Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We ordered an inquiry, if a sworn statement was made. The ex-Postmaster General knows all about this. A sworn statement is made to the effect that the postmaster has been guilty of political interference; we then appoint a commissioner to hold the necessary inquiry and we base our decision on the commissioner's report. I must add that all inquiries were not followed by dismissals, there were a number of cases where the evidence was not sufficiently convincing.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Did this commissioner also make inquiries in connection with cases of administration?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The commissioner, no; but officials of the department did. When it is a matter of administration, an official of the department is sent to make an inquiry regarding the administration of the post office. When it is a matter of political interference, a commissioner is appointed by an order in council; he questions witnesses under oath and we base our decision on the results of his inquiry.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Where did you take these commissioners?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That depended on the provinces. When the matter concerned Ontario, we sought him in Ontario, and when it concerned Quebec, we went to Quebec.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Am I given to understand that such was the case in the Lake St. John district?

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): They were always Conservatives.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I did not first inquire whether the person suggested belonged to the Conservative or Liberal party.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Mr. Chairman, I listened to the remarks of the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) with a great deal of interest and no small amount of amusement, especially to the statement, or rather the plea, he made to the present Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) that he follow in his footsteps and carry out the policies inaugurated by the former administration. I do not intend to criticize the previous administration of the Post Office Department, as I am only a new member and do not know very much about it, but as far as the dismissal of postmasters is concerned, I sincerely hope that the present Postmaster General does not follow in the footsteps of his predecessor.

I should like to direct the attention of the committee to one specific case in my own constituency. In the town of Slater a gentleman named Mr. Hrushowy, who had been postmaster for fifteen years, was dismissed in 1927 without any just cause or reason being given. He wrote several letters and had his lawyer send several communications to the department asking the reason for his dismissal. Finally a reply was received from the Postmaster General. This letter is dated Ottawa, October 24, 1927, and reads as follows:

Mr. C. A. L. Murchison,
722 McIntyre Block,
Winnipeg, Man.

My Dear Sir,—

On my return to Ottawa, my secretary placed before me yours of the 13th instant, with reference to the dismissal of Mr. Hrushowy as postmaster at Slater. I note you are under the impression that he was dismissed on recommendation of Mr. Bird, M.P. This is not the case, as Mr. Bird had nothing to do with it. The dismissal was made on the recommendation of the executive of the Liberal association. I do not see how I could now reinstate him.

Yours very truly,
P. J. Veniot.

Since I came to Ottawa I have written several letters myself in an effort to find out the reason for this man's dismissal. I appreciate the fact that since a new postmaster has been appointed it would be rather a hardship to let him go in order to put Mr. Hrushowy back on the job, but in justice to a man who has served for fifteen years, I think the reason for his dismissal should be given.

Mr. Bird, my predecessor, did not make any objection to this man, and the letter of the Postmaster General states quite frankly that the dismissal was made at the request of the Liberal association. Does the committee consider that this man has received a fair deal? Again I suggest to the present Postmaster General that he should not follow in the footsteps of the former incumbent of that office.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, if I may revert for a moment to the item before the committee, I wish to direct attention to a situation which has arisen in the province of Alberta. In this connection I have had some correspondence with the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé), and I believe he is familiar with the facts. This situation arises through the application of the minimum wage law, to the assistants employed by the postmasters in the small towns throughout the province. While most of us are distinctly in favour of a minimum wage, we must realize the effect which this act must have upon postmasters whose salaries are based upon a totally different principle. In many cases the application of the act has doubled the remuneration received by these girls, as well as shortened the hours of work. I have no complaint to make with respect to minimum wage laws, nor do I think these girls are receiving too much, but the committee will readily see that it places the postmasters in a very difficult position. I believe that the Postmaster General is familiar with this matter, and that it is being taken into consideration with a view to seeing whether something cannot be done to meet the situation. I urge that action be taken.

There is another matter to which I would direct attention, one of general application which has some connection with what I have just mentioned. I have received numerous requests from postmasters located in the smaller points who receive very low salaries and are dependent upon commissions on sales of stamps for the larger part of their remuneration. They are very anxious to know what policy will be followed now that a three cent rate has been put into force—what percentage of commission will be paid, whether it will remain the same as it was under the two cent rate, and how soon, if changes are to be made, they may expect them. In other words they would like to know how soon they may have some reasonable understanding as to their probable income during the coming year. I should be glad if the minister could make some statement on that point. As I say, I am speaking at the request of a number of the postmasters, particularly at smaller points, who have written to me in respect of both these questions.

Mr. SAUVE: The application of the act has not yet been made to the postmasters.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think, however, notice has been given that it will be. Is the minister prepared to make any statement as to the commission that will be paid under the three cent postal rate?

Mr. SAUVE: We are considering the matter.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: A decision has not yet been reached in that regard?

Mr. SAUVE: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me say to hon. members opposite that to call "carried" does not mean that the item is passed. They will be treating the minister more fairly if they do not make these interjections, because the more they call "carried" the more I will oppose it. I have privileges as a member and I do not think it helps the minister at all for hon. members opposite to keep on interrupting by calling "carried."

In reply to the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) and his expressed wish that the present Postmaster General shall not follow along the lines adopted by the former one in the matter of dismissals, I have just a word to say. I occupied the position of Postmaster General from the 26th day of September, 1926, to the 7th or 8th day of August, 1930.

Mr. SPOTTON: Too long.

Mr. VENIOT: It may have been too long, but I may tell the hon. member who interrupts me that he never applied to my department without getting a fair deal. The only thing I hope for is that he will get as fair a deal from the present Postmaster General as he did from me, although he does not deserve it.

I have been accused of wielding the political axe. I shall not say that I did not wield the political axe, in a sense. I was not going to refer to this matter, but since the friends of the present Postmaster General have taken the matter up and attacked me, he may have to raise the cry, "Save me from my friends." Had they not raised the question I would not have dealt with it, but I am forced to deal with it in self-defence.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't worry.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not worrying. That is the reason I am standing here, and I hold in my hand the means of protection. During the four years that I was in office the changes made in the Post Office Department amounted to 602. The classification of dismissals effected by me during those four years and the reasons given are the same as in the case of the present Postmaster General. Therefore, so far as dismissals are concerned, we are both politically and otherwise on the same basis. During my tenure of office 602 postmasters were dismissed for various reasons as follows:

Short in finances and irregularities..	94
Political causes..	144
Abandonment of post office..	4
Unsatisfactory service and in the interests of the public..	274
Change in location..	80
Farming out of office..	2
Reinstallations..	4

That makes a total of 602 in four years. We have the same classification in the case of the present Postmaster General over a period of ten months. Let us see who has applied the political axe with the greater vigour. In the returns laid before parliament I find the following reasons given for dismissals:

Irregularities and short in finances..	27
Services unsatisfactory..	28
Change of location..	28
Political causes..	112
Reinstallation..	1
Abandonment of office..	4
Total..	200

The Postmaster General stated to-night there were 205, but I have been able to account only, according to the statement submitted to the house, for 200.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): How many dismissals were there in 1927?

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): 378.

Mr. VENIOT: During the four years of my tenure of office I dismissed 144 for political reasons while the present Postmaster General in ten months has dismissed 112 for the same causes. Who is the greater political axe-wielder?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Did the present Postmaster General dismiss the number that the hon. member gave just now at the request of the Liberal executive of the province of Quebec?

Mr. VENIOT: No.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): The hon. member did in his case.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend has made a mistake. He has Conservative in his head.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Thank heaven I have.

Mr. VENIOT: No, the present Postmaster General did not dismiss them at the request of the Liberal executive, but there are dismissals he made on the recommendation of the Conservative committee. He knows it; I know it and can prove it.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Well, he is wrong if he did.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Name them.

Mr. VENIOT: I will name the hon. gentleman before I get through. I will bring the hon. gentleman's case before the committee for its consideration before I finish to-night, or as we shall likely have another field day on this matter to-morrow, if the Postmaster General comes before us again with his estimates, I can then give the record of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton with regard to dismissals in his county. I have under my hand the record showing where he recommended the dismissal of a returned soldier with seven children, and this was done illegally. I regret to say that the Postmaster General allowed himself to be led astray in regard to an illegal dismissal. I can prove that it was illegal, under the Civil Service Act. This is the hon. gentleman who stands in his place now after recommending the dismissal of a returned soldier with seven children, a man who had four brothers at the front fighting along with him.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): The hon. member's statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. VENIOT: I have the hon. gentleman's statement under my hand and I will submit it to the committee. I have his record. I have the record of the Postmaster General.

Mr. GOTT: Withdraw.

Mr. VENIOT: I will not withdraw.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I challenge the hon. gentleman to produce a letter to bear out his statement.

Mr. VENIOT: I have the statement and the hon. gentleman's letters under my hand.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Order. Will the hon. member confine himself to the item before the committee?

Mr. VENIOT: I was challenged by the hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): That does not make any difference. The matter is out of order. Will the hon. member confine himself to the item before the chair?

Mr. VENIOT: Then let the hon. gentleman remain quiet in his seat, and not issue any more challenges to me on this question to-night. Let him keep his challenges until to-morrow and I will produce the evidence.

The Postmaster General wants to know how many postmasters I dismissed in the province of Quebec in the first ten months I was in office. I have not the figures in detail here, but I can tell him this, that during the first seventeen months I was in office there were 115 dismissals in the province of Quebec, and during the first ten months that my hon. friend has occupied the position of Postmaster General the number of dismissals in the province of Quebec was 99. So we are not running too far apart after all.

The item we are discussing is No. 358. I want to call the attention of the Postmaster General to what I think is an error in the estimates, so that he may look into the matter to-morrow and have the error corrected or an explanation made—a correction will facilitate the passing of the estimates. The estimate submitted by the Postmaster General this year for stationery and printing is $490 000, and in the comparative column for 1930-31, the last year I was in office, the estimate for that year is given as $865,623. The only estimate submitted to the house by me at that time was $490,000. The explanation may be that included in that $865,623 is an amount of $375,623 for the payment of back debts due the printing establishment. If that explanation is correct I would point out that that $375,623 was voted in the supplementary estimates at the opening of parliament in March of this year, and has no right to appear as an estimate submitted by me to the house for 1930-31. But by including it in the estimates that I submitted to the house for 1930-31, it is made to appear that there is a reduction as between the present estimate and the estimate I submitted last year of $375,623, which is misleading. I think the explanation is that this $865,623 includes the amount I have mentioned for printing and stationery which was accumulating over several years. I have no objection to that amount being paid, but I do object to the record being falsified as it is—perhaps not intentionally, but the record is wrong as it stands; for I never submitted to the committee of supply for the year 1930-31 the amount of $865,623. The only amount I submitted for printing and stationary was $490,000. I would like the minister to look into the matter and let us have his version of it to-morrow.

As I said at the opening of my remarks to-night, the vote now before the committee, Mr. Chairman, is a bulk vote comprising twelve or fourteen different items, and there are various matters to be discussed under it. We must have an opportunity of going into the details, and while the minister could not reasonably have expected the vote to pass in bulk to-night, he must not be disappointed that none of his estimates have been adopted at this sitting. I have had the experience, which I hope the present minister never will have, of sitting for nineteen days before I could get a single item through. We do not intend to hold the minister that long; whatever criticism may be offered this session will be, so far as I am concerned, friendly criticism. If I have any blame to place on the department for not carrying out certain things which hon. gentlemen opposite advocated when in opposition I am not going to blame the present minister, but I am going to criticize the present Minister of Justice, the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Minister of Public Works and the Prime Minister, who when in opposition demanded such enormous changes from your humble servant and pledged themselves to carry them out if they ever came into office; but to-day they are as dumb as oysters. I see nothing in the estimates with regard to these things. I am not going to criticize the Postmaster General for that, but I am going to condemn others.

Item stands.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury) moved that the second and final report of the select standing committee on privileges and elections be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

GASOLINE DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I asked a question yesterday of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman). Could the minister give me an answer to-day?

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. gentleman concerned a headline appearing in the newspapers, as follows:

Announcement of new duties on refined gasoline was made yesterday.

This statement is hardly correct. The value for duty of gasoline is appraised by the department from time to time, and on July 11, 1931, a bulletin was issued by the department appraising the importations of refined gasoline from various refining points in the United States. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will find some satisfaction in the fact that the values for duty have been reduced.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Could the minister give the house the changes which have been made?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I cannot give what they were before because they were carried out to the third decimal point, but it may be of assistance to my hon. friend to read the bulletin issued on July 11. It reads as follows:

	Wine gallon cents
Pennsylvania, New York and district, which includes Atlantic seaboard.. ..	6·315
Toledo, Detroit, Cleveland and district.	6·928
Chicago and district..	5·828
Minneapolis and district..	6·178
Wood River, St. Louis and district.. ..	5·428
Mid-Continent district, which includes the states of Oklahoma, Kansas, part of Missouri, part of Arkansas, and north Texas..	3·678
South Texas, Louisiana and district..	5·228
Wyoming and district..	3·678
Montana and district..	6·678

Provided, that goods are not to be entered at less than their invoice values, nor less than the fair market value as sold for home consumption. The above prices are based on to-day's prices of crude oil in the different fields, and you will be advised of any adjustment to the above prices, due to changes in the price of crude oil.

As the price of crude oil changes, these bulletins are made up and sent to the collectors of customs. I shall be glad to hand this bulletin to my hon. friend as it may help him to understand the matter.

SAINT JOHN HARBOUR

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution standing in my name covering a loan of $3,500,000 to the Saint John harbour commissioners be discharged. As hon. members probably know, since this resolution was placed on the order paper, a tremendous fire has taken place, and it is proposed that this amount be included in a larger amount to be covered by another resolution which will be placed before the house next week.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF RESOLUTIONS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Customs tariff—184. Newspapers and weekly literary papers, unbound, tailors', milliners', and mantlemakers' fashion plates, when imported in single copies in sheet form with periodical trade journals: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Customs tariff—184a. Periodical publications, in the English or the French language, consisting of magazines or fiction, unbound or paperbound, per pound: general tariff, 15 cents.

Provided, that the governor in council may from time to time by order in council exempt from the duties specified in this item such of the periodical publications herein referred to as are deemed by the governor in council to be of a religious, educational or scientific character.

Provided, further, that the rates of duty specified in this item shall not have force or effect untll July 1, 1931.

Provided, further, that nothing in this item shall affect in any way the provisions of item 1201 of schedule C to the customs tariff.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, the various items have been adopted with the exception of items 184 and 184a. With respect to that we have made a very careful effort to meet certain criticisms that were urged against it, one of the principal being that the governor in council was perhaps not the best tribunal in the world to make the determinations that were called for under the item as read. It is therefore proposed to make it somewhat clearer than it read. Item 184 would read as follows:

184. Newspapers, unbound, n.o.p.; tailors', milliners' and mantlemakers' fashion plates, when imported in single copies in sheet form with periodical trade journals; magazines published in other than the French or the English language: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

That, hon. members will observe, is substantially item 184 as printed with some slight changes in the wording of the resolution. Then item 184a would read:

184a. Magazines, unbound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free.

They will thus be free under the British preferential tariff and the intermediate tariff, but not otherwise. Under item 184b these magazines are divided by the application of a new standard of division, as follows:

184b. Magazines, including agricultural, business, technical and trade journals, unbound or paper bound, which, by reason of their advertising content, are subject in the country of origin to zone rates of postage based upon such advertising content:

(i) when the space devoted to advertisements exceeds 20 per centum, but does not exceed 30 per centum of the total space, per copy: general tariff, 2 cents.

(ii) when the space devoted to advertisements exceeds 30 per centum of the total space, per copy: general tariff, 5 cents.

That is the application of two principles: first, that in the country of origin the magazines are subject to a surtax or higher rate of postage by reason of their advertising content; second, the determination of what per centum of advertising shall subject them to a given standard or rate of duty. The next division is 184c:

184c. Magazines in which the advertising matter does not exceed 20 per centum of the total space: general tariff, free.

Lastly, to meet a difficulty to which I shall presently refer, we would have 184d:

184d. Periodicals or portions of newspapers consisting largely of fiction and/or feature stories or articles and/or, comic supplements, per pound: general tariff, 15 cents.

[The Chairman.]

Provided, that the duty under this tariff item shall be not less than, per copy: general tariff, 15 cents.

Provided, that nothing in tariff items 184, 184a, 184b, 184c or 184d shall affect in any way the provisions of item 1201 of schedule C to the customs tariff.

This is the item in the customs tariff providing for censorship and for the prohibition of magazines and newspapers that fall within the category mentioned.

Provided, further, that the governor in council may make such regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of tariff items 184, 184a, 184b, 184c and 184d.

Provided, further, that the rates of duty specified in tariff items 184b and 184d shall be effective on and after the first day of September, 1931.

Some question has been raised as to when this should become effective; but inasmuch as magazines with a circulation of 1,000,000 copies or more have to commence printing a month or six weeks before the actual issue, in fairness to such magazines the date of the coming into effect of these items has been made the first day of September next.

May I say to the committee that the matter has not been free from difficulties. For the last twenty-five or thirty years Canada has imposed a tax by way of a tariff upon advertising matter. That tariff amounts to fifteen cents per pound or not less in any event than 35 per cent ad valorem. But amazing as it may sound, that class of advertising that was most potent, namely, the advertising in the magazines, periodicals and newspapers to which I have referred, has been free from the collection of any tariff with respect to advertising. Our great neighbour to the south early learned that it was undesirable to let this condition continue, and so they provided first of all that there should be a tax imposed upon advertising in such periodicals or publications; second, that wherever the amount of advertising exceeded 5 per cent, a graduated rate should apply. That rate was determined by the zone distances that established the rate in parcel post transportation or transmission. These rates are as follows:

	Per pound
First and second, up to 150 miles.	1½ cents

That is in addition to the ordinary postal rate of one and one-half cents, this being second class matter.

	Per pound
Third, from 150 to 300 miles.. ..	2 cents
Fourth, 300 to 600 miles..	3 cents
Fifth, 600 to 1,000 miles..	4 cents
Sixth, 1,000 to 1,400 miles..	5 cents
Seventh, 1,400 to 1,800 miles.. ..	6 cents
Eighth, over 1,800 miles..	7 cents

As I observed a moment ago, these are the rates charged for parcel post transmission within the United States. It has been found in the United States that the publications which we are seeking to reach by these items average approximately 45 per cent of advertising matter, and the average charge of postage paid as a surtax amounts to not quite two and one-half cents but 2·45 cents. It will be observed that the rate is slightly higher than the rate we have fixed because we realize the tremendous hold that such publications have upon this country. The circulation is tremendous; as a matter of fact, the sum total of the various publications amounts to 1,400,000 copies per issue, as against less than 950,000 of our own. I was recently reading a rather extensive article upon the subject and I was somewhat amazed at the extent to which these publications have found a home in Canada.

Then there is another class altogether. There is a class which we reach by censorship and a very large number of those publications have been placed under the ban by reason of article 1201 of our tariff, which is the prohibition article to which I referred a moment ago. But there is a class that one would hardly describe as coming within the exact language of the words used in that article, but which is most offensive to a very considerable number of the Canadian people. It was found that the imposition of a high rate of duty would accomplish the end aimed at and in the budget resolution the rate was stated at fifteen cents per pound, which is the rate that will continue.

In the resolution we have endeavoured to be fair, because it is rather late in the day that this action is being taken. It is amazing that we should have continued all these years to tax ordinary advertising and yet permit this form of advertising to remain free from any tariff charge. I have never quite been able to understand just why this is so; I suspect there are many reasons with which I am not familiar, but at any rate, that is the fact. If other countries are right in making this charge on advertising content, I think it cannot be said that we are treating the matter unfairly by endeavouring to secure some revenue from it ourselves, but we must, as I have said, endeavour to be fair for we have so long continued not to collect any revenue. Therefore, instead of adopting the principle that has been adopted in the United States, of charging for advertising content beyond 5 per cent, we have left the advertising content up to 20 per cent free from this tariff charge. On advertising content from 20 to 30 per cent we have made the charge, as I have indicated, two cents per copy, but when the space devoted to it exceeds 30 per cent, then the rate is five cents per copy. I read to the committee the rates prevailing by way of surtax in the United States, showing that for transmission of a magazine of the class indicated, where the advertising was in excess of 30 per cent, the rate from the east to San Francisco would be seven cents per copy in addition to the ordinary postage. I think, therefore, it cannot be said that this is in any sense an unfair impost.

Mr. EULER: Is the tax going to be imposed on a monthly basis, because the quantity of advertising will vary from month to month?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from North Waterloo has asked me the same question upon which I sought information when I was giving consideration to this matter, and I found that in the United States the publishers are compelled to file with the post office in the community in which the magazine is published a statement of the reading content and the advertising content of each issue as it leaves the press, and that determines the matter so far as they are concerned. In some instances you will find a copy from the press containing 45 or 50 per cent advertising content and 55 or 50 per cent reading content. In this item you will find the words, "which by reason of their advertising content are subject in the country of origin to zone rates of postage based upon such advertising content." That is, magazines which are not published in this country but come in here and have a wide circulation must, in order to fall within the provisions of that item of the tariff, be such as are subject to zone rates by reason of their advertising content. We apply the same principle, with the modification that we have been slightly more generous than in the country of origin for a reason which I think is not difficult to see, and which I think will appeal to the committee. That is, we have no zone system in this country. So in a broad and general way we have sought an average which I think the committee will agree is fairly represented by the charges that are made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. the Prime Minister has removed so much by way of exception that I find it rather difficult to realize what is left of the original resolution. The resolution as introduced was almost in the nature of an embargo on periodicals and magazines coming from the United States and other countries to this country, and as such it seemed to me to be a tax on thought and literary art. The protest that I wish to make at the moment is against a tax of that character. If the effect of the amendments, which my right hon. friend has just moved, has been to eliminate the greater part of the original resolution, I have little further to say; but as originally introduced, the resolution amounted, as I have said, so far as it concerned magazines and periodicals coming to this country from abroad, to all but a complete embargo, and to that extent to a prohibition upon thought and ideas conveyed through those media to the people of this country.

May I say that thought, as hon. members well know, is cosmopolitan. It should have no limitation with respect either to place or time. All advances that are made in civilization are the result of ideas, and in any way to preclude the possibility of a good idea having its opportunity of fruition to the full in any quarter is to retard to that extent the progress of civilization itself. In these days there is probably nothing more important than what we now describe as the international mind, that each nation should begin to appreciate the intellectual ideals and currents of thought that prevail and sway opinion in other countries. Viewed in this light the tax becomes a tax upon international good will. So far as our immediate neighbours are concerned, I venture to say that their thought on the great questions of the day finds its expression in the leading periodicals and publications of the United States. I believe it is all in the interests of international good will that the people of our country should become as familar as possible with the trends of thought in the United States on all classes of questions, just as it is all important that our neighbours should also become acquainted with our trends of thought and thereby in a more immediate way become familiar with the thought which governs British communities generally. I deplore any tax which will in any way restrict the widest spread of views and ideas throughout communities, particularly communities that are neighbours.

[Mr. Bennett.]

May I say further that it seems to me a tax of this kind is doing an injustice to our own authors and writers. My right hon. friend has sitting immediately behind him one who has distinguished himself as an author, and only a few days ago in this House of Commons he made the statement that but for the fact that he had been able to place some of his writings in the United States he doubted very much whether they would have found a market at all. If my right hon. friend is going to tax the magazines that come into this country from the United States, I venture to say that it will not be long before American publishers will cease taking contributions from the pens of Canadian authors and poets. Many of our writers have won distinction not only for themselves but for our country through their contributions to some of the large publications in the United States, and an inevitable reaction, it seems to me, to a tax of this kind will be the refusal hereafter by some of these publications of the work of some of the best writers in Canada. In that respect the tax would be a great mistake. How great a mistake no one will ever know, because none of us can value the thing which might have been but which is not because of certain circumstances.

May I mention another fact which comes to my mind, and that is the effect which this tax may have upon tourist travel? That may seem remote, but as we all know the tourist traffic from the United States into Canada is becoming a very important item in the revenues of this country. Tourists particularly desire when away from home to receive the publications which they are accustomed to read in their own country, and I do not believe it is stretching the point too far to assume that if our American friends travelling in different parts of Canada find that they can no longer secure at a book store, a hotel or anywhere else, copies of the publications they have been accustomed to read at home, they will prefer in the future a trip to some of their own national parks or other fields of recreation to coming to Canada. Those are indirect effects, which nevertheless are quite important.

Again, American magazines and periodicals in some part use Canadian newsprint in the preparation of their material for publication, and to the extent to which my right hon. friend's tax operates against some of these magazines coming into Canada, he is dealing a blow to the pulp and paper industry of this country, on the product of which our neighbours to the south are in large part dependent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is my right hon. friend quite sure of that statement? I understand that magazine paper bears a duty of 40 per cent in the United States, and that very little of it is exported to the United States from Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot give the particulars, but I am making a statement which I think is generally accurate. There is always the possibility of conditions changing with respect to importations of paper, and at any moment the American magazines may become more dependent on Canadian paper than ever. To the extent to which that is the case anything which will restrict the sale of these publications will I believe be injurious.

May I point out another feature, one which to my mind is the most important of any. So far as the well-to-do are concerned, the difference of a few cents on a magazine or periodical would be a matter of no concern. This change will not affect the homes of those who are already in fortunate circumstances. However if there is one right above another which the poor man is entitled to have respected, it is that he shall be able to get at the lowest possible cost his sources of knowledge and inspiration, and that there shall be available to him immediately, and through the libraries of the country anything in the nature of helpful reading material and literature. I venture to say that in many humble homes in this land the first sacrifice which because of additional cost will have to be made as a result of the general depression will be magazines and periodicals which come from across the line into our country and which have served as sources of information and inspiration in the different homes of Canada. Particularly will that be so in many of the more remote parts of the country and in the libraries of institutions not supported by the state, but which depend upon private contributions and grants to secure their different publications.

I do not wish to specialize, because as I say if between now and September 30, was it?—

Mr. BENNETT: September 1.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, September 1. If between now and September 1, the Prime Minister strikes off the list of the original resolution all the publications of any importance, of course my objection would be wholly removed. I submit however that there again my right hon. friend has made a mistake characteristic of him in that at the very start he attempts to do everything in a wholesale manner, and after he has shaken up as much as possible the existing order of things he endeavours to remedy the situation by making changes and eliminations. I do not think that is a good policy for industry, nor in this instance is it good for the social and literary life of the country. With respect to taxes in other directions his action has been definitely harmful to the financial and industrial structure of the country.

I do submit that my right hon. friend in the first instance might well have gone through the list of magazines and periodicals and have come to the house with a list of those publications which because of their pernicious or salacious nature, he thought should be prohibited. He might have prohibited, with the consent of all, publications of a type that we do not wish to have in Canada. So far as pernicious and salacious literature is concerned I am entirely at one with the Prime Minister in a desire to prevent its spread. I believe, however, that the better way to deal with that sort of literature is the method which has been adopted in the past, namely to have some known form of censorship which under the minister will be responsible for the decisions made, and have all such publications banned entirely. I would go a step further and say that there are publications in our own country which might well be suppressed and which should not be permitted to find a place on vendors' stalls. So far as that class of literature is concerned, I am entirely in accord with my right hon. friend in his desire for its suppression.

With respect to all other classes of literature however I think the people themselves should be left to choose for themselves what they may wish to read. As I said to my right hon. friend the other day, I do not doubt the sincerity of his desire to be a protector of this nation with respect to what people shall pay, what they shall eat and what they shall wear—and now, with respect to what they shall read and think—but I do submit that the people themselves are much more capable of judging what they should read, what they have the right to read and what they wish to read than is my right hon. friend.

That voices not only my own feelings but those I believe of all hon. members who sit on this side of the house. The proposed tax is one upon art, because after all art is a result of the expression of ideas. It is a tax upon invention, because invention is the offspring of ideas. To my way of thinking it is more or less of a tax upon everything which makes for progress.

I suppose we shall have to wait until September to see the extent of this tax upon the literature and periodicals coming into Canada from the United States and other countries. I know there is something to be said in connection with what the Prime Minister has expressed with regard to advertising. If advertising from other countries coming into Canada can be taxed in Canada, I think it should be taxed to the degree the same kind of advertising is taxed in Canada. I am afraid, however, my right hon. friend will find that not only will he fail to raise the revenue he hopes to raise from this particular source of taxation, but he will lose a considerable amount of money in revenue, and in the end will be obliged to cancel a good deal of what he is attempting to do at the moment. As I have said we will wait until September to see what he allows to come into the country. In this connection may I say to him I do hope he will act from the Liberal point of view and not the Conservative when he considers what constitutes scientific, educational and religious publications, which, I believe, are the three types of publications to be exempted. May I point out that while many imported magazines are not distinctly religious, nor scientific nor educational in character, yet in the broad sense of the words they are all three, because they are, to an appreciable degree, a composite of the thought of a nation.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, with respect to people living in remote districts away from news stands who subscribe for these magazines, what arrangements are made for the clearance through customs every week as they come in?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not apprehend any clearance will be made through customs. The proprietors will pay the duties before the magazines come into Canada, or as they pass the boundary.

I am sorry I was not in a position to hand this amendment to my right hon. friend before the house met. As a matter of fact I was not able to complete it until just before lunch. The officials of the department and myself were busy all morning with the amendment because it was desired that it should operate with as little inconvenience as possible to everybody. I think my right hon. friend has not quite appreciated the full importance of the change. It was because of certain objections made to the Minister of Finance and the government of the day becoming the judges of what people should read that it has been dealt with in the manner indicated by the changes themselves. It can be no longer said that the governor in council will determine what is religious, what is scientific or what is educational. The matter is placed upon another basis altogether. Particularly there are three classes which we have to consider: First, that class, with respect to the importation of which into the country there is no question raised at all. Those are the magazines that supply food for thought. I will not mention them by name because that might be taken as being in some sense an erroneous thing to do. But they are the great monthly periodicals, they are the digests of thought that contain very little or no advertising matter. Those will continue to come in free. Then there is the second class, which is mainly of a type that we would prefer not to have. It divides itself in turn into two great subdivisions: (a) those that are principally advertising material; and (b) those that contain reading of such a type that it is better out of the country than in it, and as to the advisability of its importation into this country the right hon. gentleman agrees entirely with myself and I with him.

Now I put this to my right hon. friend. If in the country of origin it is thought desirable to tax the advertising in those journals or periodicals or publications, the reading matter of which cannot be excelled, when they are also carrying advertising according to their own statements that is referable to Canada, why should not we also receive from them some revenue? Every argument that my right hon. friend has made as to taxation imposed upon thought and literature applies to the country of origin, only the tax is higher there. The tax, however, is absorbed largely by the publishers in the country of origin, and we believe that in most instances the two cents and five cents will be absorbed by the publishers here. For instance, the journal or periodical sold at five cents in the United States is sold at ten cents here—we will say it is sold in New York at five cents and at the same price in San Francisco—and the postal charge to California is seven cents. If the journal is sold at ten cents here, why should not that extra five cents be absorbed by the publisher? That would be an illustration of what I mean. Owing to the fact that we have no zone system in Canada in connection with postal rates—and personally at the moment I think with our limited population it would be very undesirable to have that, and in this respect I agree with the former administration—we cannot secure revenue from this advertising through the postal department, and this is the only method by which, so far as we can see, it is possible to secure revenue.

I will not repeat myself. We are desirous of causing as little inconvenience as possible, and therefore our desire was to approach this problem not in the reckless, ruthless manner described by my right hon. friend, but rather to approach it from the standpoint of moderation, and a charge of two cents or five cents cannot be said to be immoderate when in the country of origin the advertising material is taxed seven cents.

Mr. NEILL: Is that five cents per pound, or per issue?

Mr. BENNETT: Per copy in this instance; in that instance it is seven cents a pound, but in many cases the journals in question weigh a pound and a quarter and sometimes a pound and a half. My right hon. friend perhaps has misunderstood me. There was no revenue derived from this source before, except the revenue from the postal department in connection with the transmission of these periodicals through the mails. This is new revenue, whatever it may be, much or little.

Might I also point out that the efforts to secure some revenue from this source is the more warranted because in the very journals themselves they state that by reason of there being American branch industries or factories in this country, the advertising carried in their journals, which have a circulation of 1,400,000 copies per issue—that is the sum total of the single issues of the most important of these journals—this advertising medium in this country—Canada—is so important and their rates are so reasonable that they can cater to the Canadian demand, although they publish abroad and make no contribution to our well-being, except the contribution I have mentioned through the postal department.

Now my right hon. friend has raised four or five points that are worthy of consideration. He said, first of all, thought is universal, and there should be no restriction on its transmission. With respect to that I think it will be found that there is no departure from the general rule in this country with regard to the publications in question more than there is in the country of their origin, and the great magazines and digests that supply the seed-thought for so many will still enter without payment of duty. I think, so far as is reasonably possible, we have endeavoured to meet that very situation to which the right hon. gentleman referred.

Dealing with the next point, namely, the question of the interference with authors and making it impossible for them to sell the product of their brain, their mind, their thought, their pen, I can only say this: I do not believe, despite what the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) has said of their already having done so, that any great, reputable magazine or publication will decline to accept the products of the mind and thought of a Canadian because the Dominion of Canada sees fit to place upon the entrance into this country of the medium through which that thought is disseminated a lesser tax than that which is imposed in the country of origin. I have yet to believe that that is so. On the other hand, I am inclined to think it will have the effect of stimulating the demand for the product of the mind and thought of Canadians.

On the newsprint item I was rather amazed at the right hon. gentleman. It is one of the interesting circumstances to which many of us have alluded that while the great republic to the south permits our pulp and paper and newsprint to enter free into their markets because they need the raw material, if we tried to sell them a pound of magazine paper we would find ourselves confronted with a forty per cent tariff. So that so far as selling them magazine paper is concerned, we practically sell them none, nor is it possible for us to do so. But with respect to pulp—I think that perhaps is what the right hon. gentleman meant—there are importations into the United States from this country to be worked up into magazine paper, and I am bound to say that some quantities of that pulp have been re-imported into this country in the form of the finished article. But I do not think they will cease to buy our pulp, because we have taken some of the profits from the publisher in the form of a contribution to the revenues of the country that transports the magazine thousands of miles at the same rate as it does ten miles, there being no zone system here as there is there. So for a great publication of one hundred pages, of which fifty is advertising matter, we in Canada, transporting it through the mails for ten miles, would receive exactly the same sum as for transmitting it from Niagara Falls to Vancouver or Victoria. This remedies that condition and provides that the principle which applies in the country of origin, namely, the imposition of a tax based upon a zone system shall be recognized by the payment of a sum per copy which represents an average sum that might fairly be contributed to the revenues of this country.

Then my right hon. friend has made the suggestion that this discriminates against the poor man. If he will read that schedule with care he will find that every thought-provoking publication, as distinguished from publications for pure amusement, pleasure or recreation, will still have access to this country without the payment of any charge whatever. The only limitation imposed in the first instance is that the advertising contained must not exceed 20 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask how that 20 per cent is computed?

Mr. BENNETT: I explained that to my right hon. friend before the hon. gentleman came in. In most countries, and certainly in the great republic to the south, the publishers must lodge in the post office in the town of origin a copy marked plainly upon the back with the reading and advertising content.

Mr. IRVINE: I understand the tax will be imposed on the basis of the weight of the paper in the magazine?

Mr. BENNETT: Not by weight; by the copy.

Mr. IRVINE: Then my question is answered.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In a general way I must endorse what was said by the leader of the opposition. With regard to the advertising, I am not sure that this end could not be reached in some other way than by interfering with the reading material. As I see it—and I, together with the other members of the committee, have not had a chance to study the modification proposed—the literature must be divided into three broad classes.

First there is the objectionable literature, which undoubtedly should be shut out entirely. The whole point there is what is objectionable, and I have very serious doubts as to whether we are wise to entrust censorship powers to a department. I know that at present an officer of the department reads books and rejects a certain number, and there are certain instances in which I find myself somewhat of a different view from that of the censor, if I might call him such. On the whole I have no particular quarrel with the work he has done, but it does seem to me that we should set up some sort of appeal board so that one man, unknown to the general public, sitting in his own closed office, should not have the right to shut out literature that might be adjudged perfectly decent by a great many people throughout the country. I think if we must have a censorship we should have some sort of board of appeal to which might be referred matters in dispute. I would respectfully make that suggestion to the Prime Minister for his consideration when he is considering future arrangements. There are certain matters verging on religion which are very objectionable to some parts of the community but which are considered quite innocuous by other sections. There are certain matters relative to sex on which certain members of the community have very strong ideas while other members look at the subject in a very different light. I do not think that in these matters we should leave the decision entirely in the hands of one man, however good he may be.

I am not very clear with respect to the second class of literature I have in mind; I refer to what we generally regard as to the better and more educational magazines. The Prime Minister has said that all thought-provoking magazines will be permitted free entry. There are certain magazines which are very popular with a good many of the women in our homes, such as Good Housekeeping and the Ladies Home Journal. I do not know whether or not these would be admitted free. I do not read them a great deal, but I think they contain a good many thought-provoking articles. I know a good many housewives have been accustomed to read these magazines for the information they obtain therefrom. It is true that these magazines carry a good deal of advertising material, and as far as I am concerned I think there is a good deal of nonsense in them, but at the same time I believe thousands upon thousands of women across this country welcome magazines of this kind, and I do not think they should be excluded by heavy taxation. I am afraid they will not come under the thought-provoking classification of the Prime Minister.

There is another class about which I am not clear; I refer to magazines such as Popular Science and Popular Mechanics. These again are magazines which are welcomed in our homes by our boys, who are very keen to read what has been done in the way of invention and what are the latest discoveries of science. I do not know whether or not these would be classed as educational. If they are not so classed I think they should be regarded as such. It is true that they contain an enormous amount of advertising; I have often wished that they did not contain so much, but along with that advertising there is a great amount of good material which appeals to our boys, so I think that they should be admitted free.

Then there are those other magazines such as The Literary Digest, The Atlantic, The New Republic, The Nation, The Forum, American Foreign Affairs and a number of others. I do not know whether they come under the Prime Minister's classification of thought-provoking magazines. I find some of those quite informative and thought-provoking, and it seems to me that decidedly they should be admitted to this country and given as wide a circulation as possible. At this stage of our development, with only ten million people in our country, of whom three million speak French as their mother tongue and two or three million more who have come recently from Europe and have not acquired a good knowledge of the English language, and hence are not capable of reading magazines of that kind, I submit that the English speaking constituency in Canada is altogether too limited for us to hope to publish magazines of that class in this country. I know we have a Canadian Forum published in Toronto and several quarterly magazines such as the Queens Quarterly, the Dalhousie Review and others connected with the universities which are doing excellent work, but we cannot hope to have published in Canada those semi-popular magazines which deal with economic and political questions. They have a hard enough time to keep them going in the United States; it is only because they have people who are philanthropically inclined and who come to the rescue from time to time with large donations that certain of these magazines and papers keep alive even in the United States, where the reading public is so much larger than in Canada. I would hope that magazines of this class would be admitted free. Here again I suppose the difficulty is that many of these magazines carry considerable advertising matter. None the less they are decidedly educational in character.

There is, in addition, that other class of magazine which I think the Prime Minister will agree we should prefer not to have our people read. They are for entertainment and recreational purposes. Some of them do not provide a very high type of entertainment, but I do not know that we should try to exclude them. If our people have not been educated to the point where they themselves reject such magazines; if they are still at the grade 3 or grade 4 stage of development, where they like to read these things, I do not know that we should shut them out. It must be remembered, after all, that most of our people like to see the movies, which, on the whole, do not demand a very great deal of intelligence, so why should we attempt to keep out literature of this kind when we let in the movies which appeal to intelligence of the same degree of development? I do not know that they appeal to any lower ideals than do the movies. I do not know why people who may be said to have somewhat highbrow notions should undertake to educate forcibly the great masses of the people, and why they should refuse to allow the people to read that which they like to read for purposes of recreation. I am told that some of our men occupying very high positions like to get hold of a detective yarn once in a while. They find great recreational value in such stories. It is true that some of us would like to see our young people reading other classes of literature but I do not think such lighter magazines should be rigidly excluded. I was talking the other day to a bookstall man in Ottawa, and he told me if this legislation went through that he would have to shut up his shop because there are not enough Canadian magazines to supply the needs of the people or make it worth while to keep a magazine counter open.

There are many people who like to read those magazines which many of us do not regard as being of the highest educational character, but I think we should be very cautious in taking away from any class of people that which is of great interest to them. I protest against this particular way of raising revenue; I think almost any other way would be more desirable than the imposition of a tax on the magazines which serve either the educational or recreational needs of the people.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, judging from the amendments which have been moved, I am not sure whether or not I should protest against this item. I attended a convention in Wetaskiwin riding a few weeks ago at which very strenuous objections were taken to the tax on magazines. However, as I understand the amendments, most of these objections have been removed. I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Woodsworth) that it would be a very difficult thing for either a department or the governor in council to judge what literature is religious, scientific, or educational in character. This amendment removes this necessity, and to that extent I think it will be very welcome.

As to the classification of literature which will come under this tax, I agree with both the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that it would be better if a certain class of literature did not come into this country. However, the deciding of what shall or shall not come in will be faced with the difficulty which always surrounds a censorship of this character. The hon. member who preceded me stated that although a certain class of literature may not be considered as being of a high character, it suited the minds of a certain class of people and therefore should be allowed to come into the country. That same principle could be applied to salacious literature. If there are certain people whose minds are just at the stage where they enjoy salacious literature, they should have that class of literature for their own satisfaction. I mention this merely to indicate the difficulities which would arise under a censorship, and yet, after all, perhaps some sort of censorship of this sort of literature would be perfectly permissible.

Another objection has been removed by the amendment. The previous tax was imposed by weight rather than upon the individual periodical. Under that system of taxation the better class of magazine, generally printed on heavier paper, would have been taxed more heavily than the salacious literature which is very often printed on the cheapest and lightest grade of paper.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) realizes it, but he has spoilt many excellent speeches this session by the frequent changes he has made in his budget.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change here.

Mr. YOUNG: Some time ago we came into the house prepared to make speeches protesting against the minister's proposed changes in the sales tax, only to find that they were not to go into effect.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a shame.

Mr. YOUNG: Then we had prepared speeches in connection with the changes in the income tax, but by the action taken last night we have been denied the pleasure of delivering those speeches. We had speeches prepared in connection with the magazine tax, only to find that the item has been amended. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman hoped to save time by this procedure, but I do not know.

Several reasons have been given in support of this magazine tax. We were told that it was designed to shut out the salacious and immoral literature which comes into this country from the other side. We have been told that it was designed to protect Canadian publications and keep American advertising out of this country. During my speech on the budget, I made that charge, but my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) laughed and said that that was nonsense. Consideration of the amendments leads me to believe that that is really what the right hon. gentleman has in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: Not to shut out American advertising, but to obtain some revenue therefrom.

Mr. YOUNG: It is designed to shut out the magazines which carry that advertising.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. YOUNG: If the idea is to shut out immoral literature, the measures adopted will defeat their own purpose. The tax first proposed was to be so much per pound, which would have permitted the salacious literature to come in at a lower rate than the better class of literature printed on the better class of paper. The other day I went into a newstand I said, "I want the most immoral magazine you have that comes from the United States."

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: Why did not the hon. gentleman judge for himself?

Mr. YOUNG: The news dealer gave me a magazine entitled Gun Molls, in which I found that the heroines of the stories are depicted as being the mistresses of Chicago gangsters. The picture on the cover is of a girl with a gun in each hand, holding up some men at a poker table. Each story deifies into heroines these girls who make their living by holding up people at the point of a gun. That magazine weighed about five ounces, and under the first arrangement would have had to pay a duty of five cents, while the Saturday Evening Post, to which no exception on moral grounds could be taken, would have had to pay a duty of from twenty to twenty-five cents. Under the terms of the amendment, as I understand them, the first magazine I mentioned would come in free.

Mr. BENNETT: No. It will have to pay a duty of fifteen cents.

Mr. YOUNG: There is very little advertising in it.

Mr. BENNETT: If it comes in at all it will have to pay a duty of fifteen cents.

Mr. YOUNG: It is not censored.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman is giving good reasons why it should be. I hope no irretrievable harm has been done by the copy which the hon. gentleman has bought.

Mr. YOUNG: In order that no irretrievable harm may be done, I will try to make sure that my right hon. friend does not get it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I trust the hon. member is as incorruptible as he credited myself with being, a few days ago.

Mr. YOUNG: Thank you. I should like to know who asked for this legislation. If I understand the matter aright, it was not asked for by the Canadian publishers. I have gone to the trouble to dig out from the records of the tariff advisory board exactly what the Canadian publishers asked for, and I should like to read it into the record. On October 28, 1926, the Canadian magazine publishers did ask for a duty on magazines.

Mr. BENNETT: That is before the tariff advisory board?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes. At that time they believed a protective tariff would be of some assistance to them. On November 18, 1927, they came before the board and in the report at page 300, reference 9B, we find these words; this is what the magazine publishers say:

The original application of the M.P.A.—

That is the Magazine Publishers Association.

—was for a tax on the advertising contents of foreign periodicals. It was made about one year ago, and since the presentation of that case and the second hearing of it, we have had some opportunity to make a survey of public and parliamentary opinion in regard to our request.

Our conclusion is that, while we have the sympathy of all Canadians, public and parliamentary, and while they think it would be desirable to restrict the importation of some foreign periodicals, at the same time it would be a dangerous thing to place a tax on reading matter. It is generally felt that the consequences implied in such a principle would be dangerous.

In the same reference, at page 302, we read:

We take the ground that this is a matter of public interest; for after all, while our case is one of equity and justice, the aspect that commands particular attention is the public welfare. The people of Canada have a right to the most efficient service the publisher can provide. They have a right to expect the publisher to give them publications comparable to anything turned out anywhere.

The only obstacle in the way of greater service which will make for the prosperity of the farming community, the working people, the consumers of Canada generally, and which will promote a true Canadian spirit, is the cost of publishing.

At page 303 of the same reference, we find the following:

I am instructed to say to the board that we cannot be protected.

This is what the magazine publishers say.

If we cannot be protected, then the minimum of service which the Canadian public have a right to expect that Canadian publishers shall give them can be secured only by their being placed on a parity of production costs with their foreign competitors.

At the hearing on January 29, 1929, at page 78 of the same reference, No. 9B, there is the following:

The publishers ask for 99 per cent drawback of duty on printing plant and machinery, art work for editorial purposes, engravings for printing in two or more colours, etc., and the removal of sales tax.

Referring to an 80 per cent drawback of the duty on fine paper, granted in February, 1928, the publishers said:

The foregoing drawback has been materially helpful to Canadian publishers in meeting foreign competition and has resulted in an expansion of the Canadian publishing industry, which was predicted in our previous representations to you.

Our application requested a 99 per cent drawback on paper and we would ask the board to keep the possibility of increase in the drawback before it.

In discussing the nature of the publishers' application, their representative said:

It is our purpose to include—we are not attempting to disguise it—everything that can be practically included. We wish to have everything possible, under the customs law, on a free trade basis.

That is what I understand the magazine publishers wanted. They said: We are willing to compete with publishers in England, the United States or anywhere else in the world if you put the things we have to buy on a free trade basis. In 1928 the government of that day granted them a drawback of 80 per cent on their paper and some of their printing material. The result was they were able to effect enormous savings in their production costs, and those savings were put into improvements in their magazines, the consequence being that the qaulity of their publications was improved to such an extent that they were able, by selling a better article at a cheaper price, to compete more successfully with United States publications.

My right hon. friend referred to the fact that he was giving the western farmer five cents a bushel on his wheat and that no farmer in the west would be called upon to pay as much in the tariff as he would receive through that provision.

Mr. BENNETT: If he had a reasonable crop.

Mr. YOUNG: How many farmers in the west will have a reasonable crop?

Mr. BENNETT: About 40 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: No change will be made in the status of the Saturday Evening Post. I believe the tax on it will still remain at fifteen cents a pound. The distributors figure that the price per copy will be forty-five cents.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is wrong as to that.

Mr. YOUNG: How much will the tax come to?

Mr. BENNETT: I should think five cents a copy.

Mr. YOUNG: Will that be all the duty on it?

Mr. BENNETT: Outside of the postage.

Mr. YOUNG: The distributors figure it would retail at forty-five cents from now on. Does the right hon. gentleman say that is wrong?

Mr. BENNETT: There is no reason why it should retail at anything beyond the present price of ten cents per copy if the publishers absorb the five cents additional in Canada over the present price in the United States.

Mr. YOUNG: I am glad to hear that. It illustrates the point I made in the beginning that the right hon. gentleman has spoiled part of my speech by changing the rates. I was going to show that the duty on that one magazine would cost the farmer more than he would get under the five-cent bounty on his entire crop for a year. The right hon. gentleman says that the cost will still be ten cents.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that would be my appreciation of it. I do not want the hon. gentleman to take that as a statement of fact, because I do not administer the act. It depends on the volume of advertising, the advertising content, and I have not a copy before me to enable me to say what that would be. I am answering my hon. friend's query to the best of my ability without having any definite data from the magazine itself.

Mr. YOUNG: Judging from the amount of advertising in that magazine, and the weight of it, I would say that the duty on it would be fifteen cents a pound.

Mr. BENNETT: It will not come under the pound rate.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. YOUNG: I hope the officials of the department will follow the same interpretation as my hon. friend does. My leader referred to Canadian authors who would be shut out of the United States market because of this. A friend of mine told me some time ago, within a week of the announcement of these rates on magazines, that a friend of his, who is, I understand, living in the city of Ottawa and who writes for some fifteen United States magazines, was notified by fourteen of them that her articles were no longer required, just because of this budget.

Mr. BENNETT: Did they say that?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is thirdhand information, unfortunately.

Mr. YOUNG: But I think it is pretty nearly as first hand information as some that my right hon. friend gets.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to know what the underlying motive is of the tax which my right hon. friend has imposed. I gather that there are three objectives: one, the moral reason that this is to exclude certain classes of publications which for the moment let us say, we are all agreed upon excluding. If that be the reason, I would say it would be much better to prohibit them absolutely than to impose any tax, because people who want to read stuff of that sort will pay any price for it, or find a way of paying a considerable price. I do not think a tax is the way to deal with the matter of meeting anything which should be prohibited. It should be met by straight prohibition and exclusion.

The second is the motive of revenue. I wish my right hon. friend would tell us frankly if his reason is that of revenue, because it will be interesting to find out later how much revenue he will obtain from this particular tax. I am not taking into account what this will mean in cost of administration features by the post office and other departments. It will probably mean a good deal of increased expenditure, more than will be raised in the way of revenue. I should be glad, however, if he will indicate as in his budget speech he said should be indicated, what revenue will be obtained from this tax, and then next year we shall see how close he comes to his guess. After excluding the publications which he says should be excluded, I confess the publications left do not seem to be very considerable and I rather doubt whether he will obtain any revenue.

The third motive would be that of protection, and high protection at that. May I in that connection point out that it will not be the Canadian magazines that will be protected. I doubt very much if the magazines coming into Canada from the United States or other countries interfere to any considerable extent with publications of a like character in this country. We have a very limited number of magazines. Perhaps the most important in the matter of circulation is one semi-monthly, and I doubt if its circulation would be particularly affected by anything in the nature of protection of this kind that may be given. So it is not the magazines in Canada or those who are contributing to magazines who are being protected. It comes back to the advertising feature to which my right hon. friend has just referred. Apparently he desires to exclude as largely as possible the advertising material that comes into Canada because, I assume, some of these advertisements may be those of concerns which compete with industries in this country. Then let my right hon. friend be quite frank about it and say that again it is to protect the manufacturer in this country, and that he is going to protect him by closing the eyes, so far as that is possible, of the Canadian people to opportunities to buy elsewhere at less cost or to have any knowledge of the kind of articles that are being produced in another country which might serve the purposes of the consumer equally well if not better. That to my mind is the really mischievous feature of the whole proposal. It is a further restriction of trade, it is again an effort to further the interests of a particular class at the expense of the great body of consumers with respect to what they may wish to wear, what they may wish to eat, wherewithal they may wish to be housed and clothed, and the means by which their various other needs and satisfactions are to be met. I think that is the real explanation of it, and if it is not, I should be glad if my right hon. friend would make the matter clear.

Mr. BENNETT: I have endeavoured to make it clear to the right hon. gentleman that he had a somewhat erroneous appreciation of the situation, but I shall endeavour to answer his questions by first of all asking a question or two bearing upon the policy of this country as administered by his government for a period of eight or nine years.

There is a tax on books of 10 to 25 per cent. Why not on periodicals? Under his government the tax on fiction was, by the privy council decision sustaining the ruling of the customs board, made 25 per cent ad valorem. Why not on periodicals that contain fiction? I merely ask that question.

Secondly, the right hon. gentleman asked, what revenue do we expect? That is a perfectly proper question. In view of the fact that the magazines that will be published in September are now in process of being printed, some having been in print for some time, it follows that whatever is done should be done so as to cause as little inconvenience as possible, and this tax therefore becomes effective on the first of September. There will be seven months left in the fiscal year, and I estimate that we should receive $700,000, or $100,000 a month, for the balance of the fiscal year. My conviction is that the tax will be paid principally by the publishers.

Thirdly, the right hon. gentleman has suggested that we are endeavouring to protect the manufacturers of this country. I pointed out that the basis of this whole provision is found in these words, "which, by reason of their advertising content, are subject in the country of origin to zone rates of postage based upon such advertising content." Not being able to reach them through the Post Office Department without changing our whole scheme of postal imposts, we are reaching them in this way, but at a somewhat lesser rate than that which they would pay if the postal charges were similar to those in the United States. I pointed out that in the United States the first zone, which is up to 150 miles, makes a tax against the publisher, which he has to pay at the post office where the magazine is posted, of 1½ cents per pound; if it goes 300 miles he pays 2 cents a pound, and that is in addition to the ordinary postal rate; it is a charge by way of surtax. If it travels 600 miles, the charge is 3 cents per pound, and if it travels 1,000 miles, the charge is 4 cents per pound, and so on up to 7 cents per pound. Some of the magazines to which reference has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Weyburn weigh 1¼ to 1½ pounds, and in the United States, the country of origin, for transportation up to 1,000 miles they pay 5 and 6 cents each as a surtax over the postal rate, the maximum being 7 cents per pound for a distance over 1,800 miles. That amounts in some instances to 10 cents per copy. In view of the circumstances to which I have alluded, and to which I shall not again refer, we have made the advertising content 20 per cent before the magazine or publication pays any tax at all, and from 20 to 30 per cent the rate charged, as I have said, is 2 cents per copy only. From that point onward the rate is 5 cents per copy. It is erroneous to say that we have endeavoured to reach the prohibition point with respect to that class of magazine which does not fall within the censor's powers, but which is one that we believe is not conducive to the best thought on the part of the youth of the country in particular. They will pay 15 cents per copy, which we believe in some instances will operate to prevent them coming into the country at all.

Mr. EULER: I have read a copy of the amendment, but I am not very clear as to its effect. I think it would be of interest to the committee and the country to know whether the rate of 15 cents a copy will apply to what are usually called the Sunday papers coming in from the United States, which would make them 25 cents a copy.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I dare say it would.

Mr. EULER: They are usually sold for 10 cents, and now there will be a 15-cent tax?

Mr. BENNETT: Those containing fiction, feature articles and comic strips. I want to put a question to this committee which has been in my mind during the last few years, and I put it to members of this committee because I think they are better able to find a solution than I. Most of us realize that the generation that is now reaching manhood and womanhood is the first generation that has been subject to the indiscriminate influences of the class of literature to which I refer and of the movie, to which my hon. friend referred. It is one of the most debatable problems to which men might direct their attention, as to what the result is going to be. What sort of men and women will be produced from this generation which has been subject to the indiscriminate influence of the movie to which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre referred, and to such influences as were mentioned by my hon. friend from Weyburn, with his sample copy?

Mr. CAYLEY: And the radio.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. We have put this in here deliberately. Do you mean to tell me that there is any member of this house who does not realize what the pernicious influence must be upon the young boys and girls, of seven and eight and nine and ten and eleven and twelve, who read some of the comic strips and find deceit and fraud and theft and cunning magnified into virtues? What is going to be the result? I am not the keeper of the morals of this country—

Mr. YOUNG: Why not prohibit them?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: There are many difficulties about prohibition in a matter of that kind. I could tell the hon. gentleman, if I went into the international aspect, of features that would make him realize that previous governments when the matter was brought to their attention did not take the action of prohibition because of the difficulty, but every state concedes to every other state the right of censorship as to the kind of literature that should come within its borders. But there is a kind that lies on the border line, not being on the one hand, clearly such as should be excluded because of violation of ethics or morals and matters of that kind, and the convictions of the people, yet on the other hand exerting the very influences that work so insidiously upon the formation of character. Hon. members in this house are more concerned than I because they have given hostages to fortune and are concerned as to what their children's attitude towards life shall be. I say however one of the problems that every thoughtful man and woman in Canada must be thinking about is: What will be the attitude of mind and the character of the rising generation which every Sunday is permitted to read that form of comic strip? Children seven, eight, nine and ten years of age are permitted to read those strips which magnify every device to which youngsters might resort to cheat, to circumvent their elders and to make them think that to lie is a virtue. I say that is one of the problems this country must seriously consider for the welfare of the generation of manhood and womanhood which is marching forward, the first generation in Canada which has been subjected indiscriminately to that influence.

We have not sought prohibition in this connection for many reasons, and I want my hon. friend from Weyburn to know that the publishers did not seek it; I know of no man who asked that it be done. The government believes it should be done; I believe it should be done; every member of the administration believes it should be done not because we are censors, not because we arrogate to ourselves any virtues we do not possess, but because for the moment being trustees of power we must exercise its sway over what is best for the people of this country and the new generation of manhood and womanhood marching up.

I put the question again to the committee: Is it not clear that while one may not prohibit, the net result of imposing an extra charge of fifteen cents in addition to the ordinary price upon that sort of thing will render it not so easy for the head of the house to provide such literature for Sunday reading.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the high class magazines to which I referred a little while ago?

Mr. BENNETT: The high class magazines are on the free list; we have not touched them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understood the Prime Minister suggested any thought-provoking magazines.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say "any"; I said "most of them."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As we have not had the new list in our possession I am not in a position thoroughly to understand the situation. I referred to magazines such as the Atlantic Monthly, Current History, The Nation, The New Republic and Children's magazines, such as Popular Science, Popular Mechanics and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: From my perusal of the advertising content of the last two magazines named I would say that they would be free. The second named would also be free. In connection with the first there would be a maximum charge of 2 cents, and I am not clear that it would be that much. Before anything would be payable an excess of 20 per cent advertising content would be necessary. The typical publication I took for the purpose of ascertaining what the effect would be went over 19 per cent, but not 20 per cent. I do not know whether that particular publication was absolutely typical or not, but as the hon. gentleman knows in the main in that type of magazine the advertising is limited. For instance, Foreign Affairs has only four pages of it. With regard to the first magazine named by my hon. friend and I do not care to name them—my memory is that the advertising is limited to schools and institutions of learning along with book advertising in connection with its own publications which of course, for advertising purposes, do not count. Those advertisements refer to its own publications. The second one named clearly has not 20 per cent advertising content. Without giving any names—because I believe it might properly be urged that I should not—may I say that in these days there are small digests of current literature and news. I have no doubt hon. members must know that they will continue to be free because in connection with the ones I have looked at the advertising content does not exceed four pages.

That is the position. There is no desire to protect industry or manufacturers or anybody else, except the Canadian people, in the broad and general acceptance of that term. One of the best known and most widely circulated magazines in Canada has a weekly circulation of over 100,000. The largest circulation of any magazine coming from the republic is 180,000, or practically 6 per cent of its total circulation. The weekly average of all American magazines is 1,400,000 copies, or about 4 per cent of the whole circulation because, as is well known, the total circulations are enormous. I would point out that 64 per cent of the advertising in one of those magazines was the advertising of businesses with branches in Canada. It might fairly be said that to that extent Canadian newspapers and publications were deprived of that advertising. Although this fact has not been urged upon me, nevertheless it is a fact. That magazine solicits advertising on the basis of an enhanced price per page because of a circulation in Canada of 100,000 copies or more. Is it not fair to say that when we are operating our postal department at a deficit of several million dollars that deficit has been made up by such magazines. In the United States contributions are based on the zone system through the postal department.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We are carrying some of that stuff at a loss.

Mr. BENNETT: All of it which comes any great distance. The proposed change will do something to compensate for this loss.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to ask my right hon. friend if he is quite sure he is not confusing two things, namely, a worthy object and the method by which it should be attained. I believe all agree that regard should be had by governments, federal or provincial, for the morals of the people. However, when it comes to regulating morals by tariffs I think there is danger of very grave confusion. Neither my right hon. friend nor I are authorities on how to bring up children, and I think we ought each to speak with great humility on this subject.

Mr. BENNETT: I do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For that reason I say that my right hon. friend would be much wiser to stick to the side of the matter with which he is really familiar, namely, the question of tariffs and the protection of industry, and leave the protection of the children to someone else. As I have said the danger of the type of legislation now before us is that it confuses two entirely different aims and purposes. One is a moral purpose which I think should be dealt with by censorship and prohibitions with regard to those things which should be censored and prohibited. The other is the question of protection of industry and the raising of revenues by tariffs. Those two matters should be kept separate and distinct. I think we may well let the homes be run by those who have homes, in the full meaning of the term, and that some of us who are less fortunate and therefore less entitled to speak on all matters might well confine our energies more particularly to fields with which we are more familiar.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to express my appreciation of the modifications the government have seen fit to make in connection with the duties in this particular item. I am informed that the Minister of Finance received protests from public and university libraries in connection with the item as it stood originally. I was wondering how far the modifications have eliminated the reason for the protests, and if the changes have covered the points raised. If I understand the Prime Minister correctly, magazines containing for the most part fiction will be subject to an import duty. I think it is generally agreed that the library facilities are not very adequate in this country, particularly in our rural sections, and if they wish to read fiction people in the country must subscribe to magazines such as those mentioned by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Therefore those who have not library facilities will be penalized by the imposition of this tax.

Mr. BENNETT: On magazines?

Mr. MacINNIS: On magazines that are largely fiction, as differentiated from those whose contents are of an educational nature. I think some consideration should be given to this point. I should like the Prime Minister to state to the committee how far the modifications he has introduced have met the protests made by the libraries and educational institutions.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say to the hon. gentleman that I do not recall any protests from such sources. Large numbers of telegrams came, however, from news vendors who did not seem to appreciate just what the proposed tariff revision meant, but after a few days they stopped. In one city a large advertisement was displayed asking all who wanted to protest to send letters to the Minister of Finance, but I do not think five letters came from that community. The truth is, I believe, public opinion very strongly supports this action. But because of the criticism that the government was constituting itself a high authority upon the question of religious, educational and scientific qualifications and characteristics of newspapers, I thought it better to remove that cause for complaint and relieve this house from listening to the speech of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). The result is that parliamentary action is substituted for executive control and, as the hon. gentleman has said, that is all to the good.

Mr. YOUNG: Will my hon. friend consent to remove the gasoline duties on the same terms—if I promise not to speak on the item?

Mr. BENNETT: That is too great a price to be paid by Canada—to be deprived of the dulcet tones of the hon. gentleman on every occasion. But I think he must have bought that hold-up magazine some three or four days ago, because he says this is a "hold-up", and I notice that in recent days almost every time he has been speaking he points his finger at me in a menacing fashion, and I am perfectly satisfied that the influence of that magazine upon his mind has been such that he is practising its methods upon this house.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I do not desire to delay the item, but I think a little light can be thrown on this discussion by quoting from what I believe to be an authentic copy of a letter circulated among American magazine publishers by the American Magazine Advertisers Association. It is a letter written by Mr. B. C. Duffy, who is chairman of the committee on magazines in connection with the association, and if I may be permitted I should like to read the letter into the record. It states:

The revised Canadian tariff schedule on June 1st contains the following paragraphs:

There is no occasion to read the paragraphs. After quoting them the letter continues:

This means that the tax of 15 cents per pound will be placed on all American periodicals entering Canada, effective July 1, 1931. Publications such as the Saturday Evening Post will pay in proportion to their weight and it is likely to cost approximately 25 cents for a copy of the Post in Canada, likewise, magazines such as the American, Cosmopolitan, True Story, which are already charging in the neighbourhood of 30 cents per copy will cost approximately 45 cents per copy.

Undoubtedly this tariff action on magazines was brought about by the activity of certain Canadian magazine publishers together with the Canadian Manufacturers Association. Its effect, however, reaches much further than the volume circulation of American magazines which will be affected.

To the publisher it offers the problem of making up for this loss in Canadian circulation in order that the total magazine circulation will not fall below that quoted to the advertiser.

To the manufacturer, however, it offers a very decided problem of merchandising advertising and selling in this market and will possibly necessitate a revision of the sales policy and selling costs.

The influence of American magazines in Canada until this time has possibly been underestimated, but consider the fact that the total circulation of every general magazine which is a member of the ABC in Canada amounts to only 993,000. (This includes nineteen publications, even the French magazines). Compare this with the seventeen leading American magazines which have a total circulation of over 1,378,478 in Canada and the necessity of American magazines for reaching this market becomes apparent.

The cost of a page to reach 993,000 readers one time using Canadian magazines would be $5,812.80, whereas the cost of the 1,378,478 circulation which the United States magazines give in Canada would amount to $3,973.40—in other words 27·96 per cent less Canadian magazine circulation in Canada. A comparison of the cost per page per 1,000 is as follows:

19 Canadian magazines	$5,854
17 United States magazines	2,882

Therefore the simple problem of reaching people with your advertising message is not only restricted by the smaller circulation, but also more expensive by the higher rates.

American manufacturers and business houses have established over 524 branch manufacturing plants throughout Canada valued at $540,593,000. Canadian manufacturers whose sales have been influenced by the advertising of American commodities through our magazines circulating in Canada have been an important factor in trying to restrict this means of propaganda for our merchandise. If the magazines allow this tariff to interfere with their circulation, it is an injustice to American manufacturers and advertisers as it means restriction of the most important factor in setting style trends or taste in the Canadian market.

Therefore, it is not a question of how much circulation these magazines can pick up in the United States, to offset their loss in Canada, it is a much broader question and one which, in justice to the American manufacturers, should be taken more seriously. Anything that is not good for the advertiser is not good for the publisher or agency. It is for this reason in our talks with magazine publishers that we are stressing the importance of maintaining their Canadian circulation without cost to the advertisers, if possible.

Several publishers have already agreed to do this. We know some are thinking about printing in Canada which would overcome the obstacle of tariff, but few Canadian plants are equipped to handle the volume. Others are thinking about absorbing this tariff so that the price of their publication will not be materially increased.

The tariff goes into effect July 1, many of the monthly magazines will arrange to have their August issues shipped and in Canada before this time. The weekly publications, however, will possibly be able to ship only during the month of July in advance of the tariff date.

There will possibly be some exceptions; magazines such as the Atlantic Monthly, National Geographic, may be excepted under the heading of educational publications. On the other hand, such week-end newspapers as the New York Herald Tribune, the Chicago Tribune, New York Times and American Weekly, are likely to be put on the tariff list in the near future, according to the latest information we have received.

Canadian magazines are making rapid steps to improve the appearance and editorial contents of their publications. Many Canadian publishers have already called on agencies in this country disclaiming any credit for sponsoring the tariff measure as applied to magazines. American publishers who have looked over the Canadian situation with a view of printing in Canada, have declared it is not practical in view of the present printing facilities in the Dominion.

The following is a list of seventeen American magazines, together with the circulation in Canada. The percentage of this circulation to totals and the total circulation of these publications.

At the present time no American publisher knows definitely the final answers to this problem. The McFadden publications, True Story, Liberty, etc. have told us they will not lose any circulation in Canada. We feel the Curtis publications will take the same stand but just how this will be handled is not decided.

Latest reports from Ottawa indicate that the tariff on periodicals will not become effective until August 15th (it was originally set for July 1st).

This communication is signed by B. C. Duffy, chairman of the committee on magazines. I thought it would be of interest to the committee to have this information, and that is why I have taken time to read it into the record.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As a great many items have been changed since the introduction of the tariff, I am beginning to get confused as to what is the real object in this particular item. Last night we were told that the changes in the income tax were not to be proceeded with, and to-day there is a very drastic change made in this item. I do not know that I am going to complain a great deal about it, but I have this complaint to make, that after going to a great deal of trouble to get information we find that the items are altogether changed.

Mr. BENNETT: That is useful.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I confess it is; it keeps one out of mischief, at all events. In common with other members of the committee, of course, I am somewhat disappointed; I had a speech prepared on this matter for which there is now no need. In connection with this, as with other matters, I want to congratulate the government on being a little more sane than they were at the start.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change in the principle.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a change from 15 per cent to 2 per cent and 5 per cent. All that my hon. friend has done is to take item 184b, which includes all those magazines, and if they exceed 20 per cent of advertising matter and are under 30 per cent there is the 2 per cent duty, and if they exceed 30 per cent there is the flat rate of 5 cents per copy. I am greatly at sea; the 15 cents per pound tax applies on periodicals and newspapers which are largely devoted to comic supplements. I have no great objection to the present proposal, but I do not think the imposition of the tax will accomplish the prohibition of these undesirable periodicals and newspapers, which the Prime Minister says is desirable. I realize the difficulty mentioned by him in connection with censoring and the international difficulties which result from this method of dealing with these periodicals which are deemed to be undesirable, but after all it is the only method that can be applied. Total prohibition is the only remedy that can be applied.

Mr. STANLEY: The censor will remain.

Mr. BURY: Does not my hon. friend know that the easiest way to get over the censor, and over any provisions looking to prohibition, is to change the name of the magazine and bring it into Canada under a slightly altered title? If there is the mere prohibition of a magazine of a salacious character having a certain title; if it is known and prohibited under that title, it is the easiest thing in the world for the publisher in the United States to change the title and the general make-up of the cover and send back the magazine, and there is nothing to stop it from coming in. The same thing is true of a censorship. When magazines of this type are prohibited the name is changed over night and it comes back again.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is known that that system is practised, but we have the censorship for that purpose. This undesirable literature is coming in at the present time, we see it being sold in cigar stores, and if it is to be kept out, a proper system of censorship will have to be established. I do not believe that any system of taxation will prevent it coming to this country. There is a certain element who like to read this sort of literature, and a tax of fifteen cents per copy will not curtail the circulation in Canada. These newspapers are sold for ten cents, and there are plenty of people who would be willing to pay the additional fifteen cents.

Mr. BURY: What is the price of these magazines?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The price of the newspapers is ten cents.

Mr. BURY: I am glad the hon. member knows the price, because I do not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I know that all these Sunday editions are sold at ten cents per copy. I have never read them but I do not take any particular credit for not doing so. For the sake of his education, I would advise my hon. friend to purchase one once in a while, and then I think he would understand the complaint which is being made. My contention is that a tax will not keep these newspapers out of the country. Even although a thirty cent tax were put on them, they would be purchased by the people who like that sort of thing. These papers get into the homes and they have an undesirable influence upon the minds of the young people and even upon the minds of the old people. I agree with the suggestion of the Minister of Finance that we are entitled to the same rate for the carriage of this material as is received in the United States, but if the desire is to keep these magazines and newspapers out of the country, a vigilant censorship will have to be established.

Mr. HEENAN: Will the labour union magazines be affected by this legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: Not at all.

Mr. CAYLEY: I do not quite agree with the contention that the idea of this legislation is to keep out undesirable magazines. Even although they are kept out, things come in over the air which are more injurious than the magazines themselves. We have but to turn on our radio and we are flooded with the very stuff that is contained in these undesirable magazines and newspapers. We turn on the radio Sunday morning, before the church services and we hear Uncle Ned or Uncle Bill taking page after page of these newspapers of the Chicago type and telling about the escapades of the Katzenjammer kids and other characters. He goes through the newspaper page after page, and that is what our children listen to on Sunday morning. It might just as well be admitted that this legislation is for the purpose of raising the revenue needed by the country in an emergency, and not as a means of censorship. There are ways of evading any censorship, and the public is appealed to in one way or another. This is not the correct way to instil in the minds of our children the appreciation of better things. Another danger will be that these people may come right into our own country. In fact, they are here already, publishing these undesirable magazines, and certain types of pictorials. If we object on moral grounds let us go after this thing vigorously. I approve of the taxation being placed on some of these periodicals because we need revenue and protection. I do not know that I have anything further to say only just to protest against the argument being used that the morals of the country are being protected.

Items agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I intended to move that the committee rise and report the resolutions, give first reading to the bill founded thereon, and let it stand until Monday for second reading. There is an understanding that hon. gentlemen opposite may have the opportunity to discuss certain items in the September tariff resolutions, and if it would suit their convenience it would be much appreciated if they would make their speeches when the bill is being considered in committee.

Mr. VENIOT: That understanding would apply to the June tariff?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, to everything.

Mr. YOUNG: There is one item to which I would like to revert.

Mr. BENNETT: Every hon member will have full opportunity for discussion when the bill is in committee. If it is agreeable to the committee, I move that the committee rise and report the resolutions.

Mr. HEENAN: During the discussion on the items I offered an amendment, which could be presented at this stage or perhaps at a later one.

Mr. BENNETT: An obligation rests upon me purely in my official capacity and it would suit my convenience to have these resolutions reported. When the bill is in committee, or at any other stage in its progress, I shall see that the hon. gentleman is afforded every facility he desires.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 111, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BENNETT: The second reading will be on Monday, it being understood that in the meantime the various items will be checked up with the resolutions themselves, because there is a large number of tariff items that will have to be exactly compared with the resolutions that have been adopted by the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

AUSTRALIAN TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I was proposing to take up the Australian trade agreement, but the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) who leads the Progressives informed me that owing to his duty on a committee he has not had an opportunity to meet his colleagues and discuss the matter with them, and he would like it to stand over until the next sitting on Monday. I trust the house will regard this as reasonable under the circumstances.

SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA

BILL TO RATIFY INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION SIGNED AT LONDON

The house resumed from Thursday, June 25, consideration in committee of Bill No. 96, respecting the international convention for the safety of life at sea, signed in London on the 31st day of May, 1929, and the international convention respecting load lines signed in London on the 5th day of July, 1930—Mr. Duranleau—Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amendment under discussion at the last sitting on this bill was the proposed addition of a further section whereby the coming into force of this act could be postponed by order in council, the purpose being to withhold the coming into force of the act until a sufficient number of nations had ratified the conventions so as to put them into effect; otherwise, in the perhaps somewhat hypothetical case of five nations failing to ratify the convention, this would be law in Canada but not so in a majority of the other maritime nations. The discussion took place in regard to the wording of that amendment. The wording is about the same as that of the similar section in the bill now before the British House of Commons, which section reads:

Provided that His Majesty may from time to time by order in council postpone the coming into operation of this part of this act for such period not exceeding on any occasion of postponement one year, as may be specified in the order.

Since the committee rose, I have discussed the matter with my officials, especially with Mr. Johnston, my deputy minister, who was the representative of Canada at those conventions; also with officials of the Department of Justice and with Doctor Skelton of the Department of External Affairs. We came to the conclusion that we should substitute another section which is perhaps clearer and which I shall read to the committee:

This act or any portion thereof shall come into operation on a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

I think this substitute section is clearer and will meet the purpose.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. NEILL: What is the number of the section?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It will be No. 15, because it is at the end of the bill.

Mr. VENIOT: Is the publication to be in just one issue or in a number of issues of the Canada Gazette?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Just one issue.

Mr. VENIOT: Would it not be better to have it in more than one?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Publication in one issue is the usual formal notice.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is only a formality. Publication in one issue is enough.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move that the bill be amended by adding the new clause 15:

15. This act or any portion thereof shall come into operation on a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

I also beg to move the following changes in the various sections to comply with this amendment. Different dates were set forth in the bill as printed and they will have to be changed:

To delete the words "after the 30th June, 1932" in section 9.
In section 10, to delete the words "after the 30th June, 1933."
In section 11, to delete the words "after the 30th June, 1933."
In section 12, to delete the words "after the 30th June, 1933."
In section 13, to delete the words "after the 30th June, 1933."

There is also another amendment included in this and perhaps I had better mention it now. There is attached to the bill as printed a Final Act under which no obligation is assumed by Canada or any other country that becomes a party to the convention. The Final Act is really no part of the convention at all; it is merely a statement as to who were present and of reservations made by certain countries to be considered by themselves, but it was printed along with the bill in the two schedules attached to it, and it should be deleted. The pages to be deleted are pages 105 to 124 and pages 191 to 207. That will leave schedule I and schedule II standing. They are the convention. I have put this into the form of one motion.

Mr. MacINNIS: It seems to me that this amendment or any amendment covering the date this convention shall come into force is not necessary, because article 65 reads:

The present convention shall come into force on the 1st July, 1931, as between the governments which have deposited their ratifications by that date, and provided that at least five ratifications have been deposited with the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Should five ratifications not have been deposited on that date, the present convention shall come into force three months after the date on which the fifth ratification is deposited. Ratifications deposited after the date on which the present convention has come into force shall take effect three months after the date of their deposit.

It seems to me that the proper procedure to follow—I may be wrong—would be for this parliament to pass a bill approving of the convention and then deposit it with the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and then when four other nations had deposited their ratifications the convention would automatically come into force if that were done before July 1, 1931. Article 65 says:

Should five ratifications not have been deposited on that date, the present convention shall come into force three months after the date on which the fifth ratification is deposited.

So all that is necessary is to deposit our ratification, and if five ratifications have been deposited before July 1, 1931, the convention will come into force on that date, and if five ratifications have not been deposited by that date the convention will come into force three months after the date on which the fifth ratification is deposited. So I see no reason whatever for this amendment. It is just as objectionable as the previous amendment because it leaves it to the governor in council to say when our ratification shall be deposited, and that may hold up not merely this country but other countries which have ratified the convention.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The reason why we want to delay the coming into force of this law in Canada even after five countries have ratified the convention is that we do not want to have this law in force in Canada if adjoining countries have not ratified the convention, because in that case our boats would be discriminated against. This convention will be in force only in those countries which have ratified it. If we ratified it without any clause such as the one suggested, we would be bound by the convention and other countries close to us which had not ratified would not be bound. So, after long consideration with our officials, we thought it better to postpone the coming into force of this law in Canada until adjoining countries had also ratified the convention.

Mr. MacINNIS: In that case it would be better to change the title of the bill, "The Safety of Life at Sea and Load Line Conventions Act, 1931." If we are going to make provision for the safety of life at sea, and if the convention in its wisdom laid down that ratification by five countries should be sufficient to bring it into force, I see no virtue in holding up the convention indefinitely until some countries adjacent to us have ratified it. We should set the example, along with four other countries, by depositing our ratification immediately with the British government. If the convention itself is necessary for the safety of life at sea, we should not allow the matter of competition with other nations which may not be as humane in this matter as we are, to prevent its coming into force. The minister himself stated that there was no reason for deferring the convention. As a matter of fact, it is violating article 65 to delay ratification any further. Article 65 lays down the requirements necessary to give effect to the convention.

Mr. NEILL: While this bill contains only fourteen comparatively short sections, it is really a very long and intricate bill covering over 200 pages, and I venture to assert that there is not a man in the house who has even a working acquaintance with the bill or would be capable of passing a schoolboy's examination on it. I should like to know why this bill was not sent to the marine committee, where there would have been at least some opportunity to investigate it. It contains another feature which I never saw in any bill presented to this house before, and that is that page after page contains deletion of words or sentences struck out. Who struck them out? Did we authorize the striking out? Is there any record of that striking out? Is there anything to prevent anybody, after this bill passes, making a few more deletions and saying: That is the bill as you passed it? I do not believe the regulations were read or even called here. We probably passed them by passing a section to the effect that the governor in council shall have power to make regulations. The house does not know the first thing about this bill. It should have gone to the marine committee. What is that committee for but for matters of this kind?

Since the Minister of Justice has in some sense opened up preceding sections by giving notice of an amendment which covers several sections that we have already passed, it might be permissible for me to ask this further question. Section 3 of the bill reads:

This act shall not apply to ships while engaged on voyages between Canada and the United States of America on any lakes or rivers.

I think probably, speaking without positive knowledge, that the percentage of loss of life on the great lakes on a given number of ships is as great as on the Atlantic, which is covered by this convention, yet we are not going to make it apply in our own waters, or waters contiguous to our territory, on which are boats manned by crews of our own nationality and where the waters, especially in the fall, are very dangerous. We do not put this provision in. Does not charity begin at home; does not safety begin at home? These are things which illustrate the fact that we know nothing about this bill, and I would suggest that even at this late date it should be sent to a committee so that some expert opinions may be heard in connection with the matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. NEILL: No, it is not carried until I have had an explanation of the bill and some statement concerning the suggestion I have made. We should have more information about the bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When this bill was before the house the other day it was explained that we have nothing to do other than to ratify the conventions. We cannot alter the findings of those conventions. In one convention 19 countries were represented and in the other 30 countries, which all agreed to certain shipping regulations, and this house is asked to ratify the terms accepted by the Canadian representative. The other day when the bill was discussed section 3 was considered at length and explanations were made in connection with it but I do not think my hon. friend was in the house at the time. Despite that fact however I think it unfair that we should revert to sections which were adopted the other day.

The present intention is to suspend the coming into force of this law.

Mr. NEILL: Why suspend?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I told the committee a moment ago there is before the senate of an adjoining country a similar bill which will be taken into consideration next December. If the bill is adopted we think it advisable to suspend its coming into force until proclamation be made by the governor in council. We want both countries to be on the same footing. The moment five countries have ratified these conventions this law will come into force. If on the other hand we act before other countries our ships may be penalized.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: We are to wait and are not to bring this bill into force until five other countries have adopted it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Five in all.

Mr. NEILL: Very well; we are to wait until four other countries have adopted the bill. Supposing each of the four other countries adopt the same policy and wait until four other countries do the same. Supposing each country decides to wait on the others. If one country does not start how will we get the action of the five countries necessary to make such legislation effective? We are waiting for four other countries, and it may be that those four other countries are waiting until we proclaim ourselves. I understood the minister to say that we should ratify these conventions because they were international in character and were agreed upon by representatives of a large number of countries. Their findings could hardly have been unanimous when they could not secure five countries to subscribe to them. I understood the minister to say that in one case nineteen countries were represented, and in another, thirty-five.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Nineteen countries were represented at the convention held in 1929 for the safety of life at sea, and at the international convention respecting load lines held in 1930, thirty nations were represented.

Mr. NEILL: And so far from unanimous was their action that we cannot get four other nations besides ourselves to agree. I am not objecting to a postponement, but even if the conventions were international in character and supposing we must accept or reject the proposals as they stand, would it not be a good idea for the legislatures of Canada to have some knowledge of the proposals contained in the bill?

I admit that in connection with section 3 I am asking my question at the wrong time, but when the section was before the house I was not present. As the Minister of Justice, however, will have to ask leave of the house to go back to sections 9 and 10 I think I am justified to ask similar leave to revert to section 3.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the hon. member know the reason for section 3? The convention dealt with the safety of life at sea, and lakes and rivers are not included in the term "sea."

Mr. NEILL: Oh.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Great lakes navigation is under our Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. NEILL: I understand that lakes and rivers are not included in the present measure, but if it is so highly desirable and advisable to have this legislation for the safety of life at sea, why not introduce a Canadian law so that similar measures may apply in our waters?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have our own act on the subject.

Mr. NEILL: Along the same lines?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Our own shipping act is in force in regard to shipping on lakes and rivers. The present bill, however, deals only with the safety of life at sea, and it was thought proper expressly to exclude the lakes and rivers of Canada.

Mr. NEILL: I still think we should look after the safety of seamen on the lakes. Will the Minister of Justice explain—because I think he understands the bill more than anyone else in the committee—why there are so many deletions in the regulations? I refer particularly to pages 92 and 93, and so on.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think those deletions were made when the printed copy was compared with the originals. The changes were made to make the copy now before us conform with the original convention.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) pointed out that there were two sections to the bill, namely, the fourteen sections of the bill itself, and the fifteenth, or the added amendment. The remainder of the printed copy before us includes the articles of the conventions. The minister has said that we are not competent to change or modify the articles of the convention, and when the Minister of Marine has said that we cannot change article 65, I agree with him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes we can; article 65 deals only with the date of coming into force.

Mr. MacINNIS: If we can change article 65, which states when the convention shall come into force, then we can change any article in the convention.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not necessarily.

Mr. NEILL: To what page is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. MacINNIS: Page 39.

Mr. NEILL: I see the point made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis). A minute ago the minister told us he was introducing clause 15 to change the bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I do not think my hon. friend understands. By this bill we are adopting the conventions. We are postponing now the final announcement of our action until we in this country think it proper to make such action known. We are adopting the conventions, word for word.

Mr. NEILL: With a modification.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, we are adopting them, but we are not announcing to the world our adoption until we see fit so to do.

Mr. NEILL: Are we postponing ratification?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, we are postponing the formal announcement of our own action. We are not announcing our final adoption or notifying London of our adoption, as we are required to do, until it suits our pleasure. We are adopting the convention, however, word for word.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

INCREASE IN MEMBERSHIP OF PENSION TRIBUNAL

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 110, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 1—Pension tribunal.

Mr. MacLAREN: On the first reading I explained to some extent the purpose of this bill. It is not intended to disturb the Pension Act passed at the last regular session except as to one principle and in one direction. The reason is that the act has been in operation for such a short time,—well under a year —that it is not advisable to subject it to a general revision at the present time. These amendments are proposed to relieve to a certain extent the congestion which now exists in the administration of the pension board owing to the very large number of applications pending before the board.

I wish to amend section one of the bill by inserting before the words "section nine" in line four the words "subsection one."

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I do not rise for the purpose of taking exception to the bill. If I had any complaint to register it would be that other amendments are required in addition to those presented by the minister to do justice to the returned men. In saying this I do not wish for one moment to criticize the minister or his administration. As a matter of fact my experience has been that he and his officials are conducting the department—which is one of the most important, and certainly the most overworked of all the departments of government—as satisfactorily as possible under the circumstances. In the legislation we passed a year ago it was thought we had established the principle of giving to the returned soldier the benefit of the doubt in all circumstances, but unfortunately we now find the ex-service man in certain instances not given the benefit of the doubt at all, in fact in my judgment he is very little better off than he was before the said legislation was enacted. To illustrate this perhaps I cannot do better than state an actual case which was heard in my own county. A pensioner's case was tried by two commissioners who after hearing all the evidence, at the conclusion of their deliberations—the court sat for a couple of days and heard other cases besides the one with which I am dealing—rendered a decision in favour of the applicant receiving a pension. They said to him: We have heard your case and on the evidence presented have decided that you are entitled to a pension; we are submitting a report to this effect to the proper authorities and in due course your case will go to the Board of Pension Commissioners for assessment and pension. In addition to the two commissioners, witnesses and tribunal officials there were present expert medical men and, counsel for the department—the devil's advocate—and the returned soldier's advocate. While I did not hear the evidence adduced in this particular case, I heard the evidence in other cases before this same tribunal, and I am convinced that the court was conducted in a fair, judicial and logical manner and their verdict was a good one. An appeal was carried by the devil's advocate to the pension appeal court where the decision of the pension tribunal was reversed, and the man will not now receive a pension, after having been instructed by the pension tribunal that he would.

Now, I contend that having a year ago decided that in every case the returned man was to receive the benefit of the doubt, this judgment of the pension appeal court in reversing the former decision is a direct violation of that principle, because certainly not only a reasonable but a judicial doubt was established by the fact that one court decided in the applicants favour; and this is not the only case where such a doubt has been established with disastrous results. Such an anomaly should not be allowed to continue, for the very excellent reason that it works a grave injustice to the returned man who is seeking justice, and it is not in accordance with the principle, that all ex-service men were to be given the benefit of the doubt, which we thought we had established by the legislation enacted over a year ago. I think it is a proper suggestion to make to the minister that if possible some legislation should be brought forward to remove that anomaly.

Mr. CANTLEY: Unfortunately the case referred to by the hon. member for Cumberland is not the only case of that kind. A tribunal sat in New Glasgow, and one forenoon was occupied with one particular case. I heard the evidence, and the chairman of the tribunal stated that the decision would be rendered the following morning. The decision was given, in favour of the applicant. Shortly afterwards the case was appealed, and after some weeks of delay the appeal was heard and the judgment of the tribunal sustained. So far as I am aware that man has not yet received his pension. That sort of thing is not creditable to this country; it is not the sort of treatment we thought we were according the returned men when we passed this legislation a year ago.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have another amendment to propose, as new section 4:

4. Section 10 of the said act as enacted by chapter thirty-five of the statutes of 1930 (first session) is amended by adding the following subsection:—

(3) The governor in council may appoint a judge of the superior court, or of a county or district court in any of the provinces of Canada, as an acting member of the pension appeal court, to serve in the absence of any member thereof, and may prescribe the allowance to be made for expenses of such judge while so acting.

The purpose of this amendment is to expedite the hearings. The entire bill is intended to expedite the hearing of cases and prevent delay, as much as that can be done without disturbing the organization under the act. There are only three members of the appeal court; as a rule all three must be present, and this amendment is designed to care for a situation which might arise from absence of a member.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have a further amendment as new section 5, making it conform to section 4 in the act. It is:

5. Section 70 of the said act as enacted by chapter thirty-five of the statutes of 1930 (first session) is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

70. Unless the parties agree that an appeal or other matter as to which the court has jurisdiction shall be heard before only two from among the members or acting members of the pension appeal court, three of them shall sit; if an appeal is heard before two only and they cannot agree as to its disposition, it shall stand dismissed.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SERVICE LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris) moved that Bill No. 118, to incorporate Service Loan and Finance Corporation, be recommitted to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was first referred to by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) I took exception, and I desire to take a few minutes to show why I think the bill should not be again referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce. As hon. members know this is a Senate bill which was passed and forwarded to the House of Commons. When bills come from the Senate perhaps hon. members in this house do not give to them as careful thought as is given to bills originating in this house, the usual practice being to send such bills to the committee for consideration. Hon. members probably have not read this bill very closely, and perhaps are unaware of the nature of the legislation. I will refer to one or two clauses to which objection was taken by the committee, and my contention is that no matter what explanation is given by the hon. member for West York, it is quite unlikely that a further reference to the committee will accomplish any definite result. The bill was before the committee, it was considered very carefully, and received the support of but a few hon. members. The bill was thoroughly explained by counsel for the company; it was also explained by the superintendent of insurance, so that there was no doubt left in the minds of the committee as to what the bill meant or as to its specific provisions.

Paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 5 of the bill reads:

The company may throughout Canada—

(b) notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act, or in the Money Lenders Act, or in paragraph (c) of section sixty-three of the Loan Companies Act—

That is to say, the other acts which govern the operations of such a company are set aside and special provisions are made in this bill to give the company concerned almost unlimited powers to charge those who borrow from it. It is permitted to:

(i) lend money secured by assignment of choses-in-action, chattel mortgages or such other evidence of indebtedness as the company may require, and may charge interest thereon at the rate of not more than seven per centum per annum, and may on all loans deduct the interest in advance and provide for repayments in weekly, monthly or other uniform repayments: Provided that the borrower shall have the right to repay the loan at any time before the due date, and, on such repayment being made, to receive a refund of such portion of the interest paid in advance as has not been earned, except a sum equal to the interest for three months,

The following is the most objectionable paragraph:

(ii) charge, in addition to interest as aforesaid, for all expenses which have been necessarily and in good faith incurred by the company in making or renewing a loan authorized by the next preceding sub-paragraph (i), including all expenses for inquiry and investigation into the character and circumstances of the borrower, his endorsers, co-makers or sureties, for taxes, correspondence and professional advice, and for all necessary documents and papers, two per centum upon the principal sum loaned.

The powers given to the company to make extra charges in this connection are almost unlimited. We cannot even imagine the extent to which the company may go in this respect. These were the chief objections to the bill. The committee believed that greater powers than should be granted to any company were provided for in this legislation, and they objected to the setting aside of the Money Lenders Act, the Loan Companies Act and the Interest Act merely to give this company special power. Further, it was pointed out by the Superintendent of Insurance that this company is already operating under a provincial charter. If it wishes to extend its business into other provinces, all that is required is for it to secure licences from the provinces which it desires to enter. It may then carry on its business there, so that even if this bill should not be proceeded with further, the company would not suffer any serious disadvantage. The House of Commons, however, by rejecting this measure, will not be regarded as being remiss in its duty to protect the public interest, and if a provincial government wishes to grant a licence to carry on a business of that sort, that is its concern.

It may be pointed out further that the bill gives this particular company power to lend money to a class of people in Canada who would not be able to borrow from the banks or from other money lending institutions. The contention is that people of that class have very little or no credit, at least not sufficient for the banks to recognize them. It was argued by those supporting the bill that if it were not passed we would be doing an injustice to that particular class. The answer to that will be apparent to everyone. This is a class of people, who, it is alleged, have no credit with the banks. Therefore, in all fairness, that class of people, if they borrow, should receive a lower rate of interest than any other class. But by this bill we are providing legislation which will permit the company to charge them at least 17 per cent. To ask the poorest class in the community, with practically no credit at the banks, if they are forced by circumstances to secure a loan from this company, to pay 17 per cent is, I submit, not helping that class at all. That is usury of the very worst kind, and if parliament cannot do anything better for that class than pass legislation of such a character, we had better not legislate at all.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Moreover, I do not think it is good business, especially at this stage of the session, to duplicate our work. In the banking and commerce committee we considered this bill to the best of our ability, and it was defeated in that committee. I cannot see any reason why an exception should be made of this bill by sending it back for the reconsideration of the select standing committe on banking and commerce.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I wish heartily to support the contention put forward by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) with regard to his criticism of this bill. Only the other day, when it was before us in the banking and commerce committee, it was most thoroughly discussed. The legal advisers who were advocating the bill had ample time to put forward their case, and I was quite surprised when the sponsor of the bill rose in his place in the house the other day and asked permission that it be placed again on the order paper after it had been defeated in the banking and commerce committee, giving as his reason for wishing to have it reconsidered that he was not present at the banking and commerce committee when the bill was brought up, and that possibly he could have presented the case with different results. The hon. member knew he was not going to be at the banking and commerce committee that morning; he knew the bill was up for discussion and he had made full arrangements to have it presented. An hon. member to your right, Mr. Speaker, had full charge of the bill; he informed the committee that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) could not be present, and that the latter had asked him to take his place and present the bill for him. I can assure the hon. member for West York that the bill was put forward very ably by the hon. member who took his place. Therefore, in that regard he has no reason for asking the house to reconsider the bill and have it sent back to the committee—simply because he was not present the other morning to stand sponsor for it. That was the only reason I heard him give.

The powers given to this company, the Service Loan and Finance Corporation, are, as outlined by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, very large. We were led, before reading the bill, to believe that the main security on which this corporation would lend money was simply that of two signers, but I find the following in section 5 of the bill:

The company may throughout Canada—

(a) buy, sell, deal in and lend money on the security of conditional sales agreements, lien notes, hire purchase agreements, chattel mortgages, trade paper, bills of lading, warehouse receipts, bills of exchange and choses-in-action; and may receive and accept from the makers, vendors or transferors thereof guarantees or other security for the performance and payment thereof and may enforce such guarantees and realize on such security;

The privileges given to the company in this bill are second only to those given to our banking institutions. If anyone wanting to borrow money has any security at all to offer and is a good risk, our present banking facilities are available. As was mentioned by the previous speaker, the superintendent of insurance when asked what rate of interest could be charged under this bill, although it calls for only 7 per cent, informed the committee that in view of the many provisos whereby the company can charge a little here and a little there, and take advantage of the borrower by demanding repayment weekly or monthly, together with the privilege of discounting. the rate of interest would amount to not less than 17 or 18 per cent. In some twenty-three years of my life I have seen what happened to men who borrowed at no higher rates than 8 or 9 or 10 per cent. I have seen many a business eventually go to the wall and many and many a family driven from home. I have seen people who at one time had great hopes of success struggle on for perhaps a quarter of a lifetime only to be compelled in the end to go into bankruptcy or worse, simply because of the high rate of interest charged on the money they borrowed. If that is the case when interest rates are 8 or 10 per cent, what can we expect to be the result when the interest rate is 17 or 18 per cent? It is terrible to think of. Some say that these companies are working very well, and probably they are so far as the shareholders are concerned, but I cannot imagine for a moment how they can be working well in any respect so far as the borrower is concerned. If a borrower is so down and out that he cannot get accommodation either through his life insurance, or through a bank or through a mortgage company or from friends, if he has not two good backers, then in any event if he has the security that this bill calls for, he should be able to get accommodation through the various channels at present available.

As the hon. member for Wetaskiwin pointed out, section 5, subsection 1 (b) of this bill provides:

(b) notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act or in the Money Lenders Act, or in paragraph (c) of section 63 of the Loan Companies Act—

The company may:

(i) lend money secured by assignment of choses-in-action, chattel mortgages or such other evidence of indebtedness as the company may require, and may charge interest thereon at the rate of not more than seven per centum per annum, and may on all loans deduct the interest in advance and provide for repayments in weekly, monthly or other uniform repayments: provided that the borrower shall have the right to repay the loan at any time before the due date, and, on such repayment being made, to receive a refund of such portion of the interest paid in advance as has not been earned, except a sum equal to the interest for three months,

So even when the company refunds the interest that has not been earned on account of the loan being repaid before the due date, they make the proviso: Oh yes, we will refund the interest, but we intend to keep three months' unearned interest.

This bill, if it means anything at all, means short term loans. The argument was put up to us the other day that money might be suddenly required to pay the expenses of a doctor in case of sickness, or hospital expenses, that the money would be wanted for a short time. If that is the object of the bill, why provide that the company may retain three months' unearned interest? Although the bill at first sight looks quite harmless in calling for a rate of 7 per cent, when you take into consideration its many provisos allowing the company to charge for looking into the bona fides of the co-signers, into the value of securities, and the proviso that the lender may deduct the interest before the loan is made, and may make various charges here and there, we find according to the testimony of the superintendent of insurance himself that the rate the unfortunate borrower would have to pay is not 7 per cent, but between 17 and 18 per cent.

Mr. ROBINSON: How does the hon. membre figure it at 17 or 18 per cent? It is 7 per cent, plus 2 per cent for investigations.

Mr. SPENCER: I shall have to refer the hon. member to the superintendent of insurance, who, I would say without hesitation, is one of the ablest mathematicians and civil servants that Canada is proud to have working for her. After carefully looking over the bill he came to the conclusion and stated to the banking and commerce committee that the rate in all would amount to 17 or 18 per cent. That is all we have to work on. It may be more than that, but he put it at 17 to 18 per cent. That makes this bill nothing more or less than a usurer's bill of the worst sort, and I do think, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in the interests of the people of Canada for this parliament to pass it. I think the committee did right in turning down the principle of the bill. I support the chairman of the committee entirely in the report that he has made to the house, and I very much regret to see that this bill has been put back on the order paper.

Mr. CAYLEY: Do I understand that this company already has a provincial charter? I am not a member of the banking and commerce committee, and I ask for information.

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. CAYLEY: Do they already enjoy these privileges under provincial legislation?

Mr. SPENCER: I do not know whether they have exactly the same privileges under the provincial legislation, but I have never seen quite such a raw bill as this presented to the house.

Mr. CAYLEY: I was simply wondering whether they were carrying on raw practices under provincial legislation.

Mr. SPENCER: Even if they have these rights under provincial legislation, I do not think we should soil our hands in supporting such cruelty as to allow a usurer to penalize unfortunate borrowers to the extent allowed under this bill.

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris): I find myself in an unfortunate position, Mr. Speaker. The sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson), has been called away on account of sickness in his family. I am a member of the banking and commerce committee, but I was not able to be present when this bill was under consideration due to the unfortunate time at which the meeting was held, and I have not the same intimate knowledge of it as has my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer). I desire that this bill be referred back to the committee for a number of reasons. First, I think if the hon. member for West York were present he would be able to make such explanations as would satisfy the house. Secondly, I myself was not present at the meeting of the banking and commerce committee and I should like to hear the discussions which would take place when all persons were present. I am advised that a company known as The Central Finance Corporation is now operating under exactly the same terms as are outlined in this bill, and went through the committee in precisely the same way. I am further advised that the company now in question and the company known as The Central Finance Corporation both operate under the Loan Companies Act and are subject to the inspection of the superintendent of insurance. In themselves these facts are safeguards for the public.

I am not sponsoring the bill, but it does appear to me that when it came before the committee it was the duty of that body to suggest such safeguards as would be beneficial to the general public. It is my further opinion that if through negligence another company has been incorporated which ought not to have been incorporated it is the duty of the committee to take such steps as are necessary with regard to it.

In any event it seems to me that no harm would be done if the bill were referred back to the committee whence it came. If in the opinion of the committee the measure is unwise it of course could kill the bill. I do think however that the proposed legislation should be given fair consideration before the banking and commerce committee, especially so in view of the fact that the hon. member for West York has been suddenly called away.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the hon. member intimate that the bill was not thoroughly discussed before the banking and commerce committee?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Only fifteen out of fifty were present.

Mr. WILLIS: I have given the reasons why it should be referred back: First, the bill ought to be sponsored by the hon. member in whose name it stands. Secondly, as a member of the banking and commerce committee I desire to hear the discussion which might take place. I still think that no harm could be done if the bill were referred back, particularly when another company has been incorporated with exactly the same powers sought in the present instance.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): I desire to associate myself with the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) who has just taken his seat. I wish to be fair with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) who this afternoon sent me a note that he was unavoidably called away because of illness.

I shall not direct my remarks to the merits of the bill, but it does seem to me when the hon. member for West York, who sponsored the bill, was of the opinion that it had not received fair consideration and that it ought to be reinstated on the order paper, he is entitled to have his bill heard before the banking and commerce committee. As the hon. member for Souris has explained, no harm can result from allowing the sponsor properly to present his bill. For those reasons I support the remarks of the hon. member for Souris.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What did Mr. Finlayson have to say about the measure?

Mr. GRAY: I am sorry I cannot tell the hon. member for Lincoln, (Mr. Chaplin) because I was not on the committee. As I have said I am not here to discuss the merits or demerits of the bill but to say that the hon. member for West York, with whom I am paired, has asked that the bill be reconsidered. As he is a conscientious member of the house I think he should be given an opportunity properly to present the facts before the committee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Question.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I should like to have a ruling as to whether or not it is in order for this house to send back to a committee a bill which has already been considered by the committee and killed.

Mr. GRAY: Mr. Speaker has so ruled.

Mr. IRVINE: Not yet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. NEILL: No; a point of order has been raised, and I suggest that it be decided.

Mr. SPEAKER: As to the right to recommit, there can be no doubt. If the house chooses to recommit this bill, it may do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): No, it is not carried. I have listened with care to the debate on this bill, and at the outset may I say that I have no personal feelings in the matter whatever. I never heard of the bill until to-night.

May I advise the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) it has been stated here to-night that Mr. Finlayson, the superintendent of insurance and a man of great ability, said that under the bill it would be possible to collect 17 per cent. I gathered from hon. members who were part of the committee that Mr. Finlayson went a long way rather than to approve of it.

I suggest that if bills are to be considered with relation to the character or reputation of their sponsors rather than on the merits of such bills, we would be instituting a new doctrine in the house. We have heard a great deal about Mr. So-and-So who sponsored the bill now in question and who was not before the committee to present his baby, so to speak. However the bill was discussed on its merits by a number of hon. members in the committee, and the suggestion is not made that the bill was not so discussed. If such discussion took place what difference does it make whether one hon. member introduced it or another? The inference was left that the bill had not received a fair hearing. Listening however to members of the committee who stated what took place it seems to me that the hearing was fair. One hon. member has said that a company similar to the one now in question is operating under the Loan Companies Act, and under the inspection of the superintendent of insurance.

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the exemptions asked in the bill. In order to carry out what I think I might call its nefarious objectives it has been found necessary to seek authority from the house to exempt the company from the provisions of a number of acts. I am always suspicious of a bill, even it be a railway bill, which comes before the house and is not satisfied with the ordinary provisions of the standard railway act which has been formulated after a great deal of care and experience. On some occasions we find special exemptions asked for. The same suspicion arises in the present instance when we find on the pages of a short bill permission sought for a number of exemptions. Under section 5 of the bill we find the following:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act—

That is No. 1.

—or in the Money Lenders Act—

That is No. 2.

—or in paragraph (c) of section 63 of the Loan Companies Act—

That is No. 3—the company shall have power to do so and so. Then in section 8 we find the following:

The Loan Companies Act, chapter 28 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, excepting therefrom—

And then follows a number of exceptions, ending with the words:

—shall apply to the company.

This is what is excepted: subsection 1 of section 61; paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 61; subsection 3 of section 62; section 64—the whole section—sections 65, 66, 67, 82 and 88. With those trifling exceptions the Loan Companies Act shall apply.

I have not the time nor have I found the necessity to learn to what all these sections refer. From the number of them however one would suggest that they would cover a fairly wide field. We find the company now in question coming forward and before they are in a position legitimately to operate they ask exemption from these various acts: The Interest Act, the Money Lenders Act and the Loan Companies Act, Then we find them taking power, as other hon. members have pointed out, to impose what is very often called a "loan charge" for preliminary investigations. The section is very obscurely worded, and it is not clear to me whether there are two charges indicated or only one. The company takes power to charge:

—in addition to interest as aforesaid, for all expenses which have been necessarily and in good faith incurred by the company in making or renewing a loan authorized by the next preceding subparagraph (i), including all expenses for inquiry and investigation into the character and circumstances of the borrower, his endorsers, co-makers or sureties, for taxes,—

For taxes.

—correspondence and professional advice,—

Then there is a comma and the sub-paragraph concludes:

—and for all necessary documents and papers, two per centum upon the principal sum loaned,

It is not clear to me whether that two per centum is to cover the whole of that paragraph, or whether there is authority to charge for all expenses incurred as specific down to and including "for professional advice," and then two per centum in addition "for all necessary documents and papers." I think it will be found that two separate charges are authorized for all expenses for inquiry and investigations into the character and circumstances of the borrower, his endorsers, co-makers or sureties—and in this connection you might run up a considerable bill.

Mr. ROBINSON: Mr. Finlayson appeared before the committee and strongly supported the bill. He said he had gone over it thoroughly. It was understood in the committee that the two per centum covered charges for investigating endorsers. This company lends only to endorsers.

Mr. NEILL: Who made that statement?

Mr. ROBINSON: It was made before the committee. I may say further that Mr. Finlayson stated that he had thoroughly gone over the bill and had found it similar to bills authorizing other companies to loan moneys to parties to whom the banks will not advance loans. It is on endorsements, not chattel mortgages, that the company lends money. The two per cent covers those charges.

Mr. NEILL: Do I understand the hon. member to say that Mr. Finlayson advised the committee that this section was similar to that in other bills incorporating loan companies of this nature?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. ROBINSON: All companies doing similar business.

Mr. IRVINE: There is only one other company in Canada organized in that way.

Mr. NEILL: I think the hon. gentleman inquired of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) how he arrived at the statement of seventeen per cent, and was referred by him to Mr. Finlayson. We get a fair idea of how it can be worked out if we look at sub-paragraph one with respect to the seven per cent per annum charge:

—and may on all loans deduct the interest in advance.

Supposing the loan was $2,000 for five years; the interest for one year would be $140; multiply that by five and you have $700,—to be deducted from the $2,000 loan. The wretched man who is going to get the $2,000 is given only $1,300 in cash, and this company gets the use of the $700 for the five years. Then it is prescribed that the loan is to be paid back, if the company choose, in weekly or monthly instalments. Under the next succeeding sub-paragraph I suppose the company can begin at each succeeding period, whether weekly or monthly, and have these investigations all over again. I will accept my hon. friend's statement that the second sub-paragraph authorizes a charge of only two per centum. Add this to the $700 interest at seven per cent, and the unhappy borrower is still further behind and gets only $1,260; then he is liable to be charged the same expenses again and again in every case of renewal. And the promoters of the company did not miss anything,—the next subsection provides that in case the company has omitted anything it can charge:

—an additional sum equal to the legal and other actual expenses disbursed by the company in connection with such loan, but not exceeding the sum of $10.

Add this to the other deductions to which I have referred, and the unfortunate borrower finds his loan of $2,000 reduced by $750.

Mr. ROBINSON: I do not think it is fair to figure on a five year basis, because they are all short term loans.

Mr. NEILL: There is nothing in the bill confining loans to short periods, and I should judge from the character of the company as disclosed by these provisions that it would not care whether the loan were short or long —if it get the unhappy borrower within its power he never would be free of debt again. Then this provision is inserted.

—but no charge for expenses of any kind shall be made or collected unless the loan has been actually made.

Then I find that the company takes power to borrow money upon its own credit; but that I suppose is more or less the company's own concern. But the company seems to think there might be something shady about the transaction because I find this provision:

Any officer or director of the company who does, causes or permits to be done, anything contrary to the provisions of this section shall be liable for each offence to a penalty of not less than twenty dollars and not more than five thousand dollars.

And the other night an hon. member wanted to penalize a farmer not less than $1,000 if he was caught with one per cent more water in his butter than the regulations allow! But in this case the wrongdoer is subject to a penalty of not less than $20—in each instance, I suppose. One hon. member suggested that it was the duty of this committee if it did not like the terms of the bill, to make such amendments as would protect the public. The only way I can see to protect the public in a case like this is to reject the bill in its entirety. I do not want to take up the time of the house further—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. NEILL: I could very easily talk the bill out, but I think this house is entitled to vote on it, and I propose that it do so now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): No, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. MEMBER: Talk it out.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: No, I have no desire to talk the bill out, and I shall state any observations as rapidly as possible. It does seem to me that two points should be considered with reference to this bill. First, is it of the class which should pass this house at a time when from every part of the country comes the cry of suffering humanity weighed down under a load of debt on which the usual interest charges cannot be paid? By this bill it is proposed to empower another company to charge a still higher rate of interest. I was not a member of the committee, but I have studied the bill with some care, and as far as I can see there is no limitation on the charges of one kind and another that may be made by the company once the borrower has fallen into its clutches. My hon. friend behind me suggests that this might well be termed a "Shylock" bill—but that the old gentleman is looking for his pound of flesh without giving any undertaking not to shed a drop of blood.

Another point to be considered is this: The bill once having been killed in the select committee, shall it be again referred to that committee? I think we should have finality in these matters. There are only two reasons for a bill being returned to the committee for reconsideration: first, that the bill was not given a fair hearing; no one has suggested that this is so. The other reason is that new evidence may have been forthcoming in the meantime that might change the opinion of the committee; no indication has been given as to that. If the bill has had a hearing before a fair percentage of the committee, is it any more likely at this stage of the session that there will be a full attendance or that the committee will accord the bill a more favourable hearing? In brief, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill because of the provisions of the bill itself; I think they are wrong and that they are inopportune. The fact that at another time we gave similar powers to another company is no reason why, in this year of grace, we shoud repeat that error. I am opposed to this bill being returned to the committee, because as far as I can gather the bill has received fair consideration and no new evidence has been brought forward to warrant a re-hearing. The fact that the hon. member who to-day is sponsoring the bill, in the absence of the original sponsor, has not heard the evidence and would desire to hear what is to be said about it is a good argument from his point of view, but that is no reason why it should go back at this time. I hope the house will kill this bill, as it should be killed.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I just wish to put myself on record as being opposed not only to this particular bill but also to the principle upon which it is based. At a time when the majority of the people are criticizing our banks for the rate of interest they are permitted to charge it seems to me it would be a most reactionary thing for this house to pass a bill permitting another company to charge such exorbitant rates of interest. Therefore I am opposed to the principle upon which the bill is based.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: That settles it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to hear one hon. member suggest that this settles it; if I could possibly settle the bill in this way

I would do so. Although I am a member of the banking and commerce committee unfortunately I was not present at the session of the committee when this bill was under consideration, and for my information I must depend upon what has been said to-night and upon the bill itself. It is at this stage that we determine the principle of the bill, and those who have asked that the bill be re-committed have given us no very good reason why that should be done except that the sponsor himself has in some way taken upon himself the obligation to get this before the committee, and he as a lawyer is interested in seeing that his clients are fully satisfied.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: So he is interested in having the bill brought before the committee. For some reason or other he was not present when it came up previously.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the hon. member should refer to the sponsor of the bill as acting for a client. He is here as a member of parliament, and there is no reason to make such an insinuation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite ready to withdraw that remark if it is unparliamentary. I think those were almost the words of the sponsor of the bill yesterday.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not parliamentary to say that a member of this house who is a lawyer should have attended to the affairs of his clients. That is an insinuation that he is here as a paid agent, and that insinuation should be withdrawn.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite willing to withdraw any insinuation of the kind. As a matter of fact I did not intend to insinuate anything. The sponsor of the bill is very keenly interested in having the matter properly presented, and it is true that in this case the sponsor of the bill happens to be a lawyer. I have no doubt he has some professional pride in seeing that the bill is properly presented to the house. For some reason or other he was unable to be present before the committee, but there has been no suggestion that the committee did not give it fair consideration. If there was any suggestion of that kind I would quite gladly agree to its going back, but there has been nothing of that kind said. At this time we are trying to determine the principle of the bill, and I think sufficient has been adduced already in this discussion to-night to show that the principle of this bill is absolutely wrong. There are one or two points I should like to emphasize, though most of them have been touched upon already.

Mr. ROBINSON: My hon. friend has said he was not at the meeting. I may say that from the discussion to-night one would think the banking and commerce committee were unanimous in turning down the preamble of the bill, but the vote was seven to eight.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROBINSON: My recollection is that eight were against it and seven were for the bill. I am sure of that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite ignorant on that point, but with regard to the principle of the bill, in section 5 (b) we have the following statement:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act, or in the Money Lenders Act or in paragraph (c) of section sixty-three of the Loan Companies Act. . . .

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that these various acts which are general in character have been placed upon the statute books to safe-guard borrowers; I think that may be taken for granted. I do not know all the terms or provisions of these acts, but I have no doubt they were fairly well considered, and they are general acts intended to safeguard the interests of borrowers. I do not think any bill ought to be introduced which in this way sets aside the provision of general acts. It is vicious legislation, because almost any company could come along and plead for a special exemption. If there is something in the Interest Act, in the Money Lenders Act or in the Loan Companies Act which is unjust to the lenders or if there is something that should be revised, let us bring in amendments to those acts. Then we will not need to bring in these exceptions. If those acts are fair to lenders and yet safeguard borrowers, I think we should not permit them to be set aside.

Further, there is the other point which has been dealt with to-night and which I think has not been answered. I can hardly conceive of this house passing legislation which would permit a possible 17 per cent to be charged; it would seem to me outrageous that anything of the kind should be done. I quite admit that the interest may be only 7 per cent, 10 per cent or 12 per cent, but I cannot see that we are justified in allowing anything to go through so loosely drawn that it would permit anything of this character. Even to one who is a layman and not an expert in draftsmanship it is apparent that this is a most extraordinary bill, permitting exceptions of almost every conceivable character. So, as we are dealing here with the principle of the bill, I think we should decide that no bill shall be permitted to pass which will contravene what would seem to be the fundamental principles of justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for the consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to government orders.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Post Office—outside service, $36,339,975.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I asked the Minister if he would explain why the item covering stationery and printing shows an amount for 1931-32 of $490,000 as compared with $865,623.18 for 1930-31.

Mr. SAUVE: I thank the hon. member for calling my attention to this matter. The main estimates for 1930-31 called for $490,000 for this item, and this amount was voted during the regime of the former government. However, it was not sufficient to cover the requirements for the year and pay accounts due to the printing bureau which had been accumulating since 1927-28. The present administration decided that these outstanding accounts should be paid, and provided for an amount of $375,623.18 to be included in the supplementary estimates.

The situation to which the hon. member has called attention is one which is likely to arise following any change of government. When main estimates are passed by one administration and further supplementary estimates passed by an incoming administration, it is impossible to avoid this apparent discrepancy in the figures. In order to make a proper comparison it is necessary to show in the figures for the previous year both the main and supplementary estimates which have been passed. I am informed that this has been the practice heretofore. If it were not followed hon. members would find it necessary to have before them the details of the supplementary estimates in order to make a comparison between one year and another. This is not a reflection upon the administration of the former Postmaster General, but is simply the application of a well-defined and long standing rule.

Mr. VENIOT: An entirely wrong impression is given by showing in the 1930-31 column the amount of $865,623.18, this being an intimation that the former government had voted that amount. The amount voted by the late administration was $490,000, and if the incoming government found it necessary to straighten out accounts due to the printing department, they should have shown that they were voting $865,623.18 this year instead of $490,000, and then given an explanation of the increase of $375,000. As the two columns now appear an attempt is being made to show that this government is practising economy in that they have reduced one item by $375,000. I do not say that has been done intentionally, but it is a falsification of the records of the former and present government.

The minister says that a precedent has been established for this practice, but I do not know where he gets his information. It has never been the case that an incoming government, having to meet a deficit of an outgoing government, has shown an amount as having been voted by the outgoing government when in fact a part of the amount had been voted by themselves. It is only for that reason that I am pointing this out tonight, that the Post Office Department, under the present government, has not had any decrease; it is not entitled to a decrease of $375,000. What the minister should have had in the estimates was $490,000 plus $375,000, and then showed that the increase he was obliged to make was because of an outstanding account that had not been settled by the former government.

Mr. CAYLEY: I want to bring to the minister's attention something that has been referred to me and also I am sure has been referred to him hundreds of times by reason of the many changes in the mail services owing to the cutting off of trains. I have under my hand a communication from the town of Tillsonburg, in the county of Oxford, drawing to my attention the very great handicap under which the industries of that thrifty little town are labouring at the present time. A letter sent to the minister under date of July 14, 1931, explains the position in which many of these towns and villages find themselves, especially those off the main railways that have not at present the mail service which they enjoyed for many years past. This is the letter to which I refer:

The Postmaster General,
Parliament Buildings, Ottawa, Ontario.
Dear Sir:

We are writing you in connection with the change in the postal service in the town of Tillsonburg which came into effect the first of July. Before that date, the mail was delivered here before nine o'clock in the morning, and since then it is ten-thirty, and occasionally if there is any delay such as to-day, it is twelve o'clock noon, and as the last outgoing mail is at two-thirty p.m. you will realize that we have not time to attend to the day's business and it it has to stand over for twenty-four hours, which is an intolerable situation for business establishments like ours, and there are a dozen others in this town in the same position.

Vigorous protests have been entered to the district superintendent in London, but without any results so far, and therefore would ask you to kindly investigate this matter and see what can be done to right this situation, which is doing us a great deal of damage, as we feel we are entitled to better service.

I would be very glad to hear from you.

Yours very truly,

The Tillsonburg Shoe Company, Limited.

I am sure the minister is conscious of the great handicap under which these industries are labouring. I should like an assurance from him that he will do something and do it soon in order that these towns and villages off the main railroads may receive some consideration.

I should like to bring to his attention another matter which has been referred to me. Many of these mails are carried on mixed trains, part of the train consisting of freight cars, and while they have a schedule on which they are supposed to run, it is very difficult, indeed almost impossible, to run according to schedule, this depending upon the amount of freight they have to lift at the various stations. One can imagine the difficulty with which the postmasters along the route are faced. Some of them tell me they have to wait for these trains an hour, two hours, and so on. Very often it is the wife of the postmaster who has to wait out in those cold stations for the mails to be delivered. I am sure the minister wants to see all of these towns and villages free from this handicap and given the same advantages as industries enjoy in the larger centres which are better served by railways, and that he will do his utmost to see that as soon as at all possible something is done to give these people a fair deal.

Mr. SAUVE: I thank the hon. gentleman for his representations and I can assure him that I shall continue to give my most serious consideration to the question.

[Mr. Cayley.]

Mr. BRADETTE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have a request to make to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauve). I am aware that in the section of the country which I have the privilege of representing, it is difficult for the department to always give entire satisfaction, owing to its vastness and scattered population, I am alluding to the post office of Ryland, a parish which is situated somewhat to the west of the town of Hearst. I think that the department has had this question under consideration for almost two years, but owing to the local difficulties, I think it proper to again draw the attention of the house to this matter. I must say, by the way, that in my section of the country as well as in many other extensive districts, whether under the Conservative or Liberal rule, the Post Office Department has had to make heavy outlays to provide a postal system.

Owing to the small population of Ryland, it would be only fair that the present post office should be removed to the village of Ryland itself. At present, only eight or ten families benefit by the postal service; the others who form the majority of the parish of Ryland must travel at least 1½ miles or to get their mail at the town of Hearst which is nearly 6 miles away. As I have just mentioned, the Post Office Department was aware of this fact last year and this year, and, I think, that the question is being considered. I would suggest, if the department fears that this change would be unfair to the present postmaster, who is one of the pioneers of this section of the country and who has been postmaster for a number of years, I would suggest to the Postmaster General, on behalf of the worthy population of Ryland, that he put up two post offices, the present one to remain where it is and another to be located in the village itself. I think the thing could be easily done. I know that this will entail a further expenditure and that might create a precedent, however, I make this suggestion on behalf of the worthy pioneers of new Ontario, who are making sacrifices to develop that part of the province.

I have another request to make on behalf of this parish. I wonder if it would be possible for the Post Office Department to again provide mail service three times a week, as in the past. If I am not mistaken, these worthy people receive mail only twice a week. May I point out that there are two trains, No. 1 and No. 2, two National Railway trains which pass there daily. It would therefore be an easy task for the Post Office Department to provide again tri-weekly mail service to accommodate the parish of Ryland.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Let me assure the hon. member that the question which he has just brought up with reference to Ryland, is receiving the department's attention, and that we shall further consider and study the matter, especially after the fair comments made by my hon. friend. We are not only considering the request, but also the means at our disposal to settle this matter.

As to the last part of his request, the hon. member will admit that this is rather within the scope of the railways and that it would be proper to refer the matter to the railway officials. I can assure the hon. member that we shall continue to consider this question from the viewpoint of serving the best interests of this territory, and at the same time giving justice to the people of Ryland.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to again draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General to the question of a home distribution of mail for the city of Joliette. At the outset of the session I wrote to the hon. Postmaster General on this subject and in his answer dated March 21, 1931, he stated, among other things:

> The question of giving a home distribution of mail to the people of Joliette was considered by the Postmaster General some time ago, but owing to the economic situation of the country, it was thought proper to put off taking any decision on the matter until conditions showed improvement.

The economic situation of the country, is perhaps a reason which can be invoked as regards many requests, however, I must point out that last year the late government had an item in the estimates voted to provide for such a service at Joliette, and if I am not mistaken, an order in council had been passed—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): On what date?

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): I have not the date, it must have been in June.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): After the 1930 session?

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Yes, after the session, however, the question had been considered and decided during the session and, at the time, near the end of the session, the Civil Service Commission, on the advice of the Post Office Department had candidates who wished to become letter-carriers at Joliette, undergo the necessary test, following this the commission prepared a list of those who were eligible. Furthermore, the Post Office Department forwarded to the post office at Joliette, all the paraphernalia required to start this service, namely, letter-carriers' uniforms, mail-pouches, etc., it was therefore a service which had practically been established by the preceding administration.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If the money was voted at the last session, why the order in council?

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): The order in council was to fix the necessary amount. In last year's estimates, the details were not given to the house. However, I knew that my request had been granted by the then Postmaster General and that the amount had been included in the summary estimates of $16,500,000.

It was a service which we thought necessary and timely, and was granted under the late administration. I cannot believe that th present government had ever conceived the idea of taking away from the town of Joliette a service which had been granted by a preceding administration. I would rather believe that there has been some mistake with respect to this request.

The request is justified by the returns of the post office, at Joliette. The population is gradually increasing, although slowly; it has now reached eleven thousand and some odd hundred people and the post office has also a revenue which is gradually and uninterruptedly increasing year by year; at present it is more than $20,000. The returns of the Joliette Post Office are as large and even larger than those of certain other towns of the province, whose population is less, yet the latter have their home distribution.

Under these circumstances, I again humbly place my request before the hon. Postmaster General. May I say to him that I have full confidence in his spirit of fairness, and that if he so desires, he can satisfy the wishes of the people of the county which I have the honour of representing.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to thank the hon. member for Joliette of the trust he places in me and I may say to him, as it is often said in letters that I receive myself: "my letter speaks for itself." As to the money voted for this new service, if I be not mistaken, there was no definite amount mentioned in the estimates, at least I have not been able to find it in last year's estimates.

An amount was, perhaps included in the estimates as a whole, if it were voted, however, it does not appear anywhere, and I think, that is the reason that an order in council was passed in June to determine the amount which was to be granted for such a service.

Now, we are studying the financial situation and the means at our disposal. If it be possible to complete the organization of this service, we shall do so with the greatest of pleasure.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I correct the statement just made by the hon. Postmaster General. The amount was voted last year for this service at Joliette, it was included in the general item—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Would you kindly let me see it?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I cannot do so, but the order in council mentions it, and this order in council passed in June authorized the establishment of this service in Joliette. That order in council would have never been passed, if it had not been shown to the Treasury Board that the amount had been provided in the estimates submitted to the house.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That may be, but there is nothing to show this:

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): You will not find these details in the estimates, but they were mentioned in the house when the estimates were submitted and explanations were then given. The estimates of the Post Office Department were voted by the house, the order in council was brought down recommended by myself when I was Postmaster General, and passed upon by the Treasury Board. If this had not been done the Civil Service Commission would have had no authority to advertise in the newspapers for candidates to fill the position of letter-carriers.

Mr. CAYLEY: Coming back to the matter I spoke of before, I was wondering if the Postmaster General has considered the use of motor cars for delivering the mail to places off the main line where the mail service has been disrupted and the people at present are greatly inconvenienced. It is highly essential that these thrifty little towns and villages, which now find themselves with a very poor mail service, should be given better facilities.

Mr. SAUVE: In cases where the train mail service is abolished, we consider the possibility of delivering the mail by car or bus or other means.

Mr. HURTUBISE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Postmaster General a question, but, previous to doing so, I wish to give some explanation. Under the Liberal regime plans and specifications had been prepared and even tenders asked for in connection with an aerial postal service between Montreal, Ottawa, Pembroke, Sudbury, North Bay and Sault Ste. Marie. The point which I wish to elucidate is this: Do the estimates of the Postmaster General provide for the completion, in part or as a whole, of this service which was planned under the preceding administration?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Not for the present.

Mr. HURTUBISE (Translation): I am asking the Postmaster General this question, because in my section of the country, naturally, all towns like Sudbury and North Bay, are preparing and endeavouring to find landing fields, and if as the minister has just said, nothing will be done for a year to come they will discontinue these preparations.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I think it would be better for them to act cautiously.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I am very sorry I could not follow the remarks of my hon. friend from Nipissing, as I am unable to understand the French language. I do not know whether or not the hon. member was quarrelling with the Postmaster General, but I must say his language sounded very well. The French language is euphonic and beautiful whether hon. members are quarrelling or not—I should like to know what it is like when they are making love.

Has the Postmaster General received any letters or petitions from the village of Ranfurly with respect to closing post office lobbies in that village? If the minister has received such letters or petitions I should like to know what his answer was.

Mr. SAUVE: The hon. member is right; we have had correspondence in that connection but I am sorry it is not now before me. I may state however we have considered the matter.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Some time ago on the orders of the day I brought this matter to the attention of the Postmaster General, and asked him whether there was a general ruling to apply to all of Canada or whether the ruling would apply only to the village of Ranfurly. In reply the Postmaster General said that the ruling was not confined to Ranfurly but was general throughout Canada. There were certain exceptions however in the province of Quebec in connection with which he made the following statement:

Exceptions are made in some instances in the province of Quebec where some post offices are kept open to permit patrons to get their mail after driving to the village to church.

I sent this answer to the people in Ranfurly and vicinity but they do not seem to be very well satisfied.

Mr. VENIOT: Is it a public building?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I think there is a store attached to the building wherein the post office is located. The people around Ranfurly are not satisfied with the statement of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SAUVE: I shall be pleased to reconsider the question and shall try to satisfy the hon. member.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Will the Postmaster General tell that to the petitioners from Ranfurly?

Mr. ERNST: The minister has told it to Hansard, and that is just as good.

Mr. SAUVE: I shall reconsider the matter.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I wish to put a question to the hon. Postmaster General so as to obtain some information. In order that I may be clearly understood may I draw his attention to one case. A person is appointed postmaster in a village of Quebec. The department locates the post office in a store belonging to another person. An election takes place, and the proprietor of the store puts in his store election handbills and placards. Would the Postmaster General be so obliging as to inform me whether the fact of placing election handbills and placards in his store may be considered as political interference on the part of the postmaster?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That depends on the location of the post office.

Mr. GIROUARD: The post office is located in the store.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Is it entirely separated?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Partly.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What portion is separated?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The front part and sides are separated by partitions. Evidently, it is the same counter in the rear which is used for goods and post office purposes, and in the present case it must be admitted that in the post office proper there are no placards or handbills.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): According to the limited experience I have had, it happens in certain cases, as I have found out, after obtaining the necessary information from those who have charge of such inquiries, and even from our own officials, that the portion reserved for postal purposes in the store is very limited, and all that takes place in the store practically takes place in the post office, because the latter itself forms part of the store and the separation, so to speak, is not adequate. The post office is here and the store there. The hon. member will admit that the postmaster who has a little office in the corner of the room hardly or not entirely separated from the store, and who places hand-bills and advertisements—

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The postmaster is not the proprietor of the store.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): It is a case where the postmaster is not the proprietor of the store.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Is the place rented ?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Yes, the place is rented for the post office.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The place is rented for the post office and in the store politics is carried on?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The case is as follows, if the Postmaster General will allow me—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I know of such cases, however one must act cautiously, especially when one has to listen to reports which reach you—they are often contradicted.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I am glad to hear the hon. Postmaster General say that one must act cautiously; however, those who are sent by the Post Office Department to inquire into such cases do not act as cautiously as the hon. Postmaster General himself. I allude to the case at Ste-Clothilde-de-Horton.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Would the hon. member have any objection to naming the locality to which he alludes.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I have just mentioned the place: Ste-Clothilde-de-Horton. The postmaster had his post office in a store owned by a Mr. Rousseau.

A general election was announced and the proprietor placed hand-bills and placards in his store. He evidently was entitled to do so; he had no permission to ask from the postmaster. An inquiry was held and the Commissioner decided that the fact of having hand-bills advertising the Liberal party in the store, where the post office was located, was sufficient evidence of political interference on the part of the postmaster. Consequently, the hon. Postmaster General signed the order in council dismissing this postmaster.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What was the conclusion arrived at in the report?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I shall read it:

From the evidence heard, I conclude that the postmaster is a strong Liberal partisan who does not conceal his views and even delights in airing them in public; that the fear of losing his position as postmaster prevented him from compromising himself publicly either by his acts or other ways—

I wish to specially draw the attention to these lines.

—the fact itself of having handbills advertising the Liberal party in the store where the post office is located, and of allowing his two assistants to carry on political propaganda, driving voters to the polls are sufficient evidence to prove political partisanship.

I was anxious to elucidate the first point.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Who signed this?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): It is signed by J. Alfred Powell, of St-Ferdinand d'Halifax. I was anxious to elucidate the first point, namely, whether a postmaster should be punished for the actions of the owner of a store in which the department has rented space sufficient for the post office. The hon. Postmaster General has just stated that in such cases it is well to act cautiously. However, it is perhaps somewhat late to make this statement seeing that the ex-postmaster has been dismissed.

The other question which I want to ask is the following: A postmaster employs assistants who are paid by himself and not by the Post Office Department. If, on the voting day, one of the assistants, without the knowledge of the postmaster, drives voters to the polls, does that constitute, on the part of the postmaster, an act of political partisanship?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The employee of a postmaster does not concern the Post Office Department.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I am entirely satisfied with the answer just given by the Postmaster General. I therefore conclude that the postmaster of Ste-Clothide-de-Horton was illegally and unjustly dismissed, and I wish to protest against this dismissal. The only evidence brought to bear against him was the fact that his employees had driven voters to the polls. He was unjustly dismissed and another person was appointed in his place.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): These are not the facts. I understand that the hon. member put forth two cases: the first, that of Ste-Clothilde-de Horton, and another which he has not designated.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): It is the same case.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Are they not two different cases?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The commissioner gives these two reasons for the dismissal.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): This postmaster was not dismissed simply because one of his assistants meddled in politics. In the first case the hon. member spoke of the location of the post office and hand-bills placed in the store. These are two different questions.

As regards the inquiring commissioner, I absolutely follow the rule laid down by the leaders of the two parties, in 1923: when a commissioner is appointed he takes the oath and carries out an inquiry, the Postmaster General acts on the recommendation of the commissioner's report; he is not there to discuss the commissioner's recommendation nor to attack it, because the inquiry is carried on under oath and it does not behoove the minister to say: "Your recommendations are not just."

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I follow perfectly the reasons just given by the Postmaster General and I certainly give them their due weight. However, the Post Office Department must bear the responsibility of dismissals which take place. If there are dismissals, sir, the Postmaster General must also take his share of responsibility. I simply wish to state that an injustice was committed in my county, and I respectfully request the hon. Postmaster General to rectify it.

I especially want to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to a letter which he wrote on August 21, 1930, to Mr. Agésilas Kirouac, the Conservative candidate in Arthabaska. At the last election, I always read with interest the speeches made by the hon. Postmaster General, seeing that they always contained statements of principles with which, most of the time, I agreed. If the hon. Postmaster General will allow me, I shall read to him a letter which he personally wrote on August 21, 1930, to the Conservative candidate of Arthabaska, the letter reads as follows:

Mr. Agésilas Kirouac,
Warwick, P.Q.
Dear Sir,—
I have received your letter dated the 19th inst., recommending Mr. Alfred Laforest for the position of postmaster at St-Clothilde-de-Horton.
In answer, I am sorry to state that for the present nothing can be done in this respect. I must first make myself acquainted with all the branches of my department.

Up to now no fault can be found.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What is the date of this letter?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): August 21, 1930. The hon. Postmaster General had just been appointed, and I readily understand that he was not yet familiar with all the details of his department. However, I wish to draw his attention to the following lines:

I shall then arrange with my colleagues and be as obliging as possible to our friends, while at the same time ensuring proper administration.

Would the hon. Postmaster General be kind enough to inform me when was held this meeting of ministers to decide what had to be done to oblige the friends, who were the members of the cabinet present, and finally, what decision was taken following this meeting.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wonder whether the hon. member is joking when he asks me this series of questions. I have sufficient parliamentary experience to know that it is not customary to answer questions of this nature. The ministers met each time that it was found necessary to discuss questions which were submitted to them in the public interests. We are not called upon to give an account of the number of times ministers meet. I think, moreover, that this question was lately settled in this house, and that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) gave his views in this sense. I am ready to give all the information possible, however, I cannot remember all the dates when the ministers met to discuss public questions.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General will admit that my question is as serious a one as what he wrote to the Conservative candidate in Arthabaska. The hon. minister had just been placed in office and I am certain that to-day he would not write the same letter which he wrote last year.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Are there any other paragraphs?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): It is the third paragraph.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Is that the worst?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Yes, it is the worst.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It is all right.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I doubt whether the Postmaster General should rejoice so much over this letter. He expresses the views that to obtain a civil service position in his department, the necessary qualification is to belong to the same party as he does. No other meaning can be attached to his statement—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will you read it?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): —which I shall read a second time.

I shall then arrange with my colleagues. . . .

One must bear in mind that the Postmaster General was writing to the Conservative candidate of Arthabaska who had recommended to him the appointment of Mr. Alfred Laforest who was later appointed.

I shall then arrange with my colleagues and be as obliging as possible to our friends while at the same time ensuring proper administration.

If the hon. Postmaster General says that this statement holds good and he is ready to approve of it to-day, I have nothing else to add. After having read the statement he made, when he was appointed Postmaster General, I felt certain that he would be fair to all ratepayers, whether they were Liberals or Conservatives; but if he states to-day that he approves of what he wrote last year, I am forced, I regret, to conclude that he makes a distinction between those who side with his politics and those who belong to the Liberal party. It is all that I have to say.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I would not endorse the statement I made in that letter if the interpretation of the hon. member was a correct one. I much prefer what is said in my letter than the interpretation given to it by the hon. member. When a friend writes to me and asks a favour, I think I have the right to answer him and consult with my colleagues as regards questions of this nature, in order to play fair with our friends without interfering with the public interest. And if such interests clash, that of the country must have precedence. That is the policy which I have followed in my department from the very first, and I might point out many instances which have occurred in the county of the hon. member. I could name a number of members on the opposition benches who are aware of what I have done to be fair towards the employees of my department.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): That is what I wish to know.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That is what you wish to know and that is what I do.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General has just informed my hon. friend the member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard) that he followed the practice adopted by the previous government as regards dismissals after inquiry.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Pardon me, this is not exactly what I stated. I followed the rule adopted by the Prime Minister in office in 1923; the then leader of the opposition held the same views and the same rule had been followed by the previous administration. There is quite a difference with what the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) wants me to say.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): According to the rule followed. And the hon. Postmaster General added: "As the former administration accepted the conclusions of the commissioners, he followed the same rule." Allow me, sir, to say to him that the former administration did not follow the practice which he has just referred to this evening.

Mr. SAUVE: (Translation): I know it.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The former administration, it is true, after a report charging an official with political interference was received, ordered an inquiry according to the rule adopted in 1923 by the house. However, after the inquiry was held and the commissioner's report was submitted to the department, the recommendation of the commissioner was not adhered to without having first examined the evidence given at the inquiry, because it may so happen that the commissioner's conclusions are wrong and not in keeping with the evidence given. I took the trouble as Postmaster General to follow every inquiry and in a number of cases I would not accept the recommendation of the commissioner because his conclusions were not in keeping with the facts. I thought that I was as good a judge as he in weighing the evidence given. I notice that in the inquiries which are held to-day, the commissioners do not submit the evidence given at the inquiry and that in drawing their conclusions they say: We base our judgment on such and such evidence; however, if they quoted the evidence in full one would perhaps discover that their conclusions are not always in keeping with the evidence.

I shall cite one case in particular, that of the postmaster of Lamèque, in the county of Gloucester. The commissioner in charge of the inquiry in his conclusions states that the postmaster admitted having been present at a political meeting and he specifies which one it was. Now, it so happened that this meeting was not a political one but a public reception given by all the parties of the parish including both Conservatives and Liberals. It is true, that the postmaster came to this reception given in honour of your humble servant; however, it was not a political affair. When I forwarded—I should like the Postmaster General to listen to this—when I forwarded the report of the commissioner to the postmaster of Lamèque, he sent me an affidavit stating that the conclusions of the commissioner in charge of the inquiry were not correct, were not in keeping with the evidence given. You have on file in the department the affidavit of the postmaster of Lamèque, a man who never took any part in politics; however, the commissioner drew his conclusions from the fact that this postmaster had admitted being present at that political meeting—when in no sense could it be called a political meeting. I understand that up to the present the Postmaster General has not taken any definite stand on this question and I request him, before accepting the recommendations of the commissioner in charge of the inquiry to examine them carefully. That is why almost every time that complaints were made to me as regards inquiries which were held when I was in office, I went very carefully over the evidence given; I also ask the Postmaster General to take the necessary time to examine the evidence, at least in part, and to make sure that the recommendations of the commissioner in charge are just.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): My hon. friend the former Postmaster General will admit that heretofore we have taken the necessary time to consider the question.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Yes, you certainly had time to consider this question of Laméque.

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): If a member of parliament writes to the Postmaster General and states that, to his personal knowledge, a postmaster took an active part in an election, the Postmaster General, as a rule, dismisses this postmaster?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In certain cases we grant an inquiry. There are post offices which come under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): If a member of parliament signs a letter charging a postmaster with political partisanship, the rule is to dismiss this postmaster?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I did not quite understand the question.

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): Are there cases where a member of parliament has written to the Postmaster General charging a postmaster of participating in an election, and where the Postmaster General has dismissed this postmaster?

Mr. SAUVE: (Translation): Dismissed him or asked for his resignation?

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): Yes, dismissed.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): All depends on circumstances. If the hon. member will quote a case, it would be easier for me to refer to it and give an exact answer.

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): I simply wish to obtain some information. There are also instances where postmasters have been dismissed because the local member had put in charges against them of political partisanship. In a number of counties, postmasters lost their positions because the local member put in charges against them of having taken an active part in an election.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Oh, yes, there were a number of questions with reference to this matter and I think information on the subject was supplied to the house.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I should like to ask the Postmaster General a further question: if a member from this side of the house wrote a letter to him making similar charges would the Postmaster General also consider them.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) was in his seat, he might perhaps answer for me. I play a fair game. If a Liberal member makes a complaint against a postmaster and takes the responsibility of his action, he will receive the same answer as the one I give to members on the government side.

Mr. BEAUBIEN (Translation): I ask this question for my own information.

Mr. OSCAR BOULANGER (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General seems to be well disposed. I shall therefore avail myself of such an opportunity. He stated a moment ago that his desire was to be fair in all circumstances. I wish to ask him to make amends for what seems to me an injustice committed at St-Lazare, in the county of Bellechasse. The village of St-Lazare, like many of our Quebec villages, is built on both sides of the highway and stretches out lengthwise about a mile. In the centre of the village there is quite a steep hill. For many years the question of where to locate the post office has been debated. It seems that it cannot be located in the centre of the village since the centre is quite a steep hill, the result is that it is located sometimes at one end and at sometimes at the other end. When it is located at the western end, those living in the eastern part complain that it is too far and vice versa. When I was elected as member of Bellechasse, the post office was in the eastern part of the village, close to the church. I was asked to make a change; those living in the western part contended that their end was the business part of the village and they wanted to have the post office there. So as to please everybody, I finally suggested to the Post Office Department to establish two post offices, one at each end of the village, thus endeavouring to get over the difficulty. I was not however successful in my request. After the last election—I must first point out that the postmistress of St-Lazare, until lately, was a Mrs. Leroux—immediately after the elections my opponent in last year's election made a complaint to the Postmaster General, charging Mrs. Leroux with political partizanship. Unfortunately for him he was unable to find any evidence whatsoever in support of his charge. Madame Leroux is an excellent housewife, she minds her own business and does not meddle in politics. Seeing that he could not have her dismissed for political interference, nor obtain an inquiry to that effect, he had recourse to the ever-ready reason that the post office was not in the centre of the village and that it should be placed there. He requested that a person by the name of Adélard Bélanger be appointed postmaster to replace Mrs. Leroux. It so happens, however, that Adélard Bélanger himself resides quite to the west of the village proper, in the extreme opposite direction to the locality where Mrs. Leroux had the post office. I have letters here which I will not take up the time of the house in reading, and in which my opponent states to the Postmaster General that it was a question of almost national importance to remove the post office and in the interest of the Conservative party. However, to sum up, the party's interest is that of Adélard Bélanger and the interest of Adélard Bélanger is to take away the post office from a mother who is devoted to her family and to have himself appointed postmaster. There lies the whole question. I have a copy of the Post Office Department's file in this respect before me and I see that all the officials of the Post Office Department from the Deputy Minister down, including the superintendent of the Quebec postal division and inspectors, one after the other wrote to that gentleman, who asked for the dismissal of the postmistress at St. Lazare, that if anything was done, it would be better to settle the question definitely, once for all; because to take the post office from one end to place it at the other, was no solution to the question. The two ways out of this dilemma are either to follow the advice of the officials of the Post Office Department and place it in the centre of the village or provide two post offices, as I suggested a long time ago. Notwithstanding the advice of his officials or the views of the inspector who visited the place and recommended the setting up of two post offices, or at least one central one, the Postmaster General allowed himself to be influenced by the argument of "national interest" invoked by Mr. Bélanger. I do not wish to lay any blame on the Postmaster General who is one of my friends, and with whom I generally get along very well, however, he will allow me to say to him that in this case, he perhaps was too kind-hearted; he should have followed the first decision of his department and adopted one of the two means suggested by the inspector who visited the place. I wish to point out that it is not a site, a particular locality or a special residence that is appointed postmaster in a village, but that it is a person. It is not the house of Mrs. Leroux that was appointed postmistress, at St. Lazare; it is Mrs. Leroux herself and she should remain in that post when the site of the post office is changed. I submit that previous to taking away this post from Mrs. Leroux, she should have been given the chance—it is the least what the Postmaster General could have done—to find a more appropriate or central locality. That is not what was done. Mrs. Leroux was simply illegally and unjustly dismissed. The position was taken away from a mother with dependents against whom nothing wrong could be found, either from an administrative or political viewpoint. The site of the post office was used as a pretext to dismiss Mrs. Leroux. Before acting thus she should at least have been given the chance—seeing that she was the one who had been appointed postmistress—to choose a more central locality which would be more appropriate to the needs of the village. To my mind an injustice has been done, and as the hon. Postmaster General is in an excellent mood this evening and seems disposed to do all he can to help everybody, I beg of him to make amends for the injustice done at St. Lazare. It is yet time; this kind Mr. Bélanger, who replaced Mr. Leroux has not yet been appointed definitely. Therefore, if the Postmaster General will but grant my request, it is not too late and I trust he may do so. I have confidence in him and I hope he will take my remarks in good part.

There is another subject which I would have liked to broach this evening; it is the question of the rural mail at Honfleur. I spoke about it privately to the hon. Postmaster General, and I think that we shall be able to agree on this point. Another reason why I shall not touch upon this subject this evening is that the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) is as much interested as I am in this matter, seeing that we divide this parish. The hon. member for Dorchester seems to have at heart this rural mail route, at Honfleur, judging by the interesting letters he has written and which I find on file. As he is not in the house this evening I shall put off the discussion of it to later on, unless the hon. Postmaster General meanwhile comes to an understanding satisfactory to both the hon. member for Dorchester and myself.

In closing my remarks, may I again earnestly request the hon. Postmaster General to administer justice to our friends of St-Lazare, and I trust he will bear in mind the suggestion I made of providing two post offices, one at each end of the village. I also trust that Mrs. Leroux will be again placed in charge of one of these post offices.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to thank the hon. member for Bellechase (Mr. Boulanger) for his sympathetic and pleasant remarks, and I wish to assure him that I shall again consider the case of St-Lazare in an endeavour to be fair to everybody. As to the Honfleur matter, as the hon. member stated, I am ready to do my utmost to settle this question to the satisfaction of the large majority of those interested in Honfleur.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I thank you, sir.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, on the question of the dismissal of postmasters and the general changes in the postal service I wish to direct the attention of the committee to a case which I think deserves the very close consideration of the Postmaster General. Last night while replying to an hon. member who brought up the matter of general dismissals during my time as Postmaster General, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Smith) interjected a remark, and my retort brought back a complete denial on his part. I wish now to refer to the postmastership of Lakeville, in the county of Carleton, New Brunswick, and in doing so I shall give the history of this post office for as far back as six or seven years at least.

In 1926, when I assumed the office of Postmaster General, a Mr. W. F. Anderson was in charge of the post office at Lakeville. Mr. Anderson was charged, by affidavit, with political partisanship; an investigation took place, following which he was found guilty of the charge, and on February 21, 1928, an order in council was passed dismissing him. The Civil Service Commission advertised the vacancy and Mr. H. M. Gee was appointed in place of Anderson. Before that appointment was made, in all advertisements it was stated that the applicant must state where he would locate the post office. The applicants did so, and Mr. Gee placed the post office where he said in his application it would be located.

I am informed that Mr. Gee resigned sometime in May or June, 1930, and the Civil Service Commission, after advertising the vacancy, appointed Mr. S. G. Barter postmaster of Lakeville. In his application Mr. Barter stated that the site would be the same as it had been under the previous postmaster, and Barter was appointed and continued the post office at that point. At the time he asked the Post Office Department, through the superintendent at St. John, New Brunswick, whether he could change the site and the answer was that he could not do so except with the consent of the department. He continued to administer that office in peace and quiet until August.

I have in my hand a certified copy of sessional paper No. 226, containing the correspondence which passed between the present member for Victoria-Carleton and the Post Office Department, together with correspondence between officials of the department and Mr. Barter, and I wish to place this correspondence on Hansard. Before doing so let me say that Mr. Barter is a returned soldier and the father of six children. Mr. Barter fought overseas for over three years, together with four of his brothers, and he is the only one of those five who has received any consideration from any government or any political party. This is the man who was set aside in order that the post office might be given to a civilian, if the Civil Service Commission would do so. When I was Postmaster General I was accused of not treating returned soldiers as they should have been treated; there was one case in particular, the Simcoe case, into which I will not undertake to go to-night but to which I just refer in passing. If ever a man received a thrashing on the floor of the house; if ever a man was given a calling down, so to speak, I was that man in connection with the Simcoe case, but in that case it could not be said that I had discriminated against returned soldiers, because the man who did get the appointment instead of Whittaker was himself a returned man, who in point of qualification was ahead of Whittaker on the list, although under the special sections of the act Whittaker occupied first position because of extreme disability. Here is a case where a man who has done his duty at the front, together with his four brothers, and who has a family of six children, is thrown on the streets. No matter how hard I may have been considered in my treatment of returned soldiers there was never such a case as this brought to my attention.

Now I am going to read the correspondence and let the committee judge. Last night I said that my hon. friend had recommended the dismissal of this man, and the hon. gentleman denied that statement. I am going to read the correspondence. I have here a letter dated August 29, 1930, and sent from East Florence, New Brunswick, to Hon. Arthur Sauvé, Postmaster General:

Dear Mr. Minister:

I beg to recommend that the post office at Lakeville, Carleton county, N.B., be removed from its present place to Hilda Wilson's store.

Some three years ago, in order to satisfy the political spleen of a few Liberals in that district, this post office was moved from Mr. W. F. Anderson's place on the main street to a side street running down to the station, and to a very inconvenient place so far as the public are concerned. It was purely a political move, and the public interests have suffered ever since in that vicinity.

I therefore recommend that it be moved to Hilda Wilson's store, which is conveniently located and will serve the public well. Miss Wilson will make a very competent postmistress—her father is dead—her mother is a very aged woman, and she is in a measure, supporting the family.

Thanking you for your prompt attention to this matter, I remain,

Yours very truly,

B. F. Smith.

That is followed by a letter from the Postmaster General to Mr. Smith under date of September 4, 1930:

B. F. Smith, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Smith:

I have had the case of Lakeville, Carleton county, N.B., about which you wrote on the 29th August, examined.

I find that Mr. W. F. Anderson, who was formerly postmaster at that point, was dismissed by order in council, P.C. 287, of the 21st February, 1928, as guilty of political partisanship. The charges against Mr. Anderson were investigated by a commissioner appointed for the purpose.

I note, however, from your communication, on the dismissal of Mr. Anderson, the office was located on a side street at a point which is very inconvenient so far as the public are concerned, and that the public interest has suffered ever since.

The department will have an official report prepared by the district superintendent of postal services, St. John, on the question of the site of the office, on receipt of which your representations on behalf of Miss Hilda Wilson will be given full consideration. I may mention, however, that a permanent appointment in the event of a change will rest with the Civil Service Commission, as the revenue exceeds $400 a year and, therefore, no guarantee can be given that Miss Wilson will be the person selected by the commission for this postmastership.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur Sauvé.

The next is a letter from Mr. Underwood to the district superintendent of postal service at St. John, dated September 4, and reading as follows:

The Postmaster General has received representations to the effect that on the dismissal of Mr. W. F. Anderson, a former postmaster at Lakeville, N.B., the office was located on a side street running down to the station, which caused great inconvenience to the public. It has been recommended to the Postmaster General that the office be moved to Miss Hilda Wilson's store which is conveniently located and would serve the public well.

Miss Wilson is also stated to be a very competent person.

Will District Superintendent please furnish the department with a report on the question of the site of the Lakeville office.

E. J. Underwood.

The next is a letter from the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton to the Postmaster General, dated September 10, 1930. This letter was written during the special session, and reads as follows:

With further reference to my letter of August 29 and your reply of September 4, the recommendation that I made concerning the post office should be carried out. There is no other person there so well qualified and so conveniently located, so far as public service is concerned, to handle this matter as the one I have mentioned, namely, Miss Hilda Wilson.

If that is not a recommendation for a dismissal of a postmaster, I want to know what it is. The letter continues.

I, therefore trust that without undue delay this matter will be given consideration.

Yours very truly,

B. F. Smith.

The next letter dated September 18, 1930, is from the minister to the hon. member, and there is attached a plan of the location. It reads:

I am in receipt of your further letter of the 10th September, asking again that a change be made in the postmastership at Lakeville, N.B.

As you were informed in my previous letter, an official report has been asked for on the question of the site of the office, and, as soon as this report is received, your representations in favour of a change will be dealt with.

The district superintendent of postal service is being asked to make his report on the question as soon as possible.

The next is a letter from Mr. Peck, superintendent of postal service for the St. John district, to the chief superintendent, postal service, Ottawa. It is dated September 16, 1930, and reads as follows:

In reply to the departmental memo. post office, Lakeville, of September 4, requesting that a report be submitted on the question of the present site of the Lakeville post office on the side street where it has been located since the dismissal of Mr. W. F. Anderson, former postmaster, and also stating that it had been recommended to the Postmaster General that the office be moved to a more convenient location at Miss Hilda Wilson's store, the chief superintendent is advised that inspector Allen visited the locality on the 10th instant and reports that the present site of the post office is about 300 yards from the main highway on a side street leading from the station. It is thus removed from the business and residential part of the community and causes inconvenience.

Miss Hilda Wilson, who is a most competent person, has a store conveniently located in the centre of the village on the main highway and the public could be served much better by the location offered by her. The part of the store that would be used and fitted up for the post office would be commodious and well suited for post office business and the building presents a good appearance.

Enclosed herewith will be found a small sketch showing the locations in question.

The next is a memorandum dated Ottawa, September 30, 1930, which reads:

Memo. for the General Superintendent. Re Lakeville, N.B.

Please allow the question of changing the site of this office to stand for the present.

L. J. Gaboury,
Deputy Postmaster General.

The next letter is from the hon. member, dated East Florenceville, N.B., February 24, 1931. It is addressed to Mr. P. T. Coolican, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General. The first part of the letter refers to other matters, but the remainder reads as follows:

I do not believe in making dismissals. I have only asked, I think, for this one—

The hon. member said he did not recommend a dismissal and stated that I could not prove that he had. In this letter he states that he asked only for this one. The letter continues.

—but I have made certain representations in connection with changes notably, the one at Lakeville, New Brunswick, where an injustice was done to the community under the Liberal administration by removing the post office to an inconvenient place for the sake of meeting the wishes of their friends.

It was not made to meet the wishes of our friends, because the appointment was made under civil service regulations, and the site was described in the application. The letter continues:

I asked to have this office moved back to where it would be convenient for the public. My information is, that the superintendent at St. John was asked to make a report upon it and while in St. John recently, I gathered that his report recommended the change which I had made, however, the matter stands and nothing has been done.

I am too busy with business matters to spend my time in writing a number of letters about these matters and when I make a recommendation, I think I know the ground that I am working upon. Until some action has been taken by your department to carry out recommendations already made along this line, I shall not be in a position to waste further time in trying to give advice.

Yours truly,
B. F. Smith.

The next is a letter from Mr. Coolican to the hon. member at East Florenceville. It is dated February 27, 1931, and reads:

I duly received your communication of the 24th instant, respecting Benton and Lakeville post offices.

I have noted your remarks and I may say that if you will call at my office as soon as you arrive in Ottawa, I shall be pleased to go into these questions further with you.

If the hon. member was in the same mood when he called on Mr. Coolican as he was when he wrote his previous letter, I pity Mr. Coolican. The next is a memorandum signed by Mr. Gaboury to the general superintendent. It is dated March 31, 1931, and reads:

Lakeville, New Brunswick.

The Postmaster General has authorized the removal of the office to the main road where it was located some years ago.

Please place office in temporary charge Miss H. Wilson, pending a permanent appointment by the commission.

What authority had the Postmaster General or even the governor in council to dismiss Mr. Barter and place the office in charge of this young lady? Under the regulations of the Civil Service Act a dismissal can be made in two or perhaps three ways. First, if the postmaster in the administration of his office is not giving satisfaction and the district superintendent so reports, then the minister, under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, has authority to act. Second, if the postmaster is guilty of political partisanship and a charge is made against him under an affidavit by some reliable person, the minister may order an investigation, and if it results in proving the political charges against the postmaster, the latter may be dismissed by order in council. Third, if the postmaster is guilty or suspected of being guilty of political partisanship and the sitting member for the constituency gives a certificate that the man has been guilty of political partisanship, then he may be dismissed by order in council. There is no other way under the sun of dismissing a postmaster.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Can he not be dismissed for the good of the service?

Mr. VENIOT: Not under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Did the hon. member not do so?

Mr. VENIOT: I did not. The hon. member cannot point to a Civil Service Commission case where I dismissed a postmaster without first, if the charge was one of maladministration, an investigation by the departmental officials; second, if the charge was one of political partisanship, without an investigation; or, third, if the charge was political partisanship, without the recommendation of the sitting member that he had personal knowledge of the matter.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): With all due deference to my hon. friend—

Mr. VENIOT: I do not care what deference my hon. friend may have, he cannot point to a case.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): The hon. member had some twenty-seven dismissals in the county of Victoria-Carleton which were on the recommendation of Michael Dwyer, who was not the sitting member.

Mr. VENIOT: Those are dismissals of postmasters where the revenue is under $400 per annum, who therefore do not come under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): But the hon. member dismissed them just the same.

Mr. VENIOT: I am talking about postmasters under the Civil Service Commission. All postmasters where the revenue is less than $400 a year or who are drawing a salary of less than $200 a year, do not come under the Civil Service Commission. Such postmasters may be dismissed by the Postmaster General himself, even without a recommendation; but generally he makes the dismissal—and I did it in my time—when they do not come under the Civil Service Commission, on the recommendation of friends of the party in office in the different constituencies. That I do not deny. But this is a case that comes under the Civil Service Commission, and in such cases, you cannot dismiss except in the three ways which I have laid before the committee to-night. Here a postmaster is dismissed on the statement of a member that the office is not in the right place and that another postmaster should be appointed in his stead and the office located elsewhere. Neither the Postmaster General nor the governor general in council has authority to make such a dismissal. Therefore the dismissal is illegal. If the post office were not located in the proper place, the duty of the department was to notify the postmaster to this effect: Your office is not conveniently located for the people of the district, and you must obtain another site to be approved by the department. When Inspector Allen went to examine the situation at Lakeville, under instructions from Superintendent Peck, he never notified the postmaster. The postmaster know nothing about what was going on until one Saturday night he received a notice from St. John through the superintendent's office to turn the office over on the following Monday to Miss Wilson. When the postmaster then, thinking he had been dismissed for political reasons, telegraphed the Postmaster General, the latter notified him that he had been dismissed because of change of location. If the department had notified the postmaster that his office was not in the right place and that unless he found a central location for it, he would have to give up the position, the story would have been quite different. But this man was never given an opportunity of finding another location for the office; he was peremptorily dismissed by the Postmaster General under an order in council.

Let me proceed. I have under my hand a letter from Mr. E. J. Underwood addressed to the district superintendent of postal service at St. John, dated at Ottawa, April 2, 1931, as follows:

> The district superintendent is informed that the Postmaster General has authorized the dismissal of Mr. S. G. Barter, postmaster at Lakeville, N.B., electoral district of Victoria-Carleton, on account of change in site, and that the office is to be placed in the temporary charge of Miss Hilda Wilson, whose location is in the centre of the village on the main highway, about 300 yards distant from the former site.
> The district superintendent will kindly take the necessary steps to place Miss Hilda Wilson in charge of this office as acting postmistress, and report to the department the date on which the transfer is effected.
> E. J. Underwood.

That is followed up by a letter addressed by Mr. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, to Mr. B. F. Smith, Esquire, M.P., House of Commons, Ottawa, under date of April 7, 1931, as follows:

> Dear Mr. Smith:
> With reference to previous correspondence in regard to the postmastership at Lakeville, N.B., I may say that the removal of the office to a more convenient location has been authorized and in accordance with your recommendation, instructions have been issued for the temporary transfer of the office to the charge of Miss Hilda Wilson.
> However, as you were advised in my letter of September last, the permanent appointment of a new postmaster rests with the Civil Service Commission and when the transfer is completed, the position will be advertised.

What is the situation? This is a vacancy, created, as I say without authority of the law. It is advertised by the Civil Service Commission. Applications are now being received. Miss Hilda Wilson is in temporary charge. Let us suppose that Mr. S. G. Barter, a returned soldier, becomes an applicant for the position and in his application he designates a central site for that post office, where does Miss Wilson fit in? Under the Civil Service Act, the Civil Service Commission will have to accept the application of the returned soldier if he can qualify. Under a civil service examination he has already fully qualified for the position, and supposing he applies this time—and I do not know whether he will or not—and he receives the certificate of the Civil Service Commission, what then becomes of all the trouble to which the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton went to have this returned soldier kicked out of office?

The letter which I previously read, under date of April 7, from Mr. Gaboury, notified Mr. Smith of the decision to transfer the office to Miss Hilda Wilson. Under date of April 12 Mr. Barter sent the following telegram from Hartland, New Brunswick, to the Postmaster General at Ottawa:

I received a letter April 11 notifying me I was dismissed as postmaster of Lakeville, New Brunswick. I protest earnestly as I have taken no part in politics since my appointment last June and I demand an investigation before the office is taken from me. I am a returned soldier of three years' overseas service.

Samuel Barter,
Postmaster, Lakeville, N.B.

The notification was sent to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, dated at Ottawa, April 7, that the transfer would be made. This postmaster receives a notice, four or five days later, on a Saturday, to hand over the office immediately, that is on the following Monday, to Miss Wilson. Then I find a letter from Mr. E. J. Underwood, Chief Superintendent of the Postal Service, as follows:

Ottawa, 13th April, 1931.

Samuel Barter, Esquire,
Lakeville, New Brunswick.
Dear Sir:

Receipt is acknowledged of your telegram of the 12th April, in which you protest against your dismissal as postmaster on the ground that you have not taken any part in politics and in which you demand an investigation.

In reply I may say that it was represented to the Postmaster General that the site of the office was not suitable for the majority of the persons making use of it and that it would be much more convenient if located on the main highway. These representations were investigated by a post office official who visited the place, and the department has therefore decided to place the office as recommended on the highway.

Not one word was ever said to this postmaster that his office was in the wrong place. He had not received a single complaint from the department, and this file will show that he was never notified of any complaint. It will show that the superintendent sent an inspector there to investigate about the site, but he never went into the office at Lakeville during the time of his investigation. How would it be possible for the postmaster to know that complaints had been made if he received no notice whatever? How could he attempt to find a more centrally located site if the department had not asked him to do so? More than that, the department notified him in the month of July, 1930, that he should not move the post office from its present site without the consent of the department. Here they make an investigation into the location of this post office, and they do not even notify the postmaster that an investigation is to take place.

Here is a telegram signed by G. McBurney, secretary of the soldiers' legion, Hartland:

Hartland, April 18.

Postmaster General,
Ottawa.

S. G. Barter, postmaster, Lakeville, dismissed without investigation or known cause except location of post office which he is willing to change. He is returned soldier. Hartland branch, B.E.S.L. respectfully request matter be held up until his case has been investigated by your department resulting we believe in his reinstatement.

Then we have a letter signed by L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, addressed to Mr. McBurney. Mr. McBurney's letter was addressed to the Postmaster General, take note; and so was Mr. Barter's telegram addressed to the Postmaster General, but up to this day neither Mr. Barter nor Mr. McBurney has received any word from the Postmaster General himself. He left it to his officials to attend to the matter. Here is the letter from Mr. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, to Mr. G. McBurney:

Ottawa, April 21, 1931.

Dear Sir,—

I am directed by the Postmaster General to acknowledge receipt of your telegram of the 18th instant respecting the change in the postmastership at Lakeville.

As the postmaster was notified a few days ago, the change at that point was authorized in order to place the office in a more central location.

It may be added, however, that the permanent appointment rests with the Civil Service Commission and that the vacancy will, therefore, have to be advertised publicly in Lakeville in the near future and the case referred to the Civil Service Commission.

Yours very truly,

L. J. Gaboury,
Deputy Postmaster General.

I go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, there are quite a few letters yet, but this is nothing compared with over 150 pages of Hansard in 1929 that were taken up by the present Prime Minister reading into the record the files of my department. If he thought fit at that time, owing to the administration of the Post Office Department, to take up the time of the house and fill 150 pages of Hansard, surely I am entitled to take up a little time to put this case on record.

Mr. QUINN: That was nice cool weather.

Mr. VENIOT: And that had reference to only one case, and it took him over five hours to put it on record.

Mr. QUINN: He had a good case.

Mr. VENIOT: It was a good case, but it did him no good, and it did me no harm.

Here is a copy of a letter to the Postmaster General from Mr. Barter, in which he says:

Letter received re dismissal as postmaster. No notice of the wish of the department to change site of post office was ever received. This is only an excuse. Had bought post office and notified superintendent at St. John that soon as I obtained a proper site I would ask his approval. Could not move office without permission. Miss Wilson, to whom the office is to be given, is the daughter of one of our late leading merchants, and she has a large country village store.

Had I received order to move post office I would have done so, but the very people who were complaining would not give or sell me land to put the building on. I most eagerly ask for a hearing before the postmastership is taken from me.

Miss Wilson has only to maintain a widowed mother, and she runs the country store in Lakeville. Relying upon Hilda Wilson I find that the estate is given a credit of about $10,000. If it is necessary to throw out of office a returned soldier with a family of six or seven children to help a young lady keep her widowed mother, who owns a large estate which is rated at $10,000, then I think it is time that some change should be made in the method of dealing with these matters.

I have a letter here from H. B. Peck, which I will pass over.

Mr. SPENCE: We shall not miss anything.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps you will find before I get through that I have not missed anything.

Mr. STANLEY: Tell us something about how the man who was dismissed was appointed.

Mr. VENIOT: He was appointed by the Civil Service Commission in the month of June, 1930, after examination.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): It was before that.

Mr. VENIOT: Then the record must be wrong, for it shows that Barter was appointed in June, 1930. I did not even know that Barter was appointed, because from June 3, 1930, until after the federal elections were over I did not visit Ottawa. So far as that was concerned I did not know what was going on because this was a matter of departmental administration which could be carried on without my knowledge.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): The office was transferred before.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend is not stating the facts. In 1928 Gee was appointed. Gee had a crippled son whom he had sworn in to carry on the office work, but the crippled son could not carry on the full work of the office and Mr. Barter was engaged as a second assistant by Gee to come at different periods to do the work of the office in conjunction with Mr. Gee's son. When Mr. Gee retired, owing to the fact that his son could no longer look after anything he resigned and a vacancy was advertised. Barter applied for the position and under Civil Service qualifications he got the appointment. That is the record of the transaction, and the documents show that my statements are in accordance with the facts. My hon. friends opposite need not try to speak contrary to the record.

Now then, there are a number of other letters in the file. Mr. McBurney again protests, and we have a letter signed by Mr. Peck relating to the change. Then we have the particulars to be furnished upon appointments of postmasters and revenue officers in connection with which a blank form is supplied. I am endeavouring to point out the whole record. Then follows a letter from H. B. Peck, of St. John, in which he says:

With reference to departmental memorandum, 38/77, of the 2nd instant, advising of the dismissal of S. G. Barter, postmaster at the above address, and instructing that the office be placed in the temporary charge of Miss Hilda Wilson, the chief superintendent is informed that the office was duly transferred to the charge of the incoming acting postmistress on the 22nd instant.

I do not want to state that the information given by Mr. Peck is not correct; technically it is correct. Mr. Peck went there to make a transfer, and it was understood the transfer would take place. However when Mr. Barter undertook to hand over the position to Miss Wilson she could not accept it because she had not her store prepared to accept the transfer of the office, and she asked Mr. Barter to continue for another week. Mr. Barter was foolish enough to do so. Had I been in his place I would have thrown the stuff out on the street; that is what I would have done. Miss Wilson would not take charge of it; she was appointed to take charge of it, but when the time came she could not take over the work.

That is all I have to say in connection with this particular case, and as it is—

Mr. ERNST: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. VENIOT: —about eleven o'clock. I shall not continue further to-night. If hon. members wish I shall continue right up to the minute, but I should prefer to go on at a later time. I have more cases than the present one in connection with which I intend to make some statements—hon. members need not make any mistake about that. I have taken too much from my hon. friends opposite to let things slip. They have condemned me for acts of which they themselves are guilty. They attempted to crucify me for things they are now doing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. VENIOT: Some of the older members in the house who hear my voice will remember their actions during the session of 1929. I am not blaming the Postmaster General in matters of this kind. He is a new man, unacquainted with the intricacies of his office. I know that I found it difficult to learn the ropes in that department. However, I had had the experience of administering another department which stood me in good stead when I came to the larger department; my friend however did not have that experience. I am not blaming him, but I blame his colleagues who sat in council with him when these matters were considered—the same gentlemen who sat day in and day out on this side of the house and refused to allow my estimates to go through, criticizing me about matters far less important than the one we have just considered. His colleagues must have known that a dismissal of a civil servant brought about in the manner I have described was illegal, and they should have drawn the fact to the attention of their colleague who had recently taken office and did not know the ins and outs of the Civil Service Act.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, July 20, 1931.

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln) moved:

That the third and final report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government be amended at the first section of the said report under the heading "Canadian National (West Indies) Services," covering item 380, by adding at the end of the first paragraph thereof after the words "West Indies trade agreement" the words "and recommend that the amount required, namely, $755,000 be granted."

Mr. J. F. POULIOT (Témiscouata): I have just a word to say on this subject. I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for Lincoln on the fact that the report of the committee has been unanimous. I have 135 returns relating to the Rivière du Loup station and I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the house, but perhaps cold facts may be welcome in midsummer.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I rise to a point of order. I am not moving concurrence in the general report. All I am doing is submitting an amendment to correct by adding one line, a clerical error in the report.

Mr. SPEAKER: Probably the hon. member for Témiscouata understands that the motion is for an amendment to the report and not for the adoption of it, although this amendment is open to discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: I am complaining of the fact that the amount stated in the report as presented is not amended in a way to include a sufficient sum to build a station at Rivière du Loup, and I think I am entitled to speak on it just as much as I would be entitled to speak on the report. If I speak to-day on this matter, I shall not do so when the report comes up for adoption.

Mr. SPEAKER: This amendment is open to discussion and the motion, when and if it is put to adopt the report will also be open to discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: Would not the same purpose be served by taking the matter up to-day instead of another day? It has to do with the same question and I think I would be allowed to speak on the amendment as well as on the report, if the amendment does not include an amount sufficient to cover a station at Rivière du Loup.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has a right to speak on the amendment and on the motion.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Fisheries): May I suggest that if the hon. member for Témiscouata wants to speak on the amendment, the discussion would have to be confined to the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Quite so.

Mr. POULIOT: I complain of the fact that the amendment does not include an amount for Rivière du Loup station to be added to the report as already presented to the house and studied by the committee. That is my point and I think I am fairly in order as you, sir, agreed a moment ago. For the benefit of the house which has been kind enough to listen to my words, I shall try to present the facts if possible on a Sheffield tray in order that there will not be too many points of order raised. I shall allow no interruptions but I shall be pleased to answer questions when I have finished.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. member for Témiscouata to say he is going to discuss, on this question, the propriety or desirability of voting an amount for a station at Rivière du Loup?

Mr. POULIOT: What I say is that I complain that the amendment does not include an amount for the building of a station at Rivière du Loup. Just a minute ago you agreed that I might speak on the amendment as well as on the motion for adoption of the report.

Mr. SPEAKER: But the discussion on the amendment must be pertinent to it.

Mr. POULIOT: But I complain it is not wide enough.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think a plea for a station at Rivière du Loup has anything to do with the recommendation that an amount of $755,000 in connection with the West Indies trade agreement be voted.

Mr. POULIOT: My point is that if there is an amount relating to other parts of the system, I do not see why there is not an amount relating to the building of Rivière du Loup station. I do not wish to discuss the matter at length; I shall try to condense my remarks as much as possible and I wish to speak only once on this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Had the hon. member not better wait until the motion for the adoption of the report comes before the house? That would seem to be the more appropriate time for the discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member will tell me when he will move the adoption of the report, I shall consider that point.

Mr. CHAPLIN: To-morrow.

Mr. POULIOT: Very well; I agree.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. R. C. MATTHEWS (Toronto East Centre) moved that the tenth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce be concurred in.

ONTARIO-QUEBEC CANAL AND POWER COMPANY

Mr. ANGUS McGILLIS (Glengarry) moved:

That the petition of Arthur Edwin Hall of Cornwall, Ontario, and others of elsewhere praying to be incorporated under the name of the "Ontario-Quebec Canal and Power Company," which was presented to the house on the 17th instant, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders, for the purpose of considering suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 131, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a very short bill amending the company's act of incorporation and amendments thereto, permitting the company to increase the membership of the central council, to create an executive council to remove doubt as to their right legally to mortgage and alienate property that they have acquired.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

EXCLUSION OF OUTSIDE SERVICE FROM OPERATION OF ACT

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 132, to amend the Civil Service Act (Vacancies, outside service).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GAGNON: The bill which I have the honour to sponsor speaks for itself; it needs no explanatory remarks. I feel, however, it is my duty to the house to say that I have studied the various questions involved, free from party prejudice and without the exaggerated zeal of a would-be reformer, but with a true desire to interpret the wishes of numerous people in Canada as well as of a great number of the members of this house, who contend that the Civil Service Act ought never to have been made to apply to the outside service, and that in the public interest reforms are urgently needed. Long before I had the honour of being a member of this house I had heard eloquent members of parliament denounce the Civil Service Act of 1919 as being inconsistent with the elementary principles of responsible government. I have read the voluminous report of the Malcolm committee which was appointed by this house in 1923, and have studied the valuable recommendations made by the committee that was appointed by the Senate in 1924. A good deal of evidence was adduced before the special committee appointed by this house in 1923. The deputy ministers of all departments appeared before the committee and made valuable suggestions. Amendments were contemplated, but no serious action has been taken. I venture to say that public sentiment in my province is strongly in favour of removing the outside service from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Act. The people realize that the civil service commissioners, whatever may be their qualifications, cannot find the best possible candidates for all positions. It is indeed amazing to expect the same three men to find the best possible candidates for positions as varied, for instance, as a caretaker in the port of Vancouver, a customs agent in Gaspe, a director of expositions in London, England, and a postmaster in the district of the Yukon. It is amazing that the government of the day must rely entirely on these three men, who therefore must be practically encyclopedists of science to determine the qualifications required for such diversified positions.

As one may easily imagine, a great many mistakes have been made. The civil service commissioners cannot act alone. They have to ask for the assistance of employees of the departments, and in many instances appointments have been made by an employee of the department. On the other hand, the Civil Service Act prevents the ministers and deputy ministers from making appointments. The situation indeed is intolerable and ridiculous. This Civil Service Act subjects parliament to the authority of a kind of bureaucracy, which Lord Hewart of Bury, Lord Chief Justice of England, has happily called the New Despotism.

I might give instances to show that the operations of the civil service commissioners are frequently long drawn out and are therefore prejudicial to the best interests of the country. During the month of January notices were sent out throughout Canada that applications would be received to fill the position of director of expositions in London. Applications were sent in in the month of February. The examination was held on the first of May, and even yet, on the 20th of July, the director of expositions has not been appointed. During the month of March in Quebec city applications were called for the position of immigration inspector or guardian. Examinations were held in the months of April and May, and a report has not yet been made by the Civil Service Commission, and the Department of Immigration has therefore been obliged, pending a decision by the commissioners, to hire temporary inspectors, or guardians.

I need not go further to show that amendments to the act are necessary. As I said before, in my humble judgment the time has come for a change. During the month of January I happened to express my views on this question in a public meeting, and immediately afterwards most of the newspapers of the city of Quebec, both French and English, and even the Montreal Gazette, approved of my humble views and stated that amendments ought to be made to the act, and that the somewhat kaiser-like powers of the commission ought to be at least curtailed. Being a new member I appreciated that I ought to avoid any hasty action, and therefore I consulted with a great number of eminent members on both sides of the house, as well as studied the valuable reports of the Malcolm committee and of the Senate committee. I realize, of course, that the Civil Service Act cannot be amended without the concurrence of both parties. The other day an interesting debate was held in this house, and I am very grateful to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the views that he then expressed on this very question. May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to give me leave to quote a few extracts from that speech, which really expresses the views shared by a great number of members on this side of the house. Speaking in this house on the 24th of June, the right hon. leader of the opposition said—

Mr. SPEAKER: On a motion for leave to introduce a bill it is not customary to make a long speech on its merits, but merely to explain its purport. I think the hon. member has made a sufficient explanation.

Mr. GAGNON: Being a new member I gladly bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker. I shall confine myself to explaining in a very few words the purport of my bill.

First of all, I want to exclude the outside service from the operation of the act. Secondly, as to appointments, I am asking the house to approve of the recommendation of the Senate committee in 1924, that in making appointments the Civil Service Commission ought to cooperate with the ministers and with the deputy ministers of the departments, and if both parties could not agree the matter ought to be referred to the governor in council for decision. Thirdly, I desire to amend that act with regard to dismissals by substituting the words "head of the department" for the words "governor in council."

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask my hon. friend why he waited until the last days of the session to introduce this bill, when, as he must know, it has no chance of reaching second reading?

Mr. GAGNON: I gladly answer my hon. friend, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I have already stated that no hasty action ought to be taken in this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GAGNON: Because I understand fully that the act cannot be amended without the concurrence of both parties. I think that all members of the house, now that the right hon. leader of the opposition has expressed his views, feel that parliament has gone too far in putting the outside service under the Civil Service Act, and I think that the time is ripe for a change.

Motion agreed to and the bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 133, to amend the Post Office Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GAGNON: I think the object of the bill is very clear, and that it needs no explanation. In my own province, if not in all, sometimes we find that mail contractors become mere agents of the party in power. It is true that a public servant is entitled to his political opinions and to his vote, but he must not take an active part in politics, but in some provinces I venture to say that the mail contractors are sometimes agents of the party in power. The object of this bill therefore is to warn mail contractors that if they take an active part in politics their contract may be set aside.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

2. The last arrival of the Haugerland (not Haugherland as in the question), was at Sydney, N.S., on May 15, 1931. Her crew at that time consisted of 39 persons, of which 37 were of Norwegian and 2 of Swedish nationality.

SAINT JOHN HARBOUR

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Saint John harbour commissioners not exceeding $10,000,000 for the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works, and the deposit of the debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

In view of the fact that in the city of Saint John there is a condition of emergency, I ask that, with the leave of the house, this resolution be taken into consideration now.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Is the change made so that the minister may have leave to introduce the bill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, just to introduce the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All right.

Mr. VENIOT: I know that because of the fire an emergency exists in Saint John, and it would be well to put this legislation through one or two stages so that the work may be started.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house standing order No. 60 will be suspended. The motion is that the house do now go into committee of the whole to consider the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister give details now or wait until the bill is introduced? I should like to have some information in advance of the introduction of the bill. What part of the $10,000,000 is to be spent for further improvement of the harbour of Saint John, in addition to the expenditures incurred by reason of the fire.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The amount for further improvements would be $3,500,000 as specified in the former resolution. Those moneys would be spent to enlarge piers 3 and 5, and for some other facilities the details of which I have not before me at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: And there is a bank loan of $1,500,000 which we will have to take care of.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The reconstruction of five sheds is contemplated.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to know how much is for the reconstruction of what was destroyed by fire?

Mr. DURANLEAU: About $5,000,000.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a report appearing in the press concerning the reconstruction of that part of Saint John harbour which was destroyed by fire. If he has not the information before him he may bring it down when the bill is introduced. I see that in connection with that part of Saint John harbour which was destroyed by fire contracts have been let on a cost plus basis, and I should like to know if that report is true.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Chairman, immediately after the disastrous fire the authorities from the harbour commission of Saint John came to the department and insisted that work should be begun at once in order that the sheds would be built and ready for use on December 1, at the beginning of the winter season. If such action were not taken they said they would be exposed to loss of the winter trade. After sending Mr. Beaver, the assistant of Sir Alexander Gibb, to Saint John, and affording him the opportunity of studying the whole scheme, he reported that we should first start the repairs to the piers. As the house knows, the piers are of wooden construction, and some have been badly damaged, others less so. We have to repair the damaged wooden structures and cover them with cement in order to render the wharves as far as possible fireproof, as we intend to build steel sheds on them. It was intimated that in order to complete these works by the first of December we could not afford to spare the time necessary to prepare plans and specifications on which to ask for tenders. Moreover, the nature of the damage to these piers was such that it was very difficult to prepare specifications, for it is only during the progress of the work that we can see the extent of the damage. So Mr. Beaver suggested that we should have the repair work done by day labour on a cost plus basis of five per cent. Two companies, the Foundation Company and the Northern Construction Company, if I am not mistaken, tendered for the work, and it has been divided between them on a basis of cost plus five per cent. That is the maximum charge to be made. Now that the repair work is in progress we are drafting plans and specifications for the sheds, tenders will be asked for in the regular way and the contract will be awarded to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. VENIOT: That is for the continuation of the harbour improvements?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Absolutely, the construction of the sheds. The repair work is under way now and the plans are being prepared for the sheds. I think under the circumstances we have taken the only possible course. There was a real emergency and we wanted to save the business of the harbour.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not criticizing the minister for what he has done; rather I feel like complimenting him on the expeditious way in which he took steps to meet the emergency. But this information, I think, is due the public, I should like to know the cost plus percentage.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Five per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the contracts for this repair work be made by the harbour commission or by the marine department?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not prepared to give a definite answer to the question at the moment. Sir Alexander Gibb is at Saint John to-day studying the whole situation, and of course we shall have to confer with this distinguished gentleman and his assistants on the procedure to be taken under the circumstances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The resolution before the house provides for assistance in the form of a loan to the harbour board; consequently one would assume that the contracts would be made by the harbour board and not by the government.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: That may be; but it is the intention of my department to see that these works and the expenditures thereon shall be checked up very closely. At the present time I have first class accountants checking up everything.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the minister departing from the regular procedure in respect to this particular loan?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is the usual loan to harbour commissioners for the purpose of prosecuting their work, is it not?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): With this difference, that an emergency situation has to be dealt with.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has any consideration been given to the policy of making Saint John a free port?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The matter is under consideration, but I do not think at the moment we can change the policy followed in the past.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand that with respect to that part of the harbour destroyed by fire the repair work has been taken out of the hands of the harbour commissioners and placed under the direction of an engineer from the city of Halifax. Now, if the government is going to pay for the improvements and not charge the cost as a loan to the harbour commissioners owing to the emergency referred to, I can understand why the department would take the work out of the hands of the harbour commissioners and place it in charge of their own engineer. But if the cost is to be included in the $10,000,000 to be loaned to the harbour commission, I do not see why that course should have been followed. Perhaps I am misinformed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are.

Mr. VENIOT: I know that an engineer from Halifax is in charge of the repair work —at least the local papers have made an announcement to that effect, and that the work in connection with the improvements will remain under the direction of the engineer of the harbour commission. I should like to have some information on this point.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I must make a few observations in respect to this matter. The Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) was absent for two days when the matter became very pressing. A representative of Sir Alexander Gibb and partners visited Saint John harbour and made a report on conditions resulting from the disastrous fire which practically destroyed the whole of the terminal facilities. On the strength of his report it became apparent that the harbour commissioners would need a very much increased sum of money to enable them to carry on the repairs if the harbour facilities were to be made available for shipping by the first of December. But inasmuch as it would take weeks to prepare complete plans and specifications and call for tenders for the work as a completed unit, it was thought desirable to proceed at once with the necessary repair work. He asked the Foundation Company, the Northern Construction Company and J. W. Stewart Limited, and I think, one other company, if they would undertake the work on a cost plus basis, and they agreed to accept five per cent, which is a much lower charge than is usually asked for such work; but it was emergency work and they said they would undertake it for that figure. The work is being divided between them. It is not being taken out of the hands of the harbour commissioners, but inasmuch as the emergency was great, the department put its facilities behind those of the commissioners, and when it came down to the question of where an engineer could be secured who had knowledge of construction work, the experience of Mr. McDonald, of Halifax, was regarded as peculiarly fitting him for such work. I telegraphed him myself and asked him to meet the representative of the Gibb firm, which he did. The harbour commissioners of Halifax were asked if they would loan him to the harbour commissioners of Saint John for the purpose of directing the construction of the work which was to be undertaken to prepare the harbour facilities for use this winter. Very reluctantly they agreed to do so, and the harbour commissioners of Saint John are making arrangements to provide the harbour commissioners of Halifax with such engineering assistance as they may require during the absence of Mr. McDonald. Mr. McDonald who is a most experienced man in what you might term tidal water construction work, has gone over to Saint John and will stay with the undertaking until the work is completed. In the meantime the harbour commissioners have not been in any sense supplanted, but with their cooperation the government is endeavouring to facilitate with all the rapidity possible completion of the work necessary to make the harbour available for business this winter. Had any other method been pursued it is perfectly obvious that the work would not be done. I think it is only fair to say that the engineer of the Saint John harbour commission has sufficient work to do in connection with the general undertaking of engineering and also in connection with the new work that is being done in West Saint John, with respect to which the contract is outstanding and was outstanding when this government came into power. That work is being pushed forward to completion. I fancy it will not be completed for use this winter; in fact I know it will not, so the only facilities that can be relied upon will be berths 4 and 5 and 15 and 16 and a potato shed on 17 for the purpose of enabling business to be transacted as usual. The question of grain conveyors has been given a great deal of consideration and will involve an expenditure of half a million dollars, but unless there are legs on each of the docks it will be impossible, with the rapid tide, to move ships in a harbour like Saint John, and that work is being carried on. On pier 17, where the old potato shed was, a new shed will be erected to accommodate the requirements of shippers at that point.

I may add that there is no lack of harmony between the commission, the engineer whose services they have been fortunate enough to secure and the government in pushing forward the work. The $3,500,000 originally asked for by the harbour commission to complete what I might call the new work, together with the $1,500,000 bank loan will absorb $5,000,000, and leave substantially the same amount for the completion of the repairs in connection with the old facilities.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish to thank the right hon. Prime Minister for the full explanation he has given, which is perfectly satisfactory to me. The reports which have been appearing in the press left an impression such as the one I expressed this afternoon, and I wanted to have the matter cleared up. At the same time I wish to congratulate the government on accepting the estimate I gave the house following the fire. I then asked the government to vote $10,000,000, and that is the amount being provided.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a word before the resolution is reported. I do not rise to delay the passage of the resolution; I think the government should be congratulated upon the speed with which they have attended to the situation existing in Saint John, but it is not with reference to that matter I desire to speak. The Minister of Marine, in his preliminary remarks, and the Prime Minister in his more extended remarks, referred to a bank loan of $1,500,000. I think perhaps it would be well if the country had a little more information as to just how that loan was incurred. My understanding of the situation is that the previous harbour board let a contract to a concern known as the Atlas Construction Company for the building of what are termed the new works on the west side. That firm absolutely fell down on the undertaking, with the result that the people of this country have been called upon to pay a huge sum of money in excess of the contract price. I think these facts should be made clear.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Duranleau thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 134, to provide for a further loan to the Saint John harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BONUS ON WHEAT

PAYMENT OF FIVE CENTS PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT EXPORTED FROM WESTERN PROVINCES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that the governor in council may authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of five cents on every bushel of wheat exported from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan of the crop of 1931, and to make provision for the determination of amounts payable thereunder, and for regulations to carry out the purpose of the act and prescribe penalties to be incurred for breach of the act or regulations.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

I might just add that the word "Manitoba" should be added after the word "of", and before the word "Alberta." I do not know how that word happened to be left out; I take it to be my fault in that I did not read it with sufficient care. This proposal was always applicable to the three provinces, as I mentioned. With the consent of the house I should like to move that the resolution be amended to read, "Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan."

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Just in that connection, some time ago I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether that five cents would apply to the whole of Canada, and he said it would.

Mr. BENNETT: There must have been some misunderstanding.

Mr. STEVENS: I must have misunderstood my hon. friend, because I never made such a statement wittingly. I should like to look up Hansard, because I do not remember having made that answer.

Motion as amended agreed to.

PEACE RIVER OUTLET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) a question with reference to the Peace River outlet. I believe a conference was held the other day, and he may have something to tell the house with regard to this matter.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Yes, a conference was held, but this is a large question and a great deal of consideration will be required before any definite statement can be given out. As soon as any real results come about I will be glad to tell my hon. friend and the house.

TORONTO SUBURBAN RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. M. CAYLEY (South Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). There are several questions involved, in fact, but the answers are short and I believe the minister has the information before him. I should like to ask the minister: Is it true that the interest due on July 15 on the Toronto Suburban railway debenture stock has not been paid; are these debentures guaranteed by the national railways or by the government; what has been the financial situation of this railway with respect to earnings; how have interest payments been made heretofore; what action was taken by the national railways with respect to meeting the interest due on July 15 last, and what action will follow the said default in interest payments?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. gentleman told my deputy this morning that he was going to ask some question in this regard, and I will give all the information I have. This is a matter entirely in the hands of the management of the road. The debenture stock is not guaranteed by the management of the national railways or by the government of Canada. This is a subsidiary of the national railways, but the debenture stock is not guaranteed. I have been informed unofficially that the interest was not paid; I believe that to be correct, and I have no doubt it was a decision of the management made because of the decreased earnings and lessened business of the Canadian National Railways.

In view of the fact that my hon. friend told my deputy he was going to ask these questions I obtained figures showing the losses of this subsidiary. In 1930 the total deficit, including interest, amounted to $193,807, with an operating deficit of $77,000. In the previous year the operating deficit was $83,000, so I presume the management decided to withhold interest payments due to the depression, just as the dividends of various kinds of industrial corporations have been discontinued.

Mr. CAYLEY: What would be the result of this electric railway falling back into the hands of the debenture owners?

Mr. MANION: I was told by the management some time ago that if they did default, every facility would be given the debenture owners, without expenses, to take possession.

MARKETING OF WHEAT

POOL ELEVATORS—CORRESPONDENCE CONTAINING PROPOSALS OF THREE WESTERN PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on an article appearing in the Montreal Gazette of Saturday last. The heading is as follows:

> Pool Elevators to be Separate
> Western Premiers Believed to Favour Bennett's Suggested Trading Corporation

Would the Prime Minister mind tabling a copy of the correspondence containing the proposals he made to the three western premiers regarding the marketing of this year's crop. At the same time, may I ask whether he has a further statement to make with reference to the same matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As to the latter question, I have nothing further to add. As to the first, I shall be glad to endeavour to get him a copy of the correspondence at six o'clock, although I might not be able to procure it until to-morrow. Roughly however, as I stated to him, the purport was, declining to enter into the marketing business on behalf of the Dominion and, secondly, suggesting that it might be desirable for the three provinces to form a trading corporation of their own, we endeavouring to assist them in their financial requirements.

CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): An editorial in this morning's Citizen reminded me of a subject which I thought of bringing to the attention of the government a number of times; that is, the destruction of wild game in the west. I would commend to the favourable consideration of the government the work which Jack Miner is doing. I think the house will agree that the conservation of wild life is very essential, even in these times of distress.

PEACE RIVER OUTLET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): The Peace River outlet has been mentioned to-day. Is it the intention of the government to state some definite policy in this regard before the end of the session?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has already answered that question.

THREE RIVERS HARBOUR

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> That it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Three Rivers harbour commissioners not exceeding $700,000 for the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specification and estimates for such work, and the deposit of the debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What works will be undertaken under this loan?

Mr. DURANLEAU: On September 18, 1929, an order in council was passed approving of the awarding of a contract to the Northern Construction Company Limited and

G. W. Stewart for the amount of $2,660,535, for improvements in Three Rivers harbour. This was the lowest tender by $166,000, and according to the terms of the contract the works were supposed to be completed by October 31, 1931. Under a loan granted by this house the sum of $1,800,000 only was available. The contractors to date have carried out works amounting to $1,600,000, having ordered further materials amounting to over $200,000 to complete the contract. The works have progressed, but in such a way that the piers are not ready for use. The contractors have built the foundations of the whole work on which they have expended practically $1,800,000, but no section of it is yet completed. The whole of the loan made by this house of $1,800,000 has been expended to date, but, as I say, not a foot of these facilities is yet ready for use. We have to complete these works; there is no doubt about that; but we have tried as far as possible to save money. We have made some change in the plans resulting in a saving of about $300,000. Under the old plans, taking into account the small extras that have been provided for and the interest incurred during construction, together with engineers' fees and so on, we should have to ask the house for about $1,000,000 to finish the contract.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And the minister expects that with this $700,000 the work will be completed and will be available for use?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes; according to the reports of the chief engineer this amount will complete the undertaking. We found that, under the old plans, the pier, with two berths, was only 200 feet wide, and any practical construction man will realize that this is absolutely inadequate. Instead of building a 200 foot pier we have changed the plans somewhat, to make a straight line with the front of the government pier. This will provide a pier of 540 feet, with a 540 foot berth. The work will provide employment, because there will be a large amount of filling to be done, and we expect to have the filling made by the workmen of Three Rivers, as was done last winter. At that time, instead of securing the filling from dredging material, we provided work for the population of Three Rivers by getting earth from outside the city. It cost a little more than the sum charged by the contracting company, but under the circumstances we thought it wise to take that course in order to relieve unemployment.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend knows that anything that will give work to the unemployed of Three Rivers meets with my hearty approval. Any information which I may desire I shall ask for when the bill is in committee.

Mr. HEENAN: I take it that the work will be done under the 1919 Fair Wages Act, and that fair wages will be paid the labourers.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is a matter to be adjusted with the contractors.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not think the minister quite understands me. An act of parliament was passed in 1930, providing that all Dominion works shall be carried on under a fair wage clause, whether they are done by contractors or by the Dominion government itself, and I am asking the minister whether or not this work will be done under that law.

Mr. DURANLEAU: So far as I know, the present government has not departed from the law mentioned by my hon. friend, and I do not think it will in this instance. These works are under contract and I presume there is in the contract a clause whereby the contractor will have to comply with the law regarding fair wages. This contract was awarded in September, 1929, by the former government, and presumably a fair wage clause was inserted. We do not intend to make any change in the contract in that respect.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Duranleau thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 135, to provide for a further loan to the Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 39, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 1—Discounts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister explain?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I may say that this bill relates to nothing but administration, and it seems to me there can be difference of opinion with respect to only one matter which I had better explain now. The act as it stands provides for certain penalties. To put the matter shortly, there is a maximum penalty of $500 and a maximum term of imprisonment of seven years. The situation is that the penalty of $500 is not sufficient and the term of seven years is too much. The fine of $500 is not sufficient because more in value can be smuggled so that it would pay a smuggler to have a maximum penalty of this amount. We seek to have that penalty made $1,000 The reverse is the case in connection with the term of imprisonment. The statute now provides seven years as the maximum, and that is too much, because juries will not convict and the accused is enabled to have twelve peremptory challenges instead of four. Since the maximum of seven years has been on the statute book there has not been one sentence of that term. We are anxious therefore that the term shall be reduced to four years and the statute made workable so far as the penalties are concerned. This question has given us a good deal of concern. It seems strange to increase the penalty in one case and to decrease it in the other. This in my opinion is the only point on which there would be any real difference, and I commend it to the committee.

Mr. YOUNG: Section 1, subsection 6 reads:

In estimating the value for duty no discount or deduction shall be allowed which is not shown and allowed and deducted—

The two last words are underlined.

—on invoices covering sales for home consumption in the country of export in the usual and ordinary course of trade.

Where discounts are actually allowed in the country of export, will they be recognized by our department and allowed in Canada?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The reason for the addition of the words "and deducted" is that we want the invoices to show the true history of the sale. One would think if the discount were shown and allowed, it would hardly be necessary to have this provision that it be deducted. We want the discount to appear on the invoice as deducted, so that there is a written record of the transaction and it will not be necessary therefore to find out whether it has really been allowed or not. It is suggested for the purpose of enabling the importer to receive better terms. All that this means is that the honest transaction should stand and be shown completely upon the invoice.

Mr. YOUNG: That does not answer my question which was this: If a United States manufacturer is allowing discounts to his customers in that country and he proposes to allow the same discount to his customers in Canada, will those discounts be recognized by the department?

Mr. RYCKMAN: They will be if the true history of the transaction as stated by my hon. friend is shown upon the invoice; if it is not a case of dumping, or if it is not a special rate fixed for duty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are two provisos: the dumping and the special rate. There is no complaint about the dumping clause, but the department now have authority to fix value and under the circumstances I do not think this clause would be frequently applied.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The fixing of value does not arise in this case, but the hon. member for Weyburn put an all-embracing question that would include dumping duty and would mean, if a special value for duty purposes were fixed, and if the invoice showed what he stated, then we would be obliged to rely upon the invoice. But such is not the case. As I have stated, the intention is to have on the invoice, the actual, honest transaction or contract that the United States seller offers to the Canadian importer.

Mr. YOUNG: The other day when we were discussing the items of the budget I made the statement that under our Customs Act and customs regulations as they now stand there is a temptation for a man importing goods into this country from another country to pay a higher price to the foreign manufacturer than he need pay in order to escape the dumping duty. I said that our regulations permit him to do that and say to him: If you actually do pay a higher price to the foreign manufacturer you do not have to pay the dumping duty, but if you do not pay that higher price you will have to pay the dumping duty. When I made that statement the Prime Minister replied that that was not the case to-day, and I asked when it ceased to be the case, and he replied "Some time ago." I propose to prove not only that it can happen to-day but that it does happen, and not only that it does happen but that it cannot help but happen, just as I said.

I have here a letter from the Edgerton Manufacturing Company, Plymouth, Indiana, dated March 17, 1931, of which I shall read an extract:

You may be interested in knowing that the freight rate on the cars we shipped you during the 1930 season averaged 17·6 cents per dozen packages. This amount added to the price of $1.80 per dozen, as fixed by the Dominion government, would result in a cost to you of $1·976 per dozen without taking into consideration the duty. The action of the Dominion government would increase your delivered price approximately 25 cents a dozen and likewise would result in a profit to us of about 20 cents per dozen higher than that which we enjoy on sales made in the states. We feel that our profit on Canadian business should be approximately the same as that received in connection with business done in the states.

Yours very truly,
Richard W. Burg,
Traffic Manager.

I have another letter here from the Western Cartridge Company, East Alton, Illinois, dated May 6, 1930, a portion of which I shall read:

On January 3rd this year we reduced ammunition prices to all of our customers in the United States by 10 per cent, and we extended the same discount at the same time to our customers in Canada.

That is why I asked the question I did a minute ago. The letter continues:

The Canadian commissioner of customs has refused to accept this extra discount of 10 per cent on shipments of our goods into Canada, and has threatened to charge dumping duty against our goods so invoiced; and, based on this decision of the commissioner, we have been obliged to withdraw these reduced prices from our Canadian customers and are now invoicing them at a price 10 per cent higher than we charge any of our domestic jobbing trade. This additional 10 per cent is, of course, in the last analysis paid by the consumer of Western ammunition in the Dominion, and we regard it is distinctly unfair to him and his interests.

We have been told that the commissioner's decision was based on a brief presented to the Dominion government in Ottawa by the Dominion Cartridge Company, in which brief they indicated their reasons for protesting the reduction in price of American-made ammunition. We should like to obtain a copy of this Dominion Cartridge Company brief as presented to the government, in order to be in a position to present, if advisable, our answer to it.

I put a question on the order paper some time ago asking for a copy of that brief, but it was denied me. Here we find our customs department saying to the Canadian purchasers of American ammunition: You must pay 10 per cent more for that ammunition than these manufacturers are willing to accept from their American customers and 10 per cent more than they are asking you for, or otherwise we will make you pay that extra 10 per cent into the Dominion treasury. That is just what I said the other day would happen.

Here is a letter dated Ottawa, March 22, 1931:

In reply to your inquiry as to the effect of the change in discount on imported automobiles, basing the former discount at 30 per cent and the present discount at 20 per cent, the list price of the car being $1,000, I have to advise you as follows:

$1,000 less 20 per cent equals $800; at 20 per cent equals $160 duty.

$800 plus $160 equals $960 duty paid value; at 5 per cent equals $48 excise tax.

$960 at 1 per cent equals $9.60 sales tax.—Total, $217.60.

The next statement is this:

$1,000 less 30 per cent equals $700; at 20 per cent equals $140 duty.

$700 plus $140 equals $840 duty paid value; at 5 per cent equals $42 excise tax.

$840 at 1 per cent equals $8.40 sales tax.—Total, $190.40.

Then mark this statement:

If the importer pays $800 for his car special duty will not be applicable. On the other hand, if he purchases the car at $700 a special duty equal to $100 will be payable.

R. W. Breadner,
Commissioner of Customs.

The statement I made the other day that our customs laws and regulations as they stand at present tempt, almost force, a Canadian importer to send a larger amount of money out of the country to American or other foreign manufacturers in payment for his goods is amply substantiated by these letters, one of which is signed by the commissioner of customs himself. Not only does that happen, but under the act as it stands it must happen.

In the short session last fall we amended the Customs Act. I have a copy here of the amendments, but I shall read only the one that applies to this particular case. Section 2 reads:

Section 37 of the said act is repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:—

37. In determining the fair market value for duty of goods imported into Canada, the prices of which are published or listed by the manufacturers or producers, or persons acting on their behalf, the governor in council may from time to time fix and determine a certain rate of discount which may be applied to such published or listed prices, and such published or listed prices, subject to the deduction of the amount of discount, according to such rate, shall be deemed and taken to be the fair market values of any such manufactures or productions respectively as are specified in such order in council.

That is to say, we gave the minister power to fix a certain rate of discount on goods sent here at list price, and the list price after subtracting that rate of discount shall be the value of the goods for duty purposes. At the same session last September we amended the customs tariff, section 6. I will read the amendment:

In the case of articles exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada is less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of its exportation to Canada, or is less than the fair market value, or value for duty thereof as determined under the provisions of section 36 of the Customs Act, or is less than the fair market value thereof as fixed by the governor in council under the provisions of section 37 of the Customs Act, or is less than the value for duty thereof as determined by the minister under the provisions of paragraph (a) and (e) of section 41 of the Customs Act, or is less than the fair market value thereof as fixed by the minister under the provisions of section 43 of the Customs Act, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected and paid on such article, on its importation into Canada, a special or dumping duty, equal to the difference between the said selling price of the article for export and the said fair market value thereof or value for duty thereof; and such special or dumping duty shall be levied, collected and paid on such article although it is not otherwise dutiable.

I have underlined the parts that apply particularly to the question we have under consideration, of goods shipped in here at list price, subject to discount. I will read now the underlined parts by themselves:

In the case of articles exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada . . . is less than the fair market value thereof as fixed by the governor in council under the provisions of section 37 of the Customs Act, ... there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected and paid on such article, on its importation into Canada, a special or dumping duty, equal to the difference between the said selling price of the article for export and the said fair market value thereof or value for duty thereof; and such special or dumping duty shall be levied, collected and paid on such article although it is not otherwise dutiable.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, by the amendments made last fall we gave the minister power to fix a certain discount on these listed goods which had the effect of fixing a certain value for duty. The value for duty having been fixed, then we amended the customs tariff in such a way that that value for duty as fixed by the minister had to be the actual purchase price of the goods. Therefore, if any man imported those goods into Canada for less than the price fixed by the minister he was exposed to the imposition of a dumping duty. The only way he could expect to avoid that dumping duty was to pay the same amount of money over to the American manufacturer instead of paying it into the treasury.

That is the position in which we find ourselves as a result of the insane desire which possessed this government last fall to shut out goods from other countries at no matter what cost; it did not matter to them what the effect would be on Canadian trade; it did not matter what the cost would be to Canadian purchasers. The whole thing is this: The Canadian importer is faced with a choice of one of two things, either he must pay a higher price to the American manufacturer for the articles he buys or the government will fine him an equal amount in dumping duties. That is a situation I have repeatedly drawn to the attention of the minister and I hope he will understand what it means. I hope that at this session before the house prorogues an amendment to the customs tariff will be brought in which will give Canadians the right to purchase goods in other markets as cheaply as the people in other countries can purchase them, and legislation which will not force Canadians to pay a higher price to American manufacturers for the goods they wish to buy.

Mr. BROWN: Would the minister tell us whether the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) has correctly interpreted the act?

Mr. EULER: I was going to ask that.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, this bill does not deal with the merits, if I may so call them, which the hon. member for Weyburn discussed. It says that a discount to be allowed must be shown upon the invoice, and this will be true whether or not the minister has power to fix the value for duty. It prescribes the form of the invoice used when importing goods into Canada.

Mr. BROWN: Those remarks refer entirely and only to the bill before the house at the moment. I hope hon. members opposite who have been so ready and willing to cry "Carried, carried" will take note of the remarks of the hon. member for Weyburn regarding changes made last fall. I think the hon. member has correctly placed the facts before the house.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): We know about that.

Mr. BROWN: But the people at home do not know it.

Mr. EULER: I think the minister is quite right when he says that the matter to which the hon. member for Weyburn has referred has no direct connection with the matter before the committee, and I may say in passing that I am in agreement with the legislation contained in this particular clause. I rise however to seek information on the point raised by the hon. member for Weyburn. Possibly I am out of order, but I think it only fair to revert to those matters because there may be no other opportunity of doing so. A few days ago I asked a question similar to that asked by my hon. friend from Weyburn, namely whether the dumping duty would apply when a value was fixed arbitrarily on any commodity imported into Canada, and whether, if the importer did not actually pay the price which was fixed arbitrarily for duty purposes only, the dumping duty would then apply. At that time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) replied that it would not, but I think he was in error. If in fact he was mistaken I think a correction should be made before the committee. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) would answer yes or no to the question asked by my hon. friend from Weyburn. I believe unintentionally an incorrect reply was made by the Minister of Finance. In my opinion the dumping duty does apply, and I must say we have pretty good proof of it. It always did apply under the old clause which permitted the governor in council, through the Minister of National Revenue, to fix a price on natural products. When we fixed a price on natural products that price was taken as the basis for a dump. I think the same was done when the minister fixed a price of $1 a ton on soft coal. If that soft coal was actually purchased at 60 cents a ton, as it might have been, then the duty was 50 cents a ton. There was a dump however of the difference between 60 cents, the actual price, and the dollar fixed by the minister. I think then the dump of 40 cents was applied. If it was done in one case I suppose it would apply in all other cases, but I think the minister should say whether or not that is the fact.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has admitted that this discussion is outside the ambit of the bill.

Mr. EULER: I asked the question only because a wrong answer was given.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The Prime Minister having given one answer and the hon. member for North Waterloo being of another opinion I should like to look into the matter before stating my view.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. BROWN: I feel the proper view is that expressed by the hon. member for Weyburn.

Mr. YOUNG: We ought to know what the minister thinks.

Mr. EULER: If the minister is not sure we shall have to ask him some other time.

Mr. YOUNG: If he is not sure, I think he ought to be, because three months have passed since I first drew his attention to the matter. The other day when I mentioned it again he laughed, and he laughs now. Surely he ought to have a serious moment when he might look into the matter. I think we have a right to know the correct interpretation of the law. There is a law which gives power to fix an arbitrary valuation, and which states that the difference between the invoice price and the price he fixes shall be levied and paid.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): I do not think the matter is debatable on this particular section.

Mr. YOUNG: This section deals with discounts.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The section now before the committee merely refers to the administration of the act and states that the words "and deducted" shall be added to the section. The minister says he will deal with the point raised by the hon. member.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Territorial waters defined.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman I desire to move an amendment to this section. My reason is that recently there has been a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which would show that the present section is ultra vires of this parliament. An appeal is being taken, but if the statute of Westminster comes into force this section 5 will be appropriate. I am therefore asking to make this amendment:

That subsection 7 of section 5 be amended by adding thereto the following:

Subsection 7 shall come into operation upon a date to be proclaimed by the governor in council and published in the Canada Gazette.

I will ask my hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes) to move this amendment.

Mr. RHODES: I move the amendment accordingly.

Mr. EULER: Three or four years ago, when I had the honour of being Minister of National Revenue, I introduced an amendment which was carried under some protest, extending the ordinary three mile limit to twelve miles with regard to the right of seizing liquor-laden vessels which were supposed to be destined to Canadian ports. At that time I think the present Prime Minister and others questioned the validity of such an enactment. However, I said, "We will try it for what it is worth." The minister has now referred to the fact that in a case brought into court recently the section was declared ultra vires, and that the government proposed to lodge an appeal. I suppose that means that the case will be appealed to the privy council. If this section is acknowledged by him to be ultra vires, is he hoping by an appeal to the privy council to establish the validity of the amendment made some years ago?

Mr. RYCKMAN: We hope to establish the validity of this legislation and that the decision of the supreme court is wrong in law. We are supporting, as I understand it, the position that was taken by my hon. friend some years ago. The decision of the supreme court is to the effect that outside the three mile limit we have not the jurisdiction which my hon. friend desired to give, and which we desire to maintain.

Mr. EULER: I am very glad to hear that, for it rather vindicates the position I took at the time, and indicates a right-about-face on the part of those who then opposed it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: We are always just.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Arrest without warrant for indictable offence—jurisdiction of officer making arrest.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the reason for the reference to the criminal code?

Mr. RYCKMAN: At present there may be offences against the Customs act that would not be indictable under the criminal code. Naturally we want to have it declared by this legislation that indictable offences whether against the Customs act or the criminal code may be dealt with by customs officers acting on reasonable and probable grounds.

Mr. EULER: Does it not in effect mean that where a regular customs officer has the right by virtue of his office to make an arrest, and, the ordinary preventive officer has not that right, it is proposed to give the latter that right?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: I should like to know exactly what powers the minister gives to his preventive officers. I received a complaint some time ago that a certain family on returning home found their house in possession of a stranger who had broken open a trunk and was rifling the contents. On being asked what business he had there he said he was a preventive officer and had a right to make the search. I should like to know from the minister whether if a man finds a stranger in his house under those circumstances he has not a right to use a club on him?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The facts to which my hon. friend refers have not come to my notice. In the past preventive officers have been men who have a reasonable knowledge of their duty and act accordingly. I can think of only two cases of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend. If there is an honest belief on the part of the preventive officer that the customs laws have been broken, for instance, that goods have been smuggled, then the officer has specific instructions to proceed just as if he was following His Majesty's writ and make a search. I would be very much surprised to hear that officers of the preventive service were guilty of making oppressive searches without being properly instructed and without a reasonable belief that the law had been infringed.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who gives them the necessary authority?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The officers have the authority that the statute gives them. There is a chief inspector and I have no doubt that any preventive officer would consult the chief inspector before making an oppressive search, unless he was in the very midst of infractions of the customs law. There are no officers running around loose jumping into men's houses and ransacking them. As I say, I have heard of only two cases of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young). In one of those cases there was absolute justification; as to the other case I have not yet heard all the facts.

Mr. ERNST: I think it might be correct to say that their powers of search come under a writ of assistance granted by the Exchequer Court of Canada.

On section 9—Further penalty if value two hundred dollars or over.

Mr. EULER: I do not understand from the explanatory note the reason for the reduction of the minimum fine from $500 to $200. I am not objecting to it particularly, but I should like to know the reason for the change.

Mr. RYCKMAN: As the note explains, the maximum fine, not the minimum, was $500. We desire now that the maximum fine be $1,000 and the minimum $200. Formerly the term of imprisonment was seven years, now we desire that it be made four years for the reason stated in the note. There has not been one conviction under this seven year law and we feel there must be a stringent law that will compel the observance of the Customs Act. If hon. members will read the note they will see the purpose of the legislation.

Mr. YOUNG: In the explanatory note on the opposite page I find the following words:

—it will be made more difficult for a defendant by exercising his right of peremptory challenge to select a jury to his liking.

Is that the purpose of the legislation, to make it more difficult for the defendant?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No; my hon. friend does not understand it correctly. This will make it more difficult for the defendant to get a jury to his liking. When the term of imprisonment may be five years or over the accused is allowed twelve challenges; when it is under five years he has but four challenges, and we desire that the defendant should have but four challenges. In cases of this kind it is hard to get a jury who will find a man guilty when the penalty may be seven years imprisonment, no matter how serious the infraction of the law, but at one time—and my hon. friends know when that was—parliament thought it advisable to make the penalty seven years. That has not accomplished what parliament set up to do.

Sections 10 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—Where goods of the value of two hundred dollars or over.

Mr. EULER: I think this embodies a very radical departure from the old act. Perhaps I might refer to something that is more or less history. Three or four years ago, shortly after the customs investigation, it was thought desirable that persons who smuggled goods to the value of $200 or over, if found guilty should be sent to prison without the option of a fine. I remember that when I introduced the amendment I found a great deal of opposition from those who were supposed to be supporting me and a great deal of support from those on the opposite side, I think notably the present Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Justice. That amendment was adopted. Now I see there is a departure from that method; I take it that this clause means that a person convicted of smuggling to the value of $200 or over need not necessarily be sent to prison but that the judge has the option of imposing a fine or imprisonment. I should like to ask the minister if that is not the meaning of this section.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is quite correct.

Mr. EULER: I think the reason for this change is that in some of the provinces east of Ottawa—we will not say just how far east—it was found impossible to get a conviction in connection with liquor smugglers who had brought in goods to the value of $200 or over, so that really the law was a dead letter and defeated its own purpose. Juries would find culprits not guilty rather than find them guilty and send them to gaol. Perhaps they would have been quite content to bring in a verdict of guilty if a substantial fine could have been imposed. I am rather inclined to agree with this change; in fact last year I had some thought of bringing in an amendment to the same effect, but I was just a little doubtful whether one should make a right about face so quickly. I am quite in accord with the amendment now proposed.

Mr. YOUNG: I should like to ask how far back in a man's career the officials may go to get this total value of $200. Will they go back six months?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, this means for one offence.

Mr. YOUNG: This is the way I have known it to work out: A certain man's house was raided and the preventive officers searched through his papers. He had been indiscreet enough to keep papers; he had kept all his store bills for years back. He lived near the border, a long distance from any Canadian town and had purchased goods in the United States because there was no other place where he could buy them. He had purchased lumber there which was incorporated in his buildings. The preventive officer came along and found these papers—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Showing offences?

Mr. YOUNG: Showing he had bought these goods in the United States. There was no place within miles where he could report them, after he had purchased them in the United States because it was the handiest place, and in fact, the only place where he could buy them. He did just as you or I would have done.

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, I separate myself from that statement.

Mr. YOUNG: I hope my hon. friend is as good as he thinks he is; I will say, then, that this man did as any ordinary Christian would have done. The preventive officers totalled up the bills, which ran into several hundred dollars and the poor fellow is billed with an amount he will never be able to pay as long as he lives. I want to ask the minister if there should not be a time limit in connection with these offences.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend mean to say that the officers have added together the value of individual importations in order to make up the $200?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Surely that would not be sound; the $200 is supposed to apply to one individual shipment.

Mr. ERNST: He might be harbouring several shipments at the one time.

Mr. YOUNG: He had bought lumber, which was incorporated in his buildings years previously. The officers found the bills for that lumber and added everything together, making the man pay a fine equal to the duty paid value of the goods. The man will never be able to pay this amount; a preventive officer calls on him every once in a while, and the man is at his wit's end.

On section 19—Officials with powers of two justices.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to point out that some farmers who live close to the boundary find great difficulty in locating a customs officer in order to report their purchases; in the sparsely settled districts they may have to travel thirty or forty miles. I wonder if the minister would consider appointing postmasters or other reliable people in some of these sparsely settled districts who could carry on the work of the officers and save these farmers the long journeys they must make in order to report their purchases.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I know that the difficulty of which my hon. friend speaks does exist, particularly in districts such as the one from which my hon. friend comes, where there are stretches of land along the border perhaps sparsely settled. There is difficulty experienced by a resident in passing his goods through customs, and endeavour has been made by the department to help in these cases, where that can be done reasonably. In some cases I understand they have been allowed to observe the customs law in a generous way, always keeping in mind the necessity for the collection of the full duty. There is that difficulty, however, and if my hon. friend has anything to suggest I will be glad to consider it.

Mr. DONNELLY: I do not see why the mounted police or some other authority could not take from settlers a list of their effects and report to the customs. In my constituency there is one section in which the customs offices are some 60 or 70 miles apart. A man coming with a wagonful of settlers' effects and desiring to settle close to the line discovers when he gets there that he must go still further north into Saskatchewan, a distance of 30 miles, before he can find roads going east and west. He then has to travel east 40 miles and south a considerable distance, so that altogether he is put to a great deal of unnecessary trouble. It seems to me that he might go to a justice of the peace or some designated person of good repute who would take a statement from him as to the amount of goods he had brought in, exempt by reason of being settler's effects. I submit that some arrangement of that kind should be made.

Section agreed to.

Mr. ERNST: I was not here when section 5 was passed, and I should like to ask the minister a question regarding it. On a former occasion I took the position that the power which the department sought in this regard was really ultra vires of parliament. I would remind the minister that in the Dunphy case this power was held to be ultra vires. I was wondering whether in passing that section he had in mind the statute of Westminster—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): There has been an amendment to that section.

Bill as amended reported, read the third time and passed.

ROOT VEGETABLES ACT

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I do not think that the amendments should be concurred in. The Senate has added a clause which is not only unnecessary but which will be very inconvenient and dilatory. They have added to clause 1, as a subclause, the following:

Such regulations shall come into effect from the date of publication in the Canada Gazette, except as provided in paragraph 2 of subsection 1 of this section; and—

This is the part objected to.

—shall be printed in the prefix in the next succeeding issue of the Dominion statutes.

That is to say, the amendment to the Root Vegetables Act shall be printed in the prefix to the statutes. It is pointed out by the law clerk that this might hold up for some time the publication of the statutes. These regulations may be changed before the statutes are issued and they will only mislead the public. I do not think their honours in the Senate could have fully considered that. The same difficulty arose two or three years ago with a similar amendment and it had to be blotted out by another statute in this house. I suggest the omission from the amendment of these words:

And shall be printed in the prefix in the next succeeding issue of the Dominion statutes.

That would allow the regulations to be published in the Canada Gazette—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In the usual way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. The regulations might be changed from week to week, and if they were in the statutes it would only mislead the public. I move that we do not concur, but that the matter be referred back to the Senate.

Mr. NEILL: Is there not some of it that you accept?

Mr. GUTHRIE: All but the words I have indicated. I move that the appropriate message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours with the fact that this house does not concur in the words:

And shall be printed in the prefix in the next succeeding issue of the Dominion statutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Guthrie, seconded by Mr. Weir (Melfort). moves:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house disagrees from their amendments to Bill No. 87, an act to amend the Root Vegetables Act, for the following reason:

The proposal to print the following words in the clause of the amendment "and shall be printed in the prefix in the next succeeding issue of the Dominion statutes," might delay for some time the publication of the statute, and be misleading to the public, as the regulations are frequently changed.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT

INCREASE IN PAYMENT TO PROVINCES FROM FIFTY TO SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (for Mr. Bennett) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Old Age Pensions Act by increasing the amount of the payment to the provinces for old age pensions from one-half to seventy-five per cent of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions, and to provide for the examination and audit of expenditures in the province and the accounts relating thereto.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It will be observed that the only change is the substitution of "seventy-five" for "fifty," and to provide that the acceptance of the increased amount shall enable the Dominion to make such investigations and inquiries as may be necessary to ensure that the moneys so paid have been expended for the purposes intended. The statute provides that the agreements shall have a life of at least ten years. That is to say, the existing agreements are predicated upon the assumption that the provisions of the statute regarding the length of time during which the subsidy of fifty per cent was payable shall be maintained for ten years. There may be some questions to be considered later in that regard, but at the moment no question arises with respect to the substitution of "seventy-five" for "fifty." My only regret is that the situation does not warrant making the sum larger. In any event the whole proposal is but temporary in character, and contemplates a contributory system to old age pensions as was mentioned in the House of Commons when the Old Age Pension bill was under consideration. For that reason this provision has been made for the year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my right hon. friend indicate what additional outlay will be occasioned per annum under this change?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it is exactly half as much again as we paid last year. A few days ago I gave the figures, but I do not care to rely upon my memory. I shall see that they are given.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point I should like to make is that this means a very considerable increase in the amount of money to be handed over from the federal treasury to the provinces for their administration. The Prime Minister has, I think, indicated if not promised that the present administration will give 100 per cent of old age pensions, and if that is what he is working up to by this measure, it seems to me that the time already presents itself when he should consider the desirability of having the entire fund administered by the federal government. I cannot see any justification for the government handing hundreds of millions of dollars—because that is what this ere long will likely mean—over to the provinces for them to administer as an old age pension fund, the federal parliament providing something like 100 per cent of the oultay, and not itself taking in hand the work of administration. The constitutional difficulty was among the reasons why originally, when the Old Age Pension Act was passed, there was an arrangement whereby 50 per cent of the amount would be transferred to the provinces. But it was never contemplated that if that amount of 50 per cent were exceeded, the federal government itself would not take over the administration of the old age pension law in its entirety. I should like to suggest to my right hon. friend if anything of this kind is in contemplation and the British North America Act in any respect stands in the way, he should take immediate steps to have the provisions of the act so amended as to give the federal government the right without delay to administer the entire old age pension law.

Mr. BENNETT: The suggestion of the right hon. gentleman is a most reasonable one, but I think the ex-Minister of Justice will agree that when the statute of Westminster is passed we shall find it much easier than we do now to deal with a situation of this character. My own view is that no amendment to the British North America Act is required to deal with this problem on one phase of it, and in the preamble to the bill I have indicated that the census of the year will form the basis of actuarial computations that would warrant a contributory system on a national scale being embarked upon. As the right hon. gentleman will recall, we discussed that without going into detail when the original proposal was made. As the matter stands, I know of no constitutional impediment to the federal parliament voting 50 per cent of the sums paid by the provinces to old age pensions. I think it will be agreed that if there is no constitutional impediment against paying 50 per cent, there is none with respect to paying 75 per cent, and it is clear that it is not only probable but almost certain that there will be an increase in the payments made under this statute by reason of other provinces, now that the sum has been increased to the amount I have mentioned, availing themselves of its provisions. In the meantime I assure the committee that the whole problem is being considered from the angle of a contributory system predicated upon an actuarial valuation of the liabilities that would be involved. That is not as simple as perhaps would appear from the mere statement of it, but this year's census will enable us to determine with some degree of exactitude what is involved, and if there are any constitutional limitations upon our activities in that direction, I think the house will be only too glad to remove them. I do not contemplate any difficulty on that score.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand there is no constitutional difficutly in the matter of making grants to the provinces, but do I understand, if the contributory system of which my right hon. friend speaks becomes a government measure, it will be administered by the federal government; that is, that the old age pensions will be administered by the federal government?

Mr. BENNETT: In my judgment the answer to that would be in the affirmative. While one should not speak with any degree of certainty as to what conclusions might be arrived at in the light of further information or knowledge, I have in mind the thought that this and allied social insurance matters might be administered by a commission that would have the powers of a body corporate, but that would administer the act as a federal undertaking. My own view is that there is no constitutional difficulty in the way of administering such an act as a federal undertaking on a contributory basis.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What does my right hon. friend mean by "on a contributory basis"?

Mr. BENNETT: I mean that we should do as is done by many countries; determine the number of people that have to be provided for. That the census will show. Then the expectation of life can be ascertained by actuaries and the capital sum involved would be arrived at by multiplying the number of expectant annuitants in given years by $240. The amount of contributions that would have to be made by every person who hoped to share ultimately in the distribution of that fund would be a matter of calculation. It is not unreasonable to say that all who hope, after a given period, to share in old age pensions should. commencing at a certain period of time, make a contribution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my right hon. friend think, if this is made compulsory, it will not be beyond the powers of this parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: If you put it just as compulsory, as the statute now stands, it might be regarded as ultra vires, but if you made it conditional on all those who received benefits being compelled to make contributions, then that option is not compulsion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a condition.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And if the condition is not met, then the system would not work?

Mr. BENNETT: Possibly, but there would be no difficulty on that score in making it work. I am not going to develop a long argument this afternoon, but my right hon. friend will perhaps recall that there were placed on Hansard certain figures taken from the blue book furnished to the British House of Commons when Mr. Neville Chamberlain consolidated all the outstanding social activities of the British government. The government's contribution was based upon a capitalization of what one might call the slack, for want of a better word, between the actual sum that would be produced by the application of actuarial rules to the given conditions of age and expectation of life, and the ideal that is to be reached, that is, the payment of a given sum. The payment of a given sum can be made only if there is a contribution by the state on the idea that the contribution is equal to the requirements made upon it. As a number of expectant annuitants have already reached the age when their rights accrue, it follows that someone must take up that slack, and in most countries the state makes up that contribution from year to year. It is desirable that this should be adopted early in a country's life, because then the slack to be taken up would be so much less. In Great Britain it amounted to £750,000,000; that is the capitalized value of it. Of course no such sum was paid, but sums were advanced per annum to enable it to be taken up in that way. I do not say to the committee that this is by any means a considered plan, but it is one of the plans that I have talked over with the actuaries of the department of insurance. For the present all that is involved is the continuance of the existing system, because the statute provides that it lasts for ten years. Just how far it would be a violation of contractual obligations to interfere with that plan I have not been advised but it cannot be said to be an interference with it when you lessen the liability of the people who impose the conditions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bill to be introduced will be an amendment to the existing statute?

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. YOUNG: I would like to call the Prime Minister's attention to what appear to be to me one or two injustices in the working out of the present act. In one case a woman who has lived all her life in Canada, and raised a family here, now finds herself with her husband dead, her family scattered, and no home of her own in any province; she spends her time living with friends, a few months in Ontario, a few months in Manitoba, a few months in Saskatchewan, and so on. Yet she is totally unable to qualify for an old age pension because she cannot establish residence in any province.

The other is the case of a woman who came to this country when she was over fifty years, who speaks a foreign language, and settled in a remote district where there was no opportunity to learn the English language.

Mr. BENNETT: Is she married or single?

Mr. YOUNG: Married. Going before a judge of the district to qualify for citizenship, she could not qualify because she had not an adequate knowledge of English. An injustice is done in both these cases that was not intended in the act, and I trust that the Prime Minister will give these two classes of cases his consideration in framing his amendments.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say in reply to my hon. friend from Weyburn that whatever difficulties may have been experienced, this statute does not endeavour to remedy them; it merely accepts the situation, and increases the financial responsibility from 50 to 75 per cent. There have been what appeared to be cruel hardships in some cases, and there have also been impositions upon the fund in other cases. I would hesitate to take the time of the committee in indicating some of the charges on the fund which have been imposed upon the provinces, as well as upon the Dominion. People in moderately good circumstances have disposed of their properties and qualified to receive the old age pension. It came to my attention that in one case there was quite a little settlement of them in one province receiving the $20 per month, and when one of them presented his cheque to the bank for payment, the banker said, "What is this for? Surely you are not getting an old age pension, because you have a substantial sum of money on deposit in this bank." The man said that he had managed to get it, that somebody had told him he should have it. It is cases such as that which impel the addition of a provision to provide for the closest scrutiny with respect to payments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Should a contributory system be under discussion there may be differences of view with regard to it, and the government may be faced with the possibility of having to carry on the original scheme increasing to 100 per cent the amount that is going to the provinces, or take over the entire administration itself. I would therefore suggest that the Prime Minister institute steps immediately to clear the way for the possibility of the federal government itself at the earliest possible moment administering the old age pension scheme, so that if parliament is asked to make any larger contribution out of the federal treasury it will be sure that it will have the right to administer the moneys in its own hands, and that no exception can be taken to its administering the scheme in its entirety. Indeed it should secure this right where the amount of the federal contribution exceeds 50 per cent as will be the case when the bill based on this resolution is enacted. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he consider that aspect of it and secure as early as possible some amendment, to the British North America Act, if that be necessary, to enable the federal government from now on to administer the old age pension act.

Mr. NEILL: I am rather surprised that the Prime Minister has announced what really is a very important departure of policy at this late stage, and in a rather casual way, connected with a bill that does not immediately refer to that matter. He must have had it somewhat in the forefront of his mind, for he tells us that he has been consulting the actuaries of the department with regard to it. I cannot recall that it formed any issue on any platform in the election campaign, or that any reference was made to it in the speech from the throne, and it would be there that I would look to see what really is a radically new policy. The Prime Minister has indicated that he does not wish to discuss details, but perhaps he would oblige me on this one point. As has been pointed out, if contributions are made compulsory the question of constitutionality will arise. If, as the Prime Minister rather indicated, the contributions are made voluntarily, then this question will arise: Thrifty people, good citizens perhaps, would make their contributions, but there is always a proportion who are not good citizens and who dissipate any money they get one way or another, and when they come to old age they would be old and destitute and yet would not be eligible for relief. Could we tell them: It is your own fault. You should have contributed to this voluntary scheme when you were young and able? To tell anyone in such circumstances that he or she should have done something years ago is very little use. It is our duty to let no one starve in this country. I have no doubt that the Prime Minister would be fully aware of that aspect. What I wanted to ask was, would the Prime Minister be willing to give the assurance that in case such a contributory scheme is started, those who are now old and unable to contribute will be taken care of under the present system or something allied to it.

Mr. HEAPS: Before the Prime Minister thinks of adopting any scheme of contributory old age pensions I hope he will give the matter his very serious consideration, because I know of no English-speaking country where a person receiving a pension at the age of seventy pays any contribution towards pension. In Great Britain, of which the Prime Minister spoke, the pension is paid at the age of sixty-five, and the pensioner contributes towards that pension only for that portion of his life between sixty-five and seventy years of age. Beyond seventy years of age the whole obligation becomes a national obligation and the pensioner contributes nothing. Consequently there is no analogy between the system of pensions in Great Britain and the system of pensions in this country. I am not going to speak on the constitutional side of this question. I know it is very important. I am afraid, however, that if we were to attempt a compulsory system of pensions on a contributory basis, it would be almost impossible in this Dominion.

My reason for rising was to speak about another matter which has not been mentioned this afternoon. It is one which I am sure will appeal to the sympathies of most of the members of the house. For a number of years there has been a very strong agitation in Canada to give pensions to the blind people of this Dominion, and I am just wondering if the government would take into consideration the question of providing pensions for the blind. I am not at the moment fully conversant with the provisions of other old age Pensions acts in other countries or how they deal with the blind, but I am under the impression that in some countries where the blind people receive a pension there is a special provision in the act whereby blind people are eligible for the pension at an age much below that of the ordinary pensioner under the act. I was wondering if the government would take into consideration, when the act comes before parliament this session, the insertion of a clause which would give to the blind people of this Dominion a pension at an age at which I think the blind people ought to receive it. I do not think it is necessary to deal in any way this afternoon with the difficulties the blind people have in this Dominion. I think the matter speaks for itself, and undoubtedly action will depend on possibilities of financing. The cause is so great however that I think the Minister of Finance would be well advised to find ways and means of giving a pension to the blind payable at an earlier age than that stipulated in the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. HEENAN: At this stage I do not intend to go into this matter at length; before doing so I should like to see the bill, and I take it for granted that there will be opportunity for further discussion on the second reading. I should like, however, to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the appeal with respect to the blind made by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). Deputations from the blind people made frequent representations to the late administration, and on casual survey we found that it would cost about a million and a half dollars to include in the pension scheme the blind people of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that the share of the federal government, or the total cost?

Mr. HEENAN: The total cost.

Mr. HEAPS: Half of it would be a federal responsibility.

Mr. HEENAN: That is my recollection. I do not mind saying to the Prime Minister that assurance was given to the blind people that on the first occasion old age pensions were dealt with they would be given consideration.

My hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) has brought up a point which should receive the attention of the government. He has referred to people applying for pensions who must be residents of a province for at least five years. When the act was in its initial stages we realized that at first only a few of the provinces would take advantage of old age pensions, and it was our desire to protect the provinces which would enter the joint scheme. It was manifest that when the act was passed the province of British Columbia would participate at once. Realizing that if other provinces did not take advantage of the legislation there would be an inducement for old people to go to the province of British Columbia to receive the benefits of the old age pension, we included in the legislation a stipulation that a person must be in a province for five years before he or she would be permitted to receive any benefits. Times have changed, and to-day we find that five provinces are participating in this joint scheme. Three other provinces have passed legislation to participate in the benefits, with the result that of the nine provinces eight seek the advantages of the legislation. Consequently I believe we have reached a time when the five year provision might well be eliminated. We have reached the stage where anyone in Canada who within five years may have had reason to move from one province to another should receive the benefits to be derived from old age pensions. Canada has been built up by the pioneers, men and women who went from one part of the country to another, and made names for themselves in new territory.

Apart from that I wish to reserve my further remarks until the bill is before me. I should like to ask a question concerning the audit for which provision is made in the resolution. Does the Prime Minister not think that there is sufficient power provided under the regulations made under the act. Provision is made that—

> The minister charged with the administration of the act may at any time require the province to furnish information, detailed or otherwise, in connection with statements of account rendered by the province.

I was wondering if the Prime Minister had overlooked that section, or whether it is not sufficient to cover the point.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Weyburn referred to some of the difficulties in connection with the administration of the act, and I pointed out that when the statute was passed in 1927 these words were inserted as section 4:

> Every agreement made pursuant to this act shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to determine the agreement is given by the governor general to the lieutenant governor of the province with which the same was made.

The act contemplated that in the first instance the provinces should pass old age pensions statutes, such matters being clearly within their constitutional rights. Then the Dominion undertook to pay 50 per cent of such expenditures. Section 5 further provides:

Before any agreement made pursuant to this act comes into operation the governor in council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the governor in council.

In other words, by the joint operation of provincial and federal statutes the agreement becomes one which cannot be altered by either party without the consent of the other. For instance when the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River refers to difficulties connected with the five year period I point out to him only that the statute was in operation from 1927 until 1930, during which time no change was made, and it still remains as it was passed. Whether or not it was thought desirable to leave it as it is one can conclude only from the fact that it was not changed.

With respect to what has been said by the hon. members for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) concerning the blind, I may say that representations no doubt similar to those made to previous governments were made to the present government respecting these most deserving people. It is admitted that in the first instance the obligation is provincial in character. Until further provisions are made by the provinces it would be obviously unfair to ask the Dominion to carry the load, for the simple reason that for many years the education of the blind has engaged the attention of provincial legislatures. For instance in Nova Scotia, where I believe there is one blind person for every 1,000 of population, there is a school for the blind, the principal of which was honoured by His Majesty some years ago with a knighthood. The school has an international reputation, and through the expenditures by the province as well as private benefactions it has been enabled to carry on a very excellent work. I think the same may be said concerning other provinces. The federal government donates a small sum to two or three organizations in the province of Quebec which have in view the interests of the blind. Ontario makes the same provision as do the other provinces for the education of the blind. Concerning a pension for the blind, I spoke to the delegates of organizations which appeared before me in practically the same terms as did my predecessor, namely that in the first instance the provinces have not indicated any intention of taking action. Until they do indicate a determination to discharge an obligation which constitutionally is theirs, action by the federal government will have to wait. Of course the blind who have been deprived of their sight by the war are taken care of by the military pensions act.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), for some reason best known to himself, said that in my remarks to-day I had proposed a policy. I did not do that, nor had I any intention of so doing. I said to him and to the committee that when the Old Age Pensions Act was being considered we had discussed the question of a contributory system, and had further considered compulsory contributions. I said I had instructed that the figures be gathered together in order that I might be informed as to the situation. I said this without in any sense indicating that it could be treated as a policy. My mind was running along the idea of some system in a new country like this being entered upon that would not leave, as some of the older countries have found, a very large number of old and dependent people to be provided for, but that beginning in their youthful years, as soon as they were able to earn their living, by making contributions, large or small, there would be accumulated a fund that would ensure them from want in their old age. That is a very different thing from enunciating a policy, which I have not done, and which I would not do on the committee stage of a resolution dealing with an increase of the federal contribution from fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent; I do not think I would choose that as the occasion for a declaration of policy on a matter of this kind. I merely indicated it to the committee in order that its members might consider the problem, because they have given a great deal of attention to it. For instance, the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie King) has, the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) has, and the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has, and as well the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I merely mentioned these matters because it occurred to me that it is desirable that such matters affecting the welfare of this country should be thought of from time to time, regardless of our party affiliations, and I was merely making the suggestion that this was worthy of their consideration. In fact my mind is free to arrive at any conclusion that after mature consideration I think may be best for the country as a whole.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have always been in favour of an old age pension system, but I earnestly wish that some means might be devised under which all the provinces would be treated alike and would share equally in all rights and privileges under the act.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am of the opinion that if my right hon. friend had made up his mind to change the present statute, he should have gone the whole way and made it 100 per cent, because by increasing the federal contribution from 50 to 75 per cent the burden on those provinces which have not adopted the scheme will be increased.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: For instance, in my own province there is considerable difficulty to be met in the handling of this question. In the province of Quebec the old and needy people have always been looked after in various institutions to which the provincial government contributes a large amount.

Mr. BENNETT: And largely by family arrangement.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. Under this system of course the province will continue to contribute to all those institutions a very large amount; for after all I think it is recognized that the old people are very well looked after in my province.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Apart from that, the people of Quebec will contribute their share of the 75 per cent which will go to all the other provinces. If my right hon. friend were adopting a federal system of old age pensions —I mean a hundred per cent contribution— then either the province would cease to contribute to those institutions or possibly some other arrangements might be made in virtue of which part of the money would be reimbursed to the province for the contributions which it makes to those various institutions. I simply submit that for my right hon. friend's consideration. As it is, the system works in an unfair way towards the province of Quebec. I do not want to be critical in any way, but somewhere in my room I have a report of a speech delivered by my right hon. friend when he visited my city of Quebec, in which he told the—

Mr. BENNETT: Electors.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, the electors—and his hearers there gave him a very fine reception, as he acknowledged—that the Old Age Pensions Act was not applied to Quebec because the province could not see its way to accept it; but that he, my right hon. friend, when he became Prime Minister, would see to it that the benefits of the old age pension legislation should be extended to Quebec by statute.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not recall putting it as strongly as that, because I could not enforce my views upon the province of Quebec, but I recall I made some observations along that line.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That the question would be solved without the assistance of the province of Quebec, if necessary. I think that is substantially what my right hon. friend said. Of course, this bill will not redeem that pledge.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I wish to say, moreover, that at the present time there is a commission sitting in the province of Quebec, on which employers, labour and men interested in social work are represented. They are studying and considering old age pensions, unemployment insurance and other social problems, and I hope they may come to a conclusion in virtue of which the province may be able to arrive at an agreement with this government and this parliament so that the injury—because it is a real injury—that is worked on the province at the present time may be remedied.

Mr. HEAPS: One always hears of the contributions that the province of Quebec makes to the rest of Canada. It is quite possible that the rest of Canada is contributing also towards the province of Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who denies it?

Mr. HEAPS: It is a thing that works both ways. Personally I should like to see the province of Quebec under the old age pension scheme. Then the old people who are in the homes referred to by my hon. friend would be taken care of; that is, the $20 a month which the old age pensioner receives would go to the institution in which he happened to be housed at the time, and it would relieve those institutions of a good deal of the obligations they are now carrying. Consequently if the province of Quebec would come under the federal old age pensions scheme, those institutions would be the beneficiaries and would be better off than they would be under a scheme of the character enunciated by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

I want to refer for a moment to the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister with reference to the question of pensions for the blind. He states it is a matter almost entirely—

Mr. BENNETT: No, primarily.

Mr. HEAPS: —primarily for the province to take care of. The same might be said of old age pensions.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. HEAPS: I think in other countries where the blind people receive pensions they come under a special provision by which they become entitled to a pension at the age of forty or forty-five. I am pleading with the Prime Minister now that we do in this country what they have done in other countries and that by a special clause we give them the benefit of old age pensions at the age of forty or forty-five, whatever the government might think proper. As I say, that preferred treatment is already in effect in other countries. I think some of the provinces have already gone on record to the effect that they would be prepared to put the blind under the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act. But I think the first move must be made by the federal government. That is, this parliament is the authority to amend the Old Age Pensions Act, and unless it is amended as I suggest, then the provincial governments find themselves powerless to move in the matter. In view of the fact that the number is comparatively small, we would be conferring a blessing on a class of people who need it I think almost more than any other class in Canada. I think the government would be doing a worthy and desirable thing if they inserted in the new act a section giving pensions to blind people perhaps at the age of forty or forty-five.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has overlooked just one fact. He is quite right when he says the exercise of the powers of this parliament would be absolutely imperative for the insertion of a provision of that kind in the law, but I direct his attention to the fact that the present Old Age Pensions Act is predicated upon the assumption that the provinces have an old age statute of their own, before we act at all. That was what I meant when I said the primary obligation rests with the province. These are the words:

> . . . . equal to one-half of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions, pursuant to a provincial statute authorizing and providing for the payment of such pensions to the persons and under the conditions specified in this act and the regulations made hereunder.

That is, the Dominion comes in and pays half, but the statute passed by the province is the basis of the action, and that statute must be in accordance with the terms of the arrangement made, namely that $20 a month shall be payable as indicated, that properties must be turned over to the state, and so on.

As far as the blind are concerned I think there is a universal feeling that if the provinces treated them as being eligible for pension before the age of seventy and asked for cooperative action on the part of the Dominion, such action would be taken, but no province has made that request or taken the initial step of providing for such pensions, although there lies the liability.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to say a word on this question, because I think it is one of those humanitarian matters which should be entirely taken out of politics. The care of the helpless, the infirm, the aged and the blind should be a matter apart from our party discussions. As has been stated by the ex-Minister of Justice, the province of Quebec occupies a very unfortunate position at present in this respect. Owing to our peculiar social system we have a large number of institutions in almost every constituency which are able to look after the aged people in many cases better than they could look after themselves. Before a change should be made the provincial legislature thought the matter needed further investigation, and a commission has been appointed to study this question. It is true, as the right hon. Prime Minister says, that the basis of this measure is a provincial statute, but we brought about that condition when we ourselves adopted a statute which provided that when the provincial statute was adopted the Dominion would act.

I have no doubt that if the finances of Canada permitted them to do so, the Prime Minister and his colleagues would have granted 100 per cent instead of 75 per cent; that is just one step further. I think our present system is very faulty; I frequently receive letters from old people in my constituency asking for this old age pension, and I have to refer them to the provincial government, with the result that very little satisfaction is obtained. When this parliament starts to vote money I think this parliament should control its expenditure. That is a very wise system; if we are going the length of contributing 75 per cent I think this would be a good opportunity to stipulate, by an amendment to the bill which is to be brought in, that the province wishing to receive 75 per cent should consent to that money being administered by the Dominion.

Those are the only remarks I wish to make. I support the bill, because I think any further step in the way of helping unfortunate people, especially in the eastern provinces where conditions are different from those in the western provinces, deserves support. Our younger people go west, those who have not gone to the United States, and the old people stay at home; that is the condition in the three maritime provinces and in Quebec. I think under the circumstances this government should go one step further and try to bring about an arrangement under which the Dominion would come to the assistance of the poor people and of the blind as well. A contributory system might be provided for people who are in their youth or middle age, but when you are dealing with an old man or woman who has reached the age of sixty or seventy years, and who is penniless and without any means of sustenance, it would be almost cruelty to ask them to contribute.

Mr. BENNETT: They would not be expected to contribute.

Mr. MARCIL: I am glad to hear that. I just rose, Mr. Chairman, to say that I heartily support any further legislation of this kind, which I know will meet with the approval of the country at large.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say to my right hon. friend that I am glad to see that the responsibilities of office are beginning to have their effect upon his point of view. He intimated to the committee a few moments ago that it would be wise for all the members to do a little thinking before they went too far in the matter of expenditure from the federal treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I said it was desirable to think about this from the standpoint of the nation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, to think about a contributory system in connection with an old age pension system. In the same connection my right hon. friend said that with conditions as they are to-day it was hardly probable that for some little time to come his government could think of going much further than they are going at this moment. If I gathered aright the meaning of his words it was that when they did go further in the matter of old age pensions, and certainly if they went to the extent of 100 per cent in the matter of expenditure, it would be in connection with some contributory system. That may be a wiser course of proceeding, and more in the national interest, but it is a very different course from that taken by my right hon. friend when he was speaking during the election campaign at this time a year ago. Then he was very definite as to what he was going to do if he and his party were returned to power. There were no conditions or considerations. I am afraid the statement he is making to-day will create very serious disappointment in the minds of many people all over the country, who gave him support on the strength of his promises, particularly in those provinces which at present have no old age pension scheme.

Speaking at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, on July 2, my right hon. friend said, according to the Halifax Herald of July 3:

> If the Conservative party is successful on July 28, I will see to it that old age pensions are paid to every province of the Dominion from the federal treasury.

That was fairly specific; it did not leave much doubt in the minds of those who applauded that statement that the aged in their province were going to get a 100 per cent payment as soon as my hon. friend took office.

Mr. BENNETT: Just read that again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well:

> If the Conservative party is successful on July 28, I will see to it that old age pensions are paid to every province of the Dominion from the federal treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: Paid to every province.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, from the federal treasury, and I have no doubt, that statement being made in Nova Scotia, that all the Nova Scotians felt that when my right hon. friend brought in legislation they would come in for an old age pension scheme maintained in its entirety by the federal treasury. Now they are being told that if their province will raise 25 per cent my hon. friend will contribute 75 per cent.

Of the speech my right hon. friend made on July 3 at Halifax, the Halifax Herald of July 4 had the following to say:

> The opposition leader's reiteration of his definite pledge to establish a federal system of old age pensions, the cost of which will be borne entirely by the federal treasury, brought prolonged cheers and applause, as did his latest statement with regard to the pledges that he had made, when he emphatically declared, "I will ask the Conservative candidates from this province who are elected to parliament to vote against me and my government if these pledges are not fulfilled.

The Halifax Herald, which is one of my hon. friend's organs in that province, took his statement as a definite pledge to establish a federal system of old age pensions, the cost of which would be borne entirely by the federal treasury. And yet, if my right hon. friend's remarks to-day mean anything, they mean that he has thrown overboard altogether the idea of a federal scheme to be borne entirely by the federal treasury, inasmuch as, in his present opinion, any scheme to be administered federally will be one having a contributory feature as an essential part of it.

At Chatham, New Brunswick, on July 11, touching on old age pensions, he is reported in the Ottawa Citizen of July 12 as having spoken as follows:

I say to you, if the Conservative party is returned to power we will provide for the payment of old age pensions from the federal exchequer, so that the provinces will not be called upon to contribute a cent and so that the provinces who now find the burden too great will be able to benefit equally with all the provinces of the Dominion.

The constitutional point had been raised by the premier. "If," he said, "it is constitutional to pay 50 per cent, would it not be constitutional to pay one hundred per cent? We will pass the law to pay one hundred per cent and it will be legal."

He is not redeeming that pledge to-day, and his words would indicate that he does not quite see when it will be possible for him to do so. He is not sure that it would be wise to have a federal scheme at all unless on a contributory basis.

At Montreal, on June 26, as reported in the Montreal Daily Star of June 27, the right hon. gentleman said:

"We say," the Conservative leader continued, "that if the federal government can provide half the cost of the old age pension scheme it can provide the whole without wrecking the constitution."

It is not difficult to judge of the effect of his speeches on his supporters, and the use they made of his repeated references. For example the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney), among the number, created great expectations in Ontario. The Ottawa Journal of July 17, in a report of the Conservative meeting at Renfrew on the day previous, contained the following:

Cheers greeted Dr. Maloney when he stated that Mr. Bennett had promised a national old age pension law. The present caused hardship on the poor and dependent aged as there were four provinces which had not entered the scheme. Under Mr. Bennett's plan he would protect the aged from coast to coast.

That was all very well a year ago, but to-day we are far from protecting the aged from coast to coast. When I was speaking in the last campaign, I repeat, I was speaking with a sense of the responsibility which one in office is obliged to have, particularly when facing difficult and hard times, and I was careful not to raise unduly the hopes of the electors.

Mr. BENNETTT: In Prince Edward Island, for instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and all over Canada. But my right hon. friend put no restraint upon his language nor upon the promises he made, and he is finding it now extremely difficult to fulfil them.

Mr. BENNETT: It being six o'clock, I will deal with that afterwards.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Mr. NEILL: At six o'clock I was just going to ask a question. The ex-Minister of Justice indicated that Quebec was very unlikely to take up the old age pension scheme on its present suggested basis of 75 per cent. Has the Prime Minister any information that would lead him to believe any of the other provinces will take it up on that basis?

Mr. BENNETT: I have seen in the press various statements, but nothing, so far as I can recall, has been communicated officially to the government. I have received no intimation that any of the provinces contemplate at the moment taking up the matter. Discussions did take place with the eastern provinces as to their making arrangements in that direction, but nothing has been officially intimated.

I should just like to say this in answer to the leader of the opposition: In 1927 there was at Winnipeg the most representative political convention that has ever been held in this country. There were present men of business, professional men, representatives of every walk in life, of every human activity, so far as Canada was concerned. At that convention the Conservative party determined that old age pensions should be a federal undertaking and they made that a plank in their platform. The same convention which passed those resolutions honoured me by selecting me as the leader of their party, and to the best of my ability I presented to the Canadian people the policy of the party as outlined at that convention. I have nothing to withdraw from and nothing to add to what I said. I said to the electors what most of them already knew, namely, that if the Conservative party were elected, it was prepared to make old age pensions a federal undertaking. Unlike some parties, the Conservative party believes, if it is elected on a platform, it should at least endeavour to give effect to it, and it has endeavoured to do so.

The Conservative party did not say that this should be done at the next session; neither did I. It naturally should undertake, at the earliest possible moment consistent with the conditions that prevail, any obligations imposed upon it. Those obligations it has undertaken, and it will continue to undertake until its promises to the public have been discharged. The Conservative party sought power upon a platform; it was given power because of that platform, and I can only say it was a matter of pride and satisfaction to me to be the leader of a party that promulgated the policies it did, policies that proved to be so acceptable to the people. We shall continue, as conditions warrant, to give effect to our promises. That is all I can safely say in reply to what my right hon. friend has said. If objection is taken to the statements I made I can only say I was interpreting the promises of the Conservative party made at that convention, and if any hon. gentleman desires further information on that point, if he will take the trouble to read what the declaration of the party was at that convention at Winnipeg, he will find them, I think, substantially in the terms in which I expressed them to the electors some two or three years after the electors had themselves, through their delegates at that convention, made that a plank in their party platform.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to add more than that I am prepared to leave the electors to judge for themselves what they understood my right hon. friend to say. I believe that most of them at the time he was speaking to them thought he intended to have a national old age pension scheme introduced at this session of parliament. Personally, I believed this would be impossible of achievement, but I think that is what the old people had in mind and now they will just have to judge for themselves. As I say, I do not think there were many conditions or parentheses in the remarks of my right hon. friend about this time a year ago. I venture, however to predict that before he has completed the task which he has laid out for himself, there will be many considerations of which he will have to take very full account.

Mr. MacLEAN: This question is far more important to the provinces which had not adopted any form of old age pensions than it is to the provinces which had adopted a scheme. The three maritime provinces and Quebec had not adopted an old age pension scheme, and when it was intimated that if the present Prime Minister came into power, his government would pay old age pensions 100 per cent through the federal treasury, the people of those provinces took that at its face value and believed the Prime Minister of to-day was at that time stating something which he intended to carry out. Those provinces have been looking ever since for the fulfilment of that promise. I do not think the Prime Minister can very well explain his position away by saying to-day that he is endeavouring to fulfil that promise, because on every platform in the maritimes he gave us distinctly to understand that that pledge would be implemented in full. Just before six o'clock he referred to something which the leader of the opposition had said in Prince Edward Island during the campaign. I want to refer the leader of the government to what he said when he was in Prince Edward Island during the camgaign of last summer. Speaking at Summerside in my riding on July 4, he is reported in the Guardian of July 5 to have said this:

> The Conservative party pledges that old age pensions will be dealt with in a national federal act by which eligibles will be granted pensions, while the province will be under no additional burden of taxation.

If that is not a definite statement that the provinces would not have to make any contribution to the scheme, I cannot understand the English language. As reported in the Guardian in its issue of July 7, this is what the Prime Minister said at Charlottetown:

> The Conservative government will pay the whole cost of old age pensions to every province in the Dominion. Do you know any reason why it cannot pay 99½ or 100 per cent of old age pensions in Prince Edward Island? The answer is simple: There is no reason.

If that is not a definite statement, I again say I cannot understand plain English. At the present time we are having a local election in Prince Edward Island, and this old age pension scheme is being trotted out again before the electors in the endeavour to gain a few votes in the local campaign. I think our hon. friends should be ashamed to mention the subject of old age pensions when one considers the record of the present government. They opposed this scheme when it was first introduced in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so.

Mr. MacLEAN: If I had time to look up Hansard, I think I could find proof that what I say is correct. My right hon. friend said that it should be a contributory scheme and he is advancing the same scheme to-day. Yet they are telling the people down in the maritime provinces: Yes, we are implementing our promises. How are they implementing them? All they are doing is simply to give 25 per cent more than under the system of the late government. I claim that that is by no means fulfilling the promise that they made to the electorate. They could not do this and face the electorate. During the election there was no question as to whether the finances of this Dominion would permit the federal government paying 100 per cent of the cost. There was nothing said then about the progressive steps that would be taken by the federal government in this matter. No, the electors were told plainly by hon. gentlemen opposite that the federal government would pay 100 per cent of the old age pensions, and would do it at the very first opportunity. Now they come before us and say: We will give you a paltry 25 per cent over what you received under the old act, and before we go any further we will consider whether we will make the system a contributory one. I could read column after column of speeches by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in the maritime provinces and elsewhere throughout the Dominion where he said on every platform that the federal government would pay the old age pensions 100 per cent, and it is no excuse for him now to come and tell this house that the federal government will only pay 25 per cent additional. I know that some of the provinces will endeavour to put legislation through implementing this legislation, but I say that it is not treating the provinces fairly when you consider the promise that was made to them by the present leader of the government.

Mr. DUPRE: I think the electors of the provinces and of Canada generally will be satisfied with this legislation because they realize how hard times are and how trying the circumstances we are now facing. The position taken by our friends opposite is very queer. On the one hand they blame the Prime Minister because he does not pay 100 per cent of the cost of old age pensions, and on the other hand they say that the federal exchequer cannot afford to pay more than 50 per cent.

I submit that no other prime minister has ever carried out so many of his promises in so short a time under the most trying circumstances. I deplore the fact that the province of Quebec will not benefit by this legislation. The Liberal administration in the province of Quebec has considered that that province should not come under this old age pension legislation, but may I express the wish that the present administration, or if you prefer, some other administration in my province, will enable the people to benefit by it. I congratulate the Prime Minister, and I can assure him that the electors will not forget that under this legislation they get 25 per cent more than they would have got if my hon. friends opposite had been returned to power. I challenge right here my hon. friends opposite to vote against this measure.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Who is going to vote against it?

Mr. HEENAN: I think on this legislation we have had an illustration of the quickest jumping-jack body of men who ever occupied the treasury benches in this house. We have had the Prime Minister give one excuse for this federal government not paying 100 per cent of the cost of old age pensions, and we have had the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) giving another. The Solicitor General deplored the fact that the Liberal administration in the province of Quebec had not seen fit up to the present time to adopt old age pension legislation. I wonder if he knows what his own colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) stated during the late election campaign in the province of Quebec why the province of Quebec had not adopted old age pension legislation. If he does not, I will read it to him. The present Postmaster General is reported in the Montreal Star of July 9, to have spoken as follows:

> Mr. Sauvé argued that laws passed by the King government like the Old Age Pensions Act and the Rural Credits Act were entirely unsuited to the requirements of the province of Quebec, and were so because they were dictated by the western farmers. The heads of the government were in the west and the will of the west prevailed.

That is the only reason why Quebec did not accept the old age pension legislation, according to the Postmaster General—because Quebec was being dictated to by the western members of the government.

I do not know of any body of men of any party which has jumped around from pillar to post on any subject more than the Conservative party have jumped about with respect to this one. They have already changed their view up to the present five times. They have jumped hurdles and turned handsprings five different times on this question of old age pensions. At first they voted against the federal system of old age pensions in 1925. In 1926 when the old age pensions was introduced on a cooperative scheme, they said it was a provincial matter and a municipal obligation, and that the federal government of the day would be better advised in looking after its own business instead of provincial business. In 1927, after the election, they took the view, when the old age pension leigslation was introduced again, that it should be a purely federal scheme. Then in Winnipeg, as the Prime Minister has said, this great body of men, very respectable, some of them, for some of them come from my own riding, adopted as a plank in their platform for the first time in Canada, after the Liberals had put the legislation on the statute books, that there should be a national system of old age pensions. They forgot that the King government had already established a national system. They simply jumped up on the band wagon on this question as they have done in connection with so many other subjects. During the last federal election campaign they promised a national system of old age pensions. As has been said here to-night, it was quite understood by the electors that if the Conservatives were elected to power they would pay 100 per cent of the cost of old age pensions, and that that legislation would be among the first to be introduced in this house. But now they have introduced a measure to amend the old age pension law, a law which they declared in 1927 and have done so up until now was unworkable, inadequate, a joke and a dead letter. They are now going to amend this joke, this unworkable scheme of old age pensions, by paying a further 25 per cent of the cost. They have changed five times already on this question, and the Prime Minister before the dinner hour to-day said that he had in mind still another system of old age pensions, a contributory system. Somebody has said that it was a good thing that the Conservative party had announced their position on old age pensions, but they have announced so many policies on this question that I do not know which one they are going to adopt. However, there was a national system adopted in 1927, and it was put on the statute books in spite of the opposition that was put in the way of it by our Conservative friends.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will please be good enough to indicate what he means by that.

Mr. HEENAN: I am going to prove it.

Mr. BENNETT: Take Hansard and look at the vote.

Mr. HEENAN: I say that that legislation was placed there in spite of the Conservative opposition at that time, and I will undertake to prove that before I sit down. The government of that day, after placing that legislation on the statute books solicited the cooperation of the provinces. Because of the attitude taken by our Conservative friends we had quite a task to secure the cooperation of the provinces. Notwithstanding all the encouragement they got however, notwithstanding all the propaganda and the fact that the scheme was said to be unworkable and inadequate, despite the fact that it was called a joke and a dead letter, we were successful in enlisting the cooperation of five different provinces. By that action, which was termed a joke and a dead letter, old age pensions are provided to over 60,000 people in Canada.

What have we now before us? We have the Prime Minister's explanation of the resolution before the committee concerning amendments to legislation which was said to be a joke and a dead letter.

Mr. BENNETT: Who described it in that way?

Mr. HEENAN: Who?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, who?

Mr. HEENAN: If the Prime Minister will allow me to go on—

Mr. BENNETT: Who described it in that way?

Mr. HEENAN: I would recommend that the Prime Minister ask his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). To-day five provinces are paying to and participating in old age pensions. Three provinces have passed legislation in this connection, and I am satisfied if it had not been for the opposition of the Conservative party two of those provinces would be also paying old age pensions to-day.

Mr. STEVENS: May I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment?

Mr. HEENAN: I would rather my hon. friend did not interrupt.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has referred to me and I think I should be extended the courtesy of replying to his observations.

Mr. HEENAN: After I get through I shall quote where the minister said it was a joke.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is not quoting correctly my statements. What I said on that occasion was this—

Mr. HEENAN: I do not wish to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Order; the hon. member has not given permission to interrupt.

Mr. HEENAN: If the province of New Brunswick had not intended to accept the Old Age Pensions Act, why did they, two sessions ago, pass legislation so that they would be in a position to participate in the scheme? The whole record of the Conservative party with respect to old age pensions has been humbug and propaganda of the worst kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: Let me outline briefly the history of that party in connection with this particular legislation. I shall not go back farther than the year 1925, when a committee of this house was appointed to inquire into the feasibility of old age pension legislation, and a report was brought in which amongst other things recommended the adoption of a scheme regulated on a fifty-fifty basis with the provinces. When that report was before the committee of the whole my hon. friend from Westaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), who at that time represented East Calgary, moved an amendment to the effect that the matter be referred back to the special committee with instructions to bring in a purely federal scheme rather than a cooperative one. If the Conservative party were convinced that the scheme should be purely federal they had their chance so to express themselves on that occasion. However only one Conservative in the whole house voted for that amendment, namely Mr. Church of Toronto. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) was a member of the committee and of the Conservative party, but he did not see fit to accept the amendment. On that occasion his words as reported at page 4433 of Hansard for 1925 are as follows:

> We feel that the administration by the provinces would be much cheaper. The overhead would not be so large. We have given this matter all the consideration that is necessary, and I hope the house will pay absolutely no attention to the amendment that has been moved to the committee's recommendations.

That was the attitude of the Conservative party when they had the opportunity to vote on an amendment which would have inaugurated a purely federal scheme.

Mr. MANION: How did the Liberals vote on that occasion?

Mr. HEENAN: The Liberals had consistently advocated all the way through that the matter of old age pensions should be arranged between the Dominion and the provinces, and they so voted.

Mr. STEVENS: They voted against that amendment.

Mr. HEENAN: They voted for a Dominion-provincial system. My hon. friends opposite who are now advocating a national system on that occasion voted to the contrary.

Mr. SPENCE: Is my hon. friend against a 75 per cent payment now?

Mr. HEENAN: I am for 100 per cent administered by the Dominion government.

Mr. DUPRE: Why did not the hon. member make that change when he had the opportunity?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Order.

Mr. HEENAN: When the old age pensions bill was introduced after the election of 1926, during the temporary absence of Mr. Meighen, the then leader of the Conservative party, Sir Henry Drayton, made the following statement which appears at page 1941 of Hansard, 1926:

> I am not at all certain that it is a good thing for this parliament to try to look after other business than its own, to try to look after provincial business, ...

That was his attitude on that occasion. Then we have an expression of opinion by the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). He stated, as many hon. members will recall, that there was no necessity for old age pensions, and that for the Dominion government to contribute money to provincial governments was a bad system because it lent itself to extravagant expenditures on the part of the provinces. Speaking not only for Quebec but for Nova Scotia he made the following statement, as it appears at page 2472 of Hansard, 1926:

> In my own native province of Nova Scotia, there is no need, I think for old age pensions or for pensions to those who are suffering special disability owing to blindness or being deaf and dumb. That province has undertaken for years past to educate its deaf and dumb and blind. The work has been so extremely well managed and so extremely beneficial that it will compare with similar work in any other civilized state in the world. I do not think there is any demand from that province for contributions of this kind in respect of work which they have undertaken as a province and in which the municipalities assist. They regard this as a provincial and municipal affair and they are prepared, I believe, unless there has been a change of sentiment in recent years, to continue it in the same vigorous and successful way in which they have carried it on in the past. . . .

Shortly afterwards the leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Meighen, entered the chamber, and after referring to the speech by the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) he had this to say, as it is reported on page 2474 of Hansard, 1926:

Now aside from the fact that the provinces heretofore have taken care of this situation, this being their responsibility under the constitution, this legislation is not framed on the principle of disability at all. As a matter of fact there is no principle of any kind underlying it.

At that time the then leader of the Conservative party said there was no principle underlying a system of old age pension. He continued as follows:

If the Dominion is going to step in and assist the provinces in the care of old persons, the Dominion is under as great a responsibility to step in and assist the provinces to take care of others who are disabled from earning power from any cause.

Of course there was an election after that statement, and I do not wish to refer to Mr. Meighen's statements during the campaign because in many respects they vary. Then on April 15, 1926, we had the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) speaking on this subject. Turning to page 2481 of Hansard of that date I find the following:

I supported the principle, and have done so for years. I did so long before this government had the courage to bring it in, because I think legislation is good, but not of this particular type. The government's hope is that the Senate will throw it out and relieve them of the embarrassment which it causes. And why will the Senate throw it out? If the Senate throws out this legislation it will do so because it knows it is not effective. That is the reason.

On the following page will be found these remarks by the hon. gentleman:

By attempting to pass a measure of this kind before a conference of the provinces is held and an agreement on the part of those provinces secured, the government are passing a piece of legislation that will be a joke on the statute books of Canada.

Then he continued:

I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that a genuine effort has not been made by the government in this matter. I do not like to indulge in prophecy, but I predict that one year, two years or three years from now this legislation will be a dead letter on the statute books of Canada if it passes both Houses of parliament this year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that legislation did pass both houses of parliament in 1927. And it is neither a joke nor a dead letter, for already over 60,000 people are receiving old age pensions under that legislation. I do not wish to quote the speeches delivered by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce during the election campaign, but he ridiculed this legislation to such an extent that the newspaper report I have in my hand shows that his audience jeered and laughed.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the hon. gentleman quoting from?

Mr. HEENAN: The Vancouver Province of August 25, 1926. The present Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) also spoke on the old age pensions bill. His remarks will be found at page 2488 of Hansard under date of April 15, 1926. He said:

There are conditions under which this government has a right to legislate. My good friend from Comox-Alberni quoted a decision of the Department of Justice, and I think correctly, that this is a matter for the provinces and not for the Dominion.

Concluding his address the hon. gentleman said:

I have offered these constructive suggestions, but the most important to my mind are these two: First, the system should be contributory, and secondly, we should get the provinces to agree before we insist on taking them into this scheme.

The bill was introduced again in the session of 1927, and on February 18 the hon. member has this to say—I am quoting from page 461 of Hansard:

As to the attitude of the Conservative party on old age pensions at the present time, we would prefer to have a federal scheme, with the necessary grants paid out of the federal exchequer, but if we cannot get a federal scheme we are going to support this bill. That, however, does not deprive us of the opportunity of criticizing some of the details of the measure, and because we offer some criticism of certain details is not to say that we are opposed to the bill itself.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: That was in 1927. In 1930 we had the election. The Dryden Observer of June 27, reports that the hon. Doctor Manion of Fort William spoke on the platform with Mr. McManus at Dryden to the effect that the Conservative party were not against old age pensions, but they claimed that the expenses in connection with it should not be divided, but the whole should be paid from the federal treasury. That statement of my hon. friend's was received with loud applause. The report continues, and in this I quite agree with the writer:

The hon. Dr. Manion is a rapid and pleasant speaker. He met with no interruptions nor were any questions asked by the audience.

I commend that to my hon. friends opposite. The people of Kenora district know how to treat a man when he is delivering a speech. As I have said, the bill was again introduced in 1927. The Conservative party had obstructed the measure in every possible way in 1926, but now it turned hands and was in favour of a Dominion scheme. Before I deal with that change of front I desire to quote what the leader of the Conservative party in the Senate said about the bill when it was before that chamber. These are his words. I am quoting from page 187 of unrevised Senate Hansard:

Hon. W. B. Ross: If it is the duty or the right of the Dominion to provide old age pensions, why should it not provide lunatic asylums, houses of providence, shelters for the deaf and dumb—in fact, institutions for assistance for all the poor of the country. The unreasonableness of such a position is quite apparent. Therefore, in my judgment, this bill is not only an improper infringement upon provincial rights and duties, but it is ultra vires of the Dominion parliament.

Those were the views of the leader of the Conservative party in the Senate on the occasion when the bill was thrown out. In 1927 the then leader of the Conservative party in the person of my hon. friend the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said:

The Conservative party stood for a federal system of old age pensions, one hundred per cent paid by this government.

He was applauded by his party. After saying that the party were in favour of a federal system he continued—I am quoting from page 332 of Hansard of February 15, 1927:

Have we or have we not the right to pass a federal measure dealing with this matter? I submit without hesitation, without any reservation, that under the constitution of this country this parliament can pass a federal measure. Unquestionably it has the right, and if the government will propose a measure applying to all Canada, where the whole amount is to be paid out of the federal treasury, there can be no doubt as to our constitutional authority to do so. We impose no burden upon any province. We exact no condition from any province. We ask no contribution from any citizen of any province. We invade in no respect what is known as property and civil rights in the various provinces. We have the right.

Speaking at Guelph on June 28, 1928, he is reported in the Guelph Mercury of that date as follows:

The Hon. Hugh Guthrie, M.P. for South Wellington, addressing a banquet held in Ryan's auditorium in connection with the annual convention of the managers of homes for the aged and infirm, said: "The Old Age Pensions Act legislated by the Dominion government is not working altogether satisfactorily," in Mr. Guthrie's opinion for two reasons: "I voted for it," he said, "but it only gives $20 a month to those 70 years or over. Seventy cents a day will not support any man or woman, and the balance must come from somewhere."

He continued:

"Another point is that the provinces are not accepting the scheme, only three have done so so far, and in this application the act is somewhat unfair." Mr. Guthrie stated he would favour a national act, but the country cannot afford it, and dcelared that in his opinion Ontario's method of letting the counties take care of their poor people was among the best.

On July 8, 1929, there was a provincial election in the offing and the premier of the province announced that he intended to adopt the old age pensions legislation for Ontario. The Hon. Hugh Guthrie was reported in the Toronto Mail and Empire of July 18, 1929, as having spoken at Hamilton on the preceding day with respect to old age pensions as follows:

Old age pensions were approved by the speaker, who complimented the Ontario government on its decision to adopt the scheme. The speaker added "there are many clauses of the federal act which should be amended."

There are three different hurdles which the present Minister of Justice jumped in the space of two years on the question of old age pensions. Now let me quote what the present Prime Minister said in 1926 when he gave the house what I thought was a very fine lecture —I do not mean that in any offensive sense— on old age pensions. He showed plainly that he had studied the matter not only from the Canadian viewpoint, but from that of the empire as a whole. He took this position:

But I do venture to plead with my friends opposite not to urge the government to proceed with it at this time.

I think anyone listening to those words would realize that in 1926 the present Prime Minister did not want the government to proceed with the scheme which had been introduced. Then on the same day, at page 1975 I find the following statement by the present Prime Minister:

I apologize for trespassing again to-night upon the time of the house, but I feel very strongly on this subject. I am deeply interested in it; I desire to see it succeed. I am convinced that it cannot succeed without the cooperation of all the provinces, unless the Dominion, in defiance of our constitutional jurisdiction as voiced by the deputy Minister of Justice, sees fit to undertake the whole responsibility, which would involve us in an expenditure of $23,000,000 per annum and, in a very short time, an expenditure of $40,000,000 per annum, an expenditure entirely too large for us to entertain at the present time.

One would hardly think the present Prime Minister was very enthusiastic at that time. At page 478 of Hansard for the session of 1926-27 we find the present Prime Minister saying:

This side of the house gave its support to that measure after pointing out its weaknesses;

we did not ask for a division, and for myself I then stated, as I now state, that I believe in an old age pension scheme. But I do not believe in an old age pension scheme based upon a mere granting of money to a provincial authority, thus imposing our views upon them willy nilly. There must be an exercise of some legislative discretion by these legislatures if they desire to pass a measure of this kind, but that is denied them; they must either accept or reject. They must take it as it is or drop it; they cannot get a sou unless they take it as we give it to them, and if they take it in that way they may get some money. That is the position, and that is what the leader of his party pointed out the other day.

In other words it was a case of "take it or leave it", and as I understand this legislation we are still in the same position. The Prime Minister adds 25 per cent to our contribution, and says to the provinces who have not participated as yet, "You can either take it or leave it." Again at page 481 of the same volume we find the following statement of the right hon. gentleman:

Now, it might be well to look on the political side of the matter. You know what took place in Australia under conditions such as these. You are going to have a system that is not contributory. An election is coming on. They go out and say that more money should be given, that $20 is not enough. "Well, we will give them $25 if we get into power," . . . .

And so on. I wonder if the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues did not run true to form in regard to what was in the mind of the Prime Minister at that time. The evidence is quite conclusive that the Conservative party did go out during the last campaign and bid for the votes of the people, saying that something more would be given than the Liberal party had given them in connection with old age pensions. The Prime Minister said he would give the provinces 100 per cent instead of 50 per cent, and some of the hon. members who were supporting him in that election promised even more money than $20 a month, and to reduce the age limit. Then we have Senator Robertson speaking in the east, as reported in the Halifax Herald of June 24, 1930:

Again Senator Robertson referred to the Conservative convention at Winnipeg and to the unanimous endorsation given by that convention to the proposal to establish a purely federal system of old age pensions, the cost of which would be entirely borne by the federal treasury.

I believe Senator Robertson was sincere in that statement, but apparently he cannot get his government to carry out that promise. Then we have Colonel Taylor speaking in the Manitoba legislature with regard to old age pensions and reported in the Manitoba Free Press of June 24, 1930, as follows:

[Mr. Heenan.]

In closing he called attention to the proposition made by Hon. R. B. Bennett in his Walker theatre address to make old age pensions solely a federal responsibility.

Then we have some editorial comment by several Conservative newspapers with regard to this promise made by the Prime Minister. In order that there might be no doubt left in the minds of hon. members as to what the Conservatives in the east expected, I want to quote from an editorial appearing in the Amherst News of July 16:

From the standpoint of justice and equity, and from the standpoint of our own provincial services, the argument is all the one way, that old age pensions should be a straight federal charge. It is Conservative policy, and if that party comes into power on July 28, it will be one of the first measures to be introduced by the new government under Mr. Bennett.

Those are the words of the editor of the Amherst News, a very important paper in the maritime provinces. The Halifax Citizen had the following to say editorially under date of June 27, 1930:

We are robbed to pay the pensions of the wealthy Canadian provinces. After July 28, Mr. Bennett will see that the rich provinces are made to foot the bill for our old age pension scheme.

So there can be no mistake as to just what the provinces expected. My good friend the present Minister of Fisheries spoke at a by-election in Halifax and, according to the miners, he promised that his government would adopt the old age pension plan in co-operation with the federal government. At a convention in Truro the miners' union passed the following resolution:

Whereas, the provincial revenue is greater by millions of dollars than in former years; and whereas, the provincial government is receiving substantial sums in the form of federal subsidies; and whereas, there is all possibility that when government control of the sale of liquor comes into force the provincial revenue will be enhanced to a still greater total, annually; and whereas, repeatedly in the past conventions of the U. M. W. of A., district 26, have urged the government to put into effect the necessary legislation to meet old age pensions in accord with the general pension scheme; and whereas the premier of this province has frequently promised an early enactment of this legislation;
Be it therefore resolved—

And they call upon the provincial government to take action.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The hon. member's time is up.

Mr. STEVENS: I should not have risen but for the rather irresponsible remarks of my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River

(Mr. Heenan). The hon. gentleman frequently regales the house with long series of statements characterized chiefly by their absolute irresponsibility. He is in the pernicious habit of picking up observations here and there and setting them forth as the deliberate utterances of those whom he is presuming to combat. The hon. member said that the Conservative party had resisted this legislation when it was brought in; that we had ridiculed it; that we had called it a joke; and so on. He mentioned myself as having referred to it as a joke.

I purpose referring briefly to the speech from which he quoted in order to indicate the stand I then took; and then I shall make one or two further observations. In 1926 there took place in this house a debate, from which the hon. gentleman quoted, on a resolution similar to the one now before us. In the course of my remarks at that time I directed attention to a report of a committee of this house on the subject in 1924. The terms of that committee's recommendation were stated in these words:

> Your committee further recommends that the government communicate with the various provincial governments to ascertain if they are disposed to adopt the above system and enact the necessary legislation.

We were urging the government of the day to do this and to bring in legislation acceptable to all the provinces. I pause to make this point. The burden of our objection was that the legislation then introduced and subsequently put into effect, having been in force up to the present time, would not be acceptable to all the provinces. The proof of the soundness of that stand is the fact that only a certain number of the provinces have been able to take advantage of that legislation. Up to this time several provinces have not availed themselves of it. Some declare they cannot take advantage of it, and yet they are paying their share to the participation of other provinces in the benefits of the legislation.

The situation is quite clear. In the west there is a preponderating element of younger persons; in the extreme east you have exactly the reverse. The smaller maritime provinces, we pointed out, would be burdened with a charge which it was absolutely impossible for them to bear, whereas in the west the burden was very much lightened by the large number of younger people living there in comparison with the aged. It was on that ground that we combated, not the principle of the legislation but the wisdom of its form; and if ever a party was justified in any stand it has taken, this party has been vindicated over and over again in its attitude towards that legislation by the fact that the legislation has not been and cannot be adopted by all the provinces of Canada.

On that occasion I made this statement:

> I supported the principle, and have done so for years. I did so long before this government had the courage to bring it in—

I was referring to the government of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I made that statement because I thought the principle was good. I took that stand then, and for several years prior to that, from my place in the house, I had urged some measure of old age pensions. Yet my hon. friend has the audacity to-night to say that we of the Conservative party consistently opposed this measure of relief to the aged of the country. I then referred to what action the Senate might take. My hon. friend suggested that we rather wished that the Senate would throw it out. On that occasion I said:

> So far as I am concerned, if I had any influence with the Senate I would advise them to pass the legislation, even though it is of an abortive character, so that the uselessness of it may recoil upon the government's head.

Again, I say, the ineffectiveness and injustice of that legislation have been amply demonstrated in the efforts of the last few years to put it into operation. I am not going to quote further because it is not necessary for the point I wish to make.

Let me say a few words on the principle of the legislation. Ten years ago, long before my hon. friend came to the house, and for several years prior to the placing of the present legislation on the statute books, I took the stand, as I take it now, that a proper system of old age pensions should be a contributory system. But we always contended that certain other measures should be adopted to take care of the aged who were on our hands and who, of course, could not participate in a contributory system. The government of my hon. friends opposite, under the right hon. gentleman who is now leader of the opposition, made no attempt whatever to work out a contributory system—not the slightest attempt. They made no effort to introduce a permanent and definite system of old age pensions. They did introduce a system which, as I have already said, has been taken advantage of by a few provinces but not by all.

Then there is the second point: we contended that the system should be federal; that is to say, that it should be a measure introduced in this parliament and worked out on a proper actuarial basis. My hon. friend asks: Why has not the leader of the government brought in a federal 100 per cent measure at this time? There is one very definite reason, and my hon. friends opposite are entirely responsible. They have entered into ten year contracts with five provinces under the scheme of legislation they introduced, and before a definite federal scheme can be worked out the present legislation will have to be disentangled. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton) Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member for West Edmonton laughs at the suggestion. He always treats difficult legislation in that way; just why I do not know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will tell you why.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member was a member of the government that saddled this country with the legislation at present in force; and that legislation, with its ten year contracts, stands in the way. That is one very good reason. But other reasons have already been indicated; the condition of the country, and the fact that, in view of the amount of legislation before parliament this session, the working out of a scheme that will be federal in its character, that will be contributory, and that will be fair, will take a very considerable time. What the government is trying to do under my right hon. leader is, at this session, in the short time at our disposal, so to amend this legislation that other provinces may have an opportunity of participating, pending the working out of a full measure of federal legislation. It is wholly untrue for any hon. member or anyone else to say that the members of this government and the Conservative party have consistently opposed old age pension legislation. I brand that as an absolute unequivocal untruth, and it should not be allowed to pass. The fact of the matter is that the Conservative party is clearly on record, as my leader has stated to-night, as being in favour of a proper federal scheme of old age pensions.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said to-night: I am for 100 per cent. Was he for 100 per cent last year? Was he for 100 per cent the year before? He certainly was not. He stood in his place and voted against the very amendment that he twitted us for voting against. He was the Minister of Labour. He was the minister who had this matter in hand. He was the minister who administered it. He was the minister who was responsible to the people. He was the minister who went up and down the country and claimed credit for almost all the social legislation passed in the legislature of Ontario and in this house during the last ten years. There is scarcely a bit of social legislation that appears on our statute books for which he has not at one time or another wrongly claimed credit. Yet he sat in the government year after year, and session after session, and never made any proposal for a 75 per cent participation, for a 100 per cent participation, no, not for one per cent more participation than was in the legislation passed in 1926. It ill behooves my hon. friend to make reckless statements regarding the attitude of hon. members on this side of the house. Our record has been consistent. We asked for a measure that would be effective throughout the whole of Canada, and my hon. friend and his friends had a measure passed that has been abortive, that has been useless to half the provinces of Canada, which they cannot take advantage of, indeed, which they dare not take advantage of. Because we now seek to afford some measure of relief in respect of that intolerable situation, he condemns it and his friends condemn it as a piece of legislation unworthy of support. The legislation is worthy of every support, and it is an earnest of what this government proposes to do as soon as there is reasonable opportunity to give effect to our declarations in this regard.

Mr. HEENAN: I have not had many lessons on debating, but I have often heard that when people get into a tight corner and cannot get out of it, they resort to ridicule. Here we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) rising in his place and talking about irresponsible statements from this side of the house, referring to me. Then at the latter part of his address he says that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River stood in his place and voted against the very resolution I accused him of voting against. If he knew what he was talking about, he would have known I was not a member of the House of Commons at that time; I was a member of the provincial legislature.

Mr. STEVENS: He has supported the party ever since.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, and I will support the party again that in spite of the opposition of the Tory party will put on the statute books legislation that will provide for the payment of 60,000 pensions. He says that his party were always consistent. I have quoted from his own words where he called the legislation a joke.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not call it a joke.

Mr. HEENAN: He called it a dead letter. If hon. members will read the Vancouver Province of August 25, 1926, they will see that my hon. friend, speaking from the public platform, ridiculed it, made it the subject of jeers by misrepresenting it. He says the Tory party were always consistently in favour of old age pensions. I have shown him that when there was an opportunity in 1925 for a federal system of old age pensions, under an amendment moved by the then hon. member for East Calgary to make it a federal scheme, hon. members opposite voted against it. When in 1926 a Dominion-provincial scheme was brought in, my hon. friends said that it was a provincial matter and the federal government should keep their fingers away from it and mind their own business. When the Conservatives in the Senate threw the legislation out and an election took place, they saw what the people thought about the matter, and then when it was introduced in 1927 they wanted a federal scheme. Later they had a convention at Winnipeg and they broadcast throughout the four corners of the earth that the King government had introduced an old age pension scheme that was unworkable, that was inadequate, and other similar adjectives. Yet they are amending this old, unworkable, inadequate system to-day, and endorsing the very principle they denounced in 1927. The present Conservative party led by the Prime Minister went up and down the country saying: Vote for us and we will bring in an old age pension system, a national system without one cent of expenditure from the provinces. Now the Prime Minister comes into the house and introduces an amendment to this old unworkable, inadequate joke, which they say is a dead letter on the statute books of Canada. That is the attitude of the Conservative party, and in the introduction of this legislation the Prime Minister turns around and tells us: This is not the system we have in mind; we have in mind a contributory system. Heaven knows what he will have before he brings in another system.

I have put pretty nearly all the members of the present government on record as to what they said during the past campaign. I see the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes) in his seat. According to the Halifax Herald of July 18, 1930, he is reported as having said this:

> On the question of old age pensions Premier Rhodes quoted the Conservative platform as adopted in Winnipeg, and made the notable declaration that if Mr. Bennett was elected to office on July 28 and did not keep his pledge in regard to making old age pensions a federal charge, he himself would retire from public life.

He got a great reception because of that speech. My hon. friends across the house want to make it appear that the King government was permitted to put that old age pension legislation on the statute books without any obstruction from anyone. The whole thing was ridiculed throughout Canada wherever there was a Conservative speaker. Even a gentleman in the city of Ottawa, the provincial member, Mr. A. E. Honeywell, is reported in the Ottawa Evening Journal of May 9, 1928, as having made this statement with respect to old age pensions:

> The present old age pension act of the federal government was nefarious in its operation, Mr. Honeywell told his audience. It left even provincial appointments to a large measure under the control or supervision of the Minister of Labour.

He was opposed to old age pensions because he thought the provincial appointments in respect to the matter would be made by the federal Minister of Labour.

Last but not least we have the Toronto Telegram reporting an Orangeville editorial under date of April 17, 1928, as follows:

> Go to the racetrack, step into the poolrooms any night and you can see the class of fellows who will be drawing old age pensions tomorrow. The thrifty, hardworking people will have to sweat to provide the means to keep those improvident bums in comparative luxury in the evening of their lives—and this class of no-goods live a long time. The number of needy people who have to be kept at the public expense is very small, but the bums and never-do-wells is large. Why, we ask, should the hustlers and self-sustaining, who labour and keep themselves, be taxed to maintain that class who were never any good to themselves or anybody else? Premier Ferguson is well advised to go slow on this old age pension business.

That is a Conservative paper in the province of Ontario, and that is the kind of propaganda with which the government was baset all over the country with respect to the old age pension legislation. I would say to my right hon. friend, who suggested that my statements were irresponsible when I was referring to himself, that it is probably because I was simply quoting his own words from Hansard. It is about time the Conservative party and the present government stopped trying to fool the people with respect to old age pensions. The people ought to be told that the present government did not mean or intend what they said with regard to old age pensions during the last election campaign or during the Winnipeg convention. If they do not bring in an old age pension scheme now with the federal government paying 100 per cent to relieve the provinces, it is because they do not wish to do it. If they bring in such a measure I am satisfied that this side of the house will support them 100 per cent, because that is the kind of old age pensions that we wanted; that is the kind that would have been introduced by a Liberal government had we been returned to power. My hon. friends opposite laugh. They say that we were in power for four years and what did we do? We did this: we introduced an old age pension scheme in accordance with the report of the committee of the house on which sat Conservatives, Liberals, Progressives and Labour members of the house, and we announced at that time that it was but the first step in an old age pension scheme. I stated on the platform in the maritime provinces and everywhere else that as soon as the provinces came into the scheme the federal government would consider any amendments that were considered necessary to the legislation. We hesitated to bring in any amendments before the last election for fear of being accused of amending the old age pension legislation just prior to the election for party advantage. That is the reason there were no amendments made at that time. We want the government to live up to their promise to the electorate to pay 100 per cent of the cost of old age pensions, and I say, Mr. Chairman, if they do not do it, it is because they do not want to do it. If the Prime Minister does not intend to do it, I would suggest to his followers that they live up to the declaration made by himself when he said: If we do not live up to our promise I ask all the Quebec and maritime members to vote against me in the house.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but really the spectacle we see to-night of hon. gentlemen opposite trying to justify their position under the present circumstances is enough to bring any member to his feet. I am not going to quote speeches by hon. gentlemen opposite because there can be no doubt about the fact that every one of them promised the electors of Canada that as soon as they were elected they would introduce an old age pension scheme with the federal government paying 100 per cent of the cost. No hon. gentleman opposite dare deny it.

My hon. friend from East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) stands in his place to-night and says: The reason we cannot do this thing is that the previous government entered into contracts with several provinces, and we dare not break those contracts. At different times I have heard my hon. friend make some splendid defences of his position and of the party he supports, but I am bound to say I was justified in laughing at the statement he made to-night. There is nothing on earth, and no one knows it better than my hon. friend, to prevent a change being made in the agreements with the provinces. He knows that, and everyone of ordinary common sense knows it.

Why did the province of Alberta fail to vote the necessary money to take care of their old age pensions this year? I will tell my right hon. friend. It was because they depended on the word of hon. gentlemen who are sitting in the seats of the mighty to-night. That is the reason they did not vote the necessary sums in the legislature to take care of their share of old age pensions. And now, forsooth, the government is going back to its old love; we must have a contributory scheme. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite are not going to go back on their promise. The Prime Minister says, "This was our policy. It was so stated at our convention at Winnipeg. There was nothing new about it. I simply repeated it during the election campaign from one end of Canada to the other." The Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) makes another excuse. But may I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that some of the provinces were not willing to go into the scheme on the basis of a fifty per cent contribution; they were promised during the last campaign a one hundred per cent federal contribution, and if the aged people in those provinces, about whom my hon. friends opposite were so much concerned in the last election, do not get relief it is because the federal government has failed to carry out its promise of a one hundred per cent contribution. Hon. gentlemen opposite were very solicitous about old age pensions and unemployment and all the rest of it during the election campaign; but now that they have the responsibility they calmly stand in their places and try to evade it by referring to the vacillation of the men who preceded them. Is it any wonder that we laugh at you when you make yourselves so ridiculous? I cannot understand that kind of mentality. For heaven's sake, quit talking about the men who held office before you when you have gone back on your promises to a greater degree in your nine months of office than we did in our whole nine years. Talk about vacillating—

Mr. MANION: The death knell of protection, for instance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is pleasing me more than enough because he is contributing to the death knell of protection by keeping on increasing the tariff. When hon. gentlemen opposite introduce even a 75 per cent contribution to old age pensions, to partly keep their promise, I am going to support them. When they make it 100 per cent, I am going to support them. But do not any longer charge those who preceded you with vacillation, because for a vacillating government you take the cake. You have demonstrated in the short period you have been in power that you did not mean what you said when you appealed to the electors last July.

Mr. SAUVE: I thank the ex-Minister of Labour for the attention that he has devoted to me during this debate. He cited an extract from one of my supposed speeches, reported in the Winnipeg Free Press, not in the Montreal Star, as he said previously. My attitude on this question of old age pensions was defined in the legislative assembly of Quebec in 1929, as recorded in the Journals of the legislative assembly at page 315, as follows:

Mr. Sauvé moved, seconded by Mr. Duplessis, and the question being proposed, that it be resolved, that whereas one of the members of the government has declared that he held the "Old Age Pension Act" to be anti-social—

That was the law of the King government; and the member of the provincial government here referred to was the Hon. Mr. David, the provincial secretary, a Liberal, and a friend of the leader of the opposition:

—and that certain jurists who were consulted by the government—

Those jurists were Mr. Geoffrion and others:

—have decided it is unconstitutional, this house is of opinion that:

(a) it is expedient to seek for and to find what method could best be followed to protect our indigent old people, without any injustice and without affecting the economic system of the province;

(b) that it is opportune to entrust the study of this entire question to a special committee composed of representatives of the government, of the opposition, of the universities, of the School of Higher Commercial Studies, and of the labour and agricultural unions:

(c) that this committee, authorized to meet even during the parliamentary recess, be instructed to inquire into the different systems adopted or suggested elsewhere, to study the consequences thereof and to report at the opening of the next session of the legislature.

The resolution was defeated. The year following the same government, that of Mr. Taschereau, appointed a committee to study the question. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that my resolution speaks for itself. Since 1929 I have been studying the question, and as a result I am prepared to support the measure now before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, if my remarks at this time were likely to cause further controversy I should hesitate to make them. I feel, however, that they may tend to remove what misunderstanding there may have been concerning my statements in the maritime provinces.

Just before six o'clock the Prime Minister referred to statements I had made when speaking in Prince Edward Island, which he spoke of as a Liberal province, and then proceeded to compare those remarks with my statements in Nova Scotia, which was spoken of as a Conservative province. I gathered that the comments by my right hon. friend were based on a speech made in the course of the debate on the budget a few days ago by the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes), who I am glad to see in his seat at the moment. On that occasion the minister said he had heard my statements over the radio and for that reason he was quite sure he was giving a correct report of my remarks. May I say to him that his statement as to what he heard over the radio was right. I contend, however, that the inference he sought to convey was wrong. The statement made is that while in Charlottetown I said I was not averse to a 100 per cent old age pension scheme but that I thought in the first place there should be an accounting with the provinces so that we might learn the respective obligations of the federal and provincial authorities. According to my hon. friend that was the statement I made in Prince Edward Island and I now state that he has correctly repeated what he heard.

The Prime Minister sought to leave the impression that my statement was intended to win votes in the smallest eastern province, that it was an appeal to that province to support a 100 per cent old age pension scheme. On the other hand in Nova Scotia it is alleged I put matters in such a way that the Liberal party might, through a different representation, gain at the expense of the Conservative party. I made, to all intent and purposes, the same statements in Prince Edward Island with respect to old age pensions that I made in Nova Scotia, and in all other provinces in which I spoke on the subject.

I have before me a report of my speech in Prince Edward Island as it appears in the Charlottetown Guardian of June 23, 1930. Apparently my words were taken down by a shorthand reporter, and I ask the committee, when listening to my words, to judge whether my statements were calculated to win votes by promises in connection with old age pensions. I shall now read the report of my speech because it emphasizes the point I have been trying to make concerning provincial grants. From the point of view of winning support I admit the criticizing of the giving of provincial grants is not popular, but I do believe that careful consideration of the view I have expressed is essential to save our country from a very serious condition with respect to future taxation, something to which we ought now to be giving much more attention than we really are. Of my speech delivered on June 22 in Charlottetown, the report in the Charlottetown Guardian of June 23, 1930, is as follows:

May I say this, I am not averse to the idea of taking over the old age pensions law as federal obligation, but I think before we take over any more obligations at the present time, we had better have a pretty careful accounting of what the total amounts are of those things that we are contributing to, and what the total expenditures are, both provincially and federally. This is all bound up with the constitution of our country. When the provinces came into confederation they gave up certain rights of taxation. For that they were given in consideration; they were given an agreement to get so much in the way of subsidy. That means that they would be handed out of the federal treasury certain grants of money which the federal government would have to raise in the form of taxes. Under that arrangement Prince Edward Island got so much. The intention of confederation was that each of us—the provinces and the Dominion—would work in our own fields. Now I think the time has come when those arrangements, especially with regard to subsidy should be revised even more than they have been. When we had a Dominion-provincial conference at Ottawa, I found that the premiers of the different provinces and their ministers all took the view that whatever is being given to them from the federal treasury should be given in a lump sum and that the provinces be allowed to spend that money as they think best. They stated in so many words: We don't like this contribution for highways, etc. Give us the money and let us do what we think best! I think that is a fair way to go on. Let us make the subsidies fair and let each province expend the money as it thinks advisable.

I am quite prepared at the appropriate time to go very carefully into this whole question of the matter of subsidy and what should be given, and if in this connection it may seem advisable for the Dominion government to take over the old age pensions we can get our British North America Act amended to take over that particular charge, and we can write off against that expenditure what we propose to give in the way of subsidy. But a matter of this kind that relates to the Dominion as a whole, in relation to the several provinces should not be made a matter of party politics, but should be made a matter of straight business and good government.

That was the statement I made in the maritime provinces and which I made repeatedly in this house during the last parliament. I have made a similar statement frequently this session and it is one I should like to repeat at this moment.

I do submit that however well intentioned the Prime Minister may be when he makes additional grants for old age pensions, when he proposes additional grants for technical education and binds future governments for fifteen years by a bill now before the house, when he pledges further grants of very considerable amounts for unemployment, when he proposes to make a grant running into many millions of dollars to meet a great emergency existing in another part of the country—I say that when my hon. friends consider that they have had at this session so considerally to increase taxation, when they know that at the close of the fiscal year they will be far behind in revenues and will have enormous deficits and that there will be necessity for imposing additional taxation, they ought to be giving more in the way of thought to the additional burdens of taxation they are loading on the backs of the people.

I suggest that they call these grants by their right names. Call them additional taxation of the people made for this, that or some other purpose. All the grants out of the federal treasury for the provinces are under provincial administration, notwithstanding the fact that the moneys are raised by the federal government for federal purposes. I say that the government ought to think twice before it continues to increase expenditures right and left. My proposal during the general election campaign, and my suggestion of the government's present duty is: Before they throw away what bargaining power they have in dealing with the provinces—and I submit that members of the Dominion government have an obligation to the Dominion; the provinces will look after themselves and their obligations, and when its comes to making an agreement with the provinces you need all your bargaining strength—I say before throwing away what real bargaining power they have in negotiating with the provinces, members of the Dominion government should convene a Dominion-provincial conference, at which the Dominion and provincial authorities should go very fully into their respective obligations. Let the Dominion decide, if it so desires, to take over altogether the control and administration of certain of these social services that to-day are being divided between the Dominion and the provinces. For example, let the Dominion say: "We will take over and administer the whole scheme of old age pensions." Let them with respect to other matters, if they deem it right so, to do, say: "We will also take over and administer these, but we will leave to you the complete control and administration of such and such other services." Having thus arranged a division of services between them, they might then go on to say: "Now a balance for purposes of adjustment will be struck betwen us in respect of what shall be paid further to the provinces by way of subsidies according to the principle underlying the British North America Act." In this way, you will be giving to the provinces what is justly due to them, and you will be allowing them the utmost freedom in expending those subsidies in the way they think best." Any other method of dealing with these matters is to a certain extent an interference with the autonomy of the provinces. I am not taking exception to any of the very worthy purposes that these grants are intended to serve; least of all do I take exception to a federal old age pension scheme, because I think where more than 50 per cent of the cost is met by the government at Ottawa, it should be an old age pension scheme administered by the federal government. I say when you are about to relieve the provinces of a burden such as is now being proposed in connection with old age pensions, there is no reason why the Dominion government, as a means of adjusting financial relations between the governments of the provinces and itself, should not have had to its credit the fact that it is assuming this further obligation.

That was the whole point I was making. I submit it was not the kind of appeal that would win votes. I venture to say that I lost thousands of votes all over the country—

An hon. MEMBER: You sure did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —through being perfectly honest in stating the position—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —through being perfectly honest with the electors in stating the position as to what in difficult times a government that was charged with great responsibilities could hope to be able to do. I told the people very frankly that these obligations meant additional taxation—taxation which I did not feel the federal government would be justified in adding to existing burdens until at least there has been this Dominion-provincial conference to adjust financial arrangements. I shall wait and see what the outcome of all this legislation is going to be in terms of taxation and increase of the public debt. That is what the country will be interested in more than anything else. The country will watch with a great deal of anxiety the increased burdens of taxation put upon its shoulders year by year by the present administration. It will be no excuse after two or three years have run by and each year there continues to be an additional deficit and a further increase in the public debt and in taxation for hon. gentlemen opposite to say: We were seeking to carry out certain promises we made in the thick of a general election for the sake of gaining political power.

As I say, I do think there should be greater care with regard to the expenditure of public money.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Especially when under an arrangement such as I have proposed, the whole object can be attained quite satisfactorily, and I submit, more to the interests of the provinces as well as the Dominion itself.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) said a moment ago that the previous government had entered into contracts for a period of ten years under an existing statute, and that was one reason why 100 per cent legislation could not be introduced at once. Why, those very contracts will have to be changed under this legislation. If you can change contracts with the provinces to give them 25 per cent more money, surely you can do so when you are giving them 50 per cent more. I am surprised that my hon. friend would think anybody was guillible enough to to be taken in by a ruse of that kind, notwithstanding the fervid manner in which it was put forward by him.

May I say one other word? I believe experience has shown that many of our municipalities are being driven into bankruptcy by the burdens which are being put upon them by the federal government in connection with the various conditional grants to the provinces. Throughout Ontario at the present time the government of the province does not meet 50 per cent of the old age pensions, as was the understanding with the province at the start, but it has passed along, I understand, 20 per cent to the municipalities, and something similar is true of the other provinces as well. I am told by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) that the province of Manitoba has passed on the whole of the burden to the municipalities. At any rate the point I am making is this: By legislation of this kind, conditional as it is upon amounts being raised in the provinces, there is a certain pressure—it is an economic pressure, but nevertheless a very real pressure, and to that extent an interference with the autonomy of the province—there is an economic pressure upon the provinces to make them raise more revenue for the purposes here set forth. They in their turn pass on that economic pressure to the municipalities, and the municipalities being the weakest of the three classes of authority find themselves in a condition of bankruptcy in the course of a short time. Throughout this Dominion to-day municipality after municipality is making the plea to the government that it has become bankrupt, and can no longer meet the condition that is required, either for old age pensions or for unemployment relief, and the like. These three or four measures that are coming before us within the last three or four days of the session—grants in connection with pensions, in connection with technical education and in connection with unemployment, and then a very large expenditure in connection with the very distressing circumstances in the west—all these are in the nature of substantial grants from the federal treasury to the provinces. I submit they all mean additional taxation, not only for this year, but for several years to come, for most of these grants are being made for a series of years. With the increased burden of taxation what it has become this session, with trade falling off week by week and month by month, I really do not know what is going to be the ultimate fate of the taxpayer if this policy is continued indefinitely.

That is the protest I wish to make—not against the object, but against the method of providing money and the lack of foresight in arranging these matters by a Dominion-provincial conference before it is too late for a conference to be of any effect.

Mr. ROBITAILLE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I shall not delay the house in discussing the legal aspect of this legislation. I think that the committee is well aware of the views of our leaders: that the act is ultra vires in its principle. Even the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) quoted today the views of the Hon. Mr. David, who had stated that this was anti-social legislation. I understand the views of the Hon. Mr. David because I know his patriotic zeal for our charitable institutions.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): You cannot wiggle out, he said it was anti-social. There is but one interpretation to the word anti-social.

Mr. ROBITAILLE (Translation): That is also what we contend. Moreover, we state that this act is ultra vires. Our leaders hold the act to be so in its very principle because it encroaches on provincial rights. However, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) after having admitted that it was ultra vires, came to the province of Quebec to visit the beautiful county of Maisonneuve, where at a large meeting he made all kinds of promises: immediate relief of unemployment, free ports for Halifax, St. John, etc., including old age pensions in full. If we have the authority of offering 50 per cent to provinces, why not 100 per cent, or 99 per cent, he stated? He did not fulfil this pledge. But he did fulfil one; when an old lady asked him: "How are you going to fulfil all these pledges?" He answered: "By taxation." That is the only pledge which he kept. I submit, sir, that this legislation is not equitable. There are provinces which avail themselves of it, others do not. Those which do not avail themselves of it contribute by taxes to meet the expenditure entailed by such legislation, without any benefit to them. You may say that they are free to accept it or not. That is true, and as the right hon. leader of the opposition has stated, it was suggested at the conference of prime ministers of the provinces, that the Dominion government should give a round sum to each province. I also suggest that the government should do something for the provinces which do not avail themselves of this act. The government should allow them a grant either proportionate to their population or proportionate to their subsidies or again based upon the census of their old people. This would be a very equitable and justifiable measure. I understand that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) stated just now that all the provinces could not adopt this act—I must state that Quebec is the most important province from a financial viewpoint. It is the only province whose budget showed a large surplus.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): It is a fictitious surplus.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Who says so?

Mr. ROBITAILLE (Translation): The hon. member should have an auditing of the books of the province before making that statement. Auditors more competent than the hon. member have examined the books and have found that the statement of such a surplus was a truthful one.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): As truthful as a tooth drawer.

Mr. ROBITAILLE (Translation): Quebec has the means from a financial viewpoint to avail itself of this act. However, we have in Quebec special institutions to help the old people and the provincial government generously contribute to their upkeep. I therefore suggest, sir, that the Dominion government should vote a fixed amount to the provinces which do not avail themselves of this act.

Mr. RHODES: It is not my desire to be a party to the delaying of this resolution, because it has been under consideration now for some time, but I feel it essential that I should say a word in view of the remarks of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). If I remain silent my silence may be construed as accepting his statement of the position he took with regard to this question while touring the maritime provinces.

I do not know why my right hon. friend went out of his way to protest his qualities of virtue and to announce so vehemently that he was speaking with the utmost frankness to the people of the maritime provinces. In fact, he said, he was so frank that while making his statement he expected he would lose votes. We all know that my right hon. friend did not expect to win any votes on that occasion; that was far from his thought in addressing audiences in the maritime provinces. He just came down to pay us a sort of friendly visit, and he was so anxious to pay that visit that he came to the maritime provinces in spite of the fact that he expected to lose votes. As a matter of fact my right hon. friend might as well admit very frankly that in discussing this question he did not expect to lose any votes at all; he was trying to deal with a very difficult question under difficult and different conditions.

My right hon. friend read a statement which purports to be, and may be, part of the report of a speech delivered by him in Charlottetown, as quoted in a Charlottetown newspaper, but he went on to say that this was the statement he made in the maritime provinces. On that statement I wish to take direct issue with him. The clear impression which my hon. friend left with his audiences in Prince Edward Island was that he was prepared to consider a scheme which involved the payment of old age pensions by the federal government. In Charlottetown my right hon. friend did not raise the constitutional question at all, nor did he place upon the premier of that province the responsibility because the people of Prince Edward Island at that moment did not enjoy the benefit of old age pensions. On the other hand, speaking in Sydney, Nova Scotia, the very next night, my right hon. friend brought up the constitutional question as an impassable barrier over which he could not jump; he said that was the bar to his government giving 100 per cent old age pensions. There, in contrast with his attitude of the night before, my right hon. friend said to the audience in plain words, "The reason you have not old age pensions in this province is because Premier Rhodes has not given them to you."

Having said so much merely for the purpose of keeping the record accurate, I do not propose to labour that point very much further. However, before I resume my seat I must take exception to one other statement made by the right hon. gentleman. He complains that the municipalities to-day are being burdened almost to the point of bankruptcy because of the burdens imposed upon them in turn by the provinces because of this contributory scheme of old age pensions. Who but my right hon. friend brought in that contributory scheme? It was brought in not after a conference with the provinces but in defiance of the fact that the provinces, through their premiers, had stated in terms that they would not accept any part of a contributory scheme. That point should be made very clear indeed. To-night, if you please, the right hon. gentleman criticizes this government and protests our action because he says we had not the foresight to consult with the provinces before bringing down this bill. Those protests come from the right hon. gentleman who is himself responsible for having introduced the principle in the face of the opposition of the provinces. Is it necessary that this government, now that they find this bill in being and this principle established, should consult the provinces as to whether they should ameliorate their troubles to the extent of one-half the gap between 50 per cent and 100 per cent? I think not.

There are other angles and other phases of the matter which I shall not discuss at this time. I could not remain quiet in my seat and allow my right hon. friend to leave the impression with the committee and with the country that the report of his speech in Charlottetown contained the statement he made throughout the maritime provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I have sent to Hansard the copy of my speech from which I quoted. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat says I did not raise the constitutional question at all in Charlottetown.

Mr. RHODES: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will look at Hansard to-morrow he will see that in the course of what I read this evening I stated that the constitutional matter would have to be considered before there could be any 100 per cent old age pension scheme; that is the very thing I said in Charlottetown. My hon. friend is quite right in another point; I did say that the people of Nova Scotia would have to look to Premier Rhodes. Perhaps I drew a little more attention to my hon. friend in his own province because he was taking a very active part in the campaign, especially in connection with the question of old age pensions. But may I ask my hon. friend if the statement which I made was not literally and absolutely correct, when I said that if the electors of Nova Scotia wished to have the benefit of the old age pension scheme, as it was than in force, they would have first to look to the then Premier Rhodes. Was that not literally true?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "certainly."

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister is now increasing this grant from the federal treasury to 75 per cent; and I would say this, that before the electors of Nova Scotia can get the benefit of that increase and of the original amount they will have to look to the premier of that province to introduce an old age pension law, agreeing to contribute 25 per cent. Is not that true? I ask my hon. friend.

Mr. RHODES: I will speak when the right hon. gentleman has done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I will make the statement perfectly plain. Until the province of Nova Scotia enacts an old age pension law, agreeing to pay at least twenty-five per cent towards old age pensions, they cannot get a single dollar in the way of pensions from the legislation which the Prime Minister is now introducing. That was the position I took in Nova Scotia, and I was right. My hon. friend said I was right in what I stated on the question when he was premier of Nova Scotia, and I am equally right in regard to the position as it affects the present premier of that province. The hon. member suggests that I was not seeking votes in the maritimes.

Mr. RHODES: We all know that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not say that for a moment. I most decidedly was seeking votes in my appeals through the maritime provinces. But in those parts of my speeches in which I discussed old age pensions I was losing votes every time I referred to the matter. I was placed in this position. My hon. friends opposite had promised the electors that they would pay 100 per cent of old age pensions; I was obliged to explain why we were not prepared to follow them in, shall I say, an appeal of that kind—I will use the mild term.

Mr. BENNETT: The ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) said that was what you were going to do if returned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh no; he did not.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He said that we should first have a conference with the provinces. If he made that statement I did not hear him.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought you were listening to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I said was that there would be a conference between the provinces and the Dominion, at which time we would put forward a proposal to take over old age pensions 100 per cent, but that we would make it part of a final arrangement, adjusting between the Dominion and the provinces their respective burdens. That was our position. The Prime Minister had taken the position that, if returned, he would pay 100 per cent. Had I been indifferent to what became of the public treasury, and to what the proposal would mean to the people in the way of additional taxation, I could easily have told the electors that we would do precisely the same thing. And I might have done that not only in regard to old age pensions but in regard to technical education, highways, unemployment relief and many other proposals on which hon. members opposite made their appeal. I submit that when an appeal is made to the electorate in that way it is simply an effort through vast outlays from the federal treasury to gain the support of an entire province. I hesitate to describe what that sort of thing really amounts to in public life, but I submit that it is not a practice that can be long followed without bringing the nation into bankruptcy.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend takes an extraordinary position. In the latter part of his speech he said, "We were prepared to consider a 100 per cent old age pension scheme after a conference with the provinces." This is to say, having forced upon the provinces a scheme which they refused to accept in advance, in virtue of which they had to pay one-half—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where did they refuse to do it?

Mr. RHODES: Through their premiers, the Hon. Mr. Taschereau and the Hon. Mr. Ferguson. And the premier of Nova Scotia wrote here in response to communications sent him by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, saying that the province would have no part in such a scheme as was proposed. The right hon. gentleman forces this scheme upon the provinces without a conference, a scheme in virtue of which they must pay half, and then, if you please, he says, "I will have a conference with the provinces to ascertain whether they will consent to our paying the whole of it." That position is manifestly too absurd for words.

The right hon. gentleman put to me a query as to whether it would not be necessary under this legislation for the present government of Nova Scotia to pay 25 cents on every dollar. It will. I raise the point, however, not on its merits but merely to contrast the position taken by my right hon. friend in two different provinces in the maritimes. In Sydney he emphasized the constitutional issue to the point that it was a barrier to his paying 100 per cent, and he took the position that it was the fault of Premier Rhodes that the aged person of the province did not receive old age pensions; whereas the night before he had taken a different position. When I spoke the other day I did so from notes which I had taken over the radio at the time the right hon. gentleman addressed the electorate, and I can quote him almost exactly. He said, "Our Conservative friends say they are prepared to pay 100 per cent old age pensions. I am prepared to consider that proposal, subject to an accounting with the provinces." Those were his exact words, interlarded, of course, and overburdened with a multiplicity of words which would enable him on any subsequent occasion to explain his position. But he did not say in Prince Edward Island, on a Liberal platform with a Liberal premier, "If you want old age pensions in this province you must look to Premier Saunders." Not at all. And my purpose in rising now is to point out the clear distinction. Of course, he was not appealing for votes there; we all know that. He had taken high ground, with that same uniformity on general principles which is befitting the leader of a great party. Nevertheless there is that juxtaposition, which is most striking and typical of my right hon. friend and his method of dealing with public questions, even where he is not appealing for public support, and where he is so frank, as he always is.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 136, to amend the Old Age Pensions Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

Immigration, salaries and contingencies, including grants to immigration societies, women's hostels, provinces, and loans for stock, equipment, etc., for Canadian boys, as may be authorized by the governor general in council, $1,905,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the minister be good enough to give a detailed statement as to how this money is divided up amongst immigration societies, women's hostels and so forth?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): The outside salaries amount to $1,055,000. This item is divided into various districts as follows:

Mr. LUCAS: What societies are receiving grants?

Mr. GORDON: At the present time no societies are receiving any grants. These estimates were of course made up earlier in the year, in fact in January if my recollection serves me correctly, and at that time the picture was changing with a good deal of rapidity. I doubt whether any of this vote will be used. At the same time I do not think it should be disturbed in the event of our having to use it before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. LUCAS: What amount is paid to the provinces?

Mr. GORDON: The only payments made were on juvenile immigration, but this year that immigration is of course practically nil and I doubt if we will be called upon to pay anything.

Mr. LUCAS: Is part of this vote used for repatriation in the provinces?

Mr. GORDON: That comes under this vote. The arrangement, as the hon. member knows, was open for acceptance by all the provinces, but it was taken advantage of only by Quebec. Last year they received $50,000 and I suppose they will be expecting it again this year.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The minister mentioned an item of $78,500 for publicity. Just what form does that publicity take and what is its object, considering that at the present time we are not endeavouring to attract immigrants to this country?

Mr. GORDON: That is another item that unquestionably will not be fully used. I do not think more than half of it will be used. At the time these estimates were prepared we were maintaining offices in the United States, and also some on the continent. Some have been discontinued, but on the other hand there will be an increase of publicity within Canada. That is following the plan that was adopted by the government last fall to try out something that I think has not been given a trial, namely colonization at home. We have plenty of people to work on who have come into the country in the last few years, ostensibly to go on the land, but who have drifted into industry. Now they are finding themselves cast adrift from industry and the effort of the government is to give those people who can carry on farming operations in such a way as to sustain themselves an opportunity, at the least possible expense to the government, to go on the land. Any publicity this year and possibly next year will be confined to such as is necessary within Canada itself, in the hope that that effort will contribute to relieving distress in industrial and mining sections. No publicity of a major kind will be carried on in Great Britain, and none at all in Europe. By that I mean the kind of publicity that is calculated to bring into Canada at the present time people who are not equipped to take care of themselves financially and otherwise. We cannot, of course, dissociate ourselves entirely from contact with Great Britain with respect to the migration of people, but the British government and the Overseas Settlement Department know very well—we have had many communications on the subject with them—that the time is not opportune to encourage any considerable movement of people. For myself, and I speak probably for every member of this house, I hope the time will very shortly come when conditions will improve and we shall be able to absorb British and other desirable peoples in larger numbers. I can assure hon. members that when that time does come it will be my most earnest effort to see that that movement of people takes place under some disciplined plan where there will be fewer failures than there have been in the past, and under which people will be placed in Canada where they are best able to get along.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Information was given some weeks ago—I am speaking from memory—as to a plan which had been worked out between the two great railway companies and the head of the department to place people on the land in order to relieve the unemployment situation. I think it was stated that some thousands of single men and over one thousand families had been placed in that way and that the movement had been quite successful in that a very small percentage of the men had gone back to the cities. I would ask the minister just what was the basis of that plan. Were families placed on the farms with the object of purchasing them eventually, or were they simply placed on abandoned farms to relieve them for the time being, perhaps with a garden or something of that sort to help them carry along?

Mr. GORDON: The operation of the plan commenced last fall, after several interviews with the colonization departments of the railways and after it had been approved by the presidents of the two roads. It was generally agreed between the government and the railways that the combined colonization effort should be directed first towards taking desirable single men out of the ranks of the unemployed and placing them with farmers who could give them work and probably some pay. Well qualified men, of course, got more pay than those less qualified. Instructions were given by the railways to their agents to survey the various districts throughout Canada and ascertain the number of men the farmers could absorb, and the same instructions were given to the land settlement branch and the field supervisors of the soldier settlement board. They were instructed to survey the situation with care so that men who were taken from the ranks of the unemployed would be of a type likely to give satisfaction to the farmers who employed them. That plan is now being worked out; it is being pressed with a good deal of vigour, and it is meeting, I think, with a very large measure of success. The figures are returned to me monthly. I have not under my hand the latest figures, but if I remember aright somewhere in the neighbourhood of ten thousand single men have been placed on the farms with farmers. I was rather surprised to note how many farmers like to have a good hired man around the place. It was extremely encouraging from our standpoint to find that there were quite a large number of farmers in Canada who were doing pretty well. They are absorbing a great number of the unemployed and this, remember, without any extra cost to the government, for we are using the same staff which heretofore had been engaged in outside immigration work taking care of the men coming into this country.

With respect to the families, this picture presented itself to the railways and to myself. There were many families who, during the last few years, attracted no doubt by the apparently prosperous position of industry, had come into the industrial centres seeking jobs in industry. They had accumulated some hundreds, and in some cases some thousands of dollars, and then they found themselves out of work, with their savings gradually dwindling for rent and taxes. We found a desire among them to go back to the land if they could get a farm suited to their purpose and within their means. We have found that many families, just such as I have described, are very anxious to go back to the land and to be sure at least that they have something to support them. The last figure I got as to the number of families placed upon the land in that way—I am speaking from memory—was in the neighbourhood of 2,700. I intend, in conjunction with the railways—and I hope as time goes on to be able to enlist other organizations which heretofore have been engaged solely in bringing people outside of Canada into this country—to concentrate our efforts in a way best calculated to ensure success in that work until the time shall have arrived, and I hope it will not be so very long, when Canada will be able to take a more comprehensive view of inducing people to come here. But when they do come, it will be my effort to see that they come under some disciplined plan so that there will be the least possible number of failures.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is it hoped that these family settlements will be permanent, that they will purchase farms?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Are these abandoned farms held by the soldier settlement board or by the railways, or by both?

Mr. GORDON: Both.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I notice an item for loans to boys. Is there anything being done in that respect now? Is free passage still being given to boys, and are many taking advantage of it?

Mr. GORDON: We are not carrying on that work now.

Mr. LUCAS: Do I understand the minister to say that free pasage is not being given to boys of from 14 to 19 years of age, from the old land at the present time?

Mr. GORDON: None now. Some boys were coming out to the provinces under agreement with us, but they have already arrived, and no more boys are being brought out.

Mr. LUCAS: When was that discontinued?

Mr. GORDON: Some of the provinces discontinued it at the beginning of last year. Others brought out a few this year—Ontario, for instance. Saskatchewan brought out about forty, and Nova Scotia about fifty.

Mr. LUCAS: Some of the railway companies were still advertising along this line in the old land as late as March 5 of this year. I have here an old country paper that was sent to me containing an advertisement headed, "Free Passage to Canada for Boys, 14-19." It reads:

On Monday, March 9th, at 7.15 p.m., Mr. J. G. Moxley, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, will give a lecture on Canada, at the Carlton Hall, Carlton Club, Victoria Arcade, Southend-on-Sea.

Films of life in Canada will be shown, explaining how boys can secure a free passage with no repayment whatever, and the chance of a loan of £500 at the age of twenty-one. Parents who have sons between the ages of 14 and 19 are kindly asked to attend. Particulars can be obtained from: Charles Dale, Gold Star Tours, 5 Clarence Street, Southend-on-Sea.

I should like to ask the minister if the railways are still carrying on these advertisements.

Mr. GORDON: No; that matter was brought to my attention some time ago and in communication with the railways I learned that such advertising had been discontinued. Boys coming out under various schemes by agreement with the provinces have already arrived, and no more are coming.

Mr. SPENCER: When were such advertisements discontinued? Only last week I received a letter from the old country informing me that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is still advertising for people to come out to go on farms in the maritime provinces.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member is not referring to boys?

Mr. SPENCER: No.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. GORDON: Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, so far as I know, have always maintained that they could take care of selected families. Nova Scotia asked for one hundred families, and New Brunswick for a similar number. Requests were made particularly for British and Scandinavian races. We agreed to admit that number of people, and I believe it was stipulated that each family must have $1,000. Undoubtedly the railroads knew about the coming of those families, and the fact that they were keen for business accounts for the advertisements. I expect however that this year only about one-quarter the number will come out to the maritime provinces.

Mr. LUCAS Does the minister think it advisable under present conditions to spend large sums of money in repatriation work?

Mr. GORDON The only money spent at the present time for repatriation is $50,000 to the province of Quebec, and that province is spending an equal amount. While it may seem rather paradoxical to spend money on repatriation at this time, I think there is justification for it. We ought to be pleased to know that a large number of Canadians are returning. Although in the past we had hoped for their return we did not expect that it would be for the reasons which prompt some of them to come. Under any circumstances, however, they are welcome.

Mr. LUCAS: Surely we should not have to pay for their coming.

Mr. GORDON: That may be the view of the hon. member, but I am inclined to think that this money is being very well spent by the province of Quebec, and I should be reluctant to see such expenditures disturbed.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if that statement applies to the repatriation of orientals in British Columbia? Would the minister spend $50,000 for the repatriation of orientals from British Columbia?

Mr. GORDON: Where to?

Mr. NEILL: To the orient.

Mr. GORDON: I think the hon. member has his gears in reverse, has he not?

Mr. NEILL: No, it would be highly desirable to repatriate them to the orient on the condition that they stayed away.

In vote No. 124 there is provision "for loans for stock, equipment, etc., for Canadians boys." I have always been in favour of such loans rather than bringing people from overseas. Do those boys have to have money to begin with? Are they given land, or what are the general conditions?

While the minister is getting that information I might save time by asking another simple question. Under an order in council regarding immigration there is a clause that Americans may come in provided they have sufficient funds to maintain them until they secure work, or words to that effect. I should like to have an idea from the minister as to what sum might reasonably be expected to keep such an immigrant until he obtained work, especially under present conditions when work is very much at a premium. A man out of work at present may be in a similar position twelve months from now, and under such circumstances I am wondering what sum might be considered sufficient.

Mr. GORDON: There is no fixed sum.

Mr. NEILL: How is it arrived at? The order in council says that such men shall have sufficient money to keep them until they get work. Is it possible to tell by looking at a man, by knowing his name or by any other external evidence when he may expect work?

Mr. GORDON: Such decisions are left to the judgment of the officers at the ports of entry. They have to size up the men and make decisions. Some men may have $10,000 in their pockets and I might refuse to let them in; other men may have only 50 cents and might be allowed in. A great deal depends on the judgment of the officers at the border ports of entry.

Mr. NEILL: Such practice is not without some merit. We all know that a man's character is his best asset. At the same time, however, to tell all subordinate officers simply to use their judgment is not a good system. An officer may say, "Oh yes, come in" to almost any person. In these days when we are asked to pay large sums to relieve unemployment we should have a most definite plan. Such men ought at least to have $200 in their pockets.

Mr. GORDON: They have to have more than that.

Mr. NEILL: A minute ago the minister said only 50 cents might be required.

Mr. GORDON: A man would not be allowed to come in here with any amount of money and simply look around until he secured work we are trying to provide for our own people. He would have to assure the officer at the port of entry that he had means sufficient to provide for himself for some time. I have taken the stand that a man should have funds sufficient to carry him over the next winter. That attitude has been passed on to the officers at the ports of entry and has been adopted as a principle. The officers are instructed always to use their own judgment, leaning slightly towards rigidity in the enforcement of the law.

Mr. NEILL: Those are the instructions sent out, are they?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, instructions very much along that line.

Mr. SPENCER: I think those instructions are enforced on the other side of the line and not when the immigrant gets to Canada.

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Reverting to the matter of the families who at the present time are going on land, some of whom are purchasing land in the hands of the soldier settlement board, may I ask upon what principle the price of that land is based? Is it based upon the amount against a particular farm, or is the land appraised quite regardless of any debts which may have been accumulated against it by its former occupant?

Mr. GORDON: If my hon. friend will let the matter stand until we come to the soldier and general land settlement votes I shall be pleased to answer him.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Very well.

Mr. NEILL: Have you any information about the Canadian boys?

Mr. GORDON: There is about $30,000 in that item but we do not anticipate we will spend any of it this year.

Mr. NEILL: You are not encouraging the Canadian boys to go on the land any more?

Mr. GORDON: The provinces at the conference did not care to join with us in that effort this year; therefore we are advancing no money.

Mr. NEILL: Why the vote if you are not going to spend it? I do not think it could be better spent than in encouraging our own boys to go on the land.

Mr. GORDON: We are not advancing the money this year because we are directing our whole effort in another direction, that is, to getting people who are able to go on the land themselves with their families without expense to the government. I am of opinion that a halt must be made on advances by this government to people to go on the land until at least I have had a further opportunity of considering the policy. Sometimes I doubt the wisdom of making advances to put people on the land, because in my judgment at least it has not been a very great success.

Mr. NEILL: That is a matter of policy for consideration by the minister. If he is not going to spend the money why put it in the estimates?

Mr. GORDON: It is a small amount.

Item agreed to.

Empire settlement scheme, including grants to immigration societies, provinces, women's hostels, etc., as may be authorized by the governor general in council, $200,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What is the difference between the women's hostels mentioned in this item and the women's hostels mentioned in the preceding item? There seems to be a duplication of phraseology, if not of activity.

Mr. GORDON: The words "women's hostels" should not be in the previous item at all, because no grants are made to institutions of that kind. I expect the wording has been carried forward from other years. The hostels under the British empire settlement agreement do get some grants.

Mr. LUCAS: What societies are getting assistance under this vote?

Mr. GORDON: None; but the grants will be continued to the women's hostels.

Mr. NEILL: They will not get the $200,000, will they?

Mr. GORDON: That is the total amount

Mr. NEILL: It seems to me we are passing these votes just because they were passed last year.

Mr. GORDON: There is a reduction of $350,000.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but we have discontinued the empire settlement scheme, yet we are continuing the grants. The empire settlement scheme is at an end, is it not?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. NEILL: Are people still coming out under it?

Mr. GORDON: There are a few people coming out.

Mr. VENIOT: In New Brunswick there are some.

Mr. GORDON: New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Mr. NEILL: That is where the provinces take care of it, is it not?

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. GORDON: The empire settlement takes care of it under the agreement.

Mr. NEILL: I think if that vote were cut in half the minister would have sufficient so far as he can explain.

Mr. GORDON: We will not spend that amount.

Mr. NEILL: Then why vote it? Just because it has always been voted?

Mr. GORDON: No. At the time these estimates were made up we reduced the amount by $350,000, and it was anticipated that it would be spent this year. It is quite true that we will not spend this amount, but nobody will be hurt by the passing of the item so far as I can see.

Mr. GARDINER: May I take the opportunity of bringing to the attention of the minister the unsatisfactory condition of the empire settlers in western Canada. Frequently we make a reduction of the indebtedness of our soldier settlers to the extent of 30 per cent of their land and equipment. If you make inquiry among the empire settlers you will find that usually they have paid for their land a price equal to the price paid by the original settler. The situation is simply this, —under present conditions the empire settlers carrying that load of liability find it impossible to succeed. I suggest to the minister that he take into consideration in cases where the prices paid were excessive the question of reducing those prices.

Mr. GORDON: The situation of the empire settlers in western Canada—that is the three thousand family scheme?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: That has given me a great deal of concern. There is no doubt those men bought land at prices very much higher than they are to-day, and having regard to the setback in connection with the crop failures, it is obvious that many of them are not only unable to pay their instalments, but are having great difficulty in holding their farms. I do not propose to see any of those men have their contracts rescinded. The whole situation in respect to those settlers is under consideration, and I hope some equitable adjustment may be arrived at, although it is going to be very difficult because so many other people are in the same position with the mortgage and trust companies.

Item agreed to.

Chinese immigration—salaries and contingencies, $50,000.

Mr. REID: Will the minister furnish particulars of this item?

Mr. GORDON: These are the particulars:

(1) Salaries, permanent staff.. ..	28,560
Temporary employees..	3,500

(2) Travelling expenses of officers doing Chinese investigation work and inspection of boats carrying Chinese crews; legal expenses re prosecution and deportation of Chinese; printing and stationery; uniforms; telegrams; telephone, cablegrams, etc.. .. .. . $13,850

(3) Hong Kong office contingencies:

Living expenses of D. F. Warren.	$ 2,000
Office rent..	1,500
Travelling expenses..	100
Printing and stationery..	100
Cables, postage, light..	200
Miscellaneous office expenses.. ..	100
	$ 4,000
	$50,000

Item agreed to.

Soldier and general land settlement, $1,960,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In view of the fact that this service is to be reorganized and that the cost of administration will be reduced, would the minister explain the decrease in this item?

Mr. GORDON: There is a total decrease of $657,000, with an increase on the other side of the ledger of $302,000 leaving a general decrease of $355,000. That is purely a change of bookkeeping. Farms which were administered formerly under the general land settlement vote now will be administered under the soldier land settlement vote, which shows an apparent increase of $302,000 for that reason. On the other hand, the administration of general land settlement is decreased by $657,000, showing a net decrease of $355,000 for the year.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Could the minister tell me in a general way how the price now arrived at compares with the price for which the land was sold originally?

Mr. GORDON: I imagine a great deal would depend upon the year in which it was sold. I think it would be a fair statement to say that to-day valuations are considerably decreased from the original price; there will be a loss in almost every case.

Mr. NEILL: I agree with the minister that it is right and proper that the land should be sold to-day at its actual value, but that puts us in this position: What about the empire settlers who are on the land; can you justly refuse them a revaluation? You cannot put yourself in the position of forcing off these men and then selling the land to someone else at a much lower price. If you are willing to take your loss, as you must, and sell to the newcomer at 50 per cent less than the other man paid, why not do justice and keep the empire settler on the land and give him a rebate?

Mr. GORDON: It does seem an anomaly.

Mr. NEILL: You cannot get out of that position once you do the proper thing and sell the land at its present value; why should you turn off the man originally put there?

Mr. LUCAS: I think something will have to be done with regard to the British empire settlers. As I understand it, most of these men were settled on abandoned soldier settlement land without a reduction. The soldier settlers proper were granted a reduction of 30 per cent last year, and some of these people coming out at the present time are being placed on these lands at their present value. Under present conditions it is hopeless to expect these empire settlers to pay for their lands at the prices for which they were sold a few years ago, and in order to keep them on the land some revaluation will have to be made. I trust that the minister will give this matter his very serious consideration. I have had a number of representations made to me by these men, and I promised to bring the matter to the attention of the minister. Then there is another point with regard to which I should like to ask a question. I refer to what is known as the tripartite agreement.

Mr. GORDON: The New Brunswick agreement?

Mr. LUCAS: No, it applies in the west. Here is the situation; A soldier settler takes over land from another soldier settler; that transfer is endorsed by the board, but since the second man was not originally a bona-fide soldier settler, to-day he does not get that 30 per cent reduction. I have in mind the case of a soldier settler who was settled in 1921 by the board. Later on, because of ill health, he was advised to give up farming, so he sold his farm to another soldier settler. After being away for a couple of years he came back again and repurchased the land. Now he is refused the 30 per cent reduction, whereas had he remained on the land continually he would have been entitled to it.

Mr. GORDON: That would require a change in the statute.

Mr. LUCAS: I understand so, but I should like to ask the minister to give this matter his careful consideration.

Mr. GORDON: I am aware of some cases such as the hon. member has described. There is an apparent hardship, and I have the matter under consideration to see if some method cannot be evolved which will overcome that hardship. Fortunately there are not many of those cases.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, both when the revaluation was permitted and the 30 per cent reduction was granted it was in the mind of the committee that those genuine cases of tripartite agreements were covered by the act. That was the intention of the committee, but it turns out that according to the phraseology of the act they are not covered.

Then I should like to say just one word in support of what has been said already as to the position of empire settlers and other civilian purchasers of soldier settlement lands. I am not going to bring forward any individual cases, because I think that is more or less a waste of time since they cannot be considered at a time like this. But I have a case in mind which is typical of a great many cases. It is the case of a man who moved from the dry area of southern Alberta into my riding in central Alberta, and who purchased an abandoned farm through the board. Up to about 1930 he did keep up his payments, but of course he is utterly unable to do so this year. I appreciate, and most of the settlers are begininng to appreciate, the fact that the minister has no intention of either putting them off the land or permitting them to be forced off at the present time. Naturally however, their debt is accumulating, the arrears becoming quite a burden; and while they are confident that the minister intends to safeguard them at the moment, they are looking to the future without much hope. The suggestion made by a number of them was that during this year, at least at a time when they do not expect payments to be made on a number of these farms, current interest be cancelled so that their arrears may not increase to a hopeless point. I realize that the minister has just taken charge of his department and is now reorganizing it, but I have no doubt he has the whole situation in mind. As regards these empire settlers; the soldiers who became settlers, not having been originally soldier settlers; and those civilians who purchased land abandoned by soldiers, none of whom have received the benefit of the reduction, I hope their cases will all be taken into the minister's careful consideration at his leisure, when he is relieved of his responsibilities in connection with the Beauharnois committee. I should like to see something done for these people, not merely from motives of generosity but on a business basis, so that they may be able to pay for the land and retain their self respect.

Mr. LUCAS: Perhaps the minister will make a statement in regard to the Burch case which I have discussed with him privately several times. Is he still prepared to give consideration to this case?

Mr. GORDON: It is the case of the carpenter; I know it very well. I may tell my hon. friend frankly that I have been struggling with the case, because while there is a good deal of equity on the side of the claimant, there is so little that I can do. However, I have it still under review and I hope to find some means whereby he can be compensated legally.

Mr. LUCAS: I am glad to hear the minister say that, because the soldier settlement board has certainly benefited to a considerable extent through this man. He is a carpenter, and returned soldier, and when so much has been done for others I think his case should be given consideration.

Mr. GORDON: It is a meritorious case.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Combines Investigation Act, $30,000.

Mr. REID: Why the reduction in this vote?

Mr. BENNETT: This is due to the duties placed upon the tariff board.

Mr. GORDON: Last year's expenditure was abnormal on account of the investigation in Toronto and the appeal to the judicial committee.

Item agreed to.

Administration, Employment Offices' Coordination Act, $17,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Shall we have an opportunity anywhere in the estimates of discussing the expenditures under the Department of Labour of the relief money last year? When can we discuss that matter?

Mr. GORDON: There is no item in these estimates under which it can be discussed.

Mr. VENIOT: There will be an unemployment vote?

Mr. BENNETT: There will be an opportunity for discussion when the bill is under consideration.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina) moved concurrence in the second report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend mind informing us just what the recommendations are?

Mr. TURNBULL: The report of the committee appears in the votes and proceedings. Briefly, the committee did not agree that there was any money spent in Canada on war, that the expenditures of the Department of National Defence were not war expenditures. Secondly, the committee was of the opinion that professorships and scholarships were not practicable to establish, first by reason of the expense entailed, and second by reason of difficulties of legislative jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion. The third recommendation of the committee is that books on inter-imperial and international relations should be added from time to time to the library in the Department of External Affairs, and the fourth recommendation commends the League of Nations Society in Canada to members of parliament and to the people of Canada generally, and suggests continued support thereof.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I do not agree, Mr. Speaker, with the first two recommendations of the committee. I do not agree with the statement of the committee that expenditure for national defence and cadet training is not money spent on war, because I think that defence when there is no war is really war in an inactive period or a native war. I do not agree with those two recommendations, and I shall say no more about them.

The committee also is of the opinion that scholarships and chairs on international relationships are not feasible partly because of the expense necessary for the establishment of the chairs, and partly by reason of the question of legislative jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion. If scholarships and a chair in even one university would do anything at all to prevent war, I think we could very well afford it because we have spent huge sums and are still spending very considerable sums on defence. I do not agree that we cannot afford to spend the money necessary for the establishment of international professorships and scholarships. The other reason against such establishment given by the committee is the constitutional difficulties in the way. So long as we have a Royal Military college the money for which is voted by this parliament, the college being under federal jurisdiction, so long as the federal parliament is voting sums of money for technical education and cadet training or military education in schools, I do not and will not agree that there is a constitutional difficulty. Besides that we have the Minister of Justice in the late government (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in this government, as well as eminent professors of international law at McGill and Toronto universities, all saying that the constitutional difficulty can be got around. I think, therefore, we can conclude that whatever the reason is that we do not go forward with scholarships at the moment, it is not the reason given in the report. My opinion is that we are not interested enough, and the moment that we are, we shall find ways of spending money for scholarships on international relations.

The third recommendation of the committee deals with the extension of the library of the Department of External Affairs and the making of that library available to research students. That recommendation is an admirable one, and I think it may be the beginning of a sort of summer school to which students of this particular subject can come and study. It may be that in the near future they may have the help of a librarian or professor, or someone who knows the work there.

The fourth clause of the committee's report is a pious wish for the success of the League of Nations Society in Canada. That is possibly better than nothing, but I am not so sure that it is much better than nothing, though I agree with it as far as it goes. That is all I care to say at the moment.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): As one who supported the motion of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), and also as a member of the committee I should like to add a few words to what has been said.

It seems to me that the committee has quite sidestepped the resolution which was submitted to it. It is all very well to say that it is a good thing to have an extension of the library of the Department of External Affairs and an extension of the work of the League of Nations Society in Canada, but these were not the matters referred to the committee. The committee had a definite reference, that for every one hundred dollars spent for war one dollar should be spent to promote peace. That resolution passed this house, and I do not think it is good parliamentary practice that a committee should simply waive aside a resolution that has been referred to it by the house itself.

Clause one of the committee's report states that the committee does not believe that money spent on the maintenance of the army or on cadet training and so on, is money spent for war, but that was very clearly the meaning of the resolution as understood by the house, and even if the phrasing were a little defective, it would seem to me that whilst the committee might call attention to the desirability of better phrasing, it ought not to have set aside the substance of the reference itself. I do think it is more or less of a quibble to say that money spent on our militia and on our standing army, on our ships and on our air force, does not constitute preparation for war. We have all along been told that armaments were an assurance against war. But the committee itself took new ground altogether when it said that, after all, our military force was simply a police force and was not to be used against outside nations, but rather for police purposes within Canada. If the viewpoint of the committee is correct, I think the public of this country ought to know that. I ventured to suggest something of that kind myself when the military estimates were up, and now I find my opinion endorsed by the committee, the members of which stated very clearly that they believe that our standing army is a police force to be used against certain sections of our people in Canada and not against foreigners outside.

The committee also state that the establishment of international professorships and scholarships is not practicable by reason of the expense. The committee was not asked to give that opinion. The house referred the question to the committee. In any case it is rather absurd for the committee to state that the expenditure of one dollar for peace out of one hundred for war is not a practicable thing. If that is in reality true, then I would say that the one hundred dollar expenditure ought to be wiped out at once. If we cannot afford to spend one dollar to promote peace and thus live up to our obligations under the Paris peace pact, it does not seem to me that we are financially in a position to spend one hundred dollars on our army and ships and air force. It is not merely the one hundred dollars that is spent in that way, but members of the house will recall that almost half the entire revenues of this country are now being spent on past wars. As I have said before, we are largely a debt-collecting agency, collecting from our people and turning over nearly half our entire revenues to pay for past wars. If wars have cost this country so much, it would seem that it is indeed economy to spend a few dollars in the effort to prevent wars in the future.

Again, I join with the hon. member for Southeast Grey in protesting that the committee ought not to constitute itself a court to say just where legislative jurisdiction lies. So long as we are actually giving money for cadet purposes, and thus far entering into educational matters within the provinces, I do not think that it can be argued that there is any very serious question of legislative jurisdiction entering into this matter. I regret that the committee has taken the stand indicated by the report. I hope that in the future the house will accept a motion along this line more favourably than it has done in the past. If we are really in earnest about the disarmament conference to be held next February it seems to me that instead of spending the few dollars proposed we ought to spend thousands, yes hundreds of thousands of dollars, in an effort to educate our own people so that they may be in the forefront of the disarmament movement.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln) moved for concurrence in the third and final report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, before this document is relegated to the limbo of things futile I should like to say a few words about its subject matter. The Canadian government is engaged in a rather large way in the business of transportation both on land and sea. On land the Canadian National Railways own and operate 23,668 miles of first track steam mileage in which are included 3,342 miles of eastern lines. Eastern lines are defined by the Maritime Freight Rates Act of 1927 as those lines lying east of Levis, Quebec. From July 1, 1927, the rates on those lines have been reduced by 20 per cent, and the government has made up the difference. The Canadian National Railways also operate 187 miles of electric lines. At sea they operate a coastal service on the Pacific coast of six vessels; three of them in the triangular service between Vancouver, Victoria and Seattle; two other ships are in the island service; two ships, the Dalhousie City and the Northumberland, on lake Ontario are operated under the name of the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Navigation Company. They operate also two vessels plying between Chicago and Depot Harbour, a car ferry between Chicago and Milwaukee, a car ferry between Pictou and Mulgrave and two car ferries between Borden and Tormentine. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine owns a fleet of thirty vessels; a few years ago there were 60 vessels. The total tonnage at the present time is 239,170 tons. The Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited operate twelve ships between Canada and the West Indies with a total tonnage of 60,592 tons. The government owns and will soon operate the Hudson Bay railway with a mileage of 510 miles.

My purpose in reciting these facts is to acquaint the country with this great enterprise and its cost during the last twelve years. The amounts which I shall give are disbursements which have been made either in cash or credit by the Canadian people since April 1, 1919. I may say that at the moment those disbursements amount to $1,663,675,517.61. I have before me the details of this sum. In cash we advanced to the Canadian National Railways between April 1, 1919, and March 31, 1923, $389,743,789.34. From April 1, 1923, to December 31, 1930, we advanced $57,482,652.91, making a total of $447,226,442.25. We guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian National Railways to the extent of $569,609,027. Included in that amount are $77,000,000 of retirements. In addition to this new capital we have secured to the railways $216,207,141.67, by guaranteeing the interest in perpetuity on the Grand Trunk railway guaranteed and debenture stock. Moreover we have guaranteed as to capital and interest Canadian National Railways debenture stock, of which there now remains outstanding $30,559,114. There has also been purchased equipment, for which equipment trust notes have been issued and remain outstanding to the amount of $94,680,000. These notes are not guaranteed, but the conditions under which they were issued make the country entirely responsible for them if the railways continue to operate. Under the Maritime Freight Rates Act there has been paid to the Canadian National Railways $7,897,360. The requirements of the Canadian National Railways for deficits, acquisitions and betterments for the present year are $120,000,000. I wish to say on that score that the amount estimated was $104,000,000. It was admitted, however, by the railway management when before the committee that although the estimates were prepared in April they were already $13,000,000 short. I think in view of present conditions it is a conservative estimate to place those requirements for the present year at $120,000,000. Furthermore we are pledged for $48,250,000 after this year's program of construction is completed; that includes branch lines, terminals at Montreal and the hotels at Saskatoon, Jasper and Vancouver.

With regard to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, we were told that if this business were wound up to-day it would have cost the people of Canada $81,222,769.90, without allowing anything for interest. The deficit on the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, if we assume that it will be this year what it was last year, will be $588,500. We invested in the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamship Company $9,804,715. The deficit on that service last year was $523,136.98, and it is fair to assume it will not be less this year. This makes no allowance for interest.

Our investment in the Hudson Bay railway is something like $45,000,000, but since 1919 we have put into the Hudson Bay railway and terminals $31,756,417.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the hon. member think the last item should be debited against the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. HACKETT: If the hon. gentleman were listening he would not ask the question. There also has been spent on the car ferry at Prince Edward Island $2,500,000. Under the Maritime Freight Rates Act there has also been paid $2,922,891 to railways other than the Canadian National. These different items make a total of $166,367,551,761.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think these figures can be controverted; in fact I have culled them from the records of the company and of the department. But it is one thing to hear and quite another thing to comprehend them. We all know that there comes a time when language utterly fails us. We know that the symbols of speech when used to express either facts or phenomena that are beyond our personal experience do not convey very much to us. It will be recalled that after the Franco-Prussian war when France, the richest nation of Europe, was condemned to pay to Germany $1,000,000,000, or 5,000,000,000 francs, it did not mean very much to anybody, because 5,000,000,000, or even 1,000,000 francs, was so far beyond the experience of the ordinary individual that it conveyed no definite idea. But when the gold began to move from France to Germany in carload lots, then the people understood what it meant, a carload was something within their grasp; then they realized the enormous indemnity which their country was called upon to pay.

This is the difficulty which confronts one when he attempts to explain something that is beyond the experience of his audience; it is the difficulty of the schoolmaster; it is particularly the difficulty of the clergyman. Who has not listened to laboured efforts on the part of clergymen attempting to describe the celestial sphere, or the beatific vision, or the deity or something else that has never been heard or seen? I recall once hearing a clergyman say in an attempt to describe the endlessness of eternity, that if a mountain which rose high above the plain were worn down level with it by the brush of a swallow's wing which passed over it once in a thousand years, then eternity would only have begun.

I think the Canadian people find themselves in a somewhat similar difficulty when attempting to comprehend, to understand, to grasp the full meaning of the indebtedness that has been placed upon them in the last twelve years. When one is confronted by this difficulty he resorts to indirect and possibly to inadequate means; he resorts to comparison, to anything that may illustrate, even indirectly, the point which he is trying to make. With that end in view may I point out that in the first forty years of confederation we added to our national debt at the rate of only $7,000,000 a year, so that on the fortieth anniversary of confederation we had added but $280,000,000 odd to the original obligation. Yet during the last thirteen years we have added to our national liabilities something like $130,000,000 a year for the purposes of transportation alone. For the last year of which the record has been completed the total expenditure of the government of Canada for all services was but $383,000,000, including something over $25,000,000 of capital expenditures. Yet the Canadian National Railways alone—and I may say to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) that a few moments ago I was not speaking exclusively of the Canadian National Railways, I was speaking of the venture in transportation on land and on sea, of the Canadian government—yet the Canadian National Railways alone spent last year, not $380,000,000 which the nation spent to carry on its work, but $421,071,409. The total pay-roll of the government of Canada in all services was but $90,808,425.71, whereas the Canadian National Railways paid out in Canada alone $159,675,000 for wages. The total number of employees of the Canadian government last year was 44,000, of the Canadian National Railways 100,678. The carrying charges in the form of interest on the funded debt due from the Canadian National Railways to the public at the end of this year will be $60,000,000, and in 1919 it was but an insignificant figure. On the eve of the war the total expenditure of the government reached the unprecedented figure of $144,000,000 a year. Yet the railways required from this country in new capital in 1929, $144,670,459 and $148,000,000 in 1930. I have cited these figures not for the purpose of arguing that any or all of these amounts have been improperly spent. I am attempting merely to make the point that the business of transportation as carried on by the Canadian National Railways is a far greater business in dollars and cents, in enterprise, in salary and in number of employees than is the business of administering Canada itself. And what precautions have we taken, as a people and as a parliament, that this administration be carried on as it should be? When moneys are spent by governments they are very carefully scrutinized; estimates come before the committee of the whole and sometimes hours are spent in discussing just how a few hundred dollars should be spent. Very frequently one avails himself of that opportunity to discuss how a few hundred dollars have been spent. When ways and means resolutions come before parliament they are debated very carefully, yet when we called into existence the Canadian National Railways the very first thing we did was to kill the watch dog. By the statute which brought the Canadian National into existence we eliminated any interference or supervision by the auditor general, who is sent into every department of government to scrutinize, to check up and to certify as to the exactitude and propriety of every cent of expenditure. Yet when it came to the Canadian National Railways; in which we have billions of dollars invested, we utterly failed to exercise the most elementary prudence.

When we created this vast corporation, which constitutes the greatest mass of property brought under centralized control in Canada, and one of the greatest masses of property subject to unified control in the world, what precautions did we take? We put it into the hands of a manager, and over that manager we put a board of directors. Who constitute that board of directors? Honest gentlemen? That is conceded. Honourable gentlemen? Oh, yes. Good railway men? I am not certain how many of them know a hay rake from a hand car. What qualifications have they for the high office which they hold? There may be some exceptions but many of them have not, either by experience, by training or by aptitude the necessary capacity or opportunity to protect the country's purse. In my humble estimation if there is one thing more futile than the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways—more futile, be it understood, for the purpose for which directors are supposed to exist, which is to direct, to control, to supervise and to safeguard the interests of the shareholders, who are the people of Canada—it is this select committee on railways and shipping which, in a few short sittings, is supposed to check up the millions of dollars annually spent and make a report on the actions of the management and the board. If it were not so tragic it would be amusing. That a people who pride themselves on their enterprise and who have taken their place in the sun should, in a matter of business, be so absolutely lacking in the elements of common sense is beyond comprehension.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Was he restricted in any way before that special committee, either in asking questions or in making any inquiry he desired to make, even though he was not a member of the committee?

Mr. HACKETT: We have gone on with this noble experiment, as it has been called by some of its protagonists, for nearly thirteen years, and I submit that there are two or three facts which are absolutely incontrovertible. The first fact is that there is not in Canada sufficient business to maintain these railways in the state of efficiency in which they are operated at the present time. The second is that we cannot go on paying into the coffers of this company, to make up deficits, to acquire betterments and build extensions, a hundred to a hundred and fifty million dollars a year. The third is that the management has failed in the task which was allotted to it. The management was set up for what purpose? It came here to solve our railway problem. Has it done so?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes? Any hon. gentleman who thinks our railway problem has been solved may select for himself a place in either category, that of the innocent or the ignorant. Any man who has seen our debt increased by $1,600,000,000 in the last twelve or thirteen years; any man who has seen the dead weight imposed upon the people increased to $60,000,000 a year in the payment of interest on funded debt alone and who thinks a solution has been found does not commend himself, I submit, to the good judgment of the people of the country.

I admit that the service provided by these railways is good; I admit that the personnel, the equipment and the road bed have all been carried to a high point of efficiency. But I consider that the capital expenditures and some of the administrative charges have been injudicious, lavish and incurred without any regard to our needs or our capacity to pay. Show me a single venture in the Canadian National enterprise that has succeeded according to the rule of profit and loss. There has not been a single venture, be it the hotels, the triangular or the coastal service on the Pacific, the Canadian Government merchant marine, or the Canadian National West Indies service, that has yielded one cent of profit.

I know that my hon. friend who sits opposite, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), has said forsooth that public ownership of public utilities has a greater and higher purpose than that of profit: it is service, and service at cost. I ask, at what cost? The hon. gentleman possesses a serenity which I admire; but he is also capable of talking with his tongue in his cheek; when he asserted the other day that he wanted service at cost, and then proceeded to throw the cost out of the window—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member is justified in making such a remark with reference to the hon. member for North Waterloo—

An hon. MEMBER: Let him go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: —and I must ask him to withdraw the statement that the hon. member "is capable of talking with his tongue in his cheek."

Mr. HACKETT: I withdraw anything I have said that may be thought to be offensive.

Mr. BRADETTE: Let him go the limit.

Mr. HACKETT: An amount of $604,000,000 in cash was put into this enterprise, all with the exception of $157,000,000 after the bankruptcy, every dollar of which was used by the company; and the hon. gentleman has argued that this should not form a part of the capital of the railways.

Now what is going to be done? The management has offered this solution: it suggests that we scrap the merchant marine. I have no objection to that, it is probably unfortunate for the taxpayer that this course was not pursued some years ago. Then the suggestion is made with regard to the railway itself, that we appoint a commission to investigate the condition of transportation in Canada. I take that to mean, Mr. Speaker, that the management feels that its effort of the last eight years has been unproductive and that it is incapable of finding a solution to our problem. It means that if it means anything.

I am not sure that it was possible to find a solution in the circumstances in which the management found itself. Commissions in the past have been a haven for those who were perplexed, and have furnished fodder for pigeon holes. However, commissions, like governments, are good, bad or indifferent as the men who comprise them are competent or otherwise. If a commission of men, judiciously selected and competent, cared to undertake the solution of this problem, I daresay it might yield to their treatment. I consider that the government is better able than any commission to deal with this situation; it is more capable of dealing with it, especially from the financial point of view. There is a limit quite regardless of what may have happened in the last thirteen years to the credit of the country. It is necessary, when we decide upon the future policy of this transportation system, that we realize that our treasury is not inexhaustible. I believe that the government, with such assistance as it can commandeer from the railways, and possibly from some outside sources, is in a better position than any other body of men to deal with this problem promptly and effectively.

Mr. POULIOT: What outside sources?

Mr. HACKETT: Rivière du Loup. But while we are dealing with this question, it seems to me that there are some aspects of it which are more urgent than others. In the first place, whatever may have been the success of the management in its administration of the properties there is one field in which it is absolutely supreme. It has outshone all its rivals in the gentle art of publicity. The Canadian National Railways have monopolized the agencies for disseminating news. They have their own publications which in no way minimize either the virtue or the achievements of those who form part of that organization.

An hon. MEMBER: What is wrong with that?

Mr. HACKETT: They control the radio service; they have a telegraph service; and they have so demeaned themselves towards the press of the country that, with a few rare exceptions, any copy which is not laudatory of the Canadian National is not good and fit copy to go to the public of Canada. I say, Mr. Speaker, that so long as this method obtains, this method of suppression which withholds news and which prevents public opinion from being formed, there hangs over the Canadian National system and over this country a peril which shortly will do it great harm. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the great public of the country should be acquainted with the Railway situation. They should be acquainted with all its details; the people whose road this is—an institution which is of the people and for the people—should be thoroughly known to the public in all of its activities.

Another aspect of the situation which in my view requires immediate attention is the curtailment of all non-productive expenditures. I am of those who believe that steam traction ultimately will come back into its own, but at the present time it is challenged as it never has been challenged before. It is challenged on land by the auto truck and by the passenger automobile. It is challenged by the ocean; the Panama canal has done much to minimize the transcontinental movement of freight. The Hudson Bay railway was built for that very purpose. It is challenged by the deep waterways, that projected system of transportation which has emerged from the realm of theoretical discussion and is rapidly becoming one of practical politics. If it becomes a reality, it must of necessity take much freight from the railways of Canada. It is even challenged from the air. Until we know what success awaits our steam roads, until we know they are going to withstand these challenges, and resist the inroads which are being made on their earnings, it behooves us to go slowly and discontinue these large capital expenditures, it behooves us to exercise some element of control. Whether this control can be exercised by appointing directors who know something about railroading, men who can give their full time to this work and who will not be selected because of some accident of political stripe or residence, men who will know something about the problems to be solved and who will be able to render useful service, or by naming some official of the government to direct and check expenditures, I know not, but it is abundantly apparent from the events of the last few months that such an element of control is needed.

I suggest that these publicly owned roads be made to pay their way and that future deficits be paid out of taxes. It is only by this means that the public will have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with these roads and knowing whether or not the benefits they confer are worth the price which they cost. We have been charging deficits to capital account and thus saddling the future with a heavy burden. The full cost of railway transport must be paid either by the classes served, by the taxpayers of the time, or, with compound interest, by posterity. To spread this cost over a long period in the name of constructive benevolence is to dull the instrument of financial criticism by which all well-ordered communities locate and analyze their financial weaknesses. Worse than that, Mr. Speaker, it is a direct invitation to posterity to indulge in that all-shattering denial—repudiation. Something should be done and done now. Every way we have turned during the last six months in an effort to curtail expenditure we have been told that we were too late. We were too late because a contract had been signed here, a sod turned there, or a statute passed here. The mocking spectre of "Too late" has dogged our steps for the last six months. I ask that something be done now to preclude further commitments before it is too late, not only for the roads but for Canada.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DENIS: Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has the floor.

Mr. DENIS: I desired only to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) has been speaking for forty minutes, and the hon. member should have asked his question during that period.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Would the hon. member allow me to ask him whether the Canadian Pacific Railway would be willing to purchase the Canadian National Railways, at its actual value; moreover, would the hon. member accept the presidency of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways, at a lower salary than that of Sir Henry Thornton?

Mr. HACKETT (Translation): As regards the Canadian Pacific Railway's intentions, I am unable to give any information, so far as the second question, it is not a serious one—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): You must consider it.

Mr. HACKETT (Translation): —and I prefer not to answer it.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I fear I am not at all qualified to follow the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) in the melodramatic type of eloquence which he has employed; being but a practical man I cannot soar into the heights of imagination and eloquence to which he has resorted. The extravagant statements—I say this advisedly and I think I am within the rules of order—which he made, especially with regard to the attitude taken by myself, cannot do me any particular harm and I am sure they do not do his cause any particular good. When he refers to me as speaking on a previous occasion with my tongue in my cheek, that does not offend me particularly, although I might say that the same might not be true of the hon. member. I was just wondering whether it is the hon. member's own tongue that speaks or whether it is the tongue of somebody else.

An hon. MEMBER: That is pretty unfair.

Mr. EULER: I am just giving back a little of that given to me by the hon. member. The speech made by the hon. member on the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been practically repeated today, and for that reason I do not intend to take up the time of the house in replying because to do so would necessitate my using practically the same language as I did when speaking on the budget when replying to him. In fact, I had not intended to speak at all.

The report has been presented and it is stated to be a unanimous report and I am willing to accept it as such. In some respects the report was not exactly as I would have desired, but no legislation, committee work and so forth can be carried on entirely unanimously. We must give and take and so far as I am concerned there was a bit of compromise in that report. I did not desire to create friction and for that reason I was quite willing to allow it to be presented as a unanimous report.

I am at a loss to understand just what motive—I have no desire to impute wrongful motives—is behind the hon. member's speech. It is not a speech friendly to the Canadian National Railways, and I do not think my hon. friend would contend that it is that sort of a speech. I am at a loss to know just what good will be done by this speech. I intend to deal with only a few criticisms made by my hon. friend. I will not take up the financial structure of the railways, as this matter has been discussed and the charges of extravagance made by my hon. friend have been answered.

The hon. member for Stanstead was a welcome visitor at the sessions of the committee, and in fact I think he took just as much part in its deliberations as if he had been a member. I make no complaint in that regard, but the hon. member had every opportunity and seemed to avail himself of those opportunities to make the criticisms he has made to-day. As I followed the hon. member, his one criticism was that there was no audit made of the transactions of the board.

Mr. HACKETT: I did not intend to convey that impression.

Mr. EULER: I gathered that the hon. member contended that there was not a sufficient audit made of the expenditures.

Mr. HACKETT: Sufficient control.

Mr. EULER: I will accept that. As is well known, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) has authority under the act to send in an auditor at his pleasure.

The hon. member says that the board is practically a useless body—I am giving the spirit of his remarks—and if its uselessness could be excelled it would be by the committee which has made this report. I will not say a great deal about that statement because I was a member of that committee. I will not say much about that board because it is a creature of the present government and in so far as the hon. member criticizes the personnel of the board, he is criticizing the government which he supports. I would say in passing—and the matter was discussed in committee—that I believe it would be possible to appoint a board which would be more efficient than the present board or the one constituted before the present one. Perhaps I am speaking of an ideal impossible of attainment, but if it were possible to appoint a board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, having only one qualification in view, namely that of fitness for the position and no regard whatever for political leanings, we would be going a long way in the right direction.

Mr. STEVENS: What about geography?

Mr. EULER: My right hon. friend brings up the matter of geography. I think he might find that even in the province of British Columbia there are men who would be absolutely competent and well qualified to serve as members of the board. May I say quite sincerely that if I were so fortunate, or so unfortunate as to have to attend to the appointment of members of the board of the Canadian National Railways I would not make my choice with any view to provincial allotment at all. I would try to obtain five, six, or eight, or whatever the proper number may be, men qualified for the work they would have to do. I would say further that we cannot expect the members of that board to give a considerable part of their time to the work of the board for the miserable pittance of $2,000 a year. True, there may be many men in Canada who possess a great degree of public spirit and are willing to give up their time and services for the public good. As a general rule however a man will generally do what he is paid to do. I make the suggestion, even if in a measure it may be a criticism of past governments, that in the appointment of members to the board of the Canadian National Railways consideration be given only to one matter, namely qualification for the work. There should be higher salaries paid so that it may be worth while for men to give their time and attention to the work of the board. So that we would not lose the benefit of the experience of men who have attained knowledge and ability in the management of the railways, it might be well if the terms of office did not terminate at the same time. Members might be appointed for two or three years, or five years, and at intervals as some members retire from the board some experienced men would remain so as to eliminate the possibility of an entirely new board, none of the members of which would be familiar with railway practice.

That is a responsibility of the present government, and I should like to remind my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) of that fact. He made one or two further criticisms, and another one which I shall leave to the last. He blamed the management, and in that connection I am not going to speak at length. I know there have been many rumours and charges about which I am going to say nothing. I believe the report of the committee might be accepted by parliament as speaking for itself. There have been charges of extravagance; something has been said about the building of hotels, and so on. If I so desired I could make comparisons, but I do not intend to enter into that phase of the discussion at all because, as I say, comparisons are odious and would lead only to discussions of no practical value. If there is extravagance I would say that it is a matter entirely within the control of the present government and the board appointed by it. If there is one statement I might make—and I do not wish my remarks to be construed as a criticism of the committee—if there is one thing in connection with which we may have gone a little farther afield than at times I thought we should go, it is that to some extent we were trying to do the work which properly belongs to the board of directors enjoying the confidence of this government.

Then my hon. friend made a further significant statement. He said that there is not enough business for the two railways. Perhaps he is right, but I wonder what inference he wishes the house to draw from that remark. When he makes that statement I think it is due to hon. members that he tell what the remedy should be. He says the railway has not been placed on its feet. I would say to him—and this statement applies to both railways, which are in the same position, although he has seen fit to criticize one and not the other—that those railways are bound by the laws of Canada to charge certain freight and passenger rates. I believe I am stating a fact when I say that if the freight rates in Canada had been as high as they are in the United States the Canadian National Railways would not be registering deficits but would be showing profits. Those lower rates have been for the good of the Canadian people; we have enjoyed lower rates in Canada, although we live in a less thickly populated country than do our neighbours to the south.

I have nothing further to say except that I think my hon. friend from Stanstead did not complete his speech. From beginning to end his words have been full of criticism, and I wonder what good they will do. I do not believe his speech will have a great deal of effect in destroying the confidence of the Canadian people in their National railway system. He has made the statement that the Canadian National Railways control the press—a statement which I regard as an insult to the responsible and respectable press of this country. I do not believe his statement that the Canadian National Railways control the press is founded on fact. I do not believe however that his criticism will have any greater tangible result than had the flight of the swallow against the mountain, of which he spoke. If there is anything in my hon. friend's statement that there is not enough business for the two railway campanies, which railway does he wish to survive. If my hon. friend and the people of Quebec do not know it, I think I am speaking for the people of the province of Ontario and the members on both sides of this house from that province when I say that we have a real confidence and belief in the principle of public ownership so far as the Canadian National railways are concerned.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker one day the member for Témiscouata asked the Minister of Railways:

Is the minister aware that the station at Riviere du Loup is in a deplorable condition and entirely unsuited to the requirements of the officials compelled to remain there?

The minister answered:

The minister is aware that the station is requiring certain repairs. Plans are prepared, and it is proposed to proceed with the work of improvement.

This answer was given by Mr. Blair, the then Minister of Railways and Canals, to a question put by my predecessor, the late Mr. Gauvreau, on February 26, 1900, at page 1006 of Hansard. The station was remodelled and enlarged in 1900, and for thirty-one years there have been no repairs.

Photographs were taken and shown to hon. members on June 10, 1931. It was impossible to take photographs of the inside of the station because of the extreme darkness. That very respectable Conservative paper the Toronto Mail and Empire contained the following statement on June 11:

The photographs were taken with a view to showing proof of Mr. Pouliot's complaints. On the set filed with the clerk, he has marked out what he terms the rats' entrance to the station, the manner in which the roof is warped and the ease with which rain water can—and does, he says—flood the station cellar every time Riviere du Loup has one of its frequent storms.

I wish to thank my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) for the following statement which he made in the railways and shipping committee on June 17:

I have often had to get out at Riviere du Loup in the middle of the night. I have a great deal of sympathy for Mr. Pouliot.

My colleague from Hull (Mr. Fournier) told me that not long ago he visited Riviere du Loup by motor car, and while there he heard a noise on the top of the car. At first he did not know what the trouble was, but eventually learned that the shingles from Riviere du Loup station were dropping on the top of his car.

When the Prime Minister came to Riviere du Loup on July 15, there was a shower, and while standing on the covered platform shaking hands with his friends one of his associates had to hold an umbrella over his head so that he would not be injured by the rain. When His Excellency came to Riviere du Loup, they tried to raise the flag on the station flag-pole, but unfortunately as the pole was broken the flag seemed to be hanging half mast.

Let me now answer some of the objections that have been made by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). On March 31, 1931, he said on page 484 of Hansard:

This station was dealt with as were other matters in the constituencies of other hon. members on both sides of the house, as a building program which could not be gone on with because of the decreased earnings of the Canadian National Railways and because of the large amount of money which this government had to raise for the purposes of the railway.

The same statement was repeated on May 12, 1931. Besides what has been paid for the Montreal terminals in 1930-31, parilament has voted $131,510,400 for capital expenditure of the Canadian National Railways. From September 16 to December 2, 1930, $1,296,-483.34 had been approved for new stations by this government. That is 15 times more than $83,271, which was the amount of the lowest tender. The difference between the appropriation and the lowest tender, $6,135, was 94 times or $575,348.34 less than the amount approved by this government for stations not in the Canadian National Railways budget. (Reference No. 314; Hansard, June 25 and June 29).

The second objection of the Minister of Railways was this, at page 1536 of Hansard of May 12, 1931:

My hon. friend seems to have the impression that the station at Riviere du Loup is the only station or the only railway building of any kind which was not built as originally proposed. Such, however, is not the case.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Of six new stations included in the approved Canadian National Railways 1930-31 budget, it is the only one the construction of which the Department of Railways has refused to sanction, although the same department afterwards approved the construction or completion of five new stations not originally in the approved Canadian National Railways budget. (Reference No. 314, page 4).

The third objection of the Minister of Railways was this. He said, on April 15, 1931, on page 618 of Hansard:

What condition was that cellar in during the five years of the Liberal regime when my hon. friend was sitting behind the cabinet? Why did not my hon. friend have things fixed up during that five years?

In 1925, the first year I was elected, I sent a memorandum to Sir Henry Thornton asking for the building of that station, and I renewed my request every year, but each year Mr Appleton, the general manager at Moncton, replied that the management had to cut expenditures. In 1928 I succeeded in having an amendment made to the law in order to put the old government railways, especially the Intercolonial, under the control of the Board of Railway Commissioners. That is reported in Hansard of April 12, 1928, and of April 23, 1931, at pages 996 and 997. I wish again to thank Hon. Mr. Dunning for the change he made in that respect.

In December, 1928, the Riviere du Loup station was inspected by the provincial board of health, and their report will be found in Hansard of March 31 and of April 15 of this year. The recommendation of the board of health was endorsed in April, 1929, by the chamber of commerce and the city council of Riviere du Loup, as will be found in Hansard of April 15, 1931, at page 614.

On May 1, 1929, Mr. Appleton wrote to the secretary of the chamber of commerce to tell him that it was agreed that the Canadian National Railways would put an item in their budget of 1930 for building a station at Riviere du Loup. In May of 1930 an appropriation of $77,136 was voted in that connection. That will be found in return 313, and in Hansard of September 19, 1930. Tenders were called for in July, 1930, and I quote from the instructions given in connection with the tendering for the station building at Riviere du Loup, as will be found in reference 425, Hansard, June 22, 1931:

The work covered by this contract shall be commenced immediately the contract is awarded, and all the work shall be fully completed not later than February 28, 1931.

On April 23, 1931, I told the Minister of Railways:

If my hon. friend the Minister of Railways were the cleverest lawyer in Canada; if he were as good a lawyer as he is a doctor, I should nevertheless say to him that he has a very bad case.

I was referring to his defence of the decision that had been made.

On April 23 of this year, at page 932 of Hansard, the Minister of Railways said:

So far as I know there is no political patronage in regard to the Canadian National Railways.

I will tell the minister what happened in his absence and in the absence of the Prime Minister. I will give the details of the killing of the proposal to build a station at Riviere du Loup, which is just as interesting as a murder case. At a banquet which took place at Riviere du Loup on December 29, I said:

I am credibly informed that the defeated Tory candidate was in Ottawa on the day when the Department of Railways refused to sanction the construction of the new station at Riviere du Loup. He must have seen the Acting Minister of Railways (Sir George Perley) or communicated directly or indirectly with that department through the Minister of Marine. Either he did not have enough influence to force the minister to reconsider his decision, or he has instigated it. In the first case he is a useless being; in the second case, he is a noxious being.

On January 8, 1931, his companion, Mr. Leo Berube, stated publicly that I should either prove that statement or retract it. Mr. Berube is a lawyer of note, although he has been successively defeated in both the counties of Témiscouata and Kamouraska. He took the stand that the Témiscouata Tories were above reproach. I felt sure that I should be allowed at least to see Mr. Dube's correspondence with the Canadian National Railways and the government, and my surprise was indeed great when it was refused me because Mr. Dube was one of those who said that I should either prove or retract my statement. Instead of giving me a chance to get my evidence, he had that correspondence concealed by marking it personal. Is that good sportsmanship?

Now I come to the personal, private and confidential correspondence. On May 7, June 1 and June 15 I was refused the tabling of the correspondence between Mr. Dube and the Canadian National Railways. On June 5 and June 9 the Minister of Railways and the chairman of the railways and shipping committee told me that the answers to my questions would be given in the House of Commons. That will be found in the report of the railways and shipping committee at pages 5 and 25. On June 10, 1931, at page 2481 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

As the matter to which my hon. friend referred originated last year, it might be considered by the special committee.

The hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugène Fiset) replied:

The chairman of the committee has already ruled that as those questions are on the order paper they cannot be discussed in committee.

I observe by reference No. 355 that the Deputy Minister of Railways wrote to the under Secretary of State on June 8, 1931, as follows:

As the correspondence received from Mayor Dube is marked personal it is not brought down.

I personally objected to the non-production of the personal correspondence of that gentleman with the government. Why did he mark personal even letters that had been partly published in the press? In order to learn why, I had to ask numerous questions. With reference to no member of this house, may I be allowed to quote Job, chapter 34, verse 21:

There is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves.

The production of that correspondence would have saved lots of time. On August 23 Mr. Dube wrote to Mr. Appleton that the contract should be given to the local contractors, etcetera. That "etcetera" means a lot. There were two tenderers. Dumont & Damours, and Jos. Collin. On March 26 he wires to Mr. Dupre:

Dumont and Damours are Pouliot's strongest followers and friends.

That is in reference number 352. There was only another tender from Riviere du Loup, the tender by Mr. Jos. Collin.

On August 30th he wrote to Mr. Appleton asking for the name of the contractor to get in touch with him.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is that?

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Jos. Collin, a good Tory from my county. He is advised that the tenders have been sent to Montreal for final decision. Then he is not any more successful in writing to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), who had declared in the house it was not in the interest of the country nor of the railway to divulge the amount of each tender, and apparently he has not further satisfied his morbid curiosity. I congratulate the Minister of Railways on his discretion in that respect.

On September 4, last year, that gentleman wrote to the Solicitor General:

I will perhaps go to Ottawa during the last week of the special session.

He waited until the Minister of Railways left for Churchill before he came here, for the reason which I have just given.

At what date did Mr. Dubé come to Ottawa? According to Hansard of May 28, pages 2040 and 2041.

The Minister of Railways left for Fort Churchill Wednesday, October 1st, returned to Ottawa Saturday, October 11.

In Le Saint Laurent of November 27 the gentleman in question said that while in Ottawa he had had an interview with the Postmaster General, the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Public Works. On the fifteenth of this month the hon. Minister of Marine wrote me as follows—I translate his letter for the benefit of the house:

Mr. Dubé reminded me that in effect he had come to Ottawa in the company of Mr. Bérubé and that these two gentlemen met me, October 6, a Monday, on the train between Montreal and Ottawa. I remember the occasion well.

In our conversation on the train we discussed general topics. There even may have been mention made of the Riviere du Loup station but not in a way to change what Mr. Dubé wrote me on October 2nd. I did not see Mr. Dubé and Mr. Bérubé again—during their stay in Ottawa.

On October 2nd Mr. Dubé wrote the Minister of Marine insisting on a new building. He was then favourable to the proposal provided that Mr. Collin was the contractor. The Minister of Marine was at his office in Ottawa on October 6 as will be seen on page 3561 of Hansard of July 9. Then Messrs. Dubé and Bérubé came with him on the noon train to Ottawa.

What was their purpose in coming here? On August 20 Mr. Dubé wrote the Board of Railway Commissioners:

We are very anxious that this station shall be constructed immediately.

The same day he wrote to the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson):

Authorization shall be given at once to Canadian National Railways to award contract as soon as possible in order that the work should be started without delay.

And naturally he was recommending a local contractor. He sent a copy of that letter to the Prime Minister, the Postmaster General, the Minister of Marine and the Solicitor General. On September 12 he wrote to the Prime Minister:

The contract shall be awarded without delay.

Collin! Collin!

An hon. MEMBER: Who is Mr. Collin?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Collin is the gentleman who did not get the contract, and because he did not get the contract the station was not built. On October 2nd he wrote to the Minister of Marine:

Nothing shall delay the starting of the work.

On October 4th he wrote to Sir Henry Thornton:

Do all you can to rush that construction.

The travellers suffered a sunstroke on the way to Damascus. Before October 6, everything was going well. On August 9th the Board of Railway Commissioners had issued order No. 45205, reference No. 296, approving plans for the building of the new station. Proposed contracts were forwarded for the consideration of the department after they had been recommended by the board of directors or by the executive committee of the board of directors. My reference is Hansard of June 22, 1931. What was the resolution? There was a meeting of the executive committee of the Canadian National Railways at Montreal on September 2, 1930. Let me quote:

Submitted to the meeting a memorandum dated August 29 from Mr. Hungerford recommending that a contract be placed with the Stewart Construction Company Limited of Sherbrooke for $83,271—the lowest tenderer—for the construction of station building at Riviere du Loup.

It was unanimously recommended that such a contract be made.

It was declared that the immediate carrying out of the above resolution is required. (Reference No. 449.)

Messrs. Dumont and Damours were not recommended, but an outside firm at Sherbrooke—the same firm that two days later was awarded the contract for the station at Levis. This resolution recommending acceptance was forwarded on September 4th by Mr. Fairweather to the Department of Railways and Canals.

Speaking at Brandon, Manitoba, in June, 1930, the present Prime Minister is reported in the Winnipeg Evening Tribune of June 23, 1930, as follows:

I want to say that the Conservatives in power will give the Canadian National management a stronger support and a more disinterested support than they have had under the King administration. There will be less log-rolling and interference. The management will be better able to carry out their policies without politicians butting in and trying to stop them.

Everything was O.K. The only thing the travellers had to do was to stay at home to assure the building of a new station at Riviere du Loup, because the plan had been approved by the railway board and the acceptance of the lowest tender had been recommended by the board of directors; and as the policy of the right hon. Prime Minister was not to interfere with the management of the railway, the station was to be built.

The absent are not always wrong, and I am not putting the blame on the right hon. Prime Minister nor on the Solicitor General because at that time they were at the Imperial conference; the Secretary of State was in Berlin, Germany; the Postmaster General says he has no correspondence in that regard; the Minister of Marine in the letter of July 15 says he did not meet those travellers during their stay in Ottawa; my hon. friend the Minister of Railways was in Churchill. But there was one minister in Ottawa from the province of Quebec—the Acting Prime Minister, who on the 8th of this month said—I am quoting from Hansard, page 3505:

I was not absent from Ottawa a single day during the time the Prime Minister was away from Ottawa last autumn.

Now we come to the second part. While the delegation was in Ottawa on October 6, the matter was before council, although the Minister of Railways was absent from October 1 to 11, as we have seen. In Hansard of May 12, 1931, at page 1538, the Minister of Railways said:

The hon. gentleman has pointed out in this house on a number of occasions that I was up at Fort Churchill when the matter went through council.

In Hansard of June 22, at page 2865, will be found the following:

The matter was still before council when the Minister of Railways and Canals left for Fort Churchill.

According to reference No. 303:

No record can be found of such order in council as referred to by the Minister of Railways and Canals on May 12, 1931, relating to the proposal to build a new station at Riviere du Loup.

On July 16 I put this question on the order paper:

Was the proposal to build a new railway station at Riviere du Loup put before council?

To which the Prime Minister said:

Mr. Speaker, it has been held that this is an improper question.

Thereupon the Speaker declared the question out of order. The matter was important enough to be submitted to council. Therefore could it be decided otherwise than by order in council? On September 24, Mr. Bérubé, one of the travellers, wrote to my friend from Dorchester, (Mr. Gagnon):

We must act quickly—Il faut faire vite!

On the same day that the travellers arrived in Ottawa the secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals wrote to the Canadian National Railways to the effect that the department had refused to sanction the building of the station. Mr. Pugsley wrote to Mr. Fairweather on October 6:

I am to advise that it has been decided by the department—

I ask hon. members to note those words "by the department."

—not to award a contract for the construction of the proposed new station at Riviere du Loup, but to make repairs, etc.

That is reference No. 295. On October 6 the secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals, "acting upon instructions of the acting deputy minister," notified the Canadian National Railways by letter that the department had refused to sanction the construction of a new station at Rivière du Loup. That is reference No. 315, and Hansard, May 28, 1931. Before leaving for Churchill the Minister of Railways said the matter was still before council and that he did not communicate with anyone during his trip. This will be found at page 3048 of the French Hansard of June 22 and Hansard of May 28, He was accompanied by the deputy minister. It is strange that the acting deputy minister takes, proprio motu, such a step. Is it possible that a matter submitted to council was decided not by council not by the minister in charge, not by the deputy minister, but by the acting deputy minister? On June 22, I asked this question:

Under the authority of what minister, acting minister or person did the Department of Railways and Canals make a decision . . . .

The minister said he did not think the question was proper, and it was dropped.

What was the meaning of the refusal of October 6? On October 6 the plans had been approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners and the directors of the Canadian National had unanimously recommended the acceptance of the tender, in accordance with Mr. Hungerford's memorandum. On April 23 the minister said "the directors of the railway work in association with the management." Did the management decide to change their views? In reference No. 314 we find the following:

The Riviere du Loup station is the only one that the department refused to sanction the construction of as, it was alleged, there was no necessity for constructing a new station as with proper repairs, additions and improvements the existing accommodation could be made satisfactory.

On June 29 I asked if someone had reported after September 4, 1930, that it would be improper to build a new station. The answer was: Reference No. 314 contains no reference to any such report. See Hansard of June 29, page 3134. The first report from the railway is dated December 9, 1930; it is a letter from the assistant chief engineer to Mr. Alastair Fraser as follows:

It is quite correct that the railway called for tenders for a new station at Riviere du Loup, but these were entirely too high and it has therefore been decided to thoroughly renovate the present structure in order to meet the requirements of the travelling public.

It was written two months after the decision was made on October 6. The whole amount of each section of vote No. 323, 1930, totalling $51,600,0000 was not spent until three months later on December 31, 1930 (Reference No. 322); it was not spent on October 6. The assistant chief engineer says the tenders were too high. The lowest tender was nearly $7,000 less than the engineer's estimate, while at Levis a contract was approved having to do with a tender which was more than $6,000 over the engineer's estimate.

At last the cat comes out of the bag. Who made a decision so absurd and so diametrically opposed to the policy preached by the Prime Minister at Brandon? Was it an architect, an engineer or at least a foreman? No, it was the boss, the acting Prime Minister. The following appears at page 3561 of Hansard under date of July 9:

Mr. Pouliot: Who was the minister or the acting minister in charge of the Department of Railways and Canals on October 4, 1930?

Mr. Manion: The acting Prime Minister. Between October 1 and October 7 there was no acting minister in charge of the Department of Railways, but the acting Prime Minister could act for any minister, at any time, during the absence of the minister, without an order in council being required.

That is in Hansard for June 22, of this year. I asked if the same thing had been done by the same hon. gentleman (Sir George Perley) in other departments, but the question was ruled out of order. I asked how many times the same gentleman had been appointed acting minister, and that question was also ruled out of order.

In Hansard for June 22 I find the following:

Proposed contracts are forwarded for consideration of the department after they have been recommended by the board of directors or by the executive committee of the board of directors.

Tenders were received at Moncton on August 26, and were submitted by the company to the department, the approval of the department being required because such construction involved a capital expenditure by the Canadian government railways. That is from reference No. 317.

Now I should like to discuss the illegality of such unwarranted intrusion by the acting Prime Minister. According to Halsbury, seventh volume, page 46, the Prime Minister acts as the medium of communication between the cabinet and the crown. This means no administrative duties. He is the first amongst equals. In the revised statutes of 1927, chapter 1, section 31 (f) I find the following:

If a power is conferred or a duty imposed on the holder of any office as such, the power may be exercised and the duty shall be performed by the holder for the time being of the office.

Subsection (1) of the same chapter reads:

Words directing or empowering a minister of the crown to do any act or thing, or otherwise applying to him by his name of office, include a minister acting for, or, if the office is vacant, in the place of such minister, under the authority of an order in council, and also his successors in such office, and his or their lawful deputy.

Chapter 171, section 3, of the revised statutes of 1927 is as follows:

There shall be a department of the government of Canada which shall be called the Department of Railways and Canals, over which the Minister of Railways and Canals for the time being, appointed by commission under the great seal of Canada, shall preside.

(2) The minister shall have the management and direction of the department, and shall hold office during pleasure.

Section 7 of the same chapter is as follows:

The minister shall have the management, charge and direction of all government railways and canals.

The day after October 6 the acting Prime Minister was appointed by order in council P.C. 2349 as acting Minister of Railways and Canals, and acted as such from October 7 to October 11. Perhaps this was done because the banks refused to finance any corporation which had a contract unless the gentleman who had to approve same was appointed acting minister of that department. In the meantime he submitted to council only one order. On October 8, 1930, P.C. 2370 was passed having to do with orders for additions to the station at Levis. See Hansard, June 1, page 2197. Then, at page 482 of Hansard for March 31, of this year I asked the following question:

Mr. Pouliot: Was he appointed acting Minister of Railways and Canals in order to refuse to sanction the construction work at Riviere du Loup?

Mr. Manion: Certainly not.

This is no joke; if an order in council was necessary for the station at Levis how could the acting Prime Minister decide the case of Riviere du Loup in the absence of the minister, and without consulting him? The acting Prime Minister was not in charge of the department, according to the law of the land. The person who was in charge of the department was the Minister of Railways; he was not in Ottawa but he was in charge of the office, and the action of the acting Prime Minister was an unwarranted intrusion. May I repeat here what I have already said this session, that the right hon. Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways never would have done such a thing or made such a decision, if they had been here at the time.

Let me add that the Prime Minister has only the right of supervision over departments, and I contend that that decision of the acting Prime Minister was illegal and void. The province of Quebec has been kind to my hon. friend (Sir George Perley); he has been elected six times in Argenteuil and I regret that in the sunset of his life he has done such injury to a little town of the province which has done so well for him.

On May 22 the minister of railways said:

I do not intend to be bulldozed by the hon. member.

He forgot that the word "bulldoze", according to Webster, means the intimidation of negro voters in Louisiana. Was there a negro in the wood-pile? No contractor but Collin was to be allowed to build the station. His tender was for $44,864 more than the appropriation, for $38,729 more than the lowest tender and for $31,756 more than the railway estimate. He was "the local contractor" who had been recommended so often by Mr. Dubé to the Canadian National and to the government. On October 11, Mr. C. E. Dubé sent to the deputy minister of railways a copy of the letter which every contractor tendering on the Riviere du Loup station received. The letter was dated October 7 and was addressed to "Mr. Jos. . . . . ., general contractor, Riviere du Loup station." The Canadian National were returning his deposit cheque for $2,500 and his employers' liability bond amounting to $10,000. (Reference No. 300). It would be highly interesting to know who were Collin's bondsmen, but at any rate, according to reference No. 466, the bond was returned to Mr. Collin on October 7 last. This person was the highest tenderer, he was guaranteed by bondsmen and Mr. Dubé and Mr. Bérubé argued his case here, but it was impossible even for the Acting Prime Minister to recommend the acceptance of such an extravagant tender. The conclusion was reached, however, that the station should not be built by anyone else, because the profiteers could not have their chance.

According to reference 314, a decision was arrived at on October 4. I had asked whether on that date any letter, memorandum, note or other document had been sent by or had emanated from the member for Argenteuil, in the absence of the Minister of Railways, to the acting deputy minister or to the secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals, with reference to awarding the contract for the construction of the proposed new station at Riviere du Loup. This will be found in Hansard of June 29, 1931, at page 3135. The answer was that there was no such document. On July 8 the right hon. member for Argenteuil said: "I do not keep a diary." On July 13 I inquired whether there had been a sitting of the council on October 4, and the Prime Minister objected to the question. On July 15 the question was ruled out of order. The 4th was a Saturday and the 6th a Monday, and it is improbable that there was a sitting of council on either of those days. No record can be found of such an order in council as referred to by the Minister of Railways in Hansard of May 12, 1931. relating to the proposal to build a new station. (Reference No. 303). There is no written evidence to prove that the decision was made on October 4. Is there not a clerical error in this? It reminds me of the old puzzle: What looks like an egg, is round, like an egg, has a yolk and a shell, and barks? The fellow to whom this puzzle was put replied, of course, "I don't know"; whereupon the answer came, "Why, it is an egg." The other fellow objected that an egg does not bark and the man who proposed the puzzle explained that that was added to make the puzzle more difficult.

May I say that Mr. Dubé and Mr. Bérubé were still in Ottawa on October 7, when the tenders and deposit cheques were returned. On January 8 Mr. Dubé published a letter bearing no date and with the signature of the then Acting Prime Minister, in which it was stated that the writer had not met him for six months. When I asked for the date of the letter the question was ruled out of order. The same ruling was made on July 15, with regard to the request for the production of the entire correspondence between these two parties.

After the delegation had come here the sum of $475,000 was included in the unemployment scheme for a station at Saint John, New Brunswick, and the gentleman of whom I spoke said that, as he had not been elected, he had no promise to fulfil, although his correspondence had been referred by the private secretary of the Prime Minister to the Minister of Labour.

There were protests from the chamber of commerce of Rivière du Loup on November 27, as well as from the board of health. These references can be found in Hansard of March 31 and May 22. On March 27, according to a return, reference 4676, which can be found in Hansard of April 15, the railway board reported to the effect that they had rescinded their first order, approving only the plans for repairs. This is the only matter in respect to which I think the Minister of Railways is at fault, for it could not have been decided without his knowledge. I regret this, inasmuch as I do not blame him for some venial sins of inaccuracy. On May 22, at page 1906, the minister said:

> If the government requests the Board of Railway Commissioners to give Montreal and other interested districts an opportunity to appear in this matter, the Board of Railway Commissioners would hardly dare take any other course.

The present budget of the Canadian National Railways includes $15,000 for repairs. This is absolutely inadequate, because specifications attached to the approved plan of repairs do not comply with the recommendations of the board of health, nor do they contain any provisions for the building of a cellar, the solidifying of the foundations, and the making of a new roof. There was a new protest by the city of Rivière du Loup, on April 13, as will be seen in Hansard of April 23, page 914, Mr. G. Spencer, chief operating officer of the railway board, reported on March 23, 1931, that the matter of a new station might reasonably be deferred for the present. But he cannot state that a new station is not necessary.

When discussing generalities, Mr. Speaker, one seldom comes to a definite conclusion. I have studied a concrete case to learn what had been the relations of the government with the Canadian National Railways in the absence of the Prime Minister and the minister in charge. I regret very much not to have been as pleasant to the acting Prime Minister as was the South American brass band. On May 23, 1931, the correspondent of the Montreal Star wrote:

> In tribute to Mr. Pouliot it should be recognized that, while his persistence may not have succeeded in convincing parliament that the Riviere du Loup station is a national issue, it has resulted in directing attention to other important matters to which the discussion has led.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I suggest to the government that they should cover the illegality of the decision of October 6, 1930, by removing the injustice which has been done to a small centre in the province of Quebec. If not, I will come back again session after session, and when I am asked whether I am downhearted, my answer will be, no.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) on having occupied a great deal of the time of the house in discussing Rivière du Loup station. I shall not comment at any length on his remarks, because I am sure that there is not a member who is not absolutely tired of the hon. gentleman's discussion of this subject. If I had not always found him so genial I should think he was really in earnest in his tirade against me to-day; but my own impression is that he simply wishes to get the matter on record for political purposes.

Mr. POULIOT: No, no.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: He has made a great mystery of the matter—

Mr. POULIOT: The mystery was yours.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman when he was speaking and I would ask him to show me the same courtesy. Now, he has accused me of unwarranted intrusion in regard to this decision about the Rivière du Loup station. I resent that imputation as strongly as I possibly can. I do not think I have ever been known, either in this house or outside, to have intruded into anything with which I had no concern.

This matter which he has discussed at such length is very simple and plain. Hon. gentlemen who are privy councillors know that members of the government frequently have meetings at which no orders in council are passed, but at which various matters of interest at the time are discussed by everyone present with a view to arriving at the best decision in the public interest. This question of the Rivière du Loup station was brought up in that way before the Minister of Railways left for Churchill. At the same time we had before us other proposals for expenditures by the Canadian National Railways, and in regard to a number of these, including the Rivière du Loup station, it was decided that it was unwise to proceed at that time. For that reason no recommendation to council, as far as I know, was ever brought in. But it was decided after discussion among ourselves that it was not advisable to authorize the construction at that time; so that all that happened was that there was no order in council to confirm the proposal of the directors of the Canadian National Railways in regard to the building of this station.

I am quite prepared, as I always am, to take my share of any criticism, and if necessary a little more than my share. In this instance, however, the action taken was that of the members of the government who were present in Ottawa at that time, including the Minister of Railways and myself and others who were there on that occasion. We took the responsibility as a government.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not know whether it is possible to get back from Riviere du Loup station to the discussion of the general principles contained in the report which is before us. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) gave us the impression that he had made his speech because he wished us to love and not to despise our own railroad. If the hon. member was sincere in that desire it seems to me that he took a very strange way of trying to effect the result. It appears to me that his criticism was most unfair. He took this great public enterprise, the Canadian National Railways, and denounced many of its departments and activities without making any comparison with similar departments and activities of its private competitor. I do not know that any blame can be attached to the Canadian National because it has its own publications. As a matter of fact the Canadian Pacific has its own publications which are very carefully edited and distributed. I do not know that any particular blame can be placed upon the Canadian National for having its own telegraph system; the private road has its own telegraph system. I do not know that there is anything reprehensible in the Canadian National operating its own radio. As far as the question of hotels is concerned, it may be that it has built too largely and has catered to a certain element in the community more than it should have, but if it has done that it is because of the influence of big business in the sphere of private competition. If the hon. member had really intended that we should come to love our own national system he would have offered some constructive criticisms by which we could improve the present method of carrying on the work of the road.

The hon. member criticized the scrutiny made by a committee of this house of the estimates of the Canadian National Railways. It seems to me that the work of this committee is one of the finest pieces of work done by the house. I was very much interested a few years ago when the government went so far as to set up a committee of this character. It seems to me that we would be well advised to have similar committees discussing the estimates of the other departments. If the estimates of the Canadian National Railways were discussed in the committee of the whole as are the estimates of the other departments, we would be here until next fall. I think it is an excellent idea that hon. members should be given an opportunity to meet the president and higher officials and discuss in detail the expenditures and policies of the company.

We all recognize that public ownership on a scale such as we have in the Canadian National Railways is altogether new in the history of our country. A fair trial should be given to this organization. What does the hon. member for Stanstead propose as an alternative to existing arrangements? Would he bring back the old patronage system which existed in the days of the Intercolonial railway? I do not think any hon. member would seriously consider that that is the best way to conduct our business. Does the hon. member mean that we should turn over our own road to a private corporation? If he does, why does not he come out and say so instead of trying to persuade this house that he is trying to get us to love our own road? If I have any criticism to make of the Canadian National road and its management, it is that we copy too closely the methods in vogue in private corporations. It is well known that we took over private companies which had become bankrupt. If we had built from the ground up things might have been different, but we all know that it was to save what was left from private enterprise in which there had been multiplications of all sorts that the Canadian National was organized, and gradually developed into the present system.

The hon. member for Stanstead states that those charged with the management of the road know nothing about railroads, they would not know a hay rake from a handcar. That may be a catchy phrase which may be picked up by the press but—

Mr. HANBURY: The hon. member was speaking about the directors, not the management.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. The hon. member stated that they did not know anything about railroading, that they would not know a hay rake from a handcar. I suggest that that is not constructive criticism. If the board of directors is not what it should be, let us have a change. We had one change not so long ago; if desirable, let us have another. It has been thought best that men should be brought in from different professions and businesses and from different geographical points; if that is not a good policy, let us alter our policy. This matter is in the hands of the government. One wonders why a government which has discouraged any adverse criticism from the back benches permits an assault to be made upon the Canadian National Railways by a back bencher. I hope the government is not sympathetic with the viewpoint expressed by the hon. member for Stanstead.

Mr. MANION: I would suggest to my hon. friend that the hon. member for Stanstead has as much right to speak in the house as he has.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I admit that.

Mr. QUINN: The hon. member is the champion of free speech.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should be very glad to think that the hon. member for Stanstead is on his own and is defying the government. I should be glad to find that that is the case, but my contention is that in a great many instances the supporters of the government do not get up and criticize the policies of the government.

Mr. QUINN: We can if we want to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But you do not.

Mr. QUINN: We can do that when it is necessary, but in this case it is not necessary.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to be necessary in this case.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member makes a speech every day, that is enough.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Stanstead would have us believe that the Canadian National had a strangle hold on the press of this country. I do not think that suggestion can be taken very seriously especially when one considers the number of newspapers denouncing the Canadian National Railways. Evidently some papers have not come under the control of the Canadian National.

The hon. member pointed out a fact which I think is evident to everyone, that there is not sufficient business to maintain the road up to its present standard. That is equally true in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but it was not pointed out that in either case the charges must be borne by the people of this country. The idea is so often expressed that it is only in the case of the Canadian National that the taxpayer has to pay when, as a matter of fact, it is equally true of the Canadian Pacific. That railway managed to store away large reserves, some of them hidden, and now in a time of crisis they bring forth those reserves in order to continue partly to pay their regular dividends. That may be legitimate business, but none the less those dividends are being taken out of the pockets of the people who use the railroad. It is a charge on the industry of this country. It is all very well to say that the railroads should pay their way, but they have never done so. If the Canadian Pacific had been left to finance and push through its road, I do not suppose it ever would have been pushed through to completion. We know that enormous grants in land and money were made to the Canadian Pacific, and we know that at that time there was a Pacific scandal comparable to the Beauharnois scandal of the present day. We are inclined to pass over these things because they are so far in the past.

An hon. MEMBER: It does not compare with the present scandal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was serious enough in those days. I do not minimize the seriousness of the present scandal; they are both bad. When we say that our railroad should pay its way we forget that in the earlier stages the Canadian Pacific did not pay its way. It is paying its way to-day because of the high freight rates which were charged. If it is desired that the Canadian National should pay its way, the only fair thing to do is to cut down the enormous capitalization which bears no relation whatever to the physical assets. If we would cut out that part of the capitalization that represents the graft which occurred in the earlier days, perhaps the Canadian National would come nearer to paying its way.

Mention was made, for example, of the enormous load that we carry in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. This is one unit of the system which undoubtedly has led to very heavy losses. The report of the committee states:

> In this respect we wish to point out that the total original cost of this enterprise, which was undertaken solely as the result of the exigencies of the war, was approximately $80,000,000.

In addition to that, throughout the whole period a deficit of over $57,000,000 has accumulated, and this does not include the depreciation on the present boats, which amounts to $17,000,000. I think the members of the committee are to be commended because of so definitely placing this responsibility where it really lies. This big expenditure was undertaken, in the words of the committee, solely as a result of the exigencies of the war. That item should be put in as part of the war expenditure. It should never have been included as a part of the cost of the public services of this country. So again it seems to me that a good deal of criticism is beside the mark when we consider the actual facts underlying the development of the Canadian National railway system.

Mr. CHAPLIN: None of that is chargeable to the Canadian National Railway.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but it was criticized by the hon. member for Stanstead when he was criticizing the publicly owned services. Most of the criticism I think does not bear fairly on the principle of public ownership. It may be that much is to be desired in the management of the Canadian National. Undoubtedly the report reveals that. The recommendations of the committee advocate some very great changes. It seems to me that this is a frank recognition that there is much improvement to be desired in the management of the Canadian National Railway as we have had it in the past. There is one thing that has not been mentioned by way of criticism, on which I venture to interject a few words at this point. I have never liked the idea that the president of the Canadian National Railway, Sir Henry Thornton, should become a bank director, a director of the Royal bank. I know that some differ from me in that regard and consider such a move as essential to the successful carrying on of the road.

Mr. QUINN: He is financially qualified, is he not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly, and there may be certain advantages about it, but there are also serious liabilities, and with a road that is government-owned I do not think it is well for us to ally ourselves with a particular financial group in this country. It is too dangerous.

After reading the report and hearing something of the discussion, it seems to me that one of our chief difficulties lies in this, that because of the competition of the government road with the private road a great many expenditures have been forced upon the public road. Then, again, there is another reason for this large expenditure. I think that to too large an extent the public-owned road has been copying the practices that are prevalent among private corporations. That is undoubtedly true, so that if there is criticism along that line it applies equally, if not more so, to most of our private corporations.

I note that among the recommendations of the committee there is one that, where possible, we should reduce the expenditure on operation and maintenance. We will all agree with that, stated in such general terms, but I hope the committee did not have in mind a reduction in wages; that is the wrong end at which to begin. All our economists to-day are telling us that one of the difficulties in our modern economic structure is that we have given too little in the way of wages and services, and allowed too much in the form of capital expenditure.

Mr. ARTHURS: Does the hon. member refer to wages or salaries?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would include both. As a general principle I say that too little has been given in that form. The hon. gentleman has referred to salaries. He has anticipated what I wanted to say. It seems to me that there is altogether too great a discrepancy between the higher paid and the lower paid, and if we are going to have a reduction of wages and salaries I say let us begin at the top and let the percentage cut be bigger at the top.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If the hon. member will examine the report, he will find that special reference was made to salaries, and nothing was said about wages at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so.

Mr. CHAPLIN: But we did say specifically that salaries should be reduced. Surely that covers the ground.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite in sympathy with that recommendation.

Mr. SHORT: Then why bring in the question of wages at all? It was not referred to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am bringing it in simply because it was not referred to. It might well have been referred to, with a suggestion that wages should not be cut.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There was no intimation of cutting wages.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know there was none, but there has been a pretty general drive to cut wages, and I think the Canadian National Railways have maintained an excellent attitude in that regard. It has reduced wages to a very small extent, and it has not cut off its employees to nearly like the same extent as the privately owned road. On the part of some that policy has been the ground of criticism against the Canadian National Railway.

In reviewing this report may I urge then that while in a general way we ought to try to reduce expenditures, we ought not to permit a reduction of wages. The chairman of the committee has referred to the special section dealing with salaries. Perhaps I might be permitted to read that:

In view of the decreased revenues of the company, and the economies being made in other branches of the service, your committee are of opinion that the executive committee of the board of directors should immediately consider the whole question of salaries, allowances, disbursements, pensions and retirement provisions for executive officers and officials of the company receiving salaries of $5,000 and over, in order that every reasonable and proper economy should be effected.

I agree absolutely with that clause in the committee's report.

Mr. McGIBBON: Are there any clauses the hon. member does not agree with?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was mentioning just now what I thought was one omission. There are two clauses to which I should like to call attention, if only to underline them. Some of us from the west, and I should like to speak for some of the members from the west as the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has spoken for some of the people in Ontario, feel very strongly on this matter of public ownership. Some of us do feel that there has been some slackness in the expenditures of the Canadian National. Some of us feel that there have been expenditures which were not justified, although in fairness it may be said that comparatively only a short time ago we were passing through almost boom times when no expenditure was considered too great. There were these large expenditures on hotels, and so forth, which in my judgment were quite unjustified, and which catered to one particular section of the community rather than to the masses of the people. There are two brief sections in the report which I have marked. One reads:

Your committee while of opinion that many of the salaries are much too generous, and in some instances excessive, accede to the expressed wish of the president that the list be not published for the reasons given by him.

If I understand it aright, the reason for not publishing the list is the reason usually advanced by private companies, that it is a matter of private business and ought not to be given out to the general public. Now, as most hon. members know, I am decidedly in favour of publicity in such matters; I do not think that publicity is dangerous. I can quite well see, however, the difficulties in this particular matter because we are dealing only with our own road. It might very well be that with no basis for comparison the mere publication of certain figures might be misunderstood or misinterpreted. I can understand the viewpoint which was held by a considerable number of members in committee. I cannot however see why the time should not come when the higher salaries in the Canadian Pacific Railway ought not to be published just as much as those in the Canadian National Railway. After all when a road receives so much from the public as does the Canadian Pacific Railway, when it can go to the railway board and ask that freight rates be maintained in order that it may keep up its dividends, I say that the details of the business of the road should no longer be private. There is no good reason why the larger salaries on the Canadian Pacific Railway should not be published side by side with those of the Canadian National Railways.

Then there is the further sentence:

Your committee strongly condemn the practice which has grown up under which the Canadian National Railways are chargeable with large amounts for payment of the social entertainment and other activities of officials on other than official business.

Again let me say that in that regard I should like to endorse the findings of the committee. It seems to me that the practice described in the sentence I have just read is most reprehensible. We are all aware that practices of that sort are commonly indulged in by other great corporations, and the excuse is often made that under our present competitive system unless our road did that sort of thing it might lose business. I do not know if that argument is sound but I do know it is often advanced as one reason why our road in competition with others should resort to such practices. Be that as it may, since the road is government owned, surely scrutiny cannot be too careful or detailed.

I should like to express my hearty concurrence in the recommendations by the committee. My hope is that we may lop off those things which are inimical to the best interests of the road. If housecleaning has to be done, we will have to do that housecleaning, but we must not endanger the general principle underlying the great public utilities of which we are justly proud.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The observations of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), to which the house listened this afternoon, reflect only his own personal views. It is the privilege, I take it, of any hon. member when the report of a committee is presented to make such observations as he may desire to make concerning any particular public matter.

In conformity with that practice the hon member for Stanstead has expressed his opinions. They were stated in terms which represented his own views, and his own views only so far as this government is concerned, with respect to the matters about which he spoke.

I do not purpose to discuss the report or to say more than this, that since I have had the responsibilities of office no matter has given me more concern or pressed more heavily upon me than has the railway situation in Canada. I do think, as I have so frequently said, that it is time hon. members studied the situation in all its ramifications; for we are a people only 10,000,000 in number with railway facilities far beyond our requirements. We have an enterprise owned by the people of Canada who acquired it under circumstances to which I shall not refer this afternoon. In competition with a privately owned road they have endeavoured to maintain that railway system. They have placed money into its operation with great freedom and willingness; they have backed it with a courage and determination which I think at least has satisfied those who had to administer the railroad that nothing any government has done in this country has stood in the way of every reasonable effort being made to advance the fortunes of the railroad When the opportunity comes to discuss the affairs of the railway company I am sorry to find that there is a group which thinks that any criticism constitutes adverse criticism of the ownership of the road. That has not been so. Surely, however, for the same reasons that hon. members criticize expenditures by departments and estimates submitted by ministers, in the very nature of things there should be free criticism with respect to every matter connected with the administration of our own property. If the hon. member for Stanstead expressed his personal views I can only say that he has not expressed the views of the government or those I hold personally. For instance, the board of directors may be all that he says they are. For my part I think they are a reasonable cross-section of the Dominion of Canada, and that in every reasonable way, taking them man for man, they represent the whole of Canada. They are men from every walk of life, men experienced in corporate management, professional men or farmers. If one were to take the trouble to analyze their records he would find that those directors represent in a general way the people of Canada.

Traffic conditions are bad—very bad. Those conditions however are not confined to our own road but exist as well in respect to other roads. It is unfortunate that the mere discussion of a situation should resolve itself into recriminations between individuals. I think the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) was correct when he said that the report of the committee represents a compromise of conflicting opinions. The fact that it was unanimous was to me a matter of great personal gratification, because I had followed the proceedings of the committee only in a casual way, and when I saw that a unanimous opinion had been arrived at I thought the members of the committee were to be congratulated, and the country was to be congratulated upon the fact that it was possible for the committee to arrive at a unanimous opinion. In fact what has been said to-day has only strengthened my personal views.

I think if the house will take the trouble to analyze what has been done since the present government came into office and the effort it has made to maintain the integrity of the property consistently with the obligations which in the end must be borne by the Canadian people, hon. members will be satisfied that no step has been taken other than for the purpose of advancing its well being and proper management. It does not follow, however, that in so doing, hon. members will agree wholly with everything that has been done; for certainly there are many hon. members who will join in the criticisms urged in the report with respect to those three steamships on the Pacific coast. The answer is, however, that this parliament agreed to their operation. It is much to be regretted that we have those three vessels losing such tremendous sums of money and serving no useful purpose. My only difficulty has been to understand how it was possible that they should have been constructed. They are there, however, and we have to deal with the situation as it exists.

I fancy the hon. member for North Waterloo realizes that criticism of that nature is sound and constructive. At the same time there is some force in what was said by the hon. member for Stanstead, that it is pathetic to think we must always be too late. All the thinking in the world will not unscramble that situation. It is there, and our business is to try to meet it. I put it to the members of this house fairly that it is rather an intolerable burden, isn't it, when in addition to trying to provide for the financial situation of the country you have to carry a load with respect to the railways, and find yourself saddled from month to month and from day to day with enormous deficits with respect to the operation of something which a committee of the house think never should have had being? That is a reflection upon all of us, upon this parliament and every hon. member who was in it when the arrangements were made, and upon every government which has had to do with it. There is no doubt that thoughtful people are beginning to realize that fact and to ask questions about it. I realize that in the very nature of things you must expect mistakes to be made; $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 is a big mistake and it takes a lot of money, it takes an enormous amount of traffic to pay the interest on it. When you realize that the boats are not earning their operating costs, not enough to pay for the fuel, the oil, the wages of the crew and the upkeep, it becomes a serious matter. If criticism of that kind is made in a committee of this house—as it was—and that committee arrives at a unanimous opinion —as it did—I think the committee is to be commended for the action it has taken.

I did not intend to make such a lengthy statement because I am not going to discuss the merits or the demerits of the many matters referred to this afternoon. It suffices for my purposes that a committee of this house, representing all parties, having considered thoughtfully and carefully—in so far as it is possible in a limited time thoughtfully and carefully to consider an undertaking of such magnitude with activities which extend not only throughout every province but also into several of the states of the American union—having so considered these matters, have arrived at a report which is unanimous, and I hope it will be unanimously adopted by the house. For no change in policy can ever take place in respect to this publicly owned property unless the people of Canada, speaking through this parliament, so determine, and there has been no evidence of that so far as I have seen.

But I should like to remind those who, like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Woodsworth), talk strongly about a certain policy with respect to the ownership of property, that they must never forget that the true test which in the end will determine the success or failure of the venture is the efficiency and effectiveness of the management; and unless we can get the same efficiency and effectiveness in the management of our own property that private enterprises command in theirs, we cannot succeed. The hon. member for North Waterloo put that very fairly the other day, it struck me. I think that is true. We must get it in our minds that the stake we are playing for is really the success or failure of the great undertaking upon which the Canadian people embarked some years ago, and which succeeding governments have been endeavouring to maintain in a successful manner. If there are differences of viewpoint by successive administrations, I am sure the common sense of the Canadian people will realize that it is not because one party is viewing the undertaking from one angle and another from another; but that the method of approach as to efficiency and economy on the one hand differs from the method of approach as to efficiency and economy on the other hand. That this house must exercise increasing control with respect to expenditures is only axiomatic when you come to contemplate what vast sums are involved, and how they concern every taxpayer in this Dominion. The success of the whole venture rests upon the efficiency of its management; and the efficiency of its management is reflected by the attitude of this parliament, whose members represent the shareholders; for it is an unfortunate fact—I directed the attention of this house to it many years ago—that the only place where the shareholders of this great enterprise can make themselves vocal is in this chamber. That is, we, two hundred and forty-five members, are the shareholders' spokesmen, their proxies and representatives, at the only form of annual meeting that counts so far as this enterprise is concerned. If, seized of that sense of responsibility, we approach the matter from that angle, I think we shall appreciate that the committee did attempt to reconcile divers opinions and opposing views with the purpose of arriving at constructive suggestions and recommendations, and then present a unanimous report. In that sense I think it is an achievement of which the committee can well be proud, and I commend the report to the consideration of every member. But I would not deny to any member on this side or the other the right to express any opinion he feels, but I should like it clearly understood that in so doing he represents his own opinion and not the opinion of myself or of any member of this administration.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) would permit me to follow the Prime Minister?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr Speaker, I shall be very glad to do so if the house will rise at six o'clock, for I wish to make some extended remarks on the hoped-for work of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank my hon. friend. I have but a few remarks to make. The Prime Minister has referred to the anxiety he has experienced since coming into office with respect to this great railway problem. I am sure he could not feel that his anxiety on that score was any greater than was my own at the time, nearly ten years ago, when the Liberal administration assumed office and was confronted with the railway problem that existed at that time. There were then three different railroads or systems, each of which was in considerable difficulties, but all of which have since been combined into the one great Canadian National Railway system. We found that the Grand Trunk Railway system, because of its being in a state of bankruptcy, had been taken over as a government railway by the preceding administration. It was under its old management and control. We found the Canadian Northern Railway, then a part of the government railway system, also under separate management. We found the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, also a part of the government railway system, in the hands of a receiver. The task which confronted the then administration was to bring those three systems—including the old Intercolonial—into one great national system, to find a president who would be a competent executive, and to arrange for a board of directors.

The problem, in a word, was a choice between a monopoly on the one hand or government ownership competing with private ownership on the other. That was the alternative which had to be faced at the outset—whether we should seek to bring about a combination of all the railways in Canada in one great monopoly, and whether that monopoly should be privately owned or government owned. To the government of the day it seemed that the wisest course was to avoid monopoly and to have competition between the privately owned company and the publicly owned company; we believed that as a matter of fact competition would be good for both, that government ownership would have its best trial were it placed in a position of competition with an efficiently run, privately owned system, and that a privately owned system such as the Canadian Pacific Railway would find itself also aided through the force of competition with an efficiently run government owned system.

The decision being to establish of the three railway systems first mentioned a government owned railway system, the next problem to be considered was whether that system should be run by the government under political influence or control, or whether it should as far as possible be removed from such influence and control. The decision reached was to remove the system from government control just as far as was consistent with the circumstances mentioned by my right hon. friend, namely that the people of the country themselves were the shareholders of the system. In establishing the government owned system the object of the government was to give government ownership a fair trial. That was the way in which the policy of the government of the day was presented to the country, and we felt that it would not have a fair trial if there were government interference in the management of the road.

Once it had made up its mind as to the policy to be pursued, the government sought to secure as president and executive head of the new system the best executive that it might be possible to find. It took some little time to discover a competent executive head, but I venture to say that the people of Canada to-day will agree that, having searched a great part of the world as we did, had we searched the world over we could not have found anyone who, in the period of years which has since elapsed, would have given more satisfaction than Sir Henry Thornton has given in the management of the affairs of the road. With Sir Henry Thornton we associated a board of directors, and in order that the system might be free from government control the president and board of directors were given to understand that it was their business to run the Canadian National Railways just as Mr. Beatty and his directors ran the Canadian Pacific Railway. That was the ground on which the position was accepted by Sir Henry and it was the declared policy of the government, the purpose being, as I have said, to give government ownership the fairest trial possible, altogether free from political interference.

Now may I say that it was not without some misgivings that the government entrusted to any group the complete management and control of this great system, misgivings as to the expenditures which might be made, and as to the improvements, extensions and the like which might be requested. There was the further difficulty with respect to any program of railway construction and the like, that not only did the board have to determine its own policy but the administration of the day had to be relied upon to get that policy through this parliament. On more than one occasion, as hon. gentlemen will remember, the board did submit to parliament a plan which they believed to be necessary and which they thought would be most effective. There was for instance the branch line program, which we succeeded in passing through this house but which was defeated in another house. Thereby the railway was prevented from carrying out, at the time thought most desirable, some of the improvements and extensions which the management believed would have advanced the system.

The point I wish to make at the moment is that the government gave to the president and board of directors a free hand; we sought to keep them free from any attempt at political control, and I have yet to hear mention of any influence the government of the day sought to bring to bear upon Sir Henry Thornton and his board of directors other than that of restriction with respect to some of the expenditures they wished to make. It may be, as my right hon. friend has said, that some expenditures have been indulged in that could have been prevented. Some things may have gone a little further than might have been the case if this house had been controlling affairs. No matter who might have been in control there would have been room for criticism. The main point is that the railways have had a chance under government ownership, free from political control, and now we have before us an object lesson as to the possibilities of government ownership on a large scale, as contrasted with the possibilities of private ownership.

May I say that with the greater part of what my right hon. friend has said this afternoon in relation to the report now before the house I am in entire agreement. Personally I am pleased that the committee have found it possible to make a unanimous report; personally I do not regret any criticism which they may have made of what seemed to them extravagance, or of what they have felt to be necessary in the way of cutting down certain expenditures. I know that personally so far as the merchant marine was concerned, I often felt it was very questionable whether those ships should be continued in service year after year at a loss. But it was pointed out to the administration that the Canadian Pacific Railway had vessels afloat which connected its land transportation system with other countries by water routes, and that for the Canadian National Railways to be denied a similar right would be to restrict and handicap that line to the benefit of its great competitor. Arguments of the kind prevailed. If the committee have come to the conclusion, after the experiment has been tried and it has been made apparent that in these particulars the cost is too great, that it will be the part of wisdom to discontinue these services, personally I am inclined to feel that they have given the matter very careful and full consideration, and that their report in that regard should be adopted. As the Prime Minister has said, the committee have gone into the matter in a more detailed manner than is possible in this house at this time. Studying the report as I have, in the light of such knowledge as I have gained in watching the developments of the last ten years, I am inclined to feel that the note of caution which the committee have sounded to the Canadian National Railways, in the matter of limiting its outlays, is very wise. In saying this, I should also say that had there been any attempt on the part of the administration of that day to interfere with the views of the president, and board of directors as to what was most in the interests of the road, the criticism at the time, or today would not have been directed against the Canadian National Railways, but would have been levelled very directly at the late government for having interfered with a government owned system.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, as it will not be possible for me to conclude my remarks before six o'clock I would ask you to call it six o'clock now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. GARLAND: I regret that hon. gentlemen opposite do not see fit to grant me a courtesy which on many occasions we have granted hon. gentlemen opposite. If they insist on my proceeding at this untimely hour of course I must bow to their decision in the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that my hon. friend was courteous enough to allow me to follow the Prime Minister, and probably it was in his mind that the house would grant him the courtesy of beginning his remarks after recess if that were necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not usual to call it six o'clock at 5.45, but if it is the will of the house there is no reason why it should not be done.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SERVICE LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

The house resumed from Friday, July 17, the debate on the motion of Mr. Lawson for the consideration of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Service Loan and Finance Corporation.

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York): There seem to have been more misstatements with respect to this bill than there have been with regard to any other bill that has been before this house since I have been here.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member closing the debate?

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it he is. If any other hon. members wish to speak they should do so now.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): I am very sorry that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) had not the opportunity of explaining this bill, which I think needs a good deal of explaining. Possibly after he had explained the bill I might have changed my opinion with respect to the way I would vote on it should the question come up for a vote to-day. An hon. member, in expressing his opinion on this bill which is now before the house, spoke to me privately of the odious odour cast off by a vicious rodent which he thought was hidden somewhere among its objectionable sections. I asked him what he thought of the principle of the bill and his answer was, "Principle? There is no principle in this bill; but I smell a rat and I think it should be destroyed."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what rats smell like, nor should I care to smell one even if I did suddenly discover its presence in this bill. So far as I am concerned, rats, Al Capone and exorbitant money lenders all smell alike. There is, however, one service which the rat could perform by virtue of its presence in this bill: it could chew the bill up holus bolus, preamble, principle, sections and all, and then make a hasty retreat from this house down Parliament hill, ending its own hideous life as well as the life of the bill at the bottom of the Ottawa river. I think that by this time I have made myself quite plain where I stand on the bill.

Now I have said that I am not aware of the presence of any rat, nor have my nostrils communicated to my mind any inkling of the nature of the beast. But I do see in my mind's eye drops of blood trickling from a pound of flesh held aloft in the hands of those people who would profit by this bill should hon. members present to-day allow it to pass this house. I do not smell a rat, but I do see clots of blood and pieces of flesh smeared and dangling everywhere, the nauseous odour of which even now emanates so strongly from the bill that has been sponsored by the hon. member for West York.

The bill, on the face of it, looks innocent enough; but it is said that the devil is not so bad to look upon if he has a definite place to go and is dressed up in his holiday clothes. The sponsor of this bill would have us believe that the trouble with those who oppose it is that they do not understand it. That is exactly what the woman said when she could not get along with her supposedly worse half —"my husband does not understand me." The hon. member for West York would also have us believe that the bill calls for a paltry seven per cent. That looks lean enough at first sight, but there is more than seven per cent in the bill. To tell the truth, I do not like the bill's hungry look. It looks too ominous to me. It is not so much what this bill says as what it leaves unsaid. The bill does not say, for instance, that a possible seventeen per cent might be charged, but we have the word of the superintendent of insurance as to that potentiality.

May I for a moment digress to ask who the sponsor of the bill may be. I am informed that he is one of nature's noblemen from West York. Look at his kind and genial face, the intelligent features, the broad and noble brow, the light and graceful figure. Can it be that the hon. member who sits over yonder, who has been destined to sit with the mighty, would lend the powers of his intellect to a scrap of paper that is not worth his fettle and that has neither truth nor poetry in it? Is it possible, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for West York does not realize the real import of the bill?

I am still very sorry that the hon. member had no opportunity to give us any further explanation that he might have with respect to the sections of this bill. It is therefore with reluctance in my mind and with alacrity in my heart that I am forced to admit that another promising young member of this house has gone astray. If the hon. member for West York has not yet seen the error of his ways, I would beseech him to repent before it is too late; and if he has any tears to shed I hope he prepares to shed them now. For what the hon. member for West York is doing by sponsoring this bill is virtually putting himself in the place of the rest of the would-be Shylocks behind it who are seeking to obtain the sanction and authority of law, and who, having obtained it must now needs whet their knives to cut the forfeiture from the inevitable bankrupts that would be rendered thereby.

I invite hon. members again to turn their gaze to yonder end of the chamber, in the direction of yonder sponsor of the bill, and try to conjure in their minds a picture of said member whetting his knife on the sole of his shoe and testing its sharpness with one of his long scraggly hairs. Like myself I think you would find it very hard to visualize the dapper young man from West York in any other shape or form than can be seen right now with the naked eye. However, wittingly or unwittingly his support of this bill clothes him with a character which he does not and should not possess. This bill is like the Irishman, it does not know when it is licked. It has been beaten to death and thrown out of the select standing committee on banking and commerce and now it is sneaking back into this chamber virtually asking hon. members to subject it to another annihilation. I wonder whether this bill has as many lives as a cat? If I knew that it had more I would be constrained to speak a little bit longer than I originally intended. It has been killed already but thanks to the serum injected into it by its sponsor, it has come back to life again. It is like the bad penny, always turning up.

It is like the notorious gentleman across the line, Al Capone, full of scars and other bad features, seeking the protection of law in order to carry on his nefarious work. Al Capone got rid of his enemies by mowing them down with machine guns. By means of powder, lead and gun, Capone rid himself of One-Eyed Ike, the killer, Snaky Joe the blackmailer and Bugs Moran the would-be bootlegger king. If I have not named the gentlemen correctly I hope some hon. member will put me right because I am not an authority on these matters. However, suffice it to say, that they were done away with because they stood in the way of Capone's ascension to power as chief cook and bottle washer in his own neck of the woods. Likewise Bill No. 118 does not intend to tolerate any rivals because in paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 5 we read the following:

> The company may throughout Canada—
> (b) notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act, or in the Money Lenders Act, or in paragraph (c) of section sixty-three of the Loan Companies Act—
> (i) lend money secured by assignment of choses-in-action, chattel mortgages or such other evidence of indebtedness as the company may require, and may charge interest thereon at the rate of not more than seven per centum per annum, and may on all loans deduct the interest in advance and provide for repayments in weekly, monthly or other uniform repayments: Provided that the borrower shall have the right to repay the loan at any time before the due date, and, on such repayment being made, to receive a refund of such portion of the interest paid in advance as has not been earned, except a sum equal to the interest for three months,
> (ii) charge, in addition to interest as aforesaid, for all expenses which have been necessarily and in good faith incurred by the company in making or renewing a loan authorized by the next preceding subparagraph (i), including all expenses for inquiry and investigation into the character and circumstances of the borrower, his endorsers, co-makers or sureties, for taxes, correspondence and professional advice, and for all necessary documents and papers, two per centum upon the principal sum loaned,

This bill would first get rid of its enemies. Enemy No. 1 is the Interest Act; enemy No. 2 is the Money Lenders Act, and enemy No. 3 is the Loan Companies Act. In justice to this bill it must be said that it does not murder these acts, it merely ignores them contemptuously. Al Capone puts his enemies on the spot and then snuffs them out forever more; this bill just takes them off the spot and renders them impotent. It adds insult to injury by saying to the aforementioned acts: You're only a trio of palookas, deadbeats and has-beens who do not mean a thing in my life. To all this the hon. member for West York chants "Amen." After taking its enemies, as it were, for a ride, the bill then goes on to state how it is going to hold up the public. It starts out innocently enough with the statement that all that will be asked is a measly seven per cent, but as we go on we see the said sum swelling up like the pumped flat tire of a tourist's bus. This bill has contracted another old Capone custom, that of collecting toll. It has contracted the disease of the gimmes; it has "gimme this," "gimme that" and "gimme the other thing."

Mr. FACTOR: I rise to a point of order. I submit that the hon. member has no right to compare legislation sponsored by another hon. member to the methods used by Al Capone.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house has no information as to what Al Capone is.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I am merely trying to convey to the house the nefarious character of the legislation we are asked to pass. The reason I have compared it to Al Capone is because he is the best parallel of which I know. I have just as little use for Al Capone as has the hon. gentleman who just interrupted me. I have said that this bill has contracted the disease of the gimmes. In other words it would do exactly what Al Capone is doing in Chicago. The charges permitted by this bill seem to be unlimited. I might point out that the company behind this bill is operating already under a provincial charter but it wants to extend its tentacles to the rest of Canada. That is just another old Capone custom; he, not being satisfied with his native haunts of Cicero, must extend his operations to the other wards of Chicago. The seven per cent mentioned in this bill is too much like the old ditty of the spider and the fly to be genuine. The company, being the spider, virtually says to the people, who are flies, what is exemplified by the following verse:

Will you walk into my parlour
Said the spider to the fly,
'Tis the prettiest little parlour
That ever you did spy.

My advice to the people of Canada and to hon. members of this house is:

But if the fly is wise
He never would go in;
He would know very well
There was nothing there for him.

That just about expresses my opinion with respect to the bill that is now before the house. Another hon. member on Friday last said that this company would lend only to endorsers and that the main security on which it would lend money was simply that of two co-signers. But how about section 5 of the bill which reads:

The company may throughout Canada:—
(a) buy, sell, deal in and lend money on the security of conditional sales agreements, lien notes, hire purchase agreements, chattel mortgages, trade paper, bills of lading, warehouse receipts, bills of exchange and choses-in-action; and may receive and accept from the makers, vendors or transferors thereof guarantees or other security for the performance and payment thereof and may enforce such guarantees and realize on such security;

Does that section which I have just read justify the supposed innocence which the hon. member for West York, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis), and some other hon. members who spoke on Friday night would attribute to this bill? Not if the inevitable word means anything.

This bill has already been killed in the banking and commerce committee. It now comes stalking back into this chamber like a ghost to haunt hon. members and to call forth nightmares in what otherwise would have been their more or less peaceful sleep. I repeat, I do not like this bill's lean and hungry look. I like neither its principle nor its provisions. Furthermore, I do not think this is an opportune time to pass a bill of this kind. When the majority of the people of Canada are clamouring for cheaper credit, for the nationalization of our banks, for an equalization of agriculture with other industries, for the suspension of the redemption of Dominion notes in gold, for the depreciation of our currency, and consequently for increased purchasing power, it seems to me that it is the height of audacity to ask parliament at this time to pass legislation the only result of which can be to fatten the pocketbooks of a small group of shareholders at the expense of a duped and unsuspecting public. It is said that these three acts, the Interest Act, the Moneylenders Act, and the Loan Companies Act, are somewhat in the nature of a financial bible. We will call the Interest Act the Bible, the Money Lenders Act the Koran, and the Loan Companies Act the Talmud. Surely nobody but the devil would like to get rid of three such books as those, and I think it is very devilish for this act to try to get rid of such noble acts as we have passed in parliament in times gone by. At a time like this, the house should not countenance a bill of this nature. It is not so long ago that one of the ablest men in the House of Commons, a very brilliant minister on the other side of the house, had a great deal to say about credit. I quoted from a report in one of the newspapers:

In the meantime Hon. Robert Weir, federal minister of agriculture, has been engaging with the banks in a debate over credits to farmers who have still substantial equities in their farms, own stock and implements and buildings, but who have because of low prices run out of ready cash for winter supplies and spring operations. The strength of Mr. Weir's position is that he was recently out west and while there was given authenticated cases of refusal by banks to loan money even where the security was of a high type.

The banks have answered him by challenging him to produce the evidence of what he alleged, but that does not embarrass Mr. Weir, because he has the goods in his office here.

I wish he would show the goods to the hon. member for West York:

He is taking his time in answering the banks because he has been invited to speak in Montreal to the Canadian Club next Monday on the western situation, and to the business men of that city he will quote verse and chapter to prove his assertions.

I hope he will quote verse and chapter also to the hon. member for West York:

Mr. Weir's object is not that of developing sectional feeling or of castigating the banks, but of taking away a weapon which he feels may otherwise become a powerful one in the hands of professional western agitators, who are making hay while the sun of prosperity is in temporary eclipse. The federal minister is determined to see that the western farmer who is reasonably entitled to help gets it, and has warned that if the banks will not provide such assistance, someone else will.

Does that jibe with what the hon. member for West York would have us believe to-day in respect of the bill now under consideration? I do not think it does. I think that he could take a good lead from one of the most billiant ministers on the other side of the house.

I wish to quote from another newspaper about what happened to a farmer out west, because I think it is relevant to the question under consideration, and I wonder how this bill would help a farmer such as the one I am going to read about. I believe that hon. members are already acquainted with this story, but it is so powerful in its influence upon the argument I am advancing that I cannot refrain from quoting it again:

The story concerns a farmer in the Vegreville district of northern Alberta, who was required to make immediate delivery of certain grain which had been assigned to the bank as security for a past-due note. Obedient to the banker's instructions, the farmer forthwith hauled the first load to the elevator, but it was pronounced of low grade and rejected on account of its moisture condition.

The farmer was in a quandary both as to what he should do about his rejected grain and his past-due note, when suddenly an inspiration struck him. He had assigned the grain to the bank. The bank had demanded settlement of his note and, since the elevator had refused to accept the grain for storage, the logical thing to do was to deliver it to the bank.

Accordingly he drove over to the bank, backed up to the rear door, and before police arrived he had succeeded in shovelling the bulk of the grain in on the bank floor. He still has the past-due note and is $25 poorer, this being the penalty exacted for illegal tender.

There is a sequel, however, even to this. Having reloaded the grain, Mr. Farmer was still at a loss as to how he should dispose of it. This problem he solved by dumping it by the roadside as he proceeded back to his farm. Thus the episode would have closed, but for the fact that a neighbour's horse spied the wheat, ate it, swelled up and died. Now the hero of the story faces a suit for damages.

I wonder to what extent a farmer in that situation would be benefited by the bill now before us? It is hard enough to-day for any farmer in the west to get a loan from a mortgage company or bank, let alone a company like this which is going to charge, not 7, but 17 per cent, according to the evidence of the superintendent of insurance before the banking and commerce committee. I think hon. members would like also to know the view of the farmers with respect to the matter of credit. Let me read from a resolution passed in the city of Calgary on July 23, 1931:

That we as delegates assembled recognizing the inadequacy of the existent credit system in meeting present economic stringency and believing that adequate distribution of credit is absolutely essential to the carrying on of the agricultural industry recommends:

(1) That this organization continue to advocate at all times the complete nationalization of our credit system.

(2) That as an immediate measure the federal government take steps to organize a federal reserve bank of issue and discount which bank shall be entirely under government control and shall provide credit at a reasonable rate of interest for all necessary productive and commercial enterprises.

We are convinced that the above proposal is imperative in order to get away from the present intolerable position in which the credit requirements of the public in general are sacrificed to the professed necessity of the charter banks to protect to the utmost their savings deposits.

(3) We specifically recommend that the directors of the wheat pool should thoroughly canvass the possibility of their financing the marketing of their grain through utilization and extension of our present finance act.

A further resolution was passed relevant to the matter of interest:

Interest: In view of the present prices of farm products this convention recognizes that the accumulation of interest at the rates charged by many credit organizations constitute an intolerable burden and will greatly delay the return of agriculture to normal conditions and urges

(1) That the federal government by appropriate legislation definitely fix a maximum legal rate of interest which may be collected in any proceedings with adequate penalties for non-compliance.

(2) That as soon after this convention as possible the executive confer with the various organizations of creditor interests with a view to effecting voluntary reductions or remission of interest rates on overdue accounts.

(3) That in the event of the failure of these negotiations the government concerned be urged to pass such measures as may be necessary to meet this situation by way of compulsory adjustment.

(4) That this convention protest against the prevailing practice of the charter bank charging higher rate of interest for doing business in western Canada than in eastern Canada, and that every effort be taken by the organization both by conference with the banks and by recommendations to the government to remove this inequality.

Notwithstanding this resolution, if the bill now before us were allowed to pass the company would be in a position to extend its tentacles out of the poorer sections of Alberta.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Not yet. This bill is a hold-up bill. It starts out in true Al Capone fashion by trying to shelve three legislative measures which might stand in its way, and then there is set forth a well laid plan to fleece the Canadian public. I do not think the house would be well advised to emulate any of the methods of Al Capone. There is one ruse however that we might be justified in adopting, and that would forever react to the credit of this house, namely to put Bill No. 118 on the spot and kill it deader than a door nail.

I move Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "be" and substituting the following "referred to the committee of the whole."

Mr. J. EARL LAWSON (West York): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that apparently the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) intended to compliment me upon my intellectual powers I regret that I am not sufficiently nimble witted to follow through the maze of his mixed metaphors the ideas which in the main he was endeavouring to express in connection with the bill.

I shall not ask the house to consider the bill either from the standpoint of my intellect or my personal appearance but rather on the merits of the bill itself. I had endeavoured to avoid taking up the time of the house in a discussion of the bill by moving that it be recommitted to the select standing committee on banking and commerce where I think its provisions might have been more properly and readily discussed than in the house. But as my hon. friends either by the use of vituperous language or strong statements and allegations have seen fit to cause a discussion in the house on the bill I crave the indulgence of hon. members for a few moments in order that I may lay before them what I conceive to be the intention and purposes of the proposed legislation.

In so doing may I at the outset ask hon. members to bear in mind that the bill now before them is in terms almost identical with those of two or three bills of incorporation which were previously passed by this parliament. In one case legislation was passed in the year 1928 and an amendment passed thereto in the following year to increase the rate of interest that particular company was entitled to charge.

Mr. SPENCER: Shame.

Mr. LAWSON: I cannot hear my hon. friend. Before proceeding to deal with the actual terms of the bill, in view of the gratuitously insulting remark offered me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I feel constrained to advise hon. members of this house that I have not any interest of any nature or kind, professional or financial, in this bill. I sponsored the bill merely at the request of a fellow practitioner, the Ottawa agent of the solicitor for this particular company. That, Mr. Speaker, is the only connection I have with the bill.

To illustrate to this house the extent to which some hon. gentlemen have gone in opposing the bill, I would ask hon. members to recall the argument made the other night by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). He dilated at great length upon section 8 and endeavoured to make it appear that because the section provided that certain sections of the Loan Companies Act were not applicable to this company, therefore this company was being given some special pivilege or special concession. Nothing could be more misleading. Do not misunderstand me. I do not allege that the hon. gentleman deliberately misled the house; I think rather his statement was made in ignorance of the Loan Companies Act, because every single section of that act which by section 8 of this bill is not made applicable to this particular company confers some special privileges upon companies to whom that act applies. And so the effect of section 8 is not to amplify the powers of this particular company, but to take from it some of the powers which may be exercised by any loan company.

Mr. NEILL: Does that apply to the other acts that I also mentioned, a large number of the sections of which are eliminated?

Mr. LAWSON: I will deal with them in a moment; I am taking one part of his speech at a time. Then my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) had a special theme for the speech which he delivered in opposition to the bill. I ask hon. members to recall the number of times that that hon. gentleman has stood in his place and related to those of us who were within hearing the terrrible atrocities that were being perpetrated by the banks upon the farmers of western Canada. How well do we recollect his telling us that in spite of the ample security which his constituents had to offer, the banks would not make them loans. How often have I lent a sympathetic ear to him and to his colleagues in their appeal for the establishment of an intermediate credit institution because the banks were utterly failing to meet the credit situation in this country, particularly in the western provinces. In view of these statements made by the hon. member, I would ask the house to listen to this gem which fell from his lips the other night as the theme of his speech, when he said:

> If anyone wanting to borrow money has any security at all to offer and is a good risk, our present banking facilities are available.

Then my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) appeared to work himself into a state of frenzy over the fact that although this bill provides that notwithstanding anything contained in the Interest Act, or in the Money Lenders Act, or in paragraph (c) of the Loan Companies Act, and that in certain hypothetical circumstances which were stated to the superintendent of insurance, he answered to the effect that in such a hypothetical case, but one not likely to occur in actual practice, it would be possible for the total charges for interest, services, collections, and so on, in the event of the debtor defaulting, to amount to the equivalent of 17 per cent interest. Let me ask my hon. friend if he has read the provisions of the Interest Act? I would call his attention to section 2:

> Except as otherwise provided by this or by any other act of the parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact on any contract or agreement whatsoever any rate of interest or of discount which is agreed upon.

That is one of the provisions which would be beneficial to this company if it had as its objective the exacting of usurious rates as alleged by my hon. friend. But that power is taken away from the company by this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me be very frank and say to the house that this bill has as its objects of incorporation: (1) to permit the acquisition by this dominion company, what is in effect an amalgamation, of two provincial corporations now carrying on business in the province of Ontario; (2) to overcome the provision of the Money Lenders Act which stipulates that on loans of less than $500 a certain limitation is put upon the charges wihch may be imposed for interest, and so on. I make that statement very frankly. This bill proposes that in substitution for that provision there shall be imposed upon this company the several limitations which are set out in the bill, including government inspection of its operations by the superintendent of insurance. May I ask hon. members to bear in mind that, subject to the provision of the Money Lenders Act which I have outlined, individuals may on loans in excess of $500 charge any rate of interest that they may desire provided it is stipulated in writing; but by this bill this company is restrained from exercising that privilege. By the way, that provision in the Interest Act has no relation to real estate mortgages.

[Mr. Lawson.]

Again I come back to another point raised by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni. He seemed to think that it was a terribly iniquitous thing that the rate of interest prescribed by this bill should be allowed by way of discount on the amount loaned. May I point out to him that for years and years and years money has been borrowed and loaned on second mortgages, and many of us—including myself—have been glad to borrow money on second mortgage and accept from 20 to 25 per cent less than the face value of the mortgage, repaying the principal by quarterly instalments spread over a period of five years, and paying interest, not upon the actual amount advanced but upon the amount specified in the mortgage deed. There has not been any great howl or any loud complaint, so far as I have heard, from those who have raised money by way of second mortgage, or from those builders who discount their second mortgages in order to get capital with which to continue their operations.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that this bill is in almost the exact terms of bills incorporating other companies. If my hon. friends feel that there are not sufficient safeguards in the bill to protect the interests of the public who may wish to deal with this company surely the proper course is to raise these objections before the banking and commerce committee; let us amend the bill so that it will protect the public, if protection is required, and do not let us capriciously refuse this company incorporation.

My hon. friends have made a great deal of the fact that before the banking and commerce committee the superintendent of insurance said, in reply to a hypothetical question, that it might be possible for this company to collect an amount which would be equivalent to 16 per cent or 17 per cent interest. I think in fairness to this house those hon. gentlemen should have advised the house that the superintendent of insurance approved of this bill; that the superintendent of insurance advised the committee that two similar companies were already operating, that his inspection of one company disclosed that it had on loan some $600,000 but up to date had not paid one cent of profit to the shareholders, because none was available; that the superintendent of insurance said that from his inspection he found everything in order and that the department had not received a single complaint from any person.

I am quite free to confess that there may be those holding the view that it is not in the public interest to encourage the borrowing of money by those who have not such securities to offer as would be accepted by banks or loan companies, but it must be remembered that, under the Loan Companies Act, loan companies can loan only up to sixty per cent of the value of the security offered. To those hon. members who hold this view I do not attempt to advance an argument in favour of this bill, except to say this: If other similar companies are in operation; if they have been successful in meeting a public need; if there has not been public complaint, why discriminate against this particular bill?

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): As a member of the banking and commerce committee I am somewhat surprised to see this bill coming before the house. I thought it was killed for all time; if it is not it ought to be. We on the western prairies do not want a bill of this kind; we are looking for cheaper money. This bill bears every resemblance to a sign I have seen hanging in front of some offices in the larger cities, consisting of three brass balls. The farmers of western Canada do not want to pay 17 per cent; they do not want to have chattel mortgages or other indebtedness, and I cannot understand the hon. member sponsoring a bill of this kind. I wonder why the hon. member did not state what would be the fee for drawing the documents in connection with the loan of money.

Mr. LAWSON: I can give my hon. friend that information now. The fee is limited to $10 by the bill.

Mr. MULLINS: I do not know what the limit would be going in, but I remember that in the old days it was plenty coming out. I remember in the pioneer days paying 20 per cent for the loan of money from the same sort of outfit, and we struggled and worked to get out of the clutches of those people. We will not have them back on the prairies if I have any say as a member of parliament.

I am not going to take up very much of the time of the house. I would not like to couple up this bill with Al Capone; I do not know anything about him, but I will say I am absolutely opposed to this legislation in any shape or form. On the prairies we want a lower rate of interest, and we do not want any organization established by this side of the house which will extract any such interest rates from the people of Canada. We want money at the lowest rate possible from banks and mortgage companies.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I was very glad indeed to hear the statement of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) to-night, although I am sure it was not necessary for him to explain to the house that he had no personal interest in the bill. I am quite sure we all know that he is only performing his duty as a member of this house in bringing forward this measure for consideration; there is no question of anything else in my mind.

I would submit, however, that he has failed to give a really sound reason why this bill should be recommitted. In the select standing committee very careful consideration was given this measure; we had all the provisions explained in detail, and my hon. friend did not throw any additional light on the bill by his remarks to-night. He told us we should send this bill back to the committee, but he did not say on what grounds that should be done. Does he mean to infer that the consideration given this bill previously was not careful consideration? Does he mean to suggest that the committee was remiss in its duty, that it did not go into all the details, that it did not understand the principle involved in the bill? Or does he mean to suggest that if he had been present he could have thrown more light on the matter and presented the bill in better form and in a more eloquent way? He did not even say that; if he had made that argument at least it would have been one reason why we should recommit the bill, but there is no suggestion of any amendment to the bill; there is no charge that we failed to consider it adequately; there is no argument offered why it should go back. We are only told that my hon. friend would like it to go back. I should very much like to please him; he is very genial and is an excellent colleague in this house, but I should like some reason for an action of this kind. While I appreciate the splendid presentation he made to-night; while I appreciate his erudition and knowledge of the laws which are involved, I was disappointed in that he failed to give us a real reason why we should recommit the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for the consideration of private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to consideration of the motion for the adoption of the report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

PRIVILEGE—MR. NEILL

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I rise to a question of privilege before we proceed with the discussion; I think a matter of privilege is always in order. Yesterday afternoon I made a statement in this house which was later contradicted by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I have in my hand proof that I was right, and I wish to clear up the matter now. I will require to read only a couple of sentences. At page 3947 of Hansard, I said:

I am rather surprised that the Prime Minister has announced what really is a very important departure of policy at this late stage, and in a rather casual way, connected with a bill that does not immediately refer to that matter.

I was referring, of course, to the suggestion of a contributory system of old age pensions. At page 3949, the Prime Minister said:

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), for some reason best known to himself, said that in my remarks to-day I had proposed a policy. I did not do that, nor had I any intention of so doing. I said to him and to the committee that when the Old Age Pensions Act was being considered we had discussed the question of a contributory system.

Later on he said:

I said this without in any sense indicating that it could be treated as a policy.

At that very moment the Prime Minister held in his hand Bill 136, to amend the Old Age Pensions Act, the preamble of which contains the following language:

And whereas it is desirable that a system of old age pensions should be established on a contributory basis as a national undertaking—

If that is not a definite and new policy I do not know what it is.

Mr. BENNETT: Preambles to bills are not policies; surely the hon. member knows that. This is not a matter of privilege at all.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chaplin for concurrence in the third and final report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I feel I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without once more making a plea to the now quite genial Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and the often genial Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for the construction of the Peace River outlet at the earliest possible moment. It may not be amiss at this stage briefly to review the history of this proposal.

It is some seventeen years since the agitation began for a Peace River outlet. Nine years ago in this house, and again in 1923, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) moved resolutions asking for the construction of the outlet. The persistent efforts of the settlers in that territory were apparently without avail. In both years, 1922 and 1923, the pioneers of that country sent down to Ottawa at their own expense delegations to interview the then government. Nothing was done. As a result of the agitation by my hon. friend from Peace River the house in 1922 voted the sum of $50,000 for a reconnaissance survey. This sum of money was, of course, wholly inadequate to undertake any comprehensive survey of the passes out of the Peace River district to Vancouver, and in 1923 it was found necessary to vote a further sum of $75,000. With this vote a fairly complete survey was made of a route between Aggie, on the Edmonton Dunvegan line, about 200 miles northwest of Edmonton, and Obed, a point 200 miles west of Edmonton. Following this, and early in 1924, a meeting was held at the office of the then Minister of Railways, the Hon. George P. Graham, to discuss the whole question. There were present at that meeting the following gentlemen: Sir Henry Thornton, Mr. E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Hon. Herbert Greenfield, then premier of Alberta, the Hon. Vernon Smith, Minister of Railways and Telephones in the Alberta government, Mr. W. F. Maclean, M.P., Conservative member for Toronto, Mr. D. M. Kennedy, M.P., and the Hon. John Oliver, premier of British Columbia. As a result of that meeting it was agreed that the two railways, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, should get together and undertake an examination into the available routes out of the Peace. This was done, and the report made to the Minister of Railways was tabled in the house in 1926. This report, an important one at that stage, was signed by five engineers, two of them representing the Canadian National Railways and three representing the Canadan Pacific. The report recommended the Obed route as the best, after an examination of the Peace pass, the Pine pass, and the Monkman pass routes. In the year 1924 the Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), made a tour of western Canada.

Mr. MANION: Where was that meeting held?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the office of the Minister of Railways. In 1924 the then Prime Minister made a tour of western Canada, and speaking in the Presbyterian church in Edmonton—an estimable place in which to make definite promises—he pledged himself in such a decided way that headlines appeared in the following day's paper like these:

King pledges self to the Peace River cause. Premier promises outlet to Pacific just as soon as humanly possible. Railway will be built, declares Prime Minister at a mass meeting here. Government has but minority in Commons; says times are now difficult and everybody must have a little patience, but Liberal party is not falling down on any of its pledges.

I do not wish unnecessarily to remind hon. gentlemen of promises they have made, but I want to place before the house the fact that both political parties in this country are definitely and irrevocably pledged to the construction of the Peace River outlet. That is my sole object in referring to this promise. I quote from the speech made by the then Prime Minister:

There is to the north of this city a great tract of land that is crying out for development. The Peace River country is amongst the richest in Canada—

That statement has been more than borne out by the experience of the years that have passed.

—but before the proper development of that country can take place an outlet to the Pacific coast is an absolute necessity. I pledge myself—

That reminds me of the manner in which the pledges of the present Prime Minister were made.

I pledge myself that as soon as it is humanly possible the great Peace River country will be given that measure of railway relief that will bring to the pioneers of that country the outlet they have been so long denied, and will open up the country for prospective settlers. I must, however, sound the same note to you here as I did to the citizens of Saskatoon. The times that we are passing through are very difficult, and I would ask you to have a little patience, and in as short a time as possible a railway outlet will be provided for Peace River and northern Alberta districts that will open up an era of prosperity for that province which will not be equalled by any other province in Canada.

At this stage I submit this thought, which I will develop later, that the time to undertake great public projects of this kind is not in a period of prosperity but in a time of adversity. At that time we were passing through one of those minor depressions, and the Prime Minister of the day used that depression as an excuse for avoiding the work. The country steadily emerged from that period of depression into what was described by the Liberal party then, as it has been described since, as the greatest era of prosperity that Canada had ever seen. The Minister of Finance of the late government was wont to talk in this house fervently of the buoyant revenues of the country, of our expanding foreign trade, of the tremendous development of transportation, of the increased production of goods in Canada. Yet no Peace River outlet was constructed. It could not be constructed in bad times, it was said, and it was not constructed in a prosperous period.

Now, that I may link up the other part of the project with this, may I submit to the house a statement made by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in parliament, following that declaration of the present leader of the opposition. On October 1, Mr. Meighen, speaking also in Edmonton, said:

I have always urged that the north country should have railway relief. I cannot be accused of making futile promises such as the Hon. Mackenzie King promised in the speech from the throne at the opening of the last session of parliament when he stated that he was going to give railway relief to the north country, and nothing has been done.

No; but if Mr. Meighen and his party were elected it was to be one of their first undertakings. The report of the five engineers to which I referred a moment ago was tabled in the house in 1926. As hon. members will recollect, 1926 was the year of that hectic and stormy session when no one knew what the government to-morrow was likely to be. It was the hectic session of the Customs scandal, during which two governments went down to defeat. During that session a proposal was made in the house, though never acted upon, that instead of constructing an outlet, a rate ought to be struck on the basis of mileage—the mileage of a direct outlet instead of the actual mileage by Edmonton. Nothing, however, was done in this connection. In the following session of 1927, the hon. member for Peace River moved the following motion:

That, in the opinion of this house, the time has arrived for the commencement forthwith and the completion in the near future of a direct railway outlet from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast.

That motion, which was in keeping with the definite pledges made by both the Liberal and Conservative parties of that day, was resisted in this house. Hon. Mr. Dunning, then Minister of Railways and Canals, objected to it and it was referred to the committee on railways and canals, along with the report of the five engineers. During the investigation held before that committee it was found on examination of the report that the Obed route was the only route of the four routes possible of which a complete survey had been undertaken and that the reports in connection with the Peace and Monkman passes were mere guesswork. The committee then brought in what amounted to an innocuous recommendation to the effect that a continuous study of the development of the Peace River district and the outlets should be carried on. To the motion for concurrence in that report the hon. member for Peace River moved an amendment calling for an immediate and complete survey of those passes which had not yet been surveyed, namely, the Peace, the Monkman and the Pine passes. The vote on the amendment was 87 for and 97 against. The then Minister of Railways promised that in any case the government would ask the Canadian National Railways to complete the surveys to a stage where they would have sufficient information to be able to say, when it was determined to build the line: This is the territory through which it should pass.

Mr. Murray Hill, of the Canadian National Railways, was sent out through the mountains in 1928. He made a complete survey of the approach to the Peace pass from the north side of the Peace river and between the Peace river and Dunvegan. Mr. Murray Hill who is an estimable engineer possessing quite a reputation reported definitely against the Peace pass route and recommended that further surveys be undertaken to show how impossible that route was. It happens that the crossing at Beatton river and the approach to the canyon at Hudson's Hope along the banks of the Peace river is made at a point where there are exceedingly steep banks which slide during times of rain. At this point I would like to direct attention to the last paragraph of Mr. Murray Hill's report, which reads as follows:

> The Peace pass seems to be the most favoured. To my knowledge, there have not been any lines run through this route, either on the north or south side of the Peace river. I would therefore suggest that these surveys be made in order that definite information may be available to show the difficulties in construction and operation of lines over these routes. The Obed route, from information available, is unquestionably the best Pacific outlet for the Peace River country as a whole. It is, however, unpopular with certain sections of the country. Actual surveys have been made over this route and also the Pine pass route. In order that a correct comparison may be made between all routes, surveys must be made over the other two, viz: Monkman pass and Peace pass routes.

Mr. MANION: Who was that?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Murray Hill of the Canadian National Railways. Up to this stage the principal objection to the construction of the outlet seems to have been that there was not sufficient information available to justify the selection of any definite pass through which the line should run. During the debates in this house it became apparent that both the government and the railways were reluctant to undertake the construction of this outlet because of the position in which they found the northern railways of the province of Alberta. This was apparently the chief stumbling block in the way of definite and immediate action. Both Alberta and British Columbia were directly interested. British Columbia owned the famous Pacific Great Eastern Railway and whatever route might be selected might affect the business of that line as well has have an effect upon the political and economic life of the province. That province as well as Alberta was directly interested in whatever route might be selected. The objection in connection with the ownership and operation of the railways in northern Alberta has now been removed.

Before I continue may I mention that the Minister of Railways of that day, the Hon. Mr. Dunning, referred to the Alberta railways and the Pacific Great Eastern railway as being white elephants and suggested that one of the reasons for difficulty in settling this matter was that the premiers of Alberta and British Columbia were doing their best to slough off these white elephants on the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Dunning, on one occasion, called attention to the fact that the provinces were unable to pay the cost of operation of their railways. I am afraid that Mr. Dunning was sadly mistaken in his facts, because the first year of operation by the province of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway showed an operating surplus of $300,000, while the second year's operation showed a surplus of $800,000, sufficient to pay the fixed charges on the replacement value of the railway.

Mr. MANION: What year was that?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not certain of the exact year, but I think it was 1928.

Mr. MANION: Did that amount not include a certain amount paid by the two railways?

Mr. GARLAND: The report of the Department of Railways and Telephones of our province is as I have stated, that the operating surplus for 1928 was about $800,000, which would cover the fixed charges on the replacement value of the line. The government and people of Alberta were positively astounded at the successful outcome of government ownership.

Mr. MANION: Last year the operating surplus included an amount of about $1,000,000, or perhaps $2,000,000, which had been paid in by the two railways and which was taken in as operating revenue.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am speaking of the period when these lines were operated by the provincial government and not by the two railways.

We now reach the stage where the second objection to the construction of the Peace river outlet had been removed. The railways were sold to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for $26,000,000, on the understanding that up until December 31, 1928, an offer would be open to the Canadian National Railways to share fifty-fifty in the purchase of these lines. This offer was accepted and to-day the lines in northern Alberta are operated jointly by the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways.

Previous to 1927 the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway had been operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am afraid that the showings reported by the Canadian Pacific Railway were not as favourable as those shown when the lines were operated by the government. In spite of this fact, both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National attempted to secure a lease of the roads for five or ten years. For reasons best known to the province of Alberta, this lease was refused and the lines were operated by the government, and then the classic agreement was made with the Canadian National Railways. I mention this only in order to introduce this statement: It was during the negotiations for the transfer of these northern lines that Sir Henry Thornton in a letter to Premier Greenfield of Alberta stated that he would be prepared to recommend the construction of this outlet to the Pacific coast when the Peace River district had developed an export of grain amounting to ten million bushels a year, or equivalent tonnage, for three years. I now wish to give to the house information as to the tonnage shipped out of that district.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It was a straight offer—when ten million bushels of grain had been produced.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Or equivalent tonnage.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There was no mention of that; it was ten million bushels of grain.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No; I have seen the letter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So did we see the letter. Mr. Greenfield, as premier, had it at the time. But it does not matter which of us is correct because the fact is that that district has exceeded the requirements of Sir Henry Thornton as set forth in his letter, whether he said ten million bushels or equivalent tonnage. It is intensely interesting to notice the growth of the development of that territory. In 1925 they shipped out 89,000 tons of grain or 5,300,000 bushels; in 1926, 6,000,000 bushels; 1927, 6,331,765 bushels; in 1928, 11,506,000 bushels; 1929, 7,323,000 bushels; 1930, 11,050,000 bushels; 1931, up to April 30, 10,067,000 bushels. It therefore must be clear to anybody who examines the facts that the requirements set up by Sir Henry Thornton have been more than met and that the tonnage of that district fully justifies the construction of this line. This year, may I remind the house, in all western Canada, covered as it is almost like a blanket with depression, the one really bright spot is the Peace River territory. There the prospects for a crop are still good. The prospects are that the tonnage there this year will equal if not exceed last year's tonnage, but that will depend, of course, upon weather conditions from now on.

This northern district in our province has shown a better return in railway revenue during the last few years than any other district I know of in all of Canada. In 1929 the Northern Alberta Railways showed operating revenues of $2,232,156, and in 1930, $2,253,737. The net revenues will perhaps be more interesting and comprehensive. The net revenue in 1929 was over three-quarters of a million dollars, $795,000, and in 1930, $301,000. In that year hon. members will recall we had a small crop over quite an extensive area in the west.

In the following session of 1930 the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) endeavoured to secure the ear of the house for the construction of the outlet and moved a motion on going into supply—a want of confidence motion it has sometimes been described. On that occasion the government accepted the motion, and, as was pointed out, technically defeated themselves. In the course of that debate the then Prime Minister, now the leader of the opposition, said on May 5, 1930, as reported in Hansard of that date at page 1809:

We all—

He was referring to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Railways and himself:

—have impressed upon the presidents of these systems that it is the desire of the government to have this matter expedited and the surveys completed, that it is our view that at an early date agreements should be arrived at by the two companies as to the route which they will jointly recommend—

Notice what follows:

—and that failing agreement by them the government itself will undertake to make a decision.

That is a definite pledge given by the former leader of this house. Again on May 28, 1930, in the debate that ensued, the then Prime Minister made the following statement:

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I repeat what I said the other evening, that in the opinion of the government it ought to be possible—

May I direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to these words:

—for these companies to agree upon a route within six months—

That statement was made on May 28, 1930:

—and to have work begun within a year.

One year and two months have elapsed:

—on a railway which will afford an outlet from the Peace River district to the Pacific. I will say that if they do not make a beginning within a year and the present administration should be in office at the end of that period, we will undertake to find a way or make it for the beginning of the construction of a railway line from the Peace River district to connect with the Pacific via some other railway line or otherwise.

Under these circumstances perhaps my hon. friend will feel that it is unnecessary to press his amendment any further. I said that the government would accept his amendment.

There is the intimation of a man who, I presume, had studied closely all the negotiations and all the preliminary procedure right up to the time he made that statement. He definitely pledged in this house, first of all, that in his opinion the two railways would come to an agreement within six months, that if they did not he would undertake to find a way either to make them come to an agreement or to construct the line.

May I point out that we have removed the difficulty with regard to the railways in northern Alberta? That difficulty being solved, we now come to the solution of the next difficulty. The surveys then to be undertaken have been made. The Canadian Pacific Railway has made surveys and a report has been prepared. A copy of this report is now in the hands of the Minister of Railways. The Minister of Railways has not yet, in spite of repeated requests by the hon. member for Peace River, tabled the report in the house. He may have good reasons for that.

Mr. MANION: I have not the permission of the Canadian Pacific Railway to do so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then may I say that the minister can readily find means to induce the Canadian Pacific Railway to give permission for the tabling of that report? If the minister is serious about this thing he can go to the Canadian Pacific Railway and tell them that public interest in the circumstances demands that he present that report to parliament. All of that western country is waiting for it. They have been promised the railway by both parties, and it is effrontery, it is absolutely unfair to withhold the report and action upon it. I have no doubt myself that the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway will recommend construction along the Obed route. But that is better known to the minister. It is immaterial what the route is, so long as the report recommends the construction of the line through a certain definite pass.

The Minister of Railways has stated that the government has studied the matter. He has gone further. He has been guilty of a heresy. I understand that one of the bitterest criticisms of the Liberal party in office was that they lacked decision, that they were always going into conference about something or other. Now the minister's excuse for not dealing with this matter, apart from the fact that he has not yet received permission from the Canadian Pacific Railway to table the report, is that he is waiting for a conference between Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty. It seems that Mr. Beatty was ready at one time but Sir Henry Thornton was busy with the committee.

Mr. MANION: We have had the conference.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Splendid. That is one more difficulty out of the way. The Peace River outlet was one of the most prominent issues in western Canada in the last election. Supporters of the Liberal administration quoted the then Prime Minister's statement with regard to the outlet time and time again from every platform as a definite indication of the coming rapid construction of the line. The Conservative party was but little more cautious, because the Prime Minister, speaking at Winnipeg, pledged that one of his cures for unemployment would be the development of transport northward to Hudson bay and westward to the Pacific by way of the Peace river. Again, the Conservative convention in Winnipeg made the construction of the outlet one of its major planks.

> We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation northward by the completion of the Hudson bay route, and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it most readily available to every part of Canada; to the Pacific slope by a Peace river outlet, and east and west by the development of the St. Lawrence waterways, and we pledge ourselves to aid existing traffic channels and to increase port facilities . . . .

And so on. No longer, Mr. Speaker, is delay justifiable in connection with this outlet. I make that statement for the reason I have already given, namely that the obstacles which were placed in the way of construction are now removed. We have had surveys. I venture to say that no railway line projected anywhere in Canada has had a more complete survey than this one will have had by the time it is constructed. The other difficulty with regard to the Alberta Northern railways is removed by the joint ownership of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. All that remains is for the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway to get together and agree upon a route upon which the line should be constructed. In order to do that it will be necessary for this government to undertake the necessary expenditures in connection with the share to be shouldered by the Canadian National.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend implies that the Canadian Pacific Railway is ready to build half of it—is that correct?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I venture to say they ought to be, and if they are not I will give ample reasons why this government should be ready to advance as a loan the moneys necessary to construct their share of the road. Up in that great territory there is a magnet drawing the poor unfortunates who are left destitute on the dried out prairies of southern Saskatchewan and Alberta. In this month of July arrangements have been made for the transportation of a great many settlers from the southern portion of the prairie provinces into the Peace River district. Those men are not drifting into the cities and joining the ranks of the unemployed so that they may eventually become charges upon the state. They are doing their best to make another start. The persistence of such people has helped to make Canada what it is, and their action would justify this government undertaking to give them some assistance by the construction of the outlet. May I submit to my hon. friends opposite, and to the hon. member who has just made an unintelligent and impertinent noise—I have already made this statement and I wish to repeat it—that the northern railways are the only great sections of the lines in Canada where during the years 1929 and 1930 the gross earnings have not seriously declined. I repeat that if the 1931 crop comes up to the estimates made by the bureau of statistics and by those who reside in the territory in question there will not be any serious loss in this year's movement of grains and commodities from that territory. The settlers up there however are labouring under a serious handicap. They went in with courage in their hearts to tear out a home from the wilderness. They have been fighting for from seventeen to twenty years under a freight handicap the seriousness of which few people in eastern Canada can appreciate. The cost of moving their grain to Vancouver via Edmonton is 5, 6 or 7 cents higher than the cost of moving it from Edmonton to Vancouver. Yet a line of railway could be constructed which would put those people in as close proximity to Vancouver as the people in Edmonton are to-day. The line would have the effect of building up a great territory and would give those people heart and head to keep on fighting to build up their country.

May I point out that the money will be spent anyway, because money must be spent to relieve unemployment in Canada. Why dole it out to single men or unfortunate married men through relief measures when useful work can be provided? Here is an opportunity. Turn all the unemployed in the country to the task of constructing a useful financial asset, one which will be of great benefit to the western section of Canada. Such a line would be beneficial to the province of British Columbia as much as to the province of Alberta. No better suggestion could be advanced than that in this great day of need on the part of hundreds of thousands of people throughout Canada a few thousand could be used to undertake forthwith the construction of this line. Time would be required for its completion. I hope however that the present government will not wait until the dying days of their regime four years hence to make more promises such as the Prime Minister has made and such as were outlined in the Conservative platform at the Winnipeg convention. Here is the chance for the present administration to justify its existence and formulate a real, constructive government policy in connection with this matter.

Had I the time I could give to the house the recommendations of a body of men well known to my hon. friends opposite, men who certainly could not be charged with being radicals, men who constituted the royal commission in the province of Ontario which in the year 1916 considered the question of unemployment. The list is headed by Sir John Willison, Most Reverend Neil McNeil, D. D., Venerable Archdeacon Henry J. Cody, Reverend Daniel Strachan, D.D., W. K., McNaught, C.M.G., Joseph Gibbons, G. Frank Beer, Professor A. T. DeLury, Gilbert E. Jackson, W. P. Gundy, and another. There, Mr. Speaker, is an aggregation of Conservative men, men who have the training and ability to study such problems, and who at that time directed their attention to unemployment. What did they say? They recommended distinctly that plans should be undertaken to provide for the construction of public works during times of depression. They recommended clearly and by terms which cannot be controverted that the time to plan was in good years and the time to spend was in bad years.

This government, and this government alone of all who hold office in Canada, can borrow money at the cheapest possible rates. They can readily secure funds. Surely the credit of Canada can well be used to support the settlers in the Peace river district. I have no more time at my disposal, but I hope others will further develop the matter. In closing, however, I should say to the Minister of Railways and Canals that the old obstacles which were brought up again and again appear to be removed. The time is ripe for construction. Ample work would be provided for many hundreds of men and at the present time construction work could be done more cheaply than it may be done in many years to come.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have been listening this afternoon and this evening to the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) for concurrence in the report of the railways and shipping committee. At this late hour I have no intention of taking up much of the time of the house. Not only is the hour late but we have reached a late stage in the session; therefore my remarks will be brief.

As I listened to the debate this afternoon the one point which struck me was that it has been of the finest type. Throughout the whole debate there has been practically no political controversy; the whole discussion has been on a high plane, and I feel that the house deserves some credit. Following the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) so far as I could see adopted a similar attitude in every respect. The use of three expressions struck me particularly. He said that when they came into power they desired that the government railways should be given a fair chance, that the management and directorate should be given a free hand, and that politics should not be permitted to enter into such management. I have no thought of injecting into a debate which has been of so pleasant a character anything of a controversial nature, and in regard to those expressions by the right hon. leader of the opposition I could say only that they are ideals which all true Canadians should have in dealing with the Canadian National Railways. I think therefore all hon. members can agree with the ideals and principles upheld by him this afternoon. We can agree that so far as the management of the Canadian National Railways, and, for that matter, any other Canadian railways, is concerned, politics ought to be taboo.

When we realize that to-day we have in the Canadian National Railways a responsibility amounting to over $2,200,000,000 made up of loans, interest, appropriations, and guarantees we realize that the railways are of such vital importance to us and we realize why hon. members are justified in debating the matter in a non-controversial and non-political way; because actually I think our whole economic structure depends upon the successful solution of the railway problems of Canada.

The discussion to-day was on the report of the special railway committee, a report which was brought into this house unanimously by the members of the committee in the absence of only one of those originally appointed. May I at this moment do what I fear no one else has done—although I have no doubt it was an oversight—congratulate the chairman of that committee, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), on the excellent work which he did, particularly in bringing down a unanimous report with the constructive criticisms contained therein.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I am glad to hear applause from the other side, because I know hon. members opposite agree with the report, as of course do our friends on this side. It was not an easy matter for the hon. member for Lincoln to bring about that happy result. I was present at most of the meetings. He had to hold a number of meetings, he had to submit various reports to the members, and, as the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) pointed out this afternoon, there are suggestions in this report that had to be accepted in a spirit of compromise. But after all, the spirit of our democratic institutions is a spirit of compromise; for I do not suppose you could get twenty-two members of this house to agree on the same ideas or the same ideals. So it is all the more to the credit of the hon. member for Lincoln that he finally succeeded in getting twenty-one members of the committee to sign the report and to agree on the constructive criticisms embodied therein. While listening to the debate this evening I looked over the membership of the committee and find that ten of them are from the opposite side of the house and eleven from this side, which indicates a very good division of the committee from the political standpoint, and emphasizes the excellent work which was done by the chairman in bringing about that unanimity of view. All opinions were expressed, because I have no doubt that while my hon. friend from North Waterloo—who has been in this house about the same number of years as I have—has been a persistent and consistent champion of public ownership, there are other members of the committee who have been just as strong in favour of private ownership. All parties were represented: the Liberal party, the Conservative party, the Progressive party and the Labour party in the person of the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps).

This afternoon not only the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and my right hon. friend the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett), but my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who was not a member of the committee—all of those and others as well supported in a general way, in fact almost in toto, the report. I was particularly glad to have the support of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because after all—and I say this in no spirit of criticism—he does not too often agree with other members on questions of this sort, and I think his endorsation of the report was perhaps the best praise that could be bestowed upon it.

My hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) took an attitude with regard to the report which I think was hardly justified. He stated, in effect, that the report was futile and that the committee also was futile. I do not agree with his criticism. For the first time so far as I can remember in the history of these committees this year's committee brought in a report which, although critical, is constructively critical, and instead of merely handing back the accounts as submitted to them, the committee has suggested useful changes that might be made by the management of the railroad in order the better to establish the system on a basis of economic success.

May I say in this regard that while the discussion was proceeding this afternoon one of these suggestions was put into effect by the directors themselves. The directors hold their meetings on the third Tuesday of every month, and at their meeting to-day in the city of Montreal I was informed they were going to discuss and deal with this report. While this debate has been in progress I have received a telegram from Sir Henry Thornton which may be of interest to the house. He wires:

That the board this afternoon passed the following resolution:

Resolved that all officers and employees, excepting those whose rates of pay and working conditions are governed by scheduled agreements, earning in excess of $3,600 per annum shall be reduced by 10 per cent for a period of 10 months from the first of August, 1931. At the expiration of this period the deductions herein included shall be restored unless the board otherwise orders.

Be it further resolved that no salary in excess of $3,600 per annum shall by virtue of such deduction be reduced below $3,600.

That action is along the lines of the course taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway management a couple of months ago when they reduced the salaries of their executives by 10 per cent. I do not know how far down the line they went; perhaps the reductions went further than those mentioned in this telegram, but at any rate it was stated that by this means the Canadian Pacific Railway would save some millions of dollars. That action this afternoon by the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways seems at least suggestive in view of the clauses of the report which I shall now read. I hold in my hand Votes and Proceedings for last Thursday, in which the report of the special committee was printed. These are the three clauses which I desire to quote:

Certain questions relating to the salaries and emoluments paid to executive officers of the company were asked by members of the committee, and were by resolution of the committee submitted to a subcommittee for consideration.

Your committee while of opinion that many of the salaries are much too generous, and in some instances excessive, accede to the expressed wish of the president that the list be not published for the reasons given by him.

A little further down in the report will be found the following:

In view of the decreased revenues of the company, and the economies being made in other branches of the service, your committee are of opinion that the executive committee of the board of directors should immediately consider the whole question of salaries, allowances, disbursements, pensions and retirement provisions for executive officers and officials of the company, receiving salaries of $5,000 and over in order that every reasonable and proper economy should be effected.

So that the board of directors this afternoon went a step further even than the committee had requested them to go.

May I say to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, who spoke this afternoon commending in a general way the whole report, that this does not affect the wages of those of whom he spoke. This affects the executive officers, from my reading of Sir Henry Thornton's telegram; it does not affect the ordinary wage earner, the day labourer, the piece job man or the running trades; it does not affect the ordinary workingman on the road up, we will say, to conductors, brakemen, engineers, and so on. I doubt if it at all affects the operating staff of the road, but rather the executive staff as was suggested by the committee which dealt with this matter. So it appears to me as though that committee, if it did not inspire the action of the board of directors, at least supported it inasmuch as it antedated their action by a few days.

So I repeat that to my mind this is a very useful report in its constructive criticisms and suggestions with regard to the national road. I say this in no spirit of criticism, but I think perhaps it is a pity that in past years the committee did not act in a similar way and offer constructive criticisms. I am indirectly criticizing myself, because for some years, at least, while sitting on the opposition side of the house I was a member of that committee. I think this report generally is constructive; it is not perfect, but it is a real effort to be helpful in the work of the road.

Now for a moment or two I wish to deal with some of the remarks of my hon. friend from North Waterloo, particularly his remarks with regard to the board of directors. Again without desiring to cast reflections may I say that I believe the present board of directors is the best board the Canadian National Railways ever had. Perhaps it is natural that I should make that statement because this government appointed them, but at the same time I believe more than the usual care was taken in these appointments. My hon. friend from North Waterloo took the attitude, which is taken by many others, that there should be no politics in the appointment of such a board as this. Of course there are arguments against appointments of that kind being political, but so long as we have party government in this country, just so long will the party in power naturally lean towards people who are friendly to it in making appointments of any kind. I think that is no reflection on party government. Not only that, but if my hon. friend from North Waterloo could see some of the letters I received after this directorate were appointed he would not think they were all friends of ours, because there were some very severe criticisms in regard to the political leanings of some of the men who were appointed.

Mr. EULER: I suppose there were a great many applicants?

Mr. MANION: Yes, but I am speaking of political criticisms by our friends, some of whom thought we did not pick Conservatives for these positions. But may I say that I do not believe the political affiliations of any member of that board, whether appointed by the Liberals or by the Conservatives, necessarily need lessen the ability of the board, because after all there are outstanding business men in this country who are of Liberal persuasion, as there are outstanding business men who are of Conservative persuasion. It is not difficult, in view of that fact, to choose a good group, as we have done. I do not believe in playing about with words; I will admit that they were largely of our political persuasion, but I still maintain that they are an outstanding group of men.

I will grant this: Probably a smaller board might give better and more efficient management to the railway. Yet this is a government railway, and the difficulty in creating a small board is that you get complaints from all over the country. When my hon. friends were in power I am sure when they made similar appointments they came up against the same type of criticism we have received since those appointments were made. Any appointments to a government institution—as this road is to a certain extent though handled by the management, since it is dependent upon the government for the money it may need—will bring about the same criticism. So long as this is a government road we will get demands from different portions of the country that they be represented, and from different classes in the country that they be represented. For example, when hon.

gentlemen opposite were in power, they appointed Tom Moore as representing Labour. We replaced him and a number of others who were formerly on the board.

Mr. EULER: You did not replace him; you reappointed him.

Mr. MANION: I meant to say we reappointed him to the board. We have had demands from the agricultural sections of the country; I have received many personally; some were read by my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) some time ago, and others have been forwarded by supporters of the party on this side of the house, asking that agriculture be represented in the same way. So long as we have this road as more or less of a government institution we will have these demands that certain portions or certain classes of the country be represented. That is an advantage which a company such as the Canadian Pacific Railway has over a government institution such as the Canadian National Railways. They are not forced to consider the geography of the country, as my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) put it; they are not forced to consider different classes. They are in the position—the happy position, if you like—of being able to appoint those men whom they see fit to appoint from a straight business and executive standpoint. While I was sitting here I looked up the board of directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway; I had it in mind, and just checked it up. I find that they have exactly the same number of directors on the board; they have seventeen, and of those directors nine come from Montreal, two from London, one from New York—and what complaints we would receive if we should appoint a New York director on the Canadian National—one from Brantford, one from Oshawa, one from Winnipeg, one from Vancouver, and one from Toronto. Only four provinces are represented on that board, but the Canadian Pacific Railway have that advantage in that they are not forced to satisfy the different geographical or political sections of this country as a government road is forced to do to a certain extent.

Let me give an illustration of what I have been saying. When we appointed this board the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were not represented—and were not represented on the previous board—and we had the very strongest protests conceivable from those provinces because of that fact. I presume the same thing occurred when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. In a short time we intend to appoint two directors from those provinces, so that every province will be represented.

It may be of interest to the house to know the size of the boards of directors of some important companies in Canada. None of them is small. The directors of the Bank of Montreal number 21; of the Bank of Nova Scotia, 20; of the Bank of Commerce, 37, and of the Royal bank, 28. Of course many of those boards were enlarged because of the amalgamation of different banks, but the fact remains that these companies have large directorates. There are 17 directors of the Sun Life Assurance Company; of International Nickle—and I presume a great many hon. members here remember International Nickle—there are 25 directors, and the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company consists of 15. So it will be apparent that very few of the large companies have a smaller number of directors than the Canadian National Railways.

I will admit, however, that I agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo; probably if we could pick four or five strong men as directors, more efficiency might result. They would have to be situated close to Montreal, at least within a night's run; they would have to be big, powerful men, independent of any smaller considerations, men who would give their very best to making the Canadian National Railways a success from a business standpoint. I believe if you could pick five men like that and give them a better salary, such as has been suggested, and generally put the road in their hands probably you would get better management than you can get from a directorate scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which cannot meet more than once a month. Men in Prince Edward Island, in Vancouver or Victoria, in Calgary or in other places widely separated cannot get east or west to the centre where the meeting is held more often than once a month. That is one of the penalties we pay for having a democracy. No doubt democracy is the best form of government we have so far encountered, but it has its faults. This is one of the reasons why we have so many political demands upon the railway and so many protests against any change made in the interests of economy. This very morning I think I received half a dozen letters from various sections of the country protesting against some act of the management of the road, of which I knew nothing, some economy which is being practised and which the management feels must be carried out because of the reduced earnings of the railway.

It may be interesting to the house to know as it is only right the house should know, that the gross earnings of the national railways for the first six months of this year are down some $22,000,000 as compared with the same six months in 1930. In 1930 the total year's earnings were down $46,000,000 as compared with 1929. In view of those figures, and in view of the fact that last year the government of Canada had to meet interest to the public amounting to nearly $30,000,000, which the railways had not earned and which therefore had to be paid on behalf of the people, it is, I think, realizable that the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway—because that railway also has been affected—must of necessity economize. It is not quite fair, therefore, on the part of people in various sections of Canada to take the attitude that economies may be made, but not in their particular districts. And that, I am afraid, is the attitude which is taken in every part of the Dominion whenever any slight change is made by the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific—for I get protests sometimes in regard to the economies practised by the Canadian Pacific as well. I do not think it is reasonable, in view of the situation as I have indicated it, that people should protest as vociferously as they do.

My remarks so far have been quite general, and I wish now to discuss one or two particular questions. Let me for a moment or two consider the Peace River outlet. Before I take up that question, however, I think it might be well for me to reply briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who again this afternoon took up the time of the house with reference to the Riviere du Loup station. I do not intend to delay the house discussing that particular subject, because in my opinion the hon. member has already taken up too much of the time of the house in that regard. He has been very persistent, I will not say obstinate, in his presentation of the case, and as a result of his efforts he has obtained altogether 135 or 140 returns. That, I think, is a record in the whole history of parliamentary institutions in Canada, though I fancy it is a rather doubtful record. Now, in justice to the government, I would point out that last year the Canadian National Railways planned $8,000,000 worth of additions and betterments which were not carried out, so that Riviere du Loup constituted but one-hundredth part of the additions and betterments which had been contemplated but could not be realized. The Canadian National Railways took the attitude, with respect to most of these additions and improvements, that in view of the decreased earnings of the system such undertakings must be restricted. I agree with my right hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), who in reply to the member for Témiscouata, spoke this afternoon, and I accept entirely the statement that this was a government responsiblity. No hon. member has any right whatever to lay any undue blame upon him, as the hon. member for Témiscouata has done, because he was but one member of the government. I take my full share of responsibility for the action taken in regard to this matter, and I submit that it is not fair that my colleague from Argenteuil should be blamed, if there is to be any blame at all, more than the rest of the government. The responsibility for not passing the order in council was that of the government as a whole. I may say to the hon. member for Témiscouata, however, what he already knows and what has been already stated, that the Riviere du Loup station is being treated fairly well this year by the Canadian National Railways, because there is in the estimates a vote of $15,000 for repairs; and I hope that this $15,000 will at least put the station in fair shape so that we shall not be held up during another session to the extent that we have been this year.

In regard to the Peace River outlet, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) made a vigorous speech in behalf of this cause. I have sat in the house a few years and I have heard eloquent speeches made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser), and by the hon. member for Bow River. These three gentlemen—I will not particularize—have been strong and persistent advocates of an outlet to be built from the Peace River territory. I do not mind telling them frankly that I sympathize with them in this regard, although, so far as I remember, I have never made a speech anywhere dealing with this subject. I have not made any promises on the matter. But having lived all my younger days in a pioneer section of the country, in northern Ontario, where transportation was not easy and where we were largely isolated from other parts of Canada, I can sympathize with these hon. gentlemen who feel so strongly on the need for an outlet from that vast territory. May I point out, however, that the solution is not quite so easy as was suggested by my hon.

friend from Bow River in his otherwise excellent speech. The hon. gentleman spoke as though it were only a matter of the government stepping in and building this immense project. He spoke as though the two railways had come to a decision as to what they wanted and it would be a simple matter for the government to raise the $40,000,000 with which to construct the outlet forthwith. The fact of the matter is, the railways have not come to any decision. It is true that the route referred to by the hon. gentleman, the Aggie-Obed route, was one of the early suggestions of the Canadian National Railways. But the Canadian Pacific Railway has submitted a report recently in which they take exception to that suggested route; they suggest a different one from the route proposed by the Canadian National Railways. And then there are other routes which have been proposed. For instance, there is the suggestion that the present route be maintained, bringing all grain from the Peace River section back towards Edmonton—a backhaul—and taking it towards Vancouver, leaving the route as at present, and putting lower rates into effect. Secondly, there is the Obed route, of which the hon. member for Bow River has spoken. Then there are the Monkman pass and, the Pine pass, and the Peace pass routes. As a theorist I have studied the situation on the map, have looked into the various reports, and have endeavoured to familiarize myself with the subject. And in a general way I think I have done so. Moreover, I trust that during this summer I shall have the pleasure of a visit to the district. But I submit that it is only fair to say that before the government takes any action in the matter the railways themselves should at least agree to something definite. The hon. member spoke as if the Canadian Pacific Railway at least was ready to build one of these routes at once. I submit that it is not so. I had a conference only last Friday in my office with the heads of the two railways, and they did not propose to put up the money. I do not think I am betraying their confidence when I say that it is the opinion of the two railways at the present time that if this outlet is to be built it should be built by the Canadian government and not by either of the systems. Obviously, therefore, there are a number of questions to be settled before a final decision can be arrived at. Certainly I am of the opinion—and I am sure that in this regard the whole house will agree with me, including the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Cariboo and the hon. member for Bow River—that we should not undertake in this country the construction of very costly lines of railway which will duplicate the mistakes of the past, without a proper investigation into the whole situation and an endeavour to avoid any such condition. After all, it is far better to have the two railways agreed upon one specific route and to have the government cooperating with them. Surely it is better to have the whole plan carefully laid out than to take chances, undertaking the construction of a road which has not been decided upon by agreement—one railway engineer taking one view and another suggesting something different.

I am interested in the whole question; I am sympathetic to the idea. But at the present time I think it would be unfair to the people of the country at large, and unfair to that section itself, if my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) were asked to carry into effect some ill-conceived proposal. I submit that my hon. friends from that section of the country will have to have a little more patience. After all, this government has not yet been one year in power, and I am sure that whatever promises may have been made in this regard were certainly not made by my leader, nor were they made by any other member of this government, to the effect that this road would be built within one year. Nor was any such promise made with respect to any of the large projects which the government has been gradually taking up as time has passed.

May I, in closing, make this observation. Parliament realizes that the country to-day is faced with a serious railway problem. Everyone must admit, when you take into account the immense debt of the railways; the vast governmental guarantees; the fact that the interest to the public to-day is well over a million dollars a week, and that this year it looks as if the national railways have not much chance of paying very much of that $50,000,000 odd which is owing to the public—everyone must admit, I say, in view of these facts, that the situation demands general economy, because of its seriousness. That immense sum of money having to be paid by the people of Canada, this house realizes and I believe the people realize the seriousness of the transportation question. At the same time I do not think this matter is a hopeless one nor do I believe this is a time for panic. I believe in the motto which I suggested some time ago, I think in my remarks on the budget, that with care, caution and economy, with prudence and wise general management of the railways, the whole transportation system of our country will come back once again to a proper basis of progressive prosperity. Surely we Canadians are hopeful for the future of Canada. This country has not been ruined in a couple of years. We have our fields, our forests, our mines, our waterfalls and our virile people, and this country is going to come back into its own. The day for the people of Canada will return and with that day will return prosperity for both railway systems. Both roads will return again to a proper basis of economic progress, and the spirit which has been shown to-day in this house by every hon. member who has spoken is the spirit which will help to bring back prosperity, not only to Canada but to both the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways. They will both soon reach that position of progress and prosperity which we all desire to see them attain.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I hope the house will bear with me for a few moments while I emphasize the points raised by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I do so not only because of the importance of the subject itself, but also because the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), who has been an ardent advocate of the Peace river outlet, is suffering from a bad throat and is unable to speak.

First, let me offer my congratulations to the hon. gentleman who acted as chairman of the railway committee. I am sure that all hon. members appreciate the great qualities he exercised in that capacity. I am glad to know that the report of the committee was adopted unanimously, and I anticipate that it will be concurred in unanimously by this house. My words will not be words of criticism of the Canadian National Railways, although there may be room for criticism, nor will they be words of praise.

I want to point out to the government the necessity of undertaking as speedily as possible the building of a Peace River outlet, and I want to emphasize in particular the economic aspect of that undertaking. The hon. member for Bow River has very ably outlined the history of the struggle of the people of the Peace River district for an outlet to the coast. That struggle has been carried on from 1917 up to the present day, during which period many people flocked into that section of the country in the hope and belief that a railroad would be built and that they would find an outlet for their products. It is now known that the tonnage of produce which could be shipped annually from that section of the country will far exceed the estimates made by leading railway men of this country as being necessary to warrant the building of a road. Moreover both railways have been making surveys during the last eight years. and practically every possible route has been surveyed. There is now in the hands of the government or available to it all the engineering data necessary to enable it to come to a conclusion as to which route should be selected.

While I did not expect that the minister would say that the Peace river outlet would be built, I did hope for a little more encouragement than he gave us in his remarks. We are glad to have the minister's sympathy; I know the people of the Peace River district will be glad to have it; but they are looking for something more substantial. To express it in another way, they are looking for sympathy expressed in material form, or materialized sympathy. If I understood the minister correctly, his chief objection to proceeding immediately with the development of this route was that there does not seem to be any agreement between the two railway companies as to which route should be selected. That disagreement might go on forever because these roads being in competition, no one can say how long it will take them to agree as to which route should be selected.

Mr. MANION: I should have stated that the suggestion of the two roads was that engineers be appointed, one by each railway company and one by the government, to go into this question. That will probably be carried out in the near future.

Mr. IRVINE: That would seem to show that some action has been taken to break the deadlock and there is hope that in the near future a definite decision will be arrived at as to which route should be adopted. Perhaps a little more progress has been made than was indicated by the speech of the minister. If that arrangement fails to accomplish anything then the government should not wait any longer for a decision to be made by the railway companies. Having, as I said, at its disposal all the data necessary to arrive at a conclusion it should put its own engineers on the job, decide which route should be built, and proceed to build it.

The need for an outlet is great. I do not think I need to recapitulate what the hon. member for Bow River has so eloquently presented to the house. There is no doubt about the fact that the people are there. In 1928 and 1929 there were homesteaded in this district a total of 1,760,000 acres, and to date about 5,000,000 acres have been taken up with approximately 1,000,000 acres under cultivation. With such a large portion of the population of Canada, if it is desired that it be expressed in that way, in dire need of facilities of this character, there can be no question about the necessity. It must be remembered that the opening up of this district, which is perhaps the most fertile in the Dominion of Canada, will mean virtually the opening up of a new continent.

It was said not so long ago by statesmen of this country that there were two great railway necessities, the Hudson Bay railway and the Peace River outlet. The Hudson Bay railway has been built, and without making any criticism of that road I have no hesitation in saying that the least important has been built first. I do not think there can be any question as to the relative importance of these two routes. All necessary surveys have been made and there should be no doubt as to which route should be chosen for a Peace River outlet. All the engineering information that is required is to hand. The only question is, when is the road to be built?

Let me point out that there is no political issue here, as I understand it, for both political leaders have declared themselves in unequivocal language as being in favour of the development of the Peace River country by providing it with adequate railway facilities. I refer hon. members to the statement of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) when making his tour in the west as Prime Minister some time prior to the election of 1925. He had this to say in the city of Edmonton in respect of the Peace River outlet:

> There is to the north of this city a great tract of land that is crying out for development.

Incidentally, it is still crying:

> The Peace River country is amongst the richest in Canada, but before the proper development of that country can take place an outlet to the Pacific coast is an absolute necessity. I pledge myself that as soon as it is humanly possible the great Peace River country will be given that measure of railway relief that will bring to the pioneers of that country the outlet they have been so long denied, and will open up the counrty for prospective settlers.

That was the statement of the right hon. leader of the opposition when he was Prime Minister. Let me now quote the declaration of the Conservatives in their great Winnipeg convention, which I presume was accepted by their leader and is accepted by the government to-day. Clause 5 of that declaration says:

> We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation northward by the completion of the Hudson bay route, and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it most readily available to every part of Canada; to the Pacific slope by a Peace River outlet, and east and west by the development of the St. Lawrence waterways, and we pledge ourselves to aid existing traffic channels and to increase port facilities on the great lakes, Hudson bay and the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and to the establishment of a national highway system.

Incidentally in that declaration mention is made of a number of other transportation facilities, but specific mention is made of the Peace River outlet. So I think we may take it that there is no political conflict in a party sense, but that both party leaders have declared themselves as being in favour of the Peace River outlet. With the great need for the building of that road, with the preparations that have been made during the last eight years by the railway companies in their survey work, and in view of the fact that both political leaders have declared themselves in favour of building the road, why are we not busy building it? I imagine the only answer that will be given will be that this is a time when we ought to be practising economy rather than spending money. All governments in all countries of the world have a tendency to take that attitude. It has been the general practice, I think, of all governments, that in periods of depression governments, naturally reflecting the depressed feelings of the population and fearing popular criticism if they enter upon what would be regarded under such circumstances as extravagant expenditures, have refrained as much as possible from making expenditures during such periods and have practised rigid economy. Not only does that increase the depression by withdrawing credit from circulation, but by intensifying the psychological effects it makes the people generally more afraid of launching out into new enterprises, and thus adds greatly to the difficulties which depressions always bring.

I want to submit to the hon. Minister of Railways and to his government, in view of the situation with which we are faced at the present moment, the advisability of taking into consideration the suggestion that I am now going to make. I suggest to the government that this is no time for the government to practise economy. I suggest on the contrary, that this is the psychological moment for the government of Canada to launch out into large expenditures. I suggest to the government that in doing so they should be thinking in terms of at least twenty years, and not in terms of the next budget. If they are thinking in terms of twenty years, and have the faith in Canada which they have indicated they have, there will be no doubt about what they will do. They will immediately launch out into those great projects which they very freely adumbrated in their election campaign speeches. They will proceed to implement those promises because all of them that I have mentioned to-night are of a high order. They are all necessary for the wellbeing of Canada, and may be proceeded with immediately to the advantage of Canada.

Let me point out to the Minister of Railways that next year we may spend in relief for unemployment perhaps $100,000,000, perhaps $200,000,000. I cannot guess how many millions. I know that this parliament provided $20,000,000 in the special session for unemployment relief, which amount was augmented by grants from municipal and provincial governments which amounted to something in the neighbourhood of $80,000,000. Now it is reasonable to suppose that in the winter that is ahead of us, taking into consideration all the phases of our economic situation that we are able to visualize at the moment, our expenses for unemployment relief will be greater than last winter. I submit to the government this proposition: Would it not be better business to build this railway with the money which otherwise would be spent in unemployment relief, and thus have an excellent asset in the hands of the Canadian people to increase further their wealth in the future, and at the same time give heart to Canadian workingmen, not by treating them as objects of charity, but by furnishing them with work which will be to the advantage of the nation?

Perhaps I shall have an opportunity to go into this matter as thoroughly as it deserves when we discuss the proposals of the government with regard to unemployment. When that time comes I would go as far as to suggest not only that the Peace River outlet should be immediately proceeded with, but also that the trans-Canada highway should be built at the earliest possible moment, and we should undertake not only the St. Lawrence deep waterway development but similar public works which can be carried out to the advantage of Canada. In order that I may not stand alone as an advocate of this policy, which differs from all practices of previous governments in times of depression, I want to draw the attention of the government to the sessional papers of 1916, volume 48, part 13, from which I wish to quote to indicate that there are others who think as I do on the matter of public expenditures being good business at a time like this.

[Mr. Irvine.]

For several years, Canadian factories have secured a market through the investment in Canada of very large sums of borrowed capital, amounting during the years 1907—1913, inclusive, to between $700,000 and $800,000 for each working day. Sir George Paish estimates the British loans to Canada between 1907 and 1913 at $1,500,000,000. This is equal to $714,000 each day for 2,100 working days. Mr. F. W. Field has estimated the foreign borrowings of Canada from 1905 to 1913 at $2,276,000,000 which is equal to $843,000 each day for 2,700 working days. An equivalent for this expenditure must now be found by other methods. The adverse balance of trade must be overcome, not by an artificial stimulus such as war orders, but through the response of a healthy national organism to vigorous effort directed definitely to that object.

Presumably the war inflation and the subsequent developments removed all suggestions made at that time by those men investigating the unemployment situation. It is now becoming apparent however that we are suffering more to-day from the economic effects of the war than we did when the war was in progress. If we look at the very grave statements of the Prime Minister of Great Britain as published in to-day's press to the effect that the conference in which they are now engaged may mark a very important era in the world's history or may work for the good or evil of the world in a most profound way, and when we realize that Canada is within the range of the difficulties which now beset the world, we can readily appreciate that the time for us so to act as to rehabilitate our own economic life is now—at this moment. If we could dip into the future for war purposes, to the extent of $2,000,000,000, all of which was used for purposes of destruction, surely in view of the great developments which are possible in Canada we can if necessary increase our indebtedness, having faith in our future. Such an indebtedness would be an asset which would add to the national wealth and would increase the facilities of our people while at the same time assisting us in the very difficult period through which we are passing. To quote further from the sessional papers to which I have referred:

To plan necessary public works and expenditures, for such periods, in order that public employment may compensate as far as possible for a lessened private demand for labour, is, in the judgment of your commissioners one of the most effective methods of dealing with the problem of periodic unemployment.

It is not proposed that unnecessary expenditures should be undertaken; but your commissioners are of the opinion that the public works and other requirements of several years should be planned in advance as a program, and this should be carried out, when and in proportion as the returns of unemployment show a subnormal demand for labour.

It might be further pointed out that governments have a greater control over capital expenditures of a nation than any one or number of large corporations. Their control comes in largely because they can refuse to spend this year and may spend next year or four years from now, thus making the largest expenditures at a time when they will do the greatest service to a nation faced with an unemployment problem. I should like to quote the words of Mr. Sydney Webb:

Without securing an approximate uniformity, one year with another, in the aggregate demand for labour in the community as a whole, it is clear that unemployment on a large scale cannot be prevented. The only possible way in which that uniformity can be secured is, so far as can be seen, the use of the government orders as a counterpoise to the uncontrollable fluctuations in the other orders.

I do not wish further to belabour this point. I hope I have gone far enough to indicate that it might be worth while for the government to take the matter into consideration, namely, that the best time to make expenditures is at the time of the deepest depression, not only because money is cheapest but also because expenditures made at such a time relieve directly the pressure and further encourage industry to go ahead. Best of all, such expenditures increase the purchasing power and improve the entire economic outlook of the state.

With that in view I urge that the government give serious and immediate consideration to one of the projects to which it made frequent reference when seeking the franchise of the people. So far as I am concerned I have so far no blame to attach to the action of the government in respect to the carrying out of its promises. I will say that I do not know of any prime minister or any government which has gone so far in carrying out his or its promises. My plea to-night is not one of censure; I am merely asking the Prime Minister to carry on the good work, and asking the government to continue to carry out their promises until all have been implemented. I wish particularly however that the government would expedite this special work. In the interests of the Peace River country—and not only the Peace River district, because the matter is not sectional—I wish them to hurry. The railway when built would be a great asset to the port of Vancouver and to the province of British Columbia and the western provinces generally. The steel industry in Canada which is now and has been languishing for a long time would be greatly stimulated if next winter it were called upon to prepare steel for this great undertaking, the Peace River outlet. From that point of view, so far as I am able to see at the moment, it would be advantageous to the people of Canada, advantageous from an economic point of view, advantageous to the government itself and advantageous to all concerned, to build this road as speedily as possible.

I leave my plea with the government. The present is the opportune time. The need is great. Everything is in readiness—and all we want is the money. The government can get the money more easily now than it will be able to get it ten years hence, and at a lower rate of interest; and ten years from now when boom times come back the government may practise economy. That is the time to raise taxes to make up for what is now being spent; that is the time to spend as little as possible. At present however I believe the government should spend all it possibly can on this project, which will leave a worth while asset in our country.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) upon his remarks in connection with the report of the committee. I can associate myself with practically all his statements, with the possible exception of his reference to the outlet from the Peace River district to the Pacific.

To sum up briefly, I wish to place myself on record as being in accord with the statements made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) concerning the Peace River outlet. In this connection the Minister of Railways said that it would be unfair to the people of Canada if at this time the government were to proceed with the construction, and for that reason he recorded his opposition. Although we have had surveys and re-surveys, examinations and re-examinations by engineers from the government and the various railways, he said that we were still in a position where in fairness to our people no definite decision could be made. Naturally Canadians want that route to be the most efficient possible of development. But I would also associate myself with the remarks of the previous speaker that the most important question before the people of Canada at this time is the question of unemployment. While it may be that in fairness to the people the route cannot be decided upon immediately, I say that in view of the economic situation and that the building of this railway would give employment to from 10,000 to 20,000 men for some months to come, it is doubly unfortunate that the government are not prepared to say "Go ahead at once."

As to the report itself, first of all I wish to commend the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), for his patience, his tact, and his fairness to every member of the committee. That the report is to all practical purposes a unanimous report is due almost entirely to his fairness and his tact.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANBURY: The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) in speaking to this report this afternoon, placed a good deal of valuable information before the people of Canada. I feel he is to be highly commended by the house and by the country for trying to bring home to us some realization of the colossal undertaking and of the enormous sums of money involved in the operating losses of the Canadian National Railways and its subsidiary companies. To my mind a great deal of the responsibility for the present position of the system rests with past governments. The picture which I have of the Canadian National Railways is that the Canadian people invested approximately $2,000,000,000 in the undertaking, and then they searched the world over and found the man they thought best fitted to handle it. But to my mind they did not take sufficient safeguards to ensure that the funds of Canada were spent to the best advantage.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANBURY: I have no desire to criticize the officers of the Canadian National Railways. I say that any man placed in a responsible position where he has large sums of money to disburse, and is not given constructive criticism from time to time and watched at all times, will invariably tend to become extravagant. So I say in the present case any remarks I have to make are not in criticism of the officers of the Canadian National Railways, but rather of the method adopted by the people of Canada for watching the operation of such a large undertaking.

The member for Stanstead thought that the appointment of directors, the setting up of the committee, and the report of the committee itself were all absolutely futile. I would say that this system of endeavouring to watch our large railway investment is not the best system. I have already stated so this evening. But I do say in justice to the committee that each and every member was conscientious, serious and not politically partisan; all were conscientiously endeavouring to do something that they felt was necessary. That they have done something constructive I am quite satisfied, because if they have done nothing else they have brought to the attention of this house, of the board of directors, and of the officials of the system the necessity of doing something radical, and doing it at once.

In the report it will be noticed that as a result of the recommendation made by the president it is suggested that a commission should be established to investigate the whole railway situation in Canada. In that respect I would point out to hon. members that the total cost of the operation of both the Canadian National railway and the Canadian Pacific rialway must eventually be borne by the people of Canada; that every dollar spent in operation must eventually come from the pockets of the people. To my mind we have in both of these railway companies some of the most able men in their profession; they are men of knowledge and of vision; and if they would sit down across the table and not play railway politics, they would soon iron out some of the difficulties that are facing us at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANBURY: I do not think it is necessary to have a commission to investigate our railway troubles. I believe if the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways in no uncertain terms notified the presidents of these two railway companies that we expect their cooperation for the elimination of so much futile competition—to use the words of my hon. friend from Stanstead—so much expensive competition, and that they must get down to business, the people of Canada would very soon see some light in the railway situation. That is something for which the government must take responsibility. I do not believe that a commission as suggested would get results, but I do believe that the government through the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways can get results by simply insisting that those results shall be obtained.

It has been suggested that higher freight rates in the past would have prevented some of these losses; it has also been suggested that higher freight rates in the future would convert some of the present losses into profits. I would point out to hon. members that if we are to have higher freight rates we shall have a higher cost of producing wheat, lumber, and every other commodity. Transportation is a portion of the cost of producing everything, and to the extent that we increase freight rates we increase our cost of production. The problem in connection with increased freight rates is whether the individual producer is to absorb the increase or whether the country as a whole shall do so.

In connection with the large deficit on the operation of the Canadian National Railways during the past year, I think it is only fair to call the attention of the house to the fact that during the past twelve months or more the management have retained on the pay roll numbers of men who in view of the economic depression would have been discharged had the railway company not been a nationally-owned system. To what extent their retention has prevented a reduction of the pay roll I could not say, but it would be an enormous sum. It has been suggested that there is not enough traffic in Canada to justify and make profitable the operation of both these railways. In this connection I would point out to the house that the greatest returns to the railway companies were in those years when the external trade of Canada was greatest. During the internal development of Canada it is only reasonable to assume that the deficits of the future will be even larger than those of the past.

Very few suggestions have been made as to what steps are necessary in order to remedy the losses we are suffering, but it is obvious that we require either greater revenue or a lower cost of operation. In order to bring about either of these results government policy is necessary, probably as expressed through the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. There has been some discussion as to the constitution of the board of directors, as to the number of directors and as to the salaries they receive, and I think the arguments as to why the number of directors should not be reduced are logical. I would suggest for consideration that the Canadian National Railways might very well have a committee of the directors—not a committee of the management—numbering four, five or six, so located that they could meet often and for as long as it might be necessary, and that on this committee should be placed the responsibility for the operation of the road. They could then work in conjunction with the general board of directors as it is constituted at the present time. If we are to overcome the loss in the operation of this railway it is necessary that we should eliminate useless competition, and that we should do away with some of the services which the country can most easily do without. It may be that we will have to increase rates; it may be that we will have to reduce the cost of operation; it may be that this reduction in the cost of operation will mean not only the reduction in salaries which was announced by the Minister of Railways this evening but that the government will have to go as far as to take responsibility for further reductions in the operating costs. That is something for government policy. It may be that the government will have to reorganize the capitalization of the company, and it may come to the point where the government will have to consider whether or not there are sufficient people in Canada at this time to make possible the profitable operation of the Canadian National Railways, and whether or not they will have to give consideration again to an immigration policy.

In connection with the committee, of which I had the honour to be a member, I feel quite justified in complimenting Sir Henry Thornton and the management of the company on the large mass of detailed information which they were able to give. I would suggest to the government, at the same time, that in constituting this committee another year they should endeavour to see that the committee is placed in possession of information as complete as possible, as early in the session as is possible. I do not know that any good purpose would have been served this year if we had been given more information at an earlier date, but it would have done no harm and might have done some good. I feel sure that the management and officials of the Canadian National Railways are fully seized of the importance of reducing every possible expenditure at this time, and I repeat that I believe the committee can take some credit to itself for having impressed upon the management the importance of this action being taken.

Just for a moment or two I should like to refer to that part of the report which deals with the Canadian government merchant marine. The original cost was approximately $80,000,000; the book value at present is about $45,000,000 and depreciation already set up amounts to about $17,000,000, so there is a present valuation of the steamers operated by the Canadian government merchant marine of approximately $28,000,000. That is the book value. We are told that the actual value is from $2,000,000 to $2,500,000, so the Canadian people have absorbed the loss of the entire original investment, plus the amounts it has been necessary to vote from year to year.

Last year the operating loss was less than $600,000. The suggestion has been made by the committee that the government should give serious consideration to the disposal of these vessels, and with that recommendation I am in agreement, with one qualification. I suggest to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) that the only justification for ever having had this service or for continuing it has been the development of the external trade of Canada. During the investigation we attempted to ascertain the value of the trade, both into and out of Canada, carried by those ships, but were unable to do so. I would suggest, therefore, that these ministers notify every board of trade in Canada and every user of these vessels that unless they can prove to the government that the people of Canada are justified in absorbing a loss of $600,000 a year, the service will be discontinued.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that my time was so short, because there were several other remarks I should like to have made.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, July 22, 1931.

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Fifth report of the select standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Bury.

Mr. Bury moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

STATEMENT CONCERNING EXPENDITURES IN CONNECTION WITH TRIP TO BERMUDA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. The press of yesterday and to-day in reporting the proceedings before the select standing committee investigating the Beauharnois project has in certain quarters placed its own interpretation upon the evidence which was given there. I have in my hand one publication bearing the following heading:

Beauharnois paid bills of ex-Premier King. Mackenzie King's jaunt to Bermuda with Senator financed by Beauharnois.

I just wish to say Mr. Speaker that no bills of mine were ever paid by Beauharnois. I had no connection whatever with Beauharnois in any way, with respect to any matter of travel or anything else, and also I did not make the trip to Bermuda with Senator McDougald, as one might infer by reading the headings of articles appearing in some newspapers of yesterday and to-day.

The statement upon which these articles are based is a voucher presented yesterday to the committee which reads as follows:

April 30, 1930.—Expenses of trip to Bermuda Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and self, hotel Bermuda, $288.53. Fares Montreal to Bermuda and return, $395.04. Hotel, New York, $168.75. Total, $852.32.

If one were to read this voucher without reading the evidence given yesterday by Senator McDougald, there might be some justification for headings which would seek to place upon the matter the interpretation to which I have referred. Senator McDougald's evidence given yesterday however makes perfectly clear the facts that this voucher was one which was put in, if not by himself by some one connected with his office, that it should never have been put in, that it was not a correct statement of his expenses and that it was in fact wholly erroneous.

May I say that at Easter of last year I paid a visit to Bermuda. On the way through the city of Montreal I saw Senator McDougald. He came into my car for a moment and spoke to me there. I did not see him again until I arrived at Bermuda, and when I was leaving I found that Senator McDougald who had been there during part of my stay had in part settled the account of myself and Senator Haydon who accompanied me on the trip. Senator McDougald left Bermuda before I did, and I did not accompany him to New York. I saw him in New York. I stayed one night at the Ritz Carlton hotel. The senator himself was not in New York at the time; I had received word that he had reserved accommodation there for Senator Haydon and myself and we stayed that night in the hotel. On the following day Senator McDougald came to the hotel with his wife with whom he had been in Atlantic City, and took up the accommodation he had reserved for himself. Senator McDougald did not pay any expenses whatever of either Senator Haydon or myself for transportation from Ottawa to Bermuda either by land or water, nor did he pay any transportation whatever from Bermuda back to Ottawa. All he did was to pay, himself, some of the hotel expenses while he had been a guest with Senator Haydon and myself.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that any attempt to draw an inference from the fact that on an Easter vacation I went to Bermuda with another member of this parliament and was met there by a second member, and that this meant that in any way I was violating any matter of honour in any particular is an inference which cannot be drawn by anyone who has an honourable mind. My purpose in going to Bermuda was twofold: I had in mind first of all the need of some vacation at the Easter recess. As hon. members know, whoever is filling the office of Prime Minister in Canada when parliament is in session is on certain occasions very much in need of rest. I took very few vacations during the time I was Prime Minister, and last year when the house was having the Easter recess I visited Bermuda. The primary object in my mind in going to Bermuda was this: In the government we had been discussing the terms of what is known as the Dunning budget, under which it was proposed to increase the duties against the United States on fruit and vegetables. It was further proposed to reduce the duties under the British preference, and I was anxious to ascertain whether in the event of fruits and vegetables being made free from Bermuda and the West Indies there was a possibility or a probability of Bermuda and the other islands reciprocating by lowering their duties on some of our commodities going into those countries. While in Bermuda I discussed this matter with several members of the legislature and received assurances that if Canada did lower her duties on fruits and vegetables they were quite sure the islands would respond speedily by reducing some duties in our favour. That step was taken very shortly after our return.

Had I been thinking of enjoying a vacation at the expense of anyone I might, I suppose, have interpreted the trip—had I so desired to do, or been of a mind to do that kind of thing—as one which was associated with public business. I was so scrupulously careful however to avoid anything which might even remotely resemble anything of the kind that I regarded the entire trip to Bermuda and return as a vacation, and not a cent of money was charged against any account of the government or of any other organization or corporation of which I have any knowledge whatever.

I just wish to make that statement, Mr. Speaker, repeating that I am in no way responsible for any bills that may have been submitted by Senator McDougald to the Beauharnois company. I had no knowledge whatever of any such bills being submitted. I was horrified when I learned of the voucher that was presented before the committee; so much so that I immediately went to the Prime Minister and told him of my trip to Bermuda and the circumstances surrounding it. I fail yet to understand how any such voucher could possibly have been put in. I want the house to understand that any bills that were put into the Beauharnois company were not put in with my knowledge or with my consent; they were not put in by me or on my account, but were put in by Senator McDougald with respect to expenses which he himself had incurred.

May I add this further fact, which possibly I should have mentioned at the outset: That I had no knowledge that Senator McDougald had settled the hotel account at Bermuda until I was about to pay my bill, when the clerk informed me that the Senator, before leaving, had paid the account—for the most part, not in its entirety—and that therefore there was no further charge to be made in connection therewith.

Mr. BURY: Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the house, there is one important statement that I should have made. During the entire trip to Bermuda I never discussed the question of Beauharnois either with Senator Haydon or with Senator McDougald, or with anyone else, nor have I at any time discussed with Senator McDougald any matters pertaining to the Beauharnois.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED JUNE 18

EX-SERVICE MEN—HOSPITALIZATION

Mr. AHEARN:

Will the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health consider giving hospitalization to all ex-service men, regardless of length of service, who are suffering from tuberculosis and who appeal to the Department of Pensions and National Health for help?

Mr. MacLAREN: It has been and still is under the consideration of the department.

POULAMOND WHARF—ENGINEER'S REPORT

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Has an engineer's report been received on building a wharf or an extension to the existing wharf, at Poulamond, Richmond county, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, is such report favourable?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, it would not appear to be in the public interest at this stage to give an answer to this question. It asks for information received for the guidance of the department, and until some action is taken on the report I submit an answer should not be given to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

CHEVALIER'S SCOW

Mr. SEGUIN:

1. Did one Chevalier offer for sale to the harbour commissioners of Quebec or Montreal a scow owned and operated by him?
2. If so, what is the name of said scow?
3. What price did the said Chevalier demand for the said scow?
4. Have the harbour commissioners of Quebec or Montreal purchased said scow?
5. If so, what price did they pay for same?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. DURANLEAU:

The following answers have been furnished by the harbour commissioners of Quebec:—

1. There is no record in the Quebec harbour commissioners' files regarding such an offer, and the officials of the commission do not recollect any such offer being made.
2. The name of said scow is unknown.
3. The commissioners are ignorant of the price which the said Chevalier wished to obtain for his scow.

5. Does the contractor hold a position with the Ontario government?
6. Who let this contract on behalf of the federal government?
7. Who recommended the present contractor?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1 to 7. There is no contract. The arrangement this season is the same as in previous years whereby the work is done under the immediate supervision of Mr. C. L. Parrott, sub-agent of the marine department at Kenora, who is authorized to purchase material and hire labour, and tug, as required. The work is more extensive this season than formerly on account of change in level of lake.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PUBLIC WORKS COAL CONTRACTS IN MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. RALSTON:

1. To whom were contracts awarded for coal to be delivered to the Department of Public Works for consumption in the maritime provinces?
2. What grade of coal did the contracts call for and what price is to be paid, in each case?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I desire to inquire of the member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) which year he has in mind, the current or the past year?

Mr. RALSTON: Any contract that has been let or dealt with since my hon. friend has had charge of the department.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Then I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that this question stand as an order for return.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR

ADVANCE OF $450,000 FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners not exceeding $450,000 for the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works, and the deposit of the debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BANK NOTE CIRCULATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, some little time ago I put certain questions on the order paper with respect to bank note circulation, and they were answered on July 6. This was one of the questions:

What was the total of chartered bank notes in circulation on 31st May, 1931?

To which this answer was given:

$123,749,693.

Looking at the return of the chartered banks to the Department of Finance, made at a later date, I find under the heading "Notes in circulation" the total amount given as $143,749,692, or a difference of $20,000,000, less $1. This may be a clerical error, but I should like to know which amount is correct.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance): I shall read the Hansard report of what the hon. gentleman has said and answer him to-morrow.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. VENIOT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Before going on with the orders of the day I rise to a question of privilege, which includes the privileges of parliament as well as the personal privileges of myself as a member of parliament. On April 27 an order was passed for the production of papers in the case of Nordin v. the King. These papers were asked for by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White): Seeing that the papers were not produced, and being interested in obtaining the information contained in that file, on June 5 I took up the matter. The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) then informed me that he would look into the matter. I believe this was on a Friday, and the following Monday or Tuesday he informed me that he had discovered that the wrong file had been looked at, and that later on the matter would be attended to.

Up to the present time these papers have not been produced. Since this file has to do entirely with the Department of Railways and Canals, and since it is not the practice for the Secretary of State to produce papers except when they come from more than one department, I would now ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) if there is any reason why these papers have not been produced, or if there is any reason why they should not be produced. When the minister gives that reason I should like to have the opportunity, on a question of privilege, of discussing the matter further.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): It is not in the least the fault of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) that these papers have not been produced. It is my own fault, or perhaps I should say it is to my credit that this has not been done, and the reason is this: The production of these papers is being asked for —and in saying this I am in no way reflecting upon my hon. friend—for the purpose of permitting someone who wishes to sue the government to get certain information from our files. Since our department does not believe that the people who are going to sue the government in this matter have a just case, it was and is my opinion that it is not the duty of the government or of any department of the government to submit files for the purpose of enlightening some legal firm who may desire to secure information from those files which will assist them in preparing their case. I am not saying this in any spirit of criticism with regard to my hon. friend, because an hon. member on this side of the house moved for the production of those papers, I believe, on a previous occasion. The resolution slipped through; I do not remember when it was passed and I do not remember knowing anything about it when it did go through, but at any rate it was passed.

Mr. VENIOT: On April 22.

Mr. MANION: I do not question that, nor do I question my hon. friend's intentions at all. But I repeat that I cannot see why, in a case like this, the government should be in a different position from a private corporation, which certainly would not show its files to an opposing group who might desire to sue them. I think the government, in the public interest, should refuse to permit the file to be brought down.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that the infallible justice of the crown?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend had better stick to free trade.

Mr. VENIOT: In discussing this matter further permit me to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals first to the fact that an order of this house has been passed directing that these papers be produced, and the minister himself has no right to refuse to obey the orders of this house. If there were any serious objections to be taken to the production of these papers they should have been taken at the time the motion was before the house. No objections were taken. Further, let me refer to standing order 51, which has to do with the papers that may be produced. Among others I find:

. . . . for returns of petitions of right . . . .

There has been a petition of right in this case, and I claim that as a member of this house I am entitled to have that petition of right brought down and action taken upon it. Then the standing order goes on:

. . . . and cases before supreme and exchequer courts. . . .

Let me go further: It is a principle of British justice that the crown shall do nothing to prevent a citizen of the country from obtaining justice, and that the crown should in every way facilitate the obtaining of that justice. We have rulings on that point even from the privy council, and that is well laid down.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member has brought up this question and I have answered it. It is true that the order of the house has been passed; I do not question that, but the order of the house does not state when the return must be brought down. The reason I rise to a point of order is that I do not think this is the proper time to discuss this case. If the hon. member will wait, we will have some supplementary estimates for my department and I will be properly prepared to discuss the matter. I did not know it was coming up today and am not fully informed as to the facts. If the hon. member cares to discuss it then I would be quite ready to answer him, but I do not think this is in order on the orders of the day.

Mr. VENIOT: I rise to a point of order having to do with the privileges of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: When an hon. member has a complaint to make with regard to the production of papers, the proper time to make the complaint is on the orders of the day.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member has brought up the question and I have answered him. I do not think he has any right to go on and discuss all the details of the case at this time.

Mr. VENIOT: Under your ruling, Mr. Speaker, let me proceed further. Paragraph 450, under standing order 51—

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Did we understand you, Mr. Speaker, to rule that there could be a debate on this question on the orders of the day? The hon. member rose to a question of privilege. He has stated his question; a reply has been given by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and now the hon. member seeks to debate the question. If he is not satisfied he has other remedies; he can move a vote of censure on the minister; he can bring up the matter when we take up the estimates of the Department of Railways and Canals, but certainly he cannot debate it on the orders of the day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand the hon. member to be entering upon a debate; I understood him to be stating his position more fully. I hope he will not trespass upon the indulgence of the house to any great extent.

Mr. MANION: May I suggest—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that since this case is about twenty years old now, a few days more cannot make much difference.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not my intention to discuss the merits or demerits of the case, but as a member of this house I wish to have the privileges of parliament safeguarded.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rules are quite clear. The resolution came before the house and the house decided that the papers should be produced. As yet they have not been produced, and if they are not brought down the hon. member has a remedy. There is no point now in citing standing orders and rules of the house. I would say that the incident had better be closed for the time being.

Mr. VENIOT: But surely I can refer to the grounds upon which I am bringing up the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no question as to the right of the hon. member to the production of the papers as the matter now stands. It requires no argument to convince the house, I think, or to convince me that he is entitled to have those papers brought down.

MAFEKING CUT-OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) if the report of the engineers in connection with the Mafeking cut-off will be made available to hon. members of the house before the session closes.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): No, it will not. It is somewhat lengthy and we have not had time to give it proper study. Probably it will be available next session.

DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): On July 8 an order of the house was passed:

For a copy of the report made by Mr. W. R. Little, of the Department of Immigration, covering an inquiry held in Glasgow, Scotland, in April, 1930, with reference to complaints made by Mr. A. M. Graham.

That order, as I say, was passed on July 8, but the notice had appeared on the order paper for at least two weeks before that. I knew there was hesitation on the part of the government in allowing that order to pass, but finally it was allowed to pass. Then the Prime Minister, in answer to another question of mine, made the statement that all the documents would not be produced, some of them being of an interdepartmental nature. Up to the present I have received none of the documents. In view of the fact that the government have not intended to supply all the papers in this connection, I am entitled to know as soon as possible just what they do intend to produce; for there might then arise a further question as to whether I was receiving all that I was entitled to. I would ask that whatever documents the government intend to produce be brought down as speedily as possible.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): The information for which the hon. gentleman asks arose, if my recollection serves me correctly, out of an investigation that was conducted by the late government, concerning the dismissal of a civil servant. It is true there has been some delay in making the return, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that it was not because this government was at all hesitant about making it. I will have the matter investigated this afternoon.

INSPECTOR OF CUSTOMS—CHANDLER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspé): Some time ago a motion was passed in the matter of the dismissal of C. E. Thibault of Chandler, as inspector of customs. I should like to know when those papers will be laid on the table of the house.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I shall have to inquire into the matter. The returns already brought down exceed some 400 in number, nearly three times the number brought down in any previous session of the house except three. An effort is being made to expedite the production of documents. Stenographers are kept busy night and day preparing these papers, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that there will be no delay on the part of the Secretary of State. I shall make an investigation.

CANADIAN COPYRIGHT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): On July 2, I asked the Secretary of State certain questions with reference to the copyright situation in Canada, and on July 6, the questions were passed as an order for return. I would impress upon the hon. gentleman the importance of the questions I asked and would request him to press the matter. It is of considerable importance to know whether the copyright law is to be fully enforced in Canada; whether we are to adhere to the Berne convention; and what the status of the law is at the present time. The house will shortly prorogue and we are not aware whether that law is yet in effect. If the Secretary of State will refer to the questions I asked he will see how urgent it is that they be answered. Once more I impress upon him the importance of this matter.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): The answer to the question whether or not the amended Copyright Act is in force in Canada is so obviously within the knowledge of the hon. gentleman, as it is within mine, that that particular question seemed to be of no special importance. The act was passed, it received the assent of the Governor General, and that assent was reported to the house. The other questions involve communications with the Dominion government office in London, the ascertaining from the government of Switzerland what other countries are adhering to the Rome convention, and other questions which can be answered only by information obtained from abroad. I understand that the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs is making due inquiry, and as soon as the information is obtained it will be placed at the disposal of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Arising out of the remarks of the Secretary of State, I might, if I so desired, raise a question of privilege. I should have reason to resent the inference which may be drawn from his observation that I ought to be aware that the Copyright Act is in force in Canada. I am aware that it is in force, but I am not aware that the revised convention of Berne, to which we were supposed to adhere, and which is an appendix to that law, is in force in Canada. I should be very much interested if the hon. gentleman would say whether Canada is at present an adherent of the Rome convention, and whether the appendix to the act is in force or not. As a matter of fact, I doubt whether he himself knows.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no doubt that the government of Canada requested His Majesty to adhere, on behalf of Canada, to the Rome convention, some days before the expiry of the time fixed—I think it was June 30. The hon. gentleman asks what other nations have adhered, and we must obtain that information from abroad. It has not yet been obtained. With regard to the Rome convention being in force in Canada, this Dominion has adhered to that convention and this parliament has enacted the legislation which has been deemed necessary in order that the provisions of the convention may be enforced in the courts of Canada.

NEW WESTMINSTER PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to direct to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) a question based on the reply he made to an inquiry of mine on July 8, when I discussed matters affecting the administration of the penitentiary at New Westminster. At that time I asked him, in view of statements that had been made with respect to dismissals that had occurred in 1928, during the time Inspector Jackson was in charge, whether the government intended to hold an inquiry and, if so, whether it would be of the fullest nature possible. The Minister of Justice, in reply, stated that no inquiry had then been instituted. In view of many serious statements that have now reached me concerning the administration of the penitentiary at New Westminster since the present officer took charge, some eighteen men, nearly all returned soldiers, having been dismissed, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether he will now institute a full inquiry into all matters affecting the present administration of the penitentiary.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman was good enough the day before yesterday to mention this matter to me, and he gave me a synopsis of some of the complaints which had reached him in regard to the administration of the New Westminster penitentiary. The matters which he brought to my attention I have referred to the officers of the department in order that they may obtain reports thereon. The whole question of the administration of this penitentiary is receiving the consideration of the department, but I am not prepared at the moment to announce any conclusion with respect to the matter.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, On April 27 an order of the house did issue as follows:

> For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between any or all of the Canadian oil refining companies and any department of the government since May 1, 1930, in regard to the importation of oil or oil products.

When can we expect this return?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I will make inquiry and inform my hon. friend at the earliest possible date.

RESTIGOUCHE RIVER BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) to a matter of urgency to our district. The provinces of New Brunswick and Quebec have undertaken by orders in council to provide for an interprovincial bridge over the Restigouche river. Is the hon. minister in a position to say whether effect will be given to this agreement? The commencement of this work would supply much needed employment to the district. The bridge has been needed for many years and each of the two provinces has agreed to pay one-third of the cost.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to inform me that he proposed to ask this question. A copy of an order in council was received recently from the Minister of Public Works of the province of Quebec intimating that that province was prepared to pay a portion of the cost of this bridge. Some time ago an order in council of similar purport had been received from the province of New Brunswick. Under these circumstances the Department of Public Works of Canada is prepared to enter into a discussion of the whole matter with these two provinces.

MARKETING OF WHEAT

POOL ELEVATORS—CORRESPONDENCE CONTAINING PROPOSALS TO THREE WESTERN PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and asked if it would be possible for him to produce a copy of the correspondence containing the proposals he made to the three western premiers regarding the marketing of this year's crop. The Prime Minister promised to bring down this correspondence at six o'clock of that day, but as yet I have not received it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I told the hon. gentleman the purport of the letter which had been written to the three premiers. I have a copy of that letter but I neglected to bring it to the chamber because of having told my hon. friend what was contained in the letter. I did not go to the east block that night and the matter did not again cross my mind.

CIVIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): I should like to ask the government a question. I regret I am unable to do so in English and receive a direct answer from the Prime Minister, however, I hope that the French Canadian ministers will give me the information either in French or English, as they may think proper.

I wish to know whether the government holds the views that it is preferable to place an employee on the retired list when it is found that his services are not satisfactory.

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): We shall consider the matter.

AUSTRALIAN TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 123, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and Australia.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when I moved for leave to introduce this bill to ratify the trade agreement made between Australia and Canada and Canada and Australia I indicated in a general way what were the provisions of the agreement. The bill now before the house, the second reading of which I have just moved, provides for the ratification of that agreement. I assume that every hon. member has in the meantime probably read the agreement and is familiar with its provisions, but I will state briefly the general principles that governed in connection with its negotiation and execution.

It was realized that Australia produces a large number of commodities which are not produced in Canada and which Canada must import from some other part of the world. It was realized that Canada produces commodities which Australia imports and buys from other parts of the world. The agreement endeavours to provide and does in fact provide that such commodities as Canada produces and Australia requires shall find a favoured market in Australia and that such commodities as Australia produces and Canada requires shall find a favoured place in Canadian markets. That is the first great principle which governed in the negotiation of this agreement.

In the second place it has been provided that where goods or commodities are produced in Australia which would compete with Canadian goods or commodities, then there must be such tariff provisions as will ensure fair competition in Canada to the goods from Australia, and equally, goods produced in Canada which come into competition with Australian goods in Australia shall, by virtue of the tariff provisions, enter into fair competition in Australia with Australian goods.

I need hardly say that the effort made to negotiate this measure of reciprocity in trade between the two countries is further predicated upon the thought that the agreement must be of mutual advantage to both countries. If the principles to which I have alluded are applied, obviously they will be of mutual advantage to the communities affected. Unless a trade agreement benefits both countries it is not usually of very much use, but we believe and the Australians believe that the application of these principles will be mutually advantageous to Australia and to Canada.

In 1925 a trade agreement was negotiated with Australia. Under the terms of that agreement Canada received British preferential treatment with respect to four items out of a total tariff of 430 items; under the new agreement Canada will receive British preferential treatment on 415 items out of a total of 433. Under the agreement of 1925, Canada received intermediate tariff treatment on four items; under the agreement now before the house, Canada will receive intermediate tariff treatment on six items. Under the agreement of 1925, the general tariff applied on exportations to Australia in the case of 422 items; under the new agreement, the general tariff applies only to twelve items. In other words, while there were 430 items in the tariff of 1925 and 433 items in the tariff of 1931, we receive preferential treatment with respect to 421 items while the general tariff applies only to twelve items. Under the agreement of 1925, the general tariff applied to 422 items while preferential treatment was given only to eight items. The new agreement indicates a distinct advance and I believe it will commend itself to the judgment of this house and of the country. We are sure that this agreement will expand the trade of Canada in the east as well as in the west and it will afford an opportunity for raw materials as well as for finished products.

If on first perusal there are those who believe that too favourable treatment has been extended to Australia, in the main it will be because they have not perused the agreement with care. No agreement can be of service which does not afford a fair opportunity to Australia, such as we ourselves seek in her markets. I need hardly point out that I received a communication from a friend of mine saying that he was very much alarmed with regard to meats. He said that it was a serious situation, because Australia could produce meat readily. I replied that under the present agreement the rate was one-half cent a pound, but in order to maintain the principle to which I alluded in my earlier remarks, we have provided a duty of three cents a pound, which is four times what it was before with respect to some items, and six times what it was with respect to others.

[Mr. Bennett.]

With regard to eggs which were on the free list under the old agreement, we have not imported a dollar's worth of eggs since the agreement was made. Now we have provided that there shall be a duty of two cents a dozen against importations except during certain months of the year. We have also made provision with respect to fruits and other products of the tropical sections of Australia. We have provided a market for the lumber of this country. I say frankly, as I have so often said, I have always found it difficult to understand how any bargain could be made with Australia that did not make some provision for a preference being given to Canadian lumber in that commonwealth; but such was not the case. In this agreement, however, that provision is made.

I shall not go through the various items in the schedule to the agreement, because they will be dealt with in committee. The bill follows the course that has usually been adopted in such cases and ratifies and confirms the agreement as it stands. It provides that if there is any inconsistency between the agreement and the act which ratifies it, and any other laws, the provisions of the act and the agreement shall prevail. Lastly, it provides that the agreement shall come into force on a day agreed upon by the government of Australia and the government of Canada as a result of a proclamation to be made by the governor in council in that commonwealth and in Canada as well.

I do not think there is anything I can usefully add to what I have said as to the principles that have governed in the negotiation of the agreement. How they have been applied will be observed as the house proceeds to consider the agreement in committee. I believe it is such an agreement as will commend itself to the thoughtful and considered judgment of the house. I am already advised that it commends itself to the business community of Canada in every part of it, and although at first sight there were some items that invited criticism, on further investigation it was found that there was no warrant for such criticism, nothing but a frank recognition of two great principles which have governed the negotiation of an agreement between two British commonwealths. We believe also this is a step towards the development of empire trade on sound lines, not of endeavouring to get without giving nor of giving without getting, but of giving and getting. That principle has governed and it will be the ultimate principle that will govern and prevail with respect to the development of trade throughout the British Empire.

second reading of which has just been moved by my right hon. friend, is one which creates a new trade agreement with Australia. Inasmuch as the previous Liberal administration was the first to initiate a trade agreement with that particular sister dominion, we naturally take no exception to the underlying principle of the bill. The fact that this bill also recognizes the importance of reciprocal treatment in trade between different parts of the British Empire makes it only the more commendable in principle to those of us on this side of the house, for it will be remembered that it was a Liberal administration which was the first to introduce the principle of the British preference, and the first to make it an empire preference.

My right hon. friend spoke of some things being produced in Australia which could not be produced in Canada, and some things being produced in Canada which could not be produced in Australia. He said that the trade treaty would make possible the exchange of those particular commodities. In speaking on the budget I pointed out that I believed it would be possible for the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in negotiating a treaty in accordance with the principles which he had laid down as those which should govern in trade agreements, to go further in negotiating a treaty with Australia, than would be the case with any other of the sister dominions, and very much further than would be possible in a trade agreement with the mother country, and this for the particular reason that Australia being a tropical or quasi-tropical country and Canada being in the temperate zone, there would, in the nature of things, be more in the way of what might be described as an absolute advantage in production on the part of each one of these countries in its relation to the other with respect to certain commodities than would be the case as regards Canada in relation to any other country. Therefore I am not surprised that my right hon. friend has started with Australia in his effort to make the further trade treaties which he has in mind.

But may I say that when he provides in this treaty for trading to any extent beyond the point of absolute advantage, he runs counter to the principle which he laid down as being fundamental in trade treaties, namely, that nothing should be imported into Canada which can be produced or manufactured in Canada. I think those are the words which the Prime Minister himself on different occasions has given to the house as setting forth his policy in trade matters. He has said repeatedly, that it is our business to see that what can be produced or manufactured in Canada should not be permitted to be imported from other countries. There is in this treaty a considerable departure from that principle, and, indeed, if there had not been, I question very much whether any treaty could have been made.

My right hon. friend spoke of mutual advantage. I should like to ask him if he can tell me of any exchange that is ever made between individuals that is not believed to be in the nature of mutual advantage. Mutual advantage is of the very essence of exchange. One person parts with what he possesses either in the form of goods or money for something which he wishes to get in exchange and which will mean more to him as a consequence of his exchange than to retain the commodity or the money which he exchanges for it. What is true on one side of a bargain is equally true on the other. International trade is nothing more than trade between individuals at large so far as one nation is concerned with individuals at large so far as another nation is concerned. All trade is, as I have already said, in the nature of an exchange for purposes of mutual advantage. It is there that there is a real difference between my right hon. friend and those who follow the doctrines which he lays down, and those of us on this side who believe that with greater freedom of trade there will be in the end a greater national development.

My right hon. friend has said that he assumes we have all had an opportunity to study this treaty and that we can discuss its items in committee. The criticism which I have to direct most strongly against the government with respect to this measure is that they have waited until the close of the session, at a time when there are so many important measures before the house, to bring in this particular treaty. There has really been no opportunity at all in the time that we have had since the agreement was laid upon the table, to consider its features in any proper manner. My right hon. friend speaks of four hundred and some odd items in one relationship and some four hundred odd or more in another. The value of the agreement can be estimated only when we discover the true significance of the different items. It may well be that some of them will indicate so far as Canada is concerned a possibility of more advantageous trade with Australia than that which existed before. Unless however we know in all items what the Australian tariff is in comparison with our own tariff we cannot make the comparisons necessary to draw proper deductions. That opportunity hon. members of this house have not had. In speaking the other day my right hon. friend said that he himself could not give the house a statement as to what the Australian tariff actually was, that it was being constantly changed, and that it was being changed at this very time. I have no doubt that some of those alterations will very materially affect the value of the agreement. My right hon. friend has said under the old treaty a very small number of commodities, relatively, were given a preference, while under the proposed treaty a very large number would be given a preference. Whether that preference means anything or not will depend upon the preferential tariff which exists in Australia, and whether it will mean more or less to Australia than to Canada will depend upon whether the preference given under the tariff in Canada is greater or less than that given by Australia to Canada. The Minister of Finance will not deny that the preference which under her customs tariff Canada gives Australia is very much greater than that which Australia gives to Canada under her customs tariff. So far as there is an advantage of one country over another in the exchange of goods or commodities, in this instance the advantage lies with Australia rather than with Canada. May I state further that the height of the preferential tariff in Australia is I believe in many cases quite as great if not greater than that of our general tariff,—certainly as great as that of our general tariff as it existed before it was amended in the special and present sessions.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the right hon. gentleman does not understand; on 400 odd items they extend to us the British preference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Exactly. On 400 items there is the British preference, but the British preference in Australia differs from the British preference in Canada. That is the point I am trying to make. Whereas in Canada the tariff rates governing our British preference might be rated—and I speak without reference to any particular item —at something like 20 per cent, that is to say the duty might average 20 per cent, in Australia in all probability it will be 40 per cent.

Mr. EULER: Much more than that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend the former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) says it will be much more than that. In other words the preference granted by Australia when it is examined carefully so as correctly to understand this measure, really does not amount to very much because even the preferential tariff is already virtually prohibitive.

In Australia they have done what my right hon. friend is attempting to do in Canada. They have really made it impossible, even under the British preference, for commodities produced or manufactured outside of Australia to be imported into that country. What the result of that policy has been one has but to study the conditions in Australia to learn. Certainly it would scarcely be proper to refer here to a condition in any other country, particularly that of a sister dominion. The general position of Australia as contrasted with that of Canada is, however, well enough known to enable us to see for ourselves that the policy of making the tariff, both general and preferential, so high that most commodities cannot enter a country thereby restricting trade in large part, is not a policy which in the long run makes for good. In connection with the Australian tariff there is a 50 per cent—is it a surtax?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, a surtax, in addition to the tariff which has to be met, that makes the importation of most commodities from this country into Australia almost prohibitive.

There is another circumstance which is most important and which I believe in large part will determine the fate of the proposed treaty, namely, the position of the currency in Australia at the present time. As is generally known the currency of that country is considerably depreciated, and in estimating how far it will be possible for Australia to purchase commodities from Canada we have to take into account the position of the credit and currency of that country. Again I say that I do not think it would be proper to reflect upon conditions in a sister dominion. I mention this matter however simply as one of the outstanding economic facts which has to be considered in discerning the merits of an agreement of this kind. It may be that if the government hopes to derive any real benefit from this proposed trade agreement it will have to extend credits to Australia to enable that country to purchase goods from Canada. If we are to judge from previous experience in giving credits to other countries to enable them to purchase our commodities, I submit that great care would have to be exercised before such a step should again be taken.

My right hon. friend has referred to the lumber industry and has said he could scarcely imagine an effective trade agreement with Australia which did not include a considerable opportunity for the export of lumber from Canada. He frequently speaks of the depletion of our natural resources as one of the terrible results of trade. Lumber is a manufactured natural resource. Following him in his own view I see somewhat of a contradiction in an arrangement which enables us to part more rapidly than we ought with the great natural resources of our forests.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure my right hon. friend knows that, like other things, lumber reaches maturity, and as it reaches maturity it should be cut and sold.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would remind my right hon. friend that in regard to our forests reforestation is a means by which natural resources may be preserved, and the parting in some measure with a natural resource through trade does not always mean its exhaustion, as my right hon. friend on different occasions has sought to make us believe. With respect to lumber however while my right hon. friend is pleased to credit his administration with what has been achieved in connection with that commodity may I say to him that he is reaping where others have sown. As he is well aware, for some time past there have been a number of gentlemen in Australia who went from the province of British Columbia with a view if possible so to persuade public opinion as to make possible a larger export of lumber from Canada to Australia. Those gentlemen were active during the time the previous Liberal administration was in office, and had that administration been returned to power I have no doubt that the Australian tariff would to-day be amended with respect to lumber in very much the same way as my right hon. friend has changed it.

These are the points I wish most to make. I have only this further to add, that after all, the benefit of the proposed trade agreement in comparison with the benefit derived from the previous one will be known only by results. The previous agreement was negotiated in 1925 and we have its effect on record. We know what the total trade of Canada with Australia became after the agreement had been in force and what our exports and imports were. It might be well for me to place on record the figures in that connection so that the house will have before it for purposes of future comparison the extent of the relative benefits derived. If I might be permitted to do so, I should like to place the figures on Hansard in detail. These are the figures:

Trade With Australia
Under Australian Treaty, 1926

	Imports	Exports	Total trade
*1925. . .	$2,634,713	$12,035,086	$14,669,799
1926. . .	3,042,054	15,411,746	18,453,800
1927. . .	6,296,165	18,965,881	25,262,046
1928. . .	5,301,618	14,189,446	19,491,064
1929. . .	3,484,836	19,470,305	22,955,141

*Year prior to treaty.

In other words, comparing the trade figures of 1925 and 1929, our exports to Australia increased $7,435,219, and our imports from Australia increased $850,123. I should like to ask hon. members: Was not that a good bargain for Canada? Did it not provide a lucrative market for Canadian goods? Did Canada not gain? As a matter of fact Canada under its previous treaty was exporting to Australia on an average four times as much in the way of commodities as it was importing from that country. That was the extent of the relative advantage under the last agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman did not give the figures for 1930 and 1931.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the figures.

Mr. BENNETT: I have them here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend is aware, the trade depression which affects the whole world set in in 1930, and I have no doubt it has had its effect upon the trade relations between Australia and Canada as well as upon trade relations elsewhere. But I am giving the figures I have for the time during which the old agreement was in existence under normal conditions.

Now may I say that personally I hope the new agreement so far as Canada is concerned will prove to be even more beneficial than the last. Surely we are all sufficiently one in our regard for the interests of the whole country to wish that any agreement which may be made by any government will be of great benefit to our country, and I do not wish to say a word that will in any way prejudice the success of this agreement. I hope it may prove to be all that the government expects it to be, but "by their fruits ye shall know them," and as the years go by it will be interesting to compare the results of my right hon. friend's negotiations under the views in respect to international trade which he entertains with the results which were obtained during the first few years the agreement, as inaugurated by the previous administration was in existence.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask the right hon. leader of the opposition in what way he considers the depreciated condition of Australian money works to the advantage of that state in that trade?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Works to the advantage of that state? I think it works very much to the disadvantage of our state.

I cannot see that the depreciated currency of Australia is going to help the Canadian who has commodities to sell to Australia. That is the point I was making. It will take much more depreciated currency to buy a commodity in terms of dollars than it would require of a currency that was not depreciated.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is it not as broad as it is long, is there not that much more of the currency in circulation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If currency was just a nominal affair and we could put whatever denomination we liked on our values, my hon. friend's argument would be correct; but my view is that currency is a measure of value and a medium of exchange, and so far as it is a medium of exchange its real worth in international relations is just what a given quantity will buy in terms of commodities.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, so far as I could hear the statement of the Prime Minister, I feel that very little exception, if any, could be taken to the basis which he says underlies the negotiations for this treaty. The number of items which have received the benefit of the Australian British preferential tariff is not necessarily any indication of the real worth of the treaty. I believe that on many items the Australian British preferential tariff is so high that we cannot expect to sell any goods to Australia.

I have not had time to secure the Australian tariff and go into the details of these different items, and I think we must wait until the committee stage is reached before we can determine how much value the British preferential tariff on any of these items will be to Canada. I hope the agreement will be just as beneficial to Canada as the Prime Minister seems to expect, but I think there is a tendency to overrate the advantages likely to accrue to Canada. In this connection I desire to quote from the Financial Post of the 18th instant. I am citing this paper because it is considered a very reliable financial journal. Dealing with the new trade treaty with Australia it says:

> The Australian treaty opens up, for the first time, substantial opportunities for many classes of Canadian producers in Australia. Canadians, in many items, are put on a parity with British manufacturers. Canada has a geographical advantage in relation to Australia which will be of help in some lines, unimportant in others.
> Yet too much must not be expected of the treaty at the moment. Australian purchasing power is at a low ebb; Australian exchange is subject to a large discount. This penalizes importers by 30 per cent and gives to Australian exporters a corresponding advantage.

That is the point I want to emphasize for the moment, particularly the concluding words:

> This penalizes importers by 30 per cent and gives to Australian exporters a corresponding advantage.

That corresponding advantage will amount to 30 per cent. Looking at schedule A of the treaty for a moment I find the first item mentioned there, meat, fresh, namely: (a) beef and veal, 3 cents per pound.

Assuming for the sake of argument these meats would be worth on the average 10 cents a pound when imported into Canada, the premium which the Australian exporter would receive would amount to 3 cents a pound, which would be equivalent to the duty that we have placed against beef and veal coming from Australia. That is putting us on a free trade basis so far as those two meats are concerned. On (b) lamb and mutton, the duty is 3 cents per pound. Lamb and mutton, I think, would have a slightly higher value than 10 cents a pound. But assuming for the moment that the value would be only 10 cents a pound, the exporter from Australia would have a premium of 3 cents a pound on the present rates of exchange. The next item on the schedule is canned meats, poultry or game; extracts of meats and fluid beef, not medicated, 15 per cent ad valorem. Clearly the 30 per cent advantage enjoyed by the Australian exporter will give him a sufficient premium to more than pay the tariff; it is practically double the tariff placed against canned meats. Coming down to eggs in the shell, they are free during the months of January and February; British preferential tariff during the other months of the year. That rate, I believe, is 2 cents a dozen. If these eggs have a value of even 10 cents a dozen when landed in Canada, the premium enjoyed by the Australian exporter will be 3 cents a dozen, which is more than the tariff placed against the Australian exporter to Canada. Then take cheese, item No. 17, on which the duty is 1 cent per pound. I suppose cheese should be worth at least 10 cents per pound wholesale, so the premium which the Australian exporter would enjoy would be 3 cents per pound, while our tariff is only 1 cent per pound. Then we come to butter, which is a very controversial item. Butter carries a duty of 5 cents per pound. I take it for granted that butter coming from Australia would be worth at least 20 cents a pound, so the premium of 30 per cent enjoyed by the Australian exporter would be 6 cents a pound, which would more than pay the duty.

Mr. BENNETT: But the five cents per pound duty would have to be paid in Canadian money.

Mr. COOTE: Then you could deduct a small percentage from the six cents; it would leave at least five cents per pound. Then we come to hops, and I find that in the calendar year 1929, hops imported had an average value of 22 cents per pound, so the premium of 30 per cent on hops would practically pay the duty of six cents per pound under this tariff.

I do not wish to deal with any of the other items in detail at the moment, since we will take those up in committee, but I do want to point out that this premium which is enjoyed by the exporter in Australia is going to place him practically on a free trade basis in exporting goods to Canada. I know many members of the house think the advantage enjoyed by the Australian exporter is a myth, and for their benefit I should like to quote very briefly from a speech delivered in this house in 1922 by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) in dealing with the budget of that year. The minister was referring to the question of depreciated currency and was urging upon the then Minister of Finance the necessity for placing a special duty on goods coming from countries whose currency had depreciated by more than 50 per cent. Of course the Australian currency is only depreciated at this moment by about 30 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: No, 24 per cent.

Mr. COOTE: The last figure I saw was 30 per cent, but whether it is 24 per cent or 30 per cent the same principle applies. I quote from the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as they appear in Hansard for June 8, 1922, at page 2642:

> Now, I come to the next point, and that is the depreciated currency clause passed in amendment to the Customs Act last year. It is not necessary for me to go into the details of what it was; it was in effect simply this: That in any country where the currency had depreciated below a point of 50 per cent of par, the valuation for duty purposes upon goods imported from that country should be figured at a rate not less than 50 per cent.

Then he went on to deal with the German situation and to show that the tariff was very inadequate. Later on he referred to a statement made by the then member for West York, Sir Henry Drayton, as follows:

> . . . . let me refer to a statement made by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), that this constituted free trade with Germany. I want to say to the house that it does not constitute free trade with Germany; it constitutes paying a premium on German imports.

I agree with what the hon. member said at that time. Then he went on to quote authorities to prove that this really was paying a premium. I do not want to take up too much of the time of the house, so I am only quoting very briefly from the remarks of the minister at that time. He went on to quote Doctor Melchior, a very prominent German economist, from an article which had appeared in the Manchester Guardian a short time previously, as follows:

> The international value of the mark has a natural connection with its purchasing power in Germany, which in turn depends on inflation. The internal purchasing power of the mark . . . . is at present (April, 1922), between two and three times its international value. . . .

Then the minister said:

> I want the house to follow very closely these last few words:

And he concluded the quotation from Doctor Melchior:

> The falling currency has, it is true, brought apparent prosperity to German industry by means of a premium on exports—

Then the minister proceeded to quote further:

> —which at the same time cripples the industries of the competing countries.

Doctor Melchior is an outstanding German economist who was very familiar with the German situation. There is no question but that he stated the case correctly; I am stating it correctly to-day, and the Financial Post is stating it correctly when it says the present rate which has to be paid in Australia for foreign exchange is creating a premium on the exports of that country which at the same time is crippling the industries of competing countries. Then the minister proceeded:

> This is not my statement; this is not the statement of some wild-eyed, prejudiced person seeking vengeance on Germany; this is the statement of the highest economic authority in Germany who was at Versailles, who was the head of their economic agents and experts, and who has been at the head of almost every one of their conferences. Let me emphasize the words of Doctor Melchior: "Which at the same time cripples the industries of competing countries."

Then the minister went on to give some very good figures showing how impossible it was for a Canadian manufacturer, or a British or American manufacturer, to compete with Germany, and he proceeded to say:

Now, this is what I want to emphasize. The Canadian manufacturer to-day is manufacturing at a lower cost and under-selling both the British and the American manufacturer of this particular article.

He was referring to some kind of knife, and I want to direct attention to these words:

Why should we ask him, however, to compete with such utterly unfair competition as that to which I have referred with this depreciated currency?

I am not suggesting for a moment that the depreciated currency of Australia to-day compares at all with the depreciated currency of Germany in 1922, but I say that the same principle is involved when we have to compete with goods coming from Australia. Just on that point I should like to quote from an unquestioned authority in regard to this matter, in order to prove that the Australian exporter enjoys a premium. A week or two ago we had before the agricultural committee Mr. Richardson, a very prominent grain exporter of western Canada and a member of one of the oldest grain firms in Canada. He was asked the following question:

Mr. Campbell: Would you suggest, then, that if the Canadian currency were depreciated to the extent that the Australian is, that is if the world's exchange were against us, would it put the Canadian farmer in the preferred position?

Mr. Richardson: If our exchange were depreciated, our wheat would be higher by probably 30 per cent.

A little later I asked Mr. Richardson this question:

Mr. Coote: Just to clear up that point, Mr. Richardson, is it not a fact that Australia has largely taken the oriental market from us on account of their exchange situation?

Mr. Richardson: Undoubtedly.

Mr. Coote: And has it not made it easy for the Argentine to take our market away from us?

Mr. Richardson: Undoubtedly.

At the moment, Mr. Speaker, I am not objecting to this treaty even though Australia has a depreciated currency. I want to wait until we have heard all the items discussed in committee so that we may see their true significance, but I do suggest that here is good evidence of the beneficial results which would come to Canada if we would suspend the redemption of our notes in gold, as was done during the war. No doubt our currency would depreciate to some extent; I would not predict just how far it might go, but the value of our dollar should be allowed to depend upon our trade balance and not upon the gold standard. If that were done there is no doubt that the price of our wheat would be advanced by 15 cents a bushel without cost to the government of this country, while the debts of all the producers in Canada would be materially lessened.

I do not wish to take up more time in dealing with this point, but I should like to emphasize that it will be difficult for us to get any advantage from this Australian treaty unless our currency is somewhere near par with Australia's. If we would allow our currency to depreciate to the point to which the Australian currency has depreciated, so that we might be on a level with that Dominion, we could sell her more goods and at the same time secure a distinct advantage when we came to export our commodities to any country in the world. I hope that before the treaty is in force very long the government will see the wisdom of putting us on a parity with Australia in the matter of currency. Let us put a little more money into circulation even if our dollar does depreciate somewhat, so that we may enjoy the same advantage that Australia now enjoys in the markets of the world. Wheat is Canada's greatest item of export. We cannot export any to Australia, that dominion and the Argentine being our greatest competitors, apart, possibly, from Russia. Australia is taking the oriental market from us, according to Mr. Richardson, and the Argentine is largely taking away the European market. There is only one way to prevent them from taking those markets away from us and that is to sell wheat at a ruinously low price. I submit, therefore, that it would be to our advantage, if we are to derive any benefit from the treaty, for the government to see that we are placed on something like an equal footing with Australia so far as currency is concerned.

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): In reply to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), who has just concluded, I would point out that our great difficulty in this country in making a treaty with Australia is the fact that they already buy from us, and have bought for years, ten or fifteen times more than we have been buying from them. That is one of the difficulties that beset any government in Canada in trying to make a treaty with Australia. I pointed that out when the last treaty was made.

I shall have a word or two to say with regard to the currency question, but before discussing that subject I might refer to the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). As usual, the opposition has to oppose, although the right hon. gentleman's criticism took a mild form. He spoke of this treaty having been brought down at what he terms the close of the session. What a memory he must have. Do you know that when the first treaty with Australia was brought down it was brought down on the 25th day of June—I believe it was the 27th—and that we got through before the first of July? And on the 25th of June we had not seen the treaty; all we were doing was discussing the resolution. So much for that.

As regards this treaty, while I am not entirely in favour of it, I will say that it is altogether superior to anything we have ever had. I will pay the hon. member who brought it in that compliment. It might be just as well to take a glance at the old treaty. That treaty was bound to fail. It was always headed for disaster, and disaster overtook it. And if there was any one thing more than another that caused my hon. friends opposite to sit on that side of the house it was that Australian treaty. One reason why I was not keen about the new one was that I thought possibly the same thing might happen to us. I feared it, I can tell you that.

Mr. EULER: Do you still?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am not afraid to say so at any rate. The first treaty was brought to this country by a great friend of my own —a personal friend—the Hon. James A. Robb, a canny Scotchman, sane in everything he did. I do not say that Mr. Robb was a brilliant man, but he possessed an unusual fund of good, sound common sense.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am glad that one hon. member applauds. The applause was not very loud.

Mr. EULER: It is taken for granted.

Mr. CHAPLIN: But I know what I am talking about. That gentleman was a keen observer of affairs. The great trouble with hon. members whom I see across the way, and who formerly sat on the treasury benches, is that they did not support Mr. Robb in the treaty he made. He went to Australia and made that treaty and they never supported it. What was the history of that treaty? The treaty was made in September. It was brought into this house in the following June, the house having been in session from January; but hon. members were afraid to bring it down. The treaty had actually been passed in the Australian house and it never got into this one at all. Why? Simply because they got cold feet. Had the gentlemen who were supporting Mr. Robb, or should have been supporting him, taken his advice in the first place they would have brought in a treaty regarding which there would have been little complaint. But they changed the treaty in the process of making it and brought in one which was different from the one he made. That was the cause of their trouble. My hon. friends here have avoided that to a great extent, and I give them credit for it.

There are some things in this treaty which I do not like, and I am not afraid to talk about them—not a bit. Criticism may be a good thing; it may be a good thing for me also. As I have said, that first treaty was in the Australian house while this house had no information about it. We never got it until June. What we did learn about the treaty we learned from Melbourne or Sydney or through New York. That was the situation. How then could you expect any treaty to be successful based upon any such arrangement as that: And when the treaty was brought down it was referred to as a sort of aside in the speech from the throne. As I say, we never saw it until late, and when it did get here it was an entirely different treaty from what had been originally made. That was one of the causes of its failure.

Now, coming to the present treaty, I do not intend to discuss the item. I am getting too old now to enter into a fight—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have lost my grip and vigour.

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: At any rate, I do not want to get into any scrap. I shall therefore confine myself, so far as this treaty is concerned, to my own district and my own constituents. They are the people to whom I am responsible and for whom I intend to appeal. I wish to quote briefly from the remarks of Mr. Robb when the previous Australian treaty was brought in. Mr. Robb was a gentleman whom I always very highly respected. He was always a great friend of mine, and I want to let the house know how he approached the question. When somebody thought that butter would be of some consequence in the treaty he had no fear. At page 4647 of Hansard, of June 22, 1925, he said:

If you will allow me to make a personal reference, may I pause to say that next to that of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), I think I represent the largest dairy constituency in Canada. The census shows more milch cows in that constituency than in most of the other constituencies. I am a little bit selfish like most men. I am here to look after the interests of my constituents, and if I thought this treaty was going to hurt the dairymen of Chateauguay-Huntingdon, I would hesitate to present it to parliament. A country that exports 24,300,000 pounds of butter more than it imports and that exports 122,000,000 pounds of cheese more than it imports is not afraid to compete with any other country in the world.

And then later on:

Mr. Forke: I was rather astonished to hear the minister say that he would hesitate if it was going to interfere with his constituents.
Mr. Robb: Just like my hon. friend the hon. member for Brandon, I am looking after my constituents.

So am I. I must apologize to the house for taking up its time, but certain things have appeared recently in the newspapers and I feel a duty to my constituents to say a word or two regarding an industry which is of great importance to them, the grape-growing industry. I am not interested directly or indirectly in the wine manufacturing business, nor is any relative of mine of which I know. However, for years I have been a grape grower and I intend to approach this subject from that angle.

Because of the wine industry another large industry has grown up in which my people are interested, that of grape growing. The other day the press contained the statement that grape growing or wine making are not industries which belong to Canada; that we have not the grapes and we cannot produce the wine; that we cannot ripen our grapes, and so on. The district east of the Appalachian mountains, running south from the great lakes to the states of Delaware and Maryland grows a type of grape which has been developed from the wild grape. Anything imported from France, Spain, Portugal, Great Britain or anywhere else, unless imported from a district having a similar climate, would not develop and ripen in this district. I have tried this, so I know. Any vines imported from these countries die during the first winter. Quite recently an expert in Toronto, who claimed to know something about growing grapes, stated that we should grow grapes which would make good wine. Our grapes have been bred, crossed,and propagated from the wild vine to bring them up to the present quality.

These people have been in the grape growing business for sixty or seventy years. There is one wine maker with whom I played when a boy, and his father was in the wine making business. Probably we should not have gone into this industry, but I do not want to see these people put out of business. I do not admit that the treaty will do this because although certain advantages are being given to Australia we may be able to overcome them. I do not intend to criticize the treaty too strongly, but I will say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that when the items are before the committee I will discuss this matter frankly and fairly in an effort to see if we cannot be met in one or two particulars.

Because we are close to the frost line there are times when our grapes are not as ripe as they should be. Bright sunshine in September and October will add as much as three or four per cent sugar content to the grapes. Because of our climate our grapes are deficient in sugar, but is that any reason why we should not grow them? The grapes grown in my part of the province cannot be excelled anywhere in the world, either for eating or for body or flavour for wine making. The grapes grown in California, France and Australia are deficient in other things, but that does not stop those countries from making wine. The California grape is deficient in acid which is added in wine making. Our grapes have too much acid and there is no other alkali with which to offset that acid except the addition of sugar and water.

Although I am not personally connected with this business I have been associated with it through my friends for fifty years and I make an appeal to the minister and to the house not to destroy this business and thus deprive these people of their daily bread. The newspapers of a few days ago contained a statement that sugar and water were being used. Evidently the intention was to convey the idea that an inferior article was being manufactured, but that is not so. The people in this business have grown up with it through generations, they have pleased their customers and increased their trade and at the same time paid the farmer a price for his grapes not exceeded in any other nation in the world. This shows that they have played the game fairly. The farmers in my riding have received $65 to $70 per ton for grapes, and they are growing three tons to the acre. This year in my district there will be a crop of 35,000 tons.

We grow a grape as fine as any in the world. Two or three weeks of extra sunshine before the frost comes will put plenty of sugar into the grape, but sometimes we are deficient in that ingredient. I apologize to the house for taking up what time I have, and I ask Your Honour's assistance in this matter when the items are being discussed.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all in the very brief remarks which I propose to make congratulate the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) both on the tone and on the material of his remarks. While I know nothing about the grape growing or wine making industries—

An hon. MEMBER: Does the hon. member know anything about wine?

Mr. EULER: That question is much too intimate. While I know nothing of those industries, I am quite willing to accept as fact almost everything my hon. friend said. I must, however, take exception to one statement he made, and that is that he feels he is growing somewhat old and has lost something of his vigour. Those of us who sit on this side must contradict him on that, although he has perhaps mellowed nicely in his method of presentation. My hon. friend also spoke of criticism from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). He stated that the criticism was mild, but perhaps to some extent it was criticism in opposition to the treaty. I do not quite agree with my hon. friend in that regard. I may state in what I have to say, there is no real criticism of the treaty, because I feel that after all it is a matter of trial and test and we cannot say a great deal as to its merits until it has been thoroughly tried out. Possibly next year or the year after we may have something more definite to say.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I criticized your treaty when you first made it.

Mr. EULER: Quite so. By the way, I did not make it. I agree entirely with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in regard to the two principles which underlie the treaty, the most important being that a treaty to be successful must be mutually beneficial. Let me say frankly that upon looking at the treaty in a more or less hurried way—and it is impossible to ascertain all its bearings—it appears to be a pretty good production. I am not going to say, as the hon. member for Lincoln did, that it is superior to any other treaty we have had. It may be true that it is, and it would be rather remarkable if, after the experience which we have had, some advancement might not be made along this line.

Possibly it would be a fair criticism that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) in the statement which he made this afternoon was rather unfortunate in making the comparison which he did, and that comparison which he made is really my only reason for saying what I am about to say. He stated—and I think I am quoting him correctly—that whereas under the old treaty there were only some four or five items which enjoyed the British preference, this treaty gives the British preference to some 422 items. I am afraid the inference which he expected—perhaps he did not—the public to draw from that was that exactly to the extent of the figures which he gave the present treaty was better than the former one.

Mr. BENNETT: What I was endeavouring to convey was that the old treaty contained that limited number of British preferential items as applicable to Canada, while the new treaty contained some 400 or more British preferential items that were applicable to Canada.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend is just confirming what I said a moment ago. What I object to is that the inference that ordinarily any man would draw from that statement is that this treaty is better than the former one as 422 is greater than four. I wish in a general way to take objection to that method of making a comparison. It is unfair mathematically to make it in that way, for several reasons. In the first place it will be admitted that the four items which enjoyed the British preference under the old treaty were at least effective items; they had some force. The 422 items in the present treaty are not in the same category. As a matter of fact, some of the commodities comprised in those 422 items are absolutely prohibited from entering Australia and they should be taken out of the picture entirely. Again—and I think some exception has been made to this by the leader of the opposition and it is very true—some of the items which under this treaty enjoy the benefit of the British preference, have such a high rate of duty even under the British preference, that I cannot see how Canada under those circumstances can export those commodities to Australia; and those items should disappear from the picture. Lest I say something which I cannot substantiate, I might quote a number of items that, when the Prime Minister was speaking, were taken just at random from the table in the votes and proceedings.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows I do not desire to interrupt him. The point is this: if they do import any goods of that kind or quality, necessarily Canada is in a better position than other countries to export them to Australia. That was the point I was making

Mr. EULER: But my point was this, that the four items on which we had a preference under the old treaty, we were in a position to export to Australia, whereas some of the 422 items on which we are now supposed to have a preference, are of no practical use. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) shakes his head.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is overstating the case; that is all.

Mr. EULER: I have no intention of overstating the case. I am endeavouring to make a fair comparison. Some of those commodities cannot be imported into Australia because they are prohibited, and others have under the Australian tariff such a high rate of duty still that for all practical purposes they may be wiped out of the picture. It may be that in time to come, if the treaty remains in force, those items may be of some value. Let me take a few items from the list and I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong. In regard to certain articles of clothing, the Australian tariff under the British preference still remains 60 per cent plus a surtax of 50 per cent of that 60 per cent, or a total tariff of 90 per cent. Is it conceivable that Canadian manufacturers of that particular kind of clothing can hope to sell any goods in Australia while the tariff is 90 per cent, unless nothing of that type of clothing is made in Australia and it has to be imported? As regards boots and shoes, the Australian tariff under the British preference as against Canada is 45 per cent, plus 50 per cent of that, or another 22½ per cent, making a total tariff of 67½ per cent. If I am wrong in this I shall be glad if the Minister of Trade and Commerce will correct me.

The next item I shall take is that of cordage and twines which, by the way, are made in my own town, and as the hon. member for Lincoln said, we are all concerned about the industries in our own cities.

Article	Australian tariff British preference
Cordage and twines..	40 per cent
Paints..	35 per cent
Switches and fuses..	65 per cent
Certain kinds of machinery..	55 per cent
Belts and belting..	40 per cent plus 50 per cent of the 40 per cent, or a total of 60 per cent.
Furniture..	50 per cent plus 50 per cent of that, or a total tariff of 75 per cent.

The furniture industry is a very large one in my constituency.

Article	Australian tariff British preference
Gramophones..	50 per cent plus 50 per cent of that, or a total tariff of 75 per cent.

These are also made in my riding.

Mr. STEVENS: So far we have not even had British preferential rates and my hon. friend is simply selecting certain abnormally high rates and wholly ignoring the fact that last year $277,000,000 worth of goods entered Australia under the British preference from the United Kingdom. Now we have access to the market which bought those goods.

Mr. EULER: I am not ignoring that at all, and I am quite willing that my hon. friends should make out a good case. I hope they can because I want to see Canadian manufacturers and producers and the people generally derive benefit from this treaty. This is not factious criticism.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is inferring we are being penalized under the British preference.

Mr. EULER: When the 422 items were mentioned, the public will gather, I believe, that we have a preference that is of some use to us in the exportation of all these goods to Australia. I have picked out only a few; there are many others—

Mr. STEVENS: It is of as much use to us as to anyone else.

Mr. EULER: If these items are not of use to anybody, they should not be included in the 422 given for purposes of comparison.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Were my hon. friends not in a similar position when, under the Dunning budget, they counted them all up?

Mr. EULER: But Mr. Dunning made certain explanations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Dunning made the explanations in the budget.

Mr. EULER: I think it is a fair criticism to say that if the four items of the old treaty were really items which actually could be exported to Australia, and of the 422 items cited by the Prime Minister many cannot be exported at all, then we have not a fair basis of comparison. I have not been able to examine the items, and only experience will show whether they are of any value, but I am prepared to say it is possible and probable, and I hope it is true, that there are many items in connection with which Canadian producers can extend their trade with Australia.

There are many factors which militate against an extension of trade. Perhaps I should not mention them, but as I said before I am not offering any serious criticism of the treaty. The fact is, however, that the purchasing power of Australia is low. I think some reference was made to the value of exports in recent years from Canada to Australia and the Prime Minister stated that during the last year that value had dropped very considerably. Last year they were valued at something like $16,300,000 and they have now dropped to $6,788,000. One reason may be the depression in Australia; another, that Australia is an extremely high tariff country and for that reason imports are shut out. Their depreciated currency may be another reason; and another, the fact that they are not allowed to pay for the things they desire to buy. They do not allow funds to go out of Australia, and I think it is true that to-day there are Canadian business men who sold goods to Australia one or two years ago who have found it absolutely impossible to obtain their money because the banks would not release it.

I shall have nothing further to add, Mr. Speaker, until the bill reaches the committee stage. I might mention however, that I gather from a reading of the agreement that both countries bind themselves not to apply special or dumping duties on any of these commodities.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason for article IX.

Mr. EULER: I do not remember the terms of article IX, but I presume it is the article in the agreement which states that upon giving three months' notice any particular item may be removed from the treaty. I was going to add—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Unless the countries agree.

Mr. EULER: Unless the countries come to an agreement in the interval. I was going to inquire whether the dumping duty will be applicable when that item at the end of the three months' period stipulated in the agreement goes back to the general tariff list.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it is treated as any other general tariff item, and the dumping act would apply.

Mr. EULER: It has been said that the butter item in the old Australian treaty was more responsible than anything else for the defeat of the late administration, and my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) has said that in the present instance probably the same might happen with regard to wine. I do not know, but I should like to point out that under the late administration no butter came into Canada from Australia, because while we had a tariff of only one cent per pound against Australian butter we did apply against them the six cents which they received under the Paterson scheme on butter for export. That really meant a tax of seven cents per pound, as the dump could be applied. As I said no butter came into Canada. Under the agreement now before us no dump can be applied. I should like to know—I suppose the information will be given—whether under this agreement the Australians are going to keep in operation their Paterson scheme; because if they do and the dump cannot be applied that six cents cannot be considered at all. Under the old agreement there was a one cent duty and the six cents under the Paterson scheme, making a total of seven cents against Australian butter, whereas under the present agreement there is a tariff of only five cents against Australian butter. It is possible that my hon. friends opposite may slip out of office on the butter question because there is still a difference of two cents a pound as compared with the duties under the late administration.

Mr. STEVENS: The Paterson scheme is down to 2½ cents net.

Mr. EULER: Yes. The treaty states specifically that either country may apply special duties, although dumping duties are excepted. I am free to say that I do not understand the provision and I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) to make an explanation, if it is worth while explaining.

In conclusion may I say, not by way of criticism, that I am sorry it was not found possible to place on the preferential or special list some of the important commodities we produce in Canada. Many commodities remain under the general tariff, which is so high as to prohibit our getting into that market. I refer particularly to such commodities as Canadian flour and agricultural implements. Perhaps my hon. friend from Brantford City (Mr. Ryerson) would be interested in this matter. Rubber automobile tires are manufactured to a very large extent in the constituency I represent, and I regret it was not found possible to have such commodities placed on the preferred list. Even paper, apart from newsprint which is manufactured in Canada, is still on the general list.

I do not know whether my remarks will be regarded as a serious criticism of the new treaty. They are not, however, so intended. I hope the treaty will turn out to be just as advantageous to Canada as my hon. friends expect. If it does, I shall be one of the first to congratulate them.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with the matter now before the house from the point of view of the province of British Columbia. The present treaty greatly concerns that province and I wish quite heartily to congratulate the government and more particularly the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) because I understand he was largely instrumental in bringing about the agreement now before us. I should like particularly to compliment him, as others have not done so, on that section of the treaty—I think it is article IV—in which by a rather ingenious method he has managed to get around the trouble concerning freight charges. His action will result in increased business for the railways of Canada and the port of Vancouver. Of course it is easy to criticize, but we must remember that the treaty was not formulated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce alone but appears before us as a result of negotiations with another man who was probably equally alert in looking after the interests of Australia. Necessarily, the present agreement is a compromise. I believe it will materially benefit the fishing, lumbering and newsprint industries in British Columbia. I regret only the fact that the coal industry of that province could not have received the same beneficent treatment. I might say that while the press of British Columbia is largely Conservative all papers have struck a very pleased note concerning the completion of this treaty. There may be certain industries less vocal at the present time, and as time goes on undoubtedly they will indicate where they may think their interests, if not actually hurt, have at least not been looked after.

One fact which must militate against the general success of the treaty is the one referred to by other hon. members, namely, that on a great many items Australia has enormously increased her tariff. It has been stated that the British preferential rate we get is so high as to be possibly of very little benefit. I might give an illustration. It is the first item on one of the statements issued by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in Votes and Proceedings, No. 83. On that first item we get the British preference, but the British preference is 60 per cent, then there is a surtax of 50 per cent on top of that, and a primage tax of ten per cent as well; then in addition there is a 30 per cent preference due to the depreciated currency—making a total protection of about 125 per cent. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says the currency depreciation is only 24; I am figuring it at 30. A few weeks ago it was 35, and under the distressful conditions of Europe we do not know what it may be from one day to another in the future. We all hope some day it will come back to par, but that may be a long time away.

To deal with some of the interests individually. The lumber interests of British Columbia have expressed themselves as being entirely satisfied with the treaty, and that being the case, it hardly becomes me to make any criticism of it. But there is an item to which I should like to call attention. I note a preference is given on redwood, which is entirely a Californian product; coupled with it is red cedar, which is our product. I notice the preference given California on redwood and Canada on cedar is 2 shillings out of a total of 4 shillings per unit; in other words, 50 per cent. But the bulk of our wood, the woods we are most anxious to get sold in Australia, are Douglas fir, hemlock and spruce. Hemlock and spruce, especially hemlock, are regarded as cheap and inferior timber. We find that we are to get a preference on that in another item, and the preference pro rata is very much less; for instance it is 2 shillings on 12s. 6d., or something like 16 per cent. There may be but little force in the suggestion, but presumably the inducement on the part of the Australian would be to buy the better wood on which a lower tariff is placed. At any rate the British Columbia timber people have expressed themselves as being highly pleased with the treaty—and they ought to know.

Mr. STEVENS: Our cedar has the same rate as redwood, and it is the competing wood.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, red cedar benefits in the same way as California redwood; but we do not get as good a preference on hemlock and spruce, possibly on balsam also.

As regards paper, I notice the increased preference is only on newsprint. There is an item in the treaty, 334 (G) which is subject to the general tariff, and it comprises a good many articles made of paper—I suppose in large measure nearly all of them. The only thing we get a preference on is newsprint. Item 334 (g) comprises a great many articles made of paper, but, as I say, that item takes the general tariff, which is very high indeed. Then there are some other items that come under the British preferential tariff—not mentioned in the treaty, but coming under the general clause—and they also take a very high rate, even although under the British preferential rate. So on everything but the newsprint we are somewhat hard hit by the high tariff rate now in effect. Of course, the benefit we get on newsprint is a very substantial benefit, and I am not trying to belittle it.

But here is a serious criticism I should like to make of this treaty. There is no provision for a preference on pulp and sulphite. That is unfair. The pulp and sulphite industry has to contend with increased costs, due to a higher tariff—we need not discuss for the moment whether a higher tariff does produce higher costs of production—and they have to endure that along with the newsprint people. But the latter get an enormous preference in the Australian market—more power to them—but the pulp and sulphite people get nothing at all. The pulp and sulphite industry, due perhaps to location or to other conditions, such as lack of funds, and also due to the class of timber which is accessible to them, and which can only be made into sulphite and pulp—they could of course be forced to make their product into newsprint, which is more or less a separate industry; but as a matter of fact they cannot profitably make anything but pulp and sulphite—are cut out of the picture entirely. In fact their condition is almost made worse, because their competition, which in one sense is from paper, has been bonused, so the more paper we sell, the less pulp and sulphite we are likely to sell. I think that will remain a blot on the Australian treaty so far as those two industries are concerned.

While on the subject I might say that word is now beginning to reach us as to how some industries in British Columbia regard the treaty. I see in the press protest was made by some associated growers of fruit, complaining that nothing has been done as regards the apple or the onion situation. Today it is alleged that Australian onions come into Canada free, and Canadian onions are assessed $40 a ton going into Australia. They also complain that no attempt has been made to remove the Australian embargo against apples, entry of which was prohibited on account of danger from a disease known as fire blight, but this disease is said to be non-existent at certain seasons of the year. They had hoped that that situation might have been adjusted during the tariff negotiations.

I come now to the egg situation, and I should like to put on Hansard a letter received from the president of the British Columbia Egg and Poultry Cooperative Association. This man is entitled to speak with authority because of the number of poultry men he represents and the handicaps they have been endeavouring to overcome. After alluding to the conditions of the tariff he says:

> I am instructed by our directors to write you and point out that in our opinion this will have a very adverse effect on the poultry industry in Canada and particularly in British Columbia. Canada is now producing sufficient eggs to supply all domestic requirements and has a considerable surplus which must be exported. The Canadian poultry pool shipped 2,706 cases to London, England, a few days ago and further shipments will go forward from the prairie provinces and Montreal shortly.
> Prices have been very low for a long time, at present they are at least 10 cents per dozen lower than at this time last year, average prices to producers being 13 to 14 cents per dozen, which does not cover the cost of production. Large numbers of producers have been compelled to quit and dispose of their birds.
> Feed costs are comparatively high here—

He might have said more than "comparatively."

> —due largely to the domestic freight rate on grain from the prairies.

I have bored the house on this many times before. He goes on:

> British Columbia specializes in the production of winter eggs, costs are higher than in the summer and we must receive a fair price for our fall and winter eggs, or we will not show any profit on the year's operations and will be unable to continue in business.
> September to February is spring and summer in Australia and is their high production period, their costs of production are lower than ours, they produce a huge surplus of eggs during these months for which they must find a market. In the months of October, November and December, 1930, exports to Great Britain from Australia were 5,323,270 dozens.
> We believe a large volume of that surplus will come to Canada with the result that prices will be depressed to a point much lower than they otherwise would be, the sure effect of which will be that the poultry industry in British Columbia will disappear. We cannot profitably meet their competition.

There is more of it, but I will not detain the house by reading the remainder.

Mr. STEVENS: There is another clause in the letter asking that the duty be restored. Will the hon. member read the rest of the letter?

Mr. NEILL: I will read it all—I wanted to save time. The letter continues:

Canada is well able to supply all her own requirements of eggs. We have more at the present time than we can use, and could produce a great many more if a profitable market could be found. It is entirely unnecessary to bring eggs here from any other country.

Here is the clause my hon. friend refers to:

We respectfully request that, in the interest of the poultry industry of Canada, the section of the agreement which provides for the free entry of Australian eggs entering Canada during January and February, and the reduced duty during the other months of the year, be cancelled, and the rate of duty be maintained at 10 cents per dozen. If this is not done, in our opinion the poultry producers here will not be able to carry on.

Mr. STEVENS: At this point I should like to ask my hon. friend a question. How are we possibly jeopardizing the egg producing industry when, since 1923, we have not imported a single egg from Australia although during that period eggs could have come in free during the whole year? Now we have reduced the free period to two months and we are told we are ruining the egg industry. Those are the facts. My hon. friend read something about restoring the duty to 10 per cent, but there was no such duty.

Mr. NEILL: This letter asks that Australia be put on a par with other countries and pay 10 cents per dozen. My hon. friend spoke a little too soon; I did not make the statements to which he referred.

Mr. STEVENS: No; I say, how can the gentleman who wrote that letter which my hon. friend has just read justify the statements he has made in view of the facts I have recited?

Mr. NEILL: I was going on to say that I was well aware of the facts just stated by my hon. friend; I knew there was no duty on eggs at all under the last Australian treaty and that of late years practically no eggs have come into Canada from that country. I quite admit that, but I was merely stating that this association, which represents practically the entire egg industry of British Columbia, have a right to have their views put on record. I was going on to say that while I quite admit the force of the argument of the minister, there is this to be considered: Possibly this may operate to give them a greater advantage. There is the fact of the reduced currency, which makes 20 cent eggs worth about 26 cents, and the further fact that the government have taken power to remove the dumping clauses, with which I will deal in a moment. Mention has been made of the Paterson scheme; the Australians are very fond of that sort of bonusing, and it applies to a great many articles other than butter, although we have not perhaps come in contact with them as yet. It is quite possible that Australia may take advantage of the removal of the dumping duty to extend something like the Paterson system to other articles, such as eggs, which would permit them to enter this country. There is a certain amount of danger in that regard, but I frankly admit that if anything of the kind happens it will be because of the lack of a dumping duty and because of the depreciated currency rather than because of the reasons advanced in the letter from which I have quoted although, if they export 5,500,000 dozen eggs to England it is quite obvious they will be anxious to enter a market so much closer.

I next come to butter, which leads me to the consideration of article IX of the treaty, which agrees not to enforce a dumping duty. It may be presumption on my part, but I cannot think that this will have the beneficial effect anticipated by the Prime Minister in his remarks the other day. I think it is a very serious matter indeed, and I am afraid it will work out in this way: The idea was that if there were one special article in connection with which some grievance arose, such as butter in the case of the New Zealand agreement, we would not have to cancel the whole agreement but could strike out the preference on that particular article without prejudice to the rest of the agreement. Let us look at it from the standpoint of the New Zealand agreement. Once you did away with the preference on butter you could have torn up the whole agreement, as far as New Zealand was concerned, and if we had not cancelled it no doubt New Zealand would have done so. Even supposing that were not so and you took one article and put it under the general tariff; later on you took another article and did the same thing, and how long would it be before the other party to the treaty would say, "This is not good enough; if you are going to pick out our best commodities one by one we will have to do the same thing, and there will be no treaty left." I believe that may be the way it will work out.

For years past I have listened to the Conservative party stressing the need not so much for dumping clauses, since we always had a technical dumping clause, but for what we might call the safeguards which rendered it possible to impose the dumping duty. The Conservative party demanded those safeguards from time to time very vigorously, and last September we saw those clauses enacted. I voted for them, believing they were required, but I rather regret my action after having seen how readily, how easily and above all how secretly it can be applied. There is no publicity at all; it simply appears in the Gazette, and how many of us take the Gazette? When you find your goods hung up at the border there is not much time left in which to look up the Gazette, or perhaps after having contracted for goods in the old country you find that the dumping duty is applied. It is not such a nice arrangement as I thought it would be.

Be that as it may, it is the settled policy of the Conservative party to have these safeguards, and we have them. Now, at a time and under conditions when, if ever, they would be most useful and most required, they have been taken away absolutely; we have legislated ourselves out of our rights. There was never such a thing done before; at least we always had the frame-work for a dumping duty, but now we are not going to be allowed to employ it under this treaty. I am afraid it will work very much against our interests. We know that the Australians are always changing their tariffs; they are changing them at the present time and they may do so at any time in the future. While, perhaps under a gentleman's agreement, the dumping duty might never be put in operation, it is a wonderful safeguard to have in the background. It was the means of remedying the butter situation; Australian butter would have been rushed in here but for the fact that we were able to keep it out through the dumping duty. It was bonused under the Paterson scheme, although I do not think it was quite as much as my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has said, because there was a 15 per cent restriction. At any rate, we took advantage of the dumping duty, having regard to the Paterson scheme, to stop Australian butter coming into this country.

As my hon. friend from North Waterloo has said, under the old treaty the Australian butter exporter had to pay a total of 7 cents. Supposing he sends a pound of butter to Vancouver which is sold in the open market for 30 cents per pound in competition with British Columbia butter. Under the old treaty the Australian would have received 23 cents, and that difference was sufficient to stop the importation. Under the new duty he will get 30 cents less 5 cents duty, and in addition he has the advantage of a depreciated currency which at 30 per cent would be 8 cents, so his pound of butter would realize him 33 cents as against only 30 cents to the British Columbia man. I know my hon. friend will say 30 per cent is an excessive statement of the fluctuation of Australian currency, but it was 35 per cent a few weeks ago and may be 35 per cent again, so I think 30 per cent is not excessive. If the currency improves, of course, that condition will not obtain, but we have no knowledge and in fact very little hope, I think, that the Australian currency situation will improve in the near future.

Mr. BENNETT: On the contrary, there is every reason to believe it will improve.

Mr. NEILL: I am glad to hear that, but after all we are dealing with things as they are and we cannot make treaties on hope.

Mr. STEVENS: The Australian people have been making great efforts to that end, which have been highly successful.

Mr. NEILL: Next I should like to tell the house how the Australians regard their prospects with reference to butter. They may say, "No butter came in before and none will come in now, so what are you making such a fuss about?" Here is what the butter exporters of Sydney, New South Wales, say:

Butter exporters see a large and profitable market. . . .

Here is another quotation:

"Butter exporters have every reason to be satisfied," said the chairman of the Victorian section of the Australian dairy produce export board.

If he has reason to be highly pleased he has some knowledge which we do not possess, because the treaty cannot do him very much good unless by way of the lack of the dumping duty and the fluctuation in the currency. Then we have New Zealand, within three days sail of Australia by fast passenger steamer equipped with cold storage facilities. They see that they are paying a duty of 14 cents a pound on their butter coming into Canada while, in a country around the corner, there is a rate of 5 cents, which is in reality a bonus of 2 cents, if you take the depreciated currency into consideration. Are they going to stand for that? There is a duty on New Zealand butter going into Australia, but they may get around that by establishing branch factories or shipping the cream to Australia.

Mr. BENNETT: Direct shipments, the produce of Australia.

Mr. NEILL: But butter is a product of Australia if it is manufactured in that country from cream. It is a manufactured article, the other being the raw material. Knowing the alertness of New Zealand, and how anxious she is to sell her butter, I should look for some sort of legal manoeuvre by which they would endeavour to meet that situation. The temptation is too great—14 cents in one place and 2 or 3 cents of a bonus in the other. I would again remind the house that, when the old treaty was introduced, there did not seem to be any fear that it would be injurious to us, as regards its application to New Zealand. Political use was later made of it, and the government was blamed for the consequences—properly, of course, because they must shoulder the responsibility and stand the results. But no one in the house at that time ever anticipated that the treaty with Australia would result in such an enormous influx of butter from New Zealand. No one voiced any such anticipation.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They were warned of it.

Mr. NEILL: The warning was mild.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Donald Sutherland spoke for hours about it.

Mr. NEILL: Yes; I remember his discussing it for hours. So long as there was any political object to be gained he would talk for days.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman can understand that.

An hon. MEMBER: What are you doing now?

Mr. NEILL: The criticism in regard to New Zealand butter was entirely trivial, for it was not anticipated that the influx of that butter into Canada would be what in fact it turned out to be. Nevertheless, the government paid the price. I am not kicking about that at all, but I am pointing out that what happened once may happen again. Some unexpected development of trade may eventuate, and we are powerless in the absence of the dumping duty.

Mr. BOWMAN: What do you suggest?

Mr. NEILL: Retain the dumping duty.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. STEVENS: Does the hon. member suggest rejecting the treaty if the dumping duty is not retained?

Mr. NEILL: That is not a fair question. We know very well that the treaty is here, and if we do not accept it in its entirety it will be rejected. That is the threat the hon. member holds out.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not a threat.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps not; but the hon. gentleman is asking me to place myself in that position, to reject the manifold advantages of the treaty because of some disadvantages I have indicated. But I suppose it would be possible, without a total loss of the treaty, to refer the matter to Australia and ask for further amendment. I am willing to give the Minister of Trade and Commerce credit for having got the last advantage that could be obtained under the treaty, and he knows better than I do that it is useless going back for improvements. Still, these facts remain and must be faced.

Let me now sum up the situation so far as British Columbia is concerned. The fish and lumber people and the newsprint interests are getting a great benefit, and I heartily approve of the treaty in that regard. With respect to the pulp and sulphite industry, they will not be assisted but may be injured to some extent. I cannot allow that fact to pass without comment, no matter how much anyone may try to prevent my discussing it.

Mr. STEVENS: How will they be injured?

Mr. NEILL: By the fact that the Australian is encouraged to buy newsprint rather than pulp and sulphite. They have no preference whatever, and—

Mr. STEVENS: How does that injure the industry? The hon. gentleman makes the bald statement that the pulp industry will suffer. Will he kindly tell me how they will be injured by the treaty?

Mr. NEILL: I do not know that I said "they will be"; I said they are likely to be injured. But they certainly have reason to complain when they see a competing branch of their own industry given an enormous preference under a treaty negotiated by the government, while they themselves are getting nothing at all. Are the conditions in the pulp and sulphite industry so far removed from the conditions that exist in the newsprint industry that there should be this discrimination?

Mr. BOWMAN: Is it not better for us to sell paper rather than pulp?

Mr. NEILL: Yes. But pulp and sulphite are not raw material, in that they require a considerable degree of manufacturing. And there are circumstances in which they cannot convert the pulp and sulphite, out of the raw timber, immediately into newsprint. Yet they are being penalized and placed at the mercy of the newsprint companies to whom they must sell their product.

Mr. STEVENS: How are they penalized in comparison with their present position?

Mr. NEILL: They are penalized because newsprint is getting a big preference and they are getting nothing at all.

Mr. BOWMAN: Is it not better to sell them manufactured paper?

Mr. NEILL: Not if it is impossible to manufacture the article under certain conditions. The hon. gentleman is not familiar with the situation. He does not know that there are remote localities and other conditions where it would not be profitable to convert the timber into newsprint. But they can make sulphite which is afterwards taken to the factory and manufactured into newsprint. Surely, however, the hon. gentleman will not suggest that the pulp and sulphite industry should have been, to put it mildly, neglected. Surely he does not suggest that they should be passed over and ignored.

Mr. STEVENS: Has my hon. friend received complaints from the pulp industry of British Columbia on the subject?

Mr. NEILL: Not since the treaty was passed, but I received an urgent request that I should endeavour to have some consideration given pulp and sulphite. I was asked to see whether the industry could not be given some of the benefits of the treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: Did my hon. friend try?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, I tried.

Mr. STEVENS: I don't remember.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, I tried.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not remember having heard from him at all—not a single word. I never heard from him.

Mr. NEILL: No?

Mr. STEVENS: Not on that subject.

Mr. NEILL: He has heard from me often.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman said he tried to get it in the treaty. He never came near us, nor asked us, nor suggested it to us.

Mr. NEILL: Am I not trying to get it in now?

Mr. STEVENS: After the treaty has been signed?

Mr. NEILL: The treaty has been signed, it is true—

Mr. STEVENS: Signed by both parties and delivered.

Mr. NEILL: It has been signed but not ratified; and it is not law and is not binding until it is ratified.

Mr. STEVENS: Will you reject the treaty to get it in or take the treaty without it?

Mr. NEILL: That is the same question: the hon. gentleman is trying to trick me into a false position. He asks, "Will you forego the great advantages of the treaty because certain things are not included in it?" Well, two blacks do not make a white, nor do two wrongs make a right. I am saying that the treaty is of great advantage to a large number of interests in British Columbia, but I am pointing out that certain interests have been ignored.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman made no representations on their behalf during the last nine months while the treaty has been under negotiation.

Mr. NEILL: My time is drawing to a close and I must finish what I have to say. As regards eggs, I have already put on record the opinion of those who are best calculated to know what the results will be. As regards butter, I fear that the market will again be flooded because of the absence of the dumping clause. I regret that the dumping clause has been abandoned in this regard. That is one outstanding mistake in the treaty. Notwithstanding this, however, and on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number, I may answer my hon. friend's challenge whether I will vote for the treaty by assuring him that I will. It will be of considerable advantage to a great many people in British Columbia, and on that principle, of the greatest good to the greatest number, I will support it. But that does not and will not prevent me from pointing out wherein I think it might have been improved upon, without any very great loss to us with regard to the interests I have indicated.

Mr. QUINN: Don't be wasting our time.

Mr. NEILL: My hon. friend is very fond of interrupting. If he will get up on his hind legs and address the committee in whatever language is familiar to him, I will listen to him. If he is not getting the amount of hay and oats—or perhaps thistles—he thinks he is entitled to, let him go to his keeper.

Mr. QUINN: If I cannot make a better speech than that the proper thing for me to do is to keep my seat.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I do not intend to detain the house, but I wish to refer to two items in particular in the treaty, namely, lumber and newsprint. In passing, may I comment briefly on the observations of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) with reference to newsprint paper versus pulp and sulphite. That, I think, was the way in which he referred to these two items. There are three kinds of pulp manufactured in Canada, sulphite, sulphate and groundwood. Sulphite and groundwood are used in the manufacture of newsprint in the proportion of approximately 84 or 85 per cent of groundwood to 15 or 16 per cent of sulphite. If you make provision by which you are enabled to export 15 or 16 tons of sulphite and 84 or 85 tons of groundwood pulp, you simply take away from yourself a market for 100 tons of newsprint. From the standpoint of British Columbia, where both pulp and paper is manufactured, if we can export newsprint we provide a market for an equal tonnage of sulphite and groundwood pulp. It is better for the country to manufacture the paper to the highest possible degree and give employment to an additional number of Canadian workmen. Although I have not the information before me, I believe the same thing would apply to sulphate which is used in the manufacture of kraft paper. When my hon. friend says that sulphite and pulp—I presume he is referring to groundwood—cannot be manufactured into newsprint, I believe he must be mistaken.

Mr. NEILL: I did not say that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the sulphite and pulp industries were being penalized because conditions were such that those commodities could not be converted into newsprint.

Mr. NEILL: Oh, no.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The wood itself is the raw product.

Mr. NEILL: My hon. friend has misunderstood me. I said that it could not in many instances be manufactured profitably immediately into newsprint.

[Mr. Quinn.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is no doubt a paper mill cannot be erected wherever a pulp mill is in operation, but it is equally true that sulphite and groundwood are the semi-raw products from which newsprint is manufactured, and if you provide a market for newsprint you provide a market for sulphite and groundwood, which in turn provides more employment for Canadian workmen.

Every million feet of lumber which is exported from any part of Canada will provide more employment than an equal value of any other product produced in Canada. The provision of a market for an additional 100,000,000 feet of lumber would provide, directly or indirectly, for 50,000 Canadians. It would provide directly for 7,500 people, then there would be in addition all that is involved in the maintenance of 7,500 people, and the purchase of equipment, provisions and so on, which would involve an amount almost equal to the sum paid in wages in the industry.

Mr. NEILL: My hon. friend was stressing the point that pulp and sulphite should not be exported but should be manufactured into newsprint, but he says now that the raw lumber should be exported.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That argument does not hold. A hundred different articles can be manufactured from raw lumber. The principal use to which raw lumber is put is the erection of all kinds of buildings. Does my hon. friend suggest that we should limit the export of lumber until we can provide the means by which we would erect the buildings, and export them as such? Groundwood and sulphite are the raw products for newsprint, and when we export newsprint we are exporting groundwood and sulphite. Does my hon. friend contend that we should limit the export of lumber because we do not manufacture the buildings for export? Lumber which goes into the manufacture of furniture is of an entirely different class. Some goes into the manufacture of doors, but that article is provided for in the treaty. The exporting of lumber would provide more work for Canadian people than a proportionate amount of any other commodity manufactured in this country.

Mr. NEILL: This is unmanufactured lumber.

Mr. NICHOLSON: To what does my hon. friend refer as unmanufactured lumber?

Mr. NEILL: Not manufactured.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If I understand this bill it provides for all sizes of lumber.

Mr. NEILL: Including logs.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, but how many logs will be exported to Australia? I am not very familiar with the lumbering trade of British Columbia, but I do know that some of the largest saw mills in the country are located in that province. When a market is provided for the product of those mills the pressure will be relieved which is now being exerted on the eastern market by the British Columbia trade. If there were no other provisions in the treaty than those covering the export of newsprint and lumber, the treaty would be well worth while. There is no other industry in Canada, not excluding wheat, in which unemployment has increased to a greater degree than in the lumbering and newsprint industry.

Mr. VENIOT: Under the terms of the old treaty, salmon, sturgeon and other canned fish were all on the same basis. Under the terms of the new treaty salmon receives a preference of three pence as compared with one and a half pence.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. member would prefer to wait until we get into committee so that answers can be given without violating the rules of the house.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I have noticed some criticism of the Australian treaty, and I will venture the assertion that it is unlikely there ever will be a treaty which will not call for criticism from some branch of the community or some individuals interested. Speaking as I do for my constituency in British Columbia, I can only say frankly that I congratulate the government upon the treaty. In so doing I should like to associate, and I feel confident the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) would also associate with this treaty, those gentlemen from British Columbia who, about a year and a half ago, partly at the expense of the British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Manufacturers' Association, assisted by the government of that province, went to Australia and New Zealand, their main purpose being that British Columbia lumber should be given a preference in those two dominions. The gentlemen to whom I refer are Mr. J. C. McDonald, Mr. J. G. Robson, both of them from the city of New Westminster, and Mr. T. Gadd, of the city of Vancouver. All of these gentlemen are members of the British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Manufacturers' Association. As secretary of that group they took along with them Major Andrews, and it may be of some interest to members of the house to know that the Major Andrews to whom I refer is a son-in-law of the Premier of British Columbia, the Hon. Doctor Tolmie. They were given a great deal of encouragement by the governments and industrials of both Australia and New Zealand. Prior to their departure from Canada they had been in consultation with the then Minister of Trade and Commerce. After their return they arranged that Major Andrews, who had accompanied them on this trip, should reside permanently in Australia. It is only right that the efforts of all these gentlemen should be recognized in connection with this treaty.

Newsprint is to be an item on which Canada gets a preference in the markets of Australia. I would, however, point out to the house that Canada, or British Columbia—it is practically the same thing in this particular case—has been furnishing approximately one-third of the newsprint requirements of Australia. The other two-thirds have been purchased from Great Britain. So that it is difficult to see wherein British Columbia is to get a preference over what has been in the past our chief competitor. Unquestionably, however, the preference has been increased to such an extent that there is little likelihood of other nations successfully competing for the newsprint market.

In respect to Australia's lumber requirements we have not been so fortunate. Canada has never been given a preference in connection with the lumber requirements of Australia. The total importation into Australia of lumber that could have been supplied by British Columbia—I refer chiefly to Douglas fir—was 212,000,000 feet in 1928. Of that Canada supplied only about 13 per cent. In 1929 we increased the percentage to some extent. Australia imported approximately 266,000,000 feet, but even so, less than 22 per cent was furnished from Canada, practically the whole of the remainder being obtained from Washington and Oregon, which compete directly with British Columbia in furnishing Douglas fir, or, as it is known in many countries, Oregon pine. I am pleased to note that the treaty also includes redwood or cedar. Redwood is not grown in British Columbia, but cedar is. In the past I understand redwood from California has had a preference in Australia over British Columbia cedar. Now British Columbia cedar will have a preference over the redwood of California, and this should be a big advantage to the lumber interests of our province.

As regards canned salmon, we have in the past supplied approximately 70 per cent of the requirements of Australia. Therefore, from the standpoint of British Columbia we have a possible expansion of the newsprint supply; we have a possible expansion of 200 or 300 or 400 per cent in the quantity of lumber, and a possible increase of 50 per cent in the quantity of canned fish that can go from Canada to Australia. Consequently the treaty appeals to me as one that is worthy of the favourable consideration of the house.

Some criticism has been made in connection with our importation of eggs and butter. It is only reasonable to assume that if we can increase the production of newsprint, lumber and canned fish, the increase in the number of the employed will result in the consumption of a very large quantity of the surplus eggs that are now available. At the present time, however, eggs in Canada are on an export basis and so long as this condition continues I can see little disadvantage to the Canadian producer, whether eggs come into this country and force the sale of a larger quantity of his surplus outside Canada, or whether he sells his whole production inside or outside this country. So long as butter and eggs are on an export basis I can see very little injury to butter or egg production in Canada.

It has been stated as a ground of criticism that many items of the treaty are not such as will be exchanged between Canada and Australia. True, we may not exchange these commodities, but I can see no disadvantage in having them mentioned in the treaty. It is something like the cast iron pipe and cut flowers about which we heard so much a year or so ago.

The important question is not so much whether the exchange of commodities is to be to the advantage of Canada, but whether it will be possible for Canada to sell goods to Australia at all. As was pointed out this afternoon by my leader, many of the duties, even under the British preference, are higher than our general tariff, and in addition to that they have a surtax of 50 per cent on many items. The latter, we are informed, is a temporary measure, but the fact remains that this surtax of 50 per cent does that much more to exclude the importation into Australia of goods from any country and makes it just that much more difficult for Canadian shippers to reach the consumer in Australia. In addition to the duty and the surtax, they have what is known as a general primage tax duty of 10 per cent, so that in many cases there is the surtax of 50 per cent, and in all cases the primage tax. That, however, is to my mind not the worst feature, because Australia has in the past, and will in the future purchase goods regardless of the height of her tariff.

What should concern us chiefly at this time is the inability of Australia to furnish money with which to purchase the commodities not only of Canada but of every country in the world. At the present time Australia is restricting the export of exchange. There are merchants in Canada who for some time past have been unable to transfer their credits from Australia to Canada, and I understand that condition exists to-day. Therefore Mr. Speaker, if we are to take advantage of the Australian treaty, if we are to furnish work for the lumbermen of British Columbia and other parts of Canada, for the paper mills and paper mill workers in British Columbia and other parts of Canada and, for the fishermen, we must make some provision whereby the goods they produce can be sold in Australia. Otherwise of what advantage would such a treaty be to this or any other country?

I suggest therefore, since each of these commodities entails a very high percentage of labour, that in view of the present economic and unemployment conditions the government could, if on no other grounds, justify an extension to Australia of a credit which could not be used outside of Canada. Until Australia is able to set her own house in order, until that country can permit the exportation of credits I see very little advantage in placing this treaty on the statute books. I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that every effort should be made to establish credits in Canada so that the Canadian producer may sell his goods to Australia.

During the past few years the old Australian treaty was criticized in every part of Canada —yes, even in British Columbia. The basis of the criticism was that benefits accrued only to British Columbia. True, on account of her geographical position that province must reap the greater benefit of any treaty with Australia, New Zealand or any of the Pacific countries. In this particular treaty, however, I feel that the government of the day have provided some preference to producers of all classes of goods in all portions of Canada. Therefore I for one believe that an advance has been made, that a step forward has been taken, and I have no hesitation in saying that I for one heartily support the Australian treaty as submitted to this house.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to reserve my observations until the bill reached the committee stage, but after listening to a number of addresses this afternoon I have come to realize that at this stage perhaps a few words of explanation and some observations in reply to statements made by hon. members may be useful. If the house would consider that details can be given more fully in the committee stage my present remarks might tend to shorten the debate on the second reading.

During the long months which have elapsed since this treaty was originally under discussion there has been on the part of the representatives of Canada as well as of Australia nothing but the most earnest desire to cooperate in the production of an agreement which would be mutually advantageous. I think my colleagues will agree that throughout those months, which have entailed a great deal of labour there has been nothing but the most cordial good-will between the two dominions. Some difficulties have been experienced due largely to the great distances separating the two countries. Negotiations concerning the treaty were commenced during the sessions of the economic conference, and at this point I wish to pay tribute to Mr. Moloney, who represented his country on the economic committees of the Imperial conference, upon the manner in which he approached the subject and the generous support he gave us in our efforts to bring the matter to a satisfactory conclusion.

Certain attitudes have been taken to-day towards the treaty, and I think a few words of explanation would serve to remove at least some of the apprehensions in the minds of hon. members opposite. I shall try to deal with hon. members in the order in which they have spoken, referring first to the observations of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). He referred to the fact that the Prime Minister Mr. Bennett) had said the agreement before us was a treaty of mutual advantage to both countries, and reiterated a homily on the mutuality of trade generally. I would invite the house to this thought however, that while certainly an exchange between two individuals must be or usually is of mutual advantage in that the two making the exchange are both pleased or satisfied, it is not correct to say that such is true between nations. The right hon. member laid it down as a definite and proven principle that because an exchange between individuals is mutually advantageous an exchange between nations must necessarily be of the same order. Here is the difference. Trade between countries is trade between different individuals in each of the countries. For instance, if one country has no tariff at all—I use the extreme example in order to get the full force of the point—and the other has a high tariff, the individuals in the country with the low tariff could buy goods in the country with the high tariff and bring them in to the disadvantage of some of its own nationals. On the other hand it would be next to impossible, or certainly much more difficult, for individuals in the free trade country to ship their goods into the high tariff country to the injury of the individuals over there. It is conceivable therefore that a condition may exist between two countries where trade is not mutually advantageous. If however the two countries come together and examine the conditions of trade in each and the conditions controlling the interchange between the two, it is possible to iron out differences or at least to minimize the injury which might be done. That is precisely what we have tried to do in the agreement between Australia and Canada. It is clear that there are goods produced in both countries which are competitive; I might say that in some few instances they are highly competitive. On the other hand, there is a wide range of commodities where the one is the complement to the other. In this treaty we have sought to avoid the injury which keen competition from one of its commodities would do to the importing country. While we have sought to minimize, and indeed, almost eliminate, such a danger, on the other hand there is a wide range of exchange of goods that may be carried on without injury to either country, and that is what we have tried to facilitate.

Now, I was very sorry when I heard the right hon. gentleman offer criticisms of the Australian tariff rates. He has been followed by several other hon. members who have indicated the extremely high tariff rates obtaining in Australia. It may be advisable at this point for me to refer briefly to the conditions which have brought that about, and I think in justice to Australia we ought to appreciate two or three matters to which I shall make reference. It is true that Australia has in recent years drastically increased her tariff rates. It is also true that Australia's exchange at the moment is under a serious discount. But why is it so? The reason is that Australia over a great number of years indulged, I might say, in rather expensive social legislation, which resulted in a very costly type of administration. This was followed by a very heavy expenditure, in proportion to her population, during the great war. I think I am correct in saying that the contribution which Australia made to the cause of the allies cost her perhaps more than that of almost any of the other dominions; at least in proportion to population it was a very heavy charge. Subsequent to the war, for these two reasons in the main, Australia found herself confronted with internal financial difficulties, and it was only in the last couple of years that her statesmen addressed themselves seriously to the correcting of those difficulties. Bringing their efforts down to date, they first of all increased the exchange rate. I may say that the Australian banks deal with this matter in a different manner from that followed by the Canadian, American or British banks. In Canada, United States and Britain, and, I think, in nearly all the other major countries, the exchange varies from day to day according to the necessities of the case—according to the demand for the money of one country in the market of the other, or the obligations to be met from time to time. So that exchange is constantly varying up and down in those markets. But under the Australian system of administering their banks, they arbitrarily fix the rate of exchange in a given period.

Now, under the circumstances to which I referred a moment ago, that is, the pressing necessity to correct their internal financial handicap, and the further necessity—which I overlooked—of paying their heavy interest charges abroad, both in New York and in London, Australia found it necessary to curb imports—that was her first step—in order to increase as far as possible the spread between exports and imports, thus giving her the goods or the financial value to pay her obligations abroad. To achieve this she imposed drastic increases in her tariff, and she raised her exchange. A year ago last January it was 3 per cent; it remained there for several months until she advanced it to 7 per cent; where it remained for several months and then she advanced to 9 per cent; where it remained until last January, when for a few days she raised it to 13 per cent, and later to 24 per cent, where it remains to-day. I am talking about the official exchange rates.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is that imposed arbitrarily by Australia? Is it not imposed at the other end on Australia?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is fixed by the Australian banks themselves, for the dual purpose of restricting the export of cash and the import of goods, with the idea of stimulating the exports in order to meet their obligations abroad. In addition to that Australia raised her tariff very substantially. Then the Australian authorities took one further step, for which I believe they deserve great credit. They cut all civil servant's salaries by 20 per cent; they cut all classes of pensions, including war pensions, 20 per cent; they cut down internal subventions 20 per cent; and they put into effect other drastic economies which have materially reduced their internal obligations. As a result of these efforts they have corrected their trade situation until for their fiscal year, ending, I think, last June, their exports exceeded their imports by $100,000,000. I cite that because those who are studying the situation closely believe that in this achievement alone one can perceive an early return of their exchange to par. I do not suggest that it will return to par rapidly, but I do believe that we shall see an improved condition in Australian exchange in the near future. I do wish to impress upon hon. members that the statesmen of Australia have seriously addressed themselves to the task of correcting the internal financial difficulties and uncertainties of the country. Therefore instead of criticizing the means which they have taken to achieve this end, I think we ought to recognize that they have taken a courageous and a bold stand in an effort to bring about this result.

Now, my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) I am very sorry to observe is not in his seat, because I always prefer to direct my remarks to hon. members when they are in their seats, and I shall have to answer some of his points in his absence. Usually the hon. gentleman is perhaps one of the most fairminded and moderate debaters in the house, and I was a little disappointed in the attitude he took to-day in regard to this treaty. It is quite true he intimated that he was not opposed to the treaty, that he thought there were some good features about it, but then he spent the rest of his time citing individual items which he held up before the house as evidence of the ineffectiveness of the treaty, and that it would be indeed of little value to the country. In that respect I am fair to him in saying that he limited such remarks to the application of the British preference.

I am going to examine a few of the items he examined and a few more that he did not deal with; I am not going through the whole list. By the way, he was seeking to show that the Australian rates were so absurdly high that in any case the British preference meant nothing. "Why," he said, "the first item on this list carries a duty of 60 per cent under the British preference, plus a surtax of 50 per cent of the duty." He did not say what the item was, but let us see what it is. He said, "You are not going to ship much goods under such a high rate; it means 90 per cent plus the primage tax and so on, so you need not expect to do much business under that rate." What is that item? It deals with corsets, an antiquated article of female attire. I do not know much about ladies' wear, but I am under the impression that the item of corsets does not play quite so prominent a part as it did in my younger days, and I question whether, after the treaty has been in effect for a year or so, my hon. friend will find that the failure to jump the Australian hurdle of 90 per cent under this item of corsets is going to be a very great detriment to Canada.

Mr. EULER: I never mentioned corsets.

Mr. STEVENS: No, my hon. friend was very careful not to mention them; he was a little shy and delicate. He said the first item on the list, and I am reading the first item.

Mr. EULER: I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, my hon. friend did say so. Then he came along and made rather a pathetic appeal for his own riding. He said, "I have in my own riding a cordage factory," and he cited binder twine and yarns.

Mr. EULER: I did not cite binder twine.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, my hon. friend did.

Mr. EULER: I did not cite binder twine.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend certainly spoke of the item to which I am referring.

Mr. EULER: I spoke of cordage, but not of binder twine.

Mr. STEVENS: Then my hon. friend did not read the item correctly if he did not mention cordage. He said this item carried a duty of 40 per cent which, plus the 50 per cent surtax would be 60 per cent, and he said, "I cannot see much help for my riding under this item." That is the item covering binder twine and yarns, but immediately adjoining is an item covering cordage and twines. I look across the page, and I find that under the old treaty it was 10 per cent, running up to 50 per cent in the case of some of the finer yarns, while under the new treaty it is free and up to 40 per cent on some classes of yarns. In other words we are getting that item on the free list, but my hon. friend did not see that; he saw only the other item, which carries a very much higher rate of duty.

Then my hon. friend wept over refrigerating condensers and coils, which he said carried the iniquitously high rate of 45 per cent.

Mr. EULER: I never mentioned refrigerators, and I am surprised at the statement of my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend certainly did. Does he say he did not refer to refrigerators?

Mr. EULER: No, I did not.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot contradict my hon. friend, but if he did not do so my memory is playing me false. At any rate, my hon. friend referred to another item below at 45 per cent, and the only one I see carrying that rate is the item dealing with refrigerating apparatus. But immediately adjoining that item is item 164, covering churns, cheese presses, dairy coolers and non-household refrigerators. Formerly this item carried a rate of 35 per cent while under the new treaty the rate is 22½ per cent, which is a substantial reduction. This is the British preference rate, which will certainly permit us to enter that market in competition with British manufacturers.

Now I turn over the page, and while my hon. friend did not refer to these separate items he referred to certain agricultural items as not being under the British preference. I am going to refer to a number of items and give the rate which we now receive under the British preference, and I will also show what were the previous rates. The first item is handworked rakes and ploughs combined; handworked cultivators and handworked seed drills; under the old treaty the rate was 10 per cent and it is now free. Then come threshing machines, which carried a rate of 10 per cent under the old treaty and are now free. Then there is an item covering channel-making graders; road scoops and scrapers; scoops; stump extractors; horse road rollers and machines, which under the old treaty carried a rate of 30 per cent and under the new treaty a rate of 20 per cent. The next item covers garden and field rollers and spraying machines; lawn mowers, sweepers and sprinklers; garden hose reels and syringes. Under the old treaty the rate was 30 per cent, while under the new treaty it is 20 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I see threshers are under the general tariff, while my hon. friend has just given them as free. How would that happen?

Mr. STEVENS: We come under the British preference with regard to threshers. Discs for agricultural implements, formerly 10 per cent, now are free; grinding machines, formerly 10 per cent, now are free; unspecified metal working machinery, formerly 10 per cent, now is free. I may add that there is no surtax at all on any of the items I have just mentioned. Then there is an item covering boiler tubes which I hope will be of some value to Canada. Under the old treaty the rate was 10 per cent, and now they are free.

So I might go on; there are a larger number of these items, but the point I want to impress upon the house is that perhaps the most valuable provision of this treaty is that Australia extends to Canada the British preference, which previously we had only on four items. I pause to say this to my hon. friends: When the discussions leading up to this treaty were first undertaken there were two main points which had to be overcome. The first will answer the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) with regard to the dumping clause. Australia insisted that the application of the dumping clause should be waived on our part. On the other hand we insisted that the British preference should be extended to us in full. When that was ironed out we came to consider individual items now contained in the treaty, but those were the two main principles to be considered first. I regard them as of extreme importance. Let us look at the history of the dumping legislation. In 1925 Canada entered into a treaty—and I am not now going to blame my hon. friends opposite; I will say that Canada entered into a treaty with Australia, knowing perfectly well that there was such a thing as the Paterson scheme, and we put the rate on butter at one cent a pound. The treaty was passed in the autumn of 1925.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is my hon. friend correct in his statement that the Paterson scheme was in operation in 1925?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I doubt it. That is not my information.

Mr. STEVENS: Butter had been coming into Canada quite freely, and I remember that my friend the late Hon. Mr. Boivin, Minister of Customs at that time, was alarmed about the importations of butter and he imposed the dumping duty of 6 cents against Australia because of the Paterson scheme.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In 1926.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, about February of 1926. The matter was discussed in January and February, and I have forgotten the exact date the dumping duty was imposed. Australia considered that this was more or less a shabby trick, shall I say, and they have never agreed that it was a fair imposition of the dumping clause. There was an element of unfairness in it, for this reason: All butter produced in Australia contributes 3 cents a pound to a pool, out of which was taken 6 cents per pound which was paid to the exporter of butter, so that really the exporter had already paid into the pool 3 cents a pound. Originally the amount involved was 9 cents per pound; that is, 3 cents was paid in and 6 cents was paid out. Later that was reduced to 6 cents, so that for a number of months, if not for the last year or two, there really has been a bonus of only 3 cents a pound. Recently—I have the date under my hand—that has been reduced to 5 cents a pound, so there is a bonus on Australian butter of 2½ cents a pound net, because prior to receiving the bonus the butter has contributed to the pool.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is really no difference, except the reduction of one cent. They were doing the same thing before.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but it started at 9 cents, then dropped to 6 cents and now is 5 cents. That is the point I am making. I refer to that to emphasize the reasons why Australia requested the waiving of the dump. They never regarded it as a fair imposition and they insisted that it should be waived in the treaty. We waived it, but included in the treaty, by agreement with them, of course, after we had worked on it a considerable time, article IX, which we shall deal with in due course. Article IX is simply this: that either party to the agreement, if it is found that goods from the other country are being imported to the injury of any industry, may notify the exporting country accordingly and request the restriction of such exports. And it is assumed that the exporting country will immediately take action to restrict those exports. As regards Australia, the situation is very simple. They have export boards controlling butter, eggs, canned goods, meats and, indeed, most of the goods that may be affected by the treaty.

Mr. EULER: By what method can they restrict exports?

Mr. STEVENS: The export boards also control wine. In answer to the hon. gentleman's question, I am afraid I cannot go into details, but the method is this. They have export boards from which all exporters must get a licence before they can export goods.

Mr. EULER: We should have to have legislation to that effect?

Mr. STEVENS: We have not got that system. I am pointing out that Australia, which affects us most, because we are the importing country, has the necessary machinery which it will put into operation the moment the need arises. Our experience with them during the past nine months gives us confidence in their fairness and we believe that they will actually put it into effect if necessary. But should they not do so, under Article IX we can, by our own action, remove the particular item from the treaty and it will fall automatically into the general tariff. The reason for that is this. We learned from the experience with the last treaty that an entire treaty may be wrecked by one item, and both countries agreed that this was an unwise position for either to find itself in. We therefore worked out Article IX to meet that difficulty, and there is a genuine understanding, embodied in the treaty in definite language, and clearly understood by both, that an item may be removed without jeopardizing the rest of the treaty. And when the difficulty or dispute, or whatever you choose to call it, is adjusted, the item will go back into the treaty automatically by action of the government. We consider that an excellent method.

Reference has been made by one hon. member to the fact that we have lost our market in China for wheat, Australia being able to ship wheat to that country, under her depreciated currency, at much lower rates. Now, it is well sometimes to look at the facts. It is perfectly true that Australia this year has found a larger market in China for her wheat. It is lucky for us that she did, because it as lifted that much more wheat off the congested market of Europe. And we were delighted to see it. But what injury has that done to Canada? Let me quote the figures for the last five years. Our exports to China, in bushels, have been:

1928	2,364,000
1929	7,469,000
1930	2,266,000
1931	7,266,000

And 1931 is the year in which we have been injured. These figures I submit indicate that no injury has been done to Canada—no material injury—in the Chinese market by Australia. On the contrary, the disposal of a large portion of Australian wheat in the far east has relieved the congestion of the European market, and personally I am delighted that Australia has found that eastern market this year, for her surplus wheat.

My hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), in his usual manner, opened his remarks with a rather complimentary reference to the government and the treaty.

Mr. NEILL: Is that my custom?

Mr. STEVENS: No, but I will tell the hon. gentleman what his custom is. I accept the correction. In opening his remarks he made some rather complimentary references to the government—

Mr. NEILL: To the treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: —but, as is his custom, he spoiled the effect and value of these kindly and, I trust, just remarks by proceeding to a most unfair analysis of certain items of the treaty. Referring to eggs, he took good care to read into the record a letter from the Poultry and Egg Producers' Association of British Columbia. I received precisely the same letter, which I took care to answer, giving information which would remove the false impression they had. The hon. member knew —he admitted he knew—that the writer of that letter, a Mr. Wallace, was labouring under a misapprehension, not understanding all the facts. He had made the statements that appear in his letter without having the full information before him, or without troubling himself to look it up. Now what are the facts? I indicated them this afternoon. For the last six years eggs from Australia have been on the free list. During the last eight years, from 1923 to the present time, we have imported no eggs from Australia although they have been on the free list the whole of each year during that period. In this treaty we have restricted the free period to two months of the year, or one-sixth of the time under the old treaty; yet there are some who say that we are striking a dire blow at the very heart of the egg producing industry. The thing is so absurd that only a complete disregard of the facts or a complete ignorance of them would justify anyone in making any such statement. I was therefore very much surprised that my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, who knew better, should read into the record the letter in question. And the reason I interrupted him was that that letter appearing in his speech, which he would likely send out through the egg producing district of his riding, should not go without some challenge to the accuracy of the statements made by the hon. member, together with the letter as it was read.

The hon. gentleman then referred to butter, expressing apprehension of the effect of this treaty in the importation of butter into British Columbia in particular, and into Canada generally. I have already indicated the operation of the dumping clause. The facts regarding butter are these. Under the old treaty butter was one cent per pound, with the application of the dumping clause available to the government. Under the new treaty butter is five cents per pound but, instead of the application of the dumping clause, we have article IX, which provides a much more effective, expeditious and definite way in which to prevent any flooding of the market with butter. Let me say as earnestly as I can that we are confident that Australia will not attempt to flood the Canadian market with butter. Australia takes the position that Canada during recent years has been a butter importing country, and she merely asks that if and when we import she may have a reasonable advantage in our market. We have given an advantage restricted to five cents per pound duty. During the session we have been condemned because we put on a duty of more than four cents per pound. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) read a letter purporting to come from the national dairy council at Winnipeg wherein they declared that they did not want a duty of more than four cents per pound. He impressed this upon the attention of the house and condemned the government because too high a rate was being put on. Australia has agreed to the rate of five cents per pound and we consider it reasonable and adequate, fortified as it is by article IX of the treaty.

This afternoon the hon. member for Comox-Alberni attempted to get away with the assertion that he had been asked by the pulp industry to see that they were protected against any possible damage which might be done by this treaty. He modified that statement by saying that he had been asked to speak on their behalf so that their interests might be protected. I told him this afternoon and I repeat now that he never presented that protest to the government. He is not a shy man, nor is he modest in the slightest degree—I question if he knows the meaning of the word—and if he had in his possession a request from the pulp industry of British Columbia asking for special consideration in the matter of preferences in connection with pulp, he never presented it to the government.

Mr. NEILL: I said I had received the letter and I spoke absolutely correctly, but I did not say I had it with me. During the dinner recess I looked up this matter and, it being my custom to close up my files at the end of each session, I found that it was not on this year's file. Therefore it must have been last session and I must have presented it to the late government.

Mr. STEVENS: This afternoon my hon. friend was very positive that he had this letter. He was very certain that we were penalizing the pulp industry, he was very certain that we were neglecting this industry and that we were injuring it. I challenged him to show how we were injuring it, how we were penalizing it or how we were neglecting it, and he was narrowed down to asserting that he had the letter. Now he tells us that he has not the letter; it must have been a letter he received last year and passed on to hon. members opposite. I shall be very much interested in seeing that letter.

Mr. NEILL: I will send it to my hon. friend as soon as I get home.

Mr. STEVENS: I took the precaution of wiring to the pulp industry of British Columbia to ask if such a protest had ever been lodged, and I will be much interested in the reply. The fact is that this industry, the largest in the province, is highly pleased with the care taken of its interests by this treaty. A moment ago some hon. member said quite grudgingly that a little preference had been given to newsprint. Newsprint has been put on the free list and there is a preference of £4 or $20 per ton. I submit that that is a very generous preference, and in spite of what my hon. friend has said I consider that this government has fully protected and not neglected the interests of the pulp and paper industry of British Columbia.

I do not propose to deal with the currency question, other than to comment upon the fact that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) quoted from a speech which I made in 1922. I recall that speech very well, and if my hon. friend thinks he was embarrassing me by quoting therefrom, he is mistaken. I think the right hon. leader of the opposition, who was then Prime Minister, will recall the incident. Right Hon. Mr. Fielding had introduced his budget, which was an important one because of world conditions which had arisen during the previous year or two bringing about an economic collapse and a subsequent condition similar to that through which we are passing at the present time. Many countries of Europe had indulged in what some hon. gentlemen have suggested we are indulging in, the inflation of currency. So rapidly had this inflation occurred that it endangered the trade of countries which were maintaining some measure of stabilized currency. After weeks of study I presented to the house my views on this matter, and my right hon. friend will recall that Mr. Fielding changed his budget and made provision in his second announcement for the protection of Canada against a possible flow of goods from countries with inflated currency. The inflation at that time was most acute and vicious. At the time I made my speech, if I recall correctly, the mark had dropped to about one quarter of its value. It was continuing to decrease in value on an increasing ratio, so much so that when people received marks for goods or wages they rushed to spend them, but very often would lose from 10 to 20 per cent before they could get to the store.

As far as Australia is concerned, the depreciation has been fixed by her banking system. As I have already explained, the practice is to maintain the exchange discount at a given level until a certain object has been attained, and then to reduce or increase it a few points as conditions warrant. We believe that Australia already has made such progress in the adjustment of her affairs that in the near future a reduction in the rate of the exchange discount may be expected. That decrease will come through the action of the Australian banks and will not be caused by market influences.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the minister think that the rate of Australian exchange will work to the advantage of that state in shipping goods to Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate the sincerity of my hon. friend, but to discuss that question fully would necessitate one of those long debates which we have experienced in years gone by. I will answer the question, but I do not pretend that the answer will be complete. Undoubtedly some advantage would accrue to a country with a depreciated currency in the exchange of its goods with other countries, but it must be remembered that although it may not synchronize with the depreciated currency, the time will come when the cost of production rises correspondingly. It does not follow that that rise will be as rapid as the rate of depreciation; it never is, but it follows that the depreciation gradually is offset.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The advantage, then, would be only temporary.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. It is a grave question whether or not it is of any advantage to Australia, and I question whether it is of any advantage at all. We are undoubtedly concerned about it in a sympathetic way, but we believe the situation is being corrected and we look in the near future to a very rapid correction of it. We certainly would not advise the holding up of this treaty because of the fact of depreciated currency. Furthermore, while I am not certain, I believe Australia has a provision in her tariff to prevent, and is recognizing the wisdom of preventing, the unfair competition of goods from countries with depreciated currencies. The other day a cargo of goods from Russia entered Sydney harbour, and the Australian government are, I believe, taking action to prevent those goods from entering into unfair competition with her own products. If that be so—and I believe it to be—certainly they will appreciate an appeal to them should it be proved that goods from Australia are entering Canada because of depreciated currency, in an unfair manner in competition with our goods.

Just a word in conclusion. Australia and Canada have similar tariff systems; they have a preferential, an intermediate and a general rate. Hitherto Australia has extended the British preference to the United Kingdom and New Zealand, and on four items, to Canada. She now extends the British preference to Canada, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, on 415 items. True, on some of those items the British preferential rate will be high and will not permit of exchange, but this preference will give us perhaps two or three hundred items upon which we may enter the markets of Australia in competition with the United Kingdom. Furthermore, this is certain: whatever opportunity any countries may enjoy of entering the Australian market, we certainly enjoy the best. Last year Great Britain shipped goods into Australia to the extent of $277,000,000, and the preference netted Great Britain $35,000,000. That is what it is worth to Great Britain. We have now equal opportunity with Great Britain on all the range of goods that she sells to Australia. It may also be interesting to know that Australian imports are divided as follows:

United Kingdom..	42 per cent
United States..	23 per cent
Canada..	3 per cent

I invite the house to consider the possibilities for Canada under the new treaty with the British preference and special privileges that we have in the specified items. The United States have to their credit 23 per cent of the imports of Australia, while we have only 3 per cent, and now we have an opportunity in the Australian market on conditions surpassed by no other country, not even Great Britain.

The principle which has directed our efforts in connection with this treaty has been that of friendly cooperation between Australia and ourselves. We have at all times sought to work these things out in a fraternal spirit, if I might so put it. On every occasion we have been met with the most kindly response, and we anticipate the most hearty cooperation on their part just as we shall give it to them in the working out of the terms of the treaty.

Another point to which I might call attention is that so far as the items in the two schedules are concerned, we maintain the spread between the general tariff and the specified rates to Canada or to Australia, as the case may be. That is, however we may change our rate or they may change theirs, the spread between the general and the specified rates will be maintained.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will my hon. friend explain that spread a little more fully?

Mr. STEVENS: In so far as the items specified in the two schedules are concerned, the spread between the preferential rate extended by us to Australia or by Australia to us and the general rate will be maintained.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the Australian tariff?

Mr. STEVENS: And in ours—both ways. I might mention also in connection with the treaty the question of inland freight rates. Under the Australian law determining the value for duty freight in the country of origin to the point of exit is included. To illustrate: Goods originating in Toronto, if shipped via Buffalo and San Francisco, would be dutiable in Australia at the cost of the goods plus the freight rate from Toronto to Niagara or Buffalo. If the goods perchance went by Vancouver, the rate of duty would be applied on the cost of the goods plus the freight rate to Vancouver. The result was a tendency to ship the goods via United States ports, thus depriving Canadian ports of that business. That situation has been completely corrected. It was, I may say, in part corrected a year or two ago on the westward haul, but not on the haul eastward to Montreal, Halifax or St. John. Under the treaty this freight situation is completely corrected and the only freight charge to be added to the invoice price will be that to the nearest point of exit. From Toronto the nearest point will be Niagara or Buffalo.

Mr. MORAND: Does that apply to Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: It applies to both countries. It is not important as applying to Australian goods coming into Canada, but in the case of Canadian goods entering Australia it is of great importance.

Mr. MORAND: It does not apply to the United States?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I have already given an explanation of article IX, and I shall not now repeat it.

We are asking the house to look upon this treaty as a genuine effort on the part of Canada as a whole, irrespective of party affiliation, or business interests, or locality, because we believe the treaty will be of advantage to the whole of Canada much more than is perhaps at the present time understood. We offer the treaty to the house in that spirit, that Canada as a whole has sought to work out and we believe we have succeeded in bringing before parliament a trade agreement with a sister dominion, which, while it may not be perfect or wholly satisfactory, is at least for the time being the best we could hope for and one that will be of advantage to Canada and, we trust also, of advantage to Australia.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): I do not rise to be critical of the trade arrangement now being consummated between this government and the government of Australia. May I say at the outset that I welcome treaties that will enlarge and encourage trade abroad, more particularly wtih countries within the empire; I think Canada stands to be benefited by any extension of trade that can be brought about by any process or by any government. The Australian treaty which was previously in effect and which was criticized so severely by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition proved to be very beneficial to Canada. One need only look at the trade returns to realize that Canada had much the better of that agreement. I do not think the present arrangement will result so favourably to Candaa, but I do not say that if that result is effected, any considerable damage will accrue to this country. I believe the more trade we can bring about, the greater the encouragement we can give to trade, the more prosperity we shall bring to Canada. That was amply demonstrated during the regime of the late government. True, so far as the Australian treaty is concerned, there has been a falling off of exports to Australia during the past year. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) brought that to the attention of the house. I think they are almost on a parity, some $4,000,000 worth of trade being done by Australia and $6,000,000 being done by Canada—a very considerable drop so far as Canada is concerned. Australia unfortunately, like most countries which indulged in an orgy of tariff increases, found itself in very serious difficulties, and as a consequence Canada, and other countries which had an import trade into Australia, suffered. The drop not being so great in Canada, the import trade from Australia did not fall so rapidly. I think that is only to be expected.

I am not going to offer any criticism at the present time but would prefer to reserve it until a later stage. My remarks as a matter of fact do not constitute criticism but are offered for the purpose of gaining information when the bill is in committee. There are one or two matters however to which I think the minister's attention might be directed. For example, let us consider lumber—and in this connection I wish to congratulate the minister upon the advantageous terms he secured in connection with this commodity. Trade in lumber will be of immense benefit to the west coast of Canada, the province of British Columbia. The fact that the Australian market has been secured and a preference obtained makes possible greater activity in the lumber trade. Hon. members opposite however have always maintained that their policy with regard to raw products was to manufacture them in Canada and ship them out in their manufactured state, and lumber has undergone a manufacturing process when it has been sawn. In examining the schedules I find that the greatest preference enjoyed is with respect to logs, and the greatest preference is given to the raw product. If I am wrong I should like to be corrected, but in my opinion this preference will create an extensive shipment of logs from British Columbia to Australia to be sawn and manufactured in that country. This would be in exact contradiction of the policy of hon. members opposite for a considerable number of years.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will give me the information no doubt when we reach the committee stage.

Mr. STEVENS: All I wish to say is that that is not the case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Unfortunately I find, after careful scrutiny, that the figures appear to indicate what I have stated. A good deal of stress is being placed upon the number of items on the preferential list. I say without fear of contradiction that Australia has secured the better end of the bargain, because on our products there will be a duty almost twice as high, in the main, as the preference we have given to Great Britain which Australia will enjoy when shipping her goods to Canada. I am not unmindful of the fact that, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, under this provision Great Britain enjoys a rather extended trade. My hon. friend will remember, however, that on the very class of goods which Great Britain is shipping to Australia this government has seen fit to reduce the British preference so that they may be kept out of Canada. So that in going into competition with Australia, or with Great Britain in Australia, if the policy adopted by this government with reference to the importation of British goods into Canada is a correct one, and it is necessary for the protection of our industry that they be kept out or at least that the duty upon them be increased, we will have a great deal of difficulty in meeting that competition in the Australian market.

The minister has cleared up some points in connection with the fluctuations in the Australian tariff concerning which I had some doubts. In the last three or four years Australia has been constantly changing her tariff and imposing higher rates of duty. The rate on sewing machines, upon which the duty had been 10 shillings, was on the first of June of this year increased to £2. I mention that merely as an indication of the manner in which the Australian government has been fixing its duties. The result is that while in one month we may be able to get a market, in another the commodities in question may carry a higher rate of duty. My hon. friend has pointed out that there is no stabilization of duty, that the only precaution taken is that the general tariff must increase by the same percentage as the preferential tariff. Speaking generally, therefore, we have no preference on agricultural implements, of which in former days we shipped considerable quantities to Australia, and we must go into the Australian market on the same footing as the United States. No hon. member opposite has said a single word about agricultural implements. To some degree at least we have been put out of that market through the sale of American machinery.

Mr. BENNETT: They make it themselves.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My right hon. friend will admit on account of our having no preference in the market the Americans did secure a fair share of the Australian business and to a considerable degree we lost out in the farm implement business. After all the main items in connection with which Canadian trade will profit the most, and the items I am very glad indeed to support—in fact I am glad to support the whole treaty—are timber and paper. My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) was very critical of the action of the government which negotiated the treaty in 1925. He said if we had adopted the proposals of the late Mr. Robb we would not have had such a serious condition. True, there may have been some trouble, chiefly I believe in regard to raisins. At the time, however, the difficulties did not seem to be serious. Some members of that government felt that food products should be procured as cheaply as possible for the consumers of Canada, and to some extent we did oppose the proposal to increase the duties upon raisins. In the present instance my hon. friend is alarmed about wine; he fears that the industry in Canada will be interfered with by the importation of that commodity. Well, the minister has my sympathy. To introduce schedules in a treaty to please every part of Canada is a very difficult matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite happy in that regard; there is no difficulty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am glad to know my hon. friend is happy, because the severest criticism he has received has come from my hon. friend across the way, who I believe intends to make further observations in committee.

After the argument of my hon. friend I cannot see that under the Paterson scheme, there has been any reduction, except the one cent which prevailed when the embargo was placed on the importation of Australian butter. The result was that Australian butter did not come into Canada because the embargo kept it out. I am not complaining about that, nor would I complain very much if there was no duty upon Australian butter or if it had a free market in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite, of course, in order to carry out the theory that they advanced so strenuously during the recent campaign when they talked so much about the importation of New Zealand butter—and undoubtedly they did a great deal of damage to our government—felt it incumbent upon them to put a duty on butter, notwithstanding the fact that we told them time and again that owing to the Canadian product being shut out of the American market, we would within a period of a year or eighteen months at least be on an export basis; then it would not make very much difference whose butter was being imported into this country, for prices would be regulated in the markets in which we would have to sell our surplus. And that has happened to-day. Notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite said throughout the rural constituencies, to-day they are forced to go back and admit that all the duty they have placed on butter does not help the price one iota so long as we are on an export basis. For a short time we did happen to be out of the export market, then a higher price for butter prevailed in Canada than in any other country, and New Zealand promptly diverted her shipments from Britain to Canada. At once hon. gentlemen opposite took advantage of that exceptional condition to decry the Australian treaty and to make statements from one end of Canada to the other that were utterly untrue. In consequence they were able to secure the return of a greater number of their candidates than otherwise would have been possible. If it was butter that defeated the late government, and the same condition prevail again that we become a butter importing country—it will not happen, of course, because the United States will not admit our butter into their market again, and we shall be on an export basis when hon. gentlemen opposite appeal to the country four years hence—a duy of five cents a pound will not keep out imports of butter, particularly from Australia, for so long as the Paterson stabilization scheme is continued we shall have practically free imports of butter from Australia, and it would simply be a fitting retribution that hon. gentlemen opposite should slide out of office on the article on which they slid into office.

As the result of this treaty I hope our trade with Australia will be at least as great in volume as it was under the former treaty which hon. gentlemen opposite maligned so much. While I do not expect that that trade will be so much in favour of Canada, yet if we get our share of it, then it is all to the good. May I say to the government that so long as they secure business for Canada by treaties negotiated on a reasonable and equitable basis, then I am for them, for I have some sympathy with the statement made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) the other night. He mentioned a few things that are worth thinking about. For the last twenty years we have been improving our ports and our railway facilities, we have been spending huge sums of money upon our transportation systems, largely for the purpose of external trade, but the action of the government that he supports has put the greatest stumbling block in the way of our securing that trade and making payments on the vast expenditures so incurred. Every time there is any encouragement for Canada to increase her external trade, I am for it, so long as the trade treaty is upon reasonable and equitable terms for Canada.

Hon. PETER VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this treaty to be adopted by the house without expressing my views. At the outset permit me to say that I approve of the treaty in almost all its terms. I have listened to the various speeches made this afternoon and to-night, and I have come to the conclusion that the introduction of this treaty has been a field day for British Columbia. The only reason I rise to enter a protest of any kind is that in some respects the treaty constitutes discrimination against the maritime provinces. I find item 51 (c) covers fish preserved in tins or other airtight vessels including the weight of liquid contents. This gives salmon a preference of 3 pence while crustaceans and other canned fish have a preference of only 1½ pence. Now, every one knows that British Columbia is the largest producer of salmon in the world—

Mr. BENNETT: Not now; northern Russia and Japan.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, outside of northern Russia.

Mr. BENNETT: And Japan.

Mr. VENIOT: British Columbia does not produce the crustaceans and other canned fish to which I have referred; these are produced in the maritime provinces and exported in large quantities. I wish to enter my protest on behalf of the fishermen of the maritime provinces against this way of treating that section of the Dominion. I have no fault to find with the substantial preference given British Columbia in that respect, but I claim the maritime provinces should have been put on an equal footing with relation to their crustaceans and other canned fish as is British Columbia with respect to its salmon.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I am not going to discuss the treaty at any length, Mr. Speaker, but I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to secure accurate information as to the present standing of the Paterson stabilization scheme. I have before me the November issue of the Journal of Agriculture of South Australia, and I desire to quote two paragraphs from a paper read by Mr. R. J. Finlayson at a conference of the Murray Lands Branches at Minardie, on October 1, 1929. Referring to the Paterson stabilization scheme he said:

> The price of butter having advanced 3d. per pound, the farmer was immediately paid the enhanced price by his factory. Out of this 3d., however, he received only 1½d. per pound, the other 1½d. per pound being placed in a fund to provide the money necessary to pay a bounty of 3d. per pound (the difference between the two markets) on butter exported. The factory exporting is, therefore, no better or worse off than it was before, while the farmer, under this arrangement, was 1½d. per pound to the good.
> Under the scheme all factories in the commonwealth have contracted to subscribe to the scheme, and to furnish each month to the secretaries of the various states duly certified returns, showing the amount of butter manufactured and the amount of money deducted from the farmers' payment. This money, which is forwarded to the secretaries, is placed in the bank to provide funds for the paying of bounties when butter is shipped.
> After the plan had been tried out for two years, the committee found from experience gained that it could give further advantage to the supplier by increasing the levy and bounty, therefore on July 1st last—

I may say this is dated November 15, 1929.

> —the levy on the farmer was raised to 1¾d. per pound and the bounty available for butter exported was raised to 4½d. per pound. The difference between the two prices was then 2¾d. per pound, which amount the farmer receives by the extra price which he is paid for his butter.

It would seem that when this address was delivered the export bounty was equivalent to 9 cents per pound, but this evening I was informed by a gentleman who makes it his business to know these things that recently that amount has been reduced. He was not able to tell me exactly the amount, but was of the opinion that it was about 7½ cents.

Mr. STEVENS: I hold in my hand a recent despatch which states that the Australian bounty on butter manufactured for export has been reduced from threepence to two-pence-halfpenny per pound, with effect from April 12.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: At the moment hon. gentlemen should address themselves to the principle of the bill. A discussion of the individual items would be more in order in committee.

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps the minister will be prepared to give a little more information when we discuss this measure in committee. I hope he will secure the fullest possible information on this point. I should like to know not only the bounty at the start, but what it was later and what it is at the present time. I should like also to be informed as to the time the Paterson scheme became effective. To-night it has been stated that this scheme was in operation when the former Australian treaty was negotiated. On that point I must express a little doubt, because I am told the Paterson scheme came into effect in January, 1926, while the former treaty was made in 1925. Perhaps during the discussion in committee we will get these matters cleared up.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): This will be the third occasion this session on which I have had the pleasure of supporting a government measure. The first was in connection with a very modest bill to amend the Root Vegetables Act, and I made what little contribution I thought necessary to assist the minister at that time. The second occasion was when I supported the duty on foreign oranges. That was a very unpopular thing to do, but nevertheless I think it will work out all right. That action was on all fours with the policy of the Liberal government in respect to bananas a few years ago, when the trade treaty with the West Indies was negotiated. Prior to that time bananas were non-dutiable coming from all parts of the world, and the government of that day imposed a duty of 50 cents a stem on foreign bananas, leaving them free from the West Indies and other British dominions. That has worked out splendidly, and I think that the same result will come about in connection with oranges. I hope that within a short time we will be able to obtain sufficient oranges from the various parts of the British Empire to make us independent of foreign countries.

To-night I have much pleasure in supporting this bill, almost without reservation, though I intend to point out some defects and I hope my hon. friends will not take exception to what I have to say. I think they realize now that they cannot buy a market in any country without paying for it. You cannot go into any store in this city and buy a hat, a pair of boots or anything else without having to pay some coin, and you cannot go to a sister dominion or to any other country and secure a market without not only giving something for it but also allowing them to export commodities which will compete with commodities produced in our own country.

I am supporting this bill for two particular reasons. It is the first evidence this session of returning trade sanity on the part of this administration, and I think it would be a terrible thing to not encourage that development in the future. The second reason is that this is the proper thing to do. I think from now on this parliament as a whole should support any bill which brings into being a treaty, after it has been threshed out with a sister dominion or whatever country it may be. When the government come down with an agreement and say, "This is the best that can be devised," we should give it a trial before condemning it. That is my honest opinion, as one who believes in the principle of inter-empire trade. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, what would happen to this bill—because there are weak points in it, although to-night I am looking only for the strong points—if we ripped into it as hon. gentlemen opposite did with regard to the first Australian treaty from its very inception. Would that promote the cause of inter-empire trade? I do not think it would. So I think from now on Canada should realize that any treaty brought down by any government should be given a fair measure of support before it is subjected to severe criticism by the opposition, whatever opposition it may be. Give it a probationary trial; I think that is fair to any government, and it is the proper thing to do. I realize that to-day because of the utterly unfair criticism of the Conservative party in connection with the first Australian treaty. I do not want to say that with any soreness or bitterness; I speak as one who has experienced what it means to have a government measure very unfairly criticized and a treaty jeopardized. I always thought the old treaty was economically sound, but it was politically weak when exposed to the attack of an opposition which knew no limits to its criticism. So for those two reasons I support this bill.

Now I should like to refer briefly to some of the remarks of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin). I have been asked once or twice this session, I think by my hon. friend from North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam), why the government enacted the first treaty containing the tariff provision it did contain with regard to butter. It was stated from Melbourne, just after the late Mr. Robb left there in 1924, that we had the option of either increasing the general tariff or lowering the preference; we could do either so long as we gave Australia a 3 cent preference. Those are not my words; I say that is the statement which came from Melbourne. Assuming that to have been correct, we had the option of either putting up the general tariff to 7 cents and leaving the preference at 4 cents or of putting the preference at 1 cent and leaving the general tariff at 4 cents. Whether we did rightly or wrongly, we took the latter course, which was in conformity with the general policy of the Liberal party in regard to preferences. We believe in creating preferences by lowering the British preference rather than by raising the general tariff. We raised the general tariff in connection with bananas as I have said, but that was an exceptional case.

As I say, rightly or wrongly we chose the course which conformed to the general policy of the Liberal party with respect to preferences and lowered the British preferential rate instead of increasing the general rate. As a matter of fact I do not believe we could have passed the bill through this house if we had increased the general rate. As you know, Mr. Speaker, at that time the Progressive party were sixty-four or sixty-five strong and we had a majority of only one if everyone was in the house, so in a measure we were dependent upon that party. I think they advocated an even lower tariff then than the Liberal party, although we have some pretty low tariff men on this side of the house.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If my hon. friend will look up the records he will find that the Progressive party voted against that treaty.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know they did last session, but not at that time on butter. And it was on a different question altogether—raisins, not butter. There is one matter with which I fancy the newer members are not familiar. The very first session after the late government came into power, the session of 1922, there was a real stand-up fight on the question of oleomargarine. The question was whether or not the prohibition of the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine should be restored. The government that had preceded that Liberal administration had continued the manufacture and free importation of oleomargarine, and when we came into power I myself took the position that we should revert to the pre-war condition of prohibition of this commodity. The prohibition had been instituted by the Hon. Sydney Fisher, and it was abolished during the war, in 1917, as a war measure. I felt it was only fair all around, to the dairy industry particularly, that the prohibition should be restored, and the fight continued in 1922 and 1923, and almost into 1924. It seemed to me that anything in the way of a tariff that would artificially raise the price of butter at that time would once more start the agitation for the manufacture and importation again of oleomargarine. For four years after the Australian treaty was enacted butter in Montreal, No. 1 pasteurized, was selling at 40 cents per pound wholesale during the month of January. That would mean practically 50 cents per pound retail; and with butter selling at 50 cents per pound—indeed, it went higher, but we may take that as the average—and especially so soon after the struggle over the oleomargarine question, there was almost bound to be a renewed agitation for the removal of the prohibition against the manufacture and importation of that substitute. It was a severe fight, and I did not want the experience a second time. That was one reason why I favoured a reduced preference to one cent per pound on butter rather than raise the general rate to 7 cents. I was of the opinion that anything that would raise the price of butter artificially would surely create an agitation for the importation and manufacture again of oleomargarine. Those were three reasons why it seemed advisable and expedient to do what we did at that time.

I will go further. The national dairy council came to the government on one or two occasions during 1926 and 1927 and interviewed Mr. Robb and myself with regard to the increasing of the duty to what it was before, that is, up to 4 cents. Mr. Robb invariably advised them to go to the tariff board. But the national dairy council had nothing in particular to submit to the board at that time. They had no evidence that New Zealand butter was injuriously competing with Canadian butter, and it was not until 1929 that they did appear before the board. By that time they felt they had a case, and as soon as they presented that case the matter was approved of by the tariff board and Mr. Dunning took the necessary steps to restore that duty, giving six months' notice. I suppose that had the dairy council worked up a case at an earlier date they would have gone to the board and obtained the same results. But as soon as they did go in 1929 they got the approval of the board and of the government as well. That is the story in a nutshell.

Under this new treaty the duty is one cent more than the dairy council asked for. What that 5 cents will mean I do not know. Now, I do not pretend to be very well versed in economics, but it was news to me that Australia could choose her exchange at will. I think there was a time when she could.

Mr. STEVENS: It is arbitrary.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It may have begun as an arbitrary depreciation of currency but I fear it is involuntary now. I remember well when our money had depreciated 13 or 17 cents. That was no act of Canada's. My own impression is that the exchange or any country depends upon the money markets of the world, and I have more than a suspicion that this is about the way it stands with Australia to-day, although I hope, as I am sure we all hope, that they will soon be back to par. But in the meantime will the Australians not make as much on the present exchange as the duty represents? Will they not make 5 cents on the exchange? I think they will.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) this afternoon made a speech that had something in it, not only as regards butter but as regards every other commodity which Australia sells to Canada. I do not wish to make too much of this, but if the minister is relying on any deliberate act of Australia to restore her money to par to set this matter right, in order to give the 5 cents its full value, he is making a treaty based on pious hopes rather than on actual facts. I hope he will not resent my calling this to his attention. More than that, he has thrown away, rightly or wrongly, any power to dicker on the basis of the dumping duty.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh no.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: After three months' notice, of course. That was always there. I myself got the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice that we could have abandoned any one feature of the act ourselves by giving six months' notice. And if I remember rightly that was what Mr. Dunning did in regard to New Zealand.

Mr. BENNETT: It was the whole treaty.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That may be; I was not here at the time. However, I had the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice that the duty on butter could have been dealt with separately if we had thought it advisable to do that, by giving the usual six months' notice. At any rate, I do not believe that the national dairy council, when they supported the proposal for 4 cents rather than 8 cents on Antipodean butter, took into consideration the question of depreciated currency. And I must admit that when I discussed the matter earlier in the session I did not take it into consideration either. But I know what the effect is. I shipped grass seed into the United States for many years, at a time when our currency was depreciated, and I was surprised when I deposited in my local bank the cheque I got from the American side for my carload of grass seed to find that for every $100 I had been expecting I received $113 Canadian dollars. That was the first time in my life I was so agreeably surprised by a similar cause. I knew, of course, that if I spent that money in a foreign country I should lose as much as I had gained. I knew in a general way that a depreciated currency enabled you to sell your commodities in another country to better advantage than you could when your own money was at par. So much for that.

May I now briefly refer to eggs. I always thought that two weaknesses had developed under the old treaty; I will make that admission. Those weaknesses were not inherent in the treaty at the beginning but they appeared later. I refer to the matter of eggs and onions. I do not believe that anyone ever expected that very many eggs would be shipped either way. Under the old treaty eggs from Australia were free. I am not sure at what rate eggs were going into New Zealand and Australia from Canada under the British preference, but if I remember rightly the rate into New Zealand was 8 cents and into Australia 17 cents. But that did not matter much so long as no eggs were moving either way. And the fact is that practically no eggs came from Australia to Vancouver or elsewhere in Canada. But some trade was worked up once or twice when the markets for eggs were quite low in eastern Canada; Vancouver tried to ship to Australia. Their eggs, I believe, had to climb over a wall of 10 or 17 cents; I do not remember exactly which. Perhaps my hon. friend can tell me what it was under the old treaty. What is the duty on eggs going into Australia under the new treaty? Are they not 10 cents into Australia?

Mr. STEVENS: I think they are 10 cents.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Sixpence.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not certain.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It seems strange that Canadian eggs can go over the Pacific waters to Australia in fair condition while Australian eggs cannot acceptably come to Canada. If the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) were in the chamber I believe he would agree that Australia and South Africa were about to ship eggs to Canada when he put a dumping duty on eggs. I believe my information is correct, because I obtained it from the Canada Gazette or the newspapers or elsewhere.

Mr. STEVENS: It has never applied against Australia, and no eggs came in from that country.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They did not come in because there was a dump put on.

Mr. STEVENS: The dump was not applied against Australia.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Was there not a dump put on last fall and applied to South Africa?

Mr. GOTT: For the last ten minutes the hon. gentleman has been speaking of the old Australian treaty.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would rather speak of the new one, but I wanted to make a comparison.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: We are discussing the new Australian treaty. The hon. member should wait until we go into committee before asking questions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Some time ago I promised the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) that when the new Australian treaty was before the house I would answer certain questions which he asked regarding butter and eggs.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member may discuss the treaty, but he should not put questions to the hon. minister who is not allowed to answer. He should wait until we go into committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I agree with your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I thought the minister would be accommodating. We can ship our eggs to Australia because they are of high quality, but Australia has not been able to enter our market because her eggs are graded so low on arrival in Canada. I would like to elaborate this matter but I am afraid I would not be in order.

I do not see onions mentioned in the treaty, but other hon. members have referred to this commodity so I may be considered to be in order. Onions came into Canada free under the old treaty, and last fall they were taxed £8 per ton going into Australia. Putting the par value on Australian money, that would mean about $37. I do not think that was fair, but that was not the condition when the old treaty was first made. Under the late government cold storage facilities were set up in British Columbia to enable the growers of onions to keep their product in good condition throughout the winter in order to be able to ship in the spring when onions are scarce in Australia. If we were given half a chance to get into Australia we would be able to enter their market with British Columbia onions. I admit that this disparity cannot be changed now without altering the new treaty and I admit that that was one of the developed weaknesses in connection with the old treaty. It did not exist at the time the treaty was made, but the need for correction had arisen. I do not see any harm in pointing out to this government just where further corrections can be made in regard to both eggs and onions. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) must not think that he has a monopoly on onions, because they are grown in other parts of Canada. I am not making these suggestions in any critical way, and I do not believe the minister thinks I am. If the government could not improve a little bit on the first treaty after six years' trial of it, it would not be doing very much.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The government I repeat has had the experience of five or six years and if they could not make an improvement on the old treaty they would not amount to very much. I hope we will learn, as an opposition, from hon. members opposite, how not to treat a new treaty with a sister dominion. Perhaps that will be one benefit which will come out of this treaty.

I do not think it would be quite fair to judge the trade results of the new treaty by the old. It is not fair to compare the last four or five wonderful years of development under the old treaty with the next four or five possible sub-normal years under the new. I do not know how long I will have to keep myself under discipline and refrain from criticizing this new treaty. Conditions probably will not be sufficiently normal for at least two years, but I do not know whether I will have sufficient grace to keep quiet about this treaty and give it a fair trial for that length of time, but I will try.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I intend to make but a few general observations on the principle of this bill. In that this treaty represents an earnest and honest endeavour on the part of the government to improve the trade relations of Canada with our sister dominion, I think hon. members generally thoroughly approve of it. My own opinion is that the treaty is a fair one for Australia and a useful one for Canada. It has every promise of bringing to us that which we need and of providing an extension of markets for many of our products, particularly those of our fisheries, our lumbering and paper industries, and certain of our manufacturing industries. The principle of the treaty is similar to that of the treaty which was put into force by the former government.

So far as Canada is concerned, there are two main points in the treaty. First, we give Australia an advantage in our markets for her agricultural products, and, second, we give Australia a preference on some of her fruit exports. As to the latter, we give a preference by increasing the duty against other countries, notably the United States, and in so doing we extend the principle made operative by the former treaty in respect to raisins and apply it to other fruit, such as oranges.

On behalf of agriculture I must voice a protest. The inevitable outcome of a treaty with a dominion such as Australia is that any advantage given to certain classes of industry in this country must be paid for. Unfortunately, owing to the fact that Australia is not a manufacturing country, that preference must be paid for by agriculture, not by a reduction of duty but by the opening of our doors to the agricultural products of Australia. I am not taking violent objection to that. Anything we get that is worth while for Canada as a whole must be paid for by some sacrifice on our part. It is unfortunate of course that invariably such sacrifices must be made by agriculture; to what extent this will affect agriculture time alone will show. I am not of opinion that Australian butter, eggs or meat will at the present time at least, enter Canada in any large quantities to displace the Canadian article. As regards butter—and I am speaking of butter because it was perhaps the outstanding issue of the last treaty, particularly as it related to its extension to New Zealand—the situation has completly changed since that time. We were then in a position to take advantage of a domestic market and to receive a higher price for our butter in this country than the world market would justify. At the present time we are, and I would expect for some time to come we shall be, on an export basis. Therefore I doubt very much that there will be any large imports of Australian butter, and also whether any imports there may be will have any effect on the price under present conditions.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Speaking generally, then, we have negotiated a treaty favourable to this country; it is favourable particularly to certain industries, and to the extent that it is paid for by any corresponding sacrifice within this country, it is paid for by agriculture. Time alone will show the extent to which agriculture may have to pay for it. But on the face of the treaty as it stands to-day, and leaving out two factors which I shall mention briefly in a moment, I think it is a fair treaty which can be supported. We can leave it to time to show whether it will work out to the ultimate advantage of all. I certainly agree with the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) that it would be foolish, unjustifiable, for us to attempt at this stage to destroy the treaty.

The two factors to which I allude, and the full significance of which is at this stage unknown, are the question of exchange and the question of the Paterson bonus scheme upon export butter. It is obvious, by the action of the Australian bankers as described by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), that, whatever arguments may be adduced in opposition, they at least believe that this discount on their exchange works to the advantage of their exports, making it easier for them to place their exports in other countries. The same thing is clear from our own experience when our currency was at a discount in the United States and when we could ship cattle into that country and pay the duty through the disparity in exchange. How long this situation will last and to what extent it will affect us, time again alone will show. At the moment, however, it is apparent to everyone that the disparity in exchange alone will at least equal the protection which remains to domestic as compared with Australian butter, and the same thing applies to Australian meat, eggs and any other article coming from that dominion. In the same way and to the same degree Canadian exporters, those who, it is expected, and we hope, will be benefited by this treaty, will be placed at some disadvantage if the expressed object of the Australian bankers is fulfilled, namely, to increase exports and to discourage imports, to make it easy for them to sell and to make it difficult for us to sell in return. While this fact is obvious, the extent to which it will operate and the time over which it will extend are unknown quantities.

As regards the Paterson bonus scheme, there is a levy of two and a half cents a pound in our own money and a bonus of five cents a pound. This means a net bonus of two and a half cents a pound, because the export butter pays one-half of the bonus it receives. So we have to add to the other advantage another two and a half cents a pound. Again, no one knows the extent to which that will work, or to what degree it will place a disadvantage on our farmers. So long as we are on an export basis, may I repeat I doubt whether it will make much difference, but the moment we slip below an export basis, then we shall be able to see exactly what the result will be.

I repeat that I am sure no hon. member in our part of the house would feel justified in placing obstacles in the way of a treaty which in its general terms is designed to nullify part of the policy of the present government; which is designed to encourage international trade and the interchange of commodities between this Dominion and Australia. So far as the disadvantage may be placed upon any individual product of the Canadian farmer or manufacturer, we may again look to article IX if that disadvantage becomes obvious and if the unfairness becomes equally so. It is certainly to the advantage of the government to see that this treaty operates to the benefit of Canada and does as little harm as possible to any Canadian citizen. Undoubtedly for the sake of their own reputation, apart from their honest desire to serve Canada, they will see that such is the case. We shall trust, then, that under article IX they will be able to meet any unexpected and untoward situation which may arise, and in the meantime, reserving any further remarks until the bill is in committee, we can assure the minister of our qualified and, in view of the principle which I have already outlined, somewhat critical support.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Coming into force.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I assume there can be no material changes in this bill without consultation with Australia?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then we might as well put it through as fast as we can read it.

Section agreed to.

Schedule, articles I to XI inclusive, agreed to.

On schedule A.

The CHAIRMAN: (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): Is it the wish of the committee that we consider the items in the schedules separately?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOWARD: I should like to say a few words concerning item 18 in schedule A, which deals with butter. I shall make some statements and if I am incorrect I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will put me right. Under the old legislation the duty charged against butter entering Canada from Australia was one cent per pound. At that time the Minister of National Revenue applied the dump against Australia. With six cents added to the one cent duty, the duty against butter from Australia was raised to seven cents a pound. Under the present schedule the dump against butter is not to be applied under any consideration, and the duty of five cents per pound is in force. The result is that the duty against butter is two cents less than it was under the late administration.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is not quite correct. I have already explained that Australia always felt more or less hurt concerning the action of Canada in applying the dump. She felt that under the terms of the old treaty such action should not have been taken, and the matter of the dump became one of the principle points of adjustment between the two countries. Through the adoption of article IX an adjustment was reached and while it is clearly understood that section 6 of the Customs Tariff, the dumping clause, will not be applied, article IX will take its place. Instead of one cent per pound against butter we have a definite duty of five cents. Should Australian butter enter Canada in a manner which would prejudicially affect the interests of dairymen, notice is given to that effect. I may say that this article has been in operation, although it has not existed in the form of a contract. Australia however has voluntarily complied with requests to curb exports to this country when it was felt that such exports would be injurious to Canadian interests. Under the article such a curb becomes obligatory. If measures to remedy the conditions complained of are not put into effect by the exporting country within three months, the notice is made effective by action of the importing country. We believe article IX will be quite effective if not more effective than the dump, and will remove the stigma of applying a dumping duty.

Mr. HOWARD: With those remarks I agree most heartily, nevertheless the statements I made a few moments ago still stand. It is true that if butter enters Canada to the detriment of the Canadian dairymen the government may apply article IX. That condition however does not change one iota the statement I have just made. The late government did apply the dump of six cents a pound against Australian butter. With a duty of one cent a pound the total duty became seven cents. The present rate is five cents; there is no denying that statement. With the last part of the minister's remarks I fully agree; naturally if butter comes in the government will have the right under article IX to rectify the situation.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I notice under a prior article that the treaty itself stands for one year, after which it remains in force until terminated by six months' notice on either side. Under article IX can three months' notice be given at any time after the treaty comes into force?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, at any time.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was going to ask the minister a hypothetical question as to the possible effect of depreciated currencies, but I believe his answer has covered the point. I understand that if Australian butter or any other agricultural product comes in in such quantities and at such prices as prejudicially to affect our own interests, article IX will be invoked.

Mr. HACKETT: I believe that the statement of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) is incomplete. I think it should be completed. The Paterson scheme which obtains in Australia has undergone a very radical change since last year. The bonus to butter exported is only 2½ cents per pound, and not 5 cents, as—

Mr. EULER: Twopence halfpenny—5 cents.

Mr. HACKETT: The bonus is only 2½ cents a pound, I think if the hon. gentleman will hear me for a moment he will agree with me. For every pound of butter produced in Australia 2½ cents is paid into the pool, and when any portion of that butter is exported it is bonused to the extent of 5 cents per pound.

Mr. HOWARD: Yes, 5 cents.

Mr. HACKETT: But having contributed 2½ cents a pound to the pool the net bonus is only 2½ cents.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. EULER: Relatively that is exactly the same as under the six cents scheme.

Mr. HACKETT: Relatively, but there is an entirely different situation in Canada, which makes a difference. The point I wish to accentuate particularly in connection with the remarks of my hon. friend from Sherbrooke is, Canada is now on an export basis and so long as we are on an export basis we are absolutely immune from any harm which may come to us through importations from Australia.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is my hon. friend speaking for the government?

Mr. HACKETT: To the government, not for it. So that any harm which may have come to Canada when it was not on the export basis—and that was our pitiful plight for three or four years—has now been removed by the fact that again we are on an export basis and we can suffer no harm or injury from this item in the treaty so long as we remain on that basis.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend will look at Hansard he will find that speeches very similar to his were made in 1925.

Mr. EULER: I wish to say to my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) that under the former government so far as Australia was concerned we were never in any pitiful position, because Australian butter was not permitted to come in. I think my hon. friend is referring to New Zealand butter and not the Australian product at all. In the course of my remarks this afternoon I asked a question of the government which has not been answered. It was with regard to article VI, which states:

> Nothing in this agreement shall be construed to affect the right of either country to impose any special duty or tax (other than dumping duty)—

What is the significance of that particular clause?

Mr. STEVENS: A good illustration is the one per cent excise tax that we imposed this year.

I happen to have accurate information upon the bounty question. My hon. friend from Lisgar asked me a few moments ago to try to get some definite information with respect to it. I was in error when I said that the Paterson stabilization scheme was in force prior to the date of the last treaty. It came into operation in January, 1926, and immediately afterwards the dumping duty was applied.

As regards the rates, I have under my hand the official reports in regard to them. Until December 12, 1930, the rate was 4½ pence per pound; that is 9 cents. However, the butter having already contributed 3 cents to the pool, that left a net bonus of 6 cents a pound until December, 1930. It was then reduced from 4½ pence to 3½ pence, or 7 cents a pound, and the 3 cents deducted from the 7 left a net bonus of 4 cents a pound. In March, 1931, it was reduced from 3½ pence per pound to 3 pence per pound, or 6 cents a pound, effective April 1, which meant the net bonus was now reduced to 3 cents a pound. It was further reduced from 3 pence to 2½ pence per pound, effective April 12, and is now 5 cents a pound less the 3 cents.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How do you figure it so far as Canada is concerned—

Mr. HANBURY: We are not interested—

Mr. STEVENS: Wait a moment, please. It was reduced to 2½ pence per pound, or 5 cents, 2½ cents of which is paid into the pool and the balance is the net bonus.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That has always been so.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but my hon. friend will pardon me; the idea has been that the full amount of the bonus was recognized throughout the history of this stabilization scheme.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not so, because originally, as I pointed out, down to December last the bonus was 9 cents a pound, but having paid 3 cents into the pool that left an actual bonus of only 6 cents a pound. That is what has been applicable for five years. But this year these reductions have occurred so that now the actual bonus is only 2½ cents a pound. I hope that is clear because I have applied in each case exactly the same operation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Having regard to the lower value of butter to-day is not the 2½ cents bonus just as high as 6 cents was, say, a year ago? In other words, relatively the bonus is just as high as it was formerly.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Sherbrooke, (Mr. Howard) is entirely in error in stating that the dumping duty was 7 cents.

Mr. HOWARD: I did not say it was 7 cents; I said 6 cents.

Mr. BENNETT: Or 6 cents. The rate is one cent and the dumping duty has averaged 3 cents under the treaty of 1925, the maximum being 15 per cent of the duty paid value, and 30 cents being the maximum, 15 per cent of that is 4½ cents, which added to the one cent made 5½ cents as the maximum. But the maximum was 30 cents, the general price was less. At 24 cents per pound, 15 per cent meant a duty of 3·6 cents per pound, which added to one cent made 4·6 cents. As is known, the Australians objected very strenuously that it was bad faith to impose that duty upon them at all. We know a former member of the late administration wondered how it could be done, because where the duty is specific a dumping duty applied on an ad valorem basis is a little difficult to appreciate, there being no ad valorem duty; but the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) will be able to solve that difficulty without any trouble.

While I am on my feet I should like to pay one tribute to our Australian friends. Last year was a serious year for the dairy industry of this country. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will be glad to know that when the Australians were passing through here on the last day of the old year, after they had discussed the matter with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, they made an agreement with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) whereby they stabilized the price of their butter that they had already shipped for this country, a part of it through London, and the result, according to Mr. Robinson, who is no particularly friendly witness so far as our duties are concerned, meant last year not less than $10,000,000 additional money paid to the dairy interests of this country. Now, $10,000,000 is a very substantial sum to have disbursed in one season to the dairy interests of Canada by reason of the action so taken. That is the testimony of Mr. Robinson himself, and if any hon. gentleman has any doubt as to what his words were I think it well that they be read into Hansard.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As a matter of curiosity, what became of the butter from Australia that was in storage in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Trade and Commerce can give the details of that.

We thus had our wholesale butter market—

Said Mr. Robinson:

—maintained all winter at a level from seven to ten cents over world parity, and most of the time at the latter figure. During the period in question about 75,000,000 pounds of butter was produced in this country . . . . which thus resulted in an extra return to the producers of about $7,000,000. This figure of $7,000,000 applies to butter only, and does not take account of the fact that prices of whole milk, sweet cream, ice cream, etc., could not have been maintained at the level actually paid if butter had been selling for 22 cents instead of 32 cents. The actual benefit received by dairy producers last winter in the form of extra income was therefore greater than the above figure. I could not hazard a guess at the real total, but am very sure that it was over $10,000,000.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the right hon. Minister of Finance tell the committee if the excise duty of one cent applies also to butter?

Mr. EULER: One per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: One cent on the dollar.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that applies.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I too accept this Australian treaty under reservations, and those reservations—

Mr. BENNETT: There is great controversy in England about reservations.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I am not going to discuss those provisions at the present time, but in reply to the hon. member for Lincoln, who made such a tirade this afternoon against the old treaty, I should like to place on Hansard the figures of our exports and imports from Australia for the fiscal years from 1925 to 1931 which speak for themselves.

Mr. GOTT: We had that this afternoon; it is all on Hansard.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Very well; if so that is sufficient. Then with respect to butter: While the statement read by the Prime Minister undoubtedly is Mr. Robinson's opinion, it is not borne out by the prices of Canadian butter when compared with the prices of butter on the British market. From the early part of 1926 until the election of 1930 the price of Canadian butter in Montreal was invariably higher than the price in the world market.

Just before schedule A is carried I should like to refer for a moment to the matter of sugar. Tariff item 135 reads as follows:

Sugar, above No. 16 Dutch standard in colour when imported or purchased in bond in Canada by a recognized sugar refiner, for refining purposes only, under regulations by the minister, when exceeding 98 degrees, but not exceeding 99 degrees polarization, 31·64 cents per hundred pounds.

I have no fault to find with that rate of duty, but I want the committee to realize that this grade is practically refined sugar, and the present duty from Australia is $1.09 per hundredweight, so that this is a clear hand-out to the refiners of this country of 77.36 cents per hundredweight. On the 20,000,000 pounds of sugar imported from Australia at present this gives the refiners the nice little hand-out of $155,000 per annum.

Mr. MORAND: Think of the poor consumer.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): That is just what I am coming to. It has been suggested that Australia may be able to supply our entire requirements, which amount to some 800,000,000 pounds of sugar per annum, and this would mean an annual hand-out to the refiners of $6,188,000. I have no fault to find with the duty suggested under this item, but for God's sake give the consumers of this country a part of that reduction.

Mr. NEILL: A few moments ago the hon. member for Stanstead, speaking on the Paterson scheme, said it had been radically reduced. Those were his words as I took them down, but there is nothing to prevent its being radically increased again and we have given away the only measure by which we could have prevented that from happening, the dumping duty.

Mr. HACKETT: Article IX then would apply.

Mr. NEILL: No, I do not think it would apply, because any action under article IX would call for retaliation immediately. While I am on my feet may I do a tardy measure of justice and clear the reputation of my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) by telling the Minister of Trade and Commerce that it was I who referred to that item regarding corsets. The reason I mentioned it only by number was because of that modesty which he would not allow me to possess half an hour ago. These two material errors of fact may be taken as a fair gauge of his accuracy with regard to other remarks of mine.

Mr. HOWARD: I do not accept the statement of my right hon. friend that we are charging one-half cent per pound more than under the old tariff, but I would like to direct attention to the fact that at the time we were charging 7 cents on Australian butter coming into Canada—

Mr. BENNETT: We never did.

Mr. HOWARD: —the price of butter in Canada was 35 cents a pound. To-day the price is only 20 cents per pound.

Mr. BENNETT: There never was a time when there was a 7 cents duty, and there never was a time when the price for duty purposes was 35 cents.

Mr. YOUNG: A moment ago the hon. member for South Huron spoke of the reduction in duty on sugar above 98 degrees polarization. I should like to ask the minister what further refining process is necessary in connection with that sugar. I notice in the tariff schedules there is nothing quoted above 98 degrees, which seems to be fully refined sugar. I should like to know if further refining is necessary.

Mr. STEVENS: Under our general tariff sugar up to 98 degrees carries a steadily increasing ratio of duty. From 98 to 99 degrees it jumps, instead of at about one cent per pound, from about 30 cents to 35 cents. There is a little higher degree of refining in the first process. As hon. gentlemen know, there are two general processes, the milling and the refining. In most of the countries exporting sugar to Canada the sugar is purified to 96 degrees, and some of it to 97 and 98 degrees. One colony, Mauritius, I think, purifies it up to 99 degrees, but when Australia installed their milling system, which merely deals with the raw cane, and established their refineries they did so on the basis of the first process carrying the purification up to about 99 degrees—I am not certain whether it is 98½ or 99 degrees, but for our purposes they are about the same. So in order to give Australia a portion of our Canadian market for what is known as raw sugar we increased the classification from 98 to 99 degrees, which permits the sugar from Australia to enter our market for refining purposes.

The hon. member for South Huron is mistaken, and I do not criticize him for it because these are technical matters. I do not pretend to be an expert in them, but I have given a good deal of study to this question during the past few months, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is no bonus at all going to the refineries under this item. They have to pay the same ratio of increase for this added degree as they pay down the whole list; it increases at a steady ratio, and sugar of 99 degrees polarization is not a refined sugar. Probably it is a little more intense, but they pay a little more for it for that reason, and this simply puts Australia on the same basis as the West Indies and other parts of the empire in that respect.

May I add this one word: I consider this one of the important items on the Australian side of this agreement. One of the difficulties in our trade with Australia is that much of our business with them is bulk business—paper, lumber, and heavyweight cargoes—while much of their business with us is more or less of confined space, like dried fruits, and so on. It was thought desirable to get some bulk cargoes back from Australia for freight-equalizing purposes, and sugar offers about the only commodity we can bring in. We expect that Australia will obtain from 50,000 to 100,000 tons a year of our business which she has not heretofore received from this sugar item.

Mr. YOUNG: I believe I have seen that sugar refined to 99 degrees, and it is a sugar that could be sold in the stores. I wonder why its importation at this rate is confined to refiners. Why should no one else be allowed to bring it in at the same rate?

Mr. STEVENS: I doubt whether that would be desirable. When I was a young lad in the old country, in some of the stores they used to sell what was known as Demerara sugar. That is a raw sugar and is very sticky and disagreeable to handle. It cannot be put into ordinary paper bags and containers of that sort, and it is difficult to handle in private use. I doubt whether it could be sold in Canada at all in the general trade. In its transportation through the country by rail it is usually shipped in hogsheads and sometimes in heavy jute sacks of 200 or 300 pounds. To handle it locally would, I think, be almost impossible.

Mr. YOUNG: I am afraid that either the minister does not understand me or I do not understand him. The sugar I refer to is plantation refined, a granulated sugar. It is not quite as attractive in appearance as the refined sugar which we are accustomed to buy, but still it could be sold in the stores at retail. I do not see any objection to allowing the wholesalers to import it for sale on the same basis as the other. It is not a sticky sugar.

Mr. STEVENS: The sugar to which the hon. member is referring does not come under this item; it comes under the general classification.

Mr. BENNETT: That comes now from Cuba.

Mr. EULER: The Prime Minister has laid down certain definite rules of policy in connection with the tariff, one of which is the desire that the Canadian producer should have at least an equal opportunity with the foreign producer. With that I agree. He has also laid down the principle of protection for Canadian industry. Further, he has said to-day—and I agree with him in this—that we should try to buy from other dominions those things which we do not produce ourselves in order that they may buy from us those things they do not produce. It seems to me there is one item in this schedule A which absolutely violates every one of these three principles. I approach it perhaps with some hesitancy because it deals with a commodity to which many people are opposed—brandy. I have no special brief for anyone in that business, but the committee will agree that so long as it is a legal commodity which is produced in this country it is at least as much entitled to protection as any other commodity. Brandy coming from Australia is allowed in at a duty of $8 per gallon. Brandy is produced in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Where? I am told not.

Mr. EULER: I understand it is. However, I will read a telegram which I have received and I shall be glad to get an adequate reply; because, so far as I can see, the protest is a just one. Australian brandy can come under this treaty at $8 per gallon. Canadian-produced brandy pays to the government an excise duty of $9 a gallon, so that it has not an equal opportunity. The two are not even on an equal basis, the Australian producer actually having an advantage over the home producer of $1 per gallon.

Mr. MANION: Where is brandy produced in Canada?

Mr. CHAPLIN: You are doing the same thing under the French treaty at this moment.

Mr. EULER: That may be, but two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I agree with you.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend has protested against the reduced duty on Australian wines; but so far as wines are concerned the Canadian producer has at least a little protection left. The Canadian producer of brandy, if there are any producers,—

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. EULER: —on the other hand, is discriminated against. Perhaps I had better read the telegram I have received. I repeat, I have no brief for them, but if there are legitimate producers of brandy in Canada they have a right to protection under the principles laid down by my right hon. friend. I have no doubt he has also received this telegram. It reads:

Understand Australian treaty allows entry into Canada of Australian brandy at eight dollars per gallon. At present Canadian excise duty on spirits is nine dollars per proof gallon so that a substantial preference is given to importers over the domestic manufacturer who employs Canadian labour not only directly but indirectly through many other industries. Canadian distillers are also large users of Canadian rye and barley. It is obviously unfair that this important Canadian industry which has thousands of shareholders should thus be discriminated against and we respectfully ask that appropriate steps be taken to remove the disadvantage placed on Canadian spirits.

It is signed by ten distillers. I need not read the names.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be just as well.

Mr. EULER: They are: Hiram Walker & Sons, Limited; Distillers Corporation, Limited; Jos. E. Seagram & Sons, Limited; Gooderham & Worts, Limited; Canadian Industrial Alcohol Company, Limited; Consolidated Distilleries, Limited; Wiser's Distillery, Limited; B.C. Distillery Co., Limited; United Distillers, Limited; Pioneer Distillers, Limited.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggested that my hon. friend should read the names for this reason. I say to him here and now that not one of those firms produces a single gallon of brandy.

Mr. EULER: If they do not, I have nothing to say.

Mr. BENNETT: I have under my hand from one of the largest of the firms who have signed the telegram—I need not mention the name—a letter in which the statement is made:

Answering your inquiry, would say no brandy is manufactured in Canada.

I wish to make that perfectly clear. And as the hon. gentleman has said that he has nothing further to say if there are no producers of brandy in Canada, it is not necessary that I should take up the time of the committee further.

Mr. EULER: If it is the fact that no brandy is produced in Canada, I have nothing to say.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the fact.

Mr. VENIOT: While there is no brandy produced in Canada, the preference given to brandy from Australia, as against the $9 per gallon excise on Canadian spirits, makes brandy cheaper and it therefore comes into competition with whiskies and other spirits manufactured in this country. That is why they are protesting. It will be observed that in the telegram they say "Canadian spirits;" they do not say brandy. Brandy having a $1 preference over the Canadian excise of $9 per gallon, it is so cheap as to come into competition with all Canadian spirits.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the observations of my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), perhaps I might add this. My hon. friend from North Waterloo will recall that this afternoon, when moving the second reading of the bill, I explained that it was our purpose to prefer, under equal conditions, the British dominions to foreign countries. This brandy comes into competition with French brandy, and we could not apply a higher rate than $8 because the French treaty stands in the way. This treaty was made by my hon. friends and fixed the duty at that rate. If Australian brandy is to compete in this country with French brandy, obviously the same rate or less had to be applied. France is something like three thousand miles away from this country while Australia is over twice that distance.

Schedule A agreed to.

On schedule B.

Mr. VENIOT: I would like to have an explanation of what appears to me to be a discrimination against fish packed in the maritime provinces.

Mr. STEVENS: There certainly was no intention to discriminate against the maritime provinces. It must be recognized that Australia fixed the rates in this schedule.

Mr. VENIOT: Why would they determine to give such a high preference to salmon? Surely the minister should have discussed the other fish.

Mr. STEVENS: We not only thought of it but this was one of the important items which were under negotiation.

Mr. VENIOT: It is a good thing for British Columbia but it would appear to be discrimination against the maritimes.

Mr. STEVENS: Crustaceans stand as they were before as far as differentiation is concerned, the preference being 1½d per pound, while the preference on salmon has been increased. This is not applicable only to the maritime provinces; it applies to all forms of canned fish other than salmon. I think my hon. friend has a suspicion that what has been done for British Columbia might have been done for the maritimes, but I assure him that that was not so. Australia made it clear to us that it was in her own interest that the other kinds of fish—

Mr. VENIOT: She does not can other kinds of fish.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh yes, they can some.

Mr. VENIOT: Not the type of fish we send to Australia. The largest sardine canning factory in the world is located in New Brunswick, and this country has always held the Australian market for sardines. The preference on sardines has not been increased while the preference on salmon has been doubled.

Mr. STEVENS: The duty on crustaceans is five cents per pound British Preferential and eight cents per pound general tariff. That is a three cents per pound preference on crustaceans.

Mr. VENIOT: And six cents per pound on salmon.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, that is right.

Mr. VENIOT: Does the minister think that is a fair deal?

Mr. STEVENS: It is the best we could do.

Mr. VENIOT: I want to see this treaty go through, but I want to see fair play given to the people of the maritime provinces. I suggest to the minister that between now and the next session he take up this matter with the Australian authorities and see if we cannot obtain the same preference as applies to salmon.

Mr. STEVENS: We shall be glad to discuss it with Australia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not a fact that this agreement has to pass in its entirety and that no matter how long we continue the discussion, there is no possibility of amending it?

Mr. BENNETT: That is quite right.

Schedule B agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NEW FRASER RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. REID:

Have applications been made to the hon. Minister of Public Works for the right to construct a bridge over the Fraser river, British Columbia, at a point east of the present bridge at New Westminster?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

TEST SHIPMENTS OF GRAIN THROUGH CHURCHILL THIS SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) a question in reference to a newspaper article appearing in the Ottawa Citizen to-day stating that the Saskatchewan government are going to furnish the entire trial shipment of 750,000 bushels of wheat for the first official test of grain shipments from Churchill. In my maiden effort in this house I attempted to point out to the government that in my opinion the excessive marine insurance rates might possibly strangle this whole enterprise. The people of the west are fearful of these rates, which are 3½ per cent as compared with ⅛ of one per cent out of Montreal. I should like to ask the Minister of Railways if he has any statement to make in regard to these test shipments, now that the Saskatchewan government has signified its intention of furnishing the cargoes.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. gentleman told me yesterday that he was going to ask this question, and in view of the wide discussion in Manitoba and Saskatchewan as to the statement made by me in this house on July 16, regarding shipments of grain from Churchill, I desire to make absolutely clear the position of the government, which has been subjected to unfair and unjust attacks.

In the first place, the fact that we have continued to push forward the work at Churchill at great expense, so that it is ahead of schedule while other important works in Canada have not been proceeded with, proves our good faith. Secondly, being assured of the port being ready for test shipment by September 15, as arranged for in the contract by the previous government, we then endeavoured to induce grain shippers to supply cargoes on the basis that ships would be available to carry such cargoes at rates not greater—including insurance and all charges —than via present through routes. But as pointed out in my statement of July 16, we did not succeed in this effort, and the government has no machinery with which to buy grain in Canada and dispose of it in Europe.

Since making the statement, certain newspapers and organizations in western Canada have criticized us severely for alleged inaction. I have requested western grain dealers to submit any reasonable proposition they thought desirable for providing cargoes of grain for the test shipments on the basis of a freight rate not higher than the present through rates, the natural and intended inference being that we would absorb any difference in rates due to increased insurance or other charges. The only proposal I have yet received in reply has been one wire stating that 150,000 bushels of grain can be assured. This is only about half a cargo.

In view of the above let me again state our position. If a proposition is made to the government to supply from one to three cargoes of grain for shipment via Churchill, the shipper to pay rates on the basis of present through rates from the prairies to Europe via Montreal, the government will see that ships are available and absorb any difference due to insurance or other transportation charges. That surely is a fair proposal on the part of the government. Now instead of criticism or abuse let the grain trade or some responsible organization come forward with cargo proposals.

Let me add that the statement that Mr. Dunning intended sending out five million bushels as a test movement cannot be verified or substantiated either by departmental records or officials, the same officials as obtained under the late government, and furthermore such a quantity could not be shipped out via Churchill this season, as it could not be handled between September 15 and the close of navigation.

If any action is to be taken it should be taken quickly as I am advised that vessel arrangements must be made not later than August 10.

May I just add, in regard to the statement of my hon. friend concerning Hon. Mr. Merkley, that so far we have had no proposition of any kind from this gentleman. Some days ago Mr. Merkley telegraphed me asking some questions, and I wired back telling him to put forward any proposition he might have and the government would give it fair consideration. As yet I have received no proposition from him, but if he brings forward any suggestion certainly it will be given fair and reasonable consideration in every possible way.

CANADIAN COPYRIGHT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) based on a press article appearing in to-day's Ottawa Morning Journal. It is a Canadian Press cable, and is as follows:

> Authors Complain On Canadian Law
> International Organization Registers Protest At Geneva
> Geneva, July 22.—The International Federation of Authors and Composers to-day complained to the League of Nations committee on intellectual cooperation with regard to the Canadian copyright law. The present session of the committee is under the chairmanship of Professor Gilbert Murray, of Montreal.
> According to the complaint, the Canadian law was in certain respects conflicting to the Berne convention, of which Canada was a signatory.
> The committee decided to uphold its 1928 resolution on arts and letters, attaching special importance to the question of copyright and expressing the hope it might be settled under the auspices of the permanent court of international justice.

I should like to ask the Secretary of State what action will be taken in view of this situation.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I would say that no such complaint has been received by the government of Canada. If a complaint of this kind is received, even from any authors' association, it will receive due consideration, but on questions of international law the International Federation of Authors and Composers is not the final tribunal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Would the Secretary of State say what is the final tribunal?

HALIFAX HARBOUR BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). I am informed that Sir Alexander Gibb is expected in Halifax to-day, to consult with the port authorities. I should like to ask the minister if it will be part of his duties to study and report on the bridge question at Halifax, that is, the feasibility and desirability of proceeding with the construction of a bridge across Halifax harbour, connecting Halifax and Dartmouth.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The instructions given Sir Alexander Gibb have to do with the development of our national ports. If the construction of this bridge enters the question of the development of the port as a whole he may consider it, but I am not sure whether he will study that question. If it has to do with the development of the harbour he may report on it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the minister consider especially directing that matter to his attention?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The matter has not been considered as yet.

FRASER RIVER BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) whether the Minister of Labour made any report to him, following his trip to British Columbia, with regard to the proposed bridge over the Fraser river.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): The answer is no.

BANK NOTE CIRCULATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) yesterday directed attention to the fact that an answer given to a question asked by him was at variance with the figures given in the official Gazette of July 11. This morning the officer in charge directed my attention to the fact that he had already noticed that the figures 123 should have been 143. The other figures are the same, with the exception of the last numeral. The computation had not been verified when the answer was prepared. The correct answer is $143,749,692, as published in the Gazette.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

MINISTERS OF THE CROWN

BILL TO REMOVE NECESSITY OF REELECTION UPON ACCEPTANCE OF OFFICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 35, to remove the necessity of the reelection of members of the House of Commons of Canada on acceptance of office.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is at present before the house as a government measure is one which the house will recognize as a bill previously introduced during this session, by an hon. member, as a private measure. As such it was considered by the house, disposed of in the course of debate and dropped from the order paper. It has made its reappearance as a government measure, and the question which naturally suggests itself to the minds of hon. members is just what circumstance has developed which has occasioned the government to take this particular measure as a means of assisting itself along its own path as the years go by. Not only was the measure disposed of at this session some weeks ago as I have indicated, but it made its appearance in parliament several times in previous years only on each occasion to disappear. When the former Liberal administration was in office the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) brought in a similar measure and the government, though it had been in office for almost eight or nine years, intimated, when last the bill was introduced, that it saw no necessity for the enactment of any such legislation. We preferred to uphold the principle that we should keep the government and the people in as close contact as possible on all matters of concern to the nation as a whole.

Now the present administration proposes in this measure that a member of parliament, if appointed to office as a minister of the crown, may assume office without in the first place going back to the people for reelection. The bill is entitled:

An act to remove the necessity of the reelection of members of the House of Commons of Canada on acceptance of office.

I think it should read: "An act to remove the necessity of the present administration having by-elections when the same at any cost can be avoided". So regarded, the measure is in keeping with what up to the present time has been the practice of the administration. We have a statute which provides that by-elections shall take place within six months after the chief electoral officer has been advised that a vacancy exists in any constituency. The intention of that statute was that all constituencies should be represented in the House of Commons, and that at least within six months from the time a vacancy occurred it should be filled by election. Two elections are being held next month, one to fill a vacancy which occurred in October last, and the other to fill a vacancy which occurred early in the month of January. But throughout this entire session the two constituencies in question, one in Ontario and one in Quebec, Hamilton East and Three Rivers-St. Maurice have not been represented at all in this House of Commons. The government of the day is responsible for that fact, and there must be a good and sufficient reason in the mind of the administration for its having hesitated to bring on by-elections in time to permit of the representation of these constituencies.

No doubt the Prime Minister is anxious to make certain changes in the administration. He has intimated to parliament that he does not intend to continue in the office of Minister of Finance. I presume that one of the objects of the bill is to enable him to bring into the ministry as Minister of Finance some hon. member he has in mind, to have him assume the office without the necessity of going back to the people for reelection. I imagine that what he will do will be to make one of his present colleagues Minister of Finance and then bring in some hon. member to fill the portfolio thus left vacant. At any rate, it is quite clear that the administration has to a very considerable extent lost confidence in itself, or it would not hesitate to appoint a new minister and let him go before his constituents for re-election in the usual way, it would seek the approbation of the electorate, as has been customary in this country from the days of confederation to the present time.

There are, I think, the strongest reasons why under representative institutions the government should seek an expression of the people's views as intimately and as frequently as the customary procedure of the constitution provides. The hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) will probably tell us, if he speaks on the measure, that Great Britain has adopted a course similar to that proposed in this measure. There, since 1926, a newly elected minister is not obliged, if he holds a seat in the House of Commons, to go back for re-election. But there were two stages in effecting that change in the British system. The first change was to limit the time within which a minister who was a member might assume office without vacating his seat to the period of nine months after a general election. It was in 1919 that the British Act was first amended and amended in this way. It was felt that where immediately after a general election a government had been formed there was not the same necessity for a minister of the crown to go back for re-election; and the act as it then stood was amended to provide that if a new minister took office within nine months after a general election he should not be obliged to go back for reelection. But it was not until seven years after that, in 1926, that the nine month limitation was removed. I suggest that if this measure is to carry at all it should provide the same limitation that was enacted in Great Britain when the British act was first amended.

I was interested in some of the reasons given at the time the act was amended against the change, and one paragraph in the speech of Sir John Marriott delivered in the British House of Commons on February 12, 1926, is so much to the point that I shall read it. It contains, in a word, all that I would say at this moment on the measure. Sir John Marriott said :

> I want to suggest whether at this particular moment in the evolution of our constitution—and now, as always, our constitution is changing with very great rapidity—it is really wise to do anything that will further disturb the equilibrium of the constitution in favour of the executive and against the legislature on the one side and the electorate on the other.

That question, I think, may be asked with great pertinency with reference to constitutional development in this country to-day. Great Britain, as we all know, is a very compact country; the number of constituencies is large but they are all comprised within a very small area. Moreover, under the British system by-elections are brought on within a very few days and at most weeks after vacancies occur. So that in Britain there is constant opportunity for the electorate to express its views on the government's policies and the administration of the nation's affairs. With such a large number of members of parliament, the vacancies that inevitably occur are considerably more than those in a smaller body; and there the expedition with which by-elections are brought on affords a constant expression of the nation's view as to the way in which its affairs are being administered. In Canada, and particularly since the present administration has been in office, the tendency has been more and more to increase the powers of the governor in council, to withdraw from parliament those opportunities for discussion of public questions which would be available if the governor in council was not being given such excessive powers. There has been the further tendency already referred to of protracting and delaying the filling of vacancies by by-election. In these and other ways the ministry is getting further and further away from the electorate; it cannot so readily ascertain the views of the people.

But there is this further fact which I submit is of great significance in a country like Canada. We have vast stretches of territory, there are racial, religious and economic considerations of which account must be taken in so many particulars that there is an ever present necessity for a ministry to be reconciling differences which in the nature of things are inherent by seeking to get the approval of the people in as many ways as possible. One would be any important changes made in the personnel of the ministry.

If this present measure goes through it will be possible for my right hon. friend in making future appointments to the ministry if he so desires to ignore altogether considerations of geography which are very important in the formation of a ministry. It would be possible also for him to ignore altogether considerations of a religious character which are important in the formation of a ministry, having regard to the diversity of religious beliefs of the people in our country. There would be also the possibility of ignoring altogether important economic considerations. I know my right hon. friend will say that when it comes to a general election the day of reckoning will have arrived and he will then have to take responsibility for all changes made. But much of mischief may have been wrought as a consequence in the interval. I submit that what is needed in Canada is that every important act of the ministry should inasmuch as may be possible be of a character which will not tend to emphasize differences, but which will tend to lessen them. The fact that a newly elected minister is obliged to go before the people for their approval before being permitted to continue as a member of the administration is a great safeguard in more ways than one.

It is not for me to advise the Prime Minister as to what may be in his own interest, but if he will allow me to say one word in all kindliness, it would be that I think he will find when this measure has passed that instead of his troubles being lessened they will be very greatly increased.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

A moment ago I was interrupted by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). If my right hon. friend were changing his ministry to-morrow and the hon. member for York-Sunbury wished to be taken into the ministry, in giving as a reason why this might not be possible the argument would no longer be possible on the part of the Prime Minister that account must be taken of the particular part of the country from which he comes, of the particular profession which he follows, or of the particular religious belief which he holds. The Prime Minister will find that what is true with respect to one hon. member will be equally true with respect to all hon. members on his side of the chamber. Every hon. gentleman opposite should realize that once this measure passes whatever there formerly was in the way of necessary consideration on the part of the Prime Minister as to how the country is likely to view his appointment, will have largely disappeared. The Prime Minister will find increasingly that this is so in the minds of his followers. I am inclined to believe that that is something which my right hon. friend will discover to be even truer than at the moment he may believe to be the case.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to delay the house during the preliminary stages of this bill, except to say that the reason why this bill has been taken over is that it is sound in principle and its application will be found to be beneficial in this country just as it has been in every other British dominion as well as in the motherland. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) who, in the absence of the original sponsor, moved the second reading of this bill, gave a very careful and full statement of the reasons why such legislation should be placed upon the statute books. Those who heard him speak were convinced of the soundness of his argument; those who did not hear him speak should read his remarks in Hansard.

The law now upon the statute book of Canada had its origin in the seventeenth century when there was probably a sound reason for the maintenance of such a rule. In those days the influence of the sovereign was very powerful and the subjects were very jealous of their rights. They demanded that no favourite of the king should be appointed to office without first giving them an opportunity of pronouncing upon the individual. This law arose from an effort of the people to maintain their rights against royal encroachment.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If my speech was so immensely convincing, as the minister so flatteringly says it was, why was it that on that occasion I could not get any support from my hon. friend or those around him?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We on this side of the house thought that the bill was moving so smoothly and in the proper direction that we should not interfere with its passage, and we hope that it may move just as smoothly on the present occasion.

In those early days when this law was first introduced into the British parliament, members of parliament were not paid any salary or remuneration. They served freely in the parliament of Great Britain and it was thought that, having been elected under conditions which prevented their accepting salaries, when they obtained positions of emolument under the crown they should go back to the people in order that the people might ratify the appointments and agree to the emolument. Members of this parliament have at all times been in receipt of emolument so there was no reason for the adoption of this law in Canada. My right hon. friend stated that I probably would refer to the fact that in Great Britain and the other dominions this ancient law had been abrogated some time ago. Any hon. member who reads the bill will see these facts all set out in the explanatory note.

In 1919, Great Britain practically abrogated the law, but included a nine months limitation which provided that for nine months after a general election members of parliament upon being called to the cabinet should not be required to go back for reelection. That law worked for the succeeding seven years but it was then found that there was no necessity for the nine months limitation, and the parliament of Great Britain, in 1926, deliberately repealed that limitation. Now the law in England does not require that a member who has been called to the government go back for reelection, neither is this required in South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, the Irish Free State or in any other British dominion so far as I am aware. Why then in this parliament should we hold on to this antiquated statute? The hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) introduced this bill once or twice in previous sessions, but for some reason or another the bill was never pushed to a conclusion. The hon. member for Cartier seemed to have rested on his oars for some reason best known to himself, and the bill never advanced to its second reading.

But the time has come when we believe we should put ourselves in line with the legislation of the rest of the British Empire in this respect. My right hon. friend's chief objection to this bill seems to be to its title. He imagines that it might more properly be called a measure to relieve the present government of the embarrassment of by-elections. I do not think this government fears anything or has anything to fear at this particular time in regard to by-elections. Let me tell my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition that a by-election is pending in East Hamilton and the Liberal party is not even represented in that constituency. I am inclined to think it may be some little time hence before the Liberal party is seriously represented in electoral constituencies in the Dominion of Canada.

There are, however, some very sound reasons for the adoption of a measure such as this. We urge it, first, on the ground of convenience; second, on the ground of expediency, and third on the ground of saving of expense. Those are three strong reasons for supporting this proposal. We know the delay in bringing on elections in this country is very great. I am told that in Great Britain a writ can be issued and a man be returned and take his seat in parliament in twenty-one days. In Canada this takes two months. This delay is very inconvenient. The expense of elections is very heavy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friends opposite seem to have taken out of that statement a meaning which I did not attach to it and did not intend to have attached, but I know they can speak from experience.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So can my hon. friends.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But there is in the history of this parliament in regard to this very matter one outstanding incident which I think must be present in the minds of most hon. members opposite, when the services of one of the most illustrious sons of Canada could not be utilized by the government of the day on account of this antiquated rule in regard to by-elections. When the late Sir Wilfrid, then Mr. Wilfrid Laurier, in 1877 was called to a portfolio in the government of Alexander Mackenzie, it became necessary for him on account of this antiquated statute, to go back to Drummond and Arthabaska for reelection. He went back; he was defeated and the country lost his services.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; Quebec East elected him immediately afterwards.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He was defeated in the by-election in Drummond and Arthabaska and he was elected in the general election of 1878.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, in a by-election in Quebec East.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My statement is right that he was defeated in the by-election in Drummond and Arthabaska.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But the country did not lose his services.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The country did lose his services for the time being; and what happened in the case of so illustrious a statesman as Sir Wilfrid Laurier might happen again in connection with his successors. I am pointing out that it is a matter of inconvenience to a government, to parliament; it is a loss to the country to be deprived of the services of a man under such conditions. It may not and did not in that case affect a majority in the house, but it does affect the conduct of affairs in the Dominion of Canada. There is no sound reason for retaining the rule and there are very sound reasons for doing away with it. For those reasons we ask that the bill be now passed.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE: (Montmagny): I listened to the address of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) when he introduced this bill, and when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was speaking I was wondering whether he would say if he were in favour of the measure or not. Perhaps it was due to lack of understanding or poor hearing on my part, but I am not quite sure whether the leader of the opposition is in favour of this legislation or not. Probably, before asking this side of the house the reasons for such a bill, he might put his question to the hon. member for Cartier.

I have listened to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and I have heard his three reasons and the example cited. I am not supposed to be a democrat; on the contrary I am supposed to be a very strong Conservative; but being a Conservative I am in favour of the rights of the people being maintained, and I cannot see why a man who has been given a portfolio should not have to go back to the people to have his appointment confirmed. The fact that this rule has been abolished in Great Britain, the Irish Free State or South Africa is no reason to me. The important point of this bill is what is good for Canada. I believe, representing what I think are the rights of the people to approve the choice of a minister, they are the masters of the administration and no government should give a portfolio carrying a salary and the confidence of the government to anyone without its action being approved by the people. I think the measure brought forward by the hon. member for Cartier, this foundling left on the steps of the government, should not be adopted by the government. We are going against the rights of the people, against the constitution, against our institutions by adopting such a bill. I am only a very ordinary, humble member; I do not expect ever to be a minister of the crown, but I think any man who is chosen as a minister should not be chosen without having the approbation of the people, and he should resign his seat in order to stand for reelection. If the people reject him, they are the master and he should not be a minister. Therefore I am going to vote against the bill.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): It is very interesting to follow debates on matters of this kind which have reference to historical developments. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has been interesting on this point, but I think he missed one historical connecting link. The measure as adopted in England was not based on the old claims of the people to control nominations. On the contrary, it was based on what happened after the revolution of 1688. As everyone knows or ought to know who intends to be faithful to British precedents and history, after the revolution there was an assertion on the part of the House of Commons as against both the claims of the crown and the claims of the House of Lords. Eventually the House of Commons came to be dominated largely by the nominees of the great Whig families who controlled most of the rotten boroughs, and, under the reign of George III, by the favourites of the crown. This measure in England, if I remember right —I am speaking from memory, and old memory—was enacted at the time of the reaction against the old Whig rule. The Reform movement was largely supported by Edmund Burke, and later on by Charles James Fox, and there came a time when the House of Commons was largely composed of the nominees either of the great aristocratic families or of the crown . It was not a question of official emolument, nor was it a question of official position under the crown. It was a question of influence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My recollection is that the statute in question in England is a statute of Queen Anne, not of the time of Burke and Fox at all, but years and years before that.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. The hon. gentleman is right. The statute was passed under Queen Anne, but perhaps the hon. gentleman will remember that under George I, Robert Walpole, one of the ablest men who ever ruled England, went around the statute and found means of filling the House of Commons either with placemen of the crown or nominees of the great Whig families. The reaction showed that the enactment of a statute is not sufficient to protect the liberties of the people or the independence of members of the House of Commons. Eventually when the reaction came on, curiously enough it was supported by such statesmen as Chatham and later by Edmund Burke, more or less connected with the old Tory tradition. They reacted against the Whig influence.

But to go into that would carry us too far. I think it is better to take the conditions as they are in Canada at the present time. For my part I have supported the principle of this measure ever since it was first introduced into this house by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) in 1926, and I have seen no reason to change my views because the parties have changed sides. I was in favour of this measure when the Liberals were in power, and I am still in favour of it now that the Tories are in power, whether it favours one government or the other.

As far as the rights of the people are concerned, they are exercised in a general election. Then the people have an opportunity to show their mind when they vote for one party or the other, rightly or wrongly. Once a party is in power I do not see why choosing one member of the House of Commons or one member of the Senate to become a member of the administration should necessitate reelection for his maintenance in office. If the Prime Minister chooses one member of the House of Commons to fill a vacant office in his cabinet, I do not see how the people at large in the country have a chance of expressing their views for or against the policies of the government in a bye-election, which will be held in one single constituency, for the election of that particular member. In that regard I think the argument made by the right hon. leader of the opposition falls entirely short of the question. He says that there are considerations of geography and considerations of religion. I do not see what religion has to do with it, but I suppose he meant that the Prime Minister could choose a member of the house from one province or another to fill a vacancy. Well, after he has been chosen, I do not see what difference it makes to have to submit to reelection. If, for example, he has been chosen from Ontario to fill an office that has been vacated by a member from Quebec, it is not likely that he will offer himself for reelection in the province of Quebec, and so I do not see what chance the people of Quebec would have to vote against the choice of the Prime Minister from amongst his Ontario membership. If the new minister had to be reelected at large, there would be a kind of plebiscite which might allow an expression of opinion to the people at large; but since he has to be reelected in his own constituency, it is a hundred to one that he will stand a much better chance of being reelected as minister than as a private member of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not caught the point I had in mind. He speaks of religion. May I say that in a country like Canada, speaking broadly of Roman Catholics and Protestants, it is generally understood that any ministry here will be made up with some regard to the proportion in the country of the adherents of both religions. Under this proposed arrangement a ministry, if the prime minister so desired, might in the course of a parliament become entirely Protestant or entirely Roman Catholic without the people having any say in the matter. In the same way a ministry might become an entirely western or an entirely eastern ministry, or a ministry composed entirely of lawyers, or agriculturists or manufacturers or some other class, without any opportunity of being given to the people to pass upon it so long as a parliament lasts.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course one can always indulge in any amount of speculation as to the probable results of a measure, but in actual practice this bill concerns simply the reelection of one man in one constituency. I do not suppose any Prime Minister, either our present Mussolini, or the right hon. leader of the opposition, if he has a chance of coming back to power, or any other Prime Minister, would be foolish enough to resort to such a practice as the right hon. gentleman has suggested. But if he did, what chance would all the Roman Catholics of Canada, for example, have to express their disapproval of one Protestant minister taking the place of a Roman Catholic when that minister was being reelected in a Protestant constituency? They would have no chance at all; their chance would be in a general election.

On various occasions I have endeavoured to bring back the minds of the house to this fact, that after all the only safeguard which the people at large have is at a general election. A by-election where a member of the government who is already a member of the House of Commons goes back to his own constituency for reelection affords very little relief to the people at large, in the nine provinces of Canada, belonging to this creed or that creed, this race or that race, this class or that class, or very little opportunity to express their opinion. On the other hand, I can see the practical results of this measure, the effect of which will be to avoid at least one by-election. I believe one of the curses under which this country of ours, as well as the neighbouring republic, is suffering, is in having too many elections, general elections and by-elections. We have municipal elections, provincial elections, and federal elections. There is almost no year in the life of a parliament, and hardly any month in any year in which some part of our country is not disturbed with political and electoral agitation. Of course, we are bound to have it, but once we have had a consultation of the people at large at the proper time and they have made their choice as to the party that should rule and the government that should be formed, I think the less we have of electoral agitation and the less going back to this or that particular constituency the better. I cannot see that the reelection of one or two members of a government for this or that constituency gives any indication of the attitude of mind of the millions of electors in the Dominion of Canada from one ocean to the other. I cannot see the significance of a by-election as far as the general policies of the government are concerned. I repeat, when the hon. member for Cartier introduced a similar bill on a former occasion I supported it, and nothing has developed in the meantime to prevent me from supporting the measure once more.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): For many years, Mr. Speaker, I have been in favour of this bill, and I am still. I readily admit that the reasons that were necessary two hundred years ago for a member of the house to seek reelection on acceptance of an office under the crown no longer exists. But although I am in favour of the principle of the bill, it seems quite evident to me from the speech made by the Minister of Justice that the government of the day is making a virtue of necessity.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that although the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) is a Liberal member, he never introduced a measure of this kind as a party measure, and certainly not as a government measure.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so.

Mr. RINFRET: So when he says he supports the bill whether he sits on one side of the house or the other, he is speaking for himself—

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so.

Mr. RINFRET: —as he always does very nobly. There is something in the argument that other parts of the empire have adopted a similar measure. But I accept the argument of the right hon. leader of the opposition that in many respects we are different from other parts of the empire. When we were in power and wished to amend the Naturalization Act to put Canada on a basis similar to that enjoyed by other parts of the empire, the Prime Minister of to-day and several of his colleagues strenuously opposed the amendment on the ground that Canada was a different country from Australia or South Africa, and that the conditions prevailing here did not prevail in those dominions. I believe the same argument might well be advanced with regard to this bill. I would be in favour of it if it was limited in its application to a certain number of months after a general election. I do think that when a party is returned to power those of its members who are selected to form the new administration should not be subjected to the formality of a by-election, although I think a reference to past records will show that there has never been any opposition to the reelection of members of the government immediately after a general election. But when a government has been in power a number of years, I submit that sometimes circumstances may arise which create a very different condition of affairs. Let me give two concrete examples which are within my own memory and I am sure within that of most members of this house. In 1905 when Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced legislation creating new provinces in the west, one of the most outstanding members of his cabinet resigned. It is to be supposed that when that minister resigned he had a following in his province which was opposed to the proposed legislation. The Laurier government could not go to another of its supporters and simply invite him to accept the vacant portfolio; it had to have the new minister re-elected by his constituency. In that particular instance the government was forced to have its policy approved by the province from which the late minister had been elected, and from which his successor had also been returned.

Mr. BOURASSA: Pardon me; one constituency, not the province.

Mr. RINFRET: That is true; but the constituency does to a certain extent reflect the average political opinion of the province. Let me give another instance. When I came into this house in 1920 and in 1921, the province of Quebec was not represented in the then Meighen government by a French Canadian.

Mr. BOURASSA: It was never so happy.

Mr. RINFRET: That may be. But if this proposed legislation had then been in force what would have happened? There is no official record of it, but it is within the common knowledge of everyone who sat in the house at the time that the government came to our ranks and tried to persuade one of our members to accept a portfolio. Everyone remembers the famous breakaway of a then Liberal member who is now supporting the Conservative party. He made a long speech to explain why he was breaking away from the Liberal ranks. It is common knowledge that if it had not been for the obligation of having him reelected he would have joined the Meighen government. I quite agree with the member for Labelle that when a new minister is called from the ranks of his own party it does not matter very much if he has not to submit to reelection by his constituents, and ten times out of twelve he will be reelected; but when there comes a crisis as in 1905, when there was a division in the party ranks in the province of Quebec, or as in 1921, when the government tried to seduce a member from this party or from an independent party to accept a portfolio, then I do say that the necessity for the new minister to be reelected by his constituency is a very important safeguard. Suppose the right hon. Mussolini, as the hon. member for Labelle has called him, should go to him—

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: May I ask a question? The hon. member said that if the ministers had to go back for reelection that would be a test of the government's policy. Is not the by-election now in progress in Hamilton a test for the government?

Mr. RINFRET: In a way. I surmise from what the hon. member says that he is sharing our views. But I am urging the point that where a government desires to take into its ranks an hon. member who had not been elected to support it, then the necessity for a by-election is a safeguard. Suppose the Prime Minister had come to the hon. member for Labelle and had offered him the portfolio of Finance!

Mr. McGIBBON: A wild flight of the imagination.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not suppose he would accept it. But supposing he did accept the portfolio, would it not be fair to the electors of Labelle, who elected the hon. member as an Independent, to say whether they wanted to see him as the Minister of Finance in a Conservative government?

Mr. BOURASSA: They would express their opinion later on.

Mr. RINFRET: That might be at too late a date.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Does not my hon. friend from Labelle recall how on the naval question he declared the importance of the by-election in Drummond-Arthabaska?

Mr. RINFRET: It is usual for an hon. member who wishes to speak to another hon. member to do it through you, Mr. Speaker. I am quite willing to transmit the message from the member for Montmagny to the member for Labelle. I suppose the question would at least show that they are not as close together to-day as they were twenty years ago.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so.

Mr. RINFRET: But I accept the question of the hon. member for Montmagny as showing there are times in the life of a government when a by-election is desirable.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Hear, hear.

Mr. RINFRET: I think it is even more desirable when a Prime Minister calls in a member to become a minister of the crown that the electors should have a chance to approve of his acceptance of the portfolio. Under ordinary conditions, as has been pointed out, most likely the member will receive an acclamation. But the circumstances may be altogether different, and I do submit that as independent groups become stronger it becomes more and more desirable to maintain the safeguard of a by-election. That is my point. My hon. friend has mentioned that an individual member is likely to be re-elected in his own constituency if he goes back as a minister. That all depends on how he was elected in the first place. If he was elected as an independent, as a Labour member or as a Progressive and he joined the Conservative government, surely his electors would have a right to say whether or not they would support him in his new political attitude.

I do think the government will go far enough in this sort of evolution if they limit the time within which a by-election is not required to a few months, which will cover the period immediately following a general election. I think in that regard this measure would be very satisfactory, but if a government has been in power a couple of years and fails to redeem a great part of its promises and brings down legislation which was not contemplated, before an hon. member becomes a member of the cabinet he should be forced to go back to his electors for their approval.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): When the fathers of confederation framed the constitution of this country they had in mind government by the people for the people, and they took every means in their power to see that the people would have absolute control of this parliament. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that immediately following a general election it should not be necessary for an hon. member to go back to his constituency for reelection if he accepts office in a cabinet formed by his own party; I would have no objection to the removal of the necessity for reelection in a case of that kind.

There comes to my mind the occasion in 1877 when Sir Wilfrid Laurier went back to his constituents for reelection. The country was passing through an economic crisis at that time, and when the by-election took place the Conservative party, led by the late Hon. Mr. Tarte, who subsequently became Minister of Public Works, fought Sir Wilfrid day and night, to the great surprise of the country and to the dismay of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That was one instance when the people were given an opportunity to pronounce a verdict. Another instance which comes to my mind is that of the resignation of a minister from the northwest in 1905, when the western provinces were incorporated. At that time I had the honour to be deputy speaker of this house, and a new minister had to be elected from the west. The minister elected was Hon. Mr. Oliver, who had to go back to the electors following his appointment to the cabinet.

We have made exceptions to this rule of requiring the reelection of ministers; the deputy speaker, and the leader of the opposition, are not required to follow this procedure. Those exceptions have been made by the internal management of this house, for reasons which are obvious. In the explanation given with regard to this bill it was stated that in the British parliament and in several of the dominions reelection is not required and I may say that the same thing applies in France also. In that country the government changes every ninety days, on an average, but the ministers are not required to go to the people; parliament is elected for a stated period, and the members remain in office even after their appointment to the cabinet.

I believe that if a member who was elected on July 28 last to support a particular policy and a particular party, to-morrow or six months or a year from now walks over to the other side of the house and accepts a portfolio with a different party, it is only fair that his constituents, whose representative he is, should be consulted on the new stand he takes. The downfall of governments has been brought about by such things; in 1879 the government of Quebec was defeated because three or four members who had been elected as Liberals walked across to the other side of the house.

I would be prepared to do away with the necessity for the reelection of ministers within say three or four months after a general election, but beyond that I think we should stand by the old principle and not abrogate in these democratic days the control of the people over this parliament. It is imperative that this control should be maintained. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) seems to be maturing with age; I remember that in 1899 he resigned from this house in protest against the sending of a contingent to South Africa. He appealed to the electors of Labelle, and in the by-election which took place he was reelected. He took the stand that the people had not been consulted and that this should have been done before such a step was taken. That is another instance of the usefulness of these by-elections, and I think in the interests of the administration itself it should be able at times to feel the pulse of the electors in any part of the country. For these reasons, if the bill is not modified I shall have to vote against it, but if it is amended to cover only a short period after a general election I am prepared to support it.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I desire to say just a word or two in support of this measure, which I believe is a reform long over-due. This requirement that a member accepting a portfolio must go back to the people for reelection is a hangover from the days before responsible government. If I understand constitutional history aright it seems to me that Lord Dufferin first laid down the principle that a cabinet minister must be elected by and be responsible to the people. At that time cabinet ministers were not necessarily chosen from a legislative body, and it seems to me that safeguard was required at that time. But that time has gone by; after a member is elected to this house surely it should not be necessary for him to go back to the people for reelection.

Let us suppose, for instance, that the present government lost the confidence of this house and were defeated by an adverse vote. That should not necessarily mean a general election. If the right hon. leader of the opposition were voted into office I contend that he should be able to carry on the government of the country as long as he enjoyed the confidence of parliament. But in the present situation that would not be possible, and it seems to me that this condition of affairs should be removed. When a government is voted into office the Prime Minister almost invariably finds it necessary to reconstruct his cabinet to some extent. He wishes to bring in men who have not appeared before the people in the election as cabinet ministers. Although elected, the moment they are called upon to assume office, they must go back to the people for reelection. It may be necessary to call parliament at the earliest possible date, but delay is inevitable because of by-elections. I regard this as a reform long overdue.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

On section 1—Seat of member not vacated by accepting office of profit.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will not repeat what I said on the second reading of the bill. I agree with the objections stated by the leader of the opposition. I am willing to admit that, immediately after a general election, it is a tedious and largely a useless process to compel ministers forming the new government to go back to their constituencies for reelection. I believe, however, that after a certain time has elapsed and the government has adopted new policies which may or may not be approved of by the majority of the people, popular control of the government and of parliament should require any new appointment to the cabinet to be ratified by the electors of the member so appointed.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The hon. member will recall the case of the Hon. Mr. Dobell. In 1896 he was elected as a Conservative in Quebec West and he joined the Laurier cabinet. The people approved. Does my hon. friend agree with that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He was appointed without portfolio and was not subject to reelection.

Mr. LAVERGNE: But even so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Possibly, if he had been a member of the government with portfolio, he would have had a rough passage on going back to the then constituency of Quebec West. Of that I cannot speak with any authority. My hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) has cited certain instances, and I think my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) did too. Perhaps I can give a more recent one. The history of Canada in recent years might have been different if this bill had been on the statute books in 1926, because the new Prime Minister who was called upon to form a cabinet would not have been defeated in the house had his ministers not been compelled under the law to withdraw from this parliament and run for office, seeking the approval of their constituents. I am sure my hon. friend from Labelle will admit with me that at the time he thought it was a proper requirement to make of new ministers. The reason which I gave on the second reading and which was repeated this afternoon by an hon. member is a strong one. If a government goes to another group in the house and invites to the cabinet a member who has been elected by his constituents to oppose the government, and that gentleman is willing to accept the invitation, I object to his transferring his electors with him to the government side. That is my strongest objection to the bill, and for that reason I propose that in this section we adopt the provision of the nine-month limitation which existed in the British statute until 1926. Nine months is as good as any other period. I want the new ministerial baby to be presented to the people of his constituency in order that they may see whether all the circumstances, physical, moral and spiritual, surrounding his birth, deserve their approval. I move, therefore:

That section 1 of the bill be amended by adding at the end of the proposed new section 13 of the Senate and House of Commons Act, the following words:

"and if such acceptance has taken place within nine months after the issue of proclamation summoning a new parliament."

(2) That section 1 of the bill be amended by striking out the last line of the proposed new section (14) of the Senate and House of Commons Act and substituting therefor the following words:

"If such nomination has taken place within nine months after the issue of proclamation summoning a new parliament, and is not otherwise disqualified."

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can only say that we cannot accept the amendment. That would be going back to what the British House of Commons did in 1919 and subsequently found was improper or unworkable and therefore deliberately repealed. Surely we in this house can profit by the example of others. That was adopted in Great Britain and after a trial of seven years it was repealed. Why not let us take advantage of their experience? I do not see any sound reason for the proposed limitation; it does not appeal to my judgment at all. The measure is either right or wrong in principle; if it is right in principle, why have the limitation?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am interested both in the bill and in the proposed amendment. So far as I could follow the ex-Minister of Justice when he moved his amendment, he was actuated by the very laudable desire to safeguard the political morality of members in this house belonging to independent groups.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Or of any group, even of this group here. I assure my hon. friend that I was including all hon. members opposed to the government.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I assure the former Minister of Justice that I was not taking it personally, as I do not believe any hon. member could imagine my being placed in that position. To my mind the main argument in favour of the principle of this bill and against the amendment is that when any government desired to appoint an hon. member to the cabinet there would be a possibility of the only consideration being the suitability of that individual by character, by training and by attainments. That should be the first, last and sole consideration. Under the present system that consideration is subordinated to the popularity of a particular hon. member or to the possibility of his being reelected by a large majority. At times we have seen appointments made which would not have been made had the suitability of the proposed member of the cabinet been the sole consideration. This bill would remove the necessity of considering the reelection of an individual as the main qualification for membership in the cabinet, and make it as it should be, that those best fitted for the positions will be chosen.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LAVERGNE: Why have elections at all?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The suggestion of the hon. member is hardly cogent. We have elections in order to ascertain what party shall be in power over a period of years. That having been settled, then the detail of deciding what individuals are to form the cabinet should be left to the discretion of the government which has been given a mandate by the people. This bill would obviate a situation which is too frequently found in this and other countries. The seeming necessity would be avoided of, I will not say, bribing but of influencing people to support a certain individual by making all sorts of promises which must be implemented out of the public purse. To the government would be left the responsibility of appointing to office the best man to be found to serve the people as a member of the cabinet. For these reasons I am in favour of the bill and opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Chairman, I would gladly support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) if it attained the object which he apparently hopes to attain. He told the committee that his object was to prevent the government bribing members of the various parties in opposition. As I understand the amendment, for nine months this would not be necessary, but after that time the government might have to resort to this method. It seems to me that it is rather difficult to prevent by text of law any government from bribing, directly or indirectly an hon. member of the house. That matter rests with the conscience of the members.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not use that word.

Mr. BOURASSA: Words are nothing. We have had examples of members belonging to one party giving support to other parties much more effectively than by crossing the chamber and waiting for a reward which might or might not come. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said, the principle of this bill is either good or bad. If it is good and it is considered that one of the prerogatives of the ministry is the recruiting of its own membership from among those chosen by the people, then I do not think that any impediment should be presented. If the principle is bad and if every member of the cabinet should be reelected, then the law should be allowed to remain as it is at present.

It may be said that when the people vote at a general election they do not vote for a ministry. Each constituency elects its representative and then a government is formed. The leader of the party having a majority occupies no constitutional position —it is purely a matter of tradition and habit —but he chooses his colleagues and they go back to the people to be reelected as members of the cabinet. There is something to be said in favour of the reelection of each member of the government, whether that takes place fifteen days, nine months or two years after a general election. I would be quite prepared to listen to an argument that the present law be maintained, but if we abolish the obligation placed upon a minister of going back to his constituency for nine months, I do not see why such action should be made obligatory after that time. We should either support the bill as it is or reject it in toto. The right of the people to elect a member of parliament and to reelect that member if he accepts office should be absolute. I think it will take the cogitation of many parliaments to discover such means as would remove the possibility of bribing any hon. member of any party.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Mr. Chairman, I think both the bill and the amendment dangerous. The amendment suggested by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) would be clearer than that proposed by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). The theory of the former is that once elected, for five years a party will do whatever it pleases and if the people are not satisfied they can turn it out of office. I am surprised, not to say astonished at the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I remember his having stated some time ago that he believed in the importance of by-elections as a means of teaching the government a lesson at certain times and giving to the people an opportunity of pronouncing on the actions of the government during a term of parliament. I must admit that I was convinced then by the hon. member for Labelle, but now it seems that everything is changed. I am probably one of the last monarchists left, I will not say in the house, but perhaps in the country at large. The hon. member for Labelle seems to have changed his viewpoint because in 1926, if my memory serves me aright, he denounced the use of the prerogative of the sovereign to turn out a government and call upon somebody else to form one. According to him the sovereign was only what we call in French "un roi-soliveau," that is, a king who had no rights and no powers of intervention, or of interference with the affairs of the nation. But to-day it seems that the rights of the people are not recognized any more. I am prepared to support the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec East as a "pis aller." I speak as a man who believes in the prerogatives of the sovereign on the one side and the prerogatives of the people on the other. That is the beauty of British institutions. I do not see why in our country of liberty and freedom we should pass a measure which would entitle the sovereign to call a minister who would not be subject to the approval of the people. We are told that after a general election this approval is not necessary. That may or may not be true, still I believe the people should be consulted and should have an opportunity to express their opinion in regard to the formation of a cabinet; but if we cannot have that, I shall accept the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec East.

A moment ago I quoted the instance of the late Mr. Dobell. He was a Conservative, elected as a Conservative in the constituency of Quebec West, who joined the Laurier cabinet. If he accepted a portfolio, I am inclined to think the people of Quebec West who had elected him as a Conservative were entitled to pronounce upon his change of allegiance and upon his acceptance of the Liberal doctrines of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Being a Conservative in doctrine and a monarchist in sentiment, I maintain that the best guarantees of our freedom are to uphold the age-old and age-tested principles of the British constitution involving at the same time the rights of the sovereign and the rights of the people. To-day. when we see thrones tottering, when we see in different countries the great institution of monarchy declining we can say as British subjects that what has made the greatness of England and of the British Empire is the maintenance of age-old and age-tested institutions, on the one side the rights of the sovereign and on the other the sovereign rights of the people. They make for the liberty of the nation; they are the guarantees of the freedom of the people and we should adhere to those principles which underlie the British constitution—principles which have given freedom to the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I am quite willing to leave the question to the judgment of the house. I think the best guarantee for our institutions is what we call in French "la voix des morts qui parlent," that is, the voice of those who came before us, who made the British nation, British institutions, the British Empire and the British freedom of which all Canadians are proud.

Mr. JACOBS: If I have not projected myself into this debate until the present moment, it is due to the fact that I have in mind the untimely fate that this bill met when it was introduced by me on several previous occasions. I felt that perhaps the unpopularity of the proposer was responsible for the death of the measure. I claim some little sagacity. I presented the bill to the Minister of Justice and I am glad to know by the expressions of opinions so far heard in the house that this bill has a chance of passing. It is a case of the stone which the builders have rejected becoming the cornerstone of the edifice. It is a popular measure, I can see, and I am glad to know the government is prepared to accept something at the hands of the opposition. I have listened to the eloquent remarks of the various members who have spoken on the bill, particularly the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) who declared that he is and always has been a monarchist in principle; that he is in favour of monarchy in every phase. What does he say to the bill which was passed by the British House of Commons in 1926? We are five years behind the British. The trouble with the hon. member for Montmagny is that he is a monarchist of the Bourbon or Stuart type. By revolution or otherwise we put them into the discard a long time ago.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The best government France ever had was under the Bourbons.

Mr. JACOBS: I agree with my hon. friend in this respect that he has been born 150 years too late. He should have lived in the days of that monarchy. When I heard the eloquent observations of those who know what they are talking about, like the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and others, I felt that my work was largely completed. I felt like old King Aeolus—I remember my Virgil to that extent—who sat in his cave and who sent out the west wind, the east wind and the south wind and they all did his work. The wind does the work and the man who starts it can sit in his cave.

So far no valid reason has been urged—and I say this with all due respect—why this bill should not pass. There has been some suggestion that members from another side of the house might be purchased. That might be. If they have the purchasable mind, what we call the mens rea; if they are ready to be purchased, we would like to know publicly that they can be purchased. The electors will deal with them in due time. Any person who sells himself for the temporary pleasure or advantage of being a member of the cabinet, will find he has been living, so to speak, for a short time only in a fool's paradise. When I say "a fool's paradise," I do not refer particularly to this government; I am using the term which is generally used to express the view that a man is living in a place which he thinks is a paradise and which turns out not to be one. It is significant that the Minister of Justice should have accepted this bill. He has had his experience with this side of the house; he knows that sometimes good people and good measures are not appreciated and it is only when they join the other side that they are appreciated at their true worth. When I came to deposit this child on somebody's doorstep on the other side I remembered the fact that my good friend the Minister of Justice was once an honoured member of this side of the house, and when I had something good to advance I went to my former friend who used to support us here.

As the bill is likely to go through I do not want to say anything which might in any way delay its passage. I am anxious that the bill should be passed because after all I am its legitimate father, and having turned it over we know the rule of law that once taken over by adopted parents the regular parents must in no way molest the child. For that reason I leave the bill in very good hands. If there is any measure which I think deserves the approval of the entire house it is this one. It is a pleasure for me to know that it is likely to go through. This is not the first measure of the kind that has been accepted by the government and introduced by me. Several electoral measures amending the Senate and House of Commons Representation Act I am proud to know were the children of my imagination. The measure which restricts the government to holding off elections to not more than sixty days is mine. The meaning of it has been somewhat tortured by the present government, but self-preservation is the first law of nature.

Mr. MANION: Is that why the Liberals have no candidate in the Hamilton by-election?

[Mr LaVergne.]

Mr. JACOBS: "God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform." We find that the electors of Hamilton have not yet attained that high degree of intelligence where they can accept a Liberal candidate, so we are trying them out with a Labour candidate first, and if that succeeds we will give them something better at the next election. I notice that my hon. friend does not refer to Three Rivers. I hope that he will be able to go down there and with his eloquent tongue make the people of Three Rivers believe that the present government is the best government that Canada has ever had, and when the opportunity offers I shall be one of the first to support the move that he be elected to the leadership of the Conservative party. It is very pleasing to me to see that the leading members of the present government are one-time Liberals. They got a good training with us and we are glad to know that they are spreading the light all over. It was rather restricted for them here, but now they are appreciated at their true worth. When I think of the little leaven that leavened the whole lump on the other side, I am glad to think that we are responsible for having provided the Conservative party with these gentlemen.

There is nothing further that I wish to say, Mr. Chairman. I am very sorry indeed to be obliged to differ from my party on this bill. On several occasions I brought up the bill, and it did not receive very favourable consideration. I withdrew it at the request of our party, who were not in favour of it, but I think the time has now come when in the interests of the country, party for the moment should be discarded and patriotism take its place. It is in the role of a patriot that I provide this bill to the country, and I hope that when the proper time comes my efforts will be commemorated by a bronze figure on Parliament Hill.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

PROPOSED ANNUAL EXPENDITURE OF $750,000 CONDITIONAL UPON AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 53, for the promotion of vocational education in Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when on May 26, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice introduced the resolution on which this bill is based, he made certain references to his own attitude and to my attitude with respect to the subject of technical education. I felt at the time, and still feel, that if not deliberately, then unintentionally he totally misrepresented my attitude. In order that in the future there may be no mistake as to what my attitude has been from the outset, I should like to clear up any difference there may be between us and establish if possible the true position. My hon. friend is reported in Hansard of May 26, 1931, at page 1973, as follows:

> Just a word in regard to the very learned address—

That is in reference to my remarks which had preceded his own:

> —offered to the house by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. This I will say in regard to his address, that the attitude which he has taken to-day in regard to the proposal to make federal grants in aid of technical education in the various provinces has been pretty consistent with his whole course since this question was first brought to the attention of the federal parliament, for I well remember that when I moved for the first time in this parliament a quarter of a century ago for the appointment of a commission to inquire into technical education, my right hon. friend the present leader of the opposition was the one who moved a motion which killed mine, and I was the only one then on the Liberal side who voted in favour of such a commission. However, a year or so afterwards, he decided that the popular demand in favour of something being done by the federal government was so great that it was time to act, and my right hon. friend, who was then Minister of Labour in the Liberal administration of that day, did issue a commission for the purpose of inquiring into technical education, and that commission made a very valuable report to parliament.

I wish to say that those statements contain a false and unwarranted implication as to my attitude. The statements are not true, and I think I can prove they are not true by the words of my hon. friend himself. I hope if his remarks have been unintentional that when he replies to me he will not hesitate to correct a statement which is not accurate but which he has repeated many times in this house and elsewhere on occasions when I have not been present and able to reply. My hon. friend says:

> —when I moved for the first time in this parliament a quarter of a century ago for the appointment of a commission to inquire into technical education, my right hon. friend the present leader of the opposition was the one who moved a motion which killed mine.

When my right hon. friend moved his motion in the House of Commons a quarter of a century ago—it was in 1907; that is when his motion was first made for the appointment of a royal commission on technical education. I was not, Mr. Speaker, a member of the parliament of Canada at the time my hon. friend moved that resolution. I hope that is an all sufficient answer.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The resolution to which my right hon. friend refers was not acted on, nothing came of it, no vote was taken. One or two years afterwards I was induced by the trades and labour congress to move the motion which was blocked by my right hon. friend by a motion to adjourn the debate, which sent my motion to the bottom of the list.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me read my hon. friend's words again:

When I moved for the first time—

That was in 1907.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not quibbling about a word. My right hon. friend was not in the house then.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not in the house when the motion was moved.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I mean the motion I moved when my right hon. friend was in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am going to speak on that, too. Let me repeat his words:

—when I moved for the first time in this parliament a quarter of a century ago for the appointment of a commission to inquire into technical education, my right hon. friend the present leader of the opposition was the one who moved a motion which killed mine, and I was the only one then on the Liberal side who voted in favour of such a commission.

The first motion was made in 1907. I was not a member of parliament at the time, and I did not kill his resolution. He goes on to say:

However, a year or so afterwards, he decided that the popular demand in favour of something being done by the federal government was so great that it was time to act, and my right hon. friend, who was then Minister of Labour in the Liberal administration of that day, did issue a commission for the purpose of inquiring into technical education, and that commission made a very valuable report to parliament.

There are two distinct statements there: one that I defeated the resolution of the present Minister of Justice when he first moved it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Don't trouble about the first.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And that two years later, repenting of that act, as Minister of Labour I introduced the resolution that had to do with the appointment of the commission on technical education. Let me read what my hon. friend himself said in parliament with respect to the resolution which he alleges I killed. I think my hon. friend is on record as having been responsible for the defeat of his own motion. I have in my hand Hansard of December 6, 1909, page 1023, from which I am quoting:

Mr. Hugh Guthrie (South Wellington) moved:

That in the opinion of this house it is advisable that a commission of inquiry be forthwith appointed to investigate the needs of Canada in respect to technical education and to report on ways and means by which these needs may be best met.

He said: During the session of this house in 1907, I had the honour to move a motion framed in terms very similar to those of the motion which I have now the honour of bringing to the attention of the house. But on that occasion the motion came up for discussion at a very late hour of the evening, and before a very thin attendance of members; the discussion was exceedingly limited, and the subject did not, I think, receive the attention which its importance deserved. I do not think that upon that occasion I was able to impress either the house or the government with the soundness of my argument, or with the propriety or necessity for the motion, strongly as I was able to impress myself.

That was the reason why my hon. friend's first resolution was defeated—the resolution which he said I killed in 1907—his own inability to impress either the house or the government!

Mr. GUTHRIE: My right hon. friend is quibbling over the first or second resolution. What I referred to was the motion I moved when my right hon. friend was Minister of Labour and when he moved adjournment of the debate, which was in December, 1909; not the one I moved when he was not in the house at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am coming to that. I am referring to the resolution which he said I killed. But now, confronted with his own words, he ought to admit that since he himself was unable to impress the house in regard to the importance of the matter, the resolution was withdrawn. The other resolution was the one he brought in two years later and which I may say was withdrawn not in order that it might be killed but in order to ensure the appointment of a commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was not withdrawn; it was voted on, and voted down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was voted down or rather not accepted, in order to enable the government to make the necessary inquiries of the provinces to ensure the speedy appointment of the technical education commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the excuse you gave.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all, as I can show from my hon. friend's own words I am now going to read what my hon. friend at the time said was the attitude of the government of the day. He said he accepted the government's action in good faith, and more than that, at the time he congratulated me very warmly not only on the speech I made but for cooperating with him in seeing that a commission on technical education was appointed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsequently I approved it, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me quote from the debate. As reported in Hansard of December 6, 1909, at page 1062, I spoke, as follows. This was not a year or so after but at the very time the motion was introduced:

Mr. Mackenzie King (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I am only voicing the opinion of every member of this house when I say that our thanks are due to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) for having brought this important subject to the attention of parliament and for the exceptionally able, forceful and comprehensive manner in which he introduced his resolution. I think, too, sir, the house is to be congratulated on the very full discussion which has taken place on this resolution, to be congratulated because the subject is one which, no matter what view we may take as to the jurisdiction of this government or a provincial government to deal with it, cannot be viewed other than as one of great national concern.

Then a little further on, having pointed out the importance of the subject as one of national concern, I continued as follows as reported at page 1076:

I think, the risk should not be run of raising a great constitutional question in a matter of such great national importance until at least the exact position of this government with regard to this question is fully and rightly understood by the different provinces and by the people in the country.

Then a little further on I said:

But I am not so sure that the exclusive right to make laws with regard to education means the right to exclude the Dominion from gathering information on any subject which may be deemed a subject of national importance. However, that may be a debatable constitutional question, and in view of the importance of the subject of this discussion, I think it would be well if the mover of this resolution would allow the government a further opportunity to consider the question from this point of view, and not press it to a division to-night.

Then a little later:

I hope that one of the results of this debate will be that the true relationship of the provinces to the Dominion on this question of great national concern will be brought out in bolder and clearer relief than ever before, and if the subject be brought up again, as I hope it will be, there will be no doubt in the mind of any member of this house, or in any group of responsible persons outside, as to whether or not the Dominion would be trespassing in endeavouring to cooperate with the provinces —for it is cooperation alone that would be expected—to the extent the mover of this resolution would desire. I would beg to move therefore the adjournment of the debate.

The purpose of the adjournment of the debate, as is shown clearly there, was to get over any constitutional difficulty and to enable the government of the day to communicate with the governments of the several provinces with respect to the commission that was to be appointed.

Now, what did my hon. friend himself say in regard to my attitude? Before I quote his words I might quote those of the late Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, who also stated the government's purpose in asking for the adjournment of the debate. On December 6, 1909, at page 1089 of Hansard, Mr. Fielding is reported as having said:

I must take exception entirely to the observation of an hon. gentleman opposite that the motion to adjourn is a motion to side-track this resolution. . . .

Speaking on the resolution the other day, the present Minister of Justice spoke of Mr. Fielding as one who understood what the position of the Liberal government was and what its intention was with respect to this question of technical education. I am now giving him the words which he himself heard and accepted in the House of Commons at the time:

. . . . and while I propose to vote for the motion to adjourn, I do so on altogether a different ground. After the discussion we have had, after the abundance of information brought before the house, showing the great need of this movement in Canada, it would indeed be strange if nothing further should be done. We are all of the opinion that something should be done, and the only question is what is the better way of doing it.

Then a little further on he said:

I do not say that the Dominion parliament should not step in and assist them. I am going to vote for the adjournment of the debate, not for the purpose of side-tracking the matter, but that we may have further opportunity of considering, not the wisdom of doing something, but the best way in which to do it.

Mr. Fielding concluded:

. . . . and in voting for the motion to adjourn I do so in order that we may have the opportunity of considering further what is the best way to aid a movement which seems to have received the favour of the whole house.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice concluded the debate, and this is what he said:

As mover of the resolution I may say a word on the motion to adjourn. After dealing with the question somewhat fully this afternoon, and endeavouring to impress upon the government the propriety of the motion, and also the expediency of appointing a commission forthwith, I hardly think it would be consistent for me now to vote for the postponement of my own motion. However, I accept in absolute good faith the statement made by the Minister of Labour in asking for an adjournment of this debate in order to give the government further time to consider the question.

A little further on my hon. friend said:

But I accept the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, and the positive assurance given to this house by the Minister of Finance that the government does feel in sympathy with the main purpose of this resolution, but requires further time for consideration.

Then my hon. friend concluded with these words:

. . . . I do not ask anyone to support what may be my vote if a division is taken. I would, for the sake of consistency, if there is a decision, have to vote for my motion, but I do not do so with the idea of antagonizing the government or of placing myself in a false position with regard to it.

That was the position of my hon. friend; he said, "I accept in absolute good faith the statement of the Minister of Labour," but from that day to this he has been telling the house and the country that I was acting in bad faith. I do submit that my hon. friend rather owes it to the debate itself, if not to myself, to remove the false impression which he has since created with regard to my attitude at that time.

May I go just a little further. Speaking on May 26, 1931, my hon. friend not only said I had killed his motion—whereas the record shows I helped to advance the object of it —but he said I was consistent also in raising a constitutional objection with a view to preventing anything being done. Here is what my hon. friend said just the other day:

The attitude of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, as I said, has been consistent on this question. Speaking in this house in 1929 he took the same position that he did to-day. In 1929 the matter came up on a bill to renew the grant which at that time had expired, and my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition said on that occasion, as reported at page 162 of Hansard for 1929:

There was no thought at the outset that the federal government would be called upon to go further than simply to supply the information to the provinces which would enable them to develop their educational systems along lines of industrial training and technical education.

Evidently that was not the view of the late Mr. Fielding, who was a member of the government that appointed that commission.

I have already quoted Mr. Fielding's remarks, which make perfectly clear what his view was as to the purpose of the motion. In reply to my hon. friend I went on to say this on May 26 of this year:

I think my hon. friend will find in the report of the royal commission to which he has referred that there is there printed an exchange of correspondence between the federal government and the governments of the different provinces. The premiers of the various provinces were approached before the federal government instituted the commission, with respect to what its powers should be, and my recollection is, and I think it will be borne out by the correspondence, that they agreed that no exception could be taken to the federal parliament having information gathered on any subject, but that the commission could not go beyond that, that its duty was to gather information and place the information at the disposal of the provinces.

I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, the report of the Royal Commission on Technical Education, which contains the order in council under which the commission was appointed, the recommendation to council, the commission itself, and also the correspondence which took place between the government of the day and the government of the several provinces before the commission was appointed. In order that the house may have the exact dates in the matter, may I say that the debate in the house took place on December 6, 1909, and was adjourned in order to give the government time to consult the provinces. The letters were sent to the different premiers on December 13, 1909; the order in council regarding the commission was passed on June 1, 1910. As Minister of Labour, I made the recommendation for the appointment of the commission. The commission was formally appointed on June 22, 1910; it made an interim report in March, 1911, and the final report on May 31, 1913. The final report is in four parts and covers over 2,300 pages. I shall have a word to say in a moment as to the recommendations contained in the report, but bearing out what I have just said as to the understanding on which the commission was appointed I should like to read to the committee a letter which was sent to the premiers of the different provinces by myself as Minister of Labour, dated at Ottawa, December 13, 1909. I will just read the first and last paragraphs:

Dear Sir:

The Dominion government is considering the advisability of appointing a royal commission to inquire into the needs and present equipment of the Dominion as respects industrial training and technical education, and into the systems and methods of technical instruction obtaining in other countries, particularly in Great Britain, France, Germany and the United States. It is intended that the commission shall be solely for the purpose of gathering information, the information when obtained to be published in a suitable report to be at the disposal of the provinces and available for general distribution.

Then in conclusion:

It is recognized, however, that the work of such a commission, to be of national service, should have the hearty endorsation of the governments of the several provinces of the Dominion, and I am, therefore, writing to ask if the appointment by the federal authorities of a commission of the character and scope suggested would meet with the approval of your government, and to inquire, in particular, inasmuch as some doubt has been expressed on the point, whether exception to such a course would be taken on any ground of jurisdiction.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) W. L. Mackenzie King.

I shall not read all the replies, but here is a typical letter from Hon. J. D. Hazen, premier of New Brunswick:

I have no hesitation in saying that the appointment by the federal authorities of a commission of the character and scope suggested in your letter would meet with the approval of my government, and no exception would be taken to such a course on any ground of jurisdiction.

The late Sir James Whitney, then premier of Ontario, wrote as follows:

I understand the object of the proposed commission, to inquire into the needs and present equipment of the Dominion as respects training and technical education and into the system of methods for technical instruction obtaining in other countries, will be solely for the purpose of gathering information. This being so, I see no objection to the creation of the commission, and no exception will be taken to it on the part of the province of Ontario.

Then the late premier of Manitoba, Sir Rodmond Roblin, wrote as follows:

I appreciate the fact that education is a matter under the constitution entirely vested in the provinces, and realize that it is a delicate question on which to give advice such as you solicit.

He goes on to say that for the purpose of gathering information no exception will be taken to the action of the government.

The late Sir Lomer Gouin was at the time premier of the province of Quebec and his letter, dated December 30, 1909, is important. I will quote it:

We are of the opinion, my colleagues and myself, that anything pertaining to public education—whether the subject be special teaching or general teaching—belongs to the provinces exclusively and I want to write you so in order that there may be no misunderstanding on that point. As, on the other hand, you give me the assurance that the federal authorities, in instituting a commission of investigation, would simply do it with a view to help the provincial governments by having collected information which they would later on put at the disposal of the latter, we see no objection to the appointment of such a commission. Please accept, sir, the expression of my highest regard.

Lomer Gouin.

These letters are sufficient to make perfectly clear, what I have stated all along, namely that the provinces gave their consent to the appointment of a royal commission on technical education on the understanding that it was a body solely for the purpose of gathering information which would be placed at their disposal. And in any attitude I have taken as to the ground on which this parliament should further proceed in the matter, I have had in mind the assurance given by the federal government to the governments of the several provinces at the time the commission was appointed.

I hope that clears up any misrepresentation there may be as to what my interest in the subject of technical education has been from the outset. What I have read would indicate that while I am quite prepared to give my hon. friend all the credit in the world for sincerity in his desire to see technical education further developed in this country, he ought to be equally ready to believe in the sincerity of my wish to further industrial training and technical education in Canada. I submit that he should not longer continue as he has been doing in the last few years, to seek to leave the false impression that I have been trying to kill resolutions or bills that have to do with technical education and trying to raise constitutional objections that had no place in the matter when it was originally considered.

I am wholeheartedly in favour of the development of technical education and vocational training in this country I believe that both the Dominion and the provincial governments should do their part in helping to further this great work, which, as I have said all along, is of national importance. I do submit, however, that more will be achieved in the end if the government of the Dominion and the governments of the several provinces confine themselves in their efforts to what beyond question comes within their respective jurisdictions. I suggest that they perform the services expected of them and raise their own revenues for the purpose, and that any expenditures that are made be controlled by the government that is responsible for the services and for the raising of the money.

We have progressed very far in Canada in some fields of our industrial development and the time has now come to consider carefully, if we are going to continue, as I hope we are, the expenditure on technical education and industrial research, just how far the provincial and Dominion governments respectively should go. When some years ago the government of the day introduced an act making a contribution in the form of grants to the provinces, they fixed upon a period of ten years. At that time the industrial research work that was being carried on at Ottawa was comparatively limited. No provision was made for it by any special act of parliament, but in the course of years there were persistent representations from industrial and labour organizations in Canada, from manufacturers' associations and from departments of government, regarding the need of more highly developed research work on the part of the Dominion government. When the Liberal government was in office we were faced with the question how best that additional demand could be met. We considered that the act fixing the period of ten years had been framed expressly to enable the provinces to get on their feet. Very little had been done up to the time the act was passed and the purpose of the act was to give the provinces a real start in technical education. We understood and the report of the commission and of the debate will show that the intention was to allow for a period during which buildings might be erected and equipped, teachers trained, staffs organized, and the work advanced to some extent. We did not believe it was intended by the parliament that enacted the measure that the grant for a period of ten years, made in that way, should be permitted to become a perpetual thing. We did feel, on the other hand, that the necessity for doing more at Ottawa in the way of providing facilities for technical and scientific research was becoming more and more apparent every day. Therefore, some years before the act expired, we notified the provinces that at the end of the ten years they must not expect the grant to be continued but must make provision for providing in their entirety the services which they had themselves started. We required additional money for federal purposes. It was because we had cut off the grant in one direction, that we felt justified in coming before this parliament and asking for a very large expenditure to develop allied research work on a scale theretofore never undertaken in Canada by the national research council which had come into being in the intervening years. We not only asked parliament to give increased votes to the national research council, but we asked for a vote which I think amounts altogether to something like $3,000,000 for the erection in the capital of Canada of the finest industrial research building to be found anywhere. That building will later be still further equipped for scientific research work.

That phase of the work, we thought, the federal parliament should engage upon. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice, speaking the other day, said quite truly:

> Technical education has become associated rather with work of a scientific or investigational nature and work of university grade.

It was with regard to technical education that this commission was appointed; it was with regard to technical education that the grants were being made by parliament. And, as my hon. friend has said, technical education is now being associated rather with work of a technical nature and work of university grade. That is exactly the class of work done under the national research council; it is work of that kind that is being carried on in the laboratories here. So that, instead of impeding the work on technical education, the late Liberal administration did more to advance technical education in Canada than had been accomplished by all previous efforts put together. Not only was this building erected as I have said, but additional appropriations were made for research purposes.

I have in my hand the Research Council Act passed on August 27, 1917. This act had not been passed at the time the royal commission of inquiry into technical education was appointed; it was some seven years later. Under this act a new body was formed under which industrial research was to be carried on by a federal advisory council for scientific and industrial research under the control of a committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research. Let me read a paragraph of the act which deals with the duties of this council. Section 6 reads as follows:

> The council shall have charge of all matters affecting scientific and industrial research in Canada which may be assigned to it by the committee, and shall also have the duty of advising the committee on questions of scientific and technological methods affecting the expansion of Canadian industries or the utilization of the natural resources of Canada.

That is precisely the work described by the Minister of Justice as constituting technical education, namely, work of scientific or investigational nature and of university grade.

Section 10 which covers the powers of the council reads as follows:

Without thereby limiting the general powers of the council conferred upon or vested in it by this act, it is hereby declared that the council may exercise the following powers, namely:—

(c) To undertake in such way as may be deemed advisable—

(i) to promote the utilization of the natural resources of Canada,

(ii) researches with the object of improving the technical processes and methods used in the industries of Canada, and of discovering processes and methods which may promote the expansion of existing or the development of new industries,

(vi) the investigation and standardization, at the request of any of the industries of Canada, of the materials which are or may be used in, or of the products of, the industries making such a request,

(vii) researches, the object of which is to improve conditions in agriculture;

(g) Subject to the approval of the chairman, to publish, from time to time, such scientific and technical information as the council may deem necessary.

Subsection 2 of section 11 reads as follows:

The council, with the approval of the governor in council, may pay to its technical officers and to others working under its auspices who have made valuable discoveries, inventions or improvements in processes, apparatus and machines such bonuses or royalties as in its opinion may be warranted.

Here we have a statute of Canada, now known as the Research Council Act, 1924, which makes provision for the federal government going into the whole work of technical research and investigation on a scale never before contemplated. In discontinuing the grants to the provinces the Liberal government had in mind the increase of the work to be carried on by this industrial research council. What has been done in that regard is best shown by a reference to the estimates which this house has been considering this year. In the estimates of this year for the Department of Trade and Commerce, there appears on page 71, an item of $500,000 to cover the work of this research council. Last year there was an item of $500,000, making $1,000,000 in two years. This money was not being expended prior to 1917, nor was it being expended at the time a previous administration made the grants in aid of technical education to the provinces for a period of ten years. We are now committed to an annual expenditure of at least half a million dollars to carry on research work right here in the capital. As I pointed out the other day, the estimates of the Public Works department show an item of $2,000,000 for laboratories and equipment for the national research council, while in the previous year an amount of $1,541,330 was voted for this purpose. Taking all amounts, within the last two years we have spent between four and five million dollars on scientific and industrial research. When the estimates were before the committee the other evening the minister was asked whether or not scholarships could be granted in the universities to promising students to enable them to engage in industrial and scientific research, and the minister replied that that was what was being done under this very act. At the present time this parliament is voting money for scholarships for industrial and scientific research and making payments out of federal funds for the training of young men and women in colleges and universities. However, we are controlling our own expenditures; we are using them in connection with our own sphere of work.

When the estimates of the Department of Mines were being considered the minister asked for something like $750,000 for research work. I asked the minister if that work was all in the nature of industrial research and technical work and he replied that it was. I drew attention to the fact that here again the federal government was expending large sums of money for the purposes of technical education and industrial research.

It has not been with any desire to restrict industrial training or technical education that I have questioned the wisdom of continuing these grants. The truth is quite the opposite. I see the extreme necessity of our own federal government raising increasingly large sums of money for work in the federal sphere. I am anxious that that work shall be carried on in as large a way as may be possible. It cannot be so carried on unless we have the necessary funds, and funds are becoming more and more difficult to provide.

There is another point, one which I have mentioned at different times. It is not wise from the point of view of principle for one government to raise taxes and pass them over to other governments to be expended. The government which raises the taxes ought to control their expenditure. I believe that was the principle laid down at the time of confederation. It was recognized that the provinces would need something in the way of subsidies to supplement their sources of income, but I contend that one of the bases of the confederation act was the idea that the federal and provincial governments would have certain definite fields of services assigned to them, that they should have complete control over those services, that they would raise the moneys necessary and see to their expenditure. If for any reason the division is not fair, then adjustments should be made by the paying of additional or altered subsidies.

I have no objection to any just increase which might result from proper revision of the subsidies, but I would point out to my hon. friend that before having the country go further into debt, before imposing more in the way of taxation upon the people, it would be advisable for the government to call a dominion-provincial conference and review the different services which are being carried on by the different administrations, take into account all grants which have been made in the past and are now being made to the provinces by the federal administration and see if it is not possible to make some definite arrangement whereby the provinces on their part and the Dominion on its part will themselves thereafter raise all that is necessary for the carrying out of the particular services which may be assigned to them. If the provinces have not a sufficient latitude in the way of fields of taxation, then more latitude should be given. I think it will be found with respect to taxation that the provinces have been finding new avenues for raising revenue at a time when the federal government, although it has been making much larger expenditures, is finding it increasingly difficult to obtain revenue. For example, the provinces derive a large revenue from the control of the liquor traffic; they derive large revenues from the licensing of motors and the like; they derive revenues from other sources which were not thought of at the time of confederation.

An hon. MEMBER: Beauharnois.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member says the provinces have derived revenue from Beauharnois. Does he mean to say that that is the way Beauharnois has been spending its money, by paying it to the province of Ontario? I am quite interested in hearing that from a Conservative member. I think the country will take note of that.

Mr. BENNETT: Don't talk like that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister was not in his seat when I was interrupted.

Mr. BENNETT: I heard the remark.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend would hardly approve of it. It was applied by one of his own supporters to the words I was using at the time I was saying that the provinces had other sources of revenue to-day which they did not have at the time of Confederation. I was interrupted by a Conservative member who called out "Beauharnois". I said that I was rather surprised that should come from Conservative sources at this time, and I am. On the other hand may I say that the federal government has been losing certain sources of revenue. The federal government has turned over to the provinces the natural resources, which had constituted a source of revenue. Therefore, on the one hand the provinces are getting new sources of revenue and we as a Dominion are losing others.

I do not wish to take more than a few minutes more, but in order that I may press home an argument of which I think full account ought to be taken at the moment, may I give to my hon. friends opposite, not the views solely of those on this side of the house, but the views of members of the administration itself in regard to what is wise with respect to these grants. I wish to quote from what the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) said on the subject when speaking of grants in aid to the provinces for the old age pensions. He was speaking in reference to grants from the federal treasury to the provinces, but this applies equally to grants in connection with vocational training. It is wholly applicable to the very bill which we had before us the other day increasing the grants to the provinces in regard to old age pensions. This is what the Secretary of State in the present administration had to say on April 15, 1926, as reported in Hansard, page 2472 of that date:

> Furthermore, this scheme contemplates that in its operation there shall be cooperation between the provincial governments and the federal government. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the recent political history of this country we have proceeded altogether too far in the way of cooperation between the federal government and the provincial governments, in respect, for instance, to road appropriations, which are within the proper jurisdiction and control of local legislatures. The same refers also to certain building schemes in which there was cooperation, but in respect of which the federal treasury, which provided the money, really had little or no control over the management of the funds and little or no supervision over the actual expenditures made. I do not want to stress the matter, but I went through for several weeks, as counsel, an investigation in my native province of Nova Scotia which clearly disclosed to me that when provincial governments or provincial legislatures are expending moneys which are not raised on their own credit and responsibility, and in respect to which their sole responsibility is that of expenditure, it leads to wasteful expenditure and very wide latitude indeed in the making of those expenditures.

That is a member of the present administration speaking. The Prime Minister also gave his views with respect to these matters and in particular in regard to binding one parliament by the action of a previous parliament. When we were speaking the other day on the tariff board bill, my right hon. friend said that I was stretching his point a little in applying it to appointments of officials to the tariff board. He said that he had been talking about money grants which would bind one parliament following another, and he took strong exception to that on the score of principle. This legislation which we have before us involves the expenditure of something like $750,000 a year for a period of fifteen years, so that if we pass it we shall be binding at least three or four subsequent parliaments, as may happen to be the case. What did my right hon. friend say? He was speaking in the house on April 24, 1928, the debate at the time being in reference to moneys appropriated for the Federal District Commission. This is what he said as reported in Hansard of that date at page 2352:

> Five years is the life of a parliament, and I cannot think it quite consonant with the ideas of the right hon. gentleman as heretofore expressed that this parliament should bind the hands of future parliaments.

A little further on the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) moved an amendment to the third reading of the bill and he used the following words in reference to it:

> My chief objection to the bill is that this parliament, through a commission, is making commitments for fifteen years, which in the ordinary course of events will cover the lifetime of possibly three, if not four, parliaments. I think the principle is wrong, and I am surprised that it should be seriously proposed, especially after what the Prime Minister said in this house when in opposition and since he became head of the government. To give to a commission the expenditure of moneys over a period of fifteen years is to my mind preposterous, and to take away from future parliaments the right to say how that money shall be spent, I think is also preposterous.

Mr. McGIBBON: Was that not my right hon. friend's own proposal?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not in relation to special aid grants, I discussed that the other day. I have been quite consistent in the matter of special aid grants. I did not renew the old act but extended its provisions for five years. There is still $1,500,000 to be paid under it.

Mr. McGIBBON: But the right hon. gentleman is willing to bind future parliaments?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not in relation to this particular subject.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The right hon. gentleman has bound us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), as reported in Hansard of April 26, 1928, had this to say on that date:

> Personally I have held a very strong view for some considerable time as to the undesirability of any legislature or parliament tying the hands of succeeding legislatures or parliaments with respect to annual expenditures. That idea may or may not be sound, but I do not think that when matters of policy are affected—and matters of policy always are affected in relation to grants of public moneys—this parliament should tie the hands of two or three succeeding parliaments. Not denying that parliament has always the right to repeal legislation, I submit that it is undesirable to create vested rights with respect to legislation; and the undesirability of such a policy can never be more apparent than it is in this particular measure.

May I go a step further? My right hon. friend made a reference specifically to technical education. He continued:

> I cannot but think that the principle involved —the principle which the right hon. gentleman when in opposition always contended should be applied—is the soundest possible principle with respect to the expenditure of public money. No parliament should create a condition which leaves a succeeding parliament under the necessity of either repealing existing legislation with respect to which vested interests or rights may have arisen, or of carrying on regardless of the views of that succeeding parliament, simply because the preceding government has done what is being done in this case. The cases which have been referred to, with respect to technical education—

The very question we are discussing.

> —highways and matters of that kind, in my judgment, stand in exactly the same position, unless there are very extraordinary conditions which can be submitted to parliament, and without those very extraordinary conditions, which might arise on questions touching the public debt and the necessity of liquidating it, one parliament should not say that in its wisdom it has placed upon its successors a burden which they must respect because of the interest which may have grown up under it. . . .
> As I say, it is with regret that one has to deal with this matter as a matter of principle with respect to this particular legislation.

All I say to my right hon. friend is that that argument is as strong and effective today as applied to technical education and grants of this kind as it was on the day when he made the pronouncement.

I might go on to quote what he said on a previous occasion on another important aspect of these grants. As reported in Hansard of February 18, 1927, at page 481, my right hon. friend had this to say:

> Now it might be well to look on the political side of the matter. You know what took place in Australia under conditions such as these. You are going to have a system that is not contributory. An election is coming on. They go out and say that more money should be given, that $20 is not enough. "Well, we will give them $25 if we get into power". . . . I was simply pointing out what might be said with respect to such a matter as this. That is the position. That is what happened in Australia. . . . The contending parties, the government and the opposition, were endeavouring to outbid each other in the matter of old age pensions. . . . The contending leaders were intending to secure the popular vote by promising to make an increase in old age pensions. Those are the facts. Consider what would happen in Canada.

And so forth. These are all principles that are worth keeping in mind, and all that I suggest to my right hon. friend is this: Since those very admirable principles were stated, conditions have become such not only in this country but throughout the world that governments are required to consider more than ever where they can best economize, where they can avoid increasing burdens on municipalities and provinces—that is one of the indirect effects of making these conditional grants—and how they can manage to keep down the public debt. I would suggest to the administration that they seriously consider whether the time has not arrived when they might well call a Dominion-provincial conference and discuss with the provinces the whole question of readjustment of finances as between the Dominion and the provinces before proceeding to bind future parliaments for a period of fifteen years. I do not say to do away entirely with this legislation, but I do say that it might be well to postpone it to another session holding in the interval the Dominion-provincial conference to which I have referred. This is a great bargaining instrument which the government will have in making its adjustments with the provinces, just as the old age pension grants and grants for highways, and as will be the grants for unemployment relief. The government in the interests of the country as a whole ought not lightly to disregard these important considerations in arriving at an adjustment which sooner or later will have to be made.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask what the right hon. gentleman means when he says that this legislation will place heavier burdens on the municipalities? I do not quite follow him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad the hon. member has asked the question. The municipalities are saying to-day that the provinces have been passing on to them—they did with respect to old age pensions—the obligation of raising a certain amount of the money, that the provinces have not been meeting the expenditure themselves, and more than one municipality has stated that it has been driven into bankruptcy because of the contributions that the province is compelling it to make in order that the province may get its full share of the grant.

Mr. PRICE: Take a seat.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend, if he is controlling the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: It being six o'clock—

Mr. BENNETT: Is the right hon. gentleman going on after eight o'clock?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not after that remark.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not notice that.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties that one has to contend with in parliamentary government is that frequently he finds leaders of parties relying upon the statements of their opponents when they were in opposition for the purpose of justifying the action which they now take. Now, either my right hon. friend opposite was right a few years ago when he contended that parliament was following the correct course in permitting grants to be made payable beyond the term of the parliament which was making them, or he was not. He convinced at least a majority of the House of Commons of that day that he was right, and the majority of the House of Commons so decided. It therefore follows that at that particular time at least the party to the left of the Speaker was wrong, and the party to his right was correct in the view which it took.

This afternoon the right hon. gentleman relied upon certain statements made by myself when in opposition as to the unsoundness of making grants of money that extended beyond the life of the parliament that was making them. He referred to my observations on the Old Age Pensions Bill when it was being considered by parliament. He also referred to certain observations I made in connection with the Technical Education Act and the Canada Highways Act. But I observed as he read, as doubtless the house did, that I said "except in very extraordinary circumstances or conditions." Now when this bill was considered by the government it was realized that something should be done for technical education by the federal authorities, and as education is primarily a matter for consideration by the provinces it was felt that we would do well to follow the course adopted in 1919. In that year parliament appropriated a very large sum of money, amounting in the aggregate to $10,000,000, for the purposes of technical education.

Now, I submit to this house that technical education is a matter in which the Dominion has a very great interest and a very great stake. Apart altogether from trade and commerce and all that is implied in that, it also has an interest in technical education as distinguished from the narrower interest of the provinces to deal with education as such. We have the interest of the nation, a concern in the ability of our people to meet competition and to carry our wares, our goods, our merchandise successfully into every part of the world. Believing that, we determined, after the commission made a report many years ago, to make an annual grant. This year, however, confronted with extraordinary economic conditions, instead of making a lump sum grant, or a grant which would expire with the life of this parliament, we realized that we must cut our garment according to our cloth—to use an old saying—and therefore we have appropriated a smaller sum of $750,000 to be granted annually for the next fifteen years. It is true that that period of time is far beyond the life of this parliament. It well may be—although there are no indications that warrant such a conclusion just now—beyond the lifetime of the present party in office as a government. But, as I say, there is no likelihood of that being so judging from present appearances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Don't be too sure.

Mr. BENNETT: I rely largely on the Toronto Globe in that respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Read it to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: Fixed up, is it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a correct report this evening.

Mr. MANION: The editorial is pretty strong.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Other things may have been fixed up.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think if I were sitting for Vancouver Centre I would make any statement of that kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You would not?

Mr. BENNETT: I just think I would not —there are some reasons why, too.

As I was pointing out, with the economic conditions prevailing in this country at the moment, it was concluded that it would be desirable, as I say, to cut our garment according to our cloth, and therefore we make a grant of $750,000 per annum extending over fifteen years. We come exactly within the terms of the observations I made from which the right hon. gentleman quoted. The extraordinary circumstances and conditions which I then had in mind now obtain, and there is nothing left for us to do but to take one of two courses, either discontinue this aid altogether, or continue it for a longer period with a smaller annual payment. We have chosen the latter course, and have continued assistance to technical education on a smaller annual grant, extending over a longer period of time.

That is all I have to say on the reasons that have governed us in the action we have taken. But once more I desire to direct attention to the strange anomaly of the right hon. gentleman relying on statements I made while in opposition, which the house did not then adopt, and which he says now should be adopted, and that the advice which he then tendered to the house should not have been so tendered. On that ground he asks the house to reject this measure. I do not think the house will conclude that that is a sound reason, but will conclude that if the right hon. gentleman was right on that occasion, he at least is not right in saying that the extraordinary circumstances to which I alluded on the former occasion do not now prevail. The principle I believed in then I believe in still, I think it should have application, and now is the opportunity to make it applicable to the purposes intended.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few brief observations on this bill. If the federal government is in a position financially to make grants to the provinces I do not think it should tie any strings to those grants. If a member on this side of the house ventures to criticize this measure the impression is conveyed to the country by some members on the opposite side that we are against technical education

As far as I am concerned, I am not against technical education. But I think the most important part of education to-day, especially under the conditions now prevailing, is primary education. I am going to confine my remarks mainly to Manitoba, because I am more familiar with matters concerning education in that province than with such matters in the other provinces.

In Manitoba, primary education is supported by the municipalities. We have a law under which the municipal authorities contribute $3.60 for every school day in the year —two hundred days—for every school teacher in the municipality, or an annual contribution of $720. Under present economic conditions in western Canada I do not know how we are going to keep our primary schools open. I am not trying to exaggerate the economic conditions, but judging from the latest reports I have—and I think every member from western Canada has been similarly advised—taxes are not being paid. This being the case, where are we going to find money to keep our primary schools open? Under this proposed legislation we are forcing the provinces to come to an agreement with the federal government in regard to expenditures for technical education. When the federal government votes certain grants to the provinces for education the provinces make every effort possible to comply with the conditions surrounding such grants. It will be so under this bill. What benefit is a child going to get from technical education if he is not able to receive a primary education? In the rural parts of Canada how many of our children take advantage of technical education? Very few of them I venture to say. The reason is that very few pass the higher grades in our primary schools to enable them to take advantage of technical education. If the federal government is in a position to grant moneys to the provinces for educational purposes, let the provinces administer the grants for the benefit of all those under their jurisdiction. I repeat, I am opposed to this proposed legislation—I am not opposed to technical education when it is possible, but I am opposed to this bill because it ties the hands of the provinces—forces them to make certain expenditures which under present conditions they can ill afford to make.

Mr. D. B. PLUNKETT (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two on vocational training, because to my mind it concerns the city which I represent and many other cities throughout Canada. Sometimes I think, in legislating for dominion affairs, we altogether forget the provincial side of the question, so to-night I am going to lay before this house some facts in regard to the tremendous cost entailed to the government of British Columbia in social legislation for which they must tax the people.

In the social legislation of this country I think there are many departments which might well be condensed and a saving made, and I am going to enumerate some of those which affect British Columbia, my own province. Social legislation in British Columbia is becoming more expensive each year, and the burden of taxation has become extremely heavy. Social legislation in British Columbia comes under several headings, and I should like hon. members to listen to this list, because they may be surprised to know that a provincial government should have to carry such a load. Here is the list: conduct of the Labour department; mothers' pensions; old age pensions; home for incurables; charitable institutions; the aid of the destitute; the burial of indigent persons; Tranquil sanatorium for tuberculosis patients; superannuation; health; provincial home; grants to hospitals; the Infants' Act; care of the poor and sick; mental hospitals; industrial schools and unemployment and destitutional relief. That may seem a startling list, and perhaps British Columbia is a little ahead of some of the other provinces in social legislation; as a matter of fact I think it is the leading province in Canada.

What does this mean to the people who have to bear the burden? It will be admitted by every hon. member of this house that federal taxation is a little more indirect than provincial taxation, so the people of the provinces feel this provincial taxation far more than they feel the federal taxation. In the year 1916-17 grants by the province of British Columbia to provide for this work totalled $963,049.03; in 1922-23 the total was $2,447,666; in 1928-29 the amount had increased to $4,099,654.84, while the estimates passed by the British Columbia provincial legislature at the recent session for 1931-32, for those services, totalled $4,466,515.35. It will be seen that the increase from 1916 to 1931 amounts to over $3,500,000.

With regard to education the amount provided by the department in 1916-17, exclusive of the amounts provided by the municipalities, was $1,806,311.76, while last year the vote for education amounted to $4,787,912 or an increase between the years mentioned of over $2,981,600. In passing I might recall to the minds of hon. members that the population of British Columbia is about equal to that of the city of Toronto, while I believe it is the second or third largest province in Canada in area. We have a tremendous difficulty in carrying on educational work in the mountainous districts where the lumber interests are centered, and this entails an added expense to the Department of Education in providing schools for those districts; some of them may be only temporary, but they must be provided for the children.

We must look at this measure in two ways. If we are going to have trained mechanics in order to compete in the commerce of the world we must have training schools in which they may obtain a knowledge of their business. It is no use trying to build up an export trade in manufactured goods if we do not build up the knowledge of our citizens in order to produce those goods. I quite agree with what the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said to-day with regard to the money voted for the national research council; I believe he mentioned two years in each of which $500,000 was voted. But I would ask this question. What good is that national research council to the citizens of my city or to the citizens of Prince Rupert if there should be a young man who wants to learn a trade and acquire technical knowledge at the same time? Is it not necessary to have some of these schools in the larger cities? Unfortunately it is true that a technical school is the most costly of all our institutions of this kind; the machinery and equipment require a great deal of money, and I think the government might go further and give some allowance to the provinces to help maintain these schools after they are established.

I commend the action of the government in this regard; I think money could not be spent in a better way. Some time there will come a readjustment of the taxation system of this country, and our taxes will be rearranged as between the province and the Dominion. At the present time I feel that the provinces have too heavy a burden, and therefore I am pleased to support the action of this government in voting money for this purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suppose if I say a word I will close the debate.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Before the minister closes the debate I should like him to explain whether the benefits of this legislation will extend to the rural municipalities. At the present time in Quebec we have splendid technical schools in Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers and other larger cities, but there are no schools of this kind in the rural constituencies, which include about half the population of the province. I should like to know also what is meant by this word "vocational." Will this include farming, fishing and other occupations which may be taken up in the country districts?

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Perhaps before the minister replies I may be permitted to say a word. I should like to make it clear at the outset that I am heartily in sympathy with the principle of vocational training. It was my honour and privilege for a time to be president of the school trustees' association of Manitoba, and on one occasion I chose vocational training as the theme of a presidential address. Undoubtedly in the past our school curricula have tended more to produce professional men than men who will take part in the ordinary business of life. Perhaps two years ago I would not have had the slightest hesitation in heartily endorsing this bill, even though there may be involved such constitutional questions as jurisdiction and the rights of the provinces and the Dominion. I have not usually attached undue importance to these questions. But according to the reports that come to us from the west, those provinces—I know this for a fact—not only this year but for some years to come will find it very difficult indeed to support the primary schools. There can be no question about that. Someone foolishly made the statement the other day in a newspaper interview that one good crop would bring Saskatchewan back. That is absolute folly. Debts have been piling up during the last two or three years and obligations have been incurred from which the provinces, either as governments or as individuals, will be unable to escape for many years. In the face of this fact it seems to me that it would be well for us to go slowly. I believe in vocational training with all my heart, but as things are in our western provinces I believe the government would be wise not to ask the provinces just now to assume obligations which they will not be able to discharge. It is quite possible that Ontario and Quebec, these central wealthy provinces, will be able to fulfil the conditions imposed by this bill. I am quite satisfied that the prairie provinces will not be able to take advantage of the opportunities here offered for technical education, and possibly what is true of those provinces is true also to some extent of the maritimes. Of the maritime provinces, however, I cannot speak. That is my attitude to this bill; not one of opposition but a firm conviction that under the present circumstances it woudl be well for the government not to pass this legislation inviting the provinces to take on responsibilities which I am sure they will not be in a position to bear.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): In Saskatchewan we have already assumed all these obligations; we have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in the building of technical schools. Does my hon. friend want to drop all this? Does he want us to abandon all that we have done, or shall we continue?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I have just a word to say at this point in the debate. The questions asked by my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and by my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) I should prefer to discuss when the bill is in committee; we shall have wider scope then.

I do not know that I should have risen to say anything now had it not been for the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon, when he tried to take me to task for certain statements I have made in this house at various times with reference to his own record upon technical education. I do not want to quibble with my right hon. friend as to whether I mentioned the "first occasion" or the "second occasion" when I spoke upon the introduction of the bill. I realize that the first occasion on which the question was brought to the attention of this parliament, and by myself, was in 1907. My right hon. friend was not then a member of the House of Commons and therefore I could not have made any reference to him in regard to that first occasion in 1907.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's words were that I killed his first resolution.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is the quibble on the word "first." I meant the first time I moved the resolution, when the right hon gentleman was present. Is that clear? I am not referring to the occasion two years previously, before he was a member. Let us fix the occasion definitely, whether you call it first or second: It was in December, 1909. My right hon. friend was Minister of Labour; I was a humble member supporting the Liberal party and the government of which he was a member. And at the instance of very important bodies in this country, notably the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and various similar organizations, I brought forward a resolution for the appointment of a commission to inquire into questions relating to technical education. The right hon. gentleman, as Minister of Labour, discussed my motion in an elaborate and very interesting speech. The whole temper of the house was distinctly in favour of my resolution, but unfortunately for it my right hon. friend saw fit to move the adjournment of my motion. though he knew, as I knew, and every other member in the house knew, that should his motion of adjournment carry my motion would be relegated to the foot of the list. And under the rules of the house in those days my motion would not be reached again. He knew that; the whole house knew it. When he moved the adjournment of my motion the opposition of the day immediately challenged him upon the ground that he was trying to sidetrack the whole question—that was the word used in the debate. It was assumed by the opposition, of course, that the move of my right hon. friend as Minister of Labour was for the purpose of killing my motion, or postponing it, or, as was said on that occasion, sidetracking it. That was why Mr. Fielding got up and explained that the government did not intend to sidetrack it: he knew what the house believed. Well, the matter was put to the vote, the majority prevailed, and my right hon. friend's motion to kill my motion carried. And on that occasion I voted for the first time with the Conservative party. That vote constitutes one important milestone in my career.

My motion having been adjourned, or abandoned, or sidetracked, whichever way my right hon. friend wishes me to refer to it, considerable agitation arose throughout Canada among the parties interested; and if my right hon. friend will turn up the Toronto Globe of the day following he will see how strong was the protestation against the abandonment of the matter. At any rate, as I remember well, after the Christmas adjournment I was one of a deputation that waited upon Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In that deputation, I think, were Mr. Draper of Ottawa, Mr. O'Donoghue of Toronto, Mr. James Simpson of Toronto, a gentleman from my own riding and myself, and we urged upon the Prime Minister that the matter should not be dropped. These people were serious; they insisted that a commission should be appointed. Later on in that spring the then Minister of Labour, now leader of the opposition, did communicate, as he says, with the various provinces and did appoint a commission. The appointment was made in June 1910. Then ended the first step in the matter.

My right hon. friend in the speech which he made on my motion expressed the warmest sympathy with the subject of technical education.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend said it was later on in the spring, but the communications I read this afternoon were dated December 30, 1909.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The commission was not appointed until June.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The communications with the provinces were immediately after.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the end of the first period. Those expressions of sympathy which permeated his address were couched in the beautiful language in which he always expresses such sentiments in this house. What the men who were earnest and interested in this matter wanted was not sympathy, but action, and the only action taken, and that under a certain amount of pressure, was when in June the commission was appointed.

When the commission made its report, a long and very interesting one, the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was out of office and the government of Sir Robert Borden was in office. No further practical step was taken in the matter until 1919. The war intervened. I was a member of the government in 1919 but I do not think my right hon. friend was a member of the house at that time. The government of that day brought in a bill to grant $1,000,000 per year for ten years to the various provinces in aid of technical education. It is interesting to note that the late hon. Mr. Fielding was in the house in 1919. I believe I placed on record the statement which he made in the house in the session of 1919 in regard to the bill, but I will mention it again just to emphasize what Mr. Fielding said. The following appears on page 3796 of Hansard of June 20, 1919:

> As regards technical education, it is worth remembering that this grant, although it is late in coming, is the outcome of a policy which the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier took up some years ago.

The money grant by this parliament was the outcome of the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in whose government my right hon. friend was Minister of Labour. The grant of 1919 was the outcome of the policy of the government in which my right hon. friend sat. Mr. Fielding also said:

> When the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier appointed that commission, headed by Professor Robertson and including a number of able men, we certainly created the impression that in some degree the matter was a dominion one, and I look upon this movement as a belated endeavour on the part of the government to carry out the intentions which the Liberal government had in mind when they appointed that commission.

That is a very clear and distinct statement from an able and prominent member of the Liberal administration, the late Hon. Mr. Fielding. When the bill passed the house in 1919 I do not think my right hon. friend was in the house. No further action was taken until 1929 when my right hon. friend was Prime Minister of Canada. The matter came up again at the instance of the opposition. The ten years period had expired, some of the provinces had received almost their whole allotment of money while other provinces had a considerable balance yet to be received. The question was: would the grants lapse or would they be continued? When the matter was brought to the attention of the house on that occasion, my right hon. friend used the following language:

> There was no thought at the outset that the federal government would be called upon to go further than simply to supply the information to the provinces which would enable them to develop their educational systems along lines of industrial training and technical education.

My right hon. friend stated there was no thought that the government should do more than gather information. Mr. Fielding stated that the grant of 1919 was the outcome of a Laurier policy. I think Mr. Fielding was correct notwithstanding the statements made in this house in 1929 by my right hon. friend, as I have just quoted them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about the letter addressed to the premiers of the provinces, and the replies thereto?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Which letter is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The letter which stated what the commission was for and asking the consent of the provinces to the appointment of such a commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In answer to that, I will read from the report of the commission appointed by my right hon. friend. The following appears on page 26 of the report:

> 5. The very considerable increase in the population of Canada by immigration is throwing additional burdens for elementary education upon the communities and the provinces. The enhanced public revenues due to growth by immigration goes in a large measure into the Dominion exchequer. The increase of the volume of trade brings in larger amounts through the customs offices. This would indicate that the new financial responsibility and burdens for industrial training and technical education, on a scale large enough and generous enough to be available to all the people between the ages of 14 and 18, should be sustained in large measure by funds from the Dominion government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What date is that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the report of the commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Which was made in 1914. My remarks had reference to what took place at the outset in 1909.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not interrupt my right hon. friend and he should not interrupt me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my hon. friend wishes to state matters accurately.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am reading from the report of the commission appointed by my right hon. friend. I quoted the statement made in this house by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, and I continued with the statement made in 1929 by my right hon. friend that the government had no thought of anything like financial responsibility in connection with this scheme. In 1929, my right hon. friend told the provinces and told this house that he did not approve of grants from the Dominion in aid of technical education, but his government passed an act to continue those grants for a further period of five years in so far as the unexpended balances were concerned and to the provinces which were entitled to receive such balances, but provided that such grants should lapse in the year 1934. My right hon. friend made a contract to run until 1934 and to provide for payments by a government other than his own. He tied the hands of that government in respect of these payments for another five years, and now he objects to that government following out the same principle and making grants for the next fifteen years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those were not new payments, they were extensions of the old grants.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As a result of the legislation sponsored by the then Minister of Labour, the government made future contracts with all provinces entitled to participate on a five-year basis, whereas all previous contracts had been made from year to year. That is the information which came to me this evening from the Department of Labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend say that a new contract was made with the province of Ontario?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, because that province had received its full allotment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just stated that new contracts were made with all provinces, and that is not true.

Mr. GUTHRIE: All provinces entitled to unexpended balances. That is the position as I see it, and I think I have stated it correctly. There has never been a time when my right hon. friend has not poured out his heart in sympathy over the cause of technical education and vocational training. His sympathy has been abundant but that is not what the provinces want. They want practical assistance in this great work. Whenever the question of giving practical assistance has come up my right hon. friend has merely extended his sympathy and has refused financial support from the Dominion treasury.

I do not know that I should go any further into this matter at this stage. I shall have to furnish considerable information during the committee stage, and I think for convenience and expedition the bill had better be permitted to go into committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On section 4—Agreement with province.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister might explain what the government have in view in regard to the application of this grant.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not proposed under the present bill to limit or restrict the application of these moneys as was done under the former bill, and should provinces so desire, such portion of the grant going to them may be used, for instance, in agricultural education or training. This was not permitted under the former bill. The reason for the exclusion of agriculture under the former bill was that another act had been passed by parliament in 1919 or 1920 providing for a specific grant in aid of agricultural education. That state of affairs continued until 1928 or 1929 when the Duncan report was made in regard to the maritime provinces, after which a change was made in the regulations allowing provinces if they so desired, to utilize their grants in agricultural education.

Mr. VENIOT: Was that not applicable only to Prince Edward Island?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it was applicable only to Prince Edward Island, as all the other provinces had availed themselves of the grant for the purpose of what we understand as technical education or vocational training schools. "Technical education," as defined by the department, is as follows:

"Technical education," as defined in section 2 of the act, means and includes any form of vocational, technical or industrial education or instruction approved by agreement between the minister and the government of any province as being necessary or desirable to aid in promoting industry and the mechanical trades, and to increase the earning capacity, efficiency and productive power of those employed therein.

Mr. BROWN: Does that definition appear in the bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, that is a definition made by regulation under the bill, and it is, I think, broad enough to include almost anything that the provinces desire in regard to special training that will promote industry or increase the welfare of any particular class in any province. Experience has shown that there is a good deal of diversity between the various provinces concerning what they desire to teach. In the past the wishes of the various provinces have been met in this respect. The federal department which has had charge of the administration of this fund has, I think, in every case been able to come to agreeable terms with the provincial authorities, so that there has been no clash, no hitch, no disagreement as to the application of the grants that were made to the different provinces, while the act of 1919 remained in force. The extent to which advantage has been taken in the various provinces of that enactment has been marked. It may be interesting to know, if I can give it in brief form, just what has been accomplished in that respect. For instance, in the report made to the department on June 30, 1930, we find that the attendance at the vocational school classes in Canada amounted last year to 127,873, while the total attendance in 1919, when the act came into force, was 60,546. During that period the attendance at those classes has been doubled and as divided amongst the provinces, the showing is particularly good. The number of pupils attending these classes in the different provinces is as follows:

British Columbia	11,778
Alberta	4,844
Saskatchewan	2,845
Manitoba	6,984
Quebec	19,893
Ontario	57,321
New Brunswick	3,158
Nova Scotia	6,725
Prince Edward Island	1,094

Or a total of 127,873 attending these special courses or classes.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand these pupils all atend these schools in the large cities or towns, but I should like to know the present policy of the government. Do they intend to come to an arrangement with the provinces whereby the benefits of this legislation may be extended to the rural districts? In Quebec we have industries in Montreal, Quebec, Sherbrooke, Three Rivers and so on, but in the rural districts the vocations are limited to farming, fishing, lumbering. Is any of this grant to be extended to the rural parts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I fancy that if any province concerned were to make a reasonable proposal for any special section of its territory or in regard to any special class of its people, it would be favourably considered if it were for the purpose of vocational education or training. My attention has been drawn to the fact that without exception the provinces have endorsed this scheme and have asked for these grants in a definite way. Letters have been received during the present year, but at the meeting that was convened in Ottawa by the government of my right hon. friend in 1927, all the provinces were represented and all the resolutions passed there were to the same effect, commending the system as inaugurated by the government of the Dominion of Canada, commending the operation of the plan in the various provinces and asking for renewals of the grants. At that time of course they were in some doubt whether the act would be renewed or not, but the scheme has so far been commended by all the provinces. If they desire any special treatment or arrangements of their grants or to apply them in any particular way which still brings them within the general scope of the term "vocational training" or "technical education," there will not be the slightest difficulty in having the money applied in the way the provinces desire.

Mr. RHODES: With respect to the question just submitted by the hon. member for Bonaventure, as I understand it there never has been any limitation imposed as to the method employed by the several provinces so long as they come within the terms of the act. Speaking for Nova Scotia, a very important branch of the system there is the conducting of schools in the far-flung sections of the province through the correspondence school section of the provincial technical education college, and there is no reason in the world, so far as I understand it, why the same method could not be employed in the province from which my hon. friend comes.

Mr. HEENAN: I take it for granted that the government contemplate making similar agreements under the act to the ones now in existence. If so, the Dominion government will have very little to say as to where the schools shall be established. The provincial law will obtain in that regard, and the provinces require the municipalities, through their taxation, to take the initial step. I take it that that is right.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that is correct.

Mr. HEENAN: So my hon. friend from Bonaventure is right in saying that schools would not be established in the isolated rural districts unless the province makes arrangements to that effect. Take, for instance, towns like Kenora or Fort Frances; they are probably three hundred miles away from a large city, yet they are the centre of a large and important section of the country. The young men and the young women from that part of the country would of necessity have to travel as far as Fort William in order to obtain the benefit of technical education. I was wondering if the minister would not think it advisable to make provision in the agreements to be entered into with the provinces to assist those distant localities to a greater extent, so that the benefits of technical education will not all be concentrated in large cities like Fort William, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal. I think the point raised by my hon. friend from Bonaventure is very well taken. It is one that I was going to suggest to the minister, and I commend it to him because the people in the distant rural parts —this is the least important factor—are paying their share of the cost of technical education through taxation, yet they are unable to secure any of the benefits of it because of the fact that they live in scattered rural districts, where taxation is already very high. Kenora, with a population of 8,000 thought of establishing a technical school, but when the Ontario government sent their inspector up there to inquire into the situation, they determined that the school would hardly fit in with the taxation of the town and everything else connected with it. I would suggest to the minister that it might be well to take into consideration ways and means of assisting these localities through the agreements. As the agreements read at the present time—I have a copy of them here—we have very little to say except in the matetr of assisting the provinces with a grant. They themselves determine where the technical schools shall be established, and they spend the grant that we give them.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the principle of the act, that this government does not carry on the work of education. It supplies the money, and the province works out all the details. I should have thought that as good a town as Kenora, with 8,000 people would probably have some kind of vocational school now. I think it ought to have, but that is a matter for the residents of Kenora and the government of the province. It would be fatal to the whole scheme if this government were to start to intimate what should be done and what should not be done. That should be left exclusively to the provinces and the municipalities concerned.

Mr. BROWN: How will the existing agreements extended up to 1934 be affected under this legislation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will not be adversely affected. The provinces will receive the amounts to which they are entitled notwithstanding this legislation. The legislation of 1929 had application only in respect of unexpended moneys under the former vote The amount unexpended at the present time is $1,152,165.26.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What is it by provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The table I have here shows the amounts available for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1930, as follows:

British Columbia	$ 68,563 73
Alberta	21,779 82
Saskatchewan	695,054 99
Manitoba	528,340 07
Quebec	125,302 35
Ontario	.....
New Brunswick	106,768 60
Nova Scotia	363,067 89
Prince Edward Island	126,522 07

Those amounts have been further reduced by payments since March 31, 1930. The total amount on hand on March 31, 1931, was $1,230,715.58. There are only five provinces now entitled to anything, as follows:

Saskatchewan	$436,259 15
Manitoba	448,177 12
New Brunswick	4,791 68
Nova Scotia	267,873 20
Prince Edward Island	73,614 43

Mr. BROWN: With the inclusion of agricultural training in the definition of vocational training, the provinces will be enabled more quickly to take advantage of the grant?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I expect they will.

Mr. VENIOT: They cannot take advantage of the amount unexpended for agricultural instruction. The minister meant under this bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Except in the case of Prince Edward Island, but as far as this bill is concerned all of the grant can be expended, if they so desire, for agricultural instruction.

Mr. VENIOT: Saskatchewan has an unexpended balance of $436,000 over a period of eleven years, Manitoba an unexpended balance of $448,000 over a period of eleven years, and Nova Scotia, which the Minister of Fisheries said was taking such advantage of the grants and desired to have them continued, has an unexpended balance of $267,000 over a period of eleven years. There is proof positive that those three provinces at least are not so very anxious that these amounts be voted to them, because they have not been taking advantage of the amounts hitherto available. Here we have over $1,000,000 in three provinces unexpended after eleven years' operation of the act, and in order to give them further time to take advantage of the grant we had in 1929 to extend for a further five years the term during which the unexpended balance might be spent. Two years afterwards we find that Saskatchewan has reduced its unexpended balance by only $200,000, and Manitoba has reduced its unexpended balance by less than $80,000, and Nova Scotia has reduced its unexpended balance by only $93,000. Yet we are told that these provinces are appealing to the government to vote this $750,000 a year for fifteen years. The facts as laid before the committee by the hon. Minister of Justice certainly do not show that Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia are anxious to take advantage of even what has been granted to them since 1919.

Mr. BROWN: Unless the act of 1929 be amended to allow the unappropriated balance to be spent on agricultural training, I am afraid the western provinces will not be able to take very much advantage of this legislation. Is it possible for the Minister of Justice to take that course?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would have to have some request from the province before any arrangement of that kind could be made. All the provinces have approved the scheme. Speaking for myself, I may say that if Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta desired to divert any considerable amount of the unexpended balance still due them, and they made representations to that effect, I think it might be very favourably considered. They have not made such representations.

Mr. BROWN: Does the minister mean that all the provinces have approved the scheme within recent times, or is he referring to the general approval given as far back as 1927?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, no, within the last few months.

Mr. VENIOT: Do I understand the minister to say that should Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta or even Nova Scotia, wish to divert the unexpended balances for agricultural purposes, the proposal would be favourably considered?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the provinces asked for such diversion.

Mr. VENIOT: You could not grant that diversion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I could, by an amendment to the bill. But that is what was suggested by my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown); he asked me if we would consider an amendment to the bill for that purpose. I said no, unless the provinces themselves take the initiative in the matter.

Mr. BROWN: I think there can be no question of the attitude of the western provinces in regard to the matter. Would it not be possible to amend the legislation in that way so that the provinces can take advantage of it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No request has been received in that respect yet, and I do not know whether my hon. friend speaks for all the western provinces or not.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What is the total amount that Manitoba has received under the scheme introduced in 1919?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The total amount we have paid Manitoba for the ten years from 1919 to 1927 is $191,406.49.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What is still unappropriated?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The unexpended balance amounts to $448,177.12.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: My contention is that the province of Manitoba, for which I spoke, has received only $191,000 in ten years out of a total of around $700,000. Unless the western provinces use the unexpended balance under the act of 1919 for agricultural purposes, I do not see how they are ever going to spend the $448,000, to say nothing of the money to be voted under this legislation. I desire to impress on the minister that if he is going to give the western provinces any grant for education, he should certainly not put any strings on it because those provinces are going to have the hardest time of their life keeping their primary schools open, and I doubt if all of them will open this fall.

Mr. MARCIL: The greatest problem we have in Canada to-day is to keep our people on the land. The majority now live in the towns and cities. It was not so in former years. The riding I have the honour to represent is 300 miles from the nearest city, Quebec. The young people scattered over this riding, 250 miles long, have to leave home and go either to Quebec or to Montreal, and many go to the United States to get this education. Under section 4 the federal government is authorized to come to an agreement with the provinces. Would it not be possible for the minister to give a very valuable service to the rural districts by making the grant conditional on the provinces extending the benefit of this education to the rural districts? I am not speaking merely for my own constituency, but for the rural districts generally. The minister will realize what an immense service he would render to the whole of Canada by adopting my suggestion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I may state quite candidly to my hon. friend that if he means the money should be applied to primary education or to ordinary scholastic training in rural districts, that is not the purpose of this bill. Its purpose is to provide vocational and technical training.

Mr. MARCIL: Supposing a farmer's son wants to remain on the farm and to learn something connected with agriculture?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Agricultural courses might be provided at the agricultural colleges; but for primary education this grant is not intended.

Mr. BROWN: I am quite satisfied that the scheme would be much more useful in Manitoba if agricultural training were included. Would it be possible to have two agreements running side by side? For instance, take Manitoba, would it be possible for the province to make an agreement with this government to get a part of the fund applied to agricultural education, so the two agreements might run side by side?

Mr. GUTHRIE: An agreement was made in 1929 which continues for five years; that is not in any way involved in the present bill. That was a restricted agreement under the former act, under which I do not think agricultural education would be included. But a new agreement now will be made, if this bill is passed, and in the new agreement it will be possible to divert to the purposes of agriculture such portion of the money as the governments of the provinces may desire.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Of the unexpended money?

[Mr. Beaubien.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, that is subject to the agreement made by the former government, which I suppose will be carried out.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has there been any request from the province of Manitoba to include agricultural expenditures in connection with the agreement made in 1929?

Mr. GUTHRIE: For the unexpended balance? No, none has come to my notice.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That was done for Prince Edward Island?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was done because of the report of the commission on maritime rights.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to suggest one point to the minister. I notice that the amount which would come to Alberta would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $45,000 per year. The technical institutions, I think, are wholly in two of the cities, but in all the rural districts the pupils are taught practical agriculture, and to some extent text books are supplied on this subject. Would the minister consider an arrangement by which text books or supplies used for teaching practical agriculture in rural schools could be paid for out of this money?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it is technical agriculture, properly so called, and it is requested by the province, under the present act there will be no difficulty in arranging to supply those books out of this money.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I think the allocation of this money in the rural districts would be a matter for the Department of Education of the province.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And the municipalities.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Yes. At the present time they teach only a little theory; very little practical work is done, so that it would be difficult to allocate any sum to the boys and girls taking up technical subjects in the public schools. I understand this grant is handed over to the province for technical education, and if they have a school in Edmonton or in Calgary naturally a certain portion of the money goes to that school. Is that it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The money is handed to the provincial government under the terms of an agreement, and it is expended by the provincial government as that government sees fit, in compliance with the terms of the agreement.

Bill reported.

Mr. GUTHRIE moved the third reading of the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of the bill my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in closing the debate, said he would not have spoken but for the remarks of the leader of the opposition. May I say that I had no intention of speaking on the third reading, but I am doing so now in virtue of the speech made by the Minister of Justice.

In his speech my hon. friend repeated what he had previously said and what after the quotations I gave this afternoon from his own speeches I thought perhaps he would correct when he came to speak to-night. His statement was to the effect that I had been responsible for killing his motion at the time it was introduced. I think even to my hon. friend himself it is now quite clear that his first motion was killed by himself; for in the speech he made in the house on a subsequent occasion with regard to it he said that his own words had not been effective enough to convince the house. But with regard to the second motion, so that there may be no possibility of any quibbling about the matter, my hon. friend said that unfortunately my motion, as Minister of Labour, was made to kill his motion. In other words, he repeated what he previously said, that in 1909 when I moved the adjournment of the debate it was to kill his motion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It had that effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said this afternoon that my purpose in moving the adjournment of the debate was to enable the government to make progress in appointing a commission, and that the whole purpose was to get the consent of the governments of the provinces so that there would be no question of jurisdiction raised to embarrass the work of the commission, and to get the commission appointed at the earliest possible date. Now I wish to repeat what my hon. friend then said with respect to my motion for adjournment, in order to show what was his view at that time, and I would ask the committee to judge for themselves whether these words sound as though my motion, in his estimation, was killing his motion. I refer to page 1096 of Hansard for December 6, 1909:

> As mover of the resolution I may say a word on the motion to adjourn. After dealing with the question somewhat fully this afternoon, and endeavouring to impress upon the government the propriety of the motion, and also the expediency of appointing a commission forthwith, I hardly think it would be consistent for me now to vote for the postponement of my own motion. However, I accept in absolute good faith the statement made by the Minister of Labour in asking for an adjournment of this debate in order to give the government further time to consider the question. If I thought there was the slightest foundation for the statement of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Reid) . . . .

Who, by the way, had said that the motion was in order to sidetrack the whole matter. Then my hon. friend goes on to say:

> . . . . I would be the more inclined to press the matter with all the resources at my command. But I accept the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, and the positive assurance given to this house by the Minister of Finance that the government does feel in sympathy with the main purpose of this resolution, but requires further time for consideration.

Then a little later on he said:

> However, as I feel satisfied that the government has evidently the intention of going ahead on this matter and desires only time for consideration, I do not ask anyone to support what may be my vote if a division is taken.

Those are my hon. friend's words in reference to two persons, myself, and the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, who is no longer here to speak for himself. I propose to say a word on my own behalf, and I also propose to say a word with respect to the late Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, who is no longer in this parliament to answer my hon. friend. With regard to myself, and to show that my motion was simply to enable the government of the day to get some information that we might proceed with the speedy appointment of a commission, my hon. friend said:

> However, I accept in absolute good faith the statement made by the Minister of Labour in asking for an adjournment of this debate in order to give the government further time to consider the question.

When my hon. friend said he accepted my word in absolute good faith he was speaking as one gentleman to another, in the presence of gentlemen in the House of Commons. He was doing more than that; he was then, as he described himself this evening, a humble member of parliament speaking to a minister of the crown. To-day he is speaking as a minister of the crown to a humble member of the opposition, and what my hon. friend in 1909 said he was prepared to accept in good faith as a gentleman, and as a member of the House of Commons, to-day as a minister of the crown he says is a matter of bad faith. I am sorry for the changes the years have brought in the attitude of my hon. friend. I thought the present Minister of Justice was a man of his word; I thought that the present Minister of Justice, when he said to anyone, "I will accept your statement in good faith", would, so long as he lived, remain true to his word. I can only regret that hereafter I shall not be able to feel that, when Minister of Justice in the government of another party, he was as true to his word as he was when a humble member of the Liberal party.

May I say a word on behalf of the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding? The present Minister of Justice has brought into this debate the name of a gentleman than which none is more honoured in the parliament of Canada. The hon. member has cited Mr. Fielding because of his known integrity, because of the type of man he was, a gentleman whose word he knew would weigh with all hon. members of this House of Commons. This evening he has given to the house, from the speech made by Mr. Fielding in 1909, certain citations which he says confirm the view that my motion made in that year was intended to kill his and that what was being done by the government in 1919 was in furtherance of the original intention of the Laurier administration, and that this original intention was not to gather information as I have said. Let me read what the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding said, and let me lend to his words the added emphasis of one who is not here to speak for himself but whose name is revered even by the present Minister of Justice. This is what Mr. Fielding said, as reported in Hansard of December 6, page 1089:

> I must take exception entirely to the observation of an hon. gentleman opposite, that the motion to adjourn is a motion to side-track this resolution.

That was what Mr. Fielding said regarding the comment that had been made by Doctor Reid, who was member for Grenville, that the motion was to sidetrack the resolution. The Minister of Justice tried to convey to the house to-night the impression that in Mr. Fielding's opinion there was an attempt through my motion to sidetrack the resolution, and these are the words of Mr. Fielding:

> I must take exception entirely to the observation of an hon. gentleman opposite, that the motion to adjourn is a motion to side-track this resolution; and while I propose to vote for the motion to adjourn, I do so on altogether a different ground. After the discussion we have had, after the abundance of information brought before the house, showing the great need of this movement in Canada, it would indeed be strange if nothing further should be done. We are all of the opinion that something should be done, and the only question is what is the better way of doing it.

Then further on:

> I am going to vote for the adjournment of the debate, not for the purpose of sidetracking the matter, but that we may have further opportunity of considering, not the wisdom of doing something, but the best way in which to do it.

And finally:

> I do so in order that we may have the opportunity of considering further what is the best way to aid a movement which seems to have received the favour of the whole house.

I do not believe there is a single member who will not accept, verbatim et literatim, every word uttered by the late Mr. Fielding at that time. I could wish for the Minister of Justice that when he has passed away, and when his words are being quoted in this parliament in years to come, they might be received as unreservedly as the words of Mr. Fielding have been accepted by himself.

I was a little over generous when I said a moment ago to my hon. friend that the letter which I sent out immediately after the debate in question was dated December 30. I find that the letter was sent on December 13, the 30th being the date of one of the replies. That was not as he said a year or so after my hon. friend's motion was voted down. My hon. friend made his speech in the House of Commons on December 6. He knows, as hon. gentlemen do, all that is involved in departmental correspondence, the preparation of communications, and so on. I ask whether much time was lost in carrying out the promise of the then administration given by myself as Minister of Labour to take steps immediately to appoint a commission. That promise was made on December 6, 1909, and on December 13, 1909, the following letter was sent to each of the premiers of the different provinces:

> Department of Labour, Canada.
> Ottawa, December 13, 1909.

Dear Sir:

The Dominion government is considering the advisability of appointing a royal commission to inquire into the needs and present equipment of the Dominion as respects industrial training and technical education, and into the systems and methods of technical instruction obtaining in other countries, particularly in Great Britain, France, Germany and the United States. It is intended that the commission shall be solely for the purpose of gathering information, the information when obtained to be published in a suitable report to be at the disposal of the provinces and available for general distribution.

I may say that the view of the government is that a commission of the kind suggested might render valuable services to the Dominion as a whole, since it would be in a position to conduct an inquiry on a wider and more comprehensive scale than might be considered desirable or possible in the case of the different provinces, and which if undertaken by the provinces individually must lead inevitably to the duplication and reduplication of energy and expense.

It is recognized, however, that the work of such a commission, to be of national service, should have the hearty endorsation of the governments of the several provinces of the Dominion, and I am, therefore, writing to ask if the appointment by the federal authorities of a commission of the character and scope suggested would meet with the approval of your government, and to inquire, in particular, inasmuch as some doubt has been expressed on the point, whether exception to such a course would be taken on any ground of jurisdiction.

Yours faithfully,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

Then the replies came from the different premiers. I read some of them this afternoon, but inasmuch as my hon. friend this evening sought to have the committee believe that I was stating something that was not correct, when I said that the original purpose of the commission was solely that of gathering information, that that was the ground on which the commission was appointed, let me read again a paragraph or two from some of the replies. Here is a communication from Sir James Whitney:

Office of the Prime Minister and President of the Council, Ontario

Toronto, December 16, 1909.

Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.
Dear Sir:

I have your letter of the 13th instant.

I understand the object of the proposed commission, to inquire into the needs and present equipment of the Dominion as respects training and technical education and into the system of methods for technical instruction obtaining in other countries, will be solely for the purpose of gathering information. This being so, I see no objection to the creation of the commission, and no exception will be taken to it on the part of the province of Ontario.

Yours very truly,

J. P. Whitney.

I will give one other letter—reference to others will be found in the speech I made this afternon on the second reading. This letter is from the premier of the province of Quebec. It will be seen that I have taken the two largest and most important provinces.

Office of the Prime Minister, Province of Quebec

Quebec, December 30, 1909.

Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.
Sir:

I have submitted to my colleagues of the executive council the letter you were kind enough to write to me on the 13th inst., asking me whether the government of the province of Quebec would approve the appointment by the federal authorities of a commission to make an investigation concerning technical instruction in this country.

We are of the opinion, my colleagues and myself, that anything pertaining to public education—whether the subject be special teaching or general teaching—belongs to the provinces exclusively, and I want to write you so, in order that there may be no misunderstanding on that point. As, on the other hand, you give me the assurance that the federal authorities, in instituting a commission of investigation, would simply do it with a view to help the provincial governments, by having collected information which they would later on put at the disposal of the latter, we see no objection to the appointment of such a commission.

Please accept, sir, the expression of my highest regard.

Lomer Gouin,
Prime Minister.

These letters I have quoted will show the reason for my repeated statement that the original intention in appointing the commission was solely that it should gather information to be placed at the disposal of the provinces, so that there should be no question of invasion by the Dominion of provincial jurisdiction in the matter of education. Having been responsible for the appointment of the commission, I have ever since felt responsible to the provinces for maintaining the position which I then took. I have before me a copy of the order in council which covered the appointment of the commission. It reads:

Certified copy of a report of the committee of the privy council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 1st June, 1910.

Let me direct attention to the date of that recommendation. As hon. members know, while parliament is in session ministers find it very difficult to arrange the personnel of commissions and the like. The last replies received from the different provinces came in around January or February, and in May of the same year, as Minister of Labour I made my recommendation to the cabinet for the appointment of the commission. The order in council reads as follows:

On a memorandum dated May 28, 1910, from the Minister of Labour stating that industrial efficiency is all important to the development of the Dominion and to the promotion of the home and foreign trade in competition with other nations—

Mr. BENNETT: Those are functions of the Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is why I was citing them. It was my duty as Minister of Labour to state why the Dominion government should appoint a commission to inquire into this matter. May I read again without interruption?

Mr. BENNETT: I extend my regrets for having interrupted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my right hon. friend meant no impoliteness, but three very insulting interruptions occurred this afternoon from the other side of the house. As my right hon. friend leads the house I have a right to expect him to set an example to his followers. That is why I took exception to his interruption. I do not believe the Prime Minister meant anything discourteous, but the interruptions this afternoon were most discourteous; they were entirely uncalled for and insolent; I venture to say the Prime Minister would not have supported them. I take the position in this parliament that while speaking in opposition I am as much entitled to a respectful hearing as is the Prime Minister, and I will look to you, Mr. Speaker, to see that during the rest of the sessions of this parliament a fair hearing is given to myself and to all hon. members on this side of the house. If we cannot get that hearing in the parliament of Canada, we will be heard somewhere else. The order in council reads:

Certified copy of a report of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 1st June, 1910.

On a memorandum dated May 28, 1910, from the Minister of Labour, stating that industrial efficiency is all important to the development of the Dominion and to the promotion of the home and foreign trade of Canada in competition with other nations and can be best promoted by the adoption in Canada of the most advanced systems and methods of industrial training and technical education.

May I ask, Mr. Speaker, that order be maintained in the chamber?

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members will kindly desist from loud conversation while the right hon. gentleman is speaking.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The order in council continues:

The minister further states that the premiers of the several provinces of the Dominion have expressed on behalf of the governments of their respective provinces, approval of the appointment by the federal authorities of a Royal Commission on Industrial Training and Technical Education.

The minister recommends that authority be granted for the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the needs and present equipment of the Dominion as respects industrial training and technical education, and into the systems and methods of technical instruction obtaining in other countries; the said commission to be appointed pursuant to vote No. 477 of the supplementary estimates for the fiscal period ending March 31, 1910, and to consist of the following gentlemen, viz.:—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

James W. Robertson, Esq., C.M.G., LL.D., of Montreal, Que., Chairman.

Hon. John N. Armstrong, Esq., of North Sydney, N.S.

George Bryce, Esq., LL.D., F.R.S.C., of Winnipeg, Man.

M. Gaspard DeSerres, of Montreal, Que.

Gilbert M. Murray, Esq., B.A., of Toronto, Ont.

David Forsyth, Esq., M.A., of Berlin, Ont.

James Simpson, Esq., of Toronto, Ont.

The minister further recommends that the said commissioners be instructed and empowered to pursue their investigations at such localities as may appear necessary, in the Dominion of Canada, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the United States of America, France, Germany, and, subject to the approval of the minister, elsewhere on the continent of Europe; also that the purpose of the commission shall be that of gathering information, the information when obtained to be carefully compiled, and together with such recommendations as it may seem expedient to the commission to make, published in a suitable report to be at the disposal of the provinces and available for general distribution.

The minister further recommends that the commissioners be appointed under the provisions of the statute respecting inquiries concerning public matters, and report the results of their investigations together with their recommendations to the Minister of Labour.

The minister further recommends that Mr. Thomas Bengough, of Toronto, be appointed secretary and reporter to the said commission.

The committee submit the same for approval.

(Sgd.) F. K. Bennetts,
Asst. Clerk of the Privy Council.

That is the story. On December 6, the government of the day promised that it would take immediate steps to appoint a commission, but it desired first to communicate with the premiers of the different provinces to make sure that no question of jurisdiction would be raised. On December 13, 1909, communications were sent to the premiers of the provinces and replies were received during the balance of that year and extending into the next. One was dated Victoria, January 15, which would reach Ottawa the latter part of the month. On March 13, 1910, an amount appeared in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1910, as an appropriation for the commission. That amount was not included in the estimates for the following year but in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1910. This was done so that the commission could be speedily appointed. The recommendation to the council was made by the Minister of Labour on May 28, 1910, and the authority for the appointment was dated June 1, 1910.

The commission then started on its duties and visited different parts of this country.

It made several interim reports but it was not until 1913 that the final report came in. My hon. friend has said that they acted on the final report the next year, but let me read what the commission said.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said that the government of which I was a member took action in 1919.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In 1919 the government took action upon the report which had been brought in in 1913. Let me read one paragraph of the report, as follows:

> The commission recommends that the sum of $3,000,000 be provided annually for a period of ten years by the parliament of Canada and paid annually into a Dominion development fund.

Did the government of the day act on that recommendation? Instead of acting on it and making an annual grant of $3,000,000 for ten years, it passed an act to provide for the annual payment of $1,000,000 spread over a period of ten years. It gave less than one-third of the amount suggested by the commission as being necessary as a development fund.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend must not forget that a war had occurred in the meantime.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was a war in the meantime and ever since this country has been endeavouring to pay for that war but has not succeeded. While that war was proceeding every dollar of the finances required on war account was money borrowed by the government then in office, and it was left to subsequent governments to meet the expenses. We have to-day a condition in this country which, considered from the point of view of its possible effect upon trade and industry, is almost as serious as periods of war have been in different countries at different times. We have at the present time a condition in Canada to meet which the Prime Minister intends to announce to-morrow night, I do not know what measure of relief. I shall be very much surprised if this parliament is not asked to vote some such sum as $50,000,000, $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 to relieve the present situation. Many men and women have no work, they have no food to eat, some no clothing to wear, and are unable to pay their bills. Is this a time for the government to be asking the people to spend additional amounts of money in grants to the provinces, when, as has been pointed out to-night, some of the provinces have not been able to use the total amount of grants that have been made to them; when in addition to that, municipality after municipality has been communicating to the provinces its inability to carry the burden resulting from the provinces passing on to the municipalities the raising of amounts equivalent to some of the grants which the Dominion has furnished for certain purposes? I am as strongly in favour of promoting technical education and vocational training and I have done as much in regard to getting industrial training developed as any other man in the country. I was responsible for the appointment of the commission the report of which lies at the basis of this whole matter. I was the one who brought into parliament the recommendation for the appointment of a commission to study the question of technical education when the present Minister of Justice says himself that he could not have his voice heard in the matter of getting support for his proposals. This commission made its report and my hon. friend tells us to-night that on the basis of this report the governments of the day have since acted. Yet he would seek to deny the administration of which I was a member any credit for any part in this matter, and particularly in regard to myself he would seek to make out that I had killed his motion, citing in a manner wholly misleading in support of his statement the words of one who is no longer here to speak for himself. I do not wonder hon. gentlemen opposite sigh. After all, there are some things that are befitting even in parliamentary debate.

When this afternoon I spoke on the second reading I pointed out that within the last two years this very parliament of which we are members at the present time will have voted —if we include what is in the estimates to-day, has already passed the house and will shortly receive His Excellency's assent—the sum of $1,000,000 for industrial research work, which is part of the technical education work of the country, to be given to the industrial research council that was not in existence at the time the technical education act was first passed. May I point out that in addition to that the house will have voted within the past two years something approaching another $3,000,000 for the construction in this very city of Ottawa of the finest research laboratory on the continent; that this house has voted another $750,000 for further research work in connection with the Department of Mines. According to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) the other evening the national research council itself has been awarding scholarships to young men and women throughout the country to go into the universities, technical colleges and elsewhere in order to qualify as experts in matters of industrial and technical research. I have supported all these measures, and been largely responsible for some of them. I have pointed this out to make clear that I am not opposing any aid to industrial and technical education. I have shown that inside two years something like $5,000,000 has been voted for this purpose. This measure calls now in addition for the expenditure of a sum of $750,000 a year for a period of fifteen years.

Surely these are things of which account ought to be taken, and I again appeal to the ministry, although I know my words will not be harkened to, to consider whether the time has not come when we ought to call the provinces into conference to find out, where there is any doubt, what services should be carried on by the provinces, what services should be carried on by the Dominion, what is a fair adjustment of financial arrangements between them, what are the sources of revenue and taxation for each of them to have. If as a result of that conference it is decided that the British North America Act should be amended so that the federal parliament shall take over in its entirety the work of industrial and technical education in all parts of Canada, I shall be prepared to support a recommendation of that kind. If, on the other hand, it is decided that the provinces shall do the work of vocational training and that the Dominion government shall do that of higher industrial research work of the type in which the universities are engaged, I shall be prepared to support that. If it is decided that the Dominion should take over the old age pensions scheme and administer it in its entirety, I shall support that gladly and I say here and now that is what I think ought to be immediately done. If, further, it is decided with respect to unemployment and other matters there is to be a division whereby the Dominion will assume certain obligations and the provinces other obligations, I shall be prepared to consider favourably recommendations that are made along those lines.

What I submit, however, is this; whether we have made mistakes in the past—and I was frank enough the other evening to say that with respect to some of those grants I did make the mistake of countenancing contributions to the provinces, but I thought experience had shown that was not wise—if as a result of a conference of that kind, we come to the conclusion that these different grants should not be continued, but that larger subsidies should be given to the provinces; that the provinces should be allowed certain fields of taxation which are not used by them at the present time, I shall be prepared to consider all these things on their merits. The constitution of this country was framed by men who gave the matter very serious thought, who were very careful in outlining respective spheres of action for the provinces and the Dominion, and who showed, that by making provision for the adjustment of accounts through subsidies, they felt that any money that went from the federal treasury should go to the provinces to be dealt with by the provinces as they might deem best, but not that provincial jurisdiction should be invaded by the Dominion nor that the Dominion should seek to put pressure on the provinces.

The Minister of Justice said the other day that this legislation would give more power to the provinces, and he supported it on that ground. Is not that an extraordinary position for the Minister of Justice of the federal government to take? More power to the provinces where federal finances are involved means less power to the Dominion. The Minister of Justice is here to maintain the power of the Dominion. One thing which we as members of the federal House of Commons have to safeguard is the rights of the Dominion. In this house many speeches have been made, to which no exception can be taken in any particular, about the needs of provinces and what the provinces should do; but this is the parliament in which to discuss the needs and taxation of the Dominion, and this is the place where primarily matters of federal and not of provincial obligation must be settled.

May I conclude with this word: I remember very well when in 1916 this parliament was discussing the question whether it would without sanction of the electorate extend the term of parliament for one year, when under the constitution it had not the authority so to do. I was not a member of parliament at the time, but I was in very close association with the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier who honoured me with his confidence in matters of the kind, and I know something of the discussions which took place. I remember very well Sir Wilfrid Laurier saying at that time: Once we trifle with the constitution and seek to do things which by the constitution were never intended, we put profane hands upon the ark of the covenant and no one can say how far the resultant injury is likely to extend. That is a very sound doctrine. If the constitution is not right, amend it; make it as it should be; but as long as we have a constitution setting forth certain powers for the Dominion and certain powers for the provinces, we shall not err very much but will rather be doing our duty as members of the federal parliament if we adhere to that constitution in spirit as well as in letter.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 111, to amend the customs tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: All the sections, Mr. Chairman, have been considered in committee on the resolutions. They have been very carefully compared and reprinted, and I think they are wholly in order.

Sections 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 4—Powers of governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that one of the principal changes in this section is the adding of the words "from time to time" in various places. May I ask my right hon. friend whether those words either add to or take from the previous section in any material particular?

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them add to; others are as they were. This makes them uniform and confers upon the governor in council the power from time to time to exercise the authority mentioned, namely, to extend or withdraw the British preference or intermediate tariff, as the case may be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend to indicate the sections that give additional power to the governor in council?

Mr. BENNETT: In paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (h) the underlined words "from time to time" are new; in paragraphs (e), (f) and (g) the words were already there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me understand this. I would gather that for purposes of uniformity the insertion of the words may have some advantage, but do the sections as sections of a statute change in any particular the powers that are given by the act?

Mr. BENNETT: The words "from time to time" were added to make clear what had been taken to be an inference of law from the language, to remove any doubt with respect to the matter. Paragraph (e) of section 4 is new, giving the governor in council power from time to time to extend to any British country the benefit of rates of customs duties more favourable than those of the British preferential tariff.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is very desirable, I think.

Mr. BENNETT: The next paragraph, it will be observed, is the complement of that, and paragraphs (g) and (h) are really complementary, the one authorizing the granting of an extension, and the other its withdrawal.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Undervaluation.

Mr. BENNETT: I trust that the committee observes that midway in the section are the words "under the Australian Trade Agreement Act, 1925, the said special duty shall not exceed 15 per cent ad valorem in any case." That will not apply when the new treaty comes into force, but it is left in because if anything should happen by which that treaty did not come into force we would be without the provision to which the hon. member for Sherbrooke referred last night, namely the dumping provision.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the Australian treaty come into force when it is passed by Australia?

Mr. BENNETT: It comes into force on proclamation.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Fish caught in Canadian vessels to be free.

Mr. VENIOT: Is that sufficiently clear, "domiciled in Canada?"

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Gloucester will remember that when the resolutions were before the committee some discussion took place with respect to this matter. It is as clear as under the circumstances it can be made, having regard to the difficulties of Canadian nationality and matters cognate thereto as explained by the Secretary of State. It will be observed that it says, "Fish caught by fishermen in vessels registered in Canada." That is the first thing. Then it says, "or owned by any person domiciled in Canada."

Mr. VENIOT: Although registered elsewhere; that is what it means?

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. That is as clear as it was thought desirable to put it having regard to the conditions referred to when the resolutions were before the house.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On the schedules:

Mr. BENNETT: I promised my hon. friends opposite that ample opportunity would be afforded on the schedules for discussion, and I suggested last night that if they desired to discuss the September legislation they might do so now or later, as they preferred. We will proceed with the schedule and they may speak at the end of it or as they may be advised.

Customs tariff—76. Seeds, viz.: Cauliflower, celery, onion, pepper and tomato, when in packages weighing more than one pound each, per pound: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 cents; general tariff, 25 cents.

The first change is No. 76, page 14. It will be observed that in 76d the word "celery" is the third word. It is a typographical change. The hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes) will move the amendment. It has been checked up very carefully.

Mr. RHODES: I move:

That item 76 be amended by striking thereout the word "celery."

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—184c. Magazines in which the advertising matter does not exceed twenty per centum of the total space: general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: The next item is 184c. During the discussion the other day in committee the question was raised as to the sufficiency of the language to make clear that religious, educational, scientific philanthropic, agricultural, labour or fraternal publications should be free. This amendment will make it abundantly clear:

Magazines maintained by and in the interests of religious, educational, scientific, philanthropic, agricultural, labour or fraternal organizations or associations not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures for the benefit of any private individual.

Those are the words used in other countries, and we have followed them here, so that no question will arise as to the reciprocal character of our operations. I was struck with the way in which the question was put the other day; hence this takes the place of the language employed.

Mr. RHODES: I move the amendment accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—184d. Periodicals or portions of newspapers consisting largely of fiction and/or feature stories or articles and/or comic supplements, per pound: general tariff, 15 cents.

Provided, that the duty under this tariff item shall be not less than per copy: general tariff, 15 cents.

Provided, that nothing in tariff items 184, 184a, 184b, 184c or 184d shall affect in any way the provisions of item 1201 of schedule C to the customs tariff.

Provided, further, that the governor in council may make such regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of tariff items 184, 184a, 184b, 184c and 184d.

Provided, further, that the rates of duty specified in tariff items 184b and 184d shall be effective on and after the first day of September, 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this item it is proposed that after the words "September, 1931," the following words be added:

—except as regards the portions of newspapers, includig comic supplements, referred to in tariff item 184d, in respect of which newspapers and/or supplements the rates of duty specified in said item shall become effective upon proclamation by the governor in council.

I need hardly point out to the committee that possibly some members knew what had not clearly been made known before, that there are contracts outstanding in these matters, the breaking of which would very seriously embarrass financially the people who are parties to the contracts, and in addition the effect would be to establish a monopoly in Canada with respect to some of these comic supplements about which I spoke the other day. The only way in which it can be met involves the consideration of very complex problems, some of a postal character and some otherwise. So it is proposed to defer operation of that portion of item 184c until proclamation by the governor in council.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I move the amendment accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—438d. Horns, distributors, instrument board lamps, oil gauges, gasoline gauges, thermostats, oil filters, carburetors, purifiers for oil, purifiers for air, annular ball bearings and parts thereof, lock washers, speedometers and parts thereof, vacuum tanks, composite gaskets of copper and asbestos, steering wheels and rims therefor, one piece welded axle housings, machined or not, instrument bezel assemblies, dash heat indicators, electric ignition locks, cylinder lock barrels and keys, bearing spring shackles and automatic radiator shutter assemblies, ammeters, radiator shells, body cowls and body stampings of metal, including front, rear, side, door and seat stampings, not welded or riveted, nor further manufactured than as stampings, all of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported by manufacturers of goods enumerated in tariff items 438a, 438b, 438c and 438e for use only as original equipment in the manufacture of motor vehicles enumerated in tariff items 438a, 438b and 438c: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. BENNETT: The next item is 438d. It is only a question of making clear a matter about which the persons concerned think there might be some doubt. If the committee will be good enough to turn to page 20 and look at the fifteenth line from the bottom they will find these words:

—body stampings of metal, including front, rear, side door and seat stampings, not welded or rivetted, nor further manufactured than as stampings, all of a class or kind not made in Canada.

The trade were fearful that a wrong construction might be placed upon these words, because it was only intended to meet cases in which stampings were not further manufactured than welded or rivetted for shipping purposes. In order that that may be cleared up the item will read now as follows:

438d. Horns, distributors, instrument board lamps, oil gauges, gasoline gauges, thermostats, oil filters, carburetors, purifiers for oil, purifiers for air, annular ball bearings and parts thereof, lock washers, speedometers and parts thereof, vacuum tanks, composite gaskets of copper and asbestos, steering wheels and rims therefor, one piece welded axle housings, machined or not, instrument bezel assemblies, dash heat indicators, electric ignition locks, cylinder lock barrels and keys, bearing spring shackles and automatic radiator shutter assemblies, ammeters, radiator shells, body cowls, and body stamping of metal, including front, rear, side and door stampings, not further manufactured than welded or rivetted for shipping purposes, all of a class or kind not made in Canada, when imported by manufacturers of goods enumerated in tariff items 438a, 438b, 438c and 438e for use only as original equipment in the manufacture of motor vehicles enumerated in tariff items 438a, 438b, and 438c.

Mr. RHODES: I so move.

Mr. EULER: Are these necessarily of metal?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, they are all of metal.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, the other night when we were dealing with items 438 and 438a I made a statement to the effect that whenever the minister under the authority of an order in council—which order in council would be issued under the authority of the customs act passed at the special session—placed an arbitrary valuation on goods for duty purposes, the valuation invariably would be above the invoice value, that this always tended to induce the importer to pay a higher price for the goods to the foreign producer than he would otherwise pay, and that if he did not do so the customs department would impose a fine on him in the form of a dumping duty equal to the excess price he might pay. I stated further that the importer because of that condition would always be tempted to pay a foreign manufacturer more than was necessary, thus transferring to the coffers of foreign producers money that otherwise might come into the treasury of the Dominion. I mentioned automobiles. The minister at the time informed me that that could not happen. My purpose in speaking to-night is to show that it can happen, that it does happen, and that it is inevitable that it should happen.

It will be recalled that in 1922 the government of the day passed an amendment to the customs act known as 47a. That amendment gave the minister power to place an arbitrary valuation on natural products coming into the country, which valuation should be the value for duty. That amendment remained a dead letter on the statute books until 1926, when my hon. friends opposite were in power. They enforced the act; they passed an order in council giving the minister power to place this arbitrary valuation on certain natural products.

Mr. BENNETT: Fruits and vegetables.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, fruits and vegetables. Not only did the minister fix this valuation and thereby increase the duty, but the officials of the department took that arbitrary valuation as a basis for accusing the importer of dumping, and they added the dumping duty. When we discovered that this was being done we protested to the departmental officials. They insisted on their right to charge that dumping duty; we insisted they had no such right, until finally they consented to appeal to the Department of Justice for an opinion. The Department of Justice declared they had no right to impose a dumping duty because of the arbitrary valuation which had been placed on the article. In spite of that they continued for a time to collect that dumping duty until finally an appeal was taken to the governor in council and the orders in council were rescinded.

Matters remained in that state until the September session of the present parliament, when amendments were passed to the Customs Act which gave the minister power to place an arbitrary valuation not only on natural products but on almost anything coming into this country, such valuation to be the value for duty. Those were the amendments to the Customs Act, and having done that an amendment was passed to the customs tariff. That is section 6 of the customs tariff, which was the dumping clause, and I wish to read that section as it was amended last fall:

> In the case of articles exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada is less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of its exportation to Canada, or is less than the fair market value or value for duty thereof as determined under the provisions of section thirty-six of the Customs Act, or is less than the fair market value thereof as fixed by the governor in council under the provisions of section thirty-seven of the Customs Act, or is less than the value for duty thereof as determined by the minister under the provisions of paragraphs (a) and (e) of section forty-one of the Customs Act, or is less than the fair market value thereof as fixed by the minister under the provisions of section forty-three of the Customs Act, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected and paid on such article, on its importation into Canada, a special or dumping duty, equal to the difference between the said selling price of the article for export and the said fair market value thereof or value for duty thereof; and such special or dumping duty shall be levied, collected and paid on such article although it is not otherwise dutiable.

This is the meaning of that amendment: Where the minister has exercised his power of fixing a value for duty on almost any goods—since the power goes that far now—if that value is higher than the price the man actually paid for the goods then the man shall be charged a dumping duty equal to the difference between the price so fixed by the minister and the price he pays. The other day my contention was that the man was thereby tempted to pay a higher price to the foreign canufacturer, with whom very often he is friendly, rather than pay the dumping duty, and that the effect of this legislation is to force Canadians to pay higher prices to foreign producers than those producers receive from their own people, and higher prices than it is necessary for the Canadian to pay. The minister said such a thing could not happen, but I have here three letters which I think will convince him that it not only can but does happen. Here is a letter from the Edgerton Manufacturing Company, Plymouth, Indiana, who I believe manufacture baskets for packing fruit. The letter is addressed to the Norfolk Fruit Growers' Association of Simcoe, Ontario, and the paragraph I desire to read is as follows:

> You may be interested in knowing that the freight rate on the cars we shipped you during the 1930 season averaged 17·6 cents per dozen packages. This amount added to the price of $1.80 per dozen as fixed by the Dominion government would result in a cost to you of $1·976 per dozen without taking into consideration the duty. The action of the Dominion government would increase your delivered price approximately 25 cents per dozen and, likewise, would result in a profit to us of about 20 cents per dozen higher than that which we enjoy on sales made in the states. We feel that our profit on Canadian business should be approximately the same as that received in connection with business done in the states.

Here is a firm which frankly states that because of the action of the customs department they are compelled to charge Canadians 20 cents a dozen more than they charge Americans for the same goods. I also have a letter from the Western Cartridge Company of East Alton, Illinois, dated May 6, 1931:

> On January 3rd this year we reduced ammunition prices to all of our customers in the United States by 10 per cent, and we extended the same discount at the same time to our customers in Canada. The Canadian commissioner of customs has refused to accept this extra discount of 10 per cent on shipments of our goods into Canada, and has threatened to charge dumping duty against our goods so invoiced; and, based on this decision of the commissioner, we have been obliged to withdraw these reduced prices from our Canadian customers and are now invoicing them at a price 10 per cent higher than we charge any of our domestic jobbing trade. This additional 10 per cent is, of course, in the last analysis, paid by the consumer of Western ammunition in the Dominion, and we regard it as distinctly unfair to him and his interests.
> We have been told that the commissioner's decision was based on a brief presented to the Dominion government in Ottawa by the Dominion Cartridge Company, in which brief they indicated their reasons for protesting the reduction in price of American-made ammunition. We should like to obtain a copy of this Dominion Cartridge Company brief as presented to the government, in order to be in a position to present, if advisable, our answer to it.

I might say that I asked for a copy of that brief in order that we might find out what the cartridge company asked for and whether or not their claims were proper and sound, but the government saw fit not to grant that request.

Mr. BENNETT: To whom is that letter addressed?

Mr. YOUNG: This letter is addressed to Mr. R. J. Deachman, Ottawa, and is signed by W. T. Birney, sales manager for the Western Cartridge Company. The other night, speaking on this matter, I was referring particularly to automobiles. To illustrate I mentioned the importation of an automobile which retails for $1,000, the discount on which should be 30 per cent but by the order in council passed by the government is limited to not more than 20 per cent. That was the case with respect to which the minister said it could not possibly happen that the importer would pay higher prices to foreign producers. I have here a letter dated Ottawa, March 22, addressed to the same Mr. R. J. Deachman, which reads as follows:

> In reply to your inquiry as to the effect of the change in discount on imported automobiles, basing the former discount at 30 per cent and the present discount at 20 per cent—the list price of the car being $1,000—I have to advise you as follows:
> $1,000 less 20 per cent equals $800 at 20 per cent, $160 duty.
> $800 plus $160 equals $960 duty paid value at 5 per cent, $48 excise tax, $960 at 1 per cent, $9.60 sales tax.—Total, $217.60.
> $1,000 less 30 per cent equals $700 at 20 per cent, $140 duty.
> $700 plus $140 equals $840 duty paid value at 5 per cent, $42 excise tax, $840 at 1 per cent, $8.40 sales tax.—Total, $190.40.
> Additional duty and excise taxes payable, $27.20.

Then note this paragraph:

> If the importer pays $800 for his car special duty will not be applicable; on the other hand if he purchases the car at $700, a special duty equal to $100 will be payable.

That is signed by R. W. Breadner. My contention was that if the man paid the higher price to the American manufacturer he did not have to pay the dumping duty; if he purchased the car at $700 the government stepped in and said, "Because you purchased that car at $700 instead of at $800 we will charge you an extra $100 duty." I argued that the man always would be tempted to pay the higher price to his business associates on the other side of the line in order to avoid paying the duty to this government. There the action of the government has the result of transferring to the pockets of foreign producers money which otherwise might come to the treasury of this country. The commissioner says it will happen, and by the very amendment to the act as I have read it it cannot but happen; or the act says that the extra duty shall be levied, collected and paid. There is no alternative. The whole trouble is with the amendments of last fall, and now that the matter has been called to the Prime Minister's attention he should take steps to repeal these amendments.

Mr. BENNETT: It is disturbing to find the hon. gentleman so inaccurate. The first case, the Edgerton case, is one in which the goods were being sold at less than cost of production, and the minister had nothing to do with it. It is covered by a statute of this parliament. That statute was not enacted by this government; in the form to which I have directed attention it has existed for many years. When it is suggested that the dumping duty was treated in the manner indicated, I recall that when the Minister of Customs of that day, Mr. Bureau, introduced the legislation in question he indicated that the dumping duty would apply, and it was subsequently discovered, as the hon. gentleman knows, that that was not the case. But inasmuch as it was the intention of parliament that it should, when this government did legislate it legislated to give effect to the intention of parliament as Mr. Bureau had then stated it, and as parliament understood it, although it was opposed by my hon. friends opposite and to the right, and supported by the Conservative party of that day. So that the legislation as it now stands means exactly what the Minister of Customs of that day said it was intended that it should mean, and what it was regarded as meaning. Now keeping that in mind and the fact that the Johnson case—the fruit baskets—is one that comes within the letter of the law and in which the minister had nothing to do with fixing either values or prices, but which automatically involved the application of the duties to which the hon. gentleman has referred, I think he will agree with me that that passes out of the picture. That is No. 1. No. 2, the cartridge case, considerably intrigued me when I heard my hon. friend refer to it the other day. I took the trouble to investigate it. The truth is that that American cartridge company for whom apparently the gentleman named has been so solicitous was selling cartridges in this country at what was represented to be a price less than cost of production.

Mr. YOUNG: By whom was it so represented?

Mr. BENNETT: By the manufacturers of cartridges and by others in this country, the merchants who were dealing in Canadian-made products in competition with the American product. The result was that the minister directed an investigation to be held—not the minister but the administrative branch of the Department of National Revenue. I need hardly point out to so well-informed a gentleman as my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) that these investigations are being held continuously. Investigations are proceeding every day of the year with respect to this much-vexed question of the prices at which goods are being sold, thereby displacing Canadian goods in our markets. This is nothing new. It is not the caprice of a minister; it is a well-established principle of our customs law. Nor has it been in force only since a new government came into being; it was in force during the long years from 1896 to 1911. In fact, it was during those years that it developed, because during the years of the war very little attention was paid to that sort of thing. But since then, with the lowering of currencies in continental Europe, with costs of production fluctuating as they did, it became essential to apply this statute to which I have just referred, based as it is upon the domestic cost and the selling price of the commodity in the country of origin. Bearing that in mind, I am sure the hon. gentleman will realize that there is nothing new in investigations being carried on. In this case the order was issued that pending investigation certain rates of duty should be applied, which involved, of course, the application of the clauses of the statute to which the hon. gentleman has just referred. The result of the investigations was unfavourable to the importer. The dumping duty was removed and the circular went to the customs houses accordingly. Thus vanishes case No. 2. Case No. 3 will also vanish when I tell the hon. gentleman that the automobile interests concerned have decided to establish agencies for the sale of their product in Canada. They have done so, and up to the present time there is no evidence that the conditions to which the hon. gentleman has called attention prevail.

Now I wish to tell the hon. gentleman the principle upon which this administrative action was taken. In a falling market, with surplus production, dealers will offer their commodities for export consumption at a discount which they will not accord to their home consumers. A few months ago my attention was drawn to a particular case in which a Canadian merchant in the city of New York inquired the price at which he could secure silk hose. He was told the price; it was the domestic price. He was then asked where they were to be sold and he replied, in Canada; whereupon a much lower price was quoted. Now to meet that situation is not always easy. On the one hand the ultimate consumer says, "I should be permitted to acquire these goods at the lowest possible price, and if I am fortunate enough, because of surplus production, to acquire that surplus at a lower price than prevails in the country of production, that is all to my advantage." On the other hand, there is the class of Canadian who believes that you cannot maintain industry without variety; for variety is essential to national development. The population cannot all be fishermen or lumbermen or wheat growers; and if variety is necessary there must be some stability in our industrial life. That stability is predicated upon a fair return to the producer, whoever he may be. We should try to see that the farmer, who is the ultimate creator of most of our wealth, receives a fair return. We should try to have the lumberman and the miner, or anyone else engaged in any form of industry, given a fair return. If he does not get a fair return bankruptcy is inevitable; for no man should be in business without some profit, whether it be farming or lumbering or mining or anything else. Under these circumstances I think the committee will agree that some action had to be taken by this country. You could not deal by legislation with every specific case as it arose, and I may assure the committee that the action taken last fall was not taken without much consideration. I leave it to the committee, as I have left it on other occasions, to say how otherwise the situation could be met. A tariff would meet it within bounds, but to meet the extreme cases which I have put to the committee would involve a tariff so high as to make it ridiculous; it would amount in some instances to several hundred per cent. On the other hand I think it is fair to say that notwithstanding occasional outbursts to the contrary there is no hon. member of the committee who does not believe in a tariff of some kind. Certainly I do not think there is any hon. member in my sight who does.

The extent of the tariff depends on what you are endeavouring to do with it. If you seek to use a tariff merely for exploitation, to use the word "protection" in the large sense in which it is sometimes used, then you are wrong. If it is used to give the Canadian an even chance with those who are trying to take his market away from him, then I submit, as I have so often done, that no man properly can urge anything against it. We have endeavoured to meet the class of case where a reasonable rate of tariff fails to accomplish the purpose aimed at, where frec-dom of trade is impossible. We have been compelled to put a value for duty purposes upon that commodity in order that there may be some sort of protection to the Canadian engaged in that industry.

I shall not take up the time of the committee in explaining again the circumstances under which we fixed the rate of discount upon motor cars. It was bound to work some hardship on those who were willing to give any rate of discount in order to get rid of their product. If a man is quoting a rate of discount far beyond what may be regarded as reasonable, something should be done to protect the Canadian against such a practice. We fixed 20 per cent as the arbitrary rate of discount which should be allowed with respect to importations. I agree with the hon. member for Weyburn that in some instances higher discounts have been quoted, but a decision has to be made and a line has to be drawn. I think it is regarded by those who have studied the question that the rate we decided on is a fair one. I regret that at the present time most businesses are not making money; at any rate we fixed it at 20 per cent. I appreciate the point raised by the hon. member, but I think he will be able to ascertain that those who are interested have established Canadian selling agencies to meet the situation. The effect of the new tariff on the higher priced cars may be such as to prove a strong case for an increase of the discount, but that matter will have to be considered on its merits. This is all I have to say regarding the three cases presented to the house by the hon. member. I think he will agree that two have disappeared entirely, and in respect to the third, the producer in the foreign country has met the situation by providing selling agencies in Canada.

Mr. YOUNG: I am not as much alarmed as my right hon. friend over imports at a time when most of our people cannot buy the clothing they need, the boots and shoes they need, the fuel they need or the hundred and one other things they require. I think it little short of a crime that they should be denied the opportunity to buy those things where they can.

Mr. MORAND: Why can they not buy them?

Mr. YOUNG: Largely because of the tariff.

Mr. MORAND: Because they have no work and have no money.

Mr. YOUNG: And one of the principal reasons why they have no work is the tariff.

An hon. MEMBER: If it were not for the tariff there would not be any work.

Mr. YOUNG: I am not alarmed at these things coming into the country. The more goods that come into the country, the more goods will be available for the use of our people. However, if our people were to be given the opportunity to get these goods for nothing, my right hon. friend would not allow them to come in. If our neighbours to the south offered to feed us, clothe us and house us for nothing, the right hon. gentleman would not have it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That would be dumping.

Mr. BENNETT: Our self respect probably would rebel.

Mr. YOUNG: We get the sunlight free and we do not rebel against that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There is no dumping there.

Mr. YOUNG: No country is going to send goods in here for nothing. When we take the goods that are sent in we must produce others to send out to pay for them, so that the more goods we take the more employment there will be at home to produce the goods with which to make payment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friends may laugh, but let one of them get up and disprove that statement. I am delighted to learn that the one instance has been eliminated, that an investigation was made and it was discovered that the charge that these people were dumping cartridges was unfounded and the dump duty is not being collected.

Speaking about baskets, my right hon. friend tells the committee that they were being sold at less than cost. I do not know whether or not his investigators were accurate.

Mr. BENNETT: The cost to the domestic consumer in the country of origin.

Mr. YOUNG: This company was selling these baskets in the United States, the country of production, at the same price as they were selling them to us. The American government was quite willing that that company should go on and operate, whether at a profit or loss. However, our government, taking a benevolent interest in the American manufacturer, say to him: You are not making enough profit, so you must charge Canadians more in order to make more profit. Can you conceive of anything more ridiculous.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No

Mr. YOUNG: The tariff law of this country is being set up and enforced for the sole purpose of guaranteeing profits to American manufacturers. Can you conceive of anything quite so ridiculous?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Hon. members cannot, neither can I.

Mr. PORTEOUS: Did not the hon. member give his support to the Dunning budget?

Mr. YOUNG: There were no dumping duties in the Dunning budget. What I am referring to is the amendments to the tariff which were not touched by the Dunning budget.

Mr. PORTEOUS: The hon. member is talking as a free trader; he never talked as a free trader when a member of the government.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member was not here at the time, so he does not know what I talked about.

An hon. MEMBER: But he is going to be here for a long time.

Mr. YOUNG: With regard to automobiles, my right hon. friend says that the difficulty has been overcome by the American manufacturers establishing agencies in Canada. That may be true as applied to automobiles, but every exporter of goods to this country cannot establish agencies here. A manufacturer of a small article cannot come over here and establish selling agencies in order to function in such a way as to escape the duty. The only remedy is to amend the act so that this cannot occur.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, it is not my desire to delay the committee, but one point has been brought out in the debate, especially in the remarks of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), to which I would like to refer. I think the committee is aware that I have no objection to a reasonable dumping law; in fact I applied it myself when I was at the head of the department. I do not intend to deal with the application of the dump where goods are brought into Canada to be sold at less than the cost of production, but I should like to refer to what might be termed a typical case, that of automibiles. I am speaking of the importation of automobiles at normal prices and in normal times, not in times of over-production or slaughter conditions in the country of origin. As explained by the hon. member for Weyburn and referred to by myself the other day, suppose an automobile is invoiced at a list price of $1,000. With a bona fide discount of 30 per cent the car will be billed at $700 net to the dealer in Canada. But the Dominion government or the Department of National Revenue has decided that the fixed discount for purposes of duty shall be only 20 per cent. That means that the discount allowable for duty purposes is only $200 although the actual discount to the Canadian dealer is $300. In other words, although the price at which the automobile enters Canada is really $700, the Department of National Revenue applies the tariff on the sum of $800. That makes the duty higher. I have no fault to find with the fixing of the discount at 20 per cent, but it seems to me that it is going far enough to collect an additional duty on the extra $100, the result of the reduction of the discount from 30 per cent to 20 per cent. The point I want to make particularly is that made by the hon. member for Weyburn. It surely would be a pity if the Canadian dealer, in order to escape paying the dumping duty of $100, the difference between the actual price of $700 and the amount of $800 fixed by the department as the value for duty were to pay that extra $100 to the United States dealer, who does not really want it because he is getting sufficient profit when he sells the car at $700. Surely some other means could be found to serve the purpose the government has in view. The Minister of Finance says that what is suggested does not happen; that the United States automobile manufacturers will overcome that by establishing their own branches in Canada. That may be true in a practical sense.

Mr. BENNETT: I mean sales branches.

Mr. EULER: The dumping duty of which I have spoken may never have been applied; I do not know. But I doubt whether every automobile manufacturer in the United States would or could establish or find it worth while to establish his own branch in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: What I meant was not manufacturing branches but sales branches.

Mr. EULER: I understand. The manufacturer in the United States must of necessity be the proprietor of that branch and, I suppose, take a loss in his Canadian branch because he can only get a 30 per cent discount by establishing his own branch.

The same principle will apply not only to automobiles but to any other commodity. In September last the government did two things affecting the importation of automobiles. By order in council they gave authority to the Minister of National Revenue to fix any value for duty on any commodity imported, and on automobiles they fixed the discount at 20 per cent. I think the minister will agree that if in regard not only to automobiles but to other commodities as well that heavy dumping duty is charged as a result of fixing an arbitrary value, it will indeed be unfortunate, particularly if the money goes into the pocket of the foreign manufacturer rather than into the treasury of Canada. It occurs to me, that since the government have taken the power to fix values they might say this: We will fix values of automobiles, if you like, at such a sum that when the regular tariff rate is applied it will serve our purpose without our having to apply the dumping duty. I was going to make this suggestion for the consideration of the minister, that where an arbitrary value has already been fixed at a point sufficiently high for all practical purposes, the dumping duty should not apply. That would avoid all possibility of those moneys going into the pockets of the United States manufacturer rather than into the Dominion treasury, and would at the same time serve the purpose of protecting the Canadian manufacturer of automobiles or of any other commodity.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend remembers the difficulty he had in dealing with fruits and vegetables, a difficulty which he overcame practically by utilizing the dumping duty—although he called it by another name. Fruits and vegetables cannot be successfully dealt with unless recourse is had to the principle involved in the dumping duty. What the hon. member has said relates to a matter that has seriously engaged the attention of the government, as to just how it can be met and made of universal application, which is what one should endeavour to attain. Except in the manner I have indicated, we have not yet been able to discover a more suitable method.

Mr. EULER: I quite appreciate the difficulties that arise in the administration of the act—

Mr. BENNETT: These are emergent conditions.

Mr. EULER: —but there should be no great difficulty—if there is an emergency or if it is desired to give protection without raising the tariff rate—in fixing the value at such a figure that the purpose will be served without the necessity of applying that excessive—for it is excessive—dumping duty.

Mr. BENNETT: Automobiles happen to be a commodity in regard to which there are serious difficulties, because they are charged on a list price, and you cannot very well fix for duty, as you can in connection with other commodities, a price at variance with the list price. My hon. friend is quite familiar with the difficulty, and I do not in any sense minimize it. But I know of no method of universal application of dealing with it except that which I indicated last fall, again a few days ago, and again to-night.

Mr. YOUNG: The Minister of Finance spoke of United States manufacturers of automobiles establishing their own sales agencies in Canada. I suppose when they did that they dismissed all their Canadian agents.

Mr. BENNETT: It was for the purpose of giving them employment, according to the letters they gave to me. Many of them owned agencies here anyway through stock control, and they said they wanted to continue their organizations. They did not care to drop the Canadian market with all that was involved and to permit the organizations which they had built up during the years to perish simply because we are living in times of great economic stress. Two or three sent communications of that kind.

Mr. YOUNG: I refer to a Canadian dealer in automobiles having the agency for two or three makes in the United States. Was he notified that his services would no longer be required because they were now going to open branches of their own?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Owing to the date the duties become effective it is thought desirable to adopt the language in connection with the duty payments that was adopted by the late Mr. Fielding in 1906, which is the standard clause. The one originally in the bill was one of ten years previous. The amendment I desire to have moved is to meet the situation as it is to-day.

Mr. RHODES: I move to substitute the following for subsection 5 on page 27 of the bill:

5. This act shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of June, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the preceding sections imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for consumption for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Provided, that goods which were imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption, and on which duty was paid, on and after the second day of June, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one, in accordance with the rates of duty set forth as payable on such goods in the resolutions respecting the customs tariff introduced in the House of Commons on the first day of the said month, shall not be subject to further payment of duty, by reason of such rate of duty having been increased by any resolution introduced subsequent to that in accordance with which such duty was paid.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the schedules carry, as amended?

Schedules as amended, agreed to on division.

Mr. BOTHWELL: There is one item in connection with the tariff schedules of last September on which I wish to speak. Will an opportunity be given for that?

Mr. BENNETT: I will defer the third reading to afford my hon. friend the opportunity.

Mr. HEENAN: I move to amend the bill by adding the following as section 18:

The governor in council may direct from time to time that any industry, the products of which receive protection under this act, shall demonstrate to the satisfaction of the governor in council that freedom of association for employees for all lawful purposes is permitted in the operation of such industry, and that the hours of labour and rates of wages are observed consistent with the provisions of the labour part of the treaty of Versailles concluded at Paris, France, on June 28, 1919.

I discussed this amendment on a previous occasion and I will not discuss it further to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: As I stated previously to the committee, inasmuch as the tariff board is authorized to deal with these matters this bill is not the place for such an amendment, and we cannot accept it as an amendment to this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The tariff board gets a chance to deal with it only if the Minister of Finance asks them so to do.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the same as this. The governor in council has to do it, and that is the minister.

Mr. HEENAN: Of course, I am not in a position to have the amendment carried if the Prime Minister says no. I wish, however, to discuss it briefly on the third reading.

I would ask the Prime Minister if he has not some statement to make to clear up a misunderstanding in connection with a statement I made in the house when I quoted from a paper called Labor, printed in Washington. I have copies of certain correspondence in connection with the matter, and I would ask the Prime Minister if he wishes to make a statement with respect to it.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. BENNETT: I have no statement to make. I merely read the memorandum that was submitted to me.

Mr. HEENAN: I mean a statement in rebuttal from a Canadian source.

Mr. BENNETT: I received a letter this morning from the president of the company enclosing a letter from Washington dealing with the matter, the details of which I do not carry in my head at the moment.

Amendment (Mr. Heenan) negatived, on division.

Bill reported.

Mr. REID: Will an opportunity be given to discuss the tariff items of last September?

Mr. BENNETT: I promised that facilities would be afforded hon. gentlemen to discuss the September items. I thought they were going to do it to-night. I thought that was what the hon. member for Weyburn was doing. I understand, however, that the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) desires to add to the gaiety of nations by a few observations on one item, and that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) also desires to speak, so on the third reading that opportunity could be afforded if that is satisfactory to hon. gentlemen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will furnish the opportunity that is desired with regard to this measure?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, only this, of course

Mr. NEILL: There would not be opportunity for debate on the third reading?

Mr. BENNETT: If I had known that an opportunity for debate was desired I would have left the bill in committee, but it has now been reported and the amendments have been concurred in.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has spoken about giving an opportunity to discuss certain items of the tariff of last September. When that opportunity is afforded, might not these other matters be also discussed?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no objection. I tried to explain. The committee will realize that it is not my fault because I did state twice that hon. gentlemen had an opportunity to speak this evening, and I thought they had carried out their intention to speak. I see, however, that I did them an injustice. I suggest that on one of the items in the estimates of the Minister of Finance facilities be afforded for unlimited speech, just as long as hon. gentlemen desire to continue it. I agree to that, if it is satisfactory to my hon. friends.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 24, 1931.

The house met at three o'clock.

DUTY VALUE OF MELONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) to a matter which is of concern to many of the people whom I have the honour to represent. In Essex county this year we have the largest acreage of melons ever grown in that county, and our crop is ready for the market. On July 6 the Department of Agriculture recommended to the Department of National Revenue that duty values be established on July 25. To-morrow is July 25, and I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he will see that these values for duty purposes are established to-morrow.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that I will discuss the matter with my colleagues.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 113, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Parading while nude.

Mr. ESLING: I am confident that all hon. members will be in accord with this amendment, the primary purpose of which is to provide more fitting punishment for a fanatical class of Doukhobors who defy our Canadian laws by gathering on public highways and in close proximity to the highways in an absolutely nude condition. I want to give members of this committee what might be called a close-up view—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ESLING: I hope the chairman will understand that I am speaking metaphorically when I say I want to give hon. members a close-up view of this fanatical class. While hon. members may get some amusement from it I should like them to understand that this is a very serious situation.

These people were brought to Canada as far back as 1898. They were bonused to come here; a huge acreage of land was set aside for them in Saskatchewan and the government went to considerable expense in placing them upon that land and getting them started. Shortly after 1900 a large number came to the district of West Kootenay and settled in that beautiful valley along the Kootenay river between the city of Nelson and the Columbia river. To-day in that district there are some three thousand of these people, who are divided into three groups. First there is the community group, living in one section and directed by their leader, Peter Veregin. And then there is an independent group composed of Doukhobors who have purchased land of their own and withdrawn from the community. Then there is a third or fanatical group who are usually known as the sons of freedom. They lead the procession in these nude parades and exhibitions.

The three peculiarities of Doukhobors and particularly of the fanatics are these. First of all, there is arson, they do not hesitate for one moment to burn anything. Their second peculiarity is nude parading. And the third is defiance of the law. They have absolutely no regard for Canadian law. First of all they burn schools; they burn churches; they dynamite public halls. The department of the Postmaster General has before it now a claim for damage done to a federal post office which was dynamited only a short time ago. Then they show their defiance of the law by refusing to register births, deaths or marriages. Nobody knows who is who among these fanatics. They proceed in this country on the assumption that the land is God's land and they know no laws but God's law. They do not intend, therefore, to subject themselves to the laws of any province or of the Dominion. When I say they refuse to pay taxes, I mean that they refuse to contribute to the community treasury for the payment of taxes on community-owned land.

To bring to the house the seriousness of the situation I may point out that the party represented by hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for the coming to Canada of these Doukhobors. They brought them here; do not let them forget that. They have a lot to answer for. These people were brought in in 1898, when they were given land and a cash bonus. In 1912, after the Conservative government had come into power, they said, "We want no more Doukhobors." They are invading all the fields of labour. They know no hours of work, and no rates of wages. In 1912 the Conservative government put up the bars. They said they would have no more of it. And that prohibition continued until 1926, when the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie King), anticipating an election and thinking they might be of great help to his party, took down the bars again. But immediately this government came into power they stopped the further entry of Doukhobors.

We realize that the provincial government is responsible for the enforcement of law. But there are circumstances beyond which it is impossible for a provincial government to go. The costs are too great, and if the truth must be told—and I say this advisedly—these people are numerically too strong for this government or the provincial government to keep them within bounds. I have always contended and still contend that the federal government, having brought them here, must share the responsibility for their conduct and the cost of their maintenance while here.

Hon. gentlemen think it trifling for me to refer to fires, but it is not an occasional fire that takes place. I have just received from the Minister of Education in British Columbia a list of schools which have been burned, and the information will be almost appalling to the house. I will mention only those fires that have occurred from June 1929 to the end of the year. In that time they burned seven schools valued at $14,700. They were small country schools. In April 1930 they burned a community hall valued at $2,500. On July 1—it will be seen that these fires are close together—they burned another school valued at $2,200, and the same night they dynamited a brick school which cost $7,700. And then we come to Christmas of 1930. At a place called Thrums they were preparing the Christmas tree. A boy got out of a car with a basket of toys and tree trimmings, and just as he was proceeding to the hall the place blew up. It was only his lucky detention for a few minutes that saved his life. Now we come to March 1931—that is since we have been here. In that month three schools were burned. On June 2 they destroyed one and attempted to burn another, and they burned the Presbyterian church. These fires all take place at about the same hour, eleven o'clock at night. They cut the telephone wires and take particular care to avoid discovery.

I have another letter from the Minister of Education in British Columbia, which gives a good idea of the situation. He states that by reason of these fires it is necessary for all schools to be guarded. In his letter of June 1, he says:

> I am quite sure that if the guards were taken away the schools would all very shortly be burned.

He cites this particular school at Krestova in the district adjoining mine, where he says the fire started while two Canadian teachers were asleep in the building.

As for the statement that the cost of the provincial government is too great, I would point out that the loss by fire in this district in the past two years amounts to a total of $50,000. These fanatics have destroyed schools, churches and community halls to that value. And in the rampage of 1929, to arrest the Doukhobors and keep them in gaol six months cost the provincial government $35,000. There you have $85,000 of actual loss and expenditure to govern a community of some 4,000. Hon. gentlemen who live in places with a population of about 3,500 know that the policing of such places does not cost more than $5,000 per annum.

I want to come now to the matter of community parades, and I am sure I shall have the most rapt attention.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What do you mean, "rapt"?

Mr. EULER: "Unwrapped", I should say.

Mr. ESLING: Let me explain. This does not mean one person here or there disrobing for the benefit of passersby; the fact is that these people gather in groups of fifty and seventy-five, marching along the highways and through the fields. And in other instances they make special exhibitions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ESLING: This is not a laughing matter. I want the committee to appreciate the seriousness of it. During a recent convention of the farmers' institute, one whole morning was spent discussing the seriousness of this situation. It might come home more closely to hon. members if they had their life savings tied up in a ten-acre plot of ground and a Doukhobor came along and bought the land alongside. Only one thing can be done—move out.

There was the great rampage of 1929 and then another only a few weeks ago. The last letter I received from this district states that the Doukhobors are again on the rampage. One lady writes me that as her children were coming from school they were confronted with a number of naked Doukhobor men and women. She tells me of two little girls who were on their way to her house and who came rushing in frantic and shocked by the fact that two naked Doukhobor men had accosted them on a public highway. The committee will remember the recent rampage into Nelson when 108 of these naked Doukhobors were placed in gaol. They had started a trek of some ten miles and as they approached Nelson the fire trucks and all other kinds of trucks and wagons were used to barricade their way.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. ESLING: It will not be carried for a while. Twenty-four special constables were sworn in to assist the provincial police. One of these constables had a naked Doukhobor woman on each arm, and they just picked him up as if he were matchwood, laid him down on the road, and sat on him, one on his head, and one on his body.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. ESLING: If we could take some of the long, thin hon. members opposite or some of the short, thick ones and put them down in the middle of the road on a hot August day with two naked Doukhobor women weighing 300 pounds sitting on them, then they would probably realize that these people are beyond control of the law.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ESLING: I am glad to hear hon. members laugh because such laughter reflects the attitude of indifference taken during the last six years by both the provincial and federal governments. These Doukhobors have burned churches, school houses and buildings; they have torn the uniforms from inspectors, the tunics from police officers and the clothing from federal enumerators. They have used sticks of cordwood on the provincial police; they defy the law by refusing to contribute to the provincial treasury. They refuse to register births, marriages, and deaths, and they practise and preach open defiance to Canadian law.

This is the description of a situation almost inconceivable in Canada, and yet these are the people by whose votes the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie King) hoped to defeat the Conservative candidate in West Kootenay. Some of these people enjoy the franchise because they were born in Canada, and I ask the committee if it can conceive of the great Liberal party being reduced to the extremity of encouraging such a class of people to vote. The Liberal workers went out into the hills and valleys to bring these people to the polls to vote at the last federal general election. On the morning of election day the Conservative candidate published a statement that he did not want a single Doukhobor vote, and I am proud to say that he did not get one. When the right hon. gentleman publishes his memoirs I hope he will include a picture of this memorable happening on July 28 last. Just imagine a milling mass of men and women who could not speak English with the Liberal workers showing them how to mark their "X" after the name of the Liberal condidate. These Doukhobors were receiving their orders from Peter Veregin, so that one man controlled the votes of 1,500 people. They were challenged, but challenging did not do much good because it was impossible to know who was who. The scrutineers did not know what their names were or where they came from. All oaths had to be taken through an interpreter and when the polls were closed there were 600 Doukhobors on the outside trying to get in. The Conservative agents saw that the polls were closed on time, and that oaths were administered to all who applied for ballots. The Conservative candidate polled two votes from returned men who happened to be agents there. The Labour man got one vote, and—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ESLING: —the Liberal candidate got the other 248 votes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GOTT: The chairman must call order.

An hon. MEMBER: He did, but not very loudly.

An hon. MEMBER: He did.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ESLING: I want the committee to realize the debauchery of the great Liberal party in the last federal election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member should confine his remarks to the section before the committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is the hon. member's speech of the session.

Mr. ESLING: I am referring to the amendment to the criminal code which provides for a three year term in the penitentiary in place of the six months' imprisonment which is now the penalty for Doukhobors who go naked. If this amendment had been in force two years ago, these naked fanatics would not have been able to vote for the Liberal candidate.

The provincial government has amended its elections act to disqualify from voting any Doukhobors or others, male or female, born in the province or elsewhere, who claim exemption from military service. These Doukhobors were admitted to Canada unconditionally exempt from military service. I look to this government to bring in a similar amendment before another election is held. Those who are not willing to fight for their country, should not be permitted to run it. If this amendment is not effective, I would suggest that in so far as the men are concerned, other means should be taken to restrain their exhibitions. Perhaps the most effective means would be the lash. Some citizens have suggested that these people should be placed on a couple of islands out on the Pacific.

I am sure that the committee, after hearing what is the true state of affairs, will take a more serious view of the Doukhobor situation in this country. I know some hon. members may get some amusement out of this, but let me tell them that the men, women and, indeed, whole families who are subjected to these obscene exhibitions are not in a very comfortable position. I am sure if hon. members lived amongst these Doukhobors they would feel just the same as do those who complain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This clause in the bill has been drafted to meet a situation which has certainly a very serious aspect. The actions of a particular portion of the community known as the Doukhobors, more especially in British Columbia and perhaps also in Saskatchewan, have become nothing short of a menace and an insult to all right thinking people who live in certain portions of those provinces. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Department of Justice by the government of British Columbia, particularly by the premier and the attorney general, and also by certain organizations and individuals of that province. The description of these nude parades as related to the committee by the hon. member for West Kootenay who has just taken his seat, has not been overdrawn. I have heard similar stories from officials of the province of British Columbia. The trouble is that the section of our criminal law which now applies to indecent exposure is not sufficient in the way of penalty to stop these parades. The present law provides that a fine of $50 and a term of six months' imprisonment at hard labour may be imposed. The provincial authorities have had many prosecutions and both fine and imprisonment have been imposed, but this has not had the desired effect on these fanatical people who insist on carying on these nude parades.

It has been suggested by those who know the situation best that if the penalty were increased as proposed in this bill to a maximum of three years' imprisonment, probably the most fanatical of this particular community would be made to respect the law. They look upon the shorter term of six months as more or less of a holiday and as no very serious punishment at all, and they openly boast that they are being kept at the expense of the province. It is suggested that these penalties be increased. I think the committee will agree that these nude parades as they take place now in these Doukhobor communities, should be stopped. They are, as I say, an insult and a menace to the right thinking people who live in those particular portions of Canada. With that end in view these amendments have been prepared; I think we have covered the case as fully as we can in the language we have used, and I would ask the committee seriously to consider these clauses.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What would the minister consider necessary in the way of clothing so that a person will not be liable under paragraph (d)?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The last sentence provides it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is pretty vague.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is not. It reads:

> For the purposes of this subsection anyone shall be deemed to be nude who is so scantily clad as to offend against public decency or order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But that will leave it pretty much to the discretion of the judge as to what sort of costume offends against public decency. After all, we have heard much about the Doukhobors this afternoon, but this clause does not mention them at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. It applies to anybody.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It might be made to apply to bathers at many fashionable resorts. I think my hon. friend will agree with me on that. There are people who are more severe and strict in their views of this than others. I am quite sure some judges would find that a certain bathing suit does not accord with public morality, whereas others would find the same costume absolutely correct. I know there is a difficulty in striking a proper description of what would constitute a crime, but I am afraid the clause as it reads is a little vague.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think we can depend upon the discretion and good sense of the judge who hears the case. In many instances under our criminal law we have to depend upon the good sense of our judges and juries

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have to help them though.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The language of the clause is:

> Anyone shall be deemed to be nude who is so scantly clad as to offend against public decency or order.

That is taken in connection with the foregoing that they must be parading.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It does not apply to parading at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Just a minute. Let me read:

> Everyone is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to three years' imprisonment who, while nude,
> (a) is found in any public place in company with one or more—

There must be at least two. A single individual would not be prosecuted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, under paragraph (a) but not under paragraph (c).

Mr. GUTHRIE: The clause reads:

> Everyone is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to three years' imprisonment who, while nude,
> (a) is found in any public place in company with one or more persons who are parading or have assembled with intent to parade or have paraded in such public place while nude, or
> (b) is found in any public place in company with one or more other persons, or
> (c) is found without lawful excuse upon any private property not his own, whether alone or in company with other persons, or > (d) appears upon his own property so as to be exposed to the public view, whether alone on in company with other persons.

The last two paragraphs referring to a person appearing alone upon his own property or upon that of his neighbour would be sufficient.

Mr. JACOBS: Does that apply to public theatricals and theatres? I do not see anything which protects them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It applies only to places mentioned in the bill.

Mr. JACOBS: A theatre is sometimes a public place.

Mr. MULLINS: I am quite in sympathy with what the hon. member for West Kootenay has said. I saw the parade of the Doukhobors from Yorkton some years after they had arrived in this country. They came through the constituency of Marquette and one cannot compare the wearing of bathing suits with their nudity. I have seen bathing suits from Hollywood and I have also seen these Doukhobors parading through the constituency of Marquette, and the sight of the Doukhobors was most appalling. I am quite in sympathy with driving out of my part of Canada those individuals who will parade nude through the streets. We rounded these men up in Minnedosa and shipped them back to Yorkton. I am sorry my hon. friend has them in Kootenay.

Mr. JACOBS: Might I press my question on the Minister of Justice as to whether there is any protection for theatres?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no need of protection for theatres.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Do people need to go nude in theatres in Montreal?

Mr. JACOBS: But some of those who appear on the stage are, to put it mildly, scantily attired.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If they offend against public decency, they come under this measure.

Mr. JACOBS: That is a question of opinion. To some they offend against public decency where as to others they do not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is in the discretion of our judges and juries.

Mr. FACTOR: Is it the intention of the minister to make the penalty three years for a first offence, or not exceeding three years? The way it reads, a first offender would have to receive a penalty of three years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Three years is the maximum penalty, but any less penalty may be imposed.

Mr. NEILL: The Minister of Justice said just now, quite properly, that we could always trust to the good sense of judges and juries, but these people are not going to be tried by judges and juries, but upon summary conviction by one or more justices of the peace, and three years' imprisonment is a very heavy penalty to be left to the discretion of two justices of the peace. I do not know any other section of the criminal code where the penalty is three years' imprisonment on summary conviction.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, yes. Police magistrates or justices of the peace have power to impose very long terms, much longer than three years in many cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it not a fact that paragraphs (a) and (b) as distinguished from paragraphs (c) and (d) are to exempt the individual who parades in a public place alone in the nude.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Paragraphs (a) and (b) refer to more than one person. Paragraph (c) would include one person or more than one person, and so would paragraph (d).

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So if an individual paraded in the nude in a public place alone this section would not apply?

Mr. JACOBS: What about turkish baths and places of that sort?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That would not be a parade, as I understand it. It comes under paragraph (c) or (d) if he is alone.

Mr. SPENCER: It seems to me that the second part of paragraph (d) is loosely drawn. I agree entirely with the Minister of Justice that certain people might think that certain bathing costumes are all sufficient while others would have bathers put on dress which would be just about as good as jumping into the water with your clothes on. It seems to me that something should be added there to protect bathers who appear in the ordinary costume.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not quite catch the last part of the question.

Mr. SPENCER: It seems to me that something should be added to this clause to free from penalty in any shape or form those who appear in reasonable bathing costume.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The last clause is intended to apply to them. This is only intended to apply to people who are nude or so scantily clad as to offend against public decency. In reply to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre there might be an improvement made there by adding after the word "place" in the first line of paragraph (a) and after the word "place" in the first line of paragraph (b) the words "whether alone or," so that it would read "is found in any public place whether alone or in company with one or more other persons." I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. BURY: Might I ask whether the first paragraph does not cover sufficiently the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre? Anyone appearing singly in a public place nude comes under the provision with respect to a person doing an indecent act where the public have access.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That carries only a six months' penalty.

Mr. BURY: I suppose the idea was that stronger penalties were to be provided for these parades. The first subsection already provides for the ordinary act of indecency by a single person.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It seems to me that under paragraph (b) a justice of the peace who had strong views as to the amount of clothing a bather should wear could enforce drastic penalties if he so desired, on the ground that they were scantily or indecently clad.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is an appeal against that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, but you are making these extreme penalties applicable, and the law now is sufficient to protect against that sort of thing.

Amendment (Mr. Guthrie) agreed to.

Mr. COOTE: Was there any definition in the criminal code before of the word nude?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. Nude has, of course, a meaning. It means without clothes, naked.

Mr. COOTE: I think some difficulty arises in connection with paragraph (d). Recently a magistrate in Toronto expressed the opinion that a woman would not be properly dressed for bathing unless she was covered from her neck to her knees. Few modern bathing suits would comply with that requirement, yet that particular magistrate would probably find justification in this clause for imposing a very severe penalty for those who were not so clad.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5.—Publication of false advertisements to promote sales, etc.

Mr. EULER: It seems to me that there is a contradiction in terms in this section. It says "contains any statement of fact which is untrue." Now a fact is a fact. A fact contains the truth, and a statement of fact or an enunciation of a fact must be true. It seems to me there is inconsistency there, and

I was going to suggest something of this kind to carry out the intention, to substitute for the present language the words "what purports to be a fact, but which is untrue, deceptive or misleading."

Mr. GUTHRIE: We could meet that difficulty by simply striking out the words "of fact."

Mr. JACOBS: It might be a statement of law, and then we would have to go to the privy council to find out whether it was true or not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is another consideration with respect to this section to which I would direct the attention of the committee. Formerly the penalty was provided for one who "knowingly" publishes, and the real change that is made here is to strike out the word "knowingly." The question has been raised by some very prominent business people in Canada as to the propriety of striking out that word, and of putting a saving clause at the end of the section. They represent that many bona fide advertisers are mistaken in some of the statements they make, through no fault of their own in many cases, and that it is hard to penalize them for statements innocently made. The difficulty with the word "knowingly" in the clause as it now stands is that it imposes upon the prosecution the burden of proving that a certain thing was stated knowing it to be false or untrue, and very often the prosecution is not able to prove that knowledge on the part of the accused, and consequently the prosecution fails. If the word "knowingly" is struck out the section becomes much broader, as the committee will see. It has been suggested that a saving clause to this effect should be added at the end of the section:

Provided further that in any prosecution under this subsection a case may be dismissed if it be established to the satisfaction of the court upon proper evidence that the accused acted in good faith,—

In other words, if it can be proved that he did not knowingly mislead by the statements he made. If this amendment were put in, the onus would be upon the accused to show that he had acted in good faith, and if he had so acted and convinced the court of that fact the court might forgive him of his offence. In the present section the word "knowingly" appears and the result is that prosecutions have failed because the crown has not been able to establish the fact a man has knowingly inserted a false advertisement, knowing it to be false. The amendment was originally asked for by many clubs, better business associations, boards of trade and the like in Canada. I have no very definite views upon the subject, but I must say that the saving clause I have suggested might be advantageous.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would it be added to the present proviso?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, at the end of the present section. Then as my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has pointed out, I think an amendment might be made by changing the words "which contains any statement of fact which is untrue, deceptive or misleading" to the words "which contains any statement which is untrue, deceptive or misleading."

Mr. EULER: That is all right.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We would be striking out the two words "of fact" in line twenty-nine of section 5 of the bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does the minister so move?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have merely made a statement to the committee.

Mr. BURY: The only point I see concerning the words "statement of fact" is that such statements might be considered by the courts in contradistinction to statements of law. It is usual and proper to talk about statements of fact as distinguished from statements of law without implying that a statement of fact is per se true. The words "of fact" are used in contradistinction to show that a statement of law is not intended. I had thought that was the intention of the amendment. If so I believe the words should be left in the section.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think the words are of great importance, one way or the other. My hon. friend from East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) may be right. We do not however find statements of law in connection with sales of goods. I would not pay much attention to the suggestion of my hon. friend in that connection. I think if the words "which contains any statement which is untrue" are in the section they will be sufficient to cover the points in question.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. MORAND: I wonder if by removing the words "of fact" merchants who advertise reductions from $4.00 to $3.99 would be affected. Such advertisements would in fact be untrue, deceptive and misleading. Yet he would not be making a statement concerning the kind of goods advertised.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If a merchant cuts his price, what more is there to it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not misleading.

Mr. MORAND: That is not what the act is intended for.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I prefer that the words "of fact" should remain in. If, however, the committee prefers they be struck out I have no serious objection.

Mr. EULER: I am not a lawyer and I cannot express a legal opinion, but from the standpoint of an ordinary man the expression that a statement of fact is untrue is absolutely absurd.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it is not absurd. There are statements of fact and statements of law to which reference is made every day in courts. On statements of such and such a fact comments may be made, and on statements of law other comments are in order. Certainly there is a distinction.

Mr. EULER: I am speaking as an ordinary layman, not as a lawyer.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think the section is particularly affected, no matter which way we leave it. I prefer that it should remain as it stands, but if the committee thinks the words "of fact" should come out, I have no objection.

Mr. EULER: Strike them out.

Mr. MARCIL: In the section before us there is protection for newspapers, but no protection for the ordinary printer who publishes circulars.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend is referring to the publisher of advertising circulars which are passed around?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This section provides only:

> Provided that any newspaper publishing any such advertisement accepted in good faith in the ordinary course of its business shall not be subject to the provisions of this subsection.

I think the words in the section ought to meet the case my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. MARCIL: The printer who, in good faith, publishes a circular should in law be protected as much as the newspapers.

Mr. NEILL: Would not the minister consider an amendment which would extend to the persons who caused to be published any particular advertisement? For instance, a real estate man might in good faith advertise that a railroad was going to pass through a particular town. Time might prove that his statement was deceptive. The amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice apparently applies only to newspaper publishers. Should not such protection be given to a person who causes an advertisement to be published?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The man who caused it to be published is protected in the first part of the section. If the amendment I last submitted were carried, certainly he would be protected. If in good faith he published a statement about a railroad he would be protected.

Mr. NEILL: I thought the minister said the section applied only to newspapers?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was a further amendment which I said had been submitted to cover the case my hon. friend has in mind. I prefer the section as it stands now, with the amendment which was suggested and which I read a few moments ago. The result would be that the section would stand as it is, with the following amendment:

> Provided further that in any prosecution under this subsection a case may be dismissed if it be established to the satisfaction of the court upon proper evidence that the accused acted in good faith.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The words "the accused" would cover every class of people.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Guthrie moves that subsection (2) of section 5 of the bill be amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

> Provided further that in any prosecution under this subsection a case may be dismissed if it be established to the satisfaction of the court upon proper evidence that the accused acted in good faith.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend intend to delete the two words "of fact"?

Mr. GUTHRIE: On second thought I believe the words ought to remain in the section. There is a distinction between a statement of law and a statement of fact.

Mr. EULER: The minister cannot say that a statement of fact could be untrue.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes a statement of fact can be untrue.

Mr. EULER: A statement of fact can never be untrue; that is ridiculous.

Mr. JACOBS: I agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). A statement is a fact or it is not a fact.

Mr. EULER: It is absurd, absolutely, and no harm will be done by making a change.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. EULER: I am content to strike out the words "of fact." I made another suggestion however.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What was it?

Mr. EULER: I would suggest the following words "a statement of what purports to be a fact but which is untrue, deceptive or misleading." The minister will note the words "what purports to be a fact."

Mr. GUTHRIE: This section was pretty carefully drawn by the law officers of the department, and they seemed to think it was right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We know how these officials sometimes do these things.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am rather inclined to trust their judgment more than my own in the matter.

Mr. YOUNG: But this is to be interpreted by men who are not lawyers.

Mr. EULER: I would suggest to the minister that you cannot do any harm by changing it, and it would appear absurd to the average man as it is now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But I do not think that apparent absurdity to the average man would be an absurdity before a court, which would understand what was a statement of fact.

Mr. EULER: But many magistrates are not trained in the law.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I will ask my colleague the hon. member for Argenteuil to move that the words "of fact" in line 29 be struck out.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I beg to move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 6 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Soliciting or carrying on business of insurance.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is merely to repeal the clause which was declared ultra vires by the privy council.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—False fire alarms.

Mr. EULER: What is the penalty there?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Imprisonment for up to one year.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the penalty now?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it either comes under the mischief clause or under municipal by-laws. This is inserted at the instance of the city of Toronto in particular, and of one other city in the west.

Mr. JACOBS: It seems to me some distinction should be made with regard to the age of the offender or offenders. Very often this is a popular prank with boys in large cities.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The criminal code takes care of that now; they are excused up to a certain age.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Injury to animals.

Mr. BROWN: What is the reason for that expression "not being cattle"?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Cattle and horses are provided for by other sections of the criminal code; this is for other animals which are not provided for.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister says cattle and horses are provided for under other sections, so why should not the word "horses" be included here also?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The word "cattle" under the criminal code includes horses as well.

Mr. YOUNG: Does this prevent the killing of a dog?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suppose it would. This is the section we passed last session, but that amendment of last year only applied to attempts to kill. This makes the actual killing an offence as well. I see that in the original section, before the amendment of last session, the word "wilfully" was inserted. Perhaps it would be well to have that word here also.

Mr. YOUNG: Would not the word "maliciously" be better?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was thinking of both words.

Mr. ARTHURS: Or "unlawfully."

Mr. BROWN: Does not the change take away the provision for an attempt to kill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The attempt is covered by the amendment of last session, and we are changing that section to make both the killing and the attempt to kill an offence. I think "wilfully or maliciously" will cover it.

Mr. YOUNG: But you can kill wilfully and still be justified.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree that the word "wilfully" should go in there, but the word "maliciously" means something else.

Mr. ARTHURS: Under certain laws of the province of Ontario a man is allowed to kill a dog legally when it is found pursuing various animals, and in certain other cases. A man might want to kill his own dog. I think the word unlawfully should be placed in this amendment.

Mr. SPENCER: Very often dogs become a nuisance, killing chickens or worrying sheep. Something ought to be done to prevent that sort of thing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The law allows you to kill a dog under those circumstances. The word unlawfully might be added before the word kills.

Mr. YOUNG: You would have to have reference to other laws to know what that meant.

Mr. BENNETT: No one can lawfully wound or maim.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Should not the word unlawfully be put before the word attempts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. I move that the section be amended to read:

Unlawfully kills, maims, wounds, poisons or injures, or unlawfully attempts to kill. . . .

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 13—Summary trial in certain cases.

Mr. MARCIL: In my district jury trials are very rare. Sometimes three or four years elapse before a jury is summoned. Trials are held by the magistrate. What offences are now to be referred to the magistrate? What changes are being made?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no change.

Mr. MARCIL: If there is no change I am satisfied. There are Indian reserves where cases of attempted murder are tried before the magistrate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no change.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Formal judgment to specify grounds in law on which dissent is based.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister state the law as it is? I have it in mind but I am not certain.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: At the present time a person convicted may appeal to the court of appeal on any ground of appeal which involves a question of law alone; or, with leave of the court of appeal, upon the certificate of the trial judge that it is a case for appeal, on any ground of appeal which involves a question of fact alone or a question of mixed law and fact; or, with the leave of the court of appeal, on any other ground which appears to the court of appeal to be a sufficient ground for appeal—that is, to the court of appeal of the province. From that court of appeal there is an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada when there is a difference of opinion between the judges in the appellate court of the province.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And the dissenting judge must give his reasons.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. This section has been suggested by the judges of the supreme court.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of Canada?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. It seems that when appeals go there and the stated reasons are given as the grounds for appeal, it frequently happens that the reasons argued before the appellate division here are not at all those stated in the reasons. Often, new ground is taken for the very first time in the whole case. The judges in the court of appeal think that the appeal should be taken upon the stated grounds, and that only the grounds which are stated, upon which the appeal is based, should be argued before the appellate court here. The subsection now proposed reads:

(6) Whenever an appeal under this section is dismissed by the court of appeal, and any judge of such court expresses an opinion dissenting from the judgment of the court, the formal judgment of the court shall specify any ground or grounds in law on which such dissent is based either in whole or in part, and, on appeal under section one thousand and twenty-three to the Supreme Court of Canada, it shall not be competent to the appellant to raise any question of law not so specified.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If there are five points of appeal before the appeal court and the judges are in accord on four of those points, there being dissent on one, that one and only that one will be argued before the supreme court.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is narrowing the appellant's right in order to save the judges of the supreme court a little work. The appeal court might be wrong on the four points mentioned by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and it ought to be open to any appellant to have any ground available to him before the supreme court. I object to this as a restriction of the right of the appellant. If you grant a man a right of appeal on well-defined principles, as we have done in the preceding sections, then I think there should be no restriction to the final appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Suppose the dissenting judge dissents only upon one point, as suggested by the ex-Minister of Justice. But there are other grounds which are equally potent and perhaps stronger, and the majority in the appellate court may be wrong on those points on which they are agreed. That frequently happens. Is the appellant to be barred from urging before the final court of appeal the very strongest points in his favour? This is an undue restriction and I object to the principle involved.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Sometimes the court does not pronounce on many of the grounds of appeal suggested to the first court of appeal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is quite true.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Then the appellant would be barred from bringing those grounds before the supreme court. In many cases the court of appeal decides on one point, without going further into the case. The appellant, the crown, or the accused, would be barred from raising the other point before the supreme court. I think we would be narrowing the rights of appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. members for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) and York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) have, I submit with deference, quite overlooked the fact that under our system of jurisprudence appeals are not to be taken in criminal cases beyond the court of last resort in the province. Up until recent times the principle has been that in criminal cases there should be no appeal upon any question. Of course, the privy council always retained the right to review a criminal case from any part of the king's dominions if it were found that justice had not been administered by due process of law. It was then decided that there should be an appeal in criminal cases on questions of law only, but the principle of our jurisprudence was that that right of appeal ended in the province. However, it was believed that if there was a dissenting judgment on a question of law, there should be a right to go to the Supreme Court of Canada. It will be observed that the dissenting judgment must be on a question of law. As the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has just said, it is now being provided that the principle of an appeal not going beyond the province is still being maintained, but where there is dissent with respect to a question of law, then the supreme court shall decide as to the validity or invalidity of the dissent.

If this whole matter is opened up we would be going contrary to the general rule and be wholly opposed to our system of jurisprudence. It will be recalled that in the two addresses delivered by the Lord Chief Justice of England when he visited the Canadian Bar Association, attention was drawn to the practice and procedure and the functions of the court of criminal appeal in Great Britain. In that case there are provided by statute certain questions which shall be considered by the court, but in a broad and general way this matter resolves itself into this: that the court of appeal shall not review the findings of fact by a jury—that is the prerogative of a jury and not a court—the questions of fact having been decided, the only question which remains is as to whether or not, during the trial of the prisoner, the law has been properly interpreted to the jury. This question involves the legality of the reception of evidence and the propriety of the judge's charge to the jury. If an appeal is taken and there are one or more dissenting judges, it seems to me to be not unreasonable to ask that the dissent should be clearly indicated so that the question of law upon which there has been a difference of opinion should be settled by the court of last resort.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The notes of the dissenting judges are not produced in the supreme court. As I understand this section, the practice will be to limit the appeal strictly to the points of law upon which the dissenting judge and his brothers have differed.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With great respect to the Prime Minister who is a much more experienced lawyer than I am, I would suggest to him that we are departing from the underlying principles which govern appeals in criminal cases in this country. If we were right before in the evolution of the law, we are now taking a retrograde step. I submit that there have been cases and will be cases in which the majority of the court of appeal has been and may be wrong. In the case of an appeal where there is a dissenting judgment, I submit that the appellant should be given the reasons for the dissenting judgment and have open to him every ground of appeal which he had on his original motion to the court of appeal. That right is given in every civil case.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a different thing altogether.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is different only in principle. I submit that this will be a restriction of the right of appeal, and I can see no good reason why that restriction should be imposed.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if this amendment becomes law there will be a restriction of the right of appeal and there certainly is a limitation of the functions of the supreme court. It might happen in a case at bar that the dissenting judgment would be given on the wrong point of law, and there would, in such a case, be no reasonable basis for appeal. I think it is right that there should not be a review on the finding of facts, but if there is to be an appeal on the law, why should there not be a complete appeal. Why should there be a restriction in criminal cases different from that applying to civil actions, especially when the liberty of the subject is involved.

Mr. GIROUARD: Mr. Chairman, I desire to support the hon. members who are opposing this amendment. I do not believe there should be so many restrictions imposed on the supreme court, especially in criminal matters. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), there might be points of law which might arise in the supreme court, but which would not be mentioned in the formal judgment of the court of appeal. I do not think justice would be done to the prisoner applying to the supreme court for a revision of his case, if the supreme court were to answer: well, that point of law is not mentioned in the formal judgment of the court of appeal, and we cannot hear you. I do not believe that justice would be rendered, and I think the government would be wise to let the matter stand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The restrictions on appeal exist already. There is no right of appeal to the supreme court if there is no dissenting judgment. This bill provides that where an appeal is made because of a dissenting judgment, those reasons are the only ones which should come before the Supreme Court of Canada. I am rather in favour of the bill.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): It would mean a little less work for the supreme court.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not very strong views on the matter and perhaps it might be well to let the section stand for another year for consideration. Perhaps all the words after "part" in the ninth line could be deleted. That would make the judge who dissents specify his grounds.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That would be an improvement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The latter part of the section which provides that it shall not be competent to the appellant to raise any other question of law would be struck out. I will ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) to move this amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to point out to the committee that it is in the formal judgment of the court that the grounds on which such dissent is based are specified. It must be in the formal judgment.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the judgment roll.

Mr. DUPRE: I move the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 15.—Bail.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the bill of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) that was before the house.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been brought to my attention, since this bill was printed, that there is an anomaly in one of the appeal sections, section 1025, subsection 3, which reads:

> Any person whose acquittal has been set aside may appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada against the setting aside of such acquittal.

The case which has arisen or will arise is this: Certain people are indicted on a charge of conspiracy. One of them is convicted; three others are acquitted, and in the case of those three the crown appeals to the provincial court of appeal. The provincial court of appeal convicts them. From that conviction, under the section which I have read, they have an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, but the other man who was convicted in the first instance, has no appeal. The result may be a favourable judgment in the supreme court in respect of the three, while the unfortunate man who was convicted in the first instance, has no appeal and stands convicted, although they have been tried together for the same offence. The suggestion has been made that that sentence should be clarified by adding these words:

And any person who was tried jointly with such acquitted person and whose conviction was sustained by the court of appeal may appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada against the sustaining of such conviction.

I will move that as a new section, amending section 1025. It will be section 16 of the bill and the next will be section 17, that is the one with regard to the provision for coming into force.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 17 agreed to.

On section 12.—Injury to animals.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I could put in a more adequate wording than that in the proposed amendment. I will make it read in this way:

Who unlawfully kills, or attempts to kill, or maims, wounds, poisons or injures, or attempts to maim, wound, poison or injure.

That would cover the difficulty that was raised.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. REID: Before the committee rises, there is a little matter which I should like to draw to the attention of the committee and the Minister of Justice. It is in connection with section 236, subsection 3 of the criminal code which reads:

Every sale, loan, gift, barter or exchange of any property, by any lottery, ticket, card or other mode of chance depending upon or to be determined by chance or lot, is void, and all property so sold, left, given, bartered or exchanged, is liable to be forfeited to any person who sues for the same by action or information in any court of competent jurisdiction.

I do not know whether the minister has considered this or not, but he probably knows better than I do that advantage has been taken of this subsection to a large extent during the past few months. Lotteries are not legalized in Canada, but we have many people who participate in them and I think it is very unfair when they win a prize and as their names cannot be kept private, an informer should be entitled to lay a charge and thereby obtain their winnings.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. member moving an amendment?

Mr. REID: This is under the criminal code. I do not know how I can bring the matter up otherwise. I believe if the winnings on a lottery ticket should go to anyone, they should go to the government. We have had cases of wives laying information against their husbands so as to prevent informers from obtaining the winnings. I should like to know if the minister has considered the matter, because it is obnoxious that we should so encourage informers, and I do not believe the act was ever intended for such a purpose.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have had many communications and I know my predecessor has also had many on this subject, because there is a tremendous file in the department on this question of lotteries and the recovery of lottery prizes. I was inclined to suggest an amendment to this very section providing that any money recovered in an action of this kind should be recovered for the benefit of the crown; but as the matter is pending in the courts and several actions are pending in British Columbia I thought it was not wise to make any change in the law at this time. There are two opinions on the matter. Some people think the effect of the section as it stands at present is rather to promote the starting of fictitious suits amongst friends and families for the purpose of securing these winnings. Others say that the whole penalty clause should be wiped out; that people should be allowed to buy these tickets and that if they are successful in drawing a prize, they should be permitted to retain it. Others have represented that if the forfeiture of money won as a prize in this way should be made to the crown and not to the individual, this might cure the evil without any further legislation being necessary. As soon as the pending litigation is settled, we shall have to consider the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With the permission of the committee I should like to say a few words with regard to section 2. I would rather speak now than on the third reading.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Woodsworth that we revert to section 2.

Motion agreed to.

On section 2—Parading while nude.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Unfortunately I was not in the chamber when this section was under discussion. I have been a good deal in touch with the Doukhobors ever since they have been in this country. I learn there has been considerable levity in the committee concerning these people and it is for that reason I think a few words should be said on their behalf. Only some 8,000 Doukhobors came to this country about forty years ago. I do not know what the natural increase has been, but I suppose at the utmost there would be only 15,000 or 20,000 in the country to-day, a certain number of them in Manitoba, a much larger number in Saskatchewan, a few in Alberta and quite a large colony or several colonies in British Columbia. I think it is only fair that the public generally, perhaps especially the eastern public, should not be prejudiced against this group of people, who on the whole are very excellent citizens. The fanatical group among them is comparatively small. They constitute a very small proportion of the entire number of Doukhobors. It is quite true that the whole group have some very peculiar characteristics. They may be said to be the Quakers of the Greek Orthodox church. They came into existence many years ago because of their attitude towards the state—they were opposed to the use of arms—and also because of a protestant attitude towards some of the evils then existing within the Greek church. Essentially they are a group of high-minded and heroic people, so much so that they attracted the attention of Count Tolstoy, who learned a great deal of his philosophy and of his special viewpoint of christianity from these selfsame Russian peasants. In fact he was so much interested in them that I understand that a good deal of the proceeds of his book Resurrection went to assist in bringing the Doukhobors to Canada.

It ought to be understood then that the Doukhobors are not a lowdown, degraded people. Let me give the house one illustration. Several years ago I was asked to participate in a conference of young Doukhobors held on the plains of central Saskatchewan. The members of this conference consisted of students attending the various educational institutions—high schools, normal schools and the university. The leader of the group was a graduate of Saskatchewan university, and a lawyer of good standing in the city of Saskatoon. His wife, a very charming woman, is the daughter of a former professor of Queen's university. They have a beautiful home in the city of Saskatoon. I admit that that is an exceptional family, but the fanatical ones are also exceptional, and it seems to me very unfortunate that the public of Canada should be given the idea that the Doukhobors are simply a troublesome, degraded set of people. On the whole the vast majority of them are living clean, decent, honourable hard-working lives. Several years ago when some of the local residents at Nelson, not liking the fact that a great many of the Doukhobors bought wholesale instead of patronizing the local merchants, got up a petition to the British Columbia government, a commission was appointed to investigate, and it found that there was no crime amongst them and no poverty, that they were among the best citizens of the province. That gives some idea of the other side of the question.

I quite frankly admit that this small group about which we hear so much has created a good deal of difficulty. They are fanatical. I am not quite sure whether they are mentally sound, but as with many such religious sects they are subject to hallucinations and queer ideas, and undoubtedly a number of them have broken the law in this country. They have burned down schoolhouses, and in the early days some of them burned their implements and went on a crusade eastward to Winnipeg and a little further east. Those pilgrimages are examples of the fanatical side of this religious movement.

Let me further point out that this curious practice of disrobing is not one that arises because of some perverted emotion or lax sexual ideas. Nothing could be further from the truth. In the beginning as practised some years ago it was rather a religious practice. Those who know anything about the history of fanatical religious sects may remember certain groups among the Protestants in the New England states who were guilty —if you call it "guilt"—of very similar practices in the early days. With these Doukhobors the idea seemed to be in the beginning that in some way they had to get back to primitive conditions, to show that they were not dependent on all the various trappings of civilization. I am inclined to think that in more recent days they have resorted to this practice as a sort of protest since they found that it annoyed the authorities, and called attention to some of their grievances. But I would impress on the house that this practice is not the outcome of immorality as we commonly understand the term.

Further, may I point out that the present generation of Doukhobors have been born and brought up in Canada. If they are guilty of practices that are considered antisocial or that are not desired in this country, we can no longer deport them because most of them are native-born Canadians. That brings me to the real difficulty, that in the past we have largely neglected all of these classes of immigrants. I know that the public schools have done magnificent work among the non-English speaking people, and they have attempted to do some work among the Doukhobors, and have accomplished much good work in Saskatchewan. I remember that fifteen years ago I was talking to one of the school inspectors in the district occupied by the Doukhobors in British Columbia, and he said that about the only reason he was interested in trying to establish schools among the Doukhobors was in order that at least a few of them would be able to defend themselves from the exploitation of some of the people round about them. In many respects he thought the comparatively simple life they were living was a very desirable one. I am not making out this particular fanatical sect as being all we would desire, but I would say that we ought to have some knowledge of the background of these people in order to understand some of their fanatical acts.

The CHAIRMAN: I was asked a little while ago to bring back the hon. member for West Kootenay (Mr. Esling) to the question before the committee, namely, amendments to the criminal code. Of course, my hon. friend is speaking with the consent of the committee, but I would not like it to be thought that I was prejudiced in allowing my hon. friend to speak when I had to stop another hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall not trespass on the courtesy of the committee very much longer. I was suggesting that we must understand the background of these people. One reason why they try to get away from the enumeration of the census is that they fear that they may be brought under military conscription, which is fundamentally opposed to their religious convictions. Further, their idea seems to be that they are a peculiar people, and should be let alone as far as possible to live out their own community life —a sort of imperium in imperio.

Undoubtedly one difficulty has been that they have not been very fairly treated in the past by some of the authorities in this country. Some years ago when they first came to this country they were allowed to live together, holding and working their land in common. That was their understanding of the condition under which they had migrated. Then there came a change in the department. A Minister of the Interior was appointed who did not know or care about the previous arrangements, and he forced them or tried to force them to make individual entry and to live as other Canadians were doing. They refused to do that, and there was taken from them at that time land that was valued at something like $10,000,000. They feel, on account of some of these experiences, that they have not been dealt fairly with in Canada. Repressive measures which from time to time have been used against them have not improved the situation.

I have no particular objection to the bill. I suppose that the citizens of this country have to take some means of maintaining Canadian standards along these lines, but I would suggest that this way of dealing with a problem of this kind is not going to be effective. We are not really touching the problem. What we have to do is in some way learn to understand these people, understand their point of view, do a good deal of educational work among them, and not consider that merely by repressive measures we will overcome these deep-seated religious instincts and social practices which have been prevalent among this particular group for at least several centuries.

I venture to bring these considerations before the committee first as a protest against the idea that this particular fanatical sect represents the whole of the Doukhobors, secondly to counteract the idea that they are any more immoral than any other class of people, and thirdly in the hope that either this parliament or some other group of people in Canada would adopt a more constructive way of dealing with these people whom we have admitted to our country. They and their problems undoubtedly will be with us for years to come.

I wish to express to the committee my appreciation for allowing me to speak at this stage.

Mr. STEVENS: I should not like the suggestions of the last speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to go without some measure of challenge. Let me make the point perfectly clear that this amendment to the criminal code is not directed at any group of people anywhere who have observed even the laws of common decency dear to the heart of all persons living under what we might term western civilization, and in the temperate zone. I will admit that in the tropics conditions might be different. I should not like the idea to go forth, either, that these people are the victims of repressive measures. My hon. friend himself remarked that the Doukhobors have been in Canada for approximately forty years. During that time they have been under the control of a series of governments. That is, different parties have been in control both in the provinces and in the Dominion. I think I can say without exception that of all the people who have entered Canada from the outside none has received such patient consideration as this particular sect known as the Doukhobors. Neither at this nor at any other time have the authorities directed repressive measures against a single Doukhobor who observed—I will not say the laws, because few of them really observe our laws in spirit—but who have been free from doing violence to all sense of decency in this country.

My hon. friend states further that they have been forced into this course of action to defend themselves against exploitation, and as an illustration he said that the business men of Nelson were jealous of the Doukhobors because to some extent they had succeeded in establishing a communal system. There may be personal opinions, but as a matter of fact there has never been any effort by any authority to interfere with these people in their peculiar economic theories and ideas.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was trying to say that complaints of the business men of Nelson had led to the appointment of the British Columbia commission.

Mr. STEVENS: But my hon. friend took care to leave the impression with the committee that because the business men of Nelson were critical of the communal system they had inspired a certain amount of unfavourable or—shall I say—repressive action. That is not the case. Generally speaking I would say these people are thrifty. They are hard working and administer their affairs well. Those of us who know them fully recognize that fact. Speaking of the Doukhobors around Grand Forks, Brilliant and Nelson those who observe the amenities of civilization, shall I say—and they are in the majority—are looked upon as thrifty and decent settlers, and as such are welcomed in the community. Those are not the people however at whom this legislation is directed.

We have been forced to the action we are now taking. Why? Because for forty years the people of Canada have patiently endured some of the most absurd spectacles, some of the most ludicrous efforts on the part of a group of fanatics to enforce their own peculiar notions and idiosyncrasies. In the present instance however we have something more than that. To-day in Grand Forks, Brilliant and Nelson there are men who owe allegiance directly to the present communistic system existing in other parts of the world and who are taking advantage of their innocence, if you like, the ignorance and prejudice of these people to lead them into an anti-law method of activity or system of action in the province of British Columbia. To-day they are being led by that class of people. My hon. friend spoke concerning a family and drew a picture of what might have been one of the most cultured families in Canada. His picture described a highly educated people, and he stated further that none of the present generation indulged in the practices to which the bill refers. What are the facts?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Again I interrupt. I did not say that none of the present generation indulged in these things.

Mr. STEVENS: I took those words down.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I said that most of the people who indulged in these actions were born and brought up in Canada and could not be deported. My statement was exactly opposite to my hon. friend's understanding.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend drew a very attractive picture of a cultured family. Let me tell him and this committee that what has brought the present action to a head has been recent activities taken by the group to which he refers in connection with the taking of the census. Who were the people who began these latest mischievous and ludicrous nude parades? It was a group of young girls just out of high school who met the census takers who had gone patiently to interview them. If necessary I could show correspondence to prove my statements, but I state that those census takers went to those people, day after day, even going to the extent of taking some of the saner ones with them to try to get the required information from the people they were interviewing. We did not care so much about getting all the answers, but it was our desire to learn their names so that they might be properly enrolled. What did they do? Led by some of the educated young women who were graduates of the high school at Vernon, British Columbia, they commenced to disrobe right in the public place when the enumerators appeared. It is that sort of thing which has brought the government to take the rather extreme action proposed by the present legislation.

My hon. friend has very charming diction; his voice and language are always excellent and tuned to convey the precise view he wishes to express. I notice he said in a very minor key, "some have disregarded the law." "Some have disregarded the law"—Mr. Chairman, hundreds have disregarded the law. They gathered in mobs which were described this afternoon. During the last two years they have dynamited schools, post offices, community halls, and the grave of the late Peter Veregin. There is grave suspicion, although probably not definite proof, that while on a train, one member of the local legislature was bombed. While in the Doukhobor section a bomb was placed under his seat. There has never been at any time in connection with any group in Canada so much violence as has been practised by these people. The patience and tolerance of the rest of the people in the neighbourhood has been simply phenomenal, I think. I do not think my hon. friend can cite a case where the people in the localities in which these outrages have occurred, the Canadian people who are entitled to some consideration and some modicum of protection by the law, have risen up and attempted to resent with violence the action of these people. It is true that when a nude parade started into Nelson, consisting of hundreds of these fanatics, either last year or the year before, action was taken. These people marched right to the city of Nelson; they were not residents of that city but were simply thrusting themselves into the town with their nudity and their crudities. Were the people of Nelson to stand idly by and do nothing? This is what happened: The chief of police and the mayor of the community called on the people for help; a number of special constables were sworn in, and they met these fanatics at the edge of the town and herded them off the main streets. In some cases fire hose was used to prevent their advance.

My hon. friend is not doing justice to himself or to this house when he seeks to leave the impression that in introducing this clause in amendment to the criminal code the government is in any sense using what he terms repressive measures.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are these not repressive measures?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend went on to say that this disrobing practice was a sort of religious rite. There is very little about it that is religious now, although that may have been the case two centuries or ten centuries ago, in the early history of these people. Certainly it is not a religious rite at the present time; it is done absolutely for provocative purposes. When these people are faced with an effort on the part of the officers of the law to enforce some simple respect for the law, immediately this disrobing practice begins, because they know it is one of the most embarrassing things with which an officer can be confronted.

I am not going to say anything more other than to remind the committee once more that if we are to protect our public buildings and institutions and the sane, respectable and law-abiding citizens of this country from the outrages which are perpetrated by a faction of these people, if you like to call them that, then we must have more teeth in the law in order to enforce it. We—and when I say "we" I mean Canadian citizens generally—have been more than patient with these people; I do not think any country in the world would have tolerated this sort of thing as long as it has been tolerated in this country. Certainly they would not have received any such consideration south of the international boundary, and I doubt if there is a country in Europe where they would have been treated so leniently. Talk about repression; talk about religious rights; there is not a country in the world where there is more general liberty given the people to indulge in their own peculiar religious beliefs than is the case in Canada. I do not know of any instance when the Canadian people, regardless of the law, have interfered in this respect, but I want to say that we Canadians owe some duty to our families and to our own people, and this amendment is designed as something which will enable us, under the law and with constitutional authority, to do that which hitherto we have not been able to do.

I may say that I would much prefer to have this difficulty overcome by other means. Never, until this moment, have I uttered a word against the Doukhobors in this country, though I have been in public life for some years. I have vainly hoped that, as the years went by, it might be possible to win these people from some of these mad practices in which they indulge, but these outrages have become so common that I have given up that hope. They continue to indulge in this obscene practice, it is nothing more; if my hon. friend wants to get further particulars he has but to go to the inner records of the department which would not make a very savory recital here. If he will look up those records he will get away from the idea of a gentle, devout religious observance to a true appreciation of the obscenity of many of these practices and these nude parades. It is most unfortunate that we have to discuss the matter here, but certainly those in authority must be given some power and some weapon with which to protect the decencies of Canadian life.

Mr. LAVERGENE: I did not intend to take part in this debate, but I think I would be derelict in my duty if I did not, in a few words, express to the committee the lesson which this house and this country should learn from the circumstances which have been exposed this afternoon. It is over forty years since these people first came to this country, and at the time they were brought here the migration of the French-speaking Canadians from Quebec was frowned upon by the western provinces. I am sure I am saying what I may call the naked truth—

Mr. BROWN: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, has not sufficient time been given this subject already?

Mr. LAVERGNE: I think it has, but I am going to say a few words more. I am sorry if what I say grates on the nerves of the hon. gentleman, but I think this is rather important.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. gentleman is very fond of calling other hon. members to order.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Yes, and I remember a few moments ago calling another hon. gentleman to order, but with the consent of the committee he proceeded. What I have to say will not take very long, and it is rather important; my hon. friend, who lives in the west, could profit by the lesson himself. We have been filling our country with the scum of the world through paid and bonused immigration, and to-day we must admit that if we had followed the policy of filling our country with our own Canadian citizens we would not have been obliged to pass laws such as the one now under consideration. I think, as a Canadian, it is my duty to say that governments in the past were most guilty in adopting that open door immigration policy, which meant an open door immigration to the scum of the world and a closed door to immigration coming from the old provinces of Canada, especially from the province of Quebec.

Mr. GERSHAW: Will not the hon. member admit that the great majority of those immigrants are loyal, valuable and useful citizens of Canada?

Mr. LAVERGNE: Certainly; I will admit that, but now we have proof that while we were receiving immigrants from all the different races of Europe we had not the necessary population to assimilate them. Here we have a small group of eight thousand or ten thousand people who have been here forty years and who are not assimilated as yet. Not only have they not adopted Canadian institutions; they have not adopted western civilization, and I claim we should profit by the lesson. Chickens are coming home to roost; I think "chickens" is the proper word, after the illustration we had given us this afternoon of young girls disrobing before census enumerators. If the fair name of Canada has been spoiled it is our own fault. We should have been more careful with our immigration; we should have opened our door only to races which could be readily assimilated. I repeat what I have said for the last thirty years, that the best immigration is that which comes from within our own country. We should have settled our western provinces with Canadians or with such races as the British or the French from the other side of the Atlantic who, until about twenty-five years ago, were barred by the policy of the government, to-day it costs less for an immigrant to come from Europe and settle in the west than it does for a Canadian from Ontario or Quebec to go and settle there. These facts should open our eyes, and instead of quibbling and raising points of order we should try to put into force a broader, a cleaner and a more Canadian policy for the future.

THE CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 131, to amend The Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not necessary for me to add very much to the explanation I gave the other day. This amendment adds a few words to three paragraphs of the society's incorporating act. It provides for an increase in the number of the governing body, and grants certain powers, making clear what was implied in the opinion of the corporation's legal advisers, there having been some difference of opinion in that regard. In view of the fact that the Red Cross Society was the agent chosen in the treaty of Peace to carry out certain very important undertakings, is so recognized, and will be called upon to do a great deal of work during the winter, the government has introduced the bill, enabling them to add to the numbers of the governing body.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BONUS ON WHEAT

PAYMENT OF FIVE CENTS PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT EXPORTED FROM WESTERN PROVINCES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that the governor in council may authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of five cents on every bushel of wheat exported from the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan of the crop of 1931, and to make provision for the determination of amounts payable thereunder, and for regulations to carry out the purpose of the act and prescribe penalties to be incurred for breach of the act or regulations.

He said: The bill to be founded upon this resolution provides for the payment of 5 cents a bushel in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba. It is proposed that the money shall be distributed through the machinery of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and that it shall be paid to the person who is the producer of the grain. It was hoped that some provision might be made for following the grain through Canadian vessels to the ports of ultimate shipment, but although we were very strongly urged to have such a provision in the resolution and in the bill it was found as a practical matter impossible to do so. The lake shipowners urged it very strongly, as did the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Simpson), but there was no machinery by which we thought it could be done. Therefore the payments will be made direct by the elevators through the machinery of the Board of Grain Commissioners. If the house will go into committee on the resolution and allow the matter to be advanced a stage or two, there will be full opportunity to discuss the bill in committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is this on all wheat marketed?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): The resolution is somewhat different from the statement in the budget address. On that occasion it was intimated that the freight was to be absorbed on all wheat shipped for export, meaning abroad, I suppose. The resolution, as I understand it, includes interprovincial trade. As I see it, the local mills in each of the three western provinces will be discriminated against. If a farmer wishes to sell, say to the Robin Hood mill at Moose Jaw, or to any other mill in the west, he will not be eligible for the 5 cents if the mill is in his own province. So that the farmer or other seller will not sell to the local mill unless he gets 5 cents more per bushel than the ordinary market price. The only means by which the seller could get the 5 cents would be to sell to a mill in an adjoining province or for export abroad. If he sells to a mill in another province, under the terms of this resolution he will be eligible; if he sells to a mill within his own province he will get nothing. Should the local mill take his, the farmer's wheat and pay him the ordinary price plus the 5 cents the miller will be at that disadvantage with competitors both abroad and interprovincially. That is the way it appears to me.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Would the Prime Minister give his reasons for proposing this resolution?

Mr. BENNETT: There are three reasons. The first is the low price of wheat in the markets of the world. It is a well known fact that the sudden collapse of the wheat market brought about a condition in western Canada which is being felt all over this country, particularly in eastern Canada. This section of the country relies to no small extent upon the purchasing power of the western population, and this purchasing power has been so lessened by the reduction and diminution in the price of wheat that it has assumed almost national proportions.

The second reason is brought about because of the first reason. The price received for the grain does not bear that relation to the cost of production which it did heretofore.

The third reason is the necessity of a measure of relief for western Canadian producers. I have been told by those who are better able than I to speak with authority that the effect of this measure will be excellent and that it will lessen the amounts which we may be called upon to pay for direct relief in cooperation with the provinces.

Then there is the psychological effect which perhaps the hon. member will not underestimate. The great wheat producing areas of Canada lie between the lakes and the mountains. It is the products of that territory which have given Canada a reputation abroad as a wheat producing country. A population discouraged by a great reduction in the price of their products and because of a calamity which has overtaken them as far as successive crops are concerned, will be heartened by the fact that to this extent the parliament of Canada recognizes their situation. Perhaps the bill founded upon this resolution will give a better explanation than can be given in a mere sentence or two. It is proposed to utilize the machinery of the grain act, and the money will be distributed through that agency directly to the people who are affected. I learned only yesterday that in the opinion of those interested in the grain business the effect upon whose who have lost their crops will be very considerable, even though they will not benefit. There are many other reasons for this resolution which I could mention, but I think perhaps the hon. gentleman understands why this legislation is proposed.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I am glad to hear the reasons given by the right hon. gentleman for this legislation, but they do not satisfy me. As all hon. members know, the situation in many sections of the three western provinces is such that there are tens of thousands of needy farmers who will not have a single bushel of wheat this year. The latest report is that there are 100,000 who will require relief because of an absolute loss of crops.

The right hon. gentleman has given four reasons for this legislation. The first reason is the low price of wheat; the second reason is the low price when compared with the cost of production; the third concerns relief, and the fourth is the psychological effect. I fail to see any real reason why the government should adopt a sectional policy such as this. If relief is to be given, why not make it general. I think I am within the judgment of the committee when I say that we who live in other than the western provinces have refrained from placing before the house the situation which confronts the farmers in our provinces. The condition in almost every section of the province of Ontario with which I am familiar is such that at the present time it is almost impossible for a farmer to make ends meet.

Mr. REID: Will this apply only to wheat for export?

Mr. BENNETT: It will apply to wheat delivered to any licensed elevator in the western inspection division, commission merchant, track buyer, or grain dealer as defined by the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. VALLANCE: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that this five-cent subsidy was to be administered by the grain commission?

Mr. BENNETT: The Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. VALLANCE: It will apply to all wheat marketed?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: All wheat sold to any licensed elevator in the western grain inspection division, commission merchant, track buyer, or grain dealer as defined by the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, before we go into the details of this measure, I think we should first discuss the general principle. In all probability during the discussion of details some hon. member opposite will rise and ask us if we are in favour or opposed to this measure. That is the kind of criticism which has been levelled against us. The Prime Minister has given certain reasons for the introduction of this measure, and at this stage I accept them as good reasons. In spite of what the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) has said, I do not think that the condition of the farmers in the three western provinces can be compared with the condition of the farmers in Ontario, Quebec, and other provinces of the Dominion. The latter, although they are suffering from low prices, have the promise of an abundant harvest. But even before conditions had been aggravated as they were by the drouth in the west, the farmers in western Canada suffered very severely from the drop in prices. Although the Prime Minister may at the present time take the position that these serious conditions are the result of what has arisen during the last few months, I take this opportunity of stating, as I did on a former occasion, that even before present conditions arose, the situation in the west was very severe and perhaps the Prime Minister by this time realizes that fact.

I am quite willing to admit that the reasons which have just been mentioned by the Prime Minister are good ones. The burden has rested very heavily upon the western provinces. A short crop last year in many sections and a very low price meant that in many cases farmers were due to lose their equity in their farms, and since they were bearing in a special degree the burden of those low prices, it seemed to me well that the whole burden should not be borne by the west but that part of it might be borne by the people of Canada. But a few days ago the Prime Minister mentioned another reason which I am not going to accept as a good one. In discussing certain items in the tariff he stated that this might be considered as a compensation to us—

Mr. BENNETT: A compensating adjustment.

Mr. BROWN: I shall accept the term—for burdens that were laid upon us because of the tariff. I cannot accept this as a compensating adjustment for the burdens that have been laid upon us by the tariff, nor will the people of western Canada accept it as such. As I said, I will accept it for the reason the Prime Minister mentioned a few minutes ago.

A few days ago the Prime Minister drew a picture like this: he spoke of a quarter-section of land with 150 acres of that quarter-section in wheat and an average of ten bushels to the acre, amounting, on the basis of a bonus of five cents a bushel, to $75. Then he said: No farm in western Canada is taxed that amount by the tariff. That is one of those questions in absolute mathematics which are so simple to the Prime Minister, but as a matter of fact that condition does not exist in the west. The picture is simply a figment of his imagination.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the yield too low?

Mr. BROWN: To begin with 150 acres is not the average acreage of a quarter-section put into wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: I have known 160 acres.

Mr. BROWN: So have I.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing wrong about that.

Mr. BROWN: But it is not a true picture of the condition that exists in western Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say it was.

Mr. BROWN: Then it is giving an entirely false impression to suggest that the average farmer in the west will receive $75 on a quarter-section. I am not going to discuss this matter at any greater length.

Mr. VALLANCE: The resolution reads:

> May authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of the sum of five cents on every bushel of wheat exported from the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

From the reply to a question that I asked the Prime Minister, I find now that this is not an export subsidy, but a producer's bonus. Am I right in that assumption?

Mr. BENNETT: Substantially that is right. I will discuss it later in detail.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): While this money is to be paid out for the benefit of those who are producing wheat, may I say a word in connection with the barley producers. Manitoba produces almost as much barley as wheat, and the former is of particular concern in the constituency from which I come. I feel that if the wheat growers deserve some consideration in this regard, surely the barley growers should also. Again, when we consider the freight rates, they operate very materially against the domestic shipments of barley, more so than with regard to shipments for export. Has the government anything to say as to giving some assistance to the barley growers of Manitoba who are most concerned in connection with this matter?

Mr. BENNETT: It is abundantly clear that the government did not propose to deal with other than wheat, and without going into the reasons at length, I may say this: It is wheat that has given to Canada the name of a food producing country. Manitoba hard has given this country a name in every part of the world for the production of wheat, and it is because of the situation in that regard that we have dealt with the matter as we have. If we dealt with barley we should also have to deal with rye, and if we dealt with rye we should also have to deal with something else. That is entirely beyond our ability, even if we desired to do so, and it would be beyond the scope of the intention of the government in that regard. We have already endeavoured to give some assistance to the barley producers by the effort to substitute barley for corn. That question has been discussed at length in the house and I do not propose to go into it again.

In reply to the hon. member for Lisgar I may say I took the illustration of a quarter section with 150 acres in wheat, and I took the low yield of ten bushels an acre. I said that this would give the farmer $75 which was more than he would pay on his quarter section—or he might have a half section—by reason of any tariff in this country this year. I know many such farms and the yield has usually been at least 50 per cent more than ten bushels per acre.

Mr. VENIOT: What will be the approximate cost of this bonus?

Mr. BENNETT: It might cost $6,500,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not on a 350,000,000 crop.

Mr. BENNETT: There will not be that nor half that this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think we may take it for granted that the object of this resolution is to make the growing of wheat at present prices five cents less unprofitable than it would otherwise be. To that extent the bonus is of benefit. As I have already pointed out it is only such wheat as is exported from the various provinces that is eligible for the bonus of five cents.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The resolution says so. I heard something read once or twice from some other document, but I did not quite understand it. As far as the resolution before us is concerned, it is only the wheat that is exported from the respective provinces that can earn the five cent bonus.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. member did not hear me. I endeavoured to say that the words "wheat exported" will be construed in the bill as meaning all wheat delivered to any licensed elevator in the western grain inspection division, commission merchant, track buyer or grain dealer as defined by the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not hear that. Will that include anyone who buys or sells wheat for feed stuffs or seed grains.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of the use to which this wheat is put is not a factor.

Mr. YOUNG: I gather the object of the government in granting this five cent bonus is to assist the western farmers in their present plight, particularly those who are in the dried-out districts. Could the Prime Minister give us any estimate of the average yield per acre affected in the dried-out districts of the western provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is asking a question which he would claim, and properly so, greater ability to answer than I. So far as I know, in the dried-out areas to which he refers there will be no yield at all. There may be some green feed, but that is all. I pointed out that this cannot bring any relief to those who have no grain. It was never intended to do so, but it will enable those who have to help those who have not, and a gentleman whose opinion I do regard says that the value of that cannot well be over-estimated. If the committee will allow the resolution to pass and the bill to be introduced, they will have the details before them and then will be better able to appreciate what is intended. I am quite content that the second reading should stand, or we could pass it, by consent, and in committee discussion could take place, and we could let the bill stay in committee for further discussion.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 140, respecting wheat.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BENNETT: If the house is agreed, we can give the bill a second reading without in any sense committing members of the house to any principle involved in the bill.

Mr. VENIOT: There would be full opportunity for discussion of the principle in committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. BENNETT moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. BENNETT: We will not go into committee now, but perhaps at the next sitting of the house, in view of the fact that there is so much supply to be voted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the bill been printed?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but I do not think the French copies are ready.

Mr. VENIOT: May I make a suggestion? I understand the Prime Minister wishes to go into supply to-night. There are a great many members absent who are interested in supply. Perhaps we could go on with this bill in committee to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: I said yesterday that we must go on with supply.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would seriously object to going on with this bill to-night. Supply has been before us for months, and surely we can get rid of some supply. We have not seen the bill, and it seriously affects western Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I took the hon. member's view myself. I think he will agree that that is the view I took. I said to the right hon. leader of the opposition that I did not think the bill had been translated into French. The second reading was only taken by consent, and I am obliged to the house for doing that, to give hon. members an opportunity to consider the bill without having committed themselves to the principle.

I should like to get on with supply to-night. Although we have been a long time at it, there is a considerable number of items to be disposed of.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can we not pass another bill or two before six o'clock?

FISH INSPECTION ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the order for the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Fish Inspection Act, be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

BIOLOGICAL BOARD ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the order for the second reading of Bill No. 78, to repeal the Biological Board Act, be discharged.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the order for the second reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928, be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE INCREASED PENALTIES FOR VIOLATION

The house resumed from Friday, July 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 16, an act to amend the Dairy Industry Act (increase of penalties)—Mr. Gobeil.—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. GOBEIL: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GIROUARD: Does the sponsor of the bill close the debate?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. GOBEIL: Convinced as I am of the merits of the bill, and having listened attentively to the reasons brought forward by hon. members opposite who opposed it, I wish to make a few remarks so that if the bill does not pass the responsibility may rest in the proper place.

This bill was not presented to the house because of the fancy of the hon. member for Compton, or through political motives, as was suggested by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), but because of a necessity existing in connection with butter. As I stated on a former occasion the matter of adulterated butter came before the annual convention held last fall of the dairymen's association of the province of Quebec. May I say that that convention brings together a body of men representative of the dairy industry in that province. At the meetings of that convention there are about 55 or 60 inspectors of cheese and butter factories of the province, the heads and officials superior to those inspectors, the directors and professors of the dairy school at St. Hyacinthe and several of the factory owners in the province. Certainly that body of men is in a position to give an opinion as to what should be done in the best interests of the dairy industry. This question was brought before the board of directors, of which I have the honour to be a member, and the board finally came to the conclusion that the adulteration of butter could not be stopped with the existing penalties. Therefore the board passed the resolution which I read on a previous occasion, and that resolution was brought before the convention, where it was adopted. As a result, Mr. Chairman, this bill was presented.

I was amazed at some of the reasons put forward by some hon. members opposite in opposition to this bill. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard) discussed the various subsections of section 5. I might remind the hon. member and the committee that these subsections are exactly as they were previously; not one word has been changed. I would also remind the hon. member that the act which is being amended was passed by this house in 1928, when the Liberal government was in power and when the hon. gentleman was sitting on this side of the house. Certainly he had every opportunity to discuss these subsections at that time, and if they were not in the best interests of the dairy industry they should have been amended when the original bill was passed.

One of the principal objections to the bill was that we should give more latitude and more discretion to judges in the application of the law. As I said in the beginning, those who have had the responsibility of making complaints and trying to secure convictions were of the opinion that the existing penalties were not sufficiently severe to stop the adulteration of butter, and the discretion allowed the judges is just as it was before this amendment was introduced. There again not a word has been changed; the judge can impose anything from the minimum fine to the maximum fine, so it only remains to decide whether or not those penalties are sufficient. That is the reason this bill has been brought forward, because the men in the trade claim that these penalties are not sufficient to stop that adulteration.

Another objection put forward by hon. members who oppose this bill is the question of good faith on the part of those who produce butter. I do not blame the hon. gentlemen; they would like to convince their electors that they are safeguarding the interests of the butter makers, so they say it would be too bad if some farmer or butter maker who produced butter with more than 16 per cent of moisture content should be fined $500. Surely this cannot be a question of good faith. The man who buys 400 or 500 pounds of butter, puts it in a mixing machine and adds 200 or 300 pounds of oil certainly cannot plead good faith. But they ask, "What about those who are found with more than 16 per cent of water in their butter?" I say, Mr. Chairman, that not one of those people has been convicted under section 5 of this bill. I hold in my hand the record of convictions for 1930, which numbered 91. Of that number 71 were convicted in connection with butter containing over 16 per cent moisture, while 18 were convicted for the real adulteration of butter. Of the 71, all were convicted under the section of this bill which provides a minimum fine of $10 and a maximum fine of $50, and the officers of the department here tell me that over 90 per cent of those convicted were fined the minimum of $10 and costs. Of the 18 who were found guilty under section 5, all were convicted because they had adulterated butter in the real sense of the word. So I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to point to one case in which a butter maker or a farmer has been prosecuted for producing butter containing over 16 per cent moisture or less than 80 per cent butter fat and fined under section 5 of this act which I am trying to amend.

I do not desire to cast any reflection on those who oppose the bill; I take it for granted that they are capable men in their respective walks of life. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) speaking the other day to the tariff item concerning chickens and ducks, said he found it strange that those who discussed that item were lawyers, doctors and other professional men. So, while I take it for granted that all the hon. members who spoke against this bill are practical men in their respective walks of life, yet the people who considered this question last year at Mont Laurier were more acquainted with the question than the hon. members who have opposed this bill. I find that of the seven or eight members who spoke against it four or five are lawyers, one or two are doctors, and one is a newspaper man. There was not one farmer in that number. Surely, Mr. Chairman, there must be a farmer on the opposite side of the house, and I should like to hear him express an opinion on this question.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these figures which the hon. member is giving now for the whole Dominion, or only for the province of Quebec? Further, could the hon. member tell me how many of those convicted were farmers and how many were butter makers? Has he those separate figures?

Mr. GOBEIL: The total figures for 1930 were, 96 in Quebec and 26 in Ontario. In 1929 the convictions in some of the other provinces were: Prince Edward Island, 1; Nova Scotia, 1; Saskatchewan, 1; British Columbia, 1.

Mr. MARCIL: How many in Quebec were farmers and how many were butter makers?

Mr. GOBEIL: I cannot answer accurately but I know, generally speaking, that most of them were factory men. I should have been glad if farmers on the other side of the house had given us their views. The farmers on this side have spoken in favour of the bill. I do not reflect on others in saying that, when I need legal advice, I go to a lawyer rather than to a doctor or any other professional man. I regret that the hon. member for St. James saw fit to make a political speech on this bill. I do not intend to follow him, because it seems to me that whatever I or any other Conservative candidate may have said during the last campaign has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. GOBEIL: The question referred to by the hon. member for St. James is one to be settled between my electors and myself at the next election. I wish the hon. member were here because I would invite him, when that time comes, to discuss with me in the county of Compton all matters affecting the dairy industry.

Mr. POULIOT: All those you invite will accept.

Mr. GOBEIL: I fully realize that if hon. members opposite wish to prevent this bill from becoming law they can easily do so. They have only to talk for half an hour and very likely the bill will not come before the house again. That is why I have made these remarks. I know that the whole dairy industry is behind the bill. Every thinking farmer is in favour of it. The main objection of hon. gentlemen opposite has been that the poor farmer who is caught with more than 16 per cent of water in his butter will be fined $500. They know that this has never happened under section 5, because the officers are very careful. Those who adulterate butter are well known; there are only a few of them in Montreal. Everyone in the trade knows them and this bill will put a stop to the practice. If hon. members who represent rural constituencies are sincere in their criticisms they will allow the bill to become law.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just a few words to say on this bill. My hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Gobeil) will admit that in Quebec there is a distinction between butter factories and creameries; they are not at all the same thing. The butter factory is the place where in the country they make butter, and the creamery is where it is made in the city. This is a very important distinction. I regard it as an evil that so much milk is being sent to-day from the country to the city for manufacturing purposes. I do not think that many hon. members will contradict me on that point, because some business is needed to encourage the farmers and give them every chance in their struggle. It is unfortunate that in Quebec as no doubt elsewhere, factories are being closed because the farmers are sending their milk to the city instead of having it made into butter or cheese in the locality. How is that done? My hon. friend from Compton, who is a director in dairy societies, must know that the creamery people falsify the records, giving to the producer less fat than he is entitled to and then raising the price. It is a fake, and is done to deceive the farmer. The farmer is paid for less fat than his milk contains, although the price he receives is apparently higher. That is how so many farmers have been deceived into sending their milk to the city creameries instead of taking it, as many do, to the local butter factory. This is an evil, and I submit that my hon. friend's bill, though his intention may be good, is simply un coup d'épée dans l'eau—a sword thrust in water. I suggest that the important thing would be to have some inspectors in these creameries. I have no technical knowledge of the industry, but I was told that these creameries are not as rigidly inspected as the butter factories. It is of the utmost importance, and it would be in the interests of the local buttermaker, to have these creamery factories very carefully inspected, to make impossible the falsification of records. If this were done the farmers would know exactly what price they were getting for their product; they would know what price the creameries were paying for a stated quantity of fat. They are entitled to know just how much fat their butter contains.

Let me tell my hon. friend that I am not ashamed of being a lawyer. I represent a rural constituency and I am proud of the fact, and I should feel that I was not doing my duty if I did not speak for them here. I have at heart the interests of those I represent. I am not making a political speech; I am speaking on the authority of people who know just as much about the industry as the hon. member for Compton. There is an evil which we must stop, and the only way to do that is, at the earliest opportunity, to amend the law, providing for the strictest inspection of creameries so that the farmers shall not be deceived. It will be just as well also to put some restraint on the farmers. The important thing is to prevent the falsification of the records. The bill reads:

> Any person who violates any provision of sections five or seven of this act shall be guilty of an offence and upon summary conviction, shall be liable—

And then follow the penalties, which are heavier than those in force at the present time. What is meant by "any person"? The rural butter factory is generally operated by a single man. He is either the owner of the factory or is employed by a syndicate or society of farmers who own it. However, it is entirely different in the cities. There the creamery is usually owned by a company which has a president, a general manager, several employees and lots of watered stock. Who would be responsible in that case? Would it be the president, would it be the manager, or would it be the poor employee who is acting under their instructions?

Mr. GOBEIL: It would be the same as before; the law is not being changed.

Mr. POULIOT: We are here to improve the law, and I know my hon. friend is sincere in his efforts to that end. I believe this amendment would make the law more severe without making a distinction between the factory in the city and in the country. I think such a distinction should be made. This amendment does not achieve the result aimed at. I do not know how it is in other provinces, but I know there is some trouble in Quebec city and Montreal. The people in the rural districts should be told that the reason they do not receive more money for their products is the deduction for transportation made by the creameries in the cities.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): This measure aims at increasing the penalties provided by the Dairy Industry Act. When the bill was discussed in the house some time ago, I pointed out why, in my opinion, this measure was unjust and vexatious towards the farmer. I do not intend to go over the reasons which I then gave; I simply wish to answer an objection which was raised. Some hon. members on the government side have stated that this measure does not apply to farmers. They certainly are under a false impression. It is only necessary to read the act with the proposed amendment in order to convince oneself that the provisions apply to everybody, to dealers as well as farmers. It is precisely with reference to this point that I wish to make a few comments. Subsection (b) of section 5 of the act reads as follows:

"No person shall
(b) mix with or incorporate with butter, by any process of heating, soaking, rechurning, reworking, or otherwise, any cream, milk, skimmilk, buttermilk or water to cause such butter when so treated to contain over sixteen per centum of water."

"No person shall," these words therefore apply to everybody, and, according to the proposed amendment, a person violating the section just read would be liable to a fine of $500, and, in default of payment to imprisonment for a term of six months. Therefore, a farmer who, in good faith, mixes with the butter or introduces in it water to cause such butter when so treated to contain over sixteen per cent of water, is liable for a first offence to a fine of $500, and in default of payment to imprisonment for a term of six months. I state that inasmuch as this measure applies to farmers, the act is unjust and arbitrary. That is why I move, seconded by Mr. Pouliot, the following amendment:

That clause 1 of the present bill be amended by adding after subsection (c) of section 10 of the Dairy Industry Act, the following subsection:
(d) The present section does not apply to farmers who manufacture or sell butter made from the dairy products of their farm.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

EXCLUSION OF OUTSIDE SERVICE FROM OPERATION OF ACT

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester) moved the second reading of Bill No. 132, to amend the Civil Service Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will not repeat what I said on Monday last when I had the honour to move the first reading of this bill. I will say briefly that one of the features of my bill is to exclude the outside service from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission.

Now, with respect to appointments, it is my desire to incorporate into the act the recommendation made in 1924 by a committee of the Senate which considered this question at length and reported to the effect that in connection with promotions the Civil Service Commission should cooperate with the government. I also wish that with regard to dismissals the ministers of the departments be given the power to make dismissals themselves. The law as it stands provides that an employee can be dismissed only by the governor in council, and I think the amendment which I have in view is not very drastic in its terms. The change I propose is very small; if a minister has no right to dismiss an employee for cause, it is of no use to speak of the powers of the government.

As I said, I do not want to take up too much of the committee's time because I am well aware that many members on both sides of the house are anxious to express their views and that at this stage of the session it is not probable that my bill will become law. May I add that one reason why I have presented it to the house at this stage is to enable hon. members to study it earnestly with a real desire to do justice to the country as well as to the civil service. I am proud to say to hon. members opposite that one of the distinguished members who are anxious to amend the Civil Service Act is none other than the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who is now the chief organizer of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. I am also proud to say that on the 24th of June those who like my humble self are anxious to amend the Civil Service Act found another champion in the distinguished leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). Let me emphasize the fact that on that date the hon. leader of the opposition stated in the most emphatic terms that he rather favoured the exclusion of the outside service from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. He went even so far as to state that in 1924 when he voted against the Spinney amendment he was wrong and he added that he now favoured the nomination of postmasters in rural districts by the Postmaster General.

I leave my bill to the earnest consideration of the house. I am prepared to discuss the matter free from party prejudice. As I said last Monday this question is not a party one because no such amendment as I have in view can be made unless all parties concur in it.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): The major portion of this bill I support very strongly. I have been a sympathetic supporter of the Civil Service Commission because I have taken time to study its functions and the work it does, but any hon. member who believes that the Civil Service Commission appoints applicants to the outside service will be sadly disappointed. Practically all that it does is to put a rubber stamp upon the recommendation of a member of some other department. Therefore I am supporting this bill first because the Civil Service Commission does not examine the application and the applicant. That is done by a member of some other department. It was a surprise to me to learn this. A short time ago I had a very good example of it. An application was made for an outside position in the district from which I come, and I had occasion to follow up that application. A returned man, who had been a resident of that district only a few months, was given first choice—although I think when a position is locally advertised, length of residence should be one factor in making an appointment. The men who were named on his application as recommending him repudiated having given their names and refused to recommend him for the position. But I want to be fair. Some two months before, this man, having drifted into the district, was recommended by these three men, who were officers of the local battalion, although they had not much information as to who he was. The man was supposed to be a very good shot, and on securing the good will of these three officers he obtained their recommendation for another job which he did not get. He had given them a promise and an oath of service, both of which he repudiated and refused to carry out. When the matter of the second position came up, these men could not recommend him and he gave their names without their consent or approval. Subsequently when they were asked to give recommendations, they repudiated having given their names. The chairman of the commission says: I do not think that is serious, because it is a matter of his character and on a former occasion these three men recommended him. If a man repudiates his oath and his promise, what else is left of his character and how can any man recommend him for a position? Nevertheless, the commission accepted these three names. When I asked for the letters repudiating them, the commission did not have them on file. They were put away in a little bag, but they had the former papers on the file. These papers were not addressed to the Civil Service Commission but to somebody else.

In addition to that, two other returned men had applied for this position, one being a graduate of the school of science—one of our best universities. I want here and now to express my disapproval of the classification made of these men by an inspector of the Public Works department. The man who had drifted into the locality, who had been there for only a few months, was given 80 per cent, while the man who was a bona fide resident, whose family had been in the district for fifty or sixty years, a returned man with a good service record, and a graduate of the school of science, was given only 60 per cent. I ask hon. members if in such a case the Civil Service Commission performed any function at all? I give it credit for having done something in the past, but examples of this kind surely will confirm one's opinion that it does not make the appointments.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What was the position?

Mr. ROSS: It was a minor position, that of inspector of dredges, and a graduate of a school of science would be far better qualified to fill it than anyone else. In addition to that he was a returned soldier, but the man who had no qualifications was given 80 per cent by this inspector, while the graduate of the school of science received only 60 per cent. No officer of the Civil Service Commission ever saw that man or examined him, and yet you say that the Civil Service Commission make the outside appointments. That is the method of appointing officers to the outside service. Any man who shakes his head can get up and try to disprove it if he likes. I have here a list of the men upon whose recommendations in every case the appointment depends. Here is an official document. I have not the time to read it now, but it is upon the recommendations of these officers in every department that the Civil Service Commission makes the appointments.

Mr. MARCIL: The law should have been amended, and the Civil Service Commission provided with inspectors. They have to rely now on the inspectors of the various departments.

Mr. ROSS: They have their own inspectors. These inspectors are their choice; they select these men.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think they have any outside inspectors, have they?

Mr. ROSS: Why not?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They have inspectors on the staff here.

Mr. ROSS: If they have not their own men, it is so much the more proof of my statement. For appointments to the inside service, written and oral examinations are held, and through their examiners the commission makes the appointment, but for appointments to the outside service the commission has to depend on other people than themselves.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Was this just a temporary appointment for the summer?

Mr. ROSS: Most of these are.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. ROSS: Very good, then. Take the position of postmaster; that is a permanent position. Who makes the recommendation for that appointment? An official of the Post Office Department. Would it not be better to let the Post Office Department appoint their own men? As it is their inspector goes out and examines the applicants—and remember, this is not a temporary position, but a permanent one. Upon the recommendation of that inspector, in over 90 per cent of the cases the Civil Service Commission makes the appointment. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that these are sufficient reasons why the outside service should be removed from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. It will really not be doing anything more than what we are actually doing at the present time, because as it is now each department makes its own recommendation, and upon that recommendation the commission acts.

Secondly, there are many applications made which never reach the Civil Service Commission at all. They are pigeon-holed by certain officials in the various departments. We have proof that many of these applications do not reach the commission. They are first gone over by officials of other departments, and in many cases the applications are pigeonholed and never reach the commission.

In the third place, the Civil Service Commission, having appointed the men, cannot take care of them after they are appointed. The men are dismissed without any examination or investigation by the Civil Service Commission whose employees they are. The department can simply go to work and have a departmental investigation, and out the man goes on their recommendation without any approval or disapproval by the Civil Service Commission.

I shall not take up any more time. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that these outside appointments are not now made by the Civil Service Commission upon any examination that they conduct, the commission simply acting as a rubber stamp of approval of the recommendations of other departments.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the hon. member include in that sweeping statement the whole outside service as well as what the bill provides?—because there is a number of permanent officials in the outside service. Would my hon. friend take them all out from under the jurisdiction of the commission.

Mr. ROSS: I absolutely would if they have not any better system than they have now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend knows that the permanent service is not appointed in that way. He is speaking of temporary appointments for the summer.

Mr. ROSS: A large number of the positions is temporary, but I have mentioned others that are permanent, such as postmaster, and collector of customs. Who appoints them? The Civil Service Commission have not the original information, and they have to depend upon the officials of other departments.

Mr. McINTOSH: Would my hon. friend state that the civil service examinations held at outside points in the different cities are a complete farce?

Mr. ROSS: I made a distinction between the oral and written examinations for the permanent positions in the inside service, but the outside appointments are not made in that way.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I had the honour of supporting the original bill passed by this house creating the first Civil Service Commission, and I have followed the work of the Civil Service Commission very closely. I was a member of two or three committees that investigated the operation of the Civil Service Commission and the Civil Service Act, but I have not the time to refer to them to-night. I think the time has arrived when the government should seriously take into consideration this civil service question, and see if a remedy cannot be found. The big civil service associations of Canada have already protested against the adoption of any such measure as is proposed by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon). Circumstances have changed since 1908 when the Hon. Sydney Fisher introduced his bill creating the Civil Service Commission, and since Sir Robert Borden sponsored his bill extending the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission to the outside service. Conditions have so changed due to the war and otherwise that the time has come, I think, when the whole Civil Service Act should be overhauled. When next we meet, and I trust we shall all meet again, I hope that the government will be in a position to give us a matured plan which will do justice to all parts of the country, to the civil servants as well as to the public.

Mr. F. T. SHAVER (Stormont): I see there are only two minutes left, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to place myself on record as thoroughly in accord with the principle of this bill. I have the honour to represent a constituency in which there is a large number of outside civil servants, in the departments of railways and canals, national revenue, and post office, and I do not think that the efficiency of these civil servants or of the service itself would be impaired if the outside service were taken from under the control of the Civil Service Commission, and if the members for the constituencies had the right to recommend to the minister who should be appointed to the various positions. I know that some may consider this a retrograde step. There are some members who would not want to take upon themselves this added responsibility. But I also know that there are in the civil service at Ottawa men holding very important positions. I know of one who came from my own village, who for over forty years has been a very faithful and efficient civil servant; and he was appointed under the old system. I am ready as the member for the constituency to take the responsibility of recommending honest and efficient men for any positions which may become vacant. I believe it would be in the interests of the civil service itself. As was expressed in a debate a few days ago by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), it is in the interests of each member in making recommendations to see that only capable and efficient men are recommended.

I see I have not time to give any further reasons why I should support this bill. I wish merely to express my entire sympathy with it, particularly with that section which deals with the outside service.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will proceed to government orders.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Postmaster General be kind enough to inform me as to how long Mr. Charles Garon has been acting as postmaster at Rimouski?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I think it is since November last.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): Would the hon. Postmaster General inform me also whether he intends to appoint a permanent postmaster at Rimouski; and whether he will give the customary consideration to veterans who are candidates?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I intend to fill this post as soon as possible and we are at present considering recommendations as regards veterans who have applied for the position.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to have some details from the minister concerning reductions in revenue during the last year, referring particularly to the revenue derived from the sale of postage stamps, postcards, and so forth.

Mr. SAUVE: The revenue for the year 1930-31 will be approximately $31,000,000, a decrease of almost $2,000,000 as compared with the year 1929-30. This decrease was brought about as the result of general economic conditions.

Mr. VENIOT: In the year 1929-30 postage stamps, postcards and so on brought in a revenue of approximately $27,000,000. I should like to know what reduction there was in that connection. How much less came in during the past year?

Mr. SAUVE: The revenue from that source during the yast year was $25,769,781.18.

Mr. VENIOT: A reduction of almost $2,000,000.

Mr. SAUVE: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT. How much newspaper postage was paid in cash?

Mr. SAUVE: The postage paid in cash for newspapers was $1,628,366.87.

Mr. VENIOT: There is a difference there of $100,000. How much was received in cash for postage on third class printed matter? I wish to learn where the revenue is falling off.

Mr. SAUVE: On third class printed matter the amount was $1,114,811; on metered mail matter $2,342,077, and on parcels $3,801,368.70.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay the house to any extent, nor say anything which might displease my good friend the Postmaster General; I simply wish to make a suggestion to him. There are a great number of merchants in our rural sections who have been selling much less within the last few years because of the large purchases which are made at Eaton's, Simpson's and at Dupuis'. These large firms are drawing on the money reserves of our rural districts. It was not as bad when Eaton's had only a store in Toronto, but to-day it has branch stores almost everywhere. I am aware that it has a large store in Montreal and another in Moncton, and the sales which are carried on by this firm, as well as by Simpson's and Dupuis,' are very detrimental to our country-side merchants; these firms sell for cash. Our rural merchants often accept farm products in exchange for their goods and also give them long terms of credit. The hon. Postmaster General who represents a rural constituency, is well aware that farmers have the habit of paying their bills around All Saints Day and at Easter, twice a year. Meanwhile, sometimes during six months, the rural merchant is obliged to carry all this credit so as to allow the farmers an opportunity of selling their products in order to settle their bills with them.

I would suggest to the hon. Postmaster General, who has so much influence with the Prime Minister, being also the Minister of Finance, to come to an understanding with the latter in order to place a prohibitory rate on the mailing of catalogues to rural sections. I think that such a step would be appreciated throughout the country.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to thank the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) for his kind words. I wish to say to him that I also regret the abuses which may result from these new commercial methods; however, the Post Office Department has no means at its disposal of correcting this evil. Nevertheless, my hon. friend's suggestion is worthy of consideration.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): Has the hon. Postmaster increased the rates on parcel post?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): Then why not increase them?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The question was not brought up.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): Why not increase them? It would ensure a revenue to the Post Office Department. The trade carried on with these firms has been very extensive within these last years; the man on the street is asked to pay three cents on a letter, yet nothing further is requested from these firms who are greatly harming the trade in our rural sections.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The comments of the hon. member for Bonaventure are certainly worthy of consideration.

Mr. VENIOT: I was trying to get some information from the minister, but some of my hon. friends on this side of the house interfered. I intend to stay on my feet and I hope my hon. friends will not interrupt until I am through. For instance, I should like to know the falling off in postage on parcels from other countries. In 1929-30 the amount received was $776,411.

Mr. SAUVE: In 1930-31 it was $456,213.55.

Mr. VENIOT: Over $300,000 less. In the 1930 revenue there is an item representing Canada's share in the sale of the Pacific and West Indies telegraph and cable service. There will be nothing coming from that source this year, which will be an additional falling off, so there is practically $600,000 of a drop there?

Mr. SAUVE: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Then what were the deductions this year from the gross revenue?

Mr. SAUVE: The deductions were about $7,000,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Just about the same as before?

Mr. SAUVE: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the Post Office Department keep a special commissioner in Saskatchewan to investigate charges of political activity preferred against postmasters, or is this done by the commissioner maintained by the government to investigate such charges against employees of all government departments? I should like to ask also how many commissioners have been appointed in Saskatchewan, how many are there now, and who they are.

Mr. SAUVE: I understand two commissioners have been appointed; one has been investigating political complaints and there is one other, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. DONNELLY: What salaries are they paid?

Mr. SAUVE: The salary is $20 a day and expenses.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is Mr. Elliott still working as an investigator?

Mr. SAUVE: Not now.

Mr. DONNELLY: Was he discharged?

Mr. SAUVE: I think so.

Mr. DONNELLY: On what grounds?

Mr. SAUVE: On certain representations.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): I have no protest to make against the system enforced by the hon. Postmaster General in connection with dismissals of postmasters who are guilty of political partisanship; the act exists and it must be carried out. When a complaint is lodged against a postmaster, the minister orders an inquiry and a commissioner is specially appointed for the purpose. In the county of Bonaventure I was privileged in having the visit of a fellow citizen from Rimouski, who carried out numerous inquiries. I have nothing to say against the work he carried out and which seems complete; he is a member of the bar and he understands his work. However, I must protest as to his method of procedure. When a commissioner, having such extensive powers, visits a village or a parish to hold an inquiry, the latter, to my mind, should be held either at the post office or in a public place. At present, in my county, these inquiries are generally held at the home of the person who has made the charge or has caused it to be laid and who, moreover, hopes to replace the postmaster in question. I think that this procedure is of a nature to lower the prestige of the commissioners in charge of the inquiry.

I therefore contend that these inquiries should be held either at the post office—like the inquiries carried out by the inspectors of the department—or in a public place, and that a previous notice, with a reasonable length of time, should be given as to the date of the inquiry. If a postmaster thinks fit not to be present at this inquiry, it is his concern, however, some postmasters or, again, some other persons might wish to deny these charges, but they have not the opportunity because they are not notified in advance.

I have neither the time nor the desire to discuss any further these inquiries which are held in my county for I may add the old saw, "to the conqueror belong the spoils." Such is the way the matter stands to-day and it has always been so.

Government positions will always be sought by people, especially in time of crisis, even if those positions are not very remunerative, however, my protest concerns the way these inquiries are carried out. I think the Postmaster General would enhance the prestige of his commissioners by giving them instructions to that effect.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The case to which the hon. member for Bonaventure refers to, to my knowledge, is an exceptional one. I do not think that such a procedure will be found in other counties. Our aim is to look into the charges which are made to us. We then send a commissioner to hold an inquiry according to the rules of evidence. We do not instruct them to carry out this inquiry at the home of the person who laid the charge but in a house where the public can have access.

However, if a commissioner happens, in certain cases, to go to the complainant's home, it is perhaps because there were no other places available.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): I should like the Postmaster General to allow me to emphasize somewhat the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). What the hon. member for Bonaventure complains of, also exists in the county of Rimouski, and conditions in the latter place are, perhaps, worse than those mentioned by the hon. member for Bonaventure, since the two commissioners in charge of inquiries were ex-Conservative candidates who had both stood for the county of Rimouski and had besides taken part in the last election.

It was therefore almost impossible for any one charged of meddling in politics to obtain fair play under such conditions. I would not object to any of these gentlemen being appointed as commissioners to take charge of inquiries outside the county where they were candidates.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The commissioner is under oath. Often we see judges called upon to hear cases in which their past electors figure. There is no objection.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): What would the Postmaster General think, for instance, of the fact that, while in charge of such inquiries, the commissioner delivers political speeches in the county where are held these inquiries?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): My jurisdiction does not extend to speeches, and if I remember well, I have never received information nor complaints to that effect.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): I do not blame the Postmaster General.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): However, if inquiries were not held according to the rules laid down on evidence, if those who are charged were unjustly dealt with, it behooves them to complain to the department. I will note the representations made to me by the hon. member for Rimouski.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): When a vacancy is to be filled by the Civil Service Commission, does the inspector of the department visit the locality to inquire as to qualifications of the candidates?

[Mr. Sauve.]

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Exactly.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): Is there a fixed time to send this report of the inspectors to the Civil Service Commission or does it remain in the possession of the department and, if so, for how long?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The report is forwarded to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): How long is it held?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There is no fixed time, but I suppose it is as soon as possible.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): I wish to especially refer to the interesting village where, since a number of years, I have passed my summers, Bonaventure which is the largest parish of Bonaventure, and where the postmaster, who was charged with political partisanship, died shortly after the inquiry. The vacancy was created by a natural cause, even before an order in council was passed dismissing him. Since his death, his widow has acted as postmistress, even before his death she was in charge of the office, acting as an assistant. She is recommended for the post by the Rev. Mr. Gauthier, the parish priest, and by Mr. Charles A. Forest, manager of the local savings bank, they are neither political friends. Previous to making an appointment, I would like the Postmaster General to consider the situation of this Mrs. Forest, widow of the late postmaster who rendered great services to the department, and to further give consideration to the exemplary way she carried out her duties. I must state that the father and the son were in charge of the post office for forty years, and this, to the satisfaction, evidently, of the Post Office Department. I should like to see the hon. Postmaster General grant the wishes of the parish priest and the principal business people of this village, and leave Mrs. Forest in charge of the office which she has administered to the entire satisfaction of the department and the people.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): My hon. friend for Bonaventure may rest assured that I shall examine the entire file and shall exercise the greatest discretion in this matter.

Mr. VENIOT: What was the cost of the railway mail service for the year ended March 31, 1931?

Mr. SAUVE: It was $7,800,000.

Mr. VENIOT: That was the estimate; but was that expended?

Mr. SAUVE: I do not understand the question.

Mr. VENIOT: For 1930-31 the amount I asked for was $7,800,000. How much of that was expended?

Mr. SAUVE: In 1930-31 the expenditure for railway mail service was $7,714,151.11.

Mr. VENIOT: In 1930-31 we increased the estimate by $100,000. The estimates now before the house show a reduction of $150,000 for railway mail service. I hold that you cannot carry on the railway mail service with that reduction. You will have a deficit in that service and will have to come back for supplementaries. The other day the minister, giving a survey of his department, said they were cutting down expenses because certain railway mail services had been dispensed with owing to the change in railway arrangements. He said that the department had no control over the railway service. That is quite true. But where a railway was giving a daily mail service and it was deemed necessary, for purposes of economy, to cut down the service to three days a week, the Post Office department must provide for those three days which have been taken off the railway service. Unless you make that provision you are crippling the mail service of the Dominion. If, because of the reduction in the number of days of railway service, you decrease the amount you pay for that service, you must add to your regular road or highway service a sum sufficient to take care of those three days. What provision is being made for that?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I did not quite follow the last remarks.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General stated the other evening in his speech, that the amount paid to railways for the mail service had been reduced because the railways were not giving to-day the mail service they previously gave, owing to the necessity of curtailing expenses.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I shall explain my point; previously a railway which gave a daily mail service, now gives but a tri-weekly service. The mail which was previously carried daily is now carried only three times a week by that railway. If you reduce the amount paid to the railway for a given section, you are forced to increase the appropriation required to give a daily service to the people who have lost three days of service by railway. If on the one hand you reduce the means of communication by railway, you must on the other hand increase them, otherwise, and if you do not do so, you are not giving the public the same service as in the past. Now, I find no increase in the appropriation asked for the mail service by public routes. You will, therefore, not have sufficient money to give the public the service to which it is entitled and which it had in the past.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In answer to my hon. friend, I may say: when the railway mail service is curtailed, we cater as much as possible to the needs of the section affected by other services, such as motor buses, etc.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): You do not follow me, I think. Perhaps, I do not express myself clearly. For instance, in my own county, take the Caraquet railway which gives, instead of a daily mail service, a tri-weekly service. The Post Office Department was kind enough—and I congratulate it—to grant us an additional service by railway; but you cannot take from the appropriation voted for the railways the money required to pay for an increased service on a public route. That money must absolutely be voted separately. You cannot appropriate that money because you have reduced by $150,000 the amount voted for the railway service and you have not increased the amount for mail service by public routes. You have not, therefore, funds applicable to that service and the result will be that you will have a shortage at the end of the year. Next year, at the outset of the session, you will be forced to ask parliament for supplementary estimates, and I shall oppose it because your leader has openly stated that in future there will be no more requests to parliament, at the opening of sessions, for supplementary estimates.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I think that the hon. member did not quite understand what I said a few moments ago, because, after listening attentively to all his explanations, I am obliged to give him the same answer.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Whether the answer is the same or not, it cannot be correct, because you have not the money to meet this situation. You have reduced the appropriation of the railway mail service by $150,000 and you have increased appropriation for mail service on highways; you must therefore have further appropriation voted to keep up the latter service, because this mail route service to-day, is the same which existed when I was a minister.

Mr. MORAND (Translation): That is less expensive.

Mr. MALONEY: I have great sympathy with the attitude taken by the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). Has this railway mail service been cut down outside of the hon. member's county?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes; the minister will admit that it has been cut down in every province.

Mr. MALONEY: Where?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not here to answer for the minister. The railways have cut down their services; in places where they were running six trains a week, they are now running only three.

Mr. MALONEY: Are we justified in permitting such a reduction in the mail service of this country?

Mr. VENIOT: No, we are not, and that is what I am fighting against.

Mr. MALONEY: I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT: This is perhaps a unique occasion, but I agree with the hon. members for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney) and the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). I will continue my remarks in French.

(Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have but a few words to add: it is with reference to the daily mail service of the Témiscouata railway, which crosses the county of Témiscouata and runs as far as Connors in New Brunswick. Since its construction, in 1888, this railway has had a daily service, and all the parishes along this line had a daily mail service. Since July 20, this service has been discontinued and these parishes have but a tri-weekly mail service. That is the reason why I am asking the hon. Postmaster General, who seems well disposed, if it would be possible, without any greater outlay than that previously made for the county of Témiscouata, to carry daily at least until the autumn, the mail by motor truck, from Rivière-du-Loup to Edmundston.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am informed by the officials of the department that we have, in the appropriations, as a whole, a sufficient amount to take care of the needs of the mail service. In the case pointed out by my hon. friend from Temiscouata, I wish to state that, when a service is dispensed with through the decision of the railway commission, we endeavour to replace it by motor-buses—

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Yes, such is the case.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): —or by some other means of transportation.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then, I leave this matter with the hon. Postmaster General and ask him to kindly attend to it.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): With reference to the Temiscouata case, the hon. Postmaster General perhaps forgets that this question has already been placed before him and that I have, this day, received from his department a very gratifying letter stating that the mail service will be resumed again along the highway between these two points. Therefore, the Postmaster General, has already granted the request of the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I grant as far as it is possible reasonable requests, and especially when we have the funds enabling us to comply with the requests thus made to us.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The minister granted my request as regards the Temiscouata mail service, evidently on the strength of my letter.

Mr. VENIOT: There has been a reduction of $150,000 in the item covering mail service by railway. It has been stated that this reduction is due to the curtailment of railway service, in many cases a daily service being cut down to a tri-weekly service. It is stated also that the reduced mail service is being offset by the use of buses, automobiles and teams. The vote for mail service by ordinary land conveyance has not been increased, and I am afraid the minister will be faced with a deficit. However, that is not my business; the minister will have to accept the responsibility. I would point out to him that the money voted for one service cannot be used for another.

I have no desire to take up unduly the time of the committee. I know the minister is anxious to get his estimates through. Were it not that the session is drawing to a close, I would discuss these matters in detail. There is a matter, however, to which I should like to direct the attention of the government. In this regard the minister, being a new member of the cabinet, may not be wholly responsible, but the older members were well aware of all the circumstances. An increase in postal charges has been put into effect which should provide at least $4,000,000 in extra revenue, and if business improves as it should, this increased revenue may amount to practically $5,000,000, which would wipe out the deficit. During 1929 and 1930 the then opposition, now the government, blamed me for not heeding the demands of the rural mail carriers for an increase in salary, but no provision has been made in the present estimates to grant such an increase. During the last election circulars were broadcast throughout the length and breadth of Canada in which I was depicted as having a heart of adamant because I would not listen to the cry of these poorly paid servants of the government. As it is expected that this session will close by the end of next week, there is not the time available to go into this matter in detail, and therefore I will leave aside all contentious discussion. The estimates will not permit of increases being paid this year, but I hope the government will remember its promise and grant these increases next year.

Mr. SPOTTON: Since the house has decided to stay in continuous session and inasmuch as none of us seems to have any business to return to, for the first time this session I propose to take up only a few minutes in order to ask the Postmaster General to see to it that a little heart or soul or cream of human kindness is put into that great post office machine. It is true, as the ex-Postmaster General has said, that a square deal for the rural mail carriers was advocated by many on this side of the house, and I suppose I really led in that matter. It seems too bad that of all the public servants in the Post Office Department, the rural mail carrier is the only man who has, every four years, to tender for his position. The man in the city who to-morrow morning dons a suit of clothes paid for by the Post Office Department, walks around a few hours, goes out in the afternoon and walks around a few hours more, receives $1,400 or $1,500 and two suits of clothes a year and has a retiring allowance; but the fellow who hitches up the old mare and drives over the muddy roads or snowbanks gets the least consideration of all. I have advocated a square deal for these rural mail carriers. The ex-Postmaster General is correct when he says that this party is on record in this respect, and when the finances of the country become more buoyant, when the deficit in the Post Office Department is wiped out, we shall look to the present government to give some relief to the rural mail carrier.

I do not intend to take this matter up in detail; I am going to give the Postmaster General just two examples. I took the ex-Postmaster General to task in connection with this case: In a little village in my constituency the rural mail carrier, who got nine hundred and some dollars for his route, had to travel a certain distance to the post office. Later it was moved a short distance. The Post Office Department sent a public servant, who was getting possibly $3,000 or $4,000 in addition to liberal travelling expenses, to measure that distance, and it was discovered that the poor mail carrier by virtue of the moving of the post office had to travel thirty-one rods, a few feet and a couple of inches less; therefore they reduced his salary by something like $11.37! These figures are not exact, I may say, but they are approximate. In other words, the Post Office Department spent perhaps $100 out of the treasury of Canada in giving a highly paid public servant a beautiful trip in order to cut a few dollars off the wages of a struggling mail carrier. That is the general principle against which I wish to protest. It is a twopenny-ha'penny business. That was the ex-Postmaster General; this is the present Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT: It is the same law.

Mr. SPOTTON: Yes, the same law. In the village of Belgrave in my constituency a gentleman was getting ninety-five cents a day for making three round trips to the railway station, a distance of almost a mile, or I believe they call it seven-eighths of a mile. Then one train was cut off, and this man was immediately notified that because he had to make only two trips to the depot instead of three, by some rule of thumb or Chinese mathematics his pay would be reduced by thirty-two cents—I am not talking by the book—and he would receive sixty-three cents a day for making those two trips. Such action is beneath the dignity of this administration. No administration can do such a thing as that in regard to any one of my constituents, whether he be with me or against me. This man, of course, will not accept the reduction; the job will be put up for public tender, and if I can do anything in that community to have the present Postmaster General pay $2 a day for that work, let me assure the committee I will do it.

As regards the general principle, we have been trying to "keep up with the Joneses" in this country and the Jones family has wrought havoc in private life. We are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on the air mail service, which was a little toy for the ex-Postmaster General to play with. We need very little of that except in the hinterland or for taking the mail to those who live in the far-flung parts of Canada.

The idea of sending a bird with a broken pinion from Toronto to Montreal when there are several fast mail trains a day between those two cities! To do that is absolutely foolish. It is an expenditure I cannot condone in the face of the fact that the man who gets up at five o'clock in the morning receives only sixty-three cents a day for making two trips to Belgrave station. I do not know how the department figures it out. This man has a capital expenditure just as any financial or business organization has. He has himself, a horse, a buggy and a cutter to finance, and simply because he makes only two trips instead of three the horse cannot get along with three shoes instead of four or with two meals instead of three. I do not know by what method it is computed that this man shall have one-third of his pay cut off. I am not blaming the present Postmaster General; he is new in the saddle; he has his feet in the stirrups, and by another year we shall expect him to be an expert rider. I am prepared to give the present Postmaster General a chance, but I resent any such picayune, two-penny-ha'penny paring as has been going on in connection with men who carry the mails from town post offices to depots. Why is it that because a train is temporarily taken off in the summer their pay is immediately reduced?

I have one case in mind. Go to the department and they will say to you: If two trains come in fifteen minutes apart, that is one trip. If a man is driving a bus, his passengers are supposed to wait because of His Majesty's mails, while the money that should be spent on the rural mail service is spent in the air from here to yonder. The man has to keep his passengers sitting in the bus or make a special trip. I wish to ask the Postmaster General to look into this and see that those hard and fast rules, those little regulations of the Medes and Persians that have been left on his doorstep, those little vexatious things, are corrected. The idea of cutting a man's pay from ninety-five to sixty-three cents and then letting millions go through the hopper without a word of protest! The time has come when these men who toil must be paid what is coming to them, while the men who toil not nor spin will lose a little of their purple and fine linen.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish to call attention to the way in which these estimates are made up. They are the same every year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. VENIOT: If you ask that an item of $36,000,000 be carried without its being gone into in detail, I can say to the committee it will not be passed in that way. The item is subdivided into many other items and it is not fair to ask the committee to pass the bulk item of $36,000,000. If hon. members will turn to page 70 of the estimates, they will find the total for post offices amounts to $14,645,040. As far as I am concerned I am prepared to have that pass. I would say now that the chairman may call it carried.

Mr. ROSS: I should like to say a few words on that. Will the minister explain these reductions for post offices?

Mr. VENIOT: I am coming to that. Now that I want to have something passed, it appears the committee does not want to pass it. I am asking the chairman to say "carried," and he will not.

The CHAIRMAN: Unfortunately the vote is a bulk vote, and it is not my province to change it.

Mr. VENIOT: I am going to point out what items of the bulk vote could go through without opposition. There can be no objection to the next item, for the offices of district superintendents of postal service. Then comes the mail service by rail. We have discussed that I think as fully as we need. The next item is mail service by steamboat. I cannot understand how there is a decrease of $45,000 in that item, but if the minister says that that reduction is necessary, I am not going to raise any objection. One reason for it might be the diminution of correspondence between foreign countries, so that not so much space on the steamers would be required as formerly. That can go through. The next item is mail service by ordinary land conveyance. Both myself and hon. gentlemen opposite have expressed ourselves on that, and we will see what can be done later. The next item, mail service by air, I would ask the minister to let stand by itself for open discussion. Then we have miscellaneous expenditure. There is an item of $13,750 for commission to postmasters. There is no objection to that; it is the same amount as last year. The next is an item for travelling charges and expenses for district superintendents, inspectors, and so forth. That is all right. The item for stationery and printing has been fully discussed. Next is an item for manufacturing postage stamps, showing a reduction of $40,000. I cannot understand how, in the light of the changes that have been made since the opening of this house, it is possible to carry on that work with a reduction of $40,000. The printing of postage stamps last year cost practically $260,000.

Mr. MALONEY: You paid too much.

Mr. VENIOT: They did not cost too much. There is a fixed price on that, and the amount paid each year increases with the volume of business of the post office. The government has introduced the three cent stamp, and that will further increase the cost for printing. Hon. gentlemen need not interrupt. If there is to be obstruction of that kind, I can obstruct too. I have enough material here to keep the minister employed for a fortnight; I do not propose to do it, but if hon. gentlemen opposite want that kind of obstruction to go on, I can carry it on too. The next is an item for hand stamps. That is all right. My hon. friend across the way (Mr. Ross) wished some information under miscellaneous expenditure, I think.

Mr. ROSS: I was going to ask the present Postmaster General about it.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not going to give any information. I was mentioning items to which I have no objection.

Mr. ROSS: Every member is interested in his own post office. I notice that there are a good many reductions here for post offices. What is the reason for the reduction of $3,720 at the Kingston post office?

Mr. SAUVE: It is made up as follows: Difference between salaries of employees promoted or who have left the service and the salaries of the new appointees to replace them, $1,380; three positions dropped, $3,240; less 7 statutory increases of $120, $840 and one statutory increase of $60.

Mr. ROSS: Why were three positions dropped?

Mr. SAUVE: I will give the names in a moment.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understand that the postmaster for the city of Ottawa will soon be superannuated. Will the Postmaster General kindly assure the committee that when his successor is appointed, the appointment will be made by promotion within the service, and on the merit system only?

Mr. SAUVE: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Personally I am content that every item in the minister's estimates should pass except those concerning the mail service. Let it be understood that the mail service estimates must stand over until a later time.

Mr. SAUVE: No.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot allow the air mail service estimate to carry without making some remarks.

Mr. SAUVE: My hon. friend has an hour. I understand that the other items are carried.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that only the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) has consented to the passing of the items? What about the rest of the committee? I do not think he constitutes the whole committee.

Mr. VENIOT: I think I said that so far as I was personally concerned they might go through.

Mr. MORAND: Well, I suggest that the chairman read the items so that we may proceed.

Mr. VENIOT: I shall have no other criticism to offer to-night or during this session except with regard to the air mail service, on which there is some information I wish to get from the minister.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I understand that there is but one appropriation covering all items, we can discuss right now all such questions and then vote.

Mr. HEENAN: Before the items are carried may I ask the minister whether it is the policy of the department to give contracts at a very reduced rate to school boys to carry the mail between stations and post offices when there are married men and returned soldiers who have applied for that work? I have in mind a contract for carrying mail from the station at Dryden to the post office, for which there were eleven applicants—six married men, four returned soldiers, and one school boy. I learn from the returns that it was given to the boy at a very reduced rate so that he might put himself through college. That was in a district where there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of unemployed men, many of them returned soldiers.

Mr. SAUVE: We have followed the established procedure; the work was given to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. VENIOT: The work could not be given to a minor.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the minister has been misinformed. Surely a contract cannot be given to a minor whose parents can guarantee for him so that the boy may put himself through school when at the same time returned soldiers whose families are starving are out of work. Surely that cannot be the policy of the department.

Mr. SAUVE: If the boy is under the age of eighteen years we cannot give a contract. If a complaint is made, it is considered.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, I shall not say what the minister can give, because it appears to me that this government can do almost anything. Is it the policy of the government that a school boy whose parents can give a guarantee may have a man's job when there are married men who could have been given the same contract?

Mr. SAUVE: I have given my answer—we cannot give contracts to boys under eighteen.

Mr. VENIOT: But he has got it.

Mr. SAUVE: If the hon. member has any complaint I should like to have the name of the boy.

Mr. HEENAN: The present Postmaster General has not been in office long enough to resort to this kind of manipulation. Surely it is not the policy of the government to give a contract worth about a thousand dollars a year to a school boy at $480 so that the boy may get through school. If that is the policy of the government for heaven's sake don't let me hear hon. members opposite say any more about upholding the rights of labour. Of eleven men who made application a boy named William C. Gammon got the contract for $480. The reason he received the work may be shown by the following letter written by the district superintendent of postal service:

> The matter was further taken up with his parents through the postmaster, Dryden, and it has been further ascertained that he is a school boy and desires to go through college, financing himself with the contract payment. His parents are willing to sign the contract and assume full responsibility but feel that a four-year term would be more than the boy would care to do and suggest a two-year term as sufficient.

That is the most flagrant piece of robbery I have ever known to be practised on the people of the constituency I have the honour to represent. Men with families are refused work which a school boy obtains at a price of $480. His parents would not sign a contract for four years, so the term was changed to two years. I should like the Postmaster General to consider the cancellation of the contract and its being given to a married man.

Mr. SAUVE: The matter to which my hon. friend has referred is not one of policy, but is of a purely legal nature. If the boy is too young I understand he had no right to make a contract, and when a complaint is made the matter will be investigated.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. QUINN: I am surprised to hear the remark of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) with regard to the awarding of mail contracts to school boys. The Post Office Department of the late administration of which my hon. friend was a member, awarded in my constituency a mail contract to a boy who at the present time is only sixteen years of age and is still going to school.

Mr. HEENAN: That was wrong, but two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. QUINN: Yes, but my hon. friend did not open his mouth when he was sitting on this side of the house.

Mr. HEENAN: If it had been mentioned I would have done so.

Mr. POULIOT: His name was McConachie.

Mr. MALONEY: I am pleased to see that a reduction of $400,000 has been made in connection with air mail service. When reference is made to that service I think the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) should blush. He cannot be made to blush, however.

Mr. VENIOT: Not so easily as that.

Mr. MALONEY: If I were Postmaster General to-day I would expend on air mail service not $1,500,000 but less than $100,000. There are only two or three corners in this country where that service is required, one in the far north and another in the far west.

Sir EUGENE FISET: And the third at Rimouski.

Mr. MALONEY: The Post Office Department is supposed to be maintained for service and not for profit. If that be the case the Postmaster General should extend the rural mails throughout this country, though I will confess to hon. gentlemen opposite that so far I have been unable to secure one route in South Renfrew since this government came into power.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to get some information with regard to the air mail service. What was the amount expended on air mail service during the year ending March 31, 1931?

Mr. SAUVE: The total amount was about $1,299,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Reference has been made to the Postmaster General reducing the expenditure on air mail service by some $412,000. Last year the estimate was $1,912,000, of which $1,299,000 was spent; this year the estimate is $1,500,000, so the government has increased by about $200,000 the estimated expenditure for the coming year.

The reason $1,912,000 was estimated as necessary last year was in order to complete the connection of the route from the maritime provinces to Winnipeg via Montreal, either from Montreal to Toronto and from there on to Winnipeg, or from Montreal to the northern part of Ontario and then across to Winnipeg. Tenders were called for to cover that service; tenders were received, and it was estimated that it would require about $478,000 to do the work for the remainder of the year, and that in all the route might cost something like $600,000. That money was not expended by the former government; the contract was not let. The tenders were received and opened three days before the dissolution of parliament, and the awarding of the contract was left in abeyance until after the election. However, the department did spend about $1,299,000 on air service. I know there has been some severe criticism of the air mail service, but I believe if hon. gentlemen opposite and perhaps some on this side of the house would go more carefully into the great benefit it has been and will be in future I am sure they will cease their criticisms.

In reply to a question which I asked, the right hon. Prime Minister told the house that the government had the right to cancel existing contracts by giving one month's notice That is quite true, and we were told also that the notice had been given but that it was not the intention to cancel the entire air mail service as established under your humble servant. That month has expired, and I understand that a further notice covering an additional month has been given. I am anxious to know what routes are to be kept up. If this $1,500,000 passes this committee there will be sufficient money to maintain all the routes that were in operation last year.

We desired to link up the east and the west, because until that was done we could not hope to make the air mail service pay. We began in 1928 by establishing an air mail service from Rimouski to Montreal, and by so doing we were able to land transatlantic mail in Montreal more quickly than transatlantic mail could be landed in New York. This placed the business men of the Dominion on an equal footing to the business men of the United States, who formerly received their transatlantic mail from a day and a half to two days sooner than it was received by the north Atlantic route. That meant a great deal to the business people of Canada; it was appreciated by them and they took advantage of it. Later in the same year we established an air mail service to the northern shores of the gulf of St. Lawrence and carried mail to those people who, in the winter time, formerly had very poor service. We then inaugurated an air mail service to the Magdalen islands, where previously they had not had a service in the winter. That service to the Magdalen islands has paid for itself, and the service on the north shore of the St. Lawrence has paid its way also, if I can judge by the poundage carried. We established air mail service to Prince Edward Island in the winter time when steamship communication was interfered with, and in fact at other times also in order to accommodate the business men of the island. We delivered mail by air from Moncton on a Saturday so that the mail would be distributed to the business houses that afternoon, and on Monday they answered the mail by an outward service. If that had not been done the mail would not have been distributed to them until three o'clock Monday afternoon, so by the air mail we have helped the business men of Prince Edward Island. That service is also paying its way.

We established air mail service to the far-flung sections of the west, up the Mackenzie river into Aklavik, three hundred miles within the Arctic circle, and that service, under a two cent rate, to-day is paying its way and has a surplus. Formerly we delivered mail by dog teams in the winter time and by boat in the summer time, and we paid $41,000 for a service which was of absolutely no use to those people. When we were considering inaugurating air mail service we called for contracts under both systems, the old and the new. There was a difference of only $5,000 or $6,000 between the cost of the air mail service and the cost of the old service, so we adopted the air mail service and instead of giving those people a mail once or twice a year we gave them several deliveries of mail a year. In the Mackenzie district, up to within eight hundred miles of the Arctic, we are giving a service equal to almost any other service in Canada, and to-day that service is more than paying its way. We gave a two cent service in the mining districts of Ontario and Quebec, and every one of them is paying its way to-day. We wished to give a more extended service to the commerce of Canada. We found that American business men, through their air mail service, were getting ahead of our Canadian business men and we therefore established a number of routes such as the route from Halifax to Saint John and then to Montreal, from Moncton to Montreal, from Montreal to Toronto, from Montreal to Schenectady, from Toronto to Buffalo, and through the prairie provinces. Those routes had a five cent service. They are not paying their way, but the increased volume of business, after the service has been in operation only three years, indicates that within two years it will pay. If it had been possible for me as Postmaster General to link up Montreal direct with Winnipeg, that service would be paying to-day.

Let me appeal to the Postmaster General not to cut out any important branch of the air mail service. I know that the service from St. John and Moncton on to Montreal is not paying, and my hon. friend says it never will pay. Very poor encouragement, coming from a member of the maritime provinces. But that is not so; the service will pay. In the last three months of the last fiscal year the service between St. John and Montreal increased over 30 per cent; and when it is linked up with Halifax, and we have a route from Halifax to Moncton, from Moncton to St. John, and from St. John to Montreal, the service will be used so extensively that it will pay.

Let me now give the figures to show the poundage carried over these routes. On the Amos-Chibougamau route the poundage was 2,224 and the cost $1,200. With that poundage at $1.20 it more than pays the cost. Take the Amos-Simcoe route: the poundage was 3,305 and the cost $1,100. On the Fort Murray-Aklavik route the poundage was 62,747, to that outlandish and far-flung section of Canada. Over that route we have a postal parcel rate carrying all the furs from that section to civilization. On the Leamington-Pelee island route the poundage is 17,103, and on the Montreal-Albany route it is 21,689 pounds of first class matter at $3 per pound. There you have, within $7,000, this important route paying its way. Take the Montreal-Detroit route: the poundage is 39,040. There there was a deficit. The business in increasing, however, and the moment we link up with the network of the American air mail service, getting communication with Mexico, that service will pay its way. Then we have the Montreal-Rimouski route, carrying 53,042 pounds; the Peace River-North Vermilion route, 26,223 pounds, at $1.20 a pound, the cost being $3,200. Then there is the Quebec-Seven islands, Seven islands-Anticosti-Moncton-Magdalen islands route. The cost is $30,000, the poundage being 39,289. This is really two routes in one. Next we have the Narrows-Lake Sioux Lookout, with a poundage of 40,964; the Winnipeg-Calgary-Regina-Edmonton route, newly started, carrying 64,242 pounds. For the Winnipeg-Pembina route I have not the figures. On the Moncton-Charlottetown route the poundage is 43,846.

Mr. QUINN: What is the cost of the Moncton-Charlottetown route?

Mr. VENIOT: That is $15,750. This is only an emergency route used in winter. On the Toronto-Buffalo route there is a poundage of 43,880. With regard to the Montreal-Ottawa route, I may explain that this was only an experiment. I knew at the time that it would not pay and I feel now it will not pay. But it was only once a week and was provided in order to connect with the boat at Rimouski. The Montreal-Quebec route, which is very costly, was also a trial route. When we came to carry out our plans for the Montreal-Quebec route we found we could not call at Quebec and at the same time continue on to St. John and to Moncton, owing to climatic conditions and locations. Quebec was therefore cut out of the general route, but was allowed to remain in for a short time so far as Quebec and Montreal were concerned. We had other routes such as the Lac du Bonnet, with a poundage of 40,715. The air mail service with the two-cent rate has more than paid its way.

There is a surplus of between $100,000 and $116,000; and this additional one cent, which I am informed by the Prime Minister will be added to all first class postage, will give another $199,000. The additional one cent added to the five cent rate already established, will give an additional revenue of over $230,000. There you have an additional revenue, by increase in postage over these routes, assuming that the business keeps up, of nearly $400,000. The deficit of the past will amount to about $700,000 in round figures, so that with the extra postage and increased volume of business, this air mail service could be carried on and show a deficit of less than $300,000.

There are gaps in the service between the Atlantic and Pacific coast. One gap is between Sudbury and Winnipeg or Toronto and Winnipeg, and the other from Winnipeg to Vancouver. To give a complete service Winnipeg to Vancouver would cost about $370,000 or less per year, and such a service would pay for itself within a very short time. A plane could leave Halifax with 600 pounds of first class matter; it could drop and pick up mail on the way through to the coast, and this complete service could be inaugurated for $3,000,000. I leave it to the officials of the Post Office Department and the Department of National Revenue to verify these figures. This service would pay its way and bring the maritimes 64 hours closer to Vancouver.

If there is one thing I am desirous of seeing kept up, it is the air mail service. I think I can say without boasting that I had the courage to convince the government of the advisability of putting this service into operation. I saw that our friends to the south were taking advantage of our laxity in extending this service in Canada. I noticed that there was a meeting of financiers in Montreal and Toronto to form companies by which it was hoped to gain control of civil aviation in this country. It was shown that money could be made out of this proposition because these men were interested in air mail and commercial services in the United States, and were hoping to obtain a monopoly of the services in both countries. I knew that the policy of the Department of National Defence was to establish civil aviation in Canada; I felt that an air mail service would be a foundation for commercial and civil aviation, and I recommended that the government put the service into operation. I came before the house in 1928 with this proposal, and it was accepted. I never had anything else but the fullest faith in its success, and I have even greater faith to-day after two or three years of experience.

If Canada takes a retrograde step in the matter of air mail services our friends to the south will try to take advantage of it. At the present time there is an organization in the state of Maine which hopes to inaugurate an air mail service from Boston to Bangor, Bangor to St. Stephen, St. Stephen to Saint John, and Saint John to Moncton and Halifax. They cannot operate an air mail service in Canada without first obtaining the permission of the Post Office Department, and they cannot operate a commercial air service without first obtaining the permission of the Department of National Defence. Has the Post Office Department granted that permission? I am not opposed to its being granted provided it is stipulated that Canada may step in when she is ready to take over the service on the Canadian side. When we are ready we should be able to say: you will stop at the border and we will take the mail through Canada and deliver to you mail from Canada destined for the New England states.

The air mail service offers a means of encouragement to flying. We have to-day in Canada some of the best pilots in the world. Canada is recognized as having the best pilots anywhere. These men made their mark not only during the war but after they returned from the war. American companies are offering higher salaries to our pilots than they receive here, but they showed themselves to be patriots during the war and they are again showing their patriotism by refusing to go to the United States even at a higher salary. If Americans are permitted to establish an air mail service in Canada they will soon attempt to take over the commercial and civil air services and drive our own people out of the business. If this service is permitted to operate between Boston and the maritime provinces I hope the government will take care that it is nothing but an air mail service. These men should not be privileged to do any commercial work; they should be confined to air mail service.

I have made a particular study of this matter. The officials of the department will confirm the fact that I spent many sleepless nights during 1927 and 1928 when we were considering the details of this service. We had the expert advice of the best men in the Department of National Defence and the Post Office Department. When we were not sure of the steps to be taken, our officials went to the United States to investigate conditions there. The American air mail service during its first three years was an utter failure from a financial standpoint. The deficits were enormous because they adopted the wrong system—the poundage system, under which they could not hope to make a financial success. We in Canada, profiting by their mistake, adopted a mileage system. A mileage system prevails in nearly every portion of Canada except in one or two outlying places where hazardous conditions prevail and under our contracts we specify a certain poundage at so much per mile up to that poundage, but above it so much per pound extra. When our United States friends found out that Canada was succeeding so well after its second year in the air mail service, what did they do? We had the pleasure of having our United States friends come to us and consult with officials of the Post Office Department and experts of the Department of National Defence to find out how it was that we were succeeding so well in our air mail service. After they had interviewed the officials I have mentioned, they returned home and changed their whole system. To-day the system adopted, following the Canadian plan, is operating a great deal more to their advantage than the one which they had previously used.

In conclusion let me say I do not mind honest criticism of an enterprise of this kind; I do not mind what criticism may be hurled at me for having inaugurated and undertaken that system in Canada, but I ask those who feel they should criticize to study first the whole situation as I have laid it before hon. members to-night. It is not very often I am able to say that I agree with the Tory party. I have been a long time in public life; I have been a Liberal by conviction; I have remained so; I see no reason why I should change, and for that reason perhaps my mind may be biased on some of the questions that the party which I am opposing may bring up. But this is one question on which I think we can agree. I urge upon the government that they continue the policy that has already been inaugurated and extend it as necessity requires. If they do so, they will receive my hearty support.

Let me say just one more word in conclusion.

Mr. CANTLEY: The third conclusion.

Mr. VENIOT: If my hon. friend does not like it he can leave. I happen to have the floor, and I do not care whether he likes my way of doing things or not. While I have the floor the hon. gentleman has no right to interrupt me. I think I should say a word on behalf of those who are flying in Canada. Is it known to hon. gentlemen that Canada holds the record to-day for the fastest commercial air service in the world? I am talking now about commercial air service and not of those experts who fly for the purpose of making time. We hold the record of 248 miles an hour in the delivery of air mail, and this was not done for the purpose of making a record. We hold another world record for long distance run of 196 miles an hour. Canada has become famous throughout the world for her splendid pilots, men who were able to attain their present standing by participating in the inauguration of the air mail service of the Dominion.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) on the great task he performed in connection with aerial mail service. He brought out many good points in his speech, however, I must state that if we have found it necessary to modify the policy which he laid down, it is because of economic necessity and also because we have to take into consideration the decrease in revenue of our department due to the crisis which prevails throughout the country. When our finances are in better shape, we shall do our utmost to keep up with the country's progress as regards aerial mail and other matters.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Can the Postmaster General point out what mail routes will be discontinued or will there be any discontinued?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): First, there is the Toronto-Buffalo route.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Will there be any others or will this be the only one?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There will be the temporary contracts, such as Montreal-Moncton.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): That will be continued.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes. We are looking into the matter and we have up to August 15, to decide. In the meantime, we shall see what it is possible for us to do.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): If you do not intend to continue, I object to having the appropriations voted.

Mr. QUINN: The previous speaker, the ex-Postmaster General, made reference in his lengthy remarks on this item to the air mail service between the maritime provinces and Montreal. The Postmaster General and his department are quite familiar with what has been done and promised with respect to this service. Representations were made to the former Postmaster General by the people of Halifax for an air mail service in order that that city might be connected up with the Canadian air mail service. The former Postmaster General promised the people of Halifax that an air mail service would be established if they would provide the proper facilities for an airport. On that understanding and guarantee the city of Halifax purchased a large strip of land in the western portion of the city and equipped it for the reception of airships, but I regret to say that promise was not carried out.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot let that go by without correcting the hon. member.

Mr. QUINN: I have listened to the hon. member for three quarters of an hour.

Mr. VENIOT: But the hon. member is making a statement which is not correct. I have a right to correct it.

Mr. QUINN: I stated that the hon. member promised the people of Halifax he would give them an air mail service if they would provide the proper facilities for an airport.

Mr. VENIOT: They had not their port facilities provided last July.

Mr. QUINN: I did not say anything of the kind. I said that on the strength of that promise—

Mr. VENIOT: How could I keep the promise if they did not carry out their part?

Mr. QUINN: I will repeat the words of the right hon. leader of the opposition, Mr Chairman, and ask you to preserve order. I would say to the Postmaster General that the port of Halifax, at great expense to the people of the city, has now provided its part. Representations have been made repeatedly by delegations to the minister and the department from the city of Halifax, the mayor of Halifax, who was here only a few weeks ago, the boards of trade of the city of Halifax and of Dartmouth, Moncton and Saint John with regard to the improvement of the port of Halifax in connection with an air mail service. Halifax, as is well known to all Canadians, is the finest harbour on the Atlantic seaboard and the nearest ocean port to Europe. For these reasons I would ask the minister to take the matter into very serious consideration before making a final decision with regard to the refusal of the department to carry out the promise which was made some time ago to provide an air mail service between Halifax and the cities in the western part of Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to ask the Postmaster General a question with regard to a return, No. 255, which was brought down some time ago, and particularly with regard to the mail service on Cape Sable Island. In the first place I may remind the Postmaster General that recently the mail contracts there have been cancelled and new contracts let. Apparently on the 13th of May a contract existing for the carriage of the mail between Stony Island and North East Point wharf was cancelled and a new contract let at the same rate. Would the Postmaster General give me the reason why?

Mr. SAUVE: I will give my hon. friend the reasons to-morrow privately, for I have not them here.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend also permit me at the same time to ask another question? Perhaps he may get the information with regard to this as well. I find by this return that on two occasions, on February 3, 1931, and on February 28, 1931, the department, through Mr. Anderson, the superintendent, addressed a letter to W. H. Currie, of Shelburne, and asked him for his recommendation and advice whether or not the mail contracts on Sable Island should be continued. The letter of February 3, 1931, mentions that the contract for the Clark's Harbour wharf and Orion wharf mail service will expire on June 30, 1931. The contractor is Gilbert E. Atkinson, and the rate $350 per annum. The next paragraph reads:

> I should be glad of your advice as to whether it would be in the public interest to allow this service to remain with the present contractor whose name is given.

The letter is addressed to W. H. Currie, Esq., Shelburne, N.S., and is signed by G. C. Anderson, superintendent. On February 28, 1931, another letter is addressed to Mr. Currie with regard to the contract for the Clark's Harbour wharf and Orion wharf mail service, stating that it would expire on June 30, 1931, and the same information is asked for. Then on page 50 of the return comes a letter headed, "Shelburne Coast Guard," reading as follows:

> Shelburne, N.S.,
> March 5, 1931.
> Mr. G. C. Anderson,
> Superintendent of Postal Service,
> Ottawa, Ont.
> Dear Sir:—
>
> Re: Mail Carrying Tenders
> We recommend the following to put up for tender:
>
> Thomas Freeman, Sable River West and Sable River Railway Station.
>
> Thomas Harrington, Sable River and Railway Station.
>
> Gilbert E. Atkinson, Clark's Harbour Wharf and Orion Wharf.
>
> Mrs. Etta McGarron, Barrington and Brass Hill.
>
> The following contracts we recommend for renewal:
>
> Charles D. Hagar, Roseway and Railway Station.
>
> J. C. Sears, Jordan Bay, East Side and Jordan Railway.
>
> Joseph E. Golden, Gunning Cove and Railway Station.
>
> Clarence Long, Birchtown and Railway Station.

The letter is signed by W. H. Currie, President, Conservative Association.

I want to ask my hon. friend the Postmaster General how it is that he is writing to Mr. Currie asking for advice in these matters?

Mr. SAUVE: Generally we follow the practice that has been adopted in the past. I will give the information to-morrow to my hon. friend.

Mr. RALSTON: On whose recommendation does the Postmaster General write to Mr. Currie asking for this advice?

Mr. SAUVE: I will give that information.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Currie is not even the defeated candidate in the county of Shelburne.

Item agreed to.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the Postmaster General have any supplementary estimates?

Mr. SAUVE: For a few dollars.

Progress reported.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is not in his place. This motion falls within the category of those we have dealt with several times during the session. It involves the question of costs of production and the information given is confidential. Such parts as may not be confidential the hon. gentleman is entitled to receive, but beyond that we cannot comply with the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried?

Mr. BENNETT: No; we had better wait until the hon. gentleman is in his place.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

FARM AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

POWER TO DEAL WITH AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS AND LABOUR SITUATION—MAINTENANCE OF ORDER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting, to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to employment and farm relief; and for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada; and to authorize the governor in council to expend for the said purposes out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as may from time to time be necessary.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, although this motion is not debatable at this stage, I should like to ask a question concerning its wording. It appears to be ambiguous in a certain particular. The motion reads:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to employment and farm relief;

Does that mean unemployment relief and farm relief or does it mean in respect to employment and in respect to farm relief? I understood that the measure was to be in respect of the relief of unemployment and the relief of distress in rural districts. As it is now worded it would mean that the government is putting forward a principle of obligation on the government to furnish employment rather than to provide unemployment relief.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the resolution is ambiguous in the sense in which my right hon. friend suggests. If there is any doubt the word "unemployment" can be used.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the only point I was making.

Mr. BENNETT: With the consent of the house I move to add the prefix "un" before the word "employment."

Motion as amended agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I see in the press that some letters patent or documents, have been issued concerning the appointment and functions of His Excellency, the Governor General of Canada. Could the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) lay these papers on the table of the house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was as surprised as the hon. gentleman when I read in the papers this morning the item to which he refers. I did not know from what source this information had been obtained. These papers may have been laid upon the table of the British house, but no motion has been made in this house to supply such documents. Had such a motion been made it would have been agreed to. A copy of the instructions of His Excellency, the Governor General, will be laid upon the table, if that is what my hon. friend suggests. I shall endeavour to ascertain the source of the information. No new instructions have been issued since His Excellency was appointed the latter part of March or the early part of April this year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does the newspaper report give substantially what are the instructions?

Mr. BENNETT: I will table the instructions.

RIVIERE DU LOUP STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker inasmuch as it has been said in reference number 389, tabled June 29,

1931, that it was then impossible to bring down the information called for by that return because at the time the estimates of the Canadian National Railways were being dealt with by the select standing committee on railways and shipping, and whereas since that date the final report of that committee containing no such particulars has been dealt with by the house,—

1. Are provisions made in the Canadian National Railways budget of 1931-32 for the construction of new stations?

2. If so, how many?

3. Where are they to be constructed?

4. What is the total estimate, including capital account expense or other, prepared by the Canadian National Railways for each station?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that there are not to be any new stations built this year. I think that answers the hon. gentleman's question.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUTHORITY TO ISSUE SECURITIES FOR $68,500,000 TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS IN 1931

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 79, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1931.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. MANION moved the third reading of the bill.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that when the resolution upon which this bill is based was presented to the house, a statement of the situation was made to hon. members as to the necessity of the measure. That is why no discussion has taken place in committee and why no further exception will be taken to the immediate third reading.

Mr. MANION: It has been dealt with in committee.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I desired to make it clear that the bill is not going through without consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES TO BE ISSUED UNDER CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCING ACT, 1931

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 83, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of securities to be issued under the Canadian National Railways Financing Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to make the same observation with regard to Bill No. 83 as I did with respect to Bill No. 79. My understanding is that both of these measures are based first of all upon the discussion that took place in the committee on railways and shipping—

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —that members of the committee were agreed upon the advisability of these measures being introduced; and also that when the resolutions on which the bills were based were before the house an explanation to that effect and in addition with regard to the essential features of the measures was made to the satisfaction of all sides of the house.

Mr. MANION: While there is a slight difference in the method adopted, this is the right to guarantee the securities of the Canadian National Railways, and it has been done in the past in practically the same way.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to take this opportunity to say a few words regarding the policy adopted by the Canadian National Railways in my constituency and to ask the Minister of Railways to use his good offices in this respect. The Canadian National Railways are now applying to the Board of Railway Commissioners to close up three stations or receiving agencies which are situated in the parishes of Maria, St. Siméon de Bonaventure and Marcil between Shigawake and Port Daniel. Maria station has been in existence for over forty years, in fact since the road was built. The population of the parish is about 2,000. I have received numerous petitions and protests against this policy. The chief claim is that in a time of stress such as this the Canadian National Railways should not deprive the people of the limited facilities they have at present for shipping their agricultural products, fish and so forth, and that the status of these stations should be continued until the crisis is passed. The revenues are fairly reasonable and I do not think the policy of the Canadian National Railways in depriving the people of these facilities is a good one, because the result will be that the people will resort to transportation by water, thus still further decreasing the revenues of the railway. I would ask the minister to use his good offices to see that these services are continued.

Mr. MANION: The Canadian National Railways will lose a certain amount of revenue by closing stations throughout the country and protests have been received, but they are taking this action only where they find that this means an actual gain in money and sometimes a large gain. As a matter of fact, if the people would continue to utilize the railways, the services would not be cut off. I shall, however, be glad to pass my hon. friend's representations on to the railway. The matter is in their hands, not in those of the government.

Mr. CAYLEY: Has the minister any provision for the payment of interest and principal on those guaranteed bonds of which I spoke the other day? I particularly mentioned the Toronto Surburban.

Mr. MANION: I think, in the hon. member's absence, the question was asked by another hon. member. I pointed out that we have nothing to do with that. The bonds of the Toronto Suburban are guaranteed neither by the government nor by the national railways. It was a subsidiary, and while it is true the interest was paid in the past, the national railways, I am informed, due again to the same reasons that I gave another member a minute ago, namely, decreased earnings, have decided not to pay the interest, because on this subsidiary they were down $100,000 a year on operating expenses and, including interest, $200,000. Therefore I presume they have decided to cut out the interest payment just as many industrial corporations have discontinued paying dividends on stocks. I have no control over the matter; it is entirely in the hands of the Canadian National railway management.

Mr. CAYLEY: I would infer that as soon as times get better, interest payments will be resumed?

Mr. MANION: I cannot say that. As a matter of fact, the national railways for some years, indeed I think ever since they took over the Toronto Suburban, have found that it has been a losing proposition, and I think their decision is to shut off the services altogether for the same reason that I gave to an hon. member, namely, that they are not getting the traffic. I understand they are willing to turn the railway over to the trustee of the debenture stock and let him handle it as desired; it is stock and not bonds about which my hon. friend inquires. The railways will give every facility for having the stockholders' trustee take it over without cost and handle it in any way to suit his wishes.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR

ADVANCE OF $450,000 FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners not exceeding $450,000 for the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works, and the deposit of the debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Duranleau thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 141, to provide a further loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. DURANLEAU moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Explain, please.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will explain it in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think there is any desire to delay this measure, but inasmuch as hon. members have not seen the bill, if there is to be no explanation, it might be permitted to stand. I would suggest, if it is not too late, that this be done and that we have the second reading at a subsequent time.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to be disagreeable to the minister. I simply want information.

Motion stands.

SAINT JOHN HARBOUR

ADVANCE OF $10,000,000 FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 134, to provide for a further loan to the Saint John harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Loan of $10,000,000 to harbour commissioners for terminal facilities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just wish to observe in respect of this bill that my recollection is that there was a very full discussion on the resolution, and the committee got most of the details at that time.

THREE RIVERS HARBOUR

ADVANCE OF $700,000 FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 135, to provide for a further loan to the Three Rivers harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Loan of $700,000 to harbour commissioners for terminal facilities.

Mr. POULIOT: On this section I have just two questions to ask of the minister. Owing to an article that has been published in a local paper pointing out that the loan is being voted by the house at the same time as a by-election is taking place in the county of Three Rivers, I would ask if it is understood that the harbour commissioners of Three Rivers will proceed with this work, whatever may be the result of the election in Three Rivers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: That is a very serious question, and I want an answer from the minister.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be glad to answer it. The answer is, surely.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. My second question is this: Is it understood that only citizens of Three Rivers of a certain political complexion will be employed on the work, or will the unemployed be able to work on the harbour whatever may be their political colour?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It seems to me that my hon. friend has in mind what he would do himself under similar circumstances, but I can say to the committee that any citizen who is able and willing to work, irrespective of his political colour, will be given the chance to work by the harbour commissioners so far as there is work available.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. That is very satisfactory.

NORTH FRASER HARBOUR

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 139, to amend the North Fraser Harbour Commissioners Act, 1913.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Certain by-laws confirmed.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister explain section 4?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The explanation is contained in the explanatory note on the page opposite to the bill. By-law 115 provides the tariff of cargo rates effective on goods landed, shipped or deposited within the limits of the North Fraser harbour. It repeals and replaces a by-law of the same number approved by order in council of April 20, 1927. The rates in the present by-law 115 are considerably reduced, and are the result of conferences and agreements arrived at between the members of the corporation, representatives of the four municipalities adjacent to the harbour, and other interests affected. The by-law 115 and the order in council confirming it, of November 1, 1927, are set out in full in the Canada Gazette of November 12, 1927, at pages 1406-1409.

BONUS ON WHEAT

PAYMENT OF FIVE CENTS A BUSHEL ON WHEAT EXPORTED FROM WESTERN PROVINCES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 140, respecting wheat.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Payment of five cents a bushel on wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: In order that there may be little difficulty in the operation of this measure I asked the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada to go into the matter with some degree of care and as a result of his suggestions the bill appears in its present form. It covers wheat grown in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in the year 1931, and delivered to any licensed elevator in the western inspection division, commission merchant, track buyer or grain dealer as defined by the Canada Grain Act. The chairman was of opinion that this is the proper language to employ to cover the intention of the bill. In view of the limited discussion which took place the other day I may add that the next paragraph provides the regulations for payment of the money and makes the further provision that the act shall expire on July 31, 1932.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question concerning the operation of the proposed legislation. How will it affect the wheat grown in the Peace River area of British Columbia. Will the farmers in that area receive the benefit of this legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Well, why should not the wheat grown in the Peace River area of British Columbia come within the operation of the act, the same as that grown in Alberta? The two areas adjoin one another. My information is that there are about a million bushels of wheat grown in the Peace River area of British Columbia. Why should not wheat grown in that area be entitled to the same bonus as wheat grown in the adjoining province of Alberta?

Mr. BENNETT: The wheat grown in the Peace River area is partly in Alberta and partly in British Columbia. So far as my information goes the major part is grown in Alberta, and the measure now before the committee is intended to cover only the three great wheat producing provinces. To undertake to make it cover a small area or section of one province presented such difficulties that it was thought undesirable to make any such attempt. The conditions under which wheat is raised in the new territory, as compared with the older part, is well known to all. Such action could not reasonably be taken.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a considerable quantity of wheat grown in the Peace River block of British Columbia. Undoubtedly there will be considerable dissatisfaction if those farmers are not to receive five cents per bushel.

Mr. BENNETT: The farmers who live in Alberta will receive the benefit.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not speaking of those who live in Alberta, but of those who have their residence in British Columbia at points adjacent to Alberta and who do not enjoy the railway facilities for the transportation of grain enjoyed by their neighbours in Alberta. To that extent they are handicapped. As it is arranged now I presume the Board of Grain Commissioners will supervise payments, make regulations and decide to whom the money will be paid. Generally speaking it will be paid on wheat cheques to the farmers through the elevator companies.

Mr. BENNETT: To the producers.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Through the elevator companies, or purchasers from the grain growers.

Mr. BENNETT: Through the payee, as described on the grain tickets. Sometimes the payee is a bank, and sometimes, as my hon. friend knows, it is not a bank. As he has very properly said payments will be made through the Board of Grain Commissioners, to the producers. The business of the grain commissioners is to see that the money reaches the producers in connection with their grain tickets. My hon. friend knows better than I that there are great difficulties in connection with mortgages on crops. The chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners is working upon the regulations and believes there will be no difficulty in carrying into effect the intentions of the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) in regard to the Peace River section of British Columbia. As the Prime Minister knows, the nature of the soil in that particular part of British Columbia is the same as in the Alberta section. It seems to me that there will be discrimination against wheat producers in Pouce Coupé and Rolla, British Columbia, who would not receive the five cents a bushel, while the Alberta producers at Spirit River, almost next door, would receive it. It seems to me that possibly some amendment might be introduced to extend the benefit of this legislation to the Fraser river section of British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a small area in the southern part of British Columbia in the same way.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize that I am heartily in favour of any relief that may be or should be given to any real needy person in this Dominion. However, when the resolution preceding this bill was introduced the other day I made a protest against it on the ground that I did not believe that it was the duty of this government to propose any such sectional measure. I think my hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) has made a protest which should be considered by this house. But I do believe that this is a bill which should not be received and passed by this parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): No sir, it is not carried. I think there is no more uncalled for, unreasonable and indefensible bill —and goodness knows there have been many introduced by the government during this session and the special session last September. What is the situation? My right hon. friend the Prime Minister told us the other day that he had four reasons—

Mr. BENNETT: Five.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Well, possibly five; which he advanced in favour of the passage of this measure. The first reason was the reduction in the price of wheat. Does not that apply equally to every variety of grain and of every other product of the farms of Canada? If you are going to introduce any such measure why should it not be made general in its application? His second reason was that the prices which we are getting for wheat bear no relation to the cost of production. Does that not hold good in the production of every other article of the farm? I should like any hon. member to get up and say that the farmers of his constituency are able to produce at a profit. His third reason was the necessity of a measure of relief among western farmers. I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to realize that in the burnt-up districts of the three western provinces there are, according to the last report, 150,000 farmers who will not have a bushel of grain of any kind this season. They certainly will not benefit at all from this sectional measure. In the other sections of the three prairie provinces there are farmers who have the prospect of a 20,000 bushel crop, and they will get a pure handout under this bill of no less than $1,000 each. Why should this house consider seriously any such sectional arrangement? Then his fourth reason was the psychological effect, which he described as the fact that the wheat-producing capabilities of the three prairie provinces had placed Canada on the map as a great wheat-producing country. I would ask him and every other member this question: Do you want to encourage our farmers at the present time to grow a greater quantity of wheat in the face of present conditions and present prices? Furthermore, there is not a large stock-producing farmer in those three western provinces to-day but will feel like feeding at least a portion of his wheat crop to his live stock; this bill does not encourage him to do so at all.

I want this house to realize, when the Prime Minister sets up the three western provinces as being a great wheat-producing country, that as far as the agriculture of Canada is concerned the old province of Ontario produced in 1929 over 31 per cent of the entire agricultural production of the Dominion. When we consider the province of Quebec along with Ontario, we find that in 1929 they produced 62.71 per cent of the entire agricultural production of this Dominion. In 1930 they produced over 55 per cent of that production. And yet, sir, here is a proposition so sectional that with the exception of the three prairie provinces no other portion of the Dominion is entitled to anything. On June 29 I asked the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) what parts of Canada were taken into consideration with respect to this proposition. He told me that this payment of 5 cents per bushel applied to the wheat producers of this country. Of course, he did say afterwards that it had not been considered in council. Nevertheless that was the reasonable, unbiased opinion that he gave expression to as a result of that degree of reason of which he is possessed—and we all give him credit for considerable reasoning power—but it seems to me that when he and other members of the cabinet go into council they have to throw their brains into the waste-paper basket. We have often heard the hon. Minister of Railways talk about the farmers in his district. Do you think he will go out and tell them that this is a provision not intended for their benefit, that they are too wealthy to need any help like this, and that this applies only to the farmers of the three western provinces? Do you think he will go out and tell them that? I noticed the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) in his seat a moment ago, but he has since gone out. I wonder if he will go to the good county of Oxford and tell his farmer constituents that they are not entitled to any consideration along these lines? Will the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) tell his farmer constituents up in new Ontario that they are so wealthy they are not entitled to any of this handout?

Mr. ROBINSON: Are there any crop failures in Ontario?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): If my hon. friend had watched the press reports he would have seen that in the vicinity of Stratford, in the first twenty days of July, no less than 8·51 inches of rain fell in that locality, at the very time when our farmers were trying to save the hay harvest. There are farmers in my immediate vicinity who have not a single load that has not been partially destroyed. Many of them have drawn the hay and burned it because of the weather. Even in the favoured sections of Ontario there is scarcely a farmer who will be able to make ends meet. I am not going to keep up this protest at any greater length, but I want the committee, and more particularly the members of the cabinet, to understand that I will protest in this country wherever I go, and I am not going to do that before I protest in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: I can hardly let the hon. gentleman's statement go without one or two observations in reply. Are there any elevators in Ontario such as are referred to here, or in any of the eastern provinces?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): There are storehouses.

Mr. BENNETT: But they are not storehouses such as these. It will be observed that all the grain that passes out of the western country for export passes through the elevators. There may be some small quantities that do not leave for export which also pass through them.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Does this provision take in the millers of western Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. gentleman knows, most of them have elevators, and some provision will be made in the regulations to deal with that situation. But this is an effort to give some assistance to the great grain-producing area of Canada. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should display so much heat in opposing the measure. I am sure it will be greeted with great satisfaction by those of his countrymen who have gone and settled in the western plains—for there are a great many men from Huron who have settled in western Canada. If they tell him, and if he will listen to them, I think he will agree that the action taken is what he himself would take under similar circumstances. It has not been taken hastily; it is the sort of action I would expect him to support rather than to oppose, for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Section 1 speaks of wheat grown in the western provinces in the year 1931. There are still held by the farmers certain quantities of the 1930 crop which will be marketed with the 1931 grain. Has any provision been made to separate these two crops, or will the 1930 and 1931 wheat come under this provision?

Mr. BENNETT: The information of the Board of Grain Commissioners is that only small quantities of the 1930 crop are held. In any event an effort will be made under the regulations to separate the crops, and the 1930 wheat will not be paid the 5 cents.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As I see it, wheat delivered at mills to which no licensed elevators are attached will not be eligible for this 5 cent subsidy. There are a number of mills in the three western provinces that have no elevators associated with them. They are not licensed under the grain act, and wheat delivered there will not receive the 5 cents. If the Prime Minister does not intend to provide for them, then, of course, they will have to go without it. But if he does intend to take care of them, I see no provision here for wheat delivered to such mills.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not intended to do otherwise than as stated in the bill, except to meet the situation referred to by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael).

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You think they will be covered?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has not heard me. All grain grown in 1931 and delivered to country elevators in accordance with the grain act will receive the payment of 5 cents; not otherwise.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I see that. But does the Prime Minister think that the regulations are comprehensive enough to include an occasional warehouse as well?

Mr. BENNETT: Warehouses are covered by statute.

Mr. YOUNG: The Prime Minister stated the other day that this bonus of 5 cents was intended as a compensatory adjustment of the burden the tariff imposes on the farmer.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. YOUNG: I associate myself with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown); we cannot accept it as such. This bonus of 5 cents will amount to approximately 8 per cent of the farmer's income, and the tariff imposes a burden of 30 per cent. We cannot accept a bonus of 8 per cent as a compensation for a 30 per cent spoliation. But I want to ask this question. In view of the fact that this is intended as a compensatory adjustment of the burden the tariff imposes on us, and inasmuch as this will last only one year, will the Prime Minister at the end of the year remove the tariff burden?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say a tariff burden; there is no tariff burden placed on the farmers of the west.

Mr. BROWN: Why an adjustment?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say a tariff burden. I said that this was a compensating adjustment as between the east and the west, because hon. gentlemen are all the time complaining—notably my hon. friend from Lisgar—about the terrible burden imposed upon the west by the east. If he has been around these buildings lately he will understand what that means. This is intended to be just what it says, neither more nor less; and I gave the reasons for it. I did not give as one of the reasons what my hon. friend has suggested, and which I thought might offend his susceptibilities; although I did mention it as something that might possibly be said with respect to the payment of this sum of money. As regards my hon. friend's remark about spoliation, that is not a matter of great importance.

Mr. VALLANCE: Following up what the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has said, I do not think the Prime Minister really grasps the significance of the question put to him by that hon. member. There are in the three western provinces many mills that will not come within this provision. The Prime Minister is merely putting these interior mills at a disadvantage of five cents a bushel. The export miller has an advantage over the Canadian miller who has no elevator facilities; he has a five cent leeway on him. Let me assure the hon. member for South Huron that this five cent bonus will not encourage the growing of wheat. The position of the western farmer to-day is well known to the Prime Minister. If the hon. member for South Huron will look up to-days' quotations he will see that No. 1 wheat, July delivery, is selling at 52 cents. In the pool it is 30 cents on No. 1 wheat, and if you deduct freight, all that the farmer has left is 8½ cents a bushel. It costs him 12 cents to thresh it, so that you can see what his profit is. As one who has produced a good deal of wheat, I can assure the hon. member that this bonus will not be an inducement to me to go more extensively into the production of this grain. However, I want to emphasize the point with regard to western millers who have no elevator facilities of their own. I hope the Prime Minister will see to it, either by regulation or in some other way, that the wheat delivered to those individuals will receive the five cents which will be paid on export wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to my hon. friend from South Battleford for having taken up the question raised by the hon. member for South Huron. It is not the intention to encourage the growing of wheat. I thought that was so well known that it would be unnecessary to mention it. I thank my hon. friend for bringing this matter to my attention and will state that an effort will be made to meet the situation. I went over it with the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and although there are some difficulties in the way they are not such as will not yield to treatment. I think the major part of the wheat will be taken care of as the great milling companies have licensed facilities.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, just a word following what was said by the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Vallance) in connection with over-encouragement being given to wheat growing. The hon. member spoke of a possible 8 or 8½ cents payment being made locally to the farmers for No. 3 wheat delivered to the pools. I have before me the market quotations for the town of Red Deer, which offers a typical example being situated on the main line. These prices are as follows:

11½ cents for No. 1.
8½ cents for No. 2.
3½ cents for No. 3.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the advance payment.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Those are the quotations which appeared in the paper of July 15. They cover the initial payments as advertised by the pool. Every hon. member will appreciate that the addition of five cents per bushel will not make wheat growing so profitable as to encourage over-production. As has been said, this payment could hardly be looked upon as a compensating adjustment, but I think the farmers who have been so fortunate as to have wheat this year will appreciate this additional price. While they do not consider it in the light of a compensating adjustment, while they feel, rightly or wrongly, that it is wholly inadequate, from the viewpoint of increased purchasing power or a lessening of their losses they are prepared to accept and appreciate this payment. This is the first time in our history that such recognition has been given; whether or not it will be the last, we do not know, but we accept it in that way. It is being accepted as some recognition of the losses which have been incurred but not in any way as an encouragement to over-produce. Even with the 5 cents a bushel it is obvious that the cost of growing and marketing wheat will be far greater than the returns which have been received this year. As to whether or not this payment should apply to all grains is another matter; as to whether or not it should apply to all farm products is another matter. Those are matters for discussion but my own opinion is that it would be of assistance to all farmers to receive something of the same nature. The farmer appreciates anything which will add $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 to the purchasing power of the prairies, but as has been said again and again, he is not prepared to accept this as payment in full for the burdens which the tariff and other policies of this country have placed upon him. He is prepared to accept it exactly for what it is worth, as so much assistance at a time when assistance is badly needed. With so many crop failures this payment will not apply to or be of the slightest advantage to many districts, and we must look to the bill which will be introduced shortly for relief in this connection. Despite what has been said by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) and other hon. members of the committee, I am not afraid that the farmers of the west will rush into greater production of wheat.

Mr. DONNELLY: Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for this assistance to be given to the farmers of western Canada. I appreciate the endeavour to make it applicable to all wheat marketed through the regular channels. However, there will be difficulty and hardship involved in the case of the smaller millers. One of the absurdities of our economic life is that at the present time the price of flour in western Canada where the wheat is grown is practically higher than the price prevailing in any other part of the British Empire. The cause is the fact that the millers charge for the wheat as if it were shipped to Fort William, and then add on the price of flour the local freight back from Fort William. The price of flour in the west is as high as if not higher than the price in many points in eastern Canada. As a result of this condition many small mills have begun to operate throughout the prairies. There are four or five in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. These mills buy their wheat from the local farmers, who, in turn, purchase their flour from the mills These local mills not having to pay the freight on the wheat to Fort William and the freight on the flour from Fort William are able to sell flour at a lower price. Several of the municipalities in granting relief stipulated that any flour needed should be purchased from these mills because of the cheaper rate prevailing. Under this proposal these mills will have to pay an additional five cents per bushel for wheat. They have no elevators and there will be a discrimination against them because the larger mills, such as the Quaker mills at Saskatoon, and the Robin Hood mills at Moose Jaw will have an advantage of five cents per bushel, even though they charge more for their flour. Something should be done to give these smaller mills the same consideration as is being given to the larger ones so that they may have an even break in the matter.

Mr. SANDERSON: Mr Chairman, I was not in the chamber when the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) was speaking, so I do not know whether or no he took up the question which I propose to ask the Prime Minister. My question is as follows: Why has the province of Ontario been left out of consideration in this payment of five cents per bushel? Why are not the wheat growers of the province of Ontario going to share in this payment? The Prime Minister may have some good reason for that, and if so I should like to hear it.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the question which was asked by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). I endeavoured to give him an answer. He considered it inadequate, but it was the answer that suggested itself to me, namely, that we were dealing with an extraordinary and emergent situation which the western producers of wheat, being so far removed from their market, as distinguished from those in the east, found it necessary to pay transportation charges that left them only from as low as five cents to as high as fifteen cents a bushel for their wheat. It is almost unnecessary for me to say to the committee that such a price, if you take the maximum figure I mentioned, might cover the cost of threshing. In Ontario no such condition prevails; there is no such thing in that province as a bushel of wheat being sold for fifteen or twenty cents; there is no such thing as the transportation costs absorbing 80 per cent of the price of the commodity, and under those circumstances this is an endeavour to equalize the situation, to a limited extent only as I have said, but to do something to indicate that those parts of Canada more favourably situated with respect to transportation are willing to bear some part of the common burden to assist the producers in the western areas to approximate in their returns more nearly at least the cost of seed and the effort put upon it.

Mr. CAYLEY: So far as an emergent condition exists in the western provinces, we in the east very heartily approve the step that is being taken to relieve that emergency, but I want the Prime Minister to understand that in many cases there is also an emergent condition in Ontario. The problem is serious for the farmers in the older parts of Ontario to know how to carry on under the very heavy obligations which they have assumed and the heavy taxation that has grown upon them down through the years. They are at present facing problems that are hard of solution.

I notice in Saturday's paper a suggestion to encourage dairying in the western provinces by the payment of a bonus of one cent a pound on butter. This would be another measure of assistance to the western provinces. We in Ontario wonder what we are going to get by way of legislation and help for our farms because we know it is very important that our farmers be able to make their way and pay their expenses. I was wondering whether in the legislation it is proposed to introduce by way of unemployment and farm relief, the Prime Minister had in mind any proposition in the way of relieving the farmers of Ontario or any other part of the Dominion who are also suffering from an emergent situation.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps when the Minister of Agriculture is dealing with his estimates, the hon. member might secure from him an explanation with respect to the item that he noticed in Saturday's paper.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I understood the government had abandoned the idea that this bonus was being granted for the purpose of assistance in transportation costs, in other words, that it was a bonus on export wheat as was announced in the first instance, because I think it would have been unfortunate if the government had adopted that plan. Australia has got into considerable difficulties by bonusing exports, and I would regret to see Canada following that method of granting assistance. I am much more favourable to this scheme which gives the producer the five cents without mentioning whether the wheat is to be exported or what use is to be made of it. The matter then is a domestic one and does not get into the realm of international trade, involving the same difficulties that Australia has encountered. I hope conditions will improve and it will not be necessary to bonus the growing of wheat. No doubt the Prime Minister has in mind the deplorable situation that exists at the present time, when the price of wheat has gone away below production costs.

Mr. BENNETT: It was down to fifty-two cents to-day.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think the five cents will be of great benefit, although it may lend some encouragement and help. As prices are to-day this five-cent bonus cannot be construed as compensation, but it may be some help to the farmer who has a reasonable quantity of wheat and who at present is producing below cost. I would however oppose most vigorously any attempt to bonus any commodity as an export commodity, because I think in the long run such a policy would bring about a worse evil even than that which Australia became involved in by her attempt to carry out a scheme of that kind.

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): I wish to express my disapproval of this bill which, in my humble opinion, does not answer the purpose which the government had in view when submitting it to the house. On the other hand, I think that the government introduced this measure with always the same end in mind: that of favouring the large interests at the expense of the small holders; that of favouring the wheat grower on a large scale, the gentleman farmer at the expense of the small wheat grower who utilizes his crop for live stock raising. Moreover the government has given little thought to those who, instead of shipping their wheat to the elevators, sell to the miller or to friends who need it, either in their section of the country or the province. I am furthermore opposed to this measure because it tends to favour one section of the country to the detriment of the other provinces of confederation. I am aware that the western provinces are, at present, in serious straits, but the eastern provinces, Quebec included, are also, to some extent, in a critical position owing to the lack of sale for their farm products, such as butter and cheese. As Quebec has to bear a large proportion of the taxes, I think the government could afford giving it its quota of protection. I am opposed to this bill because it is devoid of principle, the government seems to court the western provinces and specially favour the large interests which are always subscribers to election funds. As a Quebec representative, I am not opposed to the rebate of five cents for each bushel of wheat shipped to elevators, but I am opposed to the measure because the same advantages are not afforded to the small holders who seek by all possible means to earn a living, and who, instead of shipping their wheat to elevators at ridiculous prices, have gone into live stock raising in order to take full advantage of their wheat.

Mr. YOUNG: This five-cent bonus is intended as a temporary expedient to relieve the present distressful condition, but it can be at best only a temporary expedient, whether efficient or not, and the real remedy must be found in something more permanent. I think everybody will agree that the trouble with the wheat farmer to-day, apart from crop conditions, is that our wheat is shut out of world markets where formerly it had a ready sale. Many European countries now have hostile tariffs which it is almost impossible for our wheat to surmount. I know that the Prime Minister has made efforts to have our wheat used more largely within the British Empire, but the empire itself cannot take all our wheat, and so we must find markets outside. I would respectfully suggest to the Prime Minister that some endeavour be made to have European markets reopened to our wheat. Two or three months ago a trade treaty was signed between Germany and Austria, under the terms of which each country admitted the products of the other duty-free, and I believe there was a clause in that treaty which provided that any other country would be eligible to receive the benefits of that treaty if they would come in on the same terms; that is, open their ports to the products of those countries. I would respectfully suggest that the Prime Minister explore this matter thoroughly to discover if it is not possible to have those markets reopened to our wheat on the condition that we open our markets to some of the products they have to sell.

Mr. BENNETT: I must not permit my hon. friend from St. Denis to labour under a misapprehension. He said first of all that we were protecting the large producers of wheat at the expense of the small producer, and he proceeded to say that what we are trying to do is to give a bonus to those who might really need it, but at the same time, he said, it was discriminating against the province of Quebec, and that we should not do it unless we gave a bonus to butter and cheese; and we also, he said, should provide something in connection with local sales.

Let me say this to him: No farmer in the province of Quebec is ever called upon to produce a bushel of wheat and sell it for 13 cents. That is number one. The farmer in the province of Quebec has a market nearby, and in my judgment the finest market that any people have in Canada, namely, the great cities of Montreal, Three Rivers and other large communities. Whatever else may be said, there is in the province of Quebec a large industrial population. On the island of Montreal there are nearly one million people who must be fed, and are fed in the main by the products from the farms of other parts of the province of Quebec. There is no such condition as that in western Canada. If there were, the western farmers would not be seeking a market abroad for their wheat; they would be able to sell it at home. It is true that the province of Quebec has to purchase a portion of its wheat from these very wheat producers, but the producers of the province of Quebec find a ready market for their vegetables, farm products and garden truck on a fairly profitable basis, notwithstanding the lowered cost of commodities. That does not extend, of course, to all parts of the province.

Clearly, there is no such thing as sectionalism in a policy of this kind. It is an endeavour on the part of all the people of this Dominion to adjust the tremendous losses that are being made by the producers in western Canada, whose purchasing power has amounted in the last few years to billions of dollars, to conditions that approximate—I say only approximate—the cost of production, and by production I do not mean the labour or the price of seed and threshing, apart from everything else. I do not think our policy should call forth from the hon. gentleman an attack against the government on the ground that it is based on sectionalism. On the contrary, it is a frank recognition by all the people of Canada of an obligation to the less-favoured part of our population under an extreme and emergent condition. Rubber has fallen about 90 per cent in value; wheat has fallen over 50 per cent; and many of the metals, copper, for instance, have fallen 100 per cent in value. But the farm products in western Canada are peculiarly struck by reason of the fact that, rightly or wrongly, the producers of that country have been depending more or less on that crop and that crop only, and when you have a crop that not since the days of the building of the Canadian Pacific railway has reached the price of 50 cents, and when you recall that but for the action of the government it would undoubtedly, as the premier of Alberta said the other day, have dropped to 40 cents, it means that there is absolutely nothing left for the producer of the wheat. The one factor that the hon. member for St. Denis and the hon. member for South Huron overlook is the cost of moving the product from the point of production to the point of consumption. If you had any such difficulties as that in Ontario and Quebec, you would have exactly the same claim; but when you have the cost of threshing, the cost of the seed, the cost of putting it in the ground, the cost of reaping the crop, and when in addition to all those costs you have a cost of 20 cents a bushel—

Mr. VALLANCE: Twenty-six and a half cents per hundred.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, about 15 to 16 cents a bushel for freight. When I mention that I think the committee will realize that all we are trying to do under the present most distressed conditions is to equalize in some small way—we cannot do it wholly because we cannot afford to do it wholly—the emergent conditions under which these people are suffering. But if the time ever came when you had an equally emergent condition in the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario, there are no people who would respond more willingly in their desire to help than the people of those same western plains.

Mr. IRVINE: I have no doubt that the farmers in eastern Canada need more than they will obtain for their products this year, just as do the farmers of the west, but I do not think it can be doubted that eastern Canada has been industrialized largely through the national policy which has been in vogue in this country for upwards of sixty years, and that national policy has been paid for, if you care to put it that way, to a greater extent by the people of the west than of any other section of Canada. The result of that industrialization has been to give the farmers of eastern Canada a market for all kinds of products right at their very door. So under the circumstances, as explained by the Prime Minister, I do not think the eastern farmers should object to allowing five cents a bushel to the western farmer under the very difficult conditions which exist at the present time.

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I strongly protest against the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he asserts that I wish to rouse the provinces against one another. To be more clearly understood, I state that this bill is worthless. If the right hon. Prime Minister sincerely believes he can find a solution to the distress existing, at present, in the western provinces, by granting a rebate of five cents per bushel on wheat, he is greatly in error; to my mind, all will have to be done over again, once the five cents rebate is exhausted. It would be preferable for all concerned to inaugurate a constructive policy, that the cause of the evil be sought in order to apply an effective and curative remedy, as behooves the good doctor, financier and able lawyer he believes himself to be. Instead of this measure which proposes to pay a rebate of five cents per bushel of wheat, when the western farmers are in the greatest straits, he should wait until next session, ponder over the matter and present to parliament and the country a more constructive legislation than the one he is, to-day, submitting to the house.

Mr. McINTOSH: In connection with the five cent bonus on every bushel of wheat, the Prime Minister has made the statement that the proposed legislation is not sectional. Well, as to whether or not it is sectional depends on the way hon. members view the legislation. I always understood if you took a piece of legislation, applied it to one part of Canada and did not apply it to the other it was sectional in scope, vision and content. I believe the present legislation is of that type. The Prime Minister argued however, quite properly, that we have a national emergency, and he is using the emergency idea to make it appear that after all the proposed legislation is not sectional when in fact it is.

I would say that we appreciate the five cents a bushel bonus offered to western farmers, so far as their wheat sales are concerned. I should like to point out however that that was not the policy the creators of the national policy fifty or sixty years ago thought would be necessary to bind Canada together and make her a nation. At that time they told Canada that the national policy was going to unite all portions of the Dominion, was going to populate all portions of the Dominion, was going to create splendid markets for all portions of the Dominion; we were promised that we would have cities, towns and buying areas for all our products. We find sixty years afterwards however that such is not the case, that our policy of industrialism has linked us up to a very high and extreme tariff policy with the result that to-day the spread between the price of what the farmer has to buy and what he has to sell is greater than ever. Nationally speaking, that is really our present predicament. The five cents a bushel now offered is to narrow that spread. Well, when we consider that about 30 per cent is taken from the farmer every time he buys an industrial product, and that we return to him five cents a bushel on his wheat—five cents on fifty cents, or 10 per cent—the policy is not worth much after all, and it is not permanent. This temporary policy for one year is not going to meet the situation at all. It will have to be met in a more permanent way, and I suggest that one of the best ways to meet it is, as far as possible, to reduce the tariffs on articles the farmer must buy and thereby give him a chance to buy more with his money—even, if he has not very much.

In closing I would say that as a westerner representing a western riding we accept the help afforded by five cents a bushel, although in my estimation it will not meet the problem with which Canada is faced, namely, to give the farmers of the west, the producers and consumers of Canada a much greater purchasing power.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I say, with the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) that the present legislation certainly will not cure the difficulties with which the wheat producers are faced. I do not think any hon. member expects it to have that effect. At the present time however the action of the government is very welcome. Even five cents a bushel means a great deal to the farmers who will have wheat to market this fall.

I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question concerning subsection (b) of section 2 of the bill. I presume that is the section we are now discussing. I wonder if there is any discrimination between the different classes marketing wheat, namely the farmer and the bank or loan companies. Subsection (b) reads:

> Determining the person to whom the said sum of five cents per bushel shall be paid and the method of the payment thereof.

Mr. BENNETT: Although we have not reached subsection (b) I may say to the hon. member that it appears in the bill for the purpose if possible of enabling the producers to receive the money. As I mentioned a short time ago, at times there are grave difficulties in determining exactly who the producers may be. This is an endeavour at least to see that the man who puts the work upon the land and secures the grain may be able also to secure the five cents a bushel. The chairman of the grain commissioners thought that with such a provision he would be able to see that justice would be done to the producers.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am glad to have the Prime Minister's explanation. I may say that thousands of farms in western Canada are really held by loan companies. Farmers have fallen behind in their mortgages and they have signed over their farms to loan companies. In this case five cents a bushel might be taken as a part of the price of the grain. Usually the farmer is obliged to deliver one-third of the crop clear or its value. If the five-cent payment is made as a distinct bonus to the grower himself, however, then of course all such payments would go directly to the farmers.

Mr. DONNELLY: I wish briefly to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) concerning the marketing of our grain. While with the best possible grace accepting the five cents a bushel we feel it is not going to be of much assistance to us because no man in western or any other part of Canada can grow wheat for 30 or 40 cents a bushel—and that is practically what the farmer would receive. Aside from that one must consider the hauling of the wheat to market. I have paid as high as 25 cents a bushel to have wheat hauled to market. That is but one of the expenses. Some of our western farmers have to haul distances of 35 or 40 miles. In western Canada our sheriffs allow a cent a mile per bushel to haul wheat to the market. Hon. members can readily see that there is not much money left for the farmer.

We must recognize the fact however that if we are going to get out of the depression in which Canada and the world are thrown to-day, the first people who must be put on their feet are the primary producers—the farmers. Unless measures are brought in to relieve the farmers and to bring them back to better conditions we will not get out of our present depression. All economists throughout the world say that in any depression in which we have ever found ourselves the first class to show signs of relief were the farmers, the primary producers. Our primary producers, namely our farmers, fishermen, lumbermen and miners must first show signs of getting over the depression or the manufacturers will not get over it, and the country will continue to suffer.

In 1921 we were faced with a great debt; we had the war to pay for. All our money was used to pay for the war, in the same manner as the farmer pays his mortgages. All our money has been going out in the payment of debts with the result that it has reached the coffers of the United States and France. The world to-day is without money, and the only way in which she can buy goods is by exchanging goods. As our economists tell us, after the year 1921 the United States saw a chance of making some money and as a result they inaugurated a fiscal policy of higher tariffs. They built tariff walls around themselves, shut themselves in, and made money in abundance. They had their own markets and world markets to supply; their factories were built four or five times greater than would have been necessary to supply their own local needs. But the world market said, "This is the way for us to grow rich; we will do the same thing, we will build a tariff wall around our own country." France built a tariff wall, Germany did the same, and so did Italy. In 1927 Germany, France, Italy and the other countries of Europe began to help their primary producers, and they prohibited the importation of wheat. Then the farmers of western Canada began to feel the effect of that fiscal policy. Little by little those countries raised their tariffs until at the present time Canadian wheat is shut out of the markets of Germany, France and Italy. The French tariff against us is from 85 to 90 cents per bushel, the Italian is 85 to 90 cents, the German is something like $1.25 to $1.50, and I think it has been up as high as $1.80. No wheat can get over such a tariff wall. It is impossible for us to sell our wheat to those countries. The result is that the only market left for our wheat is the British Isles. If we supplied all the wheat that is needed in the British Isles, if we had the whole of that market to ourselves, it would not be sufficient to absorb our surplus wheat. They import only about 170,000,000 bushels a year, and on an average we have an exportable surplus of 300,000,000 bushels. Therefore we have to find a market somewhere for the remainder of our crop, and unless those other countries in continental Europe go back to truck farming or dairying or stock raising, and leave to us the growing of wheat, these unfavourable conditions are going to continue.

What we need at the present time is tariff agreements with those countries just as we made a tariff agreement recently with Australia. We ought to make tariff arrangements with Germany, Italy and France, so that they will let our wheat in at lower rates of duty in return for which we will admit some of their manufactured products. The other day we made a tariff agreement with Australia which would help the manufacturers, and the only people who were to pay for those concessions were the farmers. I should like to see an agreement negotiated with some country that would help our farmers at the expense of the manufacturers. I should like to see the tide turn for once. Until we have something of this sort done, I say conditions for the farmers in western Canada will go from bad to worse.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Regulations, paragraph (a).

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman, on section 2, paragraphs (b) and (c), I should like to make a few observations to the Prime Minister. Paragraphs (b) and (c) are as follows:

(b) determining the person to whom the said sum of five cents per bushel shall be paid and the method of the payment thereof;
(c) making such arrangements as may be necessary with the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada or other statutory body for payment of the said sum;

I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister, in reply to a question directed to him by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), make the statement he did, because this is the kernel of the whole bill; that is, that it will be necessary that payment of this five cents be so arranged that it goes directly to the producer, because if it is at all to be a relief measure the producer must have the entire control of the five cents; for instance, if his wheat was seized, his five cents could not be touched. We know that huge financial corporations in western Canada are extorting from the people a tremendous toll. I could cite instances that have been drawn to my attention. I know the Prime Minister probably would tell me that this subject is entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and I agree that it is. But I could cite these instances to show the absolute necessity of making certain that no one can touch the five cents, otherwise it ceases to be a relief measure to the wheat grower. I hope paragraphs (b) and (c) will effect this purpose and that it will be absolutely certain that the farmer or producer will get the benefit of this assistance.

I should like to draw the attention of eastern members to the fact that for some years past there has been a tendency in the west to decrease the cost of labour in operating our larger farms. Take a farm to-day in western Canada producing 5,000 bushels of wheat and over a year. On such a farm it is more profitable to operate a combine or harvester-thresher than the old binder and threshing machine. There was a time when in the operation of a section-and-a-half farm you would have to have four to five men on the binder, four or five men stooking, and some twenty-five to twenty-seven men drawing in to the machine. To-day it is possible to take care of the wheat-harvesting operations on that size farm with three men only, two on the combine and one on a truck drawing the wheat. So that the money that the western farmer heretofore used to pay for labour on the farm is now being paid for labour in the eastern factories. Therefore the eastern farmers stand to gain by the introduction of the harvester-thresher. This is another instance where we can say that in this measure the government is not discriminating against the east in favour of the west.

Let me repeat, one of the things that concerns me most is to see that this bill makes it positive that the producer or farmer shall get the five cents, and that no one shall be able to deprive him of that relief.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the hon member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) has directed attention to what after all is a very important, if not the most important feature of the legislation, apart altogether from that section of it which directs payment of the five cents. Those subsections in section 2 are to meet the situation to which he has referred, and I can only say to him and to the committee that I asked the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners to come to Ottawa in order that we might discuss the matter in an endeavour to make it clear that the purpose and intention of this parliament is given effect to. If the hon. gentleman has any suggestions to make, I shall be glad to receive them and to act upon them if they will make the purpose any clearer. When the hon. gentleman uses the word "absolutely" I think he realizes that that is a little strong, because many conditions might prevail that would make it almost impossible to give effect to what he says. But that is the aim, and if there be an exception now and then it will only go to prove the rule.

While I am on my feet I think I must say to the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) and others who have made observations with respect to tariffs and their effects upon the sale of Canadian wheat, I hope they will remember that so far as this country is concerned at least it lowered its tariff and did not increase them, and yet Canada was more affected than any other country by those higher tariffs. So it cannot be said that Canada invited reprisals, for at least it has been remarked by those well able to speak with authority in the League of Nations and elsewhere that of all the countries of the world we were the only country that did reduce our tariffs between 1921 and 1930; and during that period tariffs against our agricultural products were higher than they have ever been in our history. The very conditions to which the hon. member for Willow Bunch referred in Germany, in France and in Italy obtained under the economic situation to which attention has been directed. There has been a very earnest effort on the part of those European countries to be self-contained from the standpoint of growing sufficient grain to meet their own requirements. Every little corner in France is covered with a crop, grain is grown everywhere, and I think it would amaze hon. members to see the care and attention given to small sections or patches of land in France for the purpose of getting the utmost return from the standpoint of food products. In Germany and in continental Europe generally the same thing prevails. We have sold more wheat to France by three times than we did last year. That is explainable in many ways, as hon. gentlemen will say, but we believe that at least one explanation is to be found in the representations which we made to them. The Prime Minister of France had no hesitation in saying to me personally that the business of any government there was to take care of the agrarians. He said that no government could survive in France that did not take care of the agrarian interests. France, he pointed out, was so constituted; and from my own observations and reading I should think there is no doubt about it. I mention this only because it must be clear that we stand in a different position to that country than we do in relation to Australia or any other country. When we go to countries like France or Germany and propose to them that they should admit our wheat free, they at once say that they have obligations that would make it necessary for the wheat of other countries to come in free also. Trade relations, most favoured nation treaties, and matters of that kind make it impossible for such an arrangement to be carried out unless we give terms that would be absolutely destructive of our national integrity. I do not think that any member of this committee is prepared to say that the doors of Canada should be opened freely to the manufactured products of continental Europe. I say that to my hon. friends from the west who have studied the matter with a good deal of care, but I apologize for taking up the time of the committee again discussing the point. I felt, however, that I must make that statement, because it does not lie in our hands, in view of the experiments we, ourselves, have made.

Mr. VALLANCE: Undoubtedly an effort will be made this fall by the farmers' creditors to seize the wheat. No matter what the value of the wheat is they will not get very much for it as conditions are to-day. But if it is possible I want the government to assure us that this five cents will not be touched. If it is touched it affords no relief at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I can say this to the hon. gentleman. The five cents is not garnisheeable, so far as we understand the law. The provinces, of course, control questions of seizure and matters of that kind; but so far as this government is concerned it certainly will not be seized. That is why it is put in the hands of the Board of Grain Commissioners. My hon. friend will agree that no other body in the west which we could name is so well able to look after it.

Mr. VALLANCE: I suggested it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the hon. gentleman did. It is a striking manifestation of the fact that great minds think alike. I followed the leading of his great mind and he followed mine, not so great.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT AMENDMENT

INCREASE IN PAYMENT TO PROVINCES FROM FIFTY TO SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 136, to amend the Old Age Pensions Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I would direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the following phrase in the preamble:

And whereas it is desirable that the system of old age pensions shall be established on a contributory basis as a national undertaking;

Inasmuch as this phrase appears in the bill to amend the existing act which is before us, it is important to consider what may be involved in the passing of the second reading. Speaking on the resolution upon which this measure is based, I pointed out to my right hon. friend that it would be advisable to avoid raising the question of contribution; at any rate, that it would be desirable to have the British North America Act so amended as to make it possible at the earliest possible date for this parliament to enact an old age pensions measure and administer it without any question of contribution, in case there should be a difference of view as to whether the old age pension measure should be on a contributory basis or not. I still take that view, but I am inclined to feel that if the house were to approve the bill in its present form it might be said later by the administration that we had endorsed an old age pension scheme only on a contributory basis. If that is the intention of the measure, there will be strong opposition to it, and before the second reading passes I think the Prime Minister ought to give the house a word of explanation in that regard.

Another point is this. Under this measure we of this federal parliament are contributing 75 per cent of the amount that is to go towards old age pensions. This is being contributed to the provinces. To bring out the significance of my point, I would ask the house how it believes the provinces would view any measure on their part which would involve their making a contribution of 75 per cent to this Dominion with the expectation that the Dominion would administer the law, towards the operation of which they had contributed that proportion of the expenses. The time has come when the Old Age Pensions Act should be administered by the federal government, even if only 75 per cent and not 100 per cent of the cost is being met by the Dominion.

The third point I would emphasize again is the unwisdom of making special grants to provinces where they involve control of expenditures by a body other than that which is obliged to raise the necessary taxation.

Mr. BENNETT: To the three points raised by the right hon. gentleman, I have this to say. As regards the preamble, it was not intended thereby that the house should commit itself to any definite policy. While the preamble is under certain circumstances of very great force, it was not intended that in this bill it should be anything more than the recital of a pious hope; and in view of what was said the other day, had it not been that the bill was already printed, it would have been omitted. When the bill is in committee that part can be removed.

With reference to the second point, I can only point out to the right hon. gentleman that his objections to the payment of 75 per cent are equally applicable to the payment of 50 per cent. If he will look at section 4 of the legislation passed by his own government he will find these words:

> Every agreement made pursuant to this act shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to determine the agreement is given by the governor general to the lieutenant governor of the province with which same was made.

Under these circumstances it will be apparent that all that we have done is to increase our contribution or payment without in any sense endeavouring to interfere with the terms of the agreement. Inasmuch as it would remain in force for a period of ten years I have grave doubt as to just how far we could proceed in that direction. It is a principle of law, which has been settled by the decisions, that you do not avoid an agreement by increasing the benefits which accrue under it to the other party. We are advised that the agreement itself cannot be affected within the terms of that section by reason of the increase of the benefits which are conferred upon the other party, namely, the increase from 50 to 75 per cent.

As far as the third point is concerned, I do not think any useful purpose would be served by beating again that straw. This has been discussed at great length on various occasions. It has been indicated that the British North America Act is based upon the assumption that the provinces were to receive subsidies by reason of the fact that they surrendered certain powers of taxation. Having surrendered those powers there has been a continued increase since confederation of the benefits to the provinces. Subsidies have been reviewed, revised and increased; grants in aid have not been uncommon, and in fact when the right hon. member was confronted with the problem of dealing with old age pensions he dealt with it by paying 50 per cent of the amount due. I am rather inclined to think that the imposition of that principle upon the provinces subject to the conditions mentioned could be said to be the basis of most of the difficulty which since that day has arisen out of the grants in aid to provinces. Two distinguished members of the legal profession gave to the province of Quebec an opinion that this was illegal and improper, the basis of the opinion being that it was not competent for the Dominion to impose its will upon the provinces, even to the extent of conferring benefits predicated upon conditions. In this instance benefits were conferred based upon conditions to be fulfilled, and the opinion of these two eminent counsel was that legislation stipulating the acceptance of conditions which might be regarded by the provinces as onerous before they could receive any part of the benefits provided, was beyond the competence of this parliament. I find it a little difficult to follow that reasoning, and yet one can understand that there is some semblance of authority for it when one applies to the facts of the case the well-settled legal principles which should govern in matters of this kind. As I said the other day, this measure merely increases the benefits to be conferred, and if there is anything in the preamble or the bill which is out of keeping with that principle, I will assist the committee in its removal.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure just where we stand in this matter. I understand that on second reading we adopt the principle of a bill, but the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has stated that he does not wish to commit the house to the principle of a contributory system. If it is understood that the preamble will be amended during the committee stage, and that we are not endorsing the contributory principle on second reading, then the bill could go through to committee.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, the other day the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes) stated that the agreement had been forced on the provinces by the late government. I was rather surprised to hear the minister make such a statement because he is one of the most brilliant lawyers in this country. He knows very well that an agreement cannot be forced upon anyone, and so this statement must have been a slip on his part.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, I cannot subscribe to the interpretation which has been placed upon my remarks by the hon. member. My remarks appear in Hansard and they can speak for themselves.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is a dissenting judge.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has raised a question which is worthy of some consideration, namely, that when the act of confederation was passed certain duties were assigned to the federal parliament, the remainder being retained by the provinces. I remember when the federal government passed the highways act. This act granted sums of money for the purpose of constructing highways provided that the provinces spent a considerably larger amount and that the highways were constructed according to a certain standard. That created some embarrassment to the provincial governments—I know that was the fact as far as Alberta was concerned; and I mention this merely to point out that in my opinion the federal government should confine its activities to its own field. The government of which I was a member cannot be said to have been immune from acts of this character, but these matters lead to abuse. If federal parties are going to vie with each other during general election in offering inducements to the electors in any given province to vote for them, offering assistance to the province which rightly belongs in the sphere of provincial finance, trouble will ensue. Such has been the case with old age pensions, grants for highways and grants for technical education; all these were clearly intended to be the business and the duty of the provinces themselves. The Prime Minister has pointed out that consideration has been given from time to time to the method by which assistance or grants should be given to the provinces. If the subsidies are to be increased, all well and good; because that would not entail any obligation upon the provinces to do anything to earn the subsidy. In my opinion we are embarking upon what is nothing more or less than a vicious principle. If assistance is to be given, let it be given by way of a subsidy, and let the provinces take care of their own affairs. Both governments have been guilty of this practice and I do not think the federal government can continue to enter the field of the provinces without there being some readjustment of taxation. Undoubtedly the provinces will resent any intrusion in the way of taxation. Although the income tax was a special war measure, it was resented to some degree by the provinces. Undoubtedly conferences will be held during the life of the present parliament to discuss with the provinces this very question. The fathers of confederation were wise in their day and generation when they made an allocation of duties, and we would be wise to stay within the bounds of that allocation. If increases in assistance are to be given, they should be by way of subsidy.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I happened to be out of the chamber when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) made his remarks, but I understand he has signified his willingness to eliminate whatever reference there is in the bill to the contributory system. I am glad my right hon. friend is willing to do that, because the question of a contributory system of old age pensions has not had the survey and the consideration which it might have received. On the other hand, the question of a non-contributory system of old age pensions was reported upon by a committee of the house which sat and heard evidence from many organizations and representative men, especially labour men. Therefore I was a little surprised to find in the bill a reference to a contributory system, because it had not received due consideration. A contributory system of old age pensions is much more involved now than it was when it was adopted in England a few years ago, the reason being that our economic situation has changed considerably and is changing very fast. A contributory system would be of very little use unless it were compulsory, and to compel people to-day to contribute to old age pensions would be much more difficult than it was a few years ago. For instance, England is a small, congested, highly industrialized country, and it is very easy there to provide for contributions for unemployment insurance, old age pensions or any other social activity. But in a country like Canada, where we have men who are out of work say four months in the year, and who usually receive low wages when they are working, it would be a hardship upon them to provide that if they did not contribute to an old age pension system they should not be entitled to receive any benefits therefrom.

Another aspect of the situation that I might point out to the Prime Minister is this: in our industrial life in Canada to-day—and I suppose it is the same in many other countries—men are being laid off work at a much earlier age than they were some years ago. We have many industries that will not employ a man who is over forty, so that when a man who is forty years old loses his job he is not in a position to contribute to any system of old age pensions and it would be hard to prohibit him from participating in the benefits just because he was consigned to the scrap heap at such an early age.

Mr. BENNETT: What work would that be?

Mr HEENAN: I have in mind a few industries, but there is one in particular with which I have had some experience. I refer to a pulp and paper industry in Kapuskasing, where they have a rule that a man cannot be employed after he is forty years of age. That does not mean that he will be discharged when he reaches forty—

Mr. BENNETT: That is a different thing.

Mr. HEENAN —but a man will not be hired after he reaches forty. Conditions are going to be harder than ever, and I am glad the Prime Minister has signified his willingness to eliminate from the bill all reference to the contributory system, because if we passed the measure as it stands, we would simply be putting ourselves on record as announcing that it is the only proper system of old age pensions for Canada to adopt. I am heartily in favour of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Amount of payment to provinces increased.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps it would serve the purposes of the committee if I pointed out the words it is necessary to delete from the preamble. They are the ones commencing in the seventh line after the word "desirable":

—that the system of old age pensions shall be established on a contributory basis as a national undertaking; and whereas, pending the taking of the decennial census of 1931 and obtaining such information therefrom as will enable the necessary acturial computations to be made, it is desirable—

Then it would read:

And whereas it is desirable and would be of advantage to augment the national contributions.

When we reach the preamble I shall have the Minister of Fisheries move accordingly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure that the elimination of those words is satisfactory from the standpoint of some of us who are specially representing labour. I do not think I need point out that in Great Britain the old age pension is a distinctly government obligation at the age of seventy, but between sixty-five and seventy only it is contributory. There are also invalidity provisions that are very important. As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River pointed out there is also a system of unemployment insurance which dovetails into this and makes contributions possible. In some of the other dominions legislation is along somewhat similar lines. I notice in the Australian measure, part III, section 15, reads:

Subject to this act, every person who has attained the age of sixty-five years, or who, being permanently incapacitated for work, has attained the age of sixty years, shall, whilst in Australia, be qualified to receive an old age pension.

Subsection 2 reads:

The governor general may by proclamation declare that the age at which women shall be qualified to receive an old age pension shall be sixty years, and from and after such proclamation the last preceding subsection shall, as regards women, be read as if the word "sixty" were substituted for the word "sixty-five."

Section 20 reads:

Subject to this act, every person above the age of sixteen years who is permanently incapacitated for work, by reason of an accident or by reason of his being an invalid, and who is not receiving an old age pension, shall, whilst in Australia, be qualified to receive an invalid pension.

I would venture to urge upon the Prime Minister that when the agreement between the Dominion government and the provinces is being altered to harmonize with this legislation, some provision should be made for those who are permanently incapacitated. There is in all our communities a considerable number who are old before they reach anything like seventy years. This was clearly recognized in the case of the burnt-out returned men, and provision was made for them. But there are others who are permanently aged and others who, because of some invalidity, are as helpless as if they were old people. I am thinking particularly of a class whose claims should appeal to every member of the house, that is the blind. I have in my hand the following resolution which was passed by the United Blind Pensions Committee of Manitoba on April 3, 1930:

All needy blind persons in the province of Manitoba, not otherwise provided for by any pension scheme, should be provided for by state aid of pensions, in order to effectively relieve the aged, infirm, unemployed and unemployable blind, by providing for them adequate maintenance, and thereby reduce for them the struggle for existence.

I would also call attention to the resolution passed by the provincial legislature of Manitoba on February 24, 1931, reading as follows:

That whereas the legislature of Manitoba has from time to time recognized the urgent need for a pension scheme to assist blind persons, and has unanimously passed resolutions, urging the federal government to inaugurate a system of pensions, and

Whereas the legislature on March 27, 1930, undertook or agreed to undertake a pensions scheme for the blind in conjunction with the federal government, and forwarded a memorial to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada to this effect, and

Whereas since that time the federal government has agreed to assume a much larger share of the cost of old age pensions, and

Whereas at the forthcoming session of the federal parliament it will be necessary to amend the Old Age Pensions Act to bring it into conformity with the proposed financial changes,

And whereas a pension scheme for blind persons could advantageously be financed and administered in conjunction with the Old Age Pensions Act, either through an added schedule to that act or by the passing of a Blind Persons Pension Act;

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Therefore be it resolved that the legislature of Manitoba again forward a memorial to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, urging upon His Excellency the present urgent necessity for such a pension scheme, financed in whole or in part by the federal government, and Praying that His Excellency may be pleased to cause such legislation as may be necessary for the granting of such a pension scheme to be brought before the parliament of Canada at the earliest possible moment, at the forthcoming session thereof.

I would urge upon the Prime Minister the need of some such change as this. I need not, I think, say anything further to the members of this house with regard to the appalling position in which a great many of our blind find themselves, and it would seem a very natural extension of the principle underlying the old age pension scheme to include incapacitated people and particularly, perhaps, this class, which is amongst the most needy of all the incapacitated classes. I would ask the Prime Minister, if it is possible, to consider this. I know that he has had some representations made in this regard.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not intended to change the agreements and negotiate new agreements. It is merely intended to substitute "seventy-five" for "fifty;" that is all, and in view of the provisions of the statute to which I referred and the fact that increasing the benefits to be paid does not constitute such a variation of the agreement as necessitates a new agreement, no new agreements are being negotiated at the moment. I am unable therefore to meet the views of the hon. gentleman. It must always be remembered that pensions involve taxes, and some are demanding no taxes, no thrift, and pensions for everyone. Of course you cannot do it that way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister is not really serious in suggesting that anything like that was involved in my request on behalf of the blind.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. I said that one must remember that fact. The leader of the opposition reminded me of it the other day, and I am merely reminding the committee of it in case it might be forgotten. My right hon. friend seemed inclined to the view that I had forgotten that all these things involve money. Unfortunately in the position I occupy I cannot forget that fact. I am constantly, every day, reminded of it, and of how the money is to be raised. It is not intended to vary the agreements, but merely to substitute the payment of seventy-five per cent under the existing agreement. That is why these conditions are added in subsection 2 with respect to the inspection of the vouchers involved in the payments made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to see that my right hon. friend has taken to heart some of the advice that I have been trying to give him, in the kindliest spirit, I can assure him.

Mr. BENNETT: The kindliest spirit was always apparent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am interested in the legal advice which my right hon. friend has just been giving the committee. He indicated that an agreement was not voidable because its conditions were being improved, if I understood the purport, but not the language, of his contention. Because better consideration was being given—

Mr. BENNETT: Increased benefits.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —the agreement would not be voidable on any ground such as that. In this matter of the agreements between the Dominion and the provinces the latter are really being placed in an improved position, seeing that the federal government is now giving seventy-five per cent instead of fifty per cent. All of that is quite correct, but I imagine the law applies equally with respect to all things, and I submit there would not be any objection on the score of the existing agreements raised by the provinces should my right hon. friend undertake immediately to take over the administration of the act and the federal government bear that cost in addition to the seventy-five per cent, or take over, as I think the public were led to believe by him we would do at once, one hundred per cent of the expenditure on old age pensions. There is nothing in the agreement, no matter what its terms are, that cannot be terminated by mutual agreement, and my point is—it does not require argument, it is obvious—that the provinces to-morrow would jump at a chance to be relieved of their fifty per cent, and jump at a chance to be relieved of the cost of administration. So my right hon. friend need not regard any agreements existing at the present time as being either a bar to action or a cause for delay in implementing the pledge he made to the electorate that there would be a national old age pension system on a one hundred per cent basis.

Just to emphasize the importance of hastening towards that end, may I give him the words of his own Secretatry of State (Mr. Cahan) as to the mistake that is being made in these contributions to the provinces, from their point of view as well as ours. The hon. Secretary of State, speaking on this very subject of old age pensions in this house on April 15, 1926, as reported at page 2472 of Hansard, said:

> Furthermore, this scheme contemplates that in its operation there shall be cooperation between the provincial governments and the federal government. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in the recent political history of this country we have proceeded altogether too far in the way of cooperation between the federal government and the provincial governments in respect, for instance, to road appropriations, which are within the proper jurisdiction and control of local legislatures. The same refers also to certain building schemes in which there was cooperation, but in respect of which the federal treasury, which provided the money, really had little or no control over the management of the funds and little or no supervision over the actual expenditures made. I do not wish to stress the matter, but I went through for several weeks, as counsel, an investigation in my native province of Nova Scotia which clearly dislosed to me that when provincial governments or provincial legislatures are expending moneys which are not raised on their own credit and responsibility, and in respect to which their sole responsibility is that of expenditure, it leads to wasteful expenditure and very wide latitude indeed in the making of those expenditures.

That is excellent counsel, and I have no doubt that it was because of his known wisdom in matters of this kind that my right hon. friend brought the present Secretary of State into his administration as one of his close friends and advisers. That, I think, is advice that might well be heeded at the moment.

This further word by way of supplementing what was mentioned by the hon. member for West Edmonton, namely that these grants tend to lead to all kinds of efforts unduly to influence whole provinces in political campaigns in a way that is not at all justifiable and which if carried to any extent, may prove to be very serious. I would like to give my right hon. friend his own words as they appear on the subject of old age pensions in Hansard of February 18, 1927, at page 481. My right hon. friend then spoke about the possible political effects of parties vieing with each other to do more in the way of making these grants in aid to the provinces, and he held up Australia as a horrible example of what might result to any country were its political leaders to compete in that way. My right hon. friend said:

> Now, it might be well to look on the political side of the matter. You know what took place in Australia under conditions such as these. You are going to have a system that is not contributory. An election is coming on. They go out and say that more money should be given, that $20 is not enough. "Well, we will give them $25 if we get into power."

Then, later I find the following:

I was simply pointing out what might be said with respect to such a matter as this. That is the position. That is what happened in Australia.

Skipping another sentence or two, I find the following:

. . . . and so the contending parties, the government and the opposition, were endeavouring to outbid each other in the matter of old age pensions.

Then, a little later on:

. . . . and the contending leaders were intending to secure the popular vote by promising to make an increase in old age pensions. Those are the facts. Consider what would happen in Canada.

My right hon. friend having uttered those words, I am all the more surprised that he should, a year ago, have made so considerable a bid for the support of the electors of the provinces by the grants he promised with respect to old age pensions, technical education, highways, unemployment relief, and other matters, for all of which services he promised grants in aid. I am happy to be able to say to him that during the last campaign I was not a contending party with him as regards any of those promises. I refrained from making a single overture to any province involving proposed additional grants for old age pensions or additional grants for any other purposes if returned to power. In fact, I went out of my way to explain that with conditions what they were in Canada, it would be most unwise for the leader of any political party to hold out inducements to an electorate by way of further grants in aid to the provinces. What I did say, and should like to repeat now, is that I believed the time had come when there should be a Dominion-provincial conference which would afford an opportunity for the Dominion and the provinces to decide upon which particular services of what may be called these great social services they would respectively undertake to administer. Let the Dominion, if so agreed, take over in its entirety the administration and control of old age pensions. If to that end an agreement could be reached with the provinces, let the Dominion agree to take over technical education, or any other services which at such a conference might be agreed upon between the provinces and the Dominion. Let the provinces on their part agree exclusively to manage and control these or other services concerning which agreement might be reached. Having reached an understanding, if it were felt that the provinces had not sufficient fields of taxation, by agreement they should be allowed fields of taxation other than those they had previously enjoyed. Further, if there was a feeling that full justice was not being done to the provinces, as regards their financial relation to the Dominion, the subsidy should be revised. That was the method adopted at confederation and undoubtedly it was intended to be the method through which all financial adjustments between the provinces and the Dominion should take place. I believe that step should have been taken before the legislation now before us was introduced. After all, by postponing such a conference till all these grants are made, the administration is throwing away its strong bargaining instruments in any angreement which may eventually be reached between the provinces and itself. Sooner or later there will have to be a Dominion-provincial conference to settle these matters. When such a conference is held the provinces will already have received and will feel themselves permanently entitled to these additional grants for old age pensions, additional grants for vocational training and technical education, additional grants for highways, for unemployment relief and the like. The federal government, which is supposed to be protecting Dominion interests, will find itself, as a consequence, materially handicapped in its efforts to uphold the interests of the Dominion.

I am just as strong an advocate of provincial rights as any person can be, but I do believe that the people of Canada sent us here not to represent the provinces but to represent the interests of the Dominion. I submit that is, or should be, our first consideration in all matters between the provinces and ourselves. The provinces have their own representatives who will feel a corresponding obligation.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if anything is more calculated to bring democratic institutions into contempt than the speech to which we have just listened from the same gentleman who in 1926 wrote a letter to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in which he promised he would do the very thing he now says this house should condemn. When in power after the election he put upon the statute book this very law—and he now says, "What an iniquitous thing it is!" Is anything more calculated to bring democratic institutions into contempt?

Standing here this afternoon, with all the power and authority of the leader of a party, he condemns the scheme which he himself fastened on the country. And he asks the people to take him seriously! I wonder if he really has any policy about anything. Just look at it—ask yourselves what it means; look at it clearly. When this statute was passed he was not content with putting it on the provinces, but he fixed the terms upon which the provinces would have to pass their legislation. He fastened that upon them—he fixed the amount at $240. He fixed the terms and conditions under which they should make payments. He fixed the power to make regulations, and then said no pension could be granted by this Dominion—50 per cent or any other amount—until the provinces adopted agreements satisfactory to the Dominion. Then his provisions are approved by the governor in council.

Now he says that all this is such an absurdity! The idea of the federal power making these grants to the provinces—why, it was that in this very house that was read by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in the hectic days of 1926. But the right hon. gentleman stands in this committee to-day and talks in that way. I must say this is the fourth time I have listened to the same speech. I have not said much about it, the time has come to expose the hollow mockery of that sort of talk. No wonder men look upon our institutions with disdain and contempt. He talks about what the Secretary of State said—of course he did. He dealt with the matter as I dealt with it When the right hon. gentleman said I went out and competed with him or anybody else for votes, he knows as well as anybody that a great convention of the Conservative party was held in Winnipeg at which a declaration was made for a national old age pension system. That same convention elected me leader, and I went out to the people of Canada, not with a chart that I had forgotten about, not with a compass upon which I could not read the direction in which my ship was sailing; but I took that declaration as meaning that I was bound by the convention, and I asked the electors of Canada to adopt that policy. It is not my policy; it is that of the party I lead. When that party elected me to be leader I accepted, I was bound to give effect to their policy. To the best of my ability I have done so, and I shall continue to do so until I am replaced by someone else. When hon. gentlemen go round and say I made promises, my reply is that I placed before the people the policies of the party which made me its leader. That practice I shall continue until my party concludes that it shall have either another policy or another leader.

In connection with my undertaking with the people of Canada to pay 100 per cent and take over the national old age pension system, I realize I cannot do it in a day, nor did I promise I should do it in a day, nor did my party say that we would do it in a day. I realize however that the provinces are hard pressed in these days—very hard pressed indeed; their position is one of great financial uncertainty. To relieve them of any part of their burden, provided I safeguard federal interests is something that, having regard to that legislation, I am bound to do. It is not the way perhaps that I would choose to do it; it is not the way in which if I were dealing with it de novo I would endeavour to deal with the situation; but with that policy, with that position, with that legislation, I felt the only thing I could do in justice to the people of this country—who after all live in the provinces, but are citizens of the Dominion—was to implement to the extent that the finances of the country would warrant the promises which the party had given when it sought their support in the general election. I do not believe the intelligent electors of this country expected me to introduce in a day legislation to deal with all the things dealt with in the resolutions passed at the Winnipeg convention; but I do believe they expected some evidence of a desire to honour that policy and in good faith to carry into effect the promises that were made to them. It is in that sense that we have endeavoured to meet the situation in the manner that I have indicated. If anyone will take the trouble to read that legislation and see how it imposes the will of this parliament upon the provinces with respect to (a) amount of pensions, (b) conditions under which they pay, (c) conditions under which men may have property taken from them if they have any for that purpose —all that it may be argued is something which protects the federal interests. But what it does is this—it says: "You take it or leave it; there is the system we give you."

Now I succeed to the obligation under the promise made by the party to which I belong to deal with this as a national system. And we will deal with it as a national system if we continue in office—as I believe we will—but we are not going to endeavour to do it at a time of national financial emergency. All we can do is to endeavour by this bill to show our good faith to the people who gave us their support, and that good faith is evidenced by our relieving to the extent of 25 per cent the obligation that the provinces have assumed with respect to pension legislation.

I must say that I do not believe the Canadian people think it is necessary for political leaders who one day are in power and the next day are in opposition to revile when in opposition all that they held most dear when they were in power, to change their ground, to shift their position and say, "That which I asked you to accept I now ask you to condemn; that which I told you I believed in then I no longer believe in. I misled you when I told you to do thus and so, not knowing whether I knew or not; I instructed you right then, but now, with changed conditions all that is wrong, all that is nonsense, all that is absurd. What I want to do now is to condemn this thing." What would the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have said if when the bill was introduced he had listened to the speech he has listened to this afternoon? What would he have thought? He was the man who forced this upon a reluctant administration. What would he and his friends have said? How would they have voted in that crisis? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre never made any bones about what he wanted, he was frank and open about it, and he said, "The necessity of one party is my opportunity, and I am going to press it to the full for the benefit of my friends." And he did. I never had any objection to his doing it. But what would he have said if on the introduction of the bill he had listened to the speech he has listened to to-day for the fourth time? What would this country have thought of it? Is not that after all the fair test?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Bennett.]

SUPPLY—CRIME AND CRIMINALS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the house some considerations with regard to the administration of our criminal laws. There is no recognized place for the discussion of such a topic, the estimates for penitentiaries being nearly always presented in the last crowded hours of the session, when they receive scant attention. I therefore feel justified to-night in bringing to the attention of the government and of the house some matters which I believe are creating increasing interest among the outside public.

First I venture to suggest that justice is not being impartially administered. Let me point out one or two instances to illustrate my meaning. I quote from a paragraph in the Winnipeg Tribune of June 5, 1931:

> Tense, whitefaced and repentant, Mike Kohut, young farmer of Sundown, Manitoba, winced and clutched the side of the dock when sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary by Magistrate Noble in city police court to-day for extortion.
> Kohut pleaded guilty to a charge of "demanding property with menaces."

Again—

> Asked in court to-day if he had anything to say before sentence was pronounced Kohut replied, "I didn't try to do those things."
>
> "But it was only because you were caught before you could do so," replied Magistrate Noble.

Again—

> "This is a very serious offence," commented Magistrate Noble, "and carries a maximum penalty of fourteen years in the penitentiary. I can't see where we could have anything much worse than your case. There will be a sentence of ten years in the penitentiary."

Here is a young fellow who was represented by no lawyer whatever. His mind is said to be somewhat unbalanced and he had simply threatened to do certain things. In his own stupid, fumbling way he probably told the truth as he saw it, when he said that he actually had not done them. I contrast that with another sentence which was reported in the Manitoba Free Press of May 6, 1931, just a few weeks previously:

> Lachlan McNeill, for many years head of the Manitoba Farm Loans association, was sent to Headingly jail for eighteen months by Magistrate H. R. Welsford in provincial police court to-day when he pleaded guilty to theft of more than $7,000 government moneys. . . .
> The court expressed much sympathy with the man, who, after a long and successful career in the public service, where he was highly regarded, now finds himself penniless, and with his character gone. For that reason it dealt leniently.

Here was a different sort of crime, the appropriation of $7,000 of government money, extending over a period of five years, and the sentence was eighteen months. I do not know what some hon. members may think of this, especially some of the lawyers who are accustomed to cases of this kind. But I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that a growing number of ordinary people across the country are beginning to resent keenly what seems to them great partiality in the administration of justice. It would seem as if the big criminal is treated in one way and the little criminal in an altogether different and more severe fashion. Let me give a few other illustrations. I quote from the Free Press of December 22:

> Bank hold-up. Gang leader is given twelve years, twenty strokes.

This was simply one of a number of similar sentences meted out by Magistrate R. B. Graham to some young criminals who had been convicted of hold-ups.

Here is another from Toronto:

> James Kirkland, self-confessed bank bandit, who admitted having robbed the Bank of Montreal at King, the Bank of Nova Scotia at Agincourt, and the Canadian Bank of Commerce at Unionville, was this week sentenced to serve eighteen years in the Portsmouth penitentiary, with fifteen lashes at the end of sixty days, by Magistrate William Keith in the Yory county police court.

Take another case which has come to my knowledge. A young chap named Kitowoski robbed a bank. The report says:

> Kitowoski robbed the Dominion bank, Wednesday, of $540. The deed was committed at 12.45 p.m., and in less than twenty-four hours, the bandit received, after pleading guilty to the crime before Magistrate H. L. Cruso, the severe punishment of five years and twenty lashes to be administered in the Stony Mountain penitentiary. . . . . Kitowoski is only sixteen years and two months old.

I am very glad to say that clemency was shown to this boy and the lashes were remitted. Here is a boy just past sixteen who ought to have been dealt with by the juvenile court; yet he was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. He had not actually injured anyone. It is true he held up a bank, but he was caught and the money had not been disposed of. So that no one was the loser. I am not justifying him, but I do say this is a very severe penalty to inflict upon a boy. Personally I do not think any police magistrate ought to have such powers. This is one respect in which the law should be changed.

Mr. RYCKMAN: In fairness, should you not say that he was armed and threatened to shoot?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He was armed.

Mr. RYCKMAN: And threatened to shoot.

Mr. SHORT: If the money had not been handed over he would have shot.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to be fair; I am quoting these extracts briefly. In contrast, let me now give two Canadian Press despatches:

> Toronto, Nov. 3.—A verdict of guilty was brought in by the jury Saturday after deliberating three and a half hours in the case of D. S. Paterson and Austin Campbell, charged with conspiracy to defraud and affect the price of stocks.
> Toronto, Ont., Nov. 3.—D. S. Patterson and company, mining brokers, were suspended from trading on the Standard Mining Exchange to-day.

I cannot help contrasting such a sentence as that with the sentence meted out to these poor boys of whom I have been speaking.

Mr. SHORT: Was that broker armed?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; there are easier ways of robbing people than by using arms—and much more effective.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the sentence?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He was suspended.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that was not the sentence. That had nothing to do with the sentence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A verdict of guilty was brought in. The sentence is not given.

Mr. BENNETT: He is in the penitentiary now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and that is another matter to which I wanted to refer. He has been placed in the preferred class penitentiary. Only a week or so ago we had some information regarding some of these mining brokers who had been placed on the Collins Bay farm some miles west of the city of Kingston. We were told by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) that this farm was not intended for juveniles. When the estimates were being considered in 1928, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) made a strong plea for better treatment of juvenile delinquents. The following reply was made by the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) as appears on page 4063 of Hansard of June 9, 1928:

When the estimates are being prepared next year this will help me to convince my colleagues that the money will be well spent to provide for the construction of special institutions for young offenders.

The debate of the following year will show that this farm was intended for juvenile delinquents. It is true that it was classed as a preferred class penitentiary site, but I do not think that any hon. member imagined that the preferred class would be the big criminals, such as mining brokers. As someone has said, this is a sort of country club for tired brokers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Did my hon. friend say that in the passing of the estimates it was stated that this would be used for juvenile offenders?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said that the discussion would show that it was for juvenile offenders, although it was classed as a preferred class penitentiary site. The hon. member for Kingston followed much the same line as the year before and it was taken for granted that it was to be for juvenile delinquents. I bring this matter up because I know that a large number of people feel very strongly with regard to this matter. May I read what the Toronto Star had to say in connection with the Solloway-Mills case. The article reads:

Guilty Brokers Escape With One Month and Four Months in Jail—Man Who Steals An Overcoat Gets Several Years

It comes down to this, does it not: That because the guilty brokers are willing to pay into the provincial treasuries a total of half a million dollars out of the vast sums they improperly took from the public, they are to escape with one month and four months in jail. And the elected representatives of the people whose duty it is to see that justice is impartial are satisfied with the arrangement, if, indeed, it was not their own making.

Meanwhile, an unemployed man who steals a suit and an overcoat is liable to go to prison for several years without intervention on his behalf from the fountain head of justice.

Something will have to be done by leaders of the community to improve upon the faulty workings of our system of justice and restore faith in its impartiality.

I quite agree with the comment made by the Toronto Star. Let me give one or two expressions of opinion from my own city. I quote the following:

Judge L. St. G. Stubbs spoke to Mrs. Doris Wyrozub, after acquitting her on a charge of aiding her husband to break jail. He said: "Had you been the wife of some wealthy man, sent to jail for robbing the bank by more subtle methods than those used by your husband, there would have been no need for the use of hack-saws to secure his release. The more potent weapon of political influence is much less dangerous, and much more up-to-date."

That is what was said from the bench by Judge Stubbs.

Mr. GUTHRIE: His Honour Judge Stubbs does not admit that report.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Of course I have not his statement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have, and in writing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am well acquainted with his honour.

Mr. GUTHRIE: So I believe.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know something of his sentiments in this regard. In sending Jack Tansowny to gaol for two weeks for furious driving, his honour said:

When a few wealthy rogues can steal more money than all the bank robbers and hold-up men since Canada began, and get off with nominal punishment, it is very disturbing, not only to some of the judges, but to the very serious effect it has on the mind of the public.

I know that our laws have come into existence by piecemeal methods, some of the severest being inherited from the early days. I do not think anyone will contend that in these more modern days we have been as severe with modern crime as they were in the days of old with the class of criminals of that day. Many people are losing their all through speculation, and I ask whether or not this house has any responsibility in the matter. I have talked over this matter with the Under-Secretary of State, but he tells me that he does not see how we can do anything. If we manage to punish crime of other kinds, surely we can punish crime which defrauds people of large sums of money, sometimes of their very living itself. I received the following letter only a few days ago:

I am an employee of the C.N. for about 23 years. When I was a kid of 14, father became an invalid so I had to get out and hustle. At 17 I took out an endowment policy in the Manufacturers' Life. It often kept me guessing to meet the premium but I managed to cash in on it in 1927.

That year was rather unfortunate as I was advised by a so-called business man to invest in some good bonds or preferred stock, so he had a talk with a bond salesman at Wood-Gundy's, and picked out Anticosti for me. So I slammed $2,000 into it.

I am enclosing an editorial from to-day's Free Press which will explain the whole steal better than I can. For every $100 I put in, I get one and a half shares common. The common is quoted at sixty cents, so that gives me ninety cents or nine mills on the dollar.

Is it any wonder that Canadians are losing faith in their country. The only difference I can see between Sir Herbert Holt and Solloway Mills, etc., is that the latter are in jail, while the former is a bank president.

It seems to me that that letter well illustrates what a large number of the so-called "common" people in this country are thinking. In so far as this government represents law and order, it behooves us to take such steps as will remove these anomalies from our criminal code.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does not the hon. member know that under our constitution the administration of the criminal law is in the hands of the provinces?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I know that, but I know also that the federal authorities have general supervision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Over what?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Minister of Justice has a certain function; the Solicitor General has a certain function, and this parliament is the body which enacts the criminal code. When interrupted I was urging that we pass legislation which will enable us to deal with the big criminals just as we deal with the small.

Further, in my opinion there should be appointed a special commission to study the causes of crime and the treatment of criminals. It is said that in this connection we are ahead of the United States; I believe that to be true, but I believe that we are far behind Great Britain. Some years ago that country made a careful investigation of the whole situation, and since that time there has been a very marked improvement. The following resolution was passed by the legislative assembly of Manitoba. I quote from the routine proceedings of March 23, 1931, as follows:

> That whereas the increasing number of convictions in Canadian criminal courts, and of prisoners in our reformatories, jails, and penitentiaries, indicates that crime is on the increase notwithstanding severe and long prison sentences and the imposition of flogging; and,
> Whereas no scientific system of segregation and treatment of prisoners according to age, nature of the crime committed, and modern methods of reclamation, at present exists in our prisons and penitentiaries; and
>
> Whereas the recomendations of a royal commission appointed by the British government to study the whole question of the cause, punishment, and cure of crime, was followed by legislation which apparently has resulted in a lessened incidence of crime; which recommendations included new forms of trial, new institutions for the preventive detention and treatment of prisoners, such as the Borstal institutions, prison aid associations, the Criminal Court of Appeal, the Juvenile Delinquency Act, and Parole Act, and
> Whereas there is in Canada urgent need for a similar exhaustive investigation into the whole matter of crime, treatment of prisoners, conduct of prisoners and penitentiaries, the nature of punishment, and the institutions and organizations necessary for scientifically dealing with the problem;
>
> Therefore be it resolved, that this legislature do hereby humbly memorialize His Excellency, the governor general in council, to make such investigation, by royal commission or otherwise, into the matter of crime, its causes and remedies, present and possible methods of dealing with persons accused of crime and of persons convicted thereof for the purpose of creating legislation, institutions and organizations, necessary for dealing with crime and criminals in an efficient and scientific manner.

Mr. BEYNON: Why not just read the report of the English commission?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. gentleman like me to read it?

Mr. BEYNON: Why not adopt it in Canada instead of having a royal commission?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If we adopted the report of the English commission, we would probably accomplish our purpose.

Mr. BEYNON: I think that would cover it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It might. The trouble is that we have drifted along from year to year in the old way, and we have not attempted any very drastic reforms in dealing with criminals. This idea of a royal commission on crime is endorsed by the Canadian prisoners' Welfare Association of Montreal.

I do not think I need go into any further detail with regard to the necessity of some more modern methods of dealing with crime. In a pamphlet published at Ottawa, giving statistics of criminal and other offences, I note that in 1900 there were 780 convictions per 100,000 of population, while in Great Britain the convictions amounted to less than 200 per 100,000 of population. In that respect we are evidently far behind Great Britain. I admit that conditions in Canada are somewhat different from those in the old country. Owing to our very large and mixed populations and vast spaces, the situation in this country may be difficult. On the other hand, we are apt to say that in the more crowded industrial sections we would look for more crime.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do those figures include convictions for offences against provincial liquor acts?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That I cannot say.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think they do. It makes a great difference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In this connection I might quote from a statement from an address delivered in January, 1931, by the Hon. E. J. McMurray, former Solicitor General, before the service clubs of Winnipeg:

> The policemen of Great Britain and Ireland are unarmed and the criminals are unarmed. The jails are becoming empty. From 1913 up to 1930 crime decreased from 600 in every 100,000 population to 120. There are but one-fourth as many people in prisons in Great Britain to-day as there were in 1913. . . . Intelligent scientific treatment of a purely scientific problem has had this result.

Let me give some of our own statistics. The total number of people in Canadian penitentiaries has jumped from 2,769 to 3,187, an increase of 418 over the previous year. By far the greater part of this increase is in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The figures for Saskatchewan penitentiary have almost doubled during the past year—501 on March 31, 1930, as against 268 in 1929. Forty-eight were under twenty years of age when sentenced. I think that is a most serious situation. Over 45 per cent of the total number of prisoners are between the ages of twenty and thirty. Nearly 12 per cent are not yet twenty years old. So that about 57 per cent of the total number of prisoners in Canadian penitentiaries are not over thirty years of age.

We have very largely gone on the old plan of dealing with the criminal individually. Henry Elmer Barnes has said in the Story of Crime:

> The modern criminology supplants the old slogan of making the punishment fit the crime by the new objective of making the treatment fit the criminal.

Some hon. gentlemen insist on banging their desks as I talk. I am well aware that a number of members are not in the slightest degree interested in this question of crime and the treatment of criminals. In the last ten years, that I have been a member of the house I have found that we have had practically no opportunity of entering into details with regard to the situation or really carefully considering the matter. I cannot hope that to-night at this late stage in the session—and this is the first opportunity I have had of dealing with the matter—we can give it careful consideration. What I am pleading for is that in some way the Department of Justice would consider very definite reform measures. If it be necessary to have a royal commission—and sometimes these royal commissions are overdone—let us have one, but in some way let men competent to deal with the question give careful consideration to the whole subject with a view of working more nearly along the British lines or bringing in some other better system. We should not be satisfied simply with reading reports of how we are dealing with criminals; rather, we should take some steps to try to understand and abolish the causes of crime.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that the matter he has just discussed is one of the greatest importance in this or any other civilized country. I regret exceedingly that he has waited until almost the closing day of the session to bring this subject to the attention of the house. I also regret that I had no notice whatever that he intended to bring the matter up this evening or at any time to-day; otherwise I might have had before me certain information, in particular statistical data which might have thrown a good deal of light upon the administration of the criminal law in the Dominion of Canada.

As has already been said the administration of the law does not belong to the jurisdiction of this government or parliament. Under our system the administration of the law, both civil and criminal, is entrusted almost exclusively to the various provincial governments. It is true that the criminal law is enacted in this parliament, and that the federal government appoints the judges who for the most part administer that criminal law throughout Canada. But there is a great body of the criminal law which is not administered by the judges we appoint. The majority of the convictions to which my hon. friend has just referred are convictions by justices of the peace, police magistrates, stipendiary magistrates, all of whom are appointed by the governments of the various provinces. The vast majority of the convictions are from the courts of our magistrates, in whose appointment this government has no voice whatever.

I agree that it is difficult in a country such as Canada, or in any country for that matter, to secure uniformity in regard to criminal sentences. Indeed it is impossible. Each case must be decided upon its own particular facts and circumstances. Matters which will appeal to one presiding judge may not appeal to another. The circumstances in no two cases exactly coincide. Consequently we are bound to have in the various parts and among the different populations of this country differences in regard to sentences.

There is a branch of the Department of Justice known as the remission branch, which deals with criminal cases on the basis of executive clemency, where recommendations are made to His Excellency the Governor General in respect of persons who are actually in custody serving the sentence. Until a man or a woman has been placed in one of our penal institutions and is actually in custody, no question of clemency arises and the Department of Justice in no way interferes; but after the criminal is in custody, then it is within the power of His Excellency the Governor General, in the exercise of the royal prerogative, to take a lenient view, as he very frequently does on many of the applications which are brought before him in respect of clemency.

We have on the statute books of this country what is known as the Ticket of Leave Act. Under that act it is competent for any man or woman who is confined in a penal institution to bring his case up for consideration before His Excellency the Governor General and ask for the exercise of the royal prerogative. Those cases are exceedingly numerous. The applications will run to four thousand, probably five thousand, in a year, and each application, when it comes in, is fully considered and such recommendation is made to His Excellency as seems to accord with the circumstances of the case.

I admit that probably at this date the conditions in respect of criminals and crime are more advanced in Great Britain than in Canada. I have read, not as fully as I should like to have done, and I have to some extent considered, the report of the royal commission in Great Britain upon this subject. We in this country are endeavouring as fast as we reasonably can to adopt such of those methods as have been adopted in Great Britain with excellent results. But we cannot do so in the twinkling of an eye. It will take time to develop that system here as it is in Great Britain. Indeed, it is said by officers of the Department of Justice that as far back as the year 1890 the very system which was adopted in Great Britain was considered in this country and partly adopted. Plans were drawn and laid before parliament for the adoption of such a system, and some money was spent at that time, but the matter was allowed to rest; it never was proceeded with. But in England it is said that they adopted the very plan which we had discussed in the parliament of Canada. They brought them to maturity, and they have been operated in Great Britain with very excellent results.

In any comparison of convictions in Great Britain with convictions in the Dominion of Canada, no true idea of the conditions in the two countries can be formed unless one excludes what we call convictions under the provincial liquor laws. These in Canada are exceedingly numerous, while in Great Britain they are exceedingly limited in number. We have different provincial enactments with respect to the use of intoxicating liquor. In England they have one, broad, general, very liberal law, and the convictions for breach of their law are rare, while in this country convictions for breach of our liquor laws make up a very large proportion of the records of our convictions.

Unfortunately the penitentiary population in Canada has increased. It is now somewhere between 3,800 and 4,000. It has increased in the past three or four years so rapidly that we are experiencing the greatest difficulty in accommodating those who have been sent to our penal institutions, but it is not correct to say that in this country we have not drawn the line between the juvenile offender and the more hardened offender. In I think almost all the provinces of Canada we have prisons and reformatories under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments for the treatment of juvenile offenders. Under the laws of this country, under the laws passed by this parliament, a juvenile offender is a boy or girl up to the age of sixteen. They do not go to our penitentiaries. They go to our prisons and reformatories.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about these young people between twenty and twenty-five years of age, who form such a large proportion of the penitentiary inmates?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Over the age of sixteen they are not, under the statute, considered juvenile delinquents. We have a limited number in our penitentiaries to-day between the ages of sixteen and eighteen. I had the figures prepared to submit to the house when the penitentiary estimates were under discussion, but I do not happen to have them with me to-night. It is a very small number between the ages of sixteen and eighteen, but between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five the number is considerably larger. But as between the first offender and the hardened criminal a very great effort has been made to draw a very decided line. It is for that reason, and in carrying out that policy, that certain prisons are being established, and I hope in the future they may be established throughout Canada, called "preferred class" penitentiaries. I do not know that the name is well chosen. I do not know that there should be any preference at all in regard to such a matter, but in some way or other the term "preferred class" has grown up, and you will see in the various reports in years gone by from the superintendent of the penitentiaries how strongly he has urged that preferred class penitentiaries should be established. The recommendation of the year before last, I think it was, for a vote of money to erect buildings at Kingston and at St. Vincent de Paul in the province of Quebec was for the express purpose of providing preferred class penitentiaries—not for juvenile delinquents at all. I note that in the discussion which took place in this house something was said in regard to juvenile delinquents, but that was not the purpose of the vote. Juvenile delinquents, I say, are looked after for the most part in provincial prisons and reformatories. These preferred class penitentiaries are for first offenders, for men who have not theretofore had a criminal record at all. The idea is to segregate them from the old offender. I grant you that the influence of prison life, where first offenders are congregated day after day and night after night, year after year, with old offenders, is in a great many cases very baleful indeed, and I think it was a step in the right direction when something practical was done to establish the preferred class penitentiary, call it by what name you like.

The criticism which was levelled some six weeks or two months ago with regard to the treatment of some men in the preferred class penitentiary was entirely unjust. It was said that certain brokers were down at the preferred class penitentiary at Kingston. That is so in the case of other men, not brokers only, who are first offenders. Anyone else who goes there is a first offender who has not been convicted of one of the more serious crimes of violence. That prison is now under construction. It is being built entirely by prison labour. Naturally the construction is slow. Men have to be trained as carpenters, stone masons, bricklayers and mechanics in the various trades. In the preferred class penitentiary the hours of labour are precisely the same as in the other penitentiary, the clothes are precisely the same, the prison rations are precisely the same, the hours during which the patient or prisoner is locked up are precisely the same—the treatment in every respect is identical, although as yet the prisoners are not confined behind high stone walls but merely behind barbed wire fences. The idea in the establishment of that prison is to give the inmates a chance if possible, to reform, to keep them away from the bad influence of hardened criminals. Two of these preferred class penitentiaries have been established. One institution which might be in that class is the Ontario reformatory at Guelph, which has done excellent work. It is a provincial prison. Around it there are neither stone walls nor fences. Gangs of men may be seen working on the farm. Of course there are guards in attendance, but the men are allowed a certain amount of recreation while in that institution. In a great many instances I believe positive reforms have been made and men have been saved from careers of crime. That is the first of the large prisons established in Canada based upon reformative principles.

The preferred class penitentiary follows as closely as possible the model of the reformatory at Guelph. Conditions are the same in many respects, but segregation is complete. First offenders sent to Kingston to-day, except in cases where crimes have been accompanied by violence—because as yet we cannot trust such prisoners—are placed in the preferred class. Although at the present time there is not room to accommodate all of them, about 200 or 250 are in the preferred class prison. Another institution of the kind is being established at St. Vincent de Paul, Montreal. I hope when we are in a position to make the necessary expenditures similar preferred class prisons will be established throughout all the provinces.

I do not wish further to discuss this matter. I agree that the matters to which my hon. friend referred are serious and I should like to offer some practical suggestions concerning the points he raised. I think however that in this country we are proceeding along proper lines and if we do not stand first in the number and treatment of our criminal classes I believe we stand second to Great Britain and ahead of every other country in the world. Perhaps some day we will in that regard be upon as high a plane as is the mother country.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say very much to-night, because I am not prepared, but I believe the subject under consideration is worthy of the attention of hon. members. For some years I have been interested in the subject before us, especially from the point of view of juveniles. I think a mistake was made in allowing police magistrates to sentence to penitentiaries. They have not the experience or judgment to qualify them to make such decisions.

I have one example in mind which I think worthy of mention, and to which I shall make further reference when we are dealing with the subject of penitentiaries. I refer to a young boy who enlisted for overseas service as a result of which at the age of seventeen years, he was taken from his home. At the close of the war he was rooming above a grocery store, and one night being hungry he entered the store and took two tins of pork and beans. A few mornings afterwards the police magistrate, not being in his right mind, sentenced the boy to three years in the penitentiary. Before we could get the boy out of prison he had spent two weeks in Kingston penitentiary on a bench beside a lifer. Although we were told repeatedly that boys were not placed beside lifers, I know in this particular instance the reverse was the fact. This should make plain the necessity for some consideration of the matter before us. I do not agree with the information the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has received concerning preferred class penitentiaries. I think the term "preferred class penitentiaries" will damn us all. It is said that this particular type of institution is for first offenders, but if it is supposed that only first offenders are admitted, somebody is badly mistaken, because I am in a position to state that at the present time there are other than first offenders in the institution.

I am not particularly concerned with the statements which have been made concerning the preferred class penitentiaries. I do not care how much comfort and ease the brokers have experienced, and so far as I am concerned they may be given more. In my view it is a mistake, however, that those men should have been picked out, some of whom had been only twenty-six days at the penitentiary and some only seven days when they were transferred, while on the other hand boys, first offenders, are still in the big prison. I am not concerned about the brokers, but I am opposed to naming the institution "preferred class penitentiary," and believe that such action will get some people into trouble.

There are further matters with which I intend to deal when we come to the matter of penitentiaries. For the present, however, I wish only to say that I am not convinced that the Minister of Justice has been correctly informed concerning the existing situation.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the session I placed a motion on the order paper asking that a board be appointed to examine all sentences pronounced for offences under dominion statutes with power to revise either by appeal or otherwise. Unfortunately when the matter came before the house shortly after eight o'clock I was not in my seat and the motion was dropped. I have had a great number of letters and large quantities of corespondence in the matter. I have had considerable experience in dealing with criminals and I believe there should be some check upon sentences imposed, especially by police magistrates whose environments and sympathies are purely local.

Before I proceed further I should like to give an example of the administration of justice in the county from which I come. A few years ago a foreigner ran amuck through the town and smashed twenty-one windows with an iron bar. He was arrested and charged with wilful damage to property, and sentenced to serve two years for each window that he had broken—forty-two years in the penitentiary. Evidently the magistrate intended the two-year terms to run concurrently, but once having delivered judgment, he insisted that it was correct. We have had cases in Ontario—largely automobile accident cases—where through the sympathy of the local judge and magistrate the accused was let off on suspended sentence. A young man in my riding was convicted of stealing a fox from a fox farm. For this offence the extreme penalty is two years' imprisonment—and he got it. It was pointed out, and rightly I think, that this young fellow had had no previous convictions against him, that he was drunk at the time and in the company of criminals who no doubt had induced him to commit the theft. It took me a year and a half to get a remission of the sentence. Why? Because in this, as in every such case, remission of the sentence depends upon the magistrate reversing his original judgment, and it is naturally to be expected that our magistrates being just human and having no legal training will be disinclined to stultify themselves.

I do not desire to labour the matter further, but I would impress upon the government that a board should be appointed to whom such appeals could be made. I know I shall be told by the Minister of Justice that the persons convicted are at liberty to engage a lawyer to appeal their conviction, but many of these criminals, especially the young men, have no means, and therefore cannot possibly engage legal assistance to lodge an appeal. I submit there should be a body appointed to whom these cases could be appealed without any costs to the unfortunate appellants.

RESTIGOUCHE RIVER BRIDGE

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I am in the happy position this evening of bringing to your notice and to that of the government, through the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), a question that appeals favourably to me as it has for many years appealed to the people of New Brunswick and eastern Quebec; I refer to the construction of a bridge over the Restigouche river from Cross Point in Quebec to Campbellton in New Brunswick. The matter has been brought to a head during the last four or five years by the construction by New Brunswick of the magnificent highway extending from Campbellton to Edmundston down to the United States boundary, and also by the construction of the magnificent Gaspe highway by the province of Quebec. The hon. Minister of Public Works has been kind enough to advise me of the progress that has been made in regard to this question. A few years ago, if my memory serves me aright, the New Brunswick government passed an order in council to pay one-third of the cost of this undertaking, and recently the government of Quebec has passed an order in council, a copy of which the hon. Minister of Public Works has very courteously supplied to me. I presume it is practically on the same lines as the order in council passed by the government in New Brunswick. It reads:

Whereas Act 21, George V, chapter 5, authorizes the government of the province to build an interprovincial bridge on the Restigouche river, between Cross Point, in the province of Quebec, and Campbellton, in the province of New Brunswick, and, consequently, to enter with the government of Canada and that of the province of New Brunswick into the necessary covenants concerning the construction, maintenance, up-keep, repair, administration and operation of the said bridge.

Whereas it is now necessary to enter into these covenants.

The honourable the minister recommends that he be authorized to enter with the government of Canada and that of the province of New Brunswick into the necessary covenants concerning the construction, maintenance, up-keep, repair, administration and operation of an interprovincial bridge on the Restigouche river, between Cross Point, in the province of Quebec, and Campbellton, in the province of New Brunswick.

On Wednesday last I brought this arrangement to the attention of the government, and the hon. Minister of Public Works told me that his department was prepared to enter into a discussion of the matter with the two provinces. This enabled the citizens of Campbellton,—the most important town in northern New Brunswick—to convene its board of trade. At the meeting a resolution was adopted which I had the honour of transmitting to the hon. minister asking him to take action in this matter, both by reason of the urgency of the work itself and the necessity to provide employment in that part of the country owing to the practical stagnation of the lumber industry. I also communicated with the hon. Minister of Public Works and Labour in Quebec, Mr. J. N. Francœur, and this afternoon I received from him the following message:

Have sent to-day following telegram to hon. Stewart, Ottawa, and hon. Stewart, New Brunswick, "Re Cross Point Campbellton Bridge as per legislation passed concerning this bridge and as authorized by order in council our government ready to contribute to the extent of one-third of cost of bridge."

This dispels all doubt on the question. I do not think I need plead any further with the government to cooperate with the provinces in this undertaking. When we see two provinces agree as in this case, it has been the time-honoured custom of the federal government to contribute one third of the cost. Happily at the present time this government has at its head a distinguished son of New Brunswick, and I have no doubt that under the circumstances he will be delighted to aid his native province and the old province of Quebec in the construction of this bridge over the historic Restigouche river. I have inquired of the hon. Minister of Public Works and I know I shall have his support and also that of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) with whom I have sat in this house for many years, and I am sure also the support of the member for Gaspe (Mr. Brasset) and the member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier). Already the supplementary estimates have been tabled, but this is a matter of great urgency and I know there have been instances of further supplementaries being brought down. Therefore I think it might be possible until such time as the plans are prepared and the arrangement between the two provinces completed for a small amount to be voted by this house to enable the preparatory work to be carried on and certain necessary construction material ordered. I can assure the government that if it responds to the public feeling in this matter it will be entitled to the thanks of the community on both sides of the river.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of detaining the house but without making any apology for so doing, I desire to say a brief word in regard to this proposal for a bridge over the Restigouche river between Cross Point, Quebec, and Campbellton in my own province. The agitation for this bridge extended over a very considerable number of years. Previous to the war it was thought that the project might be brought to fruition, but the enormous war expenditures forced its postponement. Recently, however, interest has been stirred up, chiefly by the citizens of Campbellton. They have been exceedingly active in urging upon the three governmental authorities the absolute necessity for providing a through highway joining the two provinces at this point. I quite realize that perhaps the country is not in a very favourable position just now to vote large sums towards this project, but I agree with my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), who has laid the matter before the government in a reasonable way, that a start might be made this year. The reason I urge that something be done is that I realize that unemployment conditions in that particular locality call for immediate attention. Restigouche river, dividing New Brunswick and Quebec, has been for many years the scene of very extensive lumber operations. But as a result of the change from long lumber to pulp a large number of long lumber mills have been put out of active business, with consequent unemployment. If the government, and especially the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart, Leeds) could find it convenient to call a meeting of the representatives of Quebec, now that they have put themselves in order, and of New Brunswick, which has been urging the project for three years, some start might be made this fall. I commend this to their consideration, because I believe it will go a long way towards relieving some of the distress from unemployment in that community in the coming winter. A substantial amount of preparatory work could be done before the drawing of the plans and the calling for tenders; but if that is not possible I suggest that some provision be made either in the supplementary estimates or out of the moneys that may be voted for unemployment, so that the project may not be delayed until the next session of parliament. In other words, I urge that a start be made this year, and I heartily concur in what has been said by my hon. friend from Bonaventure. I trust that the government will give the matter its very earnest attention.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Very little can be added to what the two hon. gentlemen who have just spoken have stated in connection with this project. The Dominion has sometimes made a joint and equal contribution with the provinces interested in interprovincial bridges. It is correct to say that a considerable time ago New Brunswick intimated its readiness to join in this project and to contribute one-third of the cost. It is only within the last few days, as I have already said in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Bonaventure, that any intimation of this kind had been received from Quebec, and I have not yet been handed the telegram to which he refers. The orders in council passed by that province signify its willingness to consider the question of a contribution, and I stated to the house that we were prepared to enter into a discussion. That still stands. It is unfortunate that the matter comes up so late in the session, when the supplementary estimates are practically down. It would take weeks or probably months to conclude the discussion and have plans prepared, because no action can be taken until the three authorities interested are in agreement with regard to cost and other matters. It has been suggested that possibly the Canadian National Railways would be interested in this project, and that would change its character altogether. All I can say at this time is that I shall be pleased to receive deputations from either or both of these provinces, and give the matter careful consideration, discussing it in all its details and endeavouring to arrive at a conclusion as to the kind of structure to be built, whether it is necessary to proceed with it immediately, or whether it would be possible to do so. That is as far as I can go to-night. I have no doubt that in the near future, the two provinces being now interested and each having agreed to make a contribution, we shall be able to discuss the subject. The details can be settled and an agreement framed if it is thought, after all the information is available, that this is the proper time to proceed.

CRIME AND CRIMINALS

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): It shows how little we can hear, and how bad the acoustics are, when I say that I did not know that the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who followed him, were discussing something altogether different from the matter introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Since I could not hear one word that either of them said, I shall now proceed to say something on the subject of crimes and criminals. Before I go on to do so, however, may I suggest that we need not only an improvement in the acoustics of the chamber but a training school in voice culture. The least we can expect is to hear what is being said.

It seems to me that in this time of widespread unemployment, when people cannot find work and often are driven to desperation, the sentencing of those who have committed offences is something that should be done with great care. We know only too well that many people who commit the gravest crimes against society are not condemned but rather applauded. On the North American continent the strange custom prevails of honouring most the most unsocial of citizens; they are given places of trust, all the fine things fall to their lot, and in fact the laurel wreath of victory is placed upon their brows. It therefore makes me sympathetic with men and women who in these days are often driven by hunger and despair to do what otherwise they would not dream of doing. I think it is particularly fitting that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should bring this matter up.

Many years ago, when the Right Hon. Mr. Doherty was Minister of Justice, a splendid commission was appointed and it brought in recommendations which if acted upon would have resulted in the improvement of our treatment of criminals. But those recommendations have not been acted upon, and so our whole penal system has suffered.

In Great Britain they have been remarkably successful in their treatment of criminals. There are three things in which they have gone much further than we. First, in regard to probation, many are given suspended sentence; second, the man or woman is given a chance to pay the fine in instalments. Now that we have the instalment plan in nearly everything there is no reason why it should not be applied to the payment of fines. Then, too, they carry on a more extensive parole system, particularly in regard to young offenders. This is something which we might well follow the lead given by Great Britain.

In case I should not be here when the estimates come down—because it is often difficult to be in the house when particular estimates are in committee—I wish to say now what I think is most needed at the moment in our Canadian penitentiaries. Possibly more than anything else we need a citizens' board of reestablishment. That need not be the name, but we do need a body of responsible citizens to whom prisoners can go, and who will help them in a human way to become reestablished in life. I am sure we could get people of splendid mental attainments and fine character to take part in such work as this. Very often the prisoner becomes utterly discouraged during the first week in which he or she is free, and this feeling might be overcome.

We need wardens who are trained in penology. While some wardens have been good wardens, many have been political appointees. They are appointed not because they are trained in penology, but because they happen to be the brother, the cousin or the brother-in-law of some person in authority. At times these appointments turn out rather badly.

We need that to which this house agreed to some time ago but which has not been carried out, the providing of productive work for prisoners. This work would be paid for, the pay to go to the support of their dependents, if any, and, if there are no dependents, to be held for the use of the prisoners when released. Of course, the cost of maintenance would be first deducted.

Mr. ARTHURS: We should provide first for the men out of prison.

Miss MACPHAIL: I do not see why a man should be prevented from working simply because he has committed a crime. Certainly I want to see the men out of prison having work, but by adopting the method of productive work with pay for prisoners, maintenance would cost the state less and the men would be better off if they had plenty of work to do. Social workers will tell those interested that one of the disastrous things which happens after a man has served a long term is the fact that he will not again assume the responsibilities of his family upon release. This would be prevented to a large extent if the man had to consider these responsibilities while in prison.

The library facilities in our penitentiaries could be improved. They are much better than they were previously, but the lighting in the cells is not good. If a prisoner wants to be studious he should not be forced to carry on his studies under the worst possible light, with a danger of eye strain.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1932, was presented by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS

European war—naval, militia and air forces after the war, $50,500,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, when this item was last before the committee I asked the minister as to the standing of the disputed cases which had been sent to the exchequer court. I understand that a total of $25,000 is payable in connection with the six cases. Perhaps the minister could give the committee some information in this regard.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My information is that the decision of the exchequer court did not touch the question of payment. I am informed also that to effect payment application must be made to the tribunal, and that one or more of those affected have already made such application.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Another point which was raised on a previous occasion had to do with the commission counsel throughout Canada. A return was tabled earlier in the session containing the instructions sent out by the chief commission counsel to the various counsel throughout Canada. When that return was made I discovered that further instructions had been issued on June 26, 1931. I brought this matter to the attention of the minister who informed me that he did not approve of the instructions and had asked that they be cancelled immediately. I think it only fair to the minister to make this statement. However, these instructions violated absolutely the spirit of the legislation passed last year under which the ex-service man was to be given the benefit of the doubt. Without detaining the committee too much, I should like to place these instructions on record. They read:

Ottawa, June 26, 1931.
C.C. Instruction No. 25.

Re: Medical Witnesses.

Up to the present time it has been only on rather rare occasions that counsel have brought in any medical witnesses on applications before the various tribunals. Our attitude, as you well know, has been to insist upon the applicant proving his case against the crown rather than producing evidence against him. This practice has resulted in what might be described as "unbalanced transcripts." That is, all the evidence is in favour of the applicant and there is none which tends to show the soundness of the medical theory advanced by applicant's medical witness. This situation has been repeatedly commented on by the court and a change is considered advisable.

Pension medical examiners in the various unit offices have now been instructed to furnish counsel with the name of a prominent doctor in each of the towns and cities visited by the tribunals. Immediately upon arrival in that town or city it is desired that district counsel communicate with this doctor, advising him that you wish him to peruse the file, listen to the testimony and if necessary go into the box as a witness. If it happens that he agrees with the medical theory advanced by the applicant's medical witness or the applicant himself, it would seem hardly necessary to put him in the box. On the other hand, should he doubt that the symptoms complained of by the applicant are bona fide symptoms of any present injury or disease or that it is likely that the said injury or disease could be related to service, put him in the box, so that his opinion may be recorded.

It is impossible to lay down any definite tariff of fees but you will have to inform these doctors that the commission is prepared to pay them a reasonable fee.

In case of consultants or specialists the figure would, of course, be larger. The best method of arranging payment for these services is for the doctor to give you an account at once and for you to forward it to this office, advising in what cases he attended before the tribunal and whether or not he actually testified.

This change in procedure is to go into effect immediately.

Chief Counsel.

The only reason I am bringing this to the attention of the committee is this: I strongly advise the minister that all instructions sent in the future by the chief counsel to the various commission counsel be reviewed by the minister himself or by his deputy before they are sent out, because this instruction is in direct conflict with the spirit of the work of the parliamentary committee of last year and the principle of giving the ex-service man the benefit of the doubt. Again I wish to congratulate the minister on recalling this instruction as soon as I brought the matter to his attention.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is true when the instruction was drawn to my attention I did not approve it, and I wrote the pension board asking that it be cancelled immediately. I want to say further that I am not yet informed that the instruction has been cancelled. This may be partly due to the absence of the chairman or to a question of the minister's authority under the act. I do not know which it is, or whether both were factors; but as a matter of fact I have not yet been informed of the cancellation. Further, as the matter has been brought up and as the instruction has been read in the committee, I wish to state that I entirely disapprove of the communication having been sent in reference to the giving or the not giving evidence. It is hardly in accordance with the spirit in which we look on these matters of claims for pensions.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to bring up a matter that is of great interest to many ex-soldiers seeking pension and that will be of still greater interest in time to come, because they do not yet fully realize what they are up against. The situation is this: When a case comes before the Board of Pension Commissioners, as we all know they have three matters to decide: First, has the man any disability? Second, did he get that disability due to war service? Third, what is the amount of the disability? If the answers are in the affirmative in the first two cases, they will grant him a pension in accordance with the answer to the third question.

Prior to the legislation passed last year, if the Board of Pension Commissioners, while admitting the disability, refused to admit that it was due to war service, the man could appeal to a higher court, called the appeal court, but he could not appeal if, while they admitted the disability was due to war service, they said that the disability was negligible, or they gave him a sum less than he thought he should get. Many of the men felt that they suffered an injustice in that regard; they said that the Board of Pension Commissioners could always get out of their responsibility by saying: We admit you have a disability due to the war, but we find it is negligible, or only one or two per cent, in which case the man had no redress. The pension committee which went so largely into the subject last year thought they had remedied that by changing the right of appeal so that the man could appeal on either ground, either that the board had refused to admit that the disability was due to war service, or that he thought the pension was not big enough on what is called technically, assessment. That was highly satisfactory; it was made public and there were thousands of appeals. That began in the latter part of September or early in October and went on for a month or two. Then someone, I do not know who he was, had the idea that was all wrong, that the legislation passed in 1930 gave the man the right to appeal not on assessment but only on the question whether he had what is called entitlement or disability due to war. It appears that the legislation of 1930 provided that in case of any doubt arising as to the interpretation of the act, it was to be decided, not by the pension board, not by the regional tribunal, but by the higher court, the court of appeal. The question was submitted to them, so far as my memory goes, somewhere around December and was heard some time in March. It is almost August now and the decision has not been rendered. It must be a simple matter for men versed in the law to decide whether that appeal comes within the four corners of the act or not. I have tried again and again by asking questions in the house, and so on, to find out the situation, and all I have been told is that the matter has been heard but a decision has not yet been given. I feel ashamed to go home, and surely many other members feel as I do, and have to say that this matter has been hanging fire all this time and we cannot get this simple decision rendered by some three or five men.

This question very materially affects the returned men and the whole system of pensions, because thousands of cases where the appeal is against assessment are in consequence being held up; they are not being sent on to the regional tribunal because it is not known whether that can be done or not. It is difficult to explain the matter to the ordinary pensioner who put in an appeal last October and wants to know why there has been no action. When one tells him that a decision has not yet been given all he asks is; why not? I am interested not so much in asking why a decision has not been given as in asking that pressure be put upon this body to give their decision immediately. The benefit of it is this, that those men who have appealed on assessment and who find that they can or cannot, as the case may be, go on with their appeal, will know the best or the worst. Whichever way the decision goes, it will result in advancing the roll. The appeals will either be dropped or gone on with, which will be to the benefit of the system of granting pensions. I should like to know from the minister, who has studied this question carefully, whether he could give us some expression of his determination to bring this to a head in the interest of everybody concerned, including his own department.

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall make inquiries in reference to the matter.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to direct a question to the minister in regard to the status of a Canadian soldier who remained in Great Britain at the close of the war and who is now suffering from a very serious disability which is, I believe, traceable to his war services. This young man was in Canada when the war broke out; he had lived here for a number of years; he joined up with the Canadian forces; he served with the Canadian forces throughout the entire period of the war, but he remained in Great Britain after demobilization. Has he any claim now to apply to Canada for a pension?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think he has, but if a communication were sent in writing to the department any day, a prompt reply would be furnished in regard to the case, because the records would be searched, a statement would be before the department and the matter could easily be settled.

Mr. IRVINE: I think the application has gone in.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: How many applications are now pending which have been made since that act came into force on the first of October?

Mr. MacLAREN: There are 20,000 odd.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Can the minister say how many appeals have been taken, not heard, during the same period by the Board of Pension Commissioners against favourable decisions of the tribunals?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think all those figures have been given in answer to questions. The number is 717.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In how many of those cases was the decision of the tribunal reversed?

Mr. MacLAREN: In 200 cases up to the end of June.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Are the cases before the appeal court increasing or decreasing?

Mr. MacLAREN: The appeal court is able to deal with its cases more completely than the other courts. It is pretty well up to date now.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I neglected to ask what should have been my first question. How many of these 700 odd appeals have been heard?

Mr. MacLAREN: The number is 377.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: And in 200 cases the decision has been reversed? I understand that under the resolution which was adopted, I believe, a little while ago, the number of the members of the tribunal will be increased so that in effect there will be two additional courts, which it is hoped will be able to overtake the applications that are accumulating. It is a matter of a good deal of importance, as the minister knows. I have never been in the habit of bringing up individual cases in the house, and I am simply going to touch on one illustrating the situation that exists and with which the minister is very familiar.

It is the case of a young chap named William Martin. The minister will not remember him, but this young fellow remembers the minister because, through the kindness of the minister, this young chap at my request was given several weeks of hospitalization, although at the time not legally entitled to that hospitalization.

Mr. MacLAREN: That was in Calgary.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes, at the Colonel Belcher hospital. He is a young chap from Red Deer, who was given hospitalization at my request as a compassionate case. Unfortunately the doctors found that they could not do very much for him, and although he was a little easier while in hospital, they came to the conclusion that the case was practically incurable, and so he went home. The situation is this: It is something over three years now since he first made his application. His application was refused, but he reapplied under the new act. During the time of application, some months ago, the minister was good enough to issue an order which placed him in hospital for some weeks. As I say, that is some months ago now. When he left the hospital he was assured by the officials there that his case for a pension was a good one. His condition was obvious, and they said that so far as they could judge his condition was attributable. He was a machine gunner. He received certain dental injuries and injuries in the back, with the result that in addition to the weakness and pain in his back, he now finds himself in a nervous condition which totally disqualifies him for any kind of work. As a matter of fact, at the present time this chap with his wife and two children, one of whom is an invalid and has to have special food at all times and special treatment due to some form of kidney trouble, is totally unable to work, and his sole income is derived from four cows which they are milking.

I have taken a particular interest in this case, perhaps a greater interest than in any other that has come to my attention because of the patience and courage of this man. He hardly ever complains, and he has endeared himself to the doctors and officials with whom he comes in contact just by reason of those qualities. But for months now his papers have been in Ottawa, and for months he has been awaiting word. He was informed when he left the hospital that very shortly afterwards he would receive notice as to his pension, but month after month has passed and he has been unable to get any reply. Apparently the file is hung up somewhere in this mass of 20,000 cases. Hope deferred makes the heart sick. I get an occasional letter from this man, not a cheerful letter, but very patient and courageous. I got a letter from a neighbour a little while ago asking if I could possibly find out why this fellow whose condition so obviously to all his neighbours entitles him to a pension, was unable to get a hearing and get any action. I am not complaining of the minister at all, because I know just as well as the minister himself that when we placed these boards beyond the reach of any political influence we placed them practically beyond the influence of the minister himself as well as everybody else. They are almost autonomous boards, but at the same time the minister has naturally some influence, and I would like him to use it in this way, not to get for this man something that he does not deserve, but if possible to hasten the decision so that he will be able to get the pension which he thinks will be coming, and which I think will be coming eventually. At present the case seems to be lost in this labyrinth of 20,000 cases. I have applied again and again to try to find out where it is, and no one seems to know or to be able to locate it, or to be able to say when the man's case will be settled. In the meantime the neighbours write to me and ask why in the world, with all the legislation we have passed and with all the intent on the part of parliament and the people of Canada that these proper cases should he taken care of, he is left in that situation.

I estimate that his income from the four cows would be from $2 to $2.50 a week, and the minister knows how far that will go to support four of a family, two of them invalids. I would ask the minister to make inquiries and ascertain the present position of this application, and if possible to hasten the day when definite action will be taken and the pension, if he is entitled to a pension, will be granted. As I say, it is a case which above all others which have gone through my hands in all these years has enlisted my complete sympathy. I am almost ashamed to look the man in the face when I meet him, because when I go home and go to see him, month after month and recess after recess he asks me about his case and, I can only tell him that I am doing all I can and that presently, if he will only have patience, his case will be attended to. As I say, it is a case of hope deferred making the heart sick, and I am a little afraid, in view of the condition this chap is in, nervously and physically, of just what the consequences may be; because a man can hope only so long, and courage and patience last only so long. The man's name is W. G. Martin, and his regimental number is 2275312. That is an outstanding illustration of the delays which have taken place and of the fact that some of the procedure has gone a long way towards nullifying legislation which was passed. I hope the minister will look into the matter and that before long this young man will receive the consideration and financial assistance to which his services and disabilities have entitled him.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not assume, necessarily, that the department is at fault. I have seen many cases where full investigations have shown that the department was not in error. I hope however that the hon. member (Mr. Speakman) will have a reply at a very early date.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am not assuming that the department is at fault; I have a good deal of sympathy with it. Delays can last only so long, however, without being fatal.

Mr. CAYLEY: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which has been referred to me concerning the late G. A. Warren, regimental No. 775429. Mr. Warren was in receipt of a pension but directly following his death the pension due his wife and daughter was cut off. An application was made for appeal, and the case was heard in Toronto by the pensions tribunal on December 18, 1930, at which time the appeal was allowed. The finding of the tribunal was that the late Mr. Warren's death was due to cerebral hemorrhage, traceable to military service. In the hearing before the tribunal the evidence seemed to be very clear. For some reason however, the decision was referred to the pension appeal court, which set aside the finding of the tribunal on the ground that in the opinion of the court the evidence was insufficient properly to establish the claim. At the present time they are asking for more detail and evidence. The wife and daughter are in dire need of assistance. On the surface this seems to be a very cruel way of handling the matter. Before Mr. Warren's death he was in receipt of a pension; directly after his death the pension due to his wife and daughter was cut off and they are left to get along as best they can. I trust the minister will investigate the matter to see if something can be done.

Item agreed to.

Care of patients and medical examination respecting pension, $3,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many are in all the hospitals in Canada at the present time receiving treatment?

Mr. MacLAREN: There are 3,348.

Mr. ROSS: There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. A notice of motion in this connection has been given, but has not received consideration by the house. One matter which is causing ex-service men a great deal of pain and suffering is the fact that when they make application to the unit administrator they are told they can get no treatment or hospitalization until the examiners at headquarters decide whether or not they are entitled to pension. In all cases such decisions require periods of time ranging from two to six months, and often longer. I think it would only be fair, where an applicant or ex-service man presents himself for such consideration, that he should be examined forthwith, by the unit or district director, and if there is a matter of urgency or seriousness he should be admitted to hospital pending the decision whether or not he is entitled to pension. Many of these men have come up on such applications, and before decisions have been reached the men have died and the determination of eligibility was more difficult than ever. I think this country could well afford, where there are serious or emergent cases concerning ex-service men, to admit through the unit or district administrator to the hospital at once. This matter has been the subject of discussion on more than one occasion and I believe it is the wish of all parties that such treatment should be given. There is no doubt that men have died simply because they were refused treatment. It may be true that those ex-service men may become municipal or charitable cases, but they have points of view of their own and believe that they are entitled to better treatment. I know how difficult it is to prove a man's eligibility, but according to the methods used at the present time it is just as difficult and perhaps more so to prove that he is not eligible. I believe that ex-service men, and especially those who have had front line service, are entitled to this particular consideration. When they present themselves they should be forthwith examined and if their cases are urgent or serious they should be admitted to hospitalization at once.

Item agreed to.

Salaries—administrative, $1,510,000; insurance, $40,000; hospitals and clinics, $1,850,00.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister given consideration to the necessity for a new military hospital in the city of Vancouver?

Mr. MacLAREN: No. There have been very substantial improvements in the building in Vancouver. At one time it was not regarded as being reasonably safe, and for that reason extensive changes have been made. Bed patients have been moved downstairs, administrative rooms have been moved upstairs, because they are used only in the day time; special shingles have been placed on the roof and other changes have been made in the building so that it is now reported as being a fair and reasonable risk. It is not an old building and was not built as a hospital, but I think conditions at present are quite favourable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thank you.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment relief, $600,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why the reduction of $300,000 in this vote?

Mr. MacLAREN: Really it is not a reduction, it is a very substantial increase. Last year instead of there being what was thought by many a decrease, on the contrary nearly twice as much was spent; that is to say, over $900,000 as compared with $500,000 odd. But the amounts were not always sufficient and were supplemented by governor general's warrants. This year $600,000 was the original estimate, but as during the summer it has not been possible to make the usual reduction, that amount will have to be very substantially increased by an appropriation in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. CAYLEY: Is this vote to provide for returned soldiers out of work?

Mr. MacLAREN: Unemployed pensioners.

Mr. CAYLEY: In my constituency there is a soldier who has not been able to prove that he is entitled to a pension, although he has been so used up that he is not able to work and has to depend on the municipality and his friends for maintenance. Is there any provision for such a case?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, a man not a pensioner and not able to work can qualify for a veteran's allowance.

Mr. CAYLEY: What would he receive in that case? He is a married man.

Mr. MacLAREN: Forty dollars a month.

Mr. NEILL: But he has to be permanently unemployed before he becomes entitled to such an allowance.

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot give details, but it is quite possible from what my hon. friend says that the man might qualify for that allowance. No definite statement could be made until after a thorough investigation.

Mr. GARDINER: Suppose a returned man is unemployed and cannot qualify for that allowance, what provision is made for him?

Mr. MacLAREN: Then this department does not cover his case.

Mr. NEILL: On what basis is this money distributed to a single man, in cash or groceries?

Mr. MacLAREN: If the man works for it, he gets money; but as a rule it is an order for groceries, coal or rent.

Mr. NEILL: I heard of the case of a single man, totally unable to work, given an allowance for groceries of $5 a month,—this to cover rent, food and clothing.

Mr. MacLAREN: This is a supplementary allowance and is not intended for the maintenance of a man and his family.

Mr. NEILL: What does it supplement?

Mr. MacLAREN: His pension. If he has a large pension he does not get anything out of this fund. It is to bring up his pension to a certain amount.

Mr. NEILL: What is that amount?

Mr. MacLAREN: For a single man $30, for a married man $45, for a man and wife and one child $57, for a man and wife and two children or more $67. It does not exceed the latter sum.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the total amount spent last year?

Mr. MacLAREN: We spent $907,000.

Mr. ROSS: What per cent of disability must a man have before he participates in this fund?

Mr. MacLAREN: A man who has a pension of 80 per cent or over does not receive anything.

Mr. ROSS: What is the minimum?

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think there is any minimum now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. ROSS: I know that men with 5 per cent disability have been refused relief. It very often happens that the man who is credited with only 5 per cent has 100 per cent disability but he gets no relief, whereas the man who has only 15 per cent total disability gets relief. Would it be possible to remedy that anomaly?

[Mr. MacLaren.]

Mr. MacLAREN: There is no downward limit. Any man who has five per cent disability can get assistance from this fund.

Mr. ROSS: That may be true, but quite a few men in my city are refused simply because they are only 5 per cent disability cases. If the minister will say that is so, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not say unqualifiedly that that is so at all seasons of the year.

Mr. ROSS: How many have received assistance from what is known as the disablement fund, and who administers that fund?

Mr. MacLAREN: It is not in the estimates, it is a private fund administered by the secretary of the department.

Mr. ROSS: Has the secretary of the department the whole say?

Mr. MacLAREN: He has a very substantial say, yes.

Item agreed to.

Sheltered employment, $130,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: How are the vetcraft shops getting on? Some time ago their chief difficulty was finding markets for their products.

Mr. MacLAREN: There is considerable difficulty in disposing of the products. These shops have salesmen who travel about the country, trying to get orders. Some of the shops have a large accumulation of stock so that there is a good deal of difficulty. As time goes on the need of these shops will largely disappear.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Are the proceeds returned to the men or are they taken in part by the department to carry on the shops?

Mr. MacLAREN: The men are paid so much an hour. The shops cannot be expected to be self-sustaining; they are behind something like $30 per man per month.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Roughly speaking, what returns were received by the department last year from the sale of goods?

Mr. MacLAREN: Last year the amount was $430,000.

Item agreed to.

Pension tribunal, $55,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I wish to submit to the minister certain statements made to me recently by a returned man who said he represented the organized unorganized returned men, if that title is understood. Those men who do not belong to any of the recognized soldier bodies have apparently some form of loose organization. He gave me a lengthy memorandum which I shall not read at the moment, but the gist of his request was that an investigation should be held into the working of the whole act and into the funds which come under the jurisdiction of the department directly or indirectly, including the last post fund. He included the canteen fund, which is not at present under the jurisdiction of the department. These men, it seems, have certain grievances and this ex-service man's suggestion was that an investigator should be appointed, paid by themselves but clothed with authority from the minister so that he might have access to the books and the records of the different departments in order to satisfy his organization with regard to these matters, particularly as they affect those men who do not belong to the legion or any other kindred body. He felt, apparently, that the men who do not belong to the legion were discriminated against, and he seemed to have a strong feeling in the matter. I suggested that he approach the minister himself. I do not know whether he has done so but I am passing on to the minister the gist of what he said to me. I can give the minister the memorandum for his private information.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not recall the case.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The name is W. Martin.

Mr. MacLAREN: The accounts are audited and anyone who wishes to do so can come to the department and get the information.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I will advise him to see the minister.

Item agreed to.

Pension appeal court, $23,209.68.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What are the duties of the members of the court?

Mr. MacLAREN: The court comprises a president and two members. The president receives $8,000 and the two other members $7,000 each. The president of the appeal court was a member of the Supreme Court of Alberta and he was retired with his superannuation allowance. It has been so arranged that his retirement allowance will continue in addition to the salary of $8,000. It was found necessary to obtain the services of someone who would have to be paid considerably more than $8,000 if we wished to get the ideal man. So that Judge Hyndman receives his retiring allowance as judge and also the $8,000 as president of the pension appeal court.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister's explanation is quite lucid as far as it goes, but I wish to repeat the warning I sounded when the item was discussed on a previous occasion. I would point out that this system of dual appeals is working to the distinct injury of the returned men. Anyone who studies the returns submitted during this session will find that of 560 cases heard by the court of appeal from the pension tribunals, the decision in 143 was favourable to the ex-service appellant, and unfavourable in 417. It seems to me very unfortunate that after an appellant has won his case, returning home in that belief, he should some months afterwards be notified from Ottawa that this successful appeal has been rejected by the pension appeal court. It is a most cruel thing.

Mr. MacLAREN: That happened during the early history of the tribunals. Instructions were issued and are now being carried out that all concerned are to be informed at the time of the award that the award is subject to appeal. In this way disappointment is avoided.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I feel very strongly, as does the hon. member who has just taken his seat, about this whole system of appeal against the decision of the tribunals. I know the act provides for this precedure and the minister is not responsible, but the effect is to discredit the tribunal. I feel, as do many more vitally interested, that there should be finality as far as favourable decisions are concerned, and that that finality should rest with the body best qualified, the body which meets the applicant and hears his evidence. There should be no appeal except on the part of the returned men where an unfavourable decision is given. I hope the legislation will be amended in this regard.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I am very much interested in the remarks just made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman). Undoubtedly when a favourable decision is given by the court of first instance, the tribunal, and that decision is reversed on appeal, the general effect is bad. A sound principle of law is that the court of first instance which hears the evidence, sees the witnesses and observes their demeanour, and then finds upon the facts, should not have its decisions lightly disturbed. As I understand the law a court of appeal will not disturb a finding of fact made by the court below. If the court of appeal finds that there is no evidence to sustain certain facts necessary to support the finding, it is within its jurisdiction to reverse the finding. I have no doubt that the appellate body in this instance takes into consideration the facts and frequently reverses decisions based upon facts. That is where the appellate court is going astray, and in fairness to those who submit their cases, there should not be the large percentage of reversals referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In view of the fact that the percentage of reversals is about fifty per cent, there would seem to be no doubt that the tribunal itself is taking less care in the consideration of these cases. It is losing its sense of dignity and importance. I have gone over 100 cases of appeals and I find a very strong feeling that the appeal court is ignoring largely what we call the benefit of the doubt clause and is insisting upon positive and conclusive evidence in almost every instance. This is contrary to the act itself.

Mr. MacLAREN: The pensions board, the tribunal and the appeal court are bound to give heed to that clause.

Item agreed to.

War veterans' allowances, $1,600,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What percentage of applications received have been granted?

Mr. MacLAREN: Those granted number 2,219, and those refused 2,508.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: How many applicants had reached the age of sixty, and how many were under that age?

Mr. MacLAREN: Of those refused, 527 were sixty years and over, and 1,981 were under sixty years of age. Of those granted, 872 were under sixty,and 1,347 were over sixty.

Mr. ROSS: I understand that the disablement fund is a private fund, and I would like a little information in this connection.

Mr. MacLAREN: The disablement fund had its inception in 1915. In the late summer of that year money was being paid to the government by public-spirited citizens for the purchase of machine guns which it had been claimed through an erroneous newspaper report were not being supplied to the Canadian troops owing to the lack of money. Sir James Lougheed, then president of the Military Hospitals Commission, and acting Minister of Militia and Defence, suggested to Mr. E. H. Scammell, secretary of the Military Hospitals Commission and now secretary of the department of Pensions and National Health, that he issue an interview to the press with a view to having some of the subscriptions then being raised diverted to create a fund which might be of use to disabled members of the Canadian forces. He authorized Mr. Scammell to administer any moneys thus obtained. As a result of an interview given to the press, correspondence, addresses, and so forth, the sum of $128,710.20 was raised. There was one very large subscription amounting to $100,000 made by the late Mr. James Carruthers of Montreal. Mr. Carruthers attached no conditions to his subscription, nor did any other contributors do so. The total number of subscriptions received was sixty-five, many of them representing collections made by various organizations among their members, so that in all probability the number of individual subscribers ran into some thousands. In addition to Mr. Carruthers,' large individual subscriptions were received from Mr. John Nichols of Souris, Prince Edward Island; Messrs. Goldie, McCulloch Company, Galt; railway mail service staff; Irish Charitable Institution, Halifax; Mr. M. P. Davis, Ottawa; Mr. A. Baumgarten, Montreal; Thursday Afternoon Club, Yarmouth, Nova Scotia; employees of Dominion Bridge Company and Montreal Ammunition Company, Lachine; collection per Mr. A. L. Kennedy, Aylesford, Nova Scotia; Prince Edward Island students' gift fund; Military Hospitals commission staff, Winnipeg; McMurrich School, Ontario.

I might read the financial statement. The following statement sets forth the present condition of the fund:

Subscribed..	$ 93,710 20
Interest..	72,810 42
Total..	$166,520 66

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL HEALTH

Public health engineering, $25,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Just what is the class of work carried on under this item?

Mr. MacLAREN: This is in connection with water supply, for instance, protection against diseases in polluted waters, on railway trains, inland lakes, lake boats, and other services.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Salaries and disbursements of fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and fisheries protection services, $1,116,000.

Mr. NEILL: I have had a large number of complaints as to the way in which these appointments of fishery guardians have been made. These men are what are called permanent seasonal men; that is, they are employed every year for a few months. The procedure that has been adopted for the last number of years has been that if they gave satisfaction, and there was no complaint from their superior officer, they would be taken on year after year no matter what their political affiliations might be. The result was that that system made for the efficiency of the department because the men understood that if they carried out their duties properly they would be kept on year after year, without any regard to political considerations. But a different system seems to have been adopted in the last few months. Last fall, after the election—I am speaking of that period only—thirteen appointments were made, and in only one case was the man a returned soldier. I forgot to say that the system that was always followed previously was of giving a preference to a returned man. Even though these appointments were not under the Civil Service Commission, but were rather political appointments, the well recognized principle of giving the returned soldier the preference was carried out. As I said, thirteen appointments were made last fall, and only one appears to be a returned man. I am not proposing to take up the time of the house to go into each of these cases, but I would like to give a couple as thoroughly illustrative of the system that is being followed.

At Qualicum Beach, on the second of September, a man was put on. He was not a returned man. I believe the reason was that he had to be put on in a hurry and there was no returned man available. That is a fairly good excuse if it happened to be true, but it does not happen to be true. There was no rush about it because it had been known for six months before that his services would be required. In the next place, Qualicum Beach has a returned soldiers' organization of somewhere around fifty or sixty, which is right at that spot, of course. Then at Parksville there is another returned soldiers' organization, numbering about ninety, and three miles beyond that is the residence of this man who was appointed, and who is not a returned man. Both these returned soldier organizations are thoroughly alive, and they have very capable secretaries, both of them on the telephone, I believe, at all events both readily accessible, and they would have been only too glad to furnish a half-a-dozen names of returned soldiers for the selection of a fishery officer, but instead of that, they were all passed over and this non-returned man from a greater distance was selected. I might point out that the way in which his predecessor was selected the year before was this, that when the vacancy occurred the returned soldiers' organization was asked to nominate two or three, and then one of these men nominated, irrespective of his politics, got the position. But in the case I have mentioned it was done in the way I have indicated. I shall not stop to ask the minister for an explanation now, but will give the other case so that he may answer both at the same time. In the case I have mentioned the appointed man's name was Craig, and the circumstances are as I have indicated.

In respect to the appointment at Sprout Lake, this summer, the man who had been there was a returned man, appointed according to the practice that had been followed for a number of years. I do not know if he had been actually wounded, but he had considerable disabilities due to the war, and he had held that position for six years. He had been appointed year after year as a matter of course, and he took it for granted that he would go on again. He had been there since 1925. Apparently there had been no complaint against this man. If there had been, why did it take six years to come to the surface? That man was put off and a gentleman who was not a returned man was put on. Another returned man, who had been three and a half years in France, named Below, also applied for the vacancy, and he naturally wants to know why he did not get the preference ordinarily and properly given to returned men. I would be glad if the minister would give me the official explanation as to these two cases. There are quite a number of others of the same character but I have given just a couple for the purpose of illustration.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Fisheries): In reply to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) I have no record before me nor could I have a record with respect to each individual appointment, but I shall be very happy indeed to take up Hansard to-morrow and make a personal investigation into each case raised by my hon. friend. I am advised, however, by my deputy that there has been no change whatsoever in the practice of the department with respect to the appointment of fishery guardians, but that the same practice which has obtained for many years has been followed.

My hon. friend is in error in assuming that the policy was ever laid down that a fishery guardian who had been employed for any number of years should have a prescriptive right to continue in office. As a matter of fact, these appointments have been made for years in a manner which is known to hon. members of this house. They are not permanent. They are made on nomination, as my hon. friend knows; and I will say this to him, that I have been at pains to satisfy myself that in every letter sent out from the department calling for nominations for these positions it has been clearly stated that returned soldiers should be given the preference. I am not surprised that certain of these appointments are not acceptable to hon. gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of the house. I may say, however, that while there are over 550 of these officials scattered throughout the country, I have had very few complaints with respect either to the individuals themselves or to the manner in which they have performed their work. Further information than that I cannot give with respect to individual cases, but any that my hon. friend cares to bring to my attention I shall be very happy to investigate to see if there is anything I ought to do to remedy what he claims to be an injustice.

Mr. NEILL: Neither the minister's deputy nor anyone else can deny the fact that the system has been changed, because hitherto it has been as I have stated. Returned men were given the preference, and the returned soldiers' organization in the locality was asked to nominate a man, and where they were unable to nominate a man, as in years gone by when work was plentiful, I have had to go and practically beg men to take these rather petty jobs, and sometimes men who were not returned men were put on. I know what I am talking about. I am talking of the policy that prevailed in Comox-Alberni, not of the policy that may have been followed throughout the country. The system that was followed in Comox-Alberni was wherever possible to appoint a returned man on the nomination of the returned soldiers' organization, and there was no discrimination on account of politics at all. There are men who have been carried on in these positions year after year since before I was first elected, and they are there still regardless of their politics, or at least were there until the election, and I certainly would challenge anyone to deny that out of thirteen appointments made last fall only one was a returned man I accept, of course, the minister's statement that he cannot be cognizant of every case, and I am also glad to hear that he has given instructions that the preference to the returned men should be recognized. I can only regret that his instructions have been very poorly carried out, and I would ask him to put some pressure on his subordinate officers in British Columbia in order to see that the proportion of returned men appointed in future is a little better than one in thirteen.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask what is the cause of the delay in the appointment of the regular fishery inspector at Miscou and Shippigan?

Mr. RHODES: So far as the department is concerned, there has been no delay. We are awaiting the action of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish the minister would urge the commission to make the appointment, because the acting inspector is busying himself with other work rather than looking after the work of the protection of fisheries. I refer to Mr. Albert Robicheau.

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that within the last few days the Civil Service Commission were requested to hasten the appointment concerning which my hon. friend has spoken. Mr. Robicheau, however, is not an inspector but a guardian.

Mr. VENIOT: Hs is acting in the place of the inspector.

Mr. RHODES: Pending the appointment by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. VENIOT: He is a temporary inspector; my statement is correct in that regard.

Mr. McLURE: The other evening when the estimates of this department were under consideration I made some statements concerning complaints of the crew of the steamship Amla. I desire at this time to put the remainder of the facts on record.

On the former occasion I presented letters showing that the crew of the Amla had not been paid, despite the fact that many promises of payment had been made. I wish to read a letter under date of July 25, 1930, addressed to one of the crew of that ship. The particular letter in question is addressed to Lemuel Winchester, and is as follows:

> Many thanks for your kind felicitations regarding my appointment to the Senate. We understood when leaving Ottawa that the wages due on the Amla were to be paid at once. As there was no word of it last week we wired the minister to have no further delay in effecting a settlement, but we have no word yet. We expect it be attended to at once.
> Yours truly,
> John E. Sinclair.

On the previous occasion I said that representations had been made by the hon. members from Prince Edward Island in favour of paying the crew. In spite of promises which have been made we find that on July 12 the then Minister of Fisheries wrote the captain of the boat as follows:

Captain W. P. Burke,
148 Elm Avenue,
Charlottetown, P.E.I.
Dear Captain Burke:

I have your letter of the 10th instant. I have taken up with the department the case of yourself and crew of the Amla and have been pressing for an immediate settlement. I am glad to inform you that the department has approved of payment and has forwarded the recommendation to the treasury board for approval. Because of the peculiar circumstances of the case, payment cannot be made until this approval is given and I confidently expect that this will be done at the first meeting of the board which, I am told, must be at an early date. I have every hope and assurance of an early and satisfactory settlement,

I am,

Faithfully yours,
Cyrus Macmillan.

At that time Cyrus MacMillan was Minister of Fisheries.

On July 19, 1930, when the election campaign was in progress, Doctor Grant, the gentleman in Kings county who was running against the Honourable J. A. Macdonald, had received complaints concerning wages paid to the crew of the Amla. The then Minister of Fisheries wrote him as follows:

With reference to the claim for unpaid wages submitted by Captain Burke and the crew of ss. Amla mentioned in your recent letter, I have to inform you that this claim which has been pending for nearly a year was finally approved by the Department of Fisheries some time ago. There is no departmental appropriations from which the amount can be taken and payment can therefore only be made by the treasury board. This board has not met for some days because of the absence of so many ministers. A meeting will be held at an early date, possibly within the next few days, when the matter will be finally adjusted.

I confidently look for an early and satisfactory settlement.

With all good wishes, I am,

Faithfully yours,
Cyrus Macmillian.

With reference to the claim of the Amla we have had reports from two different ministers of fisheries, and they each assure us that the claim was justifiable and should be paid. I have learned that the sum of $3,650 is claimed by the crew and has not been paid. We hope that the present minister will consider the matter favourably and that as a result the crew will be paid. It is bad enough for men to have no work, but in this instance men have had work but have not been paid.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has continued some remarks he made when the estimates were previously under consideration. I think I can place the facts briefly before the committee. An agreement was entered into between the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries and one O. W. Nordin, President of the International Fresh Fish Corporation. The agreement covered a period of six months, and a portion of it provided that Nordin was to purchase from the fishermen all the fish available in a certain area of the waters of Prince Edward Island, at a certain price set forth in the agreement. For the services to be performed he was to receive during a period of six months a subsidy of $1,800 per month. This agreement was approved by order in council passed on March 20, 1929. The terms were that the services to be performed were to be commenced on the first day of June of that year. As a matter of fact, on the first day of June the services did not commence, and in consequence of the negligence of the company which had contracted to perform the services notice of cancellation was given and the contract was cancelled on the 17th day of July following. In other words, the services to be performed were never even commenced, and the contract was duly cancelled.

Subsequently there were a number of claims made by seamen for wages and by merchants who had supplied goods to the company which owned the ship, and an action was entered in the exchequer court, Prince Edward Island admiralty district, and judgment was rendered by Mr. Justice W. S. Stewart. He found, not that there were due for services in connection with this ship five month's wages, as has been alleged on different occasions, but that there were due one month's wages to each member of the crew. The amounts which he found to be due were as follows: to the captain, $117.75; to the mate, $125; to the cook, $125; to the engineer, $210; to two firemen at $140 per month $280; and to two seamen at $120 per month, $240; or a total of $1,097.75. I think it would be admitted by any fair-minded person that there is no claim either in law or in equity against the government for the month's services which were found by the judge to have been rendered to the owner of the ship, because he performed no services for the government under his agreement and his agreement was cancelled.

There is one regrettable phase on which I do not desire to dwell,—apparently an understanding was given these unfortunate men that in some manner or other the government may have been connected with the enterprise. But that understanding came from nobody in authority with the government. Possibly in virtue of it the men had in their minds that they were working for the government, and they continued their services long after any work was performed on the ship. As a matter of fact Mr. Justice Stewart in his judgment makes reference to it in these words:

> Although the claim was for five months, I allow each of the plaintiffs one month's wages, and I fix the allowance at so much. The crew seems to have been kept connected with the ship until the trial at the request of the captain, although it is not easy to understand why they were so kept.

Now, sir, on the merits I submit there is no claim in law, neither is there in equity, by these men against the government. It would be a very dangerous precedent to establish if under the circumstances you are going to make such a remotely distant contract with the government an excuse for a claim against the government for wages. I have gone this far, and I do not see how I can very well go any further, I have said: The government at the time took out a bond for the faithful performance of the contract with the Fidelity Insurance Company of Canada in the sum of $5,000, indemnifying the government against any damages which might arise as a result of this contract and to ensure bona fides on the part of the contractor. The Department of Justice has been asked to collect under that bond. Up to the present moment they have not succeeded in doing so. If they do recover, so far as I am concerned, I would be quite willing to recommend to the government that these men be reimbursed their wages as an act of grace, and as an act of grace only, because I submit, it would be too dangerous a precedent for the government to admit any liability whatever in the circumstances.

I am not going to impute any motives or find any fault with my predecessor, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of that day, who submitted the recommendation to council that these wages be paid. But I do say this, that while that recommendation went to council, there it remained and no action was taken on it. So I can only conclude either that the government were not in agreement with the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or that they considered it immaterial whether the wages were paid or not. It is true that when the first Minister of Fisheries was appointed a further recommendation came in on behalf of those who had supplied goods to this vessel. Well, I am not going to enter into the merits in that connection. These merchants must have gone into the contract with their eyes wide open, and they must have known that there was no liability on the part of the government. And I am not going to dwell upon the circumstance that the recommendation, if my memory serves me right, went into council after the last general election. At all events, this I do know, that my predecessor as Minister of Fisheries, when he wrote the letter which was last referred to by my hon. friend from Queens (Mr. McLure) must have written it in Prince Edward Island, because there is no record of it in the department whatsoever; we have no knowledge of it there. Needless to say, the recommendation to council for payment of those accounts received precisely the same treatment as the first recommendation to council with reference to wages.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I cannot take up very much more time on this matter for I see I have only half a minute left. I will add only this: I hope we can recover under the indemnity bond, and if so I am prepared to recommend payment of these claims as an act of grace. Otherwise I do not see how I can possibly concur in the view that the government is under any liability whatsoever. I must take my courage in both hands in making that statement, because my hon. friend from Queens has been most insistent, persistent and consistent in demanding that these claims should be paid; but with all respect to him I must say that I cannot agree with him that the government is liable in any respect whatsoever.

Mr. McLURE: Will the bond be collected?

Mr. RHODES: I hope so.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

First report of the joint committee on the library of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

TEST SHIPMENTS OF GRAIN THROUGH CHURCHILL THIS SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. R. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) advise the house if he has received any intimation from exporters of grain in the west that they would like to have cargo space reserved in the trial shipment from Churchill. Will he inform the house also if competent authorities in Saskatchewan have stated that they have secured grain in quantities for the test shipments?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have received no requests from anyone in western Canada for space in this trial shipment. No one has communicated with me except the On-to-the-Bay Association, who stated that they had disposal of 150,000 bushels, which would comprise about half a cargo. While on my feet may I add that statements have appeared in the papers that Mr. Dunning had said repeatedly that if his party were returned to power they would ship 5,000,000 bushels this fall. A search has been made of the records and of Hansard and no such statement has been found. I do not believe Mr. Dunning ever made any such statement. I ask these western papers either to tell me the source of their information or to stop misquoting and misrepresenting.

PRIVILEGE—MR. SPOTTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. The Toronto Daily Star of Monday, July 27, contains the following headline:

M.P. Franks Circular Soliciting Students for Business College.
Had Several Hundred Mimeographed in House, George Spotton admits.

The article itself reads as follows:

Enclosed in an official envelope of the House of Commons, Ottawa, a letter written on government stationery received by a Toronto girl, carries a mimeographed text of about 250 words soliciting her patronage for the Canada Business College, an organization owned and operated by George Spotton, Conservative M.P. for Huron North.

The letter is signed "Canada Business College, per George Spotton, M.P. for North Huron." The outside envelope is franked for free postage, and on the back in large type is the word "free."

Also enclosed is a return envelope, on House of Commons stationery, addressed to G. McEachren, B.A., Canada Business College, 274 College Street, Toronto, Ontario.

Interviewed by The Star in Toronto to-day, Mr. Spotton admitted that the letter was one sent out by him.

"How many have you sent out?" The Star asked. "Several hundred," Mr. Spotton said. "Where were they mimeographed?" "In the house. They were dictated to a government stenographer and passed through the usual channels. All letters dispatched by members have to be authorized by the chief of stenographers and the Clerk of the House."

"Were these letters authorized?" "They were authorized. In fact it was Mr. Smith, head stenographer, who suggested that they should be multigraphed to save time. Otherwise I could have had carbon copies made."

"Do you consider this method of writing business letters quite in order?" "Certainly. I consider it one of my perquisites. Every public office has perquisites. If a man were not allowed to keep in touch with his business while in Ottawa, except by hiring his own stenographer, then a parliamentary career would be for rich men only."

"Is this a general practice?" "Even more so than in my case.' Mr. Smith told me a short time ago that I had been particularly lenient in the use of his stenographers this session. I am not trying 'to put it over.' Both Mr. Smith and the clerk have long experience in parliamentary custom."

Mr. Spotton stated he did not think that the matter would be brought up in the house. "It was done before and it came out that the persons who protested had been themselves making particularly free use of departmental facilities," he said. "If anyone thinks they will do me harm in my constituency, I will say that my electors would laugh if anyone brings up the question in the house, of my having saved $17 or $18 or $21 by using the house stenographers, stationery and stamps. Every envelope bears my initial, written either by me or by someone else on my behalf. That means that I am responsible for that letter."

I wish to say that the Toronto Daily Star was particularly fair to me. During the week end they searched for me all over western Ontario and sought an interview before they published this item.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member state his question of privilege? He has laid the ground therefor by reading the article, but it is not in order to make a speech.

Mr. SPOTTON: The following appears under date of Ottawa, July 27:

"Offhand, I should say such a practice would be an abuse of the franking privileges," an official of the Post Office Department told The Star, commenting on Mr. Spotton's circular.

That is my chief complaint. I will read another paragraph in the article, as follows:

The regulations governing franking are quite broad and indefinite, the text reading merely as follows: "letters and other mailable matter sent to or by any member of the Senate or House of Commons are carried free of postage."

No limitation as to the character of the letter is contained in the regulations.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member state his question of privilege?

Mr. SPOTTON: I deny absolutely the accusation contained in the heading of this article. A cursory reading of the article would make it appear that the hon. member for North Huron was abusing his privileges. I ask that the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) give the name of the post office official who says that a member of this honourable body has abused his franking privileges. I state: This is not correct. A lawyer in the house fills out his deeds, leases and mortgages and keeps in touch with his clients, so does the manufacturer, and if a humble business college manager cannot keep in touch with his business, then he cannot remain in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman can direct his complaint to the Post Office Department which, and not this house, controls the franking privilege.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 111, to amend the customs tariff.

He said: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) said that on the third reading he desired to move an amendment and the matter stood over to afford him that opportunity.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I am not going to discuss my amendment at any length, because it has been discussed on several previous occasions, and I think we have exhausted all the discussion on that particular subject. I am not, however, so sure that I am really responsible for the amendment I have to offer. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is responsible for it; in fact, I think the Conservative party is responsible for it, because in 1930 they advocated an amendment to the customs tariff, and taking my cue from their position I consider that industries which are receiving benefits from the customs tariff should be prepared at least to give their workingmen protection in accordance with the treaty of Versailles. My amendment is along the lines of the one I moved when the bill was last in committee. I beg to move:

That the bill be not now read a third time but be referred back to the committee empowering the committee to add the following section:

The governor in council may direct from time to time that any industry, the products of which receive protection under this act, shall demonstrate to the satisfaction of the governor in council that freedom of association for employees for all lawful purposes is permitted in the operation of such industry, and that the hours of labour and rates of wages are observed consistent with the provisions of the labour part of the treaty of Versailles concluded at Paris, France, on June 28, 1919.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will those in favour of the amendment kindly say aye?

[Mr. Spotton.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will those opposed to the amendment kindly say nay?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet before you put the motion, trying to catch your eye or ear. Some of us are seated at a long distance from the Speaker, and when we stand in our places in regard to a matter of this kind, I think we have a right to be heard before a motion is put. I was standing in my place before Your Honour put the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose while I was putting the question. He was too late. The question is now on the motion for the third reading of the bill. If the hon. member desires to speak on that, not having done so before, that is his privilege.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not propose to discuss at any length the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan). It seems to me that this is quite in keeping with the suggestion as made last year by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I think it was read once before, but I want to read once again what he said on May 21, 1930. He said:

Did Canada sign the treaty of peace? Did Canada thereby become, amongst the nations of the world, a member of the League of Nations? The answer is yes. Did the Liberal party, in solemn convention assembled, adopt the Labour articles of the treaty of peace? The answer is yes. Did the Conservative party do the same? The answer is yes. To-night the question is whether or not the parliament of the Dominion of Canada that signed the treaty of peace, with two great parties pledging themselves to its observance and the group to my left also supporting it, is helpless. It is true that property and civil rights are matters exclusively under the control of the provincial legislatures. It is equally true that this parliament may, if it so pleases, impose conditions with respect to any matter wherein it expends public money or confers a benefit or privilege upon any person or class or corporation.

I do not think the case could have been better put. Since only yesterday the Prime Minister definitely assured us that he was prepared to carry out the pledges made by the people who elected him to his present position, I can scarcely understand—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPENCER: Can we not have order in this chamber ?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that since it was only yesterday the Prime Minister told us that since he had been elected by the convention at Winnipeg to the position of leader of the Conservative party he was prepared to stand by the program laid down at that time, I can scarcely understand his position in this matter. Today I find that he is taking no steps whatever to carry out the solemn pledges adopted at that convention, and which he himself stated so well only a year ago when leader of the opposition. I can say no more than that.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONALS ACT

PROVISION FOR LOSS OR RENUNCIATION OF CANADIAN NATIONALITY

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved:

That the motion to go into committee on Bill No. 24, be discharged, and the bill be withdrawn from the order paper.

He said: The other day I gave reasons why it was impracticable in the present session to deal further with the bill.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): I understand that the government still believes in the principle of the bill, but for some special reason cannot proceed with it at this session.

Mr. CAHAN: I think I explained the other day to the hon. member for St. James that because the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) had been employed on a select committee of the house it had been impossible to secure agreements between the Department of Immigration and Colonization, the Department of External Affairs and the Department of the Secretary of State with respect to certain necessary amendments to the Immigration Act which would be required to comply with the terms of this measure. For that reason the government decided not to proceed further with this measure this year, in the hope that at the ensuing session steps might be taken to enact measures embodying the principle of this bill and also making certain necessary amendments to the Immigration Act so that it may be made consistent with the terms of the bill before the house.

Motion agreed to and bill withdrawn.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 39, to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the nature of the amendment?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The amendment is really formal in character, and is quite acceptable. If this bill as amended in the Senate becomes law, we will still have in our law subsection 7 of section 151 as it stands at present, although it is understood we will not exercise jurisdiction beyond the three-mile limit pending appeal to the privy council in the Dunphy vs. Croft case. Then, if a favourable decision is obtained from the privy council, a proclamation would be issued, the effect of which would be to repeal subsection 7 as it now stands and substitute therefor the new subsection 7 as proposed in our original bill.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CHICOUTIMI HARBOUR

ADVANCE OF $450,000 FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 141, to provide a further loan to the Chicoutimi harbour commissioners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, July 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 106, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): We shall consider section 1.

Mr. BENNETT: No; section 1 has been adopted. The bill was in committee before.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not certain of the sections which have been carried.

Mr. BENNETT: The first section for consideration was No. 2.

On section 2—stamp tax on cheques.

Mr. BENNETT: This section stood. It is proposed to give effect to the contention that cheques of five dollars or under should not pay the stamp tax.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That section two of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

2. Section forty-four of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"44. No person shall

(a) issue a cheque for an amount exceeding five dollars, payable at or by a bank or drawn upon or addressed to a bank and requiring or directing payment of a sum of money; or

(b) present to a bank for payment a cheque for an amount exceeding five dollars, as defined in paragraph (c) (ii) of the last preceding section;

unless there is affixed thereto an adhesive two cent excise or postage stamp or unless there is impressed thereon by means of a die a stamp of the value of two cents."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—stamp tax on receipts for money paid by bank.

Mr. BENNETT: The next amendment is to section 4 with respect to the receipt tax. It merely continues the provision of section 4 of the original act, exempting receipts for amounts up to five dollars from the tax.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That section four of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

4. Section forty-seven of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"47. No person shall sign a receipt for money exceeding five dollars paid to him by a bank chargeable against a deposit of money in the bank to his credit unless he has affixed to the receipt an adhesive two cent excise or postage stamp, or unless there is impressed thereon by means of a die a stamp of the value of two cents."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Stamp tax on money orders, etc., of express companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 6 is amended to conform with the other sections.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That section six of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

6. Subsection one of section sixty-five of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"65. No money order or traveller's cheque for an amount exceeding five dollars shall be issued by an express company, bank or other person unless there is affixed thereto an adhesive excise or postage stamp of the value of two cents, or unless there is impressed thereon by means of a die, a stamp of the value of two cents."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Stamp tax on money orders of the post office.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: This is the same provision with respect to section 69.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That section seven of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

7. Section sixty-nine of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"69. No money order for an amount exceeding five dollars shall be issued under the provisions of the Post Office Act unless there is affixed thereto or to the relative advice a postage stamp of the value of two cents."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14.—Excise tax of 1 per cent on duty paid value.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. leader of the opposition directed attention to a suggested change and we made an amendment in committee, but I think it is more clear if it reads in this way:

or by the owner thereof when entering Canada, unless more than one entry of such goods be made by one importer during one day from one country, in which case the tax shall be applicable.

We exempted goods to the value of $25 coming in by mail or express or by a person crossing the boundary, and we are providing that the exemption shall extend only to one entry by one person in one day from one country. The proposed amendment makes it a little more clear than the amendment that was rather hastily drawn in committee.

Mr. EULER: Is that the one per cent excise tax?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. It will not apply to $25 worth of commodities brought into the country by mail or express or by any person crossing the boundary, but there shall be only one such entry by any one person in any one day from any one country.

Mr. EULER: It applies only to that provision, the one per cent excise tax?

Mr. BENNETT: That is all. There has also been added after the words "gold coin" the words "bullion and unmanufactured gold." Attention was directed to the fact that some gold came in from a foreign country, and we want to make it abundantly clear that it is exempt from the one per cent excise tax.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If a person were bringing in two different commodities to a total value of under $25, they would not be exempt as there would be more than one entry?

Mr. BENNETT: They would have to pay the tax.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That section 14 of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

14. The said act is further amended by inserting therein the following section as section eighty-eight:—

"88. In addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under this part, or any other statute, there shall be imposed, levied and collected a special excise tax of one per cent on the duty paid value of all goods imported into Canada payable by the importer or transferee who takes the goods out of bond for consumption at the time when the goods are imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption. Provided that the said tax shall not apply to goods, the duty paid value of which does not exceed twenty-five dollars, when imported by mail or express, or by the owner thereof when entering Canada, unless more than one entry of such goods be made by one importer during one day from one country, in which case the tax shall be applicable.

Provided, further, that the said tax shall not apply to articles on which other excise taxes are imposed on importation by Part XI of this act, nor to raw leaf tobacco when imported by licensed tobacco or cigar manufacturers; material for the manufacture of binder twine for export, when imported by the manufacturers thereof; British and Canadian coin and foreign gold coin, bullion and unmanufactured gold; fish and other products of the fisheries of Newfoundland; fish caught by fishermen in vessels registered in Canada or owned by any person domiciled in Canada, and the products thereof carried from the fisheries in such vessels; donations of clothing for charitable purposes, nor to goods enumerated in customs tariff items 700, 702, 703, 704, 705, 705a, 706, 707, 708 and 709, but shall apply to all other articles of whatsoever nature, which are imported.

Provided that when raw furs imported into Canada are exported therefrom a drawback of the tax paid may be granted under regulations to be made by the minister."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 18—Drawback.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There was some discussion with regard to a change in schedules 3 and 4, particularly with regard to vegetables.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall come to that. I have kept it in mind. With respect to section 18, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) suggested the use of the word "in" after the word "used" and before the word "wrought," to make the meaning clear. That has been adopted.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That section eighteen of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

18. Section ninety-four of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

"94. A drawback of ninety-nine per cent of the taxes imposed by this part paid in respect of materials used in, wrought into or attached to articles exported, may be granted; provided that payment of a specific sum in lieu of such drawback may be authorized by the governor in council in cases where specific rates of drawback of customs duties are granted under the provisions of section two hundred and eighty-six of the Customs Act."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On sechedule III.

Mr. BENNETT: If the committee will next turn to the exemptions commencing with line 2 of page 13 of the bill some question arose as to making it quite clear that hospital supplies would be exempt from the sales tax. The exemption commencing at line 2 of page 13 of schedule III is proposed to be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

articles and materials for the sole use of any bona fide public hospital certified to be such by the Department of National Health, when purchased for use exclusively by the said hospital and not for resale.

The committee will remember that some difficulty arose in properly defining the term hospital, and some exception was taken by some members of the committee to the language used. It is proposed to use the same language that was employed in dealing with sales of alcohol to hospitals, and to provide that a public hospital is one certified to be such by the Department of National Health.

Then the exemptions appearing on the same page under customs tariff item 219a. We have to add the provisions of the tariff that we passed the other day, namely:

Customs tariff—219a. Non-alcoholic preparations of chemicals for disinfecting, dipping or spraying, n.o.p.:

Dry preparations used for the same purposes as goods enumerated in items 219a and 219c.

Those items were passed in the tariff and are now added to the exemptions. Then schedule 3 at the top of the page:

Preparations for use exclusively as gopher poison.

This question was raised by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). Then the customs tariff items that I have just referred to, 219c and 409e. The latter item deals with spraying, dusting and other garden machines. Those also will be free from tax.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That the exemption commencing on line two of page thirteen of schedule three of Bill 106 relating to hospitals be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"articles and materials for the sole use of any bona fide public hospital certified to be such by the Department of National Health, when purchased for use exclusively by the said hospital and not for resale;"

That the exemptions appearing on page thirteen under customs tariff item 219a, and dry preparations used for the same purposes as goods enumerated in item 219a, be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

"219a. Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals for disinfecting, dipping or spraying, n.o.p.;

Dry preparations used for the same purposes as goods enumerated in items 219a and 219c;"

That the following be added to schedule three:

"preparations for use exclusively as gopher poison."

Goods enumerated in customs tariff item 219c:

"219c. Non-alcoholic preparations or chemicals, such as are used for disinfecting, dipping, or spraying, when in packages not exceeding three pounds each, in weight;"

That goods enumerated in customs tariff item 409e, appearing on page fourteen be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"409e. (i) Spraying and dusting machines and attachments therefor, including hand sprayers; apparatus specially designed for sterilizing bulbs; pressure testing apparatus for determining maturity of fruit; pruning hooks; pruning shears; animal dehorning instruments; and complete parts of all the foregoing;

(ii) Fruit and vegetable grading, washing and wiping machines and complete parts therefor;"

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: The same applies to tariff item 410d, well-drilling machinery and apparatus. There is a list on page 19. We delete the section that appears there and add the items that have been passed in the Customs Tariff commencing at 219a and 219c. That arises from the renumbering of the items in committee so the act will conform to the particulars of the customs tariff.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That goods enumerated in customs tariff item 410d appearing on page fifteen be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"410d. Well-drilling machinery and apparatus, and complete parts thereof, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and seamless iron or steel tubing over eight inches in diameter, for use exclusively in drilling for water, natural gas or oil, and in prospecting for minerals, but not to include motive power."

That the list of articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of goods enumerated in customs tariff items appearing on page 19 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"219a, 219c,—Dry preparations used for the same purposes as goods enumerated in items 219a and 219c,—281, 281a, 391a, 406a, 406b, 409a, 409b, 409c, 409d, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409i, 409j, 409k, 409n, 409o, 410b, 410d, including goods enumerated in this item of a class or kind made in Canada; 410e, 410f, 410g, 410k, 410l, 410m, 410n, 410o, 410p, 410q, 410s, 410z, 411, 411a, 411b, 431, 431a, 439c, 439d, 440k, 442, 442a, 476, 476a, 480, 538, 663, 663a, 663b, 666, 667, 696, tubing enumerated in customs tariff item 1017;"

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. BENNETT: The next amendment is:

That section 25 of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"25. Sections ten to thirteen, both inclusive, and fifteen to twenty-three, both inclusive, of this act shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of June, 1931; Provided that the rate of consumption or sales tax imposed by section eleven of this act shall apply to any stocks of goods, wares and merchandise in the hands of licensed wholesalers on that date."

Otherwise the section would work great injustice to certain wholesalers who had cancelled their licences. Now they make their sales and pay the same rates as others.

Mr. RHODES: I move that section 25 be amended accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change in the sense of section 26 but the language is put a little clearer by a change in the arrangement of the words.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That section twenty-six of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:—

"26. Section fourteen of this act shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of June, 1931, and to have applied to all goods therein mentioned, imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for consumption for which no entry for consumption was made before that day."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 27 will read as follows:

27. Sections three, five, eight and nine of this act shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of July, 1931.

That, it will be recalled, is the provision by which all cheques were required to bear a two cent stamp, and it has been in force for the past month:

Sections two, four, six and seven shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of August, 1931.

That is the exemption of cheques up to $5.

Provided that with respect to cheques, receipts for money, money orders and travellers cheques on which taxes were imposed by sections two, four, six and seven of this act, issued, or presented for payment between July first and July thirty-first, 1931, both dates inclusive, no refund of the said taxes shall be paid.

That is to make it abundantly clear that there will be no difficulty in that regard.

Mr. RHODES moved:

That section 27 of Bill 106 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"27. Sections three, five, eight and nine of this act shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of July, 1931.

Sections two, four, six and seven shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of August, 1931. Provided that with respect to cheques, receipts for money, money orders and travellers cheques on which taxes were imposed by sections two, four, six and seven of this act, issued, or presented for payment between July first and July thirty-first, 1931, both dates inclusive, no refund of the said taxes shall be paid."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) raised a question with respect to certain types of canned vegetables which he thought might possibly be brought within the exemptions. After much consideration the officials of the department advise that there is no good reason why it should be done having regard to all the circumstances, and from a personal examination of the facts I cannot think that there is any reason for taking that action at this time.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT AMENDMENT

INCREASE IN PAYMENT TO PROVINCES FROM FIFTY TO SEVENTY-FIVE PER CENT

The house resumed from Monday, July 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. 136 to amend the Old Age Pensions Act—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) suggested an amendment last night. He said that the provinces were desirous of having the amendment, but it imposes an additional burden upon the state, and I think it would be out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the Prime Minister misunderstood me, Mr. Chairman, I did not offer it as an amendment. I think this is a measure that we can very well deal with without offering amendments from our side. What I had in mind I would rather offer as a suggestion.

The question of the amendment of the Old Age Pensions Act has been fairly well discussed in this house during this session, and I am not going to cover the ground further. The leader of the opposition has suggested that the government should take over the old age pensions scheme and administer it with the Dominion paying 100 per cent, and my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has offered a suggestion with regard to the inclusion of the blind. I should like to say to the Prime Minister, in case he does not know it, that I think I am safe in saying five of the provinces have signified their willingness, either directly or indirectly, to have the blind taken in when the Old Age Pensions Act is amended.

The amendment I suggest to the Prime Minister at this time has to do with a matter which is causing a great deal of hardship. It is true that only a very few people are affected, but still those few should be entitled to a pension which, because of the way the act reads at present, they cannot get. As I said before, when we first introduced this measure we did not know how many provinces would take up the scheme, and naturally it was desired to protect the provinces who first took part, so that if only one or two provinces participated they would be protected from an influx of old people from other provinces. So we included subsection (d) of section 8, which reads:

(d) has resided in the province in which the application for pension is made for the five years immediately preceding the said date;

We find, in the administration of the act, that, I think, fifty old people have resided in one or more of the provinces for more than five years but have not been in any one province for that length of time. They have been in this country all their lives but are unable to obtain a pension. When the interprovincial board met to discuss amendments and new regulations they drafted the following suggested subsection to replace the present subsection (d) of section 8:

(d) has resided in the province in which the application for pension is made, or in that province and in another province with which an agreement under this act is in force, for the five years immediately preceding the said date.

That is to say, if a person had been in this country for twenty years and had resided for five years in one or more of the provinces coming under this scheme, he would be permitted to apply for pension, and since the five provinces under the scheme desire this amendment I suggest to the Prime Minister that he give consideration to it, because after all is said and done it will only affect about fifty persons.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not disposed, Mr. Chairman, to adopt the amendment at this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not intended to say anything further in committee, and had it not been that at the close of yesterday's sitting my right hon. friend by his remarks rather left the impression that in some way I was seeking to block this legislation, I would not speak at the moment. Fortunately the Hansard report is there and speaks for itself. Hon. members of the committee will see that when the bill came up for second reading I drew the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that the preamble contained a clause which I thought would create some difficulty unless it were removed. I thought it desirable that it should be removed in order to ensure the enactment of the measure. When my right hon. friend rose to speak he said he intended to withdraw that particular clause, and it was withdrawn.

Later I spoke about the desirability of the government taking over the administration of the measure, particularly since it now involved a contribution of 75 per cent on the part of the federal administration; I said it seemed rather anomalous that the body which was paying the largest part of the cost of the scheme should not be the body to administer it. My remarks were all intended to convey the hope that the government would move as rapidly as possible towards the administration of the scheme in its entirety in order completely to relieve the provinces of that responsibility. I also said that in speaking during the last campaign I had expressed the view that it was desirable that there should be a dominion-provincial conference to review as between the dominion and the provinces all these matters of social services and to delimit the fields of taxation and of expenditure and that I thought it would have been of advantage to the dominion had such a conference been held before this legislation was brought in. A conference for that particular purpose might well have taken place previous to this session of parliament. At any rate, it might have been arranged that a conference would take place between now and next year at which time a 100 per cent payment might be agreed upon. My sole contention in that regard was that in making our financial readjustments with the provinces, being trustees of the dominion's purse, we would in such an event be in a stronger position than would be the case if, before holding any conference of the kind, we were committed to further extensions of these and other grants.

Then I think my right hon. friend rather left the impression that in some way, when in office, I had been responsible for beginning the grants in general. May I say that the policy of making grants to the provinces started with previous administrations; that they had been made with respect to highways, agricultural instruction, technical education, loans for housing and unemployment relief before the Liberal administration ever came into office. With respect to old age pensions, at the time the Liberal government undertook to pay 50 per cent of the cost it was recognized that it was desirable to have a national scheme, but at that time anything of the sort was impossible owing to well known constitutional difficulties. The government of the day had been advised by the Department of Justice as to its authority and rights and powers in the matter, and as a result of the advice given the government reached the necessary conclusion that unless it were to be made a contributory scheme, which at the time we were not prepared to consider, the federal government could not inaugurate an old age pension scheme in any other way than by grants to the provinces. That was the reason why the government of the day made the grant of 50 per cent; it did so with a view to bringing about throughout Canada a uniform system of old age pensions and also with a view to giving time to remove any constitutional impediment to the dominion taking over the entire scheme. It was felt that the fact that all the provinces would be prepared to accept an old age pension scheme on the lines laid down to secure uniformity would of itself be the strongest evidence that it was desirable to have such a scheme on a national scale, administered federally.

That is the sum and substance of the remarks I made yesterday, and if my right hon. friend felt that in any way they were susceptible of another interpretation I hope he will permit hon. members of the committee to read for themselves the Hansard report.

Mr. BENNETT: They can read it without my permission.

Mr. NEILL: I understand that the right hon. Prime Minister has said he will not open the act for amendment at this time, so I only desire to place on record in the hope that it may be useful to the Minister of Labour when the act is to be amended another year, this difficulty which has been experienced in ascertaining the age of these old people.

The regulations require the production of a birth certificate, if possible, but in several of the older provinces of Canada births were not registered seventy years ago, and it has been sought to have recourse to the census returns where the age given by a man at a certain period is on record. For some reason or other, however—I think possibly in the Census Act—there is a regulation which provides that even with the consent of the man or woman this information may not be given out unless it has reference to a census which took place not less than thirty years ago. Old people applying for old age pensions forget frequently just where they were thirty years ago, and this information is difficult to locate. If the parties are willing to sign a consent certified to by a justice of the peace that they are willing to have their age revealed as at a certain census; this should be made applicable to as late as the census of 1921 because it would be out of place to use the present one where wrong information might be given for purposes of eligibility. In 1921 there was no suggestion of old age pensions and it would facilitate the work if access could be had to the censuses up to and including the year 1921.

Section agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. BENNETT: I will ask the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) to move an amendment to the preamble.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I move that the preamble be amended by striking out all the words after the word "desirable" in the seventh line down to and including the word "desirable" in the twelfth line.

Mr. BENNETT: The preamble would then read:

And whereas it is desirable and would be of advantage to the Dominion to augment the national contributions:

Amendment agreed to.

Preamble as amended agreed to.

Mr. HEENAN: Section 20 of the act of 1927 reads as follows:

All regulations made under this act shall, from the date of their publication in the Canada Gazette, have the same force and effect as if they had been included herein.

Regulation number 32 under the act reads as follows:

The minister charged with the administration of the act may at any time require the province to furnish information, detailed or otherwise, in connection with statements of account rendered by the province.

Although it has not been used, I consider that there is sufficient authority contained in this regulation without making necessary subsection 3.

Mr. BENNETT: It is just to make it clear.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

To assist in the conservation and development of the deep-sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $190,000.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Mr. Chairman, before this item is carried I would like to deal with certain articles which have appeared in the press in connection with the fisheries of Hudson bay. I feel that I would fail miserably in my duty as the representative of that great country if I did not correct some of the statements which have been made.

The Ottawa Journal of April 24 contained an article stating that the government spent a large sum of money last summer making an investigation into the fishing possibilities and that no fish were taken. That article would cause the average citizen not acquainted with that country to believe that there is no fish in the Hudson bay, and to that statement I take exception. I intend to place on the records of this house certain evidence in regard to the fishing possibilities in that great body of water. This information should be of great benefit to hon. members of the house as well as to the people of Canada generally.

In a book published by the Department of the Interior entitled The Unexploited West, I find the following information in connection with Hudson bay. J. B. Tyrrell, a well known engineer, stated that salmon of the very finest quality are found in abundance both in Hudson bay and the straits. In another paragraph, Mr. Hanbury of the department states that he has seen Eskimos with cod and fish in great abundance along both the east and west coast of the bay. Mr. Christie, chief inspector of the Hudson's Bay Company, stated before the Senate committee that salmon were found in large numbers at Churchill as soon as the ice cleared out of the river, which was about the middle of June. He stated that they entered the river and went out with the tide, and he thought that these salmon were as large as those he had seen in Scotland. Mr. A. P. Low, director of the Geological Survey of Canada, examined by the Senate committee, stated that the Arctic salmon found on the east and west sides of the bay were very abundant. He stated that this was an excellent fish, beautifully coloured and resembling the western salmon more than it did the Atlantic or eastern salmon. He stated that salmon fishing in Hudson bay would no doubt have a commercial outlet as soon as marketing facilities were provided. He stated that the whitefish to be found in the bay was a very fine fish.

Captain Bernier, the explorer, published an excellent book entitled Hudson Bay and Straits which book contained a report of the special committee appointed to report on the navigability and fishing resources of Hudson bay and the straits. Captain Bernier states that at the entrance to the straits there is any amount of codfish, and that east of there they used to take from 200 to 300 fish a day with line fishing. He states that he caught a few halibut at Fullerton and some salmon further north. He found every river along the coast teeming with fish, particularly with salmon trout weighing from 10 to 15 pounds. In the same bulletin, Mr. J. B. Tyrrell, a mining engineer and explorer who has made several trips into the bay, states that he met an enormous number of walrus which swarmed about the shores of the islands. These walrus live on clams and other shell fish and are to be found in great numbers. He states that they saw many seals and caught large quantities of fish, including salmon, whitefish and sturgeon. He states that seals appear quite frequently along the shores of the straits and bay.

So much for the evidence given before the Senate committee, to which I might add my own knowledge gained during eighteen years spent in this country. I have seen as many as 1,000 whales come into the harbours of Nelson and Churchill at one time. These whales live on fish, so that if what some seal expert who writes for the Ottawa Journal says is true, that there are no fish in the bay, there would not be any whales or seals or walruses, because those mammals live exclusively on fish. Inside of an hour using a short net, I have taken out of the bay more salmon than would fill a small boat. Last summer, when I was there during my election campaign trying to capture a few votes from a handpicked bunch of Liberals that were put in there, I saw about 1,000 whales chasing a shoal of herring. It was a great sight and was evidence that there must be fish in the bay.

It is true the government sent a trawler there last year to do some investigating in the deep water. It is also quite true they did not catch any fish by this deep-water trawling. Every schoolboy in that part of the country knows fish are not to be found in the deep water of the bay, because the water there is only one degree above freezing point, but we know there is a great number of fish along the shores and in the estuaries of the rivers. It is interesting to note that the fishing industry of British Columbia produces two-fifths of the fishery wealth of the dominion. Exactly the same condition exists in Hudson bay. I cannot too strongly urge upon the minister the necessity of a more thorough investigation of the shoreline and estuary fisheries of Hudson bay. It is of great importance to the Hudson Bay railway and the people of the west that a complete investigation is made. Boats should be sent in there, equipped to ply on the east and west shores of the bay with a good supply of gill nets, small boats and net fishermen. I sincerely hope the minister will provide for that at the earliest possible moment, and that it will be carried out.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Fisheries): If the hon. member for Nelson reads the report outlining the result of the investigation into the fisheries of Hudson bay, I think he will see that the statement that there were no fish had reference merely to what is known as deep-sea fish, that is, cod, halibut and fish of that type. There is no question that the results of the experiments conducted by the Loubyrne demonstrate that fact. It is well known, that for many years there have been rich cod fisheries in Hudson strait, especially at the entrance. As a matter of fact, Newfoundland fishermen operated cod fisheries there as far back as a century ago. It is also well known that the rivers flowing into Hudson bay are teeming with fish; that those are what we know as freshwater fish. My hon. friend referred to the fact that there were seals and whales in the bay and they would not be there unless there were something on which they could feed. As a matter of fact, I am informed by the officers of my department that shoals of caplin come in there from time to time and they form the most delectable food for seals and whales. We are well satisfied the rivers are teeming with fish that an investigation on the part of the department scarcely seems necessary excepting that I might add that even this year we have issued a number of experimental licences to individuals who are conducting fishing operations there and a condition attached to the licence which was given to them was that they should report to the department the result of their season's operations. Therefore, to the extent that they succeed, we shall add to the store of knowledge we already have.

In conclusion, I should like to assure my hon. friend we are already seized of the fact that there are rich fisheries in the rivers and tributaries surrounding Hudson bay.

Mr. BRADETTE: I must say very frankly to the Minister of Fisheries that the northern section of northern Ontario is not satisfied with what I may call the Hachey report. I believe the government should find it possible this year to spend another $65,000 in order to make a very thorough inquiry into the situation, because we maintain that there are deepwater fish in Hudson bay. I am going to give the history of the reasons why such an inquiry was made last year. At page 81 of the sixty-third annual report of the Fisheries branch, I find the following information:

Hudson Bay Resources

A quick trip visit was made to the Churchill at Hudson bay during the late summer, the object being to ascertain what available information there was relative to the fisheries of the bay and the estuaries of the big rivers. A special report was made to the department, in which a recommendation was made to send a properly equipped trawler from the outside to investigate conditions in the deeper areas of the bay.

Along the Manitoba coastline and entering the rivers, there appear to be two important varieties of fish, the Arctic trout and herring or ciscoes. The former centre on the Churchill, while the latter seem more plentiful towards the Nelson, also whitefish although these fish are apparently not very plentiful. There are also to be found indefinite indications of both cod and halibut, but nothing to base a conclusion on whether or not these are indigenous to the waters of the bay.

Again it is clearly stated that in Hudson bay there are deepwater fish. In our section of the country we were all astonished when we read the report which was made after only a few days spent in making investigations over an area which covers 540,000 square miles in Hudson bay and 150,000 square miles in Hudson strait and Ungava bay, and which stated that there were no deepwater fish.

I am going to read the preliminary report of the investigations of the Hudson bay and strait fisheries expedition of 1930. On page one of the report I find the following:

Instructions From The Department

The instructions received from the department were in part as follows:

"Actual fishing operations should be begun as soon after Hudson strait is entered as may be deemed feasible, but there should be no unnecessary loss of time to the trawler incurred in the journey to Churchill, or fishing carried on to the extent that might endanger exhaustion of the coal supply before Churchill would be reached. Also fishing should be again conducted in the strait on the homeward journey to as great an extent as conditions will permit."

On page 2, I find the following:

Operations In Hudson Bay

On the journey across Hudson bay the biological, physical and chemical conditions of the waters were investigated. These investigations consisted in,—

(1) collecting samples for the qualitative and quantitative determination of the smaller organisms present which would form an important link in the food cycle of life in these waters,

(2) determining the temperature of the water at various depths and localities,

(3) obtaining samples of water for the determination of the salinity of the water at various depths and localities, and

(4) setting out drift bottles for the purpose of mapping the prevailing surface water movements.

On page 3 of the report they give the results:

Results

The expedition travelled a total distance of about 8,000 nautical miles. Of this amount 3,100 miles were covered in occupying the various stations for the purposes of the investigation. The total distance was covered in approximately fifty-six days so that the average daily distance travelled was 143 miles.

The record of fishing operations furnishes the particulars of the actual fishing done.

Our objection is to the actual fishing done. We maintain in our district that the time allotted was not sufficient to make a thorough investigation. The report continues:

Hand lines were used at several points for seven hours and fifteen minutes. Drift nets were used for twelve hours. Long lines were used for two hours and fifty-five minutes, and trawling operations were carried on for fifty-seven hours and fifty minutes. As a result of the total work covering the whole of Hudson bay not a single commercial fish was taken.

I stated previously that Hudson bay comprises an area of 540,000 square miles. Was it possible to investigate such a large area in such a short time? They also had to investigate fishing conditions in Hudson strait which, including Ungava bay, comprises an area of 150,000 square miles. It was absolutely impossible to make a very good investigation under the circumstances. I must give credit to the officers in charge because they did the best they could in the time allotted, but I repeat that at least a three months' investigation should be conducted in these waters next summer. Anyone will realize that it would take at least three months to make a thorough investigation into the resources of Hudson bay. Quoting from the report, I find this:

In looking over a chart of the Hudson bay region the experienced fisherman would note immediately the absence of anything that would correspond to the various "banks" so familiar and appreciated by the fishermen of the Atlantic coast. There is one small region in the vicinity of stations 39 and 40 which might be called a bank.

I challenge that statement. Any navigator in those waters knows that there is more than one bank in Hudson bay. The whole of James bay is practically a bank itself, and there are unlimited schools of fish in that section of Hudson bay. They wind up their report by saying:

The scientific investigations were carried on concurrently with the fishing operations, and sufficient data is available for the correct interpretation of the fishing results. The cursory examination of the material collected and the data noted suggest that the waters of Hudson bay are similar to the unproductive waters of much higher latitudes.

Again I challenge that statement. The greater part of Hudson bay is in a temperate zone. The climatic conditions in James bay are identical with climatic conditions in Cochrane or northern Ontario. The statement in the report is not a true statement of the conditions in Hudson bay.

In all sincerity I say that this is not a political question but as a man from northern Ontario I am particularly interested, as all hon. members must realize, in this question which vitally affects the northern sections of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba. Only a few years ago the Ontario government wanted to extend the government railway northward from North Bay, and some people prominent in public life said that not a single dollar should be spent in that northern country which they said consisted only of stunted poplar and muskeg. To-day that district, which comprises Cobalt, Porcupine and Kirkland Lake, is the treasure house not only of northern Ontario but of Canada as a whole. The same is true of Hudson bay. Anyone who looks at the map must be arrested by that great inland sea, and no one will say that not a single deep sea fish could be caught in that vast expanse of water. I know that the minister has at heart the development of the fisheries of this country. There have been rumours that there is fear of competition from Hudson bay with the fisheries of the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. I do not believe that there is anything in that, but I would point out to the minister that we are fully equipped now to give a thirty-six hour refrigerator car service from Moose Factory to Toronto, and a forty-eight hour refrigerator car service from Moose Factory to New York. So we are highly interested in this problem. In conclusion, I would make a strong appeal to the minister to send a trawler up there this fall, to quarter there for the winter months, and then conduct a three months' inquiry into deep sea fishing in Hudson bay next summer.

Mr. RHODES: I think we are all agreed with my hon. friend from North Timiskaming that this is not a political question, and I hope it will never be approached as such. I am at one with him in that, and I think all members of the committee are.

[Mr. Bradette.]

I do not think it was ever suggested when this expedition went to Hudson bay that in one short season it could cover that whole immense area. Without for a moment calling in question the findings of that commission, and without calling in question the suggestion of my hon. friend that a further and more prolonged examination might result in finding deep sea fish in those waters, may I point out this, especially with reference to his suggestion that possibly the examination was not as complete as it might have been, and that if deep sea fish were discovered in those waters it would minimize the opportunity of selling fish from the Atlantic coast—

Mr. BRADETTE: I say there were rumours to that effect.

Mr. RHODES: I never heard of them before, but I do not find fault with my hon. friend for having voiced them, although I do not think there is any truth in them at all. I would point out that the fishing operations were under the direction of Captain Sigurd Sorensen, master of the Loubyrne. He was given full charge of the actual fishing operations, while the scientific aspect of the expedition were under the direct supervision of the officer in charge, Mr. H. B. Hachey. In Captain Sorensen the department had a man who had had twenty-four years of experience in trawler operations in various north Atlantic waters, including the North sea, the White sea, the gulf of St. Lawrence, the waters off Labrador, Iceland and the west coast of Scotland, and the region extending from the Grand banks to Georges banks. In addition, at least two members of the crew were experienced in the use of hand lines and long lines. The instructions received from the department were as follows—I am quoting from the report:

Actual fishing operations should be begun as soon after Hudson strait is entered as may be deemed feasible, but there should be no unnecessary loss of time to the trawler incurred in the journey to Churchill, or fishing carried on to the extent that might endanger exhaustion of the coal supply before Churchill would be reached. Also fishing should be conducted again in the strait on the homeward journey to as great an extent as conditions will permit.

My hon. friend quoted quite correctly the number of hours which the expedition employed in the various methods of fishing. For example, that some seven hours and fifteen minutes were employed in the use of hand lines, twelve hours for drift nets, two hours and fifty-five minutes for long lines, and fifty-seven hours and fifty minutes fishing by means of the trawler, but when you come to analyze the record as disclosed in the report of the expedition it will be found that this comparatively limited number of hours represented continuous operations subject only to the limitations of weather and sea conditions, beginning on August 8 and continuing to September 10. Furthermore, these operations were directed by men who knew, of their own experience, from the character of the ground the probable places in which fish might be caught. So it by no means represented as limited an inquiry as my hon. friend would imagine. Furthermore, the scientific end of the expedition was engaged in determining a number of other factors which would have a bearing on evidencing whether or not there were any deep sea fish, such as taking the temperature at various depths, taking water samples, investigations as to the various forms of bottom life, quantitative and qualitative samples of minute organisms in the upper fifteen fathoms. If, as time proceeds, it is deemed advisable to extend and enlarge this experiment, I am prepared to approach it sympathetically. Certainly our store of knowledge will be much more rapidly augmented now that the Hudson bay railway is open and Churchill will become an occupied place of some importance. Possibly we may be able to discover what the conditions are by the actual operations of men upon the ground, which would save the treasury a great deal of money in sending an expedition up there to carry on an investigation covering two or three years. If there is evidence that further and more complete and extended inquiries would result in the discovery of sea fish there I should be very happy to lend my support to the proposal.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Before this item is carried I should like again to bring before the house a matter which seriously concerns Canadian fishermen on the Pacific coast. At an earlier date I believe I outlined their reasons for being concerned about this particular matter. At this time, speaking again to the question, I shall quote some of the evidence by members of the American fishing fleet from Washington. The whole report is lengthy, and I do not intend at this time to read it fully, but shall make a few quotations to show that it is necessary for the American fishing fleet to use the port of Prince Rupert.

I understand that since I last spoke concerning this matter the minister has received a petition signed by fishermen and residents of Prince Rupert and vicinity. I understand it is signed by the Canadian Fishermen's Association. In 1929 it was urged that the port of Prince Rupert should be closed to American fishermen. I believe the minister has thoroughly investigated the matter, and that it is of great importance so far as Prince Rupert is concerned. We lose the trade and rail haul of fish going to the American market, the market we have ultimately to secure in which to dispose of our Canadian fish. Before a committee of congress Mr. H. E. Lokken appeared representing the Fishing Vessel Owners' Association of Seattle, Washington. Mr. Hadley who did the questioning was one of the commissioners. I quote from the evidence as follows:

Mr. Hadley: How many owners do you represent?

Mr. Lokken: Our association consists of 190 vessel owners. Their investment is over $1,500,000.

Mr. Hadley: They are individual independent operators, who have an association to which they all belong?

Mr. Lokken: Yes, sir.

Mr. Hadley: And you are representing that association?

Mr. Lokken: Yes, sir.

Mr. Hadley: And you say there are 2,500—

Mr. Lokken: Fishermen.

Mr. Hadley: What are the opportunities for source of supply for the American fishermen?

Mr. Lokken: Where they catch their fish?

Mr. Hadley: Yes.

Mr. Lokken: They catch their fish in Alaskan waters, or in waters from northern California clear to Bering sea.

Mr. Hadley: Is there an unlimited supply?

Mr. Lokken: No, sir, there is not.

Then, at a latter point I find the following:

Mr. Hadley: How many pounds did you say are produced on the American side?

Mr. Lokken: 44,000,000 pounds this past year.

Mr. Hadley: And on the other side how many?

Mr. Lokken: 9,000,000.

Mr. Davenport: A rather large percentage of our total was landed at Prince Rupert.

Mr. Lokken: 21,000,000 pounds are landed at Prince Rupert; 13,000,000 pounds at Seattle, Washington; and 9,000,000 pounds in Alaska.

Mr. Davenport: Does Canada object to your landing fish at Prince Rupert?

Mr. Lokken: There has been objection a number of times but only on the part of the Canadian fishermen alone.

Mr. Davenport: If you had to land your catch at Seattle, would it mean additional cost of operation?

Mr. Lokken: It could not be done, because the run from Seattle is something like 1,200 miles, and only on rare ocasions can that be done; that is, when a vessel will catch the larger part of its trip in two or three days and will have sufficient speed to come to Seattle in a short time.

Mr. Davenport: Suppose they should shut out Prince Rupert; what would you do?

Mr. Lokken: We would just have to tie up; the majority of the vessels would just have to tie up.

That was in 1929. Since the matter has been taken up in this house I have received a wire from the Deep Sea Fishermen's Union. The wire is dated June 22, 1931, from Seattle, and is addressed to Mr. J. M. Morrison, the Canadian agent of the Deep Sea Fishermen's Union. The text is as follows:

> Rumours here that there is strong move to close Prince Rupert to American vessels, wire our member's attitude on this matter. In my opinion it would not help men there as we are in the midst of a national and international depression we can and will try to have the tariff on Canadian fresh halibut reduced to one cent per pound if the men there think that of sufficient benefit.

I wish to read at this time a paragraph from a letter from myself to the minister dated July 2, 1931:

> I also have a letter informing me that the halibut fishermen on the American side have asked their representative in Washington to cooperate in every way with the Canadian authorities in order to adjust the present discrimination between Canadian and American halibut fishermen, especially in reducing the American duty, if not altogether, at least 50 per cent. This is for your information and I hope you will give it due consideration and advise me as to what steps you have taken in this regard.

I do not think it is necessary to go into this matter at greater length. I wish merely to learn from the minister whether he has done anything to assist the fishermen either by negotiations with Washington or closing the port of Prince Rupert to American fishermen.

Mr. NEILL: Before the minister answers may I add my support to the proposals put forth by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson), as I did when the same constituency was represented by an hon. member of the party opposite. This is not a political matter at all; it is beyond and I hope above that. The petition to which my hon. friend has referred I understand was signed by 1,500 people. I suppose that they did not solicit the ladies, so that 1,500 people in a place the size of Prince Rupert would indicate almost complete unanimity. I believe they seek to have the minister take steps to restrict the operation of American fishermen into the port of Prince Rupert. On many occasions in the past this matter has been discussed by officials but never was there a better opportunity or more appropriate occasion to take action than the present.

We know of the conditions of hardship existing among the fishermen in the present year, and I believe conditions will be much worse this year than they were last. Any support which can be given the fishermen to enable them to help themselves is much better than the handing out of doles. A government is in power committed to the policy of high protection. To avoid possibility of an argument I shall simply use the expression "protection." Coupled with that policy we have heard the further suggestion of equal opportunities to the man in Canada as against competitors from foreign fields. It cannot be said that Canadians and aliens are operating on equal terms when the alien can come into our ports, bond his fish through to the United States, get two cents a pound of protection in that market—because there is a duty on our fish going into the United States—fish with our fishermen on a common fishing ground and purchase gasoline at a price much lower than that asked of our fishermen.

At no time have we any right to object to duties imposed by foreign nations. That is their privilege. When such duties are imposed we can but take such steps as are possible to balance the situation. That is not always possible, but in this particular situation it is, owing to the geographical advantage we possess. The halibut ground used to be much nearer Seattle but because that ground has been fished out the fishermen have moved farther north and west until now it is practically compulsory for American fishermen to land their fish at Prince Rupert. There exists in the United States a rather high-class market such as we do not have in Canada. So we must base all our conclusions on those premises, that the market is in the United States. The halibut banks now being exploited lie so much nearer Prince Rupert that, as I said, the American fisherman is compelled to go in there, even though he does not want to. Efforts have been made to go to Ketchikan, which is comparatively near, or to Seattle, but in both cases it has been found impracticable and unprofitable, on account of the extra handling and extra expense involved. So the American fisherman must use the port of Prince Rupert, and the report that my friend from Skeena quoted was the report of a representative of the American fishing interests before a congressional committee at Washington, saying they did not want to change the existing system, and if they were compelled to they would have to tie up their boats.

The minister cannot impose a duty, but it is suggested that to remedy the present unsatisfactory situation he could charge port dues on all foreign fish coming into Prince Rupert. Or for a time he could withdraw the regulations under P.C. 2777, which gives certain privileges to American citizens coming into our ports. These privileges are granted absolutely as a matter of courtesy, and are renewed annually at the beginning of the year. I do not suggest that he should do that; he need not close the port, but he could place our men on the same basis as the American fishermen by imposing port dues of 2 cents a pound on foreign fish. The evidence quoted by my hon. friend from Skeena shows that the American fishermen could not endure that. That is the language they used a year or two ago. But to show that condition still exists and is indeed intensified, we have only to consider that when this matter was brought up in the house a month or two ago—and it was not at the time pushed to the extreme of asking for action—immediately the American fishermen from their headquarters at Seattle wired, as my hon. friend has said, to Prince Rupert, asking the Canadian fishermen to go slow on that matter because they were making efforts with their congressmen at Washington to have the two cent duty taken off. We have evidence that they are taking the matter up now, and they are asking their congressmen to take action—and this only on a vague hint that the policy I have suggested might be adopted. I am thoroughly satisfied that if the minister took that step we would find that the American authorities, through pressure at Washington would arrange the matter by striking out the obnoxious two cent duty. The result would be as Mr. Lokken said, the duty would either have to be taken off or they would lose the trade. Either event would undoubtedly inure to the benefit of our fishermen and would be the making of Prince Rupert.

While it would benefit Prince Rupert both as to halibut and salmon as the duty on fish going into the United States applies not only to the halibut but to salmon, and that affects also the district which I represent. There is a season of the year when practically our only market for spring salmon is in the United States. Speaking a few minutes ago when I said that our market for halibut was almost exclusively in the eastern United States I should have also mentioned spring salmon. Our market for the spring salmon that we catch off the west coast of Vancouver island in the spring and early summer is principally in New York and other eastern United States cities. That market cannot be secured anywhere else, so far as I am aware, than in the United States and our nearest port is Seattle. If this regulation were passed we would get a better price for our "springs" as they are called, at that season of the year.

I hope the minister will take action. I may say, without any attempt to flatter him, that he has shown himself to be a man capable of taking decided action. If he took action in this case he would not only endear himself to the fishing industry of the Pacific coast, but I think he would also secure the respect of our friends to the south, because that is just the sort of language they understand, and if they found that he was prepared to take a step such as I have suggested, it would buttress him very strongly in any dealings with them. I am quite sure we would soon find them knocking at our door anxious to enter into negotiations.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friends, the members for Skeena and for Comox-Alberni have touched upon a question which is not free from difficulty, but in that respect it is in common with every problem that I have so far met in the fishing industry—it seems to be one of a succession of difficult and almost insolvable questions. Let me say at the outset that, while I agree with my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that this is not a political question so far as parties in Canada are concerned, yet he was unfortunate in bringing in the controversial question of protection, because I am rather sensitive upon the subject. Although a protectionist, let me say to him that I have never subscribed to the point of view that there is any such thing as high protection or low protection. I would not wish to digress into a tariff discussion, but I should not like his remarks upon that point to pass without putting in this caveat; otherwise he might accept my silence as agreement with his idea of what our views are in respect to that vexed question also.

As my hon. friend from Skeena knows, this subject probably has become more acute this year by reason of the depressed conditions which have resulted in a very low price for fish and a very limited market. In fact the market this year was limited to such an extent that something has happened there which so far as I can ascertain has never happened heretofore, certainly not on the Pacific coast, namely, the fishermen could not sell their fish and for a time had to tie up their vessels with heavy loss to themselves because their overhead charges had to be carried on in the meantime. I can quite understand the feeling of bitter dissatisfaction—I do not think that is too strong a term to use—of those engaged in the industry at the unfairness of the situation which exists there today by reason of the difference in prices. Because here we find American vessels and Canadian vessels fishing side by side in the same waters, for the same fish, with the same gear, and coming to the same port, and each having the same privileges there, and yet the American fisherman can ship his fish through Canada into the United States and land it there duty free, while the Canadian fisherman is handicapped to the extent of the duty of two cents a pound. I must say that I do not take very much exception to the attitude of the Canadian halibut fisherman as to the injustice of that situation. I can assure my hon. friend that I have given very serious thought to the question as to whether it would not be wise for us to prohibit the port privileges at Prince Rupert to the American halibut fishing fleet so long as this unfair condition continues. That I did not take action was because the petitions to which my hon. friend refers came to hand within the last ten days, I think, certainly not more than two weeks ago.

This scheme has only crystallized, if I may use the word, within that period of time. It would be a very unfair thing, I think, to take such drastic action in the midst of a fishing season after a large fleet of vessels had left their ports, outfitted and undertaken their season's operation with the idea quite properly in mind when they started that the conditions which hitherto obtained would continue to obtain during the fishing season. But I may say to my hon. friend that the department is giving very serious consideration to the question of whether we would not be wise to close the port of Prince Rupert to the American fishing fleet under these conditions, so that to the extent to which it can be utilized it may be made available to our Canadian fishermen. I would regret to have to take that step, in view of the fact that there are a number of questions outstanding between ourselves and the United States with regard to fisheries matters. I would rather approach those questions around a common table in the hope of being able to reach a solution which would be reasonably satisfactory; in other words I would rather approach our American friends in an attitude of sweet reasonableness.

Mr. RALSTON: You would not be red blooded, like the Minister of Railways?

Mr. RHODES: Sometimes the red blooded policy is the policy required; sometimes the other is the policy required, and I will say to my hon. friend that I will have no hesitation in using whatever policy happens to be necessary, as far as I am concerned.

I want to impress upon my hon. friends and members of the committee generally, that I am fully seized of the seriousness of this problem. As I have said, I would wish that it might be solved by our sitting around a council table and discussing the matter with our American friends in an endeavour to reach a solution which might be reasonably satisfactory.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I understand negotiations are already under way between the United States government and the Canadian government with regard to this question of duty.

Mr. RHODES: I would not wish to say very much about that at this stage, but I can assure my hon. friend that the department has not lost a single moment in taking every step and using every reasonable effort in an endeavour to lead the way to a solution. The department will continue to keep this matter in mind; it will not be lost sight of and no effort will be spared to see if we cannot reach a solution which will be reasonably satisfactory all around.

Mr. NEILL: Hon. members will excuse us from British Columbia for taking up the time of the committee in these matters, but the fishing industry is as important to us as wheat growing is important to the prairies, and whether hon. members like it or not they will have to allow us a reasonable time in which to discuss these questions.

I think the hon. member for Skeena and myself might well join in thanking the minister for the attitude he has taken. Knowing him to be a man of his word I believe he will do even more than he has indicated I should like to deal with one or two other matters, but before doing so I should like to express my gratitude to the minister, if I may do so without the suggestion of trying to curry favour with him, for his action in connection with the pilchard industry this spring. To his energy and persistence alone was due the fact that the regulations were so changed that it is now possible to manufacture pilchard oil into shortening in Canada and, thus carry on a very important industry in British Columbia. Previously the regulations were such that it was impossible to do so; our main market was in the United States, with a very high duty and a very low price, and many of the plants were bankrupt while others were almost prepared to shut down. The minister had the regulations changed so that now we will have access to the Canadian market. The effect of this action may not be apparent this year, because probably it will be necessary for a plant to be built in order to carry out the process of hydrogenation, which is the essential part of the manufacture, but even the knowledge that this market is available has enabled several additional plants to be put into operation. I see by the press that there is a very good run of pilchard, and it is to be hoped this change will make more money available for an industry which I can assure the house very badly needs it.

Some six weeks or two months ago the canned salmon industry in British Columbia was very much agitated by a report, which there seems to be good reason to believe to be true, that the French parliament was preparing to introduce a bill which would have the effect of doubling the general tariff on canned salmon, thus giving the Japanese, who are under a different trade treaty, complete control of that market. At one time we sold a large proportion of a certain variety of our fish in France, and if nothing can be done to modify or change this provision the result will be disastrous. I should like to ask the minister if anything has been done or if it will be possible to do anything in that regard.

Mr. RHODES: The last question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is one of exreme delicacy. Of course he is aware that the disparity in favour of the Japanese has existed ever since the French treaty came into operation.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but this makes it worse.

Mr. RHODES: Unfortunately that disparity has been such that it has brought about a gradual decrease in our shipments of canned salmon to France and has deflected to Japan what hitherto had been an almost exclusively Canadian business. That situation is still further aggravated by recent tariff changes made by the French government, which will make it practically impossible for us to export our canned salmon to that country. All I can say to my hon. friend is this: The hon. gentleman will realize that it is purely within the right of the French government to effect such tariff changes as may suit their own purposes, but to the extent that it is open to us to discuss the matter with the government of France I can assure my hon. friend that this will be done. So far as any action of ours will enable us to bring about a betterment of that condition, it will be the desire of the government to endeavour to have this country placed on a parity of trade with our friendly neighbour, Japan.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How much longer must we put up with this French treaty?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will have to address that question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. NEILL: One more point before I go home; after this I will not bother anyone further. My last point is in connection with facilitating methods of communication to a place called Kyuquot on the west coast of Vancouver island. On this occasion I can hardly resist making my annual protest in connection with the diversion of $160,000—I see the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis is not here—to the friends of the hon. member on the Atlantic while we on the Pacific are equally entitled to it. I am not going to say anything more on that point now, except to suggest that since they have been getting the whole of that sum illegally for a long period of years—it is a fisheries bounty authorized by statute, and I am not going into it in detail—we on the Pacific should be entitled to the major portion of the vote now under consideration, this $190,000 for the conservation and development of deep sea fisheries and the furthering of the demand for fish. I assure the minister that we will not ask that it be expended in the petty ways in which the money is spent on the Atlantic, where they give eight dollars and six bits to one man and seventy-five cents to some other. That is not going to develop deep sea fisheries.

At the annual meeting of the Pacific coast fishermen, held at Nanaimo last December, when the Deputy Minister of Fisheries was present, a petition was either presented or referred to from those who fish from the Kyuquot asking for better wire facilities. Kyuquot is a very small place; I do not suppose the total population exceeds 50 people during the winter, but when the fishing season is on the population may run up to 2,000, because many fishermen use that village as a base. I may explain also that Kyuquot is very remote; the nearest telegraph wire is about seventy miles away, and the country between is of such a character that one might almost say it would be impossible to build a telegraph line there. Nothing is impossible if you have sufficient money, but this country is so cut up with inlets, fiords and so forth, and the ground itself is so rough that the expenditure would be prohibitive. These people fish during the spring and summer, and in these days of keen competition it is necessary to have access to market information. A telegraph line eighty miles away is of very little use, they must have constant contact with the outside world. A sudden run of fish might come along and they would have them on the ground and not be able to get a carrier in time. These are the conditions which they have to face. A gentleman writes me that during an ordinary season Kyuquot will produce about 800,000 pounds of springs which at an average price of 25 cents per pound would be worth $200,000. That amount of trade is not to be picked up in a forenoon and it should be encouraged in every way possible.

As I have said, it is practically impossible to connect this place up by means of a land wire. What is the alternative? The alternative is a wireless system. Several of the pilchard companies used to have their own wireless plants, manned by operators, but these companies are not operating at the present time and these unhappy fishermen have no way of getting news from the outside world. The coastal steamer calls twice a month, but such service is of very little use. A wireless station could be installed and it need not be an expensive plant. Where something is to cost $500, the government is apt to get out plans for something costing $6,000, and then point out that such a plant would be too expensive. It is suggested the necessary plant would cost about $3,000, but there need not be an operator, which would obviate a large part of the upkeep. For a small percentage of the tolls one of the storekeepers would undertake to operate this plant and the government would receive a fair return by charging the regular rate for messages.

This is not a new idea. I happened to be in the office of a fishing company some years ago when I heard a telephone ring. The manager asked me to excuse him, saying that it was one of his carriers which was calling. These boats are about 50 or 75 tons burden, but they are equipped with small wireless sets by which they are enabled to keep in touch with the head office. It is estimated that it would cost about $3,000 to erect the necessary machinery and equipment at Kyuquot. Trees could be used for the masts, and a quite ordinary plant would be sufficient.

It may be said that this is something which should be taken up with the Department of Marine, but that department has not what might be termed a progressive viewpoint. I found that out after ten years experience. I suggested that a portion of this vote for the preservation and development of deep-sea fishing could be profitably expended. The Marconi people will rent these outfits for something like $60 per month, but as no operator would be required the investment of $3,000 or $4,000 would save the rental charge and be a profitable one, considering benefits to the fishing industry and also the possible returns.

[Mr. Neill.]

This place can produce about $200,000 worth of fish per year. This business is handled in two or three months of the year, and if it had sufficient encouragement there would be a considerable development. Under present conditions these fishermen are losing out in their competition with other and better equipped places. Of course there is no possibility of anything being done this year, but I would like the minister to consider this matter. As I said before, he would not lose much because the regular rate on messages could be charged and the returns would be considerable.

It need not be a high-powered plant because there is a wireless station at Estevan Point, which is no more than 100 miles away. From there the messages could be sent by wireless into Vancouver or Victoria, which would make additional business for the government wireless stations at those points. I trust the minister will give this matter his consideration.

Mr. RHODES: The first reaction to the information that this business amounts to $200,000 per year is that it should be sufficiently profitable to enable those engaged in it to provide their own means of communication.

Mr. NEILL: These are small fishermen with no money.

Mr. RHODES: This subject has been up before and is being inquired into at the present time. I do not think that this department should embark upon a policy of establishing telegraph and wireless services. We have neither the machinery nor the equipment, and I do not think it is good business to have several departments conducting similar lines of endeavour. The Department of Marine handles all wireless matters, and I understand telegraph lines are being operated by both that department and the Department of Public Works. I assure my hon. friend that I will take this matter up with the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), and if it can be demonstrated that this is a reasonable measure of assistance which this department can give at not too great an expense, I will be disposed to consider the matter favourably.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, speaking for the other end of the Dominion, I want to say a word or two in support of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I am glad that the minister appears to be somewhat sympathetic in this regard. Every means possible should be used to extend our market for fish in the United States. This matter affects the western fisheries, but I think the minister knows better than most of us that it affects even more the eastern fisheries. I appreciate that the minister cannot give any definite information with regard to the progress of international negotiations, nor do I desire to instruct or advise him in this connection, but it seems to me that if we were able to go to Washington with this Prince Rupert matter and indicate to our friends to the south that we have been doing them a favour in affording certain facilities, there would be a different situation existing as far as the exporting of fish is concerned. I feel sure my hon. friend has now found that the negotiations, which were held up only because of certain negotiations with regard to treaties which were being considered, have sufficiently progressed to enable him to reopen the matter—and I presume he has done so—and to endeavour to secure better terms and more opportunities in connection with the consumption of fish in the United States. I assure him that so far as I am concerned he will have all support in that respect, and I am glad to hear he is at least thinking of this matter of withdrawing the port privilege or thinking of the extent to which it affords facilities to United States fishermen and of the way in which it might be said to improve our relations with the United States. The fishermen of Nova Scotia, as the minister knows, needs that market very badly. While we welcome every effort that can be made to extend the Canadian market, I am not convinced that the Canadian market can absorb the production of fish which it is possible to have if a decent and fair market is provided for the fishermen.

The minister spoke of the fishing industry in the west, and I have no doubt he intended to include the fishing industry in the east also. I do not think in any previous year the fishermen of the east have endured a worse situation or more hardships, if I may use that term in connection with business, than they did this year. Prices have been down; gear has been lost; it has been difficult to make ends meet; there has been no market and altogether the fishing industry is not at this time in a very healthy condition. It would give the fishermen new hope if the minister could indicate that there was some prospect of the opening up of the United States market.

While I am on my feet, I should like to ask what progress has been made with regard to the survey which I understand is being made by the firm of Cockfield Brown and Company with regard to the development of increased marketing facilities for fish.

Mr. RHODES: I wish to thank the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth for the subject matter of his remarks and his manner of approaching it. With every word he has said I am in hearty accord. The fishermen in the eastern part of Canada have had a very serious year and every reasonable effort ought to be made to assist them.

My hon. friend knows how delicate his first question is as to negotiations with the United States. I can speak only in general terms and assure him that I am at one with him in appreciation of the desirability of what he has suggested. I feel sure when the time comes I shall be able to demonstrate to him that we have not lost any opportunity to take every step we can towards that end.

The survey of Cockfield, Brown and Company is now completed; the report is in process of preparation, and last week I was advised by Doctor Goforth that according to an agreement it will be in my hands on the first day of August. That survey, contrary to a more or less general impression, is not by any means confined to the Canadian market. It covers marketing conditions throughout the world wherever there is a possibility for a market. I am led to believe it has been very comprehensive and I trust when the report is available we shall be able to base upon it a policy which will enable us to enlarge not only our Canadian market but our foreign market to a considerable extent.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend think the report will be available at the end of August or within a month?

Mr. RHODES: As soon as it is in hand and has been perused, we shall have it printed and made available for distribution if possible before the end of August, or at all events as early as may be.

Mr. RALSTON: I know the report is not confidential except in the sense that it should be given to the government first. From what my hon. friend knows of what has been discussed and the nature of the report, does he think that under the present legislation and powers of the department any recommendations contained in the report can be put into effect?

Mr. RHODES: I do not think any further legislation will be required, nor do I think, so far as this year is concerned, any further appropriations will be necessary for the purposes which we have in mind.

Mr. VENIOT: Has any request been received from the salmon fishermen for an extension of time? If so, what action has been taken?

Mr. RHODES: I think I could answer the question of the hon. member for Gloucester without making any inquiry at all. I do not know there has ever been a year or a district that there has not been a request for an extension of not only salmon fishing but every other kind. Perhaps my hon. friend will take that as an answer.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to know what action he has taken.

Mr. MARCIL: I do not think this discussion of the fishing industry would be complete if I did not put in a word in regard to Quebec. In the early spring I received many complaints from those engaged in the salmon fisheries on account of the change in the regulations. Has the minister reason to believe the change made in working out in the interests of the fishermen and the fishing industry in that part of the country?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend may take it as axiomatic that no regulations and no change in any regulations will ever be satisfactory to everyone. The best that the department can hope to do is to make regulations and effect such changes as will reduce complaints to the minimum. My information from the officers of my department is that the changes recently effected have been in the main reasonably satisfactory. They have been concurred in by the fishery authorities of the province of Quebec and by our officers, and I think on the whole are supported by public opinion, although here and there no doubt there will be the odd complaint.

Mr. RALSTON: I suppose under this item I may refer to the policy which the minister enunciated the other day in the house with regard to trawlers. I note he intimates he has come to the conclusion—and I take it he is enunciating a matter of government policy—that any trawler to be licensed must be built and owned in Canada. Does the minister intend to pass regulations to that effect?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. Regulations are now being prepared, and I propose to recommend them to my colleagues. If they concur, the regulations will be put into force. I presume my hon. friend gathers from what I have said previously that it would be unjust to discriminate against trawlers already licensed, but it does not follow that we shall continue to license them all. If it be found that four or five trawlers are sufficient, we shall not license more than that number, but the six that are now in existence will have the preference.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is going to pass regulations?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me steer my hon. friend past any pitfalls that the late government found. Is he not going to get into difficulty if he passes regulations of that kind?

Mr. RHODES: I do not say that we are going to avoid pitfalls, whatever we do, but if my hon. friend has any suggestions to make I shall be glad to receive them.

Mr. RALSTON: In order that it may be put beyond peradventure, in view of the fact that a case is pending before the supreme court, my hon. friend should have a statute for whatever he is going to do, particularly in the matter of limitation of licences. I am all for limitation of licences. As my hon. friend knows, the policy of the government of which I had the honour to be member was that after April 1, 1932, no licences should be granted except to Canadian-built trawlers. I understand that the difference between that policy and the policy enunciated by my hon. friend is that after this date no licences will be granted to other than Canadian-built trawlers except such as are now in existence and are now licensed.

Mr. RHODES: I think my hon. friend, if he will look at section 69 (A) will agree that it gives ample powers to the minister; in fact, as I said the other day, it gives too much power to the minister. I wish it had not given quite so much. I do not think any power, desirable or undesirable, could possibly be added by legislative authority to the powers contained in that section. This need have no bearing on the case now on appeal before the supreme court. That is only a question whether we are going to take so much money out of the trawler companies or not. If my colleagues agree with me in the regulations to be promulgated, I am going to recommend that that case be withdrawn and not proceeded with, because there is no object in attempting to extract large amounts of money from companies which are already having difficulties in financing. So I say quite frankly that the case was held over on my recommendation, having in mind the course which I felt I ought to take. If that course is taken, that case will be withdrawn.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want my hon. friend to misunderstand me. I do not recede one tittle from the position which the former government took. We believe the policy which we laid down in that order in council was correct. The exchequer court has decided that it was ultra vires, but I am talking of the policy as a policy, and so far as I am concerned it still stands. On the other hand, I would warn my hon. friend, if I may, with deference, that in view of the principle which seems to have been laid down by Mr. Justice Audette, it would seem to me that he ought to look very carefully into the question whether he can ever make a regulation limiting the licences to the trawlers now in existence, for that, I understand, is what he is going to do. Outside of that they are to be Canadian-built trawlers. That is one of the points on which Mr. Justice Audette decided that the order in council was ultra vires. I only throw out that suggestion to my hon. friend. I think he is not going far enough in his limitations, but if he is going that far, I do not want him coming to us next year and saying: Well, we passed regulations, and we found that they were ultra vires. In view of the principle laid down by Mr. Justice Audette it is very questionable whether the policy which my hon. friend laid down in the house the other day can be accomplished without legislation.

Mr. RHODES: I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the legal phases. I can assure my hon. friend that the question he has raised I have had in mind, and I certainly do not anticipate any difficulty upon that score. If the regulations are not so onerous as to come within the purview of the judgment of Mr. Justice Audette, and I do not think they will be, I cannot see where we shall have any difficulty.

Item agreed to.

Oyster culture, $10,000.

Mr. REID: I would like to direct the attention of the committee and of the minister in particular to a state of affairs that exists in connection with oysters in British Columbia. We have two rivers there, the Serpentine and the Nicomekl, flowing into what is known as Mud bay. These two rivers have been set aside for biological purposes presumably for the cultivation of oysters. In order to acquaint the minister with the situation as it now exists I should like to give him a few facts of the case.

At one time there were no dams in these two rivers, but a few years ago dams were constructed across them and about the same time a lease was given by the provincial government to companies to propagate oysters out in the bay. It was not until the dams had been constructed, and possibly not until the oyster operations began in the bay that the oysters began to go up these rivers. The dams are each about three and a half miles from the bay. There were however native oysters in the rivers before these companies started their operations in the bay. The beds of the rivers are now covered with old shells to a depth of some four or five feet, and the fishermen last year had a great deal of difficulty in fishing in these rivers because their nets would catch on these oyster beds, and when they dragged up their nets they would bring up large masses of oyster shells and also oysters which tore holes in the nets. Many persons were coming to these rivers to take oysters, but the oyster companies frowned on such action. They claimed that the oysters on the rivers belonged to them, due to their having propagated the oysters for many years and having also brought spat from away back east. They then approached the provincial government, which in turn approached the federal government. The result was that these oyster beds were set aside for biological purposes.

May I point out to the minister that in the description as it appears in the return that was brought down, an error occurs, inasmuch as it states that the reserve would exist from the river to Boundary bay. I think that that should be checked up because Boundary bay is far off, and if the reserve really extended to those limits not even the company could take oysters, because Boundary bay is many miles distant from Mud bay, into which these two rivers flow. I have the official file before me, from which I should like to quote. Here is a letter addressed to Mr. Found by J. P. Babcock, assistant to the commissioner of the provincial Fisheries department, Victoria. He says:

> It is suggested that you take the bull by the horns and create an oyster reserve.

That certainly is an Irishism, to take the bull by the horns and create an oyster reserve. In another letter from Mr. C. R. Elsey, the marine biologist in charge of the oyster investigation, to Mr. J. P. Babcock, this statement appears:

> Shells placed in the rivers by the Crescent Company have become heavily set.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that no shells were set in the river by the company. The shells were there in the bay already, so that statement is not correct. He says further:

> Efforts on the part of the oyster company to obtain leases have failed.

That is probably correct, Mr. Chairman, because there is a controversy as to the respective jurisdiction of the Dominion and provincial government over navigable streams, the Dominion government having jurisdiction over navigable rights and the provincial government claiming the bed of the stream. He says further:

> Persons have been taking these oysters but the Crescent Oyster Company has refrained in the past from such action, but are at present quite resentful of such unrestricted vandalism and threaten, quite naturally, to go in with their superior equipment.

It would be interesting to know what superior equipment can be used in lifting oysters, because my information is that oysters are lifted by hand. He says further:

> The removal of these fully grown and well established oysters would make the summer's work futile and put back for ten years the establishing of seed beds.

That is very far away from the truth, because those beds have so many oysters in them now that they could not be depleted in years. One firm has offered $100,000 for the privilege of getting the oysters from each of the rivers, so great are the numbers of oysters in them. So that the statement that the removal of these fully grown and well established oysters would make the summer's work futile and put back for ten years the establishing of seed beds, is not correct.

One of the criticisms I have to offer concerns the hardship enforced upon fishermen. Fishing licences are given every year to fishermen allowing operations on certain areas on those rivers. Until last year they had the right to take the oysters and sell them if they wished, or use them for their own purposes. Now that privilege has been denied them. On behalf of those fishermen I ask the minister seriously to consider this point of view: They are now denied the right of taking oysters from those rivers. It is hardly correct to say that the beds of those streams have been set aside for experimental purposes. No experiment is necessary, because the oysters are there by the thousands. In fact, when they lifted the gates off the dams this year, oysters were found encrusted about two feet thick upon them. The fact of the matter is that the company to which I have referred are endeavouring to obtain absolute control of the two rivers. They could not obtain control in any other way than by first coming here and having the reserve put on for biological purposes. This is the first move. Their intention later on is to obtain possession, but in the meantime outsiders including fishermen who year after year have used these streams for fishing are denied the right even to use the oysters for themselves. I have not gone into full particulars with the minister, but I should like to have done so because there are many aspects of the matter which should be inquired into. First of all I am asking on behalf of the fishermen that they receive back the right to get the oysters. Secondly, I think the situation should be carefully looked into; in the event of any lease being given to a company to operate the question of navigable rights would come in, because the rivers might have to be dredged. If any company or companies owned the beds of the rivers they would object very strenuously to dredging operations as such operations would take out practically all the oysters from the river. I shall not take up further the time of the committee, but would ask that the minister give these matters his serious consideration.

Mr. RHODES: The only manner in which I can be of service to my hon. friend is to send his remarks as they will be reported in Hansard to the Commissioner of Fisheries of British Columbia, because the fisheries to which he has referred come within the exclusive jurisdiction of that province. It is true that we must in all cases, and did in this case, pass regulations, but that was done at the request of the government of British Columbia, pursuant to the policy followed by this as well as by previous administrations, namely to put into effect only such regulations as are in conformity with the wishes of the various provincial governments. That arrangement is subject always to a general provision—in the event of the dominion not agreeing with the provinces on a matter of policy relating to conservation, or something of that nature. So it was that this regulation was passed at the request of the government of British Columbia, and the area was set aside to enable experiments to be conducted by the biological board. Those experiments were paid for by the Dominion but were carried out by the biological board for the province of British Columbia and at its request. At the moment I do not believe I can do more than send Hansard containing the remarks of my hon. friend to the Commissioner of Fisheries for the province of British Columbia.

Mr. REID: What experiments were carried on last year?—because I can assure you no experiments are necessary. Oysters are there on each river for a distance of three and a half miles—beds of them.

Mr. RHODES: I think my hon. friend will find that a report covering these experiments has been circulated by the biological board. In any event I believe there is a report in the department which will be made available to him.

Mr. RALSTON: I have in mind a matter which may not be of very great importance, but for the consideration of which I would ask special permission at this time. It concerns an appointment, and is as important to those interested as would be a matter of international significance to the industry at large. I am protesting on behalf of my own constituency. Mr. Marshall was appointed inspector in Digby. He had been dismissed for active political partisanship about a year before. However, in the eyes of the government at least he had purged his sin and was again considered eligible. Mr Lewis had been appointed temporarily and was located at Yarmouth. An advertisement was issued by the Civil Service Commission, confined to the counties of Halifax, Guysborough, and Digby. There was a joint advertisement for Kings and Queens but Yarmouth was not included. The point I make is that Yarmouth is included in that particular fishing district. The inspector who was to be appointed was to have jurisdiction in Yarmouth, Digby, Lunenburg and Queens, but when the advertisement was issued Yarmouth was excluded; in other words no residents of Yarmouth need apply. Why was that?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot agree entirely with my hon. friend. I remember the matter to which he refers. Digby is a more central region for this officer than is the town of Yarmouth. Yarmouth is at one end of the area, because that inspector covers the counties of Yarmouth, Shelburne, Queens Digby Lunenburg and Annapolis. His location at Yarmouth would put him about as far away as possible from the centre of the area.

Mr. RALSTON: It would put him just in the centre.

Mr. RHODES: No, I do not agree with my hon. friend. Digby is a much more central point. He has to go away up to cover Annapolis, Queens and Lunenburg. Certainly when in Digby he is much nearer the centre than if he were in Yarmouth. My hon. friend will recall that we insisted the offices should remain at Digby where they had been originally.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has missed the point. I am not talking about the location of the offices. I say my hon. friend is wrong; anybody who would take the trouble to look at the map would know that he is wrong. With his knowledge of the geography of the province of Nova Scotia he does not need to look at the map. Yarmouth is in the centre of that district. Fishery inspectors have to go around the shores. For the first time, Yarmouth was going to have the office, but my hon. friend moved it back to Digby.

Mr. SHORT: It never was moved to Yarmouth.

Mr. RALSTON: Let us leave it at that; but when my hon. friend moves it to Digby why does he exclude all the residents of Yarmouth from eligibility for the position?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): We are not discussing the matter to which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has directed attention.

Mr. RALSTON: I asked special permission to have the matter considered.

Mr. RHODES: I have no objection to discussing it. I do not agree with my hon. friend at all when he says the jurisdiction of the fishery officers is around the shores; it is over the rivers and streams and lakes as well. So he covers the whole area. My hon. friend was wrong there.

Mr. RALSTON: One-tenth of the rivers, streams and shore.

Mr. RHODES: Yarmouth was not excluded. This question would never have arisen, because Mr. Lewis was not dismissed. He was asked to carry on his office from Digby, where quarters were available in the public building, and where the work had been carried on for years and years. If Mr. Lewis had not resigned he would have been in office yet, and it was only when we insisted on his living in Digby that he resigned. Having resigned, his place was filled by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that, but it has nothing to do with my question. I am asking why when the position was going to be filled in Digby residents of Yarmouth were not allowed to apply.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend had better address his question to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the advertisements were prepared by the department.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so, but the position was filled by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. RALSTON: A gentleman, a returned soldier, living in Yarmouth was declared ineligible for the position because he lived outside the district advertised.

Mr. RHODES: My deputy tells me that it cannot be the same position; but even so, he has to live in Digby, that is all.

Mr. RALSTON: I am saying that according to this return this gentleman is regarded as ineligible for this position because he lived outside the district advertised. There was no advertisement that included Yarmouth. Halifax and Digby were included.

Mr. RHODES: Will my hon. friend let me have the advertisement?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is confusing two things. This advertisement is for an inspector of fisheries; that would be a Digby county appointment. Mr. Marshall's position was that of supervisor of fisheries—a different office altogether.

Mr. RALSTON: Was not Clement Crowell an applicant for this position?

Mr. RHODES: He may have been, but this advertisement has nothing to do with the appointment to the position at Digby.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the other position filled by a returned soldier?

Mr. RHODES: My deputy advises me that we have two vacancies for an inspector of fisheries in Digby county; that is why they were asked to be residents of Digby. The position that my hon. friend speaks of is that of supervisor. Of course, there is no question of exclusion there, and it was quite competent for the man at Yarmouth to apply. I do not know anything as to the details.

Mr. RALSTON: I simply want to say to my hon. friend that that is the information given me by the secretary who abstracted the return.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. But possibly the individual referred to in this application might also have applied for the position of supervisor.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. Is it true or not that for the position of supervisor residents of the county of Yarmouth were excluded?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know that?

Mr. RHODES: I am so advised by my deputy.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know that Mr. Merkel was an applicant for the position of supervisor?

Mr. RHODES: I would have to make inquiries to find out.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend would inquire I should be obliged. I do not want to do any injustice to my hon. friend or to the department.

Mr. RHODES: I shall be glad to make inquiries.

Mr. RALSTON: A man named J. W. Merkel lived in Digby and served in France for four years. According to the report I have he was third on the list of eligibles. Even so, under the Civil Service Act he would be entitled primarily to the appointment, because no matter how far down the list a returned soldier happens to be he takes precedence over a civilian. Perhaps my hon. friend will at the same time look up the application of Clement W. Crowell. He was a disability case. He had a super-preference according to the return and applied for the position.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, I will make inquiries.

Item agreed to.

To provide, subject to the approval of the governor in council, for a grant to the United Maritime Fishermen, $5,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend be good enough to call the attention of his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) to a communication to the secretary of the United Maritime Fishermen? There was some difficulty in Yarmouth to which I have referred before in this house—I do not propose to go into it fully again on this occasion—with regard to holding up a shipment of rope on which 5½ cents dumping duty had been imposed temporarily. An investigation was held which took a considerable time. The net result was that the rope was finally released in time for the fishing season, but very late, and after the fishermen had been put to a great deal of trouble due to the uncertainty as to whether they would get the rope or not. Then the secretary of the United Maritime Fishermen—which is the association getting this vote—wrote to the minister of Customs with regard to the holding up of the shipment at Yarmouth and to be advised fully as to the conditions under which it was released. The reply sent from the Department of National Revenue—I am bringing it to the attention of the minister, and I am sure he will see that such a thing does not occur again—is signed by Mr. Watson. He says:

Messrs. Stone and Forsyth, Boston, Mass., have been advised as to the conditions under which the importation at Yarmouth—referred to by you—was released and are in a position to communicate same to you if they so desire.

It does not make any difference who the secretary of the United Maritime Fishermen happens to be, he represents a responsible body recognized by this government in the vote now under consideration, and I submit that the information he asked for was information to which he was entitled, and that he should not have been referred to somebody in Boston when the required information was so easily available in the department.

Mr. RHODES: I went very carefully into that case. My hon. friend, I think, is wrong in saying that this extra duty was charged. As a matter of fact, Mr. Breadner, acting for the department, wired to the collector in Yarmouth not to collect, but to assure himself that the shipment had come direct from Holland. That was where the whole question arose. It was thought at first that the rope had been transhipped at Boston, but when it was found that it had come direct from Holland it was passed through without extra duty. The inquiry had taken place before Doctor Hamer ever sent any telegram. I have in my hand a copy of the letter on the subject written by Stone & Forsyth and addressed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. RALSTON: I have it here.

Mr. RHODES: May I say it is almost a disease with Doctor Hamer, the secretary of the United Maritime Fishermen, to rush into print on the first available opportunity, usually with a telegram, which he in all cases sends collect. In the present instance he could not resist dashing into print and getting his name—and usually his photograph—into the papers at the same time. Messrs. Stone & Forsyth say:

We feel that Dr. Hamer should have waited the result of the investigation and the decision to be made by Mr. Breadner's office before giving the matter such publicity.

In other words, the very people for whom he professed to speak in part, took exception to his having dashed into the newspapers before he knew what he was talking about. As a matter of fact this whole thing was adjusted by officials of the department, and Doctor Hamer had nothing whatever to do with it one way or the other. But he had to stick his telegram in the paper, get his photograph published once more and try to take a little credit in the matter.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know and never even saw Doctor Hamer, but I want to say to my hon. friend that he is not quite doing justice to the association.

Mr. RHODES: Neither is Doctor Hamer.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said Doctor Hamer had nothing to do with it. Here is a telegram from Mr. Breadner dated January 30 in which Mr. Breadner does not say "Hold it up" or "Do something temporarily," although he does say something about an investigation pending. The telegram reads:

Value for entry with collection of dumping duty twenty-three and one-half cents per pound less two and one-half cents per pound discount to dealers pending completion of investigation.

On February 1, only two days later, Doctor Hamer does wire, and I suppose there are wires from him right along. Then my hon. friend read a letter from Stone & Forsyth, for whom he said Doctor Hamer was acting. Stone & Forsyth are the dealers; they are not the fishermen. I am talking about the fishermen, and I only rose to make one point, that the secretary of the fishermen's association of the maritime provinces is entitled to some different answer than to be told that he can go to Boston and find out what was done there. That was the only point I desired to make, and I repeat it.

Item agreed to.

To provide for an investigation by an international committee into the probable effect upon the fisheries of the lower bay of Fundy region of damming Passamaquoddy and Cobscook bays, in New Brunswick and Maine, U.S.A., $22,500.

Mr. VENIOT: There are a few minutes left before six o'clock, and I think we can get through this item, since I have just one question. Can the minister tell me what progress has been made with this investigation? I understand that the Canadian representatives to the commission already have been named in the persons of the Deputy Minister of Fisheries and Doctor Huntsman. If that is true I wish to express my satisfaction with those commissioners, but I should like to know how far the matter has progressed, because the delay is causing a great deal of uneasiness in the fishing industry of Passamaquoddy bay.

Mr. RHODES: It is true that the Canadian representatives are the Deputy Minister of Fisheries and Doctor Huntsman, and I may say that the Deputy Minister of Fisheries has been appointed chairman of the joint board. There has been no delay so far as their efforts or the efforts of the department have been concerned. As a matter of fact it has been difficult to get the best class of men to conduct the technical phases of the investigation, but there is on the way now one of the foremost experts of the British isles in matters touching the herring industry who, through the good offices of the British government, has been made available to this commission for a period of two years.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SERVICE LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 21, the debate on the motion of Mr. Lawson for the consideration of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Service Loan and Finance Corporation.

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house, I ask permission to withdraw my motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent, Mr. Lawson moves that order No. 45 be discharged and that Bill No. 118 be withdrawn.

Motion agreed to and bill withdrawn.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE INCREASED PENALTIES FOR VIOLATION

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton) moved the third reading of Bill No. 16, to amend the Dairy Industry Act.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The orders under private and public bills having been exhausted the house will revert to committee of supply.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Fraser (Cariboo) in the chair.

Dairying, including grant of $5,000 to National Dairy Council, $295,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, would the minister advise the house why the price of milk for home consumption remains the same when the price of butter has dropped so considerably? The price of butter has dropped from 40 cents per pound last year to 20 cents per pound this year, while the price of milk has remained at the same level for the past five years.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The only reason that can be given is that we are on an export basis with regard to butter and not with regard to whole milk.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand an amendment was moved to this item when it was before the committee previously.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): Yes. It was moved by Mr. Young, seconded by Mr. Bouchard:

> That the item be reduced by $5,000, being the amount of a grant to the National Dairy council.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. DONNELLY: We are by this item giving a grant to the National Dairy Council. I have been looking over the report of the meeting of the National Dairy Council held in Winnipeg last March, and I should like to know how far the program they have suggested is being carried out. They say that they have three objects in view:

> (1) To build a prosperous dairy industry, the foundation of general live stock industry.
> (2) To produce dairy products, both raw and manufactured, sufficient to meet all domestic market requirements.
> (3) To reestablish and maintain a substantial export trade with continuity of supply and superior quality.

Then they make to the government certain recommendations which they ask to be put into effect in order that those three planks in their platform may be carried out.

First they deal with butter and they say that at present large numbers of small and unsanitary butter factories are responsible for less effective and economic butter manufacturing. They ask that larger butter factories be built in certain centres; that there be fewer butter factories but larger ones. They say that uniformity demands this, and if larger factories are built the butter produced will be of better quality and produced under more sanitary conditions, so that they will be able to meet the export demand. They say the same thing with regard to cheese. They want fewer and larger cheese factories, so that the production may be concentrated but not to the same degree as with regard to butter.

Then they say that something should be done so that the market price which the farmer receives for his milk may be in some degree commensurate with the price the dairy receives. For instance, if we take the city of Ottawa, the farmers are getting from 17 to 19 cents a gallon for their milk, while the Ottawa Dairy or the Borden milk company are getting from 40 to 44 cents a gallon. In other words, the farmer who has to feed the cows, to operate his dairy farm in accordance with sanitary methods laid down by the government and to bring his milk into the large centres, gets the huge sum of 17 cents, while the people who pasteurize the milk and distribute it around the city have a spread in the neighbourhood of 27 cents a gallon. The spread between the producer and the consumer is altogether too great. The National Dairy Council lay down as a plank in their platform that this spread should be narrowed down so that the farmer may get some recompense commensurate with what the dairy people do.

Then they take up the subject of production and they lay down the plank that the tuberculosis areas should be increased. They commend the government for having established these areas. They say that this is resulting in the production of better and healthier cows and a better and more sanitary class of milk. Passing on from that they deal with cheaper feed and they ask for reduced freight rates on feeds and coarse grains coming from the west. The Minister of Agriculture this morning told us in the agriculture committee that feeding with barley, bran and certain other feeds, produced a higher quality of steers that compared with the best they had on the English market. If that be a fact, we should be enabled to ship our barley to the eastern farmers at a reduced and cheap rate. Our barley growers should receive at least the five cents a bushel handed out to the wheat growers in order that the price of barley in eastern Canada may be made low enough for the farmers there to buy it, feed it to their stock and thus produce better stock for both dairy and beef cattle. These are some of the planks laid down by the National Dairy Council to whom we are voting to-night a grant of $5,000. If nothing is being done towards carrying out the recommendations which this organization is making, why give it a grant? We should either accept and endeavour to carry out the recommendations or cut out the grant altogether.

Mr. POULIOT: I entirely agree with what the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) has said. Let me draw the attention of the committee to one recommendation in particular. But first let me take this opportunity of fulfilling a very pleasant duty in congratulating the hon. member who is acting as chairman of the committee (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo) upon attaining such a high position to-night. The recommendation I wish to mention is that which the National Dairy Council makes with regard to a high tariff on butter. Last year the tariff on butter was six cents a pound, and during the September special session the government increased it to eight cents. I asked the question: When was the highest tariff imposed on butter? It was before the new Australian treaty was brought before the house; in other words, in April we had the highest tariff on butter since the discovery of Canada, and yet the price was the lowest since May, 1904. Therefore a high tariff was of no use in protecting the farmers because the tariff was the highest and yet the price was the lowest. Although the Prime Minister made some jokes about the numerous returns for which I asked, thanks to that return the government has changed its policy and is no more acting in accordance with the recommendations of the dairy council, but in the light of that return it has reduced the tariff to five cents a pound. The tariff on butter is now one cent a pound less than it was when the former government was in office. Perhaps this tariff will cure the evil in time, but I do not know how the platform and stump speakers we heard during the last campaign preaching high tariff in my constituency as in others throughout Quebec, will explain the good results of that high tariff policy. I cannot conceive that it was ever good for the farmer, and we have the evidence now. It shows that with time the government can improve a lot.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am opposed to this item of $5,000 for the National Dairy Council on the ground that last year the activity of the National Dairy Council was simply propanganda for higher tariffs. All the creameries in Ontario and the National Dairy Council, of which they may or may not be members—I am not clear on that point—spent all their energies in trying to convince the farmers that protection on butter was going to give them a greater return. If the National Dairy Council would set itself to answering the question asked by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) we might well grant them $5,000. The Minister of Agriculture did not answer that question; at least, he did not answer it wholly. While it is true that milk is sold at home and butter is sold abroad, I think, it is also true that the lack of organization among the producers of milk and the organization of the distributors of milk have very much to do with the great spread between the price the producer receives and the price the consumer pays. I do feel that the consumers to-day are being almost, if not quite, as badly treated as the producers of milk, because they are paying much more than they should pay under the circumstances, and the producers are getting much less than they should get. I am entirely opposed to this vote. As a matter of fact, I would say that outside of the Conservative party itself there was no more effective body of propagandists for protection in the last election than the National Dairy Council of Canada.

Mr. PERRAS: I see by Le Droit, in an advertisement in its issue of July 24, that five-pound lots of butter are being sold at 15 cents per pound. I am entirely opposed to this grant of $5,000 to the National Dairy Council, and I would ask the minister to explain how it is that butter is being sold in five-pound lots in the city of Hull at 15 cents per pound.

Mr. POULIOT: It must be peanut butter.

Mr. PERRAS: No, it is good butter.

Mr. BERTRAND: The hon. member for Willow Bunch a few moments ago stated that the dairies in Ottawa were paying the farmers 16 and 17 cents per gallon of milk, but the dairies have recently adopted a new rule that milk shipped to Ottawa and testing less than 3.25 would be paid for at the rate of 64 cents per 100 pounds, which is 6.02 cents per gallon. I do not want to refer to the question of paying a bounty to the wheat farmers of the west, but I do say that it is utterly impossible for the farmers to produce a gallon of milk for 6.02 cents. That milk is sold at very much higher prices to the consumer. I noted in the committee of agriculture this morning the very good disposition of the minister to inquire into the spread between the price to the producer and the price to the consumer. I would ask him to make a full inquiry into the milk business; to start by going into the capitalization of these dairy companies, and secondly to ascertain what they do with the milk that they buy from the farmers, and what revenue they derive from it. The middleman is getting far more profit than the farmer. There is ground there, and very serious ground, for a thorough investigation, in order that the producers may be assured that they are going to get some value for the products they deliver to the dairies.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. W. A. GORDON (South Temiskaming): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I desire to revert to motions.

[Miss Macphail.]

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent the house will revert to motions.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

Mr. GORDON: I desire to table the fourth report of the special committee appointed to investigate the Beauharnois project, and to give notice that on Thursday next I shall move that the report be concurred in. I give notice in order that in the meantime hon. members may acquaint themselves with its contents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if the report will appear in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day?

Mr. BENNETT: I assume that the assistant clerk will read the report as soon as it is noted, and it will appear in the Votes and Proceedings.

The Clerk Assistant then read the report, as follows:

Mr. Gordon, from the select committee appointed to investigate the Beauharnois project then presented the following as its fourth report:

1. On the 10th day of June, 1931, the House of Commons adopted the following resolution: that Messrs. Dorion, Fiset (Sir Eugène), Gardiner, Gordon, Jacobs, Jones, Lennox, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Stewart (Lethbridge), be a committee to investigate from its inception the Beauharnois project for the development of hydro-electric energy by the use of the waters of the St. Lawrence river so far as the matters referred to are within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing words in particular to investigate the matters referred to in the speech made in the House of Commons by Mr. Robert Gardiner, the honourable member for Acadia, on the 10th day of May last, as reported on pages 1875-1887 of Hansard, and to report from time to time their observations and opinion thereon; with power to send for papers, persons and records. Hon. W. A. Gordon was on the 15th of June, 1931, appointed chairman of the special select committee.

2. (1) The committee sat from the 15th day of June, 1931, to the 22nd day of July, 1931, held on most of these days more than one session and examined 35 witnesses.

(2) On the 1st of July, the members of the committee visited and inspected the site of the works.

There were filed with the committee 129 exhibits.

3. Soulanges Section—St. Lawrence River

(1) The Soulanges section of the St. Lawrence river is that portion thereof lying between Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis which are some 14½ miles apart, and between which there is a fall of 83 feet. The average normal available flow of the river through this section is in the vicinity of 230,000 cubic feet per second for 50 per cent of the time, making possible a development of 2,000,000 horse power of commercial electric energy at 85 per cent load factor. The site is in close proximity to the city and port of Montreal, and is conveniently located on what must soon be a waterway capable of accommodating ocean-going vessels. It has therefore great possibility for industrial development if cheap power is available.

(2) It is apparent that the Soulanges section thus presents an opportunity for hydro-electric development almost if not quite unique on the face of the globe. It is one of the greatest national resources in Canada, and in its natural state of great potential value.

4. History

(1) About the year 1800, Edward Ellice, the Seigneur of Beauharnois, erected a small "moulin Banal" at the mouth of the St. Louis river and in order to increase the flow of the river, in 1807 built a small feeder, four miles in length, from Lake St. Francis to the head waters of the river. This constituted the first diversion in the Soulanges section of the St. Lawrence river for power purposes. Whatever water rights were incidental to this feeder later passed into the hands of a family named Robert and apparently formed the basis of the applications for power rights hereinafter mentioned. Details concerning the Robert "rights" may be found in a judgment delivered in the Exchequer Court of Canada in the case of Robert vs. the King (9 Exchequer Court Reports). Reference may be had also to Exhibit No. 29, a memorandum prepared by Mr. R. C. Alexander.

(2) in 1855 the government of the province of Canada built a dyke, known as the Hungry Bay Dyke, as a protection against floods. It rebuilt the control gates of the feeder and in 1883 the government of Canada deepened and widened the feeder and installed new gates in the dyke at the feeder entrance, considerable sums of money having been appropriated for this purpose.

(3) In 1902, J. B. Robert, as the grantee of the representatives of Edward Ellice, brought action against the crown for a declaration of his rights and judgment was pronounced on the 17th October, 1904, deciding that Robert held substantial rights in the feeder. A compromise was arrived at by which the feeder was leased to the heirs of J. B. Robert by the Department of Public Works under date of the 28th December, 1909, for a period of 21 years. This was authorized by order in council, P.C. 2168, of the 9th December, 1909.

(4) In 1902 by Quebec Statute 2 Edward VII, Chapter 72 of the 26th March, 1902, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company was incorporated with power to enlarge and extend the feeder. As a consequence of the finding of the Exchequer Court that J. B. Robert was not the owner of the feeder, in 1910 another Provincial Act was passed giving the Company the right to build a new canal or feeder from any point on the original feeder to any point on the St. Louis River at or near the town of Beauharnois. This Company thus became possessed of certain rights in respect of the diversion of water for power purposes from lake St. Francis. The shares of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company were all owned by W. H. Robert and other members of the Robert family. On the 3rd February, 1927, Mr. R. O. Sweezey obtained from the Roberts an option of all the issued capital stock of the Company and the Company's rights.

The Robert interests

(5) W. H. Robert and the other Robert heirs received for the 2,000 shares of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company and such other rights, if any, as were then outstanding in them

(1) Cash $1,520,000.

(2) 200 fully paid part interests in the Beauharnois Power Syndicate.

(3) 21,000 class A shares of the Beauharnois Power Corporation.

(4) 100 fully paid part interests in the Beauharnois Syndicate transferred from R. O. Sweezey account, which became 200 part interests in the Beauharnois Power Syndicate.

(6) In addition to the above-mentioned 400 part interests in the Power Syndicate owned by the Roberts, W. H. Robert held a further 300 units in his own name on which he owed $10,000 as at December 17th, 1929. For the 700 part interests, referred to above, the Robert heirs received, on the dissolution of the Syndicate, cheques aggregating $95,000, together with 28,000 shares of the class A common stock of the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited.

(7) In the same year, Mr. Sweezey applied to the Quebec Legislature for an amendment to the Act incorporating the Company permitting the construction of a canal between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis. This application was refused.

(8) On the 17th March, 1927, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company applied to His Excellency the Governor General in Council for approval of a proposal to build a power canal "which can be readily adapted for thirty foot navigation requirements also" from a point on lake St. Francis near the mouth of the St. Louis feeder to lake St. Louis and to use so much of the water of the St. Lawrence river as can be taken through the proposed canal without interfering with navigation and without interfering with existing prior rights in the river St. Lawrence." This application was not pressed.

(9) On the 17th January, 1928, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company applied to His Excellency the Governor General in Council "for approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act of its plans and site of proposed works herein described and for the right to divert forty thousand cubic feet per second (40,000 c.f.s.) from lake St. Francis."

(10) In March, 1928, by Statute of the province of Quebec (18 George V, Chapter 113), a new section, 11A, was added to the original Act of incorporation giving the Company the right to build a new canal from any point within two miles in a southwesterly direction from the mouth of the St. Louis feeder to any point on lake St. Louis within one and a half miles in a westerly direction along the shore of lake St. Louis from the mouth of the St. Louis river and giving the Company the right to expropriate lands not exceeding six arpents in width.

(11) On the 27th April, 1928, Mr. Sweezey and his associates obtained the passing of an order in council by the executive council of Quebec authorizing the granting to the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company of an emphyteutic lease, which lease was subsequently executed on the 23rd June, 1928, and which grants to the Beauhornois Light, Heat and Power Company the rights of the province of Quebec to such part of the hydraulic power of the St. Lawrence River as can be developed between Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis through a derivation (six diversion) canal on the right (southern) shore of a maximum flowing capacity of forty thousand cubic feet per second (40,000 c.f.s.), (the province reserving the ownership and the free disposition of the surplus) for a period of 75 years from the 23rd June, 1928, at an annual rental of $20,000 for the first five years and $50,000 for each of the subsequent years and an additional payment of $1 for each horse power year revisable after each period of ten years from the date the plant will have been put in operation. The company agrees that at the expiration of the first five years it will have installed 100,000 h.p.; at the expiration of the sixth year, 200,000 h.p.; at the expiration of the seventh year, 300,000 h.p.; and at the expiration of the tenth year, 500,000 h.p. The lease is granted without prejudice to Federal and Provincial laws concerning navigation, mines, fisheries and the driving of logs and also upon the understanding that the lessee "who is presently negotiating with the Federal government shall obtain from the latter in so far as its rights are concerned, the authorization to divert a flow of forty thousand cubic feet per second (40,000 c.f.s.)" and in the event of the approval of the Federal government not being obtained within twelve months, the lease may be cancelled by the lieutenant governor in council.

(12) Having obtained the amendment to its charter and the lease from the province of Quebec, the company pressed its application to the governor general in council and on the 15th January, 1929, a hearing was held by the then Minister of Public Works and two other members of the Dominion government, at which were considered protests from shipping companies and power interests.

(13) The application originally contemplated the diversion of the whole flow of the St. Lawrence River. To meet the opposition to the application at this hearing, Mr. Aime Geoffrion, K.C., who appeared for the applicant, amended the application to read as follows:

"The application of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company now pending before the governor in council is purely and simply for the approval of plans for hydraulic development which will be subject to a condition that not more than 40,000 cubic feet per second shall be diverted from the river—from lake St. Francis, to be returned to lake St. Louis, and used for power purposes by the company between these two points; and any condition that the government may exact, in any wording satisfactory to the government involving that limitation, is accepted in advance by the applicant. If the enginers think that the plans should be altered to meet this declaration the company will submit to any such alteration."

(14) It should be noted that notwithstanding the limitation to the 40,000 c.f.s. the plans of the company and the works so far as constructed clearly show and the officers of the company and of the Department of Public Works admit that at all times there has been in contemplation the diversion of the whole flow of the river by this company.

(15) A committee of departmental engineers was constituted, composed of Mr. K. M. Cameron, chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, Mr. D. W. McLachlan, engineer in charge of the St. Lawrence Waterway Project, Mr. J. T. Johnstone, director Dominion Water Power and Reclamation Service and Mr. Louis E. Cote, chief engineer, of the Department of Marine, and on the 30th January, 1929, made a report which is part of Exhibit No. 17, in the file of the Public Works Department 804-1-D.

(16) Certain paragraphs of this report are as follows:

83. The 40,000 c.f.s. diversion project can be authorized without injury to existing navigation, if the plans submitted are subject to modification and to regulations embodying the restrictions referred to in this report.

89. Having regard to the application under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, now under consideration. your committee are of the opinion that the site and works proposed in the plans and application filed by the said company will not impede or interfere with navigation on the St. Lawrence River if the conditions attached hereto are met by the company and, having consideration to the interests of the country as a whole, we are of the opinion that if the works are constructed in accordance with such application and plans subject to the said conditions the same can be efficiently utilized in connection with and as part of any feasible and economical scheme which the Government of Canada may eventually decide upon for the deep waterway development of the St. Lawrence River.

14. The works proposed by the Beauharnois Company consist of the following:

1. A canal extending from Hungry bay, at the foot of lake St. Francis to Melocheville, at the head of lake St. Louis, said canal being contained between banks which are 1,100 feet apart where hard materials are encountered, and 4,100 feet apart, where soft materials are encountered.

2. A power house at Melocheville equipped with ten 50,000 h.p. units.

3. Regulating works at Thorn island and at Leonard island. These are designed to hold up the level of lake St. Francis, when a diversion of 40,000 c.f.s. from that lake is made.

4. A series of works in the four rapid stretches of the river between Thorn island and the head of lake St. Louis. These are designed to maintain existing depths in channels, and also to maintain existing levels at the head and foot of the Cedar rapids works.

15. The works proposed by the Beauharnois Company affect in varying degrees canal navigation, river navigation, power developments, and future plans for a deep waterway.

(17) The committee expressed disapproval of the remedial works and channel improvements and in paragraph 28 stated that the committee while offering the suggestions aforementioned can only recommend approval of these works subject to modifications to meet conditions as experience shows them to be necessary. In paragraph 31, the committee says, "the design of remedial works for use in the rapids below Grande island is not yet worked out in a satisfactory manner." It will thus be seen that the approval of this committee was qualified and that certain of the plans were not in their view sufficient.

(18) On the 8th March, 1929, order in council P.C. 422 was approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the report from the Minister of Public Works. This order in council recites the application of the 17th January, 1928, the deposit of plans, the grant of the emphyteutic lease and the report of the aforementioned engineers.

(19) It sets out twenty-eight conditions, subject to which the recommendation for approval is made.

(20) The committee, on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works, submitted for His Excellency's approval, under section 7, chapter 140, revised statutes of Canada, 1927 —the Navigable Waters Protection Act—(subject to the foregoing conditions and to such additions, improvements, alterations, changes, substitutions, modifications or removals as may be ordered or required thereunder), the annexed plans of works and the site thereof according to the descriptions and plans attached in booklet form, which works were proposed to be constructed by the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company with respect to the diversion of 40,000 c.f.s. from lake St. Francis to lake St. Louis in connection with a power canal to be built by the said company along the St. Lawrence river between the two lakes mentioned.

(21) By reference to the large plan submitted with the application, and referred to in the order in council P.C. 422, and which is Exhibit No. 2A, at will be observed that there are two cross sections shown, one at Mileage 144·3 which shows a width between the embankments of about 1,100 feet, this being typical of the rock section of the work. This cross section also shows a width at the bottom of the deep section of the canal of something over 1,000 feet. In the cross section which is given as typical for each section, at mileage 152.0 the width between the embankments is shown as about 4,100 feet, and the bottom of the deep section, approximately 27 feet, is shown as having a width of about 500 feet.

(22) Subsequently on the 29th July, 1929, modified plans were submitted to the Department of Public Works by the company, and for these there were on the 22nd August, 1930, certain other plans substituted. None of these has as yet received the approval of the Minister of Public Works, although the chief engineer of the department has recommended them for approval. Plans submitted on the 22nd August, 1930, did include plans for the remedial works, but such plans were subsequently withdrawn and as the matter now stands there is now before the department for approval any plan or plans of these remedial works.

(23) On the 10th February, 1931, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company applied to the Quebec authorities for a lease of a further 30,000 cubic feet per second, and has now obtained this right.

(24) On the 25th June, 1929, an agreement was entered into between the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company and His Majesty represented therein by the Minister of Public Works of Canada, Exhibit No. 43, which agreement incorporates the terms and conditions of P.C. 422.

(25) On the 6th November, 1929, the Governor General in Council passed three orders in council, numbers P.C. 2201, 2202 and 2203, authorizing the transfer of three water power leases from the Montreal Cotton Company to the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, and on the 3rd December, 1929, three agreements were entered into between the Montreal Cotton Company, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, and His Majesty represented therein by the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada (Exhibits 7A, 8A and 9A) by virtue of which the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company acquired with the consent of His Majesty the right to use and divert into the canal to be built 13,072 cubic second feet presently used by the Cotton Company at or near Valleyfield under an effective head of about 10 feet.

(26) A difficulty may arise in connection with these three leases by reason of the fact that the Department of Public Works takes the position that under the order in council P.C. 422 there is only authority to grant an opening in the Hungry Bay dyke sufficient to take 40,000 cubic feet a second (see evidence, page 363).

(27) On the 5th December, 1929, the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Quebec passed an order in council authorizing the diversion of this 13,072 feet.

(28) On the 20th March, 1930, the charter of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company was further amended by enactment 20 George V, chapter 136 (Quebec) which extended the expropriation powers of the company so that for the purpose of building its new canal it might "expropriate such lands as may be necessary, not exceeding in all 21 arpents in width."

(29) In the final result, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company appear to have obtained from the Dominion of Canada orders in council purporting to authorize the diversion of 53,072 cubic second feet, subject to their obtaining permission to breach the Hungry Bay dyke sufficiently for that purpose, and subject also to compliance with the conditions of orders in council and the approvals of plans.

(30) They have also obtained from the province of Quebec a 75 year lease for 40,000 cubic second feet, authority from the lieutenant governor in council of Quebec to acquire the use of 13,072 c.s.f. and in 1931 the right to use an additional 30,000 c.s.f.

5. Corporate Organization

(1) There were two syndicates prior to the incorporation of the Beauharnois Power Company Limited, the present holding company, the first being the Beauharnois Syndicate and the second the Beauharnois Power Syndicate. These will be referred to, sometimes, for convenience as the First Syndicate and the Second Syndicate, respectively.

The First Syndicate

(2) About the 12th May, 1927, Mr. Sweezey organized the syndicate known as the Beauharnois syndicate, having 5,000 units or part interests. This syndicate existed until the 4th April, 1928, at which date the holdings were as follows:

(3) The units subscribed for in the name of the Credit Generale du Canada were subscribed and held for senator Donat Raymond.

(3A) 1,000 of the units in the name of Newman, Sweezey & Company, Limited, were held for Frank P. Jones and 50 for Fred M. Connell. The Honourable Walter G. Mitchell had a half interest in Mr. James' holdings.

(4) The units in the name of L. Clare Moyer are said to have been subscribed on behalf of the late Winfield Sifton. Senator Wilfrid L. McDougald states that on the 18th May, 1928, he agreed to acquire them, the transaction being completed about the end of that month.

(5) The units in the name of R. W. Steele were held for the Dominion Securities Corporation.

(6) The price to subscribers Raymond and Moyer was $37.50 per unit and Frank P. Jones acquired 800 of his and Mr. Mitchell's units from Newman, Sweezey & Company, Limited, at the same price.

(7) Of the 900 units in the name of R. O. Sweezey, 600 were issued pursuant to the syndicate agreement for consideration other than cash and the balance of 300 subscribed for at $100 per unit.

(8) The 350 units subscribed for by F. S. Molson were at an average price of $45.71 per unit.

(9) The Newman, Sweezey & Company Limited, units were at an average price of $42.86 and all other subscribers paid at the rate of $100 per unit.

(10) The average price of the 4,400 units sold for cash was $59.32.

The Second Syndicate

(11) On the 4th April, 1928, the Beauharnois Power Syndicate was organized and acquired the assets of the Beauharnois Syndicate, the consideration being two units of the new syndicate for each one unit of the old syndicate with the right to unit holders to subscribe for as many units in the new syndicate as each already held therein at $100 per unit, being the par value thereof.

(12) The members of the Beauharnois Power Syndicate holding 100 or more units or part interests, as on the 17th December, 1929, were as follows:

All of these with the exception of part interests exchanged for holdings of part interests in the first syndicate, and the 2,000 part interests that were used to purchase the shares of the Sterling Corporation, and also except 200 units issued to the Robert heirs, were paid for at the rate of $100 per part interest. These 2,000 units are included above in the holdings of John P. Ebbs.

The 5,200 units in his name were held for Hon. W. L. McDougald, and will be referred to hereafter.

(12A) The capital of the Beauharnois Syndicate consisted of 30,000 units at the par value of $100 each, of which 25,000 were issued.

(13) The tangible assets of the first or Beauharnois Syndicate totalled not over $261,000 as on the 4th April, 1928.

Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company

(14) This company has been in existence since 1902, as previously mentioned. The control passed to Mr. Sweezey and his associates on or about the 3rd February, 1927. Under the agreement of that date (Exhibit No. 60) and according to the minutes of the meeting of the directors held on that day, Mr. H. B. Griffith was elected a director and secretary of the company. It was not, however, until the 13th June, 1927, that a board of directors consisting of Mr. Sweezey and his associates including Mr. R. W. Steele, representing the Dominion Securities Corporation, took charge of the company's affairs.

Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited

(15) This company was incorporated on the 17th September, 1929, by the Ottawa legal firm of McGiverin, Haydon and Ebbs by letters patent under the Dominion Companies Act. It was granted wide powers of acquisition and development of natural resources and in connection with the production, use, distribution or disposal of energy, power, water, light or heat.

(16) The authorized capital stock is five Management Preferred shares without nominal or par value; 1,799,995 Class A common shares without nominal or par value and 3,200,000 Class B non-voting common shares without nominal or par value.

(17) The holders of the five management preferred shares during the ten years next succeeding the date of the letters patent have the exclusive right to vote for the election of directors of the company. At the expiry of this period these automaticaly become Class A common shares.

(18) At a meeting of the company on the 31st October, 1929, held at the office of Messrs. McGiverin, Haydon and Ebbs, in the city of Ottawa, a proposed memorandum of agreement, dated the 31st October, 1929, between the Beauharnois Power Syndicate, the Marquette Investment Corporation and the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited, was submitted providing for the acquisition by the company or its nominees of all the undertakings and assets of the syndicate except unpaid or uncalled balances in respect of purchases of units or part interests of the syndicate. The consideration was

(a) $4,750,000 cash

(b) the assumption by the company of the liabilities and obligations of the syndicate and

(c) the undertaking by the corporation to defray expenses not exceeding $10,000 of the winding up of the affairs of the syndicate and the distribution of its assets amongst the members.

The syndicate, on the other hand, agreed to subscribe at $1 per share for 1,000,000 class A common shares of the company.

(19) It was resolved that this memorandum of agreement be approved and executed on behalf of the company.

(20) The directors present at this meeting were O. F. Howe, and D. K. McTavish, barristers of Ottawa, and the Misses Belle Fraser, Lila Brennan, Edythe H. O'Malley, Bessie Conniffe, Lillian Dell, Elsie M. Burritt, Gwen Gunderson, Kathleen Havey and Mary H. Kelly, stenographers, all of the city of Ottawa.

(21) At this same meeting, according to the minutes, there was authorized a proposed agreement, dated the 31st October, 1929, between Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited of the first part and Newman, Sweezey & Company, Limited, and the Dominion Securities Corporation of the second part, providing for the creation and issue of thirty year 6 per cent collateral trust sinking fund bonds of the company to the authorized principal amount of $30,000,000 and for the sale to Newman, Sweezey & Company, Limited, and the Dominion Securities Corporation of the said bonds, together with 770,000 class A common shares of the company for the price of $27,000,000 and accrued interest of said bonds. This agreement was subsequently ratified by the shareholders at a meeting held on the same day and at the same place, the above named directors being all of the shareholders and all being present.

(22) The agreements were subsequently executed and carried out. The Beauharnois Power

Syndicate was dissolved as of the 17th December, 1929, its tangible assets at that time consisting of the amount paid in—aggregating for the two syndicates $1,561,000. This includes unpaid balances of subscriptions which on the final settlement were deducted from the amounts payable to the individual members, and $20,000 par of units issued to Robert in part payment for Robert's rights.

(23) The tangible consideration received in respect of the 25,000 part interests issued by the Beauharnois Power Syndicate may be shown thus:

Particulars	Part Interests	Amount
Issued to members of Beauharnois Syndicate for the acquisition of the undertaking of that Syndicate	10,000	261,000
Issued for cash consideration	13,000	1,300,000
Issued for the capital stock of Sterling Industrial Corporation Limited	2,000	.....
	25,000	1,561,000

For purposes of exactness, it should perhaps be noted that the above amount of $1,300,000 includes $20,000 in respect of 200 part interests of Beauharnois Power Syndicate issued as fully paid to the Robert Heirs in part consideration of the purchase of the shares of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, etc.

(24) As a result of the agreement above mentioned, the syndicate members receive for each part interest $150, and 40 class A shares of the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited, which class A shares are set up in the books of the company at $1 per share and have had a market value as high as $17 per share, the low price being $4 per share.

(25) On the above basis the cash profit paid to the members of the syndicate would amount to $2,189,000, to which should be added 1,000,000 class A shares, which were purchased by an additional $1,000,000 part of the consideration for the transfer of the syndicate assets. The above mentioned $2,189,000 was paid out of $27,000,000 received from the sale of the bonds and shares under the agreement with Newman, Sweezey and Company, Limited, and the Dominion Securities Corporation.

(26) The Marquette Investment Company is a company controlled by Newman, Sweezey and Company, Limited, and organized for the purpose of acting as trustee and depository and dispersement agent of the Beauharnois syndicate. (Exhibit No. 59).

Subsidiary Companies

(27) There are also the following wholly owned subsidiaries of the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited, in addition to the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, namely:—

The Beauharnois Construction Company, having charge of the actual work of construction under contract; and the

Beauharnois Transmission Company, having to do with the actual transmission lines and the transmission of the electric energy to be produced; the

Beauharnois Land Company, in which is vested the lands of the company, including land acquired in addition to all that required for actual canal construction and which it is hoped to dispose of for industrial sites, residence and other purposes in connection therewith, the

Beauharnois Railway Company, organized to build and operate the construction railway; the Marquette Construction Company, a Delaware corporation, organized to purchase in the United States and lease to the Canadian Construction Company certain machinery which it is hoped to return duty free to the United States after use on the canal, where it is said to be more readily saleable.

6. Authority for Construction Work

(1) According to Mr. Henry, actual construction on the north embankment was commenced on the 7th August, 1929, in the vicinity of lake St. Francis, and on the south embankment on the 23rd April, 1930.

(2) Condition 11 of order in council P.C. 422 provides that the company shall not commence the construction of the works until detailed plans of construction " . . . . have been submitted and approved of by the minister. . . ."

(3) The work as it is being carried out is not in accordance with the plans referred to in this order in council in certain important respects, viz.:

(1) The banks are about 3,300 feet apart, whereas the original plans show a width of about 1,100 feet in the rock section and 4,100 feet in the earth section.

(2) The width at the bottom of the navigation part of the canal is shown in the original plan, Exhibit No. 2a, in one place as considerably less than 600 feet, and in another as considerably more, whereas the actual 27 foot channel is being dug at a bottom width of 600 feet.

(3) The entrance to the canal from lake St. Francis according to the last plan filed on the 22nd August, 1930, and as actually being excavated, is some 3,000 feet northerly and nearer the head of the Cedar rapids than shown on the plan, Exhibit No. 2a.

(4) The remedial works shown on the original plan have not been approved either by order in council or by the minister.

(5) The Hungry bay dyke has been breached and a substitute feeder for the old St. Louis feeder dug on the south side of the proposed canal wholly without governmental authority.

(6) Certain questions have been raised as to the rights to pass order in council P.C. 422:

(1) Does the Navigable Waters Protection Act give the governor general in council the right to authorize the diversion of the water from a navigable river?

(2) Can any of the powers given under that Act to the governor general in council be delegated to a minister, or to anyone?

(3) Is the right of the governor general in council limited to the approval of plans already submitted, i.e., can the governor general in council approve of plans to be submitted in the future.

(4) Can the governor general in council approve of the plans after the work has been done or partly done, or in the alternative is his power limited to approval of work the plans of which have been submitted before the commencement of the work.

(7) Your committee finds as a fact that the work of construction is proceeding according to plans which have not received the approval of the governor in council or of the Minister of Public Works.

7. Hungry Bay Dyke

(1) The province of Canada in 1856 and subsequent year, constructed a dyke along the shore of that part of lake St. Francis known as Hungry bay. This dyke at Confederation passed to the control of the Dominion of Canada, and it has since been maintained through the agency of the Federal Department of Railways and Canals. It will be necessary before water can be diverted to the canal from lake St. Francis that permission be obtained from the crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada to breach this dyke.

(2) An application was made on the 29th day of July, 1929, for a conveyance to the company of that part of the dyke opposite the lands owned by the Beauharnois Company, to the extent of 9,064 feet measured along the dyke. This application is now pending.

8. Ambiguity in Order in Council

(1) Condition number 3 of order in council P.C. 522 provides that "the diversion of water shall not at any time exceed the maximum quantity of 40,000 cubic feet per second." If this means that at no time can the quantity of water diverted exceed 40,000 cubic feet per second, it is doubtful whether 500,000 h.p. can be developed by the use of that quantity of water, even adding thereto the 13,072 cubic second feet obtained by assignment of the Montreal Cotton Company's lease.

(2) Your committee is of the opinion that any ambiguity in this respect should be removed.

9. Control of Water

(1) The present plans do not provide for the control of the water at the entrance to the proposed canal. It has been stated in evidence that for this purpose and for reasons of safety, some method of control should be adopted, whether by way of a dam and gates, or a control lock at this point.

(2) Considerable time was spent by Mr. Henry in an endeavour to establish that proper control could be maintained by the Dominion authorities at the gates leading to the water wheels.

(3) Your committee was impressed with the idea that there should be some means of control at the entrance to the canal.

10. Site of Works

(1) The topography of the locality and the ground at the site of the works are of such a character as to render possible and of comparatively easy attainment the large power development contemplated at a quite reasonable cost.

(2) Your committee is of the opinion that from the physical standpoint a power development on the south shore of the Soulanges section of the St. Lawrence river is fundamentally sound and that with proper safeguards and regulation a navigable canal can be developed synchronously with the power develop- and utilized as a link in the St. Lawrence great waterway, at a reasonable cost to the Dominion of Canada for locks and bridges.

(3) While the present plans are not in accordance with the proposals of the International Joint Board for this section of the river mentioned in their report of 1926, nevertheless, in view of the amount of money already expended, and of the possibility, as we believe, of the utilization of this canal for navigation purposes, we think that from the navigation standpoint the scheme should not be abandoned.

11. Robert A. C. Henry—Vice-President and General Manager

(1) Mr. Henry is an engineer of considerable imagination. He first became interested in the canalization of the Soulanges section of the St. Lawrence river as early as 1922 or 1923. He then discussed the project with Senator McDougald.

(2) This resulted in an arrangement between them by which Mr. Henry was to make an investigation, Senator McDougald agreeing to finance him up to $10,000. As a result, a company called the Sterling Industrial Corporation, Limited, was formed in the office of Messrs. McGiverin, Haydon and Ebbs (Exhibit No 63). The incorporators were Honourable Andrew Haydon, John Parsons Ebbs, and Mary Hilda Kelly, Belle Fraser and Lila Brennan, stenographers, of the city of Ottawa. By the letters patent dated the 5th July, 1924, the company was impowered to carry on the business of an electric light, heat and power company in all its branches and incidentally thereto has wide powers. The authorized capital consists of 500 shares without nominal or par value and the letters patent provide that the company shall carry on business with a capital of $2,500, of which only five shares have ever been issued.

(3) On the same day—the 5th July, 1924—this company made application to the Department of Railways and Canals for the right to divert from the St. Lawrence River 30,000 c.s.f. at lake St. Francis and to use the same for power purposes. On the 7th July, 1924, a similar application was made to the Department of Public Works. The company never acquired any rights and so far as its minutes show never attempted to do anything other than file these applications. To each was attached a plan, Exhibit No. 62, dated Ottawa, 20th June, 1924, and signed John B. McRae, engineer, and having this note on its face, "This plan has been traced from plans made by the department of Railways and Canals."

(4) Mr. Henry joined the Department of Railways and Canals in 1912 as inspecting engineer of railways and structures. He remained in various capacities with that department until 1923 when he joined the Canadian National Railways on the 1st March of that year as Director of Bureau of Economics. He remained with the railways until the 14th February, 1929, when he was appointed Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, by Order in Council, P.C. 192 (Exhibit 76). He held this position until the 10th March, 1930, and was appointed general manager of the Beauharnois Power Comporation, Limited, by agreement, dated the 10th March, 1930. His appointment to the Beauharnois company had evidently been under discussion for some time for Senator McDougald says (Evidence, page 960) that there was an arrangement with him (McDougald) and Mr. Sweezey that Mr. Henry would go in with Beauharnois as soon as he could get away from the Canadian National Railways and that was some time in 1929 and prior to the 13th January of that year, so that Mr. Henry accepted the position of Deputy Minister at a time when he had an arrangement to go in with Beauharnois. Senator McDougald says he was surprised when he saw a report in the newspaper of Mr. Henry's appointment as Deputy Minister—so surprised that he telephoned from London to Canada "because my understanding with Mr. Henry before I left Canada was that he would take up his duties with the Beauharnois company with Mr. Sweezey and myself just as soon as he could make arrangements to get away from the National Railways."

(5) It is worthy of note that the three Orders in Council numbered respectively 2201, 2202 and 2203, approving of the transfer of the leases from the Montreal Cotton Company all dated the 6th November, 1929, each contain the following:—

The minister, on the advice of the chief engineer of the department, concurred in by the Deputy Minister, recommended that authority be given, etc.

(6) Evidence was submitted that Mr. Henry had not been consulted about any matters pertaining to Beauharnois. His position, however, was to say the least, quite anomalous.

(7) The beneficial ownership of the Sterling Industrial Corporation Limited was and always has been in Senator McDougald and Mr. Henry until the transfer thereof to the Beauharnois Power Syndicate pursuant to the agreement dated the 18th December, 1928. By that agreement, Mr. Henry and his partner, Senator McDougald were to receive 2,000 units in the Beauharnois Power Syndicate, conditional on the passing of P.C. 422. It was not until August, 1929, that the actual interests of Senator McDougald and Mr. Henry were agreed upon at 50 per cent each but each affirm that it was always understood that they were partners in the transaction, so that during all of the time Mr. Henry was Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, he had a very substantial interest in the Beauharnois Power Syndicate or, after the 17th December, 1929, in the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited, an interest out of which he made quite substantial profits as will hereafter appear. He was Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals at the time of the passing of the order in council P.C. 422, and was deeply interested in securing the approval of the plans of the Beauharnois project and your committee is asked to believe that he took no active interest in securing the approval of the governor in council. One can easily imagine, however, that in his position as deputy minister he threw no obstacle in the way, once the obstacle or nuisance value of the Sterling application had been determined.

(8) Mr. Henry, at his appointment to the managership of the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited, also obtained 8,995 shares of that company at $1 per share. Your committee is also satisfied that Mr. Henry participated to some extent at least in the withdrawal of company's funds for political purposes.

(9) Mr. Henry's connection with Senator McDougald, and their success in despoiling the company of a large sum of money or money's worth for something that on the evidence was entirely worthless, does not commend him to your committee as a fit and proper person to continue in the management of this great public utility.

12. Mr. R. O. Sweezey

(1) Mr. Sweezey seems to have been the principal promoter of the Beauharnois project. He is now president of the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited, and is a civil engineer by profession.

(2) In 1912 he was engaged by the Royal Securities Corporation to investigate certain water powers, and in 1913 was instructed by the present Lord Beaverbrook, the then president of the Royal Securities, to investigate the water-power now known as Beauharnois. A copy of his report is filed as Exhibit No. 123.

(3) Mr. Sweezey states that in 1925 or 1926, Mr. Narcisse M. Cantin brought the matter again to his attention and it is stated by Mr. Cantin in his evidence, and not denied by Mr. Sweezey, that from the 4th April, 1925, to December of 1926, Mr. Sweezey was chief engineer of the Transportation and Power Corporation Limited, the Cantin company.

(4) As early as the 14th October, 1926, Mr. Sweezey had conceived the idea of forming a syndicate to take up the Beauharnois project, and his ideas of how to go about it are outlined in a letter written by him to Mr. Alderic Raymond, brother of Senator Raymond, on that date. In this letter he states: "To place ourselves in possession of all the rights essential to this undertaking we should pursue the following course:

"1. Acquire the Robert rights which are fundamental in regard to an initial grant which he holds to divert 40,000 c.f.s. He also holds rights granted by charter to expropriate for the proposed canal route. Numerous other incidental rights are included in his holdings which he is anxious to sell, though he wishes to participate partially in the organization syndicate.

2. Acquire the control of the St. Lawrence Waterways and Power Company stock, which is available to us, and upon which we have already a substantial hold.

3. Enlist with our syndicate two or three individuals, who in addition to providing some cash as their fair share, can assist us in getting our rights extended or enlarged so as to develop the entire available flow of the St. Lawrence at this point. As the whole situation is entirely within the province of Quebec, our influence has to be exerted only in Canadian political circles—that is, at Ottawa and at Quebec. He further says: "In connection with personnel of syndicate, I have in mind the individuals we should enlist with us. . . . I have hesitated to accept anyone definitely until certain that each and every one is persona grata to all others."

(5) Asked as to who the persons he had in mind were, he at first could not remember. When later recalled and confronted with his answers on a former occasion under oath, he admitted that they were Senator Raymond, Hon. W. G. Mitchell, and Frank J. Jones, the latter of whom was desirable only for his ability to help with the finances.

(6) It is obvious, therefore, that from the very threshold of this undertaking he had in mind that he had to associate with him men who could exert influence in political circles at Ottawa and at Quebec. How well he succeeded remains to be seen.

(7) He states that he had talks with Senator McDougald, "and I was trying to get from Senator McDougald his view as to what the difficulties would be in overcoming the political work to be done." This was probably in 1925 or 1926.

(8) Mr. Sweezey succeeded in enlisting the help of all these gentlemen, first Senator Raymond, who was a subscriber for 800 part interests or units in the first syndicate through the Credit Generale du Canada; Hon. Walter Mitchell, who was an equal partner with Mr. Jones in the units purchased by Mr. Jones from Newman, Sweezey & Company; and Mr. Jones himself; and ultimately Senator McDougald, who agreed to join the ranks on the 18th May, 1928.

(9) On the formation of the first syndicate Mr. Sweezey obtained 600 part interests for his activities up to that time, and he subscribed and paid for 300 units at $100 per unit. On the transfer of the assets to the second syndicate, his holdings doubled in number, and at the period of distribution, as of the 17th December, 1929, he appears by the books to have been the holder of 1,000 part interests.

(10) Mr. Sweezey's idea from first to last seems to have been that in order to secure the approval of the authorities at Quebec and Ottawa, it was necessary to deal with a lavish hand with his own moneys and those of the companies concerned. In pursuance of this idea he proceeded to employ a formidable array of legal talent, resulting ultimately in the payment up to the 31st December, 1930, of so called legal fees amounting to $436,000.

(11) The bills of some of these legal gentlemen show that the work was not of a strictly legal nature, and consisted to a certain extent of lobbying, and in fact one fee of $50,000 to Senator Haydon's firm was made contingent upon the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company obtaining approval of its plans.

(12) Mr. Sweezey was also, in association with Mr. H. B. Griffith and at least two other unnamed directors, the instrument by which approximately $300,000 of company funds were misused, as he alleges for campaign purpose. This is surely contrary to the purposes for which these moneys were borrowed from the public through the issue and sale of the company's bonds.

(13) Your committee considers that Mr. Henry as general manager and Mr. H. B. Griffith, as secretary-treasurer, and director of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, and other subsidiaries, are involved in this misuse of company funds. Mr. Sweezey's further activities in respect to campaign funds will be dealt with in a separate paragraph.

(14) According to the evidence of Senator McDougald, Mr. Sweezey and he had arranged that Mr. Henry should join the Beauharnois Company and the matter had been discussed prior to the death of the then Deputy Minister Grahame Bell, which occurred on the 13th January, 1929. It is, therefore, obvious that Mr. Sweezey must have released him from this arrangement and agreed to Mr. Henry's joining the Department of Railways and Canals at a time when he, Mr. Sweezey, knew that Mr. Henry had arranged to become interested as an employee of Beauharnois and this at a time when Mr. Henry, as the partner of Senator McDougald in the Sterling transaction, had acquired a substantial interest in the Beauharnois power syndicate.

13. Campaign Funds

(1) Mr. R. O. Sweezey has admitted in his evidence that he was responsible for the following contributions:—

(2) For contributions for political purposes aggregating $864,000 and which includes the sum of $125,000 paid to John Aird Jr., of which mention will be made hereafter. Of this total, approximately $300,000 were Company funds and the balance was raised by Mr. Sweezey personally and probably at least in part came out of the large profit made on the sale of the syndicate assets to the Beauharnois Power Corporation and, therefore, indirectly out of the moneys borrowed on the sale of the company's bonds. Mr. Sweezey states (Evidence page 821) that he contributed personally to the Liberal party "somewhere around $600,000 to $700,000." This large sum was paid to Senators Haydon and Raymond. On page 822, Mr. Sweezey says that the total contributions to the Liberal party would run up well over $700,000 and in this there was included a sum stated by Mr Sweezey to be in the neighbourhood of $100,000 and by Mr. Griffith to be about $120,000, which were company funds.

(3) Mr. Sweezey is unable to state how much was paid to them but he and Mr. Griffith agree that out of the sums paid to Senator Raymond, the Liberal party of the province of Quebec was to be taken care of. Mr. Sweezey says that he has no knowledge of how much went to the province of Quebec nor does he tell how much of the total amount was paid each of these two senators. He, however, ventures the statement that the amount received by Senator Raymond might have been in the neighbourhood of $200,000.

(4) On page 822, Mr. Sweezey is asked the question, "Then you spoke of contributions to the Conservative party. What amounts were they and to whom were they paid"? Answer—"They were small amounts. Some of them were to help personal friends whom I had been helping, as a matter of fact, for a number of years in their campaign work." Mr. Sweezey spoke of contributing $6,000 to the campaign of Mr. Leslie Bell and Mr. Bell in his return under the Dominion Elections Act is said to have published this contribution, as required by section 80 of such act. Contributions were also made, according to the testimony of Mr. Sweezey and Mr. Griffith, to General McCuaig, understood to be a collector for the Conservative campaign fund in Montreal, of $10,000. Mr. Sweezey is not clear as to whether there were any further contributions to the campaign fund of this party. Mr. Griffith, however, states that there was a contribution to Mr. Cartier and that the total contributions to Conservative candidates or party organizers were $25,000. Mr. Sweezey, on the other hand, thinks that the amount was $30,000 but refers to Mr. Griffith for the correct amount.

(5) Contributions were also made to Mr. W. R. P. Parker, president of the Ontario Liberal Association amounting to about $3,000. There was also a suggestion with reference to a proposed contribution to the Conservative federal campaign fund through its organizer, General McRae. This, however, was not made. Asked if the reason for its not having been made was that Mr. Bennett would not accept it, Mr. Sweezey in his reply said "I do not know that but I presume that may be so."

(6) There appears to have been a contribution of $20,000 to Mr. Cartier on behalf of the Conservative party of the province of Quebec, but it does not appear clearly whether this was included in the sum of $30,000 above mentioned or in addition thereto. This item of $20.000 appears in a cheque of the Marquette Investment Corporation, dated the 7th March, 1931, payable to cash, endorsed by Mr. Sweezey and charged to accounts receivable, in respect thereto Mr. Sweezey says, "I think probably that must be the item contributed to the Conservative party in Quebec."

(7) Asked by Mr. Jacobs who got that money, the answer was, "That went to the funds of the Conservative party." Asked who received the money Mr. Sweezey states, "Mr. Cartier, I understand it was on behalf of Mr. Houde's party."

The John Aird, Jr. Payment

(8) This leaves but one further item to be discussed—the sum of $125,000 paid by Mr. Griffith at the direction of Mr. Sweezey to Mr. John Aird, Jr., of Toronto. This sum, as to $120,000 thereof, was procured by a rather ingenious device; Mr. Griffith purchased 8,000 shares of the Marquette Construction Company, at $5 a share, for $40,000, and immediately purported to sell them to the Beauharnois Construction Company at $20 a share, for $160,000, and took out the difference, $120,000 in cash, which he used to purchase through Newman, Sweezey & Company, Dominion of Canada bonds at a par value of $120,000.

(9) Mr. Sweezey says (page 823): "I know we made a contribution to someone who represented himself as standing up for an Ontario fund of this kind," and that this representation was made to him by Mr. John Aird, Jr. Asked what Mr. Aird said, Mr. Sweezey's answer is: "That he thought a contribution would be in order to the Ontario Conservative party because we would probably be having a lot more dealings with the Ontario people and that gratefulness was always regarded as an important factor in dealing with democratic governments."

(10) The delivery of the bonds is said to have taken place some substantial time after the last Ontario general election, and the conversation between Mr. Aird and Mr. Sweezey is said to have occurred some months before the delivery of the bonds, which were handed over on the 6th December, 1929.

(11) Mr. Aird says in his evidence that the first interview with Mr. Sweezey took place at the Ritz Carleton Hotel, Montreal, in the early fall of 1929, at a time when the Beauharnois organization was negotiating for a contract for the sale of electric power to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission from whom they obtained a contract for 250,000 h.p. at $15 per h.p., on or about the 21st November, 1929.

(12) Mr. Aird, (evidence page 844) is asked whether the receipt of these bonds was on behalf of any political party, and his answer is "No." Asked on whose behalf it was, his answer is: "On my own." Asked this question: "Was it on behalf of anybody, or was anybody interested but John Aird, junior, personally in these particular bonds to the extent of $120,000?" his answer is: "No, sir, decidedly not."

(13) On page 847 of the Evidence there appears the following:

By Mr. Jacobs:

Q. It was not your intention to turn this over to the organization at all?—A. No, I did not give Mr. Sweezey any communication that I was going to do so.

Q. You swear to that?—A. Yes.

(14) On page 849, by Mr. Jacobs:

Q. You would swear you did not, directly or indirectly, represent to Mr. Sweezey that you were an emissary of the conservative political organization in Toronto?—A. Yes.

Q. You swear to that?—A. Yes, I do.

(15) Mr. Aird states that he belonged to no political organization of any kind and had not taken any interest in party politics, and also that the arrangement between him and Mr. Sweezey was purely a personal one between the two of them.

(16) Whether the truth lies on one side or the other, it is clear there is no evidence before the committee that would indicate that any of these bonds have reached any political organization, or any person authorized to receive campaign funds.

(17) Mr. Aird's statement is supported by the evidence of various bank officials as per details set out hereunder. Mr. Aird further stated that the coupons were personally collected by Mr. Aird. (Evidence page 974).

(18) The evidence establishes that the $120,000 par of bonds handed to Mr. Aird by Mr. Griffith on the 6th December, 1929, have been dealt with as follows:

(A) Held for safekeeping or as collateral by the Royal Bank of Canada, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and the Bank of Nova Scotia		$ 65,000

SUMMARY OF SALES

Bonds originally obtained from Griffith	$ 5,000
Grand Trunk Pacific £500 say	2,500
Toronto Harbour Commission	5,000
	$ 12,500

Mr. Aird's evidence is that the proceeds of bonds sold were expended for his personal purposes.

(19) Neither Mr. Sweezey nor Mr. Griffith pretended to speak with exactitude as to the actual amount of moneys contributed for political purposes. In this connection Mr. Sweezey says: "It was a very distasteful thing to me and I personally preferred not to know or remember much about it."

(20) Your committee considers that return should be made immediately of any moneys improperly taken from the companies' funds for political subscriptions by those responsible for their extraction.

(21) It is also to be observed that no pretence is made that the personal subscriptions were because of the adherence of Mr. Sweezey to any particular party and we are of the opinion that they were shamelessly wastefully and needlessly made for the express purpose of obtaining favourable consideration of the company's proposals to the government.

(22) That Mr. Sweezey was solicited for these contributions appears on page 822 of the evidence, where in answer to Mr. Lennox he states: "I could not deliver that amount of money in one fell swoop. I had to scratch it up where I could from time to time." Further on, in speaking of the $10,000 campaign fund to General McCuaig, Mr. Lennox remarked: "You did not treat us very generously." Mr. Jacobs: "The fact that the party is in power is some indication." Witness: "They did not press me so hard, sir."

(23) The evidence on page 826:

By Mr. Lennox:

Q. You said Senators Raymond and Haydon were designated as the proper persons to whom you should pay this fund? Who designated them?" Answer: "Nobody specifically designated them; I just happened to know it; they came and told me they were."

14. Senator Haydon

(1) The first connection of Senator Haydon with the Beauharnois project appears to be in 1924, when his firm incorporated for Senator McDougald and Mr. Henry the Sterling Industrial Corporation on the 5th July of that year and made the application of that company to the two departments of the government for the right to divert 30,000 c.f.s.

(2) His firm was retained by Mr. Sweezey for the Beauharnois power syndicate in the fall of 1928 under somewhat peculiar circumstances.

(3) Senator Haydon has been a member of the Senate since March 11, 1924, and was known to Mr. Sweezey to be a member of the Liberal party who collected campaign funds. The retainer was of an unusual character. The firm demanded in excess of $30,000 per year but Mr. Sweezey demurred and finally arranged that the firm of McGiverin, Haydon and Ebbs would be paid the sum of $50,000, conditionally upon approval of its application by the governor in council. On October 3, 1928, this firm received a cheque from the Marquette Investment Company for $7,500 for legal services. On page 728, Mr. Sweezey says in an interview with Mr. McGiverin, "However, by a compromise I agreed that if the thing got through, I would prefer to pay on that basis; if it went through I would pay him $50,000, and a retainer for three years at $15,000. . . . it is human nature to work harder at a price." Asked, in the event of failure what would happen, Mr. Sweezey's answer was "Well, he would have his expenses. At least I presumed that he would have to have his expenses. . . . I was sure he would charge me something for it." This arrangement was apparently made, according to Mr. Sweezey, some time prior to the 2nd October, 1928 (Evidence page 729).

(4) On the 2nd October, 1928, a transfer was made to Mr. Ebbs of the Haydon firm, from Mr. Clare Moyer of the interest Mr. Moyer then held in the Beauharnois power syndicate for Senator McDougald.

(5) Mr. Ebbs, Senator Haydon's partner, acted as syndicate manager for some time representing Senator McDougald. The order in council was approved, Senator Haydon's firm was paid $50,000 and thereafter received several cheques in pursuance of the arrangement made with Mr. Sweezey by which that firm was to be paid a retainer of $15,000 per year.

(6) Senator Haydon was a man of note and standing in his party and was recognized as one of the official organizers of the Liberal party in Canada. Senator Haydon became the recipient from Mr. Sweezey and the Beauharnois company of sums of money for campaign purposes, said to be in excess of half a million dollars, and it is also to be noted that throughout this firm did not render any detailed bill for professional services, as shown by the vouchers (Exhibit Nos. 85 to 87 inclusive).

(7) In these circumstances, your committee is of opinion that the acceptance of the abovementioned contingent retainer and of the $50,000 involved, and of the campaign funds by Senator Haydon cannot be defended and is strongly condemned.

15. Senator Raymond

(1) Senator Raymond was appointed to the Senate on the 20th December, 1926. He, voluntarily, after the permission of the Senate had been granted, appeared before the committee on the afternoon of the 16th July, 1931, and stated that he had subscribed on the 1st April, 1927, at the suggestion of Hon. Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Frank P. Jones, for 800 units of the Beauharnois syndicate at a price of $30,000, which he paid. These became 1,600 units in the second syndicate and as was his right, he subscribed for 1,600 further units, in the name of J. R. Lefebvre, and made his holdings 3,200 units. On the whole transaction he realized as of the 17th December, 1929, $529,600 profit and 14,040 shares of class A stock of the Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited. Senator Raymond sold all his originally acquired units at the same time that Mr. Frank P. Jones sold his at $550 per unit, and later Senator Raymond bought from W. G. Mitchell 350 units and from R. T. Fuller one unit in the Beauharnois Power Syndicate and he held these at the dissolution of the syndicate on the 17th December, 1929. His total profit was as above mentioned. He states that neither at Quebec nor at Ottawa did he exert or attempt any political influence on behalf of the Beauharnois applications. His evidence is that he "did nothing to push the deal." On page 794 of the evidence, Senator Raymond was asked:

Q. Then are we to understand you to say, that having this interest in this project and knowing that there was a very strong opposition and a big fight being put up, you never turned a hand to help it at all?—A. I do not know if there was anything in my power to do towards helping it.

Q. Well, you could help?—A. I thought the only help that I could give was to put my money in.

Q. I may take it then, from what you say, that we have your unequivocal statement that at no time did you attempt to exert your personal influence on behalf of this project?—A. At no time.

(2) At the conclusion of his evidence one of the members of the committee expressed the view that he ought to be commended for his frankness in giving his evidence. It was, however, later disclosed in evidence that according to the bill of Messrs. Geoffrion and Prud'homme, counsel for the Beauharnois Syndicate (Exhibit No. 114) from September 10, 1927, to May 23, 1928, there appear some sixteen entries charging for interviews with and telephones to and from Senator Raymond. An interview appears to have taken place on one occasion with Hon. Mr. Mitchell and on another occasion in Ottawa with Senator McDougald.

(3) On page 391, Mr. Frank P. Jones states "I certainly asked Senator Raymond over and over again if he could not do something to get some action."

(4) It transpired when Mr. Sweezey returned to give further evidence that Senator Raymond had received from Mr. Sweezey some $200,000 of campaign funds for the Liberal party. The commmendable frankness would seem to require that Senator Raymond should have disclosed this to the committee if he wished the committee to understand that he was stating fairly his connection between the government and the Beauharnois promoters.

(5) In view of Mr. Sweezey's attitude throughout and his views as to the necessity for political influence, it is hardly conceivable that Mr. Sweezey would pay this large sum of money over to Senator Raymond unless he at least was satisfied that the Senator's influence had been or would be worth the money and it is remarkable that Sanator Raymond did not insist on making some explanation of his position in this regard, in view of the evidence.

16. Senator Wilfrid Laurier McDougald

(1) Senator McDougald was first summoned to the Senate on the 25th June, 1926, but owing to the dissolution of Parliament was not then sworn in and his appointment lapsed. He was again summonded in October of that same year and was sworn in the following year. Since 1922, except for a short interval in 1926, until 1930, Senator McDougald occupied the position of chairman of the Montreal Harbour Board and, as he stated in evidence, assumed a position of high responsibility in connection with the development of the St. Lawrence Deep Waterway.

(2) In May, 1924, the then Dr. McDougald was appointed a member of the National Advisory Committee, whose membership included the Honourable G. P. Graham, as chairman, and Honourable Clifford Sifton, and several gentlemen interested in existing hydro-electric power developments.

(3) On the 20th April, 1928, Senator McDougald was appointed a member of the Special Committee of the Senate to inquire into and report from time to time on the matter of the development and improvement of the St. Lawrence River for the purposes of navigation and production of electric current and power and matters incidental to such a project. That committee held several meetings in the month of May, 1928, and to which reference will be made more specifically hereafter.

(4) In 1923, Mr. McDougald became associated with Mr. R. A. C. Henry, as has been previously pointed out in this report, and as a result the Sterling Industrial Corporation Limited was incorporated and applications made to the Departments of Public Works and Railways and Canals on the 5th and 7th July, 1924, as already indicated.

(5) From this small beginning, the interests of Senator McDougald have expanded until at the time of his giving his evidence he was chairman of the Board of the Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, elected on the 20th of December, 1929, the holder of Management Preferred shares; a director of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, the Beauharnois Construction Company, the Beauharnois Land Company, and the Beauharnois Transmission Company.

(6) This expansion is almost comparable to the present Beauharnois project as compared with the original St. Louis feeder.

(7) The application of the Sterling Industrial Corporation was allowed to lie dormant until some time in 1928. On the 18th of May, 1928, senator McDougald agreed to take over 800 units of the first syndicate which had been subscribed for by Mr. Clare Moyer on the 4th of April, 1928, the day upon which that syndicate was dissolved, and upon which day a payment of $15,000 was made by Mr. Moyer, of moneys which he says he received in cash from Mr. Winfield Sifton. A further payment was made on the 18th of May, in an amount of $15,000 out of moneys which Mr. Moyer says were received by him from Mr. Sifton by way of a bank draft containing no information as to the person who was providing the funds.

(8) The 800 units thus acquired by senator McDougald became 1,600 units on the formation of the second syndicate, and he, in the name of Mr. Moyer, subscribed as he had the right to do for 1,600 more units at a price of $100 per unit, and for which he agreed to pay $160,000 and on which at the dissolution of the syndicate on the 17th December, 1929, he had paid $80,000.

(9) In the meantime, however, namely on the 2nd October, 1928, these had been transferred from Mr. Moyer to Mr. John P. Ebbs, a member of the Haydon firm, by reason of some instructions from senator McDougald, about which there seems to be some insolvable mystery, and about which there need not have been any mystery at all if the transactions were an ordinary business one.

(10) As previously pointed out, senator McDougald through his representative, Mr. Ebbs, acquired for the five issued shares of the capital stock of the Sterling Industrial Corporation, Limited, 2,000 part interests in the second syndicate. These units were given for a corporation the rights of which, as has been pointed out by Mr. Cameron, chief engineer of the Public Works department, on page 1019 of the evidence, "would be of no value." The agreement was made in the fall of 1928, and the Beauharnois company considered these shares to be of such value that they still remain endorsed in blank, and have never been transferred on the books of the company. It can hardly be pretended that this company had any value, even as suggested, any "nuisance value" or was or could be thought to be any serious obstacle in itself to the application of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company to the governor general in council then pending. If so, there were two former applications in the department, one of which at least was based on an alleged acquisition of the Robert rights, which rights were the foundation of the Beauharnois application. Still, the carrying out of the agreement was made conditional upon favourable action by the governor general in council, and it is beyond belief that had that company not been owned by Senator McDougald, who represented himself to be a close friend of the administration, and R. A. C. Henry, soon destined to become deputy minister of Railways and Canals, or others equally influential, the Beauharnois Power Syndicate would have hardly considered paying for it even the nominal amount that had been subscribed as its capital stock, much less 2,000 units, which ultimately became $300,000 in money and 80,000 shares of the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited but would doubtless have received the same consideration as was accorded the other prior applicants—namely, the privilege of being completely ignored.

(11) It is suggested that the handing over of this large number of units was in order to induce Mr. Henry to go over to the Beauharnois Company. Why any inducement, other than a doubling of his salary which actually occurred, should have been necessary in order to induce the man who had for at least six or seven years been most anxious to be connected with a Beauharnois project is difficult to understand, and your committee cannot accept that as the explanation. On the contrary we are convinced that the "nuisance value" consisted in the necessity of a large inducement to Senator McDougald in order that he, a possible obstacle in the attainment of the objects of the syndicate, might become so vitally interested therein that any possible opposition on his part might be obviated.

(12) That Senator McDougald was a factor in the success of this venture is apparent from the proceedings of the special committee of the Senate above referred to, of which he was a member. It appears that on the 31st of May, 1928, he was instrumental in having Mr. Henry, then his partner in the Sterling company, come before that committee and answer certain questions. These questions had (see page 215 of the proceedings) been prepared beforehand by Senator McDougald and submitted to Mr. Henry.

(13) Mr. Sweezey in his evidence makes it very clear that the reason for his having done some of the extraordinary things which he did do was that time was of great importance from the standpoint of financing the enterprise, owing to the threatened financial crisis.

(14) On the 25th May, 1928, Mr. Aime Geoffrion, chief counsel for the Beauharnois syndicate, and who according to his bill for professional services had a number of interviews, starting on the 17th December, 1927, with Senator McDougald, wrote to Senator McDougald urging that there was "no reason for delaying the application to the Dominion Executive for approval of the Beauharnois plans under the Navigable Waters Act."

(15) The last question which Senator McDougald asked Mr. Henry on this occasion, on the 31st of May, 1928, was as follows:

(Page 232 of the committee's proceedings).

Hon. Mr. McDougald: The last question which I have, Mr. Henry, is, in your opinion should the improvement of the St. Lawrence waterway be gone on with as soon as possible, and if so, why?

It is to be recalled that thirteen days previously, on his own testimony, senator McDougald had agreed to become interested in this enterprise to the extent of 800 part interests in the Beauharnois syndicate.

(16) On the 19th of April, 1928, Senator McDougald in a speech delivered by him from his place in the Senate stated: "I want to say here, and to say it with emphasis, that I do not own a dollar's worth of stock in this enterprise, and have no interest in or association with that company in any way, shape or form". . . "So far as I myself I am concerned I cannot add too much emphasis to my denial of the suspicions and aspersions which these despatches" (referring to despatches of the Toronto Mail and Empire and the Globe of April 18, 1928) "have cast upon me as a member of the advisory committee, as a member of this honourable body, and as a private citizen."

(17) On the 20th of May, 1931, senator McDougald, in referring to his former statement on this subject, and the date thereof, the 19th of April, 1928, made the following statement from his place in the Senate: "Honourable members of the Senate, before the orders of the day I rise on a question of privilege. According to the newspapers of this morning my honour and integrity as a member of this house have been attacked in another place, and I desire to draw attention at once to a statement which I made in the Senate in April, 1928, regarding my position in the much-discussed Beauharnois Power Company. Newspaper articles had reflected on myself and other members of the National advisory committee reporting on the St. Lawrence Waterways. It was insinuated that our decisions and recommendations were influenced by personal interest in power development on the St. Lawrence. In this house I stated at the time that I had no interest in the Beauharnois Power Company or in the syndicate. That was absolutely true and correct. I may say at once that up to that time. . ." (that is April, 1928) "I had been invited on many occasions to become a member of that syndicate but had always declined. After that date I was asked again, and had the whole project investigated from every angle. When I was satisfied that it was a proper project for me as a member of this Senate, as a business man, and as a citizen of Canada, to take a financial interest in, I agreed to do so. Some six months later, in October, 1928, I took an interest in the Beauharnois Syndicate."

(18) On page 930 of the evidence appear these questions and answers:

By the Chairman:

Q. That is not a correct statement, Senator, I suggest to you?—A. I suggest, sir, that is is a correct statement.

Q. Then your evidence yesterday was wrong, because you bought from Sifton in May?—A. I did not appear in it until October, Mr. Ebbs was my representative in October, and I became active in it in October.

Q. Is that your explanation for that statement?—A. That is my explanation for that statement. I was in the syndicate—

Q. Why, of course you were in the syndicate; here is your evidence?—A. The end of May, 1930, and not when I made the speech in the Senate.

Q. You say in your speech, distinctly that in October, 1928, you first took an interest in the Beauharnois Syndicate. Yesterday in your sworn testimony you admitted that you had purchased from Sifton in May, 1928?—A. That is correct.

Q. I suggest to you that your statement in the Senate was entirely wrong?—A. It may have been ambiguous, but it was not wrong. What I meant was I came into it in October through Mr. Ebbs. That is the first time I came into it. . ."

Q. Just before you go on with that, Mr. White, I want to complete the question I was putting to the Senator a moment ago (to the witness). While you were making this ambiguous speech, as you call it now, in the Senate on the 20th May, 1931, of course you were interested with Mr. Henry in the Sterling Industrial Corporation— —A. That is right.

(19) Further in his speech on the 20th May, 1931, Senator McDougald said: "I might add that I paid into the syndicate dollar for dollar with every other member of it."

(20) As previously pointed out in this report, Senator McDougald, Senator Raymond, and Mr. Frank Jones, bought their units in the first syndicate for many fewer dollars per share than any other of the members, except possibly Mr. Sweezey who got some of his for a consideration other than cash.

(21) It is also significant that Senator McDougald received considerable sums of money from the company for travelling expenses.

(22) How one holding the high offices to which he had been called, as chairman of the Montreal Harbour Board, member of the National Advisory Committee on St. Lawrence Waterways, a senator of Canada, and a member of the special committee of the Senate, above referred to, and as he himself has stated, having a high regard for his public duties, should allow his private interest to so interfere with his public duty that he found it necessary, speaking from his place in the Senate to be "ambiguous" and incorrect, it is difficult for your committee to understand.

(23) Senator McDougald's actions in respect to the Beauharnois project cannot be too strongly condemned.

17. Mr. James B. Hunter, deputy minister of Public Works, and Mr. Kenneth McKenzie Cameron, chief engineer of that department were called as witnesses and gave evidence. The committee desires to say that the evidence of neither of these officers appeared to be given in the manner which one might expect from departmental officials.

Further items in Exhibit No. 127 are:—

An unaudited statement of the 31st of May, 1931, exhibit No. 128, as compared with the Consolidated Balance Sheet as of the 31st December, 1930, disclosed that the property account had increased by $5,781,185.74 to a total of $34,550,002.27, as compared with $28,768,816.53.

The Royal Trust Company escrow fund had been decreased by $1,430,396.67 for payments made to the Company for outgoings. Cash on hand had decreased by $113,857.31.

(2) In the liabilities the most important increase is a bank loan of $3,500,000 secured by the hypothecation of $5,250,000 of bonds of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, being part of an issue of $20,000,000 bonds authorized for temporary purposes on the 15th day of January, 1931. At present the bank loans are, according to Mr. Griffith, about $6,000,000 secured by the hypothecation of $9,000,000 of these bonds.

(3) Accrued interest of bonds had been decreased by $150,000 which means that having regard to the monthly accrual of interest amounting to $150,000 in the interval between December 31, 1930, and May 31, 1931, $900,000 of bond interest had been paid. Miscellaneous accounts payable had increased by $881,770.75 to an amount of $1,355,252.35.

(4) As the situation now stands, the promoters of the Beauharnois Project involving the exploitation of a great natural resource have been able to secure to themselves a return of all moneys advanced by them or any of them, a profit of $2,189,000 in cash and 1,000,000 class A common shares, which, if saleable at the market quotation would at one time have been worth $17,000,000 and at to-day's quotation of $4 per share, would be worth $4,000,000. This cash profit was paid out of moneys borrowed by the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited by the sale of its bonds.

(5) According to Mr. Henry, in order to complete the project up to the point where 500,000 h.p. will be produced, they will require a further sale of bonds in a capital amount of $46,000,000. If this were accomplished the power project would have been constructed completely on borrowed money and the promoters would be in control of this vast enterprise owning 1,620,000 of the class A shares out of a total issue of 1,799,995 and also the 5 Management Preferred shares which for 10 years give to the under-writers practical control of the company's affairs and all of this without the present investment of any money.

Your committee recommends:

1. That the parliament of Canada take such action as may be within its power, and without prejudicing the rights of the province of Quebec, to procure the development of this project in such a manner as will best serve the people of Canada.

2. That should the rights of the Dominion and the province of Quebec come in conflict, every effort be put forth to arrive at a satisfactory agreement, so that the project may not be imperilled by delay.

3. That definite action be taken to preserve the rights of navigation and the complete jurisdiction of parliament in respect thereto.

4. That the order of reference, the reports of the committee, the minutes of proceedings, the minutes of the evidence taken, and the exhibits filed, be printed as an appendix to the Journals of the House.

5. That a copy of this report be remitted to the Speaker of the Senate for the information of that house.

6. That such of the exhibits as have not been read into the record and are not on departmental files and were referred to be copied and the originals thereof be returned to the person producing the same.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Cold storage warehouses, $453,708.08.

Mr. TAYLOR: How much is included in this vote for additional cold storage at Simcoe?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The amount is $15,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I presume that a large portion of this amount is to take care of contracts already entered into. Assuming that that is right, I would ask the minister if he had not sufficient applications to obligate his spending the same amount of money as last year. In other words, why is there this reduction of $46,000? Are there not sufficient applications of a bona fide nature to justify the same expenditure as last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A number of them have notified us that they are not carrying on their contracts, and the payments will not have to be made this year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Are there any new contracts this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What are they?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are as follows:

Federal Warehouse, Windsor, Ont.
Norfolk Fruit Growers Association, Simcoe, Ont.
Prince Edward Fruit Growers Limited, Picton, Ont.
Thedford Cold Storage Company, Thedford, Ont.
La Sarre Creamery, La Sarre, Que.
Georgian Bay Fruit Growers Limited, Thornbury, Ont.
Gagnon and Dufour, St. Felicien, Que.
Le Poisson de Gaspe, Barachois, Que.
Trenton Cold Storage, Trenton, Ont.
Penticton Cooperative Growers, Penticton, B.C.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why is there a reduction of $46,291.92 as compared with last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have just explained that some of the contracts that have been entered into and accepted are not being carried out this year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the list the minister has just read make up the total amount of the vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not entirely. There are some applications pending.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are the payments that are to be made all under the Cold Storage Act? I understand that in the past the government has made payments not under the Cold Storage Act. Is it proposed to continue that practice?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This year we are just making commitments under the Cold Storage Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is for the present fiscal year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Fruit, including grant of $8,000 to Canadian Horticultural Council, $502,200.

Mr. YOUNG: In this item is included a grant of $8,000 to the Canadian Horticultural Council. I have here the Dominion government telephone directory, and I notice in it this name: L. F. Burrows, 114 Vittoria street, centre block 772. This man Burrows is secretary of the Canadian Horticultural Council. I would ask the minister how his telephone comes to be connected with the exchange of this building, and what he pays for it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In previous years when this association was formed and the grant was made, it was agreed that we would supply the council with an office and telephone service.

Mr. YOUNG: They are to have a free office in this government building at 114 Vittoria street?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That has been the practice in the past.

Mr. YOUNG: I know it, and they also get free telephone service, connected with the government exchange. As I understand it, this association was organized some years ago to promote the interests of horticulture in this country, but it was not long until they degenerated into a political organization. The secretary of this association carried on within the walls of this very building an active lobby against the late government. I know it, for he admitted it when I accused him of doing it. He and that association are responsible for a large amount of the protectionist propaganda that has been circulated among the farmers during the past few years. This association is not representative of the horticulturists of this country. It includes in its organization those engaged in horticulture and also those engaged in the commercial handling of horticultural products. At the annual meeting of the Canadian Horticultural Council last winter, the Ontario Horticultural Association decided to withdraw from this association entirely because of its political activities. I have before me a copy of the report of the convention. Mr. Carter of Guelph is reported as follows:

As your representative since the time the horticultural council was organized in 1922, and just to make myself right in regard to a statement made by Mr. Saunders, that if your representative had brought forward something there would probably have been something doing, I might state that the council, in my opinion, would be a wonderful organization for this society but not until such time as you people demand something more than what your representative can get for you to-day. The Canadian Horticultural Council was established for the purpose of helping horticulture in all its branches. Its branches extend to the canners, basket makers, etc., commercial bodies. You are the only body represented down there by one member. They send us a letter saying they have 85,000 members. You constitute 80,000 of that membership which they claim. You have one member on their board. If a resolution is proposed by that member, he seldom gets it seconded, because the institution is almost altogether commercial. There was only one circular which was of interest to this organization, and that was the one on shrubs, written by a gentleman in Nova Scotia, not a single item on the program last year that interested you. Now when we went before the minister in 1922 for a grant, the minister made it quite clear that his sympathy was with the amateur horticulturists, that the commercial men could very well look after their own, but he saw fit to make a grant of $8,000. That has been paid up to date, and now amounts to $64,000, and I can safely say that there has not been $3,000 of that money used in your interests. All of the legislation asked for in the last two years was for increased tariff, dumping duty, and all those things which affect only the commercial interests. When they go before the minister, or the government, it is always with that argument of 85,000 backing up their claim. That is not correct. You people constitute almost 80,000 of those, the other 5,000 are commercial but they use you to accomplish their purpose of securing tariffs and other things horticulturally.

I would say that we would not be far astray if we demanded twelve representatives out of the twenty-one and I would say to the members if you want to get what is coming to you and to make this organization of any value, drop your membership this year, tell them what you want, and if they are willing to give it to you. They will, with their commercial men, be a strong deputation on increasing duties, with the new government, and your membership will be the agency in that, to force the government's hand.

As a result of this speech made by Mr. Carter and a motion introduced by Mr. Klosterman, eighty thousand horticulturists of the province of Ontario decided to withdraw from membership in the Canadian Horticultural Council. To-day that council does not represent the horticulturists of Canada but represents only the commercial men who come to Ottawa and conduct government lobbying for increased tariffs. I said before that the secretary of this organization has personally conducted active political lobbying within the very walls of this building, and I object to paying money for political purposes to any such organization. I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, the following amendment:

That item 109 in the estimates be reduced by $8,000 being the amount of the grant to the Canadian Horticultural Council.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, I do not see how the Canadian Horticultural Council can be considered a political organization, on account of the very way in which the members of its executive are chosen. They are the people who year after year have appointed Mr. Burrows as their secretary. It may have been that in some matters they did not see eye to eye with the past government and I can assure the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) that since I took over the portfolio they have not seen eye to eye with me. If they did not feel that they should stand up for their own opinions, even in contradiction or opposition to any opinions that I might have, I would not think they were worthy of any grants. If they agreed with me in all things they would be unworthy of anything so far as their advice is concerned. Because they happen to disagree with one political party or another is no reason why we should consider them a political organization. From the very nature of their appointment I do not see how they could be political. In reply to the suggestion that the council is not representative of Ontario I would state that some of the most important officials in the Canadian Horticultural Council are residents of that province. As to the dissension in the ranks of the Ontario horticulturists I believe there was a very strong personal element involved.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, during the last three or four years it has been my misfortune to disagree with the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) not only on this matter but in regard to the National Dairy Council grant. I take much pleasure in supporting the minister in both these expenditures. Because I find myself disagreeing with him upon so many occasions I embrace every opportunity which presents itself to support him. With regard to this particular grant I would say that any government making a grant to such a worthy and important organization would not make it for the purpose of purchasing its silence on matters pertaining to its own interest. Under those conditions they would never accept a grant. Naturally they have views regarding matters in which they are particularly interested, and they have thought for some time that their interest included some measures of tariff increase. They persevered in those views until the Dunning budget gave them some consideration and this government gave them much further consideration. This action would indicate that at least they were working along lines endorsed by public sentiment—that is, assuming that governments represent public sentiment. Surely we cannot assume that this important body representing the horticultural interests of Canada should be prevented from having views on tariffs because we extend to them a grant of $8,000. I think that would be a wrong attitude to take, and I for one would be opposed to it.

Before I sit down I have a question to ask. During the last year practically all the export apples of Canada have come under shipping point inspection. This inspection has been under consideration for many years. Five or six years ago British Columbia began such inspection for export and interprovincial trade and was followed by Ontario and Quebec. Last apple orchard harvest was the first occasion upon which inspection was carried out in the maritimes, and that action followed a commission carried out by the provincial government recommending that shipping point inspection be applied to the maritimes forthwith. I wish to know with what success that practice met, and if there was any evidence of greater acceptability in the British market for maritime apples since shipping point inspection was introduced last fall.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): An amendment has been moved by Mr. Young to item No. 109. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. YOUNG: In reply to the hon. member for Melville I would say that one of the few things I have against him is that while in office as minister he has taken vipers to his bosom in the form of the horticultural and dairy councils. These associations were nourished on public money and have become politically active. If it is justifiable to make a grant to the Canadian Horticultural Council to carry on political propaganda, and to urge their ideas in matters of increased tariffs, it is equally justifiable to give a similar grant to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. What hon. member in this committee would justify such a grant to the last named association? Yet it is doing identically the same work as are the associations to which grants are given. If the action in respect to the horticultural and dairy councils can be justified, then similar action in respect to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association could be justified. The minister has said that he gives the Canadian Horticultural Council credit for standing up for their principles. Nobody denies that, but we do take exception to the expenditure of public moneys for the carrying on of political propaganda. Only the other day the members on this side of the house almost with one voice condemned the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) —for what? For taking money out of the public treasury to spread protectionist propaganda. Having voted against the minister for doing that, how can they consistently vote for this $8,000 to the Canadian Horticultural Council?

Mr. MANION: Would it have been all right if they had spread free trade propaganda?

Mr. YOUNG: The consumers' league did not get a dollar from the government, and they did not ask for one. We have more right to a grant like this than those people have, because we have no axe to grind, we are working for the general good.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: Hon. members are laughing because they do not understand. They cannot conceive of any organization working for the general good. All they can think of is some specific benefit being secured for some particular party or group. We cannot consistently support this vote since we voted against the Minister of Trade and Commerce for spending public money to spread protectionist propaganda in the newspapers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In reply to the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), the shipping point inspection in the maritimes has been very good, and it has very materially raised the price of their apples on the British market.

The CHAIRMAN: (Mr. Morand): Those in favour of the amendment will please say "aye."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Those opposed will please say "nay."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): No, sir, it is not lost. I endorse the words of the member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) to the letter, because I know that the secretary of this council travelled all over Canada in the interests of protectionist propaganda. He was right out to the Pacific coast, and when he came back he visited the Niagara district. I discussed the whole thing with him in my office. I also discussed it with the hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). Before this government was in power I insisted that the item should be withdrawn, simply because the society was engaging in political propaganda. Those in control of the society have a perfect right, just as has any other organization, to conduct political propaganda at their own expense, but they have no right to conduct it on money voted from the treasury. For that reason I support the amendment which has been moved by my hon. friend from Weyburn.

Mr. GOTT: Just a year ago to-day hon. members opposite heard it.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us what happened a year ago.

Mr. GOTT: The ex-Minister of Agriculture mentioned the Dunning budget. I am going to give the house a piece of poetry on the Dunning budget. I do not want to hold up the item, but the other night the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) gave us a piece of poetry that has been on record at least a dozen times in Hansard, and now I am going to give hon. members a poem that has never been on record before. It is entitled "The Wreck of the Hocus-Pocus." The subtitle is, The King-Dunning Pact.

Since this day last July,
All the Grits wonder why
Premier King and his crew met defeat;
They have blamed the big crash,
On the lack of good hash,
That the unemployed needed to eat.

But these Grits just forget,
That the ocean is wet,
They are blind to the well-known rule;
That though Barnum was right,
It is only at night
All the folks any party can fool.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you talking on the item?

Mr. GOTT: Yes; this is on the Dunning budget.

"We have cheapened your tea,"
Was a great Liberal plea,
"We have cancelled the 'Pullman-berth tax;'
From the isle o'er the sea,
All your hay will come free,"
Was the gem of their infantile "cracks."

"Reduced rates of taxation
We submit with elation,
For we know that you'll hardly surmise
That with all these decreases
How your tax-rate increases,
Just as fast as the dust in your eyes."

"Wheat, oats and 'cut-flowers,'
In your leisurely hours
You can smoke in a 'cast-iron pipe;'
While for industries ailing,
We have nice 'country failing,'
Tariff duties their life-blood to swipe."

Then that empire tirade
With the flag well displayed,
To prevent us from using our reason;
Was considered by King,
As a mighty good thing,
Till our last "dairy-cow" shouted "treason!"

I presume this was the "dairy-cow" whose bellow in Marquette was heard from the Atlantic to the Pacific—the cow that produced the milk from which the cream came that produced the butter that caused the Liberal party to slide into the shades of opposition, where they are going to remain for many years to come. I will continue the poem, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. MEMBER: Onions.

Mr. GOTT: Yes, I can give you a little piece of poetry on onions, too.

And of course with the knowledge
That our chief learned in college,
When he raised up the "sales tax" galore;
He has taught you the system,
That though somehow you've missed them.
With less shekels your wealth is now more.

Then the few unemployed
Were no doubt overjoyed,
When they heard that the big-hearted chief
Had decided, by gorry,
If they lived near a Tory
Not five cents would they get to buy beef.

Then with vivid description,
That old stand-by conscription
He revived on the eve of the fight,
With fantastic pretension,
This King of dissension,
Warned Quebec of a war not in sight.

But these baseless deceptions,
And kindred conceptions
Were doomed to defeat ere their birth;
When the people had voted,
Premier King sadly noted
They had judged him for what he was worth.

From this wave-pounded wreck
Bennett captured Quebec;
Good true union again as of old
Shall guide Bennett's hand,
To reprosper this land
That our forefathers gave us to hold.

May God grant to this man,
Nearing life's given span,
True success in his greatest endeavour;
Through his efforts sincere
Bennett's name shall be dear
To the heart of this nation forever.

[Mr. Gott.]

It is just one year ago to-day, Mr. Chairman, that at this very moment there was considerable anxiety, and the people expressed their desire that the Conservative party should guide the destinies of this country for the next four years.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the oration by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott)—

An hon. MEMBER: No more poetry.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, I do not intend to quote poetry—may I convey to him the sincere thanks of the opposition for a portion at least of what my hon. friends opposite tendered the Prime Minister at the banquet this evening. We are indebted to him for that portion of the banquet, for his remarks smack of nothing more than the banquet; what he said had nothing whatever to do with the item under discussion. I find myself, Mr. Chairman, in absolute agreement with the hon. member for Weyburn. I am opposed to this vote for the reasons he gave. I do not think it is in the public interest that any organization, I do not care under what name it travels, should expend public moneys to propagate and spread over the country whatever theories it may have regarding public policy.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Shall the item carry?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, Mr. Chairman. I feel strongly on this question. Naturally I would because I think it was under our administration that this grant to the horticultural council was first introduced. Reference has been made to lobbying around the buildings. My recollection is that the horticultural council's system of lobbying consisted of this: By appointment they met members of the government in the railway committee room on a certain day; they met the former Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the late Mr. Robb, the former Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler), your humble servant, and two or three other members of the government. Mr. Burrows, the secretary of the council, was there leading the horticultural interests with a large body of representative men from all over Canada. They must have been there at least an hour and a quarter making out their case before the government. Was there anything wrong in that? Nothing could have been more upright, nothing more honourable and fair. It is true Mr. Burrows made out as good a case as he could, but is that not what the council employed him for? I do not know that, from his standpoint, he went any further than he should, but I have no doubt that he touched the low tariff susceptibilities of some of the people who listened to him. The very fact that both governments gave some consideration to those representations is an evidence that they were pedalling along the right lines, as I see it, and consequently they were not doing anything dishonourable or wrong at that time in making the representations they did make in connection with the tariff.

I would much rather be supporting my hon. friends who hold the opposite view than be supporting the ministry, but on the other hand I am not going to refuse to support the ministry when their course is identical with the course I took a year ago.

Mr. YOUNG: The explanation of the system of lobbying carried on by this body, as given by the hon. member for Melville, is not correct. It is true that this man Burrows, the secretary of that council, organized a deputation from all over Canada, which came to the government and presented its views in the railway committee room of this house, but what the hon. member for Melville does not know is that an active lobby was conducted in the corridors of this building in connection with individual members. Of course the ex-minister was not lobbied; they knew where he stood. It was those who took the other view who were lobbied. I know that to be so, and this man Burrows admitted it when I accused him. More than that, he openly boasted in this city that he hoped the United States would raise their tariff against us, because he said that was the only thing that would force the Liberal government to raise the tariff against the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to come back to the question with which I was dealing a few moments ago; I refer to the questions of cold storage and pre-cooling. In the part of Canada which I have the honour to represent the pre-cooling of fruit before it is sent to the market is receiving a great deal of attention, and I should like the minister to say in a few words what the policy of his department is to be on the question of pre-cooling and cold storage grants. I understood, from his answers a few moments ago, that during the present fiscal year the government does not propose to make any advances except under the Cold Storage Act, and that all the advances in the list given were under that act. I should like to be quite sure of that, because I understood that certain advances of government money were made, not under the act but by the department under some policy of its own, to certain applicants in certain parts of Canada. I know the matter has been before the minister and that he has given it a great deal of attention, and I should like him to say a few words to the committee—for the benefit of my constituents, I will admit, because I want them to know the policy of the government—as to what he intends to do in this matter of grants for pre-cooling and cold storage equipment for fruit particularly.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The policy of the government is to give assistance, under the Cold Storage Act, to cold storage plants fruit and otherwise, which are open to receive public storage or which are operated by cooperative associations. All the grants we are making this year are under the Cold Storage Act, and as yet we have not received sufficient applications to take up the whole amount.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Might I ask the percentage of the grant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is 15 per cent the first year, 7 per cent the second year, 4 per cent the third year and 2 per cent the fourth year.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Which amounts to about 30 per cent in all?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, roughly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that brings out the information desired by my hon. friend from Hants-Kings. Under the Cold Storage Act the grants are governed by statute, and the money must be paid out as my hon. friend has indicated. In addition to that, however, under the old government we had a distinct policy which came under what we called the pre-cooling vote. Under that vote a grant was given amounting to practically the same percentage as the cold storage grant, but it was all paid at once. It makes a great deal of difference to the fruit men whether they get the money all at once or whether it is spread over three or four years. I know the vote was not large but it met a very urgent necessity, especially in those districts which were heavily in debt in connection with the construction of large packing plants. That was particularly so in the Okanagan valley some ten or twelve years ago. They got their money grant under this pre-cooling vote all at once and equipped their packing plants with modern pre-cooling equipment beginning about the year 1923—the first of their kind in Canada.

I think my hon. friend the minister is making a mistake in departing from that policy. We usually had that vote included in the supplementary estimates, amounting to from $20,000 to $40,000. I see a long and very formidable looking list of individual payments in the supplementary estimates in connection with animals slaughtered outside the provisions of the Health of Animals Act, but they do not total very much. A vote of $40,000 or $50,000 would have meant a great deal in the establishment of pre-cooling plants in the various fruit districts of Canada. The supplementary estimates have been brought down, but we have heard of further supplementary estimates, and if the minister can get in his digs I would suggest that he include an item of about $30,000 for pre-cooling plants such as were suggested by the hon. member for Hants-Kings.

Item agreed to.

For experiments in dehydration of fruits and vegetables, $20,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: I should like to know what progress they are making with these experiments in the dehydration of fruits and vegetables.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Experiments are being carried on in Nova Scotia with the view of developing an apple cider free from the objections raised to apple cider in the past. It is hoped in that way to develop a market for the apples of Nova Scotia and to help the people learn the best apple for this particular use. We have there an arrangement with one of the cider pressing plants under which we carry on the experiments and provide the chemicals and some of the apparatus. The company does the bottling, buys the apples and puts the goods on the market. In Ontario we are carrying on somewhat similar work at Oakville and other places. In British Columbia also work is being done in connection with apricots, prunes and so on, because we feel that while we have a market now for practically all those fruits produced in British Columbia, since large numbers of young orchards have been planted which will be bearing fruit in the near future, we must do all we can to put these people in a position to market their products through another channel and thus compete with outside interests.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Wednesday, July 29, 1931.

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

Mr. MARK C. SENN (Haldimand) presented the fourth report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization as follows:

At the first meeting of the committee held for this purpose, the Hon. Mr. Weir, Minister of Agriculture, made a brief statement outlining his reasons for making the reference, and the course which he thought the committee should follow:

Your committee has called and examined the following named witnesses:—

W. A. Brown, chief of poultry division, Department of Agriculture.

A. W. Ault, egg and poultry division, Department of Agriculture.

W. L. Brown, member of the firm of William Brown Company, cattle importers, Manchester, England.

A. A. MacMillan, chief of sheep and swine division, Department of Agriculture.

S. E. Todd, Secretary of the Industrial and Development Council of Canada Meat Packers.

W. A. Amos, President, United Farmers' Co-operative Ltd.

W. West, egg dealer, Almonte, Ontario.

Jas. C. Richardson, grain merchant, member of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

Sydney T. Smith, representative of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

Andrew Cairns, representative of Canadian Wheat Pool.

The agricultural products more particularly studied included eggs, pork and pork products, beef and beef cattle, and exportable wheat.

With respect to the production, grading and marketing of eggs, your committee was fully informed by witnesses, W. A. Brown, chief of the poultry division and A. W. Ault, both of the Department of Agriculture, and also heard representations by witness W. West, an egg dealer of Almonte, Ontario.

Departmental regulations governing the grading and marketing of eggs were carefully and fully examined and explained and the activities of the department officials charged with the enforcement thereof, fully gone into. The committee was informed that the federal government jurisdiction in this respect extended only to interprovincial and import and export trade, and that enabling legislation by the several provinces was necessary to the enforcement of such regulations. The position in this respect is that all of the provinces with the exception of Ontario and Quebec, have passed the necessary legislation to make enforceable the regulations promulgated in 1929. The regulations of 1924 are enforceable in the province of Ontario.

Notwithstanding the absence of authority to enforce the regulations of 1929 in Ontario and Quebec, the department officials find that voluntary cooperation by the trade is increasing from year to year.

Your committee is of the opinion that the principle of marketing poultry and eggs on a graded standard is in the interest of the producer, dealer and consumer, and recommends that every effort be made to insure the least possible difficulty in the handling, grading and marketing of poultry products, and to guarantee the greatest possible return to the producer.

The committee was fortunate in having appear before it, Mr. W. L. Brown, a member of the firm of William Brown & Company, Manchester, England, buyers and importers of beef cattle. Mr. Brown gave a comprehensive statement of the conditions obtaining in the British market, the competition met and to be met by Canadian cattle, and the desirable class of beef cattle required by the British market. Mr. W. A. Amos, President of the United Farmers' Co-operative, Limited, also gave the committee valuable evidence.

The committee is of opinion that an export trade of increasing volume and value in beef cattle is open to this country dependent on the following conditions:—

(a) Careful breeding, feeding, selection and conditioning of Canadian cattle.

(b) Adequate shipping space.

(c) Reasonable transportation rates, both rail and ocean.

(d) A continuous and sufficient volume of available shipments the year round irrespective of the fluctuations in the market prices.

The committee therefore recommends that the foregoing conditions should be carefully and fully studied by the government with a view to bringing the same into effect.

Your committee went very thoroughly into the subject of hog production, breeding and marketing in relation to the requirements of the domestic market and the export trade.

Mr. A. A. MacMillan, chief of the swine division of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Todd of the Canadian Packers and Mr. W. A. Amos, President of the United Farmers' Co-operative, Limited, gave valuable evidence in this respect. The committee held an informal meeting at the plant of Canada Packers, Limited, where, under the direction of Mr. Todd, a demonstration of the grading of live hogs was given, and an exhibit of dressed hogs of the several government grades was shown. Also cuts were made showing Wiltshire sides and the domestic cuts. This demonstration was exceedingly instructive.

The government hog regulations, their intent, effect, and application were fully considered and your committee is of the opinion that:

Every effort should be made to improve the present system of grading so as to secure the least possible difficulty in the handling and marketing of same, and to insure the greatest possible return to the producer. In this regard we commend the Department of Agriculture in the experiments which are being conducted by way of comparison of grading on the hoof and grading on the rail.

Your committee has also given consideration to the wheat situation.

Representatives of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange and of the Canadian wheat pools, upon invitation, appeared before the committee and expressed their views of the situation. Suggestions for the marketing of the carry-over wheat and of the export crop of 1931 were advanced. Reference was made to the negotiations now proceeding between the pools, the banks, the western provinces and the federal government.

In view of the evidence given before the committee, it is recommended that the government take whatever steps it may deem necessary to prevent a drastic decline in the price paid to producers of wheat, especially during the fall months when the bulk of the crop is being marketed.

Your committee commends the experimental work carried on by the Department of Agriculture and particularly urges the continuance of efforts to inquire into and to disseminate information to the farmers in respect to:

(a) The causes of and remedy for soil drifting, especially on the open prairies;

(b) Precautions to take in seeding down to grass or clover, or the planting of trees and hedges or other means;

(c) Any other matter pertaining to or allied with the live stock and live stock products industry in any part of Canada.

The important question of how to get the producer the maximum returns for his produce and the relation of the spread between producer and consumer was given careful study by your committee.

It is recommended that the Department of Agriculture should take whatever steps be deemed most efficient to obtain all available information on factors determining the spread between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays.

Your committee submits herewith its minutes of proceedings and evidence as an appendix to this report, and recommends that the said minutes and report be printed as an appendix to the Journals of the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTING

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I cannot say what progress will be made with the business of the house, but I thought it desirable that we should provide for a sitting on Saturday morning next at eleven o'clock, as we may likely conclude business that day. With the consent of the house I shall move the motion, or I shall put it on the order for consideration to-morrow as the house may think desirable.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I beg to move:

That on Saturday first August next, the house shall meet at eleven oclock in the morning. That in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission from one to three o'clock, p.m., and that the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Friday.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*TRADE TREATY WITH CUBA

Mr. MacLEAN:

1. Have any steps been taken by the government to negotiate a trade treaty with Cuba to insure the continuation of our market there for Canadian potatoes?

2. If so, what progress has been made and what are the prospects for a reciprocal arrangement for the exchange of products?

Mr. STEVENS: I thought I had the answer to this question under my hand, but I find I have not. I can, however, answer it in a sentence. The subject matter of questions one and two are under study by officers of the department, and the whole matter is under consideration by the government.

MR. JEAN BOUDREAU

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Is the Minister of Marine aware that complaints were made against Mr. Jean Boudreau, lightkeeper at Havre St. Pierre, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river?
2. If so, what was the nature of these complaints?
3. By whom were they made?
4. Did the Department of Marine, through one of its officers, write to Mr. Boudreau asking him to admit his culpability following the complaints that had been made against him?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1 and 2. The Minister of Marine is aware that charges of political partisanship have been made.

3. Azade Boudreau.

4. No, he was asked if the charges were well founded.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—MATANE COUNTY

Mr. LARUE:

1. How much money was spent for the relief of unemployment in the county of Matane?
2. How much for direct relief?
3. How many man's days' work were provided?
4. How many families were granted relief thereby?
5. What is the actual cost of public works and undertakings which have been carried out in the above county?

CANADA POWER AND PAPER COMPANY

Mr. COOTE:

What amount of debentures, subsidiary first mortgage bonds, preferred shares and common stock, or other securities of the Canada Power and Paper Company and associated companies which are affected by the reorganization plan of the security holders' protective committee of the Canada Power and Paper Company were held as at December, 1929, by each of the following companies:—

Sun Life Assurance Company,
Great West Life Assurance Company,
Canada Life Assurance Company,
Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada,
Dominion Life Assurance Company,
Manufacturers Life Assurance Company?

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. BENNETT: As this question is a little long, it may stand as an order for return, and the information is tabled herewith.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MR. J. A. BELANGER

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of evidence and report in the case of J. A. Belanger, postmaster of St. Jean l'Evangeliste, in the investigation made by Mr. Gerard Simard on charges of political partisanship.

MAJOR M. P. NEILLY

Mr. HEENAN (for Mr. Ralston):

For a copy of all memoranda, telegrams, recommendations, representations, petitions, communications, and other correspondence to or from the Minister of Immigration, or any other minister or ministers of the government and to or from any official of the government or of the Civil Service Commission, or any other person or persons, having reference to the dismissal of Major M. P. Neilly from the staff of the Soldiers' Settlement Board on June 30, 1931.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

WESTERN CLOCK COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. MARCIL (for Mr. Bouchard):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams passing between the Western Clock Company Limited of Peterborough, or any official of the company, and the Minister of Finance, and to any other member of the Dominion government, during the year 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: On Monday I mentioned that this notice comes within the provisions of the exception that we have taken steadily this session, that matters of this kind containing information with respect to costs and business of competitors should not be tabled. There are some telegrams asking what action has been taken. They can be tabled, but nothing beyond that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps in the absence of the hon. member in whose name the motion is presented, it had better stand.

Motion stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I should like to address an inquiry to the Prime Minister based upon a communication which I have received from the mayor of the city of Kitchener. He refers to the plan apparently made by the Ontario government for sending single men to construction work in northern Ontario as a method of dealing with unemployment relief and also to the relief work which must be given to married men in towns and cities. In addition, he refers to the urgency of some decision; he states that a decision in connection with these matters must be made by the federal government and he urges that it be made as soon as possible so that the municipalities may make their preparations. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he could make a statement in regard to the matter in order that the municipalities may make preparations in due course.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I take it this is a matter in regard to which the municipalities are in communication with the provincial government. There are no communications between the municipalities and ourselves; they are dealing with their governments. It is a matter between the municipalities and the provincial governments.

Mr. EULER: But surely it is dependent on what this government will do.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a matter between the province and us, not between us and the municipalities.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization regarding the exposure of an extensive province-wide conspiracy to evade immigration laws in connection with Japanese entering Canada. Fred Yoshi, former interpreter in the Department of Immigration and a few others are accused of a conspiracy in regard to forging papers enabling Japanese to enter this country illegally. In view of such allegations and the serious state of affairs, is it the minister's intention to pursue this matter with a view to checking up all Japanese legally or otherwise in British Columbia?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration): In reply to the hon. member, the checking up of Japanese illegally in Canada goes on constantly. That is true not only with respect to Japanese but any other people who are illegally in Canada. Regarding the particular matter to which reference has been made, an investigation was commenced by the officers of my department, with the assistance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The interpreter was, of course, discharged from his position. That investigation is proceeding, and in due course I shall receive a report of what disclosures, if any, there may be.

FARM AND UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

POWER TO DEAL WITH AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS AND LABOUR SITUATION—MAINTENANCE OF ORDER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief; and for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada; and to authorize the governor in council to expend for the said purposes out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as may from time to time be necessary.

He said: Perhaps it would be advisable for me to make a statement now, or if the house prefers, I will do it after the Speaker leaves the chair and the house resolves itself into committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do it now.

Mr. BENNETT: The adoption of this resolution lays the foundation for the introduction of a bill for the purpose of vesting in the governor general in council during the recess of parliament and until the end of the fiscal year full power to redress so far as it is possible the conditions of unemployment and distress now prevalent in certain sections of the Dominion. Comprehensive measures of relief cannot under the circumstances be undertaken without the expenditure of large sums of money. The expenditure of moneys not directly derived from current revenues should not be made without the clearest justification, and the justification which we plead, and which we claim is sufficient, in the interest of Canada as a whole.

The economic situation is apparent to parliament and to the public. It is not the intention of the government to minimize the gravity of it, nor is it its desire politically to profit by it. After the most searching inquiry the full facts of the situation are before us. The causes underlying the present state of affairs may be analyzed at another time when the electors are again asked to determine the form of economic structure most likely to sustain this country in hard times and to prosper it in better times. During the campaign which ended a year ago yesterday I repeatedly said that many of the causes contributing to the disruption of business in other lands had no place in Canada. I said so then; I say so now, and I maintain that this country has a right to expect that however good conditions may be elsewhere, they should be better here. This government is not content with the knowledge that others are suffering more than we. What alone concerns us is that many of our people are now in want, and unless extraordinary measures are taken many more will know hardship and privation in the coming months of winter. Knowing this it becomes our solemn duty to aid them. In the short session of parliament last September and in the one now drawing to a close this government did all within its power to strengthen our economic structure and to repulse the wave of world-wide economic depression which was then upon us. I believe that we may fairly claim to have done much. The facts support this belief, but the maximum benefits of any measure of reform cannot be realized in a day or in a year. But, indeed, a short time more I think will prove conclusively that we were right. Of that I am convinced, and of this as well, that the policy of this government will put Canada in the van of the world's recovery.

I have said that I do not wish to make political capital of the present situation. I do not claim that even had this country for many years known the ideal in economic policies we would have been unaffected by the present world conditions, immeasurably aggravated as they have been recently by the partial failure of the wheat crop in the west. In that regard if hon. members of this house will study the immigration returns for the fifteen months prior to the 7th day of August, 1930, they will find some reasons why the economic conditions in this country were as we found them on that day. Further, if they will study the exports of this country and observe that during the fifteen months before the 7th day of August, 1930, they began to dwindle, and if they will study the relation of imports to exports, they will realize the reasons that compelled this government to take the action it has done to repair the injuries to our economic structure which have resulted in the conditions to which I refer. To say, however, that these were wholly responsible for the conditions prevailing in this country would be unjust and unsound. In the past twelve months economic conditions throughout the world have grown gradually more acute. No normal legislation could have immediately and entirely offset them. It therefore becomes necessary for parliament to meet the situation, in so far as it lies within its power so to do, by legislation specially designed for this abnormal situation. This government has had under the most careful consideration the means most likely to achieve that purpose, and has come to the conclusion that the best way to strike at the root of the present trouble is to accelerate the natural progress of development by immediately commencing upon the construction of some such public works as will inure to the benefit of Canada. This program of national upbuilding is known to parliament and the country. The Conservative party was pledged to it in the campaign of last year, and after I was called upon to form a government I reaffirmed that pledge. When parliament met in the month of March last it was hoped that the amelioration of world conditions and a bountiful harvest in this country would, before the winter, result in a situation readily improveable by the measures of economic reform which have been passed. While that hope was possible of fulfilment, wisdom counselled the strictest conservation of our national revenues.

I need hardly point out that the $20,000,000 that we voted in September last has given employment up to the end of July to upwards of 310,000 people, and it has resulted in contracts outstanding and work being done to the extent of some $70,000,000, scattered over every part of Canada, and every one of the undertakings assisted by that grant may be considered a work for the advantage of Canada as a whole, commencing with half a million for subways and going all down the line of public works, including road building. The amount expended for direct relief—I say direct relief—has not exceeded $2,000,000. It has not reached that sum. Under the circumstances I think it will be realized that the national character of the relief afforded, which would be the only justification of our participating in relief operations at all, has been abundantly shown by the results which have been attained. But, as I have said, when we found this year that there was hope of an abundant harvest we realized that the conservation of our revenues was a duty of the first magnitude so far as this parliament was concerned, and we acted accordingly and awaited the harvest. But alas! for the second and even the third season the crops of the west have in large part been ruined by lack of moisture. During the last three weeks there was such an improvement as warranted the belief that there might be substantial quantities of green feed, for instance, available to take care of the stock and herds of those who live upon the prairies. But even that hope is now apparently destroyed, for the very scorching suns of the last few days have entirely changed that picture.

World conditions too, have since grown worse. The harvest as I have said, is in part a failure. In the opinion of the government therefore the circumstances justify an early expenditure of a sum of money which normally would have been spread over a period of years. Such moneys do not come from current revenues, and I believe a judicious outlay now will not be reflected adversely in the revenues of the country in the next few years. This, as I say, is a departure from settled procedure and practice based on our program, as we prepared it, from anticipated revenues. Normally it would not be justified, but under present conditions no true Canadian can cavil at it because it means increased employment, comforts and happiness to thousands of our citizens in the coming winter who would have had to go without the necessities of life. Nor need prudent citizens be unduly concerned over proposed expenditure; this country is solvent. If our people are assured of health, happiness and the means of livelihood, no capital disbursements, unless wantonly made, can impede our national fortunes built up by hard and intelligent working out of the vast riches which are our heritage.

I think everyone within sound of my voice to-day will agree with those propositions. Anyone, however, can be optimistic in good times. Optimism in bad times is bred of courage, faith and the capacity to endure. These are the dominant characteristics of Canadians. Not that I would urge the people of this country to nurture unfounded hopes; anxious times are yet ahead, and hard work and patience and self denial are needed to bring good times out of them. But I hold that if we steadfastly maintain our belief in our destiny, which we do, and are prepared to meet the future with courage, which we are, then in this testing time we may fortify ourselves with the knowledge that following close upon the condition of to-day will come an era of true prosperity, fore-ordained, to those who have not swerved in their faith to themselves and to their country.

The pioneers of this country had to make for themselves their homes, and they had practically to provide from the soil, the sea, the rivers and the forests the wherewithal to enable them to live. We have lived in easier times. But we must fortify ourselves with the thought that the courage of the pioneers was never more required than now, and there never has been a time when faith in the ultimate destiny of our country was more required than it is to-day among the Canadian people.

The government realizes however that no matter how comprehensive this constructive program may be there will remain those who cannot directly benefit from it. That is, there are those who may not benefit from constructive works carried on by the federal authorities with the provinces, and through the provinces with the corporations, towns and cities of the country. There are classes within the community who cannot work or for whom suitable work cannot be provided. These classes the government will assist either through the instrumentality of the provinces, and either public or private institutions, as may seem best, and in such ways as may seem most likely to assure the greatest measure of relief. No one will be asked to accept direct relief for whom suitable work can be procured.

During the last few days I have received telegrams from the province of Saskatchewan suggesting that it was not desirable that direct relief which might be regarded as charity should be accorded to those hardy settlers who have lost their all for the third, and in some instances the fourth succeeding year, but rather that they would like to execute some document which would indicate that they regarded the help given as an obligation which they might some time be able to pay. I would say to my good friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that that indicates at least the attitude of most of those who at the present time are without crops and who have had the third succeeding crop failure.

Mr. McMILLAN: (Huron): Why does the Prime Minister address that expression to the hon. member for South Huron?

Mr. BENNETT: Because of his observation the other day regarding the five cent bonus on wheat.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): And the observation was entirely justifiable.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. Nobody will be permitted to accept direct relief who is able to undertake work which is offered to him. I need hardly say that even at this early date in the history of this country there are not lacking evidences of an unwillingness to work on the part of those who believe that this country should give them money for nothing. The other day a parade came up this hill, and I had taken the trouble to make some investigation with regard to it. One at least of the participators in the parade the day before had been driving a Ford car, soliciting charity from various homes in other parts of this city. His conversations on those occasions are a matter of record. In every part of this country there are some evidences of that, already,—that is, evidences of a willingness to accept from the state charity, and charity from private sources as well, rather than to work. So the principle upon which we endeavour to proceed and will proceed is that where there is work there will be pay, and that if an individual is capable of work and will not work there will be no benefits. If there be those who think to increase the public burdens by unfairly casting themselves upon the state it will be our duty to make them as self sustaining as circumstances will permit. The people's money is not for those who are able but unwilling to care for themselves. I warn them of that now. The measures we shall take will be denied their fullest benefit without the generous cooperation of all classes in the land. Upon that cooperation we confidently rely. If any deny that cooperation, then they cannot properly look to us for support.

In that regard the measure provides for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada. It is not for a moment to be thought that an insignificant number of strongly vocal persons shall be able so to affect the populace of this country as to make it impossible for us, in cooperation together as Canadians, to work out our destiny. I say that class, happily, is few in number. But in this present situation they now see an opportunity propitious to the prosecution of their pernicious political doctrines. This is a land of freedom where men may think what they will and say what they will, so long as they do not attack the foundations upon which our civilization has been built. But as we have freedom, so have we justice, and it is not just nor right that now or at any other time we should permit such action by words or deeds as may tend to unsettle confidence in the institutions and customs under which we live. Most of our legislation is framed upon that assumption. For instance, the Naturalization Act provides for the cancellation of naturalization certificates where by act or speech the individual has indicated that his purpose is to create disaffection in the minds of those to whom his speech may be directed. If in times past we have had recourse to the provisions of that act, and will have in the future, it is because we realize that although they are few in number who thus attack our institutions and who in the name of free speech imperil the very existence of those institutions, it is not proposed that in a time of crisis and peril such as the present they should be permitted to make it more difficult for those who would cooperate to work for the common good. If the government is given reason to believe, as there may be some cause for its so believing, that there is a settled purpose in the minds of a considerable number of people—not large, numerically, but scattered over the various parts of Canada—to take action against the maintenance of law and order, or make attempts to impede the difficult task with which we are charged, then we will take such action as in the judgment of the executive of this country, the cabinet who are the board of directors for the time being administering the affairs of this country, as will free this country from those who have proved themselves unworthy of our Canadian citizenship.

I have said, sir, that the resolution does not contemplate the fixing of an amount that should be expended. It would be difficult indeed at this time to indicate with any degree of precision the exact sums that may be required to be expended for the public good. For that reason someone has said that the government asks for a blank cheque. It is not that. We ask between now and the expiration of the next fiscal year that the board of directors of this country, charged as it is with responsibility, and with a deep sense of its responsibility, shall discharge its duties from a financial standpoint as it best can and take the chances that are incident to so doing by submitting an account of its stewardship to this parliament before the 31st day of March next. That is the position we take with respect to the matter. It is nothing new. I was thinking yesterday, when someone was making an observation akin to criticism of the governor in council being permitted to have a large discretion as to the amount that may be expended for the purposes in question, that only a few short years ago my friends who now sit opposite, and who then constituted the government of this country, passed a statute, chapter 58 of the statutes of 1924, in which they gave to the governor in council the power to guarantee the bridge bonds of the Montreal harbour commissioners. In the parliament of that day it was said that the cost would be $6,000,000. Did they put any limitation on the bill that gave that power to guarantee? They did not. In the province of Quebec it was said that the cost would be $10,000,000. Yet there are now outstanding on that bridge bonds for $19,000,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would not a limitation have been desirable?

Mr. BENNETT: I am only pointing out that no such limitation was imposed, and that those who criticize with respect to a matter which affects the welfare of the public cannot very well do so on any ground of consistency in view of the position that we know now follows with respect to that undertaking, where $19,000,000 of bonds are outstanding, issued without limitation, pursuant to the provisions of chaper 58 of the statutes of that year.

Would a limitation now be desirable? I have a telegram from one of the western premiers, who, having seen the resolution in the papers, congratulates the government on imposing no limitation, for the simple and obvious reason that otherwise there would be a contest between the provinces to get their "share" as they call it, of what may be appropriated, and he regarded anything of that character as being inimical to the best interests of the administration of the money. I can only repeat that that view, so far as we have been able to ascertain, is the view held by the major number of those charged with responsibility in the provinces. I can say with great frankness to this house that I have no desire, and no other member of the government has any desire, to incur expenses or create obligations of the country out of keeping with the position which we occupy. But we believe that it is in the interests of Canada—of the Canadian taxpayer, of the provinces, of the people concerned, that we should not place a limitation upon the amount that may be expended, either with respect to direct relief or otherwise, because in the one instance you create the idea "Here is a fund upon which anyone may draw without work, and we have a right to live upon this fund that the taxpayers have so provided." And on the other hand you would have a contest among the provinces to get all that they believed to be their "share." We desire to administer the affairs of this country at this critical time having regard to the necessities existing in each part of this Dominion. There is one province, we will say, in which you could not if you chose expend more than $15,000 or $20,000 for any purpose that should come within the purview of this proposed statute. Then there is another province in which, as I have pointed out to this house, it is not improbable that there may be as many as 25,000 families that will have to be provided for.

Nor do we in undertaking our obligations desire to supplant the constitutional responsibility of the provinces. That constitutional responsibility must still be discharged. All we are endeavouring to do is to assist those charged with that responsibility to a due and adequate discharge of it. We are not substituting this Dominion for the provinces under the constitution; we are not substituting this Dominion for the municipalities or towns under the constitution; but we are endeavouring, and we will continue to endeavour, to give such assistance to the constituted authorities in the several provinces as will enable them with such supervision as we think necessary in the public interest, to safeguard the public exchequer and ensure the three purposes that I have indicated, namely; work for those who are willing to work—and pay there will be for none unless they who can work do work; and secondly, as I said a moment ago, relief for that class to whom work in the ordinary acceptance of the term may not be easily provided—that is, people of the type who by reason of invalidity or other causes are not able to work; and there is that other class to which I referred, namely, those who have no opportunity at all in the circumstances under which they live to find employment of any kind.

I will say frankly to the house that in asking what euphemistically is spoken of as a "blank cheque" we are not unmindful that we are asking very considerable from this House of Commons. But how otherwise could we discharge the functions and responsibilities that devolve upon us? That is the question. If you fix it at any sum you may suggest, I repeat, you but invite the very thing that we desire to prevent, and by so doing instead of serving the public interest we are preventing the greatest service being rendered that the means available are intended to render.

In that regard I think it but fair to say to the house that we have already taken active steps in all the provinces. Commencing at the western coast, the provincial government of British Columbia has prepared a very full and definite program as to what it believes can be done with the assistance of the federal authorities to meet the unemployment situation during the winter. A large number of unattached single men have gone into the great city of Vancouver. That imposes upon the local authorities a burden of great magnitude. Almost every train has taken men into that city. If the provincial government in working out its plans with our financial cooperation and assistance, with such supervision as may be necessary to ensure that the money is not wasted, will make it possible for a large number of these unattached men who have collected in Vancouver to go out of that city and find employment elsewhere, we propose to enable them to do so. With respect to other cities in the central provinces, the same situation prevails and will be met in the same way.

The province of Alberta has prepared a comprehensive program of public undertakings. The province of Saskatchewan stands in a class by itself, for the reasons I have already indicated. The province of Manitoba has completed provision for a winter program which it believes will meet the situation. In the province of Ontario there are some signs already of what the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) indicated in the telegram he received from Kitchener, which showed a state of mind reflected in similar telegrams I have received from other Ontario cities, looking to this government to deal directly with them with respect to the problem of direct relief in those municipalities, towns and cities. We have endeavoured to make it clear that if we were to do so in the sense they have suggested we would be indeed breaking down their constitutional privileges and rights and substituting this Dominion for the constitutional authority provided for the very purpose they mention. We do not propose to do that.

In the province of Quebec the letter which was published the other day from the premier of that province made clear his position. In the maritime provinces they have prepared what they believe is an adequate program to meet the situation with which they must deal during the winter. In the province of Prince Edward Island, which has a population of less than 90,000, which is peculiarly an agricultural population, the difficulties are very few because they are not in want, as other parts of the country are, for reasons which are apparent to all.

Mr. EULER: May I ask a question? The Prime Minister stated a moment ago, I think in reply to something I said this afternoon, that direct relief to municipalities would not be given by this government. I presume the right hon. gentleman means that they must proceed through the provincial governments. I understand in the province of Ontario such direct relief has been refused by the provincial government. I say that subject to correction, but if that be so what would be the attitude of the government?

Mr. BENNETT: I hardly think that would be correct, because they have not so informed us. We have made contributions to assist them in carrying out their constitutional obligations. I say to this house quite frankly that if we voted a very large sum of money there would be a great tendency on the part of some communities to do just as my hon. friend has suggested. An emergency does not necessarily change the constitution, and despite the fact that from the federal treasury we must meet a very difficult situation it does not mean that the whole constitution of the provinces shall be suspended and that they shall be relieved of their obligations and responsibilities. On the other hand it does mean that we as a national body are endeavouring to assist the provinces who are charged with provincial responsibility adequately to deal with the situation confronting them, but we ourselves, if I might summarize, will undertake as comprehensive a scheme of public undertakings as it is possible to undertake.

Hon. gentlemen may ask why we have not done so previously. The reason is clear and obvious: We have no right to anticipate these matters and make vast expenditures now which would be made in our stride during the years that are to come, when they impose upon the country an additional obligation or debt.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the hon. gentleman allow me a question? He has referred to a letter from the premier of Quebec. Is he able to state whether or not he is in agreement with the suggestion contained in that letter as to the means that will be taken to relieve unemployment in Quebec?

Mr. BENNETT: The premier of Quebec said he would take care of his obligation and that we would doubtless take such steps federally as we thought best and as we could take, and he said he was willing to cooperate in no spirit of political partisanship. With respect to that $20,000,000 we have endeavoured—I think no government ever did more—to make that the foundation of every effort we have made, and I have yet to hear any person charge political partisanship in respect to the administration of that amount. The only complaints I ever did hear were to the effect that in some instances some of the municipalities had administered their portion of the fund having too strict a regard to dollars and cents. That criticism was made on more than one occasion.

I will summarize, and in doing so I point out that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggested some time ago, in dealing with the question of the provinces and the Dominion, that great voluntary bodies of reputable, leading citizens might be set up to give effect to any relief measures that might be proposed. As he very properly indicated, such a suggestion had been made previously and was in the minds of the government. I have endeavoured to make clear to the provinces that if we are to maintain any semblance of constitutional right they must be responsible for the creation, within the area of the provinces, of those committees of administration, of control and of supervision which will ensure that during the coming winter, there will be no hardship, hunger or suffering. But in my judgment it would be an anomaly, and would result in a very difficult situation indeed, if we were to say that the Dominion government should assume responsibility for setting up organizations to deal with local communities. I think that would be the negation of every theory we have of constitutional government, because it would involve an assumption that we had such a condition in this country that the provinces, the municipalities, the towns and the cities could not function. It is possible that they may not all be able to function because of financial difficulties, but with respect to the calling of meetings, the appointing of committees and dealing with matters of that kind I have asked all the premiers of the provinces except the premier of Quebec, who said they had the matter well in hand, to consider the matter from that angle, that the provinces, within their several areas, should organize voluntary associations or committees which would undertake to see that the difficulties which must be met during the winter will be successfully overcome.

There is one exception to that. At the end of the war, when the treaty of peace was concluded after the long conference which took place in the south of France between the representatives of all the nations, you will observe that a provision was made that the Red Cross organization was to carry forward certain international work. It was not to be limited by the boundaries of nations but was to be international in its character, and the peace time activities of that organization have resulted in changes being made in the act of incorporation. As hon. members will remember, the powers of the organization were extended the other day to meet changed conditions and to provide for expansion to take care of the situation confronting us. That body, controlled by a central authority, has autonomous branches in each of the provinces. Those branches will be asked—and they are ready and willing to do so, since it is part of their charter obligations and responsibilities—to care for what you might call the clothing necessities of women and children primarily. With respect to food they, by reason of the position which they occupy in the provinces and the branches they have in almost every settled part of each province of the confederation, will be able to supply such data as in my judgment will ensure the smooth and harmonious operation of every effort that may be made to meet the situation as far as food and clothing are concerned.

Apart from that the autonomous position of the provinces must be recognized. Their position as units of this confederation must not be departed from in any sense with the exception of the extent to which their necessities demand that, in addition to the work we undertake ourselves and for which we are primarily responsible, we must supplement their efforts financially or otherwise. In every instance where our money is being expended we will claim—and our claim is gladly acceded to—the right to see that no part of that money is wasted and that it meets the purposes and ends for which it may be appropriated.

I do not think that in moving this resolution I can usefully do more than say this in conclusion. I have summarized the position at, I trust, not undue length. We are asking for large powers, because to limit the amount would result in less good than benefit; of that I feel quite certain. For I do not want it to be said that the money has to be administered according to population: that because there are so many thousands of people in one province therefore they must secure a definite proportion of the money based upon the relation of their population to the whole. Rather, the necessities of the several communities shall be the determining factor in the administration of whatever assistance may be extended for the purpose in view. That will be the governing factor in determining what action may be taken.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Prime Minister stated a little earlier in his address that he would undertake a comprehensive program of public works. May I ask him to be more specific as to what they are.

Mr. BENNETT: The program will embrace every kind of undertaking for which the federal administration is responsible. To that end we have asked the provinces, rather than deal through political channels, to suggest to us just what they believe are the most urgent public works, and the works which will provide the greatest amount of employment. When I say that we will undertake public works, I mean undertakings such as heretofore, under our constitutional practice, have fallen within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. Does that answer the hon. member's question?

Mr. NEILL: What proportion?

Mr. BENNETT: The whole of the federal undertaking. I am afraid I must have spoken too rapidly. What I was endeavouring to say at the very inception of my remarks was that ordinarily all relief measures should be chargeable against revenue; but that because of the extraordinary circumstances we would anticipate such public undertakings as we should not take in our stride normally, carrying them out during the next few months in order to provide employment for those who might need it at the present time.

Mr. NEILL: I meant, what proportion in regard to the provinces—what share?

Mr. BENNETT: No rule or share will govern with respect to the application of federal moneys, because it will depend upon the number of unemployed. The one word necessity will be the governing rule.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the Peace River outlet, for example, come within this category?

Mr. BOULANGER: Or Rivière du Loup station?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not expect that question to originate with the hon. member; I thought it would come from the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). With regard to the Peace River outlet, I do not know that it will properly come under this designation, because at present there is no such thing as a Peace River outlet. Where the Peace River outlet is to be is a matter for engineers to determine, and that has not yet been settled, so far as I know; the engineers themselves have not agreed upon it. If there were any work that had been agreed upon in connection with the Peace River outlet, as a result of surveys, then it might properly come within the category of federal undertakings. Whatever matters may properly be chargeable against the federal authority will be considered and dealt with as part of the program to which I have referred.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Hon. members have before them a copy of the orders of the day on which appears the resolution which you, Mr. Speaker, have just read to the house. They will observe that if no reference is made to either the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means, this resolution constitutes the only order upon the order paper. It is not only the last government order to appear, but it is the only order which remains to be disposed of on the order paper to-day.

Perhaps I cannot better express in a word what I have first to say in the way of criticism than to observe that, instead of being the last order in the last week of the session, this resolution should have been the first order to appear after parliament assembled. When we have regard to the circumstances of the past year, to the fact that a special session of parliament was thought necessary last September to deal with the question of unemployment, and that when parliament met in the month of March this year the unemployment situation was infinitely worse than it was when that special session was called, I do think it was the duty of the ministry to have made the question of unemployment relief the first, as indeed it is the most important question before this house and the country to-day. But far from bringing the matter forward at the beginning of the session, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has so managed affairs in the house as to have made impossible any discussion of the subject until now.

My right hon. friend has spoken of the cabinet as a board of directors, and he says that in this resolution he is asking the house to give to that board of directors absolute powers in dealing with the problem of unemployment relief. May I say to him that it is not the cabinet, of which he is Prime Minister, that is the board of directors of the nation; it is this House of Commons. Hon. members sitting on both sides of the house are the board of directors who have been sent from the different constituencies in Canada to represent the people of the country, to discuss questions of importance with respect to the economic and other affairs of Canada, and to make laws to aid in the solution of those problems. The cabinet is a committee of the House of Commons; any power it has is derived from the members who sit in this house. It is an executive committee. But the committee of the nation constituting the board of directors is, I submit, this House of Commons. That leads me to direct again a very strong criticism against my right hon. friend. The criticism is this: that with regard to this all-important question he has ignored altogether the board of directors of the nation and has taken it into the hands of a small committee, which derives its authority from this board of directors, to deal with the question in an absolute way.

May I, to confirm what I have said regarding the extent to which my right hon. friend has prevented parliament from considering this question, mention a few records which appear in Hansard, of demands that have been made from time to time to deal with the question. I will not refer either to the debate on the address or to the budget debate. In each of these debates, which were of considerable length, hon. members on this side spoke very freely with reference to this all-important question of the need for the relief of unemployment. But my right hon. friend and hon. members opposite were more or less silent; they made no contribution whatever to those debates. Indeed, during the greater part of the debate on the address my right hon. friend was not even present to hear what was being discussed. Here may I say that I think my right hon. friend has taken an entirely wrong course. Is it to be imagined that in regard to great problems such as unemployment relief, out of the number of members assembled here coming from all parts of this country—and I am speaking now with reference to those on the government side as well as on this—there would not be, in the course of a discussion on this question, some contribution which would be helpful to the ministry of the day? The purpose of parliament is to enable hon. members who live in different parts of the country to assemble in one place and there speak freely with respect to conditions in their particular constituencies, in that way to inform and enlighten the ministry with respect to existing needs and possible methods of dealing with them. But in respect to the greatest question of the day all that has been entirely set at naught, and now in the last days of the session, when, as all hon. members know, the proceedings are likely to be concluded within a day or two, we are for the first time afforded an opportunity to discuss this question.

On March 20 the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) asked the ministry if any special measures were contemplated to cope with the unemployment situation. The Prime Minister declined to answer. I am making reference now to matters of which full particulars will be found in Hansard.

On March 23 the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) asked what the government intended to do with regard to relieving the unemployed in his constituency. The Prime Minister said:

The question can stand.

On March 31 the hon. member for North Winnipeg moved the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the acute distress arising from unemployment. After a lengthy discussion Your Honour ruled the motion out of order.

On April 17 the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River brought up the question again, and failing to get a satisfactory answer from the government, he moved the adjournment of the house. This motion was defeated on division by eighty-two to fifty-six.

On April 24 the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) asked whether the government intended to call a Dominion unemployment conference. The Prime Minister said:

The hon. member will be advised when the event happens, if it does happen.

On May 25 the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) directed the attention of the acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to the desperate condition existing in the city of Nanaimo, due to unemployment, and urged the government to deal with the situation immediately. The acting Minister of Labour said that the matter was purely a provincial one.

On May 26, on the motion to go into committee of supply, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni discussed the urgent necessity of holding a conference with the provinces to deal with unemployment. A lengthy debate followed during which the various speakers called upon the government to state its attitude towards the question. No member of the government took part in the debate.

On June 8 the hon. member for Comox-Alberni brought the question to the attention of the government once more, and called upon the ministry to declare its intention not only for the immediate future but also for the coming fall. The deputy speaker ruled him out of order, and on division the chair was sustained by sixty-four to forty-five.

On June 16, speaking on the budget, I urged the government to call a conference of all parties in interest to deal with the question of unemployment, but neither in the course of that debate nor since was any reference made by any member of the ministry to the suggestion.

On June 29 the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked for a statement of government policy on unemployment. The Prime Minister replied:

At an appropriate time a statement will be made. The primary duty with respect to unemployment does not rest with the federal government.

Mr. Speaker ruled against the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in his attempt to continue the debate.

On June 30 the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) directed attention to the appalling conditions in Saskatchewan, and called upon the government to do something at once. The Prime Minister said:

The primary responsibility rests with the municipal authorities and the province.

On July 9, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked when the government would introduce legislation on unemployment. The Prime Minister said that legislation would be introduced when the business of the house had been practically disposed of. Immediately following his reply I said:

I assume my right hon. friend will be introducing some legislation in this connection, and I hope he will not wait until the last day or two of the session to place upon the order paper the resolution which would necessarily precede a bill to relieve unemployment. Hon. members ought to have a little time to consider any provisions before they are called upon to pronounce their views.

The Prime Minister said that every opportunity would be afforded to discuss such a measure.

Those are only a few of the references that might be made. Hon. members will see that this resolution is introduced in the last days of the last week of the session, when there is no opportunity adequately to consider a measure so all-important.

May I say a word with respect to the resolution itself? In order to make clear the points that I wish to direct to the attention of the ministry, let me read the resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief; and for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada; and to authorize the governor in council to expend for the said purposes out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as may from time to time be necessary.

I shall be pleased if my right hon. friend will allow me to speak to him more particularly at this time.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure the right hon. gentleman I am listening to every word he utters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should appreciate that very much, because in what I am saying I wish to be of as much help and to offer as little criticism as I can.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My words will speak for themselves. If hon. members wish to laugh, that is their privilege, but the public will judge from what I am saying whether the proposals are in the interest of the government as well as of the country.

My first point is this: The resolution is really three resolutions embodied in one. I believe my right hon. friend would help materially in bringing about unanimity so far as the house is concerned—and that is what I think we all desire in a matter of this kind—if he would divide his resolution into three parts and deal as separate and independent measures with the three subjects to which it refers. The first resolution is with respect to the relief of unemployment:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment relief.

Unemployment relief is a subject by itself. It is the subject with respect to which a special session of parliament was called last September. I do not think we should confuse what relates to the relief of unemployment arising out of economic conditions with any other particular subject with which the government wishes to deal.

The next subject in the resolution is farm relief. To make my point clear, may I say that until the crop failure in Saskatchewan and the distressing conditions existing in that province had become apparent, there was no thought in the mind of anyone that relief in the rural districts of the prairie provinces would be necessary. The situation in Saskatchewan has grown out of what I suppose would be described as an act of God. It is in no sense due to any world condition or to any national policy, fiscal or otherwise. It is due simply to the happenings of nature as they have this year evidenced themselves. I submit that a measure to deal with Saskatchewan and the prairie situation generally to relieve a condition arising from crop failure should be a separate measure. After all, when we are dealing with these great economic questions it is important that the nation should know with respect to the different matters on which it spends its public moneys, precisely what its outlay is. The moneys that are spent for relief in connection with Saskatchewan should be separately dealt with and separately administered, and similarly the moneys spent with respect to unemployment generally ought to be separately dealt with.

But the third is a still more important matter. The resolution reads:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada.

There is a third subject which is entirely separate and distinct from relief, either farm relief or unemployment relief generally. May I say to my right hon. friend that it is a great mistake to confuse these two matters. It is in every way most unfortunate that they should be confused in any particular. We have laws on the statute books at the present time for the maintenance of law, order and good government throughout the country. If those laws are not adequate and my right hon. friend wishes to have additional powers to maintain law and order in Canada, let him ask for them in a separate measure. He is responsible for the administration, and if he says to this house that he has reason to believe that the powers that exist at the present time are not adequate to cope with any possible situation with respect to the maintenance of law and order in Canada, I will accept his word and support him in any reasonable measure he may bring down for that purpose. But I do say that he should not confuse any question of the maintenance of law and order with the question of unemployment relief or farm relief. Unemployment is an inevitable risk of industry. It is one of the unfortunate incidents of industry. It is bad enough for those who are unemployed to have to endure something for which they themselves are not at all responsible, but I do submit that it adds, if I may use an old-time expression, insult to injury to associate with the question of unemployment and relief for the unemployed any measures for the maintenance of law, order and good government in this country. Surely it is not fair to the thousands of men and women who find themselves without work through no fault of their own, but owing to conditions that are unavoidable so far as they are concerned, some of them owing to world conditions, some of them owing to fiscal policies, some of them owing to the distressed conditions of the prairies, to say that a measure submitted to parliament for their relief, should confer upon the governor in council additional power to deal with peace, order and good government in Canada. I am going to ask my right hon. friend to eliminate that particular clause from his resolution. I would ask him to do it in the interest of the very subject that he mentions, namely, peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada. I do not think it will make for peace, order and good government to include that particular clause in a resolution dealing with unemployment relief. Let that particular clause be eliminated, and then if for reasons that he may have in his own mind, my right hon. friend says, as I believe he sincerely thinks is the case, that there is need to give the governor in council additional power to deal with this question, let him bring in a measure for that purpose, and I think I can promise him the support of hon. members on this side. But I do submit to him very earnestly that he remove that clause altogether from his resolution and from the bill that may be based upon it. That is the criticism I have to make of the resolution in that regard.

May I next point out the difference between this resolution and the resolution upon which the bill was based that was introduced during the special session of parliament in September last? At that time many of us thought that resolution went pretty far, that it gave the government considerable powers, gave them, not a blank cheque, but a very large cheque. We were inclined to be critical of the resolution on that ground, though we took no exception to the amount which my right hon. friend needed, and we allowed the resolution to pass. The resolution with regard to unemployment relief at the special session of parliament was as follows:

> That it is expedient to provide that a sum not exceeding twenty million dollars be appropriated and paid out of the consolidated revenue fund for the relief of unemployment in constructing, extending or improving public works and undertakings, railways, highways, etc., that will assist in providing useful and suitable work for the unemployed, all as set forth in a bill founded on this resolution.
