That resolution is direct to the purpose for which it was intended: That it is expedient to provide the sum of $20,000,000 to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund for the relief of unemployment. But this resolution is not specific in the same way with respect to the causes for which it is intended. This resolution is to give the governor in council increased powers, or as I say, absolute powers, to withdraw from this parliament altogether its control over the moneys to be expended and other matters, and to give that power to the governor in council. Here is the wording of the present resolution:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council.

Then it goes on to enumerate the powers. That is a very different resolution, as I have said, from the one of a year ago. My right hon. friend and his colleagues would have been much better advised had they followed the resolution of a year ago—though it went very far—and adopted it as a precedent instead of going from bad to worse by now seeking to get absolute powers to themselves for these purposes. That would have removed our greatest objection to this measure. We are not going to object to the moneys that may be needed for unemployment and farm relief so long as parliament, the board of directors representing the people of this country, has its control and its say with respect to the expenditure. But we will object as strongly as we possibly can to increasing the powers of the governor in council in the matter of giving them unlimited authority with respect to public funds.

When I read the present resolution I thought to myself: "This has a familiar sound to it, but not one that relates itself to times of peace. It reads to me like a war measures act." I went to the library of parliament to secure a copy of the war enactments, to see what legislation was passed, what authority was given to the government, and what action was taken by the government under that authority. I have before me an act to confer certain powers upon the governor in council and to amend the Immigration Act, assented to on the 22nd of August, 1914. This act may be cited as the War Measures Act, 1914. Section 3 of that act reads as follows:

> The provisions of sections six, ten, eleven and thirteen of this act shall only be in force during war, invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended.

Clearly indicating that the parliament of that day felt that the powers under the sections I have just mentioned would not be appropriate powers to ask from parliament in times of peace, that they should be in force only during war, invasion, insurrection, real or apprehended. Section 6 is one of the sections so mentioned. It reads as follows:

> The governor in council shall have power to do and authorize such acts and things, and to make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion, or insurrection deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the governor in council shall extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:—

The governor in council would have power to deal with all the following matters if again empowered with the same powers given under the War Measures Act:

> (a) Censorship, and the control and suppression of publications, writings, maps, plans, photographs, communications and means of communication;
> (b) Arrest, detention, exclusion and deportation;
> (c) Control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada and the movement of vessels;
> (d) Transportation by land, air or water, and the control of the transport of persons and things;
> (e) Trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture;
> (f) Appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property and of the use thereof.

I need not read the other powers given, but I wish to direct the attention of the house to the fact that in this resolution my right hon. friend is asking for precisely the same powers by way of additional authority to the governor in council as those asked of this parliament in the War Measures Act.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Let me read part of the resolution as it stands with respect to the maintenance of peace, order and good government, and then read again the section from the War Measures Act, omitting the words, "by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection." The resolution is:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief; and for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada;

That is the resolution before us. Section 6 of the War Measures Act is as follows:

> The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may . . . . deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing in the present resolution about "defence".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. My right hon. friend has said that he has left out the word "defence"; that there is nothing concerning security and defence. I shall confine myself to the words which in intent are identical in the resolution and the act. In the act I find the words:

> The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations as he may . . . . deem necessary or advisable for . . . . peace, order and welfare of Canada.

That is practically the identical wording in both instances. On the one hand we have a War Measures Act, and on the other a peace time measure relating to the relief of unemployment and distress. In the War Measures Act it is expressly stated that the provisions of the section I have just read shall be enforced only during war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended. So I repeat to my right hon. friend that I do think he would be well advised to eliminate altogether that clause from the resolution dealing with unemployment relief. It would be most unfortunate—indeed one can scarcely say what might result from the inclusion of words through which the unemployed of the country may have reason to feel, for any cause whatever, that those particular words had been put in concerning their condition.

My right hon. friend has made clear in his speech that it is not with respect to the unemployed that he wants this particular power. He has said there is a noisy minority that may stir up a great deal of trouble in Canada and take advantage of the distressed conditions to make additional trouble. He has said that he wants power to deal with them. Again let me say to him that if he wants to deal with a noisy minority difficult to control and if he wants special legislation for that purpose, let him ask this parliament for it and it will be given to him. He should not confuse the two issues however, for the sake of the feelings of those who will be forced or obliged through necessity, as well as for other reasons, to avail themselves of help offered. I would implore that these two different purposes should not be confused in the one measure.

My right hon. friend has predicted a criticism, which he must know is inevitable, when he asks for powers such as those sought in this resolution. He himself has said that they may be described, euphoniously, I think, as giving a blank cheque to the administration.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that they "had been" described.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that they had been described. Let us drop the word "euphoniously" altogether and view in a clear and direct manner the simple fact that the government is asking this parliament to give it a blank cheque to deal with unemployment relief in such a manner as it may think wise. My right hon. friend has gone on to indicate to the house that he intends to spend money on all kinds of public works, and in that connection he has named different matters. One may see in a moment that such works may include anything, anywhere, in the nature of work or construction.

A day or two ago my right hon. friend laid on the table of the house the supplementary estimates containing works for which he asks appropriations. In them we see appropriations for wharves, public buildings and the like. There was no necessity for those supplementary estimates however, if this measure goes through. Under the measure now before us he would have authority to carry out the works mentioned in the estimates. There is no need for estimates at all, with respect to a great part of the construction work in Canada, if in this particular measure the government is to be given a blank cheque with authority to proceed. Again I say it is an injustice to the people of Canada who need relief through unemployment to be placed in the position whereby what they may receive comes only as a result of a blank cheque given to the administration to spend as it thinks best on public works.

I do say that I think my right hon. friend should amend his resolution by fixing a definite amount. I realize there are difficulties in that connection.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to disturb or interrupt my right hon. friend but I should like to say that the distinction I endeavoured to draw was that in one instance the supplementary estimates for public works were chargeable against revenues for the year, and that the charges involved by the proposed resolution were not properly chargeable against revenue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These will be charged against borrowings.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, they must be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That makes the situation even worse. So long as there is a certain control with respect to taxation, which it is the obligation of this house above all others to guard, there will be, I believe, an attitude of generosity on the part of hon. members in the house to go a very great length in allowing the ministry wide latitude in such matters. However when the ministry goes a step farther and asks not only that they shall be free to spend moneys which are to be voted by parliament and are to come out of the taxes of the people, but that they are to be free to borrow to any extent to do whatever they like, all of which means more in the way of taxation, I think they are going a very great length and are creating a situation which it is impossible for the House of Commons to countenance, if it is at all to maintain its position as representing the people of Canada and controlling the expenditures of the nation.

I can see where my right hon. friend may have difficulty in fixing an amount. He has given as his reason for wanting a blank cheque and not fixing a definite amount that a stipulated amount might lead to something in the way of competition or dole. May I say to him that if that is a true argument with respect to a limited amount, the force of the argument is vastly increased if the government is to be given a blank cheque. What is there to prevent the dole system becoming inevitable if the government has power to borrow and to spend as much as it pleases to relieve unemployment. By such a measure my right hon. friend is simply inviting the dole. There is no control of any kind the ministry can assert. The ministry can no longer assert, which is the strongest of all positions it can take, that parliament itself has not given it authority to go that far. It is relieving itself entirely of that restraint and saying to the country at large, "We have power to borrow all that we wish; we have unlimited power to use those borrowings for purposes of unemployment relief in any way that we like." Nothing of that kind has ever existed in this country before. I am not at all sure that even during the war for war purposes parliament gave the ministry any such unlimited powers. I do not believe parliament did. Certainly in time of peace this parliament cannot afford to go farther in matters of extending powers to the governor in council than parliament would have been prepared to go in time of war. I say I can realize where my hon. friend has difficulty in limiting his amount. That difficulty comes I think among other things from the large sum he fixed last year as that which he believed to be necessary to deal with the unemployment situation as it was then existing. We on this side did our best to have him realize that it was advisable to fix an amount that would serve up to the time that parliament reassembled, that the public would not distinguish between a sum of money which was put in the estimates last September and which could be spent over a prolonged period from a sum which would be just sufficient for the fiscal year and until parliament reassembled. But my right hon. friend wished to have large figures and he asked for $20,000,000.

To give the house a realization of what that sum of money meant in relation to relieving unemployment, may I recall the circumstances after the great war when the soldiers were returning and were being re-established in civil life. At that time there were large numbers of unemployed, and that was the beginning of such relief. It was not under the Liberal administration, it was under the administration of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, when the present Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) held the same portfolio. At that time there was a great deal of unemployment and the minister laid down the policy that unemployment relief was a matter, first, for the municipalities, then for the provinces, and finally it became a dominion responsibility where the emergency was large enough to be a national one. That is the ground on which unemployment relief has been given ever since. We took the same position when we were in office with respect to unemployment relief. I made it quite clear that when these conditions existed we were prepared to deal with them as the former administration had dealt with them. But how much money was found necessary to meet the unemployment situation, grave as it was at that time, and grave as it was for some years after? I have here figures of the amounts that have been spent on unemployment relief through grants to the provinces since the war; they are as follows:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Fiscal Year	Amount
1920-21	$341,831 68
1921-22	498,321 18

Those two years belong to the period of the preceding Conservative administration. Then during the Liberal administration the figures were:

Fiscal Year	Amount
1922-23	$923,272 16
1923-24	4,127 68
1926-27	77,474 56

Or a total of $1,845,027.26 over a period of ten years. That was the total amount found to be necessary for this federal parliament to vote to the provinces and the municipalities in aid of unemployment relief during those years, some of which were almost as serious from the point of view of the need for unemployment relief as certainly the last fiscal year has been. Yet my right hon. friend with these figures before him asked parliament at the last special session to vote $20,000,000 for unemployment relief. Not all of that $20,000,000 has been spent, but the public have that figure in mind. Now my right hon. friend is in this position, that having at a special session started with an outlay of $20,000,000 for a certain period, he finds it difficult at the present time to know what particular amount to fix.

Now, may I say this to him? So far as the opposition is concerned, we will be prepared to allow him to make any estimate he likes, so long as it is an estimate based on good judgment, and we will not question that estimate, we will allow him to have the amount he asks for. But we do assert, if it is only for the sake of maintaining what is the most fundamental of all obligations of the Commons, namely, its control over expenditure, that he should not ask us to give him a blank cheque to borrow as much as he pleases to deal with this particular matter. That is our position in a word, and I would again very strongly urge my right hon. friend to modify the bill that he may introduce by fixing a definite amount.

Here may I say it is always possible to call parliament together. It was deemed all-important last September to have a special session when unemployment conditions were far from being as serious as they are at the present time. If a special session was necessary last September, and my right hon. friend cannot make an estimate as to what he is going to require to meet the situation ahead, if the situation is going to be so serious that larger amounts than the sum he may ask this parliament to vote will be necessary, then it seems to me it is not only his right, it is his duty to bring parliament in session and allow parliament to deal with the greatest question that is before the country at the time. That is what parliament is for—to deal with questions that are all-important to the nation. My right hon. friend has now a breathing space, he has a clear road ahead of him, and if he asks for a sum of money, which doubtless will be sufficient to meet his purposes up to the end of the year, he can call a regular session of parliament early in January. And I think every hon. member on both sides of the house will thank him if he brings parliament into session in January rather than in March, or even in February. My right hon. friend has said he will convene parliament in the middle of February. May I say to him that it would better suit the convenience of everybody if he would bring parliament into session early in January. Let him name the sum that he thinks necessary to meet the situation up to January, and we will give him what he asks. Then early in January if he needs further money let him ask for it, and I do not think he will encounter much in the way of opposition to what he considers is necessary to enable him to finish out his fiscal year. But I do say he is going altogether too far when he asks that he shall be free even of the sittings of parliament to deal with what is now, and, what he told us in his speech to-day, will be the most serious situation that Canada has been confronted with perhaps at any time in her history.

One other objection I have to this resolution. It offers no advance over the step which was taken at the special session of parliament. At the time of the special session we very strongly advocated that the whole question of unemployment relief should be put into the hands of an unemployment relief commission, which would have power to study carefully the whole situation, which would be in touch with the provinces and the municipalities and which would be a body gathering information and knowledge as well as dealing with the situation which was before it. Had such a commission been appointed last September, and had it been given administration of the $20,000,000 which was placed at my right hon. friend's disposal, that commission would be in existence to-day and would know more or less exactly the position with respect to every province and every municipality and would be able to advise the ministry and parliament what was necessary to meet the continuing situation. But all the good that might have been obtained from a permanent body created for that special purpose has been lost; although the money has been spent, there is nothing in the way of further information upon which parliament can act. Speaking on the budget, I suggested that it was advisable immediately to call a conference of those parties that are likely to be best informed on the whole question of employment and unemployment, to bring together representatives of the provinces and of the leading municipalities, representatives of employers and of trade unions, representatives of agricultural associations and of boards of trade, representatives of women's organizations and of any other bodies that have to do with the forming of public opinion. I suggested that when that conference met they should choose a body that would be non-political in its character, and would constitute a commission for the purpose of dealing with unemployment relief. I suggested that the government might well place in the hands of a body of that kind the disposition of such funds as parliament might vote. On that body could be placed the expert men and women of this country, regardless of their politics, who understand social, industrial and economic conditions. They would be a body infinitely better qualified to deal with this question than the cabinet possibly could be, with its many other obligations and its particular duties what they are.

I still suggest that something of that kind should be done. I am not suggesting that any organization should be formed that would invade the jurisdiction of the provinces and the municipalities. What I would suggest is that a body of that kind should see to it that every province has its own organization along lines laid down by the federal commission as being the most advisable and desirable, and that each province should see that each municipality had its particular organization also to deal with the situation as it might affect that locality. In this way there would be something in the nature of uniformity and equal treatment throughout all parts of the Dominion. It is useless to say that a body of that kind could not be readily created. I remember very well when we were celebrating the diamond jubilee of confederation; there was a national committee which had to do with the arranging of the celebration throughout Canada. That committee arranged for each province to have its provincial committee, and each province arranged that each municipality should have its committee, and the result was that with respect to that particular celebration there was not one part of the Dominion which was not linked up with the great parent organization, and with respect to which the national organization had not full particulars.

A body of that kind dealing with unemployment relief would be of great national service. May I point out this further feature: We have been discussing at this session the question of unemployment insurance. I cannot conceive of a more useful fund of information to enable this parliament to deal with that question at a future session than that which could be gathered by a body of the kind. What are we to get in the way of information from all the millions that will be spent on unemployment relief under the method suggested by the Prime Minister? We will have nothing to show for it; the money will have been spent; certain employment will have been given, but the wide knowledge which might be obtained as to the causes of unemployment, the circumstances surrounding it and the like will have been lost entirely.

I do not wish to go again into the many points I raised at the special session with regard to these grants to the provinces from the federal treasury without adequate control over expenditure on the part of the federal parliament. In a word I will just say that what was said at the special session in that particular stands also by way of criticism of the resolution now before us in the form in which it has been brought down.

In conclusion may I say to my right hon. friend that in speaking on the budget I expressed, speaking not only on behalf of myself but as well for the entire opposition, a sincere desire to cooperate with the Prime Minister to the best of our ability in working out any plans which would help meet this serious situation in Canada as it exists at the present time. But my hon. friend is taking away from us any opportunity of cooperating with him at all when he asks us on almost the last day of the session, without any possibility of discussing plans at all, to give him a blank cheque to borrow what he wishes and then dismisses parliament for an indefinite period Our powers of cooperation as members of this house are definitely gone. By his resolution he virtually tells us that he does not thank us for our offer of cooperation and does not expect to receive anything in the way of helpful suggestion not only from the opposition but from members on his own side of the house. I think that is most unfortunate with respect to a situation as grave as the present one, and I can only regret that my right hon. friend makes it necessary for me to make that observation with regard to his method of dealing with the matter.

If, as my right hon. friend did, I might summarize in a word what I regard as the important points with respect to this resolution, I would say first of all that he should not seek to obtain all the powers he desires under this one resolution but should divide the resolution into three parts. I would suggest that he ask this house to vote a sum of money for unemployment relief; that he ask the house to vote a sum for farm relief and that he ask us to enact whatever he may think necessary to give him additional powers for the maintenance of peace, law and order. That is the first point. Then having divided his resolution into three separate measures let him fix the amount with respect to each measure which he deems necessary to meet the situation from now until he may call parliament again. If he does this, speaking for the opposition I may say that we will let him take the responsibility in full for what he may feel to be necessary in regard to the amount for which he asks, and we will give him that full amount. But we cannot completely surrender the rights of this House of Commons and of parliament with respect to its control over expenditures for any purpose that may be named, and we cannot accord him our approval of the resolution in the form in which it has been brought down.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, from the standpoint of labour this is the most important measure of the session, and I am sure a large number of working people across the country will welcome the news that some definite provision is to be made for unemployment I quite agree with the Prime Minister that the object ought to be to provide work rather than merely to give charity. Further than that, it seems to me an advance has been made over previous arrangements in the enunciation by the Prime Minister of the principle that the necessities of the several communities should be the governing factor in the administration of relief measures.

I think the Prime Minister made a mistake, however, when in his exhortation that we should have courage he went back to the pioneer days. It seems to me the comparison is very slight between the conditions in which men find themselves to-day and the conditions in which our grandfathers or great-grandfathers found themselves. The Prime Minister suggests that we live in easier times than they did. I am not at all sure that this is so. I have heard stories of pioneers, that they had to dig up the potatoes which they had planted and so on; I know they had to make for themselves shelters in the woods, but I point out to the Prime Minister that in the old days men had opportunities of going into the newer parts of the country. They had an opportunity of taking up land for themselves; they had an opportunity of going from one place in which there was no work to another place where they might obtain work. They had an opportunity of going into the woods for certain seasons of the year. I would say that the conditions of the thousands of our people who are now riding the freight cars from industrial town to industrial town, finding no more work in the place to which they come than in the place which they left, are a great deal harder than the conditions any of our people had to meet in the pioneer days.

The Prime Minister suggested that certain men seemed to be willing to accept charity rather than work, and he instanced the fact that one among those who came here in the unemployed parade had been seen begging, and had been driving around in a Ford car. I am quite well aware that there are men who take advantage of conditions in almost every walk of life. But speaking by and large, the vast majority of the unemployed to-day are men who are willing to work, who have worked in the past, and who would be working now if anything like suitable employment were provided. We must recognize clearly, along with this, that if men are allowed to drift about from month to month for any long period they readily become unemployable and before long they will settle down into an undesirable class. But it is altogether unfortunate that the Prime Minister should suggest that any large number of these people are out of work because they are lazy or shiftless.

Mr. BENNETT: I said the number was small but vocal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quite admit that. But I want to make it clear that the vast majority are neither lazy nor shiftless. I think that ought to be very definitely understood.

With regard to the proposal before us, it seems to me that the statement which the Prime Minister has made is much of a piece with the resolution itself; the arrangements are very indefinite indeed. The Prime Minister has said that relief shall be given through the provinces or direct in such ways as may seem desirable. That is to say, he takes, or his government takes, full authority to act in whatever way they may please. I find myself in this regard in considerable sympathy with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). We have been sitting now for nearly five months and no plans have been brought down showing how this relief work is to be carried on. The Prime Minister says that we should not anticipate difficulties. It seems to me that this is what a government is for. It was very clear to anyone who considered the general situation that there was going to be a continuance of unemployment, and it was the business of the government, as we have tried to point out from time to time since the beginning of the session, to make provision ahead of time so that no one would suffer.

The Prime Minister has all along taken the ground that we ought to beware of the dole. But I would point out that this haphazard way of giving relief, of providing relief or jobs here, there and yonder just as necessity may arise, constitutes the very worst and most demoralizing form of the dole that could be invented. I am inclined to think that the leader of the opposition is correct, that this resolution essentially involves the abrogation of parliamentary authority. I can understand that in a matter of this kind very large discretionary powers have to be given the government. But at the same time, I think that some amount should be named, a generous sum if you like, but one beyond which the government could not go. Further than that, some definite idea should be given of the general principles which will underlie the administration of this fund.

I believe the leader of the opposition has distinguished three measures that are herein included. In my study of the motion I discovered five distinct measures. First of all there is emergency relief for farmers in the drought-stricken area. That, I think, should come in a class by itself. The leader of the opposition suggested that the crop failure was ordinarily referred to as an act of God. May I remind the house that Sir Josiah Stamp referred to it as a godsend. Possibly that means the same thing, though I am a bit doubtful. It may be a godsend to the world at large, but decidedly it is anything but a godsend to the poor people of Saskatchewan. It seems easy for us to blame divine providence for conditions over which, after all, we have considerable control. Although some one part of the west may be in a very serious condition, on the whole a sufficient amount of wheat is produced to meet the needs of all the people, and a proper system of distribution could easily be arranged so that no one would suffer.

Second, there is relief for the farmers suffering because of general economic conditions —lack of markets, and other difficulties, which some of us are inclined to think are accentuated by the government's policy. I admit that the government has already brought down certain measures called compensating adjustments which may provide some help for many of these farmers. But there are others who have very little grain and who will be but slightly helped by the five cent bonus.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member suggest that the government is to blame for the drought?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. BENNETT: He said that just now

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what you said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the suggestion

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Clearly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not only would I not suggest that the government was to blame for the drought, but I suggest further that the government, together with nearly all politicians, are assuming that they have a great deal more authority or influence than they really possess. I suggest that not only so-called acts of God but the great economic laws are very largely independent of the particular government that happens to be in power at the time. I would urge upon the Prime Minister that if we had a proper system of general crop insurance and a proper distribution of wealth we could largely take care of any particular distress that might result from drought in some areas.

Third, there is involved in this resolution the establishment of certain unemployment relief schemes. And fourth, there will have to be direct relief for large groups of unemployed, which again is a distinct thing from an unemployment work scheme.

And, lastly, there is provision for the maintenance of law and order. May I suggest that the very fact that the government are asking for some special provision along this line indicates that they are somewhat doubtful of the adequacy of the measures they are proposing. When men are well cared for and work under proper conditions there is not very much danger of a departure from law and order.

With regard to unemployment schemes, the house should be definitely informed as to the general character of the schemes proposed. We should have some fairly definite regulations laid before us in addition to the general principles underlying administration. We have that in connection with the administration of almost any law on the statute books. In this matter I do not see why the house should not be given an opportunity to pass upon the general underlying principles as well as to criticize the regulations under which these principles will be carried out. We are told by the newspapers that one of the schemes may be camps in the north country. The Minister of Mines and Forests of Ontario, the Hon. William Finlayson, has suggested that labour camps will be established in northern Ontario. I have not the slightest objection to labour camps in the north country for the construction of roads, reforestation and so on. It may prove an excellent idea. But I should like to know what conditions will prevail in these labour camps. Mr. Finlayson has said there may be only a nominal wage paid. If that be the case, on behalf of labour across the country I would raise a vigorous protest against any such arrangement.

Mr. HEENAN: He said fifty cents a day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Fifty cents a day would be merely spending money. There is plenty of productive work to be done in this country and these men who find themselves out of work to-day have a right to be found work at a remunerative rate. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said that he was in favour of giving pay only to those who would work. I suppose, in a general way, we are all agreed as to that. But I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is willing to give decent wages to those who are willing to give good work? That is a matter—and an important one—upon which he made no pronouncement. It is one in which the labour people across this country are very much interested. In passing may I say that it is rather curious that we have to go to the minister of a province to find out what the federal government intends to do, but that is the only place at the present time to which we can go for information. The federal government has not announced its policy, so I presume some arrangements have been made with at least some of the provincial governments. Mr. Finlayson suggests there will be no relief given if the men refuse to stay in camp. That seems to be rather a serious situation; at least it might work out in a disastrous way. A little earlier in the session we heard a great deal about forced labour in Russia. I was rather interested in noting, according to a despatch in the Montreal Gazette of July 21, 1931, that a British group had investigated the charges made against the Russian lumber trade. The despatch reads:

Members of the British trade delegation which spent three weeks inspecting the lumber centres of northern Russia returned to Moscow to-day with the statement that they had found no evidence to support charges that forced labour is used in the Russian lumber industries.

The despatch goes on to elaborate this statement. While we have been criticizing forced labour in Russia, which appears from investigation not to exist, we are in very great danger of establishing something like forced labour in northern Ontario and other parts of Canada. In other words, we will say to these unemployed men: You go into camp and do your work under whatever conditions we prescribe for practically no wages, and if you do not do that, you starve. That is a serious situation and those are serious conditions to impose upon any free people. In fact such a situation would differ very little from slavery.

Moreover it is actually being suggested in the newspapers that these camps should be placed under military control. I hope the government has nothing of that kind in contemplation, because I feel sure it would raise a storm of protest, not merely from all sections of labour but also from all thoughtful citizens. We ought not to set up detention camps in Canada in times of peace. It is a dangerous proceeding and it is not fair to those men who are unfortunate enough to be out of work.

I should like to say a word with regard to the transients. No one has these days very much good to say of them. They have been forced to adopt more or less the life of hoboes, but in past years they have done much of the hard work of building up this country, in the lumber camps, the construction camps, the harvest fields, the mining camps and so on. Everywhere in the early stages of the development of this country we have depended upon the now despised transient workers, and they ought, I think, to receive at least a decent living. I should like to emphasize the point of view that I have been trying to bring before the house, that a decent living to this class of men has a prior claim to the interest charges of the banks, or to the dividends of the bondholders in any of our corporations or even to the interest on government bonds. I do not think this can be too strongly impressed upon the house.

Especially ought this to be emphasized with regard to foreign labour. Undoubtedly we have admitted altogether too many aliens into this country, and I think we in our corner of the house have done our best during the past ten years to protest against the immigration policy of the late government, a policy that I may say was endorsed pretty generally in the house and in the country at large. But now that we have these people here, we should treat them decently. We have spent millions of dollars in trying to induce them to leave their homes in mid-Europe or Norway or Sweden and to come to Canada to throw in their lot with us. Some of them unfortunately have not been able yet to become naturalized, and when a time of crisis comes, because of their lack of knowledge of the English language and because of their lack of connections here, they are the first to be laid off and to suffer the most heavily. Nevertheless, they have taken their full share in doing the heavy work of this country, and I would urge that nothing be done at this time of crisis that would lead to injustice in our attitude towards those whom we have asked to join with us in building up a new country.

Think of the conditions under which many of these transients are forced to live. Some weeks ago I called attention to the bad conditions that existed in the east end of this city. I find that similar conditions exist in almost every large centre from coast to coast. In the Toronto Star of June 28, I find an article on the "Jungles of Toronto." I will read a paragraph or so:

Some five hundred residents of the Don valley, Toronto's unique residential quarter, were just getting up when the Star arrived to-day. Crawling out from huts and shacks which look for all the world like beaver colonies, men of every nationality, nearly all of them unemployed, started lighting breakfast fires, washing at the stream, or cleaning their teeth.

Homeless, these men have built for themselves "homes" from the flotsam and jetsam which clutters the valley in the vicinity of the Don valley brickyards. Dried burdock plants, sticks of wood, heavy wrapping paper, and branches of trees have been interwoven and thatched to make several colonies of the little shacks. Some of the men, who were termed "transients" by a well-spoken shack owner, were sleeping in the open, on sheets of rusty tin to prevent ground moisture from seeping through.

Sleeping in the brick kiln where the officials of the works have strung up electric lights for the use of the sojourners, are the men about twenty of them who have been in the valley all winter. They are very jealous of their prerogative of sleeping in the comparatively swanky and dry kilns. Further to the east, and strung out along the railroad tracks have grown up within quarter of a mile of Rosedale, the miniature village, a unique product of the current depression.

Except for the more or less permanent residents in the brick kiln, everything in the village is in a continual state of flux. "Gangs of fifty or sixty leave here every night on the freight trains, and about the same number drift in by the same means," one of them told the Star.

Conditions of that kind, which I say are typical of those in nearly all our cities today, are a disgrace to any civilization. Those old lines of Lowell's have frequently been running through my mind lately.

Think ye that building shall endure
Which shelters the rich and crushes the poor!

It seems to me that a time of depression of this kind brings upon us the absolute necessity of giving fair play to those who are perhaps the least influential members of our community.

Let me give a warning to the government. I believe if camps are established under anything like military control, they may become schools of bolshevism. It may be that the government may be able to increase its mounted police force and keep individual camps in order. It may be that they will call in the military, but again let me warn that the army may easily become a Haman's gallows, the means by which capitalism itself will be done to death. The authorities of the present order are undoubtedly in a dilemma. They may be damned if they don't, but certainly they will be damned if they do, and I hate to think of the suffering that may be involved.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is my hon. friend not aware that both the Hon. Mr. Finlayson and the premier of Ontario have categorically denied any thought of establishing camps such as he has been describing?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have seen denials in the papers, and I have also seen statements that such camps were to be established.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Who made the statements?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They have been common in all our papers. This is almost our last opportunity for protest. Within a few days parliament will prorogue, and then the members of this house will have no opportunity of making their protests in the house, and I do want to urge upon the government that they will not permit anyone to influence them to establish camps of that character.

There is a very great deal of constructive work that might be undertaken in this country, I think, of our highways, of reforestation, of tree planting on the prairies, which in part would help prevent the drifting of our soil, of clearing the land in many scrubby districts, of drainage, of preparing semi-ready farms and better homes for the settlers on the prairie, of level crossings, of improving our parks and clearing out our slums, and particularly I would say the slums in the great city of Montreal, and of providing decent homes and healthful surroundings for the people. Only the other day a gentleman who had just returned from Vienna was telling me of the wonderful housing schemes being carried on in that fine old city. It seems to me that our government might undertake something of this character.

Of course, the old question comes up, and I think the Prime Minister will be the first to raise it: how are you to finance such schemes? I would say that if the country is as strong as he would have us believe, we have the whole credit of the country upon which to draw. The Prime Minister would finance the schemes by drawing on the consolidated revenue fund, that is, by borrowing. I would point out to him that a few years ago there was a precedent set for another type of financing. In 1914 and 1915 the government issued currency to the amount of $26,000,000, $10,000,000, if I recall aright, for the Canadian National railway, $6,000,000 for the Grand Trunk, and $10,000,000 for the treasury. I would suggest that a policy of that kind would mean that we would have the money without interest, and further than that, as my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) has pointed out, such a procedure would at the same time lessen our load of debt. That is no cheap money scheme, but at this time when we have some of the leaders in finance pointing out the necessity of policies of this character I think it would be wise that the government should carefully consider action along this line rather than continuing to borrow and thus burdening the country in the years to come with a load of debt.

The Prime Minister in this motion and also in his speech indicated that he desired greater power than is now possessed by the government to deal with those who would in any way imperil law and order. The Prime Minister said that he wanted such powers with a view to such action "as in our judgment" —I presume he meant in the judgment of the government—"will free this country of those who have not proved themselves worthy of Canadian citizenship." Again let me say that this seems rather in harmony with some of the statements that we have had recently in our newspapers. I noticed just recently an Ottawa despatch that appeared in the western newspapers, as follows:

Ottawa, July 7.—The federal government is planning a round-up of communists and revolutionists in all sections of Canada, but more particularly in the west. It is definitely established here to-day that there are a number of "Reds" in the Winnipeg district who have been marked down for arrest and deportation, and action certainly will be taken before the summer is over.

As I have tried to say in this house before, I wish that I were not placed in the position where it would always seem as if I were defending all the actions of our local communists. I am not doing that. I think, however, there is a bigger question here, and that is the question of freedom. We are in danger of becoming hysterical. For example, in the Montreal Gazette of July 23, 1931, I find an interview given by Lieutenant-Colonel R. H. Webb, the mayor of my own city, from which I quote a few paragraphs:

Bolshevism's insidious "Group G" is getting a grip on Canada's recent immigrants, especially around Winnipeg, and the Dominion, hampered with a legal system that is not made to cope with such a situation ought to enforce a national emergency measure, something like Great Britain's "Dora," or Defence of the Realm Act of war-time fame, Lieutenant-Colonel Webb said in response to a query on that subject.

Ordinary forensic methods were out of the question in dealing with bolshevik agents, he said. The Dominion ought to maintain a secret service expressly for combating the bolshevik menace, and ringleaders, instead of being hauled up in the ordinary law courts and allowed to hire high-priced counsel, ought to be just spirited out of the country and back to where they came from.

Canada ought to take a leaf out of the American book of sedition, and place the matter in the hands of the Immigration department, which is responsible for bringing foreigners into the country and making them into citizens, and of the federal police, who are here the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

It does seem to me an extraordinary thing, Mr. Speaker, that in times of peace we should have any citizen, to say nothing of the mayor of one of our large cities, telling us that ordinary forensic methods are out of the question in dealing with a certain section of our community and that we should adopt secret police methods and spirit these people out of the country without trial. I would say that anybody who makes such a statement is not only doing his best to foster bolshevism, but I think is copying directly what we denounce as bolshevist methods. If there is to be any deportation I would say that the mayor of Winnipeg might be the first to be deported for trying to introduce bolshevist methods into Canada. But I am glad to say that the position of our "travelling mayor" is not the attitude of a good many people in Winnipeg. For example, I had a letter the other day from the city clerk, enclosing a copy of a resolution passed in connection with the Alien Identification Card Bill, which I believe has been before the Senate. The resolution reads:

We, the members of the municipal council of the city of Winnipeg, are of the opinion that the "Alien Identification Card" bill now before the Senate of Canada will not accomplish the object sought by its sponsors, and tends to stigmatize newcomers to Canada. It is considered an undeserved insult by immigrants who came to this country with the best intentions of becoming, and are honestly trying to be, worthy Canadian citizens. We therefore urge the hon. members of the Senate and House of Commons not to press such legislation, but to maintain unsullied our Canadian ideals of civil equality and social justice.

May I repeat that last phrase, and I would urge upon the Prime Minister, that we should maintain unsullied our Canadian ideals of civil equality and social justice.

While I have had hundreds of communications from labour organizations across the country protesting against some of these proposed methods, I should like to read a paragraph from an editorial in the Manitoba Free Press of July 24, which I think represents fairly well the judgment of a large number of the citizens of my own community:

The communists may be imposing on the good nature of the community, and taking advantage of rights which their own creed, in its own country, would refuse to tolerate for a moment, but such action as the council takes with the communists must leave uninfringed the right of free speech exercised in Winnipeg.

Free speech cannot be allowed to come under police supervision or discretion, which is what would happen were police permits required before meetings could legally be held.

I feel proud to be a citizen of Winnipeg when one of our leading papers takes that attitude. Sometimes it seems to me that in adopting these rather haphazard measures the Prime Minister is facing a great conflagration with a little squirt gun. He is trying to put out the conflagration, and when anyone expostulates that he definitely promised to put out the fire he exclaims, in great indignation, "No, I promised to meet it. Time will tell how successful I will be," whereupon he works harder than ever with his squirt gun and the fire rages more furiously than ever.

Almost in despair he at this time seeks autocratic powers. Sometimes I have wondered how to characterize the position and methods of the Prime Minister. On occasions he seems to be the conductor of a great orchestra composed of the members of his own party. As conductor, however, he does not permit each member of the orchestra to play very long or very loud on his own instrument but he conducts as would the leader of a jazz orchestra showing his versatility by playing in turn on each instrument as it is passed up to him.

Mr. POULIOT: Sousa's band.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that in this resolution not only have we autocratic action, so far as the party is concerned, but the Prime Minister is taking the powers entirely out of the hands of parliament and placing them in his own and in those of his immediate colleagues. I think the situation is too dangerous for that. Further, may I venture to suggest that the world wide depression demands a great deal more in the way of constructive, far reaching planning.

I feel sure that the Prime Minister is sincere in the belief that his policies will solve our problems. I will say that he is almost fanatically sincere in that regard. Those of us however who have not his particular brand of fanaticism may be pardoned if we question his methods, when he asks us to hand all power over to him.

In closing may I say that while we have been talking to-day about unskilled workers, nothing whatever has been said about the skilled workers of whom there are very large numbers out of work, and for whom provision would not be made by the measures which have been indicated. Further, there are a very considerable number of women workers about whom very little has been said. The same is true of clerical workers who are perhaps in a more serious plight than manual workers. Last, I would point out the thousands of young people in this great land of opportunity who have not been given a chance as they left school to procure work. I cannot see that haphazard emergency methods, such as that now before us, are going to solve the problems of the classes which I have merely enumerated. Even now, before this house prorogues, might it not be possible for the government to reconsider the situation, take the house into its confidence and work out some sort of general plan, appoint a central committee which would not merely supervise the giving of relief—which in fact might not supervise the giving of relief at all—but which might study the underlying causes of unemployment and have the general direction and planning of what might be done to meet the situation.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not purpose to delay the house at any great length, but I feel I should say a few words. With much that the speaker who has just taken his seat has said, I agree. With some of the criticisms by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), I agree. The unfortunate fact is that it does not matter very much what the leader of the opposition, the leader of the Labour group or myself may say in the present instance. I am convinced that for the purpose of meeting a crisis the government is determined to carry through its dictatorial and autocratic policy of usurping the powers of the state. That the need for drastic action is there, I do not deny. There is no doubt under heaven that one of the most serious situations has arisen in Canada, and it is now proposed to meet it planlessly. The proposal before us is of a broad and general character. The amount of money involved we know nothing about; we do not know what will be spent, and I doubt very much if the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself has any comprehensive idea or estimate of the amount actually required. I doubt if he knows what works he will undertake. I suggested to him to-day one public work which might be proceeded with, but he replied that the engineers were not yet in agreement concerning that particular work. I do not think it would be a difficult matter, now that the surveys have been completed concerning the Peace River outlet, to have an agreement. I think action by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways and Canals would result in that very useful piece of work being proceeded with.

Because of the refusal of the leader of the opposition himself, as well as the present Prime Minister, to accept recommendations made a year ago and on previous occasions by hon. members in this corner of the house, we find ourselves in the present unfortunate position. A year ago last May I closed my remarks on the unemployment debate by saying to the then Prime Minister that he would not have taken the first step towards the solution of this problem until he authorized a comprehensive survey of economic and social conditions in Canada, with a view to planning for the solution of those problems. Nothing was done; no such body was appointed nor has it been appointed by the present administration. There has been no survey. In a previous debate this session one of the ministers opposite suggested that such a survey could be undertaken by the census takers—an absurd proposition.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, if this government or the preceding one had been gifted with that vision, which ought to be a prerogative of statesmen—and Prime Ministers in particular—they would have seen this situation. All they had to do was to listen to and carry into effect the suggestions of hon. members in this corner of the house, or to listen to the suggestions of such outstanding men with wisdom and brains as Sir George Paish, Lord d'Abernon and others who forecast the present situation in regard to unemployment. The situation in Europe alone would have justified anybody assuming that such a condition would come about.

What do we find? At the very outset of this session hon. members opposite, including the Prime Minister, attempted to minimize the seriousness of the situation, attempted to gloss over it. Then, on July 1, the Prime Minister made a pronouncement to the country more devastating in its gloomy forecast than anything that the people of Canada or hon. members in this house had heard of. He comes into the house to-day and by implication at least, if not by actual words, states that the situation has now become so desperate that nothing short of war measures could be calculated properly to deal with it. I doubt if there is any country in the world—there is not one that I know of—which so far has found it necessary to undertake such drastic and far-reaching measures to meet the economic situation. In other words it would appear that the Prime Minister is now so exercised—and I congratulate him upon being troubled, even though he be late—that he is prepared even to usurp the powers of parliament itself and resort to what might virtually be termed a dictatorship for the purpose of meeting the situation. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I think he would be wise to meet the suggestion of the leader of the opposition to state a definite amount sufficiently large to cover every need anticipated, and then proceed with a general plan of constructive public works to give employment to those requiring it. To-day the situation is quite a bit worse than it was a year ago or even two years ago. In those days the contention that the constitutional position in dealing with unemployment was that the municipalities came first, the provinces second, and then the federal government; that contention was perhaps unassailable at that time. But now, as the Prime Minister himself would describe it, and in fact does describe it, we have a national calamity, a national crisis, so great in its magnitude that he is now prepared to ask parliament for these sweeping powers. The fact of the matter is the whole situation is now reversed, and instead of the municipalities bearing the first responsibility the federal government must do so. The Prime Minister himself accepted that position when, speaking on behalf of his party during the last election campaign, he said:

> I will end unemployment, I will take such measures as will provide for the giving of work to every man and woman in this country prepared to work.

Now we find a measure introduced which, in part, is a proposal to provide public work—at what wages we do not know yet—and, in part, makes provision for the dole. That is what it amounts to. I wish I could have some comprehensive idea of just exactly what is in the Prime Minister's mind. I do wish hon. gentlemen opposite had not made those statements they did make early in the session, when even the Minister of Labour himself, speaking in Hamilton on April 28 last, expressed these views:

> In Canada the unemployment problem is diminishing. We have experienced the most distressing winter in many years, but we emerge into the sunlight of hope at the beginning of another season, and it is within the realm of reason to say that before the snow falls again our wories will have largely disappeared.

The situation now is so bad that we need a war measures act to cope with. I congratulate the government, however, on proposing to meet the problem by providing work. I am afraid difficulties face the administration in this regard. If the government does succeed in meeting this problem with useful and remunerative work it will be the first government that I know of that has ever been able to do so. All governments are agreed that the policy of providing work is the best, and so are all individuals who have studied the question. And after all, all the men ask is work or maintenance. But all governments on coming into power have one eye on the treasury and the other on the unemployment problem, and the result is that one is controlled by the exigencies of the other. In Great Britain the grave situation has not been met by comprehensive public works, but a great deal of direct relief has been provided; much the same situation prevails in Germany; much the same situation exists in the United States, where charitable organizations are the present resource of the unemployed, the starving, and the miserable.

I think the time has come, Mr. Speaker, when governments should reconsider their whole method of borrowing for purposes such as these, and I support most strongly the latter suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), when he submitted to the Prime Minister a plan for providing the necessary moneys for all public work that might be required to take up the slack of unemployment by simply issuing dominion notes on the basis—if he wants to go through that formality—of dominion bonds deposited with the treasury board. We do it for our chartered banks now; why not do it for the state? It is a sound, a reasonable proposal. We could do that without charging the state a single dollar of interest. The additional currency thus created could be repaid subsequently out of taxation. It appeals to me as a far superior method to borrowing money on long-term bonds and paying high rates of interest.

Before I sit down I want to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the demoralization due to the semi-starvation pay that is being given at the present time and during the last winter has been given to those who secure either direct relief or the inadequate work offered. In the city of Calgary, for example, until quite recently unemployed single men were receiving meal tickets for one meal a day and a bed in return for one day's work. I do not need to invite hon. members opposite who will spend a dollar and a half on a single meal in the Chateau Laurier to imagine just what the life of these people must be. One meal is all they get a day, in return for which they have worked eight hours. Recently the regulations were altered, and now the men are asked to give two day's work each week for the same return—two day's work for one meal a day and a bed. And even at that, Mr. Speaker, the single unemployed men in the city of Calgary are in a superior position to the single unemployed men in most of the cities of this country, for with few exceptions there is no provision for unemployment relief for single men.

The next thing to which I want to draw the attention of the Prime Minister is the situation in Drumheller, in my own constituency. There the married people, unemployed since last spring, very slightly employed in the winter of 1929-30, and with practically no employment, or very little, in the winter of 1930-31, have been receiving $1.25 a week per adult, and 25 cents per week for each child, irrespective of age or size. Can you maintain the moral fibre of the citizens of the country on the basis of pay of that kind? I ask the Prime Minister, can he expect that optimism and faith and pioneering courage which he seeks in our people on pay of $1.25 a week for each adult and 25 cents a week for each child? It is nothing but slow starvation. That is the situation that has existed in connection with hundreds of people in my own constituency in the mining valley of the Red Deer. Recently as the result of constant agitation, as the result of parades and demonstrations, the single unemployed men in that vicinity secured a measure of relief—one dollar and a half a week for a full-grown man. All they ask, Mr. Speaker, is work. Here is a message sent to the premier of my province, by these very men who held a mass meeting of some thousand odd, over four hundred of whom paraded to the police station at Drumheller seeking relief:

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Unless relief is immediately granted, workers must help themselves. They will not die at the time when warehouses are full of all kinds of food and other necessities of the workers. We have produced the wealth and we have the right to live.

Dangerous words, Mr. Speaker, for men in dangerous circumstances. We have the mayor of Edmonton emphasizing this in an emphatic prediction that we shall see, "Worse times than we yet have seen." His statement that the situation was getting beyond the power of the civic authorities to deal with deserves consideration at the hands of this house. According to the newspapers, after meeting Premier Brownlee and discussing the situation in Lethbridge, he said:

The situation in Lethbridge was acute and the costs to the city so high that it was the intention to cut off the relief April 26. At least 700 families in the city were in a state of destitution.

The miners in the Drumheller valley—the Prime Minister is not particularly interested, but I do not suppose it makes any difference—wired the premier of Alberta as follows:

We want work or full maintenance—

In order to make absolutely clear what they meant by "full maintenance" they added:

—the latter meaning three meals a day and a place to sleep.

Surely every Canadian man and woman and child is entitled to three meals a day and a place to sleep.

We want no discrimination between single and married men and no eviction for non-payment of rent while unemployed.

They complained that their light and water had been cut off and that they needed clothing. They preferred work to relief. It is the cry of every man who has anything real in him,—work, not relief.

There is just one other matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister. I have here the report of a meeting of the town council of Smiths Falls. Earlier in the session we heard that the district about that town was comparatively well off. Here is the quotation:

. . . . town council at its regular meeting last night . . . .

This is dated July 7, 1931.

. . . . heard the startling statement that families in this town were starving and that in some cases were absolutely without provisions. . . . In speaking on unemployment conditions, Councillor P. A. McKeown declared that some families in Smiths Falls were "starving" and thought a committee should be appointed to work in connection with church and welfare societies in order to raise a fund to provide relief for the families of unemployed during the coming winter.

"There have been cases," he said "where families were absolutely without provisions for the week end. They have come to me on Saturday nights and I have had to go out and dig up enough food to carry them over the week end."

Returning to the situation in my own constituency for a moment, I crave the attention of the Prime Minister to the last report of the welfare board which was appointed there. Let me briefly state that the situation became so desperate towards last spring that a meeting was called of the church authorities, the civic authorities and other influential persons in Drumheller, and at that meeting it was decided to set up a local relief board. This was done. That relief board functioned as long as all the funds the town council thought they could possibly vote lasted. Recently the resources being exhausted, even the official relief officer has gone, and the only body dealing with the situation there is a voluntary body created by some warm hearted Canadians who are doing their best to carry on the work formerly done by the relief board. This is the quotation I wish to read:

"We only have a small supply of tea and some dry bread," said a lady asking Mrs. L. Mackay, local relief officer, for relief early this week. "My husband is laid off from the mine permanently (at least until next fall) and we have no hopes for the future." This is only one of the many pitiful tales heard daily at the relief office.

Another case is that of a destitute family who could not send their children to school because of lack of footwear. There are four children in the family, the youngest four years old. Since the welfare board has stepped in to help, the three children going to school have been provided with shoes and the younger one, who can only stand at the door and watch the other children play, will be provided with shoes as soon as further donations are made to the welfare board.

In some cases there are six children in the family and the board is supplying these with milk in an endeavour to restore health and strength to the little bodies.

Donations of money and clothing are needed by the board to continue the work. Mrs. Mackay is always busy investigating cases, and so far as can be learned very few undeserving cases are slipping by. If any of our readers can spare a used suit, shoes, or any kind of wearing apparel the same would be gratefully received at the local relief office, upstairs in the city hall.

These, Mr. Speaker, will give this house some conception of conditions with which we are not all closely familiar. The situation is more terrible than anything that has already been said. Now I give to the house an editorial written by a man of whom the Prime Minister knows well, a man held in high esteem in the city of Edmonton. I refer to Mr. Elmer Roper, editor of the Labour News, who says:

I have something to get off my chest this week. Sunday I had a talk with Mr. Edwardson, the director of Hope Mission in Edmonton, and Monday morning I spent some time with him again, during which I saw the unemployed single men getting their porridge. About a thousand men are being fed in that way, and twenty-five hundred to three thousand bowls of porridge are being ladled out each day. The place opens up at seven-thirty and stays open until eleven in the morning, then opens again at three, and mush is dispensed until seven. The most striking thing about the whole business, to me, is the ages of the men. They range, I should say, from twenty to thirty. There is only a sprinkling of older men. Another noticeable feature is the cleanliness of most of them, and the fact that the majority whom I saw seem to be English-speaking fellows. I came away with a deep sense of the tragedy of the whole affair. With a few noticeable exceptions, they were a fine looking group of young men. (They'd have made wonderful recruits in the war). They possess the potentialities of good service to society. But because of society's lack of intelligence they are being demoralized and their energies are being wasted.

That is the situation, Mr. Speaker. Due to the delay all summer long countless thousands, nay, tens of thousands of single unemployed men have drifted across this country from city to city in misery; almost hopeless; begging; living at missions; sleeping where they can; riding on freight trains; learning how to steal; learning how to beg; learning how to starve. What an indictment of a country rich beyond the dreams of nations; what an indictment of a government that pledged itself to solve the problem; what an indictment of a nation that prides itself on its vast wealth as well as its potentialities.

If you want the final word, Mr. Speaker, it is to be found in the letters I have received from those who beg to be deported. We have heard much in this house from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others against the policy of deportation for certain reasons. I have no particular complaint; so far nothing has come to my attention in that regard. But I have this complaint: We have a situation here under which, having invited Britishers to Canada, and having promised them steady work at good wages, we now find the same Britishers failing to get the promised work begging to be deported. Not only that, but they thank you when you secure deportation for them. I have a letter here from a man named Joe Lewis, a Welshman, who says:

I came out here two years ago from Aberavon, South Wales. My wife has been sick ever since, and last February applied for deportation. I have been interviewed by the officer, and this I know is hard to ask you but could you ginger them up that end so as to get the family back home out of this misery? With all fraternal greetings,

I hope to remain,

Fraternally yours,

Joe Lewis.

I think that man now is on his way home. I have another letter here from Wayne, Alberta, written by another Britisher, George Ritchie. I helped secure deportation for him and his family, and he writes as follows:

Well, Mr. Garland, I humbly beg to thank you on behalf of myself and family for the way you handled my case and the trouble and pains you used to help me in my great difficulty of getting away. Needless to say my wife has improved in health already, and looking forward to getting back home.

This country must learn to offer more to its people than the hopelessness depicted in letters of that kind, which have been received not only by myself, but I presume by other members as well. The situation is now in the hands of the Prime Minister; whether we will or not he is going to take to himself power to deal with unemployment in the widest and most drastic fashion. The responsibility for failure will be upon him, but in conclusion I say to him that he will have been derelict in his duty and will have betrayed the best interests of Canada if he permits, so long as he is Prime Minister with the power to vote money, any man or woman to exist on $1.50 per week, or 25 cents per child. If he is not able to provide useful and remunerative work I say at least he should provide these people with enough to supply them with three meals a day, a bed and necessary clothing.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I wish to make a few remarks on this very important resolution. I have always regarded the unemployment question as being the very centre of the great problem of our modern world, the problem that has yet to be solved. We may regard the problem of civilization as being focussed in this unemployment question with which Canada, like all other countries in the world, is confronted to-day.

The resolution before the house recognizes the necessity of giving some relief to the unemployed of our country and it makes a definite proposal as to how this is to be done, seeking from this house the necessary authority to enable the government to carry into effect the policy indicated in the motion. I look upon that, in itself, as a real step forward. I am quite sure that the people of Canada will feel relieved when they read the resolution; and they will be more satisfied when they read the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to-day, when he said most definitely that no one was to be hungry or cold or in dire distress in Canada in the coming year, who was willing to work if work could be found. And the right hon. gentleman intimated that where people could not work, or where it was impossible to get work for them, they would be similarly taken care of.

That, to my mind, is the announcement of a policy from which no government in the future will ever be able to depart until the problem of unemployment has been solved. I do not think it has ever been so clearly stated by any government before, that the people of the country should be protected from hunger and cold. And when we realize that the country itself is well able to meet the situation; when we realize that there is no richer country in the world, certainly not in proportion to population; when we realize that there is an abundance of all kinds of goods which the people require, then we can see that it is only a matter of ordinary common sense and wisdom for a government to declare that it will see to it that the people shall not suffer from any lack of food and clothing.

In this resolution the government undertakes to do what the capitalistic system has failed to do. Whether capitalism will undergo some modification in the future and continue, I do not know. But I do know, as everyone else knows, that it has fallen down; it is not able to distribute to the people who require them the goods which it has produced. Here the government of Canada has definitely undertaken that in the coming year goods will be distributed to the people, at least to such an extent as will prevent hunger and cold.

Now, the question is whether or not the policy of the government in this regard is the best one to follow. The Prime Minister has challenged the commoners, if the proposed method is not satisfactory, to suggest a better way of going about it. The criticism so far has been against a request from the government for a blank cheque from parliament as it has been described. The government is criticized for asking authority to spend as much money as it may see fit, and the Prime Minister has declared that a limitation is undesirable. He asks us—How can it otherwise be done—I do not think it can be done otherwise with efficiency, nor do I think that if another way could be found it would be wise to take it. I think the proposed method is the wisest under the circumstances. And I have not been converted to that view by the resolution itself nor by the arguments in its defence; for I said the same thing when addressing myself to the unemployment question in the budget debate. At that time the government was criticized for failure to state in the budget a specific amount to be expended in unemployment relief. During that debate I said as clearly as I could that in my opinion the budget was not the place in which to make that provision. I did not think that the government was in a position to say definitely how much was required, and therefore, in taking the same view now, I am not admitting that I have changed my mind in consequence of the resolution. I recognize, in view of all the circumstances, the wisdom of the policy now proposed.

If the government did fix a figure it would be immediately open to criticism that that figure was either too small or too large; some would take one view and some the other. And if a specific sum were indicated, it could be at best only a guess. Moreover, all the municipalities and the provinces would be immediately trying to get their share of what there was, and to get it as quickly as they could. If the appropriation were a large one, they would be competing with one another to see who could get the most. They would argue, as I have often heard them argue, "We have to pay for it anyway out of our taxes and we may as well get as much as we possibly can." Another consideration is this. If a specific sum were mentioned the tendency of the manufacturers and large employers of labour would be to rest on their oars more or less. They would feel that they had less responsibility than before in our present industrial situation, because the government had decided to spend so much to relieve unemployment.

Taking all phases of the question into consideration, I am quite satisfied that the government could not declare what specific amount would be required. They could only guess at it, and even if they were approximately right it would not be good policy. It is far better for us to give the government what it now asks, namely, the right to expend whatever sum is necessary and where it is necessary. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we must entrust any government, under circumstances such as we are faced with now, with that much authority. The government in accepting responsibility in this regard, cannot, if it fails, escape its responsibility to the people; if it misspends the money or if its policy proves to be a fiasco, parliament and the people will have to deal with the subject again. The government cannot escape its responsibility in this regard even if it were desirous of so doing. We are now taking the logical and wisest step in order to deal with a specific situation.

It has been contended, especially by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), that the government by this measure is being granted too much power. I am not sure that I can quite follow the logic of that argument. According to our system the government, for all practical purposes, is parliament, and parliament is the government. I would say that the objection that the government is getting too much power under this bill has not even a technical basis upon which to rest for the government makes its appeal to parliament and parliament is the majority of this house. The majority of the house belongs to the government side, and the government controls the party in power. Therefore, in reality, in respect to not only this government but all governments under the party system, the government is parliament and parliament is the government. Theoretically we can argue otherwise if we choose to do so; theoretically we can say that parliament has this, that and the other thing, but the only thing that parliament has is the decision of the majority. The decision of the majority is that of the government party in every case, and the government party is controlled very largely by the cabinet. Perhaps this is a good thing in most instances. There you have the situation, so what is the use of saying that parliament is now being ravished and the government is obtaining powers greater than it has any right to receive? Under our system the government cannot do that if it brings the measure to the house, for it is parliament that is now acting. In that regard I could not follow the reasoning of my good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), when he stated that the government under this bill was usurping the power of parliament. I am at a loss to see how parliament can usurp the power of parliament; for, I repeat, this bill will have to be passed by the majority of this house which is the voice of parliament, and parliament cannot usurp its own powers. As a matter of fact, this bill does not seek power; it expresses power, and anyone who wishes to challenge that statement must challenge our entire system of government. I have done that many a time, and I still do it. I do not think this is the best system of government, but it is the system that exists and in this bill the government is carrying out the constitutional method. There is nothing wrong with that. Anyone who criticizes it ought to challenge the system itself, because that is the only ground he would have in this connection.

To pass on to the other phase of the question which has been touched upon by the Prime Minister and those who replied to him, in regard to the powers whereby the government seeks to enforce law and order, any government must be clothed with powers to act in an emergency in order to protect the system for which it stands. That is a principle which cannot be put aside even though we may not be supporters of the government or of the order of society which it represents. The power to meet any emergency is inseparable from the idea of government; it is inherent in government. A government without power to protect itself is not a government at all. I do not know that Canada is in any great danger of revolutionary uprising at present; I would say that probably it is in less danger in that respect than any other country in the world, but I know as well as any other hon. member that there are those who seek to upset by force this system, not only in this country but in all others, and they do not hesitate to say so. They declare that all governments exist by force, which is true, and they say that we can upset that government or system only by force. They openly say: We are out by force to upset that system. They know quite well that power of this kind is inherent in government and they do not hesitate so to declare. I do not know to what extent the danger may be from that quarter; I think it is very small; but if there were a danger I would not want to accept the responsibility of not having provision made to take care of it. When there are numbers of people in the country who openly declare they are out to upset the whole system by force, I do not consider that method intelligent, and I am still trying to hold on to my faith in the possibility of modifying our present system through intelligence. While I do not agree with the system as it exists to-day; while I have every hope that a new system will be established, nevertheless I can see that if the system as it is were swept away by those who would seek to detroy it, I would be defeated in trying to modify the system through intelligence just as those who believe in the system would be defeated. To that exent there is no middle course: we must either openly and avowedly take our side with those who stand for the overthrow of the system by force, or else give our support both moral and direct to the protection of the system at it exists. Therefore, I see no objection to giving the government the authority which it asks. Even if there is no danger of their having to use it, the government must be clothed with that authority. I hope the clothes will fit well; if they do not, the government will have to pay for the misfit.

I would deplore nothing more than civil disruption to any degree in Canada next year or any other year; I would deplore that there should be any act which would warrant the government in exercising that power, but it would be equally deplorable if conditions arose which demand its exercise and the government did not have the right to use it. So from that point of view I see no reason why this measure should not be passed.

Let me turn next to the main proposal, and the one in which we are all more interested than even in these points of academic discussion. I refer to the question of how to meet the unemployment situation that at present exists in Canada. Of course I know the government, in taking this course, does not consider it is solving the problem of unemployment for all time. It will give employment to the people only while they are doing the work which is provided for them, and not any longer. There is nothing in the proposal that would indicate a fundamental alteration in the system itself that would do away with unemployment. But the action that is being taken is very necessary at the present time, and the question is: what suggestions can we make to the government in this regard?

I was glad indeed to hear the declaration that the government intended to enter upon extensive public works, to provide constructive, real work, not work that is manufactured by groups and municipalities as is sometimes done, merely to keep idle hands busy, like carrying a heavy stone from one end of the garden to the other for eight hours a day in order that a man may feel morally justified that he had done sufficient work to entitle him to eat three meals. That kind of work we do not want, but real constructive work which is required, work which will be an asset to the nation, work which will assist Canada to produce greater wealth in the future than it has in the past. That is the kind of work we desire to have done, and I am delighted that the government has seen fit to announce that policy now because I believe that that in itself is a mark of progress.

As I have perhaps too often said to this house in criticism of government policies generally in respect to unemployment, most governments during times of depression spend less money than at any other time, and most governments during times of great prosperity have a tendency to spend more money than at any other time. That is the natural reaction, I say, to the general public feeling, but I argue that it is bad policy. The governments of the country, municipal, provincial and dominion, taken together represent a greater control of the capital expenditure of this country than any other force, and if all these governments would undertake to plan carefully even their own expenditure, they could to a very great extent regulate the periods of depression and unemployment. They have control. They may spend this year or next year. I think that the adoption of such a policy by the government would be a step in advance; not that it would cure anything, but it might prevent a good deal of unnecessary suffering if all the governments of Canada, municipal, provincial and dominion, would undertake to think ahead and to engage in capital expenditure to the greatest extent in times of depression and to husband its resources in times of prosperity. That would have a regulating effect upon the boom and slump cycles which unfortunately come because we have not intelligent control of finance in relation to production and distribution.

There are many kinds of work which the government could undertake, and may I suggest that the government ought to do this thing in a big way if it is going to do it at all. I hope the government will do it in such a way that it will not be necessary for working people to lower their standard of living next winter. I hope that they will engage in it in such a way that it will not be necessary to reduce wages below the ordinary standards, and that they will engage in it in a big enough way to give a stimulus to the whole business life of Canada. It may not take so much to do that as we might at first think. Unquestionably the depression in this and all other countries is due to the fact that there is not sufficient purchasing power amongst the people to distribute the goods the production of which the modern machine has made possible. You may explain that any way you like. But put the money into the pockets of the people of Canada to-day and you will not require any money for unemployment relief. There would be plenty to do. You would then have the purchasing power necessary to move the goods now lying on the dust-laden shelves of the warehouses, and as soon as those goods are moved the wheels of industry will start replenishing the shelves, and then you are off. The great question is to distribute purchasing power, and I hope the government will enter into this building of public service in such a way as to make a real impression on the economic life of the country. There are so many things that might be done. I shall enumerate a few of the smaller ones first, and then finish up with a few of the larger ones.

There could be built schools and colleges. We need more of both. Roads and bridges could be built. Electric and steam railways, footpaths, parks, the making of improvements, such as pavements and so forth, the building of hospitals, sanatoria and laboratories, public buildings, the improvement of harbours, the development of canals and generally the means of inland navigation, the reclamation of waste lands, reforestation, the making of supplies for public institutions, such as clothing, uniforms and furniture.

May I add to that list, the building of houses for the people of Canada to live in? There is not one of our large cities in Canada, so far as I am aware, which has escaped the slum condition characteristic of older cities. Go to Montreal or Toronto, or even to Winnipeg, and you will find street after street of houses that ought to be burned down. You will find people struggling to pay high rents for houses because houses are scarce. At the same time you will find hundreds of idle carpenters, hundreds of idle plumbers, hundreds of men idle who would like to dig cellars and make concrete basements. You will find lumber burning up in the sun in the lumber yards of Canada, and tall timber in the forests waiting to be cut down with the axe. We have all these things in abundance, and yet we have people without houses to live in. Go on the prairies among the farmers and you will find dozens of farmers living in hovels, shacks, with the rain pouring in on them when it rains, and the occupants freezing almost to death in the winter time. These people require better houses, and it would be in the interest of Canada to build them. It is far better for us to build houses, to remove the slums from our cities, to raise the standard of living for our agriculturists, than merely to give hand-outs in relief in order to keep people from starving. Such is the kind of constructive work that I hope the government will undertake.

Let me now indicate a few things that might be done in a bigger way. We hope that some day in the near future the deep waterway on the St. Lawrence will be developed. We hope that in the near future it will be possible to travel by motor from the eastern coast to the western coast. We want that highway built, whether it is built as a national highway all the way through or the stretches of provincial highways are merely linked up. That work should be done. It would be of great service to the people of Canada. To give another example, take the Peace River outlet, which has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). There is a necessary railway to be built; the people are needing it, and there cannot be a more advantageous time to build it than now when money can be borrowed perhaps more cheaply than in the midst of a period of prosperity. There are three great undertakings. Let them be undertaken as speedily as possible, as well as similar undertakings. Suppose it puts Canada $500,000,000 more in debt. Suppose it even went so far as to put Canada $1,000,000,000 more in debt, for construction, for peace, for the development of national life, a billion dollars in the interests of constructive human statesmanship. Suppose it did. Could not that well be defended? We cannot defend the expenditure of two billion dollars for war. I do not know of anybody who either then or now would say that we could have got rid of that expenditure, but after all, what have we to show for it but thousands of graves of our best in Flanders, hundreds and thousands of our citizens crippled, and all the ill-feeling which develops as the result of a world war of that magnitude, with all the problems which have been created thereby? And still we have to meet all the little wars and all the big wars which the peace following the last war made possible. That is all we got out of it. All the goods were produced and destroyed, but for a peace program of this kind the goods we produce will remain to reproduce themselves in the greater wealth of the nation. I do not think any government has to fear criticism from intelligent people when they undertake the expenditures necessary to meet the country's needs in the midst of an economic breakdown of society such as is common to all nations of the world to-day. The government has committed itself to a policy of protecting Canadian citizens from hunger and starvation, and it proposes to do so, not merely by doling out a few dollars now and again, but by constructive work. I have tried to indicate some of the things I believe should be done under that program by the municipal and provincial governments in joint operation with the federal government.

The question now arises: Where is the money to come from to carry out these works? That is the greatest problem which any government of to-day has to face. I do not know whether the government has agreed with what I have said so far, but I am sorry to say I am sure it will not agree with my next statements. From now on I go alone, so far as the government is concerned. The government does not believe it is possible to finance our national undertakings in any way other than the method which in the past has been adopted. I am quite convinced that the day is not far distant when this or some other government wlil change its mind on that point. Throughout the entire world the question of credit is to-day the chief matter of discussion. We know that at the moment Europe is almost at the point of breakdown, through lack of proper credit facilities. We know that condition has been brought about by a debt creating system which, by its very nature, grows from day to day and from generation to generation until the burden of the world's debt becomes so terrific that the financial structure crumbles under the weight. To put it another way, international and national debts have so absorbed the credit of the people that there is nothing left to live on, and nothing left to circulate or to make goods move. There is nothing left with which to enter into new productions, so great has become the debt system. If we proceed with a program such as that indicated in the resolution we shall have to borrow or create money to do it. If we borrow the money, the banks create it; if we create it, we do ourselves what the banks would do for us. That is the only difference.

I am going to suggest, as I have done ad nauseam to this house, that the government consider the possiblity of financing this matter by putting the national credit behind it, and not by issuing debt and interest bearing bonds which will not only add to the debt but in twenty years will be doubled, and will add to the burden of debt from which the nations of the world are at the present time struggling to free themselves. I do not suppose it would be edifying to hon. members if I were to attempt to analyze the credit system of Canada. I do not think I would be justified in letting this opportunity pass, however, without emphasizing that this is a time when an experiment could be made, at least on a small scale. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) has been urging that we should alter the gold basis of our currency sufficiently to place us on a par with countries with whom we have to compete in business. Here is a method of achieving that result without doing anything with the gold. Let there be issued in Canada sufficient credit to undertake these public services, and immediately, as the Prime Minister will declare, if asked, currency will be debased to correspond with the currency of other countries, and immediately we shall have done what the hon. member for Macleod has been asking us to do and would place ourselves on a level with Australia, Argentine and the countries with which we must compete when selling our goods in the markets of the world. They would not have an advantage, as they do now, of between 25 and 30 per cent when they sell their goods to countries to which we desire also to sell.

I do not think I could add much more to the discussion. That the government has undertaken to deal with the problem of unemployment is a mark of progress. I believe it should be a part of the government's policy to regulate its public works with a view to doing most of them at a time when we have greatest unemployment, and doing least when we have greater prosperity. Further, I believe that the financing of such an undertaking should be done directly from the treasury of the state without any interest charges beyond those which are necessary to meet the handling charges. In that way we would increase the purchasing power of the community without increasing its debt, and by increasing the purchasing power we would stimulate industry in Canada and go a long way towards relieving the present unemployment situation.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the city of Winnipeg is vitally concerned in the measure of relief foreshadowed by this resolution. In point of population Winnipeg is the third city in Canada; in normal times it is the third city in point of the value of its industrial output. To-day Winnipeg stands first among the cities of Canada in the gravity of the unemployment situation; surely that is a matter of real concern. I think I am not overstating the facts when I say that in that city and its immediate environs there are to-day 30,000 workless. Who are those workless people? Many, it is true, are transients; many are unskilled workmen; many, too, are skilled artisans; there are clerks and divers other classes of citizens who in times of normal prosperity administer to the multitudinous needs of a great metropolis.

It is my privilege to represent in this house an important constituency in that city, that of Winnipeg South Centre. That constituency, including that portion of the municipality of St. James immediately adjoining on the west, contains, conservatively speaking, about 125,000 people. Its actual voting strength at the last general election was approximately 47,000. In it there are all classes of people living under normal standards. There are people of moderate wealth, but the vast majority are engaged in business, in retail trades, in various working and building trades; some are clerks—indeed I think I may describe the constituency as one representative of the working people of Canada who depend upon their day's work for their daily bread.

It has been intimated in the press throughout the country that Winnipeg of all the cities of Canada is a city where there congregate in large numbers those who for want of a more accurate description the papers call "reds." I am here to-night, sir, to say that that is untrue. The vast majority of the people of the city of Winnipeg, as I believe of all other cities in this country, call them what you like, are plain, honest citizens, seeking only the right to work and to maintain their families in reasonable comfort. It is true that in Winnipeg, as in other cities, we have certain professional agitators whose dividends depend upon dissension, discord and agitation. But, thank God, they are few. While they are articulate and vociferous, and consequently acquire a notoriety and a publicity far beyond their numerical importance, let me say that at heart the city of Winnipeg is sound. In fifty years it has grown from a hamlet to be the third city of Canada; I am proud to-night to be a representative from that city.

The people of Winnipeg—and may I presume to speak not merely for the people of my constituency, but for the fair-minded people of Winnipeg, generally—are looking with hope to the legislation that is at present before this house. I am happy to say that I think they have reason to look with hope, indeed to look with far greater hope than would be indicated by the criticism offered by the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon and by those who have followed him in a similar vein. Since I have referred to the ex-Prime Minister, I think I could not better describe the plight of these people than to use his own language in his book on Industry and Humanity. At page 51 in discussing people in like circumstances he says:

> The sufferings of the victims of economic pressure are not so dramatically displayed as are the sacrifices of men in war. They are none the less real, though being silently, slowly and obscurely borne.

That is true, sir—it is comparatively easy, booted and spurred, with bugles calling to ride into action with death tugging at your stirrup leathers; but to be denied the right to earn your daily bread, to sit without employment, hope or aim by an unlighted hearth, to watch your children, your dependents in hunger and in want—that is something that plumbs the greatest depths of human fortitude. That is the plight to-night of these 30,000 people in the city of Winnipeg. I hope, sir, that this house will not consider I am parochial in referring only to the city of Winnipeg. I refer to Winnipeg because it is my city, and I think it is consistent with the duty of every member on an occasion such as this to concern himself particularly with the needs of his own constituency. I realize that similar conditions exist, not to that extent perhaps, but to whatever extent they do exist in other parts of Canada they are equally critical. For that reason I am glad to know that when parliament prorogues I can go back to the city of Winnipeg, knowing that the Prime Minister and his cabinet have seen fit to place, as they will place, upon the statute books an instrument by which the government during the long winter months that are to come will be in a position to deal effectively and adequately with the crisis that is upon us.

To ameliorate these conditions is, and should be, the first duty of government. Has this government recognized its duty? The matter need not be extended. Let me simply say this: The Conservative party, led by the Right Hon. Richard B. Bennett, in the campaign just closed a year ago yesterday, told the people of Canada that when our citizens could not find work in a land of plenty, when they were denied the right to work, that was a matter of national concern. He told the people of Canada that if the Conservative party were returned to power it would recognize unemployment as a national problem and would so deal with it. A special session was called; that was the first step in fulfilment of the promise. Following that there was initiated in this house—however it may turn out eventually—a policy which in the judgment of the government of the day is predicated upon this principle: That Canadian workmen in Canada shall have the right, as far as is economically possible, to work up into the finished product the goods that will be consumed in this country. That is the principle upon which this government is proceeding with a view to bringing about permanent amelioration of general conditions. But in the meantime, since we have unemployment still with us, there will be introduced now a measure to provide for the immediate circumstances.

It is rather surprising to me as a comparatively new member in this house to find that members opposite seek always apparently only something to condemn, nothing to commend. It has come as a surprise to me that those who claim to represent labour in a special sense could find so little to commend in the legislation now before the house. I am glad the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is in his place, because I want to make a brief reference to his criticism. Read the speech of the hon. member and recall that it is relative to a resolution recognizing unemployment as a matter of first national concern, that asks this house to place in the hands of the government an instrument whereby it can adequately cope with the situation as it arises. Yet how little of commendation is to be found in the hon member's remarks. There may have been a phrase of commendation—if there was I missed it—but I did not miss the carping, factious criticism. The hon. member charged—what? That this government seeks autocratic powers. Autrocratic powers, forsooth! What are they? The government of the day seeks only this right: the authority of parliament to work out in cooperation with the municipalities and the provinces a measure of relief for our own workless, and to that end to use such funds of this country as the occasion warrants. Autocratic powers! The scope of the request is measured by the need, and by the need alone. That far, and no further, the government seeks authority from this parliament.

The hon. member found occasion too to refer to newspaper despatches relating to alleged statements by the Hon. Mr. Finlayson of the Ontario government, intimating what was likely to happen in certain camps in the north of the province. So far, so good. But not until his attention was definitely directed to it by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) did he say, "Yes I did read denials by Mr. Finlayson." Is it too much to expect, sir, that one who in former years was engaged in the promulgation of the principle, "do unto others as you would they should do unto you," would be fair enough in the first instance to place the two statements side by side?

The hon. member also seems to fear that some sinister use is intended to be made by this government of the special powers asked for looking to the preservation of peace, order and good government in this country. Does any fair-minded man throughout the whole of Canada believe that either the right hon. Prime Minister or any member of his cabinet really seeks that power for any ulterior or sinister purpose? I am sure there is not one. Who are apprehensive? Only those who have cause. Let me remind the hon. member of a text with which I am sure he will be familiar: The guilty flee when no man pursueth.

Reference was made also, Mr. Speaker, by the same hon. member to the first citizen of the city of Winnipeg. I hold no brief for Colonel Ralph Webb, mayor of the city of Winnipeg; he does not need me to tell the people of Canada where he stands, but coming from that city I felt I could not let the observation pass. When speaking of deportations it was suggested by the hon. member that the first deportee be Ralph Webb. Let me say that if we deported from Canada every citizen of the type of Ralph Webb of the city of Winnipeg, and left only citizens of the communistic type who want to subvert our constitution and all our principles of liberty, Canada indeed would be a very bad country in which to dwell.

The right hon. the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) devoted his whole speech to criticism, and without going into detail I took this to be his major criticism: He intimated that by giving this government power to draw upon the resources of this country without limitation, for unemployment relief, we would be doing violence to the constitution of Canada and abrogating the powers and privileges of parliament. He contended that something in the proposal was fundamentally wrong, and that in asking parliament to grant this power we were shattering precedent. Sir, how often in the past has the Conservative party in Canada had to listen to the taunt that they were a party of reactionaries, fettered by precedent and afraid to move without some precedent to back up that movement? It is a happy change, then, for those who have been accustomed to indulge in those taunts to have this outstanding example to the contrary to meet a national crisis. If it be—and I do not think it is—that we are asking parliament to stretch a little the garment with which the constitution of Canada is clothed, then never before in the history of Canada was there such warrant and such merit for the request. Although the ex-Prime Minister may be disturbed by the shattering of this precedent; although some of the others who followed him in like strain may be disturbed, let me say that I think the people of Canada are not particularly concerned whether we stretch that garment an inch or more. But they are concerned with this government dealing in an adequate and courageous way with the problem now preeminently occupying the minds of the people.

At the most it is this: Parliament is asked to trust this administration, in dealing with this matter of unemployment, not to squander the money of the people. Shortly, that is all there is to it. The ex-Prime Minister says we should fix the sum, that it should be limited. What sum could be fixed, with conditions changing from day to day? Who in April last, by the utmost prevision, could have foreseen that in the great province of Saskatchewan there would be an area of some five million acres practically without a crop? Who could have foreseen that situation? Now we know it to be so. The ex-Prime Minister says this legislation should have been brought in at the commencement of the session; had that been done there would have been no relief for the cropless farmers in the west.

During this whole summer the Department of Labour has been in touch with the situation and has been gathering information, and I submit that now is the most opportune time to deal with this question. Just as conditions changed fundamentally from what they were in May last, so in October, November and December they may vary again. Then what sum can be asked of this parliament for this purpose? A maximum could be fixed, but if that were not enough what would happen then? It is a matter of trusting this administration to act judiciously as trustees of the funds of the people in order adequately to meet the situation as it arises, and as it varies from time to time. If that is too much it means that this house cannot trust the present administration. Happily the people of Canada have seen fit to trust them, and it is my belief that this whole question of unemployment will be so met and dealt with that the government will continue to merit the confidence of the people.

Just one further word and I am through. The ex-Prime Minister is now very much disturbed about our workless. Is it too much to expect that our unemployed will measure the magnanimity of his present concern when he has not the power to execute, by the parsimony of his performance when he had the power to help?

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, it has been stated—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. BOURASSA: This is the third time I have risen, but evidently I have not caught the eye of the Speaker.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Before this resolution is adopted I wish to say a few words. It is not my intention to arraign the government for not having solved the unemployment problem as they promised to do, nor is it my intention to reiterate the statements already made from this side of the house as to the action of the government in not carrying out the pledges they gave the people of Canada during the last campaign. But before giving the reasons for what I am going to say on this resolution, I wish to refer to one or two of the arguments advanced by the last two speakers.

I think I rightly understood the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) when he laid down this principle: The government is parliament and parliament is the government; therefore the measure before the house does not take away any of the prerogatives of parliament. This is the first time in my political career that I have heard a gentleman occupying the responsible position of an hon. member of the House of Commons laying down so absurd a principle. It is a pity indeed that the government have not seen fit to take the hon. member into their ranks; I am sure an hon. member with such principles as he professes must be a source of great strength to any government of which he might form a part.

I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy), and he complained that so little commendation had been given this legislation from this side of the house. He went on to leave the impression that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was opposed to this measure. The hon. member should have been fair in his criticism. The leader of the opposition is not opposing this measure; he is not opposing any relief that the government may give to the unemployed. He is opposing the method adopted by the government to carry out that relief; and in doing that, I feel that he is perfectly justified in the position he has taken. Personally I am in hearty accord with anything the government may do to bring relief to the unemployed. But after they have been in power one year, I submit that they should be in a position to inform this house what they are going to do, how they are going to do it, and how much it will cost the country. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre says that we refuse to trust the government. Yes; so far as I am concerned, after one year's experience of the present government, I refuse to trust them with this blank cheque. And I intend before I get through to give my reasons.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Would you suggest limiting it to a nickel?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How clever!

Mr. VENIOT: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman; apparently the shoe pinches so much that he cannot keep his seat. One thing I might say, however: after listening to the hon. gentleman I do not think his speech was worth even a nickel.

Before the interruption I said I intended to give my reasons for not trusting the government with a blank cheque. They come before us to-day after one year in power. Last September we voted them $20,000,000, which they were so anxious to obtain in order to relieve unemployment. And that money is not yet all spent. There is still in the treasury of the Dominion a large part of that money voted them; and judging from their actions, our hon. friends knew so little about the situation, at least up to within the last three or four months, that they could not find means of spending this money to relieve the situation. Yet on every hustings last year they were telling how rampant unemployment was in every part of the Dominion. We voted that $20,000,000 willingly, although I felt at the time that $20,000,000 was not enough. But if the government had known their business, had they been sincere in their desire to relieve unemployment, there would not be a cent of that money in the treasury to-day. Of the $20,000,000, $4,000,000 was set aside for direct relief; and of that sum about $1,500,000 has not been spent, although there are hundreds of people throughout the country who to-day are almost on the verge of starvation and to whom direct relief should be given. That is one reason why I will not trust the government with a blank cheque.

Another reason is my experience of the way the money was spent by this government in cooperation with the government of New Brunswick. I will touch upon that before I finish.

But to come back to the blank cheque. Is it possible that the government does not know approximately the number of unemployed in Canada to-day who require relief? The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated, boasting about it, that during last winter, or from September last until the first of July, there had been employed 310,000 people under the $20,000,000 voted by parliament. Then he added to that the sum of $50,000,000 spent otherwise. He said that altogether there had been expended $70,000,000. Apart from what the federal government spent, the municipalities, the provinces and the two large railway companies spent something like $50,000,000. Now, if the federal government spent $16,000,000 in indirect assistance, and the provinces, municipalities and railway companies spent $50,000,000, there you have $66,000,000 provided for employment for 300,000 people. Let us take it at that figure —300,000. Surely there are not more than 300,000 unemployed in Canada to-day. If there are, then the government's policy since last September has been an utter failure. If there are more unemployed in Canada to-day than there were last fall and last winter, then, I repeat, the government's policy has been an utter failure as a means of providing employment for the people of the country. But let us take that figure which the Prime Minister gave, 310,000, and for purposes of a rough and ready calculation let us put the wages at $2.50 a day for 20 days in the month. What do we find? Until the end of next January—from the first of August to the end of January next—it will cost $94,500,000. It is quite easy therefore to ascertain just what the unemployment situation in Canada is to-day.

Why did the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) go to Vancouver? Why did he visit the provinces in the west? He told us he was making a survey of the unemployment situation and that he would make a survey of the situation in the maritime provinces. No doubt he has made it. Is it possible then that he is unable to tell the people of the country the number of unemployed in Canada? Or is it the other way? Is it possible that he knows that the number has so increased since the government came into power, that the government's policy has been such an utter failure in providing work for those unemployed, that he is ashamed or scared to let the public know? It is for that reason that the Prime Minister is to-day asking parliament for a blank cheque. If I am correct in my calculations—and I know I am approximately correct—$94,000,000 will cover the amount required between now and the end of next January. Let us leave aside the railway companies who say they are hard pressed. They are at present adding to the unemployment situation in this country by dismissing thousands of men in order to keep down their expenses. If we leave the railway companies aside, the municipalities and the provinces will contribute about fifty-fifty with the federal government. That will leave for the federal government to contribute about $50,000,000 instead of the $20,000,000 which they contributed last September. Let the federal government add more to it; let them make their contribution $80,000,000; let them make it $100,000,000; but let them put a definite sum in the resolution or the bill to be founded upon it, and I am sure this side of the house will support it and support it with pleasure.

Let me go a step further. I said that I was opposed to the system that was put into practice last year for the expenditure of the federal money. I believe in the principle laid down by the leader of the opposition, namely, that a commission, one independent of politics, should be appointed to see that the money is properly expended in cooperation with the provincial and municipal authorities. Similar municipal systems do not obtain in the different provinces. You will have to have a different system for the expenditure of the money in New Brunswick from what obtains in Ontario and Quebec. In New Brunswick—and I think the same situation exists in Nova Scotia—the municipalities have nothing whatever to do with roads; the provincial government has entire control of the expenditure for roads and the municipalities do not contribute one cent. Therefore, expenditures on roads in New Brunswick under the system of unemployment relief will have to be made by the provincial department of public works, and it is on that ground that I object to the present system. This is where an independent commission would render useful service.

Some time ago I referred in the house to the method under which expenditures in connection with unemployment relief were made last winter in the northern part of New Brunswick, and what is true of that part has been proved true in other sections of the province in connection with the expenditure of provincial money. At that time I stated that the moneys voted by the federal parliament for unemployment relief were not being honestly expended in New Brunswick. I made that statement boldly in the house; I made certain charges in regard to which I said I would take personal responsibility and put my seat at stake. I have made those charges and they have not been taken up. To-night I want to go further along this line. I desire to draw the attention of the government to the condition of affairs that exists in connection with the expenditure of federal money for unemployment relief. I hold in my hand affidavits made by reliable people who declare that their names appear on pay sheets in the counties in which they reside; that the supervisor of roads has padded the pay sheets for federal relief; that in one instance alone in the month of December last a pay sheet for from $350 to $400 was sent in to the New Brunswick Department of Public Works and paid for without examination, and that not one dollar of that money was spent during that month. I have certified copies of the official pay sheets, and I have the affidavits of men who say: My name is on that pay sheet for so many hours in the month of December, but I never worked and there never was a man at work. They say: Although my name is on that pay sheet, I never received a cheque; I never saw it; the cheque was issued and my name was forged as endorsing it. I have other affidavits for the month of November from men whose names are on certified copies of official pay sheets that I have received from the provincial Department of Public Works in Fredericton, and who say that they did not work during that month. They say: I saw So-and-so's name on the pay sheet, and I know he did not work. I have the affidavits—

An hon. MEMBER: Read them.

Mr. VENIOT: I am going to read them.

Mr. McDADE: Has the hon. member Mr. Hachey's pay sheet?

Mr. VENIOT: I have Hachey's pay sheet, and since the hon. member mentions it, I will read it. I will prove what I say and I have put my seat at stake. On Mr. Hachey's pay sheet the men are down for eight hours' work at twenty-seven and a half cents an hour, and Mr. Hachey is down for ten hours' work at fifty cents an hour, although the men were working only eight hours. The men were paid at the rate of only $2.20 a day, although the provincial Minister of Public Works had promised that $2.75 would be the rate for eight hours. Mr. Hachey is no more entitled to $5 for ten hours' work and he knows it, than I am to $7,000 for my parliamentary indemnity this year. Let me go further, since we are talking about the Hachey matter.

Mr. McDADE: It was coming to him.

Mr. VENIOT: It was not coming to him. He did not earn it. He worked only eight hours a day, and all he should have got was $4.

Mr. McDADE: Does my hon. friend not realize that he was structural superintendent of the department, and as such was entitled to remuneration at the rate of $6 a day?

Mr. VENIOT: That is not correct.

Mr. McDADE: Does my hon. friend deny it? I wish to tell my hon. friend I have the authority of the Hon. David Stewart, provincial minister, for this statement.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot accept it. Mr. Hachey is structural superintendent of the provincial Department of Public Works. He is entitled, when working for the province of New Brunswick ten hours a day, to $5 for salary and $1 a day for the use of his horse.

Mr. McDADE: That is $6.

Mr. VENIOT: Just a minute. He charged for his horse, but he charged for his horse twice and the department cut out one charge. Let me go further. Mr. Hachey was working under federal regulations, not under provincial regulations, and the federal regulations were eight hours a day at a certain rate per hour. He was working under federal regulations just as the men were doing, and was entitled only to a proportionately higher rate than that paid to the men.

Mr. McDADE: He worked more than ten hours.

Mr. VENIOT: He did not work ten hours, and he is not a permanent employee. He was employed, not by the month but by the day, being engaged under the orders of the department. I ought to know this because I was for ten years head of that department.

Since my hon. friend has brought up this matter, let me take Mr. Hachey's pay sheet, and this will show the work of the provincial Department of Public Works in looking after the expenditure of this money. Mr. Hachey bought for the government 15,000 feet of lumber. The government paid $4 stumpage on it to the lessee of the crown land, but this lessee had got a reduction of one-third of the stumpage from the provincial Department of Lands and Mines and the federal government reimbursed the provincial Department of Lands and Mines the one-third reduction they allowed to the crown lessee. The government of New Brunswick paid $4 stumpage for lumber off their own lands under lease when they should have paid only $2.20. It only goes to show that the Department of Public Works in New Brunswick should have looked after the matter and should not have allowed the lessee to get the stumpage he got when they were being reimbursed by this government one-third of the provincial stumpage which that man had paid to them.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that got to do with this?

Mr. VENIOT: I notice that there is always a great deal of interruption when I get on my feet. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. McDade) knows that he is out of order when he says that I do not stick to the facts. I would go a long way before I would go to him for a lesson in telling the truth, knowing him as I do. The hon. gentleman cannot even be polite when he interrupts.

Here is an affidavit signed by Elie Selesse, before Ed. Bernard, justice of the peace for the county of Restigouche:

I, Elie Selesse, of Upper Balmoral, in the county of Restigouche, in the province of New Brunswick, minor, make oath and say as follows:—

1. That I am the son of John Selesse, of Upper Balmoral, and that I am sixteen years old.

2. That I have seen a copy of a payroll purporting to be a payroll of Octave Lepage of Upper Balmoral for work done on the roads during the month of November, 1930.

3. That in the said payroll I appear as having worked 128 hours at hand labour and as having received the sum of $35.20 in payment; that during the said month of November, 1930, I did work one day in place of my father, John Selesse, and that my father received a cheque for $11 which included payment for the day that I had worked in his place; that I did not work on the road except during the said day, and that I did not receive the cheque for $35.20 or for any other amount.

4. That I have also seen a copy of a payroll purporting to be a payroll of said Octave Lepage for the month of December, 1930, and that in said payroll I appear as having worked 24 hours at hand labour and as having received $6.60; that I did not work at all on the road during the month of December, 1930, and that I did not receive a cheque for $6.60 nor for any other amount for such work.

Sworn to at Upper Balmoral, in the county of Restigouche, in the province of New Brunswick, this 17th day of June, A.D. 1931, before me. Elie Selesse.

Ed. Bernard.

A Justice of the Peace in and for the county of Restigouche.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the date of that, please?

Mr. VENIOT: There is no date to this. It is last fall, November and December, 1930. It was sworn to before Ed. Bernard about three weeks ago. But here is one with a date, and this one will perhaps open the eyes of hon. gentlemen:

I, John E. Bernard, of Upper Balmoral, in the county of Restigouche, in the province of New Brunswick, farmer, make oath and say as follows:

1. That I am secretary to the board of school trustees for school district No. 3, in the parish of Balmoral, and that as such secretary I have the custody of the school register for the year 1930.

2. That I have seen a copy of payroll purporting to be a payroll of Octave Lepage, of Upper Balmoral, in the county of Restigouche, for work done on the road in said parish of Upper Balmoral during the month of November, 1930.

3. That in said payroll Gabriel Bernard appears as having worked 128 hours at hand labour and as having received $35.20; that said Gabriel Bernard appears in the school register for the month of November as having attended school every school day during that month, in all nineteen days, and that at the opening of the school in January, 1930, said Gabriel Bernard was twelve years old.

4. That I have also seen a copy of payroll purporting to be a payroll of Octave Lepage for the month of December, 1930, and that said Gabriel Bernard appears as having worked 16 hours at hand labour and as having received $4.40; that the school register shows that said Gabriel Bernard attended school all school days, 14 days in all.

5. That in said November payroll Louis Fournier appears as having worked at hand labour 128 hours and as having received $35.20; that said Louis Fournier is shown on the school register as having attended school 18½ days and as having missed ½ a day during said month, and that in January, 1931, he was eleven years old; that in the December, 1930, payroll said Louis Fournier appears as having worked 48 hours at hand labour and as having received $13.20. That in said month he appears on school register as having attended at school five days.

Sworn to at Upper Balmoral, in the county of Restigouche, in the province of New Brunswick, this 17th day of June, A.D. 1931, before me. John E. Bernard.

Ed. Bernard.

A Justice of the Peace in and for the county of Restigouche.

I have here an affidavit touching another bridge superintendent:

I, Wilfred Blake of Nash Creek, in the parish of Durham, in the county of Restigouche, and province of New Brunswick, farmer, make oath and say as follows:

1. That I have seen a copy of payroll purporting to be the payroll of Archibald Murchie, superintendent of bridges for the county of Restigouche, for work done on the Carney bridge, in the said parish of Durham, during the month of November, 1930.

He goes on to state that on the said payroll there were the names of William McMillan, Arthur McAllister, Dan Murchie, the son of the superintendent, Arnold McCurdie and Charles Laughlin for time that they did not work, he himself being one of the men who worked on the bridge.

Mr. STEVENS: What was the date of that last one?

Mr. VENIOT: The 17th day of June, 1931; that is the affidavit of Joseph Fournier. Here is an affidavit in reference to the pay sheet for the month of December, and it is sworn that not one cent's worth of work was done on the roads at that time. The man who makes this affidavit names the people on the pay sheet who he knows did not work.

This man, Lepage, as well as eighteen other supervisors of road building in New Brunswick, are now under investigation, and Lepage has admitted under oath to the padding of pay sheets for the expenditure of direct provincial money—not federal money—amounting to about $2,000 in the summer's operations. I knew this man Lepage was crooked. I knew he was expending federal aid.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: What is wrong, Mr. Speaker? It is now under investigation by this government, and I knew that this man was crooked. Let me say to my hon. friend from Northumberland county that he should go right down into that county and find the supervisors who acknowledged their guilt and had to resign their positions because of investigations before the public accounts committee of the province of New Brunswick.

An hon. MEMBER: What had that to do with the federal government?

Mr. VENIOT: Never mind; I have the proof concerning Lepage and Murchie. Before the Department of Public Works of the province of New Brunswick is allowed to spend any more money in federal aid I want the federal Department of Labour to have these investigations carried out. All that is necessary is that the federal Minister of Labour request the Minister of Public Works of the province of New Brunswick to have the pay sheets produced before the investigation now being held.

I have outlined only two cases, but there are plenty of others. Those two men ought to be brought before the commissioner who is conducting a royal commission with the assistance of the attorney general of the province. The Minister of Public Works should be asked to produce the pay sheets, and it could be proven that those men have padded pay sheets in connection with expenditures for federal relief. I am prepared to hand the affidavits to the acting Minister of Labour, and have him go into the matter with the Minister of Public Works of New Brunswick.

I bring this matter up because I want that sort of thing stopped, and I want it publicly known that such practices shall not be permitted to continue. If those men have been dishonest in the handling of public money, especially relief money, they should be punished. Apparently the present provincial government is not going to punish them. Because the men resigned after the charges were proven and have promised to reimburse the government for the stolen moneys, apparently the provincial government is satisfied.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not go to the minister about it and save the time of the house?

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: What minister? I think I should have the privilege of taking up at least forty minutes of the time of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should be allowed to speak without interruptions.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to ask a question. Are those charges to which my hon. friend refers not being investigated to-day by the deputy attorney general of the province of New Brunswick?

Mr. VENIOT: No; he has refused to investigate them, because the charges were not made during the session of the last legislature and he is investigating only the charges which were made at that time.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): The case of the man Hachey is being investigated.

Mr. VENIOT: It has not been investigated.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): It has been.

Mr. VENIOT: It has not been. The hon. member does not know what he is talking about. I make that statement with all due respect.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Yes, that is very respectful.

Mr. VENIOT: The Hachey case has not been investigated by the commissioner appointed by the provincial government.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Has not the deputy attorney general given notice that he is holding an investigation within a few days?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not believe he would do that without informing me, the man who laid the charges.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): It has been so reported in the public press.

Mr. VENIOT: The report is not correct. I have made charges against Hachey, and the attorney general, who is my friend and a person for whom I have every respect irrespective of politics, would never undertake to make the investigation without informing me.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): He will make a fair investigation.

Mr. VENIOT: He will make it, but he will not make it in my absence. If he did it would not be a fair investigation. I am running that case, and when I was connected with the province my hon. friend did not have a great deal to say about it.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I know how the hon. member conducted investigations.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton wishes to go into the matter of running the province of New Brunswick he and I could have a field day, and I would guarantee I would not come out the worse. My record will stand alongside of his, any day.

After all these interruptions, Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude. Once more I request the Minister of Labour to pass on his recommendations to the Minister of Public Works in the province of New Brunswick, and for that purpose I shall hand him these affidavits. Let him request the Minister of Public Works to investigate the cases I have laid before parliament. At the present time investigations are being conducted by the royal commission at Balmoral. They met on Monday, but had to adjourn because four witnesses did not attend and warrants had to be issued through the provincial police to capture the witnesses and bring them before the commission.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, may I have a chance once in a while to catch your eye?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. McDade) has the floor.

Mr. BOURASSA: I rose four times since eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Former occasions have nothing to do with the present one.

Mr. BOURASSA: You saw me every time.

Mr. G. M. McDADE (Northumberland, N.B.): In view of the observations of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) let me say that if he fully realized the unemployment conditions on the north shore of the province of New Brunswick he would not place obstacles in the way of the passing of this important legislation.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not placing obstacles in the way of it.

Mr. McDADE: There are pitiful conditions on the Miramichi, and I am pleased to see that the administration, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his colleagues, are wholly seized of the seriousness of the situation. As a result of the passing of this measure we expect that some remedial relief will be afforded to us. For my hon. friend to criticize this legislation comes with very bad grace, and it is unfortunate that he should take up the time of the house referring to petty charges of illegal use of public funds by minor officials in the province of New Brunswick. Let me say that there was no Dominion government official involved in the charges made by the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. VENIOT: There was.

Mr. McDADE: He has mentioned specifically an item of $35. Does he realize that as a result of the legislation passed last September to relieve unemployment the amount of $1,500,000 went to that province? And yet my hon. friend directs the attention of the house to a small item of $35. I have no sympathy with anyone who would misappropriate even a single cent of money expended for unemployment relief.

Mr. VENIOT: There was an item of $350 on one pay sheet alone.

Mr. McDADE: For some time I have stood for the insults handed out by the ex-Postmaster General.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the hon. member who has just taken his seat is not in order when he continues the discussion of a matter of purely provincial concern. I think the whole of the discussion is out of order.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member is half an hour late.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not refer to provincial matters.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member for Northumberland has been in order.

Mr. McDADE: The ex-Postmaster General has handed out a gratuitous insult to the people of New Brunswick. He would leave the impression that the people of that province are robbers, and his remarks are an insult to the French Acadian people of the county he represents. The trouble with my hon. friend from Gloucester is that he is actuated by political bias. He thinks all the good in the world centres around the Liberal party, of which he is one of its most insignificant members. The trouble my hon. friend experiences concerning the Hachey case is purely political. Mr. Hachey happened to be a candidate at the last provincial election in support of the then Baxter administration, and opposed the candidates of my hon. friend opposite. Mr. Hachey, however, holds the position of structural bridge superintendent in New Brunswick, and my hon. friend knows that the remuneration attached to such a position is $6 per day, including the use of a car or a horse to transport him to and from his work. His duties of necessity involve inspection work and also entail a large amount of labour at home in connection with the preparation of accounts and payrolls and making out details of itemized costs of the different materials and their purchase. I might state to my hon. friend on the authority of the Hon. David A. Stewart, Minister of Public Works in New Brunswick, that Mr. Hachey received the fair and equitable wage that is paid per day to all structural bridge superintendents in the province, and no more.

In these critical times, with the people of the north shore of New Brunswick in such distress, surely my hon. friend must realize that this government is actuated by the highest motives in introducing relief legislation, and I am sure the province of New Brunswick, in particular and the country generally would much prefer to see him employ his talents in cooperating wholeheartedly with the administration in working out these relief measures to a happy conclusion.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McDADE: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Where can the hon. gentleman find in any of my remarks that I am opposed to the granting of relief? I am simply opposing the method by which the relief is proposed to be applied.

Mr. McDADE. My hon. friend certainly gave the house that impression.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I said at the outset that I was in favour of $20,000,000 or $100,000,000 for relief.

Mr. McDADE: In my humble opinion the present is the time and the opportunity for the big Canadian, rather than for the small politician. My hon. friend—and I regret to say it—has had a political career which has been characterized by vilification, vituperation, scandal and abuse of his political opponents.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, I think I should have the protection of this house, and that such language should not be allowed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. McDade) is going far afield in using such adjectives, and I suggest that he withdraw them.

Mr. McDADE: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. The people of my province, however, have their own opinion of my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Withdraw.

[Mr. McDade.]

Mr. BENNETT: On the question of order, I wonder if Your Honour heard what was said here to-night by the hon. member for Gloucester about men who are absent? I did not desire to intervene—Your Honour is in charge of the house—but those statements were such as, I think, should not have been made in any chamber. They touched on provincial matters.

Mr. VENIOT: On the point of order, I did not refer to any provincial people except those—

Mr. STEVENS: You abused them for a whole half hour.

Mr. BENNETT: Those men were employed by the provincial government, and an investigation is being held by the provincial authorities.

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all, they are spending federal money

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend in respect of provincial matters used such terms of denunciation as I think were very improper to be used by any member of this house in the absence of persons affected. The senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) certainly raised the point of order when the member for Northumberland began to answer, because he said he was dealing with provincial politics. But surely when the good name and fair fame of men are attacked in this house opportunity should be afforded to answer the attack. Men should not be called thieves and robbers to gratify political rancour. As leader of the house I should have intervened, but I did not do so because I thought the chair should take cognizance of the matter.

Mr. VENIOT: There is no investigation being held to-day. Those whom I accused of padding the pay sheets, and—I use the word again—robbing the country—

Mr. McDADE: Thieves and robbers.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes; they are spending federal money.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, that is incorrect; they are spending money of the province and we reimburse the province part of the expenditure made.

Mr. VENIOT: A fine distinction.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a distinction, it is a fact.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is taking place in New Brunswick is a matter of argument. The point of order taken by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) was not sustained by me because I felt opportunity should be given to the hon. member for Northumberland to reply to the hon. member for Gloucester. At the same time I think the adjectives used by the hon. member for Northumberland in describing the hon. member for Gloucester are not parliamentary and I understood him to withdraw them.

Mr. McDADE: Mr. Speaker, I can only add that a competent non-partisan commissioner, the deputy attorney general of the province of New Brunswick, has been appointed by the provincial administration to investigate fully the charges preferred during the 1930 session of the provincial legislature of alleged misappropriations of road moneys. That investigation is still going on. The fullest facilities have been afforded the Liberal opposition in the province to be represented by counsel, and some of the most distinguished and eminent members of the bar have appeared on behalf of the Liberal party, including the provincial leader of the opposition. Undoubtedly the investigation is being carried on in a strictly non-partisan manner. My hon. friend makes charges with respect to the misappropriation of $35 or even of $350 out of the $1,500,000 expended by this administration in New Brunswick as a result of certain measures adopted by them, as opposed to no expenditure of any consequence whatever in the province on the part of the late federal administration, when conditions were immeasurably worse than obtain to-day. If my hon. friend in the public interest is desirous of seeing that justice and equity are vindicated, then I would respectfully suggest that he invite the deputy attorney general of New Brunswick to look into these affidavits and see if there were such misappropriations as alleged. But I would point out that my hon. friend does not say that one official of this administration or one member of the provincial administration at Fredericton was involved in the charges he has taken so much of the time of this house at this late stage of the session in discussing when we are engaged in the momentous work of endeavouring to relieve the distress and suffering and hardship that unfortunately is the lot of the people of Canada to-day in common with most of the nations of the world. I repeat, if he is so desirous of proceeding with the charges he has made to-night he should get in touch with the proper provincial authorities in New Brunswick.

In conclusion, on behalf of the constituency that I have the honour to represent, indeed, on behalf of the people of the whole province, I wish to express my congratulations to the Prime Minister and his administration upon having tackled this problem in such a determined and courageous manner. I feel that conditions in New Brunswick—I am speaking again particularly of the north shore—will be remedied, and that once again employment will be afforded to our citizens.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): This robust New Brunswick red herring having been drawn across the trail, perhaps now we may have a chance to come back to the very important question before the house. It seems to me that in these last days of the session, with everyone anxious to see the session concluded, hon. members are apt to minimize the importance of the proposition before us. We should distinguish quite clearly between the object in view, the policy propounded by the government in order to attain that object, and the means chosen to give effect to that policy.

As far as the object to be reached is concerned I think no one disagrees; everyone admits that a very grave crisis is upon us, and I do not think any useful purpose would be served by rehashing the arguments which took place during the last election. The Conservatives, perhaps not without reason, condemned the Liberals for not having grasped the situation fully before the election, while on the other hand the Conservatives themselves committed the fault of making promises which I do not say they knew then but which they realize now could not be fully implemented. No doubt a great deal of the moral disquietude and the somewhat bitter feeling which have grown up in the country arise largely from the fact that the people, not seeing the immediate fulfilment of promises which could not be immediately implemented, are apt to take a rather wrong view of the situation and of the government. For my part I feel quite at ease, because, having nothing to do with either party during the last election, I could say quite plainly to the people whose confidence I enjoy that whatever party came into power the crisis was bound to be worse the year following and for perhaps another year, whatever policy was adopted. Knowing a little of the conditions of the world as they were; knowing that the deep causes of that crisis went far back into the past and that most of the apparent prosperity which followed the war was a fake prosperity kept up by a system of credit which could not but fail when the conditions which existed in Europe should reach us, I felt quite sure that the farmer, the industrialist and the workman had worse days to anticipate, and they have come.

At the special session the government obtained from the house, without much difficulty, permission to spend $20,000,000 under certain conditions. As far as I am concerned I do not blame the government for not having realized that some of the conditions attached to the spending of that money would put many municipalities in a bad position. I cannot blame the government now, because I did not blame them then. I took the view, which was taken by the ex-Prime Minister and I think by the present Prime Minister also at one time, that there was a joint responsibility; that the first responsibility was that of the municipality, then that of the province and finally that of the federal government. Therefore I thought the legislation was proper.

With regard to the amount of money voted, naturally, it was only in the course of the months which followed that the government could realize what further needs would have to be met by parliament; but here the failure of the government begins. It comes about largely, I think, because of that peculiar viewpoint expressed by the Prime Minister this afternoon, when he evidently thought it his duty and the duty of the government to maintain in the country a spirit of optimism. Optimism is a good thing provided it is based on realities; but I do not think enthusiastic optimism is any better than pessimism for the curing of such evils as that with which we must deal. What is needed on the part of statesmen, of men of influence, of everyone who can direct public opinion and manage public affairs, is neither optimism nor pessimism but cool-headed realism, plently of courage to face the situation and also courage to tell the whole truth to the people.

As far as that is concerned I think no one would accuse the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) of lacking in courage, but I am afraid he has failed to speak the whole truth to all classes of the community. No doubt he was more or less tied up by the declarations he made during the campaign; but now, after a year in power, after the experience he had in dealing with the situation last winter, he ought to have put himself, and the members of the government ought to have put themselves, in the position of stating clearly—I will not say in every detail but on broad lines—the policy which they proposed to adopt. This resolution fails to do so. It is all very well to say that these are abnormal circumstances and that we should not tie up the government by a legal technicality or an article of the constitution, as the eloquent and charming member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) suggested. We are not concerned with a clause of the constitution in this matter; we are concerned with a fundamental principle of parliamentary government. It is not written in the British North America Act; it is not written in any statute of this land or of the motherland; it is that basic principle that the elementary duty of the representatives of the people is to keep control of all the sums of money gathered from the people by way of taxation, and to confide to their executive committee such powers as are necessary properly to apply that money derived from the people by taxation, according to the will of parliament. I claim, sir, that we have no right to abdicate a particle of that duty and of that function. It is not a question of trusting or mistrusting this or any other government. It is a question of keeping in their proper order the functions of government and the functions of parliament.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) suggested in passing that this resolution smacked of bolshevism. No; I think he was wrong there. But it does show a strong touch of fascism, undoubtedly. Now, what has substituted fascism for parliamentary government in Italy? I am not criticizing the attitude of the Italian people; they knew their circumstances. And I knew enough of those circumstances to appreciate their position, because I was in Italy in the very year of the advance of the fascist army; I left Rome a few months before they took possession. Possibly, with conditions as they were in Italy at that time, the only material salvation of the country was the abdication of parliamentary control into the hands of a strong government. But have we come to that in Canada? I do not think that the Prime Minister, in the very plausible speech he made this afternoon, has given a single cogent reason for asking, for the first time in the history of parliamentary government in Canada, that this house should divest itself of a fundamental, I will not say right, but function and duty.

The suggestion has been made that the government cannot very well say precisely what amount is needed. That suggestion came either from the Prime Minister or from some of his followers, and it was repeated even by an over-zealous member in this corner, who in the first thirty minutes of his speech seemed to me to be making a bid to be the first to benefit by the law passed a few days ago to allow members to be appointed to the cabinet without re-election. The hon. gentleman seemed better informed of the policy of the government than the Prime Minister himself. But let that pass. It has been said that the circumstances are such that the government cannot state exactly what amount of money they need. But surely that is true of any large enterprise which is subsidized by parliament. When Sir John Macdonald came to parliament and asked for the first subsidy in lands and money to the Canadian Pacific Railway he did not know what that undertaking was going to cost. Indeed, no one knew. But he asked for 25,000,000 acres of land and $25,000,000; and later on various forms of assistance were given. Or let us come to the time when the Meighen administration decided to take over the bankrupt enterprises of Mackenzie and Mann and the Grand Trunk Railway, and when that right hon. gentleman was described by his successor, the present Prime Minister, in rather exaggerated language, as the gramophone of Mackenzie and Mann. The circumstances then were very difficult, and I am not one who blames Mr. Meighen for having done what he did. But he did not know exactly to what he was committing Canada; yet he asked for something precise to start with.

When the war broke out it created an issue as grave, surely, as the present one. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon quoted some of the war measures. At every session of parliament during the war Sir Robert Borden came and asked for so many millions to carry on war operations until the following year. Everyone knew it was not enough; he knew and the opposition knew. But it never entered Sir Robert Borden's head to ask for a blank cheque for the duration of the war. He did not say, "I do not know what it will cost; I do not know what will be the loss in men and money; let parliament abdicate its functions and have confidence in the government".

I have as much confidence in the integrity and ability of the present Prime Minister as I had in the integrity and ability of Sir Robert Borden or of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But in the old days, under Liberal or Conservative administrations, I did oppose any attempt to increase unduly the powers of the cabinet at the expense of parliament. And to-day I oppose that attempt, remaining true to the principle of parliamentary government.

It is not a question of men; it is not a question of parties; it is not a question of personal trust in this or that man. It is a question of principle. I have stated before, and I repeat now: If the people of Canada have come to the conclusion that parliamentary government is not the best form of government for our country, it is for them to say. I have already said, and I say again, that I have lost a good deal of my faith in parliamentary government. But so long as we have it we must work it out in the spirit of its fundamental principles and not encroach upon those principles without realizing what we are doing.

History, and particularly English history, shows that the great danger to popular liberty and to popular representation in times of crisis is twofold. At one extreme there are those who are apt to minimize the gravity of any situation and, so to speak, to tie the hands of government by adhering too rigidly to many legal technicalities which, while necessary under ordinary circumstances, are undesirable in a crisis. At the other extreme there are people who are blinded by the exigencies of a passing situation, and without due reflection, or with a desire to please people by satisfying their immediate material needs, will sacrifice great principles which it has cost centuries of effort to establish. This has been several times exemplified in the history of parliamentary government in Great Britain. At the moment I will refer only to one instance that comes to my mind. At the beginning of the French revolution, a hundred years after the English revolution, and after a long process of liberalizing legislation, religious and social; after all those declarations of right for which men had fought in the hope that succeeding generations would benefit thereby; in the reaction from the French revolution one who was perhaps the greatest English parliamentarian, Edmund Burke, went to the right and Charles Fox to the left. Charles Fox, imbued as he was with the principles of liberty, attempted and to a certain extent succeeded perhaps in shaking the confidence of the English people in its monarchy. But Edmund Burke, that great reformer whose words, uttered in time of calm and peace, will remain forever a source of inspiration to all who believe in English parliamentary government—Edmund Burke, I say, in his dread of French Jacobinism, outdid some of the most rabid English Tories. He went further than the Pitts and those who were then employed in strengthening the hand of the government to combat revolution and to carry on the war on the continent. Surely the situation in Canada to-day is not such that we should lose our heads to the point of abrogating the duties and the functions of parliament.

The Prime Minister has made an allusion rather than a reference to the difficulty in which, perhaps, he has found himself or in which he may find himself in the future, in the apportionment of the amount of money needed as between provinces. I hasten to agree with him that we should at once dispel the idea that may exist right or left, east or west, that this fund is going to be given to the provinces according to population. Neither the leader of the opposition nor anybody that I have heard has suggested that the government should declare what amount of money they are going to spend in Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan or elsewhere. Nobody could reasonably ask that. Of course, if the situation in Saskatchewan is such that in proportion to population they require to spend in that province twice or three times as much as is needed in Quebec, they are welcome to do so, but that does not change the position with regard to the principle of the resolution. The government could have asked for an amount of $50,000,000 or $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 to be apportioned as between provinces and various works of relief according to circumstances, and I for one, would have ungrudgingly granted the government that power.

I have already touched upon the question of the limitation of the amount by referring to past examples. I consider the argument advanced by the leader of the opposition this afternoon is incontrovertible. The government has the power of calling a session of parliament whenever it is needed. Surely in those twelve months, I shall not say of enjoyment of office, because I know the Prime Minister has not had twelve months of enjoyment; but in those twelve months of fulfilment of his duty—and I give him this credit, that he has done perhaps more than he should have done personally in the accomplishment of his duty—he has gathered sufficient information to be in a position to state to parliament that in order to carry on this work of relief until the month of January next, a certain sum of money will be required, just as on the 18th day of August, 1914, Sir Robert Borden was capable of stating to the House of Commons what amount of money was needed to commence the work of the war. The positions are the same; the principles are alike; and I see no reason why we should change them now.

I do not want to dwell at any greater length upon this broad aspect of the situation, but as one of the oldest members of the house I appeal to every hon. member, to whatever party he belongs, to think twice before he sets aside those great principles of parliamentary government. It is all very well to unfold the British flag and to sing the National Anthem upon all occasions; but there is a more effective way of showing that we are attached, not to the person of a king, not to the emblem of a form of government, but to the principles of a system that has done more to unite the various races and classes of Canada into one contented nation than anything else could have done.

With regard to the application, again I agree entirely with the leader of the opposition. I see no reason why the government should not have asked first for the right to come to the relief of the unemployed and, as a means to accomplish that object, to help the provinces and the municipalities. Then they could have brought in a special measure for farm relief. As a matter of fact, I think it would have been far better to have those two measures separate, in order to define precisely the powers of the government. We shall see, of course, by the bill to what extent this separation is accomplished, and therefore I shall not dilate any longer upon this point. I wish simply to answer the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who said that in the month of April the situation in Saskatchewan could not have been foreseen. If the government had done in this instance as they did in every other; if they had treated each subject on its merits, they could have been in a position on the 12th day of March to forecast in the speech from the throne what they proposed to do with regard to unemployment which has been upon us for at least the last two years. Later on they could have come in with a measure regarding Saskatchewan. But to take the situation in Saskatchewan in May and June to excuse the government for proposing nothing to the house and the country prior to the last days of the session, to settle another problem which was just as acute in March as it is now, which, in fact, was just as acute in January as it was in March, is no explanation or excuse that can be reasoned out.

With regard to the application, leaving aside the question of Saskatchewan which is one by itself, let me assure my hon. friends opposite that, whether they believe it or not, I am speaking in the most disinterested spirit. It is true there is bad feeling as between east and west and as between provinces. This is due to many causes, but let us be frank about the matter. It is due largely as regards the province of Quebec to the campaign which was carried on during the last election.

An hon. MEMBER: By whom?

Mr. BOURASSA: By most, not all, of the Conservative candidates who charged the Liberals with sacrificing Quebec to the western provinces. I have heard right and left the western representatives being accused of being the most greedy and grabbing representatives in Canada. I have contradicted that as best I could in my own constituency. This was not necessary on my part; I had no opponent; but just as I gave warning that the year to come would be worse than the year passed, I gave warning that the situation in the west would be worse than in the east. I knew this because I had been all through the west and saw what was coming, in spite of good harvests, in 1927. In that regard I agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to a certain extent that there was a good deal of extravagance in the west. But can my Conservative friends be surprised if to-day in Quebec at least—I do not know anything about Ontario—there is a feeling of jealousy towards the west? Let me put this in concrete form. A friend of mine, a good average citizen of Montreal, with a sufficient degree of information, said to me: "I suppose as usual all of that money will go west." I said: "You know the situation is very bad in the west." He said: "That cannot be true; look at what Mr. Bennett said during the debate on the address, that the western people were the wealthiest in Canada." Of course he exaggerated a little; but there was enough in that speech of the Prime Minister to develop in the minds of the people of Quebec the idea that that province is in much greater need than is the west. We had all those statistics about two billions of dollars of natural wealth being produced in the west in two years; about so many automobiles purchased by the western farmers; about so many millions of dollars deposited in the banks by them. All that information went through Quebec. Our people read the newspapers and they have this advantage over most of the people of the other provinces, that they can read both French and English. The result is that at times some things stick in the minds. They took hold of that idea; they said: "Ah, it was true what our Conservative candidates told us during the election, that the westerners are nothing but grabbing and greedy people". But now, all of a sudden, the Prime Minister rises in his place in the house, in the last days of the session, and says that we must come to the rescue of those people, not only of those whose harvests have been destroyed by drought, but of the west generally; he says that we must give them a bounty of five cents a bushel to transport their wheat, and so on.

We have had the situation in Winnipeg described this evening in very moderate and very true terms by one of its most distinguished representatives. I can say to him and to the Prime Minister that the situation in Montreal is fully as bad, if not worse. That brings me to another aspect.

The apportionment of funds, as between provinces, will be a difficult one on account of that state of mind. It will perhaps be rendered more difficult in the province of Quebec because we are going to be afflicted there, I understand, with a provincial election one year after the federal election. Naturally the Liberals will charge the Conservatives with having broken their word at Ottawa; and on the other hand the Conservatives will try to shift the blame from the federal government to the Liberal government in Quebec. I take this occasion to ask my friends from the province of Quebec, whether they sit on this side of the house or the other, for heaven's sake and for the sake of the province, try to carry on that campaign in a somewhat decent way. The people of the province of Quebec are quiet generally. They have a good heart and it is in the right place; but they are human beings the same as everybody else, and if you go on, reds and blues, all the time raising their appetites, promising them money and bonuses, charging the Taschereau government with everything that goes wrong in the province of Quebec; or on the other hand if you charge this government at Ottawa for the present dire situation, I cannot promise you what the result will be. Electorally speaking, I tell you quite frankly that it does not matter to me; but I am concerned about the social results and the national results. I am concerned about the feelings in the breasts of all those men and women who at the present time have hardly a crust to eat. This is not the time to play party politics in a demagogic way.

The situation in Montreal is rendered more acute than anywhere else in Canada because of its closeness to the United States. Not only have thousands of transient workers come gradually to Montreal from as far west as Victoria and Vancouver; not only, as I predicted last fall, the lumberjacks from the lake St. John district and a few from my own constituency, or from the St. Maurice valley, come to Montreal because they have no work to do in the shanties or in the mills; but every day a large number of unemployed in the United States cross the border and flock to Montreal. That we are given to understand on the authority of the municipal council of Montreal, and it was reproduced in the Montreal Gazette last week. I know this much, that from week to week, on the streets, in the tram cars, on the mountain, where hundreds of them lie out every night because they have no other dormitory on the island, you meet every day physiognomies that evidently are entirely new to the city.

Now as a first suggestion to the government, without entering into the details of the apportionment of this sum—I am prepared to trust them in that—may I say that if we want to accomplish something that will endure, if we are going to take into account the social structure and the social instincts of the population, and are determined to make the best of the situation, then there should be a concerted effort between the federal, the provincial, and municipal authorities, first to keep the fathers of families at home as much as possible and give them work at home. The work should be apportioned according to the number of members of the family. If in a family of ten two are capable of working, let those two work. If in a family of five, two are capable of working, let one work so as to give the two families an equal chance. That is a matter to be adjusted by the municipality. As far as the boys are concerned, familiar with the surroundings in Montreal or the province, and the same will apply to every large city and to every province, try to give them work not too far away from their centre.

But where the duty of the government is more complicated, and where I think the exclusive duty of the federal government comes in, is in dealing with the foreign transient. I agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre that we should not let grow up on the part of the native-born Canadian a feeling of animosity against foreigners. I opposed the immigration policy of the Liberal party for twenty-five years, and therefore I am free to speak on this question. But we now have these foreigners here, some for five years, some for ten years. Even if they have been here only three months. they are human beings just the same; are we going to let them die because they do not speak English or French or because they may be orthodox Russians or Roumanians? No. We have a social and a national and an international duty, as well as a human and a Christian duty, to perform towards them, and I consider that the federal government is the proper authority to look after these people. As was stated by Mr. Brierley—I do not know what his politics are, but he is a very good social worker in Montreal—we should consider these foreigners as the wards of the nation. Where do they belong to? I do not know. Some have come to Montreal from Saskatchewan, some from Alberta, some from British Columbia. It has been suggested that they be repatriated. The municipal council of Montreal adopted unanimously a resolution to that effect at the suggestion of one of the Jewish representatives there. But there are two sides to that question. If we should repatriate these foreigners on a voluntary basis, the best of them physically, the best socially and the best morally would jump at the chance, just as the two did who were mentioned by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), and we should be left with the dregs. Therefore I am not quite sure that to announce a policy of repatriation is quite the proper thing. I think the government should keep itself absolutely free to deport those who are really undesirable, with due equity, of course, and perhaps to repatriate some. But if we want to accomplish that, we need, first, to develop in each province a sense of responsibility towards the Canadians who have gone from one province to another. For example, I was sent this week a certified copy of a letter written by Mr. A. A. Mackenzie, supervisor of the relief branch, Department of Municipal Affairs, in the province of Alberta. It reads:

Edmonton, Alberta, May 13, 1931.

Dear Sir,—

I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 8th inst., in which you state you are in need of direct relief. The issuing authority of your district is the Alberta Provincial Police.

I think you would have been well advised to consider your situation before the children were brought into the world to starve—

May I say, in parenthesis, that this man had stated that he had ten children, so he received from the supervisor of relief a lesson on birth control:

—but I am willing to give your application consideration on the merits of your case, and would be prepared to recommend to the government to ship you back to the province from which you came.

Yours truly,

A. A. Mackenzie,
Supervisor of Relief Branch.

Certified copy.
L. A. Giroux.

I believe that Mr. Giroux is or was a member of the provincial legislature and a notary public. This man who was applying for relief was born in the county of Wolfe. He went to Alberta in 1921, ten years ago. He has ten children. He has been married twenty years, and has a family of ten children, a typical French-Canadian family. The oldest is nineteen, and the baby five months. As I said this man is a native-born Canadian, a French-Canadian going back, as most of them do, for five or six generations. He went to Alberta ten years ago to settle, and now finding himself in distressed circumstances he is told by the chief relief authority of that province that all he can hope for is to be shipped back to his native province. In the arrangements that are going to be made between this government and the various provinces I respectfully suggest to the Prime Minister that he should invite the authorities of those provinces to agree to the proposition that Canadians who have gone from one province to settle in another are at home in any of those provinces. I would be the last to ask the authorities of the city of Montreal or of the provincial government at Quebec to ship back to Alberta or Saskatchewan the transients who have come from those provinces. Nobody in his proper senses in Quebec, Ontario or the maritimes would treat as undesirable aliens, Canadian citizens born and brought up in Manitoba and offer to ship them back to their native province.

No. I entirely agree with the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition that we have before us a great national problem which first should be treated from a christian and human point of view, and then from a national point of view, because it is a national duty we have to perform. Taking into account, however, conditions in our country, politically, socially and otherwise, the problem should be considered as a provincial and municipal matter as well, but we should insist that the city of Montreal or the city of Edmonton, as the case may be, are Canadian cities and are not states within the state. Provincial authorities east and west should be convinced that each province is a component part of the Dominion of Canada, and that the Dominion as a whole will not begrudge help to each province, provided it grapples with the problem from a broad human and Canadian viewpoint.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words along lines somewhat different from those thus far pursued. It is not my intention to speak to those phases of the matter which may be regarded as controversial. There was one word in the Prime Minister's speech that claimed my attention, because for the last three or four weeks, in fact for months, it had been on my mind; I refer to the word "cooperation". The necessity for cooperation not only between parties in this house but among all elements in Canada is apparent. When we were face to face with the war there was a wonderful example of cooperation among the different classes of Canadian people. We sent our soldiers to the front and many of us at home who could not go did the best we could to support our soldiers. We experienced, in a large degree, the spirit of self-sacrifice. At the same time, while the majority of Canadians exhibited that spirit there were here and there some people making the war an opportunity for self-aggrandizement. There were grafters in the sale of surgical supplies, grafters in the sale of horses, grafters in the sale of potatoes, all of which did not redound to the honour of Canada. That is one thing we do not wish to take place concerning the expenditures of these moneys, if it can possibly be avoided. I know that such conditions almost inevitably creep in, and my appeal to the people of Canada would be to exercise something of the spirit of cooperation and self-sacrifice they manifested during the war.

I shall now say something I had not intended to say, but which is prompted by what happened in the house this evening. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) made certain charges regarding the expenditure of part of the $20,000,000. Whether or not those charges were true I do not know, but I must say I noted with regret that when the hon. member was making them many hon. members opposite seemed to treat his remarks with great levity, and as if there were no seriousness in them. It was with very great regret I noticed the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. McDade) stand in his place and attempt to belittle the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester. I believe the time will come when the hon. member opposite (Mr. McDade) will have the grace to be ashamed of that portion of his speech, and will wish it to be expunged from the record.

In making a plea for cooperation among the people of Canada the point that has been in my mind during the past few weeks has been the necessity for cooperation on the part of those who are in need of relief, whether it be direct or through the furnishing of employment. I wish particularly to appeal to labour members in the house who, I am sorry to say, I do not see in their seats. The hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) have frequently emphasized the necessity for high wages. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that it is not desirable that this money should be spent in the spirit of trying to keep men down to a bare living wage. I do not think the people of Canada would wish that men should be paid a mere pittance for a fair day's work. At the same time, however, it would be well for those who undertake to represent labour in this house to impress upon their constituents the necessity of giving the heartiest kind of cooperation to the people of Canada in this great emergency. It may be that the great majority of their constituents are willing to do so, but we do know that unfortunately there are large numbers of people who would not be willing to cooperate.

Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been an employer of labour, and because of that would be able to view the matter of employment from both sides. I hope that at some time in his life the hon. member has had that experience. Some of us have worked as labouring men, and have afterwards been employers of labour. We are in a position to view labour matters from both angles because we have lived and worked on both sides. My own opinion would be that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has very seldom, if ever, been an employer of labour and for that reason he may not be able to view labour matters from the standpoint of having to pay a very unsatisfactory labourer the high wage he might demand.

I shall give an illustration. Last harvest time we in the prairies provinces recognized that owing to prevailing conditions we would not be in a position to pay the wages we had formerly paid to labourers at that time of the year. When prices were good we did not begrudge paying high wages, but it was not an uncommon thing last harvest time for men who were offered wages we were able to pay, to say, "Oh, it is no concern of ours that the price of wheat has gone down; that is nothing to us. We want certain wages." Just so far as that spirit prevails, just that far will our whole efforts to relieve present difficulties meet with failure. My plea to Canadian people in all walks of life would be to exercise that spirit of self-sacrifice and cooperation which was shown during the war and as far as possible let their actions be free from the graft which took place during the war and which brought nothing but dishonour to the fair name of Canada.

We are passing through a difficult time. I know there is no doubt in this house as to the necessity for relief measures. With a proper spirit of cooperation among all classes of the people I believe we will weather this emergency, severe though it be.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): The resolution before the house, Mr. Speaker, is a frank recognition by society of its obligation towards its less fortunate members. Perhaps it is unnecessary now to discuss the situation in Saskatchewan, but I might say that in a speech delivered recently by the premier of that province he stated that there were 160,000 people living in districts in which there was no crop whatever. There are also many thousands of others in districts where there is very little crop and these also will need some assistance.

In a number of articles in the Winnipeg Tribune, written by the editor of that journal, Mr. McTavish, which articles were reproduced in the Ottawa Citizen, he points out a rather interesting thing. He noticed that the people in the districts in which there was no crop whatever seemed to be taking it quite philosophically and had ceased to worry. They knew they were safe from the bailiff, from the mortgage companies and from the banks, that nobody was going to interfere with them or try to dispossess them of their homes or their stock as long as they had no crop whatever, and they knew also that in the last analysis the government would see that they were provided with feed for their stock and the necessaries of life for another year. But he pointed out that strangely enough when he went to another part of the country where the crops were fair he found the people were worried because they knew they had to rely on their own resources, they did not expect the government to look after them, and the mortgage companies and other creditors would be expecting to get something out of the crop in reduction of their claim. That is one of the anomalies of the situation. Where there is a fair crop—and there is in my constituency—the farmers are in distress because that crop will be taken off probably at a loss; at any rate it will mean no profit whatever. My point is that the distress will not be entirely confined to the districts where there is no crop.

Now, we have a tremendous trek of population from the dry districts to the districts in the north, the bush districts, where at least there is grass and water and something growing. Hundreds of people from the southern parts of the province have come into my district, and in dealing with this trek, which is something unprecedented in that country, I might quote, in part, an editorial in a recent issue of The Western Producer. It says:

> Another evidence of the condition in western Canada is the increasing abandonment of farms by harassed agriculturists. During the past month or two there was to be seen any day the spectacle of a family moving northward with what is left of its meagre possessions. A thousand tragedies are slowly moving north on the dusty roads: a man, a woman, two or three children, a few skinny horses, a decrepit cow or two, some sticks of furniture, a few worried hens; moving north, in search of water, in search of food, in search of the means to sustain life.

These people are now in the north, many of them in my constituency, many of them I understand in the constituency of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). While they have moved in there on to bush homesteads too late to produce any crop, while they may have grass and feed and water for their animals, yet they will have to be provided with the means of sustaining life through the winter and of putting in a crop in the spring.

I was glad to hear what the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said about the necessity of providing work rather than giving charity. I think we can all agree that that is the best way to look after needy people—to give them the means of earning something rather than a direct charitable hand-out. In that country we need roads very very badly. One may travel hundreds of miles on roads that are barely passable after a heavy rain. The province would no doubt contribute its quota towards their construction, and I think that with some cooperation between the two governments roads can be built and work provided for needy farmers at the same time.

There is a great deal, too, in what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) said. In prosperous times when interest rates are high and commodities and materials are high in price, we seem to build our roads, erect our buildings and construct railway branch lines and other public works. Then when there is depression, when interest rates are low, when money can be borrowed very easily, when lumber and all other materials are low in price, we sit quietly by waiting for prosperity to come. I do believe that the government has a direct responsibility to do what it can in such periods of depression. The money spent in a period of prosperity means a double debt when we come to a period of depression. The money we borrowed in 1928 and 1929, that is the actual debt, has doubled today; whereas if we spent money now, in a couple of years when we hope there will be a period of prosperity, when we hope commodity prices, wages and so on will be high again, we would find it very much easier to pay the debt so incurred than if we deferred the expenditure to that time. So I do think it is good business on the part of the government to engage in all the public works they can at the present time. In so far as a good deal of the province of Saskatchewan is concerned, I feel that the best means of providing relief would be to do some necessary roadwork in cooperation with the province. The situation is so serious that the government should place the whole resources of the country behind the effort to deal with unemployment and with agricultural distress.

Now, there has been a lot of discussion across the floor because the Prime Minister, it is objected, is asking parliament to give him a blank cheque for the amount of money to be spent. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) objected very strongly to that and, if I caught him rightly, he used these words: "We will give him"—referring to the Prime Minister—"anything he asks if he will only name the amount." Now, I do not see very much difference between that and giving the Prime Minister a blank cheque. The Prime Minister in effect says: "Give me a blank cheque and I will not spend any more than is absolutely necessary." The leader of the opposition retorts: "If you will just say the amount, regardless of what that amount is, I will support you." So in effect the leader of the opposition is prepared to give the Prime Minister a blank cheque; that is what he is offering to do. In any case I do not see that it makes very much difference. We talk about the rights of parliament, but how much does it mean after all? In the last analysis the expenditure of money is controlled by the government. The government has a majority in the house and can always force those expenditures through. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) seems to be shocked because the hon. member for Wetaskiwin subscribed to this principle in the resolution. I am sorry the hon. member is not in his seat, but I would say to him that as a private member he has never had any control over expenditures. He can get up and protest against any expenditure, as he did to-night, but the estimate or the bill goes through because the government has a majority. So I do not see any particular difference so far as that is concerned.

I am not altogether clear as to what is involved in the measures that are proposed to be taken to maintain law and order. That is something we do not like to think about at a time like this. I think we all agree that the first duty of a government is to maintain law and order. Every member of the house will subscribe to that principle, but I do hope nothing very drastic will be undertaken by the government in that regard.

The Prime Minister spoke rather severely about certain agitators in the country who should be dealt with, and with whom the government intended to deal rather severely.

I think often we take these men too seriously; in fact we dignify them and enhance their importance by taking them seriously. The ordinary soap box orator, with the little group around him, is only as serious and as dangerous as we take him to be. In discussing this question the late President Wilson said: "I tell you the so-called radicalism of our day is simply nature's way of relieving the generous energies of our people." So I would say to the government that if they are faced with any threats of disorder they should fight that threat with bread rather than with bullets. Bread is always much more effective in times of distress, and when hungry men get riotous bread is always a much more effective weapon than bullets. I trust that is the weapon upon which the government will rely.

As a last word I would ask the Prime Minister to look seriously into this question of providing relief in Saskatchewan by having necessary road work done in order to give employment to needy farmers.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): I desire to make a few remarks in connection with the very important resolution now under discussion. First of all I must say this measure will have a wonderful reception in that part of the country I have the honour to represent, because of certain local conditions we must face immediately. I believe we fully understand now that this matter of unemployment is of national importance; for that reason alone we will have a central organization and the old hit-and-miss policy under which we proceeded last winter will be done away with. That will be doing something tangible in a national way.

One of the details I have in mind is the way wages were paid the workingmen under the unemployment relief fund last winter. I have in my hand a statement made by Senator Robertson as reported in the Toronto Mail and Empire of February 7, 1931, in which he stated that the Ontario government and the federal government cooperated in the expenditure of over $2,000,000 in the construction of rural roads in northern Ontario. The quotation is as follows:

> The federal and provincial authorities agreed that it would be wise that the opportunity to secure work should be spread to as many needy people as possible. It was therefore decided that the men should work eight-hour days instead of the customary ten hours. We felt that 25 to 30 cents an hour was not enough, particularly with men working only eight hours and we fixed 35 cents as the minimum in all road work in which the Dominion government cooperates. The men working in northern Ontario are getting from 5 to 10 cents an hour more than was the scale before unemployment relief was inaugurated by the Dominion government and are working two hours a day less.

I believe the Minister of Labour was sincere in making that statement, but I am sorry to say that principle was not applied in the section of the country from which I come; it was not applied to the ridings of North Timiskaming, South Timiskaming or Nipissing. During the progress of a recent provincial by-election in Hamilton I was amazed to learn that a minister of the Ontario government stated that in the Fort William-Port Arthur and Kenora districts the men doing road work under the employment relief fund received $2.80 for an eight hour day. In my section of the country they were paid only at the rate of $2.40 for an eight hour day. I believe the same rate should have applied in my section of the country; we are part and parcel of northern Ontario and the cost of living is just as high there as it is in other sections of the north. So I ask the government to go into this matter and if possible pay to the settlers and the workingmen who did that road work last winter that difference of 40 cents a day.

Hon. gentlemen must realize that 40 cents per day means a great deal to a man who has been out of work for weeks or perhaps months. Hon. Mr. Finlayson said, only a few days ago, that this anomaly would be remedied in a very simple manner, that the government were going to lower the wages of men working on the roads in northern Ontario to $2.40 per day. This is not playing fair with the north. The men should be paid at least the wage promised by the Minister of Labour last winter when he was speaking in Toronto. We expected, and had the right to expect, that the settlers and workingmen of our section of the country would receive that wage. Very strong protests have appeared in the press of northern Ontario. The Porcupine Advance, a Conservative paper, made an urgent appeal to the provincial government making it plain that they were not playing fair; the Northland Post of Cochrane, an independent paper, and the Kapuskasing Tribune both took the same stand.

I appeal to the Prime Minister to see that this situation is remedied as soon as possible. Hon. gentlemen will readily see the importance of this matter in our section of the country where most of the men were allowed to work only three days per week at $2.40 per day, making a total of $7.20 per week. We must remember the climatic conditions which exist in that part of the country, and I may tell the house that during most of the winter the average time spent on road work did not exceed 20 days per month. It will be seen that for the father of a family or a settler trying to hew a living out of a new section of the country it was absolutely impossible to make ends meet. Again I ask that the difference be paid to every man who worked on the roads last winter in my section of the country; they should be paid the wage which was paid in other sections of northern Ontario.

There is one other protest I desire to make. I believe that in centralizing the control of the expenditure of the money for unemployment relief single men should be given a fair chance in the north. Perhaps I am treading on dangerous ground when I discuss this question, but it must be realized that in the newer sections of the country, whether they be in northern Ontario, northern Quebec or the western provinces, many single men have settled from the older sections of Canada. They have tried to start farms, and it is not their fault that they are single, because in many instances they intend to marry when they are in a position to do so. Last winter in my section of the country we had the sad spectacle of poor single men who had been working on farms for many years absolutely refused work, with no inquiry made as to their circumstances. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this is not playing the game with a very good section of the population of northern Ontario.

I would direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that it is now eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 30, 1931.

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Eleventh report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Matthews.

Mr. MATTHEWS moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PREEMPTION ENTRIES

Mr. PICKEL:

1. In whose name and on what date was preemption entry made in respect to each of the following: (a) S.W. ¼ section 13, township 33, range 20, W. 4th; (b) N.W. ¼ section 13, township 33, range 20, W. 4th?

2. Was patent ever issued on each of same, if not, why?

3. What ultimate disposition was made of each parcel?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. (a) S.W. ¼ 13-33-20-W. 4th mer., preemption entry William J. Garland, 25th April, 1911; (b) N.W. ¼ 13-33-20-W. 4th mer., preemption entry Edward J. Garland, 25th April, 1911.

2. Patents not issued, entries having been abandoned and cancelled.

3. S.W. ¼ 13-33-20-W. 4th mer., now included in ranch No. 15076 held under lease by Edward J. Garland.

N.W. ¼ 13-33-20-W. 4th mer., now included in ranch No. 23352 held under lease by Edward J. Garland.

IMMIGRATION BY MONTHS

Mr. BOULANGER:

What is the number of immigrants who entered Canada during the months of May, June and July, 1931?

Mr. GORDON: The immigration figures for the current month will not be available until some time in August. The following are the figures for May and June:

	Ocean Ports
	British	Others	From U.S.A.	Totals
May. . .	1,693	602	1,523	3,818
June. . .	940	536	1,693	3,169
Totals. . .	2,633	1,138	3,216	6,987

PRIVILEGE—Mr. DURANLEAU

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I beg leave to correct the statement I made, a few days ago, in connection with the harbour of Three Rivers and which appears in Hansard, on July 20, at page 4226 (English version) and at page 4178 (French version). I stated:

"This undertaking will give work to the unemployed, because much filling will be required to be done by labourers in Three Rivers, in the same way as it was carried out the previous winter. At that time, instead of utilizing the material dredged to do the filling, we had earth brought from outside the city limits, thus giving work to the people of Three Rivers. The cost was somewhat higher than that contracted for by the company, however, under the circumstances we thought it proper to have the work done in this way in order to help the unemployed."

I wish to say that this statement was meant for the harbour of Chicoutimi instead of that of Three Rivers.

The error happened owing to the fact that, last autumn, the Commissions of the harbours of Three Rivers and Chicoutimi wished to come to an understanding with the contractors performing the work in order that the filling of the wharves under construction could be carried out independently and without utilizing the dredging material. An agreement was arrived at for Chicoutimi which benefited throughout last winter by such an arrangement. So far as Three Rivers is concerned, the matter is still being considered by the commissioners and contractors; however, I hope that within a few days, the latter will come to a satisfactory agreement by which the Three Rivers labourers may immediately benefit as in the case of Chicoutimi.

CIVIL SERVICE

COMMENCEMENT AND CONTINUATION OF FOUR O'CLOCK CLOSING

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): If the house prorogues on this coming Saturday, may I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister when the four o'clock closing in the civil service will be started, and after it is started, will it be continued through the month of September in compensation for the month of July?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The matter is under consideration and I trust I may be able to make a statement to the house to-morrow. The present intention is that the four o'clock closing will end in August.

CRIMINAL CODE

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate acquainting their honours that this house doth agree in all the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 113, an act to amend the criminal code except in regard to the amendment to clause (d) of section 2 of the original bill which in the opinion of this house is not a desirable amendment and is unnecessary, having regard to the fact that a prosecution under the section cannot take place under the added section without a fiat of the attorney general of the province concerned.

The amendments made by the Senate to this bill are all very formal with the exception of two. Their honours have seen fit to amend the bill by striking out altogether section 15, which provided that:

Any judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction or of the court of appeal, may, if it seems fit, on the application of the appellant admit the appellant to bail pending determination of his appeal.

The other section to which I call attention is the one in regard to the nude parades. The bill provided that:

For the purposes of this subsection anyone shall be deemed to be nude who is so scantily clad as to offend against public decency or order.

Their honours have struck out the words "offend against public decency or order" and have inserted the words "expose the genital organs." I do not think we should concur in that amendment, and I have framed my motion accordingly, that we concur in all the amendments save that.

Motion agreed to.

FARM AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

POWER TO DEAL WITH AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS AND LABOUR SITUATION—MAINTENANCE OF ORDER

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 29, consideration of the motion of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief; and for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada; and to authorize the governor in council to expend for the said purposes out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as may from time to time be necessary.

Mr. JOSEPH A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): In the few remarks I made before the adjournment last night I brought to the attention of the house some of the anomalies that existed with respect to the wages paid in certain sections of northern Ontario in connection with unemployment relief. I cited that whereas the wages paid in certain districts for road work under the unemployment relief fund were $2.80 per day, in my section the men were paid only $2.40 per day, or a difference of 40 cents less. I would ask the government to make up that deficiency to the people involved in my section.

I also made an appeal on behalf of single men for work under the Northern Development Branch, and I hope that in any new work undertaken in the northern sections of the province such anomalies as I mentioned will not exist. I proved that single men in large numbers in that section of the country have been penalized. I am now going to bring to the attention of the house a local or regional matter, and I hope that my genial friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence) will not say, as he said the other day, that I should stand behind a wailing wall. This is a very important matter to northern Ontario, and more particularly to the town with which I am more familiar, that of Cochrane. We have in that section of the country a situation which I believe is not experienced in any other part of Canada. This applies to Kapuskasing, Porcupine district, Kirkland Lake district and most particularly to the town of Cochrane. That is the reason I believe it is my duty as a representative of that section of the country to bring to the attention of this house, as I brought it to the attention of the Prime Minister, the very acute and serious situation with which we have to contend in the town of Cochrane.

I hope the house will be indulgent for a few moments so that I may tell of this very important matter. Already the Prime Minister is familiar with the present situation, and after listening to me very carefully he has promised that in conjunction with the authorities of the province of Ontario he will provide a remedy. I want the house to realize that that statement was made nearly a month ago by the Prime Minister. So far, no relief has been given to the unemployed in Cochrane district. Hon. members will appreciate the gravity of the situation when they know that the population of that town is only 3,000, and that at present we have to take care of about 1,500 transient unemployed. For the last six months we have had to do that. The town of Cochrane and municipality is practically keeping and feeding that additional population, and has been doing so for the past six months. That is one of the reasons why we in that section of the country think we have done our duty and that the responsibility now rests wholly, if not with the provincial authorities, at least with the federal government.

I believe some hon. members will be interested to listen to a statement of conditions among the unemployed in that section of the country. They do not look to the municipal authorities, but blame, simply and solely, the federal authorities. That is why it is important for this government to listen to my outline of the situation so that as soon as possible remedies may be effected. Perhaps some hon. members will ask, "How is it you have such a great number of transients in your section of the country?" The answer is that geographically speaking we are in the centre of Canada. Owing to the fact that at the present time developments are being carried on at Coral rapids, necessitating the employment of hundreds of men, and that the railway is being extended to Moose Factory, that section of the country has been advertised in the newspapers for two years, with the result that Cochrane and district has been a drawing card for unemployed. That explains why we have so many people coming from all parts of Canada. True, many of them are there only for a short time, but a great many remain permanently.

That is my justification for appealing to the federal authorities to help remedy a situation for which the town of Cochrane is not, in a way, responsible. The situation is becoming worse, from day to day. We very much regret that the Minister of Labour did not find it possible, on his way back from the west, to go through our section of the country. We are at a loss to understand why he travelled through the southern section of northern Ontario; we do not know the reason. We were hoping that he would find it possible to come to Cochrane, speak to the unemployed and learn the facts of the situation with which we are faced.

Only last week the premier of the province of Ontario visited northern Ontario, but for some reason unknown to us in the northern section of the province he did not find it possible to come to Cochrane district, or to the northern section.

Now, so that the house may fully realize the situation in Cochrane I shall read to hon. members some articles appearing in local newspapers. The Cochrane Northland Post in its columns gives the northern viewpoint of the situation. I am no sob-sister artist, but I believe it my duty to make known the conditions we are facing and to point out to the authorities that unless attention is given to the matter immediately trouble will result. Last week, during one of the unemployed parades, one of the provincial constables was hurt. I shall quote from the Northland Post of May 14, 1931:

> There seems to be no limit to the number of unemployed that the town of Cochrane can harbour, from the appearance of the streets these days. Last Monday evening when the National pulled out of town, Railway street and Sixth avenue looked as though they were out to put Yonge street in the shade. It seems a pity that the citizens of the town are forced to either step off the sidewalk or else be jostled till their teeth rattle in order to get to and from work.
> Several storekeepers have complained that the entrance to their places of business have become the stamping ground of the hundreds of unemployed that we have in town. Many of these unfortunate men seem to monopolize the sidewalk with a bovine like indifference, making it almost impossible for women with baby carriages, to say nothing of the decidedly coarse type of talk that is all too frequently heard.
> It is hoped that work will be resumed up north soon, before a series of robberies breaks out, which is inevitable with the large number of men we have here with no means of support. Already two or three have been reported.

Again, quoting from the Northland Post of June 12, 1931, I find the following:

The unemployment situation in the north has now reached a stage where immediate action on the part of either, or both, provincial and federal government is absolutely imperative. During the past several months northern Ontario has been the mecca of literally thousands of unemployed drawn here by the overdone publicity given the construction work in progress. North Bay, Kirkland Lake, Timmins, Cochrane, Kapuskasing, all have the same story; of hundreds, even thousands, of men from all parts of Canada, arriving seeking work, where no work was to be had. These men are now stranded in these various centres with no chance of obtaining work, with little, if any money; the condition of many bordering on the desperate. These men have no claim, legal or moral, upon the municipalities, in which they are stranded. The municipalities in turn, absolutely cannot extend to these men relief of any kind whatsoever.

The situation at present is the most serious that has ever confronted the north. Though there is a large amount of unemployment throughout the country, that does not help to solve the problem in the north, which by virtue of the unique conditions existing here, is much more acute than in the older and more densely populated sections. In referring to this all-important question, wisdom and expediency preclude a reference to certain contingencies which will almost surely arise, unless action is taken in the very near future. There is a very real potential menace in the situation, recognized by many of the citizens, which cannot safely be ignored.

Now is the time for action, not when it is too late. Now is the time for statesmanship, not politics. The north is looking anxiously to the seats of government for action. More, it is demanding it, and it has the right to expect it.

On the 28th day of last month I spoke to between 700 and 900 unemployed in the town of Cochrane. I could see for myself that the situation was very serious. I promised those people that I would do everything within my power to bring matters to the attention of the house.

On July 1 the present Prime Minister told me he would get into communication with the premier of Ontario. So far, however, I am sorry to say that a solution of the problem has not been arrived at and there is more and more unemployment in the town of Cochrane. Only last week I gave the Prime Minister an article I had clipped from the Northland Post stating that a provincial constable had been assaulted and seriously wounded during a parade of the unemployed, and as a result was taken to the hospital. Again, the Prime Minister promised me he would do everything within his power to solve the difficulty. However, the problem is not yet solved and as a result the town of Cochrane is, so to speak, divided into two camps, and the situation grows worse. The house will understand that for six months Cochrane has had from 1,000 to 1,500 transient unemployed. Following the assault upon the provincial constable we have the spectacle in that section of the country of the population being divided into two camps. The local population resent the action of the unemployed men, and assert that they had no right to assault the constable. On the other hand the unemployed take the opposite stand and claim that they have to eat and work.

The time is ripe to remedy the situation. A few days ago I read a report in a Toronto paper to the effect that the premier of Ontario, Mr. Henry, after making a tour of the northern section of the province had said that within two months work would be initiated on the trans-Canada highway. Two months will be too late. So far as I am concerned I wish to wash my hands of responsibility for anything which may happen in the future. Two months time will be too late to offer those men work so that they may get something to eat and put shelter over their heads. I make that appeal very sincerely to the right hon. Prime Minister, for the situation is so urgent that it must be dealt with immediately. I said a few minutes ago that on the 20th of June, when meeting a body of the unemployed, I came to the defence of the government. I told them that the government were trying to do everything within their power to remedy the situation, and that it was no time for playing politics. It was said at the meeting that some of the unemployed would break into private property and take what they wanted. I told those men that as citizens of this country they were entitled to food and clothing, but at the same time property owners were entitled to defend their property. The house will understand the seriousness of the situation in my constituency when the unemployed take the law into their own hands and break into houses to get food and clothing. I repeat the statement that I made to the unemployed on that occasion, that I have enough confidence in this government to feel that they will step right in and deal with this acute situation in the north, particularly in the town of Cochrane, and that within a week or two 1,000 or 1,500 men will be put to work. This grave situation must be dealt with not two month's hence or next winter, it must be dealt with immediately. As I have said, this question should be lifted out of politics. It may be parochial in some respects, but in others it is national. Hon. members ought to hear what some of the unemployed say. They put the blame for the present condition of affairs on the right hon. Prime Minister and this government, not on the local organizations, not on the premier of the province. Every spokesman for the unemployed put the blame solely on the right hon. Prime Minister. In order that the house may realize the seriousness of the situation and the urgency for remedial action, I am going to read an editorial which appeared in the Northland Post of Cochrane published on the 24th inst. It is as follows:

Little Improvement In The Unemployed Situation

That the unemployed men receiving relief in Cochrane are transients has been amply born out during the past week. Each day numbers have left town, their places have been taken by others coming in from other points. Some idea of the way these men shift around can be gathered from the fact that as many as a hundred or more have been known to come to town on one train, while nearly as many have left at one time also. The number in receipt of relief, however, has remained fairly constant, from a low of about two hundred and eighty to over three hundred and fifty.

In addition to those in receipt of relief there is a large number of men who have not yet reached that stage in their finances, who are staying at the various rooming houses around town. Quite a number of these men are subsisting on only two, and in not a few cases, one meal a day, in order to husband their scanty savings. In some cases also, the boarding-house keepers have allowed men to run up accounts for both rooms and meals, though of course this is necessarily limited, as the proprietors of the boarding houses are not in a position to finance the men indefinitely. One such case was recently reported to have some three thousand dollars of book debts, but few of them could afford to let the figure run so high.

Many of the men coming here state that they were told to come here by the police and others in the town or city which they came from. This practice has quite evidently been followed in many of the places, and the fact that there is a construction job going on up north of Cochrane has aided these places in persuading the men to come here. One or two places have been particular offenders in this way and Cochrane's troubles at the present time are due in no small measure to these two places, both of which are better able to take care of the men than is Cochrane.

The news of Premier Henry's proposed "Labour battalions" was received here last week with tempered enthusiasm. Most of the local citizens appear to be very much in favour of the idea, but feel that in the case of Cochrane, immediate steps should be taken by the government to remove these men from here, as there are no facilities for looking after them, and the problem is really none of the town's business. There is also a certain uneasiness that there will be a recurrence of the trouble which broke out a week ago last Monday, when Provincial Constable Crozier was injured. Though many individuals are convinced that such will not be the case, this feeling is not shared by the majority and the uncertainty of the situation is having a very unsettling effect upon the community.

Since the trouble referred to, there is very little sympathy on the part of the townspeople generally for the men, resentment being general that they should come here uninvited from every part of Canada and repay kindness and good treatment in such a manner. The citizens of Cochrane are heartily fed up with the whole situation, and while willing to assume a just share of any burden shouldered by the country as a whole, they feel that the town has been imposed on long enough and that it has been called upon to harbour far too many in proportion to its population. There is an insistent demand on all sides for the removal of these men in the near future.

No definite date has so far been announced in regard to the formation of the labour battalions. One source has estimated it at about two months hence, which, if correct, will not be soon enough to relieve the local situation. It is likely, however, that it will be sooner than that, as the situation throughout the province is so serious that it will force the government to rush the arrangements. The announcement of the labour battalions brought forth protests from certain quarters, particularly in organized labour circles, but subsequent reassurances on the part of the government that the men would not be conscripted has done much to overcome this opposition. Regret is expressed here that Premier Henry was unable to pay a visit to this part of the north in addition to his visit to Sault Ste. Marie this week, as it is thought that a personal inspection of the local situation would have hastened governmental action here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BRADETTE: I beg to inform hon. members opposite that if some of them would come up to my section of the country tomorrow they would be ready to plead my case with the right hon. Prime Minister. Last session when we mentioned the unemployment situation no one on the other side was treating our appeal very seriously. I do not take up very much of the time of the house, and I interrupt very few hon. members on the other side. Let me extend this invitation to hon. members opposite: If by "carried" they mean that the situation which I have described will be remedied within the next week, I will take my seat at once. But I am not going back to my constituents until I can tell them that the situation will be remedied. I am speaking for the unemployed in Cochrane and district, and so distressing is their situation that I am positive that if my hon. friends opposite could be brought face to face with those unhappy people they would fight by my side for immediate remedial action. I am not talking politics; this question is bigger than politics; but this is the time and place to discuss such a matter, and I would be derelict in my duty as representative of the riding if I failed to bring this critical condition before the attention of the house. Let me quote the statement made by the spokesman for the Cochrane unemployed delegation which recently waited on the council:

"You know very good what we want," was the answer of the spokesman for the unemployed delegation which waited on the council on Wednesday evening, when acting Mayor Penny invited him to come up to the council table and tell the council what was wanted. The spokesman went on to say that many men were sleeping in barns, sheds and out of doors, that they had no shoes, no clothes and no work, and were, in fact, living like dogs.

Now, this is not to be laughed at; it is too serious for mirth.

Mr. Penny assured the delegation that the council were doing all in their power to get action from the government and pointed out that they had been successful in obtaining some measure of relief. The delegation, nine in number, were told that though the council would continue their efforts to place before the government the condition of the men, the town was incapable of furnishing shelter for such a large number. The delegation left the meeting after being assured that the council would put their case up to the government again and urge measures of relief. The delegation spoke to a resolution, passed at a meeting of the unemployed, held on July 15th, which was, in its way, a masterpiece of misrepresentation, protesting as it did against police violence.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have made out my case. It is not my intention to delay the house for any length of time, for I know it is not popular for any member to make a long speech at this late stage of the session; but I would be lacking in my duty to my constituents if I did not make it a point to bring this unfortunate and critical situation to the attention of the house with all the force at my command, and to appeal to the right hon. Prime Minister and the government—and I believe he and his colleagues are sympathetic—that to remedy this situation something be done, and done immediately. Surely it is within the power of the government to send a wire to the mayor of Cochrane that they are going to take care of the situation at once. I am no "sob sister" artist and I am sure that my genial friend from Parkdale (Mr. Spence) if he would visit my section of the country would come back and give me his heartiest support in the appeal that I am now making to the government. I know the right hon. Prime Minister realizes the seriousness of the situation and I assure him I am making my appeal very seriously.

Last summer we were told that if the unemployment situation became a national problem it would be dealt with in a national way. That meant that it would be dealt with by the central authority, which is this parliament and this government. And again I appeal to the right hon. Prime Minister that before the day is over he send a message to the mayor of Cochrane that he will relieve the present unemployment situation in that town and district. So far we have heard of only one case of violence by the unemployed, so far they have kept within the law, but you cannot argue with men who are hungry and destitute, and need food, shelter and clothing. That is why I believe that hon. members will agree with me that a message should be sent to that section of the country that the government will deal with the situation in such a way that the town of Cochrane will be relieved of further responsibility for meeting a condition which has been forced upon them and with which during the last six months they have been trying to cope. Every institution and individual in that town has been doing its duty, but the stage has been reached where it is absolutely impossible for the town of Cochrane to cope with the situation further. It will be impossible for me to go back to my constituency unless I have a message to deliver to the people that authority will be taken by the government to deal with the situation, and that it will be remedied, and remedied at once.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to two statements made by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, the most astounding and the most timely statements he has made during the last thirteen months. His most astounding statement was, "I will end unemployment," made in Moncton during the last campaign; his most timely statement was made before a large audience of unemployed in Calgary, to the effect that it was the intention of this government to study the causes of unemployment. That is the first thing that should have been done. I remember very well that after the last election a committee was formed to inquire into that question, and one of the recommendations brought in was that immigration should be stopped. That recommendation has not been carried out; immigrants may still enter the country, and the government have only ceased advertising in order to bring them here.

It is most important, Mr. Speaker, that we get to the root of the evil in order to cure it, and I am very much surprised that there has been no meeting of the committee on industrial and international relations this session to study that question, which is of such great importance not only to Canada but to all the countries of the world. It is late, Mr. Speaker; the session is about to close, and we have now a resolution before us in connection with which I congratulate the government. They seem to be in earnest in trying to do something to relieve unemployment, but this is only a palliative. This will not cure the evil at all; it is like putting a plaster on a wooden leg. I think it is time for the government to appoint a commission composed of technicians, university and labour men and others of wide experience to study the question in all its details and make appropriate suggestions. Last fall and this spring, before the Minister of Labour undertook his trip to the west he said unemployment was diminishing all the time and that conditions were getting better. When he went to the west, with adding machines with which to count the number of unemployed, he was startled; he was astonished; he was dumbfounded, and he returned to tell the government what he had seen.

Conditions are very bad in the west; they are very bad in the east also, because the farmers cannot sell their products and the lumber industries are not doing the business they did previously. What is the reason? Is it because the people who have some money are discouraged and are keeping that money in the banks or in their pockets instead of spending it in improvements? They may be waiting for better times, so in that respect I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) was doing the right thing when he preached hope for the future. But do we not all remember the campaign which followed the Winnipeg convention of 1927, during which hon. gentlemen opposite went about saying the country was in bad shape, when that was not true?

Following that people began to make money in the stock market; some people were getting rich, and others tried to do the same thing. Many people with small incomes put all their savings in the stock market, and everyone knows what happened. Some brokers were really thieves; they advertised certain stocks, saying they were good and were going up, in order to sell them. Then what happened? Those stocks came down; people lost their money, which was concentrated under the control of a few people. Those brokers became rich within a very short time by stealing money from people who had invested their small savings in securities of every kind. So I would make one suggestion: In order to provide money for unemployment relief works in this country would it not be fair to confiscate say three-quarters of the enormous gains made unlawfully by those brokers? That would be a step to which no one in this country except themselves would object; it would be only retribution for the evil done by those men.

That is one suggestion I desire to make; the other I made in beginning my speech. I believe the government are sincere in trying to relieve unemployment, and I ask them to be practical by going to the root of the evil and ascertaining the first causes of it. The matter has been studied by the League of Nations and by the keenest minds of Europe and America. Now it is time for this country to make a thorough inquiry into the question of unemployment in order to cure the evil and prevent it from happening again in the future.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee, Mr. Tummon in the chair.

Mr. HEENAN: I am anxious that the Prime Minister should introduce the bill at the earliest possible moment, so I will not delay the house at this stage but will reserve my remarks for the second reading of the bill. However, I do wish in all sincerity to make one appeal to the Prime Minister; I appeal to him to eliminate from his resolution and from the bill any reference to the maintenance of law and order, coupled with unemployment relief.

I make this appeal because I have knowledge of the labour men of Canada. I know they are a sane body of men; I know that during the inactivity of governments in providing for unemployment relief, the working men of Canada have shared their work, their number of days of employment, with those who were less fortunate. If the Prime Minister will reconsider it he will realize that there are sufficient laws on the statute books to-day to cope with any situation. But to couple with a bill providing for unemployment relief a provision with regard to the maintenance of law and order will not, I think, be taken in the right spirit. I appeal to the Prime Minister to eliminate that feature from the legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Ordinarily we of the opposition would be inclined in committee to emphasize anew the points that were raised in the discussion of the resolution. But we realize that the house is anxious to conclude the business of the session and that, no matter what we may say, hon. gentlemen opposite have a majority, which enables them to do as they please. If, therefore, the Prime Minister is determined to pass the measure in its present form our discussion at this stage would possibly be regarded only as in the nature of obstruction. Nothing is further from our minds than a desire to obstruct in any way the granting of relief for unemployment and rural distress, and in view of these circumstances, having expressed our views on the main motion, we do not intend to discuss the resolution in committee.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 142, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief, and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. BENNETT: With the consent of the house it might now be read the second time, and when the house is in committee on the bill my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) can make his observations and I shall be glad to answer any questions he may ask.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister is not going to move the second reading now?

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend would not press that we should be obliged. I should like to see the bill before the second reading. Possibly it would be better to delay the second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the lengthy discussion we had yesterday I had thought that, with the consent of the house, we might proceed now. However, the right hon. gentleman having expressed a desire to look over the terms of the bill, it will have to stand, because we can proceed only by consent. I had intended to dispose of this matter before going on with the report of the Beauharnois committee. In the circumstances, perhaps we had better take supply until later in the day. The minister who is to make the motion in that matter requested me not to proceed this afternoon. He says he will try to go on this evening if possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would agree to go on immediately with the second reading of the bill were it not that it is possible we may wish to move an amendment on the second reading. This we cannot even consider without seeing the bill itself. If the house were to proceed with supply now, this evening we might go on with the other subject.

Mr. BENNETT: So that my hon. friends, when studying the bill, will be acquainted with its terms, I may say that we propose to add in the preamble the words, "so far as the legislative authority of parliament extends." That will make it clear that there is no endeavour to take from the provinces their powers, as suggested yesterday by an hon. gentleman. These are the words mentioned in one of the judicial decisions to which I had reference to-day. The bill itself expires on March 31, 1932, which I did not mention yesterday.

SUPPLY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Tummon in the chair.

London—salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, including $2,000 additional salary for the High Commissioner to that authorized by chap. 92, R.S.C., $132,260.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my right hon. friend any figures which will indicate the allowances made in addition to the salary paid in connection with the London office?

Mr. BENNETT: There is an increase of $15,000 in the allowances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How is that increase made up?

Mr. BENNETT: The living and entertaining allowances are increased by $15,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In connection with Washington, Paris and Tokyo, there are allowances made for house accommodation, and then there is something additional for other purposes. I would like to know if the London office is to be made to correspond with the other offices in these particulars. For example, what are the house allowances?

Mr. BENNETT: As my right hon. friend knows, there is no residence at London such as there is at Washington. Having regard to the demands made upon the High Commissioner, the allowances made contemplate large individual resources. Studying the matter from every angle I am bound to say that I know of no other way by which the situation could be met except by increasing the allowances by at least $15,000. I think if justice were done the increase would be somewhat larger because the demands at London are more than they are at any other point where we maintain representation. The amount has been increased from $25,000 to $40,000 and I fancy my right hon. friend will agree with me that that is a lesser sum than will be required for that purpose. The salary is $12,000; living allowance, $5,000; allowance in lieu of house and furnishings, $5,000, and then a car allowance which has been paid for some years.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my right hon. friend advise the committee whether festivities such as the dinner held on Dominion day are paid for by the people of Canada or by the High Commissioner? My right hon. friend will realize that it would be rather hard for those Canadians who are abused on these occasions by the High Commissioner because their views do not coincide with his to have to pay this cost.

Mr. BENNETT: I think my hon. friend is putting too constrained a construction upon the observations to which he directed attention the other day. I do not think there was any intention to abuse him or anyone else who entertains views at variance with those entertained by the High Commissioner. The High Commissioner is now en route on the sea, but as soon as an opportunity presents itself I shall make inquiries and then communicate with my hon. friend. These jocular observations which are made sometimes are seized upon by the press and we receive only the report of what has been said. I feel quite certain that no reflection was intended. I have found myself presiding at a meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, and in such capacity introducing my hon. friend, I have made some jocular observations as to our variance of views and I would be sorry to think that those remarks represented the considered views of the association of which I at the moment happened to be the head. I have no information as to what happened in London, but my information is that at such gatherings tickets are first bought and paid for.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That would be new.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know of any place from which I could obtain this information, but the moment it is obtained my hon. friend will be advised.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think I am over hyper-sensitive or that I have an exaggerated sense of my own dignity, but I will admit that it is rather unpleasant to have our own representative in the centre of the empire refer to those who think otherwise than he does as men of low calibre. I read that in the official report of his speech, and there is no joke in that.

Item agreed to.

Washington—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change in this item.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says that there is no change in this item. I am anxious to ascertain if there is any change in his point of view with respect to the legation at Washington. At the time the legation was opened, my right hon. friend may recall that he was somewhat critical of the establishment of legations by the government of Canada. Speaking in this house on April 13, 1927, as reported in Hansard, page 2472, my right hon. friend said:

> I am wholly opposed to the establishment of this embassy at Washington. It is but the doctrine of separation, it is but the evidence in many minds of the end of our connection with the empire. For that is what it means. It means nothing else ultimately, because if we are a sovereign state we cannot belong to the British Empire.

I would ask my right hon. friend when he replies to say whether he still believes the legation at Washington and the underlying policy represent a doctrine of separation, and if the legation continues to be an evidence of the end of our connection with the empire. That view of my right hon. friend was expressed in 1927. In 1928 he seemed still to entertain the same view because in speaking at the Toronto Business Men's Conservative Club as reported in the Mail and Empire of June 15, 1928, my right hon. friend said:

> I had hoped in my younger days, and I have not entirely lost my hope yet, that in maintaining the unity and solidarity of this commonwealth of nations we call the British Empire, we might attach Canadians, Australians, New Zealanders to the embassies abroad of the empire. It may come that some Canadian may be ambassador of the British Empire—just as much to be achieved by his ambition as if born within sound of Bow Bells.
> I see no reason why that hope should be disturbed to-day. I see no reason why we should have separate embassies and legations, but rather embassies and legations should be of the united empire, and every part of the empire might find representation there when the moment of peril came, and they could speak with one voice, without divided authority.

That represents an attitude somewhat different from that on which this particular appropriation is founded. I should like my right hon. friend to say whether here also he has modified his views.

Then speaking at Oshawa on July 22, 1928, my right hon. friend, criticizing myself as the head of an administration which had opened the legation at Washington, is reported in the Ottawa Morning Journal of July 23, 1928, as follows:

What port is Mr. King bound for? Mr. Bennett asked, referring to recent declarations by the premier of Canada's equal status in the British Empire, and the establishment of embassies in foreign countries.

If he wants to make this an independent country, let him say so. Let us have a well-defined expression from Premier King as to where he is heading, what his chart is and what his port.

That is the report of his speech as it appeared in the Ottawa Morning Journal of July 23, 1928. It contains the same underlying idea that the legation at Washington was making for separation.

May I give one further quotation? I have innumerable quotations from his speeches on this subject, but I think these will be sufficient to indicate what his previous critical attitude was. Speaking at Halifax, on July 26, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle of July 27, 1928, my right hon. friend said:

What is meant by this talk of equality of status? Mr. Bennett asked. What do all these legations mean? There can't be two kings. This may not mean what it seems and it may seem what it is, but it serves to make this country an independent nation. I say, for myself and for the Conservative party, that we in Canada are not prepared as yet to separate our allegiance to the British Empire. If Mr. King is sincere he will answer this question: What port are you bound for?

If we are to be independent, Mr. Bennett said in conclusion, Mr. King should let us know, that the people might have a say before it is too late.

Just in order that I may not take up further time by referring to this subject after my right hon. friend replies, unless he says something that occasions a reply, may I in substantiation of the point of view taken by the Liberal administration when these legations were opened, give him the words of his own representative whom he has appointed as minister to Washington, at the time of presenting his letter of credence to the President of the United States. The letter of credence was presented along with a letter of recall of the previous minister on June 23rd of this year. In the letter of credence the minister set forth, and I assume that he was voicing the opinion of my right hon. friend, his views as to what the legation had really meant in the course of the time it had been in existence, and he was quite explicit in saying that the legation had not only served a very useful purpose to Canada but that it had served, if anything, to bring the whole British Empire closer together. That is the fruit of experience as it is expressed in the words of my right hon. friend's minister to Washington on June 23 of this year. I quote from the Ottawa Morning Citizen of June 24, 1931, a despatch from Washington, D.C., dated June 23, It says:

The minister—

That is the present minister to Washington:

—expressed to the president the conviction that the establishment of diplomatic relations had assisted in promoting the harmonious relations existing between Canada and the United States and the empire of which Canada formed a part.

Major Herridge's address is set out at length, and I have in my hand the words which appear in the address as presented to the president. I have no doubt that my right hon. friend saw this address before it was presented. I assume that he would be familiar with the words of it. At any rate, the minister was representing the government and was speaking for the government of Canada and for my right hon. friend in particular. I think my right hon. friend will admit that. The address in part reads as follows:

It is the earnest wish of His Majesty's government in Canada that the harmonious relations which have long prevailed between the United States and Canada shall be maintained and strengthened. Mr. Massey in Washington expressed the confident hope that the establishment of a Canadian legation in Washington would serve to strengthen those cordial sentiments which exist between Canada and the United States as well as between the United States and the empire of which Canada is a part. I feel that I can say with conviction that this hope has been fulfilled during the four years which have passed since direct diplomatic relations were established between the United States and Canada.

Nothing could be more gratifying than that, I am sure, to the administration which established the legation and appointed Mr. Massey as minister to Washington, as well as with respect to the manner in which Mr. Massey discharged his duties as minister to Washington. The president of the United States in replying used the following words:

You have likewise delivered to me the letters of recall of your distinguished predecessor, the Hon. Vincent Massey, whose residence in this capital as the first minister of the Dominion government to this country is most happily remembered.

A little further on the president said:

I share your conviction that the establishment of direct diplomatic relations between Canada and the United States has served to strengthen the cordial sentiments which exist between our countries as well as between the United States and the empire of which Canada is a part.

There we have two entirely different points of view. The point of view of the Liberal administration which established the legations was that these legations would make for better relations between Canada and the countries to which the ministers were sent, and that they would also be a factor in making for closer relations between the British Empire as a whole and these countries. We took that view; it was in that belief we established legations. My hon. friend, as leader of the opposition at the time, criticized our action and said he believed it would lead to separation. After three or four years of the existence of the legations, however, my right hon. friend sends his own minister to Washington with a letter to the president. In that communication there is stated, in as concise and emphatic language as could be used in a diplomtic communication, the fact that the legation has made and is making for closer relations not only between Canada and the United States but between Canada and the British Empire as a whole.

Perhaps my right hon. friend will tell us frankly whether the views of his minister as expressed in his communication are my right hon. friend's views to-day, and if so, whether as a consequence of necessity he has altered his opinion as given at a time when he was so critical of these legations.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no difficulty in answering the questions of my right hon. friend. In the first place the word used was not "relations". The words are "cordial sentiments". The words which His Majesty's newly appointed Minister for Canada used were

Mr. Massey, in presenting his credentials in 1927 as the first Canadian Minister in Washington, expressed the confident hope that the establishment of a Canadian legation in Washington would serve to strengthen those cordial sentiments which exist between Canada and the United States as well as between the United States and the empire of which Canada is a part.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did I use the word "relations"?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, at the close of your remarks I believe you used the word twice. To continue the letter:

I feel that I can say with conviction that this hope has been fulfilled during the four years which have passed since direct diplomatic relations were established between the United States and Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not misquote.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the quotation was read accurately, but when the right hon. gentleman was speaking from memory at the end of his remarks he used the word "relations" instead of "sentiments," which I regard as a very essential difference. The cordial relations existing between the two countries have undoubtedly been strengthened by reason of the circumstances to which the right hon. gentleman refers, and in his reply the president suggested that that was so. I repeat that the conduct of a legation in any part of the world on behalf of this Dominion will be successful along the lines I discussed in the years 1927 and 1928 only after the experiment had been tried for a long time. What the ultimate effect may be of the assertion in strange countries of sovereignty which you do not possess, and of a position which we cannot in any sense occupy, unless we change our relations to the motherland and to other parts of the British Empire, is a matter which will not be settled in a single day, a single year, five years or ten years. The stream of history flows slowly; its volume increases as the years pass, and it is fed by many little incidents that at the moment seem small but in the end constitute and make up its volume.

So far as I am concerned I did not view with approval the establishment of legations in foreign countries on behalf of the Dominion. I rather believed the doctrine of Sir Robert Borden in the first instance was a sound one, namely, that we should have our legation in the same premises as the British embassy, and that the solidarity of our empire should be proclaimed to all the world by the fact that we are all together. I believe that that was a perfectly sound experiment, and I so expressed myself on several occasions. But I certainly did not,—as I understood and still understand what is meant by representation by a minister in a foreign country,—believe that you could continue it without bringing about the inevitable result unless you changed entirely your attitude of mind towards the use to which the legation was put. I think it is now abundantly clear, from the observations that have been made publicly and otherwise by our minister at Tokyo, that the legation in that place is an adjunct to our commercial activities, and permits him, by reason of his diplomatic position, to have audience—if I may use that term, which I believe would be the proper one under the circumstances—with the authorities of another country, more readily and more expeditiously than could be hoped for if he did not occupy that position. Hence it is that the reports of that distinguished Canadian are so filled with references to commercial matters, and the concern he has manifested for the expansion of trade and the attendant advantages upon our commercial position by better understanding in foreign countries.

With respect to Washington I believe the extension of the use and utility of the office in that city will depend upon the extent to which the incumbent of the office makes himself familiar with the commercial as well as the other problems which have to be dealt with between the two countries. It will be recalled that only a short time ago the President of the United States invited foreign communities, if they so desired, to present their positions before the tariff board he set up. In that sense there is no doubt that any minister representing this Dominion could, if he had the desire and the inclination to interest himself in commercial matters affecting the welfare of this country in its relations with the great republic, be of inestimable service, and more so by reason of the particular position which is accorded to the diplomatic representatives of countries in foreign capitals.

I have never made a statement that indicates that I have not a clear appreciation of the distinction which must be drawn between the position which a minister representing this country must hold in foreign countries, if he interests himself in trade and commerce, as distinguished from the problems of pure diplomacy. On problems of pure diplomacy I have not changed my view, that if we are to speak with any degree of strength or power we must at least have some common purpose in our foreign policy. I need hardly remind my right hon. friend that not since 1900 has an Imperial conference been held at which the question of foreign policy has not engaged the attention of delegates. The extent to which foreign policy can be promoted by the maintenance of diplomatic representatives in foreign capitals who are not working out their diplomatic difficulties in accord with the other representatives of the British Empire, whether they be representatives of Great Britain, South Africa or Australia, is a matter which is still in the lap of the gods. While approving of a representative of each country finding a diplomatic home in Washington, the most eminent of British statesmen have indicated what every thoughtful man realizes is the real problem yet to be settled: Can the empire survive if it has six representatives in a given community following different courses with respect to a matter of concern between the capital in which they find their homes, and their several countries? The problem is not yet solved, and the difficulties are not yet resolved. Still the problems remain and the difficulties are with us.

I am hopeful that as days go by, as the attitude of man towards peace is improved, and as recourse to arbitration and peaceful methods of settlement are changed from time to time, we will not have any reason to regret the action we have taken. I need hardly remind my right hon. friend however that standing in this very place within the last fifteen or eighteen months—yes, only that long ago—he expressed grievous concern as to the safety of this Dominion by reason of commercial relations which existed between this country and the United States with respect to one commodity, and expressed the view that he could not assume responsibility for the position which would be created. Under those circumstances I think he will readily agree with me that the ultimate determination of the value which attaches to the experiment we are making cannot to-day be apprised; it cannot be done. I have expressed my views with respect to it and given my reasons for it.

Like all other heads of parties who succeed to a position as distinguished from an idea, who have to deal with a concrete situation and not with a mere academic problem; we found these legations, and we will maintain them to the very best of our ability; we will support in every possible way their usefulness, hoping that as the days go by a clearer appreciation of their value in the field of commercial activities may make their maintenance more desirable and more justifiable. For if you consider them and weigh them in the pure realm of diplomatic usefulness, you will find it extremely difficult to justify some portion of the expenditures incurred. But from the larger standpoint of commercial advantages to the community, I think, weighing the value and the cost against the results and benefits, it will be found that the results and benefits outweigh the cost.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have done my utmost, Mr. Chairman, to follow my right hon. friend in his reply, but I must say that his speech seems to me to be best described by the simile of a stream which he himself used. It was, however, a meandering stream, and it was not too clear a stream. I did try to follow him from Washington to Tokyo then over to the Imperial conferences in London, then to appreciate his digression on commercial relations and finally his reference to what I understood to be the liquor traffic. Altogether, I must say that I do not yet feel quite sure as to what in his heart of hearts my right hon. friend really feels and believes. He has spoken about the "stream of history" and the inflences that affect its course. May I say to him that he is in the middle of that stream at the present time, and it is his wand that turns the stream in one direction or the other so far as Canada is concerned. In the matter of legations he has been most emphatic as to the roads to the right and to the left. He has said that these legations mean independence, if we were to have legations that stand for Canada as possessing equal status with other parts of the empire, and that the only salvation in the long run for the empire as well as for Canada was not legations such as we have to-day, which represent the individuality of this Dominion, but some composite diplomatic organization to which the Canadian representative would be attached as a sort of glorified commercial attaché. That, I think, is about the substance of the difference of the two points of view. Let me say to my right hon. friend that he cannot escape his responsibility by any amount of philosophizing—perhaps casuistry would be too strong a word, but it seems to me to be fitting in the circumstances. He to-day is responsible for the maintenance of the legation at Washington, which is expressive of the equality of status which this Dominion enjoys with the other self-governing parts of the British Empire, includuing Great Britain itself. If the maintenance of a legation of this character means in the end separation, or the risk of separation, he must now bear the responsibility for helping to direct this country along that course. He has it within his power to abolish the legation, to change its complexion if he likes, and if he does not do that, then he must be responsible for the consequences, not only so far as this Dominion is concerned but the empire as well, if the whole structure unfortunately collapses!

Mr. BOURASSA: I think the right hon. leader of the opposition is unduly cruel to the right hon. leader of the government in this matter. He ought to rest modestly content with the fashion in which his successor is following his policy. I think that is the best possible commendation of his idea. There is a point which leaders of parties should not overstep in declaring their victories over their opponents in this matter as well as in the matter of interimperial relations. In this respect at least, I think the present government should be congratulated on the very frank manner in which they have stepped into the shoes of their predecessors and maintained all that has been gained and made the best of it. The right hon. leader of the opposition has used the metaphor of the leader of the government being, I will not say King Log, but in the midst of the stream and going either to the right or to the left. I think that most leaders of governments, whether they like it or not, once they are launched in the midst of the stream follow the current; they may seem to go one way or the other, but if the current corresponds really to the trend of public opinion they have to follow it.

But I did not rise with the idea of trying to restore harmony between the two right hon. gentlemen. I simply wanted to give an example in the history of our relations with the United States which shows the practical advantage to be derived from the establishment of direct relations. The right hon. leader of the government has endeavoured to minimize the importance of foreign relations, especially in Washington, to the level of commercial relations. Of course, I admit that commercial relations are very important, but as between two countries situated as the United States and Canada are I think the commercial interests of each country can be largely relied upon to establish relations between the two countries without much interference on the part of governments. But apart from those commercial relations, and apart also from those great questions of international concern to which the Prime Minister has referred, and upon which, I admit, so long as we are united with Great Britain there must be at least some conversations—to use the diplomatic expression— before any action is taken in common or separately as between the representatives of Great Britain and Canada and the other dominions, there are also questions of a semi-diplomatic character, which are far better treated, I think, by men representing directly their respective countries. Here is an instance. Long before the question of the boundary between British Columbia and Alaska had become acute, the Americans had created trading establishments along the coast of the Pacific ocean. The British interests were represented by the Hudson's Bay Company. The Hudson's Bay Company established trading posts along the shore—some even in the state of Oregon, which they had to abandon after the boundary was established on the 49th parallel; they had a few also on Vancouver island and on the main coast. After the United States had purchased Alaska from Russia, naturally the activity of American fishermen and traders increased, and there was a time when they came in contact with representatives of the Hudson's Bay Company, until one day a surveyor sent by the Interior department in Canada became very much embarrassed to find where the boundary lay between Canadian territory and American territory. If I remember rightly, it was Mr. Dennis, who established a very fine reputation in the Interior department in the surveying of the western territory. He wrote to Ottawa to obtain instructions. This was during the summer time, and the Minister of the Interior sent a despatch to Sir John Macdonald, who was spending the summer at Rivière du Loup. Sir John Macdonald sent the letter to our representative in London, Sir Charles Tupper, who took the letter to the colonial secretary. After a couple of weeks the colonial secretary passed the letter over to the foreign secretary, who wrote the English embassy in Washington. At that time the English embassy was somewhat upset, because that was the summer when the English ambassador, Sir Lionel Sackville-West, had got into difficulty with the American government in connection with the presidential election, and to use a colloquial expression he was in the process of being sacked out of the country at the request of the American secretary of state. Naturally that took up some of the time of that gentleman before he could reply. Finally the reply of the secretary of state was sent to the foreign secretary, who handed it to the colonial secretary, who sent it to the Governor General in Ottawa, who handed it to Sir John A. Macdonald.

To put it shortly, after four months the department in Ottawa was informed that the secretary of state in Washington had no knowledge that any American citizen had encroached upon Canadian territory. In order to show how correspondence of that nature deleted the facts, let me say this: The report of Mr. Denis gave all the data, the names of the parties in conflict, the exact situation of the property and everything, but through this exchange of letters it came to this: Sir Lionel Sackville-West or his representative, the chargé d'affaires, inquired of the Department of the Secretary of State if they had information that any American citizen had been encroaching upon the property of any Canadian citizen, to which naturally they replied they had no such knowledge. Here is a concrete example of the situation which existed between the two countries so long as we had to maintain our relations through that process of correspondence. Direct relations between Ottawa and Washington would have elicited the information in from eight to fifteen days.

What was the consequence? When the question was taken up by the Anglo-American commission in 1898—I happen to know the facts because I was one of the secretaries of that commission—that was the one instance in which Canada could have pleaded proof that we had placed a claim for possession of a portion of that strip of land extending south from Alaska along British Columbia. That was the one instance in which we could have demonstrated that we had already put in a claim for ownership, but through that absurd process of correspondence from Ottawa to London, from London to Washington and back the same way, these facts were entirely deleted of all their force and it was impossible to maintain them as against the series of counter-facts established by the United States government.

I quote that as an example to show that the establishment of direct relations between Ottawa and Washington is perhaps the most practical move we have made in that direction in the last twenty years. Between two countries such as the United States and Canada I firmly believe, and experience has shown, that direct relations are the best means of avoiding difficulties, misapprehensions and misconceptions of fact. The establishment of the International Joint Commission is another case. How many difficulties with regard to the navigation of the great lakes and the St. Lawrence would have arisen if those matters had been treated in the old-fashioned, indirect way through the British embassy?

Reference has been made to those expressions of opinion contained in the remarks of our present minister to Washington and of the President of the United States. I will go further and say that the British government felt greatly relieved when we established these relations. One of the English ambassadors stated in public that of all the affairs with which he had to deal during his occupancy of the position of British ambassador at Washington, at least half came from Canada. He did not say that in any grudging way at all, but anyone who has had any relations with English diplomats, or with diplomats of any other country, knows that they do not care to have more to do than they are obliged to do. We all know that the position of English ambassador at Washington is one of the most important in the world, and the idea that the representative of the British government in Washington should be obliged to deal with all those small matters, semi-political, semi-diplomatic and semi-commercial, which arise every day between Canada and the United States, was absurd. The idea that a diplomat of the first rank, who is primarily concerned with the great problems of British policy the world over, should be obliged to pass a great deal of his time in dealing with such questions is unjust to the British government, I claim, and to the British ambassador. Therefore I say we have done a service not only to ourselves but to the British government through the establishment of that legation. They have enough of their own difficulties and problems with which to deal without our loading more on them. This was one of the most practical manifestations we could give of our friendship for the British Empire and at the same time of our dignity as a nation, showing both to the English and to the Americans that we were capable of presenting our own cases before a foreign government, of discussing them on their merits and of dealing with a foreign government without the mediation of a third party, as a minor child is obliged to deal through his tutor.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I do not propose to take up much of the time of the committee at this stage of the proceedings; I quite realize the importance of this position and the desirability of maintaining it, as outlined by the last speaker, but I wish to say that the importance of that position depends largely upon the personality of the individual appointed to it. I want to say that in my experience, at least, the former appointee was not fit to occupy the post. I had a case concerning a gross injustice done a Canadian citizen, whose ship was taken on the high seas and brought into a United States port. He was tried before the courts of the United States, which decided that the act of the United States officials was illegal and ordered the return of the vessel and cargo.

Mr. BENNETT: What ship was that?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): The ship was called Over The Top, and was owned by a man residing in my constituency in Sydney, Nova Scotia. That is the reason I feel so strongly about the matter. The ship was a three-masted vessel worth perhaps $20,000 or $30,000. She was ruined; she was kept in a United States harbour for nine months and then thrown back on the hands of the owner. This was in 1925-26, and from that day to this we have never been able to get our representative at Washington to press our claims upon the United States government.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house, but in my opinion a gross injustice was perpetrated on a Canadian citizen. I consider that the person we had at Washington lacked the qualifications of firmness, tact and diplomacy necessary to press this case. Nearly every month of every year this matter was brought to the attention of the department at Ottawa and also at Washington, and every year we got the same reply. In order to complete the record I will read one letter dated June 8, 1927:

Dear Sir:

I am directed by the minister to acknowledge your letter of June 7.

I wish to assure you that the case of Mr. MacKinnon is receiving every possible attention. It is still under consideration by the competent authorities. Some weeks ago we wrote to the Department of External Affairs at Ottawa. We hope to have soon an expression of the views of the Canadian government and then to communicate with you again according to the instructions sent to the minister.

Yours truly,
Laurent Beaudry,
First Secretary.

So things went on. This was in 1927, and in 1928 and 1929 the same state of affairs continued. In the latter year we got a reply from the secretary here to the effect that they had been formally notified by the American legation that no provision had been made for the payment of any such claim. In other words, we were told that the claim was not going to be considered. Under clause 4 of our treaty special provision is made for just such cases as this, and all that was necessary was a little firmness, a little strength on the part of the person who then represented us at Washington, to have the claim properly considered.

This vessel was seized on the high seas nineteen miles from shore. It is true she was laden with liquor, and, of course, we had to say that a vessel laden with liquor deserved no consideration. But when we say that we only add hypocrisy to cowardice. The sale of liquor is a perfectly legal transaction in eight of the nine provinces of Canada, and it was perfectly legal for this vessel to be carrying liquor on the high seas. This American cutter, however, seized the vessel nineteen miles from shore and simply laughed at us. And the man whom we had at Washington lacked the necessary intestinal fortitude to press our claim on that government.

I do not wish to make any cheap utterance with regard to that position. It is a very important position. But the person who filled it did not recognize its importance, nor did he recognize the importance of the principles involved in this incident. If a Canadian vessel can be seized on the high seas, taken to an American port, condemned by the United States court as illegal and ordered interned, and we have no redress, then I think the time has come for us to consider the qualifications of the person who then represented us at Washington.

I feel pretty strongly about this matter. I made two or three attempts in this house to bring it to the attention of the government, but for one reason or another I was frustrated. There is a principle involved: the high seas are free to the commerce of the king. Our vessels cannot be taken to a port in another country without redress. Our history shows many instances in which less provocation than this has led to very serious complications between nations. All I wish to say is that I regard the person whom we had as our representative at Washington as deserving of condemnation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) may have a personal grievance with respect to a vessel which was rum-running, and he may feel pretty keenly about it. But I do submit that it affords no justification for him to make a personal attack upon one who has held the office of minister of this country at Washington, and held that office with very great distinction to himself and to this Dominion, particularly when the ex-minister is not in this house where he can speak for himself. If my hon. friend wishes to have a discussion begun on the personal merits of representatives, he had better say so; I do not think it is the desire of anyone in this house at this moment to engage in any such discussion, and I do not intend to follow him in that direction.

May I point out to the hon. gentleman that a minister acts with the authority and power his government gives him. Within a few days it will be a year since the hon. member's own government came into office. Does he say that his own government is guilty of all these shortcomings which he ascribes to the previous minister at Washington?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Our own government has not a representative there yet. I have not the slightest doubt he will—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the doors of the legation have not been closed. The government is responsible if there is not a representative there. Can the hon. gentleman not see that he reflects on his own administration with respect to the way in which they have managed the affairs of Canada during the past year?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): This year I have not made representations to this government.

[Mr. F. MacDonald.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then my hon. friend cannot be much concerned except for reasons of party. It does not matter what my hon. friend has done or not done; the representations are in the Department of External Affairs, and it is the duty of a new minister to take up all matters in the department where his predecessor has left them. Whether the office was filled for a time by an acting minister does not change the situation in the least. And may I add that not only has there been an acting minister all the time, but there has been recently appointed a full-fledged minister who has been to Washington on two or three occasions since his appointment. I repeat, however, that a minister's powers are those of the government he represents; and if there has been delay throughout the past year the hon. gentleman can only place the responsibility in toto upon his own Prime Minister. I am quite prepared to take the responsibility for delays during the time I was in office, and I have no doubt the present Prime Minister will take the responsibility for any delay during the time he has been in charge of the government. But I believe we shall both agree that with respect to these rum-running vessels which have been captured on the high seas that there has been a good deal of difficulty in getting any settlement that would meet the wishes of those engaged in the rum-running business. That is one of the reasons why it has not been possible to get some of these matters settled which have been outstanding. There are very few of them, but they are a class of cases that have occasioned all governments very considerable embarrassment. These, I think, are the reasons why this matter has not so far been adjusted.

Let me repeat that, so far as Mr. Massey was concerned, the hon. gentleman's own leader, the present Prime Minister, speaking in this house, paid the former minister at Washington the compliment of saying that Mr. Massey had filled his position with distinction to himself and the country. And that opinion is one that is held universally. It has been expressed over and over again by distinguished visitors who have come to this country from Great Britain. Two prime ministers of Great Britain have spoken in Canada in the highest terms of Mr. Massey's representation of this country at Washington, especially when considered from the point of view of helpfulness to the British Empire. The Right Hon. Austen Chamberlain, the then Foreign Secretary, spoke in similar terms when he was in this country. I have read a communication from the President of the United States expressing the happy recollections which the government of the United States had of the manner in which Mr. Massey had performed his duties. I venture to say that there is not an individual in this country possessing any knowledge of the situation who would say other than that during the time Mr. Massey occupied the position of Minister at Washington this country was very fortunate indeed to have one so distinguished and so able to fill the office in the very excellent manner in which he did.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I cannot but agree with the Washington appointment because it has brought Ottawa and Washington into closer relationship. I am sure that the minister will do very well but I would remind the committee of what was said in my county during the last campaign. Conservative speakers said that it would be the policy of the Conservative party to abolish the legations at London, Washington and Tokyo and use the money thus expended for old age pensions. I am glad the Prime Minister has acted otherwise than as announced by his followers. The people who voted Conservative for this reason have been much surprised that the Prime Minister has not followed the course which was indicated.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman must not say that I at any time favoured a Canadian being a commercial attache at the British embassy. I did not say that here or elsewhere and it is not what was said by Sir Robert Borden. It was not what was in any sense intended, and I need hardly call the attention of my right hon. friend to the terms of the order in council as originally drafted and as finally passed. I do think, and I endeavoured to make it perfectly clear, that in so far as possible we should secure unity of policy in all those overseas and self governing dominions, including the motherland, which constitute the British Empire. Every step possible should be taken for that purpose, for it is itself the greatest league of nations of which the world knows. Unless we can maintain unity and solidarity as such it cannot be expected that the other nations of the world will be apt to maintain a united front with respect to peace and other matters of equal importance.

With reference to the representations in connection with ships which have been held and released, I think the incident to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) has just directed attention is the one which he brought to the attention of this house either at the last regular session or the session before. As I understood it, the attitude taken was that no compensation could be obtained. As the hon. member said, the matter has not been brought to the attention of the present government although I apprehend that it will be. The issue is whether or not a vessel which has been seized and ordered released by the courts of the United States, a vessel which has been injured during the time she was held, is entitled to be put back into the position in which she was at the time of the seizure. All hon. members know that vessels lying idle in port under circumstances similar to those mentioned deteriorate very rapidly. I understand that there has been no case in which any compensation has been paid with respect to any vessel.

Item agreed to.

Tokyo—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $80,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask my right hon. friend if he is not changing his mind a little with regard to this legation. At the time the legation at Tokyo was being established we had a short debate in the house. Speaking on January 30, 1928, probably on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, my right hon. friend is reported on page 29 of Hansard as having said:

> What this country wants in Japan and all other foreign countries are trade commissioners, under the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to carry forward Canada's trade. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) knows that trade commissioners are what are wanted, men who will carry forward Canada's trade, not our diplomatic skill and power, to the countries of the world.

And again:

> I desire to make it perfectly clear that we on this side of the house are opposed to setting up these legations as long as our present status continues. We do not desire that the implications that are attached to our position shall be misunderstood in the world at large. It is going to bring about disaster, as certain as anything can be. About that there can be no doubt. One need not engage in prophecy; one need not be a prophet who reads the diplomatic history of Japan and the United States during the last twenty-five years, to understand what it means to start diplomatic relations in Tokyo. It is only necessary to know what has taken place to understand the situation. You, Mr. Speaker, represented this country in dealing with problems of immigration and if we set up an embassy or legation in Tokyo you can realize the position. We embark on these different problems with respect to immigration and other important problems, but it is idle boasting to talk about our position in a foreign country because some representative over there can wear gold lace and a uniform. That does not advance the interests of the country a single sou.

That was the way my right hon. friend spoke at that time and yet this afternoon he tells us that the ability to wear gold lace and a uniform was really an advantage.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say anything about gold lace.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. gentleman mentioned the ability to obtain an audience.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not demand gold lace.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend said that when a representative of our country was asking for an audience he must be suitably dressed. I notice that when the present minister went to Washington with his letters of credence he turned up dressed in a Windsor uniform, which certainly has lots of gold lace and feathers and all that sort of thing. This was done in the most democratic country in the world by a representative from another of the most democratic of countries. My right hon. friend must have had some knowledge that a uniform would be of some value, and if it would be of value in Washington it would be of far greater value in Tokyo. I submit that our ministers with their paraphernalia of office have been able to accomplish very much. My hon. friend said that it would not advance the interests of the country a single sou, but surely he will not contend that our minister at Tokyo has not served the interests of this country very well, very faithfully and most helpfully. His presence in the orient has been of real advantage to the trade of this country, and has furthered our friendly relations with Japan. I remember that just a short time ago we had a visit from His Royal Highness, Prince Takamatsu, a brother of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan. My right hon. friend presided at a very important international gathering at which he made a very eloquent speech, and unless I may have forgotten the real purport and tenor of that speech it was to the effect that since we have enjoyed these diplomatic relations, since we had a distinguished minister from Japan in Canada and a minister from Canada in Japan we had understood each other better and the interests of the two countries had been advanced socially, commercially and politically. I think that was the substance of his remarks. I do hope that my right hon. friend will be quite frank and, without taking us all around the world again when he begins to make a reply, will just say that he is still of an open mind at least in regard to the legation at Tokyo, and hopes that it is going to advance the interests of the country as we who established the legation anticipated it would when the legation was opened.

There is just one other quotation of my right hon. friend which I desire to give. I feel it is necessary to give it in view of what he and those who accompanied him to Great Britain have been saying in respect to the great success of the conference that took place there so far as the constitutional side of the conference is concerned. They have been very silent as to all other sides. They have not said much about the success of the conference in promoting trade or as regards the fiscal policies, but they did crow quite a lot over what they would have us believe they had succeeded in doing in connection with the constitutional phase. The other day my right hon friend introduced a very important resolution approving of what is known as the Statute of Westminster. The purport of that statute, as we understood it, was to make it conclusive, once and for all, that Canada had at last freed herself of the last badge of colonial inferiority and that we were now a fully fledged nation with a status of equality comparable with that of Great Britain herself. Now that was true or it was not true. Here is what my right hon. friend said in speaking on June 11, 1928, as reported at page 4164 of Hansard:

> The appointment of a minister by Canada—

That is in relation to Tokyo:

> —implies by international law that the Dominion is a sovereign state. We are not, and that implication will create misunderstandings at home and abroad. . . . There can be no such thing in international law as equality of status between Canada and Great Britain until such time as this country has the powers of a sovereign state and absolute independence both within and without our country. Then, and then only, may we have equality of status. I have said, and I repeat, that as far as I am concerned I propose to die protesting against that independent condition being achieved.

May I say that my right hon. friend's friends who accompanied him to Great Britain, particularly the Solicitor General, almost died protesting that they had achieved in complete measure this equality of status which the Liberals had theretofore claimed the credit for, but which he said as a matter of fact had waited their arrival that the final seal of authority might be put upon the whole. My right hon. friend cannot have it both ways. He must do one of two things either admit that we have not equality of status, that this referring to Canada as a nation is all a mistake and that we are still a colony and not a dominion of equal status with the mother country and other self-governing parts of the British Empire, or he must come out and frankly say that we are a nation so far as status is concerned equal therein to that of any other self-governing portion of the British Empire. Let him tell us which of the two he stands for; that is all, and it is very important to know the truth, particularly if he is going to claim the credit that he does for what has been effected by the Statute of Westminster. We would like to know just what it all amounts to. Perhaps my right hon. friend will enlighten us in regard to his position in that respect.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not boasted about any achievements of mine with respect to the Statute of Wesminster, either publicly or privately. What I said at the Imperial conference I repeated in this house. I will say this, now that the right hon. gentleman has raised the question, that we did bring about an interprovincial conference which in a day agreed upon a formula that made possible the acceptance of that proposed statute by the parliament at Westminster. Had the statute as originally framed become law, it would have brought about an intolerable condition in this country by reason of the two largest provinces taking the position which they did. I have it on the word of one of my right hon. friend's most ardent supporters that that interprovincial conference was one example of a successful conference which had been provided for, and which met and discharged its duties and went away on the second day after it met. I endeavour at least to avoid the sin of boasting, and I do not think any man within sound of my voice in this house will say that I have boasted with respect to this matter, but I have some little pride in the fact that representatives of every province in this Dominion met together and that we agreed upon a formula that protected alike the interests of the smallest and the largest province in the confederation. The Statute of Westminister would certainly not have been possible had some such action as that not been taken, and the provision made prior to that was wholly inadequate for the purpose for which it was intended. That was admitted at the Imperial conference itself without question by all those who were present whether they were from one part of the king's dominions or the other.

The Statute of Westminster does confer upon this country, with limitations, equality of status legislatively with other parts of the king's dominions, but it does not confer upon this country complete equality of status. It only confers upon this country that equality of status which it was asserted was being sought. There is no such thing, for instance, as the same power residing in the parliament of Canada that resides in the parliament at Westminster. That is still true, and as a matter of historical accuracy and of legal terminology, there can be no equality of status so long as one country has a different position from another with respect to that country. That is the position which I constantly brought to the attention of this house, and I still continue to do so. That is, the very use of the words equality of status, if applied in their strict legal sense, involves the idea of independent communities, and I say that this country does not desire that. The equality of status that has been accomplished by the legislation to which reference has been made is all the equality that has been desired, and all that should be desired. Standing in the place which the right hon. gentleman now occupies I did not vote against the resolution that made possible the legislation to which reference has been made. When I went to the Imperial conference I told them frankly that this resolution had passed the house unanimously, and that a change of prime ministers had not changed the unanimity that the House of Commons had expressed with respect to the resolution, and therefore it was my duty, having just been elected, in the light of that unanimity of action in the House of Commons, to carry into effect the proposals that had theretofore been made, and I proceeded to do so. But I was confronted with the difficulties to which reference has been made; that is, objections from the largest provinces of Canada as to the sufficiency of the safeguards of their constitutional rights and privileges. It was agreed that they were not ample as they stood, and we held the interprovincial conference as I have just said, and as a result unanimity was secured, and every province initialled the agreement at which we arrived as to what the legislation should be. That at least had something to do with the Statute of Westminster. I have not heard of anyone crowing or boasting nor have I read of it, but the fact that the legislation passed this house as it did and that the two largest provinces and the others were satisfied is at least an achievement to which some merit attaches. That is all that I can say with respect to that.

As to the legation at Tokyo, I find an entire fulfilment of the exact conditions that I said would prevail if the legation were to serve the useful purposes which it was said it would. The minister who was appointed to that position entered upon his duties with enthusiasm, and he has discharged them with zeal. There is no doubt at all with respect to that, but he has made it abundantly clear that the major part of his duties have been of a commercial character. I cannot but think that upon reflection, when the right hon. gentleman looks in Hansard and reviews his references to gold lace, he will think they are somewhat unworthy of him. I have said that the mere wearing of gold lace was not what constituted merit or value in the discharge of duties as a minister, and it is perfectly true that members of His Majesty's Privy Council are entitled to wear a second class uniform. It is expected that when they visit representatives or heads of other states they will do so in the uniform of the rank or position they occupy. That is a part of diplomatic usage which has grown up through the centuries. It is true that the United States is a democratic country and no uniform is worn by their representatives abroad; they appear simply in evening dress. Just what that had to do with the value of services rendered, I do not know; but I did say in 1928, speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, that this was not the measure of value. I believe every word I said as to what the minister to Japan would do has been borne out by the fruits of his efforts in that city. Since he has come home on leave his whole subject of discussion has been the extension of trade. He has desired to address, and I believe will address, Canadian audiences in different parts of Canada on matters of trade, selling our goods abroad, and the establishment of trade commissioners. As a result, in part at least, of representations which were made by him, my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has now completed a design he had in his mind shortly after we took office, of opening up, as he will describe later, two more offices in the far east. The minister to Japan feels that is a matter of tremendous concern. I am free to say that practically the whole of the many conversations I have had with him as to trade conditions in the far east, all of which have been most illuminating, have touched upon the question of the expansion of trade. I repeat that the value of a Canadian minister in the orient consists in his ability to obtain ready audience of those who are directing the affairs of government in those countries, by reason of the international legal position which attaches to the name "minister." That is, the minister may do things which a trade commissioner or consul could not do. He has the right when he goes to the seat of government to have audience without delay with the heads of government and with the various ministers, whereas trade commissioners would not be entitled to—and as a matter of fact might not for days or weeks—see the heads of departments. That is the position I took previously, and one which is abundantly borne out by the results which have followed.

The present occasion affords me an opportunity to say that the appointee to that office, the minister to Japan, entering upon his duties with enthusiasm, after having addressed a considerable number of public meetings in various parts of Canada, has zealously and with great toil continued to discharge the duties of his office. He has made sacrifices, not only financially but of his own personal comfort. His hospitality so generously extended in the far east, the excellent reputation Canada has gained through the sympathetic consideration which has been given by Mr. and Mrs. Marler to every matter engaging the attention of the people in the city in which they reside, has done much to raise the name of Canada among the people with whom they have lived. Their action has enhanced our reputation, and by reason of his ability to carry on in the manner I have indicated he has done much to promote, and will continue to extend the trade of Canada. That and that only would be the measure of the duties he has discharged, but would not by any means represent the measure of responsibility which attaches to his office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say to my right hon. friend how much I appreciate his words of appreciation concerning the Honourable Mr. Marler, more especially as Mr. Marler was a former colleague in my administration and was appointed to the office of minister to Japan under the former Liberal government. I am sure my right hon. friend's words of appreciation will be received with real satisfaction in all parts of Canada.

My right hon. friend made reference to the wearing of uniforms by privy councillors. I have no doubt he is aware that a minister of a legation as a minister in the diplomatic service is entitled to wear a uniform.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That causes me to ask my right hon. friend whether he feels that because an appointment is made to the diplomatic service the appointee should also necessarily be made a member of the Privy Council of Canada. To be a member of that honourable body is to have attained one of the highest honours which can come to any man in public life, the highest, I believe, with the possible exception of that of being a member of the Imperial Privy Council of Great Britain. Both honours have usually been restricted to those who have played an important part in public affairs, to those who have distinguished themselves in parliament and who are known as national or world figures. I do not think that ever before that honour has been given to any one who has played no part whatever in public life, no matter how great his talents or abilities may be. It is very much in the interest of government that we should seek to maintain the honour of membership in the Privy Council of Canada as one most exceptional in its nature, and one which should be awarded only after important or long service to the state. I recall having spoken at one time with the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin when Mr. Baldwin was Prime Minister of Great Britain with respect to a possibility of certain appointments being made to the Imperial Privy Council. I was very much impressed at the time by the way in which Mr. Baldwin spoke of membership of the Privy Council. He expressed the view that the honour of Imperial Privy Councillor was the highest, and quite the most exceptional of all that could come to any man in public life, and he felt it was in the interests of government that the attainment of such an honour should be surrounded by as much in the way of exclusiveness as that high office would appear to warrant. As a political entity, we are of course, not as important a country as Great Britain, nor have our public men played the great roles which many of the public men of the old world have played. I do hope, notwithstanding, that my right hon. friend will not take the view that appointments to the privy council are to be lightly or quickly made, but that it shall remain, of all bodies we have in Canada, the one to which only those who have won their way into a ministry, because of the part they have played in the public affairs of the country, or who have otherwise greatly distinguished themselves, should be appointed. Unless that is done I am afraid we shall lose something of the great value which attaches to that time honoured institution.

Mr. POULIOT: When the leaders of both parties join to pay tribute to a deceased citizen I admire their eulogy, but when they pay such compliments to a man still among us I am a little suspicious. Mr. Marler is full of dignity; he is a very dignified diplomat; he is one of the most dignified diplomats in the world; he impresses everyone by his dignity. I do not see how he can increase our business in China and in the other countries of the far east, or solve the Indian problem, or keep the bolshevists under control. But he is always dignified: his smile is dignified; his gesture is dignified; his voice is sweet—and dignified; his words are impressive—and dignified. But, Mr. Chairman, in joining my tribute to that which has been paid him by the leaders of both parties, may I express the fear that if the monarchical system is reestablished in China the Chinese may steal the hon. gentleman from us to be their next emperor!

Mr. MALONEY: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this item I must confess that in my county during the last election I condemned the expenditure for a diplomatic representative at Tokyo as well as at Washington. My views have not changed since. These gentlemen have cost us many hundreds of thousands of dollars. I cannot see where we have derived any benefit at all commensurate with the expenditure. Rather it would appear to me that we should pay fifteen or twenty trade agents $10,000 a year each to promote trade between this country and Japan, China and the United States. If by this means our trade with those countries was substantially increased, surely those trade agents would be of more value to Canada than the gentlemen who we have at Washington and Tokyo.

Mr. BENNETT: I might make one observation with respect to the question of privy councillors. I think any Canadian who serves abroad must necessarily have practically the same position as had his predecessor; and one who has been a member without portfolio in a government, without ever having been in the House of Commons, and is sworn of the privy council, has no more claims to the title than his successor who, it is true, never was in the House of Commons. Mr. Marler was in the House of Commons for some years, but he was sworn of the privy council because he was made a member of an administration without portfolio and was not elected. Mr. Massey was in the same position exactly; he was sworn of the privy council when he was appointed to membership in the government and failed to secure election. I can only say to the right hon. gentleman that so far as the privy council is concerned, any gentlemen that are recommended by this administration to His Majesty's representative will in every case be as worthy Canadians as those who found office under him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite sure that what my right hon. friend has just said is wholly true. I hope he will not misunderstand the nature of my remark, or take it as an unwarranted criticism. The point I am particularly interested in making clear is this: there is a distinction between the diplomatic service and the service of the state in parliament and in administrations. I believe it would be unfortunate were it to be assumed, in the event of there being further legations established elsewhere, that just because someone was appointed a minister, he would necessarily be made a member of the privy council. I cannot think of any honour higher in the diplomatic world than that of being a minister plenipotentiary or an ambassador. It is an honour on a par with that of being a privy councillor in another field of public service. My point is that the two fields should be kept separate and distinct, and the fact that one is appointed to the diplomatic service should not necessarily mean his appointment as well to the privy council.

Mr. MARCIL: I do not want to refer to the constitutional issue in any way, Mr. Chairman, but after listening to the description given by the member for Labelle of our relations with the United States twenty-five or thirty years ago, and even before in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, I feel impelled to mention an incident which occurred when I had the honour, in 1906 and 1907, of accompanying a distinguished body of Canadians to Washington. We were received by Theodore Roosevelt, the then president, and in his conversation he impressed very strongly upon us the absolute necessity of having Canada represented at Washington to do away with the circumlocution of communications between Canada and the United States by way of the British foreign office. That was twenty-five years ago, and in view of the position Canada has taken now, I have mentioned this incident to show that other countries like to be communicated with directly by representatives of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: I may say that the high commissioner in London appointed by my right hon. friend opposite was never in parliament, but was sworn of the privy council upon being made high commissioner. Upon succeeding to that office the same honour was accorded to one who for many years had been premier of one of our largest provinces and had served his country with great satisfaction in that province. I think if it is to be put on the ground the right hon. gentleman mentioned, one case could be justified and the other not. But inasmuch as the former high commissioner had been so honoured, I took the responsibility—which I think was a sound exercise of my discretion—to recommend to the sovereign's representative that his successor should be similarly honoured.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend took the correct course when he appointed the Hon. George Howard Ferguson a member of the privy council, for two reasons: the Hon. Mr. Ferguson had been a long time in public office, and was a well-known public figure and quite worthy of being appointed to the privy council; secondly, he was going to England as high commissioner for Canada, and all the previous high commissioners had been members of His Majesty's privy council of Canada. The position of high commissioner is somewhat different from that of ministers to foreign legations. I believe the distinction there would justify the appointment of both Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Larkin to that particular position.

Item agreed to.

Geneva—salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian advisory officer, $27,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an increase of $2,000 to make some allowance for rent and salaries.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of Canadian delegates to the assembly and commissions of the League of Nations, $18,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my right hon. friend in a position to indicate who are likely to be appointed as delegates to the assembly of the league this year?

Mr. BENNETT: The matter has not yet been settled, except as to one appointment. I think it would not be sound to indicate who that would be until the matter has been settled with respect to the others.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Representations were made to myself at different times, and I think they have since been made to my right hon. friend, that it does materially assist the delegates at the League of Nations if their appointment is made some time ahead of the actual meeting of the assembly. I hope my right hon. friend will be able to annonce before very long who the appointees are likely to be.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope to be able to do so next week.

Item agreed to.

Publications of League of Nations for distribution to members of parliament and a grant to the League of Nations Society in Canada, $3,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In connection with our committee on industrial and international relations it was pointed out that it would be very desirable to have a larger grant for the League of Nations Society in Canada than is made at present, since this is one way in which the peace ideal may be more effectively spread throughout the country. As I understand it, in these depressed times the League of Nations Society is finding some difficulty in financing its operations. Particularly in view of the disarmament conference, and the preparatory work which should be done in all countries before that conference may be effective, it would be highly desirable that this society be given full support. I wish it were possible that an extension of this grant could be made.

Item agreed to.

Civil Service Commission—contingencies, further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the Secretary of State should take this item, but since it goes through the Department of Finance I will pass it with the consent of the committee.

Item agreed to.

Finance—salaries—to provide for the payment of an honorarium to executive officers of the Department of Finance for extra services rendered since the commencement of the illness of the late J. C. Saunders in January, 1930, in connection with the executive administration of the department, the treasury board and conversion loan operations, and to authorize the treasury board to make an allocation of the grant, notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, $7,500.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an item at which I wish the committee would be good enough to look. It provides for some compensation to five men who did all the work of the deputy minister and of the secretary of the treasury board, and a good deal of the work of the minister, saving the country something over $37,500 during the last year. I think their services, which in many instances extended far into the night, should be compensated for, and that is the purpose of this item.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Is this the last item in the Department of Finance?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I told my hon. friend I would give him an opportunity to speak, and I will do so.

Item agreed to.

To provide for a Canadian contribution in commemoration of the 1000th anniversay of the parliament of Iceland, $2,500.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be remembered that we promised to do something in connection with the 1000th anniversary of the parliament of Iceland. The former Prime Minister and myself agreed that some contribution should be made for the purpose and this sum will be expended as may be deemed desirable.

Item agreed to.

To provide a retiring gratuity for Lucien Pacaud, late secretary, office of the High Commissioner, London, $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Pacaud for a time discharged the duties of high commissioner and when he resigned I took the responsibility of submitting a gratuity of $5,000.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the administration of the Royal Canadian Mint, including salaries, contingencies, retiring and other allowances, and general expenses, $125,000.

Mr. EULER: What changes have taken place in the administration of the mint?

Mr. BENNETT: None. The act comes into force by proclamation and that will not be done until such time as satisfactory arrangements have been made with the British authorities in connection with the staff.

Item agreed to.

To authorize a compassionate grant to the estate of the late Miss F. V. Bridgman, $2,028.65.

Mr. BENNETT: This unfortunate lady died before the documents she had executed with respect to sums she had contributed to the superannuation fund could be forwarded,—that is, between the date of execution and getting them to the department.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of litigated matters—Department of Justice—further amount required to pay legal fees and expenses of N. W. Rowell, K.C., in the Trail Smelter investigation before the International Joint Commission, $7,020.36.

Mr. POULIOT: Is Mr. Rowell still on the list of lawyers engaged by the government?

Mr. BENNETT: These were cases in which Mr. Rowell had been engaged as counsel and he continued his services. I do not know whether at the moment he is employed in any litigation, but I should rather think he had practically concluded his very eminent services to the state in that regard.

Mr. POULIOT: He was well cared for.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, very.

Item agreed to.

Unforeseen expenses — further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. BENNETT: We have had larger unforeseen expenses in connection with many matters.

Item agreed to.

To provide for hospitality in connection with foreign visitors, $35,000.

Mr. BENNETT: We must discharge our duties as host to the best of our ability, once we have undertaken them.

Item agreed to.

To provide for grants to veterans of the Northwest Mounted Police, who served in the northwest rebellion of 1885, in lieu of scrip, at $300 each, as authorized by the governor in council, $18,000.

Mr. BENNETT: There are fifty-eight survivors of the old mounted police who did not receive, after the rebellion, consideration in connection with scrip which was awarded, as the committee will recall, to all those who went west of Fort William in the quelling of the rebellion.

Mr. NEILL: Before this item carries may I ask when we can expect vote No. 463 with regard to payments to the railways in connection with coal?

Mr. BENNETT: There is some question whether the words in the vote are sufficient to warrant the auditor general making the payments for the movement of coal. I wish to have that stand until the matter can be disposed of.

Mr. NEILL: When will it come up?

Mr. BENNETT:: I was hoping to-morrow or this evening; to-morrow at any rate.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the payment of claims for compensation for loss sustained by the civil population and prisoners of war of Canada during the late war, interest thereon and cost of administration, $3,200,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This comes partly within the Department of Finance and partly within the Secretary of State's department. The Department of Finance is responsible for providing the money. This item is necessary because of the decisions of the commissioners in connection with the payment of these claims. Ultimately the money will not be raised by taxation but will be provided out of the funds that come into our hands through enemy property.

Mr. EULER: Is the amount of claims to be paid to be limited by the amount of the reparations received? I presume so.

Mr. BENNETT: I should hardly put it so strongly. We have now taken care of practically all and we hope that with respect to the others there will be no question about there being sufficient money.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the claims of prisoners of war be paid before the next report of the commissioner is submitted to parliament? I ask merely for information; I am in favour of its being done.

Mr. BENNETT: My personal view is that if the money is available under this vote we should pay them. I am afraid the vote will not go far beyond taking care of those things already decided; it leaves a small balance. On the other hand, the cases now awaiting adjudication do not involve large sums, and if it is possible I certainly share the hon. gentleman's view.

Mr. NEILL: I inquired into the circumstances of some of these men whose cases were investigated as far back as last October. They had to travel a considerable distance at very great expense to be examined. In making inquiry as to when these payments were to be made I was advised by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) that it was not proposed to consider the matter until all the soldiers' claims had been put in, which he expected would be somewhere about next December. Is there any reason why the cases which have been decided should not be paid as we go along?

Mr. BENNETT: Except that the minister has been anxious to dispose of all cases of a class as far as possible. I think all claims which have been adjudicated upon and which have been laid on the table of the house have been paid. The main estimates provided for all which had been laid upon the table and this item provides for those which were laid upon the table the other day. A small balance will be available for other claims. The hon. gentleman will have to direct his question to the Secretary of States because I have no information as to why action has been taken in the way in which it has.

Mr. NEILL: If I am not mistaken, the report which was laid upon the table referred to civilians' claims exclusively and not to soldiers' claims.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that some referred to soldiers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think the report referred to soldiers.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions $1,052,220.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are any of these subsidies given in lines in competition with our merchant marine?

Mr. STEVENS: I think not. In fact, we give the merchant marine a subsidy for the service to South America.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—additional amount required to provide for ocean service subsidies; to meet obligations under existing contracts; to provide subsidies to assist the shipment of live stock to the United Kingdom and the continent of Europe; and to provide for a subsidized service between St. John and Weymouth, $2,016,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does this item supplement the amounts provided for specific service?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Construction of a grain elevator at Lethbridge—further amount required, $400,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Will this item complete the elevator?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it the intention of the government to build a seed cleaning plant?

Mr. STEVENS: That matter is under consideration.

Mr. GARDINER: A definite decision has not been arrived at?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Item agreed to.

22110—276½

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day. I am asking for second reading of these resolutions in order that time may be saved when concurrence is being sought.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE

The house proceeded to consider certain resolutions reported from committee of supply.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) will be given an opportunity to carry on his discussion when the house is again in committee.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I believe that two or three hon. members dealt with this matter the other night.

Mr. BROWN: Will that be gone on with after adjournment?

Mr. BENNETT: No. It is the intention to continue wtih the Beauharnois report provided the minister is feeling able to make an address.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house met at eight o'clock.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. W. A. GORDON (South Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, if I have the consent of the house to revert to motions, I wish to introduce a motion with respect to the fourth report, which has been tabled, of the special committee appointed to investigate the Beauharnois power project.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent the house will revert to motions.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

Mr. GORDON: It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to dwell at length on the report of the special committee on the Beauharnois power project. The committee was set up by this house on the 10th of June last, and the reference contemplated that the project known as the Beauharnois power project would be investigated from its inception by that committee, and that in addition to the investigation of the project the charges which were made by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) in May last should also be inquired into.

As hon. members know, the committee held its sessions from day to day, and invited and compelled the attendance of all witnesses who they thought might be able to contribute useful testimony in connection with the inquiry.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make this observation. Being chairman of this committee in the first regular session of the parliament of Canada in which I had the honour of being a member of this house, gave me no sense of gratification. The subject matters under review were very, very serious, so serious indeed that I accepted the duty of presiding over that committee only with a great deal of reluctance. Let me say at this juncture that I cannot do otherwise than commend the members of the committee for the attitude that they assumed throughout its deliberations. It was apparent that the investigation of necessity had to do with political matters, and it seems that when one's party is challenged or its actions are under fire it is difficult indeed to divorce oneself from the suggestion of partisanship, but the members of the committe, and particularly those belonging to the party opposite, adopted with a degree of resignation an attitude throughout which was commendable. I am beginning to find out that it is difficult when one is interested in politics to accept a position of this kind with any degree of resignation. However, the members of the committee did so conduct their duties that they made the work a great deal lighter than it might otherwise have been.

At the conclusion of our efforts I undertook the drafting of the committee's report. It was of necessity long and to some extent involved. On the last day of the committee's sittings I presented the report to the members of the committee, paragraph by paragraph and page by page, and the members of the committee studied it paragraph by paragraph and page by page. The committee went into the various statements of facts and the various inferences that were drawn—and let me say that inferences were not drawn from the facts unless those inferences were irresistible. I think the committee was careful to see that no one was involved unjustly or unfairly, and I experienced a degree of satisfaction when at the end of the review of the draft report the members of the committee, representing all political parties in this house, were able to subscribe to its terms.

By reason of the unanimity which ultimately prevailed with respect to the report, and by reason of the length and the exhaustive nature of the inquiry as disclosed in the report, I do not feel that in introducing the motion that the house concur in the report I should dwell at any great length on the matters disclosed therein. The report speaks for iteslf. We had to deal with the disposition of probably the greatest single natural, national resource that Canada has. When I say that I do not mean that the Soulanges section of the St. Lawrence river is iteslf the greatest, but it may be, and probably is the pivotal part of the St. Lawrence river which ultimately we hope will become a great deep sea waterway from the head of the lakes to the Atlantic ocean. That being so, I think all the members of the committee felt that we should detach ourselves from petty party consideration in the hope that our deliberations might contribute something to the nation in whatever steps the house might see fit to take with respect to this matter. I do not think I need dwell upon its importance. We hear from time to time of the great natural resources of Canada. Sometimes people speak of our great hinterland and our great resources, and they use those euphonious terms which probably do not mean anything so far as the knowledge of the person speaking is concerned. Our resources, in large measure, can be identified by those who have taken the time to inquire into them, and to try to limit or delimit them, as the case may be. I think we may all agree that the St. Lawrence river and its development is a question bigger than party; it is probably bigger than any contest which may arise between the Dominion and the provinces; it is something that is inseparably connected with the future of this great Dominion. Let me say then, at the outset—and I think I am speaking the mind and reflecting the views of the committee—that there will be no conflict between the Dominion of Canada, the federal government, and the province of Quebec. The rights of that province will be religiously preserved. Undoubtedly they have rights—some of them may not be clearly defined—but I think I am reflecting the mind of the government and of the committee when I say that whatever steps may be taken in the future—and I trust and hope that by agreement, if possible steps may be taken—will be with a view to conserving this national resource for the best interests of the people of Canada.

The Soulanges section of the St. Lawrence river, and the particular part of it with which your committee dealt—that portion lying between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis, a distance of fourteen or fifteen miles—constitutes probably, if engineers are to be relied upon—and I have no reason to suggest that they are not to be relied upon—the one portion of the St. Lawrence river most easily capable of being converted to the use of mankind, with respect both to power and to navigation. The total area of the river at this point lies within the limits of the province of Quebec. It is adjacent to the city and port of Montreal, and will undoubtedly constitute part of a deep sea waterway. The development of this project, I believe, can be carried on, having regard both to the navigability of the river and to the utilization of the power incidental thereto. I have no reason to suggest that the plan at present under way is not the soundest method of developing that section of the river, although engineers differ on that point. I am not sufficiently well acquainted with engineering problems, however, to take a stand on one side or the other. Having had with the other members of the committee an opportunity to visit the scene of the works and to visualize what is being done and what will be accomplished when the project is completed, I could not help but be impressed by the magnitude of the work and of its ultimate benefit, not only to the part of the country in and around that portion of the province of Quebec, but to the whole of the Dominion of Canada.

In dealing with this matter your committee felt they should direct their attention to various phases. With that in mind they went into the history of this power development as well as into questions affecting title. Probably the historical facts are important only from a historical point of view; at any rate there came a time about twenty years ago when those who had acquired what rights were originally in the former owners who held possession over one hundred years ago, found that the rights they held were manifestly important, although in themselves, at the inception, they were insignificant. In 1902 the Robert family caused to be incorporated, under the provisions of the Quebec Companies Act, a company known as the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company. They had utilized some power through a feeder that ran from lake St. Francis in a southeasterly direction to the St. Louis river for the purpose of adding some volume to that stream, and providing power for the water wheels they had established upon it.

As we all know, about this time the development of hydro-electric power became interesting from many angles. The whole of this continent was interested in hydro developments, and it must have been obvious—as it was to those who knew of this situation—that nature had thrown in the lap of Canada one of the greatest resources that this or any other country ever possessed. The time had come when industry advanced to the stage that absorption of the powers to be developed from the Soulanges section could reasonably be anticipated. The time was then, and then only, ripe for the development of this enterprise.

Certain advances were made by the Robert people through the government of the province of Quebec with respect to the identification of their rights. After some litigation in the Exchequer Court of Canada about the year 1909 their rights were in a measure determined. Nothing further of consequence was done, although from time to time in other reaches of the river adjacent thereto rights were acquired by certain companies to carry on comparatively insignificant industrial operations. It was not until the year 1923 that any pointed interest—and I use that word advisedly—was taken in connection with this development. True, back in 1912 Mr. Sweezey, at the suggestion of Sir Max Aitken, now Lord Beaverbrook, made some investigations with respect to this power project which, however, seemed to come to nothing, and the project apparently was not seriously taken in hand until about 1923.

At that time a rather important event took place which I shall not dwell upon. I shall give merely a narrative history of the facts, because hon. members of the house are as capable as I am—probably more so—of drawing conclusions from the facts. Mr. Henry, who was in 1923 an employee of the Canadian National Railways, a man of quite superior engineering ability and, I think, equipped with a profound knowledge of the St. Lawrence river and all its possibilities, enlisted with him Mr. W. L. McDougald, the idea being to have Mr. Henry make an investigation into the possibilities of developing power by a canal extending from lake St. Francis to lake St. Louis. Mr. Henry at that time was busy with his work in connection with the Canadian National Railways and is said to have employed another engineer for the purpose of making a survey between the two lakes. There followed as a result the incorporation in Ottawa by the firm of McGiverin, Haydon & Ebbs of a company known as the Sterling Industrial Corporation. That was accomplished on the fifth day of July, 1924.

Concurrently with its incorporation in fact on the same day, application was made to the Department of Public Works, and two days later, on the 7th of July, a similar application was made to the Department of Railways and Canals, asking on behalf of this company that approval be granted under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act to the plans then submitted, which contemplated the diversion of 30,000 cubic feet per second from lake St. Francis down through a proposed canal to reenter the St. Lawrence river at lake St. Louis. Very shortly after the filing of this application advice was given to the promoters, or to their solicitors, that the application could not be entertained; and in that advice certain things were suggested that they might or might not do, whichever course they chose to adopt. At any rate, nothing was done. That application was allowed to lie there and was not renewed until some years later.

In 1927 Mr. Sweezey became interested in this project. Mr. Sweezey is unquestionably an engineer of repute. He, in my view, and I think it is the view of the other members of the committee, is a very capable engineer. But I must confess that he adopted a rather strange attitude on his first move towards acquiring the rights that he hoped to acquire on the St. Lawrence river. I have reference to the letter—with which hon. members are well acquainted, I think—to Alderic Raymond, in which he set out his conception of the method and the manner and the means that should be adopted and employed in order to accomplish the acquisition of the rights in this part of the river. No one could read that communication without at once being struck by Mr. Sweezey's conception of what might or might not be done if "political influence," as he calls it, could be assembled to his assistance. Now, right from the beginning—and in making this statement I am sure that the members of the committee will not quarrel with it—Mr. Sweezey and those who were associated with him seemed not only to be inspired, but to feel that they could make no headway unless they had political influence, and they proceeded upon that assumption, so that even those who had no political influence at all, even those who were not in the counsels of any party, probably participated in the disbursement of moneys at the hands of the promoters. It is not a pleasant thing to contemplate, but that seems to have been the case. From 1927 onwards we find $437,000 paid in legal fees. Of course, they were not legal fees in the sense of payments for professional services rendered, and that became manifest as the investigation proceeded.

Application was made to the federal government at Ottawa for the approval of certain plans on behalf of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company after the option to acquire the stock of that company had been secured by Mr. Sweezey. That application met with considerable opposition. Other power interests on the river, jealous, I presume, of the rights sought to be acquired by the Sweezey organization, set up an opposition that at one time, according to the evidence, almost spelled disaster for his application. But there came a time when this opposition seemed to lose their interest in opposing, and almost overnight they reappeared in another form, namely, in support of the application which they had theretofore so vigorously opposed.

Out of it all came the passing of the order in council we have heard so much about, P.C. 422. The order in council, shortly stated, gave the right, or assumed to give the right, to divert 40,000 cubic feet per second from lake St. Francis into a canal down to lake St. Louis. Prior to this Mr. Henry had taken on a new duty; he still remained associated with the Canadian National Railways, but he was appointed deputy Minister of the Department of Railways and Canals, and during the time he occupied that office three orders in council were passed whereby the water in the river which the Montreal Cotton Company had the right to use was acquired by the Sweezey interests. There may be a difference of opinion as to the efficacy of the order in council, whether it in fact gives the right that those who were sponsoring the application hoped it did give. Your committee felt that it was not within the purview of the task assigned to it and that it would serve no useful purpose for it to try to define the law with respect to that order in council.

But it is plain that the order in council, by its terms, contemplated that nothing should be done in this stretch of the river until the final detailed plans had been approved by the minister. Those final detailed plans were not approved, and I believe I am stating it fairly when I say they have not been approved to this day. But the work went on. It is only fair at this juncture to point out that evidence was given, and with a good deal of force, that detailed plans, that is, working plans, could not very well be prepared and approved that would not have to be changed as the work progressed. I say that in fairness to those who were sponsoring the application. But the fact remains that the plans contemplated by the order in council were not approved and have not been approved up to the present time.

Another point I might touch on in passing is this: that the land through which this canal will run from lake St. Francis to lake St. Louis is all owned by the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company Limited. As the case stands at present there will be no fight as between provinces or as between the Dominion and any province or anyone else with respect to the bed or banks of the new canal because they are owned in fee simple by the company.

That raises another point, if one cares to pursue it further, with respect to the three bridges crossing the channel. The Navigable Waters Protection Act itself does not in any of its sections, so far as I am able to read and interpret them, give to the governor in council power to authorize the diversion of water from a navigable stream. It is quite true that the evidence disclosed that in the past, rightly or wrongly, approval has been given to such diversions, but that raises just the point whether or not, under that act, the governor in council had the right to do what they did. At any rate, granted they had the right and that ultimately the waters are turned into the canal and the total useful flow of the St. Lawrence river is made use of—and that is what was in contemplation by the promoters, and what is still in contemplation according to the evidence—then we will have the rather curious situation of a new river built from lake St. Francis to lake St. Louis, the bed and banks of which are owned by a private corporation and across which are three bridges. The Navigable Waters Protection Act, if I remember section 11, distinctly states that no approval shall be given under the act to the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence river.

The authority of parliament comes from the British North America Act; section 91, with which I am sure hon. members of the house are well acquainted, deals with navigation and shipping. The power there given for the control of navigation and shipping is given to the parliament of Canada, and the words are just as I have used them. Of course, the widest interpretation can be given those two words. The Navigable Waters Protection Act was passed by this house under the authority conferred upon this parliament by the British North America Act with respect to navigation and shipping, and under the terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act certain authority is delegated to the governor in council. In my view at least that does not include the power to authorize the diversion of water from a navigable stream. However, I may be wrong in that; others may take a different view, but that was one of the matters your committee had under review and upon which they felt they could not make any useful pronouncement.

The next step in connection with the matter with which your committee had to deal was the structure of the various syndicates and companies. I am not going to labour that phase of the question, because the history is set out in the report which was read in the house a day or two ago. I think it is only necessary to say that one syndicate was formed with 5,000 authorized part interests or units; that a little later another syndicate was formed with 30,000 part interests or units; that the second syndicate took over the first, giving two shares for one, and that the assets which were originally those of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, namely, the shares of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, which were acquired by the first syindicate and subsequently by the second syndicate, were in turn transferred to a new corporation known as the Beauharnois Power Company, Limited, a company incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act.

Following out what appeared to be the course Mr. Sweezey set himself, in order to procure the rights that he wanted he got the financial support, and I think I am not unfair in saying the political support, of different gentlemen. He obtained the financial support of Frank P. Jones and the political and financial support of Senator Raymond and Hon. Walter Mitchell. Later on those gentleman were joined by Senator McDougald, whose advent into this project appeared to come about in this way: If hon. members will remember, a moment or two ago I said that he and Mr. Henry incorporated the Sterling Industrial Corporation and filed plans on July 5, 1924. Those plans remained in the department. When Mr. Sweezey started in to acquire these rights to develop the power on the St. Lawrence, Mr. Henry—and I think I am not unfair in stating it in this way—apparently was watching the developments and he, acting on behalf of himself and Senator McDougald, interviewed Mr. Sweezey, or Mr. Sweezey interviewed Mr. Henry. The evidence is not clear as to which one was interviewing the other, but it was a sparring match, as it were, to get information one from the other. The ultimate result was that Mr. Sweezey became convinced that in order to have his efforts crowned with success he would have to get rid of the application of the Sterling Industrial Corporation, which was owned by Senator McDougald and by Mr. Henry, who at that time or shortly afterwards was the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals. A good deal of evidence was taken with respect to those interviews, and with regard to what was done before an agreement was reached. Some of the evidence was vague, but during the taking of that evidence there came a time—and the evidence can be referred to by any hon. member—when a question was put to Mr. Henry substantially to this effect: "Is it correct that you filed that application for the rights which are now under discussion for the purpose of compelling anyone who might thereafter undertake the development of that section of the St. Lawrence river to take care of McDougald and Henry?" His answer was, "I guess you can put it that way."

Those interests became very valuable, the upshot being that 2,000 part interests in the new syndicate were given in exchange for them. Evidence was taken with respect to what consideration was given for the issue of those 2,000 part interests, and that evidence was not contradicted. On both sides it was reluctantly admitted that there was no consideration; and in fact it got down to being described as a nuisance value and similar units in that same syndicate were sold for $550 each.

Those matters of necessity had to be inquired into by your committee, and again I wish to commend members of the committee for the ability they displayed and for the self-abnegation, if I may put it that way, as far as party politics were concerned, which they showed in their desire to search out and attempt to determine what was the truth in connection with this promotion. It is, I believe, the opinion of the committee, and it is reflected in the report, that this project or a similar project is one that will be of great advantage to this country and, if properly built, will become part of the deep sea waterway. Whether or not there was too much hurry in the building, your committee does not see fit to report upon except indirectly. At any rate, it was the view of the committee that the work was a very important one and that we could not report otherwise than to say that every safeguard should be taken so that the work might not be imperilled, and at the same time that the rights of the province of Quebec and of the people of Canada should be protected.

I will not go further in discussing the financial structure or set-up of the last company. There were five management shares that contemplated continuity of management for a period of ten years. Probably it is a wise precaution to take if the management is in sound hands during the initial stage. There were common class A and class B non-voting shares. These, in the main, were given those who were raising money, and they in turn subscribed for some of the shares with the profits they made out of various syndicates. The final result was that the promoters of the company, who now own and control the company, have no money in it and have made a great profit out of it. I am not complaining of that if the rights of the people of this country are adequately protected. It is for the members of the house, after a review of the report, for concurrence in which I shall presently move, to say whether or not that protection has been given.

There is one other phase of the matter which I wish to discuss, probably the one phase that is most difficult of all. I refer to the employment of moneys out of this project for the purpose of contributing to campaign funds of political parties. I know from my reading—not from my association with politics, because that has been but a recent matter with me—that contributions to campaign funds to all parties have been made for many, many years, and I do not think the leaders of any party would care to suggest that funds, large or small as they may be, are not made to organize the voters of the country in order that the views of the party particularly concerned might prevail. That has been the custom. Whether or not it is a proper one, I do not think I am called upon to pass judgment. At any rate it has been done, and I assume that it will be done in the future. It costs something to organize the vote of the voters of the country. Whether it is done properly or improperly is probably the important question. Those who contribute to the campaign funds of the parties, and do so prompted by their belief in the soundness of the policy of the particular party, can be, I think, probably excused and, maybe, commended. But those who contribute to a party's coffers, inspired only by the hope—and in time something more than hope—that they will, by reason thereof, be able through the influence of that party to alienate from the people of the country the resources that belong to them—those contributions, I say, and those who make them cannot be too strongly condemned.

In connection with this project I must confess that I am unable to divorce myself from the view that the contributions to campaign funds that were made from the company's funds, which came from the sale of bonds to the people, were made for the purpose of influencing those who might be returned to power; and those who took them, those who collected them, receive in the committee's report the condemnation they deserve.

This is the first unit in the course of the development of this great natural national resource. Obstacles were thrown in the way here and thrown in the way there, purely and simply because those who were doing it felt that they would be paid to step aside. Now, this is only the first step, and every time a dollar is added to the capital cost of any business the ultimate result is that those who have to transact business with that company or with that industry must, all down through the future, just pay that much more for the product of that industry. Therefore it is very essential, particularly in the development of a resource such as this, that its initial capital cost be kept down to the lowest possible limit, in order that the benefits that will flow from its development will be reaped by the people of the country. This is only the first unit, and if, on examination of the report, you can visualize what might have happened if, as each recurring application came along for the diversion of more waters of the river, the same course was taken, then I ask you to realize for yourselves the load that this resource would carry before it was finally developed. We should have on our hands a burden which probably would in large measure discount the benefit and advantage that nature has given us by placing that water available to the people of the country.

I have spoken longer than I intended and I trust that in the remarks I have made I have not departed from the evidence that was disclosed before the committee. Our report in certain respects may be blunt, but it is supported by the cold, unvarnished, sworn testimony, and your committee asks this house to concur in that report. I now move, seconded by Mr. Dupré, that the report be concurred in.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The hon. the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon), who has just moved for concurrence in the report which has been presented to the house, has outlined its main features. In doing so he indicated that the report has several important divisions. The first is historical in character, reviewing the inception and development of the Beauharnois canal project. The next division has to do with the organization of syndicates in connection with the promotion of the company, while another portion of the report has to do with individuals who were concerned in its promotion, and particularly with the fees which were paid to many lawyers whom the promoters seemed to believe had a certain political influence which they should seek in this manner to gain. The minister has indicated that the report further deals with the question of contributions to party funds, and while he did not mention it, I think I am right in stating that the report concludes with certain important recommendations which this house is asked to accept.

Perhaps I could not do better than to follow the minister in his order of presentation and to deal with the matter not only in the sequence he has pursued but more particularly with respect to the particular topics which he has touched upon, leaving other matters aside for the present, unless perchance some seem to me to be deserving of special mention.

I would like to do as the committee has done, present to the house a statement as to the position of the late government in granting approval of the plans of the Beauharnois company in the light of the perspective which governed in the matter. In so doing I hope the house will not feel that I am trespassing unduly upon its time if I outline the background, so to speak, of the developments in which the approval of the plans of the Beauharnois canal had its particular setting. After all, I assume that what the house and the country is most interested in is whether the late administration, of which I had the honour to be the head, granted approval of the plans from any motive other than that of the public interest, whether the decision was a wise one, whether all that could be expected of the ministry in the way of safeguarding its action was or was not performed. It is from that point of view that I wish to develop what I have to say.

When the late Liberal administration assumed office there were many pressing problems facing this country. Not the least important of these were the differences which had sprung up in the course of years between some of the provinces and the Dominion government itself. These were not differences of a character to involve conflict between governments, but there was a feeling on the part of some of the provinces that they had not received full justice in matters with respect to which the Dominion had more or less the determining voice. As an administration we set ourselves the task of endeavouring to remove these differences as largely and as completely as possible, believing that upon Canadian unity more than upon anything else depended the progress and development of our country.

Among the questions which were to the fore and which occupied the time and thought of the ministry perhaps more than any other during the first few years after it assumed office was the question of the return to the western provinces of their natural resources. This question had been facing the governments for many years, and it was one with which we wrestled and of which we finally successfully disposed. Allied in a way to that question was a grievance on the part of the province of British Columbia. That province felt that it had been deprived of certain lands along the Canadian Pacific railway and in the Peace River belt, and that those lands should be restored to it. That question also was dealt with, and may I say, dealt with successfully. We had not been in office very long before difficulties which were latent asserted themselves in the maritime provinces, and we were confronted with a great deal in the way of social unrest, and a feeling on the part of those provinces that they had not been properly treated from the time they had come into the federation. As hon. members know, we appointed the Duncan commission to investigate the grievances of the maritime provinces. When that commission made its report we acted upon it, if not in its entirety, at least with respect to all its major features. So far as the other provinces were concerned, Ontario and Quebec, there remained very few differences or difficulties of any kind with which to deal, with the exception of the question of the navigation of the St. Lawrence river and the development of power on that river. In the case of Ontario that question was particularly involved because it had to do with international as well as national considerations; it had as I have indicated also to do with power as well as navigation. A vexed question was the degree to which the Dominion itself might have ownership of the power which would result from any improvements which it might make with respect to navigation. These were the problems with which we were occupied at the time the Beauharnois application came before the administration.

I think I need scarcely say to any body of hon. members of this house that a government comes to know of questions only as they are presented to the ministry for consideration. There are at the present moment innumerable matters awaiting consideration in the different departments of government but they will not assume importance, so far as the government of the day is concerned, until they reach the cabinet through the minister of the department in which they happen to arise. The first real concern which the administration had with the Beauharnois canal was when the formal application which had been made to the Department of Public Works for the approval of the plans came from that department before the cabinet for consideration. That however was not the first intimation which individual members of the government had had of an application being made for the approval of plans for the Beauharnois canal project.

Perhaps the house will permit me to speak more particularly of my own knowledge of the matter, giving, as I speak, my version as one who at the time was holding the office of Prime Minister. I have a very slight recollection of having heard anything about the Beauharnois canal project, so called, before I was asked by Mr. Frank P. Jones if I would grant him an interview to discuss a matter of considerable importance. I did not know at the time very much about the matter that Mr. Jones wished to discuss, but he wrote me upon it and I arranged to accord him an interveiw. That was in June, if I remember rightly, or July, 1928. Mr. Jones called on me at my office and we had a short conversation. My mind was full at the time of the question of the St. Lawrence development, the deep seaway. It was a matter to which the administration had been giving a good deal of attention. We were in communication with the government of the United States with respect to it. As hon. members know, the exchange of correspondence between the two governments had been tabled in the house. My first reaction to the interview I had with Mr. Jones was as to just how this particular project might affect the St. Lawrence waterway. In that connection I put to him the very direct question: How would the province of Ontario view a matter of this kind? Because I knew that the province of Ontario had been interested in seeking to get approval of certain plans of power development on the international section of the St. Lawrence, and that we had not been able, as a government, to see our way to grant that approval until our exchange of views with the government of the United States had progressed a greater length than they had. Being international waters the consent of both countries was needed. I felt that if the government was even to consider the project at all, we would have to feel perfectly sure that out of our consideration there was not going to arise any difference or possibility of estrangement between two of the provinces, but rather that whatever would be done would accord with our policy of seeking to remove altogether whatever in the way of differences might exist between the provinces and the Dominion.

In 1928, as members will recall, the Briand-Kellogg peace pact was signed in Paris. I had the honour of representing this country at its signature, and subsequently of representing Canada at the assembly and on the council of the League of Nations. Those particular missions occupied a considerable portion of my time abroad that year. Being absent, I had no further thought of the Beauharnois matter until after my return to Canada, when the matter again came up for consideration. Shortly after my return to Canada I received another letter from Mr. Jones, in which he recalled the previous interview and the question that I had put to him at the time. He said that he was in a position to answer the question, and he enclosed certain correspondence in his letter, which correspondence was tabled in this house, I think, two years ago, which answered the question which I had put to him. It was shortly after that, that the application came before the government for consideration.

May I pause here to say a word—I shall enlarge upon it a little later—as to the attitude which I have taken with regard not only to the Beauharnois project but to every question that came before the cabinet during the time that I was Prime Minister; for this has a very important bearing on all that pertains to the consideration of this application. Once a matter came before the government for consideration, I made it religiously a rule not to discuss it with anyone—whether members of the House of Commons on my own side, friends of the party from outside, or anyone else—other than my colleagues. I received respectfully such representations as were made to me, but I invariably made the reply: this is a question under consideration in the cabinet; it will be dealt with on its merits; I cannot discuss this question with you. I am afraid that many of my own followers were most impatient at times, or perhaps I should say more than patient with me in this attitude, I know that they have felt, and it has reached my ears very often, that I was inaccessible, that it was difficult for members of the party even to have a chance to discuss with me many of the questions which they were concerned in. Part of that has been due to the fact, which I am sure my right hon. friend will be able to bear out as true, that the task of a Prime Minister is a very considerable one, and that any man who wishes to master the questions that have to be discussed in this House of Commons, unless he has had extensive preparation and unless he has a powerful mind, will require pretty much all the time he can get to himself to study intimately and thoroughly the essentials of the problems that come before his government and before parliament for consideration. I have all along been conscious of my own limitations in dealing with many of the great questions which involved complicated legal as well as technical considerations, and it has probably taken me much longer than it might have taken other men to become thoroughly familiar with the different questions that have been discussed in the cabinet and on the floor of this house; but I found that the only way in which it could be done was in just the manner I have indicated. I have been prepared to be misunderstood on the part of my own following, and even to incur the reproaches of many of the best supporters of the party, because I have been unwilling to discuss with them matters which were before the cabinet council for its consideration. I have told them I would not very frankly and emphatically. Indeed, I think every secretary who I have had will bear me out when I say that the instruction that I have oftenest given is not to let anyone into my office until he knew what he wanted to see me about, and unless it was something that could be told to my secretary then I preferred to have my office to myself. That has been pretty much the rule I followed during the time I was Prime Minister. It may serve to account for an attitude, which some of my own followers have not always appreciated. I mention that now because when this application came before the cabinet there were many persons who did try to see me and did want to discuss with me the question of the Beauharnois canal project. They were not only those who wanted to see the project plans approved; they were very powerful interests that were concerned about this power not going to the Beauharnois people. Certain of these claimed they were friends of the party—if it may be expressed in those terms—or professed to be, and thought for that reason they should be entitled to present their views. I dealt with all in exactly the same way. On this question, as on all others—I am not singling out this one, because my attitude as Prime Minister in this instance was exactly the same as it has been with regard to every other question—I refused to discuss the subject then before the cabinet with other than my colleagues, preferring to get my knowledge of the situation from what might be said at the council table.

For that reason the decision which was reached in cabinet council, so far as I personally was concerned—and I think I can say the same with respect to my colleagues of the day—was a decision reached as the result of open discussion across the council table in which every conceivable aspect and consideration was thoroughly discussed, and the merits thereof very carefully weighed. In a few minutes I shall go into the considerations of which we had to take account. Before doing that however may I give to the house by way of confirmation of what I have said, and to throw a little more light on the subject, one or two communications to which I have referred.

These communications were tabled as the result of a return for all correspondence between the government of Canada and other parties under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, in relation to the question commonly known as the Beauharnois power and canal project. An order was granted by the house on February 13 or 14, 1929, for these papers. It includes all the correspondence that was in my office at the time. The letter from Mr. Jones to which I have referred is dated at Montreal, June 22, 1928, and is as follows:

Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.
Dear Sir:

For the past month I have been desirous of seeing you regarding the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, but have refrained from asking for an interview, knowing how frightfully busy you must have been while the house was sitting, and although I know your time is really more than fully taken up now, necessity compels me to ask if you would, if possible, be kind enough to grant me a half-hour's interview as early next week as you can.

You will remember I told you before I sailed for Europe I expected to take an active interest in the Beauharnois proposition, this I am doing, but naturally do not want it to drag, and I would like if you would make it possible to have actual construction work started this fall. I am anxious to see this water go through the turbines and industries using the power generated. I may be impetuous, but I have always found that while impetuosity may be a drawback to an individual, it is very often good for the community.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
F. P. Jones.

I arranged for the interview with Mr. Jones and at the interview made to him the representations to which I have already referred. The next communication I received from him was dated at Ottawa, November 28, 1928, from the Chateau Laurier, and is as follows:

Right Hon. W. L. M. King, P.C., Ottawa.
Dear Sir:

At the last interview you were kind enough to give me, re Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, it was suggested that I might procure some evidence as to the attitude of the government of Ontario towards the proposed power development. This I have done and therefore would like, if it is possible, to have you grant me a short interview in which I could submit the evidence to you.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. P. Jones.

Unfortunately Mr. Jones did not receive an interview. He, however, sent me another communication. This one was dated from the Chateau Laurier, Ottawa, November 30, 1928, and is as follows:

Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, P.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.
Sir:

You will recall that when I saw you a few months ago regarding the application of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company for the approval of its plans under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, you asked me regarding the attitude of the premiers of Quebec and Ontario regarding this project.

I was in a position to assure you that not only the premier but the entire government of Quebec was practically unanimously in favour of it and anxious to see the development go ahead. I could not, however, state definitely the precise attitude of the premier of Ontario.

I now take the liberty of enclosing a copy of a letter from the Hon. Mr. Ferguson, dated November 19, to the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, by which you will see that Hon. Mr. Ferguson considers that the matter is one which should be dealt with according to the wishes of the province of Quebec. Mr. Ferguson appreciates the spirit of cooperation shown by the province of Quebec, and evidently feels that this development will be beneficial to Ontario, inasmuch as it will be an additional source of supply of power to help satisfy Ontario's rapidly increasing demand.

I think the letter of the Hon. Mr. Ferguson justifies my stating to you that Ontario, as well as Quebec, is in favour of the project.

I wish to state that the copy of this letter which I enclose was sent to me by Mr. Taschereau, and I have his permission to give it to you.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. P. Jones.

The letter which was enclosed is before me. I shall not read the whole of it, because it deals with two subjects but shall read that part dealing with the Beauharnois canal project. It is from the Hon. Howard Ferguson, at the time Prime Minister of Ontario, and is addressed to Mr. Taschereau the Prime Minister of Quebec. It is as follows:

I note you say that the Beauharnois people are about to press the Dominion authorities to give effect to the legislation passed by your legislature at the last session. I fully realize that this development is entirely within the boundaries of the province of Quebec and this province has no voice in the matter. We do, however, greatly appreciate the spirit of co-operation in the development of these two great old provinces which you have so frequently shown, and which is again evidenced by the provision you have made that a portion of this power may be made available to this province should we need it and are able to negotiate a favourable contract, so long as it is not directly or indirectly exported to the United States.

Owing to the undoubted delay there will be in regard to the settlement of the development of the St. Lawrence and Ottawa river powers, and the rapidly increasing demand for power in Ontario, I feel that we will probably again in the near future have to take advantage of your good-will and secure a further supply from some point in your province.

I am sure I need not assure you again, as I have done in the past, of our appreciation of your attitude towards Ontario and her power problems by voluntarily making such generous provision a condition of your approval of the Beauharnois undertaking. If I am right in my view as to our early requirements of power, Beauharnois would seem to me to be a very convenient and favourable point from which to procure our requirements.

Yours faithfully,
G. H. Ferguson.

I believe the correspondence I have read is sufficient to make clear the fact that in November, or the beginning of December 1928, the administration of the day was in this position: They had before them an application from a company which had been organized in the province of Quebec, had received its charter from the province of Quebec, had been given a lease of power from the province of Quebec, had been given the right to divert certain waters from the province of Quebec, that the Premier of Ontario knew of the particulars of the lease granted and the conditions attached to it, and had stated in a written communication which I assume was intended to be brought to the attention of the federal government, that he approved of the project, that he would be in need of additional power for his own province and that he would probably have to make a contract at an early date with the government of Quebec in order to get the power he needed for the province of Ontario. That was the position as it presented itself to the cabinet. Our first consideration was whether we could afford to ignore the wishes of the two provinces most vitally affected in this power development, provided that all requirements with respect to the federal obligation of approving the plans were fully met.

Now, may I pause at this point to remind hon. members what was the obligation, the duty and the power of the federal government in this particular. We were not required to pass upon the organization of a company, in the application before us we had nothing to do with leasing the power, we had nothing to do with the diversion of water; all this belonged to the government of the province of Quebec—a government just as sovereign within its jurisdiction as the Dominion government within its jurisdiction. We had to consider whether, when the government of Quebec, and I might add the government of Ontario, were urging that these plans should be approved, we were justified in refusing approval. We had to consider, when the government of the province of Ontario was asserting its needs for more power, whether we were justified by refusing such approval, thereby to prevent the Ontario government from getting that extra power from the source with which it said it was going to make a contract. Our obligation was limited to the approval of the plans from the point of view of the protection of navigation. The protection of navigation comes within the jurisdiction of this federal parliament. Our obligation was in the nature of an administrative act certifying that the grant made by the province of Quebec with respect to water powers within its own jurisdiction would not in any way interfere with navigation on the St. Lawrence.

But we had a larger question to consider—and this, let me repeat, was the thought mostly in the minds of the administration, because it was a question that we had been dealing with for four or five years,—namely, the question of the ultimate development of the St. Lawrence deep seaway project. We had to make perfectly sure not only that any project we were going to approve would not interfere with navigation, but that it would be so carried out that it would not interfere with but rather further the development of the St. Lawrence deep sea waterway. It was to that question that we had to direct our attention particularly.

In that connection we had to take into account all outstanding considerations of importance. First of all we had to consider whether, in constructing works for the protection of navigation, power developed from those particular works would belong to the Dominion or to the province. There never was any question about the power in the St. Lawrence river within the province of Quebec itself belonging to that province. The question for our consideration was whether once the works necessary for the protection of navigation, were constructed, and power developed therefrom, that power should belong to the province of Quebec or to the dominion. That was a legal question that we were not in a position to pronounce upon except through the advice of the law officers of the crown.

Here again may I revert to the original setting of this matter. As I have said, the question of the settlement of the differences with respect to the St. Lawrence development was the outstanding question with Ontario and Quebec. When the Dominion-provincial conference met in 1927, the year of the diamond jubilee of confederation, the premiers of Ontario and Quebec asked that this question of the relative jurisdiction and rights of the dominion and the provinces respectively with regard to power on the St. Lawrence should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada. As a result of that request a series of questions was prepared and after amendment submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada. Those questions were before the court when the application of the Beauharnois Power Company came before our government, but no decision upon them was given until the eve of the meeting of parliament in February, 1929. I ask hon. members to keep that fact also in mind—that the question of the respective rights of the Dominion and the provinces with regard to power developments in all their phases was before the supreme court at that time.

When the opinion of the supreme court on the question submitted to it was delivered, I confess that not being a lawyer I could not make head or tail of it, and much to my relief I found that even members of the legal profession were in the same quandary that is in so far as the opinion being of a character which would settle the question of legal rights. In a word, as I recollect it, the supreme court said it could not decide a hypothetical case, that the question of legal rights could only be finally determined when a concrete case was before the court.

We had then to consider whether or not all this power development should be held up indefinitely simply because we had not a definite finding on the points submitted to the supreme court. However, the court laid down very definitely certain principles, and those principles were a guide of the administration. What we eventually decided to do was this. So far as the province of Quebec was concerned, there seemed to be no doubt whatever that the power developed within the provincial area belonged to that province. We undertook to say that any power resulting from the works that were constructed for the purpose of protecting navigation should be treated as though it belonged to the province of Quebec, even although the legal decision to that effect had not been given. But in order to be fair with all concerned, we took precisely the same position with regard to the province of Ontario. We said to Ontario: while we cannot give you a legal right in respect to these matters, we will treat you as though you had that legal right. In other words, in dealing with Ontario power rights we were prepared to treat the province of Ontario in precisely the same way as we were prepared to treat the province of Quebec.

At the time that we were awaiting the decision of the supreme court we were in conference with Premier Ferguson of Ontario and Premier Taschereau of Quebec, and members of the Dominion government, with a view to seeing if we could not mutually agree upon terms that would be acceptable to the provinces as well as to ourselves. We had two conferences. After the first conference we believed we had everything satisfactorily settled. Apparently the premiers of the two provinces went away feeling that we had said we would concede what they contended were their legal rights, whereas our contention was that we could not say what their legal rights were but we would treat them as though they had the legal rights they asserted though we were not in a position to give them legal rights. The whole purpose of the conference was to enable us to meet the situation by way of conference rather than as a matter of law.

We had a second conference which was held, if I recollect aright, on the day the decision of the supreme court was given out. At that conference I drew up and presented in the form of a definite memorandum the attitude the federal government was prepared to take in dealing with the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. By way of confirmation of what I am now stating, may I refer to a file of correspondence which took place between Premier Ferguson of Ontario, Premier Taschereau of Quebec and myself in arranging for these conferences. Without going into the correspondence at any length may I quote the essential points from these communications. The first is under date of April 17, 1928, and is a communication relating to the St. Lawrence waterway development. I sent to Mr. Ferguson, Premier of Ontario, a letter having the following as its concluding paragraph:

In our view, as the correspondence indicates, the next step should be conferences with the governments of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I hope that it will prove convenient for you to take part in such a discussion, as to which I shall write you more definitely at the close of the session.

I must correct one statement I have made. After that communication which was dated April 17, 1928, Mr. Ferguson, owing to reasons which he outlined in subsequent corespondence, indicated that he was not able to come down for a conference at the time, and the conferences which I said had taken place in 1929 I should have said took place in 1930. In the meantime however there was correspondence, which I have under my hand, showing the extent to which we were proceeding with both provinces in the same way. For example, on May 3, 1928, Premier Ferguson wrote as follows:

Some four or five years ago this government, through its electrical agency, the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, filed with the proper department at Ottawa plans for the development of power on the international section of the St. Lawrence river. We requested the approval of these plans and at intervals since that time have urged that early action be taken towards such approval. We still await a favourable reply. The government of Ontario feels that the power problem is the most pressing, and is quite separate and distinct from the question of international navigation project. No matter what may be the outcome of the negotiations for the canalization of the St. Lawrence, it would appear that many years must elapse before the project can be completed.

As I have explained, questions of power and of navigation were so inseparably intertwined with regard to the international section of the St. Lawrence that as a government we felt it impossible to conclude any negotiations relating to the international section of the St. Lawrence at the time Mr. Ferguson hoped they might be concluded. One of the causes of the delay was a certain difference of view between the engineers of the province of Ontario and those of the Dominion with respect to what would be the best route for a canal, and in that connection we asked that a conference should be held between the engineers, which conference was delayed for a time but finally took place, moving the project along a step further with regard to the St. Lawrence.

In a communication dated August 14, 1928, to Mr. Ferguson, among other things I pointed out the following:

This objective which you emphasize so strongly can be attained only through an adequate solution of the problems of engineering and finance, of constitutional authority and of international adjustments which are involved.

Consideration of the development of power from the St. Lawrence cannot be separated, you will agree, from consideration of the conservation and development of this great national asset for the paramount purposes of navigation and commerce.

Then again:

Nor can we overlook the difficulties as to jurisdiction involved by the division of authority under our federal system.

And a little further:

So marked has been the divergence of view as to legislative control and proprietary interest in connection with many phases of water-power development that the representatives of the province of Ontario at the recent Dominion-provincial conference joined in a request to the Dominion to submit a case to the Supreme Court of Canada. This has been done, after consultation with provincial representatives, and the case will be heard at an early date. While it is not necessary to postpone all further action until the respective rights of the Dominion and the provinces have been judicially determined, it is obvious that the results of this appeal to the courts, undertaken at the request of the provinces and the full cooperation of the federal government, may affect very materially the view of either authority as to the feasibility of the various methods of construction and finance.

That bears out what I said as to one of the causes of delay in not being able to meet the situation as far as Ontario was concerned. I concluded that communication by saying:

I trust that in the way indicated we may find it possible to cooperate effectively for the advancement of the interests of the province of Ontario and of the Dominion as a whole.

I shall not go further into this correspondence, because it deals more particularly with the St. Lawrence development, but at the conference which was held in Ottawa with Premier Taschereau and Premier Ferguson, in the early part of last year, after we had approved the Beauharnois plans, we made a statement of our policy with respect to approval of plans generally and with respect to powers on the St. Lawrence. That memorandum was as follows:

Mr. CAHAN: The date, please?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This was about March, 1930. The memorandum reads:

With due recognition of the paramount rights of navigation and subject to the observance of any necessary international requirements, the Dominion government is prepared to adopt a practical policy for water-power development in navigable waters as follows:

(1) Where a province desires to undertake power development in navigable waters, its right to do so shall be recognized, conditional on the provision of the necessary navigation requirements.

(2) Should the Dominion government at any time undertake or authorize the construction of any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation, it would be prepared to make available to an approved provincial agency the surplus water-power developed beyond that needed for the operation of the locks and purposes of navigation, on a basis equivalent to that which would govern if the provincial agency had itself undertaken the work as a power development scheme.

(3) In either case, should the use of Dominion or provincial property be required or the riparian or other property rights of the Dominion or province be interfered with or affected, the acquisition of such property, or the authority to interfere with or affect such rights, could be made the subject of a special agreement in the particular circumstances of each case.

Mr. CAHAN: Was that carried into effect by any official order in council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was not. It was communicated to the premiers of Ontario and Quebec. I am reading the memorandum to make clear that with respect to whatever was done with regard to Beauharnois, was part of a general policy which applied to all parts of the St. Lawrence, and to all provinces; It was not something peculiar to the province of Quebec but, as I say, it was a matter of policy which was generally applicable. And this particular communication was sent both to Premier Taschereau and to Premier Ferguson as indicating our point of view, with the hope that it would be acceptable to them.

Mr. BENNETT: Their replies were not in that sense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, they would not accept what we suggested. As a matter of fact the provinces have always contended that they had full legal rights and they would not accept anything which would not accord them those full rights. Our view was that we were not in a position to say that they had full legal rights. though we were in a position to treat them as though they had. As I remember, they claimed that they were entitled to even better treatment than the terms we required of the Beauharnois canal people because of certain conditions which we had imposed in the contract made with them.

Mr. BENNETT: It was a year after the Beauharnois order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; but what I am trying to point out at the moment is that when we dealt with the Beauharnois matter we were trying to settle it in the light of what would apply to the whole of the St. Lawrence development. We were endeavouring to lay down principles which would govern with respect to any similar situation that might arise at any time. And I think I made that quite clear in this House of Commons when parliament met in February 1929.

I wish to touch briefly upon other important features which have a bearing on the matter. I need not say anything with respect to the different meetings of the cabinet beyond the fact that the application came before us first of all in the month of November. To safeguard our action, particularly with respect to the question of the diversion of water and our rights in that particular, we obtained from the law officers of the crown a written opinion on the subject. That written opinion appears in the records of the proceedings before the committee and I need not quote it at the moment. But I mention it to indicate that we were seeking the best legal opinion that we could obtain to guide us in our decision. After the Department of Justice had given its opinion the whole Beauharnois situation was considered in the light of that opinion. Later, when the supreme court gave its decision, the matter had again to be reviewed in the light of the opinion of that body, and it was not until after the supreme court had given its decision that it was possible to begin work on the final drafting of the order in council which contained the conditions that were imposed upon the canal people.

Now, parliament opened in 1929 on the 7th of February. And here I wish to speak particularly of what I regard as all important. In the course of the inquiry before the committee an effort was made, it seemed to me, to have it appear that there had been great delays in the granting of approval of this application. As far as I can gather from a reading of the evidence, questions were asked in a way which sought to have it appear that this matter was being dragged on over a considerable period of time.

Mr. CAHAN: For just a little over a year. The application is dated January 17, 1928, and the order in council, P.C. 422, is dated March 8, 1929.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It never came before council for consideration until the month of November. Up to that time it had been a departmental matter, and Mr. Jones's letter makes it pretty plain that until he spoke to me I had no knowledge that any application was in the department. However, the point I am making now is that an effort has been made to have it appear that action was being delayed. The fact of the matter is that at the time the press of the country was asking—Why this haste? Why this hurry? All the while the course the cabinet was taking was one which would insure every possible safeguard. The promoters saw no reason why they should not get their approval before the supreme court gave its decision; and while waiting for that, they saw no reason why approval should not be given before parliament met. There were two very important considerations which the cabinet had to take into account. The position we took in council was that we would not grant approval of the application until we had before us the opinion of the supreme court. If the opinion of the supreme court had been adverse to what was being contemplated, that would have settled the matter; we should then have known definitely that our powers were restricted in the way indicated by the court. But when the opinion of the court came, it did not afford us very much light or guidance. The other consideration was the meeting of parliament. If we had approved the plans before parliament met, there is not a member on either side of the house who would not have said, "Why all this hurry? Why did the government approve the plans before parliament met? Why could they not have waited? They knew we were meeting in February and they could have put it off until parliament met." Well, we did put it off, and I took care to let parliament know as soon as it assembled that we had this very matter under consideration. I did so deliberately in order that every hon. member of the house might be on his guard with respect to what was being done in the consideration of this particular project. I sought to indicate to parliament at that time what the considerations were of which we had to take account.

May I add this further point. There has been a good deal of talk about political considerations and influence in this matter. So far as I knew—and I think I am right—Mr. Jones, who was the prime mover in seeking to get the plans approved, was a strong Conservative, having been one all his life. I believed, in dealing with this matter, that the government was dealing with a Conservative corporation. That did not make any difference in our obligation; we had to view the question on its merits. But far from considering that we were approving any plans with which any political friends of the administration were concerned, our conception, certainly mine, was that the main factors in the company were Mr. Jones and those who were associated with him. As regards Mr. Sweezey, I did not know what his politics were. I have never met him; I should not know him if he were to come into this room at this moment. That may be an unfortunate circumstance, but nevertheless it is true. I know nothing about his politics. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister told me last night the he understood Mr. Sweezey was thought of as a Liberal candidate in the last election.

Mr. BENNETT: In Kingston.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is the first I have heard of it; my right hon. friend has more information in this regard than I have. That is the position with respect to the company.

Senator McDougald's name has been brought into the discussion. At this point let me say that up to and until after the time of the approval of the application, I had no knowledge that Doctor McDougald had an interest in or was concerned, directly or indirectly, with this company. He had never spoken to me with regard to these plans at any time prior to or for a considerable period after the application had been approved. I refused to discuss with Doctor McDougald at any time any matters with respect to the Beauharnois situation. I said at all times to him and every one else that the project would be considered only on its merits. That was the position both before and after these plans were approved.

I want to make these three statements most emphatic. Let me repeat them. I believed, and I think the cabinet believed, that the company which had been granted this charter was in the main a Conservative organization.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the truth.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Wasn't Jones a Tory?

Mr. BENNETT: They would have been apt to get a charter in Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Jones was the only man with whom I had discussed this matter. He surely had not the authority to negotiate in the way he did unless he was the prime mover in the matter. I knew Mr. Jones as a very able business man, one who was generally successful in what he was undertaking in the way of business and industrial organization. I had reason from what I had known of him to feel that if a great project of this kind were undertaken it would if entrusted to him be in successful hands. That is the first point.

The second point, as I have said, is that I had no knowledge in the world that Doctor McDougald had any connection, direct or indirect, with the Beauharnois project, nor had I ever spoken to him on the subject when this matter came up before the cabinet and was decided upon.

In the third place, may I say that any delay that occurred was due to the endeavour of the government to safeguard all interests of navigation, to protect the public interest in every particular, and to ensure as far as possible that parliament should have immediate knowledge of and be fully prepared to deal with the situation.

In order to bear out what I have said with respect to the opinion prevailing at the time being that we were in haste rather than delaying the matter, may I read an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe of January 14, 1929. If hon. members will look as well at the Toronto Globe of January 25 they will be met with the glaring headlines: "Why all this haste? Why should this Beauharnois matter be allowed to go through until parliament meets? Why should it be allowed to go through until the supreme court has given its decision?" Those and similar headlines were the ones with which by the Toronto star and numerous other papers we were also confronted. The press throughout the country were complaining of the haste with which we were seeking to put through this matter, and all at a time when the cabinet was doing its utmost to hold back everything until parliament met in order before any order in council was signed that parliament might be advised in advance of what we were contemplating. The following is the Globe editorial of January 14, which is headed, "Why the hurry?":

> The manner in which the federal government is rushing the application of the Beauharnois Light and Power Company for a concession on the St. Lawrence is not calculated to win the confidence of the voters for the administration or the company. A public hearing is scheduled for to-morrow, but the public has not had an opportunity to learn the terms of the application or to organize its representation. It will not be a public hearing. Opposing companies will probably be present, but they will speak for themselves.

I had forgotten to mention that we had arranged for a public hearing to be held on January 15, so that all parties could make their voices heard in public with respect to this matter before it was finally decided upon. The editorial continues:

> It is well known that the rich prize in the St. Lawrence current is eagerly sought. There are various corporations anxious to secure the concessions worth many millions of dollars. The government may be anxious to escape further importunities by handing over the property without delay. This, however, is no way to handle a responsibility in which the entire country is interested.
> For, although the territory involved is wholly within Quebec and the Quebec government have granted a licence to the Beauharnois company, the project is not one in which Quebec alone is concerned. The St. Lawrence enterprise in its entirety is before the country and the government, and the country expects the government to handle it from a national point of view.
> It will not be known until the decision of the privy council is received whether the federal government has the right to grant a licence to the Beauharnois company or any other company. Why, then, the hurry?
> The government has not decided, as far as the public is aware, how, when or whether it intends to proceed with the creation of the St. Lawrence seaway and the development of power. How, then, does it expect the public to make intelligent representations regarding the merits of any plan or partial plan having to do with the general scheme?
> No progress has been made, apparently, in cooperation with the United States for the development of the international section, without which the seaway cannot be built, and without which the benefits of the new Welland canal cannot be gained. Still the public is asked to make an intelligent appraisal of a proposition which has a vital bearing on the whole undertaking.
> Why the hurry?

When parliament met I took the earliest occasion that presented itself to advise hon. members of this house of what we were doing and why we were doing it. I will ask the house to bear with me while I read a few paragraphs from Hansard of February 25, 1929, at page 418. This will disclose the situation not as I am seeking to present it at the moment, but as I presented it to parliament at the time the government approved the plans of the Beauharnois company. On that occasion, I said:

> From the opinion of the supreme court it would seem that we might wait from now to the day of judgment, if I may use that expression, to get from any court an opinion conclusive enough to settle as between the Dominion and the provinces all of the questions with respect to their relative rights in the matter of power. So far as we can be guided by the opinion of the supreme court, it would appear that if an appeal from the answers which they have given were taken to the privy council, we could expect nothing more from the privy council in the way of definiteness than what we have already obtained from the supreme court.

In the circumstances, having sought in the first instance a solution of the constitutional question by an appeal to the courts, and having received the replies which we have received, the government is of opinion that it is in the interests of all concerned, of the provinces and of the Dominion in their relations to each other, as well as of the Dominion in its relation to the United States in dealing with this question of international waterways, that we should not seek for the present at least to settle this matter by any further reference to the courts, but that we should endeavour to seek a solution by direct conference between the provinces immediately concerned and ourselves. Accordingly the government has decided, as we advised the United States government we would decide when we received the replies from the supreme court, to ask the governments of Ontario and Quebec to meet us in conference, to see if it is not possible to arrive by agreement between us at some settlement which will secure the provinces in their full rights with respect to power, and secure the Dominion with respect to all national interests involved. We are at the present time sending communications to the premier of Ontario and to the premier of Quebec asking that, as soon after this session of parliament is over as may be convenient to them, they meet us in conference that we may see as a result of direct conference whether it is not possible for us to come to an agreement which, as I have said, will permit without further question the development of the power in which the provinces are interested, and which will secure the Dominion in all its rights in respect to navigation and power, and which will enable the St. Lawrence development to go forward on such lines as may be agreed upon between the provinces and ourselves; in other words, to see if it is not possible to work out a plan of St. Lawrence development which will safeguard any interests of the provinces in the development of power as well as the national interests.

And further on:

But we see no reason why, speaking for the federal government, it should not now be possible for the Premier of Ontario and the Premier of Quebec, with a group of their colleagues, to meet with members of the federal government and, actuated by a desire to remove those differences and uncertainties which make for friction and create doubt as between the provinces and the Dominion, to work out some sort of settlement which will be satisfactory to all concerned. In other words, we are following in regard to Ontario and Quebec the method which we have followed in our dealings with the other provinces of Canada. We have attempted, for instance, to deal with the problems which were uppermost in the minds of our friends in the maritimes by going carefully by direct negotiation into the questions which are of greatest concern to them. We are taking up by direct negotiation with members of the western governments the questions of the transfer of the natural resources which are the outstanding and immediate questions so far as they are concerned. So far as the two old provinces of Ontario and Quebec are concerned the question of power development, and the question of the development of the St. Lawrence channel as an ocean shipway, are the matters which are of prime importance, and it is our hope, indeed, it is our expectation, that meeting together with a sincere desire to work out a solution of these problems, we shall be able to find a satisfactory solution.

And again:

As indicated, we have been seeking to cooperate with Ontario in its power problems, and we have been doing the same with respect to Quebec. The province of Quebec, like the province of Ontario, is interested in power development. The province has certain rights with respect to power developments; we have certain rights with respect to the protection of navigation. In any negotiations with the province of Quebec, and with respect to the approval of any plans which may be submitted by any company holding a charter from that province we shall take, and are taking great care to see that nothing shall be granted to a company or to a province which in any way will impede or interfere with the St. Lawrence development project, or the full rights of the Dominion in navigation on the St. Lawrence. Viewing the matter broadly, therefore, it would appear as though it required only the goodwill of all parties interested to work out some agreement as between the provinces and the Dominion which would settle this vexed constitutional problem in a manner satisfactory to all concerned, and which in addition would enable the provinces and ourselves to take a course which in their interest and the interest of Canada as a whole would be considered most advantageous in negotiating with the United States with respect to further development of the St. Lawrence shipway.

Then this further word—and this, hon. members will notice made clear to the House of Commons that the minute the approval was given, this parliament would have the right, if it so desired, to annul altogether the approval. I want hon. members to grasp the significance of that statement. I made that statement in this house on February 25, the approval was not granted until March 8. I was doing all in my power at the time to have every hon. member of this house made fully aware of the magnitude of this transaction, and all that was involved in it, and I was putting them on their guard in case by any chance there might be an error in any way. I was not merely putting them on their guard, but I was advising them even before the order was signed that they had full power if they so desired to annul. That surely was maintaining the supremacy of parliament. With respect to the approval of the Beauharnois plans, it only required a resolution of this house to annul anything that the government had done. May I say that we went through that session, and no motion was made to annul the approval we had given. We went through another session of parliament and no motion was made in this house to annul the approval. How, then, can hon. members say to-day that the government at the time had been moved by political influences or by any consideration of the kind with respect to what it did? The government acted wholly and solely on the merits of the case, seeking to be perfectly fair and perfectly impartial, and the government advised this House of Commons in advance of what their full power of control over the situation would be. May I read the words? This was on February 25, 1929:

Further with respect to the portion of the St. Lawrence which is wholly within Canada and indeed in respect to all navigable waters, this parliament is already secured in its powers of supervision under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, which gives to parliament the right not merely to review but to annul whatever may be done by the governor in council should it be shown that in any particular the action taken is unwise.

I ask hon. members to contemplate the significance of that statement at that time. That was not a statement made after there had been an investigation. That was not a statement made after approval had been given. That was a statement made a week or two in advance when this whole matter was being finally considered and the drafting of the clauses that were to protect the country and protect the rights of the people and the provinces were being most carefully considered and weighed. I continued:

Let me give to the house the sections of the Navigable Waters Protection Act bearing on this question. Section 4 reads:

"No work shall be built or placed in, upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water unless the site thereof has been approved by the governor in council nor unless such work is built, placed and maintained in accordance with plans and regulations approved or made by the governor in council."

Section 10 provides:

"The governor in council may make such orders or regulations as he deems expedient for navigation purposes respecting any work to which this part applies or of which the plan and site are approved under any act of the parliament of Canada.

2. The local authority, company or person constructing, owning or in possession of any work shall be subject to such orders or regulations."

I come now to section 12, which is the important provision. This is the section which I wish hon. members to note particularly:

"Parliament may, at any time, annul or vary any order of the governor in council made under this part."

Mr. Adshead: Parliament?

Mr. Mackenzie King: Yes, parliament. Subsection 2 goes on:

"Any action of parliament in that behalf shall not be deemed an infringement of the rights of the local authority, company or person concerned."

Then I went on:

Where, then, is the need for adding anything to this particular act?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That had reference to something that the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) had been discussing, I brought in the Beauharnois matter in that discussion. Someone asked me at the time, "Why did you bring the Beauharnois matter into something that has to do with natural resources?" That I believe was the question that was then under consideration. I replied that I was deliberately availing myself of my earliest opportunity to let hon. members know the exact position in regard to matters that were under consideration in the cabinet. I continued:

My hon. friend the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) asked me the other day as to whether parliament would have the right to review certain matters which might be in contemplation. He has no need for concern as to the powers of parliament with respect to the possible acts of the government he had in mind whether they were of to-day or of six months ago or are still of the future; because parliament, with respect to the protection of navigable matters under the act as it stands, has the power not only to review but to annul whatever may be done by the governor in council. Words cannot be stronger.

A little later I said:

I am merely seeking to make plain the points that bear particularly upon the St. Lawrence water development. I am not dealing with the other question. To that I have referred only incidentally. But this is very material to the question of the St. Lawrence development with respect to the rights of this parliament touching any act of the government by order in council or otherwise.

Mr. Garland (Bow River): Would it not be better, sometimes not to pass an order in council than to have to annul it afterwards?

Mr. Mackenzie King: My hon. friend has asked a reasonable question, and I am glad that he has done so. There are some matters which are administrative in character, and others which are legislative; there are some questions which are technical and which can be dealt with only by experts, and other questions which are suitable for discussion in a deliberative assembly. When one comes to such questions as sites for water-power, the volume or rapidity of water passing over a particular point, the question of the effect of obstructions upon the levels of waters, the effect of the ice flow in certain localities, all of which are important questions when we are dealing with navigation, these questions can be settled, and settled only by expert engineers. They cannot be settled in a deliberative assembly. Most questions that relate to public works are of that character. They are questions for the experts of the government departments, and parliament in its wisdom has made clear that it is not advisable to prevent development by requiring in the first instance that parliament shall perform functions or duties which it is not at all fitted to perform. That is the reason this section is worded in the way it is. In other words, so far as provincial rights may be concerned, what is sought by the Navigable Waters Protection Act is to allow the full development which provinces may seek with respect to power but where navigation is likely to be affected to assure at the same time that the general interest will be wholly and adequately secured.

That was on February 25. I am not going to weary the house much longer with citations, but I wish to give one more, and this is from what I said in the house two days later, on February 27, which bears on this matter. The citation is from the revised Hansard, page 525:

I think it is apparent that most of the problems respecting resources relate to the provinces. The provinces are primarily concerned with the natural resources, whether they be lands, mines, timber, waterpowers or other resources. I can conceive of nothing easier than to raise in this country the old issue of provincial rights if the federal government were to go beyond its jurisdiction and seek to perform in dealing with resources that belong to provinces acts which parliament never intended should be performed by a federal government. We have to be particularly careful in this Dominion, which is composed of provinces as well as a federal authority, to see that powers given to the Dominion for one purpose are not used to frustrate the rights of provinces as regards other matters which have been entrusted to them.

A good deal of discussion has taken place in connection with power resources, and I want to say a word in that connection, in order to make perfectly clear wherein the administration of water-powers within a province may belong to the province and not to the Dominion, and wherein there may be a difference of views as to powers generated in navigable waters. The question has arisen whether, under the rights which the Dominion has, with respect to the protection of navigable waters, the power that results from works constructed in a river for the purpose of improving navigation, would belong to the Dominion or the province. That question has been referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the answer that we have received, as I made clear the other day, is, to say the least, indecisive as to what, in that regard, are the rights of the respective parties.

Some persons reading the judgment may say that the emphasis inclines in one direction, while others may say that it inclines in the other. I think the judges have indicated fairly clearly that they must have a concrete case before them before they will attempt to give any real decision as to the respective rights of the Dominion and the provinces. What I wish at the moment to make clear is that, as regards navigable waters, the authority given to parliament to protect navigation and the means taken by parliament to exercise that authority enables the government, with respect to any applications that come before it for approval of plans of any company generating power in navigable waters, to impose such conditions as, in the opinion of its experts, are necessary to safeguard navigation. But it was never intended by any legislation of which I am aware, that the power which was given to the Dominion to protect navigation, was a power to be exercised to frustrate provinces in the legitimate development of their own natural resources. That is an aspect of its rights and obligations which the government has to consider pretty carefully.

We have had placed before us by a company in the province of Quebec an application for the approval of certain plans that are essential in the development of power under a charter which has given to that company by the province of Quebec. From much of the discussion in the public prints, one would think that the Dominion government was giving a charter for the right to develop water-power in the province of Quebec. The government has neither the power nor the authority to give a charter such as the one I refer to. The legislature of Quebec protects its own water-powers; that legislature gives its charters to companies in the light of its administration of its resources and what it may wish to have done with them, all that this government is called upon to do under the legislation which has been passed by parliament to protect navigable waters—navigable waters being a subject which by the British North America Act, is assigned to the Dominion parliament for protection and development—is to say whether or not those plans prejudice in any way or will injure the needs of navigation in the waters in which the works are to be placed or to which they may be related. When plans are submitted they do not go before a body of ministers; they go to expert engineers who examine them to see whether or not, they would be an obstruction to navigation. If they are, then the Dominion has no right to approve them. If they are not, the Dominion has then to consider whether there are other obligations of a general character of which account has to be taken? Where the river St. Lawrence is concerned, I submit there is a very real obligation of which the Dominion must take account: the Dominion is obliged to see that any step which is taken under a provincial charter shall not be of a character which in any way will, in the first place, interfere with navigation, or, in the second place, prejudice any possible scheme of development of navigation of which account ought to be taken because of the important national interests involved or to be considered. In other words, in regard to the St. Lawrence, the government would not only be justified in refusing but ought to refuse to approve any power plans that would have the effect of prejudicing the development of the St. Lawrence as a great ocean shipway. But if engineers and experts, whose business it is to look into these matters, advise the administration that not only do plans submitted not obstruct or appear in any way as an obstruction, but that they may also be made to serve to help the larger object, then the government has to ask itself whether it is justified in preventing an industrial development in the matter of water-power in a province where it finds navigation fully safeguarded simply because under an act of parliament, it has been given the duty of safeguarding navigation? I am bringing this up at the moment because it also bears on the resolution of my hon. friend.

In matters of government certain acts are legislative; others administrative; while parliament has given to the executive power to approve plans, has parliament thereby parted with its power of controlling any situation, should it be found that the executive in the exercise of its duty and authority has made a mistake, has gone too far? Not a bit of it. The other evening I read to the house a section of the Navigable Waters Protection Act which provides wtih respect to any approval given by the Dominion to any works or other construction in navigable waters that parliament may at any time annul all that has been done. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition says: But would parliament think of annulling any act of the executive. He said if this were done it would destroy the credit of the country, that it would never do to make a contract and then subsequently to annul it. Well, that is something which the parties who apply for approval of their plans, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, have to take into account and have always had to take into account. That is how parliament protects itself. That is how the country's interest is protected. All a company gets when its plans are submitted is approval of its plans subject to the right of parliament to annul all that the executive may do in granting approval.

There is a definite statement of the considerations the cabinet had in mind at the time this approval was given. May I direct the attention of hon. members to this feature: We had a responsibility not only with respect to giving approval, but we had an equally great responsibility in the matter of refusing approval. This was a Quebec project; the government of Quebec had given a charter to a company, had leased power rights and had granted a certain diversion with respect to waters within the borders of that province. The legislature of the province of Quebec was just as anxious to develop its industries through hydro-electric power as was the province of Ontario to develop its industries by hydro-electric power. If approval had not been given within a year the parties interested would have had to go back to the legislature for renewal of the charter. We had to ask ourselves the question: What is there that justifies us in refusing the approval of these plans? That was the question we were considering. The obligation on us was to see that we protected navigation, and once our engineers and experts assured us that navigation had been fully taken care of, we had to say: Is there any reason why this approval should not now be granted? I venture to say if we had refused to grant the approval we would have raised a much greater issue in Canada than any which had been raised up to that time, namely, whether the Dominion through the exercise of its powers to protect navigation had a right to prevent a province from developing its own resources. That was the serious nature of the situation. Let hon. members ask themselves whether, if they had been seized with that responsibility, in the light of these circumstances as known to them at the time they would have acted in a manner different from that in which we acted. I was perfectly conscious that in a great undertaking of this nature many questions would arise during the course of its development which it would be almost impossible for any government in every particular fully to safeguard. For that very reason, as far as I could, I was putting the responsibility upon parliament. Once we had decided to discharge our responsibility, I was serving notice upon parliament in those two public speeches made in this House of Commons, before any approval was granted, that it would be up to hon. members in the house, if when approval was given they thought anything was wrong in the approval, immediately to introduce a resolution. No resolution has been introduced in this house at any time. This is July 30, 1931. That approval was given in March of 1929.

May I say that the order in council passed council and was signed by His Excellency about ten minutes to three on March 8, 1929. Immediately after the house met my colleague, the Minister of Public Works of the day, informed the house that the approval had just been given. He laid on the table a copy of the order in council and gave to the house the particulars contained therein. Those particulars may be found in the address delivered in this house by my hon. friend the then Minister of Public Works on Friday, March 8, 1929.

I ask hon. members this question: Can they in those circumstances think of any course other than that which with regard to its responsibilities to the provinces a government of Canada could have adopted? Our duties were all set forth in the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and those duties I submit we fulfilled not only in spirit but to the letter.

So much for the approval of the plans of the company on March 8, 1929. From that time on, as I have said, parliament had the right to review the whole situation. Was there anyone who believed at the time that political influence had played its part in the approval of these plans? If so, why have we had to wait for over two years for a statement to be made to that effect?

As I have remarked, in the investigation a great deal was said about political influence, and every effort was made to bring together pieces of the evidence to make it appear as though political influence had been exerted. In particular, reference was made to the Sterling Industrial Corporation which had applied to the government some years before with respect to some water powers. That application, according to the evidence, was made to one of the government departments.

Mr. BENNETT: Two.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Two, was it? I thought it was one.

Mr. BENNETT: Public works and railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But no action was taken upon it. So far as the application was concerned, the government's part consisted in turning it down. Now, if some action had been taken on it, I suppose it would have been said that that was the result of political influence. I ask hon. members to be just in this matter, and see how every question has its two sides. I say if the government had approved of that application we would have been told that it was due to political influence. As it was turned down, I suppose the insinuation is that this action was also because of political influence being exerted somewhere.

At any rate the Sterling Industrial Corporation disposed of its interests, whatever they were, real or unreal—I think from what I have read in the evidence they were unreal—about the time at which these plans were approved. Because of that fact and other facts that have been brought out in evidence, it is assumed that some political influence was being exerted. May I say with respect to the Sterling Industrial Corporation that I never knew of the existence of that corporation until this committee of inquiry held its sessions, I had never known there was such a corporation in existence, and I doubt very much if any of my colleagues other than possibly those of the department, to which the application went had any knowledge of the existence of any corporation of the kind.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I never heard of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never heard of it, knew nothing about it, had no conception in the world that anybody associated with me in a friendly way, in a political way, or in any other way had anything to do with any corporation by the name of the Sterling Industrial Corporation. All my knowledge of that particular concern has come since this inquiry—and I must say it has come as a very great and a very sad surprise.

Now, just a word as to political influence. I agree with what the hon. the Minister of Immigration said when he drew attention to the fact that Mr. Sweezey had curious notions as to how progress was to be made with respect to industrial enterprises through the exercise of political influence. As the minister says, either he or those associated with him retained members of different legal firms, some that could not possibly have had any influence, some that might be presumed to have influence, but evidently on the theory with respect to all that if there were enough of them sooner or later their influence would make itself felt. Now, may I ask this question, and I ask hon. members to think of it carefully: Is it any reflection upon the government of the day that a company paid those legal fees, unless it can be shown that in some way the result of those payments had its effect and influence upon the government? Remember this, it is stated in the evidence that some of these payments were contingent upon the plans being approved. Let me pause for a moment at this pointt. There was before the Supreme Court of Canada at the time certain questions as to the right of the government to grant approval of the plans. Is there not just as much ground for saying that legal influence was bought in order that it might be exerted against the Supreme Court of Canada as that it might be exerted against the government of the day? My right hon. friend the Prime Minister shrinks back in horror. May I ask him, as Prime Minister of this country, does he not feel his honour to be as great as the Chief Justice of Canada feels his honour to be? Why should anyone who is the head of the administration, why should any member of the government, feel that a government composed of honourable men is any more venal than any court of judges in this country? I say that in the circumstances anyone who was so ill-minded as to take the view that those legal firms were financed for the purpose of bringing influence to bear, are bound to say that that influence would have had to operate on the supreme court just as much as on the government. It is no reflection on the supreme court to say that, because everybody knows that the supreme court would never yield to any influence of the kind. It is equally no reflection on the government of the day. After this committee of the house has done its best with respect to every witness to find some way in which it could be shown that political influence was brought to bear upon the government, there is not a single statement in all the evidence that will bear out such a suggestion.

Now, may I go a step further. Will he say it was a reflection upon the legal profession? Will members of the legal profession say it was?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says "yes." No, I do not think so.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think it was.

Mr. BENNETT: Contingent fees are forbidden by the ethics of the profession, and by statute in Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is this: does he feel it was a reflection upon himself as a member of the legal profession that these moneys were paid to members of his profession in order to bring influence to bear? That is my point.

Mr. BENNETT: Indirectly, certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not hold that view. I say there are in the legal profession honourable men, and in the main they constitute the profession. There is no more reason to feel they are reflected upon by anything dishonourable done by a few members of the profession than there is reason to feel that the government of the day or the Supreme Court of Canada is reflected upon because of some supposed influence that has been proven never to have been brought to bear upon either.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that in justice to the government of the day, that is one factor which should have been brought out very prominently. When I speak of the government of the day, I am speaking of the government of Canada. After all, as hon. members of this House of Commons, this parliament, each of us who are its members has something at stake with respect to the government of Canada. Why should any hon. member wish to have it appear throughout Canada and throughout other countries that governments in this country are venal? Surely our politics do not need to be carried that far. We ought to rejoice that this parliamentary committee, sitting as it has been for weeks and examining witnesses under pressure, has been unable to show anything in the way of direct influence, or any influence at all of a political kind that had a bearing upon the situation. Instead of innuendo, instead of insinuation, as there is in many of the questions that were put,—and I am afraid as there is with respect to some of the evidence as quoted in the committee's report—I think there should have been a direct statement by the committee that, having gone into this whole matter very fully and very carefully, they could say that any political influence that had been paid for in any way by this company had not been brought to bear at all upon the administration. I say if that statement had been made I would find it much easier to support the report of the committee. But when the report is so drafted that there is insinuation and innuendo in the absence of statement of matter of fact, I confess that notwithstanding as the minister has said, that all the members of the committee subscribed to a draft report, I shall have to think twice before I can feel that concurrence in that report, might not be construed in the country as an endorsation of its innuendos and its insinuations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Here is one who won't approve of it anyway.

An hon. MEMBER: There are lots of others, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now may I quote just two or three lines from an article written by one of the ablest Canadian journalists who has followed this investigation very closely and who gave at its close a brief review of the entire inquiry. I quote from an article by Mr. Paul Reading, special correspondent for the Ottawa Citizen, copyright by the Southam Publishing Company. The article is dated July 23, 1931. It was written as I have said at the conclusion of the inquiry. This is what Mr. Reading says after having followed the proceedings of the inquiry from day to day:

> It has not been actually shown that political influence was bought in any quarter, though it may have been generously paid for.

That is the opinion of a keen and very able journalist who was watching the evidence day by day in order to see what would be the outcome of this all-important question of whether political influence had been brought to bear on the government when it was approving these plans. He says, and I believe every journalist, and every person who attended the sittings of the committe will endorse these words:

> It has not been actually shown that political influence was bought in any quarter, though it may have been generously paid for.

May I say this also: We all have our friendships. Are we to understand that every man is responsible for every act of his friends? Unless every hon. member is prepared to say that this is his view, and that such a law should apply to himself, then I say he owes it to others to apply his own view to them, as he would expect it to be applied to himself. The fact that certain friends of the administration, or of individual members of the administration, may have done things which probably no one regrets more deeply than they do, is not even circumstantial evidence that those with whom they shared friendship have been in any way associated with them in transactions of the kind.

I ask this honourable house: Is there any relationship closer than that of father and son? Will hon. members opposite, or will any member of this parliament or anyone in this country say that because a son commits indiscretions and does things which will not bear the light of day his father is responsible for those acts, that as a result of them his father has been corrupted. He may break his father's heart but he will not break his father's character. He may even help to reveal something of the beauty and the strength of a father's character, and what is true of that very intimate relationship of life is true also of the less intimate but hardly less sacred relationship of human friendship. I say that any hon. member who would seek to imply by insinuation or innuendo that any act of a friend reflects upon the one who has been sharing his friendship is playing a role unworthy of anyone who regards himself as a man in the true sense of the word.

Now may I come to the significant statement which has been made during this inquiry? It was brought out during the investigation that very large sums of money were paid to two members of the party who were acting as its treasurers in the recent political campaign. I refer in this regard to the evidence given before the committee. Mr. Sweezey was being examined by Mr. White, as follows:

Q. Then you spoke of contributions to the Conservative party. By the way, during what period were those contributions of which you have spoken made?—A. Oh, they were sometime prior to the last election, the last federal election, not very long before.

Q. That was July 28th last?—A. Well, it was sometime previous to that.

I ask hon. members to fix that fact firmly in their minds. Approval was given these plans on March 8, 1929, and Mr. Sweezey says the money he gave was contributed during the campaign in the summer of 1930. There is no evidence that a single dollar was given by that corporation to anyone until the campaign of last year. The evidence is that the money was contributed in the thick of the campaign. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the evidence being what it was in that particular, the report which was brought in by the committee should have disclosed that fact prominently. It should have been clearly stated that there was nothing to show that the government as a whole or a single member of the government, was influenced, directly or indirectly, by any monied influence or political influence of any kind in the approval of the plans; that it was not until the general election of last year that moneys were paid as a political contribution.

Why were those moneys paid? Perhaps the best way to answer that question is to take the evidence of the witness himself, the one who made the contributions. Here is what Mr. Sweezey says, at page 823 of the evidence:

By Mr. White:

Q. Inasmuch as it has been suggested that we go into the matter of provincial campaign funds, was any political contribution made to the Ontario Conservative party?—A. Yes; again Mr. Griffith can give you particulars on that. I know we made contributions to someone who represented himself as standing up for an Ontario fund of this kind.

Q. To whom did he make those representations?—A. To me.

Q. To you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And what did he say to you in that regard?—A. That he thought that a contribution would be in order to the Ontario Conservative party because we would probably be having a lot more dealings with the Ontario people, and that gratefulness was always regarded as an important factor in dealing with democratic governments.

Let me hasten to say that I have not selected that passage because mention is made of the Conservative party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members opposite may laugh, but I have selected it because it is the one statement in Mr. Sweezey's evidence which gives his conception of what political campaign funds are for, and discloses what Mr. Sweezey had in mind when he was making contributions to campaign funds. Mr. Sweezey makes it very apparent there that he is not thinking of something that has taken place in the past; he has in mind what he hopes will take place in the future.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Nothing could be more plain. Hon members say, "hear, hear;" I hear my hon. friend, from East Algoma, who is a bit of an authority, saying "hear, hear." Perhaps he knows. I repeat: Here are Mr. Sweezey's own words:

> . . . . because we would probably be having a lot more dealings with the Ontario people, and that gratefulness was always regarded as an important factor in dealing with democratic governments.

I can say that if Mr. Sweezey took that view I am very sorry for him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope hon. gentlemen opposite do not agree with him; I hear some saying "hear, hear." Remember that this remark of Mr. Sweezey's applies as much to the government of my right hon. friend as it does to the government of which I was the head; his is a democratic government, just as ours was a democratic government. That is not a statement limited to Liberal governments; that statement applies to all governments in the country. That was the view Mr. Sweezey entertained as promoter, and my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon), who moved concurrence in the report, touched on that very point himself. He said he could not understand how a man could believe that governments were moved in that way. I agree with the minister in that. I say that any man who thinks that he can sway governments by the size of his contributions to political funds has not the first knowledge or understanding of human nature—perhaps I should say character—worthy of the name. What evidence is there on which to condemn an administration because of the fact that some man makes a very large contribution to a political campaign fund? All would depend upon what as a result was done. That company was undoubtedly looking for something in the way of consideration from governments. They are looking for something more from my right hon. friend to-day.

We provided in the order in council that if the company failed in any particular to do what was expected of them the government should always have the right to take over the whole concern. We have protected the public rights in every respect, where it appeared that the company might fall short in anything it was doing. Had we left out that consideration, had we not put in a clause in the order in council, with a view to safeguarding the government of the day, whatever might be its complexion, in the event of the company's failing to fulfil its obligations, then certainly we should have been at fault. I am sorry I have not the time to put on record all the safeguards that were provided. They are in the order in council, and they show that in every particular we have protected the rights of the public. And having so protected the public rights, I say that in the event of the company coming for further consideration, its application should receive that consideration on its merits and on its merits only.

I hope I have made that as clear and emphatic as it is possible to make any statement. I say if he was thinking of the late Liberal administration, that Mr. Sweezey little knew the character of the men with whom he was dealing if he supposed that any contribution of his, however large, would influence in the slightest the consideration of any question he or those associated with him at any time might bring before the cabinet. I say he little understood the character of the men who were handling the affairs of the country at that time if that was his view.

Now I come to another point. Unfortunately this report contains very much in the way of innuendo and insinuation. I regret to have to say that, but no one can read the report without seeing that certain things appear in it which can only be there with a view to conveying a certain implication. The minister said to-night that the members of the committee had had an opportunity to read over the report clause by clause and then subscribe to it. I gather from his words that this was all the opportunity they had. I think I am right when I say that no member of the committee ever saw the report in its final form, nor had a chance to read it through in its final form. The minister states that it was drafted—

Mr. GORDON: I wonder whether I might interrupt the right hon. gentleman, so that there may be no misunderstanding. As chairman I prepared the draft report. The committee started at nine thirty in the morning, going over that draft report, taking up paragraph after paragraph, page after page. I signed at the foot of each page after the committee had subscribed to the correctness of what was disclosed on each page. The whole day was spent in assembling the facts. Whatever inferences are contained in the report, that report was the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I have the same indulgence as the minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the leader of the opposition concluded?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is on a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is not in order at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is a point of order with reference to the interruption of the Minister of Immigration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. gentleman is not in order I will refer to the statement of the minister. I do not think—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And I wish to challenge that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has said that he is rising to a point of order. What is the point of order?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish to challenge the statement of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not in any respect a point of order. Unless the leader of the opposition has concluded his speech the hon. member may not speak now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the point can be raised when I am through. Let me take what the minister has said. I do not think I misrepresented him when I said that the members of the committee, as I understood it, had not had an opportunity to read through the report in its final form after the committee had gone over it section by section. The minister tells us now that the report was gone over section by section, which is a procedure very similar to that followed when a bill is in committee. The bill is taken up clause by clause, an O.K. is put on each clause, and then the bill is moved on another stage. But the point I am making at this moment is that after the clauses of the report had been gone over in this manner there was no opportunity for the committee to read through the document in its final typewritten form to see whether modifications were required in the phraseology or in its details. Very often, as my hon. friend knows, when one is running through a document clause by clause, the general purport of each clause may be assented to, or agreed to if you like; but when one comes to view the document as a whole one sees it in a certain perspective which it is not possible to see when it is being considered clause by clause. I honestly believe that if the committee had been given an opportunity to read the whole report carefully and to reflect upon it after the first draft had been prepared—and I do not say that my hon. friend was wrong in exercising haste—because we were all anxious to get the report as soon as possible—there are many things in it that might have been changed or altered. I will speak of one of them.

Mr. GORDON: May I interject—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to have the hon. member make his statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why not Mackenzie?

Mr. BENNETT: Because the minister is chairman.

Mr. GORDON: I regret having to interrupt, but I wish to make the position clear. I take full responsibility for the drafting of the report which was submitted to the committee. Rightly or wrongly, I conceived it to be my duty to see that that report should not go out to the public until it was tabled in this house for the information of the members. We went over the report paragraph by paragraph, page by page. There were deletions and there were additions. The original has been preserved by the clerk of the committee, to be seen by any member. Every change in the draft report was initialled by me, and the bottom of the page signed by me. Great discussion took place on every paragraph of the report, and at the conclusion, when all members were agreed and satisfied—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. GORDON: Well, read the proceedings of the committee and see.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want to ask the minister a question. Is it not a fact that at the conclusion of the proceedings in camera, at about half past five, I asked whether the Liberal members of the committee might have permission to adjourn and consider their attitude to the report as a whole? I protested against the minister submitting the report to parliament as a unanimous report without giving us an opportunity to consider it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON: Hon. members may applaud that statement, but what I have said I have said with a full consciousness of the seriousness of it. When the report was finally revised, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) asked me whether he could have a copy to submit to his leader.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right.

Mr. GORDON: I said to the hon. member that the report had not been in any way referred to the Prime Minister; not a thing had been referred to him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GORDON: Laugh if you will.

An hon. MEMBER: Answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it not a fact that I asked for an adjournment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will not sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it not a fact that I asked for an adjournment of the committee and to have the committee reconvene?

Mr. GORDON: I will leave it to hon. members of the committee as to whether my recollection is correct or incorrect. The clerk of the committee says it was unanimous, and so does the report. I made it abundantly plain that I considered it to be my duty to see that the report was a report from this select committee and not one influenced by any advice which might come from the leader of the opposition or others.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point was that if hon. members had had a chance to read over the report, possibly many of the phrases would have been altered before the report finally came down. There are in the report what might be regarded as insinuations carrying very serious reflections. Reference, for example, has been made to the appointment of Mr. Henry as Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, and in this connection the report says:

(4) Mr. Henry joined the Department of Railways and Canals in 1912 as inspecting engineer of railways and structures. He remained in various capacities with that department until 1923 when he joined the Canadian National Railways on the 1st March of that year as Director of Bureau of Economics. He remained with the railways until the 14th February, 1929, when he was appointed Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, by Order in Council, P.C. 192 (Exhibit 76). He held this position until the 10th March, 1930.

Why were the words "on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, by order in council, P.C. 192 (Exhibit 76)" put in the report, unless it was an effort to connect the Prime Minister of the day with the appointment of Mr. Henry? My hon. friend states that he wrote this report with his own hand, but I would refer him to a statement made in this house a short time ago by one of his own colleagues and to the answer which was made. A question was asked on May 21, 1931, of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) as to the appointment of a deputy minister, as follows:

Mr. Power: May I ask the minister if the rumour which has been circulated is true, that Mr. Lucien Dansereau is to be appointed deputy minister?

Hon. Alfred Duranleau (Minister of Marine): I suppose my hon. friend knows that these appointments are in the hands of the Prime Minister. According to law and practice, the heads of the various departments are appointed by the Prime Minister, so the question will have to be directed to him.

It is quite clear from this reply that hon. gentlemen of the administration had considered the question of who made the appointments of deputy ministers, and they knew that the practice was for the Prime Minister to make such appointments.

Mr. GORDON: The committee was in doubt as to who made the appointments, so they sent out for a copy of that order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister's reply was made on May 21. In the light of that knowledge on the part of one member of the ministry, which I assume was equal on the part of all, was there any necessity for adding the words "on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, by order in council, P.C. 192 (Exhibit 76)"?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are not looking so good now; they are getting a little white behind the gills.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite knew that there was an order in council which governed this matter. I have in my hand order in council, P.C. 1639, approved July 19, 1920, at a time when the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, head of the previous Conservative administration, was Prime Minister of this country. This order in council was passed upon the recommendation of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. It deals with the functions of the Prime Minister, with the question of quorum, with the dissolution and convocation of parliament, and in connection with appointments, it reads:

Privy Councillors;
Cabinet Ministers;
Lieutenant-Governors;
Provincial Administrators;
Speaker of the Senate;

Chief Justices of all courts;
Senators;
Sub-committees of council;
Treasury Board;
Committee of Internal Economy, House of Commons;
Deputy heads of departments;
Librarians of parliament;
Crown appointments in both houses of parliament;
Governor General's secretary's staff.

This order in council made it a function of the Prime Minister to appoint deputy ministers. I must say that when I came into office I had no knowledge of that particular order in council, and I permitted my colleagues who were ministers of departments to make their own recommendation to the cabinet. This particular order was brought to my attention by the Clerk of the Privy Council after we had been in office some years, and after that time I held still to the practice of permitting my colleagues to choose whom they wished as their deputy ministers, I making the appointment as was my duty in accordance with the order in council of the day. To show that I alone in the case of Mr. Henry, was not the only one to make the appointment of a deputy minister, I will quote from an order in council passed July 14, 1919. This particular order was passed at a time when Mr. Meighen was Prime Minister. It reads:

The committee of the privy council on the recommendation of the president of the privy council advise that Lieut.-Col. John A. Amyot, M.B., C.M.G., of the city of Toronto, be appointed Deputy Minister of Health under the provisions of the act passed at the recent session of parliament, intituled "An act respecting the Department of Health."

Mr. Meighen was president of the Council. Does any hon. member suppose that Mr. Meighen had any ulterior motive in making that particular appointment? He was just carryin out the provisions of his own order in council with respect to the powers of the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Did not my right hon. friend find a copy of that order in council attached to his patent? A copy was attached to mine when I first took office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry but it was not attached to mine. However, I told the Clerk of the House to see to it that a copy was attached to future patents. My right hon. friend is only bearing out what I have said, that he and his colleagues knew when they came into office that deputy ministers were the appointees of the Prime Minister.

I notice it is eleven o'clock. I wonder if it would be agreeable to the house to permit me to continue a little longer so that I may conclude my remarks this evening. It would help to shorten matters as to the conclusion of the session if I might have unanimous consent. I should be glad indeed to rest until to-morrow and continue at that time, but I think the debate could be shortened by my concluding this evening. I am thinking mostly of the convenience of others.

Mr. BENNETT: The matter of adjournment is entirely in the competence of the chamber. If any hon. member desires that the house shall not continue, we will adjourn; if there is no voice to the contrary, we will not adjourn. I am quite willing that the right hon. gentleman be accommodated but I wish he had spoken to me so that I could have made a motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry to have taken as long as I have, but the reading of citations necessitated my doing so. I promise that I shall not be very long in concluding.

I have in my hand another order in council covering the appointment of a deputy minister. This order in council is dated December 11, 1924, which should be far enough removed from any Beauharnois relationship not to have any association with it. It reads as follows:

The committee of the privy council, on the recommendation of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister, advise that William Stuart Edwards, Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice, be appointed to be Deputy Minister of Justice vice Edmund Leslie Newcombe, appointed judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

When that appointment of Mr. Edwards was made, I made it on the advice of my colleague, the then Minister of Justice. He was the proper person to advise me whom he wished to have as his deputy, and I put forward the order.

I have here the order under which I appointed the successor to Mr. Henry, Mr. Valentine Irving Smart. Then here is an order dated July 12, 1928, which reads:

The committee of the privy council, on the recommendation of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister, advise that Mr. William A. Found be appointed Deputy Minister of Fisheries under the authority of section 2, of chapter 62, of the statutes of 1926-27, at a salary—

And so forth. This was the regular way of proceeding. No one would say because I had appointed Mr. Found that there was something which necessitated the bringing of the name of the Prime Minister into the report of a select committee of the commons dealing with a project such as the Beauharnois canal project. This kind of thing, I say, I believe would have been somewhat altered in any careful revision of the report.

May I say in regard to the appointment of Mr. Henry that it would be just as true to say that Major Graham Bell's death, which was the occasion of filling the vacancy of deputy minister was due to some circumstance connected with Beauharnois, as it would be to say that Mr. Henry was appointed because of any association with the Beauharnois interests? I ask hon. members to be reasonable in these matters. Consider the circumstances in which an administration is sometimes faced when very critical questions have to be dealt with. The late Mr. Graham Bell had a knowledge of Canadian railway conditions second to no other man in this country. There were very few who had any intimate knowledge of the railway business generally, of the work of the Department of Railways and Canals, and particularly of the work of the Canadian National Railways. When Mr. Graham Bell died, the Hon. Mr. Dunning, the then Minister of Railways and Canals, was at his wit's end to know where he could get a deputy minister who would be of any help to him when the session come on. It was a session during which a large program with respect to the Canadian National Railways was if possible to be put through parliament, and Mr. Dunning was filled with anxiety as to what he could do to fill that office so as to enable him to go on with that particular program. Mr. Henry had been for years in the Department of Railways and Canals, and was familiar with the general railway organization. He was at the time the economic expert on the Canadian National Railways, and as such knew about the Canadian National Railway system generally. The deputy minister had always been a member of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. He was the link between the two. Mr. Henry helped to fill that particular role as no one else could possibly have filled it at the time it was necessary to fill the vacancy created by Major Bell's death It was for that reason that Mr. Dunning sought to get the services of Mr. Henry.

Mr. Henry has given his own evidence. He has stated that he did not wish to accept the office, that he did not want it, but that Mr. Dunning pressed him and Sir Henry Thornton pressed him in the railway interests. He says that he told Mr. Dunning that he was interested in Beauharnois. Mr. Dunning had said to him: If Beauharnois was going to come before the Department of Railways and Canals in any shape or form he would not allow him to come in, but that the Beauharnois application was before the Department of Public Works and that he would not be asked to have anything to do with the Beauharnois matter. The very day the evidence came out that Mr. Henry was associated with the Sterling Industrial Corporation I asked Mr. Dunning whether that fact had been disclosed to him and whether he had had any knowledge of it, and he said to me that he had no knowledge of it whatsoever, that he did not know of the existence of the Sterling Industrial Corporation when he spoke to Mr. Henry, that until he read the evidence given before the commission he never had had any knowledge of its existence any more than I or, I imagine, any other members of the cabinet had. If he had had the knowledge of what has since been disclosed, I am quite sure he would not have asked, pressing as the circumstances were, to have Mr. Henry fill the position for that time. Mr. Henry had to be persuaded against his own will and wish. He did what he did to oblige the government of the day and to render a much needed public service. He was at the time, as he said himself in giving his evidence, not in a condition physically where he felt he should take on extra burdens, and indeed he had to go into hospital for an operation very shortly after he took the appointment. All the circumstances, to anyone with an unbiased and free mind, make it perfectly clear that Mr. Henry's association with the Department of Railways and Canals was only because of the interests of this country, generously given with regard to its railway problems. It was for a temporary period only, until Mr. Dunning had had time to look around and obtain a successor. Mr. Dunning a little later was transferred to the Department of Finance, upon the death of Mr. Robb, which rendered necessary the keeping on of Mr. Henry for a little longer than would otherwise have been the case. He stayed only to oblige the administration in a critical situation.

Those are the facts. Why unless there is an ulterior political motive, this reference to Mr. Henry's appointment should be brought into the report in a way to appear to reflect upon the head of the government of Canada, I am at a loss to understand. As I say, I would like to support this report in its entirety if it were not for things of this kind, but when one encounters paragraphs of that sort one has to ask oneself: What view is the public going to take of the attitude of anyone who supports a report that contains that kind of insinuation and that kind of reflection?

May I say that the same kind of thing is true with respect to some other of the personal references in the report. Here I feel I come to tread on rather delicate ground. The report makes mention of several persons, some of whom are in public life, some of whom are in the civil service, others of whom are citizens engaged in industrial and other concerns. I have always understood with respect to this parliament that where matters concerned members of the other house it was for that house to concern itself with those particular individuals, that is was not for the members of this House of Commons to pass judgment upon any member of the honourable body of the Senate, any more than it is within the jurisdiction of the Senate to pass judgment upon an honourable member of this house. I do not want it to be assumed that I am trying to shield anyone, or to avoid any discussion, but I have the same responsibility as the Prime Minister has in seeking to maintain the traditions of parliament, traditions that are fundamental, that are based on principle and that may operate in one way to-day as respects hon. members on this side and to-morrow may be operating in the same way as respects hon. members on the other side of the house. For that reason I say I was surprised when I found the report did refer in condemnatory terms to hon. members of the Senate. I would take no exception whatever to the committee taking all of the evidence that it wished to take, bringing it together in its report and making it as pointed and direct and as strong as you please, and saying that this evidence should be submitted to the Senate of Canada—I am speaking now of the evidence that relates to the senators—for that honourable body to deal with. Indeed one of the recommendations of the report is that a copy of the report and the evidence shall be sent officially from this house to the Senate so that the Senate may take cognizance of it. I submit that the Senate is the body that must deal with senators, and that we in this House of Commons have not the right to pass judgment on any member of the other house. I ask, Mr. Speaker, if I am not right in that view. Perhaps it is unnecessary to make an appeal offhand. I will leave it to the sense of the house. All that I want to make perfectly clear is this: I think a mistake is made in the report in presenting the matter in the way it is. Let me repeat, I would not have asked the committee to refrain from making a single statement about anything done by any senator that came out before the committee, but I do say that when they had brought out the evidence, no matter how condemnatory in their opinion it may have been, it was their duty where the evidence reflected upon honourable members of that body to recommend that the evidence be transmitted to the Senate for the Senate itself to deal with. Similarly in the House of Commons I believe we have here to maintain the rule and the tradition in that particular regard. If therefore I do not go into the question of any actions of the senators as referred to in the report it is because I am respecting what I believe to be the rules and the traditions of this parliament. Let me say most emphatically however that with respect to much set forth in the report concerning some of the things which have been done, I believe they are wholly unjustifiable and cannot be defended at any cost. However with the matters contained in the report which pertain to senators it is for the Senate itself to deal.

There is one reference in the report, however to an honourable senator which I believe I should not allow to pass without comment, because it seems to cast a reflection on a hon. member of parliament which the evidence does not justify. I have before me that portion of the report which refers to Senator Raymond. It is to be found at page 638 of the votes and proceedings. Referring specially to subsection 2 of section 15, I quote the following:

> At the conclusion of his evidence one of the members of the committee expressed the view that he ought to be commended for his frankness in giving his evidence.

This is referring to Senator Raymond. Then, a little farther on I find the following:

> It transpired when Mr. Sweezey returned to give further evidence that Senator Raymond had received from Mr. Sweezey some $200,000 of campaign funds for the Liberal party. The commendable frankness would seem to require that Senator Raymond should have disclosed this to the committee if he wished the committee to understand that he was stating fairly his connection between the government and the Beauharnois promoters.

I say that is not the evidence, and not even the inference to be drawn from the evidence. There are in those paragraphs insinuations and implications which under the circumstances are not at all justified. May I direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that Senator Raymond was never asked the question whether or not he received money for campaign funds. Senator Raymond offered to appear before the committee, came of his own volition, was present at the sittings and allowed members of the committee to examine him and ask any questions they wished. He answered every question. I am told that in fact he came back a second time.

May I say to the house that there were other witnesses who had appeared before the committee and had been questioned, but to whom no questions were put concerning campaign funds. Mr. Sweezey himself had been on the stand more than one day. At a later time he was recalled and asked concerning campaign funds, but this was at a time subsequent to that at which Senator Raymond had given his evidence. When Senator Raymond gave his evidence the matter of campaign funds had not been discussed in the committee. Under those circumstances I ask: Was it fair for a committee wishing to be perfectly impartial and judicial to inject this reference into the report:

At the conclusion of his evidence one of the members of the committee expressed the view that he ought to be commended for his frankness in giving his evidence.

There was no need to insert that sentence in the report. It was put in to form an excuse for inserting the following paragraph:

It transpired when Mr. Sweezey returned to give further evidence—

Those are the words, "when Mr. Sweezey returned to give further evidence." Why was that evidence not brought out at the beginning? Hon. members in the committee had knowledge during the several meetings of the facts that they were going to bring out with respect to campaign funds, and with respect to everything else. They had that knowledge before the committee ever met. Why did they not ask Mr. Sweezey about campaign funds when he was questioned at the start?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman realizes that he has omitted the intervening ten lines.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did it because I felt they were not relative to the point I was making.

Mr. BENNETT: On the contrary, they explain what follows.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well, I shall read it all. To my mind they disclose a further reason why this particular part of the report is not at all justified. I shall read the whole thing:

At the conclusion of his evidence one of the members of the committee expressed the view that he ought to be commended for his frankness in giving his evidence. It was, however, later disclosed in evidence that according to the bill of Messrs. Geoffrion and Prud'homme, counsel for the Beauharnois syndicate (exhibit 114) from September 10, 1927, to May 23, 1928, there appear some sixteen entries charging for interviews with and telephones to and from Senator Raymond. An interview appears to have taken place on one occasion with Hon. Mr. Mitchell and on another occasion in Ottawa with Senator McDougald.

(3) On page 391, Mr. Frank P. Jones states: "I certainly asked Senator Raymond over and over again if he could not do something to get action."

Mr. BENNETT: To get "some" action.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, to get some action. To continue reading:

(4) It transpired when Mr. Sweezey returned to give further evidence that Senator Raymond had received from Mr. Sweezey some $200,000 of campaign funds for the Liberal party. The commendable frankness would seem to require that Senator Raymond should have disclosed this to the committee if he wished the committee to understand that he was stating fairly his connection between the government and the Beauharnois promoters.

I say that Senator Raymond was perfectly frank when he appeared before the committee. He answered all questions asked him and he was never asked any question about campaign funds. Had he been asked he would I believe have made then exactly the same answer as he would give to-day. He would have answered in the same straightforward manner in which he gave his evidence before the committee on other matters. I am informed that he came a second time to Ottawa in order to continue his evidence. I really believe there are many hon. members on this side who would like to support the report and make it as nearly unanimous as possible, but how can hon. members on this side support a report with that particular statement in it concerning Senator Raymond, which is in the nature of a reflection, without its being broadcast from coast to coast that the Liberal party this day condemns Senator Raymond for his action? The evidence does not disclose anything which would afford reason for an attitude of that kind.

I should like now to pass on to further matters. I do not wish to take up too much time in a discussion of individual names, but reference has been made to two civil servants and in that connection I think I should speak briefly. The report contains a reference to Mr. J. B. Hunter, Deputy Minister of Public Works, and to Mr. K. M. Cameron, chief engineer of that department. True, the report does not say very much about these gentlemen, but refers to the manner in which they gave their evidence. I feel the statement ought to be made that at all times, civil servants are in a very difficult position. They are in the public service under the direction of ministers, but they are not in positions where they can speak for themselves. A reflection may be cast, in a report such as this, upon two members of the public service, and yet they are not at liberty to so much as come out in the press the next day and make an explanation of their conduct.

I gather that in the committee there was a good deal of questioning of witnesses and it may have been that there was something in the manner of these gentlemen that was not altogether pleasing to members of the committee. But let anyone go through the ordeal of appearing before a parliamentary committee to give evidence, and I should be rather surprised if his manner would be all that one might expect from a person expert in the matter of giving evidence. In this case I submit if these gentlemen gave their evidence in a manner which was not satisfactory the whole purpose would have been served had the minister in charge, the chairman of the committee, spoken to his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, about the manner in which the evidence was being given, and requested the Minister of Public Works to speak to those particular civil servants concerning the manner in which their evidence had been given. That would I believe have been a fair way to deal with public servants, but I do not think it is fair that the names of these two very worthy men who have been in the service of Canada for a long time and who have given excellent service, should be broadcast across Canada, coupled with the kind of thing contained in this report, thereby carrying the inference that in some way they too were connected with what there may be in the way of scandal revealed therein.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is another reason why I should hesitate to approve fully of the report in its present form, strongly as I am prepared to endorse most of what it contains.

That concludes about all I wish to say at the moment with respect to individuals whose names are mentioned. I come now to the concluding portion of my remarks which deal with the matter of political organization and campaign funds. At this point I shall ask hon. members to allow me to review the situation, as did the Minister of Immigration, in its true perspective. I wish to state my own position as head of the party I have the honour to lead, and from the standpoint of my relation to the whole question of political organization.

I was chosen leader of the Liberal party at the national convention in 1919—chosen by the votes of the majority present at the convention, which happily included a majority of the then members of the Liberal party in the House of Commons. On some previous occasions leaders have been chosen only from the parliamentary group. My right hon. friend was chosen at a great convention of his party. I think he is the first leader of his party who has been chosen in that way. I mention this matter simply because it has some bearing upon the question of the organization of a political party. The proceedings of that convention have been published, and are available to all hon. members of this house. In the proceedings are given the two-fold purpose of the convention: (1) to choose a leader; (2) to arrange for party organization. Page 12 reads as follows:

> In the official call for the national Liberal convention it is stated that the second purpose for which the convention is to be held will be to deal with the question of party organization. The importance of party organization was, therefore, present to the minds of those who prepared the official call, and it should not occupy a lesser place in the minds of those who may be given an opportunity to deal with the subject either as members of a committee or in the convention as a whole.

The convention took up the question of party organization, and it was decided that there should be a national committee of which the leader of the party would be the president or honorary president, there were to be vice-presidents from the different provinces, and a committee of fifty odd in number. There was to be a national Liberal organization office to be established in the city of Ottawa, which would have charge of organization and information. Mr. Haydon had been secretary of the national convention. He generously consented to act as secretary of this office. Probably I am wrong in saying he acted as secretary; I think he was to be general counsel, although he assumed in large part the obligations of secretary. That was in 1919. The work of carrying on such publicity as was issued on behalf of the party was centred in this office, and when political campaigns came on those who were associated with the office had to do with those campaigns.

There were by-elections prior to the general election of 1921. With regard to those by-elections, as leader of the party I had no knowledge whatsoever of the organization of the campaigns, I did not regard it as part of my duty as leader of the party to have to do with the work of organizing political campaigns. I could never have hoped to fill the position of leader of my party in this house had I, in addition to the duties of preparing for the subjects of debate here and the obligation of speaking publicly throughout the country, to take charge of political campaigns

I simply could not have done it even if it had been expected of me as a political leader, which it was not. I had nothing to do with the organization of the by-elections prior to 1921. When the general election of 1921 came on, I had no knowledge whatever of how that campaign was managed—I went where I was told to go to speak by those who had direction of the campaign. I had just about all I could do to get together the material that was needed for speaking in that campaign from one end of the country to the other.

How could I, as leader of the Liberal party at that time, having had very little experience in public life, have taken charge of such organization work? I was returned to parliament in 1908, and during the greater part of that year I was in the orient. When I arrived back in Ottawa before the end of the session the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier honoured me by taking me into his cabinet, and I continued as Minister of Labour until 1911. I was busy with my departmental work during that time and was not dealing with questions of political organization. While I was out of parliament after 1911, I had for a time to do with some of the publicity work of the party, writing pamphlets, and also editing the Liberal monthly publication. But during the time I held the position no election campaigns took place, and I had no knowledge of the organization of political campaigns. When I came back into parliament in 1919, I had had very little in the way of political experience. With such ability as I had it required just about all the time and resource I could command to master the questions that presented themselves for debate and discussion without attempting in addition to deal with election campaigns. So during the campaign of 1921 I had no knowledge whatever of who contributed to the campaign funds or how the campaign was conducted.

Now, what was true of the by-elections prior to 1921 was equally true of all by-elections which took place subsequent to 1921; what was true of the general election of 1921 was equally true of the general election of 1925, the general election of 1926 and the general election of 1930—the position was exactly the same. With respect to the political organization of the party or the knowledge of its affairs in 1930 my attitude was no different from that which it had been in previous years. There was no reason why it should be. I held to the position which I hold to at this moment, and which I say is the only true position that a political leader can take—that there must be a division of labour in a political party, that it is the duty of the political head of the party to see to matters of policy, to be able to discuss questions on the floor of parliament and throughout the country; but that it is not his business to get out the literature of the party, nor is it his business to organize political campaigns. Such work belongs to the rank and file of the party and to those who will act on their behalf.

In that particular may I say that I believe I am following the tradition which has always been followed in British politics. Will anyone say—I will not speak of those who are in active politics to-day, and I will not speak of those who have been politically active in this country, but I will speak of some of the great political leaders in Great Britain who have passed away. Will anyone say that Mr. Gladstone had supervision of the organization of the Liberal party and its campaigns in England during the time he was Prime Minister and leader of the party?

Mr. BENNETT: The records show that he had a most intimate knowledge of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says that Mr. Gladstone had the most intimate knowledge of the organization of his party. That is a surprise. However it helps bring us to the point that I wish to develop. Will anyone say that Lord Salisbury had a most intimate knowledge of the organization of the Conservative party, that he knew who contributed to the funds of the party, that he knew about all the contributions that were being made to the political funds of his party? Will anyone say that Mr. Asquith had that intimate knowledge?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will anyone say that Mr. Bonar Law had that intimate knowledge?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will anyone say that Lord Balfour had that intimate knowledge?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister says, "Yes"?

Mr. BENNETT: I am saying that all the Prime Ministers of Great Britain since Lord Salisbury—I am not speaking in relation to him—had the most intimate knowledge of the matters to which the right hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, that is a surprise to me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is to everybody.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot speak for the organization of the Conservative party, in Great Britain, but I can speak of the Liberal organization in that country because I know a little of how it is carried on. I took care at the time I became leader, to ascertain what was the practice followed in Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my right hon. friend knows that Mr. Lloyd George has control of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and I am glad my right hon. friend has spoken of that. I will have a word to say in that regard, because it brings out the essential difference between our points of view. In England the organization of the Liberal party was a development of the national federation. Its secretary was Mr. Robert Hudson, a gentleman who subsequently became Sir Robert Hudson. For a third of a century he was secretary of the national Liberal federation, an organization of the party as a whole whose affairs were controlled by representatives of the party from all parts of England. He was also secretary of another special council which had to do with political matters, the Liberal Central Association. This national federation carried on the work of the Liberal party throughout the country and in the constituencies; it had to do with the sending out of literature, the placing of speakers and the organizing of political campaigns. In parliament the whips of the party had their own organization in association with the Prime Minister, but that organization had nothing to do with political campaigns. The whole work of political campaigning, as I have said, was kept separate and distinct from the Prime Minister and his associates; they may have been in touch with it but it would have been impossible for any prime minister to attempt to grasp all the details.

I do not ask hon. members to accept my word for this. I hold in my hand a volume which is a memoir of Sir Robert Hudson, published by Mr. J. A. Spender, who for many years was editor of the Westminster Gazette and who is well known as the distinguished author amongst many other works of the Life and Times of Campbell-Bannerman and other volumes entitled "The Public Life." This memoir of Sir Robert Hudson contains a statement of the organization of the Liberal party in England over a period of forty years. If hon. members wish to know about the organizer and his work they will find in chapter 3 a full account of how the organizing is carried on, under the following headings:

Appointment as secretary to the N.L.F.; A dual office; The Liberal central association and its functions; A working partnership; Robert's friendships and their value; The duties of the secretary; Visitors to the office; Supplying candidates; Arranging public meetings; Difficulties with the star performers; Providing "literature;" The Liberal publication department; The Liberal magazine.

That chapter contains a complete statement of the organizer and his work in connection with the Liberal party in England. Then there is another chapter which goes even more fully into the matter we are now considering. It has to do with the Liberal party and its finances. This subject is discussed under the following headings:

Asquith at Dean's Yard; Work at Abingdon Street; Anxiety and hope; The financial storm-centre; The 1923 election; The Lloyd George fund; Negotiations with Mr. Lloyd George; The disaster of 1924; The million fund; Its difficulties; The general strike and Lord Oxford's resignation; Renewed negotiations with Mr. Lloyd George; Their outcome; Resignation of officers.

This chapter makes clear that the split in the Liberal party of England, which is more or less irretrievable, was the result of the introduction into Liberal politics of a plan of organization by one of the political heads of that party which had never existed previously. Mr. Lloyd George, who had been head of the Union government, acquired control of a campaign fund which, as is generally known, was largely derived from the sale of titles. They get their campaign funds in one way or another in the old country as well as in this country. Over there they got them largely from the sale of titles, and when Mr. Lloyd George had this fund he carried it with him away from his position as head of the Union government to his position as leader of the Liberal party. The Liberals who were of the old school, and who believed in the party itself looking after its own organization, were not satisfied with that sort of dictatorship. It shocked their sense of independence, they felt that it gave a political leader who had all the power in his own hands, the right to dictate policies, to control constituencies and to make conditions in a dozen and one ways with respect to the general business of the party. They thought no political leader should have any such power, at least in the Liberal party, so they decided to issue a call asking the Liberals of England to subscribe to a million pound fund.

What was the result of that call? The Liberals of England asked, "What about this fund Mr. Lloyd George has? They said: We do not intend to subscribe a million pounds while the party has a fund as large as that in the possession of Mr. Lloyd George." The leaders of the party could not very well explain that Mr. Lloyd George was attaching all sorts of conditions to the use of that fund, and through their inability to give any explanation of the kind they were unable to gather in subscriptions to any appreciable amount. The result has been that large numbers of Liberals have left Mr. Lloyd George altogether simply because they do not wish to have at the head of their party anyone who has complete control of the party purse.

This is where the difference and a complete divergence arises between my right hon. friend and myself in connection with what has been said to-night. He is perfectly sincere in his point of view; I am equally sincere in mine, and this house and this country will have to judge as to which holds the correct view. My right hon. friend says that as political head of his party he should have full knowledge of all the funds of the party, that he should know—

Mr. BENNETT: When has he said that, and where?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But is not that what I am to gather?

Mr. BENNETT: I ask the right hon. gentleman where and when he said it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the remarks of my right hon. friend to-night meant anything they were to the effect that he blamed me for not having a knowledge—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not blame my right hon. friend for anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought so.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not yet blamed the right hon. gentleman for anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then let us understand each other; that is what I want to get at. Does my right hon. friend hold a view different from mine? I take the position that it is not part of the duty or obligation of a leader of a political party to have to do with the organization of political campaigns or to possess an inventory of those who make contributions to party funds. That is my view; does my right hon. friend hold a different view?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BENNETT: I have always held that the receiver of stolen goods was a criminal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I notice that whenever my right hon. friend is asked a direct question, the reply to which is of importance, he usually evades it by some very smart remark such as the one to which we have just listened. I do not think the country will find in my hon. friend's answer anything that will satisfy it with respect to his views as to the obligation of the leader of a political party with respect to its funds and its organization for party purposes.

I want to explain, as I think I have explained, wherein there certainly is a difference in point of view with respect to the ownership or control of a fund by the political head of a party and the funds of a party being controlled by the party itself. The view I hold is that with respect to any funds relating to campaign purposes it is not the duty of the leader of the political party to have to do with these matters. It is for the party organization formed expressly for the purpose by the party itself.

Now may I go a step further. This memoir of Sir Robert Hudson contain appreciations of the work done by the secretary of the Liberal organization, and I want to read a few words from these appreciations because they confirm what I have all along held to be the relationship between the secretary of the national organization and whoever might hold the office of Prime Minister or leader of the party. I quote from page 187:

> In his dual capacity of secretary of the national Liberal federation and secretary of the Liberal central association, Robert at the time of his death had had a longer continuous association with the intimate affairs of a great political party than any man then living. His service stretched back to the days when Mr. Gladstone was in the plenitude of his power, and Mr. Chamberlain the enthusiastic leader of the Radical left-wing; he was appointed to the highest place in the administration of the Liberal party when Mr. Gladstone was still on the scene, and remained at his post for thirty-three years in intimate relations with three prime ministers and a succession of leaders and whips, by all of whom he was trusted and respected. Though he died in the prime of life, the years in which he lived were crowded with events of overwhelming importance, and he had an inner vision of them and of the chief actors in them vouchsafed to very few men of his generation.

There is a true picture of one who holds the office of chief organizer of a political party formed on the lines I have indicated. Here is a further word that throws a little light on the relations of an organizer to his party:

> So far as Robert was concerned, life behind the scenes was one of cheerful and loyal comradeship between men who honestly believed in the policy and principles of their party, and were convinced that in serving it they were serving their country.

In this report that has been brought down there are many references to Senator Haydon, and over and over again, in what has appeared in the public press, reference has been made to the fact that Senator Haydon was a close personal friend of my own. It would be strange indeed if Senator Haydon had not been a close personal friend of my own. He was a close personal friend and is a close personal friend of mine; he was a friend throughout the years that he held the position of secretary of the national office and before that time. And may I say that if I were asked to describe the relationship between us, as I have believed it to be all the time, I would do so in the words which are used here by Mr. Spender in reference to the one who held the office of chief organizer of the Liberal party in Britain. So far as Senator Haydon's relationship and my own was concerned——life behind the scenes was one of cheerful and loyal comradeship between men who honestly believed in the policy and principles of their party, and were convinced that in serving it they were serving their country.

What else is said in this volume by way of appreciation of this man who was chief organizer of his party?

The confidence that Hudson at once inspired in men, even rich men, wary of their pockets, was extraordinary. Rich men would give him thousands when they would not have given prime ministers a penny piece, and yet Hudson had nothing to offer them in return save his good-will, for the federation possessed neither patronage nor power, and never attempted, or would have been allowed, to interfere with the arrangements of the whips' room.

That is the position in England. The chief organizer of the party had to do with the obtaining of party funds and he obtained them from different persons. Mr. Spender, who has perhaps a more intimate knowledge of the politics of Great Britain than any other living man, certainly than any other Liberal in Great Britain, says that there were men who gave the chief organizer thousands when they would not have given a prime minister a cent. And yet so scrupulously careful were they in Britain, or have been so far as I can judge, to prevent political leaders from being placed in a position of embarrassment through knowledge of what contributions may be made to party funds, that, as the writer says here, the organizer——had nothing to offer them in return save his good will; for the confederation possessed neither patronage nor power, and never attempted, or would have been allowed, to interfere with the arrangements of the whips' room.

May I say with regard to Senator Haydon that he possessed neither patronage nor power, nor would he have been permitted to interfere nor would he have thought of interfering in any way with the duty of the Prime Minister and his colleagues. That is the position; and I cannot make it too clear that, so far as the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the late administration were concerned, they were attending to the business of government, attending to their duties as ministers of the crown, and were not concerning themselves with the question of raising party funds or of working out party campaigns. They may have assisted. But the fact that contributions were made to a party campaign fund, no matter what their amount, cannot possibly carry with it, except to those who are inclined to think in that way, the inference that these funds were going to influence at any time either the present or any future action of the administration of the day.

I was struck, in reading this book, with a remark about the way Sir Robert Hudson felt in regard to this obnoxious and thankless business of collecting political campaign funds, and obtaining moneys wherewith to run the organization. It discloses how difficult it is in England or elsewhere to obtain funds. Here is a paragraph which appears at page 174:

Robert felt his position as treasurer of the federation to be becoming intolerable and more than once in 1925 and 1926 he warned the federation that he would be unable to go on unless the response was more generous. "As for money," he told Maclean at the end of 1926, "the answer is simple, there ain't none."

I speak in the presence of members of my party who were members in the last session of the last parliament. I wish to tell this house what I said to them when I spoke in caucus in the spring of 1930. I had asked Senator Haydon why it was that, despite the fact that we were labouring night and day in this parliament to make our policies known, we could not get a leaflet published which we could distribute among the electorate. We had the Dunning budget which we were bringing in and we wanted to have the electors acquainted with the details of that budget and the policies that underlay it. So far as the Liberal information office was concerned, there was no money for the purpose of getting out any publications. I confess that if there is one thing above another that has been a heartbreak in the task of leadership of the political party which I have led in these last few years, it has been that, labour as some of us would in this House of Commons, and on the platform and elsewhere, the great body of men and women throughout the country who call themselves Liberals have not seen their way to send into the organization contributions in amount sufficient to enable us to issue our literature.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends opposite laugh. Perhaps they find it easy to get political party funds. They have on their side many interests which unfortunately, because of our policies, we are obliged to oppose, and we do not find it so easy. Indeed, we find it as difficult to get pennies as they do to get dollar bills. They may laugh, but that is the position. We have had great difficulty. What did I say to my own followers in parliament at the caucus to which I refer? I said that I felt my responsibility as leader of the party to let the members of the parliamentary party know that in the event of a campaign at some future date we might find that we would not be as successful as we believed our cause entitled us to be, for no other reason than that nothing was going out to the country in the form of literature. I directed their attention to the Victoria building across the way, in which my right hon. friend and his friends, for months, had offices with a staff of some fifteen clerks, if I am not incorrectly informed. They had offices from which there issued literature not by the pound but by the ton, which they sent out broadcast. I called attention to the fact that while our political opponents were spreading broadcast their political ideas and aims, and misrepresenting ours, nothing was being done by our own party to further a knowledge of its purposes and aims; and I pointed out to the members of the party how necessary it was that they should all do what they could to arouse public interest, that we might secure at least something to enable us to carry on

Does that look like a political party under obligations to power companies or other concerns? That was more than a year after the approval of the Beauharnois company's plans. That was the position of the party at that time. If mistakes have been made in accepting funds which never should have been accepted in a political campaign, it has been a very serious error in judgment, but this error has grown out of the fact that things have been done in the heat of a campaign possibly through a feeling of desperation brought about by the competition with which the party was faced which would never have been thought of or dreamed of at any other time. I do not say that to mitigate what has been done; I do not mitigate it in the least, but there is a reason for everything, and that I submit was the reason in this case.

May I say to my right hon. friend that I have stated quite frankly my point of view as to the organization of political campaigns and the duty of a leader with respect to political campaign funds. I hold the view I do for two reasons. The first one is the one which I have already given, namely, that it would be humanly impossible for me as the leader of the Liberal party to attempt to do my duty in this House of Commons and deal with the questions which are before us if I were to be continually harassed through having to do with questions of party organization and political campaigns. I could not have done it in the past, I cannot do it now, and I will not do it in the future. Unless the party of which I am the head can find some means of having the work of publicity and organization carried on without my being responsible for it, and for the organization of political campaigns then all I can say is that they will have to find someone else to lead the party. It would be an impossible task for any man who is in this particular position and I have always so indicated to members of the party ever since I have been its leader.

But I have another reason. I think I have some faith in my own integrity and in my purpose in public life. I would not care to have to deal with the questions with which this house has to deal and be possessed of an inventory of those who had contributed to the party funds. I would not care to know who the men were or what the amounts were which they had given for purposes of political campaigns. I want to make a distinction with respect to the issuing of literature and for the work of the Liberal information office from month to month and from year to year. I have time and again asked leading members of the party if they would not make some small contribution in order to help out with our literature, and a very few friends of the party have been generous in that regard. I felt that that was a perfectly legitimate thing to do. These names and amounts can be made public at any time; these contributions have been made in order to help the party publish what literature it has been in a position to get out. All the time that I have been the leader of the party I have never asked a single individual to make a contribution to a political campaign. I have had no knowledge of what the political campaign funds were. As I have said, I cannot see how a political leader could have in his pocket an inventory of the contributions made by those who have to do with one interest or another interest and at the same time hope to be free from any kind of influence in his dealing with many of the questions which might come up in the house.

The following statement is made in the report, as appears on page 634 of votes and proceedings. I read this to bring out the difference between my hon. friend and myself in the way in which I think it should be understood. The report reads:

There was also a suggestion with reference to a proposed contribution to the Conservative federal campaign fund through its organizer General McRae. This, however, was not made. Asked if the reason for its not having been made was that Mr. Bennett would not accept it, Mr. Sweezey in his reply said "I do not know that but I presume that may be so."

The evidence upon which that statement in the report is based will be found at page 823. The following are questions asked of Mr. Sweezey:

Q. Was there any proposal indicating a contribution to the federal campaign fund through its organizer, General McRae?—A. Yes, a proposal came to me at one time to make a contribution.

Q. Of how much?—A. Of $200,000.

Q. Was it made?—A. No.

Q. Why?—A. I do not know what happened.

Q. I understand that Mr. Bennett would not accept it?

How did Mr. White get that information? How did he know in advance of the witness? Had Mr. Bennett told him that he would not accept it? Had he asked him to ask that question? The answer given is as follows:

A. I do not know that, but I presume that may be so.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Lennox and not Mr. White appears to have asked those questions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my right hon. friend. My right hon. friend had knowledge of the contribution that was made or at least of the fact that this Beauharnois company had been asked for a contribution of $200,000, and it is intimated he said that it was not to be accepted. Was there an exception in the case of Beauharnois with regard to political contributions? Was Beauharnois the one case that my right hon. friend knew about or did he know about all contributions to the party fund? I hope he will tell us this when he speaks on this subject. Did he ask his organizer to tell him who were contributing and how much they were contributing? Did anyone come to him to find out whether or not a contribution should be received? He may have had this information, but if he had I do not know what view he himself or the country will take of the fact that these contributions must have come in a large part from those engaged in industry in this country. I have implicit faith in the integrity of my right hon. friend. I do not say for any reason other than this, I honour him in his position. I honour him as a man and I have faith in his integrity, but I think he renders himself open to very serious misunderstanding from one end of this country to the other if he tells the people of Canada that he has an inventory of those who contributed during the last elections to the funds of the Conservative party; that he knows the amounts which were received, that he said they were to be received from this person or from that and were not to be received from other persons. We have been dealing with many matters during the present parliament. Both at the special session and the present session the tariff has been raised—raised very high indeed. It will be remembered that Mr. Sweezey told the committee that contributions were made to political parties not for favours which were past but for favours to come. Having that thought in mind, I ask hon. members to ask themselves this question: If it be true that my right hon. friend had knowledge of all who were contributors to his party fund, what will the country be thinking to-day of the changes which have been made in the tariff in connection with cottons, in connection with woollens, in connection with rayon and silk? What about iron and steel, boots and shoes, gasoline, magazines, sugar refining; what about income taxes, what about agricultural manufacturers, what about motor car manufacturers and what about electrical goods manufacturers?

Let me hasten to add that my right hon. friend—

Mr. BENNETT: That is disgraceful.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say that I do not believe my right hon. friend—

Mr. BENNETT: My right hon. friend has been talking all evening about insinuations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking directly; there are no insinuations in this.

Mr. BENNETT: It is full of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The extent to which there can possibly be insinuation depends on whether or not my right hon. friend has gained from everyone who has contributed to his party exact knowledge of how much they contributed. There is not an insinuation of that on my part. I am speaking of how the country may view matters however upright and good my right hon. friend's intentions may be. The difference between him and me is this, he may feel that as Prime Minister he can have a knowledge of how much has been contributed to the party funds by the different members of his party and yet keep free from any kind of direct or indirect feeling, conscious or unconscious, with respect to the matters in which those who have made contributions may be interested. Perhaps he is able so to do. Perhaps he can hold that position, but I say to him that I think the country would feel in a much happier frame of mind if it believed that my right hon. friend did not know what contributions had been made by the textile industries, did not know what contributions had been made by wealthy men with large incomes, did not know what contributions had been made by some of those concerns getting subsidies and other benefits at the present time. I repeat, I am not reflecting on the integrity of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: What are you saying it for, then, if not for that purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am trying my best to make clear the difference between my right hon. friend's point of view with regard to political funds and my own. Either he knows what contributions were made to his party, or he does not. I say that the view that I take of a prime minister's obligation is that it is not part of his duty, and it must not be expected of him, to know what contributions have been made to political campaign funds. I may be wrong in that, but that is the position I take.

May I add this? I do not see how anyone could possibly be expected to know what contributions are being made to party funds. After all, is the Prime Minister going to be told everything? Some things come from one source, others from another source, some in direct ways, others in indirect ways. How can he possibly know? I think any doctrine that the Prime Minister should know is as unfair to those who make political contributions as to those who ask for them. Many a man might wish to contribute to his party and the policies it advocates, but if he knew that the leader was going to know what his contribution was he might hesitate to make a contribution, feeling that it would be embarrassing both to him and to the head of the government. I just want to say apart from all else that during the years I was Prime Minister I had not the time to keep myself familiar with these matters of organization, There is no use pretending or being hypocritical in the matter. The truth is it could not have been done and was an impossibility.

I want to answer a question or two that come concretely to the point in this matter. In the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, July 23, 1931, there is an article which is headed, "Mr. Mackenzie King and Beauharnois." The first part of that article has reference to my own personal honour as leader of the opposition. I should like to thank the Ottawa Journal for what it has said in regard to myself personally, as I do thank as well other publications both on the Conservative and the Liberal side which have been generous enough to say a word at this time with respect to what they believed to be the personal honour of one who has held the office of Prime Minister in this country for nearly ten years. However, I have not referred to the article for that purpose. I have referred to it for the purpose of answering four questions which it asks in the editorial and which it says I should answer. The article in this particular reads:

> In the matter of campaign funds, and in the particular matter of that $700,000 which Mr. Sweezey handed over to Senators Haydon and Raymond, Mr. King's position is not so happy. Here, we think, the country will want to know the answer to those questions:
> 1. Upon whose credentials did Senators Raymond and Haydon obtain Mr. Sweezey's money?

My answer to that is that I do not know. Senator Haydon was known to be and had been known to be for years the organizer and treasurer of the party, so far as Ottawa and the general work was concerned. I assume that he would naturally be thought of as the one to whom contributions should be made. As hon. members well know, in political campaigns a great many are only too anxious to be the collectors of political funds, and I think it is fortunate for a political party when it is known that only one or two men have the right to receive contributions. The province of Quebec, so far as the Liberal party is concerned, whether it relates to the Dominion or the province, has always preferred to manage its own affairs, and in that province Senator Raymond acted as treasurer for the party—a very difficult task, a very obnoxious task in many ways, but assumed by him as his share of the party's work in a political campaign, and generously assumed.

> 2. Did Mr. King authorize them to go to Mr. Sweezey?

My answer to that is no, I did not, nor did I know they had gone to Mr. Sweezey.

3. If not, did Mr. King know that they were going to Mr. Sweezey and did he know that they got the $700,000, and that his party was using it?

My answer to that has already been given, and it is an emphatic no.

4. Whether Mr. King, assuming that he did not know anything about the Beauharnois contribution, should not have considered it his duty to find out from what sources his party was being financed?

I think I have answered that last question. I may be in the wrong in my answer. The country will have to judge, and this house will have to judge, but my answer is this, and it will continue to be this as long as I have to do with the Liberal party: I simply cannot undertake to assume responsibility for the organization of political campaigns and to pretend to have a knowledge of who are making contributions to them. I agree that some way will have to be found to help make more effective the supervision of such funds, and I shall gladly cooperate with anyone towards that end, but so far as I am concerned there will have to be someone else take on the task of leadership if that particular job is expected of the leader of the party, particularly during the time one might be holding the office of Prime Minister.

May I just say a further word in regard to this matter? Some of the papers of the country have been saying that the Liberal party has been brought into disgrace by what has taken place. After all, it is an unfortunate fact with regard to most things in human life, that no matter how good the cause may be, no matter how true and honourable and honest the great body of men and women are who are supporting a cause, every now and then something happens which is not creditable, and the party as a whole or the group as a whole have to suffer as a consequence. During the period of the great war when men were fighting for liberty and giving their lives for the cause, things happened to the commissariat which were most discreditable. There were scandals in connection with the food that was supplied, in connection with the boots and shoes supplied, even in connection with the munitions supplied, scandals which everyone deplored, and I am sure no one more than those who belonged to the great army in the fighting forces. But will anyone say that because some of the army organization or those connected with it did things that were not creditable, that their actions brought the whole army into disgrace or that the great cause for which they were fighting had suffered thereby. No one could deplore more than I do what has been revealed in this inquiry. I am glad if it was there to bring out, that everything has come out that has come out. I would much rather have everything known than that anything should be concealed with no end of rumours and suspicions continually afloat. What I want to say is this. Individual members of the Liberal party may have done what they should not have done, But the whole party is not thereby disgraced. The party is not disgraced, but it is in the valley of humiliation. I tell the people of this country today that as its leader I feel humiliated, and I know my following feel humiliated. I have told them so in caucus, that we are in the valley of humiliation. But we are going to come out of that valley, not in any boasting way, but with a determination to see to it that so far as the cause of Liberalism in this country is concerned, it will advance forward to higher and stronger and better ground than it has ever occupied in the past.

The report concludes with certain recommendations. There is no time to go into them in detail; but may I say I am quite prepared to accept them with the qualification that their final acceptance will depend upon the legislation to be based upon them. As they stand, the recommendations of the committee are:

1. That the parliament of Canada take such action as may be within its power, and without prejudicing the rights of the province of Quebec, to procure the development of this project in such a manner as will best serve the people of Canada.

2. That should the rights of the Dominion and the province of Quebec come in conflict, every effort be put forth to arrive at a satisfactory agreement, so that the project may not be imperilled by delay.

3. That definite action be taken to preserve the rights of navigation and the complete jurisdiction of parliament in respect thereto.

4. That the order of reference, the reports of the committee, the minutes of proceedings, the minutes of the evidence taken, and the exhibits filed, be printed as an appendix to the Journals of the house.

5. That a copy of this report be remitted to the Speaker of the Senate for the information of that house.

6. That such of the exhibits as have not been read into the record and are not on departmental files and were referred to be copied and the originals thereof be returned to the person producing the same.

I endorse all of those recommendations, but I will reserve to myself and to the members of my party the right to decide, when my hon. friend brings down his legislation, whether it comes within the lines of the recommendations here laid down.

I wish now to conclude, Mr. Speaker, what I have to say. A committee has been sitting which has revealed the source of the campaign funds of the Liberal party in the last general election. I believe the country feels and I know I feel, that as regards campaign funds only part of the story, and a very small part, has been told. The country is demanding to-day that this inquiry which has been started shall not be permitted to drop at the point it has now reached, but that it shall be continued, and continued in a more thorough and more impartial manner than it has thus far been conducted. What I believe the country wants, and what I ask my right hon. friend to grant, is a royal commission to go into the question of party campaign funds, the sources of those funds and the cost of conducting political campaigns, and to investigate not only the election of 1930, but the elections of 1925 and 1926 as well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In that connection I do not believe the country will be satisfied with a commission which would consist of one judge or one commissioner appoined by my right hon. friend himself. It will expect that there shall be a commission on which all parties in this house will feel they have a voice in the choice of the commissioners, and also that they have representation by way of counsel. What I recommend and ask the government to do is this: To appoint a royal commission of three judges. I would recommend that my right hon. friend as leader of the Conservative party name one of the commissioners; I would ask that as leader of the Liberal party I should be allowed to name another, and that the so-called independent group in this house should name the third commissioner. I would recommend that the right be given to each of the three groups to have its own solicitor who may act in an advisory capacity, and that such a commission should go into the whole question of the sources of campaign funds of the last general election and the elections of 1925 and 1926. I say nothing short of that will satisfy the people. If it is not done, the country will increasingly come to the conclusion that the purpose of the select committee has been not so much to gain information concerning the Beauharnois canal project as to bring out certain facts known in advance concerning what has been done by one or two members of the Liberal party in order that the Conservative party might be shielded with respect to what it has done in political campaigns.

I am not making any charges, but I think the country will be interested in knowing how large contributions have been, what individual contributions have been, what every member who has contributed to the party has given. After all, it is not merely the fact that individuals contribute but the amounts which are given which are of importance during election times. A contribution of half a million dollars—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends opposite laugh, but the contribution of half a million dollars, whether it comes from an individual who is a member of his party in the House of Commons or from a company outside of parliament, is still a contribution of half a million dollars, and serves exactly the same purposes.

An hon. MEMBER: Make it three-quarters of a million.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends opposite probably know more about amounts than I do; I am not directing my remarks to particular amounts.

May I add that I believe it is a great mistake that the public should have the idea that because campaign funds are large, and large amounts are contributed, that they are used for the purposes of corrupting the electorate or for buying votes. I do not believe of late campaign funds have been used in that way by any of the political parties in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members opposite seem doubtful. Again I say that probably they know better than anybody else. I ask anyone to recall the last general election and consider what was spent for advertising, what was spent for radio broadcasting, what was spent for party literature, and just try to imagine its total cost. I ask anyone to think of the last election, to consider the expenditures visible to the eyes of anyone, and then ask whether for every dollar the Liberal party spent there were not ten dollars spent by the party opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We would be in a position to find those things out for ourselves if my right hon. friend would grant the commission I am now asking for in the name of the country.

I think that not only should there be a royal commission to go into the matter of party campaign funds from the ground up, so that if at all possible we may have the matter cleared up once and for all, but as soon as the next session of parliament meets there should be appointed a select committee of the house to consider the Dominion Elections Act, and see if in some way it is not possible to have that act further amended so as to render unnecessary, to as large a degree as possible, the collection of moneys for campaign purposes. I make that suggestion in the interests of every hon. member in the house, in the interest of every future candidate, in the interests of every political party, and in the public interest. I would suggest the establishment of a permanent register which would record the name of every elector who is entitled to vote, such register to be kept up to date by the chief electoral officer so that when there is a by-election or a general election no money will have to be spent to make out voters' lists, or for other like purposes. May I add that when in office we considered the register idea, and had time permitted would have put it into force. I had consulted with Colonel Biggar, who had to do with the drafting of the elections act some years ago and he told me that two years at least would be required to put such legislation into effect. There was not time before the general election to bring it into effect, but the government now in office might have time to deal with the matter.

In addition to the suggestions I have made there should be a measure to make it the law of the land that voting shall be compulsory. Under such a law every voter would be expected to go to the polls and record his vote, whether he marked his ballot for one party or for another, or simply sent it in in blank. It is the duty of every one to vote, a first duty of citizenship; and if the last two measures I have mentioned were put into effect I believe they would go a long way towards putting an end to the necessity of campaign funds and everything associated with them. In the third place, if any way can be found of limiting the amounts of subscriptions to be given by individuals, companies or corporations, and any way of giving increased publicity to whatever is given, I believe such measures would be very much in the public interest.

It would be a grave mistake, after the inquiry has gone so far, if the matter were allowed to rest as it now stands. The public conscience in Canada has been aroused, and we should take advantage of that fact to see that as much information and as much light as possible is thrown on the whole matter of party organization and campaign funds, and that legislation be enacted to ensure at election time hereafter as little necessity as possible for campaign funds. If we do that, then possibly some great good will come of the inquiry which has been held, and which has been such a heartbreak to many of us on this side of the house.

On motion of Mr. Woodsworth the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 12.20 a.m. (Friday).

Friday, July 31, 1931.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a question was raised by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) as to the instructions, commission, and letters patent issued to His Excellency the Governor General. The facts are that the commission appointing the Earl of Bessborough as Governor General of Canada was issued by His Majesty on March 20, 1931, and countersigned by the Prime Minister of Canada. It empowered the Governor General to exercise the powers contained in the letters patent issued on June 15, 1905, or in any other letters patent issued thereafter in accordance with such instructions as had already been given, or might hereafter be given.

On March 23, 1931, His Majesty, on the advice of His Majesty's government in Canada, issued new letters patent and instructions. The letters patent and instructions were gazetted on July 25. The commission has not hitherto been gazetted.

I lay on the table copies of the relevant documents.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

DISTRICT SUPERVISOR OF BEEF GRADING—CALGARY

Mr. BURY:

1. Was John W. Cahill, district supervisor of beef grading, Calgary, a naturalized British subject when he first made application for the position?
2. When was he appointed to this position?
3. When did he make application to the Civil Service Commission?
4. When was he naturalized?
5. How many applicants were there for this position?
6. How many were qualified and placed on the eligible list?

7. Give names and dates of appointments?
8. Who was the Department of Agriculture representative named to be a member of the examining board?
9. What officers of the Department of Agriculture signed the examining board report?
10. What other competitions have been held since that date for this position by the Civil Service Commission?
11. How many applications were received?
12. Give the names of the successful candidates, in the order in which they were placed by the Civil Service Commission?
13. Were either or both of these applicants in the first competition?
14. If so, why were they not placed on the eligible list?

Return tabled forthwith.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale) moved concurrence in the first report of the joint committee on the library of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

WORLD WHEAT CONFERENCE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): A few days ago an hon. member asked if we had received any report in connection with the standing committee of the conference of the wheat exporting countries held in London recently. I now have three copies which I propose to table, and in doing so, I shall make a short statement as it has been received from London:

The first session of the standing committee of the conference of the wheat exporting countries was held in London at the office of the High Commissioner for Canada from the 6th to the 10th of July, 1931. Official representatives of the following countries were present: Argentina, Australia, Bulgaria, Canada, Hungary, India, Poland, Roumania, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United States of America.

It will be recalled that the standing committee was instructed by the wheat conference, which met in London on the 27th of May, 1931, to submit to the governments of the countries participating in that conference a definite proposal for establishing a clearing house of information to serve the wheat exporting countries.

Carrying out these instructions, the committee has presented a report on its first session which I shall lay before the house. The report outlines the plan for the creation of an International Wheat Information Service which the standing committee has prepared. The organization will consist of:

First, the standing committee of the conference of wheat exporting countries;

Second, a small secretariat.

The duties of this service will be informational and not advisory. It will operate as far as possible through existing official and unofficial, national and international agencies. Its scope will be international and its work will be carried out in the interests of all countries.

[Mr. Bury.]

The objects of the service will be:

(1) To foster collaboration between wheat exporting countries with a view to encouraging the effective distribution of wheat, and to facilitating the better understanding of the wheat problem.

(2) To increase the scope, reliability and timeliness of wheat statistics and other relevant information, in order to assist the international trade in, and the effective distribution of, wheat.

(3) To review and analyze all relevant information on the current international position and future outlook concerning the production, consumption, movement and stocks of wheat and wheat products.

(4) To promote, by investigation and education, the greater consumption and utilization of wheat and wheat products.

(5) To arrange for the timely distribution and publication of the information thus provided, utilizing as far as possible existing governmental and international services, and private publishing and distributing agencies.

It is estimated that the cost of the international wheat information service will be six thousand pounds sterling per annum. The standing committee recommended that contributions toward the establishment and maintenance of the service should be on the following basis, which corresponds to the relative importance of each country as an exporter of wheat and wheat products:

Country	Units of contribution	Total contribution at £150 per unit
Canada	10	£1,500
United States	10	1,500
Argentine	5	750
Australia	5	750
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics	5	750
Hungary	1	150
India	1	150
Jugoslavia	1	150
Roumania	1	150
Bulgaria	1	150
Poland	1	150
	41	£6,150

On this scale of assessment, the justice and fairness of which is obvious, Canada's annual contribution would be £1,500, or approximately $7,300 a year.

In endorsing the proposed wheat information service and providing the funds for Canadian contribution to its maintenance, it should be clearly understood that the Canadian acceptance of the plan put forward by the standing committee is contingent upon its acceptance by the other wheat exporting countries which took part in the London conference.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Thursday, July 30, the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Gordon for the concurrence in the fourth report of the special committee appointed to investigate the Beauharnois project.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a member of one of the independent groups and as one who has supported the plea for an investigation I should like to call attention to certain aspects of the report. I shall not attempt to follow the apologia of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). There were no charges made against him, and yet he made an elaborate defence which reveals, probably, his own personal integrity, rather than his political sagacity. In the early part of his speech he discussed Mr. Sweezey's cynical statement that "gratefulness was always regarded as an important factor in dealing with democratic governments." He repudiated the idea that the acceptance of campaign funds had any influence on the policies of politicians. However, later in his speech he insinuated that an investigation might show that tariff concessions were not unconnected with campaign funds, and insisted that large contributions are what tell at election times. He urged that a leader of a party could not very well have a knowledge of the campaign funds and of those who had contributed and still be free to decide questions on their merits. Again I would suggest that the moral standards of the leader of the opposition are high but rather unreal. I ask, would the majority of corporations continue to subscribe to campaign funds from purely altruistic motives? And I ask, would the leader of the opposition himself be very happy in his enjoyment of the position secured through doubtful means, even although he himself was personally ignorant of them? As a matter of fact we all know that every member of parliament is required to certify to the statement of his agent with regard to contributions and expenses, and thus if the contentions of the leader of the opposition were correct every private member must have moral difficulties as great as those which the leader would have.

I should like to congratulate the chairman of the committee, the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) on his statement. He enunciated a new code of financial morality—at least I have never heard it in this house put so clearly. I quote from page 4355 of Hansard. He was referring to the fact that the promoters of the company who are now in control have no money in it but had made a great profit out of it, and he said:

> —every time a dollar is added to the capital cost of any business the ultimate result is that those who have to transact business with that company or with that industry, must, all down through the future, just pay that much more for the product of that industry. Therefore it is very essential, particularly in the development of a resource such as this, that its initial capital cost be kept down to the lowest possible limit, in order that the benefits that will flow from its development will be reaped by the people of the country.

It seems to me that if we really incorporated that principle into our requirements with regard to big corporations, we would be far on the way to a much higher level of business morality than we have had in the past.

It is obviously very difficult for the ordinary member of parliament to study the evidence as contained in the report of over a thousand pages, covering highly technical engineering problems, and legal and constitutional questions and financial arrangements with wide ramifications. I have wondered as I have looked over this evidence, whether a hundred years from now, if somebody delving into the archives should discover the report of this inquiry he might not regard it as a farce displaying the political morals of the dark age of 1931. Look at the dramatis personae! Senators, financial promoters, deputy ministers and other government officials, bankers, parliamentary agents—otherwise known as "lobbyists"—barristers galore, engineers, investment brokers, chartered accountants, an ex-Prime Minister, a medical doctor. In the background, as a sort of chorus, political parties—and may I say not a single woman in the play.

Mr. BOURASSA: The directors of one of the corporations were all women.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. I had forgotten that at one time the directorate of one of the corporations was composed entirely of stenographers.

Mr. BOURASSA: Women stenographers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, women stenographers—I stand corrected. I think the people of that future time might well consider that the author of such a play goes to incredible lengths and creates impossible situations. That a man could be a trusted member of a government advisory commission, the head of an important allied executive position, a senator, the confidant of the Prime Minister of the day, and at the same time one of the gang engaged in looting the resources of the country—well, it might be considered that even in 1931 the people could not have been such fools as to be so hoodwinked. Or another illustration: that any man could be a responsible official of a government-owned road, a deputy minister of the Department of Railways and Canals, and at the same time a partner with the aforementioned senator in a fake company through which they milked the principal company. Well, really the plot transcends the bounds of poetical licence or legitimate fiction.

I would say that we have inherited from the classical economists the doctrine that capital is built up by means of frugality and savings. It seems to me that one of the outstanding results of the investigation ought to be to dispel that superstition. The wealthy, starting with little or nothing, to use the expressive phrase of the day—"financing on a shoe string," spending lavishly other people's money, using political influence to acquire what are called "rights," creating "nuisance" values, and building up a financial structure are enabled to exact tribute in perpetuity from the public.

Further than that, it seems to me that another result of the investigation ought to be the revelation of modern business methods. Men known to all of us, respectable, honoured, kindly men are yet engaged in a ruthless competitive system that recognizes no accepted moral standards, that is essentially a scramble for profits—rival concerns fighting one another, distrusting and overreaching one another, then joining hands the more effectively to loot the public. Sweezey, an engineer wanting to get things done—finding obstacles that had to be removed—bribery distasteful but necessary—outside his own field gullible as a child and the prey of unscrupulous adventurers! As I thought over the situation thus revealed, I recalled a book that I had been reading not long ago, James Truslow Adams on Our Business Civilization, wherein he remarks:

> If the leaders are not humanely rounded personalities, civilized rather than barbarous, what shall be expected of the mass which patterns itself upon them? In a word, can a great civilization be built up or maintained upon the philosophy of the counting house and the sole basic idea of a profit.

I think perhaps it is well that the general public should recognize very clearly that the special committee of investigation was not an impartial court. As we went in to the railway committee room we were impressed by the battery of lawyers representing various interests, and, curiously enough, the accuser and the rival political parties involved were sitting in judgment on their colleagues and upon the man who evidence showed confessed to attempting to bribe them. I would say that naturally men are apt to shield personal and political friends and to expose the shortcomings of their rivals. I do not know that that is altogether a reprehensible tendency; there is a good deal to be said for it; but I would point out that such a committee is not very well fitted to carry out an impartial investigation. That is the main point. I think I took that ground several years ago when the customs matter was under consideration, I then moved that there should be a judicial commission to complete the investigation.

It should be remembered that this Beauharnois probe was the result of the action of the independent members of this house. It has been claimed that a good deal of political capital is being made out of this discussion, so perhaps I might be permitted to make that statement from our standpoint as independent members. May I say also that I am not claiming any superior virtue whatever for the members in our corner of the house, but I think I may claim that in a matter of this kind we are in a superior position in that we are free from some of those considerations which perhaps somewhat tie up members in other parts of the house. Last year the hon. member for Acadia—

Mr. VALLANCE: How do you know? Can you prove what you are saying?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know; I am merely expressing an opinion. I would say frankly that I think one of the reasons is that we are too few in number as yet to have come to the attention of some of the men who may be anxious to secure concessions. Let me be perfectly frank in the matter; I said I claimed no superior virtue in the matter but that possibly in a question of this kind we were in a position to criticize somewhat more freely than some others.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Barkis is willing; is that the idea?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I am not making a bid at all; as a matter of fact most people could not be ten years in the house without having been made aware that people might be willing to do something if a certain attitude were made manifest.

Last year the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), backed up by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), by myself and by certain members from Toronto brought this matter to the attention of the house. The action of the government was defended by the then Minister of Public Works. This year the hon. member for Acadia, again backed up by several of the independent members, introduced the question in the house. I think it is not going too far to say that if this group had not brought the matter to the attention of the house we would have heard very little about Beauharnois, so we must assume some responsibility for whatever good or evil has come about in connection with this investigation. I might point out as well that it was really touch and go as to whether or not the matter should be discussed in the house at all. Hon. members may recall that at first only a handful of members voted in favour of considering the question, and then a roll call was asked for. In fact I am not quite sure that we were strictly entitled to a roll call, so small was the number of members who actually stood up. I might note also that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) voted on that occasion only after the Prime Minister had voted, and at this point I may say that I believe very considerable credit should be given the Prime Minister for having permitted this matter to go to a committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows that the reason for that occurrence is recorded in Hansard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I know the reasons are recorded in Hansard, and I think they might bear very careful reading. The scene was one of the most ludicrous I have witnessed in this house.

I do not intend to go further into that phase of the question except to say that in a general way the contentions of the hon. member for Acadia and those who supported him were substantiated, but I do submit that the outside public is far from satisfied with the results of the investigation. If I interpret outside public opinion aright as I learn of it through people who come to see me, through the letters I receive and from newspapers in all parts of the country I would say that to-day the public demand several outstanding things. First of all the punishment of (a) those who have defrauded the public; (b) those who have been guilty of bribery, and (c) those who have betrayed public trust. Second, I think the public demand a further investigation, and third at least a very large section of the people demand government control of the whole Beauharnois enterprise. Further, at least the more thoughtful part of the public demand legislation that will prevent similar occurrences in the future, and from my standpoint I think perhaps that would be the most desirable result of these unfortunate revelations.

Now let me very briefly speak of those three or four points. I suppose that with regard to punishment the public generally likes to find a scapegoat. Perhaps we all remember the ancient Hebrew ceremony by which the people sought to get rid of their sins by taking a goat, laying their hands upon him—thus symbolizing the laying of their sins upon him—and then driving the goat into the wilderness.

An hon. MEMBER: Ask Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, perhaps my hon. friend from Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) will be able to say whether or not I am giving a correct interpretation. Some of us, too, may have seen that painting, by Holman Hunt, if I recollect aright, in which the scapegoat is shown as a very sorry and desolate figure wandering in the wilderness. Well, I confess that I have a good deal of sympathy with the scapegoat; I am not sure that these particular individuals whose actions are now before us are so much more to blame than a great many other individuals. I must insist on this though, that if a small man or a small criminal is to be punished—and I called attention to this a few days ago in connection with another matter—what about the man who takes millions without giving any return, the man who attemps to bribe political parties and to undermine responsible government, or the man who uses public position for personal gain? I would say that practices of this kind are much more dangerous to our morals than are nude parades.

After all, criminals big or little are not very different from ordinary people. I can remember shrinking away when I first met a criminal. I regarded him as a creature different from the rest of us. But as I came to know men of his class a little better, and as I came to understand their experiences a little more intimately I began to realize that they were very much like other men. Indeed, the greatest differences were that they had been harder pressed and that they had been caught. So I would suggest that our indignation really ought to be against the system rather than against the victims of that system. I think that ought to be kept in mind; we ought not simply to drive these men into obscurity and heap all sorts of blame on them when we know perfectly well that a great many of the things they have done are quite common in society to-day. Not only are they common, but let me say that with regard to the morality of many of those transactions, we have not yet worked out very clearly a generally accepted standard, and the public as a whole are apt to condone a great many things in general which in a report such as this we condemn.

Then I would urge further investigation and in this suggestion I join with the leader of the opposition. I urge that the report of our committee of investigation should be followed up by the appointment of a royal commission to investigate just as far as can be done the whole question of corrupt practices. The probe is something like a drill. The committee bored down and struck oil; the disquieting probability is that had they drilled in other places they would also have struck oil. The surface indications are very much the same. The financing of Beauharnois was dependent, for example, on two power contracts, one to the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario and one to Montreal Light, Heat & Power Consolidated. This will be seen at page 555 of the report. I would ask what were the circumstances connected with the securing of these contracts. I think that had these been investigated fully we should have a great deal more evidence than is now before us.

In this connection, with regard to the payment of $125,000 to John Aird, Jr., I note that the Ottawa Journal of July 30, has the following to say—and I commend the Journal for having taken this ground:

> The committee reports that there was no evidence before it that this money reached any political party. There was the evidence of Mr. Sweezey that he paid it to Aird with the understanding that it was to go to the Ontario Conservative party, and, this being so, it is difficult to understand why the committee did not probe the matter further; all the more so seeing that Mr. Aird's statement that Mr. Sweezey paid him $125,000 for doing nothing in particular places an impossible tax upon human credulity.

That coming from the Ottawa Journal is most significant and heartening, and it seems to me that if the Prime Minister could see his way to the appointment of a royal commission he would be simply carrying on the work which he had the courage to commence in allowing the matter to go to the committee.

With regard to campaign funds, again I should like to quote from the Ottawa Journal of July 22:

> No political party can enter an election in this country to-day without a central fund of at least $1,000,000—for perfectly proper purposes.

Perhaps the Ottawa Journal might have stretched that a little bit and made it $2,000,000. That is closer to the actual mark, from the information I have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is your information?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The general information which one secures in the course of a number of years around the lobbies of the House of Commons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just hearsay.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just hearsay, that is all. But if the hon. member prefers I will take the estimate of the Ottawa Journal—$1,000,000. That is good enough. It may be that a great political party, in order to carry on a campaign under modern conditions, needs a million dollars "for perfectly proper purposes." But this means, I suggest, that the ordinary people across the country will not have very much opportunity to initiate policies with much hope of seeing them carried into legislation. Some of us in the independent groups feel very strongly on this point. We are making an effort to have adopted certain policies. I know that most members do not agree with us, and that is their right. But we as citizens, as groups of citizens, believe that we ought to be more largely represented in this house. A few of us only have as yet been returned to parliament. Now, we have no such funds as these, and if our groups are to extend their influence it is rather a serious thing if we have to contemplate in some way raising a great fund of a million dollars before we can hope to enter the field against the established and older parties.

In contrast with these large funds, I might point out that my own campaign last year cost less than $500. In fairness I should say that there came from what might be called the central committee of our little organization possibly $100 in value; that is to say, they financed one big meeting for us and financed some literature.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You were not using the radio?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, to some extent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Out of the $500?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; that came out of the central committee fund. Our proportion of the general amount would be something like $100, but my election last year cost with this included, less than $600. I admit that the situation was rather exceptional, because I did not have opposing me any official Liberal or Conservative candidate.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You could not have used the radio to any great extent at that rate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; and that is the very point I am getting at. It is impossible for us to use the radio and other modern means of getting our point of view across to the general public. And that involves a very serious question. If corporation funds are the determining factor in an election, that means that the most wealthy people in the community are going to control and win elections.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did you not do something last year to change the law?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why did you do it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was on the statute books a law which prevented corporations from contributing to campaign funds. We all know that this law was very largely a dead letter; it had never amounted to very much. But that legislation had the effect of prohibiting labour unions from contributing to campaign funds. We had tried our best to introduce an amendment to exempt labour unions from this clause as they contributed openly. That amendment was turned down on one or two occasions, but last year on the third reading, when there was no opportunity to go into the matter in detail, I introduced an amendment removing that particular clause from the criminal code, and the house accepted the amendment. I will not discuss the question whether, in view of the present situation, that was a good thing or not; but I do know that campaign funds came from corporations long before that amendment was adopted.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It was not in the criminal code but in the election act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I accept the correction; it was in the election act.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): You weakened the law.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly. But I assert that it was generally recognized that the law as it stood, without punitive clauses, without provision for the disclosure of campaign funds to central committees, was practically useless. It seems to me that legislation along this line should provide first of all for the publication of central campaign funds. We all know that the individual member has to send in an account of his expenses in his own riding. But there is in the election act no regulation which insists that central campaign funds shall be reported. It is not for me to indicate the particular legislation needed, but I would urge that we might do away with a good many of these evils and make life a great deal easier for members of all parties if we insisted that campaign funds of central organizations should be published just as now are the expenses of individual candidates.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why not have compulsory voting?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Compulsory voting might be a good thing. But I have another suggestion to make, and that is that the necessary election expenses should be furnished by the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LAPOINTE: The report will be unanimous.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think this is the first suggestion which I have made in this house which has met with unanimous approval.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is most ridiculous.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) suggests that this is a ridiculous suggestion, but I cannot see it in that light. If it is desirable that men should be selected to be sent to parliament, as is done under our parliamentary and democratic system, then it seems to me to be only reasonable that provision should be made for those expenses incident to such selection. That seems to me to be a common sense proposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not original at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not put it forward as being original; it has often been put forward in the past. I do not know whether the hon. member for York-Sunbury has ever come across it, but it has been advanced by those possessing more authority than I. I think it worth while to pass on to the house.

Mr. QUINN: The fellow who was defeated would be a total loss.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is incidental. It would be one of the greatest economies which this country could put into practice.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There would be a dozen candidates in each riding.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is possible, but members would be left free to vote on different measures without feeling that there were strings attached to them.

I come now to my third suggestion. I believe that a very large section of the public is in favour of expropriating the whole of this Beauharnois work. The Montreal Star of July 24, possibly speaking with its tongue in its cheek, nevertheless gives some very sound advice. It says:

> Private enterprise having failed so signally, having permitted so sickening a series of developments, we who have always been in favour of private enterprise and against public ownership feel that a colossal problem has been suddenly thrust into the face of the Canadian people for which they must find a solution, and the only solution we can imagine for the moment is for either the Dominion government or the provincial government—or both—to take the tragic business over and run it for the benefit of the citizens.

It seems to me that that is the soundest piece of teaching which has come from the Montreal Star for a long time.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Why expropriate what belongs to us?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suggest that perhaps the Star is speaking with mental reservation because in later editorials it contemplates taking over only the canal, which as a matter of fact, no one wants very badly. The canal would be rather expensive to maintain, and I am not so sure but that the canal comes over to the people anyway.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the only thing which is under Dominion control.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not so sure of that. Without going into the constitutional question at any length I would say that the so-called provincial rights do not present a very serious problem. Mr. Sweezey's claims were based entirely on the Robert rights.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They were two years ago in the case of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This was confirmed by Arthur E. Dubuc, chief engineer, Department of Railways and Canals, who said:

> The Robert rights were the ones which I regarded as the basis upon which this whole development could take place.

Further there is not the slightest doubt that the Beauharnois as part of the development of the St. Lawrence is essentially a Dominion proposition and is necessary to fulfil our international obligations. As such it seems to me that it stands in a class by itself and I regret exceedingly that the late government took the position which it did. We all know that there are rival claims to rights but it seems to me that the Dominion government has yielded altogether too much to the viewpoint of the present administration in Quebec.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad the hon. member—

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member must be wrong if the deputy speaker is with him.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We should remember that parliament may at any time annul or vary any order of the governor in council under the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Viewing the whole situation, an outstanding man has written me as follows. I quote it because he puts in good form that which many people are feeling. He says:

> The group which has been guilty of such corruption should not be permitted to retain the fruits of their corrupt acts or escape prosecution therefor. In the Teapot Dome scandal in the United States the government took steps to cancel the oil lease and succeeded, and they prosecuted the principal actors in the deal. We sometimes think we have more political virtue than they. This case will show whether we have as much.

There is a danger of this whole proposal falling into the hands of another group of promoters. Such a disaster would be a sorry outcome to the probe. The Financial Post of August 1, suggests that public ownership would involve more jabs and hence more political power; further more opportunities for the continuation of the graft which has been already exposed. It says:

> Graft or waste would pile up year after year by way of increased capital investment on which interest must be paid.

It seems to me that that is the most ludicrous argument which could be advanced. The graft in this case has come through private ownership, and I cannot imagine anything worse than the further suggestion of the Financial Post. They say:

> The association of Sir Herbert Holt—under whom Montreal Power has been built up—with some unsuccessful merger promotions should not blind us to his main achievement.

They then actually go so far as to suggest that this development should be handed over to Sir Herbert Holt. We are asked to overlook for the moment that Sir Herbert Holt is the one largely responsible for that outrageous Canada Power and Paper Corporation affair which I think should be investigated just as thoroughly as the scandal now before us. Had it not been for this Beauharnois matter I was hoping to have an opportunity of impressing upon the government the necessity of such an investigation. It seems to me that the government has a responsibility at this time. The Montreal Star of July 28 has a timely editorial headed Parliament is on Trial. The Star says:

> They are shocked at the Beauharnois revelations. But that feeling is being fast submerged by another thought — What will parliament have the courage, the conscience, the public spirit finally to do about it?
> Parliament should represent and express the moral sentiment of the people. It is the highest court established in our land. It has full power to deal with even novel situations in which the property, the future prosperity and the moral standards of the people are involved. It is denied one easy alibi — the favourite alibi of the coward — "non possumus."

To use the wording of the last phrase, I would say that nevertheless "non possumus" is the alibi in this case. To translate that legal phrase into the language of the street, I suppose we might put it: we cannot do anything about it.

The recommendations of the committee are decidedly disappointing, in fact they mean practically nothing. It is suggested that we should do all that is necessary in a manner that will best serve the people of Canada. That is all right as a phrase but it does not mean anything. The report states further that the respective rights of the Dominion and the province should be preserved. Everybody accepts that, but it does not mean anything. Again it says that definite action should be taken to preserve the rights of the—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My closing warning is that capitalism is on trial and that democratic institutions are on trial.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on June 10 last this House of Commons appointed at my request nine of its members to conduct an investigation into the affairs of the Beauharnois power enterprise. That motion was adopted unanimously. The committee met, appointed a chairman and has made what purports to be a unanimous report; for on the last page of the minutes of proceedings the following words appear:

> It was unanimously agreed that the following be presented to the House of Commons as a fourth report.
> July 28, 1931.

After which follows the report, and at the end of the report, at page 30, appear these words:

> A unanimous vote of thanks was tendered by the other members to Hon. Mr. Gordon for the manner in which he discharged his duties as chairman of the committee.
> The committee adjourned sine die.
> John T. Dun,
> Clerk of the Committee.

That report, purporting to be a unanimous report made by at least three Liberal members, one Independent member and the remainder, or five in number, Conservative members or supporters of the administration, is now submitted to the house. It was presented to the house last evening by the chairman, who moved its adoption in a speech that all will regard as one of singular moderation, based entirely upon the findings of the committee as supported by the evidence adduced.

He was followed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) who for three hours and a half dealt with all possible means at his disposal for the purpose of creating a smoke screen to prevent this report being considered. I have listened to the right hon. gentleman for four hours, for three and a half and for two hours, but I confess I never before listened to so many irrelevancies with respect to the subject matter of a motion as I did last evening. In some houses of parliament I have no doubt he would have been called to order because his observations were wholly irrelevant.

The issue before the house to-day is concurrence or non-concurrence in the report of the committee. I do not know that I have ever before been more pleased at unanimity as expressed in a report than I have been with respect to this report. It has very properly been urged that where party strife runs high and men have strong political opinions and convictions, there is always a danger that the evidence and the value of it are sometimes obscured by reason of those opinions and convictions. But in this case the fact that unanimity was reached, at least indicates that in the mind of the committee there was a high sense of individual duty and a clear realization of obligation to the institution called parliament. The one criticism that I have to urge against the speech to which we listened last evening and this morning is that it was a speech in which there was an entire and utter forgetting of parliament, of its great traditions, of our institutions and of what is involved in this inquiry, and one long continued effort on the part of the right hon. gentleman to vindicate himself at the expense of parliament. In entire forgetfulness of parliament and our obligations, it was a long effort to vindicate the position of the right hon. gentleman himself. That was not at issue; that was not what was being tried. The order of reference that was made by the house was to have an investigation into the Beauharnois undertaking, and I say this to the right hon. gentleman: Had he desired to give evidence, why did he not go down to the committee and give it under oath so that he could be cross-examined? What right has he to stand in his place now and state as facts mere conversations? Everyone who has anything to do with courts of law, with investigations before tribunals, knows you cannot get at the truth without recalling to the memory of the witness circumstances and fact, relating one thing to another and bringing to his attention circumstances that in the ordinary course of events he might and probably would have forgotten. The only way in which the truth can be arrived at is by relating those incidents one to another and carrying on a rigid cross-examination under oath. I shall not follow the course of the right hon. gentleman; I shall not state what I believe to be facts, because I was not before that tribunal. I was not called as a witness. I had at one time a very strong conviction that I should have gone before that tribunal because of the way in which my name was used in connection with it. I did not do so, however, and I do not yet understand why the right hon. gentleman, thinking as he does, did not go to the committee and say: I desire to be examined under oath, cross-examined, and to give my view of the matters under investigation in order that the truth may be known and justice be done. If there be any cause for complaint that it has not been done, he cannot complain; for the opportunity was there for him or any other man who so desired, to give evidence before that committee. It was a committee of this house of whose honour at one time he was the custodian, the former leader, who knew something of its traditions, who knew just what was expected from public men who occupy positions of that kind; and under those circumstances, as I have said, I shall not endeavour to follow the course which the right hon. gentleman pursued. I shall not read from the story of the life of Sir Robert Hudson, who could get money from rich men when the prime minister could not do so.

I shall content myself with dealing with the issue which is before the House of Commons this afternoon, and ask hon. members whether or not in their judgment the adoption of the report with the remedy suggested, will not go a long way towards meeting what was in the mind of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) when he made his submission to the House of Commons. May I remind the house, as it has frequently been reminded before that a year ago I suggested a judicial tribunal should be appointed for the purpose of investigating this matter. When this question was raised by the hon. member for Acadia in 1930, before the last general election, I in my then place yonder pointed out that I regarded it as of so serious a character, in view of the statements that had been made, as to necessitate a judicial investigation. But I pointed out on the very evening when in May of this year the hon. member for Acadia renewed his attack, ill-advised as I think he was, in making the references which I am sure on sober reflection he would not have made, with respect to judges and the judiciary, it was obvious that a judicial inquiry was no longer possible and that the house must itself deal with the matter. I stated that frankly. I am only too pleased to say to-day that the efforts and the result have entirely justified the course I then took.

Another reason, and one that has been borne in upon my mind very strongly during the progress of this discussion is this: Our judges should not be selected to sit on matters of this kind; the statutes contemplate they shall not do so, for judges to a very great extent, dealing with questions of this nature, have once more recalled to them their ancient past, the memories of their old political prejudices and the glories of their political antagonisms. That, I think, would be most injurious to the interests of this country. May I point out further that when in 1899 the circumstances in connection with the elections of West Huron and Brockville were investigated by a committee of this house at the instance of Mr. R. L. Borden, now Sir Robert Borden, the committee made a report which I believe many people thought was not highly creditable to parliament, and it was suggested that the committee should be renewed the next year. But in June of the next year, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, from his seat as Prime Minister, stated that he had that day submitted an order in council to his colleagues appointing Chancellor Boyd, Chief Justice Falconbridge and Judge MacTavish a commission to inquire into election proceedings in the province of Ontario. That commission never met; it never took a word of evidence. It was open to either party, but nothing was done under it. For reasons which are obvious I am not in a position to say whether or not the information I have received is absolutely correct; but the dominating reason, as I understand it, was that those judges realized fully that it would detract from their dignity and from the position judges should occupy if they were to sit as commissioners upon a matter of that character.

I have revised my opinion as to the functions of this house. I have greater faith in it to-day than I have ever had in my life, as I find it was able to arrive at what purports to be an unanimous opinion with respect to a matter in connection with which the most acute differences were possible. I agree with my right hon. friend that it is possible in a matter of this nature, where a report involves many pages, that a line here or there may constitute a line too many or a line too few, but the fact is that there was at least a semblance of unanimity.

I am free to say that once I sat on a committee of this house, not many long years ago, a committee on which there were representatives of the Liberal party, the Conservative party and the party to my right across the floor. I recall vividly that the committee, in terms stronger than any committee had ever made denunciations of wrong doing in departmental administration in Canada, submitted a report to this parliament, which report, amended to read stronger still, was adopted by this house by a small majority, as will be found in the journals I have under my hand. Yet in the succeeding election the people of Canada brought back to power the very men whom this parliament had condemned. That in itself is some reason why there is cause and justification for pride in the report of the committee before us to-day. At least it is a report which has reviewed the evidence at length, has about it some semblance of unanimity, and suggests remedies for the conditions which have been found to exist in connection with the enterprise.

I do not purpose to deal with the personal attacks which were made upon me last night. The right hon. gentleman spent hours complaining of insinuations and innuendos. Yet, for line after line he said, "If the right hon. gentleman does so and so; if the right hon. gentleman does so and so; if the hon. gentleman does so and so"—for which there is not a scintilla of evidence, or the memorandum of a single conversation. Do you call that right and fair and just? You call that a smoke screen which it was hoped would divert the minds of the Canadian people from the Beauharnois project in order that they might think of tariffs and income taxes. Is that the sense of decency that prevails in the mind of my right hon. friend who stands in this house and makes the sort of attack he made last night? I was amazed. What was that attack made for? What was it made for? There was not a single person within sound of the voice of the right hon. gentleman who did not know what it was made for. It was made to induce the Canadian people to try to forget Beauharnois. It was made to induce the Canadian people to forget that there had been an investigation. It was an effort, through that cunning which has characterized the discharge of my right hon. friend's public duties, as evidenced by that very report of the customs inquiry to which I referred—it was an endeavour, I say, by that cunning device, to insinuate hypothetical conditions and draw hypothetical conclusions, and then afford an opportunity for his political friends to go out into country and quote them as indicating the true position of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Do you call that decency? Do you call that high art? I suppose some will. Some will call it high technical art and skill. But that is not the idea of the Canadian people; I repeat, that is not the idea of the Canadian people. To insinuate—that is what it was—that if I carry in my pocket a list of the contributors to the funds of the Conservative party I have placed myself in a position where every legislative act I take must be influenced by that sordid consideration—and that from one who has been for nine years Prime Minister of Canada!

And then he complains, almost in sobs, about the innuendos against him in this house. Is that the sense of decency that should govern with respect to matters of this kind? I asked last night, and I ask now: Show me within the four corners of the evidence given in this instance anything which warrants such observations. All that appears there—and it is correct—is that I did decline to have anything to do with contributions from the Beauharnois people, so far as my party was concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: And it is not a matter for which any great credit is to be accorded to me. I never have claimed such credit. I merely took the view any man should take, that as the matter had been raised in parliament, and I had said that I thought a judicial investigation should be held, if I succeeded to power I was bound to provide that investigation. How could I do that if I had taken benefactions from them for the purpose of preventing my taking proper action? That is the question. That position is met by the whispered insinuation: "You raised the tariff on textiles, woollens and steel, and you raised the tariff on something else, and where is your list of contributions? I have no such list; that I desire to make perfectly clear.

I shall not enter into a further discussion of my position; for if this matter is further investigated—and I say right here and now if the right hon. gentleman and those who sit beside him think that the Beauharnois matter has not been adequately investigated I will give them an investigation, judicially or otherwise, if they require it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: But if the right hon. gentleman had ended his remarks at that point one might have not been so greatly concerned; we expected that. I did not however expect that in three sentences he would explain the whole situation. Standing out here in the cool of a summer's evening looking at Victoria chambers we see the right hon. leader of the opposition, saying, "Behold, these Conservatives, how they work. See the literature they are sending out. Haydon, I have no money; we cannot do it." Haydon gets it; Why wouldn't he? Haydon gets it; why shouldn't he? Why wouldn't he?—why wouldn't any man who stood in relation to the Prime Minister as he stood? Let me read what my right hon. friend says the relationship was; just listen to this. Referring to page 4383 of Hansard I read a quotation from Mr. Spender's Life of Hudson, as quoted by the right hon. gentleman:

> The confidence that Hudson at once inspired in men, even rich men, wary of their pockets, was extraordinary. Rich men would give him thousands when they would not have given prime ministers a penny piece, and yet Hudson had nothing to offer them in return save his good-will, for the federation possessed neither patronage nor power, and never attempted, or would have been allowed, to interfere with the arrangements of the whip's room.

Then my right hon. friend, speaking of Haydon, said:

> I had asked Senator Haydon why it was that, despite the fact that we were labouring night and day in this parliament to make our policies known, we could not get a leaflet published which we could distribute among the electorate. We had the Dunning budget which we were bringing in and we wanted to have the electors acquainted with the details of that budget and the policies that underlay it. So far as the Liberal information office was concerned, there was no money for the purpose of getting out any publications.

There is the story. He said Senator Haydon occupied to him the relation that Sir Robert Hudson did to the leader of the Liberal party in England. Why would not Haydon do what he did do? When his chief, his fidus Achates, his inseparable friend said to him, "I have no money; we can publish no information; the beauties of the Dunning budget—cast iron and cut flowers—will not be known to the electorate unless we have money." And Haydon goes out and gets the money. The suggestion to him was a command, and he forgot everything else except Beauharnois and the getting of the money. And he gets it by the hundreds of thousands of dollars. That is the reason our constituencies were flooded with leaflets, that is the reason that there went all over western Canada the great volume of Liberal literature, some mimeographed, some prepared by Mr. Deachman of the consumers league—they too, are in it; this literature went all over western Canada and throughout other parts of the country. The Prime Minister said, "Why is it we have no money? Haydon said, "Here is the money." And Beauharnois provided it. That is the position the former Prime Minister occupies to this corporation. Did he think Haydon was going to make money? Did he think Haydon was going to pull it down from the stars, did he believe he was going to find it in the earth, or did he believe—as the facts are—that he found it in the water? Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker.

The former Prime Minister stated that the relationship that existed between Senator Haydon and himself is the relationship which he says Spender so splendidly mentioned as the relationship between himself and his chief; and he says: "You will observe that Sir Robert Hudson did not have any patronage; all he had was good will." Good will—that is what Spender said he had. And look at the good will that his friend Senator Haydon had! All Mr. Sweezey had to say to Senator Haydon was "$50,000, if you secure our order in council." And he got it. All Mr. Sweezey had to say to Senator McDougald was "Two thousand units, if you secure approval for our scheme." And he got it. That is the evidence of this inquiry, and that is the testimony of the right hon. leader of the opposition himself as indicated in his speech last night.

I put to every hon. member of this house, as I put to every citizen of this country, this simple, single question: Is there any organizer of any party in the world who, confronted by his chief and told that the party had no money with which to make their virtues known, would not go out and get it—or try to? And so we have the right hon. leader of the opposition saying that he told the organizer that they hadn't any money. He must have seen that it was received from some source, and what source so likely? Just think of it! And then calling upon high heaven to witness to his virtues, to speak of the disinterested character of his services to the country, it resolves itself at last to the statement of his organizer, "We have no money."

But the results of money from some source soon became apparent. We have the circumstances under which Mr. Sweezey made his payments. I agree with what was said yesterday about Mr. Sweezey. I mentioned his position last year. He is an engineer of vision; he saw great industrial communities thriving where you and I saw but a stream flowing over rocks; he saw the possibilities of dams, he saw the possibilities of machinery, he saw energy created and industries grow. He is a promoter—some would say a dreamer. This simple-minded engineer was told, "The only thing to do is to get in touch with those who know how to do it." So there in his first letter, and hon. members will remember that when mentioning Mr. Jones he said, "He has no political value, he has just a business value." As to the rest of them, they had that value which belongs to those who "get things done." Not necessarily improperly—just "good will," according to Spender. "Get it done." And look at the efforts to get it done. I am not going to discuss how it was done; that is not a matter of importance at all at the moment. It was done. The promoter says it was done in that way because he understood that that was the way to do it. Now, whom did he learn that from? "We have no money."

Leaving that for the moment, behold the character of the influence that is used. These gentlemen do not deny in reality, although they clothe it in words of milk and honey, that they were interested in this matter. They bought shares in syndicates to make money. Surely men who contribute must recoup themselves some way if there is a chance to do it! that is the theory, and they did it. That is all. But that is not all for parliament. There is an Independence of Parliament Act, there are such things as the traditions that pertain and belong to parliament. Yesterday you saw the vindication of the law in England with respect to one of the proudest of the men who live in that country. But here—well, here it is sanctioned, here it gets the hallmark of ready approval, here men become apologists—or used to; they will not after this committee's report because this report marks a distinct advance in the public life of this country. I am perfectly certain of that.

I am not going to discuss any of the senators mentioned in the report. The conclusions of the committee are warranted by the evidence. That is all I have to say. But the right hon. gentleman is wrong there. This house has a perfect right to discuss the evidence given before the committee. When any senator is requested to give evidence, and is granted permission by the house of parliament to which he belongs to attend and appear, and does attend and appear, he attorns to the jurisdiction and must accept the inevitable result of his attendance. And it becomes no part of the procedure of this house to stand between him and the discussion that is raised by reason of the evidence that he has given. We may not in debate discuss members of the Senate. We discuss them now as witnesses, or as those whose position has become known by reason of the evidence given by witnesses before the commission. But I do not propose even to do that. We can leave that to the Senate and the government. The Senate must act first; it is the custodian of its own honour. It will receive this report when it is adopted by this house, and from what I know of the Senate of Canada—despite the reformation that has been made therein during the last few years—it will, I think, be worthy of its great traditions. The only thing the right hon. gentleman did not mention last night was reform of the Senate. I waited anxiously for a reference to that reform! I wanted to hear about those who when they went into the Senate had signed a document by which they were going to bring about its reform; at least that is what was told to a confiding public. Now, I suppose if we ask for the documents they will say they are lost. Peradventure there were not any. But I believe the Senate will take care of that part of the situation. Afterwards, it may be, the government of the country will have to put in operation certain laws and institute certain proceedings; which the government will do.

So far as restitution is concerned, I can only say to the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and to other members of this house that that is not a matter over which this government has any jurisdiction. The lawyers who framed the report realized that is so. One of the corporations was created by act of the Department of State, the others were created by statute of the province of Quebec. And we have no power to institute civil proceedings for the restitution of money. So far as our right to institute criminal proceedings is concerned, every hon. gentleman knows that such proceedings must be instituted by the provincial and not by the federal authorities. Inasmuch as the deputy attorney general of Quebec has been retained by Beauharnois I am satisfied that for his $1,500 a year he will take proceedings to that end.

Leaving that for the moment we will proceed to what I regard as the more important phase of this matter. As I said, I have no interest in discussing these senators or other witnesses; time will take care of them and the body to which they belong. But I have a very great interest in this further phase of the question, because of the unhappy position which I occcupy—for it is unhappy at times—and I desire now to indicate to this house, not as leader of a party but as leader of the House of Commons, what action this government propose to take in connection with this matter. I am dealing now with the second branch of this case. The first deals with the injury done to parliament, the injury done to our institutions and the fuel that it provides for bolshevists from one end of the country to the other to deride our country and its institutions. But the very fact that this House of Commons has done what it has will do much to still that criticism and make men realize that in the end the House of Commons will rise to a high sense of its own responsibilities.

Now, as I have said, I come to what I conceive to be the second branch of this inquiry. Sir, the real, fundamental criticism I have to urge against the conduct of this enterprise is that from its very inception it defied government. Will hon. gentlemen take the trouble to turn to the report and note the conditions which were imposed upon that company under the licence it was given to exercise its powers? If those who are interested will look at page 628 of the proceedings of the committee they will find certain matters set forth which will leave no doubt as to the conditions imposed. I will say this, that there were twenty-eight conditions imposed in the order in council, and the original slips by which little amendments were made here and there as the document was being prepared are still extant, in the handwriting of one who is still a member of this house. Those amendments introduced into the final licence, as settled on the recommendation of the former Minster of Public Works, indicated that if they were observed the public interest would be protected. What do you think they did, sir, with respect to them? Just let me direct your attention to the finding of the committee in that regard:

(7) Your committee finds as a fact that the work of construction is proceeding according to plans which have not received the approval of the governor in council or of the Minister of Public Works.

But that is not all; to show how supreme was their confidence in their own position let me tell you, sir, that they did not file any plans until fifteen days after this government came into power. They did not need to file any plans as long as the former government was here. Just look at the report in that regard. It says:

. . . . actual construction on the north embankment was commenced on the 7th August, 1929, in the vicinity of lake St. Francis, and on the south embankment on the 23rd April, 1930.

Then follows condition 11 of order in council 422:

The company shall not commence the construction of the works until detailed plans of construction . . . . have been submitted and approved of by the minister . . . .

They constructed something entirely different from what was provided for in the order in council; the remedial works have not been approved of either by order in council or by the minister; the Hungry bay dyke has been breached without consent or permission, and finally they are still proceeding without their plans having been in any sense ratified, approved or given even an acquiescent approval by the government.

Now let us see, for a moment, what they did when they found that situation confronting them, in agonized fear, I take it, seeing that a new government was in power. You can readily understand what would have been the significance of the position if the new government had been led by one who was under financial obligation to them. Certain other plans were substituted on the 22nd of August, 1930, as is indicated at page 623.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Those were substituted for the plans filed in 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but the plans of 1929 were never ratified or approved. I am just coming to that. The report says:

None of these has as yet received the approval of the Minister of Public Works, although the chief engineer of the department has recommended them for approval. Plans submitted on the 22nd August, 1930, did include plans for the remedial works, but such plans were subsequently withdrawn and as the matter now stands there is now—

That should read "not now".

—before the department for approval any plan or plans of these remedial works.

I put this to every member of the house who happens to be a member of my profession. If a judge were charging a jury, as Mr. Justice Wright did the day before yesterday in England with respect to a matter not unlike this in some particulars, would he not say: "Gentlemen, is it not a significant fact that although order in council P.C. 422 provides that there shall be approval by order in council, and also by the minister, of plans of the undertaking and of remedial works which are to be carried out, until the defeat of the administration that was in power at the time the order in council was granted no such approval had been given, and fifteen days after a new government took office in Canada new plans were substituted?" Is that not a significant fact? Most men in this house have served on juries. Why was it that these people went on with their work week after week and month after month and paid no more attention to the government of Canada than they did to the government of China?

Mr. JACOBS: Would the right hon. gentleman permit me just one question? I do not wish to interrupt him.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. JACOBS: What is the government engineer doing there now? What has he been doing from August 7 to the present day? He must be representing some person.

Mr. BENNETT: The government engineer is there to see what is going on, and he was not there on the 7th of August. I asked for a report myself, because I realized that action had to be taken. I had heard of these things; I sent an engineer there last fall before I went to England and I asked the Minister of Public Works and the Department of Railways and Canals to keep watch on that undertaking because of what I had heard. I received a report which I told the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) I thought I would have to treat as a confidential report made to a minister as to what was going on. I take it that the paragraph appearing in the report with respect to the chief engineer and deputy minister has some relation to these facts.

Now I ask this house to consider that significant fact. The government of this country was defied. These people got their order in council; they breached the Hungry bay dyke, which they had no right to do. They went on just as they pleased; they were so sure that the government would be returned that they thought they could afford to take almost any chance in the world.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to interrupt, but would my right hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. EULER: If this company was forbidden, under the order in council, to go on with construction until the plan had been approved by the government, how is it they were permitted to go on for a year after the last election, under the present government?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a very proper question; it indicates that the hon. gentleman wants to know exactly what the terms of the order in council were. They were these:

(11) The company shall not commence the construction of the works until detailed plans of construction and all necessary information respecting the said works have been submitted to and approved of by the minister, provided that such plans and information shall be submitted within one year.

(14) The works shall be constructed by the company subject to the approval of an engineer or engineers authorized for such purpose by the minister and the decision of the said engineer or engineers shall be final and conclusive upon all questions that may arise in connection with such construction.

Now, no approval was given within the year, and the final plans were not filed within that time. The question of law is a simple one. Where a delegated power is being exercised by a minister, has he any authority to exercise that power after the expiration of the period of time fixed within which he must do it? There are clear authorities that he has not such power. No application was made, as a matter of fact, beyond the filing of the plans. I will give in a single sentence the answer to my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who is of a very inquiring mind: These gentlemen took the view before the committee that all they were doing was digging a ditch on their own land. That is the answer.

Mr. EULER: Was that a correct view?

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the committee had no power to be judge and jury and to pronounce on questions of law. They only had to find the facts. And the committee strove with the witnesses to ascertain those facts. But counsel took the position, "What have you to do with us? We are here, having bought a piece of land and we are digging a hole in it. That is what we are doing;" although they had sold to the public securities on a hydro electric enterprise.

Mr. EULER: Was the company doing an illegal thing in continuing their works without having these plans certified or approved? If so, why were they allowed to go on for a year under the present government?

Mr. BENNETT: I will give the answer in a moment.

Mr. EULER: A legal technicality which I do not understand, not being a lawyer.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman does not need to be a lawyer to understand this. He who runs may read. And the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. Let me put it this way to the hon. gentleman, who is neither. If their contention was right, that they were down there having bought a piece of land on which they were carrying on excavations, putting up some embarkments, and matters of that kind, this government had no power to interfere.

Mr. EULER: But were they right?

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, if they say that is what they were doing, they are right. And they sold debentures of a hydro electric enterprise with which this government had nothing to do. I hope I make myself clear.

Mr. EULER: I understand it.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Now, that is one of the difficulties.

Mr. JACOBS: They took the ground that the works referred to were remedial works in the river.

Mr. BENNETT: They took the ground that so far as the order in council was concerned, it did not touch anything except the remedial works. What the hon. gentleman says is perfectly clear. And so far as they were concerned, although they had sold debentures, nevertheless they had the right to dig holes, to put up walls and embankments, and to operate machinery, without any water at all.

Mr. EULER: And they are still doing it.

Mr. BENNETT: They have breached the Hungry bay dyke without consent. The fact is that they could not do that either. I will confess to my hon. friend that it is a matter that gave me great concern when I found what they were doing; and it gave me greater concern when I discovered the attitude they had taken, because it made our position so difficult. We could not launch injunction proceedings against them; they owned the land. They were not trespassers; this was their property. That is the position.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a fact, which I think my right hon. friend has overlooked, that before the work was started detailed plans were filed on July 29, 1929. The work was not started until August. May I refer to the statement of the chairman, that apparently it had been the custom to allow proceedings to go on after the filing of detailed plans.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. But the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) realizes that the plans filed had no relation to the work done. That is the difficulty.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is why they were not approved.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend says that is the reason they were not approved and I accept his word in that regard. They were not approved because they were not plans referable to the work they were doing, and they are not in any sense the detailed plans called for by the engineers in the department.

I have given these illustrations because, as I have said to the house, it does appear to me that the real gravamen of the charge against the company in the first instance is that it absolutely defied this government. And when I say this government, I mean the government of Canada, under whatever auspices it may be conducted. Why did they do so? Any judge addressing a jury would say, "It is for you gentlemen to say why." Well, there were at least 700,000 reasons each worth 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not a fact that the plans have since been recommended for approval by the Department of Public Works, and have been waiting for the last eight months for the approval of the minister?

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned that the engineer had recommended them. But the minister is met with this legal difficulty—and I put it to any legal member of the house: Can a minister, exercising a delegated power from the governor in council, legally exercise that power when the period of time has lapsed within which the plans are to be approved, without the plans having been filed?

Mr. JACOBS: The government had it before them—

Mr. BENNETT: No application was made until after the year had passed. Within that year no plans had been filed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will the Prime Minister permit me again—

Mr. BENNETT: No detailed plans, my hon. friend means. The plan of July 29 had nothing to do with the construction.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They were working on that.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not on that. Let us have no misunderstanding.

Mr. JACOBS: What plans have been approved by the department?

Mr. BENNETT: None.

Mr. JACOBS: But what plans are before the minister?

Mr. BENNETT: No plan has been approved.

Mr. JACOBS: No, the plans before the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: No plan has been approved.

Mr. JACOBS: No, but recommended for approval.

Mr. BENNETT: By the engineer whom the committee has censured?

Mr. JACOBS: Censured only for not having given evidence in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, if that is not criticism I will say—whom the committee has not lauded for his frankness. Now, I am not competent to advise the Minister of Public Works. The Department of Justice says that this is a question of the greatest legal difficulty. It is a question whether or not, under these circumstances, the minister may, after the expiration of the time fixed for the filing of the plans, give his approval. It is a question whether or not he is functus officio after the expiration of the time; because there has not been filed within the year anything to which he might give approval under the terms of the order in council.

These are the circumstances that confront us. The committee has inquired why, and has given reasons which I think are ample. And in view of these findings the only other question which the government has to consider is what action shall be taken. First may I point out that the province of Quebec claims and has exercised certain jurisdiction over certain parts of the St. Lawrence. The privy council has decided that the bed of the harbour of Montreal belongs to the crown in right of the province in the first instance. The question as to the right of the province with respect to the water has for many reasons not yet been decided. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) last evening indicated the difficulties so far as the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada was concerned on the stated case presented for its consideration. The Dominion has paramount right in respect of navigation; and for myself I never had any doubt in the world about the fact that there is no power under the Navigable Waters Protection Act to approve of plans such as these. The act itself is clear. It makes no more reference to the matter than it does to a river in China, so far as that is concerned. I feel perfectly confident that this is so, and hon. gentlemen may convince themselves if they will read the following words in chapter 140:

> No approval shall be given under this part of the site or plans of any bridge over the river St. Lawrence.

You cannot place piers in the river upon which to erect a bridge but you can dewater the river.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my right hon. friend claim that order in council, P.C. 422, has the effect of permitting the diversion of the whole St. Lawrence?

Mr. BENNETT: I say that the province of Quebec has added 30,000 second feet to the original 40,000 second feet and the effect will be to render no longer navigable the river St. Lawrence. It is only navigable in a limited way at any time and the governor in council is now being asked to practically dewater the river so that it would not be navigable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not under order in council, P.C. 422. Surely the government has the power to prevent that.

Mr. BENNETT: The governor in council granted only 40,000 second feet but the province of Quebec has granted an additional 30,000 second feet.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But not this government.

Mr. BENNETT: Application has been made to the government. If, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act they can grant one thing, they can grant the other. If they can cause the river not to be navigable, they can dewater it altogether. As a matter of fact the plans that have been prepared—this leads me to the other point—were to take the whole flow of the river St. Lawrence. In other words, what was the river St. Lawrence yesterday is now to be the Beauharnois canal. Yet it is said that this can be done under the statute which will not permit the erection of a bridge across the river.

Mr. EULER: It cannot be done without the consent of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the government, of parliament; that is my point.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not P.C. 422.

Mr. BENNETT: The former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) knows that I am not endeavouring to mis-state or confuse the issue. Order in council, P.C. 422 permitted the diversion of 40,000 second feet.

Mr. RALSTON: It did not permit the diversion, it approved only of the plans. My right hon. friend stated that the diversion was approved; it is not that, the plans were approved.

Mr. BENNETT: They have no power over navigation and they do not pretend to have any right to take the St. Lawrence river away from its course. What a beautiful argument to say that you do not permit the diversion although you approve of plans for a contemplated diversion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my right hon. friend admits that the bed of the river and the land adjacent are the property of the province of Quebec, is it not for that province to allow the diversion of the water and change the course of the river providing this government approves of the plans which create the diversion?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend just overlooks one sentence. The paramount right of navigation is in the hands of the Dominion and the right of navigation is the navigation of the river as nature put it there, unless there is some power given to change it. That power is parliament and parliament alone. My right hon. friend referred to the section which reads:

> Parliament may, at any time, annul or vary any order of the governor in council made under this part.

It is abundantly clear that that is a recognition of the fact that no great undertaking such as this was contemplated. There is no provision there for the protection of investors or anything of that sort which always occurs in an act of parliament of this kind. This contemplates just the sort of thing one expects with respect to navigable rivers, such as booms and small matters of that kind and not a great national enterprise such as this.

Having said this much about the statute, the next question is what shall be done at the present moment. Subsection 10c of section 92 of the British North America Act provides that the province shall not have control over:

> Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

We can only with the consent, or shall I say with the goodwill of the province of Quebec take that action. We have prepared a bill which if agreed to by the province of Quebec will declare that this work is a work for the general advantage of Canada. In order that there shall be no misunderstanding on that point, we will say:

> The canal now being constructed by the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company Limited, a body corporate, incorporated under the laws of the province of Quebec, between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis, on the south side of or in or along the St. Lawrence river, and the works on lands or lands covered with water, excavations, embankments, retaining structures, remedial works, dams, locks and other works appurtenant thereto, now executed or hereafter to be executed, are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

Counsel for the province of Quebec has cooperated with us with respect to this legislation and it is proposed to add a provision that nothing in the act shall in any sense be taken as interfering with any of the vested rights which the province of Quebec may have in hydro electric development as distinguished from the canalization of the river.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would that mean that the canal is to be declared for the general advantage of Canada but that the power created by virtue of the works will be under the control of the province of Quebec?

Mr. BENNETT: We could not make a declaration of that kind. That is something which will have to be decided ultimately by the courts. We propose to have a decision based upon a concrete case and not upon the theories which unfortunately engaged the attention of the supreme court.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is only that part which constitutes the canal which is declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: In order that my hon. friend may understand it, I will read it again. It is as follows:

> The canal now being constructed by the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company Limited, a body corporate, incorporated under the laws of the province of Quebec, between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis, on the south side of or in or along the St. Lawrence river, and the works on lands or lands covered with water, excavations, embankments, retaining structures, remedial works, dams, locks and other works appurtenant thereto, now executed or hereafter to be executed, are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: For the purposes of the canal?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a fact. I now proceed to the next point, and that is what is to happen with respect to the enterprise as at present constituted. With the approval of this house we propose to annul and cancel the order in council. Having regard to the circumstances under which it was obtained and the defiance of Canada and of the government, we propose to cancel it. The act will not become effective until proclamation of the governor in council is made to that effect.

We propose to ask parliament to authorize the diversion of water from the stream to the extent to which the order in council provided, namely, 40,000 second feet. We shall provide for those people who put their money bona fide into this proposition under the debentures of $30,000,000. This shall be carried out under such terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve. This statute also will come into effect upon proclamation of the governor in council.

The net result of the action which we propose to make will be, first, to declare that this canal is a work for the general advantage of Canada; second, we shall declare that the old order in council under which it operated is no longer operative; third, that no grants out of the river St. Lawrence shall be made by order in council, but only by parliament and we shall provide further that the order in council shall be on such terms and conditions that this undertaking, its successors or assigns shall be able to carry on. But one provision must be that protection is given to bona fide investors who have subscribed $30,000,000 to the enterprise and whose money has been there expended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend used the expression "grants will be made". I assume what he refers to is approval of plans.

Mr. BENNETT: No, a grant of water by parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A grant of water.

Mr. BENNETT: A right to divert 53,000 cubic feet per second of water, being the 40,000 cubic feet per second authorized by the province of Quebec and the 13,000 cubic feet per second that belonged to the Robert interests, the cotton mill interests, making 53,000 cubic per second that this parliament has granted, and that belongs, so far as the Dominion is concerned, to all the people, supplementing the action of the province of Quebec which has already given a lease of its rights in that water to the Beauharnois company, and has reserved the right to determine its successors; that so far as our legislative power extends, without arrogating to ourselves a power which we do not possess, this parliament will grant.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the same as the order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, but in the one case it is an order in council, and in the other it is parliament.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Under what form of management will the work now proceed?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has asked a question to which I was just going to refer. I have indicated what we propose to do—assert the supremacy of parliament on the one hand and declare once and for all that the methods by which the undertaking was commenced are not the methods by which it will be ended. Thirdly, it is desirable to ensure the continuation of this undertaking and to hasten its completion, because I believe it to be one of the greatest undertakings that could be completed in the national interest. Then there arises the question as to the control of the enterprise. That is involved in the terms and conditions for which the order in council must provide, because there are four alternatives, and four only, as I see the matter: first, the present management might be able to secure financial backing to enable them to continue. That is their business. I do not think they can. Second, the property could be taken over by the province of Quebec, under a hydro or public commission. That I do not believe the province of Quebec will do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And it is their own business.

Mr. BENNETT: Absolutely, and that of nobody else. I have made it clear that is their business absolutely and I have no comment or criticism to make in any way, shape or form as to what they do or do not do. I was privileged to have an opportunity of discussing the matter with one of their ministers the other day and I made it quite clear, as the hon. gentleman has said, that it would be as impertinent for me to suggest what they should do as it would be to suggest to the government of the United States what it should do.

Third, the Dominion might take it over, although legal difficulties would arise, to which reference was made yesterday and in regard to which I wholly agree, of such a character that the inevitable result would be the stoppage of the enterprise. I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who has just taken his seat: He must realize clearly we could not by any declaration of this parliament, unless Quebec acquiesced and became a partner with us, do what he suggests so far as the Dominion is concerned.

Mr. EULER: Would it not be competent for parliament or for the government of Canada, by purchase, to take the place of the shareholders of the Beauharnois company?

Mr. BENNETT: I had thought that question would be asked. The lease from the province of Quebec naturally provides that that province must concur in any alienation or transfer of that property and they would exercise their own discretion in that regard. But I have no reason to believe they desire the Dominion of Canada to undertake the operation of a hydro-electric plant in that province; neither have I any intention of asking the house for authority to do so.

Lastly, there might be complete reorganization of the enterprise under the circumstances to which I have alluded, namely, by the creation of a new corporation under the authority of an act of this parliament with the cooperation of the province of Quebec under such terms as will ensure the continued progress of the work and make it clear for all time that any concessions, that may have been obtained with the thought in the minds of those who received them that it was necessary to expend hundreds of thousands of dollars for that purpose, are negatived absolutely and positively, and that the honour of parliament and of this country cannot be bought and sold for any sum like $700,000, or any millions of dollars or any payment of that kind. I want to be fair about that. It has not been suggested that the honour of this parliament was bartered or sold, but it has been suggested by those who paid the money that they believed it could be secured in that way and that payment of money was the method to be adopted for the purpose of attaining the end they had in mind. This legislation will cure them of any such delusion.

One word more. The submission to the committee was broad. It has been suggested that a saw-off was arrived at with respect to some of the work of the committee. The committee was not investigating campaign funds, so called; the committee was investigating this undertaking. Last night the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King), once more trying to divert public attention from Beauharnois, began to talk about an investigation of campaign funds. For nine years the Liberal party was in power. Anyone who knows anything about campaign funds knows the party in power is always able to obtain them with readiness as compared with anybody else, for the contributions that are made, not for corrupt purposes, but for the purposes of enabling the organization of a party to be effective, are made on the assumption that the party in power is best able to attend to affairs because it has power to do great injury to those who are carrying on business in this country. I do not propose that there should be a roving commission going over Canada to ask every man that it meets whether he contributed money to help the Consumers' League or somebody else. I do not believe the people of Canada expect that a roving commission should be appointed to go around and ask everybody whether he made a contribution to a party fund or to help anyone to be elected or not. The people of this country are in the main honest, and many of them from profound conviction contribute even as small a sum as twenty-five cents to the fortunes of political parties. There is only one thing I want to say about the wellbeing of the party that sits across the way to my right, and it is this: Their organization ensures at the minimum of expenditure that the voice of the people may be recorded and the twenty-five cent contributions that are made by individual contributors to the funds of the party in the province in which I live have been of great use and have taught the people that they get just what they pay for, so far as that is concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Some hon. gentlemen are pleased to put upon that a meaning that I had not intended, and one which I think is not warranted. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spoke of the cost of his election being $500 or $600. The cost of election campaigns carried on by hon. gentlemen who sit opposite to me and to my right amount to only a few hundred dollars, for this reason: A candidate comes into one community and it is the bounden duty of the organization there to take care of him and to see that he gets his propaganda over until he goes to the next community. The same thing happens there, and so on. When I said that the people got what they paid for in alluding to the contributions of twenty-five cents apiece, I meant that they get elections without corruption and an honest expression of public opinion at the polls through the efforts that their money made possible. I do not think hon. gentlemen will object to that being done. I only wish that more of it were done in this country.

Mr. HANBURY: We will accept the right hon. gentleman's first statement.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think the hon gentleman is a living illustration of just what that statement means in his opinion.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Now will the hon. member be good!

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before the hon. gentleman proceeds to his peroration, I should like to ask him to revert for a moment to the question of management. He has not yet made it clear to me in what form the new management will be. How will it be handled?

Mr. BENNETT: I can assure the hon. member for Bow River of one thing, and that is that I am not going to manage the company or ask the people of this country to manage it. I look to the bankers interested in that enterprise to see that it receives such management as will ensure the terms and conditions of the order in council being those to which we may properly agree. It certainly must be changed, however, if that is what the hon. gentleman means. I could not undertake the management of that enterprise. When my hon. friend was asking the question, I could not help but think of the troubles which have been left on our doorstep. Here is one, and there is one down in Montreal harbour—I refer to the bridge. Those troubles are left on our doorstep. The auditors are there completing their report. These are the legacies left to us when we succeed to office; this is one of them, and that is another.

Now, may I complete what I have to say. I have said we have no intention of appointing any roving commission to run around the country and ask people what they are contributing to an election—not any. If my right hon. friend gets any comfort out of that, well and good. The reasons for it are obvious. Some of those who could give the most striking evidence with relation to campaign funds have passed to the beyond. There are others who, out of the goodness of their hearts, have made substantial contributions, just as the right hon. gentleman said last night, for the purpose of promoting the policies and principles in which they believe. The law as amended at the last session permitted corporations to make contributions, and that amendment was made at the instance of the gentleman from Winnipeg who has spoken to-day. That is the position. Contributions were made legal and proper, but in preceding elections that was not so.

We must always have regard to the morbid curiosity of people who desire to stick their noses into everybody else's business for the purpose of ascertaining just what their neighbours get, or do not get. How many men who listened last night were beneficiaries of the election funds in the last general election? How many of them will say no part of the election funds from the central fund was spent in their constituencies?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will; that is one.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, all I can say is, my hon. friend has probably been overlooked.

Mr. MANION: One.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I will say so.

Mr. BENNETT: Peradventure, if there be two righteous men the city may be saved,—peradventure.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How many on your side?

Mr. BENNETT: I am just putting that question to the whole house. But do not let those gentlemen go around arrogating to themselves virtues they do not possess, for the purpose of trying to get a mob to howl about campaign funds to cover up their delinquencies in regard to Beauharnois, to cover up the story that they themselves have spread upon Hansard about asking for money from their organizers, and then being reckless as to where it was obtained. Could anything be more reckless or indicate more utter disregard of the public interest than for a public man, at the end of a great inquiry before a committee of fellow members, to say, "I want a royal commission to investigate campaign funds of the years 1925, 1926 and 1930."

What about Beauharnois? That is the issue before us. If in the opinion of hon. members a royal commission or further inquiry is necessary at another session, so far as this government is concerned, it will give it to them. What is more. If, following the example of Blake and Huntington, those men who carried on the investigation with respect to the Pacific scandal, which was but a little drop in a river as compared to this, any hon. member will rise in this house, even at this late day in the session and make charges acquiesced in by a sufficient number of those about him, he will get the investigation, this session or next. You will get a commission or an investigation before a committee.

In view of the spirit that sometimes is aroused concerning these matters, I do not think judges should be dragged into discussions in this house. But I repeat if, however, hon. members will rise in the house next session or at another session, so long as we are in power, make charges with respect to election funds, give us particulars and do not propose a roving commission to run around the country, and attempt the impossible, we will meet them. I repeat, we will meet them. Make the charges against me, if they like,—and I except nobody from that statement. Make your charges, but do not go about this country talking about your virtues and arrogating to yourselves a righteousness you do not possess—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I say.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: —and then expect that the attention of the people will for a moment, be diverted from what this investigation discloses, by the old red herring trick of trying to induce them to think of something else. The tactics of Napoleon were "Divide and rule." Apparently you think that all you need to do is to induce people to believe that something or somebody else is wrong, and thus you may be able to induce them to forget that you stood and said, "Look on yonder building . . .; but we have no money." No; rich in influence, with leaflets distributed everywhere, we come before the house and say, "The paragon of an organizer was Sir Robert Hudson, of England." His Canadian counterpart is, my friend and organizer who like him gets money from "rich men," having only "good will" to dispose of.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will be glad to hear that if I had the time at my disposal I should not care to take so much as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), or had I the righteousness I should not care to display it as did the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I have often wished I had a wide vocabulary, but I never hear the leader of the opposition but I rejoice in my infirmity. I would say to the Prime Minister that there is nothing quite so hard to live with as self-righteousness, and if he intends to live with human beings—which we are, and which I proudly claim to be—it would be very well for him some time to be wrong. He is never wrong. He is not wrong when he brings down income tax legislation, and he is not wrong when he withdraws it; he never is wrong.

However, that is neither here nor there. I think if we needed proof of the fact that the party system is bankrupt we have certainly had it in the three and a half hour speech delivered last night, and in the speech we have heard to-day. While I do admire the despatch with which the Prime Minister acted, we must at least say for him that he does act. If he did so with a little less gusto, probably we would appreciate his actions still more. We are pleased with the stand he has taken; personally I rejoice in the thought that he intends to cancel the order in council and at least to go some distance in retaining for the people the power to be developed at Beauharnois. If it is to be managed by three bankers, however, I think I would have to know who they are and what they are before I could agree that the change is an improvement.

When one surveys the great fortunes which have been made in this country—and the fact is that great fortunes are being made in Canada—one traces them, always, to the natural resources. They have been made through the taking of the people's wealth. When one thinks of wealth in Ottawa, one thinks of lumber; when one thinks of wealth in Winnipeg, one thinks of wheat. Great wealth in any community has a close connection to the great natural resource of that particular locality. So again we have one bunch of exploiters—and we shall likely have others in the future—taking from the people the great natural resources that should belong to them, and taking it in a way that will cause those who use those resources when developed, for instance, the electric energy to be developed at Beauharnois, to pay more for it in perpetuity, while those who by their exploitation made an exorbitant profit quite likely will go scot free. I feel there should be a law—whether provincial or federal does not matter to me—to force those who so exploit our great natural resources to disgorge their dishonest gains or else go to jail like any ordinary Canadian citizen would have to do if found guilty of petty thievery. Why not? If a hungry person takes a loaf of bread or a bag of potatoes, or some other thing of practically no monetary value, he is sent to gaol. So why should not people who have taken wealth that certainly did not belong to them, whether they have given it to somebody else or retained it does not matter—why, I ask, should not such people be brought within the criminal code? Are we to do nothing about it? Are people of that type to be honoured rather than condemned? I suppose one should apologize for not knowing the law, and I regret my lack of legal training, but most of us have an average mental endowment, and I think we should remember that we are passing through very difficult and very hard times, and that there is nothing quite so nauseating to the people of Canada, nothing that arouses a rebellious spirit so strongly as the fact that when they are striving to remain honest and cheerful and hard-working, at the same time they see a bunch of rogues making off with wealth that really belongs to the nation. Unless something definite is done to curb these so-called financiers and the senators who got some of the money through their supposed political value, then as a former teacher and as a woman I would ask: What are we going to teach the children of Canada? What is the use of saying to the boys and girls in our public schools "We must have high ideals, we must be honest and hard-working, we must respect our institutions, we must look up to our public men and have confidence in them," if such men are to be allowed to remain in the parliament of Canada? Here are three senators who appeared before the Beauharnois committee, and I suppose they will continue to bear the prefix "honourable." If there is to be any respect for the Senate—and there is precious little now—we ought to rid the Senate of their presence, and we should not be afraid or ashamed to say so. I read in the latest issue of Toronto Saturday Night this amusing little poem which pictures the case in the words of the people:

Behold Beauharnois
How happy is The Senator!
He gets let in
On the ground floor,
And makes himself
A millionaire
For some concern
That isn't there.

The magnate has A lot of fun—
He splits up stocks
At ten for one,
And think how he
Is tickled when
He sells them out
At one for ten.

How generous is
The financier!
He gives a hundred Thousand clear
To any college
Chum he meets
And doesn't even Ask receipts.

The witness prides Himself a lot
On what he did
For what he got,
But on details—
He will be frank—
He finds his mind
A perfect blank.

O sweet to be
A politician
Whose acts are all
Above suspicion
But who can always Find a way
To make his nuisance
Value pay.

That is the way the people are looking at the Beauharnois scandal, and unless everybody is to be smirched by the disclosures we had better take no uncertain stand in the matter.

The Beauharnois committee was also told something about campaign funds. It is interesting to know where some of the campaign funds came from. It would be equally interesting to know where the remainder came from for both parties; because I do not think campaign funds always go to one party, I fancy they go to both. It is not so long ago that we had the liquor scandal, when an investigation disclosed that huge sums were paid to both parties by the liquor interests; then we had the customs scandal, and now the Beauharnois scandal. These investigations have given us three little glimpses of how campaign funds are paid. This does not mean that we know where all the campaign funds come from, but in the latest disclosures John Aird, jr., put it very well indeed. He said: "Gratefulness was always regarded as an important factor in dealing with democratic governments."

An hon. MEMBER: Sweezey.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, but he was telling what Aird told him. Well, in one way I do not blame the parties, I blame the people for payment of campaign funds. As long as the people enjoy having corporations and bunches of rogues, or whatever you like to call them —I do not mean that all corporations are controlled by rogues, I am thinking of this particular gang—as long as the people enjoy being fooled by men of that type it is their own fault. During my own campaigns I have said this many times: If the people of Southeast Grey do not want to pay for the financing of a candidate, then don't have one; if they do want one, then pay for it. Suppose every family in Canada paid $1 to the candidate of his choice, that is money enough to carry on an honest campaign, to pay for radio broadcasts, newspaper advertisements, lectures, and any other decent method of convincing the electorate of the virtues of the candidate. Until they do that we shall go on from the customs and the Beauharnois scandals to other scandals, on, on, on, endlessly, and sometimes it will be the Conservatives who are pure and holy, and sometimes—if they are careful and astute—it will be the Liberals.

Undoubtedly the methods of securing campaign funds for the support of the old parties throttles the whole idea of democratic government. The large sums which the old parties get—and they are not 25 cent pieces, I should judge—cause them to be "grateful," in the words of John Aird, jr., to those who give the money. However much those who require such campaign funds may try to be perfectly honest in their relation to the people of Canada, they can scarcely help being biased in favour of those who made their election possible by their bounty.

In the same issue of Saturday Night there is a very interesting cartoon, and I hope all hon. members will look at it. "The People" shown by a figure in the centre, very much bedraggled, a beaten little man, with a bump on his forehead, a black eye, hair dishevelled, deprived of his coat and in a state of impotent rage, his fists clenched, while on his right hand are two grinning, well-dressed, corpulent gentlemen representing the power interests, on his left two financiers emptying his coat pockets, in the background two politicians —there should be three—slinking off with a fat bag, seeming a bit ashamed. The cartoon is headed: They've Taken Everything but His Vote. And that is about where we are in democratic government. The people can vote, but they cannot do much else, for it does not matter a great deal which side they vote for. True, a change of government does help; we find out what the other party was doing, and that is always interesting. But certainly if there were no big campaign funds available to the old parties the number of independent members in this house would be much greater. They might not be sitting in this corner; they might not think as we do but they would be independent, free men, and how they would enjoy it. I am sure, during the last few weeks, many men in this house have gone through what the right hon. leader of the opposition last night called the valley of humiliation.

Then there is something else I should like to know. I should like to know why Sweezey gave John Aird that $125,000. The fact that it went to the province which supplied the contract which enabled the company to sell bonds is, to me, a suspicious circumstance.

Then take Aird's own words as given by Mr. Sweezey—we will go over them again. He testified that Aird said:

> That he thought that a contribution would be in order to the Ontario Conservative party because we would probably be having a lot more dealings with the Ontario people, and that gratefulness was always regarded as an important factor in dealing with democratic governments.

The matter is pretty clear to anyone who is not too credulous, but we ought to know more than we know about it as yet. One is almost led to suspect that long years of careful manoeuvring have taught certain people how to completely cover their tracks. I am not sure that the committee went into that question as far as they might have; I am not sure why it was not made clearer, though of course in the minds of the people it is quite clear. Mr. Aird was certainly a marvellous man to get that amount of money for a few words of advice, the nature of which he could not recall. Advice must be valuable.

Before I finish—and I have not taken very long, nor do I intend to do so—I must say that I think the people of Canada ought to take this lesson seriously in regard to campaign funds. If they do so this revelation will be worth while; a great lesson will have been learned by this investigation. I am sure I do not enjoy seeing people's characters besmirched, but there was one individual, Senator McDougald, about whom I feel it would not matter very much. A man who not only used his position of trust for his own enrichment but who betrayed his best friend seems to me beyond anything but our contempt. All the others, I suppose, are doing just what is being done in other corporations day after day and month after month, which goes to show how absolutely rotten is the social system under which we live. The Toronto Saturday Night, which is not a radical publication, or was not such, in P.M.R.'s column says the following:

> If the capitalistic system is to survive, there must not be scandals like the Beauharnois. Disclosures such as those which have shocked the country in recent weeks are just so much ammunition for the reds.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Are you sure that is not from the Worker?

Miss MACPHAIL: No, that is from the Toronto Saturday Night, and it is followed by a paragraph in which it is stated that the only argument in favour of the capitalistic system is that under it both overalled and white-collared workers have had the best opportunity for advancement, and that unless the capitalistic system proves that to be true it cannot last. There can be nothing more sure than that; we are watching the old system totter to its fall. I am not particularly interested in it, but if those who are interested wish to save it, it is time they bestirred themselves, because unless that is done, it will hasten to its end.

Motion agreed to on division.

FARM AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

POWER TO DEAL WITH AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS AND LABOUR SITUATION—MAINTENANCE OF ORDER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 142, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief, and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada.

He said: I think I have made all the explanations I can make with respect to this legislation, except that I indicated yesterday that it might be desirable to add "as far as the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada extend" or words to that effect. However, at the moment that has nothing to do with the second reading of the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since I have had an opportunity of seeing the bill I must confess that I feel it lends emphasis to the remarks I made in speaking on the resolution upon which the bill is based, and that it really would be impossible to express in too emphatic terms the objections to which the measure as proposed is open.

I should like to repeat that I believe it is a very great mistake to associate the relief of unemployment arising from economic causes, of which existing fiscal policies are one, and the relief required in rural areas because of distress occasioned by drought, failure of harvest and other like causes. It is an even greater and graver mistake to associate these relief measures with a measure concerned with peace, order and good government in Canada, which looks to me like a war measure applied to our country in times of peace. One would think that the possibility of a civil war were contemplated in this country by a measure of this kind, and that it was going to arise out of the extent of unemployment.

That is most unfortunate. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) did say that he desired legislation with respect to peace, order and good government in order to deal more effectively with some noisy minority who might represent certain bolshevist or what he terms communist views which he did not think should be permitted to make headway in this country, but the public will not get that idea from this measure, nor will those who are suffering from unemployment and who are experiencing the great distress which is theirs in virtue of the fact that, seek as they will, they are unable at the present time to secure remunerative employment. That is my first objection.

There is another objection, which is perhaps even stronger. The bill gives to the governor in council power not only to spend money for certain purposes but to borrow money and spend it without limit. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe there will be found on the statutes of this parliament any comparable measure in the whole history of Canadian legislation. As was pointed out the other evening by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), when parliament was asked to vote huge sums to meet the emergencies and necessities of war, the Prime Minister of the day never thought of coming to this House of Commons and asking parliament to give him a blank cheque for the purpose. He fixed some amount. True he was unable to estimate within appreciable bounds what the amount might be that would ultimately be required, but, notwithstanding, he did have some regard for the rights of parliament. It seems to me this bill disregards parliament altogether; it is a complete usurpation of the rights of parliament. This afternoon my right hon. friend spoke with some force, some emphasis and feeling about having regard to the traditions and the institutions of government. Well, the fundamental tradition in all that pertains to responsible government is that the people's representatives in the House of Commons must exercise control over taxation and that that right must never be taken away from them. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that that is exactly what this bill does. It takes away from this House of Commons and this parliament control over taxation, because no amount is named. We have no knowledge whatever of how much will be borrowed and how much will be spent. All we know is that after the treasury has been depleted to a very considerable extent, and our public debt has been correspondingly increased, and not until then, will the people have any idea of what this particular measure involves. I do not think it is possible to emphasize too strongly how serious is the departure which the government is making in asking this house, no matter what the reason may be, to give it unlimited powers of the kind.

When one reads the measure and contemplates the possible uses of the moneys, judging from the provisions with respect to what the governor in council may do once these powers are given, the situation will be seen to be more serious than ever. It becomes, I confess, extremely grave. In the first place, the measure gives the government power to aid in the relief of unemployment in a manner similar to that which characterized the legislation passed at the special session and which seemed at the time to be going pretty far. But it gives the government wider powers than were conferred at that time. Such relief as was given at the special session had relation to the needs of the provinces and the municipalities, and to a corresponding contribution on their part, which surrounded possible expenditures with some sort of limiting safeguard. But see what this measure does. It enables the governor in council to use any sum of money it may wish in order to—

(a) Provide for the construction, extension or improvement of public works, buildings, undertakings, railways, highways, subways, bridges and canals, harbours and wharves, and any other works and undertakings of any nature or kind whatsoever.

Why have a parliament at all? Why have estimates submitted to parliament for consideration if the governor in council is to be given authority to do without any control by parliament all these things which ought to be subject to the most careful scrutiny of this House of Commons? Take the next power given the ministry under this bill. They are empowered to:

(b) Assist in defraying the cost of the production, sale and distribution of the products of the field, farm, forest, sea, river and mine.

That gives the government power to do almost anything in the way of subsidizing any industry associated with the great natural resources of the country. They can give moneys to any extent to any enterprise to be used in any way. Why bring in a measure such as the one which passed this house a day or two ago, granting to the farmers a five cent bonus in connection with the production of their grain when under a measure of this kind the government without further sanction by parliament could give them 25? There was no necessity for that measure with this bill in view. All the powers required to grant that assistance and as much more as desired are being given in this bill to the governor in council without even the necessity of any supervision on the part of parliament. Take the next section, which empowers the government to:

(c) Assist provinces, cities, towns, municipalities and other bodies or associations, by loaning moneys thereto or guaranteeing repayment of moneys thereby, or in such other manner as may be deemed necessary or advisable.

Contemplate what that means. It gives the government the right to borrow to any extent, to assist in any way they please, for any purpose, the provinces, the cities and towns and municipalities, and other bodies or associations. That pretty nearly covers all important organizations that can be thought of which would require assistance for any reason whatever.

While the measure has reference to unemployment and farm relief and peace and order—that is the title of the bill—in reality it may be summed up in the first few words of the title: "An act to confer certain powers upon the governor in council." That is the whole purpose of the bill, to give additional powers to the governor in council to go to any length it wishes. Take the next section. This gives the government the power to:

(d) Take all such other measures as may be deemed necessary or advisable for carrying out the provisions of this act.

That leaves nothing that the government cannot do if it wishes to act under the terms of the bill now before us. I do not think that anything of this kind has ever been introduced in any parliament in any part of the world since there have been representative institutions and responsible government in the different countries. But the bill goes further. It not only contemplates the expenditure of moneys in this way; it gives the government power to make any orders or regulations it may wish to make by reason of the circumstances recited in the preamble. The preamble touches upon peace, order and good government—that covers pretty much everything; it touches specifically upon unemployment, rural distress and the like.

What this house is being asked to do now is to enable the government of Canada, without any supervision on the part of this parliament, to make any order or regulation whatsoever; this is equivalent to saying that the government may make any law whatsoever which can possibly have a bearing upon conditions in this country during the remainder of this year and until March, 1932. Never was power asked for by any government at any time of any parliament comparable to that which is asked for in this measure. Not only does the bill give the government power to make these various orders and regulations, but it gives power as well to enforce the orders and regulations. And in that connection it goes the length of providing that the government may make any order it pleases or any regulations, and that they may therefore revoke those orders and regulations. If a mistake has been made in the original order no consideration is to be due those who may have suffered under the order. I cannot conceive of anything more arbitrary, which an autocratic government could seek to possess, than power such as that. Just imagine a responsible body of the people's representatives being asked to give the administration power to make any rules and regulations it pleases, to pass any orders in council, to revoke those orders in council, and even if it be shown that injury has been suffered by those affected, and that there has been loss and suffering from the government's action, there shall be no redress! But that is not all. The measure goes on further than that. It asks this parliament to part for the time being with its right of imposing fine and imprisonment and to hand over that power as well without reservation to the government. It asks parliament to give to the governor in council power to fine and imprison if it thinks with respect to the enforcement of any feature of this legislation that may be necessary. I do submit, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where does it say that it gives the government power to fine and imprison?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Section 6 reads:

6. The governor in council may prescribe penalties that may be imposed for violation of the orders and regulations made under the authority of this act, but no such penalty shall exceed a fine of one thousand dollars or imprisonment for a term of more than three years, or both fine and imprisonment, and may also prescribe whether such penalty shall be imposed upon summary conviction or upon indictment.

Nothing could be more emphatic than that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That must be decided by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government prescribes the fine and the penalty creates the offence where there was no offence before.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It fixes the maximum penalty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It creates new offences and new penalties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not impose them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely parliament alone should have the right of saying what constitutes a criminal offence. Since when has parliament parted with its right to be the guardian of the people in the matter of liberties every citizen is entitled to possess? No citizen can escape being liable to fines and penalties which the governor in council may wish to prescribe if for any cause his actions may be held to come under the provisions of this section and if he does what the governor in council during the next nine months may say is a crime punishable by fine or imprisonment though no such offence exists at the present time. That is a most serious aspect of the whole measure.

If this measure were dealt with as it deserves to be, it would be the duty of this House of Commons to remain in session until the measure was withdrawn. That is the only way in which I believe a free parliament could in the circumstances be expected to maintain the rights of a free people. However, hon. gentlemen opposite have the majority; the government knows that it has at its back those who will support it through thick and thin. At this stage of the session we are forced to realize that no matter what we might do in the way of endless discussion the government would not alter this measure in any particular. Under these circumstances I am obliged to content myself with making as strong a protest as can be expressed in words. As I say, under ordinary circumstances it would have been our duty to fight this bill to the last ditch. Where a measure of this kind was in contemplation, it was the duty of the government not to have made it the last measure of the session, but rather the first of all measures that all hon. members might have had a full opportunity of disclosing before it was too late the grave seriousness of this taking away of powers from parliament to be given exclusively to the ministry.

I do not intend to move an amendment on the second reading. To do so might appear to be taking exception to what the ministry will say is the fundamental principle of the bill. I wish to avoid even the semblance of anything of that kind. So far as the bill is a measure for the relief of unemployment I am wholly and most heartily in accord with the principle of it. I shall go so far as to repeat what I said the other day, for I realize that we are reduced to that extremity in virtue of the power of hon. gentlemen opposite. If the government wishes to fix any amount it pleases —I do not care what the amount is as long as it will preserve at least the form, the appearance and the semblance of the authority of parliament—we on our part will be prepared in existing circumstances to subscribe without question to the measure. The ministry is doing something wholly indefensible, something which of itself will create more unrest in this country during the next few months than all that can ever be hoped for in the way of overtaking a very difficult situation.

When the bill reaches the committee stage, I will propose one or two amendments which touch the vital points to which I have just referred. I am going to ask that all the powers which are asked for shall be made subject to such appropriations as this parliament may vote. I believe that is the first duty of parliament with respect to the control of taxation and any added authority which it may give to the executive. I am going to move that we strike out of this measure the words which relate to peace, order and good government. I am going to do that not because I am opposed to the government taking all the powers which it may wish to have for purposes of the kind, but because any power of that sort should not be associated with unemployment relief in rural and urban areas. If the government will bring in another measure stating what it wishes to have in the way of additional authority to maintain peace, order and good government in Canada, I am almost prepared to say that for the sake of preserving the constitution and in appearance at least the authority of parliament I will give the measure ready support. I believe it is wrong, I believe it is cruel to associate with this measure, which relates to unemployment, to distressing economic conditions and to human suffering, anything which has to do with the semblance of riots and, possibly to a limited extent even of civil war.

This is all I desire to say at the moment. May I emphasize again that if this bill is passed in the form in which it has come before this parliament, it will be the beginning of the end of all that can be referred to as responsible government in Canada. It destroys the fundamental principle of control by the House of Commons over taxation. No measure at all comparable in its sinister possibilities and effect has ever been presented to parliament by this or I believe by any other responsible government, even in time of actual war.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to traverse the ground covered by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) except to say that I heartily concur in everything he has said. I shall not take the time to express my opinion of a government which proposes legislation of this kind in the parliament of Canada; I have no words at my command to condemn it strongly enough. I have known the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for twenty-five years, and I cannot conceive why he should attempt to thwart the will of parliament as he is doing by this legislation. He is asking for money to construct public works over which he will have control. We are all alive to the necessity of doing something to relieve unemployment, but I cannot condemn too strongly the action which the government is taking in this regard.

What is parliament for? Why are we sent here? What is our duty to the people? This government with its majority is taking upon itself the responsibility of doing everything which parliament should instruct them to do. After all this or any other government are but the stewards of parliament to carry out its behests, but this measure reverses that procedure right about face. What are we here for? What is left for parliament to do? This government is asking for authority to do anything they wish, in whatever manner they wish, and anyone who objects will be liable to fine and imprisonment. I do not know of any country in the world possessing a democratic government which would propose a measure such as this for the relief of the unemployed and the destitute. To combine it with a situation that actually puts into the hands of the government the right to declare a state of war in the country—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is my interpretation.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no such power asked.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why insert the expression "for the peace, order and good government"?

Mr. BENNETT: When the bill gets into committee I shall explain it to the hon. member.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be glad to get the explanation. My right hon. friend has not left out a single thing that he may require and that parliament properly has the right to bestow. He is asking for a blank cheque without the semblance of a statement as to his intentions. I presume—and I have no quarrel with him on that score—that so far as relief work is concerned, he will carry out the program that was carried out under the legislation of last September. But he is going to carry on public works, controlled absolutely by the government of Canada, and parliament is not given the consideration of a mention of what shall be done, except that it is asked to give a general, blank order that the government may do thus and so.

I could not let this occasion pass without voicing in the strongest terms condemnation of this attempt to get such wide powers. Indeed it is not only an attempt but a reality, as the Prime Minister informed us on previous occasions, when for instance we were discussing the tariff board bill: I have the majority behind me, and the majority is a subservient one and will carry me through.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the hon. member say when that was said?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It was said in a debate in the house by my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: When?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That my right hon. friend had the power behind him to carry out his wishes.

Mr. ROSS: When?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On a former occasion when we were discussing matters similar to this. I have not Hansard before me, but if my hon. friend will look it up he will find that my statement is correct.

Mr. COTNAM: My hon. friend was subservient to his leader.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not on all occasions, because I supported my hon. friend's party against the then government, on one occasion, and if a similar occasion arose, I would do it again.

Mr. COTNAM: Just once.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes; that is more than my hon. friend can say, because he would not think of doing such a thing. I have it on my record on a certain occasion, but I doubt whether my hon. friend, who is so anxious to interrupt proceedings and annoy, would ever do such a thing. It is the last thing that would occur to him. Without delaying the house further, I want to put myself on record as being unalterably opposed to this method of carrying on the affairs of this country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Sixth report of the select standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Bury.

Mr. BURY moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: The business of the house under the order of private and public bills having been disposed of, the house will revert to the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 142.

FARM AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

POWER TO DEAL WITH AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS AND LABOUR SITUATION—MAINTENANCE OF ORDER

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett for the second reading of Bill No. 142, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief, and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): When the house rose at six o'clock I had not intended to say anything on the bill now before us. Had it not been for the attitude of members of the cabinet I should not have spoken. We know the powers they seek to take out of the hands of parliament, and this is not the first time since the general election of July 28 last, they have endeavoured so to do. We know that at the special session the power of taxation was taken out of the hands of the people, a power which had rested with their representatives in parliament under the terms of the British constitution ever since the days of Magna Charta. The government took the power out of the hands of the representatives of the people and placed it in the hands of one man, the Minister of National Revenue, so that he could place upon goods a value for duty purposes without any respect whatever to their cost price. He could raise the value as high as he wished, reduce it as low as he wished or change it whenever he wished.

I desire to do nothing to delay the business of the house, but we had before us a few days ago a bill providing that members may be appointed to cabinet positions without asking the sanction of their constituents —just another instance of power being taken out of the hands of the people. The system of representative responsible government under which we live leads us to believe that the people constitute the great tribunal of last resort. That power has been kept in their hands, after having been fought for and won. and has been transmitted to us from the days when the heads of kings used to be tumbled into the wastebasket simply because they persisted in the imposing upon the people of their imperious wills, in the belief that the people were merely the serfs and chattels of the state and that the state and the high command must be all-supreme.

We have just emerged from the greatest conflict of the ages, and in it the very same principle was at stake, namely whether the common people would rule or whether they were to be serfs and chattels I have already described. In preparing for that great conflict the children of Germany were taken at a very tender age from their mothers and placed in the hands of the military command. So well did they succeed in this way, in building up a great military force that for four long years the freedom and liberty of humanity, the preservation of the liberties of the world, trembled in the balance. The measure which allows cabinet ministers to hold office without appealing to their constituents took away from the people a sacred right which should have been preserved. That is another instance in which the people lost the power and authority which should have been preserved to them.

Here again we have before us a blanket proposition through the medium of which the government can do anything they like with the finances of Canada, and where power is being taken from the representatives of the people and given to the custody of a few. I am not going to obstruct the measure, because I know it will pass, but I did not wish to see it pass without voicing my protest.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to speak at great length on the bill, but I desire to endorse the remarks made in opposition to it and to the manner in which it has been presented to parliament. I support every objection raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and I am in full sympathy with every word uttered by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) in the speech he delivered, which I have read in Hansard.

By this measure the government takes from parliament matters which should be under its exclusive control. It wipes away parliamentary control and takes upon itself all conceivable powers. The terms of the bill I am sure are more general than most people have begun to realize. Referring to section 2, I find the words:

> There may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as the governor in council in his discretion may deem expedient to expend for relieving distress, providing employment and maintaining peace, order and good government.

"Peace, order and good government," may mean anything. As was said in committee the other day, the sky is the limit. They are borrowing the very terms used in the British North America Act to define what is the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament. Section 91 provides:

> It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces;—

I draw the attention of the house to the following words:

> —and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—
> 1. The public debt and property.
> 2. The regulation of trade and commerce.

And so forth. By this bill they borrow not only those words "peace, order and good government," which may mean anything under the sun by way of legislative jurisdiction, but they take the trouble to say in section 3:

> Without restricting the generality of the terms of the next preceding section hereof, and notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law, the governor in council may,— —do certain things mentioned in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d). Under this bill as now drawn it will be within the power of the governor in council—of the Prime Minister of Canada—to take money from the consolidated revenue fund for the purpose of doing anything which under the British North America Act this parliament has the right to do. They may establish banks. We do not need any legislation for the completion of the Beauharnois canal—they will be able to build it under this proposed legislation. And they bring down this measure at the very end of the session, after members on both sides have for five or six months asked the government to define some policy for unemployment; they wait until the very last days of the session and then ask for this wholesale power without any restriction, without any control whatever on the part of parliament. I say that is a piece of despotism which has not had any parallel in the history of Canada, or, so far as I am aware, of any other democratic country enjoying responsible government. It is the establishment of a virtual dictatorship; there is no doubt about it. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said that it smacks of bolshevism, and my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said it was fascism. I do not know what term to use to describe it, but it is the worst piece of autocratic power which a prime minister or a government in this country has ever tried to assume.

Only the other day, Mr. Speaker, when some hon. gentlemen raised the question of unemployment and besought the Prime Minister to define some policy, he said that he was hampered because of constitutional difficulties, because of the powers of the provinces in matters of property and civil rights, and he had his doubts as to the power of this parliament to intervene directly and not through the provinces. And I myself did say at the time that I thought there was a national emergency, and that if unemployment had become a matter of national emergency the parliament of Canada had the right to legislate with regard to it; but never did it enter my mind, and I do not think it did enter the mind of any hon. gentleman, that that meant that parliament itself would abdicate its control, its power, its jurisdiction, its authority, and entrust all of these into the hands of one man or one set of men, who after all are only a committee of this parliament.

Sir, in matters of national finance the vital principle is the full sovereignty of parliament, of the representatives of the people, in disposing of the burdens which eventually will be borne by their constituents. Parliament and the government must be kept within their respective spheres, or else the whole machinery cannot work. No public money can be taken out of the consolidated revenue fund except by a vote of parliament, either by way of a special statute for an expenditure of a permanent nature like the salaries of judges, members of parliament, or something of that kind, or by an item in the estimates which is voted annually. That is the basic principle of the control of parliament over national expenditures. In the time of the great war at the special session of 1914 I had the honour of a seat in parliament. That was a national emergency; it was war, and in time of war everything seems to be permitted. In all the countries engaged in the war the inevitable answer to every suggestion or criticism was "This is a war measure." But even so the then Prime Minister never thought of asking parliament to give to him what the right hon. gentleman is asking parliament now to entrust to his care. Even then the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, although he asked for votes of money without their being subject to the ordinary measures of control, asked for a definite sum of $50,000,000 at the first session; and at every subsequent session another amount was voted by parliament, but always there was defined an amount which could not be exceeded, $100,000,000 or $150,000,000; and every time the Prime Minister thought it his duty to give to parliament, to the representatives of the people, a list of the destinations of the money which he was asking parliament to vote. We have nothing of that kind in the present bill. There is no detail; carte blanche is being asked without any control whatever. Even during the war, with the limitations which were then imposed, everybody knows that there were abuses, everybody knows that money was wasted, there were scandals, and a royal commission was appointed. My right hon. friend this afternoon spoke against judges sitting on royal commissions. That was not the idea of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden. At the most difficult time of the war when those questions of abuses, of wasted expenditures, of scandals were raised, he appointed two distinguished judges of the land, Right Hon. Mr. Justice Duff, of the Supreme Court of Canada, and Chief Justice Meredith, of Ontario. He thought that was the best way to act, and I quite agree. When there is a question of judicial importance; when judicial powers must be exercised, I agree that judges are the best men to carry on the work. I do not believe in justice being dispensed by majorities belonging to one or another party, and if I may be permitted to use the words of Burke, that is not where we can find the strict neutrality of impartial judges.

I say that even then there were abuses, but in this measure there is no limitation as far as amounts of money are concerned; there is no limitation as to the destination of those moneys or the use to which they may be put. I have been reading a book which my right hon. friend quoted many times when sitting on this side of the house but which he seems to have forgotten since he has been on the other side; I refer to that famous book written by Lord Hewart, chief justice of England, entitled The New Despotism. In that book Lord Hewart relates the story of an Anglo-Indian civil servant who returned to England on leave after an absence of many years. On arriving in London and while travelling between Victoria and Charing Cross stations he asked the man with him, "What are those buildings?" The man said, "Well, those are the parliament buildings; that is Westminster." The Anglo-Indian said, "What, does that rubbish still go on?" That was the attitude of mind of that gentleman, and if we agree to this bill in its present form I really believe we will be entering on a path fraught with grave danger. Surely someone will say, sometime, "Does this rubbish still go on at Ottawa, the parliament of Canada?"

Mr. DURANLEAU: What would the hon. member suggest?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suggest that an amount should be fixed. I am quite prepared to be as generous as possible in order to relieve unemployment in Canada and give work to the people who are willing to work, but parliament should set the amount.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What amount?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Any amount the government thinks necessary provided they give some good reasons for it, but not a blank amount which will enable them to do anything at all with regard to peace, order and good government. Under this act anything may be done by the government without parliament having anything to say in the matter. In the days of the worst kings the custom was to defy parliament, but they failed.

Mr. LAVERGNE: What kings?

Mr. LAPOINTE: What does the deputy speaker have to say?

Mr. LAVERGNE: What kings? Name the worst kings.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some of the kings my hon. friend is so fond of referring to—

Mr. LAVERGNE: May I ask—

Mr. LAPOINTE: If the hon. member for Montmagny, the deputy speaker of the house, will keep order, I shall be much obliged. I voted for his appointment as deputy speaker in order to keep him silent, and I hope he will not interrupt me when I speak in the house. I am willing to vote his salary, but I want him to keep quiet when I speak.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Once more—

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will talk about it.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Yes, in your county, any time you like.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will you keep quiet? Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to ask this noble deputy of yours to keep quiet? I know my hon. friend is more often an embarrassment to the Prime Minister than to myself, but I will ask him to keep quiet when I have the floor.

Mr. LAVERGNE: My most humble apologies.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who has the floor, Mr. Speaker, your deputy or myself?

Mr. LAVERGNE: Undoubtedly you have it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not quite remember what argument I was presenting when I was interrupted by my hon. friend. That shows how unfair it is, on the part of the man who is in charge of order in the house, to act as he has acted under the circumstances.

Mr. BOURASSA: You were speaking of kings.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, the kings who are so dear to the heart of my hon. friend. I was saying that some of those kings attempted to defy parliament but failed in the attempt. Apparently the ways of the new despots are different. They do not challenge parliament openly; they try to subordinate parliament, to supersede parliament, to render supreme their will or their caprice of those of the Prime Minister or governor in council, no matter what parliament may think; and they rely on a majority in the house to achieve that purpose. I repeat that this course is fraught with great danger, and hon. gentlemen should think twice before endorsing the principles embodied in this bill.

"Peace, order and good government"—I repeat, and I do not think any hon. gentleman opposite can successfully challenge my statement or contradict me, that this includes everything which under the British North America Act is under the control of the parliament of Canada. There is no limitation. The powers set out in the subsequent clauses do not restrict the generality of the expression "peace, order and good government," and on that point I am in agreement with the words of the right hon. leader of the opposition, who said the other day that it was adding insult to injury to include, in a bill for relief to the unemployed, provisions having to do with keeping order and things of that kind In other words the government seem to say, "We may give you bread; we will have the power to do so. We will have the power to give you work but also we will have the power and the money necessary to employ that power to shoot you down if you are not satisfied." Certainly that is not what hon. members in this house, even those on the other side, have in mind, but that is what is contained in this bill. I do not think the way to avoid disturbances and troubles is to deal with the people in that way. I do not think police matters and things of that kind should be included in a bill having to do with the relief of unemployment.

I do not like to add more on this feature of the subject, though there are many things which come to mind. I am speaking under some restraint, and I do not like to say all I am thinking about this feature of the bill.

I repeat, in conclusion, that so far as subscribing to relief measures is concerned, and giving assistance to those who are in need, I am quite willing to go as far as possible in the support of the government in any legislation it may bring down for that purpose. But this bill is the negation of the powers and the rights of parliament, and for that reason I cannot but oppose its second reading.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny): One would have thought last night that hon. gentlemen opposite were still in the valley of shame and humiliation, but it seems to-night, to hear the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), that they are coming out into the open plain of the shameless. One word particularly struck me in the address which the hon. member for Quebec East has made to-night, and I must say I was not surprised. The moment I mention the argument used by the hon. gentleman everyone in this house who has lived in the province of Quebec during the last twenty-five years will recognize it. After a long and sorrowful appeal in behalf of the liberties of the people, which the hon, gentleman scorned when he was in the government,—and we had a good example last night, without referring specifically to a past debate—the ex-Minister of Justice, with tears in his voice, suggested that there was some intention to shoot down the people. I may tell the hon. gentleman that this argument is exploded. It has been used too long in the province of Quebec to have any effect.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That was probably when the hon. gentleman was shooting holes in the British flag.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I did not at any time use language of that sort, but if the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) forgets the days of Papineau and William Lyon Mackenzie, I may tell him that I do not. He can discuss that matter with his leader. As a Canadian, I do not forget those days. At any rate, I have never shot holes in the British flag. Let me assure the hon. member for Quebec East once more that this kind of argument is exploded. Hon. gentlemen have been shooting the people of Quebec long enough; they will not now listen to anything of that sort. What they want this year is bread, which the hon. gentleman failed to give them. May I also tell him that we are waging a war—not a war such as they endorsed in this house and denounced in Quebec; not a war in Turkey or Egypt, nor the last war in India, discussed in their papers, La Presse and Le Soleil of Quebec, in which a picture of my hon. friend appears once a week. No; this is a war against hunger, a war against misery brought upon the people of Canada by the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have been following for a number of years past. And, to wage this war, we are willing to endorse a blank cheque, if hon. gentlemen wish to call it that.

When my hon. friend says that parliament has not been consulted, I wonder what we are doing now; I wonder what we shall be doing next year when this government brings before parliament its accounts in connection with the adminstration of this fund. But I will go further: I dare the hon. gentleman to get up and ask for a vote on this bill. Hon. gentlemen opposite will let it pass, "carried on division," as they have been doing lately, not having the courage to register their names to those great principles which they have been bringing before the house. The principles which they have been bringing before the house they have not the courage to bring before the people.

I was not going to speak on this matter, but the hon. gentleman, in his speech, became quite huffy. He began naming the worst kings who have reigned in the past. Let me put a very humble question to the king of Quebec—and the king of Quebec, I am afraid, like the ex-king of Spain, instead of standing his ground and answering, will take his hat and run away or take refuge behind the Speaker, who has to maintain order in this house. When I am in the chair I am for the time being not an ordinary member; I must maintain order, as the hon. gentleman knows very well.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And very poorly.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Very poorly, perhaps; I know my limitations, which is something that cannot be said for the hon. gentleman. He does not know his limitations.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What does the Prime Minister think of this exhibition?

Mr. LAVERGNE: I have not asked the Prime Minister's opinion. What he thinks of me is his own affair. But I know one thing: I know what the people of Quebec think of the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What will they think of the hon. member for Montmagny after this display?

Mr. LAVERGNE: I invite my hon. friend from Ottawa to come to Montmagny and he will see. That invitation is reasonable; it is a fair proposition; I am signing a blank cheque in that regard, and I ask my hon. friend to endorse it.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us have another.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I will go to Vancouver, although I am not an eloquent speaker like the hon. gentleman, and discuss it with him there. Speaking of what the Prime Minister may think of me, I know that I shall never receive at the hands of my leader the denunciation the hon. gentleman got from his leader last night. That is all I have to say on that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are you speaking about me?

Mr. LAVERGNE: My hon. friend knows that I have a great esteem for him; I esteem him too highly to repeat half what was said about him last night by his own leader. Now, coming to this bill which is before us, we are giving the government power to relieve an unusual situation in this country. One suggestion I might make, however, is that some time limit ought to be fixed in the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is fixed; the act expires in March, 1932.

Mr. LAVERGNE: That being so, parliament will then have an opportunity to criticize the government; the government will be responsible to parliament then. But I repeat what I said at the beginning to the uncrowned king of Quebec, or the resigned king of Queber, or—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Choose your worst.

Mr. LAVERGNE: If I chose my worst, I would say the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very, very clever.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Not very clever but quite sufficient for my hon. friend. However, I will say once more to the hon. gentleman, I dare him to vote against the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Only one cheer.

Hon. MAURICE DUPRE (Solicitor General): I will not say much on this subject, but I think I should answer the challenge of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). The hon. member for Quebec East, like the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), contends that this legislation is a departure from the basic principle of parliamentary government. It seems to me that this is only a matter of mere procedure. Hon. members seem to forget the fact, which in my humble estimation is important, that we are going to render an account of the moneys which we are going to spend. And this blank cheque, as they call it, is not for very long; it is only for a few months. As I understand the attitude of hon. members opposite, they are trying simply to raise a new constitutional issue. They tried this trick in 1926, when they raised a constitutional issue with reference to the governor general. I cannot say that it proved a fiasco on that occasion; they wanted to gain votes by it and they did succeed in getting many votes. If ever the word "humbug," which has been hurled at us, could be applied, it could be to the issue raised by the hon. member for Quebec East.

We are perfectly willing to take issue with our hon. friends on this question and we would like them to come into the province of Quebec and discuss it upon the public platform. When I heard the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) speaking about the basic principle of parliamentary practice, I thought of that ancestor of his who said in this house: Let my country perish but the principle must be saved. On that occasion Lafontaine answered him by saying just the opposite, let the principle perish but my country must be saved. We have no desire to be quite so tragic. We simply say: If there is a principle at stake, as our hon. friends contend, if they think it is as dangerous as they say it is, they can take care of the principle; we will take care of the unemployed. When I was speaking on the old age pension act and was faced with the criticism of hon. members opposite, I replied as did the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne): I challenged hon. members opposite to vote against the measure. Tonight I repeat that challenge. I defy my hon. friends opposite to vote against this legislation.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be an evening for challenges, and I rise to accept the challenge of the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré). The Minister did not say one word which would be helpful to the unemployed. If he has any political or parochial tactics to employ, he should go down to the province of Quebec and let us deal with the unemployment question. When the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was speaking, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) asked him what he suggested. I am going to offer a suggestion which I think will prove helpful to the unemployed. Section 3 of the bill states that the governor in council may—> provide for the construction, extension or improvement of public works, buildings, undertakings, railways, highways, subways, bridges and canals—

And so on. What the unemployed want in this bill is not that the governor in council "may" but that it "shall" provide. We want a program of what the government proposes to do to help the unemployed. That is my suggestion. Every hon. member admits that the unemployed and the farmer need relief, but why should unemployment and farm relief be coupled with a provision for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada? What has arisen in this country to cause such alarm? If there is any sign of rebellion or dissatisfaction among the labouring people it is due to the neglect of this government. During the last elections the party opposite undertook to end unemployment. The Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) was on the platform in Quebec when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) made that promise. The Prime Minister concluded his remarks by saying: "I ask all members from Quebec to vote against me and put me out of office if I do not carry out the obligations which I have undertaken to-night."

Mr. DUPRE: We are carrying them out now.

Mr. HEENAN: Has the hon. member's government carried out any obligation since they came into office?

An hon. MEMBER: What did the hon. member do?

Mr. HEENAN: In addition to coupling with this measure the maintenance of peace, order and good government, there is a provision that the bill is only to supplement what the provinces and other bodies do. If the provinces and other public bodies can do nothing, then the bill will be of no effect.

An hon. MEMBER: It would be of every effect.

Mr. HEENAN: It is only to supplement that which the provinces and other public bodies will do.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. HEENAN: The only trouble is that the Prime Minister speaks for the government instead of my hon. friend. Perhaps he should be Prime Minister.

An hon. MEMBER: We can read the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: If the hon. member can read this bill it is the first time I ever knew him to be able to read anything correctly. Let me read it to my hon. friend and see if he can understand my Irish. It reads:

> And whereas it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and other bodies—

It is in the public interest to supplement what the provinces will do.

An hon. MEMBER: That is only the preamble—read the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member does not know the difference between the preamble and the rest of the bill. Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise. The bill continues:

> —and for that purpose should vest in the governor in council the powers necessary to insure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of all relief measures and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada.

That is to say, the government would supplement what the provinces and the municipalities will do. I come from the best part of Canada, northern Ontario, a part of the country discriminated against and persecuted by the government of Ontario because of its political faith. Let me tell the house what the municipalities in this part of the country will be able to do. I do not intend to quote any political body, but rather a resolution passed by the associated chambers of commerce and boards of trade. The Kenora Examiner of Friday, June 19, contains the following resolution, which was one of many passed by this organization:

> Unemployment, the greatest problem facing the country to-day came up for discussion with the result that a resolution was submitted and adopted as below:
> Whereas, the problem of unemployment has now advanced to a position of primary importance in the life of northwestern Ontario inasmuch as in the various sections of the area there is an alarming percentage of unemployed workers.
> Whereas, the condition of unemployment has now existed for some eighteen months thus depleting the accumulated savings of the people entirely, in the majority of cases, and
> Whereas, many have gone in debt by mortgaging homes, life insurance, etc., thus impoverishing and pauperizing themselves to such an extent that the morale is seriously effected, and
> Whereas, the municipalities have mortgaged the future in order to provide their portion of the funds made mandatory under the provisions of the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, and
> Whereas, municipal taxation has increased to provide relief and the various councils now find the same or worse conditions of employment as existed in October, 1930, and are not able, financially, to provide either the work or direct relief needed, even though further funds were provided by the dominion and provincial governments, therefore be it,
> Resolved, that the northwestern Ontario federation boards of trade appeal to the provincial and dominion governments to immediately begin construction of the trans-Canada highway and to renew construction of the subsidiary roads still uncompleted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Speaker, there was so much ignorant interruption one other evening from the Conservatives as to cause the development of considerable heat. At that time I was just a little carried away and I made a very unparliamentary remark. I do not want to do that to-night and I will have to depend upon your honour to ask some of these hon, gentlemen who seem to treat this matter so flippantly—they did the same thing during the elections—to go into the smoking room so that peace, order and good government can be maintained in this house.

The position of the municipalities in northern Ontario in reference to further relief grants is that they are unable to tax their people any more in order to cope with the situation. This bill is simply to supplement the efforts of the provinces and of the Dominion. Some of our hon. friends opposite seem to think a miracle was performed after the last special session of parliament. They voted $20,000,000, and it was passed without division. Like members on the government side, I thought it would be very helpful, and it was to some extent; but when one analyses the result, I want to ask any hon. member of the government or of the party opposite whether they think the unemployed were properly provided for. Let us analyse what was done with the $20,000,000—and we have no assurance that more than $20,000,000 will be expended under the present legislation. I should like some hon. members opposite who have been glorifying what was done during the special session of parliament to tell us what they think when they hear the result in the several provinces so far as the housewife, the woman who has to keep up the home, is concerned, because after all, that is the test of the result.

The following statement has been issued by the Department of Labour, showing the result prior to June 10. It gives according to provinces the amount of man day's work, and the number of individuals employed. I have analysed the statement to show the extent to which the housewife has to cope with the situation, and that ought to be the test. I want the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) to applaud the figures in regard to Quebec.

Province	Number days' work per man	Man received	8 months		Average working man's family contains 5 and would receive		Dominion Government share
			Amount per week	Amount per day	per week	per day
Quebec	12	$ 33 60	$ 1 02	14-5/7c	20-4/7c	3c	3/4c
P.E.I.	8	22 40	68	9-5/7c	13-3/7c	2c	1/2c

N.B.	13	36 40	1 10	16c	22c	3-1/7c	4/7c

Will the Solicitor General applaud what the province of Quebec received, or is it the intention to do better this time?

Mr. DUPRE: I can answer my hon. friend.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not want an answer just now.

Mr. DUPRE: If the hon. member challenges me I should like to answer..

Mr. HEENAN: I want the hon. member to applaud. I do not want an answer.

Mr. DUPRE: I am not going to applaud, but I am prepared to answer the hon. member.

Mr. HEENAN: Some hon. members from Prince Edward Island may applaud the figures in regard to that province.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have no unemployment there. They were not asking for relief. The hon. member is putting up a straw man to knock down.

Mr. HEENAN: If the hon. member were a housewife keeping a family on three cents a day, he would be knocked down too.

These figures were obtained in the fairest way possible, because I consulted with those who issued the report, and it will be found that prior to June 10 there were 291,735 individuals who got 6,273,228 man days' work. But when one analyses that as it really is and as the housewife experiences it, one wonders whether the workingman of Canada is going to be treated any better under this bill, which is a blank cheque and which I may say I am going to vote for if we cannot get anything more satisfactory.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If it is as bad as that, why do you vote for it?

Mr. HEENAN: Some hon. members are so ignorant they don't know enough to rise in their places when they ask questions.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You don't understand anything; you must be ignorant.

Mr. HEENAN: You can't expect anything but a grunt from a pig, anyway.

One of the hon. members opposite took an hon. member from Winnipeg to task the other day for daring to suggest that Mr. Finlayson, the Minister of Lands and Forests for Ontario, would suggest anything with respect to camps. I understand the exception was taken to military camps. I say to hon. members that when I read Mr. Finlayson's statement and then read this bill I am wondering whether there will not be a necessity for military camps. I have before me Mr. Finlayson's statement as it appears in the Kenora Miner and News of Wednesday, July 15, 1931, when he addressed the board of trade, a non-political organization. At that time he tried to intimidate his hearers by telling them that if the town councils and boards of trade did not enter into political controversy and repudiate what the labour men in the Ontario legislature and I were stating, he was liable to spend in other parts of the country the money under his control. In other words, a minister came into the town of Kenora, one of the most democratic places in Canada, and, addressing a public body, made the statement that if they did not enter into political controversy and did not repudiate statements publicly made by their elected representatives, he might spend the money under his control in other parts of the province.

Does that not verify what I have said for many years, that there has been intimidation and persecution of the worst kind by the Ontario government? I shall read his statement as reported in the paper to which I have referred:

> Speaking on the problem of the floater or transient, Mr. Finlayson stated that he had been proposing, and his proposal was now receiving consideration, to take the transients to camps in spots where they will not interfere with local labour, and supply them with work, food and clothing, and pay in the spring, say fifty cents per day for their work during the winter.

I have been accused by labour men of being very mild in my views, that I am not at all radical, but if there is anything which will create communism and bolshevism it is the kind of treatment that is handed out to the working men of Canada. There is a suggestion in this statement of paying as little as fifty cents a day, and on the other hand we have before us a bill to provide for peace, order and good government if the men do not want to accept those conditions.

There is no provision in the bill to proceed with public works, but there is a provision that the governor in council may do so and so,—construct highways, public buildings, subways and anything of that kind. If we may judge from the results of what they did with the last $20,000,000 vote I am satisfied the money will not be used to the best advantage. In my section of the country, a new part of Ontario, boards of trade and town councils have gone on record as asking for the immediate construction of the highway. If this bill had provided for a subsidy sufficient to facilitate the commencement of work on the highway, I do not know but what I would have withdrawn my other objections to it. I have no assurance, however, of such help. Ontario ministers have come through northern Ontario telling the people that they will do something just as soon as the federal government acts.

Mr. McGREGOR: What can the Dominion government do, when you are in it?

Mr. HEENAN: Do you want a cigarette? I thought perhaps you wanted a cigarette to put in your mouth. Somebody has to maintain order in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker is there for that purpose, and will preserve order.

Mr. HEENAN: I shall ask him, Mr. Prime Minister, and I think you will agree with me that there are few hon. members who interrupt less than I do.

Mr. SPENCE: You are talking all the time. That is why you don't interrupt—you never quit talking.

Mr. HEENAN: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that you request the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) and other hon. members who cannot give anything but abuse, to refrain from so doing. Let them go outside and grunt, so that we may have peace and order in the house. The Prime Minister would do well to address his remarks to hon. members sitting behind him.

I wish to know whether the Prime Minister will consider the suggestion, which I made, in all seriousness, that a bill of this description providing for unemployment relief and the relief of needy farmers should not be coupled with a provision for the maintenance of law and order. I can recall another period in the history of Canada when similar measures were introduced. I was not in politics at the time, but I advised against such drastic action. Every man in western Canada will admit that it would have been far better for the western people if such drastic measures had not been enacted.

I contend that the legislation before us is only an aggravation and will disturb the men who consider they have grievances. The only men who were taken care of under the 1930 legislation were the common labourers. The government could go on with a program of building bridges, public buildings and other things of that nature which are really necessary and for the erection of which carpenters, machinists and other artisans could be employed at a fair rate of wages. The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette), speaking yesterday, complained that some labour members were arguing for higher wages. I have not heard a labour man in the house lodging that argument concerning this kind of work. We urge that fair and reasonable wages be paid.

The regulations under the Unemployment Relief Act of 1930 contained the following clause:

> All agreements made with provincial or municipal authorities involving the expenditure of any portion of the money appropriated by the act of public works or undertakings shall contain provisions for the payment of fair wages and hours of work in accordance with the intent of the Fair Wages and Eight-Hour Day Act 1930, and the fair wages policy of the government of Canada as set forth in order in council (P.C. 1206) dated 7th June, 1922, and amendments thereto.

That was the condition under which after the special session the provinces and municipalities received grants. To-night we have the spectacle of the government of Ontario ignoring entirely that provision. The Minister of Labour made the statement that he had by agreement with the province set a fair wage of thirty-five cents an hour, yet we find that in most parts of northern Ontario they were paying only 30 cents an hour. I am going again to ask the government to see to it that the moneys wrongfully withheld from the workingmen of northern Ontario be paid to them. That is an obligation of this government. From a return tabled in response to my inquiry I find that the fair wages for common labour is between 40 to 50 cents an hour, that being the scale set by this government during the last two or three years. Notwithstanding that this scale has recently been reduced to 35 cents an hour, the provincial government is paying only 30 cents an hour. This rate of wages was paid on highway work, and undoubtedly it was highway robbery to deny the workingmen of northern Ontario the money rightfully coming to them under the provisions of this act of parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. HEENAN: That is all my hon. friend knows about it. I noticed an hon. gentleman from New Brunswick who said "carried," told the house the other night that 27 cents an hour was sufficient for the workingmen of that province. He ought to bow his head in shame.

I am not going to discuss whether or not unemployment is greater now than when the government took office, for everybody knows it is greater, and everybody knows that the government is not responsible for it. But they boasted that they would end unemployment. Well, now they have to confess that they did not and could not end it. I object to the autocratic powers which the government seek by this bill, especially with respect to the maintenance of peace, order and good government. But notwithstanding these objections that I have to the measure, I am going to support it in the hope that some housewives in northern Ontario may get sufficient food, clothing and shelter during the coming winter.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Before I engage upon a very brief discussion of the general principles of the bill, may I, Mr. Speaker, enter my protest against the conduct of a man for whom I have a great personal regard—the deputy speaker of this house, an honourable gentleman who curiously enough takes such a prominent and contentious part in the debates.

Those of us who went through last winter in the various centres of Canada have a painful recollection of the tremendous efforts that had to be made by private individuals, by private organizations, by the municipalities, by the provincial governments and also by the federal government, to provide relief for the unemployed. In the budget debate I impressed on the right hon. Prime Minister that I contemplated with the greatest possible concern the very grave emergency that would confront us next winter. My observations lead me to believe that to cope with that emergency we shall need the joint efforts of all sections of the community and the absolute elimination of partisan considerations.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before I discuss the esential features of this bill I wish to direct a practical suggestion to the right hon. Prime Minister. It has already been advanced by my friends from Bow River (Mr. Garland) and Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine). The right hon. gentleman has subscribed to the famous pledge No. 5 of the Winnipeg convention; he is committed to the construction of an outlet from the Peace River to the sea. So is the party on this side of the house. I am not going to discuss the relative responsibilities of both parties in that regard. The other evening my good friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) gave us a well considered and very reasonable statement in regard to the difficulties that confront the government in a solution of this problem. He concluded that statement by informing the house that three engineers were to proceed to the Peace river area, one nominated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, one by the Canadian National Railways, and, as I understood him, a third by the government. Now, I wish to make this observation, but not in any critical spirit; at the present time the administration has ample information at its disposal to come to an immediate decision with respect to the most practical route to be followed from the Peace River area to the sea, and I submit that those three engineers within thirty days of leaving Ottawa can decide amongst themselves on the most feasible route. I wish to leave this suggestion with the right hon. Prime Minister also. To redeem his pledge he must, either this year or next year or in the near future, embark on a policy of railway construction between the Peace River and the sea, and I suggest to him and to his Minister of Railways—and I do so in the most friendly way possible—that there is no practical difficulty in reaching an immediate decision with respect to the most feasible route.

Mr. MANION: In the same friendly spirit may I interrupt my hon. friend? He has been studying the question, and I have heard him speak on it a number of times. Would he offer the house his opinion on the best possible route?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My personal predilections in the matter might be influenced by territorial considerations. All that we desire on the Pacific coast is an outlet from the Peace River district to the sea. We are convinced that if that outlet taps the Canadian National Railways there will be inevitably a diversion of traffic from the great and growing city of Vancouver.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend knows that we can come out by the Canadian National Railways in two or three different ways. We are in the same position as he is, we are amateurs in the choosing of routes. Would he suggest the one that he prefers?

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): We already have facilities at Prince Rupert, owned by the Canadian National; why not use them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There are three possible routes, namely, the Peace pass, the Monkman pass, or the Pine pass, by tapping the Canadian National Railways. I am going to link up this question with the present emergency situation with regard to unemployment in the west. You cannot complete your outlet from the Peace River to the sea at much less than $20,000,000. To-day you could place at work betwen Rolla or Pouce Coupé and Prince George, or whatever point you are touching on the Canadian National system, some 20,000 men and have them with their hands making ties, and with their hands placing those ties on the grades, abolishing as far as possible all unnecessary machinery. We have from the present government of British Columbia the promise that if my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, his right hon. leader and the government embark upon a comprehensive policy of developing the Peace River outlet, the provincial government will commence construction from Quesnel to Prince George of the Pacific Great Eastern railway, thereby placing many more residents of that province at work.

Mr. MANION: But my hon. friend knows that the engineers themselves differ, and that was why I asked the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am quite well aware of that fact, but what I am trying to drive home is this: There is no reason why the engineers should not come to an immediate decision. This winter my hon. friend's government will be confronted, under the authority of this blanket legislation, to which I shall come in a few moments, with an expenditure the amount of which they cannot tell at the present moment. My suggestion is this: Last year something in the neighbourhood of $20,000,000 was spent directly by this government, and about $70,000,000 in all throughout Canada in connection with unemployment. I am suggesting to the administration that if in the future they are to be committed to the expenditure of some $20,000,000 in the development of a Peace River outlet; if this winter they will be compelled to spend millions of dollars, possibly in unjustifiable expenditures, perhaps on some useless roadways in British Columbia and the prairie provinces, why not combine the emergency of the moment with the definite policy of the future and spend your $20,000,000 this year, putting men at work in the finest climate in Canada during the coming autumn and winter? In that way you will go far towards solving the unemployment problem of British Columbia and the western provinces. I do suggest that to the Prime Minister, not in any political sense. He is aware that some weeks ago I requested an interview with him on this subject on behalf of myself and other western members. I realize that because of his responsibilities he could not possibly meet our committee at the time—

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend was busy in a committee himself; that was the real trouble.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is true; we were both busy, but the western members certainly would have appreciated an opportunity of discussing this very grave situation with my right hon. friend in an entirely non-partisan way.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I arranged for the interview with the western members.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Now may I consider, in the light of the present situation in Canada, the situation which existed just over a year ago. At that time a political campaign was being waged throughout the Dominion, and we had the present ministers of the crown making definite and specific promises and pledges to the Canadian people in regard to this grave issue of unemployment. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this house that very largely as a result of the promises they made and the pledges they gave they are to-day in office as ministers of the crown. What did my right hon. friend the Prime Minister say? Speaking in his own city of Calgary on June 12, 1930, the Prime Minister said:

> This is a new country, and there is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty.

Those words, Mr. Speaker, as and when they were uttered, were either true or false. If they were true, surely we are within the bounds of fair play in confronting the right hon. gentleman, a year after he has been in office, with the promises he made to the Canadian people at that time. Again, speaking in Victoria on June 17, he said:

> Is there any excuse for Canada to have hard times—if the government is discharging its duty as it should?

Further, speaking in this house during the special session, on September 17 of last year he said that whatever promises he gave and whatever pledges he made, this government proposed to implement them immediately. The actual situation, sir, which I am sure causes every hon. member of this house the gravest possible concern to-day, is a hundredfold worse than it was before July 28, 1930. And, sir, this legislation is the remedy offered this house; this is the remedy offered the Canadian nation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I ask hon. members not to be impatient; I have good reason to fear that before we meet again in this house they may be more serious in their attitude towards this very grave problem. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure it is true of all hon. members in this house: I leave to-night for the city I have the honour to represent in this parliament, and I intend to spend all the time at my disposal during this coming autumn and winter in every possible conference to do all I can to help those who are hungry, those who are starving and those who are unclad, of whom we have been told, who in my city of Vancouver are being fed in a jungle by the organized clergy of the city. I am sure other hon. members of this house will do the same thing. That is the situation in Canada thirteen months after my right hon. friend told the Canadian people—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —there was no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government did its duty. Is there any excuse, Mr. Speaker? Was the right hon. gentleman right or was he wrong? Either there is an excuse for unemployment to-day in Canada or this government is not doing its duty by the Canadian people. Here we have the remedy proposed by the government to meet this emergency situation.

The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), speaking in this house a few moments ago, said this was a war against human misery and human starvation. Well, if that is true—and possibly it is—then that was an admission by the hon. member that this is war legislation. I suggest to hon. members of the house that during the campaign last year the Prime Minister suggested that the unemployment situation could only be fully met by calling a special session of parliament. Sir, if the authority of parliament was necessary at a special session in September, 1930, why is it necessary, in July, 1931, to dispense in one fell swoop with the entire authority of this house and to give the government blanket authority to deal with three great subjects which have been linked together in a trinity of measures—the unemployment situation, the relief of farmers in the west and the preservation of peace, order and good government in Canada?

I greatly fear that the inclusion of the latter of this trinity of measures, Mr. Speaker, together with legislation which is designed to help our unemployed, our suffering, our hungry and our starving, is a direct incitement to insurrection and insubordination in every city in this Dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Now we are getting at it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I trust, sir, that my interpretation of this section is not correct, but I do want to emphasize to my right hon. friend that he has abolished, in one piece of legislation, those great and imperishable liberties which the people from whom we obtained our ideas of political and constitutional freedom secured after centuries of effort and struggle. Last year my right hon. friend the Prime Minister could not deal with the situation except by summoning a special session of parliament. Now in one piece of legislation he takes away from parliament all authority and all control and gives to the governor in council complete power, complete jurisdiction and complete control over the situation in Canada in regard to the maintenance of peace, order and good government. I associate myself in the most emphatic way with those who along these benches have described this legislation as the grossest usurpation of those parliamentary rights which have been established through the efforts of the common people over hundreds of years.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): I do not intend in these dying hours of the session to take up much time discussing this matter of relief. I am glad to know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is at last convinced that in western Canada there is a condition that calls for relief. From the time the house opened in March last we on this side have been endeavouring to impress upon the Prime Minister and his government the seriousness of the situation in the west. But when we told him about these things we were simply told that we were playing politics. Some of his supporters from the west charged us with playing politics and laughed at us for our pains. They told us there was nothing to it. But at last apparently the Prime Minister is converted. He begins to realize that there is out there a condition that requires immediate relief. Well, we rejoice even in one convert. There is, we are told, more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine that need no repentance. The right hon. gentleman has changed his mind. It was the same thing with the income tax and the stamp tax—something proposed and then changed. It is the same thing over and over again: off again, on again, in again, Finnegan—another jump. He does not know where he is going but he is on the way.

An hon. MEMBER: Pretty cheap.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes; I thought the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite were pretty cheap when we came here and told them of conditions in the west and they only laughed at us. I have been thirty years in western Canada and have never known things to be so bad. For the last three years in my constituency we have not had a crop. An odd farmer here and there has had seed, but we find poverty and starvation everywhere. I have driven into communities and have talked with people and I can assure the house that I have never known such conditions to exist before. Things are bad enough indeed when a man will come and tell you that his three little girls came to him crying because they had no shoes to wear, nothing to put on their feet to go to a Christmas tree. And when you see a home with five or six little children all with pinched faces, showing starvation, you will realize what things are like. Yet when hon. members come to this house and try to impress upon the government the seriousness of the situation they are only told that they are playing politics.

Just consider what the Prime Minister himself said in regard to conditions out in the west. Speaking in this house he said, as reported at page 779.

> The bank reports show that tens of thousands of farmers in western Canada have money in the bank.

And later on, at page 780, he is reported:

> There are some people who try to make it appear that the western country is a country that is bankrupt. I repeat, those gentlemen are entirely wrong. Western Canada is the country it always has been.

Further:

> The other day I had a letter from a gentleman saying: Cannot something be done to stop Mr. So and So from talking so about his country?

An hon. MEMBER: What date was that?

Mr. DONNELLY: You can look it up; I gave you the page.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the date?

Mr. DONNELLY: It is this year's Hansard.

An hon. MEMBER: That was before we knew we had a crop failure.

Mr. DONNELLY: We have had a crop failure for two years, and I have been telling the government what the conditions were. I knew what the conditions were last winter and I knew what they were when I came here and stated them to the government. But I got no sympathy, no consideration from the government or from anyone else on the other side.

An hon. MEMBER: Play fair; give us the date.

Mr. DONNELLY: I played fair but your side did not. Again, at page 1075, the Prime Minister is reported:

> But what have we from hon. gentlemen opposite? Nothing but the Jeremiah wail of despair.

That was on April 28, 1931. These are some of the things we were told when we tried to put before the government the situation as it has existed out in the west for some time. For three years relief has been handed out. Two years ago that relief was given by the municipalities, and as usual the ne'er-do-wells and drifters, the ordinary labourers and renters, came to the municipality and got relief. But the thrifty farmer who was trying to make a go of it got no consideration. All the relief was handed out and paid for by the municipalities, and the result was that quite often they were very hard up. Last year the relief handed out was paid for partly by this government, partly by the provincial government, and partly by the municipalities. And, again, those who got relief were the ne'er-do-wells and drifters, the ordinary man who could not succeed; they were always looking for something which they could get as easily as possible. But the thrifty farmer received little consideration. Yet he had to pay the shot, because one-third was charged to him in his taxes.

What do we find now? This year these thrifty farmers are up against it just as much as anyone else. Their backs are against the wall. They have not paid their loans from the banks for three years; they have not paid their taxes; they are not able to meet the interest on their mortgages. Unless something is done at once for these people they will be driven from the land. There is no doubt about that. Indeed, some are leaving now, and I tell the Prime Minister that this is a serious condition that must be faced. It is no laughing matter when you see men who are the backbone of the country, thrifty, capable farmers, taking the view that the best thing for them to do is to pull up stakes and move out.

Conditions were so serious in the middle of June, when our pastures are supposed to be good, that horses and cattle were dying from lack of food. In June, in one municipality I know, they brought seventy carloads of hay to keep the stock and cattle alive. Ours are famine conditions, conditions as serious as any that ever existed in India or China when our charitable institutions in this country have raised money for the relief of the people in those countries. Surely we can do the same thing for our own people. If we had hundreds of millions with which to fight the war with Germany, when we were killing and were being killed, surely we have money to spend in western Canada to relieve the people there.

Mr. BENNETT: Why try to prevent its being done?

Mr. DONNELLY: I am only pointing out that the relief is so late in coming. This is eleventh-hour repentance; it is coming at the last moment.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not too late.

Mr. DONNELLY: Probably conditions are better in the hon. gentleman's section of the country; but let him come to my section and he will hear what the people have to say. Last year the relief came too late, for the only work that can be done in those sections is road work, and you cannot work on the roads when the ground is frozen. Now is the time to get down to work with road gangs, men and horses. These people do not want charity; they want a chance to work. That is what the Prime Minister himself told the people in the stadium in Regina when he almost cried over them. He said, "The people do not want charity; they want a chance to work." The same is true to-day. Open up work for the people. And this work must be given to all who need it; it must not be given only to the ne'er-do-wells and the drifters but to the thrifty as well. In my opinion this work should be divided up so that each grown-up person may receive, say, $100. There should be about $100 granted to every grown-up man and woman and something like $50 to every child. A survey of the districts should be made in order to estimate how much each family should receive. Sufficient should be given to keep these people for ten months. There is no chance that they will make any money until the crops ripen next year.

This thing should not be handled as it was handled last year.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman must realize that the primary obligation in this matter rests with the provinces and it is only now that we are in a position to give any support.. The uncertainty of what might be involved is the reason for the character of this bill.

Mr. DONNELLY: I appreciate very much that position but I say that this relief should not be handed out as it was last year. In certain districts in my riding if you were a good Tory you got a job.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not true.

Mr. DONNELLY: Excuse me, but I know what happened.

An hon. MEMBER: Did the same thing apply in Quebec?

Mr. DONNELLY: The hon. member can look after that himself; I am speaking about what happened in my own district. If you were a Tory you got a job but if you were a Liberal you were very likely not to get a job.

An hon. MEMBER: That statement is not true about the hon. member's district.

Mr. VENIOT: It is true of any district.

Mr. DONNELLY: In one instance they went four towns away in order to get a good Tory who was a prospective candidate to come in and take a contract. All the local Tories were turned down, and that action made about one hundred good Liberals in that district. This relief work should be handled by non-partisan bodies. Let the municipal officers handle it, and in the local improvement districts, let it be handed over to the overseers. I know of one instance last year where a hotel-keeper who had a section of land clear as well as his hotel clear was picked out and put in charge of a road gang in order that he could receive relief. A thing like that looks pretty queer.

Mr. BENNETT: The federal government did not hand out anything. Everything was handled through the provincial authorities.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is just what some of the people thought, that the federal government did not hand out anything. In many districts they got very little.

Mr. BENNETT: The money was paid to the provinces and not to the individuals direct or to the municipalities.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understood the Prime Minister to say that they did not hand out anything, and that is what some of the people in my district think. They did not get enough to keep themselves properly clothed.

An hon. MEMBER: You will not get them any more.

Mr. DONNELLY: Probably not, but I am not laughing over the situation. Hon. members laugh at these people suffering from hunger and want.

An hon. MEMBER: You are the joke.

Mr. DONNELLY: This is a condition at which you laugh; it does not appear to be serious with you.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Hon. members must address the chair and not one another.

Mr. DONNELLY: The provincial premier and others had a meeting the other day at Yorkton at which it was stated that this unemployment matter should be handled in a non-partisan way. I agree with that statement because it is a terrible thing to have to think that a man's politics will determine whether or not he obtains relief. The premier asked his political opponents to join hand in hand with him to meet these conditions. He asked that they do away with politics. One of his ministers got up and asked that politics be forgotten, that we unite to help the unemployed—and then he launched an attack against the opposition. Is that the way to approach an opponent when you want him to join wholeheartedly with you? I say to this government and the government of Saskatchewan that I am ready and willing at all times to meet them half way to alleviate the condition we have out there. Politics should be forgotten but it must not be expected that we will stand for that sort of treatment. That is not the way a matter such as this should be approached.

The condition is so serious that I do not think any government or group of governments can handle it. The Red Cross and other charitable institutions should be called in to lend their assistance. A government cannot go from home to home and from place to place and hand out boots and shoes and wearing apparel of one kind and another. The charitable organizations will have to be called in to give assistance. Last year while I was in the east I went to several places and called upon certain clergymen, and we sent out two or three tons of second-hand clothing and boots and shoes. That was altogether inadequate even for last winter, which was so mild. If this winter should happen to be a hard winter there will be much suffering unless steps are taken to send help to these people; ten times the amount of clothing will probably be needed. Our charitable organizations should begin at once to make preparations to relieve the suffering of these people in western Canada.

I welcome this bill, but I am sorry that it has come so late in the session. It should have been introduced much earlier in order that this work could have been started some time ago. However, we rejoice over the eleventh hour repentance when it does come. I think a definite amount should have been named. I believe it will take at least $100,000,000 to relieve conditions. Approximately $80,000,000 was spent last year by our railroads, municipalities and the provincial and dominion governments. The municipalities of western Canada will not have any money to spend this year upon relief; they will not be able to put up a cent. In many of our districts they are threatening to close down the public schools, and that is one objection I have to the grant for technical education. If we are to give a grant of this nature, it should be handed over to the provinces for educational purposes, letting them use it as they see best for either technical education or public schools. It is a terrible condition when one sees public schools closing and children not getting the privilege of learning to read and write, while the federal government is giving a grant for technical education. In my own village where we had five teachers, we have reduced the number to three and have cut their salaries in half in order to keep the schools going, because there is very little money coming in from the municipality this year and there was very little last year.

These are some of the conditions as they exist out in the west, and if this legislation will give any relief to these people, I welcome it. I hope the relief work will begin at once, because, as I say, once the ground freezes up, very little work can be done at making roads, and that is practically the only work that can be given; otherwise the money will have to be paid out as direct relief.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): I want to speak briefly in support of the government measure in connection with unemployment relief. I shall commence by expressing my approval of that portion of the measure which deals with the maintenance of law and order. Last night on the streets of Toronto bills were distributed in English and other languages, and although I have not copies, judging from the Party Organizer, a pamphlet published by the Communist party of Canada, I have no doubt that similar bills were distributed elsewhere in the country. This bill reads:

Out on the streets on August first.

Demonstrate on Saturday, August 1, at 12.30 noon, Spadina and Queen.

To all workers of Toronto:

August first, the real day of struggle against imperialist war and for the defence of the Soviet Union, must be made into a day of militant working class solidarity. All class-conscious workers must come out into the streets and demonstrate against the danger of imperialist war and for the defence of the Soviet Union.

On August first, to-day, Canada, as part of the world capitalist system, finds itself in the grip of the deepest, most widespread crisis ever recorded. Five hundred thousand industrial workers, besides hundreds of thousands of agricultural workers, are walking the streets.

Let me pause for a moment to state that that is absolutely untrue. There are not at present in Canada 500,000 workers unemployed. Another paragraph reads:

Fellow workers: the Communist party and the Young Communist League, united with all militant working class organizations, calls on you to come into the streets to demonstrate your readiness to fight against these war preparations. The struggle against war is closely bound up with the struggle for your immediate demands, with the struggle to build your revolutionary organizations, with the struggle for the defence of the Soviet Union.

I shall pause for a moment again. This circular, like many others I have in my possession, speaks of revolution, of wars, as if the thought uppermost in the minds of the organizers behind these sheets is revolution, the upsetting of law and order not only in Canada but throughout the world. At the bottom the circular reads:

Demonstrate on August first.

Fight against wage cuts and worsening conditions.

Fight for non-contributory unemployment insurance.

Fight against growing political terror.

Make August first a mighty demonstration against imperialist war and for the defence of the socialist fatherland.

Saturday, August first, 12.30 noon, Queen and Spadina.

Mr. FACTOR: Does the law not now provide for punishment for distributing circulars of that kind?

Mr. MacNICOL: There are not sufficient police to be on every street corner in Toronto to prevent distribution.

In the Party Organizer published by the central organization department of the Communist Party of Canada, I find the following on page 10:

Hang this reminder in the kitchen.

When the cupboard is bare; when threats are made to cut off relief; when electricity, gas or water is discontinued, or if any worker is to be thrown out on the street because he cannot pay his rent, or at any time that unemployed are discriminated against, communicate with local council of the Nationalist Unemployed Workers Association.

The N.U.W.A. organizes and fights for non-contributory unemployment insurance for immediate cash relief, for free electricity, gas and water and against evictions. Organize unemployed councils. Fight, don't starve.

We are all deeply sorry for any of our fellow citizens who are out of work, and I am sure the people of Canada will support the government in every effort it makes to see to it that no Canadian citizen suffers either this fall or the coming winter, through cold, lack of clothes or lack of food. We can trust the government and the Canadian people to see to it that our fellow citizens do not suffer. But we must have law and order, and agitators who always do their best to cause revolution and to interfere with the administration of law and order, when times are hard as they are to-day, must not be permitted to bring about revolution in this country. I have under my hand another paper distributed in Toronto, and, I suppose, elsewhere. This is entitled "Toronto Free Bread League." Amongst many other resolutions and so forth, I find this:

Our demand is, that the city of Toronto take over all the bakeries, at a valuation to be later decided, and distribute bread free, plain bread, brown and white, to every house, big and little, to all stores, shops and hotels, and lunchrooms, wherever bread is needed, and that it be a criminal offence to sell bread.

Surely there must be some provision against such people agitating for the violation of law and order in this manner.

Mr. FACTOR: There is a law now.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the issue of the Worker of May 16, 1931, is the report of a meeting held in Queen Street United Church in Toronto, which had been loaned for the occasion. The article is as follows:

Starting by singing the "International"—

I have a copy of it here, but I shall not take time to place it on Hansard, because I believe most people have heard it.

—the meeting was thrown open to free discussion, and one speaker after another condemned the church as an opium vendor, demanded non-contributory unemployed insurance and urged the workers present to join the National Unemployed Workers Association. The first speaker declared "What we want is an international soviet union."

I have absolutely no comment to make concerning Russia. The way the Russians desire to govern their country is their business, not mine. It is my business however and the business of every loyal Canadian to see that Canada is not governed in the same way as is the soviet union. It is up to us to maintain our own standards and ideals which have been handed down to us by those who have preceded us. I maintain that the government ought to be supported in any measures necessary to maintain law and order. I am not in accord with injuring or maltreating men out of work; on the contrary I think every legitimate means should be taken to see that they obtain employment. Failing to obtain employment, and failing to make a living, the government should—and I believe will—defend them from want, cold or from whatever they may suffer. I have confidence that it will fulfil its duty.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) said that as a result of the legislation adopted last fall, during the special session of parliament approximately $80,000,000 were spent. Surely the spending of that sum of money on the building of subways and like works is something worth while, and must have given considerable employment to those engaged. In the riding I have the honour to represent, a subway has been built which required labour not only for excavating but for the building of steel bridges and girders used in construction, for the manufacture of cement and the lumber required in making the forms. Immediately adjacent to my riding two other subways are being erected. I do not know how many others may have been built throughout Canada but I am sure there must have been a considerable number. The government and the municipalities associated are surely entitled to some credit for such construction.

I know that the legislation enacted last fall resulted in the building of a number of factories. Concerning three I can speak very definitely, one in particular being in my riding. In the erection of those three factories between 700 and 800 men have been employed. Approximately the same number would be engaged in manufacturing the material which entered into construction. In two of the three there are now about 400 people engaged in work. In the third one, which will be completed within the next two months, 450 more will be employed.

Numbers of other factories are being erected throughout Canada; is that not worth while? I cannot understand why men rail against giving employment to fellow citizens; I cannot understand why they do not appreciate work which is given to their fellow citizens and legislation which makes such work possible. They ought to try to appreciate what is being done instead of talking blue ruin. Anyone who has been in business for a quarter of a century, as I have been, and who has associated with hundreds of men and see them without employment, cannot help but feel sympathetic and express the wish that everything possible should be done to secure employment for them. The Canadian working men are an object lesson for the rest of the world. In spite of all the distress they remain sane, and they, along with the Canadian working women, accept the situation and look forward to a brighter future. They are law abiding and intend to do as their fathers did in the previous crises of 1876, 1893, 1920-23, and others in the present century. This is a time when we should all cooperate to do our best to relieve the distress and suffering around us.

Judging from the results obtained by the legislation brought down at the special session, and what we hope will be the results of recent legislation, I think the government should be given every encouragement to provide unemployment relief. I am in accord with their determination that in this country law and order shall be maintained, that Canadians shall be taken care of, and that all who desire work shall be provided with it.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): I should not have risen at this time had it not been for certain statements made this evening by the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly). No doubt because of successive crop failures a serious situation prevails in the southern part of the prairie provinces. That fact is well known to all hon. members and to citizens of Canada generally. No benefit can accrue, however, to the people affected by speeches such as that delivered this evening by the hon. member for Willow Bunch. Prior to the last session of the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan friends of the hon. member made from place to place throughout the province statements similar to those he made to-night. At the opening of the legislature an opportunity was afforded the friends of the hon. member to appear before a committee to make good such statements as were uttered by him to-night. If the hon. member would go to the proper authorities in Regina he would have an opportunity of making good those statements. The very statements he made to-night were considered and disposed of by that committee, and the resolution exonerating the provincial government with respect to the distribution of relief roadwork and matters of that kind was moved by Liberal members and carried unanimously by the investigating committee. That being the case, no assistance is being given to improve conditions in Saskatchewan by bringing up in this house stories which have been disproved in the legislature of the province concerned.

As to the closing of schools, my hon. friend was very careful not to name any that had been closed, although he was invited to do so by the member for Moose Jaw. The premier of Saskatchewan has declared that no public schools had been closed as a result of financial difficulties, and he has declared further that none shall be closed if it is possible for the provincial authorities to prevent it. I believe there will be very little difficulty in the province in this connection.

With respect to a large number of the unemployed being at the meeting in Regina on June 10, whispers to this effect were heard in Regina shortly after the meeting. They were repeated, if I mistake not, by the right hon. leader of the opposition during his tour through Canada. I do not blame some of the gentlemen who repeated these whispers, because they thought they had good authority for repeating them; but if they will take a file of the Regina Leader containing issues of the paper a day or two after the meeting they will find the facts set out as a result of an interview with the secretary of the unemployed workmen's association, in the course of which he said that they were not there at the request of the Conservative party, that the Conservative party had nothing whatever to do with their being there, neither had the Conservative organization, except to accord them the privilege of the seating that they asked for. That is the declaration of the secretary of the unemployed workmen's association.

I would not have taken part in this debate had I not felt that some of the misstatements regarding my province should be corrected. I submit that my hon. friend is doing no good service to his constituency by repeating statements not founded on fact, and thus giving a misleading idea of conditions in the province. So far as my constituency is concerned, the money spent there last year was contributed partly by the federal government, and I take this occasion of thanking the government for its assistance. My constituents are grateful for that contribution. There was much more money spent in the constituency of Willow Bunch and in the constituency of Weyburn than in mine, and a large amount also was spent in the constituency of the right hon. leader of the opposition. So the Liberal constituencies got relief just the same as did the Conservative constituencies. I regret that throughout this session, although some of those hon. gentlemen can get on their feet very readily when it suits their purpose, not a single one has attempted to voice the gratitude of his constituents for the relief money spent in their behalf. We are taking no great credit for spending those relief moneys, it was a duty imposed on the government by the people of Canada; but I know the people of other constituencies are grateful to the provincial and Dominion governments for doing their duty in that regard.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate were it not for some extravagant statements made by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol). I rise to protest as vigorously as I can against his insinuation that Toronto is the centre, the hotbed of communism.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Speaker, I made no such statement, and I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. FACTOR: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacNICOL: I demand that the hon. member withdraw the statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Give the hon. member a chance to speak.

Mr. FACTOR: The hon. gentleman produced certain literature and said it was—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest denies that he made the statement imputed to him, and the hon. member for Toronto West Centre should withdraw it.

Mr. FACTOR: I say that the hon. member for Toronto Northwest made statements implying that Toronto is the centre of communism.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then he will have to withdraw his first statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FACTOR: I am ready to withdraw my first statement, and to substitute therefor the statement that the hon. member's remarks carry the implication that Toronto is the centre of communism.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is your interpretation of it. I must protest again, Mr. Speaker. I said nothing of Toronto being the centre of communism.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FACTOR: This is not the first time that I have listened to the jingoistic speeches of the hon. member. He seems to be imbued with the idea that there are communists in Toronto.

An hon. MEMBER: Everybody knows that.

Mr. FACTOR: If the hon. member would come to Toronto and attend a meeting of communists, as I did one night, and acquaint himself with their numerical and intellectual strength, I think he would come back to this house and laugh at the situation, rather than be so serious about it as the hon. member for Toronto Northwest. The people in Toronto are too sane and too sensible to countenance revolution, no matter how bad economic and social conditions may be. I want further to point out to the hon. member that the criminal code already provides against the distribution of literature of a kind that he produced in this house. Let me refer him to section 98 of the criminal code which declares it an offence for any society, association or organization to promote by unlawful means governmental, industrial or economic changes. Then there is section 98 subsection 8, which specifically provides for the punishment of persons who print, publish, edit, issue, circulate, sell, or offer for sale or distribution any book, newspaper, periodical or pamphlet, advocating methods of force to bring about changes in our economic situation. If the Prime Minister is of the opinion that the present law is not strong enough to counteract the sinister influences referred to, I maintain it is his duty to ask this parliament for an amendment of the criminal code in order to strengthen his position.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all members welcome the provisions of this bill which are intended to provide for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress in the west. But we very strongly protest against what we consider to be the vicious part of this measure, which takes away the control of parliament, which scraps every statute, and substitutes legislation by governor in council. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the old czarist government in Russia never passed a law containing provisions of the kind set forth in this bill.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you know?

Mr. FACTOR: Because I happen to have been born in Russia under the czarist regime and I have seen some of the conditions that then obtained there. I should like further to say that if the governor in council gets authority under this bill to pass regulations, they may pass a regulation that if I make a speech in Toronto which in the opinion of the Prime Minister is contrary to the maintenance of peace, order and good government I may be deported back to Russia.

I do say that this legislation is an absolute symbol of dictatorship, and I point to section 5 as an example. Under that section the governor in council may pass regulations providing for the method of trial of those who disobey the orders or regulations issued by the governor in council. They may abolish jury trials; they may deport people at their whim.

Mr. BENNETT: Where is that in the bill? Read it.

Mr. FACTOR: It is in section 5, which says:

> All orders and regulations of the governor in council shall have the force of law and shall be enforced in such manner and by such court officers and authorities as the governor in council may prescribe. . . .

I submit that the governor in council can prescribe the method of trial, a most unheard of thing in criminal jurisprudence in this Dominion. Not only that, but the governor in council may prescribe the method of trial for a breach of orders and regulations made by itself. I appeal to the right hon. gentleman to consider this legislation.

There is another point: If this legislation passes it will be broadcast throughout the world that Canada is in such a situation, not only economically and socially but politically as well, that it requires the abolition of all parliamentary authority and the vesting of authority in a small body of men in order to cope with the situation. I ask the Prime Minister what effect this will have on the credit of this country among the nations of the world, when they see this legislation passed and then find that the situation has been exaggerated. I say the Prime Minister has exaggerated the seriousness of our political situation. He is quite right in providing for the relief of unemployment and in assisting the farmers of the west; I agree with him in that regard. Heroic measures are required to cope with these problems, but I do say that as far as the part of the bill is concerned which provides for the abolition of parliamentary authority, it should be withdrawn. Let me say here that I am absolutely opposed to any show of communism throughout this Dominion, but if the provisions of the criminal code or the other statutes of the country are not sufficient to meet any situation which may arise during the coming winter it is the duty of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice to bring in amendments to the criminal code in order to meet the situation. I am sure they would be passed unanimously. I say that this provision for the maintenance of peace, order and good government coupled with relief measures will create great dissatisfaction and perhaps great disorder as well throughout the country. In my humble judgment there is nothing worse than to take away the authority of parliament and substitute rules, regulations and orders in council issued by the governor in council.

About the only redeeming feature I see in the bill, Mr. Speaker, is section 7, which provides for the expiration of the bill on March 31, 1932; that is the most satisfactory point, having regard to the taking away of the rights of parliament. I do say to the Prime Minister in all sincerity that we on this side of the house are anxious to cooperate with him. Being one of the members from Toronto not on the government side, I have always cooperated with every member from Toronto in every unemployment relief measure brought before this house. I have always said that in meeting our economic difficulties there should be no politics and no partisanship, and I have acted in this house in no partisan spirit whenever any measure was brought in having to do with the relief of unemployment or the improvement of our social or economic conditions. I do say, however, that the provision of this bill which takes away the rights of parliament, even if only for a limited time, is very wrong at this time when conditions are what they are.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take only a few moments of the time of the house, not in the hope of adding anything new but rather, if I may, to emphasize what has been said and to add my protest particularly with regard to the form of this legislation. Just a little while ago some hon. member said something about the argument with regard to the rights of the people having been exploded. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the argument that parliament has the right and duty to limit the expenditure of public moneys is not exploded, and this House of Commons should not be asked to put its seal of approval on a bill which in effect does away with that power of limitation.

I submit that the precedents of the past in this Dominion, particularly during the time of the great war, to which reference has been made already, do not justify this action. Even in the early stages of the war, when the greatest uncertainty prevailed; when no one knew how long it would continue; when no one knew anything about the obligations which Canada might have to assume, a special session of the house was called and hon. members saw fit to place a limitation in that bill, even at that time of national crisis. The sum of $50,000,000 was expressly named, and as my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) pointed out to-night repeatedly, parliament was called upon during those four years to vote money many times, and a limitation was put in each bill.

There is really only one fundamental in connection with this legislation; it is this point, as to how far parliament should be asked to go in granting what is called a blank cheque and in going further and passing an omnibus bill at this time when it is so comparatively easy to call parliament together. I submit that one cannot do more than reiterate the principle already laid down, but I believe these protests should be allowed to pile up so that at least the government may see that we are in earnest and that the air of intolerance which has been displayed by hon. gentlemen opposite this evening may perhaps give way to some serious consideration of the principle we are trying to establish.

The situation is simply this: there are three things in this bill which call for limitation. First there are the powers. It has been pointed out already by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that this bill gives to the government of Canada power to do anything which the parliament of Canada could do under the British North America Act. That is a pretty wide power; I do not believe it can be found in any bill which has been passed by this parliament since 1867. The next matter requiring limitation is the amount. The bill reads:

> And, for the purposes aforesaid, may expend such moneys from the consolidated revenue fund as may be required.

There is absolutely no limit of any kind with regard to the amount. The third fundamental is that referred to so well by my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) a few moments ago. Full power is given the governor in council to make orders and regulations—note the words—which shall have the force of law. They may amend the criminal code if they so desire. They may make orders and regulations for the carrying out of the purposes of this bill, which are not simply relief measures or to provide employment but which are for—the general omnibus words of the British North America Act—the peace, order and good government of Canada. As my hon. friend has pointed out, not only have they power to make all orders and regulations necessary to exercise any one of those powers contained in the 29 subsections of section 91, but in addition to that they have the power to designate the courts before whom trials shall take place for violation of any of the regulations. If they like they may designate any departmental officer to try a man for an infringement of the regulations which they make under these very wide powers; they may designate a town councillor; they may designate a reeve of a municipality or a justice of the peace. And what may he do? The justice of the peace may try people, depriving them of the right of trial by jury. You will say that there is at least a limitation of penalty. Yes, there is. And that is the only limit in the bill apart from the fact that the act itself will expire on a certain date. The penalty limit is $1,000 and imprisonment for not more than three years, and that means that any one of these authorities designated by the governor in council, whether they happen to be judicial officers or not, may for a violation of the regulations made by the governor in council impose this fine and imprisonment. And they may decide that it shall be by summary conviction or by indictment.

I submit that these are provisions which offend against the fundamental principle I have indicated. Neither my right hon. friend nor any other member of the government except the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), to whom I shall refer in a moment, has spoken this evening to explain why these extraordinary measures are required. The Prime Minister has said that this blank cheque, this unlimited authorization as to amount, is needed because of the uncertainty of the situation. Well, I say that the situation could not be more uncertain than the situation in 1914, when an honoured and respected predecessor of my right hon. friend decided that the most he would ask for was $50,000,000. As my leader has said, if the Prime Minister would only ask for a specific amount to take care of contingencies there would be no cavilling about voting it. But what we object to is that we should be asked to give carte blanche, a blank cheque, an omnibus bill.

And that brings me to this other point. Not only does this legislation provide for the exercise of all these powers that are enumerated, but it groups together things that should not be grouped together in a bill of this kind. This is an omnibus enactment with regard to unemployment relief, farm relief, and peace, order and good government. The only member of the government who has spoken is the Solicitor General, and he says, "We challenge you to vote against it." Many a man has held a woman or a child in front of him and said, I challenge you to strike. It is very easy for hon. gentlemen to put the suffering and the hungry in the front line and challenge us to criticize this legislation, knowing as they do that it is for the relief of these people. The Solicitor General knows perfectly well that we are thinking more of unemployment relief than we are of the principle of the bill, but at the same time he cannot make with impunity the suggestion that we are doing anything more than our duty when we criticize that principle and what it stands for. Does he mean to say that because the object of this bill happens to be the relief of those who are in need, therefore there is to be no criticism of it? I say to him that he is in exactly the same position as a man who might stand behind a woman or a child and say, "I dare you to shoot." Of course we intend to vote for the bill, if my right hon. friend insists upon its going through in its present form. But we will not vote for it without making the strongest protest, not against the object of the bill, with which we are in full sympathy, but against its form. I venture to say that no man, if he were sitting on this side of the house, would be more vehement in his denunciation of the principle of this bill than the Prime Minister himself. If he were on this side he would stand up and say that he considered it his duty, in the interests of responsible institutions, to see to it that a measure of this kind should not be passed, vesting the government with any such powers. The shoe happens to be on the other foot, and as we are on the side where the hon. gentleman himself once was, we must bring to his attention and the attention of the people just what the implications of this bill are.

My hon. friend from Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) has referred to the administration of these relief moneys. I may say to the Prime Minister that, at least in some parts of my constituency, that administration has not been satisfactory. My right hon. friend was good enough to rise and point out that it was not the federal government who were administering the measure. That is quite so. I understand it is done through the provincial government and the municipalities. But we impressed upon the Prime Minister last session, as we impress upon him now, that since the federal parliament is voting the money it should have some say in its administration. I do not propose to mention a single case or to make any invidious comparisons, but I can give to my right hon. friend privately, or to his Minister of Labour if he wishes to have them, some illustrations of the cases I have in mind to show him that the relief money often does not reach those who need it. I know the object for which it was intended and for which the government took authority last fall. But the matter is too serious now, and the authority which my right hon. friend asks for is too great, for us not to make some provision that the money shall be properly expended and that it shall go to those for whom it is intended.

In closing, I repeat that my right hon. friend is going to far greater length than is necessary to carry out the object we have in view, and he is infringing upon a principle which I think, in his younger days at any rate, he would have observed, a principle which the people in my part of the country regard as very dear, because it was fought for in the early days of responsible government in the province of Nova Scotia. That principle is the accountability of the executive and the supervision by parliament over the executive with regard to the expenditure of money.

My hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Turnbull) spoke about the gratitude of the people for what the government had done. I do not think his leader, the Prime Minister, would particularly thank the hon. member for that remark. We must remember that this is the money of the taxpayers, the people of Canada, which is being voted. It is not the money of the government; and while we realize that the government are doing their duty in this matter, at the same time I do not think any question of gratitude need necessarily be raised in this house. Indeed, as the hon. member hastened to add, the administration was really only doing its duty. And because it is the money of the taxpayers of Canada which is being voted, I submit that my right hon. friend should put some limitation upon the provisions of this bill and should be more careful of the terms upon which he takes authority than appears from the provisions before us.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): May I offer one or two words in reply to some of the observations that have been made in regard to this bill by hon. gentlemen opposite during the debate on the second reading. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has protested as vigorously as he can, and he certainly has emphasized and, I think, exaggerated the possible consequences of the enactment of this legislation. The fears which he has expressed have also been expressed by several members in the course of the debate this evening.

First and foremost, starting with my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor), my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and one or two others, have uttered the same criticism in regard to the appearance in this bill of the words "peace, order and good government." There seems to be an idea that these words have been placed in this enactment for a sinister purpose. If the house will reflect for a moment I think it will realize that these words are the foundation of the authority of this parliament to pass such a measure. If the bill is not founded upon the theory that it is necessary to maintain peace, order and good government in Canada, then parliament would have no authority to pass it. Without these words the bill in the form in which it is enacted into law might be set aside when challenged in the courts. The judgments of the privy council during recent years have established most clearly that unless there is something in the nature of a national disaster, of plague, famine, or some national emergency, then parliament has no authority to legislate upon the subjects set out in this bill. After consultation with the law officers of the Department of Justice, we came to the conclusion that the best way to establish the authority of this parliament was to insert the clause which states that this measure is being passed for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada. It is recognized that there is a national emergency. That question need not be argued, in view of the speeches made from every quarter of the house. We recognize this emergency by the adoption of these words from the British North America Act, and they were placed in the bill as the foundation of our authority to pass such an enactment. They have nothing to do with the question of enforcement; they are merely a declaration to give us the jurisdiction which we know we have under the circumstances but of which we want to be sure.

Mr. RALSTON: The peace, order and good government provision follows the relief measure as an additional authority.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are granting relief in order to maintain peace, order and good government. That makes it constitutionally certain that the bill will not be set aside.

Mr. RALSTON: Those are not the words.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have given my reason for the inclusion of those words. If it does not appeal to my hon. friend I cannot convince him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did not the Prime Minister tell us that the purpose was to deal with possible disturbances arising from bolshevik and communist outbreaks; that it had nothing to do with relief, but was to deal with noisy minorities?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think the Prime Minister went quite as far as the leader of the opposition has suggested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is my understanding.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I believe that at the present time we have reasonable powers apart from this bill to deal with such matters, but where communistic activities take place in connection with the operation of our relief measure, then I think it to be a safe and satisfactory thing to have some provision in the bill to meet any situation which might arise.

Another criticism, and perhaps the major one which was levelled against the bill, is one which I do not take very seriously. The leader of the opposition has been pounding his desk in defence of the constitutional rights which must not be varied or abrogated by this house. I do not take that too seriously.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member should.

Mr. GUTHRIE: During the history of this parliament that right has not been maintained at all times. I took the trouble to look up the revised statutes of Canada. I will refer first to the Dominion Elections Act, which by section 77 provides that the governor in council may pay out of the consolidated revenue fund whatever sum he deems necessary for the payment of the costs of elections. There is no limitation.

Mr. RALSTON: But that is not for peace, order and good government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This fundamental principle of democratic government has been violated in the Elections Act which was passed by this parliament. Let us take the Expropriation Act, section 34 of which provides that the governor in council, without the consent of parliament, may take from the consolidated revenue fund whatever amount may be necessary to pay the judgment of any court. There is no limitation in this case.

Mr. RALSTON: The Expropriation Act provides only for certain objects for which expropriations can be made.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend need not interrupt me any more with these quibbles. The fundamental principle which has been proclaimed so loudly in this house has been violated in these two cases. Let us take another. I turn now to the Finance Act, which provides that in the event of a national financial crisis the governor in council may take out of the funds of this country whatever amount he deems necessary to relieve the situation. This can be done without consulting parliament, and no limitation is imposed. Let us consider next the Old Age Pensions Act. Is there any limitation there? I submit that there is not.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a dollar.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We can pay any amount necessary to make up our share.

Mr. RALSTON: On a certain scale.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That can be done without authority from this parliament, and no limitation is imposed by that act. With these illustrations before them, why should hon. members strain this point when it is recognized that there is a real emergency? We do not know what amount will be required; we are prepared to use the money of the country in accordance with the provisions of this bill to the extent to which it may be required. We have not named any amount, but neither did this parliament name an amount in the four or five instances I have cited. I would not dwell too strongly upon this supposed breach of fundamental constitutional principles which has been argued so thoroughly in the house this evening.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I find myself wondering more and more why the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his colleagues should bring down such a beneficent measure as this in such an obnoxious form. There is no need to do this. My right hon. friend knows that our leader has indicated that he would agree to any amount named, be it $50,000,000, $75,000,000 or $100,000,000. As long as there is a vote to give visibility to the purposes for which the money is to be used, and the amount named should not prove to be sufficient, governor general's warrants could be used. There is absolutely no reason why such an objectionable precedent should be created. With such a wide open door, hon. friends opposite say that is the way to restrict expenditure. It seems to me that the whole country will be wanting to get into this relief vote when they know there is no limit to the amount.

There is no limit either upon the purposes for which this money is to be used. Almost anything but sheep stealing is to be permitted. There is no limit to the amount, scarcely any limit to the purposes, but it must stop on March 31. This afternoon the government was pluming itself because it was restoring to parliament certain rights in connection with the St. Lawrence, but this evening sacred rights are being taken away from parliament and given to the executive. Surely that is not a consistent attitude on the part of the government. If the record of this government during the last year had been such as to inspire confidence, it would not have been so bad, but there has not been a blunder between here and Makakanik which this government has not committed. Why should we allow them to adopt this course? True, it is not within our power to put them right; we will just have to let them go on their way, but not without a strong protest. They say grandiloquently: We dare not oppose it. We will not oppose it, but we will protest stoutly against it. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), there were colonial difficulties in old Canada. I have often heard my father speak of 1837, the clergy reserves, and what not. These difficulties are bobbing up again under our present status, and this is another one. I would think the government were trying to borrow trouble. I do not see how they expect to deal with this relief matter better than they did last fall, especially when they start wrong. When they get off on the wrong foot, how are they going to get off on the right one? They are beginning with an indefinite expenditure—it may be $100,000,000, $200,000,000, anything under the sun. That is not the way to run the affairs of this country at this time. I should have thought this was the worst time to open the door to such extravagance as may be possible. There are no conditions either under which the money is to be spent. As I listened to the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly), I knew he was not exaggerating the situation in any respect. I know what happened last fall. There is no use in talking about that too much, but we should avoid it rather than walk blindly into it again.

At times I have wondered, and I have asked myself many a time: Has this government really gone mad? It has not such a great distance to go, and this is the latest bit of evidence to that effect. I give the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) full credit for starting out on the first of July with fine intentions. He did well; everybody was happy and the goose honked high all over the chamber. Now he precipitates this row unnecessarily at this time when we should have the very opposite conditions prevailing among us with reference to a relief bill of this nature. I believe he wants us to oppose it, but we are not going to. Let him pass it, but we are on record as protesting against it as strongly as we know how.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): I want to draw the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the situation as I see it in the west and to one feature in particular which I think should be drawn to the attention of the government. Only this morning I received from the west a letter, a copy of which has been sent to the Prime Minister, and which I should like to put upon Hansard. My reason for doing this is that it will bring home to the house, perhaps more clearly than anything else, exactly what the situation is out there. I do not think the house fully appreciates how desperately hard up the people are. This letter is written by a doctor who has made a personal inspection of conditions in my constituency. I may say that the whole of my constituency is in the dry belt area and I do not believe there is a single crop in it. This is not the first year there has been no crop; for three successive years they have been dried out, and four years ago in a large part of that district they were completely hailed out. Hon. members can imagine the financial situation of any business man who would try to carry on for four years without any income, but that is the position of the farmers in that part of the country. This letter was addressed to the Prime Minister and a copy sent to me:

Rt. Hon. R. B. Bennett,
Ottawa, Ont., Can.
Dear Sir:—

Permit me to address you personally, re need of immediate relief in this particular part of the west, i.e. the rural municipality of Souris valley No. 7, in the constituency of Weyburn, Sask.

Should you read this, let me apologize for adding to your troubles, and also, thank you.

This municipality by the late census shows 2,200 people, about 420 families.

A day ago in company with our member for local house, Mr. R. S. Leslie, I visited in the short time at Mr. Leslie's disposal, four families adjacent to our hamlet.

At family No. 1, the conditions were; nine children, 12 years to 1 month old, children half clad, but all the clothes they have, for food, two-thirds of a sack of flour, a little milk from two cows but the cows are now drying up as there is no feed, no fuel, no money, no crop, nothing to sell, this last sack of flour obtained from local municipality. To question "How do you expect to obtain coal and flour this winter?" they replied, "We do not know."

At the next neighbour 1½ miles away, there are six children, seven years to two months old, also on last sack of flour, no potatoes, a little milk, no feed, no crop. Children will not be able to go to school after holidays for lack of clothes. Mother says she has made summer clothes for them out of flour sacks and pillow covers. Mother in her bare feet, has a pair of shoes but wants to keep them for church, shoes produced, were broken down and worn out. They put in 160 acres of crop, nothing in sight, potatoes will not grow, to question, "What do you expect to do this winter?" answered, "We do not know."

Third family, nine children, 19 years to 3 months, father 60 years of age, one of the pioneers here, hard workers all their lives, house and children neat and clean, have enough food to carry them along for about three weeks, after that they do not know what they will do, have never applied for help before, but they have no money, no credit, no crop in sight, no feed, for stock. Children have three miles to go to school, will have to stay home for lack of clothes this winter.

Fourth family, six children, nine years to six months, children not doing well, the mother says, thinks they do not get enough food, all dressed in old overalls made over from old pairs of the father, no crop in sight of any sort, do not know what they will do for the winter.

Thirty-six in these four families, all within radius of three and one-half miles, and out of 420 families in this municipality there are at least 300 of them in like position.

Have practised my profession in this municipality for sixteen years. I know the people and that they are honest, sober, and industrious.

Through no fault of their own they have reached this dire necessity.

Something must be done now. Flour and coal and food must be put in their possession at once, before winter is on them, or there will be such a calamity as will be a lasting disgrace on all governing bodies of Canada.

Meetings of ratepayers are being held often, they get together and talk, and get nowheres, they are lost and desperate, and ready fuel for the agitation and the Red.

I realize what a difficult position the government must be in.

I realize living among these people in this stricken area much better than the government what we are up against.

And so I am begging you to strive for immediate action, that will result in something concrete, not promises.

Thanking you again for consideration of this letter.

Yours truly,

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member think that letter was written to me for the purpose of having him read it to the house?

Mr. YOUNG: No, I do not.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member think that a right thing to do?

Mr. YOUNG: I received the letter with the request—

Mr. STEVENS: To put it on Hansard to embarrass the government.

Mr. YOUNG: I received the letter with the request that I bring it to the Prime Minister's attention.

Mr. BENNETT: I have the letter.

Mr. YOUNG: I know. The writer told me the Prime Minister had it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is now eleven o'clock

Mr. BENNETT: If the house thinks we could have the second reading of the bill, I should be very glad if it would consent to remain for another half hour. If not, I am in the hands of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my right hon. friend that one or two hon. members mentioned to me that they wished to speak on the second reading. They have left the chamber expecting that other speakers would take up the time to eleven o'clock. I know there are at least two or three who have that desire.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the Saturday sitting will not help the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: We were going to sit to-morrow, but it is quite clear we cannot get through to-morrow. The matter is in the hands of the house. As far as I am concerned I am prepared to sit for half an hour and have the second reading passed; but if hon. members desire to speak on the second reading, they have that privilege. If they have left the chamber on the understanding that other speakers would take up the time till eleven o'clock, we cannot go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Probably the purpose hon. members have in view might be served if they were allowed wider latitude in speaking in committee. We might pass second reading to-night, and go on to-morrow, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I think that would be quite satisfactory.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Ross in the chair.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Young.]

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: Before the house adjourns may I say that the bills I mentioned this afternoon have been prepared and printed. The French translation will be completed by morning, and I hope to be in position to hand to hon. members copies of the bills when we meet at eleven o'clock in the morning.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is there more than one bill?

Mr. BENNETT: Two bills.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Two bills?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the first dealing with the declaration that the works are for the general advantage of Canada, and the second combining two matters to which I referred. I think they will be laid on the table at eleven o'clock. I shall propose that they be distributed at once, so that there will be ample opportunity to consider them. They are not long bills.

In the meantime we could proceed with this measure and dispose of supply. Owing to the wording of one item in supply concerning coal, which is copied from that of a former year, to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) directed attention yesterday, I shall submit a new measure, and so that it may be regular it will be signed by the Governor General. I will explain that payment was to be made to the railways, as was indicated, and some payments with respect to subventions for coal are not so made.

Another matter deals with conditions concerning the Quebec harbour. Perhaps hon. members know that there is a lateral movement of the foundations at Wolfe's cove. The other concerns a hydrographic boat, under contract and partly paid for last year, the amount for which by some strange circumstance was not revoted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend is bringing down further estimates requiring a message, may I ask if he will not reconsider the matter of inserting in the relief bill an amount no matter what the figure is, which will indicate the extent of the sums to be appropriated? I do suggest that in the interests of the preservation of parliamentary institutions, which I know my right hon. friend has at heart, that step, even if taken only for the sake of appearances, would serve a useful purpose in the history of this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman has put his request most reasonably, but I must say I have considered the matter very carefully, and the more I have considered it the greater appears to be the difficulty, as it was in connection with old age pensions and several other statutes to which I could direct the attention of hon. members. There is no difference between the two, so far as I can see, having regard to the situation which has developed. Without taking up too much time I desire to say to my learned friends of the law that the real difficulty has been partly explained by what has been said to-night. In many instances apparently the provinces are unable to grapple with this situation, and the extent to which we must substitute the federal power for the provincial authority would seem to be a matter of the first magnitude and one with respect to which I certainly desire to proceed most guardedly, because of the general situation of Canada as a whole. I shall however think the matter over and speak to my right hon. friend in the morning.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Saturday, August 1, 1931.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF GIFT OF PORTRAITS TO BE PLACED IN PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by the right hon. leader of the opposition, the following motion:

That this house deeply appreciates the generous gift made by E. S. Makower, Esquire, of London, England, of a complete collection of portraits of British prime ministers, from the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole to the Right Honourable Ramsay MacDonald, which have been placed in the parliament building of Canada; and that the warm thanks of the House of Commons of Canada be conveyed by Mr. Speaker to Mr. Makower.

I dare say that my right hon. friend may think that this is another illustration of the old saying, that one sows and another reaps. The fact is that the arrangements in connection with the gift of these valuable portraits to the Canadian people was arranged by my predecessor in office, who was communicated with, I understand, through the then Prime Minister. It was my privilege and pleasure to receive from Mr. Makower these portraits framed as they now hang upon the walls of the gallery leading to the restaurant. There I trust they will always serve as a reminder to us of the splendour of the achievements of the great and distinguished men who have occupied the position of Prime Minister of Great Britain. In recording our sense of appreciation of this gift, I am sure the resolution conveys the sentiments of every member of this house. It is an additional pleasure to associate my right hon. friend with me in the motion as its seconder.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed happy to have the opportunity or joining with my right hon. friend in approval of the motion which has just been placed in your hands. As my right honourable friend said, it is a case where one sows and another reaps. The sowing has been done by Mr. Makower, and we in Canada, and of this parliament irrespective of the parties to which we belong, have been reaping the benefits of his generosity. As the Prime Minister has just said, during the time the late Liberal administration was in office I received a communication from the then Prime Minister of Great Britain asking if it would be agreeable with a view to the portraits being placed in our parliament buildings to accept from Mr. Makower on behalf of the government of Canada this splendid collection of portraits of the Prime Ministers of Great Britain from the days of Walpole down to the present time. I expressed to the Prime Minister of Great Britain our warm appreciation of the contemplated gift, and subsequently sent as well a personal word of thanks to Mr. Makower. The gift itself of the collection of portraits was not received until after my right hon. friend came into office, and it is a happy circumstance, that as a consequence each of us has now the pleasure of joining in this acknowledgment, which I am sure will be made wholeheartedly on the part of all hon. members of this House of Commons.

May I say that I understand Mr. Makower's generosity has extended to the making of similar gifts to the British House of Commons and to the parliaments of the other self-governing dominions. It is a noteworthy example of great generosity and public spirit, and I feel that too warm a word of appreciation cannot be expressed for what this parliament has received.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS STAFF

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move seconded by Mr. Rhodes:

That the recommendation submitted by the Civil Service Commission under section 12 and section 61 of the Civil Service Act, for a change in the compensation of the position of chief page, House of Commons, and laid on the table of the house on Friday, July 24, 1931, be approved.

This recommendation, directed to the hon. the House of Commons, alters the compensation from a maximum of $1,140 to $1,380. It is approved by the hon. the Speaker and signed by the Hon. W. J. Roche, chairman of the Commission, by Dr. MacTavish and by Mr. Tremblay.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1931-32

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1932, was presented by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house and referred to the committee of supply.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I move that the said message with the accompanying estimates be referred to the committee of supply. In doing so I think it well to indicate that of the three items mentioned two have already been considered by the committee of supply. The first item merely changes the wording of the provision made for payment of the subvention in connection with the movement of coal. It will perhaps be recalled that under the previous provision the subvention was payable only to the railways; this change removes that difficulty. The second item relates to the harbour at Quebec, to which I made a short reference last evening. Some few years ago it was agreed by the harbour commissioners that the sum then voted by parliament would be all that could be voted for a period of five years; but the report of the engineers indicates the desirability of making certain investigations as well as maintaining from deterioration certain parts of the works of the harbour, and this sum is being loaned for that purpose. The last item, I am bound to say, was inadvertently overlooked from the estimates. Last session parliament voted some $390,000 odd for a ship for the use of the hydrographic survey. A contract was let and the work has made some progress, but by some misadventure the vote was not included in the main or the supplementary estimates. It is a revote of some $390,000 odd, and the balance of $340,000 is the sum required during the fiscal year. I make this explanation because it is unusual to submit these further supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What was the change in the coal subvention?

Mr. BENNETT: The subvention was payable "to the railways." Those words disappear, because it will be observed that all the money does not go to the railways; provision is made, for instance, for payment of some of the money with respect to coal that is mined on Vancouver island.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend suggests that the amount for certain works in the harbour of Quebec will be in the form of a loan?

Mr. BENNETT: Under the harbour commission act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That would be a bill then.

Mr. BENNETT: It is proposed to make it just by estimate in this case as a loan because of the provisions of that statute.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it regular to make a loan by way of an item in the estimates?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is quite competent for parliament to make a loan through the estimates.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is certainly unusual.

Mr. BENNETT: I may say to my hon. friend the reason it is unusual is that under the last act relating to Quebec harbour it was provided that no further sum should be paid for five years, and at that time my hon. friend thought the sum loaned to the harbour commissioners would be more than ample for that period; but the new pier has cost more than was expected. This loan will enable certain investigations to be made and repairs carried on, and I am advised by the competent authorities that it is the proper wording for an item of that character.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am in favour of it; I was only questioning the form.

Motion agreed to.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

BEAUHARNOIS LIGHT, HEAT AND POWER COMPANY, LIMITED—RIGHT TO DIVERT WATER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 143, respecting the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited.

He said: I think I mentioned this matter to the house yesterday, and the bill was distributed this morning so its purport is quite apparent to everyone. I had thought that possibly if the bill were given a first and second reading without the house in any sense committing itself to the principle of the measure, in committee an opportunity would be afforded through the asking and answering of questions fully to inform those who are interested of the purposes of the measure. Whatever attitude the house may take in that regard is acceptable.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BENNETT moved the second reading of the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with the understanding which the Prime Minister has said will govern in this matter I do not see that there would be any objection to the second reading at this moment. It is understood that by giving second reading and going into committee we do not commit ourselves to the principle, not that I think there is going to be any difference of view on that score; at any rate if there is a difference we can express it in committee, and for the sake of expediting the business of the house to-day I will gladly concur in the suggestion of the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire merely to record the understanding that by permitting the bill now to be read a second time and the house to go into committee the house does not commit itself, nor does any hon. member commit himself, to an approval of the principle of the bill. There will be the fullest opportunity in committee to discuss every phase of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Even if the discussion does not bear essentially on the section under discussion?

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I hope the chairman of committees will be so advised.

Mr. BENNETT: Apparently my hon. friend has anticipated who may be chairman. I will try to meet his views in that regard.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): We have no objection to this bill getting second reading and going to committee, but hon. members must remember that we have had no very full explanation as to what are the intentions of the government in regard to this matter. May I suggest that in the event of the house permitting this bill to go to committee, after the Prime Minister has given the explanation which he may desire to give to the house, if members of the committee feel that they should have some little time to think over the matter I trust the Prime Minister will not object to meeting their wishes in that respect.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. BENNETT moved that the house go into committee later this day on said bill.

He said: If it is not unacceptable to the house I would move that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair for the house to go into committee on this bill at a later time this day. These two bills touch on the same matter, and if it would be convenient they might be taken together in committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When will my right hon. friend take up the bills in committee?

Mr. BENNETT: I thought we could do it at once.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know what the procedure will be immediately after the house disposes of this matter, but since I have one or two questions I should like to direct to the government I do not want to lose the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend will be afforded a chance to ask the questions before the orders of the day are called.

Motion agreed to.

BEAUHARNOIS LIGHT, HEAT AND POWER COMPANY, LIMITED—WORKS FOR GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 144, to declare certain works of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, to be for the general advantage of Canada.

He said: I endeavoured to explain yesterday that this bill would be proceeded with on the assumption that it is satisfactory to the government of Quebec, whose counsel has been assisting the Secretary of State in its preparation. By giving the bill first and second readings and going into committee I do not expect the house, in view of these circumstances, to commit itself to the principle. Every hon. member will have the fullest opportunity to express in committee any opinion that might have been expressed on the motion for second reading, without limitation with regard to the section to which the discussion may be directed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the conditions I have just indicated I move the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the house do resolve itself into committee to consider said bill later this day.

Motion agreed to.

WHITESIDE CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): May I ask the Prime Minister what success he has met with in putting a tracer on that correspondence between himself and Premier Anderson. There seems to be a missing letter, and I should like to know how he has got along with it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Only this morning I endeavoured to ascertain what the trouble had been. While I was in England, Mr. Whiteside wrote a letter to me and a reply was sent during my absence. On my return a letter was received from Premier Anderson, enclosing a letter from Mr. Whiteside, and I sent a reply to Mr. Anderson.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the one I want.

Mr. BENNETT: The return was treated as one dealing with the correspondence with Mr. Whiteside, and I have asked the clerk to obtain from the office a copy of the letter to which the hon. gentleman refers. The order for return rather indicated that it was the correspondence between Mr. Whiteside and myself which was required.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Between the right hon. gentleman and Mr. Anderson. In order to assist my right hon. friend I will tell him that I have reference to a letter which was published on the front page of the Ottawa Journal under date of March 7th.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not publish it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The right hon. gentleman might take the trouble of looking up that issue. What I want to know is whether or not that letter as it appears in the Journal is an official letter. If it is, I have the information I desire.

[Mr. Bennett.]

GOVERNMENT PRINTING BUREAU

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I desire to direct the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) to a press item appearing in this morning's Ottawa Citizen, on which I desire to base a question:

> For the first time since civic holiday was inaugurated 21 years ago, the union men at the government printing bureau will not get the day off. A notice to this effect was put on the bulletin board at the bureau last night saying that all civil servants would have a holiday on Monday, August 3, but that all prevailing wage men would have to work as usual. The men are 100 per cent union workers and feel that although the bureau is working overtime on government printing, they are being discriminated against.

In view of these conditions, may I ask the Secretary of State whether these men will receive proper compensation, either in a monetary way or by being granted a special holiday to make up for the time lost?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): As to whether the men employed in the printing bureau on prevailing rates are or are not union men, I have no knowledge. Representations have been made to me from time to time that they are largely union men, but I have not yet been able to ascertain the facts. With regard to their holidays, I may say that the men who are at work on prevailing rates are entitled to the highest rates which prevail in the printing trades in Toronto and Montreal, and are paid accordingly. In Toronto and Montreal the men who are paid these rates are entitled only to the statutory holidays. Therefore I see no reason why men who are employed on prevailing rates and who are receiving the highest wages, men who are not in the civil service as such, should receive holidays at the expense of the treasury of Canada. The responsibility is solely mine, but I gave instructions to the King's Printer that hereafter, until he was advised otherwise, printers on prevailing rates who are not members of the civil service should receive no holidays on pay which are not holidays in the printing trades of Toronto and Montreal. I may say that the printing bureau last year ran behind $70,000, and that was due largely to the fact that we were allowing printers on prevailing rates to have holiday after holiday which were not recognized under the statute. Each holiday of that character costs this treasury, in cash, $4,500 or thereabouts. I gave instructions that any printers employed at prevailing rates who wished to celebrate on Monday would have ample opportunity to do so. They were requested, if convenient, to notify the King's Printer beforehand whether they would be in attendance on Monday or not. But if they are not in attendance they will not be paid for the day: no work, no pay.

PRIVILEGE—MR. WOODSWORTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On Wednesday the hon. member for South Winnipeg made a statement which reflected on my integrity. Speaking of myself, as reported at page 4306 of Hansard, he said:

> The hon. member found occasion too to refer to newspaper despatches relating to alleged statements by the Hon. Mr. Finlayson of the Ontario government, intimating what was likely to happen in certain camps in the north of the province. So far, so good. But not until his attention was definitely directed to it by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) did he say, "Yes I did read denials by Mr. Finlayson." Is it too much to expect, sir, that one who in former years was engaged in the promulgation of the principle, "do unto others as you would they should do unto you," would be fair enough in the first instance to place the two statements side by side?

May I say, sir, that a reading of Hansard does not show any justification for that charge. I said, as reported at page 4292 of Hansard:

> We are told by the newspapers that one of the schemes may be camps in the north country. The Minister of Mines and Forests of Ontario, the Hon. William Finlayson, has suggested that labour camps will be established in northern Ontario. I have not the slightest objection to labour camps in the north country for the construction of roads, reforestation and so on. It may prove an excellent idea. But I should like to know what conditions will prevail in these labour camps. Mr. Finlayson has said there may be only a nominal wage paid. If that be the case, on behalf of labour across the country I would raise a vigorous protest against any such arrangement.

And I spoke about one or two other statements Mr. Finlayson had made. Later on, down the column, I passed on to some other considerations.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the hon. gentleman's question of privilege? What he is reading is already recorded in Hansard, and no purpose can be served by his reading it again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to take up the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, but in the passage I have quoted from the hon. gentleman's remarks, there was a distinct reflection upon my personal integrity, and I wish to show, by reading these two paragraphs, that there is in Hansard nothing that warrants such a statement as was made by the hon. member. I think I have a right to do that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may not now redebate a subject under consideration in a previous debate. If another hon. member has misrepresented him, let him point out in what respect this has been done.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am doing that now.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is going over the debate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish to read only one more paragraph. I went on to deal with another matter entirely, not with the statements of Mr. Finlayson, but with other statements which were made with regard to what might possibly take place in these proposed detention camps. I had in mind letters which had come to me from places in the west, from Regina, particularly, from Calgary and Winnipeg—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member might have had various matters in mind. But what is the statement in reference to which he is complaining?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to read it again, but the statement was that I refused to admit that I knew of Mr. Finlayson's statement with regard to this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member deny that?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do deny it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Well, let the hon. member deny it and have done with it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I deny absolutely that in a later passage dealing with military control I had reference to Mr. Finlayson. I was thinking of letters such as that of Colonel Hunter and others and I went on in that connection to speak of what might take place in these detention camps. I was not referring at that time to Mr. Finlayson, and it is only fair to have this misunderstanding cleared up. It may be that, in the confusion that sometimes prevails, the hon. member for South Winnipeg did not hear distinctly; but I desire to point out that a reading of Hansard shows that at that time I was discussing an altogether different matter and not referring to Mr. Finlayson.

Mr. MANION: Why did you not correct it when the hon. member was here himself?

Mr. MULLINS: Is not the hon. member referring to the hon. member from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy)?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I apologize; it is the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

CONFERENCE WITH RAILWAYMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I notice the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) is not in his place, and probably the question which I am about to ask should be directed to him. However, in view of the lateness of the session, I will ask my question to-day before the orders of the day are called. When the Minister of Labour was west a month or six weeks ago he held a conference with the railway employees. Only this morning I received a request for a copy of the written record of what took place at that conference. If such a record exists, I would appreciate being furnished with a copy or the opportunity of examining it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If there is a record of the conversations to which the hon. gentleman refers, I will try to secure it for him between now and three o'clock.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

COLLECTION OF INCOME TAX ON PAYMENT OF $125,000 TO JOHN AIRD, JR.

On the orders of the day.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, the question which I desire to ask of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) might have waited until the supply bill was before the house for second reading, but to expedite matters I shall ask it now. Will the minister advise the house whether he intends to take proceedings in order to collect income tax on the $125,000 which Mr. John Aird, Junior, said he received for services rendered a year or two ago. This gentleman claimed that he had no tax to pay because the bonds he received were tax-free bonds. Tax-free bonds are free only as far as the interest is concerned, but if a man receives his salary in such bonds he is liable for income tax.

Mr. EULER: That has been decided in the courts.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no argument about that.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): In answer to the hon. member's question, I would advise that if the department has any rights they will be pressed. This matter will be canvassed at once.

FARM AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

POWER TO DEAL WITH AGRICULTURE DISTRESS AND LABOUR SITUATION—MAINTENANCE OF ORDER

The house resumed from Friday, July 31, consideration in committee of Bill No. 142, to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief, and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada—the Prime Minister—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—payments authorized.

Mr. BENNETT: I have considered seriously the suggestion made last evening by my right hon. friend, and I thank him for the moderation in which he expressed his views, not upon the general principles of the legislation but with respect to one matter. I can only say that my mind wavered somewhat, but in view of communications which I received this morning I have concluded that there may fall upon this government the duty of making loans to some of the provinces to enable them to discharge their ordinary constitutional functions. I am not without full realization of what is involved in the bill but in order to meet my right hon. friend I will shorten the time to March 1 and make it clear that we have no desire to usurp powers as was suggested. It is the overwhelming sense of what I conceive to be a national duty which is cast upon us that induces me to submit this legislation.

As far as the principle is concerned, this was applied in connection with the matters mentioned last evening by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). There is no difference in saying that you may pay $8,000,000 out of the consolidated fund, the only limitation being the amount required, and legislation of this character. There is no difference in saying that whatever may be required to meet 50 per cent of the money paid out by the provinces for old age pensions is to be paid, without stipulating any amount, and saying that whatever may be required to meet this challenging situation may be paid. The Finance Act has been on the statute books of this country in its present form for I think thirty or forty years. That act confers upon the governor in council during moments of emergency far greater powers than are mentioned in the present bill. In that instance there is no limitation as to the time within which matters may be dealt with. There are other enactments which stand in the same position. As was indicated the other day a striking illustration of the application of this principle to at least $10,000,000 of public money was in connection with the Montreal bridge. As far as this house is concerned, the amount involved is $13,000,000 because the statement was made that the bridge would cost $6,000,000 while the bonds outstanding amount to $19,000,000.

I need hardly say to the committee that I do this reluctantly; I do it only from a sense of duty. What the right hon. gentleman said last evening as to the desirability of grants of money being limited, is so elementary I shall not do more than say that its general application in itself involves the necessity at times of exceptions, and the reasons, some of which I would not care in the public interest to communicate to the committee, why we should not state an amount in this measure, would, I think, appeal to the sober common sense of most hon. members. We are dealing with the most unusual situation that has confronted this country since confederation. It involves problems of the first magnitude, not only in constitutional government, but in the financial operations of the Dominion and of the provinces. Realizing that, understanding fully the soundness of the criticism that is urged against the principle in general and not endeavouring to minimize it, we are with great hesitancy seeking from the house these powers, surely with not any advantage to the government or to the individual members of it, but because, since the accident of circumstances places the obligation upon us, we want to meet it as best we can before the people of Canada as a whole for whom we are trustees; and in that sense alone is this legislation being sought. If I were less mindful of the soundness of the criticisms that are made by the right hon. gentleman opposite as to the interference with the general principle, I would not make the observations I do. But when we make charges against the consolidated revenue fund as we have done continuously with respect to matters mentioned last evening by the Minister of Justice, and when since confederation we have had a frank recognition by parliament that a situation might arise in which the application of the ordinary rules would no longer be possible as witness the Finance Act of the country, I think we are confronted by a situation that demands the acceptance of the faith, the good intentions and the honesty of this committee of the House of Commons which is called the cabinet, to meet in times of great stress a very difficult situation. That is all I wish to say. I did seriously and thoughtfully turn over in my mind the suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman, and if I have arrived at a conclusion which is disappointing to him, I can only say I have not done so from any sense other than by conviction that I am compelled to do this in the public interest. But there is no reason why the date should not be limited to the first day of March which will ensure that the house must meet at least a sufficient time before that date to enable parliament to grant such further supply as may be regarded necessary in the premises.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot regret too deeply that my right hon. friend has not seen his way, I shall not say, to accept the suggestions of the opposition, but to act in accordance with what is everywhere recognized as a fundamental principle, namely the control of the House of Commons over expenditures. I regret that above all because of what it means in the way of violation of the constitution. His refusal constitutes a complete, may I say, submarining of the right and the duty of the commons to control taxation, especially where taxation on so very large a scale will be necessitated in order to meet a situation such as the Prime Minister contemplates by this measure. Let me say to my right hon. friend that I believe I appreciate the reasons why he takes the position he does at the moment. I believe him to be sincere in the statement he has given us of those reasons; but I believe he would hardly have given them were it not for the fact that, having so completely in mind the seriousness of the position with which we are faced in the country owing to the extent of unemployment and the possibility of that situation becoming still more serious, he has lost the larger vision of a matter which is more important than all else, namely, the necessity of keeping parliament supreme in dealing with all questions of great national concern. My right hon. friend has spoken as though it were the duty of the executive regardless of parliament altogether to deal with the problems that may arise within the next few months. In that attitude I think he is quite mistaken. If a grave situation should arise, it would be his duty to have parliament summoned to cope with it. That is the all-important point which my right hon. friend seems to lose sight of altogether.

The House of Commons is the committee of the nation appointed by the people at large above all else to control appropriations of public money which may be necessary to deal with all situations as they may arise. The importance of summoning the commons at a moment to enact the measures necessary to deal with any great question cannot be exaggerated. The security of the nation, peace, order, good government—all of these matters have their foundation in the fact that under our system of responsible government, under our British constitution, the people's representatives may be brought together at any moment to cope with any situation which affects their rights and well being. My right hon. friend appeared to recognize that last year when conditions were not at all comparable with what they are to-day. In September of last year he summoned a special session of parliament on account of the unemployment situation. Why should he not summon a special session of parliament this September to deal with unemployment if the situation at that time demands it. He will not have any Imperial conference to attend this year; he will have the intervening month or two to rest up after the present session. Otherwise, why can he not bring parliament into regular session in the month of November, if need be, rather than attempt, himself with the aid only of his colleagues, to deal with a great national emergency. The stronger the reasons presented by my right hon. friend why unlimited powers should be given his executive, the stronger, in my mind, becomes the necessity of his remembering the obligation which rests at all times upon the government to bring together collectively the people's representatives to cope with any great national question, and not to leave a national emergency to be dealt with by any committee of parliament, albeit the committee which constitutes the cabinet.

I am just afraid the course my right hon. friend has taken in this matter may help to aggravate the condition with which he is faced. It creates another situation more serious, it seems to me, than anything we can contemplate at the moment. No one can tell what condition may arise. My right hon. friend, in asking for these additional powers in connection with peace, order and good government raises at once an alarm in the mind of the country that he is contemplating something dangerous. The whole seriousness of that situation will be increased if the people get into their heads the idea that no matter what happens parliament is not to be summoned until on in the spring of next year. I hope my right hon. friend will, before parliament prorogues, make it quite clear that if there does arise in Canada a situation—and let us pray it will not arise—of a very serious character, he will immediately summon the people's representatives. In that way, and that way alone, will we escape the effects of what comes inevitably from autocratic and coercive action. I am genuinely alarmed as to the possible effect of some of the provisions of this measure through what they may occasion in the way of riots and violence in different parts of the country. Powers will be given to officers or individuals who have had little or no experience with the enforcement of law. With this great authority behind them which at the moment, the government of the day is taking from parliament, they will feel free to act to the limit; that will believe that the executive has absolute authority in regard to all moneys required and in regard to the force that may be needed. This thing of itself may create a condition of unrest, if not of strife, such perhaps as we have not seen in this country at any time. I do not believe that one can stress that possibility too strongly, and it is because I am hoping and praying that nothing of the kind may occur, and am seeking to have this parliament preserved in its rights to deal with any situation of a serious kind, that I make this strong appeal to my right hon. friend. Parliament should not part with its control over the executive. That is what it is being asked by this bill to do.

Let me repeat, there is a consideration above all other considerations not only with respect to peace, order and good government, but with respect to all that pertains to our constitution and to the making of laws, and that is that at all times parliament may be summoned at a moment's notice and that when parliament is summoned the people's representatives in parliament shall have complete control over the executive and its acts, particularly as regards those measures which involve increased taxation.

I am not going to try to elaborate that idea by words of my own, but in order to surround the whole matter with the solemnity which I think is its due I wish to quote a paragraph or two from a treatise which is recognized throughout the British Empire as the standard work on parliamentary grants. I have in my hand the volume, which is entitled The Principles and Practice of the System of Control over Parliamentary Grants, by Colonel A. J. V. Durell, C.B. May I read two or three significant paragraphs and ask hon. members, as the representatives of the people, elected to maintain their freedom and their rights, and above all to sustain and maintain the traditions of parliament and responsible government, to weigh in their minds the significance of these few words. On page 2 the writer says:

The bedrock on which the English system is built is the principle of the maintenance by parliament of control over the grants which it makes.

This bedrock on which the English system is built is being shattered by the act of the administration in refusing to allow this House of Commons to fix any amount in connection with the purpose of this particular bill.

Now I come to the section of this work which deals with the constitutional aspect of these grants. On page 3 I find the following:

It is one of the old standing principles of our constitution that the House of Commons should control the finances of the country. That is the right, privilege and duty of the house. It has been achieved by means of struggles lasting through centuries, beginning from the fourteenth century down to the seventeenth century, when it was fully confirmed, and since then it has never been practically disputed. "Ut quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus approbetur." The quotation by Edward I of this legal maxim transmitted it into a great and constitutional principle. In other words, the cardinal principle on which the whole of our financial system is based is that of parliamentary control, and by this is understood not the control of parliament in its constitutional sense as composed of Sovereign, Lords and Commons, but control by the Commons alone.

My right hon. friend has a great regard for one other authority whom he has quoted many times in this House of Commons, and that is Redlich, on the House of Commons. Here is a quotation on the very page from which I am reading, from Redlich, chapter iii, page 114:

Upon this fundamental principle, laid down at the very outset of English parliamentary history and secured by three hundred years of mingled conflict with the crown and peaceful growth, is grounded the whole law of finance and, consequently, the whole British constitution.

Surely my right hon. friend in the pressure of a very strenuous session, and dealing with an extraordinarily difficult situation must have had his mind so preoccupied with the immediate thing that he has lost sight altogether of the larger principles which he above all others should maintain, and, may I add, which I believe in his heart of hearts he as much as any other is anxious to see maintained. I believe my right hon. friend has a real reverence for parliament; I think he has an equal reverence for the institutions of parliament, and I find myself at a loss to understand how, excepting under the pressure of tremendous strain through a long session, he could have been tempted to take what seems to be the easy path and the short path in dealing with the problem that he is dealing with here in the manner in which he is dealing with it. May I go just a step further? A quotation from Todd's Parliamentary Government is given on this same page from which I have been quoting:

The most ancient, as well as the most valued, prerogative of the House of Commons is the right of supreme control over taxation, to which the right to control issues is a natural corollary.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that those words ought to be emblazoned on the walls of this chamber to be constantly before the mind of every hon. member who sits in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: They were written here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend says, they were written here. It is a great tribute to our country that we have had an author of such distinction, so ingrained in his appreciation of the British constitution and all that it stands for, that he has been able to summarize and epitomize in the way which in these words he has done what is of the very essence of the British constitution as it has been evolved after centuries of struggle and effort on the part of all who love freedom and liberty. May I repeat the words?

The most ancient, as well as the most valued, prerogative of the House of Commons is the right of supreme control over taxation, to which the right to control issues is a natural corollary.

Is every hon. member opposite going to torpedo this most valued prerogative of the House of Commons? Is he going wholly to disregard it as something not worth paying attention to?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what we are being asked to do by this legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: No, no, nothing of the kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are under this measure taking away from this House of Commons its control over taxation. Let me read a little further:

The prohibition of raising taxes without parliamentary authority would be nugatory if the proceeds, even of legal taxes, could be expended at the will of the sovereign. The right, therefore, of appropriation was a logical consequence of the right of levying supplies. "The chain of historical evidence undeniably proves that a previous and stringent appropriation, often minute and specific, has formed an essential part of the British constitution."

There is nothing specific, there is nothing minute in the appropriation of the moneys required for this act. As a matter of fact, there is no appropriation. That is the sad and tragic part of it all, that this House of Commons is not being asked even to make an appropriation for the purposes of this measure, though I say here and now that if my right hon. friend asks for any amount, I care not what it is, in order to maintain these old and valued traditions, these high prerogatives of the House of Commons, I for one will support any appropriation that he may bring in, be it fifty million dollars, seventy-five or a hundred million dollars, or whatever sum he likes to name, provided of course that he gives to the house his reasons for believing the amount he names to be necessary.

Now may I go a step further. On page 9 the following paragraph appears:

> The supreme control of the commons over public grants, as already mentioned, necessarily demands the complete right of control over the manner in which those grants are spent.

There is no control over the manner in which these grants are to be spent under this legislation. This legislation takes away control from the House of Commons and puts it completely in the power of the executive. If we confine our thoughts only to the scope of the objects as specified in the bill, they are sufficient in number and significance to enable the government to spend public money on almost any single thing that can be conceived of, so long as by the wildest stretch of the imagination it may be brought to have a bearing upon the peace, order and good government of the country, or to the other subjects mentioned in the bill. To continue:

> This second right must be inseparable from the first if the control over the grants is to be effective; but it is a right which was not claimed nor enforced by the House of Commons until long after the right of control over supply had been established.

So we are parting with two of the most precious rights of the commons with respect to control of finances. I will quote one further paragraph at page 10:

> In its constitutional aspect then, the English system of finance and the rules of financial administration are based on the principle of supreme control by the House of Commons, and the machinery, by which it works, has been built up, developed, extended or modified to meet the requirements of that principle.

My right hon. friend in an earlier part of the session introduced a measure for the more effective supervision of the country's finances by a comptroller associated with the very department of which he is the head. But is it not almost a mockery for this house to have supported unanimously that greater control on the part of one branch of the civil service over accounting, and then in the same session to be asked wholly to part with its control over expenditures and over the specific purposes for which public moneys should be appropriated?

I might continue a long time, Mr. Chairman, to deal with this matter, but I will allow the weight of the authority of the words which I have read to make up for anything there may be in the lack of further emphasis. What I have given to the house in the quotations I have read is, I believe, as solemn as any statement could possibly be of the great rights which through centuries of thought and struggle have been won by those who were prepared to give their all for a free parliament to safeguard their interests and their liberties. It is most regrettable, indeed it is tragic in the extreme, that in dealing of all questions with relief of unemployment generally and of distress in the rural areas the people should have the government presenting to them what nominally appears to be a generous attitude but which in reality is an attitude which at the same time robs them of the most sacred right of British citizens, namely the right of having their interests fully protected by the parliament to which they send their representatives.

In the hope that even yet before it is too late this fatal course may be averted. I move, Mr. Chairman:

> That section 2 be amended by adding the words "not exceeding such amounts as may be appropriated by parliament."

In making this motion, I again appeal to the Prime Minister, to his colleagues and to all hon. gentlemen who support him in this house to consider above all else that greatest of the prerogatives of the commons and their own duties as representatives of the people in seeking to preserve this most ancient, this most important of all the rights of a free people.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I find myself to a considerable extent in sympathy with the position taken by the leader of the opposition, although personally I would feel inclined to stress the practical rather than the constitutional aspect of this question. I have no desire to cover the ground already so fully traversed when the bill was in its stage of second reading, but on behalf of labour I feel that I cannot permit this opportunity to pass without protesting against this bill as it stands. It is most unfortunate that there should be grouped together the three items in this section: (1) the relieving of distress; (2) the providing employment; (3) the maintenance of peace, order and good government. It seems to me that it is unfair to this house to so group these three items. In the first place, we can hardly vote intelligently on such a section. I want to have relief, I want to have adequate relief, but I do not like the three items included. If I vote against the bill in its present form it may be said I am voting against relief. I would personally take the risk of that interpretation by the outside public, but I do not think it is fair to the house to put members in that position. Then again, I do not believe the grouping in this way is fair to the needy people of this country. They are not criminals.

Mr. BENNETT: Who suggests they are, except yourself?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who suggests they are?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say the very grouping suggests that among the needy people of this country there are those who will have to be held down by the military.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Now, Mr. Chairman—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I am not going to sit down. I have the right to make my protest, and the very calls from across the way that this thing should be rushed through are—

Some hon. MEMBERS: We did not make any such calls.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —are in themselves indications of that arbitrary spirit against another manifestation of which I am protesting at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: You are wrong.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may be that I am wrong, but I want to protest against what I conceive to be a wrong policy on the part of this government. I would reaffirm that it seems to me the connection that is being established between peace, order and good government and the necessity for relief—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Do you object to peace, order and good government, or to any of them?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Do you object to them all?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. I trust the member across the way will be fair in this matter. I say the connection that is being established between the maintenance of peace, order and good government and the present situation of distress is indeed a most unfortunate one. That is my point. I say it would suggest that the people who are in need are to be held down by physical force.

Mr. STEVENS: I protest against language of that kind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is my inference—will you allow me to put it in that way?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is absolutely contrary to the facts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it is rather a significant fact that recently we have had an increase in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and have placed at the head of the force a military man.

Mr. STEVENS: And a good one.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Which again suggests a particular type of action. It is rather a serious thing if military methods are to be used in connection with the care of unemployed and needy people. It is all wrong.

Mr. MORAND: It is to take care of those who intend to feed on the needy people.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not understand what is meant.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why don't you, yourself, arrange for some work for those people instead of talking about it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is what I am sent here by my constituents to try to arrange. Does the hon. gentleman mean that I ought to go out myself and give charity? That is the job of this parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): No, give work.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the job of this parliament, and that is what I am pleading for, work for the people and not an increase in our military establishment, with special means for maintaining law and order and the right to make special regulations which is contained in a later clause. That is what I object to. I say this is essentially class legislation, because after all the people who have been carrying on Beauharnois schemes or Canada Power and Paper Company schemes; bankers and others of that class are not in need of material relief of this kind. This will affect only the poorer people, or the more unfortunate people in the community, generally those who are in the ranks of labour, and this year, because of the acute situation, also the farmers. So this legislation, is in effect directed against the labouring and the farming people of this country.

Mr. STEVENS: That is ridiculous.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think it is ridiculous.

Mr. STEVENS: I say it is absurd and ludicrous.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say those are the people for whom this legislation is designed.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the hon. member said those were the people against whom this legislation was directed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Very well, then; I will say those are the people for whom this legislation is designed. But I would point out that the legislation contains clauses which involve the possibility of the need of keeping these people in order by force.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps keeping the bolshevists in order by force, if there are some.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, the bolshevists are not in particular need at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: No, they get their hand out from Russia, as you know very well.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I do not know about that, though I have some suspicions.

Mr. STEVENS: You know pretty well.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member says I know. I have not access to the confidential reports which are available to him, so I have no knowledge on the subject. We were told yesterday by the present chairman of this committee that we should not trust to hearsay evidence, so I have nothing to say with regard to this particular question. But I want to state that if there is to be a direct dealing with the bolshevists of this country; if this is in any respect legislation designed to enable this parliament to get rid of the bolshevists, then let us have a separate measure to that effect, and let us discuss it on its merits. I think that should be done. If the government have grounds sufficiently strong to make them expect something dangerous to the state I suppose they have a right to take power of that kind, but let it be done in a separate measure. What I am here protesting against is the grouping of measures for the giving of relief with this question of the maintenance of peace, order and good government. I say that essentially this constitutes class legislation, because the wealthy people and even the middle classes of the community are not affected by it; they are not in need. The working people should not be in the position of being near-criminals, with special provision being made to suppress them in case the relief measures are not sufficient.

That is what this bill means, for I urge that if we really provide work for the people and give anything like adequate relief we will not need force. I think that is obvious to all. It is one of the fundamental principles, that is recognized as belonging to what the older philosophers used to call "natural rights," that a man has a right to defend his own life. If his livelihood is not guaranteed and may be taken away from him he has a right to fight for it. So said the older philosophers, and whether or not we admit this right a man is likely to do that very thing. The point is that we should make such provision for him that he will not be driven to take any such step.

Further I would say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this plays directly into the hands of those who urge the use of force in the bringing about of reforms.

Mr. STEVENS: Only when misrepresented by hon. members such as my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think not. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has his opinion and I have mine, which I am trying to express.

Mr. STEVENS: I have not only an opinion; I have some knowledge and some acquaintance with my hon. friend's tactics over a great many years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be so, and I also have some knowledge of my hon. friend's tactics for a great many years, so possibly we can call it quits. I say that in my judgment this measure plays into the hands of those who advocate the use of force to bring about reform.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not designed to bring about a reform; it is to maintain the life of the country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but if the life of the ordinary people is not being safeguarded under existing legislation and regulations the only thing the people can do is to take some steps to change that legislation and those regulations.

Mr. CAHAN: By force?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, and I want to make that clear. So far as I am concerned I am not in favour of the use of force and I am not advocating it.

Mr. CAHAN: But a few moments ago the hon. gentleman laid down as a principle of public policy that those who did not receive relief which they deemed adequate were entitled to fight for it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said that principle was generally recognized and that whether or not it was recognized as a matter of fact people in desperation would fight. I think no hon. member of this house will dispute that statement. But I am now trying to state my own position.

Mr. STANLEY: Are you encouraging them to do so?

Mr. YOUNG: You would do it yourself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but I think the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is quite right; if the hon. member were desperate and starving he would fight.

Mr. STANLEY: Not under the circumstances of which my hon. friend is speaking.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am speaking of the situation of men driven to desperation.

Mr. McGREGOR: This bill is brought in so they will not have to starve.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would support a bill which would supply relief, but I object to having incorporated in this relief measure a clause providing for the use of force.

Mr. BENNETT: It is designed for the protection from fraud of those who administer it, for one thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If it were only that I might be inclined to support the measure, but I think it goes much further. It has been suggested that I believe in the use of force, I want to say frankly that I do not believe in force. As a matter of fact I do not know what one driven to desperation might do; I am not saying I am going to be able to live up to my principles under all conditions. I am not boasting that, but I do say that for a great many years it has been my conscientious conviction that force does not get us very far. It was because I did not believe in force that I was not in favour of the last war; because I do not believe in force I have opposed military estimates; because I do not believe in force I cannot join hands with communists in their advocacy of it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Will the hon. gentleman confine himself to this section?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With all deference, Mr. Chairman, I think I am doing so. We are discussing the maintenance of peace, order and good government and I suggest that the means which are outlined to maintain these things is the use of force. I say that as one who does not believe that force carries us very far I think my suggestions ought not to be brushed aside as though I were the one advocating force or defending those who advocate the use of force to bring about reforms. I came to this house very largely because I advocated parliamentary reform rather than the use of physical force. I have worked away here during all these years in the hope—sometimes I have almost thought it was a vain hope—that we were going to bring about adequate reforms by the use of parliamentary methods. I should almost despair if we proceeded further along the line indicated by this bill. I think I know the labouring men and the farmers too as well as any gentleman in this house, and in my judgment let me repeat, this kind of legislation is playing directly into the hands of those who advocate the use of force to bring about reforms. We are giving authority to the government to lay down certain orders and regulations which will have the force of law, and that again takes away real liberty from the people. I do not know just how this is going to be worked out, but I can imagine an order going out for a man to go to some camp in the north country, and I can conceive of circumstances in which a man might feel himself justified in saying, "I will not go to that camp." The regulation, under this proposed legislation, is put into operation and a man is forced to go; or, if he refuses to go, he may be subjected to a fine of $1,000 or to three years imprisonment, or both. That is the abrogation of the fundamental principles of liberty—the liberty of the subject, and his right as a citizen.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is no provision in this bill for such a thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We will discuss that further under clause 6 of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us suppose the hon. gentleman were charged with the administration of a substantial relief measure and that he provided, according to his best judgment, good work with a fair living, housing, clothing and meals, and a reasonable remuneration. Now, if he offered such work to those who were unemployed and, because of some prejudice against the locality, or for any other reason, they refused to accept it, what would he do with those who so refused?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I want to be fair in this matter. I think that the hon. gentleman presents a very difficult case. I think that a man who is offered decent work, under decent conditions and with good remuneration would accept it. I believe that ninety-nine out of a hundred would take it.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the hundredth man?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I suppose he would be one of the antisocial people and he would have to be punished—that is, proceeding on the principle of using force. I recognize, frankly, that the whole of government is based on force; that indeed is the logical justification of the advocacy of force. It is sometimes said that the way to break force is to use force, and there is some logic on the part of those who so contend.

Mr. STEVENS: Then my hon. friend admits in this case the necessity for using force.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say, I should not wonder at the government taking that action; nor should I feel inclined to argue strongly against that. But I do not think that is the position which is being taken in this measure.

An hon. MEMBER: What is it then?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is for the promoters of this legislation to say. But my point is that it is most unfortunate that relief measures should be accompanied by a provision for coercive measures of this kind. They should be separate. If a man becomes a criminal he should be tried as such by the ordinary processes of law and if guilty convicted and sentenced. If our laws are inadequate for the purpose, we are going to be here a few hours if not days longer and there is still time to pass legislation to meet that difficulty. And that legislation should be a part of the criminal code: I submit that it should not form part of a relief measure. I may have a few words to say later in this connection and I do not want to cover ground that has already been adequately gone over. But, on behalf of those whom I represent, on behalf of a large number of people from coast to coast from whom I have received letters within the last few days, I do want to protest against legislation of this kind.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not intend to discuss the principle of the bill; I pronounced myself in that regard when the resolution was before the house. I wish, however, to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a situation that has developed, at least in the province of New Brunswick. This act, section 1 declares, may be cited as the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931. I do not see in any section of the bill any specific reference to what section of the country the relief will apply. I suppose the government would be prepared to consider requests for relief from farmers or settlers in any section of Canada, provided the request was not exceptional in character. In New Brunswick a great many people settle on what are known as green farms. They get the right to do so from the local government under the colonization statute of the province. They are obliged to clear ten acres of land, and to build a house, whether it be a log house or not, twenty feet by fourteen, together with a barn. They clear the land and live on it for three years and after that they have title. This local colonization has been carried on to quite an extent in northern New Brunswick. In the last three or four years a number of people have taken up these green farms and have hewn homes for themselves out of the forest. Under the act they are allowed to absent themselves from their farms during a period of four months. That period takes in the summer season. After they have put in what crop they can, they are allowed to go and earn a living elsewhere, the land not having yet reached that state of cultivation which will enable them to live entirely from the crops grown on it. In the past they have been able to sell pulpwood from the first ten acres, and when these ten acres are cleared and put under cultivation they are permitted to take up a further ten acres adjacent. In this way they have been able to eke out a living and bring up their little families, clearing the land and selling the timber for pulpwood. In winter, if they are not engaged getting out pulpwood, they have an opportunity—at least they had in the past—of going to the lumber camps in large numbers. Within the last three or four years, however, winter operations in the lumber camps, as everyone knows, owing to economic conditions, have not provided much employment, and in some parts of New Brunswick labour has dwindled to practically nothing. Last winter in northern New Brunswick there was little lumbering carried on. The price of pulpwood in the local market has fallen to practically nothing. In fact, there is little demand for it at the present time except in one section in northern New Brunswick. Now, these people find themselves in this position. While there is not a crop failure, as in the west, they have not in the last four or five years had the means of earning a living while at the same time building up homes for themselves in the forest. I know certain sections of northern New Brunswick where the people are in a desperate condition to-day, and I would ask the Prime Minister whether, in the event of a request being made by the proper authorities, and the situation being fully explained to the government, relief under this act will be extended. I plead for these people. Other members from New Brunswick who know the situation as I do will see the force of my argument and, I think, will be convinced as I am that these people should have some recourse for relief under this bill. If a request were made through the proper authority, say the municipal or religious authorities of any denomination, or the provincial Department of Lands and Mines, could assistance be given under this bill as it will be given to the farmers in Saskatchewan whose crops have failed?

Mr. BENNETT: I have indicated already that that is a matter for which the provinces would be responsible. Of course, any representations which they might make would receive the proper consideration.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, the few observations which I desire to make will have to do entirely with the amendment offered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). He and others on this side of the house have urged so strongly the desirability of leaving with parliament the voting of definite sums of money that I will not deal with that phase, although I recognize the force of their arguments. When a constitutional or theoretical side of a subject comes too strongly in conflict with the practical side, ordinarily I am inclined to favour the practical. What I have to say at the present moment is the result of the observations made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) at the outset of this debate. He stated that he recognized fully the validity of the principle urged by hon. members on this side, that ordinarily parliament should retain its control over all expenditures. I think it will be agreed that that is a sound principle, both constitutionally and from a business standpoint. The Prime Minister having conceded that it is a sound principle, I submit that it should be only some consideration of tremendous and practical importance which should cause him to override and violate that principle.

Mr. BENNETT: The principle is not overridden.

Mr. EULER: I know it is useless to waste the time of the committee in asking my right hon. friend to change his procedure because he has made the very definite statement that he is going to adhere to the bill as it is. However, he has on occasion changed his mind—I do not say that by way of reproach because a wise man will change his mind sometime when he finds it expedient or wise to do so—and he might very well accept this amendment. In that way both purposes which are desired to be served could be served; there would be no violation of constitutional principles and he would still have all the practical authority and power necessary to deal with unemployment. The leader of the opposition has suggested that if he, the Prime Minister, would insert in the bill a definite amount, whether it be $50,000,000, $75,000,000 or $100,000,000, he would be quite willing to support it. In all probability the sum of $100,000,000 would be quite sufficient, and then there would be no violation of constitutional principles. Surely if parliament were in session there would be no attempt made to take such powers as are being taken under this bill. When we get right down to the essentials of the things I have heard no argument which convinces me that a definite sum should not be placed in the bill, a sum sufficiently large to guard against all emergencies which might arise. It does occur to me that possibly it might be an inconvenience and expense to summon a special session of parliament, but we must consider whether in order to save the expense of a special session, it is worth while to violate a principle of the constitution which states that parliament shall have control over its expenditures. I think all purposes could be served by inserting the sum, of, say, $100,000,000 and I believe all hon. members on this side would willingly support such a measure. That would provide sufficient money to enable the government to contend with any difficulty which might arise, and if that amount should not be sufficient then I submit it would be the duty of the Prime Minister to summon parliament in order to consult about the difficulty into which the country had fallen. I realize the human disinclination to change one's mind because—

Mr. BENNETT: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. EULER: —of the solicitation of those opposed. I, for one, have not the slightest suspicion of the motives of the government in asking for this blank cheque. I do not think they are going to spend the money for the promotion of their political fortunes or anything of that kind, but I do say that the Prime Minister could accept the suggestion offered and serve both the constitutional and practical phases of the situation.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) must be thanked for the justification he has given for the criticisms made both on the resolution and the second reading of this bill. I expected nothing else from the right hon. gentleman, knowing his principles and his traditions. I think every hon. member expected it, and I trust the youthful member of the government, the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré), will be able to profit therefrom. I was painfully surprised at the remarks of the Solicitor General. I have known him to be a young man of principle, and I hope his twelve months in office have not yet made him cynical with regard to the maintenance of the basic principles of government.

I will not say anything further with regard to the fixing of an amount. The amendment now before the committee expresses the views which I stated when the resolution was introduced. In some respects, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), while in other respects I disagree. I also both agree and disagree with the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) who spoke last night. I believe that there is possibility of danger, especially in the large centres, and I hold that it is one of the primary duties of the government to make preparations to guard against such dangers. The government has the duty and the responsibility of looking after the welfare of all classes of the community in all parts of the country. The maintenance of peace is one of the essentials of the liberty of the subject. Poor people could not be relieved if peace were not maintained. However, on the other hand, I agree with the hon. member from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor), and with my hon. friend in this corner of the chamber (Mr. Woodsworth) that the form in which this legislation is presented is not the form which should have been adopted by the government in order, first, to accomplish its bounden duty to keep peace and order and, second, to counteract the attempt which will be made by those wanting to create disorder. No doubt the revolutionaries, call them bolsheviks or communists, are very few in number; I do not think they are dangerous in or by themselves and I think it was a mistake upon the part of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) to have given the impression that the communists in Toronto are as numerous or as active as they appear to be from the printed sheets he has read. The danger that I see is this, that you have a large number of good people, usually law-abiding, who, in the state of suffering and anguish in which they find themselves, may lend their ears to the enterprises and propaganda of individuals who will lead them into crime, although in themselves they are no more criminals than any of us here, and perhaps less than some of us. That is what I am afraid of. It seems to me in order to have the moral force of public opinion, especially among those people for whom this legislation is meant, I mean the sufferers, the government should have made it clear they do not want to resort to force unless they are compelled to do so.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

The most plausible argument that has been advanced in favour of this disposition is the one made last night by the Minister of Justice. He explained that on account of certain judicial interpretations of our constitution, it would be doubtful if the government could exercise in matters of relief all the powers contemplated in this legislation unless it were connected with the basic and broad principle that the government is primarily loaded with the responsibility of preserving peace, order and good government in Canada. That is what I had in mind when the resolution was before the house, and for that reason I did not mention that part of it; I waited for the bill. But if the object of the government is what was stated by the Minister of Justice last night, why would they not change the preamble of their bill and the clauses which derive from that preamble, in this way? I pass over the first part of the preamble and I come to the sixth line. Why not phrase it in this manner?

> And whereas it is necessary for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and other bodies—

And so forth. That would make it quite clear as the basic principle of the law that the government are adopting relief measures and, so to speak, are going beyond the ordinary and normal boundaries of their jurisdiction in order to preserve peace, order and good government. That would mean that the first object of the government is to maintain peace, order and good government by giving relief to the sufferers. That would be serving notice to all the suffering classes that the first thing they will receive from the government, after parliament has given its authorization, is relief; and then such measures as may be necessary to preserve peace, such measures of force as may be required to maintain good order, would come not as a preliminary or as a separate subject from that of relief, while being connected in the same law, but would be exercised as a sanction to the preliminary measures taken by the government for the relief of the suffering classes. It is of advantage, it seems to me, as a means in the hands of the government of alleviating that feeling of distrust and disquietude which is arising much more quickly than the government realize since the introduction of this bill. Let us not make the mistake usually committed in parliament of thinking that, when we come to the last days of the session and after such discussions as those which have accompanied the Beauharnois affair, the people are concerned only with those things which have excited the nerves and feelings of parliament. No. The people at large are primarily concerned with what relates to their liberty and their material comfort. At the present time, there are in Canada millions of people who do not care a penny what parliament is going to do with Beauharnois, but who care very much what they themselves are going to get and give to their children next winter. There are also large numbers of people, especially in the big centres, who are very much disquieted at what the social order will be in those cities, when thousands and thousands of transient workers, men who have no relations with the community in which they live, who have no homes, who cannot be traced to any domicile from night to night, will be on the streets looking for food—and here I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—who will not care about law, or order, or the constitution or anything like that, but who, if they have nothing to eat, will simply break the doors or windows of the bakeries or butcher shops and serve themselves. Of course this action would be bad; but would any human being, whether he be a member of parliament or not, say that this is not a natural instinct of the human animal, if you like, who goes out for food? We shall have thousands of these next winter; and although I advocate the taking of measures for preventing such things, if necessary by force, I advocate first that you put on the side of parliament and government all the moral strength you can gather from all classes of the community by making it quite clear that you want to feed the people before you want to put them in gaol.

Mr. STEVENS: We want to give them work before we put them in gaol.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite So. In that I concur entirely. For example, I am quite in sympathy with those subclauses mentioned in clause 3 which define the powers to be exercised by the government. I have marked them with three red lines which is my colour of approval. It is quite right that this legislation should be very much broader than that of last year. I am pleased to give that ample measure of liberty of action to the government in regard to relief measures. As regards the other part of the bill, however, I think the government should accept the suggestion, first, to insert a fixed amount of money which can be enlarged at the next session, special or ordinary, as they choose; but I insist even more on the necessity of making it clear in the letter of the law that they are introducing these words "peace, order and good government" as the moral and constitutional basis for their legislation and not as a new matter of legislation. In that way the practical object would be attained and the principle would be saved; public opinion would remain in a much better state and would be much stronger behind the government than it is now. I need not say that the political result of this legislation does not concern me a bit.

Mr. BENNETT: Nor me.

Mr. BOURASSA: I quite believe so. I also believe the leader of the opposition is sincere in the amendment he is making now. What is the use of trying to minimize the motives of each other in these matters? We may have differences of view as to the details of legislation like this, but after all, we are all Canadian citizens; we are all in touch with individuals who are suffering at the present time and we all want to do our best in order to help them out. It is in that spirit I am asking the Prime Minister to modify the principle of this bill and those clauses which attach to that part of the preamble so as to make it quite clear that the object which was stated last night by the Minister of Justice as being the reason for introducing the bill, is properly stated in the phraseology of the preamble.

Mr. CAHAN: I quite agree with the general sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Labelle, but it seems to me he has placed upon the preamble to the bill a construction which it does not necessarily convey. The bill in the preamble recites practically what the hon. member for Labelle suggests. We are in a condition of national depression involving the necessity for relief measures of an extended character. We all know that when such distress prevails an effort is always made to stir up dissent and dissatisfaction and to promote civil tumult and strife. I agree with what my hon. friend has stated with regard to the city of Montreal. From one end to the other, in large sections of that community, propaganda is being carried on night and day of a most reprehensible character, and relief measures to a very great extent will be necessary in that great city in view of the large influx of population which is taking place day by day, to which the hon. member for Labelle called attention in the other stages of this debate.

Mr. BOURASSA: And at other times this session.

Mr. CAHAN: And at other times this session.

This preamble should be read fairly, and read fairly, I think, it does not convey the impression sought to be conveyed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre nor in a milder way the impression which was sought to be conveyed by the hon. member for Labelle. The preamble says:

Whereas by reason of the continuing world-wide economic depression there exists in many parts of Canada a serious state of unemployment and distress—

That is the basic fact upon which the whole bill rests. It proceeds:

—and whereas the partial failure of the wheat crop of western Canada has intensified the adverse economic conditions theretofore prevailing—

That deals with a specific economic condition prevailing in the three provinces of the west, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. It proceeds:

—and whereas it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and other bodies in such ways as the governor in council may deem expedient, and for that purpose should vest in the governor in council the powers necessary.

and so forth. That part of the preamble accentuates that the conditions theretofore referred to are such as to demand national relief, to demand, in other words, legislative action on the part of this parliament and administrative action on the part of the government of Canada. The preamble proceeds to state that for the purposes of relieving unemployment, and so forth, there shall be vested in the governor in council the powers necessary to ensure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of all relief measures. That is the main object. This bill may be founded, as the hon. Minister of Justice has stated, and indeed it is founded upon the constitutional provision which places upon the parliament of Canada the supreme duty to maintain peace, order and good government, but recognizing that fact, as the hon. member for Labelle has done, does not necessitate that that should be the basis of the preamble to this present measure. The preamble says:

—for that purpose should vest in the governor in council the powers necessary to insure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of all relief measures.

To that extent we are in accord, I think, but no one could sit down to consider the drafting of this bill for the prosecution of all necessary relief measures with the knowledge that every member of this parliament has, and with the wider and more accurate knowledge which the members of the government have without—

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I had almost closed my analysis of the preamble of this bill. I was discussing this latter clause:

—and for that purpose should vest in the governor in council the powers necessary to insure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of all relief measures and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada:—

I assure hon. gentlemen that there is no sinister motive in the sequence of these several clauses. I had something to do in a brief way with the drafting of this section, and my own view at the time was that we were facing a national crisis of unemployment and possible distress, that the first duty of the government was to provide for the relief of unemployment and of distress, and to support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and other bodies in such a way as might be deemed expedient. Then the further question acrose in my mind that some provision should be made for the maintenance of peace and good government from the federal standpoint. I am not departing from the view that the whole basis of this statute is the preservation of peace, order and good government; but experience shows that in all times of distress and depression such as we are passing through to-day, opportunity is given to inflame public opinion, and especially to excite the minds of those who are suffering from that distress; and I believed when this bill was being drafted, as I still more firmly believe to-day, that it is the duty of this government under these exceptional circumstances to take such measures to protect those who are in distress, in poverty and in need from civil strife and tumult as a result of agitation. I know that the day we were considering the draft of this bill I read in the daily press of France—because it happens that at my home we receive the daily papers of France—the text of what purported to be a semi-official document stating that special efforts were being made by a certain element of society to stir up strife in Canada owing to the present commercial, industrial and agricultural depression, and that special measures were being taken throughout Canada for that purpose. No person who reads the pamphlets and leaflets which are being circulated throughout this country at the present time can fail to believe that special efforts are being put forth. Therefore as part of the relief of this national distress it seemed to me perfectly proper and convenient, and even necessary, that the federal government should be empowered to take special measures in that regard. Consequently the bill in the form in which it now is met with my approval, because in my mind—and I am sure in the minds of those associated with me in the government—there is no sinister or subtle meaning or intention in its terms, but those terms clearly disclose the purpose of the bill.

With regard to the other constitutional aspect which is suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition, it is well understood in constitutional parliamentary practice that usually in voting money a limit is fixed to the amount that can be expended by the government during the fiscal year. But after all that is merely practice, it is not law. There are no constitutional and no legal limitations upon the authority of this parliament. Parliament now is here to decide, the pros and cons of the whole matter are before parliament, and all that the government asks is that parliament, in the exercise of its discretion and its authority, shall authorize the government from now to March 31st next to expend such sums as may be necessary under conditions which are not now known, which cannot now be fully appreciated or estimated, and which render it impossible to determine whether the amount of expenditure necessary shall be $10,000,000 or $100,000,000. It seemed to me—and I am sure it seemed to other members of the government from discussions I have indulged in with them—that in a time of national crisis such as this parliament might well vest in the government of the day during these few intervening months before March 31st of next year authority to expend such sums as may be deemed necessary. To fix a sum too small would hamper relief, because no one has protested more vigorously than hon. gentlemen opposite against the appropriation of funds by governor general's warrants, and this is not a matter to which according to the ordinary and constitutional practice such warrants would apply. It is not an unforeseen expenditure such as would usually be covered by a governor general's warrant; it is foreseen, it is known now, and therefore parliament should deal with it. But although the amplitude of the crisis may be only dimly foreseen at the present time, I say there is no hon. gentleman in this house who has a sufficiently extensive knowledge of what will take place in this country within the next six or eight months to be able to determine with any degree of accuracy the amount of expenditure which will be necessary in the interim. If the money is improperly expended, so much the worse for the government. It is true that here they are given a large and exceptional discretion in times unprecedented in Canada and therefore, to use the phrase of the right hon. Prime Minister, as the shareholders or directors of a company parliament must give a large discretion to the executive officers who, for the time being, are to administer the finances of this country, whose duty it is in a national crisis to relieve unemployment, hunger and distress and who, when parliament meets again in February of next year, must take full responsibility for every act they have done or suffered to be done.

But I wish hon. gentlemen, so far as I am concerned, would rid their minds of any thought that in the drafting of this preamble or of this statute there was any subtle intent undisclosed in regard to dealing with the matter of peace, order and good government. In fact it was brought to my notice by some of the officials of our railways the other day that the men travelling by the score from one end of the country to the other, with hundreds being brought daily to the city of Montreal from the western and northern districts, were deliberately allowed by the railway companies to take passage on their trains, with no effort being made to keep them off because conditions were such that the officials were afraid that if these men were prevented from taking the ordinary baggage or freight cars as a means of transportation, the lives of passengers throughout this country would be endangered. I believe that to be a fair appreciation of the possibilities with which we must deal, and therefore, I think parliament may well authorize the government, in these exceptional circumstances and during these exceptional times, to take advantage of what may be called this exceptional vote in order that there may be wide-spread relief of the existing distress and that the ordinary peace and harmony which should prevail throughout the length and breadth of this land may be maintained during the coming months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend the Secretary of State has just said that with respect to parliamentary grants the principle of parliament limiting the amount that may be expended is a matter of constitutional practice rather than a matter of law.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And my hon. friend says "certainly" in acknowledgment of that statement. I grant that he is correct, but if it comes to a choice, in matters pertaining to government, between having regard to what is constitutional practice as against what at the moment may be the law, for my part, of the two, I deem it infinitely more important to have regard to constitutional practice. After all it is parliament that makes the laws; constitutional practice determines how parliament proceeds in the making of laws and in determining their character. I say the first regard of members of parliament—what may be the first regard of lawyers may be another matter though I fail to see it would be so—should be the upholding, so far as it is possible so to do, of constitutional procedure and practice. I say that in this bill we are departing from constitutional procedure and practice as regards the manner in which grants of parliament are made and taxation controlled.

It is true that the Minister of Justice made reference to two or three cases in which he said the principle of parliament definitely limiting the amount of possible expenditure had not been carried out. I submit that the examples he mentioned only go to prove the strength of the principle and of the rule itself as it is laid down by all constitutional authorities and as it has been stated so frequently from this side of the house.

Let me deal with the cases mentioned by the Minister of Justice and, which were also referred to by the Prime Minister himself. The first was the Elections Act. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice drew attention to the fact that in this act in connection with what might be necessary for the purpose of conducting elections a definite amount had not been fixed.

Mr. CAHAN: Would my right hon. friend pardon me—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment.

Mr. CAHAN: I have to leave the chamber; I have an engagement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that however much I may differ with him politically I shall never have any doubts as to his courtesy in everything.

I was speaking of the Elections Act. The reason in that case there is no limit fixed is that at the time of general elections, parliament is dissolved, the former parliament has passed away, and until a new parliament is elected no parliament can be called together to make a grant. Circumstances might arise in connection with an election where if the amount was not sufficient to carry out all essential factors, the election itself might not be completed satisfactorily. Therefore, in the realization that circumstances may arise when parliament is dissolved which might prove embarrassing where an election is in progress, and that a new parliament cannot be called together until after the election is over, this latitude is allowed.

The next case referred to was the Expropriation Act. There again a certain latitude is allowed, but it is restricted to a definite specific purpose. In each of these cases there is a specific, defined object with respect to which parliament because of very special circumstances has allowed a little in the way of latitude. The act before us is not one that relates to a specific, definite thing; it is an act that is broad enough to enable the government to carry on practically the whole business of the country for six or eight months. That constitutes a very great difference. In connection with the Expropriation Act we all know it is impossible to foresee the sudden necessity which may occasion a wholly unforeseen necessity, and what it may involve. There is a reasonable latitude allowed, but it is always allowed in the light of the fact that the contingency cannot possibly be foreseen and that expropriation proceedings will have to be immediately confirmed by parliament and that in nature and extent they are definitely limited.

Another example given was sections 4 and 5 of the Finance Act, and in referring to those sections this morning the Prime Minister used the expression that it had been recognized as being important that in moments of emergency the government should have the right to spend certain sums of money without having first received authority, within definite bounds, from parliament so to do. I draw attention to the word "moments" used by the Prime Minister. This is not a moment of crisis; this is a condition of affairs extending over a year, a condition which has been continuous throughout the months of the past year and which is likely to continue for yet a year or more. In the case of the finance act, the act as I have said gives the power it does because parliament may not be in session at the moment of time at which the government must act in order to save a wholly unforeseen situation, A financial crisis may take place at any moment, and some act on the part of the administration may be necessary to save the day until parliament can be assembled. That is a very different thing from parliament itself, while actually in session, giving permission to the executive to spend indefinite amounts without limitation, not with regard to a momentary crisis but with regard to a situation which may last for months if not for years.

The other case cited by the Minister of Justice was that of old age pensions. There, no definite amount it is said was fixed. In that regard the amount is very definitely fixed in an indirect if not a direct way, because the payment of any proportion of the old age pensions amounts is conditional upon the provinces in the first instance appropriating definite amounts of moneys for the administration of their old age pension laws and payments to be made by them on account of old age pensions. The representatives of the people in the provincial legislatures vote what is necessary for old age pensions, and it is only after they have so done and the money has been constitutionally provided that our agreement, which finds its basis in that constitutional obligation, comes into effect. The proportion agreed upon at present is 50-50; possibly on and after Monday it will be 75-25. Very definite amounts are fixed in the first instance by the provinces through their legislatures. All these seeming exceptions, studied in the light of their true significance, are found to be really such exceptions only as go to prove the rule, and exceptions which in the light of the contingent circumstances have due regard to strict constitutional practice.

There is one all important point which I think ought to be repeated. Hon. gentlemen opposite seek persistently to convey the impression that it is necessary to give these extraordinary powers to the executive because it is going to be some months before parliament reassembles. The Prime Minister says that he is willing to change the date of the period for which the act shall continue to apply. He is willing to change it to the 1st of March. But again I say that if a condition is so serious that it requires unlimited powers with respect to expenditure, with respect to police and law and order, then when any such exceptional situation arises parliament ought to be called to deal with it. This House of Commons should not give to the ministry any excuse for not calling parliament under such circumstances. Once disturbances arise in this country and there is a general demand throughout Canada for the reassembling of parliament to deal with the situation, what we shall hear from my right hon. friend and his colleagues will be that parliament has already given the executive all the necessary powers—that they have unlimited borrowing powers, unlimited powers with regard to expenditure, the unlimited use of force in any way they may wish to apply it, and that they can handle the situation much more effectively than the people's representatives can by discussing the matter in the house. I say that we should not encourage any view of that kind; and to lend it even remote countenance is to help to create the very conditions in this country which the administration should of all be the most anxious to avoid.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): In view of the unusual nature of this measure, and in view also of the importance of the subject matter, I may be pardoned even at this stage of the session if I say a few words on this question, particularly as very little has been said from this corner.

As to the measure itself and as to its extraordinary nature, I shall speak in a moment or two. But the first feature of the measure that strikes me forcibly is that it carries with it a confession of at least partial failure. A few days ago the corridors resounded with the acclamation of the Conservative party who were celebrating the anniversary of a great and momentous victory that took place a little over twelve months ago. That victory was due, in part at least, to the expectations held forth to the Canadian people that within measurable time the problem of unemployment would be solved. At the expiration of twelve months, after two sessions of parliament, a special session and this regular session, we find that not only is the problem itself unsolved but that it has reached such a point, involving so much human suffering, actual and potential, as to call on the part of the executive for such powers as are embodied in this act.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the measure involves another confession of partial failure. During these twelve months, and particularly during this session of parliament, we had looked for some definite policy of relief, some policy of public works, some detailed and defined policy which would indicate the method and extent of the public works involved, the amount and location of construction, and in a general way a fairly accurate concept of what would be done. But, again, we are met now with a measure somewhat vague but so comprehensive as to enable the executive to do anything along the lines of relief and to devise such means, to carry on such construction, as may appeal to their discretion but which at the moment is not in their minds. It is a matter of regret to me that during the last few months a Dominion-provincial conference has not been called to discuss this policy and settle upon something definite and detailed, so that we might know now the nature and extent of the public works which might be constructed to provide employment in order to relieve the present situation. I regret also that the government did not see fit to accept the resolution which I myself offered, and which was supported in this part of the house, for the establishment of a national council which would study these matters and the underlying problem from which unemployment itself arises, and from whose deliberations, if not in time for this emergency then for other emergencies, might evolve a policy so that no longer would the grim spectre of unemployment and suffering stalk this land. That, however, was not done, and it seems to me a matter for regret that we should find ourselves in our present situation.

Now, coming to the measure itself, I must confess at once that to me it is an extraordinary measure, using that word in the proper sense. It is out of the ordinary, and in order to understand thoroughly how unusual it is we may define for a moment the functions and prerogatives of an executive. To my mind, as the word implies, the functions of the executive are to execute the express will of parliament as crystallized in the various laws placed on the statute books. But I cannot accept the suggestion that at the present time the government is usurping or seeking to usurp those prerogatives which have always been in the hands of parliament itself. What the government is asking is that parliament should, of its own volition, invest the executive with those powers which properly belong to parliament, and to do so for a definite period for certain express purposes. My point is that parliament is asked to express its own will in the matter; theoretically at least, parliament is at liberty to give or to withhold that consent and those powers. And if parliament does see fit to grant those powers it will be the act of parliament itself by which this is done. Parliament for the moment will be over-riding its former wishes, expressed in normal times by way of statute.

I must confess again, Mr. Chairman, that under ordinary conditions, I should hesitate very much to give my support to such an unusual measure; for undoubtedly, under this measure, if and when passed, the government will exercise all those powers and functions which have been religiously retained by the legislative body. It will abolish, at least during the months that will intervene, that definite difference which has always existed between the legislative body and the executive body; and the executive body will for the time being assume the functions of the legislative body itself. That is the situation, and it is undoubtedly a most serious one, and one that can be tolerated only under most extraordinary conditions. Do such conditions exist? For some months, in common with other hon. members of this house, I have been giving consideration to the situation and to measures parliament might adopt during this session to alleviate conditions, to mitigate suffering and to rid the country of this grim spectre of want. I have come to the conclusion, reluctantly it is true, that the only way to accomplish this purpose is to give to the executive the powers which it seeks. If there were other practical ways, I would be glad to adopt them; if it were possible for parliament to say at the moment what public works would be carried on, what program was to be advanced, how much money was to be expended, then I would not be ready to sign this blank cheque. The fact that neither the executive itself nor any hon. member of parliament has the slightest conception at this time of the amount of money which will be involved or the kind of action which will be necessary, helps me in coming to this conclusion.

An hon. MEMBER: Or where.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Or where. I think there is an implied criticism of the executive for their not having held a Dominion-provincial conference so as to be prepared to let us know what policy would be adopted and what public works would be constructed. But taking things as they are at the moment, I cannot see any other practical way of meeting the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not the hon. gentleman think that there is another practical way of meeting the situation? Could not a special session of parliament be called?

Mr. STEVENS: And lose a couple of months.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not the hon. gentleman think that would be the proper way to proceed?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have considered that during the last few months and, rightly or wrongly, I have come to the conclusion, first, that much suffering might take place before parliament could meet to deal with the question and, second, parliament being called at any given time, with a constantly progressive condition such as we have, there would be difficulty at that time in knowing just what would be needed in the immediate future.

There are two what might be called contradictory motives confronting us, and we must adopt one or the other. We must stand by the constitution as it is written, retain within parliament those functions which properly belong to parliament and place the prerogatives of parliament before the necessity for action; or we may exercise this prerogative for the time being and for this purpose by giving to the government the power which it seeks. In either case parliament would be exercising its prerogative. As I said before, I have reluctantly reached the conclusion that with the conditions with which we are confronted, it is the wisest, the sanest and the most humane course to be followed, to give to the government the power necessary to deal with the circumstances which we find to-day or may find to-morrow.

When I spoke critically of the failure of the government to implement its expressed promises in regard to the solution of unemployment, when I spoke critically of the failure of the government to evolve and bring forward a policy of construction, be it understood that I was referring to industrial conditions and not to farm relief. That is something of which no government could have comprehension and to which no government could have given proper consideration. It is a condition which has arisen out of a complete crop failure in a large part of this country. However, my criticism still stands in connection with the conditions which have been with us for twelve months and which are confronting us in increasing measure.

Where the question of peace, order and good government is concerned, I must confess that I am not a constitutional lawyer. In discussing this question some weeks ago with some friends I expressed the opinion that I thought we must give powers of general import. I expressed the opinion that in order to do so we must make reference to those general powers of peace, order and defence of the realm, or what might also come within the purview of a war measures act. These powers were not to be given for a wrongful use but rather that the government might have the necessary authority with which to carry out the relief purposes. I was glad to hear my opinion confirmed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie).

Another question arises in my mind. Have I or have I not sufficient confidence in the present government to bestow these great powers? Although I have frequently quarrelled with the government over matters of policy, although I have offered criticism, I have that confidence in their integrity which warrants me in giving these powers, just as I would have given the same powers to the late administration. I believe that every government we have had has been composed of men of moral integrity who would not abuse powers thus bestowed. I must suggest to the government what is undoubtedly in their mind, that in giving them these remarkable powers we are giving also the most unusual responsibilities, responsibilities which must be lived up to. Following the suggestions already made by other hon. members, following the pronouncement of the government itself and following some of the terms of this bill, I suggest that special attention be paid to a really constructive line of public works. There is throughout this country the need of works of construction which will add to the value and to the credit of this nation, works which will be of value and use to the people for years to come. I shall for one scrutinize very closely and critically the actions of this government. When we meet again I intend to make certain that the money, power to raise which we are now giving, has not been frittered away in useless or unnecessary pieces of construction. An effort should be made to keep away from doles, although I do not want to see any man or woman suffer from the need of direct relief. The work accomplished should be work worthwhile for this country.

I state my position without equivocation. I believe, perhaps reluctantly, that at the present time these powers should be given to the government in order to meet an unusual situation. I trust this government to use these powers fairly and wisely, knowing that they will be called to account when parliament again meets. I trust that in the immediate future they will make an honest and serious attempt to study this question and to evolve a policy which will banish this spectre of unemployment and the necessity for action of this kind. I hope they will appoint some kind of consulting body and that in another year we will not be confronted with the necessity of giving carte blanche to a government to relieve the effects of depression, but that we will be met by a government which has fulfilled its pledges to remove the cause and solve the problem of unemployment for all time.

Mr. HEENAN: I have made one appeal already to the Prime Minister to eliminate from this bill all reference to the maintenance of law and order. I have done so sincerely, and I believe the Prime Minister is sincere in his idea of incorporating it in the measure, but I consider his action is due to failure on the part of the government to realize the psychology of the labour men of this country and the effect this provision will have on that psychology. When one listened to the Secretary of State telling of the leaflets and other propaganda distributed throughout Canada and the effect that might have on our labour men, one could readily understand how sincere the members of the government might be. As I say, the action of the government is due to failure to understand the psychology of the labour men, because from my experience I believe there are no more sane, true, loyal citizens than are the labour men. We have had periods of depression before; we had for instance, the great catastrophe between 1914 and 1918, during which time the labour men of Canada were considered the bulwarks of the nation. I can recall then when the labour men had a grievance and when they came and assured the government that for the duration of the war there would be no industrial upheaval and no strike on our railroads. The newspapers at that time came out with big headlines saying what true patriots the labour men were. Now just because we have a period of depression, which was not caused by the present government nor by the late government, and because a few of our citizens are distributing leaflets, we have to bring down a measure of relief and incorporate in it a provision for the maintenance of law and order. I do not know whether the Prime Minister quite realizes the effect of this on the psychology of the men who will receive the relief.

I believe I know where the government is obtaining its information. To be fair I want to say this, that if I were on the government benches to-day, receiving the information that each one of them is receiving, and without having the experience that I have had, I might too be alarmed as to what is going to take place in this country. The majority of us know that the government have men situated in different parts of Canada giving them information as to what is going on in this regard. I recall the time when I used to sit in the Labour office reading these reports, and if one were to take them seriously, one might consider there was going to be a revolution overnight. I recall one time when negotiations were taking place in the mining areas of Nova Scotia in connection with a wage schedule, and if one were to have taken notice of the reports to members of the government, emanating from that quarter, one would have considered a revolution was going to take place overnight. I did not take those reports seriously. Knowing the mining men of Nova Scotia as I do, and knowing there is no body of miners in any other part of the world more sane, sensible or loyal, no better citizens anywhere, I consigned that information to the waste basket. The consequence was that there was no revolution; an agreement was reached and it was carried out to the letter by the contending parties.

With reference to the statement made by the Secretary of State regarding men riding blind baggage cars and freight trains, one would imagine this was something alarming; that the railway officials were afraid of something extraordinary happening. I have railroaded ever since I came to this country in 1902 and I do not know a year since then in which we have not had hundreds of men, good loyal citizens, travelling east and west in this manner, their only reason for so doing being that they were not able to pay their fares. These men were welcomed in western Canada during the harvest time. People watched for them to drop off at the railway stations in order that they might assist in the development of the country in mining, harvesting and other projects of a national character. Therefore, there is no fear whatever with respect to the men who travel to and fro on the trains in this manner, and there is no novelty about it because it has been going on for many years.

It is quite evident from the remarks of members of the cabinet that they have changed their position with respect to this bill, especially as regards the provision for the maintenance of law and order. The Prime Minister, who is the spokesman of the government, when he introduced this measure, made it quite plain what it was for. If hon. members will refer to page 4278 of Hansard of July 27, they will find that the Prime Minister is reported as having said this:

> If the government is given reason to believe, as there may be some cause for its so believing, that there is a settled purpose in the minds of a considerable number of people—not large, numerically, but scattered over the various parts of Canada—to take action against the maintenance of law and order, or make attempts to impede the difficult task which we are charged, then we will take such action as in the judgment of the executive of this country, the cabinet who are the board of directors for the time being administering the affairs of this country, as will free this country from those who have proved themselves unworthy of our Canadian citizenship.

Those are his own words. Later the Minister of Justice changed the position of the government with respect to that, saying that it was only because of constitutional questions that this had to be based upon the principle of the maintenance of law and order before they could give these contributions for unemployment relief. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, when asking questions of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, showed that he had quite clearly in mind some disturbance was likely to occur, because he asked the hon. member what he would do providing some man out of a hundred would not go to work. The minister showed quite clearly that he had in mind that some drastic measure would have to be taken in order to compel that man to go to work or else suffer the penalty that is provided in this legislation. Surely the government must realize that is not the way to deal with one man out of a hundred who will not go to work when it is provided for him. To take care of that one man, or half a dozen men out of a hundred, we have laid before us one of the most autocratic measure that I have ever seen in any country, coupled with the provision for unemployment relief, As I said before, I do not want to take the position that the government is doing this with some ulterior motive. A government that promised the electorate it would cure unemployment, end unemployment, or perish in the attempt, realizes that this is not a good political move. I would say that on behalf of the government. This is not a popular measure to introduce. I do not say that the government has any ulterior motive. I think it is because they are unduly alarmed because there were a few stones or bricks thrown in one particular part of the country, and because of the information given to them by their agents, who may be unduly alarmed or who, as I prefer to believe, do not understand the psychology of the labour men of Canada, and who take one or two radical speeches to represent the position of the whole of the labour men of Canada. The labour men of Canada have been through trying times in many years, much more trying than at present. They have been tested, and I think it is wrong to sigmatize, as this bill does, the labour men in Canada generally and suggest that they cannot go through a depression and co-operate with the government without having a threat staring them in the face that if they do not do thus and so they are liable to three years' imprisonment. That is the reason I pleaded with the Prime Minister the other night to eliminate all semblance of threats from this bill. The labour men of Canada have shown very conclusively, even during this particular period of depression, that they do not need the threat of maintaining law and order to get them to cooperate, for during the last twelve or eighteen months I know of thousands of labour men in this country who are entitled, because of their seniority, to so many days work per month—no one could deprive them of it because of their agreements and because of the seniority which they have attained after many years of faithful service—and yet they agreed among themselves to lay off so many days per month in order to give a certain amount of work to others who were less fortunate. With such evidence before me I do plead again with the Prime Minister not to insult the labour men of Canada by coupling in this bill the provisions for farm and unemployment relief with a provision for the maintenance of law and order.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to delay the proceedings of the house; in fact, I have said very little since I came here, but I must register my most emphatic protest against this bill. Virtually it suspends the constitution of this country, and establishes a dictatorship, and a dictatorship not of a political party but of the cabinet of this country. There is nothing that the cabinet cannot do under the powers conferred by this bill. Every right and privilege of citizenship will be abrogated by the passage of this bill. As has been claimed, and as was substantiated by the remarks quoted from the speech of the Prime Minister on July 29, when introducing the resolution, this provision is aimed at the working classes of this country. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce said to-day that it was aimed only at the bolsheviks, but who is going to define what a bolshevik is? The Minister of Trade and Commerce might include me in his definition of a bolshevik. Someone else might define him as a bolshevik. There you are; there is no one safe if this bill passes.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says that I said the bill was aimed at somebody. I interrupted an hon. member some hours ago and intimated that the bill was aimed at nobody, that it was for the purpose of providing aid to the unemployed. It is not aimed at anybody or at anybody's liberty, that of the workingman or anybody else.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that it was aimed at certain people and that certain people would be affected by it, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, I believe, and as I think Hansard will show, that it was aimed at bolsheviks.

Mr. STEVENS: No. I made no such statement.

Mr. MacINNIS: Certainly the Minister of Trade and Commerce used the word, and I am asking now who is going to define who is a bolshevik and who is not. What is the definition of a bolshevik? An hon. member suggests that it is one who is opposed to constitutional government. If that is the definition, then as this bill does away with constitutional government, if only for a limited period, the government must be bolsheviks. If things are not better next spring than they are now, will this provision be extended, or are you going to go back to where you were before?

I believe that the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition is quite sound, although I would not accept the bill even with that amendment. I am opposed to the bill because it links up unemployment relief and distress with the maintenance of peace and order in this country. I believe the leader of the opposition is quite within the mark and very logical when he advocates the appropriation of a certain sum of money to deal with the situation. There are only five months to the first of the year, and ordinarily parliament assembles very shortly after the first of the year. Surely the situation in this country is not so bad at the present moment that this government cannot estimate fairly closely what amount will be required for this purpose until parliament reassembles at the usual time. I noticed only yesterday in the press that the situation in Great Britain is considered very serious, and that financial difficulties may arise at any time. What did the Chancellor of the Exchequer say about it? Did he ask for powers to deal with the situation such as this government is asking? No. He said that they would call a special session of parliament if necessary, even before the 20th of October, to which date parliament had adjourned. I do not think there is any reason at this time for this government to ask for these powers. But suppose there is a reason. We in this corner have been, ever since the beginning of the session, drawing the attention of the government to the seriousness of the unemployment situation, and the government have steadily maintained that there was no unemployment situation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking on the 4th of June last, said that this was not the time to deal with the situation that might be anticipated next autumn. That is all very well for those whose stomachs are filled, and who do not know what hunger is, but it is very different for those who are unemployed.

As I said at the outset, I do not wish to prolong this debate. I think that nothing has been said so far that would convince me that this bill should pass. This bill is an outrage and should not pass this house. If the government had done their duty they could have got all the necessary information in regard to unemployment. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) gave their dereliction of duty in that regard as a reason for giving them this particular privilege which they are now asking. I do not think this house should grant it. At least I will take the responsibility of voting against the bill in its entirety, and I shall be glad to meet any member of the government before any labour audience in this country and justify my position.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, I absolve the government from any sinister motive such as has been suggested with respect to the non-parliamentary control terms of this bill. They have no sinister motive that I know of; they have merely a fundamentally different attitude towards control of finance by the government from what we on this side have. And the same fundamental difference existed a hundred years ago, during the great struggle prior to the rebellion of 1837. Now my right hon. friend opposite claims to have put the capsheaf on our present constitutional status while he was in London recently, and yet he and his followers now want to revert to the colonial days, for by this bill they ask that the powers of parliament be abdicated in favour of the executive. That is just what the struggle was over in 1837. I do not differ with my hon. friends over there as individuals, I differ with them because of their Tory attitude of mind towards things parliamentary. It is a strange coincidence that we should have in this parliament the grandson of Mackenzie and the grandson of Papineau taking the same attitude on this question as their grandfathers did on the question of parliamentary control of public expenditures. The grandfathers in this instance were sound and right.

Mr. MANION: They take the same attitude on every question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If it is natural for my hon. friends opposite to revert occasionally to the Toryism of that day, it is just as natural that we should stand by the reformers of a hundred years ago. So we do not need to import any personal feeling into this matter at all. There has always been a fundamental difference between the Liberals and the Tories on the right of parliamentary control of expenditures. That fundamental difference existed for centuries in Britain before 1837 and has continued in Canada more or less right up to the present day. A year ago I had the pleasure of visiting the West Indies and I was astonished to see what the colonial system really meant in operation. We had it in Canada prior to 1837—the king's representative appointing the executive. In the West Indies they are perfectly happy under that system; and there are reasons why they should be, but I need not enter into them now. But prior to the union of Upper and Lower Canada we had the struggle of the people for the right to control taxation and expenditure. I was raised on those conceptions. Whether I have been true to them all through my life or not —I hope I have—I intend to be true to them now. Everyone who has read about Lyon Mackenzie in Ontario and Papineau of Quebec are aware that in their struggle for responsible government they risked their lives, their homes, a price on their heads and everything that was most dear to them, because they wanted to secure what we are trying to preserve to-day, the control of parliament over expenditures, a control which quite unnecessarily is being abrogated by this bill. If there were some reason for taking so serious a step I would consent to it. It is not because I have not confidence in my hon. friends opposite as individuals that I oppose such arbitrary powers, but because the Tory mind does not suit my mind. I do not know what my hon. friends opposite are going to do in their administration of the relief bill. From their conception of this matter at the last special session they are liable to do anything. I hope I have made myself plain.

Mr. MANION: Yes, you may sit down now.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then I will leave that point. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he ponder whether he is not putting himself in wrong with the people. This relief is going to cost us a lot more money than any sum that has yet been suggested. The biggest amount that I have heard suggested was $100,000,000. That sum will not cover the necessary expenditure for both farm relief and unemployment. Does my right hon. friend want the cost to dawn on the people gradually? Why not say $150,000,000, which will be nearer the mark than any sum mentioned so far—that is, if we are to take care of both farm and unemployment relief all over Canada. Is there any state reason why my hon. friends opposite should not be candid and say: This is going to cost the country during the next eight months $150,000,000? If so, I am willing to listen to such state reason, but I have not heard of any yet. There are two principles that divide us, and because of that I respect the views of my opponents, and I hope they respect our views and realize that in opposing the terms of this measure we are not merely pernickety about something that does not amount to anything except possibly in theory.

We are proud to be the descendants of those reformers that I spoke of, and to hold to their conception of responsible government, and I suppose my hon. friends opposite are equally proud of being the descendants of the Tories of 1837 and to hold to their conception of it. But I would urge my right hon. friend not to divide us now on this question. We have got along together on many things, particularly with regard to our present status. Why make this rupture at the present time by reverting to colonial status in this respect? I would rather have in this bill the sum of $150,000,000 mentioned, and trust the government to expend it properly, than depart from the principle that I have been endeavouring to enunciate and that was so much better enunciated by my right hon. leader. I leave that suggestion with the ministry, and I hope their pride will not prevent them from modifying this bill in the light of the arguments that have been presented against the measure as drafted as a blank cheque, during the course of this debate.

Mr. BENNETT: I think, Mr. Chairman, that I must say a word or two, and I will endeavour to be as brief as possible. If I might say so without offence, the right hon. leader of the opposition has overlooked the fact that every provision that Colonel Durell suggests should be taken to safeguard control by parliament of any grant it makes is provided for in this measure—every one of them. He says:

> The bedrock on which the English system is built is the principle of the maintenance by parliament of control over the grants which it makes.

"Control over the grants which it makes." Parliament is about to make a grant. If it declines to make it, it has not made it. It exercises its control over that grant through the auditor general and by the annual report of the auditor general that is laid before this parliament.. No power that this parliament has provided in days gone by, no safeguard that the legislature has fixed, is taken away; the control is over the grant, it still continues. The question is, shall the grant be made, and that is the only question. There is no "Tory mind" about it. The question is, shall the grant be made; yes, or no?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: If the house says the grant shall not be made, that ends it. But once the grant is made, every constitutional safeguard that has been obtained during all the years that are past will still remain, they will all be taken, and if this government fails in the discharge of its duty in that regard, like other governments it will disappear, and other men will take the place of those who now sit on the treasury benches. The question is: Shall the grant be made? Let us look at just what this does mean. The hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) says it will take $150,000,000. The leader of the opposition stands in his place and says "Fill in any sum you like."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And give your reason for it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a new thought, that came this morning; last night there was no "reason." The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) says "Name any amount;" the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said last night, "Name any amount." I put this to the house: Would there be any sense in inserting an amount which you know would not be spent as against inserting no amount, when you know that the latter course will encourage that economy of expenditure which is so desirable.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I believe that amount to be required.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, I say my friend the ex-Minister of Agriculture believes that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does not my right hon. friend believe it too?

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say, as I said this morning, if some of the communications that have recently been received are warrant for a conviction, you cannot tell what the amount will be. That is my difficulty, and has been for weeks. But I do put it to this house that confusion as to the grant and the expenditure of the grant is the difficulty that the right hon. gentleman opposite has been experiencing. The very statement that he read, the control of parliament over the grant, indicates that. That is the bedrock. The bedrock is not the question as to whether or not you fix the amount at $10 or $1,000; as if this great and glorious principle, which should be respected as far as may be possible, cannot be broken without smashing the constitution! To hear one of these hon. members talking about the constitution being destroyed, you would think he really meant it, instead of its being merely flapdoodle talk that he thinks will raise a cheer among the crowd. Go and tell men on the street corner, "Your constitution is broken," do you think they will believe it? What happens is referred to right here by Colonel Durell: the bedrock is the maintenance by parliament of its control over expenditures. It is going to have it. Did parliament break the constitution when it gave the governor in council power to guarantee the bonds, without limitation, of the Montreal harbour bridge, which reached a total of $19,000,000, when the original statement of the cost was only $6,000,000? Did that or did it not break the constitution? Was the constitution broken when the old age pension legislation was passed providing that there should be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund any sum that might be necessary to meet half the expenditure, not of one or two provinces but of any number of provinces who might come under the scheme? That was done without knowing whether there would be one province or nine provinces affected, or whether the amount would reach $5,000,000 or $25,000,000. Was the constitution broken; was it destroyed; did it crack?

Then the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and others spoke about peace, order and good government, and said that by this provision we were insulting the labouring men of this country. This provision is inserted to protect them from just such talk as that. There were two clear reasons for this bill. One was the constitutional point, which I always think it is difficult to explain when you are dealing with matters that have engaged our attention for the last half century, and when you begin to reconcile decisions from the Queen v. Russell to the last case decided a few years ago by the privy council as to the exact limit between the powers of the provinces on the one hand and the Dominion on the other. So I said last evening that I proposed to remove any doubt on that score with respect to section 2 by providing, through an appropriate amendment, that this relief, this provision of employment and this maintenance of peace, order and good government throughout Canada, should be as far as lay within the competence of parliament.

Attempts have been made to have it appear that what we have endeavoured to do is shock the constitutional susceptibilities of the provinces, but that is not so. One of two things had to happen. Either we had to undertake large obligations and responsibilities which, under the constitution, fell upon the provinces, and do it by declaring that it was done for the purpose of maintaining peace, order and good government, or we had to leave the provinces to do it themselves. Let there be no misunderstanding about that. The privy council has clearly decided that point, and this house expected us to take hold of this national emergency on behalf of all the people as distinct from the people of the provinces which might be affected. That is why we are trying to do it. That is why I say it became a national calamity when a hundred thousand people, by reason of the last crop failure mentioned last evening by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) and the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) suddenly became in need of food and clothing.

It may be said that we have trenched upon the constitutional obligations of the provinces to deal with these matters, and we had to do that on some ground. It was not the ground of war; it was not the ground of national defence or anything of that sort. It was the ground of peace, order and good government, that riots might not be possible, that unfed men might not congregate in corners to be inspired with the thought that their lot was such that they should prefer Russia to Canada. This was done so that our youth might not be banded together to decry the government of Canada, as has been advocated by the circulars which have been broadcast throughout the country. We desire to maintain peace, order and good government through employment, through activity, through food and clothing justly earned and work which involves wages. But there is the other side to it, the side of which every hon. gentleman has the right to think. Shall there be fraud in the administration of this relief? Shall it be possible that decent, honest, hard working men such as those referred to by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River shall be always subject to the insidious appeals made by non-Canadian agitators, who in some instances for the moment may have Canadian citizenship by reason of false declarations or flagrant disregard of the law which gave them a naturalization certificate? Shall these men be permitted to insinuate into the minds of Canadian men the cursed doctrines of the destruction of our civilization and the foundations of our government?

Those are the two issues, and this is the reason we have used this language in this measure. When it is said that we are trying to set aside the constitution, that is not so. Have we asked this parliament for a grant? We have. Is parliament to give that grant? Either this bill is defeated or we get a constitutional grant. True it is not limited, but it is granted. Why do not hon. members opposite vote against the bill? Why do they not summon up their forces and appeal to those on this side of the house to defeat the government? Once this parliament makes a grant that is the constitutional exercise of the powers of parliament; it is the control of parliament, which is just the same as the control of parliament over any $100 item we have in respect to any part of the public service. It must be expended honestly; the auditor general must exercise control, for we do not provide that this money shall come from the proceeds of a loan which the government might put in a trust account and deal with. These payments are to be made from the consolidated revenue fund, and every dollar which goes through that fund under any circumstances is subject to the control of the auditor general.

That is what this measure means. If anyone suggests that because the government has not mentioned any specific fund they had in mind any object other than the safeguarding of two things, one the efficiency of the relief granted, and the other the guarding of the treasury of this country and the credit of Canada, he is suggesting what is not so. Those are things for which the responsibility rests for the moment upon the government. The hon. member for Red Deer made a happy observation when he asked if any hon. member in the house thought those of us who sit here to-day were seeking this measure for comfort or for pleasure. Does anyone think for a single moment that it makes it easier for any one of us because we have to ask parliament for a statute such as this? Then the cry is "Summon parliament." I can only say that this parliament will be summoned in due course, under whatever circumstances exist or may arise, but at the moment what is wanted is action and not words.

During all this session hon. members have been complaining that they could not get a statement, and they could not. During all that period there was not a day when at least one member of the cabinet was not thinking about this matter, securing information from every possible source, endeavouring to fit themselves to grapple with a problem as difficult as any that ever faced men in Canada. I wonder if hon. members realize that when war was in this country it gave employment at once in increasing numbers to the men left here, providing food, clothing and the other necessities of life. This condition which exists to-day is just the negation of that other condition. This matter is not being put through hurriedly and I should like to assure my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition that I have not for a single moment lost my sense of perspective. I only wish sometimes that my sense of perspective was not just what it is; my lot would be somewhat easier. I think I have just as clear an appreciation of the situation, from one end of this Dominion to the other, every part of which I have visited, as any hon. member in this house. From information which I have received and read and re-read and read again until I have been tired and weary with the reading of it, I know just what the conditions are. And what the hon. member from Willow Bunch and the hon. member from Weyburn have said is nothing new to me nor to the members of the government.

I say advisedly that in the early days of the session we had fervently hoped that with the spring, with the planting of the crop, there would come that betterment of conditions which would result, of course, from the prospects of a harvest, even although the price which it would bring would be small. We had hoped, relying upon statements made by men who had a better knowledge of world affairs than we have in the northern half of the continent, the great financial men to the south, and other great economists in other lands, that conditions would improve. The conditions that brought about the disappointment of our hopes in that regard are, as the hon. gentleman said yesterday, the act of God in one instance and those conditions in central Europe which are known to every hon. member of the house who reads. The condition in two countries, more than in any other, is responsible, together with the world-wide condition that results from the situation, to which I referred, arising out of the great war.

Those are the conditions, and I just ask my hon. friends this: What would you have done better than we are doing? We are doing our very best to deal with the problem, with a deep and ever-increasing sense of responsibility, which sometimes leaves men little opportunity for sleep and sometimes little thought, except the thought of what that responsibility is. But that does not in any way destroy our sense of perspective. And when this government asks the house for this legislation it does so for just the purpose mentioned—to preserve peace, which is the negation of war; to give happiness, which is the negation of sorrow; and to give order, which is the negation of riots and tumultuous assemblies in various parts of the country. And for the provision which will ensure these ends, of peace, order and good government, through constructive effort in public works and undertakings, giving assistance to the provinces and to the municipalities and other bodies, not depriving them of their constitutional functions but enabling them to collect their taxes, thereby receiving from the people the necessary assistance to carry on—for this condition of affairs, I say, no men will be more grateful than these various authorities, that we have at least tried to see that they will not be charged with responsibility for those who are taking advantage—and I say that deliberately—of the very trying conditions of the present time, and of the great and difficult problem with which we have to deal, of those who try to incite men to actions which under normal conditions they would not think of.

With these problems, Mr. Chairman, we will deal to the best of our ability and after the most thoughtful consideration which we are able to give them. That consideration may not be the best the world offers, but it is the best we can give. We have asked parliament for these powers, not for selfish purposes, but for the benefit of this country. It is our bounden duty, by every means within our power, to establish successfully and to maintain in the present situation peace, order and good government, and we propose to do so by the measure which we have offered for adoption by this house. With the grant made, parliamentary control is complete, and it will be maintained by reason of the auditor general's control over the consolidated fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I quoted this morning from Durell's Parliamentary Grants, which my right hon. friend will I am sure agree is the standard authority throughout the British Empire on this all-important subject, the right hon. gentleman asked me whether I would lend him the volume. He has, as opportunity has afforded, been carefully perusing its pages ever since. I have no doubt he took it away with him during recess—

Mr. BENNETT: No, I did not have time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, he has been busy on it ever since. I have rather enjoyed watching him, because I knew what he was looking for. He was going through the volume to see whether, anywhere in its pages, he might discover something which would afford him some excuse for making of his present stand an exception which might be justified. I venture to say that if within the two covers of that book there could have been found anything that would lend shadow of countenance to what my right hon. friend is asking this house to do at the present time he would have found it, and we should have heard about it in a manner much more emphatic even than that which he has employed in speaking.

What does my right hon. friend say? He began and concluded his remarks by saying that control on the part of parliament was affected because forsooth the auditor general would have to do with the auditing of all accounts. Now surely my right hon. friend has more regard for the intelligence of this body than to assume that its members are going to be confused as between what constitutes control and what constitutes auditing. The two are very different functions, and if hon. members will just ask themselves what the difference is they will see exactly where the difference lies between my right hon. friend and myself, and between hon. gentlemen opposite and those on this side of the house.

The quotation I gave this morning, which has been repeated by the right hon. gentleman, was that the bedrock of the constitution was control by parliament—not by any auditor general but by parliament—of all grants. Now that control is being parted with, because the measure fixes no amount.

Mr. CAHAN: Will my right hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should prefer to get through first; I will answer the hon. gentleman's question later. We are being asked to give a blank cheque; we are being asked to allow the ministry to spend whatever sums they like, to borrow whatever sums they like. Where is the control in that? The power of parliament passes over into the hands of the executive, and they are free to borrow as much as they please, to spend as much as they please, for months at a time, and parliament is not to be in session. Parliament has prorogued, the ministry will be absolutely free to do as they please. My right hon. friend says the auditor general will go over the accounts, and that parliament appoints the auditor general.

Mr. BENNETT: And the reports have to come back to parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And now my right hon. friend adds, the reports will have to come back to parliament. Well, I trust that before this bill passes the Prime Minister will insert an additional clause, which I shall move as an amendment, that reports be made to parliament of what is being done. Perhaps I had better stop to speak of that for a moment.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not necessary, if that will please the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is very necessary, especially where amounts certain to be spent are so large. When parliament was called to deal with the question of unemployment relief at a special session last year, a definite amount was named in the bill respecting unemployment relief and was appropriated, namely, $20,000,000. It was deemed necessary then to insert a provision to the effect that reports should be made to parliament. I cannot understand, therefore, why in this particular bill, where no amount is fixed, and which confers infinitely greater powers upon the executive, no provision appears for a similar report to parliament. The act for the granting of aid for the relief of unemployment, passed by this parliament at the last session, contained the following provision:

> A report shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after the opening of the next session thereof, containing a full and correct statement of moneys expended under this act, and the purposes to which they have been applied.

That section has been dropped from this bill or rather has not been inserted in it and my right hon. friend tells us that he was told it was not necessary. Why was it necessary last year? It was pointed out by my right hon. friend that at least some semblance of the authority of parliament over what had been spent and the opportunity of review was essential, and if I am not mistaken that clause was included as a result of a suggestion from this side. A similar clause should be in this bill and before it is finally passed I propose to move an amendment to that effect. I do hope my right hon. friend will not seek to go the length of taking away even the obligation on the part of the ministry of reporting to parliament within a definite time after the expiration of the bill as to what has been done and spent under its provisions. That would be the last straw.

My right hon. friend quoted my remarks that the bed-rock of the constitution was that of the control of parliament, but he did not refer to another quotation which I made from the same authority. Mr. Durell points out that a corollary of the control of parliament is that there must be definite amounts fixed for the different purposes for which the ministry is asking parliament to make grants. Mr. Durell lays as much emphasis upon the restricting and defining of grants as he does upon the control of parliament in the broad sense. He says that one flows from the other, that one is the necessary corollary of the other and that you have not control by parliament unless you have your amounts definitely stated. My hon. friend did not quote that. When he ventures to quote Durell he should quote from the beginning to the end, and give to the committee the entirety of the meaning. I am standing upon that authority and I am giving to the committee what Mr. Durell has said in this regard.

During the course of his remarks my right hon. friend seemed to intimate that as much as $150,000,000 might be required. Do hon. members realize that when the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in office the total expenditure of Canada, including the interest on the public debt and the like, did not in any way exceed $125,000,000? Do they realize that when Sir Robert Borden became Prime Minister of this country during his early years of office the expenditures for all matters in connection with which this parliament voted appropriations did not exceed the figure which is being discussed at this moment as being necessary to meet this need? Do they realize that the amount which this government is asking us to permit them to spend without any limitation and, as my right hon. friend has just revealed to us, without the necessity of even reporting upon to parliament, is almost equivalent having regard to this period of time for which it is asked, to the annual amount appropriated by parliament for the administration of all the services of Canada, for the payment of the interest on the public debt and for the meeting of expenditures which have grown out of the war and the like? This amount is required for seven months only. When the proportions of this matter are thus revealed, one would be far removed from a sense of responsibility who did not realize what it may mean and what it may lead to.

My right hon. friend does not wish to call a special session of parliament. Let him then call the regular session a little earlier. We would be obliged if he would call it at the beginning of the new year or, better still, at the end of the present year. My right hon. friend will be fortunate if before this year is out he does not find it necessary to call a special session to save himself from the effects of what he is doing at this moment. He may find that he will need to call a special session to deal with conditions in this country which have got beyond his control owing above all else to the fact that he is asking this parliament to give him unlimited powers. Apart from the dangers which autocratic powers always seem to breed, having unlimited powers, the men and women of this country, believing that there is nothing under heaven my right hon. friend cannot do, may confront him with the things they demand of him to do and he may find it necessary to call this parliament to shield him in the administering of the enormous amounts which he is now asking us to give in this way. There will be a period of seven months during which the provisions of this bill will apply. My right hon. friend has said that this bill will expire on March 1.

Mr. BENNETT: March 31 is provided for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend said he would change it to March 1.

Mr. BENNETT: If the opposition so desired.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will certainly do all we can to reduce the time. Among other reasons I think it will be helping to save my right hon. friend from himself.

Mr. BENNETT: I am so grateful.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The other evening my right hon. friend gave us the definite assurance that parliament would be called not later than the middle of February. That means that over half a year must elapse before parliament will be called. In the meantime the government will be free to do what it pleases, no matter what circumstances may arise. They are to have a bottomless well from which they may draw all the resources necessary to meet any situation. What does that mean? It means that parliament as parliament in making this grant is simply committing hari kari, we are turning over the whole business of this country to the executive to be run in a more absolute and dictatorial way than has been sought by any government from any parliament at any time since the days of Cromwell and the civil wars of that period.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King) negatived.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the section is declared passed, I will ask the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) to move an amendment thereto. This amendment will obviate the possibility of there being any misunderstanding so far as provincial rights are concerned.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move that section 2 be amended by adding after the word "maintaining" in the fourth line the words "within the competence of parliament", and adding after the word "government" in the last line, the words "throughout Canada".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This amendment may prove helpful for the purpose of giving a semblance of limitation to the matters to which it refers, but it neither adds to nor substracts from the powers which are given by the section. However, I think it would be well to have it included in the section.

Amendment (Sir George Perley) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3.—Powers of governor in council.

Mr. YOUNG: Last night when the house rose I was about to make a few remarks in regard to a letter I had received and read into the record. The Prime Minister and his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, seemed to be under the impression that I did this to embarrass the government. That is not the case. I do not see how any government could find anything in that letter to embarrass them. The letter was well and courteously written; it attached not a word of blame to the government for any of the conditions described in it. The writer stated distinctly he understood the difficulty with which the government is confronted.

Mr. STEVENS: And he addressed it to the Prime Minister and not to the hon. member.

Mr. YOUNG: A copy was sent to me with a covering request asking me to bring it to the attention of the powers that be. If any government can find anything in that letter to embarrass them, I must say they are easily embarrassed. My purpose in reading the letter was to set as clearly as possible before the committee the exact situation as it exists. These people who have lost several successive crops, first exhausted their own resources, their own credits. Then they turned to the municipalities and the municipalities helped them out until their credit was exhausted. Last fall the municipalities found themselves in the position that they could not secure another dollar from the banks without the backing of the provincial government; their credit was exhausted. Now from what the Prime Minister tells us to-day, the credit of the province is likely to be unequal to the task of securing for the municipalities the necessary relief to hand out to these people. That is the situation.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. gentleman realizes he is doing no service to any part of this country by making that observation. I did endeavour to disclose to the committee, without going into too much detail, that the strain might be such that money would have to be loaned to the western provinces. That is what I said. I have refrained purposely from getting into discussion of that kind which might furnish ammunition for those who attack the credit of the very province in which the hon. gentleman lives. If he desires to do so, I cannot help that; I have done my best.

Mr. YOUNG: I will accept the Prime Minister's explanation. This is what I want to put before the committee: As the Prime Minister has said, the primary responsibility rests with the municipalities. The information contained in the letter which I read and in another communication which no doubt the government received, is to the effect that many people out there are in such straits that they need immediate relief. In this clause of the bill I find paragraph (a) as follows:

(a) Provide for the construction, extension or improvement of public works, buildings, undertakings, railways, highways, subways, bridges and canals, harbours and wharves, and any other works and undertakings of any nature or kind whatsoever.

All that is excellent, but it will take time to plan those works. You cannot commence them to-morrow.

(b) Assist in defraying the cost of the production, sale and distribution of the products of the field, farm, forest, sea, river and mine.

That is excellent also, but it will take time, It will not bring immediate relief.

(c) Assist provinces, cities, towns, municipalities, and other bodies or associations, by loaning moneys thereto or guaranteeing repayment of moneys thereby, or in such other manner as may be deemed necessary or advisable.

I suppose that paragraph will cover the case of municipalities that are unable to assist themselves, but this will be subject to certain rules and regulations which will take time to work and plan out. My purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the minister is to suggest to him—and I am not and have not been trying to embarrass him—that while these plans are being worked out, something might be done to yield immediate relief to those who are on their last bag of flour now and whose children are running around insufficiently clad, by letting the municipalities and the banks know that where it is necessary for a municipality to extend immediate relief in the form of the necessities of life, such as food, fuel and clothing, the credit of the government is behind that municipality in furnishing such relief. I make that suggestion seriously, and I hope the government will consider it favourably and not believe I am doing it for the purpose of embarrassing them.

Mr. HEENAN: Is it the intention of the government itself to proceed with any works under this provision or only in cooperation with the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: Both.

Mr. HEENAN: What I have in mind is this: in the part of the country I have the honour to represent many public undertakings are required, the plans of which are already prepared, and the federal government could do a great deal of work without any cooperation on the part of the provinces or the municipalities. We have already, for instance, the plans of a bridge over the Rainy river. The United States government have passed an act permitting the Dominion government to build a bridge across there, but have refused to cooperate in paying a portion of the expense. Inasmuch as the bridge is for the purpose of, shall I say coaxing people from the United States into Canada, I think the government at this time could very well bear the whole cost of the undertaking.

The Minister of Public Works has in his office a report by one of the engineers in his department in regard to a retaining or protection wall along the south part of the lake of the Woods where the waters are washing away town property. There is also a public building that I think the present Minister of Railways and I promised the people of Emo because it was required and there are many other works of a like nature. I see the minister smile. This promise was made during election time.

Mr. MANION: I was not in Emo then. I was smiling at the facility with which my hon. friend makes promises.

Mr. HEENAN: I happened to meet my hon. friend in Emo in 1926. I do not remember what department he was minister of at that time, but I know he made the same promise to the people of Emo as I did.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend's memory is of a very convenient type.

Mr. HEENAN: I am glad to know the government can initiate public works under this measure and we shall look for some of these undertakings to be carried out.

Mr. VALLANCE: I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Let us take that portion of Saskatchewan where at the present time there is such dire distress. In connection with the public undertakings mentioned in paragraph (a), is it the purpose of the government to permit the agriculturists of that portion of the country to take advantage of the opportunity of rendering service on this construction work, or are we going to confine it to other classes?

Mr. BENNETT: Primarily, as I said before, that is a question for those in the province responsible for those matters. The language is that it is to enable the government to assist them in discharging their duties. It was not intended that the federal government should send somebody out there to employ eight or ten men to work at a given point. That is not a matter which constitutionally comes within our powers, but we shall not only try to enable but we will enable those whose duty it is to do that work.

Mr. HEAPS: Paragraph (a) refers to work which may be municipal or provincial in character. I have in mind works which are purely federal in character and which the government could carry on at this time, that would help to a considerable extent in relieving unemployment in the larger centres. At the beginning of the session I asked the Minister of Public Works whether it was the intention of the government to provide work of that nature whereby the artisans in the cities could find employment. I was unable to get any definite answer from the government. However, I see that the government are asking for an unlimited amount and paragraph (a) gives the government power to provide for the construction of public works, and so on. I would ask the Prime Minister whether, under that clause, the government will undertake to carry out federal works which will be wholly a federal charge and towards the construction of which the municipalities will not have to pay anything. It is hardly necessary to point out that many municipalities, particularly in the west, are not in a position to pay even the one-third that they were called upon to pay last winter. I think it would be much more desirable if the federal government itself would undertake such federal public works as are necessary and can be carried on in the immediate future.

Mr. BENNETT: I tried to make clear to the hon. gentleman that the real reason we have to go so much further than heretofore is that because in a great many parts of Canada municipalities have been unable to collect any taxes whatever, and therefore they cannot carry on their undertakings. The provinces wherever possible have come to the assistance of the municipalities. To the extent to which it may be thought desirable, having regard to the circumstances of each case, such action will be taken as the interests of the country as a whole demand. That is the real reason why those words are there. Certainly it contemplates that there may be federal undertakings that will be carried on solely by federal authority. We expect that that will be so, but as I did explain to the leader of the opposition, the estimates provide for federal undertakings and public works that are within the contemplated revenues for the year. This extra effort on the part of the country will have to be one related to the communities wherein it is made, having regard to the conditions that obtain. I could not give an antecedent expression of opinion that might satisfy my hon. friend, but I told him that with respect to every province except one, and the premier of that province is writing a letter stating his position, we have already taken steps and obtained from them indications of the work they thought they could do which would be federal in its character, and undertakings which might be regarded as appropriate for joint effort. We have in addition, of course, the reports of our own engineers.

Mr. HEAPS: Let me give a concrete illustration of what I have in mind. In Winnipeg for a number of years we have been requiring a new post office and a new custom house. In times like these when there is so much unemployment I think that work of this kind should be undertaken. They are not works the expenditure on which would come out of the revenues of the country, but are capital expenditures. I am wondering whether under the provisions of this bill the government have in contemplation works of this nature.

Mr. BENNETT: A committee of the citizens of Winnipeg sent representatives to this city. They met the government and presented their case. They presented it also in writing. The attitude that may be taken with respect to the matters referred to will depend altogether on the general position as indicated by the province of Manitoba and also the municipalities as they relate their position to that of the province. Whether or not the works mentioned will be undertaken has not been decided, and naturally will not be until such time as this measure having been adopted the activities under it will begin; but if every member of the house were to rise in his place and mention the works that might be done we would remain here rather a long time. For the information of the house I may say that I have asked the Minister of Labour, as soon as this bill becomes law, to communicate with every member of this house, regardless of political affiliations, and ask him for just such information as that to which the hon. gentleman has directed attention, and the Minister of Labour is making the necessary effort in that direction. It was thought very undesirable to send out and ask for information of that kind before this bill was submitted to the house; for it would have involved such claims as might have made it almost impossible for the government to contemplate the position with any degree of equanimity.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There will be some representations coming afterwards.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that they will all come afterwards—I hope my hon. friend did not misunderstand me. The letter has not been sent, and will not be sent, to anyone until after this measure becomes law.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is postponing the trouble.

Mr. BENNETT: I will admit that, but it is better to postpone it than to have it thrown upon one in the form in which it would have been had those communications been sent before. I think it only fair to state that to the house now, it being well along on Saturday afternoon. Otherwise it might well have been that the progress of the measure would have been entirely impeded, instead of only partially, by the recital of claims of the various constituencies for consideration.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is one of the most candid ministerial statements that I have heard.

Mr. NEILL: The information just furnished by the Prime Minister has forestalled much of the information I was going to ask for. I have no intention of putting forward the claims of my own particular district at this moment. Paragraph (a) provides for the construction of public works, and I take it that it is the intention of the government to proceed with such. I rather inferred from the remarks of the Prime Minister that he intended under this bill to supplement what should have been in the estimates for public works but was not. That is to his own advantage as Finance minister, for this reason: Any money that comes out of the loans for relief will, of course, be treated in a different category from the ordinary public works expenditures as provided for in the estimates, which have to come out of revenue, and if the Finance minister does necessary public works out of relief money he will be just that much ahead in balancing his budget. This same section was in the act last year, and so far as British Columbia was concerned nothing, so far as I know, was done under it for the reason, I think, that the money was allocated to the provinces on a basis of each party paying so much. There was less reason for federal work last year in any case, because the public works estimates for the year had been ordinarily sufficient, but this year, owing to the need for economy, the public works estimates, as we all know, some of us to our cost, have been very severely cut down. I think this affords a very appropriate means of supplementing them. There is certain work which will have to be done, and to postpone it is in many cases a pure waste of money because it will cost much more to replace those works in a year or two than it would cost to do the work now. I think I gathered enough from the Prime Minister's remarks to reassure myself in that respect.

The other point on which I should like a little more information is with reference to paragraph (c) which provides for assisting the provinces, cities, towns and municipalities, by loaning them moneys or guaranteeing repayment of moneys. In many cases we have got far beyond that point. Even if the Dominion or provinces were willing to lend money to the smaller municipalities, we cannot take it because the law forbids us to borrow more than a certain proportion, and we have already borrowed that proportion. Even if the government were to come in as a second mortgagee, it would only make our position worse. Paragraph (c) goes on to say "or in such other manner as may be deemed necessary or advisable." But that is somewhat vague. I notice that in last year's bill it said that they would make straight grants. They do not use the word "grants" in this bill. It says that the government may assist the provinces and municipalities "by loaning moneys thereto or guaranteeing repayment of moneys thereby." Also last year it was laid down in the regulations, if not in the act, that the cost would be allotted in certain proportions, 25 per cent by the province, 25 per cent by the Dominion, and 50 per cent by the municipality. We are not told anything about that in this bill. What I want is an assurance that despite the particularity of this language, which would appear to confine it only to loaning moneys to municipalities or guaranteeing repayment of moneys thereby, there will still be just the same opportunity to assist the municipalities, and possibly the provinces, by grants to the extent they require, without requiring repayment.

Mr. BENNETT: As I explained, I received a telegram the day after the bill was introduced on behalf of a large number of settlers in Saskatchewan who said that they did not wish to take money unless they gave a promise to repay it. So far as the federal government making direct grants to municipalities is concerned, I can only say to the hon. gentleman that the matter has not seriously engaged our attention; the relations between the provinces and the Dominion would be a very serious matter if they were directed along that line.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: But every representation that has been made will receive serious consideration.

Mr. NEILL: The minister claims that we must not deal with the municipalities, we must deal with the provinces; but last year the dominion government, quite properly perhaps, imposed a stipulation that the municipality should put up fifty per cent, which was rather a harsh condition. In that way the Dominion was dealing directly with the municipality. Therefore, suppose a municipality went to the province and said, "We cannot pay this," the province might reply, "We cannot help you because the Dominion insisted that you should put up fifty per cent."

Mr. REID: Has the Prime Minister considered the question of registration? I am prompted to ask owing to the fact that last winter hundreds of people flocked illegally into British Columbia.

Mr. HEAPS: What do you mean by "illegally"?

Mr. REID: Through the highways and byways.

Mr. HEAPS: That is not illegal.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of the registration of all those who may be out of work, especially in the province of British Columbia, has been taken up with the local government. It has been regarded as being the duty of the provincial, the city and the the town authorities to secure that information.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am beginning to be afraid that by keeping silent one's attitude towards this matter will be misconstrued.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the idea.

Mr. STEVENS: Are you beginning to worry?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not changed my mind towards this bill in any single particular. When it was introduced I said that the governor in council was usurping the powers of parliament, and I still think so. The business of the government is to carry out the behests of parliament—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —and this is a direct reversal of that particular power which the government are asking for at the present time. But there may be some doubt about the fixation of amounts where moneys are to be spent through the agency of the provinces, and I take it from what the Prime Minister has said that that method will be pursued. I can scarcely understand how any other method could be pursued, because to reach the municipalities the federal government must go through the provincial government. In such a case I can well understand it would be difficult to estimate the amounts required. But in subsection (a) the government are asking for authority to construct federal public buildings, railways, canals and highways. Highways of course, are still under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, and I assume that if there is assistance for highway construction the work will be done through the medium of the provincial governments. But I think the government might very well have made some effort to present to parliament an estimate of the amount that they wish to spend by designating where buildings would be put up, and the type of buildings, and so with respect to canals or other public works that they are going to undertake. Surely some estimate could have been made of the cost of such federal works so that parliament could have granted a definite sum for the purpose. As I said before, the government are going to pass this bill by the sheer strength of their majority. I have no hesitancy in saying that so far as I am aware they will do their very best to spend money economically and spend as little of it as seems to be necessary. But on the other hand nothing has been said so far to convince me that the government is pursuing the proper policy in asking for a blank cheque, for this is nothing more than a request to be granted authority to borrow money and spend it where they like, directly in opposition to anything that we on this side of the house may say with respect to the matter. But let it be known that so far as we are concerned, we make our protest in the strongest kind of language against this usurpation of power on the part of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to make one suggestion to my right hon. friend, which I hope he will receive in good part, and which I believe would be helpful in the administration of this act. I am sure that of the amounts paid out it will be desired that as much money as possible shall go to the persons who actually perform labour as a means of obtaining relief. I gather that many municipalities may not be in a position to make any proportionate arrangement such as was made last year. Might I suggest that the minister in charge of the administration of the act keep in mind the desirability if possible, of inserting in all contracts with municipalities or provinces, certainly in most of them, a clause which would oblige those communities or organizations which may be receiving any federal money for relief purposes to see that the whole, or nearly as much of the whole as possible is spent out only in payment to labour. Let me give but one illustration which will throw light on what I mean. I imagine the building of highways will be one feature of the work to be carried on. I suggest that before any municipality or province be entitled to receive federal moneys under this act it be obliged to incur all the costs of administration, of superintendence, of equipment, supplies, materials and the like in connection with the particular service being performed. This would be a real check on wastefulness and would ensure the money paid out under the provisions of this act going direct into the hands of those who do the actual work. I have given a little thought and study to this question of unemployment relief, and I know that the method that I have suggested has been adopted in other countries with most satisfactory results. This method of cooperation might well be carried to the point where farmers and others who have horses or vehicles or tools, and who reside in the community in which most of the construction is being carried on, might be asked to contribute towards the work by supplying what they could in this way, the dominion's contribution being limited to moneys going to pay for the actual labour perfomed.

Mr. BENNETT: This affords me an opportunity to say what I should like to say now. My right hon. friend and I had a discussion the other evening about these matters, and I availed myself of the opportunity to secure from him a record of his own experience when he was administering considerable funds in connection with a rather serious condition that prevailed in Colorado. I am grateful to him for the information which he gave me, and which this afternoon he has mentioned without indicating his part in connection with it. I think there should be in every constituency a local committee of citizens to see to it that no one suffers, for if the people themselves do not have some sympathetic consideration towards one another to warrant that action, it is hardly fair to expect that governments shall carry the whole of that particular kind of load.

Mr. NEILL: Would the committee act in an advisory capacity?

Mr. BENNETT: That would be its own business.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to draw the attention of my right hon. friend to one point in connection with subsection (c). As to subsection (a), which has to do with the construction of public works, I do not intend to elaborate on what I said in regard to a similar clause last year, that if the Minister of Public Works were making an appropriation of $2,000, ordinarily he would have to give the house full details. This, of course, is a direct departure from that rule, but I do not suppose any protest will have any effect. I want to refer particularly to clause (c), however, having to do with assistance to provinces, cities, towns, municipalities and other bodies. In many places in the dried out areas one of their greatest difficulties is that for two or three years they have not had crops and have consequently been unable to pay their taxes, which have accumulated on the property. In many cases the property is liable to pass out of the ownership of those who have built, broken, fenced and otherwise developed it and worked upon it. I was wondering what my right hon. friend had in mind with regard to assisting municipalities at least to postpone the payment of taxes so as to not have people in that position deprived of their homes because of their inability to pay.

Mr. BENNETT: No one knows better than my hon. and learned friend that only the provinces can deal with moratoriums and with the question of relief from the payment of taxes. As to what action may be taken by municipalities where taxes have not been paid and where the property of taxpayers is imperilled, that cannot be antecedently stated with any degree of satisfaction. I can only assume that the provinces will put that point forward rather strongly. I know in some cases I have already suggested to the provinces that they should consider what action they are going to take to protect those who may lose their homes through non-payment of taxes.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. COOTE: There is one question I should like to ask the Prime Minister on this section. One of the very worst features of the situation, at least in western Canada, is in connection with the debts of many people, and particularly of farmers, some of which carry 10 per cent interest. Under this act has the Dominion government power to see that a rate of interest not in excess of say 5 per cent should be charged in any case? I wonder whether under section 2 the government would not have the power to take such action.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Macleod brought this matter to my attention some time ago. I told him I would look into it, since which time I have been able to do so although it may be that the opinion I express will be subject to revision. The Dominion parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over interest rates; the evidence of that will be found in the Interest Act. But where contracts have been made the province has supreme and exclusive control, and the jurisdiction of this parliament is gone. That is, we may legislate as to the maximum rate of interest, as we have done, but where a contract has been made the provincial authorities, and they only, may deal with the situation.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to remind the Prime Minister that although the federal government decided, under the Bank Act, what the limitation of interest should be, at the same time the government does not restrict people from charging more than is supposed to be the limit.

Mr. STEVENS: Under individual contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the difficulty about the contract.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Orders and regulations.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I desire to move the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "as" in the second line be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"may be demed necessary or desirable for relief of distress, providing employment and within the competence of parliament in maintaining peace, order and good government throughout Canada."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like to suggest to the Prime Minister that when the regulations are being drafted under this bill he consider such cases as I am going to describe. The drought area extends considerably farther north than it did during the previous two years. There are a few men with a little reserve left in the bank or elsewhere who, unless they can get fodder, we will say, through the means which will be employed in the granting of relief, will be obliged to buy in small lots and pay regular freight rates. If it would be possible for them to get carload rates, which will probably be the way in which relief will be dispensed, it would mean a great deal to them. Will these men be able to do that, or will they be obliged to buy on their own, at less than carload rates and under the regular freight rate? I think that is worth considering in drafting the regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt that what my hon. friend says requires the closest consideration but primarily it must be a provincial matter. All I can say is that those who are charged with the responsibility under this act will cooperate to the fullest possible extent to ensure the best results possible.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Enforcement of orders and regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just one word in regard to this section. I can scarcely hope the government will change its wording, but it is a little rough on those who may be affected adversely by some error on the part of the administration. As I read it, the government have power to make any orders and regulations they please and to vary, extend or revoke those orders as they see fit. But if in the process of making, revoking or extending the orders they make mistakes there shall be no redress on the part of those who may suffer therefrom. Under this section the government is free to do what it likes; it can make as many mistakes as it pleases but there is no redress for those who may be adversely affected as a consequence.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the reason for that provision?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a usual provision in statutes of this kind; to leave it otherwise is an invitation to claim against the crown under every possible circumstance. It has not been unusual for the crown to take cognizance of situations such as those mentioned by the right hon. gentleman. This gives no ground for legal action, while still leaving the subject the right to complain, and in the estimates from year to year usually there will be found some recognition of that fact. That is all that is meant.

I may as well make this further statement at once. It was suggested that the courts might be wiped out by regulations made under this statute. No such thought was in the mind of the government, and that was indicated by the amendment to the previous section. It must be remembered that the establishment of the courts is in the hands of the provincial legislatures, and no power here is conveyed to destroy or wipe out those courts or to establish new ones.

Mr. RALSTON: That statement had not reference to the establishment of courts but to the reference of questions to any authority. It was not the wiping out of any courts; it was only the utilizing of various authorities for the determination of offences under these regulations. My hon. friend the former Minister of the Interior asked why this provision was necessary, and I thought that was the question to which my right hon. friend was directing his answer. That is what we should like to know. Why is it necessary to provide for a reference of offences under these regulations for trial, not to judicial authorities but to some other officers or authorities as are mentioned here?

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid my hon. friend has not exercised his usual care in reading this section. The words are:

> All orders and regulations of the governor in council shall have the force of law and shall be enforced in such manner and by such court officers and authorities as the governor in council may prescribe . . . .

These are the existing officers and authorities. This does not establish new ones. Such officers and authorities as the governnor in council may prescribe are the existing officers and authorities. The word "authorities" is used because some of those who are responsible for the discharge of obligations and duties before the courts might not properly be called officers but authorities. It is the court officers and authorities such as may be prescribed. They are not a creation of this government except in the sense that the Supreme Court of Canada, the exchequer court and other federal courts—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Any other court that parliament might establish.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but apart from that this does not establish a court. This could not in any sense be said to establish a court. These words are used in the usual sense.

Mr. RALSTON: It does not sound as if it were referable to judicial officers. My right hon. friend has referred to other statutes of this kind. I took occasion to look at the War Measures Act, and there is no such provision there.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the War Measures Act.

Mr. RALSTON: No, it is a good deal broader. But on this point—the matter of regulations—the provisions of the War Measures Act ought to be sufficient. My right hon. friend suggests that "officers and authorities" means "judicial officers"; that is his interpretation.

Mr. BENNETT: Not "judicial officers." The provincial authorities establish courts and appoint the officers, and this authorizes "such court officers and authorities" to be named for the purpose of carrying the regulations into effect.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit not, though perhaps I am wrong. I thought that the court officers and authorities were those who might try the offences under the regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. RALSTON: That seemed to be the reading of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: Look at it and you will see it is not that.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what court officers and authorities are for if not for that purpose. I thought they were the ones to whom the offences might be referred.

Mr. BENNETT: In his political zeal—

Mr. RALSTON: No political zeal.

Mr. BENNETT: —I am sure my hon. friend wishes to be fair. All orders and regulations of the governor in council, the section declares, shall have the force of law and shall be enforced in such manner and by such court officers and authorities, and so on. That does not in any sense take away the jurisdiction of the courts. But a constable, a sheriff, a bailiff, or other authorized court officer, may be directed to do these things.

Mr. RALSTON: He does not enforce the regulations; that is my point.

Mr. BENNETT: The sheriff?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; the whole theory is that these are the officers who do enforce the regulations. Certainly the courts do not enforce them, but the officers of the law.

Mr. RALSTON: That is what I am getting at.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. BENNETT: And these men are the officers of the courts. We do not create the courts.

Mr. RALSTON: I am perfectly satisfied to have the court carry out the execution. But we want to see that trials do not take place before court officers or other authorities other than those properly constituted for the purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: No such intention was in the mind of anyone connected with the measure.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not see any necessity for having in this bill any provision that a person suffering monetary loss by reason of a change in the regulations, with which he may not be kept informed, shall have recourse against the government. He has no recourse anyway, unless the government is willing to grant it. These regulations are bound to be changed. Undoubtedly this is a new venture in many respects, and regulations that would seem to be workable under ordinary conditions will be found to be not adapted to the circumstances that may arise. The regulations may be changed at any session of the governor in council. A man in perfect good faith enters into some business arrangement under a regulation, and he wakes up some morning to find that the regulation is changed; and the statute provides that he has no recourse, except by the ordinary method of bringing the matter to the attention of the government and obtaining redress through government channels or through reference to the exchequer court or some other body. I do not see any necessity for including in the statute an obnoxious reference of this kind.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Fines and penalties.

Mr. YOUNG: I believe the penalties mentioned are intended for those who deliberately set out to disturb the peace. As this section reads, however, these penalties might apply to anyone who did not carry out the regulations in regard to the administration of relief. Let me illustrate. Last year we passed a relief measure and voted so much money to be spent by the municipalities in cooperation with the provinces. Regulations were drawn up by the provinces. In a certain municipality the council looked over the regulations and said, "We cannot carry these out. If we do there might arise a situation in which we should be personally responsible for the expenditure." And they refused to act until they had positive assurance that this would not be the case. With a section like this in force, an arrogant official could throw a man into gaol. I do not think that is the intention of the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have no idea what orders and regulations are contemplated.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. gentleman that we are on section 6, fines and penalties.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is what I am discussing. It seems to me that these penalties are extremely severe, and we have not been given much idea what the orders and regulations are. If this has reference merely to the orders and regulations with regard to the relief measures, these are very severe penalties.

Mr. BENNETT: From the fact that a penalty seems severe, it does not necessarily follow that it will be the penalty exacted. The penalty is not to exceed a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for a term of more than three years. I have in mind—well, I must not mention cases that have been considered in this house; I will forget the one I had in mind. I pointed out, however, that the federal power, in dealing with some of these bodies, must entrust the exercise of authority to those whom we name, and if they play us false we want to be able to deal with them summarily. Suppose there were embezzlement or fraud. There was brought to my attention the case of one charged with responsibility who had derived great benefit while those who should have received assistance were defrauded and deceived. I think there should be a power to deal with such persons promptly, effectively and severely.

Mr. NEILL: I must protest against this clause. It provides that one justice of the peace, a man very often practically ignorant of law, may sentence a man to a fine of $1,000 and to imprisonment for three years. Let us suppose that there are two or three hundred men in a logging camp. A few simple rules are provided for the convenience of the men. One is that they must go to bed at a certain hour, there must be no talking after a certain time, they must not smoke in the bush during warm weather, and so on. In some camps the men are fined a small sum when they break the rules, or warning is given and then they are discharged if another infraction oocurs. The minister has hinted that it may be necessary to put men into a camp. Those men will be in charge of one man. The camp will probably be located in some remote place and there will have to be a justice of the peace on the premises so to speak. That man will be nominated by the head of the camp and will be under his influence. A man may break one of the simple rules of the camp, or other rules may be made, say in connection with seditious talk. A man may say, "This is a poor dump," or "I do not think much of the blank, blank government." This justice of the peace incited by his superior officer may take advantage of this section and give the man a very heavy sentence.

Mr. CAHAN: That could not be done under this section.

Mr. NEILL: I am talking about section 6.

Mr. CAHAN: What the hon. member is saying has no real reference to section 6. This section reads:

> The governor in council may prescribe penalties,—

A limitation is being placed upon the penalties which the governor in council may prescribe.

Mr. NEILL: I will read the section. It reads:

> The governor in council may prescribe penalties that may be imposed for violation of the orders and regulations made under the authority of this act, but no such penalty shall exceed a fine of one thousand dollars or imprisonment for a term of more than three years or both fine and imprisonment, and they also prescribe whether such penalty shall be imposed upon summary conviction or upon indictment.

I think that covers the case. If it was to be by indictment only it would not matter so much. The minister says that it does not necessarily mean that a man will be fined a thousand dollars, but I know of justices of the peace who would look at that section and say, "By jove, I will have to fine this man one thousand dollars."

Mr. BENNETT: The discretion is not there. The governor in council will assume the responsibility of fixing what the penalty shall be.

Mr. NEILL: Is a new criminal code to be created?

Mr. BENNETT: It is to prevent that very thing; this is to be something which will last only during the lifetime of the bill. This is to cover offences which may be incidental to the administration of great sums of money.

Mr. NEILL: The minister told the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that the courts would be invoked.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely, but this is not a criminal code.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member goes astray in thinking that the penalties are fixed by this section. This is simply a limitation upon the powers of the governor in council to fix the penalty, and unless the governor in council goes crazy it is not going to fix a penalty of one thousand dollars or three years in prison for a man going to bed at half-past ten o'clock when he should have gone at ten o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: Power is given to do anything.

Mr. CAHAN: After the penalties are fixed for particular offences then they may be enforced. In the distribution of large sums of money through various employees more extensive opportunity will be created for fraud than exists under ordinary circumstances. The governor in council should be allowed considerable discretion in fixing the penalties to be imposed for such frauds.

Mr. NEILL: A man who embezzles public money can be proceeded against under the criminal code.

Mr. BENNETT: This does not take that away, this is to provide merely for the special circumstances mentioned in the bill. The attorneys general, the criminal code and the machinery of the criminal law will be still there. I thought I made it clear some time ago that the fixing of these offences to be dealt with by regulation and the power of fixing the penalty were asked for in order to ensure some degree of, shall I say happiness among those who have to do with these matters rather than the opposite. Instead of making the burden greater we have endeavoured to make the administration simpler.

Mr. BOURASSA: No prosecution could be taken other than through the ordinary provincial authorities.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. RALSTON: By way of summary conviction.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the case in our courts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that a regulation of this kind could be used to intimidate the men. If this were merely to provide for the punishment of fraud by officials, I would not have any objection, but this would apply to men who are seeking relief or who are engaged on government works. Although the penalty in many cases may not be as severe as the maximum, that penalty could be used for purposes of intimidation. It seems to me that we are setting up a temporary criminal code. We are changing to the status of crimes what might be regarded as ordinary misdemeanors or infractions of certain regulations. I do not think an infraction of a regulation or an ordinary misdemeanor should be put in the same category as a crime, even although that crime will exist only until March 1, 1932. It is a serious thing thus to adopt a new criminal code, even if it is only a temporary adoption.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): This is one section of the bill which I think I can support. Evidently the government is willing to trust parliament to instruct them as to how far they can go with penalties. The other sections are unlimited but in this case the government is being restrained to one thousand dollars or three years in prison.

Mr. NEILL: This act expires in March 1932: Supposing a man is sentenced under it to three year's imprisonment, would that imprisonment cease on March 1, 1932?

Mr. BENNETT: Surely it is unnecessary to answer that.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Duration of act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend promised that he would delete the word "thirty" in this section, to make it read:

This act shall expire on the first day of March, 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite satisfied to do that.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I will move that the word "thirty" be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have an amendment to offer in the form of a section to be added. I have endeavoured to draft my amendment in such a way as to anticipate any difficulty which may arise in connection with its acceptance. In the measure for relief which was passed at the special session there was a clause which required that a report containing a full and correct statement of the moneys expended under the act should be laid before parliament within fifteen days after the opening of the next session. The bill as now amended will expire on the first day of March. It has been promised that the session of parliament will open not later than the fifteenth of February or thereabouts. It may take a little time after the act has expired before a report can be made. Instead therefore of fixing the time within which a report should be made relative to the opening of the session, I am proposing to fix it relative to the date of the expiration of the act. I desire to move that the bill be amended by adding the following section as section 8 thereof:

A report shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after the expiration of the act—

Not after the opening of parliament.

—containing a full and correct statement of the moneys expended under this act and the purposes to which they have been applied, together with copies of all orders and regulations of the governor in council made under the provisions thereof.

I think that is a reasonable request. Of course when the house assembles a return could be moved for all these particulars and documents, but I believe the insertion of this clause in the act will help to effect a certain control over these matters.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman has given the answer, that is that a motion for a return would always be in order. But in view of what he has said, I shall be glad to accept the amendment if he will make it section 7 and call the present section 7, section 8.

Mr. TURNBULL: What would happen if parliament were not in session?

Mr. BENNETT: It will have to be. The right hon. gentleman is taking it for granted that parliament will be in session.

Mr. TURNBULL: It should read "within fifteen days after the opening of parliament".

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask whether those orders and regulations cannot be published in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. BENNETT: I was hoping the hon. gentleman would not raise that point, because it is obvious, if we have to do some of the matters of detail which I hope we shall not have to do and the provinces will do, this will cause a great deal of unnecessary work, and as this return asks to have them all brought down, I thought that might cover it. I had anticipated the question would be asked. I do not think any purpose will be served, but if it is desired we can provide for publication. There will be a number of very small matters that it seems to me will have to be dealt with if we are not able to escape what I conceive to be the constitutional obligations of others and have to accept them ourselves.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. BOURASSA: I move in amendment to the preamble:

That in the sixth and seventh lines the words "in the national interest" be struck out and be replaced by the following:
"necessary for the maintenance of peace, order and good government of Canada"—

This would make it read:

And whereas it is necessary for the maintenance of peace, order and good government of Canada that parliament should support—

And so on. Then strike out in the twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth lines the words:

And the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada.

In other words, as I explained this morning, this places the whole thing on the basis of legislation for the maintenance of peace, order and good government of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: This morning when the hon. member for Labelle made the observations he did, I followed without difficulty his line of argument. But to enable us to exercise these powers of relief there must be somewhere a declaration of the national character of the calamity or of the difficulties that have to be overcome, and in order to make it easier than it would otherwise be, we have adopted the language of the British North America Act "peace, order and good government." In that we have predicated our constitutional right within limitations, as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth mentioned last evening, to undertake this work. I think it must be common ground to every member, whether he be a lawyer or a layman, that this is not any part of the work of the Dominion parliament. That is the real basis of this difficulty and in order to found jurisdiction there must be somewhere a declaration. A declaration about war is, of course, a national matter. If you mention the word "calamity", it might be that it was referable to one section of the country—I am talking about relief now—but when we use the words of the constitution, "peace, order and good government", as the former Minister of Justice pointed out, the case of Russell and the Queen would form some little foundation for the exercise of that power.

although recent decisions have cast some doubt upon that case. I think if the hon. member for Labelle will look at the preamble again he will find that the sequence in which he puts it makes it difficult to say it is such a declaration as founds a constitutional power with respect to relief. During recess I looked at it, and I do not think the use of the words in the sequence in which he desires to employ them would enable us constitutionally, without question, to do this work. I asked the Secretary of State to look at it, and perhaps he will speak on the matter.

Mr. CAHAN: It is obvious the amendment of the hon. member for Labelle would strike out from this bill all authority which is now vested in the governor in council to take measures for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada. He has suggested striking out the words "in the national interest" and inserting in lieu thereof the words:

Necessary for the maintenance of peace, order and good government of Canada.

But when he strikes out at the end of the paragraph the words—

Maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada.

—by striking out those words from the position they occupy in the preamble, he takes away the authority which is now vested in the governor in council to make rules and orders for maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada. I think he is taking away from the bill far more than he is adding to it. He is adding no new constitutional provision, but he is depriving the governor in council of all authority to make orders for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada in connection with the carrying out of these relief measures.

Mr. BOURASSA: Surely the Secretary of State does not mean to say that outside of the new powers asked by the government in its legislation of seven months, the government has no authority to execute the existing laws for the maintenance of peace, order and good government. I want to meet the very object of the government, and the object under this language is to afford relief to sufferers and maintain peace, order and good government. I would leave to them unhampered all the powers that they enjoy at the present time either under the criminal code, the Militia Act or any other act. With great respect for the legal knowledge of the Secretary of State, I think he is giving an interpretation to my amendment which the words do not carry. I think I am meeting the views of the government as expressed by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid that the hon. member for Labelle has not quite appreciated the full force of his proposed amendment, because the declaration that it is in the national interest I think every lawyer within sound of my voice will regard as absolutely essential if we are going to give any relief at all.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have no objection to leaving that in. Suppose you put it "in the national interest and necessary."

Mr. BENNETT: The preamble, as the hon. gentleman knows, in the interpretation of a statute does not bear a decisive part, but I think the legal members of the house who sit opposite will agree that a declaration that it is in the national interest must be followed by something more if you are undertaking a constitutional obligation that rests upon the provinces. That is why that language is used. I do say that having regard to the doubts passed upon the decision to which reference has been made, it is not as powerful language as might be employed, but it at least serves the purpose. I would ask my hon. friend not to press the amendment under the circumstances because it deals only with the preamble and the preamble is only for the purpose of laying the foundation upon which to exercise a constitutional power which, under the British North America Act, as the hon. member for Labelle properly said this morning, rests with the provinces and not with the Dominion.

Amendment negatived.

On the title:

Mr. MOTHERWELL: After this bill becomes law I understand that the first act towards putting it into operation will be the writing of a letter by the Minister of Labour to each member of the House of Commons asking us our views as to how best this money can be spent in our respective constituencies—

Mr. BENNETT: Not quite that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the direction of unemployment relief. After that is done, what next? My understanding is that the administration will be part provincial and part federal, or a combination possibly of both. I just want to know what all this is about because when I go home I am sure that I shall be asked about it.

Mr. BENNETT: What I said this afternoon was that the Minister of Labour, the appropriate minister, would communicate with every member of the house as to what federal undertakings, as distinguished from others, they might be interested in their particular constituencies, but necessarily the province itself must be the body in the first instance with whom we communicate. Some of the provinces suggest that they do not require so much. I just wanted to make that clear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is clear, thank you.

Bill reported.

Mr. BENNETT moved the third reading of the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That the said bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instruction that they have power to amend it by adding in section 2 thereof the words, "not exceeding such amounts as may be appropriated by parliament."

I would support the proposed amendment by everything that has been said on this side of the house. While we are but a mere handful now, I offer this amendment as a protest up to the last sitting of this session against the enactment being made in the form in which the bill still stands.

Mr. BENNETT: I oppose the amendment by everything that has been said or may be said on this side of the house, and I oppose it with the last breath that I have in this last sitting of the session.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was negatived on the following division:

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

PROROGRATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, 31st July, 1931.

Sir,—

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable L. P. Duff, Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber August 1st at 11 o'clock p.m., for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable,
The Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

BEAUHARNOIS LIGHT, HEAT AND POWER COMPANY, LIMITED—RIGHT TO DIVERT WATER—WORKS FOR GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 143, respecting the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, and Bill No. 144, to declare certain works of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, to be for the general advantage of Canada—Mr. Bennett—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, as I said this morning when moving the second reading of these bills, the right of hon. members to discuss every detail of the measures was reserved. At this stage I cannot usefully add anything to what I have already said as to the principle of the two measures in question. One bill adopts the usual language in such cases in declaring that certain works and undertakings are for the general advantage of Canada, as far as what may be described as the canal part is concerned. The other bill deals with the internal management and control of the enterprise, and in order that no question may arise as to the grant of water which it has obtained by lease from the province of Quebec being recognized by this parliament in view of what has transpired, provision is made for that matter in the measure.

My hon. friend and colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) has given much time and attention to matters of this kind, and I have asked him to deal with certain phases of the measure. When my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has expressed his views we shall be glad to endeavour to answer any questions which may be asked in order that not only the principle of the measure may be considered but that any questions which may arise out of their consideration may be answered and dealt with as we proceed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, there are two bills to consider, and I think my right hon. friend has taken the right course in discussing them together, because the questions that may be raised in connection with each bill are identical and it will avoid repetition to have those questions discussed immediately.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That was understood.

Mr. BENNETT: That was understood during the discussion this afternoon.

Mr. LAPOINTE: One of the bills declares that the canal to be constructed, or being constructed by Beauharnois is a work for the general advantage of Canada. Contained in the same bill is a very important provision reserving the rights of Quebec, if any. Of course I would take rather strong exception to those two words, "if any."

Mr. CAHAN: I intend to move an amendment to that section.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That will facilitate matters considerably.

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend desires I will give him the form of the amendment now. It has to do with Bill No. 144. In drafting bills sometimes one puts a position much more emphatically than is necessary, and I have discussed Bill No. 144 with Mr. Geoffrion, K.C., who has gone over it with me clause by clause. Finally Mr. Geoffrion wrote me this note:

Dear Mr. Cahan:

I am prepared to advise the Quebec government that this bill is acceptable.

I would prefer "any right" to "rights if any." This is less of a challenge.

As we have no desire whatever to challenge the rights of the province of Quebec, such as they are or as they may hereafter be determined to be, I have prepared an amendment which will strike out the words "rights if any" and insert in lieu thereof the words "any right." That section of the bill will then read:

Nothing in this act contained shall be deemed to affect any right that may be vested in the province of Quebec over or in respect of the use of the waters of the river St. Lawrence for the development of hydro-electric power.

In due course I intend to move that amendment. In order that we may understand the exact position I may tell my hon. friend that in the same spirit I propose to suggest two other amendments to Bill No. 143. Section 2 of that bill now reads:

The Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, its successors or assigns, is hereby granted the right to divert . . . .

Then it goes on to say how many cubic feet of water may be diverted. By some of those who have discussed the bill with me, including Mr. Geoffrion, that was taken as an assumption on the part of parliament that it alone could grant the right to divert water from lake St. Francis, and therefore I propose to amend that section by inserting the words:

. . . . in so far as it may be within the competence of parliament. . . .

That will come after the word "assigns," so that the section will read:

The Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, its successors or assigns, in so far as it may be within the competence of parliament, is hereby granted . . . .

Mr. LAPOINTE: This also is a great improvement.

Mr. CAHAN: Then it was suggested to me that section 3 of the same bill should be changed. That section now reads:

No further or additional diversion of water of the river St. Lawrence shall be made by said company except with the express approval of parliament.

As members of the federal parliament, and as members of the federal government we have certain opinions as to what may be the rights of parliament in the premises, but by that section we do not wish to declare that the grant made by the legislature of the province of Quebec has no validity. That is a question to be determined by the courts and not by a committee of the house or by members of this house. Therefore I propose to insert, in lieu of the present section 3, the following:

3. The governor in council shall not consent to any further or additional diversion by said company of water of the river St. Lawrence except with the express approval of parliament.

When these clauses are reached I shall move these amendments on behalf of the government.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am pleased indeed at the changes suggested by my hon. friend; they will meet, to a large extent, some of the objections I had to the phraseology of both bills. It is well, if we are to discuss this matter with some intelligence, to define or try to define the respective rights of the Dominion and of the provinces. Some members on this side have asked me to do so and I shall try to be brief. At confederation the provinces that then existed had all these rights and they agreed to surrender some of them to a central, Dominion parliament, creating a new government in Canada. They surrendered some of their powers, both legislative and by way of assets, revenues and property, reserving to themselves other powers and properties. So far as the legislative power is concerned, the powers of the Dominion and of the provinces are contained in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. In that sphere of legislative jurisdiction the Dominion was granted exclusive power of legislation on various subjects; and on all subjects, except those specially reserved to the provinces, the residue of power, so far as legislative jurisdiction is concerned, goes to the Dominion. Not so with regard to assets, revenues and properties. That part of the act is contained in the sections from 102 to 126. There, what was to be transferred to the Dominion parliament is specified. As regards public property, it is stated in section 108 that:

The public works and property of each province, enumerated in the third schedule to this act, shall be the property of Canada.

The third schedule to the act enumerates the property then belonging to the provinces, which was transferred to the Dominion authorities. For instance, there are the canals then existing, with lands and water connected therewith; and it has been decided that this means the water powers then existing connected with the canal. River and lake improvements were transferred to the Dominion, but not the rivers and the lakes. Improvements have been made on the rivers and lakes, and as the Prime Minister has said—I do not know whether it was yesterday or to-day—in the case of the harbour commission of Montreal a few years ago, it was absolutely decided and settled that "harbour improvements" there means the harbour as it existed then, and that neither the harbour authorities of Montreal nor the government of Canada could, without compensation and without proper legislation, take more of the bed of the St. Lawrence river for the purpose of harbour improvements because the bed of the river belonged to the province. There is therefore a difference as between the legislative jurisdiction and the proprietary rights, and an essential difference.

So far as legislative jurisdiction is concerned, what is not mentioned goes to the Dominion. The Dominion has the residue; it has jurisdiction with respect to the subjects not specifically mentioned in either section 91 or section 92. Not so when it concerns property. When it concerns property rights, the properties transferred to the Dominion are specially mentioned and described in the British North America Act, and the provinces retain their rights to property in everything else. So that if you cannot show that certain property has been transferred to the Dominion by the British North America Act, that property is vested in the provinces. For instance, the water powers connected with the canals were transferred to the Dominion and are specially enumerated; but the other water powers are not. The other water powers remain vested in the provinces.

Reference has been made to a decision of the supreme court of a year or two ago. What the Dominion claimed mainly in that reference was that where the works producing the power owe their existence to the exercise of legislative jurisdiction vested in the Dominion, the Dominion has the right, claimed there before the supreme court, to dispose of the power so created by the works made in virtue of the legislative jurisdiction of the Dominion. But the Dominion has never claimed, either in that reference or elsewhere, that when a province desires the development of water powers not the property of the Dominion, and such development does not conflict with Dominion legislation or policy, the approval of the works which the province desires to undertake can be refused under the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

It might be well to show what was really decided by the court, because, if there was no formal answer to many of the questions that were referred to the court, principles were laid down which certainly serve as a guide to what should be the policy of the government of the Dominion and of the provincial governments. May I refer to the notes of Mr. Justice Duff, who delivered the judgment of the court. I shall do so briefly, but I think it is important in order that members of the committee may know exactly what the situation is. At page 212 of the Canada Supreme Court Reports of 1929, Mr. Justice Duff says:

> The legislative authority in respect to "Fisheries," conferred upon the Dominion parliament by section 91, does not, it was held,—

He was referring to the fishery cases decided by the privy council. The judgment continues:

> —involve the power to deal with the property of a province as if the administration of that property had been entrusted by the British North America Act, to the control of the Dominion parliament; for, as Lord Herschell, who delivered the judgment of the board, said, such a ruling would enable the Dominion to "transfer to itself property which had by the British North America Act been left to the provinces, and not vested in it."
> The effect of the decisions seems to be, that neither the Dominion nor a province can take possession of a source of revenue which has been assigned to the other, and as a source of revenue, appropriate it to itself, nor, as owner, transfer it to another.

And on page 218:

> But although the Dominion may, by legislation enacted in exercise of its exclusive powers relating to railways and canals, authorize the construction through the property of a province of a railway or canal, to which its jurisdiction extends, this does not involve the right to appropriate the whole beneficial interest of the site of the work (including the minerals, for example), for the purpose of making it available as an asset or source of revenue for the benefit of the Dominion or of the Dominion's grantees, where that site is vested in His Majesty and is, by the British North America Act, subject to the administration and control of the provincial legislature.
> Apart from the fact that such legislation would not be legislation exclusively competent to the Dominion, it would transcend the ambit of Dominion authority touching railways or canals, which was not intended to enable the Dominion to take possession of sources of revenue assigned to the provinces, and by assuming the administration of them, to appropriate to itself a field of jurisdiction belonging exclusively to the provinces. Similar considerations apply to the exploitation and disposition of water-powers appropriated by the Dominion in exercise of its legislative authority in relation to canals. Assuming such an appropriation by the Dominion to be competent without payment of compensation, the Dominion could not constitutionally assume the administration or control of water-powers so acquired for purposes not connected with the canal.
> We must, as best we can, reconcile the control by the provinces of their own assets as assets, with the exercise by the Dominion of its exclusive powers for the purposes which those powers were intended to subserve. This can only be accomplished by recognizing that the proprietary rights of the provinces may be prejudicially affected, even to the point of rendering them economically valueless, through the exercise by the Dominion of its exclusive and plenary powers of legislation under the enumerated heads of section 91. On the other hand, in giving effect to the provisions of the British North America Act, we must rigorously adhere to the radical distinction between these two classes of enactment; legislation in execution of the Dominion's legislative powers under section 91, which may, in greater or less degree, according to the circumstances and the nature of the power, affect the proprietary rights of the provinces, and even exclude them from any effective control of their property; and, in contradistinction, legislation conceived with the purpose of intervening in the control and disposition of provincial assets, in a manner, which, under the enactments of that act touching the distribution of assets, revenues and liabilities, is exclusively competent to the provinces.

I should have liked to quote Lord Haldane on the fisheries case, but his ruling is to the same effect as that of Mr. Justice Duff's in the water powers reference, which I have just read.

I submit that the effect of this decision is that the water powers which do not belong to the Dominion, which did not come to it by the British North America Act, are assets of the provinces, and that the legislative control of the Dominion is limited to the requirements of navigation. The Dominion may possibly say that the whole flow of water is necessary for navigation; it does not seem that a situation would arise where the whole flow would be necessary, but the Dominion could claim that it was. However, the Dominion would be limited to the requirements of navigation, and in the use of the water for its purposes the Dominion could not take more than was necessary to achieve that purpose. It would not be just nor fair for the Dominion to take advantage of or to use the assets of the province for the purpose of paying for works which are necessary for Dominion requirements. Navigation on the St. Lawrence connot be paid for by the province of Quebec any more than by any other province, and the assets of the province of Quebec cannot be taken for the purposes of federal works any more than can the assets of Ontario or any other province. Water power is created by changing the contour of the land, whether it be the bed of the river, the beaches or the land adjacent to the river. Provincial property must be used to effect the change necessary to create the power, and I submit that this change can be made only with the consent of the owners of the bed of the river and of the land adjacent to the river. I do not believe the power to divert, diminish or change the flow belongs to the Dominion, the Dominion having only the right to see that navigation is not endangered by any such work. I admit that in order to promote or improve navigation provincial property may be used, but it must be used in such a way as not to affect provincial rights any more than is absolutely necessary for the purposes of the Dominion.

The St. Lawrence river is no different as far as property rights are concerned from any other navigable river. There seems to be an idea in the minds of many people that the St. Lawrence river must not be considered in the same light as other navigable rivers when matters of property right are concerned. The bed of the St. Lawrence river in the province of Quebec belongs to that province and the banks are the property either of the province or of the grantees of the province, as are the lands adjacent to the river. If Cedars rapids belong to the Dominion, so does Niagara, and if the water powers and the commercial assets which they represent belong to the Dominion, the hydro electric commission of Ontario should belong to the Dominion and not be the property of the citizens of Ontario. As to that I think everybody will agree with me. When this grant was made by the province of Quebec, as the province had the right to make it, an application came to the government of Canada for approval of the works under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. What had the government to do? The Minister of Public Works had to do two things: he had to ascertain as to the legal side, and also as to the engineering side of the undertaking. That is what was done.

Let me deal first with the legal side of it and the opinion that was given by the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. GORDON: Have I the hon. member's permission to ask a question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: I ask it now because the hon. member is dealing with the law in connection with navigable waters, because of his profound knowledge of the law in this regard, and purely as a matter of information. Would the hon. member tell the committee what his interpretation is of "navigable water" under section 4 and "navigable waters" under section 7 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Before answering my hon. friend I would have to look at the statute. I am speaking of navigable waters generally. I wonder whether my hon. friend challenges the assertion that the St. Lawrence is different from other navigable waters, or what is the purpose of his question? If he requires an answer I should be pleased to give it to him after looking up the matter.

Mr. GORDON: If the definition of navigable waters as used in the statute could be determined, from a legal standpoint, then the legal argument would become a progression, and we would probably be armed with my hon. friend's knowledge, which I know is profound.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry I cannot answer the question as put by my hon. friend. The Deputy Minister of Justice said in his opinion, in answer to the Deputy Minister of Public Works:

> In my opinion there is no power in the governor in council, under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, to authorize the diversion from lake St. Francis of 40,000 cubic feet of water per second or of any quantity of water for the purposes of the company's proposed development, except in so far as the diversion of such water is necessarily incidental to, or is the real object intended to be subserved by, the construction of works which are subject to the provisions of that act. The plans of the company's proposed development embrace the construction of certain regulating and compensating and other works in the St. Lawrence river and I think it would be within the power of the governor in council, under section 7 of the said act, to grant approval of the plans and proposed sites of these works.

Let me say a word about this question of diversion, because the question has been raised in the report of the committee. The opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice is not challenged by the committee. It is merely stated in the report that questions were raised as to that, and the chairman of the committee in his speech also said, without making any definite statement about the matter, that doubts had been expressed; in fact, my right hon. friend said that doubts had been expressed as to the right of the governor in council to permit that diversion of water from lake St. Francis. I believe—and I have never had any doubt about the matter, I may say in all humility—that the Dominion parliament really has nothing to do with the diversion of water under such circumstances. The Dominion, as I stated before, never claimed ownership of the St. Lawrence waters. It has claimed the right through proper legislation to appropriate them for federal purposes, but as long as such legislation does not exist, the province and only the province can allow a diversion of water. It owns the bed; it owns the banks; it owns the land through which the diversion must be made. The only power of the Dominion is to protect navigation, to see to it that all the requirements of navigation are met. The diversion itself was not a grant of the Dominion; it was a consequence of the works permitted in the river, subject to the condition that more than a specified maximum quantity of water cannot be diverted. My hon. friend shakes his head, but I believe I am right in that contention, and there are many others who have expressed their views in this matter since the question has come under discussion. It is true, no water can be diverted from a river without works in its bed or on its beaches, and any work that may interfere with navigation must receive the approval of the governor in council. Whether that diversion made as a result of those works should be in or from the river, is immaterial as far as the Dominion's control of navigation is concerned. The authority came from Quebec, but the order in council No. 422 provided for remedial and control works which were deemed to be important to safeguard navigation and imposed conditions for granting its approval of the works in the river, amongst those conditions being the manner in which the diversion should be carried out. Another condition was that the works should not involve a diversion of more than 40,000 cubic feet per second. But again I repeat that the diversion itself was granted by Quebec. That was the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice who was the natural and official legal adviser of the Department of Public Works in the matter. That opinion has been ratified and confirmed by all the counsel for the various financial institutions which have advanced money in connection with that undertaking—counsel for the banks, the trust companies and those representing the bondholders. I have here, and if it were necessary to give it I could do so, except that it would take up the time of the committee, the opinion of Mr. Tilley who, everybody will admit, is one of the most eminent counsel. I have also the opinion of Mr. St. Laurent, who has succeeded my right hon. friend as president of the Canadian Bar Association. Their opinions coincide entirely with that of the Deputy Minister of Justice in that respect. I am free to confess that because some people have seen fit to question publicly the legality of the order in council in that regard, and the committee, without pronouncing upon it, having stated that the question had been raised, it is a good thing on the part of the government to enact legislation which will make it sure that the rights exist.

Mr. BENNETT: There might be some difficulty such as the hon. gentleman has suggested were it not that section 12 of the act specifically provides, as the right hon. leader of the opposition mentioned the other evening, for parliament exercising the power that is being exercised.

Mr. LAPOINTE: For parliament, yes. I submit that perhaps this ratification ought to be broadened and enlarged. This legislation will cover the diversions authorized for the Beauharnois company, but if there are doubts —I do not think there are doubts myself; I think the power exercised was exercised properly—with regard to validity concerning the Beauharnois company what about all those other concerns which have built works and completed undertakings at other places in the St. Lawrence and elsewhere where the very same condition existed, where diversion of water has been made, authorized by the governor in council under the Navigable Waters Protection Act? It is stated in the evidence that there are twenty-five such works, and I was given a list of the value of the works of these various concerns, amounting to over $600,000,000. I do not think it was fair to raise those doubts because they might apply to some of these other companies as well as to Beauharnois. I say, Mr. Chairman, that it was done as it had always been done before. I know that the chairman of the committee stated during the taking of the evidence that it may have been wrong all the time. In the first place, I do not think it was wrong. In the second place, those precedents certainly had some authority in the matter.

Mr. GORDON: I am sorry to interrupt, but since what I said is in a manner challenged—

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. GORDON: —would the hon. member quote from either the British North America Act or the Navigable Waters Protection Act one single suggestion that grants or delegates to the governor in council the right to divert water from any stream, no matter what has been done in the past?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have been trying to tell my hon. friend that the diversion is only the consequence of the works which are authorized in the river. The diversion is the result of the works made in the river itself, which works are authorized by the governor in council.

Mr. GORDON: Works made on private property.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not at all.

Mr. GORDON: The canal is on private property.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: But not the works made in the river. No water can go through unless there are works made in the river, and it is the works that have been authorized. The diversion is merely the consequence, the result, as the Deputy Minister of Justice has said, as Mr. Tilley says, as Mr. St. Laurent says, and as I humbly say myself.

Mr. GORDON: Where is the authority for the diversion of the water?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The authority comes from Quebec, the owner of the bed of the river, the owner of the banks and the owner of the land from which only the diversion can be made. The only right of the Dominion is to control navigation.

Mr. GORDON: The owner of the bed of the new ditch is not in the right of the province of Quebec because the fee simple is in the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The grantee or the acquirer of the rights which were granted from the province of Quebec—

Mr. GORDON: In private ownership?

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will allow me, it will be much shorter if I am permitted to go ahead with my own argument. Take the order in council concerning Cedars Rapids, dated August 15, 1916. There also the approval was of works, not of diversion. The diversion is created as a result of the works. But the approval which is given is the approval of the works made in the river. The same thing happened at Niagara.

Mr. GORDON: Quite true, the same thing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am going to show that in a moment. My hon. friend had the opinion of the Justice department and he had the opinion of a board of engineers. I need not dwell upon that phase of the question. But this being done, there are many who believe that not only had the governor in council discretion to exercise approval of the works, but that it was his duty, if there was nothing in the way of obstacles to navigation, to approve of the works which were proposed as a result of the grant by the province of Quebec, which was the owner in that case. Let me quote the opinion of the late Mr. Eugene Lafleur, whose legal qualifications were so well known in Canada, when representing the province of Quebec before the supreme court in that reference. Although the question did not specifically present itself, Mr. Lafleur in the course of his argument, which can be found at page 1025 of the report of the argument, said:

What I want to put before your Lordships is this: When a province or one of its grantees presents a plan to the Dominion authorities here for approval, and that plan makes adequate provision for navigation, they are bound to give their assent to that plan. What I mean to say is that they cannot refuse on the ground that they want to develop that water-power themselves. Before they can refuse it has got to be a plan which is defective in that it does not make adequate provision for navigation. The moment it does, I say it is the duty of the government to approve of it. You may say to me: How are you going to force the government to do its duty in that regard? I am not concerned with that because we assume, as we have a right to assume, that the government is asking this court for direction as to what it should do under like circumstances, and when your Lordships say there is no possible interference with navigation, then the Dominion has no reasonable excuse for not approving the plans submitted. If we provide adequately, then they are satisfied. We take for granted, as we must, that the Dominion is going to act constitutionally, when it is told what the constitution requires to be done. And the competency of the remedy, the difficulty of attaining the end, I am not concerned with, because we are not here in a case taken in the regular fashion before the courts and it is not a question of procedure, it is a question of right, and if that is once settled by your Lordships I think there will be no trouble at all, I am confident that the government will follow the direction given.

But I have another opinion which I believe is of as great value. Sir Henry Drayton was acting Prime Minister in 1926, and he had to explain a certain grant that was given at that time of the Carillon power. He gave a statement to the press on Tuesday, August 16, 1927, and I take it from the Ottawa Journal of that day.

An hon. MEMBER: 1927?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He gave that statement a year after the discussion took place in the house. Here is what Sir Henry Drayton said:

An understanding of the basic conditions that ought to apply to the whole question is first necessary.

I know there was no question of the Beauharnois at the time.

They can be shortly stated as follows:

1. The water-powers afforded by the rivers of our country must be considered as absolutely subject to provincial jurisdiction.

2. That the provinces have the right to develop such powers, by such means, in such manner, and in such districts as may be determined by the policies of their respective governments.

3. That on navigable streams, where the dominion authority is charged with the right and duty of maintaining navigation, that right ought only to be exercised in the interests of navigation, and never in order to (a) delay or defeat the policy of the province; (b) make dominion revenue out of provincial undertakings.

In other words, that the interests of the dominion in navigable streams, apart from navigation, is simply that of a bare trustee for the provinces, and as such the dominion is charged with a duty to authorize and to assist to make legal all provincial works that do not interfere with navigation. Whatever other legal technicalities may be advanced, there is no doubt but that the public interest and provincial rights alike demand the acceptance of such principles and irrespective of past practices. I admit these principles have not always been followed in the past.

That was a censure.

For example the plans of the great hydro works at Niagara were only made legal last summer, years after their construction.

Well, that was worse than Beauharnois.

In connection with that undertaking in the first instance certain works in ease—

I should like to call the attention of the committee to this, that changes were made in the plans.

—in ease of navigation were to be done by the hydro commission. These works were found to be unnecessary, and further plans submitted were found by the dominion department to be satisfactory, but the validating order was never issued owing to the fact that the railways department insisted on an annual rental of $17,580. The basis of this charge is set out in the department's letter of April 9, 1926, to the commission as follows:

This was calculated at 6 per cent on a valuation of $2,000 per acre, applied to approximately 144 acres of river bed lying between the mouth of the Welland river and the point where your supply channel leads it.

Sir Henry goes on:

It may go without saying that I saw to it that the proper order went immediately without the creating of a further precedent that the Dominion had the right to enact toll money from provincial enterprises when conditions enabled the holdup to be made.

So Sir Henry expressed clearly the opinion that it is a duty on the part of the federal government to approve plans which are submitted to it to develop water powers on navigable rivers when those water powers are the property or assets of a province, and in that very case of the hydro-electric commission the work was even done before the final plans were approved, but Sir Henry Drayton saw to it that they were approved during his term of office as acting Prime Minister in 1926.

Now, sir, at the time public opinion was manifesting itself, which is rather interesting. The government was taken to task by some for wanting to rush this thing through, and by others for delaying the work which was in the interests of the country. I have here articles published in a very important organ of public opinion, the Ottawa Journal, which I cannot find time to read. But let me quote a couple of extracts. In an editorial on January 16, 1929, entitled: That Beauharnois Power Project, the Journal states in conclusion:

In the circumstances, and seeing that it has been made reasonably clear that the Beauharnois project cannot interfere with navigation, there is nothing left for the government to do but to give its sanction. The withholding of it, in fact, would, considering the industrial possibilities which the plan holds out, be a grave dereliction of duty.

Those editorials continued until the order in council was passed. But I have in my hand an editorial of March 11; that was after the order in council had been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN: Will my hon. friend allow me? As he knows, he will require unanimous consent to speak for more than forty minutes in committee. I suppose unanimous consent is given?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I am almost tempted to withdraw everything I have said. The editorial is entitled: Beauharnois, and is as follows:

After six months' of hesitation between its plain duty under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act and the fear of offending powerful rival power interests which are numbered among its political friends, the government has at last approved the application of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company.

As you see, you will be cursed if you do, and you will be cursed if you do not.

From the very first, no reason existed why the application of the Beauharnois people should not have been approved. It might well have been granted four months ago. All that the government had to do was to see that what was proposed did not injuriously interfere with navigation, and, that done, permit the company to use the rights which it had legally secured through the proper channels. As between public ownership and private ownership, there was no issue at all. The circumstances being what they were there couldn't be.

However, all's well that ends well. The application is now granted, and, reading the order in council granting it, nobody can say that navigation and all other public interests haven't been safeguarded. The government's approval, in fact, is hedged by so many stipulations, conditions and reservations that the Beauharnois people must be wondering whether they have anything left at all.

That is rather interesting, and I must say that in fact the conditions imposed were of the strictest character.

Mr. GORDON: But they paid no attention to those conditions.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is another question, if my hon. friend will kindly let me refer to the situation as it then existed. The conditions were very strict indeed. I do not claim any credit for it, because perhaps hon. members who were here at the time will remember that I was the unfortunate victim of an accident that winter and was kept in my room for over two months. The reference to the supreme court and the order in council were made known to me through the press. I claim no merit in the drafting of those conditions, but I say they certainly were of a very strict nature and I was not sure, when I read them, that some were within the purview of this parliament or this government to impose.

Parliament had the right, as has been stated during this debate, to cancel this order in council as soon as it was passed. It was laid on the table of the house the very day it was passed, and attention was drawn to it by the then Minister of Public Works. Any member of the house, including the right hon. Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition, if he had found anything suspicious, if he had found the order invalid in law or that the conditions imposed were not as they ought to have been, had the right and power to move the cancellation of that order in council. What happened? I direct the attention not only of the house but of the country as well to what happened in connection with that order in council and the action of parliament with regard to it. The order was passed on March 8, 1929. In 1930, during the following session, the then hon. member for Toronto Northwest, Mr. Church, introduced a bill which was really very similar to one of the sections of one of the bills introduced to-day, making it imperative that any approval of such plans should be made by parliament itself instead of by the governor general in council. But the bill was made retroactive to January 1, 1930, and could not apply to Beauharnois. Mr. Church was asked by the then Minister of Public Works why the bill was not made retroactive so as to include Beauharnois, which was then in existence, and Mr. Church replied, "Well, I had a separate bill for that purpose, but I have been ill and that is why the bill has not been introduced."

What happened to the bill introduced by Mr. Church? It was discussed by him on the second reading, when he made quite an extensive speech, but when he concluded his remarks the bill was negatived without a division being taken. Hon. members will find that at page 501 of Hansard for 1930.

Not only did no hon. member of this house make a move towards the cancellation of order in council P.C. 422, but when a bill was presented the following year which would have made it imperative that parliament should control such approval instead of the governor in council, the bill was lost without a division being recorded in the house at the time.

I desire to refer briefly to condition 28 of the order in council in which obviously nothing is sacrificed. In that condition it is clearly stipulated and understood that nothing is thereby granted except approval of the proposed works under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, upon and subject to those conditions.

My right hon. leader has mentioned the fact that at the time there was an application by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, supported by the Ontario government, for permission to construct works of the same nature in the international section of the St. Lawrence river. I shall not refer to that matter except to assert again that the conditions imposed on Beauharnois were considered unfair to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec when they came to deal with the government of Canada in an endeavour to come to an arrangement as to a future policy with regard to water powers. They did not want to accept the situation created in connection with Beauharnois, under which the company or the province doing the work would be assessed for many millions of dollars for the purpose of creating and constructing a canal for the general advantage of all the citizens of Canada.

I do not want to take much more time on this subject, but the question of public ownership is very often raised in this regard. I do not want to discuss the merits or demerits of public ownership. If there were an academic discussion on the question I am not sure that I would not be tempted to side with the advocates of public ownership, but I say that when it concerns the assets of a province it is for that province to decide. It will be for us, the citizens of the province of Quebec, to decide among ourselves whether we shall have public ownership with regard to the assets of the province. It is not for the gentlemen from Ontario or those from Alberta or some other place to dictate the policy to be followed by the people of Quebec. The federal parliament has no more right to interfere with the water powers of Quebec with regard to public or private ownership than we would have the right to interfere with the hydro electric of Ontario. That was a question settled by the citizens of Ontario, and we were never tempted to dictate, to advise or to suggest what they should do as between public or private ownership of electricity and water powers in their own province. The same principle applies to the province of Quebec. I repeat, it is for us to decide that; and when the people of Quebec discuss the question and decide which side they will take, it will be the people of Quebec who will be the judges. Therefore, while I am grateful for the excellent advice which we are receiving right and left, I suggest that we can do without it. It is our own business, and so I thank the hon. gentleman for nothing —the hon. gentleman who offered that advice. I think this is pretty clear. I cannot understand the way of thinking of hon. gentlemen like my good friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), for whom I have the greatest esteem, as revealed in his speech of yesterday. I cannot understand the way of thinking of gentlemen who for years have been pleading and arguing for the transfer of the natural resources of their own provinces from the Dominion to those provinces, and who wish to take away from Quebec some of the natural resources which that province has always had from the beginning. That is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Has anyone on this side of the house suggested—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not say that; I said that we were receiving advice.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not from this side.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; I did not mention my hon. friend or his associates.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. gentleman certainly leaves the implication that something we have done seeks to take from the province of Quebec some right it has. Let me say now—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not talking—

Mr. GORDON: I say now, if I may be permitted, that there is not one single, solitary thing done in connection with this Beauharnois project that would seem to indicate for a moment that there is any such intention. There is no intention that the rights of the province of Quebec shall be imperilled one way or the other.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is too sensitive, and he puts into my mouth words I have not used. But speeches have been made in this house, last year and this year, even when the charges which led to this investigation were made, in which it is more than suggested, more than hinted at. I have not spoken at all about my hon. friend nor about the Minister of Public Works. Indeed, I have under my hand extracts from a speech of that hon. gentleman, made in 1927, I believe, on the Carillon power scheme, when he spoke eloquently on the side of the provinces. I was far from suggesting anything of the kind, far from insinuating what my hon. friend has denied; and if he had only permitted me to conclude I am sure he would not have risen. Especially with the amendments suggested by my good friend the Secretary of State, the suggestion put forward in the present legislation might be, I believe, the best under the circumstances, more particularly with the elimination of the words "if any," which I intended to challenge as vigorously as possible. With those words left out, I must admit that my good friend has taken the wind out of my sails.

Now the canal will be declared a work for the general advantage of Canada. I believe that under section 92, paragraph 10, subparagraph (c), a canal, although entirely situated in one province, can be declared for the general advantage of Canada. The effect will be, however, that what was primarily a work for water power purposes—and all that the province of Quebec could do would be to deal with the water power side of the matter —becomes under this bill a work primarily for the general advantage of Canada, for navigation purposes, the water powers being incidental. The rights of the province of Quebec will be reserved as they existed. I have no objection on the ground that this qualification is not in the bill; it is expressed by the Secretary of State; because this parliament could not grant rights to the province of Quebec if they did not exist, any more than the province of Quebec could grant to the Dominion of Canada rights which it did not have.

There is one feature of the bill to which I wish to direct attention.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not want to curtail the hon. member's remarks on a matter of this kind, but I would point out to him that this is supposed to be the last night of the session and someone else might wish to speak.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Had my hon. friend been here this morning he would have known that we agreed not only to the introduction of the bill without sufficient notice, but to the first reading and the second reading, and we agreed to have it referred to the committee. This was done on the understanding that I should have latitude in the expression of my views.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I was only suggesting to my hon. friend that time is passing and someone else might wish to speak.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member has dealt with the general features of the matter and I would suggest that we might now proceed with one of the bills.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My personal friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) has lost an opportunity to be kind to me, because I was just concluding. He might have allowed me to finish my remarks.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not objecting at all; I was only calling the hon. member's attention to the fact that the time is going.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should have liked it better had my good friend allowed me to conclude without that reminder. However, as I was about to say, this work has been declared for the general advantage of Canada, and the preamble reads:

> Whereas the improvement of inland navigation by the development of a deep waterway, which is now in progress, from lake Superior to the sea, through the great lakes and connecting waters and in part in, over or along the St. Lawrence river, requires that the canal now being constructed or to be constructed by the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited should hereafter be under the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

For the first time parliament is committed by this bill to a deep waterway scheme. I do not suppose there was any way of taking over a canal situated entirely in one province—I am glad that my right hon. friend agrees with me—and making it for the general advantage of Canada without linking it up with this other great national undertaking. Obviously this bill commits us to the development of a deep waterway system from the great lakes through the waters of the St. Lawrence.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of the committee for the courtesy extended to me. I have perhaps trespassed too much upon the time of the committee, but this is a matter of vital interest and I have tried to deal with it as best I can without hurting the feelings of anyone.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to enter into what would be for me a very pleasant discussion regarding the respective rights of the two provinces and of this dominion in and to the use of the waters of the St. Lawrence river for the development of power. My hon. friend has delivered a lengthy opinion in a most admirable and rather convincing manner, but if we had ample time for discussion I would repeat to him some of his former speeches in which the views expressed were not those which he has expressed to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That was before the judgment of the supreme court; I bow always to the decisions of the tribunals.

Mr. CAHAN: We all learn; as we grow older may we advance in wisdom and experience. From the point of view of the province of Quebec, I might congratulate that province upon the development of my hon. friend's opinions. However, there remain certain issues which cannot be decided by a committee of this house or by parliament itself; those issues must be left, and I trust they may be left at an early day, to the final decision of the supreme court and of the privy council. During the discussions which I have had during the last few days with the counsel of the government of the province of Quebec, he has suggested that the government of that province will be quite willing to facilitate a decision on these issues by the highest judicial tribunal of the country. In view of that possibility it would be useless for me to advance arguments with respect to the powers and jurisdiction of the dominion parliament, save to say that with respect to Bill No. 144, which should be dealt with first, there is no doubt that the declaration that this work is a work for the general advantage of Canada is within the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and, as the hon. member has said, in view of the present conditions, it is a very necessary piece of legislation. I suggest to the committee that we should consider the provisions of Bill No. 144 clause by clause in order that we may now dispose of them and that I may be enabled to propose some amendments which will meet with the approval of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DUPRE: Mr. Chairman, I intend to take only a few minutes in order to answer my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why be afraid?

Mr. DUPRE: The questions dealt with by the hon. member for Quebec East have to do with provincial rights. May I say to him that there are two schools of thought. One school contends that the development of hydro electric power belongs to the provinces, while the other school holds a somewhat different view. My hon. friend has quoted a number of extracts from judgments in connection with this question. I have before me quite a number of opinions which I had intended to read to the committee, but as the time is rather late I will ask that special permission be granted me to place these upon Hansard. I do this in order to give an idea of the opinions expressed by those who are the champions of provincial rights.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely my hon. friend will tell the committee who the authorities are before he puts them on Hansard.

Mr. DUPRE: Some are obtained from the same source as those quoted by my hon. friend, there is a judgment of Chief Justice Sir Charles Fitzpatrick in Leamy vs. The King, and also the opinion of Viscount Haldane, from which my hon. friend quoted.

The first question then is, did the province have the rights in regard to power development or did these rights rest with the Dominion of Canada.

There has been a long series of decisions bearing on this question both in the Supreme Court of Canada and in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

The first of these authorities is that known as the First Fisheries case, cited as the Attorney General of Canada versus the Attorney General of Ontario, et al, 98 Appeal Cases 700, and in that case, in the judgment delivered by Lord Herschell, he says, at page 709:

> It must also be borne in mind that there is a broad distinction between proprietary rights and legislative jurisdiction. The fact that such jurisdiction in respect of a particular subject matter is conferred on the Dominion legislature, for example, affords no evidence that any proprietary rights with respect to it were transferred to the Dominion. There is no presumption that because legislative jurisdiction was vested in the Dominion parliament proprietary rights were transferred to it. The Dominion of Canada was called into existence by the British North America Act, 1867. Whatever proprietary rights were, at the time of the passing of that Act, possessed by the provinces remain vested in them, except such as are by any of its express enactments transferred to the Dominion of Canada.

In Leamy versus The King, 54 Supreme Court Reports 143, in the judgment of Chief Justice Fitzpatrick, at page 14, he says,—

> Since confederation the title to beds of navigable waters has been vested in the crown in right of the province but the authority to legislate regarding the public right of navigation is, by the British North America Act, 1867, assigned to the Dominion parliament.

In the case of the Attorney General of Canada versus the Attorney General of Quebec, 1921 Appeal Cases, Viscount Haldane in referring to the 1898 case above mentioned says, at page 419,—

> What the board on that occasion had to determine was among other things, whether the beds of rivers and other waters situate within the territorial limits of a province and not granted before confederation belong to the crown in right of the Dominion or of the province. The answer was that generally speaking the proprietary title of these beds, excepting where expressly transferred, remained provincial.

In a latter case of the city of Montreal versus Montreal Harbour Board, 26 Appeal Cases 299, it was held that the bed of the stream which the dominion wished to add as part of the harbour did not belong to the dominion but belonged to the province and must, if taken by the dominion for addition to the harbour, be compensated for.

The last case dealing with this question is that of the Water Powers Reference in 29 Supreme Court Reports 200, and the ninth question there asked was:

Has the province the right to control or use the waters in provincial rivers and to develop or authorize the development of water-powers within the province, provided that in so doing navigation is not prejudiced and that the province complies with Dominion requirements as to navigation.

and the answer to that question given by Hon. Mr. Justice Duff, on page 266 is:

As to question 9, it was not seriously disputed that under the conditions mentioned, the provinces have the rights which are the subject of the question. This, of course, on the assumption that there is no conflicting legislation by the Dominion under an overriding power, a power, for example, conferred by the combined operation of section 91 (29) and 92 (10a).

From these authorities it seems that the proprietary right to control and use the waters in provincial rivers and to develop or authorize the development of water powers within the province rests with the province and not with the dominion.

There is another school of thought which holds a view contrary to the opinions I have just cited. Among my authorities there is one which is quite familiar to my hon. friend, the opinion of the ex-Minister of Justice himself in 1927. If my hon. friend will refer to the speech he delivered in this house in 1927 in connection with the Georgian bay canal he will find that he then expressed an opinion contrary to the one he expressed to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is not being fair.

Mr. DUPRE: I do not want to bore the committee—

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is not being fair.

Mr. DUPRE: —but I would like to read a few extracts from the opinion given at that time by the hon. member for Quebec east, to be found in Hansard of 1927, at page 1619. In his letter to the premier of Ontario which my hon. friend then quoted, he said:

So far as I am aware, any interest which the province may have in the matter—

Of power development.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not fair at all.

Mr. DUPRE: My hon. friend continues:

—is of a limited character, depending possibly upon the ownership of lands in the bed of the river or within the area to be flooded.

Continuing, my hon. friend said this—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall have to speak again.

Mr. DUPRE: I will go back to an opinion expressed this evening.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall have to speak again, as my hon. friend is not being at all fair.

Mr. DUPRE: I do not want to make any misrepresentation of the facts. A few minutes ago my hon. friend said that he was satisfied with the amendments as presented by the hon. the Secretary of State, especially with regard to the words "if any" which are going to be erased and which words he declared himself ready to challenge. The very words he used were that he was ready to challenge the term "if any."

Mr. LAPOINTE: In this bill surely, in connection with the Soulanges power, which is entirely in Quebec, Quebec property, the bed of the river in Quebec. That was not the case there.

Mr. DUPRE: In other words, my hon. friend said that he was going to challenge the words if the bill were not amended.

Mr. LAPOINTE: With regard to Beauharnois.

Mr. DUPRE: In the last clause of Bill No. 144.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. DUPRE: Very good. If my hon. friend will refer to Hansard of March 28, 1927, he will find that in his speech on that date this is what he said, speaking of the water powers of the provinces and the rights of the provinces with regard to water powers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where?

Mr. DUPRE: This is what my hon. friend said:

The question of what interest, if any, the province may have in any water-powers which may come into existence by the erection of works for the improvement of navigation beyond what is required to operate the works has not yet been judicially determined.

Therefore in 1927, my hon. friend was less severe and exacting than he is to-day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why this attack?

Mr. DUPRE: Just to prove to my hon. friend that he is not the only one who may rise to champion the rights of the provinces. If my hon. friend wants to know the other reason it is that he rose in his place to-night just to assert himself as the champion of provincial rights in order to help his party in the next provincial election in Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member is still young.

Mr. DUPRE: My hon. friend said this also:

When the question comes to be determined, I believe the court will have to take cognizance of the fact that the provincial title to the bed of the river is burdened by the public right of navigation, which considerably decreased its value; that upon payment to the province of compensation for its proprietary interest in the bed of the stream, such interest according to the judgment of the Privy Council in the Montreal Harbour Commissioners' case, will be extinguished. Furthermore it has been held that the ownership of the bed of a river does not carry with it any proprietary interest in the waters which flow over it.

May I draw the attention of the hon. member for Quebec East to his own words, which are exactly the opposite of what he said a few minutes ago. I will repeat them:

Furthermore it has been held that the ownership of the bed of a river does not carry with it any proprietary interest in the waters which flow over it. The surplus waters in question do not exist by nature but are brought into being by the Dominion in the exercise of its powers.

That is just the contrary of what my hon. friend said a few minutes ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But that was before the judgment of the supreme court. May I say to my hon. friend that those contentions were submitted to the supreme court? The Attorney General of Canada by his representatives there submitted the very point my hon. friend is reading, but the supreme court has decided otherwise and I am abiding by the judgment of that court.

Mr. DUPRE: Shall I, being an ignoramus in these matters and my hon. friend being an expert, abide by the opinion given by my hon. friend in 1927 or by the opinion he expressed to-night?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is childish.

Mr. BENNETT: Which—the opinion?

Mr. DUPRE: To continue, this is what my hon. friend said as reported on page 1621 of Hansard of March 28, 1927:

It follows that until the matter is judicially determined, the Dominion must regard the provincial interest in such water-powers as not being so considerable as some hon. gentlemen in the course of this debate have claimed.

That is the contrary of what my hon. friend said to-night. Provincial rights were not considerable in 1927, but to-night, on the eve of a provincial election in Quebec, they are of very considerable importance.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend notice the words "until the matter is judicially determined?"

Mr. DUPRE: Yes, but "until it is determined," the hon. member for Quebec East took the opportunity then to express his own views. What I am quoting to-night, may I say to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth is not the judgment of the supreme court but the personal opinion of the hon. member who was Minister of Justice in 1927.

Mr. BENNETT: Which the privy council said was of equal validity and reliance to that of a court itself to which the matter might be referred.

Mr. RALSTON: Until judicially determined.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and it is not yet determined.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the matter of the Carillon power where the federal government has rights because the canal existed at confederation. There is a difference in the situation.

Mr. DUPRE: I do not care whether my hon. friend changes his mind or not. Why should he not do so? He has a perfect right to do so; but when I hear him say he is going to challenge the words "if any" which we use in clause 4 of Bill No. 144, I take the liberty of reminding him that we are using the very words he himself used in 1927, when speaking of the rights of the provinces. He talked of those powers and rights and said: Those rights, if any, are very hard to determine, and if they are in existence are not considerable.

This is why the committee on the Beauharnois question took the trouble to insert in the first two paragraphs of its conclusions a proviso that the rights of the province must be respected. May I read just a paragraph or two:

Your committee recommends:

1. That the parliament of Canada take such action as may be within its power, and without prejudicing the rights of the province of Quebec, to procure the development of this project in such a manner as will best serve the people of Canada.

2. That should the rights of the Dominion and the province of Quebec come in conflict, every effort be put forth to arrive at a satisfactory agreement, so that the project may not be imperilled by delay.

I conclude by saying this: The provincial rights of Quebec I have at heart as much as has the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who said otherwise? Why this attack?

Mr. DUPRE: My hon. friend said a few minutes ago that some people did not share this view. When challenged by the hon. the Minister of Public Works he explained that he did not intend to apply this remark to the members on this side of the house. But I know quite well that part of the speech of my hon. friend will be circulated through Canada and particularly in the province of Quebec. That is why I want to show exactly where we stand. Without knowing or affirming what the provincial rights are or may be, we say: Whatever those rights are they must be respected in their entirety. With regard to the rights which may belong to the province of Quebec we say: Hands off Quebec; hands off provincial rights! As soon as those rights are determined once and for all by our courts or the privy council, it will be the duty of this or any other government or party to see that they remain untouched.

On Bill No. 144, to declare certain works of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Governor in council may make orders, rules or regulations.

Mr. GARDINER: Before we proceed further, Mr. Chairman, may I call the attention of the committee to the fact that one of the reasons why this Beauharnois project is going to be declared a work for the general advantage of Canada is that it is intended eventually to use this section of the river as part of the St. Lawrence deep waterway system. My first inquiry of the minister in charge of the bill is this: When they deal with this matter is it the intention of the government to take over the property rights of the Beauharnois project in so far as the canal section is concerned?

Mr. CAHAN: So far as this canal section is concerned, it is brought under the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and the government of Canada is authorized by purchase or otherwise, even by expropriation, to acquire the lands and works appertaining to navigation. I think that is quite sufficient an announcement for the present. I cannot give an expression of opinion as to whether that will be done immediately or not.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not my intention to delay the committee. I merely desire to find out if possible what are the intentions of the government with regard to this legislation. We know that order in council 422 contains certain provisions which were made for the purpose of using this Beauharnois project as part of the St. Lawrence deep waterways navigation canal. If this Beauharnois project had been gone on with without interference, and if later this country had decided to develop the St. Lawrence deep waterway, we would have been in the position as a country of using this stretch of the canal which was owned by private interests. I cannot conceive of anything more humiliating to this country than to be placed in that position. In view of the fact that the government intend to deal with this matter I should like to get a very plain answer from the government, yes or no, as to whether, when they take over this project, it is the intention of the government to retain possession so that when the St. Lawrence deep waterway is finally developed we shall not have to pass through private property but through the property of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand that it is the intention of the government that when the deep water canal is completed through the Soulanges section, that is between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis, it and the works that appertain to it, which are necessary for navigation, shall be vested in the crown in the right of the Dominion to the same extent as the lands and canal and appurtenances of the new Welland canal are now vested in the crown in the right of the Dominion.

Mr. GARDINER: That is very satisfactory, so far, Mr. Chairman. Now in view of the possibility of the government using this as a deep waterway, I come to this question: Heretofore when the Dominion government has constructed a canal in any part of the country for the use of the people of Canada, and where they have created a head of water by virtue of that canalization, it has always been the practice of governments to claim the ownership of the head of water that comes from such canalization. Is it the purpose of this government to claim the head of water because of the canalization in this case, and to use it for the purposes of the Dominion?

Mr. CAHAN: I can say, I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is the intention of the government that the issue as to the right to use the water of the river St. Lawrence for the development of hydro-electric power will be placed before the courts either by agreement and common consent or by initiating proper action to that end. It is the intention of the government to secure from the highest tribunal of this country a clear decision with regard to this particular project as to the respective rights of the Dominion and the province.

Mr. GARDINER: I appreciate very much the answer the minister has given. I think the sooner this question is decided by the highest court in this land, and even by the privy council, if necessary, the better it will be for all concerned. The Dominion and the provinces will then know where they stand, and I am quite sure that because of that fact the relations between the provinces and the Dominion will be much happier in the future than they are at the present. I appreciate therefore very much the decision of the government in that regard.

There is another point on which I want information, and I believe this is very important. This work is going to be declared to inure to the benefit of Canada. I have heard some rumours which have disturbed me during the last few days. I never like to deal with rumours unless there is some real evidence supporting them, but in view of the nature of this legislation and the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday, would it be possible for the minister to give this house any information as to what is going to be the management of this project in the immediate future? Is the government going to take it over and put it under the Department of Public Works in the same manner as the new Welland canal, or is the Prime Minister's statement to be taken as the attitude of the government, that this project will be handed over to the banks? Or is it possible that the government may hand it over to a certain firm in Toronto, Nesbitt, Thomson and Company, which has been rumoured very strongly within the last few days? Just what is going to be the attitude of the government? Before I take my seat may I say that I should be very sorry indeed to see the government hand this over to the banks, which have advanced certain moneys against certain bonds, or to any other company that they might select. I hope and trust that until such time as the courts have given a clear decision, the government will keep control of the project and therefore be in a position to deal with it adequately. As far as I am concerned, I am an advocate, as I think the members of this house know, of public ownership, and I would regret very much if after getting out of one difficulty in so far as this project is concerned, we stepped into another which might have to be dealt with at a future time. Is there any possibility of any of these things happening which I have mentioned, or is it the intention of the government to keep control until such time as there is a clear decision from the courts?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman suffers perhaps from the disability of not having followed, although he has been on the committee, just what the legal implications of the present position are. It is necessary to keep clearly in mind this fact. This property is the property of a private company created by the legislature of the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec has complete and absolute power to create that company, as it has done, and this parliament cannot destroy that company or take from individuals the shares of the company which they own. About that there could be no manner of doubt. That is the difficulty always of being too late. No action that this parliament can take at this moment will set aside the corporate rights of that company, or deprive its members of their property in the shares which they own. Everybody must realize that. Who is responsible for it is not now the issue. The question is: What are the facts? This government has not taken possession of that company; it cannot do so. The province of Quebec made that company and controls it. So far as the immediate future is concerned, I can assure the hon. gentleman that I know of no foundation for the rumours to which he has referred. I have heard a great many more rumours than those which he mentioned. But at the moment this company is an entity and that entity functions by reason of the powers received from a body over which this parliament does not exercise control. The government by every means in its power will endeavour to do the following: (a) secure continuance of the enterprise; (b) secure the rights of those who bona fide have put their money in that enterprise; (c) secure proper control and management; (d) take such other steps as may be necessary when terms and conditions are fixed as will ensure the greatest possible benefit to this dominion as a whole by reason of the undertaking now being declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That can only be done in cooperation with the province of Quebec?

Mr. BENNETT: Absolutely.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to embarrass the Prime Minister, but—

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot embarrass me.

Mr. EULER: He is never embarrassed. He stated a moment ago, and I agree with him absolutely, that this is a company incorporated by the province with certain rights with which the Dominion cannot interfere. But he said he would endeavour to secure proper control and management of the company. As this parliament has no control over a Quebec-organized company, I was wondering by what means the government would secure proper control and management.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) was not in the house when my colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), was indicating the basis of the legislation in the other enactment; that is on such terms and conditions as may be thought desirable by the governor in council. This does not touch of course the corporate existence of the company. We will endeavour to ensure what I have indicated, namely, proper management of the enterprise.

Mr. EULER: I presume this means that as the government has now taken over the canal as a work for the general advantage of Canada it has a weapon in its hands which it can use for the purpose of—

Mr. CAHAN: Moral suasion.

Mr. EULER: That is about all.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have the government now definitely decided to utilize the Beauharnois canal as a link in the canalization system.

Mr. BENNETT: It has to be.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not necessarily, because my hon. friend will remember it was never definitely decided to do so in the event of international difficulties.

Mr. BENNETT: Subject to that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was curious to know whether the government now had definitely decided that this was to be the route. I say that because precaution was taken in the event of its ultimately being chosen the route that it might be utilized for the purpose; but if the government has decided that this, and no other route, will be chosen, I should like to know.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think we should be asked that question to-night. As I am instructed, the latest and best engineering advice available to the government is that this is one of the most practicable routes down through that section.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a relevant question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I beg your pardon, it is.

Mr. BENNETT: It has nothing to do with the matter now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It has a great deal to do with it. In the event of a canal being built on the north side of the river, and being a link in the waterways, then it would make a vast difference in the attitude that the government might take towards this undertaking. If it is now chosen by the government as the route which the great waterway system will take, then there is good reason for many of the things being done by this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman surely hardly expects the government to answer that question at the moment. Having had this matter thrust upon us without having had an opportunity to consider all the details, we can make no declaration of policy beyond what is involved in what has been said. The canal is there, it is an available route, it has been treated as the one that would be used, and has been held out in the order in council as the route proper for the purpose, although not the one that the international board thought at first should be the route selected.

But it is said to be available for that purpose and to be satisfactory because you can get a depth of water the same as in the Welland canal. The government has not expressed any settled policy in regard to the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And the committee endorsed that as the proper route.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I forgot that.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Rights of province of Quebec.

Mr. CAHAN: I desire to move an amendment as follows:

That section 4 be amended by striking out in the second line of the said section the words "the rights, if any," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "any rights."

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend think that he might strike out or alter those words "for the development of hydro-electric power?" It seems to limit the rights of the province in the use of the waters to the development of hydro-electric power. The waters could be used for mills or other undertakings.

Mr. BENNETT: That seemed to be what the province desired, for the reason that it was the question at issue that the courts might have to decide. It was settled in that way with my friend the Secretary of State, for reasons that he will explain to him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But that is a limitation, there is no doubt about it.

Mr. CAHAN: The question of using the waters of the St. Lawrence for watering cattle or driving an old-fashioned grist mill is not in controversy. The only question in controversy is this of the use of water for hydro-electric power, and the amendment is made at the suggestion of counsel for the government of the province of Quebec. He says:

I am prepared to advise the Quebec government that this bill is acceptable.

That is, before it was amended. He adds:

I would prefer "any rights" to "the rights, if any."

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course, that does not bind us altogether.

Mr. CAHAN: No; but the hon. gentleman is not now expressing the opinion of the Canadian parliament so much as expressing a view that he thinks prevails in the province of Quebec. Anyway this clause cannot affect any other right than that dealt with by the general terms of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: This does not take other rights away.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Ever since I came to Ottawa I have taken the ground that the water powers belong to the provinces, and I have waged battle on that ground on a good many occasions. I do think that this to some extent restricts the right of the province to the use of the water for hydro-electric industry only. Frankly I do not think any other rights would be very much affected, because the courts will decide ultimately what are the respective rights of the province and the Dominion. But I do not see why you seek to restrict the province to the right to develop hydro-electric engineering only.

Mr. CAHAN: What would you suggest?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would give them a general water power.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not the question at issue; there was a single question. This is a matter which affects the province of Quebec and without their consent it is very doubtful whether we should have introduced this measure, because in a complicated matter of this kind it is very desirable not to bring about a conflict. Good will and cooperation are essential, and the province of Quebec narrowed the controversy to a single point, which was explained by my colleague, namely the rights of the province with respect to the development of hydro-electric energy as against those of the Dominion. That being the only question at issue it does not detract from or add to the other issue, and that is the only franchise this particular company obtained.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is quite true, but you are creating precedents all the time, and after all my hon. friend is very fond of precedents. If the question should arise in the future, as it may, in connection with the development of power not for hydro-electric energy but for some other purpose, it will be pointed out that a precedent was created in this particular bill.

Mr. BENNETT: All that is done is to say that this is without prejudice to the rights of the province of Quebec as asserted with respect to the development of hydro-electric energy. That is all. I think any hon. gentleman who will look can see that. This cannot be a precedent with respect to Ontario or Manitoba or some other province.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not so sure that it could not be so used.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. BENNETT moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny): I just wish to state, as a member from Quebec, that I do not believe Quebec rights are in danger in this bill. Also, I think the St. Lawrence is a dominion asset and that dominion rights should be preserved before anything else in a question of this kind.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

The house in committee on Bill No. 143, respecting the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Right to divert water.

Mr. CAHAN: I wish to move that section 2 be amended by inserting after the word "assigns" in the second line the following:

in so far as it may be within the competence of parliament.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Further diversion to be approved.

Mr. CAHAN: I desire to move that section 3 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

3. The governor in council shall not consent to any further or additional diversion by said company of the river St. Lawrence except with the express approval of parliament.

That leaves entirely open the question as to whether or not and to what extent such consent is necessary.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Auditor General's office—salaries, including the Auditor General at $10,000 additional to 7-8 Edward V, chapter 6, $443,825.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the new statute the salary is a charge against the consolidated revenue fund, and this will be the last year in which it will be dealt with in this way.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Loan to harbour commissioners of Montreal, with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, for such period and upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of deficits resulting from the operations of the Montreal harbour bridge, $681,600.

Mr. BENNETT: This item might be reduced by payments that have been received since it was placed in the estimates, but it is unnecessary to do so because it will only mean that so much less will be required, so it might pass as it is.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment annually from the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of $2,000 to each minister of the crown charged with the administration of a department, the solicitor general, and the leader of the opposition, and the sum of $1,000 each to the speaker of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Commons, in lieu of motor cars and their maintenance, including chauffeurs, the acceptance of such sums not to vacate their respective seats in parliament; and to authorize the governor in council to appoint any person now employed in the public service as a chauffeur of a passenger automobile at Ottawa, whose position is abolished, to a vacant position in the public service, provided such chauffeur has been continuously employed as such for at least two years and that the appointment will be made at no higher remuneration than he is now receiving, $42,000.

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not want to delay the committee, but I do not think this estimate should have been imposed upon the house under the circumstances in which the country finds itself just now. It is perhaps a small matter in itself and I am not going to say that the ministers are sufficiently paid without receiving a further remuneration. But this matter has been commented upon in many quarters and it creates a very bad impression. The practice of ministers having automobiles of their own has grown up without special statute, and this is interpreted as simply a disguised increase in salary for ministers and the leader of the opposition; and in the present circumstances it is a very bad way of terminating the session.

Mr. BENNETT: I should hesitate to speak about this, but it is desirable that a wrong impression should not be left on the minds of the committee. The cost of ministerial cars last year was $47,266.52; the cost of departmental cars was some $34,000, making a total of $81,267.26; with a net purchase price for ministers' cars and others of $106,748.04. Of the 36 cars, 20 have been turned over to the departmental garage, Department of National Defence, for storage and ultimate disposal.

I have no desire that at this time in the country's history additional salaries should be granted to ministers. On the other hand, I can speak, perhaps, with a little more freedom than my colleagues, and I am not concerned whether or not this vote is allowed, so far as I am personally concerned. But I do say this, that while cars were allowed to ministers for a long time, a practice grew up the example of which was bad, and we determined to discontinue it. But it is unfair to ask men to leave their homes and their professions, in many instances their future, and come to the city of Ottawa and live here, maintaining that position which they are bound to maintain by virtue of their office, and then find themselves, at the end of a term of office, hopelessly bankrupt. That has happened in this city. It has happened during the last few years that one of the leading ministers of the crown found himself in that position, and when he departed this life his estate indicated that that was so.

Men in politics should not be compelled to rely upon the benefaction of friends or otherwise, so far as the duty they owe the state is concerned; and when men serve Canada for the miserable pittance they get, as compared with what they would receive if they were practising their professions—they would get twice as much—to say that they should come here and find themselves, after a term of office, with their little savings gone, with their families on the threshold of life, without much opportunity to get an education because of the cost, and then to expect them to maintain the dignity of their office, entertaining, dispensing hospitality, treating visitors as they should treat them, moving to and fro, from one place to another, maintaining cars, I do not believe that anybody would suggest that this is at all reasonable. Least of all do the Canadian people expect it, and it cannot be done on the salary that is provided.

I did consult with the leader of the opposition with respect to the matter, and I am sorry he is not here at the moment. A sum was arrived at after consultation with automobile men and garages, and there is not a member of this house who does not appreciate just what is involved. I can only say that this item does not represent the cost of gasoline and service which I pay, without any question of loss or depreciation to the car; and I do not want my colleagues, nor does anyone in this house want them, to be placed in a different position because of the accident of our circumstances. Moreover, in the end it is a saving. I ask the committee to realize that this sum of money is here for a specific purpose and is used for that purpose. So far as I know, it is not adequate for the purpose, but it saves the country $40,000 or $50,000 a year or perhaps a good deal more than that in the end. At least it will save $5,000 a month.

None of my colleagues will engage in this discussion and I want to be fair to them. I think most of us know that there is not a single occasion on which a charity list or some other subscription list is opened when every minister is not asked to subscribe. And if we are to have that probity in public life which has been spoken of in the house so frequently we must at least put men in positions that will be self-sustaining, positions in which they can support themselves and their families and maintain that dignity which by virtue of the offices they hold they are bound to maintain, not because they want to but because they have to. It is not a matter of choice but of necessity. I ask the committee to pass this item as offering to the country an indication of the fact that the people do not expect their servants to serve them without being at least placed in a position that will not leave them the poorer for the services they render. The labourer is worthy of his hire, whatever may be his position. In every walk of life I know of men receive compensations in keeping with the services they give. If anyone has any doubt about that, let him look at the lawyers' bills which we pass in the estimates, or at those bills entailed in connection with the recent committee. I speak strongly about this, although I have no personal interest in it; but I believe it is the fair thing to do by men who serve the state on either side of the house, giving of their best to the country. And it is better than the indiscriminate use of automobiles in the manner that grew up out of the war. This is in the interests of the country. It represents a saving to the people and is a fair recognition of the fact that you do not expect people who serve you to be poorer in consequence of that service.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Salaries—further amount required pending the final adjustment of staffs by the department and the Civil Service Commission, owing to the transfer of natural resources, such sum to cover allowances to those retired and salaries of those retained, $100,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to delay the committee at this late stage, but I am very sorry to see that the administration has not seen fit to include in the supplementary estimates something in the way of relief for those who have been let out from the Department of the Interior. I thought at one time that this matter was being favourably considered, especially the suggestion that five years should be added to the length of service of those who had not reached thirty-five years of service. To have done this would have served a very useful purpose. I had other observations to make on this item, but I will defer them until next session.

The Prime Minister is very much concerned, as it is his duty to be, about unemployment, and I hope that he will find some way of using some of the money which has been appropriated to-day in an endeavour to relieve the situation in Ottawa. Six hundred employees have been let out, and when their families are considered the total number affected would amount to probably 2,500. This has caused a tremendous disturbance of ecenomic conditions in this city, as a large number of merchants, dealers and others have thereby also been affected. These employees have been let out without notice and I trust the administration will give their case favourable consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: The observations of the hon. gentleman have been noted and his representations have not been overlooked. However, it is impossible to deal with this matter until such time as we have ascertained to what extent the other departments of the service will be able to absorb these employees. If the hon. gentleman sees fit between now and next session to make such representations as he may be advised to make on behalf of those for whom he speaks, they will be looked into and if possible consideration will be given.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I thank the Prime Minister for his very considerate reply.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Salaries—to provide hereby for the continuance in office of G. W. Dawson as departmental purchasing agent, grade 5, from February 13, 1931 to March 31, 1932, $1.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a case where the gentleman involved is beyond the age of seventy. As he is continuing in the service, the vote of $1 is to indicate that no order in council is being passed. This vote is being put in the estimates in order to show that parliament is giving its approval of this action.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. NEILL: There are a number of works urgently required throughout the province, and I hope that advantage will be taken of the sum voted for unemployment in order to complete some of these requirements. Much of this work would be in the nature of a stitch in time; if it is not done to-day it may prove to be very costly in the future. This work would supply employment to the local people as well as to make much needed repairs of wharves, floats and so on.

To provide for payments to the railways in connection with movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor general in council and for the cost of administration thereof, $1,428,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is superseded, because of its wording, by a new item which appears in the estimates which were submitted this morning.

Item dropped.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

To provide for the administration of the Income War Tax Act, 1917, and amendments thereof, and authority for this purpose to create positions and make appointments, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act—further amount required, $350,000.

To provide for expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and for preventive service—further amount required, $150,000.—Total, $500,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I notice the Minister of National Revenue is not in the chamber at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: He is not in very good health to-day and he has retired, but I am familiar with the matter.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to refer to a matter that came up the other night with regard to the dismissal of an officer in the provincial service, concerning which I spoke to my hon. friend, and he said he would have the matter looked into. Since then I have received a return. I am sorry at this late date to have to take up the time of the committee to bring the matter up, but I shall take only a moment. This is the case of a man named Norman MacDonald, in Pictou, Nova Scotia. The minister stated the other night that this man was a very efficient officer in every way. He seems to have been appointed in May, 1927. On March 19, 1931, a certificate was given by the hon. member for Pictou to the minister as follows:

I have personal knowledge that Mr. Norman MacDonald, preventive officer at Trenton, N.S.,

was guilty of active political partisanship prior to and during the last election contest and, as a member of parliament, I ask for his dismissal on that account.

On March 22 the recommendation went forward for his dismissal. On April 2 he received notice of dismissal and on April 11 he sent to the commissioner of customs this letter:

I wish to acknowledge receipt of departmental letter of April 2 advising me that an order in council was passed dispensing with my services as a customs-excise enforcement officer on account of active political partisanship during the recent federal elections.

This notice comes as a shock to me, as I have not taken any part in politics, and I have always done my duty without fear or favour, as an examination of my record will show. I think this order is neither fair nor just and I appeal in all fairness that I be reinstated in the service and given a fair investigation.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Hon. R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister; Hon. E. B. Ryckman, Minister of National Revenue, and A. T. Logan, Divisional Chief Customs-Excise Preventive Service.

Yours respectfully,

Norman MacDonald.

Then telegrams were sent, not by Mr. MacDonald or by personal friends of his, but by the social service council and by Mr. H. R. Grant, President of the Nova Scotia Temperance Association, protesting in the strongest terms against MacDonald's dismissal. On April 15, Mr. H. R. Grant wired the commissioner of customs as follows:

With reference to recent dismissal Preventive Officer Norman MacDonald social service council of Nova Scotia believes charge of active political partisanship cannot be substantiated. Request impartial investigation.

On April 14, the previous day, a longer telegram was sent, which is on the file, in which the Social Service Council of Nova Scotia protests against the dismissal of preventive officer MacDonald as follows:

The Social Service Council of Nova Scotia protests against the dismissal of Preventive Officer Norman MacDonald, who since his appointment has been doing excellent work in Pictou, Antigonish and Guysborough. The charge against him is active political partisanship. From information we have we know the charge is unfounded. His dismissal would give satisfaction to the liquor interests and the baser element of the people of the province, and would outrage the moral sense of the law-respecting citizens. We further protest against the dismissal of any officer in the preventive service without an impartial investigation.

MacDonald ceased duty on April 15, the next day after this telegram was sent. A further protest was sent by Mr. Grant on May 13 when he wrote to Mr. Breadner, commissioner of customs, as follows. I am leaving out the first part where he refers to Mr. Breadner's telegram:

I now write to ascertain if although "it is not the practice in such cases to have an investigation" an opportunity will be given Mr. MacDonald to produce evidence that he has not violated section 55 of the Civil Service Act.

We respectfully protest against the regulation of the Civil Service Commission, which empowers an individual member of parliament to be prosecuting attorney, judge and jury in such cases, and we ask for an impartial investigation.

In behalf of the Social Service Council and Temperance Alliance of Nova Scotia.

Yours sincerely,

H. R. Grant,
General Secretary.

On the 22nd April MacDonald sent in to the department a statutory declaration as follows:

I, Norman MacDonald, of Trenton, Nova Scotia, ex-customs-excise enforcement officer, appointed permanently by order in council passed on the 21st day of December, 1929, do solemnly declare:

That by departmental letter dated April 2, 1931, I was notified that an order in council had been passed dispensing with my services as customs-excise enforcement officer on account of active political partisanship. This notice was a complete surprise to me as I have not taken any part in politics in any way whatsoever at any time whatever since my appointment as such customs-excise enforcement officer, or since my temporary appointment to said office, made June 1, 1927, or for a long time prior thereto, and I have not at any time whatever while a servant or employee of the Dominion of Canada or any department of the government of the Dominion of Canada taken any part whatever in political activities of any kind, and I have always done my duty without fear or favour, and I submit that a fair investigation of my record as an officer will substantiate the facts herein set forth and show that I have had a record for efficiency at least a good deal above the average.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Norman MacDonald.

Declared before me at New Glasgow, this 3rd day of May, 1931.

A. Johnston Chisholm.

A commissioner of the supreme court of Nova Scotia authorized to take affidavits to be used in the supreme court of Nova Scotia.

What I am asking my right hon. friend, who has had a letter addressed to him regarding the matter, is that under the circumstances shown him, an investigation should be granted to this officer into the conditions of the case. Not only has this man given his own declaration, but we have had three different protests from the Social Service Council of Nova Scotia. The minister himself said that he was an efficient officer in every way, and the other night he intimated that he was very sorry to lose this man's services. The hon. member for Pictou thinks this man was guilty of political partisanship. He should be given an opportunity to defend himself in view of the fact that he has gone on the stand, as it were, and made a solemn declaration that he was not guilty of political partisanship.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member raises a question that this house dealt with on a previous occasion. It will be recalled that one of the then ministers took the responsibility of making a declaration similar in terms to that which was made by the hon. member for Pictou and action was taken by his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, upon such recommendation. The house decided then by a majority that this was the proper course to take. Under those circumstances there seems to be no reason why the rule thus established should be departed from. Where a member has pledged his word that a condition exists, the action taken upon it one should not say is irrevocable; but action at any rate has been taken upon it, and it is a matter between the member and the constituency which he has the honour to represent in the house. That has been the action previously taken by this house. What action it may take in the future I cannot say, for I have not had the opportunity to do more than just look through the correspondence and see that the facts were as I have indicated and as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has clearly indicated from correspondence. The matter can be further considered, but I have no opinion beyond that which I have just expressed.

Mr. RALSTON: I would urge my right hon. friend in the strongest way I can to reconsider the case in view of the representations that I have received. I do not think the case to which he refers is on all fours with the case I put before the house. I do not think there was a denial of the act in that case. The question was whether or not the acts constituted offensive partnership, but the acts were not denied. Here the acts are specifically denied, the man says he is innocent, and he is backed up by people who know him and his services, and he is backed up as well by the minister. I do submit that he ought at least to have a trial because after all the rule with regard to members certainly is only a rule of evidence; dismissal is made under section 55 of the act, which must be on proof of active partisanship. I ask my right hon. friend to consider not only carefully but favourably the ordinary application for an investigation.

Mr. CANTLEY: The member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) brought my name into this matter on a previous occasion, and has done so again to-night. I asked for the dismissal of Norman MacDonald, preventive officer. Yes, I certainly did, and I was fully justified in doing so. My action was taken at the urgent request of prominent Conservatives, my political friends, who were fully aware of the rabid and excessive political partisanship of the man known to be such and by them resented for years. While my action was taken as stated, it was, as of necessity it had to be, on my own definite, personal knowledge and in conformity with section 55 of the Civil Service Act.

As to the demand for an investigation, that is not a matter for me to decide and I can only refer my hon. friend to the proper authorities. May I suggest, however, that MacDonald and his friends, including the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, might perhaps be well advised to drop their demand in that connection.

Of olden time, a judge in Israel contracted a matrimonial alliance with a Philistine woman of the Clachan of Tinmath. The men of the place being poor sports, lacking in imagination and devoid of honour, meanly and cowardly secured information by fraud and threats which won them thirty shirts and thirty changes of raiment. This brought from the victim of the fraud the classic: "If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle." The friends of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, with much the same high sense of honour, obtained access to correspondence marked "private and confidential." This they lacked the intelligence to understand and jumped to the erroneous conclusion that my action had been undertaken solely on the suggestion of some of my friends and not on my own personal knowledge.

If the hon. ex-minister wishes to further ventilate the matter, I shall be glad to accommodate him and, in that case will submit some facts to the house as to the action of his friends both prior to and after July 28, 1930, which, peradventure, will cause him and them to regret his action. He and his friends may need thirty shirts and thirty changes of raiment, but they will not get them from me. If he thinks he can, I say "Lead on MacDuff."

Mr. RALSTON: All I say to my hon. friend is that after the assurance which he gives I am sure that he will welcome the investigation, and I am sure the Prime Minister will grant it now. That is all I am asking for. My hon. friend seems satisfied with that, and I am.

Mr. CANTLEY: Under the act to which I have referred and under the conditions existing I understand that he is not entitled to an investigation. I saw his affidavit. He denies doing certain things, but there are many other things which he does not deny which he did do.

Mr. EULER: There is an amount of $350,000 in this item which constitutes an increase under the Income War Tax Act. I think that is an increase over anything that we have had in the last four years, and I should like to know what is the reason for it.

Mr. BENNETT: That $350,000 is provided for the purpose of enabling the auditors to carry out the very work that was suggested by my hon. friend to-day in connection with the income tax and other revenues. It is thought that closer investigation will bring to the government of the country greater revenue. The officials assure us that with the expenditure of this sum of money they will be able to recover this year ten times the amount thus appropriated. They did ask for half a million dollars. There are only seven months left of the fiscal year, and this amount of $350,000 gives them $50,000 a month to carry on their investigations. One matter alone in which they are now interested would net to the treasury a sum at least three times the amount thus appropriated.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—to provide for payments in connection with movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof, $1,428,000.

Mr. NEILL: Under this item a bonus is to be paid on coal mined on Vancouver island for export and the bunker trade. I wish to ask whether it provides for a bonus at the rate originally contemplated of 25 cents per ton, or at the rate of one dollar per ton which I had some reason to hope the Prime Minister might agree to on further consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: Twenty-five cents a ton is the sum provided for under this estimate.

Mr. NEILL: Then I must take up ten minutes of the time of the house. I have seen a lot of time wasted to-day and this is not going to be wasted. It will take me a great deal longer if there are interruptions. This is one of the occasions, Mr. Chairman, when you can show yourself by keeping order.

The CHAIRMAN: It is pretty hard in certain circumstances.

Mr. NEILL: What does that mean?

The CHAIRMAN: The circumstances the hon. member referred to.

Mr. NEILL: When this matter was up before I was particularly careful to make no kind of political or other attack or criticism on the government. I merely pointed out that their policy was such and so, and that it apparently stopped short when it came to Vancouver island. Now that the government have definitely decided against us I still do not propose to waste the time of the house in reproaches against the government. It is a local matter, and while constituting a very bitter grievance it does not interest the members in the east. Also I want to lose no possible opportunity and to close no door through which we may still get relief.

I want to refer to three or four items. The Prime Minister, speaking the other day, said that it was one thing to be asked for aid to prevent an industry going to disaster, and another thing to encourage a new and thriving industry. I would point out that the coal mines on Vancouver island will average some forty years in age. Ten minutes before the Prime Minister made that remark his supporter from Cape Breton South, where the coal mines have been in operation for something like two hundred years, made the remark that the industry in his district was a dying industry—I have the Hansard here but I shall not take the time to quote his exact words—and must be rejuvenated or it would perish, and he congratulated the government on taking steps to prevent it dying; that was the word he used. If his argument is good and sound, and I admit that it is in regard to Nova Scotia, the same argument should be equally applicable to mines not one-fifth part of their age in British Columbia.

There are two matters which give me still some hope that the Prime Minister may give us at any rate some relief, in the matter of which I am speaking. While speaking of these coal mines at Nanaimo and in Cumberland he commented on the fact of how hard up these miners would be this winter. He said that the tales of poverty and destitution that had been told to him would almost justify the bonus of one dollar per ton which we were asking for, being given by way of a relief measure. Further, speaking directly to me, he informed me that his policy was a national policy and that wherever it was necessary compensating adjustments would be made. I tell him that here and now is the hour and the moment at which the compensating adjustments should be made, and this is the place in which to make them. They are obviously due now.

There was another feature in connection with this matter in respect to which I think a mistake arose in the Prime Minister's mind. It was in connection with lignite. At one place he said that in his opinion the lignite to which I had referred, coming into British Columbia from the state of Washington, was not true lignite, and therefore the matter was at an end.

Mr. GORDON: You mean from Bellingham?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, and from Newcastle in the state of Washington. He said that it was not lignite. In a sense that is true, but unfortunately it comes in as lignite. You cannot tell the difference between lignite and bituminous coal by looking at it. You must have some rule of thumb or scientific method of finding out the moisture content. I agree with the Minister of Mines that it is not lignite, but bituminous coal, but it is coming in and will continue to come in as lignite.

Mr. GORDON: What is the difference between bituminous coal and lignite?

Mr. NEILL: The difference is in the moisture content.

Mr. GORDON: How much difference is there between the two?

Mr. NEILL: It may be half of one per cent. When it was necessary to make a dividing line between lignite and bituminous coal—

Mr. BENNETT: It is six per cent or over.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, if it is six per cent moisture content or over it is classified as lignite, and if it is a fraction under six per cent it is classified as bituminous coal. That is the point I want to make. It is not the coal that is wrong; it is the definition. It is no use saying that that is not lignite because it is, so long as it comes in under the definition of lignite. What is needed to be changed is the definition, which was wrongly or carelessly made a number of years ago. I have the records here. I allude to one which the minister can check up. There was a special committee in 1926 investigating the coal resources of Canada, and on June 9, at page 179 will be found a reference to lignite and a description of the difference between it and bituminous coal. Dr. Camsell, the Deputy Minister of Mines, was giving evidence. I tried to pin him down. I asked him what was lignite, and he said that it was coal containing about ten per cent moisture. The definition says only six per cent, but I say that it was carelessly drawn at the time. Then I have statements from Mr. McLeish, who is one of the officials of the minister's department, and he says that it is quite possible, as the scientific classifications of coal are not sharply defined, that parliament if it so desired—the department itself could do it—could quite justifiably adopt seven per cent as the limiting point for lignite coal. The British Columbia chamber of commerce suggests eight per cent.

Mr. GORDON: What effect would that have on the movement of coal so far as we are concerned?

Mr. NEILL: As regards coal going from Alberta to the United States?

Mr. GORDON: Any place.

Mr. NEILL: If it was judiciously done it would keep their coal out and allow our coal to go into the United States.

Mr. GORDON: What does the hon. member mean by "judiciously done"?

Mr. NEILL: Not making it either ridiculously high or ridiculously low, as it is at present. If it were put at eight per cent it would probably exclude Bellingham coal. I have the records here of the coal coming in from the United States and the moisture content runs from 6.1, 6.2 and so forth. The definition could be changed to exclude Bellingham coal from Canada and allow southern Alberta coal to go into the United States.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. NEILL: No, it is not carried, and I consider it a piece of gratuitous impertinence, Mr. Chairman, for you to say so when a member is on his feet and speaking.

Unless the definition is changed this coal must come in as lignite. If the definition were changed it would help us materially. It would then come in as bituminous and carry a duty of 75 cents per ton. That would give us that trade, which amounted last year to 17,000 tons, not a very big amount, but still quite an item.

The other matter about which I think the minister was inadvertently mistaken was this. He stated that doing away with this lignite would do away with the grievance that I was alleging in connection with the countervailing duties. That is not so. The coal is not classified simply as coal when it goes into the United States, but as lignite or bituminous or anthracite, and a duty on one would not affect the other. There are two situations, the bituminous coal situation and the lignite situation. The lignite coal came in for years free of duty. The Finance minister in his budget the other day put on a duty of 40 cents a ton. Later he took that off, so we are left exactly as we were before, with no duty on lignite entering Canada and no duty on the Canadian products entering the United States. It would help us if it was classified properly and made liable to the bituminous duty.

The bituminous coal situation was this. We paid a duty of 50 cents a ton going into the United States, on a countervailing basis. When we raised our duty from 50 cents to 75 cents a ton, automatically, without any action by congress, the Americans raised their duty to 75 cents also. That cuts off a trade for us, not of 17,000 tons, but of 48,850 tons. That was the shipment of that class of coal into the United States last year. I am entitled I think to say that we will certainly lose that trade. I shall not give the figures now because I gave them before, but it means a loss of about $270,000 a year. It is easy to find the remedy. It would be to put the duty back on again, but the Finance Minister cannot do that without upsetting the whole fabric of his fuel policy. It would affect the situation in Nova Scotia. I do not ask him to change the duty again. The obvious thing to do is to give us a compensating adjustment, as he readily can, to take care of the injury we suffer by the operation of this policy. I am still slow to believe that the Prime Minister, once he understands the matter thoroughly, will refuse to remedy this grievance, especially as he is committed to a policy that demands precisely this action. The increased duty on coal in the east and the increased subsidy with respect to railway transportation call for a compensating adjustment which, as I say, we have not been given. He may help us with the lignite, but that is a small matter; the main thing would be to raise the bonus to $1 a ton. He has denied that request, but even yet there is a possibility of helping to some extent by giving this bonus of $1 a ton out of the relief fund. That would be a cheap way of doing it, because it is far better to keep men working steadily at fair wages, even though they work only three days a week, than to cut them off completely and have to give them a dole. So I say the money could be taken out of the relief grant with great satisfaction and benefit.

Mr. GORDON: How much will the mines get under the present bonus?

Mr. NEILL: They will get about $25,000 and lose a trade of $293,000. Of course this aid by way of relief would not be so satisfactory to us as assistance given under the other policy, for this reason: Coal mines are not like corner grocery stores; they must lay their plans for months and years ahead, and if this money were granted out of the relief fund it would be liable to peter out next November, or certainly next March because this act does not operate after that, whereas the policy applied to the eastern and Alberta coal mines runs until 1932, so it would not be nearly so satisfactory. Still, as a drowning man grasps at a straw, certainly it would help us and would relieve the situation there during the coming winter, so I would earnestly implore the Prime Minister to give this request his consideration.

I have only a word more to say, and I am going to quote the Prime Minister. As I said before, he stated that conditions there would almost warrant this money being taken out of the relief fund, and further he said that where adjustments were necessary they would be granted. A day or two ago the right hon. gentleman spoke about the bonus on wheat being a compensating adjustment for the taxes the wheat growers paid through the higher tariff. This is exactly the same situation; I am asking for a compensating adjustment for the loss we have sustained through the increased duty on coal, which cuts us off from a profitable market in the United States. Curiously enough the price of a ton of coal represents twenty bushels of wheat; the bonus on twenty bushels of wheat comes to $1, and we are asking a bonus of $1 a ton.

If some measure of this kind is not introduced it cannot be denied that the government has been unfair to the industry and unfair to the district. I think in all moderation I could go further and say they have been untrue to the promises made at election time and to the very pronounced and definite pledges given in their platform. I know there are occasions when prime ministers, governments and sometimes candidates make promises in all good faith which they are unable to carry out because of subsequent circumstances, but that is not so in this case.

The government of the day has found a remedy for the coal situation in Canada, but it has not been applied as far as British Columbia is concerned. I can see no excuse for them; they have the support of the provincial government and of a very large number of public bodies. The responsibility must be with the government. I have done my best and I am willing to believe the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) when he says he has done everything he can. The result is in the hands of the government.

Item agreed to.

Loan to the Quebec harbour commissioners for the construction of harbour improvements and terminal facilities, including renewals and repairs, additional to the amount authorized by the Quebec Harbour Loan Act, 1928, notwithstanding the limitation expressed in the last phrase of section 2 of the said act, but to be otherwise subject to the provisions of the said act, $500,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am heartily in favour of this item and supported the request for it. Of course one of the main arguments in its favour is that it will help relieve unemployment in the city of Quebec. I am sorry the Minister of Marine is not here, but my colleague from Quebec city, the Solicitor General is here, and I would like him to give me the assurance that Liberal unemployed will have a chance to work on the harbour works as well as Conservative unemployed.

Mr. GORDON: One hundred per cent.

Mr. DUPRE: Is the question addressed to me? I am not the Minister of Marine, but I may say that certainly we will do as well as my hon. friends did when in power; we will treat everyone with the same justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is a question of helping the unemployed; I should like to know whether they will be considered. I am a little afraid, because since the last election many Liberal workers have lost their jobs there.

Mr. STEVENS: Is that possible?

Some hon. MEMBER: Good.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Somebody says "good," but I would not like to think that money voted for the relief of unemployment would go only to Tories.

Mr. DUPRE: If the Liberals were put out of their jobs I may say that in 1921, in 1925 and in 1926 Conservative workmen also were put out of work, but that is not the question. The unemployed will be dealt with justly, irrespective of political creed.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Neill.]

Experimental farms, $2,325,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I ask a question with regard to item 112?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 112 has been carried.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot carry them in that way.

The CHAIRMAN: No one objected when it was called.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I object, just for a moment.

Mr. BENNETT: These estimates have been discussed very much longer than any other agricultural estimates have been discussed, and if this is to continue I do not intend to attempt to prorogue on Sunday morning.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was just going to ask the Prime Minister whether he wished to prorogue to-night. If he does I am not going to stand in his way.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank the former Minister of Agriculture. I did mention the matter to his leader and it was thought we might be able to do so, but time is passing very rapidly, and the deputy of His Excellency was asked to come about eleven o'clock. Many circumstances combined, perhaps, to take up more time than was expected; for instance, I promised two of my hon. friends an opportunity to discuss some other matters. If it is desired that the house should sit on Monday I will accommodate myself to that desire; otherwise if we can dispose of the business in the next few minutes we might prorogue to-night.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not going to take the responsibility of holding this house over until Monday, nor am I going to take the responsibility of engaging in this midnight farce. A proper discussion of these items cannot be undertaken in this way, so I am just going to let the chairman call the items out and the Prime Minister call them "carried" while I sit by, look on and behold the procession go by.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry I cannot let that remark pass; I should like to do so but I cannot, because of the government. No items have been more fully discussed in this house since I have been here than those of the Department of Agriculture this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I beg to differ with my right hon. friend. They were discussed on four different days; there was one return asked for having to do with the total production of milk for the last ten years, and that return was not supplied to the committee until the fourth day. When it was supplied by the minister the discussion ceased.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is not a correct statement. According to Hansard it was asked for on May 28 and was produced on May 29.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was produced on the fourth day after being asked for.

Mr. DONNELLY: In regard to the time taken in discussing these agricultural estimates, I do not think there is any more important subject to discuss. We spent most of our time in committee discussing this question of dairying; I think if we did spend three days it was well spent, and we can spend a longer time at it. There are many other things that should be taken up and discussed, and I do not think it should be left to the last minute of the last hour of the last day to bring up the rest of the estimates of agriculture and ask us to put them through in two or three minutes. They should have been brought up some days ago. We spent time in other less important discussions, and this all important question, a question of importance to the greater part of the Dominion, should not be dismissed summarily.

Mr. VALLANCE: The next item has to do with live stock. The present Minister of Agriculture has announced on various occasions a new agricultural policy along live stock lines, and it should be fully discussed. We have not discussed in committee the marketing of farm products. No report has been concurred in by this house and no opportunity has been given to members who are particularly interested, representing agricultural constituencies, to deal with the subject in the manner in which it ought to be dealt with. I am absolutely in agreement with the hon. member for Willow Bunch.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: This cannot possibly go on. I think the right hon. gentleman will agree that more time has been given to agriculture this year than in any year, at least since I have been in the house. Agriculture has been the subject of study by a special committee and all these matters have been under consideration. If hon. gentlemen have taken up more time on one item than another, the blame cannot be put on the government. This house has not sat after eleven o'clock except on two occasions, and the business has been conducted in a proper and orderly manner. I do not, therefore, propose to have the house prorogued when hon. gentlemen say that they have not had an opportunity for discussion. They have had an opportunity and if they have not taken advantage of it they cannot blame the government. I have the pages of Hansard taken up in discussion, and for every page covered by the whole of the government forces two pages have been covered by the opposition. That is the record. Under these circumstances, if hon. gentlemen say that they desire an opportunity for further discussion of agriculture on Monday, I shall certainly move that the committee rise and report progress. If they are satisfied with the discussion that has taken place in the special committee, in this house, and in this committee, then I will endeavour, although it is difficult, to prorogue the house before midnight.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Some days ago it was intimated that an opportunity would be afforded to discuss the tariff items of last September. There are some members who wish to discuss those items and who will not be able to do so. It is not my intention to take up the time of the house but I do want to commend to the Prime Minister the address delivered on June 12 and also the address of June 15, and to ask him to consider the remarks that were made then. The condition has not changed since that time; in fact, it has become worse. If you read the newspaper reports since that time you will see that the people of this country are in a worse position possibly than they were then. I ask the Prime Minister to consider those addresses and to take proper action, as he has intimated that he will do, under section 18 of the act which he has passed at this session of parliament.

Item agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the committee have leave to sit again?

Mr. BENNETT: Next sitting.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: I move the adjournment of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will it be eleven o'clock on Monday or three o'clock in the afternoon?

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to move that the house stand adjourned until either eleven o'clock or three o'clock, as the right hon. gentleman thinks his friends desire. If they wish to talk from eleven o'clock to one o'clock, discussing the items, very well; if not, the house will meet at three o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has shown his capacity to make decisions. He had better say which

Mr. BENNETT: Eleven o'clock, so that hon. members may have an opportunity to discuss the estimates on agriculture.

Mr. SPEAKER: This house stands adjourned until Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, August 3, 1931.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION AS TO REGULARITY OF PROCEDURE RESPECTING ELEVEN O'CLOCK SITTING ON MONDAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question respecting the privileges of this house. Standing order 2 reads as follows:

The time for the meeting of the house is at three o'clock in the afternoon of each sitting day . . . .

As hon. members know, and as you Mr. Speaker are aware, that rule cannot be changed except with the unanimous consent of the house and by resolution to that effect. No motion has been put to this house to alter that rule with regard to the sitting of the commons to-day, and I submit that in the absence of a formal resolution, duly passed and assented to, the whole proceedings of this House of Commons would be irregular. I should be very sorry to see this parliament break up with a violation of the rules of the house as its last act, particularly where the effect might be to render irregular all the business done this morning, if not also possibly the business of prorogation itself.

Let me read what took place on Saturday evening last with respect to adjournment. Hansard, at page 4516, records the following:

Mr. Bennett: I move the adjournment of the house.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Will it be eleven o'clock on Monday or three o'clock in the afternoon?

Mr. Bennett: I was going to move that the house stand adjourned until either eleven o'clock or three o'clock, as the right hon. gentleman thinks his friends desire. If they wish to talk from eleven o'clock to one o'clock, discussing the items, very well; if not, the house will meet at three o'clock.

Mr. Mackenzie King: My right hon. friend has shown his capacity to make decisions. He had better say which.

Mr. Bennett: Eleven o'clock, so that hon. members may have an opportunity to discuss the estimates on agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: This house stands adjourned until Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

I think that record makes it very clear that no motion was put to suspend the rule of the house with regard to sitting at three o'clock, and that to that end the unanimous consent of the house was not so much as even asked, but that the Prime Minister himself declared that the house would sit at eleven o'clock. In view of that fact I am more than surprised that in the votes and proceedings of Saturday I should find the following record of the alleged proceedings of the house, at page 685:

On motion of Mr. Bennett, it was resolved,—That when the house adjourns this day it do stand adjourned until Monday next, at eleven o'clock a.m.

That is not a correct statement, Mr. Speaker, of what took place in this house. There was no motion made by the Prime Minister to suspend standing order 2, as the record of the house shows.

Mr. BENNETT: These Journals are the record of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the Prime Minister now says the Journals of the house are the record, but unfortunately in this case, the Journals are not accurate. That is what I am taking exception to with regard to the privileges of this house, that someone, with no authority from this House of Commons, has included in the Journals a record of a motion which was never introduced in this house, never made and never passed. In the name of the rights of the commons I demand that this part of the record, as it here appears, shall be effaced. If the Prime Minister desires to have the proceedings of parliament conducted in a regular way he should formally put to the house a motion asking that standing order No. 2 be suspended in order that the house be permitted to sit this morning. I shall do what I can to secure for such a motion unanimous consent. I submit that unless that motion is put and agreed to as regularizing proceedings, in order that to-day's proceedings may be regular it will be necessary to adjourn this house until three o'clock, which is the time fixed for the regular sitting. As Your Honour very well knows, notice has to be given of a motion of this kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But notice has to be given of a motion to change the time of sitting.

Mr. BENNETT: Not when the hour is fixed at adjournment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Notice has to be given to change any rule of the house; the Prime Minister knows that very well. He knows that the rules of the house required that before this house could sit on Saturday last a notice had to be made to suspend standing order No. 2 in order to give the house authority to sit. In the same way a motion must be made formally and passed by this house in order to give the house authority to sit in the morning today.

Let me make it perfectly clear that I am not raising this point to prolong the proceedings of this parliament further than may be necessary. I would go as far as to say that I would advise hon. members on this side of the house, if a motion is formally put to suspend standing order No. 2 and that the house sit at eleven o'clock this morning, to give their unanimous consent, but I am going to request as emphatically as I can that this alleged resolution, which appears in the votes and proceedings, which was never passed and which has no right to appear in the votes and proceedings of Saturday, August 1, be deleted, and that the records of this parliament be a faithful and true record of what transpires in this house. On Saturday last a measure was put through this House of Commons which removed the necessity of parliament meeting for a period of seven months. That is serious enough. So long as parliament continues to be sitting, if it is at all possible so to do I propose to see as far as I can that the commons exercises its rights at least in regard to its own business and that a faithful and true record is given in the Journals of parliament with respect to what transpires.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I cannot say that I am at all surprised at the observations of the right hon. gentleman; they are wholly in keeping with what I would expect, but the record shows that the Journals correctly record what transpired. At page 4516, from which the right hon. gentleman read, it will be observed that I started to move the adjournment of the house when my right hon. friend asked, "Until when?" It was he who raised that very question, speaking for the opposition as I assumed, and no question came from any other quarter of the house. Thereupon I said I was going to move that the house stand adjourned until either eleven o'clock or three o'clock, whichever the right hon. gentleman and his friends might prefer, whereupon he said:

> My right hon. friend has shown his capacity to make decisions. He had better say which.

I said eleven o'clock, therefore, and the motion was that when the house met on Monday it would meet at eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was no motion; my right hon. friend said—

Mr. BENNETT: It is here; I moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not there.

Mr. BENNETT: It is here, and what is more the excitement of the right hon. gentleman is not in keeping with the calm repose that should mark an occasion of this character, the last day of the present session. The fact is that I did not conclude the motion to adjourn by fixing the hour at which we should meet this day; I asked my right hon. friend, as a matter of courtesy, to fix the hour having regard to the fact that his friends had said they had not been given an opportunity to discuss these items. When I extended that invitation my right hon. friend said, "No, do it yourself," whereupon I said eleven o'clock in order that there might be no question. The house thereupon accepted that motion unanimously.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The house did not accept it.

Mr. BENNETT: It was accepted unanimously, when I said I would suggest the hour of eleven o'clock. The Speaker, in the Journals, recorded the arrangement arrived at, the considered decision of the house given unanimously, to which no objection was taken. If it had been otherwise; if a single suggestion had been made that the proper time would have been three o'clock, we should not have met until that hour. I invited my right hon. friend to suggest the hour he preferred, but he declined that invitation and the Speaker recorded what took place, namely that this house agreed to adjourn until Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

There is only one man in this chamber who will see any doubt about that. That was the understanding arrived at; I, having moved the adjournment, was about to indicate the hour on Monday when my right hon. friend interrupted and asked whether it would be eleven o'clock or three o'clock. Could anything be more significant than that? What did the right hon. gentleman mean by asking in this house on Saturday night whether we would meet at eleven o'clock or three o'clock? Now he says it was neither. I met his views by saying I would make it whichever he chose, and when he told me to make my own decision I said eleven o'clock so that hon. members would have an opportunity to discuss these items. Whereupon, in pursuance of that consent, Mr. Speaker said, "This house stands adjourned until Monday morning at eleven o'clock." Could anything be more clear than that? If there was any objection or if the right hon. gentleman did not mean what he said he should have so stated then. If the right hon. gentleman desired to play fast and loose that was the time to do so, not now. If he desired to make a joke of the proceedings of this house that was the time to do so, not now. He asked, "When will you meet on Monday, at eleven o'clock or three o'clock?" He did not ask me what were my views; I was in the position, as leader of the house, of merely consulting the house as to what would meet its convenience. My right hon. friend himself said Monday; he himself said eleven o'clock; he himself said three o'clock, and all I did was to ask him what would best suit his convenience. Mr. Speaker recorded the decision arrived at and consented to by this house. The house has been opened in accordance with the common agreement arrived at and understood by everybody, except possibly in the subtleties of the right hon. gentleman's mind, and after having asked at what hour on Monday we would meet; after having left it to me; after I said eleven o'clock, I cannot think that my right hon. friend should now come to this chamber seriously and so stultify himself as to suggest that we are not here at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid that in this matter, in order to make it clear I will have to ask Your Honour to advise the house whether you put any formal resolution that we should sit on Monday morning at eleven o'clock. You, sir, know the rules of this house as to the necessity of a formal motion being put, and I am prepared to abide by whatever you say as to what you did on Saturday evening. I do wish to make clear that my right hon. friend's own words, which he quoted a few moments ago, bear out the contention I have been making that no motion was put. He said:

> I was going to move that the house stand adjourned until either eleven o'clock or three o'clock, as the right hon. gentleman thinks his friends desire.

The Prime Minister said, "I was going to move." He never did make that motion which to enable the house to sit at eleven would have had to include the suspension of standing order No. 2; he did not make any motion, which is made very clear by the record. My right hon. friend now says in reference to your action, Mr. Speaker, that you took the view that the house agreed to stand adjourned until Monday at eleven o'clock. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there were no words of yours which indicated that there was an agreement, and you never used the expression "agrees to stand adjourned." You simply put the motion for the adjournment of the house. The Prime Minister had said eleven o'clock, so that hon. members might have an opportunity to discuss the estimates on agriculture. We recall the nature of the proceedings on Saturday evening. The Prime Minister took the business of the house out of your hands, Mr. Speaker, and into his own; he simply stated that we should meet at eleven o'clock, and that was the end of it. No motion whatever was put. Now, I do not think it is very fitting on the part of my right hon. friend, when I draw attention to this matter in order to regularize the proceedings, to save him from his own impetuous and dictatorial acts, and point out emphatically to him and to the house that the whole proceedings of this House of Commons this morning might be violated by virtue of—

Mr. BENNETT: What a joke.

Mr MACKENZIE KING: —the fact that no resolution was passed—I do not think he should take occasion to follow his usual course of delivering a lecture to anyone who ventures to make mention of any shortcomings on his part, especially where it is only to point out where, in the excitement of the moment, he omitted to have regard to one of the important rules of the house.

Mr. BOWMAN: Why did not the right hon. gentleman question the proceedings on Saturday night?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the first place, it was not my business so to do—

Mr. BENNETT: You agreed to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and in the second place there was no opportunity so to do. Had there been a little time, had some consideration been shown and had we been allowed to discuss the matter, I certainly would have pointed out to my right hon. friend that a unanimous resolution of the house was necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: So there was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend cannot deny that on several occasions during this session I have sent word to him, or crossed over to him myself and pointed out where something in the proceedings had been irregular, or threatened so to be, and that some necessary step would have to be taken to regularize matters. I have done that because I realize from experience how difficult is the position of the Prime Minister, with the multitude of things to which he must give his attention. But there was no opportunity for anything like that on Saturday night. The conclusion of affairs took place in a few minutes, I should say seconds, and no one was afforded any opportunity to speak. The Prime Minister said, "It will be eleven o'clock," and that was all there was to it.

Mr. LAVERGNE: May I point out that there was a terrible noise while his honour was putting the motion. I remember speaking to my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. McDade) at the time. As I say, there was considerable noise while His Honour was putting the motion and, absentminded, I was under the impression that I was still in the chair and so I called for order. I remember remarking to Mr. McDade, "I am absentminded; I am under the impression that I am still in the chair and am calling for order". But I remember His Honour putting the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: His Honour did not put any motion and I leave it to him to say whether or not he did. His Honour said:

This house stands adjourned until Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

That was what His Honour said. Why has Hansard no record of a motion to meet at eleven o'clock?

Mr. STEVENS: It is on record.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The right hon. gentleman knows that Hansard is not a correct report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the hon. gentleman will see that it is a correct report. After the proceedings were over that night I said to my secretary, "I think it was an extraordinary thing that the Prime Minister did not put a formal motion to suspend standing order No. 2 with regard to the matter of meeting at eleven o'clock".

An hon. MEMBER: There was such a motion.

Mr. BENNETT: I made the motion and it was agreed to by consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want to take up more time than is necessary, but my purpose is to regularize this morning's proceedings, and if hon. gentlemen wish to have this house continue in session this morning, notwithstanding the record of Hansard, which does not show any motion having been put to suspend standing order No. 2 and thereby run the risk of the fact of violation of the rules of the house and of a bad precedent being established for all time, well and good. But as leader of the opposition I am doing my part to maintain the rules of the house, and so to regularize matters as to enable the business to be proceeded with. Let me repeat, I am quite prepared—

Mr. LAVERGNE: May I say that my hon. friend from Northumberland also remembers the incident.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The record is there and speaks for itself. But may I say that if the necessary motion is formally put, to enable this house, by unanimous consent, to sit this morning, I will ask all hon. members on this side to support the motion. I do say, however, that the first duty of the House of Commons is to maintain its rules. Your Honour, as Speaker, is primarily responsible in that regard; and I leave it to the word of Your Honour, as Speaker, whether any motion was put into your hands with respect to the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: Put into his hands!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will not say put into his hands, then, but whether any motion was formally put.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is there on Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister says the motion was put. I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether he himself formally put the necessary motion that the house should meet at eleven o'clock by unanimous consent. If Mr. Speaker says he did put that motion I have nothing else to say.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I did not hear all that went on on Saturday night, but I understood that by consent we were to meet at eleven o'clock. But may I ask this question: If we have no right to be sitting this morning, is not the suggestion of the leader of the opposition also out of order?

An hon. MEMBER: He is trying to make the proceedings in order.

Mr. BENNETT: That would not make it in order; that would be a joke.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If we are not regularly in session this morning we can no more pass a resolution to the effect of the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition than we can proceed to anything else.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The leader of the opposition bases his whole argument on the assertion that no motion was made for adjournment. He also—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not for adjournment; I did not say anything of the kind. I said that no motion was made to obtain unanimous consent for the house to sit at eleven o'clock instead of at three o'clock—in other words, to suspend standing order 2 of this House of Commons. The motion that was needed was a motion to suspend order No. 2.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman rests his case on the fact that there is an absence of that motion. He also takes Hansard as the basis upon which he rests his contention. As a matter of fact, it is well known that the Journals of the house are the official records. But, taking Hansard, the record is so abundantly clear that the right hon. gentleman must see he has not a scintilla of evidence to support his position. At page 4516 of Hansard the incident is reported under the heading:

Adjournment—Business of the House

That is the usual heading under which the adjournment is reported.

Mr. Bennett: I move the adjournment of the house.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That motion was before the house. It is not a debatable motion, but from time immemorial it has always been permitted the leader of the opposition to query the leader of the house as to the business of the next sitting, and any little matter of that kind. Before the Speaker had an opportunity to put the motion in the usual and regular way the right hon. gentleman asked a question:

Mr. Mackenzie King: Will it be eleven o'clock on Monday or three o'clock in the afternoon?

That was speaking to the motion for adjournment. I remember very well sitting beside my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett); and when he said, "I move the adjournment of the house", his sentence was not complete at the time. But we will not raise that point. The record shows a period there; we will not discuss whether it should be a period or whether it should be a dash. Then the leader of the opposition asks, in a perfectly proper way:

Mr. Mackenzie King: Will it be eleven o'clock on Monday or three o'clock in the afternoon?

Mr. Bennett: I was going to move that the house stand adjourned until either eleven o'clock or three o'clock, as the right hon. gentleman thinks his friends desire. If they wish to talk from eleven o'clock to one o'clock, discussing the items, very well; if not, the house will meet at three o'clock.

That was giving an opportunity to the right hon. gentleman to indicate what his friends wished which is a common arrangement or practice followed in the house. The right hon. gentleman replied:

Mr. Mackenzie King: My right hon. friend has shown his capacity to make decisions. He had better say which.

The Prime Minister then said:

Mr. Bennett: Eleven o'clock, so that hon. members may have an opportunity to discuss the estimates on agriculture.

This is on the motion to adjourn the house —a motion which was still undecided and still properly and officially before the house; and no other business could intervene until that motion was disposed of. He spoke in the usual and regular fashion, and he is reported in Hansard as saying:

This house stands adjourned until Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

There was absolutely no objection; there was a general and complete understanding that we were to meet again at eleven o'clock on Monday to carry on the business of the house. A meticulous examination of the Journals, or of Hansard, which is the unofficial record of the house, will disclose no grounds to support the right hon. gentleman. When he invites the Speaker to say this or that on his word of honour, I submit that Your Honour must be guided by what actually occurred and what is shown by the Journals of the house. The record is abundantly clear. I must say that I am amazed at the right hon. gentleman raising this point. What is to be gained by it? Nothing whatever. There is no doubt that all hon. members are anxious to conclude the business of the house and to get away. If there was any objection to be raised to meeting at eleven o'clock this morning, the time to have raised it was when the right hon. gentleman was courteously invited so to do. He did not do so; he left it to the Prime Minister to decide, and the Prime Minister named eleven o'clock. The motion to adjourn was before the house at the moment and there was nothing further which could have been done by the Prime Minister or by the Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I could make my purpose still more clear by referring to the procedure which was adopted when the house received permission to sit on Saturday morning. Hansard of Wednesday, July 29, 1931, at page 4273, under the heading "Business of the House" has the following to say:

Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister): I cannot say what progress will be made with the business of the house, but I thought it desirable that we should provide for a sitting on Saturday morning next at eleven o'clock, as we may likely conclude business that day. With the consent of the house I shall move the motion, or I shall put it on the order for consideration to-morrow as the house may think desirable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

What was said by the Prime Minister on Saturday night is to all intents and purposes in accordance with what up to this point he said on July 29. In other words, the Prime Minister expressed his intention of moving that we should sit on Saturday and when it became apparent that there would be no objection, then the Prime Minister made a formal motion as follows:

Mr. Bennett: I beg to move:

That on Saturday first August next, the house shall meet at eleven o'clock in the morning. That in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission from one to three o'clock, p.m., and that the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Friday.

That motion was formally adopted by this house by unanimous consent. That is what gave us permission to sit on Saturday morning, it should have included words suspending standing order No. 2; that is what regularizes all the proceedings of Saturday. A similar motion was not put on Saturday night.

Mr. BENNETT: Because no notice is required with respect to adjournment—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly not.

Mr. BENNETT: —nor the business of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A notice is required to suspend standing order 2.

Mr. BENNETT: No notice is required to fix the hour for sitting. Surely my right hon. friend must admit that he is estopped from repudiating what he agreed to the other night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The rule of the house is:

The time for the meeting of the house is at three o'clock in the afternoon of each sitting day.

That standing order cannot be changed except by formal motion such as was put on Wednesday last with respect to the sitting on Saturday.

Mr. BENNETT: The decision is the other way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apart from there being no record of any motion in regard to the suspension of standing order No. 2, I can see no justification whatever for the votes and proceedings purporting to report a motion which was never put to this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the discussion has gone far enough. It is true that under standing order 2 the time for the meeting of the house is three o'clock in the afternoon, but if hon. members will refer to standing order 45 they will find the following:

Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper, but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house.

No notice is required of a resolution with reference to the meeting or adjournment of the house. That would seem to settle that point in the controversy.

It was very clear to me on Saturday night that all parties present agreed that this house should meet again at eleven o'clock this morning. As is quoted in Hansard, a discussion on the point took place between the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the right hon., the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). The leader of the opposition leaves it to me to say whether or not I put the motion. My recollection is that I did put the motion. That is as far as I can go; if I was put on oath I would not be prepared to swear that I did, and I was astonished to see that the motion was not reported in Hansard. After all, Hansard is not the official record and we must be guided by the votes and proceedings, which reports:

On motion of Mr. Bennett, it was resolved,—That when the house adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, at eleven o'clock, a.m.

I think the house is bound by that record, and I do not think the proceedings will be irregular if we proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If Your Honour says that you put the necessary motion, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SPEAKER: As to whether or not a motion should now be made is a matter entirely for the government, the Prime Minister and the house. I am in the hands of the house as to that.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk):

ST. EMILE POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Who asked for the appointment of Mr. Azarias Rivest, to replace Mr. Adolphe Grenier as postmaster of St. Emile, in the county of Montcalm?
2. Was Mr. Emile Provost appointed in his stead, and if so, why, and for what reason did Mr. Rivest not take charge of his office?
3. Who asked for the cancellation of Mr. Azarias Rivest's appointment, were complaints made against him, and if so, by whom?

Mr. RHODES (for Mr. Sauvé):

1. Mr. C. E. Jeannotte of Mascouche.
2. Yes. Mr. C. E. Jeannotte had first recommended Mr. Provost but the department had raised certain objections. It was found later that the objections no longer existed and instructions issued in accordance with the original recommendation.
3. Appointment cancelled in view of Mr. Provost's appointment. There were no complants against Mr. Rivest.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WESTERN CLOCK COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. BOUCHARD:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams passing between the Western Clock Company Limited, of Peterborough, or any official of the company, and the Minister of Finance, and to any other member of the Dominion government, during the year 1931.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion not being in proper order, it will be expunged.

[Mr. Speaker.]

GASPESIA RAILROAD

Mr. LARUE:

For a copy of the report of Mr. S. A. Desmeules, civil engineer, regarding the possibility of building a railroad in the inland part of Gaspesia.

Mr. BENNETT: This motion asks for departmental communications, and the house has decided that such communications cannot be asked for by an hon. member. I stated the position of the government the other day, and as the hon. member is not in his place this motion might be dropped.

Motion dropped.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT

SUGGESTION THAT NEXT SESSION BE CALLED EARLY IN JANUARY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will my right hon. friend consider favourably between now and the beginning of next year the calling of parliament early in the month of January instead of at a later time in the year. Of course, my right hon. friend has the decision in this matter but I believe he will be meeting the wishes of all hon. members of this house and will be doing what would be most in accord with the needs of the country if he would bring parliament together at the latest very early in the new year.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman had control of the calling of parliament for some nine or ten years, and from 1922 up to date parliament met as follows:

March 8, 1922.
January 31, 1923.
February 28, 1924.
February 5, 1925.
January 7, 1926.
December 9, 1926.
January 20, 1928.
February 7, 1929.
February 20, 1930.

The right hon. gentleman is fully aware of the change of Governors General which took place and matters of that sort which caused a delay in the calling of parliament this year. The convenience of hon. members and the needs of public business will be considered when the house is called to transact business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first date —the only one in March—to which my right hon. friend has referred is the day on which parliament was called after a general election which was held in the month of December.

With the exception of that single date the house met frequently in January, and when in February, it was called at an early date. I am not referring to the late date at which parliament was called this year, but rather to what is desirable as regards the coming year. My right hon. friend even with the house meeting in January, will have five or six months without any session of parliament, and I again express the hope that he will find it possible to call parliament in the month of January, if indeed necessity does not compel him to call parliament sooner.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

TEST SHIPMENTS OF GRAIN THROUGH CHURCHILL THIS SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, as this will be the last opportunity, I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) if satisfactory arrangements have been made for the volume of wheat to make a test shipment from Churchill through the bay.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have received no communication from anyone wanting to make a shipment of wheat from Churchill except that to which I have referred, a telegram from the On-to-the-Bay Association which stated that they had control of 150,000 bushels of wheat, which would make about half a cargo. Speaking for the government, I may say that we are endeavouring and will continue to endeavour within the next two or three days—it must be done immediately—to arrange this matter. No help that I know of has been received from anyone in the western provinces, and it should be from that part of the country that the cargoes should come.

MINISTER OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of the session the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) indicated that the arrangement of having the Minister of Labour occupy a seat in the Senate was to be temporary and that his intention was to have the Minister of Labour occupy a seat in this House of Commons. May I ask my right hon. friend whether between now and next session he will endeavour so to readjust the portfolios or existing arrangements as to make possible the presence in this House of Commons of whoever holds the portfolio of Minister of Labour. It must be wholly apparent that the most important question to-day in this country is the labour question, and it is of importance that hon. members of this house should have in this chamber the presence of whoever fills the office of Minister of Labour. Otherwise it will be quite impossible for us to discuss many all important matters or even to obtain information required with respect to labour matters in a manner most desirable in the public interest.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the onerous duties of the Minister of Labour have been discharged by the present incumbent of that office with such satisfaction to this country and such credit to himself and the government that at the moment I am not prepared to make any statement. It is desirable that this House of Commons should have control over many matters but during the time when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was Prime Minister the Secretary of State was in the Senate for a considerable number of years. During that same period the Minister of Justice in the person of Sir Oliver Mowat was in the Senate, if my memory serves me aright. It is desirable that the Senate should in some sense be made a body of considerable importance in view of existing circumstances and also in view of the Senate reform that has been proceeding in the last ten years. Under those circumstances, I can give no assurance when the government will take such action as may be thought desirable in the public interest.

MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask another question in regard to a matter which affects the cabinet. May we assume from all that has been said that when parliament re-assembles the Prime Minister will have in his cabinet someone other than himself who will be performing the duties of Minister of Finance?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): That is probable.

FREIGHT RATES ON COAL

SUBVENTION ON SASKATCHEWAN COAL SHIPMENTS TO MANITOBA AND ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Has the Prime Minister anything further to report with regard to the amount of the subvention that will be paid for the removal of coal from the Saskatchewan coal fields to Manitoba and Ontario? A few days ago he said that the question was under consideration.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It has been, but in view of the pressure of work in the house the Minister of Mines (Mr. Gordon) has not been able to arrive at any conclusion. He informed me, however, on Saturday, that the matter was still engaging his attention and he thought that some satisfactory arrangement could probably be reached.

INDIANS—INFANTILE PARALYSIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Timiskaming): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of the Interior in regard to infantile paralysis that is prevalent amongst the Indians in the Moose Factory section. I understand an aeroplane was sent to that region with serum?

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): A quantity of serum has been sent by aeroplane into the district affected; I understand the disease is well under control.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATION OF CANADA AT APPROACHING MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Last week I asked my right hon. friend if he could indicate to the house and to the country who would be the representatives of Canada at the meeting of the League of Nations this year. He said that he could not give the information last week but he would be able to do so this week. He said that a decision had been made with regard to one of the members, but he did not wish to announce any names until the representatives were all decided upon. Is he in a position now to indicate who will be the representatives of Canada at the league. With respect to the one representative with regard to whom the decision has been made is that himself or someone else?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I cannot give my right hon. friend the information he desires, and I am certain he must know me well enough to appreciate the fact that under existing conditions nothing would induce me to leave this country to go to the League of Nations or any other body across the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very glad to hear that.

[Mr. R. McKenzie.]

AIR MAIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Since the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) is not in his seat, could or would the Prime Minister inform the house and the country as to the approximate date when the government will be able to arrive at a decision in connection with air mail routes in the west?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Between now and August 15 there will be an immediate curtailment of air mail service in western Canada and in other parts of the country as well.

JASPER PARK—MOUNT ROBSON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): May I ask the Minister of the Interior if any progress has been made with the government of British Columbia in the matter of including Mount Robson in the Jasper Park area? Has the matter been under consideration?

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): An offer of Mount Robson has been made by the British Columbia government to the Dominion government. The matter is still under consideration.

SUPPLY

DRAINAGE OF WATERHEN LAKE—TERMINAL OF HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the order:

House again in committee of supply (the message of His Excellency with estimates, supplementary, and further estimates, referred).

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss one or two questions. It is somewhat late to bring them up, but it is never too late to mend. First I wish to refer to a reference made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) in his maiden speech in this house and to a reply which was given to a question of mine on May 13, 1931, with reference to a certain lake in the riding of the hon. minister called Waterhen lake. Before discussing that I wish to give notice to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) of a little matter that I propose to discuss with him. It is with respect to a statement he made regarding the Hudson Bay railway and the alleged approval of the Hon. George P. Graham of the port of Nelson. The minister will have time to look that up while I am discussing the other question. I refer him to pages 1879 and 1883 of Hansard of May 22 of this year.

Mr. MANION: I shall not have time to look it up because there is no staff on duty.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am giving my hon. friend more notice than he gave me, for I was absent the other day when he brought this matter up, the first day I have been absent this session.

Mr. MANION: Go ahead. I do not think anybody pays any attention to the hon. gentleman anyway.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will see whether the minister pays any attention or not before I am through with him.

With respect to the Waterhen lake trouble, the Minister of Agriculture intimated in his speech that the former Minister of the Interior in the late government, the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) and myself, were responsible for the drainage of this lake. I was in hopes that the minister would have felt some contrition of conscience, some repentance with respect to that monstrous statement of his and would correct it, but he has not done so. Now that we are on the last day of the session—

Mr. SPEAKER: On what is the hon. gentleman basing his remarks? There is no motion before the house at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Was there not a motion to go into supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not heard it made.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought I saw you, Mr. Speaker, rising to leave the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: The clerk assistant called the order and I thought the motion had been made. However, to remove any doubt, I now move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the chair for the purpose of enabling the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is this the correct time now for me to speak, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am glad that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is regarding the rules of the house. He was not so particular in connection with the recent suggestion of my right hon. leader.

The Minister of Agriculture in his speech in this house on May 7 spoke of all the weeds around Regina, and blamed me for the weeds being there, although it is thirteen years since I ceased to be Minister of Agriculture in that province. Was I supposed to administer some sort of absent treatment to the weeds?

Mr. LAVERGNE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman is alluding to a past debate and discussing a question that has been discussed in the house this session.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend should be satisfied with making interruptions when he is in the chair. I have the floor, and I am glad the deputy speaker is not in the chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: No member has the right to quote from the record of former debates of this session.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right, Mr. Speaker. I think I know it by heart anyway. The hon. Minister of Agriculture intimated distinctly on one or two occasions during that debate and at the conclusion of it—this is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that you have insisted upon that rule, but I am going to comply with it—that the former Minister of the Interior and myself were responsible for beginning the drainage of the Waterhen lake. I asked for a return with respect to the matter and under his own signature my hon. friend the minister intimated that the contract was let on October 20, 1920, fourteen months before either the former Minister of the Interior or myself came into this house. When the debate was on I drew attention to the fact that that drainage was started by the Conservatives. My hon. friend looked at his notes and said that it was done in 1921 and 1922. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals were in power only for the three last days of December in 1921, and they would not be doing much drainage at that time of the year. The point I want to make is that the minister's statement was absolutely incorrect, as is proved by his own return, indicating that the contract was let on October 20, 1920. Anybody can figure out how many months there were between that date and the time we came into power. May I quote, at all, Mr. Speaker, from Hansard, with reference to the return brought down by the minister?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is against the rules to do so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I quote from an order in council passed a good while ago, confirming and authorizing this work?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Here is a certified copy of a report of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on June 25, 1920. It is P.C. No. 1416, and reads:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report dated 11th June, 1920, from the Minister of the Interior, submitting that complete investigations were made during 1919, by the reclamation service, on behalf of the Dominion government, to ascertain the feasibility and desirability of reclaiming by drainage the land underlying and adjoining Waterhen lake and Waterhen marsh in townships 44 and 45, range 21, and townships 44, 45a and 45, range 22, west of the second meridian. The report of the investigation indicates that the project is economically feasible and in the public interest, and that 13,920 acres of land now practically worthless can be reclaimed at an estimated cost of $143,273.91, which will increase the value of the reclaimed land by about $312,220,000.

Further:

The sum of $150,000 was provided in the estimates for 1919-20—

That is two years and two months before the hon. member for West Edmonton and myself entered this house:

—to cover the cost of the work and a revote of a similar sum is included in the estimates for the current year.

So my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is shown to be absolutely incorrect by the record. He must have known he was incorrect because he was quoting from data that he had before him. If he says that he did not know at the time that it was incorrect, why did he not admit that long ago, instead of waiting until this last day of the session and then imposing upon me the necessity of correcting his misstatement? The order in council continues:

All the requirements of the laws and regulations have been fulfilled and a drainage district has been organized by the government of the province of Saskatchewan designated as "drainage district No. 18."

In order to take in the territory to which my hon. friend alluded. The order in council is signed by Rodolphe Boudreau, clerk of the privy council, and at the bottom is this note:

Published in the Canada Gazette of 24th July, 1920, Vol. 54, No. 4, for the fourth consecutive week.

So my hon. friend was entirely incorrect in his statement. I have often wondered if he knew what he was saying on different occasions, and I find myself still wondering. He went on to say:

[Mr. Motherwell.]

But that is not all. His work was not yet completed. There was a patch in Saskatchewan that was still not weedy enough.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am reading from Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of this session?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I forgot. We are going to be very correct on the day of prorogation. I am sorry I am not allowed to read the minister's exact words, but I think I can summarize them. The Minister of Agriculture intimated that anyone could read the monument that had been left by the member for West Edmonton and myself on this Waterhen lake, and he described in a most spectacular way how the weeds had been distributed all over the Carrot river district. He said that he who runs may read the record of our alleged deeds as an epitaph on that monument. Now instead of introducing the names of my former colleague from Edmonton and myself, I am going to insert the names of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and Dr. Tolmie, because they were the two ministers in office in the government here at Ottawa at that time. So this graphic description by the minister supposed to apply to the minister from Edmonton and myself should, would, and did apply—if they applied to anybody—to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and Hon. Doctor Tolmie. The whole thing was bunk. I do not think either of them deserve these strictures. They were responsible however although I do not think Doctor Tolmie had anything to do with it or that I can censure Mr. Meighen for it. The fact is however that one of these gentlemen was Minister of the Interior and brought down the recommendation to council; I have read a copy of the order in council. If the Minister of Agriculture has anything to say on behalf of himself I should be glad to give place to him, with the understanding that when he is through I shall have the floor. Just a minute—will that be the understanding.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member wishes to give way so that any other hon. member may make a remark or ask a question he has the right to resume his speech.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have to have our T's stroked and our I's dotted this morning for the Prime Minister.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the remarks to which the hon. member refers, I was endeavouring to fix the responsibility for the weed menace in the Waterhen lake area. If the former Minister of Agriculture says he had no responsibility for that menace, I am willing to take his statement to that effect. If that is correct the only conclusion we can come to, is that his colleague, the former Minister of the Interior, knew him so well that he did not think it was worth while to ask his opinion concerning an agricultural project as great as that in the Waterhen lake area. There is no doubt in the mind of anybody who lives in that part of the country that the weed menace did develop during the administration of the previous government. That is what I have reference to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is just some more bunk and rubbish, and has nothing to do with it. What has that got to do with it? How could the minister think that the Minister of the Interior could have had anything to do with it? Who began it? It was begun in 1919.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Who was responsible? I think we should compliment the former Minister of the Interior on—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I gave the minister a chance to explain himself and he has messed himself from top to bottom in trying to do so.

I now come to the Minister of Railways—and at this time I do not know whether or not I will be allowed to quote. Why do you, Mr. Speaker, on this particular date, put a crimp in one—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: Quote the whole of Hansard; get an old Hansard.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Could I quote Hansard of past days?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of past years.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I shall read the words of Mr. George Graham about Nelson as quoted by the minister. An attempt was made by the Minister of Railways and Canals to pass on the responsibility to Senator George Graham and the Liberal party for choosing Nelson as a harbour. There was no justification whatever for making such a statement. Here is what Mr. Graham said:

> If the traffic is to assume any dimensions at all—and unless the department were satisfied it will, they would not go to the expense of having very costly terminal facilities there—if the traffic is to assume any proportions a good harbour is necessary, and from the information in the department the best harbour is to be found at Nelson—

Mark you, he said:

> —the best harbour is to be found at Nelson.

That is where the Minister of Railways ceased quoting. He did not notice the following words however, or the following proviso:

> "Provided the difficulty referred to is overcome."

Why did the Minister of Railways stop when he came to a comma, when there was a full stop at which he might have stopped if he had quoted those seven additional very significant words which make Mr. Graham's answer entirely different from the way in which it was said.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is what he did it for.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: "Provided the difficulty referred to is overcome." What was the difficulty? It was recited by the Hon. Mr. Oliver when he intimated that Nelson was an impossible port because there were no banks for shelter, that there was nothing but mud flats, and that the harbour had to be dredged but would not stay dredged. There were sand bars on the outer part of the harbour and in spring great cordons of ice would form and prevent ingress to or egress from it. After the harbour was opened it could not be used because of ice piled up sometimes twenty-five feet high. These are the difficulties which surrounded the selection of Nelson. The Hon. Mr. Dunning also intimated his preference for Nelson, if these difficulties could be overcome; we were all in favour of it, because of the possibility of a shorter rail haul. Here the significant points are omitted. Why? I am not permitted to quote the hon. gentleman's remarks and I do not know whether he will be allowed to quote them. I am quite prepared to give my permission, if Mr. Speaker will do likewise. I would discriminate in favour of the Minister of Railways so that he may hunt around and find words to describe his remarkable conduct. Probably he could set up an alibi, and blame it on some official in the department, as his leader has done on more than one occasion. We would accept that; an alibi of any kind is better than straight guilt. Here are the words left out "Provided the difficulty referred to is overcome." Why were those words left out? Mr. Speaker, I shall again retire to my chair, as I retired formerly, so that I may hear what the Minister of Railways has to say. I hope he will do better than the Minister of Agriculture has done in his bogus alibi. It would seem that he has not much inclination to speak.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to waste much time of the house, nor do I intend to copy my hon. frend's example of wasting time. I cannot lay my hand on the incident at all. I had the whole matter looked up at the time, and gave the information in connection with it. As to being unfair to Mr. Graham, I can say only that he is a friend of mine and I would not have attempted to be unfair to him. I had the evidence before me at the time, and I think it was quite conclusive that Mr. Graham was favourable to Nelson, just the same as others were.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Of course, we all were, provided Nelson could be made into a good harbour.

Mr. MANION: Well, what is the matter then?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We were all in favour of it—only, we were not in favour of it, because it was no good. I would be pleased to hand the minister a copy of Hansard, to which there could be no objection. Imagine anybody stopping at a comma only seven words away from a full stop. Did he go into a trance; he does not do that very often. My hon. friend has often stood up and invoked an infusion of red Canadian blood into hon. members on this side of the house. I believe he has it, just as we have, but it seems to me there was a yellow streak infused into the hon. member when he perpetrated such a dastardly garble of the record as he did on that occasion. He could not find it he says; he and his colleagues have not been able to find a lot of returns which were asked for, and many letters are coming down only at the last minute. Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned I am content to go into estimates.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, as my name has figured rather prominently in the controversy respecting Waterhen lake I think I should clear myself of any responsibility alleged to lie at my door concerning the spread of noxious weeds. What the ex-Minister of Agriculture has said is true; we inherited this project. I may say that throughout my whole administration of the Department of the Interior I set my face religiously against the drainage of any area and I do not think the statement can by made that any single area was drained while I was minister of that department. I took the stand that there was plenty of dry land in western Canada for settlement purposes, without any drainage whatever. Having inherited this project however something had to be done with it. Certainly there was no sow thistle in that lake when the water was taken off, and at the request of the municipalities on different occasions we spent money to meet the difficulties brought about by the sow thistle; I am speaking from memory. I do think my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture went somewhat out of his way to be critical of the administration of that particular project. I know if it had not been for the appearance of things I would have restored the dam and flooded the lake again, but when you get one of those difficult propositions you just have to do the best you can. It is quite true, as my hon. friend has inferred, that until perhaps the last two years we were in power the Department of Agriculture was not consulted about the matter. The land was leased and I believe farmed in an improper manner as far as land of that character is concerned. Land is always sour when water leaves it and difficulties will arise unless you leave it in grass and cultivate it in that manner for a few years.

I just desired to make these remarks, although I am not particularly interested in what the Minister of Agriculture or anyone else has to say with regard to my administration; I am always ready to defend it when it comes under review. I just want to say that as far as Waterhen lake is concerned we used our best judgment in the matter, and it is wholly erroneous to say we were responsible for seeding that lake or that community with sow thistle. I visited that district on two or three occasions, and every time complaints were made by the weed inspector, mowers were put in and the weeds cut. I am bound to say that from my observation that was not done to the same extent on the surrounding land. If my hon. friend looks up the records of the department he will find that expenditures were made for this very purpose on at least three occasions.

SUPPLY—AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words with regard to the position in which agriculture finds itself today. On Saturday evening some of us were accused of holding up the estimates because we wished to say a few words in connection with agriculture. I think to-day, of all the industries in Canada, agriculture finds itself in the most precarious situation. From one end of Canada to the other we find farmers in all branches of agriculture complaining and wondering what the end will be. I do not care what branch of farming activity they carry on, whether it be wheat or fruit or cattle or dairying; we find them all bitterly complaining that they are unable to make ends meet because prices to-day are only about fifty per cent of what they were a year ago. As I say, from one end of Canada to the other we hear these mutterings, these groans and denunciations of present conditions. Farmers see nothing before them but darkness and blankness; there is not a rift in the clouds as far as agriculture is concerned, yet every man must know that if as a country we are ever to get out of this depression the first people to feel the effects of better times must be the primary producers, the agriculturists.

During the last election, a little over a year ago, the unemployed were told they were going to have lots of work. There was to be work for all at good wages; no one was going to be hungry. There is no doubt also that the farmer was led to believe, either directly or indirectly, that he would be able to market anything he could produce, at a good price. He was going to get real money for his butter and eggs and wheat, and if there was one thing for which the Liberal government was condemned during the last election it was that Mr. Dunning did not step out and sell Canada's wheat at a good price. Why did he not sell it? That was the cry. What was he doing? We were told to wait until the Conservative government got into power, they would sell it. They are selling it, all right; they are giving it away now. That was the whole cry during the campaign, and say what you like now the farmer believed in his heart that when the Conservative government came into power he was going to get a better price for his product. You may side-step that all you like, but it is a fact. That is why so many farmers voted Conservative; they voted in favour of those promises. All I can say is that they are reaping their whirlwind now, and they regret their action most deeply.

Well, the election was held and we came to Ottawa for the session of the house. Hon. members from western Canada demanded from the government time after time what was their program in regard to agriculture. All the press throughout Canada proclaimed the present minister the greatest Minister of Agriculture we ever had; they said he was a wonder man. We hoped he was; we really and sincerely hoped he was such a man, because we thought that if ever there was a time when agriculture needed a real minister this was the time. We wanted that to be so; do not make any mistake about that. As farmers we were all anxious to see the farmer get out of his present condition. Well, we came here and asked him for his policy. We continued to ask and finally, after a lot of bantering and talking, and after the session had been going on for two or three months, he made a speech in this house. At that time he was supposed to tell us what was his program, but he started in and took a long time to tell us he was a new man in politics and that he was the graduate of a university. I do not know what that had to do with it, but he took a long time to make those statements. Then he made nothing but a political speech, the most rabid political speech we have had in this house. The very first thing he did was to attack the former Minister of Agriculture and tell us he was the worst minister we ever had. Before he even had his own seat warm he was telling us that the last minister was the worst minister Canada ever had.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What authority has the hon. gentleman for making such a statement?

Mr. DONNELLY: I am not allowed to look up Hansard; if I do so I will be called out of order, so I am just giving the impression we got.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. DONNELLY: Take back nothing.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to take it back.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am quite ready to take back the words, but that was the impression left with us and with the country. The minister said, "Look; he left nothing outside Regina but a trail of weeds," but what do we find? The trail of weeds in Saskatchewan was left by the Union government, the Conservative government sitting in Ottawa at that time.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would like the hon. gentleman to adhere to a certain degree of accuracy. I did not say anything of the kind, and I do not think the hon. gentleman can blame the Union government for spreading weeds around Regina.

Mr. DONNELLY: Hon. members may look up the record to see if the minister did not mention the trail of weeds around Regina, and I say that the trail of weeds in Saskatchewan was left there by the Conservative government in 1914.

An hon. MEMBER: Prove it.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am going to do so. That trail of weeds is south of the main line; it is about one hundred and fifty miles long and two hundred or three hundred miles in width. In 1914 the Conservative government at Ottawa sent seed to that district; it was full of wild weeds and stinkweed which polluted the whole country, and no one is to blame but this government, who did it. They are the ones that spread the weeds. And what are they doing to-day? Let me ask the Minister of Agriculture that question. What are they doing to-day to see that no weeds shall be sent in?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): All seed is inspected.

Mr. DONNELLY: This past winter, I know for a fact, they have brought in Canadian thistle and sow thistle, and this in a country which is supposed to be new. Then hon. gentlemen opposite accuse the former Minister of Agriculture of spreading weeds.

Next we hear the story of the drainage of Waterhen lake. I do not need to say more about that, because we heard what the former Minister of Agriculture had to say. He indicated his position in that regard. The Minister of Agriculture went on to tell us what a wonderful market he had obtained for our cattle in Europe. Why? Because the price of cattle in this country had been so reduced that England could afford to buy them. Hon. gentlemen were instrumental in having the price come down in this country. We had Mr. Brown before the committee, and he told us that in the years 1927, 1928 and 1929 we could not ship our cattle to England because there was a better price in Canada than could be obtained over there, and that if we did ship our cattle we should lose money. That is the whole explanation. The hon. gentleman says, "I got a place for you on the ships; I obtained satisfactory ocean rates, a cheap rate for your cattle. I was instrumental in doing that". Well, I looked up Hansard myself—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. gentleman say that I ever at any time took credit for obtaining a $15 rate.

Mr. DONNELLY: Look up Hansard.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I never said so.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am not allowed to quote from Hansard of this session, but apparently the hon. gentleman took credit for obtaining a good price. He says—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has already heard me rule with reference to quoting from previous debates in the same session.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am not referring to a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I thought the hon. gentleman was referring to Hansard.

Mr. DONNELLY: I was looking at Hansard to see what the date was which I have in mind. It was on March 27.

Mr. SPEAKER: In order that there may be no misunderstanding I shall quote from Bourinot. After reciting various prohibitions, Bourinot goes on to say:

> Neither can a member, in speaking, refer to anything said or done in a previous debate during the same session—a rule necessary to economize the time of the house, and a restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded.

Mr. DONNELLY: I am not referring to any debate, Mr. Speaker. I asked a question on the orders of the day on March 27, 1931, when the minister made a reply. That is all. That was why I said to the Minister of Agriculture that I could not refer to any of the debates to see what he had said during this session, because it would be out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is intended to economize the time of the house.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister also referred to the feeding of cattle and said that he had performed experiments in connection with barley, chopped oats and one thing and another. Well, these experiments have been carried on for years and along the very same lines. The whole question of the marketing of farm produce was referred to the committee on agriculture who apparently were asked to evolve a policy. The minister had no policy of his own, but he wanted to shoulder on the committee on agriculture the responsibility of evolving one for him. I sat in that committee, and after our deliberations the only conclusion we arrived at was that the former Minister of Agriculture had been correct; his actions were justified. Indeed, he had done a whole lot that members of the committee knew nothing about, and our inquiry confirmed in every way the actions of the former minister. That committee brought in a report which has never been concurred in;

we have never asked for concurrence in the report. We brought it in and that was all. It was not important enough, it would seem, to be bothered with at all. When we went into that committee we found that the grading of cattle and beef, of butter and eggs, of fruit and vegetables, had been started by the former Minister of Agriculture, and the committee recommended that this be continued. That is about all we arrived at.

We asked that not only the marketing of produce but production as well should be studied, inasmuch as production was of great importance in many parts of Canada. During the last five years the farmers of Canada would seem to have forgotten that we had a Minister of Agriculture in the last eight years or so, because the farmers prospered so under the Liberal government that they were not aware that a Minister of Agriculture was there. They forgot that their Minister of Agriculture had been doing things for them.

Let me briefly put before the house a few of the things which the former Minister of Agriculture did, because no doubt many hon. gentlemen are as ignorant as were the members of the committee of what the former minister did. In the committee on agriculture the other day the fact was brought out that the former minister passed regulations with regard to the grading of eggs, and a member got up and said he did not think that a man should be compelled to sell eggs according to grade, but should be allowed to sell as he wished to. It was brought out in the committee that the provinces that did not concur in that legislation did not have to sell eggs according to grade within their own territory. One member got up and said that everyone in his constituency knew it, and another member of this house said he did not know anything at all about it. He said they were allowed to sell in the open market as they liked, either according to grade or not. I am willing to let that go; but apparently he did not know what the situation was in his own province.

Under the former Minister of Agriculture excellent work was done in our experimental farms, and any money spent on these farms anywhere in Canada is warranted. In my judgment, no branch of the Department of Agriculture has done as much for the farmers of the country as the experimental farms have done. Take spring wheat in this country. In Canada we do not produce wheat as they do in the United States. We do not spend on our experimental farms one dollar for every ten dollars they spend there; yet, in spite of that fact, our farms have done well and every step in the progress they have made has been of real benefit to the wheat growers of Canada. Discovery of Garnet has made possible the growing of wheat in the Peace River district and in many parts of northern Saskatchewan. Seventy million dollars at least has been added in one year to the wealth of western Canada by the growing of Garnet wheat.

Then there is the matter of a rust-resisting wheat. The experimental farms which have investigated this matter have taken different views. Some have been attempting to find a cure for the disease by dusting the wheat with certain powders. Others contend that the cause should be removed, but the experimental farms in Canada have attempted to find a wheat which would be immune to this disease. They have succeeded and many parts of Manitoba which could not formerly grow wheat are now enabled to do so. By these two things alone the experimental farms have justified their existence; the discovery of Garnet and Reward wheats occurred under the regime of the former Minister of Agriculture.

What else do we find? I have summarized these matters, and I will refer briefly to them. The next is the fact that we have secured the participation of the provincial government of Ontario in financing the erection of a new live-stock building at the Royal Winter Fair. This government is to grant $35,000 per year for twenty years to assist what is probably the greatest winter fair on the North American continent.

The next accomplishment under the former Minister of Agriculture is the work performed in connection with bovine tuberculosis. Restricted areas have been created in the attempt to prevent this disease spreading throughout the country. At the present time we find involved $1,400,000 in this and the related policies of graded herds and testings. I have referred already to the fact that there has been instituted a system of grading butter, cheese, bacon, eggs, fruits and vegetables, all inaugurated by the former Minister of Agriculture.

The next thing was the creation of a system of inspection of fruits and vegetables at the different shipping points. Inspectors make sure that these products are properly graded and are in proper condition before being sent out. The next matter inaugurated by the former Minister of Agriculture is the system of pre-cooling or refrigerating of fruits and vegetables. There are all advanced steps which were taken by that hon. gentleman.

The next is the establishment of a seed cleaning and storage elevator at Moose Jaw.

This is one of the things spoken of several times during the speech of the Minister of Agriculture. He said that probably too much money had been spent along this line. This seed cleaning plant is self supporting. There is no other system of inspection in any department which pays its own way, except that of wheat inspection. This government has taken out of the farmers something like $1,700,000 more than it needed and there is in the public funds of this country that amount of money which rightly belongs to the wheat growers of western Canada.

Last year or in the previous year we said: You cannot raise cattle unless you have pure bred stock; you cannot grow good wheat or other grain unless you have pure seed. We said: We think some of this $1,700,000 that is lying in the national treasury and that belongs to the western farmers, should be taken out and given to them in order to establish a seed cleaning plant. We took some of that money; we did not as a matter of fact take much more than the interest on it, and we erected a seed cleaning plant at Moose Jaw. That plant is still in existence and it is a place where a man may go in order to get pure, clean seed. In this country at this time, the necessity for such a plant is greater than ever, because we want to know where we can get clean grass seed in order to have a rotation of crops which seems to be essential at present in western Canada. The plan outlined at that time was to erect another of those plants in Alberta and one in Manitoba. I do not think eastern interests or anybody else should have anything to say with regard to this. It is the wheat grower's money and he has a right to take it and use it as he chooses. As long as what has been done is satisfactory to the wheat growers of the west, outsiders in eastern Canada should not have anything to say about the matter. It is the wheat grower's money that has been taken from him in connection with the inspection and grading of his wheat.

Another thing that was done was to take the initial steps for holding a world seed fair at Regina this year. I believe such a fair will do much to enlighten the farmers in regard to growing proper seed.

Then in 1923 we had the prohibition of the importation of oleomargarine. This is something which our Conservative friends like to forget. During the session of that year there was quite a discussion in regard to the importation of oleomargarine. The former Minister of Agriculture fought strenuously for the prohibition of its importation. Many of our Conservative friends supported its importation, but they like to forget all about that, and say they were in favour of prohibiting it. The record, however, shows otherwise. In 1917 some 14,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine were imported and I believe that if in 1930 it had been allowed to be brought in, something like 30,000,000 pounds would have been imported.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. gentleman say that 30,000,000 pounds entered Canada in 1930?

Mr. DONNELLY: No; I said that if the importation had not been prohibited, I believe 30,000,000 pounds would have been imported. I know the importations were stopped in 1923.

Mr. BENNETT: The extent of the hon. gentleman's imagination is amusing.

Mr. DONNELLY: It would not take very much imagination to believe, when the price of butter was so high during the Liberal regime in 1929, that oleomargarine could readily have found a market in this country.

Mr. VALLANCE: It would not to-day.

Mr. DONNELLY: No, because the price of butter is not very high now. It would be cheaper to buy butter. As I said in the house some time ago, it takes about two pounds of butter to buy a pound of axle grease. Some farmers are using their butter for axle grease.

Mr. SHAVER: The hon. member has made that statement before about its taking two pounds of butter to buy a pound of axle grease. Where does that condition obtain?

Mr. DONNELLY: In western Canada.

Mr. SHAVER: It does not obtain in this part of the country.

Mr. DONNELLY: The price of butter is much lower in the west than in the east. The farmers can get only from ten to twelve cents a pound for it at the country stores, and they pay from twenty to twenty-five cents a pound for axle grease.

Mr. BOYES: Why do they not take their cream to the creameries?

Mr. DONNELLY: In many sections of the country hon. members must realize that farmers are from twenty-five to thirty miles from a railway, and it would hardly pay a farmer to haul his milk daily to the railway to ship to a creamery.

Mr. SHAVER: That explains the whole situation.

Mr. DONNELLY: That does not explain why the price of dairy butter was twenty-five cents at the time of last election and it is only ten or twelve cents now, although my hon. friends opposite made the people believe that if the Conservative party came into power, they would be getting more for their product. That is the point of the whole argument. My hon. friends opposite made the people believe during the last election they would be getting real money for their butter; it would not be any small, miserable, twenty-five cents.

Mr. BOYES: That is incorrect.

Mr. DONNELLY: The last thing to which I wish to refer is the fact that we arranged in cooperation with the different parts of the British Commonwealth for the establishment of an agricultural research bureau. These are some of the activities of the former Minister of Agriculture for the benefit of agriculture throughout Canada. All I want to say in conclusion is that when the estimates for agriculture are before the house, we hope the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) will be able to throw out a line for our farmers and to give them a ray of hope.

Mr. McINTOSH: Throw out a lifeline.

Mr. DONNELLY: The farmers throughout the country are dreading the prospect of having to leave their farms and under present conditions it looks as though they would have to do so. There is nothing more essential to a country than a prosperous and contended peasantry:

> But a bold peasantry, it's country's pride,
> When once destroyed can never be supplied.

It looks to-day as though our farmers will have to leave the land. As a matter of fact, they are doing so, and if conditions as they are continue for very long, more and more of them will have to abandon their farms. We trust and hope the Minister of Agriculture, even at this late date in the session, will be able to give some comfort to those farmers who find themselves in this situation at this time.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I should like for a few minutes to draw the attention of the house to a condition which exists in western Canada and that is well known to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I am going to comment upon a return for which the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) asked the other day. It will be remembered that in the last general election the big question in western Canada as far as agriculture was concerned, was markets. I want to quote two extracts from a speech made by the Prime Minister before I deal with this return. The Prime Minister, when addressing a meeting at Winnipeg a year ago last June, had this to say:

> Recognizing that the marketing of our natural products is a foremost factor in our national welfare, I pledge our organization and machinery, in cooperation with private and financial agencies, to permanently establish effective organizations in the countries with which we trade. With these drastic adjustments and improvements to which you are entitled, and with the full employment of our great transportation system, you will have broader markets, and will have them for all time. You have known suffering and have been patient. Let us end it. Take heart.

There are many members who are behind the government to-day who will agree with me that it was the statements made by the present Prime Minister while in Winnipeg that made the greatest contribution to their being members of the House of Commons at this time. Let me quote another statement which the Prime Minister made at the same meeting:

> Listen you agriculturists from the west and all other parts of Canada. You have been taught to mock at tariffs and applaud free trade. Tell me, when did free trade fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. VALLANCE: I hope hon. members will be able to say: "Hear, hear!" when they learn what has been the attitude of the government during this session of parliament with regard to those statements of the Prime Minister. Naturally, we expected that the government would bring down, shall I say some drastic measures or even some suggestions in the way of fulfilling these promises. I was rather amazed when the Prime Minister during this session stood in his place and referred the whole marketing problem to the committee on agriculture. At that time, as a member of that committee, I rose in my place in the house and objected to having the responsibility thrown on to that committee, a responsibility that he had assumed during the last general election.

I said in the beginning that the Prime Minister had some knowledge of the wheat situation. In the return to which I referred, there appears a letter written to the premier of Saskatchewan by the present Prime Minister. This letter reveals to what extent my right hon. friend has knowledge of the situation. He writes:

My Dear Premier:

I return you herewith the papers you sent me the other day.

Your informant is in error. The officials were appointed under the War Measures Act—

I want the house to listen to this:

—to deal with Canadian wheat. They were known as the board of grain supervision on the Canadian wheat board. The wheat board sold the Canadian crop of 1919 and after paying all expenses, they credited to the Finance department the sum of $428,781. After everything was wound up, the money sent to the western provinces was $560,000. There remains upwards of $100,000 which is in process of being made available for relief purposes in the west.

Now listen to this:

The letter indicates how easy it is to have erroneous impressions regarding public matters.

I just wish to prove to the Prime Minister how erroneous his own statements are. I want to give the correct figures which I know will be substantiated even by his Minister of Agriculture. The old wheat board of 1919 had a surplus of some $732,000. Of that, $560,000 was paid to the farmers by the late lamented James Robb. In the final wind-up the grain supervisors turned over to the federal Department of Finance $428,000, making a total of $1,160,000, leaving still owing to the farmers of Canada the sum of $600,000. Therefore I think the Prime Minister had better revise his information and take it from the records within the department. In his letter he says:

The letter indicates how easy it is to have erroneous impressions regarding public matters.

I would suggest that even at this late date, while he is still having conferences with, shall I say, those who are interested in the marketing of Canada's wheat crop, he revise his figures and see whether the figures I give him are not correct, because it may have some bearing if he realizes that this country still owes some $600,000 to the farmers. I do not wish to go into details; I merely wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to this fact.

I was one of those who, on Saturday night, objected to the estimates on agriculture going through as they were and being assisted through the house by the Prime Minister. As I pointed out then, some very important, supposedly new agricultural policies have been brought into effect by the present Minister of Agriculture, and it is only fair and just to the farmers throughout Canada that the government and the Minister of Agriculture in particular should have an opportunity to tell the house and the country just what those policies are and just what effect it is believed they will have on the deplorable conditions existing in agriculture at the present time.

Mr. LUCAS: Why does not the hon. member give the minister a chance to discuss this question?

Mr. VALLANCE: If the house had had its way on Saturday, you would have had no chance to hear him. I would say to the Prime Minister that if he had not been so impetuous on Saturday night, the house could have got through before twelve o'clock, and it was his own fault that it did not get through.

Mr. BOWMAN: You mean if the ex-Minister of Justice had not taken up so much time we would have got through.

Mr. VALLANCE: I am not laying the blame on anyone, except to say that if the Prime Minister had not been so impetuous and dictatorial we would have got through on Saturday night. It was his own attitude that brought those of us to our feet who rose on Saturday night.

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): Please continue.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think that any member from western Canada sitting behind the government ought to agree with the attitude that three or four of us on this side of the house took on Saturday. I am sure it will be appreciated by the farmers of western Canada. It is because of the promise hon. gentlemen opposite made to the farmers of western Canada that they are now sitting over there. Take the election in South Battleford, for instance. If you go into the records of that election you will find that there were two thousand farmers who left the Progressive or farmer candidate and voted Tory. Why? Because of the promises you gave.

Mr. MANION: Because they were tired of your conduct.

Mr. VALLANCE: You can go through the record and you will find—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will please address the chair.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think I did address the chair, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. Minister of Railways addressed a remark to me across the floor without even referring to you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: That does not put the hon. member in order.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then, why not call him to order, too? Because he happens to sit on the front benches opposite, with apologies to you, Mr. Speaker. In the South Battleford election I gained 380 votes, but the farmers of that constituency, because of the promises the government gave them, slipped two thousand votes to the Conservative candidate. I do not think I can add anything more. I think we were justified in the action we took on Saturday night.

Mr. FRANK BOYES (East Middlesex): I just wish to make a few remarks in reply to the two hon. gentlemen who have just spoken. I have been more than amazed at the way in which these two hon. members in the past and to-day have gone into the records of their ridings and represented conditions in the west. I come from the province of Ontario, representing the riding of East Middlesex, and I am sure that I would not like to be one of those who would get up in this house and decry the province of Ontario as these two hon. gentlemen have been decrying the west. Further, it is a surprise to me that these two hon. members, who have been members of the former government for a number of years should make such extreme statements at the present time. Why did they not look after some of these things in years past when they had the opportunity? I do not wish to take up the time of the house. I will just say in conclusion that I believe this to be a fact, that these two hon. members did hold up the house on Saturday night. There is no doubt about that. On this side of the house the west is ably represented. We have the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr Bennett) who, as all hon. gentlemen know, is as well acquainted with western conditions as anybody in this house. We have also the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). Does he not know conditions in the west as well as the two hon. members who have just spoken? I am convinced that he knows them much better, and he is giving us an administration which is very satisfactory to us. In Ontario we are not questioning where ministers come from, but my hon. friends opposite, if the minister had come from Ontario, would have complained. We are making no complaints. We are convinced that the Minister of Agriculture will do fairly by this country, no matter where he comes from. I believe that the people of this country generally, as well as the people of the west, are more and more convinced as time goes on that this government is doing the right and proper thing and I believe that the two hon. gentlemen opposite, who have been holding up this house as they have been doing for several days past, involving additional expense to the country, will have to account for it to their electors when the next election comes. I believe that they will be held to account, and that their electors will return supporters of the government now in power.

SUPPLY—COPYRIGHT ACT

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring up one matter. I am sorry the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) is not in his seat. I am not saying that in any unkindly spirit; he may be busily engaged otherwise. Perhaps after I have made my remarks, which will take only a few minutes, the Prime Minister may enlighten me and indicate what action will be taken in respect to what I have to say.

I have here a return brought down by the Secretary of State just a few days ago. It is with reference to some eighteen questions that I asked about the Berne convention. I shall not deal with all the questions, though the replies to most of them are unsatisfactory, but only with this one. I asked the names of the various countries that now adhere to the Berne convention, and for this reason: Under the amendment to the act which was recently passed, article 1 says:

> The countries to which the present convention applies are constituted into a union for the protection of the rights of authors over their literary and artistic works.

Throughout the convention the articles refer to the countries of the union, and I asked the Secretary of State whether the names of the said countries would appear in the preamble of the schedule, because otherwise the whole law means nothing. His answer was no, that the names of the adhering countries will not appear in the preamble, but that they may be obtained by asking the office of the International Union for the information. That is a sorry state of affairs. If anybody wants to know to what countries the present Canadian copyright law applies, so far as the Berne convention and the schedule to the act is concerned, there is no authoritative source to which one may go to find out what those countries are. The Secretary of State says that the information may be had by asking the office of the International Union for it. The Prime Minister will see at once the difficulty one is placed in when trying to interpret the law, which applies to so and so, when the adhering countries it does apply to are not mentioned in the act. I fully appreciate that the law was passed in Canada before the ratifications were effected on July 1, in Rome, but I submit that there ought to be some way, either by proclamation in the Canada Gazette or otherwise, whereby one could ascertain authoritatively what these countries are without having to write to the International Union office at Berne for the information. There are other questions which have been answered in a most unsatisfactory and incomplete way. For the moment however I should be satisfied if some direction could be given as to where one could secure the list so that it would be possible to give advice on the matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member has asked a question which, it seems to me, is not unreasonable. Canada has acceded to the Rome convention, and Canada had previously acceded to the Berne convention. I understand the hon. member's question is as to what countries have acceded to both. He has received fair information with respect to Rome, but he finds it difficult to obtain information concerning Berne. Is that correct?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Information in connection with the countries now forming the union.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I believe there are about forty countries.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to me that the suggestion is not unreasonable. I shall ask the under secretary to get into communication with the proper authority, and a notice can be inserted in the Gazette stating the facts.

While I am on my feet I may say to my hon. friend it has been decided that for the month of September the hours for the Civil Service shall not be different from what they have been under previous regulations. I promised my hon. friend I would give that information in regard to the civil servants.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I did not get the effect of the Prime Minister's words. Does he mean that the closing hours, the four o'clock hours, will extend into September?

Mr. BENNETT: No, they will not.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I cannot hear what is going on, and I should like to know what is before the house—there is too much noise.

Mr. BENNETT: Public Works, item 194.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is the Prime Minister in charge, as he was on Saturday night?

Mr. BENNETT: I was trying courteously to answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think he will be in charge of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, if I can hinder it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is excited.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not.

Item agreed to.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories, $1,007,639.

Mr. VALLANCE: What are we dealing with?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Indian affairs.

Mr. VALLANCE: Well, call out the items so they may be heard, because I should like to ask a question of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy). What is the policy of his department with regard to calling for tenders for supplies? Do they call for a list to be given to the department so that the minister or the department may choose from that list those firms qualified to tender for supplies. I have in mind a firm in my constituency which has been sending supplies of flour to Indian reservations for a considerable number of years, not only during the regime of this government but during that of the last, and previously. Tendering for this year's supply of flour this particular firm was told they were not on the list handed to the department. I wish to learn from the minister if it is his policy or that of his department to get the names of individual firms who are to be allowed to tender on various commodities.

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs): Mr. Chairman, the supplies of flour for the Indian department are, I believe, purchased to a great extent from the manufacturers of that product.

Mr. VALLANCE: I am referring to a manufacturer, a miller.

Mr. MURPHY: The different firms manufacturing in western Canada are asked to quote on that particular commodity. I am not able to state at this time whether the firm he has in mind has been asked or not. I am prepared to accept, however, his statement that it has not been asked.

Mr. VALLANCE: This particular firm had been delivering flour supplies for quite a number of years. They wrote to ascertain why they were not asked for tenders and were politely told that their name did not appear on the list of firms from which tenders were required. Is it the decision of the Department of Indian Affairs that purchases shall be confined to certain individuals? I have no objection if that is the policy; if so, however, I should like to know it. I wish to know if that is the policy of the minister and his department.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think there has been any change of policy with respect to buying supplies. It may be that when firms are asked to quote all firms are not included. If however the name of this particular firm did not appear on the list, I suppose they were not asked to tender. I may say that on some occasions a firm which has not been asked to quote on certain orders has written asking to be allowed to quote, and permission has been granted.

Mr. VALLANCE: I refer to the Bishop Milling Company in my constituency, right in the midst of the Indian territory, who for many years have been supplying flour to the Indian department. When they asked permission to quote on this occasion they were politely told their name did not appear on the list handed to the purchasing agent, and therefore they could not tender.

If that is the policy of the government, all right. I want to be in a position to tell those who come to me regarding purchases, or tendering on produce for the Department of Indian Affairs, that unless somebody other than myself vouches for them to the department they will have no consideration. I merely wish to make it quite clear, and have it understood whether or not my opponent, the Conservative candidate, will be extended that courtesy; I wish to know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask again if the rules of the house are to be observed. I understand the time of sitting is from eleven o'clock to one o'clock. According to the clock it is now some seven or eight minutes after one o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I have not looked at the clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is your duty to do so.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I look at the clock now, and it is one o'clock. My information, however, is that there is no rule which provides that this house must rise at one o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit it has been the custom and practice in the past; I do not know where the chairman obtained his information, but certainly the house usually sits from eleven o'clock until one o'clock. However, if my hon. friend thinks he is going to further the progress of the business of the house by causing us to depart from our usual practices, by all means let him so proceed. I am doing what I can to get the house prorogued in accordance with the rules and practices of the House of Commons, and if the deputy speaker and others desired to combine to seek to prevent that they must blame themselves for whatever difficulties they may encounter in proceeding in that way.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no necessity for threats of this kind; do not threaten us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are no threats.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us be better natured about it. I direct your attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that it is now one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MANION: With the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a brief statement with reference to Fort Churchill which I think will be of interest not only to the people of western Canada but to the country generally. I was asked this morning, and I have been asked at various times by hon. members, about the possibility of getting out a shipment or shipments of grain from Churchill this autumn. The government, through myself and my officers, has been working continuously in an endeavour to get grain shipments through Churchill. We have had the matter under consideration with Mr. John I. McFarland and various organizations, private and public, but we had not succeeded in obtaining any promise of a shipment of any kind except 150,000 bushels with the On-to-the-Bay Association had arranged through Mr. McFarland. This morning, learning that Mr. McFarland was in the city, and before I was asked anything about the matter here, I tried to get in touch with him, and I succeeded at noon in having an interview with him. My chief, the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett), Mr. McFarland and myself discussed the matter, with a view to having Mr. McFarland cooperate with the government to have Fort Churchill tested. He has consented to cooperate with us in an endeavour to get out two cargoes through Churchill this fall.

Mr. BRADETTE: Carloads?

Mr. MANION: Two cargoes. I do not know the number of bushels, but Mr. McFarland feels that two cargoes are as much as he can reasonably assure us of. Under the circumstances we are hoping to have these two cargoes go from the port of Churchill some time after September 15. If someone else comes forward with a third cargo almost immediately—because the boats will have to be arranged for—we could probably handle a third cargo. As I stated previously, apart from what we have accomplished through the kind offices and cooperation of Mr. McFarland, we have not succeeded in getting anyone to ship wheat that way. In view of this arrangement, however, we hope to be able to ship the two cargoes out this fall as a test.

The CHAIRMAN: There is nothing before the committee. The next item is:

Indian Affairs — Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Northwest Territories, $1,007,639.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I wish to ask the minister a question with regard to the lake resort at North Carlyle. I understand that there was a movement on foot to cancel the lease held by the town of Carlyle of a portion of the Indian reserve near the lake. The reserve is in the Moose mountains. I wonder what progress has been made with regard to the cancellation, or whether the matter stands.

Mr. MURPHY: I believe that some years ago a lease was granted to the town of Carlyle by the Indian department, giving rights in connection with a summer resort near there. The term of the lease was I believe for a period of ninety-nine years at $400 per year. The matter is now in the hands of the Department of Justice and will go before the court.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I want to present the point of view of the town of Carlyle in regard to this matter. It is true, as the minister says, that there was a lease in 1907 or 1908 or thereabouts made between the town of Carlyle and the Indian department, in connection with a portion of that reserve. The significant point is that for about twenty years the Indians were apparently satisfied with that lease. It is true that the lease was for ninety-nine years, the amount being $400. Someone who pretended to have considerable interest in the Indians persuaded them that they were not getting enough for the lease of that land. At the time the land was leased it was just a rocky lake front and, in that condition, no one would think of paying $400 a year for a lease of that property. However, it went on from 1906 until about two years ago. I wish to read a letter which I have received from the mayor of the town of Carlyle, to show their position in the matter. Up to this time I had not heard of any dissatisfaction among the Indians, but the question was raised about two years ago when the town of Carlyle wanted to rent an additional piece of land for a golf course. The town of Carlyle has spent a considerable amount of money establishing their summer resort, which is second to none in Saskatchewan. This letter, addressed to myself, reads:

Re town of Carlyle and Carlyle lake resort lease.

You will remember that about two years ago the town of Carlyle wrote you requesting that you intercede with the Indian department on our behalf in an endeavour to have them lease the town an additional piece of land to be used as a golf course.

At that time we offered the Indians $400 per year rental, although the estimated rental on this land was approximately $50, with the idea of clearing up any dissatisfaction there might be concerning the old lease.

These negotiations were unsuccessful, and the Indian department have now instituted proceedings in the exchequer court of Canada asking for cancellation of this lease.

Previous to the issue of this writ, the Indian commissioner at Regina wrote me, stating that the Indians were dissatisfied with the present lease, and that he thought a representative from his department and the town of Carlyle should meet and discuss the situation with a view to settling the differences. I replied immediately to the effect that the town of Carlyle would be very pleased to meet himself or his representative and he then wrote stating that he would arrange a meeting.

After the writ was issued the matter was fully discussed by the council, and they were of the opinion that a town such as ours should not be expected to carry on an expensive lawsuit with the government. Consequently the town solicitor and myself interviewed the department's solicitor, and he agreed to write to his clients explaining that the town was quite willing to enter into negotiations with the department, and the action still stands in that position, with the exception that they have asked us to file our defense, and this means that we are already becoming involved in legal expenses that the town cannot afford.

I would again impress upon the minister and the committee the fact that for approximately twenty years the Indians were to all intents and purposes satisfied with the lease. But someone, who apparently had a great interest in the Indians, persuaded them that they were not getting sufficient money. The town of Carlyle has spent a considerable sum developing that summer resort and it is very unfair to put them to a great deal of expense at this time in connection with that lease.

Mr. McINTOSH: I was waiting to see whether the minister would reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie), but if he is not going to do so I have something to say in connection with what we were discussing before recess. I understand that the situation in connection with the flour mills of the Battlefords, in respect to the needs in a flour way of the Indians in the northwestern part of Saskatchewan, is this. If you are on the patronage list for the riding, if the milling organization is on the constituency patronage list, it can compete for this business and tender. If it is not on the patronage list for either riding, it cannot do so. Is that the position? I should like the minister to say.

Mr. MURPHY: That is not correct.

Mr. McINTOSH: If that is not the position, will the minister define exactly the situation in both ridings. There is a mill in each riding and certainly each mill ought to have an opportunity to tender on departmental business. As I understood the statement of the minister before recess, it was that the mill in Battleford was not allowed to tender. It was not on the list, and that list must be the patronage list. What kind of business is that for a department to carry on?

Mr. BENNETT: Just what was going on in the last ten years.

Mr. McINTOSH: If the Prime Minister makes that statement will he bring forward a specific example to prove it?

Mr. BENNETT: Calgary.

Mr. McINTOSH: Name the man and the organization.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Hundreds of them.

Mr. VALLANCE: I may tell the Prime Minister that that statement is hardly true, because in the Battlefords—

Mr. McINTOSH: It is not true.

Mr. VALLANCE: —the Bishop Milling Company was supplying a portion of the flour prior to the coming into office of the previous government. They did not tender during the life of the last government and they were not asked this year to tender. They inquired as to why they had not been asked to tender and they were politely told, maybe properly so, that their name had not been handed to the purchasing agent so that he could ask for tenders.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) asked if only certain people in these ridings were allowed to tender, and I answered, no. We are asking for quotations from the different flour mills throughout Canada. The mills in Winnipeg, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon or wherever they may be situated are asked to tender. As to whether or not there are patronage lists, the hon. member seems to have quite a knowledge in that regard.

Mr. McINTOSH: We are seeing it every day.

Mr. MURPHY: There is a list of names in the department from which they were asked to request tenders. It may be called a patronage list or whatever hon. members want to call it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Let us call it that, because that is what it is.

Mr. MURPHY: I will take the hon. member's word for it, because he seems to know.

Mr. McINTOSH: No hon. member knows better than the minister.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think there has been any change of practice.

Mr. McINTOSH: I understand that this mill in North Battleford is not on the patronage list; is that correct?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know whether it is or is not a patronage list; I know there is a list.

Mr. McINTOSH: The departmental list.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not sure whether or not the name of that firm is on this list.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is the North Battleford Milling Company on the patronage list, and if not, why not?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has answered the last question.

Mr. McINTOSH: In view of the minister's statement that he does not know whether or not these mills are on the patronage list, I am sure that the electors of the two Battlefords will wonder at his knowledge of and familiarity with the affairs of the department.

Item agreed to.

General, $286,500.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Prime Minister seems to know something about patronage lists. I spent the last year or two trying to find out whether or not such a thing was in existence.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member did not know there was one in existence?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not rise to speak about patronage lists, but rather to draw the attention of the government and the minister to the large reduction which has been made in the votes for Indians. I notice that the supplementary estimates contain an additional $200,000 for the relief of destitute indians. This will cut down the reduction considerably—

Mr. MURPHY: It is for destitute indians and hospitalization.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —but even with that additional amount there is still a cut of $300,000.

Mr. MURPHY: It is more than that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was speaking in round figures. I do not take exception to the decrease in the vote for education, as I understand that one can cut down on the construction of buildings and the like without creating a serious hardship, but before the year is out this drastic cut will prove to be a serious matter to the Indians. During my time in the department I found that the requirements of the Indians were growing at a considerable rate and for purposes which it did not seem humanely possible to refuse.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I know something of the conditions of the Indians throughout northern Ontario, and unless a very definite step is taken in the near future to provide a means of livelihood for them a serious condition will develop. The Indians have virtually been deprived of the means of maintaining themselves by trapping and hunting, because these privileges have been taken away from them by the white trapper. I would urge that the government in cooperation with the provincial authorities try to evolve a scheme under which fur-bearing animals will be conserved for the Indians. I am speaking only of that part of the country of which I have some knowledge, but I believe the same condition applies right across Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is correct.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The situation in northern Ontario is such that if something is not done very quickly the Indians will have to be taken care of en bloc. The misery among these people has reached a state of almost complete desperation, and I am confident that before the year is out very substantial additions will have to be made to what is now being provided to take care of these destitute Indians. The natural reflex from the unemployment situation has affected them to some degree, but the main cause of distress is the fact that their hunting grounds are being destroyed by the white trappers. Their rights should be recognized, and they should be allowed their hunting grounds in at least the unorganized parts of the north country.

Mr. MURPHY: Last year there was spent for Indians the sum of $5,956,855, in addition to the supplies which they were able to obtain from their own reserves. In western Canada very fertile land has been set aside for the Indians and they carry on farming operations on their reserves. In British Columbia they carry on farming in addition to their fisheries, but in northern Ontario and Quebec the Indians are not so well provided for. Their reserves are not agricultural lands, and they are unable to raise many of the commodities they themselves require. The hon. member for East Algoma has brought up a point which is more provincial than otherwise in character. I am informed that the Ontario government have appointed a commission to inquire into that very matter in order to see that the hunting rights may be reserved in those very areas for the Indians. The Indian department is taking steps so that its representatives may be able to appear before that commission and present the case of the Indians. The former Superintendent General of Indian Affairs has stated that the expenditure has been growing, and that is true. We have been building residential schools throughout Canada so that these people may become educated, and as the schools increase in number of course both capital expenditure and cost of maintenance will increase. That is being looked after.

The main reduction this year is in capital expenditure; that is, we are not undertaking this year to build new schools or to construct new roads in these reserves. But it will be observed that the sum of $200,000 has been inserted in the supplementary estimates to provide for hospitalization and against destitution that may occur amongst our Indian wards. This was necessary because the condition which now prevails could not have been anticipated when the main estimates were brought down. We had hoped, as every Canadian had, that conditions would become better, but under conditions that now prevail, when it is difficult for white people to secure work, it is more difficult for Indians to do so, and in addition to that the Indians' former hunting rights have been curtailed by reason of the hunting by the whites. But we have taken the necessary steps to provide for these people.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the Indian population by provinces?

Mr. MURPHY: The total Indian population is in round figures about 108,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Men, women and children.

Mr. MURPHY: By provinces it is as follows:

Nova Scotia	1,827
New Brunswick	1,606
Prince Edward Island	315
Ontario	27,420
Quebec	12,885
British Columbia	25,107
Manitoba	12,263
Saskatchewan	10,784
Alberta	10,311
Northwest Territories	4,150

Mr. DONNELLY: Is the Indian population increasing or decreasing?

Mr. MURPHY: It is about stationary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not in any spirit of criticism but rather to be helpful that I wish to offer a few remarks with respect to the question raised by the hon. member for East Algoma. For some years we tried to make arrangements with the provincial governments for the purpose of having set apart in Ontario or Quebec or the older provinces, hunting areas from which the white trapper would be excluded, that is, areas in addition to the reserves that are set aside for the Indians. Naturally the provinces did not view this matter at the start with a great deal of favour, but after considerable discussion about the matter on different occasions with various ministers, I found a disposition on the part of the provinces—and I am passing this on to the minister now—to consider with some favour a proposition of that kind. What the minister says is probably true. The plains Indians with a tendency towards farming have a much better chance of securing a livelihood than those in the wooded areas, who have to obtain their living by hunting. If an arrangement could be made with the provinces whereby the Indians might have the exclusive privilege of hunting in certain areas, this would be of immense benefit to the Indians and helpful to the exchequer of the federal government. I mention this now merely in order that the minister may be able to say with full assurance that he has the complete support of those who were in office before him in endeavouring to secure this privilege for our Indians, because unless something of this kind is done, the plight of the Indians who gain their subsistence by hunting will be serious. Year by year it has been growing gradually worse, and the fact that the price of fur has increased in value has only added to the difficulty. This situation is not confined to any one province; it is general throughout Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Several weeks ago I brought to the attention of the minister the complaints of the Indians on the Pasqua reserve with regard to the granting of a lease to the Antapa Club. I should like to ask the minister if it is possible in some way that the wishes of the Indians may be met in this case.

Mr. MURPHY: I understand at the present time there are no complaints before the department, although in former times protests were received in regard to the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I took some time to bring to the attention of the minister and the house the protests which the Indians had definitely made to me with regard to the lease. Those protests were very active and recent; they came to me only a few weeks ago. The minister can hardly take the view there is no protest or no trouble at the present time.

Mr. MURPHY: In view of what the hon. member has stated, I can only say that the matter will be investigated by the department in order to correct the injustice, if any, that has been done.

Mr. McINTOSH: The minister, in his statement to the committee, said that the department had not any intention of building or rebuilding any residential Indian schools in western Canada this year. What is his policy in connection with some of the schools which have been burned? Is action on them to be postponed for years?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not know whether or not the hon. member has any particular case in mind. I made the statement that the department were not making any capital expenditure this year not only in western Canada but in the country generally.

Mr. McINTOSH: There is an Indian school at Beauval in the northwestern part of North Battleford. Will the minister take any action on it?

Mr. MURPHY: I understand the school at Beauval has been partly rebuilt. My general statement holds good, that we are making no capital expenditure this year on buildings throughout Canada, or on the construction of roads.

Mr. McINTOSH: So the policy with regard to a new school there will be determined in the future; am I to understand that?

Mr. MURPHY: We are not rebuilding there at the present time any new school, although as I said before, I think the school has been partly rebuilt or some buildings have been erected there to give temporary accommodation to the pupils.

Item agreed to.

Agriculture—entomology, $35,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Are all the agriculture items up to this one passed, Mr. Chairman? If so, there must have been a lot passed since the live stock item on Saturday night.

Mr. McINTOSH: The items must have been smuggled through.

Mr. BENNETT: On a question of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has suggested that the estimates have been smuggled through. He must withdraw that statement.

Mr. McINTOSH: That was just an emphatic word which I thought would be properly interpreted.

Mr. BENNETT: No estimates have been marked as carried which have not been considered by the committee and passed. There is no question about that at all.

The CHAIRMAN: When the hon. member for Melville got up on Saturday night, some estimates had been passed and the committee allowed the hon. gentleman to discuss certain items on another item.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A lot of these agriculture items were never mentioned on Saturday at all. My intention is to act as nice as pie this afternoon so that we may prorogue by five o'clock. I am saying that on behalf of myself because some members seem to think that I was holding things up. What other items will the chairman permit us to discuss live stock on? My understanding was that these items had not passed.

The CHAIRMAN: I will permit anything if the committee consents. I have the estimates before me, and I call the number of the votes; that is all.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the agriculture items that are standing, some six in number, I believe—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When did the other four get through?

The CHAIRMAN: On Saturday night.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend may discuss anything from the genesis of agriculture down to the exodus of this house this afternoon.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On any item?

Mr. BENNETT: And I trust that in the meantime a revelation will come to him as to what is involved.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Revelations have come to me, and I hope they will come to my right hon. friend. If we are going to discuss the agriculture estimates, the first thing I would request is that the Minister of Agriculture take charge of these estimates as soon as possible.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right. He will.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I knew my right hon. friend would act nice when I acted nice.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear; it works both ways.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the Minister of Agriculture would get a little nearer, I would be able to hear him better. We are going to have a real family reunion before we leave. May I quote from yesterday's Hansard?

Mr. BENNETT: May I make clear to my hon. friend that a citation from Hansard is always permissible except it be with respect to matters on which the house has arrived at a decision, or observations made during a debate on an amendment to the address or on going into supply, which must not again be referred to, for the reason that if you did the discussion would be interminable. The hon. gentleman certainly has a right to refer to what was said on Saturday because we are still sitting in committee of supply with respect to the very items he mentions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All I was complaining of this morning was that that was the first time in my life that I spoke on the Speaker rising to leave the chair for the house to go into commitee of supply. It was the first time that I had heard that rule invoked this session, and it was against myself.

Mr. BENNETT: New experiences are always interesting.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In reply to the Prime Minister on Saturday night, well after eleven o'clock, I stated that while we had discussed one agriculture item a long while, on four different days, it was because the minister refused or at all events did not bring down the information sought. The Minister of Agriculture replied, "That is not a correct statement." "According to Hansard the information was asked for on May 28, and was produced on May 29." This does not really amount to a very great deal except that if I let it go unchallenged I am afraid that the Minister of Agriculture will develop a penchant for saying what is not correct himself. We have had two or three manifestations of that already, especially in connection with Waterhen lake, and I do not want that habit to become chronic in him. On the 26th of May I endeavoured to get the record of the production of milk for the past ten years. I had a reason for that. There had been such a hullabaloo all through the last election about Australian butter and what not, that I wanted to show that the proper measure for estimating the condition of the dairy industry in any country was the production of milk, no matter what it goes into, no matter if it goes into a dozen different dairy commodities. I quoted figures of the production of milk from 1922 to 1929, showing an increase from ten billion pounds in 1922 to fourteen billion pounds in 1929, or an increase of from 40 to 45 per cent. That is a good increase. The whole Tory raft over there went up in the air and looked like going up the flue.

Mr. BENNETT: If the raft went up in the air it would be difficult to go up the flue.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They soon caught on to what I was aiming at and started to block the giving of the information. I think they were more to blame than the minister. I had asked for the information on the 26th, and then on the 27th, which was a Wednesday, the hon. member for Labelle gave an excellent speech on the Russian situation which occupied the time of the house to almost six o'clock.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Will the hon. member give the page of Hansard where he first asked for that information?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The estimates were taken up on the 26th of May. My hon. friend has the same Hansard as I have, but I will give the page for his convenience. It is page 2159, of May 26. I gave the information myself because the minister was looking rather helpless. I had asked him for the information, and he indicated by his appearance that he had not got it and I gave it to him, and immediately the hubbub started to show that my figures were wrong, and things went on for the next two or three days in that way. Then on the 28th of May the hon. member for Provencher brought down some figures that were practically all right, and there was some firing at those. It was not until the 29th of May, at page 2139 of Hansard, that the matter was finally disposed of. The minister brought down figures, but I defy anybody to find any meaning in them. They were brought down, I will not say intentionally but probably unwittingly, in such a way that they were not arranged in consecutive order, and I for one could not understand them. Then he gave some further figures which he said were mine; he would not take responsibility, however, but said they were mine. I accepted his statement, but found that the return was not official. Towards the end of the discussion the Minister of Agriculture said he had not wittingly withheld any information. Here is my reply to that:

When the committee resumed at eight o'clock we were in hopes that we should be able to get this vote through, and possibly the next one.

Hon. members on this side of the house will recall that.

But the minister has made a statement this evening which makes it impossible for the item to go through. He has said that he did not wittingly withhold any information from the committee. The whole difficulty existed in the different parties securing their figures from different sources.

That is, from the statistics branch and the dairy branch. To all intents and purposes they were both the same; the statistics from the dairy branch were based on those from the bureau of statistics, and the figures are so arranged that they do not conflict.

Well, for four days we have been endeavouring to get certain information, and the hon. gentleman is not conscious of having wittingly withheld it. Has he been in a trance all these four days, that he did not know what we wanted?

Either he was in a trance, or all the rest of us were. I intimated in one place that I had asked four times for the information, and that I would ask for it four times four, until I got it. The discussion ended some time after the information was brought down in that somewhat upside down fashion. He did bring it down eventually.

Then, just last week we dealt with the agricultural estimates, and particularly with dairying. After we had disposed of the national dairy council I looked up the information concerning dairying, cold storage fruit branch and seed, feed and fertilizer branch, and dehydrating. Those four votes went through so rapidly that one of them is not recorded in Hansard at all, namely the seed, feed and fertilizer item. Then on Saturday a number of supplementary estimates went through, of which one or two were important. I did not rise from my chair, and all the civil government items went through without comment. I do not know what would have been passed, and certainly we would not be here to-day if some of us had not objected mildly. If it were so important to prorogue—

Mr. BENNETT: It was not.

Mr MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend was quite ready for prorogation at any rate, at the indecent hour of midnight. You would think we were a lot of criminals wanting to run away from the scene of our operation.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am glad we are in agreement; we are getting along famously.

Mr. BENNETT: Splendidly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would say to the minister that it was on the evening of the fourth day after the matter was brought up that we received the information, and we did not get it properly even at that time.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first place, I have some information which although not of a controversial nature may be of some interest to the house in view of what was said on Saturday night concerning the rushing through of estimates. On May 26 I presented to the committee vote No. 107, asking for a certain amount of money for dairying. The vote asked was for exactly the same amount as had been asked a year ago when the present opposition were in power. The work was carried on by exactly the same staff, and practically the same work was to be provided for by the vote as had been provided in the previous year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is the minister referring to the year before?

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The number of pages devoted to the discussion of this year's vote was a little better than one hundred. Last year the total agricultural estimates were contained in only six pages of Hansard. I give those figures merely by way of information. When the ex-Minister of Agriculture got to his feet to-day he stated that he had asked for information on the four days the dairying item was under discussion. He made certain references regarding my veracity. During this session however I have hesitated very much, having a due appreciation of my hon. friend's age—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That does not need to cut any ice; I am far younger than you think I am.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That particular vote was discussed for four days and—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I asked my hon. friend at what page of Hansard he had first asked for the information, and he stated it was page 2139.

An hon. MEMBER: Page 2159.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That item was not discussed on page 2139 at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Probably my speech is getting impaired also, but—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The first record I can find in Hansard of the hon. gentleman asking a question is on May 28, and I brought the information down on the following day. I think this is a matter too small to be of importance. When the hon. member spoke, without any provocation whatever, but through the natural working of his mind, he said that Doctor Archibald had been offered by the Russian government much more than he was being paid here, but that he had refused to go. I am informed by Doctor Archibald that he never received any offer from the Russian government. He made many statements like that, and that is why I said that I did not believe the hon. member was making misrepresentations, and that I was making full allowance, in all sincerity for his illness, his age and his—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You can cut that out, or you will get more than you are bargaining for and we won't prorogue at all tonight. Those are downright stupid statements. Having regard to the hon. member's inherent stupidity in—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr STEVENS: Oh, put a little grace into it.

Mr. BENNETT: He is talking about stupidity; let him prove it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I would ask the hon. member to refrain from those expressions.

Mr MOTHERWELL: To read from page 2159 of Hansard:

He may use it to produce any commodity he wishes—

Speaking about what could be done with milk.

—or any form which he can derive the greatest amount of money. I wonder if the minister had the data concerning the number of pounds of milk produced. If he has not, I may tell him that I have the figures before me.

That is to be found at page 2159 of Hansard.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No question is asked there.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let us see what the committee understood. At page 2160 I find the following:

Mr. McIntosh: Let us have the correct figures.

Mr. McIntosh made that statement when hon. members had jumped on my figures like a meat axe, trying to make out that they were wrong. Mr. McIntosh said, "Let us have the correct figures." Then Mr. Casgrain, about a couple of inches further on in Hansard said:

We ought to have a statement from the minister so that we may find out whether the figures placed on record by the hon. member from Melville are correct.

Now, isn't that asking for something? Was not the minister asked at that page by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay and by the hon. member for North Battleford to put the correct figures on Hansard if my figures were not correct? That was the whole issue for the two days, and now he is trying to get out of it. Is not what I read on that page of Hansard?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What my hon. friend read about his own statement does not contain a question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But did not the others ask the question? The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay said:

We ought to have a statement from the minister so that we may find out whether the figures placed on record by the hon. member for Melville are correct.

That is on the next page, and now the minister is trying to squirm out of it. Is that statement on that page, or is it not? I think the hon. gentleman was in a trance all the way through, so we will let it go at that.

Mr. VALLANCE: I was rather surprised to hear the Minister of Agriculture state that on a previous occasion the opposition took up one hundred pages of Hansard in connection with his estimates. He must expect that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Did I say the opposition took up one hundred pages of Hansard?

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister said the house took up one hundred pages of Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: The opposition took up most of it.

Mr. VALLANCE: You can talk when I get through. It is obvious why that was done. As I pointed out in the very beginning, the minister announced so many different policies that what we wanted to know, and what we want to know now, is what is his policy. The reason I rose on Saturday night was because I was interested in live stock and I wanted to know his policy in that regard. I have in my hand a pamphlet having to do with the bull-loaning policy, and I should like the minister to tell us just what that policy is. On the bottom of the pamphlet is printed "By the direction of Hon. Robert Weir," not the late minister but the present Minister of Agriculture. I think it is only fair to the minister that he should have a chance to tell us just how he arrived at that new policy, and all about it. Another item was passed having to do with assistance to fairs and exhibitions, including the royal agricultural winter fair. Most of us are interested in fairs, and I think the minister should have the opportunity of telling us just what is his policy with regard to fairs. I say this in the kindliest way possible; I should like to get those statements on Hansard so that those who read it may know what is to be done. I should like the press to-night, if they so desire, to be able to state that the Minister of Agriculture has laid down his policy regarding agricultural fairs, whatever it may be. I think it is only fair to the government and to the Minister of Agriculture, so I hope before the house does prorogue he will give us a short statement with regard to his live stock policy, his bull-loaning policy and the policy of assistance to fairs.

Mr. GOBEIL: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. VALLANCE: I think now is the time for the minister to make that statement, if he has one.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Compton has the floor.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have asked for a statement, in the most kindly way. If hon. members opposite want me to be otherwise I can accommodate them.

Mr. GOBEIL: As some latitude has been given the hon. member for Melville to discuss items already passed I wish to take the opportunity to make a few remarks in connection with item 115.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. GOBEIL: I did not like to say anything when the item was passed Saturday evening because we were expecting to prorogue, but after the fine exhibition given by hon. gentlemen opposite Saturday evening and this morning I think I might very well take up a few minutes without being accused of delaying the house. First I want to congratulate the Prime Minister for having adjourned the house Saturday night.

Mr. VALLANCE: Stay with the estimates.

Mr. GOBEIL: I will come to them, but this is the reason I am speaking. After what was said this morning I feel that my remark the other night to an hon. member on this side of the house was justified, when I said that hon. gentlemen opposite were seeking to go back to their constituencies and tell their people that this government had overlooked the interests of the farmers of this country.

Mr. VALLANCE: I rise to a point of order. What we did was to prevent the government from doing that very thing.

Mr. GOBEIL: Everyone in this house and everyone in Ottawa expected the house to prorogue Saturday evening. Knowing that, hon. gentlemen opposite took up the time of the house until eleven o'clock with trifles. Even the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, who ordinarily has a sense of proportion, took up half an hour talking about the dismissal of all political partisan.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GOBEIL: Then at eleven o'clock hon. gentlemen opposite thought this government were so anxious to prorogue that they would force through the estimates, so my hon. friends would be able to go home and tell their people that this government were not interested in agriculture.

Mr. PERRAS: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I understand that item 115 was carried Saturday evening, so why debate it again?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is quite right; the point of order is well taken and this discussion is out of order. It is going on by the unanimous consent of the committee, but it is strictly out of order.

Mr. GOBEIL: Now I want to come to item 115, and to refer the committee to some criticism which was directed to it on a previous occasion, and even this morning to some extent. On May 18 of this year the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville, in criticizing the government for not raising the indemnity on slaughtered cattle, said that in his constituency cattle had been slaughtered in the months of April, May, June and July.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. GOBEIL: I am in order; this comes under the item I am discussing.

The CHAIRMAN: The item before the committee is 117, but the hon. member for Melville was given leave, by unanimous consent, to discuss item 115.

Mr. CHEVRIER: What does item 117 cover?

The CHAIRMAN: The administration of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act.

Mr. GOBEIL: The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville told the government that they had not done their duty; he said that the indemnity for slaughtered cattle should be increased. The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville also criticized the government for not having increased it. He said that if the Liberal government had been returned to power in July last the Quebec government would not have had to offer an indemnity for slaughtered cattle. The hon. member for Russell went further; he said that the law should be made retroactive. I mention these hon. gentlemen because it is obvious that every one of them criticized the late government. When the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville, in May of this year, said that cattle had been slaughtered in his own county and that the farmers had not received a just compensation, there can be no doubt in the mind of anyone that the hon. gentleman was criticizing the late administration and the former Minister of Agriculture. And when the hon. member for Russell says that the law should be retroactive, what is he aiming at? The hon. member for Russell was on this side of the house, a member of this house, when the animals in his county were slaughtered. But he never rose in his place to defend the farmers. Why? Because his party was then in power. Now, however, when the Conservatives are in power, he wants to have the law made retroactive so as to remedy the wrongs done by the government which he supported.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch has told us a few of the good things which the former Minister of Agriculture did. Well, let me tell some of the things that he did do. When the hon. member for Melville took the portfolio of Minister of Agriculture what was the law in regard to compensation for cattle slaughtered? The maximum indemnity in 1921 was $250 for pure-bred cattle and $80 for grade cattle. Was the hon. gentleman satisfied with that? No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was here in 1922.

Mr. GOBEIL: The hon. gentleman thought the farmers were getting too much and when he got into power he reduced the maximum compensation paid to $200 for pure bred and $60 for grade cattle. That was something. He liked the farmers so well that he did not think that was good enough; so in 1923, the following year, he had to do something more for them. He reduced still further the compensation which they were being paid; he fixed it at $150 for pure bred and $60 for grade cattle. That was something else he did for the farmers. He met with a good deal of criticism, and I myself heard a lot of it. Two or three years later he had a generous impulse. The number of pure bred cattle provided for, under the accredited herd system was ten, and in order to meet the criticism of the people he reduced the number to five. That was in 1925. However, he did not leave it at that figure very long, for in 1928 he again restored the number to ten. But he made his regulations somewhat more rigid than before. He decided that even if a man had ten head of pure bred cattle he should not be allowed to come under the accredited herd system unless that number represented one-third of his herd. Moreover, the cattle had to be at least six months old, and the bull at the head of the herd twelve months. He made the regulations more severe. That was how much he loved the farmers. But the hon. gentleman decided that he had to do something more. Until that time the compensation had been paid for every head of cattle slaughtered; but the hon. member for Melville considered this a little too generous and so he sent out a circular letter in which he said that thereafter there would be no compensation for steers. So that all farmers raising steers found themselves excluded from the accredited herd system; if they did come under it they ran the risk of having their cattle slaughtered without compensation.

Now I have given these figures to show the unfairness of the criticism that has been made against this government. When the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville and the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville criticized this government in connection with this item, were they not criticizing the leader of the opposition? During the nine years the right hon. gentleman was in power his government kept reducing the compensation and making the regulations gradually more rigid, so that fewer farmers could take advantage of the system. Is it fair, therefore, for them to accuse this government of delays and of not doing its duty? Is it fair for them to suggest that if the Liberal party had remained in power at Ottawa Premier Taschereau would not have had to pass a law for the compensation of the farmers of Quebec?

Speaking of the generosity of hon. gentlemen opposite, in 1929 the legislative assembly of Quebec passed a resolution authorizing the government of that province to communicate with the federal government with a view to fixing a more reasonable compensation for farmers whose cattle were slaughtered under the act. Now the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville comes before this house and accuses this government of failure to do its duty, saying that if the Liberal party had remained in power Mr. Taschereau would not have had to do what he did. Well, for three years Mr. Taschereau did practically nothing, though his friends were in power at Ottawa. But when the Conservatives are in power at Ottawa and he faces the electors of Quebec then he passes a little law offering some compensation to the farmers. I quite understand that hon. members are anxious to have this and other items carried, but I could not let it pass without commenting upon the remarks of the hon. member for Melville.

I am asking the Minister of Agriculture to be more generous with the farmers of Canada than was the hon. member for Melville. I am asking that more compensation be paid to the breeders of steers. I am interested in this matter because of the total steers exported from the province of Quebec, the county of Compton exported over one-third.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the hon. gentleman does not know anything about this act his criticism would be quite reasonable, but it seems to be based upon an entire lack of information of the cattle compensation business. I could not catch all that the hon. member said, but I heard enough to understand that he thought the compensation should not have been reduced. The prices for cattle during wartime were away up and the break did not occur until 1920. Late in 1921 we came into office, and the session of 1922 offered the first opportunity of doing anything in this regard. The cattle then were hardly worth drawing to the market in Winnipeg, and surely the hon. member must agree that there should be some relation between compensation and the value of the animal.

Mr. GOBEIL: Are the prices of cattle higher this year than they were last year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the prices for good stuff might be a little higher, but I do not think that would be the case as far as dairy cattle are concerned, because in that case the prices of the commodities produced are now at a low level. There must be a fluctuation in the compensation to compare with the fluctuation in the value of the animals. We could not change it every day or every year; my recollection is that it has not been changed since the time I mentioned, but surely my hon. friend is not suggesting that the same compensation should be paid now as during wartime.

In order to give the owners of small herds an opportunity to participate, in accredited herds they were reduced from ten to five animals. I might say that the officials of the department agreed to that reduction only under protest. They told me how it would work out, and they were correct. Abuses crept in and it was found necessary to put the figure back to ten.

I might mention to my hon. friend that there is no other country in the world which pays as high compensation for T.B. slaughtered animals as does Canada.

Mr. IRVINE: I understand the committee is dealing with item No. 117, covering the administration of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. The grave misgivings I have with respect to myself, and my concern for the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) leads me to ask whether or not any portion of this vote will be expended in this chamber.

Mr. VALLANCE: Some of it should be expended on the electorate.

Mr. WEIR: Mr. Chairman, I will make a short reply to the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). I think the hon. member will agree that one of the soundest principles of basic agriculture is that we should have as far as possible the best blood in our herds so that the largest return can be received for the feed given and the labour expended. The farmers in the outlying districts found it very expensive to locate animals which would have a tendency to improve their herds. I think I am safe in saying that on an average it would cost them as much in expenses as it would to pay for the animal itself. It was only sound economics to use the people's money to place into the hands of these farmers sires of the best possible type at the lowest possible cost. Our bull policy has been that where a group of farmers got together and requested a sire, we would undertake to supply the kind requested. Perhaps due to the depressed condition in the wheat market, farmers are turning more than ever before to the raising of live stock. The result has been that we have not been able to fill all the applications received. We have placed over 765, but that is only about 60 per cent of the applications received. Practically my only instructions to the department have been that the animals sent out must be well above the average in standing. If this is not done the results aimed at by this policy will not be achieved. I think hon. members of the committee will agree with the stipulation which has been made that the farmers in the outlying districts must be given preference in this regard.

Another policy inaugurated was the brood sow policy. As I said before, because of the low price of grain many farmers were turning to the raising of live stock. Where the production of bacon was being considered it was thought that it behooved this government to make it as easy as possible for the farmer to get the best type of brood sow. Our policy has been to keep back from the stockyards the sows of a selected bacon type and to supply these to the farmer for breeding purposes without any expense. The farmer was asked to pay only half the freight, and in order to make it still easier, in fact almost to force him to make use of this policy, certain of the provincial governments cooperated with this government and agreed to pay the other half of the freight as well as certain incidental expenses.

A further policy in connection with live stock is this: it was felt that due to the low price of wheat and the scarcity of money, especially in the west, farmers would get rid of everything they had in the shape of live stock that would bring in any money. It was also felt by people in the east there would be a tendency in the west on the part of those who were better fixed financially, to buy live stock in the east and ship it to the west. That has been done in the past and has been done very much to the cost of the western farmers. For example, we have in eastern Canada, in Ontario in particular, one disease amongst cattle that I believe, and I know many of the stockmen believe, is more of a damage and loss to the live stock of Ontario than even tuberculosis. I refer to abortion. Yet we know, according to the law at the present time in the provinces—and the Dominion has done nothing so far to counteract that—any animal that may be given the blood test for abortion and reacts, does not have to be stamped, marked or slaughtered. Therefore, with all the due respect for the people of the east, if they were shipping stock to the western people for breeding purposes, they might have a tendency to ship animals that had reacted, and this would have the effect of spreading the disease throughout the west where at the present time it is not very prevalent.

In the first place, to make it easier for the farmers in the west who wish to get breeding females, we made them this offer, that we would pay the freight to bring stock from the western stockyards to a farmer's own farm, provided that the animals came up to the standard set by the men in the stockyards or by the people appointed to make the test. Then we had inquiries in the west as to whether we would not set up breeding centres there. We felt that if we set up public breeding centres as suggested, there would be a great deal of loss in connection with them; that it would be difficult to get men to manage them in the way that we would like, and along with experienced stockmen I felt that the best way to set up breeding centres would be by men who had made a success of farming, but who on account of the price of feed in the west, had been out of live stock, who, however, were well fixed financially and wished to undertake it again. Our idea was that if we made it easier for them to get stock of high quality, they would form breeding centres from which their neighbours could secure stock. I felt that if in four years ten such breeding centres were established, this would be worth the effort we put into the matter, because in the old country even now, after all they have done in breeding and all the achievements they have made, there are only a few outstanding breeders. I was complimented on this policy in particular at the very beginning of the session by one of the Saskatchewan members, the leader of the opposition, who did me the honour of mentioning this policy, namely, of moving animals from one part of the country to another at the country's expense. I think hon. members will agree with me it was natural that this policy should appeal to him as no one has a better appreciation or understanding of the policy of moving from one part of Canada to another than has the right hon. gentleman.

In connection with fairs, many of us who have exhibited in both the west and the east have had this feeling with regard to grants to fairs in the past—I know this is a problem that has worried the Department of Agriculture for years: that much of the money that was paid as grants to fairs did not achieve the purpose it was supposed to achieve, that is, in creating in the community in which the fair was held an interest amongst the farmers themselves. For instance, there is one fair in western Canada where thousands of dollars have been paid each year. Yet that money was taken by people who were more or less professional showmen and there is practically no evidence within one hundred miles of that particular centre of any definite improvement in live stock due to the money that was paid out for agricultural purposes. For that reason we started this year as an experiment by selecting at one place in each province a fair in the nature of what we were pleased to call a regional fair, where by giving prizes we endeavoured to create a healthy competition amongst the farmers in the community. The grant is $1,000, the first prize being $400 to be given to the community that wins the most points at the exhibition. The next prize was $300; the next $200, and the next, $100. We already have returns from some of these, and I am glad to see that the result is much beyond anything that we expected as regards getting the farmers themselves interested in this work.

Another work that we are undertaking throughout Canada and that has been given more or less attention in the past—and an item that slipped through in a hurry the other night and that many of us perhaps overlooked, was in connection with it—is in reference to pasture, forage crops, etc. Even in British Columbia, which we think of as having almost unlimited pasture, the carrying power of the ranges has decreased to one-fourth, and in many places, more than that. In some sections it will take four acres now to carry as many head of cattle as one acre would have done some years ago. This year, in cooperation with the British Columbia government, we have sent two men through the range lands in that province to make a special study of grass conditions, and the report they have made has been anything but satisfactory in regard to the rangeman's economic condition. The bunch grass on which they have relied so much for their pasture cattle is practically disappearing. In eastern Canada, in the old native pastures, I believe it takes about four to six acres now to carry as many head of cattle as one acre carried a number of years ago. Speaking of the cost of production, we all admit that the cheapest feed for the production of milk is pasture and we believe that any reasonable expense we may make towards the improving of pasturage conditions will be more than warranted. One of the serious problems in the prairie provinces at the present time is that of pasture and forage crops to prevent drifting. This year the drifting has been so great that those of us who believed shelter belts and so on were the solution for it are now undecided on that point. In fact, this year it was proven that they would not prevent drifting. The western farmers, due to the price of wheat and other grains during the past few years has not been attempting to keep a great deal of live stock, even in districts where they might do so, or to pay attention to forage crops. The farmer in the west has been paying attention particularly to the raising of wheat—and I say this without criticizing them, because they turned their attention to that method of farming which they believed would give them the greatest crop—but the result has been, by taking all the fibre and strength out of the land, to create as nearly as possible the ideal condition of the desert. One thing we must concentrate on in the west, therefore, is to get the best authorities we can to work on the question of pasturage. When I came here first, I had in mind to carry on this work the official who had held the position of agrostologist. The man who had been in charge left in 1929 to go to Winnipeg, and the position had not been filled. We believed the matter was of such importance to the farmers that we could not afford to take any but the very best man we could get. There was no doubt that the best man was Professor Kirk, of the university of Saskatchewan, at Saskatoon. He is one of the three best men in that work on the American continent, and I think he is easily recognized as the best man in the Dominion of Canada. But I was up against this difficulty. Professor Kirk is a personal friend of mine—probably all the professors at the university of Saskatchewan are friends of mine; I knew how invaluable he was to the university, and I did not want to bring in his name until I was sure that the professors and the university staff felt that he was needed more for the whole Dominion than he was needed at the university. They agreed, and Professor Kirk was very anxious to come because of the greater opportunity of the work here. Therefore, in order to pay him anything like he was worth, it was necessary to put through that estimate on Saturday night, by which he is given $5,000, which is more than men are receiving who are occupying similar positions in the experimental farms branch. He is getting more than that at the university of Saskatchewan at the present time, but he was willing to come here, even at a lower salary than he is now receiving, for the good that he could do. It is only fair that I should say that the men in the experimental farms department who are the heads of branches were so anxious to get Professor Kirk here that they had no objection to his receiving more salary than they are receiving. The director of the experimental farms gets only $5,000 a year, together with a house. They were particularly anxious to have Professor Kirk, and I am sure that everyone will realize, especially with conditions as they are in the west and every where, that no wiser step could have been taken than to get a man of the type of Professor Kirk, who is himself a true scientist and will be a worthy co-worker with the men we have in the various branches of the experimental farms.

Mr. VALLANCE: I wish to thank the minister for acceding to my request. I will reserve any comment or criticism I may have of the policy as outlined by the minister because I realize that the house wishes to prorogue, and as well it will give me a little more time. But when the house next meets I hope to be able to offer some suggestions regarding the minister's policy.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) has had something to say with regard to the health of animals branch. I was prepared to have something to say on that, but I shall be very brief. I would like an explanation from the minister of the reduction of $300,000 in this item this year. To the people of the west this is the most important item in the agricultural estimates, especially when we consider that there is approximately $800,000,000 invested in live stock throughout the Dominion, and approximately $136,000,000 in the province of Saskatchewan from which I come. There has been an impression amongst the farmers throughout the west that the present Minister of Agriculture is not very much in love with the establishment of T.B. free areas.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What is your authority for that?

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I say the statement has been made that the minister is not very sympathetic towards that movement. I hope that it is not true.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Who made the statement?

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): There is no need to say. The statement has been made.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have put more pressure on that work since we started than ever was put on before.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): The hon. member for Compton this afternoon gave us to understand that the ex-Minister of Agriculture had not done all he might have done in connection with the establishment of T.B. free areas and the matter of compensation. I have very decided views in the matter of compensation, but I shall not deal with that now. I do not like to see any reduction made in the vote for the health of animals branch. Let me quote from the report of the veterinary director general, of the health of animals branch. At page 5 he says:

> I am glad to be in a position to report that there were no extensive outbreaks of contagious disease throughout the Dominion during this fiscal year.

We have statements such as that from year to year from the Department of Agriculture and the health of animals branch, and we are in that fortunate position because we have been spending a substantial amount every year to prevent these contagious diseases spreading. For that reason I do not like to see the vote cut down. Suppose we had an outbreak of foot and mouth disease, which we have never had in this country because of the activities of the officials of the health of animals branch. There would not only be the loss of the animal, but the loss of our market because of the embargo that would be put on by other countries against our cattle. In the same bulletin from which I quoted mention is made of a disease called dourine, which was prevalent in Canada at one time, and I note that nearly $49,000 was expended in compensation for that disease. Within the last nine or ten years there has not been a case of it in Canada. This is largely due to the fact that we have been spending substantial sums on the health of animals branch, and I would like an explanation from the minister as to why a reduction is being made in the vote this year. There are a great many other things I should like to say in connection with this vote, but I shall defer my remarks to a later time.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In answer to the question raised by my hon. friend it is only fair to myself to ask that the hon. gentleman before he repeats rumours that he may have heard in the country, which I would think no person should pay any attention to, should at least take steps to see if there is any truth in them.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I mentioned the rumour to give the minister an opportunity of looking into it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think we are on pretty safe ground in that matter. We have put orders in council through for a lot more restricted areas in the same length of time than was done by the previous government. The reason the vote appears cut is this: The officials of the health of animals branch feel that before we undertake the establishment of any more new areas we should clean up the second tests, instead of leaving things at loose ends. The idea is to keep clean the areas that we have established, rather than to undertake new work which is impossible, according to my officials, with the staff that we have at the present time. Therefore our work this year is to complete the tests, which the experts tell me is the right thing to do, and I may say that their opinion is confirmed because in many places where we made the second test the losses have been as high as 28 and 29 out of 32. So it is advisable not to continue as we have in the past without checking up as we go along and making a complete job of it. We feel that we are on the right track. I would appreciate it if the hon. member would tell me who starts any false rumours regarding myself.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): It is quite satisfactory to me that the minister has denied the rumour. I quite appreciate that the department may find it difficult to obtain a sufficient number of men to carry on the work as they would like to do it.

There is one other matter I would like to mention, and it is one in respect to which I have criticized the previous government. I believe that in connection with the establishment of T.B. free areas there is some sort of regulation whereby it is coupled with the establishment of pure bred sire areas. I understand that in some cases, perhaps not in every case, the two interlock.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The pure bred sire area is a provincial policy.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Then I shall say no more about it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I want to run over very hurriedly the minister's policy. The question of good blood is an old, old question. If my hon. friend will look up the story of father Jacob in the book of Genesis, he will see how he put it over his father-in-law in cattle breeding. He knew more about animal genetics 4,000 years ago than most of us here to-day, including the minister. Then, we come to the sow policy. Well, the Liberal government had a sow policy which was introduced in the year 1924.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member will agree that I did not talk about that until I had to.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I wish to congratulate my hon. friend upon his publicity bureau. Nobody had a suspicion that there was a sow policy before my hon. friend took office.

Then we come to fairs, and I need only say that the previous government was doing the same work in that connection. At the Saskatoon fair there were calf clubs with one thousand calves feeding, as part of the work, among farmers' sons in the vicinity.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): There were not a thousand calves fed at the Saskatoon fair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend would listen, he would realize I was saying something complimentary. There were one thousand calves fed by boys under the auspices of the Saskatoon fair.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): They did not feed a thousand calves. I happened to be head of the organization that had that matter in hand, and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, they did. One would think my hon. friend were as deaf as I am. They did feed a thousand calves; that was part of their voluntary work among the farmers' sons.

Then, there is only one way to deal with pasture in the west. The previous government established some experiments in connection with pastures on the prairie at Manyberries, Alberta; surely the minister knows that. There is no use in his talking about pastures as something new, because that is a lot of nonsense. He did not introduce that policy, but his predecessors did six or seven years ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it is not carried.

I want to set the minister right before it is carried. For two or three weeks we heard nothing but "sheltered belts" as a means of preventing soil drifting, and my hon. friend entered into an arrangement with a provincial government to carry them into effect. I am not going to say anything about them, but the winds and drifting soil will cut down those proposed sheltered belts as quickly as he can grow them if growing caragana seed or seedlings.

I wish to congratulate the minister upon having secured the services of Professor Kirk since Mr. Angus McKay passed away about a month ago. Professor Kirk is now considered the best authority in Canada on forage crops and how to seed them down. Seeding down, after all, is the only proper policy to stop the drifting soil. To restore the prairie to its original soddy condition seeding down alone is the only policy that will succeed four years out of five. Unless the minister adopts this policy two or three of us have recommended for the last twenty-five years he might as well throw his seed in the ocean, because it will be of no use. Good work has been done at the Swift Current and Indian Head farms to demonstrate that. It has already been demonstrated at Swift Current that they cannot seed down old weedy land with a crop; that has been demonstrated, and with Professor Kirk's assistance some further progress will doubtless be made along that line.

I wonder why the minister voted down a proposal which was made in the agriculture committee a few days ago looking towards the dissemination of these views. For the information of hon. members I shall read the proposal:

> Your committee is further of the opinion that, having regard to the most serious and emergent conditions in the prairie west, referred to so fittingly and effectively in the House of Commons on July 1st by the premier, the Right Honourable R. B. Bennett, as a national calamity. Supplementary measures should be instituted forthwith, looking toward the prevention and non-recurrence of such calamities, so far as it is humanly possible to provide against, on the principle that prevention is better than cure.

With this desired end in view, your committee strongly recommends the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into:

(a) The causes of and remedy for soil drifting, especially on the open prairie;

(b) Precautions to take in seeding down to grass or clover, or the planting of trees and hedges, as possible remedial measures;

(c) Any other matter pertaining to or allied with the livestock and livestock products industry in any part of Canada.

There was a proposal to recommend the appointment of a royal commission to look into the matters contained in this recommendation. In committee my hon. friend and his associates voted down this recommendation proposed by Mr. Totzke and said that the departmental officials would take the matter up and make a similar inquiry. I would tell the minister that the Department of Agriculture officials, while quite capable to do so, have their hands full with their regular work. There is no money, either, set aside to pay for an additional inquiry from the experimental farm vote, and the proper course to take I think was to follow the recommendations contained in the document I have read. But no, the committee did not want to have it that way, and the majority voted down these recommendations.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There was no vote taken.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And my hon. friend with a majority was at the back of the the opposition to it. What did he do with this report? He has not had the courage to ask for concurrence in the house because he knew he was wrong; that is the reason. We are going home with both agriculture reports in the air and dead on the roost because my hon. friend did not submit them for adoption.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, did I use another unparliamentary remark?

The CHAIRMAN: No, I was just calling the members to order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I beg your pardon; for once at least my hon. friend in the chair is innocent.

The CHAIRMAN: No, it is not the first time. My hon. friend does not understand me.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: So much for the minister's new policies. I have referred to them because probably unwittingly he has been deceiving the entire electorate with regard to what he is doing. He is merely carrying on old policies, and I may tell him if he continues to do so he will not do badly. But to tell the people that they are new policies is absolute non sense and downright hypocrisy on his part.

Let me tell the committee what the minister was going to do about chickens. Every cockerel and every little hen was to be rounded up and be depolarized. My hon. friend has been using the word so glibly that he can say it much more quickly than I can. There were to be depolarization stations here, there, all over. It would seem as if this is the first time in Canada depolarization has been advocated. I say to him that during the war, in the year 1916, this poultry disease became prevalent among chickens in the maritime provinces. I hope the maritime representatives will not take objection to my statements. The disease became very prevalent—I hope it does not spread to the human family, and expert work was undertaken at once to eradicate it; blood tests were taken and as a result nearly all experimental farms across Canada have had this disease called Pollorum (white scours) eliminated. Ask the chickens whether this is a new policy; they have been suffering from it for a long time, and they can tell a different story.

What is the use of that kind of nonsense? The minister will not get anywhere with that. This depolarization business has been in existence during the regime of at least four former ministers—the Hon. Martin Burrell who inauguarted it, the Hon. Mr. Crerar, the Hon. Doctor Tolmie, myself and my hon. friend. I hope he will not lay claim to doing something wonderful which has been in course of correction for fifteen years, because if he does he will just do himself injury and no one any good.

The story goes that when the Minister of Agriculture attended the North Atlantic shipping conference on cattle he came back or met their representatives in Montreal with a reduction in ocean freight rates from $20 to $15 per head. It went all over Canada like a prairie fire; he was extolled everywhere, as he should have been if it were true. But here is a return brought down indicating that there have been no changes in ocean rates since 1927, when they were reduced by the North Atlantic conference, for what reason I do not know. I think it was due partly to the fact that the number of cattle shipped overseas was beginning to fall off, and the rate was lowered in order to encourage the continued shipment of cattle. Even his own staff thought he had secured a reduction; I called up and they told me the rates were reduced. Then I asked the hon. gentleman himself through a return, and he reported back that there had been no change. The rate was $15 a head in 1927, and it is the same to-day. If the hon. gentleman wants me to read the return I will do so, but I think it is not necessary. The hon. member for Marquette is not here. He is a great friend of live stock; he is a good old missionary in that respect, and he extolled the minister in this regard. He said, "Why, before the minister has been in power three months he has gone to the shipping conference in Montreal and come back with a reduction in ocean rates to $15." Why did not the minister correct those misstatements and not get his friends in wrong? Why did not his friends correct those statements and not get the minister in wrong. Do they think we do not know these things? Do they think we are not going to pull them up on these unwarranted claims. If they were even within a hundred miles of being true I would not say a word, but they are a thousand miles from the truth.

After everything being depolarized in a correct way I have just one more matter to which I should like to refer the minister to in regard to live stock. It is this: The minister is a member of the cooperative live stock pool, and my information is that a beef producers' association has grown up in the west at Calgary. Will the minister state whether the new beef producers' association is getting an organization grant now, as well as the live stock pool?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They have received no grant as yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But my hon. friend has encouraged them to organize with the idea of getting a grant and is paying for their secretary's salary. Has he done that? The minister nods. Let me implore him not to create in the live stock industry the same confusion and rivalry which existed in Saskatchewan in connection with the marketing of wheat, when we had the pool, the old Saskatchewan cooperative elevators and the United Grain Growers all competing for the same wheat and the same markets. This was fatal to the cooperative organizations in the Canadian wheat world; it was most damaging to their solidarity and to their future and was one of the causes of the present marketing condition there. Now my hon. friend admits that he is setting up a second cooperative live stock association in the west, and there can be only one result. Mr. Arkell is business manager of one organization and Mr. Jack Byers is manager or secretary of the other. Both these gentlemen are very good friends of mine, and I would regret very much if the minister should encourage, by grants or otherwise, two live stock organizations who would compete for the same ocean space—which has been very scarce recently—and the same cattle. This will result in a very serious condition unless it is possible to merge or reorganize these two organizations.

I wonder what is the purpose of the minister in encouraging the formation of the second organization. He must be doing it without knowledge of what his action will bring about, because it will create I fear such conflict that we will have nothing but a continuous struggle. It will be bad for both organizations. I cannot understand the minister; I wish to goodness he might give me some explanation which would make me think better of him and that he would not encourage competition and strife with this splendid organization, the live stock pool, which it was my privilege to assist by a grant for three or four years. My hon. friend is a member of that cooperative live stock association and he should not do anything to hurt it, but he has encouraged the formation of this other organization which will, as already intimated, compete for the same live stock and the same ocean space. I wish he would make some explanation to relieve my anxiety about this looming difficulty and possible friction ahead.

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolutions?

Mr. McINTOSH: Do I understand that items 113 and 114 are carried?

The CHAIRMAN: They were carried Saturday night.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Could we not have some explanation from the minister with regard to item 114, which is an entirely new item?

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. McINTOSH: I understood the Prime Minister to say that any debate at all could take place under the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BENNETT: Only on those which were standing.

Mr. McINTOSH: That was not made very clear by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: If we are to prorogue to-day I do not think we can permit this further debate; otherwise we will have to adjourn until to-morrow. I only make that statement in frankness and fairness.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I was here Saturday night and I did not hear the item called.

Mr. BENNETT: It passed the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This item was included in the old item and we thought it would be better to separate it.

Mr. McINTOSH: How much was the old grant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not say offhand.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Before we proceed further, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter of personal privilege to which I wish to speak.

Mr. BENNETT: Would my right hon. friend rather speak now or at a later stage?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would rather take up the matter now, because this is the first opportunity I have had with the Speaker in the chair, and I feel that the matter is important. I have in my hand a copy of the Toronto Mail and Empire of Saturday, August 1, which carries the following headline across the front page:

> Bennett Says King Told Senator Haydon: "Get The Money."

A little further down the page there is a subheading, "Go and get money", under which appears the following:

> Thrusting an accusing, quivering forefinger directly at Mr. King, Mr. Bennett declared in searing phrases that the former premier had said to his friend, Senator Haydon. "Go and get money"—and that Senator Haydon had promptly gone and got it from Beauharnois. . . .

The moment I saw this paper, Mr. Speaker, I read through the speech made by the Prime Minister of which the article purports to be a reproduction and from which it is to be assumed the headings have been drawn. May I say that I could see nothing in the speech made by the Prime Minister, from beginning to close, nor have I seen or heard in any speech made by the right hon. gentleman at any time in this house any statement which justifies the heading appearing there or the statement I have read. The Prime Minister is in this House of Commons in front of me at the moment, and I should like him to say whether he ever made any such statement. I know very well that my right hon. friend will not say he made a statement of the kind; I am perfectly sure he would be the last person to do so. For any paper to print such a heading or to make such a statement as one purporting to reproduce what was said in any debate which occurred in this House of Commons is to render itself open to an action for criminal libel.

Now I want to say that my right hon. friend, to use his own words on Friday last, did resort to the "cunning device, to insinuate hypothetical conditions and draw hypothetical conclusions, and then afford an opportunity for his political friends to go out into the country and quote them as indicating the true position."

Mr. BENNETT: This cannot be a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So long as he held to insinuations and to innuendos I remained silent knowing that the records of this parliament would speak for themselves. Had there been a direct statement of the character here ascribed to the Prime Minister I most certainly would immediately have taken exception to it. I am making this statement at the moment, Mr. Speaker, first of all by way of protest and correction, and in the second place in order to say again emphatically that at no time since I have been leader of a political party have I given directions to anyone with respect to campaign funds. I am further making this statement from my place in parliament for the reason that it may become necessary for me, if this kind of thing is repeated by any individual or any newspaper in this country, to consider having regard to the source whether I shall not immediately institute an action for criminal libel. I do not wish the party who repeats an allegation of the kind to be able in mitigation or in self-defence to plead that, when I had opportunity in the House of Commons, I had not taken advantage of it first to correct what was false, and next to state to the house what was true.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is not usual, on questions of privilege, to avail oneself of the opportunity to make a speech; the Speaker has frequently ruled that this is improper. Nor is it usual to make threats against those who are not members of the house or those who are members. That is not regarded as a question of privilege. On a question of privilege it is the right of every member to deny the accuracy of reports that have been made with respect to what he has said in this house. The right hon. gentleman was perfectly within his rights in availing himself of the opportunity to deny the accuracy of the report to which he alluded. I have not looked at Hansard, but if the right hon. gentleman says that he has gone over Hansard and that the statements made in the newspaper to which he refers are not extracts from speeches reported in Hansard, then it must be that the statements are incorrect. I am perfectly content to take his word in that regard. Beyond that I cannot go.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message.

Ottawa, August 3, 1931.

SIR,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Lyman P. Duff, acting as the deputy of the governor general, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Monday, August 3, at 5 p.m., for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

James F. Crowdy,

Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LAVERGNE

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I have observed that after hon. gentlemen have spoken in the house they are entitled to correct their speeches as reported in Hansard. I am getting up in years, but I can remember that in the old days if an hon. member wished to correct Hansard he had to rise in the house on a question of privilege. I have read recently some speeches reported in Hansard, to the delivery of which I listened carefully, and which were entirely different as reported. I would suggest that the first edition of Hansard, at any rate, should not be open to correction on the part of members without at least having the corrections brought before the house. Certainly speeches have been made in this house during this session, which I have read in Hansard, and the reports have not accorded with the original. I think the old practice was much better. When we wanted to correct Hansard we had to rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should state some specific instance instead of making a general charge against Hansard.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Mr. Speaker, in my remarks I was referring to hon. members personally and not to Hansard.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE

The house proceeded to consider certain resolutions reported from committee of supply.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the year ending March 31, 1932, the sum of $181,101,991.28 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 145, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1932.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, and reported.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the bill be read the third time. In doing so, may I avail myself of this opportunity to thank the right hon. gentleman opposite for having made it possible to close before six o'clock.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

In the Senate chamber the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1932.

To these bills the royal assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In His Majesty's name the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these bills.

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted supplies required to enable the government to defray certain expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1932.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

To this bill the Clerk of the Senate, by command of the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, did thereupon say:

In His Majesty's name, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General thanks his loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this bill.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

After which the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the second session of the seventeenth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I desire to thank you for the diligence and efficiency with which you have discharged your duties during the present session of Parliament.

The development of Canadian industry and agriculture has been further promoted through the measures you have enacted.

A Tariff Board has been created, one of the functions of which will be to aid in the stabilization of trade and the establishment of an equitable relationship between the costs of production and consumption.

The changes provided for in the system of government accounting will, it is believed, make for greater simplicity and more effective control over the finances of the country.

The measures granting assistance to the wheat producer, and for the distribution of coal will do much to assist those industries.

Among other important measures enacted were Bills respecting: Copyright; Canadian National Railway Company; Pensions; Soldiers Settlement; Consolidated Revenue and Audit; Vocational Education; The Royal Canadian Mint; Old Age Pensions.

Approval has been given the proposed measure of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to be known as the Statute of Westminster, and His Majesty The King has been humbly petitioned to cause it to be laid before that Parliament. Prior to such approval being given, delegates of my Government and of all the Provinces of Canada at the invitation of my Prime Minister, met at Ottawa and approved for insertion in the proposed measure a clause defining the rights of the Dominion and Provinces in respect to its provisions.

The commercial agreement negotiated with the Commonwealth of Australia and ratified by Parliament will, I confidently believe, be of advantage to both our countries. This agreement manifests the desire of my government to enter into similar trade agreements with other parts of the Empire.

The Imperial Economic Conference, adjourned last November to reassemble at Ottawa during the latter part of the current year, has been postponed because of circumstances which prevented the representation at the conference of all the dominions of the Empire. It is confidently believed that when this conference reassembles, an Empire trade agreement of advantage to all its parts may be consummated.

The Conversion Loan of 1931, through which there was reinvested in securities of the Dominion of Canada a sum of approximately six hundred and forty million dollars, affords striking proof of the confidence of the general public in the financial strength of the country.

As a result of the Parliamentary inquiry into the operations of the Beauharnois Power Corporations, measures have been enacted to secure the public interest against harmful exploitation of our natural resources and to safeguard the rights of bona fide investors.

Since you entered upon the duties of the session, the world-wide depression in economic conditions has grown more acute, and the consequent state of unemployment and distress in many parts of the country has been intensified through the partial failure of the wheat crop of western Canada. To augment existing relief measures, the Governor-in-Council has been empowered to take the necessary action to provide the maximum of employment and to aid, by such means as may be deemed expedient, the recovery from the adverse conditions arising primarily from the crop failure.

The great powers of Europe and America, following the generous and constructive action of the President of the United States of America, which Canada whole-heartedly endorses, are unitedly striving for the re-establishment of better world conditions. Towards this purpose we may now effectively contribute, by steadfastly bending ourselves to the task of freeing Canada from the consequences of this universal state of economic depression and of the particular misfortune which has befallen the West; so that this country may be ready to take its place in the forefront of the world's recovery.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision you have made for the public service.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I join with you in sympathy for those upon whom the present conditions bear most heavily. As our burden is less than that of other countries, so have we, as a Nation, the greater duty to aid the unfortunate among our citizens. I commend your zeal for the common good. It is the crowning proof of the unassailable unity of the Canadian people. These troubled times will pass, for adversity is powerless against the will of Canada to regain the happiness and prosperity which are its birthright. May Divine Providence bless and guide you in all your labours.

This concluded the second session of the seventeenth parliament.

END OF VOLUME IV
