try was decidedly ultra-royalist; and never, perhaps, had an administration in any country to encounter such a storm of virulence and invective as that which assailed the cabinet of Polignac. On looking dispassionately at their first measures, they appear dignified, moderate, and even conciliatory; but nothing could convince the democrats of the rectitude of the intentions of either Charles or his favourite ministers. And when it was seen that the king not only favoured the Jesuits and monastic orders, but that he showed a marked dislike to those who had acquired eminence in the revolution, or under Napoleon, and that the rigid court etiquette of former days was revived, they were ready to believe the most absurd rumours of his intended designs, not merely to crush the rising spirit of liberty, but to rule over France with the most absolute despotism. But though Charles and his ministers had endeavoured to uphold the aristocratic power of the state, many of their measures had a contrary effect. The nobles had ceased in France to form an aristocracy. Their great numbers and little wealth; the mixture of political elements they presented; their total want of any political privileges, &c., had left the noblesse entirely without consequence: and it was apparent from the fact that neither the king nor Polignac fully comprehended the wishes or wants of the people, but trusted that something might arise to turn the popular current in their favour.

A. D. 1830.—Though they knew not the signs of the times, they did not, however, forget that Frenchmen were notorious for their love of military glory. War was therefore declared against Algiers, on account of insults some time before offered to the French flag, and also to resent a personal indignity committed on the French consul by the dey, who struck him while at a public audience. An armament was accordingly prepared with extraordinary care, and the success which attended it corresponded with the exertions made to ensure it. On the 10th of May, the army, consisting of 37,577 infantry and 4000 horse, embarked at Toulon, and the fleet, consisting of 97 vessels, of which eleven were ships of the line and twenty-four frigates, set sail. June 14, the army began to disembark at Sidi Ferraj, on the coast of Africa. The city of Algiers was taken after a slight resistance, the dey was sent prisoner to Italy, and his vast treasures remained at the disposal of the conquerors. The maritime powers of Europe were naturally jealous at the establishment of French garrisons and colonies in northern Africa; and to allay their suspicions, it was declared that the occupation of Algiers would be merely temporary; but the French nation became so infatuated with their conquest, that to the present hour Algeria is looked upon by them as a most important acquisition, although it causes an enormous annual waste of blood and treasure, without conferring the slightest advantage either on Africa or on France.

Resolved to take advantage of the moral effect which the "conquest" of Algiers might produce, on the 17th of May appeared in the Moniteur the royal ordinance dissolving the chambers; at the same time, new elections were ordered, and the two chambers convoked for August 3rd. The Moniteur of June 15th contained a proclamation of the king, in which he called upon all Frenchmen to do their duty in the colleges, to rely upon his constitutional intentions, &c. In this proclamation are these remarkable words: "As the father of my people, my heart was grieved; as king, I felt insulted. I pronounced the dissolution of that chamber." It ends thus: "Electors, hasten to your colleges. Let no reprehensible negligence deprive them of your presence! Let one sentiment animate you all; let one standard be your rallying point! It is your king who demands this of you; it is a father who calls upon you. Fulfil your duties. I will take care to fulfil mine." The elections for the new chamber took place in the latter part of June and in July. Though the success of the army in Algiers became known during the electoral struggle at home, and though all parties exulted in the success of the French arms, the ministry appeared to gain no popularity by it. All the returns of the new elections indicated a strong majority against the ministry, so that, in the beginning of July, intelligent men spoke of a change in the administration as a natural consequence. A crisis was evidently approaching.

A blind infatuation seems to have possessed prince Polignac and his colleagues. They preferred to attack the charter, violate the social contract, and expose France to a civil war, rather than to yield. During this time the king and queen of Naples visited Paris, and many festivals took place, strongly in contrast with the state of political affairs. The king also ordered Te Deum to be sung in all the churches of the kingdom for the victory of his army in Africa; the news of which reached Paris four days after the capture of Algiers.

Ardently as some of the fierce and unruly demagogues of Paris desired to see the monarchy overthrown, the majority of the commercial classes and landed proprietors in France dreaded the renewal of civil commotions; they knew there was an active republican party in the country, which though not very numerous, was unscrupulous and energetic; and they had a just apprehension that if the revolutionary party gained the ascendancy, it would lead to a renewal of those dreadful enormities which were committed during the reign of terror, when the Jacobins were in power. But at the same time they were hostile to the restoration of the ancient despotism, which they had been taught to believe was the determination of king Charles and the Polignac ministry to revive.

hility, have passed over without danger, and the prerogatives of a constitutional monarch would have been secured to him. Instead of which the ministers made a "report to the king" (July 26), setting forth at length the dangers of a free press, and calling upon him to suspend the liberty of the press. "The state," they said, "is in danger, and your majesty has the right to provide for its safety. No government can stand, if it has not the right to provide for its own safety; besides, the 8th article of the charter only gives every Frenchman the right of publishing his own opinions, but not, as the journals do, the opinions of others; the charter does not expressly allow journals and the liberty of the press. The journals misrepresent the best intentions of government; and the liberty of the press produces the very contrary of publicity, because ill-intentioned writers misconstrue everything, and the public never knows the truth." This report was accompanied by three ordinances, which virtually subverted the constitutional privileges of the charter. The first dissolved the newly-elected chamber of deputies before it assembled; the second changed the law of elections, and disfranchised the great body of electors; and the third subjected the press to new and severe restrictions which would have completely annihilated its liberties. Astonishment and indignation seized the people of Paris as soon as the news reached the different quarters of the city; but no tumult occurred; but while the ministers were congratulating themselves on the apparent tranquillity of the citizens, the latter had been actively employed in summoning the deputies of their party within reach, or in concerting measures for a vigorous resistance. The principal journalists prepared and printed a spirited protest against the restrictions on the press, declaring their right to publish as usual, and enforcing that right upon the ground that property in a journal differed in no respect from any other kind of property, and that it could only be attacked by regular judicial proceedings for a breach of the law. The liberal papers, notwithstanding, were all suppressed, and only those which were known to be favourable to the government allowed to appear.

It was impossible that this state of things could long exist. The deputies representing the electors of the city, and some from other parts of the kingdom who were then in Paris, in all thirty-two, assembled at the house of the deputy, M. Lafitte, the banker, to take the subject into serious consideration, and decide on some immediate course of action. A number of constitutional peers also met at the duke de Choiseul's. At each of these meetings it was resolved not to submit. The peers signed a protest, and sent it by a deputation to the king, who refused to receive it. The rejection strengthened the resolution of the deputies, and forty counters were sent with dispatches to towns and villages within a hundred miles of the metropolis, representing the outrageous conduct of government, and urging the inhabitants to co-operate with the Parisians in a determined stand for the liberties of France.

In the meantime the government was on the alert, and sent a general officer to Grenelle, and another to Angers, for military purposes. The military command of Paris was entrusted to marshal Marmont, duke of Ragusa. Troops were ordered in from the barracks within fifty miles around; and the guards in the city were doubled. Towards the evening, bodies of gendarmerie were stationed about the Bourse and on the Boulevards. In consequence of the bank refusing to discount bills, the manufacturers perceived it had not confidence in the government, and they immediately discharged their workmen. These artisans congregated in the different streets and reported what had happened to listening crowds. An ordinance was now issued by the prefect of police, declaring, among other things of a restricting kind, that "Every individual keeping a reading-room, coffee-house, &c. who shall give to be read journals, or other writings, printed contrary to the ordinance of the king of the 26th inst. relative to the press, shall be prosecuted as guilty of the misdemeanours which these journals or writings may constitute, and his establishment shall be provisionally closed." This ordinance showed a great ignorance of character; for a newspaper with a Frenchman's coffee is rendered by habit almost as indispensable as his morning's meal. Nevertheless, the officers of police cleared the coffee-houses, reading-rooms, &c. and shut them up. By their interference also the theatres were closed. A sullen discontent was seen in every countenance, and occasionally was heard the cry of Vive la charte; yet during all this time, it would seem, the ministers had no idea of the mischief that was brooding.

On Tuesday the 27th, in the forenoon, the police and a large force of gendarmes, mounted and on foot, appeared before the office of the Nationnel, a popular journal. They found the door fast closed; and, being refused entrance, broke in, seized the types, and carried the editor to prison. They then proceeded to the office of the Temps, another popular newspaper, which, though the door-way was barricaded, and a determined resistance was offered by the printers, they forced, and seized the printed papers and the types. This was the signal for a general resistance to the ordinances. All work was now abandoned, every manufactory was closed, and detachments of artisans with large sticks traversed the streets. Troops of gendarmes patrolled the streets at full gallop to disperse the accumulating crowds. The people were silent, and at an early hour the shops throughout Paris were closed. Troops of the royal guard and soldiers of the line came pouring in. The people looked sullen and determined. The chief points of rendezvous were the Palais Royal, the Palais de Justice, and the Bourse. There were simultaneous cries of "Vive le charte!" "Down with the absolute king!"—but no conversation, no exchange of words with each other. The king was at the Tuilleries. In the Place Carrousel there were stationed several thousands of the military, with a great number of cannon. At the Vendôme a strong guard of infantry was stationed around the column, to guard the ensigns of royalty upon it from being defaced; and there were crowds of people upon the spot, who menaced the troops. Several smart skirmishes between the citizens and the soldiers occurred in the evening, in which the latter were generally successful, so that Marmont sent a note to the king, congratulating him on the suppression of the riots. But when night closed in, the citizens destroyed every lamp, thus securing the protection of darkness for their preparations to renew the struggle in the morning.

On Wednesday, at an early hour, all Paris was in arms; the shops were closely shut, and the windows fastened and barred, as if the inhabitants fully anticipated an approaching calamity. The tocsin sounded, and the people flocked in from the faubourgs and different quarters of the city. The press had been in active operation during the night; handbills were profusely distributed, containing vehement philippics against Charles and his ministers, and summoning every man to arm for his country, and to aid in ejecting the Bourbons. Nor had the citizens in general been idle, during that eventful night; they were ready and organised for a decisive contest; they were in possession of the arsenal and powder magazine; they had procured arms from the shops of the gunsmiths and the police stations; they had thrown up rude barricades across the principal streets to prevent the attacks of cavalry, and had selected leaders competent to direct their exertions. A red flag was hoisted on the several buildings, amidst the shouts of the people. Tri-coloured flags were promenaded in the streets, and tri-coloured cockades and breast-knots were worn by all classes. All Paris, in short, was in a state of insurrection, and every movement of the people portended a terrible conflict.

A deputation of the most influential men in Paris waited upon marshal Marmont, and represented to him the deplorable state of the capital; stating, at the same time, that they made him personally responsible, in the name of the assembled deputies of France, for its present alarming situation, and for the fatal consequences which must inevitably ensue. The marshal replied, "The honour of a soldier is obedience; but, gentlemen," said he, "what are the conditions you propose?" To this M. Laftie made answer—"The revocation of the illegal ordinances of the 25th of July, the dismissal of the ministers, and the convocation of the chambers on the 8rd of August." The marshal replied, that though as a citizen he might even participate in the opinions of the deputies, as a soldier he had only to carry his orders into execution; but that if they wished to have a conference with M. de Polignac, he was close at hand, and he would go and ask him if he would receive them. A quarter of an hour passed, when the marshal returned with his manner much changed, and told the deputies that M. de Polignac had declared to him that the conditions proposed rendered any conference useless. "We have then civil war," said M. Laftie. The marshal bowed, and the deputies retired.

As soon as Polignac's answer was made known, all the stifled feelings of resentment burst forth, and the people rushed eagerly forward to oppose the troops wherever a favourable opportunity presented itself. With a disinclination to take any decisive steps, it was noon before marshal Marmont determined to clear the streets by military force; and he then unwisely divided his troops into four columns, which he sent in different directions, thereby destroying the great advantage they possessed in being able to act in concert. The drums of the national guard soon beat "to arms!" and the struggle began in earnest.

Every step taken by the columns was marked by a series of murderous conflicts; they were assailed by musketry from the barricades, from the windows and tops of houses, from the corners of streets, and from the narrow alleys and passages which abound in Paris. The hottest engagement seems to have been in the Rue St. Honoré, opposite the Palais Royal, where the military were assembled in great force, and the people resisted them with desperate determination. At the Place de Grève they fiercely contended with the Swiss guards, and compelled them to retreat with great loss. In the Rue Montmartre an attack was made by the duke of Ragusa in person; but the obstacles which everywhere presented themselves to the troops were so formidable, and the disinclination of the troops of the line to engage with the citizens so apparent, that the insurgents were enabled to seize many important posts; and when evening closed, the troops, defeated in every direction, returned to their barracks, weary, hungry, and dispirited; for while they had been the whole day without food, every family in Paris vied with each other in supplying their fellow citizens with refreshment.

As soon as the firing ceased, the people made preparations for the next day by strengthening the barricades and increasing their number. Excellent materials were at hand in the paving stones, which were dug up and piled across the street in walls breast high, and four or five feet thick, about fifty paces distant from each other. Besides these defences, hundreds of the trees were cut down for blockades; in short, nothing was left undone that ingenuity could devise, or perseverance accomplish, towards making an energetic and determined stand against the military on the morrow.

Thursday morning had scarcely dawned

when the tocsin sounded "To arms!" and the people began to assemble rapidly and in great crowds. The military, whose guard-houses had been destroyed, where chiefly quartered at the Louvre and the Tuilleries, the Swiss and the royal guards being posted in the houses of the Rue St. Honoré and the adjacent streets. At the same time the students of the polytechnic school joined the citizens nearly to a man; they then separated, proceeding singly to different parts to take the command of the people, and nobly repaid the confidence that was reposed in them, by the coolness and courage they displayed. The garden of the Tuilleries was closed. In the Place du Carrousel were three squadrons of lancers of the garde royale, a battalion of the 3rd regiment of the guards, and six pieces of cannon. The royal guards had hardly made themselves masters of the Hotel de Ville, when they were assailed on all sides with a shower of bullets from the windows of the houses of the Place de Grève and in the streets abutting on the quay. The royal guards resisted vigorously, but were ultimately compelled to retreat along the quay; their firing by files and by platoons succeeding each other with astonishing rapidity. They were soon joined by fresh troops, including 100 cuirassiers of the guard, and four pieces of artillery, each of them escorted by a dozen artillerymen on horseback. With this reinforcement they again advanced on the Hotel de Ville, and a frightful firing began on all sides. The artillery debouching from the quay, and their pieces charged with cannister shot, swept the Place de Grève in a terrific manner. They succeeded in driving the citizens into the Rue de Matriot and du Mouton, and entered for the second time that day into their position at the hotel de Ville; but their possession of it did not continue long, for they were soon again attacked with a perseverance and courage that was almost irresistible.

On the 30th general Lafayette was appointed commander-in-chief of the national guards by the liberal deputies, and was received with enthusiasm by the Parisians. A youth of twenty years of age belonging to the polytechnic school, led the attack on the Louvre, from which the Swiss guards retreated to the Tuilleries. This place was also taken by the people, with one of these youths at their head. The Luxembourg had already fallen into their hands. The young men of this school rendered the greatest service to the cause of the nation; and afterwards declined the medals granted to them, and also the rank of lieutenant, offered to each, in case he entered the army. Many of the soldiers solemnly vowed they would not continue to act against the people; others were disheartened and discomfited; and two whole regiments went over to a body to the side of the Parisians. At length, all the royal troops left the capital by the way of the Champs Elysées, and in their retreat were fired upon by the people. At night the city was partially illuminated, and perfect tranquillity prevailed, whilst strong patrols silently paraded the streets, and passed gently from barricade to barricade.

A deputation from Charles X. at St. Cloud, arrived at the Hotel de Ville early in the morning. At eleven o'clock, the deputies and peers then in Paris assembled in their respective halls, and established regular communications with each other. The duke de Mortemart was introduced to the chamber of deputies, and delivered four ordinances signed the previous day by the king. One of them recalled the fatal ordinances of the 25th; another convoked the chambers on the 3rd; the third appointed the duke de Mortemart president of the council; and the fourth appointed count Gerard minister of war, and M. Casimir-Perier minister of finance. The reading of these ordinances was listened to with the greatest attention. But at the termination no observation was made—the most profound silence was for a time observed—and then the deputies passed to other business. The manner in which the duke and his communications were received by the deputies was an announcement that Charles X. had ceased to reign.

On the 31st of July the deputies published a proclamation, declaring that they had invited the duke of Orleans to become lieutenant-general of the kingdom. At noon of the same day, Louis Philippe d'Orleans issued a proclamation, declaring that he had hastened to Paris, wearing the "glorious colours" of France, to accept the invitation of the assembled deputies to become lieutenant-general of the kingdom. A proclamation of the same date appointed provisional commissioners for the different departments of government.

The king, with his family, had fled to St. Cloud. They now proceeded to Rambouillet, a small place six leagues w. s. w. of Versailles. Three commissioners were sent from Paris to treat with him; who, on their return, informed the authorities, that the king wished to leave France by way of Cherbourg; to restore the crown jewels, which he had taken from Paris, &c. These concessions were produced by the advance of the national guard towards Rambouillet. On the morning of Aug. 2, the abdication of Charles X. and the dauphin, Louis Antoine, was placed in the hands of the lieutenant-general; the abdication, however, was made in favour of the duke of Bordeaux. A letter of the king, bearing that date, appointed the duke of Orleans lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and ordered him to proclaim the duke of Bordeaux, king, under the title of Henry V.

The abdication of Charles was announced to the peers and the deputies by the lieutenant-general on the 3rd of August; and Casimir-Perier was at the same time chosen president of the chamber. On the 6th, the chamber of deputies declared the throne of France vacant, de jure and de facto, and discussed the provisions of the charter. On the 7th, new changes were adopted in it; and it was voted to invite the duke of Orleans to become king of the French, on condition of his accepting these changes. On the 8th, the chamber went in a body to the duke, and offered him the crown, which he accepted; and on the 9th, he took the prescribed constitutional oath.

The spirit of order, manifested by the people during the struggles in Paris, which prevented all outrage and plundering, was still further shown in the unmolested retreat of Charles X., who took passage for England in two American vessels. On arriving he was received merely as a private person. The revolution of July, 1830, thus drove one dynasty from the throne of France, and seated another in its place. In theory, it sanctioned the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, and dealt a fatal blow to the ancient notion of passive obedience; but in practice, it disappointed the "movement party," who looked to see a monarchy shorn of its prerogatives and surrounded by republican institutions.

Though this extraordinary revolution had been effected with such comparative ease, justice could hardly be considered as complete without the trial of those responsible officers of government who had originated, or, at least, sanctioned this war on the liberties of France. In the course of the month, four of the ex-ministers, Peyronnet, Guernon de Ranville, Chantelaine, and Poulignac, were arrested, tried by their peers, and being found guilty, were sentenced to imprisonment for life. While the trial was going on, the Luxembourg was surrounded by a clamorous mob, demanding the death of the prisoners, and threatening vengeance in case the sentence was not satisfactory. As the trial proceeded, and it began to be suspected that a capital sentence would not be pronounced, the violence of the multitude increased, and everything seemed to menace a new insurrection. The troops and national guards were kept under arms by night, and bivouacked in the public places. The whole personal influence of the king and of Lafayette was also employed to soothe the populace; still the number and clamour of the mob became so alarming, that it was determined to remove the prisoners secretly to Vincennes before sentence was pronounced; and the ruse succeeded.

In the beginning of the year 1831, the public mind continued to be agitated by conspiracies and rumours of conspiracies of Carlists, or partisans of the exiled family. Nor were there wanting, on the other hand, republicans and Buonapartists to fan the flame of insurrection both in the capital and in the provinces. In the midst of this anarchy, the king of the French, with that prudent foresight and conciliatory disposition which have characterized most of his movements, determined on a tour through his dominions, one of his objects, doubtless, having been to attach to his person, by so popular a course, a large portion of his subjects who might otherwise feel disposed to join the disaffected, and the enthusiasm with which his Majesty was everywhere received, might have led an ordinary observer to believe that the French nation could appreciate the combined advantages of a free yet fixed government. But soon afterwards, at Lyons, some slight riots resulting from lack of employment, swelled into a formidable insurrection; and the vacillating conduct of the national guard, and the weakness of the military, enabled the insurgents to gain possession of that city, which they held for several days. But the insurrection was at length suppressed; the insurgents were tried and convicted; and the conduct of the prisoners on their trial was made the pretext for an encroachment of the Crown on the rights of the subject, which it had been supposed the last revolution had for ever established.

Whether Louis Philippe was apprehensive that the peace of the country would not be of long duration, or whether he was anxious to prevent the citizens of Paris from showing another specimen of their courage, by any chance they should be brought into collision with the military—or whether it were to provide equally against either contingency—is more than we will venture to offer an opinion on; but our sketch of French history would be incomplete, if we did not state, that on the advice of M. Thiers, measures were taken to fortify Paris in a manner calculated to afford great facilities to the troops in either emergency. These works were begun in September, 1840, and finished in 1844. The city and suburbs of Paris are enclosed with a thick high wall, defended by bastions and moats in various parts. At some distance from this wall, exterior works, consisting chiefly of detached forts, now serve to protect the inner fortifications, and to prevent an enemy from approaching the walls of the city. This measure at first met with considerable opposition; but, viewing it as a defensive operation, and recollecting how in 1814 and 1815 the French capital was compelled to open its gates to an invading army, these defences came to be regarded with more satisfaction than displeasure.

Beyond the period to which we have brought this history, the chief events that have occurred in France are incidentally mentioned in the latter part of the history of England; as, the various attempts against the life of the king; the expedition by Louis Napoleon, who had the temerity to land near Boulogne, in August, 1840, with a handful of followers, under an idea that he could overturn the existing dynasty; the removal of the remains of Buonaparte, from St. Helena to the chapel of the Invalides in Paris; the visit of Queen Victoria to Louis Philippe and family at the château d'Eu, &c. But we will here give a short summary of the leading incidents in its colonial and foreign policy, down to the forced abdication of King Louis Philippe.

During the first years of the new reign, the internal prosperity of France continued to increase in spite of the formidable insurrections which now and then broke out; but her African contest seemed to be far from being completed as ever. Abd.

The History of France.

Kader, the indefatigable enemy of France in Algeria, continued to elude the grasp of the successive commanders employed against him; but he had frequently been driven, after successful combats, to take refuge in the territories of the emperor of Morocco, by whom the French had reason to expect he was encouraged and assisted. At length it was determined to take hostile measures against the emperor, and thus compel him to adopt, for the future, a strictly neutral policy. On the 30th of July, the Prince de Joinville arrived off Tangiers, in the Pluton war steamer; and after some preliminary negotiations with Mr. Drummond Hay, the British chargé d'affaires at Tangiers, who had interfered with the view of averting actual hostilities, they were abruptly broken off on the 6th of August, by the commencement of a cannonade by the French guns upon the city of Tangiers. "It was not possible," says the prince, "to hesitate longer: we were deceived with treacherous proposals at the moment that war was actively prepared against us; there was nothing left for us but to have recourse to arms." In this affair the loss of the French amounted to only three killed, and sixteen wounded; while that of the Moors amounted to 150 killed, and 400 wounded.

The Prince next directed an attack to be made on the town and fort of Mogador; and on the 15th of August he opened his fire from those vessels which could enter the harbour, consisting of the Belle Poule frigate, and three armed brigs. It was sustained the whole day with unabated vigour, and was replied to by a very severe fire from the batteries of the town, and of the island at the mouth of the harbour. About 500 choice troops afterwards effected a landing on the islet: they encountered a furious and sanguinary resistance; and nearly half the number of the Moorish soldiers who formed the garrison perished on the spot, with their yatagans in their hands. The work of destruction proceeded with frightful violence; the batteries on the shore were gradually silenced, and the walls of the town were reduced to ruins. The inhabitants fled from the city to escape the fire from the ships; and the wild hordes of the Kabyles descended from the hills, and plundered the houses, maltreating all who fell in their way. In the meantime, while the Moorish fortifications were crumbling away beneath the fire of the French ships, Marshal Bugeaud, who commanded the army in Algeria, encountered the main body of the emperor's troops, on the banks of the Isly, and obtained a most complete victory. Being now convinced that he was unable to cope with the arms of France, the Emperor of Morocco yielded to the demands of the French, and a treaty was executed between the two countries, whereby Abd-el-Kader was outlawed from the Moorish territory, and the emperor engaged to prevent troops from assembling on his frontier. The French then evacuated Mogador, an exchange of prisoners took place, and thus terminated the short but spirited contest in which France and Morocco had been engaged.

Meanwhile, the indomitable Abd-el-Kader

had hitherto baffled all the attempts made by the French to capture or destroy him; and if defeated in an engagement, he was sure to re-appear in a short time at the head of his gallant followers, in haras and wear out the European enemy, to whom the burning sun of Africa was of itself alone an intolerable scourge. And well, indeed, might the native chieftain thirst for their blood. A dreadful act of vengeance had been inflicted by the French, which invested the campaign of Algeria with the character of such unnatural ferocity as was never before heard of, even in the most barbaric periods of history. The Ouled-Rihah, a Kabyle tribe, were closely pursued by the French, and took refuge in some caverns or grottoes. They were summoned, but, refusing to surrender, preparations were made by their pursuers to suffocate them by placing lighted fascines at the entrance. This produced no effect; and Col. Peleissier, who commanded the French troops, ordered letters to be sent to them, in which they were told that they would be spared, and liberty restored, if they surrendered their arms and horses. With these terms they agreed to comply, provided the French would withdraw to a distance. This condition, however, was rejected; and lighted fascines were again thrown into the caverns. On the second night of this horrible siege, the fires were kindled anew, and the cries of the victims, whom the smoke was about to suffocate, were heard in the winding depths below; then fainter grew the cries; and in a short time nothing more was heard than the crackling of the green wood, of which the fascines consisted. It was afterwards ascertained that a terrible struggle had taken place in the cavern, some wishing to submit, and others stubbornly opposing it. A large number had received yataghan cuts, and bore the marks of deep wounds. Altogether, eight hundred men, women, and children perished; many of their bodies literally sticking to the heated sides of the grottoes. That such an act of remorseless vengeance would be followed by severe retaliation from the Africans, was naturally to be expected. A general rising of the Arab tribes, with the formidable Abd-el-Kader at their head, speedily took place; and the massacre perpetrated by the French in the caves of the Dairah produced some extraordinary exploits of savage valour on their part, and rendered the name of the Arab chief a greater terror than before. It was not until the close of 1847 that Abd-el-Kader, after being hemmed in on all sides, surrendered to General Lamoricière, under certain conditions, which have never been fulfilled.

It was during Sir Robert Peel's administration, that the French and English alliance reached its climax. Queen Victoria paid a visit to Louis Philippe at the Château d'Eu, and shortly afterwards Louis Philippe visited the Queen at Windsor. But, notwithstanding this cordiality of the two crowns, there was no lack of difference, even at this time. In Greece, for instance, France constantly supported the Coletti administration, whilst England inclined to Maurokordatos. After Coletti's death, an insurrection broke out, which was supposed not to be looked upon with much disfavour by England; but the policy which Coletti had adopted finally prevailed, and it was generally understood that French influence carried the day.

But still greater was the result of the French policy in Spain. The interests of France and England were here brought into collision on the occasion of the projected marriage of the young Queen of Spain and her sister. France desired that the Bourbon line should continue upon the Spanish throne. England would have liked to see a prince of the House of Coburg obtain the hand of the Queen. The queen's mother, Christina, had previously been anxious to obtain the hand of the Duke of Montpensier for her eldest daughter; but Louis Philippe showed his usual circumspection in declining this alliance for his son, the treaty of Utrecht having expressly declared that no Prince of the House of Orleans should ever fill the Spanish throne. The candidates whom France one after the other proposed were, the Count of Aquila, brother to the King of Naples, Count of Trapani, elder son of Don Carlos, and the two sons of Don Francisco. As Louis Philippe engaged that his son should not enter the lists as a candidate for the hand of the Queen of Spain, Lord Aberdeen promised in return to support no other prince but one of the House of Bourbon, and the French Cabinet expressly reserved to itself the right, if England should push forward a prince of Coburg, of making a French prince his rival competitor. It was understood that England would not oppose an alliance of the Duke of Montpensier with the Infanta, if her elder sister should have children. But, strangely enough, the English agents in Spain did not adhere to the instructions of their superiors. An invitation even was addressed to the Duke of Coburg, who was at that time in Lisbon, to come to Madrid, in order to negotiate the marriage with a prince of his House. Queen Christina was probably aware of the terms that had been arranged between France and England, and accordingly hoped that France, now released from its engagements, would make the Duke of Montpensier a competitor for the hand of her eldest daughter. But scarcely had Lord Aberdeen informed the French Ministry of this unexpected step on the part of the Spanish government, and forbidden the English ambassador to enter into the Spanish proposal, when Sir Robert Peel's Ministry resigned, and was replaced by the Whigs, with Lord Palmerston as Foreign Secretary, in whom the French Ministry had less confidence than his predecessor. Immediately after this event, Queen Christina, dreading the English influence, urged Count Bresson, the French Ambassador at Madrid, to decide at once for a simultaneous marriage of the Queen with the Duke of Cadix, and the Infanta with the Duke of Montpensier. Bresson, who had a quasi permission to enter into this proposal, adopted the project. But when this news reached the French court, Louis Philippe desired M. Guizot to compel Bresson to a formal disavowal.

Whilst Louis Philippe was thus receding from the course taken by his representatives, the English ambassador in Madrid, Mr. Bulwer, received instructions from Lord Palmerston, that the Prince of Coburg was the real candidate of England. Louis Philippe now became alarmed, and hastened to confirm Bresson's arrangements for the simultaneous marriage of Queen Isabella and the Infanta; and it was in this way that those important and much talked of Spanish marriages were accomplished, which certainly belong to the most important diplomatic victories ever gained by one cabinet over another. But there was no sympathy in France for Louis Philippe's triumph; on the contrary, his ministry was even attacked from all sides on account of it; and the so-called extrême cordole that subsisted between the English and French governments, thus sustained a shock from which it never fully recovered. These events took place in 1846.

But nothing contributed more to weaken Louis Philippe's government, than a series of scandalous events, in which the year 1847 abounded. The Duke of Praslin, a peer of France, who stood in the most intimate relations to the court, in that year murdered his wife, the daughter of Marshal Sebastiani, under the most abominable circumstances. He was seized, and about to be confronted with his judges, when it was suddenly known that he had found time to poison himself, and thus to escape the scaffold by suicide. Letters were published after his death, from which it appeared, that he was engaged in an improper connection with the governess of his children, and that for the sake of this person, he had not shrunk from the perpetration of this foul deed. General Despaens Cubières, peer of France, formerly minister of war, and the ci-devant minister Teate, one of the presidents of the Court of Cassation, were condemned for bribery and for corruption, by the Court of Peers; and after the most audacious denials, the latter was obliged to confess having accepted 100,000 francs for granting some privileges to a mining company. He tried to shoot himself in prison, and it was universally reported that his own son had procured him the pistols. Yet fate would have it that he should survive his own disgrace. The minister of justice, Martin du Nord, died suddenly a mysterious death; he is said to have sunk into imbecility, for he was discovered by the police in a secret gambling-house, where they expected to find only debauchees, and other characters of the lowest description. Bresson, who had negotiated the Spanish marriages, cut his throat. Emile de Girardin accused Guizot of being willing to sell the dignity of the peerage, and he himself was convicted of having sued for this dignity for his own father, and having given a promise to withdraw from the opposition press, in the event of his request being granted. It became known at the same time that the minister of the interior had received 100,000 francs from a ministerial paper, to which he had granted a privilege. The minister of commerce was convicted of having accepted 500 railway shares from the Northern Company immediately after M. Gil-not's declaration that a minister to whom such a charge could be brought home was to be considered infamous. Many other similar delinquencies were proved against Government officials; but enough has been said to show how deep-seated was the disease, and consequently what torments were daily made upon the popularity of King Louis Philippe, and the integrity of his government.

But the proximate cause for the unpopularity of Louis Philippe was his speech, at the opening of the Chambers, on the 28th of December, 1847. In that speech his Majesty ascribed the reform agitation, which had spread over the whole country, to "hostility and blind passions. The angry phrase confounded, in one assertion, the men with the extremes—the ultras with the moderates; those who might at the next turn of the political wheel constitute the new administration, with those whose only chance of power depended on a revolution.

Nineteen sittings were held ere the address on the royal speech could travel through the Chambers. Yet, obstinate in error, the king and the government proceeded to follow up the blow, by putting to issue the legal right of the constitutionally legitimate parliamentary opposition to a reform banquet, assembled not by the members of an extra parliamentary and law-prohibited association, but by those of a great party in the Chamber, for the exercise of an undoubted constitutional right. The reform banquet was fixed to take place on Sunday the 20th; but was subsequently deferred until the following Tuesday.

That Tuesday morning the general committee appointed to organise the banquet, had desired only "to make a legal and pacific protest" against the acts of the government—a protest which, as they publicly advertised, would "be the more efficacious the more calm it was, and the more imposing the more it should avoid all pretext to inflict. Pursuant to this idea, they requested by their manifesto the citizens to utter no cry, to carry neither flag nor exterior emblem;" and such of the national guard as might join the procession, "to present themselves without arms." The dynastic opposition meanwhile had yielded to the conservative cabinet, and, much to the chagrin of the multitudes abroad on the morrow, had resolved on withdrawing from the banquet, and to rest satisfied with the impeachment of the ministry.

Notwithstanding the unpleasant state of the weather, groups of artisans and shopkeepers crowded the Boulevards and the Champs Elysées; and the whole of the immense area between the Church of the Madeleine and the Chamber of Deputies was completely occupied. At noon there followed a procession of labouring men, dressed in blouses, but who were soon dispersed by a regiment of infantry and a civil magistrature. To these succeeded a deputation of students, bearing, unarmed, a petition to the Chamber for the impeachment of ministers.

As the day advanced, the money-changers on the Boulevard closed their shops; for the old Marseillaise hymn, and a new

chorus, "Mourir pour la Patrie," had been sung by the people densely massed in the Place de la Concorde. Moreover, as at the same hour on the 27th of July, 1830, the official residence of the premier was attacked with stones, two panes of a mock window being broken. Thereupon followed a charge of cavalry, by which many were injured, some wounded, and one man had his head cleft open. The national guard, during the day responded with reluctance to the beat of the rappel. A detachment of the seventh legion, on guard at the Chamber of Deputies, had indeed, even early in the day, refused to clear the colonnade, lobby, and avenues. The populace from time to time attempted to erect barricades in the rue Royale, Rivoli, St. Honoré, and St. Florentin, the Place de Châtelet, and other spots favourable to their purpose; but by midnight all had been thrown down, and the troops of the line bivouacked in the streets, along the quays, and in the market-places of Paris. But next morning the barricades were re-erected, and stoutly defended, and some of the soldiers, by whom they were attacked, were slain. The national guard declared for reform and against the ministers. A company of the fourth legion appeared in arms before the Chamber, to present a petition in favour of reform; while detachments of the second, third, and seventh legions raised shouts of "Vive la Réforme!"—"A bas l'homme de Gand!"—"A bas Guizot!" A change of ministry was now inevitable, and the king's choice fell on Count Molé. In the course of the night the supreme command of the national guards and of the troops of the line was confided to Marshal Bugeaud; and Count Molé having failed him, the king charged MM. Thiers and Odilon Barrot with the duty of forming a new cabinet.

But whatever hopes were indulged in from this arrangement were soon dissipated;—for an event had occurred which converted the insurrection into a revolution. A ball from a gun, then supposed to have gone off accidentally, struck on the leg the horse of a colonel of the 14th regiment of the line;—who, conceiving that he was attacked, ordered an instant discharge. At once muskets were levelled and fired—the shrieks and ravings of thousands were heard—and then sixty-two bodies lay weltering on the pavement. Over them, anon, drove a squadron of cuirassiers, sword in hand; and the whole scene about the Hôtel des Capucines, where M. Guizot resided, was one of massacre. Seventeen of the corpses, being placed on a truck, were borne along from place to place, and exhibited for a spectacle by the ghastly glare of torch and gaslight. Stopping before the office of the "National," MM. Garnier Pages, Armand Marrast, and other popular citizens were called forth. Everywhere the multitude cried "Aux armes! Nous sommes trahis!" It became clear that on Thursday morning, no mere ministerial change would satisfy the people. The new ministry felt its weakness, and not further to exasperate their countrymen, directed the military—"not to fire."

LOUIS PHILIPPE LANDS IN ENGLAND: MARCH 3. 1848.

The Treasury of History, &c.

The troops of the line, paralyzed by the order not on any account to fire, presented but a weak rampart against the insurgents; they fell back within the court of the Tuilleries. The national guard had wholly disappeared; the insurgent crowd constituted to advance; already was heard the discharge of their fire-arms. The ministers, in a state of consternation, lost all hope. Amid the terrible confusion which reigned round Louis Philippe, some exclaimed, "Will you permit your whole family to be butchered?" others, "The regency of the duchess of Orleans will save all!" The king signed his abdication, and withdrew from the palace of the Tuilleries to retire to St. Cloud.

Meanwhile the Duc de Nemours, doubtless with the design of protecting the king's retreat, was still on horseback in the court of the Tuilleries, with two regiments of infantry. The position could, however, be defended no longer. The duke gave directions to abstain from firing, in order to spare useless bloodshed. He also, though in vain, sought to repel the multitude by a weak detachment of National Guards who had just re-entered the court. While these events were taking place, he learned that the duchess of Orleans, with her two sons, had quitted the Tuilleries by the garden. It was in good time; an instant later and she must have been unable to save herself or her infant children, for armed bands were already making their way into the gardens through the railing of the Rue Rivoli. The prince ran to join her. On his arrival at the Place de la Concorde, he gave orders for the troops to be drawn up along the Champs Elysees, with a view to conducting the duchess of Orleans safely to the palace of St. Cloud. In the meantime, he posted guards at all the exits of the Place, and at the Pont Touraon. While the prince was superintending the execution of these different measures of precaution, the duchess of Orleans was, with her children, conducted into the Chamber of Deputies, in the midst of a group, in which were many members of the Chamber, and officers in attendance upon the Count of Paris. The Chamber received the duchess with acclamations, which were redoubled after the speech of M. Dupin. On the benches of the deputies and in the tribune, "Long live the Regent!" "Long live the Count of Paris!" were loudly shouted. The sitting, however, was prolonged. The radical opposition drowned the voices of M. Odillon Barrot, who spoke in support of the regency. Finally, several orators, among whom was M. de Lamartine, insisted upon an appeal to the people. At this moment the headstrong rabble, armed with sabres, pikes, and firearms, preceded by persons in the uniform of the national guard, who bore a tricolor flag, threw itself into the hall. A young madman, in a blouse, from the height of the tribune, levelled a gun with direct aim at the president. Another stared with ferocious earnestness upon the group, in which were members of the royal family. The national representation was contemptuously disregarded, profaned, outraged, and dissolved; the regency was trampled under foot; and the Duchess of Orleans and her two sons withdrew; and the monarchy was at an end. Ledru Rollin then read out the names of the members of a Provisional Government. Thence they proceeded to the Hotel de Ville, where the republic was formally proclaimed.

Meanwhile King Louis Philippe had fled from the Tuilleries. When the people came thronging to the Tuilleries, the national guard appeared to take their side, and it therefore seemed useless to call upon the troops to act. The King and Queen then issued from the palace on foot, and walked on through the garden to the very spot where Louis XVI. had been murdered. Here they found themselves hemmed in on all sides, but no one offered them injury or insult. They got into a small one horse carriage and drove to St. Cloud, whence they directed their course for the coast, and on the following Thursday they got on board an English steamer, from which they landed next day at Newhaven, in Sussex.

Thus, after a duration of less than eighteen years, terminated the rule of the House of Orleans in France. "If King Louis Philippe," says a contemporary writer, "had not also been infatuated with the curse of his race—that of refusing to concede a simple and just demand, made in equity and moderation by the people—he would not in his old age have been exiled from his country." He had disdained to be taught even by all his eventful experience. He had forgotten that he had ever written to a Bishop of Llandaff, "Que des reformes faites à propos peuvent lire sans danger; mais que la resistance aux reformes se termine le plus souvent par des revolutions." He had forgotten or disregarded in power what he had written in adversity. In France, after two revolutions, and more bloodshed in the name of liberty than in any country in the world, the press was thoroughly fettered by the law. No French citizen or foreigner could move in or out of or over France, without a written licence, or permission to do so from the police. The freedom of assembling in public or private meetings was prohibited by the laws of September, 1834—laws which Berryer with truth said, "put into execution the ordinances of Charles X." The representative system was so limited by the high money rate in direct taxation required to be paid to qualify electors, as to amount to a mockery of the whole population. In short, though there was civil, military, and legislative equality, for all before the tribunals, and equality for all rich enough to qualify for electors, civil liberty did not exist in France.

The republic having been proclaimed on the basis of liberty, equality, and fraternity, Dupont de l'Eure was named President of the Council; Lamartine, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Ledru Rollin, Minister of the Interior; M. Goudchaux, Minister of Finance; Crémieux, Minister of Justice; Francis Arago, Minister of Marine; General Bedeau, Minister of War; Cornu, Minister of Public Instruction; Belmont, Minister of Commerce; Marie, Minister of Public Works; Cavaignac, Governor-General of Algiers; and Garnier Pages, Mayor of Paris, while Armand Marrast, Louis Blanc, Flocon, and Albert, ouvrier, were appointed secretaries.

The fortresses of Paris and Vincennes acknowledged this Provisional Government. Odillon Barrot, Marshal Bugeaud, and numerous other members of the opposition, gave in their adhesion to it. The palace of the Tuilleries was transformed into an hospital of invalids for the wounded workmen, to whom a million of money, due of the sum which had been granted for the civil list of the late king, was directed to be paid, in order to relieve the immediate wants of the unemployed labourers and citizens. All political prisoners were discharged; and the punishment of death was abolished for political crimes. It was declared that the national tricoloured flag should bear the words, "Republique Française, Liberté, Égalité, Fraternité"; that the red rosette should be introduced as a souvenir of this last revolutionary act, and that it should be worn by the members of the Provisional Government. A strong Garde Mobile, consisting of twenty-four battalions of 1048 men each, was formed for securing the tranquillity of Paris; and acts of accusation were drawn up by the Procureur General against the Guizot ministry, most of whose members had meanwhile fled to England.

But it soon became apparent that important differences of opinion existed amongst those whom a strange series of events had placed at the head of affairs. Lamartine, the presiding genius of the new movement, who sought, with Marrast and others, to govern the country according to the principles of constitutional liberty, was opposed by Louis Blanc and Ledru Rollin, who maintained that the last revolution, unlike all previous revolutions, was more social than political, and that measures should immediately be taken by the Government for the organisation of labour, and the abolition of misère. To meet these views, a commission of inquiry was appointed to sit at the Luxembourg with Louis Blanc as president, and Albert, ouvrier, as vice-president. National workshops* too were opened, where two francs per day were awarded by government to each new comer, and where those the idle and vicious had the same remuneration as the energetic and industrious. The enormous multitudes of working men flocking into Paris from the departments to take advantage of the new regulation, caused great excitement in the capital. These working men formed themselves into clubs, which became the centre of furious debates, and fomented such disorder in Paris, that many of the wealthy inhabitants, desiring a residence in the capital unsafe amid such elements of discord, quitted France, and trade was for a time prostrate. Meanwhile the Assembly proposed to frame a new constitution, and divided the country into electoral districts. Great exertions were made by the extreme party, who now obtained the title of "Red Republicans" from wearing the old red cap of liberty as their badge, to obtain a preponderance in the election of members for the National Assembly. The Assembly, though chosen by universal suffrage, being, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Red Republicans, composed of men of moderate views, great antagonism arose. A formidable outbreak on the 15th of May, resulting from the refusal of the Assembly to appoint a Minister of Labour, and which eventually led to the expulsion of Louis Blanc, was suppressed by the vigorous efforts of Lamartine. This outbreak was followed by another of a most alarming character. In the month of June, the increase of labourers in the national workshops, from 13,000 to 120,000, became a subject of apprehension to the government, who ordered that 30,000 of those who came from a distance should return to their homes. After an interview with the executive committee, a deputation of men from the national workshops collected a riotous mob, as they marched through the streets of Paris, exclaiming against the measures of government. The rapidity with which barricades and preparations for civil war were commenced, proved that the conspiracies against the government were no hastily concerted plans, and the strong line of works, which embraced a great part of the city, induced the executive committee to resign their functions, and confer the command of the forces upon General Cavaignac. On the morning of the 23rd June, the insurrection broke out; and in the course of a few hours, the insurgents had taken possession of a segment of the town of which the river, the canal St. Martin, and the Rue and Faubourg St. Denis, formed the three principal sides. The whole of this ground was a mass of barricades. All the streets leading to the principal thoroughfares, such as the Rue St. Denis, and the Rue St. Jacques, were blocked up at the entrance; at the bridge of St. Anserin, on either side of the river, at the bridge St. Michael and that of Notre-dame, formidable têtes-de-pont were erected; every street was barricaded from one end to another, and those of the barricades were defended by loop-holes made in the wall on each side. These were the defensive preparations; but the plan was to march simultaneously forward by the right bank on the Hôtel de Ville, the National Palace, the Chaussée d'Antin, and the Faubourg St. Honoré; by the centre on the Palais de Justice, the Louvre, the Bank, and the Mint; by the left bank on the Luxembourg, the offices of the Ministry and the National Assembly, and thus form a junction at the western extremity of Paris.

For three whole days this terrible conflict lasted from morning till night, and in spite of the barricades being breached by artillery, of shells being thrown into the whole district, of the mine being brought into play, the troops could gain their ground but step by step, the insurgents beaten from one stronghold rapidly reaching another. Finally on the fourth day, they were forced to retreat from all sides into the Rue du Faubourg St. Antoine, which offered a succession of very close barricades, almost all cannon proof, from one end of the street to another, the cross streets leading on one side towards the canal, and on the other towards the Seine, being likewise barricaded. At ten o'clock a battery of mortars on the Place de la Bastille bombarded the Faubourg on that side; and in a short time, a few shells had set fire to some of the nearest houses. A mine also pushed some considerable distance threatened to blow up a considerable number of the insurgents, whilst their position was taken in flank by General Lamoricière. Perceiving the inevitable consequences of further opposition, they capitulated.

* It is but justice to M. Louis Blanc to state that, whatever evils these national workshops inflicted upon the community, he was in no respect to blame for their establishment. He has himself clearly exonerated himself on this point in his "Pages d'Histoire;" and his statement is fully corroborated by M. de Lamartine, who says, "Bien loin d'être à la solde de Louis Blanc, les (les ateliers nationaux) étaient inspirés par l'esprit de ses adversaires."—Histoire de la Rev. de Fourier, t. ii. p. 120.

On both sides the loss of life was tremendous. Among the victims was the Archbishop of Paris, who had nobly gone among the insurgents as the messenger of peace; but the firing which had ceased having been accidentally renewed, he was struck by a ball in the groin and died of the wound. Immediately after the suppression of the insurrection, General Cavaignac resigned the dictatorship, with which he had been invested; but was forthwith elected chief of the executive.

The Constituent Assembly, which had met on May 4th, now proceeded to draw up a constitution of which the outline was as follows:—The legislative power was to be voted in a single chamber, called the National Assembly, consisting of 750 members, elected by universal suffrage, with a maximum duration of three years. The executive power was to be vested in a president, elected for four years by universal suffrage, with himself and his relations to the sixth degree ineligible for the next term. The national representatives were to receive 25 francs per day, and the president was to have a salary of 600,000 francs per annum with a residence.

These details being completed, the public mind was almost solely occupied by the election of the first president of the Republic. The contest lay between General Cavaignac and Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, nephew of the Emperor and eldest surviving son of Louis ex-king of Holland, who had been elected to the Assembly by Paris and various other constituencies. On the day of election, Dec. 10., it was found that Louis Napoleon Bonaparte had upwards of five millions and a half of votes in his favour, while General Cavaignac had only about one million and a half. His name, no doubt, gained this great majority over his able competitor; and no more striking proof could have been given of the respect paid in France to the memory of Napoleon. But it should not be overlooked that General Cavaignac was supported only by Republicans as sincere as himself; while his competitor obtained the suffrages, not only of the Orleans and Legitimist parties, but of the so-called Socialists, who thus avenged on the republican general their overwhelming defeat in the month of June. On the 20th of December, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte took the prescribed oath to observe the constitution, and was installed President of the Republic amid imposing solemnities.

It would serve no useful purpose to dwell upon the events of the next three years. Ignorance and hero-worship, the superstition and idolatry of a name, raised Louis Napoleon on a lofty pedestal without a single claim or merit of his own; but the moment he was there, one party of the Monarchists hailed him as their precursor, while another considered him a useful stop-gap till they had matured their plans. But whatever rivalry existed between the different sections of the Monarchical party, they all, Legitimist, Orleansist, Bonapartist, combined to prevent the Republic from having a fair trial. They did all that lay in their power to disgust France with the then existing form of government. They converted the National Assembly into an instrument of oppression; they curtailed the liberty of the citizen, destroyed the independence of the press, and undermined the educational institutions of the country. The choice of journals to be sold in the streets was actually left to the police; and the fundamental law of universal suffrage repealed without the sanction of the nation. If the cause of order lost adherents out of doors, the fault was with the party that called themselves its champions within the Chamber. They possessed all the power, if not the will, to do good; the majority in the single chamber was omnipotent in the nation, the executive government was bound to obey their behests, and popular caprice could not affect their position; they were returned under a system of universal suffrage, and no legal power in the state existed to dissolve parliament. If they had been true friends to their country, and acted irrespective of party considerations, they would have consolidated the liberties, developed the resources, and strengthened the position of France. All power in the country was concentrated in their hands; they might have passed a Habeas Corpus act, relaxed their stringent commercial code, modified the system of centralisation, or asserted some principle in their action which would have made them the rallying point of rational liberty. Instead, however, of availing themselves of their impregnable position, and directing the progress of the nation, they only signalled themselves as exaggerated alarmists or faint-hearted reactionists. They seemed determined that France should enjoy the unabated excitement of a continual revolution; they protested against peaceful acquiescence in what had been adopted, and nothing annoyed them so much as the supposition that their constitution was finally settled; its very imperfections were a source of consolation to them, and any new evidence of its instability was hailed as a triumph to their principles. To create discontent with the existing form of government was their object, nor were their efforts without success: they seriously damaged the Republic in the eyes of the people, and it was difficult to find any who were satisfied with its working.

But while the National Assembly was thus reaping laurels in so unpatriotic a field, it was kept in countenance by the doings of the President. From the first it was apparent to all who were not struck with judicial blindness, that his own personal ambition, and not the maintenance of the constitution which he had sworn to uphold, or the prosperity of the country which had recalled him from exile, was the object he had at heart. In the prosecution of his aims he adopted a mingled policy of cunning and hypocrisy, to which there are few parallels in modern times. To gratify the army, he regaled them on champagne and sausages on the plains of Satory:—while the conservative majority in the Assembly were won by his apparent adherence to their illiberal and reactionary measures. Thus he gave a ready assent to the law on the 31st of May 1850, repealing universal suffrage in the election of the president and the assembly (the very law which he afterwards struggled hard to get repealed), and in order to gain over the priesthood, he sent the army into Italy in 1849, which abolished the Roman republic, and reinstated the Pope.

The close of the year 1851 had been long designated as the advent of a great convulsion: no pains were spared to prepare the public mind for some alarming event; it had been the policy of all parties to exaggerate the dangers society was exposed to, and Europe at large was willing to believe that secret associations for the worst of objects covered like a network the whole surface of France; a jacquerie was announced to be at hand, and many a Cassandra prophesied that hearth, altar, life and property were about to be engulfed in a whirlpool of socialism. These and such like rumours were put in circulation by Legitimist and Orleanist, Monarchist and Republican, each in the hope of turning the alarm they created to their own individual advantage. The greater the distrust in existing forms, the clearer, they thought, would be the field for their own systems: the day of confusion was to be the vigil of their success, the outbreak of revolution the eve of a restoration: France frightened from her propriety would fly to any standard which promised a momentary respite, and each party believed that theirs would be the first to wave over the scene of general confusion. But, strange to tell, while the friends of either branch of the Bourbons were thus building their hopes on a national panic, and both were busy scheming the fall of the Republic, while Monarchists were boasting of the sympathy of the people, and Socialists beginning to believe in their renowned importance, some half-dozen individuals swept away constitution, chamber, press, tribune, law and authority throughout the realm, and constituted themselves sole arbiters and absolute masters of life, limb, power and property within the dominion of France.

On the 2nd of Dec. 1851, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, the president, whose tenure of office was to have expired the following May, under the pretext of "saving society," assailed the legislative power, arrested the representatives, drove out the Assembly, dissolved the Council of State, expelled the High Court of Justice, suppressed the laws, swept the streets of Paris with grape-shot, and terrorised France. Since then, to use the language of Victor Hugo, himself an exile, "he has proscribed eighty-four representatives of the people; confiscated from the Princes of Orleans the property of their father Louis Philippe; to whom he owed his life; decreed despotism, in fifty-eight articles, under the name of the Constitution; garrotted the Republic; made the sword of France a gag in the mouth of liberty; pawned the railways; picked the pockets of the people; regulated the budget by ad hoc; transported into Africa 10,000 democrats; banished into Belgium, Spain, Piedmont, Switzerland and England 40,000 republicans; filled all souls with sorrow; covered all foreheads with a blush."

The audacity of the stroke was only surpassed by its success; no real opponent took the field: even the choice of evils was not left: the bewildered nation, reeling under the blow, threw itself at the feet of the power which had inflicted it. A decree, plastered on the walls of Paris, was submitted to by the whole of France. The courts of justice, it is true, and the National Assembly did, to their immortal honour, protest, but the love of legality was so dead that their voice did not find a single echo. Nay more, the immense majority of the nation, when afterwards appealed to, conferred on the president almost despotic powers, and thus appeared to sanction his unheard-of deeds. But it cannot be supposed that a people like the French, who have been the foremost people in continental Europe, should long sit contentedly under their present yoke, whether under the guise of a republic or an empire, or that the army will be satisfied to perform duties usually confided to the police. Humiliated by the blunders of her own statesmen, France may for a while bear from the nephew of Napoleon a policy she spurned at the hands of Charles X. But the more rapid the downward course the more violent the rebound. France lies drunk too deep at the well of liberty to be contented now with the muddy draught with which it is supposed she may at present slake her thirst. Her statesmen, her men of letters, and her patriots, will, it is to be hoped, soon reappear upon the political stage, and restore France to her true position in Europe, as the first of continental powers.

THE HISTORY OF SPAIN.

THIS country, situated in the south-west of Europe, and bounded by the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, Portugal, and France, was well known to the Phœnicians at least a thousand years before the Christian era; yet it appears to have been very imperfectly known to the Greeks in the time of Herodotus. As far as history or tradition makes us acquainted with its aboriginal inhabitants, they were the Celts and Iberians, who became blended in the common name of Celtiberians. Till the coming of the Carthaginians into Spain, however, nothing certain can be affirmed of the Spaniards, and this happened not long before the first punic war.

In ancient times Spain was regarded as a country replete with riches; and though at the time of the Roman conquest prodigious quantities of gold and silver had been carried out of it by the Carthaginians and Tyrians, it still had the reputation of being very rich. We are informed by Aristotle, that when the Phœnicians first arrived in Spain, they exchanged their naval commodities for such immense quantities of silver, that their ships could neither contain nor sustain their load, though they used it for ballast, and made their anchors and other implements of silver. Nor could it have been much diminished when the Carthaginians came, since the inhabitants at that time made all their utensils, even their mangers of that precious metal. In the time of the Romans this amazing plenty was greatly reduced; still their gleanings were by no means despicable, since in nine years they carried off 111,542 lbs. of silver, and 4,095 lbs. of gold, besides an immense quantity of coin and other things of value.

Although the earliest inhabitants of Spain appear to have consisted of Celtic tribes, which probably entered the peninsula from the neighbouring country of Gaul, and occupied the northern districts, there is every reason to believe that the southern part of the country was possessed by the Mauritanians from the opposite coast of Africa; the narrowness of the strait of Gibraltar, and the valuable products of Spain, being inducements quite sufficient for the African barbarians to form settlements there. Accordingly, the Carthaginians, whose descent from the Phœnicians led them to traffic with all those nations who could supply them with useful commodities, early directed their views towards Spain, and about the year 300 a.c. had established a colony in the north-east of the peninsula, and founded the town of Barcæno, the modern Barcelona. In the course of the same century their ambition and jealousy of the Romans induced them to attempt the conquest of a country so advantageously situated for their commercial enterprises. This attempt gave rise to the second punic war. The result was the gradual annexation of the whole peninsula to the Roman republic; and it continued, under the name of Hispania, to form an important province of the empire for nearly seven centuries. It was usually divided into three great portions, Lusitania, Bætica or Hispania Ulterior, and Tarraconensis or Hispania Citerior.

The Spaniards were naturally brave; and though the inhabitants of the eastern and southern coasts had been reduced to a state of servile subjection, yet, as the Romans penetrated farther into the country than the Carthaginians had done, they met with nations whose love of liberty was equal to their valour, and whom the whole strength of their empire was scarcely able to subdue. Of these the most formidable were the Numantines, Cantabrians, and Asturians.

In the time of the third punic war, one Viriathus, a celebrated hunter, and afterwards the captain of a gang of banditti, took upon him the command of some nations who had been in alliance with Carthage, and ventured to oppose the Roman power in that part of Spain called Lusitania, now Portugal. The prætor Vellius, who commanded in those parts, marched against him with 10,000 men; but was defeated and killed, with the loss of 4,000 of his troops. The Romans immediately dispatched another prætor with 10,000 foot and 1,300 horse; but Viriathus, having first cut off a detachment of 4,000 of them, engaged the rest in a pitched battle; and, having entirely defeated them, reduced great part of the country. Another prætor, who was sent with a new army, met with the same fate; so that, after the destruction of Carthage, the Romans thought proper to send their consul, Quintus Fabius, who defeated the Lusitanians in several battles. It is not, however, necessary to pursue this portion of the Spanish history with minuteness; suffice it to say, that after many severe combats, in which the Romans were often obliged to yield to the bravery of the Celtiberians, Numantines, and Cantabrians, Scipio Æmilianus, the destroyer of Carthage, was sent against Numantia, which, after a most desperate resistance, submitted to the Roman commander, though scarcely an inhabitant survived to grace the conqueror's triumph. This was a final overthrow, and the whole of Spain very speedily became a province of Rome, governed by two annual prætors.

Nothing of importance now occurred in the history of the peninsula till the civil war between Marius and Sylla; a. d. 76. The latter having crushed the Marian faction, proscribed all those that had joined against him whom he could not destroy. Among these was Sertorius, who had collected a powerful army from the relics of that party, and contended with great success against Caius Annulus and Metellus, who were sent against him. Sertorius now formed a design of erecting Lusitania into an independent republic; and so vigorously were his measures prosecuted, that the Romans became seriously alarmed for the safety of their empire in that quarter.

On the death of Sylla, the most eminent generals in Rome contended for the honour of having the command of the army which it was intended to send against this formidable enemy. After some deliberation, the management of this war was intrusted to Pompey, afterwards surnamed the Great, though he had not yet attained the consular dignity. Metellus was not, however, recalled; but Sertorius for a long time proved more than a match for them both; and after establishing himself in Lusitania, he made such perpetual attacks on their united armies, that they found it necessary to separate, one retreating into Gaul, and the other to the foot of the Pyrenees. Treachery at length effected for the Roman cause what valour tried in vain; the bold and skilful Sertorius being assassinated at an entertainment by Perperna, after having made head against the Roman forces for almost ten years. Pompey now pressed forward with redoubled ardour against the insurgent army, and the troops, deprived of their able leader, were finally subdued by him.

Though conquered, Spain was not altogether in a state of tranquillity; many of the most warlike nations, particularly the Cantabrians and Asturians, continuing, wherever opportunities presented themselves, to struggle for their independence. But from the time of Agrippa, who carried on a war of extermination against them, till the decline of the western empire, they remained in quiet subjection to the Romans. Augustus himself founded the colony of Caesar Augusta (Saragossa) and Augustus Emerita (Merida). For 400 years the Roman manners and language took root in the Spanish provinces, which in Caesar's time had a population of forty millions. Tarragona had 2,500,000 inhabitants; and Merida supported a garrison of 90,000 men. In the arts of war and peace, the peninsula at that period rivalled Rome; and it gave birth to many men of first-rate character and abilities; among them, Pomponius Mela, Seneca, Lucan, Trajan, and Theodolus the Great.

In the reign of the emperor Honorius, the Gothic tribes of Vandals, Suevi, and Alans, spread themselves over the peninsula. About the year 480 the brave Wallia founded the kingdom of the Visigoths in Spain. The Vandals, from whom Andalusia received its name, could not withstand him, and withdrew into Africa in a few years after. The Visigoths, under Euric, extended their kingdom by the expulsion of the Romans in 484; and at length Leovigild, in 583, overthrew the kingdom of the Suevi, in Galicia. Under his successor, Reccared I., the introduction of the catholic faith gave the corrupt Latin language the predominance over the Gothic; and, after that time, the unity of the Spanish nation was maintained by the catholic religion and the political influence of the clergy.

Towards the end of the seventh century, the Saracens (the name adopted by the Arabs after their settlement in Europe), having overran Barbary with a rapidity which nothing could resist, and possessed themselves of the Gothic dominions in Africa, they made a descent upon Spain. Roderic, the king of the Goths, was a usurper, and having occasioned great disaffection among his subjects, he determined to come to an engagement, knowing that he could not depend upon the fidelity of his own people if he allowed the enemy time to tamper with them. The two armies met in a plain near Xeres, in Andalusia. The Goths began the attack with great fury; but they were totally defeated, and Roderic, in his flight, was drowned in the Guadalquivir, a. d. 711.

Nearly the whole of Spain was brought under the dominion of the Moors (as the Arabs of Spain are usually called) by this decisive battle; those Goths who still contended for independence retiring into the mountainous parts of Asturias, Burgos, and Biscay. But in 718 their power began to revive under Pelayo (or Don Pelayo), a prince of the royal blood, who headed those that had retired to the mountains after the fatal battle of Xeres. In the most inaccessible parts of these regions Pelayo established himself; and such were its natural defences, that although the Moorish governor, Alakor, sent a powerful army to crush him, the followers of Pelayo were so concealed among the precipices, that, almost unseen, they annihilated their enemies. In a second attempt the Moors were equally unsuccessful, nearly the whole of their army being either cut in pieces or taken prisoners.

At this time the greater part of Spain became a province of the caliphs of Bagdad; but in the middle of the eighth century Abderrahman, the caliph's viceroy in Spain, threw off the yoke, and rendered himself independent, fixing the seat of his government at Cordova. Abderrahman's first care was to regulate the affairs of his kingdom; and though he could not alter the Mohammedan laws, which are unchangeable as the koran wherein they are written, he appointed just magistrates, released his Christian subjects from a great part of the tribute-money hitherto exacted from them, and patronised commerce and the arts. At Cordova he built one of the most superb mosques in the world, and it still remains a splendid monument of the skill and magnificence of that enlightened people.

The descendants of Abderahman continued for nearly two centuries to reign in Spain, at their capital Cordova, patronising the sciences and arts, particularly astronomy and medicine, at a period when christian Europe was immersed in ignorance and barbarism. In 778, Charlemagne entered Spain with two great armies, one passing through Catalonia, and the other through Navarre, where he pushed his conquests as far as the Ebro. On his return he was attacked and defeated by the Moors; though this did not prevent him from keeping possession of all those places he had reduced.

In the meantime the kingdom founded by Pelayo, now called the kingdom of Leon and Oviedo, continued to increase rapidly in strength, and many advantages were gained over the Moors. In the early part of the tenth century, a distinguished general, named Mohammed Ebn Amir Almanzor, appeared to support the sinking cause of that people. He took the city of Leon, which he reduced to ashes, and destroyed the inhabitants. Barcelona shared the same fate; Castile was reduced and depopulated; Galicia and Portugal ravaged; and he is said to have overcome the Christians in fifty different engagements. A pestilence, however, having attacked his army just after he had demolished the city of Compostella, and carried off in triumph the gates of the church of St. James, the Christians superstitiously attributed it to a divine judgment; and, in the full persuasion that the Moors were destitute of all heavenly aid, they fell upon them with such fury in the next battle, that all the valour of Almanzor and his soldiers could not save them from a terrible defeat; and, overcome with shame and despair, he starved himself to death.

During this period a new Christian principality appeared in Spain namely, that of Castile, which lay in the middle between the Christian kingdom of Leon and Oviedo, and the Moorish kingdom of Cordova. This district soon became an object of contention between the kings of Leon and those of Cordova; but by degrees Castile fell entirely under the power of the kings of Leon and Oviedo; in 1035, Don Sanchez bestowed it on his son, Don Ferdinand, with the title of king, and by this event the territories of Castile were first firmly united to those of Leon and Oviedo, and the sovereigns were from that time styled kings of Leon and Castile.

Aragon, another Christian kingdom, was set up in Spain about the beginning of the eleventh century. The history of Aragon, however, during its infancy is but little known. But about the year 1036, Don Sanchez, surnamed the Great, king of Navarre, erected Aragon into a kingdom in favour of his son, Don Ramira, and afterwards it became very powerful. At this time the continent of Spain was divided into two unequal parts, by a straight line drawn from east to west, from the coast of Valentia to a little below the mouth of the Douro. The country north of this belonged to the Christians, who, as yet, had the smallest and least valuable share, and all the rest to the Moors. In point of wealth and real power, both by land and sea, the Moors were greatly superior; but their continual dissensions weakened them, and every day facilitated the progress of the Christians.

The Moorish governments, indeed, being weakened by changes of dynasties, as well as by internal dissensions, the Christian kings wrested from them one portion of the country after another, till, after the great victory which the united Christian princes gained over the Moors, in 1232, at Tolosa, in Sierra Morena, there remained to them only the kingdom of Granada, which was likewise obliged to acknowledge the Castilian supremacy in 1246, and was finally conquered by Ferdinand and Isabella.

In 1080, the king of Toledo engaged in a war with the king of Seville, another Moorish potentate, which being observed by Alphonso, king of Castile, he also invaded his territories, and in four years made himself master of the city of Toledo, with all the places of importance in its neighbourhood, and from that time he made Toledo the capital of his dominions. In a short time the whole province of New Castile submitted, and Madrid fell into the hands of the Christians.

The only son of Alphonso died without heirs; and Ferdinand, the son of his daughter, united Castile and Leon. Having thus become more powerful than the former kings, he conquered Baeza and Cordova, and after a difficult siege of eighteen months, made himself master of Seville, A. D. 1248. Setting out thence, he gained possession of Cadix. In vain the mountains of Jaens opposed themselves to his career; the coast no longer allowed reinforcements to arrive from Africa to the Arabian Spaniards, and Granada was henceforward their chief possession.

Ferdinand III., after conquering Cordova, Murcia, Jaen, Seville, Cadix, and subjecting Grenada to a feudal dependence on him, became, in 1259, the true founder of Castile, by establishing "the rule of indivisibility and primogeniture, in the succession. Still the whole was as yet an imperfect confederation. The privileges granted to the Jews in Spain, in the middle ages, had an injurious influence on the government and the public welfare. They were placed nearly on a level with the nobles; they were appointed ministers of finance, farmers of the public revenues, and stewards to the great: thus they obtained possession of all the money in the country, and, by their excessive usury, at length excited a universal outcry against them; and, in 1492, they were banished for ever, to the number of 800,000, from Spain. The improvement of the coun-

Malcontents to England. The prince of Wales, surnamed the Black Prince, invaded France, defeated king John at Poitiers, and took him prisoner, which constituted him the most violent and turbulent of that kingdom. The dauphin, then about nineteen years of age, naturally assumed the royal power during his father's captivity. In order to obtain supplies, he assembled the states of the kingdom; but that assembly, instead of supporting his administration, demanded limitations of the prince's power, the punishment of past malversations, and the liberty of the king of Navarre. A rebellion ensued; and amidst the disorders that convulsed the kingdom, the king of Navarre made his escape from prison, and presented a dangerous leader to the malcontents. Those of the French people who wished to restore peace to their country, turned their eyes towards the dauphin. Marcel, treacherous provost of Paris, was slain in at-

Of all the Mohammedan possessions in Spain the kingdom of Granada now alone remained. Princes equally zealous and ambitious naturally wished to add that fertile territory to their hereditary dominions, and expelling the enemies of Christianity and extending its doctrines. Everything conspired to favour their project; the Moorish kingdom was a prey to civil wars; when Ferdinand, having obtained the bull of Sixtus IV., authorising a crusade, put himself at the head of his troops, and entered Granada. Its subjugation quickly followed. When the capital surrendered, it was stipulated that their king should enjoy the revenue of certain places in Spain, the mountains of Alpujarras, that three inhabitants should retain undisturbed possession of their houses, goods, and inheritances, their laws and religion. Thus ended the empire of the Arabs in Spain, which had flourished for more than eight hundred years.

During the period of Arabian power, agriculture, commerce, the arts, and sciences, flourished in Spain. The universities and libraries at Cordova and other places were resorted to by the Christians, as the seat of the Greek-Arabic literature and the Aristotelian philosophy. From these institutions Europe received the knowledge of the arithmetical characters, of gunpowder, and of paper made from rags; while, on the other hand, among the Gothic Spaniards, the blending of the chivalrous and religious spirit gave occasion to the foundation of several military orders. We may here remark, that Don Rodrigo Diaz de Vivar el Campeador, the hero without an equal, has been celebrated since the end of the eleventh century as the hero of his age. The romantic elevation of national feeling, which found its support in the religious faith and national church, preserved the Christian Gothic states of Navarre, Aragon, and Asturia, from many internal and external dangers.

It was in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, and through the patronage of the latter, that Columbus, a Genoese navigator, discovered America. The country was afterwards subdued by Cortes and Pizarro; and its valuable mines of gold and silver continued, until of late, to fill the coffers of Spain; but riches so easily acquired in the new world withdrew much of the activity of the nation from the improvement of the mother country; and avarice, united with fanaticism, established an impolitic colonial system. Still, the extensive conquests which were made by the Spaniards in the new world, though obtained by the fiercest cruelty and the most flagrant injustice, tended, for a time at least, to raise the Spanish monarchy above any other in Europe.

On the death of Isabella, which took place in 1606, Philip, archduke of Austria, came to Castile, in order to take possession of that kingdom as heir to his mother-in-law; but he dying in a short time after, his son Charles V., afterwards emperor of Germany, became heir to the crown of Spain. His father, at his death, left the king of France governor to the young prince; and Ferdinand at his death left cardinal Ximenes sole regent of Castile, till the arrival of his grandson. This man, whose character is no less singular than illustrious, who united the abilities of a great statesman with the devotion of a superstitious monk, and the magnificence of a prime minister with the severity of a mendicant, maintained order and tranquillity in Spain, notwithstanding the discontents of a turbulent and high-spirited nobility; and when, in 1557, he resigned into the hands of the young king the power he had so worthily held for him, he was able to do so with honour and integrity.

"Never yet," observes Dr. Von Rotteck, "the old Roman emperors, and perhaps Charles Martel excepted, had Providence accumulated such great power in Europe upon one head, as Charles V. inherited.

The two momentous marriages—that of Maximilian I. with the hereditary princess of Burgundy, and that of his son Philip I. with Joanna of Spain (upon whom, however, the great inheritance of her parents did not devolve until the death of three nearer heirs) made Charles, Joanna's first-born, the master of immense countries; they gave by that means the political relations and efforts of Europe their principal figure and determination for centuries.

Charles had scarcely taken possession of his throne, when the emperor Maximilian assembled a diet at Augsburg, and endeavoured to prevail on the electors to choose that young prince as his successor. But though he could not prevail upon the German electors to confer on him that dignity, other circumstances conspired to his exaltation. The imperial crown had so long continued in the Austrian line, that it began to be considered as hereditary in that family; and Germany, torn by religious disputes, stood in need of a powerful emperor, not only to preserve its own internal tranquillity, but also to protect it against the victorious arms of the Turks, who, under Selim I., threatened the liberties of Europe. This fierce and rapid conqueror had already subdued the Mamelukes, and made himself master of Egypt and Syria. The power of Charles appeared necessary to oppose that of Selim. The extensive dominions of the house of Austria, which gave him an interest in the preservation of Germany; the rich sovereignty of the Netherlands and Franche Comté; the entire possession of the great and warlike kingdom of Spain, together with that of Naples and Sicily, all united to hold him up to the first dignity among Christian princes; and the new world seemed only to be called into existence that its treasures might enable him to defend Christendom against the infidels. Such, at least, was the language of his partisans.

Francis I. king of France, was also a candidate for the empire, and he put forth his claims with equal confidence, and scarcely less plausibility. The electors, whose deliberations were directed by Frederic the Wise, of Saxony, who himself refused the offered throne from purely political motive, united finally in favour of Charles, as a German prince, and whose position promised the empire the most certain protection, especially against the menacing power of the Turks. Yet he was required, by solemn acceptance of a convention with the electors, to guarantee the most precious of ancient rights, and to promise such innovations as appeared useful. Although the two candidates had hitherto conducted their rivalry without enmity, the preference was no sooner given to Charles, than Francis discovered all the passions natural to disappointed ambition, and could not suppress his chagrin and indignation at being rejected. We shall find in the sequel, that the jealousy between those potentates cost Europe four sanguinary wars.

was to appoint a diet of the empire, to be held at Worms, in order to concert with the princes proper measures for checking the progress of "those new and dangerous opinions which threatened to disturb the peace of Germany, and to overturn the religion of their ancestors." This subject, however, does not properly belong to the history of Spain, and as our notice of the reformation appears elsewhere, we here merely allude to it.

Not long after Charles's coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle, an insurrection broke out in Spain, which was highly dangerous to the power of the king, and extremely remarkable in its origin, spirit, and object. The commencement of the reign of Charles, whose partiality for his Dutch favourites wounded the Spanish pride, was already attended with disorders; and all the courage and all the wisdom of cardinal Ximenes, whom Ferdinand the Catholic had appointed in his last moments administrator of the kingdom, had been necessary to allay the storm, which the nobility had mainly raised.

The arrival of Charles in Spain would have restored complete tranquillity, had he not wantonly wounded the hearts of his people, who were becoming favourably disposed towards him, by his scornful and despotic manners, and harshly violated the constitutional rights of the country by his insupportable tone, by disregard of customary forms, and by extraordinary demands. As soon, therefore, as he had gone to Germany, to take possession of the new throne, the cities of Castile arose for the defence of their ancient rights. These cities, jealous of their independence, refused to acknowledge cardinal Adrian, bishop of Utrecht, whom Charles, his former pupil, had appointed regent. They concluded among themselves a "holy league," got possession of the person of the queen-mother, to administer, in the name of her, as the legitimate sovereign, the government of the kingdom, and sent to the king a detail of their well-founded grievances, of which they demanded redress. Charles refused to receive the deputies of the league, and thus augmented the exasperation of the people. The league then raised its head still more boldly, and formed plans for liberating the common people from the ancient feudal oppression of the nobility.

The democratic spirit spread rapidly; but it was by this very means the cause was lost; for the nobles in all the provinces, feeling that spirit far more than the abuse of the royal power, rallied around the throne, which they had previously risen against, and around the regent Adrian, whom they had hitherto hated, in order to frustrate the projects of the rebels. The citizen warriors of the league, notwithstanding the high courage and devotedness of individuals, were unable to withstand the shock of the forces brought against them; and though the noble city of Toledo defied their power for nearly a year after all the others had submitted, it was at length taken by stratagem, and royalty triumphed. The most precious of ancient privileges were abolished or forgotten; the cortes, once so venerated and influential, degenerated into tame assemblies, the principal business of which was to grant taxes, but the voice of which was unable to produce salutary reform.

This revolt seemed to Francis a favourable juncture for reinstating the family of John d'Albert in the kingdom of Navarre. Charles was at a distance from that part of the dominions, and the troops usually stationed there had been called away to quell the commotions in Spain. A French army, under Andrew de Foix, speedily conquered Navarre; but that young and inexperienced nobleman, pushed on by military ardour, ventured to enter Castile. The Spaniards, though divided among themselves, united against a foreign enemy, routed his forces, took him prisoner, and recovered Navarre in a shorter time than he had spent in its reduction.

Hostilities thus begun in one quarter between the rival monarchs, soon spread to another. The king of France encouraged the duke of Bouillon to make war against the emperor, and to invade Luxembourg. Charles, after humbling the duke, attempted to enter France; but was repelled and worsted before Metziers, by the famous chevalier Bayard, distinguished among his contemporaries by the appellation of "The knight without fear and without reproach," and who united the talents of a great general to the punctilious honour and romantic gallantry of the heroes of chivalry.

During these operations in the field, an unsuccessful congress was held at Calais, under the mediation of Henry VIII. of England. It served only to exasperate the parties which it was intended to reconcile. A league was soon after concluded, by the intrigues of Wolsey, between the pope, Henry, and Charles, against France; and after a severe contest, in which Francis continued to lose ground in Italy, the authority of the emperor and his confederates was every where established there.

Following up the advantages he had gained in the field by political manoeuvre, Charles paid a visit to the court of England in his way to Spain, where his presence was become necessary. In this he was more fortunate than he had any right to expect; for he not only gained the cordial friendship of Henry, but disarmed the resentment of Wolsey, (who had been grossly deceived and offended by the share which Charles took in conferring the papacy, vacant at Leo's death, on Adrian), by assuring him of it on the decease of the present pontiff, whose age and infirmities seemed to render it not far distant. But the negotiation between Charles and Henry proved of little value to either; for the army under the earl of Surrey, that was sent to invade France, was obliged to retire at the end of the campaign, without being able to take one place within the French frontier.

Francis had prepared not only for the most energetic defence of his kingdom, but was resolved also upon reconquering Milan. This, perhaps, would have succeeded, had he not at the instigation of his intriguing mother, Louise of Savoy, incurred the enmity of prince Charles of Bourbon, constable of France. Impelled by passion, this prince fled to the emperor, in order to fight under his banners, and thereby revenge the wrong which had been inflicted on him. Thus France lost its best general, and secured the triumph of its enemy, by the hand of its natural defender.

In the meantime the imperial army, under the command of Pescara and Bourbon, had penetrated into Provence, and was besieging Marseilles. But Francis, never more energetic than in misfortune, forced these arrogant generals to retreat, and entered once more as conqueror the plains of Milan and their brilliant capital. The strong city of Pavia, on the preservation of which almost the last hope of the emperor hung, he now besieged with all the impetuosity of passion, and with all the resources of the art of war. Great destinies seemed to depend on the issue of this siege. Already the friends of Charles began to waver; already threatening clouds seemed to portend some dire political calamity. Pope Clement VII. (Medicis), previously the enemy of the French, having signed a treaty of neutrality, abandoned the cause of Charles; and England, ministering to the passions of Wolsey, its prime minister, had grown cold in the emperor's interest.

The French army no longer appeared in Piedmont than the whole Milanese was thrown into consternation. The capital opened its gates. The forces of the emperor and Sforza retired to Lodi; and had Francis pursued them, they must have abandoned that post, and been totally dispersed. But Fortune suddenly rescued her favourite son from such a disaster, by the most decisive blow. The evil genius of Francis led him to besiege Pavia, which almost miraculously withstood, during the winter, the immense force that was brought against it, until the generals of Charles, strengthened by reinforcements hastened to its relief. The soldiers of the emperor, eager for plunder, longed to engage; and the chivalrous pride of Francis would not permit him to decline a battle, although in this he acted contrary to the advice of his most experienced generals. Under the walls of Pavia, Feb. 23, 1525, the emperor's army gained the most brilliant victory, Francis himself, after the most valiant resistance, being taken prisoner.

The news of this victory, and of the captivity of Francis more especially, filled all Europe with consternation. The French army was nearly destroyed; Milan was immediately abandoned; and in a few weeks not a French soldier was left in Italy. The power of the emperor, and still more his ambition, became an object of universal terror, and resolutions were everywhere taken to set bounds to it; while France, governed at such a calamitous juncture by the queen-mother, a princess of a masculine and a courageous character, prepared as for a desperate contest. The emperor saw a prospect of unbounded glory, and immediately meditated plans for realizing it.

It was not, however, by pursuing his victory with energy, but by recurring to artful negotiation, that Charles sought to gain his object. He designed to humble Francis, who rejected with indignation the ignominious terms of deliverance which were offered to him, and spent one long sad year in Madrid under the strictest custody. Finally his desire for liberty overcame him, and he signed, on the 14th of January, 1526, the treaty called the peace of Madrid, in which he ceded Burgundy, and renounced his claims to Milan and all other Italian countries. He also relinquished his feudal sovereignty over Flanders and Artois; promised to restore to the duke of Bourbon and his adherents all their possessions, to abandon the cause of the king of Navarre, and, by surrendering his two elder sons as hostages, and taking his oath that if all this was not fulfilled he would return into captivity, guaranteed the inviolability of the whole treaty. But we must not forget to state, that a few hours before he signed this instrument, king Francis had protested before some of his faithful friends, secretly, although by writing, against this treaty, which he said he was compelled by unjust force to conclude, and by which he thought he was nowise bound. And let us not forget, also, that pope Clement II. soon afterwards formally released him from the obligation of this oath!

After Francis had returned to his kingdom, the imperial ambassadors in vain demanded the fulfilment of this treaty. The deputies of the states of Burgundy, having been called into their presence at the same time, declared that the king had passed the limits of his power by ceding their country, and that, if he abandoned them, they would avert from themselves foreign dominion with their own power. At the same time the news was spread of the alliance concluded between the king of France and the pope, in which the Venetians, the duke of Milan, and the king of England also participated. It was designed by force of arms to make Charles subscribe to more moderate terms; and the alliance was called the holy league. But Francis, having become disheartened by his previous misfortune, negotiated instead of fighting, whilst his Italian allies succumbed to the superior forces of the emperor.

In the meantime Charles had strengthened his armies by new levies; and they were now under Bourbon's command. But his troops were a mixture of Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, who, devoid of national feeling, and without love for the cause, served only for pay and booty. So badly managed were the finances of the emperor, that he, before whose power Europe trembled, could not, at that time, furnish money sufficient to pay 25,000 men. In that dilemma the general led the army against Rome, and promised to enrich them with the spoils of the eternal city. Nor did he make an idle boast: for though Bourbon himself was about while planting a scaling-ladder against the walls, the soldiers, infuriated rather than discouraged by the death of their beloved commander, mounted to the assault, took the city, and pillaged it with all the atrocities of rapacity and brutality.

Never did Rome in any age suffer so many calamities, not even from the barbarians, by whom she was often subdued, the Huns, Vandals, or Goths, as now from the subjects of a christian and catholic monarch. During this storm the pope had taken refuge in the castle of St. Angelo, and, not making his escape in time, was taken prisoner. He was confined till he should pay an enormous ransom imposed by the victorious army, and surrender to the emperor all the places of strength belonging to the papal dominions.

Well knowing the horror which his Spanish subjects must feel at the indignity thus offered to the sovereign pontiff, Charles not only repressed all outward demonstration of joy at this new triumph, but literally put himself and his court into mourning, and, with unexampled hypocrisy, had prayers offered up in all the churches of Spain for the recovery of the pope's liberty; when an imperial order would have instantly procured his freedom:

A. D. 1529.—Charles had, however, more to apprehend from the resentment of other powers than from his own subjects; and it was not long before his old competitor, Francis, with the aid of English money, was able to send a formidable army into Italy, under the command of marshal Lautrec. Clement then regained his freedom; but the death of the French marshal, and the revolt of Andrew Doria, a Genoese admiral in the service of France, were serious disasters, which inclined Francis to try the effect of negotiation in lieu of the force of arms. The progress of the reformation in Germany—to which Charles was ever most strenuously opposed—at this time threatened the tranquillity of the empire; while the victorious sultan Solymán, who had overrun Hungary, was ready to break in upon the Austrian territories with an overwhelming force.

In this state of things, a pacific accommodation was too desirable to be refused by Charles, notwithstanding he had lately gained such advantages; and it was agreed that Margaret of Austria, (Charles's aunt), and Louise, (the mother of Francis,) should meet at Cambray, with a view of adjusting the terms of a treaty between the two monarchs. The result was, that Francis agreed to pay two millions of crowns as the ransom of his two sons, to resign the sovereignty of Flanders and Artois, and to forego all his claims on Italy; and Charles ceased to demand the restitution of Burgundy. On this occasion, Henry VIII. was so generous to his friend and ally Francis, that he sent him an acquittal of near 600,000 crowns, in order to enable him to fulfil his agreement with the emperor.

The terrors of the Turkish arms were at this time greatly increased by the cruelties exercised on the subjects of Christian states who were so unfortunate as to fall into the power of the Algerine pirate, Barbarossa. This man was the son of a potter at Lesbos, and by deeds of violence had raised himself to the throne. He regulated with much prudence the interior police of his kingdom, carried on his piracies with great vigour, and extended his conquests on the continent of Africa; but perceiving that the natives submitted to his government with impatience, he put his dominions under the protection of the grand seignior, Solymán, flattered by such an act of submission, and considering him the only adversary worthy of being opposed to the renowned Doria, appointed him to the command of the Turkish fleet. Thus assisted, he not only strengthened his former kingdom, but usurped that of Tunis; and now carried on his depredations against the Christian states with more destructive violence than ever.

Willing to support the exiled king of Tunis, Muly Hassan, but far more desirous of delivering his dominions from so dangerous a neighbour as Barbarossa, the emperor readily concluded a treaty with the former, and set sail for Tunis with a formidable armament. This was the most brilliant exploit of his life. He sailed from Cagliari to the African coast, took the strong sea-port town Goletta by storm, with 300 pieces of cannon and all Barbarossa's fleet; defeated the tyrant in a pitched battle; and 10,000 Christian slaves having overpowered the guards and got possession of the citadel, he made his triumphant entry into Tunis. Muly Hassan, on being reinstated, agreed to acknowledge himself a vassal of the crown of Spain, to put the emperor in possession of all the fortified sea-ports in the kingdom of Tunis, and to pay annually 12,000 crowns for the subsistence of the Spanish garrison in Goletta. These points being settled, and 20,000 Christian slaves freed from bondage, either by arms or by treaty, Charles, covered with glory, returned to Europe, and was received as the deliverer of Christendom; while Barbarossa, who had retired to Bona, lost no time in gathering around him the necessary means of becoming again the tyrant of the ocean.

Whilst Charles was fighting in so glorious a manner against the hereditary enemy of the Christian name, the king of France took advantage of his absence to revive his pretensions in Italy. Glorious as the result had been, the temesty of the Algerine expedition at first portended nothing but misfortune; and Francis thought such an opportunity of turning the political scale might not again occur. How quickly did the prospect change! Barbarossa defeated and obliged to fly; the barbarian prince for whom Charles had interested himself replaced upon the throne of Tunis, and that kingdom made tributary to Spain; while altars were erected there to the Christian religion, and the triumph of the conqueror adorned with the broken chains of slavery.

A.D. 1536.—France now invaded Italy, occupied Savoy and Piedmont, and threatened Milan. Charles, again roused by exertion, arrived with a superior force, and drove the French from the greatest part of Savoy, invaded Provence, and besieged Marseilles. But the great talents of the marshal de Montmorency, who commanded the French army, and still more the determined energy of the people, who now arose to defend their homes and property, compelled Charles to raise the siege and to make a most deplorable retreat across the Alps.

After various other feats of arms, attended with changing success, a truce was concluded, through the mediation of the pope, for ten years, (June 18, 1538), according to which each of the belligerents retained what he possessed. Savoy was therefore divided, but Milan remained in the hands of the emperor, although under equivocal promises in favour of France.

These conditions were not fulfilled. For Charles, having invested his son Philip with Milan, had given his adversary a new cause for animosity; and the second expedition of the emperor to Africa, which was this time very unfortunate, furnished Francis with a favourable occasion for a new rupture. The audacious piracies of Barbarossa, which were renewed with all their horrors, appeared finally to require an avenging sword; and Charles, full of the proudest hopes, undertook this crusade in October, 1541, at the head of a powerful army, well equipped and stored. Hardly had they arrived on the coast of Algiers, when a storm arose, destroyed the fleet, and left the discouraged troops exposed to the fierce attacks of an exasperated enemy. The battalions, relieved by abandoning their baggage and munitions, marched from the gates of Algiers, amidst a thousand dangers and hardships, to Cape Metafus, where the vessels that had escaped the storm awaited them, and the miserable remnant of the army embarked.

A.D. 1542.—Francis thought that the moment had at length arrived for prosecuting his enemy. He took the field against Charles with five armies, on five different boundaries: towards Spain, Luxembourg, Brabant, Flanders, and Milan. Nor did he blush to admit the auxiliary fleet of the sultan into the harbour of Marseilles, or to let the French flag float beside that of the pirate Barbarossa in the line of battle against the imperial and papal fleets.

But all this was of little avail. Andrew Doria remained master at sea, and the five armies of France, notwithstanding their success in the beginning (and notwithstanding even the brilliant victory of Cerisoles, in which 10,000 of the emperor's best troops fell), yielded at last to the perseverance, prudence, and fortune of Charles and his generals. On the other hand, Charles having renewed his old alliance with Henry, king of England, had already penetrated into Champagne, and menaced the heart of France, whilst Henry was advancing through Picardy, in order to unite with Charles at Paris. At length, mutually tired of harassing each other, the rival monarchs concluded a treaty of peace at Crespy (1544), which, in the main, renewed the conditions of the earlier one at Cambrai, but contained also the project of a matrimonial connexion between the two houses. Francis died in 1547.

In consequence of the emperor's resolution to humble the protestant princes, he concluded a dishonourable peace with the Porte, stipulating that his brother Ferdinand should pay tribute for that part of Hungary which he still possessed; while the sultan enjoyed undisturbed possession of the rest. At the same time he entered into a league with pope Paul III. for the extirpation of heresy, but in reality to oppress the liberty of Germany. But he failed in his object, and was obliged, in 1552 to conclude a peace with the protestants on their own terms. By this peace the emperor lost Metz, Toul, and Verdun, which had formed the barrier of the empire in that quarter; he therefore, soon after, put himself at the head of an army, in order to recover these three bishoprics. In this he was unsuccessful. The defence of Metz was committed to Francis of Lorraine, duke of Guise, who possessed in an eminent degree all the qualities that render men great in military command; and although the emperor marched into Lorraine at the head of 60,000 men, and laid siege to Metz, attempting all that was thought possible for art or valour to effect, he was obliged to abandon the enterprise, with the loss of one half of his troops.

Breathing vengeance against France, and impatient to efface the stain his reputation had received, Charles retired to the Low Countries, and took Terouanne and Hesdin. In Italy and in Hungary, however, the imperial arms were less successful; still, by efforts of wisdom, celerity, and prudence, he again snatched the laurel from his enemy's brow. At length, after having reigned over Spain for thirty-nine years, this mighty monarch, whose life had been one continued scene of ardent pursuits,—either disgusted with the pomp of power and the projects of ambition, or sickened by repeated disappointments,—resigned the empire to his brother Ferdinand, and his hereditary dominions (Spain, Italy, Flanders, and the American possessions), to his son Philip. He then sought happiness in quiet obscurity, and retired to the monastery of St. Juste, in the province of Extremadura, where, after two years' tranquillity, he closed one of the most tumultuous lives that it is to be met with in history: A.D. 1558.

profound knowledge of men, and of the art of placing them properly; a mind calm in prosperity, and unshaken in adversity; an activity which continually hurried him from one extremity of his empire to the other—were the talents that distinguished Charles, and raised him to the first rank among those who governed the world. He was inferior to his rival, Francis, in the qualities of the heart, but far exceeded him in abilities, and, independent of superiority of power, was formed to triumph over him. Ambitious, artful, prudent; little scrupulous in point of religion, and always affecting to appear the reverse; prodigal of his promises in danger, and preferring the advantages of breaking to the honour of keeping them; affable and open with subjects who, in a manner, adored him; a dissembler with his enemies, whom he flattered only to destroy; this prince possessed all the virtues and vices necessary for the conquest of Europe, and would in all probability have subjected it, but for the courage of Francis and the capacity of Solymán.

When Charles V. resigned his dominions to his son Philip II., anxious that he should pursue the same plans of conduct and principles of policy, he put into his hands all the political observations which he had written down during his long reign, and which formed a system of the art of government both in peace and war. Although Philip treated his father with great disrespect after he had abdicated the crown, yet he highly valued and carefully studied this his political testament, which being the result of long experience, and dictated by great abilities, might be thought an inestimable gift; but the event has proved that the maxims adopted and principles laid down were in their tendency destructive of the true interests of Spain, whose power has been gradually weakened, and wealth exhausted, by the system of aggrandizement therein recommended, and pursued during the two succeeding reigns. The Spaniards, even to this time, retain the memory of this fact, on which they have founded a proverbial expression, that "in all great emergencies, their ministers are wont to consult the spirit of Charles V."

At the period to which we are now arrived, how powerful was the throne of Spain! Besides that fine and warlike country, it governed also in Europe the two Sicilies, the Milanese, the seventeen provinces of the Low Countries and Franche Compté; in Africa, Tunis and Oran, with their territories, the Canaries and some of the Cape Verde islands; in Asia, the Philippines, the islands of Sunda and a part of the Moluccas; in America, the empires of Mexico and Peru, New Spain, Chili, and almost all the islands situate between those two continents.

The troops of Spain were the first in Europe; their armies, reckoned invincible, were composed of veterans trained in actual service, insured to fatigue, and animated by the remembrance of various triumphs. They were commanded by the dukes of Alva and Savoy, both pupils of Charles V., who had been brought up in his camp, and were already distinguished by their victories. Her immense fleets, which in a manner covered the seas, had been taught to contend with Barbarossa, and to triumph under Doria; the mines of Potosi, and Chili, lately opened, were in full vigour, and enriched Cadiz with an annual tribute of twenty millions sterling.

Philip II. was master of all those possessions. He had recently married the queen of England; and the passionate fondness of Mary for a husband who made no return to her affection, gave him the command of all the forces of her kingdom. This monarch had neither the valour or activity of his father, nor that affability which made the emperor the idol of his subjects: but he had all his ambition, and supported it with those talents and vices which make tyrants so formidable. His penetration and capacity were extensive; but he was callous to every generous feeling, full of duplicity and suspicion, cruel, revengeful, and superstitious.

A truce of five years, settled by the management of Charles V., had given some repose to Europe, and seemed to promise a lasting peace. An aged pontiff revived the animosity of nations, and kindled the flames of a general war. Paul IV., impatient to be revenged on Philip, sent his nephew to Henry II., in order to persuade him to take up arms. Montmorency in vain urged him to reject the solicitations of an ambitious old man: Guise, who ardently wished to display his talents, prevailed upon the monarch to assist the pope, and hostilities were renewed. Henry, who always found a faithful ally in Solymán, was joined by the sultan and the pontiff against Philip. The latter, who, notwithstanding the indifference he showed for his consort, still preserved an absolute empire over her, and found no great difficulty in obtaining the assistance of English forces. Thus Italy, Hungary, and the frontiers of France, were at the same time in a flame. Tranquillity, however, soon revived in Italy, where the misfortunes of Henry, the defeats of Guise, and the abilities of the duke of Alva, obliged the pontiff to abandon the monarch whose assistance he had implored.

In Flanders Philip appeared in person, at the head of a numerous army; the operations being directed by Philibert of Savoy, a prince of great abilities, which he was particularly desirous of exerting on this occasion, from motives of resentment against the oppressors of his country. The flower of the French troops advanced to meet the Spaniards, and a splendid train of nobles followed their warlike leader; the king was prepared to join them, and the city of St. Quentin became the general rendezvous of those numerous forces. Philibert laid siege to it; and it was defended by the gallant Coligny, nephew of the co-stable. The prodigious efforts of the inhabitants, animated by that young hero, confounded Philip; and he already began to dread that he should be under the necessity of raising the siege in a shameful manner, when the impetuous Montmorency appeared under the walls, and offered battle. The French fought valiantly, but their courage was useless; the capacity of the Spanish general triumphed over the rash valour of his opponent; a bloody defeat threw Montmorency into chains, and destroyed the greater part of the nobles under his command. The capture of the city immediately followed.

NATIONAL VANITY WHEN CARRIED BEYOND THE LIMITS OF TRUTH AND REASON, MAKES THE WISDOM OF MEN RIDICULOUS.

France, unprotected on all sides, thought herself undone, and Paris trembled with apprehensions of soon seeing the enemy at her gates. Charles, who was informed in his retreat of the success of his son, no longer doubted of the destruction of his ancient rivals, and the French monarch was preparing to fly for shelter to some remote province.

The duke of Guise, who had been recalled from Italy, was the only person that did not despair of preserving the state. With incredible diligence he collected the scattered remains of the vanquished army; and when, by judicious marches and continued skirmishes, he had given a check to the ardour of the enemy, and revived the courage of the French, he suddenly turned towards Calais, and, after a vigorous and well-concerted attack, deprived the English of a place that, for three centuries, had given them a ready entrance to the continent.

Philip fixed his residence at Madrid, and governed his vast dominions, without the aid of any ostensible ministers, in perfect despotism. By his intrigues the popeedom was conferred on cardinal Medici, who was attached to the house of Austria, and became the minister of his designs. The new pontiff loaded him with favours, and declared him the protector of the church, which title the monarch justified by extraordinary condescension. He submitted to bulls and papal edicts that affected the majesty of the throne, and paid a blind deference to the clergy. His raised immense and magnificent monasteries, rigorously persecuted the enemies of Rome, and presided at those horrid rites which bigotry and enthusiasm dignified with the name of acts of faith. He gave orders for establishing that court in all the provinces under his authority, and published decrees to inflame the zeal of the tyrants who presided over it. Can it be wondered at that the oppressive severity of this execrable court should cause disaffection?

The Moors, who remained in Spain on the faith of treaties, were enraged to see their privileges violated, their liberty continually menaced, and the blood of their dearest friends flowing beneath the hands of public executioners. Despair supplied the place of strength; they considered nothing but the excess of their misery, and endeavoured to break their chains, the weight of which was become insupportable. The execution of one of their countrymen, whom they had crowned, did not terrify them; they supplied his place by another, and implored the assistance of strangers who professed the religion of their ancestors. A general rebellion rent the southern parts of the kingdom, which now became once more the theatre of ancient animosity. All Spain was alarmed; Philip alone secretly exulted at the revolt he had produced. The valour of his troops and the abilities of his generals triumphed over the desperate resolution of the Moors, and these unfortunate people were obliged to submit to the mercy of the king; they lost their rights and possessions, and were transplanted to the provinces that lay most remote from their former settlements.

The people of Arragon, at the same time, demanded a restoration of their violated privileges; Naples threatened to shake off the yoke; and Milan, so long remarkable for fidelity, was endeavouring likewise to break her fetters. The establishment of the Inquisition terrified the inhabitants, and prompted them to take up arms. But the same crafty measures also produced those disturbances, and the efforts exerted by so many nations for the recovery of their liberty, served only to rivet their chains the faster.

The tumults and confusion in Flanders were still more violent. The people were extremely jealous of their privileges, which they had preserved under their counts and the dukes of Burgundy; they compelled Charles V. to respect them, and that prince, after despairing to subvert them by terror, adopted the more generous method of conciliating their affection. Philip, who never had a heart to relish such an expedient, was passionately desirous of bending the stubborn necks of this people to the most oppressive and humiliating yoke; their privileges were obnoxious to his pride, and their immense riches inflamed his cupidity.

When he quitted that country, with a resolution never to return, he seemed inclined to continue the mildness of his father's rule; he appointed Margaret, the daughter of Charles V. and widow of Octavius, duke of Parma, its ruler. The wit, charms, and clemency of this princess, were well calculated to gain the hearts of a generous people; but, at the same time, the usefellow cardinal Granville, who made no distinction between policy and perfidy, or zeal and persecution, was placed at the head of the council. This ecclesiastic was the depository of the secrets of the cabinet, and while he appeared to perform but a secondary part, was actually employed in the first. He treated the nobles with contempt, issued extravagant edicts that were prejudicial to industry and commerce, multiplied taxes, trampled on the laws, and punished the most humble remonstrances and timid representations as crimes. The Flemings, thus oppressed under the yoke of a stranger, contented themselves with lamenting their distress in private; but the sight of the tribunal of the inquisition, erected in their principal cities, raised a general indignation; the people forgot their weakness, and thought not of their duty; protestants, impelled by rage and fury, pulled down churches, subverted altars, and obliged the clergy to fly. Margaret trembled at those increasing tumults, and endeavoured to appease them by a prudent compliance with the desires of the people: the cardinal overturned all her measures, and published a decree of council, equally ridiculous and cruel, against those seditious proceedings, which condemned all the citizens indiscriminately—the heretics for having destroyed the temples, and the catholics because they did not prevent them.

The nobles, foreseeing the consequences of the ill-advised acts of the minister, endeavoured to persuade him from such inconsiderate conduct; but being dismissed with haughtiness, and finding themselves disappointed in their hopes of meeting with justice from the throne, they determined, if possible, to save their country, by a resolute opposition to the council, that should re-establish the vigour of the laws.

At the head of those nobles was William, prince of Orange, descended from the illustrious house of Nassau, that three centuries before had swayed the imperial sceptre. With every necessary qualification for effecting a revolution, William had ambition, capacity, and courage to undertake any thing, and saw, with secret pleasure, that the imprudent haughtiness of the Spanish ministers was opening a road to give him independence. In order to conceal his ambitious designs, he assumed an air of submission and respect, and talked of nothing but carrying the complaints of his countrymen to Madrid; but he secretly concerted a more extensive plan.

With this view he conciliated the friendship of the great, and ingratiated himself in a particular manner with the counts Egmont and Horn. These two noblemen were descended from very ancient families, and were both excellent citizens and faithful subjects: Egmont was distinguished for victories he had gained for the house of Austria; Horn was respected for his virtues by all parties. The cries of the nation carried to the throne by such venerable advocates seemed to affect Philip; Granville was recalled, and the people flattered themselves with the hope of seeing their grievances redressed by a new minister.

In some men the most valuable powers of the mind are united with the basest passions. Thus it was with Alva, whom Philip had appointed to succeed Granville. As soon as he arrived in Flanders, by an affected show of lenity and moderation that silenced all diffidence and apprehensions, he appeased and united the Flemings, disarmed them, and decoyed the principal nobility to Brussels. The governor, thus master of their fate, threw off the mask that till then concealed his despotic and sanguinary sentiments, confined the most distinguished persons in a dungeon, and appointed a special commission for their trial. Judges, devoted to his mandates, condemned eighteen noblemen to death, and a few days after pronounced the like sentence against Egmont and Horn. These executions, conducted with the most awful solemnity, were a prelude to many others. Executioners were dispatched from one city to another, and in the space of one month thousands perished under their hands. Terror, which at first chilled the courage of the people, at length gave place to despair, by which it was relieved. Numerous armies appeared on every side, all animated by the desire of avenging the blood of their friends and fellow-citizens shed on the scaffold, and all made desperate by the certainty of having no hope of pardon. Alva, no less great as a commander than he was barbarous as a minister, hastened at the head of a small body of Spaniards to the different provinces, fought and triumphed at every step, dispersed the confederates, beat down the walls of the cities, and deluged the streets with blood.

One head, however, escaped the governor's snares: William, prince of Orange, having more penetration than his unfortunate friends, did not give way to the flattering invitations of the Spaniard. He retired to Germany, where he learned, with the rest of Europe, the miseries of his country; proscribed as he was, and his fortune confiscated; without friends or support, he ventured to declare himself openly the avenger of his countrymen. A general hatred against Philip, whose enormities he laid open; horror and detestation against the duke of Alva, whose tyrannical excesses he painted in strong colours; the interest of the protestant religion, the alliances of the house of Nassau with so many sovereigns, his prayers, his patience and resolution, procured him a small army, and his two brothers who joined him gave increase to his hopes.

He scarce raised the standard of liberty, when the people flocked round him ready to obey his orders. His first attempts were unsuccessful, and gave way to the superior fortune of the duke of Alva; he returned to Germany, collected another army, made his appearance in Holland again, and was once more obliged to fly. Haarlem, Flushing, Leyden, and most of the maritime towns renounced all obedience to the duke of Alva; the love of civil and religious liberty animated every breast, and the Hollanders, till then obscure and insignificant, seemed to become a nation of heroes. Courage and skill were in vain opposed to them: the love of liberty supplied the place of numbers, policy, experience, and riches.

At length the sovereignty of Philip was abjured, the Roman catholic religion abolished, the state erected into a republic, and William declared their chief, under the title of stadtholder. But he did not long enjoy the title. An assassin employed by Philip gratified his revenge against William; and the sudden death of that great man seemed to threaten the extinction of the republic he had created; but Maurice, his worthy son, inherited his dignity, his talents, and his zeal.

The new stadtholder was not dismayed at the approach of the dukes of Parma, though that hero possessed all the capacity of the duke of Alva, and, with more knowledge and experience, had many excellent qualities. Though reduced to the last extremity by the amazing efforts of their enemies, they would listen to no accommodation, and contented themselves with soliciting succours from queen Elizabeth. Their persevering efforts were rewarded; the republic revived, her fleets returned from distant countries richly laden, and furnished her with new resources for repelling her tyrants and securing her liberty on a solid foundation.

While Philip was pursuing the war against these obstinate revolvers, an unexpected revolution procured him a new kingdom. John III., who during a long reign saw Portugal enjoy the most splendid prosperity, left only a grandson for his successor, who was still an infant, and promised to be the model of happy monarchs. A peaceful and wise regency augmented those expectations, which were confirmed by the great qualities that appeared in Sebastian.

This prince, in peace with all Europe, master of the most extensive commerce till then carried on, idolized by his people, who fancied the great kings his predecessors were revived in him, appeared to have nothing that could prevent him from enjoying an enviable felicity. But a vain passion for glory having suddenly captivated the mind of Sebastian, hurried him to the tomb, and with him the glory and prosperity of the nation vanished for ever.

One of those scenes of ambition so frequent among barbarians, had lately been exhibited at Morocco. The ruler of that country was both weak and odious, and his uncle taking advantage of his unpopularity, obtained the crown. The unfortunate monarch having no hopes of assistance from subjects that had suffered by his oppression, applied to the Christian princes, and endeavoured to interest them in his cause by the most specious promises. Philip was too prudent to engage in a war from which he could derive but little advantage, and therefore rejected the solicitations and offers of the African. Sebastian eagerly embraced them, and resolved to employ all his forces in restoring the tyrant. Deaf to all advice, and blind to every other consequence, he could see nothing in the prosecution of this design but the honour of being the protector of kings, the glory of having an emperor for his vassal, and of planting the standard of Christianity in the capital of one of the most powerful enemies of the cross. He led the army in person to Africa, and having landed with such success as seemed to presage still greater advantages, he exulted in the general consternation that appeared around him. But his fond hopes were speedily dissipated; for when on the plains of Alcazar the armies of Europe and Africa contested the prize of valour, the vanquished Christians suffered a memorable defeat; half the Portuguese nobility fell beneath the Moorish scimitar, and three kings were slain.

The cardinal Henry immediately ascended the throne of Portugal, but he survived his accession only two years; and Philip, being in the same degree of affinity with Catherine, duchess of Braganza, who then claimed the sceptre, supported his pretensions by force of arms, and proved victorious in many a sanguinary encounter. Lisbon was taken, plundered, and deluged with blood. Executioners succeeded to the soldiery; the whole kingdom was subjected to Philip, and his good fortune at the same time gave him possession of all the appendages of the crown—the Portuguese colonies on the coasts of Africa, Brazil, and the richest islands of the Indies. Yet, rich and extensive as were his possessions, valiant as were his troops, and inflexible as he was in all that he undertook, the brave Flemings, assisted by Elizabeth of England, carried on the war in support of their independence with unconquerable fortitude. Impatient of this long protracted struggle, so disgraceful to him who could boast the best troops and most able generals in the world, Philip resolved, by one stupendous effort, to subdue the spirit of revolt, and chastise the powers which had abetted it. He fitted out, in the year 1588, the most formidable fleet that had ever sailed, and, that religious zeal might give greater force to the weapons of war, the pope (Sixtus V.) bestowed on it his benediction, and styled it "the invincible armada." Three years had been spent in preparing this armament, which was destined for the conquest of England. It consisted of 130 ships, most of which, from their large size, were unwieldy; nor was the skill of the Spaniards in maritime affairs equal to the management of such a fleet. No sooner had the armada entered the narrow seas, than it was beset with violent tempests; whilst the whole naval force of England, then composed of light quick-sailing ships, was drawn together to oppose the attack. Lord Effingham had the chief command, and sir Francis Drake, the circumnavigator, who was vice-admiral, performed signal services. The superior seamanship of the English was very successfully displayed in this important contest, in which great advantages were obtained from the use of fire-ships, which were first brought into use upon this memorable occasion. Such were the consequences, both from the elementary war and the attacks of their enemies, that in the course of a month from the time they left Coruna, no more than fifty-three ships had escaped destruction, and about 20,000 persons perished in the expedition. [For a more detailed account, see "ENGLAND," p. 345, &c.]

compared, and in some respects with justice, to Tiberius. Both these tyrants attempted and accomplished the abasement of the character of their people; both were equally dreaded by their own families and by their subjects; both were full of the deepest dissimulation; both were severe towards others, and licentious in their own habits. But Philip possessed great perseverance, admirable firmness under adverse circumstances, and an appearance of devotion calculated to make a strong impression on the people, together with that stately reserve which the multitude mistakes for dignity. Notwithstanding this severity of deportment, his manners were affable and gracious when he chose to assume that character. He suffered nothing to stand in the way of his undertakings; he regarded religion and crime as two instruments, of which he equally availed himself without hesitation, according as either was suitable to his purposes; for he seemed to think that the performance of certain exterior rites of devotion, and a strict adherence in religious opinions to the dogmas of Rome, gave him unbounded license in all other respects. He was succeeded by Philip III., his son by his fourth wife, Anna of Austria; Don Carlos, his eldest son, who was accused of a conspiracy against the life of his father, having ended his days in 1568.

Philip III. was not less bigoted or superstitious than his predecessors, but he was less stained with crime and without the dangerous ambition of his father. A peace with England was concluded in 1604, and an armistice for twelve years with the Netherlands in 1609; but Spain suffered an irreparable loss in population and wealth by the expulsion of the Moriscos or descendants of the Moors. They were allowed thirty days to banish themselves, and death was the punishment appointed for such as remained behind after the specified time. By this impolitic act, and the subsequent expulsion of the Jews, Spain lost 600,000 of her most industrious inhabitants, besides those who were successively butchered, a loss which transferred five-sixths of her commerce and manufactures to other countries, and reduced the public revenue from thirty to fourteen millions of ducats. After a reign of twenty-two years, he died, and was succeeded by his son; A. D. 1621.

Under the reign of Philip IV. Portugal shook off its bonds by a happily conducted revolution, which placed the house of Braganza on the throne in 1640. The war in the Netherlands was renewed, but to no other purpose than to bring about a peace, in 1648, by which the king of Spain, acknowledged the independence of the Seven United Provinces. During the thirty years' war France acted against Spain, which was allied to Austria; and this struggle was not even terminated by the peace of Westphalia, but continued till the peace of the Pyrenees, in 1659, by which Roussillon and Perpignan were ceded to France, and a marriage was concerted between the infanta Maria Theresa, Philip's daughter, and Louis XIV.

In 1665 Philip IV. died, leaving for his successor an infant son (Charles II.) only four years of age, during whose minority the queen dowager, Mary Anne of Austria, governed the kingdom, whilst she resigned herself to the government of her confessor, a Jesuit, and by birth a German, named Nitard, whom she caused to be appointed inquisitor-general. The king, when eighteen years of age, married a daughter of Philip, duke of Orleans, who by her mother was grand-daughter to Charles I. of England; but this marriage producing no issue, on the death of the king, which happened in 1700, the succession to the crown of Spain was contested between Philip duke of Anjou, second son of the dauphin, and grandson to Louis XIV. by Maria Theresa, whom the deceased king had in his will named for his immediate successor, and the archduke Charles of Austria, brother to the emperor Joseph.

On this occasion, the jealousy which prevailed of the increasing power of the French monarchy, occasioned a grand alliance to be formed between the maritime powers and the house of Austria, to prevent the duke of Anjou from obtaining the crown of Spain, and to place that diadem on the head of the archduke Charles. This occasioned a long and destructive war; but the unexpected death of the emperor Joseph, in 1711, when he was in the 33rd year of his age, entirely changed the political aspect of Europe; and Charles, who had assumed the title of king of Spain, and entered Madrid in triumph, in consequence of the wonderful successes of the earl of Peterborough succeeding his brother in the empire, that idea of maintaining the balance of power in Europe, which had procured the archduke such powerful support against the pretensions of Philip, now pointed out the bad policy of suffering the empire and the kingdom of Spain to be again held by the same sovereign. This, together with the reverse of fortune which had happened to Charles, by the defeat at Almanza, brought about the peace of Utrecht, which confirmed the crown of Spain to Philip, but stripped it of all those valuable European appendages which had for many years been annexed to that monarchy; Belgium, Naples, Sicily, and Milan being resigned to Austria; Sardinia to Savoy; and Minorca and Gibraltar to England.

To prevent, as much as possible, the danger apprehended from two kingdoms being possessed by one prince of the house of Bourbon, Philip V. solemnly renounced his right to the crown of France, in case the succession should happen to devolve on him; and his brothers, the dukes of Berri and Orleans, on their parts renounced all claim to the crown of Spain; but as there has not been wanting lineal descendants to succeed to the sovereignty of each kingdom, the collateral branches have not had occasion to make known to the world how far they consider themselves bound by these solemn acts to deprive themselves of their natural rights, which acts might otherwise have been found weak restraints upon their ambition.

Many important conquests were made by the navy of Great Britain in the Mediterranean, during the war for the succession; and the strength and resources of Spain were in every respect greatly exhausted by it. The provinces of Valencia, Catalonia, and Arragon, which had adhered to the interests of Charles, severely felt the resentment of Philip, when he became established on the throne; all the remains of liberty which those people had been allowed to retain since the days of the Gothic kings, were abolished, and the sovereign assumed an absolute power over the lives and fortunes of his subjects.

Cardinal Alberoni, an Italian, who became minister to Philip IV. soon after he married his second wife, the princess Elizabeth, daughter of the duke of Parma (1714), was formed for enterprize and intrigue: he laboured indefatigably to restore the kingdom to something of its former consequence; and by his attention and superior talents the Spanish navy was greatly augmented. His designs were so bold and extensive, that for a short time they seemed likely to effect mighty changes in the political system of Europe; and in 1717 Spain refused to ratify the peace of Utrecht. All these ideal projects were, however, at once disconcerted by the British court, in sending a fleet into the Mediterranean, which, without any previous declaration of war, attacked the naval force of Spain, at Cape Passaro, near Sicily (Aug. 1718), and took or destroyed the greatest part of their ships. This decided step on the part of England soon procured the dismissal of Alberoni, and at the same time gave birth to the quadruple alliance between Great Britain, France, Holland, and Germany.

In 1739 great misunderstandings arose between the courts of Madrid and London, in respect to the right which the subjects of the latter claimed to cut logwood on the Spanish main, and from the conduct of the guarda-costas of the former in the West Indies, in seizing upon and confiscating British merchant-ships there. These disputes gave rise to a war, the principal event of which was the taking of Porto Bello by the English. Philip V. died in 1746, and was succeeded by Ferdinand VI., his son by his first queen, who reigned thirteen years, and dying without issue, was succeeded by his half-brother Charles III., then king of the two Sicilies.

Under the reign of Charles III. the Bourbon family compact of 1761 involved Spain, to its injury, in the war between England and France. The expeditions against Algiers likewise miscarried; as did the siege of Gibraltar, in the war of 1797-98. Yet the internal administration improved, as was seen in the advancement of agriculture, commerce, and the useful arts, while the population was considerably on the increase. The power of the Inquisition also was restricted, and the secret opposition of the jesuits annihilated at a blow, by the "pragmatic sanction" of 1767, which banished them from all the Spanish dominions, and confiscated their property. The grossest superstition, however, still abounded, and a strict observance of the most frivolous ceremonials of the church was regarded as obligatory and indispensable.

Charles IV. ascended the throne in 1788. The progress of improvement was still observable while the able Florida Blanca conducted the affairs of the nation. But he was superseded, in 1792, by Godoy, whose administration was as void of plan as it was injurious to the state, and greatly exasperated the people; so that the fall of the most fortunate and proudest favourite of modern times, was immediately favoured by that of the royal family.

Spain at first entered with seal into the war against the French republic; but the favourite ruined all, by hastening to conclude the discreditable peace of Basle, by which Spain resigned half of St. Domingo; on which occasion Godoy received the title of "Prince of Peace." He then concluded with the republic the important offensive and defensive alliance of St. Ildefonso, in 1796, and declared war against Great Britain; but being defeated at sea, Spain lost Trinidad, by the peace of Amiens, in 1802. The prince withdrew from the conduct of affairs, but retained his influence, and rose to high dignities. In 1801 military operations were commenced against Portugal, which was obliged to cede Olivença, to Spain, at the peace of Badajoz; whilst France took possession of Parma, and made its duke king of Etruria, in 1801; in consequence of which Spain ceded Louisiana to Napoleon, who, in 1803, sold it to the United States.

Charles IV., in the war between Great Britain and France in 1803, having purchased permission to remain neutral, by the payment of a monthly tribute of 1,000,000 piastres to Napoleon, the British seized the Spanish frigates which were carrying the products of the American mines to Cadiz, in 1804; and Spain was compelled to declare war. The victory of the British at Trafalgar, Oct. 21, 1805, destroyed its naval power; the bold Miranda excited the desire for independence in Spanish America, in 1806; and Napoleon overthrew the throne of the Bourbons in Naples. The prince of peace now called on the Spanish nation to arm against "the common enemy;" and Napoleon, therefore, sent a Spanish army, under Romana, to Denmark, and another, under O'Farrill, to Tuscany. October 27, 1807, he concluded a secret treaty at Fontainebleau, respecting the division of Portugal; and 28,000 French soldiers, maintained by Spain, marched over the Pyrenees, and were joined by 11,000 Spaniards. The family quarrels of the royal family favoured the plans of the French ruler in Spain. At the instigation of Godoy,

The History of Spain.

Charles IV. wrote to Napoleon, stating that his son Ferdinand, prince of Asturias, had intended to dethrone him, and to deprive his mother of life, so that he ought to be excluded from the succession. The junta, however, unanimously acquitted the prince and the other prisoners; but Godoy induced Ferdinand to ask pardon of the king and queen, on which the king caused the letter to be published in the Gazette of Madrid, and issued a decree granting pardon to the prince on account of his repentance. The other prisoners were banished.

Thus ended the process of the Escurial. In the meanwhile French troops entered Spain. Charles IV. received them as allies; but, on a sudden, the court prepared to leave Aranjuez for Seville; and it was rumoured that the royal family intended to go to Mexico. Nothing would now satisfy the people but the dismissal of the prince of peace. This was done; on the next day, March 19, 1808, Charles IV. resigned the crown in favour of his son; and on the 24th Ferdinand made his public entry into Madrid, which had been occupied by Murat, commander of the French troops, the day previous. Ferdinand informed Napoleon of his assumption of the royal power, while Charles made it known to him that he had retracted his resignation. It required not the keen eye of the emperor to discern that the affairs of the royal family were most wretchedly embroiled; and he failed not to profit by it, but caused the whole family to be conveyed to Bayonne, where he himself arrived April 15.

During the meeting at Bayonne, a commotion, attended with bloodshed, took place at Madrid between the French and Spaniards, the latter, excited by the arrogance of their visitors, having attacked them. Joseph Buonaparte, accompanied by all the ministers of Ferdinand VII., entered Madrid, as the future monarch of Spain; but some parts of the country would not acknowledge him so easily. Supine as the Spaniards appeared in the first instance, it could not be expected that a change of dynasty, or rather a transfer of one large country to the dominions of another, could be effected without some opposition; yet had it not been for the energetic support of Great Britain, the struggle could not have lasted long.

The historian of the Peninsular war forcibly and truly observes, that "the imbecility of Charles IV., the villainy of Ferdinand, and the corruption of Godoy, were undoubtedly the proximate causes of the calamities that overwhelmed Spain; but the primary cause, that which belongs to history, was the despotism arising from the union of a superstitious court with a sanguinary priesthood; a despotism which, by depressing knowledge and contracting the public mind, sapped the foundation of all military as well as civil virtues, and prepared the way for invasion. No foreign potentate would have attempted to steal into the fortresses of a great kingdom, if the prying eyes, and the thousand clamorous tongues belonging to a free press, had been ready to expose his projects, and a well-disciplined army present to avenge the insult; but Spain, being destitute of both, was first circumvented by the wiles, and then ravaged by the arms of Napoleon. She was deceived and fettered because the public voice was stifled; she was scourged and torn because her military institutions were decayed.

"From the moment that an English force took the field, the Spaniards ceased to act as principals in a contest carried on in the heart of their country, and involving their existence as an independent nation. They were self-sufficient, and their pride was wounded by insult; they were superstitious, and their religious feelings were roused to fanatic fury by an all-powerful clergy, who feared to lose their own rich endowments; but after the first burst of indignation the cause of independence created little enthusiasm. Horrible barbarities were exercised on all French soldiers thrown by sickness or the fortune of war into the power of the invaded, and a dreadful spirit of personal hatred was kept alive by the exactions and severe retaliations of the invaders; yet no great and general exertion to drive the latter from the soil was made, at least none was sustained with steadfast courage in the field. Manifestoes, decrees, and lofty boasts, like a cloud of canvas covering a rotten hull, made a gallant appearance, when real strength and firmness were nowhere to be found. The Spanish insurrection presented, indeed, a strange spectacle. Patriotism was seen supporting a vile system of government; a popular assembly working for the restoration of a despotic monarch; the higher classes seeking a foreign master; the lower armed in the cause of bigotry and misrule. The upstart leaders, secretly abhorring freedom, though governing in her name, trembled at the democratic activity they had themselves excited; they called forth all the bad passions of the multitude, and repressed the patriotism that would regenerate as well as save. The country suffered the evils, without enjoying the benefits, of a revolution; for while tumults and assassinations terrified or disgusted the sensible part of the community, a corrupt administration of the resources extinguished patriotism, and neglect ruined the armies. The peasant-soldier, usually flying at the first onset, threw away his arms and returned to his home, or, attracted by the license of the partidas, joined the banners of men, who, for the most part, originally robbers, were as oppressive to the people as the enemy; and these guerrilla chiefs would, in their turn, have been as quickly exterminated, had not the French, pressed by lord Wellington's battalions, been obliged to keep in large masses; this was the secret of Spanish constancy. It was the copious supplies from England, and the valour of the Anglo-Portuguese troops, that supported the war, and it was the gigantic vigour with which the duke of Wellington resisted the fierceness of France, and sustained the weakness of three inefficient cabinets, that delivered the peninsula."

The people in Asturias first took up arms; Arragon, Seville, and Badajoz followed. Palafox carried from Bayonne to Saragozza the order of the prince of Asturias that the people should arm; and the supreme junta received permission to assemble the cortes. Early in June the junta at Seville had issued a proclamation of war, and the French squadron at Cadiz surrendered to the Spaniards. Six days later an insurrection broke out in Portugal, and the alliance of Great Britain with the Spanish nation was proclaimed. The great struggle now commenced. Marshal Bessieres was successful in the battle at Medina del Rio Seco over general Cuesta; but the previous defeat of Dupont at Baylen, decided the retreat of the French from Madrid, and Castanos entered the city. General Romana had secretly embarked his troops at Fñen, and landed in Spain; and Wellesley was victorious over the French under Junot, at Vimiera, on which the French general capitulated the day after at Cintra, and soon after evacuated Portugal. Napoleon advanced with a new army as far as the Ebro, and on the 10th of September Soult defeated the centre of the great Spanish army. Victor and Lefebvre's victory on the 11th, at Espinosa, opened the way to Asturia and the northern coast; and in consequence of the success of Lannes at Todola, great numbers of fugitives took refuge in Saragozza. The mountain pass of Somo Sierra was taken by assault, by the French and Poles, under Napoleon and Bessieres; and the French army appeared before Madrid, which surrendered Dec. 4. The French gained many victories and took many fortresses; but the conquerors remained masters only of the places which they occupied, as the guerillas everywhere surrounded and harassed them.

Austria now declared war, and Napoleon was obliged, in January, 1809, to leave the conduct of the war to his marshals. Two objects chiefly occupied the French generals in that and the following year—the re-conquest of Portugal, and the march over the Sierra Morena to Cadiz. The British had become masters of Portugal. Sir Arthur Wellesley advanced from Lisbon, by the way of Alcantara, up the Tagus, and Cuesta joined him near Truxillo; whilst general sir Robert Wilson advanced over Placencia, and Venegas, the Spanish general, from the Sierra Morena, towards Madrid. This bold plan of attack was frustrated by the battle of Talavera. The British, indeed, were victorious over Joseph, Victor, and Jourdan; but not being sufficiently supported by the Spaniards, and being threatened by Soult and Ney advancing on their flank, they were obliged to retire to the frontiers of Portugal; after which Venegas also began to retreat, and was defeated by Joseph at Almonacid, as was Wilson by Ney in the passes of Baros. Madrid thus escaped a siege.

The central junta at Seville now resolved to yield to the universal wish, to assemble the cortes and to nominate a regency. New armies were created, and Arceaga advanced with 55,000 men as far as Ocaña, where, however, he was entirely defeated by Mortier. Madrid, therefore, was again saved; but in Catalonia, Arragon, and Biscay, the most desperate struggle was carried on with the bands of the patriots. The Empeinado's troops advanced even to the vicinity of Madrid. In Old Castile several guerilla parties hovered on the French; and in Navarre the troops of Mina were an absolute terror to them. The largest company of them, under the dreaded Marquesito, formerly a colonel in the army, encountered several generals in the open field. In vain did the French establish fortresses on their lines of communication, and endeavour to protect their rear by moveable columns. Yet their plan against Andalusia succeeded. With 22,000 men, the rash Arceaga thought he could maintain the line on the Sierra Morena, fifteen leagues long, intrenched and mined, and having in its centre the fortified pass of Peraperos, against 60,000 troops, commanded by the best generals of France. Desolles and Gazan, in January, 1810, took the pass of Despena-Peras; Sebastiani stormed the defile of St. Estevan, and took the bridges over the Guadalquivir; and on the 21st of January Joseph Buonaparte entered Baylen. Jaen was conquered; Cordova submitted. Sebastiani occupied Granada; and Joseph entered Seville on the 1st of February, from which the junta had fled to Cadiz.

This place, the only one which remained in the hands of the Spaniards, and which was defended by 16,000 men under Albuquerque, and 4000 English soldiers under Graham, besides the combined British and Spanish fleets, was besieged in February, but all the efforts and offers of the French were in vain. The war in Catalonia and Arragon continued. In Leon, the French conquered Astorga, and then directed their arms against Portugal. In this country, to the north of the Tagus, Wellington commanded a British army of 30,000 men, and Beresford a Portuguese army nearly 60,000 strong, besides 52,000 militia. The right wing of Wellington, at Badajoz, was joined by 20,000 Spaniards under Romana, and 8000 under Ballasteros. The main body of the allied force was posted on the heights of Lisbon, which had been rendered impregnable. The plan of the British commander, therefore, was defensive. Massena began his undertaking in June, by the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, which surrendered on the 10th of July, and Ney entered Portugal over the river Coa; but Almeida detained Massena till the 27th of August, when it was obliged to capitulate. Wellington ordered the whole country through which Massena could follow him, to be laid waste; and the latter was consequently compelled to defer his march some time. He was at terwards beaten at Busaco; and Wellington now entered the strong position of Torres-Vedras, which consisted of two lines on the heights of Lisbon, defended by 170 well-placed works and 444 cannons. Massena found this position unassailable, and retreated, after several engagements of little importance, in November, to Santarem. Here he remained till March, 1811, when he was compelled, by want of provisions, to evacuate Portugal entirely. But the French were victorious at other points. Suchet, in January, 1811, took the important fortress of Tortosa, in Catalonia; and, in the following June, after a murderous assault of five days, the fortress of Tarragona. Soult took the frontier fortresses towards Portugal—Olivence and Badajoz; and Victor defeated general Graham at Chiclana. In the autumn, Suchet marched against Valencia; and after having beaten the army under general Blake, Saguntum fell on the 26th of October, and Valencia surrendered in January, 1812.

Lord Wellington now again entered Spain. He took Ciudad-Rodrigo and Badajoz; but he was ill supported by the cortes and the regency. At this time Marimont was at the head of the French army in Portugal; but the loss of the decisive battle of Salamanca, on the 22nd of July, 1812, obliged him to give up the defence of Madrid. Wellington entered the city on the 22nd of August, and the French retired from before Cadix about the same time: thus withdrawing their forces from the south of Spain, and concentrating them in the eastern and northern parts. After the occupation of Madrid, Wellington followed the enemy to Burgos; but he gave up the siege of the castle of Burgos, after several unsuccessful assaults, as the Spaniards afforded him insufficient support, and the French had received succours. After several engagements, he transferred his head-quarters to Freynada, on the frontier of Portugal, and the French again entered Madrid.

At length, Napoleon's disasters in Russia decided the fate of the peninsula. Soult was recalled in the beginning of 1813, with 30,000 men, from Spain. Suchet left Valencia in July, but delivered Tarragona, which was besieged by Bessieres, in August, and withstood Clinton on the Llobregat. But Joseph had been obliged to leave Madrid again, and Wellington had occupied Salamanca. The French army, commanded by Joseph Buonaparte and Jourdan, retreated to Vittoria. Here Wellington overtook the enemy, and gained the splendid victory of Vittoria; after which the French army, pursued by Graham and Hill, retreated in disorder over the Pyrenees to Bayonne, and lost all its baggage. The victors immediately invested Pampeluna. Count Abisbal occupied the pass of Pancorbo. Graham besieged St. Sebastian, and Wellington entered France on the 9th of July. In the meantime, Napoleon, then in Dresden, had appointed marshal Soult his lieutenant, and commander-in-chief of his armies in Spain. He united the beaten corps, and opposed a considerable force to the victor. On the 24th of July the struggle began in the Pyrenees, and was maintained until August on every point. Wellington took St. Sebastian by assault, after having several times repulsed the enemy, who approached to deliver the garrison. It was not, however, till the 7th of October that he left the Pyrenees, and passed the Bidassoa. After Pampeluna had fallen, no French soldier was left on the Spanish territory, except in Barcelona, and a few other places in Catalonia. Wellington now attacked the enemy on the fortified banks of the Nivelle, and Soult retreated into the camp of Bayonne. But until Wellington had passed the Nive, and had repulsed several attacks, it was not possible for him to obtain a secure footing in the hostile country. His head quarters were at St. Jean de Luz. Thence he repulsed Suchet's attacks on the Gave. On the 28th of February he fought a battle with Soult at Orthez, by which the latter was driven from his strong position, and obliged to retreat, in great disorder, to the Upper Garonne. Wellington followed the French, under Soult, to Toulouse, where a sanguinary engagement took place on the 10th of April; and the occupation of France by the allied armies put an end to the war.

The cortes had already held its first session, and had resolved that Ferdinand VII. should swear to preserve the constitution, before he should be recognized as king. The treaty of Valençay, between Ferdinand and Napoleon, was made void by declaring all the acts of the king during his captivity null. On the 14th of May, 1814, he entered Madrid: the people, dissatisfied with the new taxes which had been imposed by the cortes, received him with acclamations, and the friends of the cortes and king Joseph were persecuted with the greatest rigour. Freemasonry was abolished, and the inquisition revived; the conventual estates were restored, and the Jesuits recalled, and reinstated in all the rights and property of which they had been deprived since 1767. And, although the king had solemnly promised a new constitution, liberty of the press, &c., he regarded none of his promises, and reigned with absolute power.

The army, however, was highly dissatisfied to these proceedings, and guerrillas, or bands of soldiers, infected the interior. Even the lower classes, though averse to liberal principles, were discontented with the severity of the government, while the better classes were divided into the hostile factions of the serviles and the liberals. Those councillors who ventured to remonstrate with the king, as Euzquinado, Balasteros, &c., were banished or thrown into prison. From 1814 to 1819, there were twenty-five changes in the ministry, mostly sudden, and attended with severities. They were produced by the camarilla, or persons in the personal service of the king. Every attempt to save the state was frustrated

Alagoas, at the head of a troop of 2,500 men, now occupied Alagairas, entered Maceio, and after some fighting with O'Donnell, advanced through Eolija and Cordoroa to Antequera; while the national arms under Quiroga, in addresses to the king and to the nation, declared their only object was to save their country by the restoration of the constitution, which had already been accepted by the nation. Rinsing now took place in all quarters in favour of the constitution of the cortes; the royal forces joined the insurgents; Freyre himself was obliged to proclaim the constitution in Seville; and Ferdinand, abandoned by his own troops, was compelled to yield to the general cry, and, by proclamation, declared himself ready to summon the cortes of 1812, and accept the constitution of that year. On the same day a general amnesty was proclaimed. On the 9th a provisory junta of eleven members was named, to conduct affairs till the meeting of the cortes; and Ferdinand swore to observe the constitution in presence of this body, and of the municipal authorities of

At the outset of the third session the moderate liberal party prevailed, and tranquillity was gradually restored to the internal affairs of the country, when it began to be threatened from without. The strong sanitary cordon of French troops along the Pyrenees, and the intrigues of the emiles, led the government to suspect that the disturbances excited among the peasants in Navarre and Catalonia, and the bands of "soldiers of the faith," so called, were instigated by the French government. The cortes therefore armed the volunteer national guards; but the pecuniary resources were chiefly in the hands of the supporters of despotism. The royal guards, in spite of the opposition of Murillo, their commander, entered Madrid July 7, but Balthazero, at the head of the national guards, defeated them, and they fled into the royal palace; but the king, who favoured them originally, now showed himself irresolute. They were unable to resist the popular force, but would have been allowed to retire, if they had not again fired on the national guards, who then fell upon them.

and killed or wounded the greater part. The auilleros, or moderate party, who had been in favour of a chamber of peers and the extension of the royal power, now joined the comuneros, or popular party, and all the ministers resigned.

The new ministers acted in conformity with the views of the comuneros; and the king, whose authority had sunk entirely, consented to all they proposed. Many persons of rank, including bishops, were banished. General Elío was executed, but the guards were treated with great leniency. The king again declared his adherence to the constitution; but the apostolical troops in Biscay, Navarre, and Catalonia, continued their revolting cruelties. Under the marquis Mataflorida a regency of the friends of absolute government was established at Seo d'Urgel, near the French frontier, in August, 1822. It issued orders, in the name of the "imprisoned king," for the restoration of every thing to the state in which it had been before the 7th of March, 1820. The troops of the apostolical party, after much bloodshed, were beaten by Mina and Milane, Generals Espinosa, Torrijos, and El Pastor distinguished themselves against Quesada, a Trappist, and others. The regency fled to France in November, 1822, and it was obvious that its cause was not that of the nation. No troops of the line or national guards, no important cities nor individuals, went over to them. Some "soldiers of the faith," however, still continued in Spain, particularly those of Besiádes, Ullmann, &c. At no period was Spain in a more unsettled state than now, and nothing less than a desperate struggle between despotism and revolution could be calculated on. The French had acceded to the principle of an armed intervention pronounced by Austria, Russia, and Prussia, in relation to Spain; and the French ambassador at Madrid received orders to advise a change in the constitution, as the condition on which the continuance of peace between the two countries must depend; and, in order to enable Ferdinand VII. to make such changes freely, he must first of all be restored to the full enjoyment of sovereign power. The same demand, and even in bolder terms, was made by the ministers of Prussia, Austria, and Russia, while Great Britain advised the cortes to yield, and offered her mediation. The Spanish government repelled with indignation the interference of the foreign powers, and the threatened discontinuance of diplomatic intercourse took place. The foreign ambassadors were recalled from Madrid. One hundred thousand French soldiers were assembled with the soldiers of the faith at Perpignan and Bayonne, and the cortes summoned the national guards to serve with the troops of the line; but the attempts to raise an army were unsuccessful, because the bands of the absolutists gave full employment to the troops of the line and the national guards in the various provinces.

The duke of Angoulême, at the head of the French army, issued a proclamation to the Spaniards, declaring that the object of the French was only to aid them, and that France desired nothing but the deliverance of Spain from the evils of revolution. His army then passed the Bidasoa; a junta was established, who formed a provisional government, declaring the king the sole depository of sovereign power, and that no change in the government should be recognised but such as the king should make of his own free choice; and all the decrees of the cortes were declared void. Great Britain remained neutral, or rather affected neutrality; for the government allowed the exportation of arms and ammunition to Spain; and, in return, the ports of the New World were opened to her ships. A long, tedious, and cruel warfare was now kept up by the Spanish troops under the control of Ballasteros, Mina, L'Abisbal, and Morillo, against the French, and the supporters of the "absolute king." On the 24th of May the duke of Angoulême entered Madrid amid the acclamations of the populace. He nominated a regency, consisting of the duke of Infantado, the duke of Montemar, the bishop of Osma, the baron d'Eroles, and Don Gomes Caldeiron; but they had no pecuniary resources, and no power, if they had the will, to prevent the furious eruptions of party hatred.

The cortes had in vain tried to excite a general guerilla war. On account of the want of money, they decreed the seizure of all the property of persons of the opposite party, a forced loan of 200,000,000 of reales, and the coining of the superfluous church plate, by which measures the hatred of the people was still more increased. Yet the ministers did not dare to propose to the cortes the mediation offered by England, through Sir W. A'Court, the British minister. The king refused to go to Cadiz; and a regency of three members, with royal powers, was appointed, because the case of moral incapacity on the part of the king, provided for by the constitution, had occurred. On the 13th of June, the cortes and the king, with the regency, departed for Cadiz; but the people were so furious against the constitutionalists, that the authorities called in the aid of the French. Meanwhile the regency in Madrid declared all the members of the cortes who had participated in the session of the 11th, when the king was declared morally incapable, to be traitors; but more it could not do: it was so destitute of resources that it was even supported by French money. The duke of Angoulême took possession of Cadiz on the 4th of October. An act of the cortes had already reinvested the king with absolute power, and requested him to retire to the French camp, where he had been received in form by the duke, with cries of "Viva el rey! Viva la religion! Muera la nacion!" &c. Ferdinand's first measure was to declare all the acts of the constitutional government, from March 7, 1820, to October 1, 1823, void, on the ground that during that time the king was acting under compulsion. The partisan warfare still continued to rage with great fierceness, particularly in Catalonia; but the defection of some of the leaders soon after took place; it appeared fast drawing to a termination; and on the 22nd of October, 1823, the duke of Angoulême took his leave of the army of the Pyrenees, which had so successfully accomplished the military objects of its mission.

The political objects of the expedition, to secure a system of mildness and moderation, were frustrated by the bad faith of the Spanish government. In direct violation of the terms of the military capitulations, a persecuting and vindictive policy was adopted towards the former partisans of the constitution. Among the crowds of fugitives were Mina, the count del Abisbal, Morillo, &c. Riego was executed at Madrid, and the king made his entry into the capital on a triumphal car twenty-five feet high, drawn by a hundred men, and amidst the rejoicings of the people. It was not, however, to be expected that the excesses of political and religious bigotry would suddenly subside; or that the people would quietly submit to the heavy taxation which the bad state of the finances rendered necessary. A treaty was therefore concluded with France, stipulating for the maintenance of a French force of 45,000 men in the country, until the Spanish army could be organised; and the debt due to France for the expenses of the French expedition was fixed at 34,000,000 francs.

The year 1825 was disturbed by several insurrections of the Carlists, who were anxious to effect the abdication of Ferdinand, and place his brother Don Carlos on the throne. Numerous executions and frequent changes of ministry took place, all plainly indicative of the weakness of the government; while the independence of the colonies was acknowledged by foreign powers, and a general interruption of commerce and industry throughout Spain was manifest. In this state the country continued for several subsequent years. In 1827, Spanish subjects were permitted to trade with the Spanish American republics, but under foreign flags; and in the following year Spain was evacuated by the French troops.

The sword, the scaffold, exile, and the dungeon had done so much to subdue the national spirit, and to reduce the numbers of the constitutionalists, that when, in 1830, the French revolution produced such effects in Belgium, and excited so much alarm in Germany and other neighbouring countries, it scarcely awakened the popular feeling on this side the Pyrenees; the troubles of Spain were now mostly confined to the struggle for power between the more or less absolute of the absolutists, the former having been favoured by the views of Don Carlos, then heir presumptive to the throne, and the latter by the king. But on the birth of a royal princess, in 1830, by Maria Christina, his fourth wife, a royal decree rendered the crown hereditary in the female line, in default of male heirs, and entirely changed the relation of the prince to the throne.

During a severe attack of illness, Ferdinand, at the instigation of the friends of Don Carlos, in 1832, renewed the Salic law, which rendered the throne of Spain hereditary only in the male line; but, with that vacillating conduct which is one of the surest marks of a weak mind, his majesty, on his recovery, formally protested against the decree, which he stated to have been extorted from him; and he then again declared his daughter to be his only legitimate successor to the throne of Spain. Shortly after this, Don Carlos was banished from the kingdom; and Ferdinand, who was in his fiftieth year, died suddenly of apoplexy, on the 29th of September, 1833.

The death of Ferdinand VII. became the signal for the breaking out of fresh dissensions. In order still further to fortify the right of his daughter to the throne, he had exercised the prerogative of naming her his successor in his will; and by the same instrument he appointed the queen regent till the infanta Isabella attained the age of eighteen years. Don Carlos, however, claimed the throne in virtue of the Salic law, although it had been repealed, and was never, in fact, practically in force. The rights of Isabella II. were supported by the liberals; the pretensions of Don Carlos by the absolutists. Guided by the councils of M. Zea, the chief minister, the queen depended upon the support of the constitutionalists for securing the succession to her infant daughter. The strength of the Carlists lay chiefly in Navarre, Catalonia, the Biscayan provinces, Old Castile, and Estremadura. The chief strength of the constitutionalists was in Madrid, and in the provinces of Andalusia, Murcia, Valencia, and other districts bordering on the Mediterranean. The queen regent was not slow in adopting vigorous and popular measures to counteract the Carlists. With the aid of the provincial militia and the volunteers, she disbanded the royalist volunteers of the capital, and in Toledo; she also remodelled the post-office laws, the censorship of the press, and public education; while at the same time care was taken not to disturb existing interests and prejudices. Meantime several contests took place between the rival parties, accompanied with the exercise of great cruelties on both sides; but the queen's party was generally successful, and at the close of the year the civil war appeared nearly at an end.

The reciprocal massacre of prisoners had several times occurred, and the deadliest hatred and revenge was manifestly encouraged by both parties; in short, so savagely was the Spanish contest carried on, that the duke of Wellington, from motives of humanity, sent Lord Elliot and colonel Gurwood on a mission to Spain, to endeavour to put a stop to the cruelties practised by the belligerents, and render the war less bloody and revengeful. aliated at first to enter into any terms with the Carlists, whom they deemed rebels; and although, at length, it was mutually agreed upon to treat the prisoners taken on either side according to the ordinary rules of war, a few months only elapsed before similar barbarities were practised with all their former remorselessness.

In the spring of 1834 a treaty was concluded in London, by the courts of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal, having for its object the pacification of the peninsula. By this quadruple treaty it was agreed,—that Spain and Portugal should assist each other in the expulsion from their respective territories of Don Carlos and Don Miguel; that Britain should co-operate by employing a naval force; and that France should assist the contracting parties in any way that they in common accord might determine upon.

The war thus continued to rage with unabated fury; but the queen's party obtained an auxiliary force, which was raised in England, and the command given to general Evans. The British government was pledged to assist with a naval force only; the troops therefore, which were denominated the "British legion," were raised without the sanction, though certainly with the connivance of ministers. They were ill equipped and ill clad, nor could any thing be managed much worse than their commissariat. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, and the motley character of the recruits, they fought bravely, and thereby contributed in no slight degree to the success of the queen's cause. On the 5th of May, 1835, some fortified works, which had cost the Carlists three or four months to erect, and through the centre of which ran the high road to Hernani, were gallantly carried by the auxiliary legion; while two armed steamers, commanded by lord John Hay, lent very opportune aid to the victors. On this occasion the loss of the British in killed and wounded amounted to 300, among whom were upwards of seventy officers. About this time Mendizabel, the Spanish prime minister, from whose abilities much had been anticipated, but who had not been zealously supported by the cortes, resigned, and was succeeded by M. Isturiz. Another violent change was, however, near at hand.

At Malaga, Cadiz, Seville, and Cordova, the Cadiz constitution of 1812 had been proclaimed, and provincial juntas established, wholly independent of the queen's authority. On the 3rd of August a movement commenced in Madrid; but it was put down, and the capital declared in a state of siege; but on the 12th the insurrection became more serious, and a regiment of provincial militia forced their way into the apartments of the queen-regent, and obtained from her a promise of the acceptance of the constitution. This produced a revolution in the metropolis. Isturiz, the prime minister, made his escape to Lisbon, and thence to England. General Quesada, the military governor of Madrid, was seized by the populace, and inhumanly put to death. Ultimately, the constitution was proclaimed by the queen-regent, subject to the revision of the cortes, and a new ministry of decided liberals formed, of which Mendizabel was minister of finance. The new government commenced with vigour. The sum of 2,000,000*l.* was sought to be raised by a forced loan; a conscription of 50,000 men was called for, to send against the Carlists; the property of emigrant Carlists was confiscated; and the example of France and Portugal was proposed to be followed, by the extinction of the remaining moiety of tithe, leaving the clergy stipendiaries of the state, or dependent on voluntary contributions.

On the 16th of June, 1837, the revised constitution of the Spanish monarchy was proclaimed. Its articles appear to be of a popular and liberal character. From among them we select the following:—1. All Spaniards may print and publish freely their opinions, without submitting them to any previous censorship, by merely conforming to the laws. 2. All Spaniards are admissible to all offices and public functions according to their merit and capacity. 3. The power of making laws resides in the cortes and the king. The cortes to consist of two legislative assemblies equal in rights and power—a senate and a congress of deputies: the senators must be forty years old, possessed of an independent fortune, and are chosen for life. To the congress of deputies each province to return one deputy, at least, for every 50,000 souls of its population: the deputies are elected for three years. 4. The person of the king sacred and inviolate, and not responsible: the ministers to be held responsible. The powers of the crown are analogous to those of the British sovereign. 5. The civil list of the king and royal family to be fixed at the commencement of each reign. 6. The succession to the crown to be in the order of primogeniture, preferring the male to the female branch. 7. The cortes may exclude from the succession persons they deem incapable to govern, or who have been guilty of any act for which they ought to lose their right to the crown. 7. Independence of the judges and judicial administration are secured.

In order to complete this epitome of Spanish history, it is necessary that some account of the Carlist and Christiano warfare should be here introduced: the more especially as the "British legion," which, as we before said, was raised without the sanction of the British government, played in it so conspicuous a part.

In June, 1835, colonel De Lacy Evans, one of the members for Westminster, was appointed by the Spanish authorities to the command of the said British auxiliary legion which was to co-operate with the queen's troops against Don Carlos.

On the 1st of October, 1836, a vigorous assault was made on the lines of the British legion at Sebastian by the Carlists, who made an unsuccessful attempt to carry them. Both parties fought bravely. The Carlists charging down-hill, frequently salied from their works in force, but each time were driven back at the point of the bayonet. The Westminster grenadiers distinguished themselves; and a small corps of lancers, under colonel Wakefield, made several brilliant charges; but a much more effective arm was the well-appointed artillery under the direction of colonel Colquhoun. The conflict lasted twelve hours. General Evans lost 376 men and 37 officers killed and wounded, and was slightly wounded himself. The loss of the Carlists in killed and wounded was estimated at 1000 men.

In December, 1836, the siege of Bilbao was raised, by the operations of the combined British and Christinos forces. General Espartero, assisted by a small band of British engineers, artillerymen, and sailors, entered the city of Bilbao on Christmas-day, at the head of his army, after a series of contests with the enemy. The works raised by the Carlists were of great strength, and nothing but the enthusiasm of the troops could have enabled them to overcome the difficulties with which they had to contend. A vote of thanks to the liberators of Bilbao, and to the Spanish and British forces, was moved in the cortes; and the official gazette of Jan. 4, 1837, contained a royal decree, in which the queen-regent expressed, in the name of her daughter, her gratitude to general Espartero and his army, the national and auxiliary British force, and to all those, whether Spaniards or English, who took a part in the memorable engagements of the 24th and 25th of December.

A month had scarcely elapsed, however, before the affairs of Don Carlos appeared to revive; general Evans having sustained a defeat before St. Sebastian, and the queen's armies under generals Saarsfield and Espartero having found it necessary to make simultaneous retreats. These reverses made such an impression, that at a secret sitting of the cortes on the 30th of March, the acting war-minister described Spain to be "without credit at home or abroad—with a depreciated and ill-conducted revenue—with an army in the worst state as to subordination or military discipline—whilst the chiefs were at variance with each other."

It was originally arranged that Espartero, Saarsfield, and Evans, should move simultaneously to the points of attack; but owing to mismanagement or treachery, this plan was not carried into operation. On the 10th of March, general Evans broke ground from St. Sebastian, and commencing his operations by an attack upon the heights of Ametzagana, at the eastern extremity of the chain of hills, carried that position. On the 16th he prepared to make his decisive attack upon the town of Hernani, and succeeded in gaining possession of the wooded heights which rise above it on the north. All was prepared for a forward movement, when he discovered, most unexpectedly, that the Carlists had been so powerfully reinforced as to render an advance desperately hazardous; and almost at the same moment the whole of his left wing was thrown into confusion, by the appearance in its rear of three battalions of Carlists, who, under the cover of the night, had been brought, by a circuitous march, to the right bank of the Urumea, and having passed that river at Axterragaga, again moved in the direction of the north-west. The regiment on the extreme left of the Anglo-Christinos' line, thus finding itself attacked in front, and on the left flank and in the rear, made a rapid lateral movement to the right, which was soon accelerated to a panic flight. A regiment of Castile, which stood next in the line, was at once infected by its terror, and the alarm ran through the line, until it approached the battalion of royal British marines, on the extreme right. This noble corps maintained gloriously the character of the royal troops of Great Britain; it repulsed every attack upon its position, and did not make a retrograde step, until it had covered the retreat of the whole allied army, and seen the artillery, wounded, and baggage of the allies placed in security. The Anglo-Christinos are said to have lost between 1500 and 2000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners—and immeasurably more in moral influence.

The next accounts from Spain showed that the cause of the queen was somewhat improving. After an obstinate defence by the Carlist troops, general Evans succeeded in carrying Irun, where a dreadful scene of pillage and massacre ensued. Fontarabia soon afterwards capitulated. On the 13th of May, Espartero entered Hernani, after having beaten the Carlists, and taken 600 of them prisoners. In several other engagements he was also successful. Yet such was the uncertainty of this contest, that in the following month the forces of Don Carlos were almost everywhere successful. On one occasion—the battle of Barbastro—the Carlists gained a great victory, upwards of 2,500 Christinos being put hors de combat. This was the most sanguinary engagement that had been fought since the commencement of the civil war.

Whilst Don Carlos was advancing towards Upper Catalonia, and preparing to place himself in the centre of the mountains of that province, the revolutionary hydra had raised its head with more hardness than ever. And, to add to the calamities of the Christinos, general Evans, with the greatest part of the officers belonging to the legion, had abandoned the cause as hopeless, and returned to England; only 1500 remaining behind, who formed a brigade under the command of colonel O'Connell.

The cause of the queen now wore a most unpromising aspect. Her troops had sustained several severe defeats; and, in September, the forces of Carlos were actually invading the capital. On the 24th of August, general Buerens was defeated, with the loss of 1,500 men, while in endeavouring to repel one of the armies of Don Carlos, 12,000 strong, which was attempting to pass between Duroca and Saragossa. On the 14th of Sept. the remains of the British legion, under general O'Donnell, after their advance to Pampeluna, were attacked by a superior body of Carlists, who carried Andoain, where O'Donnell had fortified himself, and drove the queen's troops back to Hernani. The British auxiliaries bore the whole brunt of the attack, and twenty-five English officers were killed.

On the 11th of Sept. the Spanish government received intelligence that Cabrera was preparing to march against the capital, and that his movement was to be supported by the bulk of Don Carlos's army. Martial law was immediately proclaimed. The troops and national guard mustered; a "sacred battalion" was formed to guard the two queens; and cannon was stationed in the most exposed and dangerous quarters of the city.

Again, the fortune of war inclined to the Christinos side. Don Carlos, who had invested Madrid, was compelled to make a precipitate retreat, with great loss, and was closely pursued by Espartero. In Navarra and Valladolid, also, the queen's troops gained some considerable advantages; and Carlos was driven to his old quarters in the north; and Espartero, having taken possession of many strong places, appeared confident of successful results from the next winter campaign.

In November, the dissolution of the cortes took place, and a new cabinet was formed, in which Espartero was appointed minister of war, and at the same time continued as commander-in-chief of the army of the north. The English legion had been wholly disbanded, after a correspondence between its commander, O'Connell, and the Spanish general, O'Donnell, which had reached the height of asperity. The men composing the legion had given up their arms, and were in the most deplorable state of destitution.

At the commencement of 1838 (Jan. 23), the town of Morella was captured by the Carlists. This was of the greatest importance to them, as it constituted the point of junction between the kingdoms of Valencia and Arragon, and was admirably fortified. Twelve hundred prisoners, twelve pieces of cannon, and provisions for three months, were the fruits of this capture. On the other hand, the Carlists had been defeated in an attempt to obtain possession of Saragossa, and in some minor engagements elsewhere. To which we may add, that on the 26th of April, Espartero attacked and entirely defeated, near Burgos, the force of count Negri; making 2000 prisoners, of whom 215 were chiefs and officers.

Thus for many succeeding months did victory continue to alternate between the contending parties, though inclining generally to the constitutional side. We shall therefore pass on till we come to an affair of considerable moment, namely, the surrender of Morella—the last stronghold of Cabrera—to the queen's troops on the 31st of May, 1839; the garrison remaining prisoners of war. Espartero had no less than 50,000 men, including 2000 cavalry, and 72 pieces of artillery, to reduce this fortress. Balinasada, the worthy rival of Cabrera in ferocity and rapacity, fell into the snare laid for him by the queen's generals. Believing that he was not pursued, he passed the Douro, and conceived the bold project of surprising the two queens on their way to Madrid and Saragossa, where he was attacked, on the 25th of June, by the constitutional general, Concha, and driven to the Pyrenees. He then retreated into France, but made his appearance again on the 30th, at the head of about 5000 men. He had retired before the queen's troops, fighting to the last; and although, like almost every other chieftain in this sanguinary and long-protracted struggle, he was a monster of cruelty, his firm adherence to his master's cause until there was no longer any hope of success, merits admiration. He appeared in nearly the last stage of exhaustion, from fatigue and from his wounds, of which he had received no less than fourteen.

At this time it was said that but little more than the name of royalty existed in Spain; a military despotism, headed by Espartero, dictating the whole affairs of the nation. The queen-regent Christina, being stripped of nearly every particle of power, made up her mind to quit Spain before Espartero and the new ministers arrived. She saw them, however, at Valencia, and expressed her determination to abdicate the regency, in consequence of the difficulties which environed her. She was then told, that if she insisted on abdicating, and on retiring to Naples, she must leave the young queen Isabella to the guardianship of the nation, and must also give up the public property vested in her as queen and regent. To this she consented, and the ministers accordingly announced the event to the nation. Shortly afterwards, the young queen Isabella II. made her public entry into Madrid, attended by Espartero, &c. amid the acclamations of the inhabitants.

In May, 1841, the duke of Victory (Espartero) was elected by a majority of 76 votes as sole regent of Spain during the minority of Isabella; the queen mother, Christina, having previously sought refuge in France. For a considerable time after this event, the new regent possessed the confidence of the people, and effected many useful reforms in the state; but owing to his having given great offence to the clergy, in consequence of his having sanctioned the appropriation of part of the ecclesiastical revenues to secular purposes, a powerful party continued to harass and distract his government; till, at length, the insurrectionary movements in various parts of the country denoted that another crisis was approaching.

That crisis at length arrived, and the political career of Espartero was brought to a close. In June, 1848, Corunna, Seville, and many other towns declared in favour of his opponents; and Madrid surrendered to them on the 24th of July. On receiving this information, Espartero immediately raised the siege of Seville, and started for Cadix, with 400 cavalry. He was pursued to Port St. Mary's by general Concha, at the head of 800 horses, who arrived on the strand only five minutes after the regent had embarked in a boat for the English ship Malabar, of 72 guns. Noguera, Gomez, and a few other officers escaped with him. A manly and patriotic manifesto was addressed by Espartero to the nation prior to his departure for England; which thus concludes:—"A military insurrection, without the slightest pretext, concluded the work commenced by a mere few; and, abandoned by those whom I so often had led to victory, I am compelled to seek refuge in a foreign land, fervently desiring the felicity of my beloved country. To its justice I recommend those who never abandoned the cause of legitimacy, loyal to the last, even in the most critical moments. In these the state will ever find its most decided assistants."

His enemies also addressed a manifesto to the people of Spain, with the alleged view of explaining and justifying the revolution, and also of vindicating themselves and those who co-operated with them in procuring the defection of the army, and the consequent overthrow of Espartero, by means of foreign gold.

On the 30th of July, the duke of Baylen assumed the functions of guardian of the queen and the princess her sister. The new ministry adopted the decided course of declaring queen Isabella of age after the meeting of the cortes, which was appointed to take place on the 15th of October; to which proposal the queen gave her consent. Espartero left Spain, on his voyage to England, on board the Prometheus steam-vessel; and on his arrival at Woolwich he was received with marked respect by lord Blomfield, commandant of the royal arsenal, Sir P. Collyer, &c. On arriving in London he took up his residence at Mivert's hotel, which was literally besieged by visitors of rank, amongst whom were the duke of Wellington, lord Aberdeen, and Sir Robert Peel. The regent subsequently paid a visit to her majesty at Windsor, and the corporation of London made him welcome by inviting him to a festive entertainment in true civic style.

Christina, the queen-mother, who for a long time had been living in a state of exile in France, was now permitted to return to her native land, and, accompanied by the young queen Isabella, the Infanta, and the principal ministers, they, on the 23rd of March, entered Madrid, with great pomp and state. On the 10th of October the cortes were opened by Isabella, who on that day completed her fourteenth year; and, three days afterwards, Christina was publicly married to Senor Muñoz (previously created Duke of Rianzares). Her attachment to this person had long been a matter of public notoriety; and it was universally believed that she had either been privately married to him for several years past, or had lived with him in a state of concubinage. Many insurrectionary movements had lately taken place in Spain, but it might be said that the civil war was now ended. Senor Gonzalo Bravo had arisen upon the ruins of Espartero's power; but none of the generals or ministers who attained a temporary eminence during the collision of arms and parties that had taken place, proved equal to the task of regenerating their unfortunate country. We have no space to trace the rise and fall of the various administrations that were subsequently formed. It must suffice here to state that, soon after the expulsion of Espartero, the corporations that had long been obnoxious were changed: the national guard was disbanded and put down, and a law obliging the Queen to seek the consent of the cortes to the husband she might select was abolished.

Before alluding to the most recent events in Spanish history, it may be as well to remind the reader that from time immemorial the politicians of Spain have been divided into French and English factions; the former called by the name of Moderados, the latter, Progresistas. On the downfall of Espartero, the Moderados, with General Narvaez at their head, had succeeded to power; and they soon found in the marriage of Queen Isabella and her sister the Infanta the means of perpetuating both the interests of France in Spain, and their own influence over Spanish affairs. Some of the difficulties which for a time arose with respect to the manner in which this project could be carried out, will be found at p. 560*s.* in the History of France. But, finally, Queen Isabella was united to her cousin Don Francisco de Assis, Duke of Cadiz, — eldest son of Don Francisco de Paula, King Ferdinand's younger brother, and of Dona Carlotta, Queen Christina's sister; whilst the Infanta, Dona Fernanda, was married to the Duke of Montpensier, King Louis Philippe's youngest son; — these marriages taking place at the same time in violation of a pledge, which the government of France had given to the English government, to the effect that the Infanta should not be married until the Queen her sister had issue. The English government manifested much indignation; and, after stating its objections on various grounds to the marriages themselves, protested against any child of the Duke of Montpensier ever becoming sovereign of Spain, on the ground that by the treaty of Utrecht, any descendant of the Orleans family was excluded from such a position. The Moderados were in the full enjoyment of their triumph, when intelligence arrived of the overthrow of monarchy in France, and the flight of Louis Philippe to England. On receipt of this important news, all parties seemed at first inclined to prevent violent results by prudent and moderate courses. The Government requesting extraordinary powers from the cortes, declared that that body should be kept sitting, in order to judge of the manner in which these powers ought to be exercised. The opposition leaders, on their part, believing that by the natural current of events they should come into power, deprecated violence and revolution above all things, as likely to carry matters beyond the point at which men of reputation could engage in them. All of a sudden, however, affairs put on an entirely new aspect. General Narvaez appeared one morning in full uniform before the legislative assemblies, and declared them to be prorogued; in spite of the promises recently given, and without assigning any cause for such a violation of so solemn an engagement. The consequence was clear. On the 26th of March (the cortes had been prorogued on the 22nd) an insurrection broke out at Madrid. The minister of the interior described it as "disturbances occasioned by groups, few in number, and of the lowest class, and vagabonds." But no sooner had tranquillity been restored, than arrests of all sorts took place. Two of the most eminent opposition leaders in the cortes, Senores Olozaga and Escosura were seized, imprisoned, and finally sent off to Cadiz, there to be embarked for transportation to the Philippines. They were never tried, nor sentenced, nor even accused of any particular crime; and nearly all the men of mark in the same party underwent the same fate. Meanwhile the English Government, which had a deep interest in the welfare of Spain and the preservation of the Spanish crown, for which it had made great sacrifices, instructed the British minister at the court of Madrid earnestly to recommend to the government of Spain a line of conduct more in accordance with constitutional usages. But against this interference with the internal affairs of the country, the Spanish ministry protested in a vigorous despatch; and soon afterwards, Sir Henry Bulwer, the British ambassador, who had been held up for some time in the ministerial press as a revolutionary intriguer, was dismissed from the Spanish capital, on the pretext that his life was in danger. The British government contented itself by merely giving his passports to M. Isturiz, the Spanish ambassador in London. But all diplomatic intercourse was suspended between the two countries till 1850; when it was renewed on the mediation of the king of the Belgians, at the solicitation of the Spanish government. Previously to these negotiations, General Narvaez had restored the constitutional government which he had suspended in 1848, and granted a free pardon to all political offenders. But in spite of his adoption of a milder system, he did not long maintain his authority. Early in 1851, he retired from office, in consequence of the intrigues of the Queen's mother, and a military opposition in the senate; but it is generally understood that, should the unity of the conservative party be broken up, and the Progressists be once more "aux portes du pouvoir," Narvaez would again become l'homme necessaire, as in 1848, "le plus propre," as it is said, "à tenir tête à la contagion revolutionnaire."

For some years previously to 1850, an active system of propagandism had been organised in the United States, having for its object the annexation of Cuba, the chief Spanish colonial possession, to the American Union. It is true that the government of the United States gave no official countenance to these proceedings; on the contrary, it took active measures to suppress them. Yet in the teeth of the Government, newspapers were established, and meetings were held, with the view of making popular an enterprise, from which, it was said, some high American functionaries did not keep aloof. In consequence of these measures an expedition was organised; and on the 19th of May, 1850, a buccaneering party of 600 men, under a Spanish adventurer, named Lopez, landed in Cuba. After a short but obstinate struggle, they took possession of the town of Cardenas; but a day or two afterwards, they were compelled to an ignominious and precipitate flight in presence of the prompt measures adopted by the governor, and the spontaneous fidelity of the population. Several of the pirates were captured, but their leader escaped.

But instead of being discouraged by this striking failure, in little more than twelve months afterwards, another expedition for the same piratical purpose was organised by the same adventurer. On the 3rd of August, 1851, a steamer called the "Pampero" left New Orleans for Cuba, stealthily and without a clearance, having on board upwards of 400 armed men. After touching at Key West, she proceeded to the coast of Cuba, and on the night of the 11th and 12th of August, landed her piratical crew at Playatas, within about twenty leagues of Havana.

The main body of them proceeded to, and took possession of, an inland village, six leagues distant, leaving others to follow in charge of the baggage, as soon as the means of transportation could be obtained. The latter having taken up their line of march, to connect themselves with the main body, and having proceeded about four leagues into the country, were attacked on the morning of the 13th by a body of Spanish troops, and a bloody conflict ensued, after which they retreated to the place of disembarkation, where about fifty of them obtained boats, and re-embarked therein. They were, however, intercepted among the keys near the shore by a Spanish steamer cruising, and after being examined by a military court, were sentenced to be publicly executed, and the sentence was carried into execution on the 16th of August. Meanwhile the main body of the invaders, after some desperate struggles with the military, dispersed over the island. Lopez, their leader, was captured on the 29th, and publicly garroted at Havana on Sept. 1. Many of his followers were killed or died of hunger and fatigue, and about 160 were made prisoners, and sentenced to ten years' hard labour in Spain. The news of the execution of so many American citizens caused great excitement at New Orleans. The Spanish consul there was assailed by a mob, his property destroyed, the Spanish flag that adorned his office torn in pieces, and he himself obliged to flee for his personal safety. But the government of the United States at once took measures to atone for this indignity, and thus proved to the Spanish government its lack of sympathy with the lawless expedition.

Before closing our account of Spain, we must record an incident which nearly proved fatal to the Queen of Spain. On the 2nd Feb., 1852, when her Majesty was traversing a long gallery in her palace, on her way to attend a public service in the church of Atocha, in thanksgiving after the birth of her daughter, she was suddenly struck with a knife by an aged man, who pretended to present her a petition. The assassin was immediately seized, and it was soon discovered that he was an assistant curate in one of the churches of Madrid. The only motive which he assigned for the perpetration of this unmanly, not to say inhuman, deed, was his hatred of kings. As he had no accomplices, the Queen expressed a wish that his life should be spared; but, as a warning to others, it was thought advisable to inflict some signal punishment on the perpetrator of such a crime, and he was condemned to die by the garotte.

THE HISTORY OF PORTUGAL.

PORTUGAL, anciently called Lusitania, is supposed to have been originally colonized by the Phœnicians and Carthaginians; but was taken possession of by the Romans about 250 years before Christ, and became a Roman province under the emperor Augustus. Towards the beginning of the fifth century the Alans, and afterward the Suebians and the Visigoths, successively made themselves masters of this country. In the eighth century it was overrun by the Moors and Saracens, but was gradually wrested from them by the Christians. Henry, duke of Burgundy, distinguishing himself by his eminent services against the Moors, Alphonso VI., king of Castile, gave him his daughter Theresa in marriage, created him earl of Portugal, and in 1110 left him that kingdom. Alphonso Henriques, his son and successor, obtained a signal victory, in 1136, over the Moors, was created king by the people; and in 1181, at an assembly of the states, the succession of the crown was settled. Alphonso III. added Algarve to the crown of Portugal. In 1383 the legitimate male line of this family becoming extinct in the person of Ferdinand, John I., his natural son, was, two years after, admitted to the crown, and in his reign the Portuguese made settlements in Africa, and discovered the islands of the Azores. In 1482 his great grandson John II. received the Jews who had been expelled from Spain, and gave great encouragement to navigation and discoveries. Afterwards, in the reign of king Emanuel, Vasco de Gama discovered a passage to the East Indies by doubling the Cape of Good Hope.

In 1500, Brazil was discovered by Don Pedro Alvarez, and the Portuguese made most valuable discoveries in the East Indies, where they soon erected forts, subdued the neighbouring inhabitants, and at the same time carried on a sanguinary war in Africa. The power of Portugal was then at its height; but in 1580, on the decease of Henry the Cardinal, the male line of the royal family became extinct, and in the succeeding year the kingdom was subdued by Spain. The Portuguese now lost most of the advantages they had obtained under their own monarchs; their possessions in the East Indies, in Brazil, and on the coast of Africa, were neglected, and many of them wrested from them by the new republic of Holland, and by the other maritime powers, while at home the Portuguese were much oppressed; but in 1640, they shook off the Spanish yoke, by electing John, duke of Braganza, a descendant of the old royal family, for their king. This prince, who assumed the title of John IV., drove the Dutch out of Brazil; and from him all the succeeding kings of Portugal have been descended. Alphonso VI. the son of John IV., was dethroned by his brother Peter, who in 1668 concluded a treaty with Spain, by which Portugal was declared an independent kingdom. This was brought about by the mediation of Charles II. of Great Britain, who had married the infanta Catherine, sister to Alphonso and Peter. In 1706, John V. succeeded to the throne on the death of his father. In 1729 a double marriage took place between the courts of Spain and Portugal, a prince of each court marrying a princess of the other court.

Although Brazil again belonged to Portugal, its former greatness could not now have been restored, even had the princes of the house of Braganza displayed as much vigour and wisdom as some of them showed good intentions. A commercial treaty had been concluded under the first prince of this line, and in 1703 a new treaty was concluded by the English ambassador, which secured to England the advantages of the newly discovered gold mines in Brazil. From this time the relations with England continued to become more intimate, until Portugal was no longer in a condition to maintain an independent attitude in European politics. During the long reign of John V., from 1707 to 1750, some vigour was exerted in regard to the foreign relations, and something was attempted for the promotion of the national welfare at home (the restrictions on the power of the inquisition, and the formation of an academy of Portuguese history, for example); but, in the former case, without decisive consequences, and, in the latter, without a completion of the plans proposed.

On the death of John, in 1750, his son, Joseph I., prince of the Brazils, succeeded him, and the marquis of Pombal, a vigorous reformer, administered the government, to the universal satisfaction of the people. He attacked the jesuits and the nobility, who during the preceding reigns had exercised a secret influence in the government. The exposure of the power of the jesuits in Paraguay, their conduct at the time of the earthquake in Lisbon (1755), and the conspiracy against the life of the king (1759), led to the suppression of the order: in 1767 they had been deprived of the post of confessors to the royal family, and forbidden the court. Two years after, all the jesuits were banished the kingdom, and their estates were confiscated. The brave count of Schauenburg Lippe, to whose services against Spain, in 1760, Portugal was so much indebted, likewise reformed the Portuguese army; but soon after his departure, the effects of his improvements disappeared.

On the accession of Maria Francisca Isabella, eldest daughter of Joseph (in 1777), the marquis of Pombal lost the influence which he had possessed for twenty-five years. To him Portugal owed her revival from her previous lethargy; and although many of his useful regulations did not survive his fall, yet the enlightened views he introduced, and the national feeling which he awakened, were not without permanent effects. In 1792, on account of the sickness of the queen, Juan Maria Joseph, prince of Brazil (the title of the prince-royal until 1816), was declared regent; and, in 1799, her malady having terminated in a confirmed mental aberration, the prince was declared regent with full regal powers, but made no change in the policy of the government. His connexions with England involved him in the wars of that country against France; and the Portuguese troops distinguished themselves by their valour in the peninsular campaigns. Commercial distress, the accumulating debt, and the threatening language which Spain was compelled by France in 1797, but the disasters of the French arms in 1799 encouraged the regent to renew hostilities, in alliance with England and Russia.

As soon, however, as Buonaparte had established his authority, Spain was obliged to declare war against Portugal; but it was terminated the same year (1801) by the treaty of Badajoz, by which Portugal was obliged to cede Olivenza, with the payment of a large sum of money to Spain. Portugal, meanwhile, preserved a mere shadow of independence by the greatest sacrifices, until at last Junot entered the country, and the house of Braganza was declared, by Napoleon, to have forfeited the throne; this most impudent and arbitrary declaration arising from the refusal of the prince to seize the English merchandise in his dominions.

The regent now threw himself entirely into the arms of the English, and on the 9th of November, 1807, embarked for Brazil. Junot entered the capital the next day, and Portugal was treated as a conquered country. An English force was landed, and, in the northern provinces, numerous bodies of native troops determined to maintain the struggle for freedom; a junta was also established in Oporto to conduct the government. After some hard fighting, the decisive battle of Vimera took place (Aug. 21, 1808), which was followed by the convention of Cintra, and the evacuation of the country by the French forces.

During 1808, 1809, and 1810, Portugal was the chief scene of the military contest between Great Britain and France; and the Portuguese subsequently also took an active part in the war for Spanish independence.

On the death of Maria, John VI. ascended the throne of Portugal and Brazil. This transference of the court of Lisbon into an American colony was followed by important consequences; firstly, that Brazil attempted to withdraw itself from dependence on England; and, secondly, that the colony gradually became a separate state. In Portugal, on the contrary, the influence of England continued, and the condition of the kingdom was not essentially changed.

In 1816 John VI. refused to return to Lisbon, whither a squadron under Sir John Beresford had been sent to convey him; partly, it is said, because he was displeased at the disregard to his rights shown by the congress of Vienna; partly because the unpopularity of the commercial treaty had alienated him from England; but, probably, still more because he was influenced by the visible growth of a Brazilian party which now aimed at independence. Henceforward, indeed, the separation of Portugal from Brazil manifestly approached. The Portuguese of Europe began to despair of seeing the seat of the monarchy at Lisbon; the regency there were without strength, all appointments were obtained from the distant court of Rio Janeiro; men and money were drawn away for the Brazilian war on the Rio de la Plata; the army left behind was unpaid; in fine, all the materials of formidable discontent were heaped up in Portugal, when the Spanish revolution broke out in the beginning of 1820. Six months elapsed without its communicating to Portugal; but in August the garrison of Oporto declared for a revolution; and, being joined on their march to the capital by all the troops on their line, were received with open arms by the garrison of Lisbon; and it was determined to bestow on Portugal a still more popular constitution than that of Spain.

This revolution was unattended by violence or bloodshed. A provisional government was established, which, on the 1st of October, formed a union with the junta of Oporto. Count Palmella, the head of the royal regency, was dispatched to Rio Janeiro with an account of what had happened, and a petition that the king or the prince royal would return to Lisbon. The mode of electing the cortes was settled chiefly in imitation of the Spanish constitution; and the liberal party, which was desirous of the immediate adoption of that constitution, obliged the supreme junta (Nov. 11) to administer the oath of obedience to it to the troops. The regency of Lisbon, by the advice of a Portuguese minister, at once faithful to his sovereign and friendly to the liberty of his country, made an attempt to stem the torrent by summoning an assembly of the cortes. The attempt was too late; but it pointed to the only means of saving the monarchy. The same minister, on his arrival in Brazil, at the end of 1820, advised the king to send his eldest son to Portugal as viceroy, with a constitutional charter, in which the legislature was to be divided into two chambers. He also recommended an assembly of the most respectable Brazilians at Rio Janeiro to organise their affairs. But a revolution in that capital speedily brought matters to a crisis; and the popular party, headed by Don Fedro, the king's eldest son, declared for the constitution of Portugal, and the separation of Brazil at the same time.

On the 9th of March, 1821, the articles of the new constitution, securing freedom of person and property, the liberty of the press, legal equality, and the abolition of privileges, the admission of all citizens to all offices, and the sovereignty of the nation, were adopted almost unanimously. There was more diversity of opinion concerning the organization of the chambers, and the royal veto; but large majorities finally decided in favour of one chamber and a conditional veto. After some disturbances in Brazil, the king sailed for Portugal, but was not permitted to land until he had given his consent to several acts of the cortes, imposing restrictions on his power. On landing, he immediately swore to observe the new constitution, and concurred, without opposition, to all the succeeding acts of the cortes.

The revolutionary cortes were as tenacious of the authority of the mother country as the royal administration; and they accordingly recalled the heir apparent to Lisbon. But the spirit of independence arose among the Brazilians, who, encouraged by the example of the Spanish Americans, presented addresses to the prince, beseeching him not to yield to the demands of the Portuguese assembly, who desired to make him a prisoner, as they had made his father; but, by assuming the crown of Brazil, to provide for his own safety, as well as for their liberty. In truth, it is evident he neither could have continued in Brazil without acceding to the popular desire, nor have then left it without ensuring the destruction of monarchy in that country. He acquiesced therefore in the prayer of these petitions; the independence of Brazil was proclaimed; and the Portuguese monarchy thus finally dismembered.

In the summer of 1822 the advance of the French army into Spain excited a revolt of the Portuguese royalists; and now the infant Don Miguel, the king's second son, attracted notice, by appearing at the head of a battalion who declared against the constitution and the inconstant soldiery, equally ignorant of the object of their revolts against the king or the cortes, were easily induced to overthrow their own slight work. After a short interval, the possessors of authority relapsed into the ancient and fatal error of their kind,—that of placing their security in maintaining unlimited power. A resistance to the constitution, which grew up in the interior of the court, was fostered by foreign influence; and, after a struggle of some months, prevented the promulgation of a charter well considered and digested.

In April, 1824, part of the garrison of Lisbon surrounded the king's palace, and hindered the access of his servants to him; some of his ministers were imprisoned; and the diplomatic body, including the papal nuncio, the French ambassadors, and the Russian as well as the English minister, were the only means at last of restoring him to some degree of liberty; which was, however, so imperfect, that, by the advice of the French ambassador, the king, accompanied by his two daughters, (May 9), took refuge on board of an English ship of war in the Tagus, where, with the assistance of the whole diplomatic corps, he was at length able to re-establish his authority. In all the transactions which rendered this step necessary, Don Miguel had acted a most conspicuous part. He, however, declared that his object was to frustrate a conspiracy, which was on the point of breaking out, against the life of the king and the queen; and so well inclined was the king to pardon his son, that he accepted his explanation, and forgave these youthful faults as involuntary errors.

The king, at length, issued a proclamation (June 4), for restoring the ancient constitution of the Portuguese monarchy, with assurances that an assembly of the cortes, or three estates of the realm, should be speedily held with all their legal rights, and especially with the privilege of laying before the king, for his consideration, the heads of such measures as they might deem necessary for the public good, for the administration of justice, and for the redress of grievances, whether public or private. To that assembly was referred the consideration of the periodical meetings of succeeding cortes, and the means of progressively ameliorating the administration of the state. On the 14th of May the king returned ashore; and on the 4th of the following month he proclaimed an act of amnesty for the adherents of the cortes of 1820, from which only a few exceptions were made; on the same day appeared the decree of June 4, reviving the old constitution of the estates, and summoning the cortes of Lamego. At the same time, the junta for the preparation of a constitution was superseded by another, which was directed to make preparations for the election of the deputies of the old cortes. But Spain opposed the convocation of the old cortes, and the influence of the queen was thus revived. New conspiracies were formed against the king; and the ministry was divided in its views, principally in regard to the policy to be pursued towards Brazil.

In January, 1825, a new ministry was formed; and a negotiation was opened in London, under the mediation of Austria and England, to adjust the differences between Portugal and Brazil. The Brazilians had tasted independence; and it was soon evident that no amicable issue of such negotiation was possible which, did not involve acquiescence in the separation of the two countries. Accordingly, a treaty was concluded, and finally ratified at Lisbon (Nov. 5), recognizing the independence and separation of Brazil; acknowledging the sovereignty of that country to be veated in Don Pedro; allowing the king of Portugal also to assume the imperial title; and binding the emperor of Brazil to reject the offer of any Portuguese colony to be incorporated with his dominions.

The death of John VI. took place March 10, 1826, after having named the infanta Isabella regent; who governed in the name of the emperor of Brazil, as king of Portugal. In the following month, Don Pedro granted a constitution, establishing two chambers, and in other respects resembling the French charter. May 2, he abdicated the Portuguese throne, in favour of his daughter Donna Maria (he remaining king during her minority), on condition of her marrying her uncle Miguel. But a party was formed, which aimed at the overthrow of this constitution, and proclaimed the prince absolute king of Portugal. The marquis of Chaves and the marquis of Abrantes appeared at the head of the insurgents; and Spain, which alone had not acknowledged the new order of things, assembled an army on the Portuguese frontiers. In this emergency Portugal appealed to England, and 15,000 British troops were landed in Lisbon. Thus assisted, the insurrection was completely put down; Spain was forced to yield; and the cortes, which had been convened in October, 1826, closed its session in March, 1827.

In July, Don Pedro named his brother Miguel lieutenant and regent of the kingdom, with all the rights established by the charter, according to which the government was to be administered. The prince accordingly left Vienna, and arrived at Lisbon in February, 1828. The cortes was then in session, and, on the 26th, Miguel took the oath to observe the charter, in the presence of the two chambers. But the apostolicals or absolutists, to whom the disposition of the regent was well known, already began to speak openly of his right to the throne, and to hail him as absolute king. His ministers were all appointed from that party, except the count Villa Real; and the populace were permitted to add to their cry, "Long live the absolute king," that of "Down with the constitution."

It was now determined that Miguel should go to Villa Viçosa, a town near the Spanish frontier, where he could be supported by the troops of the marquis of Chaves, and be proclaimed absolute king; but this project was frustrated by the decision of Mr. Lamb, the British minister, who counteracted the order for the departure of the British troops, and prevented the payment of the loan made to Don Miguel under the guarantee of the British government. The cortes, being opposed to the denials of the prince, was dissolved March 14, and the recall of the British troops in April removed another obstacle from his path. He accordingly, on the 3rd of May, issued a decree in his own name, convoking the ancient cortes of Lamego, which had not met since 1697. The military in general was not favourable to the projects of the prince, and the garrison of Oporto proclaimed Don Pedro and the charter, May 18. Other garrisons joined them, and the constitutional army, 6000 strong, advanced towards Lisbon. But they were unable to cope with the absolutists, and after sustaining a severe defeat towards the end of June, the troops either forced their way to the Spanish frontiers, or embarked for England. Thus terminated the first efforts of the constitutionalists in Portugal, and, with the extinction of that party, the influence of England with the Portuguese government ceased.

Don Miguel now turned his attention to the consolidation of his power; severity and cruelty were his expedients; the prisons were crowded with the suspected, and foreign countries were filled with fugitives. Many noblemen who were known to be attached to the cause of the young queen, fortunately made their escape, and some of them came to England, where they were supported by money sent from Brazil by the emperor, for that purpose, to his ambassador in London. The cortes met June 23, and declared Don Miguel lawful king of Portugal and Algarve; chiefly on the grounds that Don Pedro had forfeited his right by becoming a Brazilian citizen, and was not a resident in the country, and that therefore he could neither succeed to the throne himself, nor name the person who should reign in his stead. On the 4th of July, 1828, Don Miguel confirmed the judgment of the cortes, and assumed the royal title. He immediately established a special commission to punish all who had taken a part in the Oporto insurrection, the members of the commission being to be paid from the confiscations they should make; and in the colonies the same course of condemnation was pursued that had been practised at home.

Portugal now became the prey of political and religious bigots. In March, 1830, the regency appointed by Don Pedro, as guardian of his daughter, was installed in Terceira, consisting of Palmella, Villa Flor, and Guerreiro. The other islands were afterwards reduced by the forces of the regency; and subsequently to the return of Don Pedro to Europe, it was well known that he was making preparations for displacing Miguel from his usurped seat. Meanwhile insurrections repeatedly broke out at home, but were suppressed by the vigour of the government and the want of concert in the insurgents. In 1830, it was estimated that the number of prisoners confined for political causes was above 40,000, and that the number of persons concealed in different parts of the country was about 5000. In consequence of some acts of violence, and a refusal of redress on the part of the government, a British fleet was sent to the Tagus (May 4, 1831); but on its appearance the required concessions were made. In July, Miguel was obliged to suffer a second humiliation of this nature; a French fleet having forced the passage of the Tagus, and taken possession of the Portuguese fleet, in consequence of the demands of the French government, for satisfaction for injuries to French subjects committed by the Portaguese authorities, not having been complied with.

In August, an insurrection of the troops broke out against Miguel. At that time Don Pedro had arrived in Europe, having embarked on board an English ship of war in the spring of 1831, and reached France in June.

From thence he proceeded to Oporto, and immediately commenced operations for displacing Don Miguel from the throne, and establishing Donna Maria as queen, under a regency. Previous to this, large bodies of volunteers had embarked from Britain and Ireland in the cause of Don Pedro, the greater number of whom were garrisoned in Oporto. Don Miguel, meanwhile, was not inactive, but advanced with his adherents towards that city, which he attacked several times without success; on one occasion (Sept. 21, 1832) his loss was 1500 men, while that of Don Pedro was not more than a third of the number. In July of the same year, a naval battle took place between the fleet of Don Pedro, under the command of admiral Napier, and that of Don Miguel, in which the latter was defeated, with the loss of two ships of 74 guns, a frigate of 56, a store-ship of 48, and two smaller vessels. This event, with other successes of the Pedroite party, led to Miguel's abandonment of the throne, consenting at the same time to leave the kingdom, on condition of receiving an income for life suited to his rank. Donna Maria da Gloria was proclaimed queen of Portugal, and in 1835 was married to the duke of Leuchtenberg, son of Eugene Beauharnois. This prince died in March of the same year, after having been married about a month.

Don Pedro died a few months after his daughter had assumed the regal power; but his short reign was distinguished by two remarkable acts, one of which is likely to have a beneficial effect on the commerce of the country, the other not less likely to have an influence over the religion and social habits of the people. By the former, the abolition of the Oporto wine company, which was a most injurious monopoly, was effected; thereby giving the grower a fair recompense for encouraging the cultivation of the grape, and thus producing wine of a better quality; while, owing to the competition of the merchants who export the wine, it could be bought at a lower price. The English being great buyers of port wine, the decree of Don Pedro was therefore advantageous to them, as well as to the Portuguese. We must not, however, forget to state, that the young queen was prevailed upon, in 1833, to grant a new charter of monopoly to the Oporto wine company for twenty years, thereby frustrating the benefits which were to be expected from its previous abolition.

The other memorable act of the regent was the suppression of all the monasteries and convents in the kingdom, and the seizure of all lands belonging to them; a measure which was considered as retaliatory for the assistance given to Don Miguel by the monks, &c, during the contest between the rival brothers. This was, notwithstanding, an act of unmerited severity; for although small pensions—none exceeding fifty pounds a year—were granted to those who had not openly avowed themselves in favour of Don Miguel, it was so easy to accuse them of having done so, that very few actually received the pittance. The lands thus confiscated were ordered to be sold for the benefit of the state; and after the death of Don Pedro, the cortes divided them into very small lots, allowing labouring people to become the purchasers on easy terms. Among the buyers were many foreigners, who have settled in Portugal on these small estates, and who, as well as the Portuguese peasantry thus converted into landed proprietors, will be the means of promoting industry, and thereby increasing the comforts of a large class of the inhabitants.

To pursue this sketch of the history of Portugal farther is needless; for though several attempts have been made to overturn the existing government, and although the political horizon still wears an unsettled aspect, the events which have subsequently occurred present few features of interest to the English reader. The last and most striking occurrence in Portuguese history, took place in April, 1851, when the Duke de Saldanha, at the head of a military insurrection, overthrew the ministry of the Count de Thomar, and after a short resistance on the part of the Queen, obtained his place, which he still fills. The Queen's second marriage with a prince of the family of Saxe Coburg must not be forgotten; neither should we omit that Portugal, once so conspicuous among the slave-dealing nations of Europe, has followed the example of Great Britain, and decreed its total abolition.

The government of Portugal is an hereditary monarchy, with an upper and a lower representative chamber, both of which are elective. The cortes meet and dissolve at specified periods, without the intervention of the sovereign, and the latter has no veto on a law passed twice by both houses. Each province has a governor, to whom the details of its government are entrusted, but great abuses exist in almost every department, the inadequacy of the salaries leading to the acceptance of bribes. And with regard to the prevalence of crime, it may be truly said, that so common is assassination, and so numerous are thefts, that the law and the police are impotent alike to secure either property or life.

Though Portugal has lost Brazil, she still retains the Azores, Madeira, Cape de Verd, and Guinea Islands; the settlements of Angola and Mozambique, in Africa; and those of Goa, Dilli, Macao, &c. in Asia.

THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY WAS THE REA OF THE HEROIC AGE IN PORTUGAL, AT WHICH TIME ITS LITERATURE VIED WITH THE SPANISH.

[AUSTRIAN EMPIRE, GERMAN STATES, &c.]

FROM all that can be collected of the early history of Germany, it appears to have been divided into many petty nations and principalities, some governed by kings whose power was limited, others by such as were absolute; some of their princes were elective, and others hereditary; and some aristocratical and democratical governments were also found among them. Many of these states and kingdoms frequently united under one head or general, both in their offensive and defensive wars.

This was the state of the Germans before they were conquered by the Romans. At that time the children went naked, and the men hung the skin of some wild beast upon their shoulders, fastening it with a thong; and persons of the best quality wore only a little woollen mantle, or a coat without sleeves. Their usual bed was the ground, a little straw, with the skins of wolves or bears. Their food was bread, meat, butter, and fruit, as at present, and their drink, water, milk, and beer; for in those early ages they were strangers to the use of wine. They were accustomed to convivial entertainments, sitting in a semicircle, with the master of the family in the middle, and the rest on the right and left, according to their quality; but to these feasts no women were admitted, nor a son under twenty years of age.

They expressed an extraordinary regard for morality, and were very strict in divine worship, choosing their priests out of the nobility, who were not entirely ignorant of moral philosophy and physics, and were usually called to councils of state. Women, we are told, were likewise admitted to the priestly office, and both the one and the other were treated with the most profound respect by the laity. The doctrine of transmigration then prevailed in Germany; they believed that departed souls, when they had left these bodies, animated other creatures; and, according as they behaved in this life, were happy or miserable. Cluverius observes, that they worshipped the sun with such devotion, that they seemed to acknowledge that planet as the supreme God, and to it dedicated the first day of the week. They also worshipped Woden, or Godan, after whom the fourth day of the week was called Wednesday. It is said that this word Godan becoming afterwards contracted into God, the Germans and English gave that name to the Deity. They also worshipped the god Faranes, the same with the Danish Thor, the Thunderer, from whom our Thursday has its name. The goddess Frisia, or Fenus, gave her name to Friday; and Twiceo, the same with Mars, gave name to Tuesday.

Like the ancient Britons, they performed their sacrifices in groves, the oak being usually chosen for an altar; and, instead of a temple, they erected an arbour made of the boughs of the oak and beech. The priests, as well as the sacrifice, were always crowned with wreaths of oak, or of some other sacred tree. They sacrificed not only beasts, but men; and these human sacrifices were taken from among their slaves or malefactors. Their belief that their souls should animate other bodies after death, it is said, made them fearless of danger, and upon extraordinary occasions they made no scruple of sacrificing their own lives. They burnt their dead bodies, and, having gathered up the bones and ashes of the funeral pile, buried them together; at the funerals of the great, warlike exercises were exhibited with all the rude pageantry of barbaric splendour, and songs were sung in memory of the heroic actions of the deceased.

These were the manners of the Germans before they were subdued by the Romans, who met with such resistance, that they were contented with making the Rhine and the Danube the boundaries of their conquests; they accordingly built fortresses, and stationed garrisons on the banks of both those rivers, to prevent the incursions of what they termed the barbarous nations; but within about a hundred years after Constantine the Great, the Franks, Burgundians, Alemanni, and other German nations, broke through those boundaries, passed the Rhine, and dispossessed the Romans of all Gaul, Rhetia, and Noricum, which they shared among themselves; but the Franks prevailing over the rest, at length established their empire over all modern Germany, France, and Italy, under the conduct of Charlemagne, or Charles the Great.

This celebrated man was crowned at Rome by Pope Leo III. in the church of St. Peter, on Christmas-day, 800, amidst the acclamations of the clergy and the people. Nicephorus, at that time emperor of the East, attended at the coronation; and these princes agreed that the state of Venice should serve as the limit to each empire. Charlemagne now exercised all the authority of the Cæsars; the whole country from Benevento to Bayonne, and from Bayonne to Bavaria, acknowledging his power.

The Germans had previously been converted to Christianity by one Winfred, an Englishman, who also collected them in towns, and thus introduced the elements of civilisation amongst them. The Saxons were made Christians by Charlemagne, after a long and bloody warfare.

After the death of Charlemagne, and of Louis le Debonnaire, his son and successor, the empire was divided between the four sons of Louis; Lothaire was emperor; Pepin, king of Aquitaine; Louis, king of Germany; and Charles the Bald, king of France. This partition was a continual source of discontent among the parties. The French enjoyed the empire under eight emperors, until the year 912, when Louis III., the last prince of the race of Charlemagne, dying without male issue, Conrad, count of Franconia, son-in-law to Louis, was elected emperor; but was not acknowledged in Italy, nor in France.

The reign of Conrad produced no change whatever in Germany; but it was about this period that the German bishops fixed themselves in the possession of their fiefs; and many cities began to enjoy the right of natural liberty; following the example of the cities of Italy, some bought these rights of their lords, and others procured them with arms in their hands.

Questions affecting the general interests of the Germanic body were determined in a Diet, consisting of the emperor, the electors, and the representatives of the princes, and of the free cities. There were also minor diets in the different cities or divisions of the empire. It may, however, be proper to mention in this place, that the constitution of the empire has undergone a total change. There is no emperor of Germany; the title is sunk in that of emperor of Austria, which that sovereign holds by inheritance, not election. The ecclesiastical electorates have been taken possession of by secular princes. Bohemia is united to Austria; the palatinate has disappeared; Saxony is given to the kingdom of Prussia, formerly the electorate of Brandenburg; and the electorates of Hanover and Bavaria are also converted into kingdoms. Most of these changes are the work of the late wars.

Conrad was succeeded by Henry, duke of Saxony, whom on his death-bed he recommended to the states. And in Henry II. the male race of the Saxon kings and emperors ended, in 1024. The states then elected Conrad II., who, by means of his son, afterwards Henry III., annexed the kingdom of Burgundy to the empire, rendered Poland subject to his dominion, and, in a treaty with Denmark, appointed the river Eider as the boundary of the German empire. Henry III. is regarded as the most powerful and absolute of the German emperors.

Henry III. deposed three popes who had set up against each other, and supported a fourth against them; from which time the weakness of the papal chair was always intimated to the emperor, and it became an established form for the emperor to send a deputation to Rome, requesting that a new pope might be elected.

Henry IV. his son, was, however, put under the ban by the pope, Gregory VII., and his subjects and son excited to rebel against him; on which he was deposed by the states.

Henry V. succeeded his father, but was obliged to renounce all pretensions to the investiture of bishoprics, which had been claimed by his ancestors; and in him became extinct the male line of the Frank emperors.

Upon this the pope caused Lotharius, duke of Saxony, to be elected; but he was not acknowledged by all Germany for their sovereign till after a ten years' war. Frederic I., who became emperor in 1152, effectually exercised his sovereignty over the see of Rome, by virtue of his coronation at Arles, reserving also his dominion over that kingdom, and obliging Poland to pay him tribute and take an oath of allegiance. To him succeeded Henry VI., Philip III., and Otto; the latter of whom, being deposed by the pope, was succeeded by Frederic II., whom historians extol for his learning, wisdom, and resolution; he was five times excommunicated by three popes; but prevailed so far against pope Gregory IX. as to depose him from the papal chair. These continual contests between him and the popes gave rise to the two famous factions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines; the former adhering to the papal see, and the latter to the emperors.

About the middle of the thirteenth century the empire was rent asunder by factions, each of which supported a particular candidate for the imperial dignity; these were William, earl of Holland; Henry of Thuringia; Richard, earl of Cornwall, brother to Henry III. of England; and Alfonso, king of Castile. At this time the great officers of the household laid claim, to a right of electing the emperor, to the exclusion of the princes and great towns, or without consulting any other members of the empire: the distracted state of the empire served to confirm to them this claim; and Gregory X., who then filled the pontifical chair at Rome, either considering such claim as valid, or desirous of rendering it so, directed a bull to those great officers, the purport of which was to exhort them to choose an emperor, and by that means to end the troubles in Germany. From that time they have been considered as the sole electors; and their right to this privilege was established beyond all controversy in the reign of Charles IV., by the glorious constitution known by the title of the golden bull, published in the year 1357, which decreed that the territories by virtue of which the great offices were held, should descend to the heirs male for ever, in perpetual entail, entire and indivisible.

Germany began to recover from its distracted state in the year 1273, when count Rodolph of Hapsburg, the founder of the house of Austria, was advanced to the imperial dignity.

elected king of the Romans. This prince, who was the fourth son of Charles, at his father's desire succeeded to the empire; but, being dissolute and cruel, was deposed, after he had reigned twenty-two years.

Charles was succeeded by three other princes, whose reigns were short; at length, in 1411, Sigismund was unanimously chosen emperor, and in 1414, he proclaimed a general council to be held at Constance, in which three popes were deposed and a new one was set up. At this council the reformers, John Huss and Jerome of Prague, were condemned and burnt, although the emperor had granted them a passport, and was engaged in honour and conscience for their safe return to their country; which an exasperated the Hussites of Bohemia, that they raised a formidable army, and under the conduct of Zisca, their general, defeated his forces in fourteen battles.

Frederic, duke of Austria, son-in-law to the emperor Sigismund, was chosen emperor upon the death of his father, and reigned fifty-three years. His son Maximilian was chosen king of the Romans during the life of his father, and afterwards obtained from the pope the imperial crown. During his reign the empire was divided into ten circles.

Charles V., surnamed the Great, son of Philip, king of Spain, and grandson to Maximilian, was elected emperor in 1519. He procured Luther's doctrine to be condemned, and in his reign the disciples of that great reformer obtained the name of protestants, from their protesting against a decree of the imperial diet in favour of the catholics. He is said to have been victorious in seventy battles; he had the pope and French king prisoners at the same time, and carried his arms into Africa, where he conquered the kingdom of Tunis; but was disgraced in the war with the piratical states. He compelled the Turks to raise the siege of Vienna, made war on the protestant princes, and took the elector of Saxony and the prince of Hesse prisoners; but, after a reign of thirty-eight years, he resigned the empire to his brother Ferdinand, and the kingdom of Spain to his son Philip II., himself retiring to the convent of St. Juste, in Spain.

The abdication of this prince left the power of the princes of Germany more firm. The house of Austria was divided into two branches; one of which reigned in Spain, and which, by the conquests in the New World, had become much superior, in power and riches, to the Austrian branch. Ferdinand I., successor to Charles V., had great possessions in Germany; Upper Hungary, which he also possessed, could afford him little more than the support of the troops necessary to make head against the Turks; Bohemia seemed to bear the yoke with regret; and Livonia, which had hitherto belonged to the empire, was now detached, and joined to Poland.

Ferdinand I. distinguished himself by establishing the aclic council of the empire; he was a peaceful prince, and used to assign a part of each day to hear the complaints of his people. Maximilian II. and his son Rodolph II. were each elected king of the Romans, but the latter could not be prevailed upon to allow a successor to be chosen in his life time.

Under Maximilian II., as under Ferdinand I., Lombardy was not, in effect, in the power of Germany; it was in the hands of Philip, appertaining rather to an ally than a vassal. During this time, the legislative authority resided always in the emperor, notwithstanding the weakness of the imperial power; and this authority was in its greatest vigour, when the chief of the empire had not diminished his power by increasing that of the princes. Rodolph II. found these obstacles to his authority, and the empire became more weak in his hands.

The philosophy, or rather the effeminacy, of this prince, who possessed particular virtues, but not those of a sovereign, occasioned many fermentations. Lutheranism had already spread itself in Germany for the space of a century; prince, kings, cities, and nations, had embraced its doctrine. In vain Charles V. and his successors had endeavoured to stop its progress; it manifested itself more and more every day, till at length it broke all bounds, and menaced Germany with a general war. Henry IV. having nullified the measures of the party formed against the house of Austria, the protestants and catholics appeared reciprocally to fear each other; and hostilities ceased after the taking of Jülich.

Germany, however, continued to be divided into two parties. The first, which was named the angelic union, had for its chief the elector palatine, united to whom were all the protestant princes, and the greater part of the imperial cities. The second was called the catholic league, at the head of which was the duke of Bavaria. The pope, and king of Spain, joined themselves to this party; and it was further strengthened by the elector of Saxony, and the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt; the first, because he was jealous of the elector palatine; and the latter, because he had his particular reasons for keeping fair with the emperor.

Rodolph died in 1612. The electors, after an interregnum of some months, bestowed the empire on the archduke Matthias, brother to the late emperor. This prince had already mounted the thrones of Hungary and Bohemia, as a friend to the protestant cause. But he had no sooner ascended the imperial throne, than he laid aside the mask, and renounced the reformed religion. It was not long before he received the proper reward of his dissimulation. An insurrection being made into Hungary by the Turks, he applied to the protestants for succour, who refused him every assistance.

In 1619 Matthias died, leaving no issue. The protestant party used its utmost endeavours to prevent the empire from falling into the hands of a catholic prince, especially one of the house of Austria; notwithstanding which, Ferdinand II., cousin to the late emperor, was elected, and for a time he was the most happy as well as the most powerful monarch in Europe; not so much from his personal efforts or abilities, as from the great success of his generals, Walestein and Tilly. The power of Austria menaced equally the catholics and the protestants, and the alarm spread itself even to Rome.

The pope thought it advisable to unite with France, in order to check the growing power of Austria. French gold, and the entreaties of the protestants, brought into this confederacy Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, the only monarch of his day who had the smallest pretension to the name of a hero.

The arrival of Gustavus in Germany, changed the face of affairs in Europe. In 1631 he gained the battle of Leipsic, defeating general Tilly. Many of the new manœuvres introduced at that time by the Swedish monarch into the art of war, are even now practised by most of the European powers, and are esteemed, by military men, chef-d'œuvres in military art.

Ferdinand, in 1632, had nearly lost Hungary, Bohemia, and the empire; but his good fortune saved him: his enemy, Gustavus Adolphus, was killed in the battle of Lutzen, in the midst of victory.

The house of Austria, which had sunk under the arms of Adolphus, now felt new spirits, and succeeded in detaching the most powerful princes of the empire from the alliance of Sweden. These victorious troops, abandoned by their allies and deprived of their king, were beaten at Nordlingen; and although more fortunate afterwards, they were less feared than when under Gustavus.

Ferdinand II. died at this conjuncture: he left all his dominions to his son Ferdinand III. In the reign of this prince the celebrated treaty of Westphalia was solemnly signed at Munster, October 24th, 1648. It was the basis of all subsequent treaties, and is esteemed as the fundamental law of the empire. It was by this treaty that the quarrels of the emperors, and the princes of the empire, which had subsisted even hundred years, and the disputes about religion, (although of less duration, not less dangerous), were terminated. Germany appeared to recover insensibly its losses; the fields were cultivated, and the cities rebuilt.

Leopold, the son of Ferdinand, succeeded. His first war was very unfortunate, and he received the law by the peace of Nimeguen. The interior of Germany was not materially injured; but the frontiers, on the side of the Rhine, suffered considerably. Fortune was less unequal in the second war, produced by the league of Augsburg; Germany, England, Spain, Savoy, and Sweden, against France. This war ended with the peace of Ryswick, which deprived Louis XIV. of Strasburg.

The third war was the most fortunate for Leopold, and for Germany: when Louis

XIV. had considerably increased his power; when he governed Spain under the name of his grandson; when his armies not only possessed the Netherlands, and Bavaria, but were in the heart of Italy and Germany. The battle of Hochstadt, in 1704, changed the scene, and every place he had acquired was lost. Leopold died the following year, with the reputation of being the most powerful emperor since Charles the Fifth.

The reign of Joseph I., his son, was yet more successful than that of Leopold. The gold of England and Holland, the victories of prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, and his good fortune, rendered him almost absolute. He put to the ban of the empire the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, partisans of France, and took possession of their dominions.

Joseph died in 1711, and was succeeded by his brother, Charles VI. Although powerful as he was, by the possession of all Hungary, of the Milanese, of Mantua, of Naples, and of Sicily, the nine provinces of the Low Countries, and the flourishing state of his hereditary German dominions, he was obliged to sign, on receiving the imperial crown, an obligation to conserve and augment the rights of the Germanic body.

The empire was tranquil and flourishing under the last emperor of the house of Austria. The war of 1716, against the Turks, was principally on the frontiers of the Ottoman territory, and terminated gloriously. Germany had changed its face during the times of Leopold and Joseph; but, in the reign of Charles VI. it may be said to have arrived almost at perfection. Previous to this epoch, the arts were uncultivated; scarcely a house was well built; and manufactures of fine articles unknown: the thirty years' war had ruined all.

The affairs of Charles were uniformly successful until 1734. The celebrated victories of prince Eugene over the Turks at Temeswar, and at Belgrade, secured the frontiers of Hungary from molestation; and Italy became safe in consequence of Don Carlos, son of Philip V., having consented to become his vassal.

But these prosperities had their termination. Charles, by his credit in Europe, and in conjunction with Russia, endeavoured to procure the crown of Poland for Augustus III., elector of Saxony. The French, who supported Stanislaus, had the advantage, and Stanislaus was elected king. Don Carlos being declared king of Naples, after the battle of Bitonto, took possession also in 1735. Charles, to obtain peace, renounced the two kingdoms, and dismembered the Milanese in favour of the king of Sardinia.

New misfortunes afflicted him in his latter years. Having declared war against the Turks in 1737, his armies were defeated, and a disadvantageous peace was the consequence. Belgrade, Temeswar, Orsova, and all the country between the Danube and the Saave, were ceded to the Turks. He died broken-hearted, in 1740.

The death of Charles plunged Europe in one general and ruinous war. By the "pragmatic sanction," which he had signed, and which was guaranteed by France, the archduchess Maria Theresa, his eldest daughter, had been named as heiress to all his possessions. This princess married, in 1736, Francis Stephen, last duke of Lorraine. She solicited the imperial throne for her husband, and sued for the inheritance of her father. They were both disputed by the elector of Bavaria, who, supported by the arms of France, was elected emperor, in 1742.

Charles VII. died in 1745, and was succeeded by Francis I., the husband of Maria Theresa. He died in 1765, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Joseph II., who had been elected king of the Romans the preceding year. When this prince attained to the imperial dignity, he was considered as distinguished by a steady and active attention to every department of government; and he actually introduced a variety of bold and salutary reforms in the state. A noble liberality of mind, and enlarged views of politics, were imputed to him when he rendered the condition of the lower orders of men in his hereditary dominions less wretched and servile, by alleviating that cruel vassalage in which they were held by the feudal lords of the soil; whilst a free and unreserved toleration was granted to all sects and denominations of Christians; but these hopes were frustrated by a more full development of his character, in which, activity without efficiency, enacting laws and abrogating them, forming great designs and terminating them in mean concessions, appeared conspicuous.

On the death of the elector of Bavaria in 1777, the emperor laid claim to a considerable part of that electorate, founded on a vague right which had been set up, but not contended for, so long ago as the year 1425, by the emperor Sigismund. The king of Prussia, as elector of Brandenburg, opposed these pretensions, on the ground of protecting the empire in its rights, privileges, and territorial possessions, against all encroachments upon, or diminutions of them; but the emperor not being induced by negotiation to relinquish his designs, in 1778 the two most powerful monarchs in Europe led their formidable armies in person, to decide the dispute by arms; nearly half a million of men appearing in the field, to fight for a territory which would have been dearly purchased at the sum expended on one year's support of those vast armies—so little is the ambition of princes regulated by the intrinsic worth of the object at which they aim!

The kingdom of Bohemia was the scene of action, and the greatest generals of the age commanded; as, marshal count Laudohn, on the side of Austria; prince Henry of Prussia, and the hereditary prince (afterwards duke) of Brunswick, on the side of Prussia. The horrors and the éclat of war were then expected to be revived, in all their tremendous pomp, but the campaign was closed without any general action, or any brilliant event whatever; and during the following winter the courts of Petersburg and Versailles interposing their good offices to make up the breach, terms of peace were soon adjusted at Teschen, in Austrian Silesia. The territory acquired to the house of Austria by virtue of this treaty extends about seventy English miles, and in breadth is about half that space.

The court of Vienna, being thus put into possession of this territory, renounced, in the fullest and most explicit terms, all other claims whatever on the electorate, by which every latent spark that might kindle future contentions and wars was supposed to be extinguished. In the year 1781, the court of Vienna endeavoured to procure for the archduke Maximilian, brother to the emperor, the election to a participation of the secular bishoprics of Cologne and Munster, together with the reversion of the former; this measure was strenuously opposed by the king of Prussia, who remonstrated against it to the reigning elector, and to the chapters, in whom the right of election is lodged; but notwithstanding the power of the prince who thus interposed, the house of Austria carried its point. After this the views of the emperor were directed to the restoration of the commerce formerly carried on by the ancient city of Antwerp; and also to invite foreign ships to the port of Ostend, by which he hoped to render the Austrian Netherlands flourishing and opulent; nor was he less attentive to abridge the power of the clergy, and the authority of the church of Rome, in every part of his hereditary dominions.

Joseph II. died February 20, 1790, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and was succeeded by his brother Leopold II., then grand duke of Tuscany, who became emperor of Germany, and king of Hungary and Bohemia.

This prince severely felt the thorns which encompassed a diadem: although a lover of peace, he was compelled to wage war with the French republic; whilst he saw his sister, the queen of France, degraded from her rank, kept a close prisoner, and in continual danger of an untimely end; but death closed his eyes upon these afflictive scenes in March 1791, five months after his advancement, in the forty-fourth year of his age.

Francis had no sooner been declared emperor, than he joined in the hostilities carrying on against France, on account of his hereditary states, as well as the empire. He soon lost the Netherlands; and the empire all its territory west of the Rhine: the Austrian possessions in Italy followed in 1797. The progress of the French arms was arrested only by the treaty of Campo Formio. A congress was afterwards held at Rastadt, which continued sitting for many months, and at length broke up without procuring peace. During the year 1799, the Austrians, joined by the Russians under Suwarrow, penetrated into Italy, and deprived the French of the greater part of their conquests acquired by the military skill of Buonaparte.

In 1800, Buonaparte, having returned from Egypt, raised an army, and crossed the Alps, with a view to recover Italy, lost in his absence. Fortune favoured his arms, and all the possessions of Francis fell into his hands by the famous battle of Marengo. Piedmont also submitted to the conqueror, and was, with Parma, Placentia, and some imperial fiefs, incorporated with France.

The peace of Lunéville, in 1801, made the Rhine the boundary between France and Germany; the latter thus lost more than 26,000 square miles of territory, and nearly 4,000,000 inhabitants. The Austrian monarch founded the hereditary empire of Austria in 1804; and the first consul of France was declared emperor of the French, under the title of Napoleon I. Austria and Russia soon after united against Napoleon; and the peace of Presbourg, which took place on the 26th of December, 1805, terminated the war, in which three states of the German empire, Bavaria, Wirtemberg, and Baden, had taken part as allies of France. In the following year, sixteen German princes renounced their connexion with the German empire, and entered into a union under the name of the confederation of the Rhine, which acknowledged the emperor of France as its protector. This decisive step was followed by a second. The German empire was dissolved; the emperor Francis resigned the German crown, renounced the title of emperor of Germany, and declared his hereditary dominions separated from the German empire.

The first year of the existence of this "confederation" had not elapsed, when its armies, united with those of France, were marched to the Saale, the Elbe, and the Oder, against the Prussians, and afterwards to the Vistula, against the Russians. After the peace of Tilsit the confederation was strengthened by the accession of eleven princely houses of northern Germany. The kingdom of Westphalia was established, and Jerome, the brother of Napoleon, put upon the throne. Four kings, five grand dukes, and twenty-five dukes and other princes, were united in the new confederation.

The peace of Vienna increased its extent and power. The north-western parts, however, and the Hanseatic cities, Bremen, Hamburg, and Lubeck, were united with France in 1810. When Napoleon, in 1812, undertook his fatal expedition to Russia, the contingents of the Rhenish confederation joined his army; and not less than about 100,000 Germans found their graves in the snows of Russia. The Russians pursued their advantages to the frontiers of Germany. Prussia, wearied with her long sufferings, joined them with enthusiasm, and, at the same time, some of the states of the north of Germany united with them. Lubeck and Hamburg rose against the French, and all Germany was animated with the cheering hope of liberation. Austria next joined the grand alliance; and the war, owing to the enthusiasm of the people, soon assumed a most favourable appearance for the allies. On the 8th of October, 1813, Bavaria joined the allied arms; and, ten days afterwards, the battle of Leipsic destroyed the French dominion in Germany, and dissolved the confederation of the Rhine.

The king of Wirtemberg, and the other princes of the south, soon after followed the example of Bavaria; and after the battle of Hanau, Oct. 30, the French army had retreated over the Rhine. Everywhere in Germany the French power was now annihilated: neither the kingdom of Westphalia nor the grand-duchy of Berg any longer existed. Throughout Germany immense preparations were made for the preservation of the recovered independence. The victorious armies passed the Rhine on the first days of the following year, and all the territory which the French had conquered from Germany since 1793, was regained and secured by the events of the campaign in France and the peace of Paris. It was stipulated, by the articles of the peace, that the German states should be independent, but connected together by a federative system. This provision of the treaty was carried into effect by the congress of Vienna, Nov. 1, 1814, and by the statutes of the Germanic confederation in 1815.

In the new system of Europe, established at the congress, in 1815, and by the treaty concluded with Bavaria, at Munich, in April, 1816, the Austrian monarchy not only gained more than 4238 square miles of territory, but was also essentially improved in compactness; and its commercial importance was increased by the accession of Dalmatia and Venice. The influence of this power among the states of Europe, in consequence of the congress of Vienna, as the first member of the great quadruple alliance (changed, by the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, to a quintuple alliance), and as the head of the German confederation, has since been gradually increasing. Of the foreign affairs of the government, the most important is the connexion of Austria with the German confederation.

The termination of the war with Russia, or, as it is called in Germany, "the war of liberation," restored Germany to its geographical and political position in Europe, but not as an empire acknowledging one supreme head. A confederation of thirty-five independent sovereigns and four free cities has replaced the elective monarchy, that fell under its own decrepitude. In the choice of the smaller princes, who were to become rulers, as well as of those who were to be obliged to descend to the rank of subjects, more attention was paid to family and political connection than to the old territorial divisions under the empire. The clerical fiefs, and the greater part of the free imperial cities, were incorporated into the estates of the more powerful princes, upon the dissolution of the empire, and were not re-established. Only four cities remained in the enjoyment of their political rights.

The princes then formed themselves into a confederacy, named the "Bundesstag" or Diet, and agreed to hold its sittings in Frankfurt-on-the-Maine. They gave to it a constitution (named the Bundesacte) by which the sovereigns, of their own authority, constituted themselves the Diet, and gave to each a vote in it corresponding to the extent of their dominions; but in which the German people were not recognised as entitled to any representation. The thirteenth article of this Act of Union, however, declared that in every separate state of the confederation a constitution "shall be instituted." But no time was mentioned, and no description of the constitution was given; and it was only in some of the smaller states, such as Hanover, Baden, and Hesse, that this provision was carried into effect. During more than thirty years the rulers of Austria and Prussia, although constantly solicited by their subjects to redeem this pledge, refused to fulfil their obligations. So far from granting constitutions, a congress of ministers, under the direction of Prince Metternich, assembled at Carlsbad on the 20th of September 1819, and adopted the following among other resolutions:—1st, that the universities shall be subjected to a strict superintendence; 2d, that no daily or other periodical work, nor any book unless it shall exceed twenty sheets, shall be published in any State of the Union until they shall have been previously revised and sanctioned by the public authorities; and, 3d, that a central commission, consisting of seven members of the Diet, shall sit in Mayence, charged with the suppression of all revolutionary tendencies in the states of the confederation.

From that date till 1848 these resolutions continued to be acted upon with unsparring rigour. The "central commission" considered themselves authorised to abrogate, suspend, and act in opposition to the "constitutions" enjoyed by the minor states on every emergency, which appeared to them to call for an exercise of repressive authority. The natural fruits of this breach of faith soon showed themselves. The students of the universities, and in many instances the professors, became the determined enemies of the ruling powers. The men of literature and science winced under the galling censorship to which they were subjected; and the mass of the people, having been rendered by their schools capable of feeling, reading, and thinking, thoroughly sympathised with the classes before named, and all demanded freedom. In this manner the intelligence and physical force of Germany were nearly unanimous in the opinion that their Sovereigns had broken faith with them, abused their confidence, and, in return for all their sacrifices, had treated them with harshness, indignity, and injustice.

Even so late as 1844, a conference took place at Vienna, of plenipotentiaries of the German states, for the avowed suppression of a powerful body of malcontents, whom Prince Metternich described as hostile to all authority; tending to disturb all social relations, either public or private; and which would, if left unchecked, finally deprive certain princes of all monarchical authority. This congress was, therefore, convened by the sovereign princes and free towns of Germany, to provide against the slightest change in the existing order of things.

In these circumstances, the French Revolution of February 1848 burst forth like a volcano. It operated throughout Germany like an electric spark applied to combustible materials. The people, the students, and, in many instances, the Professors, rose, and, with the tacit sanction of the middle ranks in general, rebelled against the Sovereigns and demanded their political rights. The soldiers, in almost all the German states, partook of the common sentiments, and offered either no, or only a brief and feeble, resistance. The Sovereigns saw their power vanish like a shadow. In Vienna, on the 13th of March 1848, the cry was uttered, "Down with Metternich," and, on the 14th, Prince Metternich was a fugitive, and the city in the hands of the students and the burgher-guard. The Emperor hesitated, and on 15th May there was a second rising, in which the people triumphed. The court then promised reformed institutions, and subsequently appointed a so-called liberal minister to carry them into effect.

On the 18th and 19th March the people of Berlin rose in arms. In the König's Strasse, where the chief contest ensued, the words "Respect private property," were posted on every shop, and on the city chambers were inscribed, "Public property." The Government was beaten, few excesses were committed, the King promised free institutions, and tranquillity was restored. Political movements took place at the same time in Bavaria, Saxony, Hanover, and the other minor German States, and everywhere the Sovereigns, prostrate before the popular power, acceded to the demands of their subjects. These demands were limited to representative constitutions, freedom of the press, guarantees against personal arrest except on the warrant of a court of justice, trial by jury, publicity of judicial proceedings, and other constitutional privileges, which in England are reckoned the birthright of the humblest individual. These having been conceded, the Sovereigns were left in undisturbed possession of their thrones.

Simultaneously with these occurrences, a self-constituted assembly of political Reformers met at Heidelberg, to devise means for obtaining a new Constitution for confederated Germany, in place of the obnoxious diet, which the princes consented to abolish. They had two grand objects in view. To secure a due representation of the people in the Confederated Government, and by means of this government to render Germany a great and united political power. Their labour ended in the election, by nearly universal suffrage, and with the consent of the Sovereigns, of a certain number of deputies from each of the confederated States, who met in Frankfurt as a German Parliament, with power to frame a Constitution for the Confederation, and to constitute Germany, in her foreign relations, a single, powerful, and united State. On the 29th of June 1848, the Parliament chose the Archduke John of Austria as the head of United Germany, under the title of the "Reichsverweser," or "Lieutenant-Administrator of the Empire." "The Election was received with universal acclamation. Fires-of-joy blazed on every hill, cannon thundered, the public greeting of the Constitution, and thousands of voices shouted forth in jubilee, 'Hail our German Fatherland!'"

Immediately after the installation of the Reichsverweser, the German parliament commenced its labours of framing a constitution. By this scheme, the countries composing, till that period, the Germanic confederation, together with Schleswig, and the provinces of the Eastern and Western Prussia, were all to be fused into one grand, free, fraternal empire of Germany; the sovereignties at present existing within these territories being limited, and subordinated up to the point which the perfection of imperial unity might be found to require. This empire was to be hereditary, and its capital was to be Frankfurt on the Main. The emperor of Germany was to be maintained in his dignity by a civil list, voted by the German parliament; he was to have the executive in all affairs of the empire, and to nominate and appoint all officers of the state, of the army and navy, and of the staff of the national guard. In the imperial power, as constituted by this emperor and parliament, would be vested all the international representation of Germany with respect to foreign states, the disposal of the army, the right of conducting negotiations and concluding treaties, and of declaring peace or war. The parliament was to consist of two houses; the upper constituted by the thirty-three reigning sovereigns (or their deputies), by a deputy from each of the four free towns, and by a complement of as many imperial councillors, with certain qualifications, as should raise the whole chamber to the number of 800 members; the lower by representatives to be elected by the people in fixed proportions, but by methods to be determined by the respective states. Provision was also made for the establishment of supreme and imperial courts of judicature with ample powers, vast fields of operation, and most effective machinery. But long before this gigantic scheme could be matured, the proceedings of the German parliament were thrown into a different channel by events to which we must now briefly advert.

Schleswig and Holstein are two duchies, which, by hereditary descent, have come to be connected with the crown of Denmark, as Hanover was with that of England. But the king of Denmark is duke only of Schleswig and of Holstein, and their German laws and constitution have remained unchanged during all the period of their connection with Denmark. In Holstein the succession has always been limited to heirs male; and as in some ancient charters there was a clause declaring the union between Holstein and Schleswig indissoluble, the Germans, in the near prospect of the crown of Denmark falling into the female line, had, for a long period, been eager that measures should be adopted to the effect that the duchy of Schleswig should follow the succession of the duchy of Holstein, and that all political connection between Denmark and the duchies should cease. To this arrangement the Danes were naturally hostile. This question had attracted great attention in 1846 and 1847, and some opposition was offered to the centralising tendencies of Christian VIII., because it was thought that the measures of the court were directed against the nationality of the duchies. The accession of the present sovereign, followed by an attempt to embrace his different possessions under one constitution, increased the discontent of the German party in Schleswig-Holstein. To alter the connection existing between the duchies, and to propose to treat either of them as integral parts of the monarchy, was resented as an attack upon the rights of the country, and as an attempt to extinguish the nationality of the duchies. During this exasperated state of feeling the French revolution of February, 1848, opportunely broke out. The momentary success which attended it, stimulated the German party in the Duchies to throw off the Danish yoke; and a provisional government was at once proclaimed. Though it appears singular that the governments and the people of Germany should have seriously set to work to invade an ancient monarchy for the benefit of an empire which never existed, yet so it was—the kingdoms and the principalities of Germany took up the quarrel. The Assembly at Frankfurt aided the insurgents both by word and deed. Troops from every quarter were hurried to the assistance of a "kindred race;" and General Wrangel, at the head of a considerable army, occupied Lütland, and raised enormous contributions from the unfortunate inhabitants. It was in vain that the king of Denmark, who, as duke of Holstein, was a member of the Germanic Confederation, protested against the invasion of his rights. The Germans, from the Rhine to the Oder, had set their hearts upon making Germany a naval power, and were determined to acquire the harbour of Kiel, together with a large portion of the Danish coast. The Danes, however, manfully resisted: though compelled to retire from their continental dominions by the superior numbers of the invading army, they inflicted no small loss on the enemy by blockading the German ports. Denmark then applied to Russia, France, and England, her allies, for fulfilment of treaties guaranteeing to her the integrity of her dominions. "The danger of a general European war became imminent; and the Prussian government, which, up to that moment, had been the chief instigator and support of the insurgents, found it necessary to consent to an armistice. This armistice was concluded at Malmö, Aug. 26, and was to last for seven months. It virtually put an end to the war; for though it again broke forth, and raged with great violence during the spring and summer of the following year, the combatants were confined almost exclusively to the Holsteimers and the Danes; the German governments having meanwhile abandoned a cause to which they had lent themselves at first with unexampled eagerness.

The Assembly at Frankfort, after a stormy debate, approved of this armistice, but by a small majority. The liberal members, with Dahlmann at their head, loudly expressed their indignation, which found a powerful echo out of doors. Meetings were held outside the town, at which it was resolved that those who had ratified "the infamous armistice of Malmo were traitors against the majesty, liberty, and honour of the German people," and a deputation was appointed to inform them of this resolution. The archduke John was now officially informed that the senate could not preserve the peace of the town. His minister of the interior, Von Schmerling, forthwith summoned Austrian, Prussian, and Bavarian troops to Frankfort; and when the populace began to erect barricades, and throw stones at them, the town was declared in a state of siege. At length the conflict began by an attack on one of the barricades, at which the ominous red flag was displayed. One barricade after another was carried under a galling fire from behind the trees and the houses. Artillery had to be called for, and employed against some; but by midnight all resistance was at an end. Martial law was proclaimed. This insurrection was marked by some incidents more than usually atrocious. As Prince Lichnowsky and Major Auerwald were attempting to reason with the insurgents, they were fired upon, mortally wounded, and then barbarously cut and hacked. The decline of the Assembly may date from this day.

In the midst of these complicated transactions, the important question as to the Prince on whose head the imperial crown should be placed, could no longer be deferred. A large majority of the National Assembly voted for the king of Prussia; and a deputation was appointed to go to Berlin to apprise his Majesty of the vote. But the king, who had so often appeared anxious to seize the imperial crown, now declined it until the princes of Germany should have made known their views. This answer pleased no party. Austria did not find the refusal sufficiently distinct; and the Frankfort Assembly saw in it a proof that a rupture was at hand. Then followed a series of complicated events, in which the German parliament disappeared. Austria, through her minister, M. de Schmerling, declared that the Assembly had exceeded its powers; that it had not been nominated to dispose of the empire, but to frame a constitution for the approval of the different governments; finally, that the Assembly no longer existed, and that the Austrian deputies might consider their mission at an end.

Thus abandoned by Prussia, and attacked by Austria, the German parliament was at a loss where to turn to for support. Many of the most distinguished members, who had had faith in the mission of the parliament, lost courage, and one by one resigned their functions, and thus left the field open to the wild and revolutionary spirits whom they had hitherto kept in check. Left to the freedom of their own will, they at once proceeded to depose the archduke John, who, however, took no heed of their deposition; and at length, on the 30th of May, 1849, they resolved to quit Frankfort, and removed to Stuttgart. There they formed nothing but a club, and the first German parliament received its death blow from the police agents of the king of Wurtemberg. The revolutionary deputies then dispersed over Germany; and we find them taking part in all the insurrections of which Dresden, Leipzig, and Baden, were shortly afterwards the bloody stage.

The king of Prussia, now acting under the counsel of General Radowitz, attempted to obtain by diplomatic means what he had rejected when presented by the popular will. But it would far exceed our limits to detail the policy to which he had recourse to effect his object. Suffice it here to state, that the various schemes which he adopted had no definite result, save to revive, in all its force, the fierce struggle for supremacy that had long existed between Austria and Prussia. Prussia, by convoking at Erfurt certain elected deputies as a central parliament, in lieu of the Frankfort parliament already basenoting to an end, had recognised the political existence of the people, and their right to participate in framing a federal constitution. Austria, on the other hand, refused to allow her subjects to elect deputies to that assembly, and protested against the character of a federal parliament given to it by Prussia. Austria argued that as the Frankfort parliament, to which she had consented, was dissolved, the old diet revived as a matter of right. Prussia resisted this view, and maintained that the diet was for ever extinguished, and that, on the dissolution of the Frankfort parliament, the field was once more open to the reconstruction of a new federal constitution. But, in defiance of the protest of Prussia, the diet at Frankfort was once more convoked, the plenum announced to be complete, and the usual recognition by foreign powers formally demanded. The German people were in despair. The king of Prussia was regarded as their only, although a forlorn hope; and they longed for some event which, by uniting them, might once more enable them to vindicate their own political existence and their rights.

Such an event most unexpectedly occurred. The electorate of Hesse Cassel was one of the minor German states which enjoyed a constitutional government. For eighteen years it had been in full operation; and through its instrumentality many beneficial measures had been introduced. But the chambers having, in 1850, declined to vote certain taxes, the elector dissolved them, and in flagrant violation of the constitution, proceeded to levy the taxes by his own sovereign authority. But the individuals, from whom taxes were illegally demanded, applied to the supreme civil court, and received from it an injunction to restrain the collector. This brought the sovereign and the supreme court, as representing the law and the constitution, into collision, and the people universally rallied round the constitution. They remained perfectly quiet, but offered a determined passive resistance. The elector fled to Fulda, and there proclaimed martial law, appointed a commander-in-chief, and ordered him to collect the imposts by military execution. The officers of the elector's army resigned their commissions, and he was forced to disband his soldiers. He then applied to the confederate sovereigns to reduce his subjects to obedience. Austria and Bavaria at once responded to the call, and induced Wurtemberg to aid them. The German people, with one voice, appealed to the king of Prussia, who marched his troops to the confines of Hesse-Cassel to support the constitution. The soldiers of Austria and Bavaria approached by another line to enforce the dictates of the elector's irresponsible will. To give effect to his demonstration, the king of Prussia summoned his chambers, and called out his landwehr, or the whole military force of his kingdom. The chambers, his army, and people, responded to the call to war with acclamations of joy; and a conflict seemed inevitable. The whole German people gave indications of participating in the same spirit. The agitation was universal; and the sovereign speedily discovered that, if the sword were once drawn, it would be a war not of Austria against Prussia, but of the people of all the German states, and of Bohemia, Hungary, and Lombardy, against their kings! The rulers stopped short on the brink of the precipice. The king of Prussia suddenly prorogued his chambers, and on the 29th of November, 1850, Prince Schwarzenberg, representing Austria, and Baron Manteuffel, the minister of Prussia, met at Olmutz, and adopted propositions for "solving," as they termed it, "the pending differences" regarding both Holstein and Hesse-Cassel. The solution was very simple. These sovereigns agreed that all the German princes should name two com-missionaries, whose office shall be to force Denmark and Holstein to make an arrangement, and also to force the elector and his subjects to come to terms; and in the meantime, in order to establish, "in the electorate of Hesse as well as in Holstein, a legal state of things responding to the principles of the diet," and which should "render the fulfilment of the federal duties possible," Prussia agreed to join Austria in occupying Hesse, and in sending commissaries to Holstein, to call on "the Stadt-holderate (the Holstein people), in the name of the diet, to cease hostilities."

These resolutions were soon afterwards carried into effect; and from that moment the revolutionary flame which burst forth in 1848, and had continued to burn with more or less intensity for two years, may be said to have been extinguished. The subsequent history of Germany possesses little interest for the English reader. Suffice it to state that the old diet at Frankfurt has been reinstated with its former authority; and during the last two years repeated conferences have been held at Dresden, Berlin, Vienna, and elsewhere, for the purpose of regulating the internal commerce of the different German states, and arranging other weighty matters. But so far from these conferences having tended to cement the interests of the different governments, the contest for supremacy between Austria and Prussia still rages so violently, that even the Zollverein, whose grand swifly influence has for many years operated so beneficially on the material interests of Germany, is now threatened with dissolution. Thus have all the expectations that were formed from the events of 1848, been doomed to disappointment; but we have reason to believe that the fundamental ideas—the right of the people to be represented in the Federal Government, and the advantages of a union of all the States—remain as strongly impressed on the national conviction, and as deeply imbedded in the national affections, as at any period of the Revolution.

THE PRINCIPALITIES OF HOHENZOLLERN INCORPORATED WITH PRUSSIA IN 1850.

HUNGARY.

IN STYRIA, ILLYRIA, HUNGARY, AND TRANSYLVANIA, THE MINING WEALTH OF THE AUSTRIAN EMPIRE APPEARS INEXHAUSTIBLE.

The Huns are described by the old historians as a nation of ferocious savages, emanating from Scythia, or Western Tartary. They lived upon roots, and flesh, half raw; they had neither houses nor cities; and their wives and children dwelt under tents. They fought without order, and without discipline; and trusted much to the swiftness of their horses. They do not appear to have been known to the Romans, until about the year 209 of the Christian era, at which time the Romans called them Pannonians.

The people of Hungary consist of seven distinct races, viz. Magyars, Slovacks, Croats, Germans, Wallachians, Rusniacks, and Jews; of whom the Magyars are by far the most considerable. In their own country their oriental denomination of Magyars is usually given to them, the name of Hungarians being used only by other nations.

Under Attila, they penetrated into Gaul, and became masters of the finest cities; and were approaching towards Paris, when Aetius, the Roman general, defeated them near Troyes, in Champagne. After this battle, Attila retired into Pannonia; but as soon as he had repaired his losses, he ravaged Italy; and was preparing anew to enter Gaul, when death put an end to his victories, in the year 454.

Attila was really what he had named himself, "the terror of men, and the scourge of God." After his death, great divisions took place amongst the Huns, who no longer kept that name, but assumed the appellation of Hungarians; but of their history during the time of the Western and Eastern empires, and the various wars and invasions which are said to have taken place between the third and tenth centuries, there is no information upon which reliance can be placed.

They began to embrace Christianity under the guidance of German missionaries; Stephen, chief of the Hungarians, who had married the sister of the emperor Henry, was baptized at the beginning of the eleventh century. The pope bestowed upon him the title of "the apostolic king;" and idolatry soon after disappeared in Hungary.

Stephen, thus honoured by the pope for his services in converting the heathens, endeavoured to strengthen his kingdom by the power of the hierarchy and the aristocracy. He established ten richly endowed bishoprics, and divided the whole empire into seventy counties. These officers and the bishops formed the senate of the kingdom, with whose concurrence king Stephen granted a constitution, the principal features of which are still preserved. The unsettled state of the succession to the crown, and the consequent interference of neighbouring princes, and of the Roman court, in the domestic concerns of Hungary; the inveterate hatred of the Magyars against the Germans, who were favoured by Peter, the successor of Stephen; the secret struggle of Paganism with Christianity, and particularly the arrogance of the clergy and nobility, long retarded the prosperity of the country.

The religious zeal and bravery of St. Ladislaus, and the energy and prudence of Colomann, shine amidst the darkness of this period. These two monarchs extended the boundaries of the empire; the former by the conquest of Croatia and Slavonia, the latter by the conquest of Dalmatia. They asserted with firmness the dignity of the Hungarian crown, and the independence of the nation, against all foreign attacks; and restored order and tranquillity at home by wise laws and prudent regulations. The introduction of German colonists, from Flanders and Alsace, into Zips and Transylvania, by Geysa II., in 1148, had an important influence on those districts; and the connexion of Hungary with Constantinople during the reign of Bela III., who had been educated in that city, had a favourable effect on the country in general. The Magyars, who had previously passed the greater part of the year in tents, became more accustomed to living in towns, and to civil institutions. On the other hand, Hungary became connected with France, by the second marriage of Bela with Margaret, sister to Henry, king of France, and widow of Henry, king of England. She introduced French elegance at the Hungarian court, and at this time we find the first mention of Hungarians studying at Paris; but these improvements were soon checked, and the kingdom was reduced to a most deplorable condition by the invasion of the Mongols in the middle of the 13th century. After the retreat of these wild hordes, Bela IV. endeavoured to heal the wounds of his country. He induced Germans to settle in the depopulated provinces, and elevated the condition of the citizens by increasing the number of royal free cities.

The king, Ladislaus, having been killed in 1200, by the Tartars, the emperor Rodolph of Hapsburg, pretending that Hungary was a fief of the empire, gave the crown to one of his sons; but, in 1309, pope Boniface VIII., supposing it to be his right to dispose of the kingdom, invested Charibert, who supported his appointment with his sword. Under him Hungary became powerful; he added to his kingdom Croatia, Servia, Transylvania, Moldavia, and part of Dalmatia.

In 1437, Albert of Austria ascended the Hungarian throne. Under him commenced the intestine divisions which, joined to the irruptions of the Turks, almost depopulated the country. The civil war between the people and the nobles, in the reign of Ladislaus V. and the Corvins, weakened it so much, that it was not in a state to resist the Ottoman power; and the army of Soliman entirely destroyed that of Hungary in 1526; when the king, Louis II., was killed. Two hundred thousand captives were taken away by the Turks.

Ferdinand I., emperor of Germany, was elected king of Hungary by the states in 1527. He found the country weak in population, very poor, divided by the Catholic and Protestant factions, and occupied by the Turkish and German armies. It was in a deplorable state under all the kings of the house of Austria, but more particularly so under Leopold, elected in 1550. In his reign, Upper Hungary and Transylvania were the theatre of revolution, bloody war, and devastation.

The Hungarians defended their liberties against Leopold I. and the consequence was, the death of the principal nobility on the scaffold, at Vienna. A man named Emeric Tekeli, whose father and friends had fallen under the hands of the executioner, in order to avenge their deaths, raised a force in Hungary, in 1683, and joined Mahomet IV., then besieging Vienna. John Sobieski, king of Poland, Charles, duke of Lorraine, and the princes of the empire, had the good fortune to oblige Mahomet to retire, and thus relieved the emperor and his capital.

Leopold was resolved to be revenged on the Hungarians; he erected a scaffold in the month of March, 1687, and it remained until the close of the year, during which time, victims without number were immolated by the hands of the executioner. The shocking butcheries which the Hungarians saw practised on their countrymen, filled them with horror, and intimidated them.

The Turks were twice repulsed, and Hungary submitted. Transylvania was conquered, and in possession of the Imperialists. The crown, which, since the time of Ferdinand I., had been elective, was declared hereditary; and Joseph, son of Leopold, was crowned king at the close of the year 1687. It continued in the possession of the Old Austrian House until the death of Charles VI., 1740.

After his death, Maria Theresa, his daughter, who had married into the House of Lorraine, and was by right heiress to his hereditary states, was in great danger of being despoiled. France and Bavaria overran her dominions; but at length she overcame all her difficulties; her husband, after the death of Charles VII., of Bavaria, was also invested with the joint sovereignty. She dying in 1780, her son, Joseph II., emperor of Germany, succeeded. He dying in 1790, his next brother, Peter Leopold, grand duke of Tuscany, became king of Hungary; but died five months after his elevation, and was succeeded by his eldest son Francis.

From this time the Hungarian nation was too much occupied with wars and rumours of war to proceed regularly or zealously with constitutional or social reforms. Nay, the chivalrous nature of the people itself, and their loyalty to the Kaiser's throne, led them to submit to repeated and exorbitant demands for men and money, without exacting a correspondent redress of grievances. Francis I., when the victories of Napoleon were shattering the unity of Austria, reminded the diet of its response to Maria Theresa at a similar crisis; and on each appeal was met with equal devotion, if not with equal enthusiasm, even after the Hungarians were weary of a war in which they performed the giant's task, and received the dwarf's reward. From 1796 to 1811, the diets were convoked to grant supplies, and to be dismissed as soon as they spoke of grievances.

But with the restoration of peace in 1815, a new era began for Hungary. In spite of war and levies, and bad government, the kingdom had advanced in material prosperity; and it was expected that peace would afford leisure for carrying out the social and constitutional reforms which previous commissions had recommended. But it was an era of brief promise and protracted disappointment. Austria, as a member of the Holy Alliance, was more than ever determined to set Hungary upon the same footing as the hereditary states. A court party was sedulously fostered in the country and the chambers; Austrian officers were put in command of Hungarian regiments; the bondage of the press was rigorously enforced; new shackles were imposed on trade; the currency was depreciated; for twelve years no diet was summoned, and nearly every article of the constitution was assailed by violence, or evaded by intrigues. The arbitrary measures by which, in 1822 and 1823, the Austrian cabinet attempted to levy taxes and troops in Hungary, in express violation of Leopold II.'s nineteenth article in the "diploma," and of so many preceding charters, were arrested by the imposing diet of 1825. Francis I. upon this retracted, apologised, and by three additional articles, engaged to observe the fundamental laws of his Hungarian kingdom, to convoke the diet at least triennially, and not to levy subsidies without its concurrence. From 1825 the movements of the Austrian government were less daring and more insidious. It tampered with elections, stimulated the hostile prejudices of the races, and augmented its number of partisans in the chamber of magnates. Its success, however, in these arts was scarcely answerable to its diligence. The municipalities of Hungary, her county elections, and the temper of her country gentlemen, opposed, in most cases, an effective barrier to the encroachments of absolutism. The nation needed only a strong impulse to complete its organisation; and from the year 1827 dates that regular and active opposition which, under the title of the Hungarian party, withstood for twenty years (1827—1847) the assaults of despotic innovation. The soul of this party was Kossuth, who though not a member of the diet at this time, contributed by his pen to the diffusion of liberal principles, and more than once expiated his courage by fine and imprisonment. In 1847 he was returned to the diet, where his influence became transcendent. The movements of the Diet were materially quickened by the news of the French Revolution of February 24, 1848; and it was resolved to require a responsible ministry to be chosen from the ranks of the Liberal party. Kossuth made this motion March 3rd, and so powerful was the support he commanded, that "the Conservative delegates agreed to give their tacit assent; or, in other words, that the motion should be carried, without a single observation being made from either side of the House, by general acclamation." The influence of the Paris Revolution was exceeded by that of Vienna, March 14th. When the news arrived, that prince Metternich had been compelled to resign office, it became self-evident that the Hungarians must have a bonâ fide responsible ministry, liberty of the press, and annual diets at Pesti. To these demands the sovereign acceded, and a Hungarian ministry, composed of the most distinguished members of the diet, was installed in office. That ministry embraced the names of Louis Batthyani and Szechenyi, of Paul Esterhazy and Kossuth. For the first time for three centuries, the Magyars beheld at Pesti a truly national government; and, forgetting ancient grudges, the whole kingdom was filled with loyalty and devotion to their hereditary sovereign.

But scarcely had the just claims of Hungary been recognised, when the cabinet of Vienna began to consider how the newly-granted privileges of the Magyars could be wrested from them. One mode of effecting this object speedily suggested itself. The Slavacs had been for some time dreaming of an united empire, and to flatter their hopes, and then employ them to crush the new-born liberties of Hungary, readily occurred to the successors of Prince Metternich. The Slavonic people of the empire were envious of the success of the Hungarian movement, and thus became more readily the dupes of their imperial masters. The Baron Joseph Jellachich, at this period colonel of a Croat regiment of horse, with a handsome person and a ready wit, was suddenly elevated to the dignity of Ban of Croatia. He employed all his eloquence, which was undoubtedly great, to incite the Serb and Croat population against the Magyars. He collected troops along the frontier, whom, in his boastful proclamations, he promised to enrich with the spoils of Hungary; he even threatened to march to Pesti with his "Red-mantles," the wildest of those robber hordes by whom he was surrounded, and to dissolve the diet by force. Suspicious began to be entertained that the Ban of Croatia was secretly backed by the imperial court, and a formal complaint was brought against him at Innspruck, where the court was residing. In consequence of these representations, the Ban of Croatia was, by proclamation, deprived of all his titles, and publicly declared a traitor!

The fears of the Hungarian diet were, for a short time, lulled by this decisive act. The agitation on the Croatian frontier, however, still continued, and the marauding bands whom Jellachich had drawn together, committed the grossest outrages on the inhabitants of the Lower Danube. The few Austrian regiments which were quartered in that district offered so feeble a resistance to the insurgents, as to revive all the suspicions of the Magyars. Before a month had elapsed, the true intentions of the court became apparent. The Serbs and Croats were no longer denounced as rebels and traitors; and an imperial proclamation was even issued, approving generally of their proceedings.

Roused to a sense of the imminent danger which threatened them, the diet at length took effective measures to resist any attempt which should be made against its liberties. Towards the middle of July, Kossuth, as minister of finance, issued an elaborate address, proposed that funds should be immediately provided for raising an army of 200,000 men; these were granted with enthusiasm.

Both parties were now in earnest. Austria had resolved at all hazards to retrace her steps, and Hungary was no less determined to maintain her long-lost nationality. From this time it was evident that all further negotiation was fruitless, and the imperial cabinet prepared to carry out its scheme of invading Hungary from the south. For this purpose the "traitor Jellachich" of the 10th of June was, on the 4th of September, reinstated in all his dignities and titles, and on the 9th of the same month he crossed the southern frontier with an army of upwards of 60,000 men, composed partly of Austrian troops, but chiefly of irregular bands of Serbs and Croats, with whom the heroic Ban declared he would march direct to Pesti, and disperse the diet. Before he could make good his boast, however, he suffered a signal defeat from the army of Hungarian volunteers which awaited his approach in the vicinity of the capital. After this discomfiture, he made the best of his way with a remnant of his force to Vienna.

Serious events had meanwhile occurred. At Presburg, Count Lamberg, who had been sent to take the military command in Hungary, but whose appointment, without the sanction of the diet, was illegal, had fallen a victim to the popular fury. This occurrence materially widened the breach between the diet and the imperial authorities, and both parties actively prepared for the deadly struggle which was now inevitable. A proclamation was immediately issued by the emperor (October 3rd) dissolving the diet, declaring all its resolutions which had not his sanction null and void, appointing Jellachich military commander and royal plenipotentiary in Hungary, and laying the kingdom under martial law. The Vienna revolution of October 6th, with the subsequent bombardment and capture of the city, left the military forces of Austria free to act against Hungary. In that direction they were immediately sent; and no doubt was entertained of a certain and speedy triumph. But before the army had time to enter Hungary, Ferdinand V., who felt himself unequal to the crisis, abdicated the throne in favor of his nephew Francis Joseph, who at once caused himself to be proclaimed Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary, without waiting for the constitutional form of his election, in accordance with ancient treaties.

In the month of December, Prince Windischgratz entered Hungary at the head of 130,000 men; and one stronghold after another submitted to their assault. On the advance of this great force, the diet retired from Pesth, and established itself at Debrecin, to the eastward of the Theiss, behind which river Gorgel, the commander-in-chief of the Hungarians, concentrated his army. Encouraged by success, a royal proclamation was issued March 4th, 1849, annihilating the separate existence of Hungary; declaring it an integral portion of the hereditary empire of Austria, and naming Vienna as the Capital, and seat of the executive power. But the end was not yet. The Hungarians now began to act on the offensive, and the campaign which followed is one of the most remarkable in history.

General Bem, a Polish emigrant, recovered Transylvania; having with singular rapidity, and with very inadequate means, cleared that country of Austrian troops. Gorgel having lured his raw levies to discipline and danger throughout the winter, at this time suddenly abandoned his defensive tactics, and, crossing the Theiss at several points, made a vigorous attack upon the lines of the Austrian field marshal. His first efforts against the Austrian lines were successful, and he instantly followed them up by a fresh attack. During the next ten days there was a continuous series of battles, which terminated generally to the advantage of the Magyars. Windischgratz retired slowly before his impetuous adversary, who drove him, without a day's repose, from one position to another, until he reached Godollo. Near to that place the Austrian general entrenched himself along a range of wooded heights, which, being thickly planted with artillery, he deemed impregnable. But he was mistaken. Gorgel advanced immediately to the attack. The Austrians fought with their proverbial obstinacy; but nothing could withstand the furious charges of the Hungarian horse, which, breaking through every obstacle, made their way to the heights, and silenced the enemy's artillery. The victory was complete; and the Austrians retired in confusion from the field. After his last discomfiture, Windischgratz was removed from the command; and Welden, who was sent to succeed him, immediately evacuated Hungary with the wreck of the imperial forces.

We now approach the critical point of this great struggle. On the 14th of April, 1849, a few days after the decisive defeat of Windischgratz, the declaration of Hungarian independence was issued by the diet. The particular form to be assumed by the government was reserved for a future diet, it being provided, in the meantime, "by acclamation and with the unanimous approval of the diet," that Louis Kossuth should be governor, and that the affairs of the kingdom should be conducted "on the basis of the ancient and received principles which have been recognised for ages." Gorgel did not object to this measure; but from this time he manifested a desire to thwart the views of the diet. After the retreat of the Austrian army, he was strongly urged by Kossuth and by Dembinski, who had now arrived in Hungary, to march directly upon Vienna with his victorious troops. Instead, however, of directing his steps towards the Austrian capital, he marched upon Buda, which was still held by the imperial troops, and closely invested that ancient seat of royalty. He did, indeed, succeed in capturing Buda after an obstinate defence, but each precious day wasted before that city strengthened the arms of his opponents. The war in Italy had now been concluded by the decisive defeat of the king of Sardinia at Novara, and a considerable force could be spared. To crown the whole, the aid of Russia was invoked to crush the Hungarians; and in the month of June, the combined imperial armies entered Hungary simultaneously from the north, south, east, and west.

The summer campaign commenced under the auspices of General Haynau, who arrived on the banks of the Danube hot from the slaughter of Brescia; and being strongly reinforced from various quarters of the empire, he lost no time in commencing active operations. On the 20th of June, he at length engaged the army under Gorgel, near the confluence of the Wag and the Danube. The Austro-Russian army was greatly superior in point of numbers to the Hungarian force; but after several days' hard fighting, and great loss upon both sides, no decisive result followed. On the 2nd of July, a vigorous attack was made upon Gorgel's entrenched camp, near Komorn. The combat lasted the whole day, but the assailants were at length repulsed with the loss of 3000 men. Gorgel, who had fought at the head of his troops throughout the day, was severely wounded upon this occasion. But on the same night, a despatch was received from Kossuth, to the effect that Gorgel had been removed from the post of commander-in-chief. That the diet had strong grounds of complaint against this general, there can be no doubt; but their decision came at a most unseasonable moment; and there can be little doubt that it hastened the catastrophe which followed so shortly afterwards.

The struggle now drew rapidly to its conclusion. Gorgel, finding it impossible to make head any longer against the Austrian and Russian armies on the Danube, resolved to fall back upon districts which he had occupied during the winter, behind the Theiss. Leaving General Klapka with a large garrison in the impregnable fortress of Komorn, he commenced his retreat about the middle of July. By the rapidity and skill of his movements, he succeeded in eluding the vigilance of his enemies, and once more found himself on the left bank of the Theiss, at the head of a considerable army. He now moved to the southwards, with what object did not appear, for he thus placed himself between the army of Haynau and that of the Russian general, Rüdiger, who were both advancing upon central Hungary. But the catastrophe was at hand.

On the 11th of August, he had an interview with Kossuth, at Arad; and shortly afterwards a public proclamation was issued by Kossuth and his colleagues, resigning the whole of their powers into the hands of General Arthur Gorgel, whom they nominated dictator of Hungary. What was his motive in accepting this nominal dignity—whether to avenge the slight he had received during the previous month, or to give more effect to the step he meditated—we shall not venture to decide. Certain it is, that two days subsequent to his elevation, he made an unconditional surrender of his forces, consisting of upwards of 30,000 men, and 144 pieces of cannon, to the Russian commander, at Villagos. In a proclamation issued immediately afterwards, he recommended the rest of the Hungarian chiefs to follow his example, and trust to the generosity of the Russian czar. With the surrender of Gorgel, the contest was virtually at an end. The greater number of the Hungarian chiefs followed his example, trusting to the vague assurances of safety which were held out to them by their favourite general, and which were so completely belied by the subsequent conduct of the Austrian government. Kossuth, Bem, since deceased, Demblinski, Guyon, and some others, sought refuge in Turkey. But Austria and Russia immediately demanded from the Porte the surrender of the refugees, and the Cabinet of the sultan appealed to England and France for support. Failing in the immediate accomplishment of their purpose, the ambassadors of the former powers suspended diplomatic relations with the Porte, and waited further instructions from Vienna and St. Petersburg. In these circumstances the Turkish government addressed six queries to the ambassadors of France and England, with a view of ascertaining their opinions on the points in dispute, and of learning whether in the event of war being declared, the Porte might "count upon the effective co-operation of those two powers." France and England were united on this point, and their combined fleets were ordered to take up a position near the Dardanelles, from which they might promptly render aid if such were required. This necessity, however, was prevented by the vigour of the measures which had been adopted. The Austrian and Russian governments gave way, and ultimately Kossuth and the more eminent of his co-patriots were removed to the interior, with a view of preventing further disturbance to these powers.

Meanwhile numerous memorials were addressed to the English Government, praying its interference on behalf of the refugees; and the United States sent a steam-frigate to convey Kossuth and his companions to the Western World. Austria threatened vengeance in case they were permitted to depart; but the Turkish Cabinet resolved to listen to the representation of other powers, and on the 22d of August, 1851, the welcome tidings of freedom were conveyed to Kossuth. On the first of September, he left Kutayah, landed at Southampton on the 23rd of October, amid the acclamations of congregated thousands; and after a triumphal progress through different parts of England, sailed for the United States. Since his surrender General Gorgel has resided in great seclusion at Klagenfurth, where he has cheered his solitude with the composition of a work in which he details his "Life and Acts in Hungary," and which if it conclusively rebuts the charge of treason that has been preferred against him, fully establishes the fact that he had no desire for Hungarian independence, and exerted himself but languidly in its support.

PRUSSIA IS DIVIDED INTO EIGHT PROVINCES, FORMING 25 REGENCIES.

THE HISTORY OF PRUSSIA.

The name of Prussians was unknown till the tenth century; and its etymology is very uncertain; some authors suppose that the former inhabitants, alluding to their proximity to the Russians, called themselves Porussii, or, bordering on the Russians; for so, in the old Prussian language, signifies near.

In that age the kings of Poland took great pains, and even made use of fire and sword, for the conversion of the Pagan Prussians to Christianity. Boleslaus I. began with chastising the Prussians for the murder of St. Albert, or Adelbert, called the apostle of that nation. His successors had also several quarrels with the Prussians; and Boleslaus IV. who committed dreadful ravages in this country, lost his life in an unsuccessful battle in 1163.

In the thirteenth century, the Prussians ravaged Culm, Cujavia and Masovia; upon which Conrad, duke of Masovia, was obliged to apply to his allies, who all wore the cross, which they carried into the field against the Prussians, whom they considered as the enemies of the Christian name. But all their efforts proving ineffectual, the duke applied to the German knights of the Teutonic order, and strongly represented the great importance of defending the frontiers. Accordingly, in 1230, they obtained the palatinates of Culm and Dohersin for twenty years, and afterward for ever, with the absolute authority over any future conquests in Prussia. These knights, after long and bloody wars during the space of fifty-three years, by the assistance of the sword-bearing knights, subdued the whole country. A war afterwards broke out between the Teutonic knights and the Lithuanians, which was attended with the most dreadful outrages. These knights made religion the cloak of their ambitious views, and, under the pretence of propagating the gospel of peace, committed the most inhuman barbarities; nay, it is generally agreed, that they extirpated the native Prussians, and planted the Germans there in their stead. Their territory at that time extended from the Oder along the Baltic, to the bay of Finland, and contained cities like Dantzic, Elbing, Thorn, Culm, &c. But in 1410 their savage zeal received a terrible check; for after a most bloody battle they were totally defeated.

In 1454 half of Prussia revolted from its obedience to the Teutonic order, and declared for Casimir III., king of Poland. This occasioned a fresh effusion of blood; till at last a peace was concluded in 1466, by which it was agreed, that the part now called Polish Prussia should continue a free province under the king's protection; and that the knights and the grand-master should possess the other part, acknowledging themselves vassals of Poland. The knights soon endeavoured, but in vain, to throw off this yoke. In 1619 they raised new wars, which were terminated in 1625 by a peace concluded at Cracow; by which it was agreed, that the margrave Albert, grand-master of the Teutonic order, should be acknowledged duke or sovereign of the eastern part of Prussia, which he was to hold as a fief of Poland, and which was to descend to his male heirs; and upon failure of male issue, to his brothers and their male heirs. Thus ended the sovereignty of the Teutonic order in Prussia, after it had subsisted three hundred years.

The new duke favoured the introduction of the reformed religion into his dominions, and founded the university of Königsberg. The elector Joachim added the duchy of Prussia to the electoral house of Brandenburg, with which it had been closely connected. The reign of the elector George William was unhappily distinguished by the calamities of a thirty years' war, in which Prussia suffered much from the ravages of the Swedes.

Frederic William, called the "great elector," from his extraordinary talents as a general, a statesman, and a politician, obtained, in 1656, by a treaty with Poland, an extinction of the homage heretofore paid to that kingdom; and he was acknowledged by the powers of Europe, a sovereign independent duke. He made firm his right in Juliers; obtained Cleves; recovered part of Pomerania; and increased the population of his country by affording an asylum to the refugees of France, after the impolitic revocation of the edict of Nantes by Louis XIV.

Frederic, his son, raised the duchy of Prussia to a kingdom; and on the 18th of January, 1701, in a solemn assembly of the states of the empire, placed the crown, with his own hands, on his own head and that of his consort; soon after which he was acknowledged king of Prussia by all the other Christian powers.

His son, Frederic William I., who ascended the throne in 1713, greatly increased the population of his country by the favourable reception he gave to the distressed and persecuted Saltzburghers, as his grandfather had done by making it an asylum to the Huguenots, when driven out of France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in the year 1684. He was wise, bold, and economical; his principal study the aggrandizement of his kingdom.

This monarch was succeeded in 1740 by his son Frederic II., then in the twenty-ninth year of his age, who rendered his kingdom formidable by his valour and prudence, and promoted the happiness of his subjects by an amendment and simplification of the laws, the increase of commerce, and many wise regulations. His depredations on Poland, and his arbitrary and unjust violation of the guaranteed privileges of Dantzic, as well as the oppressions which the city of Thorn endured, though they might serve to aggrandize his kingdom, sullied his name in the eyes of an impartial posterity.

On the death of the emperor Charles VI. in the same year, Frederic led a large army into Silesia, to a considerable part of which duchy he laid claim. He for some time maintained a war against Maria Theresa, daughter of the late emperor, who was married to the grand duke of Tuscany; but on the 1st of June, 1742, a treaty between the queen of Hungary and the king of Prussia was signed at Breslau; by which the former ceded to the latter Upper and Lower Silesia, with the county of Glatz in Bohemia, and the king of Prussia engaged to pay to certain merchants of London, the sums which they had advanced to the late emperor, commonly called "the Silesian loan;" and at the peace of Aix-la Chapelle, the contracting powers guaranteed to him whatever had been thus ceded.

His father had ever paid peculiar attention to his army, but the attention of the son was more judiciously and effectually directed: for, in the year 1756, he had 150,000 of the best troops in Europe. At that time a league was formed against him by the empress queen, and the court of Versailles: Augustus, king of Poland and elector of Saxony, had secretly become a party to this confederacy, the object of which was to subvert the Prussian dominions, and partition them among the contracting powers. Frederic obtained early and authentic information of his danger from Saxony, and proceeded with no less spirit than effect to avert it. He marched a powerful army into that electorate; compelled the troops of the elector to lay down their arms; became master of Dresden; entered the palace, got possession of the correspondence which had been carrying on against him, and published to all Europe the authentic documents he had thus obtained; which fully justified him in the hostilities he had thus commenced. The war soon after raged with great fury, and the empress of Russia joined the confederacy against this devoted monarch; but his unparalleled exertions, judicious measures, and personal bravery, which were powerfully supported by the wealth and arms of Great Britain, finally baffled all the attempts of his enemies, and the general peace which was ratified in 1763, terminated his labours in the field.

The Great Frederic, long regarded as the hero of the Prussian monarchy, and par excellence the hero of the age, brought to perfection what his father had so successfully begun. He resisted the power of half Europe, and, by his conquests and the wisdom of his administration, he doubled the number of his subjects, and almost the extent of his territories. He was as great in his projects as he was fortunate in their execution: he was a legislator, a general, a statesman, a scholar, and a philosopher. Indeed, it may be said, he was one of those men whom nature only produces at long intervals; but, at the same time, it must not be forgotten that, instead of exercising a paternal care for his people, he regarded the Prussian nation as a foreign general regards the army under his command; his sole thoughts, in fact, appearing to be constantly centred in the love of fame and of power.

We collect from the writings of Dr. Moore, the following description of this extraordinary personage, as he appeared at the time the sketch was written: "The king of Prussia is below the middle size, well made, and remarkably active for his time of life. He has become hardy by exercise and a laborious life, for his constitution seems originally to have been one of the strongest. His look announces spirit and penetration; he has fine blue eyes, and his countenance, upon the whole, may be said to be agreeable. His features acquire a wonderful degree of animation while he converses. He stoops considerably, and inclines his head almost constantly on one side; his tone of voice is the clearest and most agreeable imaginable. He talks a great deal, yet those who hear him, regret that he does not say a great deal more. His observations are always lively, very often just, and few men possess the talent of repartee in greater perfection. He hardly ever varies his dress, which consists of a blue coat lined and faced with red, and a yellow waistcoat and breeches: he always wears boots with busar tops, which fall in wrinkles about his ankles. From four or five o'clock in the morning till ten at night, this king dedicates all his hours, methodically, to particular occupations, either of business or amusement. He seldom appears at the queen's court, or any place where women form part of the assembly; consequently he is seldom seen at festivals. All his hours not employed in business, he spends in reading, music, or the society of a few people whom he esteems. The only repose which the king allows to himself, is between the hours of ten at night and four in the morning; the rest of his time, in every season of the year, is devoted to action, either of the body or mind, or both. While few objects are too great for this monarch's genius, none seem too small for his attention. Although a man of wit, yet he can continue methodically the routine of business with the patience and perseverance of the greatest dunce. The merit of his subjects may apply to him in writing, and are sure of an answer. His first business every morning is the perusing of papers addressed to him. A single word, written with his pencil in the margin indicates the answer to be given, which is afterwards made out in form by his secretaries. He sits down to dinner precisely at noon: of late he has allowed more time to this repast than formerly: it is generally after three before he leaves the company. Eight or nine of his officers are commonly invited to dine with him. At table, the king likes that every person should appear to be on a footing, and that the conversation should be carried on with perfect freedom. It is absolutely impossible for any man to enjoy an office in the king of Prussia's service, without performing the duty of it; but to those who know their business, and perform it exactly, he is an easy and equitable master. The king understands what ought to be done, and his servants are never exposed to the ridiculous or contradictory orders of ignorance, or the mortifications of caprice. His favourites, of whatever kind, were never able to acquire influence over him in any thing regarding business. Nobody ever knew better than this prince how to discriminate between the merits of those who serve him in the important departments of the state, and of those who contribute to his amusement. A man who performs the duty of his office with alertness and fidelity, has nothing to apprehend from the king being fond of the company and conversation of his enemy; let the one be regaled at the king's table every day, while the other never receives a single invitation, yet the real merit of both is known; and if his adversary should ever try to turn the king's favour to the purpose of private hatred or malice, the attempt would be repelled with disdain, and the evil he intended for another would fall upon himself. The steady and unwearied attention which this monarch has bestowed, for more than forty years, to the discipline of the army, is unparalleled either in the ancient or modern history of mankind. This perseverance of the king, as it is without example, so is it perhaps the most remarkable part of his extraordinary character. That degree of exertion which a vigorous mind is capable of making on some very important occasion, Frederic II. has made during his whole reign at a stretch, without permitting pleasure, indolence, disgust, or disappointment to interrupt his plan for a single day; and he has obliged every person, throughout the various departments of his government, to make the like exertions as far as their characters and strength could go. In what manner such a king be served! and what is he not capable of performing! Twice every year he makes the circuit of his dominions. This great prince is so perfectly exempt from suspicion and personal fear, that he resides at San Souci, in his electoral dominions, without any guard whatever; an orderly sergeant or corporal only attends in the day-time, to carry occasional orders to the garrison at Potsdam, whither he always returns in the evening."

Frederic died in 1796, and left to his nephew, Frederic William II. (by some called Frederic III.) an extensive and prosperous kingdom, a large and well-disciplined army, and a well-filled treasury; but he possessed none of those commanding talents, that energy, or that patient perseverance, which so eminently distinguished his predecessor. The finances of Prussia were soon exhausted; and in consequence of the high rank among the European states to which Frederic the Great had elevated her, she was obliged to take a prominent part in the most important affairs of the continent, which, without his genius, could not be maintained. Frederic William II. died in 1797, and was succeeded by his son, Frederic William III.

By the partition of Poland in 1792, and its final dismemberment in 1795, Prussia acquired a great extension of territory, including the important city of Dantze, and upwards of two millions of inhabitants. In 1796 the Prussian cabinet made a secret treaty with France; and after many sinister and vacillating movements, Prussia resolved upon the maintenance of a strict neutrality, which, in the state of Europe at that time, was impossible. In 1803 France occupied Hanover; and, in 1805, when a third coalition was forming against France, Prussia wavered more than ever. Alexander of Russia appeared at Berlin, and brought about the convention of Potsdam, Nov. 3, 1805; but after the battle of Austerlitz, Prussia sought for and obtained peace with France, and was consequently compelled to submit to the harsh terms of the conqueror.

Again, when Napoleon had concluded the confederacy of the Rhine, Prussia stepped forward to arrest his gigantic power; but the battle of Jena disclosed to the world how incapable it was for her to contend against the emperor and his confederated allies. The peace of Tilsit reduced Prussia to half its former dimensions, which half had to support 150,000 French soldiers until the end of 1808, and to pay 120 millions of francs, while French troops were to retain possession of the fortresses of Stettin, Koenigsberg, and Glogau. The minister Von Stein, who was long at the head of affairs, was a most uncompromising enemy of France, and being in consequence compelled by them to quit Germany, baron Hardenberg was placed at the head of the government as state-chancellor. The continuance of French oppression, and the insulting humiliation the Prussians had to endure, at length roused, rather than subdued, the dormant spirit of the people. After Napoleon's Russian campaign the population rose en masse, and to their zealous efforts in the cause of oppressed Europe, the completeness of his discomfiture may be mainly attributed. The part which Prussia played in this great game of war we have elsewhere related, and it is not consistent with the limits of our work to make needless repetitions: it is sufficient to state, that at the general peace of 1815, Prussia became more powerful than ever; for although a portion of her Polish dominions passed into the hands of Russia, it was more than compensated by valuable acquisitions in Saxony, Pomerania, &c.

From this period, the Pruselian states, in spite of great political restrictions, continued to advance steadily in prosperity. A great impulse to the extension of German commerce was given by the establishment of the Zollverein, or "Customs Union," under the auspices of Prussia, by which internal trade was freed from all restrictions, and a uniform system of duties agreed on for those states that joined it.

The present king of Prussia, Frederick William IV., ascended the throne in 1840, and became remarkably popular. His affability and his varied acquirements rendered him personally attractive, and gained him the hearts of all with whom he conversed. Soon after his accession to the throne, he declared that he would develop the system of representative government, as established in the provincial estates; but he made no promise to grant a representative constitution for the whole kingdom. On the contrary, he declared at Königsberg that he would never do homage to the idea of a general popular representation. But various public changes, chiefly in the provincial administration, were soon after, and at different times, introduced. In the autumn of 1842 the king convoked, at Berlin, a meeting of deputies, delegated by the provincial states, to deliberate on questions of taxation, railroads, and other public improvements. Discontents arose afterwards on account of the censorship of the press; and it became evident in the following year that the bold sentiments of the provincial diet of the Rhenish provinces were not confined to the speakers. In 1844 or 1845, manifestations were made in different provinces, significant of a general determination to obtain a constitutional government. In 1846 disturbances broke out at Posen and Cologne, followed by arrests, trials, and convictions. In 1847 the states were convoked at Berlin; and a new era of freedom, it was supposed, was then about to dawn on the country. But this assembly was not a representative parliament. It was composed of delegates from the provincial states, summoned to deliberate and report on questions not initiated by themselves, but those only which were submitted to them by the government; it consequently gave little satisfaction. On the 17th of January, 1848, a committee of the delegates of the provincial states commenced its sittings, in order to examine the new penal code submitted to it by the king for its deliberations. In the midst of these deliberations was heard the contre-coup of the French revolution. On the 6th of March the committee of the assembled Diet of the States at Berlin, having completed its deliberations, was dissolved in person by the king, who was prepared to make some concessions, among which was the liberty of the press, with certain guarantees and conditions. A royal patent was issued convoking a Diet to meet on the 2nd of April. But before this could be effected, grave events had taken place.

On the evening of the 14th of March crowds were in the streets of Berlin; with patrols, both of horse and foot, parading there also. On the 15th, in the Schlossplatz, the people assembled before the king's palace, growing in numbers and courage, assaulting the sentinels, and managing to protect themselves from the cavalry by barrels and barricades. The 16th was a comparative lull, the 17th was pronounced quiet, but on the 18th the tempest recommenced. On that morning the king made great concessions to his people; but the latter, while acknowledging the royal condescension with shouts and huzzahs, demanded the withdrawal of the troops from the palace. A staff-officer, who thought that the crowd was approaching too near, essayed to keep them at a distance, and provoked violence, which a detachment of cavalry advanced to repress. Two chance shots were fired; the popular wrath was awakened; and the troops in all the streets were attacked. Ere long arms were obtained by the multitude; the troops were fired on from the houses, and many superior officers, distinguished by their dress, and affording the better mark, were killed. The populace themselves had to fight against 20,000 armed men; but reinforced by the armed students, active and enthusiastic, were led forward to victory. The prisons were forced open, the prisoners were set free, and soon afterwards the troops refused to fire unless attacked. At night the city was illuminated; until morn the alarm bells were rung. On the morning of the 19th, the city of Berlin looked like a town of war. The streets were torn up, and filled with heaps of stones, which the people had thrown from the windows and roofs on the soldiers. Early appeared a royal proclamation, ascribing the shots on the Schlossplatz to a mistake; and, by eleven, the troops were all withdrawn. The people, again, in the Schlossplatz were addressed by the king from the balcony. But some atonement to the slaughtered was yet needed. The bodies of those who had fallen in the Friedrichstadt were laid in a waggon, attended by a large procession of citizens, and taken to the palace, the populace calling on the king to appear and do homage to the corpses. With reluctance he appeared, and then granted their desired armament to the people, who forthwith rushed to the Arsenal, and claimed the distribution of arms. On the 24th the obsequies of the slain were celebrated; all the municipal and communal authorities, all the magistracy, guilds, clergymen of all confessions, and students, headed by the illustrious Humboldt, forming the funeral procession.

On the 2nd of April, the Diet convoked by the King of Prussia met at Berlin, under the presidency of a royal commissioner, the new Minister of State, Camphausen. But in the midst of the agitations that prevailed, the constituent assembly made little progress in its deliberations; and out of doors the democratic party assumed so formidable an aspect that the days of the monarchy seemed numbered. Ministry after ministry was appointed in the hope that the revolutionary torrent might be stemmed;

but in vain; and it was not till November that a more resolute minister, the Count of Brandenburg (since deceased), seconded by General Wrangel (who had returned from his campaign in Denmark), determined to remove the assembly from Berlin to Brandenburg, and even ventured in the following month to dissolve it. The king now proposed to concede (octroyer) a constitution, and convoked an assembly to examine it. But this attempt at constitution-making fared no better than its predecessor. The king's refusal to accept the imperial crown of Germany offered to him by the Frankfurt parliament; the long continuance of the state of siege at Berlin; and finally the ministerial efforts to preserve as much as they could of the royal authority and the ancient aristocracy; all this irritated the opposition into acts which were supposed to be incompatible with kingly power; and the assembly was dissolved in April, 1849. The third and last attempt to frame a constitution was soon afterwards begun, and this time with more success. In November of the same year, the constitution of the second chamber of the Prussian parliament was promulgated. It conferred the elective franchise on all Prussians of not less than twenty-five years of age, resident three years within the electoral district, and having paid one year's taxes—military garrisons being considered as residences, and including also as electors all Germans of thirty years of age, and residing in Prussia. The Chamber of Peers consists of the hereditary nobility, limited to primogeniture, to a certain number named by the king for life, and to a similar number elected by electors who have paid the maximum of taxation. In each of the provinces there are elective assemblies; besides, the municipalities have each their local administrations. The constitution defining the powers of the king and the Parliament, the duties of the ministers of the crown, was published on the 2nd of February, 1850. It neither establishes the liberty of the press, nor includes any Habeas Corpus enactment; but it has hitherto so far worked practically that if honestly carried out, it will enable the Prussians finally to secure for themselves a fair share of civil, political, and religious liberty.

The principal part of the Prussian dominions lies continuously along the south shore of the Baltic, between Russia and Mecklenburg. The inland frontier of this part of the monarchy on the east and south is sufficiently connected; but on the west side its outline is very irregular, some small independent states being almost entirely surrounded by the Prussian dominions. But exclusive of this principal portion, there is an extensive Prussian territory on both sides the Rhine; which is separated from the eastern part of the kingdom by Hesse Cassel, part of Hanover, Brunswick, &c. Some detached territories in Saxony, also belong to Prussia.

BAVARIA.

BAVARIA, now one of the principal secondary states of Germany, was derived from a circle of the German empire, of the same name, bounded by Franconia and Bohemia on the north, Austria on the east, Tyrol on the south, and Swabia on the west. The earliest inhabitants of Bavaria were a tribe of Celtic origin called the Boii, from whom it received its old Latin name of Boaria; but, about the time of Augustus, the Romans subdued it, and it afterwards formed a part of what they termed Rætia, Vindellis, and Noricum. After the downfall of the Roman empire, the Bavarians fell under the dominion of the Ostrogoths and Franks, by whom it was governed till Charlemagne took possession of the country, and committed the government to some of his counts, and on the partition of his imperial dominions amongst his grandsons, Bavaria was assigned to Louis the German. Its rulers bore the title of margrave till 920, when Arnold, its reigning prince, was raised to the title of duke, which his successors continued to bear till 1623, when Maximilian I., having assisted Ferdinand II. against his Bohemian insurgents, was elevated to the electoral dignity.

In 1070 Bavaria passed into the possession of the Guelphs; and in 1180 it was transferred by imperial grant to Otto, count of Wittelsbach, whose descendants branched out into two families, the Palatines and the Bavarians, the former inheriting the palatine of the Rhine, the latter the duchy of Bavaria. Few events of any importance occurred till the war of the Spanish succession, when Bavaria suffered severely from following the fortunes of France. It, however, received a great accession in 1777, when, upon the extinction of the younger line of Wittelsbach, the palatinate, after a short contest with Austria, was added to the Bavarian territory. After the adjustment of the Austrian pretensions the electorate enjoyed the blessings of peace till the French revolution, which involved all Germany in the flames of civil discord. The elector remained on the side of the Imperialists till 1796, when the French marched a powerful army into his dominions, and concluded a treaty for the cessation of hostilities. In the following year was signed the treaty of Campo-Formio, and in 1801 that of Luneville, by which all the German dominions left of the Rhine were annexed to France, and the elector lost the palatinate of the Rhine, his possessions in the Netherlands and Alsace, and the duchies of Juliers and Deux Ponts; receiving an indemnities four bishoprics, with ten abbeys, fifteen imperial towns, and two imperial villages, and some other minor privileges which it would be superfluous to mention.

In the conflicts between France and the continental powers, Bavaria continued to maintain a neutrality till 1805, when the elector entered into an alliance with Napoleon, who shortly afterwards raised him to the dignity of king, and enlarged his dominions at the same time, by the annexation of several important provinces. Of all the allies of the French emperor, no country has retained more solid advantages than Bavaria. Shortly after the campaign of 1806, when Austria, to purchase peace, sacrificed part of her possessions, Bavaria received a further enlargement, by the addition of Tyrol, Eichstadt, the eastern part of Passau, and other territories; when she began to assume a more important station amongst the surrounding states.

At the dissolution of the Germanic constitution, and the formation of the Rhenish confederation, another alteration took place, the duchy of Berg being resigned for the margraviate of Anspach, together with the imperial towns of Augsbourg and Nuremberg. In 1809, Bavaria again took part with France against Austria, and again shared in the spoils of war; but subsequently ceded some of her territories to Wirtemberg and Wurzburg; and by another alteration, which shortly followed, exchanged a great part of Tyrol for Bayreuth and Ratisbon.

But the friendship of the Bavarian monarch for his ally and patron was soon to be put to the test. When the thirst for military conquest induced Napoleon to march the French armies to Moscow, the Bavarian troops were amongst the number. Apprehending the ruin that awaited the French, but while the fortunes of Napoleon were still doubtful, the king of Bavaria seized the critical moment, and entered into a treaty with the emperor of Austria, and joined the allies in crushing that power which had long held so many nations in thralldom. These important services were not forgotten. Bavaria was confirmed in her extensive acquisitions by the treaties of 1814 and 1815; for though Austria recovered her ancient possessions in the Tyrol, &c., Bavaria received equivalents in Franconia and the vicinity of the Rhine.

Though the inferior kingdoms and states of Germany are of too little importance to become principals in any European war, they are frequently found very effective allies, as was the case with Bavaria. Its army during the war amounted to 60,000 men. In 1818 Bavaria received a constitution, which continued to work with tolerable regularity till 1846, when King Louis, whose poetic and artistic tastes had secured for him considerable fame beyond the limits of his own dominions, began to adopt measures which roused the indignation of his subjects. Into this course he was betrayed by the infatuation which had seized him for the well known Lola Montes, whom he had created Countess of Lansfeldt; and, in March 1848, immediately after the French revolution of that memorable year, the attitude of the Bavarian people became so menacing, that the King saw himself compelled to abdicate the throne in favour of his eldest son, Maximilian; who both during, and subsequently to, the stormy period

HANOVER.

THE kingdom of Hanover, which, until the year 1815, was an electorate, was formed out of the duchies formerly possessed by several families belonging to the junior branches of the house of Brunswick. The house of Hanover may, indeed, vie with any in Germany for antiquity and nobleness. It sprang from the ancient family of the Guelphs, dukes and electors of Bavaria, one of whom, Henry the Lion, in 1140, married Maude, eldest daughter of Henry II. king of England. Their son William, called Longsword, was created first duke thereof. The dominions descended in a direct line to Ernest, who divided them, upon his death in 1546, into two branches; that of Brunswick Wolfenbittel, and Brunswick Lüneburg. The possessor of the latter, Ernest Augustus, was, in 1692, raised to the dignity of an elector; before which he was head of the college of German princes. Ernest married Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector palatine, and king of Bohemia, by Elizabeth, daughter of James I., king of Great Britain. Sophia being the next protestant heir to the crown of England, through the medium of the house of Stuart, the parliament fixed the succession upon her, on the demise of the then reigning queen Anne. Sophia died a short time before the queen; and her eldest son, George Louis, in consequence, became king of Great Britain. This was in 1714, from which time till 1837, at the death of William IV., both England and Hanover have had the same sovereign.

The families set aside from the succession by the parliament on that occasion, independent of the family of king James II. by Mary of Este, were as follows: the royal houses of Savoy, France, and Spain, descendants of Charles I., through his daughter Henrietta; Orleans and Lorraine, descendants of James I. through Charles Louis, elector palatine, eldest son of Elizabeth, daughter of the said king; Salm, Ursel, Condé, Conti, Maine, Modena, and Austria, descendants of James I., through Edward, elector palatine, youngest son of the said Elizabeth.

The history of Hanover for the two centuries preceding the Lutheran reformation presents little interest, except in the connection of its princes with the wars of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, in the latter end of the 14th century. Amongst the most zealous supporters of the reformation, however, were the princes of Brunswick, and their subjects during the thirty years' war very effectively supported their anti-papal efforts. Ernest of Zell, the reigning duke at that period, was one of the most eloquent defenders of Luther at the diet of Worms; and his endeavours to improve the people by establishing clerical and general schools, when learning was appreciated by only a few, shew him to have been a man of enlightened and liberal views.

On the accession of her present Majesty to the throne of Great Britain, the Hanoverian crown, by virtue of the salic law, devolved on her uncle Ernest, duke of Cumberland, fifth, but eldest surviving son of George III. It had previously been for many years under the vicereignty of the duke of Cambridge.

Hanover suffered in the French war of 1757; but it experienced still greater sufferings during the French revolutionary war, after the enemy got possession of it. At the peace of Amiens, it was given up to the king of Great Britain; but that peace being of very short duration, it again fell into the hands of the French, without resistance, or without an effort to save it, on the part of the inhabitants or the government.

In 1804 Prussia took possession of Hanover, but ceded it in the same year to the French, who constituted it a part of the kingdom of Westphalia, established in 1808. At the peace of 1813, the king of Great Britain reclaimed his rightful dominions, which were then formed into a kingdom, and much enlarged by the stipulations of the treaty of Vienna.

The countries which compose what is called Hanover, consist of Lüneburg, acquired by inheritance in 1292; Dannenburg, by purchase, 1303; Grubenhagen, by inheritance, 1679; Hanover, (Culenburg), by inheritance, 1679; Diepholtz, by exchange, 1685; Hoya, by inheritance, in part, 1582; the remaining part by a grant from the emperor, in 1705; Lauenburg, by inheritance, 1706; Bremen and Verden, by purchase, 1715 and 1719; Wildeshausen, by purchase, 1720; and the Hadeln-land, 1731. The district of Lauenburg has since been ceded for the bishopric of Hildesheim, the principality of East Friesland, the districts of Lingen, Harlingen, &c.

Hanover so long formed an appendage to the British crown that we are induced to extend this slight history by quoting from Mr. McCulloch an account of its government.

"Before Prussia ceded Hanover to France, in 1804, the form of government was monarchical, and the various territories were subject to feudal lords. The peasants of the marsh lands had more freedom, and in East Friesland the constitution of the country was almost republican. In the territories of the princes of the empire, the representation of the people by estates, composed of the nobles, prelates, and deputies from the towns, served to check the power of the sovereign, as in other parts of Germany. In 1808, when Napoleon created the kingdom of Westphalia, the territories of Hanover, with the districts of Hildesheim and Osnabrück, formed a part of it, and the code Napoleon took the place of the ancient laws, and a sham representative government was established. On the return of the rightful sovereign to Hanover, in 1813, the French institutions were summarily abolished, and the old forms re-established; and in 1818 the estates, summoned upon the ancient footing, drew up the form of a new constitution, modelled on that of England and France, and substituting a uniform system of representation for the various representative forms which prevailed under the empire. The chief change that excited disapprobation arose from the arbitrary decision of the sovereign (George IV.), advised by count Munster, that there should be two chambers instead of one, contrary to the proposal of the estates, and the universal custom of Germany. The respective rights of the sovereign and the country to the crown land revenues were not clearly defined by this fundamental law; but the interests of the people were supposed to be sufficiently consulted by the institution of a national treasury, the commissioners of which, named for life, were ex officio members either of the upper or of the lower chamber.

"This constitution, however, contained no properly defined statements respecting either the rights of the people, or the prerogatives of the crown; and as the new system of representation was not sufficiently consolidated to resist the encroachments of a monarch supported by powerful foreign influence, the necessity of a more definite fundamental law, in which the rights of the citizens should at least be declared, was felt on all sides. This feeling led to the drawing up of the constitution of 1833, which differed in but few, though most essential, points from that of 1819. The principal points of difference were a fuller acknowledgment of the right of the chambers to control the budget, and to call the ministers to account for their conduct; the restriction of the king's expenditure, by a regulated civil list; and the reservation, for the use of the nation, of the surplus revenue of the crown demesnes. These modifications rendered the treasury, whose functions thus devolved upon the chambers, wholly unnecessary; and it was dissolved. The new fundamental law, after being discussed by both chambers, received the assent of William IV. in 1833, who, however, by the same act, modified fourteen articles of the bill. New elections followed, and the new chambers were exhibiting their activity in reforming abuses, and introducing economy into the state disbursements, when the death of William IV. interrupted the proceedings. As the salic law, excluding females from the succession to the throne, prevails in Hanover, William IV. was succeeded by his eldest surviving brother, Ernest, duke of Cumberland, in England. Immediately on taking the government, the new king declared the chambers dissolved; and previously to their re-assembling, he abolished, by proclamation, the fundamental law which had been adopted under the reign of his predecessor, and, in the most arbitrary manner, instead of alika his brother's memory and the whole country, declared the fundamental law of 1819 to be alone valid. Under the last named law he summoned a fresh parliament; but he found the spirit of the nation aroused and indignant; for not only the courts of law, but the highest legal authority in Germany, and several faculties of universities, declared his proceedings illegal; many towns refused to send representatives to parliament, and those which met signed a memorable protest, declaring their opinion that the fundamental law of 1833 was still the law of the land. As the chambers could not be convened, for decency's sake they were declared dissolved.

In this state of things, the government of Hanover was managed by authorities partly belonging to the period of 1819. The privy council, which met to advise the king on state affairs, in the same manner as that of England, was arbitrarily abolished; and a cabinet council, composed of the king's minister and creatures, appointed in its place. Matters remained in this state till 1846, when king Ernest saw himself compelled to yield to the revolutionary tempest which then swept over Europe. The constitution of 1833 was then restored, and has been in force ever since. But the old aristocratic party of the country, who saw themselves deprived of certain privileges by the restored constitution, were not inactive during the reactionary period that afterwards set in; and it is generally understood that nothing but the firm consistency of the king stood between them and success. In 1851 king Ernest I. died, and was succeeded by his only son, George V.

A treaty of mutual inheritance has long existed between Hanover and Brunswick, which was formally renewed in 1836, and by which the Hanoverian crown is declared to descend to the dukes of Brunswick on the extinction of male heirs of the line of Hanover, and vice versa.

THE HISTORY OF THE NETHERLANDS,

COMPRISING

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

THE NETHERLANDS, or Low Countries, which now form two populous kingdoms, though of second-rate importance when compared with the great European powers, were, at the commencement of the Christian era, mere dreary marshes and dismal forests of vast extent, which were frequently overflowed by the sea. This inhospitable low tract was thinly inhabited by people of German origin, called Batavians and Frisians, many of whom lived in miserable huts, raised on wooden piles, or built upon mounds of sand, to secure them above the reach of the tides. But it is not to be understood that the entire region was of this description; although it has been graphically said, that whole forests were occasionally thrown down by a tempest, or swept away by an inundation—that the sea had no limits, and the earth no solidity. The higher grounds, extending from the Rhine to the Scheldt, including that vast extent of woody country, the ancient forest of Ardennes, were inhabited by various tribes of the German race, who subsisted by agriculture and the chase. They had towns and villages in the heart of the forest; their country produced abundant supplies of corn and cattle; they were courageous and uncivilized; the rites of Druidism were observed, as in Britain; and the people consisted of two classes, chiefs and slaves.

When the Romans under Julius Cæsar subdued the Gauls, that warlike nation turned their arms also against the people we have just spoken of, whose country they denominated Gallia Belgica, or Belgium; but they did not pursue their conquests farther towards the north, thinking probably that the desert plains and patches of land, rising, as it were, from their watery bed, were scarcely worth the trouble of exploring, much less of contending for. They accordingly offered peace and alliance to that part of the Netherlands now called Holland; while the Frisians were left to struggle with the Roman legions for their liberty.

From the writings of Cæsar we learn that Flanders was occupied by the Menapii and Morini, Brabant by the Atuatii, Hainault and Namur by the Nervii (so remarkable for desperate courage as to excite the wonder of the veterans of Rome), Luxemburg and Limburg by the Eburones, &c. Cæsar emphatically describes the Belgians as the most warlike of the Gallic tribes, and observes that in stature and bulk they surpassed the Romans. But though they fought with an energy and a determination which nothing could exceed, the discipline and military skill of the Romans eventually obtained the mastery.

In subduing this brave people the Romans had recourse to the most barbarous practices of ancient warfare; and for a time either extermination or expulsion seemed to be necessary to conquer their fierce and valiant spirits: thus we read, that in Cæsar's celebrated battle with the Nervii, near Namur, the army of the confederated tribes, amounting to 60,000 men, was reduced to 500, and that on taking the town of Tongres he sold 53,000 of the Atuatii for slaves. By degrees, however, they became incorporated with their conquerors, adopted their manners, and served in their armies, proving themselves, in many memorable instances, the ablest auxiliaries that ever fought by the side of the Roman legions. In this state they remained for about four centuries, during which time the Belgic population underwent considerable changes from the successive invasions of the Franks from the north, whose progress westward terminated in their establishing the Frankish empire in Gaul.

We have already had occasion more than once in this volume to notice, that when the Romans subjugated any country, the inhabitants, however barbarous, gradually became acquainted with the arts and advantages of civilized life, and that the subsequent prosperity and rank to which they attained in the scale of nations may justly be attributed to the connexion which subsisted between the conquerors and the conquered. Thus it was with the Belgic provinces. From the Romans they learned how to redeem their inundated lands from the briny flood, by constructing dykes, embankments, and canals; and as they were naturally an active and intelligent people, they drained their marshes, and prepared the land not merely as pasture for cattle and the growth of corn, but for the cultivation of choice fruits and vegetables; while towns and villages were built on the higher ground, and the country, instead of being a dreary waste of bog-land and water, presented to the eye a varied prospect of fertility and an industrious population.

Towards the declension of the Roman empire, when its rulers were compelled to withdraw their troops from the provinces, Gallia Belgica shared the fate of the rest; and it was successively overrun by the various tribes from the north of Germany. But notwithstanding these serious disadvantages, the spirit of improvement kept pace with the age; more land was reclaimed from the ocean, and rendered both productive and habitable. The maritime lowland descendants of the Menapii, now blended with Saxons and Frisians, continued to prosper in commerce and agriculture. Large towns had been built, and many arts and manufactures, brought from other countries, were carried on with credit and success. Bruges, Ghent, Antwerp, and other towns rose into importance, and the commercial importance of the Flemings was universally acknowledged.

At what precise time the Christian religion was introduced it is impossible to speak with certainty; but we know that previous to the reign of Charlemagne the conversion of the people had become general, and that churches and monasteries existed in various parts of the country. But no trace of the heroic and valiant warriors of former days remained; their swords had indeed been turned into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, but feudal institutions had converted the free sons of the soil into abject vassals, who now toiled only to enrich the baronial lords and haughty priests, whose power and possessions were immense. This state of vassalage did not, however, extend to the towns, the inhabitants of which were mostly merchants and manufacturers, enjoying all the advantages of free citizens. Their industry and ingenuity not only made them wealthy, but obtained for them attention and respect; and in the course of time they elected their own magistrates, made their own laws, fortified their cities, and organized a regular militia from among themselves; so that they were able to maintain their privileges and defend their liberties against the encroachments of foreign princes or their own powerful nobles.

At the period to which we are now referring, the maritime commerce of the Flemings had made a great progress with Spain and England, from whence they obtained large importations of wool. Their skill in the manufacture of woollen stuffs and cloths had established for them a market in every foreign port; the herring fishery was also a great source of wealth; and to these they added a large trade in corn, salt, and jewelry.

In the eleventh century the country was divided into duchies, counties, and imperial cities; Brabant, or Lower Lorraine, and afterwards Luxembourg, Limburg, and Gueldres, were governed by dukes; Flanders, Holland, Zealand, Hainault, Artois, Namur, and Zutphen, by counts. Friesland Proper remained a free lordship; Utrecht became a bishopric, the secular authority of the bishop extending over Groningen and Overijssel. Of all these realms, the counts of Flanders were the most powerful, and, after their possessions had passed, in 1289, to the more powerful house of Burgundy, the latter, partly by marriages, partly by force or cession, obtained possession of the largest part of the Low Countries.

During the crusades the Flemish burghers obtained great advantages, owing to the mania with which many of the nobles were seized to join the holy leaguers. In order to raise money for equipping armies to combat against the Saracens, they were induced to part with their lands and to grant great privileges and political powers to their wealthy tenants, who thus were enabled to purchase independence and a jurisdiction of their own, as we have before mentioned. "The people, conscious of their power, gradually extorted from their rulers so many concessions, that the provinces formed, in reality, a democracy, and were only nominally subject to the monarch of France and his nobles. When the rest of Europe was subject to despotism, and involved in comparative ignorance and barbarism, the court of the counts of Flanders was the chosen residence of liberty, civilization, and useful knowledge; and when the ships of other nations scarcely ventured beyond the sight of land, those of the Flemish merchants traversed the ocean, and Bruges and Antwerp possessed the commerce and wealth of the north of Europe. In this state the provinces long continued, until they came under the dominion of the duke of Burgundy, about the middle of the 15th century. Previous to this event, we find only unconnected duchies, counties, lordships, and towns, with innumerable rights, claims, and privileges, advanced and enforced now by subjects and vassals against each other or against their lords; and now by lords and vassals against the monarch, without the expression of any collective idea of Belgium as a nation. Under the Burgundian dynasty the commercial and manufacturing towns of the Low Countries enjoyed a remarkable prosperity. The famous order of the Golden Fleece was instituted in 1430; and before the end of the 15th century the city of Ypres had 4,000 looms, and the city of Ghent 50,000 weavers. Bruges and Antwerp were the great marts of the commercial world, and contained each about 200,000 inhabitants. In the Flemish court of the duke of Burgundy, named Philip the Good, about 1455, luxurious living was carried to a vicious and foolish excess. The wealthy were clad in gorgeous velvets, satins, and jewellery, and their banquets were given with almost incredible splendour.

"This luxury produced depravity and crime to such an extent, that in one year 1,400 murders were committed in Ghent, in the gambling-houses and other resorts of debauchery. The arts were cultivated with great success. Van Eyck invented the beautiful oil colours for which the Flemish school is renowned. Painting on glass, polishing diamonds, lace, tapestry, and chimes were also invented in Belgium at this period. Most of the magnificent cathedrals and town-halls in the country were built in the 13th and 14th centuries.

OF ALL THE MINERAL PRODUCTS OF BELGIUM, COAL, SO NECESSARY TO THE MANUFACTURING, IS OF THE HIGHEST NATIONAL IMPORTANCE.

History, poetry, and learning were much cultivated; and the university of Louvain was the most celebrated in Europe. In 1477 Belgium passed under the dynasty of the empire of Austria; and after many years of contest between the despotie Maximilian and the democratic Flemings, the government, in 1519, descended to his grandson, Charles V., king of Spain and emperor of Germany. In his reign the affluence of the Flemish burghers attained its highest point. The city of Ghent contained 175,000 inhabitants, of whom 100,000 were engaged in weaving and other industrial arts. Bruges annually exported stuffs of English and Spanish wool to the value of 8,000,000 florins. The Scheldt at Antwerp often contained 2,500 vessels, waiting their turn to come to the wharfs; her gates were daily entered by 500 loaded waggons; and her exchange was attended, twice a day, by 5,000 merchants, who expended 130,000 golden crowns in a single banquet given to Philip II., son of Charles V. The value of the wool annually imported from England and Spain exceeded 4,000,000 pieces of gold. This amazing prosperity experienced a rapid and fatal decline under the malignant tyranny and bigotry of Philip. The doctrines of the protestant reformation had found very numerous adherents in Belgium; Lutheranism was preached with phrenzied zeal by several popular fanatics, who drew around them crowds amounting sometimes to 10,000 or 15,000. Partizans of iconoclasts also appeared, and demolished the ornamental property of 400 churches. Protestant persecution by the Inquisition had been commenced by Charles V.; but by Philip II. it was established in its most diabolical extravagance. He filled the country with Spanish soldiers, and commissioned the duke of Alva to extirpate, without mercy, every protestant heretic in Belgium. Volumes have been written to describe the proceedings of this able soldier, but sanguinary persecutor, who boasted that in less than six years he had put to death 18,000 men and women by the sword, the gibbet, the rack, and the flames. Ruin and dread of death in its most hideous forms drove thousands of artizans to England, where they introduced the manufacturing skill of Bruges and Ghent. Commerce and trade in Flanders dwindled away, many of the rich merchants were reduced to beg for bread, the great cities were half deserted, and forest wolves often devoured the scattered inhabitants of desolated villages."—For the foregoing spirited sketch of the rise, progress, and decline of commerce and the arts in Belgium, we are indebted to Mr. McCulloch's Geographical Dictionary.

These oppressions being exercised with the most tyrannical fury by Ferdinand of Toledo, duke of Alva, whom Philip had created governor, the Netherlands made a strong effort for their freedom, and William, prince of Orange, in conjunction with his brother, count Louis of Nassau, undertook the defence of the inhabitants, in their noble struggles for religious and civil liberty. Accordingly, the states of Holland, in their own names, conferred the stadtholdership, a title equivalent to lieutenant, on the former, and several other towns and provinces declared for him. He first united them, in 1576, in one general association, under the title of "The Pacification of Ghent." But this union being soon dissolved, the prince laboured to the utmost of his power to form a more durable alliance, which he happily accomplished in 1579. In that year the celebrated league of Utrecht was concluded, which gave name to the United Provinces, and became the basis and plan of their constitution.

The prince of Orange was afterwards on the point of being nominated the sovereign of these countries, but was treacherously shot in 1584, by an assassin named Balthazar Gerard, who had assumed the name of Francis Guyon. This man was supposed to have been hired to perpetrate the murder by the Spanish ministry, but no tortures could force a confession from him. The United Netherlands, however, continued to maintain, sword in hand, that liberty to which they had raised themselves; and Elizabeth of England took them under her protection, and rendered them essential assistance. When the earl of Leicester, the favourite of that queen, was sent over by her to the Netherlands, in the year 1585, the states appointed him governor and captain-general of the United Provinces, or, in other words their stadtholder; but his haughty carriage, and unskilful manner of conducting the war, soon rendered him unpopular, and the next year he returned to England. The Dutch, being afterwards better supported by the English, baffled all the attempts of the Spaniards; and their commerce arrived at such a height, that in 1602 their celebrated East India company was established. Spain, being both weakened and discouraged by the ill success of a tedious war, in 1609 agreed to an armistice for twelve years, and in the very first article of the treaty acknowledged the United Netherlands to be a free and independent state. During this truce the republic attained to a degree of power which it has never since exceeded.

Compelled by necessity to make war against the Spanish fleets, the republicans soon became excellent sailors, and enterprising, indefatigable merchants, who visited every sea, and to whom no port was too distant, no obstacle too discouraging. The commerce of Cadiz, Antwerp, and Lisbon, fell into their hands; and in this way the United Netherlands were, in the middle of the 17th century, the first commercial state and the first maritime power in the world; for, with about 100 vessels of war, they bade defiance to every rival, while England and France rejoiced in the humiliation of the dreaded monarchy of Spain. The Dutch East India Company, established in 1602, conquered islands and kingdoms in Asia; and with about 200 ships, they carried on a trade with China, and even with Japan. They alone supplied Europe with the productions, of the spice islands. The gold, the pearls, the precious jewels of the East, all passed through their hands. The West India company was not so successful, on account of the jealousy of England and France. Holland, nevertheless, for a long time maintained the dominion of the sea. Van Tromp and De Ruyter were victorious, and Louis XIV., who had laid a deep plan for humbling the daring republic, was finally exhausted, and obliged to sue for peace.

These signal successes were principally obtained by the able conduct of prince Maurice of Nassau, the second son of the first stadtholder; and to the same dignity this prince was chosen when only twenty-one years of age. He conducted the affairs of the states, during twenty years, with great ability and success. The latter part of this prince's government was sullied by cruelty and ingratitude; for he procured the condemnation and death of the pensionary Barneveldt, to whose influence he owed his elevation. This man, who was an Armenian in religion and a republican in politics, was sacrificed to his opinions; but his death caused the political principles for which he suffered to spread more widely. Those who opposed the stadtholder were afterward called "the Louvestein party," from De Witt, burgo-master of Dort, and five other members of the states general, being imprisoned in that castle for maintaining such sentiments.

In 1621 the war was again renewed, during which the stadtholder, prince Frederic Henry, youngest son of the first William (who succeeded, on the death of his half brother, prince Maurice, in 1625) greatly distinguished himself. This war was brought to a period in 1648, by the peace of Munster, by which treaty Philip IV., king of Spain, renounced all claim to the United Netherlands.

Frederic was succeeded by his only son William, who was fourth stadtholder, being then twenty-one years of age. He appears to have been ambitious, as was his father.

In 1652 a war broke out between the United Provinces and England, the latter country then being under a republican form of government: this war was terminated two years after, by a treaty, in which the states of Holland engaged for ever to exclude the house of Orange from the stadtholdership of their province.

In 1665 another war was kindled with England, at which time that country had regained its regal constitution; this war continued until the treaty of Breda. The states of Holland and West Friesland then passed an edict, by which they abolished the stadtholdership in their province. This was effected by the influence of the grand pensionary De Witt. When France formed a design to seize on the Spanish Netherlands, the United Provinces entered into an alliance with the crowns of England and Sweden for the defence of those countries; by which France was, in 1668, compelled to agree to the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle; but soon took a severe revenge by breaking that alliance, and inducing England, with some other powers, to enter into a league against the United Provinces; on which a war ensued. In this critical juncture, the republic, in 1672, nominated William, the young prince of Orange, captain and admiral general; and the populace compelled the states of Holland to invest him with the stadtholdership, which two years after was declared hereditary in his family. He was the fifth stadtholder and the third of that name; he married the princess Mary, eldest daughter of James II. of England, and became king of England.

In the year 1678 a peace was concluded with France, at Nimwegen; but it was of no long continuance, for, in 1688, the states supporting their stadtholder in his expedition to England, with a fleet and a large body of troops, France declared war against them, which was terminated by the peace of Ryswick in 1697. At length, on the death of Charles II. king of Spain, in the year 1700, the Spanish provinces fell to the share of the house of Austria, and the republic became involved in a war respecting that succession, which continued till the peace of Utrecht, in 1713.

William died king of England and stadtholder of the United Provinces, in 1702. He appointed John William Friso, prince of Nassau Dietz, his sole heir, who was born 1687, and was drowned in crossing an arm of the sea at Mardyke, 14th July, 1711. Three months after his death his widow was delivered of a son, who was christened William, and afterwards became stadtholder; but on the death of William III. that office was laid aside, until, in 1722, the province of Guelders elected him their stadtholder, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the other provinces.

On the decease of the emperor Charles VI. the Dutch assisted the queen of Hungary against France, which drew on them the resentment of that power; and in 1747, the French making an irruption into Dutch Flanders, the republic unanimously declared the above mentioned William, prince of Orange, stadtholder, captain-general, and admiral-in-chief, making those dignities hereditary in his family, even in the female and collateral branches.

In the general war which broke out in Europe in 1756, the Dutch, taking no part in the quarrel, were perhaps the greatest gainers, by supplying the belligerent powers with naval and military stores; and when the dispute between Great Britain and the American colonies rekindled the flames of war, the most essential assistance was procured both to America and France, by means of the Dutch settlement at St. Eustatius, and of the freights brought by their ships. At length it was discovered by the capture of an American packet, that a treaty between the American States and the province of Holland was actually adjusted, and that Mr. Laurens, the president of the congress, was appointed to reside at Amsterdam in a public capacity. This occasioned the court of London first to cancel all treaties of commerce and alliance which then subsisted between that kingdom and the United States, and soon after, in December, 1780, to issue a declaration of hostilities against the republic. The resentment of Great Britain proved extremely fatal to the possessions and wealth of the Dutch: the island of St. Eustatius, with a large fleet of valuable merchant ships, fell an easy prey to a naval and military force under the command of admiral Rodney and general Vaughan; several homeward-bound East India ships, richly laden, were either taken by the English or destroyed; Negapatnam, on the Coromandel coast, and their chief settlement on the island of Ceylon, were wrested from them; a fleet of merchant ships bound to the Baltic, conveyed by a squadron of Dutch men of war, under the command of admiral Zoutman, were obliged to return to the Texel, and one of the 74 gun ships was sunk in a very sharp action which happened with a British squadron under the command of admiral Hyde Parker, (afterwards created a baronet). Had the admiral been supplied with only one more ship of the line, he would probably have captured most of the enemy's fleet.

In the mean time the emperor of Germany, attentive to the improvement of his dominions in the Low Countries, and desirous of procuring for his subjects the advantages to be derived from the extension of their commerce, determined to oblige the Dutch to allow a free navigation on the Scheldt, which river, by the treaty of Munster, in the year 1648, they possessed exclusively. To procure this, a ship, bearing the imperial flag, proceeded down the Scheldt from Antwerp; the captain being ordered not to submit to any detention or examination whatever from the ships belonging to the republic of the Seven United Provinces, or to make any declaration at the custom-houses belonging to the republic on that river, or to acknowledge them in any manner whatever. At the same time another vessel was ordered to sail from Ostend up the Scheldt to Antwerp. They were both stopped by the Dutch on their passage, which the emperor construed into a declaration of war on the part of the republic, although by the 14th article of the treaty of Munster, entered into with Philip IV. of Spain, it was stipulated that the Scheldt should remain shut: in consequence of which that river had remained guarded by two forts, Lillo and Lieskenshoek, assisted by guard-ships. An army of 80,000 men was now assembling; and some imperial troops, with a train of artillery, advancing towards Lillo, the governor ordered the sluices to be opened in November, 1784, which laid a large extent of circumjacent country under water. A war between the emperor and the republic seemed to be inevitable; but the interposition of the courts of Versailles and Berlin prevented that evil; and the emperor at length agreed to give up his claims, on receiving a very large sum of money from the Dutch, to indemnify him for the expenses which had been incurred by his preparations for war.

William V., the seventh stadtholder, on the death of his father in 1751, succeeded to that dignity when only three years of age; the princess dowager, his mother, who was princess royal of England, (being the eldest daughter of George II.), was appointed governess and guardian to the young prince; the prince of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel acted as captain-general and lord-high-admiral during the minority, which continued until the year 1766, when the prince having attained to eighteen years of age, took upon himself the administration of public affairs. The year following, he married the princess Frederica Sophia Wilhelmina of Prussia.

The amiable manners and benign disposition of this prince procured him general esteem, whilst the absolute ascendancy which the duke of Brunswick had acquired, during so long a minority, over the mind of a prince in whom gentleness and acquiescence were such prevailing qualities, caused him still to retain all his plenitude of power. It was not long, however, before the people began to complain that the most undisguised partiality was shown to foreigners in the appointments to offices.

One of the chief favourites about the person of the prince of Orange was Capellan Vander Marsh, who had been advanced from a low origin to the station of chamberlain, and ennobled. This man, having continual opportunities of conversing with the prince in private, represented to him the necessity there was for him to interfere, by exerting that authority which the states had vested in him, and no longer to delegate it in so unqualified a manner. The prince acknowledged the justice of the suggestion, and promised to act upon it; but when instances were pointed out in which he might render himself highly popular by appointing certain persons to vacant offices, he found the restraints in which he had ever been accustomed to be held too strong to be broken. This led Capellan to desert the cause of his master, and to join the republican party. Soon after, the duke of Brunswick resigned his employment and quitted the country.

The republican, or anti-stadtholderian party, which, as we have already seen, had subsisted in the provinces ever since the year 1647, or from the death of Maurice, the second stadtholder, found, in the ministry of France, the most effectual support which intrigue and a lavish distribution of money could render. More than a million of money had been issued from the treasury of the court of Versailles to further the interests of this party. However secretly these practices might be carried on, they were not concealed from the courts of London and Berlin, who were no less strenuous to support the Orange party. Internal dissensions, thus fomented by foreign interference, rose to a destructive height; and each party imbibed the most rancorous spirit against the other, inasmuch that it was thought to be no longer safe for the prince and princess, with their family, to reside at the Hague; they therefore, in September, 1785, retired to Nimeguen.

In this posture of affairs, the princess of Orange, who possessed an elevated mind, great abilities, and an enterprising spirit, determined on a very bold and decisive measure; which was, to proceed, without the prince, and with only two or three attendants, to the Hague, to make the experiment how far her presence and address could be rendered serviceable to the cause of the prince her husband. As she was proceeding on her journey on the 28th of June, 1787, she was stopped near Schonehoven, by a commandant acting under the republican party, detained there during the succeeding night, and absolutely restricted from proceeding any farther. This indignity determined her to return to Nimeguen, and a representation of the treatment she had received was immediately transmitted to the king of Prussia, her brother, who had succeeded "the great Frederic" on that throne. The king supported the cause of his sister with great warmth; but the states of Holland not being disposed to make any concessions, the reigning duke of Brunswick, nephew to the duke who had filled the high offices in Holland, was placed at the head of an army of Prussians, amounting to about 18,000 effective men, whom he led on the 13th of September into the province of Guelderland, for the express purpose of restoring the prince of Orange to his rights.

The judicious distribution of the troops, and the vigour of the operations, reflected the highest credit on the commander. A general panic seized the republican party; only the town of Goream, which was commanded by Capellan, sustained a bombardment of about an hour; the other places of strength opened their gates at the first summons. Even the strong city of Utrecht, in which were 10,000 men in arms, and whose fortifications had been greatly strengthened, instead of meeting with firmness the approach of the enemy, was deserted by the whole republican party, with all the precipitancy of desperation. These rapid successes of the duke caused the Orange party to gain the ascendancy at the Hague; but the city of Amsterdam remained determined to resist to the utmost; relying upon the prodigious strength of the place, which both nature and art, it had ever been supposed, had contributed to render, impregnable. The duke, however, made his arrangements for attacking the city in various directions; leading on his choicest troops to the most perilous assault in person. After a very obstinate conflict, some of the most important of the outworks were taken, which gave the besiegers a secure lodgment, and threatened the city with a destructive bombardment; the magistracy of Amsterdam finding themselves thus placed, thought it high time to submit to terms.

After this event, nothing material occurred till the invasion of the French revolutionists, which changed the whole aspect of affairs both in Holland and Belgium. In 1792 the national assembly sent general Dumouriez, at the head of a large army, to invade Belgium, it being an object of first-rate importance to deprive Austria of that country; and, in November, the French general gained a great victory at Jemappe, in Hainault. In a few days afterwards Dumouriez made his triumphant entry into Brussels. The party who favoured the French was much too strong, conjointly with the invaders, for the friends of the house of Orange to resist the invaders with any chance of success; accordingly, in a very short time, all the principal towns of the Netherlands submitted to the French; and it was pompously asserted by the latter, that it was the wish of the Belgians themselves to throw off the government of Austria, and be incorporated with the French republic. That many really wished this there can be no doubt, but though the turbulent and disaffected were numerous, such an union was not desired by the majority of those who had any thing to lose.

Although by a very easy conquest the French had gained possession of the Netherlands, the emperor of Austria took immediate measures with a view to its recovery. A large army, under the archduke Charles, joined by the duke of York and the prince of Orange, at the head of their English and Dutch troops, contended for a time with the armies of France; but after two years of warfare, in which the allied troops, but more particularly the British, suffered very severely, the cause of the stadtholder grew hopeless. When, therefore, in 1794, the victorious banners of republican France waved on the frontiers of Holland, the malcontents again rose. Pichegru, aided by the severity of the winter of 1795, and by the favour of the popular party towards the French, made an easy conquest of Holland. The hereditary stadtholder fled with his family to England, and the Batavian republic was formed, May 16, 1795.

The old provinces were now merged into one republic; the legislative power, in imitation of the French, was given to a representative assembly; and the executive to a directory of five. The new republic was obliged to cede to France some southern districts, particularly Maestricht, Venloo, Limburg, and Dutch Flanders; to form a perpetual alliance with that state; pay a sum of 100,000,000 guilders; and allow the French troops to occupy its territories. Six years after, it was found necessary to alter this constitution. The republic was again divided into the old provinces; in addition to which the "land of the generality" was formed into an eighth. The administration of the government was simplified; the legislative assembly diminished to thirty-five deputies; and the executive power was extended to a council of state of twelve men. Notwithstanding these alterations, the Batavian republic, incapable of effecting its ends with the feeble remains of its strength, saw its fleets overpowered by those of England; its colonies laid waste; its commerce limited to a coasting-trade, and to the domestic consumption; and the bank of Amsterdam ruined. By the peace of Amiens, in 1802, it was deprived of Ceylon, one of its richest colonies.

When peace had been concluded between Great Britain and France, and the hopes of better times were just awakened, the halcyon dream was suddenly dispelled, and the thunder of war again resounded on the shores of Holland. Its ports were blockaded, its fleets were annihilated, and its distant colonies fell into the power of the British; its prosperity, indeed, seemed for ever gone; it was treated as a conquered country, and all the advantages promised by its republican allies proved a mere chimera.

In 1805, the Dutch constitution was changed for the third time; but, so far from any improvement taking place in the condition of the country, it continued to grow worse, and the only remedy that now seemed to present itself was the incorporation of Holland with the French empire. This accordingly took place in 1806, the mode in which it was accomplished being by erecting it into a kingdom, of which Louis Buonaparte, one of Napoleon's brothers, was invested with the sovereignty. But Holland was equally unfortunate as a kingdom, as when it was designated the Batavian republic. Though, by a treaty with France, king Louis possessed the rights of a constitutional monarch, and was disposed to exercise his authority with mildness and impartiality, he was made the mere instrument of Napoleon. It is true that he hesitated in enforcing, if he did not resist, the arbitrary decrees of the emperor, and that he incurred no small share of his disapprobation in consequence; but his efforts to promote the weal of his subjects proved wholly ineffectual, so thoroughly controlled was he by the power to whom he owed his regal elevation. Holland was excluded from the commercial privileges of France, though it had to follow all the wars of Napoleon. The national debt was augmented to 1,200,000,000 guilders. The only means by which the merchant could obtain a support was the smuggling trade with England. Almost all the former sources of prosperity were obliterated; and when Napoleon's Milan decree (of Nov. 11, 1807) was promulgated, and the Dutch ports were shut against British commerce, the trade of Holland was totally ruined. The well-disposed king, lamenting evils which he had no power to remedy, and finding that if he retained the sovereignty he must become a tyrant against his own will, voluntarily and unexpectedly abdicated the crown, in favour of his eldest son, a minor, July 1, 1810, and withdrew into the Austrian territory, as a private individual.

Napoleon did not, however, sanction his brother's measures. The French troops at once occupied Amsterdam, and a decree was passed for annexing Holland to the French empire; six senators, six deputies in the council of state, two judges in the court of cassation, and twenty-five deputies in the legislative body, being assigned to it. The continental system was then more strictly enforced, the taxes were augmented, and the conscription laws were introduced, whereby husbands, sons, and brothers were torn from their families, and compelled to fight for a cause they detested, and a tyrant they abhorred. The Dutch departments, which had already been formed in the time of the kingdom, now constituted two military divisions; and all the seventeen provinces of the Netherlands were united under the dominion of France.

At length the fortunes of Buonaparte began to decline, and the people looked forward with hope that their worst days of suffering had passed. The prince of Orange had died in England, in 1806; but his son was living, and on him the hopes of the nation were fixed. The Russian campaign of 1812, so fatal to the ambition of the French emperor, was regarded by the Dutch patriots as the advent of their deliverance. But Buonaparte was still in power, and most of the fortresses in the Netherlands were garrisoned with French soldiers. Ardent, therefore, as their feelings were, and anxious as were their hopes, they patiently watched that portentous cloud which appeared in the political horizon, and which at last burst with desolating fury on the hosts of Napoleon at Leipsic.

That important battle may be said to have decided the fate of Belgium and Holland: the armies of the allies advanced against France; a combined Prussian and Russian force, under Bulow, was sent against the Netherlands, and was joined by a detachment from England, under general Graham. All the great towns now declared for William, prince of Orange, who on the 13th of November, 1813, arrived at the Hague, and was welcomed with the sincerest tokens of joy and affection. He immediately repaired to Amsterdam, where he was proclaimed king, the people being unanimously desirous that the stadtholderate should be changed into an hereditary monarchy. It was not long before the whole country was entirely freed from the presence of the French, and the new sovereign, (the sixth in descent from the illustrious founder of the republic) was solemnly inaugurated on the 30th of March, 1814, and proclaimed by the title of William I.

By a vote of the congress of Vienna, the Belgian provinces were united with the United Netherlands, to form one kingdom, and William was recognized by all the powers as sovereign king of the Netherlands. At the time of this arrangement a treaty was made with Great Britain, which power agreed to restore all the colonies it had taken from the Dutch, except the Cape of Good Hope, Ceylon, Essequibo, Berbice, and Demerara. This union by no means gave entire satisfaction; indeed, there had never been any cordiality between the two people, owing to the religious prejudices of the Belgians, who are catholics, and not only dislike being governied by a protestant king, but have a kind of national animosity to the Dutch.

The people, however, were obliged to acquiesce in the decision of the ruling powers.

Scarcely was the union of Holland and Belgium accomplished, when the unexpected re-appearance of Buonaparte on the soil of France disturbed the peace of Europe; and the Netherlands became once more a scene of warfare. Louis XVIII. had taken refuge in Ghent, and there remained till the fate of the enemy was decided on the field of Waterloo. As the principal features of this important battle have been already given in this volume, it would be a needless repetition to introduce it in this place; we shall therefore merely notice a few incidents connected with the subject, or arising out of it.

In the month of June, 1815, Brussels presented a gay and animated appearance, it being the head-quarters of the British army. Officers in their bright uniforms, accompanied by elegantly dressed ladies, thronged the park; and on the 15th the duke of Wellington, with the chief of the officers was present at a ball given by the duchess of Richmond. The duke had been that day dining at his hotel with some of his aides-de-camp, and before they left the table, a dispatch was received from marshal Blucher, (who had taken up his position at some few leagues distance, to guard the outposts of the allied armies), informing the British commander that he had been suddenly and unexpectedly attacked by the French, and might probably require assistance, in which case he might soon expect to hear from him again. Orders were accordingly given by the duke for all the troops in Brussels to be ready to march at a moment's notice; and then, having made his arrangements with apparent composure, in order not to create unnecessary alarm in the city, he and his officers attended the ball; and up to a late hour all continued tranquil.

Soon after midnight, however, the rolling of drums and the sound of bugles alarmed the inhabitants, but all the information that could be obtained was, that the duke of Wellington had received a dispatch in the ball-room, of so urgent a kind, that some of the cavalry officers, whose regiments were quartered in the adjacent villages, had not time to change their attire, but actually galloped off in their ball-room dresses. It was at length ascertained that the French had obtained some advantages over the Prussians, who had been obliged to retreat and take up a new position, about seven miles from the village of Quatre Bras.

The rolling drum, the clang of arms, the trampling of horses, and all the fearful din of warlike preparation, resounded in the streets of Brussels during the whole of that eventful night; and at break of day were to be seen, among the brave fellows who were waiting for orders to march, many an anxious weeping wife and child taking their fond farewell of those who, haply, ere the sun went down would leave them wretched and forlorn.

Silent and deserted were the streets as soon as the soldiers had left them for the battle-field; but wherever human countenances appeared during the dreadful moments of suspense, it was evident that fear and dismay usurped all other feelings. Presently the hollow sound of distant cannon was distinctly heard; and in the absence of authentic information, busy rumour magnified the real danger, and circulated accounts of disasters the most appalling. On this day (the 16th) two battles were fought; one at Ligny, by the Prussians under Blucher, against Buonaparte in person; the other at Quatre Bras, between a part of the British army under the duke of Wellington, against the French troops commanded by marshal Ney, who had intercepted the duke on his march to aid the Prussians.

At night authentic intelligence was received at Brussels that a most sanguinary battle had been fought, which was to be renewed on the following day, but that the French were no nearer than they were in the morning. This latter assurance in some measure allayed the worst fears of the inhabitants; but the night was very generally occupied in packing up their valuables, so that their departure might not be impeded should the French be ultimately victorious and become masters of the city. Every thing that occurred, in fact, strengthened this impression; and in the midst of the confusion attendant on the hasty harnessing of horses to the baggage-waggons and the rattling of trains of artillery, a troop of Belgic cavalry, who had fled from the field before the fight was over, spread a report that the British army was totally defeated, and that the French were within an hour's march of Brussels.

Despair now seized the panic-stricken citizens, but none had more cause to dread an unfavourable result than the numerous English visitors at that time in the Belgic capital, who were consequently among the foremost of the fugitives. At length it was ascertained that a most terrible conflict had taken place, in which the heroic duke of Brunswick, and most of the gallant Highlanders, who had marched from Brussels in the morning, were lying dead upon the field; and that the duke of Wellington had withdrawn to Waterloo, in order to be nearer the Prussians, who had retreated after their defeat at Ligny. Early next morning a number of long tilted waggons arrived, conveying the wounded soldiers slowly through the town to the hospitals.

Saturday was a day of breathless anxiety and intense grief. Some were mourning the loss of friends and relatives, others were anticipating the ruthless violence of the French soldiers when Brussels should be given up to plunder; while all who had the means of conveyance, and many who had not, set out for Antwerp. But that day passed with very little fighting, both armies being engaged in making preparations for a decisive contest on the following (Sunday, June 18). At ten o'clock the battle of Waterloo commenced, and was not concluded till nine at night, when the complete overthrow of the French army was effected.

The first accounts which reached Brussels ascribed the victory to the enemy, adding that the duke of Wellington was severely wounded, and that most of the English officers were either killed or made prisoners; nor was it until the following morning that the mournful lamentations of despair were changed into sounds of joy and gratulation. But the terrible nature of the conflict was fully understood, for every one who arrived from the battlefield agreed that the carnage of that dreadful day was only surpassed by the matchless valour of the combatants.

Lord Byron has so admirably described the state of the Belgic capital during this memorable period, that our readers, we have no doubt, will applaud rather than condemn us for transferring to our pages stanzas so graphic and picturesque:—

"There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Belgium's capital had gather'd then
Her beauty and her chivalry, and bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men;
A thousand hearts beat happily; and when
Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes look'd love to eyes which spake
again,
And all went merry as a marriage-bell;
But hush! hark! a deep sound strikes like a rising knell!

"Did ye not hear it?—No; 'twas but the wind,
Or the car rattling o'er the stony street;
On with the dance! let joy be unconfined;
No sleep till morn, when Youth and Pleasure meet
To chase the glowing Hours with flying feet—
But hark! that heavy sound breaks in once more,
As if the clouds its echo would repeat;
And nearer, clearer, deadlier than before!
Arm! Arm! it is—it is—the cannon's opening roar!

"Within a window'd niche of that high hall
Sate Brunswick's fated chieftain; he did hear

That sound the first amidst the festival,
And caught its tone with Death's prophetic ear;
And when they smiled because he deem'd it near,
His heart more truly knew that peal too well
Which stretch'd his father on a bloody bier,
And roused the vengeance blood alone could quell:
He rush'd into the field, and, foremost fighting fell.

"Ah! then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears and tremblings of distress,
And cheeks all pale, which but an hour ago Blush'd at the praise of their own loveliness;
And there were sudden partings, such as press
The life from out young hearts, and choking sighs Which ne'er might be repeated; who could guess
If ever more should meet those mutual eyes,
Since upon night so sweet such awful morn could rise?

"And there was mounting in hot haste:
the steed,
The mustering squadron, and the clat-tering car, Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war;
And the deep thunder peal on peal afar;
And near, the beat of the alarming drum
Roused up the soldier ere the morning star;
While throng'd the citizens with terror dumb,
Or whispering, with white lips—"The foe!
They come! they come!

"And wild and high the 'Cameron's gathering' rose!
The war-note of Lochiel, which Albyn's hills
Have heard, and heard, too, have her Saxon foes:—
How in the noon of night that pibroch thrills, Savage and shrill! But with the breath which fills
Their mountain-pipe, so fill the mountaineers
With the fierce native daring which instile
The stirring memory of a thousand years,
And Evan's, Donald's fame rings in each clanman's ears!

"And Ardennes waves above them her
green leaves, Dewy with nature's tear-drops as they pass,
Grieving, if aught inanimate e'er grieves,
Over the unreturning brave,—alas!

So numerous were the wounded on the field of battle, that although the most active exertions were used to remove them, it was the work of three days; but it is satisfactory to know, that nothing could exceed the humanity of the peasantry in the neighbouring villages, who were incessantly occupied in conveying food, water, and such other necessities to the fatal field as were calculated to alleviate the sufferings of those brave men who there lay steeped in gore, the dying mingled with the dead. Nor did their humane attentions end there: they received the perishing sufferers into their humble homes, so that every cottage, as it were, was converted into a hospital, and every inhabitant became a nurse. The public infirmaries of Brussels and Antwerp not being sufficiently extensive for the reception of all who were conveyed thither, the citizens made the wounded men their guests, and kindly administered to their necessities. In all the towns of the Netherlands subscriptions were set on foot for their relief, and every comfort that could be provided for them was liberally supplied.

Among the distinguished commanders who were wounded at the battle of Waterloo was the young prince of Orange, whose conduct in the field earned the warm commendations of the duke of Wellington. It also obtained for him among his countrymen no small share of popularity; and as a mark of gratitude for his services, the nation presented him with an elegant palace near Brussels.

The union of Belgium and Holland being finally settled, the king of the Netherlands was inaugurated at Brussels, in the presence of the states-general, on the 21st of September, 1815. His first care was to deserve the good opinion of his subjects by giving them equal laws, and in endeavours to put the youthful population of Belgium on an equal footing with those of Holland; for which purpose he established national schools in every village, and appointed teachers properly qualified to impart instruction on the system which he had found so successful in his old dominions. By degrees, these schools were augmented and improved; and, in the sequel, others of a very superior kind were founded, in which the fine arts were studied, and every incentive to emulation promoted by the distribution of prizes, &c. Nor was the attention of the king entirely confined to the mental improvement of his subjects. In order to cope with the manufactured goods of other countries, advantage was taken of the discoveries and inventions of scientific men wherever they were to be obtained; steam-engines and new machinery were introduced into the cotton factories; roads, canals, and railways were undertaken; coal and iron-mines were opened; every facility was given to commerce; and nothing but the inveterate prejudice of old habits prevented the agriculturists from benefiting by the wise suggestions of king William; such, however, was the obstinacy of the Belgian farmers, that they were determined to retain the rude and awkward implements which the husbandmen of bygone centuries had used, rather than adopt the improvements of modern times.

In many respects the laws of the new kingdom of the Netherlands were assimilated to those of Great Britain, and the country increased in prosperity with every succeeding year. Still it was evident there was a want of a common feeling between the Belgic and Dutch subjects of the new monarchy; and the circumstance of the taxes in Belgium being increased since the union, was a constant and a not unreasonable theme for discontent to feed upon, inasmuch as they had been united without their own consent.

On the 17th of May, 1816, a Netherlands fleet, under admiral Van der Capellan, joined the English under lord Exmouth, and compelled the dey of Algiers to recognize the European law of nations. On the 25th, a compact was concluded between the kings of Prussia and of the Netherlands respecting the cession of a tract of country to the latter; and, about the same time, the king of the Netherlands acceded to the holy alliance. The political relations of France with its new neighbour were pacific. With Sweden and Denmark, as with Spain and Portugal, the relations were purely commercial. But the amalgamation of the Dutch and Belgians into one nation was not successful: in short, a reciprocal aversion of the northern and the southern people was several times exhibited, with great animosity, in the church, in the army, and even in the chambers of the states-general.

As the difference of languages rendered the union of the southern and northern Netherlands into one nation difficult, the government, while it allowed the use of the French language as well as the Dutch in the proceedings of the states-general, abolished the use of French in judicial proceedings, and by the public authorities, only al-

following advocates to make use of it for a certain period. The attempt to suppress the French language thus made two opposite parties, the secret friends of France; the Catholics, Belgians, apprehensive for their church, hospitable to the protestant faith; and the friends of Belgium, who, by the means of the publication of Le Peuple, the Brabanters and Flemings adhered to France from old predilections. Thus, notwithstanding the prohibition of the French and German languages in public life, the bonds of national unity were by no means tightened. On the contrary, besides the diversity of language and religion, other causes separated the southern provinces from the north; but the greatest obstacle to a cordial union lay in the uniform levying of taxes. Belgium, a manufacturing and agricultural country, wished to place the burdens on articles of export and import; while Holland, to spare its own commerce, wished to impose them on real estate. The budget, therefore, always occupied a great part of the time of the states-general, who were convened in October of each year, alternately at the Hague and at Brussels. The new finance law created such dissatisfaction among the people, especially what related to the meal tax, that in the grand duchy of Luxembourg disturbances arose, which it was found necessary to quell by force. From this period party-violence may be said to have proceeded with tenfold vigour, and the discordant elements of which the new kingdom of the Netherlands was composed, speedily led to its destruction. But it is more than probable that if the revolution in France, which drove one branch of the Bourbons from the throne and invested the other with sovereign power, had not occurred so early, the revolt of the Belgians would have been delayed a few years longer.

As in the case in the capitals of most European countries, so it was customary in Brussels to celebrate the king's birthday with illuminations and other public rejoicings; but while the usual preparations were making, placards were posted on the walls, intimating that the example of the Parisians would on that occasion be followed. Thus warned, and being also accused, from the pragmatists, of this increasing disaffection of the people, the magistrates immediately issued orders to suspend the fête; and the performance of the opera of Massanelli, which had been advertised, was also prohibited, on the ground of its containing many political allusions, which were calculated to excite the people at such a juncture, and so accelerate the threatened revolt. There is no doubt that the very act of forbidding the opera hastened the dreaded catastrophe; for a mob assembled in front of the theatre, demanding the representation of Massanelli; and so great was the tumult, that the government thought it prudent to comply.

The opera was accordingly performed, and with just such results as might naturally be expected. The audience that evening was composed chiefly of the lower classes, who being predisposed to mischief as well as excited by the revolutionary ideas of the drama, and the more violent and brutal scenes commenced as soon as they left the theatre. The gunsmiths' shops were broken open for the purpose of obtaining fire-arms, the wine cellars were plundered, the house of the chief minister was set on fire, and the residences of several other persons connected with the government were broken into and despoiled. The rioters were, however, held in check by the more respectable inhabitants, who, imitating the Parisians, on the following day formed a national guard of citizen soldiers, for the protection of their property against the mob, as well as for effecting a revolution, though by a more orderly and systematic plan of operations.

A state council of some of the most influential citizens undertook the management of affairs, and sent a deputation to the king at the Hague, with a statement of their grievances, at the same time demanding redress. The king saw that it was now too late to temporise; he had either to accede to the revolutionists, in toto, or to put down by force of arms the incipient rebellion; and he evidently preferred the peril which must attend the latter attempt, to the abandonment of his rights as sovereign of the Netherlands. At this critical moment, his sons, the prince of Orange and prince Frederic, at the head of a strong detachment of Dutch troops, were marching towards Brussels. When they reached Vilvorde, about five miles from the city, the citizens, in anticipation of their arrival, informed the princes of their determination not to admit the soldiers; and not a moment was lost in unpaving the streets, cutting down trees to form barricades, and otherwise placing Brussels in the best state of defence in their power.

Sincerely desirous that no blood should be spilt, and anxious to bring this emette to a favourable issue, the prince of Orange, unattended by a military escort, rode into the city; but no cordial greeting welcomed him, and it was with some difficulty that he reached the palace, where he remained till the deputation returned from the Hague with the king's answer. As his majesty merely replied to the effect that he would assemble the states-general, and take the subject into consideration, the public discontent was increased, and the council resolved on demanding a separation from the provinces of Holland, and if they could not obtain it by amicable means, to effect it by force. They accordingly had a conference with the prince, and having stated that they were willing to acknowledge the king as their sovereign, but wished to have a separate parliament and a separate code of laws, he promised to use all his influence with his father, and the states-general, to procure an amicable arrangement.

But although the states-general assembled, they spent their time in fruitless debates instead of pursuing measures likely to lead to an accommodation. Meantime, the revolt had spread throughout the Belgic provinces, and the acts of the insurgents at Liege, Namur, and other towns, showed that the spirit of discontent was not to be easily repressed. From among the citizens of Brussels was formed an executive government, under the title of the committee of public safety; but their councils were thought too moderate by the turbulent multitude, who refused to submit to their authority, and displayed all the violent passions common to an infuriated and lawless people. On this being communicated to the king, Prince Frederic, as commander-in-chief of the Dutch army, received his majesty's order, to take immediate steps for enforcing obedience; on which he issued a proclamation, preparatory to his entering Brussels, stating that if the people laid down their arms and returned peaceably to their allegiance, a general pardon would be granted, but not otherwise. This brought matters to an issue. A determined resistance on the part of the insurgents was resolved on, and a scene resembling that of the revolution in Paris followed; the fighting, like that, continuing for three days.

On the 27th of September the Dutch troops quitted Brussels, and the provisional government immediately issued a proclamation declaring the independence of Belgium. Up to this period the citizens of Antwerp had taken no part in the revolution; but they now admitted a body of Belgic soldiers into the town, and, uniting with them, compelled the Dutch troops to take shelter within the citadel, which, after some smart cannonading that did considerable damage to the houses, they were allowed to keep possession of; the Belgian auxiliaries being prevailed upon to leave the citizens to defend themselves in the best manner they could.

It was now fully evident that the king of Holland had not the power to retain, or rather to regain, the sovereignty of the southern provinces; and as the four great powers, Russia, Austria, Prussia, and England, had been the means of effecting the union, envoys from the three foreign courts were sent to London to settle the terms upon which the kingdom of the Netherlands should be separated. The council of Brussels appeared to be in favour of a constitutional monarchy; and they offered the crown to the duke of Nemours, second son of Louis Philippe of France. The prince, however, declined the offer, and they then fixed on prince Leopold of Saxe Coburg, who, after some hesitation, consented to become king of the Belgians, and was proclaimed, on the 4th of July, by the title of Leopold the First.

The ambassadors who had met in London to settle the terms of the separation, agreed that, while the negotiations were pending, all hostilities should cease between the Belgians and Dutch, and that the troops of both parties should retire within the limits of their respective countries, according to their former boundaries. But this arrangement was opposed by the king of Holland, because it would compel him to surrender the citadel of Antwerp and also some forts on the Scheldt. Austria, Russia, and Prussia declined to interfere in the matter; but Great Britain and France foreseeing that no final settlement could be effected while the Dutch held these important places, took a decided part in insisting on their immediate evacuation. The citadel of Antwerp was one of the strongest in Europe, and its garrison of 5000 men was commanded by general Chasse, an intrepid and skilful veteran.

An English fleet was sent to blockade the mouth of the Scheldt, while a French army of 60,000 men, under marshal Gerard, laid siege to the citadel of Antwerp; but before the siege commenced, the two generals came to an understanding that the town should not be injured by either party, and that the inhabitants should take no part in the contest. As far as possible this arrangement was observed, but during ten days of almost incessant cannonading, the loss of life on each side was great, and the citadel was literally battered to pieces. At length, the gallant old general offered to capitulate, on condition that he and his men might be allowed to retire to Holland; this, however, marshal Gerard refused, unless two of the forts on the Scheldt were given up; but as they were not under the command of general Chasse, and the king refused to sanction their surrender, the brave defender of the citadel, and the surviving remnant of the garrison, were marched into France as prisoners of war.

There were still some minor points of dispute left untouched, particularly the appropriation of the provinces of Limburg and Luxemburg; but the siege of Antwerp was the last event of a hostile nature that occurred. The direct interference of England and France had terminated as must have been expected; and though there was much contention respecting the possession of the two provinces just mentioned, it was eventually arranged, through the mediation of the British government, that they should be divided between the two kingdoms, the king of Holland retaining Luxemburg, with the title of grand duke.

King William I. being nearly seventy years of age, and wishing to retire from the cares of public life, in 1840 abdicated in favour of his son, the hereditary prince of Orange, who was proclaimed king on the 8th of October. No man can be more generally esteemed by his subjects than the new sovereign, or more entitled to their esteem; and, indeed, it may with great truth be said, that William II. of Holland, and Leopold I., king of the Belgians, were both well calculated to promote the prosperity of their respective countries.

William II. died on the 17th of March, 1849, and was succeeded by his son William III., who has since been actively engaged in organising extensive reforms, at once political, financial, and administrative.

THE HISTORY OF SWEDEN, DENMARK, AND NORWAY.

SWEDEN.

THE early history of Sweden is no less involved in fables than that of most other nations: but as it is famous for being the native country of the fierce and warlike Goths, whose emigrations effected the most singular and rapid revolutions on the European continent that history records, we shall in the first place consider who were the earliest inhabitants of those rugged coasts and mountainous regions, whence issued the bold and barbarous Northmen, whose devastations and cruelties rendered them terrible as the invaders of more peaceful and sunnier lands.

The ancient name of the region now comprehending the three northern kingdoms, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, was Scandinavia; but the inhabitants were at that time known to the nations of the south of Europe only by vague rumour.

About A. D. 250 commence the fabulous accounts of Odin, or Woden. Till the middle of the ninth century Scandinavia was little known; but the bold expeditions of the natives into the southern and western parts of Europe, and the diffusion of Christianity amongst them, about the year 1000, shed light on this region. The kingdom of the Swedes was separated from that of the Goths till the twelfth century; but in 1132 both nations, with their several dependencies, were united under Suercher, king of the Ostrogoths, who was proclaimed king of the Swedes and Goths. It was afterwards agreed by both nations, that the Swedish and Gothic princes should hold the sovereignty alternately: but this occasioned many bloody intestine wars.

Magnus Smeck added Schonen and the adjacent territories to the kingdom; but at length, by his mal-administration, he deprived both himself and his family of the throne; for after Albert, duke of Mecklenburg, his sister's son, had been elected king, Margaret, who was heiress to the crowns of Denmark and Norway, compelled him to give up the kingdom of Sweden to her; and by the union of Calmar, in the year 1397, the same princess united the three northern kingdoms under one head. This union excited in the Swedes the greatest indignation: and in 1448, the Swedes and Norwegians elected a separate king, Karl Knutsen, or Charles, the son of Canute, and formally renounced the union. After the death of Charles, several of the family of Charles reigned in succession, with the title of presidents, though with regal authority, until, in 1526, Christian II. of Denmark was acknowledged king of Sweden. But his tyranny disgusted the people. Even during the ceremony of the coronation, notwithstanding his promises of amnesty, he ordered ninety-four Swedish noblemen to be beheaded in the market-place of Stockholm, and perpetrated similar acts of cruelty in the provinces. At length, by the assistance of a Swedish nobleman, named Gustavus Erickson von Vasa, they shook off the Danish yoke.

The brave Gustavus Vasa, who had rendered himself extremely popular by the conduct and intrepidity he had showed in rescuing Sweden from the oppression of the Danes, was elected king, and not only became the founder of a line of monarchs of his family, but advanced the royal authority to a very great height.

The crown of Sweden had hitherto been elective; but the Swedes had been deprived of this right under the Danish kings: according to the laws of Sweden, the royal authority was so limited that the king could neither make war nor peace, levy money nor troops, without the consent of the states; he could neither erect a fortress, introduce foreign troops, nor put any strong place into the hands of a foreigner. The revenue of the crown then solely arose from some inconsiderable domains about Upsal, a small poll-tax on the peasants, and from fines and forfeitures which fell to the crown in criminal proceedings. The government of castles, fiefs, or manors, which were at first granted by the crown only for a term of years, or at most for life, were insensibly changed into hereditary possessions, which the nobility held by force, without paying the rents that had been reserved out of them. This was also done by the bishops and clergy, who possessed such estates, on pretence that the lands of the church ought to be exempted from all duties; and by these encroachments the royal revenue was so reduced, that the king could scarcely maintain more than five hundred horse. He was considered only as a kind of captain-general during a war, and as president of the senate in time of peace. The prelates and nobility fortified their castles, and rendered them the seats of so many independent states; and arming their vassals, frequently made war on each other, and sometimes on their sovereign. They neither sought nor expected redress from the king's courts, when they thought themselves injured; but proceeded by force of arms to avenge their own cause. The kingdoms of Norway and Denmark were under the like form of government; both were elective, and had their respective estates, without whose concurrence or that of the states assembled in their diet, the king could transact nothing of importance.

But to return to Gustavus Vasa, who found the kingdom in this situation. The states, to express their ardent gratitude to their deliverer, passed a solemn decree, by which they obliged themselves to approve whatsoever that patriot should think fit to enact for the preservation of his dignity, against a pretender who was set up in opposition to him. They, in particular, empowered him to make peace and war, and resolved that his enemies should be accounted the enemies of the nation.

This happened at the time that the doctrines of the reformation began to prevail in Sweden; and the Romish clergy, Gustavus's greatest enemies, being in possession of one half of the lands and revenues of the kingdom, also holding many royal castles and domains, the new king, in order to resume these possessions, embraced the doctrines of Luther, procured an act to be passed, by which it was ordained, that the bishops should immediately surrender their castles to the king, and disband their troops; that their pretended rights to fines and forfeited estates, which originally belonged to the crown, should be abrogated; that all the superfluous plate and bells belonging to the churches should be sold to pay the public debts; that all the grants of estates to the clergy, since the year 1445, should be revoked, and the lands re-united to the crown; that two-thirds of the tithes, generally possessed by the bishops and abbots, should be sequestered, for maintaining the army in time of war, and for erecting and endowing public schools and hospitals in time of peace; and that all the privileges of the clergy should be entirely at the king's disposal.

Vasa having thus obtained a constitutional title to the revenues of the church, marched through great part of his dominions, at the head of a body of horse, to see the act put into execution, attended by Olaus Petri, and other Lutheran doctors, whom he ordered to preach before him in the principal churches. Wherever he came, he commanded the titles and grants by which the clergy held their lands to be brought before him, and either re-united them to the crown, or restored them to the heirs of the ancient proprietors; by which means he recovered from the secular and regular clergy above two-thirds of their revenues, and seized upon near thirteen thousand considerable farms. He also caused the superfluous church plate to be melted down and carried into the public treasury. This, indeed, occasioned some conspiracies and insurrections; but they were easily quelled.

Having now succeeded so happily in suppressing his greatest enemies, he obliged the nobility and gentry who held the crown lands, which they had kept as their own, to resign their fiefs or to pay the rents that were originally due to the crown. Upon this they were obliged to compound with the king, and agree to pay him annually a certain sum for all their fiefs and manors.

The crown was next rendered hereditary to the issue of the reigning prince by the free consent of the states, and it has accordingly been enjoyed by his descendants until the present century. Gustavus Vasa died in 1560; but the division of the kingdom among his children, the mal-administration of his son John, together with the propensity of Erick, John's brother, and of Sigismund, king of Poland, the son of John, to popery, threw the kingdom into great disorder, which it required all the energy and prudence of Charles IX. and his son Gustavus Adolphus to suppress. Under the latter prince, who began his reign in 1611, the importance of Sweden rose to its greatest height; his armies supported the protestant interest in Europe, whilst his domestic policy established good order in his kingdom. He reduced the greatest part of Livonia, and penetrated so far into Germany as to become formidable to the emperor; but in the year 1632 he lost his life at the battle of Lutzen, dying in the arms of victory.

This prince was one of those rare mortals that join to the abilities of a great warrior and statesman the virtues that refine and exalt humanity. In his life and death he attained the noblest reward that worth like his could crave.

His daughter Christina succeeded to the throne in 1633, when only six years of age. She wrested from Norway and Denmark the territories of Jemtland and Harjedalen, with the islands of Gothland and Oeland, and in 1648 added Upper Pomerania, Bremen, Verden, and Wismar, to the Swedish dominions. She was no less remarkable for her learning and capacity, than for her singularities of conduct. In the year 1654 that princess solemnly resigned the crown of Sweden, and was very instrumental in advancing to the throne her cousin Charles Gustavus, prince palatine of Deux-Ponts, son of John Casimir, prince palatine of the Rhine, by Catherine, daughter of Charles IX. and sister to Gustavus Adolphus, whom her subjects had wished her to have made her husband. Charles, who coveted a crown rather than a marriage with his cousin, in 1653 added Schonon, Halland, and other places to the Swedish dominions. His son Charles XI. re-assumed all the alienated crown-lands, and rendered himself an absolute monarch.

Charles XI. dying in 1697, in the forty-second year of his age, and the thirty-seventh of his reign, was succeeded by his only son Charles XII., who being under fifteen years of age, a regency was appointed; but the uncommon talents of this young prince soon procured for him the government; and through his mediation the peace of Ryswiek was concluded, before he had completed his 16th year. In the year 1700, the Poles, Danes, and Russians, taking advantage of the king's youth, endeavoured to recover the dominions of which their ancestors had been deprived.

hereditary prince of Hesse Cassel. Frederic having no issue, the states, in 1743, nominated Adolphus Frederic, duke of Holstein and bishop of Lübeck, his successor, by a majority of only two votes. Adolphus, on the decease of Frederic, in 1751, assumed the reins of government. He married Louisa Ulrica, sister to the king of Prussia, who lived to the year 1792.

The new form of government established at this juncture, consisted of fifty-one articles, all tending to abridge the powers of the crown, and to render the Swedish sovereign the most limited monarch in Europe. It was settled, that the supreme legislative authority should reside absolutely and solely in the states of the realm assembled in diet, which, whether convened by the king or not, must regularly assemble once in three years, and could only be dissolved by their own consent. During the recess of the diet, the executive power resided in the king and senate; but, as the king was bound in all affairs to abide by the opinion of the majority, and as he possessed only two votes, and the casting voice in case of equal suffrages, he was almost entirely subordinate to that body, and could be considered in no higher view than as its president. At the same time, the senate itself ultimately depended upon the states, as its members, though nominally appointed for life, yet were in a great measure under the control of the states, being amenable to that assembly, and liable to be removed from their office in case of real or pretended malversation. Thus the supreme authority resided in a tumultuous assembly, composed of the four orders, into which many nobles without property, the meanest tradesmen, and the lowest peasants, were admitted. Although all the statutes were signed by the king, and the ordinances of the senate issued in his name, yet in neither case did he possess a negative; and, in order to obviate the possibility of his attempting to exercise that power, it was enacted in the diet of 1750, that "in all affairs, without exception, which had hitherto required the sign manual, his majesty's name might be affixed by a stamp, whenever he should have declined his signature at the first or second request of the senate." In consequence of this resolution, the royal signature was actually engraved, and applied to the ordinary dispatches of government, under the direction of the senate. In a word, the king enjoyed little more than the mere name of royalty; he was only the ostensible instrument in the hands of one of the two great parties which at that time divided and governed the kingdom, as either obtained the superior influence in the diet. Fully determined to wrest from the senate their assumed power, and to recover that participation of authority which the constitution had assigned to the crown, the king proceeded to a measure both bold and decisive. On the 13th of December, 1768, he signed a declaration, by which he formally abdicated the crown of Sweden; and, by giving public notice throughout his dominions of this step, at once suspended all the functions of government. The senate felt their authority insufficient to counteract such a measure, for their orders were disputed by all the colleges of state, who had ceased to transact the business of their several departments. The magistrates of Stockholm, agreeably with the form of government, were proceeding to convoke the order of "burghers," which compelled the senate to consent to the desired assembly of the diet; and the king's concurrence was requested to confirm the proclamation for that purpose, which being given, he resumed the reins of government. At the meeting of the diet, which took place on the 19th of April, 1769, though it coincided in some particulars with the king's views, yet it was far from effecting every thing which he aimed at.

Adolphus Frederic died February 12th, 1771, and was succeeded by Gustavus III., his eldest son, then twenty-five years of age. The accession of this young prince to the throne, with the prepossessions of the people strongly in his favour, was a favourable period for extending the power of the crown by the reduction of that of the senate. An aristocracy naturally and rapidly degenerates into despotism; the yoke of which is rendered more intolerable to a people in proportion as the oppressions of a number of tyrants are more grievous than those of a single one. The new king found his people divided into two great political parties, distinguished by the names of "hats" and "caps;" the former espoused the interest of the court, the latter the country or patriotic party. The most masterly strokes of policy, as well as the most profound dissimulation, were used by this monarch to circumvent and destroy the influence of the senate. The people were grievously oppressed; for besides the rigorous exactions made on the common people by their rulers, they suffered every calamity which a year of great scarcity necessarily occasions. The army was devoted to his interest; and his two brothers, prince Charles and prince Frederic Augustus, each commanded a body of troops. The next year, whilst the king was amusing the senate at Stockholm with the warmest professions of disinterestedness, and of his wishes to be thought only the first citizen of a free country, an insurrection of the military happened at Christianstadt, in the province of Scania; which was set on foot by one Hellichius, who commanded there. The plea made use of to justify it was, the tyranny and oppression of the governing powers. Prince Charles, who was purposely in those parts, made this a pretence to assemble the troops under his command, whilst the king, his brother, who was at Ostrogothia, put himself at the same time at the head of the troops there. The senate was much alarmed at these proceedings, whilst the king, with the most consummate dissimulation, expressed tutions of the diet, and the diet has negatived the proposals of the king, without occasioning a change of ministry, or exciting any feeling of animosity on either side. This anomaly is increased by the absolute legislative power which the constitution confers on the king in all matters of internal administration and police, in regard to which the diet merely presents addresses and petitions expressive of their views and wishes.

The sovereign disposes of the higher civil and military offices, from which foreigners are excluded by law. Without the consent of the states, the king cannot enact new laws or abolish old ones; and the constitution requires the king to assemble the states once in five years.

The legislative power in Norway is lodged in the "storting," which meets every three years suo jure, and not by any writ from the king or the executive. This "storting" enjoys a right possessed by no other legislative assembly in the world. If a bill pass through three successive "stornings" it becomes the law of the land without the royal assent; and this right was exerted when the Norwegians abolished their hereditary nobility in 1821. A viceroy, or governor-general, resides at Christiansia. The revenue and troops of the kingdoms are kept distinct; and the fortifications of Norway are only in part occupied by Sweden. For the levying of taxes, the consent of the states is necessary; and all the troops and officers are required to take the oath of allegiance to them, as well as to the king. The sovereign has the right to make war and peace, to regulate the judiciary, and to conduct the general administration without restraint. The succession to the throne is hereditary in the male line, according to the law of primogeniture: on the extinction of the male line the states have full power to elect a king. Before his coronation, the king is required to take the inaugural oath, and to subscribe an engagement to maintain inviolate the evangelical Lutheran religion.

In Marshal Bernadotte Sweden and Norway found a king in every respect worthy of their allegiance. Looking steadily to the future, he met present difficulties with firmness and wisdom; and his personal character and his constitutional principles secured him the love and fidelity of his people.

In 1844, Charles XIV. died in his eightieth year, and was succeeded by his son Oscar, who appears admirably fitted, both by nature and education, to consolidate the power which fortune bestowed on his illustrious sire.

DENMARK.

THE aborigines of Denmark are supposed to have come from Germany, and to have gained their support from the sea. The Cimbric, who derived their origin from them, dwelt in the peninsula of Jutland, the Chersonesus Cimbrica of the Romans. They first struck terror into the Romans by their incursion, with the Teutones, into the rich provinces of Gaul. After this, led by the mysterious Odin, the Goths broke into Scandinavia, and appointed chiefs from their own nation over Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. But the early history of this country is involved in fable, and presents nothing that is interesting to a stranger. All that is known with certainty is, that at the period of which we are speaking, Denmark was divided into many small states, that the inhabitants gained their subsistence by piracy, and spread terror through every sea, and along every coast, wherever they came.

In the eighth century the Danes became formidable to their neighbours by their piratical depredations on the coasts of England, Flanders, Normandy, and Germany; which desultory warfare was maintained for more than two centuries, till at length their rude and savage manners being somewhat meliorated, they became cultivators of their native soil instead of adventurers at sea. Other causes likewise concurred to put an end to these outrages: that redundant population, which had been the means of pouring forth such swarms of plunderers, no longer continued; many had fallen by the sword in those invasions; conquests had been made, and emigrants had settled on the acquired territories in vast numbers; the introduction of Christianity, in the tenth century, served likewise to abate their ferocity, while the increased strength of the neighbouring states, and the force they had acquired at sea, became too formidable to be contended with.

Canute, or Knute, commonly called the Great, who died in England, in the year 1036, advanced the dignity of this kingdom to its highest pitch; but the sovereigns who succeeded him were little distinguished until towards the close of the fourteenth century; when Margaret obtained the regal power on the death of her son Olaus, or Orlaf III., who had united the kingdom of Norway to that of Denmark. In the year 1388 (three years after her accession), having defeated and taken prisoner Albert, king of Sweden, she was enabled to urge her pretensions to that crown; of which she obtained possession by the consent of the states, at the assembly of the representatives of the three kingdoms held at Calmar, in the year 1397, at which time a confederated constitution was formed of the greatest consequence to the northern states, and called "the union of Calmar." This wise and heroic princess, to whom historians have given the distinguishing appellation of "the Semiramis of the north," reigned over Denmark and Norway twenty six, and over Sweden sixteen years. After this, a century elapsed with-

Christian I., count of Oldenburg, who came to the throne in 1448, was the founder of the Danish royal family, which has ever since kept possession of the throne, and from which, in modern times, Russia, Sweden, and Oldenburg have received their rulers. He connected Norway, Sleswick, and Holstein with the crown of Denmark, but was so fettered by his capitulations, that he seemed to be rather the head of a royal council than a sovereign king.

In the year 1523, Frederic, duke of Holstein, was raised to the throne by the voice of the people, who had deposed their king Christian II. for his cruelty and tyranny, in whose reign the crown of Sweden had been dismembered from that of Denmark, and placed on the patriotic brow of Gustavus Vasa. Frederic I. having embraced the doctrines of Luther, the tenets of that reformer spread with great rapidity through the kingdom.

The event which chiefly distinguishes the history of this kingdom since the reign of Frederic I. is the unprecedented revolution which took place in the 17th century, and which merits particular notice here.

Denmark was then governed by a king chosen by a delegation from people of all ranks, assembled in a diet, who in their choice paid a due regard to the family of the preceding prince; and if they found one of his line properly qualified to discharge the duties of that high station, they thought it just to prefer him before any other, and the eldest son before a younger, if his merits warranted the adoption; but if those of the royal family were either deficient in abilities, or had rendered themselves unworthy by their vices, they chose some other person, and sometimes raised a private man to that high dignity. To the king thus elected, and a senate consisting of the principal nobility, the executive powers of government were entrusted.

One of the most fundamental parts of the constitution was the frequent meetings of the states, in order to regulate every thing relating to the government. In these meetings new laws were enacted, and all affairs relating to peace and war, the disposal of great offices, and contracts of marriage for the royal family, were debated. The imposing of taxes was merely accidental, no money being levied on the people, except to maintain what was esteemed a necessary war, with the advice and consent of the nation, or now and then by way of free gift, to add to a daughter's portion. The king's ordinary revenue consisted only in the rents of lands and demesnes, in his herds of cattle, his forests, services of tenants in cultivating his ground, &c. for customs on merchandize were not then known in that part of the world: so that he lived like a modern nobleman, upon the revenues of his estate.

But in the year 1660, the three states, consisting of the nobility, clergy, and commonalty, being assembled in a diet, for the purpose of finding means for discharging the debts incurred by a war with Charles X., king of Sweden, the nobility endeavoured to lay the whole burden on the commons; while the latter, who had defended their country, and particularly their capital, with the utmost bravery, insisted that the nobles, who enjoyed all the lands, should at least pay their share of the taxes, since they had suffered less in the common calamity, and done less to prevent its progress.

At this the nobility were enraged, and many bitter replies passed on both sides. At length a principal senator standing up, told the president of the city, that the commons neither understood the privileges of the nobility, nor considered that they themselves were not better than slaves. The word slaves was followed by a loud murmur from the clergy and burghers; when Nansen, the president of the city of Copenhagen and speaker of the house of commons, observing the general indignation it occasioned, instantly arose, and avowing that the commons were no slaves, which the nobility should find to their cost, walked out, and was followed by the clergy and burghers, who proceeding to the brewer's hall, in the city, debated there on the most effectual means of humbling the arrogance of the nobility. Then it was that the first idea of rendering the crown of Denmark hereditary was started by the bishop of Zealand, but nothing like inventing the king with absolute power was at that time thought of, although it was soon after adopted. The assembly afterwards adjourned to the bishop's palace, where the plan of an hereditary succession received the unanimous concurrence of the whole assembly.

Frederic III., who then possessed the crown of Denmark, has been represented as a prince naturally supine and unambitious, of engaging manners and a benevolent heart, yet his habits of life were as little likely to render him highly popular as generally odious; but what the common course of events would not have brought about, the exigencies of the times effected. Charles X. of Sweden, having broken the treaty he had entered into at Roskilde, in the year 1658, and invaded Denmark, for the avowed purpose of subduing both that kingdom and Norway, to annex them to the crown of Sweden, Frederic beheld the impending storm with the firmness of a king; he renounced his beloved ease, led on his troops in person, and, by his activity, conduct, and bravery, delivered his capital, repelled the invaders, and forced them disgracefully to evacuate his territories. These achievements deservedly endeared him to the people, and before the fervour of their gratitude had subsided, the dissensions between the nobles and commons broke forth. Had the smallest spark of ambition existed in the king's breast, such an event would have kindled it into a flame; but this prince is represented, by some historians who have related this memorable revolution, as having relapsed into his former habits of incivility, and that the intrigues of two principal men in his court brought about an event which he himself showed no solicitude to procure.

The revolution being thus accomplished, a new constitution was established, by an edict consisting of forty articles, and entitled "the royal law of Denmark," by which the succession was settled on the king's eldest son, and, on failure of male issue, in the female line. The kings of Denmark and Norway were therein declared to be above all human laws, acknowledging in all ecclesiastical and civil affairs no higher power than God alone. They may make, interpret, abrogate, and dispense with laws, except the royal law, which must remain irrevocable, and be considered as the fundamental law of the state. The kings of Denmark have likewise the power of declaring war, making peace, imposing taxes, and levying contributions of all kinds. The kings who have reigned since this revolution have been Christian V. (1670); Frederic IV. (1699); Christian VI. (1730); Frederic V. (1748); Christian VII. (1766); Frederic VI. (1808); Christian VIII. (1840); and Frederic VII. (1848).

In 1792, when the allied powers wished Denmark to take part in the war against France, she maintained her neutrality. But, by her accession to the northern confederacy in 1800, she was involved in a war with Great Britain, in which the Danish fleet was defeated at Copenhagen, April 2, 1801.

The courage of the Danes very deservedly obtained for them a truce; upon which Denmark acceded to the treaty of Russia with England, evacuated Hamburg and Lubeck, of which she then had possession, and received back her own colonies. At length, in 1807, this state was included in Napoleon's continental policy. A French army stood on the borders of Denmark; Russia had adopted the continental system at the peace of Tilsit; and England thought it her duty to prevent the accession of Denmark to this alliance. To carry that object, an English fleet, conveying a large army, was sent up the Sound; and as the Danish government refused to join in a defensive alliance with Great Britain, as demanded, or to surrender the fleet as a pledge of its neutrality, the capital was bombarded for three days, and the whole fleet, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, fifteen frigates, &c., was delivered up to the British, and carried off in triumph. Great Britain now offered the crown-prince neutrality or an alliance. If he accepted the first, the Danish fleet was to be restored in three years after the general peace, and the Island of Heligoland was to be ceded to the British crown. The crown-prince, however, rejected all proposals, declared war against Great Britain in October, 1807, and entered into a treaty with Napoleon.

This alliance with France was no sooner concluded than Bernadotte occupied the Danish Islands with 30,000 men, in order to land in Sweden, against which power Denmark declared war in April, 1808; but this plan was defeated by the war with Austria, in 1809. The demand made by the court of Stockholm, in 1813, of a transfer of Norway to Sweden, was followed by a new war with this crown, and a new alliance with France. On this account, after the battle of Leipzig, the northern powers who were united against France, occupied Holstein and Sleswig. Glückstadt and other fortifications were captured, and the Danish troops driven beyond Flensburg.

The court of Denmark seeing the unfavourable position in which the country was placed by the declining fortunes of Napoleon, not only concluded a peace with England and Sweden, but entered into an alliance against France, and contributed a body of troops to the allied forces. Denmark was also obliged to cede Heligoland to Great Britain (receiving in exchange several West India Islands), and Norway to Sweden (for which she was compensated by Swedish Pomerania and Rugen, but which were afterwards exchanged for Lauenburg with Prussia). A peace was concluded with Russia in February, 1814.

Since that period, the Danish government has steadily exerted itself to draw forth the resources of the country, and to improve the condition of the people. In 1834, provincial states were established; and great improvements were otherwise made in the government and administration of the country. But useful and valuable as are the reforms of late introduced into the organisation of Denmark, the most brilliant feature in her contemporary history, and that which gives the best proof of her activity and her strength, is the struggle she maintained against Germany since the month of April, 1848, for the retention of her rights over Schleswig and Holstein. (In the History of Germany will be found an account of the origin and consequences of this fierce struggle; and we shall here content ourselves with subjoining for purposes of reference a summary of the leading events by which it was marked.) The present king, Frederic VII., who succeeded to the throne, Jan. 20, 1848, commenced his reign with the grant of a constitution to his subjects. Immediately afterwards his ministry introduced measures which, it was supposed, had a tendency to incorporate Schleswig with the crown of Denmark. In violation of ancient stipulations, which declared that the German duchy of Holstein and Schleswig should be inseparable. To this severance the German inhabitants of the duchies were adverse. Availing themselves of the contre coup which the French revolution of 1848 produced throughout Europe, they at once formed a provisional government, and appealed to the German people for assistance, which was promptly granted, both in word and deed. Volunteers hastened to the scene of action from all sides; and the Prussian government marched his troops into the country. Meanwhile Copenhagen was put in a state of defence, the navy was refitted, the soldiers were gathered under their colours, and sent towards the heart of the insurrection. On the 9th of April, the Danish army defeated the insurgents, at Bau, near Flensburg in Schleswig. But the Prussians having, by this time, come to their assistance, on the 23rd of April, the Danes were obliged to leave their position at Denvirk. On the 1st of May, the German army occupied Jutland, under the command of General Wrangel. On the 28th of May and the 5th of June, the Danes fought most gallantly at Duppel and at Nybel, while Wrangel abandoned Jutland on the demand of England, Russia, and France. The armistice of Malmo was concluded the 26th of August; but on the 3rd of April, 1849, the war recommenced with a catastrophe for the Danish fleet at Eckernforde. The man-of-war, the Christian VIII., which had sailed into the bay to destroy the batteries of the enemy, was detained there with the Gellon by contrary wind. After an heroic resistance, the Christian VIII. was blown up, and the Gellon surrendered to avoid the destruction of her whole crew.

On the 8th of April a battle was fought at Uderup; on the 23rd of April and the 7th of May, at Kolding, when the Danish General Iye effected a retreat in Jutland, remarkable for the skill and energy with which it was effected. On the 16th of May, a Holstein army of 16,000 men commenced the bombardment of Fredericia; on the 8th of July the Danish army made a victorious attack, took the redoubts of the enemy, and threw him into complete disorder. The Prussian army then retired from Jutland. On the 10th of June new armistices and preliminaries of peace were made, and signed on the 2nd of July, 1850. But Holstein recommenced the war on its own account, under the command of the Prussian general, Willisen. On the 25th of July, the Holsteiners sustained a severe defeat at Idstedt; but skirmishes continued on land and sea, till the 5th of October, when General Willisen was again driven back at Frederikstadt. It was not till the beginning of 1851 that the Danish army could return to their homes, after three campaigns which will be remembered in history, and in which members of all classes of society, animated by a common spirit, took part, either as conscripts or as volunteers. In 1852 a definitive treaty was ratified in London, between England, Russia, Sweden, and France, and Prussia on the one hand, and Denmark on the other, recognising the transmission of the Danish crown (in default of male issue in the direct line of King Frederic III. of Denmark) to the issue of Prince Christian of Schleswig Holstein, and his consort Louisa, Princess of Hesse, in order of primogeniture from male to male, and providing for the continued union of all the states now united under the sceptre of the king of Denmark.

NORWAY.

THE observations that have been made respecting the early history of Sweden and Denmark apply also to Norway. Up to the ninth century it was governed by a number of petty princes; until one, more bold and powerful than the rest, named Harold Harfaagre, who had renounced the idols of Scandinavian worship for the doctrines of Christianity, conquered them, and became sole and absolute monarch of the country.

Like the other Christian princes of Europe, Harold Harfaagre was anxious to introduce the feudal system; and having wrested the various petty principalities from those who before possessed them, he reduced the people to a state of vassalage, and placed a governor over each province, to collect the revenues and hold courts of justice. But among so brave and stubborn a race as these Northmen, many there were who, rather than submit to Harold's despotism, emigrated to other countries, Ireland being among the number. They, however, chiefly settled in Iceland, an uninhabited and uninviting spot, yet in time it became not only very populous, but was the favourite resort of their scalds, or poets, and their historians, whom they treated with every mark of honourable regard.

Norway having become a regular and independent kingdom under Harold Harfaagre, during a reign which lasted more than half a century, many customs were introduced which tended to raise the character of the Norwegians as a nation desirous of cultivating the arts of civilized life, but which still would not abate one iota of its warlike pretensions. He had bestowed fiefs on many of the nobles, amongst whom was Rognvald, father of the famous Rollo, duke of Normandy; so that, in fact, it may be said that the usurpation of Harold in Norway led to the settlement of the Normans in France. Harold died in 934, and was succeeded by his son Eric, who proving a tyrant, some of the principal chiefs made propositions to his brother Haco, who had been educated in England, and was then residing at the court of king Athelstan. He accordingly went over to Norway, and having pledged himself to abolish the feudal laws, and restore the allodial tenure, he was proclaimed king. Eric seeing that there was no chance of recovering the throne, collected a fleet, and sailed to the Orkney islands, from which point he could readily assail the coasts of Scotland and Northumbria.

In 1023, Canute the Great, king of Denmark, conquered Norway, but did not long retain possession of it, and the country had its own monarchs again from 1034 to 1380. On the death of Olaf IV., his mother, Margaret, daughter of Waldemar III., king of Denmark, inherited both thrones; from which time Denmark and Norway remained united, till 1814, when its cession to Sweden took place.

THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA.

THE original inhabitants of this gigantic empire, (which embraces nearly half of Europe, and the whole of Northern Asia—reaching from the frontiers of China to the confines of Poland, Sweden, and Turkey—besides having vast possessions on the north-western coast of North America), were doubtless a multitude of nomadic tribes, classed under the common appellation of Sarmatians and Scythians. These northern hordes, at a very early period, began to menace the Roman frontiers, and even before the time of Cyrus had invaded what was then called the civilized world, particularly Southern Asia. They inhabited the countries described by Herodotus between the Don and the Dnieper; and Strabo and Tacitus mention the Roxolani, afterwards called Ros, as highly distinguished among the Sarmatian tribes, dwelling in that district. The Greeks early established colonies here; and in the second century the Goths came from the Baltic, and, locating in the neighbourhood of the Don, extended themselves to the Danube.

In the fifth century, the country in the neighbourhood of these rivers was overrun by numerous migratory hordes of Alans, Huns, Avarians, and Bulgarians, who were followed by the Slavi, or Slavonians, a Sarmatian people, who took a more northerly direction than their predecessors had done. In the next century, the Khazai, pressed upon by the Avarians, entered the country between the Wolga and the Don, conquered the Crimes, and thus placed themselves in connexion with the Byzantine empire. These and numerous other tribes, directed the course of their migrations towards the west, forced the Huns into Pannonia, and occupied the country between the Don and the Alanta; while the Tchoudes, or Ishudi, a tribe of the Finnic race, inhabited the northern parts of Russia. All these tribes maintained themselves by pasture and the chase, and exhibited the usual barbarism of wandering nomades.

The Slavonians, coming from the northern Danube, and spreading themselves along the Dnieper, in the fifth and sixth centuries, early acquired, from a commerce with their southern neighbours, habits of civilized life, and embraced the Christian religion. They founded in the country afterwards called Russia the two cities of Novogorod and Kiof, which early attained a commercial importance. Their wealth, however, soon excited the avidity of the Khazari, with whom they were compelled to maintain a perpetual struggle; but Novogorod found another and more formidable enemy in the Varangians, a race of bold pirates who infested the coasts of the Baltic, and who had previously subdued the Courlanders, Livonians, and Esthonians. To these bold invaders the name of Russes, or Russians, is thought by the most eminent authors to owe its origin. Be that, however, as it may, it appears certain that in these dark ages the country was divided among a great number of petty princes, who made war upon each other with great ferocity and cruelty, so that the people were reduced to the utmost misery; and the Slavonians seeing that the warlike rovers threatened their rising state with devastation, were prompted by the necessity of self-preservation to offer the government of their country to them. In consequence of this, a celebrated Varangian chief, named Ruric, arrived, in 862, with a body of his countrymen, in the neighbourhood of the lake Cadoga, and laid the foundation of the present empire of Russia, by uniting his people with those who already occupied the soil.

Ruric has the credit of being zealous for the strict administration of justice, and enforcing its exercise on all the boyars who possessed territories under him. He died in 879, and was succeeded by his son Igor, who conquered Kiof, and removed the seat of government from Novogorod to that place. Igor's widow and successor, Olga, publicly embraced Christianity at Constantinople in 955, and attempted, but without success, to introduce the Greek ritual among the people. Her son Sviatoslaf, after conquering Bulgaria, and even threatening Constantinople itself, fell in battle against the Peashehgri, near the cascades of the Dnieper, in 972.

The Russian empire continued to flourish till the end of the reign of Vladimir (or Wloledomir), who ascended the throne in 976. Having settled the affairs of his empire, he demanded in marriage the princess Anne, sister to the Greek emperor Basilius Porphyrogenitus. His suit was granted, on condition that he should embrace Christianity. With this the Russian monarch complied; and that vast empire was thenceforward considered as belonging to the patriarchate of Constantinople. Vladimir received the name of Basilius on the day he was baptized; and, according to the Russian annals, 20,000 of his subjects were baptized on the same day.

The idols of paganism were now thrown down, churches and monasteries were erected, towns built, and the arts began to flourish. The Slavonian letters were now first introduced into Russia; and Vladimir sent missionaries to convert the Bulgarians, but without much success. We are told that

OWN PERSON.

WHEN SPRING COMMENCES IN ONE DIVISION OF THE VAST EMPIRE OF RUSSIA, ANOTHER EXPERIENCES ALL THE RISQUES OF WINTER.

Vladimir called the arts from Greece, cultivated them in the peaceable periods of his reign, and generously rewarded their professors. His merits, indeed, appear to have been very considerable. He has been extolled by the monks as the wisest as well as the most religious of kings; his zealous exertions in promoting the profession of Christianity throughout his dominions acquired for him the title of saint, and succeeding historians, comparing the virtues of his character with the age in which he lived, have united in conferring upon him the appellation of Vladimir the Great. He died in 1008, and, contrary to all rules of sound policy, divided his empire among his twelve sons.

Vladimir was no sooner dead than his sons commenced a civil war. Swatopolk, one of the brothers, having destroyed two others and seized their dominions, was in his turn lured from his eminence by Jarislans, another brother, who reigned from 1014 to 1045. But as the fugitive prince had found refuge at the court of Boleslaus, king of Poland, it brought on a dreadful war betwixt the Poles and Russians, in which the former were victorious. During the reign of Jarislans, the progress of Christianity was considerably promoted by his exertions; and besides conferring many important privileges on the mercantile citizens of Novogorod, for whose use he also enacted a body of equitable laws, he built a number of towns throughout his dominions, and encouraged learning as far as it could be attained under all the disadvantages attendant on its acquisition in that dark age.

Jarislans fell into the same error that his father had committed, by dividing his dominions among his five sons. This produced a repetition of the bloody scenes which had been acted by the sons of Vladimir: the Poles took advantage of the distracted state of affairs to make continual incursions and invasions; and the empire continued in the most deplorable situation till 1237, when it was totally subdued by the Tartars. Innumerable multitudes of these barbarians, headed by their khan, Batto, after ravaging great part of Poland and Silesia, broke suddenly into Russia, where they committed the greatest cruelties. At this time Vladimir II. was the grand duke, who, though he reached not the fame or authority of his ancestor, was acknowledged as czar by the Byzantine emperor Alexia Comnenus, and was the first whose brow was graced with the imperial crown of Russia.

George Sevoloditz succeeded his father, and built Moscow in 1147; but the ceaseless insurrections and calamities which had been weakening the strength of the Russian state since the death of Vladimir the Great, facilitated the enterprises of the Mongols; and after the death of George, who was killed in battle, the whole kingdom, with the exception of Novogorod, which preserved its independence by treaties, fell into the hands of the Mongols.

Hitherto the Russian state had made comparatively little progress in civilization; a circumstance to be attributed to the variety of nations of which it was composed, and to the military constitution of the Varangians. Commerce remained chiefly in the hands of those German merchants who had followed the Christian missionaries who came into Russia after the commencement of the 13th century; and the principal seats of this commerce were the towns of Novogorod and Kiof. The traffic with the south was mostly under the management of Greek merchants. From the time Christianity had been introduced there had been monasteries in Russia; and in these establishments the scanty literature of the age was preserved.

Though reduced to the most degrading servitude by their Asiatic conquerors, the Russians successfully resisted the attempts of new enemies, which appeared in the Livonians, the Teutonic knights, and the Swedes. Jarislans conquered Finland, but perished by poison among the Tartars. His son Alexander defeated the Danes and Swedes in 1241, in a great battle upon the Neva, and received for this action the appellation of Alexander Nevsky. His youngest son Daniel mounted the throne in 1247. He removed his residence to Moscow, and in 1296 assumed the title of grand duke of Moscow. This prince founded the celebrated palace of the Kremlin in that city, in 1300. Daniel was succeeded by his son George; who successfully resisted the Swedes, and built the town of Orshek, now Schlussenburg.

During several succeeding reigns the Russians had to contend, first, with the Tartars, and subsequently with the Livonians and Poles; the miseries of a foreign yoke being also aggravated by all the calamities of intestine discord. The Livonians took Pleskow; and the Poles made themselves masters of Black Russia, the Ukraine, Podolia, and the city of Kiof. Casimir the Great, one of their kings, carried his conquests still farther. He claimed a part of Russia, in right of his relation to Boleslaus, duke of Halitz, who took the duchies of Peremyssia, Halitz, and Luckow, and the districts of Sanock, Lubackow, and Trebowla; all which countries he made a province of Poland.

The newly conquered Russians were ill disposed to brook the government of the Poles, whose laws and customs were more contrary to their own than those of the Tartars had been. They joined the latter to rid themselves of the yoke, and assembled an army numerous enough to overwhelm all Poland, but destitute of valour and discipline. Casimir, undaunted by this deluge of barbarians, presented himself at the head of a few troops on the borders of the Vistula, and obliged his enemies to retire. Demetrius, who commanded in Moscow, made frequent efforts to rid himself of the galling yoke. He defeated in several battles Maymay, khan of the Tartars; and, when conqueror, refused to pay them any tribute, and assumed the title of grand duke of Muscovy. But the oppressors of the north appeared in greater numbers than before; and Demetrius, at length overpowered, after a struggle of three years, perished with his whole army, amounting to 240,000 men.

Basilius, (or Basilowitz) the son of Demetrius, revenged his father's death. He attacked his enemies, drove them out of his dominions, and conquered Bulgaria. He made an alliance with the Poles, whom he could not subdue; and even ceded to them a part of his country, on condition that they should help him to defend the rest against any new incursions of the Tartars. But this treaty was a weak barrier against ambition. The Russians found new enemies in their allies, and the Tartars soon returned. Basilius had a son of the same name, to whom the crown ought to have descended; but the father, suspecting his legitimacy, left it to his own brother, Gregory, a man of a severe and tyrannical disposition, and therefore hated by the people, who asserted the son's right, and proclaimed him their sovereign. The Tartars took cognizance of the dispute, and determined it in favour of Basilius; upon which Gregory had recourse to arms, drove his nephew from Moscow to the principality of Uglitz, and usurped his throne. Upon the death of Gregory, Basilius returned to Moscow; but Andrew and Demetrius, sons of the late usurper, laid siege to that city, and obliged him to retire to the monastery of Troits, where they took him prisoner, with his wife and son, and put out his eyes. The subjects of the unfortunate prince, incensed at the cruel treatment he received, forced the perpetrators of it to fly to Novogorod, and reinstated their lawful sovereign at Moscow, where he died. In the midst of this general confusion, John I., the son of Basilus (or as he is called in the Russian tongue, Ivan Basilowitz), by his invincible spirit and refined policy, became both the conqueror and deliverer of his country, and laid the first foundation of its future grandeur.

In this period the Cossacks arose. The Poles and Lithuanians had conquered the whole of the Western Russia to Kiof, and subjected the vanquished people to religious persecution, as well as political oppression; and on the east, the Tartars of the Crimea endeavoured to subdue the Russians. The discontented, therefore, retired into the fertile but uninhabited Ukraine, and adopted a military organization, under the control of a superior officer styled a hetman.

In the promotion of civilization, Ivan II. surpassed all his predecessors. German artists and learned men were welcomed and liberally rewarded by the czar; printing offices were established; and commerce was promoted by a treaty with Elizabeth of England in 1553. He established a standing army; conquered Kasan in 1552; the kingdom of Astracan in 1554, and endeavoured to drive the Teutonic Knights from Livonia; but Denmark, Poland, and Sweden attacked him, and a conspiracy in the interior broke out. In this embarrassment he implored the emperor Rodolph II. and pope Gregory XIII. to interfere; and the nuncio of the latter brought about the peace of Zapolia between Ivan II. and Stephen Bathory, king of Poland, in 1582, by which Livonia was ceded to Poland. Ivan died in 1594.

Towards the end of Ivan's reign, Yermack, a Cossack, discovered Siberia. Feodor, his successor, conquered Siberia entirely in 1587, and surrendered Ethonia to Sweden in 1598. Feodor, the last of Ruric's descendants, died in 1598; and Russia was shaken by internal convulsions and external wars, which greatly retarded her progress in civilization. The war of the Polish party with the party of the pseudo-Demetrius was not ended until Michael Fedorowitz (of the family of Romanoff) ascended the throne in 1613; after which a treaty of peace was concluded with Sweden and Poland.

The young Michael was proclaimed, and signed a compact with his new subjects, by which he promised to protect the established religion; to make no new laws, nor change the old; not to raise imposts; and to make neither war nor peace, without the consent of the senate. The Russians, or rather the senators, seized this opportunity to have a part of the government. Michael remained faithful to his promise; and died in 1654, leaving his throne to his son Alexis. So long as the Swedes maintained the ascendancy over the Russians, their principal view was directed to exclude that power from the possession of any port on the Baltic; being well aware that the natural advantages which their rival possessed, would, whenever that powerful empire should avail itself of them, raise the commercial consequence of Russia on the ruin of that of Sweden.

Alexis, the father of his country, was only sixteen years of age at his accession to the throne. The despotism and intolerance of his ministers drew upon him the hatred of the people during his minority; but when he took upon himself the government, he was both loved and respected. He encouraged an intercourse with foreign nations, and induced instructive and laborious strangers to people his desert provinces; and Russia, under him, began to be known to the principal powers of Europe and Asia. Ambassadors from China and Persia visited Moscow; and Alexis sent, for the first time, his ambassadors to France and Spain. More generous, or less politic, than the other monarchs, he refused to receive the ambassador of Cromwell, declaring that he never would acknowledge the pretended protector of England. He died in 1676.

Manufactures, arts, and military discipline were introduced in this active reign; and although an unsuccessful war was waged with Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, yet the boundaries of the empire were extended. Theodore, or Feodor, his son, succeeded, on the death of his father, in 1677; and after a beneficial reign which continued seven years, on his death-bed he nominated his half brother Peter, to the exclusion of his elder brother Ivan or John, whose imbecile mind disqualified him for the arduous task of government. Notwithstanding this, the intrigues of their sister Sophia, a restless and ambitious woman, stirred up civil commotions, which only subsided on the death of John, in 1696, when Peter became sole sovereign of all the Russian.

The private character of the czar was by no means so irreproachable as to lead his subjects to form any exalted notions of his future course; but, in spite of all disadvantages, he applied himself to the moral and political regeneration of his country. During the administration of the princess Sophia he had formed a design of establishing a maritime power in Russia; and at the very commencement of his reign he defeated the Turks, from whom he wrested the port of Azov, which opened to his subjects the commerce of the Black Sea. The first object of his ambition being thus attained, he resolved to carry out his design of making Russia the centre of trade between Europe and Asia—to connect the Volga, the Dwina, and the Don, by canals, thus opening a water communication between the northern seas and the Black and the Caspian seas. To complete this magnificent plan, he determined to build a city on the Baltic sea, which should be the emporium of northern commerce and the capital of his dominions. He did not, however, rely simply on this stupendous undertaking for carrying out his maritime and commercial plans. He felt that it was necessary for some of the young nobility to travel into foreign countries for improvement, not according to our notions of foreign travel, but for the express purpose of learning whatever was likely to be most useful to the country of their birth, either in cultivating the arts of peace, or in maintaining the discipline of war. He accordingly sent sixty young Russians into Italy; most of them to Venice, and the rest to Leghorn, in order to learn the art of constructing their galleys. Forty more were sent out by his direction into Holland, with the intention of instructing themselves in the art of building and working large ships; some were sent to Germany, to serve in the land-forces, and to learn the military discipline of that nation; while others were elsewhere dispatched in pursuit of whatever knowledge was likely to be rendered advantageous at home.

Nor did the patriotic emperor stop even there. Having established a regency to direct the government during his absence, he himself left his dominions, and travelled incognito through various European states. Having arrived at Amsterdam, he inscribed his name as Peter Michaeloff in the list of carpenters of the India Company. Here he performed all the duties of his situation; and at the intervals from labour, studied mathematics, fortification, navigation, and drawing plans. From Holland he came to England, where he completed his studies in ship-building, and examined the principal naval arsenals. King William permitted him to engage several ingenious English artificers, and he returned, by way of Holland and Germany, to Moscow, after an absence of nearly two years; having acquired a fund of knowledge which afterwards so much contributed to his country's glory.

He had no sooner arrived, than he was followed by crowds of every species of artisans, to whom he held out the greatest encouragement; and for the first time was seen large Russian vessels on the Baltic, on the Black Sea, and on the ocean. Architectural building began to rise among the Russian huts; colleges, academies, printing-houses, and libraries, sprung up under his fostering hand. The habits and customs changed by degrees, although with difficulty, and the Muscovites began to know something of civil society.

At the same time commerce had its birth in Russia. Laws, military and marine discipline, and manufactures, the sciences and fine arts, and all that appeared to him desirable in nature, was introduced. [The leading events of his war with Charles XII. being related in the history of Sweden, are here omitted.] Peter died, regretted by his subjects, in 1725; and was succeeded by his wife, the empress Catherine I., who supported the splendour of the empire, and held the sovereignty of Russia with a firm rule till her death, which happened two years after her elevation.

Peter II., grandson of Peter the Great, being only twelve years of age, then became czar. The reins of government, during this minority, were held by prince Menzikoff, whom the first Peter had advanced to the highest offices in the state, and who was no less the favourite of the czarina, Catherine. The young czar dying in 1730, Anne, duchess of Courland, niece to Peter the Great, and daughter of Ivan, ascended the throne, which she filled ten years. This empress rendered herself memorable by the decisive turn she gave to the contests which arose in Europe; she assisted the emperor Charles VI., frustrated the schemes of the French ministry for placing Stanislaus on the throne of Poland, and actually procured the crown for his competitor Augustus, at the same time that she triumphed over the Turks and Tartars, the natural competitors with Russia.

Ivan, or John III., great nephew to Anne, became her successor, when only two years of age. He was son of the princess Anne of Mecklenburg, the daughter of her eldest sister, who had married prince Anthony Ulrich of Brunswick Bevern. This infant was deposed by the general concurrence of all ranks in the empire; and the princess Elizabeth Petrowna, daughter to Peter the Great by the empress Catherine, was raised to the imperial dignity in December, 1741. was prosperous. In the war which broke out on the continent in 1756, she took a decided part in favour of the house of Austria; and was on the point of crushing the Prussian monarch, and possessing herself of his most valuable territories, when death suddenly closed her career, in 1762.

Her nephew, Charles Peter Ulric, duke of Holstein, grand duke of Russia now became czar, by the title of Peter III. The friendship which this prince bore to the king of Prussia saved that hero from his impending fate, and converted a formidable enemy into a beneficial auxiliary. An intemperate zeal, which led Peter to attempt cutting off the venerable beards of his clergy, and to abolish some established and favourite military fashions, joined to an unbounded fondness for a mistress, and a strong antipathy to his wife and son, terminated his reign in a few months.

The general odium which Peter III. had drawn upon himself, united all orders of his subjects against him; he was seized and deposed, and his wife raised to the imperial dignity, by the title of Catherine II., in July, 1762. The captive prince was soon after cruelly deprived of life. Some letters written by the king of Prussia to this weak prince, found after his decease, which strongly recommended to him a change of conduct, and particularly pleaded to behalf of his repudiated consort, fixed that princess in the interests of Frederic.

Catherine II. was notoriously licentious, yet her reign may be regarded as one of the most prosperous in the annals of Russia. As soon as she had relieved the country from an exhausting war, she invited artisans and workmen of all kinds to settle in her empire, and collected around her distinguished foreigners to assist her plans in the improvement of the laws, and to infuse a healthy vigour into the commerce of Russia. She was victorious by land and sea against the Porte, with whom she concluded a peace in 1774, whereby Russia gained a considerable accession of territory.

In 1776, Catherine divided her empire into separate governments. In 1780, she instituted the armed neutrality between Russia, the emperor of Germany, Prussia, and Portugal, against the naval power of the English; and, three years afterwards, she planned the expulsion of the Turks from Europe, and the re-establishment of the Byzantine empire; but some political considerations caused the execution of this project to be abandoned at the time, and when it was resumed, ten years later, it by no means succeeded to the extent that had been anticipated.

At the conclusion of the Turkish war in 1792, the Danube became the frontier of Russia towards Moldavia and Bessarabia; and as the war with Sweden was now converted into an alliance with that power, the ambitious empress again turned her eyes upon Poland, whither her army marched with the certainty of conquest; and on the occasion of the second partition, in 1793, a territory of 86,000 square miles was added to the Russian empire. On the remaining part of Poland she imposed the most oppressive restrictions, which produced a formidable rebellion in 1794. The gallant Kosciusko strove hard to effect the independence of his country, but he was overwhelmed by numbers and taken prisoner, while Suwarroff stormed and devastated with more than barbarian fury the suburbs of Warsaw. The dissolution of the kingdom was now at hand; and in the third partition of Poland, in 1795, Russia extended her power towards the west as far as the Vistula. It now extended itself from the shores of the Baltic to the western end of North America and the Japan islands. Yet, in the midst of her military operations, she protected and encouraged the arts and sciences, and gave a new code of laws to the subjects of her vast empire. She died November 17, 1796, and was succeeded by her son Paul I., who, capricious as he was, began his reign by a noble act of justice, namely, the liberation of the brave Kosciusko.

The late empress had engaged early in the confederacy against France; but, from some unexplained cause, did not come into action against that power. The emperor Paul likewise remained almost in a neutral state, until the beginning of the year 1799, when he sent a powerful army to the assistance of the allies into Italy, under the command of Suwarroff, a general well known before by his conquests and cruelties in Poland. The successes of this man were extraordinary during several months after his arrival in Italy; but towards the end of the campaign, his good fortune seemed to desert him; and it was not without great difficulty and loss, that he reached Germany across the Grisons country, harassed by the French armies under Moreau and Massena.

The ill success of the Russian arms against the French, augmented by the bad understanding which subsisted between his generals and those of Austria, appeared to have an extraordinary effect on the mind of the emperor Paul, who, from having been the uncompromising enemy of Buonaparte, now entered into amicable correspondence with him, and became one of his most ardent admirers. He laid an embargo on all the English vessels in his ports, and induced Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia to join him in the northern armed confederacy. But on the night of the 23rd of March, 1801, just at the time the British fleet was sailing through the Sound to the attack on Copenhagen, Paul was assassinated by some of the Russian nobility, whom he had treated with harshness and cruelty. How far his sons were cognizant of what was going on it is impossible to tell; but it was generally believed that they were in the secret, and connived at it from a conviction that their father intended to immure them in a fortress. And such an event was very probable, for there is little doubt of his being insane at the time.

IN MOST PARTS OF THE EMPIRE THERE IS NO MIDDLE CLASS, THE OCCUPIERS OF THE LAND BEING IN A STATE OF VASSALAGE.

THE TIME AND LABOUR OF THE SLAVES BELONGING TO PRIVATE INDIVIDUALS ARE ABSOLUTELY AT THE DISPOSAL OF THEIR MASTERS.

On Alexander, the late emperor's eldest son, succeeding to the throne, a degree of energy and consistency was soon seen in every department of the government; and separating himself from the northern league, he concluded a treaty with Great Britain (June 7, 1801), and at the same time renounced the grand-mastership of Malta, which had been conferred on his father. In June, 1802, he appeared, for the first time, personally among the potentates of Europe, and had an interview with the king of Prussia at Meacl. France, under the guidance of Napoleon, was at this period making rapid conquests in the south of Europe; Buonaparte having been, in the preceding month, crowned king of Italy at Milan; shortly after which he annexed Genoa to France. But the cabinet of St. Petersburg seems wisely to have thought that its distance from the scene of action might well excuse the emperor from any active interference with belligerent states. He, however, confirmed the incorporation of the government of Georgia with the Russian empire; concluded treaties of peace with France and Spain; and offered, in 1803, to interpose his good offices in restoring the newly ruptured peace between England and France and Spain. But after the execution of the duke D'Enghien all intercourse between Russia and France ceased; and in April, 1805, Alexander joined the third coalition against France; but the loss of the battle of Austerlitz clouded the prospects of the allies, and the Russian emperor returned to Petersburg.

The battle of Eylau was fought on the 8th of February, 1807; that of Friedland, on the 4th of June following; the Russians then retired, and after an interview between the two emperors, which took place on the river Niemen, in a handsome pavilion erected on a raft for the occasion, peace was concluded on the 8th of July, 1807. At this memorable interview the outward forms of friendship were displayed between these rival monarchs, and an abundance of courtly dissimulation used to testify the sincerity of their professions.

Alexander, by this compact, acknowledged the brothers of Buonaparte as kings respectively, of Naples, Holland, and Westphalia; he formally recognized also the confederation of the Rhine, and promised to acknowledge all the sovereigns who might hereafter become members of that confederation. He engaged, that hostilities on the part of Russia should instantly cease with the Ottoman Porte. He undertook, also, to mediate for a peace between England and France; and if he should prove unsuccessful, he was to close the ports of Russia against all British ships; which, in fact, was soon after done. In 1808, Alexander had an interview with Napoleon at Erfurth, and afterwards took part, as the ally of France, in the war with Austria; but his want of zeal in the cause was too evident to escape the penetration of the French emperor, and a growing coldness between the imperial allies began to appear.

Great injury had been done to Russian commerce, and heavy complaints made by merchants, in consequence of their ports having been shut against the English; they were therefore again opened to them, provided they hoisted American colours, while French goods were very strictly prohibited. This induced Napoleon to make himself master of the principal northern ports of Germany, and to incorporate the possessions of the duke of Oldenburg, a near relation of Alexander, with France. Against this proceeding Russia made a very energetic protest; and, as early as 1811, five Russian divisions assumed a position opposite Warsaw. On the other hand, Napoleon caused the fortresses on the Vistula and Oder to be declared in a state of siege, sent thither large masses of troops, and occupied Swedish Pomerania, because Charles XIII. of Sweden declined a closer connexion with France.

The contest in Spain was at this time daily growing more obstinate, and the large amount of men and money it consumed might well have appeared to Napoleon a sufficient obstacle to a struggle with Russia; but he calculated that his army, amounting to nearly a million of effective men, would be sufficient for the conflict in both quarters; and he also relied upon a great mass of auxiliary forces, chiefly promised by the confederation of the Rhine; besides his alliance with Prussia and Austria, which covered him on both flanks, and secured his retreat. He, however, made peaceable offers, through the count de Narbonne, his ambassador; but the object of his mission being unattained, half a million of soldiers, consisting of French, Germans, Italians, Poles, Swiss, Spaniards, and Portuguese, with more than 1200 cannon, were put in motion, about the end of July, to attack the Russians on the other side of the Niemen and the Vistula. The Russians, in three divisions, occupied a line including Kiof and Strolensko to Riga. The first western army of 127,000 men, in Lithuania and Courland, was commanded by Barclay de Tolly, who had till then been minister of war; the other western army, of 48,000 men, was commanded by prince Bagration. A third body of forces, led by general Dotoroff, served to keep up the communication between the other two.

All the disposable property and records had long before been generally conveyed into the interior. The first western Russian army was stationed along the Niemen as far as Grodno, and comprised six corps of infantry and two of cavalry. The second western army was in the vicinity of Hounim, consisting of four battalions of infantry and one of cavalry. The communication was kept between them by the hetman Platoff, with 10,000 Cossacks, at Bialystock. The army of Velhynia, under Tormasoff, at Lutsk, was composed of two divisions of infantry and one of cavalry, containing together about 20,000 men; and there were other corps stationed elsewhere, amounting to about 40,000 men more.

The Russian plan of the campaign was—by retreating, to avoid a decisive battle, until the enemy should be remote from all his resources, and weakened by marches through a desolate region, and the Russian army should be so considerably strengthened by the accession of all the forces that might be, meanwhile, raised, as to have a decided superiority. Napoleon's scheme, on the contrary, was—to use every effort to compel the Russians to battle, to destroy them after the defeat, and, pressing forward with haste to the capital, to proffer peace. But he not only entirely mistook the character of his enemy, but he overlooked the important fact, that though the Russians might retreat, they would still be in possession of their resources.

On the 6th of June, Napoleon passed the Vistula, and shortly after, the Niemen. "Russia," said he, in one of his favourite harangues, "is dragged along by a fatality! Her destinies must be accomplished.—Are we no longer to be regarded as the soldiers of Auusterlitz? Let us carry the war into her territory: a second war in Poland will be as glorious to the French arms as the first." After several severe battles, and the loss of many men on each side, the victory generally inclining in favour of the French, the main body of the Russian army retired to Smolensko. Fatigue, and want of all kinds, had meanwhile operated so detrimentally on the French army, that it was obliged to halt at this point for ten days, during which the two Russian armies finally formed a junction under the walls of Smolensko. They then immediately began to act on the offensive. With 12,000 cavalry they attacked general Sebastiani, and drove him back with considerable loss. On the 17th of August the main body put itself in motion to encounter the French army, which had advanced, in order, if possible, to compel a general battle. When Napoleon saw his attempts to surround the right wing of the Russians defeated, he ordered his right wing, under Poniatowski, to hasten, by way of Oriza, by rapid marches, to cut off the Russians from Moscow. On the other hand, Bagration hastened to defend this road, and Barclay de Tolly sought to retard the enemy as much as possible. Smolensko, an old place, formerly strongly fortified, and the whole position on the Dnieper, greatly favoured his plan; and not till the midnight of the 17th, after a loss of many thousands, did the French succeed in taking this bulwark, reduced, for the most part, to a ruin.

The Russian army retired in haste, burning all the towns through which it passed, while Napoleon followed, his troops suffering more and more from want and climate. Meanwhile, Barclay de Tolly had to resign the chief command to Kutusoff, who had reaped new laurels in the Turkish war just ended. Reinforced by militia and reserves, he resolved to await the enemy seventy miles from Moscow, in a strong entrenched position. The French came up, and a terrible battle ensued, in which the Russians lost 25,000 men. The French estimated their own loss at 10,000; it was, however, supposed to be nearer double that number. The Russians remained masters of the field of battle; and, without any great loss of artillery, and still less of prisoners, they were able to retire to Moscow. Napoleon, after two days repose, followed them; and Kutusoff, instead of awaiting his enemy at the gates of Moscow, marched through.

The news of Kutusoff's defeat had spread the greatest consternation at Moscow. Hastily collecting their money and valuables, the nobles fled, abandoning their palaces and furniture to the mercy of the invaders. Merchants and tradesmen closed their warehouses and shops, seeking refuge from the enemy wherever they could find shelter; the sick and wounded were conveyed away from the hospitals in waggons; and the prisons were cleared of their inmates, who were sent under an escort to Novogorod. And now the flames burst forth from the house of count Rostopchin—sure and awful evidence that the patriotic governor, by setting fire to his own residence, intended that the venerable city should not harbour the enemies of his country. The conflagration of the governor's house was the signal for the rest; and suddenly were seen, issuing from various quarters of Moscow, vivid columns of fire and dense masses of smoke. Doomed, as it were, to pass their winter amid the unhospitable snows of Russia unless they could extinguish the flames, the French soldiery exerted themselves to the utmost to stay the devouring element; but though they partially succeeded, so little remained of Moscow, that it was incapable of affording them protection. It must be remembered, also, that the French troops having had permission to plunder the city, such a scene of confusion and drunkenness followed, that numbers of them perished in the burning ruins.

All the hopes which Napoleon had built on the possession of Moscow were now disappointed; famine and desolation stared him in the face; and as the Russians gathered round on all sides, it was evident that nothing could save his army but a speedy retreat or peace. Every day heightened their sufferings, the provisions having been wasted, and foraging becoming continually more dangerous, from the conflux of Russian peasants and Cossacks. At length, on the 19th of October the French evacuated Moscow, and commenced their retrograde march. The country was a desert; and the privations felt by the army had dissolved all bonds of obedience, while the severity of the winter now covered the roads with ice and snow, destroying men and horses by thousands. By the 12th of November they reached Smolensko. But in vain had the remnants of the army hoped to find there repose and nourishment. But the increasing numbers of the Russians who hovered round and harassed the retreating enemy prevented them from repairing any of their vast losses, or of reinvigorating themselves by rest. At the passage of the Beresina they lost 20,000 men, and a great part of their baggage and artillery; and the cold, which increased every day, together with the most horrible want, carried disorder, misery, and despair to the highest pitch. At length Napoleon entrusted the command of his shattered army to Murat, and hastened himself, under the strictest incognito, by way of Warsaw and Dresden, to Paris. Marshals, officers of high and low rank—all who could—followed the example of their emperor. No company kept long together. The sole object of all was to save life.

The emperor Alexander, who had hitherto only fought for independence, now resolved in his turn to become the aggressor; and, joining his army in Poland, published in February, 1813, the celebrated manifesto, which served as a basis for the coalition of the other powers of Europe against the rapacity of the French. The king of Prussia at the same time summoned all capable of bearing arms to battle for their country; and though he did not then designate his object, his people, who for five years had been humbled and degraded, understood him, and, with unparalleled enthusiasm, thousands poured forth from the places of rendezvous from every section of the country. In vain had the French, with the aid of their last reserves and of troops drawn together in haste, made efforts to remain on the Pregel, on the Vistula, and on the Oder. The Russians advanced slowly indeed, but every where with overwhelming power; and all that the French could do was to retire behind the Elbe with the least possible loss. Prussia now declared war against France, and concluded an alliance with Russia; the confederation of the Rhine was dissolved; and, though Austria remained neutral, the popular insurrection was almost universal in northern Germany. Happily for Napoleon, the Prussians and Russians were not in a state to derive the full advantage from this situation of things. The forces of the Russians were almost exhausted, those of the Prussians had first to be formed; much time was lost in negotiations with the king of Saxony, and Kutsoff fell sick and died at Bunzlau. These circumstances were promptly taken advantage of by Napoleon; but though this prolonged the contest, it proved but of little avail in the sequel.

In August the war was resumed with great vigour, Austria participating in it as an ally of Russia and Prussia. Napoleon had been joined by a corps of chosen men, chiefly cavalry, which had come from Spain; and the chances of victory, for a time, once more appeared to be in his favour. But after the battle of Dresden, where Moreau was mortally wounded, he was staid in his progress by the defeat of Vandamme, at Culm; by the simultaneous overthrow of his army in Silesia, under Macdonald; by the hard-fought battles at Gross-Beeres, at Belzig; and by the defeat which Ney suffered at Deunewitz. In addition to these misfortunes, want of all kinds prevailed in the hospitals, where thousands died of dysenteries and fevers. At last, by some rapid, well-considered marches, Blucher formed a junction on the Elbe with the crown-prince of Sweden, while he surprised a French corps under count Bertrand, and took up a position between the Muldan and the Elbe. As soon as he was advised of this, Napoleon started from Dresden, in the hope of overpowering them both separately; but they had already crossed the Muldan to the Saale. The great Bohemian army had also advanced on his right flank. These and Blucher's dying corps met in his rear; and general Thielemann, who had exchanged the Saxon service for the Russian, took whole troops of French fugitives, and fought several battles between the Elster and the Saale, almost all of which resulted to the disadvantage of the French.

Napoleon now proceeded with his main army to the plains of Leipzig, where he arrived October 13. Here Schwartzberg had already commenced a reconnaissance against the king of Naples; meanwhile Angerau's division had been greatly reinforced; and, as he had probably thought he had deceived the crown-prince and Blucher by movements made on the other side of Wittenberg, and that he had gained so much time that he could meet the great Bohemian army alone in a decisive engagement, he did not delay to encounter it in the spacious plain near Leipzig. The engagement commenced about nine o'clock in the morning of October 16. After severely destructive attacks on both sides, Napoleon had gained some ground in the centre and on the left wing. But the duke of Ragusa, who occupied a wide line to the north of Leipzig, was unexpectedly attacked by Blucher with the greatest impetuosity, totally defeated, after an obstinate resistance, and driven back in disorder.

On the 17th Napoleon negotiated through count Meerveldt, who had been taken prisoner, for liberty to retire undisturbed, and for an armistice; both of which proposals were the less listened to, because the allies could now conduct their operations with a mutual understanding, the crown-prince of Sweden having joined Blucher with upwards of 60,000 men, and general Bennigsen, with almost as many, being hourly expected from Grimma. On the 18th of October, therefore, a fearful conflict took place at Leipzig. The French fought with desperation, to save their honour and secure their retreat, which had been commenced at day-break; but on the following day their retreat was converted into a flight, and a general overthrow. This battle emancipated Germany. Bavaria had already renounced the confederation of the Rhine, and united with Austria. All the German princes followed this example, with the exception of the king of Saxony, Jerome of Westphalia, and the prince-primate. After the loss of many thousands, in prisoners and wounded, Napoleon, assailed or harassed in every quarter, was obliged, in order to gain the Rhine, to sustain a desperate conflict with the Bavarians and Austrians stationed at Mannau. The allies made a halt on the Rhine, in order to unite the forces of liberated Germany with those furnished by England and Holland. Even the Danes, who had been forced to form the closest union with Napoleon, in consequence of the hard terms proffered them by England and Sweden in the spring of 1813, were obliged to concede all that they had formerly refused.

French affairs in Spain had also taken a most unfavourable turn. Marshal Jourdan had been totally defeated by Wellington at Vittoria, had been forced back to the Pyrenees, with the loss of his artillery; and, subsequently, Soult and Suchet had with difficulty kept the English from the soil of France itself, and it was consequently necessary to send thither new forces. The French senate, always before obsequious enough, now ventured to remonstrate, when repeated decrees of the emperor had already ordered the levy of nearly half a million of conscripts, the organization of cohorts of national guards, and the formation of four armies of reserve. Still stronger terms of dissatisfaction were used by some of the deputies; and, in consequence of the general indignation at the enormous expenditure of human life, great difficulties now presented themselves in the formation of a new French army.

Beyond the Rhine from Switzerland to Holland, the allies found but little resistance. They made themselves masters of all the passes to Italy, of the cities of Geneva, of the roads over the Simplon and St. Bernard, and early in January they occupied a new line, covered on the left by the Seine, on the right by the Meuse, in Alsace, Louvain, Douai, Paris, &c., with the exception of the invested fortresses. Napoleon had issued a proclamation for a kind of general rising of the people; but measures of this kind, which worked wonders in the revolution, were now almost wholly disregarded. Meanwhile the allied troops steadily advanced, and though several engagements took place, in no instance had a French general strength enough to maintain the most important points against the overwhelming force of the invaders.

On the 1st of February was fought the sanguinary battle of Brienne, in which Napoleon lost 12,000 prisoners and seventy-three cannon. He had 70,000 men in the field, and no blame can attach to either them or their commander for the loss of the day; the most desperate resistance on the part of the troops, and the most active superintendence on the part of Napoleon being everywhere apparent. Eager to improve their first victory on French ground, the allies pushed forward, and divided their forces, of which Napoleon, with great boldness and address, took advantage. But, though he had received considerable reinforcements from the army in Spain, he was too much enfeebled to prevent the Russians, Austrian and Prussian commanders from proceeding towards Paris in two large columns, one on the Seine, the other on the Marne.

The operations of the allied troops from this period, and the important consequences which followed, having already been detailed in previous portions of this volume, we deem it unnecessary to pursue the subject farther. In all the transactions which took place relative to the abdication of Buonaparte, the occupation of Paris, &c., the emperor Alexander took the lead; and with noble magnanimity, as if oblivious of the wrongs his own country had received, he endeavoured to allay those feelings of vengeance in some of his allies which, without such humane consideration, might have laid the French capital in ashes, and have given rise to a new war far more dreadful than the one which he had been so instrumental in bringing to a glorious termination.

As it was considered necessary, after all the violent changes on the continent of Europe, that the boundaries of each sovereign should be permanently fixed, a congress of the sovereigns and ministers of the principal powers was held at Vienna. This being a favourite idea of the emperor Alexander, and principally emanating from him, he took the most prominent part in it. But in the interval between the abdication of Napoleon and the meeting of congress, Alexander, accompanied by the king of Prussia and several distinguished foreigners in their respective suites, paid a visit to the prince regent of England, by whom as well as by the people at large they were received with every token of respect and hearty welcoming.

But before any final arrangements were made by the allied powers, the congress was suddenly broken up, in consequence of the return of Buonaparte from Elba to France. The allied armies of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, once more prepared to take the field; but the English, Belgians, and Prussians, at the battle of Waterloo, decided the fate of Europe, and for ever sealed the fate of him who had so long been its tyrant and disturber.

It is now necessary to revert to the affairs of Russia, in connection with the Ottoman empire, as they existed previous to the French invasion. It had been a favourite scheme of ambition with Catherine II. to expel the Turks from Europe; with that view she had sought every opportunity, however frivolous the pretence, of engaging them in hostilities; and as the Turks were generally worsted, Russia gradually acquired some new territory, and a greater influence over the Sublime Porte. The Russians had also been at war with Persia. By the peace of Bucharest, signed in May,

LECTURES ON AGRICULTURE, AND THE APPLICATION OF SCIENCE TO ART, ARE ENCOURAGED, BUT POLITICAL SUBJECTS ARE STRICTLY FORBIDDEN.

1812, the former power ceded to Moldavia as far as the Pruth, Bessarabia and the chief mouths of the Danube; the peace of Tilsit, in 1813, with the latter, gained her all the territory west of the Caspian sea, between the Kur and the Anaxes, Georgia having been united before with Russia; and on the east coast as far as the Gulf of Balkan, with the exclusive navigation of the Caspian sea. The Russian empire having become so extensive and formidable, Alexander took every means, by founding and supporting the holy alliance, to maintain his high position. After the conquest of Aix-la-Chapelle, Russia appears to have discovered that her influence over Europe would be best promoted by the continuance of peace, which would enable her to develop those resources which make a country formidable in war; and to that end Alexander re-organized almost the whole interior of his empire.

Among other matters that were settled at the congress of Vienna, it was determined that Poland should be annexed to the Russian empire, with a separate government; and Alexander was accordingly crowned king of Poland. The remainder of his reign was spent in the most laudable exertions for the benefit of his people. The abuses which were practised in all departments, civil, military, and judicial, required a degree of resolution and perseverance to correct; and the emperor set about this work of reformation with all the honesty and zeal of a patriot prince. He made frequent tours through his provinces, in order to be an eye-witness of the local administration of the laws; and he neglected no opportunity of improving the general condition of his subjects, and of abolishing vassalage; but the resistance made to his benevolent exertions in this latter measure prevented him from carrying out his intentions to any great extent. He, however, encouraged the arts and literature, and effected many salutary changes in the condition of the people, while he patronized commerce, encouraged manufactures, and promoted the diffusion of knowledge, by means of the press, which was protected by a careful censorship from the pestilential effects of licentiousness in morals, and of sedition in politics.

The emperor Alexander died Dec. 1, 1825, at Taganrock, a town, founded by Peter the Great, on the sea of Azof. He was succeeded by Nicholas, — the grand duke Constantine, afterwards viceroy of Poland, having renounced his right to the throne of Russia, according to a previous arrangement. A conspiracy soon after broke out when the regiments of the guard, who had taken the oath to Constantine immediately after Alexander's death, refused to take the oath to Nicholas, and a tumult ensued, which was suppressed at last by the mingled firmness and moderation of the emperor. On the matter being afterwards investigated, it appeared that it was the result of a conspiracy which had existed for years; and different punishments were assigned, according to the degrees of guilt of the parties implicated; some being executed, some banished to Siberia, and others imprisoned; but the far greater number were pardoned.

Soon after Alexander's death, a war with Persia broke out, in consequence of disputes arising from the non-settlement of certain boundaries between Russia and that power. Abbas Mirza, who had just then succeeded to the throne of Persia, thinking the moment propitious for attacking Russia, at once marched over the frontier, and advanced as far as Elizabethpol; but the Persians were defeated, and driven back. War was now immediately declared against them, and general Paskewitch, being appointed commander-in-chief, passed the Araxes, took several strong fortresses, entered ancient Media with no opposition, and forced the shah to sue for peace, compelling him to give up an extensive territory on the south-western shore of the Caspian sea, with some provinces on the Caucasus, besides making them pay the expenses of the war, and the losses by the invasion.

The Caucasus consists of two parallel chains of mountains in western Asia, covering the country between the Black and the Caspian seas. They extend nearly seven hundred miles, and are rendered almost impassable by rushing torrents, steep precipices, and frightful avalanches. The summits of these mountains are covered with perpetual snow, and are mostly barren, but the lower parts are clothed with thick forests, and the plains abound in orchards, vineyards, corn fields, and pastures. It comprises the provinces of Georgia, Circassia, Melitania, Great and Little Kabarda, Daghestan, which is the mountain-land bordering on the Caspian sea, and Schirvan, called the Paradise of Roses, from the abundance of beautiful flowers which grow there spontaneously. The tribes who dwell in the higher regions of the Caucasus, especially the Lezgians, who inhabit the most eastern parts, live by plundering their neighbours, and are held in such terror, that several tribes purchase immunity from their depredations by paying them tribute.

The war with Persia was scarcely ended when Turkey engaged the attention of the Russian government, and the Russian minister, Nesselrode, declared to France and Great Britain, that his sovereign must have satisfaction for the violation of the treaty of Ackermann, and for the hatti-sherif of Deceubher, 1820, which the Porte had addressed to all the pachas, and which contained many offensive charges against Russia. A declaration of war was accordingly issued by the emperor, and on the 7th of May, 1828, the Russian forces passed the Pruth, to the number of 15,000 men, including persons of all descriptions attached to the camp. Count Wittgenstein was commander-in-chief. In a fortnight the Russians had possession of several towns and fortresses, and the Turks retired into the fortified mountain position of Choumla, which was the centre of their operations.

The Russians at length took Prawodi, the key of the Balkan; and their next aim was to gain possession of Varna. To carry on a siege in a vast and almost uninhabitable country like Bulgaria, under the fatal influence of the climate, the difficulty was great, but in proportion as the difficulties were great, so were the exertions of the besiegers, and after it had been invested both on the land and sea sides, breaches were made, and a body of troops forced their way into the city. Terrified by this, the enemy gave up all further resistance.

The campaign in Asia proved successful. The predatory population on the Caucasian mountains submitted to Russia. The Russian army under count Paske-witch forced its way from Caucasus and Ararat into Asiatic Turkey, and took by storm the strong fortress of Khars, the central point of Turkish Armenia, together with the enemy's camp. After this, several other fortresses fell into their hands, so that besides obtaining possession of Mingrelia and Imiretia, the whole pachalic of Bajasid, as far as the banks of the Euphrates, was conquered. In Europe the success of the Russians was more equivocal; the results of the whole, however, were important. In Europe and in Asia, Russia had gained two Turkish principalities and three pachalics, fourteen fortresses, and three castles.

The Russian emperor had repeated, during and after the campaign, as well as before it, to the British ambassador extraordinary, lord Heytesbury, his inclination for peace with the Porte, on the terms of indemnification for the expenses of the war, and security against future injuries and violations of treaties; but the Porte had rejected all mediation on the basis of the London treaty, and refused to send envoys to negotiate with the ambassadors of the three powers, and the commissioners of the Greeks. On the contrary, Mahmoud had announced a new campaign, with the words, "Honour and independence are worth more than life." Hitherto the negotiations had been carried on in Constantinople, with the reis effendi, by the minister of the Netherlands. He had delivered to the reis effendi the manifesto of France, Great Britain, and Russia, (of August 11, 1829), which made known to the Porte the motive and object of the French expedition against the Morea. The Prussian ambassador likewise advised the Porte to yield; but no representations would induce the sultan to yield; and preparations for another campaign were made with unusual vigour.

In the beginning of 1829 general Diebitch was appointed commander-in-chief of the Russian forces; and although the Turkish army was greatly reinforced, and under the command of officers of high renown and unquestionable bravery, the Russian generals Diebitch and Paskewitch proved too much for them. The latter took possession of Erzerum, the centre of the Turkish power in Asia. The seraskier, commander-in-chief of the whole Turkish army, and governor of all Asiatic Turkey, was taken prisoner, together with four principal pachas, and 150 pieces of cannon. But the sharpest contest of the Asiatic campaign was occasioned by the pachas of Van to retake the fortress of Bajasid. The attack was made with 7000 infantry and 5000 cavalry, aided by the fire from a battery, on a range of rocks, which swept the Russian troops on the flank and rear, and the fire of musketry from the inhabitants of the Tartar villages of the place. After thirty-two hours of incessant fighting, the Turks retreated. The career of Paskewitch in this campaign had been one of continual success; and such had been his preceding campaign in Persia.

The campaign in the European provinces was still more successful. Several battles were fought in the spring, in which the Russians, under Diebitch, generally had the advantage, European tactics giving him a decided superiority. At length Silistria surrendered, and the garrison of 10,000 men became prisoners of war; 220 pieces of cannon, eighty standards, and the whole of the Turkish flotilla, falling into the hands of the Russians. Diebitch now hastened to cross the Balkan, and continued his march without any serious obstacles, except such as the excessive heat of the weather, &c. presented, till he reached Adrianople, which he took on the 20th of July.

Foiled at every point, the Porte was now ready to commence negotiations; and accordingly a treaty of peace was signed, the principal points of which were the cessation of hostilities; the restoration by Russia of the principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia, and of all the towns occupied by the Russians in Bulgaria and Rometia; the settlement of the boundaries between the two powers in Europe and Asia; the provisions for the religious liberty, independent administration, and free trade of the people of Moldavia and Wallachia; freedom of commerce to Russian subjects throughout the Ottoman empire, as secured by former treaties; free commerce and navigation of the Black Sea to all nations at peace with the Porte; the stipulation of the Porte to pay 1,500,000 ducats of Holland to Russia within eighteen months, as an indemnification for losses of Russian subjects, and a further sum, such as should be agreed on, as an indemnity for the expenses of the war; with the accession of the Porte to the arrangements of Russia, Great Britain, and France, respecting Greece. Thus the emperor Nicholas, according to the pledge which he had given to his allies at the commencement of the war, stopped short in the career of conquest, when he had obtained the objects for which the war was professedly undertaken.

THE HISTORY OF POLAND.

Most countries have some positive origin attributed to them, and handed down to present times by tradition, although no trace of a written history may be found; it is not so, however, with Poland. In the time of the Romans it is likely to have been an unexplored part of the great Hercynian forest; and such inhabitants as it contained probably belonged to the Sarmatians, a nation of barbarians more fierce and savage than any of the other hordes with whom the civilized conquerors of Europe had to contend in their work of universal subjugation. But be that as it may, it seems clear that Poland either afforded no materials for the historian, or the country produced no writer to record its history, for a considerable time after the other nations of Europe emerged from obscurity. It appears, indeed, that an army of Slavonians, under the command of Lesko, took possession of the country, A.D. 550, and that this leader became the first of a race of kings, who held the sovereign power for a century.

The next dynasty of kings is distinguished by the name of its first sovereign, and called the dynasty of Piast; but nothing worthy of notice is preserved, until Jagellon, grand duke of Lithuania, obtained the sovereignty of Poland in the year 1385. On his being elected king, he renounced the doctrines of Paganism, to which he had before adhered, and embraced Christianity; from which time it spread rapidly among the Poles. This prince united the whole of his hereditary dominions to those of Poland; in return for which the Poles rendered the crown hereditary in his family; but his male line terminated in the person of Sigismund Augustus, in 1572. Two competitors then started for the vacant crown; Henry, duke of Anjou, brother to Charles IX. of France, and Maximilian of Austria. After a long conflict, the former of these obtained the prize; but on the death of his brother, he succeeded to the crown of France, and abandoned that of Poland.

From this reign we may date the correspondence between the French and the Poles, which subsisted until the increasing power of its northern neighbours entirely counteracted the politics of the court of Versailles. On this second vacancy, Maximilian was still rejected; and Stephen Batori, prince of Transylvania, chosen on account of the high renown which he had acquired. He married Anne, the sister of Sigismund Augustus, of the royal house of Jagellon, which rendered him highly popular. He waged war with the Muscovites, and recovered from them all that they had formerly taken from the Poles; after which he settled the Ukraine, which, in the Polish language, signifies the frontier, and which was at that time a wild and unprofitable desert. He it was that introduced military tenure into Poland, by which he formed the best cavalry in the world. He likewise established a militia, composed of Cossacks, which soon became a respectable body of infantry. These Cossacks he settled in the Ukraine. Having performed these essential services to the kingdom which he governed, he died in 1586.

Theodore, czar of Russia; Maximilian, archduke of Austria; and Sigismund, prince of Sweden, now severally put forth claims and contended for the crown. The year after, Sigismund, having defeated and taken prisoner his rival Maximilian, became too formidable for Theodore; and established himself on the throne by the name of Sigismund III. He was a zealous papist, and waged a long and unsuccessful war with his native country, Sweden; but in his wars with the Turks he was more fortunate. He reigned forty-four years, and was succeeded by his eldest son Uladislavus VII., who was chosen the 13th of November, 1632. He was successful against the Turks, the Russians, and the Swedes, and died in 1648. In his reign the interests of the Polish nobility clashing with the grants which had been made to the Cossacks in the Ukraine, a fierce contention arose. His brother, John Casimir, succeeded him, although a cardinal. The elector of Brandenburg, in this reign, found means to obtain from the Poles a renunciation of their sovereignty over Ducal Prussia, which he held as a vassal of the crown of Poland. This renunciation was ratified by the treaty of Oliva in 1660. Casimir then attempting to gain an uncontrollable and absolute sovereignty in Poland, excited a civil war; and in the issue his army was defeated by prince Lubomirski. He afterwards found means, however, to drain the country of its current specie, which he remitted to France; and being no longer able to maintain his footing in Poland, he precipitately quitted the kingdom, and followed his wealth. In this state of voluntary exile he made a formal renunciation of the crown, and died two years after.

On the resignation of Casimir, four candidates appeared; namely, the great prince of Russia; the duke of Newbourg, who was supported by the interests of France; the duke of Lorraine, who was backed by the German power; and the son of the prince of Condé; but it was soon found that the content lay between the dukes of Newbourg and Lorraine. The palatine Opalenki, however, by popular harangues, had the address to set them both aside, and procure the election of prince Michael Wisniewski, in 1670, who reckoned his descent from a brother of Jagellon. He was chosen to the royal dignity as being a Piast, a title highly respected in Poland, and signifying a nobleman who can trace his descent through a long line of Polish ancestors; but being a weak prince, the Turks took advantage of his incapacity, invaded Poland, and took Kamienieck, the capital of Podolia. Michael did not long enjoy his dignity; he died three years after his elevation, at the very time when Sobieski, the Polish general, had gained a great and decisive victory over the Turks. Another contention then arose about a successor; but at length the diet unanimously chose John Sobieski for their king, who maintained a war against the Turks, although ill seconded by the nobility; and in 1678, at the head of no more than 5,000 men, he defeated 60,000 Turks and Tartars: after which, receiving a reinforcement of 10,000 troops, he drove 100,000 of the enemy out of Podolia, and was crowned at Cracow, in February, 1678.

The Turks by these defeats were brought to acquiesce in terms of peace, which were observed during seven years: but in 1683 the Ottomans invaded Hungary, and laid siege to Vienna. The neighbouring princes being roused to action by the impending danger, put their forces under the command of Sobieski, whose army mustered 40,000 strong; with which force he attacked and defeated the infidels, whose numbers were little short of 200,000. This decisive stroke restored peace: but the great military talents of the king, joined to his extreme parsimony, created jealousies among the Polish nobility, of his having formed designs of changing the constitution of the kingdom, and rendering himself an absolute monarch. These apprehensions, which were never supported by any direct proofs, embittered his latter days. He died in 1696, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, and the twenty-second of his reign. He left a son, prince James Sobieski, whom, however, the Poles did not nominate for their king.

An interregnum of a twelvemonth followed: at length Frederic Augustus, elector of Saxony, was chosen, in preference to the prince of Conti, whose pretensions were backed by the interests of France: but in 1705, the Poles being tampered with by Charles XII. of Sweden, declared the crown vacant, and chose Stanislaus Lesenski, palatine of Posnania; to establish whom on the throne, Charles of Sweden entered Saxony with a powerful army, and compelled Augustus to save his electorate by abandoning his pretensions to the crown of Poland. The reverse of fortune which Charles experienced in 1708, gave Augustus the ascendancy; and his competitor found it necessary, in his turn, to quit the kingdom. Disputes and ill-will, however, prevailed between Augustus and the nobility, from this time until his death, which happened in January, 1733-3.

Whether the house of Austria, or that of Bourbon, should fix the succession to the throne of Poland, then plunged Europe into war. The former supported the pretensions of Augustus, the son of the deceased king; in which nomination the court of St. Petersburg also concurred: the latter aimed at restoring the abdicated Stanislaus, whose daughter, the princess Mary, was married to Louis XV. Notwithstanding this alliance, his interest was not vigorously supported by the court of Versailles; and he was finally driven out of Poland, possessed of nothing more than the empty title of king; he, however, gained the duchy of Lorraine and Bar, which he enjoyed the remainder of his life. Stanislaus died in January, 1766, having attained to the great age of eighty-nine years. He was distinguished for his talents and virtues; his humanity was active, and displayed itself in many noble instances of kindness and generosity. Though deprived of the crown of Poland, he expressed his strong attachment to the prosperity of that country, and his thorough knowledge of its interests, in a work which he wrote and published in the year 1759, entitled, La Vois Libre du Citoyen: ou Observations sur le Gouvernement du Pologne.

Frederic Augustus, elector of Saxony, was chosen king of Poland in September, 1733, in the forty-sixth year of his age. He was the third king of that name. He married Maria Josepha, daughter of the emperor Joseph I. In the winter of 1745, the king of Prussia attacked him in his hereditary dominions, made himself master of Dresden, and forced the elector to accept such conditions of peace as were proffered. In 1756, the king of Poland having secretly become a party in a confederacy formed by the empress queen and the king of France, to strip the king of Prussia of the province of Silesia, the unfortunate Augustus suddenly fell a victim to the resentments of that monarch, who took possession of Dresden, his capital, and compelled his whole army, consisting of 13,000 men, to surrender prisoners of war; after which he experienced the most bitter calamities. His queen, whose every motion was narrowly watched by the emissaries of the Prussian monarch, died of a broken heart; whilst the designs which the king had formed for the advancement of his family, by procuring for one of his sons the dukedom of Courland, and for another the bishopric of Liege, were entirely frustrated. Worn down with years as well as with sorrows, he resigned his breath on the 5th of October, 1763, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and the thirtieth year from his election to the crown of Poland.

The son of Augustus declared himself a candidate for the vacant crown; but he died of the small-pox in less than two months after. Count Poniatowski, on account of his eminent merit, was unanimously elected king, on the 7th of September, 1764, without any commotion or disturbance. The powers of Russia, Prussia, and Turkey, supported his pretensions. The ambassadors of France, Spain, and the empire, who opposed his election, retired from Waraw, when the diet assembled. He took the name of Stanislaus Augustus. The new king had not long sat upon the throne, before some Russian troops entered his kingdom on the plea of procuring a toleration and other privileges for the oppressed and persecuted "dissidents," who were of the Greek church, and also for the Lutheran and other reformed Christians. The bitter enmity which subsisted between the Roman catholics and the dissidents, kindled the flame of a fierce, bloody, and desolating civil war, which raged during the years 1769, 1770, and 1771; in the midst of which, the miserable Poles were visited with the pestilence, which swept off 250,000 of the population. The part which the king of Poland took against the dissidents, caused a conspiracy to be formed to assassinate him, in November, 1771; from which attempt upon his life he escaped almost by a miracle. Many of the conspirators lost their lives by the hands of the executioner.

Amongst the Poles the love of freedom had long prevailed, without the spirit of union. A kingdom fertile and extensive as that of Poland, torn by intestine commotions, and unprovided with the means of self-defence, presented a most alluring prospect to its powerful neighbours. The censures which have been passed on the great southern kingdoms of Europe, for the tameness and unconcern with which they looked on and saw a noble kingdom mutilated, are in reality unmeaning charges. Had the states of the empire, France, and the maritime powers, joined in a heterogeneous league with the courts of Stockholm and Copenhagen; had they even engaged the Ottomans in the alliance, what could their feeble exertions have availed, toward securing Poland from the depredations of three powers capable of bringing five or six hundred thousand men into the field? Fleets would have been ineffectual in a contest carried on in the centre of Europe. These confederating powers could have brought no force equal to that possessed by the partitioning princes. In fact, the latter, by their union, had effectually prevented all attempts to form an opposition capable of thwarting their designs.

It is needless to mention the frivolous and obscure claims which were set up by the three partitioning powers, to the territories which they designed to appropriate; it is sufficient to describe the countries which were thus forcibly wrested. The claims of Austria comprehended the southern parts of Little Poland, and the whole of Red Russia, with Procutia. The royal salt mines at Wieluska, Bochnia, and other places in Little Poland were comprehended in the territory thus seized. The produce of these mines supplied the king with a part of his private revenue. The whole of the territory wrested by Austria contains about three hundred miles from east to west, and two hundred from north to south. The district seized upon by the empress of Russia, was the whole of Polish Lithuania, and that part of Lithuania which borders on the Russian empire, and extending over that duchy even beyond the river Beresina; the whole lying under more than four degrees of latitude, but much less considerable in width. The king of Prussia took possession of all the western parts of Pomerania, bounded on the southward by the river Netz, together with the whole of Polish Prussia; the cities of Danzig and Thorn only excepted. To this territory he gave the name of New Prussia. As these countries form the southern shores of the Baltic, and give the command of the Vistula, they were highly important to a monarch, whose dominions, before this acquisition, could not furnish a deep, convenient, and capacious harbour for shipping. The political views of the king of Prussia thereby became much enlarged, being directed to commercial and maritime objects.

The inhabitants of the countries thus dismembered were required, by the manifestos, to take oaths of allegiance and fidelity to their new sovereigns, within a very short space of time, on pain of forfeiting their estates. The independent spirit of the Polish nobility could ill brook such mandates; many chose rather to abandon their country and estates, and submit to voluntary exile; carrying with them such parts of their property as the short time allotted them would enable them to collect. The confiscation of these estates was an object of great consequence to each sovereign; it being a cruel policy constantly practised by invaders and usurpers, to oppress and ruin the native nobility, in order to provide for their own adherents. The empress of Russia, however, conducted these proscriptions with less severity than her two confederates. This memorable event took place in September, 1772.

The king of Poland, unable to make any effectual opposition to these violent acts of power, was at length induced to give his sanction to the partition, by being put into possession of a rich territory, which was rendered hereditary in his family; and which was guaranteed by the three courts; besides which, a large sum of money, was presented to him, as the farther price for this his sacrifice of duty to tyranny. Still, however, to add insult to injury, a diet was called; the members of which, by the most undisguised violence, were compelled to give their votes to ratify the alienation of so great a part of the kingdom. It was thought, however, that this change of government, though brought about without any colour of justice, or plausible claim of right, might, after the convulsions caused by its first establishment had subsided, tend to enlarge the sum of human happiness in those districts, as well as to render the country more wealthy and flourishing, as the oppressions of the nobility were likely to be greatly restrained, and the condition of the peasantry to be considerably amended.

That the three great northern powers should concur in the design of dismembering Poland, by mutually acknowledging and supporting each others' claims, appeared so essentially necessary to the accomplishment of the purpose, that each became disposed to lay aside those jealousies and bickerings which subsisted against the others; and for the sake of furthering its own particular interest, to assist in strengthening its rivals. To the empress of Russia, indeed, the claims of Austria and Prussia must have been particularly unwelcome; for she gave up that unbounded influence and authority which she had acquired in the distracted kingdom, for a territory little adequate to the loss of such power; but this concession was made to purchase a continuance of the good understanding that subsisted between her and the court of Vienna; and to check those designs which were forming by the latter court to reduce the ascendancy of Russia; so that mutual jealousies, in fact, cemented the great northern confederacy; which may be considered as the forerunner of a very important revolution in the political system of Europe.

By the exertions and abilities of the king of Poland, which the general sense of misery and degradation, occasioned by intestine anarchy and sovereign interference, contributed very essentially to render effectual, a new constitution was settled for Poland on the 3d of May, 1791, by which the Catholic faith was declared to be the established religion of the country, but a toleration was extended to all religious persuasions. The peasants and villagers were relieved from that slavish dependence on their lords which caused them to be considered as no other than appendages to the soil, and a perfect and entire liberty declared to all people.

For a few years Poland appeared to flourish; and that part of it which was left to Stanislaus was greatly benefited by his judicious introduction of artisans from France and other countries, under whose superintendence the manufactures of the country were carried on to considerable advantage. But though the Poles were attached to their king, they saw, with indignation and distrust, the prospect of being still farther humbled and reduced by the three self-elected arbiters of a nation's fate. Nor was it long before their apprehensions were sadly verified.

The French revolution had just broken out; and the Russian empress fearing, perhaps, the effect of such an example upon a warlike people, agreed with the king of Prussia to make such new division of the Polish territories as should render all attempts fruitless which they might make to recover their independence.

The Polish nation, aware of its impending fate, resolved to oppose this design by a general, vigorous, and unanimous effort. For this purpose, being convinced that their ancient elective and monarchical form of government was defective in its principles, and injurious to the state in its effects, the Poles, under the sanction of the king of Prussia, framed a new constitution, in which, among other changes, the crown was rendered hereditary. Whilst almost every sovereign in Europe approved of this revolution, the empress of Russia alone expressed her disapprobation, and tendered her powerful aid to a few discontented nobles who had entered into a confederacy to oppose the new constitution at Targovitz.

Relying upon the protection of the king of Prussia, who had engaged to prevent the interference of any foreign power with the internal concerns of Poland, the Poles were not intimidated at the hostile preparations of Russia. But their hopes were miserably disappointed. Frederick William when appealed to, refused to engage his power; and they were left to engage single-handed with the whole forces of the Russian empire. Catherine immediately marched an army into Poland; and Stanislaus raised a considerable force, which was placed under the command of his nephew, prince Joseph Poniatowski; but the Polish monarch, desirous of averting the miseries of war, acceded to the terms of Russia, annulled the new constitution, and allowed the Russians to take possession of his capital. This occurred in 1793.

Having proved so far fortunate, Catherine resolved to secure her domination over Poland by still more weakening its power; and, in consequence, agreed upon a further partition of this despoiled kingdom, in conjunction with the king of Prussia, who acted as his slave the cities of Thorn and Danzig. Amused, but irritated, at this act of aggressive duplicity, and deluded by the ambiguous answers of the Russian ambassador, the confederates of Targovitz invited the nation to rise in defence of the integrity of the kingdom; and this call was obeyed with singular alacrity. The Russian forces were, however, now ordered to act in concert with those of Prussia; and the courts of Petersburg and Berlin, openly avowing their intention of effecting a further dismemberment of Poland, forcibly obtained the silent assent of the diet of Grodno to this iniquitous measure.

The indignation of the Polish patriots was now raised to the highest pitch, and they instantly resolved to make one more desperate and final effort to restore the freedom of their country. With amazing rapidity a general insurrection was organised, and as the king had lost the confidence of the nation by his weakness, the troops unanimously placed at their head the celebrated count Thaddeus Kosciuszko, a young man of high birth but small fortune, who had been educated in the military school at Warsaw, and had served as aid-de camp to general Washington, in the American war of independence. Madalinska, a Polish general, raised the standard of revolt, and, in conjunction with Kosciuszko, took Cracow, from which city they issued an address to the nation, and signed an act declaratory of their motives and intentions. Kosciuszko was then placed at the head of the army and of the republic, with unlimited power.

The first operation of the severe contest that immediately ensued proved favourable to the patriots, who routed a Russian army of superior force near Cracow, and expelled them from Wilna. Meanwhile, the Russian ambassador compelled Stanislaus to declare the insurgents rebels, and demanded the surrender of the arsenals. This demand drove the inhabitants to desperation: they flew to arms, and after a sanguinary contest of forty-eight hours, the Russians were driven out of Warsaw with immense slaughter; and preparations were immediately made, under the directions of Kosciuszko, who repaired to the capital, to repel any future attack.

If the contest had hitherto been unequal, it was now rendered much more so. Austria had entered into the views of Russia and Prussia; and powerful armies advanced on every side. After an obstinate battle the king of Prussia defeated Kosciuszko, took possession of Cracow, and marched towards Warsaw, where the enraged populace had committed great excesses. His offers of accommodation having been rejected, he laid siege to the capital, but being repulsed in a fierce attack upon the entrenched camp of the confederates, he was eventually compelled to abandon this enterprise, after a fruitless siege of two months.

During the time these events took place at Warsaw, the Russians under Suwarroff had defeated the Poles, at Bressek, and general Fersen was endeavouring to unite his forces with the grand Russian army. Kosciuszko hastened to prevent this junction; but in an obstinate battle against the superior forces of general Fersen, the Poles were routed, and their gallant chief having been wounded and taken prisoner, was hurried as an exile to the dreary regions of Siberia. As far, however, as loss of liberty and expatriation could be rendered endurable, it was, under all circumstances, so rendered in the present instance, more than ordinary attention having been paid in providing him not only with suitable apartments, but with books, drawing materials, &c. for his recreation and amusement: an indulgence rarely granted to Russian captives.

Deeply was the loss of their beloved Thaddeus deplored by the Poles; and though it did not utterly break the spirit of the patriots, it nevertheless proved fatal to their cause. Suwarroff advanced without opposition under the very walls of Warsaw; and the Polish generals took post in the suburbs of Praga, situate on the opposite bank of the Vistula. On the 4th of November, 1795, they were vigorously assailed by Suwarroff, at the head of 40,000 men. The contest raged more than eight hours; but it terminated in the utter destruction of the Polish army, whose shattered remains retired into the city of Warsaw. The citizens of the capital surrendered to the conquerors, who pillaged the city, and put to the sword nearly 30,000 individuals, sparing neither age nor sex. The troops endeavoured to force their way through the enemy's lines; but nearly the whole of them were cut to pieces.

Poland, now laid prostrate, witnessed the departure of its last king, who, summoned to St. Petersburg, was compelled to abdicate his throne. The final partition of the kingdom, by the sovereigns of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, was not long delayed. A pension was settled on the ex-king, who retired first to Grodno, but on the death of Catherine, in 1796, he went to St. Petersburg, where he was treated with much respect and attention by the emperor Paul, at whose court he resided till his death. Fortunately for Kosciuszko, and the Polish patriots in general, the new emperor looked on them with more than a pitying eye: he not only restored the former to liberty, but made him the most liberal offers to remain in his service; they were, however, respectfully declined; and the heroic chief, after spending some little time in England, went to America, where he remained a few years, and on his return to Europe, chose France as his residence, and settled near Fontainebleau. All the Polish patriots in the Russian prisons were released by the emperor Paul, and those who had been sent to Siberia, of whom there were not less than 12,000, were recalled. But many of the bravest Poles, who had fought with Kosciuszko, made their escape, entered the French service, and were formed into separate battalions, distinguished by Buonaparte as his Polish legions.

When the emperor Alexander succeeded to the throne, in 1801, his conduct towards the Poles was not less liberal than that of Paul, his father, had been. Contrary to the plan pursued by the other two powers, he scrupled not to bestow high offices on natives of the country, and preserved to their ancient laws and privileges. Lithuania (the Russian portion) was divided into eight districts, with a governor over each, but all these governors were Lithuanian nobles; and the members of the diet were elected by the people. The peasants were still held in feudal bondage, but encouragement was given to many plans which tended to their improvement, both morally and intellectually.

Not long after Buonaparte reached the imperial dignity, one of his favourite schemes was that of freeing the Poles from the subjection of the three great northern powers, and availing himself of the services of that hardy and warlike race, of whose valour and physical capabilities he had had ample proofs in his late campaigns. He accordingly visited Kosciusko, who was still residing near Fontainebleau; and endeavoured to persuade him to take up arms, once more, for the land of his birth; but the gallant hero doubted the sincerity of the Gallie emperor's professions, suspecting that he only desired to rescue Poland from its present masters, in order to add it to his own empire; he, therefore, declined his overtures; but though Kosciusko refused, there were thousands of others who flocked to his standard, and Buonaparte pursued his plan of conquest. The event of the battle of Jena, fought with the Prussians in 1806, put him in possession of Warsaw, and all that part of Poland which had been annexed to Prussia; this territory he formed into a separate state, which he called the grand duchy of Warsaw; and, uniting it to Saxony, he gave to the king of that country the additional title of grand duke of Warsaw.

The dismembered country, which now first received internal order from foreign hands, continued in this condition till November, 1806, when Napoleon's victories led the emigrant Poles, under Dombrowski, to Posen and Warsaw. By the terms of the peace of Tilsit, July 9, 1807, the greater part of the Prussian Polish provinces was formed into the duchy of Warsaw, which received a German ruler in the king of Saxony, and, at the same time with the French code, a constitution similar to the French, by which bondage was abolished. Dantisc was to have been a republic under the protection of Prussia and Saxony, but remained a French place of arms. The grants bestowed on the French officers, and still more the continental system which destroyed all trade, exhausted the public revenues, so that Poland, amid all its natural wealth, experienced the fate of Tantalus. The necessity of furnishing troops for the French service, was also a check on the prosperity of the new state, and annihilated all that Prussia had effected at great sacrifices. Yet the woollen and cotton manufactures, that had grown up in Posen and Broomberg, sustained themselves. The government of the duchy did every thing practicable under such unfavourable circumstances.

The war between France and Austria, in 1809, augmented, indeed, the sufferings of the country, but developed, to an extraordinary degree, the military energies of the people. Under the command of Poniatowski and French officers, the Polish troops rivalled the best troops of France in valour. They advanced to Cracow, and the peace of Vienna (Oct. 14, 1809) annexed Western Galicia to the duchy of Warsaw, which had hitherto contained 39,000 square miles, with 2,200,000 inhabitants; so that it now comprised 60,000 square miles, with 3,780,000 inhabitants and furnished a well equipped army of 60,000 men, which fought in Spain with great bravery.

Under these circumstances, the old national pride revived; their former boundaries, a native king, and the restoration of the name of Poland, were the unanimous wish of the nation. On this wish, which he artfully encouraged, Napoleon founded his plan of attack upon Russia, in 1812, which he styled the second Polish war. He contrived that a general Polish confederation, in Warsaw (June 28, 1812), should solemnly proclaim the restoration of Poland; but the ardour was not universal. The exertions of the duchy, which raised upwards of 80,000 men, were for the most part rendered useless by Napoleon's method of waging war. Tormassoff kept the Lithuanians in check, and, instead of the myriads of whom Napoleon boasted that he should find on horseback at his command, only a few battalions of volunteers assembled.

Meanwhile Russia assumed the administration of the whole duchy. Dantisc, with its territory, reverted to Russia, and the congress at Vienna (in May, 1815) decided the fate of the country.—1. The city of Cracow, with its territory, was to be governed by its own laws, as a free and independent republic.—2. The country on the right bank of the Vistula, with the circle of Tamopola, which had been ceded to Russia by the peace of Vienna, was restored to Austria.—3. The circles of Culm and Michelin, the city of Thorn and its territory, the department of Posen, with the exception of the circles of Powits and Pysern, and part of the department of Kalisch, as far as the Prozna, excluding the city and circle of that name, were ceded to the king of Prussia, who united Dantisc, Thorn, Culm, and Michelin with West Russia, and from the remainder (11,400 square miles, with 847,000 inhabitants) formed the grand duchy of Posen, and appointed prince Badziwill governor. All the rest was united with the Russian empire, under the name of the "kingdom of Poland," but with a separate administration, and such a territorial extent as the Russian emperor should see fit. The emperor Alexander, therefore, assumed the title of czar and king of Poland, and received homage in Warsaw.

Poland, though thus divided, preserved its name and language, as the treaties of Vienna secured to all Poles who were subjects of either of the three powers, such an organisation as tended to maintain their national existence. A Polish charter was accordingly promulgated (Nov. 27, 1815). The government of the country was to be vested in a native Pole, as lieutenant of the kingdom, unless one of the imperial princes should be appointed viceroy. This was rendered nugatory by the presence of the tyrannical Constantine, as commander-in-chief. Equality of religious sects, personal security, liberty of the press, the entire possession of all employments, civil and military, in the country, by Poles, were among the promises of the charter; and these rights were to be secured by a national diet, composed of two chambers.

IN AUSTRIAN AND PRUSSIAN POLAND THE IMPROVEMENT IN THE CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE HAS BEEN SIGNAL AND EXTRAORDINARY.

But these promises were kept only to the early restrictions on the press, arbitrary imprisonment, and punishments; insults added to injuries; a solemn mockery of a diet, which was not allowed to exercise any real authority; the violation of every article of the charter by a Russian barbarian; peculation and extortion practised by the inferior officers;—these were some of the features of the Russian government of Poland.

On the death of Alexander (December, 1825) and the accession of Nicholas, a conspiracy broke out in Russia, and, on pretence that it extended to Warsaw, several hundred persons were arrested in Poland, and a commission constituted, contrary to the provisions of the charter, to inquire into the affair. The only discovery of this inquisitorial tribunal was, that secret societies had existed in Poland since 1821. In May, 1829, Nicholas was crowned at Warsaw. In 1829, however, a secret society had been instituted, for the purpose of gaining over the officers of the army to the cause of independence; and to their agency is the insurrection of 1830 to be attributed. It appears, nevertheless, that it was immediately occasioned by a sham conspiracy got up by the Russian police, who had thus induced a number of young men to betray themselves, and crowded the prisons with their victims. Not only the Polish officers, the youth of the military school, and the students, had been gained over to the cause of the patriots; but the greater part of the citizens, and the chief nobles, were ready to encourage an effort to save themselves from what they now foresaw—the occupation of Poland by a Russian army, and the marching of the Polish troops to the south of Europe.

Such was the state of things when the insurrection of Warsaw broke out, Nov. 19, 1830. A young officer entered the military school, on the evening of that day, and called the youth to arms. They immediately proceeded to Belvidere, the residence of Constantine, about two miles from the city, for the purpose of seizing his person. They were joined, on the way, by the students of the university, and forced their way into the palace; but the prince was concealed in a clothes-press, by a servant, until he could make his escape by a secret door. Another party of cadets and students paraded the streets, calling the citizens to arms, and they were joined by the Polish troops. The arsenal was seized, with 40,000 stand of arms, and the insurrection now became general. On the next morning 40,000 troops and citizens were in arms, and the Russians were expelled from Warsaw.

The administrative council was summoned to preserve order; and, to give more influence to its measures, several of the most distinguished Poles were invited to sit with it. Measures were taken for the organization of a national guard, and of a new police and municipal government. On the 3rd of December, the prince was allowed to leave the neighbourhood of Warsaw, with three regiments of Russian cavalry, and two regiments of infantry, without opposition. On the 5th, general Ciopek was proclaimed dictator till the meeting of the diet, which was convoked for the 18th. Meanwhile Nicholas issued a proclamation, in which he declared that no concessions could be made to the rebels, and, on the 24th, another, addressed to the Russians, telling them that the Poles had dared to propose conditions to their legitimate master; "God," he adds, "is with us, and, in a single battle we shall be able to reduce to submission these disturbers of the peace." January 24 the Polish diet, which had been opened on the 18th of December, declared the absolute independence of Poland, and the termination of the Russian dominion, and on the 25th, that the Polish throne was vacant.

Although the immediate cause of this revolution was the severe punishment inflicted on the pupils of the military academy, as before stated, there is no doubt that the Poles were encouraged to make the attempt by the success that had attended the Parisians in the preceding July, to secure to them a constitutional government. The object of the Polish revolutionists, however, was not to withdraw themselves entirely from the authority of the Russian emperor, but only to maintain the privileges that were guaranteed to them at the congress of Vienna, and to get rid of the tyrannous viceroyship of the grand-duke Constantine. They had now, however, drawn the sword; and although two commissioners were sent to St. Petersburg, to endeavour to effect an arrangement, the emperor refused to listen to them, and denounced the revolted Poles as traitors to whom no lenity would be shown.

Marshal Diebitzsch, who had so successfully conducted the war with the Turks, entered Poland at the head of a large army. He advanced as far as Warsaw, and was victorious over the Poles near the walls of their capital, February 25, 1831 (the loss of the Poles is stated to have been 5,500, that of their enemies 4,500); but when prince Radzivil resigned the command on the 28th, and Skrzynski, then only a colonel, was appointed in his place, the Polish cause gained strength. This brave officer, though finally unsuccessful, like the heroic Kosciuszko, proved that he deserved a better fate. March 31, he was victorious over the Russians in a night attack. He advanced cautiously, and, favoured by the darkness of the night, reached their cantonments without being perceived. The advanced guard of general Geismar, consisting of 8,000 or 10,000 men, was first attacked, and almost wholly destroyed; the Poles took 4,000 prisoners and 1,600 pieces of cannon. Immediately afterwards, he attacked general Rosen, who was posted with 20,000 men at Dembe Wielki, and obliged him to retreat, with the loss of 2,000 prisoners and nine pieces of cannon.

Another important victory was afterwards gained near Zolichow, when 12,000 Russians were killed, wounded, or taken, with twelve pieces of cannon. During this action, the Lithuanians and Volhynians, who served in the Russian army, turned their arms against the Russians, and materially contributed to the success of the Poles. The peasants in various quarters of Poland now took an active part in the war, and hastened, with whatever weapons they could obtain, to the army. Insurrections broke out in Lithuania, Volhynia, Kowno, Ukraine, Wilna, and even in ancient Poland, as far as Smolensk. On the other hand, general Dwernicki, who had been sent to make a demonstration in the rear of the Russians, and who had been victorious over them, was at last compelled to pass into the Austrian dominions, where he surrendered to the authorities of that country, April 27, with 5000 Poles. The ardour of the people, however, still continued, and hopes were entertained in every country that the manly resistance of the Poles would induce the powerful cabinets to interfere; but, unfortunately, Prussia and Austria, being themselves in possession of a part of the spoils of Poland, did all in their power to prevent interference, whilst Britain and France were too much occupied at home to render essential aid. The military operations were now prosecuted with new vigour, and the emperor, who, in a manifesto addressed to the Russians, had called them the legitimate masters of the Poles, was ready to make every sacrifice to regain the Polish throne.

Their fate was soon afterwards decided. After two days fighting, Warsaw was taken by the Russians, (September, 1831); the confiscation of their property and exile to Siberia followed as a matter of course; and though many found an asylum in England and other countries, they were mostly in extreme poverty, and were dependent on the benevolence of those who pitied their hard fate while they admired their patriotism. Poland was soon afterwards incorporated with Russia; and although it has its separate diet and code of laws, Russian troops are stationed in all the principal towns, and it bears every semblance in other respects to a conquered country.

THE HISTORY OF SWITZERLAND.

From the earliest times this country has been no less celebrated for the spirit of freedom which animated its brave inhabitants, than for the beautiful and interesting character of its scenery. Snow-capped mountains, with fertile valleys and peaceful lakes at their base, are here seen in contrast with noble forests, luxuriant vineyards, and glaciers of almost boundless extent, whose crystal pinnacles tower above each other and flash their light with all the brilliancy of a noon-day sun. But in alluding to the geographical features of Switzerland, we must not forget that our present business is more particularly devoted to its history.

The northern and southern nations of Europe have been singularly intermingled in the history of Helvetia, whose Alpine walls seem like a barrier, separating them from each other. The Roman legions, indeed, conquered the Gauls, Rhetians and Alemanni, in the forests and marshes; but they could not destroy the northern spirit of freedom. The traces of its ancient subjugation to Rome are still visible in the Romanic language of a part of Switzerland.

Helvetia, under the Romans, had a flourishing trade, which covered the land with cities and villages; and Switzerland still forms the connecting link between Northern Germany, the Netherlands and France on the one side, and Italy on the other.

Before the fall of the Roman empire in the west, the northern and largest part of Switzerland, occupied by the Alemanni, had been conquered by the Franks. On the Jura dwelt the Burgundians, and Rhætia was under the Ostrogoths. Three German nations, therefore, freed the country, about A. D. 450, from the dominion of Rome.

Christianity had already been introduced into Helvetia from Italy, and as early as the fourth century there were Christian churches at Geneva, Coire, and other places. The Alemanni and Burgundians gave their laws and their habits to the Helvetians; and the Alemanni occupied the greater part of the country. Each soldier received a farm; a judge, or centgrave, was set over one hundred of these farms (forming a cent, or hundred); and the place of judgment where he settled all questions between the free citizens, was called Mallus. Several cents formed a Gau (hence Thurgau, Aargau, &c.), the judge of which was styled count (graf); and the counts were under a duke.

The great irruption of barbarians swept through the peaceful valleys of the Alps, and Roman civilization disappeared. Ostrogoths, Lombards, and even Huns, settled in different parts of the country. At last, the French, who had taken possession of the lands of the conquered Alemanni, drove the Ostrogoths over the Rhætian mountains.

COUNTRY.

In 534, they likewise subjected the Burgundians; and all Switzerland became a portion of the Frankish empire. The country, however, retained its ancient constitution; the Romans and the old inhabitants were governed by Roman, the Alemanni by Alemannic laws; and each of the other nations by its peculiar code. The Christian religion was restored anew, and the desolated fields were again brought under cultivation.

On the partition of the empire of the Franks among the Merovingians, Switzerland was divided between two sovereigns; one reigned over Alemannian, and the other over Burgundian Switzerland, or Little Burgundy. Pepin reunited the whole country, and Charlemagne encouraged the arts and sciences in Helvetia. Under his feeble successors, the counts became more and more independent of the royal authority, and finally made the possession of their gans hereditary. One of them (Rodolph) established, in 888, the new kingdom of Burgundy, between the Reuss and the Jura. Nine years previously, Boso had established the kingdom of Arles, in the territory between the Jura and the Rhone. Thirty years afterwards, the two Burgundian kingdoms were united. The counts in the other part of Switzerland were still nominally subject to the German kings; but they conducted themselves as princes, assumed the name of their castles, and compelled the free inhabitants of their gans to acknowledge them as their lords. Hence arose a multitude of independent and complicated governments, whose chiefs were engaged in continual feuds with each other. War was the business of the nobles, and misery the fate of the people in the distracted land. The emperor Conrad, therefore, set a duke over the counts in Alemannia in 911. But the emperors of the Saxon house were the first who compelled the dukes, counts and bishops, in Switzerland, to respect their authority.

After the death of Rodolph III., the 5th and last king of Burgundy (1032), the emperor Conrad II. re-united Burgundian Switzerland with Alemannia, which belonged to the German empire. But under Henry IV., grandson of Conrad II., the royal authority in Switzerland was again overthrown. The country people became more secure; the feuds among the nobility flourished; Geneva and Lausanne, among the Romanic, and Zurich and Basle among the German cities, became thriving towns. The families of Savoy, Kyburg, and Hapsburg were the most powerful among the noble families. Many nobles went, about this time, to Palestine; and thus the country was delivered from their oppression. After the death of Berthold V., last duke of Zähringen, in 1218, Alemannia again came into the possession of the emperor. His hereditary estates in the Uchtland and in Little Burgundy, passed by his sister Agnes, to the house of Kyburg.

From this time, the Hapsburgs in northern Helvetia, and the counts of Savoy in the south-west, grew more and more powerful. The emperor appointed some nobleman as governor of each city, or community, which was not under a count, to collect the public revenue, and to punish violations of the public peace. The German kings were no longer able to afford protection; might gave right, and the boldest became the mightiest. Several inferior lords, and several places, therefore, sought the protection of Hapsburg or Savoy. Zurich, Basle and Soleure, the districts of Uri, Schwets and Unterwalden, gradually acquired the seigneurial rights from the emperors, by purchase or by grant, and assumed the name of imperial cities or imperial districts. They were more prosperous and powerful than the nobility, who lived in their solitary castles, at enmity with each other.

Even the crusades, by promoting commerce, improved the already flourishing condition of the cities, as a part of the troops, arms, provisions, &c. were transmitted to Italy, through the passes of the Alps. The crusaders brought back new inventions in the arts, new kinds of fruits, &c. The gold and silk manufacturers of the Italians and eastern nations were imitated in Switzerland; refinement took the place of rudeness, and poetry became the favourite amusement of the nobles. The cities now formed alliances for their mutual protection against the rapacity of the nobles, and demolished many castles, from which they exercised their oppression upon the peaceful merchants.

At the end of the thirteenth century, Rodolph of Hapsburg, who, in 1264, had inherited the estates of his uncle Hartmann, count of Kyburg, became more powerful than the old lords of the soil. As king and emperor of Germany, he held a court at Helvetia; but he did not abuse his power to reduce the freemen to vassalage. His ambitious sons, however, Rodolph and Albert, encroached upon the rights of the Swiss. Albert, in particular, who succeeded to the imperial dignity in 1298, by his tyranny and obstinacy, gave rise to the first confederacy of the Swiss cantons. On the night of November 7, 1307, thirty-three brave countrymen met at Grutlin, a solitary spot on the lake of Lucerne. Fürst of Uri, Stauffacher of Schwets, and Melchthal of Unterwalden, were the leaders on this occasion. All swore to maintain their ancient independence. The three Waldstätte, or forest-towns (as these cantons were called), accordingly rose, deposed the Austrian governors, and destroyed the castles built to overawe the country.

Henry VII., the successor of Albert on the German throne, confirmed to the forest-towns the rights of which Albert had endeavoured to rob them. The house of Austria still contended obstinately for its lost privileges. But the warlike spirit of the people fostered a love of conquest and plunder; mutual hatred kindled civil war between neighbouring cantons; foreign powers sought the aid of the confederates in their contents. In 1424, the people of the Grey League established their independence, and were soon after joined by those of the other two leagues.

The emperor Frederic III. then called a French army into Switzerland to protect his family estates. The Swiss made a second Thermopylae of the church-yard of St. Jacob at Basle, where 1600 of them withstood 20,000 French under the dauphin Louis, (August 26, 1444.) They next provoked Charles the Bold of Burgundy, who marched into their country, but was defeated at Granson, Murten, or Morat, and Nancy, in 1477. The confederates themselves aspired to conquest, the people being fired by the desire of plunder, and the nobles by warlike ambition. In 1480, they wrested Thurgau from Austria; and from 1436 to 1450, Zurich, Schweitz, and Glarus contended for Toggenburg, till Berne decided the dispute in favour of Schweitz.

The confederated cantons from this time bore the name of the Swiss confederacy in foreign countries. In 1481, Friburg and Soleure entered the confederacy. The emperor Maximilian I. now determined to force the Swiss to join the Suabian league, and to submit to the court of the imperial chamber. But they suspected Germany on account of Austria, and joined the Grisons. Hence arose the Suabian war, which was concluded, after the Swiss had gained six victories over the Germans, by the peace of Basle, in 1499. Basle, Schaffhausen, and Appenzel, were afterwards admitted into the confederacy. But the country and people were disturbed by domestic and foreign wars.

In the Milanese war of 1512, the Swiss conquered the Valteline and Chiavenna, and obtained from Milan the Italian bailiages, which form at present the canton of Tessin. They fought on a foreign soil, now for, now against, Milan; at one time for France, and at another time against her, till after the great battle of Marignano, gained by Francis I., in 1516, they concluded a perpetual peace with France, at Friburg, in 1516, which was followed, in 1521, by the first formal alliance with that kingdom.

About this time the work of reformation began in Switzerland. Zuinglius, in 1518, preached against indulgences, as Luther had done in 1517. Even as early as 1516, he had attacked pilgrimages, and the invocation of the Virgin Mary; and in 1517, with the knowledge of his patron, the abbot of Einsiedeln, several nuns abandoned the monastic life. His removal from Einsiedeln to Zurich, in 1518, gave him courage to speak more openly, as Luther had, meanwhile, appeared in the cause of reform. But when the principles of the reformation were diffused through Zurich, Berne, Schaffhausen, Basle (by the labours of Ecclampadius), St. Gall, Mülhausen, and Bienne, religious jealousy separated the reformed and the catholic cantons. In Garus, Appenzel, and the Grisons, the people were divided between the two confessions. Lucerne, Uri, Schweitz, Unterwalden, Zug, Friburg, Soleure, adhered to the ancient faith; as did likewise the Valais and the Italian bailiwicks. Fanaticism kindled a civil war. The Schweitzers burnt a protestant preacher of Zurich. Two Swiss armies, nearly 30,000 strong, awaited the signal for civil war, a better spirit suddenly prevailed, and the first religious peace was concluded in 1520.

It was agreed that the majority of votes in the communities should decide all questions relating to changes of faith. But the rapid progress of the reformation again provoked the catholic cantons to war; and the troops of Zurich were routed at Cappel (1531), where Zuinglius fell, and at the mountain of Zug. After the second public peace, the catholic religion was restored in Soleure and the common provinces. In the mean time, Savoy, which had long possessed episcopal and seigniorial rights in Geneva, reduced the city to entire submission. But the oppressive manner in which the ducal authority was exercised, led Geneva, in 1526, to join Berne and Friburg. The duke was forced to yield. Berne and Geneva concluded the perpetual league of 1531, and Berne gained possession of the Pays de Vaud. At the same time, the reformed doctrines were propagated from Geneva by Calvin. By the peace of Lausanne, in 1564, Savoy first renounced her claims upon the Pays de Vaud, and was thus driven from Helvetia, as Neuburg had been before. About this time (1555), Berne and Friburg divided between themselves the territories of the counts of Gruyere, so that, in all Helvetia, no great family of the ancient nobles retained its patrimonial estates, except that of Henburg.

The Swiss, however, were distracted by religious and political controversies. Aristocracy and democracy struggled for the superiority, and the intrigues of Spain filled the people of the Valteline (1617-21) with a spirit of fanaticism. In foreign, and especially in the French service, the Swiss adopted foreign manners; he sold his blood to foreign masters; and the ancient Swiss purity and simplicity retired to the remote valleys of the higher Alps. At the same time, the connection of the confederacy with the German empire became less and less close, while the cantons obtained the confirmation of their rights from the emperor Maximilian II.

But the influence of France soon became predominant, and Rome swayed the minds of its adherents by means of Jesuit colleges at Lucerne and Friburg; and particularly through the papal nuncio at Lucerne. In the thirty years' war, the confederates maintained a prudent neutrality; and, by the peace of Westphalia (1648), the complete separation of Switzerland from the German empire was at length solemnly acknowledged.

In 1663, France renewed her alliance with the Swiss, and asserted that they had no right to form alliances with other powers. The conquest of the French Comté, in 1674, and the siege of Rheinfeld, in 1678, by the French, together with the erection of the fortress of Hünningen, in 1679, excited the apprehensions of the Swiss. They, however, happily maintained their neutrality, even in the war of the Spanish succession. During the persecution of the protestants in France, to whom they readily gave an asylum and pecuniary aid, they paid as little regard to the remonstrances of Louis, who viewed the reformers as rebels, as he did to the intercession of the protestant Swiss cantons in favour of their brethren in the faith.

The Swiss had little influence in foreign politics during the eighteenth century; and, until towards its close, they suffered little from foreign interference. This tranquillity, which, however, was often interrupted by internal dissensions, was alike favourable to the progress of commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, and to the arts and sciences. In almost every department of human knowledge, the Swiss of the eighteenth century, both at home and abroad, acquired distinguished reputation, as the names of Haller, Bonnet, Bernoulli, J. J. Rousseau, Lavater, Bodmer, Breitinger, Gesener, Sulzer, Hirzel, Fuseli, Hottinger, John von Müller, Pestalozzi, and many others, bear witness.

The people of the democratic cantons enjoyed an almost unlimited freedom, and took a large share in the affairs of government. Those places which were under the general protection of the whole confederacy, were not burthened by excessive taxes; they enjoyed a high degree of civil freedom, and numerous municipal rights. The larger cantons, as Berne and Zurich, in which the government was administered by the capitals, or by a body of the citizens, who enjoyed many peculiar privileges, were also in a flourishing condition. There were no oppressive taxes; but almost every where the government was conscientiously conducted; the administration of justice was cheap and simple, and benevolent institutions were numerous. Notwithstanding all these favourable circumstances, internal dissensions still continued, and new troubles arose in 1790, which shook the political fabric; blood was often split, and punishment rendered necessary.

Although the Swiss had at first firmly maintained their neutrality in the wars of the French revolution, French power and intrigue gradually deprived them of their former constitution; and, after incorporating several portions of Switzerland with the French and Cisalpine republics, the French converted the Swiss confederacy into the Helvetic republic, one and indivisible, under an executive directory of five persons. The legislative power was divided between a senate and a great council, to which each of the fourteen cantons elected twelve members. It was in vain that some of the democratic cantons attempted to prevent this revolution. They were speedily overpowered.

But the oppression of the French, the arbitrary manner in which they disposed of the highest offices, and the great number of weak and corrupt men who were raised to power—soon made the new officers contemptible. Aloys Reding, a man of enterprising spirit, whose family was celebrated in the annals of his country, formed the plan of overthrowing the central government. Underwalden, Schwitz, Zurich, Glarus, Appenzell, and the Grisons wished to restore the federal constitution; and Reding imagined that Buonaparte himself, who had just withdrawn the French troops from Switzerland, would favour his plan. The smaller cantons, in their diet at Schwitz (August 6, 1802), declared that they would not accept the constitution which had been forced upon them, and that they preferred a federal government. The consequence was a civil war. Zurich was besieged to no purpose by the troops of the Helvetic republic, against whom its gates were shut. Rodolph von Elsch and general Auf der Maur, at the head of the insurgents, occupied Berne and Friburg. The Helvetic government retired to Lausanne.

Aloys Reding now summoned a general assembly, which was held at Schwitz, September 27. Three days after, the first consul of France offered to the cantons his mediation; but the small cantons, guided by Aloys Reding and Hirzel of Zurich, persevered in their opposition. Twelve thousand French troops entered Switzerland, under Ney, and the diet separated. Reding and Hirzel were imprisoned. In December, both parties sent deputies of the eighteen cantons to Paris, to whom Buonaparte transmitted by Barthélémy, Fouché, and Roderer, the act of mediation of February 19, 1803, restoring the cantonal system, but granting freedom to the former subjects of the cantons.

The cantons were now nineteen in number.—Aargau, Appenzell, Basle, Berne, Friburg, Glarus, Grisons, Lucerne, St. Gall, Schaffhausen, Schwitz, Soleure, Tessin, Thurgau, Underwalden, Uri, Pays de Vaud, Zug, and Zurich. The republic of Valais was changed by a decree of Napoleon, in 1810, into a French department; and as early as 1806, he granted Neuchâtel (which had been ceded to him by Prussia, but which was under the protection of Switzerland), to general Berthier, as a sovereign principality. Napoleon assumed the title of "mediator of Switzerland;" and the military service required of the Swiss became more and more oppressive. It was only by great firmness and the sacrifice of immense sums of money, that most of the cantonal governments could avert greater oppression; they were obliged to adopt the continental system; and the canton of Tesin was long garrisoned by French troops. In 1813, when the theatre of war approached Switzerland, France permitted the Swiss to maintain their neutrality; but the allies expressed themselves ambiguously, and large armies were soon marched through the country, in various directions, to France. Their arrival excited a fermentation in many quarters. The act of mediation was annulled, December 29, 1813, at Zurich, and several cantons, of which Berne was the first, laboured to revive their old constitutions. Through the influence of the allied monarchs, the cantons were finally prevailed on to assemble a general council, but revolutions and counter-revolutions agitated several of the cantons. A diet was at length assembled at Zurich, and new articles of confederation were agreed upon by nineteen cantons, September 18th, 1814. They resembled the old federal pact in many respects. This confederacy was acknowledged by the congress of Vienna. The bishopric of Basle, with Bienne, was given to the canton of Berne, excepting the district of Birsack, which fell to Basle, and a small portion which fell to Neuchâtel. The former relations of the latter province to Prussia were restored, and with Geneva and the Valais, it joined the confederacy of the Swiss cantons, making their number twenty-two.

August 7, 1815, the compact of Zurich was publicly and solemnly adopted, after the deputies of the confederacy at Vienna had given in their accession to the acts of the congress of Vienna, so far as they related to Switzerland. Soon after, Switzerland became a member of the holy alliance. But the political state of the Swiss cantons as settled by the congress of Vienna, and jealously watched by the holy alliance, gave rise to much disaffection in the great body of the people. In this state of things, the general demand for reform, in the electoral assemblies of Tessin (one of the small cantons), compelled the council, June, 1830, to yield to the public voice, and establish a system of direct elections, and of publicity of proceedings in the great council, and to guarantee the liberty of the press, and the inviolability of persons, as parts of the constitution. This event, and the French revolution of July, 1830, set the example for general risings in various parts of the country. In the new cantons, the popular demands were generally so readily complied with as to prevent any serious disturbances, and the democratic cantons took hardly any part in the troubles; but in the old aristocratic cantons, the opposition was stronger and more systematic. Still, as many of the towns' people were favourable to more popular institutions, the governments, even in these cantons, generally yielded, with little opposition, to the wishes of the citizens; and in Friburg, Berne, Lucerne, Soleure, Schaffhausen, the revision of the constitution, the abolition of privileges, the extension of the right of election, abolition of censorship of the press, &c., were among the concessions to popular rights.

From that period little occurred to disturb the general tranquillity of the country till 1846, when a civil war broke out, the cause of which was as follows:—In the canton of Argau, where the population is mixed, a portion of the Catholics had risen, in 1840, in insurrection against the government; and as it was found that the convents in that canton had instigated the rising, their suppression was decreed, and the revenues, after providing permanently for their inmates, appropriated to religious and charitable purposes. In the diet, Lucerne, the leading Catholic canton, vigorously protested against this act, and the Argovians offered to restore the convents. But the Catholic party was not satisfied. In the canton of Valais, the clergy went so far as to refuse the sacraments to the members of Young Switzerland, as the liberal party was named; and even to their relatives, or the readers of their journals. The Jesuits, elated with their triumph in the Valais, now became extremely active in the other Catholic cantons, and in 1845 they were formally invited to enter the canton of Lucerne, from which they had hitherto been excluded, to take charge of the cantonal education. This led to civil dissension in the canton; the expulsion of the leaders of the anti-Jesuit party, and the invasion of it by free corps from the adjacent cantons. Matters soon began to assume a more serious aspect. In the diet of 1846 the Argovian deputy had proposed the expulsion of the Jesuits from the confederacy. He then met with no support; but in the diet of 1845 a majority voted for that measure. In 1846 Lucerne, and six other Catholic cantons, formed what was termed the Sonderbund, or Separate League, an armed confederacy, in fact, in support of the cause of the Jesuits. This was voted to be illegal by a majority of the diet; and changes of government which took place immediately after in Bern, Geneva, and other places, having given more strength to the anti-Jesuit party, the expulsion of that society, and the dissolution of the Sonderbund, was resolved on by the diet. But as the Catholic cantons, relying on Austria and on France for support, refused compliance, it was resolved to have recourse to arms. The troops of the diet, commanded by General Dufour, appeared before Friburg, which opened its gates after a feeble resistance. The federal army then resumed its march, and soon reached the vicinity of Lucerne, where a surrender was made after one vigorous action at the adjacent village of Roth. The leaders of the Sonderbund took to flight, and the Jesuits were ordered to quit the canton within forty-eight hours. The remaining cantons sent in their submission, and thus, through the vigour and rapidity of General Dufour's measures, the civil war was terminated without giving Austria or any other power a pretext for interference. In 1848, while great part of Europe was convulsed by revolution, Switzerland enjoyed comparative tranquillity; save that the canton of Neuchâtel, which had hitherto belonged to Prussia, then shook off the foreign yoke, and was annexed to Switzerland.

THE GOVERNMENT IS WHOLLY REPUBLICAN, EXCEPT IN NEUCHÂTEL, IN WHICH THE KING OF PRUSSIA EXERCISES THE RIGHT OF SOVEREIGNTY.

THE HISTORY OF ITALY.

This delightful region of Europe, as celebrated for its genial climate, as for being the seat of that mighty empire which of old gave laws to the world; this classic land, where all that is noble in art and science have flourished; though shorn of its former glories, still claims the traveller's homage and the attention of the historian.

Before Rome had absorbed all the vital power of Italy, this country was thickly inhabited, and for the most part, by civilized nations. In the north of Italy alone, which offered the longest resistance to the Romans, dwelt the Gauls. Farther south, on the Arno and the Tiber, a number of small tribes, such as the Etrusci, the Samnites, and Latins, endeavoured to find safety by forming confederacies. Less closely united, and often hostile to each other, were the Greek colonies of Lower Italy, called Magna Græcia.

Italy, in the middle ages, was divided into Upper, Middle, and Lower Italy. The first division comprehended all the states situated in the vicinity of the Po; the second extended between the former and the kingdom of Naples; which formed the third. At present, it is divided into the following independent states, which are not connected with each other by any political tie:—1. The kingdom of Sardinia; 2. Lombardy, or Austrian Italy (including Milan and Venice); 3. the duchy of Parma; 4. the duchy of Modena (including Massa); 5. the grand-duchy of Tuscany; 6. the duchy of Lucca; 7. the republic of San Marino; 8. the Papal dominions; 9. the kingdom of Naples, or the Two Sicilies.

Italia did not become the general name of this country until the age of Augustus. It had been early imperfectly known to the Greeks under the name of Hesperia. Ausonia, Saturnia, and Ænotria, were also names applied by them to the southern part, with which alone they were at first acquainted. The name Italia was at first merely a partial name for the southern extremity, until it was gradually extended to the whole country.

The modern history of Italy begins with the fall of the western empire. Romulus Augustus, its last feeble emperor, was dethroned by his German guards. Odoacer, their leader, assumed the title of king of Italy, and thus this country was separated from the Roman empire. But this valiant barbarian could not communicate a spirit of independence and energy to the degenerate Italians; nothing but an amalgamation with a people in a state of nature could effect their regeneration. Such a people already stood on the frontiers of Italy.

Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, instigated by Zeno, emperor of the East, overthrew the kingdom of Odoacer, in 493, and reduced all Italy. His Goths spread from the Alps to Sicily. In the lagoons of the Adriatic alone, some fugitives, who had fled from the devastations of Attila, maintained their freedom.

Theodoric, who combined the vigour of the north with the cultivation of the south, is justly termed the Great. But the energy of his people soon yielded to Roman corruption. Totila, for ten years, contested in vain the almost completed conquest with the military skill of Belisarius. He fell in battle in 552; after which Italy was annexed to the eastern empire, under an exarch, who resided at Ravenna. But the first exarch, Narses, sunk under the intrigues of the Byzantine court, and his successor neglected the defence of the passes of the Alps. The country was then invaded by the Lombards, who, under Alboin, their chief or king, conquered the territory which afterwards received its name from them.

The kingdom of the Lombards included Upper Italy, Tuscany, and Umbria. Alboin also created the duchy of Benevento, in Lower Italy, with which he invested Zotto. The whole of Lombardian Italy was divided into thirty great fiefs, under dukes, counts, &c., which soon became hereditary. Together with the new kingdom, the confederation of the fugitives in the lagoons still subsisted in undisturbed freedom. The islanders, by the election of their first doge, Anafesto, in 697, established a central government, and the republic of Venice was founded.

Ravenna, the seat of the exarch, with Romagna, the Pentapolis, or the five maritime cities (Rimini, Pisaro, Fano, Sanigaglia, and Ancona), and almost all the coasts of Lower Italy, where Amalfi and Gaeta had dukes of their own, of the Greek nation, remained unconquered, together with Sicily and the capital, Rome, which was governed by a patrician in the name of the emperor. The slight dependence on the court of Byzantium disappeared almost entirely in the beginning of the eighth century, when Leo, the Isaurian, exasperated the orthodox Italians by his attack of images. The cities expelled his officers, and chose consuls and a senate, as in ancient times. Rome acknowledged, not indeed the power, but a certain paternal authority of its bishops, even in secular affairs, in consequence of the respect which their holiness procured them. The popes, in their efforts to defend the freedom of Rome against the Lombards, forsaken by the court of Byzantium, generally had recourse to the Frankish kings.

In consideration of the aid expected against king Astolphus, pope Stephen III., in 753, not only anointed Pepin, who in the preceding year had been made king of the Franks, with the approbation of pope Zacharias, but with the assent of the municipality of Rome, appointed him patrician, as the imperial governor had hitherto been denominated. Charlemagne made war upon Desiderius, the king of the Lombards, in defence of the Roman church, took him prisoner in his capital, Pavia, united his empire with the Frankish monarchy, and eventually gave Italy a king in his son Pepin. But his attempts against the duchy of Benevento, the independence of which was maintained by duke Arichis, against the republics in Lower Italy, where Naples, Amalfi, and Gaeta, in particular, had become rich by navigation and commerce, were unsuccessful. The exarchate, with the five cities, had already been presented to the pope by Pepin, in 756, and Charlemagne confirmed the gift; but the secular supremacy of the popes was not completed until the pontificate of Innocent III., about the year 1200. Their rank, however, among the ecclesiastics of the west, and the temporal power now acquired, gave them an ascendancy over the clergy and laity in Europe, which they failed not to improve until they were acknowledged as the infallible heads of the church.

Leo III. bestowed on the king of the Franks, on Christmas day, A. D. 800, the imperial crown of the west, which needed a Charlemagne to raise it from nothing. But dislike to the Franks, whose conquest was looked upon as a new invasion of barbarians, united the free cities, Rome excepted, more closely to the eastern empire. Even during the lifetime of Charlemagne, Frankish Italy was given to his grandson Bernard; who, however, having attempted to become independent of his uncle, Louis the Debonnaire, was deprived of the crown, and had his eyes torn out.

Italy now remained a constituent part of the Frankish monarchy, till the partition of Verdun, which took place in 843; when it was allotted, with the imperial dignity, and what was afterwards called Lorraine, to Lothaire I., eldest son of Louis. Lothaire left the government to his son Louis II., the most estimable of the Italian princes of the Carolingian line. After his death, in 875, Italy became the apple of discord to the whole family. Charles the Bald, of France, first took possession of it; and after his death Carloman, king of Bavaria; who was succeeded, in 880, by his brother Charles the Fat, king of Suabia, who united the whole monarchy of the Franks for the last time.

His dethronement, in 887, was the epoch of anarchy and civil war in Italy. Berengarius, duke of Friuli, and Guido, duke of Spoleto (besides the marquis of Ivrea, the only ones remaining of the thirty great vassals), disputed the crown between them. Guido was crowned king and emperor, and after his death (894), his son Lambert. Arnold, the Carolingian king of the Germans, enforced his claims to the royal and imperial crown of Italy (896), but, like most of his successors, was able to maintain them only during his residence in the country.

After the death of Lambert and Arnold, Louis, king of Lower Burgundy, became the competitor of Berengarius I.; and this bold and noble prince, although crowned king in 894, and emperor in 898, did not enjoy quiet till he had expelled the emperor Louis III. and vanquished another competitor, Rodolph of Upper Burgundy; he was even then unable, on account of the feeble condition of the state, to defend the kingdom effectively against the invasions of the Saracens and the Hungarians.

After the assassination of Berengarius, in 924, Rodolph II. relinquished his claims to Hugh, count of Provence, in exchange for that country. Hugh sought to strengthen the insecure throne of Italy by a bloody tyranny. His nephew, Berengarius, marquis of Ivrea, fled from his snarls to Otho the Great, of Germany, assembled an army of fugitives, returned and overthrew Hugh in 945, who was succeeded by his son Lothaire. Berengarius became his first counsellor. But, after the death of Lothaire, in 950, (poisoned, it was said, by Berengarius), the latter wished to compel his widow—the beautiful Adelaide—contrary to her inclination, to marry his son. Escaping from the prison to which he had consigned her, she took refuge in the castle of Canossa, where she was besieged by Berengarius II. She now applied for aid to Otho I., king of Germany, who passed the Alps, liberated her, conquered Pavia, became king of the Franks and Lombards, and married Adelaide.

To a prompt submission, and the cession of Friuli, (the key of Italy), which Otho gave to his brother Henry, Berengarius was indebted for permission to reign as the vassal of Otho. But the nobles of Italy preferring new complaints against him, ten years after, Otho returned in 961, deposed him, and led him prisoner to Bamberg; and, after having been himself crowned king of Italy with the iron crown, in 961, united this kingdom with the German. Otho gave the great imperial fiefs to Germans, and granted to the Italian cities privileges that were the foundation of a free constitution, for which they soon became ripe.

The growing wealth of the papal court, owing to the munificence of the French kings, which had promoted their influence on the government, so benefited under Leo IV. and popes of a similar character, became, through the corruption of the Roman court, in the tenth century, the first cause of its decline. The clergy and the people elected the popes according to the will of the consuls and a few patricians. Alberic of Camerino, and his son Octavian, were absolute masters of Rome, and the last was pope, under the name of John XII., when twenty years of age. Otho the Great, whom he had crowned emperor in Rome, in 962, deposed him, and chose Leo VIII. in his stead; but the people, jealous of its right of election, chose Benedict V.

From this time, the popes, instead of ruling the people of Rome, became dependent on them. In Lower Italy, the republics of Naples, Gaeta, and Amalfi still defended their independence against the Lombard duchy of Benevento, with the more ease, since the duchy had been divided, in 839, between Siconolfus of Salerno and Radelghisius of Benevento, and subsequently among a great number, and since, with the dukes, they had had a common enemy in the Saracens, who had been previously invited over from Sicily by both parties (about 830), as auxiliaries against each other, but who had settled and maintained themselves in Apulia. The emperors Louis II. and Basilus Macedo had, with combined forces, broken the power of the Muslimans; the former was, nevertheless, unable to maintain himself in Lower Italy, but the Greeks, on the contrary, gained a firmer footing, and formed, of the regions taken from the Saracens, a separate province, called the Thema of Lombardy, which continued under their dominion, though without prejudice to the liberty of the republics, upwards of a hundred years, being governed by a catapan (or governor-general) at Bari. Otho the Great himself did not succeed in driving them altogether from Italy. The marriage of his son, Otho II., with the Greek princess Theophania, put an end to his exertions for this purpose, as did the unfortunate battle at Basentello, to the similar attempts renewed by Otho II. (980).

In opposition to the designs of the count of Tusculum, who wished to supplant the absent emperor at Rome, a noble Roman, the consul Crescentius, in 980, attempted to govern Rome under the semblance of her ancient liberty. Otho II., king since 973, occupied with his projects of conquest in Lower Italy, did not interfere with this administration, which became formidable to the vicious popes Boniface VII. and John XV. But when Otho
III., who had reigned in Germany since 983, raised his kinsman Gregory V. to the papedom, Crescentius caused the latter to be expelled, and John XVI., a Greek, to be elected by the people. He also endeavoured to place Rome again under the nominal supremacy of the Byzantine empire. Otho, however, reinstated Gregory, besieged Crescentius in the castle of St.
Angelo, took him prisoner, and caused him to be beheaded, with twelve other noble Romans, A. D. 998. But the Romans again threw off their allegiance to the emperor, and yielded only to force.

On the death of Otho III. (1002), the Italians considered their connexion with the German empire as dissolved. Harduin, marquis of Ivrea, was elected king, and crowned at Pavia. This was a sufficient motive for Milan, the enemy of Pavia, to declare for Henry II. of Germany. A civil war ensued, in which every city, relying on its walls, took a greater or less part.

Henry was chosen king of Italy by the nobles assembled in Pavia; but disturbances arose, in which a part of the city was destroyed by fire (A. D. 1004). Not till after Harduin's death, which occurred in 1015, was Henry recognized as king by all Lombardy. He was succeeded by Conrad II.

At a diet held at Roncaglia, near Placenza, in 1037, Conrad made the fiefs hereditary by a fundamental law of the empire, and endeavoured to give stability and tranquillity to the state, but without success. The cities (which were daily becoming more powerful) and the bishops were engaged in continual quarrels with the nobility, and the nobility with their vasa-ls, which could not be repressed.

Republican Rome, under the influence of the family of Crescentius, could be reduced to obedience neither by Henry II. and Conrad II., nor by the popes. When Henry III., the son and successor of Conrad, entered Italy in 1040, he found three popes in Rome, all of whom he deposed, appointed in their stead Clement II., and ever after filled the papal chair, by his own authority, with virtuous German ecclesiastics. This reform gave the popes new consequence, which afterwards became fatal to his successor. Henry died in 1056.

During the minority of his son Henry IV.
the policy of the popes, directed by Hildebrand, (afterwards Gregory VII.) succeeded in creating an opposition, which soon became formidable to the secular power. The Normans also contributed to this result.
As early as 1016, warriors from Normandy had established themselves in Calabria and Apulia. Allies sometimes of the Lombards, sometimes of the republics, sometimes of the Greeks against each other and against the Saracens, they constantly became more powerful by petty wars. The great preparation of Leo IX. for their expulsion terminated in his defeat and capture (1053).
On the other hand, Nicolas II. united with the Norman princes, and, in 1059, invested Robert Guiscard with all the territories conquered by him in Lower Italy. From that time, the pope, in his conducts with the imperial power, relied on the support of his faithful vassal, the duke of Apulia and Calabria, to which Sicily was soon added. While the small states of the south were thus united into one large one, the kingdom in the north was dissolving into smaller states. The Lombard cities were laying the foundation of their future importance. Venice, Genoa, and Pisa were already powerful.

In the small republics of the north of Italy, the government was, in most cases, divided between the consuls, the lesser council, the great council, and the popular assembly. Petty feuds developed their youthful energies. Such were those that terminated with the destruction of Lodi by Milan, in 1111, and the ten years' siege of Como by the forces of all the Lombard cities, which lasted from 1118 to 1128. The subjugation of this city rendered Milan the first power in Lombardy, and most of the neighbouring cities were her allies. Others formed a counter alliance with her antagonist, Pavia. Disputes between Milan and Cremona were the occasion of the first war between the two unions (1129), to which the contest of Luthaire II. and Conrad of Hohenstaufen for the crown, soon gave another direction. This was the origin of the Ghibelines (favourers of the emperor) and the Guelfs (the adherents of the family of Guelfs, and, in general, the party of the popes.)

In Rome, the love of liberty, restrained by Gregory VII., rose in proportion as his successors ruled with less energy. The schisms between Gelastus II. and Gregory VIII., Innocent II., and Anacletus II., renewed the hopes of the Romans. Arnold of Brescia, formerly proscribed for his violent attacks against the luxury of the clergy in that country, was their leader. After eight years, Adrian IV. succeeded in effecting his execution.

Frederic I. of Hohenstaufen (called Barbarossa) crossed the Alps six times, in order to defend his possessions in Italy against the republicanism of the Lombard cities. Embracing the cause of Pavia as the weaker, he devastated the territory of Milan, destroyed Tortona, and was crowned in Pavia and Rome. In 1153, he reduced Milan, demolished the fortifications of Piacenza, and held a diet at Roncaglia, where he extended the imperial prerogatives conformably with the Justinian code, gave the cities chief magistrates, and proclaimed a general peace. His rigour having excited a new rebellion, he reduced Cremona to ashes, compelled Milan to submission, and having driven out all the inhabitants, demolished the fortifications.

When the emperor entered Italy in 1163, without an army, the cities concluded a union for maintaining their freedom, which, in 1167, was converted into the Lombard confederacy. The confederates restored Milan, and, to hold in check the Ghibeline city of Pavia built a new city, called, in honour of the pope, Alessandria. Neither Frederic's governor, Christian, archbishop of Mentz, nor he himself, could effect any thing against the confederacy; the former failed before Ancona, with all the power of Ghibeline Tuscany; and the latter, before Alessandria. He was also defeated by Milan, at Legnano, in 1176. He then concluded a concordate with Alexander III., and a truce with the cities at Venice, and a peace, which secured their independence, at Constance (1183.) The republics retained the podestà (foreign noblemen, now elected by themselves) as judges and generals. As formerly, all were to take the oath of fealty and allegiance to the emperor. But, instead of strengthening their league into a permanent confederacy (the only safety for Italy), they were soon split into new factions, when the designs of the Hohenstaufen on the throne of Sicily drew Frederic and Henry VI. from Lombardy.

During the minority of Frederic II., and the disputes for the succession to the German throne, Innocent III., who was Frederic's guardian, succeeded in re-establishing the secular authority of the holy see in Rome, and the surrounding country, and in enforcing its claims to the donations of Charlemaigne and Matilda. He also brought over almost all Tuscany, except Pisa, to the party of the Guelfs. A blind hereditary hatred, rather than a zeal for the cause, inspired the parties; for when Otto IV. ascended the imperial throne, the Guelfs became his party, and the Ghibelines the pope's; but the reversion of the imperial throne to the house of Hohenstaufen, in the person of Frederic II., soon restored the ancient relations.

In Florence, this party spirit gave pre- tence to the disputes of the Buonelmonti and Donati with the Uberti and Amadei, originating in private causes; and most cities were thus internally divided into Guelfs and Ghibelines. The Guelf cities of Lombardy renewed the Lombard confederacy, in 1226. The Dominican, John of Vicenza, attacked these civil wars; and the assembly at Paquara seemed to crown his exertions with success; but his attempt to obtain secular power in Vicenza occasioned his fall. After the emperor had returned from his crusade, in 1230, he waged war, with varying success, against the cities and against Gregory IX., heedless of the excommunication; while Ezzelin da Romano, under the pretence of favouring the Ghibelines, established, by every kind of violence, his own power in Padua, Verona, Vicenza, and the neighbourhood.

The plan of Gregory IX., to depose Frederic, was successfully executed by Innocent IV., in the council of Lyons (1245.) This completely weakened the Ghibeline party, which was already nearly undermined by the intrigues of the mendicant orders. The Bolognese united all the cities of Italy in a Guelf league, and, in the battle of the Panaro, in 1249, took Enzo prisoner, whom they never released. In the Trevisan Mark alone, the Ghibelines possessed the supremacy, by means of Ezzelin, till he fell before a crusade of all the Guelfs against him, in 1255. But these contests were fatal to liberty; the house Della Scala followed that of Romano in the dominion; and Milan itself, with a great part of Lombardy, found masters in the house of Della Torre. Tyrants everywhere arose; the maritime republics and the republic of Tuscany alone remained free.

After Charles I. of Anjou had become, by the favour of the pope, king of Naples, senator of Rome, papal vicar of Tuscany, and had directed his ambition to the throne of

THE LEVEL DISTRICT ROUND NAPLES WAS ANCIENTLY NAMED "CAMPANIA FELIX," AND IS STILL ENTITLED TO THAT NAME FOR ITS FERTILITY.

Italy, (a policy in which his successors persevered), the names of Guelphs and Ghibelines acquired a new significance. The former denoted the friends, the latter the enemies of the French. To these factions were added in the republics, the parties of the nobility and the people, the latter of which was almost universally victorious. The honest exertions of Gregory X. (who died 1276) to establish peace, were of no avail; those of Nicolas III. who feared the preponderance of Charles, were more efficient; but Martin IV., servilely devoted to Charles, destroyed everything which had been effected, and persecuted the Ghibelines with new animosity.

A different interest—that of trade and navigation—impelled the maritime republics to mutual wars. The Genoese assisted Michael Palæologus, in 1261, to recover Constantinople from the Venetians, and received in return Chios; at Meloria, they annihilated the navy of the Pisans, and completed their dominion of the sea by a victory over the Venetians at Curzola, which took place in 1298. Florence rendered its democracy complete by the punishment of all the nobles, and strengthened the Guelph party by wise measures; but a new schism soon divided the Guelphs in Florence and all Tuscany into two factions—The Neri (Black) and Bianchi (White). The latter were almost all expelled by the intrigues of Boniface VIII., and joined the Ghibelines. In Lombardy, freedom seemed to have expired, when the people, weary of the everlasting feuds of their tyrants, rose in most of the cities, and expelled them.

Henry VII., the first emperor who had appeared in Italy for sixty years (1310), restored the princes to their cities, and found general submission to his requisitions, peace among the parties, and homage to the empire. Florence alone undertook the glorious part which she so nobly sustained for two centuries, as the guardian of Italian freedom; she chose Robert of Naples, the enemy of Henry, her protector for five years, and remained free while the other parts of the kingdom were divided into factions and destroyed by intestine wars.

In 1330, John, king of Bohemia, suddenly entered Italy. Invited by the inhabitants of Brescia, favoured by the pope, elected lord of Lucca, every where acting the part of a mediator and peacemaker, he would have succeeded in establishing the power at which he aimed, had he not been opposed by the Florentines. On his second expedition to Italy in 1333 Azzo Visconti, Mastino della Scala, and Robert of Naples, united against him and his ally, the papal legate, Bertrand of Poiet, who aspired to the dominion of Bologna. After the downfall of both in 1334, when the Pepoli began to rule in Bologna, Mastino della Scala, became master of half Lombardy. Florence led the opposition against him, and excited a war of the league, in which it gained nothing but the security of its liberty.

In Rome, Cola Rienzi, in 1347, sought to restore order and tranquillity; he was appointed tribune of the people, but was forced, after seven months, to yield to the nobility. Having returned after seven years of banishment, with the legate cardinal Albornoz, he ruled again a short time, and at length was murdered in an insurrection. The Genoese, tired of the perpetual disputes of the Ghibeline Spinolas and Durias with the Guelph Grimaldi and Fieschi, banished all these families in 1339, and made Simon Boccanegra their first doge.

In 1347 Italy suffered by a terrible famine, and a still more terrible pestilence in the year following, which swept away two thirds of the population. No less terrible was the scourge of the bande (banditti), or large companies of soldiers, who after every peace, continued the war on their own account, ravaging the whole country with fire and sword.

Pope Innocent VI. succeeded in conquering the whole of the states of the church, by means of the cardinal legate, Egidius Albornoz (1354-60); but, reduced to extremities by the oppressions of the legates, and encouraged by Florence, the conquered cities revolted in 1375. The cruelties of cardinal Robert of Geneva (afterwards Clement VII.), and of his band of soldiers from Bretagne, produced only a partial subjugation; and the great schism, the freedom of these cities, or rather the power of their petty tyrants, was fully confirmed.

The Visconti, meanwhile, persisting in their schemes of conquest, arrayed the whole strength of Italy in opposition to them, and caused the old factions of Guelphs and Ghibelines soon to be forgotten in the impending danger. Genoa submitted to John Visconti, who had purchased Bologna from the Pepoli in 1350; but his enterprise against Tuscany failed through the resistance of the confederated Tuscan republics. Another league against him was concluded by the Venetians with the petty tyrants of Lombardy. But the union of the Florentines with the Visconti against the papal legates, continued but a short time. In Florence, the Guelphs were divided into the parties of the Ricci and the Albizzi. The sedition of the Ciompi to which this gave rise, was quelled by Michael di Lando, who had been elected gonfaloniere by themselves, in a way no less manly than disinterested.

The Venetians, irritated with Carrara, on account of the assistance he had given the Genoese in the war at Chioggia (1379), looked quietly on while John Galeazzo Visconti deprived the Della Scala and Carrara of all their possessions; and Florence alone assisted the unfortunate princeps. Francis Carrara made himself again master of Padua, in 1390, and maintained his advantages, till he sunk under the enmity of the Venetians (1406), who changing their policy, became henceforth, instead of the opponents, the rivals of the ambitious views of the Visconti.

In 1395, John Galeazzo obtained from the emperor Wenceslaus the investiture of Milan as a duchy, purchased Pisa (which his natural son Gabriel bargained away to Florence, 1406), from the tyrant Gherard of Appiano (who reserved only the principality of Piombino), and subjugated Siena, Perugia, and Bologna; so that Florence, fearfully menaced, alone stood against him in the cause of liberty. On his death, in 1402, the prospect brightened, and during the minority of his sons, a great portion of his states were lost. When Ladislaus of Naples, taking advantage of the schism, made himself master of all the Ecclesiastical States, and threatened to conquer all Italy, Florence again alone dared to resist him. But this danger was transitory; the Visconti soon rose up again in opposition.

Duke Philip Maria reconquered all his states of Lombardy, by means of the great Carmagnola (1416-20). Genoa also, which was sometimes given up, in nominal freedom to stormy factions (of the Fregona, Adorni, Montalto, Guasco), and at other times was subject to France, or to the marquis of Monterrat, submitted to him (1421). Florence subsequently entered into an alliance against him with the Venetians (1425); and by means of Carmagnola, who had now come over to them, they conquered the whole country as far as the Adda, and retained it in the peace of Ferrara (1428).

After Milan had been enfeebled by the Venetians and Florentines, and while Alfonso of Arragon was constantly disturbed in Naples, by the Anjou party, no dangerous predominance of power existed in Italy, though mutual jealousy still excited frequent wars, in which two parties among the Italian mercenary soldiers, the Bracheschi and the Sforzeschi, continued always hostile to each other, contrary to the custom of those mercenary hands. After the extinction of the Visconti, in 1447, Francis Sforza succeeded in gaining possession of the Milanese state. The Venetians, who aimed at territorial aggrandisement, having formed a connection with some princes against him, he found an ally in Florence, which, with a change of circumstances, wisely altered her policy. About this time, the family of the Medici attained to power in that city by their wealth and talent. Milan, where the Sforza had established themselves; Venice, which possessed half of Lombardy; Florence, wisely managed by Lorenzo Medici, the states of the church, for the most part restored to the holy see; and Naples, which was incapable of employing its forces in direct attacks on other states, constituted, in the fifteenth century, the political balance of Italy, which, during the manifold feuds of these states, permitted no one to become dangerous to the independence of the rest, till 1494, when Charles VIII. of France entered Italy to conquer Naples, and Louis Moro Sforza played the part first of his ally, then of his enemy, while the pope, Alexander VI., eagerly sought the friendship of the French, to promote the exaltation of his son, Cesar Borgia.

A long succession of military contests now took place, which were chiefly excited by invasions from Germany, or by the efforts of party leaders at home to usurp power over the free cities; but we must pass by these, and merely observe that the Medici family ultimately succeeded in establishing their sway. The brief tranquillity of Italy, however, was soon destined to be disturbed by the grasping ambition of the warlike pope, Julius II., who completed the subjugation of the states of the church, not, indeed, for a son or nephew, but in the name of the holy see. He concluded with Maximilian I., Ferdinand the Catholic, and Louis XII., the league of Cambray (1508), against the ambitious policy of the Venetians, who succeeded in dissolving the league which threatened them with destruction. The pope then formed a league with the Venetians themselves, Spain, and the Swiss, for the purpose of driving the French from Italy. This holy league did not, however, then attain its object, although Julius was little affected by the French and German council held at Pisa to depose him. Maximilian Sforza, who had re-acquired Milan, relinquished it without reserve to Francis I., in 1515; but the emperor Charles V. assumed it as a reverted fief of the empire, and conferred it on Francisco Sforza, brother of Maximilian, in 1520. This was the cause of violent wars, in which the efforts of Francis were always unsuccessful. He was taken prisoner at Pavia, and, with his other claims, was compelled to renounce those on Milan, when remained to Sforza, and after his death, was granted by Charles V. to his son Philip. The Medicean popes Leo X. and Clement VII. were bent, for the most part, on the aggrandisement of their family. Charles V., to whom all Italy submitted after the battle of Pavia, frustrated, indeed, the attempts of Clement VII. to weaken his power, and conquered and pillaged Rome in 1527; but, being reconciled with the pope, he raised the Medici to princely authority.

Florence incurred at the foolish conduct of Pietro towards France, had banished the Medici in 1494, but recalled them in 1519; and was compelled to take a station among the principalities, under duke Alexander I. de Medici. Italian policy, of which Florence had hitherto been the soul, from this period is destitute of a common spirit, and the history of Italy is therefore destitute of a central point.

After the extinction of the male branch of the marquises of Monterrat, Charles V. gave this country to Gonzaga of Mantua, Maximilian II., subsequently raised Monterrat to a duchy. The Florentines failed (1587) in a new attempt to emancipate themselves, after the death of duke Alexander, who fell by the hands of an assassin. Cosmo I. succeeded him in the government, by the influence of Charles V. Parma and Piacenza, which Julius II. had conquered for the papal see, Paul III. erected into a duchy, in 1545, which he gave to his natural son, Peter Alois Farnese, whose son Ottavio obtained the imperial investiture in 1556. Genoa, subject to the French since 1499, found a deliverer in Andrew Doria (1528). He founded the aristocracy, and the conspiracy of Fiesco (1547) failed to subvert him. In 1553, besides Milan, Charles V. conferred Naples on his son Philip II. By the peace of Chateau-Cambrésis, in 1559, Philip II. and Henry II. of France, renounced all their claims to Piedmont, which was restored to its rightful sovereign, duke Emanuel Philibert of Savoy, the brave Spanish general.

The legitimate male line of the house of Este became extinct in 1597, when the illegitimate Cesareo of Este obtained Modena and Reggio from the empire, and Ferrara was confiscated as a reverted fief by the holy see. In the second half of the sixteenth century, the prosperity of Italy was increased by a long peace, as much as the loss of its commerce allowed; Henry IV. of France having, by the treaty of Lyons, ceded Saluzzo, the last French possession in Italy, to Savoy. The tranquillity continued till the contest for the succession of Mantua and Monterrat, after the extinction of the Gonzaga family (1627). Misfortunes in Germany compelled Ferdinand II. to confer both countries, in 1631, as a fief on Charles of Nevers, the protégé of France, whose family remained in possession till the war of the Spanish succession. In the peace of Chiasso (1631), Richelieu's diplomacy acquired also Pignerol and Casale—strong points of support, in case of new invasions of Italy, though he had to relinquish the latter, in 1637. By the extinction of the house Della Rovere, the duchy of Urbino, with which Julius II. had invested it, devolved, in 1631, to the papal see.

In the second half of the seventeenth century, the peace of Italy was not interrupted, excepting by the attempts of Louis XIV. on Savoy and Piedmont, and appeared to be secured for a long time by the treaty of neutrality at Turin (1696), when the war of the Spanish succession broke out. Austria having conquered Milan, Mantua, and Monterrat, retained the two first, (for Mantua was forfeited by the felony of the duke), and gave the latter to Savoy. In the peace of Utrecht, Austria obtained Sardinia and Naples; Savoy obtained Sicily, which it exchanged with Austria for Sardinia, from which it assumed the royal title. Mont Genievre was made the boundary between France and Italy. The house of Farnese becoming extinct in 1731, the Spanish infant Charles obtained Parma and Piacenza. In the war for the Polish throne, of 1773, Charles Emmanuel of Savoy, in alliance with France and Spain, conquered the Milanese territory, and received therefrom, in the peace of Vienna (1738), Novara and Tortona. Charles, infant of Spain, became king of the Two Sicilies, and ceded Parma and Piacenza to Austria.

The Medici of Florence, entitled, since 1575, grand-dukes of Tuscany, became extinct in 1737. Francis Stephan, duke of Lorraine, now received Tuscany by the preliminaries of Vienna, and, becoming emperor in 1745, made it the appanage of the younger line of the Austro-Lorraine house. In 1745, the Spaniards conquered Milan, but were expelled thence by Charles Emmanuel, to whom Maria Theresa ceded, in reward, some Milanese districts. Massa and Carrara fell to Modena, in 1743, by right of inheritance. The Spanish Infant, don Philip, conquered Parma and Piacenza in his own name, lost them, and obtained them again as a hereditary duchy, by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748.

At the era of the French revolution, Italy was divided between the principality of Savoy, the Ecclesiastical States, the republics of Venice and Genoa, the grand duchy of Tuscany, and the small principalities of Parma and Modena. Naples and Sicily were governed by a king belonging to the house of Bourbon; and Mantua, Milan, and some other places were in the possession of Austria.

In September, 1792, the French troops first penetrated into Savoy, and planted the tree of liberty. Though expelled for some time, in 1793, by the Piedmontese and Austrians, they held it at the end of the year. The National Convention had already declared war against Naples, and the French advanced into the Piedmontese and Genoese territories, but were repelled from Italy in July, 1795, by the Austrians, Sardinians, and Neapolitans. In 1796, Napoleon Buonaparte received the chief command of the French army in Italy. He forced the king of Sardinia to conclude a treaty of peace, by which the latter was obliged to cede Nice and Savoy to France; conquered Austrian Lombardy, with the exception of Mantua; put the duke of Parma and the pope under contribution; and struck such consternation into the king of Naples, that he begged for peace.

After Mantua had also fallen, in 1797, Buonaparte formed of Milan, Mantua, the portion of Parma north of the Po, and Modena, the Cisalpine republic. France likewise made war on the pope, and annexed Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna to the Cisalpine republic (1797), by the peace of Tolentino. The French then advanced towards Rome, overthrew the ecclesiastical government, and erected a Roman republic (1798). In Genoa, Buonaparte occasioned a revolution, by which a democratic republic was formed after the model of the French under the name of the Ligurian republic. The French had, meanwhile, penetrated into Austria, through the Venetian territory. The Venetians now made common cause with the brave Tyrolese, who gained advantages over the French in the Alps. Buonaparte, therefore, occupied Venice without striking a blow, and gave the republic a democratic constitution; but, by the peace of Campo-Fornio (17th Oct. 1797), the Venetian territory, as far as the FORMATION.

Adige, was relinquished to Austria, and the rest incorporated with the Cisalpine republic. The king of Sardinia concluded a treaty of alliance and subsidy with France, October 25; but, in 1798, the directory, assembled in Rome from Naples, deemed it expedient to compel him to resign his territories on the main land.

Notwithstanding its treaty of amity with France, Naples concluded an alliance, in 1798, with Britain and Russia. The French, therefore, occupied Naples, and erected there the Parthenopean republic. The grand-duke of Tuscany had likewise formed an alliance with Naples and Britain, and his country was, in return, compelled by the French to receive, like Piedmont, a military administration. After the congress of Radstadt was broken off, Austria and the German empire, under Russian support, renewed the war against the French, who again left Naples and Rome to the British, Russians, and Turks. The king and the pope returned to their capitals in Lombardy; the French were defeated by the Austrians, under Kray and Melas, and by the Russians, under Suwarroff, and lost all their fortresses, except Genoa, where Massena sustained a vigorous siege, while his countrymen had to evacuate all Italy. But, in the mean while, Buonaparte was made first consul after his return from Egypt. He marched with a new army to Italy, defeated the Austrians at the memorable battle of Marengo (1800), and compelled them to capitulation, by which all the Italian fortresses were again evacuated.

By the peace of Luneville, Feb. 9, 1801, the possession of Venice was confirmed to Austria, which was to indemnify the duke of Modena, by the cession of Briegau. The duke of Parma received Tuscany, and afterwards, from Buonaparte, the title of king of Etruria. Parma was united with France. The Cisalpine and Ligurian republics were guaranteed by Austria and France, and with the Ligurian territories were united the imperial fiefs included within their limits. The king of Naples, who had occupied the states of the church, was obliged to conclude peace at Florence. By Russian mediation, he escaped with the cession of Piombino, the Stato degli Presidj, and his half of the island of Elba, together with the promise of closing his harbours against the British. The other half of Elba Tuscany had already relinquished to France. But the whole island was obstinately defended by the British and Corsicans, with the armed inhabitants, and not evacuated till autumn. The Stato degli Presidj France ceded to Etruria, September 19; but strong detachments of French troops remained both in Naples and Tuscany, and their support cost immense sums. To the republics of Genoa and Lucca the first consul gave new constitutions in 1801. But, in January, 1802, the Cisalpine republic was transformed into the Italian republic, in imitation of the new French constitution, and Buonaparte became president. Genoa also received a new constitution, and Girolamo Durazzo for doge. Piedmont, however, was united with France.

After Buonaparte had become emperor, in 1804, he attached (March 17, 1805) the royal crown of Italy to the new imperial crown; he promised, however, never to unite the new monarchy with France, and even to give it a king of its own. The new constitution was similar to that of the French empire. Napoleon founded the order of the iron crown, and having placed the crown on his own head, at Milan, he appointed his step-son, Eugene Beauharnais, viceroy of Italy, who laboured with great zeal for the improvement of all branches of the government, of industry, and the arts. Circumstances, however, rendered this new government oppressive, as the public expenses, during peace, amounted to 100,000,000 francs, which were all to be contributed by less than 4,000,000 people.

No European power recognized, expressly, the Italian kingdom of Napoleon. The emperor continued to strengthen his power against the active enemies of the new order of things, and gave to his sister Elisa the principality of Piombino, and to her husband, Pasquale Paolicchi, the republic of Lucca, as a principality, both as French fiefs. Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla were incorporated with the French empire, July 21st. The pope was obliged to sanction the imperial coronation by his presence. Austria now acceded to the alliance of Russia and Britain against France. Naples, also, again suffered the British and Russians to land. But the success of the Austrian arms was frustrated by the defeats at Ulm and Austerlitz; after which the peace of Presburg completed the French supremacy in Italy. Austrian Venice, with Istria and Dalmatia, were united to the kingdom of Italy; and this, with all the French institutions, Italy recognized.

The kingdom had now an extent of 35,450 square miles, with 5,657,000 inhabitants. Naples was evacuated by its auxiliaries, and occupied by the French, notwithstanding the attempts of the queen to excite an universal insurrection. Napoleon then gave the crown of Naples to his brother Joseph.

In 1803, the widow of the king of Etruria, who conducted the regency in behalf of her minor son, was deprived of her kingdom, which was united with France. Napoleon, moreover, appointed his brother-in-law, the prince Borghese, governor-general of the departments beyond the Alps, who took up his residence at Turin. As Napoleon had, meanwhile, given his brother Joseph the crown of Spain, he filled the throne of Naples with his brother-in-law, Joachim Murat, until that period grand-duke of Berg, who entered Naples Sept. 6, 1808.

In 1809, the emperor gave Tuscany to his sister Elisa, of Piombino, with the title of grand-duchess. In the same year, Austria made new exertions to break the excessive power of France; but Napoleon again drove her troops from the field, and revolutionary feeling was by no means suppressed; and throughout the whole of the Peninsula an unsettled and discontented spirit continued to prevail. In 1830 the revolution in France still further fomented the desire of change; and Modena, Bologna, Parma, and other states, set up the standard of revolt. Hopes had been entertained that help would be easily found from the actors in the French revolution, and that Lombardy would join a confederacy labouring for the emancipation of Italy at large. But these expectations were ill founded. France could not interfere, and Austria was ready with an army of 100,000 men to put down the first demonstration of revolt. After a brief struggle the malcontents were every where subdued, and the expelled princes returned to the peaceable possession of their ancient seats. Matters remained in status quo, till 1846, when the whole Peninsula was once more shaken by the reforming spirit which Pius IX. exhibited on his election to the Papal Chair. Every where Italians then felt that for the first time for many years they had a future before them. In January, 1846, the king of Naples, whose Sicilian subjects were in actual rebellion, promulgated a constitution. Soon afterwards, the king of Sardinia and the grand duke of Tuscany followed his example. But amid many changes and many hopes, the one greatest hope and the greatest change stood forth prominently under the name of Independence. Republicans, Constitutionalists, and Absolutists, all joined in the desire, real or feigned, to see the Italian provinces rid of the Austrians, or the foreigners, as they were styled: and soon after the shock of February 1848, which established a republic in France, the passionate desire broke forth in acts.

The first outbreak was in Lombardy. On the 18th of March the news arrived of the revolution at Vienna. The Milanese, availing themselves of the difficulties of the Austrian government, demanded that all political prisoners should be set at liberty, a national guard armed, and a provisional government chosen, to prevent anarchy. But with this demand neither the Austrian general, Radetsky, nor the director of the police, would comply. Meanwhile, the popular enthusiasm increased from hour to hour. Barricades were every where erected; arms were obtained from all quarters, and the troops were repulsed on every side. This passed on Sunday the 19th March. For five days, since called "the Five Days of Milan," the struggle raged with little interruption; but on the morning of Thursday, the 28th of March, the Austrian army withdrew from Milan: and the provisional government immediately issued an energetic proclamation, calling upon all Italians to join in the contest that had begun. The king of Sardinia at once responded to the call; after some "coy reluctant" delay, Pope Pius IX. and the king of Naples were forced by the clamours of their respective subjects to send a large force to the aid of the insurgents.

General Pepe, the revolutionary hero of 1821, was appointed to the chief command. The enthusiasm of the Neapolitans, indeed, knew no bounds. Brilliant reviews

In the morning, patriotic songs and serenades in the evening, consumed the brief space which intervened before the first division of the army was in readiness to move. After some vexatious delays, 17,000 men at length left Naples for the Lombard war. They were to be followed speedily by 24,000 more. Pepe, in the meantime, proceeded by sea to Ancona, which had been fixed upon as the rendezvous of the Neapolitan forces, previous to the commencement of active operations. But in the midst of all these preparations, the Neapolitan cabinet had determined that the expedition should never reach its pretended destination.

On joining the first division of his army at Ancona, Pepe was naturally eager to take part in the great struggle in Lombardy, which was then at the hottest. He quickly discovered, however, that the superior officers by whom he was surrounded had no intention to cross bayonets with the Austrians. Still he was in expectation of the second and larger division of his army, which might be more patriotically disposed. This second division, however, never appeared, and was never intended to appear. After some delay, instead of the expected aid, there came a peremptory order from Naples, recalling the whole of the troops under Pepe's command to protect the capital against the disaffected within its walls.

Meanwhile, fortune had hitherto smiled upon the arms of the king of Sardinia. After the "five days" of Milan, the Austrian commander had prudently fallen back upon the great fortresses of Mantua and Verona, with the double object of providing for the safety of his troops, and of waiting the arrival of reinforcements. In his front he had the main army of the king of Sardinia, flushed with its past successes, and far outnumbering the imperial force. In his rear, the papal army, under Durando, lay at Vicenza; while on every side a hostile population was ready to intercept his supplies and impede his operations. Such was the position of affairs in the end of May.

But all these advantages were very shortly afterwards more than counterbalanced by the masterly operations of Radetsky to the eastward of the Adige. Having received reinforcements under Welden to the amount of 35,000 men, he immediately commenced active operations; and the papal army, which occupied Vicenza, was the first object of attack. This enterprise, which was conducted with the utmost secrecy and expedition, was crowned with complete success. After a faint show of resistance, the Roman general surrendered, with nearly 20,000 men, on condition of their being allowed to recross the Po, with all the honours of war. The terms were granted by Radetsky; and after the departure of the Roman troops, he was again sole master of the Venetian provinces, with the means of ready and uninterrupted communication with Austria Proper. The tide of victory had now fairly turned against the king of Sardinia, and his adversary, no less enterprising than prudent, lost no time in following up his tardy triumph. Charles Albert had still under his command about 80,000 men.

THE KING OF NAPLES HAD NO REAL DESIRE FOR THE INDEPENDENCE OF ITALY.

The Treasury of History, &c.

The numbers under Radetsky, who now began to act on the offensive, were nearly as great, and much better supplied with all the material of war. Under such circumstances, the chances of success in the open country were in favour of the Austrians. The Piedmontese, betrayed by the Neapolitans, and abandoned by the Romans, still fought bravely, but without any definite plan; and after sustaining at least two serious defeats, Charles Albert retired precipitately upon his own dominions, with the loss of fully one-half of his army. He did not even, during his hasty retreat, attempt to defend Milan, which, after the lapse of four eventful months, again fell into the undisputed possession of the Austrians. A formal armistice was at the same time concluded; and the mediation of the great powers was offered for the purpose of effecting a final arrangement, which might be beneficial both to Austria and Italy.

After the retreat of Charles Albert, the Venetians who had embarked with enthusiasm in the war, were left almost entirely to their own resources; but in their isolation they displayed a constancy and a spirit worthy the brightest days of the republic. The garrison, which was composed chiefly of volunteers, many of whom were members of the first families in Italy, not only defended the city throughout the autumn and winter of 1848, but they ventured to leave the shelter of the lagoons, and to attack the Austrian intrenchments on the main land. On the 27th of October, a descent was made upon Mestre, which proved eminently successful. Of 3000 Austrians who were posted there, 600 were taken prisoners; and an equal number were killed or wounded, while the loss of the Venetians was comparatively small.

Throughout the winter and the ensuing spring, the struggle still continued with equal obstinacy upon both sides, and with varying success. But a contest more important than that in which Venice was so nobly engaged, was soon to attract the eyes of Europe. In the beginning of March, 1849, it became apparent that a renewal of hostilities between Austria and Sardinia was inevitable. Charles Albert was still the master of 100,000 troops; and with these he had resolved to strike another blow for the independence of Italy. It was a rash, but by no means a hopeless enterprise; for Venice yet held out, and the whole population of Northern Italy was still burning to shake off the Austrian yoke, which galled the more severely after its temporary removal, and its unlooked for return. Radetsky, indeed, was now at Milan, at the head of a numerous and well-appointed army; and, with the undisturbed possession of the German passes, he could obtain from the heart of the empire whatever supplies he might require. Regardless, however, of the now comparatively secure position of his adversary, the king of Sardinia once more pushed forward to the frontiers of Lombardy with the whole of his available force. At Novara the contending parties were nearly matched, numbering upon either side about 50,000 men. The combat was long and obstinate, but Austrian discipline at length prevailed. Throughout the day Charles Albert, with his two sons, shared all the dangers of the field. The Duke of Genoa had three horses killed under him; and several of the royal staff fell close to the person of the king. It was not until the battle was irretrievably lost that he retired with reluctance, and still within range of the enemy's guns, upon Novara.

In the evening he called around him his chief attendants and his sons; and having briefly explained his sentiments, he formally abdicated his crown in favour of the duke of Savoy. He then took an affectionate farewell of every one present, and departed alone in his travelling carriage, without a single attendant. Not one of his officers was permitted to share the solitude of his journey, nor was any one aware of his intended destination. In a few short months he found, in his voluntary exile at Oporto, that death which he had sought in vain on the banks of the Ticino.

With the second defeat of the Sardinian army, the cause of Italy was virtually lost. But the spirit of the people was still unshaken. Even after this event, the citizens of Brescia, although threatened by victorious Austrian armies upon every side, rose and expelled the garrison which occupied their citadel. But General Haynau soon afterwards with a large force reduced the city amid revolting barbarities. The fall of Brescia was speedily followed by that of Rome, whose stirring history during this eventful period has been told elsewhere; and the Sicilians, after a long but ineffectual struggle, were once more reduced to subjection.

On the south of the Alps, throughout the summer of 1849, the cause of Italian nationality was maintained alone by Venice, and nobly did she uphold her ancient fame. Fraud and force proved equally unavailing to subdue her. But hunger and pestilence at length accomplished that which Austrian bayonets had failed to effect. Towards the middle of August, the supply of bread in the city became exhausted; while, at the same time, the cholera was daily sweeping off 200 victims in a population of little more than 200,000. The ammunition, too, was nearly all expended; but even under these desperate circumstances, without hope, and without an ally in the world, the Venetians never seemed to have entertained the notion of an unconditional surrender. Aware, however, that the resistance of the Ocean city had awakened the sympathies of Europe, the Imperial authorities probably felt that some consideration was due to the opinions of the age. After a brief correspondence with the provisional government, terms of a capitulation, highly honourable to the besieged, were offered and accepted. The last act of the revolutionary drama had now closed, and the cause of Italian independence was once more laid low throughout the entire Peninsula.

THE HISTORY OF VENICE.

Or all the republics of Italy, Venice is that whose history is the most interesting and singular; it has all the startling brilliancy of romance, and fully justifies the remark of a great modern poet,—"Truth is strange, stranger than fiction." Even the termination of her independent existence differed from that of other states; it was only in the expiring throes of her once vast power that the springs of the policy which were created, and so long maintained, by that power were laid bare to the world's gaze. The policy of other states was obvious in their acts; but until the last vestige of Venetian power and independence was annihilated by the iron hand of Napoleon, the results, only, of Venetian policy were to be seen, the process never. In looking with steadfast eye upon that process it will be impossible to avoid a feeling of disgust and indignation at many of the individual acts of the government; but equally impossible will it be to withhold praise from its general wisdom. The tyranny to which some of the noblest and best blood in Venice was sacrificed we must detest; but the stern severity with which the domestic traitor was put down, and the exquisite policy by which the foreign foe was houndwinked or misled, we cannot but admire and approve.

The history of Venice is now, more than ever, interesting to us; for it is in our day that a blow, as swift and as crushing as the thunderbolt, has struck out of the list of independent states this ancient republic, so remarkable in site and in institutions.

At the north eastern extremity of Italy, between the Alps and the north-western coast of the Adriatic, there was settled from a very early age a people called the Heneti or Veneti, from whom the fertile district in question was called Venetia. From their position at the extremity of Italy it might be reasonably inferred that they were originally some nomade tribe of Northmen, and among the latest, if not the very latest of the early colonizers of Italy from that quarter. But a very great difference of opinion exists as to their actual origin. Both poetically and popularly they have been supposed to be the Heneto-Paphlagonces, mentioned by Homer, who, having lost their leader in the Trojan war, were led into Europe by Antenor, and, having arrived at the head of the Adriatic gulf, expelled the Euganei, and settled there. Strabo thinks differently, and believes them to have been originally from Gaul—there having been a Gallic tribe of that name. But Polybius states, that though the Veneti undoubtedly resembled the Gauls in some of their manners and customs, they differed from them in language. Moreover, it is well observed by a modern historian, that whatever might be the resemblances between the Veneti and a Gallic tribe of the same name, as to manners, customs, and even dress, there is one striking part in the history of the former which may be looked upon as almost irrefragable evidence that it is not in Gaul that we must look for their origin. It is this; that, having a Gallic colony in their immediate neighbourhood, the Veneti constantly took the part of Rome against that colony in all occasions of dispute. Now if we suppose the Veneti to be of Gallic origin it is impossible to account for this course; it is contrary to all that we know of the principles of human nature and of the history of human action, that men should side with the stranger against their fellow-countrymen. That the account which makes them the Heneto Paphlagonces of Homer is correct seems by no means improbable. We may easily suppose that, having crossed the Bosphorus, they passed over the plains of Thrace, skirted the Danube and the Save into Croatia, and at length halted in the north-western shore of the Adriatic, and either expelled or subjected the people whom they found there.

Whatever the origin of the Venetians, it is quite certain that at a very early period they were extremely prosperous and powerful. The very nature of the country would indicate this, as well as account for the long independence of Venice; an independence which lasted during some of the mightiest desolations of the world; which witnessed the expiring agony and downfall of the mighty empire of Rome; the rise of the French empire in the West, when Clovis conquered the Gauls; the rise and fall of the Ostrogoths in Italy and of the Visigoths in Spain; of the Lombards who succeeded the former, and of the Saracens who supplanted the latter! The Comte Figliosi, a learned modern historian of Venice, very clearly shows that in the most distant times the people which occupied the country since called the Venetian states, of the Terra Firma, also occupied Rialto and its sixty neighbouring islets; and that from that circumstance arose the titles of Venetia Prima and Venetia Secunda, the first being applied to the continental territory, the second to the Venetian isles. The fertility of the former naturally inclined the inhabitants to agriculture; the situation of the latter in the midst of canals, at the embouchure of rivers, and near the Grecian islands, as naturally disposed to navigation and commerce, and led to maritime skill, and the wealth and power of which that is invariably the creator.

It is not until the fourth century after the building of Rome that we find any mention made of the Venetians as a people; but the manner in which they are then mentioned by Polybius, shows that their prosperity and strength must even then have been of very long standing, and arrived at a very high pitch. We have it on the authority of that historian, that the very existence of Rome may be said to have been preserved by the Veneti, on an occasion when the Gauls had made themselves masters of every foot of the eternal city, with the exception of the capitol. The Gauls, a restless, bold, and greedy people, were still, even in the fourth century of Rome, an almost nomadic people. Polybius tells us that they were scattered about in villages unenclosed by walls. Of furniture they knew not the use. Their way of life was simple as that of the most unreclaimed savages; they knew no other bed than the grass, nor any other nutriment than the wild animals which they hunted down or enquired. The arts and sciences were wholly unknown to them. Their wealth consisted of gold and cattle; the sole things which could with facility be removed from place to place as vagrant fancy or pressing conjuncture might demand. Such was the people who in the year 364 from the building of Rome, defeated the Romans in the pitched battle of Allia, marched upon the city itself, beating the Romans in every skirmish during three successive days, and obtained possession of all but the capitol itself. At this most critical juncture the Veneti poured into Gaul with a fury which speedily relieved Rome of her foes, who hastened to defend their families and possessions.

Much difference of opinion has existed as to whether the Veneti were at this time the allies or the subjects of Rome; but we are disposed to think that they were the former, or Rome would not have sent a formal embassy to acknowledge and thank them for this timely and important service. It was not thus that haughty Rome treated those who were already subjected to her. But powerful and wealthy as the Veneti already were, not even their power and wealth could permanently keep them independent of the daily increasing power and profound policy of Rome. Friendly allies probably in the first instance, the Veneti, whether from force, fear, or in the well-founded hope of protection, at length became dependent upon Rome. They furnished a contingent force to Rome in the second Punic war, and Rome, on the other hand, defended Venetia as one of its proper provinces. In truth, it is of little consequence how Venetia passed from alliance to subjection; from voluntarily serving a neighbour, to marching under the orders of a protector and master. Such fate inevitably awaited the smaller and weaker of the neighbouring states; and the subtle policy of Rome was little likely to overlook the importance of adding to its provinces a district which contained fifty cities, and a population of from a million to a million and a half; a district, too, which, in addition to its fertility as a grain growing country, could boast a breed of horses which frequently carried away the Olympic victory from the swiftest steeds that Greece herself could produce.

However subjected, it is certain that in the years of Rome 682-3, just after the defeat of the Cimbric and Teutones by Marius, Venetia became a part of the Roman province called Transalpine Gaul, and was governed by a prætor. From this time forth we must, for some centuries, speak of it in connection with Rome; of whose disasters we shall see that fertile Venetia Prima was the desolated victim—and the maritime Venetia Secunda the glorious and mighty consequence. Continental Venice, if subjected to the power of Rome, was at the same time admitted to its privileges and made participator of its advantages. Governed by a Roman prætor, they also voted in the Roman assemblies of the people; and furnishing a contingent of men and money when the affairs of Rome demanded it, they also had the aid of Roman taste and Roman wealth in improving and beautifying their cities, as numerous remains, especially in Verona, show at this day.

From the annexation of Venice to Rome, until the end of the fourth century of the Christian era, it is in Roman history that the reader must look for such slight mention as is made at all of the affairs of Venetia; and we pass, therefore, in the present sketch to the commencement of the fourth century of the Christian era.

The fierce northern people known by the name of Goths, being expelled by the no less fierce and still more powerful Huns, about the year 376, were allowed to settle themselves in the vast plains of Thrace. Actuated partly, perhaps, by gratitude to Rome, but still more by hatred of the Huns, the Goths were of signal service to the western empire, to which the Huns were a dreaded and perpetually troublesome enemy. Alaric, the Gothic leader, who the most distinguished himself in this auxiliary warfare, was far too acute not to perceive the weakness of the once mighty people of which he was the temporary ally and the seemingly grateful guest; and he was far too ambitious and restless in his nature, to see that weakness without design to take advantage of it. From merely aiding Theodosius the Great to repel the Huns, Alaric easily got leave to assist in putting down the rebellions of Argobastus and Eugenius, who aimed at the imperial purple. This interference in the internal affairs of Rome at once increased Alaric's insight into her actual condition, and his desire to become the master of that empire, of which hitherto he had only been the sheltered guest or the paid servant. A considerable territory in Thrace and high honorary rank in the Roman army should have been deemed by Alaric himself a sufficient reward for all the services he had rendered to Rome; especially as Rome had sheltered the Goths as distressed fugitives long before she asked their aid as warlike allies. But a plea was necessary to justify the auxiliary in becoming the foeman; and accordingly as soon as Alaric saw that the state of public affairs was such as to promise him success, he began to call men and angels to witness how faithfully and boldly he had served Rome, and how scantly and ungratefully she had rewarded his good services.

Both courts, the eastern and the western, abounded with men who wished to see confusion and warfare in the very midst of their native country; some in mere political or personal hatred of their rulers, others in the still more detestable hope that barbaric legions might be so far successful as to throw the empires into that state in which the strongest arm and the sharpest sword would be the best title to all possessions. Rufinus, though he was tutor to young Arcadius after the death of Theodosius the Great, was the most active of the traitors who wished for the success of the barbarian malecontent; and aided him not only with secret advice and information, but also with considerable sums of money. Thus aided and encouraged, Alaric overran Pannonia, Macedonia, and those parts of Thrace which were adjacent to his settlement and sufficiently wealthy to be worth his destroying labour. Stilicho, the general of Honorius, who then reigned over the western empire, was for a time successful against Alaric; but by an unfortunate over-confidence gave the able barbarian opportunity of retaliation, which he so effectually used, that Honorius was fain to recall his general from aiding the Greeks, and convert the Goth from an enemy into an ally, by giving him the sovereignty of all Illyria. The increase of power which Alaric necessarily obtained from increase of territory was little likely to decrease either his enmity to Honorius, whose general had temporarily defeated him, or his desire to overrun the western empire, which promised much richer spoil than the Grecian territory he had already ravaged.

Causing himself to be elevated upon a shield—the ancient enthronement of a warrior king—he was proclaimed, amidst the shouts of his fierce soldiery, king of the Visigoths. Increasing his already immense army by recruits from the banks of the Danube, he pointed to Rome and the smiling Italian lands, and promised their spoils to his followers; and, unfortunately, his fierce hatred of Rome and love of bloodshed and plunder were fully equalled by the timidity and irresolution of Honorius. That feeble monarch was speedily convinced of his inferiority to his barbaric opponent; and was from the very outset of the war worsted by him, in despite of a literally innumerable army, composed partly of veteran troops and partly of barbarian levies from the very extremities of the empire.

The very name of Honorius, by weakening the frontiers of the empire in order to concentrate an enormous, but to say injuriously unskilfully, force in the interior, was in the highest degree favourable to Alaric, who thus penetrated without the slightest difficulty into the interior of Italy, which speedily swarmed with his troops.

Stilicho, the man who, of all the emperor's friends and advisers, was probably the most likely to have proved the successful defender of the empire, who had already given such signal proofs of both ability and zeal, was sacrificed partly to that vague, but no less bitter, hatred which the multitude of all times and all ages bear to towering and highly successful talent, and partly to the mingled timidity and treachery of Honorius himself, who had learned to fear the ability of Stilicho by mere dint of profiting by it. Forgetful of the talent and bravery which Stilicho had often shown, or, as we might almost say, imputing his most important services to him as crimes, Honorius showed little concern when his general and minister was massacred; and actually, after the perpetration of that crime, praised the perpetrators, and condemned the memory of Stilicho and his fellow victims, as far as their memory could be condemned by any words of so poor spirited and effeminate a person.

The treachery of Honorius and the malignity of his favourite, Olympius, having put Stilicho to death by a virtual violation of sanctuary, and some of the ablest men of the empire merely for being the friends of Stilicho having been sacrificed just before or just after the murder of the minister himself, we might expect to find Honorius, at least, making the negative and poor atonement of protecting the widow of his tutor, friend, and minister. But though Serena, the lady in question, was aunt to Theodosius and adoptive mother of Honorius himself, he menially suffered her to be strangled, in 408, on the approach of Alaric with his Goths to besiege the imperial city. Alaric, shrewd in policy as fierce in fight, sought to enlist on his side the feelings of the numerous partisans of the murdered Stilicho; and a cheap and safe way of doing so presented itself in praising the virtue and the talents of Stilicho, now that the former could no longer be serviceable to Rome, nor the latter formidable to Alaric himself. The praises thus bestowed upon the deceased minister, by the living and threatening foe, were interpreted by the Roman multitude into proof irrefragable that the widow of Stilicho carried on a treasonable correspondence with Alaric, and that his reliance upon her aid and interest it was that emboldened him to threaten the imperial city with destruction. The popular cry of the ignorant multitude was basely complied with by the emperor and the senate, and the unfortunate Serena was strangled.

With such an emperor just such a people was joined as was least likely to be permanently successful in resisting a bold, greedy, and hardy race of barbarians led on by an Alaric or an Attila. The individual hardihood and pride of manhood that had characterized the Roman of the republic, and the serried discipline and national pride that had so often given prey to the Roman eagle, under the Roman emperors who were worthy of that name, had passed away before a luxury and effeminacy which would be incredible were they not related to us by the pens of indignant Romans who describe the scenes which, loathing, they lived amidst and witnessed. Ammianus Marcellinus, more especially, describes the luxury, pride, and effeminacy of the rich as being more than eastern. "If," says he, "on a hot day they muster courage to sail in their painted gallees from the Lucrine lake to their elegant villas on the sea-coast of Puteoli and Capri, they compare the exploit to the expeditions of Alexander and Caesar. Yet should a fly settle on the silken folds of their umbrellas, or a sunbeam penetrate some unguarded chink, they deplore their hard fate, and protest, in affected language, that 'twere better to have been born in the land of the Cimmerians, the regions of perpetual clouds and darkness.' Innumerable instances might be given of this effeminacy as to the upper orders of Romans in the commencement of the fifth century; and abundant proofs might be adduced of the state of want, dependence upon public alms, or still more enthralling dependence on individual patronage, of the lower orders. But enough has been said to show that the state of Rome, alike in government and people, was precisely such as to invite, nay, to require, the rude purification of successive and successful invasions of harder races; and it now only remains to enter upon the particular history of Venice, as one which claims our attention more than the other Italian republics.

Alaric again and again ravaged the Roman territories, and insulted the Roman people; Honorius and his ministers literally seeming to invite him to do so by their pusillanimity on some occasions, and their absurd and empty threats on others. Honorius kept his court at Ravenna, whence his ministers alternately provoked Alaric by their useless and empty boastings, and bribed him to forbearance by the sacrifice not only of public treasure, but of the national honour; until at length the barbarian colours floated above the walls of Rome. Adolphus, brother-in-law of Alaric, and subsequently the terrible Attila, who awfully realized his truculent boast that where his horse once trod the grass never grew, ravaged Italy in every direction; and perhaps no part of the empire, if we except Aquileia, which was so utterly destroyed as to be even without traceable ruins, suffered more than Venetia Prima, or Continental Venice, Concordia, Oderzo, Altino, and Padua. For three years the inhabitants of these places were never for an instant free from the presence of the stranger and the oppressor, on occasion of the second inroad of the Gothic Alaric; and many of them, even during the tyranny of that comparatively mild tyrant, took refuge in the various islets which were grouped around Rialto. This island, which was already the port and entrepôt of the commerce of Padua, was naturally that which was earliest and most resorted to; and we find that as early as the year 421 the inhabitants of this little islet were numerous enough to allow of the building of a considerable church, which was in that year dedicated to St. James in pursuance of a vow made during the progress of a great fire which consumed twenty-four houses. It is possible that the retreat of the great majority of the fugitives from the main land to the isles was merely temporary, and that when their proper country was abandoned by the barbarians, they would be led, either by a pining after their fertile and beautiful land, which would be remembered with the greater regret by being contrasted with the flat and dreary shores of the isles, or by a vague hope of finding some remnants of plunder left behind by the barbarians, to return to the continent. But that the number of permanent emigrants to the isles even at this time was very considerable, is evident from a document which we believe is not quoted, if even referred to, by any modern historian of Venice, except Daru.

The document in question is an old and only partially perfect manuscript in the convent of St. Michael—and is a collection of "various notices relative to the origin of Venice," which was formed by Fulgentius Tomasellus, an abbot of the house, and since translated by one of its librarians, Father Mitarelli. It bears date in the year of Christ 421, and the last year of the papacy of Innocent I.; and the chief passage of it that was sufficiently legible to be translated into Latin by the learned librarian, is a decree of the consuls and senate of Padua for erecting Rialto into a chief city, in which the scattered population of the whole of the adjacent islands might congregate, not merely for their own greater comfort, and the convenience and prosperity of their own port, and the patron city of Padua, but likewise, and especially, that they being thus concentrated might keep an armed fleet, and thus defend alike themselves and the neighbouring continent against the recurrence of the destruction by fire and sword, which this region had already, and to so fearful an extent, experienced at the hands of "Gothorum cum regis illorum Alarico."

"Reliquum legere non potui," says the translator; "the rest is not legible; but enough appears to show, that the earliest inhabitants of the isles were comparatively few in number, scattered hither and thither without judgment and without common policy, save such as necessarily resulted from their common dependence upon Padua, as fishermen, carriers, and traders in general; and that the invasion of Italy by Alaric, and the subsequent and ruinous occupation of the cities and plains of Lombardy by his fierce people, so much increased the populousness of the isle, as to lead the Paduans to order the concentration of the inhabitants and the constitution of a central seat of population—in short, of a chief city of the islets, to which it was inevitable the rest should become morally, as in the end they also were physically, united and subjected.

Imitating upon a small scale the immemorial policy of Rome herself, the Paduans, while they assuredly took the course which was best calculated to promote the interests of the settlers on the islands, and to make them importantly useful to north-eastern Italy, should its fate ever depend upon maritime warfare, did not allow the islanders to forget that they were dependants as traders, and, in some degree, as colonists: and, accordingly, the new town or state was governed by officers appointed by the Paduans, with the title of consuls.

Rialto, or Rivo alta, the deep river, which was thus made the chief town of the isles, was subsequently connected with the opposite bank by a bridge which bore the same name, and this island subsequently had built upon it, too, the exchange, also called Rialto; this last being at once the homage paid to the chief island, and the surest guarantee, in a purely commercial and maritime state, for preserving the chief resort and influence to it.

The peculiar situation of the Venetian isles being considered, the obstacles which their difficult navigation must have presented to foreigners and barbarians in the then rude state of the maritime art, their connection with so fertile and populous a portion of continental Italy, would prognosticate immense prosperity immediately, and great, if not preponderating power ultimately, to the new state, in the event of that ruin falling upon the Roman empire, which every circumstance, within and without, indicated to the least careful and attentive observer; even should no other external circumstances favour the islanders. Such other circumstances, however, were not to be wanting in the causation of Venetian greatness.

A new scourge for Italy appeared in the shape of a multitude of Huns, who were led from the depths of Scythia by Attila; a leader fierce and able as Alaric in the field, and far more cruel and unsparring when the field was won. Having carried fire and sword throughout Macedonia, Germany, and Gallia, from which last he found it prudent to retreat, the alarm was suddenly given that he was leading the Huns and their swarming barbarous allies towards the Julian Alps, threatening now destruction to the beautiful lands of Venetia, and new miseries to the Venetians of the main land. In the year 452 Attila appeared before Aquileia; and that city still preserving some of the spirit of old Rome, of which it was a colony and offset, made a defence so brave—though insufficient to save it from the fierce host that assailed it,—that when it was, at length, in sheer necessity yielded, the enraged barbarian lit-rally left not one brick or stone standing upon another. The fate of Aquileia, and the terrific character of its destroyer, naturally struck terror into the inhabitants of the neighbouring cities of Padua, Altino, Concordia, and Oderzo; who hastily gathered together all of their property that was moveable, and hastened to take refuge in the isles; the difficult navigation of which, and the maritime habits of the long settled and proper inhabitants of which, gave a promise of safety from pursuit and destruction, which the example of Aquileia but too plainly showed to be hopeless upon the main land.

The cause of this new irruption of Attila and his Huns, as being also a principal cause of the wealth and power of Venice the Superb, must not be wholly omitted here; we mean the treason of Honoria, the sister of Valentinian III. This princess, having dishonoured her rank and family by her intrigue with a courtier, which intrigue was aided by the carelessness of her own mother, who had always acted as if she was regardless of the education and moral conduct of her daughter, was placed under the most rigid surveillance. Naturally of a gay, perhaps we might even say of a licentious turn, this restraint wearied her to such a pitch of desperation, that she contrived to send a ring to Attila, as a pledge of love and good faith; and with it a pressing message demanding his support and aid against her own family, and requesting to be admitted into the number of his wives. Honoria was reputed to be very beautiful, and to female beauty the barbarian chieftain was by no means unsusceptible. But he devised a considerable improvement upon the proposition of the princess; he preceded his new advance upon the empire with a demand, not only of the hand of the lady, but also of half the provinces of the empire. The refusal he met with, and his rage thereupon, led to the destruction of Aquileia, and to the taking refuge of the inhabitants of that and the neighbouring cities in Rialto and the dependent Venetian isles.

If not so wholly destroyed to their very foundations as Aquileia, the neighbouring cities were, however, so completely pillaged and so considerably devastated, that a vast number of the inhabitants not merely sought shelter in the isles during the actual and threatening presence of the barbarians upon the main land, but were so wearied by the losses they had already sustained, and so completely dispirited by the apparent probability of a frequent recurrence of similar inflictions, as to take up their permanent residence in the comparatively inaccessible isles, where they had at first sought only a temporary shelter. Some would doubtless return to the main land, in hope to find their homes undestroyed, whatever might have befallen the homes of their neighbours; but being as poor as the poorest of the islanders, and far less favourably situated as to the future than the islanders as a body, it was not at all reasonable that the former should claim any continuance of the Paduan authority over the isles; the more especially, as no one knew how soon a new incursion of the barbarians might once more render the isles the only place of safe refuge to the dwellers upon the main land.

The authority of the old towns being thus tacitly but effectually terminated, the islanders and refugees consolidated themselves together, and organized, perhaps, the very best kind of society for the circumstances in which they were placed.

The extent of the immigration had made it impossible for the chief islet, Rialto, to accommodate more than a very inconsiderable portion of the fugitives. The remainder had of necessity distributed themselves amid the other islets, all of which were now populated, more or less densely. Each of the larger of these islands, containing a sufficient population to give it the necessary weight and importance in the new state, it was agreed should elect a tribune. This magistrate, whose term of office was limited to one year, was charged with the administration of justice in his own isle, and was accountable only to the general assembly of the colony, which alone could decide upon the affairs of the isles en masse. In a word, the islanders formed a federative republic; the whole governed as to external affairs and affairs of common import, by an authority delegated from the whole; each internally and in matters peculiar to itself governed by the tribune of its own election.

For a long time their chief commodities for sale were salt and fish, but those are articles peculiarly profitable where the commerce in them is very large; moreover, the islanders could not fail to accumulate riches, the great source, when wisely used, of political power—exempted as they were from the evils to which the cities on the main land had become the victims.

The invasion of Italy by the Heruli under Odoacer, in 476, when the army sent by Augustulus was vanquished, and its general slain by Odoacer's own hand; and the subsequent invasion of the Ostrogoths under Theodoric, who dethroned and put to death Odoacer, the dethroner of Augustulus, caused a new increase of population to flow into the Venetian isles; and when the insular republic had barely a hundred years of existence, it already began to be respected for its industry and numbers, and admired for a prosperity so strikingly contrasted with its small number of natural productions. Fish and salt were all that Venice seemed to possess; and it was not yet known how far better a nurse commerce is to a state than war.

The disasters to which the empire had been subjected both in the east and in the west, and the blots which barbarian success had cast upon the escutcheon of Rome's supposed invincibility and even invulnerability, added to the utter destruction of the cities of Venetia Prima, probably caused Rome's power to be held in comparatively light estimation even by those who returned to the main land and rebuilt their destroyed homes. And the isolation of the inhabitants of the isles, their enervated poverty, and, above all, the hardly practicable sea-walls that stretched around them, would seem to make their independence of disorganized and distracted Rome a matter beyond dispute. It has, however, been disputed, and by a high authority, but we think on very inadequate grounds. Cassiodorus, minister to Theodoric, wrote a highly flattering letter, a letter penned with most oratorical art and care, and evidently with great anxiety as to its success,—requesting the Venetians to effect by means of their vessels the transport of a supply of wine and oil from Istria to Ravenna. The very care and polish that are lavished upon this letter seem to us to be quite decisive as to Rome having not recognized, stated, or easily available authority over the Venetians of the Isles. It is quite true, as has been remarked by the learned count Daru, that notwithstanding the urbanity of the letter, it yet evidently contains an order. It seems to us, that the politely-couched order of such a neighbour as Rome, can scarcely be said to prove against the actual political independence of such a state as Venice, and at so early a stage of its existence. It would seem far more correct to consider that Rome couched a demand, which she knew was not strictly just, in terms which she judged would be agreeable to her nascent neighbour. Even in her decline Rome was far too formidable a neighbour not to feel at liberty to make even unreasonable requests of a community of fishermen and small merchants, comparatively prosperous as that community might be.

With increase of population and of wealth, the Venetians, by which name we shall, to save circumlocution, henceforth designate only the islanders, began to feel anxious about that which was their chief and cheap safeguard, the difficult navigation of the lagoons; and the navigation was forbidden not merely to strangers in general, but even to that Padua which once was the metropolis and nursing mother of the island republic. When we consider the horrors to which the cities on the main land had been exposed by the barbarian invaders, and reflect how probable it was that new invasions would occur, which only the difficulty of the navigation and the superiority this insured to the vessels of the islanders could prevent from extending to the isles, we can scarcely wonder at the stern and jealous rule adopted by men who had only become islanders and fishers after they had been ruined agriculturists, flying in haste and in terror from one of the loveliest and most fertile of earth's lovely and fertile spots. Nor was it long ere the Venetians had good reason to congratulate themselves upon the care they had bestowed equally upon acquiring dexterity in the navigation of their narrow and difficult creeks and shallows, and preventing a like dexterity from being acquired by others.

The Slavi, a barbarous and warlike people, had established themselves in Dalmatia. That country, however, had already been so often overrun and plundered, that it afforded by no means a sufficient amount of booty to satisfy so numerous and so greedy a people. They consequently availed themselves of the numerous ports and creeks their new country afforded them, and imitated the piratical example of the Illyrians, by whom the country had formerly been occupied, and speedily became a name of terror to all who had occasion to be upon the sea in that direction. The Venetians, perpetually pursuing their commercial and carrying avocations in their light vessels, were especially subjected to the attacks of these daring marauders, to whom the portable but valuable freights brought by the Venetians from the ports of the eastern empire, with which they carried on great commerce, were an irresistible temptation. The hardy habits and active life of the fishers and merchants of the Venetian isles had given new vigour and courage to the people, who, while living in comparative luxury upon the main land, had abandoned all their possessions to the barbarians, rather than struggle to possess them at the risk of losing life also. Mustering their vessels, they boldly encountered the pirates, beat them, and compelled them to respect the liberty of the seas as far as Venetians were concerned therein. This, in addition to many other circumstances, seems to have been a link in a long and unbroken chain of causation of the prosperity and power of Venice in her subsequent palmy days; for while the success with which the traders encountered the terrible and notorious pirates was especially well calculated to obtain a high and chivalrous name for the Venetians, even at the outset of their career, the very struggle and warfare in which they were from time to time engaged with so fierce a people, and with every thing at stake upon the issue, must have had a mighty share in increasing the energy of the Venetians, and in forming their national character to that striking commixture of commercial industry and warlike spirit and skill to which their subsequent and long-continued greatness may so greatly be ascribed.

In the year 568 the Lombards invaded Italy, and so successfully, as completely to cut off all connexion between it and the eastern empire. The Lombards, who came from Pannonia, like all the other barbarian scourges of Italy, commenced their destroying and plundering career in Venice on the main land. And now again, the misfortune of the main land brought benefit to the isles. Not only were the people of the newly rebuilt habitations on the main land glad to abandon their incomplete cities, and take refuge in the isles; not only did the islanders see the inhabitants of even Padua, their former patron city, imploring shelter, but even the clergy settled amongst them, and permanently, too; for the Lombards established Arian preachers in the towns of continental Venice; and the consequence was, so fierce and sanguinary a war and such ceaseless schisms, that the clergy who had found a refuge in the isles did not think of quitting it.

Though the Lombards persecuted the Catholic faith professed by the Venetians, the former, who were at that time neither a commercial nor a maritime people, were to a very great extent dependent upon the islanders for their supply of all such necessities or luxuries as came from foreign countries; and in this particular superiority of the Venetians to the Lombards, and subsequently to Charlemagne and his Franks, the attentive and thoughtful reader will scarcely fail to see yet another great element of the permanency and power of the insular state of Venice.

Eginard, the contemporary and historian of Charlemagne, makes emphatic mention of the coarseness of the apparel of that monarch and his court, as compared to the fine stuffs and rich silks brought by the Venetian traders from the ports of Syria, the Archipelago, and the Black Sea.

It was in the inevitable nature of things, that the very increase of population which tended so greatly to the increase of the prosperity and consideration of the comparatively new state, should bring in its train such a diversity of interests, such a difference of proportion in the numbers, wealth, and power of the numerous insulated members of the federative republic as should call aloud for a change in the political system. Most important changes afterwards took place; and it is to Venice as an acting and not merely growing state, that we have henceforth to direct our attention. But we perceive that we have already greatly trespassed on our limits, and must endeavour to finish this sketch with a rapid pen.

The original form of Venetian government was purely democratical: magistrates were chosen by a general assembly of the people, who gave them the name of tribunes; one of whom was appointed to preside on each island, but to hold his office only for a year. This form subsisted for about one hundred and fifty years; it then appeared expedient to make choice of a chief magistrate, and on him the title of duke was conferred, which has since been corrupted to doge: this dignity was elective, and held for life; he was even entrusted with the power of nominating to all offices, and of making peace and declaring war. Paul Luke Ansesto, the first duke, was elected in the year 697; and such was the confidence which the people reposed in their duke, that he was at liberty to use his own discretion how far he would avail himself of the advice of the citizens. In the councils which he called on any matter of importance, he sent messages to those citizens for whose judgment he had the greatest esteem, praying that they would come and assist him with their advice. This form was retained by succeeding doges, and the citizens so sent for, were called pregadi (from the Italian word pregare, to pray). The third doge, whose talents for war had proved successful in extending the power of the republic, at length meditated the assumption of a more absolute sway, wishing to render the supreme authority hereditary in his family; but such conduct excited a general alarm in the people; he was assaulted in his palace, and there put to death. This event caused the government of Venice to be new modelled, and a chief magistrate, who was now called "master of the militia," was elected annually; but his power whilst in office was the same as before. Such form of government continued only five years, when the title of doge was revived (A. D. 740,) in the person of the son of him who had been assassinated.

About the latter end of the twelfth century, when every other part of the Christian world was seized with a frantic rage for recovering the holy land, the Venetians were so far from contributing any forces for the crusades, that they did not scruple to supply the Saracens with arms, ammunition, and every other necessary. As the power of the state became augmented by the acquisition of Istria and many parts of Dalmatia, the jealousy of the people towards their doge became stronger. At that time the only tribunal at Venice consisted of forty judges; these were called "the council of forty," but in the year 1173, another doge, named Michieli, being assassinated in a popular insurrection, the council of forty found means to new model the government, by gaining the consent of the people to delegate the right of voting for magistrates, which each citizen possessed, to four hundred and seventy persons, called councillors, who received the appellation of "the grand council;" and, acting as delegates of the people, became what the general assembly of the people until that time had been. By this artful innovation (which the people were cajoled into an acquiescence with, by retaining the right of electing these councillors annually), the democracy became presently subverted; and an aristocracy, in its fullest and most rigid form, was introduced, by restricting the power of the doge, and instituting a variety of officers (all of whom were, in a short time, chosen from among the nobility) which effectually controlled both the prince and the people.

Ziani was the first doge elected after the government had received, what the event proves to have been, its permanent modification; and during his administration the singular ceremony of espousing the sea, which has been annually observed ever since, was first adopted, and took its rise from the assistance which the Venetians gave to pope Alexander III. when hard pressed by the emperor Frederic Barbarossa, and the signal victory they obtained over a formidable fleet under the command of Otho, son of Frederic, in which the admiral and thirty of his ships were taken. Alexander, with the whole city of Venice, went out to meet Ziani, the conqueror, on his return; to whom his holiness presented a ring, saying, "Use this ring as a chain to retain the sea, henceforth, in subjection to the Venetian state; espouse her with this ring, and let the marriage be solemnized annually, by you and your successors, to the end of time, that the latest posterity may know that Venice has acquired the empire of the waves, and holds the sea in subjection, in the same manner as a wife is held by her husband."

During the continuance of the republic this ceremony was performed by the doge dropping a ring into the sea, pronouncing at the same time the words, Desponsamus te, Mare, in signum veri perpetuæ dominæ. This emblem of its former power and independence is now for ever gone; and, in the language of the poet,

"The spouseless Adriatic mourns her lord."

The Venetians having extended their territories into Lombardy, Istria, and Dalmatia, became masters of many of the islands in the Archipelago, particularly the large and important one of Candia; they were masters of the Morea; and, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, Dandolo, their doge, when more than eighty years of age, in conjunction with the French, took Constantinople from the Turks. It was about this time that they engrossed the lucrative trade in the manufactures and productions of the East Indies, which they procured at the port of Alexandria, and conveyed to every market of Europe.

Under Marino Morosini was introduced the latest form of electing the doge; and at this juncture jealousy and envy occasioned the war with Genoa, which, after continuing a hundred and thirty years, was at last concluded by a treaty in 1381. During this war, Peter Gradonigo, the doge, procured a law to be passed, that none but the nobility should be capable of having a seat in the grand council; and thus the government became altogether aristocratical.

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the Venetians extended their possessions in Lombardy, and, in 1473, the last king of Cyprus appointed the state of Venice his heir. Towards the end of the fifteenth century the commerce and power of the Venetians began to decline; for the Portuguese having doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and found the way to the East Indies by sea, that valuable trade was acquired, first by the discoverers, and afterwards by the Dutch and English.

In the beginning of the sixteenth century (A. D. 1509) the pope, the emperor, France, and Spain, joined in the famous league of Cambray, which threatened the subversion of the Venetian state; but the republic made a brave stand against its numerous and powerful enemies, and the Venetians retained their independence, although with the loss of all their possessions in the ecclesiastical state and the Milanese. They also suffered much from the Turks, who drove them out of Cyprus. In the seventeenth century a sharp contest arose between the government, the clergy, and the pope, in which, however, the former had the advantage. Venice was also long engaged in fierce wars with the Turks, during which they lost Candia, but gained part of Dalmatia and all the Morea; the latter, with other places and districts, the Turks recovered in the wars which were waged during the early part of the last century.

The Venetian government, in the year 1737, having shewn particular marks of respect to the prince, who was generally called in England, the pretender, when he visited that city, under the character of the count of Albany, the British court took great offence, and the Venetian resident at London was ordered to depart; but proper concessions being made by the state, a friendly intercourse was re-established, and in the year 1745 the earl of Holderness was sent ambassador extraordinary to Venice. In the year 1763 the Venetians found it necessary to pay a subsidy to the dey of Algiers, to preserve their commerce from the depredations of those corsairs; but they subsequently carried on a war with some other of the piratical states, nearer to them, on that coast.

Thus did the republic of Venice continued upwards of thirteen hundred years, amidst many foreign wars and intestine commotions. Its grandeur, as we have seen, was chiefly owing to its trade; and, after the decline of that, its strength and power suffered considerable diminution. No republic in the history of the world has subsisted for so long a space of time; and, as its independence was not founded on usurpation, nor cemented with blood, so its descent from that splendour and power which it had once attained, instead of degrading, reflects the highest honour on them. None of the causes which subverted the famous republics of antiquity effected the decline of Venice. No tyrants enslaved, no demagogues deluded, no luxuries enervated them. They owed their greatness to their industry, bravery, and maritime skill; and their decline, to the revolutions which successful pursuits of science had produced in the nations of Europe. For many years they withstood the whole force of the Ottoman empire by sea and land; and, although their treasures were eventually exhausted, and their power weakened, their enemies have experienced consequences scarcely less fatal.

No government has been more attacked by deep-laid and formidable conspiracies than that of Venice; many of which have been brought to the very eve of execution without discovery or suspicion. But though the entire subversion of the state has been, at times, impending from some of these plots, yet until the era of the French revolution, they have been constantly rendered abortive, either by the vigilance or good fortune of the senate. One of the most remarkable of these conspiracies was formed by a doge named Marino Faliero, in the year 1368, who at that time was eighty years of age; but, conceiving a violent resentment against the senate, he formed a plan in order to assassinate the whole body. The design was timely discovered, and the dignified hoary traitor was brought to trial, found guilty upon his own confession, and publicly beheaded. In the great chamber of the palace, where the portraits of the doges are placed, there is a vacant space between the predecessor and successor of this man, where appears this inscription, "Locus Marini Falieri desampti." The place intended for the portrait of Marinus Falierus, who was beheaded." The year 1618 is also distinguished by a no less remarkable conspiracy, the contriver and principal agent in which was the marquis Bedamar, the Spanish ambassador residing there. The elegant pen of the abbe St. Real has transmitted to posterity this very curious instance of superior talents and consummate artifice, which were, for a long course of time, exercised in effecting the most atrocious deed, being no less than the total destruction of the republic. Otway has formed a very pathetic tragedy upon this story, in which the character of Belvidera, and the love scenes between her and Jaffier, are the only fictions of the poet; and Priuli was really the doge, whom the poet ranks as a senator.

With a few observations illustrative of the secrecy and stern character of the laws of Venice, as administered during its existence as a republic, we shall conclude:—Mr. Addison observes, that among all the instances of Venetian politics, there is none more admirable than the great secrecy which reigns in their councils. "The senate," says he, "is generally as numerous as our house of commons, if we only reckon the sitting members, and yet carries its resolutions so privately, that they are seldom known till they discover themselves in the execution." He gives an instance of their holding a great debate concerning the punishment of one of their admirals, which continued a month, and concluded in his condemnation; yet none of his friends, nor of those who had engaged warmly in his defence, gave him the least intimation of what was passing against him, till he was actually seized, and in the hands of justice.

The college, called "the seignior," or supreme cabinet council of the state, was originally composed of the doge and six counsellors only, but to those at different periods were added, six of the grand council chosen by the senate, who were called avvisi (ages), then five savii of the Terra Firma, whose more immediate department it was to superintend the business of the towns and provinces belonging to the republic on the continent of Europe, particularly what regarded their troops; at one time there were also five savii for maritime affairs, but after the state had lost its commercial importance, five young noblemen were chosen by the senate every six months, who attended the meetings of the signiory without having a vote, though they gave their opinions when asked: this was designed as an initiation into public business. To these were added the chiefs of the criminal court of "forty." This college was at once the cabinet council and the representative of the republic.

The consiglio di dieci, or "council of ten," was a high penal court, which consisted of ten counsellors; the doge, as president, and his six consiglieri, or counsellors. It was supreme in all state crimes, and possessed the power of seizing any one who was accused before them, of committing him to close confinement, and prohibiting all communication with his relations and friends, of examining and trying him in a summary manner, and, if a majority of the council pronounced him guilty, of condemning him to death; they also might order the execution to be either public or private, as they thought proper. This formidable tribunal was established in the year 1310.

About two centuries after, a still more despotic power was entrusted to three individuals, always chosen from the above council of ten, and forming the court called the state inquisition. These inquisitors likewise kept the keys of chests which are placed in several parts of the ducal palace, enclosed within the open jaws of lions' heads carved in the walls; through which notes were conveyed by any one who was disposed to drop them; and thus notice was secretly given to the government of whatever might concern it to know.

The history of Venice furnished a dreadful instance, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, of a number of confederated villains, who concerted their measures so artfully as to frame false accusations against some of the Venetian nobles, which, in the opinion of their judges, convicted them of treasonable practices against the state, and one at least was publicly executed. At length the frequency of accusations created suspicions, which led to a full detection of the infernal scheme; upon which every possible reparation was made to the manes of the innocent victim, the honour of whose family was fully restored; but the tribunal, which decreed the sentence, was suffered to possess the same unlimited power; the only alteration being that anonymous information was somewhat more cautiously received; for it was a political maxim in Venice, that "it is of more importance to the state to intimidate every one even from the appearance of a crime, than to allow a person, against whom a presumption of guilt appears, to escape, however innocent he may be." How different this from the merciful spirit of the English laws, which hold it to be better that ten guilty persons escape than that one innocent person should suffer!

The history of Venice furnishes two instances which bear a strong similarity to the conduct of the Roman Brutus, which we shall give on the authority of Dr. Moore. In the year 1400, Antonio Venier being doge, his son having committed an offence of no great enormity, was condemned in a fine of one hundred ducats, and to be imprisoned for a certain time. During his confinement, he fell sick, and petitioned to be removed to a purer air. The doge rejected the petition, declaring, that the sentence must be executed literally, and that his son must take the fortune of the rest in the same situation. The youth was much beloved, and many applications were made that the sentence might be softened, on account of the danger which threatened him, but the father was inexorable, and the son died in prison. Fifty years after this, a son of another doge, named Foscarei, being suspected of having been the instigator of the murder of a senator, who was one of the "council of ten," was tortured, banished, and on his application to the duke of Milan, soliciting him to exert his interest for his recall, was brought back to Venice, for the purpose of again undergoing the torture, and being closely confined in the state-prison; the only mercy shown him being that of granting permission for the doge, the father of the unfortunate youth, to pay him a visit in his confinement. The father, who had held his office for thirty years, and was very old, exhorted his son to support his hard fate with firmness; whilst the son protested not only his innocence, but that he was utterly incapable of supporting the confinement to which he was doomed. In an agony of grief he threw himself at his father's feet, imploring him to take compassion on a son whom he had ever loved with the fondest affection, and conjuring him to use his influence with the council to mitigate their sentence, that he might be saved from the most cruel of all deaths, that of expiring under the consuming torture of a broken heart, secluded from every creature whom he loved. This melting intercession had no other effect upon the father than to draw from him the following reply:—"My son, submit to the laws of your country, and do not ask of me what it is not in my power to obtain." After this interview, the miserable youth languished for a while, and then expired in prison; but the violence which his father, as a magistrate, did to his paternal feelings, terminated his life somewhat sooner. A short time after this catastrophe, a Venetian of noble rank, being on his death-bed, confessed, that, urged by private resentment, he was the murderer of the senator whose assassination had given rise to this tragic scene.

* We have treated at some length the history of Venice, because its political and commercial eminence rendered it for many centuries by far the most important of the Italian states. In order not to break the thread of the narrative, the part which Venice played in the Italian movements of 1848 and 1849 is described at pages [709-710].

THE HISTORY OF ROME.

It (says Dr. Arnold, in his admirable history) it is hard to carry back our ideas of Rome from its actual state to the period of its highest splendour, it is yet harder to go back in fancy to a time still more distant, a time earlier than the beginning of its authentic history, before man's art had completely rescued the very soil of the future city from the dominion of nature. Here also it is vain to attempt accuracy in the details, or to be certain that the several features in our description all existed at the same period. It is enough if we can image to ourselves some likeness of the original state of Rome, before the undertaking of those great works which are ascribed to the late kings.

The Pomœrium of the original city on the Palatine, as described by Tacitus, included not only the hill itself, but some portion of the ground immediately below it; it did not, however, reach as far as any of the other hills. The valley between the Palatine and the Aventine, afterwards the site of the Circus Maximus, was in the earliest times covered with water; so also was the greater part of the valley between the Palatine and the Capitoline, the ground afterwards occupied by the Roman forum.

But the city of the Palatine hill grew in process of time, so as to become a city of seven hills. Not the seven famous hills of imperial or republican Rome, but seven spots more or less elevated, and all belonging to three only of the later seven hills, that is, to the Palatine, the Cælian, and the Esquiline. At this time Rome, already a city on seven hills, was distinct from the Sabine city on the Capitoline, Quirinal, and Viminal hills. The two cities, although united under one government, had still a separate existence; they were not completely blended into one till the reigns of the later kings. The territory of the original Rome during its first period, the true Ager Romanus, could be gone round in a single day. It did not extend beyond the Tiber at all, nor probably beyond the Anio; and on the east and south, where it had most room to spread, its limit was between five and six miles from the city. This Ager Romanus was the exclusive property of the Roman people, that is, of the houses; it did not include the lands conquered from the Latins, and given back to them again when the Latins became the plebs, or commons of Rome.

Well indeed may the enquiring historian exclaim—And now what was Rome, and what was the country around it, which have both acquired an interest such as can cease only when earth itself shall perish?

The hills of Rome (he continues) are such as we rarely see in England; low in height, but with steep and rocky sides. In early times the wood remained in natural patches amidst the buildings, as at this day it grows here and there on the green sides of the Monte Testaceo. Across the Tiber the ground rises to a greater height than that of the Roman hills, but its summit is a level unbroken line, while the heights, which opposite to Rome rise immediately from the river, under the names of Janiculum and Vaticanus, then sweep away to some distance from it, and return in their highest and boldest form at the Mons Marius, just above the Milvian bridge and the Flaminian road. Thus to the west the view is immediately bounded; but to the north and north-east the eye ranges over the low ground of the Campagna to the nearest line of the Apennines, which closes up, as with a gigantic wall, all the Sabine, Latin, and Volscian lowlands, while over it are still distinctly to be seen the high summits of the central Apennines, covered with snow, even at this day, for more than six months in the year. South and south-west lies the wide plain of the Campagna; its level line succeeded by the equally level line of the sea, which can only be distinguished from it by the brighter light reflected from its waters. Eastward, after ten miles of plain, the view is bounded by the Alban hills, a cluster of high bold points rising out of the Campagna, on the highest of which (about 3000 feet) stood the temple of Jupiter Latiarius, the scene of the common worship of all the people of the Latin name. Immediately under this highest point lies the crater-like basin of the Alban lake; and on its nearer rim might be seen the trees of the grove of Ferentina, where the Latins held the great civil assemblies of their nation. Further to the north, on the edge of the Alban hills, looking towards Rome, was the town and citadel of Tusculum; and beyond this, a lower summit crowned with the walls and towers of Labicum seems to connect the Alban hills with the line of the Apennines, just at the spot where the citadel of Præneste, high up on the mountain side marks the opening into the country of the Hernicans, and into the valleys of the streams that feed the Liris.

Returning nearer to Rome, the lowland country of the Campagna is broken by long green swelling ridges. The streams are dull and sluggish, but the hill sides above them constantly break away into little rock cliffs, where on every ledge the wild fig now strikes out its branches, and tufts of broom are clustering, but which in old times formed the natural strength of the citadels of the numerous cities of Latium. Except in these narrow dells, the present aspect of the country is all bare and desolate, with no trees nor any human habitation. But anciently, in the early times of Rome, it was full of independent cities, and in its population and the careful cultivation of its little garden-like farms, must have resembled the most flourishing parts of Lombardy. Such was Rome, and such its neighbourhood.

The foregoing topographical observations appear to be necessary, before the reader enters upon even a brief recital of any of those circumstances which—whether legendary or strictly true, whether fabulous or merely exaggerated—have been handed down from age to age as the veritable history of Rome.

We are told, in the first place, that Æneas, after the destruction of Troy, having arrived in Italy, married Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, fifth king of the Latins, and succeeded his father-in-law, after having deprived Turnus, king of the Rutuli, first of his sceptre and then of his life. Ascanias, after the death of Æneas, his father, united with it the kingdom of Alba, of which he was the founder. We cannot, however, proceed without remarking, that whatever relates to the origin of Rome is attended with the greatest uncertainty; and that the records of some of the ancient writers are more worthy of a place in the Æneid of Virgil, than the page of history. In illustration of this remark, (although it will trespass on the space which, it may be thought, would be better occupied with the authentic events of history,) we shall take the liberty of quoting from the learned author, beforenamed the "Legend of Romulus."

"Numitor was the eldest son of Procras, king of Alba Longa, and he had a younger brother called Amulius. When Procras died, Amulius seized by force on the kingdom, and left to Numitor only his share of his father's private inheritance. After this he caused Numitor's only son to be slain, and made his daughter Silvia become one of the virgins who watched the ever-burning fire of the goddess Vesta. But the god Mars, who is called also Mars, beheld the virgin and loved her, and it was found that she was going to become the mother of children. Then Amulius ordered that the children, when born, should be thrown into the river. It happened that the river at that time had flooded the country; when, therefore, the two children in their basket were thrown into the river, the waters carried them as far as the foot of the Palatine hill, and there the basket was upset, near the roots of a wild-fig tree, and the children thrown out upon land. At this moment there came a she-wolf down to the water to drink, and when she saw the children, she carried them to her cave hard by, and gave them suck; and whilst they were there, a woodpecker came backwards and forwards to the cave, and brought them food. At last one Faustus, the king's herdsman, saw the wolf suckling the children; and when he went up, the wolf left them and fled; so he took them home to his wife Laurentia, and they were bred up along with her own sons on the Palatine hill; and they were called Romulus and Remus.

"When Romulus and Remus grew up, the herdsmen of the Palatine hill chanced to have a quarrel with the herdsmen of Numitor, who stalled their cattle on the hill Aventinus. Numitor's herdsmen laid an ambush, and Remus fell into it, and was taken and carried off to Alba. But when the young man was brought before Numitor, he was struck with his noble air and bearing, and asked him who he was. And when Remus told him of his birth, and how he had been saved from death, together with his brother, Numitor marvelled, and thought whether this might not be his own daughter's child. In the meanwhile, Faustus and Romulus hastened to Alba, to deliver Remus; and by the help of the young men of the Palatine hill, who had been used to follow him and his brother, Romulus took the city, and Amulius was killed; and Numitor was made king, and owned Romulus and Remus to be born of his own blood.

"The two brothers did not wish to live at Alba, but loved rather the hill on the banks of the Tiber, where they had been brought up. So they said, that they would build a city there; and they inquired of the gods by augury, to know which of them should give his name to the city. They watched the heavens from morning till evening, and from evening till morning; and as the sun was rising, Remus saw six vultures. This was told to Romulus; but as they were telling him, behold there appeared to him twelve vultures. Then it was disputed again, which had seen the truest sign of the gods' favour; but the most part gave their voices for Romulus. So he began to build his city on the Palatine hill. This made Remus very angry; and when he saw the ditch and the rampart which were drawn round the space where the city was to be, he scornfully leapt over them, saying, 'Shall such defences as these keep your city?' As he did this, Celer, who had the charge of the building, struck Remus with the spade which he held in his hand, and slew him; and they buried him on the hill Remuria, by the banks of the Tiber, on the spot where he had wished to build his city.

"But Romulus found that his people were too few in numbers; so he set apart a place of refuge, to which any man might flee, and be safe from his pursuers. So many fled thither from the countries round about: those who had shed blood, and fled from the vengeance of the avenger of blood; those who were driven out from their own homes by their enemies, and even men of low degree who had run away from their lords. Thus the city became full of people; but yet they wanted wives, and the nations round about would not give them their daughters in marriage. So Romulus gave out, that he was going to keep a great festival, and there were to be sports and games to draw a multitude together. The neighbours came to see the show, with their wives and their daughters; there came the people of Cæcina, and of Crustumium, and of Antemna, and a great multitude of the Sabines. But while they were looking at the games, the people of Romulus rushed out upon them, and carried off the women, to be their wives.

"Upon this the people of Cæcina first made war upon the people of Romulus; but they were beaten, and Romulus with his own hand slew their king Acron. Next the people of Crustumium, and of Antemna, tried their fortune, but Romulus conquered both of them. Last of all came the Sabines with a great army, under Titus Tatius, their king. There is a hill near to the Tiber, which was divided from the Palatine hill by a low and swampy valley; and on this hill Romulus made a fortress, to keep off the enemy from his city. But when the fair Tarpela, the daughter of the chief who had charge of the fortress, saw the Sabines draw near, and marked their bracelets and their collars of gold, she longed after these ornaments, and promised to betray the hill into their hands if they would give her those bright things which they wore upon their arms. So she opened a gate, and let in the Sabines; and they, as they came in, threw upon her their bright shields which they bore on their arms, and crushed her to death. Thus the Sabines got the fortress which was on the hill Saturnus; and they and the Romans joined battle in the valley between the hill and the city of Romulus. The Sabines began to get the better, and came up close to one of the gates of the city. The people of Romulus shut the gate, but it opened of its own accord; once and again they shut it, and once and again it opened. But as the Sabines were rushing in, behold there burst forth from the temple of Janus, which was near the gate, a mighty stream of water, and it swept away the Sabines, and saved the city. For this it was ordered that the temple of Janus should stand ever open in time of war, that the god might be ever ready, as on this day, to go out and give aid to the people of Romulus.

"After this they fought again in the valley; and the people of Romulus were beginning to flee, when Romulus prayed to Jove, the stay of flight, that he might stay the people; and so their flight was stayed, and they turned again to the battle. And now the fight was fiercer than ever: when, on a sudden, the Sabine women, who had been carried off, ran down from the hill Palatinus, and ran in between their husbands and their fathers, and prayed them to lay aside their quarrel. So they made peace with one another, and the two people became as one: the Sabines with their king dwelt on the hill Saturnus, which is called Capitolium, and on the hill Quirinalis; and the people of Romulus with their king dwelt on the hill Palatinus. But the kings with their counsellors met in the valley between Saturnus and Palatinus, to consult about their common matters; and the place where they met was called Comitium, which means 'the place of meeting.'

"Soon after this, Tatius was slain by the people of Laurentum, because some of his kinsmen had wronged them, and he would not do them justice. So Romulus reigned by himself over both nations; and his own people were called the Romans, for Roma was the name of the city on the hill Palatinus; and the Sabines were called Quirites, for the name of their city on the hills Saturnus and Quirinalis was Quirium.

"The people were divided into three tribes; the Ramnenses, and the Titenses, and the Luceres; the Ramnenses were called from Romulus, and the Titenses from Tatius; and the Luceres were called from Lucumo, an Etruscan chief, who had come to help Romulus in his war with the Sabines, and dwelt on the hill called Celius. In each tribe there were ten curies, each of one hundred men; so all the men of the three tribes were three thousand, and these fought on foot, and were called a legion. There were also three hundred horsemen, and these were called celerians, because their chief was that Celer who had slain Remus. There was besides a council of two hundred men, which was called a senate, that is, a council of elders.

"Romulus was a just king, and gentle to his people; if any were guilty of crimes, he did not put them to death, but made them pay a fine of sheep or of oxen. In his wars he was very successful, and enriched his people with the spoils of their enemies. At last, after he had reigned nearly forty years, it chanced that one day he called his people together in the field of Mars, near the Goats' Pool; when, all on a sudden, there arose a dreadful storm, and all was dark as night; and the rain, and thunder and lightning, were so terrible, that all the people fled from the field, and ran to their several homes. At last the storm was over, and they came back to the field of Mars, but Romulus was nowhere to be found; for Mars, his father, had carried him up to heaven in his chariot. The people knew not at first what was become of him; but when it was night, as one Proculus Julius was coming from Alba to the city, Romulus appeared to him in more than mortal beauty, and grown to more than mortal stature, and said to him, 'Go, tell my people that they need not for me any more; but bid them to be brave and warlike, and so shall they make my city the greatest in the earth.' Then the people knew that Romulus was become a god; so they built a temple to him, and offered sacrifice to him, and worshipped him evermore by the name of the god Quirinus."

GERMANY, GAUL, SPAIN, ITALY, AND AFRICA SUCCESSIVELY INVADDED AND PILLAGED BY THE RUSS, GOTES, AND OTHER BARBARIANS.

But to quit the hyperbole of legendary lore and speak in plain terms, it amounts to this—Romulus, the grandson of Numitor, king of the Latins, joined with his brother Remus in an attempt to re-establish his grandfather in the possession of his throne, and Amulius, the usurper, was put to death. Having thus far succeeded, the two young heroes next assembled a number of the lowest orders of the people, and built a new city on the Aventine hill, to which Romulus gave his name; and soon after becoming jealous of his brother, caused him to be assassinated.

We again turn to the pages of Dr. Arnold, who, after referring those who desire to go deeply into the whole question, to the "immortal work of Niebuhr," very justly observes, that "the first question in the history of every people is, What was their race and language?" the next, What was the earliest form of their society, their social and political organization?

"The language of the Romans was not called Roman, but Latin. Politically, Rome and Latium were clearly distinguished, but their language appears to have been the same. This language is different from the Etruscan, and from the Oscan; the Romans, therefore, are so far marked out as distinct from the great nations of central Italy, whether Etruscans, Umbrians, Sabines, or Samnites.

"On the other hand, the connection of the Latin language with the Greek is manifest. Many common words, which no nation ever derives from the literature of another, are the same in Greek and Latin; the declensions of the nouns and verbs are, to a great degree, similar. It is probable that the Latins belonged to that great race which, in very early times, overspread both Greece and Italy, under the various names of Pelasgians, Tyrsenians, and Sicilians. It may be believed, that the Hellenians were anciently a people of this same race, but that some peculiar circumstances gave to them a distinct and superior character, and raised them so far above their brethren, that, in after ages, they disclaimed all connection with them.

"But in the Latin language there is another element besides that which it has in common with the Greek. This element belongs to the languages of central Italy, and may be called Oscan. Further, Niebuhr has remarked, that whilst the terms relating to agriculture and domestic life are mostly derived from the Greek part of the language; those relating to arms and war are mostly Oscan. It seems, then, not only that the Latins were a mixed people, partly Pelasgian and partly Oscan; but, also, that they arose out of a conquest of the Pelasgians, by the Oscans; so that the latter were the ruling class of the united nation; the former were its subjects.

"The Latin language, then, may afford us a clue to the origin of the Latin people, and so far to that of the Romans. But it does not explain the difference between Romans and Latins, to which the peculiar fates of the Roman people owe their origin. We must inquire, then, what the Romans were which the other Latins were not; and as language cannot aid us here, we must have recourse to other assistance, to geography and national traditions. And thus, at the same time, we shall arrive at an answer to the second question in Roman history. What was the earliest form of civil society at Rome?

"If we look at the map, we shall see that Rome lies at the farthest extremity of Latium, divided from Etruria only by the Tiber, and having the Sabines close on the north, between the Tiber and the Anio. No other Latin town, so far as we know, was built on the Tiber; some were clustered on and round the Alban hills, others lined the coast of the Mediterranean; but from all these Rome, by its position, stood aloof.

"Tradition reports that as Rome was thus apart from the rest of the Latin cities, and so near a neighbour to the Etruscans and Sabines, so its population was in part formed out of one of these nations, and many of its rites and institutions, borrowed from the other. Tradition describes the very first founders of the city as the shepherds and herdsmen of the banks of the Tiber, and tells how their numbers were presently swelled by strangers and outcasts from all the countries round about. It speaks of a threefold division of the Roman people, in the very earliest age of its history; the tribes of the Ramnenses, Titienses, and Luceres. It distinctly acknowledges the Titienses to have been Sabines; and in some of its guesses at the origin of the Luceres, it connects their name with that of the Etruscan Lucumon, and thus supposes them to have been composed of Etruscans.

"We know that for all the points of detail, and for keeping a correct account of time, tradition is worthless. It is very possible that all the Etruscan rites and usages came in with the Tarquinii, and were falsely carried back to an earlier period. But the mixture of the Sabines with the original people of the Palatine hill, cannot be doubted; and the stories of the asylum, and of the violence done to the Sabine women, seem to show that the first settlers of the Palatine were a mixed race, in which other blood was largely mingled with that of the Latins. We may conceive of this earlier people of Mamers, as of the Mamertini of a more historical period: that they were a band of resolute adventurers from various parts, practised in arms, and little scrupulous how they used them. Thus the origin of the highest Roman nobility may have greatly resembled that larger band of adventurers who followed the standard of William the Norman, and were the founders of the nobility of England.

"The people or citizens of Rome, were divided into the three tribes of the Ramnenses, Titienses, and Luceres, to whatever time and under whatever circumstances they may have united. Each of these tribes was divided into ten smaller bodies called curie; so that the whole people consisted of thirty curie; these same divisions were in war represented by the thirty centuries which made up the legion, just as the three tribes were represented by the three centuries of horsemen; but that the soldiers of each century were exactly a hundred, is apparently an unfounded conclusion, as it would be if we were to argue in the same way as to the military force of one of our English hundreds."

We see, then, that this city, which afterwards became the mistress of the world, was at this time but a large village. Its principal inhabitants laboured with the plough in an ungrateful soil. Every one made choice of the spot he meant to cultivate; and, until the taking of Rome by the Gauls, 364 years after this foundation, it was rather to be called a mass of separated dwellings, than a regular well-built city. Whereas, the circumference of the walls in the time of Augustus was thirty thousand paces, without reckoning the part that approached the Tiber, which was twenty thousand; independent, also, of the suburbs. Its embellishments were superb and prodigious.

But to return to the first foundation of Rome. There were very few women at this time among the Romans; and their neighbours being unwilling to marry their daughters to these heroic robbers, Romulus caused public games to be exhibited, at which many of the Sabine women were present, who were seized by the Romans. This conduct produced a war between the two nations, which terminated in their union.

Romulus being acknowledged king, endeavoured to civilize his new subjects; and having ascertained their number, which was 3000 men, he divided them into three tribes of 1000 each, and each tribe into ten curie of 100 each. He employed by turns, force and address to complete the work he had begun: he formed a body of cavalry, consisting of 300 men; and chose for his council 100 old men, or at least such as had experience to recommend them. To these he gave the name of senators.

Romulus governed happily during five years with Tatius, whom he had associated in the government; but Tatius being killed at Lavinium, Romulus was left sole possessor of the sovereign power. He conquered the Fidenes and the Veientes; and cemented, by salutary laws, the strength and tranquillity of Rome; but afterwards aiming to become a despot, he was assassinated in the senate.

After an interregnum, Numa Pompilius was elected king. The amiable and humane disposition of this prince softened the warlike and ferocious temper of the Romans. To reat in them from outrage and barbarity, he pretended to have received his instruction from the nymph Egeria; an artifice which had the desired effect. His reign was pacific throughout; he inspired the people with a love of religion and peace; he encouraged agriculture; amended the calendar; moderate the laws relative to paternal authority created the pontiffs, the vestals, &c.; and died justly regretted by the people, who lamented him as a father and a king.

It was Numa who established the different religious ceremonies and orders of priests; namely, thirty curiones, or priests of the curie, one for each; three sumeni, or priests of Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus; three hundred celeris, or sacrificers; a body of augurs, who interpreted signs, dreams, &c.; four vestal virgins, priestesses of Vesta, leading a life of continence, and preserving a perpetual fire in the temple of the goddess; the salii, who had charge of twelve sacred shields, suspended in the temple of Mars; seculares, or heralds; and pontifices, who presided over all religious affairs. The latter formed a college, the head of which was termed the pontifex maximus, and was generally some eminent person in the state, as the king, consul, or emperor. There was another class of ministers of religion, called haruspices, who pretended to foretell events by inspecting the entrails of beasts offered in sacrifices; but Numa did not allow such sacrifices in his reign.

Tullus Hostilius, his successor, was an ambitious and intrepid prince, who delighted in war: he defeated the Fidenates and the Sabines, and demolished Alba. The Horatii and the Curiatii were chosen to fight three against three: two of the Horatii being killed, the remaining one had recourse to stratagem, and by that means conquered his adversaries: after having gained the victory, he killed his sister for shedding tears for one of the Curiatii. Tullus Hostilius is said to have died by a thunderbolt, but more probably by conspiracy.

The fine disposition of Numa re-appeared in Ancus Martius, a friend to the arts, to religion, and to peace. The Latins, mistaking the character of Ancus, made war upon him; but were soon taught that he was equally capable of humbling his enemies as of making his people happy: he subdued the Veientes, the Fidenates, and the Volscians. He embellished Rome, built public prisons, and founded the port of Ostia.

Tarquinius the Elder, descended from an illustrious family of Corinth, was elected as the successor of Ancus. The introduction of plebeians into the senate, the decoration of Rome with superb edifices, and the foundation of the capitol, were the principal events of his reign.

Servius Tullius, a man of obscure birth, succeeded Tarquinius in the Roman throne. He subdued the enemies of Rome, enacted salutary laws, enlarged the city, established jury-rents, and a body of magistrates to judge particular causes. Having formed the design of making his subjects free, it was his intention to change the form of government from a monarchy to that of a republic; but being murdered by Tarquinius, who succeeded him on the throne, this generous resolution was prevented from fulfilment. He reigned gloriously, and cemented the union between Rome and the neighbouring states. He was the first Roman king who stamped coin.

Tarquin the Superb, a proud and ferocious tyrant, mounted the throne after having murdered Servius Tullius, his wife's father. He formed projects disgraceful to his country. He delighted in luxury and debauchery; paying little regard to the established laws, he oppressed the people; endeavoured to destroy the senate, a body instituted with so much wisdom, and who already began to be the immovable rampart of the liberty of the people. The Romans in this reign triumphed over the Sabines and the Volscians, and finished the capitol. The excesses and despotism of Tarquin and his sons, increased so much the public hatred against him, that he was precipitated from a throne which he disgraced.

It is observable, in this sketch of the Roman history, that the Greeks were in every respect superior to the Romans when their state was in its infancy; the Romans never quitting their huts upon the seven hills, but to make captives of the women, and pillage the neighbouring villages. The Greeks, on the contrary, were occupied in defending their liberties; they repulsed large armies and fleets of the Persians; and they cultivated, and brought to perfection, the fine arts, of which the Romans were almost totally ignorant until the time of Scipio Africanus.

The ferocity and spirit of rapine, which prevailed among the first Romans, one might suppose would have induced the surrounding nations to exterminate them; but the necessities which urged them to commit depredations, animated their courage, and rendered their acts of injustice irrefragable. They were successful in war, from being inured to it; and at the end of four centuries, they had conquered all the nations from the Adriatic Gulf, to the river Euphrates.

The Roman Republic.

This republic, hereafter so celebrated, commenced with the expulsion of Tarquin, the last king of Rome; and it having been declared by the senate, that he had forfeited the royal dignity, they elected two chief magistrates, called consuls, whose power was to last only one year. The consuls had several other magistrates subordinate to them, such as pretors, magistrates whose office it was to render justice; tribunes, the magistrates of the people; they might oppose all the resolutions of the other magistrates, and their persons were held sacred and inviolable; questors, officers who took charge of the public money; ediles, officers who superintended the buildings, and the exhibition of public games; censors, officers whose business it was to rate the people, and inspect and correct their manners; proconsuls, magistrates commissioned to govern provinces with consular authority; and, on particular occasions, a dictator was appointed, who possessed sovereign authority.

This revolution was the epoch of the glory of Rome. Each consul exerted himself for the benefit of his country during his short administration, in order to merit a future election; but the jealousy of the people demonstrated itself from the first consulates. Valerius, famous for his victories, became suspected; and, to satisfy the plebeians, a law was made, which permitted an appeal to the people, after condemnation, from the senate and consuls, in all cases where the punishment of a Roman citizen was intended.

In the meantime the Tarquins were busy in soliciting the neighbouring nations to avenge their quarrel. Porsenna, king of Etruria, marched against Rome, and reduced it to the greatest extremities; but the spirit shown by the republicans astonished their enemies, who could no longer resist their impetuosity; and from this time the Tarquins lost all hope.

The jealousy which had hitherto subsisted between the patricians and the plebeians had augmented rather than abated; the latter thought the power invested in the consuls too great, although it had been considerably lessened by the Valerian law. They accordingly retired to the sacred mountain, and violent measures were used in vain to reduce them; but the mild and simple eloquence of Menenius Agrippa induced them to listen to terms of accommodation. They demanded a magistrate, whose business it should be to keep a watchful eye over their interests, and defend them against the intrigues of the consuls and the senate; accordingly, tribunes were created, and established by a law, denominated sacred, and which in some measure relieved them from the yoke of aristocracy, now become nearly as heavy as the despotism of their kings.

The Roman people continued to be everywhere successful in battle; but their intestine divisions brought them frequently into the most imminent danger. Coriolanus, one of their most illustrious generals, was banished by a popular faction, and his services wholly forgotten. Enraged at their ingratitude, he put himself at the head of the Volscians, marched against his country, and would probably have become its conqueror, had it not been that the entreaties of his mother prevailed on him to desist from his enterprise.

Spurius Cassius, aspiring at tyranny, proposed the agrarian law, and thereby opened a new source of discord; he was thrown from the Tarpeian rock, the death destined for the punishment of traitors. Soon after this, Cincinnatus quitted his plough for the good of the republic; he left his field for the city; and his peaceful rustic employment, for the rude clamour of war. This celebrated character suppressed, during the consulate, the factions of the tribunes; and while dictator, defeated the enemies of the republic. After having performed several other actions, which added glory to his character, he augmented it by another superior to them all; that of returning to his plough without ambition, but with the honest pride of having served his country.

The imperfection of the laws in a nation so addicted to war as the Romans, obliged the people of Rome to borrow, from those of Athens, the laws of Solon. The decemviri, to whom the examination of these laws was committed, adopted those which appeared to them most eligible; profiting by the sagacity of the Greeks, as the Greeks had done by the Egyptians. After having digested them, they delayed to put them in force, and governed with despotic authority. The ill success against the Æquites and Sabines; the murder of Sicinius Dentatus, a man of great valour, but obscure birth, who had opposed their tyranny; the reciprocal hatred subsisting between the army and the senate; and, lastly, the death of Virginia, stabbed by her father to save her from the dishonour intended her by Appius, gave the finishing blow to their power and despotism; and the same crime which had proved fatal to monarchy, was the ruin of the decemvirate.

The consuls and the military tribunes succeeded each other alternately during seventy-eight years, in which time the enemies of Rome reaped considerable advantages from their internal dissensions. Camillus, who opposed the tribunes concerning the agrarian law, was banished.

Rome was soon after attacked by the Gauls, who plundered and burnt great part of it. Camillus was recalled, and made dictator; he entirely defeated the invaders; and Rome arose from its ashes with additional splendour. The people, prompted thereto by the tribunes, were upon the point of quitting Rome, and transferring the republic to the Velentes; but Camillus opposed their intentions, and turned their restless thoughts towards military achievements.

He began with the Samnites, a fierce and warlike nation, hitherto unconquered. A long and bloody war took place. The senate punished, with extreme severity, the treason of some of the Roman troops, who, charmed with the climate of Padua, where they lay in garrison, formed a design of murdering the inhabitants, and establishing themselves in the possession of their country. Manlius had his son put to death, although a conqueror, for fighting without orders.

About the same time the famous war of Tarentum called the celebrated Pyrrhus into Italy. Active and restless, he was continually forming schemes, and occupied himself more in the affairs of others than in his own. He was a perfect master of the military art, but totally ignorant of that of governing. In addition to the opposition of his army to that of the Romans, he introduced elephants into the field, which being new to the Roman troops, was the cause of their discomfiture. But, being aware of the unconquerable spirit of his opponents, he solicited an alliance with them through the means of the orator

Cynæas. He attempted to corrupt, by presents, the virtue of Fabricius. He passed into Sicily, with a view to succour that island against the Carthaginians. And afterwards returning to Italy, he abandoned them entirely, filled with veneration for a people whose courage and constancy he was unable even to shake.

Rome now began to fix the attention of strangers. It received ambassadors from, and accepted an alliance with, Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, the enlightened protector of the arts and sciences. About this time luxury was first introduced among the Roman people, the source of all their future misfortunes. It destroyed republican virtue; it debilitated their courage; and was thus, eventually, the cause of the downfall of Rome.

The siege of Messina by the Carthaginians, and their union with Hiero, king of Syracuse, caused the first Punic war. Hiero soon after formed an alliance with the Romans, and remained ever after faithful to their cause. The love of glory rendered them as unconquerable on the sea as they had before been on the land. Sicily, the object of their ambition, was the witness of their naval victories. Africa herself trembled at the sight of her fleets. However, Xanthippus, the Lacedæmonian, whom the Carthaginians, with the basest ingratitude, deprived of his life, defeated and made prisoner the brave but unfortunate Regulus. The Carthaginians demanded peace, and Regulus himself, who was one of the ambassadors, opposed the treaty, and fell a victim to the love of his country: he returned to Carthage to meet the most horrid death that the enraged Carthaginians could inflict. Hamilcar was afterwards defeated, which terminated the first Punic war.

The siege and conquest of Saguntum, a city in alliance with the Romans, gave birth to the second Punic war. Hannibal, already famous for his brilliant success in Spain, who had from his infancy been taught to regard the Romans with detestation, advanced towards Italy at the head of an army; crossed the Rhone; traversed the Alps in the midst of winter; defeated Scipio on the banks of the Vesin; was conqueror at Trebia, Thrasymenus, and Cannæ; and filled Rome itself with alarm. The pleasures of Capua, it is said, where he had the imprudence to winter, saved Rome from destruction. It gave the Romans time to recover from the consternation which his rapid progress had occasioned; they collected all their force, and rose more terrible than ever, by their constancy, their discipline, their courage, and their policy.

Their numerous victories astonished Spain and Sicily. They declared war against Publius, the ally of Carthage; took Syracuse, Agrirentum, and Capua; defeated Adrius; and all Spain submitted to the younger Scipio. This general went into Africa, and, by his successes, obliged Hannibal to quit Europe, and return home. The interview between these two great generals hastened the battle of Zama, where every manœuvre in the art of war was displayed. Scipio was the conqueror, and the Roman senate dictated the conditions of peace. This victory augmented the already immoderate ambition of Rome, which threatened with slavery the whole of the then known world.

Hannibal, after having passed some time at the court of Antiochus, king of Syria, whom he had engaged to declare war against the Romans, returned to Bithynia; but fearing that he should be delivered up to his inveterate enemy, he put an end to his existence by poison.

The war with Philip, king of Macedon, and afterwards with Perseus, his son, was a remarkable epoch. Philip, after having suffered great loss, made peace with the Romans; but Perseus, with a view of recovering back what his father had lost, renewed a war which deprived him both of his liberty and life, and reduced his kingdom to a Roman province. Antiochus, king of Syria, who had declared war against the Romans in compliance with the wishes of Hannibal, was likewise obliged, in order to obtain peace, to cede all the country he possessed on the western side of Mount Taurus.

The Romans beheld with pain the existence of Carthage, and eagerly sought an occasion to commence hostilities. An opportunity soon presented itself. The Carthaginians being at war with Massinissa, king of Numidia, the Romans armed in his favour, and sent a strong force against Carthage itself. The Carthaginians defended themselves courageously; but the Roman commander, Publius Cornelius Scipio, becoming master of it, reduced it to ashes, and carried with him its riches to Rome. Thus ended the third Punic war; and thus fell Carthage, the ancient and powerful rival of Rome. a.c. 147.

Carthage was originally a colony from Tyre, founded on the coast of Africa, about 70 years before the foundation of the city of Rome. It was a commonwealth, governed by a senate and magistrates, annually elected; and had risen to great wealth and power by its commercial enterprise, at the commencement of hostilities with Rome.

Upon a philosophical examination of these two republics, it will be found that a variety of causes contributed to give Rome the superiority over Carthage:—1st. Two opposing parties continually divided the senate of Carthage: the rich were constantly advocates for peace; the poor for war, expecting thereby to enrich themselves by its spoils. 2dly. Avarice dictated all their deliberations; they conquered but to amass wealth. 3dly. Carthage, not having any allies, had not the assistance of auxiliaries. The only advantages which they possessed over the Romans, consisted in the superiority of their marine. 4thly. The state was poor, and individuals were very rich.

At Rome, the love of war was the spirit that animated all orders of the state. Every man was a soldier; glory decided every thing. They were ambitious of the empire of the world; they opposed to undisciplined troops, citizens on whose courage and virtue they could depend; and they had allies without number dispersed around them.

The destruction of Carthage increased the ambition of the Romans. They marched an army against the cities of Greece, which were in league against their power, and obliged them to submit; but not before the city of Corinth had been taken, and destroyed. The Spaniards, who had revolted about the same time, were defeated; and the taking of Numantia brought all Spain under their power.

To these triumphs abroad, intestine divisions often succeeded. Tiberius Gracchus, and afterwards Caius Gracchus, caused the plebeians to revolt against the aristocracy.

Jugurtha, king of Numidia, being dissatisfied with the manner in which Micipsa, his father, had disposed of his kingdom,—having divided it between himself and his two brothers,—caused them to be put to death; and found means, for some time, by presents, to render the Romans favourable to his schemes: but being attacked by them, Metellus took several places from him. At length, Marius, a man of obscure birth, but of great military talents, being elected consul, put an end to this war; and Jugurtha was led in captivity to Rome, where he died of hunger. Marius defeated the Teutoni, the Cimbri, and other northern nations, who had made irruptions into Gaul, Spain, and Italy; and during the war, which was carried on twelve years, signalized himself by his ability and his courage.

The people of Italy took up arms against Rome, for having refused them the rights of citizenship. This insurrection was the more difficult to overcome, as the insurgents were perfectly acquainted with the military discipline of the Romans. The senate disarmed a part of them, by an acquiescence with part of their demands; and this mistaken policy was the occasion of a civil war. It was followed by that of Mithridates of Pontus, the civil war of Marius and Sylla, and that of the gladiators.

Mithridates, king of Pontus, powerful and proud, yet brave and active, and as implacable in his hatred to Rome as Hannibal, determined, if possible, to humble that haughty republic. He began by a general massacre of the Romans within his territory; he next reduced several Roman provinces in Asia, and caused a Roman general to be murdered.

Sylla, the consul, was charged with the conduct of this war; but Marius, by his intrigues, not only caused him to be removed, but obtained the appointment for himself. This proceeding brought on the civil war so destructive in its consequences both to Italy and Spain: to the latter Ser-torius, the partizan of Marius, had retired. Sylla joined to courage and activity, immense wealth and a suavity of manners, which gave him considerably the advantage over Marius, who died in the second year of the civil war.

Mithridates having been defeated both by sea and land, solicited peace, which was granted to him: but Murena, one of the lieutenants of Sylla, having infringed the treaty, the war recommenced. Mithridates prevailed upon Tigranes, king of Armenia Major, to engage in the quarrel: by his assistance, he defeated the Romans, and invaded Bithynia. The consul Lucullus then marched against Mithridates, entirely disconcerted his measures, and obliged him to retire into Armenia. Two successive victories, which he gained over the Armenians, would have furnished him with the means of dictating the terms of peace, if Glabrio had not been appointed in his place. Under this consul, Mithridates recovered his losses, and ravaged Cappadocia: but Pompey, already rendered famous for his bravery in the war against the pirates of Cilicia, which he terminated in forty days, being appointed to the command, drove Mithridates out of Pontus, pursued him to Armenia, and defeated him on the banks of the Euphrates, where, in a paroxysm of despair, he put an end to his existence. Thus terminated a war which had lasted, with unabating fury, twenty years. Pompey returned to Rome crowned with laurel, and possessed of immense riches.

During this time of Rome's victories abroad, great dissensions prevailed at home. The slaves, contrary to their inclinations, had been compelled to become gladiators. Spartacus, one of them, found means to escape from the school at Capua, and assembled a considerable army, whose standards bore the word, "liberty," as a motto. He defeated the Romans in several engagements; but was at length totally routed by Lucinius Crassus. Spartacus, perceiving that the alternative was no other than to be made a prisoner, or to die, was killed in battle, fighting heroically.

A new conspiracy exposed Rome to the greatest danger. Lucius Sergius Catiline, a man of high birth, but plunged in debauchery and debt, had formed a design of becoming master of Rome. Cicero, the orator, discovered the plot. The army raised for this nefarious purpose, was routed, Catiline killed, and the greater part of his accomplices taken and beheaded.

Sylla having set a bad example, several Romans there were, who, possessing equally his ambition, but wanting his abilities, aspired at sovereign authority. But Pompey, Crassus, and Cæsar, more bold and more active than their competitors, divided the government between them. This coalition was termed the first triumvirate. Cæsar, however, would have no equal; Pompey disdained to have a superior; and the rivalry of these two powerful men soon occasioned the ruin of the state.

Cæsar obtained the consulate, and with it the government of Gaul for five years. Pompey and Crassus remained at Rome, while Cæsar was busied in extending his conquests, and laying the foundation of his future greatness. He attached Pompey to his interests, by giving him his daughter in marriage; and, joining valour with policy, he signalized himself by the greatest military enterprises. He defeated the Swiss, who had endeavoured to establish themselves in Franche-Comté; subdued Ariovistus, king of the Germans, who had invaded that province; conquered the Belgians, or Fleming; and, reduced, with wonderful facility, the whole of Gaul. He invaded Britain, and imposed a tribute upon the inhabitants. All these achievements were performed in the space of eight years.

Crassus having been killed in a battle with the Parthians, and the daughter of Cæsar, the wife of Pompey, being dead, Pompey beheld with a jealous eye the brilliant actions of his father-in-law, and sought, by every means in his power, to render him obnoxious to the people; he even endeavoured to deprive him of his government. Cæsar, assured of the fidelity of his troops, marched directly to Rome, when Pompey and his partisans immediately abandoned it.

Cæsar had now become perpetual dictator; he gained the people by his bounties, by his valour, and his wisdom, and intimidated his enemies. He pursued Pompey to Greece. After several events, those great rivals met on the plains of Pharsalia; and victory declared in favour of Cæsar, who was as remarkable for his clemency after the battle, as he had been for his bravery during the engagement. The vanquished Pompey retired into Egypt. Ptolemy, king of that country, thinking thereby to make his court to Cæsar, had him assassinated, and sent his head to that conqueror, who could not refrain shedding tears to the memory of so great a man. It was at this period that Cæsar became acquainted with Cleopatra, whom he caused to be proclaimed queen of Egypt; her brother, Ptolemy, having been drowned in the Nile. He now marched against Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates whom he conquered with so much ease, that he thought three words were sufficient to announce his victory,—"Veni, vidi, vici." The two sons of Pompey endeavoured to revenge the death of their father; but fortune was unpropitious to their designs: after an obstinate battle, their army was defeated. Caius Pompey, the eldest son, was killed; and it was with extreme difficulty that the youngest escaped the hands of the conqueror. It was in this war that Cato, disdaining to survive the liberty of his country, put an end to his existence at Utica.

Cæsar returned to Italy; but, inflated with his extraordinary success, displayed more ostentation and pride than he had hitherto done. Rome groaned under the intolerable yoke he had imposed; and a conspiracy having been formed against him, he was assassinated by Brutus in the senate.

Lepidus and Antony, lieutenants of Caesar, breathed extreme vengeance. Antony examined the will of the dictator; and by it he had adopted Octavius, the son of his sister Julia. He bequeathed his gardens to the people, and a sum of money to each particular citizen. There were likewise legacies to several of the conspirators, particularly to Brutus, with reversion to Octavius.

The funeral oration delivered on this occasion, the appearance of the veteran soldiers in tears, who threw their arms and crowns upon the funeral pile of their illustrious general, and the cries of the Roman ladies, transported the people with rage against the conspirators, whose houses and property they burnt. It was thus that the people laid the foundation of their future misery and slavery.

Octavius, who was in Greece at the time of his uncle's murder, did not, on his return to Rome, find Antony disposed to relinquish the power he had assumed in his absence. Brutus possessed the government of Gaul, which Antony now obtained of the people, contrary to the will of the senate, and he marched, aided by Octavius against Brutus, in order to dispossess him thereof by force. This conduct offended the senators. Antony being defeated, went to Lepidus, then in Gaul; and the senate confirmed Brutus in his office. Octavius, highly offended at this action of the senate, formed an alliance with Antony and Lepidus; and this union formed the second triumvirate. It was agreed between them, that Italy, and the coast, should be in common; that Antony should command in Gaul, Lepidus in Spain, and Octavius in Africa and Sicily. Lepidus remained at Rome to defend Italy; while Antony and Octavius were employed in combating Cassius and Brutus. Thus all their common enemies were immolated in the cause of the triumvirate, and their particular friends were sacrificed to the resentment of each triumvir. Octavius destroyed Cicero. His head and hands being severed from his body, were fastened to the tribune, where that great orator had so often astonished Rome by his eloquence. Antony abandoned his uncle, Lepidus his brother. Three hundred senators, and 4000 knights, were proscribed. Thus Rome became the theatre of horror and infamy; and the cruelties were renewed that had been heretofore practised in the contest between Marius and Sulla.

In the meantime, Cassius and Brutus were defeated at Philippi; and each of them put an end to his existence, in order to avoid falling into the hands of the conqueror. Octavius returned to Rome; Antony went into Asia. He there cited Cleopatra to appear before his tribunal, for having taken part with the assassins of Caesar; but becoming enamoured of her beauty, he sacrificed thereto his glory and his interest. He did not return to Italy for upwards of a year, when he married Octavia, sister of Octavius, and widow of Marcellus. A new division of the empire now took place; all the eastern parts were ceded to Antony, the western to Octavius, and Africa to Lepidus, who contested Sicily with Octavius. Lepidus, deserted by his friends, was exiled to a small town in Latium.

Antony, fascinated by the charms of Cleopatra, employed his time in giving superb entertainments, instead of attending to the concerns of his army. He endeavoured to justify his conduct to the senate; but they were incensed at his neglect, and declared war against him. The armies met at Actium, where Octavius gained that celebrated victory, which made him sole master of the Roman republic. Cleopatra, alarmed, set sail for the Peloponnesus; and Antony abandoned his fleet, and the empire of half the world, to accompany his mistress to Egypt. Being pursued by his conqueror, he fell upon his sword, and thereby put an end to his life. Cleopatra shut herself within the temple of Antony, where she applied an asp to her bosom, and expired at the base of the statue of her infatuated admirer.

Octavius now returned to Rome, and had a public triumph during three days. Having become sole master, he feigned a desire to resign his authority, and demanded the advice of Agrippa and Mecenas. The former advised him to re-establish the republic; but the opinion of the latter being contrary, and Octavius abiding by it, the slavery of Rome was decided. He left some appearance of authority yet in the hands of the senate, in dividing with them the provinces of the empire; but reserved to himself all those in which the troops were stationed, that he might at all times be master of the army. Thus commenced the mightiest monarchy that any age has produced.

It will, perhaps, be interesting to investigate the cause of the astonishing and rapid elevation of the Roman empire.

1st. The indignity with which they treated all those whom the fortune of war had placed within their power; being as ambitious of becoming masters of their persons as of their dominions, in order that they might load them with chains, drag them in triumph after their chariots, and put them to ignominious deaths; and as these princes were, almost without exception, devoted to luxury and effeminacy, they beheld Rome with terror and humility; and the presence of an army of veterans was enough to reduce them to servitude.

2nd. Experience having taught the Roman senate how much the people of Europe were better adapted to war than those of Asia, it prohibited entirely the people of Asia from coming into Europe, and the Europeans from going into Asia.

3rd. The extent of their jurisdiction being all the then known world, the senate decided, before their own tribunals, all the quarrels which took place between the dependent kings and their subjects, and between different nations. These they terminated according to their pleasure, always enfeebling those from whom they had anything to fear; and, on the contrary, supporting those from whom they had any thing to hope.

4th. When any two nations, over whose quarrels the senate had no immediate right of decision, commenced war against each other, the Romans always declared themselves in favour of the weaker party, whether their assistance had been implored or not. The stronger being reduced, the one through fear, and the other through gratitude, submitted to chains imposed by the conqueror. They then assumed to themselves the titles of protectors of the distressed, supporters of the weak, and the avengers of wrongs; and these brilliant titles contributed as much to extend and confirm their authority, as it made them beloved by those whom they had it in their power to serve, and feared by those who dreaded their punishment.

5th. The senate always accustomed itself to speak in the haughtiest manner to the ambassadors of the different nations to whom they gave audience; and if, in return, the Romans were treated with contempt, they complained loudly of the violation of their rights, and of the insult offered to the majesty of the Roman people. Thus they declared war against those who would not submit to their insolence or suffer their pride.

6th. When they were determined to make war upon any nation, they allied themselves with some of their neighbours, at whose charge it was carried on. They always had, in the neighbourhood, a second army, before they risked a battle with the first; and a third in Rome, ready upon all occasions: these important precautions rendered their legions inexhaustible.

7th. When they foresaw a probability of having to encounter two nations at the same time, they negotiated with the weakest, who generally accepted, with avidity, the offer of peace. It was therefore very difficult to form a powerful league against the Romans, because, as they were implacable in their resentments against their enemies, they intimidated, by their approach, all those who had formed plans inimical to the interest of the republic. The senate, although proud, and addicted to vengeance, were, nevertheless, perfect masters of the art of dissimulation, when it was not in their power to revenge an injury: they sometimes even refused sufficient satisfaction when offered it, at a time they were otherwise employed, that the right of reprisal might still remain, and which they intended to exercise, when a more favourable opportunity presented itself. Thus they never made war but when it was convenient to their interests.

8th. If any general, after having received a check, made an inglorious peace, the senate always refused to ratify it. Thus the prisoners of war, which the conquerors had spared, and released upon their parole, appeared again in arms under a new chief. These were the more terrible, as they had to efface, by their valour, the disgrace which they had formerly sustained. The general who was the author of the treaty, was delivered up to the enemy; and this was termed, by the senate, a respect to the rights of the people.

9th. If, on the contrary, the enemy, enfeebled by defeat, demanded peace, the senate appeared satisfied with the conditions they offered, and accepted their terms: in the meantime, having recruited their legions, they would express a dislike to some of the articles of the negotiation, and offer others with which they knew the enemy would not comply. The war then recommenced; and the enemy, in hopes of peace, having neglected their army, were presently subdued.

10th. When the Romans were at war with a prince, if his children betrayed him, his subjects revolted, or his allies deserted him, the senate afforded them an asylum, and declared them their allies: this title rendered sacred all those that received it, and it protected them in the commission of all crimes that might be useful to the state.

11th. Every treaty of peace was concluded with an alliance; that is to say, an honourable servitude; because the allies of Rome were obliged to assist her in all her wars, and could not undertake any without her participation, and against her enemies. Thus one nation conquered another, weakening thereby themselves, and strengthening Rome. This species of alliance was, nevertheless, courted; as the Romans would not suffer any other nation to oppress those whom they protected.

12th. The first condition of every treaty, was a stipulation for a tribute to Rome; with which, however exorbitant, the other contracting party was obliged to comply, or deliver up, as a security for so doing, their frontiers.

13th. That the repetition of conquest should not diminish the thirst of glory among the troops, the greatest part of the plunder taken was divided amongst them: it therefore appeared as if the senate made war not to enrich themselves, but for the benefit of those who voluntarily enlisted into their service. The Roman dominion was thereby extended with the greater certainty, and, as it were, insensibly; being hid under the exterior and seducing names of friendship, of protection, and of liberality.

14th. The nations submitted to the Roman arms with less reluctance, because there seemed nothing terrible in the yoke they imposed; they were left in possession of their laws, their manners, and their language: thus they appeared liberal as friends; but the entire subjection of their tributaries although progressive, was positively certain.

Thus war, and a strict adherence to political maxims, by degrees raised Rome to almost universal monarchy. Their success was viewed with as much astonishment by the nations which they subjugated, as we regard, with wonder, the exploits of their Scipios, their Syllas, and their Cæsars.

The Roman Empire.

We have seen Cæsar, the conqueror of Pompey, in the fields of Pharsalia, return triumphant to Rome, and assassinated by Brutus and Cassius in the senate. Antony, under the pretence of avenging his death, united himself with Lepidus, and Octavius, the nephew of Cæsar. Octavius, disdaining a division of the empire, found means to quarrel with them both, defeated them in succession, returned crowned with victory to Rome, and assumed the name of Augustus.

From the time of Julius Cæsar, the republic took the name of the Roman empire; and those who were at the head of its government were denominated emperors. The first twelve assumed the name of Cæsar, that is to say, from Julius Cæsar to Domitian.

Augustus, the first emperor, was a most fortunate warrior, and a profound politician. His liberality to the people, his fidelity to his friends, and his love of the arts and sciences, obliterated from the minds of the people the proscriptions which had taken place during the wars which had distracted the empire at the commencement of his career. During his reign, Biscay, Dalmatia, Egypt, Pannonia, Aquitaine, Illyricum, Rhetia, the country of the Vindelicians, and all the maritime towns in Pontus, became subject to the Roman state. He defeated the Germans, the Parthians, and the Dacians, and died with the reputation of a happy monarch.

The reign of Augustus was remarkable for literary characters, amongst whom were Virgil, the author of the Æneid; Horace, of Odes, Satires, and Epistles; and Ovid, of the Metamorphoses, and other poems. It has since become a proverbial expression to call any period, when the literature of a nation is particularly cultivated, its Augustan age. The reign of Augustus was also distinguished by the birth of Jesus Christ, which took place in the seven hundred and fifty-fourth year from the foundation of Rome, and in the thirtieth year of the reign of Augustus.

Tiberius, who had married the daughter of Augustus, and by whom he had been adopted, abandoned himself to voluptuousness, and governed by his ministers. His cruelty and avarice rendered him an object of general detestation. Incapable of distinguishing himself in the field, he left the conduct of his wars to his generals. Germanicus defeated the Germans, and Tiberius rewarded his services by ordering him to be poisoned. This monster of perfidy, ingratitude, and cruelty, died at Campania, in the seventy-eighth year of his reign. Jesus Christ was put to death at Jerusalem.

The Prætorian guards were a body of 10,000 men, under the especial orders of the prætor of Rome, who was usually also one of the consuls, or subsequently the emperor. They were quartered by Augustus, in small detachments, in different parts of Italy; but Tiberius brought them all to Rome, and fixed them in its neighbourhood in a fortified camp. They soon found the unarmed and timid populace of Rome too feeble to oppose them, and took upon themselves the nomination or disposal of the emperors.

Caius Cæsar, called also Caligula, was the son of Germanicus, grandson of Drusus, and great nephew of Tiberius; and succeeded to the imperial dignity in the twenty-fifth year of his age. His life was a continued scene of debauchery, much worse even than that of his predecessor. He made war against the Suebian Germans, without displaying the least promise of military talents. He was killed in his palace, in the twenty-ninth year of his age.

Claudius, uncle and successor to Caligula, gave, by turns, symptoms of good sense and moderation, folly and cruelty. He made war upon Britain, which he reduced; at his return, he had a triumph, and took the name of Britannicus. He died at the age of seventy-four. He was the husband of Messalina, so dishonoured by her licentious life.

Nero, the son of Domitian Enobarbus and Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus, and sister to Caligula, began his reign by aspiring to virtues which he did not possess. This seeming goodness was, however, of short duration; he threw off the mask, and appeared to the people in his true character. He tarnished the reputation, and diminished the power of the Roman empire. He never undertook any military expedition; but suffered the Parthians to make themselves masters of Armenia, and obliged the Roman legions to pass under the yoke. He had Rome set on fire; and put his own mother, his preceptor, and several other persons, to death in the most wanton and cruel manner. At length the senate declared him an enemy to his country; and he was condemned to be conducted, quite naked, with his head between the prongs of a pitchfork, through the streets of Rome; then to be whipped to death, and afterwards to be thrown from a high rock into the Tiber. Nero saved himself from this sentence by self-murder, at the house of one of his freedmen in the country, at the age of thirty-two years, and the fourteenth of his reign. In his person the family of Augustus became extinct.

Sergius Galba, a senator, of an ancient and noble family, was, at the age of sixty-three, proclaimed emperor by the Spaniards and the Gauls; and his election was approved by the whole army. He possessed some virtue, but it was eclipsed by his cruelty and his avarice. He fell into the snare which he had laid for Otho, and was killed at Rome in the seventh month from his elevation.

Otho succeeded as emperor. He united in his person the extremes of valour and effeminacy. Having been overcome in battle by Vitellius, his competitor, he stabbed himself, in the thirty-eighth year of his age, and the ninety-fifth day of his reign.

Vitellius mounted the imperial throne after the death of Otho. He reigned without honour, and was cruel in his government. He killed Sabinius, the brother of Vespasian, and burnt him with the Capitol. He was an extreme glutton, and was killed by an officer in the service of Vespasian, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, having reigned eight months and one day. His body, after having been dragged through Rome, was thrown into the Tiber.

Vespasian succeeded to the purple. He brought under the Roman yoke many powerful nations: he took Jerusalem, and entered it in triumph with his son Titus. His death was much regretted by the senate and the people. He was good tempered, moderate, humane, witty, capable of friendship, and, on the whole, the greatest emperor since Augustus.

Titus succeeded his father: he was perfectly a master of his passions, and governed the empire so admirably as to gain the name of the "Love and Delight of the Human Race." His eloquence, his valour, and his moderation, were the charms by which he gained the hearts of his subjects. He died in the forty-first year of his age, having reigned two years, eight months, and twenty days.

Domitian, the younger brother of Titus, ascended the throne. He abandoned himself to every vice, and was capable of every crime. He raised many considerable edifices in Rome; and was killed in his palace, by his domestics, in the fifteenth year of his reign.

Nerva, already advanced in age, was next elected emperor. He governed with justice, and chose Trajan for his successor. He died at Rome, at the age of seventy, having reigned four months and eight days, regretted by a people whom he had rendered happy.

Trajan, by birth a Spaniard, succeeded Nerva. He was a successful soldier, and extended the bounds of the Roman empire. He was just, and an enemy to flattery and envy; he was friendly, and loved his subjects; and it has been said that his only defects were a love of war and wine. He died in Asia in the sixty-third year of his age.

Adrian was raised to the throne by the means of Plotina, the wife of Trajan. He had a happy disposition; was a protector of the arts, and of artists; and his greatest ambition was to have the reputation of being learned. He was a perfect master of the Greek language, and jealous of those who spoke or wrote better than himself. He abandoned many provinces conquered by Trajan, and built a temple in honour of Venus on mount Calvary. He died in the Campania of Rome, at the age of sixty-two years.

Antoninus Pius, of Nîmes, succeeded

Adrian. He treated his subjects as his children. Liberality, clemency, and affability, formed only a part of the good qualities of this prince: his wit was polished, his sentiments noble. He defeated the Britons by his generals. He repulsed the Moors, and took part of Egypt. His death took place at a country seat called Lorium, four leagues from Rome, in the sixty-third year of his age.

Marcus Aurelius, the successor of Antoninus, took Lucius Verus as his colleague in the empire: they made war upon the Parthians. Lucius Verus intended to command in person, but stopped at Antioch, and gave his orders to his lieutenants, who defeated the Parthians, and took Seleucia, one of the finest cities in Syria. Lucius Verus returned to Rome, and had a triumph. He died at Venice, of apoplexy, or poison, having reigned nine years.

After the death of Verus, Marcus Aurelius governed alone, with all the wisdom which characterises a good prince. He overcame several northern nations, and sold the most precious part of his property to compensate his soldiers, rather than oppress the people. This crowned philosopher would serve as a perfect model for princes, if his extreme kindness had not sometimes degenerated into weakness. He died at the age of sixty-one years.

Commodus, son of Aurelius, but unworthy of such a parent, succeeded his father on the throne. He made himself detestable by his debaucheries; but carried on a successful war against the Germans. After having practised the cruelties of a Nero, and the wickedness of a Caligula, by sacrificing the wisest among the Romans, and murdering his wife and his sister, he died, as is supposed, by poison.

Vertius, prefect of Rome, succeeded Commodus, at the age of seventy. He was originally a schoolmaster in Liguria, which he quitted for a military life. In endeavouring to establish discipline in the army, he was killed by the soldiers of his own guard, after a reign of twenty-four days.

Julian usurped the empire after the death of Pertinax; but he was defeated by his rival, Septimius Severus, and was slain in his palace in the seventh month of his reign.

Severus, who had already taken the title of emperor in Illyria, succeeded Julian. He defeated and killed Pescennius Niger, who had been proclaimed emperor in the east. He also defeated Clodius Albin, who had assumed the title of Cæsar in Gaul. He subjugated the Parthians and the Arabs, and joined to his military skill the reputation of learning. In England he built the famous wall in the north, which extended from sea to sea—and which is in part remaining at this hour—in order to prevent the invasions of the Picts and Scots. He died at York, after having reigned gloriously eighteen years and four months.

Caracalla and Geta, the sons of Severus, were elected emperors. Caracalla having killed Geta, whom the senate had declared an enemy to the republic, reigned alone. He governed tyrannically, and abandoned himself to the most infamous and degrading vices. He carried on a war with some success against the Germans; and was preparing to march against the Parthians, when he was killed at Edessa, at the age of forty-three years; after having reigned six years and two months, the detestation of the Roman people. Here we date the decline of the Roman empire.

Macrinus and Diadamenis, father and son, were placed on the imperial throne. They were killed by the soldiers, after having reigned fourteen months.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, surnamed Heliogabalus, priest of the Temple of the Sun, was proclaimed emperor by the army. He was a monster of lasciviousness; and was, with his mother Semiasyra, killed by the soldiers, after having reigned two years and eight months.

Alexander Severus, cousin to the last emperor, mounted the throne at the age of fifteen years. The army gave him the name of Cæsar, and the senate that of Augustus. He gained a signal victory over the Persians; and was noted as a patron of the arts and sciences. He was killed in Gaul, by a soldier whom he had raised from the ranks, after a reign of thirteen years; during which he consoled the empire, by his virtues and his kindness, for the tyranny of the preceding reigns.

Maximinian, of the Gothic race, elected emperor by the soldiers, was the son of a poor peasant, and, from the station of a common soldier, arose step by step, to the first dignities in the empire. He was eight feet high, and a most voracious glutton. He commenced his reign by the murder of his best friends, and was himself murdered by his soldiers.

Gordian was placed upon the imperial throne by the soldiers. He appointed his son as his colleague, whom he sent into Africa against Capellian, governor of Numidia and Mauritania. The younger Gordian was vanquished and killed by the Numidians, at the age of forty-five years. Gordian the elder died with despair, at the age of eighty, in the third year of his reign.

Maximus and Balbinus, the first the son of a smith, and the latter of noble origin, had been during the life time of Maximinian elected emperors by the senate, and now assumed the throne. But the soldiers, dissatisfied with their election, entered their palaces, and massacred them. They then set up the grandson of Gordian, whom the senate had also declared Cæsar after the death of his grandfather.

Gordian II., invested with the purple, opened the temple of Janus, and carried on a successful war against the Parthians and Persians. He pursued Sapor to the confines of Persia, where he was killed through the treachery of Philip, whom he had constituted his lieutenant. The Romans, for his virtues, ranked him among the gods.

The two Philips, father and son, were proclaimed emperors. The father was the son of an Arab chief of robbers. Before he came into Italy, he had made his peace with Sapor. He abandoned some of the provinces of the empire; visited Arabia; and built, at the place of his birth, a city, which he called Philippopolis. During the reign of the Philips, was celebrated at Rome, with great magnificence, the year one thousand from the foundation of the city. Philip, the father, was killed at Verona, and the son at Rome, after having reigned about six years.

Decius and his son, who had been sent against the Scythians, being successful, received from the soldiers the imperial crown. Decius possessed the qualities of a good soldier and an honest man. He, however, persecuted the Christians with rigour, on account of what he considered their fanaticism. After having reigned two years, he, together with his son, perished by an ambuscade prepared for them by Trebonianus Gallus.

Hostilius and Gallus succeeded Decius in the empire. Hostilius had been named by Decius as his successor; but he died soon after his elevation, with the plague, at Rome. Gallus, who was saluted emperor by the legions, divided his power with his son Volusian. Lucinius, brother of Hostilius, prepared to fight him, but was abandoned, and killed by his soldiers in Illyria. Gallus and Volusian marched against Emilius, who had revolted in Næsis, and were killed at Terano, after having reigned about two years.

Emilius, an African,* was proclaimed emperor by the legions which had revolted against Gallus; but the soldiers having learned that Valerian had taken the purple in Gaul, they killed Emilius, after having reigned three months.

Valerian, and Gallien, his son, governed the empire jointly. They were unfortunate in their wars, particularly in that carried on against Sapor, king of Persia, who defeated Valerian in Mesopotamia, took him prisoner, and treated him with every indignity. Gallien defeated and killed Ingenuus, who had taken the purple. The weakness of the Roman government had encouraged the Germans, who made irruptions into Gaul and Italy. At the same time the governors of the provinces aimed at becoming independent; and at one time no less than thirty had declared themselves emperors.

Posthumus usurped the empire in Gaul, which he governed ten years by his valour and prudence. He laid siege to Mayence, which had revolted at the solicitation of Lollius, elected emperor by the troops which he commanded. Posthumus and Lollius were killed by their own soldiers.

Marius, originally a blacksmith, elected emperor after the death of Posthumus, was killed on the second day of his reign, by a soldier who had been his boy at the forge. He ran his sword through his body; telling him, at the same time, that it was of his own forging.

Victorinus succeeded Marius, and was killed at Cologne, by a writer, whose wife he had seduced. Tetricus succeeded Victorinus, and took the purple at Bourdeaux. Gallus succeeded, and was killed with Valerian, his brother, at Milan, in the ninth year of his reign.

Claudius II. succeeded Gallus. He totally defeated the Goths, who had committed great ravages in Greece. His modesty, moderation, equity, and other good qualities, gained him general esteem. He died of a contagious fever, in the second year of his reign. Quintillus, the brother of Claudius, was saluted emperor by the soldiers, but killed on the seventeenth day of his reign.

Aurelian succeeded Quintillus, and was esteemed for his valour and his prudence. He defeated, near Chalons, in Champagne, the army of Tetricus. He fought a bloody battle with Zenobia, a celebrated princess. This astonishing woman, after the death of her husband, Odenatus, who, under the emperor Gallus, was proclaimed emperor in the east, commanded the army in person with much success. Aurelian took her prisoner, and entered Rome in triumph, making Zenobia walk before his chariot. She possessed extraordinary beauty, and a great mind. Aurelian was assassinated by the means of his secretary, in the road between Constantinople and Hæcæleum.

The army having refused at this time to bestow the imperial throne, the senate reassumed its ancient right. Their choice fell on an old man, named Tacitus. He died in the sixth month of his reign. He was just and enlightened, perfectly disinterested, and a man well suited to close the wounds of the state. Florian succeeded Tacitus, his brother; but reigned only two months and twenty days. This prince demanded the empire as the right of his family.

Probus, saluted emperor after Florian, was of obscure birth; but he possessed heroic valour; he drove from Gaul the many barbarians which had nearly overrun it. He defeated Saturninus in the east, and Proculus and Bonosus, near Cologne, usurpers of the empire. Probus was killed by his own soldiers, after having reigned with glory about six years.

Aurelius Carus succeeded Probus; and soon after he had been named Augustus, he created his sons, Carinus and Numerian, Cæsar, with whom he reigned about two years. He defeated the Sarmatians, and afterwards the Persians, and was killed by lightning on the banks of the Tigris. Numerian, who was with his father in the east, was assassinated in his litter. Carinus, whom his father had left in the west, to govern Illyria, Gaul, and Italy, had, by his crimes, become the scourge of the human race. The victorious army of Persia refused to acknowledge him, and saluted Diocletian as emperor.

Diocletian was no sooner elected emperor than he marched against Carinus, and defeated him in a general battle in Mæsia.

He bestowed the name of Cæsar on Maximin, surnamed Hercules, and sent him into Gaul, to quell an insurrection of the peasants, which duty he soon effectively performed. Carausius, general of a part of the troops of the empire, and whom Maximin had ordered to be killed, took the purple, and possessed himself of Britain. Achilleus took possession of all Egypt; and Narses used every effort to render himself master of the east. Diocletian now took for his colleague in office, Maximin Hercules, and named him Augustus; he gave, at the same time, the title of Cæsar to Constantine and Galerius. The two emperors accommodated matters with Carausius. They defeated the Persians under Narses, and on their return to Rome, received the honour of a superb triumph. But they presently grew weary of their grandeur, and both emperors relinquishing the purple on the same day, appeared in the habit of common citizens: Diocletian at Nicomede, and Maximin at Milan. The former retired to Salona, in Dalmatia; the latter to Lucania. Diocletian was a philosopher, possessing a commanding genius. Maximin was fierce and cruel, possessing more of the courage of the soldier, than the genius of a general.

Constantius Chlorus and Galerius were declared emperors by the senate. These two princes divided the empire between them. Constantius had Gaul, Italy, and Africa; Galerius, Illyria, Asia, and the east. Constantius died after a reign of about two years, with the character of a just prince.

Constantine the Great, son of Constantius, was elected emperor at York. But the soldiers of the prætorian guard, who had revolted at Rome, gave the title of Augustus to Maxentius, son of Maximin Hercules. Maximin, who now felt regret at having resigned the purple, left Lucania, and came to Rome, from whence he wrote in vain to Diocletian to re-assume the imperial throne. Galerius sent Severus to Rome, to oppose Maxentius. Severus besieged Rome, but was betrayed, and defeated; and soon after Maxentius caused him to be strangled between Rome and Capua. Maximin, having in vain endeavoured to dispossess his son, Maxentius, retired into Gaul, in search of Constantine, his son-in-law, with a design to kill him. Fausta, daughter of Maximin, and wife of Constantine, being acquainted with the design of her father, informed her husband. Maximin, in order to save himself from the fury of Constantine, endeavoured to embark at Marsailles for Italy, but was killed in that city by the order of Constantine. Galerius honoured Licinius with the purple, and died soon after. The Romans at this time obeyed three emperors; Constantine, Maxentius, and Licinius. Constantine possessed talents both for war and politics; he defeated the army of Maxentius, and afterwards attacked Licinius, who had married his sister; and having defeated him in several actions both by sea and land, the vanquished Licinius surrendered at dis-erection to the conqueror. Licinius retired to Thessalonica, where he lived in privacy and tranquillity, until Constantine, hearing that he was alive, ordered him to be put to death.

Constantine, now sole master of the empire, transferred the seat of government to Byzantium, which he named Constantinople. Under him Christianity began to flourish; he received baptism; but, although he was a nominal Christian, many of his qualities were repugnant to the principles of Christianity. He died near Nicomede.

Constantine II., Constance, and Constantius, divided the empire between them, agreeable to the will of Constantine their father. Constantine had Spain, Gaul, and the Alps; Constance, Asia, Egypt, and the East; Constantius, Italy, Sicily, and Africa. This division was the ruin of the empire. Constantine was killed by the soldiers of his brother Constantius, who perished by treason a little time after. Constance, sole master of the empire, reigned twenty-four years. Destitute of glory, weak, and inconsistent, he was neither loved nor feared.

Julian, called by the Christians the Apostate, by others the Philosopher, was proclaimed emperor by the troops in the lifetime of Constance. This prince was just, frugal, an enemy to vain-glory and flattery, and affected to hate the name of Christian. He died a hero fighting against the Persians.

Jovian, elected by the principal officers of the army, governed with wisdom, and encouraged Christianity. He reigned about eight months.

Valentinian succeeded Jovian; he joined in the government his brother Valens. They divided the empire of the East and the empire of the West. Valentinian had the West, and Valens the East. Gratian ascended the imperial throne after the death of his father Valentinian. Valens, defeated by the Goths, and other barbarians, who established themselves in Thrace and menaced Constantinople, died leaving few subjects to regret his loss.

Gratian appointed Theodosius governor of the East, where, by his zeal for the Christian religion, his abhorrence of its opponents, and by his courage, he rendered himself popular. Gratian being dead, and Valentinian, emperor of the West, being assassinated in the year 393, and Theodosius having vanquished Maximus and Eugenius, who had declared themselves emperors, re-united the whole empire, which he divided between his sons.

After the death of Theodosius, all degenerated; and from this epoch may be dated the fall of the Roman empire. The decline of the Roman empire, in fact, followed the age of the Antonines. The effeminate and luxurious manners of the nobles and people of Rome; the vices of the emperors; the means by which they rose to power; the disposal of sovereignty by the military; the recruiting of the army by natives of Germany and other barbarous countries; and the increasing numbers and audacity of the "barbarians," precipitated Rome from that eminence which she had attained during the consulate and the first years of the empire.

In order to connect the present with the past, and thereby render our sketch of Roman history the more complete, we shall now make some abridged extracts from the observations of a modern tourist, M. Galiffe, of Geneva, in his work entitled "Italy and its Inhabitants;" and conclude with a slight historical notice of Papal Rome, or States of the Church.

"If we were to judge of the state of society in Rome under the kingly power, from the tales which so many writers have dignified with the title of Roman history, we should find it very difficult indeed to account for the astonishing magnificence of its earliest monuments. The Cloaca Maxima, built by the elder Tarquin, is I believe the most stupendous work known in Europe—a work which even Egyptian kings might have admired. The Caria Hostilia offers remains of similar architecture; walls and vaults, built with stones of such enormous size, and so closely joined, that they are likely enough to endure to the end of the world. From these remains alone it would be easy to show how ridiculous is the supposition that the common people were of any consideration in the state under the kings of Rome; they were slaves, and could be nothing else. It is clear that they had no votes to give; that they were never consulted; that the public resolutions were not even communicated to them, except in so far as it was necessary that they should know what duties were prescribed for their performance; in short, that they were very nearly on the same footing as the Russian peasants in our days,—perhaps rather worse than better. On the other hand, I have no doubt that the aristocracy had a much higher degree of power and dignity than they are generally represented and supposed to have possessed. All those lords who were called patricians, were very nearly on a level with their chief, whom they called king. Their more immediate, armed followers, very probably formed that part of the nation called populus in the general assemblies. The plebs was considered as far below the populus, which its name indeed implied,—a name more expressive than polite; but politeness to that portion of the inhabitants of Rome was then quite out of the question.

"Under such a government, the private houses even of the wealthiest individuals must have been built on a very moderate scale, because each great man had only a portion of the general riches and a certain number of servile hands at his disposal; but the public buildings were likely to be exceedingly grand, because in them every individual was equally interested, and yet they cost to no one any distinct personal sacrifice.

"There is no doubt that these chiefs had great, and what we generally call heroic, qualities; military skill, courage, and an independent spirit. But nothing can be more absurd than to imagine that the common people had republican principles, and feelings of patriotic love. Every plebeian family was appended to their patrician chief or patron, whose house or estate was their real country; for him they worked, for him they prayed, for him they fought, him they obeyed; and it would have been impossible to separate their interests from his by any appeal to their loyalty to their king and country. King and country were words—patriotic attachment a feeling—exclusively engrossed by the higher classes, and which the lower ones never thought or heard of, except when their lords spoke of them in their presence. The plays of Corneille and Voltaire on Roman subjects in those early ages are the most ridiculous productions that fancy could dictate, at least as far as historical truth is involved in them; and all those declamations scattered through so many books of various descriptions, on the high-spirited republican sentiments of the first Romans, are no better than arrant nonsense!

"It was not till very long after the expulsion of the kings, that the plebeians began to feel that they were human beings, and that the distance at which they were kept by their lords began to wound their feelings. And it is probable, that they would never have dared to make the least attempt to raise themselves above the condition of their masters' cattle, if their services in war had not, by slow degrees, opened their eyes to their disgraceful situation. In time of peace they had either no leisure to make, or no means to circulate, observations of this nature; but in camps, where the clients of different patrons were necessarily often lodged together, and were led to compare their respective leaders, to talk of their deeds, and to discuss their private as well as public conduct, they could not fail, sooner or later, to make serious reflections on the extreme difference which existed between themselves and their masters: a difference not to be sufficiently accounted for by any disparity of natural means; notwithstanding that the habit of command on the one side, and that of blind obedience and low obsequiousness on the other, might have established a perceptible, and even a striking diversity of features as well as of temper between them. That diversity, besides, must have gradually diminished, as every succeeding war augmented the consequence, and at the same time enlarged the feelings and the understandings, of the lower classes.

"It is probable, however, that the captives in war contributed more than any other cause, to awaken sentiments—first of surprise, and at length of indignation,—in those classes with which they mingled; for there is every reason to believe that the Italian nations which the Romans subdued around them, had governments of a much more liberal nature than the latter, and were strangers to their degrading division of society into demi-gods, and demi-brutes. Every new conquest augmented the population of a lower rank, and was a real blow to the nobles; who still went on priding themselves in their victories, and indulging in that food which was poison to their prerogatives; till at length the disorder broke out, and produced a series of forced concessions. These concessions are the proper authorities to be consulted, as to the social state which preceded them; we may safely judge of what was wanted, by what was extorted; and the great moderation of the people in the earliest dissensions, is no indifferent proof of the awe with which they had been taught to look up to the patricians.

"This account of the progress of the Roman people in the unfolding of their moral faculties, may seem tedious by its length; but the progress itself was extremely slow: since it was only about 150 years after the expulsion of the kings, that they could accomplish the election of a plebeian to the consular chair. The end of the fourth century from the foundation of Rome was then fast approaching.

"From that time, indeed, the form of her government was democratical enough; yet there were still strong traces of its former exclusive nature; for the patricians retained for 65 years longer the very important office of pontiffs, or high priests: which, however, they were eventually compelled also to share with the plebeians; and after that all their rights were equal. But this did not happen till the 453d year of Rome, more than 200 years after the establishment of the consulate.

"When the plebeians had achieved a complete equality of rights with the patricians, the progress of the Roman republic towards universal dominion became, from the mere nature of things, excessively rapid. Though we may not be able to ascertain that the first plebeian who was made consul did any thing in particular to prove himself deserving of that distinction, we may be pretty sure that none were raised to the dignity but men capable of illustrating their name by their deeds,—at least in the earlier times;—afterwards, indeed, it was grown into a custom, and the election of a plebeian consul had ceased to be a party-stroke. On the other hand, the patricians were deeply interested in rivalling and excelling their plebeian colleagues; so that this double motive of action gave prodigious strength to the government, and such an impetus to the whole nation, that none of the radical defects of its constitution could impede its progress through a long series of conquests. But those defects stuck closely to it, though concealed by the very triumphs which seemed to disprove their existence; and they penetrated into its core, and gnawed its vital parts, while its outward appearance inspired ter-

"The religion of the first Romans seems to have been more simple and more serious than that of other heathen nations. They were strangers to that immense multitude of gods, which the over-luxuriant imagination of the Greeks and Asiatics had created. Their gods were few in number; and as they were believed to be virtuous and severe, they were accordingly respected and feared. Religious fear too frequently produces superstition; and the Romans were extremely superstitious. But if the excess of their credulity made them attach a high degree of importance to ceremonies, which certainly were infinitely more absurd than even the most extravagant practices of the most superstitious sects of Christians, the perfect sincerity of belief which animated every class, gave them a moral strength which has never been sufficiently appreciated. Let it be remembered, that in those early times their priests were not a stipendiary class: they were the chiefs who led the people to war, and who maintained them in peace; without whose permission and interference nothing material could be done, and who introduced some particular religious rites into every action of life. This mixture of civil and ecclesiastical power in the chief of every noble family, over his children and clients, formed such a bond of union between them, that no external influence could have broken it; and even long after the plebeians had acquired a rank in society, and a considerable degree of influence in the state, they hardly dared to think that those religious rites could be performed by any but an hereditary patrician. As soon as they began to discover that they could perform them with equal efficacy themselves, their deep respect for religion received a wound from which it never recovered. All the divinities of the conquered countries, however immoral and impure, were freely admitted and adopted; and they completely changed the nature as well as the form of public and private worship. The great men began to be as free in their speeches on the subject, as the same class in France affected to be during the last two reigns of the Bourbons. Indifference and incredulity glided down from the higher to the lower classes; and that Rome which conquered Carthage, had long ceased to exist, when Cæsar made himself master of its corpse. The winding-sheet was indeed more brilliant than any imperial robe, and seemed an object well worthy of his ambition.

"The conquests of the Romans unquestionably increased all their faculties at first; but, after a certain period, they agitated and exhausted, and at length destroyed them. It was a wise policy in the citizens of Rome to communicate their own rights to so many nations. Since they chose to invade the whole world, it was necessary that they should associate many partners in such an enterprise. But any privilege which we share with numbers, loses proportionably of its estimated value; and the love of Rome, which had been a passion, ceased at length to be even a feeling.

"During this period, the luxury of the Romans was gradually carried to so extravagant a pitch, that the wise and the thinking even of their own nation were shocked at, and condemned it; but idle declamations can do no good in such cases. Many of those who were accounted the most virtuous and the best citizens, were infected with this disorder, and delighted in it hardly less than the worst. But it does not appear that it was a part of their luxury to employ their riches in raising splendid edifices, for the astonishment of posterity. Posterity was nothing to them; present enjoyment was their only care. They levelled mountains, they digged or filled up lakes, they sent to the extremities of the earth for every delicacy of the table for which each country was renowned; they filled a great number of elegant villas with the most costly furniture, they kept an immense number of servants and slaves, and thus they squandered thousands of millions, of which hardly any trace remains except the names of the places from whence they dated elegant, philosophical epistles to their friends!

"Having thus treated of the state of Rome under her kings, and as a republic, we come next to the consecration of Rome under the emperors.

"We are now arrived on the real classical ground of Roman antiquities; for ninety-nine hundredths at least of the fine ruins still extant, belong to that glorious epoch which Tacitus, the greatest writer and the best historian that ever lived, has made so familiar to us, and on which so much light has been thrown by Suetonius.

"Time has not respected the most curious and interesting monuments of that memorable era; but enough is left to feed the admiration of our modern philosophers with a splendid banquet of grands souvenirs. The whole space on the farther side of the Capitol is full of ruins; and those ruins are the more interesting, as the names of but very few of them are known; so that a man of imagination may choose that which he likes best, amongst all the conjectured ones with which each fragment of Roman antiquities had been so liberally furnished by the men of learning who have written on the subject.

"The form as well as the height of the hills, has been completely changed by the immense heaps of ruins which were thrown down into the lower parts of the town, and which in many places rose up to the level of those buildings which towered above them before. Houses have been built in places where none existed in ancient times; just because those places happened to be less encumbered with ruins, and because the ground was more solid. Trees have been planted on the top of the rubbish which filled up some streets, and more particularly in the Forum Roma-

But since we cannot obtain a clear idea of the streets and public buildings of ancient Rome, let us at least turn to the best account those which are within our reach; and which Rome, as it is, offers in sufficient abundance to occupy the leisure hours of a man of taste for years.

"The Colosseum alone is so vast, so noble, so grand (notwithstanding some serious defects in its architecture) and especially so uncommonly picturesque in so many points of view, that it well deserves to be visited, at least twice or thrice a week. Nor is it necessary to admire the Romans of former times, and to hate their present governors, in order to take a lively interest in this magnificent fragment of antiquity. The Colosseum is now, however, the only piece of antiquity that can be seen so often with the same pleasure: the other ruins have no such picturesque merit, and are only remarkable for partial considerations, such as painted ceilings, the distribution, size, and form of rooms, &c.

"There are twelve obelisks in Rome; and five grand pillars, the two finest of which are those called the columns of Trajan and Antonine. The first gives its name to a square, the middle of which has been excavated as low down as the level of the ancient plane, which is, if I remember well, about eight or ten feet lower than that of the buildings around. The other stands in the middle of the Piazza Colonna; there is a staircase within it, as in the London monument. The general appearance of these columns is very agreeable as well as grand, and they are noble decorations to a square.

"The Capitol is so very different from what it was in ancient times, that it affords but little satisfaction at first sight; it is, however, far from being so insignificant as some would have it, and it grows more interesting on a nearer examination. What people call the Capitol at present, was only the Intermontium of ancient Rome, a sort of midway hill, which joined the Tarpeian rock to the real Capitoline Mount. The latter is extremely high, as one may easily perceive from the church of Ara Coeli on its top. The Tarpeian rock is lower, but yet quite lofty enough for its known destination.

"It must be observed, that the Romans were exceedingly far from possessing any well-founded pretensions to elegance; they imitated the Greeks as closely as they could, without ever attaining to their pitch of excellence. They thought there could never be too much of a good or a fine thing; and they crowded temples, houses, statues, obelisks, and every sort of ornament, in a manner that must have seemed absurd to a person of taste. Rome must have had the appearance of those very rich, but vulgar ladies of fortune, who cover themselves with every description of jewels and gaudy finery that money can purchase: and when Roman writers speak of the admiration with which strangers were struck at the sight, I am much disposed to think that they mistook mere gazing for admiration. It is utterly impossible that a Greek artist could have felt any thing like pleasure, at seeing a dozen temples squeezed together in a space which he would have thought too small for one. Another proof of the want of taste in the ancient Romans, is the ridiculous practice of placing in their temples pillars which they brought from Greece, Egypt, or other countries, and which of course could hardly ever perfectly agree with the architecture with which they were associated. This was done in so many instances, that we may take it for granted they never lost a single opportunity of adding to their supposed riches in that way.

"In general, the Romans were not formed for the fine arts. They had strong and coarse ideas of things, which completely disqualified them from ever imagining those delicate touches which they sometimes perceived and felt in Grecian works, and which they strove to imitate, but never could express with the same elegance and correctness as their models, because they were not of their own growth. The Roman arms had conquered the territory of Greece, but the Grecian accomplishments subdued the Romans themselves; and the latter victory was certainly more glorious than the former; which was only the inevitable consequence of an enormous disproportion of mere physical force between the combatants."

PAPAL ROME, OR STATES OF THE CHURCH.

The name of Pope, or Father, was formerly given to all bishops. But since the time of Gregory VII. it has been solely applied to the bishop of Rome.

The temporal grandeur of the Roman pontiff commenced in times very remote. Constantine gave to the church of Lateran upwards of 1000 marks in gold, and about 30,000 marks in silver, besides the assignment of rents. The Popes, charged with sending missionaries to the east and west, and with providing for the poor, obtained for these pious purposes, from the richer Christians, without much trouble, considerable sums. The emperors, and the kings of the Lombards, gave to the Holy Father, lands in various parts; and many others, by gift, and by will, increased his patrimony. In the seventh century we find the pontiff possessed of great riches in various countries, and exempted from tax or tribute. The Popes formed the design to render themselves independent. Under the reign of Pepin, father of Charlemagne, this revolution commenced; and it was completed under that of his son. Adrian I. caused money to be coined with his name; and the custom of kissing the feet of the Pope began about the close of the eighth century, when they assumed regal rights, and their power and riches increased rapidly in the following ages. Gregory IV. rebuilt the port of Ostia; and Leo IV. fortified Rome at his own expense.

The election of Pope has been different in the different ages of the church. The people, and the clergy, were the first electors; and the emperor had the power of confirming the election, after the death of Pope Simplicius, in 483. Odoacer, king of the Heruli, and of Italy, made a law which struck at the right of election, under pretence of remedying the divisions which sometimes took place on the election of a Pope. This law was abolished about twenty years after, in the fourteenth council of Rome, held, in 602, under Pope Simmacus, with the consent of the king Theodoric. But this prince, who was an Arian, becoming cruel towards the latter end of his life, caused Pope John to be laid in prison, where he died miserably in 526. He then usurped to himself the right of creating a Pope, and named to the pontifical chair Felix IV.

The Gothic kings who succeeded him followed his example; yet not entirely, for they contented themselves with confirming the election which the clergy had made. Justinian, who destroyed the empire of the Goths in Italy, and after him the other emperors, preserved this right; and they obliged the new elected Pope to pay a sum of money for the confirmation of his election. Constantine Pogonat delivered the church from this servitude and unworthy exaction, in 681.

Notwithstanding this apparent relinquishment on the part of the emperors, they always preserved some authority in the election of Popes, until the time of Louis le Debonnaire, in 824, and his successors, Lothaire I. and Louis II., who ordained that the election of Popes should henceforward be free, and canonical, according to ancient usage.

Parties in favour of the different candidates for the Popedom, had now arisen to a great height, and were the cause of the schisms which followed in the church. The emperors were obliged to take on themselves the right of election; but after the schism of Peter and Victor IV. had been extinguished, all the cardinals re-united under the obedience of Innocent II. After his death, the cardinals were the only electors of Celestine II. in 1143; since which time they have been in full possession of this privilege. Honorius III. in 1216, or, according to others, Gregory X. in 1274, ordained, that the election should be made in the conclave.

The conclave is a part of the palace of the Vatican, composed of many cells, where the cardinals are shut up for the election, which takes place on the morning of the tenth day after the death of the Pope.

The Pope may be considered under four different titles: first, as chief of the church; second, as patriarch; third, as bishop of Rome; and fourth, as a temporal prince. As primate, he is the superior of all the catholic churches. As patriarch, his rights extend over the kingdoms and provinces within the pale of the Romish church. As bishop of Rome, he exercises in the diocese of Rome the ordinary functions which he has not a right to exercise in other dioceses. As a temporal prince, he is sovereign of Rome, and the states which have been acquired by donation, or by prescription.

No throne upon earth has been filled with men of more exalted genius, higher ambition, or more depraved vice, than the pontifical chair; but they are in general old men, well versed in the knowledge of men and the world. Their council is composed of men resembling themselves; and their orders for a length of time embraced almost the universe.

The government is wholly ecclesiastical, no one being eligible to fill any civil office who has not attained the rank of abbot. The Pope enacts all laws, and nominates to all clerical appointments. He is assisted, however, by the high college of cardinals, comprising about seventy members; and the different branches of the government are conducted each by congregations, with a cardinal at its head.

Cardinal Braschi (Pius VI.) was elected in the early part of the year 1775, on the death of the celebrated (Ganginelli) Clement XVI. He occupied the pontifical chair until the breaking out of the French revolution in 1789; or, rather till after the execution of Louis XVI., when he was induced to take a part in the war carrying on against France, by the emperor and other potentates. The French armies having overrun Italy, seized upon Rome, and made the venerable pontiff prisoner in 1798, from whence he was conveyed into France, where he died at Valence, in August, 1799, at a very advanced age. During this period the church domains were alienated; but the compensation since made to their former owners, and the restoration of suppressed churches and convents, have cost the government prodigious sums, and are the principal causes of the wretched state of the finances. Within the limits of the Papal States there are no fewer than eight archbishops, and fifty-nine bishops; and it is estimated that in Rome there is a clergyman for every ten families. It is needless to add that this superabundance of priests, instead of promoting religion and morality, is, in fact, a principal cause of their low state in the city. The outward department of the papal court is, however, at present highly decorous. Those times, so disastrous and disgraceful, when the Popes had so many nephews, and those nephews built so many splendid palaces and villas, called by the Romans, in derision, miracles of St. Peter, are now almost as much forgotten in Rome, as the time when horses were made consuls, and emperors emperors. In 1800 a successor to the popedom was elected at Venice, who took the name of Pius VII. At his death in 1823, Leo XII. was elected, and was succeeded in 1829 by Pius VIII., who filled the papal chair only two years. He was succeeded in 1831 by Gregory XVI., whose reign embraced a period of no ordinary interest and difficulty in the history of the church, and in the relation of the Vatican with the temporal powers of Christendom.

On the 1st of July, 1846, Gregory XVI. breathed his last. His death produced a profound impression in Italy, because it was felt that it must lead to considerable changes. Preparations were immediately made for holding a conclave, with a view to nominate a successor. Meanwhile the Roman people congregated in the streets, demanding reforms. The authorities caused the people to be dispersed by force, but order was not established till a sanguinary collision had taken place between the citizens and the military force. The fermentation in Romagna and the Marches increased from day to day, and troubles broke out at this juncture at Ancona. It was in the midst of these that the new pope was elected on the 16th of June, and proclaimed on the 17th. The individual on whom the choice of the college fell was the cardinal Mastai, a native of Sinigaglia, then only fifty-four years of age. The first acts of Pius IX. gave indications of promise. In the middle of July an amnesty was published greatly to the general satisfaction.

But with all this, the retrograde party showed a bold front, and intrigued on every side; and from the first months of 1847, the hopes which the Romans had allowed to glow in their bosoms in 1846, began to wither and die within them. The Austrian influence was very nearly as preponderant as in the time of Gregory XVI.; the convocation of any representative assembly was eluded; patriotic meetings and demonstrations were seen with an evil eye; the censorship existed in full force; and the secret activity of the Jesuits was still everywhere traceable. These circumstances convinced the most favourably disposed that the changes so ardently desired would never be made by the pope nor by the church.

It was not till the cries of "Death to the Austrians!" "Death to Lambruschini!" "Death to Bernetti!" had been repeatedly heard on the Piazza di Spagna, and on the Piazza di Venezia, where the Austrian ambassador lived; it was not till Lambruschini and other reactionary cardinals had left Rome, with a view to escape personal violence, that the pope proclaimed an edict for a civic guard. On the 8th of July, Cardinal Gizzi, the Secretary of State, sent in his resignation, which was accepted; and Cardinal Ferretti, legate of Pesaro and Urbino, was immediately appointed his successor. Disquietude, nevertheless, continued, nor was tranquillity restored by the activity of the city guard, which probably over-acted its part. The pope, however, was now prepared to go farther than he had hitherto done. He dismissed the cardinal governor of the police, Grassellini, and ordered him to quit Rome. Contemporaneously with these events, the Austrians entered Ferrara, an occupation against which Ferretti in vain protested. In the month of August, the pontiff dismissed some high functionaries suspected of connivance with the retrograde agitators. A more significant circumstance than any of these was the refusal of the pope to appear at the church del Gesù, to celebrate the feast of St. Ignatius. This circumstance was generally regarded as an open rupture with the Jesuits. The latter, nevertheless, turned away public wrath from their order by the offering of money for the clothing of the national guard. Austria, meanwhile, was becoming day by day more aggressive as to Ferrara. But the Romans consoled themselves with believing that an English squadron would soon be anchored in the waters of Ancona, and force the Austrians to retreat. On the 1st of October, the motu proprio of the pope was published on the municipal organisation of Rome. It promised, undoubtedly, a great reform, for the paper was drawn up in a liberal spirit, and was generally approved of. No distinction was made between noble and citizen, as had always hitherto existed. Rome was henceforth to have a council composed of 100 members, of which 64 were to be proprietors, 32 savants, advocates, artists, bankers, merchants, and 4 representatives of the ecclesiastical body. The municipal magistrates, to be called the Senate of Rome, was to consist of a senator and eight conservators. It was now determined that each religious order should pay ten per cent. of its revenues for covering the expenses of the state. But notwithstanding all these measures, the principal employments were occupied by retrogradists, and in the absence of Ferretti they commenced attacks on the press. These and other circumstances induced Morandi, governor of Rome, to resign. He was replaced by a prelate, Savelli; and the charge of Preada di Roma et Comarea was conferred on a cardinal, Prince Alieri—two appointments which created dissatisfaction. On the 15th of March, 1848, little more than a fortnight after the fall of Louis Philippe, the constitution was proclaimed at Rome. This was a great step in advance, for one of the bases of it was a representative system, giving a member for 30,000 souls. On the 1st of May, the people of Rome were so excited by the events of Lombardy and the prolonged occupation of Ferrara, that they called on the pontiff to declare war against Austria. Pius temporised, and offered his mediation to the house of Austria, on the condition of completely abandoning Italy. But this did not satisfy the Romans; the pontiff was accused of duplicity, and emementes took place in the capital and towns. It is not here our purpose to give a history of the Mamiani ministry; of the dilapidation of the papal finances; of the pope's adhesion to the cause of Italian independence; of the efforts made by the Romanists to send a contingent to the common cause; or of the weakness, vacillation, if not culpable double-dealing, of Pius IX. To treat all these subjects in detail would far exceed our limits.

In September, Count Rossi, who had represented France at the papal court down to the 24th of February, 1848, accepted the task of forming a ministry. His first anxieties were about the taxes and the army. He sought to meet the wants of the treasury by convincing the pope it was time to obtain help from the clergy, and of the army by proposing Zucchi as minister of war. He procured aid for the treasury from the clergy, by a provision of the pope, that the cardinal-bishop should lay a tax of eighty bajocchi for every hundred crowns rated on all ecclesiastical property, and that the clergy itself, which had already granted a charge of 2,000,000 crowns in return for treasury bonds, should bind itself to make a gift of 2,000,000 more. A commission was also nominated for fiscal arrangement and the organisation of the army; the reform of the monetary system, and other useful measures were adopted. But several functionaries, magistrates, and administrators, whom Rossi admonished and constrained to activity, began to murmur, as did the clergy whom he had taxed.

On the 15th of November, the chambers were to meet, and Rossi, though warned from four different sources that there was a conspiracy against his life, proceeded to the palace of the Quirinal, where the sittings were held. Advancing to the peristyle, he found himself surrounded by a menacing group, one individual of which pushed roughly against him. Turning sharply round, as if to reprove the rudeness of his assailant, he received from another hand a poniard wound in the throat, which was at once pronounced mortal. No effort was made by the civic guard to arrest the assassin, and in the Chamber of Deputies, to which the news was hastily conveyed, no voice was raised to cover with execration the cowardly assassin. Nine days after the assassination, the pope fled from Rome to Gaeta, where an asylum had been provided for him by the king of Naples.

Every effort was made on the part of Mamiani and others to induce the pope to return: but in vain. In the meanwhile, the pope was deposed from his temporal authority, and a republic was proclaimed. A triumvirate, of which Mazzini was one, was established; and measures were at once taken to assemble a "constituent" parliament to decide on the great question of Italian unity. But this was not to be. Under pretext of maintaining their influence in central Italy, a French army laid siege to Rome, and after a long and heroic resistance, succeeded in making themselves masters of the city. This victory was followed by the restoration of the pope, who returned to Rome on April 12, 1850. Since that period the pope has had his capital garrisoned by French, and other portions of his dominions by Austrian troops; but he has reformed or remodelled nothing in the manner of a wise sovereign, a prudent statesman, or even an astute politician.

The question now arises, whether the temporal power of the popes can be perpetuated in its old and defective traditional system. And every one who knows anything of Italy will at once say that it cannot be so perpetuated. Another question is this,—whether it be possible to remove the crying oppressions and abuses of the old system, and to maintain an effective sovereignty in the papal chair. That the oppressions and abuses ought to be removed, at all hazards, there are few statesmen who will deny. But the price to be paid for their removal must unquestionably be the destruction of the temporal sovereignty of the papacy.

NAPLES.

Of the remote antiquity of this country there are but scanty documents. At a very early period most part of the coasts of Naples and Sicily were occupied by Greek colonists, the founders of some of the greatest and most flourishing cities of the ancient world. They received, from this circumstance, the name of Magna Græcia. But rapidly as the Greek republics of Italy rose to prosperity, it is certain that luxury and corruption kept equal pace with their prosperity; and in the time of Polybius, the very name of Magna Græcia was disused.

Continental Naples submitted to the Romans at an early period of the republic, subsequent to which it underwent many vicissitudes. In the fifth century it became a prey to the Goths. Belisarius, general of the emperor Justinian, took Naples in 537. Destined to pass from master to master, it was conquered by Totila in 543. The Lombards next got possession of it, and kept it until Charlemagne put an end to that kingdom. His successors divided it with the Greek emperors, and the latter soon after became its sole masters. In the ninth and tenth centuries, the Saracens possessed Naples, and after them, the Normans. Sicily also fell into the hands of the French in 1053.

The French formed Naples into a monarchy, of which Roger was its first king. Constance, last princess of the blood of Roger, and heiress of the two kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, was married, in 1156, to Henry, son of the emperor Barbarossa. This marriage was the source of great misfortunes. At length this family became extinct in 1265, when Pope Clement IV. gave the investiture of Naples and Sicily to Charles, count of Anjou. Charles was opposed by Conradin, nephew of Manfred, who had come from Germany to dispute with him the crown. Charles defeated him in battle, and having taken him prisoner, with Frederic of Austria, caused them both to be executed in the market-place of Naples in 1268. This execution made the king detested by his new subjects; and the French in Naples were equally obnoxious as in Sicily. A Frenchman had committed in Sicily an atrocious act of violence on a woman. On the morrow after Easter, 1282, the people assembled together, and murdered every Frenchman on the island, with the exception of one gentleman, a nasive of Provence. The innocent perished with the guilty, and the blood of Conrad was terribly avenged.

The descendants of Charles of Anjou possessed the crown until 1384, when Jane I. adopted by her will, Louis I., duke of Anjou, son of king John. At the same time Charles Duras, or Durazzo, a cousin of queen Jane, established himself upon the throne. This event occasioned a long war between the two princes, and even between their successors. The posterity of Charles Durazzo, however, maintained their situation, while that of the count of Anjou also bore the title of king of Naples.

Jane II., last sovereign of Naples, of the house of Durazzo, appointed, by her will, Rene of Anjou as her successor, which gave the Anjouan family a double right to the kingdom; but Rene never possessed it. Alfonso, king of Arragon, took possession of Naples, and the crown.

The kings of Arragon possessed Naples until the time of Charles VIII., when Louis XII. conquered the kingdom. The great general Gonsalvo of Cordova drove out the French army. Notwithstanding the treaty made between Louis XII. and Ferdinand, king of Spain, in favour of the former, the successors of Ferdinand enjoyed it until the death of Charles II., but not without frequent revolts on the part of the Neapolitans.

The revolt of 1647 was headed by a man of the name of Masaniello, a fisherman, who, during fifteen days, could reckon upwards of 100,000 men, over whom he held a most absolute sway. Henry, duke of Guise, a knight-errant of his day, taking the advantage of the troubles which rent Naples asunder, procured himself to be declared king, when, after he had been some months in Naples, he was made prisoner by the Spaniards; and his partizans not only disavowed him, but submitted to his conquerors.

After the death of Charles II., who had left Philip V. as the inheritor of his kingdom, the Neapolitans acknowledged him as their king. Ferdinand IV., the late king of Naples, joined the grand confederacy against France at an early period of the war. He afterwards made his peace; but again joining in the war, the French made themselves masters of Naples in January, 1799, and the royal family were compelled to fly from that portion of the Neapolitan dominions, and take refuge in Sicily. In February it was divided into eleven departments, and the government new-modelled on the French plan; but, within a few weeks, admiral Nelson appearing upon the coast, the French capitulated, the democratic system was overturned, the old monarchy and government restored, and the king welcomed back to his throne.

The kingdom of Naples was again, however, placed under French dominion by Buonaparte, and its crown conferred on his brother Joseph; the legitimate king having again fled to Sicily, where he was long supported by a British force under sir

John Stewart. In the spring of 1808 Buonaparte removed Joseph to Spain, and raised Murat to the tributary and usurped throne of Naples, where he remained without having been able to annex Sicily to his usurpation, until he was in turn hurled from the throne in 1815. Early in May of that year, the capital was surrendered to a British squadron; and, on the 17th of June, Ferdinand IV. re-entered it, amid loud and apparently sincere plaudits of the multitude.

During the time of Murat's reign considerable changes took place, the good effects of which every impartial person was ready to allow. All branches of the public administration were invigorated and improved; society in the upper ranks was reconstructed upon the Parisian scale; the French code superseded the cumbrous and vicious jurisprudence of ancient Naples; and the nation, notwithstanding its subordination to the imperial politics, and its participation in Napoleon's wars, appeared to be destined to take a higher rank than before in the scale of nations.

In July, 1821, a revolt, headed by general Pepe, broke out amongst the troops; and the universal cry was for a constitution, though no person seemed to know exactly what constitution to adopt, or how to frame a new one. At length it was determined to imitate that of the Spanish cortes, and the parliament was expressly summoned to modify and correct it. An episode to this revolutionary movement was about the same time exhibited in Sicily. No sooner had the citizens of Palermo heard what had been transacted at Naples, and that a parliament had been convoked there, than they determined to have a permanent constitution of their own. Of their taste for liberty, as well as of their fitness for it, they gave an immediate specimen, by letting loose from prison nearly a thousand atrocious malefactors. They assailed the houses of the Neapolitan officers, and threw the soldiers into dungeons. It was necessary, therefore, to send a large force from Naples to put down the rebellion; but when that force approached Palermo, a dreadful scene of slaughter and cruelty ensued in that unhappy city. All who refused to join this militia of criminals were shamefully murdered, then cut into pieces, and their quivering limbs exposed on pikes and bayonets. In the meanwhile the who led the Neapolitan troops permitted Palermo to surrender on terms of capitulation.

While at Naples they were thus amusing themselves at constitution-mongering, and in Sicily every species of horrid barbarity was practised, the allied powers took into their deliberation the changes which popular force had worked in the political system of the country; and the king of the Two Sicilies was invited to the congress. The result was, that the Austrians crossed the Po on the 28th of January, and marched to Naples. Bari was immediately taken by the Austrians, and the Neapolitan army fell back upon Aquila. The Austrians appeared in sight; General Pepe was almost instantly deserted by his troops, and obliged to escape as well as he could. This dispersion was followed by that of the troops at Mignano, who fired on their officers, and then disbanded. The Austrians entered Naples on the morning of the 29th; and thus ended the Neapolitan revolution.

But though the flame of insurrection both in Sicily and Naples was thus extinguished, the elements of combustion were not destroyed. Thousands of exiled Italians, with Mazzini at their head, continued in Marseilles, Geneva, and London, to disseminate their views, and from time to time inundated the Neapolitan territories, both insular and continental, with their revolutionary publications. But the election of Pius IX. to the papal chair in 1846, gave the first great impetus to political action. In 1847 Messina, Palermo, and Catania were the scene of popular commotions, which it required all the energy of the government to suppress. At length, in January, 1848, the great mass of the people in Palermo rose in insurrection, overcame the Neapolitan garrisons, and demanded a repeal of the union between Naples and Sicily. To all these demands the king acceded; but in the meanwhile, the French revolution of July 24th having broken out, had given a fresh impulse to the political movement; and the provisional government, which had been formed, declared King Ferdinand deposed, but offered the crown of Sicily to the Duke of Genoa, second son of the king of Sardinia, by whom, however, it was prudently declined.

Meanwhile, grave events had taken place at Naples. Simultaneously with the concessions made to the Sicilians, the king had promulgated a constitution for his continental dominions. On the 14th of May the first parliamentary sitting began; but some difficulties arose relating to the oath which the deputies were requested to take; and as neither the king nor the Chamber would give way, disturbances immediately began. On the morning of the 15th the streets were full of barricades; and, while negotiations were going on, the more eager and impetuous among the constitutional party, impatient of longer delay, began an attack on the military. A sanguinary contest now ensued between the national guards on one side and the troops and the populace on the other, which lasted for eight hours, and terminated in the complete defeat of the former. It is easy to imagine what scenes of horror ensued in a contest when the very drops of the population of Naples were fighting on the victorious side. At length, the French admiral Baudin, whose squadron lay in the Bay of Naples, interfered and threatened to land his forces unless the outrages ceased. Upon this the firing ceased; martial law was proclaimed: the national guard suppressed, and the Chamber of Deputies dissolved.

The King, being thus triumphant in Naples, soon afterwards equipped a large expedition for the reduction of Sicily. The first object of attack was Messina, which refused to surrender. On the 2nd of September a simultaneous attack was made upon it from the fire of the garrison, the Neapolitan fleet in the harbour, and a large force which had previously landed. The inhabitants fought with desperation; but the contest was too unequal; and after a bombardment of four days, during which a large portion of the city was laid in ruins, they were compelled to surrender. Here as at Naples, great atrocities marked the conduct both of the victors and the vanquished. Under the mediation of the English and French naval commanders an armistice was agreed to; but the war was virtually at an end. It would serve no purpose to detail the events that followed. They who wish to see how far unmitigated tyranny can go in avenging its imaginary wrongs, will find ample satisfaction in perusing Mr. Gladstone's unanswerable exposure of the Neapolitan government.

THE GOVERNMENT OF NAPLES IS AN HEREDITARY MONARCHY, AND THE REIGNING PRINCE BELONGS TO THE HOUSE OF BOURBON.

SICILY.

SICILY, the largest, most fertile, and best peopled island in the Mediterranean sea, now forming part of the kingdom of Naples, or the Two Sicilies, was inhabited by a people originally from Hispania, and called Sicanians. The Sicules, inhabitants of Latium, penetrated afterwards into this island, and drove the Sicanians from the south and west parts.

Several colonies of Greeks next transported themselves into Sicily, and the ancient inhabitants were obliged to retire into the interior of the country. The Greeks built several handsome cities, which are remaining to this day; but the most considerable was Syracuse, founded by the Etruscians. Archias of Corinth, a bold and enterprising man, entered Sicily with a colony of Dorians, and made himself master of Syracuse about 765 B. C. The fertility of the country, and the convenience of the port, induced him to enlarge the city considerably, and it soon became one of the first in Europe.

Agrigentum, the next city of Sicily after Syracuse, was equally exposed to revolution. Phalaris made himself master of it in the year 572 before Christ, and exercised there, during sixteen years, every species of cruelty. He was killed by Telemachus, the grandson of Theron, the liberator of his country, and afterwards its monarch.

The fugitives of Syracuse wishing once more to get possession of their city, in the year 491 implored succour from Gelon, king of Gela, a city of Sicily. Gelon conducted himself with so much prudence, that the Syracusians unanimously elected him to be their king. His first care was to reinstate agriculture; and he worked in the fields at the head of the labourers. He augmented Syracuse, fortified it, and became afterwards so powerful as to be master of all Sicily. The Carthaginians made several attempts upon this island, but were always repulsed by Gelon.

Gelon died in the year 476 a.c., leaving behind him the character of a great prince, and regretted by all ranks of Sicilians. He was succeeded by his brother Hieron, a man naturally morose and severe, but softened by Simonides, Pindar, and Xenophon, whom he encouraged, and always kept at his court. He died 466 a.c., and left the throne to his brother, Thrasylbus, who possessed all the vices of Hieron, without his good qualities. He was driven out for his tyranny; and Sicily was a short time free.

Dionysius rendered himself master of Sicily in 408 a.c., and reigned thirty-seven years. He was succeeded by Dionysius the tyrant, who reigned twenty-five years; being driven out by Timoleon, he took refuge in Corinth, where he set up a school. Agathocles brought the Sicilians under his yoke 317 a.c., and reigned twenty-six years. From his death, Sicily was a theatre of continual war between the Carthaginians and the Romans. Not the fortifications of Syracuse, nor the machines invented by Archimedes for its defence, were sufficient to prevent Marcellus from becoming master of it in the year 208 a.c.

Sicily passed under the Romans; but in the decline of rather towards the fall, of that empire, it came under the Vandals, and afterwards the kings of Italy. The Saracens were continual in their attacks upon it; and in the year 823 after Christ, the emperors of the East ceded it to Louis le Debonnaire, emperor of the West; from which time the Saracens occupied a part of it (A. D. 827), until driven out by the Normans in 1004.

Soon after the expulsion of the Saracens the feudal system was introduced; and in 1072, earl Roger, the Norman, also established a representative assembly, or parliament, in which the nobles and clergy had an overwhelming majority, and which subsisted, notwithstanding the many changes the island has undergone, down to our own times. The Normans kept possession of the island till the establishment of the Suabian dynasty, in 1194. In 1265 Charles of Anjou became master of Sicily; but the massacre planned by John of Procida, known by the name of the "Sicilian Vespers," (March 29, 1282), put an end to the sway of the Angevines. It soon after became a dependency of Spain, and was governed by Spanish viceroys. At the death of Charles II. of Spain, his spoils became an object of furious contention; and at the peace of Utrecht, in 1711, it was ceded to Victor Amadeus of Savoy, who not many years after was forced by the emperor Charles VI. to relinquish it for Sardinia. The Spaniards, however, not having been instrumental in effecting this disadvantageous exchange, made a sudden attempt to recover Sicily, in which they failed, through the vigilance of the English admiral Byng, who destroyed their fleet, and compelled them for that time to abandon the enterprise. In 1734 the Spanish court resumed their design with success. The infant Don Carlos drove the Germans out, and was crowned king of the Two Sicilies at Palermo. When he passed into Spain, to take possession of that crown, he transferred the Sicilian diadem to his son Ferdinand III. of Sicily and IV. of Naples.

In order that the thread of the narrative may not be broken, we have incorporated the subsequent history of Sicily with that of Naples, to which the reader is referred.

THE HISTORY OF SARDINIA.

SARDINIA is an insular and continental kingdom in the south of Europe. The continental part occupies the north-west portion of Italy, and is bounded by Switzerland on the north, the duchies of Milan and Parma on the east, the Mediterranean on the south, and France on the west. It stretches about 300 miles from north to south, and 130 from east to west. It consists at present of Piedmont, with the county of Nice; the duchy of Montferrat; part of the duchy of Milan, the territory of the late republic of Genoa; Savoy (not properly included in Italy); and the island of Sardinia, with the adjacent isles.

The nucleus of the monarchy was Savoy, which was governed as early as the tenth century by its own Counts, whose descendants acquired Nice in 1399, and Piedmont in 1418. The sovereigns of Savoy and Piedmont were long celebrated for their ability and the skill with which they preserved and extended their limited dominions, notwithstanding the difficulty of their position in the immediate vicinity of the great European powers. The territory was recognised as a separate kingdom by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, when Sicily was added to the Piedmontese dominions, though, in 1720, it was exchanged for the island of Sardinia, which it still retains. During the wars that sprang out of the first French revolution, the Piedmont territory was absorbed into the French republic. At the peace of 1815 the kingdom of Sardinia was restored; and Genoa and Monaco were annexed to the Sardinian crown. On their restoration to the throne of their ancestors, the princes of Savoy, it was found, had taken no hint from misfortune, and exhibited no consciousness of the altered state of affairs. They brought back with them from exile all the old system in its effete mechanism. The people were anxious for a trial of their strength and speed in the race of nations. But it was something more than the new social life common to all Europe that was developing itself in Piedmont. The fever of Italian nationality, which ran throughout the veins of unhappy Italy, throbbed especially here, at the heart and temples. The comparative youth and freshness, the wealth and prosperity of the country, gave Piedmont an earnestness and steadiness of endeavour which might be looked for in vain amidst the more weary and worn-out communities of the eastern and southern part of the Peninsula.

Unable to stem this mighty tide of advancement, the princes of Savoy strove, but unsuccessfully, to turn it into different channels. So far as their priests would let them, they were not averse to reform; and something like important internal progress was indeed observable in the old institutions of the country; but there was that in its relations to foreign potentates which too plainly pointed to revolution. All other difficulties might be smoothed down, all other differences adjourned; but the national question enlisted the Piedmontese in the ranks of Italian conspiracy, and, as a necessary consequence, threw the princes of Savoy into the arms of Austria. The Piedmontese attempted a partial constitutional outbreak in 1820. The event was such as they had anticipated; and the result immeasurably greater than the mere event portended. It was clearly proved that Sardinia had ceased to be a free agent. The princes gave way before the storm, only to come back in the wake of Austrian bayonets. It was felt that they could not have rendered a more efficient service to the country. All local or partial disaffection subsided in one national yearning. Piedmont was identified with Italy; it would no longer stand or even triumph alone. The contest was now between Piedmont and Austria, and the people bade their rulers choose between them and their foes.

The choice was matter of long hesitation and perplexity; for on the one hand Austria offered, unquestionably, the most immediate chances of safety; and it was not to be expected of the Court of Turin that it should at once rid itself of its priests, who unceasingly represented the cause of the foreigner as that of heaven and its own; and on the other hand those princes could not free themselves from some compunctious qualms; for something of the old generous spirit, and of the far-reaching ambition of the founders of the House, still lingered at the heart of their successors, and the foreign yoke was perhaps as galling to themselves as to the best of their subjects: they felt that — would they only run a great risk — a great prize was possibly within their reach. But the kings of Sardinia hesitated and temporised, until in 1848 the sudden insurrection in Milan against the Austrian government gave a final blow to the warring system, and Charles Albert was forced, by the clamours of his subjects, not only to send an army to the assistance of the insurgents, but himself to take the field, with what melancholy results both to his country and himself has been recorded in the History of Italy, p. 1709-10.

The sentiments of the Piedmontese had long been in advance of their institutions. Hence, when the revolutionary storm burst over Europe in 1848, a constitution modelled on that of Belgium was inaugurated amid the acclamations of the people, and has since operated with a regularity and vigour which augur well for the cause of constitutional government beyond the Alps. But it would be vain to deny that Sardinia has three powerful enemies to contend with in France, Austria, and Rome; each of the former with large forces concentrated on her defenceless frontiers; while the last has advanced posts in the very heart of the country. But so long as government and people remain true to their cause, Sardinia will hold up against all the machinations which France, Austria, or Rome may devise against her rights and liberties.

THE ISLAND OF SARDINIA

Is divided from Corsica by the Strait of Bonifacio. The Greeks called it Irminia Sandathotis, and Sardo. While it was in the possession of the Romans, it was a place of banishment; and afterwards the Saracens possessed it nearly four centuries. Their expulsion could not be effected by the Pisanes, on whom Pope Innocent III. had assumed the prerogative of bestowing it in 1232. The emperor Frederick paid so little regard to this grant, that he again requited it with the empire; but the Pisanes taking advantage of the long interregnum, got possession of it in 1257. A difference afterwards arising between them and the see of Rome, the pope again bestowed the island, in 1296, on James II. of Arragon, whose son, Alphonso IV., made himself master of it in 1324. From this time it continued under the crown of Spain, governed by a viceroy until 1708, when the English making a conquest of it for king Charles III., afterwards emperor, by the title of Charles VI., it was confirmed to him by the treaty of Utrecht. In 1717, it was recovered by the Spaniards; and in 1718, the emperor exchanged it for Sicily with the duke of Savoy, who was put in actual possession of it in 1720, and took the title of king of Sardinia.

"The inhabitants of Sardinia," says Mr. Salt, "(I speak of the common people,) are yet scarcely above the negative point of civilisation; perhaps it would be more correct to say that they appear to have sunk a certain way back into barbarism. They wear, indeed, linen shirts, fastened at the collar by a pair of silver buttons, like hawk-bills; but their upper dress of shaggy goatskins is in the pure savage style. A few have gone one step nearer to perfectibility, and actually do wear tanned leather coats, made somewhat in the fashion of the armour worn in Europe in the 16th century. With such durable habiliments it is easy to conceive that they do not require much assistance from the manufactures of foreign countries." Another writer, whom we have frequently quoted in this work, says, "Notwithstanding her extent, the richness of her soil, her position in the centre of the Mediterranean, and her convenient harbour, Sardinia has been strangely neglected, not only by her own governments, but by the European powers generally; and has remained, down to our own times, in a semi-barbarous state. A long series of wars and revolutions followed by the establishment of the feudal system in its most vexatious and oppressive form; the fact of her having been for a lengthened period a dependency of Spain, and, if that were possible, worse governed than even the dominant country; the division of the island into immense estates, most of which were acquired by Spanish grandees; the want of leases, and the restrictions on industry, have paralysed the industry of the inhabitants, and sunk them to the lowest point in the scale of civilisation. Since 1750, however, improvements of various kinds have been slowly, but gradually gaining ground; and, within the last few years, several important and substantial reforms have been introduced, that will, it is to be hoped, conspire to raise this lone island from the abyss into which it has been cast by bad laws and bad government.

GENOA.

A history of the various revolutions of Genoa would be a record of continual turbulence, but still interesting. Our limits, however, prevent us from attempting even a synopsis of them. In the time of the second Punic war, it was a considerable city under the dominion of Rome. Mago, a Carthaginian general, in the course of this war, attacked, took, and destroyed it. The senate thereupon sent the pro-consul Scipio, who in less than two years raised it to its former splendour. It remained under the Romans until it submitted to the Goths. The Lombards next possessed and almost ruined it. Charlemagne annexed it to the French empire. Pepin, his son, gave the city of Genoa, and its dependencies, to a French lord of the name of Adenar, under the title of count. His descendants reigned until the end of the eleventh century, when the Genoese revolted against their count, set themselves at liberty, and chose magistrates from among the nobles. In the next century the city was taken by the Saracens, who put all the men to the sword and sent the women and children as slaves into Africa.

When again re-established, the inhabitants, availing themselves of their fine situation, turned their attention to commerce, enriched themselves, became powerful in proportion to their riches, and erected their country into a republic. Their enthusiasm for liberty rendered this republic capable of great things. In it were joined the opulence of commerce with the superiority of arms. The jealousy and ambition of the citizens at length caused great troubles; the emperors, the kings of Naples, the Visconti, the Sforzas, and France, successively called in by the different parties, divided the republic.

In 1517, the principal Genoese, fearful of once more becoming the victims of intestine war, chose as their first magistrate a stranger. In 1539, the state appeared in a somewhat more regular form, and had acquired tranquillity. Simon Bocanegra, a man of an illustrious family, was elected duke, or doge, with a council composed of the chiefs of the principal families. In 1596 the Genoese put themselves under the protection of Charles VI., king of France, whom they acknowledged as their sovereign. In 1693, they massacred the French, and gave their government to the Marquis of Montfer-

rat. In 1450, Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, was acknowledged sovereign protector of the republic of Genoa; but his administration tending to despotism, they set themselves at liberty. It was at this time that they offered the sovereignty of their city to Louis XI. Louis, well acquainted with the disposition of the Genoese, unfit either to command or obey, made this answer to their solicitations: "If the Genoese give themselves to me, I will give them all to the devil."

In 1528, Andrew Doria had the happiness and address to unite and conciliate this refractory people, and established an aristocratic government. This form continued until the French republicans made their rapid conquests in Italy. Genoa was the scene of many hard-fought battles. At length, in 1797, a new republic was raised, under the name of the Ligurian republic; but which, like the rest of the modern French creations, was dissolved at the downfall of Napoleon, in 1815, and transformed to a dependant province of Sardinia.

THE HISTORY OF GREECE.

CHAPTER I.

THIS deservedly celebrated country of antiquity—the seat of science, literature, and the fine arts, at a period when the greater part of the European continent was involved in the obscurity of barbaric ignorance—in its most palmy state comprised the southern portion of the great eastern peninsula of Europe, and extended to about 42° of north latitude, including Thessaly and a part of modern Albania, with the Ionian islands, Crete, and the islands of the Archipelago. Modern Greece, although not so considerable in extent as the far-famed Greece of ancient date, comprises the territories of all the most celebrated and interesting of the Grecian states.

By all the accounts which have been handed down, the earliest inhabitants of Greece were barbarous in the extreme. They lived on those fruits of the earth which grew spontaneously; their shelter was in dens or caves, and the country was one wild uncultivated desert. By slow degrees they advanced towards civilization, forming themselves into regular societies to cultivate the lands, and build towns and cities. But their original barbarity and mutual violence prevented them from uniting as one nation, or even into any considerable community; and hence the great number of states into which Greece was originally divided.

The history of Greece is divided into three principal periods—the periods of its rise, its power, and its fall. The first extends from the origin of the people, about 1800 years a.c., to Lyncæus, 875 years a.c.; the second extends from that time to the conquest of Greece by the Romans, 146 a.c.; the third shows us the Greeks as a conquered people, constantly on the decline, until at length, about A.D. 300, the old Grecian states were swallowed up in the Byzantine empire. According to tradition, the Pelasgi, under Inachus, were the first people who wandered into Greece. They dwelt in caves in the earth, supporting themselves on wild fruits, and eating the flesh of their conquered enemies, until Phoroneus, who is called king of Argos, began to introduce civilization among them.

Some barbarous tribes received names from the three brothers, Achæus, Pelasgus, and Pythius, who led colonies from Arcadia into Thessaly, and also from Thessalus and Græcus (the sons of Pelasgus) and others. Deucalion's flood, 1514 a.c., and the emigration of a new people from Asia, the Hellenes, produced great changes. The Hellenes spread themselves over Greece, and drove out the Pelasgi, or mingled with them. Their name became the general name of the Greeks. Greece now raised itself from its savage state, and improved still more rapidly after the arrival of some Phœnician and Egyptian colonies. About sixty years after the flood of Deucalion, Cadmus the Phœnician settled in Thebes, and introduced a knowledge of the alphabet. Ceres from Sicily, and Triptolemus, from Eleusis taught the nation agriculture, and Bacchus planted the vine.

Now began the heroic age, to which Hercules, Jason, Pirithous, and Theseus belong, and that of the old bards and sages, as Tamyris, Amphion, Orpheus, Linus, Musæus, Chiron, and many others. A warlike spirit filled the whole nation, so that every quarrel called all the heroes of Greece to arms; as, for instance, the war against Thebes, and the Trojan war, 1200 a.c., which latter forms one of the principal epochs in the history of Greece. This war deprived many kingdoms of their princes, and produced a general confusion, of which the Heraclidæ took advantage, eighty years after the destruction of Troy, to possess themselves of the Peloponnesus. They drove out the Ionians and Achæans, who took refuge in Attica. But, not finding here sufficient room, Neleus (1044) led an Ionian colony to Asia Minor, where a colony of Æolians, from the Peloponnesus, had already settled, and was followed, eighty years after, by a colony of Dorians.

In other states republics were founded, viz., in Phocis, in Thebes, and in the Asiatic colonies, and at length also in Athens and many other places; so that, for the next 400 years, all the southern part of Greece was, for the most part, occupied by republics. Their prosperity and the fineness of the climate, in the meantime, made the Asiatic colonies the mother of the arts and of learning. They gave birth to the songs of Homer and Hesiod. There commerce, navigation, and law, flourished. Greece, however, still retained its ancient simplicity of manners, and was unacquainted with luxury. If the population of any state became too numerous, colonies were sent out; for example, in the seventh and eighth centuries, the powerful colonies of Rhegium, Syracuse, Sybaris, Crotona, Tarentum, Gela, Locris, and Messina were planted in Sicily and the southern parts of Italy. The small independent states of Greece needed a common bond of union. This bond was found in the temple of Delphi, the Amphictyonic council, and the solemn games, among which the Olympic were the most distinguished, the institution, or rather revival of which, 776 B.C. furnishes the Greeks with a chronological era. From this time, Athens and Sparta began to surpass the other states of Greece in power and importance.

At the time of the Persian war, Greece had already made important advances in civilization. Besides the art of poetry, we find that philosophy began to be cultivated 600 B.C., and even earlier in Ionia and Lower Italy than in Greece Proper. Statuary and painting were in a flourishing condition. The important colonies of Massilia (Marseilles) in Gaul, and Agrigentum, in Sicily, were founded. Athens was continually extending her commerce, and established important commercial posts in Thrace. In Asia Minor, the Grecian colonies were brought under the dominion of the Lydian Croesus, and soon after under that of Cyrus. Greece itself was threatened with a similar fate by the Persian kings, Darius and Xerxes. Then the heroic spirit of the free Greeks showed itself in its greatest brilliancy. Athens and Sparta almost alone withstood the vast armies of the Persian; and the battles of Marathon, Thermopylae, and Plataea, as well as the sea fights at Artemisium, Salamis, and Mycale, taught the Persians that the Greeks were not to be subdued by them. Athens now exceeded all the other states in splendour and in power. The supremacy which Sparta had hitherto maintained, devolved on this city, whose commander, Cimon, compelled the Persians to acknowledge the independence of Asia Minor. Athens was also the centre of the arts and sciences. The Peloponnesian war now broke out, Sparta being no longer able to endure the overbearing pride of Athens. This war devastated Greece, and enslaved Athens, until Thrasybulus again restored its freedom; and, for a short time, Sparta was compelled, in her turn, to bend before the Theban heroes, Epaminondas and Pelopidas. In spite of these disturbances, poets, philosophers, artists, and statesmen, continued to arise, commerce flourished, and manners and customs were carried to the highest degree of refinement. But that unhappy period had now arrived, when the Greeks, ceasing to be free, ceased to advance in civilization.

A kingdom, formed by conquest, had grown up on the north of Greece, the ruler of which, Philip, united courage with cunning. The dissensions which prevailed among the different states, afforded him an opportunity to execute his ambitious plans, and the battle of Chæronæa, 338 B.C., gave Macedonia the command of all Greece. In vain did the subjugated states hope to become free after his death. The destruction of Thebes was sufficient to subject all Greece to the young Alexander. This prince, as generalissimo of the Greeks, gained the most splendid victories over the Persians. An attempt to liberate Greece, occasioned by a false report of his death, was frustrated by Antipater. The Lamiæan war, after the death of Alexander, was equally unsuccessful. Greece was now little better than a Macedonian province. Luxury had enervated the ancient courage and energy of the nation. At length, most of the states of southern Greece, Sparta and Ætolia excepted, concluded the Achæan league, for the maintenance of their freedom against the Macedonians. A dispute having arisen between this league and Sparta, the latter applied to Macedonia for help, and was victorious. But this friendship was soon fatal, for it involved Greece in the contest between Philip and the Romans, who, at first, indeed, restored freedom to the Grecian states, while they changed Ætolia, and soon after Macedonia, into Roman provinces; but they afterwards began to excite dissensions in the Achæan league, interfered in the quarrels of the Greeks, and finally compelled them to take up arms to maintain their freedom. So unequal a contest could not long remain undecided; the capture of Corinth, 146 B.C., placed the Greeks in the power of the Romans.

During the whole period which elapsed between the battle of Chæronæa and the destruction of Corinth by the Romans, the arts and sciences flourished among the Greeks; indeed, the golden age of the arts was in the time of Alexander. The Grecian colonies were yet in a more flourishing condition than the mother country; especially Alexandria, in Egypt, which became the seat of learning. As they, also, in process of time, fell under the dominion of the Romans, they became, like their mother country, the instructors of their conquerors.

In the time of Augustus, the Greeks lost even the shadow of their former freedom, and ceased to be an independent people, although their language, manners, customs, learning, arts, and taste spread over the whole Roman empire. The character of the nation was now sunk so low, that the Romans esteemed a Greek as the most worthless of creatures. Asiatic luxury had wholly corrupted them; their ancient love of freedom and independence was extinguished; and a mean servility was substituted in its place. At the beginning of the fourth century, the nation scarcely showed a trace of the noble characteristics of their fathers. The barbarians soon after began their ruinous incursions into Greece.

The principal traits in the character of the ancient Greeks, were simplicity and grandeur. The Greek was his own instructor, and if he learned any thing from others, he did it with freedom and independence. Nature was his great model, and in his native land she displayed herself in all her charms. The uncivilized Greek was manly and proud, active and enterprising, violent both in his hate and in his love. He esteemed and exercised hospitality towards strangers and countrymen. These features of the Grecian character had an important influence on the religion, politics, manners, and philosophy of the nation. The gods of Greece were not, like those of Asia, surrounded by a holy obscurity; they were human in their faults and virtues, but were placed far above mortals. They kept up an intercourse with men; good and evil came from their hands; all physical and moral endowments were their gift. The moral system of the earliest Greeks taught them to honour the gods by an exact observance of customs; to hold the rights of hospitality sacred, and even to spare murderers, if they fled to the sanctuaries of the gods for refuge. Cunning and revenge were allowed to be practised against enemies. No law enforced continence. The power of the father, of the husband, or the brother, alone guarded the honour of the female sex, who therefore lived in continual dependence. The loss of virtue was severely punished, but the seducer brought his gifts and offerings to the gods, as if his conduct had been guiltless. The security of domestic life rested entirely on the master of the family.

From these characteristic traits of the earliest Greeks, originated, in the sequel, the peculiarities of their religious notions, their love of freedom and action, their taste for the beautiful and the grand, and the simplicity of their manners. The religion of the Greeks was not so much mingled with superstition as that of the Romans; thus, for example, they were unacquainted with the practice of augury. The Greek was inclined to festivity even in religion, and served the gods less in spirit than in outward ceremonies. His religion had little influence on his morals, his belief, and the government of his thoughts. All it required was a belief in the gods, and in a future existence; a freedom from gross crimes, and an observance of prescribed rites. The simplicity of their manners, and some obscure notions of a supreme God, who hated and punished evil, loved and rewarded good, served, at first, to maintain good morals and piety among them. These notions were afterwards exalted and systematized by poetry and philosophy; and the improvement spread from the cultivated classes through the great mass of the people.

In the most enlightened period of Greece, clearer ideas of the unity of the deity, of his omniscience, his omnipresence, his holiness, his goodness, his justice, and of the necessity of worshipping him by virtue and purity of heart, prevailed. The moral system of some individuals among the Greeks was equally pure.

The precepts of morality were delivered at first in sententious maxims; for example, the sayings of the seven wise men. Afterwards, Socrates and his disciples arose, and promulgated their pure doctrines. The love of freedom among the Greeks sprang from their good fortune, in having lived so long without oppression or fear of other nations, and from their natural vivacity of spirit. It was this which made small armies invincible, and which caused Lycurgus, Solon, and Timoleon to refuse crowns. Their freedom was the work of nature, and the consequence of their original patriarchal mode of life. Their first kings were considered as fathers of families, to whom obedience was willingly paid, in return for protection and favours. Important affairs were decided by the assemblies of the people. Each man was master in his own house, and in early times no taxes were paid. But as the kings strove continually to extend their powers, they were ultimately compelled to resign their dignities; and various states arose, with forms of government inclining more or less to aristocracy, or democracy, or composed of a union of the two; the citizens were attached to a government which was administered under the direction of wise laws, and not of arbitrary power. It was this noble love of a free country, which prompted Leonidas to say to the king of Persia, that he would rather die than hold a despotic sway over Greece. It was this which inspired Solon, Themistocles, Demosthenes, and Phocion, when, in spite of the ingratitude of their countrymen, they chose to serve the state and the laws, rather than their own interests. The cultivation of their fruitful country, which, by the industry of the inhabitants, afforded nourishment to several millions, and the wealth of their colonies, prove the activity of the Greeks. Commerce, navigation, and manufactures flourished on all sides; knowledge of every sort was accumulated; the spirit of invention was busily at work; the Greeks learned to estimate the pleasures of society, but they also learned to love luxury. From these sources of activity sprang also a love of great actions and great enterprises, so many instances of which are furnished by Grecian history. Another striking trait of the Grecian character, was a love of the beautiful, both physical and intellectual. This sense of the beautiful, awakened and developed by nature, created for itself an ideal of beauty, which served them, and has been transmitted to us, as a criterion for every work of art.

CHAPTER II.

We have seen to what a state of degradation the Greeks were reduced in a few centuries after their subjugation by the Romans. Thus it continued as long as it was either really or nominally a portion of the Roman empire; till at length, like the imperial mistress of the world herself, it bent before the all-subduing Alaric the Goth, A.D. 400; and shared in all the miseries which were brought by the northern barbarians who successively overran and ravaged the south of Europe. After the Latin conquest of Constantinople, in 1204, Greece was divided into feudal principalities, and governed by a variety of Norman, Venetian, and Frankish nobles; but in 1261, with the exception of Athens and Nauplia, it was re-united to the Greek empire by Michael Paleologus. But it not long remained unmolested; for the Turks, then rising into notice, aimed at obtaining power in Europe; and Ambrath II. deprived the Greeks of all their cities and castles on the Euxine sea, and along the coasts of Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly; carrying his victorious arms, in short, into the midst of the Peloponnesus. The Grecian emperors acknowledged him as their superior lord, and he, in turn, afforded them protection. This conquest, however, was not effected without a brave resistance, particularly from two heroic Christians, John Hunniades, a celebrated Hungarian general, and George Castriot, an Albanian prince, better known in history by the name of Scanderberg.

When Mohammed II., in 1451, ascended the Ottoman throne, the fate of the Greek empire seemed to be decided. At the head of an army of 300,000 men, supported by a fleet of 300 sail, he laid siege to Constantinople, and encouraged his troops by spreading reports of prophecies and prodigies that portended the triumph of Islamism. Constantine, the last of the Greek emperors, met the storm with becoming resolution, and maintained the city for fifty-three days, though the fanaticism and fury of the besiegers were raised to the highest pitch. At length (May 29, 1453) the Turks stormed the walls, and this brave Constantine perished at the head of his faithful troops. The final conquest of Greece did not, however, take place till 1481. Neither were the conquerors long left in undisturbed possession of their newly-acquired territory; and during the 16th and 17th centuries Greece was the scene of obstinate wars, till the treaty of Passarowitz, in 1718, confirmed the Turks in their conquest; and for a century from that time the inhabitants of Greece groaned under their despotic sway.

"Yet are her skies as blue, her crags as wild,
Sweet are her groves and verdant are her fields,
Her olives ripe as when Minerva smiled,
And still his honied wealth Hymettus yields;
There the blythe bee his fragrant fortress builds,
The free-born wanderer of her mountain air;
Apollo still her long, long summer gilds,
Still in his beam Mendel's marbles glare:
Art, glory, freedom fail, but nature still is fair."

At the time of the expedition of the French into Egypt, the Greeks, strongly excited by the events of the war, which was thus approaching them, waited for them as liberators, with the firm resolution of going to meet them and conquering their liberty; but again their hopes were disappointed, and the succours they expected from France were removed to a distance. Having waited in vain, in the midst of the great events which in several respects have changed the whole face of Europe in this century, the Greeks, taking counsel only of their despair, and indignant at living always as helots on the ruins of Sparta and of Athens, when nations but of yesterday were recovering their rights and recognising their social relations, rose against their despotic and cruel masters, perhaps with greater boldness than prudence.

The first decided movement took place in the year 1800, when the Servians, provoked by the cruelty of their oppressors the Turks, made a general insurrection, which was headed by their famous chief Czerni George, who had been a serjeant in the Austrian service, and afterwards became a bandit chief. He was possessed of much energy of character and bravery; and under him the Servians obtained several victories. He blockaded Belgrade; and, one of the gates being surrendered to him, he made his entry into the city and slaughtered all the Turks that were found in it.

At this time the affairs of the Porte were in great disorder. It had but just terminated its war with France; and the efforts by which it had been endeavouring to reduce Paswan Oglou, pacha of Vidin, had failed and ended in disgrace. At home the Janissaries were ever dissatisfied, and Roumelia was in a disturbed state. The divan, however, exerted themselves to quell the Servians, and they were aided by the Bosnians, in consequence of which many sanguinary combats took place. But relying on the promises of Russia, and receiving pecuniary succour from Ypsilanti, the insurgents continued the contest, issuing from their fastnesses on every favourable opportunity, and marking their progress through the surrounding country, by spreading devastation in every direction.

In the meantime Russia openly declared war against the Porte in 1807, and carried on the war until 1812, when the treaty of Bucharest was negotiated; and though some efforts were made to obtain a concession in favour of their Servian allies, yet one difficulty after another being started by the Porte, a peace was at length concluded, as before, upon such terms as left the insurgents to their fate. At length it was agreed, that Miloosh, brother-in-law to Czerni George, a native, should be their prince; that the sum of 100,000*l.* should be paid yearly to the Turks, whose garrisons in the fortresses of the Danube were to be limited, and that the prince should maintain a few national forces, for the regulation of the internal policy.

The period that intervened between 1815 and 1820 was apparently tranquil: the Ottoman affairs seemed prosperous; the sultan Mahmoud, by his vigorous measures, maintained peace with his neighbours, quelled the spirit of the mutinous Janissaries, suppressed several revolts in the eastern part of the empire, drove the Wechabites from Mecca, and gave more weight to the imperial firmans than they had heretofore possessed. But under this appearance of tranquillity, all those projects were forming which produced what we term "the Greek revolution." The Greeks soon became more open in their plots against their oppressors, and entertained some considerable hopes from the probable arrangements of the congress of Vienna; but that congress closed without effecting any result favourable to the liberties of Greece. This, however, did not damp the ardour of its friends, nor induce them to abandon the plans they had projected. At length, in 1820, symptoms of a general rising appeared; and all civilised nations seemed disposed to aid the cause of the oppressed. But that generous feeling in a great measure subsided, as the petty dissensions of party, or the despotic notions of arbitrary power, severally displayed themselves.

The Turks and Greeks never became one nation; the relation of conquerors and conquered never ceased. However subject a large part of the Greeks became by their continued oppression, they never forgot that they were a distinct nation; and their patriarch at Constantinople remained a visible point of union for their national feelings.

On the 7th of March, 1821, a proclamation of Ypsilanti was placarded in Jassy, under the eyes of the hospodar, Michael Suazo, which declared, that all the Greeks had on that day thrown off the Turkish yoke; that he would put himself at their head, with his countrymen; that prince Suazo wished the happiness of the Greeks; and that nothing was to be feared, as a great power was going to march against Turkey. Several officers and members of the Hetairie had accompanied Ypsilanti from Bessarabia and Jassy. Some Turks were murdered, but Ypsilanti did all in his power to prevent excesses, and was generally successful. He wrote to the emperor of Russia, Alexander, who was then at Laybach, asking his protection for the Greek cause, and the two principalities, Wallachia and Moldavia; but the revolutions in Spain and Piedmont had just then broke out, and that monarch considered the Greek insurrection to be nothing but a political fever, caught from Spain and Italy, which could not be checked too soon; besides, Ypsilanti was actually in the service of Russia, and therefore had undertaken this step against the rules of military discipline. Alexander publicly disavowed the measure; Ypsilanti's name was struck from the army rolls, and he was declared to be no longer a subject of Russia. The Russian minister, and the Austrian Intermuncio at Constantinople, also declared that their cabinets would not take advantage of the internal troubles of Turkey in any shape whatever, but would remain strictly neutral. Yet the Porte continued suspicious, particularly after the information of an Englishman had led to the detection of some supposed traces of the Greek conspiracy at Constantinople. It therefore ordered the Russian vessels to be searched, contrary to treaty. The commerce of Odessa suffered from this measure, which occasioned a serious correspondence between baron Stroganoff, the Russian ambassador, and the reis effendi. The most vigorous measures were taken against all Greeks: their schools were suppressed; their arms seized; suspicion was a sentence of death; the flight of some rendered all guilty, and it was prohibited under penalty of death; in the divan, the total extinction of the Greek name was proposed; Turkish troops marched into the principalities; the hospodar Suazo was outlawed; the patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem excommunicated all insurgents (March 21); and a hatti-sherif of March 31, called upon all Mussulmans to arm against the rebels for the protection of the Islama. No Greek was, for some time, safe in the streets of Constantinople; women and children were thrown into the sea; the noblest females openly violated, and murdered or sold; the populace broke into the house of Fonton, the Russian counsellor of legation; and prince Murusi was beheaded in the seraglio. After the arrival of the new grand-vizier, Benderli Ali Pacha, who conducted a disorderly army from Asia to the Bosphorus, the wildest fanaticism raged in Constantinople. In Wallachia and Moldavia the bloody struggle was brought to a close through the treachery, discord, and cowardice of the pandours and Arnauts, with the annihilation of the valiant "sacred band" of the Hetairie, in the battle of Dragashan (June 19, 1821), and with Jordaki's heroic death in the monastery of Seck.

In Greece Proper, no cruelty could quench the fire of liberty; the boys of the Morea invited all bishops and the noblest Greeks to Tripolizza, under pretence of consulting with them on the deliverance of the people from their cruel oppression. Several fell into the snare; when they arrived, they were thrown into prison. Germanos, archbishop of Patras, alone penetrated the intended treachery, and took measures with the others for frustrating the designs of their oppressors. The boys of the Morea then endeavoured to disarm the separate tribes; but it was too late; the Mainotes, always free, descended from mount Taygetos, in obedience to Ypsilanti's proclamation; and the heart of all Greece beat for liberty.

The revolution in the Morea began, March 23, 1821, at Calavritia, a small place in Achaia, where eighty Turks were made prisoners. On the same day, the Turkish garrison of Patras fell upon the Greek inhabitants; but they were soon relieved. In the ancient Laconia, Colocotroni and Peter Mavromichalis roused the people to arms. The archbishop Germanos collected the peasants of Achaia. In Patras and the other places, the Turks retreated into the fortresses. As early as April 6, a Messenian senate assembled in Calamata, and the bey of Maina, Peter Mavromichalis, as commander-in-chief, proclaimed that the Morea had shaken off the yoke of Turkey to save the Christian faith, and to restore the ancient character of their country. "From Europe, nothing is wanted but money, arms, and counsels." From that time, the suffering Greeks found friends in Germany, France, Switzerland, Britain, and the United States, who sympathized with them, and did all in their power to assist them in their struggle. The cabinets of Europe, on the contrary, threw every impediment in the way of the Hellenists, until they were finally obliged, against their inclination, to interfere in their favour.

Jussuf Selim, pacha of Lepanto, having received information of these events from the diplomatic agent of a European power, hastened to relieve the citadel of Patras, and the town was changed into a heap of ruins. The massacre of the inhabitants, April 15, was the signal for a struggle of life and death. Almost the whole war was thenceforward a succession of atrocities. It was not a war prosecuted on any fixed plan, but merely a series of devastations and murders. The law of nations could not exist between the Turks and Greeks, as they were then situated. The monk Gregoras, soon after, occupied Corinth, at the head of a body of Greeks. The revolution spread over Attica, Boeotia, Phocia, Etolia, and Acarnania. The ancient names were revived. At the same time, the islanders declared themselves free.

In some islands, the Turks were massacred in revenge for the murder of the Greeks at Patras; and, in retaliation, the Greeks were put to death at Smyrna, in Asia Minor, and in those islands which had not yet shaken off the Turkish yoke. The exasperation was raised to its highest pitch by the cruelties committed against the Greeks in Constantinople after the end of March. On mere suspicion, and often merely to get possession of their property, the divan caused the richest Greek merchants and bankers to be put to death. The rage of the Mussulmans was particularly directed against the Greek clergy. The patriarch of Constantinople was murdered, with his bishops, in the metropolis. In Adrianople, the venerable patriarch Cyrillus, who had retired to solitude, and Proëos, archbishop of Adrianople, and others, met the same fate. Several hundred Greek churches were torn down, without the divan paying any attention to the remonstrances of the Christian ambassadors. The savage grand-vizier, indeed, lost his place, and soon after his life; but Mahmoud and his favourite, Halet effendi, persisted in the plan of extermination.

The commerce of Russia, on the Black Sea, was totally ruined by the blockade of the Bosphorus, and the ultimatum of the ambassador was not answered. Baron Stroganoff, therefore, broke off all diplomatic relations with the reis effendi, July 18, and on the 31st, embarked for Odessa. He had declared to the divan, that if the Porte did not change its system, Russia would feel herself obliged to give "the Greeks refuge, protection, and assistance." The answer of the reis effendi to this declaration, given too late, was sent to Petersburg; but it was only after the most atrocious excesses committed by the janissaries, and the troops from Asia, that the foreign ministers, particularly the British minister, lord Strangford, succeeded in inducing the grand-seignior to recall the command for the arming of all Mussulmans, and to restore order.

CHAPTER III.

ALL eyes were fixed on Tripolizza, which was now in a state of close blockade, and its fall daily expected. The usual population was about 15,000 souls; it is also computed, that the garrison, with all the Albanians of the Kiayah, amounted to 8000 men; there could not, therefore, have been fewer than 20,000 persons within the walls; yet they allowed themselves to be blockaded by 5000 undisciplined and ill-armed Greeks, without artillery or cavalry. While the Turkish horse were in a state for service, the Greeks did not attempt anything in the plain; but their forage soon failed, and the only food they could get was vine leaves. Provisions were become very scarce, and the Greeks had cut the pipes, and thus intercepted the supply of water. Ypsilanti, however, was impatient, and felt anxious to begin a regular siege; but he had neither proper ordnance nor engineers. Some cannon and mortars had indeed been brought from Malvasia and Navarin, and were entrusted to the care of an Italian adventurer, but in the first essay he burst a mortar, and was dismissed. Things were in this state, when prince Mavrocordato arrived, bringing with him some French and Italian officers.

In the beginning of October the Turks began to make propositions for a capitulation, and the treaty was proceeding, on the 5th, when an accidental circumstance rendered it of no avail, and hastened the catastrophe. Some Greek soldiers, having approached one of the gates, began to converse, and, as usual, to barter fruit with the sentinels. The Turks imprudently assisted them in mounting the wall, but no sooner had they gained the top when they threw down the infidels, opened the gate, and displayed the standard of the cross above it; the Christians instantly rushed from all quarters to the assault, and the disorder became general. The Turks immediately opened a brisk fire of cannon and small-shot; but the gates were carried; the walls scaled; and a desperate struggle was kept up in the streets and houses. Before the end of the day the contest was over, and the citadel, which held out till the next evening, surrendered at discretion. About 6000 Turks, it is said, perished, some thousands were made prisoners, and numbers fled to the mountains.

While these transactions were occurring at Tripolizza, four pachas proceeded in the month of August from the frontiers of Thessaly and Macedonia, to Zeitouni, with the design of forcing the straits of Ther-moplye, and in conjunction with the Ottoman troops at Thebes and Athens, relieving the besieged fortresses in the Morea. Odysseus was stationed on a height above the debris at a place called Fontana. They sent a body of 300 horse to reconnoitre his position, but this detachment was cut to pieces. The next day they attacked him with their whole force; at first the Greeks gave way, but a brave chief, named Gonras, made a stand, and rallied the fugitives. They returned to the charge, and the infidels were routed with the loss of 1200 men. One of the pachas was slain, and vast quantities of baggage and ammunition taken. This was on the 31st of August, and was a victory of immense importance to the cause. About the same time the bishop of Carystus raised an insurrection in Euboea, and endeavoured to intercept the communication between Athens and that island.

An assembly was now called to meet at Argos for the purpose of organizing a government, and the prince repaired thither to attend it; while deputies in the meantime arrived from different parts to demand succours from the administration of the peninsula, and to report what was doing in their districts. In Macedonia the monks of mount Athos, provoked by the violent proceedings of the Turks, were driven into revolt.

The assemblage of a congress had been regarded as a new and important era in the Greek revolution; the anxiety of the nation for the organizing of a government was evident from the eagerness with which the people elected the deputies. By the middle of December not less than sixty had arrived, including ecclesiastics, landowners, merchants, and civilians, most of whom had been liberally educated. They first named a commission to draw up a political code; the rest were occupied in examining the general state of the nation, and laying plans for the next campaign. On the 27th of January, 1822, the independence of the country was proclaimed, and its code published amidst the joyful acclamations of the deputies, the army, and the people. The government was for the present, styled "provisional," while the promulgation of the constitution was accompanied with an address, exhibiting the reasons for shaking off the Turkish yoke. Five members of the congress were nominated as an executive, and prince Mavrocordato was appointed president. Ministers were appointed for the different departments of war, finance, public instruction, the interior, and police; and a commission named of three individuals to superintend the naval affairs.

The new government signalized their liberality by a decree for the abolition of slavery, as well as the sale of any Turkish prisoners who might fall into their hands, prohibiting it under the severest penalties; they also passed another edict for a compensation for military services, and a provision for the widows and orphans of those who should fall in battle; and a third regulating the internal administration of the provinces. The organization of the army was also commenced; a corps called the first regiment of the line was formed and officered from the volunteers of different nations, and, as there were more of them than were requisite for this service, a second was formed of the remainder, which took the name of Philhellènes. Patras was blockaded again by 3000 men, and a smaller body under the French colonel Voutier was sent to Athens, to reduce the Acropolis; the forces before Napoli were augmented, and Modon and Coron closely invested by the armed peasantry around.

An event, the most terrific and atrocious that history has ever recorded, marked the commencement of the second campaign: the destruction of Scio, and its miserable inhabitants. The Sciois had taken no part in the movement of 1821. In the beginning of May, in that year, a small squadron of Ipsariots appearing off the coast, furnished the aga with a pretext for his oppressions, and he began by seizing forty of the elders and bishops; who were immured as hostages for the good conduct of the people.

"On the 23rd of April," says Mr. Blaquiere, "a fleet of fifty sail, including five of the line, anchored in the bay, and immediately began to bombard the town, while several thousand troops were landed under the guns of the citadel, which also opened a heavy fire on the Greeks. It was in vain for the islanders to make any resistance; deserted by the Samians, most of whom embarked and sailed away when the Turkish fleet hove in sight, they were easily overpowered and obliged to fly. From this moment, until the last direful act, Scio, lately so great an object of admiration to strangers, presented one continued scene of horror and dismay. Having massacred every soul, whether men, women, or children, whom they found in the town, the Turks first plundered and then set fire to it, and watched the flames until not a house was left, except those of the foreign consuls. Three days had, however, been suffered to pass, before the infidels ventured to penetrate into the interior of the island, and even then their excursions were confined to the low grounds. While some were occupied in plundering the villas of rich merchants, and others setting fire to the villages, the air was rent with the mingled groans of men, women, and children, who were falling under the swords and daggers of the infidels. The only exception made during the massacre was in favour of young women and boys, who were preserved to be afterwards sold as slaves. Many of the former, whose husbands had been butchered, were running to and fro frantic, with torn garments and dishevelled hair, pressing their trembling infants to their breasts, and seeking death as a relief from the still greater calamities that awaited them.

selected for sale in the bazaars, when it occurred to the pacha, that no time should be lost in persuading those who had fled to the more inaccessible parts of the island, to lay down their arms and submit. It being impossible to effect this by force, they had recourse to a favourite expedient with Mussulmans; that of proclaiming an amnesty. In order that no doubt should be entertained of their sincerity, the foreign consuls, more particularly those of England, France and Austria, were called upon to guarantee the promises of the Turks: they accordingly went forth, and invited the unfortunate peasant to give up their arms and return. Notwithstanding their long experience of Turkish perfidy, the solemn pledge given by the consuls at length prevailed, and many thousands who might have successfully resisted until succours had arrived, were sacrificed; for no sooner did they descend from the heights, and give up their arms, than the infidels, totally unmindful of the proffered pardon, put them to death without mercy. The number of persons of every age and sex who became the victims of this perfidious act was estimated at 7000.

"After having devoted ten days to the work of slaughter, it was natural to suppose that the monsters who directed this frightful tragedy would have been in some degree satiated by the blood of so many innocent victims; but it was when the excesses had begun to diminish, on the part of the soldiery, that fresh scenes of horror were exhibited on board the fleet, and in the citadel. In addition to the women and children embarked for the purpose of being conveyed to the markets of Constantinople and Smyrna, several hundreds of the natives were also seized, and among these, all the gardeners of the island, who were supposed to know where the treasures of their employers had been concealed. There were no less than 500 of the persons thus collected hung on board the different ships; when these executions commenced, they served as a signal to the commandant of the citadel, who immediately followed the example, by suspending the whole of the hostages, to the number of seventy-six, on gibbets erected for the occasion. With respect to the numbers who were either killed or consigned to slavery, during the three weeks that followed the arrival of the capitan pacha, there is no exaggeration in placing the former at 25,000 souls. It has been ascertained that above 30,000 women and children were condemned to slavery, while the fate of those who escaped was scarcely less calamitous. Though many contrived to get off in open boats, or such other vessels as they could procure, thousands, who were unable to do so, wandered about the mountains, or concealed themselves in caves, without food or clothing, for many days after the massacre had begun to subside on the plains. Among those who had availed themselves of the pretended amnesty, many families took refuge in the houses of the consuls, who were indeed bound by every tie of honour and humanity to afford them protection. It has, however, been asserted, upon authority which cannot well be doubted, that the wretched beings thus saved from Mussulman vengeance, were obliged to pay large ransoms before they could leave the island. Nay, more, numbers of those who escaped the massacre, affirm, that it was extremely difficult to obtain even temporary protection under the Christian flag, without first gratifying the avaricious demands of those who conceived this appalling event a legitimate object of mercantile speculation."

At the commencement of the campaign, Colocotroni, with 300 men, was dispatched to Patras, where a part of the Turkish fleet had landed a great body of men in the latter end of February. On his approach the Turks went to meet him with almost all their force. Colocotroni, not considering himself strong enough for them, retreated to the mountains; but suddenly stopped, addressed his men, and wheeling about, advanced towards the enemy. Upon this the Turks, struck with a panic, thinking he had received notice of a reinforcement, turned their backs and were pursued by the Greeks up to the walls of the town; 500 of them were slain in less than two hours, and Colocotroni blockaded the place. The Ottoman fleet was pursued by the Greeks under Miauli and Tombasi, and the admiral's frigate nearly fell into the hands of the Greeks. Marco Bozzaris and Rango gained many advantages in Epirus, and took Arta, the key of Albania; but, owing to the treachery of Tairabos, it was abandoned. Odysseus and his companions endeavoured to check the enemy in Livadia and Negropont; but the disaster of the Greeks at Cassandra so much strengthened them, that they advanced again, and threw some reinforcements into Athens.

The fall of Ali Pacha had now so much increased the resources of Chousridi, that he concerted measures, which would have been the destruction of the Greek cause, had they been skillfully executed. Mavrocordato, in order to frustrate them, laid a plan to undertake an expedition into Epirus, draw off the Turks from the Morea, relieve the Sullotes, and carry the war into the heart of Albania. He communicated his plan to the executive, and it was determined to place 5000 men at the disposal of the president, who was to lead the expedition in person. The only forces, however, which could be mustered, were the corps of the Philhellenes, and the first regiment of the line, neither of them complete, with 700 men commanded by general Norman and Kiriakouli, to relieve the Sullotes. He arrived at Patras on the 12th of June; but Colocotroni here opposed many difficulties to any of his troops being detached, and he was obliged to leave without the expected assistance. hundred men. A large force of the enemy was in the meantime collected at Larissa and Zetouni; Colocotroni suddenly left the blockade of Patras, and proceeded with all his army to Tripolizza, leaving an opportunity for the Turkish garrison either to enter the Morea, or cross the Lepanto. Consternation prevailed in the Peloponnesus; and Corinth was abandoned and re-occupied by the enemy, not without the suspicion of treachery.

The situation of Ypsilanti was at this time very critical: he had no money or provisions, and hardly 1300 men to oppose 30,000; he therefore, in order to stop the enemy's progress, threw himself into the citadel of Argos, while Colocotroni took up the strong position of Lerno on the west of the gulf. The first body of the Turks, consisting of 7000 cavalry and 4000 foot, halted near Argos, and part of it proceeded to Napoli; soon after Marchmont Pacha arrived with 10,000 more. The pacha, however, entered Napoli, and continued several days inactive; when threatened with the extremities of famine and drought, he gave orders for the return to Corinth, and his army set out in the greatest disorder. Colocotroni attacked and destroyed 5000 of them in a few hours; the advanced guard was attacked in the defiles by the Matinoes under Nikitas, and 1200 perished in the first onset. These successes happened between the 4th and 7th of August. On the 18th the pacha attempted to draw the Greeks into a ambushade, but they got into his rear, and he was defeated with great loss; the next day, determining to regain the position they had lost, the Turks again attacked under Hadji Ali, who was slain in the engagement, and nearly 2000 of his men were lost, as well as a large quantity of baggage and several hundred horses. The Greeks, however, had no means of following up their successes.

Ypsilanti advanced to Napoli to assist in its reduction, while the troops left under the command of Coliopulo, not being supplied with rations or pay, became so weary of the service that the greater part withdrew, leaving Colocotroni's eldest son with 200 or 300 men to continue the blockade of Corinth. Soon after this, Colocotroni, at the passes near the isthmus, stopped the Turks who wished to bring succours to Napoli; and they being driven to the greatest extremity of famine, and the Palamida or citadel having been surprised, the garrison had no alternative left them but to surrender. The Greeks took possession of this important place on the 11th of January. The Turkish commanders, on the surrender of Napoli, determined to proceed to Patras, which the Greeks had lately neglected blockading. Setting out in the middle of January, they had reached Akrata near Vostiza, when a detachment from Missolonghi stopped one of the passes, and shortly after another body blocked up the other: so that the Turks were reduced to the greatest straits, feeding upon horses, the herbs on the rocks, their saddles, and at last one another. For nearly three weeks longer the place held out, when Odysseus arriving, and on one of the days being acquainted with him, a negotiation was commenced, by which the garrison obtained permission to embark, and the boys were sent prisoners to Napoli. The number of the enemy that perished on this occasion, without firing a shot, amounted, it is said to 2000. Thus ended the second campaign in the Morea, costing the Turks not fewer than 25,000 men in the Peloponnesus alone.

The operations in Epirus, though on a smaller scale, were little less interesting. Mavrocordato put his forces in motion, and first making a feint as if he wished to reach Salona, returned on the village of Therasova, and entered Missolonghi on the 17th of October, where greater difficulties than ever awaited him. Here he was besieged by the Turks until the 9th of November, when the blockading squadron was chased away by six vessels bearing the Greek flag; and on the 14th Mavronichalis arrived with the long expected succours. A sortie was then made; but it was of little avail, and the garrison was so much weakened, that Omar Vroni determined to attack the place. Accordingly on the morning of Christmas-day, at 8 o'clock, 800 men approached the walls with scaling ladders unperceived, and had even fixed some, but they were instantly cut down; the conflict that followed was desperate and sanguinary, and the Turks were obliged to retire with the loss of 1200 men and nine pieces of cannon. The rising now became general through the country, and the retreat of the enemy was intercepted in all quarters; so that of the whole force brought into the country, only three months before, not half escaped. Mavrocordato arrived in the Peloponnesus in the early part of April, 1825, after an absence of ten months.

The national congress met at Astros, a small town in Argos, on the 10th of April, 1825, in a garden under the shade of orange trees; nearly 300 deputies were occupied in the debates, which began at sunrise. The following oath was taken at the first meeting by each member:—"I swear, in the name of God and my country, to act with a pure and unshaken patriotism, to promote a sincere union, and abjure every thought of personal interest in all the discussions which shall take place in this second national congress." Having settled a number of important points, its labours ended on the 30th. The third meeting of the congress was deferred for two years; and the executive and legislative body was transferred to Tripolizza, where measures were immediately taken for opening the third campaign.

The enemy was not idle as the summer advanced; a fleet of seventeen frigates, and sixty smaller vessels, was sent with stores to supply the remaining fortresses in Negropont, Candia, and the Morea; and, after accomplishing this object, the captain pacha arrived at Patras about the middle of June. Yusuff Pacha led on a large body to Thermopylae, and Mustapha conducted another to the pass of Neopatra, near Zeitouni, the former, especially, laying waste the whole country, and committing all manner of excesses. Odysseus in the meantime arrived from Athens, and Nikitas from Tripolizza, and a sort of guerrilla warfare was commenced, which so harassed the Turks under Yusuff that they retreated in the greatest disorder. Mustapha was attacked, and forced to take refuge in Negropont, at Caryatas, where he was closely blockaded.

Marco Botzaris, who commanded the Greeks at Crionero, fell on the Turks, and either killed or captured two-thirds of their number. The same brave leader undertook a forced march against Mustapha, who had 14,000 men, while he had only 2000. On assigning each man's part at midnight on the 19th, his last words were, "If you lose sight of me during the combat, seek me in the pacha's tent." On his arrival at the centre, he sounded his bugle, as agreed upon, and the enemy, panic-struck, fled in all directions. In the midst of the attack, which was now general, he was twice wounded, and at last carried off from the field expiring; the struggle, however, was maintained till day-light, when the Greeks were victorious on all points, and the loss of the enemy was not less than 3000. One of the first acts of the capitan pacha, on his arrival with his fleet, had been to declare Missolonghi, and every other Greek port, in a state of blockade. The entrance of a few Greek gun-boats, however, was sufficient to set the capitan pacha at defiance; having remained inactive for above three months, and lost nearly a third of his crews by epidemics, he at length made the best of his way to the Archipelago.

At the commencement of the year 1824, proclamation was issued by the president and senate of the United States of the Ionian Islands, declaring their neutrality, and their firm resolution not to take any part in the contest; also prohibiting any foreigner, who should do so, from residing in the islands. Among the Greeks discussions still prevailed, every faction following its own plans, and seeking to advance its own influence. Mavrocordato, Colocotroni, and Ypsilanti, headed different factions, among the members of which there was neither unanimity of counsel, nor uniformity of action.

The Turkish fleet sailed on the 23rd of April. The Greek senate summoned Colocotroni to surrender himself, and to deliver up Napoli and Tripolizza, but he refused; the troops that were investing Patras quarrelled about the division of some of their booty, and were withdrawn; in the meantime the Turks sailed from Lepanto with fourteen ships, and blockaded Missolonghi. In order to encourage the Greeks, a loan of 800,000*l.* was contracted for in London. About this period Ipsara was threatened by the Turkish fleet, which was now at Mitylene. The island of Caso was attacked on the 8th of June by an Egyptian squadron, and after an obstinate resistance was taken on the 9th.

Several naval actions occurred about this time, in which the Greeks generally had the advantage; and had not the long delay in paying the loan in London threatened ruin to the cause, the success of their arms was such as to give great hopes of a speedy deliverance from the Ottoman power. On the 18th of April, this year, lord Byron died at Missolonghi, of an inflammatory fever, after having zealously devoted himself to the cause of the Greeks from the time he first landed, in August, 1823, up to the period of his death. His exertions had been great and unremitting, but he never seems to have been free from apprehension lest the jealousies and divisions among the Greek leaders would not ultimately prove destructive to all their patriotic efforts.

Taking advantage of an insurrection that broke out on the Morea, at the head of which were Colocotroni and his sons, the troops of Mahomet Ali, pacha of Egypt, were directed to land in great force there; and it now became evident that the neighbourhood of Navarino was destined to be the seat of war.

On the 1st of May the Egyptian fleet, from 65 to 70 sail, left the port of Suda, where it had been watched by a Greek squadron under Miaoulis, who now sailed to Navarino. On the 8th, Miaoulis's squadron, amounting to 22 vessels, was near Zante; the Egyptian fleet, 46 in number, being off Sphacteria. In about an hour from 2000 to 3000 troops effected a debarkation from the Egyptian fleet, on the island. The garrison of old Navarino capitulated on the 10th, and the garrison of Navarino on the 23rd. After the surrender of Sphacteria, a great part of the Egyptian fleet was followed by Miaoulis into the harbour of Modon, and more than half of it destroyed by fire-ships.

In the end of May the Turkish admiral left the Dardanelles, and on the 1st of June was encountered by the Hydriote Sakhtiuri, who, by means of his fire-ships, destroyed three men of war and some transports. Soon after the capitan pacha entered Suda, and joined the Egyptian fleet from Navarino. The Greek fleet was dispersed by a tempest, and having no fire ships, they retired to Hydra, while the Turkish admiral landed a reinforcement of 5000 men at Navarino, and went to Missolonghi with seven frigates and many smaller vessels. The siege was now vigorously pressed; the lagune was penetrated on the 21st of July, and Anatolica, an island to the north, surrendered to the Turks. The supply of water was now cut off, batteries had been erected near the main works of the place, the ramparts had been injured, and part of the ditches filled up; at length a general attack was ordered on the 1st of August, and the town assailed in four places at once. On the 3rd the Greek fleet, consisting of 25 brigs, attacked and destroyed two small ships of war and all the boats in the lagoon, relieved Missolonghi, and obliged the enemy's fleet to retire. On the 10th the Greeks attempted, but without success, to burn the Turkish fleet in the harbour of Alexandria. On the 20th the fleet of the Greeks, about 30 sail, commanded by Miaoulis, engaged the Turks between Zante, Cephalonia, and Chiarenza, and an action ensued, which lasted with little intermission for two days and nights, till at length the Greeks were obliged to retire. On the 29th another naval action took place, and skirmishes on the two next days, when the Greeks forced the enemy to take shelter in the gulf.

Nothing of importance happened during the year 1826 to give the Greeks encouragement. After a lengthened blockade of Missolonghi, in which every effort was made by the Greeks to defend it, that important fortress was taken by assault and sacked. Nor were the events of the early part of 1827 such as to hold out hopes of a successful issue of this prolonged and barbarous contest. Athens was taken in May by the Turks under Kiutaki, not long after the arrival of the gallant lord Cochrane in its neighbourhood, with a considerable naval force. The loss of the Greeks on this occasion amounted to 700 men killed, and 240 taken prisoners, including eighteen Philhellenians of different countries. Kiutaki, supposing that lord Cochrane and general Church were among the Europeans, had the prisoners brought before him, and, after examining them carefully, caused the eighteen Europeans to be pointed before his eyes, and ordered the 229 Greeks to be massacred.

The interference of the great European powers could no longer be deferred; and an important treaty between Great Britain, France, and Russia was concluded, expressly with a view to put an end to this horrid warfare, and, under certain tributary stipulations, to establish the independence of Greece. The ambassadors of the three powers, on the 16th of August, presented the said treaty to the Porte, and waited for an answer till the 31st. Meanwhile the Greek government proclaimed an armistice in conformity with the treaty of London; but the reis effendi rejected the intervention of the three powers. The Greeks then commenced hostilities anew, and on the 9th of September the Turkish-Egyptian fleet entered the bay of Navarino. A British squadron appeared in the bay on the 13th, under admiral Codrington. To this a French squadron, under admiral Riguy, and a Russian, under count Heyden, united themselves on the 22nd. They demanded from Ibrahim Pacha a cessation of hostilities; this he promised, and went out with part of his fleet, but was forced to return into the bay. He, however, continued the devastations in the Morea, and gave no answer to the complaints of the admirals.

The combined squadrons of England, France, and Russia now entered the bay, where the Turkish-Egyptian fleet was drawn up in order of battle. The first shots were fired from the Turkish side, and killed two Englishmen. This was the signal for a deadly contest, in which Codrington nearly destroyed the Turkish-Egyptian armada of 110 ships. Some were burned, others driven on shore, and the rest disabled. Enraged at the battle of Navarino, the Porte seized all the ships of the Franks in Constantinople, detained them for some time, and stopped all communication with the allied powers, till indemnification should be made for the destruction of the fleet. At the same time it prepared for war; and the several ambassadors left Constantinople. Upon this the Porte affected to adopt conciliatory measures; but it was evident they were insincere; for from all parts of the kingdom the ayans were now called to Constantinople, and discussed with the Porte the preparations for war; and all the Moslems, from the age of nineteen to fifty, were called on to arm.

In the meantime, the president of the Greeks, Capo d'Istria, established a high national council at Napoli di Romania; took measures for instituting a national bank; and put the military on a new footing. The attempts at pacification were fruitless, because the Porte rejected every proposal, and in Britain the battle of Navarino was looked on as an "untoward event." In this state of indecision and uncertainty, Ibrahim took the opportunity of sending a number of Greek captives as slaves to Egypt. In the meantime, the French cabinet, in concurrence with the British, to carry into execution the treaty of London, sent a body of troops to the Morea, whilst admiral Codrington concluded a treaty with the viceroy of Egypt, at Alexandria (August 6), the terms of which were that Ibrahim Pacha should evacuate the Morea with his troops, and set at liberty his Greek prisoners. Those Greeks who had been carried into slavery in Egypt, were to be freed or ransomed: 1200 men, however, were to be allowed to remain to garrison the fortresses in the Morea. To force Ibrahim to comply with these terms, the French general Maison arrived on the 29th of the following August, with 164 transport-ships, in the bay of Coron. After an amicable negotiation, Ibrahim left Navarino, and sailed (October 4) with about 21,000 men, whom he carried with the wreck of the fleet to Alexandria; but he left garrisons in the Messenian fortresses, amounting to 25,000 men. Maison occupied the town of Navarino without opposition; and after a mere show of resistance on the part of those who held the citadels of Modon, Coron, and Patras, the flags of the allied powers floated on their walls.

Nothing hostile was undertaken against the Turks by the French out of the Morea, because the sultan would in that case have declared war against France; and Britain and France carefully avoided such a result, that they might be able to mediate between the Porte and Russia. To defend the Morea, however, from new invasions from the Turks, the three powers agreed to send a manifesto to the Porte to this effect: "that they should place the Morea and the Cyclades under their protection till the time when a definitive arrangement should decide the fate of the provinces which the allies had taken possession of, and that they should consider the entrance of any military force into this country as an attack upon themselves. They required the Porte to come to an explanation with them concerning the final pacification of Greece."

The Greeks, in the meantime, continued hostilities; and the Turks relaxed not in retaliating with bitter vengeance on all who came within their power; nor would Mahmoud recall the edict of extermination which he had pronounced when he commanded Dram Ali, a few years before, to bring him the ashes of Peloponnese. Ibrahim had wantonly burned down the olive groves as far as his Arabians spread, and the Greeks were sunk in the deepest misery.

It must not be supposed that the allied powers were wholly unmindful of the great object they had undertaken; but many serious obstacles tending to delay its accomplishment presented themselves at every step of the negotiation. The basis of a settlement was, however, at length agreed upon; the principal points of which may be thus briefly stated:—The Greeks, to pay to the Porte an annual tribute; a joint commission of Turks and Greeks to determine the indemnification of the Turks for the loss of property in Greece; Greece to enjoy a qualified independence, under the sovereignty of the Porte; the government to be under an hereditary Christian prince, not of the family of either of the allied sovereigns; at every succession of the hereditary prince, an additional year's tribute to be paid; mutual amnesty to be required; and all Greeks to be allowed a year to sell their property and leave the Turkish territories.

The situation of Capo d'Istria, the president, was all this time most embarrassing. He was without means, in a land torn by discord; yet his attention had been zealously directed towards the maintenance of order, the suppression of piracy, and the formation of a regular army; the establishment of courts of justice, and schools of mutual instruction; of means for collecting the revenue, and providing for the subsistence of the wretched remnants of the population. He called together the fourth national assembly, at Argos, and in a long address (July 23, 1829), gave an account of the state of the country and of his measures, particularly directing the attention of the assembly to the organization of the forces and the revenue.

The conferences between the ministers of the three powers, at London, had now for their object to select a prince to wear the crown of Greece. It was first offered to prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, Feb. 3, 1830, and was accepted by him, as "sovereign prince of Greece," on the 20th. On further consideration, however, he resigned the honour; alleging as his reasons—the unwillingness of the Greeks to receive him, and their dissatisfaction at the settlement of the boundaries. He further observed, that the answer of the president of Greece to his appointment, in his judgment, announced a forced submission to the allied powers, and even that forced submission was accompanied by reservations of the highest importance. Much dissatisfaction was shown in England, and various motives were assigned to the prince for his refusal; but it is perhaps unnecessary to seek for any other motive than that which would force itself on the notice of any man of correct feelings and good taste, namely, the irksomeness of filling a regal station, with the consciousness that his unwilling subjects regarded him as an intruder and a tyrant. After the resignation of Leopold, several princes were proposed as candidates for the throne; and at length Otto, a younger son of the king of Bavaria, accepted the trust, and was proclaimed at Nauplia, Aug. 30, 1832. During the discontents and jealousies of the previous year, count Capo d'Istria, the president, had been assassinated.

Such havoc had the ravages of war made in Greece, and so necessary was repose to all classes of its inhabitants, that the first years of Otto's reign passed away in a comparatively tranquil manner; although the sullen murmur of discontent was occasionally heard as, one by one, the several state appointments were filled by the king's German friends, to the exclusion of natives. At length, in September, 1843, the people, urged by distress and dissatisfaction, rose against the constituted authorities of the kingdom, and accomplished a revolution without bloodshed or violence—without endangering the personal safety, or inflicting any humiliation on the king. The ministers were arrested at their houses, but were liberated in a few hours. The populace assembled in front of the palace, and demanded a constitution. The king assured the people that he would consider their demand, and that of the army, after consulting with his ministers, the state council, and foreign ambassadors, but was informed that the ministers were no longer recognized, and that the council of state were then deliberating on the best course to pursue. An address from this body was subsequently presented to the king, in which the instant dismissal of the Bavarian ministers was insisted on, and a list of those chosen to succeed them in office was presented. Wisely foreseeing the result of resisting demands, which were founded in justice and reason, his majesty with a good grace acceded to them, and the affair terminated apparently to the satisfaction of all parties. It is, however, too important a catastrophe in the history of Greece to be dismissed with so slight a notice: we shall therefore avail ourselves of the following extract from an account of this bloodless revolution, as given in a Greek paper of the 15th of September, 1843:—

THE GREEK PRINCE IS TOO, BUT THEIR LIVES ARE EXEMPLARY.

"A wise revolution, accomplished in one day, amidst the most perfect order, without a single offensive cry being uttered, even against the Havarians, has renewed the claims of Greece to the esteem and sympathy of nations and their governments. Every body knows the unfortunate situation in which Greece was placed. The Greeks had exhausted every means in their power to induce the government to adopt a truly national policy. The parliament of France and England, and the London conference, had vainly acknowledged the many grievances of the Greek people; the government obstinately persevered in its civil course. The king had no other alternative but to plunge himself into the abyss opened by his own mistakes and incapacity, or to extricate himself therefrom by a dangerous but inevitable effort. For some time the movement was in progress of preparation on different points of the country, that it might be effected without any disorder. The hostile attitude assumed by the government against those who sought to enlighten it, the extraordinary dispositions adopted within the last few days with a view to assail the liberty and the very lives of the citizens (a military tribunal had been established) most devoted to the national interests, necessarily tended to hasten the manifestation of the contemplated movement.

"Last night, at two o'clock, A. M., a few musket shots fired in the air announced the assembling of the people in different quarters of Athens. Soon afterwards the inhabitants, accompanied by the entire garrison, marched towards the square of the palace, crying, 'The constitution for ever!' On reaching the place, the entire garrison, the artillery, cavalry, and infantry, drew up under the windows of the king, in front of the palace, and the people, having stationed themselves in the rear, all in one voice demanded a constitution. The king appeared at a low window, and assured the people that he would take into consideration their demand and that of the army, after consulting with his ministers, the council of state, and the representatives of the foreign powers. But the commander, M. Callegri, having stepped forward, made known to his majesty that the monarchy was no longer recognized, and that the council of state was already deliberating on the best course to be adopted under existing circumstances. A deputation of the council shortly after waited on the king with the documents that had been prepared for his perusal.

"The new ministry soon afterwards repaired to the palace, where they held a long consultation with his majesty, who shortly appeared on the balcony, surrounded by his ministers and other personages, and was received with acclamations by the people. The cry of 'Long live the constitutional king resounded, together with that of the 'constitution for ever.' The new ministers entered immediately on the discharge of their functions."

It was the opinion of Peter the Great of Russia, that Greece would at some future day again become the favoured seat of literature and the arts; nay, that having made the circuit of Europe, and been fostered in England, France, and Germany, they would take their departure from those countries, reach Ithaca, and thence revisit the place of their birth in all their pristine glory. That time, should it ever arrive, is, in all probability, very far distant; but it may be well to close the present historical sketch with a few brief remarks on Greece in its past and present state.

The government of the different states of ancient Greece was purely monarchical; it subsequently varied from a mixed monarchy, as in Sparta, to a democracy, as at Athens. In most states there was a continued struggle between an oligarchical and popular faction; and as one or other prevailed, their adversaries were exiled, or unrelentingly put to death.

In their cultivation of literature and the arts they surpassed all nations. The poems of Homer are still unrivalled; and Hesiod, with many others, maintained the reputation which their great poet had won. Dramatic composition was invented by Thespis, and brought to perfection by Aeschines, Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes. History was cultivated with success, by Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon; and, subsequently by Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, Arrian, and Plutarch. In oratory also the Greeks excelled; there is, indeed, no name in history more honoured for commanding eloquence than that of Demosthenes.

Philosophy was also prosecuted at a very early date, and there were several eminent teachers, cotemporary with Solon. Pythagoras, who taught the doctrine of metempsychosis, came next. But it flourished most after the time of Socrates, B. C. 400, who introduced a pure system of morality, with a correct mode of reasoning, into Greece. Plato, Aristotle, and Xenophon, who were termed academicians, succeeded him; and other schools were also set up; as the sceptics, by Pyrrho; the stoics, by Zeno; the cynics, by Aristippus; and the epicureans, by Epicurus; the object of all these schools being to discover what was the chief aim of human existence. The mathematical sciences were also objects of early attention in Greece; and were pursued by many of their teachers, in conjunction with those which were purely philosophical. In painting, sculpture, and architecture, also, the Greeks gave proofs of the highest excellence; the finest statues in the world are of Greek execution; and the styles of architecture distinguished as Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian, are those to which we are indebted for our most splendid public edifices.

With some few exceptions, the Greeks were a people of lively temperament, fertile imagination, social habits, and elegant taste; but they were fierce and vindictive, sparing little for principle, and even inculcating a crafty and overreaching policy. They ever shewed an extreme proneness to civil discord, and through their own dissensions and treachery they first fell a prey to Macedon, and afterwards to Rome.

The language of the ancient Greeks has undergone many alterations in the course of time; and these commenced with the decline of the eastern empire. The irruption of the barbarians hastened the corruption of the language, as well as the fall of the empire; and ages have passed in which this nation had no language but that of its ancestors. About the twelfth century some taste for learning arose; the crusades then commenced, which brought the East into relation with the West, the Greeks with the Latins and Saracens; and though there was a striking distinction between the subtle and artful character of the Greeks, and the barbarous rudeness of the Latins, new ideas were inspired into the mind of the nation, and new expressions were introduced into its language. The Italians particularly had great influence over the Romance, or modern Greek, which was then formed; poets and prose writers availed themselves of this new language; which, though as remote from the ancient Greek as the Italian is from the tongue of ancient Rome, soon became the national idiom.

The modern Greeks are thus described:—"There is a pretty marked distinction among the inhabitants of the three great divisions of Greece—Greece north of the Isthmus, the Peloponnesus, and the islands. The inhabitants of northern Greece have retained a chivalrous and warlike spirit, with a simplicity of manners and mode of life which strongly remind us of the pictures of the heroic age. The soil here is generally cultivated by Bulgarians, Albanians, and Wallachians. In eastern Greece, Parnassus, with its natural bulwarks, is the only place where the Hellenic race has maintained itself; in the mountainous parts of western Greece there are also some remnants of the Hellenic stock. In these parts the language is spoken with more purity than elsewhere. The population of the Peloponnesus consists nearly of the same races as that of northern Greece, but the Peloponnesians are more ignorant and less honest than the inhabitants of Hellas. The Albanians occupy Argolio and a part of the ancient Triphylia. Among the rest of the inhabitants, who all speak Greek, there are considerable social differences. The population of the towns is of a mixed character, as in northern Greece; where there is an active and intelligent body of proprietors, merchants, and artisans in the towns, and among them some of Greek stock. The Maniotes form a separate class of the population: they are generally called Maniotes from the name of one of their districts; but their true name, which they have never lost, is Spartans. They occupy the lofty and sterile mountains between the gulphs of Laconia and Messenia, the representatives of a race driven from the sunny valley of the Eurotas to the bleak and inhospitable tracts of Taygetos, though the plains which are spread out below them are no longer held by a conqueror, and the fertile lands lie uncultivated for want of labourers. In the islands, there is a singular mixture of Albanians and Greeks. The Albanians of Hydra and Spozzia have long been known as active traders and excellent mariners. The Hydriotes made great sacrifices for the cause of independence in the late war; the Spezioties, more prudent and calculating, increased their wealth and their merchant navy. The island of Syra, which has long been the centre of an active commerce, now contains the remnant of the population of Ipsara and Chios. The Ipsariotes are an active and handsome race, and skilful seamen; the Chioti, following the habits of their ancestors, are fond of staying at home and attending to their shops and mercantile speculations; they amass wealth, but they employ it in founding establishments of public utility, and in the education of their children. In Tinos, the peasants, who are also the proprietors, cultivate the vine and the fig even amidst the most barren rocks: in Syra, Santorin, and at Naxos, they are the tenants of a miserable race of nobility, whose origin is traced to the time of the crusades, and who still retain the Latin creed of their ancestors. Besides these, there are various bodies of Sulioties, of people from the heights of Olymp; Candioties, many Greek families from Asia Minor, Fanariotes, and others, who have emigrated, or been driven by circumstances within the limits of the new kingdom. The Ipsariotes are those who are supposed to have the least intermixture of foreign blood. They have the fine and characteristic Greek physiognomy, as preserved in the marbles of Phidias and other ancient sculptors; they are "ingenious, loquacious, lively to excess, active, enterprising, vapouring, and disputatious." The modern Greeks are generally rather above the middle height, and well shaped; they have the face oval, features regular and expressive, eyes large, dark and animated, eyebrows arched, hair long and dark, and complexions olive-coloured."

The character of the Greeks, while under the Turks, was thus summed up by Mr. Hope. "The complexion of the modern Greek may receive a different cast from different surrounding objects: the core is still the same as in the days of Pericles. Credulity, versatiliy, and the thirst of distinctions, from the earliest periods formed, still form, and ever will form, the basis of the Greek character. When patriotism, public spirit, and pre-eminence in arts, science, literature, and warfare, were the road to distinction, the Greeks shone the first of patriots, of heroes, of painters, of poets, and of philosophers. Now that craft and subtlety, adulation and intrigue, are the only paths to greatness, the same Greeks are—what you see them!"

MOEAVIA, WALLACHIA, AND SERVIA, IN EUROPEAN TURKEY, ARE NOW CONNECTED WITH THE PORTS ONLY BY THE SILVERBERRY TIES.

THE Turks are of Tartarian or Scythian extraction; and this appellation was first given them in the middle ages as a proper name; it being a general title of honour to all the nations comprehended under the two principal branches of Tartar and Mongol, who therefore never use it as a proper name of any particular nation. The Scythian or Tartarian nation, to which the name of Turks has been peculiarly given, dwelt betwixt the Black and Caspian seas, and became first known in the seventh century, when Heraclius, emperor of the East, took them into his service; in which they so distinguished themselves, by their fidelity and bravery in the conquest of Persia, that the Arabian and Saracen caliphs had not only select bodies of them for garde, but their armies were composed of them. Thus gradually getting the power into their hands, they set up and dethroned caliphs at pleasure. By this strict union of the Turks with the Saracens or Arabs, the former were brought to embrace the Mahometan religion, so that they are now become intermixed, and have jointly enlarged their conquests; but as the Turks became superior to the Saracens, they subdued them.

The following account has been given of the origin of the Ottoman empire. Genghis-khan, at the head of his horse, issued out of Great Tartary, and made himself master of a vast tract of land near the Caspian Sea, and even of all Persia and Asia Minor. Incited by his example and success, Shah Solyman, prince of the town of Ners, on the Caspian Sea, in the year 1214, passed Mount Caucasus with 50,000 men, and penetrated as far as the borders of Syria; and though his career was stopped there by Genghis-khan, yet in the year 1219 he penetrated a second time into Asia Minor, as far as the Euphrates. Othman, his grandson, made himself master of several countries and places in Lesser Asia, belonging to the Grecian empire; and having, in the year 1300, at the city of Carachiher, assumed the title of emperor of the Ottomans, called his people after his own name.

This prince, among many other towns, took, in the year 1326, Prusa, in Bithynia, now called Bursa, which Orchan, his son and successor, made the seat of his empire. Orchan sent Solyman and Amurath, his two sons, on an expedition into Europe; the former of whom reduced the city of Callipolis, and the latter took Tyrillos. Amurath succeeded his father in the government, in 1360; took Ancyra, Adrianople, and Philippopolis; and, in 1362, overran Servia, and invaded Macedonia and Albania.

Bajazet, his son and successor, was very successful both in Europe and Asia, defeating the Christians near Nicopolis; but, in 1401, he was routed and taken prisoner by Tamerlane. His sons disagreed; but Mahomet I. enjoyed the sovereignty, and his son Amurath II. distinguished himself by several important enterprises, and particularly in the year 1444 gained a signal victory over the Hungarians near Varna.

The Byzantine empire was already cut off from the west, when Mahomet II., the son of Amurath, and his successor, at the age of twenty-six, completed the work of conquest. It is said, that the reading of ancient historians had inspired him with the ambition of equalling Alexander. He soon attacked Constantinople, which was taken, May 29, 1453; and the last Paleologus, Constantine XI., buried himself under the ruins of his throne.

Mahomet now built the castle of the Dardanelles, and organized the government of the empire, taking for his model Nushirvan's organization of the Persian empire. In 1456, he subdued the Morea, and in 1461, led Comnenus, emperor of Trebizond, prisoner to Constantinople. Pius II. called in vain upon the nations of Christendom to take up arms.

Mahomet conquered the remainder of Bosnia in 1470, and Epirus in 1465, after the death of Scanderbeg. He took Negropont and Lemnos from the Venetians, Caffa from the Genoese, and, in 1473, obliged the khan of the Crim Tartars, of the family of Genghis khan, to do him homage. In 1480, he had already conquered Otranto, in the kingdom of Naples, when he died, in the midst of his great projects against Rome and Persia. His grandson, Selim I., who had dethroned and murdered his father, drove back the Persian power to the Euphrates and the Tigris. He defeated the Mamelukes, and conquered, in 1517, Egypt, Syria, and Palestine. During fifty years, the arms of the Ottomans, by sea and by land, were the terror of Europe and of Asia, especially under Solyman II. the Magnificent, also called the Lawgiver, who reigned between 1519 and 1566. In 1522, he took Rhodes from the knights of St. John, and by the victory of Mohacz, in 1526, subdued half of Hungary. He exacted a tribute from Moldavia, and was successful against the Persians in Asia, so as to make Bagdad, Mesopotamia, and Georgia subject to him.

IN A REGION SO EXTENSIVE AS TURKEY, WHERE EVERY VARIETY OF ELEVATION IS FOUND, THERE IS NECESSARILY GREAT VARIATION OF CLIMATE.

He was already threatening to overrun Germany, and to plant the standard of Mahomet in the west, when he was checked before the walls of Vienna, in 1529. But as Hungary had placed its king, John Zapolya, under the powerful protection of the padishah, and the successful corsair Barbarossa was master of the Mediterranean, had conquered Northern Africa, and laid waste Minorca, Sicily, Apulia, and Corfu, the sultan Solymán might have conquered Europe, had he known how to give firmness and consistency to his plans. He was resisted at sea by the Venetians, and the Genoese Andrew Doria, by the grand-master Lavalette in Malta, and by Zriny, under the walls of Zsigeth.

Twelve sultans, all of them brave and warlike, and most of them continually victorious, had now, during a period of two centuries and a half, raised the power of the Crescent; but the internal strength of the state was yet undeveloped. Solymán, indeed, by his laws, completed the organization begun by Mohammed II., and in 1538 united the priestly dignity of the caliphate to the Ottoman porte; but he could not incorporate into a whole the conquered nations. He also imprisoned his successor in the seraglio.

From this time, the race of Osman degenerated, and the power of the Porte declined. From Solymán's death, in 1566, to our own time, most of the Ottoman sovereigns have ascended the throne from a prison, and lived in the seraglio until, as it not unfrequently happened, they again exchanged a throne for a prison. Several grand viziers have, at different periods alone upheld the falling state, while the nation continued to sink deeper into the grossest ignorance and slavery; and pachas, more rapacious and more arbitrary than the sultan and his divan, ruled in the provinces. In its foreign relations, the Porte was the sport of European politicians, and more than once was embroiled by the cabinet of Versailles in a war with Austria and Russia. While all Europe was making rapid progress in the arts of peace and of war, the Ottoman nation and government remained inactive and stationary. Blindly attached to their doctrines of absolute fate, and elated by their former military glory, the Turks looked upon foreigners with contempt, as infidels. Without any settled plan, but incited by hatred and a thirst for conquest, they carried on the war with Persia, Venice, Hungary, and Poland. The revolts of the janizaries and of the governors became dangerous. The suspicions of the despot, however, were generally quieted with the dagger and the bowstring; and the ablest men of the divan were sacrificed to the hatred of the soldiery and of the ulema. The successor to the throne frequently put to death all his brothers; and the people looked with indifference upon the murder of a hated sultan, or the deposition of a weak one.

Mustapha I. was twice dethroned; Osman II. and Ibrahim were strangled, the former in 1622, the latter in 1648. Selim II., indeed, conquered Cyprus in 1571, but in the same year, don John of Austria defeated the Turkish fleet at Lepanto. A century after, under Mahomet IV., in 1669, Candia was taken, after a resistance of thirteen years; and the vizier Kara Mustapha gave to the Hungarians, who had been oppressed by Austria, their general, count Tekeli, for a king, in 1682; but, the very next year, he was driven back from Vienna, which he had besieged, and, after the defeat at Mohacz, in 1687, the Ottomans lost most of the strong places in Hungary. The exasperated people threw their sultan into prison; but, in a short time, the grand vizier, Kluprili Mustapha, restored order and courage, and recalled victory to the Turkish banners; but he was slain in the battle against the Germans near Salankemen, in 1691. At last, the sultan Mustapha II. himself took the field; but he was opposed by the hero Eugene, the conqueror at Zenta, in 1697; and, on the Don, Peter the Great conquered Asoph. He was obliged, therefore, by the treaty of Carlowitz, in 1699, to renounce his claims upon Transylvania and the country between the Danube and the Theiss, to give up the Morea to the Venetians, to restore Podolia and the Ukraine to Poland, and to leave Asoph to the Russians.

Thus commenced the fall of the Ottoman power. A revolt of the janizaries, who, abandoning their ancient rigid discipline, wished to carry on commerce, and live in houses, obliged the sultan to abdicate. His successor, the imbecile and voluptuous Achmet III., saw with indifference the troubles in Hungary, the war of the Spanish succession, and the great northern war. Charles XII., whom he protected after his defeat at Pultawa, finally succeeded in involving him in a war with Peter; but the czar, although surrounded with his whole army, easily obtained the peace of the Pruth, by the surrender of Asoph, in 1711. In 1715, the grand vizier attacked Venice, and took the Morea; but Austria assisted the republic, and Eugene's victories at Peterwardein and Belgrade in 1717, obliged the Porte to give up, by the treaty of Passarowitz, in 1718, Temeswar, Belgrade, with a part of Servia and Wallachia, but still it retained the Morea.

Equally unsuccessful were Achmet's arms in Persia; in consequence of which an insurrection broke out, and he was thrown into prison in 1730. In 1736, the Russian general Münnich humbled the pride of the Ottomans; but Austria, the ally of Russia, was not successful, and the French ambassador in Constantinople effected the treaty of Belgrade, by which the Porte regained Belgrade, with Servia and Wallachia.

Catherine, empress of Russia, soon after her elevation, began to make it a favourite object in her plan of politics to gain a dictatorial ascendancy over the king and diet of Poland. This she effected partly by the intrigue and persuasive bribes of her minister at the court of Warsaw, and partly by marching a powerful army into that kingdom; but as soon as this hostile step was taken, the Porte took the alarm, and, stimulated by jealousy of its northern rival, resolved to support the liberties and independence of the Poles.

These resolutions being formed in the divan of Constantinople, M. Ohreskow, the Russian resident there, was, according to the constant practice of the Turks on such occasions, committed a prisoner to the castle of the Seven Towers, (Oct. 5, 1768.) War was declared against the empress of Russia, and the most vigorous preparations were made to collect the whole force of the empire. The court of Russia was far from seeking a rupture with the Porte, being fully employed in important objects nearer home; but being unable to prevent a war, two armies, amounting together to 150,000 men, were formed, at the head of the largest of which prince Gallitzin crossed the Dniester, and entered Moldavia, with a view of becoming master of Choczin; but the prudent measures taken by the Turkish vizier frustrated all his attempts, and obliged him to repossess the river. The impatience of the Turks to pursue these advantages, and to transfer the seat of war into Podolia, excited a general disgust at the cautious and circumspect conduct of their leader; in consequence of which he was removed, and Moldovani Ali Pacha, a man precipitate and incautious, appointed in his stead; who, by repeated attempts to cross the Dniester in sight of the Russian army, lost in the short space of a fortnight 24,000 of his best troops; which spread such general discontent through the army, that, renouncing all subordination, the troops retreated tumultuously towards the Danube, and no less than 40,000 men are said to have abandoned the standard of Mahomet in this precipitate flight. The Turkish provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia were overrun by the Russians, and most of the places of strength became easy preys to the conqueror. The campaign, which opened so auspiciously for the Ottomans, by the rashness and folly of their general ended in their disgrace and ruin. The vizier was degraded and banished.

The czarina, who almost from the commencement of her reign had endeavoured to establish an efficient naval force, which, under the skillful superintendence of sir Charles Knowles, had been successfully effected, now caused a large fleet of Russian men-of-war, commanded by count Orlov, to proceed from the Baltic to the Mediterranean, to annoy the Turks on their extensive coasts in the Levant. The unskillfulness of the Russians in maritime affairs greatly retarded the progress of their fleet; and it was not until the spring of 1770, that it arrived at the scene of action, although many experienced British officers were volunteers in the expedition. The Turks, to whom the sea has ever proved a fatal element, for some time had no force capable of opposing the enemy, so that the Morea was exposed to their ravages, and several places of strength were taken; the Greek inhabitants every where joyfully received the invaders; but at length an army of Albanians being collected, they drove the Russians to their ships, and having recovered the whole country, chastised the revolt of its inhabitants by the lawless vengeance of a licentious soldiery.

The Russians, now driven from the Morea, had advanced in full force into the Egean sea, and, passing the straits which divide the island of Scio from the coast of Natolia, were met by a Turkish fleet of superior force. A furious engagement ensued on the 5th of July, in which the Russian admiral Spiriof encountered the captain pacha, in the Sultana of 90 guns, yard arm and yard-arm. The two ships running close together, grappled each other. The Russians, by throwing hand grenades, set the enemy's ship on fire, which rapidly spread, and soon reached the Russian ship. This dreadful spectacle suspended the action between the two fleets, until both ships blew up. Only twenty-four Russians were saved, among whom were the admiral, his son, and count Theodore Orlov; the ship carried 90 brass guns, and had on board a chest containing 600,000 rubles (112,500*l.* sterling.)

Although each fleet was equally affected by this event, yet it infused a panic among the Turks, which the Russians did not partake of. During the remainder of the day the Turks maintained the action; but on the approach of night, the captain pacha, contrary to the advice of his officers, gave orders for each ship to cut its cables, and run into a bay on the coast of Natolia, near a small town anciently called Cysus, but now known by the name of Chisme. Hussein Bey, who had raised himself by his talents for war to be second in command, saved his ship by bravely forcing his way through the enemy's fleet. Here the Russian fleet soon after blocked them up, and began a furious cannonade; which being found ineffectual, a fire-ship was sent in at midnight, on the 7th of July, which, by the intrepid behaviour of lieutenant Dugdale, grappled a Turkish man-of-war, and the wind at that moment being very high, the whole Ottoman fleet was consumed, except one man-of-war and a few galleys which were towed off by the Russians. The Russians the next morning entered the harbour, and bombarded the town and a castle that protected it; and a shot happening to blow up the powder magazine, both were reduced to a heap of rubbish. Thus, through the fatal misconduct of a commander, there was scarce a vestige left, in a few hours, of a town, a castle, and a fine fleet, which had all been in existence the day before. It is somewhat remarkable, that this place was rendered famous by a great victory which the Romans gained there over the fleet of Antiochus, in the year before Christ 191.

The Turkish fleet consisted of fifty ships of the line, from sixty to ninety guns, beside a number of xebecs and galleys, amounting in the whole to near thirty sail. The Russians had only ten ships of the line, and five frigates. The Turkish fleet being thus inferior, it might have been expected that the Russian admiral would have shaken the Ottoman empire to its very foundations; that he would have put it to the proof how far the Dardanelles were effectual for the defence of the Hellespont. Had he proved successful against those celebrated barriers, Constantinople itself, the seat of empire, must have fallen into his hands. It seems evident that the views of Russia did not extend to the effecting such a purpose; her fleet, during the remainder of the war, was only employed in making descents on the Turkish islands, and with little or no success.

In that space of time the great Russian army having passed the Danube, found its progress in Bulgaria stopped by the range of mountains which intersects that country, whilst it was continually harassed by detachments from the Turkish camp. The expenses of the war were severely felt by each empire, and although that of Russia had gained the ascendancy, no beneficial consequences had been realized. In this state of affairs, the grand seignor Mustafa III., emperor of the Turks, died, January 21, 1774, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and seventeenth of his reign; he appointed his brother Abdulhamet to succeed him in the throne. The war was continued with spirit; but a large Turkish army, commanded by the reis effendi, being most disgracefully defeated by general Kamenskii, the Porte, no longer able to maintain the war, was compelled to receive terms from the conqueror. A peace was signed on the 21st of July, 1774, at Kainardgiac, to ratify which the mufti issued his fetva, or ordinance, in which, to the great degradation of Ottoman pride, it was said, that, "seeing our troops will no longer fight the Russians, it is necessary to conclude a peace."

The treaty of peace consisted of twenty-eight articles, by which, among other advantages, the Russians obtained a free navigation in all the Turkish seas, together with the passage through the Dardanelles. Russian consuls were likewise to reside in the Turkish sea-ports.

Although peace was, upon these conditions, restored, yet it soon became apparent that the latent ambition of Catherine caused her to meditate the utter subversion of the Turkish empire, and to indulge in the hope that she herself should effect it. To bring forward this grand design she made a progress from Moscow to the Crimea, with all the pageantry of imperial state. Whilst on this journey she received a visit from the emperor of Germany, Joseph II., and, as the visits of potentates are generally fatal to the peace of the world, there was good ground to suppose that this was portentous to the Ottoman empire, and had for its chief objects to settle the mode of attacking it, and how it should be divided when conquered. The Porte took the alarm, and determined not to await the maturation of its enemy's councils and force, published a manifesto, dated the 7th of August, 1787, and commenced hostilities against the empress of Russia. The emperor of Germany, soon after, led a formidable army against the Turkish fastnesses on the frontiers of Hungary, not doubting but that everything would fall before him with the rapidity which Caesar exulted in; but his progress was opposed, and his measures frustrated by the surprising valour and conduct of the Turks.

The war with Russia was chiefly maritime, and the seat of it the Black Sea; but here neither success nor glory accrued to the Turkish arms. The Russians became masters of Ocsakow, and in every conflict at sea were decisively superior.

This unequal war was not looked upon with indifference by some other of the great powers of Europe. The subjugation of the Turkish empire, and the vast increase of power which Russia would acquire, by possessing the most valuable, because the most commercial parts of it, were considered as revolutions in which the other powers of Europe were deeply interested. In consequence of which a close alliance was formed between Great Britain and Prussia, having for its chief object, the rescuing the Turks from that destruction which hung over them, by restoring peace to that part of Europe. The losses and disgraces which the emperor sustained, and the death of Laudohn, the only general who had effected any thing, rendered that prince anxious to terminate the war; and the empress of Russia, through the mediation of the British court, at length acceded to terms of peace, by the conditions of which very important towns and districts were added to her dominions; which, however, her arms had previously obtained.

Buonaparte's campaign in Egypt finally raised the indignation of the Porte, which, on the 1st of September, 1798, declared war for the first time against France. By its alliance with Russia, in December, 1798, and with England and Naples, in January, 1799, it now fell under the direction of the cabinets of St. Petersburg and St. James's. A Russian fleet sailed through the Dardanelles, and a Turkish squadron, in co-operation with it, conquered the Ionian Islands. Paul I. and Selim III., by a treaty at Constantinople, formed the republic of the Seven Islands, which, as well as Ragusa, was to be under the protection of the Porte. In the following year, this country restored Egypt to the Porte; but the Mameluke beys and the Arnaouts filled the land with tumult and bloodshed, until, on the 1st of March, 1811, the new governor, Mehemed Ali Pacha, entirely exterminated the Mamelukes by treachery. Since then he has ruled over Egypt almost independently.

had, however, made Selim and some of the chiefs of the empire sensible that, if the Porte would maintain its power, it must introduce into its armies the modern tactics, and give to the divan a form more suited to the times. The Nizari Dshaid laboured, therefore, to form a Turkish army on the European model, which should supersede the janizaries. But after the peace with France, in 1801, there were in the divan two parties, a Russian and British, and a French. The superiority of Russia pressed upon the Porte in the Ionian Islands and in Servia; it was accordingly inclined to favour France. When, therefore, Russia, in 1806, occupied Moldavia and Wallachia, the old hostility broke out anew, and (Dec. 30th, 1806) the Porte, at the instigation of France, declared war against Russia, which was already engaged with Persia and France. The weakness of the Ottoman empire was now evident. An English fleet forced the passage of the Dardanelles, and, on the 20th of February, 1807, appeared before Constantinople; but the French general Sebastiani directed, with success, the resistance of the divan and of the enraged people. On the other hand, the Russians made rapid advances. The people murmured; and Selim III., on the 29th of May, 1807, was deposed by the mufti, and Mustapha IV. was obliged to put a stop to the hated innovations. But, after the Turkish fleet had been entirely beaten by the Russians at Lemnos, Selim's friend, Mustapha Bairaktar, the brave pacha of Ruschuk, took advantage of the terror of the capital, to seize it. But the unhappy Selim lost his life; and Bairaktar, in the place of the deposed Mustapha IV., raised to the throne the sultan Mahmoud II. As grand-vizier of Mahmoud, he restored the new military system, and concluded a truce with Russia; but the fury of the janizaries again broke out, and destroyed him in the latter end of 1808.

Mahmoud now alone supported the throne: for he was, since the death of Mustapha IV., the only prince of the family of Osman, and he soon displayed an extraordinary degree of courage and prudence. One of his first acts was to conclude peace with Great Britain, in 1809; he then continued, with redoubled vigour, the war against the Russians, who already threatened the passages of the Balkan. Twice the Russians were obliged to retreat beyond the Danube; nevertheless, their policy conquered the French party in the divan. In vain did the French emperor, in his treaty with Austria, March 14, 1812, declare that he would maintain the integrity of the Turkish territory. Notwithstanding this, before the French army had passed the Niemen, the sultan bought peace with Russia, at Bucharest, by ceding that part of Moldavia and Bessarabia which lies beyond the Pruth, with the northern fortresses on the Dniester and at the mouths of the Danube, and the southern gates of the Caucasus on the Kur.

The Servians, left to themselves, again became subjected to Turkey. They retained, however, by their treaty with the Porte, in November, 1815, the administration of the government.

In 1817, Mahmoud was obliged to give up the principal mouth of the Danube to Russia. But the Greek insurrection again disturbed the relations of the two powers, and has produced important changes in the situation of the Porte. The Porte believed that Russia secretly favoured the insurrection, and therefore seized Moldavia and Wallachia, and restricted its marine commerce. Both were open violations of the peace of Bucharest. After an interchange of notes, the Russian ambassador left Constantinople. The mediation of the English and Austrian courts, together with the emperor Alexander's desire for peace, prevented the outbreak of a war; but the divan, under various pretexts, refused all satisfaction to the Russian cabinet, until, at last, the emperor Nicholas declared the Russian ultimatum; upon which the Porte, in 1826, granted all the demands of the Russian court, and promised that in Moldavia and Wallachia (where, in three years, it had raised 37,000,000 of piastres, which were employed in the war against the Greeks) everything should be replaced on its former footing, and sent commissioners to Ackerman. Here a final term was again fixed for the decision of the divan, and on the 6th of October, 1826, eighty-two articles of the Russian ultimatum were accepted. The Porte surrendered to the Russians all the fortresses in Asia which it had hitherto held back, and acknowledged the privileges granted by Russia to Servia, Moldavia, and Wallachia. The treaty was executed in 1827.

In the meanwhile the Porte had begun its internal reform, and it was utterly resolved to exterminate the janizaries, who burnt the suburb of Galata, between the 3rd and the 5th of January, 1826. An army was formed upon the European system, and in June, 1826, the janizaries were destroyed, after a bloody struggle. The violence employed in the execution of this and other measures, caused an insurrection, in which 6000 houses were burnt in Constantinople. Instead of military insubordination, the most rigid military despotism began, which did not spare even the ulema. At the same time, the Porte, in June, 1827, firmly refused the offered mediation of Russia, England, and France, in its war with the Greeks; and the grand seignior called all his subjects (Christians included) to arms, to fight, if necessary, against all Europe.

Our limits compel us to bring this sketch somewhat abruptly to a close. But for the more recent events connected with the Ottoman empire, in respect to its foreign relations, we refer the reader to the latter portions of our histories of Greece, Russia, and England.

The Rise, Progress, and Establishment of MAHOMETANISM.

A subject so curious and important as the religion established by Mahomet, which has been professed for more than eleven centuries by many millions of the human race, and which at present prevails from the Ganges to Morocco, exclusive of a vast number of very populous islands, and every country where the tribes of Malays settle, in one direction, and from the southern extremity of Arabia to the borders of Hungary, in another, deserves to be particularly noticed in this place.

Mahomet, or more properly Mohammed, the founder of this singular and spreading faith, was born in the year 569 of the Christian era; he sprang from the tribe of Koraisch, and the family of Hashem; his grandfather, uncles, and lineal ancestors were princes; his family possessed, by hereditary right, the custody of the Caaba at Mecca, which was a place of worship resorted to by the Arabians long before the time of Mahomet. Notwithstanding the respectability of his descent, being left an orphan when very young, and being in low circumstances, he was recommended to Khadijah, a noble rich widow, for her factor, he having been bred to merchandize; in which capacity he acquitted himself so well, that he gained the affections of his mistress, and, by marrying her, became as rich a merchant as any in Mecca; his kindness, attachment, and strict fidelity to his wife, who was much older than himself, are frequently alluded to by writers as proofs of a susceptible heart, and a generous and noble nature. His natural strength of mind, and intrepidity of spirit, prompted him to form great designs when his fortunes improved, although it is said that he was so illiterate as not to be capable of reading or writing. This want of learning was so far from proving an impediment to him in effecting his designs, that it very strongly promoted them; for the crafty Arab, who must unquestionably have merely affected this gross ignorance, insisted that the writings which he produced as revelations from God, were cleared of all imputation of being forgeries, for such elegance of style and excellence of doctrine could not originate from a man incapable alike of writing or reading; for this reason his followers, instead of being ashamed of their master's ignorance, glory in it, as an evident proof of his divine mission, and scruple not to call him, as he is called in the Koran itself, "the illiterate prophet." Sir William Jones relates a traditional story concerning the celebrated poet Lebid, who was contemporary with Mahomet, and an avowed enemy to his new doctrine at its first promulgation; who, to express his opposition to it, hung a poem on the gate of the temple, as was then customary to be done, which poem contained a strong implied contempt of the new religion. This piece appeared so sublime that none of the poets chose to attempt an answer to it; till Mahomel, who was likewise a poet, having composed a chapter of the Koran, placed the exordium of it by the side of Lebid's poem; who no sooner read it, than he declared it to be something divine, confessed his own inferiority, tore his verses from the gate, embraced the religion he had stigmatized, and became afterwards essentially serviceable in replying to the satires of Amralkela, who was unwearied in his attacks upon the doctrine of Mohammed.

The state of the world at that time was highly favourable to the introduction of a new religion: it had been the will of Heaven to permit the purity and simplicity of the doctrines of Christ to be contaminated and perverted by the artful wiles of priestcraft, which caused the grossest impostions to be practised upon an ignorant laity; pomp, splendour, and unintelligible worship, were substituted for the devotion of the heart, whilst the prayers offered up to imaginary and fictitious saints had effaced all just notions of the attributes of the Deity. Mohammed had made two journeys into Syria, where he had informed himself of the principles of Judaism, and the jargon which bore the name of Christianity: it is probable, indeed, that his mind was naturally prone to religious enthusiasm, and that he was a devotee before he became an impostor. His first design seems to have extended no farther than to bring the wild, intractable, and ardent Arabs to acknowledge one God and one king; and it is probable that for a considerable time his ambition extended no farther than to become the spiritual and temporal sovereign of Arabia. He began his eventful project by accusing both Jews and Christians of corrupting the revelations which had been made to them from heaven, and maintained that both Moses and Jesus Christ had prophetically foretold the coming of a prophet from God, which was accomplished in himself, the last and greatest of the prophets; thus initiated, he proceeded to deliver detached sentences, as he pretended to receive them from the Almighty, by the hand of the angel Gabriel. These pretensions to a divine mission drew on him a requisition from the inhabitants of Mecca that he would convince them by working a miracle; but he replied, "God refuses those signs and wonders that would depreciate the merit of faith, and aggravate the guilt of infidelity." The unity of God was the grand and leading article in the creed he taught, to which was closely joined his own divine mission: Allah il allah, Mahamed resoul Allah, is their preface to every act of devotion, and the sentence continually in their mouths: which is, "there is but one God, and Mohammed is his prophet."

The Arabians tribes, who occupied the country from Mecca to the Euphrates, were at that time known by the name of Saracens; their religion was chiefly gross idolatry, Sabianism having spread almost over the whole nation, though there were likewise great numbers of Christians, Jews, and Magians, interspersed in those parts. The essence of that worship principally consisted in adoring the planets and fixed stars; angels and images they honoured as inferior deities, whose intercessions with the Almighty in their favour they implored; they believed in one God; in the future punishment of the wicked, for a long series of years, though not for ever; and constantly prayed three times a day; namely, at sunrise, at its declination, and at sunset; they fasted three times a year; during thirty days, nine days, and seven days; they offered many sacrifices, but ate no part of them, the whole being burnt; they likewise turned their faces, when praying, to a particular part of the horizon; they performed pilgrimages to the city of Harrah in Mesopotamia, and had a great respect for the temple of Mecca and the pyramids of Egypt, imagining the latter to be the sepulchres of Seth, also of Enos and Sahl, his two sons, whom they considered as the founders of their religion. Besides the book of Psalms, they had other books which they esteemed equally sacred, particularly one, in the Chaldee tongue, which they called "the book of Seth." They have been called "Christians of St. John the Baptist," whose disciples also they pretend to be, using a kind of baptism, which is the greatest mark they bear of Christianity: circumcision was practised by the Arabs, although Sale is silent on that practice, when describing the religion of the Sabians; they likewise abstained from swine's flesh. So that in this sect we may trace the essential articles of the creed of Musulmans.

Mahomet was in the 40th year of his age when he assumed the character of a prophet; he had been accustomed for several years, during the month of Ramadan, to withdraw from the world, and to secrete himself in a cave, three miles distant from Mecca: "conversation," says Mr. Gibbon, "enriches the understanding, but solitude is the school of genius." During the first three years, he made only fourteen proselytes, among which were his wife Khadijah; his servant, or rather slave, Zeid Ali, who afterwards married the prophet's favourite daughter Fatima, and was surnamed "the lion of God;" Abubekar, a man distinguished for his merit and his wealth; the rest consisted of respectable citizens of Mecca. The Koreishites, although the tribe from which he sprung, were the most violent opposers of the new religion. In the tenth year of his prophetic office his wife died; and the next year, his enemies having formed a design to cut him off, and he being seasonably apprised, fled by night to Medina on the 16th of July, 622, from which event the Hegira commenced: he was accompanied only by two or three followers, but he made a public entry into that city, and soon gained many proselytes, on which he assumed the regal and sacerdotal characters. As he increased in power, that moderation and humility, which had before distinguished his conduct, were gradually erased, and he became fierce and sanguinary; he began to avow a design of propagating his religion by the sword, to destroy the monuments of idolatry, and, without regarding the sanctity of days or months, to pursue the unbelieving nations of the earth. The Koran inculcates, in the most absolute sense, the tenets of faith and predestination. The first companions of Mahomet advanced to battle with a fearless confidence, their leader having fully possessed their minds with the assurance that paradise awaited those who died fighting for the cause of their prophet, the gratifications of which were held out to be such as best suited the amorous complexions of the Arabians: fountains of black-eyed girls, resplendent in beauty, blooming youth and virgin purity; every moment of pleasure was there to be prolonged to a thousand years, and the powers of the man were to be increased an hundred-fold to render him capable of such felicity; to those who survived, rich spoils and the possessions of their female captives were to crown their conquests. Mahomet was present at nine battles or sieges; and fifty enterprises of war were achieved in ten years by himself or his lieutenants. Seven years after his flight from Mecca he returned to that city, where he was publicly recognized as a prince and prophet; the idolatrous worship of the Caaba was immediately abolished, and succeeded by the simplicity of the Mahometan establishment. This Arab lawgiver retained both his mental and bodily powers unimpaired till he reached his 60th year, when his health began to decline, and he himself suspected that a slow poison had been administered to him by a Jewess, under the effects of which he languished; but his death was caused by a fever, in the 63d year of his age, the 63d of the Christian era, and 10th of the Hegira. There are some particulars told respecting Mahomet, which have gained general belief, although void of all foundation: such is the story of the tame pigeon, which the people were taught to believe imparted religious truths to the ear of the prophet; the epileptic fits, which have been said to cause him to fall down as in a trance, he is not supposed to have been subject to; and the suspension of his iron coffin at Mecca is a most absurd falsehood, it being well known that he was buried at Medina, in a stone coffin.

Of the chapters of the Koran, which are 114 in number, the Sieur du Ryer makes ninety-four to have been received at Mecca, and twenty at Medina; but, according to Mr. Sale, a much better authority, the commentators on the Koran have not fixed the place where about twenty of these revelations were imparted; so that no inference can be drawn how far the prophet had proceeded in his pretended inspirations when he fled from Mecca; neither does the order in which they stand point out the time when they were written, for the 74th chapter is supposed to have been the first revealed, and the 68th to have immediately followed it.

MEMBERS OF THE ULAMA ARE HELD SACRED: THEY PAY NO TAXES, AND THEIR PROPERTY IS HEREDITARY IN THEIR FAMILIES.

Another foul taint in this religion is, the abhorrence which it creates against all those who do not embrace the same doctrines; and also, the direct tendency of the faith to consign the human mind to a state of arrogant and incurable ignorance by considering the Koran as comprising every thing worthy of being known. The Arabs, from the genial influence of their climate, as well as from habits transmitted through so many generations as to be formed into innate principles, were libidinous beyond most of their species, and no individual among them felt that propensity stronger than their prophet; neither policy nor inclination therefore prompted him to bring his disciples under severe restraints with respect to women: he ought not, however, at eleven or twelve, and sometimes at fourteen or fifteen years of age, when they are able to make a profession of their faith. When any renegade Christian is circumcised, two basins are usually carried after him, to gather the alms which the spectators freely give. Those who are uncircumcised, whether Turkish children or Christians, are not allowed to be present at their public prayers; and if they are taken in their mosques, they are liable to be impaled or burnt.

The fast of Ramadan is observed by the Turks exactly in the same manner as by the Persians. The feast of Bairam begins with the next new moon after that fast, and is published by firing of guns, bonfires, and other rejoicings. At this feast the houses and shops are adorned with their finest hangings, tapestries, and sofas. In the streets are swings ornamented with festoons, in which the people sit, and are tossed in the air, while they are at the same time entertained with vocal and instrumental music performed by persons hired by the masters of the swings. They have also fireworks; and, during the three days of this festival, many women, who are in a manner confined the rest of the year, have liberty to walk abroad. At this time they forgive their enemies, and become reconciled to them; for they think they have made a bad bairam, if they harbour the least malice in their hearts against any person whatsoever. This is termed the Great Bairam, to distinguish it from the Little Bairam, which they keep seventy days after. They have also several other festivals, on all which the steeples of the mosques are adorned with lamps placed in various figures.

They regularly pray three times a day, and are obliged to wash before their prayers, as well as before they presume to touch the Koran. As they make great use of their fingers in eating, they are required to wash after every meal, and the more cleanly among them do it before meals. After every kind of defilement, in fact, ablution is enjoined.

By the Mahometan law a man may divorce his wife twice, and if he afterwards repents, he may lawfully take her again; but Mahomet, to prevent his followers from divorcing their wives upon every slight occasion, or merely from an inconstant humour, ordained, that if any man divorces his wife a third time, it is not lawful for him to take her again, till she has been married and bedded by another, and divorced from that husband. The Koran allows no man to have more than four wives and concubines, but the prophet and his successors are laid under no restriction.

Church government, by the institutions of Mahomet, appears to have centered in the mufti, and the order of the moulahs, from which the mufti must be chosen. The moulahs have been looked upon as ecclesiastics, and the mufti as their head;

but the Turks consider the first rather as expounders of the law, and the latter as the great law officer. Those who really act as divines are the imams, or parish priests, who officiate in, and are set aside for the service of the mosques. No church revenues are appropriated to the particular use of the moulahs; the imams are the ecclesiastics in immediate pay. Their sheikhs are the chiefs of their derwishes, (dervishes) or monks, and form religious communities, or orders, established on solemn vows; they consecrate themselves merely to religious offices, domestic devotion, and public prayer and preaching; there are four of these orders, the Bektoah, Mevlevi, Kadri, and Seyah, who are very numerous throughout the empire. The monks of the first of these orders are permitted to marry, but are obliged to travel through the empire. The Mevlevi, in their acts of devotion, turn round with velocity for two or three hours incessantly. They are passionately fond of music, particularly a flute formed of an Indian reed; they live in their monastery; profess poverty and humility; entertain kindly all strangers, of whatever religion, who visit them; and receive alms. They sometimes even offer to wash the feet of a Mussulman. The Kadri express their devotion by lacerating their bodies; they walk the streets almost naked, with distracted and wild looks; they hold their hands joined together, as if in the act of prayer, except when they perform their religious dances, which they continue many hours, and sometimes the whole day, repeating incessantly, Hu! hu! hu! one of their names of the deity; until at last, as if they were in a violent rage or phrensy, they fall to the ground, foaming at the mouth, and every part of their body bathed in sweat. The Seyahs, like the Indian fakiers, are little better than mere vagabonds.

The Turks appropriate to themselves the name of Moslemism, which has been corrupted into Mussulman, signifying persons professing the doctrine of Mahomet. They also term themselves Sunnites, or observers of the oral traditions of Mahomet and his three successors; and likewise call themselves True Believers, in opposition to the Persians and others, the adherents of Ali, whom they call a wicked and abominable sect. Their rule of faith and practice is the Koran. Some externals of their religion, besides the prescribed ablutions, are prayers, which are to be said five times every twenty-four hours, with the face turned towards Mecca; and alms, which are both enjoined and voluntary; the former consists of paying two and a half per cent. to charitable uses out of their whole income. Their feasts have been already spoken of; and every Mahometan must, at least, once in his life-time, go in pilgrimage, either personally or by proxy, to the Caaba, or house of God at Mecca.

THE MONTH OF RAMADAN IS OBSERVED AS A FAST, DURING WHICH, FROM DAWN TILL SUNSET, THE TURKS NEITHER EAT NOR SMOKE.

THE HISTORY OF INDIA.

As the Hindûs (or Hindoos) never had any historical writings, all the information to be obtained respecting the original inhabitants of India is gleaned from popular poems or the accounts of foreigners. How vague and unsatisfactory such accounts always are, and how mixed with fabulous invention, the result of all researches in such labyrinths most abundantly proves: we shall, therefore, make but a brief analysis of it.

Under the name of India the ancients included no more than the peninsula on this side the Ganges, and the peninsula beyond it, having little or no knowledge of the countries which lie farther eastward. By whom these countries were originally peopled is a question which has given rise to much speculation, but which, in all probability, will never be solved. Certain it is, that some works in these parts discover marks of astonishing skill and power in the inhabitants; such as the images in the island of Elephanta, the observatory at Benares, and many others. These stupendous works are, by Bryant, attributed to the Cushites or Babylonians; and it is possible that the subjects of Nimrod, the beginning of whose kingdom was in Shinar, might extend themselves in this direction, and thus fill the fertile regions of the east with inhabitants, before they migrated to the less mild and rich countries to the westward. Thus would be formed for a time that great division betwixt the inhabitants of India and other countries; so that the western nations knew not even of the existence of India, but by obscure report; while the inhabitants of the latter, ignorant of their own origin, invented a thousand idle tales concerning the antiquity of their tribes.

According to Hindû tradition, then, and the popular legends of their bards, their country was at first divided between two principal families; called in oriental phraseology, "the families of the sun and moon." These were both said to be descended from Brahma originally, through the patriarchs Daksha and Atri, his sons. Vaiswaat, (the sun,) had Daksha for his father; and So-ma, (the moon,) sprung from Atri.

The first prince of the family of the sun was named Ikshwaku, who was succeeded by his grandson, named Kakutszha. But the most celebrated prince was Rama, the son of Dasaratha, who was banished to the forests by his father for fourteen years, and was accompanied there by Sita, his wife.

Sita having been carried off by Ravann, (or the giant with ten heads), who was king of Lanka, or Ceylon, Rama, assisted by Sugriva and Hanuman, (who are described as monkeys), pursued him to his capital, took it, put him to death, and placed his brother Vibhishna on the throne. The traditions of the south of India add, that upon Rama's victory, colonists came from Ayodhya, or Oude, cleared and tilled the ground, and introduced the arts of civilized life. Rama returned to Ayodhya, over which he ruled for many years; and was succeeded by his son Kusa, whose posterity inherited the throne after him.

Pururava, the son of Budha, the son of the moon, was the first prince of the lunar dynasty. His capital was Pratishtana, at the confluence of the Ganges and Jumna. To him is attributed the discovery of the art of kindling fire. His eldest son, Ayus, succeeded him.

Ayus had two sons, Nahusha, who succeeded him; and Kshetraviddha, who established a separate principality at Kasi, or Benares. Nahusha's successor was Yayati, who had five sons, the youngest of whom, Puru, he named as his successor. To the other four, whose names were Iadu, Turvasu, Druhya, and Anu, he gave the vicereignty, under Puru, of certain provinces of the paternal kingdom.

One of the descendants of Druhya was Gandhar, from whom the province now called Candahar, received its name. The posterity of Anu established themselves from the south of the province of Belhar to the upper part of the Coromandel coast. In fact, it appears that the descendants of Yayati colonized and introduced civilization throughout the greater part of southern and western India.

Among the descendants of Puru there were several celebrated princes; one of whom, named Bharata, the son of Dushyanta, ruled over a very extensive territory, so that India has been sometimes called after his name, Bharata Varsa, the country of Bharata. The most material facts that we next notice in these annals are, that some centuries after this, Hasti, a descendant of Puru, removed the capital further north, on the banks of the Ganges; which city was called after him, Hastinapur: also that, four descents after Hasti, the sovereignty of Hastinapur was Kuru, from whom the country to the north-west was called Kurukshetra, a name it still retains.

From what we have already produced as a specimen of the Hindû annals,—which we have endeavoured to give as free from mythological distortions as possible,—it will be admitted that a further analysis of them, unless we had space sufficient to make suitable comments as we proceeded, would be both uninteresting and an unprofitable occupation of time.

"The whole course of the political history of ancient India," as Professor Wilson observes, "shows it to have been a country divided amongst numerous petty rajahs, constantly at variance with one another, and incapable of securing their subjects from the inroads of their neighbours, or the invasions of foreign enemies."

"The early religion of the Hindûs, as represented in the Vedas, seems to have been little more than the adoration of fire and the elements. The attributes of a Supreme Being, as creator, preserver, and destroyer, were afterwards personified, and worshipped as the deities Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. Philosophical notions of matter and spirit were next embodied; and celebrated individuals, like the demigods of Greece, added to the Pantheon: other modifications, some as recent as four or five centuries, were subsequently introduced."

"The division of the Hindûs into castes is a peculiarity in their social condition, which early attracted notice; but such an arrangement was not uncommon in antiquity, and it prevailed in Persia and Egypt. In these countries it gradually ceased; but in India it has been carried far beyond the extent contemplated in the original system."

"The original distinction was into Brahman, religious teacher; Kshatriya, warrior; Vaisya, agriculturist and trader; and Sudra, servile: but from the intermixture of these and their descendants, arose numerous other tribes or castes, of which the Hindûs now chiefly consist; the Brahman being the only one of the four original divisions remaining."

The first among the western nations who distinguished themselves by their application to navigation and commerce, and who were of consequence likely to discover these distant nations, were the Egyptians and Phœnicians. The former, however, soon lost their inclination for naval affairs, and held all sea-faring people in detestation; though to the extensive conquests of Sesostris, if we can believe them, must this feeling in a great measure be attributed. He is said to have fitted out a fleet of 400 sail in the Arabian Gulf or Red Sea, which conquered all the countries lying along the Erythrean Sea to India; while the army, led by himself, marched through Asia, and subdued all the countries to the Ganges; after which he crossed that river, and advanced to the Eastern ocean. Strabo rejected the account altogether, and ranks the exploits of Sesostris in India with the fabulous ones of Bæuchus and Hercules.

Soon after the destruction of the Babylonian monarchy by the Persians, we find Darius Hystaspes undertaking an expedition against the Indians. Herodotus informs us, that he sent Scylax of Caryandra to explore the river Indus; who sailed from Caspatyrus, a town at its source, and near the territories of Pactya, eastward to the sea; thence, turning westward, he arrived at the place where the Phœnicians had formerly sailed round Africa, after which Darius subdued the Indians, and became master of that coast. His conquests, however, were not extensive, as they did not reach beyond the territory watered by the Indus; yet the acquisition was very important, as the revenue derived from the conquered territory, according to Herodotus, was near a third of that of the whole Persian empire.

According to major Rennel, the space of country through which Alexander sailed on the Indus was not less than 1000 miles; and as, during the whole of that navigation, he obliged the nations on both sides of the river to submit to him, we may be certain that the country on each side was explored to some distance. An exact account, not only of his military operations, but of every thing worthy of notice relating to the countries through which he passed, was preserved in the journals of his three officers, Lagos, Nearchus, and Aristobulus; and these journals Arrian followed in the composition of his history. From these authors we learn, that, in the time of Alexander, the western part of India was possessed by seven very powerful monarchs. The territory of Porus, which Alexander first conquered and then restored to him, is said to have contained no fewer than 2,000 towns; and the king of the Prasii had assembled an army of 20,000 cavalry, 2,000 armed chariots, and a great number of elephants, to oppose the Macedonian monarch on the banks of the Ganges.

The country on each side the Indus was found, in the time of Alexander, to be in no degree inferior in population to the kingdom of Porus. The climate, soil, and productions of India, as well as the manners and customs of the inhabitants, are exactly described, and the descriptions found to correspond in a surprising manner with modern accounts. The stated change of seasons, now known by the name of monsoons, the periodical rains, the swellings and inundations of the rivers, with the appearance of the country during the time they continue, are particularly mentioned. The descriptions of the inhabitants are equally particular; their living entirely upon vegetables; their division into tribes or castes, with many of the particularities of the modern Hindoos. The military operations, however, extended but a very little way into India properly so called; no further indeed than the modern province of Lahore, and the countries on the banks of the Indus, from Multan to the sea.

On the death of Alexander, the eastern part of his dominions devolved first on Pytho, the son of Agenor, and afterwards on Seleucus. The latter was sensible of the advantages of keeping India in subjection. With this view he undertook an expedition into that country, partly to confirm his authority, and partly to defend the Macedonian territories against Sandracottus, king of the Prasii. The particulars of his expedition are very little known; Justin being the only author who mentions them. Plutarch tells us that Seleucus carried his arms farther into India than Alexander; and Pliny, whose authority is of considerably greater weight than either, in this instance, corroborates the testimony of Plutarch.

The career of Seleucus in the east was stopped by Antigonus, who prepared to invade the western part of his dominions. The former was, therefore, obliged to conclude a treaty with Sandracottus; but Dr. Robertson is of opinion, that during the lifetime of Seleucus, which continued forty-two years after the death of Alexander, no diminution of the Macedonian territories took place. With a view of keeping up a friendly intercourse with the Indian prince, Seleucus sent Megasthenes, one of Alexander's officers, to Palibothra, capital of the kingdom of the Prasii, on the banks of the Ganges. This city is by Dr. Robertson thought to be the modern Allahabad, but major Rennel supposes it to be Patna. As Megasthenes resided in this city for a considerable time, he made many observations relative to India in general, which he afterwards published. He mingled with his relations the most extravagant fables; such as accounts of men with ears so large that they could wrap themselves up in them; of tribes with one eye, without mouths or noses, &c., if the extracts from this book, given by Arrian, Diodorus, and other ancient writers, can be credited. After the embassy of Megasthenes to Sandracottus, and that of his son Damaichus to Allitrochidas, the successor of Sandracottus, we hear no more of the affairs of India with regard to the Macedonians, until the time of Antiochus the Great, who made a short incursion into India, about 197 years after the death of Seleucus. All that we know of this expedition is, that the Syrian monarch, after finishing a war he carried on against the two revolted provinces of Parthia and Bactria, obliged Sophaganeus, king of the country which he invaded, to pay a sum of money, and give him a number of elephants. It is probable that the successors of Antiochus were obliged, soon after his death, to abandon all their Indian territories.

After the loss of India by the Syrians, an intercourse was kept up for some time betwixt it and the Greek kingdom of Bactria. This last became an independent state about sixty-nine years after the death of Alexander; and, according to the few hints we have concerning it in ancient authors, carried on a great traffic with India. Nay, the Bactrian monarchs are said to have conquered more extensive tracts in that region than Alexander himself had done. Six princes reigned over this new kingdom in succession; some of whom, elated with the conquests they had made, assumed the title of the great king, by which the Persian monarchs were distinguished in their highest splendour. Strabo informs us, that the Bactrian princes were deprived of their territories by the Scythian nomades, known by the names of Asi, Pasiani, Tachari, and Scauraul. This is confirmed by the testimony of the Chinese historians, quoted by M. de Guignes. According to them, about 126 years before the Christian era, a powerful horde of Tartars, pushed from their native seats on the confines of China, and obliged to move farther to the west, poured in upon Bactria like an irresistible torrent, overwhelmed that kingdom, and put an end to the dominion of the Greeks, after it had lasted nearly 120 years.

From this time to the close of the fifteenth century, all thoughts of establishing any dominion in India were totally abandoned by the Europeans. The only object now was to promote a commercial intercourse with that country; and Egypt was the medium by which that intercourse was to be promoted. Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, first raised the power and splendour of Alexandria, by carrying on a trade with India. His son Ptolemy Philadelphus prosecuted the same plan very vigorously. In his time the Indian commerce once more began to centre in Tyre; but, to remove it effectually thence, he attempted to form a canal between Arsinoe on the Red Sea, near the place where Suez now stands, and the Pelusiac, or eastern branch of the Nile. This canal was about 100 cubits broad, and thirty deep; so that by means of it the productions of India might have been conveyed to Alexandria entirely by water.

On the conquest of Egypt by the Romans, the Indian commodities continued, as usual, to be imported to Alexandria in Egypt, and from thence to Rome; but the most ancient communication betwixt the east and west parts of Asia seems never to have been entirely given up. Syria and Palestine are separated from Mesopotamia by a desert; but the passage through it was much facilitated by its affording a station which abounded in water. Hence the possession of this station became an object of such consequence, that Solomon built upon it the city called in Syrian Tadmor, and in Greek Palmyra. Both these names are expressive of its situation in a spot adorned with palm trees. Though its situation for trade may to us seem very unfavourable, being sixty miles from the Euphrates, by which alone it could receive the Indian commodities, and 200 miles from the nearest coast of the Mediterranean; yet the value and small bulk of the goods in question, rendered the conveyance of them by a long carriage overland not only practicable, but lucrative and advantageous. Hence the inhabitants became opulent and powerful, and this place long maintained its independence after the Syrian empire became subject to Rome.

The excessive eagerness of the Romans for Asiatic luxuries of all kinds, kept up an unceasing intercourse with India during the whole time that the empire continued in its power; and, even after the destruction of the western part, it was kept up between Constantinople and those parts of India which had been visited formerly by merchants from the west. Long before this period, however, a much better method of sailing to India had been discovered by one Hippalus, the commander of an Indian ship, who lived about eighty years after Egypt had been annexed to the Roman empire. This man having observed the periodical shifting of the monsoons, and how steadily they blew from the east to west during some months, ventured to leave the coast, and sail boldly across the Indian Ocean, from the mouth of the Arabian Gulf to Musiris, a port on the Malabar coast; which discovery was reckoned a matter of such importance, that the name of Hippalus was given to the wind by which he performed the voyage. Pliny gives a very particular account of the manner in which the Indian traffic was now carried on, mentioning the particular stages and the distances between them.

While the Seleucids continued to enjoy the empire of Syria, the trade with India continued to be carried on by land. The Romans, having extended their dominions as far as the Euphrates, found this method of conveyance still established, and the trade was by them encouraged and protected. But the progress of the caravans being frequently interrupted by the Parthians, particularly when they travelled towards those countries where silk and other of the most valuable manufactures were procured, it became an object to the Romans to conciliate the friendship of the sovereigns of those distant countries.

Dr. Robertson takes notice, that, from the evidence of an Arabian merchant who wrote in 852, it appears, that not only the Sarcene, but the Chinese also, were destitute of the mariner's compass; contrary to a common opinion, that this instrument was known in the east long before its discovery in Europe. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, they penetrated far beyond Siam, which had set bounds to the navigation of Europeans. They became acquainted with Sumatra and other Indian islands; extending their navigation as far as Canton in China. A regular commerce was now carried on from the Persian Gulf to all the countries lying betwixt it and China, and even with China itself. Many Sarcene settled in India, properly so called, as well as in the countries beyond it. In the city of Canton they were so numerous that the emperor permitted them to have a court or judge of their own religion; the Arabian language was understood and spoken in every place of consequence; and ships from China even are said to have visited the Persian Gulf.

According to the Arabian accounts of those days, the peninsula of India was at that time divided into four kingdoms. The first was composed of the provinces situated on the Indus and its branches, the capital of which was Multan. The second had the city of Cenoje, which, from its remaining ruins, appears to have been a very large place. The Indian historians relate, that it contained 30,000 shops in which linen was sold, and 60,000 sets of musicians and singers who paid a tax to government. The third kingdom was that of Cachenire, first mentioned by Massoudi, who gives a short description of it. The fourth kingdom, Guzerat, is represented by the same author as the most powerful of the whole. Another Arab writer, who flourished about the middle of the fourteenth century, divides India into three parts; the northern comprehending all the provinces on the Indus; the middle extending from Guzerat to the Ganges; and the southern, which he denominates Comar, from Cape Comorin.

From the relation of the Arabian merchant above mentioned, explained by the commentary of another Arabian who had likewise visited the eastern parts of Asia, we learn many particulars concerning the inhabitants of these distant regions at that time, which correspond with what is observed among them at this day. They take notice of the general use of silk among the Chinese, and the manufacture of porcelain, which they compare to glass. They also describe the tea-plant, with the manner of using its leaves; whence it appears, that in the ninth century the use of this plant in China was as common as it is at present. They mention likewise the great progress which the Indians had made in astronomy; a circumstance which seems to have been unknown to the Greeks and Romans; they assert, that in this branch of science they were far superior to the most enlightened nations of the west, on which account their sovereign was called 'the king of wisdom.'

The superstitions, extravagant penances, &c., known to exist at this day among the Indians, are also mentioned by those writers; all which particulars manifest that the Arabians had a knowledge of India far superior to that of the Greeks or Romans.

The industry of the Mohammedans, in exploring the most distant regions of the east, was rivalled, however, by the Christians of Persia, who sent missionaries all over India and the countries adjoining, as far as China itself. But, while the western Asiatics thus kept up a constant intercourse with these parts, the Europeans had in a manner lost all knowledge of them. The port of Alexandria, from which they had formerly been supplied with the Indian goods, was now shut against them; and the Arabs, satisfied with supplying the demands of their own subjects, neglected to send any by the usual channels to the towns on the Mediterranean. The inhabitants of Constantinople and some other great towns were supplied with Chinese commodities by the most tedious and difficult passage imaginable.

In spite of every difficulty, however, this commerce flourished, and Constantinople became a considerable mart for East Indian commodities; and from it all the rest of Europe was chiefly supplied with them for more than two centuries. The perpetual hostilities in which the Christians and Mohammedans were during this period engaged, contributed still to increase the difficulty; but, the more it increased, the more desirous Europeans seemed to be of possessing the luxuries of Asia.

About this time the cities of Amalfi and Venice, with some others in Italy, having acquired a great degree of independence, began to exert themselves in promoting domestic manufactures, and importing the productions of India.

About the end of the tenth century, a considerable revolution took place in India, by the conquests of Mahmud Gazni, who erected the empire of Gazna. And it is at this period that the authentic history is generally reckoned to commence.

Mahmud's kingdom had arisen out of that of the Saracens, who had extended their conquests immensely, under the caliph Al-Walid, both to the east and west. He possessed great part of the ancient Bactria. Gazna, near the source of the Indus, and Balkh, were his chief cities. After conquering the rest of Bactria, he invaded Hindostan A. D. 1000, and reduced the province of Moultan, which was inhabited by the Kuttry and Rajpoot tribes (the Catheri and Melli of Alexander), who still retained their ancient bravery, and made a very formidable resistance. Mahmud being equally influenced by a love of conquest, and a superstitious zeal to exterminate the Hindoo religion, a league was at last formed against him among all the Indian princes, from the Ganges to the Nerbudda. Their allied troops were, however, defeated; and in 1008 the famous temple of Nagraout in the Punjab was destroyed. In 1011 Mahmud destroyed the city and temple of Tanafar, and reduced Delhi. In 1018 he took Canoge, and demolished the temples of that and several other cities; but failed in his attempts on Ajimere. In his twelfth expedition, in 1024, he reduced the whole peninsula of Guzerat, and destroyed the famous temple of Sunnaut, as well as those of all the other cities he conquered. At his death, in 1028, he possessed the east and largest part of Persia, with the Indian provinces from the west part of the Ganges to Guzerat, and those between the Indus and the mountains of Ajimere. But in 1158 this extensive empire began to fall to pieces. The west and largest part was seized by the Gauri, while the east contiguous to the Indus remained in the possession of Corree, whose capital was Lahore. In 1184 his sons were expelled by the Gauri, and in 1194 Mohammed Gori penetrated into Hindostan as far as Benares, committing as great devastation as Mahmud Gazni had done. He also reduced the south part of Ajimere, and the territory south of the Jumna, the fort of Gualior, &c. On his death, (1205,) the empire of Gazna was again divided, and the Patan or Afghan empire was founded by Cutrub, who had the Indian part, the Persian remaining to Eldoze. Cattub made Delhi his capital; and in 1210 his succesor, Altumish, reduced the greatest part of Hindostan Proper. One of his sons obtained the government of Bengal, and, from this period, one of the emperor's sons had always that government. During his reign, the bloody Jenghis Khan put an end to the other branch of the Gaznian empire, but Hindostan was left undisturbed.

From this period the most dreadful confusion and massacres followed almost to the time that the British government commenced. The empire being subdivided among a set of rapacious governors, the people were reduced to the greatest degree of misery. To add to their distress, the Moguls made such frequent and formidable invasions, that at last the emperor Feroze II. allowed them to settle in the country in 1292. The emperor was incited by Alla, governor of Gurrah, to attempt the conquest of the Deccan; and Alla being employed in that business, wherein he amassed an immense quantity of treasure, no sooner accomplished it, than he deposed and murdered Feroze, and assumed the sovereignty of Hindostan.

In 1306 the conquest of the Deccan was undertaken; and in 1310 Alla carried his army into Dowlatabad and the Carnatic. But all this usurper's expeditions and those of his general, Cafoor, seem to have been made more with a view of plunder than of permanent conquest.

Under Mohammed III. the inhabitants of the Deccan revolted, and drove the Mohammedans completely out of all their territories, except the city of Dowlatabad.

Feroze III., who succeeded Mohammed in 1351, was a wise prince, who preferred the improvement of his empire by the arts of peace, to the extension of it by war and conquest. In his reign, which lasted thirty-seven years, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, were encouraged. But upon his death in 1388, a civil war broke out, which continued five years, till Mahmud III. succeeded, in 1393. During this period Hindostan exhibited the uncommon phenomenon of two emperors residing in the same capital, yet at war with each other. In this unfortunate situation of affairs, Tamerlane, after subduing all the west of Tartary and Asia, turned his arms against Hindostan, and made an easy conquest of it. But the cruel monster, not contented with his victory, ordered a general massacre of the inhabitants, in consequence of which, it is said, that 100,000 of them were murdered in one hour. In January, 1399, he defeated the Indian army, with great slaughter, and soon after took Delhi, which then consisted of three cities, surrounded by walls.

Though no resistance was made, and of course there was no pretence for bloodshed, yet a quarrel was fomented within a few days by his Tartar soldiers, who pillaged the city, massacred most of the people, and sold the rest for slaves. The spoils, in plate and jewels, were immense. After this dreadful carnage, Tamerlane marched through the other provinces of Hindostan, defeating the Indians everywhere, and slaughtering the worshippers of fire. On the 25th of March this insatiable conqueror retired, leaving Mahmud in possession of the throne, and reserving only Punjab to himself.

The death of Mahmud III., in 1413, put an end to the Patan dynasty. He was succeeded by Chizer, a descendant of Mahomet, and his posterity continued to reign until 1460, when Alla II. abdicated the throne, and Belloli, an Afghan, took possession of it. Under him a prince who resided at Jionpour, became so formidable, that he left him only the shadow of authority. Belloli's son, however, recovered a great part of the empire, about 1501, when he made Agra his residence. In the reign of Ibrahim II. sultan Baber, a descendant of Tamerlane, conquered a considerable part of the empire. His first expedition was in 1518; and in 1525 he took Delhi. On the death of Baber, who reigned only five years, his son Humaloon was driven from the throne, and obliged to take shelter among the Rajpoot princes of Ajimere. The sovereignty was usurped by Sheer Khan, who in 1545 was killed at the siege of Chetitou. His territories extended from the Indus to Bengal; but the government was so unsettled, that no fewer than five sovereigns succeeded within nine years after his death. This induced a strong party to join in recalling Humaloon, who is said to have been a prince of great virtue and abilities; but he lived only one year after his return. Upon his death, in 1555, his son Ackbar, one of the greatest princes that ever reigned in Hindostan, succeeded. He was then only fourteen years of age; but, during his long reign of fifty-one years, he established the empire on a more sure foundation than it had probably ever been before.

We are now come to a period when the European powers began to be interested in the affairs of Hindostan. The Cape of Good Hope had been doubled in the reign of John II., king of Portugal. Emanuel, his successor, equipped four ships, for the discovery of the Indian coast, and gave the command to Vasco de Gama; who, having weathered several storms in his cruise along the eastern coast of Africa, landed in Hindostan, after a voyage of thirteen months.

This country, which has since been almost entirely reduced by war under a foreign yoke, was, at the time of the arrival of the Portuguese, divided between the kings of Cambaya, Delhi, Bisanagur, Narsingia, and Calicut, each of which reckoned several sovereigns among their tributaries. The last of these monarchs, who is better known by the name of zamorin, which signifies emperor, possessed the most maritime states, and his empire extended over all Malabar.

Vasco de Gama having informed himself of these particulars when he touched at Melinda, hired an able pilot to conduct him to that port, in which trade was the most flourishing. Here he fortunately met with a Moor of Tunis, who understood the Portuguese language, and he put himself under his direction. He procured Gama an audience of the zamorin, who proposed an alliance and a treaty of commerce with the king his master. This was upon the point of being concluded, when the Mussulmen interfered, who so far swayed the monarch from his purpose, that he resolved to destroy the adventurers, to whom he had just before given so favourable a reception.

The zamorin, who wanted neither power nor inclination, wanted courage to put his design into execution; and Gama was permitted to return to his fleet: he sailed for Lisbon, which he reached in safety, and was received with rapturous joy by the people. The pope gave to Portugal all the coasts they should discover in the east; and a second expedition soon after took place, under the command of Alvarez Cabral, consisting of thirteen vessels. They first visited Calicut, where fifty Portuguese were massacred by the inhabitants, through the intrigues of the Moors. Cabral, in revenge, burnt all the Arabian vessels in the harbour, cannonaded the town, and then sailed to Cochin, and from thence to Cananor. The kings of both these towns gave him spices, gold, and silver, and proposed an alliance with him against the zamorin, to whom they were tributaries. Other kings followed their example; and this insatiation became so general, that the Portuguese gave the law to almost the whole country of Malabar.

The port of Lisbon had now become the grand mart of Indian commodities. To secure and extend these advantages, it was necessary to establish a system of power and commerce. With a view to these objects, the court of Portugal wisely reposed its confidence in Alphonso Albuquerque, the most discerning of all the Portuguese that had been in India. The new viceroy acquitted himself beyond expectation. He fixed upon Goa, where there was a good harbour and wholesome air, as an establishment, being situated in the middle of Malabar, belonging to the king of the Decan, and which soon after became the metropolis of all the Portuguese settlements in India.

As the government soon changed its schemes of trade into projects of conquest, the nation, which had never been guided by the true commercial spirit, soon assumed that of rapine and plunder. In reference to this we may observe, that of all the conquests made by the Portuguese in India, they possess at present only Macao, Diu, and Goa: and the united importance of these three settlements in their intercourse with India and Portugal is very inconsiderable.

Towards the close of the 16th century, Drake, Stephens, Cavendish, and some other English navigators, by doubling Cape Horn, and the Cape of Good Hope, reached India. The success attending these first voyages, was sufficient to determine some of the principal merchants in London to establish a company in 1600, which obtained an exclusive privilege of trading to the East Indies for fifteen years.

The funds of this company were, in the beginning, inconsiderable. They fitted out four ships, which sailed in 1601, under Lancaster, an able man, who arrived with them, in 1602, at the port of Achen, at that time a celebrated mart. He was received by the king with the highest marks of respect, and had every favour shewn him that could be wished for, to facilitate the establishment of an advantageous commerce. The English admiral was received at Bantan in the same manner as at Achen; and a ship, which he had dispatched to the Molucca islands, brought him a considerable cargo of cloves and nutmegs; with these valuables, and pepper, which he took in at Java and Sumatra, he returned safe to England.

The company now determined to form settlements, but not without the consent of the natives. They applied to James I. for assistance, but obtained none. They, however, out of their small funds, erected forts, and founded colonies, in the islands of Java, Poleron, Amboyna, and Banda. They likewise shared the spice trade with the Dutch, who soon became jealous of their rising prosperity. They at first proceeded by accusations, equally void of truth and decency, to make the English odious to the natives of the country; but these expedients not meeting with success, they resolved to proceed to acts of violence; and the Indian ocean became the scene of the most bloody engagements between the maritime forces of the two nations. In 1619, the two companies signed a treaty, signifying, that the Molucca islands, Amboyna, and Banda, should belong in common to both nations. The Dutch, however, not only soon found means to render the treaty ineffectual, but to drive the English from Amboyna. This latter transaction was replete with so much cruelty, that it will remain a lasting stigma on the Dutch nation. The English, harassed in every mart by the Dutch, who were bent on their destruction, were obliged to give way to their power. India was totally forgotten; and the company was greatly reduced at the death of Charles I.

Cromwell, proud of his success, and sensible of his own strength, was piqued that the republic of the United Provinces should pretend to the dominion of the sea, and declared war against the Dutch. Of all the maritime wars which have been recorded in history, none were conducted with more knowledge and bravery; none have abounded with more obstinate and bloody engagements. The English gained the superiority, and peace ensued.—But to return:

Under Ackbar's successor, Jehan Guire, the war was faintly carried on, the empire being disturbed by his rebellious son Shah Jehan, and his councils distracted by the influence of his mistress Noor Jehan. In this monarch's reign Sir Thomas Roe, the first British ambassador at the court of Hindostan, arrived. Jehan Guire died in 1627, and was succeeded by his son Shah Jehan, who pushed the conquest of the Deccan with vigour, but in so destructive a manner, that most of the princes submitted. A war next broke out with the Portuguese, which ended in their expulsion from Hoogly.

Shah Jehan was a debauched prince; and his rebellion against his father was retaliated by that of his son Aurungzebe, who dethroned him, disguising his ambition under the mask of religion, and committing the greatest crimes under that pretence. He engaged in a war with his brothers Morad and Dara, whom he defeated and put to death, and then pretended to lament their misfortune. He, however, treated his father with tenderness till his death in 1666. From 1660, when Aurungzebe attained full possession of the throne, till 1678, a profound tranquillity prevailed throughout the empire; but from a jealousy of Sevagee, the founder of the Mahratta states, he undertook the conquest of the Deccan; and, having quelled a rebellion of the Patans beyond the Indus, he persecuted the Hindoos so severely, that the Rajpoot tribes in Ajmere commenced a war against him.

At his death in 1707, his empire extended from 10° to 35° latitude, and nearly as many degrees in longitude. "His revenue," says major Rennel, "exceeded 35,000,000*l.* sterling, in a country where provisions are about four times as cheap as in England. But so weighty a sceptre could be wielded only by a hand like Aurungzebe's; and, accordingly, in fifty years after his death, a succession of weak princes and wicked ministers reduced this astonishing empire to nothing."

He left four sons; Mausum, Azan, Kaum-Bush, and Ackbar. This last had rebelled against his father, and been obliged to fly to Persia thirty years before. A civil war commenced between Mausum and Azem; and a decisive battle was fought, wherein 300,000 men were engaged on each side, and Azem was defeated and killed. Mausum then assumed the title of Bahader Shah, and, during his short reign of five years, gave proofs of considerable abilities. He defeated and killed his brother Kaum-Bush; after which he reduced the seiks, a new set of religionists, who, in the reign of Shah Jehan, had silently established themselves along the eastern mountains, and had now taken up arms in Lahore, ravaging the country to the banks of the Jinnah.

About this time the English East India Company obtained the famous firman, or grant, by which their goods of export and import were exempted from duties. Furrakere was deposed and murdered by the brothers Houssein and Abdoollah, who set up another emperor, whom they also deposed and murdered in the same year; and thus, in eleven years after Aurungzebe's death, eleven of his posterity, who had either possessed or been competitors for

M. Duplex, mortified at this bad success, proclaimed rajah Saib, son of Chunda Saib, nabob of Arcot; and afterwards produced forged commissions from the great Mogul, appointing him governor of all the Carnatic from the Kristnah to the sea. To carry on this deception, a messenger pretended to come from Delhi, and was received with all the pomp of an ambassador from the great Mogul. Duplex, mounted on an elephant and preceded by music and dancing women, after the oriental fashion, received his commission from the hands of this impostor; after which he affected the state of an eastern prince; kept his durbas at court, appeared sitting cross-legged on a sofa, and received presents as sovereign of the country, from his own council as well from the natives. Thus the forces of the English and French East India companies were engaged in a course of hostilities, under the title of auxiliaries to the contending parties at a time when no war existed between the two nations.

Next year both parties received considerable reinforcements; the English by the arrival of admiral Watson with a squadron of ships of war, having on board a regiment commanded by colonel Aldercoorn; and the French by M. Gadeheu, commissary and governor general of all their settlements, on whose arrival M. Duplex departed for Europe; and a provisional treaty and truce were concluded, on condition that neither of the two companies should for the future interfere in any of the differences that might take place in the country.

Matters, however, did not long continue in a state of tranquillity. Early in 1755 it appeared that the French were endeavouring to get possession of all the Deccan. M. Bussy, the successor of Duplex, demanded the fortress of Golconda, from Salabat Zing; and M. Leyrit encouraged the governor who rented Velu to take up arms against the nabob. He even sent 300 French and as many sepoys from Pondicherry to support this rebel, and oppose the English employed by the nabob to collect his revenues from the tributary princes.

Aliverdi Khan, an able and prudent subahdar, who had for fifteen years been nabob of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, having died in 1766, Surajah Dowla succeeded to the nabobship. He was congratulated on his accession by Mr. Drake, the English president at Calcutta, and readily promised protection to his countrymen; but he soon after took offence at the imprisonment of Omichund, an eminent Gentoo merchant, who had lived several years under the protection of the English government. Of this circumstance, however, Surajah did not directly complain; but founded his pretence of war upon the conduct of the English in repairing the fortifications of Calcutta; which indeed was absolutely necessary, on account of the great probability of a war with the French. The nabob, however, threatened an attack if the works were not instantly demolished. With this requisition the president and council pretended to comply; but they nevertheless went on with them. Surajah Dowla took the field on the 30th of May, 1756, with an army of 40,000 foot, 30,000 horse, and 400 elephants; and on the 2nd of June, detached 20,000 men to invest the fort at Cassumbazar, a large town on an island formed by the west branch of the Ganges. This fort was regularly built, with sixty cannon, and defended by 300 men, principally sepoys. The nabob pretending a desire to treat, Mr. Watts, the chief of the factory, was persuaded to put himself in his power; which he had no sooner done, than he was made a close prisoner, along with Mr. Batson, a surgeon, who accompanied him. The two prisoners were treated with great indignity, and threatened with death; but two of the council who had been sent for by the tyrant's command were sent back again, with orders to persuade the people of the factory to surrender at discretion. This proposal met with great opposition; but was at last complied with, though very little to the advantage of the prisoners; for they were not only deprived of every thing they possessed, but stripped almost naked, and sent to Hoogly, where they were closely confined. The nabob, encouraged by this success, marched directly to Calcutta, which he invested on the 15th.

It was impossible that the garrison could long defend themselves against the great force brought against it; little or no attempt was therefore made at resistance: the fort was consequently soon taken, and the effects of the factory destroyed. Many of the English escaped in boats and ships down the river, but many were taken; of these, 146 were confined for the night in a room twenty feet square, named the Black-hole, and which the English had made for a place of confinement. The dreadful heat and want of air quickly deprived some of existence; others lost their reason, and expired raving mad; their entreaties and offers of money to their guards to give them water, or to remove them, were mocked at or disregarded; and when the door of the dungeon was opened next morning, only twenty-three were taken out alive. Having plundered the town, Surajah Dowla departed, leaving in it a garrison of 3000 men.

The news of this disaster put an end to the expedition projected against M. Bussy; and colonel Clive was instantly dispatched to Bengal with 400 Europeans and 1000 sepoys, on board of the fleet commanded by admiral Watson. They did not arrive till the 16th of December at a village called Fulta, situated on a branch of the Ganges, where the inhabitants of Calcutta had taken refuge after their misfortune. Their first operations were against the forts of Budbugia, Tanna, Fort William, and Calcutta, now in the hands of the enemy. All these were reduced almost as soon as they approached them. gal, (its warehouses and shops being always filled with the richest merchandize of the country), was likewise reduced and destroyed, with the granaries and store-houses of salt on each side of the river; which proved very detrimental to the nabob, by depriving him of the means of subsistence for his army.

Surajah Dowla, enraged at the success of the English, now seemed determined to crush them at once by a general engagement. From this, however, he was intimidated by a successful attack on his camp, which induced him to conclude a treaty, on the 9th of February, 1757, on the following conditions.—1. That the privileges granted to the English by the Mogul should not be disputed.—2. That all goods with English orders should pass by land or water, free of any tax.—3. All the company's factories which had been seized by the nabob should be restored; and the goods, money, and effects accounted for.—4. That the English should have liberty to fortify Calcutta. and 5. To coin their own gold and silver.

As intelligence was now received of a war between France and England, an attack was meditated on Chandernagore. It remained, therefore, only to obtain the consent of the nabob; but, in ten days after the conclusion of the treaty, he sent a letter to admiral Watson, complaining of his intention, and surmising that the English designed to turn their arms against him as soon as they made themselves masters of Chandernagore. This was strenuously denied by the admiral; and a number of letters passed, in which the latter made use of expressions which were supposed to imply a tacit consent that Chandernagore should be attacked. An attack was therefore made, and it soon capitulated. This intelligence, however, seemed to be by no means agreeable to Surajah Dowla. He pretended displeasure on account of the English infringing the treaties, and complained that they had ravaged some parts of his dominions. This was denied by the admiral; but from this time both parties made preparations for war. The nabob returned no answer till the 13th of June, when he sent a declaration of war. The English council at Calcutta now resolved on the deposition of the nabob; which at this time appeared practicable, by supporting the pretensions of Meer Jaffer Ali Cawn, who had entered into a conspiracy against him. Meer Jaffer had married the sister of Aliverdi Cawn, the predecessor of Surajah; and was now supported in his pretensions by the general of the horse, and by Jugget Seet, the nabob's banker, the richest merchant in all India.

Colonel Clive began his march against Surajah Dowla on the 13th of June. The decisive action at Plassey followed (June 23), in which the treachery of Meer Jaffer, who commanded part of the nabob's troops, stood neuter during the engagement, and rendered the victory easy. At day-break the nabob's army of 15,000 horse and 15,000 foot, advanced to attack the English. Clive's troops were posted in a grove defended by mud-banks. After cannonading them till noon, the enemy retired to their fortified camp; and shortly after, Clive stormed an angle of it, put them to the rout, and pursued them for a space of six miles. The unfortunate nabob fled to his capital, but left it the following evening disguised like a fakir, with only two attendants. By these he appears to have been abandoned and even robbed; for on the 3rd of July he was found wandering forsaken and almost naked on the road to Patna. Next day he was brought back to Muradabad, and a few hours after privately beheaded by Meer Jaffer's eldest son.

Meer Jaffer and his English allies now took possession of the capital in triumph. On the 29th of June, and Clive went to the palace, and, in the presence of the rajahs and grandees of the court, solemnly handed him to the musnud (or carpet) and throne of state, where he was unanimously saluted subahdar, or nabob, and received the submission of all present. While these transactions were going forward, the utmost efforts were used to expel the French entirely from Bengal. It had all along, indeed, been the opinion of Clive that it was impossible for the French and the English to co-exist in India.

Both parties now received considerable reinforcements from Europe; admiral Pocock being joined on the 24th of March by commodore Stevens with a squadron of five men-of-war and two frigates; having on board general Lally with a large body of troops. The British admiral went in quest of the French fleet, and an engagement took place, in which the French were defeated with the loss of 600 killed and a great number wounded.

In the treaty concluded by Clive with the new subahdar, it was stipulated that one hundred lacs of rupees should be paid to the East India Company for their losses and the expenses of the campaign, with compensation to all the sufferers at the taking of Calcutta; the company was also to have the seminary, (or right of farming the produce of the soil claimed by the crown) of a tract of country to the south of that city. The subahdar was also profuse in his donations to those to whom he was indebted for his throne. His gifts to Clive amounted to 180,000*l.*; and however much the latter may have been censured at the time for receiving a reward from the subahdar, he was justified by the usages of Asia, and there seems to be no reason why he should refuse a gift from the prince whom he had so greatly benefitted.

The remainder of the year 1759 proved entirely favourable to the British arms. D'Acbe, the French admiral, who had been very roughly handled by admiral Pocock on the 3rd of August, 1758, having retired his fleet, and being reinforced by three men-of-war at the islands of Mauritius and Bourbon, now ventured once more to face his antagonist. A third battle ensued on the

UNDER THE MOHAMEDAN DOMINION THE HINDOO CONVERTS WERE IN TIME ADMISSIBLE TO THE HIGHEST OFFICES IN THE STATE.

10th of September, 1759, when the French, notwithstanding their superiority both in number of ships and weight of metal, were obliged to retreat with considerable loss, having 1500 men killed and wounded, while those on board the English fleet did not exceed 570. By the 17th of October the British fleet was completely refitted; and admiral Pocock, having been joined by a reinforcement of four men-of-war, soon after returned to England. All this time the unfortunate general Lally had been employed in unsuccessful endeavours to retrieve the affairs of his countrymen; but his fate was at last decided by laying siege to Wandewash, which had lately been taken by colonel Coote. The advantage in number was entirely in favour of the French general; the British army consisting only of 1700 Europeans, including artillery and cavalry, while the French amounted to 2200 Europeans. The auxiliaries on the English side were 3000 black troops, while those of the French amounted to 10,000 black troops and 300 Caffres; nor was the difference less in proportion in the artillery, the English bringing into the field only fourteen pieces of cannon and one howitzer, while the French had twenty five pieces in the field and five on their batteries against the fort. The battle began at noon (Jan. 22, 1760), and in three hours the whole French army fled towards their camp; but quitted it on finding themselves pursued by the English, who took all their cannon except three small pieces. They collected themselves under the walls of Chelapat, about eighteen miles from the field of battle, and soon after retired to Pondicherry.

Colonel Coote now caused the country to be wasted to the very gates of this fortress, by way of retaliation for what the French had done in the neighbourhood of Madras. He then set about the siege of Chelapat, which surrendered in one day; a considerable detachment of the enemy was intercepted by captain Smith; the fort of Timernery was reduced by major Monson, and the city of Arcot by captain Wood. This last conquest enabled the British to restore the nabob to his dominions, of which he had been deprived by the French, and it greatly weakened both the French force and interest in India. M. Lally, in the mean time, had recalled his forces from Stryngam, by which means he augmented his army with 500 Europeans. These were now shut up in Pondicherry, which was become the last hope of the French in India. To complete their misfortunes, admiral Cornish arrived at Madras with six men-of-war; and, as the French had now no fleet in these parts, the admiral readily engaged to co-operate with the land forces. The consequence was the reduction of Carical, Chellamburum, and Verdachellum, by a strong detachment under major Monson; while colonel Coote reduced Permacoil, Almannervas, and Waldour. He was thus at last enabled to lay siege to Pondicherry itself; and the place capitulated on the 15th of January, 1761, by which an end was put to the power of the French in this part of the world.

While the British were thus employed, Meer Jaffer, the nabob of Bengal, who had been raised to that dignity by the ruin of Surajah Dowla, found himself in a very disagreeable situation. The treasure of the late nabob had been valued at sixty-four crores of rupees (about 80,000,000l. sterling), and in expectation of this sum, Meer Jaffer had submitted to the exactions of the English. On his accession to the government, however, the treasures of which he became master fell so much short of expectation, that he could not fulfil his engagements to them, and was reduced to the extremity of mortgaging his revenues. In this dilemma his grandees became factious and discontented, his army mutinous for want of pay, and himself odious to his subjects. To this it may be added, that Mr. Vansittart, the successor of Clive, who knew but little of the merits of the respective parties, was willing to conclude a treaty with Cossim Ali, the nabob's son-in-law, for his dethronement; by which the provinces of Burdwan, Midnapore, and Chittagong, were to be made over to the company, and large rewards given to the members of council.

Meer Cossim was accordingly raised to the musnud; and the old nabob hurried into a boat with a few of his domestics and necessities, and sent away to Calcutta in a manner wholly unworthy of the high rank he so lately held. So unblushingly, indeed, was the whole of this affair conducted, that the servants of the company, who were the projectors of the revolution, made no secret that there was a present promised them of twenty lacs of rupees from Cossim, who was desirous of making the first act of his power the assassination of Jaffer; and was very much displeased when he found that the English intended giving him protection at Calcutta.

It could scarcely be supposed that Meer Cossim, raised to the nabobship in this manner, would be more faithful to the English than Meer Jaffer had been. Nothing advantageous to the interests of the company could indeed be reasonably expected from such a revolution. No successor of Meer Jaffer could be more entirely in subjection than the late nabob, from his natural imbecility, had been. This last consideration had induced many of the council at first to oppose the revolution; and indeed the only plausible pretence for it was, that the administration of Meer Jaffer was so very weak, that, unless he was aided and even controlled by some persons of ability, he himself must soon be ruined, and very probably the interests of the company along with him. Meer Cossim, however, was a man of a very different disposition from his father-in-law. As he knew that he had not been served by the English out of friendship, so he did not think of making any return out of gratitude; but, instead of this, considered only how he could most easily break with such troublesome allies. For a while, however, it was necessary for him to take all the advantage he could of his alliance with them. By their assistance he cleared his dominions of invaders, and strengthened his frontiers, and he reduced the rajahs who had rebelled against his predecessor, obliging them to pay the usual tribute; by which means he repaid his expenses, and thereby secured the fidelity of his troops.

Having thus, by the assistance of the English, brought his government into subjection, he took the most effectual means of securing himself against their power. As the vicinity of his capital, Muxadabad, to Calcutta, gave the English factory there an opportunity of inspecting his actions, and interrupting his designs when they thought proper, he took up his residence at Mongheer, a place 200 miles farther up the Ganges, which he fortified in the best and most expeditious manner. Sensible of the advantages of the European discipline, he now resolved to new-model his army. For this purpose he collected all the Armenian, Persian, Tartar, and other soldiers of fortune, whose military characters might serve to raise the spirits of his Indian forces, and abate their natural timidity. He also collected all the wandering Europeans who had borne arms, and the sepoys who had been dismissed from the English service, and distributed them among his troops. He changed the fashion of the Indian matchlocks to muskets, and made many excellent improvements in the discipline of his army. But it was soon discovered that all the pains taken by Meer Cossim to discipline his troops had not rendered them able to cope with the Europeans. Several acts of treacherous hostility on his part was followed by a formal declaration of war; and several engagements took place, in all of which the British army proved victorious, and Cossim's army retreated. His active enemy accordingly penetrated into the heart of his territories, crossed the numerous branches of the Ganges, and traversed morasses and forests in search of the native foe. At length the two armies met on the banks of a river called Nunas Nullas, Aug. 2, 1763. Cossim had chosen his post with great judgment, and his forces had much of the appearance of an European army, not only in their arms and accoutrements, but in their division into brigades, and even in their clothing. The battle was more obstinate than usual, being continued for four hours; but though the Indian army consisted of no fewer than 20,000 horse and 8000 foot, the English proved in the end victorious, and the enemy were obliged to quit the field with the loss of all their cannon.

It is impossible for us to pursue this history of Anglo-Indian warfare into all its details. Our readers must, therefore, be content with rapid descriptions or passing remarks, as may happen, in the narration of events sufficiently important in themselves to require a lengthened notice in works of magnitude wholly devoted to the subject. We pass on, then, by observing that Meer Cossim was subdued and deposed, and that Meer Jaffer was once more seated on the musnad. His reign was, however, very short; and on his death the council of Calcutta raised to it his son, Nujum-ud-Dowla, making him pay, as usual, a large sum for his elevation.

The high character which lord Clive had already gained in the East justly marked him out for the government of India; and on the 3rd of May, 1765, he landed, with full powers as commander-in-chief, president, and governor of Bengal. He remained in India about two years, during which period he effected the most desirable reformations in both the civil and military departments.

Sujah-ud-Dowla, subahdar of Oude, and the nominal emperor of Delhi, Shah Alem II., having assisted Meer Cossim, the English marched against them. Allahabad and Lucknow were taken. The nabob was glad to purchase peace by paying the expenses of the war; and the emperor conferred upon the English the revenues of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, and his imperial confirmation of all the territories conquered by them within the nominal extent of the Mogul empire. The East India Company had now acquired territory equal in extent to the most flourishing kingdom of Europe; and from this date, A. D. 1765, commences the recognised sovereignty of the English in Hindostan. It is worthy of notice that, although actually independent, the great subahdars continued to the last moment of the empire to solicit imperial firmans or patents from the court of Delhi, confirming them in the power they already possessed.

In the south of India, besides the real authority in the Carnatic, the English had received the northern circars in grant from the Nizam, on condition of furnishing a body of troops in time of war. This alliance involved them in a series of contests with Hyder Ali, who had made himself sultan of the Hinda state of Mysore.

The political importance acquired by the East India Company induced the government of Great Britain to claim a share in the administration of the Indian territories; and in 1773 it was determined in parliament, that all civil and military correspondence should be submitted to the king's ministers; that a supreme court of judicature should be sent out from England; and that the three presidencies should be subject to a governor-general and council, the former to be approved of by the king.

Warren Hastings, the first governor-general, found the company's finances in India much embarrassed, and a general confederation against the English in progress amongst the native powers. Notwithstanding violent opposition in his council, he conducted the government through its difficulties, repulsed Hyder, humbled the Mahrattas, and obtained from Aseef-ad-Dowla, the subahdar of Oude, the semidary of Benares. On his return to England, Warren Hastings was impeached by the house of commons for corruption and oppression, and tried before the house of lords. The trial, owing to frequent interruptions, was protracted for seven years, at the end of which he was honourably acquitted. Those proceedings, however, are not necessary to be here dwelt upon, as they belong more especially to the parliamentary history of England. During his twelve years' government in India, Warren Hastings had raised the revenue to double its previous amount; but he had added twelve millions and a half to the debt of the Company.

Lord Cornwallis succeeded as governor-general in 1786. The relations between the British government and those of Lucknow and Hyderabad, were revised and strengthened; and in a war with Tipoo Saib, who had succeeded Hyder in the principality of Mysore, lord Cornwallis defeated his armies, and besieged his capital, Seringapatam. The sultan, to obtain peace, gave up considerable territory to the British. It was under the administration of lord Cornwallis, who was possessed of first-rate qualities for this office, that the principal judicial and revenue regulations, still in force, were enacted, particularly the perpetual settlement of the revenue of Bengal with the semindars.

In 1793 lord Cornwallis returned to England, and was succeeded by sir John Shore; but the pacific system of policy followed by him forfeited that consideration which the British government held in his predecessor's time amongst the native states. In 1798 he was succeeded by lord Mornington, afterwards marquis of Wellesley.

Tipoo had greatly augmented his army, and many severe battles had been fought between him and the British, but without humbling his tone, or much diminishing his power. For several years, in fact, the affairs of India had continued in a state of doubtful tranquillity. The jealousy of the British was at length justly aroused by a proclamation of the French governor of the isle of France, in 1798, which openly mentioned an alliance formed between Tipoo and the French republic, for the destruction of the British power in India. The governor-general, on this, demanded an explanation of him, which being evasive and evidently intended to procrastinate our military operations, the reduction of the fort of Seringapatam was immediately resolved on.

After having been repulsed, with considerable loss, in an attack of the Bombay army under general Stuart, Tipoo Saib retreated to Seringapatam. The main army, under general Harris, consisted of 31,000 men, besides the nizam's cavalry, all completely equipped: that under general Stuart was equally efficient. On the 3rd of April the army came within sight of Seringapatam, took its position on the 6th, and on the 6th the principal outposts were in possession of the British. Several letters passed, and on the 20th general Harris received an overture of peace from Tipoo, which he answered, on the 22nd, with a draft of preliminaries; but the terms were too severe for the enemy to accept. On the 2nd of May, therefore, the British batteries began to open, and in the course of the day a breach was made in the fausse-bray wall; the main rampart was shattered; and, to complete the misfortune of the besieged, a shot having struck their magazine, it blew up with a dreadful explosion. The breach being thought practicable, on the night of the 4th of May 4000 men were stationed in the trenches before day-break. The assault was led on by general Baird, and began at one o'clock. In six minutes the forlorn hope had reached the summit of the breach, where the British colours were instantly planted. In a few minutes, the breach, which was 100 feet wide, was crowded with men. After a short conflict the panic became general in the fort; thousands quitted it, and others laid down their arms. A flag of truce was soon after sent to the palace of the sultan, offering protection to him and his friends upon surrendering unconditionally. The young prince surrendered to general Baird, and the body of Tipoo was afterwards found in the gateway of the fort, lying among heaps of slain, covered with wounds.

His dominions were now partitioned among his conquerors, and the Maharrats were admitted to a share, from motives of policy, though they had taken no part in the war. A descendant of the ancient rajahs of Mysore, about five years old, was sought out and placed on the throne with great ceremony, under certain conditions; and the sons and relations of Tipoo were removed to the Carnatic. Thus terminated one of the most important wars in which the Anglo-Indians had been ever engaged; and for some time at least it secured them from the re-appearance of a formidable enemy. A. D. 1799.

As the conquests of Tipoo and Hyder were retained by the British, and a subsidiary treaty had been formed with the nizam, by which the defence of his dominions was undertaken by them upon his providing for the expense, the greater part of the Deccan was now directly or indirectly subject to their authority.

Arrangements were next concluded with the nabob of Oude, by which the lower part of the Doab and other countries were ceded to the British for the support of a subsidiary force. Upon these transactions followed a war with the Maharrata chiefs, Scindia, and Ragoji Bhosla, rajah of Berar, whose armies were defeated in the south by sir Arthur Wellesley, brother of the governor-general, and in the north by lord Lake; and the upper part of the Doab, with Delhi and Agra, were taken possession of in the north; whilst in the south, Cuttack on the eastern, and part of Guzerat on the western coast, were annexed to the British dominions. A war with Holkar, another Mahratta prince, followed. He made a rapid incursion into the Douab, and committed some ravages; but was pursued by Lord Lake to the Sikh country, and all his territories occupied by a British force. The whole, however, was restored to him at the peace.

Such was the situation of British India at the period of the marquis of Wellesley's return to Europe. He had conducted our affairs in this quarter of the globe with an oriental magnificence of design, and perhaps of expenditure; but he seems fairly to claim the merit of having crushed in a most masterly manner the alarming combinations of Mahratta and French enmity, and entirely to have laid the basis of the measures which were successfully followed out by Lord Cornwallis.

And here for a moment must we pause. Whilst we are thus slightly recording some of the actions of this great statesman, his funeral knell is tolling. Nine-and-thirty years have almost passed away since he left that scene of eastern glory, where his wise councils were so ably seconded by the bravery and skill of a brother who has long since earned the title of "the greatest captain of the age," and who, thank Heaven! still survives, to vindicate, if necessary, the honour of a grateful country. Glorious compeers! venerable in age, but more venerable still in noble patriotism!

In 1805 Lord Wellesley was succeeded by Lord Cornwallis, again appointed governor-general. His policy was of a pacific character; and upon his death, soon after his arrival in India, it was adopted by his temporary successor, Sir George Barlow.

Lord Minto arrived in India in 1807. His attention was chiefly directed to the subjugation of the remaining possessions of the French in the East; and the Isle of France and Mauritius, and the large island of Java, were subdued by armaments fitted out in India.

At the end of 1813 the marquis of Hastings arrived as governor-general. The determination of his predecessors to abstain from interference with the native states had been attended with deplorable dissensions amongst themselves, and had encouraged them to commit outrages on the British dominions, the repression of which soon led to active warfare. On the northern frontier the conduct of the Gorkha government of Nepal having provoked hostilities, the Himalaya was traversed by the British armies, and an extensive tract of mountain country permanently annexed to the state.

The aggressions of the Pindarees, a set of freebooters, secretly supported by the Mahratta princes, were next punished by the annihilation of their hordes. In 1814 these bands comprised about 40,000 horse, who subsisted wholly on plunder. In the course of the operations against them, the peishwa and the rajah of Nagpore attempted, by treachery and murder, to rid themselves of British controul; and hostilities ensued, which placed the territories and persons of both princes in the hands of their enemies, A. D. 1818. The Pindarees were at first bodies of mercenary horse, serving different princes for hire during war, and in time of peace subsisting upon plunder. Lands along the Nerbuddah had been assigned to some of their leaders by the princes of Malwa; and from hence they occasionally made incursions into the British provinces, devastating the country in the most ferocious manner, and disappearing before a force could be assembled against them. It was resolved, however, in the year 1817, to hunt them into their native holds, and either to exterminate them, or to drive them from the position which they occupied, in the very centre of India. By the end of the rainy season of that year, a numerous army took the field for this purpose. The plan was, that the armies of the different presidencies should advance southward, and gradually converging to a common centre, hem in, on every side, the territory of the robbers. This was at length effected; the greater part of them being destroyed, and the rest humbled to complete submission.

Upon the re-establishment of peace, Puna, and part of the Mahratta territories, were retained, and the rest restored to the rajah of Satara. Appa Saib, the rajah of Nagpore, who had escaped from confinement, was deposed, and a grandson of the former rajah elevated on the throne. Holkar, a youth, was taken under the British protection, which was also extended to the Rajput princes. By these arrangements the whole of Hindostan was brought under the power or controul of the British government.

In 1823 the marquis of Hastings quitted his government, leaving British India in a proud and prosperous condition. At the end of the same year Lord Amherst arrived from England. In 1824 war broke out with the Burmese, who had for many years given much trouble on the eastern frontier. An expedition was sent to Rangoon, which, in the second year of hostilities, advanced nearly to Ava, the capital; and the Burman government was glad to purchase peace in 1826 by the cession of Assam, Aracan, and the Tenasserim provinces. The beginning of the same year was signalized by the capture of Bhurtpore, a strong fortress in Upper India.

The more recent events in British India will be found given as fully as our limits would permit, in the latter portion of the history of England.

monians to abandon their advantages in Asia Minor, and to conclude the disadvantageous peace of Antalcidas (387 a. c.)

The army of Cyrus comprised a body of Greek mercenaries, who, after the death of the prince, effected their retreat through the heart of Persia, in defiance of all attempts to cut them off. A particular account of this has been given by their commander, Xenophon, and is known as "the retreat of the ten thousand."

Artaxerxes III. secured his throne by putting to death his numerous brothers. He re-established the Persian supremacy over Phœnicia and Egypt, but was a luxurious and cruel prince. After a reign of 23 years, he was poisoned by his minister, Bagoas, an Egyptian, in revenge for the indignities he had heaped on the religion of his country. Bagoas then gave the crown to Darius Codomanus, a prince of the blood, who was conquered by Alexander in three decisive actions, on the Granicus, at Issus, and at Arbela, and lost his life (330 a. c.); after which Alexander made himself master of the whole empire.

After the battle of Arbela, Alexander took and plundered Persepolis, whence he marched into Media, in pursuit of Darius, who had fled to Ecbatana, the capital. This prince had still an army of 30,000 foot, among whom were 4000 Greeks, who continued faithful to the last. Besides these he had 4000 slingers and 3000 horse, most of them Bactrians, commanded by Beasus. When Darius heard that Alexander had marched to Ecbatana, he retired into Bactria, with a design to raise another army; but soon after he determined to venture a battle with the forces he still had left. On this, Beasus, governor of Bactria, and Nabarzanes, a Persian lord, formed a conspiracy to seize his person, and, if Alexander pursued them, to gain his friendship by betraying their master into his hands; but if they escaped, their design was to murder him, and usurp the crown. The troops were easily gained over; but Darius himself, when informed of their proceedings, and solicited to trust his person among the Greeks, could not give credit to the report. The consequence was, that he was in a few days seized by traitors; who bound him up with golden chains, and, shutting him up in a covered cart, fled with him to Bactria. After a most extraordinary march in pursuit of Darius, Alexander was informed that the Persian monarch was in the custody of Beasus and Nabarzanes, and that he himself was within one day's march of the conspirators, whom, indeed, he soon afterwards overtook, marching in great confusion. His unexpected appearance struck them, though far superior in number, with such terror, that they immediately fled; and, because Darius refused to follow them, Beasus and those who were about him, discharged their darts at the unfortunate prince, leaving him wallowing in his blood. After this they all fled different ways, and were pursued by the Macedonians with great slaughter.

In the meantime, the horses that drew the cart in which Darius was shut up, stopped; for the drivers had been previously killed by Beasus; and Polystratus, a Macedonian, being distressed with thirst, was directed by the inhabitants to a fountain near the place. As he was filling his helmet with water, he heard the groans of a dying man; and, looking round him, discovered a cart with a team of wounded horses, unable to move. Approaching it, he perceived Darius lying in the cart, having several darts in his body. He had enough of strength, however, left to call for some water, which Polystratus brought him; and, after drinking, he turned to the Macedonian, and with a faint voice told him, that, in the deplorable state to which he was reduced, it was no small comfort to him that his last words would not be lost: he then charged him to return his hearty thanks to Alexander for the kindness he had shown to his wife and family, and to acquaint him, that, with his last breath, he bequeathed the gods to prosper him, and make him sole monarch of the world. He added, that it did not so much concern him as Alexander to pursue and bring to condign punishment those traitors who had treated their lawful sovereign with such cruelty. Then taking Polystratus by the hand, "Give Alexander your hand," said he, "as I give you mine, and carry him, in my name, the only pledge I am able to give, in this condition, of my gratitude and affection." Having uttered these words, he expired in the arms of Polystratus. Alexander coming up a few minutes after, bewailed his death, and caused his body to be interred with the highest honours. The traitor Beasus being at last reduced to extreme difficulties, was delivered up by his own men, naked and bound, into the hands of the Macedonians; on which Alexander gave him to Oxyathres, the brother of Darius, to suffer what punishment he should think proper. The manner of it is thus described by Plutarch:—Several trees being by main force bent down to the ground, and one of the traitor's limbs tied to each of them, the trees, as they were suffered to return to their natural position, flew back with such violence that each carried with it a limb. Thus ended the ancient empire of Persia, 209 years after it had been founded by Cyrus, and leaving Alexander its sovereign, a. c. 329.

On the dissolution of the Macedonian empire, after the death of Alexander (323), the Seleucides ruled over Persia until 216 a. c. They were succeeded by the Arsacides, who founded the empire of the Parthians, which existed until 229 a. d. Ardshir Babegan (Artaxerxes) then obtained the sovereignty of Central Asia, and left it to his descendants, the Sassanides, who ruled 407 years. With them begins, according to Hammer, the romantic character of Persian chivalry; and the six most renowned rulers of this dynasty, among whom are Behramgur, Chosroes, Farwiz, and Nushirvan, are the subjects of Persian romances. Ardahir, son of Sassan, ruled from 215 to 241. The wars which he carried on with the Romans were continued under his successor, Sapor I., against Gordian and Valerian (the latter of whom fell into the hands of Sapor, and was treated in a most revolting manner), and were not terminated until the peace of king Narses with Diocletian (308).

When Sapor the Great had become of full age, the empire again recovered strength. He punished the Arabs for their incursions, and took the king of Yemen prisoner; and demanded from the emperor of Constantinople the cession of all the country to the Strymon, as Ardahir had once done. Constantine the Great, Constantine II., and Julian resisted his demands; but Jovian purchased peace by a cession of the five provinces in question and the fortress of Nisibis. Sapor also extended his conquests into Tartary and India. War and peace successively followed, without any important events, after the death of Sapor.

Under Artaxerxes II., Sapor III., and Vararanes IV. (until 399), the empire flourished. Arabs, Huns, and Turks successively appear on the field, as allies or enemies of Persia.

Yezdegerd I., a friend of the Christians, conquered Armenia in 412. In the year 420, Vararanes V. ascended the throne by the aid of the Arabs. He was victorious against Theodosius II., defeated the Huns who invaded his empire, and conquered the kingdom of Yemen. He was succeeded by Vararanes VI. and Hormisdas III. In the year 457, Firouz (Pherozes) ascended the throne by the assistance of the Huns; but afterwards made war against them, and lost his life in battle, in 483. Valens, or Balash, was stripped of a part of his territories by the Huns, and obliged to pay them a tribute for two years. The Sassanides, however, soon regained their greatness and power. Kohad subdued the Huns; and though he had recovered his throne, in 498, by their assistance, yet, at a later period, he waged a successful war against them, against Athanasius, the Indians, and Justinian I.

His youngest son and successor, Chosroes Nushirvan, was distinguished for his uncommon wisdom and valour. Under him the Persian empire extended from the Mediterranean to the Indus, from the Iaxartes to Arabia and the confines of Egypt. He waged successful wars with the Indians and Turks, with Justinian and Tiberius, and with the Arabs, whom he delivered from the oppression of petty tyrants: he also suppressed the rebellions of his brother and his son. The Lazians in Colchis, wearied with the Greek oppression, submitted themselves to him; but, when he attempted to transfer them into the interior of Persia, they again placed themselves under the dominion of Justinian, whose arms were now victorious. Nushirvan died of grief during the negotiations for peace. War continued under Hormus (Hormisdas IV.)

until the reign of Chosroes II., under whom the Persian power reached its highest pitch. By successful wars he extended his conquests, on the one side to Chalcedon (616), on the other over Egypt to Lybia and Ethiopia, and finally to Yemen. But the fortune of war was suddenly changed by the victorious arms of the emperor Heraclius. Chosroes lost all his conquests, and his own son Sirhes made him prisoner, and put him to death (628).

The decline of Persia was hastened by continued domestic feuds. Sirhes, or Kabad-Shirujeh, was murdered in the same year. His son Ardahir (Artaxerxes III.), but seven years old, succeeded him, and was murdered, in 629, by his general Serbas (Sheheriar). The chief Persians prevented Serbas from ascending the throne; and after numerous revolutions succeeding each other so rapidly that historians have confounded the names, Yezdegerd III., a nephew of Chosroes, ascended the throne in 632, at the age of sixteen. He was attacked by the caliph Omar, in 636, and Persia became a prey to the Arabs and Turks. Yezdegerd lost his life in 651.

With the conquest of Persia by the caliphs begins the history of the modern Persian empire. The dominion of the Arabs lasted 885 years, from 636 to 1220. As some of the Arab governors made themselves independent, and Persian and Turkish princes possessed themselves of single provinces, Persia continued to be divided into numerous petty states. Among the principal dynasties were, in the north and northeast, 1. The Turkish house of the Tshahridis in Khorasan, from 820 to 873;—2. The Persian dynasty of the Soffarides, which dethroned the one last named, and ruled over Khorasan and Faristan until 903;—3. The Samanide dynasty, which established its independence on Khorasan in 874, under Ahmed, in the province Mavarelnahr, and lasted to 999. Ishmael, Ahmed's son, dethroned the Soffarides, and became powerful; and under his descendants originated,—4. The Gaznavides, in 977, when Sebektechin, a Turkish slave and governor of the Samanides at Gazna and Khorasan, made himself independent at Gazna. His son Mahmood subdued, in 999, Khorasan, and in 1012, Faristan, and thus put an end to the dominion of the Samanides. He subsequently conquered Irak Agemi (1017) from the Bouides; and even extended his conquests into India. But his son Masud was stripped of Irak Agemi and Khorasan by the Seljooks (from 1037 to 1044); and the Gaznavides, weakened by domestic divisions, became, under Malek Shah (1182), a prey to the Gourides;—5. The sultans of Gour (Gourides) became powerful in 1150, by means of Aladdin Hossain, but lost their ascendancy, after several important reigns, partly by the encroachments of the princes of Khwarezm, and partly by domestic dissensions;—6. The dynasty of Khwarezmian Shahs (from 1097 to 1230) was founded by Aziz, governor of the Seljooks in Khwarezm, or Karaam, where he rendered himself independent. Tagash (1192) destroyed the empire of the Seljuks, and took Khorasan from the Gourides. His son Mohammed conquered Mavarannar, subdued the Gourides and Gazna, and occupied the greater part of Persia. But, in 1220, the great khan of the Mongols, Genghis Khan, and his heroic son Gelaeddin Mankbern, deprived him of his dominions; and he died in 1230, after a struggle of ten years, in a lonely hut in the mountains of Kurdistan. In western and north-eastern Persia reigned—7. Mardawig, a Persian warrior, who founded a kingdom at Dilem, in 929, which soon extended over Ispahan, but was destroyed by the Bouides;—8. The Bouides (sons of Bouia, a poor fisherman, who derived his origin from the Sassanides), by their valour and prudence, extended their sway over the greater part of Persia, and, in 945, even over Bagdad. They were chiefly distinguished for their virtues and love of science, and maintained themselves until 1056, when Malek Rahim was obliged to yield to the Seljuks;—9. The Seljuks, a Turkish dynasty, as is supposed, driven by the Chinese from Turkestan, first became powerful in Khorasan, with the Gassnavides. Toghrulbeg Mahmood, a brave and prudent warrior, drove out the son of Mahmood, the Gassnavide sultan, in 1037; extended his dominion over Mavarannar, Aderbijan, Armenia, Faristan, Irak Agemi, and Irak Arabi, where he put an end to the rule of the Bouides at Bagdad, in 1055, and was invested with their dignity, as Emir el Omrah, by the caliphs. Some of his descendants were distinguished for great activity and humanity. The most powerful of them, Melak Shah, conquered also Georgia, Syria, and Natolia. But the empire gradually declined, and was divided into four kingdoms, which were destroyed by the shahs of Khwarezm, the atabeks of Aleppo, and the Monguls.

Genghis-khan established the power of the Tartars and Monguls in Persia (1120—1405). Those Persian provinces which had been acquired by Genghis-khan fell to his younger son, Tauli, in 1229, and then to the son of the latter, Hulaku, at first as governor of the Mongolian khans, Kajuk and Mangu. Hulaku extended his dominion over Syria, Natolia, and Irak Arabi. He or his successor became independent of the great khan, and formed a separate Mongolian dynasty in those countries, and sat on the throne till the death of Abusaid, without heirs, in 1355. His successors also descendants of Genghis-khan, had merely the title of khans of Persia. The empire was weak and divided. Then appeared (1387) Timurienk (Tamerlane) at the head of a new horde of Monguls, who conquered Persia, and filled the world, from Hindostan to Smyrna, with terror. But the death of this famous conqueror was followed by the downfall of the Mongul dominion in Persia, of which the Turkomans then remained masters for a hundred years.

These nomadic tribes, who had plundered Persia for two centuries, wrested, under the reigns of Kara Juseuf and his successors, the greatest part of Persia from the Timurides, were subdued by other Turkoman tribes under Usong Hassan (1468), and incorporated with them. They sunk before Ismail Sophi (1504), who artfully made use of fanaticism for his political purposes, and whose dynasty lasted from 1505 to 1722.

Ismail Sophi, whose ancestor Sheikh Sophi pretended to be descended from Ali, took from the Turkomans of the white ram, Aderbijan and part of Armenia, slew both their princes, and founded upon the ruins of their empire, after having conquered Shirvan, Diarbeker, Georgia, Turkestan, and Mavarannar, an empire which comprised Aderbijan, Diarbeker, Irak, Faristan, and Kerman. He assumed the name of a shah, and introduced the sect of Ali into the conquered countries. His successors, Thomas, Ishmael II., Mahommed, Hamzeh, and Ishmael III., (from 1523 to 1587), carried on unsuccessful wars against the Turks and the Uzbeks.

But Shah Abbas the Great (1587 to 1629), re-established the empire by his conquests. He took from the Turks Armenia, Irak Arabi, Mesopotamia, the cities of Tauris, Bagdad, and Bassora; Khorasan from the Uzbeks; Ormus from the Portuguese, and Kandahar from the Monguls; and humbled Georgia, which had refused to pay tribute. He introduced absolute power into Persia, transferred his residence to Isfahan, and instituted the pilgrimage to Mehid, in order to abolish that to Mecca among the Persians.

The following rulers, Shah Saffi and Abbas II. (from 1629 to 1666) had new wars with the Turks and Indians; with the former on account of Ragdad, which was lost; and with the latter on account of Kandahar, which was reconquered in 1660. Under Shah Solyman, however, (1666 to 1694), the empire declined, and entirely sunk under his son Hussein. The Afghans in Kandahar revolted, in 1709, and Mirweis; and his son Mir Mahmud conquered the whole empire, in 1722. A state of anarchy followed. Mahmud having become insane, was dethroned by Ashraf in 1725; the latter was subdued by Thomas Kuli Khan, who, with the assistance of the Russians and Turks, placed Thomas, son of Hussein, on the throne in 1729.

But when the latter ceded Georgia and Armenia to the Turks, Kuli Khan dethroned him, and placed his minor son, Abbas III. on the throne. He recovered, by conquest or treaties, the provinces ceded to the Russians and Turks, and ascended the throne under the title of Nadir Shah, Abbas III. having died in 1736. He restored Persia to her former importance by successful wars and a strong government. The booty carried off by Nadir has been estimated at 70 millions sterling. The emperor and all the principal noblemen were obliged to make up the sum demanded, with their jewels and richest furniture. Amongst the most remarkable of the latter articles was the throne of the emperors of Delhi, made in the shape of a peacock, and richly ornamented with precious stones.

After his return from India, Nadir subdued the northern kingdoms of Khwarazm and Bokhara, and settled at Meshed, which he made his capital: entertaining suspicions of his eldest son, he had his eyes put out, and remorse for the crime made him frantically ferocious. Vast numbers of people, of every rank, fell victims to his rage, until some of his officers conspired against, and assassinated him, A.D. 1747.

The death of Nadir Shah was followed by a period of confusion. Ahmed Shah, one of his officers, seized upon Khorasan and Cabul, and established the kingdom of the Affghans. Mohammed Hussein Khan, a Persian chief, occupied the eastern shore of the Caspian; and Ali, the nephew of Nadir, was for a short time king of Persia.

Four kingdoms were now formed; 1. Khorasan and Segistan; 2. Kandahar, or the eastern provinces; 3. Farsistan, or the western provinces; and, 4. Georgia. The latter, for the most part, retained its own princes, who, at length submitted to Russia. In Kandahar and the East, Ahmed Abdallah founded the empire of Affghanism. He was victorious at Panniput, and ruled with absolute sway in India. His residence was Cabul. He was succeeded in 1753, by Timur; the latter by Zeman.

In the two other kingdoms, the Kurd Kerim Khan, who had served under Nadir, and was of low extraction, succeeded in establishing tranquillity, after long and bloody wars, by subduing Mohammed Khan, who died, and perished at Mazanderan. His wisdom, justice, and warlike skill gained him the love of his subjects and the esteem of his neighbours. He did not call himself khan, but ekil (regent). He fixed his residence at Shiraz in 1765, and died in 1779.

New disturbances arose after his death. His brothers attempted to get possession of the throne, to the exclusion of his sons. A prince of the blood, Ali Murat, occupied it in 1784; but a eunuch, Aga Mohammed, a man of ancient family and uncommon abilities, had made himself independent in Mazanderan. Ali Murat, who marched against him, died in consequence of a fall from his horse, and left the sceptre to his son Yafar, who was defeated by Aga Mohammed at Jend Kast, and fled to Shiraz, where he perished in an insurrection. His son Lutf Ali made several desperate efforts to recover his throne; but Aga Mohammed was victorious, and appointed his nephew Baba Khan his successor, who reigned under the name of Feth Ali Shah. He fixed his residence at Teheran, in order to be nearer the Russians, who threatened him in Georgia and the neighbouring provinces.

By the peace of 1812, the Persians were obliged to cede to Russia the whole of Daghestan, the Khanates of Kuba, Shirvan, Baku, Salian, Talishah, Karaach, and Gandaha, resigning all claims to Shularegi, Khaythil, Kachethi, Imeritia, Guria, Mingrelia and Abchasia, and were obliged to admit the Russian flag on the Caspian sea.

Feth Ali (born in 1768), a Turkoman of the tribe of Kadahar Shah, was induced by the heir-apparent, Abbas Mirza, and his favourite, Hussein Kuli Khan, who believed Russia to be involved in domestic troubles, to attack that power in 1826. The Persians invaded the Russian territories, without a declaration of war, instigated part of the Mohammedan population to insurrection, and advanced as far as Elisabethpol; but they were defeated in several battles, and the Russians under Paskevitch conquered the country to the Araxes, which, by the treaty of Tourkmantchal, in 1829, was ceded to Russia.

On the death of Futeh Ali Shah, in 1835, his grandson, the present sovereign, son of the prince royal, Abbas Mirza, succeeded to the throne; and, profiting by the dear-bought experience of his predecessor, is understood to be favourable to the interests of Russia, or, what is more likely, considers it prudent to keep on good terms with a neighbour who has it so much in his power to injure him. The late Abbas Mirza had, with the consent of the East India Company, raised and disciplined a body of troops in Azerbaijan, with a view of opposing the Russians; but on the commencement of the war with Turkey in 1822, as British officers could not serve against a power on friendly terms with Great Britain, they were dismissed; but the regular Persian army marched against the Russians, and were successful until they were disabled by the cholera. Yet it is clear that their army is still very inefficient, compared with what it formerly was; for when, in 1837, Mohammed Mirza, the present shah, made every effort to bring a large force against Herat, the besieging army did not exceed 35,000 men of every description, which was considerably less than half the number of efficient troops engaged with the Russians in the previous war.

With a few observations on its past and present state, we must bring this brief sketch of the history of Persia to a close. We have seen that before the Macedonian conquest of Persia, the latter monarchy was unrivalled in extent and power.

The Greeks greatly interested themselves to learn the manners, the laws, and the form of government of the Persians, and found that they adored the sun and moon: they erected neither temple nor altar, nor statue, to their gods. Their Magi were their sages and their priests. They held at Babylon a solemn feast to Venus. The kings and lords of Persia kept a great number of concubines; and such was their jealousy, that not only the sight of them was forbidden to all persons without the seraglio, but every one of them was separated and confined under a strong guard.

The king of Persia assumed the title of the Great King. His authority, however, was not without bounds: the important business of the nation was debated in a sovereign council, composed of seven principal lords, who always accompanied the prince. The Greeks observed among the Persians a great attention to justice; the king frequently rendering it himself to his subjects, and not confiding in any instance, this material duty of the prince, but to such persons as were profoundly learned in the law, and who could not attain the eminence of the judgment-seat under the age of fifty years. The lives of slaves did not altogether depend on the will of their masters; and the pain of death could not be pronounced upon them for the first fault. This empire, according to the best information, was divided into 127 governments. The lords who presided over them were called satraps, (similar to viceroys of our day), to whom the king consigned a considerable revenue. Agriculture was particularly honoured by the Persians; there was in every district officers appointed by the state to overlook the cultivation of the earth. The conquered nations supported the expences of the state, the Persians themselves being exempt from every tax and impost.

The present government of Persia is an absolute monarchy; but the right of succession, as in ancient times, and as in all Asiatic monarchies, is undefined, and generally rests with the strongest, whence a perpetual recurrence of bloodshed and anarchy arises. The religion is Mohammedan, and the Persians are zealous followers of the Sheah persuasion, or those who look upon Ali, the son-in-law of the prophet, as his legitimate successor. The people consist of four classes; the first are the native tribes, who live in tents, and are migratory with the seasons—as the Zend, Affahar, and others; the second are similar tribes, of Mongol or Turkoman origin, settled in the country, of which the Kajar, or royal tribe, is one; the third are the inhabitants of the towns, and those of the country who follow agriculture; and the fourth are Arab tribes, who occupy the country towards the Persian Gulf.

When the Arabs overran Persia, about the middle of the seventh century, three languages were spoken in the country, the Parsee, Pehivi, and Deri, exclusive of the Zend, or language dedicated to religion. The Persians make high claims to ancient literature; but the greater part of that which escaped destruction in the time of Alexander, was destroyed under the caliphs. Persian civilisation declined during the first period of the Arabian dominion. But learning revived in Persia in the time of the Abbasides, and learned men and poets were encouraged by personal favours and distinctions, till the time of Genghis Khan, in the thirteenth century. Under Timur, in the fourteenth century, and the Turks in the fifteenth, it continually declined, and in the sixteenth was almost entirely extinct. The oppressions and disturbances to which Persia has since been continually subject, have prevented the revival of learning. No oriental nation possesses richer literary treasures of the earlier periods, particularly in poetry and history; but their acquaintance with useful science, or the fine arts, is most crude and limited indeed.

ARABIA.

The history of the Arabians, called by some "the children of the east," is one of an unstable, but interesting people. Connected with the early portions of the Sacred History, and reflecting strong evidences of the truth of that history, we find in its annals the descendants of the patriarchs. Ishmael and Esau, in particular, throw an interest over the map of this country, and carry us back to that era when the hope of the promised seed was the star of guidance to the chosen family.

Various are the tribes that peopled this country; from three of these the present Arabians are supposed to be descended—two of them from the race of Ishmael, and the third from Cush, the son of Ham. Of the early history of these wandering people, it may truly be said, in the language of scripture, respecting Ishmael, "he has been a wild man; his hand has been against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he has dwelt in the presence of all his brethren." In vain have the respective powers of the successive empires of the world attacked this wonderful people. The Egyptians, the Greeks, the Persians, the Romans, especially the conqueror of Jerusalem, have in turn failed in their gigantic efforts to subdue them. Their subjugation has never been effected; they have never been led captive as a nation; they occupy the same seats, cultivate the same soil, and retain very much the old habits and customs of their patriarchal founders.

The religion of the early Arabs partook, to a considerable extent, of that of the Hebrews, but so far from being strict observers of the laws of Moses, they came under the denomination of idolaters, for, although they acknowledged one supreme God, they worshipped the sun, moon, and stars as subordinate deities. This religion has been called Sabianism, from Sabi, a supposed son of Seth. The Arabs also worshipped images, and had their tutelary guardians for appointed times and seasons of the year. After the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus, many of the Jews took refuge in Arabia, where they made no considerable number of proselytes; so that, in a century or two, the Jewish Arabs became a very powerful section of the whole people. In a similar way, converts to Christianity were made; for in the persecution which the followers of Christ suffered in the third century, many fled to Arabia, where they preached their doctrines with such zeal and success, that in a short time they had made great progress there. The faith of the Persian Magi, of which Zoroaster was the founder, had long before been embraced by numerous Arab tribes; so that, in the 6th century, the population of Arabia was divided into Sabians, Magians, Jews, and Christians.

As the propagator of a new code of religion, falsely ascribed to divine revelation, the celebrated Mahomet stands conspicuous in their annals. Amongst them he made many converts, and his successors have for centuries maintained the ascendancy he founded. Of this extraordinary man, however, and the successful mission he undertook, it is not necessary here to enter into the details; having specially devoted a considerable space to an account of the rise and progress of Mahometanism, at the conclusion of our historic sketch of the Ottoman empire—to which the reader can turn for further information.

In many respects this new religion was but little more than an adaptation of various parts of the religions previously existing in Arabia (if we except the idolatrous worship of the Sabians); the people in general, therefore, were in some measure fitted to receive it; and, when the sensual character of the Mohammedan paradise is considered, its rapid promulgation is less surprising than would otherwise at first sight appear. But, besides the delights which were to attend upon all who perished in battle in the cause of the "true faith," he made it incumbent upon all his followers to spread his doctrines by the sword, or to pay tribute for their unbelief. The attractions of plunder had charms which the Arabs could not withstand, consequently great numbers flocked to his standard. No caravan dared approach the place of his resort, without the danger of being pillaged; and by making a trade of robbing, he learned insensibly how to conquer. Of his soldiers, and even his vanquished enemies, he made disciples, giving to them the name of Mussulmen; that is to say, faithful. Having now become a great general, and an eloquent preacher, he took Mecca; and the greater part of the strong places and castles of Arabia fell under the power of his arms.

Mahomet was assisted in his wars by Abubeker, his father-in-law; by Ali, his cousin and son-in-law; and by Omar and Othman; and in twenty-three years from the commencement of his career, he found all Arabia had embraced his doctrine, and submitted to his government.

Mahomet intended Ali, who had married his daughter Fatima, as his successor; but Abubeker, on account of his age, and by the interest of Omar and Othman, was chosen. This election of Abubeker gave birth to the schisms and civil wars which followed.

The successors of Mahomet took the title of caliphs, or vicars of the prophet. Full of that fire or zeal which generally accompanies and inspires a new religion, they spread into different countries their doctrine and their power. Persia and Greece were among the first to suffer; Damascus, Antioch, and all Syria, followed. They then penetrated into Palestine, and took Jerusalem. They destroyed entirely the monarchies of Persia and the Medes of Korasan, of Diarbek, of Bactriana, and of Mesopotamia; nor was their progress less successful in Africa; they subdued all the coast to the west of Egypt; and Egypt itself submitted to their government, together with the islands of Cyprus, Rhodes, Candia, Sicily, Malta, and many others.

It appears that in Asia and Africa, at different times, there were upwards of fifty caliphs, successors of Mahomet, every one of whom pretended to be his descendant, and the true interpreters of the law. The greater part of these caliphs sunk into luxury and effeminacy, confided the management of the government to their emirs, and the principal officers of the palace. The caliph had at last little more to do than to take cognizance of matters of religion, and in all public prayers his name was first used. Thus had the enormous power of these rulers become weak by their indolence, so that it degenerated into a mere title, and ended in annihilation.

By imposture and fanaticism the Arabian dominion suddenly rose into importance, and, like other gigantic empires, it fell by its own unwieldiness. Spain, Egypt, and Africa were soon engaged in effecting their independence. Ere long the caliphs found it necessary to call to their aid those wild hordes of Tartars and Turks who had partially received the doctrines of the prophet, and from them they chose a body of mercenary troops to guard their frontiers and protect their persons. For a few generations they by this means held together their tottering power; but their auxiliaries coveted the possessions of those whom they assisted, and the overgrown empire gradually crumbled away, till a Tartar army, in 1258, captured Bagdad, and put an end to the nominal existence of the caliphate. The religion of Mahomet was untouched; but the power of the "commander of the faithful" was transferred from the caliphs of Bagdad to the Turkish sultans; while the heads of the different tribes still continued to govern their subjects as they had governed them before.

In the eighteenth century, a reformation was commenced by a sheik, called Mahomet Iba Abdoulwahab, who converted to his views the sheik of the Arabians, Ebn Saoud. The reformation was extended, and its progress was marked by the demolition of several towns, and the massacre of thousands of people. The son of the Saoud, Abdelaziz, sent an expedition against Mecca, which he completely destroyed, excepting the sacred temple. He captured also Medina, where he was assassinated—a deed which his son Saoud avenged by seizing the accumulated treasures of ages stored in that city, by means of which he made himself master of all Arabia.

THE HISTORY OF CHINA.

CHAPTER I.

There is probably no existing nation whose history is less accurately known or more inquisitively sought after by the reading public of England, than that of China. The most startling statements alike as to the antiquity of the nation and the number of the population have been gravely put into circulation by grave writers, as though the "omne ignotum pro magnifico" were not a satirical remark, but a philosophical command. More, probably, of authentic information upon the subject of this singular people has been acquired during the last half century, than during the whole lapse of the preceding ages. Marco Polo and Du Hilde, subjected as they now are to the correction of Dr. Morrison, Gutschell, Latrobe, and other able European residents in China, may safely be taken as our guide, though, were they not thus corrected they would lead into frequent and very gross error.

The Chinese writers pretend to trace back their government to a period anterior to the Flood; a ridiculous absurdity which we should not feel ourselves called upon to notice, but that European writers of no mean order have, without going to the full extent of Chinese extravagance, admitted their existence as a nation considerably more than two thousand years before Christ. Its early history, indeed, like that of most other nations of any considerable antiquity, seems to be an imaginative distortion of a few truths mixed up with a vast number of bare and mere fictions. Their founder and first monarch they affirm to have been Fohi, who is presumed by many writers to have been the same with Noah. The eastern mountains of Asia they take to be the Ararat of Scripture; and they assert that, as the waters subsided, Noah followed the course of the rivers to the south until he arrived at China, where, being much struck with the beauty and fertility of the land, he eventually settled. The astute author of "An Essay on the Manners and Spirit of Nations" has shown a strong predilection in favour of the high antiquity of China, and brought forward many arguments in support of it. "This state," says he, "has existed in splendour about 4000 years, without either its laws, manners, language, or even the mode and fashion of dress having undergone any material alteration. Its history (which, in his opinion, is incontestable) being the only one founded on celestial observations, is traced by the most accurate chronology, so high as an eclipse calculated 2165 years before our vulgar era, and verified by the mislunarities;" &c.

As the Chinese, contrary to the practice of almost all nations, have rarely, if ever, sought to conquer other countries, their annals for many ages furnish nothing remarkable; and although they date the origin of their imperial dynasties (excluding those of the fabulous times; two thousand years before the Christian era, we find that the country was long divided into several states or independent sovereignties; the princes or chiefs of which were perpetually at war with each other. Though it was in the very nature of things that some one prince should be more powerful than the others, and even be possessed of a certain degree of authority over them, yet war between state and state was the chief condition of China. Dynasty succeeded dynasty; territorial limits were perpetually shifting with the good or ill success of this or of that prince; and what Milton says of the early warfare of the petty princes of Britain, may most justly be repeated here—that it will be no more useful or interesting to dilate upon the early wars of the Chinese, than to describe the skirmishes of the kites and crows.

Twenty-two dynasties of princes are enumerated as having governed China from 2207 a. c., to the present day, the reigning emperor being the fifth monarch of the twenty-second or Tai-Tsin dynasty. What may be termed the authentic history of China does not begin till the time of Confucius, who flourished about five centuries before the Christian era, and who must be regarded as the great reformer of China. He endeavoured to unite in one great confederation the numerous states which harassed each other by mutual wars, and constructed a moral code for the government of the people. He forbore to dive into the impenetrable arcanum of nature; neither did he bewilder himself in abstruse researches on the essence and attributes of a Deity, but confined himself to speaking with the most profound reverence of the First Principle of all beings, whom he represented as the most pure and perfect Essence, the Author of all things, who is acquainted with our most secret thoughts, and who will never permit virtue to go unrecompensed, nor vice unpunished.

It is not until a. c. 248 that Chinese history begins to be at all developed. Chéu Hwang-te, the founder of the Tsin dynasty, in that year succeeded to the throne, and the petty princes of China, as well as the Huns who inhabited the immense plains beyond the Oxus, speedily found that they had a warrior to deal with. Whenever these princes ventured to meet him they were infallibly defeated, until he had completely subdued all the states, and consolidated the empire.

Having provided for his power within the empire, he next turned his attention to its regular and efficient defence against foreign invaders. The very desultoriness of the attacks of the Huns made it difficult to subdue them. When he could meet with them, and force them into a pitched battle, he never failed to give an excellent account of them; but they were no sooner dispersed than they rallied; no sooner chastised in one part of the empire than they poured furiously down to repeat their offences in some other.

Whether the monarch himself, or his able general, Mung-Teen, conceived the grand idea of surrounding China—as it was then limited—with a wall, it would now be no easy matter to ascertain; certain it is that the wall was erected under the superintendence of the general.

This perfectly stupendous monument of human skill and industry (which is 1500 miles in length, 30 feet high, and 15 feet thick on the top), could only have been completed by an absolute monarch. In a free country, where both labour and materials would have to be paid for by the government; at a fair rate, such a labour would not be thought of, or if proposed, would be scouted as utterly impossible, on account of the enormous expense. But the emperor of China had only to will and be obeyed. He ordered that every third man throughout the empire should aid in the vast work; and we may suppose that of the multitudes thus put into requisition, few had any payment at all, and none had anything more than scanty rations of the coarsest food. Like the Israelites in Egypt, and like the native builders of the vast pyramids, the builders of the great wall of China were but slaves, whose slavery only differed from that of purchased slaves, that it was but for a time that they were purchased, and that the price paid for them was not in cash or merchandise, but the sic volo, the absolute will of the emperor.

Of the extent and magnitude of this prodigious wall we have already spoken; but a farther idea of it may be formed from the curious calculation of a modern author, who says that "there are sufficient materials in it to build all the dwelling-houses in England and Scotland, allowing two thousand feet of masonry to each! Or, were the materials pulled down, and a new wall made of them, to be twelve feet high and four feet thick, that wall would be ample enough to encircle the globe at the equator!"

By the stern exercise of his unchecked power, the emperor had this mighty wall, with embattled towers at convenient distances on the top, completed, and the towers garrisoned, so as to serve at once for watch towers and fortresses! But though he was a warlike and spirited prince, and though he seems to have had a high and chivalrous desire to protect his empire from the insults and rapine of its barbarous enemies, his reign was by no means free from cause of censure. His warlike spirit, however commendable in itself, seems under some circumstances to have degenerated into a savage obduracy of character. Thus we find that the very man who so efficiently exerted himself for the physical protection of his subjects, was so utterly insensible to their moral and intellectual wants, that he ordered the destruction of the whole body of Chinese literature, in the low and disgraceful hope of thus destroying all traces of Chinese history previous to the commencement of his dynasty! The mode in which the wish was carried into execution was every way worthy of the motive that prompted it;—if it is true, as it is recorded, that for refusing to aid in this wholesale and worse than barbarous destruction, upwards of five hundred of the learned were brutally buried alive! The works of Confucius were secreted by some man of noble and well-directed mind, and were found, years after the emperor's death, by some workmen employed in repairing a house.

If the Chinese are still very far from being a wise, or even a truly and thoroughly civilized people, they at least have inherited none of their early emperor's blind rage against literature. Such as their literature is, they universally admire it; to be a learned man—as they understand the phrase—is to have a right to aspire to any office in the emperor's gift; to be unlearned, is to be utterly and irrevocably incapacitated from rising above the lowest employments of menial, mechanical, or trading life. "If," says Gutzlaff, "they can write a good essay, discourse upon the doctrines of Confucius, and unite with this a knowledge of their own country, and a few imperfect geographical notions, they are truly learned men; but woe to him who dares to utter anything beyond what has been taught by Confucius."

It would undoubtedly be all the better for the Chinese if they were less prejudiced, and gave their really acute and active minds a wider and more liberal range; but a nation is far from being contemptible or hopeless of the very highest future intellectual efforts, where there is a general diffusion of even such learning as that here spoken of. But of their intellectual condition we shall speak at some length in a separate chapter.

History of China.

CHAPTER II.

On the death of Che-Whang-te, his son Urh-shu, less polite or less powerful than his father, found it impossible to prevent new outbreaks among the princes who had been reduced to the position of mere nobles and lieutenants of the emperor. Whether leaguings against the commands of the emperor, or fiercely assailing each other, they filled the whole land with strife, rapine, and bloodshed; where the sword had shed human blood, the torch in but too numerous instances consumed human habitations; entire cities were in some cases destroyed and made utterly desolate, and the total annihilation of the empire seemed at hand, when there arose in the land one of those men of iron nerve and iron hand who never fail to appear during great revolutions, and who always appear at precisely that moment when the myriad evils of anarchy can only be put an end to by a man who possesses the talents of the soldier joined to the unbending will of the despot.

Lien Pang, the man in question, was originally the captain of a band of robbers, and notorious in that character alike for his boldness and his success. The distracted state of the country opened the way to his joining the profession of a leader of free lances to that of a robber, and, at first in alliance with some of the princes, and subsequently in opposition to all of them in succession, he fought so ably and successfully, that he subdued the whole empire, changed his name to that of Kaon-te, and ascended the throne, thus founding the Han dynasty. Though thus successful within, he was greatly annoyed by the Huns; and so far was his usual success from attending him in his endeavours to free the empire from them, that he bought their quietness with many and costly presents, which on his death and the succession of his son was changed to a stipulated annual tribute.

During several years there were no events worth recording, in the history of China; but, in the reign of Woo-te, the empire was assailed by a succession of misfortunes and calamities. Owing to a long continuance of heavy rains the Hoang-Ho river burst its banks, sweeping away everything in its path, and causing a destruction, not only of property but also of human life, that was truly terrible. During the same reign the cultivated lands were left completely bare by the invasion of a vast army of those destructive creatures, locusts; and a fire occurred in the capital which burned property to a frightful extent, and was only extinguished after it had consumed a great portion of the city, including almost the whole of the imperial palace. To counterbalance these great national calamities this reign had one piece of national good fortune of the highest consequence: the Huns had made their appearance again in vast numbers; they were completely routed in a great battle by the Chinese, under their general, Wei-sing, who took many thousands of prisoners, together with the whole of the tents, stores, and baggage of those nomadic plunderers. So thoroughly humbled were the Huns on this occasion, that for very many years they did not again make their appearance; they even paid homage to the emperor, Senen Te, against whom, however, they broke out as fiercely as ever towards the close of his reign.

In the first year of the Christian era Ping-te ascended the imperial throne. He only reigned about five years, and being a weak prince, was even during that period rather the nominal than the real emperor; for both he and the empire were completely ruled by Wang-mang, a prince of great energy, who, on the death of Ping-te, took actual possession of the throne, of which he had long been the virtual owner. Many princes espoused the cause of the displaced dynasty; but though they perpetually made war upon the able usurper, he kept possession of the throne during the remainder of his life.

Wang-mang died A.D. 23, and was succeeded by Hwae-yang-wang; he died in A.D. 58, and was succeeded by Kwang-Woo. This reign is chiefly remarkable on account of the introduction into China, from the neighbouring country of Eastern India, of the Buddhist religion.

In the year 89, and the reign of Ho-te, the Tartars, who as well as the Huns and the Cochine were the perpetual pest of China, again made their appearance. They were worsted in several encounters, and very many thousands of them perished. They were driven, broken and dispirited, to the Caspian, and only then escaped owing to the fear with which the mere prospect of a long voyage inspired the Chinese. For several years after this event the affairs of China were in a very pliable state; the Tartars, returning again and again, added by their ravages to the distress caused by bad seasons; and just under those very circumstances which made the rule of a vigorous and able man more than ever desirable, it, singularly enough, chanced that reign after reign fell to the lot of mere children, in whose names the kingdom was of course governed by the court favourites of the existing empress; the high trust of the favourite naturally arising more from the empress's favour than from his fitness or integrity. Drought, famine, plague, and the frequent curse of foreign invasion, made this part of Chinese history truly lamentable.

In the year 220 the empire was divided into three, and with the usual effect of divided rule in neighbour between whom nature has placed no boundary of sea, or rock, or impracticable desert.

In the year 288, the emperor Woo-te succeeded in again uniting the states into one empire. He died about two years later, and was succeeded by Hwuy-te, who reigned seventeen years, but was guilty of many cruelties, and consequently much disliked. The history of no fewer than 113 years, terminating A.D. 420, may be summed up

THE EMPEROR IS, IN REALITY, THE SLAVE OF CUSTOM AND ETIQUETTE.

THE EMPEROR OF CHINA IS AN ABSOLUTE PRINCE, WHOSE WILL IS LAW, AND WHO IS WHOLLY IRRESPONSIBLE TO ANY HUMAN TRIBUNAL.

FROM THE DAYS OF CONFUCIUS TO THE PRESENT TIME THE ANNALS OF THE EMPIRE HAVE BEEN CARRIED ON IN UNINTERRUPTED ORDER.

CHINA WAS KNOWN ONLY BY NAME TO THE GREEKS AND ROMANS, ALTHOUGH ITS BELAND SOME OTHER ARTICLES WERE IMPORTED INTO EUROPE.

in three words—confusion, pillage, and slaughter. Either native generals and native armies fought, or the fierce Hun and still fiercer Tartar carried death and dismay throughout the empire. Years of bloodshed and confusion at length inclined the more important among the native competitors to peace, and two empires were formed, the northern and southern;—the Nan and the Yuh-chow.

Lew-yn, or Woo-te, emperor of the southern empire, though he was far superior in the wealthiness of his share to the prince of the north, was originally the orphan of parents of low rank, who left him in circumstances of such destitution, that his youth was supported by the actual charity of an old woman, who reared him as her own son. As soon as he was old enough he enlisted as a soldier, and subsequently made his way to the empire by a succession of murders upon members of the royal family, including the emperor Kung-te, who was the last of the Tein dynasty. Lew-yn, or Woo-te, compelled that unfortunate monarch publicly to abdicate in his favour. The prison of deposed kings is proverbially synonymous with their grave. The case of Kung-te was no exception to the general rule; he was put to death by poison.

Woo-te died in 422: his son, Ying-Yang-Wang succeeded him; but was speedily deposed in favour of Wan-te. This prince issued an edict against the Buddhist doctrines, which in the northern dominions, where the prince just at that time was possessed of far more power than his southern brother, proceeded still more harshly. All Buddhists were banished: the Buddhist temples burned, and many priests put to death or cruelly tortured and mutilated.

Wan-te, learned himself, was a great friend and promoter of learning. Several colleges were founded by him, and his exertions in this respect were the more valuable, as they were imitated by the prince of the north. Wan-te having sharply reproved his son Lew Chaou, for some misconduct, and threatened to disinherit him, the son brutally murdered him at the instigation of a bonze or priest, who represented that act as the only means of preventing the father's threat from being carried into effect. The guilt of both the prince and his priestly instigator met with its fitting reward. Lew-achen, half-brother to the prince, raised a powerful army, and attacked Lew Chaou, who with his whole family were beheaded, and all his palaces razed to the ground.

Fei-le King-Ho has been aptly enough compared to the Caius Caligula of Rome: bloodshed appeared to be his greatest delight; to be privileged to approach him was at the same time to be in constant peril of being butchered; and he was no less obscene than cruel; an immense and gorgeously decorated hall being built by him, and exclusively devoted to the most disgusting and frantic orgies. The reign of so foul a monster could not be otherwise than short. The very officers of his palace could not tolerate his conduct, and in the year follow-

Ming-te Tse-che succeeded to the throne A.D. 466. What he might have proved if his accession had been unopposed we can but guess; but, being opposed, he was aroused to a rage perfectly ungovernable. Those of his relatives who actually took up arms against him were not more hateful than those of them who did not, and many of the latter were put to death by him. His whole reign was passed in warfare with one or more of the princes of his family. This state of things lasted for nearly six years, and caused so much misery to the people, that there would speedily have been a general rising for the purpose of dethroning him, but for his opportune death.

Anarchy and war marked the two following reigns of Chwang-yo-wang and Shun-te; the former was dispatched by a eunuch employed by an aspiring general, who also compelled Shun-te to abdicate in his favour, and soon afterwards assassinated him.

In 479 the aspiring and reckless general Scawu-Taduching ascended the throne, under the title of Kaou-te-now; he reigned but two years, and the succeeding princes of this dynasty, Tai, which terminated in 502, were engaged in continual war with the prince of the north, but performed neither warlike nor peaceful services to merit notice.

A new dynasty, the Leang, was now commenced by Woo-te, who ascended the throne in 502. Under him the old wars between the northern and southern empires were continued. Nevertheless, though warlike and active at the commencement of his reign, he showed himself a great admirer and patron of learning. He revived some learned establishments that had fallen into decay, and founded some new ones; but probably the most important service that he did it was that of publicly teaching in person. We may fairly doubt whether such a prince was not better skilled in the arts of war, as then practised, than in studious lore; but his example tended to make learning fashionable, and he may therefore be said to have afforded it the greatest encouragement. Whatever his actual attainments, his love of study seems to have been both deep and sincere; for while yet in the prime of mental and bodily vigour, he abandoned the pomp and power of the throne, and retired to a monastery with the avowed intention of devoting the remainder of his life to study. This, however, had such mischievous effect upon public affairs, that the principal mandarins compelled him to quit his peaceful retirement and reascend the throne; but the rest of his life was passed in strife and tumult, which eventually broke his heart. His son and successor had scarcely commenced his reign, when he was put to death, and succeeded by Yuen-te. This emperor also was fond of retirement and study, and greatly neglected the affairs of his empire, which, distracted as it constantly was by the violence and intrigues of the princes of the empire, required a stern and vigorous attention.

Shin-pan-seen, who was not only a prince of the empire, but also prime minister to the emperor, raised a rebellion against his confiding and peaceful master, whose first intimation of his danger was given to him by the fierce shouts of the rebel force at the very gates of his palace. On hearing those hoding shouts, the emperor, awakened from his delicious reveries, calmly closed the book he had been so intent upon, put on his armour, and ascended the ramparts. A single glance showed him that it was too late for resistance; he returned to his library, and, setting fire to it, abandoned his sword, and resigned himself to his fate. The library of this unfortunate monarch, who would probably have been both powerful and glorious had he ruled over a less divided and turbulent people, is said to have contained 140,000 volumes; an immense number to have been collected even by royalty at such a time and among such a people.

The next emperor worthy of any mention, however slight, is Wan-te, whose short reign was so vigorous, prudent, and successful, that he must be considered to have been the chief cause of the re-union which occurred so soon after his death between the northern and southern empires. He died in 566, and was succeeded by his son, Ye-tung, who was speedily dethroned by his uncle and the empress dowager.

The throne was then filled by Suen-te. During his short reign of less than three years, he fought boldly and constantly against his opponents, and did much towards promoting the fast approaching union of the two empires.

On the death of Suen-te, in the year 569, he was succeeded by How Chow, a mere sensualist and idler, whose debauchery and indolence disgusted and angered his people more, probably, than harder and more active vices would, even though they had been productive of a fiercer and more obvious kind of tyranny. A powerful and warlike noble, Yang-keen, put himself at the head of the disaffected nobles and their followers, and laid siege to the imperial city. The inhabitants, who, as might be expected, were even more disgusted with the effeminacy and profligacy they had witnessed, than the besiegers, threw open the gates almost without a struggle. The immediate advisers of the emperor and the notorious companions of his profligate revels were sternly put to death, and search was then made for the emperor. That cowardly sensualist had taken refuge with all his family in a dry well, whence he was dragged out half dead with terror, and expecting no less than instant death at the hands of the victorious rebel leader. But Yang-keen, either in mercy, or with the politic view of placing an additional obstacle to all other pretenders that might arise, spared both him and his family.

On usurping the throne, A. D. 572, Yang-keen's very first act was to consolidate the northern empire with the southern. In this he found little difficulty. Wei, the last really great prince of the northern empire, was both so well able to war, and so little inclined to do so without occasion, that he made his state at once feared without, and peaceful and prosperous within. He was poisoned by his own mother, a woman of high but cruel spirit, and of great talents but most restless disposition. Both she, while she acted as regent to her grandson, and the latter when he had taken the reins of government into his own hands, plunged the state into all the venomous and mischievous wars of the imperial princes; and this fatal departure from the peaceful policy of the former ruler, and the absence of any improvement in his military power, struck a blow at the safety and integrity of the northern empire, which, after a separate existence of upwards of a century and a half, was re-annexed to the southern empire almost without an effort.

CHAPTER III.

YANG-KEEN having been so successful in obtaining the throne and consolidating the empire, turned his attention to restraining the violence and rapine of the Tartar chiefs. His reputation for skill, valour, and firmness, here did him good service. Bold and rapacious as the Tartars were, they were too well aware of the character of the monarch whom they now had to deal with, to hope that he would either overlook any of the advantages he possessed, or neglect to use them. They professed themselves desirous rather of his friendship than his enmity; and to show the sincerity of what they called their amity, but what would have been far more correctly termed their terror, they went so far as to pay him homage. With his usual shrewd policy, Yang-keen gave one of the imperial princesses in marriage to the principal Tartar chief. Nor was he ill rewarded for the facility with which he permitted himself to substitute alliance for strife. During his reign, his people remained free from the incursions of the Tartars, which had previously been as frequent as the natural tempests, and far more destructive.

On the death of Yang-keen, in 604, the heir to the throne was strangled by a younger brother, Yang-te, who, having committed the fratricide, and removed all other obstacles from his path, ascended the throne in 605. The means by which this prince obtained the throne, common as such means are in despotic and but partially civilized nations, deserve all the detestation that we can bestow upon them; but if he obtained the throne shamefully, he filled it well. Though eminently a man of taste and pleasure, he was no less a man of judgment, enterprise, and energy. In the early part of his reign he formed extensive gardens, which for magnitude and tastefulness were never before witnessed in China; and in these gardens it was his chief delight to ride, attended by a retinue of a thousand ladies, splendidly attired, who amused him with vocal and instrumental music, and with dancing and feats of grace and agility on horseback. This luxurious habit did not, however, prevent him from paying great attention to the solid improvements of which China at that time stood so much in need. It would be idle to remark upon the importance (to both the prosperity and the civilization of a people) of good and numerous means of communication between all the extremities of their land. Many of his canals and bridges still exist, as proofs both of his seal and judgment in this most important department of the duty of a ruler.

His talents, energy, and accomplishments did not save him from the fate which we deplore, even when the worst of rulers are its victims. He had been on a tour, not improbably with a view to some new improvement in the face of the country, when he was assassinated. This melancholy event, it seems very probable, arose from the successful artifices of Le-yuen; he was both powerful and disaffected; had previously signalized himself by the most factious conduct, and immediately after the assassination put himself forward to place King-te upon the vacant throne. What motive Le-yuen had in making this man the mere puppet of sovereignty for a brief time, it is difficult to conjecture; but it is certain that King-te had scarcely ascended the throne before Le-yuen caused him to be strangled, and assumed the sovereign power himself.

It is strange that ill acquired power is often used at once with the greatest wisdom and the greatest moderation, as though in the struggle to obtain it all the evil portion of the possessor's nature had been exhausted. Le-yuen, or rather Kaou-tsoo, which name he took on ascending the throne, was a remarkable instance of this. Nothing could be more sanguinary or unscrupulous than the course by which he became master of the empire; nothing could be braver, more politic, or as regarded his internal administration, milder, than his conduct after he had obtained it.

For some years previous to his usurpation, the Tartars had returned to their old practice of making incursions into the northern parts of China, on some portion of which they had actually proceeded to settle themselves. Kaou-tsoo attacked them with great spirit, and in many severe engagements made such slaughter among them as to impress them with a salutary fear of pushing their encroachments farther.

Looking with a politic and prescient eye at the state of other nations, Kaou-tsoo was extremely anxious about that singular and ferocious people the Turks, who about the commencement of his reign began to be very troublesome to Asia.

Dwelling between the Caspian sea and the river Hypanis, the Turks were a sylvan people, hardy, and living chiefly upon the spoils of the chase. Thus prepared by their way of life for the hardships of war, and having their cupidity excited by the rich booty of the caravans, which they occasionally rushed upon from their peninsular lair to plunder, this people could not fail to be otherwise than terrible when, under a brave and politic leader, they went forth to the conquest of nations instead of the pillage of a caravan, and appeared as a great multitude instead of a mere isolated handful of robbers. To China they were especially hateful and mischievous; for they were perpetually at war with the Persians, with whom, just at that time, far the most valuable portion of Chinese commerce was carried on. The Persians fell before the Turkish power, and that restless power endeavoured to push its conquests into China. It might probably have effected this had a different man ruled the empire; but the emperor not merely repulsed them from his own territory, but chastised the disaffected Tibetians who had aided them and pushed forward into China, whence he expelled the Turks.

After a victorious and active reign of twenty-two years and a few months, this brave and politic emperor died, and was succeeded by Chan-tsung, whose effeminacy was the more glaringly disgraceful from contrast with the brave and active character of his predecessor. The single act for which his historians give him any credit, is that of having made it necessary for the literati, who by this time exercised pretty nearly as much influence in both private and public affairs in China as the clergy did in Europe during the middle ages, to sustain a rather severe public examination.

Of the next seventeen monarchs of China there is literally nothing recorded that is worthy of transcript; nor during their reigns did anything of moment occur to China beyond the civil dissensions, which were frequent, and, indeed, inevitable in a country where effeminate princes committed their power to intriguing eunuchs, who scarcely ever failed to prevent a resumption of it, by the dagger, or the poisoned cup.

Chwang-tsung, son of a brave and skillful general, founded the How Tang dynasty, and, at least at the outset of his reign, was a bright contrast to his predecessors. He had from mere boyhood shared the perils and hardships of his father, whom he had accompanied in many of his expeditions. At the commencement of his reign he gave every promise of being the greatest monarch China ever saw. In his apparel and diet he emulated the frugality of the meanest peasant and the plainest of his troops. Lest he should indulge in more sleep than nature actually required, he was accustomed to have no other bed than the bare ground, and, as if this luxurious way of lying might lead him to waste in sleep any of that precious time of which he was a most rigid economist, he had a bell so fastened to his person, that it rang on his attempting to turn round, so loudly as to awaken him, and after it did so he immediately rose, to repose no more until his usual hour on the ensuing night. Extremes are proverbially said to meet; but certainly one would never have suspected that so Spartan a youth would have heralded a manhood of exceeding luxury, and even licentiousness. But so it was; his companions were among the most debauched wassailers in his empire, and he emulated their conduct. Yet though he departed from the, perhaps, too rigid severity of his manners, he was, to the last, a brave and active man, and was slain at the head of his troops in a battle fought in 926, having, in spite of some personal defects of character already noted, been on the whole one of the most respectable of all the native Chinese emperors.

The next emperor was Ming-taung, who reigned for only seven years. But if his reign was short, it was both active and beneficent; and if there are many greater names in the imperial annals, there is not one more beloved. His people looked upon him as a parent, and his whole reign seems, in fact, to have been the expression and achievement of a truly kind and paternal feeling. He died in 933, with a character which greater monarchs might envy.

Min-te succeeded to the throne in 933. He only reigned one year; but in that very brief space of time he contrived to deserve, if not to obtain, the execration of the Chinese women, not only of his own time but up to the present hour. He it was who established the truly barbarous practice of confining the feet of female children in such a manner that the toes are bent completely under the soles of the feet, which are, it is true, rendered very diminutive in appearance by this abominable method, but are at the same time rendered almost useless. The loitering and awkward gait of the women would be sufficient to make this practice deserving of all abhorrence as a matter of taste merely, but when we consider the exquisite torture which the unhappy creatures must have suffered in girlhood, it is really wonderful that such a practice can so long have existed in any nation possessing even the first rudiments of civilization.

Min-te died in 934, in the first year of his reign, and was succeeded by Fei Tei, who paid the fearful price of fratricide for the throne. He possessed, it would seem, a great share of merely animal courage, and like the generality of persons who do so, he was distinguished for his exceeding barbarity. Even the Chinese, accustomed as they were to despotism in all its varieties of misuse, could not endure the excess and wantonness of his cruelty. A formidable revolt broke out; and finding himself hard pressed by his enemies, and abandoned at every moment by his troops, he collected the whole of his family together, and, like another Sardanapalus, set fire to his palace—his wealth, his family, and himself being consumed in the flames.

Kaou-tee now ascended the throne, being the first of the How-tsin dynasty. He was more the nominal than the real monarch, his minister, Hung-taiou, usurping a more than imperial power. The minister, in fact, is in every way more worthy of mention than the monarch, for according to the most credible accounts the invention of printing from blocks was a boon conferred by him upon China in the year 937.

Both this reign and that of Chuh-te, which closed this short-lived dynasty, were occupied in perpetual battling with the restless Tartars, who, for ages, seem to have had an instinctive certainty of having, sooner or later, the rule of China as the reward of their determined and pertinacious inroads.

In 960, Kung-te, a child of only six years of age, being upon the throne, the people arose and demanded his abdication. Of maternal and eunuch misgovernment they certainly had for centuries past had abundant and very sad experience. How far the successful aspirant to the throne was concerned in rousing their fears into activity and fervour does not appear; but it is certain that the revolt against the infant emperor, and the election of Chaou-quang-yin as his successor, were events in which the people showed great unanimity of feeling. This founder of the Sung dynasty did not commence his reign under the most promising circumstances; for on the ceremonial of his acceptance of the throne, he actually ascended it in a state of intoxication.

Nevertheless, this prince, who on his elevation to the throne took the name of Taou-tsoo, was in reality one of the best of the Chinese monarchs, both as a warrior and as a domestic ruler. The imbecility or infamy of some of his predecessors, and the pernicious habit into which others fell of leaving the actual administration of affairs in the hands of eunuchs and other corrupt favourites, had caused the court expenses as well as the court retinue to be swelled to a shameful extent. The new emperor, immediately after his accession, caused the most rigid enquiry to be made into the expenses of the state; and every useless office was abolished, and every unfair charge sternly and promptly disallowed. In effecting this great and important reform, the emperor derived no small advantage from having formerly been a private person, as in that capacity he no doubt would have the opportunity to note many abuses which could never be discovered by the emperor or any of the imperial princes. His frugality seems to have been as impartial as it was wise; for though he raised his family, for four generations, to the rank of imperial princes, he at the same time insisted upon their being content with the most moderate revenue that was at all consistent with their rank.

Though the election of the new emperor was nearly as unanimous as such an event can reasonably be expected to be, it must not be understood that his elevation met with no opposition, even of an armed character. On the contrary, the independent princes of Han and the extreme northern people of the empire rose in arms to oppose him.

NO PEOPLE ARE LESS PARTICULAR IN THEIR FOOD THAN THE CHINESE; WHATEVER IS CAPABLE OF AFFORDING NUTRIMENT IS EATEN BY THEM.

THE REPEATED ENDEAVOURS TO INTRODUCE CHRISTIANITY INTO CHINA, THROUGH EARLY MISSIONARIES, HAVE MET WITH BUT LITTLE SUCCESS.

When we bear in mind the long and indefatigable endeavours of the Tartars to obtain a footing in the interior of the Chinese empire, and couple that fact with that of their now leaguings with the Chinese rebels against the new emperor, we shall not be very presumptuous if we affirm that the opposition to him was in fact, though not in appearance and name, far more foreign than native. The emperor made immense levies of men throughout the provinces that were faithful to him, and marched against his enemies. The subsequent conflicts were dreadful; the troops of the Prince of Han well knowing that they had little mercy to hope for if taken prisoners, fought with the fury and obstinacy of deer, and they were well seconded by the Tartars. Thousands fell in each engagement; and though the emperor was a warrior, and a brave one, he is said to have often subsequently shed tears at the mere remembrance of the bloodshed he witnessed during this war. The overwhelming levies of the emperor, and, perhaps, that "tower of strength"—the royal name—which the adverse faction wanted, made him, but not still after a desperate struggle, completely successful.

Having put down this opposition, he next proceeded against the prince of Choo, whom he captured and deprived of his dominions. Among the millions of souls whom he thus added to his subjects was an extremely numerous and well-appointed army. This he forthwith incorporated with his own, and thus strengthened in force, marched against Kyang Nan and southern Han.

Here again he was completely successful, and he now turned his attention to the chastisement of the Mongols of Leon-tung, who had joined the prince of Han in the former war; but the issue of this expedition was still uncertain when the emperor died.

Though engaged in war from the beginning to the very end of his reign, this emperor was extremely attentive to the internal state of his empire, and more especially in a particular which previously had been but too much neglected—the impartial administration of justice. When he was not actually in the field he was at all times accessible; to the humblest as to the highest the gates of the imperial palace were always open, and in giving his decision he knew no distinction between the mandarin and the poor labourer. This conduct in his military and civil affairs produced him the enviable character of being "the terror of his enemies and the delight of his subjects." While actively engaged in the prosecution of the war against the Mongols, he was seized with an illness which terminated his valuable life, in the year 976.

Tae-tung, son of the last mentioned monarch, ascended the throne at the death of his father, whose warlike measures he proceeded to carry out, and whose warlike character and abilities he to a very great extent inherited. During his entire reign he was engaged in war; now with the Mongols, at that time the most threatening of all the enemies of the empire, and now with this or that refractory native prince. It is strange that in all the ages in which so much bloodshed and misery had been caused by wars between the princes and the emperors, the latter never thought, so far as we can perceive from the account now at hand of their proceedings, of the obvious and efficient policy of concentrating their forces upon the positions of individual princes, and on every decisive advantage over an individual prince thus unfavourably situated for resistance, demanding such a contribution in money as would effectually impoverish him; at the same time demanding as hostages from him, not only some of the more important of his own family, but of all the other great families connected with him. These measures, severe as they undoubtedly would have been upon individuals, would have been merciful indeed as regards the great mass of both the contending parties; moreover, the hostages might have been so employed and so treated at the imperial court as greatly to reduce the individual hardship. After twenty-one years of almost perpetual warfare, with many successes and comparatively few defeats, Tae-tung died in 997, leaving behind him a character only less honourable than that of his predecessor, inasmuch as he paid far less constant and minute attention to the internal order of the empire and the individual welfare of his subjects.

Chin-tung now succeeded to the empire, a prince whose character and conduct strangely contrasted with those of his two immediate predecessors. The bonzes, or priests, were the only persons who had reason to like him; and even their liking, excited though it was by personal advantage, must have been mixed with no slight feeling of contempt. There was no tale that they could tell him which was too extravagant for his implicit belief; no command too absurd for his unequalled obedience. Every morning the imperial sany was busied in relating his overnight dreams, and it need scarcely be said that the bonzes took especial care so to interpret those dreams as to tend to confirm the weak-minded and hypochondriac monarch in his furtive course, and to make that course as profitable as possible to themselves individually, and as favourable as possible to their order at large.

The bonzes were not the only persons who profited by this emperor's facility: the warlike, indefatigable, and shrewd Tartars speedily perceived the difference between an emperor who divided his time between dreaming and listening to the interpretations of his dreams—leaving the empire and its vast complicated interests to the care, or carelessness, of eunuchs and time servers—and the warlike and clear-headed emperors with whom they had to deal during the two preceding reigns. They poured in upon the empire with a fury proportioned to the ineffective resistance they anticipated, and their shrewd conjectures were amply justified by the event. Resistance, indeed, was made to them on the frontiers; but instead of their being driven beyond the frontiers with a message of mourning to thousands of Tartar families, their absence was purchased. Great stores of both money and silk were paid to them by order of the Chinese court, which, like the Romans when Rome had become utterly degenerate, was fain to purchase the peace it dared not or could not battle for.

Ying-taung, Shin-taung, and Hwuy-taung, the three immediate successors of the weak prince of whose reign we have just spoken, followed his impolitic and shameful policy of purchasing peace. We emphatically say impolitic, because common sense tells us that to yield tribute once, is to encourage the demand of it in future. And so it proved in this case. The tribute once secured, the hardy and unprincipled Tartars again returned to the charge, to be again bought off, and to derive, of course, renewed assurance of booty whenever they should again think proper to apply for it.

Hwuy-taung, the third of the emperors named above, having a dire perception of the error committed by himself and his three immediate predecessors, determined to adopt a new course, and, instead of bribing the "barbarians" who so cruelly annoyed him, to hire other barbarians to expel them, thus adding to the folly of buying peace the still farther folly of giving the clearest possible insight into the actual weakness of his condition, to those who, being his allies as long as they received his wages, would infallibly become his enemies the instant he ceased to hire them.

This prince engaged the warlike tribe of Neu-che Tartars in the defence of his territory. They ably and faithfully performed what they had engaged; but when they had driven out the Nien-cheng Tartars they flatly refused to quit the territory, and made a hostile descent upon the provinces of Pecheli and Shansi, which they took possession of. At the same time the Mongols were pouring furiously down upon the provinces of Shan-tong and Honan; and the terrified and utterly unwarlike emperor saw no other means of saving his dominions than by coming to immediate terms with his late allies and present foes—the victorious and imperious Neu-che Tartars. He accordingly went to their camp, attended by a splendid retinue of his chief officers, to negotiate not only for a peace, but also for their active and prompt aid against the Mongols. But the emperor had so long left the affairs of the empire in the hands of intriguers and venal sycophants, that he was not sufficiently acquainted with his actual position to take even ordinary precautions; he was literally sold by his ministers into the hands of his enemies; and on reaching the Tartar camp, he found that he was no longer a powerful prince treating for peace and alliance with an inferior people, but a powerless prisoner of war, in the hands of his enemies, and abandoned by his friends. And abandoned he indeed was, by all save his son. That spirited prince, faithful to his fallen father, and indignant at the treachery that had been practised against him, put the ministers to death, and gathered an immense force against the Mongols, who, in the meantime, had been making the most rapid and terrible advances. Rapine and fire marked their path whithersoever they went. The emperor's gallant and faithful son made admirable but useless efforts to approach them. Leaving devastation and misery in their rear, they rapidly approached the capital, laid siege to the imperial palace itself, butchered thousands of the inhabitants, including some of the imperial family, and sent the rest into captivity.

CHAPTER IV.

KAOU-TEUNG II. at this period reigned over the southern provinces. When the barbarians overran the northern parts of the empire he made bold and able attempts at beating them off from his dominions; but they were far too warlike and numerous for his limited resources. To the northern provinces and to the captive emperor he was unable to afford any assistance by force of arms, nor could his humbliest and most tempting offers to the savage foes induce them to liberate a prisoner or evacuate a rood of land. All that he was able to gain from them was permission to retain his own rule in peace, on paying an annual tribute and acknowledging his subjection.

During two succeeding reigns the Chinese enjoyed the blessings of peace; but the imprudence of Ning-taung, untaught by experience of the danger of calling in barbarian aid, brought into China a vast horde of Mongols—the fiercest and greediest even among the barbarous Tartar tribes.

In 1194 the celebrated Genghis Khan was at the head of the Mongol Tartars. At the outset of this warrior's career his people revolted from him, excepting only a very few families, on the ground of his being, at the death of his father, too young to rule a numerous and extremely warlike people. But the youth displayed so much talent and courage, and his earliest essays as a warrior were so entirely and strikingly successful, that the tide of opinion speedily turned in his favour; and an old and venerated Mongol chief having, in a public assembly of the people, propounded that the youth, then known by his family name of Temujin, would, if supported as he deserved to be, prove to be the greatest of their khans—Genghis Khan (the Mongol words for greatest king) was immediately made the youth's name by acclamation, and the bold, but barbarous and vacillating people as unanimously submitted to him now, as formerly they had seceded from him.

It was to this chief, who had already made his name a name of terror far beyond the banks of the Selings, the native abode of his fierce race, that Ning-taung, the then emperor, applied for aid to drive out other Tartars, by whom, as well as by native malcontents, the nation was very sorely oppressed at that period.

EDUCATION IN CHINA IS SO GENERAL, AND ITS COST SO REASONABLE, THAT READING AND WRITING ARE THERE ALMOST UNIVERSAL.

THE CHINESE EMPIRE OCCUPIES AN EXTENT OF SURFACE EQUAL TO THAT OF ALL EUROPE, WITH EVERY VARIETY OF SOIL AND CLIMATE.

Genghis Khan, already inured to conquest and thirsting for extended dominion, eagerly complied with the impolitic request of Ning-tung. During the reign of that monarch, and of Le-tung, by whom he was, at his death in 1225, succeeded, the Mongols passed from triumph to triumph, the unhappy natives suffering no less from the barbarians who were hired to defend them than from the other barbarians who avowedly entered the empire for purposes of rapine and bloodshed. Le-tung, a prince whose natural indolence was increased by his superstitious attachment to the most superstitious priests in his empire, was a voluntary prisoner in his palace, while the Mongols were driving from one province to another, not merely the intruding foe and foreigner, but also the rightful and already suffering inhabitant. The atrocities committed in what the Mongols seemed to be bent upon making an actual war of extermination were dreadful; the most authentic accounts, and those which seem most entirely free from exaggeration, speaking of the slaughter among the unfortunate people as amounting to some hundreds of thousands.

Genghis Khan dying, was succeeded by a grandson named Kublai; and Le-tung also dying, was succeeded by Too-tung. This last named prince was as debauched as his predecessor had been superstitious; and, wholly taken up with the gratification of his shameful sensuality, he saw, almost without a care or struggle, the Mongols under Kublai proceeding with their ravages, and Kublai at length become master of the northern provinces.

Thus far successful, it was not likely that the conquering chief should forbear from turning his attention to the southern provinces, which, as we learn from Marco Polo, was considered by far the most wealthy and splendid of the kingdoms of the east.

The very wealth of the southern empire, and its comparatively long exemption from war, rendered it pretty certain that it would easily be overrun by him who had conquered the harder and more experienced warriors of the north. Province after province and city after city was taken, without the experience on the part of the Mongols of anything even approaching to a severe check; many of the most powerful nobles, who were the most bound in honour and duty to have defended the country, actually joining the enemy.

With rapid and sure steps the enemy at length approached the city of Kinsai, the capital and royal residence, and wealthy to an extent not easily to be described. The then emperor, Kung-tung, seems to have despaired of successful defence against a foe so long and to such an extent victorious, and to have supposed that his empress could more successfully appeal to a victor's mercy than he could to the fortune of war. He accordingly got together all the treasure that could be at all conveniently embarked on board his fleet, gave the command of it to his most experienced naval commander, and put out to sea.

A strange circumstance is related of the siege of this city, a circumstance, to say the truth, which has so strong a family likeness to incidents that are given to other parties, both by authentic history and by fiction, that we give it with but little belief in its truth, and only relate it, lest in omitting so striking an incident, which is given by some very grave writers, we should lay ourselves open to the charge of carelessness in overlooking, or presumption in rejecting it.

The fact of the defence of Kinsai being committed to a beautiful woman, did not prevent Kublai from ordering his generals to use the utmost exertions in bringing the siege to a speedy conclusion. Such orders ensured an activity which reduced the empress and her garrison to the most alarming distresses; but the empress consoled herself under every new disaster by a prophecy which had been made by a court astrologer—a kind of cheat very popular with most of the Chinese monarchs of that time—that Kinsai could only be taken by a general having a hundred eyes. As such a specimen of natural history was by no means likely to appear, the empress allowed nothing to Jaunt her, until on enquiring the name of a general whom Kublai had entrusted to make a new and vigorous assault on the city, she was told that it was Chin san ba yan. These words—which mean the hundred-eyed—seemed in such ominous agreement with the requirement of the prophecy, that the empress allowed her hitherto high courage to give place to a superstitious horror, and she immediately surrendered the city, on receiving from Kublai assurance, which he very honourably fulfilled, of treatment and an allowance in conformity with her rank.

Sa-yan-fu, which was a far stronger city than the capital, and against which no superstitious influence was brought, held bravely out against the utmost efforts of the Mongols for upwards of three years. Marco Polo and his brother Nicolo, the Italian travellers and traders, anxious to ingratiate themselves with the formidable and prosperous Kublai, supplied him with besieging engines which threw stone balls of the tremendous weight of 120 pounds. Such missiles soon made practicable breaches in the hitherto impregnable walls. The town was stormed, and Kublai, enraged at its long and obstinate resistance, gave it up to the mercy of his troops.

CHAPTER V.

THE fugitive emperor found in some distant and strongly fortified islets, a shelter for his treasure, but not that safety for himself which he had sought with so much sacrifice of dignity and character. He had not long been at his post of ignoble security when he was seized with an illness which speedily terminated his life. The empress, who seems to have been altogether as brave and adventurous as her husband was timid, strengthened the fleet at Yae islands, under the command of the emperor's favourite admiral, Low-sewfoo, proclaimed Te-ping, her son, emperor, and repaired with him on board the fleet. The Mongol fleet, after attacking Canton, hove in sight of the imperial fleet, when a tremendous action commenced and continued for an entire day. The Mongols, though even their loss was dreadful, were victorious, and the Chinese or imperial fleet was so much shattered that Low-sewfoo found it impossible to get his crippled vessels through the straits. Dreading the very worst from the resentment which Kublai was likely to feel at this new resistance on the part of the empress, that brave but unfortunate woman committed suicide by jumping overboard. Her terrible example was followed by several of her principal attendants, including the admiral, who leaped overboard with the young emperor in his arms. So disastrous a day as this could not fail to be decisive; all the comparatively small part of the south that had hitherto held out was quickly overrun, and the whole empire was now under a Mongol emperor concentrated into one. Under the title of Shi-tau, Kublai ascended the imperial throne in 1279, and in so doing laid the foundation of the Yuen dynasty.

With the greediness and want of judgment with which conquerors, in common with more vulgar gamblers, appear to be incurably afflicted, Shi-tau having obtained the mighty and vast empire of China, now determined to use its resources in adding Japan to his already unwieldy possession. But this time he was fated to a fortune very different from that which usually attended him. The Japanese, instead of shrinking at the approach of a force that from its previous successes might well have made them pause as to the prudence of resistance, fortified their forts in the strongest manner time would admit. One being at length taken, the resistance of the garrison was punished by the butchery of every man, without exception, eight of the number being beaten to death with clubs. The real reason of this cruel distinction being awarded to the eight unhappy persons was, most likely, that they were distinguished either in their rank or in the zeal and determination of their resistance. But the fondness that exists for the marvellous has caused this occurrence to be attributed to the somewhat inexplicable mechanical impossibility of putting them to death by decapitation, on account of iron chains which they wore round their necks.

The brutal cruelty displayed by Shi-tau or his officers to the garrison of this single fort, was productive of no advantage to his arms. Before the terror such barbarity might possibly have carried into the hearts of other garrisons had time to produce weakness or treachery, a tremendous storm arose by which a great portion of the Tartar, or rather the Tartar-Chinese, fleet was wrecked. The extent of injury so alarmed the commanders, that they hastened home with the remainder of their ships, abandoning many thousand of their followers to the vengeance of the Japanese.

Shi-tau died in 1295; and it was not until his grandson, Tching-sung, ascended the throne, and began to imitate the ambitious and warlike conduct of his great predecessor, that anything worthy of even casual mention occurred in the history of the subjugated people of China.

Tching-sung is better known in Europe as Timoor the Tartar, or Tamerlane, whose treatment of his opponent Bajazet has been made the subject of so many dramas and tales. His name of Timoor (the iron) seems to have been exactly suited to his energetic, untiring, and unsparing nature. Fixing the imperial residence at Samarcand, he appears to have formed the project of carrying on the work of subjugation to the utmost possible extent in all directions. Persia, Georgia, and Delhi, speedily felt and succumbed to his power; he drove the Indians quite to the Ganges, and utterly destroyed Astracan and other places in that direction. Bajazet, the Ottoman monarch, seems to us to have had the most just cause imaginable to arrest the course of a man who was evidently determined upon making himself, if possible, the sole monarch of the east. But the Ottoman was far inferior to the Tartar in that strength which is as important to success as even a good cause itself. We are assured that while Bajazet had only 120,000 men, his opponent brought 700,000 into the field. Probably the force of Tamerlane has been very much exaggerated, though even allowing for great exaggeration there can be no doubt that, in numbers, the army of Bajazet was infinitely exceeded by that of his opponent. The day on which this tremendous battle was fought was sultry in the extreme, yet so obstinate were both parties, that the contest continued from the morning until a late hour at night. The comparatively small army of Bajazet was in the end completely routed, and the unfortunate monarch himself taken prisoner. The conduct of Tamerlane on this occasion was such as would cast disgrace on the most signal courage and talents. Instead of allowing the sympathies of a brave man to soften him towards his singularly brave though unfortunate opponent, he had him put into an iron cage and carried from place to place with him in all his excursions, exhibiting him as one would a wild beast, and at the same time displaying on his own part a temper far more like that of a wild beast than a brave and successful warrior. The unfortunate Bajazet lived in this most pitiable condition until the year 1403, when he died, as tradition says, and as was most likely, of a broken heart.

Tamerlane during his various and extensive expeditions had committed the internal government of his empire to certain princes of his house—his grandsons and nephews. Their authority and character being far less respected and feared than his own, several insurrections had taken place, and Tamerlane, or Tchin-sung, now marched towards China with the avowed determination of inflicting severe chastisement; but as he was advancing with forced marches for that purpose, he was seized with an illness which terminated both his enterprises and his life, in 1308.

After the death of the formidable Tamerlane his descendants kept up a perpetual scramble for the empire, in which they contrived the utter ruin of the high character they owed to him. A series of revolts and intrigues followed each other during the rule or the strifes of some succeeding emperors and pretenders; and the next event of which we feel it necessary to give any account is an embassy sent from Persia to China in the reign of Yunglo, also called Ching-tsao.

The account of this embassy is the more interesting, because it gives us considerable insight into the manners and state of society in China at that time, and mentions what Marco Polo does not—tea, to which, more than aught else, China owes its importance in the eyes of the modern inhabitants of Europe. Even at this early period the Chinese seem to have all the modern jealousy of the entrance of strangers into the so-called "Celestial Empire." Before the embassy in question was allowed even to set foot upon the boundaries of the empire, an exact list of all persons belonging to the embassy was required, including even the very humblest attendants, and the ambassadors-in-chief were called upon to swear to the truth and exactness of the list. Chinese jealousy being satisfied thus far, the embassy commenced its toilsome journey of one hundred days towards the capital. It is only fair to add, however, that after their first suspicion was formally and officially silenced, there seems to have been a most liberal hospitality shown in the way of substantial good fare, accompanied by an unstinted supply of excellent wines.

The capital of China, Cambulu, now known far better by the name of Peking, is spoken of as being even at that time a city of great magnitude and opulence. It would seem not unlikely that the silly absurdity of the Chinese, in speaking of such people as the English, Dutch, and other highly civilised Europeans, under the opprobrious name of outside barbarians, is an absurdity which others beside the Chinese are unfortunately guilty of. The way in which modern writers allow themselves to speak of the Chinese is in many things to be equally reprobated.

The long intercourse with Jesuits, missionaries, and others specially sent there, with a reference to their science, judgment, and aptitude for the difficult business of communicating, not merely knowledge itself but also the desire for it, could scarcely have left the Chinese so much behind the rest of the world in invention and practice in the higher productions, even had no progress been previously made by them. But when so early as the 15th century we hear of such an achievement as the Turning

Tower, of which we are about to give a description, who will consent to believe that above four centuries later they are the backward and ignorant people they are called?

That really wonderful structure, the turning tower, is stated by shrewd and intelligent observers to whom we owe our knowledge of it, to be worthy of the visit and careful examination of every smith and carpenter upon the face of the earth. What, in fact, are we acquainted with of merely human construction that can for an instant bear comparison with a tower fifteen stories high, each story twelve cubits high, and the whole edifice twenty cubits in circumference? What can surpass the ingenuity of the people who could make this large structure, having a total height of 180 cubits which turns round upon a metal axis; and that with little more difficulty than if it were merely a child's toy? Assuredly, the people who even in whim could erect such a structure as this at a period of more than four centuries ago, cannot now be the incapable and unprovided race which many late accounts would represent them.

The emperor's palace at Peking is described as being rich and spacious in the extreme. While the ambassadors and their suite were there, it was constantly surrounded by about two thousand musicians, playing and singing anthems to the praise of the emperor, whose throne was of solid gold, ascended by a flight of nine silver steps. On the emperor ascending this extremely gorgeous throne, the chiefs of the embassy were introduced; and after a brief and merely formal audience, at which they did not prostrate themselves in the Chinese fashion, but bowed in that of the Persians, they were reconducted to the apartments provided for them, where a sheep, a goose, and (two fowls, with fruit, vegetables, and tea, were daily served out to every six persons!

The evil deed, whether of man or nation, very rarely proves to be other than an evil seed. The unprovoked aggression of the Chinese-Tartars under Kuhlai, was not only productive of great injury to the Chinese fleet at the time, but led to very many subsequent losses and calamities. Favourably situated as Japan was for the maintenance of a fleet, it was a power upon which such a piratical attack as that of Kuhlai could not be made without incurring serious danger of heavy reprisals.

Tiu-taung, an extremely well-inclined prince, found the attacks of the Japanese so frequent and so fearfully injurious to his people, and to the imperial fleet, that his earliest care was directed to that subject. The Japanese, an essentially seafaring people, had, according to the least exaggerated accounts, from six to seven thousand vessels of various sizes, manned with their most daring and unprincipled people, not a few of them ready for piracy and murder, as a part of their proper trade. Running suddenly into the Chinese ports, the daring adventurers committed acts not merely of robbery, but of the most wanton destruction of property and life, firing whole towns and villages, and retiring with immense booty. During the eleven years of his reign the emperor Tin-tung was so spirited and incessant in his opposition to these daring rovers, that he would most probably have permanently rid his country of them, had his life not been so early terminated.

Suen-tung, who succeeded to the last-named emperor, was but barely allowed to ascend the throne when he was about to be dethroned by some of the grandees of the empire, among whom was his own uncle. Fortunately for the emperor, his army was more faithful to him than the grandees; and after a most obstinate engagement between it and the force of the insurgents, the latter were completely overthrown. With a far greater lenity than would have been shown by some monarchs after being so early and so deeply offended, the emperor spared the lives of the ringleaders, though, as a sheer matter of self-defence, he reduced some of them to the rank of commoners, and confiscated the estates of others.

Though the commencement of his reign was thus stormy, he was very little disturbed by revolts afterwards, to the time of his death in 1436. He was succeeded by Ching-tung, a minor; the empress dowager being his guardian, and the real state authority being divided between her and her chief adviser, the eunuch Wan-chin. This latter personage seems to have had nobler and more spirited notions of government than were commonly displayed by the effeminate and venal court favourites. He not only took prompt and active measures for repressing the Tartars, who annoyed the Tartar-Chinese with as much impartiality as though they had been still a purely Chinese people and government, but also took the field in person. Both he and the youthful emperor were taken prisoners, and matters began to look very prosperously for the Tartars, who were not only more expert in the use of the newly introduced fire-arms, but also invariably used them, which upon certain solemn days the Chinese, from superstitious notions, refused to do. As a matter of course, the Tartars always sought every chance of taking them at so great a disadvantage, and made fearful havoc whenever they contrived to do so. But the bold spirit which Wan-chin had infused into the councils of the imperial court, soon turned the scale. The imperial authority was assumed by King-tae, who, however, subsequently showed that he had assumed such authority in the trustful spirit of a loyal subject and most honourable man. He advanced against the Tartars, and opposed them with such skill, courage, and tenacity, that he completely defeated them, compelled them to restore the young Ching-tung to liberty, unransomed, and then immediately descended from a dignity that has so often been obtained by the commission of the most detestable crimes, and placed upon the throne the young sovereign whom his valour and conduct had already restored to liberty. The remainder of the reign of Ching-tung, about ten years, was comparatively peaceful and prosperous.

The early part of the 16th century produced an event of which even yet the consequences are but partially and dimly seen—the appearance of the Portuguese at China. They went there merely as adventurous mariners and keen traders; but it is quite within the pale of probability that before such another space as three hundred years, the whole vast population may have—as the remote consequence of what to men doubtless seemed the merely accidental and incidental settlement, after much striving, of a mere handful of Christians—become converted to Christianity, and contributing to the demand for European industry and the consequent increase of European happiness.

To India the Portuguese had already made their way by the Cape of Good Hope, and in India they had an extremely flourishing settlement. The governor of the Portuguese in India determined to send a somewhat imposing embassy to China; accordingly, Andrada and Peres, the two ambassadors, sailed to Canton, their own vessel being under a convoy of eight large ships, well manned and armed. Peres and Andrada, with two vessels, were allowed to proceed up the river on their embassy. While they did so, the crews and merchants who were left with the other vessels in the Canton river, busied themselves in endeavouring to trade with the natives. As usual, wherever a turbulent body of seamen is concerned, the laws of meum and tuum were frequently set at naught, and this one-sided system of free-trading so greatly enraged the Chinese, that the little fleet was surrounded by the Chinese war junks, and only escaped capture by the opportune occurrence of a severe storm. Peres, though far up the country, and personally innocent, was seized by the Chinese as the scape-goat of his fellow countrymen's offences. He was hurried back to Canton with the utmost ignominy, loaded with irons, and put into a prison, from which he never again emerged until death set him free.

About this time a state of bloodshed and horror existed in China, such as probably was never before equalled, even in that country of distraction, the annals of which are so confused by usurpations, intermingling of dynasties, and alterations in territorial extent and nomenclature, that the historian who desires to convey truth is not unfrequently obliged to allow his pen to pause until the current of the older histories becomes less turbid and torrent-like.

On the accession, in 1627, of Hwae-tung, the Tartars, who, during the comparatively quiet seven years reign of this emperor's immediate predecessor, had been preparing themselves for war, broke out fiercely and suddenly. The time was peculiarly favourable to their anticipated overthrow of the empire, which was overrun by two robbers, whose armies were not only more numerous than that of the emperor, but had already so far beaten it as to have obtained possession of some important provinces. City after city had fallen before these fierce rebels, and the imperial troops were in some places reduced to such an extremity of famine, that the bodies of executed criminals formed a portion of their disgusting food, and human flesh was, without shame or remark, exposed for sale in the open market. The imperial general was at length so pressed by the rebel troops, that being at once in despair of successful resistance, and determined not to surrender, he caused the dykes to be cut through which restrained the river Hoang-ho from inundating the country in which he was encamped, and at one fell swoop he and the whole of the troops and inhabitants, in all above 200,000, were drowned.

If the affairs of the empire were desperate before, the loss of this force could not fail to complete the ruin. The rebels and robbers who had alone been so formidable, now united with the wily Mantchoo Tartars, who had so well known how to "bide their time." The unfortunate emperor finding that there was no longer any hope or safety for him even in his own palace, strangled himself. The last city that endeavoured to make head against the victorious and formidable Tartars and robbers was Tac-yuen. The inhabitants, and a comparative handful of imperial troops, defended this with a stern obstinacy, which, under a different state of things in the empire at large, would have been very likely to save it; the Tartars were repulsed again and again, until the very number of their slain enabled them to fill up the ditches and mount. Instead of admiring the gallantry of their conquered opponents, and treating them with mercy, the Tartars savagely put the inhabitants to the sword, and then gave the devoted city to the flames.

Woo San-quel, an able politician as well as a brave general, did not, even now that the emperor was slain, and the most precious parts of the empire in the hands of the Tartars or rebels, despair of retrieving affairs. By a lavish distribution of rich presents he engaged the Mantchoo leaders to abandon the cause of the rebels, and to join with him against their chief.

Woo San-quel's policy succeeded in procuring him the alliance of the Mantchoo Tartars; and, aided by them, he vanquished their former allies, the rebels, after a series of achievements on both sides, that equal anything recounted in the wars of the most distinguished generals of ancient times.

But a new proof was now exhibited of the danger of purchased allies, who, like the elephants used in Indian warfare, are liable to become as formidable to their friends as to their foes. The Tartars having put down the rebels, took possession of Pekin (or Cambulu), which they expressed their determination to "protect," a word to which armed protectors attach a meaning very different from that assigned to it by the protected. They proclaimed Shun-che, a son of their own monarch, emperor of the northern provinces of China, the seat of his government being Pekin, while the princes and mandarins of the southern provinces proclaimed Choo-yew, the seat of whose government was at Nankin.

CHAPTER VI.

Tsuan being a northern and a southern empire, and the thrones being respectively filled by a Tartar and a Chinese, it might easily have been foreseen that war and bloodshed would once more vex the unhappy people of both empires; and the opposite natures of the two emperors, far from decreasing, increased this probability. The emperor of the South was unworthy of his high station, and ill calculated for its peculiar exigencies at that time. His indolence and gross sensuality, added, no doubt, to the tyrannies of the subordinates to whom he committed the cares of state, while he abandoned himself to his indulgences, caused a spirit of revolt to show itself, which the northern emperor was not slow to avail himself of. Marching rapidly upon the southern provinces, he possessed himself of the capital, Nankin, and after a long series of successes, became master of the whole empire, with the exception of some few comparatively unimportant portions; and the princes of even these may be said to have been his tributaries rather than independent rulers.

Shun-che was the first emperor of China who came into direct hostile collision with the Russians, who, in his reign made their way to the great river Amur on the borders of Tartary. The Russians seized upon Dauri, a fortified Tartar town of some strength, and in several battles obtained signal advantages. But subsequently the Chinese recovered their ground, and a treaty was entered into by which all the northern bank of the Amur, together with the sole navigation of that river, was assigned to the Chinese, and Tobolsk was fixed as the neutral trading ground of the two nations.

Busily and successfully as Shun-che was engaged in war, he seems to have been by no means insensible to the importance of the arts of peace. The Portuguese and other missionaries and scholars who, in despite of almost innumerable obstacles, had by this time settled themselves in China, in considerable numbers, found at the hands of this warlike monarch a degree of friendship and patronage highly creditable to him. He not only prevented them from being subjected to any annoyance, but even appointed one of them, Adam Schaal, to the post of superintendent of mathematics, a post at that time, of some importance in Germany, and one that gave opportunity, of which Schaal in the next reign very skillfully availed himself, of obtaining the highest influence in the state.

Shun-che, though an energetic man, as is evident by his warlike achievements, and a sensible man, as we may judge both from the favour he showed to learned foreigners,

SO INDUSTRIOUS ARE THE CHINESE, THAT THERE IS SCARCELY A MOOD OF AIRBORN GROWN THAT IS NOT ARTIFICIOUSLY CULTIVATED.

and the readiness with which he accepted of their instruction in many branches of learning, was, at the same time, somewhat of a sensualist. Towards the close of his life he devoted an undue portion of his time to pleasure, and his death, which took place in 1661, is said to have occurred through excess of grief, occasioned by the death of a favourite concubine; of which, had we not so many instances on record of human inconsistency, one would have supposed it impossible for a man of his stern and martial nature to be guilty.

Kang-he, who now ascended the throne, was a minor; four principal personages of the empire forming the regency. The German, Schaal, was appointed to the important post of principal tutor. Such was the influence Schaal acquired in this position, that he was virtually for some time prime minister of China.

But the abilities of Schaal and the other missionaries, though they could raise them to power and influence, could not guard them from envy. The Chinese literati, and even the regents themselves, at length became excited to anger by the very learning they had availed themselves of, and by the influence it had procured for the foreigners, through Schaal; for among the many services he had rendered to the state, it is said that on one occasion he actually preserved Macao from destruction. But envy was a-foot, the most absurd charges were made against the missionaries, and they were at length deprived of all employment, while many of them were loaded with chains and thrown into prison. Schaal, who was now far advanced in years and very infirm, sank beneath his afflictions soon after their commencement, and died at the age of seventy-nine. It is much to the credit of the young emperor that he had so well profited by the instructions of his foreign friends, that as soon as he attained his majority he restored them to their influence and appointments, the place of the deceased Schaal being bestowed upon the missionary Verbelat. We must, perhaps, blame rather the barbarous cruelty of his time and country when we add, that on discovering that his four guardians and regents of the empire were the chief instigators of the disgrace and suffering that had been inflicted on the missionaries, he confirmed the horrid decree of the tribunal, which sentenced not only the offenders, but also their unfortunate families to be cut into a thousand pieces!

We have previously alluded to the skill and courage evinced by the general Woon-san-quei when the Mantchoo Tartars and the rebels caused so much misery to the empire; when the Mantchoo Tartars, after aiding him in putting down the rebels, had fairly established the Mantchoo dynasty upon the throne, the general was appointed governor of Kweichow and Yun-nan. His position in the north west of the empire, discontent with his command, distinguished as it was, added, perhaps, to a natural restlessness and love of warfare, caused him now to levy war upon the neighbouring places. His military skill and his great resources speedily enabled him to make himself master of the southern and western provinces. His success was at once so great and so rapid, that the emperor and his court were thrown into consternation, and Verbelat, who among his numerous abilities included that of a founder of great guns, was applied to to superintend the casting of some. From some inexplicable motives he declined compliance with the request, or rather the order, for as a high officer of the empire such he must have felt it. To suppose a religious scruple, in the case of men so ambitious as the missionaries had shown themselves, and so pliable as they had been in far less justifiable courses on the part of the court, is difficult; and yet on no other ground can we reconcile Verbelat's refusal on this occasion with his sanity. Certain it is, that he not only refused, but persisted in so doing, until significant hints that his refusal was attributed to collusion with the rebels, showed him that his life would not be safe did he not comply with the emperor's wishes. Cannon were then cast, and the speedy consequence was, that Woon-san-quei, who, probably, would in a brief space have been master of the capital and the throne, was beaten back within safe limits. Woon San-quei, after another unsuccessful endeavour at usurping the empire, died in 1679, and was succeeded in what remained of his power, by his son, who shortly after put an end to his own life.

In 1680 the Mongol Tartars assailed the emperor, but the cannon with which European skill in the great game of manslaughter had furnished him, enabled him to beat off these enemies with greater ease. He had the same success over the Eleuths on the north western frontier of the empire.

Successful in war by the aid of the missionaries, he was no less so in commerce; the czar, Peter the Great, would in all probability, but for their mediation, have been prevented from concluding a peace with China; and though the commercial advantages which resulted from that peace were not immediate, they were vast and certain. As a whole, the reign of this emperor may be considered by far the noblest of all spoken of in his country's annals. As a military sovereign he will bear comparison even with the daring and hardy Kublai; while, like our own Elizabeth, he had the rare merit—scarcely inferior to genius itself—of skill in discovering genius, and of steady support to ministers possessing it, regardless of court intrigue and court jealousies. Canton, in his reign, even more than it has ever been in our time, was a port open to all nations, and by commerce with all nations was China enriched; and his people had real cause for grief when he died, in the year 1722.

Yung-ching, who now ascended the throne, began his reign by an act which held out but little hopes that he would distinguish himself by wisdom like that of his predecessor. It has been seen that in the preceding reign the missionaries had performed the most important services. In doing so, and in enjoying the high imperial favour which those services secured to them, it was to be expected that they should incur many enmities; and had the new emperor been as wise as his predecessor, to such enmities would he have attributed the host of complaints which now assailed his ears. But the emperor was at least equal to any man in his vast dominions in fierce and bigoted hatred of Christianity; and he gladly received and implicitly listened to all complaints against the missionaries and their native converts, who at this time probably numbered about a quarter of a million. Orders were issued for the expulsion of the whole of the missionaries, with the exception of a few whose mathematical attainments rendered their services of the utmost consequence to the court; and there were a few sheltered at the imminent risk of both parties by the more zealous of their pupils, and thus enabled to evade the edict and in some measure to preserve the leading truths of their teaching among the native converts. But it was a very insignificant number of these missionaries that remained in China owing to both these causes, and the whole of their chapels and stations were either sacked and destroyed by ferocious mobs, converted into public offices, or perverted to idolatrous worship. The excessive violence which this emperor displayed towards the catholic missionaries caused the king of Portugal in 1720 to dispatch an embassy to the emperor on their behalf. The ambassadors were received with distinction; but, though general promises were given even with profusion, the converts to Christianity derived not the slightest practical benefit from this interference on their behalf. The persecution of Christianity in China was, indeed, no exception to the general rule—for the more the persecution raged, the more numerous did the proselytes become. It would seem that the errors of their heathenism were in too many cases blended by the converts with the truths they were taught by the missionaries; and even the most intelligent of the higher classes were seen to worship the images of saints, as formerly they had worshipped the idols of their native superstition. Christian charity demands that we should attribute this unfortunate confusion of ideas to the obstinate and ineradicable superstition of the converts, rather than to neglect or design on the part of the teachers.

Unhappily, in the year 1726 a new and more terrible persecution took place. Both torture and imprisonment, the former in most cases terminating, after the most frightful agonies, in the death of the sufferers, were now resorted to in every corner of the land where a Christian could be discovered. Deep policy, however, was mixed up with this vengeful spirit; and to avoid the persecution it was only necessary to declare reconversion to Confucius or Buddha. It may easily be supposed that, under such circumstances, the number of Christians was, nominally at least, soon reduced to a mere handful. One of the causes of this terrible persecution was a dreadful famine which occurred in the previous year, and which was attributed to the sin of conversion to Christianity. With the usual inconsistency of fanaticism, it was quite overlooked, that of the hundreds of thousands who perished, not one in a thousand had ever even heard of Christianity.

The year 1730 was marked by an event which Yung-ching's worst flatterers could not, after his two terrible persecutions of the Christians, venture to attribute to any undue encouragement of the new faith. The whole province of Pecheli—in which Peking is situated—was shaken by an earthquake. The imperial city was for the most part laid in ruins; and the emperor, who was at the time walking in the garden, was violently thrown to the ground. In Peking alone upwards of 10,000 souls perished by this lamentable occurrence, and at least thrice that number in other parts of the province. The emperor distributed upwards of a quarter of a million of money for the relief of the survivors. The bigotry and cruelty of this prince can scarcely be excused on the plea of his being ill advised, for it is certain that he was personally aware of the great benefits that the calumniated and persecuted missionaries had conferred upon his people.

The best that can be said of his reign is, that it was a peaceful one; and the interval of peace would have been infinitely more valuable than it was, had the Christians and their foreign and highly intelligent instructors been allowed to improve it to the best advantage. He died in the year 1735.

CHAPTER VII.

THE throne was now filled by Kienlung; whose first act was to recall the princes and courtiers who had been banished by his father. This done, he put down some revolts among the Elenhs and other tribes on the north-western frontiers. Probably it was the vigour with which he executed this latter measure, that caused a deputation to be sent from Russia to settle the disputes which were perpetually breaking out as to the trade between the two countries.

Ragusinski, who was at the head of the Russian embassy, acquitted himself with so much address, that he obtained a treaty by which a Russian caravan, not to exceed two hundred in number, was to visit China for purposes of trade once in every three years; a church was to be erected; and a limited number of Russians were to take up their permanent abode in the Chinese capital for the purpose of acquiring the language.

In this treaty, which is called "the treaty of Kiachta," the Chinese authorities, urged no doubt by sound considerations of mercantile profit, conceded much, yet they could not forbear from giving one characteristic specimen of the extreme jealousy of the national polity. Thus though a caravan was permitted to visit the capital, it was to halt upon the frontiers until the arrival of the proper officer to conduct it through the emperor's people.

The next important event of this reign was the expedition sent by the emperor in 1767 against the Burmese. This expedition seems to have originated wholly in the most wanton lust of war on the part of the Chinese, who, in the sequel, were very deservedly punished. An army of above a 100,000 men marched into Burmah; but no regular army appeared to oppose its progress. As it penetrated farther, however, every foot of country, and especially where swamp or jungle rendered the route naturally more difficult, had to be traversed with active and daring hordes of guerrillas hovering upon its rear and flanks, cutting off stragglers, pouring suddenly down upon weak detachments or divisions—such as the very nature of the country made inevitable; and, in short, acting with such efficient destructiveness, that the Chinese lost upwards of 50,000 men without ever coming to a general engagement! Incredible as it would seem in European warfare, of the immense army of 100,000 men, only 2000 returned to China—the rest were all killed or taken prisoners; and all in the latter category were naturalized and settled in Burmah. Even this horrible loss of life did not prevent the emperor from persisting in his unjust scheme. He sent a still greater force under his favourite general A-quei, who was as fond of war and as ferocious as himself. Choosing what he thought a less difficult line of march, A-quei had scarcely entered the Burmese territory when he found that if he had fewer human enemies to contend against than his predecessor, he had a still more deadly and irresistible enemy, the jungle fever. He saw his men perish around him by thousands, and he was glad to hasten from the deadly place with even a diminished army, rather than remain to see it wholly annihilated. And the result of all this loss was, that China was obliged to agree to a treaty which confined her dominion within her natural frontiers, thereby giving to Burmah rich gold and silver mines which otherwise would have remained undisputed in the possession of China.

Keen-Lung was engaged in several minor warfare originating in endeavours of the more distant northern and western tribes to throw off the yoke.

The Mahometan Tartars, a brave and bigotted race, made an inroad into the province of Shen-si; A-quei, who was sent against them, called upon them to surrender the city in which they had entrenched themselves, and, on being refused, took it by storm, and put every human being he found within the walls to the sword, save a few of the chiefs whom he sent to court. The emperor, whose blood-thirsty nature was such that he was accustomed to have criminals tortured in his presence, ordered these unhappy chiefs to be tortured before his assembled court, and then cut to pieces and thrown to the dogs! Not content with this sanguinary act, the monster gave orders to A-quei to march upon the Mahometan Tartars, and put all to the sword who were above fifteen years of age.

Many, very many, rebellions took place during this reign; among them was that of the people of the island of Formosa. The mandarins who acted as viceroys in this island were guilty of the most shameful exactions and cruelties. On one occasion they put to death a mandarin who had ill-treated them. The viceroy of Fuh-keen, being commissioned to avenge the death of the mandarin, sailed to the island and sacrificed victims to his manes, without regard to the guilt or innocence of those he immolated. The Formosans soon became so enraged that they rose en masse, butchered every Chinese and Tartar in the island, and were only at length induced to return to their yoke—after having bravely beaten off the imperial feet—on being indemnified for their losses, and assured against the recurrence of the tyranny of which they complained.

As though fairly wearied out with the strife and bloodshed of sixty years of perpetual warfare, Keen-lung abdicated the throne in favour of his son Kea-king. Though he never personally commanded his armies, he caused more bloodshed than, probably, any modern commander, with the single exception of Napoleon.

Kea-king's first use of his power was to renew those persecutions of the catholics which in the last reign had seemed to be falling into desuetude. Torture and death were the fate of many; still more were sentenced to wear the caigou or wooden collar during their lives, or were banished to Tartary, which last was a singularly impolitic punishment, as the Tartars needed no discontented men to incite them to revolt.

A rebellion of a very threatening nature, inasmuch as some members of the imperial family, and other principal persons were concerned in it, was planned in 1803. By some fortunate accident, or, still more probably, through the treachery of some of the confederates, the plot was discovered ere it was ripe for execution. Many of the principal conspirators were put to death, and others only escaped death to suffer the confiscation of their property, which was peculiarly acceptable to the almost utterly empty treasury of the emperor.

In 1792 lord Macartney was sent as ambassador to China, to endeavour to establish our trade with that country upon a better and surer footing, and more especially to obtain for the British factory a cessation of the insolence and extortion of the viceroy of Canton. The embassy was productive of but little good effect. The insolent and extortionate viceroy was recalled, it is true, but his predecessor was not long in office ere he went far beyond him in both of those bad qualities. The ambassador was blamed at home for having been too high and unbending in his demeanour; but the truth is, that the time had not come for a proper understanding to exist between the Chinese and any European nation.

When in 1808 it was feared that Buonaparte would aim at our eastern trade, admiral Drury was ordered to Macao; but after much wordy disputation between the Chinese authorities there and the admiral, the latter retired after a slight collision in which we lost one man. The Chinese pretended to have gained a great victory, a magniloquent account of the same was sent to Peking, and a pagoda actually erected to commemorate it.

In 1816 another ambassador, lord Amherst, was sent to China, but his mission was to the full as unsatisfactory as that of lord Macartney.

It was about this time that the opium speculation began to grow to something like a noticeable extent—but on that head we shall have to speak at length in our next chapter.

After twenty-five years reign, marked far more by despotic temper than by the talent necessary to render it effective, Kea-king died in the year 1830, and was succeeded by the present monarch.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE reigning emperor of China, Taoukwang, is the second son of the preceding monarch, and owes his rise to the throne, in preference to his elder brother, to the great resolution and attachment to his father, displayed by him on an occasion of a revolt. The parties concerned in it had proceeded to such an extent, that some of them actually forced their way into the palace, with the avowed intention of putting the emperor, Kea-king, to death. Taoukwang, with a mere handful of the imperial guards, repulsed the conspirators, two of whom he shot with his own hand. Since his advancement to the throne, however, he has by no means displayed the vigour that might have been anticipated. He has for the most part committed the management of affairs to his ministers and favourites, and given himself up to effeminate pleasure in the seclusion of his palace.

The Mahometan inhabitants of eastern Turkestan and the Formosan islanders have revolted, but have hitherto been subdued. Their discontents, however, will probably at no distant time have great effect upon the destinies of the empire. The Chinese, to a man, are said to detest the Tartar race; and though the vast population of the empire would at first sight appear to render its subjugation by England an event of the highest improbability, the clashing opinions and interests of the constituent portions of that population may, at some future time, possibly render the vastness of the empire a principal cause of an entire alteration in both its political and religious condition.

A strong proof that strength is not necessarily the consequence of the numerical superiority of China was furnished a very few years since. A serious revolt occurred in the province of Canton, where, from its facility of communication with "the outside barbarians," revolt was especially to be feared, and to be put down, whenever occurring, with the sternest promptitude. But though the Celestial Empire boasts its standing army of a million of fighting men, the general Le, who was ordered to quell this revolt, could barely muster a few hundreds of ill armed and ill disciplined troops, and he was obliged to resort to the Chinese panacea of paying an immense pecuniary bribe to the rebels.

The trade of England, as well as of all other nations, with China has ever been subject to such restrictions, and been liable to so many interruptions, from the caprice of the Chinese and from the insolence with which those caprices have been acted upon, that it has of necessity from time to time very much partaken of the character of smuggling—even as regards articles to which no moral exception could by possibility be taken.

During the memorable "opium" dispute, this fact seems to have been much neglected by many of the leading political writers of England. They have looked at the question rather as a moral than a political one, and have blamed our political resistance to national insult because that resistance happened to be made upon a point in which a moral question was artfully mixed up with it by the Chinese.

No sane man will pretend to vindicate the trading in opium otherwise than as a very important article of materia medica; no one will say that it is otherwise than highly desirable that the use of this "insane" drug as a means of intoxication should be prohibited. But, we repeat, though our collision with the Chinese has chanced to arise upon the question of the importation of opium, the moral consideration as to the sale and use of that drug are really quite beside the question: had the article of trade been Yorkshire cloths or Birmingham hardware, the same collision must sooner or later have taken place.

Opium was imported into China as early as the 17th century, and it was not until towards the close of the 18th century that Kea-king prohibited it. We applaud him for doing this. It was high time to put some check upon the use of it; for though it was professedly imported only as a medicinal drug, it was imported to the extent of 1000 chests per annum as early as 1767, and the importation had been perpetually increasing in amount up to 1796. Up to this time, he it remembered, the traffic was strictly legal; it paid a duty of five mace per catty, and was for the most part delivered to and bonded by the government.

It is clear that from 1796 the trade in this drug was mere smuggling; equally clear that whether John Tomkins or "The Company" was the trader, that trader was a smuggler. We will go farther. When the East India Company, having the monopoly of the eastern trade, compelled the ryots of Patna to grow opium instead of rice, and compelled the ryots of divers other parts of the Anglo-Indian territory to do the same, the act was one which the English press ought loudly to have denounced, and which the English senate ought to have put a stop to, on pain of the loss of the Company's charter. All this is clear as noon-day; but there is another consideration. The government of China is essentially paternal; from the emperor to the lowest officer of his state link connects link, as from the father of a family to his youngest child or his meanest servant. The trade in opium was forbidden from time to time by edicts; true: but the very officers who were charged with the duty of enforcing those edicts were themselves the virtual importers of opium! Had the Chinese authorities at Canton and along the coast not connived at the trade for enormous bribes, or, as was even more frequently the case been themselves actual traders in the article, the trade would have been at an end years ago, and when only a comparatively small portion of British capital was involved in it.

It appears to us that the public prohibition of a drug of which the consumption was hourly increasing, and the aid given to its importation by the very persons appointed to carry that prohibition into effect, are merely "part and parcel" of the settled Chinese policy of fleeing barbarians to the utmost possible extent, on the one hand, and of always having a convenient pretext for such a stoppage in trade as circumstances might make convenient in the way of temporarily or permanently making the fleece longer and finer! It would be an instructive lesson for some of our politicians to can—the difference of profit to China, between the 100 cheats imported in 1776 at a fixed duty of five mace the catty, and that upon the 40,000 chests smuggled in 1840—at whatever profit the unscrupulous authorities could extort!

It was not until 1839 that anything in the shape of a real determination to put down the trade was exhibited by the Chinese; for the occasional stoppages of trade and blustering manifestoes, as already said, we look at as mere measures for making the fleece longer and finer!

Lin appeared at Canton, in that year, a "high commissioner"—an officer possessing almost dictatorial powers, and one who had not been more than thrice previously appointed during the present dynasty. In an edict he said, "I, the commissioner, am sworn to remove utterly this root of misery; nor will I let the foreign vessels have any offshoot left for the evil to bud forth again." The British commissioner and between two and three hundred British subjects were then thrown into a state of close confinement; the guards placed over them heaped every insult upon them, and threatened them with being deprived of provisions and water. Captain Elliot, the British superintendent, under such circumstances, saw no means of evading the demands of the Chinese; and upwards of 20,000 chests of opium, valued at 20,000,000 of dollars, were delivered to commissioner Lin for destruction.

In 1840 war was declared by England against the Chinese. The leading events, however, which followed being related in the history of our own country, it would be superfluous to repeat them here. We will merely add what has transpired since that was written.

All differences being finally adjusted, and his celestial majesty being on terms of the strictest amity with her Britannic majesty, a ratification of the treaty between the two countries was announced on the 27th of July, 1843. From that day the Hong merchants' monopoly and Consolo charges were to cease; and the conditions upon which trade was in future to be carried on, appeared in a notice issued by sir Henry Pottinger, the British plenipotentiary in China; who published an export and import tariff, and also a proclamation, in which he trusts that the commercial treaty will be found, in practice, mutually advantageous, beneficial and just, as regards the interest, honour, and the future augmented prosperity of the governments of the two mighty contracting empires and their subjects.

The proclamation issued by the imperial commission contained a perfect amnesty, and the remission of punishment for all who have served the English soldiers with supplies, &c. in days past, and concludes by stating that, "From henceforward amity and goodwill shall ever continue, and those from afar, and those who are near, shall perpetually rejoice together."

But despite these fine promises, in 1847, fresh outrages on the part of the people of Canton led to another temporary capture of the Bogue forts. The Emperor Tao-Kwang died in 1850, after a reign of thirty years, and was succeeded by Y-Ching. But the rule of the present Tartar dynasty, even in the heart of its own dominions, is held by a very uncertain tenure. The Teao-tu tribes in the south-west provinces of China, and supposed to be their original inhabitants, have repeatedly risen in rebellion; secret societies, the principal of which is called "The Triad," and which has for its object the restoration of a native dynasty, are said to be rapidly extending; and the finances of the empire are believed to be in a very unsatisfactory condition. In spite of a revenue, officially stated to amount to about 63,934,173*l.* annually. In 1852 a smouldering civil war had been making way in some of the provinces during the two previous years, mainly, it is understood, directed against the reigning dynasty, and in February it had made such progress that the Tartar general, commanding the Imperial troops at Canton, was apprehensive of an attack from the rebels.

THE EUROPEAN TRADE ORIGINATED IN A TREATY BETWEEN THE EMPEROR OF CHINA AND THE KING OF PORTUGAL, IN 1517

THE HISTORY OF JAPAN.

JAPAN is a general name given, by Europeans, to a great number of islands, lying between the eastern coast of Asia and the western coast of America, and which together compose a large empire, extending from the 30th to the 41st degree of north latitude, and from the 130th to the 147th degree of east longitude. The inhabitants call this empire Nippon, which is the name of the largest island belonging to it. It was discovered by the Portuguese about the year 1452.

The religion of the Japanese is Paganism, divided into several sects, who live together in harmony. Every sect has its own temples and priests. The spiritual emperor, or dairi-sama, is the chief of their religion. They acknowledge and honour a Supreme Being; and the temples are open to every individual, whatever his creed or country.

Christianity had once made a considerable progress in Japan, under the auspices of the Portuguese and Spanish Jesuits, among whom was the famous St. Francis Xavier; but it ended tragically, owing to an ill-conducted conspiracy of the fathers against the state. This proceeding produced a persecution of forty years' duration, and terminated by a most horrible massacre, scarcely to be paralleled in history. After this, not only the Portuguese, but Christians of every nation were totally expelled the country, and the most effectual means taken for preventing their return.

In 1611, the Dutch had the liberty of a free commerce granted them by the imperial letters patent, and established a factory at Firando. They were then at war with Spain, and Portugal was at that time under the Spanish government. The former, by taking an homeward bound Portuguese ship, found a traitorous letter to the king by a captain Moro, chief of the Portuguese in Japan. The Dutch immediately forwarded this letter to their protector, the prince of Firando. This letter laid open the whole plot which the Japanese Christians, in conjunction with the Portuguese, had laid against the emperor's life and throne. In consequence of this discovery, in the year 1637, an imperial order was sent to the governor of Nagasaki, to admit no more Portuguese into the empire.

Notwithstanding this proclamation, the Portuguese found means to carry on their trade two years longer, hoping to obtain leave to stay in the island of Desima, and there continue to trade; but they found themselves disappointed; for the emperor on the assurance given him by the Dutch East India Company, that they would supply him in future with all the articles heretofore supplied by the Portuguese, declared them, and the Castilians, enemies of the empire; and they were totally expelled the country in 1640. Their extirpation, and with them the Christian religion, was so complete, that not a vestige can now be discerned of its having ever existed there.

The government of the Japan empire is an hereditary, absolute monarchy. The imperial dignity had been enjoyed, for a considerable time before the year 1500, by a regular succession of princes, under the title of dairos. Soon after that epoch, a civil war broke out, which lasted many years. During the destructions it occasioned, a common soldier, named Tayekoy, found means to raise himself to the imperial dignity, and the dairo was obliged to submit to terms. This revolution took place in 1517. Tayekoy reigned several years, during which he made excellent laws, which still subsist. At his death he left the crown to his son, Tayekosama, then a minor; but the treacherous prince under whose guardianship he was left, deprived him of his life before he came of age. By this murder the crown passed to the family of Jejasama, in which it still continues.

The Japanese must be placed rather among the polished nations than otherwise. Their mode of government, their skill in agriculture, in manufactures, arts, and sciences—their politeness, good nature, prudence, frankness, and courage—entitle them to this distinction. They seem to possess nothing of the vanity of Asiatics and Africans; but are careful only to provide themselves, from the productions of their own country, with those necessities and comforts of life, so desirable to enlightened human beings.

The language of the Japanese has some affinity to the Chinese; though it appears, from its various dialects, to have been a kind of compound of that and other languages, derived from the various nations that first peopled these islands. Their manner of writing, and their architecture, are very similar to those of China.

The internal trade of Japan is very extensive, and their industry will bear comparison with that of the Hindoos, or even Chinese. Foreign commerce, however, is vigorously opposed by the government, in consequence of the supposed Portuguese treachery before mentioned, and the attempts of the Jesuit missionaries to Christianise the people. The number of Dutch vessels allowed to come each year, and the quantity of each description of wares to be sold, are strictly defined. The ships, immediately on their arrival, are strictly searched, and the crews are kept, during their stay in port, completely secluded from the natives; while all the business transactions are conducted by the Japanese, who also unload and re-load the vessels. Nay, so rigid are they in preventing their subjects from having intercourse with other nations, that it is a capital offence for the natives of Japan to travel into other countries; and their seamen even, when accidentally cast on foreign shores, are, on their return, subjected to vigorous examination, and sometimes tedious imprisonment, to purify them from the supposed pollution contracted abroad.

The cautious and ceremonious way in which the Japanese transact their business with the Dutch merchants is thus described:—About the time when the Dutch ships are expected, several outposts are stationed on the highest hills by the government; they are provided with telescopes, and when seen at a distance, notice is given to the governor of Nagasaki. As soon as they anchor in the harbour, officers go on board, with interpreters, to whom is delivered a chest, in which all the sailors' books, the muster-roll of the whole crew, six small barrels of powder, six barrels of balls, six muskets, six bayonets, six pistols, and six swords, are deposited. This is supposed to be the whole remaining ammunition, after the imperial garrison has been saluted. These things are conveyed on shore, and housed; but returned again on the day that the ship quits the harbour.

The beginning of the year is the time observed for holidays, or days of leisure and enjoyment; and at this time the ceremony of trampling on images, representing the cross, and the virgin and child, is performed. The images are of copper, about a foot long. This ceremony is intended to impress every individual with hatred of the Christian doctrine, and the Portuguese, who attempted to introduce it; and also to discover whether any remnant of it is left among the Japanese. It is performed in the places where the Christians chiefly resided. In Nagasaki it lasts four days; then the images are conveyed to the circumjacent places, and afterwards are laid aside till the next year. Every person, except the Japanese governor and his attendants, even the smallest child, must be present.

The population of Japan is supposed to exceed fifty millions. The army in time of peace consists of 100,000 infantry, and 20,000 cavalry: the force during war being increased by levies from the different provinces to 400,000 infantry, and 40,000 cavalry. The arms used by the former are the musket, pike, bow, sabre, and dagger; those of the mounted troops being the lance, sabre, and pistol. Their artillery is very inconsiderable.

THE EAST INDIA ISLANDS.

CEYLON.

CEYLON is a large island of the East Indies, separated from the continent by the Gulph of Mannar and Palk's Straits, near the southern extremity of Hindostan. It is 250 miles in length from north to south, and averages about 100 in breadth. The conquest of this island was the first attempt of Albuquerque, the celebrated Portuguese admiral. He found it well peopled, and inhabited by two different nations; the Bedas in the north, and the Cinglases, or Singalese, in the south. The former were very barbarous; but the latter in some state of civilization. These, however, derived great advantage from the mines of precious stones, and also from their pearl fishery, the greatest in the East.

It is said that the proper name of the island is Singhala, and that part of the population called Singalese have a tradition that their ancestors came thither from the eastward nearly 2,400 years ago; but many authors suppose them to be a colony of Singhs or Rajpoots, who arrived about 500 years b.c. From the ruins of cities, tanks, aqueducts, canals, bridges, temples, &c. at Trincomalee and other places, Ceylon has evidently been at some remote period a rich, populous, and comparatively civilized country. The Portuguese not only conquered, but tyrannized over them to such a degree, that they assisted the Dutch in expelling them from the island in 1658, after a bloody and obstinate war, by which all the Portuguese settlements fell into the hands of the Dutch East India Company.

The war with the king of Candy, the most potent, if not the sole sovereign of the island, were very detrimental to Holland. In a sanguinary war, which ended in 1766, the Ceylonese monarch was driven from his capital, and the Dutch made a very advantageous treaty. Their sovereignty was acknowledged over all those parts of the country they possessed before the war, and that part of the coasts held by the natives was ceded to them. They were allowed to gather cinnamon in all the plains; and the court stipulated to sell them the best sort, which is produced in the mountains, at a very moderate price. The government also engaged to have no connection with any foreign power, and even to deliver up any Europeans who might happen to come into the island. In return for so many concessions the king was to receive annually the value of the produce of the ceded coasts; and from thence his subjects were to be furnished, gratis, with as much salt as they had occasion for. Matters were in this situation when the English attacked the Dutch in 1794, and conquered Trincomalee, and all their settlements in the island; and it afterwards became a part of the price of the peace of Amiens in favour of England.

The English had no sooner taken possession, than they unhappily were involved

ACCORDING TO NATIVE TRADITIONS, SUMATRA AND THE ADJACENT ISLANDS HAVE BEEN THE ORIGINAL SEAT OF THE HUMAN RACE.

In a war with the king of Candy, owing to some misunderstanding relative to certain articles of commerce; and the lives of many brave men were sacrificed to it; rather, however, by the treachery and bad faith of the Ceylonese king and his minister, than by fair and honourable warfare. The population of Ceylon, independently of the colonists who have at various times possessed themselves of the coast, consist of—1st, the native Singalese or Ceylonese, one branch occupying the Candyan territories, and the other the coast; 2nd, the Vedda, or aborigines, who, in an almost savage state, inhabit the mountainous regions and unexplored fastnesses; 3rd, the Moors, who are found in all parts of the island; and 4th, the Malabar and other Hindoos, who dwell chiefly on the northern and eastern coasts. Of all these races the Candyan Ceylonese differ least from European in form, feature, and physical power. There are also some Caffres and Javanese, a few Chinese and Parsee traders, and a considerable number of English, Dutch, and Portuguese; besides a hybrid population.

The upper classes among the Singalese profess Christianity, and many are converts to Muhammadanism; but the general religion is Buddhism. The government is vested in the hands of a British governor, assisted by a council of European civil servants; but all laws, before being acted upon, are published in the official gazette, for their general diffusion and translation into the native languages. In 1849 an insurrection broke out, which, however, was speedily suppressed. It arose chiefly from the mercantile interest differing with the governor, Lord Torrington, as to his mode of levying the taxes. Lord Torrington was recalled, and his conduct was the theme of much discussion in parliament, which, however, led to no result.

SUMATRA.

SUMATRA is a large island in the Indian Ocean, being, next to Borneo, the largest in the eastern seas. It is about 1000 miles in length, from north-west to south-east; but, in general, not more than 150 in breadth. This is the first of the islands which form the great East India Archipelago; and is separated from the peninsula beyond the Ganges by the straits of Malacca; which is the usual passage from the bay of Bengal and the Coromandel coast to Borneo or China, and consequently to the Gulf of Siam, Cambodia, Cochln China, and the Gulf of Tonquin.

Gold dust is an article of considerable traffic, and is brought by merchants from the interior to the sea-coast, where it is bartered for iron tools, and various kinds of East Indian and European manufactures of silk, cotton, broad cloths, &c. But the most valuable and important production of the island is pepper, the average produce of which at this time is supposed to amount to 30,000,000 lbs. a-year. Turmeric, cassia, ginger, coffee, and many kinds of scented woods are also produced here.

After the capture of the Moluccas by the British, in 1796, the nutmeg and clove were introduced at Bencoolen, but though large quantities were raised, the quality was inferior to similar products obtained from Amboyna and the Banda Isles. The Sumatran camphor is in high estimation. Cocoa-nut, betel, bamboo, sugar-cane, various palms, and an abundance of tropical fruits, are indigenous.

At Bencoolen, on the west side of Sumatra, is the English factory, belonging to the East India Company. The factory was once entirely deserted, through the frequent quarrels and bickerings of the natives and the English; and had not the former found that trade decreased in consequence of the absence of the latter, they never would have been invited to settle there again.

PRINCE OF WALES'S ISLAND.

PRINCE OF WALES'S Island, or Pulo Penang, is situated in the straits of Malacca, about two miles from the west coast of the Malay peninsula. The India Company in 1784, came to the resolution of establishing a settlement here. This island is about seventeen miles long, by ten broad: its northern extremity runs nearly parallel with the main land, at a distance of about two miles, by which a fine channel is formed, where the largest fleet may ride in perfect safety; the height of the surrounding mountains acting as a barrier against the force of the prevailing winds. In fact, the advantages attending this island, both in a political and commercial view, are obvious.

JAVA.

JAVA is a large island, extending in length nearly 700 miles, and averaging in breadth about 90; and is separated from Sumatra by the strait of Sunda.

Towards the close of the 16th century, Cornelius Houtman, a Dutchman, conducted four vessels to Java by the Cape of Good Hope; and his prudence procured him an interview with the principal king of the island; but the Portuguese created him some enemies. Having got the better in several skirmishes in which he was engaged, he returned with his small squadron to Holland, where, though he brought but little wealth, he raised much expectation. He brought away some Negroes, Chinese, and inhabitants of Malabar, a native of Malacca, a Japanese, and Abdul, a pilot of the Guzerat, a man of great abilities, and perfectly acquainted with the coasts of India.

The account given by Houtman encouraged the merchants of Amsterdam to form the plan of a settlement at Java, which, at the same time that it would throw the pepper trade into their hands, would place them also near the islands that produce the more valuable spices, and facilitate their communication with China and Japan. Admiral Van Neck was therefore sent on this important expedition with eight vessels, and arrived safe at Java, where he found the inhabitants prejudiced against his nation. They fought and negotiated by turns. At length they were permitted to trade, and, in a short time, loaded four vessels with spices and linens. The admiral, with his fleet, sailed to the Moluccas, where he learned that the natives of the country had forced the Portuguese to abandon some of the places in which they had settled, and that they only waited for a favourable opportunity of expelling them from the rest. He established factories in several of these islands, entered into a treaty with some of the kings, and returned to Europe laden with riches.

In 1602, the states-general formed the Dutch India Company. It was invested with authority to make peace or war with the eastern princes, to erect forts, maintain garrisons, and to nominate officers for the conduct of the police and the administration of justice.

The company, which had no parallel in antiquity, and was the pattern of all succeeding societies of the kind, set out with great advantages; and, soon after its establishment, they fitted out for India fourteen ships and some yachts, under the command of admiral Warwick, whom the Hollanders look upon as the founder of their commerce, and of their colonies, in the East. He built a factory in this island, and secured it by fortifications. He had frequent engagements with the Portuguese, in which he generally came off victorious. A sanguinary war was the consequence of these hostilities between the two nations, in which the Dutch were successful.

Batavia, which, from a small beginning, has become the capital of all the Dutch possessions in India, has one of the best and safest harbours in the world. The city is surrounded by a rampart 21 feet in thickness, covered on the outside with stone, and fortified with 22 bastions. This rampart is environed by a ditch, 43 yards over, and full of water. The river Jucutra runs through the midst of the city, and forms fifteen canals of running water, adorned with evergreens. The inhabitants consist of Dutch, French, Portuguese, Javanese, Chinese, Malays, Negroes, and many others. Coffee, sugar, and spices are produced here in great abundance; and, altogether, it may be said to be one of the most valuable colonies belonging to any European nation. The island was taken by a British force from India in 1811, and held till 1816, when it was restored to the Dutch.

BORNEO.

BORNEO is one of the largest islands in the world, being 1500 miles in circumference. It is seated under the equator, and occupies nearly the centre of the eastern archipelago. The west and north-east sides of it are a desert, and the east is comparatively little known. The inland parts are mountainous; and the south-east, for many leagues together, is an unwholesome morass.

Borneo was discovered by the Portuguese in 1521. The English and Portuguese several times attempted to found establishments on its coasts without success. The sovereignty of the south coast was ceded to the Dutch by the sultan of Banjarassin in 1787; but the most important event in the recent history of Borneo is the enterprise of Sir James Brooke, who first visited the island in 1839, and has since been actively engaged in the suppression of piracy, the diffusion of education, and the encouragement of commerce and manufactures.

The Dyaks appear to be the aborigines; they are divided into numerous tribes, the chief being those of the interior, or hill Dyaks, and the Dyaks of the coast, many of whom are daring pirates; and cannibalism exists among many of the tribes. The Dyaks of the north coast have been conquered by the Malays, who treat them with great cruelty. The island is divided into many separate states, governed by native chiefs; the best known of these is Borneo Proper, which extends over the level space on the north coast, the sultan of which is under the superintendence of Sir James Brooke. On the north coast, near the north-west part of the island, is the territory of Sarawak, which is under the rajaship of Sir James Brooke. This territory enjoys an excellent climate, is rich in mineral and agricultural products, and is admirably situated for trade. Borneo is rich in minerals; gold, silver, tin, iron, and especially diamonds, one of the largest found weighing 367 carats, and, according to the absurd mode of valuation, worth 269,378l. Excellent coal is worked in Borneo Proper and Banjarassin, and rich iron mines were discovered in the south-east angle of the isle in 1848. The soil is very fertile. The forests furnish valuable timber, and, in common with many other pieces of the Archipelago, the gutta percha, now so extensively employed in manufactures. Among vegetables are maize, rice, yams, batatas, cocoa-nut, betel, tobacco, cotton, sugarcane, pepper, and other spices and fruits.

THE MOLUCCAS, OR SPICE ISLANDS.

These consist of Amboyna, Ternate, Fedor, Motry, Ciloio, and several other small islands. The Portuguese were the first Europeans who possessed them, but were obliged to share their advantages with the Spaniards, and at length to give up the trade almost entirely to them. These two nations joined to oppose the Dutch in their first attempts to gain a settlement; but the Dutch, assisted by the natives of the country, by degrees gained the superiority. The ancient conquerors were driven out about the year 1615, and their place supplied by others equally avaricious, though less turbulent.

As soon as the Dutch had established themselves in the Moluccas, they endeavoured to get the exclusive trade of spices into their own hands; an advantage which the nation they had just expelled was never able to procure. They skillfully availed themselves of the forts they had taken, and those they had erected, to draw the kings of Ternate and Tydor, who were masters of this archipelago, into their schemes. These princes, for a small sum of money, (little more than 3000*l.*) agreed to root out all the clove and nutmeg trees in the islands under their dominions; and a garrison of seven hundred men was appointed to secure the performance of the treaty.

At Amboyna they engrossed the whole cultivation of cloves. They allotted to the inhabitants four thousand parcels of land, on each of which they were compelled to plant one hundred and twenty-five trees, amounting, in the whole, to five hundred thousand; and the collective produce averages about one million of pounds.

The island of Amboyna is about thirty-two miles long and ten broad, and is divided into two parts, a greater and a lesser peninsula: the former is called Hiton; and the latter, Leytimor.

As the massacre of the English at Amboyna, by the Dutch, in 1621, was attended with such acts of perfidy and cruelty, it may be necessary, even at this time, not to pass them over in silence. We have before observed, that the Dutch dispossessed the Portuguese of Amboyna in 1615. They did not, however, become masters of the island at once. The English had here five factories, who lived under the protection of the Dutch castle; holding themselves safe, in respect of the friendship existing between the two nations. Great differences had arisen between the English and Dutch colonists at length a treaty was concluded, in 1619, by which the concerns of both were regulated, and certain measures agreed upon for preventing future disputes. Some short time after, the Dutch pretended that the English and Amboynese had formed a conspiracy to dispossess them of one of their forts. The plot, it was alleged, had been discovered by a Japanese and Portuguese in the English service, who were most inhumanly tortured into such confessions as their cruel inquisitors thought proper. Upon this evidence, they immediately accused the English factors of the pretended conspiracy. Some of them they imprisoned; and others they loaded with irons, and sent on board their ships; seizing, at the same time all the English merchandise, with their writings and books.

These acts of violence were followed by a scene of horror unexampled in the punishment of the most atrocious offenders. The tormenting tortures to which they put the innocent factors, are too shocking to relate; and those who did not die under the agonies of pain, were consigned to the executioner.

The whole of the transaction affords the most irrefragable testimony that the Hollanders did it with no other view, than of monopolizing the whole trade of the Spice Islands. They acted a similar tragedy at Poloron, about the same time, where they put to the torture one hundred and sixty-two of the natives, whom they likewise charged with a pretended conspiracy.

Until the French revolutionary war, the Dutch enjoyed, in peace, these invaluable islands, when Amboyna, and the other Moluccas, submitted to the English.

THE BANDA, OR NUTMEG ISLES.

THE Banda Isles is the general name of twelve small islands in the East Indian Archipelago. Two of them are uncultivated, and almost uninhabited; the other three claim the distinction of being the only islands in the world that produce the nutmeg.

If we except this valuable spice, the islands of Banda are barren to a dreadful degree. The land will not produce any kind of corn, and the pith of the sago serves the natives of the country instead of bread.

This is the only settlement in the East Indian isles, that can be considered as a European colony; because it is the only one where the Europeans are proprietors of lands. The Dutch company, finding that the inhabitants of Banda were savage, cruel, and treacherous, because they were impatient under their yoke, resolved to exterminate them; and their possessions were divided among the white people, who procured slaves from some of the neighbouring islands to cultivate the lands. The climate of Banda is particularly unhealthy; on which account the company attempted to transfer the culture of the nutmeg to Amboyna; but all the experiments that have been made have proved unsuccessful. The Banda Islands were discovered by the Portuguese in 1512, and colonized in 1524; but were taken by the Dutch in 1599. The English possessed themselves of them in 1810, but restored them to the Dutch in 1814.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

THE Philippine Islands are a large group belonging to the eastern archipelago, the principal of which is Luzon, a long, irregular, and narrow island. They were discovered by Magellan, in 1521, who called them the archipelago of St. Lazarus, as the discovery was made on that saint's day. But they were subjected, or rather part of them, to the Spaniards, by Don Louis de Velasco, in 1564, in the reign of Philip II. and derive their present name from him. The natives are supposed to be of Chinese extraction.

Manilla, the capital of the island of Luzon, and of all the Philippines, is situated on the south-east part of the island, where a large river falls into the sea, and forms a noble bay, thirty leagues in compass.

On the 6th of October, 1762, the English, under general Draper and admiral Cornish, took Manilla by storm, after a siege of twelve days; but, to save so fine a city from destruction, they agreed to accept a ransom, amounting to a million sterling, part of which, it is said, was never paid.

PALESTINE CONSISTS CHIEFLY OF RUGGED HILLS AND NARROW VALLEYS.

THE HISTORY OF PALESTINE, AND, MORE PARTICULARLY, OF THE JEWS.

SERIA AND PALESTINE HAVE FOR CENTURIES CHANGED TO BE INDEPENDENT, AND HAVE LONG FORMED A PORTION OF ASIATIC TURKEY.

By the various names of Hebrews, Israelites, or Jews, were this most illustrious people of ancient times known, who dwelt in the land then called Canaan. Contrary to the obscurity in which the origin of other nations is veiled, we have the evidence of Holy Writ for the rise, progress, decline, and fall of the Jews. They deduced their descent from Arphaxad the son of Shem; and we have it on record, that Abraham, the sixth in descent from Eber, the grandson of Arphaxad, dwelt in Assyria, but removed into Canaan or Palestine, with his family, to the intent that the true religion of God should be preserved by them, his "chosen people," amid the idolatrous corruptions of other nations by whom they were surrounded.

The period of which we are now speaking was about two thousand years before the birth of Christ. At that time the inhabitants of Mesopotamia and Syria appear to have been partly nomadic, or wandering, like the Tartars or Scythians; for we find that Abraham and his descendants sojourned in different parts of Canaan and Egypt, until the time of their protracted residence in the latter country. Abraham at his death transmitted the inheritance of the "promised land" to his son Isaac; and Isaac was succeeded in the patriarchate by his younger son Jacob, also called Israel.

Jacob had twelve sons; the descendants of whom remaining distinct, constituted the twelve tribes of the Israelites in after-time. Joseph, the youngest but one of these sons, having unconsciously excited the jealousy of the rest, was sold by them as a slave, to some Arabian merchants, by whom he was carried into Egypt; there, as we read, he became known to the king, and was made his chief minister; and in a time of famine, for which his foresight had provided, he was the happy means of providing his aged father and the whole of his family an asylum in the fertile district of Goshen (a.c. 1705).

The pathetic and interesting story of "Joseph and his Brethren," as narrated in the Bible, requires no comment in this place; but, we may, perhaps, be allowed slightly to digress, in order to illustrate the case of Joseph's memorable rise from the condition of a slave to that of the chief ruler of Pharaoh's household. European notions of slavery very naturally picture to the mind all that is horrible, cruel, and revolting; and it would seem next to an impossibility that, by any chance, one so helpless and degraded as a slave could become an officer of trust, or—more wonderful still—the chief minister and adviser of a monarch of a mighty kingdom. It is, however, remarked by marshal Marmont, who some years ago travelled through Turkey, &c., and who evidently paid great attention to the condition of the people and the customs of the countries he visited, that slaves in the East are far from being in the condition we might suppose; and it is therefore not unreasonable to believe that the kindness with which they are treated at the present day is derived from immemorial custom. He observes, "The most docile slave rejects with indignation any order that is not personally given him by his master; and he feels himself placed immeasurably above the level of a free or hired servant. He is a child of the house; and it is not unusual to see a Turk entertain so strong a predilection for a slave he has purchased, as to prefer him to his own son. He often overloads him with favours, gives him his confidence, and raises his position; and, when the master is powerful, he opens to his slave the path of honour and of public employment."

As peaceful dwellers in the rich and fertile valleys of Goshen, the Israelites in process of time became sufficiently numerous to excite the envious alarm of the Egyptians; and they accordingly underwent many persecutions, until the Almighty raised up Moses as their deliverer. The miracle he was empowered to work, the murmurings and backslidings of the people, their idolatrous propensities, and all other particulars relative to them while wandering through the parched and arid deserts of Arabia, form interesting portions of the sacred volume; we shall therefore pass on briefly to the death of Moses, and the delegation of power to Joshua, the acknowledged chief of the Jewish nation, a.c. 1451.

Joshua was now ninety-three years of age, and had under his command six hundred thousand men capable of bearing arms, besides the aged and infirm, women, children, and servants. On every side were warlike nations, some of them represented as containing men of gigantic stature and immense personal prowess; their towns were well fortified, and every necessary preparation had been made to repel invasion. The veteran leader was, however, undismayed; and, relying on that protecting Power who had delivered the people from Egyptian bondage, and brought them safely to the frontiers of Canaan, he went on "conquering and to conquer." At length, after subduing the "promised land," and establishing its tranquillity, he divided it among the twelve tribes; charging them, at the same time, to give a tenth part of their goods to the tribe of Levi, who were consecrated solely for the priesthood; and hence proceeds the origin of tithes. Having ruled Palestine as wisely as he had conquered it bravely, and being now one hundred and ten years old, the aged warrior resigned his breath.

Joshua was no sooner dead, than the Jews gave themselves up to anarchy, by which means they shortly fell under the power of Cushan, king of Mesopotamia. After a servitude of eight years, Othoneel became judge of Israel; at whose death, Eglon, king of Moab, reduced them to his obedience; and under his yoke they continued eighteen years. Ehud then ruled as judge of Israel, in whose time they fell under the government of Jabin, king of Canaan, who held them twenty-nine years; when Deborah and Barak, jointly, judged Israel for thirty-three years. A fourth servitude, of seven years, then followed under the Midianites. Then Gideon, and his successors, to Jair, ruled Israel as judges thirty-six years; when in the fifteenth year of Jair, the fifth servitude commenced, under the Philistines and the Ammonites. Jephtha succeeded as judge, and was followed in his office by four successors, the last of whom was Sampson, (whose superhuman strength was exerted with such terrible effect on his enemies, the Philistines). In his time, however, the Israelites fell again under their oppressors' yoke, and were ruled by them forty years. Eli then became judge, who being nearly a hundred years old, his two sons, Hophni and Phineas who acted under him, took advantage of his weakness to commit the most profigate abominations. They were, notwithstanding, by no means deficient in bravery; but having sustained a great defeat by the Philistines, in which they lost their lives and the sacred ark, their aged parent was so overcome on hearing the fatal tidings, that he fell backward from his chair and instantly expired. Samuel, at that time but a youth, though divinely inspired, was then chosen judge of Israel; and during the latter part of his administration the land was in a more peaceful state than it had been for many previous years.

When Samuel had been judge of Israel about twenty years, the people, wishing to imitate the example of their neighbours, demanded that they should have a king to rule over them. Samuel accordingly selected Saul for that high office, and on presenting him for their acceptance, "all the people shouted and said, God save the king!" Although many of the Israelites were afterwards discontented with having a king who had been their companion and equal, the numerous proofs which Saul gave of his military qualifications checked their murmurs. He attacked and defeated the forces of the different nations who haressed the frontiers of his kingdom, and took signal vengeance of their old and implacable enemies, the Philistines. As a warlike monarch he reigned with glory, but put an end to his life.

The judges of Israel are to be considered as the defenders of religion, and the protectors of the laws; they decided upon war and peace, and were at all times magistrates and warriors.

He was succeeded by David, a shepherd of the tribe of Judah, under whom the government gained considerable strength. He was succeeded by Solomon, his son, celebrated for his wisdom and his magnificence; he rendered the people happy by continual peace, and by the encouragement of commerce; he had the reputation of being a wise prince, and his writings and his laws were received and esteemed in the most distant countries, with all that veneration they deserved. His son, Rehoboam, an insensible despot, ruled the Israelites with an iron rod. Ten of the tribes separated themselves from his government, and chose Jeroboam for their king. Palestine now became two kingdoms; the one called Judah, and the other Israel. A difference in religion was soon after introduced: that called the Samaritan, or Israelite, was embraced by the ten tribes; while Judah and Benjamin kept to the ancient usage of their forefathers.

Under Hosea, king of Israel, the ten tribes were carried away captive to Nineveh, by Salmanazer.

Nebuchadnezzar very soon placed the people of Judah in the like unhappy situation of the people of Israel. After having conquered Jerusalem, he transported them to Babylon, the capital of his empire. This captivity lasted seventy years, when Cyrus gave them the liberty of returning to their country. Great numbers accepted the offer, conducted by Zerobabel, Nehemiah, and Eadras. They rebuilt Jerusalem and the Temple. They re-established their state, and lived under their own laws, paying a small tribute to the kings of Persia; and suffered idolatry no more to take place of their devotion to the true God.

The Jews were subject to the kings of Persia at the time Alexander made the conquest of that empire. At his death, his vast dominions were divided between his principal captains; and the king of Syria had a part of Judea; but lying, as it were, upon the frontiers of both Syria and Egypt, it suffered severely from alternate invasions. Jerusalem, since the Babylonian captivity, had no particular governors who took upon themselves the title of king; the high-priests held the interior administration, and were respected as much as if they had actually been in possession of the throne.

Ptolemy Soter besieged Jerusalem, and carried away one hundred thousand captives, whom he dispersed through Egypt, Libya, and the country about Cyrene, where their posterity for many centuries after continued to exist. During this period, Simon, surnamed the Just, was high-priest; a man not less remarkable for his merits as a governor, than for his eminent piety. Under his directions the canon of the Old Testament was completed, and thenceforward transmitted to future generations without further reveal: A. C. 292. It was about this time that the sect of the Sadducees arose, who denied the existence of a future state. They were, however, inferior in numbers and popularity to the Pharisees, who entertained a decided belief in the resurrection, and in the doctrine of future rewards and punishments. Under the patronage of Ptolemy Philadelphus, the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into Greek, for the benefit of the Jews residing in Egypt. This version is usually called the Septuagint, because, according to tradition, the translation was entrusted to seventy persons.

The situation of the Jews under the Syrians was various. Antiochus Epiphanes, wishing to alter their religious opinions, took the power of the disposal of the high priesthood into his own hands, which he alternately disposed of, and dispossessed, according to his caprices. He pillaged the temple, and put Eleazar to death; and also the seven brothers, Maccabees, with their mother. He also caused to be put to the sword, on the sabbath-day, all those that had assembled together for the purpose of devotion. This cruel and unjust persecution caused the Jews to rebel; they were headed by Mattathias; and, after his death, by his son, the celebrated Judas Maccabeus, the defender of the religion, and the saviour of his country. That hero being killed in battle, was succeeded by Jonathan, who united in himself the spiritual and temporal powers. His brother Simon succeeded, and was equally celebrated for his wisdom as his virtues, and was the first of his nation who had governed Judea peaceably and absolutely, since the return from Babylon. He was killed at a banquet, and was succeeded by his son, John Hyrcanus, who was succeeded by Judas, surnamed Aristobulus, assuming to himself the title of king.

Alexander Jannæus was the next king, a hero very little inferior to David. He left two sons, Hyrcannus and Aristobulus. The former held the sceptre during the life of Alexandra, his mother; but, soon after the death of that princess, Aristobulus declared war against his brother, and deprived him of his kingdom.

Judea having become a Roman province, Pompey the Great, its conqueror, re-established Hyrcannus in the government, and took with him Aristobulus to Rome, to heighten the glory of his triumph. Phraates, king of Parthia, deposed Hyrcannus, and put in his place Antigonus, son of Aristobulus. Soon after Herod, surnamed the Great, an Idumean by birth, and patronized by Antony, obtained permission from the Romans to assume the title of king of the Jews.

This prince, although a tyrant to his subjects and to his family, added lustre to the Jewish nation; he repaired Jerusalem, rebuilt the temple, and procured to himself successively the favour of Cassius, Caesar, Antony, and Octavius; augmenting his power by the art which he possessed of pleasing those of whom he held his crown. In his reign JASUS CHASBY was born.

After the death of Herod, Augustus divided the government of Judea between the sons of Herod; he bestowed one half upon Archelaus, and the other half upon Herod - Antipas and Philip. Nine years afterwards, Augustus, being dissatisfied with their conduct, sent them into exile, and placed the government of Judea under the pro-consul of Syria.

The governors appointed by the Romans over the Jews were for the most part tyrants, which served to strengthen in them the propensity for revolt. They had been taught that a descendant of the house of David should deliver them from oppression; they believed that the time was nearly arrived, and their insolence increased as the fulfilment of the prediction, in their opinion, drew near. They were almost in continual sedition; and although severely punished for their turbulence, their ardour in a cause wherein they supposed their own liberties, and those of their posterity depended, was not in the least diminished.

In the year 66 after Christ, the standard of revolt was set up. Jerusalem was besieged by Cestius, whom the Jews compelled to retire. Nero, who was then in Achaia, no sooner heard of that event, than he sent Vespasian into Palestine, for the purpose of effecting that conquest which Cestius had been found unequal to obtain.

Vespasian, who had already distinguished himself in Germany and Britain, entered this devoted country with a well disciplined army; and as he encountered everywhere a fierce resistance, he put to the sword men, women, and children. All the cities and towns that lay in the way of his march, were taken and plundered. Those persons who escaped the cruelty of the conqueror, fled to Jerusalem, then in the hands of two furious parties, each of whom persecuted their opponents with unfeeling cruelty. Civil war and assassination became the consequences of their unbridled rage, and the priests themselves were not exempt from the popular fury.

The siege of Jerusalem was suspended by the death of Nero. Three emperors mounted the throne; Galba, Otho, and Vitellius; all of whom died violent deaths. At length Vespasian was elected to the purple. He immediately sent his son Titus to Jerusalem, to finish a war which he had so successfully begun.

Titus having arrived before Jerusalem previous to the feast of Easter, took his station on the Mount of Olives, and, investing the city, he surrounded it with a wall, flanked with thirty towers. The magazines of corn had been destroyed by fire, and a most cruel famine raged within the city; but, notwithstanding their terrible situation, the beleagued refused the advantageous conditions offered to them by the Roman general. At length he became master of the city, which was nearly reduced to ashes, and also of the temple. A scene of butchery then commenced, and was continued for several days, until Jerusalem was left utterly desolate.

According to Josephus, eleven hundred thousand persons perished during the siege, and at the capture; and those that were taken prisoners were made slaves. The misfortunes of Jerusalem were not confined to the Jews of that city, but extended to the whole of that people under the Roman power; some were thrown to ferocious beasts at the public games, and others sold into bondage. The sufferings, indeed, of the devoted inhabitants, fraught as some of the scenes are with thrilling interest, are such as humanity shudders to contemplate, and over which pity is glad to throw a veil.

The State of the Jews since the Destruction of Jerusalem.

THE Jews, obliged to quit their country, irritated and provoked by the cruel treatment they had received, meditated to avenge themselves of their enemies. They began to put their murderous designs into execution at the city of Cyrene, in Lybia, and in the island of Cyprus, where, since their flight, they had increased considerably. They were headed by an enterprising but artful man, named Andrew, under whom they not only committed the greatest excesses, but also gained some advantages over the Egyptians, and even over the Romans. The emperor Trajan found himself obliged to march an army against them; but they were not reduced until after several engagements, maintained with the greatest obstinacy; they were at length overcome, and were treated by the Romans rather as enemies of the human race, than as rebels against the power of Rome. Lybia became so far depopulated in this conflict, that the Romans thought it necessary to send a colony to repopulate the waste.

The Jews, notwithstanding their recent misfortunes in Palestine, again revolted. Adrian, the successor of Trajan, sent Julius Severus against them. This general (according to Dion) killed 580,000 in different battles; and, he further asserts, they could not reckon those that perished by famine, or otherwise: so that very few Jews escaped in this war. They razed (continues Dion) fifty fortified castles, pilaged and burnt 985 cities and towns, and made such a general massacre of the inhabitants through the country, that all Judea was in a manner converted into a desert. Before this massacre, the number of Jews, according to the calculations of the priest made under Nero, and estimating those destroyed under Titus, amounted to 2,540,000 persons.

Adrian, after having ruined and massacred the greatest part of the remaining number, prohibited, by a solemn edict, confirmed in the senate, any of those that had escaped the sword, from returning into their own country; and from that time this unfortunate people have been entirely dispersed.

Notwithstanding the prodigious numbers which perished in the successive overthrow of the Jewish nation, it is clear that very considerable colonies of them settled in different countries, as the travels of the apostles alone amply testify. In Rome, Alexandria, and many other places, there were flourishing communities. Some devoted themselves to the cultivation of the arts and sciences, others pursued handicraft trades, many practised as physicians, but most of them turned their attention to commercial speculations, and soon became notorious for their wealth and overreaching cupidity.

In the fifth century they were banished from Alexandria, where they had been established from the time of Alexander. They rendered themselves the ridicule of all nations by their enthusiasm in favour of a false Messiah, who appeared at that time in Candia. This impostor, who was named Moses, and pretended to be the ancient legislator of the Jews, asserted that he had descended from Heaven, in order to enable the children of Abraham to enter the Land of Promise.

A new revolt in Palestine, in the sixth century, served to shew the turbulent disposition of the Jewish race, and the increase of the massacres of that people. Phocas drove them from Antioch, and Heraclius from Jerusalem.

While some of the scattered families resorted to Egypt, Babylon, and other polished countries in the East, there were others who settled in Arabia, penetrated to China, or wandered over the European continent. But many still remained in Palestine. After the conversion of the Roman empire to Christianity, Judea became an object of religious veneration, and the empress Helena repaired thither in pilgrimage, and built various splendid temples. A crowd of pilgrims resorted thither subsequently from every part of the world; the most numerous arriving from the west, over which the church of Rome had fully established its domination. In the commencement of the sixth century, however, an entire change took place. Judea was among the countries first exposed to the fanatical followers of Mahomet, and soon fell under their sway. But when the Turks poured in from the north, they no longer observed the same courtesy. They profaned the holy places, and the intelligence of their outrages being conveyed to Europe, roused the religious spirit of the age into those expeditions called the crusades. All Europe seemed to pour itself upon Asia: the Saracen armies were routed, Jerusalem taken by storm, and its garrison put to the sword. The leader of the first crusade, Godfrey of Bouillon, was made king; and a petty Christian sovereignty established, which endured for above eighty years; the Holy Land continually streaming with the blood of Christian and Saracen. The Mahometan states, whose resources were all at hand, gradually, however, regained the ascendancy. In 1187 Judea was conquered by Saladin; on the decline of whose kingdom it passed through various hands, till, in the 16th century, it was eventually swallowed up in the Turkish empire.

Great calamities to the Jews occurred during the crusades. Wherever the fanatical soldiers who were on their march in Palestine passed, they pillaged and murdered the scattered inhabitants of the once happy land of Canaan, and the people of the nations among whom they dwelt robbed them of their valuables without remorse. The persecution was general, their furious enemies endeavouring, as it were, to extirpate the very name of Israel. It should be observed, however, that both Mahometans and Jews being animated by a like hatred of the Christians, we often find them acting in concert, especially during the Saracenic conquest of Africa and Spain. Nay, under the rule of the Spanish Moslems, the condition of the Jews not only enjoyed complete toleration, but they cultivated science, and were entrusted with the highest offices of the state.

In the twelfth century, Philip Augustus, king of France, banished them twice from his kingdom; and during the reign of Philip le Bel, they were accused, and not without justice, of cruel exactions and usurious extortions. They were also charged with having committed outrages against the host, of having crucified children on Good Friday, of having insulted the image of Jesus Christ, &c. They were put into the hands of the judges; and, although no proof whatever was brought forward to substantiate their guilt, they were delivered over to the populace to be dealt with according to their pleasure. Philip banished them entirely from France in 1308, and confiscated all their effects. Louis X., his successor, permitted them to re-establish themselves in his kingdom, on condition of their paying him a large sum of money. In the reign of Philip the Long, brother and successor of Louis, they were massacred and pillaged. In 1395, Charles V. banished them, and confiscated all their property. This was their fourth and last banishment.

In 1393 they experienced in Germany a treatment similar to that which they had received in France. In Castile they purchased their peace at a high price; but in Catalonia, Arragon, and the other parts of Spain, they were most horribly persecuted, and nearly two hundred thousand of them were compelled to embrace the Christian religion, or at least appear so to do.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, the Jews established in Portugal underwent all the mischiefs with which Moses had heretofore menaced their nation. In 1506, during three days successively, they were barbarously massacred at Lisbon; yet, as if not content with taking away their lives, they took those among them whom they had mutilated, or mortally wounded, and burnt them by heaps in the public squares. Two thousand perished in this manner. The fathers not daring to weep for their children, nor the children for their fathers, they were mutually overcome by despair on seeing each other dragged away to torment.

We are unable to state the precise period of their arrival in this country; but in the eighth century we find them reckoned among the property of the Anglo-Saxon kings, who seem to have exercised absolute power over both their lives and goods. In this abject state they remained under the Norman princes and the early Plantagenets, who harassed them by the most cruel exactions, and often treated them with great barbarity. In proof of this, we need only refer to the reigns of Richard I., John, Henry III., and Edward I. If we pursue their history in other European countries, we shall find that, if we except the Italian republics, and Spain while under the dominion of its Arab conquerors, the Jews every where found themselves the objects of persecution. On the introduction of the Inquisition into Spain and Portugal, that dread tribunal condemned thousands to the flames, before it commenced its diabolical proceedings against those Christians who differed from the see of Rome; and it was not until the Protestant states were strong enough to break asunder the shackles of religious intolerance, that the Jew had any chance of ensuring his personal safety.

We thus see that in different ages the Jews have suffered the most dreadful persecutions and massacres; but through the annihilation of the race seemed to be inevitable, their numbers were still very considerable, and they exercised then, as they do at the present time, no little influence in the affairs of civilised nations. Since arts and learning have revived in Europe, they have felt the benefit of that humane enlightenment which has extended all over the globe. France, Holland, Austria, and most of the German states, allow them the rights of citizenship; England and Prussia tolerate and protect them; in many of the British colonies they are among the principal merchants and traders; and in Italy, Spain, and Portugal, they are at least suffered to reside unmolested. The attention of the British nation has of late years been particularly directed towards the improvement of their political condition and their conversion to Christianity. But upon the latter topic, as well as the probable restoration of the Jews to the land of their fathers, it is unnecessary to offer an opinion; both are concealed from mortal ken by the impenetrable veil which enwraps futurity.

ARMENIA.

THE ancient history of this large and warlike people is connected with that of the several mighty nations who in turn filled the world with the terror of their names. Its first king appears to have been Scythion, the next Barzanes, after whose death the kingdom was divided into several petty kingdoms. The Medes under Astyages subsequently subdued Armenia, which was reduced to a province under Persian governors. It was afterwards divided into Major and Minor by Artarias and Zadriades, who having united their forces, established each himself in his respective province, independent of his master; the former possessing Armenia Major, the other Minor. They were contemporary with Hannibal, who planned for Artarias the celebrated town of Artarat. Assisted by the Roman alliance, these usurpers maintained their power in despite of the several attacks of their former master, Antiochus. After their death, the Armenians suffered considerable loss in a war with the Parthians. Marc Antony put Artavardes, the sovereign of Armenia, to death, to make room for Alexander, his own son by Cleopatra; others say that he led him captive to Rome in golden chains. Trajan reduced Armenia to a Roman province; but in the reign of Constantine the Great and his successor, it had its own kings, dependent indeed on the emperor. Although St. Bartholomew is said to have introduced Christianity into Armenia, there can be no doubt that it was Christian in the beginning of the fourth century. Sapor, the Persian conqueror, reduced it to a province at the end of the fourth century. The Saracens subdued it in A.D. 687, who gave way to the Turks about a century afterwards. It was then called Turcomania.

Armenia partially recovered its independence, but was again subdued by Occidan or Heccate, son of Genghis, first khan of the Tartars. A remnant of the royal family of Armenia still remained; and we find one of them, Leo, came to England to solicit the aid of Richard II. against the Turks, by whom he had been expelled from his throne. Armenia was again made a province of the Persian empire, in 1472. Selim II. reduced it to a Turkish province, in 1522; the greater part of which still remains subject to the Crescent.

ALBANIA.

ALBANIA was nominally a province of the Turkish empire. Its history is diversified, and mixed up with the various fortunes of the surrounding nations. Looked upon as barbarous by the Greeks and Romans, because very slightly explored by them, Albania, better known to those celebrated people as Illyricum, and Epirus, still retains much of the simplicity of primitive habits, so that it is emphatically called the Scythia of the Turkish empire. The ancient historians describe the inhabitants of this country as peculiarly fierce and untractable. The remoteness of its situation, and want of union amongst the several tribes which inhabited the country of Albania, rendered the valour of its people of little consequence to the general affairs of Greece, and accordingly we find them but slightly mixed up with Grecian politics. Under the conduct of Pyrrhus II., one of the most consummate generals of antiquity, who waged a bloody war with the Romans in Italy, the Albanians, or Epirotes, routed Antigonus, king of Macedonia, and held that country in subjection; but their conquest ended with the death of their commander, and they in turn fell under the power of the Macedonians.

The Romans made some settlements in their country, and availed themselves of the many fine harbours to be found along its coast. At their decline, with other portions of that once mighty empire, Albania fell a prey to Alaric and the Goths, although some of their descendants afterwards retained possession of the northern district. Sigismund, one of its kings, was celebrated for his alliance with Theodoric, the victor of Clovis and Odoacer, A.D. 528. Albania now became the prey of the Slavonian nations, till it was settled within its present limits, under the Bulgarians, in 870. As the Greek empire declined, the Albanians again rose to distinction, and at last re-established their independence, in spite of the most strenuous exertions of the Bulgarians, who were masters of all the neighbouring districts of Greece.

Forming a fourth division of the army of Nicephorus Basilices, A.D. 1079, they greatly distinguished themselves. During the next century, the period of the crusades, there were several settlements on their coasts by the Sicilians, Franks, and other nations. After the conquest of Constantinople, 1204, Michael Angelus established an independent government in this district.

Albania has cut some figure in the annals of the last forty years, chiefly through the enterprising spirit and politic conduct of Ali Pacha, who raised himself to a degree of power which long kept the Turks, who were nominally his masters, in a state of fear to attack him. After amassing immense treasures, and keeping up independent alliances with the European powers, he was, in 1822, finally cut off by the Turkish officers. The modern name of Albania is Arnaut.

THE HISTORY OF EGYPT.

(WITH SYRIA.)

THE early history of Egypt, like that of China, is so involved in obscurity and fable, that for many ages it must be passed over in silence; for it would be an insult to common sense, in a work professedly historical, to narrate the marvellous actions ascribed to Osiris, Isis, Typhon, Apollo, and a host of ideal personages who, as we are told, over Egypt "once held sway." After those purely fabulous ages, the first king who makes his appearance in the times called heroic, but without any certain date, is Menes, who is by some considered the same with Misraim, the son of Ham. He drained the lower part of Egypt, converting that which was before a morass, into firm ground; turned the course of the Nile, so as to render it more beneficial to the country, that river having before his time washed the foot of a sandy mountain in Libya; built the city of Memphis; instituted solemn festivals and other religious rites; instructed his subjects in many valuable arts; and accomplished a variety of wonders usually attributed to the founders of kingdoms.

It being impossible to follow the succession of princes, it most suffice to state, that after the death of Menes, Egypt was divided into several dynasties, or principalities; but its most natural and permanent division appears to have been into three portions, sometimes under one, and sometimes under different kings. The most southerly portion was called Upper Egypt, or Thebais, the capital of which was Thebes, still remarkable for the extent and magnificence of its remains. The central part, or Middle Egypt, had Memphis for its capital, situated opposite to the modern capital Cairo. Lower Egypt was the country along the branches of the Nile, as it approached the sea; many large cities were built in this tract, one of the chief of which was Heliopolis.

We learn that some ages afterwards (a. c. 2084), Egypt was invaded by the Hyccos, a pastoral tribe from the north, who penetrated to Nubia, and established themselves in that country, and in Egypt, as the sovereign power. These are known as "the shepherd kings," and they were eventually expelled by Amosis, king of Lower Egypt, a. c. 1825.

Various princes succeeded, who all bore the title of Pharaoh. The Israelites settled in Egypt, and were reduced to a state of slavery, from which they were delivered by divine interference; and, as we are further informed in Holy Writ, one of the Pharaohs, with all his host, was drowned in the Red Sea.

The most distinguished prince of this race was Sesostrius, who marched victoriously through both Africa and Asia, as far as to the countries beyond the Ganges, and enriched Egypt with the booty he acquired. After his return, he divided the country into thirty-six districts or governments.

In 725 a. c. Sabachus, king of Ethiopia, conquered Egypt, and left the throne to his natural successors; but after the reign of Tharaca, his grandson, a period of anarchy followed, and Egypt was divided amongst twelve kings; one of these, Psammetichus, with the assistance of the Greeks, subdued his competitors, and became sole monarch, a. c. 670. After his death, the Egyptian kings continued in frequent hostilities with the neighbouring nations of Judea and Assyria, attended with various success, and were at last reduced to Persian subjection by Cambyaes, the son of Cyrus, a. c. 525.

The Persians remained masters of Egypt until the year 327 a. c., when it was conquered by Alexander the Great, who was received with joy by the Egyptians; the Persians having made themselves odious to the people by their exactions, and by their contempt of the Egyptian religion.

Alexander, as great in the cabinet as in the field, permitted the conquered to enjoy their own laws and customs. He founded Alexandria, which soon became the deposit of the commerce of the East; and it ceased not to flourish until the discovery of a passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope. After the death of the Macedonian hero, Ptolemy Soter, one of his generals, took upon himself the government of Egypt, and his descendants enjoyed it till the year 30 of the Christian era, when it was conquered by the Romans; and it became a province to that empire after the defeat of Marc Antony, and the death of Cleopatra.

The Ptolemies governed Egypt for 293 years. The four first of the family were active and wise princes, who promoted the prosperity of their country, and encouraged literature and the arts.

Ptolemy Soter, the son and successor of Ptolemy Lagus, established an academy of learned men at Alexandria, and founded the celebrated library at that city, which, by the time of the Roman conquest, contained 700,000 volumes. It was partly accidentally destroyed by fire in Julius Cæsar's attack on Alexandria; but the losses were replaced in succeeding centuries, until the 7th after Christ, when it was totally destroyed by order of the Mohammedan caliph Omar.

THE GREAT PYRAMID OF GHIZEN OCCUPIES MORE THAN 13 ACRES.

THE ARABIAN ARE CHRISTIAN DIFFERING BUT LITTLE FROM THOSE OF THE GREEK CHURCH, BUT THE PERSIANS HAVE NO FIXED INCOME.

For nearly seven centuries Egypt belonged to the Roman and Greek empires, and was for a lengthened period the granary, as it were, of Rome. It then remained under the power of the Mohammedan caliphs till the beginning of the 12th century, when they were expelled by the Turcomans, who in their turn gave way to the Mamelukes, in 1250.

Before we proceed further with our hasty sketch of this once mighty kingdom, we will endeavour to give the reader some faint idea of it as it existed in its former state. The ancient kings of Egypt were always considered as subject to the laws of the empire, and their manners were, in some particulars, regulated by set rules; among which, the quality and quantity of the provisions for their tables were allotted. If a king, during his reign, governed arbitrarily, or unjustly, his memory was condemned after his death. No people were ever more idolatrous or superstitious than the Egyptians. Men, animals, and even plants, were the objects of their worship: but the deities Isis and Osiris were in the greatest repute, and adored generally throughout the country. They also especially worshipped Apis, a bull, dedicated to Osiris, at Memphis; and Mnevis, a similar bull at Heliopolis. But every city had its sacred animal; a stork, a cat, a monkey, a crocodile, or a goat; any irreverence to which was severely punished, and an injury held deserving of death. The tribunal of Egypt was composed of thirty judges, chosen from among the priests of Heliopolis, of Memphis, and of Thebes; who administered justice to the people gratuitously, the prince allowing them a sufficient revenue to enable them so to do.

The Egyptians had two kinds of writing; one sacred, and one common. The former was the representation of ideas by figures of animals, or other sensible objects, called hieroglyphics; many inscriptions of which still exist, as do inscriptions and writings in the common character. The priests were held in the highest reverence, and the hieroglyphics were known to them alone. Philosophy was early cultivated by the Egyptians, and the doctrine of the Metempsychosis taught in their schools, to which many of the Greek philosophers repaired. They also made great progress in astronomy and geometry, and in the arts, particularly of architecture, of which the whole country still offers extensive columns, obelisks, and those stupendous specimens of human labour, the pyramids.

We now return to the history of Egypt after it became possessed by the Mamelukes, of whom it may be as well that we should here speak. According to M. Volney, they came originally from Mount Caucasus, and were distinguished by the flaxen colour of their hair. The expedition of the Tartars, in 1227, proved indirectly the means of introducing them into Egypt. These merciless conquerors, having slaughtered till they were weary, brought along with them an immense number of slaves of both sexes, with whom they filled all the markets in Asia. The Turks purchased about 12,000 young men, whom they bred up in the profession of arms, which they soon excelled in; but, becoming mutinous, they deposed and murdered the sultan Malek, in 1260. The Mamelukes having thus got possession of the government, and neither understanding nor valuing anything but the art of war, every species of learning decayed in Egypt, and a degree of barbarism was introduced. Neither was their empire of long duration, notwithstanding their martial abilities: for as they depended upon the Christian slaves, chiefly brought from Circassia, whom they bought for the purpose of training to war, and thus filling up their ranks, these new Mamelukes, or Borjies as they were at first called, in time rose upon their masters, and transferred the government to themselves, about A. D. 1382.

They became famous for ferocious valour; were almost perpetually engaged in wars either foreign or domestic; and their dominion lasted till 1517, when they were invaded by Selim I., the Turkish sultan. The Mamelukes defended themselves with incredible bravery; but, overpowered by numbers, they were defeated in almost every engagement. Cairo, their capital, was taken, and a terrible slaughter made of its defenders. The sultan Tuman Bey, was forced to fly; and, having collected all his forces, he ventured a decisive battle. The most romantic efforts of valour, however, were insufficient to cope with the innumerable multitude which composed the Turkish army. Most of his men were cut in pieces, and the unhappy prince was himself taken and put to death. With him ended the glory of the Mamelukes.

The sultan Selim commenced his government of Egypt by an unexampled act of wholesale butchery. Having ordered a theatre to be erected on the banks of the Nile, he caused all the prisoners (upwards of 30,000) to be beheaded in his presence, and their bodies thrown into the river. He did not, however, attempt the total extermination of the Mamelukes, but proposed a new form of government, by which the power, being distributed among the different members of the state, should preserve an equilibrium; so that the dependence of the whole should be upon himself. With this view, he chose from among those Mamelukes who had escaped the general massacre, a divan, or council of regency, consisting of the pacha and chiefs of the seven military corps. The former was to notify to this council the orders of the Porte, to send the tribute to Constantinople, and provide for the safety of government both external and internal; while, on the other hand, the members of the council had a right to reject the orders of the pacha, or even of deposing him, provided they could assign sufficient reasons. All civil and political ordinances must also be ratified by them. Besides this, he formed the whole body into a kind of republic; for which purpose he issued an edict, stating,

"Though we have less of the two, the regulations of the incumbent troops and as protectio send to in mone measure Upon the to have inhabit Turkish Thus continu and gr threaten Turks; withstan tures, the cou the fem brought adjacent Volney, extinct therefor by whic is, thei brought deed, as Circass a nurse Towas they co and ha Egypt, Serradi did not of the coutr; the au tribute maine bound placed had no negade perstiti adious specie cruelty ous ru descri have to toys, manag as to the st count enem with trem soldie mago coutr

"Though, by the help of the Almighty, we have conquered the whole kingdom of Egypt with our invincible armies, nevertheless our benevolence is willing to grant to the twenty-four sangiacs of Egypt a republican government," &c. The conditions and regulations then follow, the most important of which are those which make it incumbent on the republic to provide 12,000 troops at its own expense in time of peace, and as many as may be necessary for its protection in time of war; and also to send to the Sublime Porte a certain sum in money annually as tribute, with 600,000 measures of corn and 400,000 of barley. Upon these conditions the Mamelukes were to have a free government over all the inhabitants of Egypt, independent of the Turkish lieutenant.

Thus the power of the Mamelukes still continued in a very considerable degree, and gradually increased so much as to threaten a total loss of dominion to the Turks; but, singular as it may seem, notwithstanding a residence of nearly six centuries, they never became naturalized in the country. They formed no alliance with the females of Egypt, but had their wives brought from Georgia, Mingrelia, and the adjacent countries; so that, according to Volney, their offspring invariably became extinct in the second generation: they were therefore perpetuated by the same means by which they were first established; that is, their ranks were recruited by slaves brought from their original country. Indeed, as many writers have remarked, the Circassian territories have at all times been a nursery of slaves.

Towards the end of last century, when they constituted the whole military force, and had acquired the entire government of Egypt, the Mamelukes, together with the Serradjies, a kind of mounted domestics, did not exceed 10,000 men. Some hundreds of them were dispersed throughout the country and in the villages, to maintain the authority of their corps and collect tribute; but the main body constantly remained at Cairo. "Strangers to each other, bound by no ties as parents or children, placed amongst a people with whom they had nothing in common, despised as renegades by the Turks, ignorant and superstitious from education, ferocious, perfidious, seditious, and corrupted by every species of debauchery, the disorders and cruelties which accompanied their licentious rule may be more easily imagined than described. Sovereignty to them was to have the means of possessing more women, toys, horses, and slaves, than others; of managing the court of Constantinople, so as to elude the tribute or the menaces of the sultan; and of multiplying partisans, counterming plots, and destroying secret enemies by the dagger or poison. But with all this, they were brave in the extreme. Their boys, and even the common soldiers, distinguished themselves by the magnificence and costliness of their accoutrements, though these were in general clumsy and heavy. Being trained from infancy to the use of arms and horsemanship, they were admirable horsemen; and used the scimitar, carbine, pistol, and lance, with almost unequalled skill and vigour."

About the year 1746, Ibrahim, an officer of the Janissaries, rendered himself in reality master of Egypt, having managed matters so well, that of the twenty-four beys, or sangiacs, eight were of his household; so that by this means, as well as by attaching the officers and soldiers of his corps to his interest, the pacha became altogether unable to oppose him, and the orders of the sultan were less respected than those of Ibrahim. At his death, in 1757, his family continued to rule in a despotic manner; but waging war among each other, Ali Bey, who had been a principal actor in the disturbances, in 1766 overcame the rest, and for some time rendered himself absolute master of Egypt. This remarkable man was a Syrian by birth, and had been purchased when a youth in the slave market at Cairo; but being possessed of great talents, and of a most ambitious turn of mind, he, after a variety of extraordinary adventures, was appointed one of the twenty-four beys of Egypt.

The Porte, being at that time on the eve of a dangerous war with Russia, had not leisure to attend to the proceedings of Ali Bey; so that he had an opportunity of vigorously prosecuting his designs. His first expedition was against an Arabian prince named Hammam; against whom he sent his favourite Mohammed Bey, under pretence that the former had concealed a treasure entrusted with him by Ibrahim, and that he afforded protection to rebels. Having destroyed this unfortunate prince, he next began to put in execution a plan proposed to him by a young Venetian merchant, of rendering Gedda, the port of Mecca, an emporium for all the commerce of India; and he even imagined he should be able to make the Europeans abandon the passage to the Indies by the Cape of Good Hope. With this view, he fitted out some vessels at Suez; and, manning them with Mamelukes, commanded the bey Hassan to sail with them to Gedda, and seize upon it, while a body of cavalry under Mohammed Bey advanced against the town. Both these commissions were executed according to his wish, and Ali became quite intoxicated with his success. Nothing but ideas of conquest now occupied his mind, without considering the immense disproportion between his own force and that of the grand seignior. Circumstances were then indeed very favourable to his schemes. The sheik Daher was in rebellion against the Porte in Syria, and the pacha of Damascus had so exasperated the people by his extortions, that they were ready for a revolt.

Having made the necessary preparations, Ali Bey dispatched about 500 Mamelukes to take possession of Gaza, and thus secure an entrance into Palestine. Osman, the pacha of Damascus, however, no sooner heard of the invasion than he prepared for war, while the troops of Ali Bey held themselves in readiness to fly on the first attack. Sheik Daher hastened to their assistance, while Osman fled without even offering to make the least resistance; thus leaving the enemy masters of all Palestine. The combined army of Ali Bey and Sheik Daher afterwards marched to Damascus; where the pachas waited for them, and on the 6th of June, 1771, a decisive action took place; the Mamelukes and Safadians (the name of Daher's subjects) rushed on the Turks with such fury, that, terrified at their courage, the latter immediately fled; and the allies became masters of the country, taking possession of the city without opposition. The castle alone resisted. Its ruinous fortification had not a single cannon; but it was surrounded by a muddy ditch, and behind the ruins were posted a few musqueteers; and these alone were sufficient to check this army of cavalry.

As the besieged, however, were already conquered by their fears, they capitulated on the third day, and the place was to be surrounded next morning, when, at daybreak, a most extraordinary revolution took place. This was no less than the defection of Mohammed Bey himself, whom Osman had gained over in a conference during the night. At the moment, therefore, that the signal of surrender was expected, this treacherous general sounded a retreat, and turned towards Egypt with all his cavalry, flying with as great precipitation as if he had been pursued by a superior army. Mohammed continued his march with such celerity, that the report of his arrival in Egypt reached Cairo only six hours before him. Thus Ali Bey found himself at once deprived of all his expectations of conquest; and, what was indeed galling, he found a traitor, whom he durst not punish, at the head of his forces. A sudden reverse of fortune now took place. Several vessels laden with corn for Sheik Daher, were taken by a Russian privateer; and Mohammed Bey, whom he designed to have put to death, not only made his escape, but was so well attended that he could not be attacked. His followers continuing daily to increase in number, Mohammed soon became sufficiently strong to march towards Cairo; and, in April, 1772, having defeated the troops of Ali in a rencontre, entered the city sword in hand, while the latter had scarcely time to make his escape with 800 Mamelukes. With difficulty he was enabled to get to Syria by the assistance of Sheik Daher, whom he immediately joined with the troops he had with him. The Turks under Osman were at that time besieging Sidon, but raised the siege on the approach of the allied army, consisting of about 7000 cavalry. Though the Turkish army was at least three times their number, the allies did not hesitate to attack them, and gained a complete victory.

favourable aspect; but the military operations were retarded by the siege of Yafa (the ancient Joppa), which had revolted, and held out for eight months. In the beginning of 1773 it capitulated, and Ali Bey began to think of returning to Cairo. For this purpose Sheik Daher had promised him succours, and the Russians, with whom he had now contracted an alliance, made him a similar promise. Ali, however, ruined every thing by his own impatience. He set out with his Mamelukes and 1500 Safadians given him by Daher; but he had no sooner entered the desert which separates Gaza from Egypt, than he was attacked by a body of 1200 chosen Mamelukes, who were lying in wait for his arrival. They were commanded by a young bey, named Mourad; who, being enamoured of the wife of Ali Bey, had obtained a promise of her from Mohammed, in case he could bring him her husband's head. As soon as Mourad perceived the dust by which the approach of Ali's army was announced, he rushed forward to the attack and took prisoner Ali Bey himself, after wounding him in the forehead with a sabre. Being conducted to Mohammed Bey, the latter pretended to treat him with extraordinary respect, and ordered a magnificent tent to be erected for him; but in three days he was found dead of his wounds, as was given out; though some, with equal probability, affirm that he was poisoned.

Upon the death of Ali Bey, Mohammed took upon himself the supreme dignity. At first he pretended to be only the defender of the rights of the sultan, remitted the usual tribute to Constantinople, and took the customary oath of unlimited obedience; after which he solicited permission to make war upon Sheik Daher, against whom he had a personal pique. In February, 1776, he appeared in Syria with an army equal to that which he had formerly commanded under Ali Bey. Daher's forces despairing of being able to cope with such a formidable armament, abandoned Gaza, of which Mohammed immediately took possession, and then marched towards Yafa, which defended itself so long, that Mohammed was distracted with rage, anxiety, and despair. The besieged, however, whose numbers were diminished by the repeated attacks, became weary of the contest; and it was proposed to abandon the place, on the Egyptians giving hostages. Conditions were agreed upon, and the treaty might be considered as concluded, when, in the midst of the security occasioned by this belief, some Mamelukes entered the town; numbers of others followed their example, and attempted to plunder. The inhabitants defended themselves, and the attack recommenced: the whole army then rushed into the town, which suffered all the horrors of war; women and children, young and old men, were all cut to pieces, and Mohammed, equally mean and barbarous, caused a pyramid, formed of the heads of the unfortunate sufferers, to be raised as a monument of his victory. By this disaster the greatest terror and consternation were diffused everywhere. Sheik Daher himself fled, and Mohammed soon became master of Acre also. Here he behaved with his usual cruelty, and abandoned the city to be plundered by his soldiers. But his career was soon stopped, his death just at the time occurring through a malignant fever, after two days illness.

Soon after Mohammed's death a contest arose among several of the beys, as to who should succeed him. But the chief struggle lay between Mourad and Ibrahim, who, having ultimately overcome the rest, agreed in 1785, to share the government between them, and continued to rule as joint pachas for many years. From that time we have no accounts of any remarkable transaction in Egypt, till the French invaded that country in 1798; which we shall as concisely as possible relate, and then take a brief survey of some striking events that have occurred more recently.

When Selim III. ascended the Ottoman throne, the French revolution was just breaking out; but until Buonaparte's memorable invasion of Egypt and Syria, its effects were not much felt in that quarter of the globe. The two Mameluke beys, Mourad and Ibrahim, were at that time at the head of the government.

The French landed near Alexandria on the 1st of July, 1798; and that city was taken by assault on the 5th, and plundered by the soldiery. They then marched to Cairo, but were met by an army of Mamelukes in the plains near the Pyramids, where the French gained a signal victory, which was followed by their occupation of the capital, and the submission, in general, of the inhabitants.

The destruction of the French fleet, by the English under Nelson, in the bay of Aboukir, was the next event of importance; yet, notwithstanding this great calamity, Buonaparte was not deterred from pursuing his original design, but set out at the head of 10,000 men to cross the desert which separates Egypt from Palestine. On his arrival in Syria he conquered several towns, one of which was Jaffa, where an act of atrocity was committed by him, which, notwithstanding all the sophistry that has been employed to palliate it, will ever remain as a foul and infamous blot on the French commander: this was the deliberate murder of a large body of prisoners, chiefly Albanians, who had surrendered to the French, and for whose sustenance, it was pleaded, the latter had not sufficient provisions!

We shall not enter into a detail of the memorable siege of Acre, undertaken by Buonaparte, who after putting every engine into operation that skill could dictate, or disappointed ambition suggest, was compelled to retire, humbled and discomfited by sir Sydney Smith and his gallant fellows, who had been sent to the Syrian coast for the express purpose of assisting to expel the French. In both our histories of "England" and "France," the subject, down to the expulsion of the French from Egypt, will be found: it is sufficient, therefore, in this place to say, that the noble defence of Acre in reality put an end to all his hopes of conquest in the East, and that the British army, under the brave Abercrombie, completed, in 1801, that overthrow which had so well been begun by a handful of British sailors.

The most remarkable person connected with Egypt, after the period of which we have been speaking, was Mehemet Ali, the Turkish pacha of that country. This chief, who has since become so prominent in Egyptian and Syrian history, was ambitious of making himself independent of the Ottoman Porte; but as this could not be effected while the Mameluke beys retained their power and influence, he determined on their extirpation by a cold-blooded act of treachery. He accordingly invited them to a grand festival, to be given in honour of his son Ibrahim, who had just been appointed commander-in-chief of an expedition against the Wahabites of Arabia. Wholly unuspicious of the treacherous design of Mehemet Ali, the beys arrived at the castle on the appointed day, (March 1st, 1811), each attended by his suite; but they had no sooner entered than they were seized and beheaded. The execution of all the chief Mamelukes throughout the country immediately followed; and Mehemet now, though nominally a vassal of the Turkish empire, exercised all the functions and privileges of an absolute sovereign prince.

In the histories of 'Turkey' and 'Greece' will be seen how large a share Mehemet Ali and Ibrahim had in fomenting and carrying on the war between those countries. It will also be seen in its proper place in the history of "England," that Mehemet Ali had provoked the insurrection in Syria, and but for the interference of England and her continental allies, would have wrested Egypt and Syria from the Turks. But the allied fleet, under the command of sir R. Stopford and commodore Napier, bombarded and captured the whole line of fortified places along the coast of Syria, ending their operations with the destruction of St. Jean d'Acre. This place, so renowned of old for scenes of desperate valour—scenes in which British heroism has been so strikingly conspicuous—was doomed again to witness the prowess of our arms. A heavy cannonade for nearly three hours was kept up, by which time the guns of the forts were silenced; when, owing to one of the bomb-shots falling on the enemy's powder magazine, an awful explosion took place, and 1200 human beings were blown into the air. This decided the fate of the war; and Mehemet Ali, after a long negotiation, in which the allied powers of Europe took part, was reinstated in his viceroyship of Egypt, the government of that country to descend in a direct hereditary line, A.D. 1841. Mehemet Ali, from mental decay, became incapable of government in June, 1848, and his son Ibrahim him was invested with the pashalik of Egypt by the Turkish Sultan. Ibrahim dying November following, he was succeeded by Abbas Pasha, son of Tonsour. The celebrated Mehmet Ali, whose extraordinary career had rendered Egypt and himself objects of European interest, died July 2, 1840, aged 80.

Under Abbas Pasha the work of reform has continued energetic, but on a mitigated principle. Mehmet Ali centred every thing in himself, but the present ruler judiciously seeks to lighten his responsibilities by giving more freedom to the people. Thus the felahs have been restored to the right from which the military system of the former ruler had degraded them; and the practice of disposing of that part of the produce paid as rent has been altered for the benefit of the dealers. Under the old administration, the produce of the soil thus extorted by government was monopolised and distributed by favour at arbitrary prices. It is now disposed of fairly, by public sale, to the highest bidder, and former causes of complaint with the foreign merchant have been removed. Such liberal policy has borne its natural fruit. The exports of Egypt have greatly increased. That of cotton wool has risen from 200,000 to 400,000 cwt. within the last two years; that of flax has doubled; of wheat, more than double; and in sum the value of the entire exports has risen, since Abbas Pasha's accession in 1848, from one to upwards of two millions sterling. By the adoption of such measures, and by rendering Egypt the safe and rapid highway of traffic between the East and the West, the career of prosperity on which the country has entered may be indefinitely augmented.

ALEXANDRIA.

ALEXANDRIA, now called Scanderia, the ancient capital of Lower Egypt, occupies a prominent position in the annals of history even from its first foundation. Founded by the Great Alexander, whose mind was comprehensive as his valour was unequalled, the very cause of its existence was commercial, and its history for 1800 years shows how well the Macedonians appreciated the advantages of maritime resources. Amidst the convulsions which shook his empire to pieces after his death, Alexandria continued to rise in greatness and magnificence under the fostering protection of the enlightened Ptolemies, the friends of commerce and science. But the brutality of Ptolemy Physcon made Alexandria almost a desert about 130 years before Christ. An inhuman massacre of all the young men of the city shortly afterwards took place, and Alexandria was for some time the scene of conimon and anarchy.

In A. C. 48 the conqueror of the West visited the city of the victor of the East, in pursuit of his defeated rival, where he arbitrated between Ptolemy XII. and Cleopatra. His military conduct was no less conspicuous here than it had been previously in Gaul, Britain, and the plains of Pharsalia.

With a small band of Romans, assisted by some forces of the Jews, he defeated the whole army of Ptolemy. Whilst history records with exultation the exploit of Cæsar, who swam across the Nile bearing his Commentaries aloft safe from the waters, she droops over the conflagration which accidentally consumed the library of the Bruchion, consisting of 400,000 volumes. For it must be remembered that the city of Alexandria was originally designed, and actually proved, to be the mart of philosophy and science.

The emperor Caligula had designed Alexandria as the seat of his empire, in the event of his massacring the chief senators and knights of Rome.—In the year A. D. 40, the Jews, who, to the amount of a million, had for many years enjoyed a variety of privileges, were, by an edict of Flævus, now declared strangers in Alexandria—and underwent, as one of the signs of the time of their approaching destruction and complete dispersion of their nation, grievous privations, losses, and cruelty. It was within a few years after this, that the gospel of Jesus Christ was promulgated in Alexandria, and received by many.—The names of Panteus, St. Clement, and Origen, are found as presidents of a Christian school of considerable eminence founded in this city.—The admixture, however, of the philosophy which distinguished Alexandria, with the tenets of Christianity, and the dogmas of Judaism, tended materially to corrupt both truth and wisdom; and the eclectic philosophy proved the foundation of the Jewish cabala, and many corruptions of the Christian faith.—Under Claudius, Alexandria again reckoned the Jews as citizens. It was the first place which hailed Vespasian emperor, A. D. 69; and here he abode whilst his generals and armies were deciding his cause against Vitellius. The account Adrian, who visited the city A. D. 130, gives of it, is characteristic of the industry and enterprise of commerce, as well as of its worst and most pernicious effects upon the inhabitants who thrive under its riches. Under the emperor Severus, Alexandria obtained several immunities and privileges, A. D. 202; a grateful sense of which was manifested by a monument erected to him. Different, however, was their fortune under the despicable Caracalla, who rewarded their entertainment of him, by a general massacre of the inhabitants, A. D. 215; by abolishing the societies of learned men, who were maintained in the museum; by the plunder of temples and private houses; and by separating different parts of the city from one another by walls and towers. During the reign of Gallienus, Alexandria suffered most severely both by war and pestilence. But history, here, records with admiration the conduct of two Christian bishops, Eusebius and Anatolius, who, like the good Samaritan, bound up the wounds of the wretched, and, like their heavenly Master, were unwearied in alleviating the distresses of their suffering fellow creatures. Their conduct sheds a lustre over the annals of this city, far transcending the most brilliant exploits which emblazon its heraldry. Alexandria was now almost depopulated. It, however, again recovered somewhat of its former greatness, again to feel the unsparing havoc of war and dissension, in the reign of Dioclesian, who having captured it from Achilleus, the ruler of Egypt, gave it up to indiscriminate pillage and plunder A. D. 296. It made some retribution for this severity by establishing certain salutary regulations, amongst which may be reckoned, his establishment for the perpetual distribution of corn, for the benefit of this city, A. D. 302. Under Constantine Alexandria again flourished by its trade and commerce. A dreadful and almost universal earthquake, July 21, 365, shook this city to its very foundation, and swallowed up 60,000 of its inhabitants. Although the second capital of the Roman empire, Alexandria was captured by the Moslems, under Amrou, the general of the caliph Omar, Dec. 22, A. D. 640. Bloody and obstinate was the siege: amply supplied with provisions, and devoted to the defence of their dearest rights and honours, its inhabitants bravely withstood the astonishing efforts and unwearied bravery of their enemies; and had Heraclius as promptly seconded their resolution, the crescent of Mahomet had not then reigned in bloody supremacy over the Christian cross. It was invaluable to Heraclius, and its loss was a source of great inconvenience to Byzantium, to which it had been the storehouse. Since, in the short space of five years, the harbours and fortifications of Alexandria were occupied by a fleet and army of Romans, twice did the valour of its conqueror, Amrou, expel them; but his policy had been to dismantle several walls and towers, in pursuance of a vow he had made of rendering Alexandria as accessible as the home of a prostitute. In the year 642 the library of Alexandria was destroyed by order of the caliph Omar; and so extensive was it, that its volumes of paper or parchment sufficed to light the fires of the 4000 baths which were in the city, for more than six months!

So waned the splendour and glory of this mighty city. The dominion of the Saracens withered its energies, and Alexandria gradually sunk from its high estate, so that in the year 875 its extent was contracted to half its former dimensions. Mournful, but still majestic in its decline, it still retained the Pharos, and part of its public places and monuments. In 920 its great church, called Cosares, which had formerly been a pagan temple, erected by Cleopatra, in honour of Saturn, was destroyed by fire; and two years after, this second, or Arabic, Alexandria, was taken by the Magrebians, who, after various vicissitudes, at length finally lost it to the Moslems, A. D. 923, when more than 200,000 of the wretched inhabitants perished. The discovery of the Cape of Good Hope in 1499 completed the ruin which had, for some centuries, been advancing under the Turkish dominion; and Alexandria ceases from that time to possess any particular interest for the historian, until the close of the last century. The first consul of France, whose name will be reckoned up with the Macedonian Alexander and the Roman Cæsar, like these two great prototypes of his ambition, displayed in Alexandria his skill and progress. It fell to his army July 4, 1798, after a defeat of the Arabs and Mamelukes. The thunders of the British navy braving defeat and discomfiture through the ships of France, at Aboukir, were heard at Alexandria, and the British ensign waved triumphant over its walls in the year 1801, as again in 1806. Amongst the names of various heroes connected with this once mighty city, that of Abercrombie, who died here in the arms of victory, shall live enrolled in the annals of history.

ANTIOCH.

THE history of this interesting place is pregnant with great and important events, connected as well with profane as sacred history. It was founded by Antigonos, and by him called Antigonía, a name which it soon after changed for Antiochia, in honour of Antiochus, father of Seleucus. The seat of empire for the kings of Syria, and of government for the Roman officers, Antioch was a place of considerable importance. It contained four distinct cities, and was therefore called Tetrapolis. Another city, built in its suburbs, called Daphne, superseded it in magnificence and luxury so much, that not only did "to live after the manner of Daphne" become proverbial, but Antioch was termed Antioch near Daphne.

Its history is confined pretty much to the various calamities of war and pestilence which, at different times, have visited and scourged this city. By the assistance of Jonathan, the leader of the Maccabees, king Demetrius punished the contumacy of his dissatisfied subjects by laying 10,000 of them, B. C. 145. An extraordinary earthquake laid it in ruins in the reign of Trejan, A. D. 115; the emperor himself being with difficulty saved from destruction. Antioch rose from its ashes under the auspices of Trajan, and was again nearly consumed by fire in 155. It was restored by Antoninus Pius, but was dispossessed, A. D. 177, by a severe edict of his, of all its ancient rights and privileges, as a punishment for abetting the faction of Ovidius Cassius, governor of Syria, a measure, however, which was soon annulled. In 194 Severus, to punish the part which its natives took in the faction between him and Niger, passed a similar edict, and subjected Antioch, reduced to the level of a village, to Laodicea, but the next year he revoked his sentence. In the meanwhile Antioch had been distinguished for some events connected with the spread of Christianity, which, it is said, was established here by St. Peter, in the year 38. It was here the followers of the Redeemer were first called Christians, and an assembly of the apostles was held, in 56. There have also been several councils convened in Antioch at different periods.

From its situation, it was necessarily exposed to severe attacks during the wars between the Persians and the Romans, when the power of the latter began to decline. It was three times taken by the Persian monarch, Sapor, who, after its last capture, plundered it and laid all its public buildings prostrate. In 331 it was visited by a severe famine. Sixteen years afterwards its importance was increased by Constantine II., who, at an immense expense, formed the harbour of Seleucia for its convenience. During the residence of the emperor Julian here, on his way to the Persian empire, there occurred throughout the Roman provinces a severe famine, which visited Antioch more severely than other places, from the establishment of a corn-law by the emperor. In 381, two great scourges appeared, plague and famine; the former soon subsided, but on the continuance of the latter, Libanius, the bishop, entreated assistance from Icarus, prefect of the East, who answered the entreaty with brutality and insult. A commotion ensued, which, however, terminated without bloodshed. Six years afterwards, a tremendous tumult took place, in consequence of a tax imposed upon the people by the emperor Theodosius, in commemoration of the tenth year of his own reign, and the fifth of that of his son Arcadius. The governor of the city with difficulty escaped the frenzy of the populace; and great indignities were offered to the emperor's statues by the people, who were made to atone for this offence by the most cruel punishments. St. Chrysostom distinguished himself on this occasion by preaching homilies to the people, which tended very much to reform their dissolute and corrupt practices. Severe measures were on the point of being executed against Antioch by command of Theodosius, when they were averted by the united entreaties of St. Chrysostom, some hermits, and Flavianus, bishop of Antioch. But there was no defence to this ill-fated place in the year 598 against the awful visitation of an earthquake, which, on Sept. 19, laid desolate the most beautiful quarter of the city. A similar visitation occurred in 535, in the reign of Justin.

Neither was the fury of man long withheld from working utter destruction to Antioch. In 540 it was captured by Cosroes, king of Persia. The churches were pillaged, and, like another Nebuchadnezzar, he appropriated their gold and silver to his own use. Rapine, Pillage, and Até in her fullest insubordination, were let loose. Antioch had not a dwelling left; her people were scattered, slain, or carried into captivity. Once more, phoenix-like, it rose from its ruins, to experience another earthquake in 580, which destroyed 30,000 persons.

A new enemy now appears on the page of history. The Saracens took Antioch in the year 634, and retained possession of it till 958, when again it was annexed to the Roman empire. The Turks next became masters of it; and they in turn lost it to the Crusaders, who made a principality of Antioch, in 1098, under Bohemond, prince of Tarento. He was taken prisoner by the Turks in 1101, but liberated in 1103. Meanwhile Antioch had been governed by Tancred, who died the year after his appointment. The whole of the principality of Antioch, excepting the city, was overrun by the sultan Noureddin in 1148, who in the year 1160 took Bohemond III. prisoner. On his liberation in 1175, he was created knight by Louis VI. of France, and died in 1201. The principality of Antioch was dissolved in 1268 by the capture of the city by Bibars, sultan of Babylon. It then became a portion of the Turkish empire, which it has since continued, having experienced during that period two earthquakes—one in 1759, and the other in 1822.

Antioch has listed to the march of empires; the splendours of the Macedonian, the majesty of the Roman, the voluptuousness of the Persian, the vigour of the Saracenic, and the tyranny of the Osmanic, have in turns revelled in her palaces, and adorned or degraded her beauty; whilst the voice of Christianity has whispered in her temple, and the thunders of the Incomprehensible Deity have spoken in awful prodigies, and awed her inhabitants by pestilence, famine and earthquakes.

THE BARBARY STATES.

BARBARY is a vast territory of Africa, containing the states or kingdoms of Algiers, Morocco, Fez, Tunis, Tripoli, and Barca. It stretches entirely across the northern shores of Africa, from the Atlantic Ocean on the western boundary of Egypt, taking almost the whole range of the southern coast of the Mediterranean Sea. In width it is various, and bounded by the "great desert."

The Romans obtained possession of Bar-

barry in the time of Julius Cæsar, and remained masters of it till A. D. 428. At that time Bonifacius, the Roman governor, revolted, and called in to his assistance Genseric, king of the Vandals, who had been some time settled in Spain. They agreed to divide the country between them: Genseric was to have two-thirds, and Bonifacius one-third. Genseric set sail in May the same year, with an army of 80,000 men, together with their wives, children and effects. Genseric had no sooner effected his landing, and secured a part of the country, than he turned his arms against Bonifacius, defeated him, and obliged him to shelter himself in Hippo, which place he besieged in May, 430; but was under the necessity of retiring, from famine. The Romans sent an army into Africa, under the conduct of the celebrated Aspar from Constantinople; a dreadful battle ensued, and Genseric became the victor. The Vandals were by this victory rendered masters of Africa. Cirtha and Carthage were the only strong places possessed by the Romans.

In 435, peace was concluded between the Romans and the Vandals. The former gave up part of Numidia, the province of Procon Salaris and Byzancene, for which a yearly sum was to be paid to the emperor of the East. However, in 439, the Romans being engaged in a war with the Goths of Gaul, Genseric took this advantage to seize Carthage, by which he considerably enlarged his African dominions.

On the taking of Carthage, Genseric made it the seat of his empire; and, in 440, made a descent on the island of Sicily, plundered it, and returned to Africa. Being now become formidable to both empires, Theodosius, emperor of the East, resolved to assist Valentinian against so powerful an enemy. Accordingly, he fitted out a fleet, consisting of 1100 ships, filled with the flower of his army, under Arcovindus. Genseric now pretending a desire to be at peace with both empires, amused the Roman general with pacific proposals, till the season for action was over. Theodosius being obliged to recall his forces to oppose the Huns, Valentinian found it necessary to conclude a peace with the Vandals, yielding them quiet possession of the countries they had seized.

Genseric was now become so powerful, or rather so low was the power of the Roman empire reduced, that, in 455, he took the city of Rome, and plundered it; and after his return to Africa, made himself master of all the remaining countries held by the Romans in that part of the world.

The kingdom of the Vandals in Africa was now fully established; and Genseric made himself master of Sicily, as well as all the other islands between Italy and Africa, without opposition from the western emperors, who were now too feeble to resist him, A. D. 476. Genseric made his dominions a scene of blood, and died in 377, after a reign of forty-seven years. He was succeeded by his son Hunneric, who proved a greater tyrant than his father, persecuting the Christians with the utmost fury; and during his short reign of seven years and a half, he destroyed more of them than Genseric had done during his whole life.

The successors of Hunneric, Gutamund, Thrasamund, and Hilderic, of whom we know very little, except that the latter was deposed, in the seventh year of his reign, by Gelimer, a prince of the blood royal, who proved a greater tyrant than any that had gone before him, and was held in abhorrence, when the emperor Justinian projected an invasion of Africa. Accordingly, he sent a powerful fleet and army against Gelimer, under the command of the celebrated Belisarius. Gelimer committed the management of his army to his brothers, Gundimer and Gelamund; they attacked the Romans; the engagement was long and bloody, but at length the Vandals were defeated, and the two princes slain. Gelimer headed a fresh army, which was also defeated, and the loss of Carthage followed. Another defeat followed close upon the former. Gelimer fled into Numidia, and an end was put to the Vandal power in Barbary.

Gelimer was afterwards brought in gold chains before Justinian, whom he besought, in the most submissive manner, to spare his life. This was readily granted by the emperor; and a handsome yearly pension was also allowed him.

Barbary remained under the Roman power until the caliphate of Omar, when it was reduced by the Saracens. It continued subject to the caliph till the reign of Haroun al Raschid, when Ebn Aglab, the governor, assumed independence. The house of Aglab was driven out by Al Mohdi, the first Fatimite caliph.

Al Mohdi reigned twenty-four years, and was succeeded by his son, Abul Kasem, who took the name of Al Kayem Mohdi. During this reign we read of nothing remarkable, except the rebellion of Yesod. He was succeeded by his son Iahmasi, who took upon himself the title of Al Mansur.

Al Mansur was succeeded by his son, Abu Zammin Moad, who assumed the surname of Al Moex Ledenillah. This caliph conquered Egypt, and removed the caliphate to that country. The other material events that have taken place in the Barbary States will be found in the historical notice of Algiers.

ALGIERS.

ALGIERS, a country of northern Africa, and which was regarded as the most powerful of the Barbary states, has long been the subject of European indignation for its piratical practices, and the ignominious slavery to which all Christians who fell into its power were irrevocably doomed. But the hour of retribution has at length come; and the events of late years have greatly contributed to call the attention of the civilized world to its past and present history. There is a variety of opinions respecting the original inhabitants: some contending, that they were the Sabans who plundered the patriarch Job; others, the Canaanites who were driven out of their country by Joshua. Be this as it may, the Algerine kingdom formerly made a considerable part of the Mauritania Tingitania, which Julius Cæsar reduced to a Roman province. The Algerines shared in the fortunes of Rome; for, at the decline of its empire, they fell to the Vandals, who in turn were expelled by the Saracens about the middle of the seventh century. From that period they were subject to the Arabs, till the year 1051, when Abubeker ben Omar, by the agency of his marabouts or saints, assembled a large force of maulcontents in Numidia and Lybia. His followers were called Morabites, and the kingdom which he founded is distinguished by that appellation. Religious frenzy seems to have imparted resolution and strength, the sinews of victory, to these combatants; whilst a variety of favourable circumstances, arising from the absence of the most powerful of the constituted authorities, enabled Abubeker to vanquish the several sheiks who opposed him, and at length reduce the whole of Tingitania under his sway.

His successor Yusef, or Joseph, founded Morocco as the capital of the Morabitish kingdom. An event which at first seemed to threaten his project with annihilation, turned out to the increase of his power, and the consolidation of his empire. In order to strengthen his new dynasty, he sent ambassadors to a powerful sect of the Mohammedans, called Zeneti, dwelling in Tremecen. The Zeneti, whom he wished to bring back to what he called the true faith, not only murdered his emissaries, but with a large army invaded his kingdom. Fearful and terrible was the retribution he exacted from them. He ravaged their lands with fire and sword; and, assisted by the inhabitants of Fes, who refused the Zeneti the succour they had expected from them when they retreated upon their city, he almost annihilated the whole tribe, to the amount of nearly a million of souls, including women and children. Their desolated country was soon re-peopled by colonies from Fes; and Joseph, forgetful of the efficient support he had received from the Fezzans, attacked and subdued both them and the remaining Arab sheiks, who, relying upon their supposed impregnable fortresses, had not yet submitted to his authority. This dynasty of the Morabites, founded by the influence of the marabouts, fell before the power of Mohavedin, a marabout, in the middle of the 12th century, whose priestly tribe was expelled by Abdular, governor of Fes. Thus did the conquered become conquerors, only to fall before the renovated power of the descendants of those very princes whom Abubeker in the 11th century had stripped of their power. Their descendants divided their new conquests into several small kingdoms or provinces, dividing the present kingdom of Algiers into Tremecen, Tenez, Algiers Proper, and Bujayah. The alliance of these four kingdoms was so well cemented, that mutual amity reigned amongst them for nearly three centuries. It was interrupted by the aggression of the king of Tremecen, who was in consequence attacked, and subjected by the potentate of Tereza, Abul Farez. He left his power divided amongst his three sons, which occasioned discords, and afforded the Spaniards an opportunity of attacking them. Ferdinand of Spain having driven the Saracens from Europe, followed them into Africa, and, in 1504 and 1509, took possession of Oran, Bujayah, Algiers, and other places.

The successes of the count of Navarre struck such terror into the Algerines, that they sought the protection of Selim Eutemi, an Arabian prince. This alliance however, though actively exerted, did not save them from becoming tributary to their European invaders, who raised a strong fort on a small island opposite the city, in order to deter the maraudings of the corsairs. The death of Ferdinand, in 1516, seemed the signal of their liberty; for they solicited, with larger offers, the succour of Ameh Barbarossa, whose valour and success had rendered him the most redoubtable captain of that period. Barbarossa readily answered their call, and marched with a large and powerful army to Algiers, having first reduced and then treacherously murdered Hassan, another celebrated corsair, whose followers, consisting of Turks, he compelled to follow in his ranks.

The whole populace of Algiers, with the prince Selim Eutemi at their head, received this accomplished butcher with every demonstration of gratitude and honour; which he repaid by causing the prince to be murdered, and himself to be saluted by his licentious followers with "Long live king Ameh Barbarossa, the invincible king of Algiers, the chosen of God to deliver the people from the oppression of the Christians." This part of the acclamation might have been acceptable enough to the Algerines in respect of the object for which they had sought his friendship; but the concluding words, "destruction to all who shall oppose, or refuse to own him as their lawful sovereign," struck such terror into them, that they acknowledged his pretensions and received him as their king. His treachery to Selim was followed by brutal insults to Zaphira, his widow, who having vainly attempted to stab the tyrant, poisoned herself.

The reign of Barbarossa, begun in treachery and usurpation, was continued by havoc and bloodshed. The signal barbarity he exercised over some conspirators whom he had detected, effectually repressed all similar plots against him in those who disliked his authority, whilst his unbounded liberality to those who followed him obtained the favour of others who sought their own private advantage in preference to their country's liberty. An attempt, fomented by Selim, son of the prince whom Barbarossa had murdered, proved abortive, although backed by 10,000 Spaniards under the command of Don Diego de Vera. The king of Tunis also, at the head of 10,000

Moors, was defeated by the Algerine autocrat with only 1000 Turkish musqueteers and 800 Granada Moors, his capital taken and pillaged, himself deposed, and Barbarossa made sovereign in his stead. This victory, which he owed to the use of firearms, which had now begun to lend their terrible assistance to the deadliness of war, was followed by an embassy from Tremecen, in which place also he was chosen king. His tyranny in Tremecen led to his destruction, for the expelled royal family having obtained the assistance of the Spaniards, and being joined by the refugee Algerines, under the guidance of prince Selim, pressed the monarch so closely, that in his attempt to escape he was overtaken, and after a resistance distinguished by the most uncompromising valour of his followers, slain by his pursuers, in the forty-fourth year of his age, A. D. 1520.

The death of Barbarossa did not deliver the Algerines from the Turkish authority; for Hayradin, his brother, was appointed king. To strengthen his power he sought the protection of the Grand Seigneur, from whom he received a confirmation of his office, and such reinforcements that he both compelled the acquiescence of the Moors and Arabs by his way, and was enabled also greatly to annoy the Europeans by sea. He captured the Spanish fort of Calan, and by employing 30,000 Christian slaves on the work without intermission for three years, he built a strong mole, as a protection for his shipping. And not only did he provide this defence for himself, but, by repairing and strengthening the captured Spanish fort, he effectually kept out all foreign vessels. He strengthened, by the assistance of the Ottoman sultan, all the weak places of his kingdom, and was at length rewarded by him with the dignity of bashaw of the empire; whilst Algiers, now completely tributary to the Porte, received Hassan Aga, a Sardinian renegade, as the Turkish deputy.

From this period the history of Algiers for about a hundred years is one bloody series of piracy abroad, and sanguinary commotions at home. Hassan gave the Spaniards no respite. He ravaged not only their coasts, but even those of the Papal States, and other parts of Italy. A most formidable armament was fitted out against him by the emperor Charles V., at the instigation of Paul III., the pope of Rome. This expedition was, in some respects, like the armada which threatened England with Spanish bigotry in the reign of Elizabeth, and was attended with similar success. Confident in his numbers and equipments, Charles pushed his projects with every probability of success, whilst Hassan, dispirited by the weakness of his fortifications and the paucity of the garrison, was on the point of surrender, when the predictions of a mad prophet, named Yusuf, encouraged him to a more desperate resistance. The predictions of the approaching ruin of the Spaniards were soon verified. The war of elements—storms of wind, hail, rain—a general darkness—and violent earthquakes, combined to wreck the proud hopes of the Spanish monarch. His army, the fleet, perhaps, Europe had seen for many an age, was scattered, destroyed, or taken captive; his navy in a few minutes was swallowed up, and the great deep closed over the riches, and arms, and human beings with which it was amply furnished; and he himself with difficulty escaped from the general destruction which pursued his ill-fated attempt. This extraordinary event occurred on the 28th of October, 1541. The Spaniards never recovered this loss, and their attempts to annoy the Algerines were henceforth inconsiderable. This may be considered as the most splendid victory which this free-booting state ever acquired.

In 1555, the Algerines under Pelm-Bate, the successor of Hassan, captured Bujayah, which had been in possession of the Spaniards for fifty years. A period now occurs thickly clustered by names of those who were bashaws for very brief periods, amongst which we find Hassan Corso, who was murdered to make room for Tekeli, who in turn was assassinated by Yusuf Calabre, and he was bashaw for only six days. Then came Hassan, the son of Hayradin, who defeated another attempt of the Spaniards with the loss of 12,000 men. This Hassan was deposed by the age of the Janissaries; then reinstated; again deposed by Achmet; and a third time made bashaw, when he undertook the siege of Marsalquivier, near Oran, with a powerful army, but which he was compelled to raise on the approach of the celebrated Doria. He was again recalled from his government, and died at Constantinople, A. D. 1567. His successor Mahomet showed prudence, and by his wise regulations laid the foundation of Algerine independence. He was deposed by the notorious renegade Ochali, who reduced Tunis to the subjection of Algiers, only that in a few years it might be made a pachalic of the Porte, in 1586. In the preceding year, the enterprising spirit of these pirates carried them through the straits of Gibraltar as far as the Canary islands, which they plundered.

In the beginning of the following century the Algerines effected one leading step towards independence, in obtaining from the Porte permission to appoint a dey of their own; but the sultan still retained bashaw, whose office was confined to watching that the interests of his master did not suffer. Their power, augmented by an influx of the Moors who were expelled from Spain in 1609, was now formidable; and the states of Europe, with the exception of the Dutch, quailed before them. Alliances were formed against them; and to the honour of France be it said, that her navy was the first which dared openly avenge the cause of insulted Europe and suffering humanity. In 1617 the arms of Gaul fell with violence on the insolence of the pirates.

In 1623 Algiers declared itself independent of the Porte, and for the next thirty years pillaged without distinction whatever vessels of the Europeans fell in their way; then another collision took place between them and the French navy; and soon after a large fleet under Hail Pinchinin, after carrying off immense booty from the Italian coast, was defeated by the Venetians under Capello, with very considerable loss, which greatly crippled their power. This relapse was but for two years; when, as it were, renovated by the misfortune, they scoured the whole sea with a fleet of sixty-five sail, and compelled the Dutch, the French, and English to court their favour. Louis XIV. at last, in the year 1681, provoked by some outrages which the pirates had committed on his coasts, ordered a powerful fleet and armament to be fitted out, with which he destroyed several of their vessels in the isle of Scio. In the following year he bombarded Algiers, and but for a sudden change of wind would have destroyed it. The return of the year saw the French admiral Du Quesne again before Algiers, who desisted not from his attack till he had completely humbled the Algerine audacity, by reducing their city to a heap of ruins. They sued for peace, which was granted, and all Christian captives were set at liberty. Taught a lesson by this humiliation, the Algerines paid some respect to other nations, and the English in particular were admitted into treaty with them; who further enforced respect from the pirates by the capture of Gibraltar and Port Mahon. The eighteenth century presents little that is interesting in the history of this piratical state, except the union of the office of the Algerine dey and Turkish viceroy, in 1710; the capture of Oran in 1708, and its recapture in 1737.

On the 18th of August, 1816, lord Exmouth, with a fleet of four ships of war, four frigates, and several vessels, bombs, &c., appeared before Algiers, to exact punishment for the barbarous massacre of a number of Europeans at Bona, on May 23, by 2000 of the Algerine infantry and cavalry. On the 27th of August his lordship commenced an attack, which was completely successful. The whole of the Algerine navy was destroyed, and half the town demolished. Like the defeat received from Du Quesne 133 years before, this disposed them to accept the terms offered by the British admiral. Christian slavery was abolished, and full reparation made; and on the 1st of September was beheld the proud and gratifying sight of the fulfilment of the conditions. Algiers disgorged its Christian slaves, and a large payment of money for the use of the several states which had suffered by its depredations. This was one of the most honourable triumphs achieved by the British flag. Since that time the dey has been embroiled with the Austrian states; but its most signal chastisement was left for the French to inflict.

During a conversation that took place between the dey and the French consul at Algiers, the former had the ill-mannered temerity to offer the Frenchman a personal insult, and even struck him. Redress was, of course, demanded; but so far from complying with the demand, the dey displayed a hostile feeling, and demolished the French post at La Calle. This being tantamount to a declaration of war, France immediately fitted out a powerful armament, including a land force of 38,000 men, with a formidable train of artillery, under the command of general Bourmont. On the 14th of June, 1830, the French troops effected a landing, and, after a feeble resistance, Algiers capitulated on the 5th of July. The French found in the treasury of the dey, gold and silver to the amount of nearly fifty millions of francs, besides an abundant supply of stores of various kinds. The towns of Oran and Bona soon after submitted. But the French subsequently met with considerable resistance from the bey of Oran, who, however, after a series of contests and negotiations, submitted in 1837, and agreed to abandon the maritime parts of the province, and to recognise the supremacy of the French in Africa. The occupation of Algiers (or, as it is now generally termed, ALGERIA) has been a work of more difficulty than its Gallic conquerors anticipated, and thousands of Europeans have annually perished by sickness and the sword since the territory has been wrested from the fierce Arabs in whose possession it had so long remained unmolested.

The government is at present administered by the commander-in-chief of the French forces in Algiers, who holds the rank of governor-general. It was previously vested in a dey, or pacha, who was at the head of the Turkish soldiery, and who exercised absolute power. The religion of the state is now Roman Catholic, and many mosques have been converted into Christian churches; but the great bulk of the people profess Mohammedanism; and although the French have established schools of instruction in all the principal towns, the Moors show no desire to read any other book than the Koran. The language is mostly Arabic, but mixed with Moorish and Phœnician words.

What effect the introduction of European laws, arts, and sciences into this part of Africa may have, time alone can show; but if we consider how great were its population and influence in distant ages, and how formidable it has since proved under the domination of a brutal horde of pirates, we may fairly expect that the fruits of a superior civilization will, ere long, appear. Much, indeed, as some politicians may imagine that the African colony will aggrandize our Gallic neighbour, the probability is that it must confer benefits on the Christian world in general, so real and substantial, as will be amply sufficient to outweigh the preponderating influence in that quarter of the world which France can possibly derive from the acquisition.

THE HISTORY OF AMERICA.

The American Continent, known by this general name, is by some supposed to have been partially known to the ancients; but the glory of its discovery in modern history belongs to Christoval Colon, a native of Genoa, better known to us as Christopher Columbus. This enterprising man, after many fruitless attempts to obtain assistance to enable him to prosecute his elaborate speculations in geography, discovered the island of St. Salvador, Oct. 12, 1492; and six years afterwards he reached the main continent at the mouth of the Orinoco, August 1, 1498.

The discovery of the north continent of America belongs to the family of the Cabots, who resided in Bristol. The father and three sons set out in the year 1497, stimulated by the fame of Columbus, and under the patronage of Henry VII. of England. They discovered several islands, and coasted the whole of the main land of the northern continent down to the Floridas. The honour of giving a name to these immense discoveries was gained by Amerigo Vespucci, a Florentine, who accompanied Alonzo de Ojeda, as pilot, and on returning published the first account of the several countries; from which circumstance the newly discovered world was called America.

The BRAZILIAN coast was first approached by Alvarez de Cabral, a Portuguese admiral, in 1500; and FLORIDA by Ponce de Leon, a Spaniard, in 1512. In the eastern part of the peninsula, called YUTACAN, the natives were found clothed in cotton garments, and exhibiting other marks of civilization, by Hernandez Cordova, A. D. 1517.

The expedition which followed this discovery led to the conquest of Mexico.

The spirit of discovery was now active, and all the great European courts emulated one another in affording facilities to carry into effect the enterprising efforts of numerous able and adventurous navigators, who successively prosecuted the attempt, and immortalized their names by the successes which they gained. The history of the principal colonies and states which arose from these discoveries will be given in due course.

America is divided into North and South. The principal colonies of the first were made by England and France; those of the south by Spain and Portugal. The distinguishing spirit of the respective mother countries seem to have been infused into the infant states; for whilst the southern division is rent by crude aspirants after liberty, the greater part of North America stands conspicuous—a mighty nation, growing in all the essentials of greatness, and already worthy to rival the leading European states. The vigour of the Union States is that of Youth; whilst the strength of the European dynasties assimilates very closely to the condition of Age—some of them strong, it is true, in their grey hairs, but others effete, and tottering to their decay. In North America there are now three principal divisions:—The United States, the British Possessions, and the country of Mexico; and first it may not be incongruous here to give the brief but important history of that part of North America, now known by the title of

THE UNITED STATES.

These formed the original States, connected and swayed by the British; and their early history is like that of other infant countries, whilst the difficulties they had at first to encounter were aggravated by the inveterate hostility of the natives, who found themselves displaced, and lorded over by men of different countries and different habits from themselves. Many were the leagues of the natives to crush the rising States, but all alike ineffectual from the time of Philip of Pokanohet to that of Tecumseh. Rude valour is never an equal match to arts of civilization; a small power well and skilfully directed easily puts to flight large masses undisciplined and without cultivation. Every age affords numerous instances of the truth of this. But although the European settlers were, by the superiority of their arts and discipline, rendered triumphant over their rude and savage opponents in general encounters, many a deed of death was retaliated upon them, by sudden incursions; and many an individual and family have been immolated to the grim genius of American brutality. The earliest colonists suffered the greatest hardships and encountered the most bloody perils, from which some of the later ones were exempted, as well by the advancement and strength of the others, as by their own more humane and judicious policy.

But the United States had to combat not only with barbarian enemies, but with European also. The adjoining country of Canada was a fertile source of disquietude and harassings. For not only did the French settlers, in the wars between their mother states, assault and war with the English colonists, but they stimulated against them the wild war-cry of the native Indians. The barrier provinces of New York and New England felt most severely this ill neighbourhood. Desolation and bloodshed spread their ravages through these devoted lands on occasion of every renewal of war; and many were the projects of a combination of power, aided by England, to dispossess the French of Canada. In 1690 an attempt was made, but it was rendered abortive by the tardiness of the British admiral; and the years 1692 and 1696 witnessed similar scenes.

The short period of repose enjoyed by the colonies subsequent to this period was interrupted by the general war in Europe; and not only did New York and New England experience the renewal of former barbarities, but even Pennsylvania and Virginia, and South Carolina and Georgia escaped not the lash of European and Indian depredations. A brighter star now began its dawning, which, though occasionally obscured, at length attained its zenith. In 1745, Louisbourg was gallantly taken by William Pepperell and a small body of New Englanders. In 1755, the English general Braddock received a signal defeat; but three years afterwards Fort Duquesne, now called Pittsburg, was captured by the British and provincial troops. Success followed success, till Quebec and the whole of Canada fell under the power of Britain. In this exploit the name of Wolfe is consecrated on the shrine of immortality. Thus relieved from the incursions and annoyances of their enemies, the States were so rapidly impelled to wealth and greatness, that in a few years the parent country looked towards them to bear some share in the burden of taxation which the war had imposed upon her. The stamp act, in 1765, elicited the first scintillation of that flame which was afterwards to blaze so brightly on the altar of independence. This was repealed, and tranquillity again settled in the States, and tranquillity again settled in the States, to be interrupted, however, by another act of the English legislation, levying duties upon certain articles imported into the colonies. The colonists, having acquired some consciousness of their own strength and importance during the conflicts which terminated in the expulsion of the French from Canada, and having within them seeds of that stubborn spirit which characterises him whom Goldsmith has elegantly called felt indignant at the attempt to exact from them taxes in spite of themselves, and resolutely determined to resist the legislation. The British ministry partially yielded to their resistance, reserving only the duty upon tea. This was met by the colonists with a compact amongst themselves, not to import or use this excisable commodity; and so keen was their spirit, and so decided their resolution, that the people of Boston seized and threw into the sea a large quantity of it, which had been sent into their port. The legislature of the mother country retaliated upon them by passing an act to close the port of Boston, and by other severe measures against the charter of Massachusetts. This roused the indignation not of them only, but of even the provinces most remote from them, and most removed from the operation of the obnoxious measures.

In August, 1774, a congress of delegates assembled at Philadelphia. The proceedings in Massachusetts, where a provincial congress had been constituted, were approved of—a resolution neither to import from, nor export to, Great Britain was passed, and an earnest remonstrance was addressed to the English parliament. In vain compulsion became the language; troops were sent against the colonies, and coercive measures were adopted against all the States except North Carolina, New York, and Delaware. This exemption was intended to be the apple of discord, but it failed, for these provinces refused the boon which had been denied to their sister States. Now sounded the cry of preparation, to be reverberated from the engines of war, which opened their destructive fire, April 19, 1775.

The first collision took place at Lexington. The Americans had collected some warlike stores at Concord, which a body of 800 English troops destroyed, and in the exploit being assailed by a small party of militia to the amount of 70, they killed eight of them, and wounded a great many. In their turn they were much annoyed by the natives, and though reinforced by 900 men, under lord Percy, they lost before they reached Boston 273 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The next action was at Bunker's Hill, where 1500 of the American troops, partially protected by entrenchments, for a long time maintained their post against double the number of regular troops, having three times repulsed their attack, and only yielding when destitute of ammunition, with which to return the fire of the British from their field pieces, and the guns of their ships, which raked with great effect their position. Their retreat was effected in good order, with the loss of 453, whilst the British lost above 1000 men, and general Warren. This engagement took place on the 17th June, 1775.

Matters now assumed a warlike aspect; and the following year beheld troops levied in the name of the United Colonies, and general Washington appointed commander-in-chief. The first attempt made by this illustrious patriot was the siege of Boston, which commenced in July. In the following March the British evacuated the place, and embarking aboard their fleet, sailed for Halifax. In the meantime, an expedition undertaken by the Americans in two divisions against Canada, failed with great loss, and their general Montgomery was killed, and general Arnold wounded before Quebec.

On July 4, 1776, the solemn act of declaring the colonies free and independent, with a constituted government of their own, was published, after a suitable address to the king, parliament, and people of Great Britain. Strong measures were now resorted to. The war had become general, and all hopes of bringing it to a speedy issue, consisted in promptitude and large numbers. Accordingly, in August following, 21,000 British troops, under sir William Howe, landed on Long Island, about nine miles from New York, where the American general held his head-quarters with about 17,000 troops. Four days after their arrival the British gained a partial victory; and on the 14th of September, Washington evacuated the island, of which the British took immediate possession—and, Nov. 12, they captured Fort Washington, with its garrison of nearly 3000 men. This was followed by the capture also of Fort Lee, on the Jersey shore. The tide of success seemed to set in for the British. Washington's army was dispirited, and very much diminished by the departure of several of the troops whose term of service had expired. Nothing but the most determined spirit of freedom could have sustained both the Congress and army to persevere in their now almost hopeless contest.

But the spark of liberty once expanded to a blaze is not to be extinguished by reverse—and true patriotism will generally extract even from depression the means of triumph. Accordingly, Washington strove to dispel the gloom which brooded over the horizon of the New State, heavily and drearily, by some brilliant exploits, which, whilst they thinned the ranks of his opponents, shed a lustre upon his name, and infused fresh animation into his troops. His successful attacks upon the British posts at Trenton and Princeton, compelled them to evacuate the principal part of New Jersey.

Nor were their exploits at the conclusion of the year 1776 less injurious to the British, than the skill and address of the American general in the following spring, with a great inferiority of force, were superior to the plans and operations of the British general, who, baffled in his attempt upon Philadelphia by land, changed his system and resolved to attack it from the south. To counteract this attack, Washington pushed forward, but having sustained a defeat with the loss of 1200 men, and finding the attempt vain, he abandoned Philadelphia to its fate. Sept. 26, sir W. Howe entered the city, having stationed the principal part of his army at Germantown, about six miles distant. An attack made upon this post by the Americans failed, and they lost a great number of men.

But their losses in this quarter were more than compensated by their successes in the northern states. After capturing Ticonderoga with a garrison of 3,000 men, and surmounting all obstacles which the enemy could throw in his way, so that he had almost reached the object of his expedition, which was the capture of Albany, (a measure which would have been greatly injurious to the colonies), General Burgoyne was compelled, on the 17th of October, to surrender his whole army prisoners of war at Saratoga. This triumph was not less glorious to the American arms, than useful in rekindling their courage, replenishing their stores, and conciliating to their side the favour of the European powers, especially the French government, from whom they received the assistance of a fleet and an army. Neither did Washington suffer his troops to remain inactive, or the British to be unmolested; for on the retreat of the latter to New York, he attacked and harassed their march, and though he avoided a general engagement, in an action at Monmouth, he came off victorious. The only other exploit in this year, was the unsuccessful attack of the American general Sullivan on Rhode Island.

Although the British carried on the operations with activity in the southern states, the year 1779 does not present us with many striking events. They captured Savannah, but were repulsed in an attack upon Charleston; whilst in the north the American general Wayne, with a small body of troops, carried by assault the strong position of Stony Point.

In the following year, active operations were continued by the British in the southern states; they captured Charleston, and thereby wiped away the disgrace of their defeat in the preceding year; and Carolina was almost entirely overrun by them. General Gates, who was sent against them, sustained a complete defeat by lord Cornwallis at Camden. General Greene, who superseded him, rallied his scattered troops, and by great activity and skill was enabled to stem the torrent of British valour. Treachery now showed itself in the American camp, but happily for the colonies it was rendered abortive by a timely discovery. The name of Arnold is branded with infamy, and the English major André was executed by the Americans as a spy.

Very early in the following year an inferior body of American militia, under general Morgan, defeated some British troops at Cowpens; whilst at Guilford the colonists sustained some loss. Various now was the fortune of war. Greene, after a partial defeat at Camden, gained a decisive advantage at Eutaw Springs. The crisis now approached. Cornwallis having received reinforcements, entrenched himself at York Town, in Virginia, when he was blockaded and besieged by a French army, in conjunction with Washington. After sustaining their combined attacks for nearly three weeks, lord Cornwallis was reduced to the humiliating necessity of surrendering his army prisoners of war, to the amount of 17,000 men.

From this blow the British never recovered. The loss of two armies, by surrender, convinced the English government, at last, that they were lavishing their resources, and wasting their power in a vain contest; and though they made some partial attacks subsequently, the surrender of Cornwallis's army may be considered as the conclusion of this destructive and inglorious war. The independence of the colonies was acknowledged by the British government, by a treaty signed September 23, 1783. We may here remark that the assistance yielded by France contributed to aid the triumph of North American independence, and thereby inflicted a severe blow upon the British possessions and power. But it recoiled with a fearful convulsion upon herself. The lessons of American freedom were wafted across the Atlantic to the plains of Gaul, and fomented that terrible explosion of public principles in France, which demolished the throne and altar, and strewn the wrecks of its explosion over all the countries of Europe. Ending in a despotism, too great for human strength, the unwarrantable aggressions made on Spain and Portugal, applied the match to the mine of slavery, which controlled the energies of the various districts of South America, and led to the emancipation of those states, which now, rising from the ashes of oppression, open to the eye of history, a vista of great events yet hidden beyond the horizon of time. To these states there may be yet seasons of adversity and trial; but where the spirit of freedom is, there is strength—and they who are now feeble in infancy, will hereafter become strong in maturity. Their slow advance to consolidated power is strongly contrasted with that speedy and efficient growth of greatness which marks the remaining history of the North American colonies, and shows the force of the different genius which had pervaded the respective climes—characteristic of the spirit of their mother countries.

Noble and spirited as were the efforts made by the colonies, and glorious as was the termination of the struggle, they soon found that their condition of independence was not in itself the boon of prosperity. During the war, a series of danger, and the necessity of union and unceasing actions, had kept their attention devoted to one object; that object obtained, they found leisure to survey their condition. The sacrifices they had made now began to be felt. A heavy debt had been incurred, and they were a prey to all those evils which war ever bears in its train. Public morals were at a low ebb—public credit crumbled—the acts of the congress “more honoured in the breach than the observance.” The arrival of peace, like the sudden calm after a storm, had nearly wrecked the fortunes of the youthful states.

The real friends of the country now saw the danger, and a remedy was provided, which, happily for them, proved effective. At Annapolis commissioners from five states assembled in 1786, and the result of their deliberation was a proposition to convene delegates, from all the states, in order to consider the best means of revising their union and alliance. The result was the present constitution of THE UNITED STATES. This measure tended greatly to consolidate their power, and reduce their executive to order and authority; and although there arose two parties, and some delay took place before its general adoption, it became effective in the year 1789; and under the patriotic guidance of Washington, as president, and John Adams, vice-president, to use the words of Mr. Canning in reference to our own constitution, it was found “to work well.”

Their wisdom led them, in opposition to great numbers of their countrymen, to remain neutral in the shock which convulsed unhappy France, and caused every state in Europe to reel with a violence which sap the foundations of them all. They had, however, a war of four years with the Indians, which, though attended with loss and defeat at the beginning, terminated successfully under the auspices of general Wayne (A. D. 1794,) who had previously distinguished himself in the capture of Stony Point from the British, in a most gallant manner. Washington after being twice elected president, declined the office a third time, and was succeeded by John Adams. The aggressive and insulting conduct of the French towards the United States at length aroused them to hostilities. An army of regular troops was established, the command of which was given to Washington, who died, universally lamented, Dec. 14, 1799. The Americans now increased their navy; but the war was of short continuance, and confined to one or two actions on the ocean, in which the superiority of the youthful state over the French marine was clearly established.

In the collision of the two parties, in the year 1801, the democratic or republican party succeeded, in opposition to Adams, in raising Jefferson to the office of president, and under him, it must be confessed, prosperity shone upon the republic. Raised now to considerable consequence, the politics of America began to have some influence upon those of Europe; whilst the affairs of the Old World necessarily implicated in some measure the proceedings of the United States. The measures of retaliation and blockade, pursued by the British and French government for some years after the renewal of war in 1803, affected not only the whole of Europe, but also the transatlantic world. After a variety of events, especially relating to commerce, the intercourse of which had been much prevented, war was declared against Great Britain June 18, 1812.

Although in the previous year the Americans with a body of regular troops and some militia had defeated a large assemblage of Indians, their army at the beginning of the war was in a very inefficient state, and their efforts were accordingly attended with signal defeats. General Hall, with an army with which he had invaded Canada, was captured by general Broke, at an easy rate; whilst another army of about 1000 men, under general Van Rensselaer, shared the same fate, but not without a manly struggle.

On the ocean they were more fortunate. In several well-fought engagements between frigates and smaller vessels, the Americans displayed great skill and bravery; whilst, to balance their defeats, the English have to boast of the capture of the Chesapeake by the Shannon, captain Broke, in the most gallant and spirited manner, and of the Argus, sloop of war, by the British ship Pelican. On Lake Erie a British flotilla surrendered, after a long and well-fought action, to an American one of inferior force, under commodore Perry. The military character of the United States recovered its tarnished glory; various and bloody were the struggles between the belligerents on the north-west frontier, and in Canada; and great loss was sustained by both sides, with alternate defeats and victories.

In the meanwhile the Atlantic frontier, which had previously enjoyed tranquillity, became the scene of bloodshed and hostile movements. The British were completely defeated in an attack upon Craney Island; but they took and sacked the small town of Hampton. An expedition fitted out by the republic against Montreal failed, and was attended with very considerable loss to the Americans, at the close of the year 1813. A similar attempt met with a similar fate in the beginning of the following year; but general Brown maintained the high character of the American arms at Fort Erie and Chippewa, both of which he captured from the British; who were also foiled in their attempt to retake the former place. Nor were they unsuccessful only by land. Defeated on lake Erie, their squadron on lake Champlain yielded, after a severe contest, to an inferior force of the Americans; whilst an expedition, under governor Prevost, against Plattsburg was also abortive.

But now liberated from Spain and Portugal, Great Britain sent some of her veteran warriors to display that prowess in the New, which had been so distinguished in the Old World. An attack was made by a body of 4000 or 5000 men upon Washington, which proved successful; but this triumph was counterbalanced by the defeat and death of general Ross at Baltimore, and the failure of a large army of British troops in an attack upon New Orleans. Both parties now seemed weary of a contest, in which there was little to gain from victory but empty renown; and accordingly peace was concluded between them at Ghent, Dec. 24, 1814.

The thunders of the American navy were first heard in the Mediterranean, in the capture of a frigate and sloop of war, by commodore Decatur, from the Algerines; whom the Americans compelled to renounce by treaty, for ever, the practice of holding American prisoners in slavery. This was in the year 1815; and four years afterwards a treaty was concluded with Spain for the cession of Florida to the United States, which did not actually take place till the year 1821, when the American troops took possession of the territory. In the following year an almost unanimous vote of the congress acknowledged the independence of the Spanish provinces in South America.

The two most important events that have since occurred in the history of the United States are, the annexation of Texas, which took place in 1844, and the war with Mexico, which broke out in 1846, and ended in the acquisition of California, which has opened a career of prosperity to the republic whose limits can be neither foreseen nor described. We shall conclude this sketch with a brief account of this new State, and the causes of its unexampled progress. By the treaty of 1848, California was formally ceded to the United States; and in the month of May of the same year, an unexpected career suddenly opened for this new state of the Union by the chance discovery of grains of gold on the bank of the Sacramento, a short distance from the Bay of San Francisco. This prompted a more careful and extensive exploration, and the result was the revelation of an auriferous region of vast extent and extraordinary productiveness. According to the report of Mr. King, the American commissioner sent to inquire into the capabilities of the gold districts, they were found to comprehend an area 500 miles long, by 40 to 50 in breadth. The news of the discovery and richness of the deposits spread rapidly, and before the end of the first season of 1848 the enterprising adventurers had been rewarded by the acquisition of gold of the value of 1,000,000. In 1849 immigrants had flocked to the Sacramento and its affluents from all quarters, Europe, America, Mexico, China, Chili, and Australia. San Francisco, which, in the early part of 1848, consisted of a few rude cabins, at the end of the ensuing year had an exchange, a theatre, churches, several gaming houses, and numerous durable dwellings, some of stone, but mostly of sun-dried bricks, with a countless outlying throng of tents and booths.

The miracles wrought by the transforming power of gold were moral as well as physical. On the first influx of immigrants there were few inhabitants, and no government or police in the country; and the new settlers were unacquainted with the previously existing Spanish laws for the security of persons and property. From the difficulty of deciding whether slavery should or not form a constituent of the new society, the Congress of the United States was unable to decide on the admission of California into the Union, either as a state or a territory. This dilemma, however, was promptly mastered under the judicious guidance of the American portion of the population. In June, 1849, representatives were chosen in all parts to meet for the purpose of framing a constitution. They speedily completed their purpose, and to their credit unanimously resolved that the non-existence of slavery should be a fundamental article of the constitution. As a consequence the chief obstacle was obviated to incorporation into the Union. The American government had indeed already sent a military governor to the province, and who, with the temporary tolerance of Lynch law, from necessity in the absence of regular tribunals, succeeded in maintaining a certain degree of order among the many unruly and desperate characters that had crowded to the diggings. Under these extraordinary circumstances the population of California has suddenly swelled from a few thousands to nearly half a million. Of the addition made to the amount of the precious metals from this source no very consistent estimate has appeared; but from the application of greater experience, capital, science, and mechanical power, there is no reason to infer that up to 1852 the ratio of production had declined. The quantity of gold transmitted to the United States and Europe from the commencement of the diggings to the middle of 1852, appears to have amounted to upwards of 30,000,000.

At the commencement of this article we gave the names of the original thirteen states, with the dates of their colonization, &c. MEXICO.

THIS rich and interesting country may be regarded as altogether a Spanish colony, though it is no longer dependent on Spain, having become a federal republic. Discovered by Fernando Cortez, A.D. 1519, it was by him taken possession of in the name of the Spanish government. The exploits by which he made himself master of this country, seem rather to belong to romance than history; but the circumstances of the age, and the nature and character of the opposing powers, throw an air of universal interest over operations so multifarious and diversified, as the conquest of a great and powerful state by a body of men hitherto unseen by them, possessing all the advantages of skill and experience in war, and resolution and enterprise in action.

The first conquest made by Cortez was on the river Tabasco; after which, landing at St. Juan de Ulloa, he erected a fort, where he received two ambassadors sent by the emperor of Mexico with offers of assistance. A haughty answer was the reply of Cortez; and gifts of the most costly character were heaped upon him by the natives, in the hope of conciliating peace and preventing his further advance. Dangers, however, encompassed his steps. Sedition broke out in his camp, which he had the address not only to quell, but turn to his own advantage. A new town was founded, called La Villa Rica de la Vera Cruz. Still a more alarming mutiny showed itself, which he again converted into the means of executing a measure fraught with imminent risk, but calculated to superinduce the deadly courage of despair. This measure was the destruction of the fleet. Soon after this, being joined by one of the native caciques, with a force of little more than 1000 men, fifteen horses, and six cannons, he entered the state of the Tlascallans, whom, after a desperate resistance of four teen days, he subdued, and converted into allies. At Cholula he massacred 6000 of the natives in revenge for their treachery. Success now wafted his banners, and the capital of the empire lay before him. Received by the emperor Montezuma at the head of his nobles, Cortez was conducted to a house in the city, which he instantly fortified in the strongest manner possible. It appears there was a prediction amongst the Mexicans, that a strange people should come to chastise them for their sins—a piece of superstition of which Cortez availed himself. By treachery he obtained possession of the person of Montezuma, whom he kept a prisoner for six months. Worn out at length, the Mexican emperor acknowledged himself a vassal of the Spanish throne. In the meanwhile Cortez lost no opportunity of strengthening his power, by surveys of the country, and dividing the spoils amongst his followers.

He was again on the point of losing the fruit of his exertions, for Velasquez, who commanded the expedition from which Cortez had been dispatched from Cuba, hearing of his success, sent out a large force under Narvaez, to seize him, and take possession of Mexico. This formidable danger Cortez frustrated, as well by bribes as the rapidity of his movements, almost without bloodshed. But this he observed gave fresh spirit to the Mexicans, who attacked him on his return, and wounded him in his fortress. The wretched Montezuma, who had been placed in the way to deter the assailants from prosecuting their attacks, was wounded, and died of a broken heart. Cortez was compelled to evacuate the place secretly, but only to return with a larger body of forces at the expiration of six months. We shortly afterwards find his head-quarters at Tezcuco, where, with the assistance of the Indians, he built a flotilla of 13 ships. Reinforced with 200 men, eight horses and some military stores, he renewed the siege. Gallantly was the capital defended by Guatimozin, the new emperor, and Cortez was once taken prisoner, but rescued at the expense of a severe wound. Seventy-four days did the city hold out, although the ranks of Cortez were augmented by 100,000 Indians. August 12, 1512, beheld Guatimozin a prisoner, and his capital in the hands of the merciless invaders—merciless to him they were, for Cortez stained the lustre of his glory by putting the brave but ill-fated monarch to the torture. But there is even in this world a retributive justice; and worldly minds, however sublimed by courage and enterprise, generally encounter reverses similar in character to their own conduct. Success had excited envy; and Cortez was doomed to find that no courage and enterprise can be altogether free from reverses. Created captain-general of New Spain, (the name which he had given to his conquest) even after an order had been issued, but not executed, for his arrest—established in high favour and honour with the emperor, his native master,—endowed with a grant of large possessions in the New World,—he had the mortification to find himself possessing only military command. The political government was vested in a royal ordinance. His enterprising spirit led him to the discovery of the great Californian gulf, but his glory was on the wane: irritated and disappointed, he returned to Europe to appeal against the proceedings of the royal ordinance, but without redress; and he who had barbarously tortured the gallant emperor of Mexico, died 26 years afterwards of a broken heart, A.D. 1547, in the 62nd year of his age.

Abstracting the interest which attended the discovery and first conquest of Mexico or New Spain, the historian finds a tame succession of events, which claim but a very vague notice. From the year 1535 to 1808, there was a succession of fifty viceroys, none alone an American by birth. At the latter period, a spirit broke forth, elicited by centuries of oppression and exclusive favour to Europeans, which led the Mexicans to offer resistance to the disunion of Spain. The disunionists were headed by Hidalgo, an enthusiastic patriot, who was proclaimed generalissimo Sept. 17, 1810. He unfortunately halted in his advance towards the capital, which gave the royalists time to rally; and a few months afterwards, he was put to death. But with him the spirit of independence vanished not. Morelos, another priest, assumed the command, and several provinces were completely ensured to the side of liberty. A congress of forty members was called, but after the defeat and execution of Morelos, it was dissolved by General Teran, who succeeded him. After languishing for some time, the revolt was entirely quelled in 1819.

The change of system introduced into Spain by the cortes alarmed the ecclesiastics in Mexico, who, for their defence, elected Iturbide, under whom a bloodless revolution was effected, and Mexico maintained in all its rights, independent of the Spanish dominion, A.D. 1822. After an usurpation of the title of emperor for little more than one year, Iturbide was compelled to lay down his usurpation, and he retired to Leghorn.

A federal government was now formed, and sworn to, Feb. 24, 1826. Still commotions arose, in one of which Iturbide, who had been induced to return, lost his life. It would be of no use to enter into any details respecting the subsequent history of Mexico. In 1836, it lost Texas (now incorporated with the United States), after a sanguinary engagement at San Jacinto; and in 1848, it was compelled to surrender its province of New California and New Mexico to the United States, after a war of two years' duration. But Mexico is still one of the noblest territories in the world, and so vast that, before the losses above alluded to, its extent was more than five times that of the Spanish Peninsula. To this day it comprises immense provinces abounding in mineral and vegetable wealth, rich in historical traditions, and possessing advantages from geographical situation which are second to none. But Mexico, at the present moment, exists in little but a name. It cannot construct, organise, or maintain any constitution or government. It cannot discharge any of the functions of a state, or provide for any political necessities, domestic or foreign. Its substantial anarchy is only mitigated by the sparseness and indolence of its population. It has no frontiers except on the map; the very Indians invade it at all points with impunity, and an enemy more formidable than the Indians is waiting for the inevitable consummation which it would be wholly superfluous to precipitate.

CANADA.

THIS is the most important province possessed by Great Britain in North America. Its history is closely interwoven with that of the United States, with the people of which it has been, both under its original and present masters, in almost constant collision. Founded by the French in 1608, the colonists were for many years in danger of being overwhelmed by the native Indians, with whom at length they entered into treaties, which enabled them to annoy very materially the neighbouring states under the British jurisdiction. Twenty years after the founding of Quebec, the right of trading with Canada was granted exclusively to a company of French merchants, who, in the following years, were dispossessed of Quebec by Sir David Keith. This conquest remained in the hands of the British till it was ceded at the treaty of St. Germain.

THE POPULATION OF PERU CONSISTS OF NATIVE INDIANS, SPANIARDS, NEGROES, AND THE MIXED RACES ORIGINATING FROM THEM.

In 1603 the West India Company obtained the exclusive right of commerce for forty years, and Canada for thirty years enjoyed tranquillity, and its concomitant prosperity; which were interrupted by a bold but unsuccessful expedition of the people of New England, consisting of 1,200 or 1,300 men under the command of Sir William Phillips. This attempt was repeated about seventeen years afterwards (1711) on a larger scale, but shared the same result, although 4000 veteran British troops were employed.

Little occurs in the affairs of Canada deserving notice, till the breaking out of the continental war in 1756, when Canada became the theatre of military scenes, which ended, three years afterwards, in the conquest of it by the British. The English General Wolfe, though defeated in his first operations by the French, at length, after an action sustained by equal gallantry on both sides, obtained possession of Quebec. In this exploit the opposing generals, Montcalm and Wolfe, are equally renowned for spirit and courage; one did not survive the mortification of defeat—the other only lived to hear the shouts of victory. This conquest was ratified to the English by the treaty of 1763. Since that period it long enjoyed comparative peace: for with the exception of one unsuccessful expedition sent against it during the revolutionary war, under General Montgomery, who was killed, Canada was exempt from military operations till the last American war, when it became the theatre of several bloody frays, but resisted, by means of the British troops, the reiterated attacks of the Americans. Canada has been long rising in importance. The facility of commerce has been of late infinitely increased, and it may be hoped that this colony will long be a valuable acquisition to the British crown.

We make no mention in this place of the internal insurrections and piratical invasions of Canada in the years 1838 and 1839, but refer the reader to the "History of England," p. 493, et seq.

The other British Possessions in North America are NEWFOUNDLAND, NEW BRUNSWICK, NOVA SCOTIA, CAPE BRETON, and PRINCE EDWARD'S ISLAND; but the want of space prevents us from entering on the history of any of these.

PERU.

The Peruvians have strange traditions that their progenitors were instructed in the arts of government and society by a man and woman, named Manco Capac and Mama Oello, from an island in a lake south of Peru. Under their instructions their kingdom was established, the royal family instituted, and success and power heaped upon them. This was about the 13th century; and previous to the arrival of the Spaniards in 1521, there had been fourteen successive monarchs or Incas. On the arrival of the Europeans, Huana Capac was the reigning Inca, who was taken prisoner and put to death by Pizarro, the discoverer of the country, although he had paid as much gold for his ransom as filled the place of his confinement. Pizarro likewise defeated his successor, and was created marquis of Attilibet, with large possessions in his conquest. His associate, Almagro, was also amply rewarded.

The city of Lima was founded by Pizarro in 1535, but the Peruvians again took up arms under their Inca, Manco Capac, and obtained some successes. A division took place between Pizarro and Almagro, the latter of whom having sustained a defeat, was taken prisoner and beheaded by his conqueror; who two years afterwards was assassinated by one of Almagro's party.

Various insurrections ensued with various successes, in which were conspicuous Vasco de Castro, Blasco Vela, Gonzalez Pizarro, and Pedro de la Gasca, a priest. The royal authority of the Spaniards was at length established by the surrender and execution of the last Inca, Tupac Amaru, by Toledo the viceroy, at Cuzco, A. D. 1562. Peru remained in a state of uninterrupted vassalage to the Spanish crown, till the year 1782, when a descendant of the last Inca, on being refused a title which had been granted his ancestor, Sayu Tupac, reared the standard of independence, round which the natives rallied with spirit, and in great numbers. For two years the war continued with alternate success. At last Jose Gabriel Condoreanqui was defeated, and with the rest of his family, excepting his brother Diego, put to death. The surviving brother shortly afterwards shared the same fate, on suspicion of being engaged in a revolt at Quito.

Peru escaped for awhile the rising spirit of insubordination, which convulsed the other colonies; but in 1809 commotions ensued, and juntas were established in the cities of Quito and La Paz, but were suppressed. In 1813 the independents of Chili were subjugated, but their efforts were triumphant in 1817, under General San Martin, and Chili was not only evanished by the Peruvian army, but sent an army to retaliate upon Peru. Lima capitulated on July 6, 1821, and San Martin held levees in the vice-regal palace. The independence of Peru was solemnly proclaimed on the 28th of the same month, and San Martin was proclaimed protector. This office he laid down, after calling together a constituent and sovereign congress, on the 20th of September, 1822.

Disinterested as was this abdication, it was not followed by prosperity to the country. The inadequacy of the junta appointed by the congress soon became manifest: the patriots were defeated early in 1823; the congress now dissolved, anarchy predominated, and Lima surrendered to the Spanish troops in July of the same year. They were partially dispossessed by Bolivar and the Chilians shortly afterwards; and Peru, though safe from Spanish subjugation, has ever since been like a vessel tossed by every casual wave, and exposed to conflicting dangers.

CHILI.

This country was subjugated in 1450, by the Peruvians, who retained possession of it till they were driven out by the Spaniards under Almagro, in 1535. The Spaniards were driven out by a general rising of the natives three years afterwards. Pizarro attempted to colonize the country in 1540, and though opposed by the natives of Copiapo, he succeeded in conquering several provinces, and founded the city of Santiago, February, 1541. In attempting to extend his conquest he exposed his settlement for six years to the strong and repeated attacks of the Mapoehians, in whose district Santiago was. His lieutenant, Pedro de Valdivia, to whom this extension was entrusted, made the Promancians his allies, and, surmounting various attacks and oppositions from the natives, founded the cities of Concepcion, Imperial, and Valdivia. He was shortly afterwards defeated by his old enemies the Araucanians, who took him prisoner, and he was at length despatched by an old chief with the blow of a club.

These Araucanians kept the new colonies for several years in a continual state of alarm and distress; and so far succeeded in avenging their former defeats, as in 1598 to capture Vallanca, Valdivia, Imperial, and other towns, and form the cities of Concepcion and Chillar. Nor were these the only losses sustained by the Spaniards. The Dutch plundered Chiloe, and massacred the garrison. The feuds between the Araucanians and Spaniards were settled by a treaty of peace in 1641, which lasted for fourteen years; then came a war of ten years, and another peace. In 1722 a conspiracy for the extirpation of the whites was happily frustrated. The colonists were gathered into towns, the country divided into provinces, and several new cities founded by the governor Don Josef Manto, 1742. A similar attempt by Don Antonio Gonzago, in respect of the Araucanians, re-lighted the torch of war, which blazed three years, when harmony was restored. Nor does anything of particular moment occur in the history of Chili, till 1809; then a successful revolutionary movement took place, and for four or five years fortune favoured the cause of independence; but in 1814 a royalist army from Peru nearly extinguished the flame of liberty. Success (in 1817) returned with general San Martin, who brought them freedom. D. Bernardo O'Higgins was made director of the junta; and a fatal blow was struck at the power of the royalists on the 5th of April, 1818, when a large tract of coast was declared in a state of liberty by the Chilian navy under lord Cockburn. In 1820, as stated in the history of Peru, the Chilian army under San Martin, liberated Peru from the Spanish thralldom, and San Martin retired into the ranks of private life in Chili. His example was followed by O'Higgins, who resigned the dictatorship Jan. 28, 1823, and was succeeded by general Freire, the commander-in-chief. The royalist flag, which was hoisted in September, near the city of Concepcion, was pulled down, after a short period, and a free constitution appointed, with a popular government.

BRAZIL.

THE honour of discovering this country is contested between Martin Behem, and Pedro Alvarez Cabral, at the close of the 15th century. It was originally called Santa Cruz by Cabral, but afterwards Brazil, from the name of a wood produced there. It was first colonized by some refugee Jews, in 1543, banished from Portugal, and was fostered by the able guidance of governor de Souza, and the blandishments of the Jesuits. In 1624, San Salvador was taken possession of by the Dutch, who were in turn defeated by an armament of Spaniards under Frederic de Toledo.

The Dutch, in 1630, succeeded in making themselves masters of Temerara, Paraba, and Rio Grande. Maurice of Nassau added Seana, Sergipipee, and the greater part of Bahia; and the whole of Brazil was on the point of yielding to their arms, when the revolution which drove Philip IV. from the Portuguese throne, afforded an opportunity to both the Dutch and Portuguese to expel the Spaniards from Brazil. By an agreement between them, the country received a plural title, being called Brazil from the circumstance that both the Dutch and Portuguese possessed almost an equal share of it. By conquest and treaty the whole at length fell to Portugal.

In 1806 the royal family of Portugal, driven from Europe by the invasion of the French, migrated to Brazil, which from that period has risen rapidly in importance, independence, and strength. In 1817, a revolution broke out in Pernambuco, which failed. A free constitution was passed, and the king returned to Lisbon. Subsequently the prince-regent, on his birth-day, Oct. 12, 1822, was proclaimed constitutional emperor of Brazil, independent of the Portuguese throne—a measure which has since been formally recognized by the government of the parent country.

From its central position in reference to the commercial countries of the globe, and its extensive line of coast, Brazil is most favourably situated for trade. But its slow progress in this and other respects may be chiefly ascribed to the narrow policy of the parent state, Portugal, which left to her colonies little save examples of pride, indolence, and superstition. The emigration of free settlers was discouraged, mercantile intercourse with foreigners was interdicted, and no instrumentality existed for the diffusion of general intelligence. Prior to 1808, not a printing press existed in Brazil. But lately the country has been more alive to its true interests, and intelligence has rapidly spread. By its righteous and liberal treatment, too, of the coloured races it has neutralized the worst element of political evil, and the sincerity which it is now evincing in the abolition of the slave trade is evidence both of sound policy and administrative power.

THE REPUBLIC OF LA PLATA, OR UNITED PROVINCES.

THE title of the United Provinces is of modern date, as the following brief outline of the history of this part of the New World will exhibit. Juan Diaz de Solis, a Spaniard, is said to have been the first adventurer who explored the country, and took possession of it, A.D. 1513. Sebastian Cabot, in 1526, in the La Plata, discovered the island St. Gabriel, the river St. Salvador, and the Paraguay.

Buenos Ayres was founded in 1535, by Don Pedro de Mendoza. This did not flourish much, on account of the restricted state of commerce, which was, however, gradually relaxed, and in 1748 the annual fleet made its last voyage. A free trade with several American ports began in 1774, and an extension to the Spanish ports was granted in 1778. Under a viceroy trade augmented, and commercial prosperity ensued. Buenos Ayres was captured in 1806 by General Beresford, with a British army, which was in turn compelled to surrender a few weeks afterwards to General Liniers, a French officer, at the head of a body of militia. Sir Home Popham, with 5000 men, having captured Fort Maldonado, attacked Monte Video, without success; but, reinforced by Sir Samuel Auchmuty, at length carried the town by storm. The operations were extended under General Whitelocke and General Crawford, who with 12,000 men renewed the attack upon Buenos Ayres, but were defeated and captured by the native militia. Liniers, who had contributed so largely to this defeat, was raised by the people to the vice-royalty.

The United Provinces escaped not the swell of that storm which the French invasion stirred up in Spain. After various intrigues and plots, Ferdinand VII. was at length proclaimed in Buenos Ayres by the address of Don Josef de Goyeneche. A rising of the people (August, 1809) was suppressed by Liniers, who was shortly after deposed and sent into exile. Rapid were the convulsions which now shook this unhappy country; till, on May 20, 1810, the people rose, expelled the viceroy, and appointed a provisional junta of nine persons. This is the era of their independence.

But petty dissensions and intrigues, incident to the efforts of rising independence, interrupted the progress of success necessary for the consolidation of a new state. D. Jose de San Martin cut a distinguished figure in this part of the history, having twice defeated the independents at Entre Rios, in 1811; but his efforts failed, and the independence of the provinces of Rio de la Plata was shortly after sealed. Artigas, driven by the Portuguese across the Paraguay, was apprehended by the dictator Francia, and in 1819 Pueyrredon the dictator fled to Monte Video, and thus dissolved the confused mass of the union of conflicting and discordant provinces. After a variety of events and political changes, D. Martin Rodriguez was established governor, Oct. 6, 1820; and in the following year the independence of Buenos Ayres was recognised by the Portuguese government. Subsequent to the establishment of its independence, it has been subject to many political vicissitudes, of which the most remarkable has been the dictatorship of the Spaniard Rosas. This adventurer evinced some abilities in the management of an unsettled population, and his government, though tyrannical, was better probably than the incessant revolutions and anarchy that had previously existed in most of the South American states on the Plate. But his rule was not only oppressive and capricious over the Buenos Ayreans, it was also exercised most despotically for the ruin of Monte Video, and to the annoyance and injury of adjacent communities. In consequence a formidable coalition was cemented for his overthrow, consisting of Brazil, the Banda Oriental, Entrerios, Corrientes, and Santa Fe. The united forces of these states, under General Urquiza, having met the army of the Dictator, Feb. 3, 1852, on the plain of Santa Lugares, a few miles from the capital, a sharp battle followed, in which Rosas was entirely defeated, the usurper himself being compelled to take refuge on board an English vessel, in which he soon afterwards sailed for England.

COLOMBIA.

This is a new state, formed at the close of the year 1819 from the states of Granada, and Venezuela or Caracas. It will, therefore, be necessary to detail the distinct history of these two original states.

Granada, or as it is called, New Granada, was discovered by Columbus in his fourth voyage, and taken possession of for the Spanish government. But the first regular colonists were Ojeda, and Nicéssa, in 1508; the former founded the district called New Andalusia, but with no great success; the latter, Golden Castle, and he also perished. These two districts were united (1514) in one, called Terra Firma, under Avila, who successfully extended the discoveries, and founded the town of Panama. Other additions were subsequently made, and the kingdom of New Granada was established under a captain-general, in 1547. As it had been established, so did it continue for more than 150 years, when in 1718 it became a vice-royalty, which form of government lasted but for six years, when it was supplanted by the original one, which was again superseded in 1740 by the incubus of the vice-royalty. Thus did it continue till the weakness of the mother country from the invasion of the French, afforded an opportunity to raise the standard of independence. Many and various have been the events attendant upon the struggle for mastery; but a severe blow was inflicted by their old masters in 1810, who, under Morillo, defeated the colonists with tremendous loss. Three years of renewed subjection followed, when the success of Bolivar, and the union of Granada with Venezuela caused a brighter star to arise.

VENEZUELA.—This district was discovered somewhat earlier than Granada, by Columbus, in 1498. After several fruitless attempts to colonize it, the Spanish government disposed of the partially subdued natives to the Welters, a German company of merchants. Their mismanagement led to a change in 1650, when Venezuela, like Granada three years before, became a supreme government under a captain-general. From that period to 1806 Venezuela was a torpid vassal under the Spanish crown, when a futile attempt for independence was made under general Miranda, a native. Simultaneous with Granada, Venezuela rallied for liberty when the mother country was prostrate before the ascendancy of France in 1810. In the following year a formal proclamation of independence was made July 6, and success seemed to attend the cause. Then came the dreadful earthquake. Superstition re-nerved the arm of freedom, and the royalist general, Monteverde, discomfited Miranda, and again overran the province. In 1813 Bolivar called independence again into action, and success attended him for three years, when another defeat was sustained, which was followed by another in the following year, and then by a victory. Reverses again recurring, compelled the congress to appoint Bolivar dictator; and in 1819 the union of Venezuela with Granada was effected under the name of Colombia.

Colombia may therefore date its history as a nation from this union which was agreed upon Dec. 17, 1819; and the installation of the united congress took place May 6, 1821; which was followed on June 24, by a victory obtained by the president Bolivar over the Spaniards, at the celebrated battle of Carabobo, in which the royalist army lost above 6000 men, besides their artillery and baggage.

BOLIVIA.

THE history of this recently formed state, known before as URUQU PAHU, partakes of the nature of an episode in the life of the illustrious Bolivar, in whose honour its present name was given, and to whose wise councils it is so much indebted. Previously to the battle of Ayacucho, in 1824, it formed a part of the Spanish viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres; but general Sucre, at the head of the republicans, having then defeated a royalist troop, the independence of the country was effected; and in the following year, at the request of the people, Bolivar drew up a constitution for its government.

On referring to our "Biographical Treasury" the reader will find in the life of Bolivar the following passage, which is so applicable to our present purpose, that, in this limited space, we cannot perhaps do better than to transcribe it. "His renown was now at its height, and every act of his government showed how zealously alive he was to the improvement of the national institutions and the moral elevation of the people over whom he ruled. In 1823 he went to the assistance of the Peruvians, and having succeeded in settling their internal divisions, and establishing their independence, he was proclaimed liberator of Peru, and invested with supreme authority. In 1825 he visited Upper Peru, which detached itself from the government of Buenos Ayres, and was formed into a new republic, named Bolivia, in honour of the liberator; but domestic factions sprung up, the purity of his motives were called in question, and he was charged with aiming at a perpetual dictatorship; he accordingly declared his determination to resign his power as soon as his numerous enemies were overcome, and to repel the imputations of ambition cast upon him, by retiring to seclusion upon his patrimonial estates. The vice-president, Santander, urged him, in reply, to resume his station as constitutional president; and though he was beset by the jealousy and distrust of rival factions, he continued to exercise the chief authority in Colombia till May, 1830, when, dissatisfied with the aspect of internal affairs, he resigned the presidency, and expressed his determination to leave the country. The people ere long became sensible of their injustice to his merit, and were soliciting him to resume the government, when his death, which happened in December, 1830, prevented the accomplishment of their wishes." The government of Bolivia is in the hands of a president, to which office general San. Cruz was elected in 1829.

GUIANA.

GUIANA is an extensive region of South America, lying between the Amazon and Orinoco rivers, and subdivided into British, Dutch, and French Guiana. The British possessions comprise the several districts of Berbice, Essequibo, Demerara, and Surinam. It is asserted by some that Columbus saw this coast in 1498, and by others that it was discovered by Vasco Nunez in 1504. It became, however, known to Europe in 1595, when Raleigh sailed up to Orinoco in his chimerical search of El Dorado, a city supposed to be paved with gold. The coast of Guiana then became the resort of Buccaneers; and in 1634 a mixed company of these freebooters, English and French, formed the settlement of Surinam for the cultivation of tobacco. They were, after twenty years of great hardship and difficulty, taken under the protection of the British, who appointed lord Willoughby of Parham governor, 1662. The Dutch captured the settlement in 1667, and the possession of it was confirmed by the treaty of Westminster, England receiving the colony of New York in exchange. In 1783, the Dutch settlements on the Essequibo, which had been captured by the British in the American war, were restored to the states-general. In 1796, both Berbice and Demerara fell to the English, as also Surinam, in 1799; but again reverted to Holland, at the peace of Amiens, in 1802; fell to the English arms in 1815, and were confirmed by the treaty of Paris, 1814, to Great Britain.

AMAZONIA.

A country of South America, so called from a martial and powerful state, in which a body of women, with arms in their hands, opposed Francis Orellana, in his passage down the river Maragnon. It was first discovered by him, A. D. 1541; when, with fifty soldiers, he was wafted in a vessel down the stream of a smaller river into the channel of the Maragnon, which he also called Amazon.

The origin of the name Amazon is folded in some mystery. It is applied exclusively to females of strong and martial habits, and was first used in reference to a race of them who, whether actually or fabulously is a matter of dispute, founded an empire in Asia Minor, upon the river Thermodoon, along the coast of the Black Sea, as far as the Caspian. But whether the account of them is fabulous or true, they are mentioned by the most ancient Greek writers, as well as by others of a late date; and various are the accounts given both of their origin and history.

THE WEST INDIA ISLANDS.

(SOMETIMES CALLED THE ARCHIPELAGO OF THE WEST.)

THE West Indies consist of a number of islands in the central part of America, extending from the tropic of Cancer southward, to the coast of Terra Firma and Mexico; the principal of which are Cuba, Hayti or St. Domingo, Jamaica, Porto Rico, Trinidad, St. Christopher, (commonly called St. Kitt's,) Antigua, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Barbadoes, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Grenada, and Tobago; for the most part discovered by Columbus near the close of the 15th century.

The islands are in possession of various powers, whom we shall notice as we proceed in the description, beginning with CUBA.

CUBA, the largest and most westerly island in the West Indies, was discovered by Columbus in 1492; and was first called Juana, in honour of prince John, son of Ferdinand and Isabella; afterwards, Ferdinandina; then Santiago and Ave Maria, in deference to the patron saint of Spain and the Virgin. The name of Cuba is that which it was called by the natives at the time of its discovery. It is about 800 miles in length, and about 125 in breadth. The Spaniards made no settlement upon it till 1511, when Diego de Velasquez arrived with four ships, and landed on the eastern point.

This district was under the government of a cacique, named Hatney, a native of St. Domingo, who had retired hither to avoid the slavery to which his countrymen were condemned. Those who could escape the tyranny of the Spaniards had followed him in his retreat.

The Spaniards soon overcame the Indians. Hatney was taken in the woods, and condemned to be burned. When he was fastened to the stake, and waited only for the kindling of the fire, a priest advanced towards him, and proposed the ceremony of baptism as a means of entering the Christian paradise. "Are there," said the cacique, "any Spaniards in that happy place?" "Fee," replied the priest. "I will not," returned Hatney, "go to a place where I should be in danger of meeting one of them. Talk to me no more of your religion, but leave me to die."

There are some traces of cultivation at St. Jago, and at Matanza; the fine plantations are all confined to the beautiful plains of the Havana.

The Havana, the capital of Cuba, is a fine city, and the harbour one of the safest in the world. The English took it in the year 1762, and it was restored at the peace of 1763. Of late years many Americans have settled in the island, some for health, but most as merchants and planters, and form a most active and enterprising portion of the inhabitants. In the course of 1850 and 1851 two attempts were made to revolutionise the government by marauding expeditions from the United States. But both of them signally failed, and in the last their leader Lopez, and many of his followers, were captured, and executed as pirates.

of 400 miles in length, from east to west, and averages more than 100 in breadth. Having taken possession of it in the name of Spain, Columbus founded the town of La Isabella on the north coast, and established in it, under his brother Diego, the first settlement of the Spaniards in the New World. It was in high estimation for the quantity of gold it supplied; but this wealth diminished with the inhabitants of the country, whom they compelled to perpetual labour in the mines; and it was entirely lost when those wretched victims were no more. The cruelties of the Spaniards almost exceed belief. It is computed, that considerably more than a million of natives (the number at the time of its discovery) perished in the space of five years, by the hands or through the means of the conquerors.

The gold mines have failed for want of hands to dig them. The Spaniards thought of procuring slaves from Africa, to re-open them, and numbers were imported; but the mines on the continent having been begun to be worked with good effect, those of St. Domingo were no longer of importance. The settlers then turned their thoughts to agriculture, which was cultivated with success. Sugar, tobacco, cocon, cassia, ginger and cotton, were among their productions at the close of the sixteenth century.

The immense fortunes raised in Mexico, and other parts, induced the inhabitants of St. Domingo to despise their settlements; and they quitted the island in numbers, in search of those regions of wealth. This conduct ruined St. Domingo. It had no intercourse with the mother country, but by a single ship, of no great burden, received from thence every third year; and the whole colony, in 1717, consisted of only 18,410, including Spaniards, Mestees, Mulattoes and Negroes.

The Spaniards retained possession of the whole island till 1665, when the French obtained a footing on its western coast, and laid the foundation of that colony, which afterwards became so flourishing. The French settlers increased very fast; and sugar-works were erected in great numbers. Coffee, cotton, ginger, and other products, were put into cultivation: the planters became rich, and the negroes numerous, until the fatal measure of giving liberty to the slaves was adopted, without preparatory means, by the French national convention.

At that period the negroes in the French part of St. Domingo were estimated at about 500,000; and while the revolutionary terrorists in France were hourly exhibiting scenes of brutal barbarity, and recommending their actions as worthy of imitation by all other nations, the inhabitants of St. Domingo were precisely in that unsettled situation which seemed to favour the commission of similar atrocities, under the pretext of avenging past injuries and redressing present grievances. The laws of St. Domingo were, indeed, according to the account given by Mr. Bryan Edwards in his "Historical Survey," dreadfully unequal; mulattoes were in a situation more degrading and wretched than that of the enslaved negroes in any part of the West Indies. No law allowed the privileges of a white person to any descendant of an African, however remote. In such a situation it is not to be wondered at, that they should have listened with pleasure to the news of the French revolution, and to the acts of the assembly, which abolished slavery, and established equality of rights. The island was in a political flame. The pride of power, the rage of reformation, the contentions of party, and the conflict of opposing interests, now produced a tempest that swept everything before it. In October, 1790, James Oge, a free mulatto, who had been at Paris, and who is described as an enthusiast for liberty, but mild and humane, returned from France, and put himself at the head of the insurgent negroes and people of colour; but being defeated, in March, 1791, was betrayed by the Spaniards, to whom he had fled for refuge, and, with Mark Chavane his lieutenant, broke alive on the wheel.

At this time, 8000 troops arrived from France; and Maudit, the new governor, was murdered by his own soldiers, with circumstances of horrible barbarity. By a decree of the national assembly, of the 15th of May, 1791, people of colour were declared eligible to seats in the colonial assembly. And on the 11th of September, a concordat, or truce, was signed between the whites and mulattoes. But the operation of this truce was destroyed by an absurd decree of the national assembly, repealing the decree of the 15th of May. Open war in all its horrors was now renewed. It was no longer a contest for victory, but a diabolical emulation to outvie each other in barbarous atrocities. On the 23rd of August, 1791, Cape Francois was burnt; and it was computed that in the space of ten months, upwards of 2000 white persons perished by these horrible massacres, while not fewer than 10,000 of the mulattoes and negroes died by famine and the sword, besides numbers that suffered by the executioner. Meantime three commissioners arrived from France, accompanied by 6000 of the national guards; and citizen Galband was appointed governor. Their attempts, however, to stop these enormities proved fruitless, though they proclaimed the total abolition of slavery, and a general indemnity.

In October, 1793, a body of British forces under colonel Whitelock, landed, and took possession of Tiburon, Treves, Jérémie, Leogane, Cape Nicholas Mole, and upwards of ninety miles of the eastern coast, with little opposition. It was, however, a disastrous acquisition to the English, for in less than six months after their arrival, not less than 6000, of whom 150 were officers, fell victims to disease. Leogane was soon after retaken by the negroes, who now amounted to above 100,000, under their general Touissant L'Ouverture; and Tiburon was taken by the French under general Rigaud. To remedy these disasters, another expedition was undertaken by the British, but was attended with vast expense and the loss of many brave troops. Colonels Brisbane and Markham were killed; and at length, in 1798, the British having surrendered Port au Prince and Cape Nicholas Mole to general Hédouville, the island was totally abandoned by them. At this time the name of Port au Prince was changed to Port Republicain; and the Spanish part of the island was taken possession of by L'Ouverture; a man of superior talents and character, whose unremitting exertions were directed to the laudable object of healing the wounds and improving the condition of every class in the island. The beneficial effects of such an administration were soon visible. The wasted colony began to revive; the plantations were again brought into a fertile state; the ports were opened to foreign vessels; and, notwithstanding the ravages of a ten year's war, the commerce of St. Domingo was rapidly recovering; while the population also increased with astonishing rapidity.

In 1798, when the British forces evacuated the island, the military establishment of St. Domingo did not exceed 40,000; but in two years it was more than double that number. Touissant was regarded as an extraordinary being by his soldiers, and no European army was ever subject to a more rigorous discipline. Every officer commanded, pistol in hand; and had the power of life and death over the subalterns. Sixty thousand men were frequently reviewed and exercised together; on which occasions 2000 officers were seen in the field, carrying arms, from the general to the ensign, yet with the utmost attention to rank, and without the smallest symptom of insubordination. In these reviews, says M. de la Croix, Touissant appeared like an inspired person, and became the fétiche or idol of the blacks who listened to him. In order to make himself better understood, he frequently addressed them in parables, and often made use of the following:—In a glass vessel full of grains of black maize, he would mix a few grains of white maize, and say to those who surrounded him, "You are the black maize; the whites, who are desirous of enslaving you, are the white maize." He would then shake the vessel, and presenting it to their fascinated eyes, exclaim, "See the white here and there!" in other words, "See how far the white are apart in comparison of yourselves." The gleam of prosperity, however, which resulted from his wise administration was but of short continuance.

The independence of St. Domingo was proclaimed on the 1st of July, 1801; and while the inhabitants were indulging the hope of future happiness, a storm was gathering, which burst upon them with accumulated fury. Scarcely was the peace of Amiens concluded, when a formidable armament of twenty-six ships of war was equipped by order of the first consul, with the determination of reducing the revolted colony of St. Domingo. On board this fleet were embarked 25,000 chosen troops, amply furnished with all the apparatus of military slaughter; and the chief command was confided to general Le Clerc, the brother-in-law of Buonaparte. Before proceeding to hostilities, however, recourse was had to various perfidious acts. Attempts were made to sow disunion among the free people of St. Domingo. Proclamations and letters, expressed in all the delusive jargon of the republic, were widely circulated. The chiefs of both colours then in France, and the two sons of Touissant himself, who had sent them thither for instruction, were pressed into the service of this expedition.

The French forces arrived in January, 1802; yet so little did Touissant expect to have any enemy to combat, that he was at the time making a tour round the eastern part of the island, and had given no orders for resistance in case of attack. After the French troops had disembarked, and previously to commencing operations in the interior of the country, Le Clerc thought proper to try what effect the sight of his two sons, and a specious letter from Buonaparte, would have upon Touissant. Coinon, their tutor, who had accompanied them from France, and was one of the chief confidential agents in this expedition, was accordingly deputed on this errand, with instructions to press Touissant's instant return to the Cape, and to bring back the children in case he should not succeed. On arriving at Touissant's country residence, and learning that its owner would not return from his excursion till the next day, the wily Frenchman availed himself of this delay to work upon the feelings of their mother, whose tears, and the solicitations of the children, when their father returned, for a while shook his resolutions. But being at length confirmed in his suspicions of the snare that was laid for him, by the conduct and language of Coinon, Touissant suddenly composed his agitated countenance; and, gently disengaging himself from the embraces of his wife and children, he took their preceptor into another apartment and gave him this dignified decision:—"Take back my children; since it must be so, I will be faithful to my brethren and my God." Unwilling to prolong this painful scene, Touissant mounted his horse, and rode to the camp; and although a correspondence was afterwards opened between him and Le Clerc, it failed to produce his submission.

Hostilities now commenced. After several obstinate conflicts in the open field, and the burning of several towns, the blacks found themselves overpowered, and were compelled to retire into the inaccessible fortresses of the interior, whence they carried on, under their brave chieftain, Touissant, a desultory, but destructive warfare against detached parties of their enemies.

At length, however, the negroes and cultivators were either subdued by the terror of the French army, or cajoled by the deceitful promises of the French general, who had published in his own name, and in that of the first consul, repeated solemn declarations that the freedom of all the inhabitants of St. Domingo, of all colours, should be preserved inviolate. But no sooner did Le Clerc find that his plan succeeded than he threw aside the mask, and issued an order restoring to the proprietors, or their attorneys, all their ancient authority over the negroes upon their estates. This order at once opened the eyes of the negro population; Touissant and Christophe united their forces; and such was the fierce and active nature of their attacks, that Le Clerc was obliged to abandon most of his former conquests, and seek refuge in the town of Cape Francois; where he again issued a proclamation couched in such specious terms, that the blacks and their leaders accepted the conditions of his proffered amnesty.

This master-piece of deception having thus fully succeeded, and the French now having the dominion of the whole island, they began to put in execution their meditated system of slavery and destruction; and, as a preliminary step towards this object, Le Clerc caused Touissant to be privately seized in the dead of the night, together with his family, and, putting him on board a fast-sailing frigate, he was conveyed to France, as a prisoner (May, 1802). There, under a charge of exciting the negroes to rebel, he was committed to close custody, and was no more heard of by his sorrowing countrymen, till his death was announced in the following year as having taken place in the fortress of Joux.

Aroused by the base treachery of Le Clerc, the black chieftains, Dessalines, Christophe, and Clervaux, again raised their standards, and were soon found at the head of considerable bodies of troops, ready to renew the struggle for liberty, and determined to succeed or perish in the attempt. Many and desperate were the contests which ensued; Le Clerc died, and was succeeded in the command of the French army by Rochambeau; but the losses they sustained by disease as well as by this harassing warfare rendered any escape from Hayti preferable to a continuance there; and, as the war had then recommenced between Great Britain and France, the French gladly surrendered themselves prisoners of war to a British squadron, and were conveyed to England. The independence of Hayti, which had been first proclaimed in 1800, was thus consolidated, and Dessalines erected the west or French part of the island into an empire, of which he became emperor, with the title of Jacques I. (Jan. 1, 1804). But his reign was of short duration; the cruelties he perpetrated caused a conspiracy to be formed against him; and, two years after his coronation, he was surrounded by the conspirators at his head quarters, and struggling to escape, received his death-blow.

The assassination of Dessalines caused another division of the island, and another civil war. In the north, Christophe assumed the government, with the modest designation of chief of the government of Hayti; while Pétion, a mulatto, asserted his claim to sovereign power. For several years these rival chieftains carried on a sanguinary contest, with various success, until the year 1810, when hostilities were suspended; and, though no formal treaty was concluded, the country long enjoyed the blessings of peace. Christophe was crowned king of Hayti in March, 1811, by the title of Henry I.; and Pétion, as president of the republic of Hayti, governed the southern part until 1818, when he died, and was succeeded by General Boyer, whom he was allowed to nominate his successor. Both governments evinced a praiseworthy solicitude for the encouragement of agriculture, as the basis of their national prosperity; and both were persevering in their endeavours to promote the intellectual instruction of the rising generation. Christophe, in imitation of other monarchs, created various orders of nobility, together with numerous officers of state, &c. His dynasty, however, was like his predecessor's, short-lived. In 1820 a successful conspiracy was formed against him; and, finding himself surrounded by an overwhelming force, he committed suicide. Boyer now took possession of his dominions; and, the Spanish portion of the island having, in 1821, voluntarily placed itself under his government, he became master of the whole of Hayti.

In 1825, Boyer concluded a treaty with France, by the provisions of which the independence of Hayti was fully recognized, and its ports thrown open to all nations, but with certain exclusive advantages to the French. The Haytians also agreed to pay 150 millions of francs to France, in five annual payments, as an indemnity for the losses of the colonists during the revolution. The first instalment of 30 millions was paid in 1830; but it being evident that the annual exaction was beyond the ability of Hayti to repay, it was agreed, in 1838, to reduce the original sum to 60 millions francs, to be paid in six instalments, by 1867.

Down to 1845, the entire island was under the Haytian government as one republic, but in the latter year, owing to the violation by the Haytians of the terms on which the annexation of Dominica had taken place, and their refusal to permit the emigration of white colonists into any part of the island, the Dominicans were driven to declare their independence, which independence was recognized by Great Britain in 1850. Since that time, Hayti has been transformed, by a coup d'état of Soulouque, from a republic into a monarchy, and it has been the incessant object of this black potentate, who was crowned emperor in 1851, under the title of Faustin I., to subjugate the Dominicans, and to regain possession of the entire island. In this, however, he has been signally frustrated, his army raised for the purpose having, in the first instance, been entirely dispersed and beaten, while his subsequent threats of renewing the attack have been checked by the joint interference of England, France, and the United States. The mediation of these powers, however, has not yet produced an actual peace, and all that they have accomplished has been a provisional truce, which was agreed upon in 1851, and which was to expire in October, 1852. The position of Dominica, as regards the probable course of the future commerce of the world, is so important, as to render it desirable that an increased knowledge should be cultivated of the various advantages it presents. This republic comprises about two-thirds of the island of Hayti, and forms that part of it which is nearest to this country, the western side, or Hayti proper, being under the despotic authority of the black emperor Soulouque. But although the Dominican republic is much larger than Hayti, its population is only about 200,000, while that of Hayti is estimated at 700,000. The Dominicans are of Spanish origin, and consist of about one-third whites, and a small proportion of blacks, the remainder being a mixed race. The Haytiens belonged to a French colony, and are all black, no white persons being allowed even to hold land or property of any kind in the country.

PORTO-RICO.

Porto-Rico was discovered by Columbus in 1493; it is about one hundred miles in length, from east to west, and forty from north to south. The Spaniards neglected it till 1509, when thirst of gold brought them thither from St. Domingo, under Ponce de Leon, to make a conquest, which afterwards cost them dear.

Ambition, revenge, and the love of gold, prompted the Spaniards to the most atrocious outrages. They found the inhabitants brave and fond of liberty; and as they looked up to the European visitants as a superior order of beings, to their authority they at first voluntarily submitted. It was not long, however, before they wished to shake off the intolerable yoke under which they groaned. After a short interval, they rose on all sides upon their oppressors, and massacred upwards of one hundred of them.

Under the old colonial system of Spain, in 1788, the population was little more than 90,000; whereas it amounted, in 1836, to 357,000, and it was supposed to contain nearer 400,000, of whom an eighth are slaves. Previously to 1815, Porto-Rico being excluded from all direct intercourse with other countries excepting Spain, was but slowly progressive. At that period, however, a royal decree appeared, which exempted the trade between Spain and the Spanish colonies and Porto-Rico from all duties for fifteen years; and she was then also permitted to carry on a free trade, under reasonable duties, with other countries. These wise and liberal measures have wonderfully contributed to the prosperity of the island; and their coffee, sugar, and to-

In the latter part of the 17th century, Porto-Rico was taken possession of by the English; but they did not long retain it, owing to the prevalence of dysentery among the troops. The government, laws, and institutions are nearly similar to those established in the other transatlantic colonies of Spain.

BARBADOES.

Barbadoes is the most easterly island of the West Indies. It is twenty-two miles in length, from north to south, and fifteen in breadth, from east to west.

The time of its discovery is not certain, nor by whom; but it is generally attributed to the Portuguese, in their way to Brazil. However, the English touched there in 1615, and, landing some men in 1625, made their first permanent settlement. In 1627, the earl of Pembroke obtained a grant of the island in trust for sir William Courteen, unknown to the earl of Carlisle, who had before obtained a grant of all the Caribbee islands from James I. The first planters were gentlemen of Devonshire and Cornwall, principally of the parliamentary party.

The country bore not the least appearance of having ever been peopled; there was no kind of beast of pasture or of prey; no fruit, herb, or root, fit for the support of human life; but the soil was good, and soon began to submit to cultivation. Population increased through a variety of adventurers, and the civil wars of England added prodigiously thereto; Barbadoes, in twenty five years from its first settlement, containing upwards of 50,000 whites, and a much greater number of negroes and Indian slaves. The former of these they bought, and the latter they seized upon without any pretence. In 1676, the population and trade were at their highest pitch; four hundred ships, averaging about 150 tons each, were employed; since which the island has been much on the decline.

Barbadoes has been frequently visited by hurricanes, of which those of August 10, 1674, October 10, 1780, and August 11, 1831, have been the most destructive in their effects; but the fury and violence of the last hurricane far exceeded that of either of the former; in it 2500 persons were killed, and the loss of property amounted to two millions and a half sterling. By the munificent aid of the British parliament, and the industry of the inhabitants, the planters have now happily recovered from these heavy losses. The population, as in the adjoining islands, may properly be divided into four classes: Creole or native whites; European whites; creoles of mixed blood; and native blacks. Barbadoes has all along remained in possession of the English. It is the residence of the bishop of Barbadoes and the Leeward Islands; and the clerical establishment is on a very respectable and effective scale.

ST. CHRISTOPHER'S; OR,
ST. KITT'S.

THIS island, which belongs to Great Britain, was discovered, in 1493, by Columbus, who gave it the name it bears. It was the mother country of all the English and French settlements in the West Indies. Both nations arrived there on the same day in 1625; they shared the island between them; signed a perpetual neutrality; and entered into a mutual engagement to assist each other against their common enemy, the Spaniards.

War commenced between England and France in 1666, and St. Christopher's became a scene of carnage for nearly half a century, terminating only with the total expulsion of the French in 1702. This island is about fifteen miles long, by four broad. There is no harbour in the country, nor the appearance of one.

NEVIS.

THIS small island, now belonging to the British, was originally discovered by Columbus; and the English, under sir Thomas Warner settled on it in 1623. It is separated from St. Christopher's by a narrow channel; and is properly only one very high mountain, about seven miles over each way. It was ravaged by the French in 1706, and the next year almost destroyed by the most violent hurricane ever recorded.

ANTIGUA.

ANTIGUA, a West Indian island, belonging to Great Britain, is one of those denominated the Windward Islands. It was called by the natives Xaymaca, but Columbus gave it the name of Santa Maria de la Antigua. The island is about twenty miles long, by eighteen broad. Columbus discovered it in 1493, but it was found totally uninhabited by those few Frenchmen who fled thither in 1623, upon being driven from St. Christopher's by the Spaniards. The want of fresh water induced these fugitives to return as soon as they could gain their former places of residence.

It appears that in 1640 there were about thirty English families settled in this island; and the number was not much increased when Charles II. granted the property to lord Willoughby of Parham. His lordship sent over a considerable number of inhabitants in 1666; but, from that time till 1680, it grew nothing but indigo and tobacco; when the island being restored again to the state, colonel Codrington introduced the culture of sugar.

The harbours of this island, particularly that called English Harbour, are the best belonging to the British government in these seas; and the whole is so much encompassed with rocks and shoals, that it is very dangerous for those unacquainted with its navigation to effect a landing. For this cause it has remained unmolested by the French in all the late wars.

MONTSERRAT.

THIS island was discovered by the Spaniards in 1493, who gave it the name of a mountain in Catalonia, which it resembled in shape. It is about twelve miles in length, and five in its broadest part. The English landed here in 1632, and soon after drove off all the natives. The progress of the colony was slow; and it acquired no kind of importance till the close of the seventeenth century, when the culture of sugar took place. It has no harbour, nor even a tolerable road; and masters of vessels are under the necessity of putting to sea when they see a storm approaching. It is in the possession of the English.

JAMAICA.

JAMAICA, the largest and most valuable of the British West India islands, was discovered by Columbus in his second voyage, in 1494. It is about one hundred and sixty-five miles in length, from east to west, and its average breadth about forty miles, bearing a resemblance to a long oval. In 1502, Columbus was driven upon the island by a storm, and having lost his ships, he explored the humanity of the natives, who gave him all the assistance that natural pity suggests. They soon, however, grew tired of supporting strangers, and incessantly withdrew from their neighbourhood. The Spaniards, who had already treated the Indians ungenerously, now took up arms against one of their chiefs, whom they accused of severity towards them. Columbus, forced to yield to the threats of his people, in order to extricate himself from so perilous a situation, availed himself of one of those natural phenomena, in which a man of genius may sometimes find a resource.

From the knowledge he had acquired of astronomy, he knew that an eclipse of the moon was fast approaching. He took advantage of this circumstance, and summoned all the caciques in the neighbourhood to come and hear something that concerned them, and was essential to their preservation. He then stood up in the midst of them, and having upbraided them with their cruelty, in suffering him and his distressed companions almost to perish, he thus emphatically addressed them: "To punish you for this, the God whom I worship is going to strike you with his most terrible judgments. This very evening you will see the moon turn red, then grow dark, and withhold its light from you. This will be only a prelude to your calamities, if you obstinately persist in refusing to give us food." He had scarcely done speaking, when his prophecies were fulfilled. The Indians were terrified beyond measure; they begged for mercy, and promised to do any thing that he should desire. He then told them, that Heaven, moved with their repentance, was appeased, and that nature was going to resume her natural course. From that moment provisions were sent in from all quarters; and the Spaniards were never in want of any thing during the time they remained there.

It was Don Diego Columbus, son of the discoverer, that first fixed the Spaniards in Jamaica. In 1509, he sent thither seventy robbers from St. Domingo, under the command of John de Esquibel; and others soon followed. These wretches went over apparently for no other purpose but to shed human blood; in fact, they never appear to have sheathed their swords while there was an inhabitant left. The murderers raised several settlements upon the ashes of the natives; but that of St. Jago de la Vega was the only one that could support itself. The inhabitants of that town contented themselves with living upon the produce of some few plantations, and the overplus they sold to the ships that passed by their coasts. The whole population of the colony, centered in the little spot that fed this race of destroyers, consisted of about 1500 whites, and as many slaves, when the English came and attacked the town, took it, and settled there, in 1655.

The English brought the fatal sources of discord along with them. At first the new colony was only inhabited by 3000 of that fanatical army which had fought and conquered under the standards of the republican party. These were soon followed by a multitude of royalists. The divisions which had prevailed for so long a time, and with so much violence, between the two parties in Europe, followed them beyond the seas. One party triumphed in the protection of Cromwell; the other trusted to the governor of the island, who was, in secret, a royalist. The name of this governor was Dudley; and by his disinterested behaviour he enforced his authority.

When Charles II. was restored to the crown, a form of civil government was established at Jamaica, modelled, like those of the other islands, upon that of the mother country. The governor represented the king; the council, the peers; and three deputies from each town, with two from every parish, constituted the commons. In 1682 the code of laws was drawn up which has so long existed.

Jamaica soon after became the grand depot of the buccaniers, a set of pirates who plundered the seas, and ravaged the coasts of America. Here the spoils of Mexico and Peru met with a ready reception; and here "extravagance and debauchery held their court," till this destructive race became extinct, or annihilated, in consequence of the frequency of the murders they committed.

The illicit trade carried on between Jamaica and the Spanish colonies, had, in 1739, according to the best calculations, brought into the former upwards of 65,000,000*l.* sterling. The court of Madrid thought to put a stop to it, by prohibiting the admission of foreign ships into the Spanish harbours, on any pretence whatever. But the people of Jamaica supported themselves in this trade under the protection of the English men-of-war, by allowing the captain five per cent. upon every article of which he authorized the smuggling.

After the establishing of register ships by Spain, this trade gradually diminished; and some time previous to the year 1766, it was reduced to about 67,000*l.* per annum. The British ministry at that time wishing to restore or recover the profit of it, thought that the best expedient to repair the losses of Jamaica was to make it a free port. This was no sooner done than the Spanish American ships flocked thither from all parts, to exchange their gold and silver, and other commodities, for the manufactures of England.

St. Jago, or Spanish Town, is the capital, but Kingston by far exceeds it in size and opulence. The town of Port Royal stood on a point of land running far into the sea, and ships of 700 tons could come up close to the wharfs. When the earthquake happened on the 7th of June, 1692, this town contained two thousand houses, all of which were destroyed, and vast numbers of persons perished. The earthquake was followed by an epidemic disease, which carried off 3000 more. Port Royal was soon rebuilt; but in January, 1703, it experienced another great calamity, a fire nearly reducing it to ashes. Many people now removed to Kingston. It was, however, built a third time, and was rising towards its former grandeur, when it was overwhelmed by the sea, on the 28th of August, 1722.

Kingston, although not esteemed as the capital of Jamaica, is the commercial capital: it was built in 1692, from a plan of colonel Lilly's, after the earthquake which destroyed Port Royal. It is a beautiful city, laid out in squares, with streets wide and regular, crossed by others at right angles. The harbour is spacious, and capable of admitting 1000 ships, or more, in safety.

The internal quiet of the island has been fully established since the expulsion of the maroon or mountain Negroes, during the latter part of the 18th century. Jamaica is divided into three counties; Middlesex in the centre, Surrey in the east, and Cornwall in the west. These are subdivided into 21 parishes. The island is governed by the laws of its own house of assembly and council.

MARTINIQUE.

MARTINIQUE, one of the discoveries of Columbus, and the principal of the French Caribbee islands, is about forty miles in length, and ten in average breadth. It was first settled by M. Desnambouc, a Frenchman, in the year 1635, with only 100 men from St. Christopher's. He chose rather to have it peopled from thence than from Europe; as he foresaw that men tired with the fatigue of a long voyage, would be likely to perish, after their arrival, either from the climate, or the hardships incident to most emigrations. They completed their first settlement without any difficulty. The natives, intimidated by fire-arms, or seduced by promises, gave up to the French the western and the southern part of the island, and retired to the other. This tranquillity was of short duration. The Caribs, when they saw those enterprising strangers daily increasing, were resolved to extirpate them; they therefore called in the natives of the neighbouring isles to their assistance, and suddenly attacked a little fort that had been newly erected. They were, however, repulsed, leaving upwards of 700 of their best warriors dead upon the spot. After this check, they disappeared for a long time; and when they did appear, it was with presents in their hands to their conquerors.

The Indians, whose manner of life requires a vast extent of land, finding themselves daily more straitened, waylaid the French who frequented the woods, and destroyed them. Twenty men had been killed, before any one was able to account for their disappearance. No sooner was it discovered, than the aggressors were pursued, their houses burnt, their wives and children massacred; and those few that escaped the carnage, fled from Martinique, and never appeared there any more.

The French, by this retreat, became sole masters of the island. They were divided into two classes: the first consisted of such as had paid their passage to the island, and those were called inhabitants. The government distributed lands to them, which became their absolute property upon paying a yearly tribute. These had under their command a number of disorderly people, sent from Europe, at their expense, whom they called engagés, or bondsmen. This engagement was a kind of slavery for three years, and when it expired, they became free.

The first cultivation was confined to tobacco, cotton, annatto, and indigo. That of sugar was introduced in 1650. Benjamin Da Costa, ten years after, planted cocoa. In 1718, all the cocoa-trees were destroyed by the season, and the coffee-tree immediately took its place.

Early in the 18th century Martinique became the mart for all the windward French settlements; and Port Royal became the magazine for all matters of exchange between the colonies and the mother country. The prosperity of this island was very great until the war of 1744, when a stop was put, in a great measure, to the contraband trade with the Spanish colonies, by the introduction of registered ships.

Martinique was taken by the English in the beginning of the year 1762, and returned to France in July, 1763. It was again taken by the English in 1809, but restored to France by the peace of Amiens. The empress Josephine, and her first husband, the viscount Beauharnois, were natives of this island.

GUADALOUPE.

GUADALOUPE, a valuable island colony belonging to the French, was one of the discoveries of Columbus. It is of an irregular form, about twenty-five miles long and thirteen broad. It is divided into two unequal parts by a small arm of the sea, nearly six miles long, and varying from 100 to 300 feet in breadth. This canal, known by the name of the Riviera-salée, or Salt River, is navigable for vessels of fifty tons burthen.

The part of the island which gives its name to the whole colony is, towards the centre, full of craggy rocks. Among these rocks is, a mountain, called La Soufrière, or, the Brimstone Mountain, which rises to an immense height, and exhales, through various openings, a thick and black smoke, intermixed with sparks that are visible by night. From these hills flow numberless streams, which fertilize the plains below. Such is that part of the island properly called Guadeloupe, or Basée-terre. That part which is commonly called Grande-terre has been less favoured by nature.

In 1635, the first settlement was made on this island by two gentlemen from Dieppe, named Loline and Duplessis, with about five hundred followers. Through imprudence, all their provisions were exhausted in two months: famine stared them in the face, when they resolved to plunder the natives. This, however, did not avert the dreadful alternative. How far the accounts of their horrible sufferings are to be credited we know not, but it is asserted that the colonists were reduced to graze in the field, and to dig up dead bodies for their subsistence! Many who had been slaves in Algiers deplored the fate that had broken their fetters; and all of them cursed their existence. It was in this manner that they atoned for their crime of invasion, till the government of Aubert brought about a peace with the natives A. D. 1640.

The few inhabitants that had escaped the calamities they had brought upon themselves, were soon joined by some discontented colonists from St. Christopher's, and by Europeans fond of novelty. But still the prosperity of Guadeloupe was impeded by obstacles arising from its situation. Martinique engrossed every species of traffic, from its convenient harbours and roads. It was in consequence of this preference, that the population of Guadeloupe, in 1700, amounted only to about 4000 whites, and 7000 slaves, many of whom were Caribs; while the produce of the island was proportionably small. Its future progress was, however, as rapid as the first attempt had been slow.

At the end of 1755, the colony contained near ten thousand whites, and between forty and fifty thousand slaves; and such was the state of Guadeloupe when conquered by the English in 1759, after a siege of three months, in which time the island suffered so much as to be nearly ruined. The conquerors, however, delivered the inhabitants from their fears; they overstocked the market, and thereby reduced the price of all European commodities. The colonists bought them at a low price, and in consequence of this plenty, obtained long delays for payment. The colony was restored to France by the peace of Paris, in 1763.

During the French republican war, Guadeloupe was taken by the English, and retaken by the French, in whose hands it now remains.

ST. LUCIA.

St. Lucia was discovered by Columbus, and is about thirty miles in length, by twelve in breadth. The English took possession of it in the beginning of the year 1659, without opposition. They lived there peaceably about a year and a half, when they were massacred by the natives.

In 1650, about forty French arrived there under Rousselot, who married one of the natives, and was beloved by them. He died four years after. Three of his successors were murdered by the discontented Caribs; and the colony was declining, when it was taken by the English in 1664, who evacuated it in 1666.

They had scarce left it, when the French appeared again on the island. Twenty years after, the English drove out the French. The English again quitted it; and it at length remained wholly without culture.

In 1718, marshal d'Estrees obtained a grant of St. Lucia, and sent over a commandant, troops, and inhabitants. This gave umbrage to the court of London, which had a prior claim; therefore, the French ministry, ordered that things should be put into the same state as they were before the grant.

In 1722, the duke of Montague had a grant of St. Lucia from the British ministry. This gave uneasiness to France; and it was at length agreed, in 1736, that neither nation should occupy it, but that both should "wood and water" there. However, the peace of 1763 gave to France this long-contested territory.

During the American war, 1778, it was taken by the English. It was afterwards given up to France; then again captured by the English in 1803, with whom it now remains, having been definitively assigned to us by the treaty of Paris.

ST. VINCENT.

This island was discovered by the same enterprising navigator, and nearly at the same time, as the other islands in its neighbourhood. It is about sixteen miles long, and eight broad. For some time after its discovery, it was the general rendezvous of the red Caribs, the original possessors of the western archipelago.

In 1660, when the English and French agreed that Dominica and St. Vincent should be left to the Caribs as their property, some of these natives, who till then had been dispersed, retired into the former; but the greater part into the latter. This population was soon after increased by a race of Africans, whose origin was never positively ascertained. It is supposed that they were slaves intended for the Spanish markets, and wrecked upon the coast. But by whatever chance these strangers were brought into the island, is now of no importance. The natives treated them with kindness, and mingled with them in marriage; from whence sprung the race called Black Caribs.

In 1719, many inhabitants of Martinique removed to St. Vincent. The first who came there settled peaceably, not only with the consent, but by the assistance, of the Red Caribs. This success induced others to follow their example; but these, whether from jealousy, or some other motive, taught these Caribs a fatal secret; it was, that they could sell their lands. This knowledge induced them to measure, and fix boundaries; and from that instant peace was banished from the island.

The Black Caribs no sooner knew the price which the Europeans set upon the lands they inhabited, than they claimed a share with the Red Caribs, and also a share in all future sales. Provoked at being denied a part of these profits, they formed themselves into a separate tribe, swore never more to associate with the Red Caribs, chose a chief of their own, and declared war. In this war they were successful, made themselves masters of all the leeward coast, and required of the Europeans that they should again buy the lands they had already purchased. A Frenchman attempted to shew the deed of his purchase of some lands which he had bought of a Red Carib; "I know not," said the Black Carib, "what thy paper says; but read what is written on my arrow. There you may see, in characters which do not lie, that if you do not give me what I demand, I will go and burn your house this night."

Time, which brings on a change of measures with a change of interest, put an end to these disturbances. The French became, in their turn, the strongest. In less than twenty years the population amounted to 800 whites and 3000 blacks. In this situation was the island when it fell into the hands of the English, to whom it was secured by the peace of 1763. In 1779 it was re-captured by the French; but it reverted to Great Britain in 1783.

The English had no sooner got possession, than they issued an order to deprive the cultivators of the lands of their property, unless redeemed. The settlers remonstrated against a proceeding so unjust, but were disregarded; and the lands were ordered, by the English ministry, to be sold indiscriminately. This severity made them disperse. Some went to St. Martin, Margalante, Guadeloupe, and Martinique; but the greater part to St. Lucia.

The Caribs still occupied the windward side of the island, which contained fine plains; but having refused to evacuate them when ordered so to do by the English, the latter took to arms to compel them. These unfortunate people defended themselves with extraordinary courage during several years, but were at length obliged to submit. The greater part had been exterminated during the war, and the remainder either fled, or were sent off the island.

DOMINICA.

DOMINICA, discovered by Columbus, in 1493, is about thirty miles long, and sixteen broad. This island was for many years afterwards inhabited only by its natives. In 1732, nine hundred and thirty-eight Caribs were found there, dispersed in thirty-two caribets, or huts; and three hundred and forty-nine French lived in a district by the sea-side. At the peace of 1763, when it became an English colony, it was found to contain six hundred whites, and two thousand blacks. The island was captured by the French in 1778, but restored at the peace of 1783.

The great advantage of this island to the English is its situation. It is nearly equidistant from Guadaloupe and Martinique, and at a small distance from either; and its safe and commodious roads and bays enable their privateers and squadrons to intercept, without risk, the navigation of France in her colonies.

GRENADA.

GRENADA, one of the West India islands belonging to Great Britain, is about thirty miles long, and twelve miles broad. The French formed a project for settling there as early as the year 1638, yet they never carried it into execution till 1651. At their arrival, they gave a few hatchets, some knives, and a barrel of brandy, to the chief of the natives they found there; and imagining they had purchased the island with these trifles, assumed the sovereignty, and soon acted as tyrants. The Caribs, unable to contend with them by open force, took the usual method which weakness inspires to repel oppression: they murdered all whom they found alone and defenceless. The troops that were sent to support the infant colony, destroyed all the natives they found. The remainder of these miserable people took refuge upon a steep rock; preferring rather to throw themselves down alive from the top of it, than to fall into the hands of an implacable enemy. The French called this rock, Le Mor des Sauteurs, (the Hill of the Leapers), which name it still retains.

The French held this island till 1762, when it was captured by the British, to whom it was confirmed by the treaty of 1763. The French, however, retook it in 1779; but restored it in 1783, agreeable to the treaty of peace.

TRINIDAD.

TRINIDAD is the most southerly of the Windward Islands, and, next to Jamaica, the largest and most valuable of the West India islands belonging to Great Britain. It lies immediately off the north-east coast of Colombia, being only separated from it by a narrow strait. It was first visited by Columbus in 1498, at the time he discovered the river Orinoco. Its favourable situation for carrying on trade with the main, as well as the neighbouring islands, its extent, fruitfulness, and the convenience of its harbours, make it an object of considerable importance; indeed, so fertile is the soil, that not more than a thirtieth part of its surface is incapable of cultivation. Cocoa is more extensively grown in Trinidad than in any of the other British Antilles, and is of superior quality; but its sugar plantations are still more important. Coffee, indigo, tobacco, and cotton, also come to perfection here, though the quantities grown are but small; but all the fruits and vegetables of the adjacent tropical climates are found in abundance; and the pines transplanted from France or Spain are said to equal their parent stocks.

The mineral products of Trinidad are considerable, but the most abundant is that of asphaltum, which is found in the greatest profusion in the lake Brea, or Pitch lake; part of which is in a liquid state, and consists of fluid pitch of unknown depth, in a state of slow ebullition, and exhaling a strong bituminous and sulphurous odour. Exclusive of this pitch lake, Trinidad has several extinct volcanic craters and other positive evidences of volcanic agency. It is, however, happily exempt from the destructive scourge of hurricanes.

Although discovered in 1498, Trinidad was not taken possession of by the Spaniards until 1588, when a similar scene of extermination of the natives occurred as marked most of the other territories in the New World which fell under their power. Raleigh visited it in 1595; and the French took it in 1696, but soon after restored it to the Spaniards, who held it till it was taken by the English in 1797, and ceded to them by the peace of Amiens.

ST. EUSTATIUS.

ST. EUSTATIUS, one of the West India islands, in the group called the Leeward islands, is about fifteen miles in circumference, and is, properly speaking, nothing but a steep mountain, rising out of the sea in the form of a cone, the centre of which is apparently the crater of an extinct volcano. Some Frenchmen, who had been driven from St. Christopher's, took refuge there in 1629, and abandoned it soon after.

The Dutch got possession of it in 1639. They were afterwards driven out by the English, and the latter by the French, to whom it was ceded by the treaty of Breda; notwithstanding which, Louis XIV. restored it to the Dutch, in whose possession it remained until the American war, when it was taken by the English, and retaken by the Dutch. During the French republican war, it was again taken by the English, with whom it now remains.

TOBAGO.

Tobago, one of the West India islands belonging to Great Britain, is about thirty-five miles in length, and twelve in breadth. In 1622, two hundred men, from Flushing, landed there to lay the foundation of a Dutch colony; upon which the neighbouring Indians joined with the Spaniards to oppose an establishment that gave umbrage to both. Whoever attempted to stop their fury, were murdered or taken prisoners; and the few who escaped into the woods soon deserted the island.

In 1654, the Dutch sent a fresh colony to Tobago, which was driven out, in 1666, by the English. The English were soon deprived of this conquest by the French; but Louis XIV., satisfied with having conquered it, restored it to the Dutch. In the month of February, 1677, a French fleet, destined to seize upon Tobago, fell in with the Dutch fleet sent out to oppose this expedition. They engaged in the road of the island; and the courage displayed on both sides was such, that every ship was dismasted, nor did the engagement cease till twelve vessels were burnt. The French lost the fewest men; but the Dutch kept possession of the island.

D'Estrees was determined to take it, and landed there the same year, in the month of December, at a time when there was no fleet to obstruct his progress. A bomb, thrown from his camp, blew up their powder magazine, which proved a decisive stroke; and the Dutch, unable to resist, surrendered at discretion. The conquerors availed themselves to the utmost of the rights of war; not contented with razing the fortifications, they burnt the plantations, seized upon all the ships in the harbour, and transported the inhabitants. This conquest was secured to France by the peace that soon followed.

The French, however, neglected this important island; not a single man was sent thither for many years, and it fell into a very low condition. The English claimed a right to Tobago; their arms confirmed their pretensions; and it was ceded to England by the peace of 1763. It was taken by the French in 1781, and ceded to them by the peace of 1783. The English again took it in the French republican war, (1793), and it now remains with them.

THE BAHAMAS.

THE islands, the first which Columbus discovered in America, are about five hundred in number, and belong to Great Britain. St. Salvador, one of them, was the first land discovered by Columbus, on the 12th of October, 1492. They are, in general, little more than rocks just above water. When first discovered, some were densely inhabited, and their natives were sent, by the Spaniards, to perish in the mines of St. Domingo. Not one of them had a single inhabitant in 1672, when the English landed a few men on that called New Providence, who were all destroyed by the Spaniards seven or eight years after. This disaster did not deter other Englishmen from settling there in 1690. They had built about 150 houses, when the French and Spaniards jointly attacked them in 1703, destroyed their plantations, and carried off their negroes. The pirates next got possession, and insulted every flag, till 1719, when England fitted out a sufficient force to subdue them. The greater part of them accepted the pardon held out upon submission, and served to increase the colony; which Woods Rogers brought with him from Britain.

There are other islands in the West Indies, belonging to the English, Danes, Swedes, and Dutch, but of so little consideration, that to give details of them would afford but little interest or real information to our readers.

THE HISTORY

AUSTRALIA AND POLYNESIA.

UNTIL the last century it was believed that a great continent existed in the Southern Ocean, to which the name of Terra Australis was given; it being inferred that the different points of land discovered to the south of the islands of Java and Celebes, and of the Cape of Good Hope, afforded ample proof of such a theory. The discoveries of modern geographers, however, go to invalidate the hypothesis that there is any continent south of America.

Under the names of Australia (or Australasia) and Polynesia is comprehended a maritime division of the globe, in contradistinction to the older terrene divisions of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America; being altogether a classification of islands, including no one continent under a general name, like the other divisions of the world, in which various kingdoms are circumscribed by one shore; and so far it is an anomaly in geographical classification. We shall first speak of the more important division, now known as

IN AUSTRALIA AND POLYNESIA EVERY THING SEEMS TO RUN COUNTER TO THE ORDINARY COURSE OF NATURE IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

AUSTRALIA.

THIS includes the semi-continental mass of land hitherto known as New Holland, and the islands of New Zealand, New Caledonia, New Hebrides, Queen Charlotte's Islands, Solomon's Archipelago, New Britain, New Ireland, New Hanover, Admiralty Isles, and Papua or New Guinea.

In no part of the globe can greater extremes of barrenness and fertility occur than in the various islands comprehended in Australia. On the shores of New Holland, its most prominent feature, we find fruitful plains covered with verdure eastward, and on the south and south-western coast nothing but naked hillocks of sand. This island, if such indeed it is to be called, almost equal in size to the whole of continental Europe, presents of itself an unequalled and almost unexplored field for geological enquiry.

The natives of Australia are, for the major part, of a negro character; and nowhere is human nature found in a more depraved state. An enormous head, flat countenance, and long, slender extremities, mark their physical conformation, together with an acuteness of sight and hearing. Captain Cook's description of this race has been verified by every succeeding observer. "The skin," says he, "is the colour of wood soot, or what is usually called chocolate colour. Their features are far from disagreeable; their noses are not flat, nor are their lips thick; their teeth are white and even, and their hair naturally long and black; it is, however, cropped short." It seems that a decidedly inferior variety of the human race is found in Australia, and has spread itself to a considerable distance north and east among the islands of Polynesia and the eastern archipelago. The Australian is puny and weak compared with the African negro; and his intellectual attainments are quite on as low a scale as his physical powers.

NEW HOLLAND.

THE Portuguese and Spaniards appear to have visited this region in the 16th century, but it was the Dutch who first made it known to Europe. In 1606 they coasted it along the western shore as far as 13° 45' of south latitude; the farthest point of land in their map being called Cape Keer Weer, or Turn again. In 1616 the west coasts were discovered by Dirk Hartag, commander of an outward-bound vessel from Holland to India; and in the year 1601 there was found, by some of the navigators by whom that coast was visited, a plate of tin, with an inscription and dates, in which it was mentioned that it had been left by him.

In 1618, another part of the coast was discovered by Zeachen, who gave it the name of Arnhem and Dieman; though a different part from what afterwards received the name of Van Dieman's Land from Tasman. In 1619, Jan Van Edels gave his name to a southern part of New Holland; and another part received the name of Leu-weu's Land. Peter Van Nuyts gave his name, in 1627, to the coast that communicates with Leuween; and another part bore the name of De Wit's Land. In 1623, Peter Carpenter, a Dutchman, discovered the great Gulph of Carpentaria. In 1687, Dampier, an Englishman, sailed from Timor, and coasted the western part of New Holland. In 1699, he left England, with a design to explore this country; as the Dutch suppressed whatever discoveries had been made by them. He sailed along the western coast of it, from 15 to 23 degrees of latitude. He then returned to Timor; from whence he sailed again; examined the isles of Papua; coasted New Guinea; discovered the passage that bears his name, and also New Britain; and sailed back to Timor along New Guinea. This is the same Dampier who, between the years 1683 and 1691, sailed round the world, by changing his ships. Notwithstanding the attempts of all these navigators, the eastern part of this vast country was totally unknown till captain Cook made his voyages, and, by fully exploring that part of the coast, gave his country an undoubted title to the possession of it; which it accordingly took, under the name of New South Wales, in 1787.

Captain Cook having given a favourable account of this country, an act passed in parliament, in 1779, under the auspices of judge Blackstone, lord Auckland, and Mr. Howard, to establish a colony in it, where the criminals condemned to be transported should be sent to pass their time of servitude. Some difficulties, however, prevented its being put into execution till December, 1786, when orders were issued, by the king in council, for making a settlement on New Holland. The squadron appointed for putting the design in execution, assembled at the Motherbank on the 16th of May, 1787. It consisted of the Sirius frigate, captain John Hunter; the Supply armed tender, lieutenant H. L. Ball; three storeships, the Golden Grove, Fishburn, and Borrowdale, for carrying provisions and stores for two years; and, lastly, six transports; these were to carry the convicts, with a detachment of marines in each, proportioned to the nature of the service. On the arrival of governor Philip at the station, he hoisted his flag on board the Sirius, as commodore of the squadron. On the 13th of May they weighed anchor. The number of convicts was 778, of which 558 were men. On the 3rd of January, 1788, the Supply armed tender came within sight of New Holland; but the winds becoming variable, and a strong current impeding their course, prevented them from reaching Botany Bay before the 18th day of the same month.

Governor Philip had no sooner landed than he set about an examination of the country surrounding Botany Bay, which had been so strongly recommended by captain Cook as the most eligible place for a settlement. He found that neither the bay, nor the land about it, appeared favourable for a colony; being in some places entirely swampy; in others, quite destitute of water. The governor, finding the difficulties that he had to surmount, determined to examine the lands further on, and accordingly went, with several officers, in three boats, to Port Jackson, about three leagues distant from Botany Bay. Here they had the satisfaction to find one of the finest harbours in the world, where a thousand sail of the line might ride in perfect safety. A cove, which he called Sydney Cove, in honour of lord Sydney, and the country around it, he destined for the settlement; orders were therefore immediately given for the removal of the fleet to Port Jackson.

The convicts, and others, destined to remain in New South Wales, reached Port Jackson on the 25th of January. No time was lost in beginning to clear the ground for an encampment, storehouses, &c. The work, however, went on but slowly; partly owing to the natural difficulties they had to encounter, and partly owing to the habitual indolence of the convicts, as well as to a want of carpenters; only twelve convicts being of that trade, several of whom were sick, and no more than sixteen could be hired from all the ships. But on the 7th of February a regular form of government was established in the colony.

The scurvy soon began to rage with violence; so that, by the beginning of May, two hundred people were rendered incapable of work; and no more than eight or ten acres of barley, or wheat, had been sown, besides what individuals had sown for themselves. The natives now began to show an hostile disposition, which they had not hitherto done, and several convicts, who had strolled into the woods, were murdered. All possible enquiry was made after the natives who had been guilty of the murder, but without effect.

Cook's survey of the east coast did more for Australian discovery than the united labours of all who preceded him; nor should it be forgotten that captain Bligh, after the mutiny of the Bounty, in 1789, though in an open boat, and devoid of almost every necessary, carried a series of observations that added much to the information before obtained. By this time, however, many English colonists had arrived, and home and colonial expeditions were actively set on foot. But the greatest discoverers, towards the end of last century, were Bass and Flinders. In 1798 they sailed through the strait between Van Dieman's Land (now often called Tasmania) and New Holland; these two being marked in Cook's chart as continuous, and the fact of their being otherwise not having before been proved. Further discoveries have since been made; but it is to Cook and Flinders that we are indebted for the most valuable information.

The eastern coast, or New South Wales, commences at Cape York, in 10° 30' S. lat., and terminates at Wilson's Promontory in Bass's strait, in 39° 0', including an extent of 700 leagues. A chain of mountains appears to run parallel to this coast, through its whole length, whose bases are from 10 to 30 leagues from the sea. Until of late years all attempts to pass this natural barrier have been unsuccessful. It has, however, at last been overcome; and, instead of the sandy deserts or the inland seas with which conjecture had occupied the interior, the discovery of beautiful meadows, watered by considerable rivers and by chains of ponds, has given to the colonists new prospects of extension and riches. The coasts towards the south are in general elevated and covered with lofty trees. Towards the north they are lower, bordered with mangrove swamps, and lined with a labyrinth of islets and coral reefs. The Blue Mountains, which rise behind the seat of the colony, are a mixture of primitive and secondary rocks.

Only the south-east part, with comparatively small sections in the west and south, and an inconsiderable tract in the north, near Port Essington, have been thoroughly explored. Some useful expeditions have been conducted by Mr. Eyre, Governor Grey, Dr. Leichardt, and S. T. Mitchell; but much of the interior is still unknown, and some features of its best known regions can only be sketched. The following are the present settlements, with the date of their establishment:—The British settlement of New South Wales, of which Sydney is the capital, was made in 1788. Western Australia, or Swan River, in 1829; South Australia, of which Adelaide is the capital, in 1834. Australia Felix, or Port Phillip, chief town Melbourne, established in 1837, is a dependency of New South Wales. North Australia was colonised in 1838. Australind on the western coast, about eighty miles south of Swan River, was established in 1841.

The government, after passing through the usual phases, is now by a recent act of parliament expanded in all the settlements into a constitution.

The wealth of Australia consists mainly in its flocks, which produce the finest wool in the world; and pasture is so abundant, that sheep may be reared by all who take the trouble to attend to them. The fisheries too, though heretofore neglected, seem to hold out strong inducements to industry, and coal and other minerals necessary to the prosperity of man are found in abundance. The animal and vegetable productions of the island, are the very opposites of those to be found in Europe. Yet the soil is so good, and the climate so salubrious, that whatever plants or living creatures the settlers import, thrive and multiply. The wretched natives are fast disappearing. It appears that they are little capable of improvement, and that intermarriages between them and the whites seldom prove productive. For many years Australia had been a favourite land of emigration for the British population; but an extraordinary impetus has been given to emigration thither by the recent discovery of the gold beds, which most greatly influence the future character of Australian industry and the local distribution of its inhabitants. We subjoin a brief account of this interesting discovery.

On the 2nd of May, 1851, the citizens of Sydney were startled with the announcement that gold had been discovered in a native state within the Colonial Territory. Mr. Hargreaves, a resident of Brisbane Water, who had recently returned from California, struck with the similarity of the geological formation, felt persuaded that there must be gold in several districts of the colony, and on instituting a search his expectations were realised. The locality in which the first discovery of gold was made by Mr. Hargreaves, was in the neighbourhood of Summerhill Creek, thirty miles from Bathurst, (or about 140 from Sydney). A spot on the banks of Summerhill Creek soon acquired, and has retained, the attractive name of Ophir. But the Ophir diggings were shortly surpassed in amount of produce by those of Turron, a river which flows into the right bank of the Macquarie, Meroo Creek, further northward, another of the sites of auriferous wealth, belongs to the basin of the same river, the whole valley of which, from the neighbourhood of Bathurst downwards, appears to possess on either hand abundant supplies of the glittering treasure.

The discoveries to which we have been referring, as well as others that shortly ensued, were made in localities within the limits of the New South Wales territory. But it was soon ascertained that the auriferous deposits of the Australian soil were not limited to that colony. Gold fields that surpassed those of New South Wales in richness of yield, were found to exist in the neighbouring provinces of Victoria, and in places more accessible from the maritime districts. Early in the month of September, gold was found at a place called Ballarat, forty miles distant from Geelong (on Port Phillip), and within a few days after at Mount Alexander, seventy miles distant from Melbourne. The latter locality has proved by far the richest of the Australian gold fields hitherto worked, and has attracted by much the greater number of diggers. The workings at Ballarat and Mount Alexander, rapidly proved so successful, as completely to throw into shade the digging that had been already commenced at Anderson's Creek, and other places nearer to Melbourne. Within a year from the date of that announcement, gold to a value exceeding four millions sterling had been shipped to England, from the Australian colonies; and upwards of thirty thousand diggers were eagerly employed in the search after the precious metal in a single locality of the widely extended gold fields belonging to these portions of the southern hemisphere.

It is impossible to predict what consequences may result from this important discovery; but a glance at what has been done during the last twenty years may serve to indicate the future progress of the country. Within this short period the map of New Holland has gradually been filled up; the bays and headlands of the sea-board have been successively settled; river after river has received enterprising cultivators on its banks; steam navigation has united the bustling points of 2000 miles of coast, whilst an average of 200 miles along that coast has been subdued to pasturage or the plough. The wants of trade have been supplied with wool, tallow, horns, hides, ornamental and hard woods, treasuries of copper; so that England, the emporium of trade, is both clothed, adorned, and fortified with the produce of this antipodean and once desolated territory. The ebb of transportation has sunk beneath the rising tide of emigration; large cities have been founded; numerous provinces have been occupied by freemen, and civil and religious liberty have secured another home.

NEW ZEALAND.

NEW ZEALAND, a group of islands in the South Pacific Ocean, was discovered by Tasman in 1642. He traversed the eastern coast, from latitude 34 to 43 south, and entered a strait; but being attacked by the natives soon after he came to anchor, in the place to which he gave the name of Murderer's Bay, he did not go on shore. He called the country Staten Land, in honour of the states general; though it has been generally distinguished, in maps and charts, by the name of New Zealand.

In 1770, it was circumnavigated by Captain Cook, who found it to consist of two large islands, the coast of which was indented with deep bays, affording excellent shelter for shipping. From that period the coasts were occasionally visited by whalers, and some communication was held with the natives; but until 1815, when a missionary station was established there, no permanent settlement appears to have been made by any people. At the general peace the right of Great Britain to these islands was recognised; but no constituted authority was placed over New Zealand till 1833, when a sub-governor from New South Wales was sent to reside here. Meantime the shores had become infested by marauding traders and adventurers of the worst class, who attempted to obtain from the natives large tracts of land by most fraudulent means.

In order to remedy this evil as far as possible, and to put a stop to such practices in future, New Zealand was, in 1840, constituted a colony dependent on New South Wales, and a governor appointed: a commission was also appointed to inquire into the validity of all claims to land, &c.

The highest hopes were entertained respecting the issues of this adventure, and the New Zealand Company enjoyed a large share of the public favour. It undertook to transplant English society in all its ramifications to the further side of the globe; and sent out in the same expedition, judges, a bishop, clergy, persons who by purchase had become landed proprietors, artisans, peasants, medical men, and printers. But either because the precautions were not taken in the selection of colonists, or that the colonists themselves went out with exaggerated ideas of the advantages secured to them, the result fell short of general expectation. Quarrels between the settlers and the natives broke out, and the system of local government, when put to the test, was found not to fulfil the purposes for which it had been concocted. The grievances of the natives at length stimulated them into a formidable insurrection, under their chief Heke; but since its suppression in 1846 tranquillity has prevailed.

In spite of all hindrances, however, society has by degrees widened its basis in New Zealand. The first body of emigrants, who arrived there in 1830, founded the settlements of Wellington and Nelson on opposite shores of Cook's Straits. They have been followed by different swarms at different times, two of which make religious principles, and the right in civil affairs of self-government, the basis of their social organisation. At a place called Otago, about 400 miles from Wellington, a settlement of Scotchmen, members of the Free Church of Scotland, has struck root. And further north, at Canterbury, the Church of England has set up her standard under the auspices of the Canterbury Association, of which the Archbishop of Canterbury is ex officio the president. It is satisfactory to find that the natives, reclaimed from their barbarous habits, and pacified though not subdued by a wise conciliation rather than by violence, are rapidly acquiring the faith and industrial habits of the colonists, with whom they willingly coalesce. In 1852 New Zealand received from the British government a constitution modelled on that of the Australian settlements.

POLYNESIA.

THIS name, as we have already observed, is given by modern geographers to various groups of islands in the Great Pacific Ocean, lying east of the Asiatic islands and Australia, and on both sides the equator, stretching through an extent of about 5100 miles from north to south, and 3600 from east to west. Every thing bespeaks their submarine creation, and in many are positive evidences of volcanic agency. They are sometimes divided into Northern and Southern Polynesia, and classed in the following groups:—Pelew Islands; Carolines; Ladrões; Sandwich Islands; Friendly Islands; Gallapagos; Admiralty Isles; New Ireland; New Britain; and New Hanover; Solomon's Islands; New Hebrides and New Caledonia; Queen Charlotte's Islands; Navigators' Islands; Society Islands; Marquesas; Pitcairn Island &c. Of these we shall only mention a few; as they can hardly be said to come within the scope of a work professingly historical; though their entire omission might be regarded as a defect.

LADRONES, OR MARIANNE ISLANDS.

THE Ladrões are a cluster of islands belonging to Spain, lying in the North Pacific Ocean, between the 12th and 21st degrees of north latitude, and about the 145th degree of east longitude. They were discovered by Magellan, who gave them the name of Ladrone Islands, or the Islands of Thieves, from the thievish disposition of the inhabitants. At the time of this discovery, the natives were totally ignorant of any other country than their own, and, as it is said, were actually unacquainted with the element of fire, till Magellan, provoked by their repeated thefts, burned one of their villages. At the latter end of the 17th century they obtained the name of the Marianne Islands, from the queen of Spain,

Mary Ann of Austria, mother of Charles II., at whose expense missionaries were sent thither to propagate the Christian faith.

Though plunged in the deepest ignorance, and destitute of every thing valued by the rest of mankind, no nation ever shewed more presumption, or a greater conceit of themselves, than these islanders; for, to use the words of an old voyager, they looked on themselves as the only sensible and polished people in the world.

As Japan lies within six or seven days sail of them, some have been induced to believe that the first inhabitants came from that empire; but, from the greater resemblance to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands than to the Japanese, it is more probable that they came from the former.

Commodore Anson visited the Ladrões in 1742, and describes Tirrian, one of the group, as abounding with every thing necessary to human subsistence, and presenting at the same time a pleasant and delightful appearance, where hill and valley, rich verdure, and spreading trees formed a happy intermixture. Subsequent navigators, however, found the island to have been deserted, and become an uninhabitable wilderness. The natives of the Ladrões are tall, robust, and active, managing their canoes with admirable adroitness. Guajan is the largest island in the group, and the population consists of settlers from Mexico and the Philippine Islands.

FRIENDLY ISLANDS.

THE Friendly Islands are a group or cluster of islands said to be upwards of one hundred in number, in the Southern Pacific Ocean. They received their name from the celebrated captain James Cook, in the year 1773, in consideration of the friendship which appeared to subsist among the inhabitants, and from their courteous behaviour to strangers. The chief islands are Anamooka, Tongataboo, Lefooga, and Kooa. Abel Janssen Tasman, an eminent Dutch navigator, first touched here in 1643, and gave names to the principal islands. Captain Cook laboriously explored the whole cluster, which he found to consist of upwards of sixty. The three islands which Tasman saw, he named Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Middleburg. Tongataboo is the residence of the sovereign and the chiefs. These islands are fertile, and in general highly cultivated. Kooa is described as a beautiful spot; the land, rising gently to a considerable height, presents the eye with an extensive view. Captain Cook and some of his officers walked up to the highest point of the island. "While I was surveying this delightful prospect," says the captain, "I could not help flattering myself with the pleasing idea, that some future navigator may, from the same station, behold these meadows stocked with cattle, brought to these islands by the ships of England; and that the completion of this single benevolent purpose, independent of all other considerations, would sufficiently mark to posterity, that our voyages had not been useless to the general interests of humanity."

Of the nature of their government, no more is known than the general outline. The power of the king is unlimited, and the life and property of the subjects are at his disposal; and instances enough were seen to prove, that the lower order of people have no property, nor safety for their persons, but at the will of the chiefs to whom they respectively belong.

SOCIETY ISLANDS.

The Society Islands, in the Pacific Ocean, are eight in number; viz., Otaheite, Haheine, Ulitea, Otaha, Bolabola, Maurova, Toobae, and Tabooamanoo. They are situated between the latitude of $169^{\circ} 10'$ and $16^{\circ} 55'$ south, and between the longitude of $160^{\circ} 57'$ and 162° west. The people, religion, language, customs and manners, soil, and productions, are nearly the same as at Otaheite, of which we shall speak.

Otaheite was discovered by captain Wallis in 1767, who called it King George the Third's Island. Bougainville, a French circumnavigator, next arrived at it in 1768, and staid ten days. Captain Cook, in the Endeavour, next visited it in 1769, in company with Mr. Banks, (afterwards sir Joseph Banks,) Dr. Solander, and other learned men, to observe the transit of Venus, and staid three months; and it was visited by captain Cook in his two succeeding voyages; since which time the Spaniards, and other Europeans, have called there. It consists of two peninsulas, great part of which is covered with woods, consisting of bread-fruit trees, palms, coco-nuts, and all tropical vegetation. The people of this and the neighbouring islands, are the most honest and civilised of any in the Pacific Ocean; but it appears certain that the inhabitants have degenerated rather than improved since Cook's time.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

The Sandwich Islands, in the North Pacific Ocean, consist of eleven in number. They are called, by the natives, Owhyhee, Mowee, Ranai, Morotai, Taboorowa, Wookoa, Atooi, Neeshchoow, Ooshawa, Morotone, and Takooa; all inhabited, except the two last. They were discovered by captain Cook in 1777 and 1778.

Goats and European seeds were left by the English at their departure the first time; but the possession of the goats soon gave rise to a contest between two districts, in which the breed was entirely destroyed. The inhabitants are undoubtedly of the same race as those that possess the islands south of the equator; and in their persons and manner, approach nearer to the New Zealanders than to their less distant neighbours, either of the Society or Friendly Islands. Tattooing the body is practised by the whole of them.

As these islands are not united under one government, wars are frequent among them. The same system of subordination prevails here as at the other islands, the same absolute authority on the part of the chiefs, and the same unrelenting submission on the part of the people. The government is monarchical, and hereditary.

Owhyhee, the easternmost and largest of these islands, was discovered by captain Cook on the 30th of November, 1778, on his return from his voyage northward. Having circumnavigated the island, and anchored in a bay, called Karakakooa, he found great alteration in the conduct of the natives, and a general disposition to theft; and it appeared evident that the common people were encouraged by their chiefs, who shared the booty with them. Still, however, no hostilities were commenced. The greatest honours were paid to the commander; and, on his going ashore, he was received with ceremonies little short of adoration. A vast quantity of hogs, and other provisions, were procured for the ships; and on the 4th of February, 1779, they left the island, not without most magnificent presents from the chiefs, and such as they had never received in any part of the world. Unluckily, they encountered a storm on the 6th and 7th of the same month, during which the Resolution sprang the head of her fore-mast in such a manner, that they were obliged to return to Karakakooa bay to have it repaired. On the 13th, one of the natives being detected in stealing the tongs from the armourer's forge in the Discovery, was dismissed with a pretty severe flogging; this had but little effect; for, in the afternoon of the same day, another having snatched up the tongs and a chisel, jumped overboard with them, and swam for the shore, and having got on board a canoe, escaped. reach, a chief. But captain Cook was not satisfied with the recovery of the stolen goods only; he insisted upon having the thief, or the canoe which carried him, by way of reparation. As the officer was preparing to launch the canoe into the water, he was interrupted by Pareah, who insisted that it was his property, and he should not take it away. This brought on hostilities. The Indians attacked the sailors with stones, and soon drove them to their boats. They then began to break in pieces the pinnace, after having taken every thing out of her that was loose. Before the English reached the ship, Pareah overtook them in a canoe, and delivered the midshipman's cap, which had been taken from him in the scuffle. He joined noses with them, in token of friendship; and desired to know whether captain Cook would kill him on account of what had happened. They assured him he would not; and made signs of reconciliation on their part. On this he left them, and paddled over to the town of Kavaroh, and that was the last time he was seen by the English.

Next day it was found that the large cutter of the Discovery had been carried off in the night time; on which captain Cook ordered the launch, and small cutter, to go under the command of the second lieutenant, and to lie off the east point of the bay, in order to intercept all the canoes that might attempt to get out, and, if necessary, to fire upon them. The third lieutenant of the Resolution was dispatched to the western part of the bay on the same service. Captain Cook now formed the resolution of going in person to visit the king himself in his capital of Kavaroh; with this view he left the ship about seven o'clock in the morning of Sunday, the 14th of February, attended by the lieutenant of marines, a serjeant, a corporal, and seven privates. The crew of the pinnace, under the command of Mr. Roberts, were also armed; and as they rowed ashore, the captain ordered the launch to leave her station at the opposite point of the Bay, in order to assist his own boat. Having landed with the marines at the upper end of the town, the Indians flocked round him, and prostrated themselves before him. The king's sons waited on the captain as soon as he sent for them, and by their means he was introduced to the king, who readily consented to go on board; but in a little time the natives began to arm themselves with long spears, clubs, and daggers. An old priest now appeared with a cocoa-nut in his hand, which he held out as a present to captain Cook, singing all the while, with a view to divert the attention of the captain and his people from observing the motions of the Indians, who were now every where putting on their thick mats which they use as defensive armour. Captain Cook beginning to think his situation dangerous, ordered the lieutenant of marines to march towards the shore, as he himself did, having all the while hold of the king's hand, who very readily accompanied him, attended by his wife, two sons, and several chiefs. The Indians made a lane for them to pass; and the distance they had to go was only about fifty or sixty yards; while the boats lay at no more than five or six yards from the land. The king's youngest son, Keowa, went on board the pinnace without hesitation; and Tarraboo, the king, was about to follow, when his wife threw her arms about his neck, and, with the assistance of two chiefs, forced him to sit down. The captain finding that he could not take the king along with him without a great deal of bloodshed, was on the point of giving orders for his people to re-embark, when one of the Indians threw a stone at him. This insult was returned by the captain, who had a double-barrelled gun, by a discharge of small shot from one of the barrels. This had little effect, as the man had a thick mat before him; and as he now brandished his spear, the captain knocked him down with his mallet. The king's son still remained in the pinnace; and the detention of him would have been a great check upon the Indians; but Mr. Roberts, who had the command of the pinnace, set him on shore, at his request, soon after the first fire. Another Indian being observed by the captain to be brandishing his spear at him, he fired at him, but missing, killed one close by his side; upon which the serjeant, observing that he had missed the man he aimed at, received orders to fire also, which he did, and killed him on the spot. Captain Cook now called to the people in the boats to come nearer, to receive the marines. This order was obeyed by Mr. Roberts; but the lieutenant who commanded the launch, instead of coming nearer, put off to a greater distance, and by his conduct deprived the captain of the only chance he had for his life. Captain Cook was now observed making for the pinnace. An Indian was seen to follow him, who struck him on the back of the head with a club. The captain staggered a few paces, and then fell on his hand and one knee, and dropped his musket. Before he could recover himself, another Indian stabbed him with a dagger in the neck, and he fell into the water; when a savage struck him with a club, which probably put an end to his life. They hauled his body on the rocks, and used it in the most barbarous manner. The chief who first struck him with the club, was named Karimana Reha; and he who stabbed him with the dagger, was called Noah.

Owing to the barbarous disposition of the Indians, it was found impossible to recover captain Cook's body; however, by dint of threats and negotiation, some parts were procured, by which means the navigators were enabled to perform the last offices to their much respected commander. These being put into a coffin, and the service read over them, were committed to the deep, with the usual honours, on the 21st of February, 1779.

ICELAND.

ICELAND is a large island in the northern part of the Atlantic Ocean, between the 53rd and the 67th degrees of north latitude, and between the 16th and 23rd degrees of west longitude from London. It is of a very irregular shape, and contains about 56,000 inhabitants.

At what time the island of Iceland was first peopled is uncertain. The Iceland chronicles go no farther back than the arrival of the Norwegians, about the year 861, when Naddodr, a pirate, was driven on the coast. In 864, Garder Suafarson, a Swede, encouraged by the account given by Naddodr, went in search of it, sailed round it, and gave it the name of Garder-sholmer, or Garder's Island. Having remained in Iceland during the winter, he returned in the spring to Norway, where he described the new-discovered island as a pleasant, well-cultivated country. This excited a desire in Floke, another Swede, reputed the best navigator of his time, to undertake a voyage thither. Floke staid the whole winter in the island, and, because he found great quantities of floating ice on the north side, he called it Iceland, which name it has ever since retained.

In 874, Ingolf, and his friend Liefr, established a colony; and in sixty years the whole island was inhabited. The tyranny of Harold, king of Norway, contributed not a little to the population of Iceland. Besides the Norwegians, new colonies arrived from different nations.

In 924 they chose a chief; but his powers were inconsiderable, and the Icelanders began to wage war against each other. They remained, however, free from a foreign yoke till 1261, when they became subject to the Norwegians. Afterwards Iceland, together with Norway, became subject to Denmark.

Iceland is famous for the volcanoes with which it abounds, appearing, indeed, to owe its existence to submarine volcanic agency, and to have been upheaved at intervals from the bottom of the sea. Tracts of lava traverse the island and almost in every direction; besides which the country abounds with other mineral masses indicative of an igneous origin. The burning mountains, so dreadful in their effect, seldom begin to throw out fire without giving warning.

A subterraneous noise precedes the eruption for several days, with a roaring and cracking in the place from whence the fire is about to burst forth. The immediate sign is the bursting of the mass of ice, or snow, which covers the mountain, with a dreadful noise. The flames then issue forth, and stones, ashes, &c. are thrown out to vast distances. Egbert Classen relates, that, in the eruption of Kettle-gia, in 1755, a stone weighing 290 lbs., was thrown to the distance of twenty-four English miles.

Besides more than thirty volcanic mountains, there exists an immense number of small cones and craters, from which streams of melted substances have been poured forth over the surrounding regions. Twenty-three eruptions of Hecla are recorded since the occupation of the island by Europeans; the first of which occurred in 1604. But to enumerate the ravages of the many volcanoes with which Iceland abounds, would greatly exceed our limits. It will be sufficient to give an account of that which happened in 1783, and which, from its violence, seems to have been unparalleled in history.

Its first signs were observed on the first of June, by a trembling of the earth in the western part of the province of Skaptar-fall; it increased gradually till the 11th, and became at last so great, that the inhabitants quitted their houses, and lay at night in tents on the ground. A continual smoke, or steam, was perceived rising out of the earth in the northern and uninhabited parts of the country. Three fire spouts, as they were called, broke out in different places; one in Ulfaradal, a little to the east of the river Skaptá; the other two were a little to the westward of the river Ljónsá. The three fire spouts, or streams of lava, united in one, after having risen a considerable height in the air, arrived at last at such an amazing altitude as to be seen at the distance of upwards of 200 miles; the whole country, for double that distance, being enveloped in the densest smoke and steam, while the atmosphere was filled with sand, brimstone, and ashes, in such a manner as to occasion continual darkness. Considerable damage was done by the pumice stone, which fell red-hot in great quantities. Along with these, a tenacious substance, like pitch, fell in abundance. This shower having continued for three days, the fire became very visible, and at last arrived at the amazing height already mentioned. Sometimes it appeared in a continual stream, at others in flashes, with a perpetual noise like thunder, which lasted the whole summer. The obscurity occasioned by this extraordinary eruption, seems to have reached as far as Great Britain; for, during the whole summer of 1783, a haze or dullness appeared to darken the atmosphere.

The whole extent of ground covered by the lava, was computed to be ninety miles long, by forty-two in breadth; the depth of the lava being from sixteen to twenty fathoms. Twelve rivers were dried up, twenty-one villages were destroyed, and 224 persons lost their lives.

After this eruption, two new islands were thrown up in the sea; one of about three miles in circumference, and about a mile in height, at the distance of 100 miles south-west from Iceland, in 100 fathoms water.

FEW METALS ARE MET WITH, BUT THE SULPHUR IS INEXHAUSTIBLE.

HECLA, THE VOLCANIC MOUNTAIN, IS ABOUT THIRTY MILES INLAND.

ON THE SOUTH AND WEST COASTS, NUMEROUS ISLANDS HAVE BEEN FROM TIME TO TIME THROWN UP, SOME OF WHICH REMAIN.

The other lay to the north-west, between Iceland and Greenland. Both these islands subsequently disappeared.

Iceland abounds also with hot and boiling springs, called geysers, some of which throw the water into the air to the surprising height of from 200 to 300 feet. These are, indeed, the most remarkable phenomena in Iceland. The great geyser, or principal fountain of this kind, rises from a tube or funnel, seventy-eight feet in perpendicular depth, and from eight to ten feet in diameter at the bottom, but gradually widening till it terminates in a capacious basin. The jets take place at intervals of about six hours; and when the water, in a violent state of ebullition, begins to rise in the pipe or funnel, and to fill the basin, subterraneous noises may be heard like the distant roar of cannon, the earth is slightly shaken, and the agitation increases, till at length a column of water is suddenly thrown up, to a vast height, as before stated. After playing for a time like an immense artificial fountain, a column of steam rushes up with great violence, and a thundering noise terminates the eruption. All the hot waters have an incrusting quality: in some places they taste of sulphur, in others not; but when drank as soon as cold, they taste like common boiled water. This island is committed to a governor, who resides at Basso-stadr; he has under him a bailiff, two laymen, a sheriff, and twenty-one syasmen, or magistrates, who superintend small districts; and almost every thing is decided according to the laws of Denmark, to whom it belongs.

At a period when most parts of continental Europe were in a state of rude ignorance, the inhabitants of this remote island were well acquainted with poetry and history. The most flourishing period of Icelandic literature appears to have been from the 12th to the end of the 13th century; but even during the last three centuries, Iceland has produced several eminently learned men. At the present day there is no want of disposition on the part of the people to apply to literature, but they wisely attend more to solid branches of learning than to the lays and legends of their ancient sages. Domestic education is universal; and there are very few among them who cannot read and write, and many among the better class would be distinguished by their taste and learning in the most cultivated society in Europe.

GREENLAND.

UNDER the name of Greenland is denoted the most easterly parts of America, stretching towards the North Pole, and likewise some islands to the northward of the continent of Europe, lying in very high latitudes. This country is divided into West and East Greenland. West Greenland had long been considered to be a part of the continent of America, but recent geographers seem to think it is an island. It is bounded on the west by Baffin's Bay, on the south by Davis's Straits, and on the east by the Northern Atlantic Ocean.

This country was first peopled by Europeans from Iceland, headed by Eric Rande, in the eighth century; and a regular intercourse was maintained between Norway and Greenland till the year 1406; from that time all correspondence was cut off, and all knowledge of Greenland buried in oblivion. It is supposed that a nation called Schrellings, whose descendants still inhabit the western part, got the better of the settlers, and exterminated them. All that can be learned from the most authentic records is, that Greenland was divided into two districts, called West Bygd, and East Bygd; that the western division contained four parishes, and 100 villages; and the eastern district was still more flourishing. This colony, in ancient times, certainly comprehended twelve extensive parishes, one hundred and ninety villages, a bishop's see, and two monasteries. Many attempts have been made to re-discover the east country, without effect, by the Danes and the English. The land has been seen, but the ice has always prevented any approach to the shore.

The Greenland Company at Bergen, in Norway, transported a colony to the west coast; and in 1712, the Rev. Hans Egede, and others, endeavoured to reach the eastern district by coasting, but were obliged to return, owing to continual storms.

That part of West Greenland which is now settled by the Danes and Norwegians, lies between the 64th and 68th degrees of north latitude; and thus far, it is said, the climate is temperate. To the northward of the 68th degree, the cold is prodigiously intense; and towards the end of August all the coast is covered with ice, which never thaws till April or May, and sometimes June. Thunder and lightning rarely happen; but the aurora borealis is very frequent and splendidly luminous.

The Greenlanders are constantly employed either in fishing or hunting: at sea they pursue the whales, morsees, seals, fish, and sea fowl; and on shore they hunt the reindeer.

THE ICELANDERS ARE VERY MOUNTAIN, DEVOTEDLY ATTACHED TO THEIR NATIVE LAND, AND REMARKABLY GRAVE AND SERIOUS.

THE INTENSITY OF THE COLD IS MUCH INCREASED BY THE QUANTITIES OF FLOATING ICE DRIFTED FROM THE POLAR REGIONS.
