Even in the midst of these quasi religious vexations, some very useful measures were taken for promoting industry, especially by revoking sundry most impolitic patents, by which the trade in cloth, wool, and many other commodities had been almost entirely thrown into the hands of foreigners. The merchants of the Hanse towns loudly exclaimed against this "new measure;" but Warwick and his friends—this at least is to their credit—were firm, and a very sensible improvement in the English spirit of industry was the immediate consequence.

Is it to look too curiously into public cause and effect to ask whether our present high commercial fortune may not be greatly owing to this very measure, though nearly three centuries have since elapsed?

But Warwick could not long confine his turbulent and eager spirit to the noble and peaceable triumphs of the patriot. Self was his earthly deity. The title and the vast estate of the earldom of Northumberland were at this time in abeyance, owing to the last earl dying without issue, and his brother, sir Thomas Percy, having been attainted of treason. Of these vast estates, together with the title of duke of Northumberland, Warwick now possessed himself and he procured for his friend lord St. John the title of marquess of Winchester, and for sir William Herbert that of earl of Pembroke.

Northumberland's complete triumph and vast acquisitions could not but be very distasteful to Somerset, who not only cherished the most violent intentions towards him, but was even stung into the imprudence of avowing them in the presence of some of his intimate attendants, among whom was sir Thomas Palmer, who appeared to have been placed in his service as a mere spy of Northumberland's. Somerset, his duchess, and several of their friends and attendants, were suddenly arrested; and Somerset was accused of high treason and felony; the former crime as having prepared for insurrection, the latter as having intended to assassinate Northumberland, Northampton, and Percevole.

The marquess of Winchester, the friend, almost the mere follower of Northumberland, was appointed high steward, and presided at the trial of Somerset; and of the twenty-seven peers who made the jury, three were Northumberland, Northampton, and Pembroke, the very men whom he had threatened! He was acquitted of treason, but found guilty of felony, to the great grief of the people, among whom Somerset was now popular.

A.D. 1552.—As it was not to be supposed that a mild and toward young prince like Edward VI. would easily, if at all, be brought to turn a deaf ear to his uncle's solicitation for mercy, great care was taken by Northumberland to prevent all access to the king of the friends of Somerset; and that unhappy nobleman after all his services as regent, and after his almost paternal goodness as guardian of the king's person, was executed on Tower-hill; the grieved people dipping their handkerchiefs in his blood as mementos of his martyrdom. His friends sir Thomas Arundel, Michael Stanhope, Miles Farbridge, and Ralph Vane were also executed; Paget, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, was deprived of his office and of the garter, and fined 6000*l*; and lord Rich, the chancellor, was also deprived of office for the crime of being the friend of Somerset, whose chief faults seem to have been an overweening ambition, co-existing with rather less than more than the average anga-city and firmness of those who take the lead in troublous and unsettled times.

A.D. 1553.—A new session of parliament was held immediately after the execution of Somerset, in which several regulations were made that were calculated to advance the cause of the reformation. But the commons having refused to pass a bill of deprivation against the universally respected Tonsal, bishop of Durham, a new parliament was summoned; and to secure one favourable to his views Northumberland caused the king, certainly, and most probably the majority of the councillors and peers, to recommend particular gentlemen to be sent up for particular counties. The parliament, thus conveniently composed, readily confirmed the deprivation arbitrarily pronounced upon Tonsal, and two bishoprics were created out of that of Durham—the rich regalities of that see being conferred upon Northumberland himself. Insatiable, utterly insatiable, Northumberland now got the king to bestow the dukedom of Suffolk upon the marquess of Dorset; and having persuaded the new duke to give his daughter, the lady Jane Grey, in marriage to Northumberland's fourth son, the lord Guildford Dudley, next proceeded to persuade Edward, who was in an infirm condition, to pass by his sisters Mary and Elizabeth, both of whom had been pronounced illegitimate, and the former of whom as well as the young queen of Scots was a papist, and to set the crown on the marchioness of Dorset (a duchess of Suffolk) whose heiress was the lady Jane Grey. By a variety of arguments, some of which were both specious and solid, but all of which, as proceeding from so ambitious a man, ought to have been looked upon with suspicion, Northumberland prevailed upon the young king. It was in vain that the judges and the most eminent law officers protested against being compelled to draw out a patent; it was in vain they urged that they would subject themselves to the pains and penalties of treason should they do so; Northumberland gave Montague, chief justice of common pleas, the lie; swore he would fight any man in his shirt who should deny the justice of lady Jane's succession; and was so successful that the crown was accordingly settled upon lady Jane; her mother, the duchess of Suffolk, very willingly allowing herself to be passed by.

This patent was by many looked upon as the death-warrant of Edward VI. signed by himself. His health daily grew worse, and his physicians being dismissed in favour of some ignorant woman, her quack medicines brought on symptoms at once fatal and very symptomatic of poison, and he died in the 16th year of his age and the seventh of his reign.

The whole life and reign of this prince were spent literally in statu pupillari; but so far as he could in such a state manifest his disposition, he seems fully to have deserved the affection with which even to this day he is spoken of.

CHAPTER XLIV.

The Reign of Mary.

A.D. 1553.—THE artful precautions taken by Northumberland to secure the throne to his young and accomplished daughter-in-law, by no means rendered the success of the project—for which he had certainly toiled and dared much, and for which, we fear, he had staked no little—so secure as at first sight it might seem. In the first place, young Edward's reign had been so short and so completely a reign of tutelage, that his will had none of that force with the multitude which was possessed by the will of his bluff and iron-handed father. Henry VIII. had, it is true, bastardised both his daughters, but he had subsequently restored them to the succession; and the people were too much accustomed to regarding Mary as the rightful successor to Edward, in the event of his dying without issue, to allow of the almost dying act of the young king speedily changing their opinion and directing their loyalty to the lady Jane. Again, the catholics, far more numerous secretly than might be imagined, were to a man partisans of Mary; and if the protestants had some misgivings, founded on her known bigotry in favour of her own faith, they yet feared even the bigot far less than the lady Jane, who, as they well knew, could be and would be a mere puppet in the hands of Northumberland, who by this time had contrived to render himself at once the most powerful, the most dreaded, and the most detested man in the whole nation. And it is worthy of observation also, that so nearly balanced were the partisans of the respective religions, that each stood in dread of the other.

But Northumberland was far too wily a personage to be ignorant of the weight which, with the majority of the people, detestation of himself and respect for the memory of Henry VIII. would have in deciding between the princess Mary and the lady Jane. When, therefore, he perceived that the speedy death of Edward was inevitable, Northumberland caused the princesses Mary and Elizabeth to be sent for, as though the young king had been desirous of seeing them. Mary had reached Huddesdon in Hertfordshire, only about seventeen miles from London, when the king died. Northumberland, anxious to get her into his power, gave orders that the melancholy event should be kept a secret; but the earl of Arundel sent her warning of Northumberland's deceit and probable designs, and she hastily retreated to the retired fishing town of Framlingham, in Suffolk, whence she sent letters to the council and to the principal nobility, informing them of her knowledge of her brother's death, promising indemnity to all who had thus far aided in concealing it, but calling upon them forthwith to proclaim her as queen. While thus active in asserting her right, she carefully provided, also, for her flight into Flanders, in the event of her efforts proving unsuccessful.

When Northumberland found that Edward's death was known to the rightful queen, he at once threw off all disguise. Lord and the lady Jane Dudley were at this time residing at Sion House; and Northumberland, with James' father, the earl of Pembroke, and other noblemen, approached her with all the form and respect due from subjects to their sovereign. Young, gifted with singular talents for literature, and with a scarcely less singular propension towards literary pursuits, Jane viewed the throne in its true light as a dangerous and an uneasy eminence. Even now when her father, her still more powerful and dreaded father-in-law, and the very chiefest men of the kingdom, with all the emblems of state, pressed her to assume the authority of queen, she recoiled from it as from an evil of the first magnitude. Her husband, though, like herself, but little more than sixteen years of age, had been but too skillfully tutored by his wily father, and he seconded that ambitious man's entreaties so well that, overcome though not convinced, the unfortunate Jane consented. She was immediately escorted to the Tower, the usual residence of the English sovereigns on their first accession; and Northumberland took care that she should be accompanied thither, not only by his known and fast friends, but also by the whole of the councillors, whom he thus, in effect, made prisoners and hostages for the adhesion of their absent friends. Orders were now issued to proclaim queen Jane throughout the kingdom, but it was only in London, where Northumberland's authority was as yet too firm to be openly resisted, that the orders were obeyed. And even in London the majority listened to the proclamation in a sullen and ominous silence. Some openly scoffed at Jane's pretensions, and one unfortunate boy, who was a vintner's servant, was severely punished for even this verbal, and perhaps unreasoning opposition to the will of the haughty Northumberland.

While the people of London were thus cool towards their nominal queen, and even the protestants listened without conviction to the preaching of Ridley and other eminent protestant churchmen in her favour, Mary in her retreat in Suffolk was actively and ably exerting herself for the protection of her birthright. She was surrounded by eminent and influential men with their levies of tenants or hired adherents; and as she strongly and repeatedly professed her determination not to infringe the laws of her brother with respect to religion, even the protestants throughout Suffolk, equally with the catholics, were enthusiastic in her cause. Nor was the feeling in favour of Mary exhibited merely in her own neighbourhood, or among those who might be called her personal friends. Northumberland commissioned sir Edward Haatings, brother of the earl of Huntingdon, to levy men in Buckinghamshire on behalf of Jane. Sir William executed the commission with great readiness and success as far as related to levying the war; but he no sooner found himself at the head of a force of nearly four thousand strong than he marched to the aid of Mary. With the marine the duke was not more fortunate than with the land forces; a fleet was sent by him to cruise off the Suffolk coast, to cut Mary off from her retreat to Flanders, should she attempt it, and was driven by stress of weather into Yarmouth, where it immediately declared in favour of Mary.

Perplexed and alarmed, Northumberland yet determined not to give up the grand prize without a stout effort for its preservation. He determined to remain with Jane at the Tower, and to commit the command of the troops he had levied to her father. But the imprisoned councillors, clearly understanding both their own position and his, astutely persuaded him that he alone was fit to head the forces upon which so much depended, and they, at the same time, successfully worked upon the fears of Jane on behalf of her father. The councillors were the more successful in persuading Northumberland to the almost suicidal act of taking the command of the troops, because while he naturally felt great confidence in his own well-tryed valour and ability, he was well aware of the inferiority of Suffolk in the latter respect at least.

Northumberland, accordingly, set out to combat the forces of the enemy, and was taken leave of by the councillors with every expression of attachment and of confidence of his success; and Arundel, his bitterest enemy, was by no means the least profuse of these expressions. Scarcely, however, had Northumberland marched out of London ere he perceived a boding and chilling sullenness among all ranks of men; and he remarked to lord Grey, who accompanied him, "Many come out to look at our array, indeed, but I find not one who cries 'God speed your enterprise!'"

Arrived at Bury St. Edmund's, the duke found that his army did not greatly exceed six thousand men, while the lowest reports of the opposite force gave double that number. Aware of the immense importance of the event of the first encounter, Northumberland resolved to delay his proposed attack, and sent an express to the councillors to send him a large and instant reinforcement. But the councillors had no sooner received the duke's express than they left the Tower, on the pretext of obeying his order; and assembled at Baynard's castle, the house of Penbrooke, to deliberate not upon the means of aiding Northumberland, but upon the best means of throwing off his yoke, and of dethroning the puppet queen he had set over them. Arundel, whom Northumberland had with a most unaccountable weakness left behind, expatiated warmly and eloquently upon all Northumberland's vices and evil deeds, and exhorted the others, as the only just or even prudent course, to join him in at once throwing their weight into the scale of Mary, and thus ensuring not merely her pardon for their past involuntary offences, but also her favour for their present and prompt loyalty. Penbrooke warmly applauded the advice of Arundel, and, laying his hand upon his sword, expressed his readiness to fight on the instant any man who should pretend to oppose it. The mayor and aldermen of London being sent for to attend this conference, showed the utmost alacrity to proclaim Mary, and the proclamation was accordingly made amidst the most rapturous applauses of the populace. The reign of Jane, if a lonely and anxious confinement in this Tower for ten days could be called a reign, was now at an end; and she retired to her private residence and private station with a readiness as great as the reluctances she had shown to quit them.

The councillors having thus completely beaten Northumberland in his chief or only stronghold, sent messengers to demand that he should lay down his arms, disband his troops, and submit himself to the mercy of his rightful sovereign queen Mary. The message was needless; Northumberland, receiving no reinforcement from London, saw the utter impossibility of resisting the hourly increasing force of Mary, and finding himself fast deserted by his handful of foreigners, had already himself proclaimed queen Mary with as much apparent heartiness and zeal, as though he had not aimed at her crown—and probably her life.

Mary, on receiving the submission and hypocritical adhesion of Northumberland, set out for London. Her progress was one loud and unbroken triumph. Everywhere she was met by multitudes of the people invoking blessings upon her; her sister, the lady Elizabeth, met her at the head of a thousand well-appointed horse, and when she reached the Tower, she found that even Suffolk had thrown open its gates and declared himself in her favour. All circumstances considered, there is scarcely an instance in history to equal this in the facility with which a rightful princess of no amiable character, and opposed to a large portion of her subjects in religion, vanquished the opposition of so wily, so daring, and so accomplished a pre-usrper as Northumberland.

Mercy was assuredly not the characteristic of Mary, but the utmost infatuation of mercy could not have allowed offences so gross as those of Northumberland to pass unpunished. Mary gave orders for his arrest, and, whether from being utterly broken-spirited by his ill success, or from sheer willingness and a lingering hope of saving at least his life, he fell on his knees to his bitter enemy Arundel, who arrested him, and implored mercy. His sons, the earl of Warwick and the lords Ambrose and Henry Dudley, and his brother sir Andrew Dudley, were at the same time committed to custody; as were the marquess of Northampton, the earl of Huntingdon, sir Thomas Palmer, and sir John Gates. On further enquiry a id consideration, the queen's advisers found it necessary to confine the duke of Suffolk, lord Guildford Dudley, and his innocent and unfortunate wife, the lady

Jane. At this early period of her reign policy overcame Mary's natural propensity to cruelty and sternness. The councillors, pleading their constraint by Northumberland, were speedily liberated, and even Suffolk himself was not excluded from this act of mingled justice and mercy. Northumberland, sir Thomas Palmer, and sir John Gates were brought to trial. The duke's offence was too clear and flagrant to admit of any elaborate defence; but he asked the peers whether they could possibly pronounce a man guilty of treason who had obeyed orders under the great seal, and whether persons who had been involved in his alleged guilt could be allowed to sit in judgment upon him? The answer to each question was obvious. In reply to the first, he was told that the great seal of an usurper could have no authority; to the second, that persons not having any sentence of attain against them were clearly qualified to sit on any jury. Northumberland then pleaded guilty, and he, with sir Thomas Palmer and sir John Gates were executed. At the scaffold Northumberland professed to die in the catholic faith, and assured the bystanders that they would never prosper until the catholic religion should be restored to all its authority among them. Considering the whole character of Northumberland and the indifference he had always shown to disputes of faith, it is but too probable that even in these his dying words he was insincere, and used them to engage the mercy of the queen, whose bigotry they might fatter towards his unfortunate family. Upon the people his advice wrought no effect. Many looked upon the preparations for his death merely with a cold un pitying sternness, still more shouted to him to remember Somerset, and some even held up to him handkerchiefs incruented with the blood of that nobleman, and exulted, rather like fends than men, that his hour of a like bloody doom was at length arrived.

Lord Guildford Dudley and the lady Jane were also condemned to death, but their youth and, perhaps, Mary's feeling of the impolicy of extreme severity to criminals who had so evidently offended under the constraint and tutelage of Northumberland, saved them for the present—alas! only for the present!

The reign of Mary contains so little upon which the historian can bestow even negative praise, that it is pleasing to be able to remark that the very earliest portion of her reign, if stained with the bloodshed of a necessary justice, was also marked by some acts of justice and gratitude. When she arrived at the Tower of London and made her triumphant entry into that fortress, the duke of Norfolk, who had been in prison from the close of the reign of Henry VIII., Courtney, son of the marquess of Exeter, who ever since his father's attainder had been in the same confinement, though when he entered it he was a mere child and there was no shadow of a charge against him, with bishops Gardiner, Bonner, and Tostall, were allowed to meet her on the Tower green, where they fell upon their knees before her, and implored her grace and protection. They were restored to liberty immediately; Norfolk's attainder was removed as having been ad origine null and invalid, and Courtney was made earl of Devonshire. Gardiner, Bonner, and Tostall were reappointed to their sees by a commission which was appointed to review their trial and condemnation; and Day, Heath, and Vesy recovered their sees by the same means.

The queen's zeal for the catholic religion now begun to show itself. Holgate, archbishop of York, Croydale, to whom the reformation owed so much, Ridley, Hooper, and Latimer, were speedily thrown into prison; and the bishops and priests were exhorted and encouraged to revive the mass, though the laws against it were still in un-repealed force. Judge Hales, who had so well and zealously defended the right of the princess Mary when her brother desired him to draw the patent which was to exclude her from the throne, opposed the illegal practices which queen Mary now sanctioned. All his former merits were forgotten in this new proof of his genuine and uncompromising honesty; he was thrown into prison, and there treated with such merciless cruelty and insult, that he lost his senses and committed suicide.

It will be remembered that the zeal of the men of Suffolk, during Mary's retreat at Framlingham, was stimulated by her pointed and repeated assurances that she would in no wise alter the laws of her brother Edward, as to religion. These simple and honest men, seeing the gross partiality and tyranny by which the queen now sought to depress the protestants, ventured to remind her of her former promises. Their remonstrance was received as though it had been some monstrous and seditious matter, and one of them continuing his address with a somewhat uncourtly pertinacity was placed in the pillory for his pains.

Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, was by the change of sovereigns placed in a most perilous position. It is true that during the life of Henry VIII. Cranmer had often and zealously exerted himself to prevent that monarch's rage from being felt by the princess Mary. But Mary's gratitude as a woman was but little security against her bigotry as a religionist; and any services that Cranmer had rendered her were likely enough to be forgotten, in consideration of the discouragements he had dealt to her religion in his character of champion as well as child of the reformation. Nothing, probably, could have saved Cranmer but utter silence and resignation of his see, or immediate emigration. But Cranmer was too hearty and sincere in his love of the reformed religion, and, perhaps, was also too confident of its success, even now that Rome was backed by the power and zeal of the queen, to be in anywise minded for craven silence or retreat. His enemies perceiving that as yet he had met with no signal affront or injury from the queen, spread a report that he owed his safety and probable favour to his having promised to say mass before Mary. Situated as Cranmer was, it would have been his wisest plan to have listened to this insulting report with contemptuous silence, and to have relied upon his well earned character to refute the calumny to all whose judgment was of any real consequence. But the archbishop thought otherwise, and he hastened to publish a manifesto in which he gave the most unqualified contradiction to the report. Nay, he did not stop even here; not content with vindicating himself he entered more generally into the matter, and thus gave his enemies that very handle against him which they so eagerly wished for. He said, after contradicting the charge, that "as the devil was a liar from the beginning, and the father of lies, he had at this time stirred up his servants to persecute Christ and his true religion; that this infernal spirit was now endeavouring to restore the Latin satisfactory masses, a thing of his own invention and device; and, in order to effect his purpose, had falsely made use of his, Cranmer's name and authority;" and Cranmer added, that "the mass is not only without foundation in either the scriptures or the practice of the primitive church, but likewise discovers a plain contradiction to antiquity and the inspired writings, and is, besides, replete with many horrid blasphemies."

However much we may admire the general character of Cranmer—though it was by no means without its blemishes—it is impossible for the most zealous and sincere protestants to deny that, under the circumstances of the nation, many of the passages we have quoted were grossly offensive; and equally impossible is it to deny that under Cranmer's own personal circumstances they were as grossly and gratuitously impolitic. His enemies eagerly availed themselves of his want of temper or of policy, and used this really coarse and inflammatory paper as a means by which to induce the queen to throw him into prison for the share he had in the usurpation of the lady Jane, about which he otherwise would probably have remained unquestioned. Merely as the protestant archbishop, Cranmer had more than enough of enemies in the house of peers to ensure his being found guilty, and he was sentenced to death on the charge of high treason. He was not, however, as might have been expected, immediately and upon this sentence put to death, but committed back to close custody, where he was kept, as will soon be seen, for a still more cruel doom.

Every day made it more and more evident that the protestants had nothing to expect but the utmost severity of persecution, and many even of the most eminent of their preachers began to look abroad and to exile for safety. Peter Martyr, who in the late prosperity of the reformers had been formally and with much pressing invited to England, now applied to the council for permission to return to his own country. At first the council seemed much inclined to refuse compliance with this reasonable request. But Gardiner, with a spirit which makes us the more regret that bigotry ever induced him to act less generously, represented that as Peter had been invited to England by the government, his departure could not be opposed without the utmost national disgrace. Nor did Gardiner's generosity end here; having obtained Peter's permission to leave the realm, he supplied him with money to travel with. The bones of Peter Martyr's wife were shortly afterwards torn from the grave at Oxford, and buried in a dunghill; and the university of Cambridge about the same time disgraced itself by exhuming the bones of Bucer and Pagius, two eminent foreign reformers who had been buried there in the late reign. John à Lasco and his congregation were now ordered to depart the kingdom, and most of the foreign protestants took so significant a hint and followed them; by which the country was deprived of its most skillful and industrious artisans just as they were giving a useful and extensive impulse to its manufactures. The temper manifested by the court, and the sudden departure of the foreign protestants, greatly alarmed the protestants in general; and many of the English of that communion followed the example set them by their foreign brethren, and fled from a land which every thing seemed to threaten with the most terrible and speedy troubles.

The meeting of parliament by no means improved the prospects of the protestants. It has already been remarked that, however completely the reformation might have seemed to be triumphant, there was something like a moiety, at least, of the nation that was still in heart attached to the old faith. To these the court could add as practical friends that large body which in all times and in all countries is ready to side with the dominant party; there was consequently no difficulty experienced in getting such men returned to parliament as would be pliant tools in the hands of Mary and her ministers. To the dismay of the protestants, though it would be to impeach their sagacity should we say that it was to their surprise also, parliament was opened not by prayer after the reformed ordinance, but by the celebration of mass in the Latin tongue. Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, more sincere, or at all events more courageous than some of his brethren, honestly refused to kneel at this mass, and was in consequence very rudely assailed by some of the catholic zealots, and at length actually thrust from the house.

After following the good example of the parliament of the last reign in passing an act by which all law of treason was limited to the statute of Edward III. and all law of felony to the law as it stood before (1 Henry VIII.) the parliament pronounced the queen legitimate, annulled the divorce pronounced by Cranmer between Catherine of Aragon and Henry VIII., and severely censured Cranmer on account of that divorce. It is a little singular that even the acute

UP TO THIS PERIOD DOMESTIC ARCHITECTURE HAD BEEN SCARCELY CONSIDERED; BETWEEN THE CASTLE AND THE HUT THERE WAS NO MEDIUM.

Hame has not noticed the inconsistency with which Mary by the vote of her parliament, which in reality was her vote as the members were her mere creatures, denied the infallibility and upset the decision of that holy see, the infallibility of which she prescribed to her subjects on pain of the stake and the tar barrel!

Continuing in the same hopeful course, the parliament now at one fell swoop, and by a single vote, repealed all those statutes of king Edward with respect to religion, which Mary had again and again, and sometimes even voluntarily, said that nothing should induce her to disturb! Dicers' oaths and lovers' vows are not more frail than the promises of a bigot!

Mary, who even in her first youth had no feminine beauty to boast, was considerably above thirty years of age, indeed fast approaching to forty—that decline of life to even the most brilliant personal charms—when she ascended the throne; and when her parliament showed its anxiety as to her marriage she herself appeared to be fully as anxious. Courtney, son of the marquis of Exeter, whom she liberated from the Tower at her accession and created earl of Devon, was at that time a very young man, and possessed not only great perfection of manly beauty, but also, despite his long and dreary imprisonment, all those graces and accomplishments which are so rarely to be acquired elsewhere than at court. The queen was so favourably impressed by his manners and appearance, that she formed the idea of raising him to the dignity of her husband; and as her situation would have rendered any advances on his part presumptuous, she not only showed him all possible personal distinction, but even caused official hints to be given to him of the favour with which he might hope for his highest aspirations being received. But Courtney was young and romantic, and Mary was not only disagreeable in face and figure, and repulsive in manner, but was also very nearly old enough to be his mother, and he showed not the slightest intention of profiting by the amorous condescension of his sovereign. Enraged that he should neglect her, she was still more enraged when she discovered that he was a close attendant upon her sister Elizabeth, then in her first flush of youth. The parliament, by annulling the divorce of Mary's mother, had virtually pronounced Elizabeth's illegitimacy; and as Mary on discovering Courtney's partiality to that princess exhibited extreme annoyance and laid her under great restriction, Elizabeth's friends began to be seriously alarmed for even her personal safety, especially as her attachment to the reformed religion could not fail to increase the hatred called down upon her by the attachment of Courtney to herself.

Despairing of making any impression upon the youthful fancy of the earl of Devon, Mary now bestowed a passing glance at the graver and more elderly attractions of the cardinal Pole. It is true he was a cardinal, but he had never taken priest's orders. He was a man of high character for wisdom and humanity, and yet had suffered much for his attachment to the catholic church, of which on the death of pope Paul III., he had nearly obtained the highest honour; and his mother, that old countess of Salisbury who was so brutally beheaded by order of Henry VIII., had been a most kind and beloved governess to Mary in her girlhood. But the cardinal was somewhat too far advanced in life to please Mary, and it was, moreover, hinted to her by her friends, that he was now too long habituated to a quiet and studious life to be able to reconcile himself to the glitter and bustle of the court. But though she rejected Pole as a husband, she resolved to have the benefit of his abilities as a minister, and she accordingly sent assurances to Pope Julius III. of her anxious desire to reconcile her kingdom to the holy see, and requested that cardinal Pole might be appointed legate to arrange that important business.

Charles V., the emperor, who but a few years before was master of all Germany, had recently met with severe reverses both in Germany and France, in which latter country he was so obstinately resisted by the duke of Guise, that he was at length obliged to retire with the remnant of his dispirited army into the Low Countries. Far seeing and ambitious, Charles no sooner heard of the accession of Mary to the throne of England, than he formed the design of making the gain of that kingdom compensate for the losses he had sustained in Germany. His son Philip was a widower, and though he was only twenty-seven years of age, and eleven years Mary's junior, the emperor determined to demand her hand for his son, and sent over an agent for that purpose. If Mary had looked with favour upon Courtney's person, and had felt a passing attachment excited by the mental endowments of cardinal Pole, Philip had the double recommendation of being a zealous catholic, and of her mother's family. Thus actuated by bigotry and by family feeling, and being, moreover, by no means disinclined to matrimony, Mary gladly entertained the proposal, and was seconded by the advice not only of Norfolk, Arundel, and Paget, but also of Gardiner, whose years, wisdom, and the prosecutions he had endured for catholicism had given him the greatest possible authority in her opinion. Gardiner, at the same time, strongly and wisely dissuaded the queen from further proceeding in her enterprise of making innovations in religion. He well observed that an alliance with Spain was already more than sufficiently unpopular; that the parliament, amidst all its complaisance and evident desire to make all reasonable concessions to the personal wishes and feelings of the sovereign, nevertheless had lately shown strong unwillingness to make any farther concession to Rome. He argued, too, that whereas any precipitate measures in religion just at this time would greatly, perhaps even fatally, increase the popular prejudice against the Spanish alliance, that alliance when once brought about would, contrariwise, enable the queen, unresisted, to work her own will in the other and far more important measure. To the emperor Gardiner transmitted the same reasonings, with the additional hint that it was necessary that, ostensibly or temporarily at least, the terms and conditions of the marriage should be such as to secure the favour of the English populace, by appearing to be even more than fairly favourable to English interests. The emperor, who had a very high opinion of Pole's sagacity and judgment, not only assented to all that he advised, but even enforced his advice as to religious moderation, at least for that time, in his own private letters to Mary. He even went still farther; for being informed that Pole, the sincerity and fervour of whose religious zeal not unfrequently triumphed over his great natural humanity, had sent Mary advice to proceed with rigour against open heresy, the emperor detained Pole at the town of Dillinghen, on the Danube, as he was on his way to England, lest his presence should prevent Mary from following his more pacific and politic counsel.

The parliament having openly expressed a dislike of Mary's proposed marriage with a son of Spain, was dismissed, and Mary's ministers had orders to press the match on to a conclusion. The convocation, which had been summoned at the same time as the parliament, was not contented with a general profession and exhibition of its attachment to the new order of things that Mary had so rapidly introduced, but the catholic part of it boldly volunteered to put the capital article between them and the catholics, transubstantiation, into dispute. The protestants argued, but could rarely be heard, through the clamour raised by their adversaries, who finally, being the majority, complacently voted that they had clearly and decidedly triumphed. This triumph—at least of voices and numbers, if not of fair argument—so elated the Romanists, that they soon after renewed the dispute at Oxford, and as if to show how secure they held themselves to be of the victory, they caused Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley to be conveyed thither under a guard to take their parts in the debate, which ended, as may be anticipated, in the complete verbal triumph of the catholics.

A. D. 1564.—The complaisance of the parliament, and the formal debates on religion that had been initiated by Romanist members of convocation, were merely prelusive to still farther and more sweeping alterations in religion, which were made in defiance of all that the emperor and the astute Gardiner could urge to the contrary. It is true—and the fact confirms what we have more than once said as to the wide difference between the apparent and the real number of protestants existing during the two previous reigns—the mere connivance of government had in most parts of England sufficed to encourage the people to set aside the reformation in the most important particulars. But after the dismissal of parliament, the new regulations of Mary, or rather her new enactments of old abuses, were every where, openly, and by formal authority, carried into execution. Mass was re-established, three-fourths of the clergymen, being attached to reformed principles, were turned out of their livings, and replaced by zealous or seemingly zealous Romanists, and marriage was once again declared to be incompatible with the holding of any sacred office. The oath of supremacy was enjoined by the unrepealed law of Henry VIII., but it was an instruction to a commission which the queen now authorized to see to the more perfect and speedy re-establishment of mass and the other ancient rites, that clergymen should strictly be prohibited from taking the oath of supremacy on entering benefices.

While Mary was thus busied in preparing the way for laying her kingdom once more at the feet of the haughty pontiffs of Rome, the discontents thus caused were still farther increased by the fears, some well founded and some vague, but no less powerful on that account, excited in the public mind on account of the Spanish match. On the part of the court, in compliance with the sagacious advice of Gardiner, great care was taken to insert nothing in the marriage articles, which were published; that could at all fairly be deemed unfavourable to England.

Thus it was stipulated, that though the title of king should be accorded to Philip, the administration should be entirely in the queen; that no office whatever in the kingdom should be tenable by a foreigner; that English laws, customs and privileges should remain unaltered; that the queen should not be taken abroad by Philip without her own consent, nor any of her children without that of the nobility; that a jointure of sixty thousand pounds should be securely settled upon the queen; that the male issue, if any, of the marriage should inherit not only England, but also Burgundy and the Low Countries in any case, and that in the case of the death of Don Carlos, son of Philip, such male issue of Philip and Mary should also inherit Spain, Sicily, Milan, and all other the dominions of Philip.

Every day's experience serves to show that it is quite possible to carry policy too far, and to cause the sincerity of concession to be suspected from its very excess. If we may suppose that men so sagacious as the emperor and Gardiner were rendered by their anxiety temporarily forgetful of this truth, the public murmuring very speedily reminded them of it. The people, with that intuitive sagacity which seems the special provision for the safety of the unlettered multitude, analogous to the instinct of the lower animals, exclaimed that the emperor, in his greedy and tyrannous anxiety to obtain possession of so rich yet hated a country as heretical England, would doubtless accede to any terms. As a papist and a Spaniard he would promise anything now, with the full determination of revoking every thing the moment he should have concluded the desired match; and the more favourable, argued the people, the terms now published were to England, the greater the probability that the emperor and his son would revoke them at the very first opportunity, if, indeed, they were not already provided with secret articles authorizing them to do so. To the fraud and ambition of the emperor the popular report said that Philip added sullenness, haughtiness, cruelty, and a domineering disposition peculiarly his own. That the death of the emperor would put Philip in possession of his father's dominions was clear; the people assumed it to be equally so that England would from that moment become a mere province of Spain; that Englishmen equally with the other subjects of Spain would then be subjected to all the tender mercies of the Inquisition, and that the Spanish alliance and the utter ruin of England and enslaving of all Englishmen were but different terms and formula in which to enunciate the same thing.

To a people already discontented, as the protestants of England were, with the recent and sudden changes made in religious affairs, such arguments as these could not be addressed with any art or industry without being productive of great effect. Every day increased the general dislike of the people to the Spanish match. The more prudent, even those who in principle were not so deeply and sincerely opposed to the contemplated marriage, did not, indeed, see that the mere anticipation of evil to come, and an anticipation, too, which was quite opposed to the avowed purposes of the emperor and Philip, could warrant an open resistance. But the reasonable and the just are seldom the majority where either the feelings or the interests of mankind are very much aroused and appealed to; and a few men of some note were soon found to place themselves at the head of the discontented, with the avowed intention of appealing to arms rather than allowing themselves to become the bond-slaves of the Spaniard. Had France at this critical juncture taken advantage of Mary's difficulties and want of popularity, it is very probable that her reign would have ended here, and that her memory would have been saved from the indelible stains of much and loathsome cruelty. But the king of France, though at war with Philip, would lend no aid to an English insurrection. Perhaps he felt that Mary, aided as she was certain to be by Spain, would surely put down any attempts at insurrection, in which case she, of course, would aid the emperor against France; and to this motive we may not unreasonably be supposed to have added that feeling for the rights of sovereignty over subjects, which even the hostility of sovereigns can rarely banish from their hearts. From whatever motives, however, the king of France did refuse to aid the English in their proposed resistance to their sovereign's alliance with Philip of Spain. But this did not damp the enthusiasm of the leading opponents of the Spanish alliance. Sir Thomas Wyatt offered to raise and head the malcontents of Kent, and Sir Peter Carew those of Devonshire; and they persuaded the duke of Suffolk to raise the midland counties, by assuring him that their chief object was to re-invest the lady Jane with the crown. A time was fixed for the simultaneous action of these leaders; and had the compact been punctually kept, it is more than probable that the enterprise would have been fully successful. But sir Peter Carew, in his exceeding eagerness, rose before the appointed time, and being, in consequence, unsupported by Wyatt and the duke of Suffolk, was beaten at the first onset by the earl of Bedford, and with difficulty made his escape to France. Suffolk, on hearing of Carew's failure and flight, left town, accompanied by his brothers, lord Thomas and sir Leonard Gray, and proceeded to the counties of Warwick and Leicester, where his chief influence lay. But he was hotly pursued by a party of horse under the earl of Huntingdon, and being overtaken before he could raise sufficient force for resistance, was obliged to disperse his few followers and conceal himself. Accident or treachery soon discovered his hiding place, and he was sent under an escort to London. Wyatt, in the meantime, raised the standard of revolt at Maidstone, in Kent, where he issued a passionate proclamation, inviting the people to aid him in removing evil councillors from about the queen, and to prevent the utter ruin of the nation which must needs follow the completion of the Spanish match. Great numbers of persons joined him, and among them some catholics, as he had dexterously omitted from his proclamation all mention of religion. The duke of Norfolk, at the head of the queen's guards and some other troops, reinforced by five hundred Londoners under the command of Brett, marched against the revolted and came up with them at Rochester. Here sir George Harper, who had been with Wyatt, pretended to desert to the duke, but quickly returned to Wyatt, carrying with him Brett and his Londoners, upon whom sir George's eloquence so wrought, that they professed their preference of death to aiding in the enslavement of their country. Norfolk, fearing that this desertion might mislead the rest of his force, now retreated, and Wyatt marched to Southwark, whence he sent to demand that the Tower should be placed in his hands, that the queen should free the nation from all terror of Spanish tyranny by marrying an Englishman, and that four councillors should forthwith be placed in his hands as hostages for the performance of these conditions.

While Wyatt was wasting his time in sending this demand and awaiting a reply, Norfolk had secured London bridge, and had taken effectual steps to overawe the Londoners and prevent them from joining Wyatt. Perceiving his error when too late, Wyatt now marched to Kingston, where he crossed the river, and made his way unresisted into Westminster. Here, however, his followers rapidly deserted him, and he was encountered and seized in the Strand, near Temple-bar, by sir Maurice Berkeley. Vast numbers of the deluded countrymen were at the same time seized, and as the queen's rage was proportioned to the fear and peril to which she had been subjected, the executions that followed were horribly numerous. It is said, that not less than four hundred of the captured wretches were put to death in cold blood; four hundred more were condemned, but being led before the queen with halters on their necks, they knelt to her and implored her grace, which was granted. Wyatt, the prime mover of this revolt, was executed, as a matter of course. On the scaffold he took care to exonerate, in the most unequivocal terms, from all participation or even knowledge of his proceedings the lady Elizabeth and the earl of Devon, whom Mary's jealous hatred had endeavoured to connect with this ill-starred and ill-managed revolt. They were both seized and strictly examined by the council, but Wyatt's manly and precise declaration defeated whatever intent there might have been to employ false witnesses to convict them with his rash proceedings. But though Mary was thus prevented from proceeding to the last extremity against them, she sent Elizabeth under strict surveillance to Woodstock, and the earl of Devon to Potheringay castle. To Elizabeth, indeed, immediate release was offered, on condition of her accepting the hand of the duke of Savoy, and thus relieving her sister from her presence in the kingdom; but Elizabeth knew how to "hide her time," and she quietly, but positively, refused the proffered alliance.

All this time lord Guildford Dudley and the lady Jane had remained imprisoned, but unmolested and unnoticed. The time which had elapsed without any proceedings being taken against them, beyond their mere confinement, led every one to suppose that their youth, and the obvious restraint under which they had acted, had determined Mary not to punish them beyond imprisonment, and that she would terminate even that when she safely could do so. But the imprudent, nay, the situation of his daughter and her husband being considered, the wicked connection of the duke of Suffolk with Wyatt's revolt, aroused in Mary that suspicion which was no less fatal to its objects than her bigotry. Jane now anew appeared to her in the character of a competitor for the throne. That she was not wilfully so, that she was so closely confided that she could not by any possibility correspond with the disaffected, were arguments to which Mary attached no importance. To her it was enough that this innocent creature, even now a mere girl and wishing for nothing so much as the quiet and studious moral life in which her earlier girlhood had been passed, might possibly be made the pretext for future revolt. The lord Guildford Dudley and lady

Jane were, consequently, warned that the day was fixed for their execution. Subsequently the queen bestowed the cruel mercy of a reprieve for three days, on the plea that she did not wish, while inflicting bodily death on Jane, to peril her eternal salvation. The unhappy lady was, therefore, during the short remnant of her life importuned and annoyed by catholic priests, who were sent by the queen to endeavour to convert her to their faith. But she skillfully and coolly need all the arguments then in use to defend the reformed faith, and even wrote a Greek letter to her sister, adjuring her to persevere in the true faith, whatever perils might environ her.

It was at first intended to behead both the prisoners at the same time and on the same scaffold. On reflection, motives of policy caused the queen to alter this determination; and it was ordered that the lord Guildford should first be executed on Tower-hill, and the lady Jane shortly afterwards within the precincts of the Tower, where she was confined.

On the morning appointed for this double murder, lord Guildford sent to his young and unfortunate wife, and requested an interview to take an earthly farewell; but Jane, with a more masculine and self-possessed prudence, declined it, on the ground that their approaching fate required the full attention of each, and that their brief and bloody separation on earth would be followed by an eternal union. From her prison window the lady Jane saw her youthful husband led out to execution, and shortly afterwards saw his headless body brought back in a common cart. Even this sad spectacle, instead of shaking her firmness, did but the more confirm and strengthen a constancy which was founded not upon mere constitution, but upon long, serious, and healthy study.

Her own dread hour had at length arrived, and sir John Sage, the constable of the Tower, on summoning her to the scaffold, begged her to bestow some gift upon him which he might keep as a perpetual memorial of her. She gave him her tables in which, on seeing the dead body of her husband, she had written a sentence in Greek, Latin, and English, to the effect that though human justice was against her husband's body, the divine mercy would be favourable to his soul; that, for herself, if her fault deserved punishment, her youth, at least, and her imprudence, were worthy of excuse, and that she trusted for favour to God and to posterity.

On the scaffold she blamed herself not for ever having wished for the crown, but for not having firmly refused to act upon the wishes of others in reaching at it. She confessed herself worthy of death, and, being disrobed by her female attendants, calmly and unshrinkingly submitted herself to her fatal doom.

The duke of Suffolk and lord Thomas Gray were shortly afterwards executed for their share in Wyatt's revolt. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was tried in Guildhall for the same offence, but there being little or no evidence against him, his eloquent and acute defence led the jury to acquit him. With an arbitrary and insolent stretch of prerogative that now seems almost incredible, Mary, enraged at the acquittal, not only recommitted sir Nicholas to the Tower, where she kept him for a considerable time, but she even had the jury sent to prison, and fined from one to two thousand pounds each! The end she had in view in this abominably tyrannous conduct, however, was fully achieved. Thenceforth jurors were little prone to acquit the unhappy gentlemen who, no matter how loosely, were charged with participation in the affair of Wyatt. Many were condemned merely in consequence of the terrors of their jurors, and among them was sir John Throgmorton, brother to sir Nicholas. Arrests took place every day, the Tower and other places of confinement were filled with nobles and gentlemen, whose offence was that they chanced to be popular; the affection of the people being a deadly offence to the queen, who felt that she was loathed by them, and who felt so little secure against a new outbreak, that she sent out commissioners to disarm them, and lay up the seized arms in her strong holds.

In the midst of this gloomy state of things, the parliament was called upon to invest the queen with the power which had formerly been granted to her father, of disposing of the crown at her decease. Gardiner took care to dwell upon the precedent afforded by the power given to Henry VIII., and he had little fear of success because, independent of the general terror caused by the queen's merciless and sanguinary proceedings, the good-will of numerous members of parliament had been purchased by the distribution of four hundred thousand crowns, which the emperor had sent over for that purpose.

But neither terror nor purchased complaisance could blind the house to the facts, that the queen detested Elizabeth, and that the legitimacy of the queen must imply the bastardy of Elizabeth. The manner, too, in which Gardiner in the course of his speech avoided mentioning Elizabeth, excepting merely as "the lady Elizabeth," and without styling her the queen's sister, confirmed the suspicion that, once invested with the power which she now claimed, the queen would declare Elizabeth illegitimate, and by making a will, bequeathing the throne to Philip, hand over the nation to all that Spanish tyranny of which such terrible anticipations had been and still were entertained.

As if to strengthen all other grounds of suspicion of Mary's intention, the hirelings and parasites of Philip were just now, as zealously as imprudently, busy in dwelling upon Philip's descent from the house of Lancaster, and representing him—taking Elizabeth's bastardy as a matter of course—as the next heir to Mary by right of descent.

Great then as from fear or favour, was the desire of the whole parliament to gratify the queen, the determination not to throw the nation bound and blindfolded into the hands of the Spaniard was still greater. They not only refused to pass the bill to give Mary the power to will away the throne, but when another bill was introduced to make it treasonable to imagine or attempt the death of the queen's husband while she lived, they coolly laid it aside; and that Philip might not be led to complete the marriage by any lingering hope of possessing any authority in the nation which was unhappy enough to have Mary for its queen, the house passed a law enacting, "That her majesty, as their only queen, should solely and as a sole queen enjoy the crown and sovereignty of her realms, with all the pre-eminences, dignities, and rights thereto belonging, in as large and ample a manner after her marriage as before, without any title or claim accruing to the prince of Spain, either as tenant by courtesy of the realm or by any other means."

Having thus, as far as was in their power, limited and discouraged the dangerous ambition of the cruel and bigoted Philip, the parliament passed the ratification of the articles of marriage, which, indeed, were drawn so favourably to England, that no reasonable objection could have been made to them.

As nothing more could be extorted or bribed from parliament with respect to the queen's marriage, its attention was now directed to matters connected with religion. The bishopric of Durham, which had been divided in the reign of Edward, and which by an arbitrary edict of the queen had already been re-conferred upon Tonstal, was now re-erected by act of parliament. Some bills were also introduced for revising the laws against Lollardy, erroneous preaching, and hereay in general, and for the suppression of books containing heterodox opinions. But here again, to its credit, the parliament was both discriminating and firm; the bills were thrown out; and the queen perceiving that neither Philip's gold nor the terrors of her more sanguinary conduct could make this parliament, at least, sufficiently pliant and slavish for her purposes, she suddenly and sullenly dissolved it.

CHAPTER XLV.

MARY'S age, and some consciousness, perhaps of the addition made by her fearful temper to the natural homeliness of her features, had tended to make the acquisition of a young and illustrious husband all the more eagerly desired, for its very improbability; and though she had seen only the portrait of her future husband, she had contrived to become so enamoured of him, that when the preliminaries of the marriage were all arranged, and the arrival of the prince was hourly expected, every delay and every obstacle irritated her almost to phrenzy. Though as a matter of ambition Philip was very desirous of the match, as a simple matter of love he was, at the very least, indifferent; and even the proverbial hauteur and solemnity of the Spanish character could not sufficiently account for the cold neglect which caused him to forbear from even favouring his future wife and queen with a letter, to account for delays which, in spite of her doating fondness, Mary could not but believe that the prince might easily have put an end to had his impatience been at all equal to her own. From blaming Philip, the impatient fondness so rare as well as so unbecoming at her advanced period of life, caused her to turn her resentment against her subjects, to whose opposition she chose to impute that indifference on the part of the prince, which really arose from dislike of her repulsive and prematurely aged person. A circumstance now occurred which greatly increased the queen's anger against her subjects, and which probably, in so sullen and resentful a nature as hers, did much to fan into a flame that fierce bigotry which subsequently lit the fires of persecution in every county in England, and left scarcely a village without its martyr and its mourning. A squadron had been fitted out, and the command was given to lord Effingham, to convoy the prince to England; but so unpopular was the service, and such strong symptoms appeared of a determined spirit of mutiny among the sailors, that lord Effingham frankly informed the queen that he did not think the prince would be safe in their hands, and the squadron was at once disbanded. But this measure, though indispensably necessary under the circumstances, brought no peace to the mind of the queen, for she now dreaded not merely the inevitable dangers of the sea, but also that her husband should be intercepted by the French fleet. The slightest rumour so heightened her self-torturing, that she was frequently thrown into convulsions; and not merely was her bodily health affected in the most injurious degree, but even her mind began to be affected to a very perceptible extent. Hypochondriac and pitifully nervous, she became painfully conscious of her want of beauty; though, with the usual self-flattery, she ascribed the repulsive aspect presented to her by her unflattering mirror wholly to her recent sufferings. From being frantically impatient for the arrival of Philip, the unhappy queen now became desponding, and dreaded lest on his arrival he should find her displeasing.

NUMEROUS AS THE PERSECUTIONS WERE IN ENGLAND, THEY WERE INCONSIDERABLE WHEN COMPARED WITH THOSE ON THE CONTINENT.

IF ANY THING COULD BE A VALIDATION FOR THE CRUELITIES OF MARY, IT WOULD BE THE RELIGIOUS FRENZY THAT PREVAILED AMONG ALL COURTIERS.

At length the object of so many hopes and fears arrived; the marriage was publicly and with great pomp performed at Winchester; and when Philip had made a public entry into London, and dazzled the eyes of the gazers with the immense riches he had brought over, Mary hurried him away to the comparative seclusion of Windsor. This seclusion admirably suited the prince, whose behaviour, from the day of his arrival, was as well calculated as though it had been purposely intended, to confirm all the unfavourable opinions that had been formed of him. In his manner he was distant, not with abyness but with overweening disdain; and the bravest and wisest of the oldest nobility of England had the mortification to see him pass them without manifesting by glance, word, or gesture, that he was conscious of their respect, salutations, or even their presence. The unavoidably wearisome etiquette of court was now as much increased by Spanish formalities, that both Philip and Mary may almost be said to have been inaccessible. This circumstance, however disgusting to subjects, was in the highest degree pleasing to the queen; having at length possessed herself of her husband, she was unwilling that any one should share his company with her for a moment. More like a love-sick girl than a hard-featured and hard-hearted woman of forty, she could not bear the prince to be out of her sight; his shortest absence annoyed her, and if he showed the commonest courtesy to any of the court ladies, her jealousy was instantly shown to him, and her resentment to the fair who had been so unfortunate as to be honoured with his bare civility.

The womanly observation of Mary soon convinced her that the only way to Philip's heart was to gratify his ambition; and she was abundantly ready to purchase his love, or the semblance of it, even at the price of the total sacrifice of the liberties and interests of the whole English people. By means of Gardiner she used both fear and hope, both power and gold, to get members returned in her entire interests to a new parliament which she now summoned; and the returns were such as to promise that, in the existing temper of the nation, which had not yet forgotten the sanguinary punishment of the revolt under Wyatt, she might safely make her next great onward movement towards the entire restoration of catholicism and the establishment of her own absolute power.

Cardinal Pole, who was now in Flanders, invested with the office of legate, only awaited the removal of the attainder passed against him in the reign of Henry VIII. The parliament readily passed an act for that purpose, and the legate immediately came to England, when, after waiting on Philip and Mary, he presented himself to parliament, and formally invited the English nation to reconcile itself to the holy see from which, said the legate, it had been so long and so unhappily separated.

The well-trained parliament readily acknowledged and professed to deplore the defection of England, and presented an address to Philip and Mary, intreating them, as being uninfected by the general guilt, to intercede with the holy father for their forgiveness, and at the same time declared their intention to repeal all laws that were prejudicial to the church of Rome. The legate readily gave absolution to the parliament and people of England, and received them into the communion of Rome; and pope Julius III. with grave and bitter mockery observed, when the formal thanks of the nation were conveyed to him, that the English had a strange notion of things thus to thank him for doing what he ought, in fact, to thank them for letting him do.

It must not be supposed that though the nobility and gentry in parliament assembled thus readily and crouchingly laid England once again at the feet of the Roman pontiff, that they were prepared fully to undo all that Henry had done. Indifferent as to the mode of faith prescribed to the multitude, they had not an objection to make this sudden and sweeping re-transfer of the spiritual authority over England. But before they would consent to that transfer of spiritual authority, they obtained from Rome, as well as from the queen, the most positive assurances that the church property, snatched from the church and divided among laymen by Henry, should not be interfered with, but should remain undisturbed in the hands of its lay possessors. The parliament, also, in the very act by which it restored the pope's spiritual authority, enacted that all marriages contracted during the English separation from Rome should remain valid, and also inserted a clause which secured all holders of church lands in their possession; and the convocation presented a petition to the pope to the same effect, to which petition the legate gave an affirmative answer. Bigoted and arbitrary as Mary confessedly was, it appeared that she could not fully restore, even temporarily, the power of Rome.

The sentence had irrevocably gone forth against that grasping and greedy despotism; and though the accidental occurrence of a fiercely and coldly cruel bigot, in the person of Mary, being seated upon the throne gave back for a time to Rome the spiritual jurisdiction, and the power to dictate and tyrannise in spiritual affairs, all the power and seal of that bigot could not repossess the church of the lands which had become lay property. In the first instance, indeed, Rome hoped, by forgiving the past fruits of the lands, to be able to resume the lands for the future; but when Pole arrived in England he received information, amply confirmed by his own observations, which induced him without further struggle to agree to the formal and complete settlement of the lands, of which we have above given an account.

Perhaps no greater misfortune could have occurred to England than this very cession in form, by the pope, of the right of the laity to the lands of which they had possessed themselves at the expense of the church. Had Rome attempted to resume the solid property, as well as the spiritual rights, of the church, considerations of interest in the former would have caused the nobility and gentry to hesitate about surrendering the latter; but having secured their own property, the great were easily induced to hand over the bulk of the people to a spiritual tyranny which they flattered themselves that they would not suffer from. The vile old laws against heresy, which the former parliament had honestly and indignantly rejected, were now re-enacted; statutes were passed for punishing "seditious words or rumours," and it was made treason to imagine or to attempt the life of Philip during that of the queen, which, also, the former parliament had refused.

But, amidst all this disgusting sycophancy, even this complaisant parliament had still some English sense of reserve, and resisted every attempt of the queen to get her husband declared presumptive heir to the crown, entrusted with the administration, or even honoured with a coronation. The same anti-Spanish feeling which caused the firmness of parliament on those points, also caused it to refuse all subsidy in support of the emperor, in the war which he was still carrying on against France. These very plain indications of the feelings of the nation towards himself personally caused Philip, not indeed to lay aside his morose and impolitic hauteur, for that was part and parcel of his nature, and as inseparable from his existence as the mere act of breathing, but to endeavour to diminish his unpopularity by procuring the release of several distinguished prisoners, confined either for actual offence against the court, or for the quasi offence of being agreeable to the people. The most illustrious of these prisoners was the lady Elizabeth; and nothing that Philip could have done could have been more pleasing to the nation than his releasing that princess, and protecting her from the petty but no less annoying spitefulness of her sister.

About the same time, Philip's politic intervention also gave liberty to the lord Henry Dudley, sir George Harper, sir Nicholas Throgmorton, sir Edmund Warner, sir William St. Loe, and sir Nicholas Arnold, together with Harrington and Tremaine. The earl of Devonshire also was released from Fotheringay castle, and allowed to go abroad, but he only reached Padua when he was poisoned, and the popular rumour and belief ascribed the murder to the Imperialists.

Baffled in her endeavours to get her husband declared her heir presumptive, the queen became more than ever anxious for the honours of maternity, of the approach of which she at length imagined that she felt the symptoms. She was publicly declared to be pregnant, and Bonner, bishop of London, ordered public prayers to be put up, that the young prince—for the catholics chose to consider not merely the pregnancy of the queen, but even the sex of the child a matter perfectly settled!—might be beautiful, strong, and witty. The people in general, however, manifested a provoking incredulity even as to the pregnancy of the queen, whose age and haggard aspect certainly promised no very numerous offspring; and the people's incredulity was shortly afterwards justified, it proving that the queen had been mistaken by the incipient symptoms of dropsy. To the last possible moment, however, Philip and his friends concealed the truth, and Philip was thus enabled to get himself appointed protector during the minority, should the child survive and the queen die. Finding that this was the utmost concession that could at present be wrung from the parliament, and trusting that it might by good management be made productive of more at some future time, the queen now dissolved the parliament.

A.D. 1555.—The dissolution of parliament was marked by an occurrence which of itself would be sufficient to indicate the despotic character of the times. Some members of the commons' house, unwilling to agree to the slavish complaisance commonly shown by the majority, and yet, as a minority, quite unable to stem the tide, came to the resolution to secede from their attendance. No sooner was the parliament dissolved than these members were indicted in the king's bench. Six of them, terrified at the mere thought of a contest with the powerful and vindictive queen, made the requisite submissions and obtained pardon; and the remainder exercised their right of traverse, thereby so long postponing the trial that the queen's death put an end to the affair altogether. Gardiner's success in bringing about the Spanish match to which the nation had been so averse, and the tact and zeal for the queen's service which he had shown in his dexterous management of the house of commons, made him now more than ever a weighty authority, not only with the queen but with the catholic party in general. It is singular enough, as Hume well remarks, that though this very learned prelate was far less zealous upon points of theology than cardinal Pole, yet, while the mild temper of the latter allayed and chastened his tendency towards bigotry, the sterner and harder character of the former caused him to look upon the free judgment of the commonalty as a presumption which it behoved the rulers of the land to put down, even by the severest and most unsparring resort to persecution. For some time it was doubtful whether the milder course, recommended as politic by Pole, or the sterner course, advocated as essentially necessary by Gardiner, would prevail. But Gardiner had the great advantage of advocating the system which was the most in accordance with the cruel and bigoted temper of both Philip and Mary; and Pole had the mortification not only of being vanquished by his opponent, but also of seeing full and terrible licence and freedom given to the hitherto partially restrained demons of persecution.

Having determined the queen and court to a course of severity, Gardiner had no difficulty in persuading them that it was politic to select the first victims from among the eminent for learning or authority, or both; and Rogers, prebendary of St. Paul's, a man still more remarkable for virtue and learning than for his eminence in the church and in the reformed party, had the melancholy honour of being singled out as the first victim. As instances of conversion were even more sought after by Gardiner than punishment, there was probably yet another reason why Rogers was selected for the first prosecution. He had a wife and ten children, and was remarkable for his affection both as a father and as a husband; and there was every probability that tenderness for them might lead him to avoid, by apostacy, a danger which otherwise he might have been expected to brave. But if Gardiner really reasoned thus, he was greatly mistaken. Rogers not only refused to recant an iota of his opinions at what was called his trial, but even after the fatal sentence of burning was passed upon him he still preserved such an equable frame of mind, that when the fatal hour arrived his gaolers actually had to awaken him from a sweet sound sleep to proceed to the stake. Such courage might, one would suppose, have disarmed even the wrath of bigotry; but Gardiner, when the condemned gentleman asked permission to have a parting interview with his wife, brutally and scoffingly replied, that Rogers, being a priest, could not possibly have a wife! This unfortunate and learned divine was burned at Smithfield, and the flames that consumed him may be said to have kindled a vast and moving pile that swallowed up sufferers of both sexes, and of nearly all ages, in every county in England.

Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, was tried at the same time with Rogers, and was also condemned to the stake, but, with a refinement upon cruelty, he was not executed at Smithfield, though tried in London, but sent for that purpose into his own diocese, that his agonies and death in the midst of the very scene of his labours of piety and usefulness, might the more effectually strike terror into the hearts of his flock. Hooper, however, turned what his enemies intended for an aggravation of his fate into a consolation, and an opportunity of giving to those whom he had long and faithfully taught, a parting proof of the sincerity of his teachings, and of the efficacy of genuine religion to uphold its sincere believers, even under the most terrible agonies that ruthless and mistaken man, in his pride of fierceness, can inflict upon his fellow worm. And terrible, even beyond the usual terrors of these abominable scenes, were the tortures of the martyred Hooper. The faggots provided for his execution were too green to kindle rapidly, and, a high wind blowing at the time, the flames played around his lower limbs without being able to fasten upon the vital parts. One of his hands dropped off, and with the other he continued to beat his breast, praying to heaven and exhorting the pitying spectators, until his swollen tongue could no longer perform its office; and it was three quarters of an hour before his tortures were at an end. Of the courage and sincerity of Hooper there is striking evidence in the fact that the queen's pardon was placed before him on a stool after he was tied to the stake, but he ordered it to be removed, preferring the direst torture with sincerity to safety with apostacy.

Sanders, burned at Coventry, also had the queen's pardon offered to him, and he also rejected it, embracing the stake and exclaiming, "We have the cross of Christ! Welcome everlasting life." Taylor, the clergyman of Hadley, in Hertfordshire, was burned at that place, in the presence of his parishioners. When tied to the stake he began to pray in English, which so enraged his guards, that, bidding him speak Latin, they struck him so violently on the head with their halberds, that he died on the instant, and was spared the lingering agonies prepared for him.

Philpot, archdeacon of Winchester, had very greatly distinguished himself by his zeal for protestantism. On one occasion, being engaged in a controversy with an Arian, the zeal of the archdeacon so far got the ascendancy over his good manners, that he actually spat in the Arian's face. Subsequently, and when he might have been expected to have repented on reflection of what he had done in the heat of passion, he published a formal justification of his conduct, in which he said that he felt bound to give that strong proof of the detestation of his opponent's blasphemy. So impetuous a man was not likely to escape notice in the persecution that now raged, and he was brought to trial for heresy and burned to death in Smithfield.

If Gardiner was the person to whom the persecution chiefly owed its commencement, it was Bonner, bishop of London, who carried it on with the coarsest and most unrelenting barbarity. Apart from all mere bigotry, this singularly brutal man appeared to derive positive sensual gratification from the act of inflicting torture. He occasionally when he had prisoners under examination who did not answer to his satisfaction, would have them stripped and flog them with his own hand. Nor was even this his worst brutality. An unfortunate weaver, on one occasion, refused to recant, when Bonner endeavoured to persuade him, and, as is veraciously recorded, this disgrace of his sacred profession first tore the unfortunate man's beard out by the root, and then held his hand in the flame of a lamp until the sinews burst, by way of giving him, as he said, some notion of what burning really was like!

When we say that this horrible system of persecution and cruelty endured for three years, and that in that time two hundred and twenty-seven persons are known to have suffered—while probably many more were similarly butchered of whom we have no account—while that, besides men of all ranks from bishops to day labourers, fifty-five women and four children thus perished, it must be obvious that a detailed account of this terrible season of cruelty would be disgusting, even were it not quite impracticable. We shall, therefore, add but a few more cases, and then leave a subject which cannot be treated of even at this distance of time without feelings of disgust and horror.

Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, in Wales, being condemned to death as a heretic, appealed to cardinal Pole; but his appeal was wholly unattended to, and the unfortunate bishop was burned in his own diocese.

There yet remained two still more illustrious victims to be immolated. Ridley, formerly bishop of London, and Latimer, formerly bishop of Worcester, had long been celebrated for both the zeal and the efficiency of their support of the cause of the reformation. In the preaching of both there was a certain nervous homeliness, which made their eloquence especially effective upon the minds and hearts of the lower orders; and on that very account these two prelates were more formidable to the Romanists than they would have been had they affected a more learned and chastened style. That two such capital enemies of Romanism—one of whom, moreover, had even for some time been possessed of Bonner's own see—should escape, could not be expected. They were tried and condemned, and both burned at the same stake at Oxford. Both died with courage and a calm constancy not to be surpassed. Even when they were already tied to the stake, and the revolting tragedy commenced, Latimer cheerfully called out, "Be of good courage, brother Ridley, we shall this day kindle such a torch in England, as, I trust in God, shall never be extinguished." Latimer, who was very aged, suffered but little, being very early killed by the explosion of some gunpowder which the executioner had mercifully provided for that purpose; but Ridley was seen to be alive some time after he was surrounded by flames.

As neither age nor youth, neither learning nor courage, could make any impression upon the flinty heart of Bonner, so neither could even the most heroic proof of filial piety. A young lad, named Hunter, who was only in his nineteenth year, suffered himself, with the imprudence common to youth, to be drawn into a religious argument with a priest, in the course of which argument he had the farther imprudence to deny the real presence. Subsequently he began to apprehend the danger of what he had done, and absconded lest any treachery on the part of the priest should involve him in punishment. The priest, as the young man had feared, did give information, and Bonner, learning that the youth had absconded, caused his father to be seized, and not only treated him with great immediate severity, but threatened him with still worse future treatment. The youth no sooner heard of the danger and trouble to which he had unintentionally exposed his father, than he delivered himself up. To a generous man this conduct would have been decisive as to the propriety of overlooking the lad's speculative error or boldness; but Bonner knew no remorse, and the youth was mercilessly committed to the flames.

A still more disgraceful and barbarous incident occurred in Guernsey. A wretched woman in that island was condemned to the stake, and was, when led to punishment, far advanced in pregnancy. The in-effable pangs inflicted upon her produced labour, and one of the guards snatched the new-born infant from the flames. A brutal and thoroughly ignorant magistrate who was present ordered the helpless little wretch to be thrown back again, "being determined that nothing should survive which sprung from so heretical and obstinate a parent." Setting aside the abhorrent and almost incredible offence against humanity committed by this detestable magistrate, he was, even in the rigid interpretation of law, a murderer, and ought to have been executed as one; for, whatever the offence of the wretched mother, the child clearly was not contemplated in the sentence passed upon her. But, alas! the spirit of bigotry tramples alike upon the laws of nature and of man; and it is probable that this detestable murderer, so far from receiving merited punishment for his brutality, might have been even applauded for his "zeal."

As though the national dread and detestation of the Spanish alliance had not already been but too abundantly justified by the event, spies were sent out in every direction, and a commission was appointed for inquiring into and punishing all spiritual and even some civil crimes; and two very brief extracts from the commission and instructions will show that in object, powers, and process, the commissioners were, only under another name, inquisitors, and their spies and informers officials of the inquisition. The commission said, that "Since many false rumours were published among the subjects, and many heretical opinions were also spread among them, the commissioners were to inquire into those either by presentments, by witnesses, or any other political way they could devise, and to search after all heresies, the bringers in, the sellers, the readers of all heretical books; to examine and punish all misbehaviours or negligences in any church or chapel; to try all priests that did not preach the sacrament of the altar; all persons that did not hear mass, or go to their parish church to service; that would not go in processions or did not take holy bread or holy water; and if they found any that did obstinately persist in such heresies, they were to put them into the hands of their ordinaries, to be punished according to the spiritual laws; giving the commissioners full power to proceed as they discretion and consciences should direct them, and to use all such means as they would taxent for the searching of the premises, empowering them, also, to call before them such witnesses as they pleased, and to force them to make oath of such things as might discover what they sought after." This new commission was, in fact, an English inquisition; and the following extract from Hume abundantly shows the determination that that inquisition should not want for officials and familiars.

"To bring the method of proceeding in England still nearer to the practice of the inquisition, letters were written to lord North and others, enjoining them "to put to the torture" such obstinate persons as would not confess, and there to order them at their discretion.

"Secret spies, also, and informers were employed, according to the practice of that iniquitous tribunal. Instructions were given to the justices of the peace that they should 'call secretly before them one or two honest persons within their limits, or more, at their discretion, and command them, by oath or otherwise, that they shall secretly learn and search out such persons as shall evil behave themselves in the church, or idly, or shall despise, openly by words, the king's or queen's proceedings, or go about to make any commotion, or tell any seditious tales or news. And also that the same persons, so to be appointed, shall declare to the same justices of the peace the ill behaviour of few disorderly persons, whether it shall be for using unlawful games or any such other light behaviour of such suspected persons; and that the same information shall be given secretly to the justices, and the same justices shall call such accused persons before them and examine them, without declaring by whom they were accused."

This precious commission also had power to execute by martial law not only the putters forth of all heretical, treasonable, and seditious books and writings, but also all "whosoever had any of these books and did not presently burn them, without reading them or showing them to any other person." Did not the whole tenor of this portion of our history forbid all touch of humour, one would be strongly tempted to inquire how a man was possibly to know the character of books coming to him by gift or inheritance, for instance, without either reading them himself or showing them to some one else! But as bigotry cannot feel, so neither will it condescend to reason.

While Philip and Mary were thus exhibiting an evil industry and zeal to merit the reconciliation of the kingdom to Rome, Paul IV. who now filled the papal throne, took advantage of Mary's bigotry to assume the right of conferring upon Mary the kingdom of Ireland, which she already possessed de facto et de jure as part and parcel of the English sovereignty, and to insist upon the restoration to Rome of certain lands and money! Several of the council, probably fearing that by degrees Rome would demand back all the church property, pointed out the great danger of impoverishing the kingdom, and but that death had deprived Mary of the shrewd judgment of Gardiner, such concessions would probably not have been made to the grasping spirit of Rome. But Mary replied to all objections by saying that she preferred the salvation of her own soul to ten such kingdoms as England; and Heath, archbishop of Canterbury, who had succeeded Gardiner in the possession of the great seal, encouraged her in that feeling. A bill was accordingly presented to parliament for restoring to the church the tithes, first tithes, and all impropriations which remained in the hands of the queen. At first sight it might seem that parliament had little cause or right to interfere in a matter which, as far as the terms of the bill went, concerned only the queen herself. But the lay possessors of church lands naturally enough considered that subjects would scarcely be spared after the sovereign had been mulcted. Moreover, while some, probably a great number, of the members were chiefly moved by this consideration, all began to be both terrified and disgusted by the brutal executions which had disgraced the whole nation. A steady opposition consequently arose; and when the government applied for a subsidy for two years and for two six-months, the latter were refused, and the opposition, with equal bitterness and justice, gave as the reason of this refusal, that while the crown was willfully divesting itself of revenue in behalf of Rome, it was quite useless to bestow wealth upon it. The dissatisfaction of the parliament was still farther evidenced by the rejection of two bills, enacting penalties against such exiles as should fail to return within a certain time, and for incapacitating for the office of justice of the peace such magistrates as were remiss in the prosecution of heretics. This fresh and pointed proof of the displeasure of the parliament determined the queen to dissolve it. But the dissolution of the parliament did not diminish the pecuniary embarrassment of the queen. Her husband had now been several months with his father in Flanders; and the very little of his correspondence with which he favoured her chiefly consisted of demands for money. Stern and unfeeling as she was to every one else, the infatuated queen was passionately attached to the husband who certainly took no pains to conceal his dislike of her; and as the parliament, previous to its dissolution, had granted her but a scanty supply, she was led, by her anxiety to meet her husband's demands, to extort money from her subjects in a manner the most unjustifiable. From each of one thousand persons, of whose personal attachment she affected to be quite certain, she demanded a loan of 60*l*.; and even this large sum being inadequate to her wants, she demanded a farther general loan from all persons possessing twenty pounds a year and upwards; a measure which greatly distressed the smaller gentry. Many of them were obliged by her inroads upon their purses to discharge some of their servants, and as these men suddenly thrown upon the world became troublesome, the queen issued a proclamation to compel their former employers to take them back again! Upon seven thousand yeomen who had not as yet contributed, she levied sixty thousand marks, and from the merchants she obtained the sum of six and thirty thousand pounds. She also extorted money by the most tyrannous interference with trade, as regarded both the foreign and native merchants; yet after all this shameless extortion she was so poor, that she offered, and in vain, so had was her credit, fourteen per cent. for a loan of 30,000*l*. Not even that high rate of interest could induce the merchants of Antwerp, to whom she offered it, to lend her the money, until by menaces she had induced her good city of London to be security for her! Who would imagine that we are writing of the self-same nation that so shortly afterwards warred even to the death with Charles I. for the comparatively trifling matter of the ship money?

The poverty which alone had induced Philip to correspond with her was now terminated the emperor Charles the Fifth, that prince's father, resigning to him all his wealth and dominion, and retiring to a monastery in Spain. A singular anecdote is told of the abdicated monarch. He spent much of his time in the constructing of watches, and finding it impossible to make them go exactly alike, he remarked that he had indeed been foolish to expect that he could compel that uniformity in minds which he could not achieve even in mere machines! The reflection thus produced is said even to have given him some leaning towards those theological opinions of which he and his son had been the most brutal and ruthless persecutors.

A. D. 1555.—Cranmer, though during the whole of this reign he had been left unnoticed in confinement, was not forgotten by the vindictive queen. She was daily more and more exacerbated in her naturally wretched temper by the grief caused by the contemptuous neglect of her husband. Her private hours were spent in tears and complaints; and that misery which usually softens even the most rugged nature had in her case only the effect of making her still more ruthless and unsparing.

Cranmer, though he had during part of Henry's reign warded off that monarch's rage from Mary, was very much hated by her for the part he had taken in bringing about the divorce of her mother, and she was not only resolved to punish him, but also to make his death as agonizing as possible. For the part he had taken in the opposition to her ascending the throne she could easily have had him beheaded, but nothing short of the flames seemed to her to be a sufficiently dreadful punishment for him. She caused the pope to cite him to Rome, there to take his trial for heresy. Being a close prisoner in the Tower, the unfortunate prelate perforce neglected the citation, and he was condemned par contumace, and sentenced to the stake. The next step was to degrade him from his sacred office; and Bonner, who, with Thirleby, bishop of Ely, was entrusted with this task, performed it with all the insolent and triumphant brutality consonant with his nature. Firmly believing that Cranmer's eternal as well as earthly punishment was assured, the queen was not yet contented; she would fain deprive him in his last hours even of human sympathy, and the credit attached to consistency and fidelity to the cause he had embraced. Persons were employed to persuade him that the door of mercy was still open to him, and that he, who was so well qualified to be of wide and permanent service to mankind, was in duty bound to save himself by a seeming compliance with the opinions of the queen. The fear of death, and the strong urgings of higher motives, induced Cranmer to comply, and he agreed to subscribe to the doctrines of the real presence and the papal supremacy. Shallow writers have blamed Cranmer for this compliance; none will do so who consider "how fearfully and how wonderfully we are made"—in mind as well as in body; how many and urgent were the motives to this weakness, how much his mind was shaken by long peril and imprisonment, and, above all, who remember and reflect how nobly he subsequently shook off all earthly motives "like dew drops from the lion's mane," and with what calm and holy serenity he endured the last dread tortures.

Having induced Cranmer privately to sign his recantation, the queen now demanded that he should complete the wretched price of his safety by publicly making his recantation at St. Paul's before the whole people. Even this would not have saved Cranmer. But, either from his own judgment, or from the warning of some secret friend, Cranmer perceived that it was intended to send him to execution the moment that he should thus have completed and published his degradation. All his former high and courageous spirit was now again aroused within him; and he not only refused to comply with this new demand, but openly and boldly said that the only passage in his life of which he deeply and painfully repented was, that recantation which, in a moment of natural weakness, he already had been induced to make. He now, he said, most sincerely repented and disavowed that recantation, and inasmuch as his hand had offended in signing it, so should his hand first suffer the doom which only that single weakness and insincerity had made him deserving. The rage of the court and its sycophants at hearing a public avowal so different from that which they expected, scarcely left them as much decency of patience as would allow them to hear him to the end of his discourse; and the instant that he ceased to speak he was led away to the stake.

True to his promise, Cranmer when the faggots were lighted held out his hand into the rising flames until it was consumed, repeatedly exclaiming as he did so, "This unworthy hand!" "This hand has offended!" The fierce flames, as they reached his body, were not able to subdue the sublime serenity to which he had wrought his christian courage and endurance, and as long as his countenance was visible to the appalled bystanders, it wore the character not of agony but of a holy sacrifice, not of despair but of an assured and eternal hope. It is said by some protestant writers of the time, that when the sad scene was at an end, his heart was found entire and unaltered; but probably this assertion took its rise in the singular constancy and calmness with which the martyr died. Cardinal Pole, on the death of Cranmer, was made archbishop of Canterbury. But though this ecclesiastic was a man of great humanity as well as of great ability, and though he was sincerely anxious to serve the great interests of religion, not by ensnaring and destroying the unhappy and ignorant laity, but by elevating the clergy in the moral and intellectual scale, to render them more efficient in their awfully important service, there were circumstances which made his power far inferior to his will. He was personally disliked at Rome where, his tolerance, his learning, and his addiction to studious retirement, had caused him to be suspected of, at least, a leaning to the new doctrines.

A. D. 1557.—In the midst of Mary's fierce persecutions of her protestant subjects, she was self-tortured beyond all that she had it in her power to inflict on others, and might have asked, in the words of the dying inca to his complaining soldier, "Think you that I, then, am on a bed of roses?" War raged between France and Spain, and next to her desire firmly to re-establish catholicism in England, was her desire to lavish the blood and treasure of her people on the side of Spain. Some opposition being made, Philip visited London, and the queen's zeal in his cause was increased, instead of being, as in the case of a nobler spirit it would have been, utterly destroyed, by his sullen declaration, that if England did not join him against France, he would see England no more. Even this, however much it affected the queen, did not bear down the opposition to a war which, as the clearer-headed members discerned, would be intolerably expensive in any case, and, if successful, would tend to make England a mere dependency of Spain. Under the circumstances a true English patriot, indeed, must have wished to see Spain humbled, not exalted; crippled in its finances, not enriched. It unfortunately happened, however, that an attempt was made to seize Scarborough, and Stafford and his fellows in this attempt confessed that they were incited to it by Henry of France. This declaration called up all the dominant national antipathy to France; the prudence of the opposition was at once laid asleep; war was declared, and every preparation that the wretched financial state of England would permit, was made for carrying it on with vigour. By dint of a renewal of the most shameless and excessive extortion, the queen contrived to raise and equip an army of ten thousand men, who were sent to Flanders under the earl of Pembroke. To prevent disturbances at home, Mary in obedience probably to the advice of her cold and cruel husband, caused many of the first men in England, from whom she had any reason to fear any opposition, to be seized and imprisoned in places where even their nearest friends could not find them.

IT IS COMPUTED THAT FROM THE EDICT OF CHALCOT, IN 1558, 100,000 PERSONS SUFFERED DEATH IN THE REVENGE, ON ACCOUNT OF THEIR RELIGION.

The details of the military affairs between France and Spain with her English auxiliaries belong to the history of France. In this place it may suffice to say, that the talents of Guise rendered all our attempts useless; and that, so far from benefiting Philip, we lost Calais that key to France, of which England was so chary and so proud. Even the cold and unpatriotic heart of Mary was touched by this capital misfortune; and she was often heard to say, in the agonies of her uxorious grief, that, after her death "Calais" would be found visibly graven upon her broken heart. But regrets were vain, and wisdom came too late. France improved her success by stirring up the Scotch; and, with such a danger threatening her very frontier, England was obliged sullenly and silently to withdraw from an onerous warfare, which she had most unwisely entered upon.

Philip continued the war for some time after England had virtually withdrawn from it; and he was negotiating a peace and insisting upon the restoration of Calais as one of its conditions, when Mary, long labouring under a dropsy, was seized with mortal illness and died, in the year 1558, after a most wretched and mischievous reign of five years and four months. This miserable woman has been allowed the virtue of sincerity as the sole good, the one oasis in the dark desert of her character. But even this virtue must, on careful examination, be denied to her by the impartial historian. As a whole, indeed, her course is not marked by insincerity. But why? Her ferocity and despotism were too completely unopposed by her tame and sycophantic people to leave any room for the exercise of falsehood, after the very first days of her disgraceful reign. But in those first days, while it was yet uncertain whether she could resist the power and ability of the ambitious and unprincipled Northumberland, she proved that she could use guile where force was wanting. Her promises to the protestants were in many cases voluntary, and in all profuse and positive; yet she no sooner grasped the sceptre firmly in her hand, than she scattered her promises to the winds, and commenced that course of bigotry and cruelty which has for ever affixed to her memory the loathed name, which even yet no Englishman can pronounce without horror and disgust, of THE BLOODY QUEEN MARY.

CHAPTER XLVI.

The Reign of ELIZABETH.

A. D. 1558.—So completely had the arbitrary and cruel reign of Mary disgusted her subjects, almost without distinction of rank or religious opinions, that the accession of Elizabeth was hailed as a blessing unalloyed and almost too great to have been hoped for. The parliament had been called together a few days before the death of Mary, and when Heath, as chancellor, announced that event, he was hardly allowed to conclude ere both houses burst into the joyful cry of "God save queen Elizabeth! Long and happily may she reign!"

Deep and deadly indeed must have been the offences of the deceased queen to have rendered her death an actual subject of joy, instead of grief, to a nation proverbially so loyal and affectionate as England!

Elizabeth when she received the news of her sister's death was at Hatfield, where she had for some time resided in studious and studied retirement; for, even to the last, Mary had shown that her malignity against her younger sister had suffered no abatement, and required only the slightest occasion to burst out in even fatal violence. When she had devoted a few days to the appearance of mourning, she proceeded to London and took up her abode in the Tower. The remembrance of the very different circumstances under which she had formerly visited that blood-stained fortress, when she was a prisoner, and her life in danger from the malignity of her then all-powerful sister, affected her so much, that she fell upon her knees and returned thanks anew to the Almighty for her safe deliverance from danger, which, she truly said, was scarcely inferior to that of Daniel in the den of lions. Her immediately subsequent conduct showed that her heart was properly affected by the emotions which called forth this act of piety. She had been much injured and much insulted during the life of her sister; for such was the hatred and petty cast of Mary's mind, that there were few readier ways to win her favour than by insult or injury to the then friendless daughter of Anne Boleyn. But Elizabeth now seemed determined only to remember the past in her thankfulness for her complete and almost miraculous deliverance from danger. She allowed neither word nor glance to express resentment, even to those who had most injured her. Sir H. Bedingfield, who had for a considerable time been her host, and who had both harshly and disrespectfully caused her to feel that, though nominally his guest and ward, she was in reality his jealously watched prisoner, might very reasonably have expected a cold if not a stern reception; but even this man she received with affability when he first presented himself, and never afterwards inflicted any sadder punishment upon him than a good-humoured sarcasm. The sole case in which she manifested a feeling of dislike was that of the brutal and blood-stained Bonner, from whom, while she addressed all the other bishops with almost affectionate cordiality, she turned away with an expressive and well warranted appearance of horror and disgust.

As soon as the necessary attention to her private affairs would allow her, the new queen sent off messengers to foreign courts to announce her sister's death and her own accession. The envoy to Philip, who at this time was in Flanders, was the lord Cobham, who was ordered to return the warmest thanks of his royal mistress for the protection he had afforded her when she so much needed it, and to express her sincere and earnest desire that their friendship might continue unbroken. The friendly earnestness of Elizabeth's message strengthened Philip in a determination he had made even during the illness of Mary, of whose early death he could not but have been expectant, and he immediately instructed his ambassador to the court of London to offer the hand of Philip to Elizabeth. Blinded by his eager desire to obtain that dominion over England which his marriage with Mary had failed to secure, Philip forgot that there were many objections to this measure; objections which he, indeed, would easily have overlooked, but which the sagacious Elizabeth could not fail to notice. As a catholic, Philip was necessarily disliked by the protestants who had so lately tasted of catholic persecution in its worst form; as a Spaniard, he was cordially detested by Englishmen of either creed. But apart from and beyond these weighty objections, which of themselves would have been fatal to his pretensions, he stood in precisely the same relationship to Elizabeth that her father had stood in to Catherine of Arragon, and in marrying Philip, Elizabeth would virtually, and in a manner which the world would surely not overlook, pronounce her mother's marriage illegal and her own birth illegitimate. This last consideration alone would have decided Elizabeth against Philip; but while in her heart she was fully and irrevocably determined never to marry him; she even thus early brought into use that duplicity for which she was afterwards as remarkable as for her higher and nobler qualities, and sent him so equivocal and undecided an answer, that, so far from despairing of success, Philip actually sent to Rome to solicit the dispensation that would be necessary.

With her characteristic prudence, Elizabeth, through her ambassador at Rome, announced her accession to the pope. That exalted personage was grieved at the early death of Mary, not only as it deprived Rome of the benefit of her bigotry, but as it made way for a princess who was already looked up to with pride and confidence by the protestants; and he suffered his double vexation to manifest itself with a very indiscreet energy. He treated Elizabeth's assumption of the crown without his permission as being doubly wrong; wrong, as treating with disrespect the holy see, to which he still deemed England subject, and wrong, as the holy see had pronounced her birth illegitimate. This sort of conduct was by no means calculated to succeed with Elizabeth; she immediately recalled her ambassador from Rome, and only pursued her course with the more resolved and open vigour. She recalled home all who had been exiled, and set at liberty all who had been imprisoned for their religious opinions during the reign of her sister; she caused the greater part of the service to be performed in English, and she forbade the elevation of the host in her own chapel, which she set up as the standard for all other places of worship. But, always cool and cautious, Elizabeth, while she did thus much and thus judiciously to favour the reformers, did not neglect to discourage those who not only would have fain outstripped her in advancing reform, but even have inflicted upon the Romanists some of the persecutions of which they themselves had complained. On occasion of a petition being presented to her, it was said, in that partly quaint and partly argumentative style which in that age was so greatly affected, that having graciously released so many other prisoners, it was to be hoped that she would receive a petition for the release of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. Being as yet undetermined as to the extent to which it would be desirable to permit or encourage the reading of the scriptures, she readily replied, that previous to doing so she must consult those prisoners, and learn whether they desired their liberty. To preaching she was never a great friend; one or two preachers, she was wont to say, were enough for a whole county. And, at this early period of her reign, she deemed that the indiscreet zeal of many of the most pious of the protestant preachers was calculated to promote that very persecution of the Romanists which she was especially anxious to avoid; and she, consequently, forbade all preaching save by special licence, and took care to grant licences only to men of discretion and moderation, from whose preaching no evil was to be apprehended.

The parliament was very early employed in passing laws for the suppression of the recently erected monasteries, and restoring the alienated tithes and first fruits to the crown. Sundry other laws were passed chiefly relating to religion; but those laws will be sufficiently understood by those who have attentively accompanied us thus far, when we say, that they, substantially, abolished all that Mary had done, and restored all that she had abolished of the laws of Edward.

The then bishops, owing every thing to her sister and to catholicism, were so greatly offended by these clear indications of her intended course, that they refused to officiate at her coronation, and it was not without some difficulty that the bishop of Carlisle was at length prevailed upon to perform the ceremony.

The most prudent and effectual steps having thus been taken to secure the protestant interests without in any degree awakening or encouraging whatever there might be of protestant bigotry, and to despoil the Romanists of what they had violently acquired without driving them to desperation, the queen caused a solemn disputation to be held before Bacon, whom she had made lord keeper, between the protestant and the romanist divines. The latter were vanquished in argument, but were too obstinate to confess it; and some of them were so refractory that it was deemed necessary to imprison them. Having been thus far triumphant, the protestants proceeded to their ultimate and most important step; and a bill was passed by which the mass was abolished, and the liturgy of king Edward re-established; and penalties were enacted against all who should either absent themselves from worship or depart from the order here laid down. Before the conclusion of the session, the parliament gave a still farther proof of its attachment to the queen, and of its desire to aid her in her designs, by voting her a subsidy of four shillings in the pound on land, and two-and-eightpence on goods, with two fifteenths. Well knowing all the dangers of a disputed succession, the parliament at the same time petitioned her to choose a husband. But the queen, though she acknowledged that the petition was couched in terms so general and so respectful that she could not take any offence at it, protested that, always undenious of changing her condition, she was now more than ever so; she was anxious only to be the wife of England and the mother of the English, and had no higher ambition than to have for her epitaph, "Here lies Elizabeth, who lived and died a maiden queen."

A. D. 1559.—The parliament just prorogued had, as we have shown, got through a vast deal of important business in the session; but though that was the first session of a new reign, and of a reign, too, immediately following one in which such horrors of tyrannous cruelty had been enacted, it is to be remarked, to the praise of the moderation of both queen and parliament, that not a single bill of attainder was passed, though some attainments by former parliaments were mercifully or justly removed.

While the queen had been thus wisely busy at home, she had been no less active abroad. Sensible that her kingdom required a long season of repose to enable it to regain its power, she ordered her ambassadors, lord Effingham and the bishop of Ely, to conclude peace with France on any terms; and peace was accordingly concluded. But as the marriage of Henry and Anne Boleyn had been concluded in open opposition to Rome, France chose to deem Elizabeth wrongfully seated upon the throne; and the duke of Guise and his brothers, seeing that Mary, queen of Scots, the wife of the dauphin, would—supposing Elizabeth out of the question—be the rightful heir, persuaded the king of France to order his son and his daughter-in-law to assume both the title and the arms of England. The death of Henry of France at a tournament not being followed by any abandonment on the part of Mary and her husband, then Francis II. of France, of this most unwarrantable and insulting assumption, Elizabeth was stung into the commencement of that deadly hatred which subsequently proved so fatal to the fairer but less prudent Mary of Scotland.

A. D. 1561.—The situation of Scotland and the circumstances which occurred there at this period will be found in all necessary detail under the proper head. It will suffice to say, here, that the theological and civil disputes that raged fiercely among the turbulent and warlike nobility of Scotland and their respective followers, plunged that country into a state of confusion, which encouraged Elizabeth in her hope of extorting from Mary, now a widow, a clear and satisfactory abandonment of her assumption; an abandonment which, indeed, had been made for her by a treaty at Edinburgh, which treaty Elizabeth now, through Throgmorton, her ambassador, demanded that Mary should ratify. But wilfulness and a certain petty womanly pique determined Mary to refuse this, although immediately on the death of her husband she had laid aside both the title and the arms of queen of England.

Mary's residence in France, meanwhile, had become very disagreeable to her from the ill offices of the queen mother, and she resolved to comply with the invitation of the states of Scotland to return to that kingdom. She accordingly ordered her ambassador, D'Oisel, to apply to Elizabeth for a safe conduct through England; but Elizabeth, through Throgmorton, refused compliance with that request, except on condition of Mary's ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh. Mary remonstrated in severe though chafteated terms, and immediately determined upon proceeding to Scotland by sea, for which purpose she embarked at Calais. Elizabeth at the same time sent out cruizers, ostensibly to purgare pirates, but, as it should seem, with the intention of seizing upon the person of Mary, who, however, passed through the English squadron in a fog, and arrived safely at Leith. But though safe, Mary was far from happy. She had loved France with even more than a native's love, and only ceased to gaze upon its receding shores when they were hidden by the darkness of night. The manners of the French were agreeable to her; she had become, as it were, "native and to the manner born," in that land of galeity and frivolity; and all that she heard of the stern harsh bigotry of the predominant party in Scotland, led her to anticipate nothing but the most wearisome and melancholy feelings. Her youth, her beauty, her many accomplishments, and, above all, the novelty of seeing their sovereign once more among them, caused the Scots to give her a most joyous and affectionate reception. Her first measures were well calculated to confirm the favourable opinion which her people appeared to entertain. She gave, at least ostensibly, all her confidence and nearly all her attention to the leaders of the reformed party, who, indeed, had now complete power over the great mass of the Scottish people. Secretary Liddington and her brother, lord James, whom she created earl of Murray, ably seconded her endeavours to introduce something like order into that land so long and so grievously torn by faction and strife, and as the measures taken were at once firm and conciliatory, every thing seemed to promise success.

But there was, amidst all this seeming promise of better times, one fatal element which rendered her success nearly impossible. Bigotry in England was personified mildness and moderation, compared to the intense and envenomed bigotry which at that time existed in Scotland. Mary on her very first entrance into Scotland had issued an order that every one should submit to the reformed religion. But she herself was still a papist; and scarcely was the first joy of her arrival subsided when the reformed preachers began to denounce her on that account. The celebration of catholic rites in her own chapel would have been sternly refused her by the zealous preachers and their zealous followers, had not the multitude been induced to side by her in that matter, from fear of her returning to France in disgust. But even that consideration did not prevent the preachers and some of their followers from proceeding to the most outrageous lengths; and this single consideration sufficed to throw the whole Scottish people into confusion and uneasiness.

Wisely chary of expence, and profoundly politic, Elizabeth saw that the bigotry of Mary's subjects would find that princess other employment than that of making any attempt to disturb the peace of England. She therefore turned her attention to improving the arts, commerce, navy, and artillery of England; and with so much judgment, and with such great as well as rapid success, that she well merited the title that was bestowed upon her, of "the restorer of naval glory and queen of the northern seas." Her spirit and prudence had naturally enough encouraged foreign princes to believe, that though she had in some sort pledged herself to a maiden life, it was not impossible to dissuade her from persevering in that resolution. The archduke Charles, second son of the emperor; Casimir, son of the elector palatine; Eric, king of Sweden; Adolph, duke of Holstein; and the earl of Arran, presumptive heir to the crown of Scotland, were among the suitors for her hand. Nor were there wanting aspirants to that high and envied honour even among her own subjects. The earl of Arundel, though old enough to be her father, and sir William Pickering were among those who flattered themselves with hope; as was lord Robert Dudley, a son of the ambitious duke of Northumberland beheaded in the reign of Mary; and as the fine person and showy accomplishments of this last caused the queen to treat him with more favour and confidence than his actual talents seemed to warrant from so acute a judge of men's merits as Elizabeth, it was for some time very generally imagined that he was a favoured lover. But the queen answered all addresses with a refusal, and yet not such a refusal as to utterly destroy that feeling of attachment which was so useful to her as a queen, and—can we doubt it?—so agreeable as well as flattering to her as a woman? But though Elizabeth appeared to be decidedly disinclined to marriage, nothing appeared to offend her more than the marriage of any who had pretensions to succeed her. A remarkable instance of this occurred in the case of the lady Catherine Gray, youngest sister of the hapless lady Jane. This lady married, in second nuptials, the earl of Hertford, son of the protector Somerset, and, the lady proving pregnant, Elizabeth confined both husband and wife in the Tower, where they remained for nine years. At the end of that time the countess died, and then the queen at length gave the persecuted earl his liberty.

A. D. 1662.—Besides all considerations of his personal and ineradicable bigotry, Philip of Spain had yet another motive for fulfilling the vow which, on escaping from a violent tempest, he had made, to do all that in him lay for the extirpation of heresy. Of that "heresy" Elizabeth, by the common consent not only of her own subjects but of the protestants of all Europe, was looked upon as the child and champion; and her rejection of Philip's hand, and her consequent baffling of all his hopes of obtaining sway over England, had excited his gloomy and vindictive nature to a fierce and personal hatred. In every negotiation, under every circumstance, he made this hatred to the queen appear in his virulent and obstinate opposition to the interests of England. Not content with the most violent persecution of the protestants wherever his own authority could be stretched to reach them, he lent his aid to the queen mother of France. That aid so fearfully turned the scale against the French Huguenots, that their chivalrous leader, the prince of Condé, was fain to apply for aid to the protestant queen of England. Though, during the whole of her long and glorious reign, Elizabeth was wisely chary of involving herself in great expences, the cause of protestantism would probably of itself have been too dear to her to allow of her hesitating. But the prince of Condé appealed to her interest as well as to her religious sympathies. The Huguenots possessed nearly the whole of Normandy; and Condé proffered to give Elizabeth possession of Havre-de-Grace, on condition that she should put a garrison of three thousand men into that place, send three thousand men to garrison Dieppe and Rouen, and supply money to the amount of a hundred thousand crowns. The offer was tempting. True it was that the French, were by treaty bound to restore Calais, but there were many reasons for doubting whether that agreement would be fulfilled. Possessed of Havre, and thus commanding the mouth of the Seine, England would be the more likely to be able to command the restitution of Calais; the offer of Condé was accordingly accepted. Havre and Dieppe were immediately garrisoned, but the latter place was speedily found to be untenable, and evacuated accordingly. To Rouen the catholics were laying siege, and it was with great difficulty that Poyning threw in a small reinforcement of English to aid the Huguenot garrison. Thus aided the Huguenots fought bravely and well, but were at length overpowered and put to the sword. About the same time three thousand more English arrived to the support of Havre, under the command of the earl of Warwick, eldest brother of the lord Robert Dudley. With this aid and a second sum of a hundred thousand crowns, the Huguenots, though severely beaten near Dreux, where Condé and Montmorency were taken prisoners by the catholics, still kept well together, and even took some considerable towns in Normandy.

A.D. 1563.—How sincerely desirous Elizabeth was of effectually aiding the Huguenots will appear from the fact that, while she had thus assisted them with a numerous body of admirable troops and with two hundred thousand crowns, as well as proffered her bond for another hundred thousand if merchants could be found to lend the amount, she was now so poor that she was obliged to summon a parliament and demand assistance. This demand led to a renewal of the parliament's request that she would marry. She had been dangerously ill of the small-pox, and her peril had re-awakened all the national terrors of the evil inseparable from a disputed succession. The parliament, consequently, now added to its petition, that she would marry, the alternative, that she would at least cause her successor to be clearly and finally—save in the event of her marrying and having issue—named by an act of parliament.

Nothing could have been less agreeable to the queen than this petition. She well knew the claim of Mary of Scotland, and shrewdly judged that the being named as her successor would not diminish the inclination of that queen to give her disturbance. On the other hand, to deny that claim and to decide in favour of the house of Suffolk, would be to incite Mary to instant enmity, and at the same time to create in another quarter the impatience, rarely unmixed with enmity, of the declared successor. In this dilemma she acted with her usual caution and policy; gave the parliament to understand that she had by no means irrevocably made up her mind against marriage, and assured them, in general terms, that she could not die with any satisfaction until she had settled the succession on solid and satisfactory foundations.

The parliament, sincerely attached to the queen, and, besides, well aware that her temper would but ill bear aught that bore the appearance of importunity or of dictation, was obliged to be contented, or, seemingly so, with this reply; and proceeded to busy itself in passing needlessly severe laws against the catholics, and ridiculously severe laws against those imaginary and impossible offenders, witches and wizards. A subsidy and two fifteenths, and a subsidy of six shillings in the pound, the last to be paid in three years, were then voted to the queen, and parliament was again prorogued.

After long and mutually cruel butcheries

the French Huguenots and catholics came to an agreement. An amnesty and partial toleration of the Huguenots was published by the court, and Condé was reinstated in his appointments. To the great discredit of this gallant leader, his own and his party's interests were never attended to by him, almost to the entire forgetfulness of his agreements made with Elizabeth when she so nobly and liberally assisted him. He stipulated, indeed, that she should be repaid her expenses, but in return she was to give up Havre, and trust, as before, for the restitution of Calais to the treaty which the French had so evidently resolved upon breaking. Enraged at Condé's breach of faith, and believing the possession of Havre to be her best if not her sole security for the restitution of Calais, Elizabeth rejected these terms with disdain, and sent orders to the earl of Warwick to take every precaution to defend Havre from the attacks of the now united French.

Warwick, in obedience to these orders, expelled all French from that place, and prepared to defend himself against a large French army, encouraged by the presence of the queen mother, the king, the constable of France, and Condé himself. But the courage, vigour, and ability of Warwick, which promised to baffle all attempts upon Havre, or at the least to make it a right dear purchase to the enemy, were counterbalanced by the breaking out among his men of a most fatal and pestilential sickness. Seeing them die daily of this terrible disease, which was much aggravated by the great scarcity of provisions, Warwick urgently demanded a reinforcement and supplies from England. But these being withheld, and the French having succeeded in making two practical breaches, the earl had no alternative but to capitulate, and he was obliged to surrender the place upon the sole condition of being allowed life and safe conduct for his troops. He had hardly surrendered when a reinforcement of three thousand men arrived from England under lord Clinton, but, besides that they were too late, they also were suffering under the plague which at that period raged in England. As a consequence of the loss of Havre, Elizabeth was glad to consent to restore the hostages given by France for the restitution of Calais, on receiving two hundred and twenty thousand crowns,—but it was stipulated that nothing in this transaction should be held to prejudice the claim of either nation.

Though in reality the hatred and jealousy that subsisted between Elizabeth and Mary queen of Scots were bitter and constant, nothing of quarrel had as yet been openly allowed to appear. They corresponded weekly and assumed quite a sisterly tone of affection. So far was this deceptive conduct carried on the part of Elizabeth, that Hales, a lawyer, having published a book opposing the title of Mary as Elizabeth's successor, was fined and imprisoned; and Bacon, the lord keeper, on the mere suspicion of having encouraged that publication, was visited for some time with the queen's displeasure. An interview was even appointed to take place between the two queens at York, but Elizabeth, probably not very anxious to let her subjects see Mary's superiority of personal beauty, pleaded public affairs, and the meeting was abandoned.

A new source of care arose for Elizabeth. Mary, young and lovely, and of no frigid temperament, was naturally not disinclined to a second marriage; and her uncle's restless ambition would scarcely have allowed her to remain unmarried even had she been so. To prevent Mary's marriage was obviously not in Elizabeth's power; but as she, at least, had the power of getting her formally excluded from the English succession, she thought it not so impossible in the first instance to procrastinate Mary's choice, and then to cause it to fall on the least likely person to aid and encourage her in any attempts prejudicial to England. With this view she raised objections, now of one and now of another sort, against the aspirants to Mary's hand, and at length named lord Robert Dudley, her own subject, and, as some thought, her own not unfavoured suitor, as the person upon whom it would be most agreeable to her that Mary's choice should fall.

The lord Robert Dudley—as the reader has hitherto known him, but who had now been created earl of Leicester—was handsome, greatly and generally accomplished, and possessed the art of flattery in its utmost perfection; an art to which, far more than to his solid merits, he owed his power of concealing from Elizabeth his ambition, rapacity, and intolerable haughtiness, or of reconciling her to them. The great and continued favour shown to him by the queen had made himself as well as the multitude imagine, that he might reasonably hope to be honoured with her hand; and it was even believed that the early death of his young and lovely wife, the daughter of a wealthy gentleman named Robarts, had been planned and ordered by the earl, in order to remove what he deemed the sole obstacle to the success of his loftier views. To so ambitious a man, whatever the personal superiority of Mary over Elizabeth, the crown matrimonial of Scotland must have seemed a poor substitute indeed to that of England; and Leicester not only objected to the proposal, but attributed its conception to a deep scheme of his able and bitter enemy, Cecil, to deprive him of his influence by weaning Elizabeth from all personal feeling for him, and causing her to identify him with her rival Mary.

The queen of Scotland, on the other hand, wearied with the long and vexatious delays and vacillations of Elizabeth, and influenced perhaps, by the personal beauty and accomplishments of the earl, as well as anxious by her marriage with him to remove Elizabeth's evident reluctance to naming her to the English succession, intimated her willingness to accept the powerful favourite. But Elizabeth had named him only in the hope that he would be rejected; he was too great a favourite to be parted with; and though she had herself distinctly named the earl as the only man whom she should choose to see the husband of Mary, she now coldly and suddenly withdrew her approbation.

The high, and never too prudent, spirit of Mary naturally revolted from this new proof of duplicity and unfriendly feeling; the correspondence between the rival queens grew less frequent and more curt and formal, and at length for a time wholly ceased. But Mary, probably under the advice of her friends in France, resolved to make yet another effort to avoid a final and irremediable breach with Elizabeth, and for that purpose sent sir James Melvil on a mission to London.

Englishmen are greatly and justly proud of queen Elizabeth; taken as a whole her reign was one of the greatest and wisest in our history. But even making all allowance for the prejudice Melvil may be supposed to have felt against Elizabeth, the account he gives of what he saw of her conduct on this occasion places her in so weak, so vain, so utterly puerile a light, that, would rigid impartiality allow it, one would gladly overlook this portion of our great Elizabeth's reign altogether. Every day she appeared in some new style of dress; every interview was marked by some question as to the difference in feature, person, or manner between herself and her far lovelier, far more accomplished, but far less worthy and less estimable rival, which is infinitely more characteristic of the petty but aching envy of some ill-nurtured school-girl, with vanity made only the more restless and craving of flattery from the occasional suggestions of shrewdness sense on the score of personal inferiority, than of that high-souled and calm-browed queen who knew how to endure a dungeon and to dare an armada.

An accomplished courtier, Melvil was also a shrewd and practised man of the world; and it is quite clear, from his memoirs, that he saw through Elizabeth alike in the weakness of her vanity, and in the strength of her deep and iron determination. His report, and probably both her friends' advice and her own inclination, determined Mary no longer to hesitate about choosing a husband for herself. Lord Darnley, son of the earl of Lenox, cousin-german to Mary by the lady Margaret Douglas, niece of Henry VIII., was by all parties in Scotland considered a very suitable person. He was of the same family as Mary; was, after her, next heir to the crown of England, and would preserve the crown of Scotland in the house of Stuart. While these considerations made him eligible in the eyes of Mary's family and of all Scotsmen, he had been born and educated in England, and it was therefore not to be supposed that Elizabeth could have any of that jealousy towards him which she might have felt in the case of a foreign prince and a papist.

And, in truth, perceiving that it was not to be hoped that Mary would remain single, Elizabeth was not ill pleased that Mary's choice should fall upon Darnley. He could add nothing in the way of power or alliance to the Scottish queen, whose marriage with him would at once release Elizabeth from the half-defined jealousy she felt as to Leicester's real sentiments, and would, at the same time, do away with all dread of the queen of Scots forming any one of the numerous foreign alliances which were open to her, and any one of which would be dangerous to England.

Lenox had been long in exile. Elizabeth now secretely desired Mary to recall him, reverse his attainder, and restore his forfeited possessions; but no sooner was this done than she openly blamed the proceedings, with the view at once of embarrassing Mary and of keeping up her own interest with the opposite faction in Scotland. Her duplicity did not stop here. When the negotiations for the marriage were far advanced, Darnley asked Elizabeth's permission to go into Scotland; and that permission was, to all appearance, cheerfully granted. But when she learned that his handsome person was admired by Mary and that the marriage was fully determined on, she sent to order Darnley on no account to go on with the marriage, but, on his allegiance, to return to England forthwith. Compliance with such caprice and tyranny was out of the question; and Elizabeth threw the countesses of Lenox and her second son into prison, and seized all Lenox's English property without the shadow of a plea beyond the conduct of young Darnley, to which she had deliberately given her sanction! The insulting vacillation of Elizabeth's conduct in a matter of such delicate interest to Mary, can only be reconciled with her usual shrewdness by supposing that independent of any small feminine spitefulness of which, we fear, that even the utmost partiality can hardly acquit her, she deliberately, and as a matter of deep, though merciless, policy, sought thus to obtain a plea upon which to repudiate Mary as her successor in England, and a ready means of stirring up discontents among Mary's own subjects, and thus preventing them from being troublesome to England.

In 1565.—Mary's relationship to the house of Guise, whose detestation of the reformed religion was so widely known and so terribly attested, was very unfortunate for her; inasmuch as it converted her warm attachment to her own religion into something like bigotry and intolerance. She not only refused to ratify the acts establishing the reformed religion, and endeavoured to restore civil power and jurisdiction to the catholic bishops, but was even imprudent enough to write letters to the council of Trent, in which she professed her hope not merely of one day succeeding to the crown of England, but also of so using her power and influence as to bring about the reconciliation of the whole of her dominions to the holy see. Considering her knowledge of Elizabeth's temper and feelings towards her, and considering, too, how much advantage Elizabeth would obviously obtain from every circumstance which could cause the Scotch zealots to sympathize with Elizabeth against their own queen, nothing could well have been more imprudent than this misstep. Under any circumstances, probably, Mary, a zealous catholic, would have had but an uneasy reign among the fiercely bigoted Scottish protestants; but there is little reason to doubt that this very communication to the council of Trent was a main first cause of all her subsequent misfortunes. The protestants of Scotland were at that time no whit behind the catholics of any part of the world, either in self-righteousness, or in bitter and bigoted detestation of all who chanced to differ from them. Alarmed as well as indignant at the queen's ostentatious attachment to her own creed, the protestants not only murmured at her exercise of its rites, even in her own private residence and chapel, but abused her faith in the grossest terms while importuning her to abjure it. The queen answered these rude advisers with a temper which, had she always displayed it, might have spared her many a sorrowful day; assured them that besides that her apostacy would deprive Scotland of her most powerful friends on the continent, she was sincerely attached to her own faith and convinced of its truth. With the self-complacency peculiar to narrow-minded bigotry, the remonstrants assured her that they alone had truth on their side, and bade her prefer that truth to all earthly support and alliances. The rude zeal of the reformed was still farther increased by the belief, carefully encouraged by the agents of Elizabeth, that the Lenox family were also papists. It was in vain that Darnley, now king Henry, endeavoured to show that he was no papist by frequently making his appearance at the established church; this conduct was attributed to a jesuitical and profound wiliness, and the preachers often publicly insulted him; Knox, especially, not scrupling to tell him from the pulpit that boys and women were only put to rule over nations for the punishment of their sins.

While the violence of the clergy and the arts of Elizabeth's emissaries were thus irritating the common people of Scotland against their queen, the discontents of her nobility began to threaten her with a yet nearer and more ruinous opposition. The duke of Chateaufort and the earls of Murray and Argyle, with other malcontent nobles, actually raised forces, and soon appeared in arms against the king and queen, instigated to this treasonable conduct merely by their paltry fears of being losers of influence and power by the rise of the Lenox family consequent upon Darnley's marriage to the queen. The reformed preachers openly, and English emissaries secretly, aided the malcontent lords in endeavouring to seduce or urge the whole Scots population from its allegiance. But the people were, for once, in no humour to follow the seditious or the fanatical; and after but very trifling show of success, the rebels, being purged by the king and queen at the head of an army of eighteen thousand, were fain to seek safety in England.

We dwell more upon the affairs of Scotland just at this period than we generally do, because thus much of Scottish history is necessary here to the understanding of that portion of English history with which Mary, queen of Scots, is so lamentably, and so disgracefully to England, connected.

The event of the Scottish revolt having thus completely disappointed all the hopes of Elizabeth, she now strenuously disavowed all concern in it; and having induced Murray and Chateaufort's agent, the abbot of Kilwinning, to make a similar declaration before the Spanish and French ambassadors, she, with a bitter practical satire, added to the force of their declaration, by instantly ordering them from her presence as detestable and unworthy traitors!

A. D. 1566.—Hard is the fate of princes! Rarely can they have sincere friends; still more rarely can they have favourites who do not, by their own ingratitude or the envy of others, call up a storm of misfortune for both sovereign and favourite.

Hitherto the conduct of Mary had been morally irreproachable; for the coarse abuse of Knox is itself evidence of the strongest kind, that, save her papacy and her sex—of which she seems to have felt an about equal detestation—even he had not wherewithal to reproach her. Having for her second husband a handsome and youthful man of her own choice, it might have been hoped that at least her domestic felicity was secured. But Darnley was a vain weak-minded man; alike fickle and violent; ambitious of distinction, yet weary of the slightest necessary care; easily offended at the most trivial opposition, and as easily governed by the most obvious and fulsome flattery. Utterly incapable of aiding the queen in the government, he was no jot the less anxious to have the crown-matrimonial added to the courtesy-title of king which Mary had already bestowed upon him. In this temper he was inclined to detest all who seemed able and willing to afford the queen counsel; and among these was an Italian musician, by name David Rizzio. He had attended an embassy sent to Scotland by the duke of Savoy, and was retained at the Scotch court, in the first instance, merely on account of his musical talents. But he was both aspiring and clever, and he soon testified so much shrewdness and inclination to be useful, that he was made French secretary to the queen. Brought thus intimately into contact with the queen, he so rapidly improved on his advantages, that in a short time he was universally looked upon not only as the queen's chief confidant and counsellor, but also as the chief and most powerful dispenser of her favours. As is usually the case with favourites, the ability which had enabled Rizzio to conquer court favour did not teach him to use it with moderation; and he had scarcely secured the favour of the queen, ere he had incurred the deadly hate of nearly every one at court. The reformed hated him as a papist and the reputed spy and pensionary of the pope; the needy hated him for his wealth, the high-born for his upstart insolence; the aspiring detested his ambition, and many men—probably not too pure in their own morals—could find no other supposition on which to account for Mary's protection of him, save a criminal connection between them. It is true that Rizzio was ugly and by no means very young even when he first came to court, and some years had now passed since that event; and, moreover, Rizzio, whose ability had done much to clear away the obstacles to the marriage of Mary and Darnley, had at one time, at least, been as much in the favour of the king as of the queen. But Darnley, soured by the queen's coldness, which he was willing to attribute to any cause rather than to his own misconduct, easily fell into the snare set by the enemies alike of himself, his queen, and Rizzio, and became furiously jealous of an ugly and almost deformed secretary. Yet Darnley was one of the handsomest men of the age and a vain man too!

Among the extravagant reports to which the excessive favour already enjoyed by Rizzio had given rise, was one, that it was the intention of Mary to make him chancellor in the room of the earl of Morton! It was true that Rizzio knew nothing of the language or of the laws of Scotland; but the report was credited even by the astute Morton himself, who forthwith exerted himself to persuade Darnley that nothing but the death of Rizzio could ever restore peace and safety to either king or kingdom.

The earl of Lenox, the king's father, George Douglas, natural brother to the countess of Lenox, and the lords Lindsay and Ruthven, readily joined in the conspiracy against the unfortunate foreigner, and, to guard themselves against the known fickleness of the king, they got him to sign a paper authorizing and making himself responsible for the assassination of Rizzio, as being "an undertaking tending to the glory of God and the advancement of religion!" The banished lords who were ever hovering on the borders in hope of some event productive of disturbance, were invited by the king to return, and every preparation being made, a night was at length appointed for the murder of Rizzio.

Mary, now in the sixth month of her pregnancy, was at supper in her private apartments, attended by Rizzio, the countess of Argyle, her natural sister, and others of her personal attendants, when the king suddenly entered the room and placed himself behind the queen's chair. Immediately afterwards lord Ruthven, cased in armour and ghastly from long illness and anxiety, George Douglas, and others, rushed in and seized upon the unfortunate Rizzio as he sprang up to the queen and clung to her garments, shrieking the while for protection. The queen, with tears, intreaties, and even threats, endeavoured to save her secretary, but the resolved conspirators forced him into the antichamber, where he died beneath no fewer than fifty-six wounds!

The condition of the queen being considered, the presence of her husband while she was thus horribly outraged by being made witness of the atrocious murder of her servant, must necessarily have turned her former coldness towards Darnley into actual loathing. On learning that Rizzio was indeed dead, she immediately dried her tears, saying, "I will weep no more; henceforth I will only think of revenge."

Assuming Mary to be guilty of the participation in the murder of her husband with which she was afterwards so disastrously charged, though even this outrage upon her both as queen and woman would be no excuse for her misconduct as queen, woman, and wife, yet it ought not wholly to be left out of sight while we judge of the character of Mary. In a court such as the court of Scotland clearly was at that time, nothing short of the purity of angels could have escaped the general pollution of cruelty, deceit, and sensuality.

All resentments felt by Mary were now, it should seem, merged into detestation of the cruelly and insolently savage conduct of her husband. She showed him every mark of contempt in public, and avoided him in private as though in mingled hate and terror. At length, however, she was confined at Edinburgh castle of a son; and as Darnley had apartments there, they were at least apparently reconciled and living together.

A messenger was instantly sent to Elizabeth, who received the news while at a ball at Greenwich. She was much cast down at first, and even complained to some of her attendants that she was but a barren stock, while Mary was the glad mother of a fair boy. But she soon recovered her wonted self-possession, and on the following day she publicly congratulated Melvil, Mary's envoy, and sent the earl of Bedford and George Cary, son of her kinsman the earl of Hunsdon, to attend the christening of the young prince, and to carry some rich presents to his mother.

But whatever cordiality Elizabeth might affect upon this occasion, the birth of a son to the queen of Scots, as it increased the zeal of her partisans in England, so it made even the best friends of Elizabeth desirous that she should take some effectual steps for the settlement of the succession.

It was proposed by some leading members of parliament that the question of the succession and that of the supply should go together. Sir Ralph Sadler, in order to elude this bringing of the question to a point, affirmed that he had heard the queen say that for the good of her people she had come to the resolution to marry. Others of the court affirmed the same, and then the house began to consider about joining the question of the queen's marriage to that of the settlement in general, when a message was brought from the queen ordering the house to proceed no farther in the matter. She pledged her queenly word as to her sincere intention to marry; and she said that to name any successor previously would be to increase her already great personal dangers. This message by no means satisfied the house, and Peter Wentworth, a popular member, bluntly said that such a prohibition was a breach of the privileges of the house; while some of the members on the same side added, that unless the queen would pay some regard to their future security by fixing a successor, she would show herself rather as the step-mother than as the natural parent of her people. The debates still continuing in this strain, the queen sent for the speaker, and her remonstrances with him having failed to produce the desired effect upon the house, she shortly afterwards dissolved the parliament, sharply reflecting, at the same time, upon the pertinacity with which they had pressed her to marry or fix the succession.

A.D. 1567.—The debates in parliament had more than ever awakened the zeal of the partisans of the queen of Scots. The catholics of England were to a man ready to rise on her behalf, should Elizabeth's death or any national calamity afford an inviting opportunity; and, moreover, the court of Elizabeth was itself full of Mary's partisans. But while Elizabeth and her sagacious friend and councillor Cecil—to whom it is not too much to say that Elizabeth owed more than half the glory she acquired, and owed still more freedom from the obloquy her temper would but for him have caused her to incur—were using every expedient to avoid the necessity of declaring so dangerous a successor as the queen of Scots, that ill-fated princess was in the very act of plunging herself into a tissue of horrors and infamies, which were to render her the prisoner and the victim of the princess whom she had dared to rival and hoped to succeed.

After the death of Rizzio, Mary's perilous and perplexed situation had made some confident and assistant indispensably necessary to her, especially situated as she was with her frivolous and sullen husband. The person who at this time stood highest in her confidence was the earl of Bothwell, a man of debauched character and great daring, but whose fortune was much involved, and who was more noted for his opposition to Murray and the rigid reformers, than for any great civil or military talents. This nobleman, it is believed, suggested to her the expedient of being divorced from Darnley, but from some difficulties which arose to its execution that project was laid aside.

The intimate friendship of Mary with Bothwell, and her aversion to her husband, made observant persons much astonished when it was announced that a sudden return of the queen's affection to her husband had taken place; that she had even journeyed to Glasgow to attend his sick bed; that she tended him with the utmost kindness; and that, as soon as he could safely travel, she had brought him with her to Holyrood-house, in Edinburgh. On their arrival there it was found, or pretended, that the low situation of the palace, and the noise of the persons continually going and coming, denied the king the repose necessary to his infirm state. A solitary house, called the Kirk o' Field, at some distance from the palace, but near enough to admit of Mary's frequent attendance, was accordingly taken, and here she continued her attentions to him, and even slept for several nights in a room immediately below his. On the ninth of February she excused herself to him for not sleeping at the palace, as one of her attendants was going to be married, and she had promised to grace the ceremony with her presence. About two o'clock in the morning an awful explosion was heard, and it was soon afterwards discovered that the Kirk o' Field was blown up, and the body of the unfortunate Henry Darnley was found in a field at some distance, but with no marks of violence upon it.

It is a singular fact that, amidst all the dispute that has taken place as to the guilt or innocence of Mary in this most melancholy affair, no one of the disputants has noticed Mary's selection of a room immediately below that of the king for several nights before the murder. Was the gunpowder deliberately, in small quantities and at intervals, deposited and arranged in that apartment?

That Darnley had been most foully murdered no sane man could doubt, and the previous intimacy of Mary and Bothwell caused the public suspicion at once to be turned upon them; and the conduct of Mary was exactly calculated to confirm, instead of refuting, the horrible suspicion which attached to her. A proclamation was indeed made, offering a reward for the discovery of the king's murderer; but the people observed that far more anxiety was displayed to discover those who attributed that terrible deed to Bothwell and the queen. With a perfectly insatiable folly, the queen neglected even the external decencies which would have been expected from her, even had she been less closely connected in the public eye with the supposed murderer, Bothwell. For the earl of Lenox, father of the murdered king, wrote a letter to the queen, in which, avoiding all accusation of the queen, he implored her justice upon those whom he plainly charged with the murder, namely, Bothwell, sir James Balfour and his brother Gilbert Balfour, David Chalmer, and four other persons of the queen's household; but Mary, though she cited Lenox to appear at court and support his charge, and so far seemed to entertain it, left the important fortress of Edinburgh in the hands of Bothwell as governor, and of his creature Balfour as his deputy.

A day for the trial of the charge made by Lenox was appointed; and that nobleman, with a very small attendance, had already reached Stirling on his way to Edinburgh, when his information of the extraordinary countenance shown to Bothwell, and the vast power entrusted to him, inspired Lenox with fears as to even his personal safety should he appear in Edinburgh; he therefore sent Cunningham, one of his suite, to protest against so hurried an investigation of this important affair, and to intreat Mary, for her own sake as well as for the sake of justice, to take time, and to make arrangements for a full and impartial trial, which obviously could not be had while Bothwell was not only at liberty, but in possession of exorbitant and overwhelming power. Not the slightest attention was paid to the manifestly just demand of Lenox; a jury was sworn, and as no prosecutor or witness was present, that jury could only acquit the accused—the verdict being accompanied by a protest, in which they stated the situation in which the very nature of the proceedings had placed them. But even had witnesses been present, their evidence could have availed little towards furthering the ends of justice, for, by a very evident willfulness, those who drew the indictment had charged the crime as having been committed on the tenth day of the month, while the evidence must have proved it to have been the ninth, and this significant circumstance increased the odium of both Mary and Bothwell. Two days after this shameful trial a parliament was held, and Bothwell, whose acquittal was such as must have convinced every impartial man of his guiltiness, was actually chosen to carry the royal sceptre!

Such indecent but unequivocal evidence of the lengths to which Mary was prepared to go in securing impunity to Bothwell, awed even those who most detested the proceedings; and a bond of association was signed, by which all the chief nobility present at this parliament, referred to the acquittal of Bothwell as a legal and complete one, engaged to defend him against all future imputation of the murder of the late king, and recommended Mary to marry Bothwell! Degraded, indeed, by long and shameless faction must the nation have been, when the chief of its nobles could insult public justice and public decency by the publication of such a document as this!

Having thus paved the way towards his ultimate designs, Bothwell assembled a troop of eight hundred cavalry on pretence of pursuing some armed robbers who infested the borders, and waylaid Mary on her return from Stirling, where she had been paying a visit to her infant son. Mary was seized near Edinburgh; but sir James Melvil, her attached and faithful servant, who was with her at the time, not only confessed that he saw no surprise or unwillingness on her part, but adds, that some of Bothwell's officers openly laughed at the notion of seizure of Mary's person, she stated the whole matter to have been arranged between the parties themselves. Bothwell carried his prisoner to Dunbar, and there made himself master of her person, even if he had not been so before. Some of the nobility, either still doubtful of her guilty consent, or desirous, at the least, of forcing her into a more explicit declaration of it, now sent to offer their services to rescue her; but she, with infinite coolness, replied, that though Bothwell had originally obtained possession of her person by violence, he had since treated her so well that she was now quite willing to remain with him.

That no circumstance of infamy and effrontery might be wanting to this disgusting business, Bothwell, when he had himself proposed as the queen's husband and seized upon her person, was already a married man! But a divorce was now sued for, and obtained in four days from the commencement of the suit; the queen was then taken to Edinburgh, and the banners of marriage put up between her and the duke of Orkney, which title Bothwell now bore.

In the midst of the awful degradation exhibited by the Scottish nation at this time, it is pleasing to notice that Craig, a clergyman, being desired to solemnize the marriage thus abominably brought about, not only refused to perform the ceremony, but openly reprobated it, with a courage which so put the council to shame that it dared not punish him. The bishop of Orkney, a protestant, was more compliant, and was subsequently very deservedly deposed by his church. Unruffled by the disgust of her own people and by the remonstrances of her relations, the Guises of France, the infatuated Mary thus pursued her designs, and it became known that Bothwell, with her consent, was taking measures to get the young prince James into his power. This at length fairly aroused public indignation; the chief nobility, including most of those who had signed the ever infamous bond in favour of Bothwell, now formed an association for the protection of the young prince and for the punishment of the murderers of the king. The army of the associated lords and the royal troops under Bothwell met at Carberry-hill; but it was so clear both that Bothwell had no capacity equal to the occasion, and that her own troops looked upon their cause with disgust, that Mary, after making certain stipulations, put herself into the hands of the confederates and was taken to Edinburgh, the populace reproaching her in the coarsest terms, and holding up banners representing the murder of her husband and the distress of her infant son. Bothwell, in the mean time, escaped to the Orkneys, and for some time lived by actual piracy; he at length went to Denmark, where he was thrown into prison, maddened under the severity of his confinement and the horror of his reflections, and died about ten years afterwards, so miserably, that even his atrocity cannot deprive him of our pity.

Though treated with scorn and humbled by the indignities to which she was now daily exposed, Mary was still so infatuated in her affection for the unworthy Bothwell, that she is reported to have said in a letter to him, that she would surrender her crown and dignity rather than his affections; and as she appeared to be thus determined, the confederates, to decrease the chance of her once more getting power into her hands, sent her to a sort of honourable imprisonment in the castle of Lochleven lake. The owner of this place was mother of the earl of Murray, and as she pretended to have been the mother and not the mere mistress of the late king, she bore Mary a hatred which fully insured her vigilance.

Elizabeth was accurately informed of all that had passed in Scotland, and her eagle vision could not fail to perceive the advantages to her own security to be obtained by her interference between Mary and her enraged subjects. She accordingly, through Throckmorton, sent a remonstrance to the confederated lords, and advice, mingled with some severity, to Mary, to whom she offered assistance, and protection at the English court for her infant son, but on condition that she should lay aside all thoughts of revenge or punishment, except as far as related to the murder of her late husband. As both queen and woman, Elizabeth acted well in both her remonstrance to the lords and her advice to Mary; but, judging from her whole course of policy at other times, it is no breach of charity to suppose that even her womanly pity for Mary's present distressed and perilous situation, did not prevent her from determining to make it available towards her own security and peace for the time to come.

In the mean time the confederated lords proceeded to arrange matters with very little deference to either the rights of their own queen or the remonstrances of the queen of England. After much intrigue and dispute, it was agreed that the regency of the kingdom should be placed in the hands of Murray, and that Mary should resign the crown in favour of her son; nay, so desperate were her circumstances, that, though "with abundance of tears," she actually signed the deeds that made these extensive alterations, without making herself accurately mistress of their contents.

The prince James was immediately proclaimed king and crowned at Stirling, and in the oath which the earl of Morton took in his behalf at that ceremony, an oath to extirpate heresy was included. Elizabeth was so much annoyed at the disregard with which her remonstrance had been treated, that she forbade Throckmorton to attend the young king's coronation. As soon as Murray had assumed the regency a parliament was assembled, in which it was solemnly voted that she was an undoubted accomplice in the murder of her husband, but ought not to be imprisoned. Her abdication and her son's succession were at the same time ratified.

Murray proved himself equal to his high post. He obtained possession of the fortresses which held out for Mary or Bothwell, and every where compelled at least external obedience to his authority. But he had many enemies even among his seeming friends; and of those who had been most enraged against Mary, while she had openly lived in what was no better than adultery with Bothwell, were softened by the contemplation of her sorrows now that he was a fugitive upon the face of the earth, without the possibility of ever regaining his guilty power. To all these persons were added the eminent catholics and the great hudy of the people, who pitied her sorrows now with the same merely instinctive and unreasoning impulse with which recently they had heaped the coarsest contempt upon her misconduct. Even yet, then, it was quite within the bounds of possibility that she might recover her power, and so exert it as to cause the past to be forgiven.

A. D. 1563.—But Mary's own conduct, even when least blameworthy, was ever to be inimical to her. The constant insults and vexations that she endured from the lady of Lochlevin determined her to attempt her escape from that melancholy confinement; and by those artful and winning blandishments which no beautiful woman ever better knew how to employ, she induced George Douglas, brother of the laird of Lochlevin, to aid in her escape. After many vain endeavours the enamoured youth at length got her from the house in disguise, and rowed her across the lake in a small boat.

As soon as her escape was known many of the nobility hastened to offer her their aid, and to sign a bond to defend her against all comers. Among those who thus signed were the earls of Argyle, Huntley, Eglington, Cassilis, Crauford, Rothes, Montrose, Sunderland, and Errol, besides numerous barons and nine bishops, and in a very few days she found her standard surrounded by upwards of six thousand men. Elizabeth, too, offered to assist her, on condition that she would refer the quarrel to her arbitration and allow no French troops to enter the kingdom, but the offer was too late; Murray hastily drew together an army, and attacked her forces at Langside, near Glasgow; and though the regent was somewhat inferior in force, his superior ability inflicted a complete defeat upon Mary, who hastily fled to a fishing-boat in Galloway, and landed the same day at Wokington, in Cumberland, whence she immediately sent a messenger to crave the protection and hospitality of Elizabeth. The reality and extent of the generous sympathy of that princess were now to be developed; interest was now straightly and sternly opposed to real or pretended generosity.

Mary had evidently relied upon the power of her insinuation and eloquence to be of service to her in a personal interview, which she immediately solicited. But the able and tried ministers of Elizabeth were not slower than Mary herself in perceiving the probable consequence of such an interview, and Elizabeth was advised by them that she as a maiden queen could not, consistently even with mere decency, admit to her presence a woman who was charged with murder and adultery, and that, too, under circumstances which made even these horrible crimes more than usually horrible. The queen of Scots was very indignant at being, and on such a plea, deprived of the interview upon which she had so very much reckoned. She replied to the ministers with great spirit, and so evidently showed her determination to consider herself as a sister sovereign seeking Elizabeth's friendship, and not as a charged criminal whom Elizabeth could have any earthly right to sit in judgment upon, that Cecil determined to force her, indirectly at least, upon an investigation, by allowing Murray and his party to charge her before the queen in council with having been "of fore-knowledge, counsel, and device, persuader and commander of the murder of her husband, and had intended to cause the innocent prince to follow his father and so to transfer the crown from the right line to a bloody murderer and godless tyrant." To this point of this intricate and most painful affair the attention of general readers has never been sufficiently directed. The usual narrative of historians leaves the careless or superficial reader to fancy that the conduct of Elizabeth must throughout have been unjustifiable, as to even the detention of Mary, the whole question being Mary's guilt and Elizabeth's right to punish. We have already sufficiently shown that we are not inclined to sacrifice truth to our admiration of the many admirable qualities of Elizabeth. For much of her treatment to Mary she is deserving of the highest blame, and as regards her execution every one must feel the utmost indignation; but the mere detention of her, and inquiry into her guilt as to her husband, and her intentions as to her infant son, were justified alike by the laws of nations and by every feeling of humanity and of morality. That Mary was "an independent sovereign" can only be affirmed by a mere play upon words.

Stained with the deep charges of murder and adultery, beaten on the battle-field, and fugitive from her enraged and horrified subjects, Mary was in no condition to exercise her sovereignty until she should have re-established it by arms or treaty. By arms she could not proceed without great peril to England, for she must have relied upon aid from France; by treaty she could not proceed but by the aid of Elizabeth, whose territory might be perilled by some clause of such treaty. Situated as England was, both as to France and as to Spain, it is quite clear to all who pay due attention to the whole of the circumstances, that in an honourable detention of Mary, and a full, fair, and impartial inquiry into her conduct, Elizabeth would have been fully justified.

The subsequent conduct shown to Mary,

her close imprisonment and unkind treatment, reflect no credit upon either Elizabeth or her ministers; but it must be remembered that Mary, besides those verbal insults which wound women more painfully than the sword itself, greatly provoked the harsh feeling of Elizabeth by her perpetual readiness to lend her name and influence to plots involving the life as well as the crown of Elizabeth.

It seems quite certain that, at the outset of the business, the main desire of both Elizabeth and her ministers was to place Mary in such a position that she would be unable practically to revoke her settlement of the crown upon her infant son, whose regency, being protestant, would have a common interest with England, instead of a temptation to aid France or Spain to her annoyance. One scheme for this purpose was to give her in marriage to an English nobleman, and Elizabeth proposed the alliance to the duke of Norfolk, who bluntly replied, "That woman, madam, shall never be my wife who has been your competitor, and whose husband cannot sleep in security upon his pillow." Unfortunately for the duke, his practice was by no means governed by the sound sense of his theory, and he very soon afterwards consented to offer himself to Mary, in a letter, which was also signed by Arundel, Pembroke, and Leicester. Mary pleaded that "woeful experience had taught her to prefer a single life," but she hinted pretty plainly that Elizabeth's consent might remove such reluctance as she felt. Norfolk, through the bishop of Ross, kept up the correspondence with Mary. Elizabeth was from the very first aware of it, and she at length significantly quoted Norfolk's own words to him, warning him to "beware on what pillow he should rest his head." Shortly afterwards the duke, for continuing the correspondence, was committed to the Tower. Leicester was pardoned for the share he had had in the original correspondence; but there seemed so much danger that both Norfolk and the queen of Scots would be severely dealt with, that all the great catholic families of the north joined in a formidable insurrection. Mary, on the breaking out of this affair, was removed to Coventry; but the contest was short; the earl of Northumberland, who headed the revolt, was defeated and taken prisoner, and thrown into Lochleven castle. His countess, with the earl of Westmoreland and some other fugitives, were safe among the Scotch borderers, who were able to protect them equally against the regent Murray and the emissaries of Elizabeth.

Upon the English of the northern counties who had been beguiled into this hopeless revolt, the vengeance of Elizabeth was terrible and extensive. The poor were handed over to the rigours of martial law, and it is affirmed that from Newcastle to Netherby, in a district sixty miles long and forty miles wide, there was not a town or even a village which was not the scene of execution! The wealthier offenders were reserved for the ordinary course of condemnation by law, it being anticipated that their forfeitures would reimburse the queen the large sums which it had cost her to put down the revolt.

A.D. 1570.—The vigour of the regent Murray had kept the greater part of Scotland perfectly quiet, even while the north of England was in arms for Mary; and as among the numerous projects suggested to Elizabeth for safely ridding herself of Mary was that of delivering her up to Murray, it is most probable that the Scottish queen would have been restored to her country and—though partially and under strong restrictions—to her authority, but for the death of the regent. While amusing Mary with a variety of proposals which came to nothing, varied by sudden objections which had been contrived from the very first, Elizabeth's ministers were sedulously strengthening the hands and establishing the interests of their mistress in Scotland; they, however, seem really to have intended the eventual restoration of Mary under the most favorable circumstances to England, when the enmity and suspicion of the English cabinet against her, as a zealous papist, were made stronger than ever by the publication of a bull by Pius V., in which he insultingly spoke of Elizabeth's as a merely "pretended" right to the crown, and absolved all her subjects from their allegiance. Of this bull, insolent in itself and cruel towards Mary, several copies were published both in Scotland and in England; and a catholic gentleman, named Felton, whose seal bade defiance alike to prudence and decency, was capitally punished for affixing a copy of this document to the gates of the bishop of London.

It must be clear that no sovereign could overlook such an invitation to rebellion and assassination. It would in any state of society be likely to urge some gloomy and half insane fanatic to the crime of murder; though as to any national effect, even while the catholics were still so numerous, the papal bull had now become a mere brutum fulmen. Lingard, even, the ablest catholic historian, says, upon this very transaction, "If the pontiff promised himself any particular benefit from this measure, the result must have disappointed his expectations. The time was gone by when the thunders of the Vatican could shake the thrones of princes. By foreign powers the bull was suffered to sleep in silence; among the English catholics it served only to breed doubts, dissensions, and dismay. Many contended that it had been issued by incompetent authority; others, that it could not bind the natives until it should be carried into actual execution by some foreign power; all agreed that it was, in their regard, an imprudent and cruel expedient, which rendered them liable to the suspicion of disloyalty, and afforded their enemies a pretence to brand them with the name of traitors. To Elizabeth, however, though she affected to ridicule the sentence, it proved a source of considerable uneasiness and alarm.

The parliament, at once alarmed and indignant at the bull of Pius V. very naturally laid some heavy restrictions upon the Catholics, who were feared to be ready at any moment to rise in favour of the queen of Scots and for the deposition of Elizabeth, should Philip of Spain or his general Alva, governor of the Netherlands, land a sufficiently numerous army of foreign papists in England. And these fears of the parliament and the ministry had but too solid foundation. The duke of Norfolk from his confinement was constantly intriguing with Mary; and that unhappy princess, wearied and goaded to desperation by her continued imprisonment, and the constant failure of all attempts at gaining her liberty, even when she the most frankly and completely agreed to all that was demanded of her, sent Rudolph, an Italian, who had her confidence, to solicit the co-operation of the pope, Philip of Spain, and Alva. Some letters from Norfolk to the latter personage were intercepted by the English ministry, and Norfolk was tried for treasonable league with the queen's enemies, to the danger of her crown and dignity. Norfolk protested that his aim was solely to restore Mary to her own crown of Scotland, and that detriment to the authority of Elizabeth he had never contemplated and would never have abetted.

A.D. 1572.—His defence availed him nothing; he was found guilty by his peers and condemned to death. Even then the queen hesitated to carry the sentence into effect against the premier duke of England, who was, also, her own relative. Twice she was induced by the ministers to sign the warrant, and twice she revoked it. This state of hesitation lasted for four months. At the end of that time the parliament presented an address strongly calling upon her to make an example of the duke, to which she at length consented, and Norfolk was beheaded; dying with great courage and constancy, and still protesting that he had no ill design towards his own queen in his desire to aid the unhappy queen of Scots. We are inclined to believe that the duke was sincere on this head; but certainly his judgment did not equal his sincerity; for how could he expect to overturn the vast power of Elizabeth, so far as to re-establish Mary on the throne, but by such civil and international fighting as must have perilled Elizabeth's throne, and, most probably, would have led to the sacrifice of her life.

Burleigh, devoted to the glory of his royal mistress and to the welfare of her people, and plainly perceiving that the Catholics, both at home and abroad, would either aid or feign a motive to mischief in the detention of the queen of Scots, resolutely advised that that unhappy queen should be violently dealt with, as being at the bottom of all schemes and attempts against the peace of England. But Elizabeth was not even yet—would that she had never been!—so far irritated or alarmed as to consent to aught more than the detention of Mary; and to all the suggestions of Burleigh she contented herself with replying, with a touch of that poetic feeling which even intrigues of state never wholly banished from her mind, that "she could not put to death the bird that, to escape the lure of the hawk, had flown to her nest for protection."

Burleigh was aided in his endeavours against Mary by the parliament; but Elizabeth, though both her anxiety and her anger daily grew stronger, personally interfered to prevent a bill of attainder against Mary, and even another bill which merely went to exclude her from the succession.

Towards the friends of Mary, Elizabeth was less merciful. The earl of Northumberland was delivered by Morton—who had succeeded Lenox in the Scotch regency—into the hands of the English ministers; and that chivalrous and unfortunate nobleman was beheaded at York.

The state of France at this time was such from the fierce enmity of the Catholics to the Huguenots or protestants, as to give serious uneasiness to Elizabeth. The deep enmity of Charles IX. of France towards the leaders of his protestant subjects was disguised, indeed, by the most artful caresses bestowed upon Coligni, the king of Navarre, and other leading Huguenots; but circumstances occurred to show that the king of France not only detested those personages and their French followers, but that he would gladly seize any good opportunity to aid Philip of Spain in the destruction, if possible, of the protestant power of England.

The perfidious Charles, in order to plunge the Huguenots into the more profoundly fatal security, offered to give his sister Margaret in marriage to the prince of Navarre; and Coligni, with other leaders of the Huguenot party, arrived in Paris, to celebrate a marriage which promised so much towards the reconciliation of the two parties. But so far was peace from being the real meaning of the court of France, that the queen of Navarre was poisoned. This suspicious sudden death, however, of so eminent a person did not arouse the doomed Coligni and the other protestants to a sense of their real situation. The marriage was concluded; and but a few days after, on the eve of St. Bartholomew, the designs of Charles IX., or, more strictly speaking of his execrable mother, burst forth. The venerable Coligni, was murdered almost by the king's side; men, women, and children alike were butchered by the king's troops so that in Paris alone about five hundred persons of rank and above ten thousand of the lower order are known to have perished in this most sanguinary and cowardly affair. Orders were at the same time sent to Rouen, Lyons, and other great towns of France, where the same detestable butcheries were committed on a proportionably large scale.

The king of Navarre and the prince of Condé narrowly escaped. The duke of Guise advised their destruction, but the king had contracted so much personal affection for them as he could feel for any one but the

she-wolf his mother, and he caused their lives to be spared on condition of their seeming conversion to popery.

The frightful massacre of St. Bartholomew could not but be greatly alarming as well as disgusting to Elizabeth. She could not but perceive, from a butchery so frightful and extensive, that there was among the catholic princes of the continent a determination to exterminate protestantism; nor could she but feel that she, as the champion of that faith, was henceforth more conspicuously than ever marked out for destruction, could it be accomplished either by warfare or in the more dastardly way of private assassination.

Charles IX. was himself conscious of the offence this atrocious massacre of his protestant subjects must necessarily give to Elizabeth, and he sent a strong apology to her through Fenelon, his ambassador. To us it has ever appeared that this apology did, in reality, only make the offence the blacker; Charles now calumniated the unfortunate persons whom he had murdered. He pretended that he had discovered, just as it was about to be carried into execution, a Huguenot conspiracy to seize his person, and that it was as a necessary matter of self-defence that his catholic soldiery had acted. The single fact that orders for wholesale massacre were acted upon at distant provincial cities, as well as at Paris, would at once and for ever give the lie to this statement. Even Charles's own ambassador confessed that he was ashamed alike of his country and of the apology which he was, by his office, compelled to make for so outrageous a crime. His office, however, left him no choice, and he went to court. Here he found every one, male and female, attired in the deepest mourning, and bearing in their features the marks of profound grief and alarm. No one spoke to him, even, until he arrived at the throne, where the queen, who respected his personal character, heard his apology with all the calmness that she could muster. Elizabeth very plainly, in her reply, showed that she utterly disbelieved Charles's calumny upon his protestant subjects, but she concluded that she should defer making up her mind upon the real feelings of Charles until she should see how he would act in future, and that in the mean time, as requested by his own ambassador, she would rather pity than blame him.

The massacres in France, joined to the Spanish massacres and persecutions in the Low Countries, and the favour into which Charles IX. now visibly took the Guises, made it evident to Elizabeth that nothing but opportunity was wanting to induce the French and Spaniards to unite for her destruction, and she took all possible precautions. She fortified Portsmouth, paid all requisite attention to her militia and fleet, and, while she renewed her open alliances with the German princes, she lent all the aid that she secretly could to the people of the Low Countries to assist them against their Spanish tyrants.

A. D. 1579.—Beyond what we have just now said of the foreign policy of Elizabeth we need not here say anything; the events that took place, whether in Spain, the Netherlands, or France, falling properly under those heads. The attention of Elizabeth, as to foreigners, was addressed chiefly to aiding the protestants with secrecy and with as rigid economy and stringent conditions as were consistent with effectual aid; and to keeping up such a constant demonstration of vigour and a prepared position, as might intimidate catholic princes from any such direct hostility to her as would be likely to provoke her into openly encouraging and assisting their malecontent subjects.

This policy enabled Elizabeth to enjoy a profound peace during years which saw nearly all the rest of Europe plunged in war and misery.

A. D. 1580.—The affairs of Scotland just at this time gave Elizabeth some uneasiness. During several years the regent Morton had kept that kingdom in the strictest amity. But the regent had of late wholly lost the favour of the turbulent nobles, and he found himself under the necessity of giving in his resignation; and the government was formally assumed by King James himself, though he was now only eleven years of age. The count D'Aubigny, of the house of Lenox, was employed by the duke of Guise to detach James from the interests of Elizabeth, and to cause him to espouse those of his mother. Elizabeth endeavoured to support and reëstate Morton, but D'Aubigny had now obtained so much influence with the king, that he was able to have Morton imprisoned and subsequently beheaded, as an accomplice in the murder of the late king.

With Spain, too, Elizabeth's relations were at this period uneasy and threatening. In revenge for the aid which he knew Elizabeth to have given to his revolted subjects of the Netherlands, Philip of Spain sent a body of troops to aid her revolted subjects of Ireland; and her complaints of this interference were answered by a reference to the piracies committed by the celebrated admiral Drake, who was the first Englishman who sailed round the world, and who obtained enormous booty from the Spaniards in the New World.

A. D. 1581.—The jesuits, and the scholars generally of the continental seminaries which the king of Spain had established to compensate to the catholics for the loss of the universities of England, were so obviously and so intrusively hostile to the queen and the protestant faith, that some stringent laws against them and the catholics generally were now passed. And let any who feel inclined to condemn the severity of those laws first reflect upon the continual alarm in which both the queen and her protestant subjects had been kept, by the pernicious exertions of men who never seemed at a loss for a subtle casuistry to induce or to justify a brutal cruelty or an impudent sedition.

Campion, a Jesuit who had been sent over to explain to the catholics of England that they were not bound, in obedience to the bull of Pius V. to rebel until the pope should give them a second and explicit order to that effect.—i. e. not until the state of England should by accident, or by jesuitical practices, be placed in convenient confusion: 1.—being detected in treasonable practices directly opposed to his professed errand, was first racked and then executed.

Elizabeth had formerly been addressed with offers of marriage by Alençon, now duke of Anjou, brother to the late tyrant Charles IX. of France, and he now renewed his addresses through his agent Simier, a man of great talent and most insinuating manners. The agent so well played his part in the negotiation that he excited the jealousy of the powerful and unprincipled Leicester, who offered him every possible opposition and insult. The queen, whom Simier informed of Leicester's marriage to the widow of the earl of Essex, formally took Simier under her especial protection, and ordered Leicester to confine himself at Greenwich.

Simier so well advocated the cause of Anjou, that Elizabeth went so far as to invite that prince to England; and after making stipulations for the aid of France, should the interests of Anjou in the Netherlands involve her in a quarrel with Philip of Spain, Elizabeth, in presence of her whole court and the foreign ambassadors, placed a ring on Anjou's finger, and distinctly said that she did so in token of her intention to become his wife. As she was now nine-and-forty years of age, and might be supposed to have outlived all the youthful sickness imputed to her sex, and as she gave orders to the bishops to regulate the forms of the marriage, every one supposed that it was certain. Despatches were sent to notify the approaching event abroad, and in many parts of England it was anticipatively celebrated by public holiday and rejoicing.

But the marriage of Elizabeth to Anjou was looked upon with great dislike by the leading men of the English court. The duke, as a catholic and a member of a most persecuting family, could not but be viewed with fear and suspicion by sound statesmen like Walsingham and Hatton; while Leicester, conscious that with the queen's marriage his own vast power and influence would end, heartily wished her not to marry at all. These courtiers employed her favourite ladies to stimulate her pride by hinting the probability of her husband, instead of herself, becoming the first personage in her dominions; and to appeal to her fears by suggesting the dangers to which she would be exposed should she have children; the latter, surely, a danger not very probable at her time of life. However, the courtiers' artifices were fully successful. Even while the state messengers were on their way to foreign courts with the news of the queen's approaching marriage, she sent for Anjou, and told him, with tears and protestations of regret, that her people were so much prejudiced against her union with him, that though her own happiness must needs be sacrificed she had resolved to consult the happiness of her people, and therefore could not marry him. The duke on leaving her presence threw away the costly ring she had given him, and declared that Englishwomen were as capricious as the waves that surround their island. He soon after departed, and being driven from Belgium to France, died there; deeply and sincerely regretted by Elizabeth.

A. n. 1594.—Several attempts having been made to raise new troubles in England in favour of the queen of Scots, the ministers of Elizabeth made every exertion to detect the conspirators. Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, brother to that earl who was some time before beheaded for his connection with Mary's cause; Howard, earl of Arundel, son of the duke of Norfolk, that princess's late suitor; lord Paget and Charles Arundel; and Francis Throgmorton, a private gentleman, were implicated. Most of them escaped, but Throgmorton was executed. Mendoza, the Spanish ambassador, who had been the prime mover of this plot, was sent home in disgrace. Some farther proofs of a widely spread and dangerous conspiracy having been discovered in some papers seized upon Creighton, a Scotch Jesuit, the English ministers, who found Mary connected with all these attempts, removed her from the custody of the earl of Shrewsbury, who seemed not to have been sufficiently watchful of her conduct, and committed her to that of sir Amias Paulet and sir Drue Drury, men of character and humanity, but too much devoted to Elizabeth to allow any unreasonable freedom to their prisoner.

Farther laws were at the same time passed against Jesuits and popish priests, and a council was named by act of parliament with power to govern the kingdom, settle the succession, and avenge the queen's death, should that occur by violence. A subsidy and two fifteenths were likewise granted to the queen.

During this session of parliament a new conspiracy was discovered, which greatly increased the general animosity to the catholics, and proportionally increased the attachment of the parliament to the queen, and their anxiety to shield her from the dangers by which she seemed to be perpetually surrounded. A catholic gentleman named Parry, who had made himself so conspicuous in the house of commons by his intemperate opposition to a bill for restraining the seditious practices of Romish priests, that he was committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms and only liberated by the clemency of the queen, was now, in but little less than six weeks, charged with high treason. This man had been employed as a secret agent by lord Burleigh, but not deeming himself sufficiently well treated he went to Italy, where he seems to have deeply intrigued with both the papal party at Rome and the ministers of his own sovereign at home. Having procured from the Romish authorities a warm sanction of his professed design of killing queen Elizabeth with his own hand, this sanction he hastened to communicate to Elizabeth, and being refused a pension he returned to his old vocation of a spy, and was employed to watch the pernicious Jesuit Persons, in conjunction with Nevil. Though actually in the service of the government, both Nevil and Parry were men of desperate fortune, and their discontent at length grew so desperate that they agreed to shoot the queen when she should be out riding. The earl of Westmoreland, under sentence of exile, chanced to die just at this period, and Nevil, who, though a salaried spy, was also in exile in Normandy, thought it very likely that he, as next heir to the deceased earl, would recover the family estate and title by revealing the plot to which he was a party. Nevil's revelations to the government were confirmed by Parry's own confession, and the latter, a double traitor,—alike traitor to his native land and to his foreign spiritual sovereign,—was very deservedly executed.

A fleet of twenty sail under admiral sir Francis Drake, with a land force of two thousand three hundred volunteers under Christopher Carlisle, did the Spaniards immense mischief this year, taking St. Jago, near Cape Verd, where they got good store of provision, but little money; St. Domingo, where they made the inhabitants save their houses by the payment of a large sum of money; and Carthagena, which they similarly held to ransom. On the coast of Florida they burned the towns of St. Anthony and St. Helen's; and thence they went to the coast of Virginia, where they found the miserable remnant of the colony so long before planted there by sir Walter Raleigh. The poor colonists were at this time reduced to utter misery and despair by long continued ill success, and gladly abandoned their settlements and returned home on board Drake's fleet. The enormous wealth that was brought home by that gallant commander, and the accounts given by his men of both the riches and the weakness of the Spaniards, made the notion of piracy upon the Spanish main extremely popular, and caused much evil energy to be employed in that direction, which would otherwise have been of serious annoyance to the government at home.

Meanwhile the earl of Leicester, who had been sent to Holland in command of the English auxiliary forces to aid the states against Spain, proved himself to be unfit for any extensive military power. His retinue was princely in splendour, and his courtly manners and intriguing spirit caused him to be named captain-general of the United Provinces, and to have the guards and honours of a sovereign prince. But here his achievements, which gave deep offence to Elizabeth, began to diminish in brilliancy. Though nobly aided by his nephew, sir Philip Sidney, one of the most gallant and accomplished gentlemen who have ever done honour to England, he was decidedly inferior to the task of opposing so accomplished a general as the prince of Parma. He succeeded in the first instance in repulsing the Spaniards and throwing succours into Grave; but the cowardice or treachery of Van Hemert—who was afterwards put to death pursuant to the sentences of a court martial—betrayed the place to the Spaniards. Venlo was taken by the prince of Parma, as was Nuya, and the prince then sat down before Rhimberg. To draw the prince from before this last named place, which was garrisoned by twelve hundred men and well provided with stores, and upon which, consequently, Leicester should have allowed the prince to have wasted his strength and then have brought him to action, Leicester laid siege to Zutphen. The prince thought this place far too important to be allowed to fall into the hands of the English, and he hastened to its aid, sending an advanced guard under the marquis of Cueseto to throw relief into the fortress. A body of English cavalry fell in with this advance, and a gallant action commenced, in which the Spaniards were completely routed, with the loss of the marquis of Gonzago, an Italian noble of great military reputation and ability. In this action, however, the English were so unfortunate as to lose the noble sir Philip Sidney, whose accomplishments, humanity, and love of literature made him the idol of the great writers of the age. The humanity which had marked his whole life was conspicuous even in the last end scene of his death. Dreadfully wounded, and tortured with a raging thirst, he was about to have a bottle of water applied to his parched lips, when he caught the eyes of a poor private soldier who lay near him in the like fevered state, and was looking at the bottle with the eager envy which only the wounded soldier and the desert wanderer can know. "Give him the water," said the dying hero, "his necessity is still greater than mine."

While Leicester was barely keeping ground against Spain in the Netherlands, and Drake was astounding and ruining the Spaniards in various parts of the New World, Elizabeth was cautiously securing herself on the side of Scotland. Having obtained James's alliance by a dexterous admixture of espionage and more open conduct, Elizabeth felt that she had but little to fear from foreign invasions; it being stipulated in their league "that if Elizabeth were invaded, James should aid her with a body of two thousand horse and five thousand foot; that Elizabeth, in the like case, should send to his assistance three thousand horse and six thousand foot; that the charge of these armies should be defrayed by the prince who demanded assistance; that if the invasion should be made upon England, within sixty miles of the frontiers of Scotland, this latter kingdom should march its whole force to the assistance of the former; and that the present league should supersede all former alliances of either state with any foreign kingdom so far as religion was concerned."

And, in truth, it was requisite that Elizabeth should be well prepared at home, for her enemies abroad grew more and more furious against her, as every new occurrence more strongly displayed the sagacity of her ministers and her own prudence and firmness in supporting them. Partly on account of the imprisonment of the queen of Scots, but chiefly on account of those rigorous laws which their own desperate and shameful conduct daily made more necessary, the foreign papists, and still more the English seminary at Rheims, had become wrought up to so violent a fury, that nothing short of the assassination of Elizabeth was now deemed worthy their contemplation.

John Ballard, a priest of the seminary at Rheims, having been engaged in noticing and stirring up the fanatical zeal of the catholics of England and Scotland, proposed, on his return to Rheims, the attempt to dethrone Elizabeth and to re-establish papacy in England, an enterprise which he pretended to think practicable, and that, too, without any extraordinary difficulty. At nearly the same time a desperate and gloomy fanatic, John Savage, who had served for several years under the prince of Parma in the Low Countries, and who was celebrated for a most indomitable resolution, offered to assassinate Elizabeth with his own hands. As that deed would greatly facilitate the proposed revolution in England, the priests of Rheims, who had long preached up the virtuous and lawful character of the assassination of heretical sovereigns, was encouraged in his design, which he vowed to pursue, and the more fanatical catholics of England were instructed to lend him all possible aid. Savage was speedily followed to England by Ballard, who took the name of captain Fortescue, and busied himself night and day in preparing means to avail himself of the awe and confusion in which the nation could not fail to be plunged by the success of the attempt which he doubted not that Savage would speedily make.

Anthony Babington, a Derbyshire gentleman, had long been known to the initiated abroad as a bigoted catholic and as a romantic lover of the imprisoned queen of Scots. To this gentleman, who had the property and station requisite to render him useful to the conspirators, Ballard addressed himself. To restore the catholic religion and place Mary on the throne of England, Babington considered an enterprise that fully warranted the murder of Elizabeth; but he objected to entrusting the execution of so important a preliminary to the proposed revolution to one hand. The slightest nervousness or error of that one man, Babington truly remarked, would probably involve the lives or fortunes of all the chief catholics in England. He proposed, therefore, that five others should be joined to Savage in the charge of the assassination. So desperate was the villany of Savage, that he was so angry at this proposed division of a cruel and cowardly treason, that it was only with some difficulty that his priestly colleague induced him to share what the wretch impudently termed the "glory" of the deed, with Barnwell, Charnock, Tilney, and Tichborne; all of them gentlemen of station, character, and wealth; and Babington, also a man of wealth, character and station, which he owed to the former service of his father as cofferer to the very queen whom it was now proposed to slay! Such is that terrible fons criminis, fanaticisima!

It was determined that at the very same hour at which Savage and his colleagues should assassinate Elizabeth, the queen of Scots should be out riding, when Babington, with Edward, brother of lord Windsor, and several other gentlemen, at the head of a hundred horse, should attack her guards and escort her to London, where she would be proclaimed amid the acclamations of the conspirators and, doubtless, all catholics who should see her.

That this hellish plot would have succeeded there can be little doubt, but for the watchful eye of Walsingham, which had from the first been upon Ballard; and while that person was busily plotting a revolution which, commencing with the assassination of the queen, would almost infallibly have ended with a general massacre of the protestants, he was unconsciously telling all his principal proceedings to Walsingham, that able and resolute minister having placed spies about him who reported every thing of importance to the secretary. Gifford, another seminary priest, also entered the pay of the minister, and enabled him to obtain copies of correspondence between Babington and the queen of Scots, in which he spoke of the murder of Elizabeth as a tragic execution which he would willingly undertake for Mary's sake and service, and she replied that she highly approved of the whole plan, including the assassination of the queen, a general insurrection aided by foreign invasion, and Mary's own deliverance. Nay, the queen of Scots went still farther; she said that the gentlemen engaged in this enterprise might expect all the reward it should ever be in her power to bestow; and reminded them that it would be but lost labour to attempt an insurrection, or even her own release from her cruel imprisonment, until Elizabeth were dead.

We have not scrupled to declare our dislike of the original conduct of Elizabeth, so far as we deem it criminal or mean. But we cannot therefore shut our eyes to the fact, that though party writers have made many and zealous attempts to show that the whole plot was of Walsingham's contrivance, the evidence against Mary was as complete and satisfactory as human evidence could be. That Walsingham employed spies, that these were chiefly priests who were false to their own party, and that some of them were men of bad character—what do these things prove? Circumstances as Walsingham was, knowing his queen's life to be in perpetual danger from restless and desperate plotters, we really cannot see how he was to avoid that resort to spies, which under any other circumstances we should be among the first to denounce. But with whom, then, did these spies act? With Catholics of station and wealth, whom no spies could possibly have engaged in perilous and wicked proceedings, but for their own fierce fanaticism. And how and from whom did these spies procure Walsingham the important letters which divulged all the particulars of the intended villany? By letter carrying from Mary to the enamoured Bahington, and from Bahington to Mary. What sly bigotry may throw across the eyes of fierce political partisans we know not, but assuredly we can imagine nothing to be clearer than the guilt of Mary, as far as she could be guilty of conspiring against the life of Elizabeth—who had so long embittered her life and deprived her of all enjoyment of her crown and kingdom, who had mocked her with repeated promises which she never intended to fulfil, and who had carried the arts of policy so far as to outrage nature by making the utter neglect of the imprisoned mother a tacit condition, at the least, of friendship and alliance with the reigning son. The commissioners on their return from Fotheringay castle pronounced sentence of death upon Mary, queen of Scots, but accompanied the sentence with what—considering that from the moment of her abdication in his favour, his right to reign became wholly independent of his mother—seemed a somewhat unnecessary clause of exception in favour of James; which said that "the sentence did in no wise derogate from the title and honour of James, king of Scotland; but that he was in the same place, degree, and right, as if the sentence had never been pronounced."

It is an extraordinary fact, and one which is unnoticed not only by the partial writers who have endeavoured to throw the deserved degree of blame upon Elizabeth, and also to represent Mary as altogether free from blame even where her criminality was the most glaringly evident, but even by the impartial Hume, that when the sentence on Mary was published in London, the people received it, not with the sadness and silence or the fierce and fiery remonstrance with which the English are wont to rebuke or restrain evil doing, but by the ringing of bells, lighting of bonfires, and all the ordinary tokens of public rejoicing. Does not this single fact go to prove that it was notorious that Mary, during her confinement, was perpetually plotting against the life of the queen, and endeavouring to deliver England and Scotland over to the worst horrors that could befall them—the restoration of papacy and the arbitrary rule of Philip of Spain? We repeat, whatever the former conduct of Elizabeth, Mary of Scotland was now notoriously a public enemy, prepared to slay the queen and expose the protestants of the nation to massacre, so that she might obtain her own personal liberty, and take away liberty of conscience from the whole nation. That this was the true state of the case was made evident not merely by the rejoicings of the multitude out of doors, but by the solemn application of the parliament to Elizabeth to allow the sentence to be executed. The king of France, chiefly by the compulsion of the house of Guise and the league, interceded for Mary; and James of Scotland, who had hitherto been a most cold and neglectful son, whatever might be the errors of his mother, now sent the master of Gray and sir Robert Melvil to try both argument and menace upon Elizabeth.

Most historians seem to be of opinion that the reluctance which Elizabeth for some time exhibited to comply with what was undoubtedly the wish of her people, the execution of Mary, was wholly feigned. We greatly doubt it. That Elizabeth both hated and feared Mary was inevitable; Mary's position, her bigotry, the personal ill-feeling she had often shown towards Elizabeth, and her obvious willingness to sacrifice her life, were surely not additions to the character of a woman who had connived at her husband's death and then married his murderer, which could have engendered any kindly feelings on the part of a princess so harassed and threatened as Elizabeth was by that faction of which Mary, in England at least, was the recognised head. But apart from all womanly and humane relenting, Elizabeth could not but be conscious that the death of Mary would cause a great accession to the rage of the Catholic powers; and apathetic as James had shown himself hitherto, it was but reasonable to suppose that the violent death of his mother would rouse him into active enmity to England. However, the queen's hesitation, real or assumed, was at length overcome, and she signed the fatal warrant which Davison, her secretary, acting under the orders and advice of lord Burleigh, Leicester, and others of the council, forthwith dispatched to Fotheringay by the earls of Shrewsbury and Kent, who were charged with seeing it executed.

A.D. 1587.—Immediately on the arrival of the two earls, they read the warrant, and warned Mary to be prepared for execution at eight on the following morning. She received the news with apparent resignation; professed that she could not have believed that Elizabeth would have enforced such a sentence upon a person not subject to the laws and jurisdiction of England, but added, "As such is her will, death, which puts an end to all my miseries, shall be to me most welcome; nor can I esteem that so unworthy the felicities of heaven which cannot support the body under the horrors of such a passage to these blissful mansions."

She then asked for the admission of her own chaplain, but the earl of Kent said that the attendance of a papist priest was unnecessary, as Fletcher, dean of Peterborough, a most learned and pious divine, would afford her all necessary consolation and instruction. She refused to see him, which so much angered the earl of Kent, that he coarsely, though truly, told her that her death would be the life of the protestant religion, as her life would have been the death of it.

Having taken a sparing and early supper, the unhappy Mary passed the night in making a distribution of her effects and in religious offices, until her usual hour for retiring, when she went to bed and slept for some hours. She rose very early, and resumed her religious exercises, using a consecrated host which had been sent to her by pope Pius.

As the fatal hour approached she dressed herself in a rich habit of velvet and silk. Scarcely had she done so when Andrews, sheriff of the county, entered the room and summoned her to the last dread scene, to which she was supported by two of sir Amias Paulet's guards, an infirmity in her legs preventing her from walking without aid. As she entered the hall adjoining her room she was met by the earls of Shrewsbury and Kent, sir Amias Paulet, sir Drue Drury, and other gentlemen; and here sir Andrew Melvil, her attached steward, threw himself upon his knees before her, lamenting her fate and wringing his hands in an agony of real and deep grief. She comforted him by assurances of her own perfect resignation, bade him report in Scotland that she died a true woman to her religion, and said, as she resumed her way to the scaffold, "Recommend me, Melvil, to my son, and tell him that, notwithstanding all my mistresses, I have done nothing prejudicial to the state and kingdom of Scotland. And now, my good Melvil, farewell; once again, farewell, good Melvil, and grant the assistance of thy prayers to thy queen and mistress."

She now turned to the earls, and begged that her servants might freely enjoy the presents she had given them and be sent safely to their own country; all which was readily promised. But the earls objected to the admission of her attendants to the execution, and some difficulty was even made about any of them being present in her last moments. This really harsh refusal roused her to a degree of anger she had not previously shown, and she indignantly said to the earls, "I know that your mistress, being a maiden queen, would vouchsafe, in regard of womanhood, that I should have some of my own people about me at my death. I know that her majesty hath not given you any such strict command but that you might grant me a request of far greater courtesy, even though I were a woman of inferior rank to that which I bear. I am cousin to your queen, and descended from the blood royal of Henry VIII., and a married queen of France, and an anointed queen of Scotland."

This remonstrance had due effect, and she was allowed to select four of her male and two of her female servants to attend her to the scaffold; her steward, physician, apothecary and surgeon, with her maids Curle and Kennedy.

Thus attended, she was led into an adjoining hall, in which was a crowd of spectators, and the scaffold, covered with black cloth. The warrant having been read, the dean of Peterborough stepped forward and addressed her in exhortation to repentance of her sins, acknowledgment of the justice of her sentence, and reliance for mercy and salvation only upon the mediation and merits of Christ. During the dean's address Mary several times endeavoured to interrupt him, and at the conclusion she said, "Trouble not yourself any more about the matter, for I was born in this religion, I have lived in this religion, and I will die in this religion."

She now ascended the scaffold, saying to Paulet, who lent her his arm, "I thank you, sir; it is the last trouble I shall give you, and the most acceptable service that you have ever rendered me." The queen of Scots now, in a firm voice, told the persons assembled that "She would have them recollect that she was a sovereign princess, not subject to the parliament of England, but brought there to suffer by violence and injustice. She thanked God for having given her this opportunity to make public profession of her faith, and to declare, as she often before had declared, that she had never imagined, nor compassed, nor consented to the death of the English queen, nor even sought the least harm to her person. After her death many things, which were then buried in darkness, would come to light. But she pardoned, from her heart, all her enemies, nor should her tongue utter that which might chance to prejudice them."

At a sign from the earls the weeping maid servants now advanced to disrobe their mistress. The executioners, in their sordid fear lest they should thus lose their perquisites, the rich attire of the queen, hastily interfered. Mary blushed and drew back, observing that she had not been accustomed to undress before such an audience, or to be served by such valets. But as no interference was made by the earls she submitted; her neck was bared; her maid Kennedy pinned a handkerchief, edged with gold, over her eyes; and an executioner, taking hold of each of her arms, led her to the block, upon which she laid her head, saying audibly, and in firm tones, "Into thy hands, O God, I commend my spirit."

The executioner now advanced, but was so completely unnerved that his first blow missed the neck, deeply wounding the skull; a second was likewise ineffectual; at the third the head was severed from the body. The unhappy lady evidently died in intense agony, for when he exhibited the head to the spectators, the muscles of the face were so distorted that the features could scarcely be recognised.

When the executioner, on exhibiting the head, cried "God save queen Elizabeth," the dean of Peterborough replied, "And so perish all her enemies;" to which the earl

CHAPTER XLVII.

A. D. 1587.—THE tragical scene we have just described must have convinced even the most devoted of Elizabeth's subjects that their "virgin queen" was not over abundantly blessed with the "godlike quality of mercy," whatever opinion they might entertain of Mary's participation in the crime for which she suffered. But there are many circumstances connected with the history of this period which may be pleaded in extenuation of conduct that in less critical times could only be viewed with unalloyed abhorrence and disgust. The massacre of St. Bartholomew was still fresh in the recollection of every one, and the bigoted zeal which the queen of Scots ever displayed in favour of the catholics, whose ascendancy in England she ardently desired, gave a mournful presage of what was to be executed by the protestant population should their opponents succeed in their desperate machinations. Neither must we disregard the assertion, so often made and never disproved, that when Elizabeth signed the warrant of execution, she not only did so with much apparent reluctance, but placed it in the hands of Davison, her private secretary, expressly charging him not to use it without further orders. What, indeed, may have been her secret wishes, or her real intentions, her subsequent behaviour had the semblance of unfeigned sorrow. Could it be proved to have been otherwise, no one would deny that her conduct throughout was characterized by unparalleled hypocrisy—a profound dissimulation written in characters of blood.

Elizabeth, in fact, did what she could to throw off the odium that this sanguinary transaction had cast upon her. She wrote to the king of Scotland in terms of the deepest regret, declaring that the warrant she had been induced to sign was to have lain dormant, and, in proof of her sincerity, she imprisoned Davison, and fined him in the sum of 10,000*l*, which reduced him to a state not far removed from actual beggary.

One of the most memorable events in English history was now near at hand; one which called for all the energy and patriotic devotion that a brave and independent people were capable of making; and consequently, every minor consideration vanished at its approach. This was the projected invasion of our island by Philip of Spain. This monarch, disappointed in his hopes of marrying Elizabeth, returned the queen her collar of the garter, and from that time the most irreconcilable jealousy appears to have existed between them. In all the ports throughout his extensive dominions the note of preparation was heard, and the most powerful navy that ever had been collected was now at his disposal. An army of 50,000 men were also assembled, under experienced generals, and the command of the whole was given to the celebrated duke of Parma. The catholics on the continent were in an ecstasy of delight; the pope bestowed his benediction on an expedition that seemed destined once more to restore the supremacy of the holy see, and it was unanimously hailed by all who wished it success as the invincible armada.

To repel this mighty array, no means within the reach of Elizabeth and her able ministers were forgotten, nor could any thing exceed the enthusiastic determination of her subjects to defend their altars and their homes. Among the newly-raised levies the militia formed a very important item; the nobility also vied with each other in their efforts of assistance; and Lord Huntingdon alone raised 40,000 foot and 10,000 horse. The royal navy had, fortunately, been on the increase for a long time previous, and the successful exertions of admiral Drake in the India had infused a degree of confidence into our sailors, before unknown in the service.

The views of the Spanish king having been fully ascertained by the emissaries of Elizabeth, she ordered 20,000 troops to be cantoned along the southern coast of the kingdom, in such a manner that in forty-eight hours the whole might be assembled at any port where there was a probability of the enemy's landing. A large and well-disciplined corps, also, amounting to 24,000 men, was encamped at Tilbury-fort, near the mouth of the Thames, under the immediate command of the earl of Leicester, who was appointed generalissimo of the army. These troops the queen reviewed, and having harangued them, rode through the lines with the general—her manner evincing great firmness and intrepidity, which while it gave celo to the scene, filled every breast with patriotic ardour. The residue of her troops, amounting to 34,000 foot and 2000 horse, remained about the queen's person; and the militia were in readiness to reinforce the regular troops wherever there might be occasion.

All the ports and accessible points on the coast were fortified and strongly garrisoned; but though orders were given to oppose the enemy's descent, wherever it might be, the respective commanders were directed not to come to a general engagement in the event of their landing, but to retire and lay waste the country before them, that the Spaniards might meet with no subsistence, and be perpetually harassed in their march. Nor was anything left undone that might be likely to contribute to the defeat of the armada by sea. Lord Howard of Effingham was created lord high admiral, and sir Francis Drake vice-admiral, who, together with Hawkins and Frobisher, were stationed near Plymouth, to oppose the enemy as he entered the channel; while Lord Henry Seymour commanded another fleet upon the coast of Flanders, to prevent the duke of Parma from bringing over troops from that quarter.

A. D. 1585.—The armada sailed from Lisbon on the 30th of May, but being dispersed by a storm, rendezvoused at Corunna and did not enter the English channel until the 19th of July, when Emingham suffered them to pass him, but kept close in their rear until the 21st. The duke of Medina Sidonia (the Spanish admiral) expected to have been here joined by the duke of Parma and the land forces under his command, but the latter had found it impracticable to put to sea without encountering the fleet of lord Seymour, by which he justly feared that both his ships and men would be put in the utmost jeopardy.

For four days a kind of brisk running fight was kept up, in which the English had a decided advantage, and the alarm having been spread from one end of the coast to the other, the nobility and gentry hastened out with their vessels from every harbour, and reinforced the English fleet, which soon amounted to 140 sail. The earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Cumberland, sir Thomas Cecil, sir Robert Cecil, sir Walter Raleigh, sir Thomas Vasaor, sir Thomas Gerrard, sir Charles Blount, and many others distinguished themselves by this generous and reasonable proof of their loyalty. On the 24th the lord admiral divided the fleet into four squadrons, the better to pursue and annoy the enemy; the first squadron he himself commanded; the second he assigned to sir Francis Drake; the third to sir John Hawkins; and the fourth to sir Martin Frobiisher. The result of this was, that in the three succeeding days the armada had become so shattered by the repeated skirmishes in which it had been engaged, that it was compelled to take shelter in the roads of Calais.

The English admiral having been informed that 10,000 men belonging to the duke of Parma's army had marched towards Dunkirk, and apprehending serious consequences from the enemy's receiving such a reinforcement, determined to spend no more time in making desultory attacks on the huge galleons with his comparatively small vessels. Accordingly, in the night of the 28th of July, he sent in among them eight or ten fire-ships; and such was the terror of the Spanish sailors, that they cut their cables, hoisted sail, and put to sea with the utmost hurry and confusion. In their anxiety to escape, victory was no longer thought of. The duke of Medina Sidonia, dreading again to encounter the English fleet, attempted to return home by sailing round the north of Scotland; but the elements were now as fatal to the Spanish fleet as the skill and bravery of the English sailors. Many of the ships were driven on the shores of Norway, Ireland, and the north of Scotland; and out of that vast armament which, from its magnitude and apparent completeness, had been styled invincible, only a few disabled vessels returned to tell the tale of its disastrous issue. In the several engagements with the English fleet in the channel, in July and August, the Spaniards lost fifteen great ships and 4791 men; seventeen ships, and 5394 men (killed, taken, or drowned) upon the coast of Ireland, in September; and another large ship, with 700 men, cast away on the coast of Scotland. But this enumeration by no means included their total loss. On the part of the English the loss was so trifling as scarcely to deserve mention.

The destruction of the Spanish armada inspired the nation with feelings of intense delight; the people were proud of their country's naval superiority, proud of their own martial appearance, and proud of their queen. A medal was struck on the occasion, with this inscription, "Fecit, vidit, fugit"—"It came, saw, and fled." Another, with fire-shells and a fleet in confusion, with this motto, "Dux famina facti"—"The famine conducted the enterprise." But on the same news being conveyed to Philip, he claimed, in real or affected resignation, "I sent my fleet to combat the English, not the elements. God be praised, the calamity is not greater."

If the destruction of the Spanish armada had saved England from the domination of a foreign power, whose resentment for past indignities was not likely to be easily appeased, it was no less a triumph for the protestant cause throughout Europe; the Huguenots in France were encouraged by it, and it virtually established the independence of the Dutch; while the excessive influence which Spain had acquired over other nations was not only lost by this event, but it paralyzed the energies of the Spanish people and left them in a state of utter hopelessness as to the future. A day of public thanksgiving having been appointed for this great deliverance, the queen went in state to St. Paul's, in a grand triumphal car, decorated with flags and other trophies taken from the Spaniards.

The public rejoicings for the defeat of the armada were scarcely over when an event occurred, which, in whatever light it might be felt by Elizabeth herself, certainly cast no damp on the spirits of the nation at large;—we mean the death of Leicester. The powerful faction of which the favourite had been the head acknowledged a new leader in the earl of Essex, whom his step-father had brought forward at court as a counterpoise to the influence of Raleigh, and who now stood second to none in her majesty's good graces. But Essex, however gifted with noble and brilliant qualities, was confessedly inferior to Leicester in several endowments highly essential to the leader of a court party. Though not void of art, he was by no means master of the dissimulation, address, and wary coolness by which his predecessor well knew how to accomplish his ends. The character of Essex was frank and impetuous, and experience had not yet taught him to distrust either himself or others.

A.D. 1589.—After the defeat of the armada, a thirst for military achievements against the Spaniards pervaded the mind of the English public. The queen encouraged this spirit, but declared her treasury was too poor to sustain the expenses of a war. An association was soon formed by the people, and an army of 21,000 men, under the command of Norris and Drake, sailed from Plymouth to avenge the insult offered to England by Philip of Spain. The young earl of Essex, without consulting the pleasure of his sovereign, made a private journey to Plymouth, and joined the expedition. No sooner was the queen made acquainted with his absence, than she dispatched the lord Huntingdon to bring the fugitive to her feet; but he had already sailed.

It was the queen's order that the armament should first proceed to Portugal, and endeavour to join the army of Don Antonio, who contended with Philip for the possession of the throne of Portugal; but Drake would not be restrained by instruction, and he proceeded to Corunna, where he lost a number of men, without obtaining the slightest advantage. In Portugal they were scarcely more successful; but at their return their losses were concealed, their advantages magnified, and the public were satisfied that the pride of Spain had been humbled.

Elizabeth might probably have expected that the death of the queen of Scots would put an end to conspiracies against her life; but plots were still as rife as ever: nor can we feel surprise that it should be so, considering that Elizabeth, as well as Philip of Spain, employed a great number of spies, who, being men of ruined fortunes and bad principles, betrayed the secrets of either party as their own interests led them; and sometimes were the fabricators of alarming reports to enhance the value of their services.

England and France were now in alliance, and the French king called for English aid in an attack upon Spain, but the queen had begun to repent of the sums she had already advanced to Henry, and demanded Calais as a security for her future assistance; for the preparations on the peninsula alarmed her majesty, lest Philip should make a second attempt to invade England. At length the English council adopted a measure proposed by the lord admiral, Howard of Effingham, to send out an expedition that should anticipate the design of the enemy, and destroy his ports and shipping; Essex had the command of the land forces, and Howard that of the navy. When the English troops entered Cadiz, the council of war was divided in opinion as to the fitness of that step, which ended in the possession of the city and fleet, from which the troops returned with glory for their bravery, and with honour for their humanity, as no blood had been wantonly spilt, nor any dishonourable act committed. Though Essex had been the leading conqueror at Cadiz, the victory was reported as chiefly attributable to sir Walter Raleigh, and to have been in itself a cheap and easy conquest.

A.D. 1591.—The maritime war with Spain, notwithstanding the cautious temper of the queen, was strenuously waged at this time, and produced some striking indications of the rising spirit of the English navy. A squadron, under lord Thomas Howard, which had been waiting six months at the Azores to intercept the homeward-bound ships from Spanish America, was there surprised by the enemy's fleet, which had been sent out for their convoy. The English admiral, who had a much smaller force, put to sea in all haste, and got clear off, with the exception of one ship, the Revenge, the captain of which had the temerity to confront the whole Spanish fleet of fifty-six sail rather than strike his colours. It was however a piece of bravery as needless as it was desperate; for after his crew had displayed prodigies of valour, and beaten off fifteen boarding parties, his ammunition being gone and the whole of his men killed or disabled, the gallant commander was compelled to strike his flag, and soon after died of his wounds on board the Spanish admiral's ship.

A.D. 1593.—In those days, when an English sovereign required money, and then only, the services of a parliament were called for; and Elizabeth was now under the necessity of summoning one. But she could ill brook any opposition to her will; and fearing that the present state of her finances might embolden some of the members to treat her mandates with less deference than formerly, she was induced to assume a more haughty and menacing style than was habitual to her. In answer to the three customary requests made by the speaker, for liberty of speech, freedom from arrests, and access to her person, she replied by her lord keeper, that such liberty of speech as the commons were justly called to—liberty, namely, of aye and no, she was willing to grant, but by no means a liberty for every one to speak what he listed. And if any idle heads should be found careless enough for their own safety to attempt innovations in the state, or reforms in the church, she laid her injunctions on the speaker to refuse the bills offered for such purposes till they should have been examined by those who were better qualified to judge of these matters. But language, however imperious or scornful, was insufficient to restrain some attempts on the part of the commons to exercise their known rights and fulfil their duty to the country. Peter Wentworth, a member whose courageous and independent spirit had already drawn upon him repeated manifestations of the royal displeasure, presented to the lord keeper a petition, praying that the upper house would join with the lower in a supplication to the queen for fixing the succession. Elizabeth, enraged at the bare mention of a subject so offensive to her, instantly committed Wentworth, sir Thomas Bromley, who seconded him, and two other members, to the Fleet prison; and such was the general dread of offended majesty, that the house was afraid to petition her for their release.

A.D. 1596.—Essex, whose vanity was on a par with his impetuosity, had now attained the zenith of his prosperity; but confident in the affections of Elizabeth, he frequently suffered himself to forget that a subject's dutiful respect was due to her as his queen. On one memorable occasion, it is related, that he treated her with indignity uncalled for and wholly indefensible; a dispute had arisen between them in the presence of the lord high admiral, the secretary, and the clerk of the signet, respecting the choice of a commander for Ireland, where Tyrone at that time gave the English much trouble. The queen had resolved to send sir William Knolles, the uncle of Essex; while the earl with unbecoming warmth urged the propriety of sending sir George Carew, whose presence at court, it appears, was displeasing to him, and therefore, with courtier-like sycincerity, he thus sought to remove him out of the way. Unable, either by argument or persuasion, to prevail over the resolute will of her majesty, the favourite at last forgot himself so far as to turn his back upon her with a laugh of contempt; an indignity which she revenged in the true "Elizabethan style," by boxing his ears, and bidding him "Go to the devil," or "Go and be hanged!"—for our chroniclers differ as to the exact phrase, though all agree that she suited the word to the action. This report so inflamed the blood of Essex, that he instantly grasped his sword, and while the lord admiral interposed to prevent a further ebullition of passion, the earl swore that not from her father would he have taken such an insult, and foaming with rage he rushed out of the palace. For a time this affair furnished ample scope for idle gossip and conjecture: the friends of Essex urged him to lose no time in returning to his attendance at court and soliciting her majesty's forgiveness. This, however, he could not be prevailed on to do: but, like many other quarrels among individuals of a humbler grade, it was at length patched up, and the reconciliation appeared to the superficial observer as perfect, as it was, in all probability, hollow and insincere.

Essex had long thirsted for military distinction, and had often vehemently argued with Burleigh on the propriety of keeping up a perpetual hostility against the power of Philip; but the prudent and experienced minister contended that Spain was now sufficiently humbled to render an accommodation both safe and honourable; and his prudence counsel was adhered to by the queen. Economy in the public expenditure was, in fact, necessary; and one of the last acts of Burleigh's life was the completion of an arrangement with the states of Holland for the repayment of the sums which Elizabeth had advanced to them, whereby the nation was relieved of a considerable portion of its former annual expense.

After exercising very considerable influence in the administration of affairs in England for forty years, the faithful Burleigh, whose devotion to the queen and attachment to the reformed faith were constant and sincere, died in the 78th year of his age; and in about a month after, his great opponent Phillip II. also bowed to death's stern decree. Under his successor the Spanish monarchy declined with accelerated steps; all apprehensions of an invasion ceased, and the queen's advisers had an opportunity of turning their whole attention to the pacification of Ireland.

A.D. 1598.—The Irish rebel Tyrone had successfully resisted the English forces in several encounters; and at length the whole province of Munster declared for him. It was evident that much time had been spent on minor objects, while the great leader of the rebels was in a manner left to overrun the island and subjugate it to his will. This subject was earnestly canvassed by Elizabeth and her council; by the majority of whom lord Mountjoy was considered as a person fully equal to the office of lord-deputy at so critical a juncture. Essex, however, offered so many objections to his appointment, arguing the point with so much warmth and obstinacy, and withal intimating his own superior fitness for the office with so much art and address, that the queen, notwithstanding certain suspicions which had been infused into her mind respecting the probable danger of committing to Essex the chief command of an army, and notwithstanding her presumed unwillingness to deprive herself of his presence, appears to have adopted his suggestion with an unusual degree of earnest haste. The earl of Essex was accordingly made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and with 20,000 choice troops he went forward on his long-desired mission.

A.D. 1599.—Having landed at Dublin in the spring, Essex immediately appointed his friend the earl of Southampton to the office of general of the horse; but instead of opening the campaign, as was expected by his friends in England, with some bold and decisive operation against Tyrone, the summer was spent in temporising, and before the close of the year a suspicious truce between the parties put an end to all his anticipations of success. Nay, so unexpected was the issue of this expedition, that it afforded the best possible opportunity to his enemies to shake the queen's confidence even in his loyalty. An angry letter from her majesty was the immediate consequence; and Essex, without waiting for the royal permission, hurried over to England in order to throw himself at the feet of his exasperated sovereign. The sudden appearance of her favourite, just after she had risen from her bed, imploring her forgiveness on his knees, disarmed the queen of her anger; and on leaving the apartment, he exclaimed exultingly, "that though he had encountered much trouble and many storms abroad, he thanked God he found a perfect calm at home."

The earl of Essex doubtless thought the troubled waters were at rest; his vanity favoured the notion, and self-gratulation followed as a matter of course; but he soon found that the tempest was only hushed for the moment, for at night he found himself a prisoner in his own house by the peremptory orders of Elizabeth. Heart-sick and confounded, a severe illness was the quick result of this proceeding; and for a brief interval the queen not only shewed some signs of pity, but administered to his comfort. A warrant was, however, soon afterwards made out for his commitment to the Tower, and though it was not carried into effect, yet his chance of liberty seemed too remote for prudence to calculate on. But the fiery temper of Essex had no alloy of prudence in it; he gave way to his natural violence, spoke of the queen in peevish and disrespectful terms, and, among other things, said, "she was grown an old woman, and was become as crooked in her mind as in her body."

A.D. 1600.—Shortly after his disgrace, Essex wrote to James of Scotland, informing him that the faction who ruled the court were in league to deprive him of his right to the throne of England, in favour of the infant of Spain; and he offered his services to extort from Elizabeth an acknowledgment of his claims. It appears, indeed, from concurrent testimony, that the conduct of Essex had now become highly traitorous, and that he was secretly collecting together a party to aid him in some enterprise dangerous to the ruling power. But his plans were frustrated by the activity of ministers, who had received information that the grand object of the conspirators was to seize the queen's person and take possession of the Tower. A council was called, and Essex was commanded to attend; but he refused, assembled his friends, and fortified Essex-house, in which he had previously secreted hired soldiers. Four of the privy council being sent thither to enquire into the reason of his conduct, he imprisoned them, and sallied out into the city; but he failed in his attempt to excite the people in his favour, and on returning to his house, he and his friend the earl of Southampton were with some difficulty made prisoners, and after having been first taken to Lambeth palace, were committed to the Tower.

A.D. 1601.—The rash and aspiring Essex now only begged that he might have a fair trial, still calculating on the influence of the queen to protect him in the hour of his utmost need. Proceedings were commenced against him instantly; his errors during his administration in Ireland were represented in the most odious colours; the unadvised expressions he had used in some of his letters were greatly exaggerated; and his recent treasonable attempt was dwelt on as calling for the exercise of the utmost severity of the law. His condemnation followed; judgment was pronounced against him, and against his friend, the earl of Southampton. This nobleman was, however, spared; but Essex was conducted to the fatal block, where he met his death with great fortitude, being at the time only in the thirty-fourth year of his age. His most active accomplices were Cuff, his secretary, Merrick, his steward, sir Christopher Blount, his father-in-law, and sir Robert Davers, who were executed some few days after.

The parliamentary proceedings of this year were more elaborate than before, particularly as regarded the financial state of the country. It was stated that the whole of the last subsidies amounted to no more than 160,000*l.*, while the expence of the Irish war alone was 300,000*l.* On this occasion it was observed by sir Walter Raleigh, that the estates of the nobility and gentry, which were charged at thirty or forty pounds in the queen's books, were not charged at a hundredth part of their real value. He also moved, that as scarcely any justices of the peace were rated above eight or ten pounds a-year, they might be advanced to twenty pounds at least, which was the qualification required by the statute for a justice of peace; but the commons declined to alter the rate of taxation and leave themselves liable to be taxed at the rack-rent. Monopolies upon various branches of trade were next brought under consideration; and as they were generally oppressive and unjust, (some obtained by purchase and others given to favourites) many animated discussions followed, which ended in a motion, that the monopolies should be revoked, and the patentees punished for their extortions. Of course there were members present who were venal enough to defend this iniquitous mode of enriching certain individuals at the expence of the public. A long list of the monopolizing patents being, however, read—among which was one on salt, an article that had been thus raised from fourteenpence to fourteen shillings a bushel—a member indignantly demanded whether there was not a patent also for making bread; at which question some courtiers expressing their resentment, he replied that if bread were not already among the patented luxuries, it would soon become one unless a stop was put to such enormities. That the arguments of the speakers were not lost upon the queen seems certain; for although she took no notice of the debates, she sent a message to the house, acquainting them that several petitions had been presented to her against monopolies, and declared "she was sensibly touched with the people's grievances, expressing the utmost indignation against those who had abused her grants, and appealed to God how careful she had ever been to defend them against oppression, and promised they should be revoked." Secretary Cecil added, "her majesty was not apprised of the ill tendency of these grants when she made them, and hoped there would never be any more;" to which gracious declaration the majority of the house responded, "Amen."

In this memorable session was passed the celebrated act, to which allusion is so often made in the present day, for the relief and employment of the poor. Since the breaking up of the religious establishments, the country had been overrun with idle mendicants and thieves. It was a natural consequence that those who sought in vain for work, and as vainly implored charitable aid, should be induced by the cravings of hunger to lay violent hands upon the property of others. As the distresses of the lower orders increased, so did crime; till at length the wide-spreading evil forced itself on the attention of parliament, and provision was made for the bettering of their condition, by levying a tax upon the middle and upper classes for the support of the aged and infirm poor, and for affording temporary relief to the destitute, according to their several necessities, under the direction of parochial officers.

We must now briefly revert to what was going on in Ireland. Though the power of the Spaniards was considered as at too low an ebb to give the English government any great uneasiness for the safety of its possessions, it was thought sufficiently formidable to be the means of annoyance as regarded the assistance it might afford Tyrone, who was still at the head of the insurgents in Ireland. And the occurrence we are about to mention shews that a reasonable apprehension on that head might well be entertained. On the 23rd of September the Spaniards landed 4000 men near Kinsale, and having taken possession of the town, were speedily followed by 2000 more. They effected a junction with Tyrone; but Mountjoy, who was now lord-deputy, surprised their array in the night, and cut off defeated them. This led to the surrender of Kinsale and all other places in their possession; and it was not long before Tyrone, as a captive, graced the triumphal return of Mountjoy to Dublin.

A.D. 1602.—The most remarkable among the domestic occurrences of this year was a violent quarrel between the jesuits and the secular priests of England. The latter accused the former, and not without reason, of having been the occasion, by their assassinations, plots, and conspiracies against the queen and government, of all the severe enactments under which the English catholics had groaned since the fulfilment of the papal bull against her majesty. In the height of this dispute, intelligence was conveyed to the privy council of some fresh plots on the part of the jesuits and their adherents; on which a proclamation was immediately issued, banishing this order from the kingdom on pain of death; and the same penalty was declared against all secular priests who should refuse to take the oath of allegiance.

That queen Elizabeth deeply regretted the precipitancy with which she signed the warrant for the execution of her favourite Essex there is every reason to believe. She soon became a victim to hypochondria, as may be seen from a letter written by her godson, sir John Harrington; and as it exhibits a curious example of her behaviour, and may be regarded as a specimen of the epistolary style of the age, we are induced to quote some of the sentences:—"She is much disfavoured and unattired, and these troubles waste her much. She disregardeth everie costlie cover that cometh to her table, and taketh little but manchets and succory pottage. Every new message from the city doth disturb her, and she frowns on all the ladies." He farther on remarks, that "The many evil plots and designs hath overcome her highness's sweet temper. She walks much in her privy chamber, and stamps much at ill news; and thrusts her rusty sword, at times, into the arras in great rage." And in his postscript he says, "So disordered is all order, that her highness has worn but one change of raiment for many dales, and swears much at those who cause her griefs in such wise, to the no small discomfiture of those that are about her; more especially our sweet lady Arundel." Her days and nights were spent in tears, and she never spoke but to mention some irritating subject. Nay, it is recorded, that having experienced some hours of alarming stupor, she persisted, after her recovery from it, to remain seated on cushions, from which she could not be prevailed upon to remove during ten days, but sat with her finger generally on her mouth, and her eyes open and fixed upon the ground, for she apprehended that if she lay down in bed she should not rise from it again. Having at length been put into bed, she lay on her side motionless, and apparently insensible. The lords of the council being summoned, Nottingham reminded her of a former speech respecting her successor; she answered, "I told you my seat had been the seat of kings, and I will have no rascal to succeed me. Who should succeed me but a king?" Cecil, wishing a more explicit declaration, requesting her to explain what she meant by "no rascal," she replied that "a king should succeed, and who could that be but her cousin of Scotland?" Early the following morning the queen tranquilly breathed her last: she was in the 70th year of her age and the 45th of her reign.

Elizabeth was tall and portly, but never handsome, though from the fulsome compliments which she tolerated in those who had access to her person, she appears to have entertained no mean opinion of her beauty. Her extravagant love of finery was well known, and the presents of jewellery, &c. she received from such of her loving subjects as hoped to gain the royal favour were both numerous and costly. Like her father, she was irritable and passionate, often venting her rage in blows and oaths. Her literary acquirements were very considerable; and in those accomplishments which are in our own day termed "fashionable," namely, music, singing, and dancing, she also greatly excelled. The charges which have been made against the "virgin queen" for indulging in amatory intrigues are not sufficiently sustained to render it the duty of an historian to repeat them; and when it is considered that though she possessed a host of sturdy friends, yet that she had many bitter enemies, we need not be surprised that in the most vulnerable point her character as a female has often been unjustly assailed.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

The Reign of James I.

A.D. 1603.—THE advanced age to which the late queen lived, and the constant attention which her remaining unmarried had caused men to pay to the subject of the succession, had made the succession of James become a thing as fully settled in public opinion as though it had been settled by her will or an act of parliament. All the arguments for and against him had been canvassed and dismissed, and he ascended the throne of England with as little opposition as though he had been Elizabeth's eldest son.

As the king journeyed from Edinburgh to London all ranks of men hailed him with the thronging and applause which had been wont to seem so grateful to his predecessor. But if James liked flattery, he detested noise and bustle; and a proclamation was issued forbidding so much congregating of the lieges, on the ground that it tended to make provisions scarce and exorbitantly dear. It was only shyness, however, and not any insensibility to the hearty kindness of his new subjects, that dictated the king's proclamation. So pleased, indeed, was he with the zealous kindness shown to him by the English, that he had not been two months before them when he had honoured with the order of knighthood nearly two hundred and forty persons! Peerages were bestowed pretty nearly in the same proportion; and a good humoured squintade was posted at St. Paul's, promising to supply weak memories with the now very necessary art of remembering the titles of the new nobility.

It was not merely the king's facility in granting titles that was blamed, though that was in remarkable, and, as regarded his judgment at least, in by no means favourable contrast to the practice of his predecessor; but the English, already jealous of their new fellow-subjects, the Scots, were of opinion that he was more than fairly liberal to the latter. But if James made the duke of Lenox, the earl of Mar, lord Hume, lord Kinross, sir George Hume, and secretary Elphinstone members of the English privy council, and gave titles and wealth to sir George Hume, Hay, and Ramsay, he at least had the honour and good sense to leave nearly the whole of the ministerial honours and political power in the hands of the able English who had so well served his predecessor. Secretary Cecil, especially, who had kept up a secret correspondence with James towards the close of the late reign, had now the chief power, and was created, in succession, lord Effingham, viscount Cranborne, and earl of Salisbury.

It is not a little surprising that while James was so well received by the nation at large, and had the instant support of the ministers and friends of the late queen, he had scarcely finished renewing treaties of peace and friendship with all the great foreign powers, when a conspiracy was discovered for placing his cousin, Arabella Stuart, upon the throne. Such a conspiracy was so absurd, and its success so completely a physical impossibility, that it is difficult not to suspect that it originated in the king's own excessive and unnecessary jealousy of the title of Arabella Stuart, who, equally with himself, was descended from Henry VII., but who in no other respect could have the faintest chance of competing with him. But, however it originated, such a conspiracy existed; and the lords Grey and Cobham, and sir Walter Raleigh, lord Cobham's brother Mr. Brooke, sir Griffin Markham, sir Edward Markham, and Mr. Copley, together with two Catholic priests named Watson and C., were apprehended for being concerned in it. The Catholic priests were executed, Cobham, Grey and Markham were pardoned while their heads were upon the block, and Raleigh was also reprieved, but not pardoned; a fact which was fatal to him many years after, as will be perceived. Even at present it was mischievous to him, for, though spared from death, he was confined in the Tower, where he wrote his noble work the History of the World.

A.D. 1604.—A conference was now called at Hampton court to decide upon certain differences between the church and the puritans, and generally to arrange that no injurious religious disputes might arise. As James had a great turn for theological disputation he was here quite in his element; but instead of showing the puritans all the favour they expected from him in consequence of his Scotch education, that very circumstance induced the king to side against them, at least as far as he prudently could; as he had had abundant proof of the aptness of puritanical doctrine to produce seditious politics. He was importuned, for instance, by the puritans to repeal an act passed in the reign of Elizabeth to suppress certain puritanical societies called separatists, at which there was usually more zeal than sense, and more eloquence than religion. The reply of James was at once so coarsely practical, and so indicative of his general way of thinking upon such points, that we transcribe it literally. "If what you aim at is Scottish presbytery, as I think it is, I tell you that it agrees as well with monarchy as the devil with God. There Jack, and Tom, and Will, and Dick, shall meet and censure me and my council. Therefore I reiterate my former speech; the king's answer. Stay, I pray you, for seven years before you demand, and then if I be grown purty and fat, I may perchance hearken to you, for that sort of government would keep me in breath and give me work enough!"

Passing over the business of parliament at the commencement of this reign, as concerning matters of interest rather to the friends I have a care of your preservation, therefore I would advise you as you tender your life to devise some excuse to shift off your attendance upon this parliament. For God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of the time. Think not lightly of this advertisement, but retire yourself into your country, where you may expect the event in safety. For though there be no appearance of any stir, yet, I say, they will receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm, for the danger is past as soon as you burn this letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it, unto whose holy protection I commit you."

Cecil, now earl of Salisbury, was the principal and most active of the king's ministers, and to that nobleman Montague fortunately determined to carry the letter, though he was himself strongly inclined to think it nothing but some silly attempt to frighten him from his attendance in parliament. Salisbury professed to have the same opinion of the letter, but laid it before the king some days before the meeting of parliament. James, who, amidst many absurdities, was in the main a shrewd man, saw the key to the enigma in the very style of the letter itself; and lord Suffolk, the lord chamberlain, was charged to examine the vaults beneath the houses of parliament on the day before that appointed for opening the session. He did so in open day, and, as if as a simple matter of form, went through the cellars and came out without affecting to see any thing amiss. But he had been struck by the singularity of Piercy, a private gentleman who lived but little in town, having amassed such an inordinate store of fuel; and he read the conspirator in the desperate countenance of Guido Vaux, who was lurking about the place in the garb and character of a servant to Piercy. Acting on these suspicious, the ministers caused a second search to be made at midnight by a well-armed party under sir Thomas Knivet, a justice of peace. At the very door of the vault they seized Vaux, who had made all his preparations and even had his tinder-box and matches ready to fire the train; the faggots of wood were turned over, and the powder found. Vaux was sent under an escort to the Tower, but was so far from seeming appalled by his danger, that he sneeringly told his captors that if he had known a little earlier that they intended to pay him a second visit, he would have fired the train and sweetened his own death by killing them with him. He behaved in the same daring style when examined by the council on the following day; but two or three days residence in the Tower and a threat of putting him on the rack subdued him, and he made a full discovery of his confederates. Catesby, Piercy, and their other friends who were to act in London, heard not only of a letter being sent to lord Montague, but also of the first search made in the vaults; yet were they so infatuated and so resolute to persevere to the last, that it was only when Vaux was actually arrested that they left London and hurried down to Warwickshire, where Digby and his friends were already in arms to seize the princess Elizabeth. But the sheriff raised the county in time to convey the young princess to Coventry; and the huffed conspirators, never more than eighty in number, had now only to think of defending themselves until they could make their escape from the country. But the activity of the sheriff and other gentry surrounded them by such numbers that escape in any way was out of the question, and having confessed themselves to each other, they prepared to die with a desperate gallantry worthy of a nobler cause. They fought with stern determination, but some of their powder took fire and disabled them; Catesby and Piercy were killed by a single shot; Digby, Rookwood, and Winter, with Garnet the Jesuit, were taken prisoners, and soon after perished by the hands of the executioner. It is a terrible proof of the power of superstition to close men's eyes to evil, that though Garnet's crime was of the most ruffianly description, though he had used his priestly influence to delude his confederates and tools when their better nature prompted them to shrink from such wholesale and unsparing atrocity, the catholics imagined miracles to be wrought with this miserable miscreant's blood, and in Spain he was even treated as a martyr! Throughout this whole affair, indeed, the evil nature of superstition was to blame for all the guilt and all the suffering. The conspirators in this case were not lawless ruffians of desperate fortune; they were for the most part men of both property and character; and Catesby was a man who possessed an especially and enviable high character. Digby also was a man of excellent reputation, so much so, that his being a known and rigid papist had not prevented him from being highly esteemed and honoured by queen Elizabeth.

When the punishment of the wretches who had mainly been concerned in this plot left the court leisure for reflection, some minor but severe punishments were inflicted upon those who were thought by connivance or negligence to have been in any degree aiding the chief offenders. Thus the earl of Northumberland was fined the then enormous sum of thirty thousand pounds, and imprisoned for seven years afterwards, because he had not exacted the usual oaths from Piercy on admitting him to the office of gentleman pensioner. The catholic lords Stourton and Mordaunt, too, were fined, the former four and the latter ten thousand pounds by that ever arbitrary court, the star-chamber, for no other offence than their absence from parliament on this occasion. This absence was taken as a proof of their knowledge of the plot, though surely, if these two noblemen had known of it, they would have warned many other catholics; while a hundred more innocent reasons might cause their own absence.

A.D. 1604.—THE PARLIAMENT ASCRIBED AN EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION OF DECIDING CONTESTED ELECTIONS, WHICH IT HAS EVER SINCE RETAINED. ONLY FORTY-NINE OUT OF TEN THOUSAND MINISTERS OR PARTISANS REFUSED TO ACCEDE TO THE ACT OF UNIFORMITY, AND THEY WERE DEPRIVED.

A. D. 1606.—AN ACT WAS PASSED REFERRING THE LORD MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF LONDON TO CUT THE CHANNEL OF THE NEW RIVER.

Of the conduct of James, in regard to the duty he owed to justice in punishing the guilty, and confining punishment strictly to those of whose guilt there is the most unequivocal proof, it is not easy to speak too warmly. The prejudice shown against catholics in the case of the lords Stourton and Mordaunt, and the infinite brutalities inflicted upon the wretched conspirator, were the crimes of the age; but the severe and dignified attention to a just and large charity of judgment as a general principle, which is displayed in the king's speech to this parliament, is a merit all his own.

He observed, says Hume, "that though religion had engaged the conspirators in so criminal an attempt, yet ought we not to involve all the Roman catholics in the same guilt, or suppose them equally disposed to commit such enormous barbarities. Many holy men, and our ancestors among the rest, had been seduced to concur with that church in her scholastic doctrines, who yet had never admitted her seditious principles, concerning the pope's power of de-throning kings or sanctifying assassination. The wrath of heaven is denounced against crimes, but no certain error may obtain its favour; and nothing can be more hateful than the uncharitableness of the puritans who condemn alike to eternal torments even the most inoffensive partisans of popery. For his own part, that conspiracy, however atrocious, should never alter, in the least, his plan of government; while with one hand he would punish guilt, with the other he would still support and protect innocence."

A. D. 1606.—The protestants, and especially the puritans, were inclined to plunge to a very great extent into that injustice of which the king's speech so ably warned them. But the king, even at some hazard to himself and at some actual loss of popularity, persisted in looking at men's secular conduct as a thing quite apart from their ghostly opinions. He bestowed employment and favour, other things being equal, alike on catholic and protestant; and the only hardship caused to the great body of the papists by the horrible gunpowder plot was the enactment of a bill obliging every one without exception to take oath of allegiance. No great hardship upon any good subject or honest and humane man, since it only abjured the power of the pope to dethrone the king!

Almost as soon as James arrived in England he showed himself in one respect, at the least, very far more advanced in true statesmanship than most of his subjects. They for a long time displayed a small and spiteful jealousy of the Scots; he almost, as soon as he mounted the English throne, endeavoured to merge England and Scotland, two separate nations, always sullen and sometimes sanguinary and despoiling enemies, into a Great Britain that might indeed bid defiance to the world, and that should be united in laws and liberties, in prosperity and in interests, as it already was by the hand of nature. There was nothing, however, in the earlier part of his reign, by which so much heart-burning was caused between the king and his parliament, as by the wisdom of the former and the ignorance and narrow prejudice of the latter on this very point. All the exercise of the king's earnestness and influence, aided by the eloquence of, perhaps, all things considered, the greatest man England has ever had, sir Francis Bacon, could not succeed over the petty nationalities of the Scotch and English parliaments any farther for the present, than to procure an ungracious and reluctant appeal of the directly hostile laws existing in the two kingdoms respectively. Nay, so hostile, at the onset, was the English parliament to a measure the grand necessity and value of which no one could now dispute without being suspected of the sheerest idiocy, that the bishop of Bristol, for writing a book in favour of the measure which lay ignorance thus condemned, was so severely clamoured against, that he was obliged to save himself from still harder measures by making a humble submission to these ignorant and bigoted legislators.

A. D. 1607.—The practical tolerance of the king as opposed to his arbitrary maxims of government, and the parliament's lust of persecution as contrasted with its perpetual struggles to obtain more power and liberty for itself, were strongly illustrated this year. A bill was originated in the lower house for a more strict observance of the laws against popish recusants, and for an abatement towards such protestant clergymen as should scruple at the still existing church ceremonial. This measure was doubly distasteful to the king; as a highly liberal protestant he disliked the attempt to recur to the old severities against the catholics; and as a high prerogative monarch he was still more hostile to the insidious endeavour of the puritans, by weakening the church of England, to acquire the power to themselves of hearing and coercing the civil government.

In this same year, however, the very parliament which, on the remonstrance of the king, obediently stopped the progress of that doubly disagreeable measure, gave a striking proof of its growing sense of self importance by commencing a regular journal of its proceedings.

A. D. 1610.—James was so careful to preserve peace abroad that much of his reign might be passed over without remark, but for the frequent bickerings which occurred between him and his parliament on the subject of money. Even in the usually arbitrary reign of Elizabeth the parliament had already learned the power of the purse. The puritan party was now gradually acquiring that at once tyrannical and republican feeling which was to be so fatal to the monarchy and so disgraceful to the nation, and although James was allowed a theoretical despotism, a mere tyranny of maxims and sentences, some merely silly, and others—could he have acted upon them—to the last degree dangerous, the true tyranny was that of the parliament which exerted their power with the merciless and stifled malignity of a dwarf which has suddenly become possessed of a giant's strength. The earl of Salisbury, who was now the treasurer, laid before both houses, this session, the very peculiar situation in which the king was placed. Queen Elizabeth, though she had received large supplies during the latter part of her reign, had made very considerable alienations of the crown lands; the crown was now burthened with debt to the amount of 300,000 pounds, and the king was obliged, instead of a single court as in the late reign, to keep three courts, his own, that of the queen, and that of the prince of Wales. But though these really strong and most reasonable arguments were also urged by the king himself in his speech to parliament, they granted him only one hundred thousand pounds—his debts alone being thrice that sum! It cannot, after this statement of the situation of the king and the temper in which parliament used the power we have spoken of, be astonishing that henceforth there was one perpetual struggle between them, he striving for the means of supporting the national dignity, and indulging a generosity of temper which, imprudent in any king, was doubly so in one who had to deal with so close-fisted a parliament; and they striving at once to abridge the king's prerogative, and to escape from supplying even his most reasonable demands.

An incident occurred this year which, taken in contrast with the extreme horror of foreign disputes which James usually displayed, affords a rather amusing illustration of the extent to which even so petty a "ruling passion" as pedantry may domineer over all others.

Vorstius, a divinity professor of a German university, was appointed to the chair of a Dutch university. He was a disciple of Arminius, and moreover had the presumption to be opposed in argument to king James, who did not think it beneath his royal dignity, or too manifest and dangerous a departure from his pacific foreign policy, seriously to demand of the states that they should deprive and banish the obnoxious professor. The procedure was at once so absurd and so severe, that the Dutch at first refused to remove Vorstius; but the king returned to the charge with such an earnest fierceness, that the states deemed it politic to yield, and the poor professor, who was luckless enough to differ from king James, was deprived of both his home and employment. In the course of this dispute, James, who had so creditably argued for charity in the case of the attempt of his puritans to oppress their catholic fellow-subjects, made use of this revolting observation:—"He would leave it to the states themselves as to the burning of Vorstius for blasphemies and atheism, but surely never heretic better deserved the flames!"

Of James's conduct in and towards Ireland we have given a full account, which is very creditable to him, under the head of that country. We now, therefore, pass forward to the domestic incidents of England, commencing with the death of Henry, prince of Wales, an event which was deeply and with good reason deplored.

A. D. 1612.—This young prince, who was only in his eighteenth year, was exceedingly beloved by the nation, having given every promise of a truly royal manhood. Generous, high spirited, brave, and anxious for men's esteem, perhaps, in the turbulent days that awaited England, even his chief fault—a too great propensity to things military would have proved of service to the nation, by bringing the dispute between the crown and the puritans to an issue before the sour ambition of the latter could have sufficiently matured its views. Dignified and of a high turn of mind, he seems to have held the flaccid and the somewhat vulgar familiarity of his father in something too nearly approaching contempt. To Raleigh, who had so long been kept a prisoner, he openly and enthusiastically avowed his attachment, and was heard to say, "Sure no king except my father would keep such a bird in a cage." So sudden was the young prince's death that evil tongues attributed it to poison, and some even hinted that the prince's popularity and free speech had become intolerable to his father. But the surgical examination of the body clearly proved that there was no poison in the case; and moreover, if James failed at all in the parental character, it was by an excessive and indiscriminate fondness and indulgence.

A. D. 1613.—The marriage of the princess Elizabeth to Frederic, the elector palatine, took place this year, and the entertainments in honour of that event served to dispel the deep gloom which had been caused by the death of prince Henry. But this event, so much rejoiced at, was one of the most unfortunate that occurred during the whole generally fortunate reign of James, whom it plunged into expenses on account of his son-in-law which nothing could have induced him to incur for any warlike enterprise of his own.

But before we speak of the consequence of this unfortunate connection, we must, to preserve due order of time, refer to an event which created a strong feeling of horror and disgust throughout the nation—the murder of sir Thomas Overbury at the instance of the earl and countess of Somerset.

Robert Carr, a youth of respectable but not wealthy family in Scotland, arrived in London in the year 1609, bringing with him letters of recommendation to lord Hay. Carr, then quite a youth, was singularly handsome and possessed in perfection all the merely external accomplishments; though his education was so imperfect, that it is stated that long after his introduction to the king's notice he was so ignorant of even the rudiments of the then almost indispensable Latin, that James was wont to exchange the sceptre for the birch, and personally to play the pedagogue to the boy.

effect, the foul conspirators gave him a dose so violent that he died, and with such evident marks of the foul treatment that he had met with, that an instant discovery was only avoided by burying the body with an indecent haste.

Even in this world of imperfect knowledge and often mistaken judgment, the plotting and cold-blooded murderer never escapes punishment. The scaffold or the gallows, the galleys or the gaol, indeed, he may, though that but rarely happens, contrive to elude. But the tortures of a guilty conscience, a constant remorse mingled with a constant dread, a constant and haunting remembrance of the wrong done to the dead, and a constant horror of the dread retribution which at any instant the merest and most unforeseen accident may bring upon his own guilty head—these punishments the murderer never did and never can escape. From the moment that the unfortunate Overbury was destroyed, the whole feeling and aspect of the once gay and brilliant Somerset were changed. He became sad, silent, inattentive to the flatteries of the king, indifferent to the fatal charms of the countess, morose to all, shy of strangers, weary of himself. He had a doomed aspect; the wild eye and hasty yet uncertain gait of one who sees himself surrounded by the avengers of blood and is every instant expecting to feel their grasp.

As what was at first attributed to temporary illness of body or vexation of mind became a settled and seemingly incurable habit, the king, almost boyish in his love of mirth in his hours of recreation, gradually grew wearied of the presence of his favourite. All the skill and polity of Somerset, all the artful moderation with which he had worn his truly extraordinary fortunes had not prevented him from making many enemies; and these no sooner perceived, with the quick eyes of courtiers, that the old favourite was falling, than they helped to precipitate his fall by the introduction of a young and gay candidate for the vacant place in the royal favour.

Just at this critical moment in the fortunes of Somerset, George Villiers, the cadet of a good English family, returned from his travels. He was barely twenty-one years of age, handsome, well educated, gay, possessed of an audacious spirit, and with precisely that love and aptitude for personal adornment which became his youth. This attractive person was placed full in the king's view during the performance of a comedy. James, as had been anticipated, no sooner saw him than he became anxious for his personal attendance. After some very ludicrous coquetting between his desire for a new favourite and his unwillingness to cast off the old one, James had the young man introduced at court, and very soon appointed him his cup-bearer. Though the ever-speaking conscience of Somerset had long made him unfit for his former gaiety, he was by no means prepared to see himself supplanted in the royal favour; but before he could make any effort to ruin or otherwise dispose of young Villiers, a discovery was made which very effectually ruined himself.

Among the many persons whom Somerset and his guilty countess had found it necessary to employ in the execution of their atrocious design, was an apothecary's apprentice who had been employed in mixing up the poisons. This man, now living at Flushing, made no scruple of openly stating that Overbury had died of poison, and that he had himself been employed in preparing it. The report reached the ears of the English envoy in the Low Countries, and was by him transmitted to the secretary of state, Winwood, who at once communicated it to the king. However weary of his favourite, James was struck with horror and surprise on receiving this report, but with a rigid impartiality which does honour to his memory, he at once sent for Sir Edward Coke, the chief justice, and commanded him to examine into the matter as carefully and as unparisally as if the accused persons were the lowest and the least cared for in the land. The stern nature of Coke scarcely needed this injunction; the enquiry was steadily and searchingly carried on, and it resulted in the complete proof of the guilt of the earl and countess of Somerset, Sir Jervis Elvin, lieutenant of the Tower, Franklin, Weston, and Mrs. Turner. Of the temper of Coke this very trial affords a remarkable and not very creditable instance. Addressing Mrs. Turner, he told her that she was "guilty of the seven deadly sins; being a harlot, a bawd, a sorceress, a witch, a papist, a felon, and a murderer!"

The honourable impartiality with which the king had ordered an enquiry into the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury was not equally observed afterwards. All the accused were very properly condemned to death; but the sentence was executed only on the accomplices; by far the worst criminals, the earl and countess were pardoned! A very brief imprisonment and the forfeiture of their estates were allowed to expiate their enormous crimes, and they were then assigned a pension sufficient for their support, and allowed to retire to the country. But the pardon of man could not secure them the peace of heart which their crime had justly forfeited. They lived in the same house, but they lived only in an alternation of sullenness and chiding, and thus they dragged on many wretched years, a mutual torment in their old age as they had been a mutual snare in their youth, until they at length sank unregretted and unhonoured into the grave.

A.D. 1616.—The fall of Somerset necessarily facilitated and hastened the rise of young George Villiers, who in a wonderfully short time obtained promotions— which, that the regularity of narrative may be preserved, we insert here—as viscount Villiers, earl, marquis, and finally duke, of

A. D. 1617.—SIR FRANCIS BACON MADE LORD-CHANCELLOR IN PLACE OF ELIZABETH, WHO DIED IN A FORTNIGHT AFTER HIS RESIGNATION.

Buckingham, knight of the garter, master of the horse, chief justice in eyre, warden of the cinque porte, master of the King's Bench office, steward of Westminster, constable of Windsor, and lord high admiral of England. His mother was made countess of Buckingham, his brother viscount Purbeck, and a whole host of his previously obscure and needy favourites obtained honours, places, patents, or wealth.

The profusion of the king—to which justice demands that we add the parsimony of the parliament—made him throughout his whole reign an embarrassed man; and he now incurred great, though undeserved, odium by the course he took to supply his pressing and immediate wants. When Elizabeth aided the infant states of Holland against the gigantic power of Spain, she had the important towns of Flushing, the Brill, and Rammekeins placed in her hands as pledges for the repayment of the money to England. Various payments had been made which had reduced the debt to 600,000*l.*, which sum the Dutch were under agreement to pay to James at the rate of 40,000*l.* per annum. This annual sum would doubtless have been of vast service to the king—but 26,000*l.* per annum were spent in maintaining his garrisons in the cautionary or mortgaged towns. Only 14,000*l.* remained clear to England, and even that would cease in the event of new warfare between Holland and Spain. Considering these things, and being pressed on all sides for money to satisfy just demands and the incessant cravings of his favourite and the court, the king gladly agreed to surrender the cautionary towns on the instant payment by the Dutch of 250,000*l.*; and, under all the circumstances of the case, James appears to have acted with sound policy in making the bargain.

A. D. 1617.—In the course of this year James paid a visit to Scotland with the view to a favourite scheme which he had long pondered,—probably even before he ascended the English throne, and while he still was personally annoyed by the rude and intrusive presumption of the puritans. His scheme was "to enlarge the episcopal authority; to establish a few ceremonies in public worship, and to settle and fix the superiority of the civil to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction."

But though the king's personal influence was now very high, as well from the peace he had preserved throughout his dominions and the pride the Scotch, themselves a pedantic people, felt in hearing the king whom they had given to England cited as "the British Solomon," as from the great, not to say unjust, preference which the king took every opportunity to show to Scottish suitors for promotion, even his influence, after much opposition on the part of the clergy, could only procure him a sullen adoption of but a small portion of his plan.

"Episcopacy" was so much the detestation of the Scotch, that it is surprising that so shrewd a king as James should have made a point of endeavouring to force it upon them. But as if he had not done sufficient in the way of affronting the religious prejudices of the Scotch, James no sooner returned home than he equally affronted those of that large party of his English subjects, the puritans. That dark, sullen, joyless, and joy-hating set of men had, by degrees, brought the original decorous Sunday of England to be a day of the most silent and intense gloom. This was noticed by the king in his return from Scotland, and he immediately issued a proclamation by which all kinds of lawful games and exercises were allowed after divine service. However imprudent this proclamation on the part of the king, we are inclined to believe that in spirit his extreme was wiser than that of the puritans. But whatever may be the good or the bad policy of the practice, it is certain that the king chose a wrong time for recommending it. Even his authority was as nothing against superstitious fanaticism. But while he failed to check or persuade the puritans, did he not irritate them? Might not the sharpening of many a sword that was bared against Charles I. be traced to the venation caused in puritan bosoms by this very proclamation of his father?

CHAPTER XLIX.

A. D. 1618.—Sir Walter Raleigh, the favourite of Elizabeth, the opponent and enemy of Essex, to whom he had shown an implacable and savage spirit which makes us doubt whether the world had not been greatly mistaken in deeming him a good as well as a great man, had now been for thirteen years lingering in his prison. Though advanced in years and broken in fortune, even imprisonment could not break his unquestionably daring and resolute spirit. Soldier, seaman, courtier, and man of intrigue during so much of his life, it was when, amidst the yells of the public brutality, which his own brutality, however, had provoked and exemplified, he was led to the Tower of London, that he, instead of resigning himself to despair, commenced his elaborate and really learned History of the World! Thirteen years of confinement could not quell that enduring and daring spirit; and as the report of his friends informed him that public opinion was very favourably and greatly changed on his behalf, he now began to scheme for obtaining his enlargement. He caused it to be noised abroad that, during one of his voyages, he had discovered a gold mine in Guiana, so rich, that it would afford enormous wealth not only to any gallant adventurers who, under proper guidance, should seek it, but also to the entire nation at large. These reports, as Raleigh from the first intended, reached the ears of the king; but James doubted the existence of the mine, and the more so because it was clear that a man in the sad situation of Raleigh might be expected to say almost anything to obtain freedom. But the report was so far set-visible to Raleigh, that it reminded the king of the long dreary years the once gallant soldier and gray courtier of Elizabeth had passed in the gloom of a dungeon, and he liberated him from the Tower, but refused to release him from the original sentence of death which, he said, he considered a necessary check upon a man of Raleigh's character, which assuredly had more of talent and audacity than of either probity or mercy.

Though James was by no means inclined to give credit to the insignificant tale of Raleigh, he gave full leave to all private adventurers who might choose to join him; and Raleigh's intrepid assertions, backed by his great repute for both talent and courage, soon placed him at the head of twelve ships, well armed and manned, and provided with every thing necessary for piracy and plunder, but with nothing calculated for digging the pretended treasure.

On the river Oronoko, in Guiana, the Spaniards had built a town called St. Thomas, which, at this time, was exceedingly wealthy. Raleigh had taken possession of the whole district above twenty years before in the name of queen Elizabeth; but, as he had immediately left the coast, his claim on behalf of England was totally unknown to the Spaniards. It was to this wealthy Spanish settlement that Raleigh now steered, and on arriving there he staid at the mouth of the Oronoko with five of his largest ships, sending the remainder of the expedition up to St. Thomas's under the command of his son and his fellow-adventurer, captain Kemyse. The Spaniards seeing the English adventurers approach St. Thomas in such hostile guise, fired at them, but were speedily repulsed and driven into the town. As young Raleigh headed his men in the attack on the town, he exclaimed, This is the true mine, and they are but fools who look for any other! He had scarcely spoken the words when he received a shot and immediately fell dead; Kemyse, however, still continued the attack and took the town, which they burned to ashes in their rage at finding no considerable booty in it.

Raleigh had all along said not that he had himself ever seen the wonderfully rich mine of which he gave so glowing an account, but that it had been found by Kemyse on one of their former expeditions together, and that Kemyse had brought him a lump of ore which proved the value as well as the existence of the mine. Yet now that Kemyse, by his own account, was within two hours march of the mine, he made the most absurd excuses to his men for leading them no farther, and immediately returned to Raleigh, at the mouth of the Oronoko, with the melancholy news of the death of the younger Raleigh, and the utter failure of all their hopes as far as St. Thomas's was concerned. The scene between Raleigh and Kemyse was probably a very violent one; at all events it had such an effect upon Kemyse that he immediately

The other adventurers now perceived that they had entered into both a dangerous and unprofitable speculation, and they inferred from all that had passed, that Raleigh from the outset had relied upon piracy and plundering towns—a kind of speculation for which their ill success at St. Thomas's gave them no inclination, whatever their moral feelings upon the subject might have been. On a full consideration of all the circumstances, the adventurers determined to return to England and take Raleigh with them, leaving it to him to justify himself to the king in the best manner he could. On the passage he repeatedly endeavoured to escape, but was brought safely to England and delivered up to the king. The court of Spain in the mean time loudly and justly complained of the destruction of St. Thomas's; and, after a long examination before the privy council, Raleigh was pronounced guilty of wilful deceit from the first as to the mine, and of having from the first intended to make booty by piracy and land plunder. The lawyers held, however, as a universal rule, that a man who already lay under attain of treason could in no form be tried anew for another crime; the king, therefore, signed a warrant for Raleigh's execution for that participation in the setting up of the lady Isabella Stuart, for which he had already suffered imprisonment during the dreary period of thirteen years! He died with courage, with gaiety almost, but quite without bravado or indecency. While there was yet a faint hope of his escape he feigned a variety of illnesses, even including madness, to protract his doom; but when all hope was at length at an end, he threw off all disguise, and prepared to die with that courage on the scaffold which he had so often dared death with on the field. Taking up the axe with which he was about to be beheaded, he felt the edge of it and said, "Tis a sharp, but it is also a sure remedy for all ills." He then calmly laid his head upon the block, and was dead at the first stroke of the axe. Few men had been more unpopular a few years earlier than sir Walter Raleigh; but the courage he displayed, the long imprisonment he had suffered, and his execution on a sentence pronounced so long before, merely to give satisfaction to Spain, rendered this execution one of the most unpopular acts ever performed by the king.

It will be remembered that we spoke of the marriage of the princess Elizabeth to the elector palatine as an event which in the end proved mischievous both to England and to the king.

A.D. 1619.—The states of Bohemia being in arms to maintain their revolt from the hated authority of the catholic house of Austria, the mighty preparations made by Ferdinand II. and the extensive alliances he had succeeded in forming to the same end made the states very anxious to obtain a counterbalancing aid to their cause.

A. D. 1619.—IN THESE DAYS A COURT WAS A SUBJECT OF FORTUITOUS SPECULATION, AND THE PUBLIC WERE NOW INTERESTED WITH ONE FOR A MONTH.

Frederick, elector palatine, being son-in-law to the king of England and nephew to prince Maurice, who at this time was possessed of almost unlimited power over the United Provinces, the states of Bohemia considered that were he elected to their crown—which they deemed elective—their safety would be ensured by his potent connections. They, therefore, offered to make Frederick their sovereign; and he, looking only at the honour, accepted the offer without consulting either his uncle or father-in-law, probably because he well knew that they would dissuade him from an honour so costly and onerous as this was certain to prove. Having accepted the sovereignty of Bohemia, Frederick immediately marched all the troops he could command to the defence of his new subjects. On the news of this event arriving in England the people of all ranks were strongly excited. As we have elsewhere said, the people of England are essentially affectionate towards their sovereigns; and Frederick, merely as the son-in-law of the king, would have had their warmest wishes. But they were still further interested on his behalf, because he was a protestant prince opposing the ambition and the persecution of the detested Spaniard and Austrian, and there was a general cry for an English army to be sent forthwith to Bohemia. Almost the only man in the kingdom who was clear-sighted and unmoved amid all this passionate feeling was James. He was far too deeply impressed with the opinion that it was dangerous for a king's prerogative and for his subjects' passive obedience, to look with a favourable eye upon revolted states conferring a crown even upon his own son-in-law. He would not acknowledge Frederick as king of Bohemia, and forbade his being prayed for in our churches under that title.

A. D. 1620.—However wise the reasonings of James, it would, in the end, have been profitable to him to have sent an English army, even upon a vast scale, to the assistance of Frederick in the first instance. Ferdinand, with the duke of Bavaria and the count of Bucquoy, and Spinola with thirty thousand veteran troops from the Low Countries, not only defeated Frederick at the great battle of Prague, and sent him and his family fugitives into Holland, but also took possession of the palatinate. This latter disaster might surely have been prevented, had James at the very outset so far departed from his pacific policy as to send a considerable army to occupy the palatinate, in doing which he would by no means have stepped beyond the most strictly legitimate support of the legitimate right of his son-in-law.

Now that Frederick was expelled even from his palatinate, James still depended upon his tact in negotiation to spare him the necessity for an actual recourse to arms; but he at the same time, with the turn for dissimulation which was natural to him, determined to use the warlike enthusiasm of his subjects as a means of obtaining money, of which, as usual, he was painfully in want. Urging for the necessity of instant recourse to that forcible interference, which, in truth, he intended never to make, he tried to gain a benevolence, but even the present concern for the palatine would not blind the people to the arbitrary nature of that way of levying heavy taxes upon them, and James was reluctantly obliged to call a parliament.

A. D. 1621.—The unwise inclination of the people to plunge into war on behalf of the palatine was so far serviceable to James, that it caused this parliament to meet him with more than usually dutiful and liberal dispositions. Some few members, indeed, were inclined to make complaint and redress of certain gross grievances their first subject of attention. But the general feeling was against them, and it was with something like acclamation that the parliament proceeded at once to vote the king two subsidies.

This done, they proceeded to inquire into some enormous abuses of the essentially pernicious practice of granting patent monopolies of particular branches of trade. It was proved that sir Giles Mompesson and sir Francis Michel had outrageously abused their patent for licensing inns and ale-houses; the former was severely punished, and the latter only escaped the same by breaking from prison and going abroad.

Still more atrocious was the conduct of sir Edward Villiers, brother of the favourite, Buckingham. Sir Edward had a patent, in conjunction with Mompesson and Michel for the sole making of gold and silver lace. This patent had not only been abused to the great oppression of the persons engaged in that, then, very extensive trade, but also to the downright robbery of all who used the articles, in which the patentees sold a vast deal more of copper than of gold or silver. Villiers, instead of being dealt with as severely as his accomplices, was sent abroad on a mission, entrusted with the care of the national interests and honour, as a means of screening him from the punishment due to his shameless extortion and robbery at home. Hume, somewhat too tenderly, suggests that the guilt of Villiers was less enormous or less apparent than that of his accomplices. But the true cause of his impunity was the power of his insolent and upstart brother.

The king having expressed himself to be well pleased that the parliament had enabled him to discover and punish this enormous system of cruelty and fraud, the commons now ventured to carry their inquiries into the practices of a higher offender. That offender, alas! for poor human nature, was the illustrious Bacon;

"The wisest, greatest, meanest of mankind."

Kind-hearted, learned, wise, witty, eloquent, and beyond all his contemporaries deep-thoughted and sagacious, the viscount St. Albans, chancellor of England, was greedy almost to insanity; greedy not with the miser's wretched love of hoarding, but with the reckless desire of lavishing. His emoluments were vast, his honours and appointments many, and no one could be more eloquent in behalf of justice and moderation than this great man, who may be justly styled the apostle of common-sense in reasoning. Yet his profusion was so vast and so utterly reckless, and his practice so little in accordance with his preaching, that he took the most enormous bribes in his office of judge in equity. Hume suggests the odd apology that though he took bribes he still did justice, and even gave hostile judgments where he had been paid for giving favourable ones! To us it appears that this, if true, was merely adding the offence of robbing individuals to that of abusing his office. He was very justly sentenced to imprisonment during the royal pleasure, or fine of ten thousand pounds, and incapacity for again holding any office. The fine was remitted, and he was soon released from imprisonment and allowed a pension for his support; a lenity which we think he was undeserving of, in precise proportion to the vastness of his ability which ought to have taught him to keep his conscience clear.

Many disputes now occurred from time to time between the king and his parliament; and at length the king dissolved them; imprisoned Coke, Phillips, Selden, and Pym; and, in his whimsical way of punishing refractory people, sent sir Dudley Digges, sir Thomas Crew, sir Nathaniel Riek, and sir James Perrot on a commission to Ireland, a country to which a scholar and a fine gentleman of that time would about as readily go as a club-lounger of our day would to Siberia, or the salt mines of Poland.

We do not deem it necessary to dwell at all minutely upon this parliamentary opposition to the king, because it is less important in itself than in its consequences, which we shall have to develop in the succeeding reign. The seed of the civil war was now being sowed. The commons were daily gaining power and the consciousness of power; but without the large and generous as well as wise spirit which knows how to reform gradually.

Even the king himself, with all his high opinion of prerogative and his only too great readiness to exert it, perceived that the day was past for governing with the high hand alone. A curious instance of this occurs in his buying off, from the gathering opposition, of sir John Saville. While others were sent to prison, or, which was but little better, to Ireland, sir John, whose opposition had been eager and spirited, made his talent so much feared, that the king made him comptroller of the household, a privy councillor, and a baron. Oh, if his successor could but have been induced to ponder this fact, and to take it in conjunction with the nature of mankind, how much misery had been spared to himself and his people, and how many a name that has come down to us in conjunction with the most exalted patriotism, forsooth! would be forgotten in the lordly titles bestowed upon parliamentary usefulness!

A.D. 1622.—Whatever intention James might have professed of going to war on behalf of his son-in-law, his real intention was to secure the friendship of Spain, and thus secure the accomplishment of his own and the nation's wishes by marrying his son, prince Charles, to the Spaniard's sister. Upon this marriage, besides his looking upon it as a master-stroke of policy, he was passionately bent upon as a matter of personal feeling; as he deemed no one below a princess of Spain or France a fitting match for his son.

The war between the emperor and the palatine was still vigorously kept up, the latter prince, in spite of all his misfortunes making the most heroic exertions. The details of this war will be found in their proper place. Here it suffices to say, that though James greatly aided his gallant son-in-law with money, he did him almost equal injury by his negotiations, which every one saw through, and of course treated with disrespect proportioned to their knowledge that they originated in the most intense political prudence, carried to the very verge of actual cowardice. This excessive caution of the king, and his equally excessive addiction to perpetual negotiation perpetually ending in nothing, was made the subject of much merriment on the continent. At Brussels a farce was acted, in the course of which a messenger was made to announce the sad news that the palatine was at length on the eve of being wrested from the house of Austria. Nothing, the messenger said, could resist the aid which Frederick was now about to receive; the king of Denmark having agreed to send him a hundred thousand pickled herrings, the Dutch a hundred thousand butter-boxes, and the king of England—a hundred thousand dispatches!

But though James was in reality somewhat ridiculously profuse in his efforts to "negotiate" the duke of Bavaria into restoring the palatine, he really was resting his main hope upon the Spanish match.

Digby, afterwards earl of Bristol, was sent to Madrid to endeavour to hasten the negotiation which, with more or less earnestness, had now been carrying on for five years. The princess being a catholic, a dispensation from the pope was necessary for the marriage; and as various motives of policy made Spain anxious to avoid a total and instant breach with James, this circumstance was dexterously turned to advantage. Spain undertook to procure the dispensation, and thus possessed the power of retarding the marriage indefinitely or of concluding it at any moment, should circumstances render that course advisable. Suspecting at least a part of the deception that was practised upon him, James, while he sent Digby publicly to Spain, secretly sent Sage to Rome to watch and report the state of affairs and feeling there. far as Rome was concerned, was the difference of religion, he immediately discharged all popish recusants who were in custody. By this measure he hoped to propitiate Rome; to his own subjects he stated his reason for resorting to it to be—his desire to urge it as an argument in support of the applications he was continually making to foreign princes for a more indulgent treatment of their protestant subjects.

Digby, now earl of Bristol, was incessant in his exertions, and seems to have been minutely informed of the real intentions and feelings of Spain; and the result of his anxious and well-directed inquiries was his informing James that there was no doubt that the princess would shortly bestow her hand upon his son, and that her portion would be the then enormous sum of eight hundred thousand pounds sterling. Pleased as James was with the news as regarded the anticipated marriage, he was enraptured when he considered it in conjunction with the restoration of the palatinate, which undoubtedly would instantly follow. Nothing now remained but to procure the dispensation from Rome; and that, supposing, as seems to have been the case, that Spain was sincere, was not likely to be long delayed when earnestly solicited by Spain—when all James's hopes were shipwrecked and his finely drawn webs of polity scattered to the winds by Buckingham. Did a prince ever fail to rue the folly of making an upstart too great for even his master's control!

A.D. 1623.—It would have been comparatively a small mischief had the king made Buckingham merely an opulent duke, had he not also made him, practically, his chief minister. Accomplished, showy, and plausible, he was, however, totally destitute of the solid talents necessary to the statesman, and was of so vindictive as well as impetuous a nature, that he would willingly have plunged the nation into the most destructive war for the sake of avenging a personal injury or ruining a personal enemy. Impetuous and tyrannical even with the king himself, he was absolute, arrogant, and insulting to all others; and he had even insulted the prince of Wales. But as the king grew old, and evidently was fast sinking, Buckingham became anxious to repair his past error, and to connect himself in such wise with Charles, while still only prince of Wales, as to continue to be the chief minion of court when the prince should have expanded into the king.

Perceiving that the prince of Wales was greatly annoyed by the long and seemingly interminable delays that had taken place in bringing about the Spanish match, Buckingham resolved to make that circumstance serviceable to his views. Accordingly, though the prince had recently shown a decided coolness towards the overgrown favourite, Buckingham approached his royal highness, and in his most insinuating manner—and no one could be more insinuating or supple than Buckingham when he had an object in view—professed a great desire to be serviceable. He decanted long and well upon the unhappy lot of princes in general in the important article of marriage, in which both husband and wife were usually the victims of mere state policy, and strangers even to each other's persons until they met at the altar. From these undeniable premises he passed to the conclusion, so well calculated to inflame a young and enthusiastic man, that for the sake both of making the acquaintance of his future wife, and of hastening the settlement of the affair by interesting her feelings in behalf alike of his gallantry and of his personal accomplishments, Charles would act wisely by going incognito to the Spanish court. A step so unusual and so trusting could not fail to flatter the Spanish pride of Philip and his court, while, as seeming to proceed from his passionate eagerness to see her, the infant herself must inevitably be delighted.

Charles, afterwards so grave and so melancholy—alas! good prince, how much he had to make him so!—was then young, ingenuous, and romantic. He fell at once into Buckingham's views, and, taking advantage of an hour of unusual good humour, they so earnestly importuned the king that he gave his consent to the scheme. Subsequently he changed his mind; cool reflection enabled him to see some good reasons against the proposed expedient, and his natural timidity and suspicion no doubt suggested still more than had any such solid foundation. But he was again importuned by the prince with earnestness, and by the duke with that tyrannous insolence which he well knew when to use and when to abstain from; and again the king consented.

Endymion Porter, gentleman of the prince's chamber, and sir Francis Cottington were to be the only attendants of the prince and duke, except their mere grooms and valets. To sir Francis Cottington the king communicated the scheme, in the duke's presence, and asked his opinion of it. The scene that followed is so graphically characteristic of the terms upon which the duke lived with his benefactor and sovereign, that we transcribe it in full from the pages of Hume.

"James told Cottington that he had always been an honest man, and, therefore, he was now about to trust him with an affair of the highest importance, which he was not, upon his life, to disclose to any man whatever. 'Cottington,' added he, 'here is baby Charles, dog Steenie, (these ridiculous appellations he usually gave to the prince and Buckingham), who have a great mind to go past into Spain and fetch home the infants. They will have but two more in their company, and they have chosen you for one. What think you of the journey?' Sir Francis, who was a prudent man, and had resided some years in Spain as the king's agent, was struck with all the obvious objections to such an enterprise, and scrupled not to declare them. The king threw himself upon his bed and cried

A.D. 1622.—THE CUSTOMS, OUTWARS, AND INWARDS, AMOUNTED TO £1,352,312.—AN ANNUAL AGREEMENT FOR LENDRY TO THEM OF THE BRITISH COASTS.

'I told you all this before,' and fell into a new passion and new lamentations, complaining that he was undone and should lose baby Charles.

"The prince showed by his countenance that he was extremely dissatisfied with Cottington's discourse, but Buckingham broke into an open passion against him. The king, he told him, had asked him only of the journey, and of the manner of travelling, particulars of which he might be a competent judge, having gone the road so often by post; but that he, without being called to it, had the presumption to give his advice upon matters of state and against the prince, which he should repent as long as he lived."

"A thousand other reproaches he added which put the poor king into a new agony on behalf of a servant who, he foresaw, would suffer for answering him honestly. Upon which he said, with some emotion, 'Nay, by God, Steenie, you are much to blame for using him so. He answered me directly to the question which I asked him, and very honestly and wisely; and yet you know he said no more than I told you before he was called in.' However, after all this passion on both sides, James renewed his consent, and proper directions were given for the journey. Nor was he at any loss to discover that the whole intrigue was originally contrived by Buckingham, as well as pursued violently by his spirit and impetuosity."

The prince and Buckingham, with their attendants, passed through France; and so well were they disguised that they even ventured to look in at a court ball at Paris, where the prince saw the princess Henrietta, his afterwards unfortunate and he, rolically attached queen.

In eleven days they arrived at Madrid, where they threw off their disguises and were received with the utmost cordiality. The highest honours were paid to Charles. The king paid him a visit of welcome, cordially thanked him for a step which, unusual as it was among princes, only the more forcibly proved the confidence he had in Spanish honour, gave him a gold passport key they that he might visit at all hours, and ordered the council to obey him even as the king himself. An incident which in England would be trivial, but which in Spain, so haughty and so pertinacious of etiquette, was of the utmost importance, will at once show the temper in which the Spaniards responded to the youthful and gallant confidence of Charles. Olivarez, a grandee of Spain—a haughtier race far than any king, out of Spain—though he had the right to remain covered in the presence of his own sovereign, invariably took off his hat in presence of the prince of Wales!

Thus far, in point of fact, whatever obvious objections there might be to Buckingham's scheme, it had been really successful; the pride and the fine spirit of honour of the Spaniard had been touched precisely as he anticipated. But if he had done good by accident, he was speedily to undo it by his selfish willfulness.

Instead of taking any advantage of the generous confidence of the prince, the Spaniard gave way upon some points which otherwise they most probably would have insisted upon. The pope, indeed, took some advantage of the prince's position, by adding some more stringent religious conditions to the dispensation; but, on the whole, the visit of the prince had done good, and the dispensation was actually granted and prepared for delivery when Gregory XV. died. Urban VIII., who succeeded him, anxious once more to see a catholic king in England, and judging from Charles's romantic expedition that love and impatience would probably work his conversion, found some pretexts for delaying the delivery of the dispensation, and the natural impatience of Charles was graded into downright anger by the artful insinuations of Buckingham, who affected to feel certain that Spain had been insincere from the very first. Charles at length grew so dissatisfied that he asked permission to return home, and asked it in such evident ill-humour, that Philip at once granted it without even the affectation of a desire for any prolongation of the visit. But the prince parted with all external friendship, and Philip had a monument erected on the spot at which they bade each other adieu.

That the craft of Urban would speedily have given way before the united influences of James and Philip there can be no doubt, and as little can there be of the loyal sincerity of the Spaniard. Why then should Buckingham, it may be asked, overset when so near its completion the project he had so greatly exerted himself to advance? We have seen that his object in suggesting the journey to the prince was one of purely selfish policy. He then was selfish with respect to future benefit to himself. His sowing discord between Charles and the Spaniard was equally a selfish procedure. His dissolute and airy manners disgusted that grave court; and his propensity to debauchery disgusted that sober people. He insulted the pride of their proud nobility in the person of Olivarez, the almost omnipotent prime minister of Spain; and when by all these means he had worn out his welcome in Spain, and perceived that even respect to the prince could not induce the Spaniards to endure himself, he resolved to break off the amity between the prince and Philip, and succeeded as we have seen. When Buckingham was taking leave of Spain he had the wanton insolence to say to the proud Olivarez, "With regard to you, sir, in particular, you must not consider me as your friend, but must ever expect from me all possible enmity and opposition." To this insolent speech, the grandee, with calm greatness, merely replied that he very willingly accepted of the offer of enmity so obligingly made.

On their return to England both Charles and Buckingham used all their influence with the king to get him to break off all farther negotiating the Spanish match; Charles being actuated by a real though erroneous belief of the insincerity of the Spaniard, and Buckingham, by a consciousness that he could expect nothing but ruin should the Infanta, after being stung by so much insult shown to herself and her country, become queen of England. In want of money, and looking upon the Spanish match as a sure means by which to get the palatinate restored without going to war, James was not easily persuaded to give up all thought of a match he had had so much at heart and had brought so near to a conclusion. But the influence of Buckingham was omnipotent in parliament, and his insolence irresistible by the king; the Spanish match was dropped, enmity to the house of Austria was henceforth to be the principle of English polity, and a war was to be resorted to for the restoration of the palatinate. It was in vain that the Spanish ambassador endeavoured to open James's eyes. The deluded monarch was utterly in the hands of the haughty duke, and moreover, from growing physical debility, was daily growing less fit to endure scenes of violent disputation.

The earl of Bristol, who throughout this strange and protracted affair had acted the part of both an honest and an able minister, would most probably have made such representations in parliament as would have overcome even Buckingham; but he had scarcely landed in England ere, by the favourite's influence, he was arrested and carried to the Tower. The king was satisfied in his heart that the minister was an honest and an injured man; but though he speedily released him from the Tower, Buckingham only suffered him thus far to undo his involuntary injustice on condition that Bristol should retire to the country and abstain from all attendance on parliament!

From Spain the prince turned to France in search of a bride. He had been much struck by the loveliness of the princess Henrietta, and he now demanded her hand; negotiations were accordingly immediately entered into on the same terms previously granted to Spain, though the princess could bring no dowry like that of the Infanta.

James, in the mean time, found himself, while fast sinking into the grave, plunged into that warlike course which during his whole life he had so sedulously, and at so many sacrifices of dignity and even of pretty certain advantage, avoided.

The palatinate, lying in the very midst of Germany, possessed by the emperor and the duke of Bavaria, and only to be approached by an English army through other powerful enemies, was obviously to be retaken by force only at great risks and sacrifices. But the counsels of Buckingham urged James onward. Count de Mansfeldt and his army were subsidized, and an English army of two hundred horse and twelve thousand foot was raised by impressment. A free passage was promised by France, but when the army arrived at Calais it was discovered that no formal orders had been received for its admission, and after vainly waiting for such orders until they actually began to want provision, the commanders of the expedition steered for Zealand. Here, again, no proper arrangements had been made for the disembarkation, a sort of plague broke out among the men from short allowances and long confinement in the close vessels, nearly one half of the troops died, and Mansfeldt very rightly deemed the remainder too small a force for so mighty an attempt as that of the reconquest of the palatinate.

A. D. 1625.—Long infirm, the king had been so much harassed of late by the mere necessity of looking war in the face, that this awful loss of life and the utter failure of the hopes he had been persuaded to rest upon the expedition, threw him into a tertian ague. From the first attack he felt that his days were numbered; for when told, in the old English adage, that he replied, with something of his old quaintness—"Hoot mon! Ye forget it means a young king."

"An ague in spring Is health to a king,"

He was right. Every successive fit left him still weaker, till he sank into the arms of death, on the 27th of March, 1625, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, the fifty-eighth of his reign over Scotland, and the twenty-third of his reign over England.

Few kings have been less personally dignified, or less personally or royally vicious than James. As a husband, a father, a friend, master, and patron, he was unexceptionable save upon the one point of excessive facility and good nature. As a private man he would have been prized the more on account of this amiable though weak trait of character. But as a king it weakened him both at home and abroad, and would assuredly have conducted him to the scaffold, had puritans been as far advanced in their fanatic and mischievous temper, and in their political and misused power, as they were on the reign of his more admirable but less fortunate son.

CHAPTER L.

The Reign of CHARLES I.

A. D. 1625.—THE singular submissiveness with which James had been obeyed, even when his principles and practice were the most exorbitantly arbitrary, was well calculated to mislead his son and successor Charles I. into a very fatal mistake as to the real temper and inclination of his people. Authority had not as yet ceased to be obeyed, but it had for some time ceased to be respected. Even as early as the reign of Elizabeth, a sturdy and bitter spirit of puritanism had begun to possess considerable influence both in parliament and among the people at large, and that spirit had vastly increased during the long reign of James I., whose familiar manners and undignified character were so ill calculated to support his claim to an almost eastern submission on the part of subjects towards their anointed sovereign.

But the real temper of the people was, as it seems to us, totally misunderstood both by Charles I. and his councillors. Charles had imbibed very much of his father's extravagant notion of the extent of the royal prerogative; and while the bitter puritans were ready to carry out their fanatical feelings to the extent of crushing alike the throne and the church, the king commenced his reign by the exaction of a benevolence, an arbitrary mode of raising money which had been denounced long before. The pecuniary situation of the king was, in fact, such as ought to have excited the sympathy and liberality of his subjects, and even the unconstitutional and arbitrary conduct of the king in issuing privy seals for a benevolence must not blind us to the cause of that conduct. In the reign of James, as we have seen, the cause of the prince palatine was unreasonably popular, and England had entered into a treaty to keep up the war on behalf of that prince. Bound by that treaty, Charles appealed to his parliament, which gave him only two subsidies, though well aware that sum would be quite unequal to the military demonstrations which both the cause of his brother-in-law and the credit of the English nation required at his hands.

An inefficient expedition to Cadix plainly showed that, even with the aid of the forced benevolence, the king was very insufficiently supplied with money, and a new parliament was called. Warned by the experience he now had, the king exerted himself to exclude the more obstinate and able of the opposition members from the new parliament. Something like what in later times has been called the management of parliament had already been tried in the reign of James. But the chief step now taken was arbitrarily to name the popular members of the late parliament sheriffs of counties, by which means they were effectually excluded from sitting in the new parliament. But the puritanical spirit was too widely spread, and while the expedient of the king aggravated the excluded and their friends, the members who were returned proved to be quite as obstinate and unreasonable as their predecessors. The king and his friends and advisers fairly stated to parliament the great and urgent necessity of the crown; but in the face of the fact that those necessities were in a great measure created by the former enthusiasm of parliament and the people in favour of the palatine, the new parliament would only grant three subsidies, or something more than a hundred and fifty thousand pounds, a sum really paltry as compared to the king's need. It cannot be too emphatically impressed upon the reader that here, at the very outset of the king's reign, the foundation of all its subsequent troubles was laid. Measures over which the king had had no control made a vigorous and offensive course of action imperative upon him; but the parliament, while looking to him for that course, doled out the sinews of war with a paltry and huckstering spirit, that left the king no choice save that between disgrace abroad or arbitrary conduct at home. Charles, unfortunately, looked rather at the abstract nature and privileges of his royalty than at the power and fierceness of real popular feeling which he had to combat or to elude. He openly authorised commissioners to sell to the catholics a dispensation from all the penal laws especially enacted against them; he borrowed large sums of money from the nobility, many of whom lent them with great reluctance; and he levied upon London, and upon other large towns, considerable sums, under the name of ship-money, for the equipment and support of a fleet. Wholly to justify this conduct of the king is no part of our business or desire; but again, and emphatically, we say, that the chief blame is due to the niggardly and unpatriotic conduct of the parliament; an unjust extortion was the natural and inevitable result of a no less unjust and unprincipled parsimony.

War being declared against France, the haughty Buckingham, who was at high in favour with the dignified and refined Charles as he had been with the plain and coarse James, was entrusted with an expedition for the relief of Rochelle, which at that time was garrisoned by the oppressed protestants and besieged by a formidable army of the opposite persuasion. Buckingham's talents were by no means equal to his power and ambition. He took not even the simplest precautions for securing the concert of the garrison that he was sent to relieve, and on his arrival before Rochelle he was refused admittance, the besieged very naturally suspecting the sincerity of a commander who had sent no notice of his intention to aid them. This blunder was immediately followed up by another no less glaring and capital. Denied admittance to Rochelle, he disregarded the island of Oléron, which was too weak to have resisted him and abundantly well provided to have subsisted his force, and sailed for the isle of Rhé, which was strongly fortified and held by a powerful and well provisioned garrison. He sat down before the castle of St. Martin's with the avowed intention of starving the garrison into submission; but abundant provisions were thrown into the fortress by sea, and the French effected a landing in a distant part of the island. All that mere courage could do was now done by Buckingham, who, however, lost nearly two-thirds of his army, and was obliged to make a hurried retreat with the remainder. His friends, quite truly, claimed for him the praise of personal courage, he having been the very last man to get on shipboard. But mere courage is but a small part of the quality of a great general; probably there was not a private sentry in his whole force who was not personally as brave as Buckingham himself; certainly there could have been but few private soldiers who would not have failed less disastrously and disgracefully in the main objects of the expedition.

but increase the mischievous hints between the king and parliament. The latter, without considering the dilemma in which their own illiberal conduct had placed the king, loudly exclaimed against those, certainly, very arbitrary measures to which they themselves had compelled him. Duties called tonnage and poundage had been levied, and for refusal to pay them, many merchants had had their property seized by the officers of the customs. The parliament now called those officers to account, alleging that tonnage and poundage had been illegally demanded, and the sheriff of London was actually sent to the Tower for having officially supported the king's officers. To these circumstances of ill feeling the more zealous puritans added religious grievances; and every day produced some new proof that a very large proportion of the nation was infected with a feeling of intolerance and bigotry that could not but prove ruinous to both church and state.

A.D. 1629.—Alarmed at the zeal and obstinacy with which the popular members seemed determined to prosecute the tonnage and poundage question, the king determined at least to postpone the discussion; and when the question was brought forward, sir John Finch, the speaker, rose and informed the house that the king had given him a command to adjourn it. This intelligence, instead of alarming the popular members, infuriated them. Sir John Finch was forcibly held in the speaker's chair, which he was in the act of vacating, by two members named Valentine and Hollis, and thus compelled to sanction by his presence a short resolution which condemned tonnage and poundage as being contrary to law, and all persons concerned in collecting those duties as guilty of high crimes, and denounced Arminians and papists as capital enemies to the state.

This scene of violence and passion on the part of the commons was followed by the king's committal to prison of sir Miles Hobart, sir Peter Hayman, the learned Selden, with Coriton, Strode, and Long, on charges of sedition. At this period Charles seems to have acted rather upon passionate and perplexed impulse than upon any settled and defined principle, even of a despotic character. He had scarcely sent these members to prison upon his own authority, when he set them free again without further punishment. To other members he was just as inconsistently severe. Hollis, Valentine, and sir John Elliot, were summoned before the court of king's bench to answer for their violent conduct in the house of commons. They pleaded, and it should seem quite reasonably, too, that the house of commons being a superior court to the king's bench, the latter could not take cognizance of an alleged offence committed in the former. The judges, however, treated this plea with contempt; the three persons above named were found guilty in default of appearance and condemned to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, to pay fines of from five hundred to a thousand pounds each, and to give security for their future conduct. The arbitrary severity of this sentence had a doubly ill effect; it exalted in the public mind men whose own rash anger would otherwise have been their most efficient opponent, and it added to the unpopularity of the king just at the precise moment when nothing but a cordial and friendly expression of public opinion was at all likely to have been effectually serviceable to him in his contest with the obstinate and envenomed party; men who denied him the means of performing those duties which the popular outcry had mainly contributed to impose upon him.

So entirely had Buckingham obtained the ascendancy over the mind of Charles, that the favourite's disgraceful failure in the Rochelle expedition, though it caused a loud and general indignation in the nation, did not seem to injure him with the king. Another expedition for the relief of Rochelle was determined upon, and the command was bestowed upon Buckingham. His brother-in-law, the earl of Denbigh, had failed in an attempt to raise the siege. Buckingham, naturally anxious to wipe off the disgrace of two failures, exerted himself to the utmost to make the new expedition under his own command a successful one. To this end, he went to Portsmouth and personally superintended the preparations. He was at this moment decidedly the most unpopular man in the kingdom; denounced on all hands as the betrayer and at the same time the tyrant of both king and country. The libels and declamations which were constantly circulated found a ready echo in the breast of one Felton, an Irish soldier of fortune. By nature gloomy, bigoted, and careless of his own life, this man had been rendered desperate by what appears to have been very unjust treatment. He had served bravely at St. Rhé, where his captain was killed, and Buckingham, whether in caprice or mere indolence, had refused to give lieutenant Felton the vacant step. This personal injury aggravated his hatred to the duke as a public enemy, and he determined to assassinate him. Having travelled to Portsmouth, this resolute and violent man contrived to approach the duke as he was giving some orders, and struck him with a knife over the shoulder of one of the surrounding officers. The duke had only strength enough to say, "the villain has killed me," when he fell dead upon the spot. In the confusion that ensued the assassin might easily have escaped, for the blow was so sudden that no one saw by whom it was struck. But the assassin's hat had fallen among the astounded spectators and was found to contain some of the strongest lines of a very violent remonstrance which the house of commons had voted against the duke's conduct; and while some persons were remarking that no doubt the villain must be near at hand, and would be recognized by the loss of his hat, Felton deliberately stepped forward and showed his crime. When questioned he positively denied that any one had instigated him to the murder of the duke. His conscience, he said, was his only adviser, nor could any man's advice cause him to act against his conscience; he looked upon the duke as a public enemy, and therefore had he slain him. He maintained the same constancy and self-complacency to the last, protesting even upon the scaffold that his conscience acquitted him of all blame. A melancholy instance of the extent to which men can shut their eyes to their own wickedness in their detestation of the real, or imputed, wickedness of others!

A.D. 1639.—Charles received the tidings of the assassination of his favourite and minister with a composure which led some persons to imagine that the duke's death was not wholly disagreeable to the too indulgent master over whom he had so long and so unreasonably exerted his influence. But this opinion greatly wronged Charles; he, as a man, wanted not sensibility, but he possessed to a remarkable extent the valuable power of controlling and concealing his feelings.

The first consequence of the cessation of the pernicious counsel and influence of Buckingham was the king's wise resolution to diminish his need of the aid of his unfriendly subjects, by concluding peace with the foreign foes against whom he had warred under so many disadvantages and with so little glory. Having thus freed himself from the heavy and constant drain of foreign warfare, the king selected sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards earl of Strafford, and Laud, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, to aid him in the task of regulating the internal affairs of his kingdom; a task which the king's own love of prerogative and the obstinate ill-humour and disaffection of the leading puritans rendered almost impracticable.

Unfortunately, Laud, who had great influence over the king, was by no means inclined to moderate the king's propensity to arbitrary rule. Tonnage and poundage were still levied on the king's sole authority; papists were still compounded with, as a regular means of aiding the king's revenue; and the custom-house officers were still encouraged and protected in the most arbitrary measures for the discovery and seizure of goods alleged to be liable to charge with the obnoxious and illegal duties. These errors of the king's government were seized upon by popular declaimers and the violence of libellers provoked the king and Laud to a most arbitrary extension of the always too extensive powers of the high commission court of star-chamber, the sentences of which upon all who were accused of opposing the government were truly iniquitous, and in precisely the same degree impolitic. This court, though really authorized by no law, inflicted both personal and pecuniary severities which to us who are accustomed to the regular and equitable administration of law cannot but be revolting. For instance, a barrister of Lincoln's inn, named Pyrrne, a man of considerable talent though of a factious and obstinate temper, was brought before this arbitrary court, charged with having attacked and abused the ceremonies of the church of England. Burton, a divine, and Bastwick, a physician, were at the same time charged with a similar offence; and these three gentlemen of liberal professions, for libels which now, if punished at all, would surely not cost their authors more than two months imprisonment, were condemned to be placed in the pillory, to have their ears cut off, and to pay, each, a fine of five thousand pounds to the king.

The impolicy of this and similar severe sentences was the greater, because there were but too many indications already of extensive and determined disaffection to the crown. Refused the really requisite pecuniary assistance by his parliament, the king continued to levy ship money, and against this tax an especial and determined opposition was raised; though it ought to be observed that it had often been levied in former reigns, not because of so reasonable a motive as the factious refusal of parliament to provide for the necessities of the state, but in sheer despotic preference on the part of sovereigns to act on their own will rather than on that of parliament. The puritans and the popular leaders in general, however, made no allowance for the king's really urgent and distressing situation.

Among the most determined opponents of the ship money was Mr. John Hampden, a gentleman of some landed property in the county of Buckingham. The moral character of this gentleman was, even by those whom his political conduct the most offended or injured, admitted to be excellent; but his very excellence as a private man served only to make him the more mischievous as a public leader. If instead of lending himself to the support of that bitter and gloomy party whose piety not seldom approached to an impious familiarity, and whose love of liberty degenerated into a licentiousness quite incompatible with good government, John Hampden had thrown the weight of his own high character into the scale against the insanity of genius as displayed by Vane, and the insanity of hate to all above them and contempt of all below them which was manifested by nineteen-twentieths of the puritan or republican party, how sternly, how justly, and how efficiently might he not have rebuked that sordid parliament which so fiercely and capriciously complained of the king's extortion, while actually compelling him to it by a long and obstinate parsimony as injurious to the people as it was insulting to the sovereign! But he took the opposite course. Being rated at twenty shillings for his Buckinghamshire estate; he refused payment, and caused the question between himself and the crown to be carried into the exchequer court. For twelve days the ablest lawyers in England argued this case before the whole of the judges, all of whom, with the exception of four, decided in favour of the king's claim.

Without entering into the intricacies of legal argumentation, we must briefly remark, that all the writers who have treated of this celebrated case appear to us to have bestowed very undeserved praise upon Hampden, and quite to have misunderstood or misrepresented the case as between the king and the people at large. Was it the king's duty to support the peace of the kingdom and the dignity of the crown? By so much as he might have fallen short of doing so, by so much would he have fallen short of the fulfilment of his coronation oath. But parliament, the power of which was comparatively recent and in itself to a very considerable extent a usurpation, denied him the necessary supplies. An odious and insolent tyranny, surely, to impose responsibility, yet deny the means of sustaining it! The king, then, was thus driven, insolently and most tyrannously driven, to the necessity of choosing between a crime and an irregularity; between perjury, violation of his coronation oath, and a direct levy of that money which he could not obtain through the indirect and constitutional means of parliament.

It is quite idle to dwell upon the irregularity of the king's mode of levying money without charging, primarily, that irregularity to the true cause, the shameful niggardliness of parliament. Then the question between Charles and the sturdy patriot Hampden becomes narrowed to this point; were the twenty shillings levied upon Hampden's property an unreasonable charge for the defence and security of that property? No one, we should imagine, will pretend to maintain that, and therefore the refusal of Hampden to pay the tax,—unaccompanied as that refusal was by a protest against the vile conduct of parliament,—smacked far more of the craftiness and factious spirit of his party, than of the sturdy and single-minded honesty which the generality of writers so markedly affect to attribute to the man.

We have dwelt the longer upon the pecuniary disputes between Charles and his narrow-minded parliament, because the real origin of all the subsequent disorders was the wanton refusal of the parliament to provide for the legitimate expenses of the state. Later in order of time the disputes became complicated, and in the course of events the parliament became better justified in opposition, and the king both less justified and less moderate; but even in looking at those sad passages in our history which tell us of royal insincerity and of Englishmen leagued under opposing banners, and upon their English soil spilling English blood, never let the reader forget that the first positive injustice, the first provocation, the first guilt, belonged to parliament, which practised tyranny and injustice while exclaiming aloud for liberty.

CHAPTER LI.

A.D. 1640.—THOUGH there was a most bitter spirit existing against the church of England, though the press teemed with puritan libels as vulgar and silly as they were malicious, Charles, a sincere friend to the church, most unhappily saw not the storm-cloud that hovered over him. Instead of concentrating his energies, his friends, and his pecuniary resources, to elude or smite down the gloomy and bitter puritans of England, and to awaken again the cheerful and loyal spirit of his English yeomanry, he most unwisely determined to introduce episcopacy into Scotland. An order was given for reading the liturgy in the principal church of Edinburgh, which so provoked the congregation, that the very women joined in an attack on the officiating minister, and the place of public worship was profaned by furious and disgusting imprecations. Long inured to actual warfare with England, and always jealous of a nation so much wealthier and more powerful than themselves, the Scotch gladly seized upon the attempt to introduce episcopacy among them as a pretext for having recourse to arms, and the whole of that disaffected and warlike population was instantly in a state of insurrection. Even now, could the king have been induced to perceive the real inveteracy and determination of the Scottish hatred of episcopacy, he might have escaped from this portion of his embarrassments with but little worse evil than some diminution of his cherished notion of the absolute supremacy of anointed sovereigns. A negotiation was resorted to; and a treaty of peace quickly succeeded a mere suspension of arms; each party agreeing to a disbandment of their forces. Unhappily, neither party was quite earnest in desiring peace; the king could not give up his long-cherished ideas of their absolute monarchy, and the rigid Scottish presbyterians were not a jot more inclined to yield up any portion of their entire freedom and self-government in matters of religion. The negotiations and treaties were in consequence marked by mutual insincerity; mutual charges of bad faith were made, and both Charles and his Scottish people speedily resumed their hostile attitude.

The dispute in which the king had thus needlessly and unwisely involved himself seriously increased his difficulties. Although he still continued to levy ship money and other arbitrary taxes, he was dreadfully distressed for money; and the disaffected of England saw, with scarcely dissimulated pleasure, that their cause was virtually being secured by the disaffected of Scotland. It was while the people were in this ominous temper that Charles, having exhausted all other means, even to forced loans from his nobility, was obliged to call a parliament and make one more appeal for pecuniary aid. But this parliament was even less than the former one inclined to aid the king. He had been reused aid for the ordinary expenses of the kingdom; he was still less likely to be fairly treated when he, in terms, demanded aid that he might quell and chastise the Scotch rebels whose principles were so near akin to those of the English puritans, who now were numerically powerful enough to constitute themselves the national purseholders. Instead of the aid he asked for, the king received nothing but remonstrance and rebuke, on the score of the means by which when formerly refused aid by parliament he had supplied himself. Finding the parliament quite impracticable, the king now dissolved it. But the mere dissolution of this arbitrary and unjust assembly could not diminish the king's necessities, and he soon called another parliament—that fatal one whose bitter and organised malignity pursued him to the death. The puritan party was preponderant in this parliament, and so systematic and serried were the exertions of those resolute and gloomy men, that they at once felt and indicated their confidence of success at the very commencement of the session. Instead of granting the supplies which the king demanded, they passed at once to the impeachment of the earl of Strafford, the faithful minister and the personal friend of the king. Strafford at a former period had to a certain moderate extent acted with the puritans; and they resented his opposition to their more insistent proceedings so deeply, that nothing but the unfortunate nobleman's blood could appease their malignity.

It was well known that Charles required no one to urge him to support the prerogative of the crown to its fullest legal extent, at least; and it was equally well known that Laud was of a far more arbitrary turn than Strafford, and had fully as much influence with the king. But Strafford, as we have said, had given deep offence to the puritans, and deep and deadly was their revenge. He was solemnly impeached of high treason before the peers. His defence was a perfect model of touching and yet manly eloquence. With a presence of mind not to be surpassed, he took up and refuted each accusation in the exact order in which it had been made; and he concluded by assuring the peers that he would not have troubled them so long, had he not felt the defence of his life to be a sacred duty towards his children. "pledges of a dear saint now in heaven." But neither the cogent logic of his defence, nor the unimpeachable excellence of his private character, could avail against the political fury of the time. He was pronounced guilty by both houses of parliament, and his death was clamoured for with an eagerness that reflects but little credit upon our national character at that period. There was but one thing that could have saved the earl of Strafford; and it is with pain that we record that that one thing was sadly absent—a just firmness of character on the part of the king.

On a fair and careful examination of the proceedings against Strafford, we can only discover one serious fault that was committed by that minister; he allowed his personal attachment to the king to induce him to incur ministerial responsibility for measures which, both as minister and private man, he greatly disapproved of. But this great fault was one bearing no proportion to the dread penalty of death; moreover, however faulty Strafford on this point was towards himself and the nation, he had committed no fault against the king. Contrariwise, he had given the utmost possible proof of personal and loyal feelings; and Charles, in abandoning a minister whose chief fault was that of being too faithful to his sovereign, acted a part so unchivalric, so totally unworthy of his general character, that we scarcely know how to speak of it in terms sufficiently severe. A truly futile apology has been attempted to be made for Charles's abandonment of his too devoted minister. That ill-fated nobleman, while confined in the Tower, heard of the clamour that was artfully and perseveringly kept up by his enemies, and in a moment of unwise exaltation he wrote to the king and advised him to comply with the sanguinary demand that was made. The advice was unwise, but, such as it was, it ought to have had the effect of only increasing the king's resolution to save such a man and such a minister from destruction. But Charles took the advice literally au pied de la lettre, and signed the warrant for the execution of, probably, after his queen, the most sincerely devoted friend that he possessed. "Put not your trust in princes" was the agonized commentary of Strafford upon this most shameful compliance of the king; and he submitted to his undeserved execution with the grave and equable dignity which had marked his whole course. From this unjust murder of the king's friend and minister, the parliament passed to a very righteous and wise attack upon two of the most iniquitous of the king's courts. The high commission court, and the court of star-chamber were unanimously abolished by act of parliament.

While the protestants of England were divided into churchmen and puritans, and while the latter were busily engaged in endeavouring to throw discredit upon the church, papacy saw in these disputes a new temptation for an attack upon protestantism as a whole. The king's finances were well known to be in such a state as must necessarily prevent him from any thing like vigour in military operations; and the papists of Ireland, aided and instigated by foreign emissaries, resolved upon a general massacre of their protestant fellow-subjects. A simultaneous attack was made upon these latter; no distinction was made of age or of sex; neighbour rose upon neighbour, all old obligations of kindness were forgotten, all old animosities, how trifling soever their origin, were terribly remembered, and upwards of forty thousand persons were inhumanly slaughtered. The king made every exertion to suppress and punish this infamous massacre and, feeling that the chief obstacle to his success lay in his crippled finances, he once more appealed to his English parliament for a supply. But not even the massacre of their protestant fellow-subjects could alter the factious temper of the puritans; they not only refused the aid he asked, upon the absurd plea that England was itself in too much danger to spare any aid to Ireland, but even added insult to injustice by insinuating that the king had himself fomented the disturbances in Ireland. As though the unfortunate monarch had not already too numerous claims on his impoverished finances!

A.D. 1641.—The attachment of the king to the church was well known, and both he and his opponents well knew that on the support and affection of the church rested the chief hope of preserving the monarchy. The puritan party, therefore, determined to attack the monarchy through the church, and thirteen bishops were accused of high treason, in having enacted canons for church government without the authority or consent of the parliament. The opposition, or, as they are commonly called, "the popular members," at the same time applied to the peers to exclude the prelates from speaking and voting in that house; and the bishops, with more discretion than dignity, deprecated the puritan animosity by ceasing to attend their duty in the house of lords. The king was thus, at the very moment when he most required aid in parliament, deprived of the talents and the votes of precisely those peers of parliament upon whose assiduity and devotion he had the most dependence.

Posthumous blame is both cheap and easy. The writer, sitting calmly in his closet, can easily and safely point out the errors of the great men of a bygone age; it is a nobler and more necessary task to ascertain and hold up to view the circumstances that rendered those errors excusable, at least, if not actually inevitable. Goaded, insulted, and straitened as Charles was, he would have possessed something more than human firmness if he had not at length deviated into rashness. His most devoted friend slain, the prelates of his church silenced, and himself made a mere cipher, except as to the continuance of a vast and fearful responsibility, he resolved to try the effect of severity; and he gave orders to the attorney-general, Herbert, to accuse before the house of peers, lord Kimbolton, together with the prominent commoners Hollis, Hampden, Pym, Strode, and sir Arthur Haslerig, of high treason in having endeavoured to subvert the laws and government of the kingdom, to deprive the king of his regal power, and to substitute for it an arbitrary and tyrannical authority, injurious to the king and oppressive to his liege subjects. Thus far we are by no means unprepared to approve of the king's proceedings; for surely the conduct of the accused persons had been marked by all the tendency attributed to it in the terms of the accusation! But, unfortunately, Charles, instead of allowing the proceedings to go forward with the grave and deliberate earnestness of a great judicial matter, was so wilful or so ill advised as to take a personal step which, had it been successful, would have exposed him to the imputation of a most unconstitutional tyranny, and which, in being unsuccessful, exposed him to that ridicule and contempt which, injurious to any man under any circumstances, could be nothing less than fatal to a king who was in dispute with a majority of his people, and who had already seen no small portion of them in actual battle array against his authority.

On the very day after the attorney-general had commenced justifiable proceedings against the factious leaders whose names are given above, the king entered the house of commons, without previous notice and without attendance. On his majesty's first appearance, the members to a man respectfully stood up to receive him, and Lenthall the speaker vacated his chair. His majesty seated himself, and, after looking sternly round for some moments, said, that understanding that the house had refused or neglected to give up five of its members whom he had ordered to be accused of high treason, he had personally come there to seize them, a proceeding to which he was sorry to be compelled. Perceiving that the accused were not present, he called upon the speaker to deliver them up; when that officer, with great presence of mind and justice, replied that he was the mere organ and servant of that house, and that he had neither eyes to see, nor ears to hear, nor lips to utter, save what that house commanded. Finding that he could in no other respect gain by a procedure in which he was so great a loser in dignity, his majesty, after sitting silent for some moments longer, departed from the house. He now proceeded to the common-council of the city, and made his complaint of the conduct of the house of commons. On his road he was saluted by cries of "privilege," not unmixed with still more insulting cries from many of the lower sort, and his complaint to the common council was listened to in a contemptuous and ominous silence. Irritated and alarmed at this new proof of the unpopularity of his proceedings, he departed from the court, and as he did so was saluted by some low puritan with the seditious watchword of the Jews of old—"To your tents, O Israel!"

It is utterly inconceivable how a sovereign possessed of Charles's good sense, and aware, as from many recent occurrences he needs must have been, of the resolved and factious nature of the men to whom he was opposed, could have compromised himself by so rash and in every way unadvisable a proceeding as that which we have described. In truth, he had scarcely returned to the comparative solitude of Windsor before he himself saw how prejudicial this affair was likely to be to his interests, and he hastened to address a letter to parliament, in which he said that his own life and crown were not more precious to him than the privileges of parliament. This virtual apology for his direct and personal interference with those privileges was rendered necessary by his previous precipitancy, but this ill-fated monarch now ran into another extreme. Having offended parliament, his apology to parliament was necessary, nay, in the truest sense of the word, it was dignified; for a persistence in error is but a false dignity, whether in monarch or in private man. But here his concession should have stopped. His offence was one against good manners, but the offence with which Pym and the members were charged was one of substance, not of form. Their offence was not in the slightest degree diminished or atoned for by the king's folly; yet, as though there had been some close logical connection between them, he now informed the house that he should not farther prosecute his proceedings against its accused members! Could in consequence or want of dignity go farther, or be more fatally shown? If, while apologising to the house for his unquestionable offence against its privileges, he still had calmly and with dignity, but sternly and inexorably, carried on his proceedings against the accused members, it is quite within the pale of probability that he would have saved himself from an untimely end, and his country from the stigma of a most barbarous murder. The opposite conduct, though in no wise efficient in softening the stern hearts of his enemies, taught them the fatally important truth that their king knew how to yield, and that if unwisely rash in a moment of irritation, he could be no less unwisely abject in a moment of calculation or timidity. It was a fatal lesson; and from this moment, in spite of any seeming and temporary advantages, Charles of England was virtually a dethroned monarch and a doomed man.

There was a deep art, beyond what was at first apparent, in the insolent insinuation of the popular declaimers that the king had himself fomented the recent horrors in Ireland. The awful massacre among the protestants of that country had naturally raised a new horror and dread of papacy in the minds of the protestants of England. The artful popular leaders took advantage of this very natural feeling, and worked upon it as might promise best to aid their own ambitious and blood-thirsty views. The ignorant and the timid were taught to believe that the massacre of protestants, though the deed of bigoted papists, was far enough from being disagreeable to the king and his friends, who would not improbably cause similar proceedings in England unless due power and means of prevention were timely placed in the hands of parliament, which was constantly represented as an integer that necessarily loved and watched over the people, instead of what it really was, an aggregate composed of various dispositions and rates of talent, having but one common bond of union, a hatred of all authority save that of the aggregate in question, and having a deference for no opinion save that of each individual member of that aggregate. Treated as Charles had been almost from the first day of his reign, it must be clear to the most superficial observer, that nothing but his fortresses and his troops remained to him of the substance of monarchy. The parliament now determined to deprive him of these. They had seen that he could yield, they calculated upon a passionate resistance to their first exorbitancy and insolence of demand; but they doubted not that the vacillation of the king's mind would begin long ere the resolute obstinacy of their own would terminate. The result but too well proved the accuracy of their reasoning. The people were skilfully worked up into an ecstasy of horror of the designs and power of the papists, and thus urged to petition that the Tower, the fortresses of Hull and Portsmouth, and the fleet, should be committed to the hands of officers in the confidence of parliament. Demands so indicative of suspicion, so insultingly saying that the king would place such important trusts in hands unfit to use them, were, as the opposition had anticipated, warmly resented at first, and then, unwisely complied with.

Emboldened by this new concession, the popular party affected new and increased fears of the designs of the Irish papists, and demanded that a new militia should be raised and trained, the commanders as well as the merely subaltern officers of which should be nominated by parliament. Charles now, when too late, perceived that even to concede safely requires judgment; and being urged to give up the command of the army for a limited space of time, he promptly replied, "No! not even for a single hour!" Happy for himself and his kingdom had it been if he had earlier known how to say "No," and to abide by it not only with firmness but also with temper.

A.D. 1642.—In making this demand parliament had completely thrown off the mask; and as the very extremity to which the king was driven supplied him in this one case with the firmness which in general and by his natural temper, he so sadly wanted, it at once became evident that the disputes between the king and his loyal subjects on the one side, and the puritans and their only too numerous and enthusiastic dupes on the other, could only be decided by that saddest of all means, a civil war. On either side appeals to the people were printed and circulated in vast numbers, and, as usual in such cases, each side exaggerated the faults of the other, and was profoundly silent as to its own faults, whether as to past conduct or present views. The king's friends, being for the most part of the more opulent ranks, assumed the title of the cavaliers, while the puritan, or rebel party, from their affected habit of wearing their hair closely cut, were called roundheads, and in a short time the majority of the nation ranked under the one or the other appellation, and every thing portended that the civil strife would be long, fierce, and sanguinary.

In addition to the train-bands assembled under the command of sir John Digby, the king had barely three hundred infantry and eight hundred cavalry, and he was by no means well provided with arms. But, in spite of all the exertions of the puritans, there was still an extensive feeling of loyalty among the higher and middle orders; and as the king with his little army marched slowly to Derby, and thence to Shrewsbury, large additions were made to his force, and some of the more opulent loyalists afforded him liberal and most welcome aid in money, arms, and ammunition.

On the side of the parliament similar preparations were made, for the impending struggle. When the important fortress of Hull was surrendered into their hands, they made it their depot for arms and ammunition, and it was held for them by a governor of their own appointment, sir John Hotham. On the plea of defending England from the alleged designs of the Irish papists, great numbers of troops had been raised; and these were now openly enlisted and officered for the parliament, and placed under the command of the earl of Essex, who, however, was supposed to be anxious rather to abridge the power of the existing monarch than actually to annihilate the monarchy, which, doubtless, had from the very first, been the design of the leaders of the popular party. So great was the enthusiasm of the roundheads, that they in one day enlisted above four thousand men in London alone.

Tired of the occupation of watching each others' manoeuvres, the hostile troops at length met at Edge-hill, on the borders of the counties of Warwick and Stafford. A furious engagement took place, which lasted several hours; upwards of five thousand men fell upon the field, and the contending armies separated, wearied with slaying yet not satiated with slaughter, and each claiming the victory.

The whole kingdom was now disturbed by the incessant marching and counter-marching of the two armies. Neither of them was disciplined, and the disorders caused by their march were consequently great and destructive. The queen, whose spirit was as high as her affection for her husband was great, most opportunely landed from Holland with a large quantity of ammunition and a considerable reinforcement of men, and she immediately left England again to raise farther supplies. In the manoeuvring and skirmishes which were constantly going on, the king, from the superior rank and spirit of his followers, had for some time a very marked advantage; but the parliamentarians, so far from being discouraged, actually seemed to increase in their pretensions in proportion to the loss and disgrace they experienced in the field. That the king was at this time sincere in his expressed desire to put a stop to the outpouring of his subjects' blood appears clear from the fact, that on obtaining any advantage he invariably sent pacific proposals to the parliament. This was especially the case when he lay in all security in the loyal city of Oxford, whence he conducted a long negotiation, in which the insolence of the leaders of the other party was so great and conspicuous, that even the most moderate writers have blamed the king, as having carried his desire for pacific measures to an extreme, injurious alike to his dignity and to the very cause he was anxious to serve.

But if he bore somewhat too meekly with the insolence of his opponents in the cabinet, the king in his first campaign of the disastrous civil war was abundantly successful in the field, in spite of the savage severity of his opponents, who treated as traitors the governors of those strong places which from time to time were opened to their sovereignty.

Cornwall was thoroughly subjected to the king; at Stratton-hill, in Devonshire, a fine army of the parliamentarians was routed; and at Roundway-down, near Devizes, in Wiltshire, another great victory was gained over them by the royal troops, who were again successful in the still more important battle of Chalgrove-field, in Buckinghamshire. The important city of Bristol was taken by the royalists, and Gloucester was closely invested. Thus far all looked in favour of the royal cause during the first campaign, and at its close great hopes of still farther success were founded upon the fine army that was raised for the king in the north of England by the loyal and high-hearted marquis of Newcastle. Nor was it the loss only of battles and strongholds that the parliamentarians had now to deplore.

John Hampden, who had made so sturdy, although, in our opinion, so ill-founded an opposition to the ship-money, while acting with the perverse men whose conduct made that undoubted extortion inevitable, took the field with the parliamentarians at the head of a well appointed troop which chiefly consisted of his own tenants and neighbours. On several occasions he displayed great courage, and it being proposed to beat up the quarters of the king's gallant relative, prince Rupert, Hampden was foremost in the attack. When the parliamentary troops were subsequently mustered Mr. Hampden was missed, and it was then remarked that he had been seen, contrary to his usual custom, to leave the field before the fight was ended, and it was noticed, too, that he was leaning forward on his saddle-bow as if exhausted and in pain. The fears thus excited were soon realised; he had been severely wounded. The king would have sent his own surgeon to endeavour to save this inflexibly honest though mistaken foe; but the ill-fated gentleman was hurt beyond human remedy, and died soon after the action.

This loss on the parliamentary side was even more than balanced by the death of the royalist officer, Lucius Cary, lord Falkland, one of the finest and purest charac-

here that grace our national history. As a statesman he had opposed the errors of the king with all the boldness and inflexibility of Hampden, but with a grace and moderation of which Hampden's stern and severe nature was incapable. But though lord Falkland ardently desired liberty for the subject, he was not prepared to oppress the sovereign; and the moment that the evil designs of the popular leaders were fully developed, the gallant and accomplished nobleman took his stand beside his royal master. Learned, witty, elegant, and accomplished, he was indignant and disgusted at the evident desire of the popular leaders to deluge their country in blood, rather than stop short of the full accomplishment of their ambitious and evil designs. From the commencement of the civil war he became possessed by a deep and settled melancholy, the more remarkable from contrast with his native vivacity. He neglected his person, his countenance became anxious and haggard, and he would remain in silent thought for hours, and then cry, as if unconsciously, "Peace, peace! let our unhappy country have peace!" On the morning of the battle of Newbury he told his friends that his soul was weary of the world, and that he felt confident that ere nightfall he should leave them. His sad prediction was accomplished; he was mortally wounded by a musket ball in the belly, and it was not until the following morning that his mourning friends rescued his body from amidst a heap of the meaner slain.

This first campaign being ended, the king made vigorous preparations for a second. As it was evident that the very name of a parliament had a great influence upon the minds of the many, and as all negotiation with the old parliament sitting at Westminster led only to new insult, the king wisely determined to call another parliament at Oxford, where he had his quarters. The peers being for the most part firmly loyal, the king's upper house was well filled, but his lower house had not more than a hundred and forty members, being scarcely half the number that was mustered by the rebellious house of commons. But the king's members were mostly men of wealth and influence, and thus they had it in their power to do the king the chief service that he really required, that of voting him supplies. Having done this they were dismissed with thanks, and never again called together.

But any supplies which the king could procure from what may almost be called individual loyalty were but small in comparison to those which the factious parliamentarians could command by the terror which they could strike into nearly every district of the country. As if to show at once their power in this way, and the extent to which they were prepared to abuse it, they issued an arbitrary command that all the inhabitants of London and the surrounding neighbourhood should subtract one meal in every week from their accustomed diet, and pay the full price of the provision thus saved as a contribution to the support of what these impudent and ambitious men affected to call the public cause. The seditious Scots at the same time sent a large supply of men to the parliamentarians, who also had fourteen thousand men, under the earl of Manchester, ten thousand under the earl of Essex, and eight thousand and upwards under sir William Waller. And though this force was numerically so much superior to the king's, and, by consequence, so much more onerous, the parliamentary troops were, in fact, far better supplied with both provision and ammunition than the royalists; the majority of men being so deluded or so terrified by the parliamentarians that an ordinance of parliament was at all times sufficient to procure provisions for the rebel force, when the king could scarcely get provisions for money.

A. D. 1644.—Though, in the ordinary style used in speaking of military affairs we have been obliged to speak of the termination of the first campaign, at the period when the contending parties went into winter quarters, hostilities, in fact, never wholly ceased from the moment when they first commenced. Even when the great armies were formally lying idle, a constant and most destructive partizan warfare was carried on. The village green became a battle field, the village church a fort; now this, now that party plundered the peasantry, who in their hearts learned to curse the fierceness of both, and to pray that one or other might be so effectually beaten as might put a stop at once and for ever to scenes which had all the ghastly horrors of war without any of its glory, and all its present riot and spoliation without even the chance of its subsequent gain. Whether cavalier or roundhead were triumphant the peaceable denizen was equally sufferer; and when the war cry and the blasphemy rang through the village street, and re-echoed through the trees that waved above the graves of long generations of the former occupants of the village, what mattered it whether cavalier cheered or roundhead prostituted the words of the book of life—were they not English accents that issued from the passion-curl'd lips of both parties?

That the system of terrorism which the parliamentarians acted upon had very much to do with prolonging this unnatural contest seems indisputable. Counties, and lesser districts, even, as soon as they were for a brief time freed from the presence of the parliamentary forces, almost invariably and unanimously declared for the king. Nay, in the very towns that were garrisoned by the parliamentarians, including even their stronghold and chief reliance, London, there was at length a loud and general echo of the earnest cry of the good lord Falkland, "Peace, peace! let our country have peace!" From many places the parliament received formal petitions to this effect; and in London, which at the outset had been so furiously seditious, the very women assembled to the number of upwards of four thousand, and surrounded the house of commons, exclaiming, "Peace! give us peace; or those traitors who deny us peace, that we may tear them to pieces." So furious were the women on this occasion, that, in the violence used by the guards, some of these wives and mothers who wished their husbands and sons no longer to be the prey of a handful of ambitious men were actually killed upon the spot!

But they who had so joyously aided in sowing the whirlwind were not yet to cease to reap the storm. War, to the utter destruction of the altar and the throne, was the design of the self-elected and resolved rulers, and it was in vain that their lately enthusiastic dupes now cried aloud and in bitter misery for the blessings of peace.

Before we proceed to speak of the second campaign of this sad war, we must introduce to the attention of the reader a man who henceforth fixed the chief attention of both parties, and whose character, even in the present day, is nearly as much disputed as his singular energy and still more singular and rapid success were marvelled at in his own time.

Oliver Cromwell was the son of a Huntingdonshire gentleman who, as a second son of a respectable but not wealthy family, was himself possessed of but a small fortune, which he is said to have improved by engaging in the trade of a brewer. At college, and even later in life, Oliver Cromwell was remarkable rather for dissipation than for ability, and the very small resources that he inherited were pretty nearly exhausted by his excesses, long before he had any inclination or opportunity to take part in public affairs. On reaching mature manhood, however, he suddenly changed his course of life, and affected the enthusiastic speech and rigid conduct of the puritans, whose daily increasing power and consequence his shrewd glance was not slow to discover.

Just as the disputes between the king and the popular party grew warm, Oliver Cromwell represented in parliament his native town of Huntingdon, and a sketch left of him by a keen observer who saw his earliest exertions in that capacity, represents a man from whom we should but little expect the energy, talent, and success of the future "Parvulus" Cromwell. Homely in countenance, almost to actual ugliness, hesitating in speech, ungainly in gesture, and ill clad in a sad coloured suit which looked as it had been made by some ill country tailor, the future statesman and warrior addressed the house amidst the scarcely suppressed whispers of both friends and foes, who little dreamed that in that uncouth, ill nurtured, and slovenly looking person they saw the vast and terrible genius who was to slay his sovereign, knead all the fierce factions of Englishmen into one trampled and submissive mass, and, while wielding a most usurped and lawless authority over the English nation at home, so direct her energies abroad as to make her name stand fully as high among the astounded and gazing nations as ever it had been carried or maintained by the most fortunate and valiant of the lawful sovereigns of England.

As a mere senator Cromwell would probably never have succeeded in making himself a great name; he required to command rather than to advise, to act rather than to argue. Gifted with an iron frame, the body and the mind, with him, aided each other, and he who stammered out confused no-meanings to the half wearied and half wondering senate, thought clearly and brightly as the lightning flash, and shouted his vigorous conceptions with the dread vehemence of thunder, amid the fury and the clang of the battle, and as he guided his war-steed through carnage towards carnage more terrible still.

It is to this day a moot point whether Cromwell was wholly deluded or wholly a deluder; or whether he was partly the one and partly the other. To us it seems that there was nothing natural in his character, as developed by history, save his mental and bodily energy, his profound sagacity, his decision and his master-passion—ambition. He saw, no doubt, poor men become rich, and mean men powerful, as riches and power are estimated in the petty affairs of obscure country towns, and he saw that they achieved their personal aggrandizement by a supple compliance with the cant and grimace of the day. He had suffered both in reputation and fortune by his free if not prodigal life, and it is probable that he at the outset adopted the outward appearance of another way of thinking, with no deeper or more extensive design than that of saving himself from the inevitable ill consequences of poverty. Once arrived in parliament, whether conducted thither by mere accident or by skilful intriguing, a single glance must have shown even a far less sagacious person than he was, that the puritans would, sooner or later, be incomparably the most powerful party in the state. Joining with them from interest, aping their manners from necessity, he would from mere habit continue to ape them long after he could afford to be more open in his conduct. But the frequent profanity of his remarks, and the occasional coarseness and jollity of his "horse-play" among his soldier-saints, appear to us to smack very much of unconscious and uncontrollable breakings forth of the old Adam of the natural man; fever fits of the natural heart and temper that were too strong for the artificial training of resolved hypocrisy. Such, upon repeated and most impartial examination, appears to us to have been the real character of Cromwell.

Though forty-four years old before he drew a sword, Cromwell at the very outset of the rebellion showed himself what has been emphatically called a horn soldier. Stalwart though clumsy in frame, a bold and a good rider, and—as most men of any respectability at that time were—a perfect master of the ponderous sword then in use, he was the very man for a partisan captain of heavy cavalry. His troop was almost entirely composed of the sons of respectable farmers and yeomen, and as they were deeply tinctured with the religious feeling of puritanism, and filled to overflowing with the physical daring of well-born and well-nurtured Englishmen, his assumed sympathy with them in the former respect and his genuine equality or superiority in the latter, shortly gave him the most unbounded power of leading them into any danger that human beings could create, and through or over any obstacles that human prowess and daring could surmount.

Indefatigable, active, patient of fatigue, Cromwell speedily attracted the notice of the parliamentary leaders, who bestowed praise and distinction upon him none the less cheerfully because as yet he did not affect to aim at any thing higher than the character of a bold, stern, and active partisan captain, who was ever ready with sword in hand and foot in stirrup when the enemy's night quarters were to be beaten up, a convoy seized, or any other real though comparatively obscure service was to be rendered to the good cause. Such was the estimate Cromwell's commanders formed of him; such the estimate he wished them to form, of the man who was one day to dictate to the proudest and to laugh to scorn the wildest among them!

The two famous and disastrous battle of Long Marston Moor, as it was the first great military calamity of the king, so it was the first great occasion upon which Cromwell had the opportunity (which he so well knew how to seize) of openly and signally displaying himself. A junction had been formed between the Scotch army and the English parliamentary forces, and this combined host invested York. This city, both from its own wealth and from its situation as the capital of the northern counties, was too important to the royal cause to be lost without a struggle; and prince Rupert and the marquis of Newcastle joined their forces in order to raise the siege of the ancient city. The opposing forces, in number about fifty-thousand, met on Long Marston Moor, and a long and obstinate contest ensued. The right wing of the royalist troops, commanded by prince Rupert, was broken and driven off the field by the highly trained cavalry under the command of Cromwell, who after having dispersed the royalists' right wing, promptly galloped back to the field, and very materially aided in putting to flight the main body of the royalists under the marquis. The result of this hard day's fighting was the capture by the parliamentarians of the whole of Rupert's admirable train of artillery, and a loss of men, reputation, and self confidence, from which it may safely be averred that the royalists never recovered.

The successes of the parliamentarians made them all the haughtier in their pretensions and all the more unsparing in their resolves. Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, had for a long time been confined in the Tower; his devotion to his master being the only crime with which he could be justly charged, except the kindred crime of still warmer devotion, if possible, to the rights and the supremacy of the church of England. This eminent man was therefore brought to trial by his bitter enemies the puritans, condemned, and executed. As if to set a peculiar and characteristically puritanical mark upon this dastardly act of vulgar and ignorant vengeance, the now dominant power ordered the abolition—by what they called law—of the church of England liturgy on the very day of the execution of the learned and energetic prelate whose devotion to his duty was indomitable. By this act of abolition the English church was reduced, as regarded power in the state, to the same level as the newest, meanest, and most insane of numerous petty sects into which conceit, or ignorance, or sheer knavery had by this time split the puritans; and the Scotch rebel army appropriately enough joined the London rebel citizens in giving public thanks for an alteration of which not one of them could have pointed out a substantial advantage, while its instant and perspective disadvantage might have been perceived by a tolerably educated child. But faction loves a change—even though it certainly be not for the better, and probably may prove to be for the worse!

A.D. 1645.—Though the royalists, as related above, were seriously injured and depressed by the result of the battle of Long Marston Moor, neither the king nor his friends despaired of ultimate success. While the parliamentarians exerted themselves to crush the royalists whenever the next general action should ensue, the king and his friends made equally strenuous efforts to redeem their fortune and character on the like contingency. A variety of counter-marching and mere partisan skirmishing took place during the earlier months of the year 1645, and at length, on June the 14th of that year, the main strength of the two parties met near Naseby, a village in Northamptonshire. The right wing of the royal army was commanded by the gallant and impetuous Rupert, the left wing by sir Marmaduke Langdale, and the main body by the lord Astley, while a choice force was commanded, as a reserve, by the king in person. The left wing of the parliamentarians was commanded by Ireton, who had married Cromwell's daughter, the right wing by Cromwell himself, whose gallant and skilful charges at Long Marston Moor were not forgotten, and the main body by generals Fairfax and Skippon. The parliamentary left wing was so hotly charged by the impetuous and dashing Rupert, that it was fairly broken and driven through the street of Naseby. But this success was rendered of comparatively little advantage, for Rupert lost so much time in attempting to seize Ireton's artillery, that Cromwell, meanwhile, broke the royal horse under sir Marmaduke

Langdale, beyond all the efforts of that officer for its re-formation. While the cavalry on either side was thus occupied, the infantry was hotly engaged, and so much to the advantage of the royal side that the battalions of the parliament were actually falling back in disorder. The whole fate of the day now mainly depended upon which side should first see its cavalry return. If Rupert, instead of employing himself in seizing or spiking artillery, had at this time returned and made one of his fearfully impetuous charges upon the flank of the faltering roundheads, whom the best efforts of Fairfax and Skippon could scarcely keep from falling into utter rout, the fortune of that day, and most probably the issue of the whole struggle, would have been in the favour of the king. But the marvellous good fortune of Cromwell attended him; he returned to the field with his iron troops elated with their success over sir Marmaduke Langdale's division, and charged the flank of the main body of the royalists so fiercely as to throw them into hopeless and irremediable confusion. Rupert now returned with his cavalry and joined the king's reserve; but the fate of the day was sealed; not even the gallantry of that able commander could lead the reserve to the support of the beaten and fugitive host of the royalists; and the king was obliged to fly from the field, leaving his artillery and valuable baggage, as well as five thousand prisoners, in the hands of the victorious parliamentarians.

Nor did the advantages to the victor end even there. The defeat of the king and the magnitude of the losses he had sustained greatly aided the parliamentarians in reducing the chief of the fortified places in the kingdom. Bristol, Bridgewater, Chester, Sherborne, and Bath fell into their hands; Exeter was closely invested by Fairfax, and held out gallantly, but at length was obliged to surrender at discretion, all the western counties being so completely cleared of the king's troops that there was not the slightest chance of its being relieved.

In all the aspects of his fortune Charles had found the city of Oxford loyal and devoted. As well became that city of science and learning, it had constantly showed itself "glad in his prosperity and sad in his sorrow," and thither he retreated in his present misfortune, well knowing that there he would be loyally received, and hoping that even yet he might by negotiation retrieve some of the loss he had experienced in the field. But the unfortunate king was closely pursued by Fairfax, at the head of a victorious army eager for yet farther triumph over the defeated sovereign; and as the parliamentarians loudly expressed their intention of laying siege to Oxford, and were abundantly supplied with every thing requisite for that purpose, Charles had several, and very cogent, reasons for not abiding there. That the loyal inhabitants of Oxford would defend him to the utmost, Charles had no room to doubt; but neither could there be any doubt that the well known loyalty of the city would, on that very score, be most signally punished by the parliamentarians. Moreover, Charles had a most justifiable and well-grounded horror of falling into the hands of the English puritans, from whom, especially now that they were full and freshly flushed with victory, he might fear every insult, even to the extent of personal violence. Reasoning thus, and believing that the Scotch army was less personally and inveterately hostile to him, Charles took what proved to be the fatal resolution of delivering himself into the hands of the Scots. To their eternal disgrace, they received him as a distressed king only to treat him as a malefactor and a prisoner. They worried and insulted him, with sanctimonious remonstrances and reflections, by every possible neglect of the respectful ceremonials due to a sovereign; they reminded him of and embittered his misfortunes; and, to complete the infamy of their conduct, they added gross venality to faithlessness and disloyalty, and literally sold him to the rebellious English parliament for the sum of two hundred thousand pounds!

With this atrocious act of the Scots, who returned to their country laden with ill-earned wealth, but laden also with the execration of all good men and with the contempt even of those bold bad men to whom they had basely sold the unfortunate prince, the civil war may be said to have ended. Wholly and helplessly in the power of his foes, Charles had no course left to so honourable a mind as his, but to abolve his still faithful followers and subjects from the duty of farther striving in his behalf, and to trust for the safety of even his life to the mercy of men.

"Whose mercy was a nickname for the rage
Of tameless tigers hungering for blood."

But if the rebellious parliamentarians were triumphant over their king, they had yet to deal with a more formidable enemy. The parliament had been made unanimous in itself and with the army by the obvious and pressing necessity for mutual defence, as long as the king was in the field and at the head of an imposing force. But now that the fortune of war and the base venality of the Scotch had made Charles a powerless and almost hopeless captive, the spoilers began to quarrel about the disposition of the spoil; and they who had united to revolt from their lawful monarch were ready with equal eagerness and animosity to cabal against each other. There is a sure retributive curse attendant upon all needless and groundless dissent; its destitution of a real and an abiding bond of union. The civilians of the parliamentary party were, for the most part, presbyterians, who were eager enough to throw off all allegiance to the king and all submission and respect to the church of England, but who were not the less inclined to set up and exact respect both from lay and clerical authorirites of their own liking. The fanaticism of the army took quite another turn; they were mostly independents, who thought, with Dogberry, that "reading and writing come by nature," and were ready to die upon the truth of the most ignorant trooper among them being qualified to preach with soul saving effect to his equally ignorant fellow. The independents, armed and well skilled in arms, would under any conceivable circumstance have been something more than a match for the mere dreamers and declaimers of parliament; but they had a still further and decisive advantage in the active and energetic, though wily and secret, prompting and direction of Cromwell, who artfully professed himself the most staunch independent of them all, and showed himself as willing to lead them at their devotions in their quarters, as he had shown himself willing and able, too, to lead them to the charge and the victory upon the well fought field. He was, in appearance, indeed, only second in command under Fairfax, but, in reality, he was supreme over his nominal commander, and had the fate of both king and kingdom completely in his own hands. He artfully and carefully fomented the jealousy with which the military looked upon the parliament, and the discontent with which they looked upon their own comparative powerlessness and obscurity after all the dangers and toils by which they had, as they affected to believe, permanently secured the peace and comfort of the country.

Without appearing to make any exertion or to use any influence, the artful intriguer urged the soldiery so far, that they openly lost all confidence in the parliament for which they had but too well fought, and set about the consideration and redress of their own grievances as a separate and ill-used body of the community. Still, at the instigation of Cromwell, a rude but efficient military parliament was formed, the principal officers acting as a house of peers, and two men or officers from each regiment acting as a house of commons, under the title of the "agitators of the army." Of these Cromwell took care to be one, and thus, while to all appearance he was only acting as he was authorised and commanded by his duty to the whole army, he in fact enjoyed all the opportunity that he required to suggest and forward measures indispensable to the gratification of his own ambition.

While Cromwell was thus wickedly but ably scheming, the king, forlorn and seemingly forgotten, lay in Holmby castle; strictly watched, though as yet, owing to the dissensions that existed between the army and the parliament, not subjected to any farther indignities. From this state of comparative tranquillity the unhappy Charles was aroused by a coup de main highly characteristic alike of the boldness and the shrewdness of Cromwell. He demonstrated to his confidants of the army that the possession of the king's person must needs give a vast preponderance to any of the existing parties. The royalists, it was obvious, would at the order of the king rally round him, even in conjunction with the parliament, which by forming such a junction could at any moment command the pardon of the king; when the army, besides other difficulties, would be placed in the disadvantageous position of fighting against all branches of the government, including even that one to whose will and authority it owed its own existence. As usual, his arguments were successful; and cornet Joyce, who at the breaking out of the rebellion had been only a tailor, was dispatched with five hundred cavalry to seize the king's person at Holmby castle. Though strictly watched, the king was but slenderly guarded, for the parliament had no suspicion of the probability of any such attempt on the part of the army. Cornet Joyce, therefore, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the king, to whom he made known the purport of his mission. Surprised at this sudden determination to remove him to the head quarters of the army, the king, with some anxiety, asked Joyce to produce his commission for so extraordinary a proceeding; and Joyce, with the petulance of a man suddenly and unexpectedly elevated, pointed to his troops, drawn up before the window. "A goodly commission," replied Charles, "and written in fair characters;" and he accompanied Joyce to Triplo-heath near Cambridge, the head-quarters of the army. Fairfax and other discerning and moderate men had by this time begun to see the danger the country was in from the utter abasement of the kingly power, and to wish for such an accommodation as might secure the people without destroying the king. But Cromwell's bold seizure of his majesty had enabled him to throw off the mask; the violent and fanatical spirit of the soldiery was wholly subjected to his use, and on his arrival at Triplo-heath, on the day after the king was taken thither by Joyce, Cromwell was by acclamation elected to the supreme command of the army.

Though, at the outset, the parliament was wholly opposed to the exorbitant pretensions of the army, the success of Cromwell's machinations rendered that opposition less unanimous and compact every day, and at length there was a considerable majority of parliament, including the two speakers, in favour of the army. To encourage this portion of the parliament, the head-quarters of the army were fixed at Hounslow-heath; and as the debates in the house daily grew more violent and threatening, sixty-two members, with the two speakers, fled to the camp at Hounslow, and formally threw themselves, officially and personally, upon the protection of the army. This accession to his moral force was so welcome to Cromwell, that he caused the members to be received with a perfect tumult of applause; and he ordered that the troops, twenty thousand in number, should move upon London to restore these fugitives to the place which they had voluntarily ceded and the duties they had timorously fled from.

While the one portion of the house had fled to the protection of the soldiers, the other portion had made some demonstrations of bringing the struggle against the pretensions of the army to an issue in the field. New speakers were chosen in the place of the fugitives, orders were given to enlist new troops, and the train-bands were ordered to the defence of the lines that enclosed the city. But when Cromwell with twenty thousand trained and unsparing troops arrived, the impossibility of any hastily organized defence being available against him became painfully evident. The gates were thrown open, Cromwell restored the speakers and the members of parliament, several of the opposite members were arbitrarily expelled the house, the mayor of London, with three aldermen and the sheriffs, was committed to the Tower, other prisons were crowded with citizens and militia officers, and the city lines were levelled; the more effectually to prevent any future resistance to the sovereign will and pleasure of the army, or, rather, of its master-spirit, Cromwell.

CHAPTER LII.

The Reign of CHARLES I. (concluded).

The king on being seized by the army was sent as a prisoner to his palace at Hampton-court. Here, though closely watched, he was allowed the access of his friends and all facilities for negotiating with parliament. But, in truth, the negotiating parties had stood upon terms which almost necessarily caused distrust on the one hand and insincerity on the other. Completely divested of power as Charles now was, it seems probable enough that he would promise more than he had any intention of performing, while the leading men on the other side could not but feel that their very lives would depend upon his sincerity from the instant that he should be restored to liberty and the exercise of his authority. Here would have been quite sufficient difficulty in the way of successful negotiation; but, beside that, Cromwell's plans were perpetually traversing the efforts of the king when his majesty was sincere, while Cromwell's active espionage never allowed any flagrant insincerity to escape detection. The king at length perceived the inutility of negotiation, and made his escape to the Isle of Wight. Here he hoped to remain undisturbed until he could either escape to the continent or receive such succours thence as might enable him, at the least, to negotiate with the parliament upon more equal terms, if not actually to try his fortune anew in the field. But colonel Hammond, the governor of the Isle of Wight, though he in some respects treated the unfortunate king with humanity, made him prisoner, and after being for some time confined in Carisbrook castle, the unfortunate Charles was sent in custody to his royal castle of Windsor, where he was wholly in the power of the army.

Cromwell and those who acted with him saw very plainly that the mere anxiety of the parliament to deprecate the pretorian bands which themselves had called into evil and gigantic power, was very likely to lead to an accommodation with the king, whose own sense of his imminent danger could not fail to render him, also, anxious for an early settlement of all disputes. The artful leaders of the army faction, therefore, now encouraged their dupes and tools of the lower sort to throw off the mask; and rabid yells for the punishment of the king arose on all sides. Peace and security had hitherto been the cry; it was now changed to a cry for vengeance. From Windsor the unhappy king was conveyed to Hurst-castle, on the coast of Hampshire, and opposite to the Isle of Wight, chiefly, it should seem, to render communication between him and the parliamentary leaders more dilatory and difficult. But the parliament, growing more and more anxious for an accommodation in precise proportion as it was rendered more and more impracticable, again opened a negotiation with the ill-treated monarch, and, despite the clamours and threats of the fanatical soldiery, acceded upon the very point of bringing it to a conclusion, when a new coup de main on the part of Cromwell extinguished all hope in the bosoms of the loyal and the just. Perceiving that the obstinacy of the parliament and the unhappy vacillation of the king could no longer be relied upon, Cromwell sent two regiments of his soldiery, under the command of colonel Pride, to blockade the house of commons. Forty-one members who were favourable to accommodation were actually imprisoned in a lower room of the house, a hundred and sixty were insolently ordered to go to their homes and attend to their private affairs, and only about sixty members were allowed to enter the house, the whole of those being furious and bigoted independents, the pledged and deadly enemies of the king, and the mere and servile tools of Cromwell and the army. This parliamentary clearance was facetiously called "Pride's purge," and the members who had the disgraceful distinction of being deemed fit for Cromwell's dirty work ever after passed under the title of "the rump."

With a really ludicrous impudence this contemptible assembly assumed to itself the whole power and character of the parliament, voted that all that had been done towards an accommodation with the king was illegal, and that his seizure and imprisonment by "the general"—so Cromwell was now termed, par excellence—were just and praiseworthy. All moderation was thrown to the winds, and as the actual private murder of the king was thought likely to disgust the better men even among the fanatical soldiery, a committee of "the rump" parliament was formed to digest a charge of high treason. It would seem that the subtlest casuist would be puzzled to make out such a charge against a king; and especially in an age when monarchy in England was so newly and so imperfectly limited. But "the rump" was composed of men who knew no difficulty of the moral sort. The king, most rightfully, and supported by the most illustrious of his nobles and the wealthiest and most loving of his gentry, had drawn the sword to reduce to order and peace a rabid and greedy faction, which threatened his crown and tore the vitals of his country. And this justifiable though sad and lamentable exertion of force, after all milder means had failed, "the rump" now charged against the king as treason; a treason of a kind never before dreamed of, a levying war against his parliament! Surely, the unhappy Charles had now but too much reason to regret that he had not, by a just severity to lord Kimbolton and his five co-accused firebrands, crushed this venomous parliament while yet he had the power to do so!

As there was now no longer, thanks to "Ride's purge," a chance of farther negotiation, it was determined that the hapless king should be brought from Hurst-castle to Windsor. Colonel Harrison, a half insane and wholly brutal fanatic, the son of a butcher, was entrusted with this commission; chiefly, perhaps, because it was well understood that he would rather slay the royal captive with his own hand than allow him to be rescued. After a brief stay at Windsor, the king was once again removed to London, and his altered appearance was such as would have excited commiseration in the breasts of any but the callous and inexorable creatures in whose hands he was. His features were haggard, his beard long and neglected, his hair blanched to a ghastly whiteness by sufferings that seemed to have fully doubled his age; and the boding melancholy that had characterized his features, even in his happier days, was now deepened down to an utter yet resigned sadness that was painful to all humane beholders.

Sir Philip Warwick, an old and broken man, but faithful and loyal to the last, was the king's chief attendant; and he and the few subordinates who were allowed to approach the royal person were now brutally ordered to serve the king without any of the accustomed forms; and all external symbols of state and majesty were, at the same time, withdrawn with a petty yet malignant carefulness.

Even these cruelties and insults could not convince the king that his enemies would be guilty of the enormous absurdity of bringing their sovereign to a formal trial. Calm, just, and clear-sighted himself, he could not comprehend how even his fanatical and boorish enemies could, in the face of day, so manifestly bid defiance not only to all law and all precedent, but also to the plainest maxims of common sense. But though almost to the very day of his trial the king refused to believe that his enemies would dare to try him, he did believe that they intended to assassinate him, and in every meal of which he partook he imagined that he saw the instrument of his death.

A. D. 1648.—In the mean time, the king's enemies were actively making preparations for the most extraordinary trial ever witnessed in this land. These preparations were so extensive that they occupied a vast number of persons from the sixth to the twentieth of January. As if the more fully to convince the king of their earnestness in the matter, Cromwell and the rump when they had named a high court of justice, consisting of a hundred and thirty-three persons, ordered the duke of Hamilton, whom they had doomed to death for his unshaken loyalty to his sovereign, to be admitted to take leave of the king at Windsor. The interview was a harrowing one. The duke had ever been ready to pour out his blood like water for his sovereign; even now he felt not for himself, but moved to tears by the sad alteration in the person of Charles, threw himself at the royal victim's feet, exclaiming, "My dear master!" "Alas!" said the weeping king, as he raised up his faithful and devoted servant, "Alas! I have, indeed, been a dear master to you!" Terrible, at that moment, must have been the king's self reproaches for the opportunities he had neglected of putting down the wretches who now had his faithful servant and himself in their power!

Of the persons named to sit in the high court of justice, as this shamefully unjust and iniquitous coterie was impudently termed, only about seventy, or scarcely more than one half, could be got together at any one time during the trial. Law citizens, fanatical members of the rump, and servile officers of the army, composed the majority of those who did attend, and it was before this wretched assembly that the legitimate sovereign of the land, now removed from Windsor to St. James's, was placed to undergo the insulting mockery of a trial.

The court, "the high court of justice" thus oddly constituted, met in Westminster-hall. The talents and firmness of Charles were even now too much respected by Cromwell and the shrewder members of the rump to allow of their opposing this miserable court to him without the ablest procurable aid; Bradshaw, a lawyer of considerable ability, was therefore appointed president, and Coke, solicitor for the people of England, with Steel, Aske, and Dorislaus for his assistants.

When led by a mace-bearer to a seat within the bar, the king seated himself with his hat on, and looked sternly around him at the traitors who affected to be his competent judges. Coke then read the charge against him, and the king's melancholy countenance was momentarily lighted up with a manly and just scorn as he heard himself gravely accused of having been "the cause of all the bloodshed which had followed since the commencement of the war!"

When Coke had finished making his formal charge, the president Bradshaw addressed the king, and called upon him to answer to the accusation which he had heard made against him.

Though the countenance of Charles fully expressed the natural and lofty indignation that he felt at being called upon to plead as a mere felon before a court composed not merely of simple commoners, but, to a very great extent, of the most ignorant and least honourable men in their ranks of life, he admirably preserved his temper, and addressed himself to his task with earnest and grave argument. He said that, conscious as he was of innocence, he should rejoice at an opportunity of justifying his conduct in every particular before a competent tribunal, but as he was not inclined to become the betrayer instead of the defender of the constitution, he must at this, the very first stage of the proceedings, wholly and positively repudiate the authority of the court before which he had been illegally brought, as the court itself was illegally constituted. Where was there even the shadow of the upper house? Without it there could be no just tribunal, parliamentary or appointed by parliament. He was interrupted, too, for the purposes of this illegal trial just as he was on the point of concluding a treaty with both houses of parliament, a moment at which he surely had a right to expect any thing rather than the violent and unjust treatment that he had experienced. He, it could not be denied, was the king and fountain of law, and could not be tried by laws to which he had not given his authority; and it would ill become him, who was entrusted with the liberties of the people, to betray them by even a formal and tacit recognition of a tribunal which could not possibly possess any other than a merely usurped power.

Bradshaw, the president, affected much surprise and indignation at the king's repudiation of the mock court of justice which, he said, received its power and authority from the source of all right, the people. When the king attempted to repeat his clear and cogent objection, Bradshaw rudely interrupted and despotically overruled him. But, if silenced by clamour, the king was not to be turned aside from his course by the mere repetition of a bold fallacy. Again and again he was brought before this mock tribunal, and again and again he baffled all attempts at making him, by pleading to it, give it some shadow of lawful authority. The conduct of the rabble without was fully worthy of the conduct of their self-constituted governors within the court. As the king proceeded to the court, he was assailed with brutal yells for what the wicked or deluded men called "justice." But neither the mob nor their instigators could induce him to plead, and the iniquitous court at length called some complaisant witnesses to swear that the king had appeared in arms against forces commissioned by parliament; and upon this fallacy of evidence, sentence of death was pronounced against him. We call the evidence a mere fallacy, because it amounted to nothing unless backed by the gross and monstrous assumption that the parliament could lawfully commission any forces without the order and permission of the king himself, and the no less glaring assumption that the king could act illegally in putting down rebellious gatherings of born subjects.

After receiving his sentence Charles was more violently abused by the rabble outside than he had even formerly been. "Execution" was loudly demanded, and one filthy and unmanly ruffian actually spat in his face; a beastly indignity which the king bore with a sedate and august pity, merely ejaculating, "Poor creatures, they would serve their generals in the same manner for a sixpence!"

To the honour of the nation be it said, these vile insults of the baser rabble were strongly contrasted by the respectful compassion of the better informed. Many of them, including some of the military, openly expressed their regret for the sufferings of the king and their disgust at the conduct of his persecutors. One soldier loudly prayed a blessing on the royal head, and the honest prayer being overheard by a fanatical officer, he struck the soldier to the ground. The king, more indignant at this outrage on the loyal soldier than he had been at all the unmanly insults that had been heaped upon himself, turned to the officer and sharply told him that the punishment very much exceeded the offence.

On returning to Whitehall, where he had been lodged during the mock trial, Charles wrote to the so-called house of commons, and requested that he might be allowed to see those of his children who were in England, and to have the assistance of Dr. Juxon, the deprived bishop of London, in preparing for the fate which he now clearly saw awaited him. Even his fanatical enemies dared not refuse these requests, but at the same time that they were granted he was informed that his execution would take place in three days.

The queen, the prince of Wales, and the duke of York were happily abroad; but the princess Elizabeth and the duke of Gloucester, a child not much more than three years old, were brought into the presence of their unhappy parent. The interview was most affecting, for, young as the children were, they but too well comprehended the sad calamity that was about to befall them. The king, amongst the many exhortations which he endeavoured to adapt to the understanding of his infant son, said, "My child, they will cut off my head, and when they have done that they will want to make you king. But now mark well what I say, you must never consent to be king while your brothers Charles and James are alive. They will cut off their heads if they can take them, and they will afterwards cut off your head, and therefore I charge you do not be made a king by them." The noble little fellow having listened attentively to all that his father said to him, burst into a passion of tears and exclaimed, "I won't be a king; I will be torn in pieces first."

Short as the interval was between the conclusion of the mock trial of the king and his murder, great efforts were made to save him, and among other efforts was that of the prince of Wales sending a blank paper, signed and sealed by himself, accompanied by a letter, in which he offered permission to the parliament to insert whatever terms it pleased for the redemption of his father's life. But there was an under current at work of which both the king and his attached friends were fatally ignorant. The real cause of the murder of Charles I. was the excessive personal terror of Oliver Cromwell. This we state as an indisputably legitimate deduction from an anecdote related by Cromwell himself; and the anecdote is so curious and so characteristic of Cromwell that we subjoin it. In truth, how broad a light does not this anecdote throw on this most shameful portion of English history!

While the king was still at Windsor and allowed to correspond both with the parliament and his distant friends, it is but too clear that he allowed the vile character and proceedings of his opponents to warp his naturally high character from that direct and inflexible honesty which is proverbially and truly said to be the best policy. Vacillation and a desire to make use of subterfuge were apparent even in his direct dealings with the parliament, and would have tended to have prolonged the negotiations even had the parliament been earnest in its wish for an accommodation at a far earlier period than it really was. But it was in his private correspondence especially with the queen that Charles displayed the real insincerity of much of his public profession. Seeing the great power of Cromwell, and to a considerable extent divining that daring and subtle man's real character, Charles had not only wisely but even successfully laid himself out to win Cromwell to his aid. There was, as yet, but little probability that even if Charles himself were put out of the way, a high hearted nation would set aside the whole family of its legitimate king, merely to give a more than regal despotism into the coarse hands of the son of a provincial brewer! At this period the aching ambition of the future protector would, in the absence of all probability of illegitimately acquired sovereignty, have been satisfied with the trust, honours, wealth, and power which the gratitude of his sovereign could have bestowed on him. Cromwell, consequently, was actually pondering the propriety of setting up the king and becoming "viceroy over" him, when the startling truth was revealed to him, that the king was merely duping him, and intended to sacrifice him as a traitor when he should have done with him as a tool. Effectually served by his spies, Cromwell, who had already some grounds for suspecting Charles's real designs towards him, received information that on a certain night a man would leave the Blue Boar in Holborn for Dover, on his way to the continent, and that in the flap of his saddle a most important packet would be found, containing a voluminous letter from the king to the queen. On the night in question, Cromwell and Ireton, in the disguise of troopers, lounged into the Blue Boar tap, and there passed away the time in drinking beer and watching some citizens playing at shovel-board, until they saw the man arrive of whom they had received an exact description. Following the man into the stable they ripped open the saddle and found the packet, and, to his dismay and rage, Cromwell read, in the hand-writing, of Charles, the monarch's exultation at having tickled his vanity, and his expressed determination to raise him for a time, only to crush him when the opportunity should occur. From that moment terror made Cromwell inexorable; he saw no security for his own safety except in the utter destruction of the king. Hence the indecent and determined trial and sentence; and hence, too, the absolute contempt that was shown for all efforts at preventing the sentence from being executed.

Whatever want of resolution Charles may have shown in other passages of his life, the time he was allowed to live between sentence and execution exhibited him in the not unfrequently combined characters of the christian and the hero. No invectives against the iniquity of which he was the victim escaped his lips, and he slept the deep calm sleep of innocence, though on each night his enemies, with a refinement upon cruelty more worthy of fiends than of men, assailed his ears with the noise of the men erecting the scaffold for his execution.

When the fatal morning at length dawned, the king at an early hour called one of his attendants, whom he desired to attire him with more than usual care, as he remarked that he would fain appear with all proper preparation for so great and so joyful a solemnity. The scaffold was erected in front of Whitehall, and it was from the central windows of his own most splendid banqueting room that the king stepped on to the scaffold on which he was to be murdered.

When his majesty appeared he was attended by the faithful and attached Dr. Juxon; and was received by two masked executioners standing beside the block and the axe. The scaffold, entirely covered with fine black cloth, was densely surrounded by soldiers under the command of colonel Toulminson, while in the distance was a vast multitude of people. The near and violent death that awaited him seemed to produce no effect on the king's nerves. He gazed gravely but calmly around him, and said, to all whom the concourse of military would admit of his speaking, that the late war was ever deplored by him, and was commenced by the parliament. He had not taken up arms until compelled by the warlike and illegal conduct of the parliament, and had done so only to defend his people from oppression, and to preserve intact the authority which had been transmitted to him by his ancestors. But though he positively denied that there was any legal authority in the court by which he had been tried, or any truth in the charge upon which he had been condemned and sentenced, he added that he felt that his fate was a just punishment for his weakly and criminally consenting to the equally unjust execution of the earl of Strafford. He emphatically pronounced his forgiveness of all his enemies, named his son as his successor, and expressed his hope that the people would now return to their duty under that prince; and he concluded his brief and manly address by calling upon all present to bear witness that he died a sincere protestant of the church of England.

No one heard this address without being deeply moved by it, and even colonel Tomlinson, who had the unenviable task of superintending the murder of his prince, confessed that that address had made him a convert to the royal cause.

The royal martyr now began to die, and, as he did so, Dr. Juxon said to him, "Sire! there is but one stage more which though a turbulent and troublesome one, is still but a short one; it will soon carry you a great way; it will carry you from earth to heaven, and there you shall find, to your great joy, the prize to which you are hastening, a crown of glory."

"I go," replied the king, "where no disturbance can take place, from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown."

"You exchange," rejoined the bishop, "a temporal for an eternal crown,—a good exchange."

Charles having now completed his preparations, delivered his decorations of St. George to Dr. Juxon, and emphatically pronounced the single word "Remember!" He then calmly laid his head upon the block, and it was severed from his body at one blow; the second executioner immediately held it up by the hair, and said "Behold the head of a traitor!"

Thus on the 30th of January, 1649, perished Charles I. in the forty-ninth year of his age, and the twenty-fourth of his reign. He was not executed but murdered; he was guilty of no crime but weakness or vacillation of judgment; his greatest misfortune was his want of the stern energy of a Henry VIII. or an Elizabeth, such an energy exerted at the beginning of his reign would have enabled him to crush the traitorous, and would have warranted and enabled him subsequently to increase and systematize the liberties of his country, without danger of subjecting it to the rude purification of a civil war.

The blood of the royal martyr had scarcely ceased to flow, before the lately furious multitude began to repent of the violence which their own vile shouts had assisted. But repentance was now too late; more than the power of their murdered monarch had now fallen into sterner hands.

With that suspicion which "ever haunts the guilty mind," Cromwell and his friends attached much mysterious importance to the "REMEMBER" so emphatically pronounced by Charles on delivering his George to Dr. Juxon, and that learned and excellent man was authoritatively commanded to give an account of the king's meaning, or his own understanding of the word. To the inexpressible mortification of those mean minds, the doctor informed them that the king only impressed upon him a former and particular request to deliver the George to the prince of Wales, and at the same time to urge the command of his father to forgive his murderers!

CHAPTER LIII.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

WHATEVER might have been Cromwell's original views, his military successes, the vast influence he had obtained over the army, and, perhaps, still more than either of these, the base and evident readiness of the parliament to truckle to his military power and meet him even more than half way in his most unjust and exorbitant wishes, opened up a prospect too unbounded and too tempting for his ambition to resist. But policy, as well as the circumstances of the time, made it incumbent upon Cromwell, in the first instance, to exalt still higher his character for military skill and daring. Ireland had a disciplined host in arms for the royal cause under the duke of Ormond, and large multitudes of the native Irish were at the same time in revolt under the restless and daring O'Neal. Cromwell procured the command of the army appointed to put down both these parties, and fully succeeded. How mercifully he used his victory we have related under the proper head.

A. D. 1650.—On the return of Cromwell to England his pocket parliament formally returned him the thanks which, except for his needless and odious cruelty, he had well merited. A new opportunity at the same moment presented itself for the aggrandizement of this bold and fortunate adventurer. The Scots, who had basely sold Charles I. into the hands of his enemies, were now endeavouring to make money by venal loyalty, as they had formerly made it by venal treason. They had invited Charles II. into Scotland, where that gay young prince speedily found that they looked upon him rather as a prisoner than as their king.

The grossness of their manners, and the rude accommodations with which they furnished him, he could probably have passed over without much difficulty, for young as Charles II. was, he had already seen more of grossness and poverty than commonly comes within the knowledge of the great. But Charles was frank as he was gay; and the austere manners and long and unseasonable discourses which they inflicted upon him did not annoy him more than their evident determination to make him at the least affect to agree with them. As, however, the Scots were his only present hope, Charles did his utmost to avoid quarrelling with them; and however they might annoy him while among them, whatever might be their ultimate views respecting him, certain it is that they raised a very considerable army, and showed every determination to reinstate him in his kingdom.

Even merely as being presbyterians the Scots were detested by Cromwell and his Independents; but now that they had also embraced the cause of "the man Charles Stuart," as these boorish English Independents affected to call their lawful sovereign, it was determined that a signal chastisement should be inflicted upon them. The command of an army for that purpose was offered to Fairfax, but he declined it on the honourable ground that he was unwilling to act against presbyterians. Cromwell had no such scruple, and he immediately set out for Scotland with an army of sixteen thousand men, which received accessions to its numbers in every great town through which it marched. But not even the military fame of Cromwell, nor his but too well known cruelty to all who dared to resist him and were unfortunate enough to be vanquished, the Scots boldly met his invasion. But boldness alone was of small avail against such a leader as Cromwell, backed by such tried and enthusiastic soldiers as his; the two armies had scarcely joined battle when the Scots were put to flight, their loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners being very great, while the total loss of Cromwell did not exceed forty men.

As Cromwell after this battle pursued his course northward, with the determination not only to chastise, but completely and permanently to subdue the Scots, the young king, as soon as he could rally the Scottish army, took a resolution which showed him to have an intuitive knowledge of military tactics. Making a detour to get completely clear of any outlying parties of Cromwell's troops, he commenced a forced march into England, the northern counties of which lay completely open and defenceless. The boldness of this course alarmed a portion of the Scottish army, and numerous desertions took place from the very commencement of the march southward; but as Charles still had a numerous and imposing force, there was every reason to believe that long ere he should reach London, the great object of his expedition, the gentry and middle orders would flock to him in such numbers as would render altogether out of the question any resistance on the part of the parliament, especially in the absence of Cromwell and the flower of the English troops. But the bold manœuvre of the young prince was doomed to have none of the success which it so eminently deserved. Before his progress was sufficient to counterbalance in the minds of his subjects the terror in which they held Cromwell, that active commander had received news of the young king's manœuvre, and had instantly retrograded in pursuit of him, leaving Monk his second in

There has always appeared to us to be a striking resemblance, which we do not remember to have seen noticed by any other writer, between the Cromwellian and the Buonapartean systems. To compare the battles of Cromwell to the battles of Buonaparte would be literally to make mountains of molehills; yet the principles of these two commanders seem to us to have been the same, and to be summed up in two general maxims, march rapidly, and, attack in masses. The phrases are simple enough in themselves, yet no one who has studied a single battle-map with even the slightest assistance from mathematical science, can fail to perceive the immense, we had almost said the unbounded, powers of their application. On the present occasion the celerity of Cromwell was the destruction of the young king's hopes. With an army increased by the terror of his name to nearly forty thousand men, Cromwell marched southward so rapidly, that he absolutely shut up the forces of Charles in the city of Worcester ere they had time to break from their quarters and form in order of battle in some more favourable situation. The irresistible cavalry of Cromwell burst suddenly and simultaneously in at every gate of the town; every street, almost every house became the instant scene of carnage; the Pitchcroft was literally strewn with the dead, while the Severn was tinged with the blood of the wounded; and Charles, after having bravely fought as a common soldier, and skilfully, though unsuccessfully, exerted himself as a commander, seemed to have no wish but to throw himself upon the swords of his enemies. It was with difficulty that his friends turned him from his desperate purpose, and even when they had done so it appeared to be at least problematical whether he would be able to escape. Accident, or the devotion of a peasant, caused a wain of hay to be overturned opposite to one of the gates of the city in such wise that Cromwell's mounted troops could not pass, and, favoured by this circumstance, Charles mounted a horse that was held for him by a devoted friend, and sought safety in flight.

The triumph of Cromwell was completed with this battle of Worcester, but his vengeful desire was not yet laid to rest; and under his active and untiring superintendence prodigious exertions were made to capture the young king, whose difficulties, in fact, only commenced as he escaped from the confusion and the carnage of Worcester. Almost destitute of money and resources of every kind, and having reason to fear an enemy, either on principle or from lucre, in every man whom he met, Charles was obliged to trust for safety to disguise, which was the more difficult on account of his remarkable and striking features. Three poor men, named Penderell, disguised him as a woodcutter, fed him, concealed him by night, and subsequently aided him to reach wealthier though not more faithfully devoted friends. While with these poor men, Charles in the day time accompanied them to their place of labour in Boscobel wood. On one occasion on hearing a party of soldiers approach, the royal fugitive climbed into a large and spreading oak, where, sheltered by its friendly foliage, he saw the soldiers pass and repass, and quite distinctly heard them expressing their rude wishes to obtain the reward that was offered for his capture. Thanks to the incorruptible fidelity of the Penderells and numerous other persons who were necessarily made acquainted with the truth, Charles, though he endured great occasional hardship and privation, and was necessarily exposed to great constant anxiety, eluded every effort of his almost innumerable pursuers, urged on though they were to the utmost activity by the malignant liberality with which Cromwell promised to reward the traitor who should arrest his fugitive king. Under a variety of disguises, and protected by a variety of persons, the young king went from place to place for six weeks wanting only one day, and his adventures and hair-breadth escapes during that time read far more like romance than the history of what actually was endured and survived by a human being persecuted by evil or misguided men. At the end of this time he was fortunate enough to get on board a vessel which landed him safely on the coast of Normandy; an issue to so long and varied a series of adventures which is more remarkable when it is considered that forty men and women, of various stations, circumstances, and dispositions, were, during that terrible season of his flight, necessarily made acquainted with the secret, the betrayal of which would have made any one of them opulent for life, and infamous for ever.

Cromwell, in the mean time, after having achieved what he called the "crowning mercy" of the victory of Worcester, made a sort of triumphal return to London, where he was met, with the pomp due only to a sovereign, by the speaker and principal members of the house of commons, and the mayor and other magistrates of London in their state habits and paraphernalia.

General Monk had been left in Scotland with a sufficient force to keep that turbulent people in awe; and both their presbyterianism and the imminent peril in which Charles's bold march of the Scottish army had placed Cromwell himself and that "commonwealth" of which he was now fully determined to be the despot, had so enraged Cromwell against that country, that he seized upon his first hour of leisure to complete its degradation, as well as submission. His complaisant parliament only required a hint from him to pass an act which might have been fitly enough entitled "an act for the better punishment and prevention of Scottish loyalty." By this act royalty was declared to be abolished in Scotland, as it had previously been in England, and Scotland itself was declared to be then annexed to England as a conquest and a province of "the commonwealth." Cromwell's hatred of the Scotch, however, proceeded no farther than insult; fortunately for the Scots, Monk, who was left as their resident general or military governor, was a prudent and impartial man, free from all the worst fanaticisms and wickednesses of the time; and his rigid impartiality at once disposed the people to peace, and intimidated the English judges who were entrusted with the distribution of justice in that country, from being guilty of any injustice or tyranny to which they might otherwise have been inclined. England, Scotland, and Ireland—where Ireton and Ludlow had completed the very little that Cromwell had left undone—were thus effectually subjected to a parliament of sixty men, many of whom were the weakest, as many more of them were the wickedest, the most ignorant, and the most fanatical men that could have been found in England even in that age. So says history, if we look at it with a merely superficial glance. But, in truth, the hats which covered the heads of those sixty men had fully as much concern as the men themselves in the wonderfully rapid and complete subjugation of three countries, two of which had never been otherwise than turbulent and sanguinary, and the third of which had just murdered its legal sovereign and driven his legal successor into exile. No; it was not by the fools and the fanatics, carefully weeded out of the most foolish and fanatical of parliaments, that all this great though evil work was done. Uneen, save by the few, but felt and seen throughout the whole English dominion, Cromwell dictated every measure and inspired every speech of that parliament which to the eyes of the vulgar seemed so omnipotent. His sagacity and his energy did much, and his known vindictiveness and indomitable firmness did the rest; those who opposed failed before his powers, and their failure intimidated others into voluntary submission. The channel islands and the Scottish isles were easily subdued on account of their proximity; the American colonies, though some of them at the outset declared for the royal cause, numbered so many enthusiastic religious dissenters among their populations, that they, too, speedily submitted to and followed the example and orders of the newly and guiltily founded "Commonwealth" of England.

While all this was being achieved, the real government of England was in the hands of Cromwell, though, in form, there was a council of thirty-eight, to whom all addresses and petitions were presented, and who had, nominally, the managing of the army and navy, and the right and responsibility of making war and peace. The real moving principle of this potent council was the mind of Cromwell. And, while we denounce the flagrant hypocrisy of his pretensions to a superior sanctity, and his traitorous contempt of all his duties as a subject, impartial truth demands that we admit that never was ill-obtained power better wielded. Next after the petty and cruel persecution of individuals, nominally on public grounds, but really in revenge of private injuries, a political speculator would infallibly and very naturally predict that a poor and, comparatively speaking, meanly born private man, like Cromwell, being suddenly invested with so vast a power over a great and wealthy nation, would make his ill-acquired authority an infamous and especial scourge in the financial department. But, to the honour of Cromwell be it said, there is no single period in our history during which the public finances have been so well managed, and administered with so entire a freedom from greed, dishonesty, and waste, as during this strange man's strange administration. It is quite true that the crown revenues and the lands of the bishops were most violently and shamefully seized upon by this government, but they were not, as might have been anticipated, squandered upon the gratification of private individuals. These, with a farther levy upon the national resources that amounted to only a hundred and twenty thousand pounds per month, supplied the whole demands of a government which not only maintained peace in its own commonwealth and dependencies, but also taught foreigners that, under whatever form of government, England still knew how to make herself feared, if not respected.

Holland, by its protection of the royal party of England, had given deep offence to Cromwell, who, literally "as the hart panteth for cool waters," panted for the blood of Charles II. "Whom we have injured we never forgive," says a philosophic satirist; and Cromwell's hatred of Charles II. was a good exemplification of the said truth. Hating Holland for her generous shelter of the royalists, Cromwell eagerly seized upon two events, which might just as well have happened in any other country under heaven, as a pretext for making war upon that country.

The circumstances to which we allude were these. At the time of the mock trial that preceded the shameful murder of the late king, doctor Dorilaus, the reader will remember, was one of the "assistants" of Coke, the "solicitor for the people of England." Under the government of the "commonwealth" this mere hireling was sent as its envoy to Holland. A royalist whose own fierce passions made him forget that it is written "vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord," and who would see no difference between the ruffian who actually wields the instrument, and the more artful but no less abominable ruffian who instigates or hires the actual assassin, put Dorilaus to death. No sane man of sound Christian principles can justify this act; but how was Holland concerned in it? The same man with the same opportunity would doubtless have committed the same act in the puritan state of New England; and to make a whole nation answerable in their blood and their treasure for the murderous act of an individual who had taken shelter among them was an absurdity as well as an atrocity. The other case which served Cromwell as a pretext for declaring war against Holland was, that Mr. St. John, who was subsequently sent on an embassy to Holland, received some petty insult from the friends of the prince of Orange! But, alas! it is not only usurped governments that furnish us with these practical commentaries on the fable of the wolf and the lamb!

The great naval commander of this time was admiral Blake. Though he did not enter the sea service until very late in life, he was a perfect master of naval tactics, and his daring and firmness of character could not be surpassed. When the war was declared against Holland he proceeded to sea to oppose the power of the Dutch admiral, Van Tromp. The actions between them were numerous and in many cases tolerably equal, but the general result of the war was so ruinous to the trading interests of the Dutch, that they anxiously desired the return of peace. But though it was chiefly the personal feeling and personal energy of Cromwell that had commenced this war, his hitherto patient and obsequious tools, the parliament, now exerted themselves to prolong the war at sea, hoping thus to weaken that power of the army, wielded by Cromwell, which of late they had felt to be scarcely tolerable degree.

But effectual resistance on the part of the parliament was now wholly out of the question; they had too well done the work of the usurper, who was, probably, not ill pleased that their present petty and futile attempt at opposing him gave him a pretext for crushing even the last semblance of their free will out of existence. But though he had fully determined upon a new and decisive mode of overruling them, Cromwell initiated it with his usual art and tortuous procedure. He well knew that the commons hated the army, would fain have disbanded it, if possible, and would on no account do aught that could increase either its power or its well-being; on the other hand, he was equally aware that the soldiers had many real grievances to complain of, and also entertained not a few prejudices against the commons. To embroil them in an open quarrel, and then, seemingly as the mere and sympathizing redresser of the wronged soldiery, to use them to crush the parliament was the course he determined upon.

A.D. 1653.—Cromwell, with that rugged but efficient eloquence which he so well knew how to use, urged the officers of the army no longer to suffer themselves and their men to labour under grievances unredressed and arrears unpaid, at the mere will and pleasure of the selfish civilians for whom they had fought and conquered, but remonstrate in terms which those selfish persons could not misunderstand, and which would wring justice from their fears. Few things could have been suggested which would have been more entirely agreeable to the wishes of the officers. They drew up a petition—if we ought not rather to call it a remonstrance—in which, after demanding redress of grievances and payment of arrears, they taunted the parliament with having formerly made fine professions of their determination to remodel that assembly as to extend and ensure liberty to all ranks of men, and with having for years continued to sit without making a single advance towards the performance of these voluntary pledges. The house acted on this occasion with a spirit which would have been admirable and honourable in a genuine house of commons, but which savoured somewhat of the ludicrous when shown by men who, consciously and deliberately had year after year been the mere and servile tools of Cromwell and his praetorians. It was voted not only that this petition should not be complied with, but also that any person who should in future present any such petition should be deemed guilty of high treason, and a committee was appointed immediately to prepare an act in conformity to this resolution. The officers presented a warm remonstrance upon this treatment of their petition; the house still more warmly replied; and it was soon very evident that both parties were animated by the utmost animosity to each other. Cromwell now saw that his hour for action had arrived. He was sitting in council with some of his officers when, doubtless in obedience to his own secret orders, intelligence was brought to him of the violent temper and designs of the house. With well acted astonishment and uncontrollable rage he started from his seat, and exclaimed that the misconduct of these men at length compelled him to do a thing which made the hair to stand on end upon his head. Hastily assembling three hundred soldiers he immediately proceeded to the house of commons, which he entered, covered, and followed by as many of the troops as could enter. Before any remonstrance could be offered, Cromwell, stamping upon the ground, as in an ecstasy of sudden passion, exclaimed, "For shame! Get ye gone and give place to honest men! you are no longer a parliament, I tell ye you are no longer a parliament." Sir Harry Vane, a bold and honest man, though a half insane enthusiast, now rose and denounced Cromwell's conduct as indecent and tyrannical.

"Ha! exclaimed Cromwell, "sir Harry! Oh! sir Harry Vane! the Lord deliver me from sir Harry Vane!" Then, turning first to one prominent member of this lately servile parliament and then to another, he dealt out in succession the titles of glutton, drunkard, adulterer, and whoremonger. Having given this, probably, very just description of the men by whose means he had so long and so completely misgoverned the suffering nation, he literally turned "the rump" out of the house, locked the doors, and carried away the key in his pocket.

venient of tools for the purposes of despotism, Cromwell when he had thus summarily got rid of "the rump," very soon proceeded to call a new parliament, which, if possible, surpassed even that in the qualities of brutal ignorance and ferocious fanaticism. A practice had now become general of taking scriptural words, and in many cases, whole scriptural sentences or canting imitations of them, for Christian names; and a fanatical leather-seller, who was the leading man in this fanatical parliament, named Praise-God Barebone, gave his name to it. The utter ignorance displayed by the whole of the members of Barebone's parliament even of the forms of their own house, the wretched drivelling of their speeches, and their obvious incapacity to understand the meaning of what they were secretly and imperiously instructed to do, excited so much ridicule even from the very multitude, that the less insane among the members themselves became ashamed of their pitiable appearance. A small number of these, with the concurrence of Rouse, their speaker, waited upon Cromwell at Whitehall, and wisely tendered their resignation, which he willingly received. But many of this precious parliament were far from being convinced of their incapacity or willing to resign their authority. They determined not to be bound by the decision of the seceders, and proceeded to elect one of their number, named Moyer, as their speaker. Cromwell had but one way of dealing with this sort of contumacy, and he sent a party of guards; under the command of colonel White, to clear the parliament house. On this occasion a striking instance occurred of the mingled cant and profanity which then so disgustingly abounded in common conversation. Colonel White on entering the house and seeing Moyer in the chair, addressed him and asked what he and the other members were doing there.

"Seeking the Lord," replied Moyer, in the cant of his tribe.

"Then," replied the colonel, with a profane levity still more disgusting than the other's cant, "you had better go seek him elsewhere, for to my certain knowledge he has not been here these many years."

Having now sufficiently ascertained the complete devotion of the military to his person, and sufficiently accustomed the people at large to his arbitrary and sudden caprices, Cromwell, whose clear and masculine sense must have loathed the imbecility and fanaticism of the late parliament, boldly proceeded to dispense with parliaments altogether, and to establish a pure and open military government, of which he was himself at once the head, heart, and hand. The formation of the new government was highly characteristic of Cromwell's peculiar policy. Through his usual agents he induced the officers of the army to declare him protector of the commonwealth of England; and that there might be no misunderstanding as to the substantial royalty of the office thus conferred on him, the appointment was proclaimed in London and other chief towns with the formality and publicity usual on proclaiming the accession of a king.

The military officers having thus made Cromwell king in all but the mere name, he gratefully proceeded to make them his ministers, choosing his council from among the general officers, and allowing each councillor the then very liberal salary of one thousand pounds per annum.

Now that he was ostensibly, as for a long time before he had been virtually, at the head of affairs, the policy of Cromwell required that the army should be well taken care of. While there was yet any possibility of the people clamouring for a parliament and of a parliament making any show of resistance to his inordinate pretensions, the discontent of the army was a weapon of price to him. Now, the case was completely altered, and instead of allowing the pay of the army to fall into arrear, he had every officer and man constantly paid one month in advance. Liberal in all that related to real public service, as the providing of arms, furnishing the magazines, and keeping the fleet in serviceable repair, he yet was the determined foe of all useless expence.

But though the iron hand of Cromwell kept the people tranquil at home and maintained the high character of the nation abroad, he had not long obtained the protectorate ere he began to suffer the penalty of his criminal ambition. To the royalists, as the murderer of their former king and as the chief obstacle to the restoration of their present one, he was of course hateful; and the sincere republicans, including not only Fairfax and many other men of public importance and character, but also a multitude of persons in all ranks of private life, and some of his own nearest and dearest connections, saw in him only a worse than legitimate king. The consequence was, that numerous plots, of more or less importance and extent, were formed against him. But he was himself active, vigilant, and penetrating; and as he was profuse in his rewards to those who afforded him valuable information, no one was ever more exactly served by spies. He seemed to know men's very thoughts, so rapid and minute was the information which he in fact owed to this, in his circumstances, wise liberality. No sooner was a plot formed than he knew who were concerned in it; no sooner had the conspirators determined to proceed to action than they learned to their cost, that their own lives were at the disposal of him whose life they had aimed at.

With regard to the war in which the nation was engaged, it may be remarked, that all the efforts of the Dutch failed to save them from suffering severely under the vigorous and determined attacks of Blake. Defeated again and again, and finding their trade paralyzed in every direction, they at length became so dispirited that they sued for peace, and treated as a sovereign the man whom, hitherto, they had very justly treated as a usurper. In order to obtain peace, they agreed to restore considerable territory which, during the reign of Charles I., they had torn from the East India Company; to cease to advocate or advance the cause of the unfortunate Charles II.; and to pay homage on every sea to the flag of the commonwealth.

While we give all due credit to Cromwell as the ruler under whom the Dutch were thus humbled, and make due allowance for the value of his prompt and liberal supplies to the admiral and fleet, we must not, either, omit to remember that the real humbler of the Dutch was the gallant admiral Blake. This fine English seaman was avowedly and notoriously a republican in principle, and, being so, he could not but be opposed to the usurpation by Cromwell of a more than kingly power. But at sea and with an enemy's fleet in sight the gallant Blake remembered only his country, and cared nothing about who ruled it. On such occasions, he would say to his seamen, "No matter into whose hands the government may fall; our duty is still to fight for our country."

With France in negotiation, as with Holland in open war, England under Cromwell was successful. The sagacious cardinal Mazarine, who was then in power in France, clearly saw that the protector was more easily to be managed by flattery and deference than by any attempts at violence, and there were few crowned heads that were treated by France, under Mazarine, with half the respect which it lavished upon "protector" Cromwell of England. This prudent conduct of the French minister probably saved much blood and treasure to both nations, for although Cromwell's discerning mind and steadfast temper would not allow of his sacrificing any of the substantial advantages of England to the soothing and flatteries of the French minister, they, unquestionably, disposed him to docility and complaisance upon many not vitally important points, upon which, had they been at all haughtily pressed, he would have resisted even to the extremity of going to war.

Spain, which in the reign of Elizabeth and even later had been so powerful as to threaten to unite all Europe in submission, had now become considerably reduced. But Cromwell, wisely, as we think, still considered it too powerful, and as far more likely than France to espouse the cause of Charles II., and thus be injurious to the commonwealth—and the protector. Accordingly, being solicited by Mazarine to join in depressing Spain, he readily furnished six thousand men for the invasion of the Netherlands, and a signal victory was with this aid obtained over the Spaniards at Dunes. In return for this important service the French put Dunkirk, lately taken from the Spaniards, into his hands.

But the victory of Dunes was the least of the evils that the Spaniards experienced from the enmity of Cromwell. Blake, whose conduct in the Dutch war had not only endeared him to England, but had also spread his personal renown throughout the world, was most liberally and ably supported by the protector. Having sailed up the Mediterranean, where the English flag had never floated above a fleet since the time of the crusaders, he completely swept that sea of all that dared to dispute it with him, and then proceeded to Leghorn, where his mere appearance and reputation caused the duke of Tuscany to make reparations for divers injuries which had been inflicted upon the English traders there.

A.D. 1657.—ON CHRISTMAS-DAY SEVERAL CONGREGATIONS THAT HAD MET TO COMMEMORATE THE BIRTH OF CHRIST, WERE DISPERSED BY CROMWELL.

AFTER CROMWELL WAS ACKNOWLEDGED "PROTECTOR," HE CALLED HIS SON RICHARD TO COURT, AND MADE HIM CHANCELLOR OF GIGLOW.

A. D. 1658.—The trading vessels of England, as, indeed, of all European countries, had long suffered from the Tunisians and Algerines, and Blake now proceeded to call those barbarians to account. The dey of Algiers was soon brought to reason; but the dey of Tunis, directing the attention of Blake to the strong castles of Goletta and Porto Farino, bade him look at them and then do his worst. The English admiral instantly took him at his word, sailed into the harbour, burned the whole of the shipping that lay in it, and sailed triumphantly away in quest of the Spaniards. Arrived at Cadix he took two galleons, or treasure ships, of the enormous value of two millions of pieces of eight; and then sailed for the Canaries, where he burned and sunk an entire Spanish fleet of sixteen sail. After this latter action he sailed for England to rest, and sank so rapidly beneath an illness which had long afflicted him, that he perished just as he reached home.

While Blake had been thus gallantly and successfully exerting himself in one quarter, another fleet under admirals Venables and Penn, carrying about four thousand land forces, left the British shores. The object of this expedition was to capture the island of Hispaniola, but the Spaniards were so well prepared and superior, that this object utterly failed. Resolved not to return home without having achieved something, the admirals now directed their course to Jamaica, where they so completely surprised the Spaniards, that that rich island was taken possession of by our troops without the necessity of striking a blow. So little was the value of the island from which so much wealth has since been drawn, at that time understood, that its capture was not deemed a compensation for the failure as to Hispaniola, and both the admirals were sent to the Tower for that failure.

A. D. 1658.—But the splendid successes of Cromwell were now drawing to a close. His life, glorious as to the unthinking and uninformed it must have appeared, had from the moment of his accepting the protectorate been one long series of secret and most harassing vexations. As we have already pointed out, both extremes, the republicans and the royalists, detested him, and were perpetually plotting against his authority and life. His own wife was thought to detest the guilty state in which they lived; and it is certain that both his eldest daughter, Mrs. Fleetwood, and his favourite child, Mrs. Claypole, took every opportunity of maintaining the respective principles of their husbands, even in the presence of their father. Mrs. Fleetwood, indeed, went beyond her husband in zeal for republicanism; while Mrs. Claypole, whom the protector loved with a tenderness little to have been expected from so stern a man, was so ardent in the cause of monarchy, that even on her death-bed she upbraided her sorrowing father with the death of one sovereign and the usurpation which kept the living sovereign in exile and in misery. The soldiery too with whom he had so often fought, were for the most part sincere, however erring, in their religious professions, and could not but be deeply disgusted when they at length perceived that his religious as well as his republican professions had been mere baits to catch men's opinions and support without. He was thus left almost without a familiar and confidential friend, while in the midst of a people to whom he had set the fearful example of achieving an end, although at the terrible price of shedding innocent blood.

Frequent conspiracies and his knowledge of the general detestation in which his conduct was held at length shook even his resolute mind and iron frame. He became nervous and melancholy; in whichever direction he turned his eyes he imagined that he saw an enemy. Fairfax, whose lady openly condemned the proceedings against the king in Westminster-hall at the time of the mock trial, had so wrought upon her husband, that he allowed himself to league with sir William Waller and other eminent men at the head of the presbyterian party to destroy the protector. With all parties in the state thus furious against him, from well now, too, for the first time found himself fearfully straitened for money. His successes against the Spaniards had been splendid, indeed, but such splendours were usually expensive in the end. With an exhausted treasury and debts of no inconsiderable amount, he began to fear the consequence of what seemed inevitable, his falling in arrears with the soldiery to whom he owed all his past success and upon whose good will alone rested his slender hope of future security. Just as he was tortured well nigh to insanity by these threatening circumstances of his situation, Colonel Titus, a zealous republican, who had bravely, however erroneously, fought against the late king, and who was now thoroughly disgusted and indignant to see the plebeian king-killer practising more tyranny than the murdered monarch had ever been guilty of, sent forth his opinions in a most bitterly eloquent pamphlet, bearing the ominous title of "Killing no Murderer." Setting out with a brief reference to what had been done in the case of (what he, as a republican, called) kingly tyranny, the colonel vehemently insisted that it was not merely a right but a positive duty to slay the plebeian usurper. "Shall we," said the eloquent declaimer, "shall we, who struck down the lion, cower before the wolf?"

GENERAL JAMBERT WAS DISMISSED THE ARMY BECAUSE HE REFUSED TO TAKE THE OATH OF ALLEGIANCE TO "THE PROTECTOR HIMSELF."

THE LAST REPRESENTATIVE OF THE PROTECTOR WAS OLIVER CROMWELL, HERO, WHO DIED AT CHESHAM PARK, BUCKS, MAY 31, 1658.

Cromwell read this eloquent and immoral reasoning—immoral, we say, for crime can never justify more crime and never was again seen to smile. The nervousness of his body and the horror of his mind were now redoubled. He doubted not that this fearless and plausible pamphlet would fall into the hands of some enthusiast who would be nerved to frenzy by it. He wore armour beneath his clothes, and constantly carried pistols with him, never travelled twice by the same road, and rarely slept more than a second night in the same chamber. Though he was always strongly guarded, such was the wretchedness of his situation that even this did not ensure his safety; for where more probably than among the fanatical soldiery could an assassin be found. Alone he fell into melancholy; in company he was uncheered; and if strangers, of however high character, approached somewhat close to his person, it was in a tone less indicative of anger than of actual and agonizing terror that he bade them stand off.

The strong constitution of Cromwell at length gave way beneath this accumulation of horrors. He daily became thinner and more feeble, and ere long was seized with tertian ague, which carried him off in a week, in the ninth year of his unprincipled usurpation, and in the fifty-ninth of his age, on the third of September, 1659.

A. D. 1659.—Though Cromwell was delirious from the effects of his mortal illness, he had a sufficient lucid interval to allow of his putting the crowning stroke to his unparalleled treason. This slayer of his lawful sovereign, this mere private citizen, who had only made his first step from extreme obscurity under pretence of a burning and inextinguishable hatred of monarchy, now, when on the very verge of death, had the cool audacity and impudence to name his son Richard as his successor, —forsooth!—as though his usurped power were held by hereditary right, or as though his son and the grandson of a small trader were better qualified than any other living man for the office, on the supposition of its being elective! In the annals of the world we know of no instance of impudence beyond this.

But though named by his father to the protectorate, Richard Cromwell had none of his father's energy and but little of his evil ambition. Accustomed to the stern rule and sagacious activity of the deceased usurper, the army very speedily showed its unwillingness to transfer its allegiance to Richard, and a committee of the leading officers was assembled at Fleetwood's residence, and called, after it, the cabal of Wallingford. The first step of this association was to present to the young protector a remonstrance requiring that 'he command of the army should be entrusted to some person who possessed the confidence of the officers. As Richard was thus plainly informed that he had not that confidence, he had no choice but to defend his title by force, or to make a virtue of necessity and give in his resignation of an authority to the importance of which he was signally unequal. He chose the latter course; and having signed a formal abdication of an office which he ought never to have filled, he lived for some years in France and subsequently settled at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, where as a private gentleman he lived to a very advanced age, in the enjoyment of competence and a degree of happiness which was never for an instant the companion of his father's guilty greatness. The cabal of Wallingford, having thus readily and quietly disposed of protector Richard, now saw the necessity of establishing something like a formal government; and the rump parliament, which Oliver Cromwell had so unceremoniously turned out of doors, was invited to restate itself in authority. But upon these thoroughly incapable men the experience of past days was wholly thrown away. Forgetting that the source of their power was the brute force of the army, their very first measures were aimed at lessening the power of the cabal. The latter body perceiving that the parliament proceeded from less to greater proofs of extreme hostility, determined to send it back to the fitting obscurity of private life. Lambert with a large body of troops accordingly went to Westminster. Having completely surrounded the parliament house with his men, the general patiently awaited the arrival of the speaker, Lenthall, and when that personage made his appearance the general ordered the horses of the state carriage to be turned round, and Lenthall was conducted home. The like civility was extended to the various members as they successively made their appearance, and the army proceeded to keep a solemn fast by way of celebrating the annihilation of this disgraceful parliament.

But the triumph of the army was short. If Fleetwood, Lambert, and the other leading officers anticipated the possibility of placing one of themselves in the state of evil pre-eminence occupied by the late protector, they had egregiously erred in overlooking the power and possible inclination of general Monk. This able and politic officer, it will be recollected, had been entrusted by Cromwell with the task of keeping Scotland in subservience to the commonwealth of England. He had an army of upwards of eight thousand veteran troops, and the wisdom and moderation with which he had governed Scotland gave him great moral influence and a proportionate command of pecuniary resources; and when the dismissal of the rump parliament by the army threw the inhabitants of London into alarm lest an absolute military tyranny should succeed, the eyes of all were turned upon Monk, and every one was anxious to know whether he would throw his vast power into this or into that scale.

But "honest George Monk," as his soldiers with affectionate familiarity were wont to term him, was as cool and silent as he was dexterous and resolute. As soon as pended from the gallows, and subsequently buried at its foot. Others of the regicides were proceeded against, and more or less severely punished; but Charles showed no more earnestness in vengeance than in gratitude, and there never, probably, has been so little of punishment inflicted for crime so extensive and so frightful.

Charles, in fact, had but one passion, the love of pleasure; and so long as he could command the means of gratifying that, he, at the commencement of his reign especially, seemed to care but little how his ministers arranged the public affairs. It was, in some degree, happy for the nation that Charles was thus careless; for so excessive was the gladness of the nation's loyalty just at this period, that had Charles been of a sterner and more ambitious character he would have had little or no difficulty in rendering himself an absolute monarch. So evident was the inclination of the commons to go to extremes in order to gratify the king, that one of the ministers, Southampton, seriously contemplated requiring the enormous amount of two millions as the king's annual revenue, a revenue which would have made him wholly independent alike of his people and the law. Fortunately the wise and virtuous lord Clarendon, attached as he was to the royal master whose exile and privations he had faithfully shared, opposed this outrageous wish of Southampton, and the revenue of the king was fixed more moderately, but with a liberality which rendered it impossible for him to feel necessity except as the consequence of the extreme impudence of profusion.

But Charles was one of those persons whom it is almost impossible to preserve free from pecuniary necessity; and he soon became so deeply involved in difficulties, while his love of expensive pleasures remained unabated, that he at once turned his thoughts to marriage as a means of procuring pecuniary aid. Catherine, the infant of Portugal, was at that time, probably, the homeliest princess in Europe. But she was wealthy, her portion amounting to three hundred thousand pounds in money, together with Bombay in the East Indies, and the fortress of Tangier in Africa; and such a portion had too many attractions for the needy and pleasure-loving Charles to allow him to lay much stress upon the infant's want of personal attractions. The duke of Ormond, Southampton, and the able and clear-headed chancellor Clarendon endeavoured to dissuade the king from this match, chiefly on the ground of the infant being but little likely to have children; but Charles was resolute, and the infant became queen of England, an honour which it is to be feared that she dearly purchased, for the numerous mistresses of the king were permitted, if not actually encouraged, to insult her by their familiar presence, and vie with her in luxury obtained at her cost.

against the Dutch. The hostilities were very fiercely carried on by both parties, but after the sacrifice of blood and treasure to an immense amount, the Dutch, by a treaty signed at Breda, procured peace by ceding to England the American colony of New York. Though this colony was justly considered as an important acquisition, the whole terms of the peace were not considered sufficiently honourable to England, and the public mind became much exasperated against Clarendon, who was said to have commenced war unnecessarily, and to have concluded peace disgracefully. Whatever might be the private opinion of Charles, who, probably, had far more than Clarendon to do with the commencement of the war, he showed no desire to shield his minister, whose steadfast and high-principled character had long been so distasteful at court that he had been subjected to the insults of the courtiers and the slights of the king. Under such circumstances the fate of Strafford seemed by no means unlikely to become that of Clarendon, Mr. Seymour bringing seventeen articles of impeachment against him. But Clarendon perceiving the peril in which he was placed, and rightly judging that it was in vain to oppose the popular clamour when that was aided by the ungrateful coldness of the court, went into voluntary exile in France, where he devoted himself to literature.

Freed from the presence of Clarendon, whose rebuke he feared, and whose virtue he admired but could not imitate, Charles now gave the chief direction of public affairs into the hands of certain partakers of his pleasures. Sir Thomas Clifford, lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury, the duke of Buckingham, lord Arlington, and the duke of Lauderdale, were the persons to whom Charles now entrusted his affairs, and from their initials this ministry was known by the title of the CASAL.

A.D. 1670.—The members of the cabal were undoubtedly men of ability; learning, wit, and accomplishment being absolute requisites to the obtaining of Charles's favour. But their's was the ability of courtiers rather than of ministers; they were better fitted to season the pleasures of the prince, than to provide for the security of the throne or the welfare of the people. The public discontent was, consequently, very great; it was but too deeply and widely felt that such a ministry was little likely to put any effectual check upon the profligate pleasures which made the English court at once the gayest and the most vicious court in all Europe.

Nor was it merely from the character of the ministry and the dissipated course of the king that the people felt discontented. The duke of York, the presumptive heir to the throne, though a brave and a high-minded man, was universally believed to be a very bigoted papist; and enough of the puritan spirit still remained to make men dread the possible accession of a papist king.

The alarm and uneasiness that were felt

on this point at length reached to such a height that, in August of this year, as the king was walking in St. James's park, disporting himself with some of the beautiful little dogs of which he was quite troublesomely fond, a chemist, named Kirby, approached his majesty, and warned him that a plot was on foot against him. "Keep, sire," said this person, "within your company; your enemies design to take your life, and you may be shot even in this very walk."

News so startling, and at the same time so consonant with the vague fears and vulgar rumours of the day, naturally led to farther enquiries; and Kirby stated that he had his information from a doctor Tonge, a clergyman, who had assured him that two men, named Grove and Pickering, were engaged to shoot the king, and that the queen's physician, sir George Wakeling, had agreed, if they failed, to put an end to his majesty by poison. The matter was now referred to Danby, the lord treasurer, who sent for doctor Tonge. That person not only showed all readiness to attend, but also produced a bundle of papers relative to the supposed plot. Questioned as to the manner in which he became possessed of these papers, he at first stated that they were thrust under his door, and subsequently that he knew the writer of them, who required his name to be concealed lest he should incur the deadly anger of the jesuits. The reader will do well to remark the gross inconsistency of these two accounts; it is chiefly by the careful noting of such inconsistencies that the wise see through the carefully-woven falsehoods which are so commonly believed by the credulous or the careless. Had the papers really been thrust beneath this man's door, as he at first pretended, how should he know the author? If the author was known to him, to what purpose the stealthy way of forwarding the papers? Charles himself was far too acute a reasoner to overlook this gross inconsistency, and he flatly gave it as his opinion that the whole affair was a clumsy fiction. But Tonge was a tool in the hands of miscreants who would not so readily be disconcerted, and he was now sent again to the lord treasurer Danby, to inform him that a packet of treasonable letters was on its way to the jesuit Bedingfield, the duke of York's confessor. By some chance Tonge gave this information some hours after the duke of York had himself been put in possession of these letters, which he had shown to the king as a vulgar and ridiculous forgery of which he could not discover the drift.

Hitherto all attempts at producing any effect by means of these alleged treasonable designs had failed, and the chief manufacturer of them, Titus Oates, now came forward with a well-feigned unwillingness. This man had from his youth upward been an abandoned character. He had been indicted for gross perjury, and had subsequently been dismissed from the chaplaincy of a man-of-war for a yet more disgraceful crime, and he then professed to be a convert to papacy, and actually was for some time maintained in the English seminary at St. Omer's. Reduced to actual destitution, he seems to have fastened upon Kirby and Tonge, as weak and credulous men, whose very weakness and credulity would make them intrepid in the assertion of such falsehoods as he might choose to instil into their minds. Of his own motives we may form a shrewd guess from the fact that he was supported by the actual charity of Kirby, at a moment when he affected to have the clue to mysteries closely touching the king's life and involving the lives of numerous persons of consequence.

Though vulgar, illiterate, and ruffianly, this man Oates was cunning and daring. Finding that his pretended information was of no avail in procuring himself court favour, he now resolved to see what effect it would have upon the already alarmed and anxious minds of the people. He accordingly went before sir Edmondbury Godfrey, a gentleman in great celebrity for his activity as a magistrate, and desired to make a deposition to the effect that the pope, judging the heresy of the king and people a sufficient ground, had assumed the sovereignty of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and had condemned the king to death as a heretic; the death to be inflicted by Grove and Pickering, who were to shoot him with silver bullets. The jesuits and the pope having thus disposed of the king, whom, according to this veridical deposition, they styled the black bastard, the crown was to be offered to the duke of York on the condition that he should wholly extirpate the protestant religion; but if the duke refused to comply with that condition, then James, too, was to go to pot.

The mere vulgarity of this deposition might have led the people to imply its falsehood; for whatever might be the other faults of the jesuits, they were not, as educated men, at all likely to use the style of speech which so coarse and illiterate a wretch as Oates attributed to them. But popular terror not uncommonly produces, temporarily at least, a popular madness; and the at once atrocious and clumsy falsehoods of this man, whose very destitution was the consequence of revolting crimes, were accepted by the people as irrefragable evidence, and he was himself hailed and caressed as the friend and protector of protestantism and protestants! Before the council he repeatedly and most grossly contradicted himself, but the effect his statements had upon the public mind was such, that it was deemed necessary to order the apprehension of the principal persons named as being cognizant of this plot, among whom were several jesuits, and Coleman, secretary to the duke of York.

A singular circumstance now occurred which gives but too much reason to fear that perjury was by no means the worst of the crimes to which Oates resorted to procure the success of his vile scheme. Sir

Edmondbury Godfrey, the magistrate who first gave Oates importance by allowing him to reduce his lying statements into a formal and regular deposition, was suddenly missed from his house, and, after a lapse of several days, found barbarously murdered in a ditch at Primrose-hill, near London. No sooner was this known than the people rushed to the conclusion that sir Edmond-bury had been murdered by the jesuits, in revenge for the willingness he had shown to receive the information of Oates. But looking at the desperate character of the latter, does it not seem far more probable that he caused the murder of the credulous magistrate, trusting that it would have the very effect which it did produce upon the credulous people? Be that as it may, the discovery of the deceased gentleman's body frightfully increased the public agitation; the corpse was carried in procession by seventy clergymen, and no one who valued his personal safety ventured to hint that the murder might probably not have been the work of the detested jesuits.

From the mere vulgar, the alarm and agitation soon spread to the better informed classes, and at length it was moved in parliament that a solemn fast should be appointed, that the house should have all papers that were calculated to throw a light upon the horrid plot, that all known papists should be ordered to quit London, and all unknown or suspicious persons forbidden to present themselves at court, and that the train bands of London and Westminster should be kept in instant readiness for action! The miscreant whose falsehoods had raised all this alarm and anxiety was thanked by parliament and recommended to the favour of the king, who conferred upon him a pension of twelve hundred pounds per annum, and a residence in Whitehall. Such reward bestowed upon such a character and for such "public services" naturally produced a rival for public favour, and a fellow named William Bedloe now made his appearance in the character of informer. He was of even lower origin and more infamous note than Oates, having been repeatedly convicted of theft. Being at Bristol and in a state of destitution, he at his own request was arrested and sent to London. When examined before the council he stated that he had seen the body of the murdered sir Edmondbury Godfrey at the then residence of the queen, Somerset-house, and that a servant of the lord Bellasis had offered him four thousand pounds to carry it off and conceal it! Improbable as the tale was it was greedily received, and the ruffians, Oates and Bedloe, finding that credit was given to whatever they chose to assert, now ventured a step farther, and accused the queen of being an accomplice in all the evil doings and designs of the jesuits. The house of commons, to its great disgrace, addressed the king in support of this scandalous attack upon his already but too unhappy queen; but the lords, with better judgment and more manly feeling, rejected the accusation with the utter contempt which it merited.

The conjunction of two such intrepid perjurers as Oates and Bedloe was ominous indeed to the unfortunate persons whom they accused; and it is but little to the credit of the public men of that day that they did not interfere to prevent any prisoner being tried upon their evidence as to the fabled plot, until the public mind should have been allowed a reasonable time in which to recover from its heat and exacer-bation. No such delay was even proposed, and while cunning was still triumphant and credulity still agape, Edward Coleman, the duke of York's secretary, was put upon his trial. Here, as before the council, Oates and Bedloe, though inconsistent with each other, and each with himself, yet agreed in their main statements, that Coleman had not only agreed to the assassination of the king but had even, as his reward for so doing, received a commission, signed by the superior of the jesuits, appointing him papal secretary of state of these kingdoms. Coleman, who behaved with equal modesty and firmness, utterly denied all the guilt that was laid to his charge. But he could not prove a negative, and his mere denial availed nothing against the positive swearing of the informers. He was condemned to death; and then several members of both houses of parliament offered to interpose to procure him the king's pardon on condition that he would make a full confession. But the unfortunate gentleman was innocent, and was far too high-minded to save his life by falsely accusing himself and others. He still firmly denied his guilt, and, to the eternal disgrace of Charles, was executed.

The blood of Coleman satiated neither the informers nor the public. Pickering, Grove, and Ireland were next put upon their trial, condemned, and executed. That they were innocent we have no doubt; but they were jesuits, and that was sufficient to blunt all sympathy with their fate.

Hill, Green, and Berry were now charged with being the actual murderers of sir Edmondbury Godfrey. In this case the information, which was laid by Bedloe, was wholly irreconcilable with the evidence which was given by a fellow named France, and there was good evidence that was at variance with them both. But the prisoners were found guilty and executed, all three in their dying moments professing their innocence. As Berry was a protestant this made some impression upon the minds of the more reasonable, but the public mind was not even prepared to be disabused.

Whitbread, provincial of the jesuits, and Gavan, Fenwick, Turner, and Harcourt, brethren of the same order, were next tried. In addition to Oates and Bedloe, a wretch named Dugdale appeared against these prisoners, and, in addition to and in support of the incredible and monstrous lies of Oates and Bedloe, he deliberately swore that there were two hundred thousand papists at that very moment ready to take arms. And yet the alleged leaders and instigators of this huge army of armed and malignant papists were daily being brought to trial, condemned, and butchered, under the guard of a score or two constables! But reasoning could not possibly be of any avail in that veritable reign of terror, for even direct and sworn evidence in favour of accused persons was treated with contempt. For instance, on this very trial sixteen witnesses proved that they and Oates were together in the seminary of St. Omer's on the very day in which that ruffian's testimony had stated him to have been in London. But these witnesses were papists, their evidence received not the slightest attention, and the unfortunate prisoners were condemned and executed, protesting in their last moments their entire innocence of the crimes laid to their charge.

Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, was now brought to trial, but was more fortunate than the persons previously accused. The vile informers, it is true, swore with their accustomed and dauntless fluency; but to have convicted sir George would, under all the circumstances of the case, have inferred the guilt of the queen. The judge and jury were probably apprehensive that even the culpable and cruel indolence of Charles would not allow the prevalent villany to proceed to that extent, and sir George was honourably acquitted.

A.D. 1672.—For upwards of two years the horrible falsehoods of Oates had deluded the mind of the public, and shed the blood of the innocent. But he and his abominable associate were not yet weary of evil doing. Hitherto the victims had been chiefly priests and scholars, to whose title of jesuits the vulgar attributed every thing that was most dangerous and terrible. But as if to show that rank the most eminent and age the most revered were as worthless in their eyes as the pious and learning of sincere, however erroneous, religionists, the informing miscreants now brought forward a last victim in the person of the earl of Stafford. The fiercest wild beast is not fiercer or more utterly unreasoning than a deluded and enraged multitude. The cry against the venerable earl of Stafford was even louder than it had been against the former prisoners. Oates positively swore that he saw one of the jesuits who had lately been condemned, Fenwick, deliver to the earl of Stafford a commission signed by the general of the jesuits, constituting the earl paymaster-general of the jesuit or papal army. It was in vain that the venerable nobleman protested his innocence, and pointed out the improbability of his feeble age being concerned in plots; he was condemned to be hanged and quartered. Charles changed the sentence to beheading, and the earl suffered accordingly upon Tower-hill.

The parliament, which had now sat seventeen years, was dissolved, but a new one was called, which will ever be memorable on account of one law which it passed; we allude to the invaluable habeas corpus act. By this act the gaoler who is summoned must have or produce the body of a prisoner in court and certify the cause of his detention, within three days if within twenty miles of the judge, and so on for greater distances; no prisoner to be sent to prison beyond sea; every prisoner to be indicted the first term after commitment and tried in the next term, and no man to be recommitted for the same offence after being enlarged by court; heavy penalties upon any judge refusing any prisoner his writ of habeas corpus. Human wisdom could scarcely devise a more effectual safeguard to the subject than this act. On the other hand, it can never be perilous to the throne, because in times of sedition or violence parliament can suspend the execution of this act for a short and definite time, at the end of which time this great safeguard of our liberties returns to its full force.

The criminal and disgraceful complaisance with which the government had allowed the perjured informers to flourish unchecked, caused a new plot to discover to present himself in the person of a worthy, named Dangerfield, whose previous life had been diversified by experience of the pillory, the scourge, the branding iron, and a residence, as a convict, in the plantations. This fellow, in conjunction with a midwife of bad character, named Collier, came forward to denounce a plot, of which he alleged the existence, for removing the king and the royal family and setting up a new form of government. This fellow took his information direct to the king and the duke of York, who weakly, if we must not rather say wickedly, supplied him with money, and thus patronized and encouraged him in his evil course. Determined to make the most of his fortune, Dangerfield deposited some writings of a most seditious character in the house of a military officer named Mansel. Having so placed the papers that they were certain to be discovered by any one searching the apartments, Dangerfield, without saying a word about the papers, went to the custom-house and sent officers to Mansel's to search for smuggled goods. There were no such goods there, as Dangerfield well knew, but, exactly as he had anticipated, the officers found the concealed papers, examined them, and felt it to be their duty to lay them before the council. Either Dangerfield was already suspected, or something in the papers themselves indicated forgery; for the council were so convinced that the documents were Dangerfield's own production, that they issued an order that a strict search should immediately be made in all places which he had been known to frequent. In the course of the search the house of the midwife Collier was visited, and there, concealed in a meat-tub, the officers found a paper which contained the whole scheme of the conspiracy to the most minute particulars. Upon this discovery the wretch Dangerfield was sent to Newgate, where he made a "confession," which probably was as false as the former statement that he had made, for he now represented that to the lying tale he had formerly told he had been instigated by the countess of Powis, the earl of Castlemain, and others. And though it was so much more probable that the miscreant had all along lied from his own invention and in his own greediness of gain, the earl and countess were actually sent to the Tower.

A.D. 1673.—THE BODIES OF EDWARD V. AND HIS BROTHER, WHO WERE MURDERED BY RICHARD III., DISCOVERED UNDER SOME STAIRS IN THE TOWER.

A.D. 1675.—THE ROBBERY OF EDWARD V. AND HIS BROTHER, WHO WERE MURDERED BY RICHARD III., DISCOVERED UNDER SOME STAIRS IN THE TOWER.

What has always made us attach deep blame and disgrace to Charles's conduct in allowing so many innocent lives to be sacrificed to the venal cruelty of informers, is the fact, that while the informers attributed plots to the jesuits, and stated the object of those plots to be the setting up of the papist duke of York in the place of the king, Charles knew, must necessarily have known, that the jesuits were a mere handful as compared to the protestants, and that the very last man whom either protestant or papist throughout England would have substituted for the easy, though profligate Charles, was James, duke of York. In Scotland James had made himself perfectly hated, and both the English parliament and the English people every year gave new and stronger proof of the dread with which they contemplated even the possibility of the accession of James. In the war with the Dutch he had shown himself a brave and skilful officer, but his gloomy temper, his stern unsparring disposition, and the bigotry which he was universally known to possess, made courage and military conduct, however admirable in other men, in him only two terrors the more. Charles well knew this; so well, that when James one day warned him against exposing himself too much while so many plots and rumours of plots disturbed the general mind, Charles, as gallantly truly replied "Tilly vally, James! There be none so silly as to shoot me in order to make you king!" This unpopularity of James led to more than one attempt on the part of the house of commons to procure the exclusion of him from the throne on the ground of his being a papist. The new parliament had scarcely sat a week ere it renewed a bill, termed the exclusion bill, which the former house had voted, but which had not passed the upper house at the time of the dissolution of parliament. The party of the duke, though influential, was numerically weak out of doors; for besides those who hated him as a papist, and dreaded him as a stern disciplinarian, there were great numbers who hoped that the exclusion of the duke would procure the throne for the duke of Monmouth, the handsome and highly popular son of the king by one of his numerous mistresses, named Lucy Waters. But the influence of the king was powerful in the house, and after a long debate, not too temperately conducted upon either side, the exclusion bill was thrown out by a rather considerable majority.

With informers and "plots," libellous pamphlets had increased in number to an extent that could scarcely be credited. Each party seemed to think that the hardest words and the most severe imputations were only too mild for its opponents, and the hired libeller now vied in industry and importance with the venal and perjured informer.

An idle and profligate fellow, a sort of led captain in the pay of the king's profligate mistress, the duchess of Portsmouth, was employed to procure her the piquant libels which were occasionally published upon the king and the duke of York. This man not finding the existent libels sufficiently abusive, determined to surpass them, and he called to his aid a Scotchman named Everard. Between them they composed a most rancorous and scurrilous libel, which Fitzharris hastened to get printed. But the Scotchman, Everard, imagined that his Irish fellow-libeller, as a hanger on of the king's mistress, could have had no possible motive for employing him but the wish to betray him. Indignant at the supposed design, Everard went and laid information before sir William Waller, a justice of the peace, and Fitzharris was apprehended with a copy of the libel actually in his possession. Finding himself placed in considerable peril of the pillory, Fitzharris, who, be it observed, was an Irish papist, turned round upon the court, and stated, not without some appearance of truth, that he had been employed by the court to write a libel so foul and violent, that the exclusion party, to whom it would be attributed, would be injured in the estimation of all people of sober judgment. In order to render this tale still more palatable to the exclusionists, Fitzharris added to it that a new popish plot, more terrible than any former one, was in agitation under the auspices of the duke of York, whom he also accused of being one of the contrivers of the murder of sir Edmondbury Godfrey. The king sent Fitzharris to prison; the commons, instead of looking with contempt upon the whole affair, voted that this hired libeller and led captain to a court harlot should be impeached! It was so obvious that the real intention of the commons was to screen Fitzharris from punishment altogether, that the lords very properly rejected the impeachment. An angry feeling sprang up between the two houses; and the king, to prevent the dispute from proceeding to any dangerous length, went down and dissolved parliament, with the fixed determination of never calling another.

Charles now, in fact, ruled with all the power and with not a little of the tyranny of an absolute monarch. He encouraged spies and informers, and imprisoned those who ventured to complain of his measures in a manner not only contrary to his former temper but almost indicative, as was well remarked at the time, of reconciling the people to the prospect of his brother's accession by making his own rule too grievous to be endured. To those who held high church principles, and professed his doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, all the royal favour was shown; while the presbyterians and other sturdy opposers of his arbitrary measures were in numerous cases deprived of their places and employments, and in some cases imprisoned into the bargain. The city of London, so powerful and so factious during the reign of Charles I., was now made to feel the king's resentment, being, for its leadership of the popular party, deprived of its charter, which was not restored until an abject submission had been made, and a most vexatious right conceded to the crown of interfering in the election of the city magistrates. Fitzharris, who had been so warmly sided with by the exclusionists, and who had been the chief cause of Charles's angry and final dissolution of parliament, was now by the king's order brought to trial before a jury, and, being pronounced guilty, executed! An abominable stretch of power; for however worthless and debauched a fellow he might be, his crime, venal as it was, amounted to but libellous writing, for even the publication was scarcely so much his own act as it was the act of the officers who arrested him.

The popular party now found the poisoned chalice commended to their own lips. Hitherto, while it seemed not improbable that the parliament and the "patriots" would obtain power over the king, the great and degraded host of spies and informers had aimed at the ruin of "papists" and "jeuists." But now that the king had as boldly as arbitrarily dispensed with even the shadow of parliamentary aid, and ruled as independently and almost as arbitrarily as an eastern prince, the spies and informers turned upon those who had formerly encouraged if not actually employed them, and "presbyterian" was now pretty nearly as dangerous a title as "papist" had been; "protestant preacher" scarcely more safe than "jeuist" had been heretofore. Charles and his ministry encouraged the informers, and the system of perjury lost none of its infamy and villainy; it merely aimed at a different class of victims.

A joiner of London, by name Stephen College, had made himself especially conspicuous during the heats and alarms of the anti-papery crisis. Loud of tongue, and somewhat weak of brain, this man, with more zeal than knowledge, had taken upon himself to advocate protestantism, which needed none of his aid, and to oppose popery, which such opposition as his could not possibly affect. He had attended the city members to Oxford armed with pistols and sword, had been in the habit of railing against the king, the duke of York and papacy, and, rather, in derision than in distinction, had acquired the title of the protestant joiner. This weak man, whose flights were fitting matter for the ministering of the physician, rather than for the interference of the law, was selected by the ministry as a fit subject of whom to make an example. He was indicted and found guilty of sedition, and, to the disgrace of both king and ministers, executed.

A. D. 1693.—The increasing power and severity of Charles and his ministry struck a panic throughout the nation. The manner in which the city of London had been deprived of its charter, and the humiliating terms upon which that once powerful corporation had got its charter restored, soon caused the other corporations to surrender their charters voluntarily; and not only were considerable sums extorted for their restoration, but the king took care to reserve in his own hands the power of appointing to all offices of trust and profit. That patronage which was thus discreditably obtained was so enormous, that the power of the crown became overwhelmingly vast, and, with but a few exceptions, men agreed that resistance, even if justifiable, would now be useless and helpless.

But there was a party of malcontent—weak as to number, but vigorous, influential, and bold; and absolute as Charles was, and unassailable as to most people his power must have seemed, his life, even, was, at this time, in a most imminent peril.

The soul of the malcontents was the earl of Shaftesbury. That highly gifted but turbulent and plot-loving person had engaged with the duke of Monmouth, the earl of Macclesfield, lord William Russell, and several other noblemen, to rise nominally in favour of freedom, but really to dethrone Charles; exclude, if not slay, James; and place the crown upon the head of the duke of Monmouth, the king's natural son. The earl of Macclesfield, lord Brandon and others, were to effect a rising in Cheshire and Lancashire; sir Francis Drake, sir Francis Rowles, and sir William Courtney were induced by lord William Russell to head the insurrection in Devon, and generally in the west; and Shaftesbury aided by Ferguson, a preacher of the independents, undertook to effect a general rising in the city of London, where the discontent and disloyalty, owing to the affair of the charter, were at the greatest height. Shaftesbury urged on the plot with all his energy, and it is most probable that the kingdom would have been plunged into all the confusion and horror of a civil war if the extreme eagerness of Shaftesbury had not been counteracted by the extreme caution of lord William Russell, who, when every thing was nearly ready for an outbreak, urged the duke of Monmouth to postpone the enterprise until a more favourable opportunity. The usually enterprising and turbulent Shaftesbury now became so prostrated by a sense of the danger in which he was placed by this postponement, that he abandoned his house and endeavoured to induce the Londoners to rise without waiting for the tardy co-operation of the provinces; but all his endeavours were unavailing, and in his despair he fled to Holland, where he soon afterwards died broken-hearted and in poverty.

The conspirators, being thus freed from the turbulent Shaftesbury, formed a committee of six; Hampden, grandson to the Hampden who made so much opposition to the ship money, Algernon Sidney, Howard, Essex, and lord William Russell; Monmouth being their grand leader and centre of correspondence, his chief adviser, how-over, being the duke of Argyle. There were numerous subordinates in this conspiracy; and it is affirmed, by the friends of the memory of lord William Russell, that he and the leaders did not encourage and were not even perfectly cognisant of the more atrocious part of the plan of those conspirators who had agreed to assassinate the king on his way to Newmarket. We confess that it appears to us to be making a large demand indeed upon our credulity to suppose any thing of the kind, but we have not space to go into the arguments which might be adduced in favour of the supposition that, however willing the chief conspirators might be to leave the horrible crime of assassination to subordinates, they were at least quite willing that such crime should be perpetrated to the profit of their main design.

The plan of the conspirators against the life of the king was to secrete themselves on a farm belonging to one of them, the Rye-house, situated on the road to Newmarket, overturn a cart there to obstruct the royal carriage, and then deliberately fire upon the king. After much consultation it was determined to carry this dastardly plot into execution on the king's return from Newmarket. About a week before the time at which his majesty was to do so, the house in which he resided at Newmarket took fire, and he was obliged to remove to London. This circumstance would merely have postponed the "fate" of his majesty, but in the course of the time that was thus lost to the conspirators, one of their number, named Keiling, found himself in danger of prosecution for having arrested the lord mayor of London, and to save himself from the consequences he waited upon the king's ministers and revealed all that he knew of the plot against the king, and colonel Rumsey and a lawyer named West joined him in becoming king's evidence. Monmouth and Grey escaped, lord William Russell was apprehended and sent to the Tower, as, shortly afterwards, were Essex, Sidney, and Hampden, together with lord Howard, who was found in a chimney. That ignoble nobleman, though fully as guilty as the rest, immediately agreed to save his own recreant life by becoming evidence against his former associates, who seemed more indignant and disgusted at that treachery than affected by the peril in which it placed them.

Colonel Walcot, an old republican officer, together with Stone and Rouse, were first put upon trial, and condemned upon the evidence of their former associates, colonel Rumsey and the lawyer West.

Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney were condemned chiefly on the evidence of lord Howard. In the case of Sidney, however, the evidence of Howard was most unconstitutionally eked out by construing as treasonable certain writings, merely speculative, though of republican tendency, which were seized at his house. Both Russell and Sidney were condemned and executed. Hampden was more fortunate, and escaped with a fine of forty thousand pounds. Holloway, a merchant of Bristol, who had been engaged in this dastardly conspiracy, escaped to the West Indies; and sir Thomas Armstrong, who was similarly situated, escaped to Holland. But so eagerly vindictive had Charles and his ministry by this time been rendered by the numerous plots, real and pretended, that both of those persons were brought over to England and executed. Lord Essex would also probably have been executed, but being imprisoned in the Tower he there committed suicide by cutting his throat.

Judging from the severity with which Charles proceeded on this occasion, it is but reasonable to presume he would either have carried his despotism to a frightful pitch, or have fallen a victim to the equally unjustifiable violence of some malcontent. But his naturally fine constitution was now completely broken up by his long and furious course of dissipation, and a fit of apoplexy seized him, from which he was but partially recovered by bleeding; he expired in the fifty-fifth year of his age and the twenty-fifth of his reign.

Much might be said in dispraise of Charles, both as man and monarch; but impartial justice demands that we should make a great allowance for the unfavourable circumstances under which the best years of his youth and manhood were spent. Poverty for months, poverty so extreme that he and his followers were at times without a single coin and owed their very food to the kindness of their hosts, was occasionally followed by a temporary plenty; and his companions were, for the most part, precisely the persons to encourage him in every extravagance to which so wretchedly precarious a life was calculated to induce him. Even the cruelty and despotism of his latter years visibly had their chief cause in the political villainy and violence of considerable bodies of his people. No such excuse can be made for his extravagant liberality to his numerous mistresses; and for the wholly cruel and mean treatment he bestowed upon his wife we know of no decorous epithet that is sufficiently severe.

That Charles was not naturally of a cruel, or even of a sufficiently severe turn, a remarkable proof is afforded by the story of a ruffian named Blood; a story so singular, that we think it necessary to give it by way of appendix to this reign. Blood, who had served in Ireland, had, or fancied that he had, considerable claims upon the government, and being refused satisfaction by the duke of Ormond, he actually waylaid and seized that nobleman on his return from an evening party in London, and would have hanged him but for the occurrence of a mere accident which enabled the duke to escape. A desperado of this sort could not fail to be in frequent trouble and distress; and he at length was reduced to such extreme straits, that with some of his associates he formed a plan for purloining the regalia from the jewel-house in the Tower. He contrived to ingratiate himself with the old couple who had charge of the valuable jewels, and took an opportunity to blind both the man and woman and make off with all the most valuable articles. Though fired at by the sentry he got clear as far as Tower-hill, where he was apprehended after a desperate struggle. So enormous an outrage, it might have been anticipated, would be expiated only by the severest punishment; but the king not only forgave Blood, but even gave him a considerable annual pension to enable him to live without farther criminality. A rare proof of the native easiness of the king's temper! Though it must be added that the duke of Buckingham, who detested Ormond, was on that account supposed to have used his vast influence in favour of Blood.

CHAPTER LV.

The Reign of James II.

A.D. 1685.—THE somewhat ostentatious manner in which the duke of York had been accustomed to go to mass, during the life of his brother, had been one great cause of the general dislike in which he was held. Even Charles, giddy and careless as he in general was, saw the imprudence of James's conduct, and significantly told him on one occasion that he had no desire to go upon his travels again, whatever James might wish. On ascending the throne, the first, very first act of James was one of an honest but most imprudent bigotry. Incapable of reading the signs of the times, or fully prepared to dare the worst that those signs could portend, James immediately sent his agent, Caryl, to Rome, to apologize to the pope for the long and flagrant heresy of England, and to endeavour to procure the re-admission of the English people into the communion of the catholic church. The pope was either less blind or more politic than James, and returned him a very cool answer, implying that before he ventured upon so arduous an enterprise as that of changing the professed faith of nearly his entire people, he would do well to sit down and calculate the cost. Even this grave and sensible rebuke did not deter James from exerting himself both by fear and favour to make proselytes of his subjects. Hated as he already was, such conduct could not fail to encourage conspiracies against him, and, accordingly, he had not been long seated upon the throne, when he found a dangerous rival in the duke of Monmouth. This illegitimate son of Charles II. had obtained, from the easy nature of his father, a pardon for his share in the Rye-house plot, which was fatal to so many better men; but had received his pardon only on condition of perpetual residence abroad. He remained in Holland during the whole remainder of his father's reign, but on the accession of James was dismissed by the prince of Orange. This dismissal was said to be at the direct solicitation of James, who bore a great hatred to Monmouth; if so, the act was as impolitic as it was mean. The duke now found refuge for a short time at Brussels, but here again the influence of James was brought to bear upon him; and Monmouth now, thoroughly exasperated, and relying upon the detestation in which James was held, resolved to make an attempt to oust him from the English throne. At this distance of time such a project on the part of Monmouth seems perfectly insane; but it will seem far less so if we make due allowance for the widely-spread and intense hatred which the people bore to James, and for the great popularity of Monmouth, whom many people believed to be the legitimate son of Charles, it being commonly affirmed that Charles had privately married Lucy Waters, the duke's mother.

The duke of Argyle, who, as well as Monmouth, had escaped the consequences of the Rye-house plot, now agreed to aid him; it was intended that Argyle should raise Scotland, while Monmouth was to take the lead in the west of England, where he was peculiarly popular.

Argyle promptly commenced his part of the affair by landing in Scotland, where he soon found himself at the head of an army of two thousand five hundred men. He issued manifestoes containing the usual mixture of truth and falsehood, but before his eloquence could procure him any considerable accession of force he was attacked by a powerful body of the king's troops. Argyle himself fought gallantly, and was severely wounded; but his troops soon gave way in every direction, and the duke was shortly afterwards seized, while standing up to his neck in a pool of water, and carried to Edinburgh. Here the authorities and populace, with the small spite of mean spirits, avenged themselves, by the infliction of every description of indignity, for the fright their brave though turbulent and imprudent prisoner had caused them. On his way to the place of execution he was jeered and insulted by the rabble; and the magistrates suspended to his neck a book containing an account of his former exploits. These insults, however, nothing affected the high spirit of Argyle, who contented himself with sarcastically telling his persecutors that he deemed it well that they had nothing worse to allege against his character. He suffered with the same composure.

Monmouth, in the mean time, with scarcely more than a hundred followers, landed on the coast of Dorsetshire; and we may judge of the greatness of his popularity from the fact, that though he landed with so slender a retinue, he assembled upwards of two thousand men in four days. As he proceeded to Taunton he increased his force to six thousand, and could have had double that number, only that he was obliged after the first few days to refuse all but such as could bring their own arms with them.

At Bridgewater, Wells, and Frome he was joined by great numbers of young men, the sons, chiefly, of the better sort of farmers; and such was the enthusiasm that was now excited on his behalf, that James began, and with good reason, to tremble for his throne. But Monmouth was essentially unequal to the vast enterprise that he had undertaken. Though he had much of his father's personal courage, he had still more of his father's levity and love of show and gaiety. At every town in which he arrived he spent precious time in the idle ceremony of being proclaimed king, and thus frittered away the enthusiasm and hopes of his own followers, while giving time to James to concentrate force enough to crush him at a blow. Nor did the error of Monmouth end here. Lord Gray was the especial favourite of the duke, and was therefore deemed the fittest man to be entrusted with the command of the insurgent cavalry; though it was well known that he was deficient in judgment, and strongly suspected that he was not overburthened, with either courage or seal. Fletcher of Saltoun, a brave and direct, though passionate and free-spoken man, strongly remonstrated with the duke upon this glaringly impolitic appointment, and finding his remonstrances productive of no effect, retired from the expedition in disgust. Even the loss of this zealous though stern friend did not move the duke, who continued his confidence to Gray,—to repent when repentance could be of no avail.

While Monmouth had been wasting very precious time in these idle mockeries of royal pomp, James and his friends had been far otherwise and more usefully employed. Six British regiments were recalled from Holland, and three thousand regulars with a vast number of militia were sent, under Feversham and Churchill, to attack the rebels. The royal force took up its position at Sedgemoor, near Bridgwater. They were, or seemed to be, so carelessly posted, that Monmouth determined to give them the attack. The first onset of the rebels was so enthusiastic that the royal infantry gave way. Monmouth was rather strong in cavalry, and a single good charge of that force would now have decided the day in his favour. But Gray fully confirmed all the suspicions of his cowardice, and, while all were loudly calling upon him to charge, he actually turned his horse's head and fled from the field, followed by the greater number of his men. Whatever were the previous errors of the royal commanders, they now amply atoned for them by the prompt and able manner in which they availed themselves of Monmouth's want of generalship and Gray's want of manhood. The rebels were charged in flank again and again, and being utterly unaided by their cavalry, were thrown into complete and irretrievable disorder, after a desperate fight of above three hours. It is due to the rebel troops to add, that the courage which they displayed was worthy of a better cause and better leaders. Rank after rank fell and died on the very spot on which they had fought; but commanded as they were, valour was thrown away and devotion merely another term for destruction.

But the real horrors of this insurrection only began when the battle was ended. Hundreds were slain in the pursuit; quarter, by the stern order of James, being invariably refused. A special commission was also issued for the trial of all who were taken prisoners, and judge Jeffreys and colonel Kirk, the latter a soldier of fortune who had served much among the Moors and become thoroughly brutalized, carried that commission into effect in a manner which has rendered their names eternally detestable.

The terror which these brutally severe men inspired so quickened the zeal of the authorities, and afforded so much encouragement to informers, whether actuated by hate or hire, that the prisons all over England, but especially in the western counties, were speedily filled with unfortunate people of both sexes and of all ages. In some towns the prisoners were so numerous, that even the brutal ferocity of Jeffreys was wearied of trying in detail. Intimation was therefore given to great numbers of prisoners, that their only chance of mercy rested upon their pleading guilty; but all the unfortunate wretches who were thus beguiled into that plea were instantly and en masse sentenced to death by Jeffreys, who took care, too, that the sentence should speedily be executed.

The fate of one venerable lady excited great remark and commiseration even in that terrible time of general dismay and widely spread suffering. The lady in question, Mrs. Gaunt, a person of some fortune, known loyalty, and excellent character, was induced by sheer humanity to give shelter to one of the fugitives from Sedgemoor. It being understood that the sheltered would be pardoned on condition of giving evidence against those who had dared to shelter them, this base and ungrateful man informed against his benefactress, who was inhumanly sentenced to death by Jeffreys, and actually executed. Kirk, too, was guilty of the most enormous and filthy cruelties, and it seemed doubtful whether Jeffreys and his stern master intended only to intimidate the people of England into submission, or actually and fully to exterminate them.

Monmouth, whose rash enterprise and unjustified ambition had caused so much confusion and bloodshed, rode from the fatal field of Sedgemoor at so rapid a pace, that at about twenty miles distance his horse fell dead beneath him. The duke had now of all his numerous followers but one left with him, a German nobleman. Monmouth being in a desolate part of the country, and at so considerable a distance from the scene of battle and bloodshed, entertained some hope that he might escape by means of disguise, and meeting with a poor shepherd, he gave the man some gold to exchange clothes with him. He and his German friend now filled their pockets with field peas, and, provided only with this wretched food, proceeded, towards night-fall, to conceal themselves among the tall fern which grew rankly and abundantly on the surrounding moors. But the pursuers and avengers of blood were not so far distant as the misguided duke supposed. A party of horse, having followed closely in his track, came up with the peasant with whom he had exchanged clothes, and from this man's information the duke was speedily discovered and dragged from his hiding-place. His miserable plight and the horrors of the fate that he but too correctly anticipated, had now so completely unmanned him, that he burst into an agony of tears, and in the most humble manner implored his captors to allow him to escape. But the reward offered for his apprehension was too tempting, and the dread of the king's anger too great, to be overcome by the unhappy captive's solicitations, and he was hurried to prison. Even now his clinging to life prevailed over the manifest dictates of common-sense, and from his prison he sent letter after letter to the king, filled with the most abject entreaties to be allowed to live. The natural character of James and the stern severity with which he had punished the rebellion of the meane offenders, might have warned Monmouth that these degrading submissions would avail him nothing. But, in fact, his own absurdly offensive manner during his brief period of anticipative triumph would have steeled the heart of a far more placable sovereign than James. Monmouth's proclamations had not stopped at calling upon the people of England to rebel against their undoubtedly rightful sovereign; they had in a manner, which would have been revolting if the very excess of its virulence had not rendered it absurd, vilified the personal character of James; and while thus offending him as a man, had at the same time offered him the still more unpardonable offence of attacking his religion. James had none of the magnanimity which in these circumstances of personal affront would have found an argument for pardoning the treason, in order to avoid even the appearance of punishing the personality; and from the moment that Monmouth was captured, his fate was irrevocably sealed.

Bad as Monmouth's conduct had been, it is not without contempt that we read that James, though determined not to spare him, allowed him to hope for mercy, and even granted him an interview. Admitted to the presence of the king, Monmouth was weak enough to renew in person the abject submissions and solicitations by which he had already degraded himself in writing. As he knelt and implored his life, James sternly handed him a paper. It contained an admission of his illegitimacy, and of the utter falsehood of the report that Lucy Waters had ever been married to Charles II. Monmouth signed the paper; and James then coldly told him that his repeated treasons rendered pardon altogether out of the question. The duke now at length perceived that hope was at an end, rose from his supplicant posture, and left the apartment with an assumed firmness in his step and an assumed scorn in his countenance.

When led to the scaffold Monmouth behaved with a degree of fortitude that could scarcely have been anticipated from his previous abjectness. Having learned that the executioner was the same who had beheaded lord William Russell, and who had put that nobleman to much agony, the duke gave the man some money, and good-humouredly warned him to be more expert in his business on the present occasion. The warning had an effect exactly opposite to what Monmouth intended. The man was so confused, that at the first blow he only wounded that sufferer's neck; and Monmouth, bleeding and ghastly with pain and terror, raised his head from the block. His look of agony still farther unnerved the man, who made two more ineffectual strokes, then threw down the axe in despair and disgust. The reproaches and threats of the sheriff, however, caused him to resume his revolting task, which at two strokes more he completed, and James, duke of Monmouth was a lifeless corpse. Monmouth was popular, and therefore his fate was deemed hard. But his treason was wholly unjustifiable, his pretended claim to the crown as absurdly groundless as the claim of the son of a known harlot could be; and pity is far less due to his memory than to that of the unfortunate people whom he deluded into treason by his incapacity and obstinacy. Saying nothing of the vast numbers who fell in actual fight or in the subsequent pursuit, for their fate was at the least, comparatively, enviable, upwards of twenty were hanged by the military; and Jefferies hanged eighty at Dorchester, and two hundred and fifty at Taunton, Wells, and Exeter. At other places still farther victims were made; and whipping, imprisonment, or ruinous fines were inflicted upon hundreds in every part of the kingdom. And all this misery, let us not forget, arose out of the rebellion and the fraudulent as well as absurd pretensions of the duke of Monmouth.

As though the civil dissensions of the kingdom had not been sufficiently injurious, the most furious animosities existed on the score of religion. The more James displayed his bigotry and his zeal for the re-establishment, or, at the least, the great encouragement and preference of popery, the more zealously was he opposed by the popular preachers, who lost no opportunity of impressing upon the people a deep sense of the evils which they might anticipate from a return to the papal system. The terrors and the blandishments which the king by turns employed caused many persons of lax conscience to affect to be converted to papacy. Dr. Sharpe, a protestant clergyman of London, distinguished himself by the just severity with which he denounced these time-servers. His majesty was so much annoyed and enraged at the doctor's sermons, that he issued an order to the bishop of London to suspend Sharpe from his clerical functions until farther notice. The bishop very properly refused to comply with this arbitrary and unconstitutional order. The king then determined to include the bishop in his punishment, and issued an ecclesiastical commission, giving to the seven persons to whom it was directed an unlimited power in matters clerical. Before the commissioners thus authorized both the bishop and Dr. Sharpe were summoned, and sentenced to be suspended during the king's pleasure.

Though a bigot, James was undoubtedly a sincere one. He readily believed that all argument would end in favour of popery, and that all sincere and teachable spirits would become papists if full latitude were given to teaching.

In this belief he now determined on a universal indulgence of conscience, and a formal declaration informed the people that all sectaries should have full indulgence, and that nonconformity was no longer a crime. He again, too, sent a message to Rome offering to reconcile his people to the papal power. But the earl of Castlemain, who was now employed, met with no more success than Cayll had met with at an earlier period of the king's reign. The pope understood governing better than James, and better understood the actual temper of the English people. He knew that much might, with the aid of time, be done in the way of undermining the supports of the protestant church; while the rash and arbitrary measures of James were calculated only to awaken the people to watchfulness and inspire them with a spirit of resistance.

Not even Rome could discourage James from prosecuting his rash measures. He encouraged the Jesuits to erect colleges in various parts of the country; the catholic worship was celebrated not only openly but ostentatiously; and four catholic bishops, after having publicly been consecrated in the king's chapel, were sent to exercise their functions of vicars apostolical throughout the kingdom.

But the king was not unopposed. He recommended father Francis, a Benedictine monk, to the university of Cambridge, for the degree of master of arts. The university replied by a petition, in which they prayed the king to excuse them upon the ground of the father's religion. An endeavour was then made to terrify the university by summoning the vice-chancellor before the high commission court; but both that functionary and his university were firm, and father Francis was refused his degree.

The sister university of Oxford displayed the like conscientiousness and determined spirit. The presidency of Magdalen college becoming vacant, the king recommended for that lucrative and honourable situation a Dr. Farmer, who was a new and merely time-serving convert to papacy, and who,

in other respects, was by no means the sort of character who would do honour to so high a preferment. The fellows respectfully but firmly refused to obey the king's mandate for the election of this man, and James showed his sense of the refusal by ejecting all but two of them from their fellowships.

A.D. 1688.—An increasing disaffection to the king was the inevitable consequence of his perseverance in this arbitrary course, instances of which we might extend over very many of even our capacious pages. But heedless alike of the murmurs of his own subjects and of the probable effect of those murmurs upon the minds of foreign princes, James issued a second declaration of liberty of conscience. As if to add insult to this evident blow at the established church, James ordered that this second declaration should be read by all clergymen at the conclusion of divine service. The dignitaries of the church of England now considered that farther endurance would argue rather lukewarmness for the church or gross personal timidity, than mere and due respect to the sovereign, and they determined firmly, though temperately, to resist at this point.

Accordingly Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, Lloyd, bishop of St. Asaph, Kenn, bishop of Bath and Wells, Turner, bishop of Ely, Lake, bishop of Chichester, White, bishop of Peterborough, and Trelawney, bishop of Bristol, drew up a respectful memorial to the king, in which they stated that their conscientious respect to the protestant religion as by law established would not allow them and their clergy to yield obedience to his mandate. The king treated this petition as something approaching to a treasonable denial of his rights. The archbishops and bishops were summoned before him at the council, and he sternly asked them if they ventured to avow their petition. The question remained for some time unanswered; but at length the prelates replied in the affirmative, and were immediately, on their declining to give bail, committed to the Tower on the charge of having uttered a seditious libel.

On the twenty-ninth of June in this year the trial of the bishops took place; and as it was evident that in defending the church the prelates were also, and at a most important crisis, boldly standing forward as the champions of the whole nation, the proceedings were watched with a most intense interest by men of every rank, and save a few bigoted or interested papists, by men of every shade of religious opinion. The lawyers on either side exerted themselves greatly and ably; and two of the judges, Powell and Holloway, plainly declared their opinion to be in favour of the bishops. The jury, however, even now had grave doubts, and remained in deliberation during the entire night. On the following morning Westminster-hall was literally crowded with spectators anxious to know the result, and when the jury appeared and returned a verdict of "Not guilty," a mighty cheer arose within the hall, was taken up by the crowds outside, and passed from street to street, from town to country, and from village to village. James was at the time dining with lord Faversham in the camp at Hounslow, ten miles from London. The cheers of the people reached even to this distance, and were re-echoed by the soldiers with a heartiness and loudness that actually alarmed James, who eagerly enquired what that noise could mean.

"It is nothing, sire," replied one of the attendants, "but the soldiers shouting at the acquittal of the bishops."

"And do you call that nothing!" replied James; "but it shall be all the worse for them all."

The shouts of the soldiers at the failure of James's arbitrary attempt against the bishops was, indeed, an ominous sign of the times. His efforts for Rome had been repudiated and discouraged by Rome; and now even his very soldiery, upon whom alone he could rely for strength, testified their sympathy with the popular cause. But the infatuated monarch did not even yet know the full extent of his peril. Many of the leading men of the kingdom were in close though cautious correspondence with a foreign potentate, and the most extensive and formidable preparations were being made to hurl James from a throne which he had so signally proved himself unworthy to fill.

Mary, eldest daughter of James, was married to William, prince of Orange, who was at once the subtle and profound politician and the accomplished and tried soldier. To this able and protestant prince the malcontents of England, who now, through James's incurable infatuation, included all that was best and most honourable as well as most influential of the nation, turned their eyes for deliverance. He had long been aware of the discontents that existed in England, but kept up an appearance of perfect amity with the king, and even in his correspondence with the leading men of the opposition warily avoided committing himself too far, and affected to dissuade them from proceeding to extremities against their sovereign. But the ferment occasioned by the affair of the bishops encouraged him to throw off the mask; he had long been making preparations for such a crisis, and he now resolved to act. He had his preparations so complete, indeed, that in a short time after the acquittal of the bishops, he dropped down the canals and rivers from Nimwegen with a well stored fleet of five hundred vessels and an army of upwards of fourteen thousand men. As all William's preparations had been made on pretext of an intended invasion of France, he actually landed in England, at Torbay, without having excited the slightest alarm in the mind of James.

William now marched his army to Exeter and issued proclamations, in which he invited the people to aid him in delivering them from the tyranny under which they groaned; but such a deep and general terror had been struck into that neighbourhood by the awful scenes that had followed the affair of Monmouth, that even the numerous and well appointed force of William encouraged but few volunteers to join him. Ten days elapsed, and William, contrasting the apathy of the people with the enthusiastic invitations he had received from many of the leading men of the country, began to despair, and even to consult with his officers on the propriety of re-embarking, and leaving so faithless a gentry and so apathetic a populace to endure the miseries which they dared not rise against. But at this critical moment he was joined by some men of great influence and note; his arrival and his force became generally known, and multitudes of all ranks now declared in his favour.

The movement once commenced, the revolution was virtually accomplished. Even the most favoured and confidential servants of James now abandoned him; and whatever might have been the faults of the unfortunate king, it is impossible not to feel deep disgust at the unnatural and ungrateful conduct of some of those who now coldly abandoned him in the moment of his deepest perplexity and need. Lord Churchill, for instance, afterwards duke of Marlborough, and undoubtedly one of the greatest generals England has ever possessed, acted upon this occasion with a most scandalous ingratitude. Originally only a page in the royal household, he had by the king's favour been raised to high command and lucrative honours. But now when his talents and his sword were most needed by the king, he not only deserted him, but also influenced several other leading characters to desert with him, including the duke of Grafton, an illegitimate son of Charles II.

But the most shameful desertion, and that which the most deeply pained and disgusted the unfortunate king, was that of the princess Anne, who had ever been his most favoured and, seemingly, his most attached daughter. But this illustrious lady, and her husband the prince of Denmark, now joined the rest in deserting the king, who in his too tardy sense of his helpless situation passionately exclaimed, "God help me! Even my own children desert me now."

Unable to rely upon his troops, seeing only enraged enemies among all ranks of his subjects, and so deserted by his court that he had scarcely the necessary personal attendance, he sent the queen, who had recently been confined of a son, over to Calais; and then, with only one attendant, sir Edward Hailes, a new convert to popery, whose fidelity to his unhappy master cannot be too highly applauded, he secretly left London, intending to follow the queen to France. He was recognised and stopped by the mob, but being confined at Rochester he was so carelessly guarded that he was able—probably from secret orders given by William, whom his detention would have embarrassed—to escape with his natural son the duke of Berwick, and they arrived safely in France. He was well received by the French court, and encouraged to persevere in the intention he possessed of at least making an endeavour to reconquer his kingdom.

But that kingdom had finally rejected him, and was even at that moment engaged in discussing the means of erecting a secure and free government upon the ruins of his most unwise, gratuitous, and absurd despotism.

CHAPTER LVI.

The Reign of WILLIAM III.

A.D. 1689.—THE most influential members of both houses of parliament, the privy council, with the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord mayor and other leading men, now debated upon the course that ought to be taken. King James was alive; he had not formally resigned his throne; no actual hostilities had taken place between him and his people, nor had he by arms or by law been formally deposed. But he had fled from his kingdom at the mere appearance of an invader, and on the mere, however well-founded, assumption of the hostility of his people and their concert with the invading power. A clearer case of constructive abdication it would not be easy to conceive, and both houses of parliament at once proceeded to vote that the king had abdicated.

But another and more difficult point now remained for consideration. Taking the king's abdication to be undisputed—who was to succeed him? Could he, because weary of the throne or unable to maintain himself upon it, cut off the entail of the throne? His queen was recently delivered of a son; that son, by the well known English law of succession, had right of inheritance prior to the princesses; ought he not, then, to be made king, and a regency appointed? But, if so, would not the paternity of James enable him to continue his despotism through his son when the latter should attain his majority? The point was a most important one, and as difficult of solution as it was important; but we have ever been of opinion that the leading statesmen of that day decided upon it very much in the spirit of the son of Philip, who cut the Gordian knot which he found himself unable to untie. The revolution was, undoubtedly, a necessary one, for James's tyranny was great and insensate; and it was a glorious one, inasmuch as it was accomplished without bloodshed. But these considerations, important as they are, must not prevent us from denouncing the injustice with which the leading men of England, finding themselves in great and grievous difficulty how to reconcile their own liberties and the rights of the infant son of the abdicated king, pronounced that son supposititious! The most ridiculous tales were told and credited; it was even averred that the queen had never been pregnant at all, but that the child who was now pronounced supposititious had been conveyed to the apartments of the queen from those of its real mother in a warming pan! But when men have determined upon injustice any pretext will serve their turn. The young prince, then, was pronounced illegitimate, and the throne being vacant it was then proposed to raise the princess of Orange, James's eldest daughter, to the throne as her hereditary right. But to this course there was an insuperable and unexpected obstacle. The high and stern ambition of the prince of Orange forbade him, in his own coarse but expressive phrase, "to accept of a kingdom which he was to hold only by his wife's apron strings." He would either have the crown conferred upon himself, or he would return to his own country and leave the English to settle their own difficulties as they best might; and accordingly the crown was settled upon William and Mary and their heirs, the administration of affairs being vested in William alone.

Though the declaration of toleration issued by James had given such deep and general offence, it had done so only as it indicated the desire of James to deprive both the church of England and the dispenser of security from the inroads of papacy. Presuming from this fact that toleration would not in itself be disagreeable to the nation, William commenced his reign by an attempt to repeal the laws that commanded uniformity of worship. But the English, as has well been remarked, were "more ready to examine the commands of their superiors than to obey them; and William, although looked upon as the deliverer of the nation, could only so far succeed in this design, as to procure toleration for such dissenters as should hold no private conventicles and should take the oaths of allegiance.

The attention of William, however, was very speedily called from the regulation of his new kingdom to the measures necessary for its preservation. James, as we have said, was received in France with great friendship; and Ireland, mainly catholic, still remained true to him. Having assembled all the force he could, therefore, James determined to make Ireland his point d'appui, and, embarking at Brest, he landed at the port of Kinsale on the 22nd of May, 1689. Here every thing tended to flatter his hopes. His progress to Dublin was a sort of triumph. Tyrconnel, the lord lieutenant, received him with loyal warmth and respect; the old army was not merely faithful but zealous, and was very easily increased by new levies to the imposing force of forty thousand men.

Some few towns in Ireland, being chiefly inhabited by protestants, had declared for king William, and among these was Derry, or Londonderry, and to this town James at once proceeded to lay siege. The military authorities would probably have been glad to have delivered the place up to their lawful sovereign; but a clergyman, Mr. George Walker, placed himself at the head of the protestant inhabitants of the town, and worked up their minds to such a pitch of enthusiasm, that they resolved to hold out the place, until it should be relieved by William, or perish in the attempt. The enthusiasm spread to the very lowest and weakest of the population; and though famine and fever made fearful ravages, and such loathsome objects as cats and rats became coveted for food, the besieged still held out. This devotion was at length rewarded. A store-ship, heavily laden with provision, broke the boom which had been laid across the river, and the famished inhabitants of Derry received at once an abundant supply of provisions and a most welcome addition to their garrison of hale and fresh men. James during this obstinate siege had lost nine thousand of his troops, and as the aid now thrown into the town rendered his success more unlikely than ever, he withdrew his army in the night, and prepared to meet William, who in person was about to attack him.

BOTH AS A STATESMAN AND A SOLDIER WILLIAM DISPLAYED GREAT ABILITY; HE WAS POLITICAL AND BRAVE, TOLERANT AND MARCHING.

A. D. 1690.—The hostile armies came in sight of each other upon the opposite sides of the river Boyne, which might easily have been forded but for ditches and old houses which rendered the banks defensible. To this facility of ambush, in fact, the life of William very nearly became a sacrifice. As he rode out along his lines to reconnoitre his opponents and determine upon his plan of battle, a cannon was secretly pointed at him, and fired with such good aim that he was wounded in the shoulder, several of his staff being killed by his side.

On the following morning William commenced operations by cannonading the masking houses from which he had suffered so much annoyance, and then he led over his army in three divisions. They crossed the river without any considerable loss, formed in good order on the opposite side, and an obstinate battle ensued. The Irish, as well as their French and Swiss allies, fought well and zealously, but they were inferior in cavalry; and the furious charges of William's cavalry, led on by himself, at length caused the Irish to retreat, and the merely mercenary Swiss and French very speedily followed. Perhaps the victory thus gained by William was in no slight degree owing to the fact of his having personally led on his troops, who thus were inspired with a zeal and courage which James should have lent to his troops by a similar personal devotion and daring. But though James's personal courage was beyond all question, and had been signally shown during the Dutch war in the reign of his brother, he on this occasion allowed the prudence of the sovereign to outweigh the impulses of the soldier. Posted on the hill of Dunmore, which commanded the scene of action, he gazed upon the eventful battle without even detaching a squadron of the horse which surrounded him to aid in repulsing the terrible cavalry charges of William. The defeat of the Irish army was as complete as might have been anticipated from this very opposite conduct of the opposing leaders. Of James's troops nearly fifteen hundred were killed and wounded, while William lost barely a third of that number. But he sustained a heavy loss indeed in the death of the brave and able duke of Schomberg, who was shot as he crossed the river, cheering on his men.

A. D. 1691.—Disastrous as the battle of the Boyne had proved to James, it did not altogether destroy his hopes. By great exertions he got an army again into condition for service, and it was now committed to the leadership of general St. Ruth, a man of known gallantry and conduct. This army was met by that of the English at Aughrim; and the boggy nature of the ground in which St. Ruth had taken up an admirable position enabled him to repulse the English with great loss in several charges. But the English, though galled and weakened, returned to the charge with inflexible resolution, and St. Ruth being killed by a cannon ball, his men fell into disorder, and retreated to Limerick with the loss of upwards of five thousand of their number.

William now proceeded to besiege Limerick, the garrison of which city, aided by the troops who had escaped from Aughrim, made a gallant and obstinate defence; but the English gained ground so rapidly that, to avoid the horrors which must have resulted from the place being taken by assault, the Irish leaders demanded a parley. William was neither bigoted nor cruel, and he offered no objection to the terms on which the garrison proposed to surrender. These terms were, that the catholics of Ireland should have that freedom of religion which they had enjoyed under Charles II., and that all Irish persons should be at liberty to remove with their families and property to any part of the world, excepting England and Scotland. Above fourteen thousand availed themselves of this latter stipulation, and were conveyed to France at the expense of the English government.

A. D. 1692.—William aspired to the distinction of being head of the protestant interest in Europe; hence the country was almost perpetually engaged in continental wars; and if it were not absolutely necessary to throw the energies of the English nation into the scale, it suited the king's warlike disposition; for though he was by no means uniformly successful at the head of his troops, he possessed the necessary courage and fortitude, and was beyond all doubt a superior military commander. We shall not, however, enter the arena of his warlike achievements, as general of the allied armies, in the long and arduous struggle against the power and restless ambition of Louis XIV., but keep our attention fixed on those matters which more exclusively refer to England. Among these was the celebrated victory off La Hogue gained by the English and Dutch fleets, over the French. The latter consisted of sixty-three ships, and the confederate fleet of ninety-nine; but scarce one half could come to an engagement. The French fleet was entirely defeated, and driven to their own coast; and at La Hogue and other places, no less than twenty-one of their largest men-of-war were destroyed, within two or three days after the battle. Among the rest, the French admiral's ship, the Rising Sun, was set on fire, within sight of the army that was to have made a descent upon England. Not a single ship was lost on the part of the English. At this time William was in Holland; but as soon as the fleet arrived at Spithead, the queen sent 20,000*l.* to be distributed among the sailors, and gold medals for the officers, in acknowledgment for this splendid and timely victory.

With the celebrated treaty of Limerick perished the last hope of James to regain his English dominion by the aid of Ireland. The king of France allowed him a considerable pension, and his daughter and English friends occasionally aided him to a considerable amount. He passed his time in study, in charity, and in religious duties; and even the poor monks of La Trappe, to whom he paid frequent visits, confessed themselves edified by the mildness of his manners and the humility of his sentiments. We especially dwell upon this behaviour of James, not only because it shows in a strong point of view how bad a king a good man may be; in other words, how much of a peculiar ability must be added to the greatest and best virtues of a private man to prevent a king from failing, to his own and his people's vast injury, in the fulfilment of the tremendous duties of the throne, but also because it goes to refute a cruel calumny which but too many historians have joined in perpetuating upon the memory of James.

Excited as men's minds were by the revolution, what could be more probable than that bigoted and ignorant admirers of the expelled James should resort to any means, however wicked, to assail William upon what they, as being still loyal to the absent king, must have viewed as a guiltily usurped throne? The dastardly crime of assassination was resorted to against William; and the vile crime of the foiled assassins has, without the shadow of a proof, been attributed to the suggestion of James. But, whether as man or monarch, every action of his life is opposed to the probability of this vile imputation. Tyrannous, arbitrary, and bigoted he was; but he was stern, direct, and sturdy. Even in his earlier days he would have resorted to open force, not to dastardly treachery. And after the treaty of Limerick had deprived him of all reasonable hope of recovering his kingdom, his mind evidently became impressed with a deep sense of the worthlessness of worldly prosperity and greatness. He became more a monk in spirit than many were who wore the monkish cowl; and so far, we think, was he from being willing to remove his successful rival by the hand of the assassin, that it may be doubtful whether he did not deem the usurped greatness of that rival far more in the light of a curse than in that of a blessing.

James survived the extinction of his kingly hopes rather more than seven years. His ascetic way of life, acting upon a frame much enfeebled by previous struggles and chagrins, threw him into a painful and tedious disease, and he died on the sixteenth of September, 1701; his last moments being spent in enjoining his son to prefer religion to all worldly advantages, however alluring. At his own especial request, made just before his decent and manly death, James was interred, without any attempt at funeral pomp, in the church of the English Benedictines at Paris.

A.D. 1697.—In our desire to trace the royal exile James to the very close of his eventful and unfortunate career, we have somewhat outstepped the chronological march of our history.

Though an able politician, and though, at the commencement of his reign, sufficiently well inclined to use and preserve so much prerogative as could belong to the elected monarch of a people who had recently beheaded one sovereign and driven another into exile, William very soon grew weary of disputing with his cabinet. In truth, merely domestic politics were not William's forte. He had the mind and the expansive gaze of an emperor rather than the minute views of a king, and was calculated rather to rule nations than to watch over the comparatively small affairs of a single state. He saw how much the vast power of France required, for the welfare of Europe, to be kept in check; and he gladly, therefore, allowed his ministers to infringe upon his prerogative as to England, on condition of their affording him the means of regulating the disturbed balance of power in Europe. The history of his reign may be summed up in two words—war and funding. Aided by the real and original genius of Burnett, bishop of Sarum, William contrived that means of anticipating the taxes, of mortgaging the means of the nation, which in creating the national debt has doubtless led to much evil, but which has also been the means of carrying England triumphantly through struggles under which it otherwise must have sunk, and to a pitch of wealth and greatness to which otherwise it could never have aspired, even in wish. The treaty of Ryswick at length put an end to the sanguinary and expensive war with France. It has been observed that the only benefit secured to England by that treaty was the formal recognition of William's sovereignty by the French king. But it should not be forgotten that England, in common with all the rest of Europe, was served and saved by the check given to the gigantic power and the overweening ambition of France.

With war the king's life may almost be said to have terminated. From boyhood he had been of a feeble constitution, and long inquietude of mind and exposure of body had now completely exhausted him. Being thrown from his horse he fractured his collar-bone. It was set, but he insisted upon being carried to his favourite residence, Kensington palace. The motion of the carriage disunited the fractured bone, and the pain and irritation caused fever and diarrhoea, which, in spite of all that Bidloo and other skilful surgeons could devise, terminated the king's life, in the thirteenth year of his reign and the fifty-second of his age. Even in his last moments the "ruling passion" was strong within him, and only two days before his death he held a long and anxious conference on the state of Europe with the earl of Albemarle, who had brought some important intelligence from Holland.

Cold and reserved in his manners, William was far from being an amiable man. But he was moderate in his private expences, and so devoted to war and statesmanship that he had neither time nor inclination for private vices. As a sovereign he obtained his power by an utter disregard to the feelings and interests of his father-in-law, such as we cannot easily refrain from taking to be the evidence of a bad heart. But he used his power well, defending the honour and the interests of his subjects abroad, and doing as much for toleration and liberty at home as they deserved—for he did all that their own prejudices and jealousies would allow him.

CHAPTER LVII.

The Reign of ANNE.

A. D. 1702.—WILLIAM III. having survived his wife, by whom he left no issue, Anne, second daughter of James II., married to prince George of Denmark, ascended the throne amidst a general satisfaction which one might reasonably have expected to be greatly checked by the remembrance of her extraordinary and unnatural treatment of her father in the darkest hour of his distress.

Anne, at the time of her accession was in the thirty-eighth year of her age, pleasing in her person and manner, domestic in her habits, and, with the dark exception to which we have alluded, of amiable and excellent character.

One of the first acts of the queen was to send a message to the house of commons announcing her intention of declaring war against France; and this intention was warmly applauded by the house! And yet the reign of this queen has been very truly called the Augustan period of literature; so true it is that the ferocious instincts of mankind resist even the softening influence of letters. For war at that period England had none of that real necessity, that impulse of self-preservation as to either the present or the future, without which war is little, if at all, better than wholesale and legitimated murder; but hatred of the French nation continued in full force, although the power of the French to be mischievous was already very greatly curtailed; and the Dutch and Germans not only joined England, but actually declared war against France on the very same day. Though such a combination of powers was strong enough to portend danger even to the wealthy and warlike France, the French king received the news without any apparent feeling, except that of mortification that the Dutch should venture to be hostile to him; and this feeling he expressed by saying that "as for those pedlars, the Dutch, they should be dearly taught to repent their impertinent presumption in declaring war against a king whose power they had formerly felt as well as dreaded."

Of the campaigns that followed this declaration of war we shall not even attempt to give the details. Even where the historian's pages have no limit but his own will, there is, probably, no portion of his labour less useful to his readers than his minute account of battles, sieges, marches, and counter-marches, which must be unintelligible to all except military readers, without the aid of maps so expensive that few readers can command them. But in the present case such details, besides being beyond the limits of our pages, are really unnecessary. Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet, were victories as useless as they were costly and decisive; they gratified the splendid ambition and the sordid avarice of Marlborough, but to England they were utterly unproductive of solid benefit.

It is a singular fact, and one not very creditable to the nation, that while enormous treasure was wasted in sanguinary and useless victories, and the most unbounded applause was bestowed upon the victors, one of the most important and splendid conquests ever made for England was rewarded not merely by neglect, but by absolute and cruel insult. We allude to the capture of Gibraltar by sir George Rooke. Sir Cloudesley Shovel and sir George Rooke had been sent out to watch a fleet which the French were known to be equipping at Brest, and sir George was farther ordered to convoy some transport ships to Barcelona, where the prince of Hesse made an unsuccessful attack. The troops having failed on this point, were re embarked, and the English commanders, anxious to turn the expedition to some advantage, determined upon attacking Gibraltar, then in the possession of the Spaniards, who, deeming it impregnable by its own strength, kept it but inconsiderably garrisoned.

In truth, the situation of Gibraltar is such that it might well lead the Spaniards into an overweening opinion of its strength; the town standing upon a tongue of land which is defended on every side but that nearest to the Spanish territory by an inaccessible rock. Upon that side the prince of Hesse landed eighteen hundred men, and proceeded to summon the garrison. The governor paid no attention to this summons, and on the following day the fleet commenced a warm cannonading, by which the defenders of the south mole head were driven from their post. Captains Hicks and Jumper now led a numerous party, sword in hand, into the fortifications, but they had scarcely landed when the Spaniards sprung a mine, by which two lieutenants and a hundred men were killed and wounded. The remainder, gallantly headed by the captains named above, maintained their post in spite of the horrible explosion which had so fearfully thinned their numbers, and the rest of the seamen being now landed by captain Whitaker, the Mole and the town were taken by storm. When it is considered that Gibraltar has been of immense importance to England ever since, both in protecting our Mediterranean trade and serving as an outfitting and sheltering port for our navies destined to annoy an enemy, it seems incredible, but is, unfortunately, only too true, that parliament and the ministry, so lavish of rewards and praise to the costly and useless services performed elsewhere, refused sir George Rooke even the formal honour of a vote of thanks, and he was shortly afterwards displaced from his command.

Philip IV., grandson of Louis XIV. of France, having been nominated king of Spain by the will of the late king, was placed upon the throne; and as he was apparently agreeable to the majority of his subjects, and, besides, was supported by the power of France, all opposition to him would to ordinary minds have appeared hopeless. But Charles, son of the emperor of Germany, had formerly been nominated to the Spanish succession, and France herself had been a party to that nomination. Charles, therefore, encouraged by the promised support of the warlike inhabitants of the province of Catalonia, determined to assert his right. In this determination he was strengthened by England and Portugal, who supplied him with two hundred transports, thirty ships of war and a force of nearly ten thousand men. Considerable as this force was, it yet was small when compared to the mighty resources of the Spanish king de facto; but in the judgment of military men, as well as in the popular opinion, the comparative smallness of Charles's force was amply compensated by the genius and romantic bravery of the commander of it, the earl of Peterborough, who gave Charles the aid of his vast fortune as well as his personal exertions.

The earl of Peterborough was one of the most extraordinary men of that age. Though very much deformed in person, he excelled in all military exercises. At fifteen he fought as a volunteer against the Moors in Africa, and in every action he was distinguished for daring and conduct. The great experience he had acquired and the influence of his character upon the soldiery were much and justly relied on to forward the cause of Charles. His very first action justified that reliance, as he took the strong city of Barcelona with its well provided garrison of five thousand men. Had the earl of Peterborough now been left to the promptings of his own high and chivalrous spirit, there is but little room to doubt that he would have achieved still more brilliant successes.

But some petty intrigues, by which both Charles and the English government very weakly allowed themselves to be duped, led to the recall of the earl, whose command was transferred to lord Galway. That nobleman soon after came to a general action with the Spanish troops, commanded by the duke of Berwick, who had taken up a position on the plains near the town of Almanza. For a time Charles's troops, consisting chiefly of Dutch and English infantry, seemed greatly to have the advantage. But in the very heat and crisis of the action, the Portuguese horse who protected either flank of Charles's line were seized with a sudden and disgraceful panic, and fled in spite of all the efforts that were made to rally them. The duke of Berwick immediately closed in upon the exposed flanks, and Galway, losing men at every step, had barely time to throw his army into a square and retire to a neighbouring eminence. Here they were comparatively free from the attacks of the enemy, but they were destitute of provisions and ignorant of the country; and as it was evidently the design as it was in the power of the enemy to starve them into submission, the officers reluctantly agreed to capitulate. A fine army of ten thousand men thus became prisoners of war; and Philip was more firmly than ever seated upon his throne, not a voice now being raised against him excepting in the still malcontent province of Catalonia.

Turn we now to the more important domestic events of this reign. Though the accession of James I. to the English throne had to a certain extent united England and Scotland, there was still an independent Scotch parliament. In practice this was often inconvenient and always dangerous; the votes of the Scotch parliament often ran counter to those of the English parliament, and it required no remarkable amount of political wisdom to foresee, that, under certain circumstances, such, for instance, as actually occurred in the reigns of George I. and George II., this difference might be fatal by strengthening the hands of a pretender and plunging the country into a civil war. Theoretically, the separate parliament of Scotland was ridiculously indefensible. Scotland and England being already united under one crown, how absurd it was that the parliament at Westminster, held perfectly competent to enact laws for Cumberland and Northumberland, became legislatively incapable a few feet over the border! But so much more powerful are custom and prejudice than reason, that the first proposal to do away with this at once absurd and dangerous distinction was received as though it had been a proposal to abridge some dear and indefeasible liberty of the Scottish people. For once, reason prevailed over idle or interested clamour, and both parliaments simultaneously passed an act appointing and authorizing commissioners, named by the queen, to draw up articles for the parliamentary union of the two kingdoms—that

A.D. 1704.—THE REVOLVENT FUND CALLED "QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY," FOR AUGMENTING THE MAINTENANCE OF THE POOR CLERGY, COMMENCED.

The commissioners, quickened in their proceedings by the nobles' expressed desire for dispatch, speedily presented for the consideration of the two parliaments a series of articles by which full provision was made for retaining in force all the existing laws of Scotland, except where alteration would manifestly benefit that country; the courts of session and other courts of Scottish judicature were also preserved, and, in fact, the main alteration was the abolition of the anomalous separate parliament of Scotland, and giving that country a representation in the parliament of Great Britain, of sixteen peers and forty-five commoners. There was, both in Scotland and on the part of the Tories in England, considerable opposition made to these really wise and necessary articles, but common sense and the influence of the crown at length prevailed, and the articles were passed into law by a great majority in both parliaments.

A clergyman named Sacheverel had much distinguished himself by his sermons in favour of high church principles and in condemnation of dissent and dissenters. Imaginative, impassioned, and possessed of that fluency which even men of good judgment

The harmless declamation of a vain man was thus raised into a degree of factitious importance which was really disgraceful to the people, and for three weeks all the public business of both houses of parliament was set aside on account of a trial which ought never to have commenced. The lords sat in Westminster-hall, which was daily besieged by the principal rank, fashion, and beauty of the capital, the queen herself setting the example by attending as a private auditor of the proceedings.

Dr. Sacheverel was defended by sir Simon Harcourt, Mr. Phipps, and doctors Friend, Smallridge, and Atterbury; and the trial.

abound as its origin was, produced a display of great talent and eloquence. Unfortunately the silly passion shown by the house of commons communicated itself to the people out of doors. Most serious riots took place, in which the rabble in their zeal for Dr Sacheverel not only destroyed several dissenting meeting-houses, but also plundered the houses of several leading dissenters, and the disturbances at length grew so alarming that the queen published a proclamation against them. The magistrates now exerted themselves with some vigour; several ruffians were apprehended, and two convicted of high treason and sentenced to death; which sentence, however, was commuted.

While the populace was rioting without, the lords were trying Sacheverel. He was very ably defended, and he personally delivered an address, of which the composition was so immeasurably superior to that of his sermons, that it was generally supposed to have been written for him by Dr. Atterbury, afterwards bishop of Rochester; a man of great genius, but of a turn of mind which fitted him rather for the wrangling of the bar, than for the mild teaching and other important duties of the Christian ministry. A majority of seventeen votes condemned Sacheverel, but a protest was signed by thirty-four peers. Partly in deference to this protest, and partly in fear that severity would cause dangerous renewals of the riotous conduct of Sacheverel's rabble friends, the sentence was extremely light, merely prohibiting the doctor from preaching for three years, and ordering his alleged libels to be burned by the common hangman, in presence of the lord mayor and the two sheriffs.

The warmth which the people in general had shown on behalf of the doctor showed so extensive a prevalence of tory principles, that the queen's secret advisers of that party thought that they might now safely recommend a dissolution of parliament. The queen complied, and a vast majority of tories was returned to the new parliament. Thus convinced of the correctness with which Harley had long assured her, that she might safely indulge her inclination to degrade the whig party, the queen proceeded accordingly. She began by making the duke of Shrewsbury lord chamberlain, instead of the duke of Kent. Soon afterwards the earl of Sunderland, son-in-law to the duke of Marlborough, was deprived of his office of secretary of state, which was conferred upon the earl of Dartmouth; the lord stewardship was taken from the duke of Devonshire and given to the duke of Buckingham, and Mr. Henry St. John was made secretary in lieu of Mr. Boyle. Still more sweeping alterations followed, until at last so state office was filled by a whig, with the single exception of the duke of Marlborough.

to discountenance and resist all such measures as those by which her royal crown and dignity had recently been threatened. From all this it was clear that the power of Marlborough, so long supported by the court intrigues of his duchess, was now completely destroyed by her imprudent hauteur. His avarice was well known, and it was very extensively believed that the war with France would long since have been brought to a conclusion if the pacific inclinations of the French king had not been constantly and systematically thwarted by the duke for the furtherance of his own ambitious schemes. And though the tory ministry continued the war, and the almost entirely tory parliament recommended that it should be prosecuted with all possible vigour, the mortification and degradation of the lately idolized duke were aimed at by every possible means. Thus the thanks of the house of commons were refused to him for his services in Flanders, while they were warmly given to those of the earl of Peterborough in Spain, and the lord keeper in delivering them took occasion to contrast the generous nature of the earl with the greed and avarice of the duke.

As the expences of the war increased, so the people grew more and more weary of their war mania. The ministry consequently now determined to take resolute steps for putting an end to it; and as it was obvious that the duke would use all the influence of his command to traverse their peaceable policy, they came to the resolution of proceeding against him in some one of the many cases in which he was known to have received bribes. Clear evidence was brought forward of his having received six thousand pounds per annum from a Jew for securing him the contract to supply the army with bread; and upon this charge the duke was dismissed from all his public employments.

The poet Prior was now sent on an embassy to France, and he soon returned with Menager, a French statesman, invested with full powers to arrange the preliminaries of peace; the earl of Strafford was sent back to Holland, whence he had only lately been recalled, to communicate to the Dutch the preliminaries and the queen's approval of them, and to endeavour to induce the Dutch, also, to approve them. Holland at first objected to the inspection of the preliminaries, but after much exertion all parties were induced to consent to a conference at Utrecht. It was soon, however, perceived that all the deputies, save those of England and France, were averse to peace, and it was then determined by the queen's government to set on foot a private negotiation with France with a view to a separate treaty.

A. D. 1712.—Early in August, 1712, viscount Bolingbroke, formerly Mr. St. John, was sent to Versailles, accompanied by Prior and the Abbé Gaultier, to make arrangements for the separate treaty. He was well received by the French court, and very soon adjusted the terms of the treaty.

The interests of all the powers of Europe were well and impartially cared for; but the noblest article of the treaty was that by which England insisted upon the liberation of the numerous French protestants who were confined in prisons and galleys for their religious opinions.

A.D. 1713.—But while the ministry was thus ably and triumphantly conducting the foreign affairs of the nation, serious dissensions were growing up between Harley and Bolingbroke. These able statesmen had for a long time been most cordial in their agreement on all points of policy. But the daily increasing illness of the queen, and the probability, not to say certainty, that she would not long survive, brought forward a question upon which they widely differed. Bolingbroke, who had always been suspected of being a strong Jacobite, was for bringing in the pretender as the queen's successor; while Harley, now lord Oxford, was as strongly pledged to the Hanoverian succession.

The whigs watched with delight and exultation the growth of the ill-disguised enmity between these two great supports of the tory party. The queen in vain endeavoured to compose their differences, and it is to be feared that the sufferings of the last months of her life were much increased by her anxieties on this account. She daily grew weaker, and was not only despaired of by her physicians, but was herself conscious that her illness would have a fatal termination.

A.D. 1714.—The queen at length sunk into a state of extreme lethargy, but by powerful medicines was so far recovered that she was able to walk about her chamber. On the thirtieth of July she rose as early as eight o'clock. For some time she walked about, leaning upon the arm of one of her ladies, when she was seized with a fit of apoplexy, from which no medicines could relieve her, and she expired on the following morning, in the forty-ninth year of her age and the thirteenth of her reign.

Though Anne possessed no very brilliant talents, her reign was in the main prosperous and wise, and was wholly free from all approach to tyranny or cruelty. Literature and the arts flourished exceedingly under her; Pope, Swift, Addison, Bolingbroke, and a perfect galaxy of lesser stars, very justly obtain for this reign the proud title of the Augustan age of England.

CHAPTER LVIII.

The Reign of George I.

A.D. 1714.—ANNE having left no issue, by the act of succession the English crown devolved upon George, son of the first elector of Brunswick, and the princess Sophia, grand-daughter of James I.

The new king was now in his fifty-fourth year, and he bore the character of being a man of solid ability, though utterly destitute of any shining talents, and of even the appearance of any attachment to literature or the arts. Direct, tenacious of his purpose, and accustomed all his life to application to business, great hopes were entertained that his accession would, at the least, secure order and regularity in the conduct of public affairs. His own declaration was, "My maxim is to do justice, to fear no man, and never to abandon my friends."

As it was feared that the intriguing genius of Bolingbroke might have made some arrangements for an attempt on the throne on the part of the pretender, the friends of George I. had procured from him, as soon as it was tolerably certain that Anne could not survive, an instrument by which the most zealous and influential friends to his succession were added to certain great officers, as lords justices, or a commission of regency to govern the Kingdom until the king should arrive.

As soon as the queen expired, the regency caused George I. to be proclaimed in all the usual places, the important garrison of Portsmouth was reinforced, and measures were taken at all the other ports and garrisons to defeat any attempts at invasion. The vigour and vigilance thus displayed prevented any outbreak or disturbance, if any such had ever been actually contemplated; and the regency felt confident enough to deprive Bolingbroke of his office of secretary of state, with every circumstance of insult. His office was given to the celebrated poet and essayist Addison, of whom a curious anecdote is related, very characteristic of the immense difference between the qualities of a scholar and those of a man of business. Mr. secretary Addison, renowned as a classical and facile writer, was very naturally called upon to write the despatch that was to announce the death of queen Anne to her successor; and so much was he embarrassed by his anxiety to find fitting terms, that his fellow-councillors grew impatient, and called upon the clerk to draw out the despatch, which he did in a few dry business-like lines, and ever after boasted himself a reader writer rather than the facile and elegant writer of the delightful papers in the Spectator!

On landing at Greenwich, George I. was received by the assembled members of the regency, attended by the life-guards under the duke of Northumberland. He immediately retired to his chamber, where he gave audience to those who had been zealous for his succession. From this moment the king showed a determined partiality to the whigs, which gave great and general disgust; a feeling that was still farther increased by the headlong haste with which the whig ministers and favourites cornered all offices of trust and emolument upon their own partizans, in utter contempt of the merits and claims of those whom they ousted.

The greediness of the whigs, and the pertinacious partiality shown to that party by the king, threw a great part of the nation into a very dangerous state of discontent, and there arose a general cry, accompanied by much tendency to actual rioting, of

"Sacheverel for ever, and down with the whigs!"

Undeterred by the increasing number and loudness of the malcontents, the whig party, confident in their parliamentary strength and in the partiality of the king, commenced the business of the session by giving indications of their intention to proceed to the utmost extremes against the late ministers. In the house of lords they affected to believe that the reputation of England was much lowered on the continent by the conduct of the late ministers, and professed hopes that the wisdom of the king would repair that evil; and in the lower house they stated their determination to punish the alleged abettors of the pretender; a sure way of pleasing the king, and an artful mode of confounding together the supporters of the pretender, with the loyal subjects of George I. who yet were honest enough to oppose so much of his system of government as appeared to be injurious or dangerous to the country and to himself.

Following up the course thus indicated, the ministers appointed a parliamentary committee of twenty persons, to examine papers and find charges against the late ministry; and shortly afterwards Mr. Walpole, as chairman of this committee, stated that a report was ready for the house, and moved for the committal of Mr. Matthew Prior and Mr. Thomas Harley; and those members, being present in their places, were immediately taken into custody by the sergeant at arms. Mr. Walpole then again rose to impeach lord Bolingbroke of high treason. Before the house could recover from its astonishment, lord Coningsby rose and said, "The worthy chairman of the committee has impeached the hand, I now impeach the head; he has impeached the scholar, I impeach the master; I impeach Robert, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, of high treason and other crimes and misdemeanours."

Lord Oxford was now completely abandoned by nearly all those who had seemed to be so much attached to him; a too common fate of fallen greatness.

Even among the whigs, however, there were some who disapproved of the extreme violence of the present proceedings. Sir Joseph Jekyll, for instance, pointing out an overstrained article that was charged against Oxford, handsomely said that it was his way to mete out equal justice to all men, and that as a lawyer he felt bound to say that the article in question did not amount to treason. But the heads of the faction would not patiently listen to such moderate and honourable language; and Mr. Walpole, in a tone and with a manner very improper to be used by one gentleman towards another, replied, that many members quite as honest as sir Joseph, and better lawyers than he, were perfectly satisfied that the charge did amount to treason.

The humane and honest opposition of sir Joseph Jekyll being thus sneered down, lord

Conlogaby and the other managing whigs proceeded to impeach lord Oxford at the bar of the house of lords, and to demand that he should immediately be committed to custody. Upon this latter point a debate arose in the house of lords, which was terminated by the earl himself, who said that he had all along acted upon the immediate orders of the late queen, and that, having never offended against any known law, he was wholly unconcerned about the life of an insignificant old man. He was consequently committed to the Tower, though the celebrated Dr. Mead positively certified that his committal would endanger his life. The duke of Ormond and lord Bolingbroke, against whom the proceedings were no less vindictively carried on, fled to the continent, upon which the earl marshal of England was ordered to erase their names and arms from the peerage list, and all their possessions in England were declared forfeit to the crown.

A.D. 1715.—The pretender, who had numerous friends in England and Scotland, looked with great complacency upon these violent proceedings, judging that the discontent they caused could not fail to forward his designs upon the crown; and while the king was intent upon alienating the affections of a large portion of his people in order to support a greedy faction, an actual rebellion broke out. Two vessels, with arms, ammunition, and officers, were sent from France to the coast of Scotland, and the pretender promised that he would speedily follow with a greater force. The earl of Mar was consequently induced to assemble his friends and vassals to the number of three hundred, and to proclaim the pretender. As the cause was popular, and no opportunity was lost of magnifying the force with which that prince was to arrive in Scotland, Mar soon found himself at the head of an army of ten thousand men. But while he was completing his preparations to march southward, the duke of Argyle at the head of only about six thousand men attacked him near Dumblain, and though at the close of the engagement both parties left the field, yet the loss inflicted upon Mar was so great as virtually to amount to defeat, and the injury thus done to the cause of the pretender was increased by the conduct of Simon, lord Lovat. That restless and thoroughly unprincipled man held the castle of Inverness for the pretender, to whose forces it would at all times have served as a most important point d'appui; but lord Lovat, changing with the changed fortune of his party, now basely surrendered the castle to the king.

The English ambassador in France, the accomplished and energetic lord Stair, had so well performed his duty to the king, that he was able to send home the most timely and exact information of the designs of the pretender; and just as the rebellion was about to break out in England, several of the leading malcontents were seized by the ministry and committed to close custody. For one of these, sir William Wyndham,

THE SUCCESSION OF LOUIS XIV. WAS HIS GREAT-GRANDSON, WHO BEING AN INFANT, THE DUKE OF ORLEANS WAS NOMINATED REGENT.

In the north of England the spirits of the malcontents were kept up, in spite of all the ill success that had hitherto attended their cause, by their reliance upon aid from the pretender in person. The earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Foster raised a considerable force, and, being joined by some volunteers from the Scottish border, made an attempt to seize Newcastle, but the gates were shut against them, and having no battering train they were fain to retire to Hexham, whence, by way of Kendal and Lancaster, they proceeded to Preston. Here they were surrounded by nearly eight thousand men, under generals Carpenter and Wills. Some fighting ensued, but the cause of the rebels was now so evidently hopeless, that Mr. Foster sent colonel Oxburgh, of the royal army, who had been taken prisoner, with proposals for a capitulation. General Wills, however, declined to hear of them, except as armed rebels, to whom he could allow no other favour than to leave them to the disposal of government, instead of giving them over to instant slaughter by his troops. The unhappy men were consequently obliged to surrender at discretion; some of their officers who had deserted from the royal army were immediately shot, the other officers and gentleman were sent to London, and the common men thrown into the various prisons of Lancashire and Cheshire.

dee, caused a frothy and useless declaration of his rights and intentions to be circulated, and then went to Score with the intention of adding the folly of being crowned there to the folly of being proclaimed in all other places of note through which he had passed. Even the vulgar and the ignorant were by this time convinced of the utter hopelessness of his cause; and as he found that "few and far between" were the only persons who God bless him," and still fewer joined his standard, he quite coolly told his friends—who had sacrificed every thing for him—that he had not the necessary means for a campaign, and then embarked, with his personal attendants, at Montrose—leaving his dupes to their fate. Such baseness, such boyial levity, joined to such cold selfishness, ought to have made even those who most firmly believed in the abstract rights of the pretender, rejoice that he was unable to obtain power in England; since so heartless a man must needs have made a cruel monarch.

The government had acted with vigour and ability in suppressing the rebellion; it now acted with stern unflinching severity in punishing those who had been concerned in it. The mere herd of rebels, to the number of more than a thousand, were transported to the colonies. Two hundred officers were executed at Preston, and five at Tyburn, with all the disgusting accompaniments of drawing and quartering. The earls of Derwentwater, Nithisdale, and Carnwarth, and the lords Kenmuir, Nairne, and Widdrington were sentenced to death, as were Mr. Foster, Mr. Mackintosh, and about twenty other leading men.

Nithsdale, Foster, and Mackintosh were fortunate enough to escape from prison and reach the continent; Derwentwater and Kenmuir were executed upon Tower-hill, and met their fate with a decent intrepidity, which made the spectators forget their crime.

During all this time the earl of Oxford had remained in the Tower, unnoticed and almost forgotten. When the numerous executions had literally disgusted men with the sad spectacle of bloodshed he petitioned to be allowed to take his trial; rightly judging that, as compared to actual rebellion, the worst that was charged against him would seem comparatively venial, even to his enemies. He was accordingly arranged before the peers in Westminster-hall, and some technical dispute arising between the lords and commons as to the mode of his trial, the lords voted that he should be set at liberty.

4. A. T. B. - MIN GEORGE BEING ATTACKED THE BLANKING PLANT NEAR STEACUSE. AND TOOK ON DESTROYED FIFTEEN TAIL OF THE LINE.

ABOUT THE YEAR THE SOUTH-SEA DELUSION WAS STATED IN ENGLAND, THE MISSISSIPPI SCHEME IN FRANCE WAS ON THE POINT OF EXPLOSION.

The South Sea company, to which government was greatly indebted, was in the habit of contenting itself with five per cent. interest, on account of the largeness of its claim, instead of six per cent., which the government paid to all the other public companies to which it was indebted. A scrivener, named Blount, of more ability than principle, availed himself of this state of things to commence a deep and destructive part of the scheme. It was quite obviously to the advantage of the nation to pay five rather than six per cent. upon all its debts, as well as upon the one considerable debt that was due to the South Sea company; and, on the other hand, it was well worth the while of that wealthy company to add as much as possible to the already large amount upon which five per cent. interest was punctually paid by the government. Blount put the case so plausibly on the part of the company, and so skillfully threw in the additional inducement to the government of a reduction of the interest from five to four per cent. at the end of six years, that the scheme seemed to be an actual reduction of one sixth of the whole national burthen immediately, and a reduction of a third at the end of six years. Every encouragement and sanction were consequently given to the plan by which the South Sea company was to buy up the claims of all other creditors of the government. Hitherto only the fair side of the scheme had been displayed; now came the important question, where was the South Sea company, wealthy as it might be, to find the vast sum of money necessary for rendering it the sole government creditor? Blount was ready with his reply. By a second part of his scheme he proposed to enrich the nation enormously by opening up a new, vast, and safe trade to the South Seas; and flaming prospectuses invited the public to exchange government stock for equal nominal amounts in the South Sea stocks—said to be vastly more valuable. The cunning of Blount and his fellow-directors was so well aided by the cupidity of the public, that when the books were opened for this notable transfer there was a positive struggle for the precedence; a consequent run took place for South Sea shares, which in a few days were sold at more than double their original value, and ere the end of the delusion, which was kept up for several months, the shares met with a ready sale at ten times their original cost! When we reflect that a thousand pounds thus produced ten thousand to the speculator, and a hundred thousand a million, we may judge how much excitement and eagerness prevailed. Enormous fortunes, of course, were made in the transfer and re-transfer of shares, and to those who sold out while the delusion was still at its height the scheme was a very El Dorado. But the great majority of the supposed fortunate possessors of South Sea stock were far too well pleased with their prospects to part with them, as they imagined it difficult to put a sufficient value upon their probabilities of vast and ever-increasing interest! Among this number was the poet Gay, who, though a scholar and a wit, was, nevertheless, in the actual business of life, as simple as a child. He was strongly advised by his friends to sell some stock which had been presented to him, and thus, while the stock was at its highest value, secure himself a competence for life. But no, like thousands more, he persisted in holding this precious stock; and all who did so found their scrip mere waste paper when the company was called upon to pay the very first vast and very genuine demand out of profits which were represented as being equally vast, but which had the slight defect of being wholly imaginary. Thousands upon thousands of families were by this artful and most vile scheme reduced to utter ruin, and nothing that has occurred in our own time—replete as it is with bubbles and swindling directors—is calculated to give us any adequate idea of the suffering, the rage, and the dismay that were felt in all parts of the kingdom. The government did all that it consistently could to remedy the disastrous effects produced by individual knavery acting upon general cupidity and credulity. The chief managers of the scheme were deprived of the immense property they had unfairly acquired by it, and redressed as far as possible afforded to the sufferers; but in the almost infinite variety of transfers which had taken place, it inevitably followed that millions of property passed from the hands of those who speculated foolishly into the hands of those who were more sagacious and more wary, though not positively involved in the guilt of the deception; and for many years thousands had to toil for bread who but for this scheme would have been affluent, while thousands more enjoyed wealth not a jot more honestly or usefully earned than the gains of the veriest gambler.

So extensive were the suffering and confusion created by this event, that the friends of the pretender deemed the crisis a fit one at which to bring forward his pretensions again. But, as was usual with that party, there was so much discussion among the leading malcontents, and their affairs were so clumsily conducted on the part of some of them, that the ministry got intelligence of the designs which were on foot, and suddenly ordered the apprehension of the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Orrery, the lords North and Grey, Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, Mr. Lyster, and several other persons of less note. In the investigation that followed, sufficient legal evidence could be found only against the bishop of Rochester and Mr. Lyster, though there could be no moral doubt of the guilt of the others. All, therefore, were discharged out of custody except the bishop, who was banished the kingdom, and Mr. Lyster, who was hanged at Tyburn.

Scarcely less sensation was caused by an accusation which was brought against the earl of Macclesfield, of having sold certain places in chancery. The house of commons impeached him at the bar of the house of lords, and a most interesting and well-contested trial ensued, which lasted for twenty days. The earl was convicted, and sentenced to be imprisoned until he should pay a fine of thirty thousand pounds. He paid the money in less than two months; and his friends deemed him very hardly done by, inasmuch as it was proved on the trial that he had only sold such places as had been sold by former chancellors. To us, however, this seems but a very slender excuse for the offence; as a judge in equity he ought to have put a stop to so dangerous a practice and not have profited by it, especially as the honourable precedent of chancellor Bacon was in existence to remind him that in chancery as elsewhere, "two blacks do not make a white." As to the fine, large as the sum seems, it was not at all too heavy; no small portion of it having been the produce of the offence for which it was imposed.

A.D. 1727.—From the very commencement of his reign George I. had shown at least as much anxiety for Hanover as for England, and having now been above two years prevented by various causes from visiting the electorate, he appointed a regency and set out for Hanover in a state of health that gave no reason to fear any ill result. The voyage to Holland and the subsequent journey to within a few leagues of Osnaburg were performed by the king in his usual health and spirits, but as he approached Osnaburg he suddenly called for the postilion to stop. It was found that one of his hands was paralysed, his tongue began to swell, and no efforts of the surgeon who travelled with him could afford him any relief; and on the following morning he expired, in the thirtieth year of his reign and in the sixty-eighth of his age.

CHAPTER. LIX.

The Reign of GEORGE II.

A.D. 1727.—GEORGE the Second, like his deceased father, was a German by birth, language, and sentiments. In their personal qualities, also, they bore a striking resemblance; both were honest, just, plain-dealing men; both were alike parsimonious and obstinate; and as both were beset by political factions whose rancour knew no bounds, so each of those monarchs had to contend with the caprice or venality of rival statesmen, as by turns they directed the councils of the nation.

The king was in the forty-fourth year of his age on coming to the throne; and he took the first opportunity of declaring to his parliament that he was determined to adhere to the policy of his predecessor. Owing to the previous continental wars in which England had taken a part, the kingdom was involved in a labyrinth of treaties and conventions. Much discontent was also felt and expressed on many points of domestic policy. Dangerous encroachments had been made in the constitution by the repeal of the triennial act; by frequent suspensions of the habeas corpus act; by keeping up a standing army; and by the notorious venal practices employed in establishing a system of parliamentary corruption. At first some change in the ministry appeared in contemplation; but after a little time it was settled that sir Robert Walpole should continue the head of the administration; with lord Townshend as director of the foreign affairs and Mr. Pelham, brother of the duke of Newcastle, as secretary-at-war. There was, however, a great and concentrated mass of opposition gradually forming against Walpole, which required all his vigilance and ability to overcome.

Peace was established at home and abroad; and the new parliament, which assembled in January, 1728, afforded no topic of interest; but in the succeeding year the commons complained of the occasional publication of their proceedings, and it was unanimously resolved, "That it is an indignity to, and a breach of the privilege of the house, for any person to presume to give, in written or printed newspapers, any account or minutes of the debates or other proceedings of the house or of any committee thereof; and that, upon the discovery of the author, &c., this house will proceed against the offenders with the utmost severity." An address to his majesty was also presented by the commons, complaining of serious depredations having been committed by the Spaniards on British ships, in manifest violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns; and requesting that active measures might be taken to procure reasonable satisfaction for the losses sustained, and secure his majesty's subjects the free exercise of commerce and navigation to and from the British plantations in America. This was followed by a defensive treaty between Great Britain, France, Spain, and Holland: the question between this country and Spain as to naval captures being left to future adjudication by commissioners.

A.D. 1730.—Some changes now took place in the ministry. Lord Harrington was made secretary of state, in the room of lord Townshend, who appears to have interfered more with the affairs of the nation than was agreeable to sir Robert Walpole, to whom he was related by marriage. The latter, it is said, upon being asked the cause of his difference with his brother-in-law, dryly replied, "As long as the firm of the house was Townshend and Walpole, all did very well; but when it became Walpole and Townshend, things went wrong and a separation ensued." About the same time the duke of Dorset was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland in the room of lord Carteret; the duke of Devonshire, privy seal, and lord Trevor, president of the council.

With the blessings of peace England was now enjoying a high degree of prosperity; her trade with foreign nations was constantly increasing; and from her American colonies the imports of sugar, rum, &c. were most abundant. The whale fishery also on the coast of New England, New York, &c. was highly productive. The most flattering accounts were received from our transatlantic friends; and the tide of emigration from our shores, but more particularly from Ireland, was fast flowing in that direction.

A.D. 1732.—The parliamentary session was opened by the king in person, who, in an elaborate speech, complimented the country on its political aspects, and dwelt with evident satisfaction on the late continental alliances he had entered into. This was naturally followed by congratulatory addresses from both houses; and the minister saw himself surrounded by a phalanx of supporters, too numerous for the opposition to disturb his equanimity. But amid the general prosperity, there were some public delinquencies which seemed to require the strong arm of justice to unmask and punish. The most glaring of these, perhaps, was an enormous fraud committed by certain parties who had the management of the funds belonging to the "charitable corporation." This society had been formed under the plausible pretext of lending money at legal interest to the poor and to others, upon security of goods, in order to screen them from the rapacity of pawnbrokers. Their capital was at first limited to 30,000*l.*, but by licenses from the crown they increased it to 600,000*l.* George Robinson, M.P. for Marlow, the cashier, and John Thompson, the warehouse keeper, had suddenly disappeared, and it was now discovered that for a capital of 500,000*l.* effects to the amount of 30,000*l.* only could be found, the remainder having been embezzled. A petition to the house of commons having been referred to a committee, it clearly appeared that a most iniquitous scheme of fraud had been systematically carried on by the cashier and warehouseman, in concert with some of the directors, for embezzling the capital and cheating the proprietors; on which it was resolved, that sir Robert Sutton, with nine others, who had been proved guilty of many fraudulent practices in the management of the charitable corporation, should make satisfaction to the poor sufferers out of their estates, and be prevented from leaving the kingdom.

In the following year the excise scheme was first introduced into the house of commons; and although it was simply a plan for converting the duties on wine and tobacco, which had been hitherto duties of customs, into duties of excise, the ferment which this proposition excited was almost unprecedented. The sheriffs of London, accompanied by many of the most eminent merchants, in two hundred carriages, came down to the house to present their petition against the bill; other petitions were also presented; and the minister finding that his majority was small and the opposition to the measure so universal, determined on withdrawing it. The most riotous rejoicings followed; and if a correct judgment might be formed from outward appearances, the inhabitants of London and Westminster must have thought they had obtained a deliverance from some great impending danger.

Very little occurred during the succeeding year worthy of remark. The princess royal was married to the prince of Orange; a bill passed for the naturalization of his royal highness; and the "happy pair" left St. James's for Rotterdam, 22nd of April. Parliament was not dissolved by proclamation. The king had previously prorogued it, after thanking the members for the many signal proofs they had given him for seven years, of their duty and attachment to his person and government; and concluded with a prayer that providence would direct his people in the choice of their representatives.

A.D. 1735.—When the new parliament met in January, it was seen that the elections had made no perceptible change in the composition of the house; the leaders of parties were the same; and nearly the same motions, amendments, debates, and arguments were reproduced. Indeed, if we except some angry disputes which occurred between the ministers and the prince of Wales, relative to the income allowed out of the civil list to the latter, scarcely any event worthy of remark took place for a long time. The affair to which we allude thus originated. Motions having been made in each house of parliament to address his majesty to settle 100,000*l.* per annum on the prince, it was opposed by the ministers as an encroachment on the prerogative, an officious intermeddling with the king's family affairs, and as an effort to set his majesty and the prince at variance. But the truth was, there had long been a serious misunderstanding between these royal personages, arising chiefly from the prince being at the head of the opposition party; and now that there seemed no chance of his obtaining the income he required, it was highly resented by him, and caused an entire alienation between the two courts of St. James's and Leicester-house. Nor can it be wondered at that the prince should feel himself grossly slighted, when out of a civil list of 800,000*l.* a revenue of 50,000*l.* per annum only was allowed him; although his father when prince had 100,000*l.* out of a civil list of 700,000*l.* The breach grew wider every day, and at length so rancorous had these family squabbles become, that in the last illness of the queen, who expired in November, 1737, the prince was not even permitted to see her.

The growing prosperity of England during a long peace was duly appreciated by sir Robert Walpole, and he neglected nothing that seemed likely to ensure its continuance; but the arbitrary conduct pursued by the Spaniards on the American coast, and the interested clamours of some English merchants engaged in a contraband trade with the Spanish colonies, led to a war between the two countries, which lasted from the year 1739 to 1748.

In order to prevent the ships of any other nation from trading with their American colonies, the Spaniards employed vessels called guarda-costas to watch and intercept them; but instead of confining themselves to this their legitimate object, the captains of the Spanish guard-ships frequently interfered with British merchants, who were on their way to other American colonies, and, under pretence of searching for contraband goods, boarded their ships, and sometimes treated the crews with the greatest barbarity. The accounts of these indignities created a desire among all classes of his majesty's subjects for inflicting on the Spaniards signal and speedy retribution; but the pacific policy of the minister was inimical to the adoption of vigorous measures. Captain Jenkins, the master of a Scottish merchant-ship, who was examined at the bar of the house of commons, declared that he was boarded by a guarda-costas, who, after ransacking his ship and ill-treating his crew, tore off one of his ears, and throwing it in his face, told him "to take it to his king." Upon being asked what he thought when he found himself in the hands of such barbarians, Jenkins replied, "I recommended my soul to God and my cause to my country." These words, and the display of his ear, which, wrapped up in cotton, he always carried about him, filled the house with indignation; but it was not till more than a twelve-month afterwards that an order in council was issued for making reprisals on the Spaniards.

A. D. 1740.—The war with Spain had now commenced, and the most strenuous exertions were made to put the navy in the best possible condition. Admiral Vernon, with a small force, captured the important city of Porto Bello, on the American isthmus. But it appeared at the close of the year, that the Spaniards had taken upwards of 400 English vessels, many of them richly laden.

At this period the violence of party politics was displayed in all its rancour. Many changes took place in the cabinet; and Walpole, decrying the coming storm, presented two of his sons with valuable sinecures. Soon after, Mr. Sandys gave notice that he should make a motion in the house of commons for the dismissal of sir Robert Walpole from the king's councils for ever. On the appointed day the house was crowded at an early hour, and the public were in a state of breathless expectation to learn the result. The accusations against the minister were by no means confined to any particular misconduct, but were vague and indefinite. The very length of Mr. Walpole's power, said Mr. Sandys, was in itself dangerous; to accuse him of any specific crime was unnecessary, the dissatisfaction of the people being a sufficient cause for his removal! The discussion was long and animated, and the debate closed by a powerful speech from Walpole, which made a deep impression on the house; and the motion was negatived by the large majority of 290 against 106. In the lords, a similar motion met with the like result.

A. D. 1741.—The success which had attended Vernon's attack on Porto Bello induced the government to send out large armaments against the Spanish colonies. In conjunction with lord Cathcart, who had the command of a numerous army, Vernon undertook to assail Spanish America on the side of the Atlantic, while commodore Anson sailed round Cape Horn to ravage the coasts of Chili and Peru. Part of these arrangements were frustrated owing to the death of lord Cathcart; his successor, general Wentworth, being an officer of little experience and very jealous of the admiral's popularity. As might be expected where such was the case, the expedition lamentably failed of its object; incapacity and dissension characterized their operations; nothing of the slightest importance was effected; and they returned home after more than fifteen thousand of the troops and seamen had fallen victims to the diseases of a tropical climate. Nor was the result of the expedition under Anson calculated to retrieve these disasters; for although he plundered the town of Paits, in Peru, and captured several prizes, among which was the Spanish galleon, laden with treasure, that sailed annually from Acapulco to Manila, he encountered such severe storms, particularly in rounding Cape Horn, that his squadron was finally reduced to only one ship.

It is time that we turn to the affairs of continental Europe, so far, at least, as they involved England. In October, 1740, the emperor Charles VI., the last heir-male of the house of Austria Hapsburg, died. Almost all the powers of Europe had, by the "pragmatic sanction," guaranteed the possessions of Austria to the archduchess Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary; yet no power except England was influenced by its engagements. Scarcely had the Hungarian queen succeeded her father, when she found herself surrounded by a host of enemies. But the most powerful and the most wily of them was Frederick III. king of Prussia, who, having at his command a rich treasury and a well-appointed army, entered Silesia, and soon conquered it. Knowing, however, that she had not only to contend with France, who had resolved to elevate Charles Albert, elector of Bavaria, to the empire; but also numbered among her foes the kings of Spain, Poland, and Sardinia, he offered to support her against all competitors, on the condition of being permitted to retain his acquisition. This she heroically and indignantly refused; and although the French troops even menaced her capital, Maria Theresa convened the states of Hungary, and made a powerful appeal to the nobles, which they responded to by a solemn declaration that they were all ready to die in defence of her rights. Another large army was quickly raised; the English parliament voted her a subsidy; and so great was the attachment of the English people to her cause, that the pacific Walpole could no longer control the desire that was manifested for becoming parties in the war.

A.D. 1742.—In the new parliament, which was opened by the king in person, it was evident that the opponents of Walpole had greatly strengthened themselves; and being shortly after able to obtain a trifling majority of votes on the Westminster election petition, sir Robert expressed his intention of retiring from office. He consequently resigned all his employments, and was created earl of Orford, with a pension of 4000*l.* a year, his majesty testifying for his faithful servant the most affectionate regard.

England, accustomed to consider the equilibrium of the continental states as the guarantee of her own grandeur, would naturally espouse the cause of Maria Theresa; while it was quite as natural that the king of England, as elector of Hanover, would be ready to enforce its propriety. But there was another motive at this time still more powerful, namely, the war which had recently broken out between England and Spain; for it could not be expected that, in a continental war in which the latter country was one of the belligerents, England would omit any opportunity that offered of weakening that power. Yet as long as Walpole was the directing minister, the king restricted himself to negotiations and subsidies. But when Walpole was superseded by lord Carteret, the cause of Maria Theresa was sustained by the arms of England, and by larger subsidies; while the king of Naples was forced by an English fleet to the declaration of neutrality. England had at length become a principal in the war; or, as Smollet observes, "from being an umpire had now become a party in all continental quarrels, and instead of trimming the balance of Europe, lavished away her blood and treasure in supporting the interest and allies of a puny electorate in the north of Germany."

A.D. 1743.—George II. was now at the head of the Anglo-electoral army, which on its march to Hanau met and engaged the French under the command of marshal the duke of Noailles and some of the princes of the blood. They began the battle with their accustomed impetuosity, but were received by the English infantry with the characteristic coolness and steady intrepidity for which they are so eminently distinguished. In this battle the king showed much passive courage, and his son, the duke of Cumberland, was wounded; but it proved a decisive victory, 6000 of the enemy having fallen, while the loss on the side of the British did not amount to more than one third of that number.

About this time a treaty was concluded between this country and Russia for fifteen years, in which it was stipulated that the empress should furnish his Britannic majesty, as soon as required, with a body of 12,000 troops, to be employed according to the exigency of affairs; and that Great Britain should furnish Russia with twelve men of war, on the first notice, in case either of them were attacked by an enemy and demanded such succour.

A.D. 1744.—To remove the Hanoverian dynasty from the throne of these realms, seemed to be the darling object of the courts of France and Spain, who were secretly planning to restore the Stuart race in the person of the son of the late pretender. Declarations of war between France and England accordingly took place; and in May the king of France arrived at Lille, to open the campaign in Flanders, with an army of 120,000 men, commanded by the celebrated marshal Saxe. The allied armies consisting of English, Hanoverians, Austrians, and Dutch, amounting in the whole to about 75,000, advanced with the apparent intention of attacking the enemy; but, after performing numerous inconsistent and inexplicable movements, without risking either a siege or a battle, the summer passed away, and they retired into winter quarters. Meantime some indecisive engagements had taken place between the English and combined fleets in the Mediterranean.

Towards the close of the year lord Carteret, now earl of Granville, resigned office, and a coalition of parties was formed, which, from including Tories, Whigs, and patriots, obtained the name of the "broad-bottom" administration. Mr. Pelham was chancellor of the exchequer and first lord of the treasury; lord Hardwicke, chancellor; the duke of Dorset, president of the council; the duke of Newcastle and lord Harrington, secretaries of state; and the duke of Bedford, first lord of the admiralty. Mr. Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham, gave them, his support, having been promised a place as soon as the king's aversion could be overcome.

A.D. 1745.—Robert Walpole, earl of Orford, after a life of political activity, during which he had occupied the most prominent station for twenty years, died March 18, aged 71. His general policy was principally characterized by zeal in favour of the protestant succession; by the desire of preserving peace abroad, and avoiding subjects of contention at home. Under his auspices the naval superiority of England was maintained; commerce encouraged; justice impartially administered; and the rights of the people preserved inviolate.

In Italy the united armies of France and Spain, owing to their vast superiority in numbers, were enabled to vanquish the Austrians; and the Anglo-electoral troops in the Netherlands also met with serious reverses. The French army under marshal Saxe was strongly posted at Fontenoy; to which place the duke of Cumberland advanced on the 30th of April, and by nine o'clock in the morning the troops were engaged. The valour of the British infantry was never more signally displayed; for a time they bore down every thing before them; but the Dutch failing in their attempt on the village of Fontenoy, and the allies coming within the destructive fire of the semicircle of batteries erected by Saxe, were outflanked and compelled to retreat. The loss on each side amounted to about 10,000 men; but though the victory was not absolutely decisive, it enabled the French marshal to take some of the most considerable towns of the Netherlands, and the allies retired for safety behind the canal at Antwerp.

Thirty years had elapsed since the chevalier de St. George had stirred up that rebellion which had ended so fatally for his own hopes, and so disastrously for his adherents. Since that time he had lived in Italy, had married a grand-daughter of John Sobieski, king of Poland, and had one son, Charles Edward, who was afterwards known in England as the "young pretender." While George II. and his ministers were fully occupied in endeavouring to bring the war in Germany to a successful issue, Charles Edward received every encouragement from Louis of France to take advantage of that opportunity, and try his strength in Britain. And now that the national discontent was gaining ground in consequence of the loss at Fontenoy, and other events not much less disastrous, he determined to attempt the restoration of his family; and accompanied only by a small party of his most devoted friends, he landed in the Hebrides. Here he was soon joined by the Highland chieftains, and speedily found himself at the head of several thousand hardy mountaineers, who were highly pleased with his affable manners, and with genuine enthusiasm expressed themselves ready to die in his service. Their first movement was towards Edinburgh, which city surrendered without resistance, but the castle still held out. The young pretender now took possession of Holyrood palace, where he proclaimed his father king of Great Britain, and himself regent, with all the idle pageantries of state. Meanwhile a proclamation was issued, offering a reward of 30,000*l.* for his apprehension.

Sir John Cope, the commander of the king's troops in Scotland, having collected some re-inforcements in the north, proceeded from Aberdeen to Dunbar by sea, and hearing that the insurgents were resolved to hazard a battle, he encamped at Preston Pans. Here he was unexpectedly attacked, and with such vigorous onslaught, by the fierce and undisciplined Highlanders, that a sudden panic seized the royal troops, and in their flight they abandoned all their baggage, cannon, and camp equipage, to their enemies. Elated with success, the rebels entered England, and proceeded as far as Derby, without encountering any opposition. Here, however, they learned that the duke of Cumberland had arrived from the continent, and was making preparations to oppose them with an overwhelming force; and it was therefore finally determined, that as they could neither raise recruits in England, nor force their way into Wales, they should hasten their return to Scotland.

The pretender had good reason to believe that important succours would be sent to him from France, or it is not likely he would have crossed the border. But the vigilance of admiral Vernon prevented the French fleet from venturing out; and thus all hope of foreign assistance was cut off. The forces of the pretender were greatly augmented on his return to Scotland; but finding that Edinburgh was in possession of the king's troops, he bent his course towards Stirling, which town he captured, and besieged the castle. Matters had now assumed a very serious aspect, and public credit was most seriously affected; but there was no lack of energy in the government, nor any want of patriotism among the nobility, merchants or traders of England; all ranks, in fact, united with ready zeal in meeting the exigency of the occasion. Many new regiments were raised by wealthy and patriotic individuals; and it was found that by the voluntary exertions of the people 60,000 troops could be added to the king's forces.

A. D. 1745.—In January general Hawley had suffered a complete defeat in endeavouring to raise the siege of Stirling. But a day of terrible retribution was at hand. On the 16th of April the royal army, under the command of the duke of Cumberland, encountered the troops of the pretender on Culloden-moor. The Highlanders began the attack in their wild, furious way, rushing on the royal troops with their broad swords and Lochaber axes; but the English being now prepared for this mode of attack, received them with fixed bayonets, keeping up a steady and well-sustained fire of musketry, while the destruction of their ranks was completed by discharges of artillery. In thirty minutes the battle was converted into a rout; and orders having been issued to give no quarter, vast numbers were slain in the pursuit. The loss of the rebels was estimated at about 4000, while the number of killed in the royal army is said to have scarcely exceeded fifty men! Intoxicated, as it were, with their unexampled victory, the conquerors seemed only bent on merciless vengeance, and the whole country around became a scene of cruelty and desolation. As to the unfortunate prince Charles Edward, he escaped with difficulty from the battle, and after wandering alone in the mountains for several months, in various disguises, he found means to make his escape to France.

"One great cause of the pretender's preservation, was the belief that he had been slain; which arose from the following circumstance. Among his friends, who followed as much as possible in his track, a party was surprised in a hut on the side of the Benalder mountain, by the soldiers who were in search of him. Having seized them, one named Mackenzie effected his escape, upon which his companions told the soldiers that it was the prince; the soldiers thereupon fled in pursuit and overtook the youth, who, when he found their error, resolved to sacrifice his life, in the hope it might save his master's. He bravely contended with them, refused quarter, and died with his sword in his hand; exclaiming as he fell, "You have killed your prince." And this declaration was believed by many. "We cannot, however," says the biographer of the events of Culloden, "without pride, mention the astonishing fact, that though the sum of thirty thousand pounds sterling was long publicly offered for his apprehension, and though he passed through very many hands, and both the reward and his person were perfectly well known to an intelligent and very inquisitive people, yet no man or woman was to be found capable of degrading themselves by earning so vast a reward by betraying a fugitive, whom misfortune had thrown upon their generosity." At length, on the 19th of September, the young pretender embarked with twenty-five gentlemen and one hundred and seven common men, in a French vessel, sent for that purpose to the coast; and after a passage of ten days he arrived at Roseau, near Morlaix, and immediately proceeded to Paris, where he was kindly received by Louis XV. But his hopes were for ever fled. The courage and fortitude he displayed in Scotland seem to have forsaken him with a reverse of fortune, and during the remainder of his days no trace of noble ambition marked his actions.

The duke of Cumberland had now become the idol of the nation; and for his bravery at Culloden the parliament voted 25,000*l.* per annum in addition to his former income. Several acts were passed for protecting the government of Scotland, and securing its loyalty; and many executions of the rebels took place in different parts of the kingdom. Bills of indictment for high treason were found against the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, and lord Balmerino, who were tried in Westminster-hall. All three pleaded guilty; Kilmarnock and Balmerino were executed on Tower-hill, but Cromartie's life was spared. Foremost among those who had engaged to venture their lives and fortunes in restoring the Stuart family to the throne of England was lord Lovat, a man whose character was branded with many vices, and whose great age (for he was in his 90th year) had not deterred him from taking an active part in fomenting and encouraging the late rebellion. Being found guilty by his peers, he was remanded to the Tower, where in a few months afterwards he was beheaded. At this last scene of his life he behaved with great propriety; his behaviour was dignified and composed; he surveyed the assembled multitude with a cheerful countenance, and taking up the axe to examine it, he repeated from Horace, then laying his head on the block, it was severed from his body at a single stroke.

A.D. 1747.—We must now briefly allude to the state of affairs on the continent. Early in the spring the duke of Cumberland led his troops thither, to join our Austrian and Dutch allies. The French had a decided advantage in point of numbers, and marshal Saxe, their commander, commenced the campaign with the invasion of Dutch Brabant. But, with the exception of the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, by the French, the war was languidly carried on. This celebrated siege, however, lasted from the 16th of July to the 16th of September, and presented a continued scene of horror and destruction; but though the town was burnt, the garrison had suffered little, while heaps of slain were formed of the besiegers. The governor, calculating from these circumstances on the impregnability of the fortress, was lulled into false security; whilst the French troops threw themselves into the fosse, mounted the breaches, and entered the garrison; and thus became masters of the navigation of the Scheldt. In Italy, the allies, though forced to raise the siege of Genoa, were generally successful.

At sea the English well maintained their superiority. In an engagement with the French off Capa Finisterre, the English were victorious; and several richly laden ships, both outward and homeward bound, fell into their hands. Admiral Hawke, also, defeated the French fleet, off Belleisle, and took six sail of the line.

In November a new parliament assembled, and the ministers derived much popularity on account of the suppression of the late rebellion, as well as for the naval successes. All parties, however, were tired of the war, and preparations were made for opening a congress at Aix-la-Chapelle preliminary to a general peace; but as the issue of it was uncertain, the usual grants and subsidies were readily voted without inquiry. Though so long since began, it was not till October in the following year that this treaty of peace was concluded. The chief parties to it were Britain, Holland, and Austria on one side, and France and Spain on the other. By it all the great treaties from that of Westphalia in 1648, to that of Vienna in 1738, were renewed and confirmed. France surrendered her conquests in Flanders, and the English in the East and West India. But the right of British subjects to navigate the American seas without being subject to search by the Spaniards was suffered to pass unnoticed, although that was the original bone of contention and the basis of the attacks made on Walpole's ministry. The only advantage, indeed, that England gained, was the recognition of the Hanoverian succession, and the general abandonment of the pretender, whose cause was from henceforth regarded as hopeless.

A.D. 1749.—The war being at an end, the disbanding of the army naturally followed; and, as must ever in some degree be the case at such a time, the idle and unemployed committed many depredations on the public. To remedy this, a colony was established in Nova Scotia, where lord Halifax went out as governor, and laid the foundation of a town, which, in compliment to its projector the earl of Halifax, was named after him. It was soon found that the soil of Nova Scotia was incapable of repaying the labourer for his toil, and many who had been transported there obtained leave to go to more southern latitudes. They who remained excited the jealousy of the native Indians, who still resided on the borders of this barren spot; and the French, who were the first European settlers there, encouraged this jealous feeling. Meantime the animosity between the English and French grew stronger, till at length the latter claimed the whole territory between the Mississippi and New Mexico on the east, and to the Apalachian mountains, on the west. From the fact of their having been the first to discover that river, they took from the English, who had settled beyond those mountains, their possessions, and erected forts to protect all the adjacent country.

A. D. 1751.—The first event of any importance this year was the death of Frederick, prince of Wales, which happened on the 10th of March, in the 45th year of his age. His death was caused by an abscess in his side, that formed from the blow of a cricket ball which he received while playing at that game on the lawn of Cliefden-house, Bucks, a collection of matter having been produced that burst in his throat and suffocated him. The prince had long been on bad terms with his father, whose measures he uniformly opposed; and though the anti-ministerial party, and a considerable portion of the people spoke highly of his benevolence and munificence, and loudly applauded his conduct at the time, it is clear that much of his patriotism originated in a vain desire for popularity. He left five sons and three daughters; his eldest son, George, being only eleven years old; a regency was consequently appointed; but the king surviving till the prince attained his majority, there was never any occasion for it to act.

The most memorable act passed in the course of this session was that for regulating the commencement of the year, and correcting the calendar according to the Gregorian computation. The New Style, as it was termed, was introduced by pope Gregory XIII. in the 16th century, and had long been adopted by most states on the continent. By this act, therefore, it was provided that the year should begin on the 1st day of January, instead of, as heretofore, on the 25th day of March, and that eleven intermediate nominal days between the 2nd and 14th of September, 1752, should be omitted; the Julian computation, supposing a solar revolution to be effected in the precise period of 365 days and six hours, having made no provision for the deficiency of eleven minutes, which, however, in the lapse of eighteen centuries amounted to a difference of eleven days. Bills were also passed for the better prevention of robberies, for the regulation of places of amusement, and for punishing the keepers of disorderly houses; the necessity of this arising from the spirit of extravagance which prevailed throughout the kingdom, as dissipation and amusement occupied every class of society.

Among the domestic events of this year no one created more sensation than the death of Henry St. John, viscount Bolingbroke; a nobleman who had for half a century occupied a high station in the country, whether we regard him in the character of a statesman, an orator, an author, or a polished courtier. He possessed great energy and decision of character, but he was deficient in that high principle and singleness of purpose that inspires confidence and leads to unquestioned excellence.

The new parliament was opened on the 10th of May, 1753; and the first business of the house was to take into consideration the state of Ireland, which, in proportion as it advanced in civilization, showed a disposition to shake off its dependence on England. The kingdom was in a state of tranquillity at the session which terminated the labours of the last parliament; but previous to the new election, the death of Mr. Pelham caused several changes in the government offices; the late minister was succeeded in the treasury by his brother, the duke of Newcastle; and unanimity now prevailed in the cabinet.

A. D. 1755.—We have before alluded to the animosity which existed between the English and French relative to their North American possessions. Hostilities were now commenced by the colonial authorities, without the formality of a declaration of war; the Virginian port of Log's Town was surprised by a French detachment, and all its inhabitants but too inhumanly murdered; the North American Indians were stimulated to attack the British colonists, and large supplies of arms and ammunition were imported from France. The British ministers immediately prepared for hostilities; all the French forts within the limits of Nova Scotia were reduced by colonel Monkton; but an expedition against the French forts on the Ohio, commanded by general Braddock, met with a severe defeat; the general falling into an ambuscade of French and Indians, was slain, and the regular soldiers fled with disgraceful precipitation. The provincial militia, however, led by colonel Washington, displayed good courage, nobly maintaining their ground, and covering the retreat of the main army. The loss of the English on this occasion was very severe: upwards of 700 men, with several officers, were slain; the artillery, stores, and provisions became the property of the victors, as well as the general's cabinet, containing his private instructions &c. of which the enemy availed himself to great advantage. Two other expeditions, destined for the attack of Crown Point and fort Niagara, also failed. But the reprisals at sea more than compensated for these misfortunes, as upwards of three hundred merchant ships and eight thousand seamen were captured that year by British cruisers.

A.D. 1757.—FATAL RIOT AT MANCHESTER, OCCASIONED BY THE PRICE OF CORN.

A.D. 1756.—Notwithstanding hostilities had been carried on nearly a twelvemonth, war was not formally declared till May 18: the chief subject of complaint being the encroachments of the French on the Ohio and Nova Scotia. This was followed by threats of invasion upon England or Ireland; in consequence of which a body of Hessian and Hanoverian troops was introduced to defend the interior of the kingdom; a measure which gave rise to considerable discontent, as most people thought that the ordinary force of either country was sufficient to repel invasion. But whilst the government was providing for its internal security, the enemy was making serious attempts to wrest from us our possessions both in the East and West Indies. The reduction of Minorca was a favourite object of the French government; a formidable force was landed on the island, and close siege laid to Fort St. Philip, which commands the principal tow and harbour. The governor, general Blakeney, made a long and able defence: but admiral Byng, who had been entrusted with the charge of the English fleet in the Mediterranean, and was ordered to attempt the relief of the place, seems to have been destitute of any decisive plan; and, after avoiding an action with a French squadron, he returned to Gibraltar, abandoning Minorca to its fate, which, to the infinite chagrin of the nation, fell into the hands of the enemy.

The surrender of Minorca was an unexpected blow, and the rage of the people at its loss was directed against the unfortunate Byng, who being tried by a court-martial at Portsmouth, was condemned to death, for not doing his utmost to engage the enemy, but recommended to the mercy of the crown, as it did not appear to the court that it was through cowardice or disaffection. Great exertions were made to save the admiral's life, but in vain; he was ordered to be shot on board the Monarque, and he met his fate with coolness and intrepidity.

In America a second series of expeditions against the French forts signally failed; while the marquis de Montcalm, the governor of Canada, captured Oswego, where the British had deposited the greater part of their artillery and military stores.—But it is time that we call the reader's attention to the progress of affairs in our Eastern possessions.

A.D. 1757.—The jealousy which had been created among the petty independent princes of India, by the privileges which the emperor of Delhi had granted to the English settlers at Calcutta, had risen to an alarming height; but successful means had been used to allay their fury until the accession of the ferocious Suraja Dowla, son-in-law of Bengal, who was enraged at the shelter which the English afforded to some of his destined victims. He advanced towards Calcutta, where the governor and most of the local authorities, panic-stricken, made their escape in boats, leaving about a hundred and ninety men, under the control of

Mr. Holwell, to make the best of their forlorn situation. This mere handful of Englishmen, composing the garrison, for a short time bravely defended themselves, but when they fell into the power of the infuriated Suraja, he ordered the unhappy prisoners, then amounting to one-hundred and forty-six, to be thrust into the prison of Calcutta, called the Black hole; a room less than twenty feet square. Here the heat and foulness of the air reduced them to the most pitiable state imaginable; and when on the following morning an order came for their release, only twenty-three were found alive. The news of this horrid catastrophe reached Madras just when colonel Clive and admiral Watson, flushed by their recent victory over the celebrated pirate Angria, had arrived at Madras to aid in the destruction of the French influence in the Deccan. Calcutta was therefore the scene of their next operations; and no sooner did the fleet make its appearance before that city than it surrendered. The French fort of Chandernagore was reduced; several of the Suraja Dowla's own places were taken, conspiracies were formed against him, and the haughty chieftain felt that the sovereignty of Bengal must be decided by a battle. Contrary to the opinion of all his officers, Clive resolved to engage him, although the disparity of their forces was prodigious. He accordingly took up a position in the grove of Plassy: his troops in the whole not exceeding three thousand two hundred men, of whom only nine hundred were Europeans; while Suraja Dowla had with him fifty thousand foot, eighteen thousand horse, and fifty pieces of cannon. So great were the errors committed by the enemy, and so skilfully did the British commander use his means, that a complete victory was won, at the astonishingly small loss of seventy men in killed and wounded. This event laid the foundation of the British dominion in India; and in one campaign we became possessed of a territory which, in its wealth and extent, exceeded any kingdom in Europe.

A.D. 1759.—Whilst victory followed victory in the eastern world, a change in the English ministry led to similar successes in the west. It was at this period that the celebrated William Pitt (afterwards earl of Chatham) was brought into office, with Mr. Legge; but both of them being opposed to the expensive support of continental expeditions, they would have been dismissed by the king, but for the popularity their principles had acquired. In North America the British arms had been tarnished by delays and disasters that might have been avoided; and it was therefore resolved on to recall the earl of Loudon, and entrust the military operations to generals Abercrombie, Amherst, and Forbes, the first named being the commander-in-chief. Amherst laid siege to Louisbourg, and aided by the talents of brigadier Wolfe, who was fast rising into eminence, forced that important garrison to surrender. This was followed by the entire reduction of Cape Breton, and the inferior stations which the English occupied in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Brigadier-general Forbes was sent against Fort du Quene, which the French at his approach abandoned. But the expedition against Ticonderago, which Abercrombie himself undertook, failed of success; the number and valour of his troops being unequal to the capture of a place so strongly fortified.

An expedition was now planned against Quebec; and as the inhabitants of Canada had good reason to believe that their laws and religion would be respected, they were prepared to submit to a change of masters. Thus when general Wolfe proceeded up the St. Lawrence, he encountered no very serious opposition from the Canadians, who seemed to regard the approaching struggle with indifference. While Wolfe advanced towards Quebec, general Amherst conquered Ticonderago and Crown Point, and sir W. Johnson gained the important fortress of Niagara. Amherst expected to be able to form a junction with Wolfe, but in this he was disappointed; and though the inadequacy of his force made him almost despair of success, the ardent young general resolved to persevere in this hazardous enterprise. Having effected a landing in the night, under the heights of Abraham, he led his men up this apparently inaccessible steep, thereby securing a position which commanded the town. The marquis de Montcalm was utterly astonished when he heard that so daring and desperate an effort had been achieved by the English troops. A battle was now inevitable, and both generals prepared for the contest with equal courage. It was brief but fierce; the scale of victory was just beginning to turn in favour of the British, when a ball pierced the breast of Wolfe, and he fell mortally wounded. The unhappy tidings flew from rank to rank; every man seemed determined to avenge the loss of his general; and with such impetuosity did they charge the enemy, that the words "They run!" resounded in the ears of Wolfe as, expiring, he leaned on a soldier's breast. "Who run?" he eagerly inquired; and on being told it was the French, he calmly replied, "I die happy." The marquis de Montcalm fell in the same field, and met his fate with similar intrepidity. In skill and valour he was no way inferior to his more youthful rival. When told, after the battle, that his wounds were mortal, he exclaimed, "So much the better: I shall not live to witness the surrender of Quebec." In a few days after this battle, the city opened its gates to the British, and the complete subjugation of the Canadas speedily followed.

A.D. 1760.—In the East India the success of the English was scarcely less decisive than in America. By land and by sea several victories had been gained in that quarter; and at length colonel Coote and the French general Lally fought a determined battle at Wandewash (Jan. 21), in which the French were signally defeated, and their influence in the Carnatic destroyed.

The war on the continent, in which the English had taken a very active part, had now raged for four years, without gaining any other advantage than the gratification of defending the possessions of their sovereign in Germany. England, indeed, was now in a state of unparalleled glory. At sea, the conduct of her admirals had destroyed the naval power of the French; in the Indies her empire was extended, and the English rendered masters of the commerce of the vast peninsula of Hindostan; while in Canada a most important conquest had been achieved. These important acquisitions made the English very impatient of the German war; and they asserted that the French islands in the West Indies, more valuable to a commercial people than half the states of Germany, might have been gained with less expense and risk than had been spent in defending one paltry electorate. In the midst of these disputes, George II. died suddenly, on the 25th of October, in the 77th year of his age, and the 34th of his reign. The immediate cause of his decease was a rupture of the right ventricle of the heart. If we impartially regard the character of this king, we shall find both in his private and public conduct room for just panegyric. That during his whole reign he evinced a remarkable affection for his Hanoverian subjects is certainly true; yet his exposing that country to the attacks of the enemy, rather than neglect the rights of England in North America, clears him of the imputation of partiality. In his temper he was hasty and violent, yet his general conduct was so little influenced by this, that it was generally mild and humane. He was impartial in the administration of justice, sincere and open in his intentions, and temperate and regular in his manner of living. Under his reign the agriculture, commerce, and industry of Great Britain daily increased; and his subjects, even when at war with the most powerful nations of Europe, enjoyed peace at home, and acquired glory abroad.

Great progress had been made during this reign in disseminating a taste for general literature and the arts; and though it was not the fashion for the magnates of the land to be very liberal of their patronage to such as devoted their minds to the advancement of science, still much was done towards pioneering the way for a future age, when a solution of many of the phenomena of nature might seem to demand more serious attention. Among the great historians were Hume, Gibbon, and Robertson. In philology and criticism were Warburton, Bentley, and Boyle. Mathematics and astronomy could boast of Halley, Bradley, and Maclaurin. Theology was distinguished by the eminent names of Potter, Hoadley, Sherlock, Doddridge, Watts, Chandler, and many others. Painting had its Reynolds, Ramsay, and Hogarth; music, its Handel, Boyce, Greene, and Arne; and among the votaries of the muses were Pope, Akenside, Thompson, Young, Gray, Glover, and others scarcely less distinguished.

CHAPTER LX.

The Reign of GEORGE III.

A.D. 1760.—GEORGE II. was succeeded by his grandson, GEORGE III., eldest son of Frederic, prince of Wales, whose death has been mentioned as occurring in 1751. On his accession to the throne he was twenty-two years of age; affable, good-tempered, upright, and religious. His education had been under the direction of lord Bute, and he had a great advantage over his predecessors, in being acquainted with the language, habits, and institutions of his countrymen: his first entrance into public life consequently made a favourable impression on his subjects; and addresses, containing professions of the most loyal attachment, poured in from all parts of the kingdom.

On his majesty's accession, the nominal head of the administration was the duke of Newcastle; but Mr. Pitt, principal secretary of state, was the presiding genius of the cabinet. The chief remaining members were lord Northampton, afterwards lord chancery; lord Carteret, president of the council; the duke of Devonshire, lord chamberlain; Mr. Legge, chancellor of the exchequer; lord Anson, first lord of the admiralty; and lord Holderness, secretary of state. On the 18th of November the king met his parliament, and in a popular speech, which he commenced with, "Born and educated in this country, I glory in the name of Briton,"—the flourishing state of the kingdom, the brilliant successes of the war, and the extinction of internal divisions were acknowledged; while the support of the "protestant interest," and a "safe and honourable peace," were declared to be the objects of the war. An act was then passed for granting to his majesty an annual income of 800,000*l*.

A.D. 1761.—One of the first important acts of the new monarch was a declaration of his intention to marry the princess Charlotte, daughter of the duke of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz: the necessary preparations were accordingly made; she arrived in London on the 8th of September, the nuptials took place that evening in the royal chapel, and on the 22nd their majesties were crowned in Westminster-abbey.

Soon after the king's accession, negotiations for peace were commenced by the courts of France and Great Britain, but there was little honesty of intention on either side; Mr. Pitt being firmly resolved to humble the house of Bourbon, while the duke of Choiseul, on the part of France, was relying on the promises of Spanish aid, to enable him to carry on hostilities with increased vigour. The war languished in Germany; but at sea the honour of the British flag was still nobly sustained. Peace appeared to be desirable for all parties, and negotiations were resumed; but neither power was willing to make concessions; and Mr. Pitt having discovered that an intimate connexion between the courts of Versailles and Madrid had been formed, he proposed a council to anticipate the hostile intentions of the latter, by seizing the plate fleet, laden with the treasures of Spanish America. To this the king and the rest of the ministers were adverse; the consequence of which was, that Mr. Pitt and his brother-in-law, lord Temple, sent in their seals of office. His majesty, anxious to introduce his favourite, the earl of Bute, into the cabinet, accepted the premier's resignation; and in return for his great services, a pension of 3000*l*. per annum was settled upon him, which was to continue to his wife, (on whom the title of baroness Chatham was conferred) and their eldest son, for their lives.

A.D. 1762.—A very few months after the late changes in the cabinet had occurred, it became fully evident that the "family compact" of the houses of Bourbon had been completed. On this occasion the new ministry showed no want of alacrity in maintaining their country's honour; and on the 4th of January war was declared against Spain. The first blow was struck by admiral Rodney, who captured Martinico; which was followed by the surrender of the dependent isles, Grenada, St. Lucie, and St. Vincent. The next expedition undertaken by the English was equally successful; a fleet under admiral Pococke, assisted by an army under the earl of Albemarle, was sent against Havannah, the capital of the island of Cuba, which surrendered after a vigorous resistance of two months. The riches acquired by the English on this occasion amounted to twelve ships of the line, besides money and merchandize to the amount of four millions sterling.

While these successes attended the British arms in the West Indies, an armament from Madras, under general Draper and general Cornish, reduced the island of Manilla, and its fall involved the fate of the whole range of the Philippine islands. The capture of the Hermione, a large Spanish register ship, took place soon after, and the cargo, which was estimated at a million sterling, passed in triumph to the bank at the same hour in which the birth of the prince of Wales was announced to the public (April 12, 1762).

An attempt made by Spain to subdue Portugal having proved unsuccessful, and both France and Spain being heartily tired of a war which threatened ruin to the colonies of both, they became desirous of peace; this being agreeable to the British ministry, of whom the earl of Bute was then at the head, preliminaries were speedily set on foot. Indeed, so anxious was his lordship to avoid a continuance of hostilities, that he not only stopped the career of colonial conquest, but consented to sacrifice several acquisitions that Britain had already made. The definitive treaty was concluded at Paris on the 11th of February, 1763. Florida was received in exchange for Havannah; Cape Breton, Tobago, Dominica, St. Vincent, Grenada, and Senegal were retained; the conquest of Canada remained intact, and the British nation had also gained large possessions and a decided superiority in India.

A. D. 1733.—In Germany the marquis of Granby signalised himself at the head of the allied army; and, in union with the king of Prussia, would in all probability have succeeded in expelling the French troops, had not a general treaty of peace put an end to the contest. Britain by the colonial war obtained complete maritime supremacy; she commanded the entire commerce of North America and Hindostan, and had a decided superiority in the West Indian trade. But during the "seven years' war" a question arose which led to very important discussions: France, unable to maintain a commercial intercourse with her colonies, opened the trade to neutral powers; England declared this traffic illegal, and relying on her naval superiority, seized neutral vessels and neutral property bound to hostile ports. The return of peace put an end to the dispute for a season, but the subject has since been the fruitful source of angry discussion in every subsequent war.

The earl of Bute, under whose auspices the late peace had been made, had always been beheld with jealousy by the popular party, who accused him of having formed that "influence behind the throne greater than the throne itself,"—though it really seems to have been a mere delusion, fostered and encouraged for factious purposes—now suddenly resigned his office of first lord of the treasury, and was succeeded by Mr. George Grenville.

The public attention was now almost wholly bent on the result of the trial of John Wilkes, member for Aylesbury, a man of good talents and classical taste, but who bore a very profligate character. Disappointed in his expectations from the ministry, he assumed the part of a violent patriot, and inveighed vehemently against the measures pursued by government. The press teemed with political pamphlets, to which the ministerial party seemed indifferent, until the appearance of No. 49 of the North Briton, in which very strong and scurrilous abuse was published against the king's speech delivered at the close of parliament. A general warrant was thereupon issued for apprehending the author, printer, and publisher of it; and Mr. Wilkes being taken into custody, he was sent to the Tower, and all his papers were seized. He was afterwards tried in the court of common pleas, and acquitted, lord chief-justice Pratt declaring against the legality of general warrants; that is, warrants not specifying the names of the accused.

But Wilkes, after his release, having republished the offensive paper, an information was filed against him at his majesty's suit, for a gross libel, and the North Briton was burned by the hands of the common hangman; nor did the matter end here; the legality of general warrants gave rise to several stormy debates in the house of commons; and at length Mr. Wilkes was expelled for having printed in his own house an infamous poem, called "An Essay on Woman," with notes, to which the name of bishop Warburton was affixed. As he did not appear to the indictment preferred against him, he was declared an outlaw. He then retired to France; and we may here as well observe, though in doing so we overstep our chronological boundary, that in 1768 he returned to England, and by submitting to the fine and imprisonment pronounced against him, procured a reversal of the sentence of outlawry. He then offered himself to represent the county of Middlesex, and was unanimously chosen, in opposition to the ministerial candidates. He afterwards commenced a prosecution against the earl of Halifax, and recovered 4000*l.* damages for his imprisonment in the Tower upon an illegal warrant.

A. D. 1765.—This year is rendered important in the annals of England by the passing of an American stamp-act, which gave rise to those disputes which alienated the colonies from the mother country, and ended in a total separation. As the late war had been entered into by Great Britain, in order to protect her American settlements from the encroachments of the French, it was thought reasonable that they should contribute towards the expenses which had been incurred. A bill was accordingly brought into parliament, and received the royal assent, for imposing a stamp and other duties on fifty-three articles of their commerce. However, eventually, the resistance made by the Americans to these imposts, and the general discontent which prevailed in England, occasioned the repeal of the act. A change in the ministry, by the introduction of the marquis of Rockingham, was the immediate consequence; but his rule was of very limited duration, and the duke of Grafton was appointed first lord of the treasury. The privy seal was bestowed on Mr. Pitt, who was now created earl of Chatham; lord Camden succeeded lord Northampton as lord chancellor, and Mr. Townshend was made chancellor of the exchequer.

The affairs of the East India Company now claimed the attention of the house. Mr. Vansittart had acted as governor-general from the time of colonel Clive's return to England in 1760. But the viceroy of Bengal had opposed the company, and a war ensued which ended by the English making an entire conquest of the kingdom of Bengal. The preceding year the company sent over lord Clive, who found that their agents had acquired the custom of exacting large sums as presents from the native princes; by which means they had accumulated great riches, and the name of an Englishman had become odious. Lord Clive resolved to restrain the rapacity of these persons, and he concluded a treaty for the company, by which they would enjoy a revenue of 1,700,000*l.*

The wealth of this powerful body rendered it too formidable in the eyes of government, and a question arose whether the East India Company had any right to territorial jurisdiction. On examining into their charter, it appeared that they were prohibited from making conquests; and it being proved that they had subdued some of the native princes, and annexed their dominions to the company's settlements, it was agreed that this commercial association should be brought in some degree under the control of parliament.

The metropolis was for a long time agitated with the affair of Wilkes; of which a set of restless demagogues took advantage to disturb the public mind, already over-excited by the opposition to the measure of government as regarded the North American colonies. But no national event worthy of historical record occurred for some considerable time.

One or two matters of domestic interest which happened during this period must, however, be noticed. The first relates to an address from the corporation of London to the king, which was presented on the 23rd of May, 1770, in which they lamented the royal displeasure they had incurred in consequence of their former remonstrances; but they still adhered to it, and again prayed for a dissolution of parliament. To which his majesty replied that "he should have been wanting to the public, as well as to himself, had he made such an use of the prerogative as was inconsistent with the interest, and dangerous to the constitution of the kingdom." Upon this, the lord mayor Beckford, a high-spirited and fearless democrat, begged leave to answer the king. Such a request was as indecorous as it was unusual; but in the confusion of the moment, leave was given; and, with great fluency of language, he delivered an extempore address to his majesty, concluding in the following words:—"Permit me, sire, to observe, that whoever has already dared, or shall hereafter endeavour, by false insinuations and suggestions, to alienate your majesty's affections from your loyal subjects in general, and from the city of London in particular, and to withdraw your confidence from, and regard for, your people, is an enemy to your majesty's person and family, a violator of the public peace, and the betrayer of our happy constitution as it was established at the glorious and necessary revolution." No reply was given, but the king reddened with anger and astonishment. When his civic lordship again appeared at St. James's, the lord-chamberlain informed him that his majesty desired that nothing of the kind might happen in future.

An ex-officio prosecution against Woodfall, the printer and publisher of the "Public Advertiser," in which the "Letters of Junius" originally appeared, having placed him at the bar, lord Mansfield informed the jury that they had nothing to do with the intention of the writer, their province was limited to the fact of publishing; the truth or falsehood of the alleged libel was wholly immaterial. The jury, however, after being out nine hours, found a verdict of guilty of printing and publishing only, which in effect amounted to an acquittal. These celebrated "Letters" were equally distinguished by the force and elegance of their style, as by the virulence of their attacks on individuals; and though conjecture has ever since been busy to discover the author, and strong circumstantial evidence has been brought forward at different times to identify different persons with the authorship, no one has yet succeeded in the attempt.

Before this time (1771) the parliamentary debates had only been given in monthly magazines and other periodicals published at considerable intervals. The practice of daily reporting now commenced; but as it was an innovation on the former practice, and in direct violation of the standing orders of the house, several printers were apprehended and taken before lord-mayor Crosby and aldermen Oliver and Wilkes, who discharged them, and held the messenger of the commons to bail for false imprisonment. The house of commons, enraged at this daring contempt of their authority, committed their two members, Crosby and Oliver, to the Tower; but eventually the matter was suffered to drop; the aldermen were liberated; and from that time the publication of the parliamentary proceedings has been continued.

On the death of Mr. Townshend, who did not long survive his appointment to the office of chancellor of the exchequer, he was succeeded by lord North.—Lord Chatham having now lost his influence over the ministry, and being dissatisfied with their proceedings, resigned his place as lord keeper of the privy seal, and retired from the cares of government.

In the late arrangements made between government and the East India Company, permission was given to the latter to export tea free of duty. Lord North hoped that the low price of the article would induce the Americans to pay the small duty charged on importation by the English legislature, for the mere purpose of maintaining its right of taxation. Custom-houses had been established in their ports, for the purpose of collecting these duties; which being considered by the Americans as an infringement of their liberty, they resolved to discontinue the use of British commodities. Accordingly, when three vessels, laden with tea, arrived at Boston, they were boarded during the night by a party of the townsmen, and the cargoes thrown into the sea. This outrage, followed by other acts of defiance, and a repetition of similar conduct on the part of the inhabitants of South Carolina, gave great offence, while it occasioned considerable alarm in England; and acts were passed for closing the port of Boston, and for altering the constitution of the colony of Massachusetts.

When the order to close the port of Boston reached America, a copy of the act, surrounded with a black border, was circulated through all the provinces, and they resolved to spend the 1st of June, the day appointed to put the act into execution, in fasting and prayer. Whilst each province was framing resolutions, the other bills reached Massachusetts. These raised their irritated feelings to the highest pitch, and they formed an association, in which they bound themselves by a solemn league and covenant, to break off all commercial intercourse with Great Britain, until the Boston port bill and other acts should be repealed, and the colony restored to its ancient rights. In this situation of affairs the British parliament assembled, when a conciliatory plan for accommodating the troubles of America was proposed in the house of lords by the earl of Chatham, and rejected. The petition and remonstrance of THE CONGRESS were also rejected, and an application made by their agents to be heard at the bar of the house of commons was refused.

"Upon the great question of taxing the American colonies," observes Mr. Wade, in his "British History," p. 466, "there was a general coincidence of opinion, both in the nation and legislature. The populace expressed no sympathy with the claim of the Bostonians to be exempt from the fiscal jurisdiction of parliament; neither does it appear there were many addresses in their favour from the county freeholders, nor the great commercial and municipal bodies of the kingdom. Among the chief political leaders there were shades of difference, which may be ascribed to their position, as they happened to be members or not of the government, but there hardly seems to have been a substantive disagreement.—The right of taxation was as indisputable as the right of resistance. Unrepresented Boston or Baltimore had no greater claim to exemption from parliamentary government than unrepresented Birmingham or Manchester. They participated in the advantages of the general government of the mother country, and were equally bound to contribute to its general expenditure. But it does not follow that they were always to remain in a state of minority and dependence. If they had the power and were competent to the task of self-government, they had an unquestionable right to its benefits, and to make the experiment." Another recent authority, of equal value, has this remark: "It is useless to conceal that the American war was popular at its commencement. The vague notion of dominion over an entire continent flattered English pride, and the taxes which the ministers demanded, promised some alleviation to the public burdens. The colonial revolt was regarded by many as a rebellion, not against the British government, but the British people, and the contest was generally looked upon in England as an effort to establish, not the royal authority, but the supremacy of the nation."

A. D. 1775.—An open rupture between the parent state and its colonies was evidently approaching with rapid strides. Determined to support their cause with the utmost vigour, the Americans at once proceeded to train their militia, erect powder mills in Philadelphia and Virginia, and prepare arms in every province. They also assumed the appellation of "the United Colonies of America," established an extensive paper currency, and were very active in raising a regular army. On the other hand, the authority of the British government was promptly supported by general Gage, who had lately been appointed governor of Massachusetts's bay. This officer having received intelligence that some military stores belonging to the provincials were deposited at a place called Concord, he sent thither a detachment of soldiers to destroy them; but on their return to Boston, these troops were pursued by a body of provincials, who would have succeeded in cutting them off, had not the general sent out a large force to cover their retreat. The loss of the English on this occasion amounted to 273 men; of the Americans only 50 were killed and 38 wounded. War had therefore now actually commenced; and the provincials, elated with their success, pursued their hostile intentions with increased vigour. Having a short time after surprised the fortresses of Ticonderago and Crown Point, and by that means possessed themselves of upwards of 100 pieces of cannon, besides a large quantity of military stores of every description, they assembled an army of 20,000 men, which they entrusted to Mr. George Washington, and resolved to lay siege to Boston. In the meantime the English cabinet having received intelligence, if these resolute proceedings, sent a reinforcement to their army, with the generals Howe, Burgoyne, and Clinton. The Americans, not all intimidated by these measures, persisted in blockading Boston; and in the night of the 16th of June they took possession of and fortified an eminence called Bunker's-hill, from which they could open a formidable cannonade on the town. To this point general Gage sent two thousand men, in order to dislodge them; in which attempt they at last succeeded, but not without a loss so heavy, that the English general resolved to confine himself for the future to defensive operations.

Hitherto, notwithstanding their uninterrupted success, the American colonists had disclaimed all idea of assuming independence; but that, on the contrary, as was averred in a petition from the congress, presented to the king by Mr. Penn, a descendant of the founder of Pennsylvania, they were extremely desirous of effecting a compromise. He at the same time assured the government, that if the present application was rejected, they would enter into alliance with foreign powers; and that such alliances, if once formed, would be with great difficulty dissolved. The petition was however rejected; an act was passed, prohibiting all trade with the colonies, and another, by which all American vessels were declared enemies' ships.

deavours to conciliate the ministry were ineffectual, gave orders to their generals to endeavour to subjugate such of the colonies as remained faithful to Great Britain. Two parties were sent into Canada, under general Montgomery and colonel Arnold, who after having surmounted innumerable difficulties, laid siege to Quebec; but in this attempt they were overpowered: Montgomery was killed, Arnold was wounded, and their men were compelled to make a precipitate retreat. While the Americans were thus unsuccessful in Canada, the British governors in Virginia and North and South Carolina had used their best endeavours to keep those provinces in alliance, but without effect; they therefore found themselves obliged to return to England. General Gage was recalled, and the command of the troops at Boston devolved on general Howe, who was soon after obliged to evacuate the place, and repair to Halifax, in Nova Scotia. The royal forces had no sooner relinquished the town than general Washington took possession of it, and, with the assistance of some foreign engineers, fortified it in such a manner as to render it almost impregnable. It now wanted little to effect a total alienation of the colonies from Great Britain; and the fact of having subsidized a large body of German mercenaries for the purpose of assisting in the subjugation of the revolted provinces, served as a fair excuse for the congress to publish the declaration of independence of the thirteen United States, which took place on the 4th of July, 1776.

This bold measure was determined on at a time when the congress had no very flattering prospect before their eyes, and little to encourage them save the indomitable spirit of resistance that every where manifested itself to British supremacy. Its army was a raw militia, and it was unprovided to any extent with ships or money; while the English forces, greatly augmented, were preparing to besiege New York. General Howe had been joined by his brother, lord Howe, and on the 26th of August the campaign opened by the English taking possession of Long Island, preparatory to an attack on New York, which was captured on the 21st of September; Washington evacuating that city with the utmost precipitation. The city was soon after set on fire by some incendiaries, who had concealed themselves, and nearly a third part of it was destroyed. After an undeviating course of victory, general Howe led his troops into winter quarters; but in the disposition of them he departed from his usual prudence, and allowed them to be too much scattered; which occasioned the Hessian troops, who, from their depredations and cruelties, had roused the resentful feelings of the inhabitants of New Jersey, to be surprised in their cantonments, where nearly 1000 were taken prisoners, and many slain.

A.D. 1777.—Gratified with the intelligence they received of Howe's successes, the English ministry determined to follow them up by sending an army under general Burgoyne, from Canada through the northern states, to co-operate with Howe in the south. For a time every thing seemed to promise a favourable issue to this project; sir W. Howe defeated Washington at the battle of Brandywine, and took Philadelphia; while Burgoyne, having reduced Ticconderago, was pursuing his march southward. But innumerable difficulties lay in his way; and when he reached Saratoga, he was surrounded by the American forces under generals Gates and Arnold, and he and his whole army, amounting to 5752 men, were compelled to surrender prisoners of war. Thus ended a campaign which at the outset seemed so promising; but disastrous as it had turned out, neither the confidence of ministers nor of the British people appeared to be at all abated.

A. D. 1778.—Whilst England was engaged in this unfortunate contest with her colonies, a cessation seemed to have taken place in the contentions and animosities of other nations, and their whole attention was apparently engrossed by speculating on the novel scene before them. The great disturbers of mankind appear to have laid aside their rapacity and ambition, whilst they contemplated the new events which were transpiring, and predicted the conclusion of so strange a warfare. The enemies of England, who had long beheld, with apprehension, the increase of her commerce, and many of England's old allies who envied her the possession of such valuable colonies, were astonished at the revolution which threatened her, and looked forward with pleasure to the time when her power and glory should be wrested from her grasp. The Americans were received, protected, and openly caressed by France and Spain, who, beginning to feel the influence of that commerce from which they had been so long excluded, treated the colonies with respect, and rejected the feeble remonstrances of England's ambassadors. Happy had it been for France, and happy for the world, if, content with reaping the benefits of American commerce, they had remained spectators of the contest, and simply profited by the dissensions of their neighbours. For it is beyond all doubt, that the seed of republicanism which was sown in America, sprung up and was nurtured in France, nor could its rank growth be checked till every acre of that fair land had been steeped in blood.

Crippled and pent up in situations from which they could not stir without danger, the royal troops exhibited a most forlorn appearance, while every day was adding to the strength and resources of the insurgents. They had established for themselves an efficient government; they had agents at the principal European courts; they raised and maintained armies; and they had, in fact, been recognised as an independent nation by two of the principal powers of Europe. The treaty between France and America was completed; and the discussions which arose on the notification of this circumstance to the Bri-

fish parliament, were stormy and violent. Though both parties were unanimous in their opinion that a war with France was unavoidable, yet the opposition, who had from the beginning reprobated the American war, insisted that the acknowledgement of the independence of the colonies was the only effectual method of terminating the contest. The ministerial party, on the other hand, represented the disgrace of bending beneath the power of France, and the dishonour of leaving the American loyalists exposed to the rancour of their countrymen.

An invasion of England being at this time threatened by the French, an address was moved for recalling the fleets and armies from America, and stationing them in a place where they might more effectually contribute to the defence of the kingdom. This measure was vigorously opposed by the administration, and by some members of the opposition. Lord Chatham, whose infirmities had lately prevented him from attending in his place in parliament, evinced his decided disapprobation of it; he had entered the house in a rich suit of black velvet, a full wig, and wrapped in flannel to the knees; and was supported to his seat by his son and son-in-law, Mr. William Pitt and viscount Mahon. It is said that he looked weak and emaciated; and, resting his hands on his crutches, he at first spoke with difficulty, but as he grew warm his voice rose, and became, as usual, oratorical and affecting. "My lords, said he," I rejoice that the grave has not closed upon me, that I am still alive to lift up my voice against the dismemberment of this ancient and most noble monarchy." He was replied to with great respect by the duke of Richmond, when on attempting to rise again he fell back before uttering a word, in a convulsive fit, from which he never recovered, and died a few days after, in the 70th year of his age, May 11, 1778. His merits were transcendent, and his death was lamented as a national loss. Apart from the aberrations originating in an ardent love of power, his course was splendid and magnanimous; and it was truly said of him by lord Chesterfield, that his private life was stained by no vices, nor sullied by any meanness. Contemporary praise and posthumous honours were showered down upon the man of whom the nation was justly proud. His remains were interred, with great solemnity, in Westminster abbey; and the city of London erected a flattering tribute to his memory in Guildhall.

A French squadron was sent from Toulon to the assistance of America, under the command of count d'Estaing, who reduced the island of Grenada, while a body of his forces made themselves masters of St. Vincent. In other parts of the West Indian seas the British arms were ably supported by the bravery and vigilance of the admirals Hyde Parker and Rowley. On the 27th of July an indecisive action was fought off Brest, between the French fleet, under M. d'Orvilliers, and a British squadron, under admiral Keppel. Sir Hugh Palliser, the second in command, accused the admiral of not having done his duty; he was accordingly tried by a court-martial, and honourably acquitted; in fact, it appeared that he had been so badly supported by Palliser, that he was unable to make any use of the slight advantage he obtained.

Sir Charles Hardy, a brave and experienced officer, whose services had been rewarded with the governorship of Greenwich hospital, was appointed to succeed Keppel in the command of the channel fleet. In the meantime, the Spanish court was prevailed on by the French to take up arms in defence of America, and to accede to the general confederacy against Great Britain. As the danger to which the nation was now exposed was become truly alarming, it was thought advisable to raise volunteer companies in addition to the militia; and in this the spirit and magnanimity of the people reflected great credit on the national character. Strengthened by the alliance of Spain, the French began to extend their ideas of conquest; and thinking that a blow near at hand was more likely than operations carried on at a distance to alarm the fears of the English, they made attempts on the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, but in each they were completely frustrated.

But the old enemies of Britain had grown arrogant during the unnatural contest that was waged with the unruly scions of her own stock; and preparations were now made for Britain itself. A junction was effected between the French and Spanish fleets, which made their appearance in the channel, to the number of sixty sail of the line besides frigates. This formidable armament was opposed by a force much inferior, under admiral Hardy, who leisurely retired up the channel, enticing them to follow him, but, with all their immense superiority, they chose rather to decline an encounter; it is true they for some time continued to menace and insult the British coasts with impunity, but without accomplishing any thing further than the capture of the Ardent man-of-war, which by accident had fallen in with the combined fleets.

In calling the reader's attention to the state of the continent at this period, we have to notice that the peace which followed the memorable "seven years' war" was temporarily menaced by the efforts of the emperor Joseph to obtain possession of Bavaria; but the prompt interference of the king of Prussia, who brought into the field an immense army, together with the remonstrances of Russia, and the unwillingness of France to second the ambitious designs of Austria, induced the emperor to abandon his aggressive intentions.

A. D. 1780.—The first business of importance that came before the parliament this year was the state of Ireland, which brought from lord North a plan of amelioration that met with the approbation of the house, and, as it opened her ports for the import and export of her manufactures, the change was hailed as a happy omen for the sister kingdom. The next subject for legislative discussion was the wasteful and extravagant expenditure in the different official departments of the state; and the eloquence and financial knowledge of Mr. Burke were amply displayed in a plan for general reform, which was seconded by petitions from various parts of the kingdom, praying for a change of men as well as measures. But at this crisis the attention of all parties was attracted by a sudden alarm. Sir George Saville had in the preceding session proposed a bill to repeal the act of William III., which imposed certain penalties and disabilities on the Roman Catholics, and which passed both Houses without opposition. The loyal conduct of this body of his majesty's subjects, and their readiness to risk their lives and fortunes in defence of their king and country, were generally acknowledged; but in consequence of the population of Scotland expressing a dread of granting toleration to papists, the bill did not extend to that kingdom. This encouraged a set of fanatics in England to form themselves into an association, whose professed object was to protect the protestant religion, by revising the intolerant statutes which before existed against the Roman Catholics. The great majority of the members of this "protestant association" were at the time correctly described as "outrageously zealous and grossly ignorant"—persons who, had they been unassisted by any one of rank or influence, would have sunk into oblivion from their own insignificance; but Lord George Gordon, a young nobleman of a wild and fervid imagination, or, more correctly, perhaps, one who on religious topics was a monomaniac, finding this "association" would be likely to afford him an excellent opportunity of standing forth as the champion of the protestant faith, and thereby gaining a good share of mob notoriety, joined the club, and thus raised it into temporary importance. He became their chairman, and, free from even the apprehension of any fatal results, he proposed in a meeting of the society at Coachmaker's-hall, on the 29th of May, that they should assemble in St. George's Fields at 10 o'clock on the 2nd of June, when they should accompany him with a petition to the house of commons, praying a repeal of the late act of toleration granted to the Roman Catholics.

On the following Friday, the day appointed for this display of "moral force," the members of the house were much surprised—although there was every reason, after this public notice, to expect nothing less—to perceive the approach of fifty thousand persons distinguished by blue cockades in their hats, with the inscription, "No Popery." Lord George presented the petition to the house, and moved that it be taken into immediate consideration; but his motion was rejected by 192 votes to 6. During the discussion his lordship frequently addressed the mob outside, and told them the people of Scotland had no redress till they pulled down the catholic chapels. Acting upon this suggestion, the populace proceeded to demolish and burn the chapels of the foreign ambassadors. On the following Monday the number of the mob was greatly increased by the idle and the prodigal, who are ever ready for riot and plunder. Their violence was now no longer confined to the catholics, but was exerted wherever they could do most mischief. They proceeded to Newgate, and demanded the immediate release of such of their associates as had been confined there. On receiving a refusal they began to throw firebrands and combustibles into the keeper's dwelling-house. The whole building was soon enveloped in flames, and in the interval of confusion and dismay, all the prisoners, amounting to upwards of three hundred, made their escape and joined the rioters. The New Prison, Clerkenwell, the King's Bench, the Fleet prison, and New Bridewell, were also set on fire; and many private houses shared the same fate: in short, on that night London was beheld blazing in no less than thirty-six different places at once. At length they attempted the Bank, but the soldiers there inflicted a severe chastisement on them. The military came in from the country, and, in obedience to an order of the king in council, directions were given to the officers to fire upon the rioters without waiting the sanction of the civil power. Not only had the most fearful apprehensions been excited, and great injury done, but the character of the nation in the eyes of foreign powers could not fail to suffer almost indelible disgrace from such brutal and tumultuous scenes. It was not until a week had elapsed that tranquillity was restored; when it was found that 458 persons had been killed or wounded, exclusive of those who perished from intoxication. Under a warrant of the secretaries of state, Lord George Gordon was committed to the Tower on a charge of high treason; but when brought to trial the charge could not be sustained, and this most mischievous person was acquitted. However, though he escaped punishment for these proceedings, he was afterwards imprisoned for a libel on the queen of France, and ended his days in Newgate. Out of the rioters who were tried and found guilty, twenty-five of the most violent were hanged.

We gladly turn from these scenes of civil tumult to a more agreeable part of an historian's duty. The commencement of the year was attended with some considerable naval advantages to Great Britain. The fleet under the command of Sir Hyde Parker engaged a French squadron in the West Indies, and captured nine merchantmen. The success which attended admiral Rodney was more important. On the 16th of January he attacked, off Cape St. Vincent, a Spanish fleet, consisting of eleven ships of the line, captured four of them, drove two more on shore, and burned another; thence proceeding to America, he thrice encountered the French fleet, under the

A.D. 1780.—THE EARL OF SURREY AND SIR THOMAS GASCOYNE PUBLICLY RECOUNTED THE ERRORS OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

At the instant, a violent ague seized him, and he died on the 17th of 1781. At the commencement of this year the war in America was renewed with various success. The progress of the British forces under lord Cornwallis, in Virginia and the Carolinas, had raised great expectations of triumph in England, and had proportionably depressed the Americans; but the British general had to contend against the united forces of France and her transatlantic ally; and though he obtained some fresh laurels, his successes were rendered ineffectual by his subsequent reverses. At length, after making a most vigorous resistance against overwhelming numbers, while defending York Town, where he had fortified himself, he was compelled to capitulate; when the whole of his army became prisoners of war to Washington, and the British vessels in the harbour surrendered to the French admiral de Grasse. As no rational expectation of subjugating America now remained, the military operations in that quarter of the globe were regarded as of comparatively little consequence.

A. D. 1792.—Though the enemies of Great Britain had at this time gained decided advantages by land, and in numerical force possessed a manifest superiority by sea, yet such was the courage, perseverance, and power with which she contended against them single-handed, that notwithstanding the recent disasters in America and the enormous expenditure necessary to carry on so fierce and extensive a warfare, the splendour of the nation suffered no diminution; and exploits of individual heroism and brilliant victories continued to gladden the hearts of all who cherished a love of their country's glory. At the same time popular clamour and discontent rose to a high pitch on account of the depressed state of trade which the armed neutrality had caused; while invectives against the government for the mal-administration of affairs, as regarded the American war, were loud and deep. The whig opposition, making an adroit use of these disasters against lord North and his Tory friends, induced them to resign; and about the end of March they were succeeded by the marquis of Rockingham, as first lord of the treasury, the earl of Shelburne and Mr. Fox, principal secretaries of state, and lord Thurlow, lord chancellor; besides lord Camden, the dukes of Richmond and Grafton, Mr. Burke, admiral Keppel, general Conway, &c. to fill the other most important posts. The present ministry, however, had not continued in office above three months before a material change was occasioned by the death of the marquis of Rockingham. The earl of Shelburne being appointed to succeed that nobleman, his colleagues took offence; and lord Cavendish, Mr. Fox, Mr. Burke, and several others resigned. Mr. Townshend was then made secretary of state; and Mr. Pitt, second son of lord Chatham, succeeded lord Cavendish in the office of chancellor of the exchequer.

Negotiations for peace were now commenced by the new ministry, but without at all relaxing in their efforts to support the war. The islands of Minorca, St. Nevis, and St. Christopher's were taken by the enemy; and a descent on Jamaica was meditated with a fleet of thirty-four ships; they were, however, fortunately met by admiral Rodney off Dominica, and a most desperate engagement ensued, of nearly twelve hours' continuance, which terminated in the total defeat of the French; their admiral, count de Grasse, being taken prisoner, with the Ville de Paris, besides six other ships of the line and two frigates. In this action the bold nautical manoeuvre of breaking the line and attacking the enemy on both sides at once, was first tried and successfully executed. This glorious action was fought on the 12th of April; and about the same period, the fleet under admiral Barrington captured, off Ushant, two large French men-of-war, with ten sail of vessels under their convoy.

During this period the arms of Spain had been more than usually successful. In America they conquered the English fortresses on the Mississippi, as well as Pensacola and all Florida. But all their efforts, in combination with their French allies, against Gibraltar, proved fruitless; its brave governor, general Elliott, returning their tremendous cannonade with a well-directed and impetuous discharge of red-hot balls from the fortress, thereby utterly destroying the floating batteries which the besiegers had vainly boasted were irresistible. Ever and anon during the last five years this memorable siege had been carried on; but on the day after this ever-memorable bombardment and defence, (Sept. 13), not a vestige of all their formidable preparations remained.

In the East, Hyder Ally had succeeded in gaining the capital of Arcot, and his successes gave him strong hope that he should drive the British from that part of the globe; but sir Eyre Coote was victorious in more than one decisive engagement with Hyder, whose death soon after gave the government to his son Tippoo Saib; and as he appeared somewhat disposed to be on terms with England, affairs in that quarter wore a better aspect. Still the war in the East had a humiliating termination.

Some serious casual disasters occurred during the course of the year. Four large ships founded at sea on their return from the West Indies; and the Royal George, of 100 guns, a fine ship which had been into port to refit, was, while careening at Spithead, overtaken by a sudden gust of wind, and about 700 persons, with admiral Keppel, were drowned.

A. D. 1783.—The famous "coalition ministry," of incongruous celebrity, was now formed; the duke of Portland being first lord of the treasury; lord North and Mr. Fox, joint secretaries of state; lord John Cavendish, chancellor of the exchequer; viscount Keppel, first lord of the admiralty; viscount Stormont, president of the council; and the earl of Carlisle, lord privy-seal. These seven constituted the new cabinet, the whigs having a majority of one over the three tories, North, Carlisle, and Stormont. It was an ill-assorted and insincere compact, an abandonment of principle for power, which soon lost them the confidence and support of the nation.

Negotiations for a general peace commenced at Paris, under the auspices of Austria and Russia; and the basis of it being arranged, it was speedily ratified. Great Britain restored the island of St. Lucia to France; also the settlements on the Senegal, and the city of Poudicherry, in the East Indies; while France gave up all her West India conquests, with the exception of Tobago. Spain retained Minorca and West Florida, East Florida being also ceded in exchange for the Bahamas. And between England and Holland a suspension of hostilities was agreed to in the first place; but in the sequel it was stipulated that there should be a general restitution of all places taken during the war, excepting the town of Negapatnam, with its dependencies, which should be ceded to Great Britain.

In the treaty with America, the king of Great Britain acknowledged the thirteen United States to be "free, sovereign, and independent," relinquishing for himself, his heirs, and successors, all right and claim to the same. To prevent all disputes in future on the subject of boundaries between these states and the adjoining provinces, lines were minutely drawn; the right of navigation on the Mississippi was declared common to the two powers; and no confiscations or persecutions of the loyalists were to take place.

Such was the termination of the contest between Great Britain and the American colonies; a contest in which the former lost upwards of one hundred millions of money, and through which a federative state of vast extent and power sprung into existence. But great as the change was, the mother country had ultimately little real cause to regret the detachment of the thirteen provinces: freedom of commercial relations, advantageous to both countries, superseded a right of sovereignty which, in reality, was of far less value than it appeared to be. In short, the commerce of England, instead of being destroyed by the war of independence, increased most rapidly, and English trade was never more prosperous than in the period that succeeded the loss of the colonies. The Canadas and Nova Scotia shared in the rising prosperity of America; and the West India islands, emancipated from unwise commercial restrictions, also rapidly improved.

The coalition ministry was now to be subjected to a severe test. Mr. Fox thought proper to introduce to parliament two bills for the better government of India, by which the entire administration of the civil and commercial affairs of the company were to be vested in a board of nine members, chosen for four years, and not removable without an address from either house of parliament. That such a board would be an independent authority in the state was quite manifest; and it accordingly met with a determined opposition, particularly in the house of lords, where lord Thurlow observed, that if the bill passed, the crown would be no longer worthy of a man of honour to wear; that "the king would, in fact, take the diadem from his own head, and place it on that of Mr. Fox." This bill was thrown out by the lords, and this was immediately followed by a message from the king requiring Mr. Fox and lord North to send in their seals of office by the under secretaries, as "a personal interview with him would be disagreeable." Early the next morning letters of dismissal were sent to the other members of the cabinet. Thus an end was put to the coalition ministry, which was considered by the greater part of the nation to have been a corrupt confederacy of two desperate factions to monopolise the principal offices of state, and to seize upon the government of the country.

A.D. 1782.—A new administration was now formed, in which Mr. Pitt was appointed first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. Lord Sydney (late Mr. Townshend) and the marquis of Carmarthen, were made secretaries of state; lord Thurlow, lord high chancellor; the duke of Rutland, privy-seal; earl Gower, president of the council; the duke of Richmond, master of the or nance; lord Howe, first lord of the admiralty, and Mr. Dundas, treasurer of the navy. It being, however, impossible to carry on public business while the coalition party had a majority in the house of commons, a dissolution of parliament became unavoidable.

The elections turned out favourably for the new ministers, and when the parliament assembled, his majesty met the representatives of the people with evident satisfaction. He directed their attention to the affairs of the East India Company, advising them at the same time to reject all such measures as might affect the constitution at home. Mr. Pitt had strenuously opposed Mr. Fox's India bill, and now finding himself ably supported, framed a new one for the government of India, which transferred to the crown the influence which Mr. Fox had designed to entrust to parliamentary commissioners, but leaving the whole management of commercial affairs with the court of directors.

The year 1785 furnishes little matter for the historian, except the contentions between the rival politicians. A very important effort of legislation was made by Mr. Pitt, which consisted of an attempt to establish a system of commercial union between Great Britain and Ireland. It passed both houses; but, in the meantime, a great part of the Irish parliament became dissatisfied with its details; the consequences of which was, that the administration did not press its adoption.

A. D. 1786.—Early in the session Mr. Pitt introduced to parliament his celebrated plan of a "sinking fund" for the gradual reduction of the national debt. It appeared that the condition of the revenue was in so flourishing a state, that the annual receipts exceeded the expenditure by 900,000*l*. It was therefore proposed that this sum should be increased to one million, and placed in the hands of commissioners appointed for the purpose, to be applied to the discharge of the national debt. After some opposition, and an amendment suggested by Mr. Fox, the bill passed.

On the 2nd of August, as the king was alighting from his carriage, a woman approached him under pretence of offering a petition, and attempted to stab him with a knife she had concealed. His majesty avoided the blow by drawing back, when she made another thrust at him, but was prevented from effecting her purpose by a yeoman of the guards who seized her at the instant. On being examined before the privy council, it appeared that she was a lunatic; her name Margaret Nicholson.

Nothing at this period excited equal interest to the trial of Mr. Hastings, the governor of Bengal, who had returned to England, possessed, as it was asserted, of inordinate wealth obtained by unfair means. The trial was conducted by Mr. Burke, who exhibited twenty-two articles of impeachment against him. On the part of the prosecution Mr. Sheridan appeared victoriously eloquent. He said, "The administration of Mr. Hastings formed a medley of meanness and outrage, of duplicity and depredation, of prodigality and oppression, of the most callous cruelty, contrasted with the hollow affectation of liberality and good faith. Mr. Hastings, in his defence, declared, "That he had the satisfaction to see all his measures terminate in their designed objects; that his political conduct was invariably regulated by truth, justice, and good faith; and that he resigned his charge in a state of established peace and security; with all the sources of its abundance unimpaired, and even improved." The trial lasted seven years, and ended in the acquittal of Mr. Hastings, at least of all intentional error; but his fortune and his health were ruined by this protracted prosecution.

The debts of the prince of Wales engrossed much of the public attention at this period. His expensive habits and munificent disposition had brought his affairs into a very embarrassed state; and the subject having undergone parliamentary discussion, an addition of 10,000*l*. was made to his former income of 50,000*l*., and the sum of 181,000*l*. was granted by parliament for the payment of his debts.

A. D. 1788.—An event occurred about this time in Holland which threatened the tranquillity of Europe. Ever since the acknowledgment of the independence of the United Provinces, two powerful parties had been continually struggling for the superiority: one was the house of Orange, which had been raised to power by their great services to the state, both against the tyranny of Spain and the efforts of France; the other was the aristocratical party, which consisted of the most wealthy individuals in the country. This party was secretly favoured by France, and was denominated the "party of the states," or "the republican party." The prince of Orange being at length compelled to leave the Hague, he applied to England and Prussia for protection, who lent their aid, and the stadtholder was reinstated.

It was during this session that the attention of parliament was first engaged in attempting the abolition of the slave trade. This inhuman traffic, so abhorrent in its nature to all principles of humanity, seems to have been carried out by Great Britain and other nations for a length of time without having attracted the notice of the public. It was first pointed out by the quakers in the independent provinces of South America, who in many instances had emancipated their slaves. A number of pamphlets were published on the subject; several eminent divines of the established church recommended it in their discourses and writings; the two universities, and after them, the whole nation, presented petitions praying for the interference of parliament to forward the humane design of African emancipation. Mr. Wilberforce brought the subject before parliament; but as many circumstances arose to retard the consideration of it, a resolution was carried to defer it till a future opportunity.

Towards the close of the year the nation was thrown into great dismay by the fact that the king was suffering under a severe mental malady; so much so, that on the 4th of November it was necessary to consult the most eminent physicians, and to assemble the principal officers of state. His majesty's disorder not abating, but the contrary appearing from the examination of the physicians before the privy-council, the house twice adjourned; but hearing on their re-assembling the second time that there was a great prospect of his majesty's recovery, though the time was uncertain, both houses turned their thoughts to the establishment of a regent during his majesty's incapacity. The right of the prince of Wales to this office was asserted by Mr. Fox, and denied by Mr. Pitt, who affirmed, that for any man to assert such a right in the prince of Wales was little less than treason to the constitution. After violent altercations, a modified regency was carried in favour of the prince; the queen to have the custody of the royal person, and the appointment to places in the household. For the present, however, these arrangements were not needed, for the health of the king was rapidly improving; and on the 10th of March his majesty sent a message to parliament, to acquaint them of his recovery, and of his ability to attend to the public business of the kingdom. The effect of this pleasing intelligence was instantaneous; every town and village in the kingdom testified their loyalty and attachment to the sovereign; and sorrow was succeeded by rapturous exultation.

A.D. 1789.—According to a promise given by the king, that the British constitution should be extended to Canada, that province now applied for a form of legislature.

For the better accommodation of its inhabitants, Mr. Pitt proposed to divide the province into Upper and Lower Canada; and to provide separate laws which might suit the French Canadian noblesse on the one hand, and the British and American colonists on the other. In the course of the discussion, Mr. Fox observed that it would be wrong to abolish hereditary distinctions where they had been long established, and equally wrong to create those distinctions in a country which was not suited for their establishment. This drew from Mr. Burke the observation that "it became a duty of parliament to watch the conduct of individuals, and societies, which were evidently disposed to encourage innovations." Mr. Fox thinking these sentiments contained a censure on him, defended his opinions by a full explanation of his sentiments on the French revolution. Mr. Burke had previously written an excellent work, intended to operate as an antidote to the growing evils of republicanism and infidelity. In parliament, he denounced the insidious cry of liberty and equality, and a breach was thus made in the long-cemented friendship of these two distinguished statesmen, which ever after remained unclosed.

A.D. 1790.—At this period France had begun to exhibit scenes of anarchy and confusion, which, for monstrous wickedness and wide-spread misery, never before had their parallel in the world's history. A condensed narrative of those revolutionary horrors will be found under the proper head. We shall here simply observe, en passant, that the progress of free-thinking, mis-called philosophy, which had been much encouraged in that country during the last century, had diffused a spirit of innovation and licentiousness that was highly unfavourable to the existence of an absolute monarchy. Moreover, the participation of France in the American struggle for independence, had instilled into the minds of Gallo-American champions of liberty a perfect detestation of regal authority; and on their return from that vaunted land of freedom, they imparted to their countrymen the spirit of liberty which had been kindled in the western hemisphere. But, perhaps, the more immediate cause of this wild ebullition of popular fury, arose from the embarrassed state of the finances, which induced Louis XVI. to assemble the states-general in order to consider the measures by which this serious evil might be redressed.

The pernicious principles and revolting practices we have briefly alluded to, so contrary to all ideas of good government, were circulated with great zeal and activity throughout the neighbouring nations. So resolute were they in disseminating their opinions, that there was scarcely a place in Europe in which their agents were not established. In Great Britain and Ireland these democratic missionaries were received with every mark of approbation, not only by individuals, but by various political societies, who made it their study to propagate their principles, and recommend their example; and in the transactions of these societies, the means by which the French revolution had been conducted were greatly applauded, and described as worthy of the imitation of mankind.

On the opening of parliament in February, his majesty, in his speech from the throne, remarked that he had received continual assurances of the pacific dispositions of the continental powers, and congratulated the nation on the advantages which must arise from such an uninterrupted tranquillity. The supplies for the army and navy having been stated to the house, some animadversions took place with regard to the military establishment, which it was said might have been safely reduced. In the course of the debate, Mr. Fox took occasion to remark, that the French soldiers during the late commotions had, by refusing to obey the dictates of the court, set a glorious example to the military of Europe, and had shown that men by becoming soldiers did not cease to be citizens—a remark, certainly, most objectionable at the time, if not positively seditious, and as such it was treated by Mr. Burke and other members.

During the present session, a message from the king informed the house of some hostile proceedings on the part of Spain, who had seized three British ships that were endeavouring to establish a foreign trade between China and Nootka Sound, on the west coast of North America; the Spaniards insisting on their exclusive right to that part of the coast. Orders were immediately issued for augmenting the British navy; but the expected rupture between the two countries was averted by timely concessions on the part of Spain.

A new parliament having met on the 20th of November, the king, after making some remarks on the state of Europe, observed that the peace of India had been disturbed by a war with Tippoo Sultan, son of the late Hyder Ally. The business of the session was then entered into, and various debates occurred with respect to the convention with Spain, and the expensive amount that had been prepared anticipatory of a war with that power.

A.D. 1791.—The whole kingdom was now divided into two parties, arising from the opposite views in which the French revolution was considered; one condemning the promoters of Gallic independence as the subverters of all order; while the other considered the new constitution of France as the basis of a system of politics, from which peace, happiness, and concord would arise to bless the world! On the 14th of July, the anniversary of the demolition of the Bastille, the "friends of liberty" agreed to celebrate that event by festive meetings in the principal towns in the kingdom. These meetings were rather unfavourably regarded by the opponents of the revolution, as indicative of principles inimical to the British constitution; but no public expression of disapprobation had yet appeared. In the metropolis and most of the other towns these meetings had passed over without any disturbance; but in the populous town of Birmingham, where a disension had long subsisted between the high churchmen and the dissenters, its consequences were very alarming. A seditious hand-bill, which represented the late transactions in France as worthy to be imitated by the English, having been circulated about the town by some unknown person, created a great sensation. The friends of the intended meeting thought it necessary to disclaim the sentiments contained in the hand-bills; but as their views were misrepresented, the hotel in which the meeting was held was soon surrounded by a tumultuous mob, who expressed their disapprobation by shouts of "Church and King!" In the evening the mob demolished an Unitarian meeting-house belonging to the celebrated Dr. Priestley, and afterwards attacked his dwelling-house and destroyed his valuable library. For three days the rioters continued their depredations, but tranquillity was restored on the arrival of the military, and some of the ringleaders were executed.

A.D. 1792.—Parliament assembled Jan. 31, and were agreeably surprised by a declaration of the minister, that the finances of the nation would allow him to take off taxes to the amount of 200,000*l.*, and to appropriate 400,000*l.* towards the reduction of the national debt. He then descanted on the flourishing state and happy prospects of the nation, declaring at the same time how intimately connected its prosperity was with the preservation of peace abroad and tranquillity at home.

The duke of York having at the close of the previous year married the princess Frederica Charlotta, eldest daughter of the king of Prussia, the commons passed a bill to settle 25,000*l.* per annum on the duke, and 8,000*l.* on the duchess should she survive him.—The house also, during this session, went into a committee on the African slave-trade, and gave it as their opinion that it should be abolished. In the course of debate, Mr. Pitt and many others spoke in favour of its immediate abolition. After many divisions the term was limited to the 1st day of January, 1796. In the house of lords several of the peers were in favour of its indefinite continuance.

The war in India against Tippoo Saib had lately been vigorously conducted by lord Cornwallis, who having surmounted all impediments, commenced the siege of Seringapatam, the capital of Tippoo's dominions. This reduced that prince to such difficulties as compelled him to conclude peace on the terms offered by the earl, and to deliver up his two sons as hostages for the performance of the conditions.

CHAPTER LXI.

A. D. 1790.—"WHEN your neighbour's house is on fire, it is well to look after your own," says a true but wise old saw. The rapidity with which the new political principles of the French republicans were diffused throughout Great Britain, and the numerous inflammatory libels which were issued from the press, awakened well-grounded apprehensions of the government, and induced the legislature to adopt measures for the suppression of the growing evil. The moral as well as the political remnants of French republicanism were fast developing; and every reckless demagogue was busily at work, disseminating the poison of infidelity and sedition. To put a stop, if possible, to this state of things, a royal proclamation was issued for the suppression of seditious correspondence abroad, and publications at home "tending to bring into contempt the wise and wholesome provisions made at the time of the glorious revolution." The London Corresponding Society, and various other societies in this country, had recently sent congratulatory addresses to the National Assembly of France! But the heart of England was still sound, although some of the limbs were leprous.

In the meantime affairs on the continent became every day more interesting. An alliance was entered into between Russia, Austria, and Prussia, the ostensible object of which was to re-establish public security in France, with the ancient order of things, and to protect the persons and property of all loyal subjects. On the 25th of July the duke of Brunswick, commander-in-chief of the allied armies, issued at Coblenz his celebrated manifesto to the French people, promising protection to all who should submit to their king, and threatening the city of Paris with fire and sword if injury or insult were offered to him or any of his family. The republicans, indignant at this foreign interference, now resolved on the king's dethronement. Having by their mischievous publications turned the tide of disgust against their sovereign, and persuaded the populace that the royalists had invited the allies to invade them, the suspension of royal authority was soon after decreed, the king and his family were closely confined in the Temple, all persons who were attached to monarchical government were cast into prison or massacred; and, to crown the whole, the inoffensive monarch was led forth to execution, and while praying to the Almighty for pardon his enemies, ignominiously perished by the guillotine.

While these detestable scenes of murder were displayed in France, the vigilance of the English government was excited by the propagation of revolutionary principles, and it was compelled to employ such measures as the dangerous circumstances of the country demanded. The sanguinary conduct of the French revolutionists, their extravagant projects, and unholy sentiments, naturally alarmed all persons of rank and property; and associations, not merely of the high and wealthy, but of all classes who had anything to lose, were formed for the protection of liberty and property against the efforts of anarchists and levellers. But still there were many desperate characters ready to kindle the flame of civil war on the first favourable opportunity. Another proclamation was therefore issued, in which it was stated, that evil-disposed persons were acting in concert with others in foreign countries, in order to subvert the laws and constitution; and that a spirit of tumult and sedition having manifested itself on several occasions, his majesty had resolved to embody part of the national militia. This was, in fact, a measure absolutely necessary on another account, it being clear that the French republic had resolved to provoke England to a war, by the most unjustifiable breach of the laws of nations: this was, their avowed design to open the river Scheldt, in direct opposition to the treaties of which England was a guarantee, and to the manifest disadvantage of the commerce of the United Provinces, who were the allies of England.

So portentous was the political aspect at this time, that it was thought necessary to summon the parliament sooner than usual. In the speech from the throne, his majesty declared that he had hitherto observed a strict neutrality in regard to the war on the continent, and had refrained from interfering with the internal affairs of France; but that it was impossible for him to see, without the most serious uneasiness, the strong and increasing indications which appeared there, of an intention to excite disturbances in other countries, to disregard the rights of neutral powers, and to pursue views of unjust conquest and aggrandizement. He had therefore taken steps for making some augmentation of his naval and military force; and he recommended the subject to the serious attention of parliament. After very long and animated debates on the address of thanks for the king's speech, (during which many of the opposition, who were by this time thoroughly disgusted with the French revolutionists, deserted their party,) the motion was carried by a large majority.

The next subject which engaged the attention of parliament was the alien bill, which authorized government to dismiss from the kingdom such foreigners as they should think fit. During the month of December, an order of government was also issued, for preventing the exportation of corn to France; and several ships laden with grain were compelled to unload their cargoes.

A. D. 1793.—That a war between Great Britain and France was speedily approaching, was believed by all parties; yet war was neither foreseen nor premeditated by the king's ministers: it was the unavoidable result of circumstances. In a decree of the French convention on the 19th of November, 1792, they had declared their intention of extending their fraternity and assistance to the disaffected and revolting subjects of all monarchical governments. The disavowal of this assertion was demanded by the British ministry; but as this was not complied with, M. Chauvelli, ambassador from the late king of France—though not acknowledged in that light by the republic—received orders to quit the kingdom, in virtue of the alien act. In consequence of this measure, the French convention, on the 1st of February, declared war.

No sooner was Great Britain involved in this eventful war, than a treaty of commerce was concluded with Russia, a large body of troops was taken into the service of government, and an engagement was entered into by the king of Sardinia, who agreed, for an annual subsidy of 200,000*l.*, to join the Austrians in Italy with a very considerable military force. Alliances were likewise formed with Austria, Prussia, Spain, Holland, Portugal, and Russia, all of whom agreed to shut their ports against the vessels of France. Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland, however, refused to join the confederacy. The king of the Sicilies agreed to furnish 6000 troops and four ships of the line; the empire also furnished its contingents to the Austrian and Prussian armies; and British troops were sent to the protection of Holland, under the command of the duke of York.

The French army, commanded by general Dumouriez, invaded Holland, and having taken Breda, Gertruydenburg, and some other places, advanced to Williamstadt, which was defended by a detachment from the brigade of the English guards, just arrived in Holland. Here the French met with a repulse, and were compelled to raise the siege with great loss. Dumouriez then quitted Holland to defend Louvain; but being afterwards defeated in several engagements with the allied armies, particularly at Neer-winden, his soldiers were so discouraged, that they deserted in great numbers. At length, weary of the disorganized state of the French government, and finding himself suspected by the two great factions which divided the republic, Dumouriez entered into negotiations with the allied generals, and agreed to return to Paris, dissolve the national convention, and free his country from the gross tyranny which was there exercised under the specious name of equality. But the conventionalists withheld his supplies, and sent commissioners to thwart his designs and summon him to their bar. He instantly arrested the officers that brought the summons, and sent them to the Austrian headquarters. But the army did not share the anti-revolutionary feelings of the general, and he was himself obliged to seek safety in the Austrian camp, accompanied by young Egalité, (as he was then styled) son of the execrable duke of Orleans, and now Louis Philippe, king of the French!

ous to extend their conquests along the frontier: he accordingly marched towards Dunkirk, and commenced the siege on the 27th of August. He expected a naval armament from Great Britain to act in conjunction with the land forces; but, from some unaccountable cause, the heavy artillery was so long delayed, that the enemy had time to provide for the defence of the town. The French troops, commanded by Houchard, poured upon them in such numbers, that the duke was compelled to make a precipitate retreat, to avoid losing the whole of his men. He then came to England, and having held a conference with the ministers, returned to the continent. At Valenciennes it was decided in a council of war, that the emperor of Germany should take the field, and be invested with the supreme command.

The principal persons of the town and harbour of Toulon entered into an agreement with the British admiral, lord Hood, by which they delivered up the town and shipping to his protection, on condition of its being restored to France when the Bourbon restoration should be effected. The town, however, was not for any long time defensible against the superior force of the enemy which had come to its rescue; it was therefore evacuated, fourteen thousand of the inhabitants taking refuge on board the British ships. Sir Sidney Smith set fire to the arsenals, which, together with an immense quantity of naval stores, and fifteen ships of the line, were consumed. On this occasion the artillery was commanded by Napoleon Buonaparte, whose skill and courage was conspicuous; and from that day his promotion rapidly took place.

The efforts made by the French at this time were truly astonishing. Having prodigiously increased their forces, they were resolved to conquer, whatever might be the cost of human life. Every day was a day of battle; and as they were continually reinforced, the veteran armies of the allies were obliged to give way. On the 22nd of December they were driven with immense slaughter from Hagennu; this was followed up by successive defeats till the 17th, when the French army arrived at Weissenburg in triumph. During this last month the loss of men on both sides was immense, being estimated at between 70,000 and 80,000 men. The French concluded the campaign in triumph, and the allied powers were seriously alarmed at the difficulties which were necessary to be surmounted, in order to regain the ground that had been lost.

In the East and West Indies the English were successful. Tobago, St. Domingo, Pondicherry, and the French settlements on the coast of Malabar and Coromandel, all surrendered to them.

A. D. 1794.—From the great and important events which were transacting on the continent, we turn to the internal affairs of Great Britain. The French republic having menaced England with an invasion, it was proposed by ministers that associations of volunteers, both of cavalry and infantry, might be formed in every country, for the purpose of defending the country from the hostile attempts of its enemies, and for supporting the government against the efforts of the disaffected.

On the 12th of May a message from the king announced to parliament the existence of seditious societies in London, and that the papers of certain persons belonging to them had been seized, and were submitted to the consideration of the house. Several members of the Society for Constitutional Information, and of the London Corresponding Society, were apprehended on a charge of high treason, and committed to the Tower. Among them were Thomas Hardy, a shoemaker in Piccadilly, and Daniel Adams, secretaries to the before named societies; the celebrated John Horne Tooke; the rev. Jeremiah Joyce, private secretary to earl Stanhope; John Augustus Bonney, an attorney; and Messrs. Thelwall, Richter, Lovatt, and Storr. They were brought to trial in the following October, and had the good fortune to be acquitted.

Every appearance on the grand theatre of war indicated a continuance of success to the French in the ensuing campaign. The diligence and activity of their government, the vigour and bravery of their troops, the abilities and firmness of their commanders, the unwearied exertions of all men employed in the public service, astonished the whole world. Filled with an enthusiastic devotion to the cause in which they had embarked, their minds were intent only on the military glory and aggrandizement of the republic. While the whole strength which could be collected by the allies amounted to less than four hundred thousand men, the armies of France were estimated at upwards of a million.

Though the superiority by land was at present evidently in favour of the French, yet on the ocean "Old England" maintained its predominance. During the course of the summer the island of Corsica was subdued; and the whole of the West India islands, except part of Guadaloupe, surrendered to the troops under the command of sir Charles Grey and sir John Jervis. The channel fleet, under its veteran commander, lord Howe, sailed from port, in order to intercept the Brest fleet, which had ventured out to sea to protect a large convoy that was expected from America. The hostile fleets despatched each other on the 28th of May, and as an engagement became inevitable, the enemy formed in regular order of battle. On the morning of the 1st of June a close action commenced; the enemy's fleet consisting of twenty-six sail of the line, and the British of twenty-five. Though the battle did not last long, it was very severe, and proved decisive; seven of the French ships being compelled to strike their colours, one of which, La Vengeance, went down with all her crew almost immediately on being taken possession of. In the captured ships alone, the killed and wounded amounted to 1270. The total loss of the British was 906. When intelligence of this memorable victory arrived in England, it produced the greatest exultation, and the metropolis was illuminated three successive nights.

This naval loss of the French, though it considerably diminished the ardour of their seamen, was greatly overbalanced by the general success of their military operations. The principal theatre of the contest was the Netherlands, where generals Jourdan and Pichegru had not less than 200,000 good troops, headed by many expert and valiant officers, and abundantly supplied with all the requisites of war. To oppose this formidable force, the allies assembled an army of 146,000, commanded by the emperor in person, assisted by generals Clairfait, Kaunitz, prince Coburg, the duke of York, &c. Numerous were the battles, and enormous the loss of life on each side during this campaign: in one of these bloody conflicts alone, the battle of Charleroi, the loss of the Austrians was estimated at 15,000 men. The armies of France were, in fact, become irresistible, and the allies retreated in all directions: Nieuport, Ostend, and Bruges; Tournay, Mons, Oudenarde, and Brussels; Landreies, Valenciennes, Condé, and Queenoï—all fell into their hands. During this victorious career of the French in the Netherlands, their armies on the Rhine were equally successful; and though both Austrians and Prussians well maintained their reputation for skill and bravery, yet the overwhelming masses of the French, and the fierce enthusiasm with which these republicans fought, were more than a match for the veteran bands by whom they were opposed.

But the military operations of the French were not confined to the Netherlands and the frontiers of Germany; they had other armies both in Spain and Italy. The kingdom of Spain, which was formerly so powerful as to disturb, by its ambition, the peace of Europe, was at this time so much reduced by superstition, luxury, and indolence, that it was with difficulty the court of Madrid maintained its rank among the countries of Europe. It was therefore no wonder that the impetuosity and unobscured energy which proved so destructive to the warlike Germans, should overwhelm the inert armies of Spain, or that their strongholds should prove unavailing against such resolute foes. In Italy, too, the French were not less fortunate. Though they had to combat the Austrian and Sardinian armies, a series of victories made them masters of Piedmont, and the campaign ended there, as elsewhere, greatly in favour of revolutionized France.

Having in some measure overstepped our historical boundary line, by giving even this very hasty and imperfect view of transactions with which Great Britain was only indirectly concerned, though at the time of their occurrence they were of the deepest interest to the nation—we shall now return to the operations of the common enemy in the Netherlands, which, notwithstanding the approach of winter, were conducted with great perseverance. The duke of York was posted between Bois-le-Duc and Breda, but being attacked with great impetuosity by the superior numbers of Pichegru, he was overpowered, and obliged to retreat across the Maese, with the loss of about 1,500 men. On the 30th of September Crevecoeur was taken by the enemy, and Bois-le-Duc surrendered immediately after. They then followed the duke across the Maese, when his royal highness found it necessary to cross the Rhine, and take post at Arnheim. Nimeguen fell into the hands of the French on the 7th of November; and as the winter set in with uncommon severity, the whole of the rivers and lakes of Holland were bound up by the frost. At the beginning of January, 1795, the river Waal was frozen over; the British troops were at the time in a most deplorable state of ill health; and the enemy, seizing the favourable opportunity, crossed the river with an army of 70,000 men, and having repulsed the force which was opposed to them, on the 16th of January took possession of Amsterdam. The fortresses of Williamstadt, Breda, Bergen-op-Zoom, admitted the French; the shattered remnant of the British army was obliged to retreat, under the most severe privations, and in a season unusually inclement; and the prince of Orange escaped in a little boat, and landed in England, where he and his family became the objects of royal liberality. The United Provinces were now revolutionized after the model of France; the rights of man were proclaimed, representatives of the people chosen, and the country received the name of the Batavian republic. If there were any in Holland who seriously expected that this new order of things was likely to prove beneficial to the country, they soon had experience to the contrary; for, on the one hand, the English seized their colonies and destroyed their commerce, while on the other, the French despised their new confederates, and treated them with all the hauteur of insolent conquerors.

A. D. 1795.—At the conclusion of the past year the aspect of affairs on the continent was most gloomy and unpromising. The French republic had suddenly become more extensive by its conquests than France had been since the days of Charleinnagne; they had acquired an increased population, estimated at thirteen millions which, added to twenty-four millions contained in France, constituted an empire of 37,000,000 people. As this immense population inhabited the centre of Europe, they were capable by their position to defy the enmity of all their neighbours, and to exercise an influence almost amounting to an universal sovereignty.

The consternation of Great Britain and the allied powers was greatly increased by the conduct of the king of Prussia, who withdrew from the coalition, and concluded a treaty of peace with the French convention. This act, in addition to the dismemberment of Poland, was commented on in the British parliament in terms of severe and merited censure. He had received large subsidies from England, and was pledged, as a member of the coalition, to do his utmost towards the overthrow of regal France and the restoration of the Bourbons; and his defection at such a time was as unprincipled, as the effect of it was likely to be disastrous. But the English and Austrians, encouraged by the distracted state of France, more especially by the royalist war in La Vendee, continued their efforts; notwithstanding Spain followed the example of Prussia, and the duke of Tuscany, also, deserted the allies.

Though unfortunate in her alliances, and unsuccessful in the attempts made by her military force on the continent, Great Britain had still the satisfaction of beholding her fleets riding triumphantly on the ocean. On the 23rd of June, admiral lord Bridport attacked the French fleet off L'Orient, and captured three ships of the line. Some other minor actions also served to show that Britain had not lost the power to maintain her naval superiority. As Holland was become subject to France, letters of reprisal were issued out against the Dutch ships, and directions were given for attacking their colonies, with the intention, however, of restoring them when the stadtholder's government should be re-established. The Cape of Good Hope was obliged to submit to the British arms, together with Trincomalee, and all the other United settlements except Batavia.

The other events of the year may be thus summed up.—The marriage of the prince of Wales with the princess Caroline of Brunswick; a match dictated by considerations of what are termed prudence, rather than of affection: the prince's debts at the time amounted to 620,000*l.*, and parliament agreed to grant him 125,000*l.* per annum in addition to his income arising from the duchy of Cornwall, a portion being reserved for the gradual liquidation of his debts.—The death of Louis XVII., son of the unfortunate Louis XVI. and lawful sovereign of France, in prison.—The acquittal of Warren Hastings, after a trial which had lasted seven years.—The commencement of the societies of United Irishmen against, and of Orange clubs in favour of, the government.—A dearth of corn in England, with consequent high prices, great distress, and riots which created much alarm.

In seasons of scarcity and consequent high prices, the multitude are easily excited to acts of insubordination. At this period their attention had been roused to political subjects by some meetings held in the open fields, at the instance of the corresponding societies, where the mutual invectives against government had formed the staple of their discourse, and the people had been more than usually excited. A report was circulated that vast bodies of the disaffected would make their appearance when the king proceeded to open parliament; and so it proved, for the amazing number of 200,000 persons assembled in the park on that occasion, Oct. 29. An immense throng surrounded his Majesty's carriage, clamorously vociferating, "Bread Peace! No Pitt!" some voices also shouting out, "No King!" while stones were thrown at the coach from all directions, and on passing through Palace-yard, one of the windows was broken by a bullet from an air-gun. On entering the house, the king, much agitated, said to the lord chancellor, "my lord, I have been shot at." On his return these scandalous outrages were repeated; and a proclamation was issued offering a thousand pounds reward for the apprehension of the persons concerned in these seditious proceedings.

A.D. 1796.—The late unjustifiable insults to the sovereign were the subject of deep regret to all who wished well to the institutions of the country and the maintenance of true freedom; while even those who were inimical to the government were greatly displeased, inasmuch as they felt assured that ministers would apply for additional legislative powers. And so it proved;
for the business of parliament was no sooner resumed than two new penal statutes were brought forward. The first was entitled "an act for the preservation of his majesty's person and government against treasonable and seditious practices and attempts." By the other bill it was enacted, that no meeting of any description of persons exceeding the number of fifty, except such as might be called by sheriffs or other magistrates, should be held for political purposes, unless public notice should have been given by seven housekeepers; that if such a body should assemble without notice, and twelve or more individuals should remain together, (even quietly) for an hour after a legal order for their departure, they should be punished as felons without benefit of clergy; and that the same rigour might be exercised, if any person after due notice of the meeting should use seditious language, or propose the irregular alteration of any thing by law enacted. The discussions which took place on these bills in both houses were very animated, and they passed with great majorities.

The unremitting struggle which during this campaign took place on the continent, between the allied armies and those of France, was far too important as regarded the interests of Great Britain for us to pass it lightly over, however little it may at first appear to belong strictly to British history. The French armies on the frontiers of Germany were commanded by their generals Moreau and Jourdan; the army of Italy was conducted by Napoleon Buonaparte. This extraordinary man, whose name will hereafter so frequently occur, had, like Pichegru, Jourdan, Moreau, &c. attained rapid promotions in the republican armies. In 1791 he was a captain of artillery; and it was only at the siege of Toulon, in 1793, that his soldierly abilities began to be developed. He had now an army of 56,000 veterans under his command, opposed to whom were 80,000 Austrians and Piedmontese, commanded by general Beaulieu, an officer of great ability, who opened the campaign on the 9th of April. Having, after several engagements, suffered a defeat at Millesimo, he selected 7000 of his best troops, and attacked and took the village of Dego, where the French were indulging themselves in security. Massena, having rallied his troops, made several fruitless attempts during the day to retake it; but Buonaparte arriving in the evening with some reinforcements, renewed the attack, drove the allies from Dego, and made 14,000 prisoners. Count Colli, the general of the Sardinian forces, having been defeated by Buonaparte at Mondovi, requested a suspension of arms, which was followed by the king of Sardinia's withdrawal from the confederacy, the surrender of his most important fortresses, and the cession of the duchy of Savoy, &c. to the French. This ignominious peace was followed by similar conduct on the part of the duke of Parma, who, like the king of Sardinia, appeared to have no alternative but that of utter extinction.

The Austrian general Beaulieu being now no longer able to maintain his situation on the Po, retreated across the Adda at Lodi, Pizzighettone, and Cremona, leaving a detachment at Lodi to stop the progress of the enemy. These forces were attacked, on the 10th of May, by the advanced guard of the republican army, who compelled them to retreat with so much precipitation, as to leave no time for breaking down the bridge of Lodi. A battery was planted on the French side, and a tremendous cannonading kept up; but so well was the bridge protected by the Austrian artillery, that it was the opinion of the general officers that it could not be forced; but as Buonaparte was convinced that the reputation of the French army would suffer much if the Austrians were allowed to maintain their position, he was determined to encounter every risk in order to effect his object. Putting himself, therefore, at the head of a select body of his troops, he passed the bridge in the midst of a most destructive fire of the Austrian artillery, and then fell with such irresistible fury on his opponents, that he gained a complete victory. Marshal Beaulieu, with the shattered remnants of his army, made a hasty retreat towards Mantua, pursued by a large body of the French.
Pavia, Milan, and Verona, were now soon in their hands; and on the 4th of June they invested Mantua, the only place of importance which the emperor held in Italy.
Not long after, Buonaparte made himself master of Ferrara, Bologna, and Urbino; and next menaced the city of Rome. As the pope was incapable of resisting this unprovoked invasion of his territories, he was reduced to the necessity of soliciting an armistice, which was granted on very humiliating terms. He agreed to give up the cities of Bologna and Ferrara, with the citadel of Ancona, and to deliver up a great number of paintings and statues, and to enrich the conqueror with some hundreds of the most curious manuscripts from the Vatican library.

The court of Vienna now recalled Beaulieu, and gave the command to marshal Wurmsier; but the tide of success ran more strong against him if possible, than it had done against his predecessor. As Buonaparte was at this time employed in forming a republic of the states of Reggio, Modena, Bologna, and Ferrara, the Austrians had leisure to make new military arrangements. They reinforced marshal Wurmsier, and formed a new army, the command of which was given to general Alvinzi. At the beginning of November, several partial engagements took place between Alvinzi and Buonaparte, till the 16th, when a most desperate engagement at the village of Arcola ended in the defeat and retreat of the Austrians who lost about 13,000 men. Mantua, however, was still obstinately defended, but the garrison ceased to entertain hopes of ultimate success.

While the French army under Buonaparte was overrunning Italy, the armies on the Rhine, under Jourdan and Moreau, were unable to make any impression on the Austrians. The armistice which had been concluded at the termination of the last campaign, expired on the 31st of May, when both armies took the field; and the archduke Charles, who commanded the Austrians, gained several advantages over both Jourdan and Moreau, till, at the end of the year, the hostile armies having been harassed by the incessant fatigues they had undergone, discontinued their military operations during the winter.

The successes of Buonaparte in Italy, and the general aversion with which the people beheld the war, induced the British ministry to make overtures for peace with the French republic. Lord Malmesbury was accordingly dispatched to Paris on this important mission, and proposed as the basis, the mutual restitution of conquests; but there was no disposition for peace on the part of the French directory, and the attempt at pacification ended by a sudden order for his lordship to quit Paris in forty-eight hours. While these negotiations were on the tapis, an armament was prepared at Brest for the invasion of Ireland, which had long been meditated by the French rulers. The fleet, consisting of twenty-five ships of the line and fifteen frigates, was entrusted to admiral Bouver; the land forces, amounting to 28,000 men, were committed by general Hoche. They set sail on the 13th of December, but a violent tempest arose, and the frigate on board of which the general was conveyed being separated from the fleet, they returned to harbour, after losing one ship of the line and two frigates.

A few incidental notices will serve to wind up the domestic events of the year.—Sir Sidney Smith was taken prisoner on the French coast, and sent, under a strong escort, to Paris.—The princess of Wales gave birth to a daughter—the princess Charlotte; immediately after which, at the instance of the prince on the ground of "incongeniality," a separation took place between the royal parents.—A government loan of 18,000,000*l.* was subscribed in sixteen hours, between the 1st and 5th instant. One million was subscribed by the bank of England in their corporate capacity, and 400,000*l.* by the directors individually.

A. D. 1797.—The garrison of Mantua, which had held out with astonishing bravery, surrendered on the 2nd of February, but obtained very honourable terms. After this, Buonaparte received very considerable reinforcements, and having cut to pieces the army under Alvinzi, he resolved on penetrating into the centre of the Austrian dominions. When the court of Vienna received information of this design, they raised a new army, the command of which was given to the archduke Charles. The French defeated the Austrians in almost every engagement; and Buonaparte, after making 20,000 prisoners, effected a passage across the Alps, and drove the emperor to the necessity of requesting an armistice. In April a preliminary treaty was entered into, by which it was stipulated that France should retain the Austrian Netherlands, and that a new republic should be formed from the states of Milan, Mantua, Modena, Ferrara, and Bologna, which should receive the name of the Alpine Republic. He then retreated to Italy, leaving minor details of the treaty to be adjusted afterwards, and which was accordingly done at Campo Formio, in the following October.

England was now the only power at war with France; and great as had been the exertions of the people, still greater were of course required of them. The large sums of money which had been sent abroad, as subsidies to foreign princes, had diminished the quantity of gold and silver in Great Britain: this cause, added to the dread of an invasion, occasioned a run upon the country banks, and a demand for specie soon communicated itself to the metropolis. An order was issued to prohibit the directors of the bank from payments in cash. On the meeting of parliament, a committee was appointed to enquire into the state of the currency; and though the affairs of the bank were deemed to be in a prosperous state, an act was passed for confirming the restriction, and notes for one and two pounds were circulated. The consternation occasioned by these measures was at first very general, but the alarm gradually subsided, and public confidence returned.

One of the first acts of Spain after declaring war against England, was the equipment of a large number of ships, to act in concert with the French. The Spanish fleet, of twenty-seven sail of the line, was despatched on the 14th of January by admiral sir John Jervis, who was cruising off Cape St. Vincent, with a fleet of fifteen sail. He immediately formed his line in order of battle, and having forced his way through the enemy's fleet, and separated one third of it from the main body, he attacked with vigour, and in a short time captured four first-rate Spanish men-of-war, and blockaded the remainder in Cadiz. The Spaniards had 600 killed and wounded; the British, 200. For this brilliant exploit sir John was raised to the peerage by the title of earl of St. Vincent; and commodore Nelson, who was now commencing his brilliant career, was knighted.

Rejoicings for the late glorious victory were scarcely over, when a serious mutiny broke out in the channel fleet. The principal cause of this untoward event was the inadequacy of the sailors' pay, which, notwithstanding the advance that had taken place in the price of provisions, had received no augmentation for a very considerable period. This discontent was first made known to lord Howe, who in February and March received anonymous letters, in which were enclosed petitions from different ships' companies, requesting an increase of pay, a more equal distribution of prize money, &c. The novelty of this circumstance induced his lordship to make some inquiries; but as there was no appearance of disaffection in the fleet, he concluded that the letters must have been forgeries, and took no further notice of it. On the 15th of April, when orders were given for preparing to sail, the crews of the ships lying at Spithead ran up the shrouds, gave three cheers, and refused to comply. They then chose two delegates from each ship, who drew up petitions to the admiral and the house of commons, and each seaman was bound by an oath to be faithful to the cause. At length lord Bridport went on board, and told them he was the bearer of redress for all their grievances, and the king's pardon; and on the 8th of May an act was passed for augmenting the pay of sailors and mariners. The facility with which these claims had been granted instigated the seamen at the Nora to rise in mutiny and make further demands. A council of delegates was elected, at the head of whom was a bold and insolent man named Richard Parker, who undertook to command the fleet, and prevailed on his companions to reject repeated offers of pardon. In this instance, however, government was determined to employ force, if necessary, to reduce the mutineers to obedience, and to yield nothing more than had been granted to the seamen at Portsmouth. Preparations for hostilities were commenced on both sides, when dissensions among the disaffected themselves began to appear, and, after some bloodshed, all the ships submitted, giving up Parker and his fellow-delegates; some of whom, with their leader, expiated their offences by an ignominious death, but the great body of the revolvers were conciliated by an act of amnesty.

Notwithstanding the late dangerous mutiny, the idea was very prevalent in the country, that if a hostile fleet were to make its appearance, the men would show themselves as eager as ever to fight for the honour of Old England. In a few months afterwards an opportunity occurred of testing their devotion to the service. The Batavian republic having fitted out a fleet of fifteen ships, under the command of their admiral De Winter, with an intention of joining the French, admiral Duncan, who commanded the British fleet, watched them so narrowly, that they found it impracticable to venture out of the Texel without risking an engagement. The British admiral being obliged by tempestuous weather to leave his station, the Dutch availed themselves of the opportunity, and put to sea; but were descried by the English fleet, which immediately set sail in pursuit of them. On the 11th of October the English came up with, and attacked them off Camperdown; and after a gallant fight of four hours, eight ships of the line, including those of the admiral and vice-admiral, besides four frigates, struck their colours. The loss of the English in this memorable action amounted to 700 men; the loss of the Dutch was estimated at twice that number. The gallant admiral Duncan was raised to the peerage, and received the title of viscount Camperdown, with an hereditary pension.

About three months previous to this action admiral Nelson, acting on fallacious intelligence, made an unsuccessful attack on Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe; on which occasion the assailants sustained great loss, and Nelson himself had his arm shot off.

A. D. 1798.—As the French republic had at this time subdued all its enemies except England, the conquest of this country was the principal object of their hopes and expectations. The vast extent of territory which the French now possessed, together with the influence they had obtained over the councils of Holland, rendered them much more formidable than they had been at any former period. The circumstances of the British nation were, however, such as would discourage every idea of an invasion. Its navy was more powerful than it had ever been; the victories which had lately been gained over the Dutch and Spanish fleets, had confirmed the general opinion of the loyalty as well as bravery of its seamen; and all parties burying, for a time, all past disputes in oblivion, unanimously resolved to support the government. On the meeting of parliament, in January, a message from the king intimated that an invasion of the kingdom was in contemplation by the French. This communication gave rise to very active measures, which plainly manifested the spirit of unanimity which reigned in Great Britain. Besides a large addition made to the militia, every county was directed to raise bodies of cavalry from the yeomanry; and almost every town and considerable village had its corps of volunteers, trained and armed. The island was never before in such a formidable state of internal defence, and a warlike spirit was diffused throughout the entire population. A voluntary subscription for the support of the war also took place, by which a million and half of money was raised towards defraying the extraordinary demands on the public purse.

A.D. 1798.—THE NAME OF MR. FOX BRUCK OUT OF THE LIST OF PRIVY COUNCILLORS FOR COASTING "THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE PEOPLE."

While this universal harmony seemed to direct the councils of Great Britain, the Irish were greatly divided in their sentiments, and at length commenced an open rebellion. In the year 1791 a society had been instituted by the catholics and protestant dissenters, for the purpose of obtaining a reform in parliament, and an entire deliverance of the Roman catholics from all the restrictions under which they laboured on account of religion. This institution was projected by a person named Wolfe Tone; and the members, who were termed the United Irishmen, were so numerous, that their divisions and subdivisions were, in a short time, extended over the whole kingdom. Though a reform of parliament was the ostensible object of this society, yet it soon proved that their secret but zealous endeavours were directed to the bringing about a revolution, and by effecting a disjunction of Ireland from Great Britain, to establish a republican form of government similar to that of France. So rapidly did the numbers of these republican enthusiasts increase, and so confident were they of the ultimate success of their undertakings, that in 1797 they nominated an executive directory, consisting of lord Edward Fitzgerald, Arthur O'Connor, Oliver Bond, Dr. Mac Niven, and counsellor Emmet. Their conspiracy was planned with such consummate art, and conducted with such profound secrecy, that it would, doubtless, have been carried into effect, but for its timely discovery in March, by a person employed by the government, when the principal ringleaders were apprehended, and Fitzgerald was mortally wounded while resisting the officers of justice. A second conspiracy shortly afterwards was in like manner detected, but not until a general insurrection had been determined upon, in which the castle of Dublin, the camp near it, and the artillery barracks, were to be surprised in one night, and other places were to be seized at the same moment. But the flame of rebellion was not easily extinguished. In May, a body of rebels, armed with swords and pikes, made attempts on the towns of Naas and Wexford; but they experienced a signal defeat from lord Gosford, at the head of the Armagh militia, and four hundred of them were left dead on the field. They afterwards marched, 15,000 strong, against Wexford, and upon defeating the garrison, which sallied forth to meet them, obtained possession of the town. Subsequently they became masters of Enniscorthy; but being driven back, with great slaughter, from New Ross, they wreaked their vengeance upon their captives at Wexford in the most barbarous manner. On the 12th of June, general Nugent attacked the rebels, 5000 in number, commanded by Munro, near Ballynahinch, and routed them with great slaughter. But their greatest discomfiture was that which they sustained in their encampment on Vinegar-hill, where general Lake attacked and completely routed them. Various other minor engagements ensued about this time, in all which the rebels were defeated with considerable loss.

In the present divided and dangerous state of Ireland, it was judged prudent by the legislature to appoint to the lieutenancy of that country, a military man of acknowledged prudence and bravery. The person chosen for the station was lord Cornwallis, who arrived at Dublin on the 20th of June. His first act was to publish a proclamation, offering his majesty's pardon to all such insurgents as would desert their leaders, and surrender themselves and their arms. This proclamation, and the resolute conduct of government, had a great effect on the rebels, and the insurrection was in a short time suppressed. On the 23rd of August, about 800 Frenchmen, under the command of general Humbert, who had come to the assistance of the rebellious Irish, landed at Killala, and made themselves masters of that town. But instead of being joined by a considerable body of rebels, as they expected, they were met by general Lake, to whom they surrendered as prisoners of war. An end was thus temporarily put to the Irish rebellion,—a rebellion which, though never completely organized, was fraught with excesses on each side at which humanity shudders. It was computed at the time that not less than 30,000 persons, in one way or other, were its victims.

The preparations which had been making for the invasion of England were apparently continued, but at the same time an armament was fitting out at Toulon, the destination of which was kept a profound secret. It consisted of thirteen ships of the line, with other vessels, amounting in all to forty-five sail, besides 200 transports, on board of which were 20,000 choice troops, with horses, artillery, and an immense quantity of provisions and military stores. All Europe beheld with astonishment and apprehension these mighty preparations, and seemed to wait in awful expectation for the storm of war that was about to burst on some devoted land. This armament, which was under the command of general Buonaparte, set sail May the 20th, and having taken possession of the island of Malta on the 1st of June, proceeded towards Egypt, where it arrived at the beginning of July; its ultimate destination being said to be the East Indies, via the Red Sea. Sir Horatio Nelson, who was sent in pursuit of the French fleet, being wholly ignorant of its destination, sailed for Naples, where he obtained information of the surrender of Malta, and accordingly directed his course towards that island. On his arrival he had the mortification to find that Buonaparte was gone, and conjecturing that he had sailed to Alexandria, he immediately prepared to follow. He was, however, again disappointed, for on reaching Alexandria he learned that the enemy had not been there. After this, the British squadron proceeded to Rhodes, and thence to Sicily, where they had the satisfaction of hearing that the enemy had been seen off Candia about a month before, and had gone to Alexandria. Thitherward they pressed all sail, and on the 1st of August despatched the French fleet lying in Aboukir bay. Buonaparte had lauded his army on the 5th of July, and having made himself master of Alexandria, he drew up his transports within the inner harbour of that city, and proceeded with his army along the banks of the Nile. The French fleet, commanded by admiral Brueys, was drawn up near the shore, in a compact line of battle, flanked by four frigates, and protected in the front by a battery planted on a small island. Nelson decided on an immediate attack that evening, and regardless of the position of the French, led his fleet between them and the shore, so as to place his enemies between two fires. The victory was complete. Nine ships of the line were taken, one was burnt by her captain, and the admiral's ship, L'Orient, was blown up in the action, with her commander and the greater part of the crew. The loss of the English was 900 sailors killed; that of the French far greater. The glorious conduct of the brave men who achieved this signal triumph was the theme of every tongue, and the intrepid Nelson was rewarded with a peerage and a pension.

The victory of the Nile produced a powerful effect throughout Europe. The formidable preparations which had menaced Asia and Africa with immediate ruin were overthrown, and seemed to leave behind them an everlasting monument of the extreme folly and uncertainty of human undertakings. The deep despondency which had darkened the horizon of Europe was suddenly dispelled, the dread of Gallic vengeance seemed to vanish in a moment, and the minds of men were awakened into action by the ardent desire of restoring tranquility to Europe. A second coalition was immediately formed against France, under the auspices of Great Britain, and was entered into by Austria, Russia, the Ottoman Porte, and Naples.—Towards the close of the year the island of Minorca surrendered, with scarcely a show of resistance, to general Stuart and commodore Duckworth.

We must now take a glance of the state of British affairs in India. Tippoo Saib having entered into a secret correspondence with the French republic, the government-general demanded an explanation of his intentions; and as this demand was not complied with, general Harris invaded his territories. After some slight engagements, the British army advanced to Seringapatam, the capital of Tippoo, and on the 4th of May, after a gallant and desperate resistance, they succeeded in taking it, the sultan being killed while defending the fortress.

A. D. 1799.—In consequence of the new confederacy which had been formed against the French republic, the campaign of this year became particularly interesting. A French army which had advanced into Subia, under general Jourdan, was opposed by the Austrians under the archduke

Charles, and being discomfited, was compelled to retreat into Switzerland. The Austrians pursued them as far as Zurich, where they were enabled to make a stand until they received reinforcements. In the mean time, an army of Austrians and Russians, under general Suwarrow, having obliged the French to relinquish their conquests in Italy, they determined to hasten to the assistance of the archduke; but being anticipated by the French general Massena, the Austrians were obliged to retreat in great haste, and the Russians were surrounded so completely, that only 5000, with their general, escaped. In fact, so severe were the several contests, that in the space of fifteen days 30,000 men on both sides fell victims to the unsparring sword.

While these events were transacting in Italy and Switzerland, an attempt was made by Great Britain to drive the French from Holland, and to reinstate the prince of Orange in his authority as stadtholder. A landing was accordingly effected at the mouth of the Texel, under sir Ralph Abercromby; and immediately afterwards the British fleet, commanded by admiral Mitchell, entered the Zuider Zee, and captured eight ships of the line, besides some smaller vessels of war and four Indiamen. On the 13th of September the duke of York assumed the chief command of the army, which amounted to 35,000 men, including 17,000 Russians. This army was at first successful, and drove the French from their positions; but their reinforcements arriving, and the British commanders finding no support from the Dutch, a suspension of arms was agreed upon, and the duke resolved to relinquish the enterprise. Holland was consequently evacuated; and, as the price of being allowed to re-embark without molestation, 8000 scamen, Dutch or French, prisoners in England, were to be liberated.

After the battle of the Nile, Buonaparte led his army into Palestine, with the avowed intention of taking possession of Jerusalem, rebuilding the temple, and restoring the Jews. El-Arisch and Gaza surrendered to him, Jaffa was carried by storm, and he rapidly advanced as far as the city of Acre, which he invested with an army of 10,000 select troops; but here he met with an opponent who not only arrested his progress, but who ultimately put his veteran legions to shame. The pacha had the assistance of that gallant Englishman, sir Sidney Smith, whose former dashing exploits on the coasts of France had rendered his name far more familiar than agreeable to Gallic ears. On the 20th of March Buonaparte opened his trenches; but a flotilla conveying part of his besieging train had been captured by sir Sidney Smith, who was on board the Tigre of 84 guns, then lying off Acre, and the enemy's guns were employed in its defence. However, the French made a breach, and attempted to carry the place by assault, but were again and again repulsed, with great loss. An alternation of attacks and sorties followed for the space of sixty days, during which Buonaparte uselessly sacrificed an immense number of his bravest soldiers, and at last was compelled to raise the siege. Having received intelligence of the arrival of a Turkish army in Egypt, Napoleon returned from Palestine across the deserts of Arabia, and on the 25th of July obtained a great victory over the Turks near the Pyramids.

But he was now about to enter on a new theatre of action. Party dissensions in France, her danger of external foes, and the opportunity which was thereby afforded to the ambition of this extraordinary leader, seems to have suddenly determined him to quit Egypt. He accordingly left the army to general Kleber, and sailed with all imaginable secrecy from Aboukir: his good fortune enabling him, and the few friends he took with him, to reach Frejus on the 7th of October, unobserved and unmolested. Finding that the people generally approved of the step he had taken, and that while the corruption and mismanagement of the directory had rendered them very unpopular, he was regarded as the good genius of France, he, in the true Cromwellian fashion, with the assistance of a strong party, dissolved the assembly of representatives, and usurped the government with the title of chief consul, which was at first conferred on him for ten years, but was afterwards confirmed for life.

In order to render his usurpation popular, Buonaparte began to make professions of a pacific character, and entered into a correspondence for a negotiation with the principal powers at war with the republic. In his communications with the allied sovereigns he departed from the forms sanctioned by the custom of nations, and personally addressed his letters to the monarchs. The substance of the note addressed to his Britannic majesty was conveyed in two questions, "Whether the war which had for eight years ravaged the four quarters of the globe, was to be eternal;" and "Whether there were no means by which France and England might come to a good understanding?" In answer to this letter, an official note was returned by Mr. Grenville, who dwelt much on the bad faith of revolutionary rulers, and the instability of France since the subversion of the ancient monarchy. The overture which was transmitted to the court of Vienna was of a similar nature, and experienced similar treatment; but the emperor of Russia, being disgusted with the conduct of Austria in the late campaign, withdrew from the confederacy.

A.D. 1800.—The often discussed question of a legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland engaged the attention of politicians at this time, and gave rise to much angry feeling. Some serious difficulties had arisen from the existence of independent legislatures in England and Ireland, and there was reason to fear that while separate interests were made paramount to the general good, old grievances might again lead to disaffection, and the result be a dismemberment of the empire. To prevent such an evil the ministers of the day considered it their bounden duty; and though the measure at first met with great opposition, it was eventually carried by considerable majorities, and took place on the 1st of January, 1801. By this arrangement the Irish were to have a share of all the commerce of Great Britain, except such parts of it as belong to chartered companies. The commons of Ireland to be represented in the imperial parliament by a hundred members; the spiritual and temporal peerage of that country, by four bishops and twenty-eight lay-lords, holding their seats for life. Such peers of Ireland as are not elected into the house of lords, to be competent to sit in the house of commons as representatives of British towns and counties, on condition of their giving up all the privileges of the peerage during their continuance in the lower house. The former laws and courts of justice in Ireland to be retained, with its court of chancery, and the sovereign to be still represented by a lord-lieutenant.

During the past winter and the early part of spring the greatest distress was felt by the poorer classes on account of the scarcity and extraordinary high price of bread; in order to mitigate which, an act was passed prohibiting the sale of that great necessary of life until it had been baked twenty-four hours, from a well-founded notion that the consumption of stale bread would be much less than new.

On the 15th of May, as the king was reviewing a battalion of the guards in Hyde Park, a ball was fired in one of the volleys by a soldier, which wounded a gentleman who was standing not many yards from his majesty; but whether it was from accident or design could not be discovered. And on the evening of the same day a much more alarming circumstance occurred at Drury-lane theatre. At the moment his majesty entered the royal box, a man stood up in the pit and discharged a pistol at the king; the ball providentially missed him, and the offender was immediately seized; when it appeared that his name was James Hatfield, formerly a private soldier, and that he was occasionally afflicted with mental derangement, from a wound he had received in the head. He was accordingly "provided for" as a lunatic. The consternation occasioned by these occurrences was succeeded by many signal proofs of affectionate loyalty, especially on the 4th of June, his majesty's birth-day.

The campaign of 1800 was opened with great resolution on both sides. Independently of the other troops of France, an additional army of 60,000 men was assembled at Dijon, and it was publicly announced in the French papers, that it was intended as a reinforcement to the armies on the Rhine and in Italy, as circumstances might require. No one suspected that any important plan of military operations was concealed by the affected publicity of this ar-arrangement, so no precaution was taken to obviate the consequences which might arise from its movements. The Austrians in Italy, under general Melas, attacked Massena in the territory of the Genoese; and being successful in several obstinate conflicts, the surrender of Genoa with its garrison followed. Just at this time Buonaparte suddenly joined the army of reserve at Dijon, crossed the Alps over Mount St. Bernard, which before had been deemed impracticable, and descended into the Milanese without opposition. Having received some powerful reinforcements from the army in Switzerland, he placed himself in the rear of the Austrian army, and resolved on harassing a battle. Their first encounter was the battle of Montebello, in which the French had the advantage; and it served as a prelude to the decisive battle of Marengo. The Austrians numbered 60,000; the French, 50,000; the former commencing the fight with unusual spirit and success. For a long time the defeat of the French seemed inevitable. But general Desaix having arrived with a reinforcement towards evening, a terrible carnage ensued, and the Austrians were totally routed. The loss on each side was terrific; the French stating theirs at 12,000, and the Austrians at 15,000. On the following day a cessation of hostilities was proposed by the allies, which was granted on condition of their abandoning Piedmont. Immediately after, Buonaparte re-established the Cisalpine republic.

On the 3rd of December the Austrian army, under the archduke John, was signally defeated at Hohenlinden, by general Moreau; their loss being 10,000 men and eighty pieces of cannon; the effect of which was, that the emperor was driven to the necessity of soliciting an armistice. This was followed by a treaty of peace, which was signed at Luneville on the 9th of February, 1801.

A.D. 1801.—On the 1st of January a royal proclamation announced the royal style and title as "George the Third, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith;" the absurd titular assumption of king of France being now laid aside. On the 3rd his Majesty's council took the oaths as privy councillors for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and the king presented the lord chancellor with a new great seal made for the union.

By the treaty of Luneville, Great Britain again became the only opponent of the French republic, and was placed in a situation that required more than common energy and prudence. Influenced by the capricious emperor Paul of Russia, the principal northern powers resolved on reviving the armed neutrality, and claimed a right of trading to the ports of France, without submitting to their vessels being searched. At this critical juncture the British ministry, on the 11th of February, resigned their offices. Various conjectures as to their motives for this sudden act were afloat, but the ostensible cause was a misunderstanding that had taken place relative to catholic emancipation. It was, in fact, understood, that Mr. Pitt had pledged himself, in case the union was not frustrated by the Irish legislature, to obtain emancipation for the catholics, by a repeal of the disabilities legally pending over that body; but the king's objections to the measure were too deeply rooted, and too conscientiously formed, (it being, as he believed, contrary to the obligation of his coronation oath,) for the minister to remove them; added to which, there was the well-known dislike entertained by the protestants of Ireland to encounter a catholic magistracy, and the fears of the clergy of the established church. Owing to the indisposition of his majesty, a new ministry was not formed till the middle of March, when Mr. Addington was chosen first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer; lord Eldon, high chancellor; the earl of St. Vincent, first lord of the admiralty; the lords Hawkesbury and Pelham, secretaries of state; and the hon. col. Yorke, secretary at war. There is little doubt that the new ministers were brought forward to do what their predecessors were unable or unwilling to accomplish, namely, the putting an end to the war, and erasing the agitation of the catholic question. Mr. Addington, it is true, had given general satisfaction as speaker of the house of commons, and he had acquired the king's personal favours by his decorous manner and respectable character; but neither he nor his colleagues had any political reputation to entitle them to be trusted with the pilotage of the vessel of the state, especially when it was necessary to steer her amid the rocks and breakers of a tempestuous sea. In order to counteract the designs of the northern confederates, an armament was fitted out in the British ports, consisting of 17 sail of the line, with frigates, bomb-vessels, &c. and entrusted to the command of admiral sir Hyde Parker and vice-admiral lord Nelson. The fleet embarked at Yarmouth on the 12th of March, and, having passed the Sound with very trifling opposition, appeared before Copenhagen on the 30th. Batteries of cannon and mortars were placed on every part of the shore where they might be used in annoying the English fleet; the mouth of the harbour being protected by a chain, and by a fort constructed on piles. An attack on this formidable crescent was entrusted, at his own request, to Nelson, with twelve ships of the line and all the smaller craft. It began at ten o'clock in the morning, and was kept up on both sides with great courage and prodigious slaughter for four hours; by which time 17 sail of the enemy had been burnt, sunk, or taken; while three of the largest of the English ships, owing to the intricacies of the navigation, had grounded within reach of the enemy's land batteries. At this juncture Nelson proposed a truce, to which the prince of Denmark promptly acceded. The loss of the English in killed and wounded was 242; that of the Danes 1800. The sudden death of Paul, emperor of Russia, who, it has been authentically said, was strangled in his palace, caused a change in foreign affairs. His eldest son, Alexander, ascended the throne, and, renouncing the politics of his father, entered into a treaty of amity with England; the northern confederacy was consequently dissolved.

At the time the expedition to Copenhagen was on the eve of departure, a considerable British force had been sent to Egypt, in order to effect the expulsion of the French from that country. This was under the command of sir Ralph Abercromby, who on the 5th of March effected a disembarkation, with great spirit, in the face of the enemy, at Aboukir, the fort of which surrendered on the 19th. General Kleber, who commanded the French troops in Egypt after the departure of Buonaparte, had been assassinated, and Menou was now the general-in-chief. On the 13th a severe action took place, in which the English had the advantage; but it was on the 21st that the celebrated battle of Alexandria was fought. The force on each side was about 12,000; and before daylight the French commenced the attack. A long, desperate, and often dubious engagement succeeded; but at length the assailants were completely defeated, and the famous corps of "Invincibles" almost annihilated. The loss of the French in killed, wounded, and prisoners, was upwards of 3500; that of the British 1400; among whom was the gallant sir Ralph Abercromby, who nobly terminated a long career of military glory. He was wounded in the thigh, about the middle of the day; but that he might not damp the ardour of his troops, he concealed his anguish until the battle was won.

The command of the British troops devolved on general Hutchinson, an able officer, and the intimate friend of sir Ralph, who having made himself master of the ports of Rosetta, Cairo, and Alexandria, completed the conquest of Egypt about the middle of September: when the French capitulated, upon condition of being conveyed, with their arms, artillery, &c. to their own country. A large detachment of troops from the Indian army arrived, by the way of the Red Sea, under sir David Baird, just after the conclusion of the treaty.

The news of this important event reached England on the same day as the preliminaries of a peace with France were signed by M. Otto, on the part of the French republic, and lord Hawkesbury, on the part of his Britannic majesty. This negotiation had been carried on for some months with so much secrecy, that those persons alone who were engaged in it were acquainted with its progress. The definitive treaty was concluded at Amiens on the 27th of March, 1802; by which Great Britain consented to restore all her conquests, except the island of Trinidad, and the Dutch possessions in Ceylon. The Cape of Good Hope was to remain a free port to all the contracting powers. Malta, with its dependencies, was to be evacuated by the British, and restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem; while the island was to be placed under the protection and sovereignty of the king of Naples. Egypt was to be restored to the Sublime Porte, whose territories and possessions were to be preserved entire, as they existed previously to the war. The territories of the queen of Portugal were to remain entire; and the French agreed to evacuate Rome and Naples. The republic of the Seven Islands was recognized by France; and the fishery of Newfoundland was established on its former footing.

The restoration of peace was universally received with transports of joy, and was in itself a measure so necessary and desirable, that the terms on which it had been concluded were passed over in silence by the inhabitants of both countries. When the subject was alluded to in the house of commons, Mr. Sheridan observed, "It is a peace of which every man is glad, but of which no man is proud." Notwithstanding the brilliant exploits of their armies, and the superiority which they maintained over their enemies, the French nation felt in their victories all the distresses attending defeat, and sighed for the conclusion of hostilities. In Great Britain, too, the enormous weight of taxes, and high price of provisions, the total defeat of our continental allies, and the improbability of weakening the power of France, equally disposed the minds of the people to peace. Both nations seemed eager to unite in reciprocal habits of intimacy and friendship, and the interchange of visitors from the opposite sides of the Channel was a novel and cheering sight. But though this apparent tendency of the two nations to forget their mutual animosities seemed to prognosticate a long continuance of the blessings of peace, the happy prospect was soon interrupted by symptoms of jealousy which appeared between the respective governments.

Having in various ways gained the popular voice in his favour, Buonaparte was appointed consul for life, with the power of naming a successor. On this occasion, he instituted a republican order of nobility,—the legion of honour,—to be conferred on military men as a reward for skill and bravery, and on citizen who distinguished themselves by their talents or their strict administration of justice.

Before we enter upon a new chapter, we are bound to notice a treasonable conspiracy by certain obscure individuals, which, at the time, caused considerable alarm. Colonel Despard, an Irish gentleman of respectable family and connections, who had formerly given distinguished proofs of valour and good conduct, but had subsequently been confined in Cold-bath-fields prison for seditious practices, was apprehended at the Oakley Arms, Oakley-street, Lambeth, with thirty-six of his confederates, principally consisting of the labouring classes, and among them three soldiers of the guards. It appeared that on his liberation from prison, Despard induced a number of fellows, as mean and ignorant as they were violent, to believe that they were capable of subverting the present government, and establishing a democracy. In order to effect this measure, it was proposed to assassinate the king and royal family, to seize the Bank and Tower, and to imprison the members of parliament. Vast as these plans were, yet it appeared that the time, mode, and place for their execution, were arranged; though only fifty or sixty persons were concerned in it. Information having been conveyed to ministers of this bold conspiracy, its progress was narrowly watched, and at the moment when the designs of the traitors were ripe for execution, they were suddenly dragged from their rendezvous, and fully committed on a charge of treason. After a trial which lasted eighteen hours the colonel was found guilty; and on the 21st of February, 1803, this misguided man, with six fellow-conspirators, was executed on the top of the new goal in Southwark. Despard declined spiritual assistance, and met his fate without contrition, sorrow, or concern; the others suffered death with decency.

A.D. 1803.—THE treaty of Amiens proved delusive, and both combatants, jealous and watchful, stood ready to renew the conflict. The unbounded ambition of the French consul, and his implacable hatred to Great Britain, induced him to take every opportunity of insulting our ambassadors, in order to occasion a renewal of hostilities. Peace had hardly been concluded, when the whole fortresses of Piedmont were dismantled, and that country was annexed to France. The same measures were pursued with regard to Parma and Placentia; and a numerous army was sent against Switzerland, and that government was placed in the hands of the dependents of Buonaparte. Notwithstanding these and several other acts of tyranny, which were highly injurious to Great Britain, and shameful violations of the treaty of peace, his Britannic majesty earnestly endeavoured to avoid a recurrence to arms, and seemed willing to suffer the most unwarrantable aggressions, rather than again involve Europe in the horrors of war. This was construed by the Corsican usurper into a dread of his ill-gotten power. Some official papers were afterwards presented to the British ministry, in which he required that the French emigrants who had found shelter in England should be banished; that the liberty of the press in Britain should be abridged, because some of the newspapers had drawn his character with a truthful pen; and it appeared, indeed, that nothing short of a species of dictation in the domestic affairs of Great Britain was likely to satisfy him. Such insolent pretensions could not be brooked; all ranks of men seemed to rouse from their lethargy, and the general wish was to uphold the country's honour by a renewed appeal to arms.

The extensive warlike preparations going forward about this time in the ports of France and Holland, excited the jealousy of the British ministry; though it was pretended that they were designed to reduce their revolted colonies to obedience. An explanation of the views of the French government was requested by lord Whitworth, the English ambassador; but he was openly insulted by the first consul, who had the indecency to intimate, in a tone of gasconade, that Great Britain was unable to contend single-handed with France. On the 12th of May lord Whitworth presented the ultimatum of the British government, which being rejected, war was announced on the 16th, by a message from his majesty to parliament. Almost immediately upon this, Buonaparte issued a decree for the detention of all the English in France; in consequence of which infringement of international law, about 12,000 English subjects, of all ages, were committed to custody as prisoners of war.

This event was followed by the invasion of Hanover, by a republican army under general Mortier, thus openly violating the neutrality of the German empire, and breaking the peace which had been separately concluded with his majesty, as elector of Hanover. His royal highness the duke of Cambridge, who was at that time in Hanover, and had the command of a small body of troops, was resolved to oppose the progress of the invaders; but being urged by the regency to retire from the command, he returned to England. In a short time the French made themselves masters of the electorate, and committed the most flagrant acts of cruelty on the unfortunate inhabitants. The Elbe and the Weser being now under the control of the French, these rivers were closed against English commerce, and Buonaparte also insisted that the ports of Denmark should be shut against the vessels of Great Britain. In retaliation the British government gave orders for blockading the French ports.

And now it appeared that all minor schemes of aggrandisement were to give place to the invasion and subjugation of Great Britain; for which purpose an immense number of transports were ordered to be built with the greatest expedition; and a flotilla was assembled at Boulogne, sufficient to carry any army which France might wish to employ. This flotilla was frequently attacked by the English, and whenever any of their number ventured beyond the range of the batteries erected for their protection, they were generally captured by cruisers stationed off the coast to watch their motions. These mighty preparations, and the menacing attitude which was not allowed to relax on the opposite side of the channel, gave a new and vigorous impetus to British patriotism, and proportionably strengthened the hands of the government. Exclusive of the regular and supplementary militia, an additional army of 50,000 men was levied, under the title of the army of reserve; and in a few months, volunteer corps, amounting to 300,000 men, were armed in their country's defence.

While measures were being taken for defending the country against invasion, a new insurrection broke out in Ireland, which had for its object to form an independent Irish republic. It originated with Mr. Robert Emmet, brother to him who had been so deeply implicated in the rebellious transactions of 1793, and who had been ex-patriated. This rash attempt to disturb the public tranquillity was made on the 23d of July, when Emmet, with a crowd of desperadoes armed with pikes and firearms, marched through the principal streets of Dublin, and meeting the carriage of lord Kilwarden, chief-justice of Ireland, who was accompanied by his nephew and daughter, the ruffians dragged them from the carriage, and butchered the venerable judge and Mr. Wolfe on the spot, but the young lady was allowed to escape. Being attacked in their turn by a small party of soldiers, some of the rioters were killed, and others seized. Emmet and several of the most active ring-leaders, afterwards suffered the extreme penalty of the law for their diabolical offence.—In the session of November, acts were passed to continue the suspension of the habeas corpus, and enforce martial law in Ireland.

In the West Indies the English captured St. Lucia, Demerara, and other islands. A British fleet also assisted the insurgent blacks of St. Domingo to wrest that island from the French; but it was not effected without a most sanguinary contest. It was then erected into an independent state, under its ancient Indian name of Hayti.

In the East Indies much greater triumphs were achieved; among these was the famous battle of Assaye. (Sept. 23), where major-general Arthur Wellesley, with a comparatively few troops, completely defeated the combined Mahratta forces commanded by Scindiah Holkar and the rajah of Berar.

A. D. 1804.—It was the opinion of men of all parties, that in the present crisis a stronger ministry than that which had been formed under the leadership of Mr. Addington, was absolutely necessary to direct the councils of Great Britain; and the friends of Mr. Pitt became most anxious that he should return to the administration on the renewal of war. The minister accordingly sought the aid of that great statesman as an auxiliary; but, adhering to his well-known maxim "to accept of no subaltern situation," Mr. Pitt plainly signified that the premiership must be his. "Aut Caesar, aut nullus." Though many were disappointed to find that a powerful coalition, in which Mr. Fox and his most eminent colleagues were expected to be included, was not formed, yet the manifest necessity of a vigorous prosecution of the war excited a spirit of unanimity in the nation, and induced the parliament to second every motion of the ministry.

Great as was the power to which Buonaparte had by artful gradations advanced himself, it was not sufficient to satiate his ambition; and he resolved to secure to himself the title of emperor. In order to sound the inclinations of the people, a book had been published some time before, pointing out the propriety and expediency of creating him emperor of the Gauls; after which, an overture, equally insolent and absurd, was made to Louis XVIII. offering him indemnities and a splendid establishment, if he would renounce his pretensions to the crown of France. This proposal being treated with the contempt it merited, Buonaparte resolved on taking away the life of the duke D'Enghien, eldest son of the duke of Bourbon, on a surreptitious charge of having engaged in a conspiracy against the first consul, and of serving in the armies of the emigrants against France. But the fact was, that this young prince, whose courage and talents were equalled only by his generosity and humanity, had excited the enmity and apprehensions of the Corsican. He had fixed his residence at Ettenheim, in the neutral territory of the elector of Baden, where his chief occupation was study, and his principal recreation the culture of a small garden. From this rural retreat he was dragged on the 15th of March, by a body of French cavalry, under the command of general Caulincourt, and carried the same day to the citadel of Strasbourg, where he remained till the 18th. On the 20th the duke arrived at Paris under a guard of gendarmes, and, after waiting some hours at the barrier, was driven to Vincennes. A military commission appointed to try him met the same evening in the castle, and the foul atrocity was completed by his being sentenced to immediate execution; which having taken place, his body was placed in a coffin partly filled with lime, and buried in the castle garden.

Buonaparte having now nothing to apprehend either from his declared or concealed enemies, prevailed on the people to confer on himself and his heirs the imperial dignity. The ceremony of his coronation accordingly took place, with remarkable solemnity, on the 19th of November; and in the following February he addressed the king of Great Britain a letter, soliciting the establishment of peace. The answer of his Britannic majesty acknowledged that no object would be dearer to him than such a peace as would be consistent with the security and interests of his dominions; but it added, that he declined entering into a particular discussion without consulting his allies.

A. D. 1805.—Enraged at the perseverance of Great Britain, and elated by the unparalleled success which had attended all his measures, the French emperor seemed now to consider himself as the disposer of kingdoms; and not only disregarded the rights of mankind, but set at defiance all principles of justice and moderation. In order to secure his own personal aggrandisement, he made an excursion to Italy, converted the Cisalpine republic into a kingdom, and assumed the title of king of Italy. He then united the Ligurian republic to France, and erected the republic of Lucca into a principality, in favour of his sister Eliza, who had married the senator Bacchiachi. After these unprecedented acts of aggression, he returned to France, and being once more resolved to effect the subjugation of the British Isles, he repaired to Boulogne and reviewed his troops there, which were ostentatiously named "the army of England," and amounted to considerably more than a hundred thousand men.

Spain having been compelled, in consequence of its dependence on France, to become a party in the war with Great Britain, Buonaparte determined, by uniting the naval strength of both nations, to strike a blow in several parts of the world at the same time. The greatest activity accordingly prevailed in the French ports, where the fleets had hitherto remained inactive; and several squadrons having eluded the vigilance of the British cruisers, put to sea. A squadron of five ships arrived in the West Indies, and surprised the town of Rousseau in Dominica; but being gallantly opposed by general Prevost, the governor of the island, they levied a contribution of five thousand pounds, and precipitately re-embarked their troops. They next proceeded to St. Christopher's, where, having made great pecuniary exactions, they seized all the ships in the Basseterre road. These prizes were sent to Guadaloupe; and the French squadron, fearful of encountering the British fleet, returned to Europe.

In the mean time a formidable fleet of ten sail of the line, with 10,000 men on board, set sail from Toulon, under the command of admiral Villeneuve; who, having proceeded to Cadiz, was there reinforced by the Spanish admiral, Gravina, and six large ships, and immediately embarked for the West Indies. When lord Nelson received information that the French and Spaniards had put to sea, he supposed that they were destined for an attempt on Alexandria, and accordingly set sail in that direction. He traversed the Mediterranean with the utmost celerity, having a squadron of ten ships with him; but finding that he was mistaken in his conjectures, he concluded that the enemy had sailed for the West Indies. He immediately directed his course towards that quarter, and by driving the combined squadrons from island to island, he prevented them from making an attack on any of the British possessions; nay, so universal was the dread of Nelson's name, that they had no sooner arrived, than they consulted their safety in a precipitate and disgraceful flight, and hastily returned to Europe. When the brave Nelson was assured of the course of his adversaries, he dispatched a messenger to England, and immediately set sail in hopes of overtaking the fugitives. He arrived at Gibraltar on the 20th of July, and having refitted his ships, he resumed his position off Cape St.

Vincent, sixty-three days after his departure from it for the West Indies.

On the arrival in London of the information of the enemy's retreat, a squadron, consisting of fifteen sail of the line, was dispatched under sir Robert Calder, in the hope of intercepting them. On the 22nd of July sir Robert descried the object of his mission, off Ferrol; and, notwithstanding their great superiority, he did not hesitate a moment in bringing them to action. After an obstinate engagement, the unequal conflict terminated in the defeat of the enemy, who, having lost two large ships, proceeded in haste to Ferrol. Being reinforced by the admirals Grandallana and Gourdon, they weighed anchor, and retired to the harbour of Cadiz; where they were blockaded by sir Robert Calder. Some dissatisfaction having been expressed in the public papers, relative to the conduct of the British admiral in the engagement off Ferrol, he, in order to meet the charges with manly boldness, and to obviate the effects of malicious reports, applied for a court-martial to enquire into the subject; when, to his great astonishment, and to the regret of the whole navy, he was found guilty of an error of judgment, and sentenced to be reprimanded—a reproach which he, who had passed forty-six years with honour in the service, felt deeply.

Subsequently to his arrival at Cape St. Vincent, admiral Nelson traversed the bay of Biscay in search of the enemy; but being oppressed with fatigues and disappointment, he resolved on returning to England. He arrived at Portsmouth on the 18th of August, and having reached London on the 20th, experienced a most cordial and affectionate reception from his grateful countrymen. He would not, however, allow himself to remain in inactivity, and being offered the command of an armament that was then preparing, he without hesitation embraced the opportunity of serving his country. Having hoisted his flag on board the Victory, on the following day he put to sea, and on his arrival at Cadiz he received from admiral Collingwood the command of the British fleet, which now consisted of twenty-seven sail of the line. On the 19th of October Nelson learned that the combined French and Spanish fleets, consisting of thirty-three sail of the line, had put to sea from Cadiz, under admirals Villeneuve and Gravina; and on the 21st he discovered them off Cape Trafalgar. He immediately ordered the fleet to bear up, in two columns, as directed by his previous plan of attack; and issued this admonitory signal—which has since become a national proverb—"England expects every man to do his duty." The windward column of the English ships was led by lord Nelson, in the Victory; the leeward by rear-admiral Collingwood, in the Royal Sovereign. About noon the awful contest commenced, by the leading ships of the columns piercing the enemy's line; the others breaking through in all parts, and engaging their adversaries at the muzzle of their guns. The enemy fought with intrepid spirit; but the superior skill which opposed them was relentless. The fury of the battle was sustained for three hours, when many ships of the combined fleet having struck, their line gave way; nineteen sail of the line, with Villeneuve and two other flag officers, were taken; the other ships, with admiral Gravina, escaped.

This splendid victory, so pre-eminent in the annals of Britain, was purchased with the life of her greatest naval commander. In the middle of the contest lord Nelson received in his left breast a musket-ball, aimed at him from the ship with which he was engaged; and in about an hour afterwards he expired, displaying in his death the heroic firmness which had distinguished every action of his life. The loss of this gallant man damped the enthusiastic joy which the news of so important a victory would have excited; and it is difficult to say whether the general grief that was felt for the hero's death, or the exultation for so signal a triumph, preponderated. Many there were, most assuredly, who would have relinquished the victory to have saved the victim. His remains were deposited in St. Paul's cathedral, and were accompanied by a procession more extensive and magnificent than England had, on any similar occasion, beheld.

Of that part of the Cadiz fleet which had escaped, four ships were afterwards captured by sir Richard Strachan, off Ferrol, and were conducted to a British port.—Thus the enemy's marine was virtually annihilated, and the navy of England held undisputed the mastery of the seas.

It was far otherwise, however, with her continental projects and alliances. An alliance offensive and defensive had long been ineffectually negotiating with Russia, Austria, and Sweden; but it was not till the French emperor had arbitrarily annexed Genoa and Parma to his dominions, that a treaty was concluded. The objects of this formidable coalition were the liberation of Holland, Sardinia, Switzerland, and Hanover, from French tyranny; the restoration of tranquillity to the Italian states, and the re-establishment of safety and peace in all Europe. It was stipulated, that the three continental powers should furnish 500,000 men, exclusive of the British troops. The military force at the disposal of France was 650,000, besides a considerable number of auxiliaries. By one article of the confederacy it was agreed, that the continental powers should not withdraw their forces, nor Great Britain her subsidies, till a general pacification took place with the common consent of the contracting parties.

The dissatisfaction evinced against the French emperor in all the territories which he had seized, seemed only to raise his unprincipled ambition. To ensure the subjugation of Germany, he, under the perfidious plea of moderation, endeavoured to separate Austria from the other imperial states. He issued a manifesto, reproaching the folly and injustice of the confederate powers; and, declaring that if hostilities were commenced against any of his allies, particularly against Bavaria, he would instantly march his whole army to revenge the affront. He said that the war was created and maintained by the gold and hatred of Great Britain, and boasted that he would fight till he had secured the independence of the Germanic body, and would not make peace without a sufficient security for its continuance. The Austrians, disregarding these threats, entered Bavaria with 55,000 men, and were vigorously supported by its hereditary states. These forces, with those furnished by Russia and the Tyrol, seemed to promise success; but through the precipitancy of the Austrians, the tardiness of the Russians, and the vigorous measures of Buonaparte, the great objects of the coalition failed, and the most disastrous reverses were experienced.

The French reached the banks of the Rhine in September, and effected a passage over the river; engaged the Austrians before the Russians could join them, and defeated them with great loss at Wertingen and Günzburg. In the mean time general Bernadotte, by the order of Buonaparte, entered the neutral territories of Franconia, and was there joined by the Bavarian army of 20,000 cavalry and infantry, the Batavian division, and by the army of Holland, under Marmont. The losses sustained by the Austrians had hitherto been very considerable; but on the 13th of October, Meningen, with its large garrison, surrendered to marshal Soult. On the 19th, the Austrians making a sortie from the city of Ulm, and attacking Dupont's division, were defeated, and 15,000 of their men taken. A few days afterwards the Austrian general Mack, who had shut himself up in Ulm, with 30,000 men, surrendered to the French, under very suspicious circumstances, and his whole army were made prisoners of war.

The first Russian division, under generals Kutusoff and Merveldt, having at length effected a junction with the Austrians, the French army, 110,000 strong, hastily advanced to attack them. The allied troops were unwilling to engage a force so much more numerous than their own, and awaited the arrival of the second Russian army. That arrival was, however, delayed for a very considerable time, by the menacing and impolitic opposition of the Prussian armaments. Had the king of Prussia, by joining the confederates, avenged the insult offered to his Franconian territories, the French would soon have been compelled to return home; but the ill-fated policy he now adopted was the cause of all the disasters which Europe afterwards suffered. The first Russian army, unable to maintain its position against the superior power of the enemy, were under the necessity of falling back upon Moravia, and in their rout had no alternative but that of crossing the Danube, above Vienna. The imminent danger with which his capital was now threatened, induced the emperor of Austria to proposed an armistice, in hopes of gaining time for the arrival of reinforcements. Count Guilly was accordingly dispatched to the head-quarters of Napoleon, with proposals for concluding a suspension of hostilities for a few weeks, as a preliminary step towards a negotiation for a general peace. Buonaparte expressed his readiness to accede to the armistice, on condition that the Austrian monarch would cause the allied army to return home, the Hungarian levy to be abandoned, and the duchy of Venice and the Tyrol to be occupied by the French.

The Russian armies having at length effected a junction with those of Austria, they marched towards Austerlitz, where the French were posted; but as the allied sovereigns were desirous of preventing the dreadful sacrifice of life, which was inevitable from the conflict of two such prodigious armies, the counts Stadion and Guilly were sent to Napoleon to propose an armistice. The French emperor supposing that they merely wished to lull him into a false security, beguiled them with artful compliments, and solicited an interview with the emperor Alexander. He had previously discovered that the allies were rashly advancing against him when the utmost caution was necessary; and, in order to take full advantage of the circumstance, he commanded his army to feign a retreat, that his enemy might be confirmed in the idea of his being unable to resist their forces. The Russian emperor declined in his own person the proposed interview, but sent his aide-de-camp as a proxy, who returned after a long conference, fully persuaded that the French were reduced to the last extremities.

The French having by cautious movements kept up the idea of their own weakness and alarm, were attacked on the 1st of December, by the combined army; but when their artifices had been duly prolonged, Buonaparte brought up all his troops, and by the superiority of his numbers, gained a complete victory. This was the well-contested and memorable battle of Austerlitz, or, as it was often called, the battle of the "Three Emperors." The Austro-Russian armies, amounting to 80,000, were commanded by general Kutusoff and prince Lichtenstein; and nearly 30,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners, with 100 pieces of cannon, attested the triumph of Napoleon. In consequence of this, an armistice was four days afterwards effected; and on the 26th of the same month, a pacific treaty was concluded at Presburg between France and Austria. By the terms agreed on, France retained possession of the Transalpine territories; Buonaparte was acknowledged king of Italy, but the crowns of France and Italy were to be for ever separated, instead of being united under one head; and the new made king was invested with the power of appointing an acknowledged successor to the Italian throne. On the other hand, the French emperor guaranteed the integrity of the empire of Austria, in the state to which he had now reduced it, as well as the integrity of the possessions of the princes of the house of Austria, Russia, &c.

Prussia, which had insidiously held back, watching the progress of the campaign, determined for the present to preserve peace with France, and concluded a convention with that power, by which Hanover was provisionally exchanged for Anspach, Cleves, and Neufchatel. It has always, indeed, appeared to us that the policy of Prussia was constantly directed to the diminution of the Austrian power, in the hope that the imperial crown might be transferred to the house of Brandenburg; a feeling which Buonaparte insidiously encouraged as long as it suited his own views of aggrandizement.

A.D. 1806.—The campaign of 1806 having thus fatally terminated, and the Russian armies having retreated across the Elbe, Napoleon resolved to take vengeance on the king of Naples, who had provoked his wrath by admitting some British and Russian troops into his dominions. On the morning after he had signed the peace of Presburg, the French emperor issued a proclamation from his head-quarters at Vienna, declaring that the Neapolitan dynasty had ceased to reign, and denouncing vengeance on the royal family. Immediately after this threatening manifesto reached Naples, the Russian troops re-embarked, and the British determined on retiring to Sicily, without waiting the arrival of the enemy. The crown of Naples was conferred on Joseph Buonaparte, who, being supported by a numerous French army, took possession of his kingdom on the 13th of February, 1806. The late king took refuge at Palermo, where he was protected by the troops and fleet of Great Britain.

As that part of the Neapolitan territories called Calabria persisted in opposing the invaders, sir J. Stuart, commander of the British forces in Sicily, undertook an expedition for the purpose of restoring the legitimate sovereign. Having landed his troops, consisting of 4,800 men, he immediately advanced to attack the French general Regnier, who occupied a strong position near the plains of Maida, with an army of 7000 men; but the British troops charged the enemy at the point of the bayonet, and obtained a glorious victory; the enemy's loss being 4000 men, killed, wounded, and prisoners, while that of the English was only 45 killed and 282 wounded. The battle of Maida led to the expulsion of the French from Calabria in less than a month; but such considerable reinforcements were received by Joseph Buonaparte, that the authority of the new monarch was established at Naples; and the English being under the necessity of withdrawing their forces to the protection of Sicily, the Calabrians were obliged to submit.

Shortly after this Buonaparte erected Holland into a kingdom, which he bestowed on his brother Louis; whose mild administration, whilst it gained him the good-will and affection of his subjects, incensed his

THE PRINCE OF WALES AND THE ROYAL DUMES, THE LORDS AND COMMONS, AND THE CORPORATION OF LONDON, FORMED PART OF THE PROCESSION.

These momentous transactions on the continent have necessarily interrupted our narration of those events which relate exclusively to Great Britain. An important acquisition was made by general Bald and sir Home Popham, who, after surmounting the most formidable obstacles, made themselves masters of the Cape of Good Hope, on the 10th of January, experiencing little resistance from the Dutch governor. This conquest was followed by the capture of three French ships of the line, part of a squadron that had escaped from the harbour of Brest, and which sir J. Duckworth fortunately met with in the West Indies.

But no event that took place, favourable or otherwise was of equal importance to the death of Mr. Pitt, which happened on the 23rd of January. Excessive anxiety, application, and debility, added to the failure of his plan for delivering Europe from French tyranny, accelerated his death; and the last words which quivered on his lips were "Oh, my country!" By a note of the commons, his remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, with the greatest solemnity, and a monument was erected to him at the public expense. By the same vote, his debts were discharged by the public; and it was no small proof of his entire disinterestedness, that during a long administration of twenty years, he did not accumulate money, but died insolvent. Our limits and the plan of the work forbid us to trench upon the province of the biographer; but we may, perhaps, be excused for inserting a few additional lines, when recording the death of so eminent a statesman. Both in the commencement of the war, and in his internal policy, Mr. Pitt was controlled by circumstances. "He perceived," says Isaiah Tomline, "the formidable co-operation of external and internal enemies; but the former could not be effectually resisted except by open war, nor the latter without coercive acts of the legislature; and he was persuaded that neither of these expedients, exclusive of his own earnest wish not to have recourse to them, would be approved till their necessity was obvious and incontestable." It has been frequently objected to him, that he made his principles subordinate to his ambition, and that "he lent himself to the corrupt agencies of a war-faction whom a long course of lavish expenditure raised into an almost irresistible influence." Yet it is admitted that "he was favourable to every species of domestic reform; there was no abuse in the church, nor in the revenue department, nor in the laws affecting the different religionists, nor even in parliamentary representation, to the removal of which he was not friendly." Unallured by disposition and unwayed by pleasure, he never sacrificed the national treasure to the one, or the national interest to the other. He was rigidly just, and strictly moral. Self-reliance, boldness, loftiness, and perseverance, were the qualities that marked the outset and progress of his career: the whole of his actions being particularly distinguished by constancy and steadiness, a pride of superiority arising from the consciousness of superior talents, and an unsullied integrity. His eloquence was always powerful, logical, and persuasive; he had a perfect command of language, and in the arrangement of his matter he was lucid and natural. This great man died in the 47th year of his age; at a period, too, when such a master-mind seemed to be more than ever needed to counteract the vast designs and universal despotism of the tyrant of the continent.

Soon after the decease of Mr. Pitt, his colleagues in office unanimously resigned their employments, and a new ministry was formed, the chief members of which were Lord Grenville, first lord of the treasury; Mr. Fox, secretary of state for foreign affairs; and Mr. Erskine, (created a peer,) lord high chancellor. Negotiations for treaty of peace were immediately opened, and from the cordiality with which the two governments commenced their proceedings, the most happy consequences were anticipated; but it soon appeared that the immoderate ambition of the French ruler excluded for the present all hopes of accommodation.

A measure which will for ever reflect glory upon the British nation was brought about by the new administration; we mean, the abolition of the slave trade. The bill was introduced by Mr. Fox, and notwithstanding the opposition it encountered from those who were interested in its continuance, passed through both houses with a great majority. This distinguished act of humanity was, in fact, one of his last measures; this celebrated and much respected statesman having expired at Chiswick-house, in his 69th year, on the 18th of September. Like his great rival, the late premier, he gave early indications of superior capacity, and, like him, he was educated for political life. He was certainly one of the most eminent statesmen and distinguished assertors of public freedom that has ever appeared in England. As an orator, his powers were gigantic; his eloquence was argumentative, forcible, and sententious; the simplicity and variety of his language eminently fitting him for debate. He was less copious, less sententious, and less persuasive than Mr. Pitt; yet he captivated his hearers by his forcible arguments, his convincing appeals to their reason, and his imposing earnestness. In his faults, which were not a few, he had no mixture of pride, deceit, hypocrisy, or despotism. In his affections he was warm; in his temper, kind and humane; in his manners, simple; and in his disposition, easy and unassuming. It is rather remarkable, that notwithstanding the irreconcilable opposition between him and Mr. Pitt, he received similar honours from the representatives of the nation, and his remains were deposited in

On the approach of the French to the Vistula, the Russian armies advanced with great rapidity to check their course: a formidable body of Swedes was assembled in Pomerania; and the king of Prussia having assembled his scattered troops, and reinforced them with new levies, prepared to

After the surrender of the Cape of Good Hope to the British arms, an expedition was undertaken against the Spanish settlements in South America. They proceeded up the Rio de Plata, and having surmounted innumerable difficulties, landed their troops near Buenos Ayres, and on the 28th of June, 1806, took possession of that town by capitulation. A general insurrection having been excited soon afterwards, the British troops were compelled to abandon it; and it was found expedient to send to the Cape for reinforcements. Buenos Ayres was again attacked on the 7th of July 1807, by rear admiral Murray and general Whitelock. The soldiers being ordered to enter the town with unloaded muskets, were received by a most destructive fire from the houses, and after having lost 2,500 brave men, were forced to retire. A convention was then entered into with the Spanish commander, by which it was stipulated that a mutual restitution of prisoners should take place, and that the British troops should evacuate the country. For his unsoldierlike conduct in this fatal expedition, general Whitelock was tried by a court-martial on his return to England, and rendered incapable of serving his majesty in future.

We now return to the military operations on the continent. The battle of Eylau had left the contending parties in circumstances nearly equal. Buonaparte had retired into winter quarters, where he intended to have remained till the return of spring; but as the Russians were conscious of the advantages resulting to them from the rigorous climate, they were resolved to allow him no repose. The Russian general Markow accordingly attacked the French under Bernadotte, at Morungen, in East Prussia, when a very severe action ensued, which terminated in favour of the allies. Another very sanguinary encounter took place on the 8th of February, near the town of Eylau, when the fortunes of France and Russia seemed to be equally balanced, and each party claimed the victory. Immediately after this engagement Buonaparte dispatched a messenger to the Russian commander-in-chief, with overtures of a pacific nature; but general Benigsen rejected his offers with disdain, and replied that "he had been sent by his master not to negotiate, but to fight." Notwithstanding this repulse, similar overtures were made by Buonaparte to the king of Prussia, and met with no better success. The weak state of the French army at this time seemed to promise the allies a speedy and fortunate termination of the contest; but the surrender of Dantisc totally changed the face of affairs, and by supplying the French with arms and ammunition, enabled them to maintain a superiority. On the 14th of June a general engagement ensued at Friedland, and the concentrated forces of the allies were repulsed with prodigious slaughter. On the 23rd of the same month an armistice was concluded; and on the 8th of July a treaty of peace was signed at Tilsit, between the emperors of France and Russia, to which his Prussian majesty acceded on the following day.

The first interview between Buonaparte and the emperor Alexander took place on the 26th of June, on a raft constructed for that purpose on the river Niemen, where two tents had been prepared for their reception. The two emperors landed from their boats at the same time, and embraced each other. A magnificent dinner was afterwards given by Napoleon's guard to those of Alexander and the king of Prussia; when they exchanged uniforms, and were to be seen in motley dresses, partly French, partly Russian, and partly Prussian. The articles by which peace was granted to Russia were, under all circumstances, remarkably favourable. Alexander agreed to acknowledge the kings of Buonaparte's creation, and the confederation of the Rhine. Napoleon undertook to mediate a peace between the Porte and Russia; Alexander having undertaken to be the mediator between France and England, or, in the event of his mediation being refused, to shut his ports against British commerce. The terms imposed on the king of Prussia were marked by characteristic severity. The city of Dantisc was declared independent; and all the Polish provinces, with Westphalia, were ceded by Prussia to the conqueror, by which means the king of Prussia was stripped of nearly half of his territories, and one third of his revenues. All his ports were likewise to be closed against England till a general peace.

The unexampled influence which Napoleon had now acquired over the nations of Europe, to say nothing of that spirit of domination which he every where exercised, rendered it extremely improbable that Denmark would long preserve her neutrality; nay, the English ministers had good reasons to believe that a ready acquiescence to the dictates of the French emperor would be found in the court of Copenhagen. As it was therefore feared that the Danish fleet would fall into the hands of the enemy, it was thought expedient to dispatch a formidable armament to the Baltic, and to negotiate with the Danish government. The basis of the negotiation was a proposal to protect the neutrality of Denmark, on condition that its fleet should be deposited in the British ports till the termination of the war with France. As this proposal was rejected, the as the general conduct of the Danes betrayed their partiality for the French the armament, which consisted of twenty-seven sail of the line and 20,000 land forces, under the command of admiral Gambier and lord Cathcart, made preparations for investing the city. A tremendous cannonading then commenced. The cathedral, many public edifices and private houses were destroyed, with the sacrifice of 2000 lives. From the 2nd of September till the evening of the 5th, the conflagration was kept up in different places, when a considerable part of the city being consumed, and the remainder threatened with speedy destruction, the general commanding the garrison sent out a flag of truce, desiring an armistice, to afford time to treat for a capitulation. This being arranged, a mutual restitution of prisoners took place, and the Danish fleet, consisting of 18 sail of the line and 15 frigates, together with all the naval stores, surrendered to his Britannic majesty's forces. The Danish government, however, refused to ratify the capitulation, and issued a declaration of war against England. This unexpected enterprise against a neutral power served as an ostensible cause for Russia to commence hostilities against Great Britain; and a manifesto was published on the 31st of October, ordering the detention of all British ships and property.

The two grand objects to which the attention of Buonaparte was principally directed, were the annihilation of the trade of Great Britain, and the extension of his dominions. In order to attain the former of these objects, he in November, 1806, issued at Berlin a decree, by which the British islands were declared to be in a state of blockade, and all neutral vessels that traded to them without his consent were subject to capture and confiscation. This new mode of warfare excited, at first, the apprehensions of the British merchants; but the cabinet were resolved to retaliate, and accordingly issued the celebrated orders in council, by which France and all the powers under her influence were declared to be in a state of blockade, and all neutral vessels that should trade between the hostile powers, without touching at some port of Great Britain, were liable to be seized. These unprecedented measures were extremely detrimental to all neutral powers, especially to the Americans, who were the general carriers of colonial produce. They, by way of retaliation, laid an embargo in all the ports of the United States, and notwithstanding the extinction of their commerce, long persisted in the measure.

In the conduct pursued by Buonaparte with respect to Portugal, he resolved to act in such a manner as should either involve that nation in a war with England, or would furnish him with a pretence for invading it. He accordingly required the court of Lisbon, 1st, to shut their ports against Great Britain; 2dly, to detain all Englishmen residing in Portugal; and 3dly, to confiscate all English property. In case these demands were refused, he declared that war would be denounced against them, and, without waiting for an answer, he gave orders for detaining all merchant ships that were in the ports of France. As the prince regent could not comply with these imperious demands, without violating the treaties that existed between the two nations, he endeavoured to avoid the danger which threatened him, by agreeing to the first condition. The ports of Portugal were accordingly shut up, but this concession served only to inflame the resentment of Buonaparte, who immediately declared "that the house of Braganza had ceased to reign;" and sent an immense army into Portugal, under general Junot. In this critical situation the prince regent removed his troops to the seaports, and when Junot entered his dominions he retired, with his family, to the Brazils.

The subversion of the government of Spain and the expulsion of the reigning family was the next step on the ladder of Napoleon's ambition; and this he thought might be accomplished by uniting treachery with force. In order to accomplish this perfidious act, it was his first care to foment discord in the royal family, which, by a complication of dissimulation, intrigue, and audacious villany, he was too successful in effecting. By encouraging the ambition of the heir apparent, he excited the resentment of the reigning monarch, Charles IV., rendered them mutual objects of mistrust, jealousy, and hatred, and plunged the nation into anarchy and confusion. In this perplexed state of affairs, he invented an excuse for introducing his armies into Spain, and compelled Charles to resign the crown to his son, who was invested with the sovereignty, with the title of Ferdinand VII. The new made king, with his father and the whole royal family, were shortly afterwards prevailed on to take a journey to Bayonne, in France, where an interview took place with the French emperor. On the 5th of May the two kings were compelled by Buonaparte to sign a formal abdication, and the infants Don Antonio and Don Carlos renounced all claim to the succession. This measure was followed by an imperial decree, declaring the throne of Spain to be vacant, and conferring it on Joseph Buonaparte, who had abdicated the throne of Naples in favour of Joachim Murat.

As the French forces, amounting to about 100,000 men, occupied all the strongest and most commanding positions of Spain, and as another army of 20,000 men, under Junot, had arrived in Portugal, it was imagined that the new sovereign would take possession of the kingdom without opposition. But the wanton ambition and foul perfidy by which these events had been produced, inspired the Spaniards with becoming indignation and resentment. No sooner had the news of the treatment of the royal family reached Spain, than a general insurrection broke out; juntas were formed in the different provinces; patriotic armies were levied; and the assistance of England was implored. The supreme junta of Seville assumed the sovereign authority, in the name of Ferdinand VII., whom they proclaimed king; and declared war against France. Peace with Spain was proclaimed in London on the 5th of July; the Spanish prisoners were set free, clothed, and sent home; and every thing that the Spaniards could desire, or the English afford, was liberally granted. The suddenness of the insurrection, the unanimity which prevailed, and the vigour with which it was conducted, amazed the surrounding nations, and called forth their exertions. The efforts of the loyal Spaniards were crowned with astonishing success; the usurper Joseph was driven from the capital, after having remained in it about a week; and the French, after losing about 60,000 men, were obliged to abandon the greatest part of the kingdom, and to retire to the north of the Ebro.

A.D. 1808.—Animated and encouraged by the successful resistance of the Spaniards, the Portuguese also displayed a spirit of patriotic loyalty, and a general insurrection took place in the northern parts of that kingdom. In the provinces from which the enemy had been expelled, the authority of the prince regent was re-established, and provisional juntas, like those of Spain, were formed. The supreme junta of Oporto having taken effectual measures for raising an army, dispatched ambassadors to England to solicit support and assistance. In consequence of this, an army under sir Arthur Wellesley, consisting of 10,000 men, set sail from Cork on the 12th of July, and landed in Oporto, where, after a severe encounter, he compelled the French general La Borde to abandon a very strong position on the heights of Roleia. In the following night La Borde effected a junction with general Lonson, and they retreated with their united forces towards Lisbon. The British army having been reinforced by a body of troops under general Anstruther, proceeded towards the capital, in pursuit of the enemy. On the 21st of August, the French army under Junot, who had been created duke of Abrantes by Buonaparte, met the British troops at the village of Vimiera, where a very severe action ensued, and terminated in the total defeat of the French, whose loss in killed alone amounted to 3,500 men. Sir Hugh Dalrymple, who had been called from Gibraltar to take the command of the British forces, joined the army at Cintra on the day after this splendid victory, and concluded a treaty, which at the time was thought in England to be most disadvantageous, and it became the subject of a military inquiry; but sir Arthur Wellesley giving his testimony generally in its favour, it may safely be inferred to have been wisely concluded; and such was the result of the investigation. It stipulated that the French should evacuate Portugal, with their arms, but leaving their magazines, and be transported to France in British ships, without any restriction in regard to future service; having leave to dispose of their private property (viz. their plunder acquired by contributions), in Portugal. The Russian fleet in the Tagus, consisting of nine ships of the line and a frigate, was to be surrendered to the British government, but to be restored after the peace, and the Russian officers and men to be conveyed home in English transports.

The convention of Cintra being carried into effect, the British forces advanced to Lisbon, and having remained in that city about two months, proceeded in different divisions towards Salamanca, in Spain. In the mean time, an army of 13,000 men, under sir David Baird, having landed at Corunna, was marching through the northern part of Portugal towards the same point. Buonaparte having, with an immense army, entered Spain, in order to conduct the operations of the war, the patriot troops under Belvidere, Blake, and Castanos, were successively defeated, and Napoleon entered Madrid in triumph. Sir John Moore, the commander-in-chief of the British army, being unable to keep the field in the presence of an enemy so much superior in numbers, while his own troops were suffering dreadfully from hunger and fatigue, retreated, in the midst of winter, through a desolate and mountainous country, made almost impassable by snow and rain; yet he effected his retreat with great rapidity and judgment, and arrived at Corunna Jan. 11, 1809. Soult took up a position above the town in readiness to make an attack as soon as the troops should begin to embark. On the 16th, the operation having begun, the enemy descended in four columns, when sir John Moore, in bringing up the guards, where the fire was most destructive, received a mortal wound from a cannon ball. General Baird being also disabled, the command devolved on sir John Hope, under whom the troops bravely continued the fight till nightfall, when the French retreated with the loss of 2000 men, and offered no further molestation. The loss of the English in this battle was stated at between seven and eight hundred men; but their total loss in this arduous expedition was little less than 6000, with their brave and noble commander, whose soldierly skill and general high qualities fully entitled him to the respect and admiration in which he was universally held.

A. D. 1809.—The most vigorous exertions were now made by the French for the complete subjugation of Spain. Having defeated and dispersed several bodies of the Spanish troops, the enemy sat down before Saragossa, and made themselves masters of it, after a desperate and sanguinary assault. The French army then entered Portugal, under marshal Soult, duke of Dalmatia, and took Oporto. On the arrival of another British armament, consisting of about 30,000 men, under generals Wellesley and Beresford, Soult was obliged to retire from Portugal with considerable loss. Sir Arthur Wellesley advanced with rapidity into Spain, and having united his troops with a Spanish army of 38,000 men, under general Cuesta, they marched on Madrid. On the 26th of July general Cuesta's advanced guard was attacked by a detachment of the enemy, and as a general engagement was daily expected, sir Arthur Wellesley took a strong position at Talavera. On the following day a very obstinate engagement commenced, which was continued with various success till the evening of the 28th, when the enemy retreated, leaving behind them seventeen pieces of cannon. The battle was most severe, the English losing in killed, wounded, and missing, 6000 men; while the loss on the part of the French was estimated at 10,000. For the great skill and bravery displayed in this action sir Arthur Wellesley was created a peer, with the title of viscount Wellington. The French army was commanded by Victor and Sebastiani; but soon afterwards, the junction of Soult, Ney, and Mortier, in the rear of the English, compelled them to fall back on Badajoz, and Cuesta remained in Spain to check the enemy's progress.

sort her independence; and Buonaparte had left the peninsula soon after the battle of Corunna, in order to conduct in person the war which was thus renewed in Germany. Hostilities had been declared on the 6th of April, when the archduke Charles issued a spirited address to the army preparatory to his opening the campaign. The whole Austrian army consisted of nine corps, in each of which were from 20,000 to 40,000 men. Buonaparte, in addition to the French corps, now congregated under his standard Bavarians, Saxons and Poles; and such was his celerity of movement, and the impetuosity of his troops, that in the short space of one month he crippled the forces of Austria, and took possession of Vienna on the 13th of May. On the 21st and 22nd of the same month, the archduke Charles, who had taken his position on the left bank of the Danube, engaged Buonaparte between the villages of Aspern and Essling, and completely defeated him, compelling him to retire to Lobau, an island on the Danube. The Austrians were, however, so much weakened by this battle, as to be unable to follow up their success; and both armies remained inactive till the 4th of July when Buonaparte having been greatly reinforced, relinquished his situation, amidst a violent torrent of rain, and drew up his forces in order of battle on the extremity of the Austrian left wing. The allies were greatly disconcerted by this unexpected movement, and being obliged to abandon the strong position which they held, an engagement commenced near Wagram, under every disadvantage, when the French were victorious, and the Austrians retreated towards Bohemia. A suspension of hostilities was soon afterwards agreed on, which was followed by a treaty of peace, concluded at Schonbrun, Oct 15; by which the emperor of Austria was compelled to cede several of his most valuable provinces, to discontinue his intercourse with the court of London, and to close his ports against British vessels.

In the course of the summer was fitted out with great secrecy one of the most formidable armaments ever sent from the shores of England. It consisted of an army of 40,000 men, and a fleet of 39 sail of the line, 36 frigates, and numerous gunboats, &c. The command of the first was given to the earl of Chatham, of the last to sir R. Strachan. The chief objects of the enterprise were to get possession of Flushing and the island of Walcheren, with the French ships of war in the Scheldt; to destroy their arsenals and dock-yards, and to effect the reduction of the city of Antwerp. The preparations which had been made for this expedition, the numerous soldiers and sailors engaged in it, and the immense sums of money which had been expended on it, raised the expectations of the nation to the highest pitch; but it was planned without judgment, and conducted without skill, and therefore necessarily terminated in loss and disgrace. On the arrival of the armament in the Scheldt, the contest between Austria and France had been decided; the military state of the country was widely different from what had been represented; and Antwerp, instead of being defenceless, was completely fortified. The attack on the island of Walcheren succeeded, and Flushing surrendered after an obstinate resistance of twelve days; but as the country assumed a posture of defence that was totally unexpected, all idea of proceeding up the Scheldt was abandoned, and the troops remained at Walcheren, where an epidemic fever raged. Of the fine army that left Portsmouth a few months before, one half perished on the pestilential shores of Walcheren; and of the remainder, who returned in December, many were afflicted with incurable chronic diseases.

The other events of the year may be briefly told. The French settlement at Cayenne surrendered to an English and Portuguese force, and the island of Martinique was soon afterwards captured by British arms. A French fleet, consisting of ten sail of the line, which lay in the Baque roads, under the protection of the forts of the island of Aix, was attacked by a squadron of gunboats, fire-ships, and frigates, under lord Cochrane, who captured four ships, disabled several others, and drove the rest on shore. A gallant action was likewise performed by lord Collingwood, who on the 1st of October destroyed, in the bay of Rosas, three sail of the line, two frigates, and twenty transports. To these successes may be added, the reduction of some small islands in the West Indies, and the capture of a Russian flotilla and convoy in the Baltic, by sir James Saumarez.

In the early part of the year, public attention was engrossed with a parliamentary inquiry into the conduct of his royal highness the duke of York, commander-in-chief, against whom colonel Wardle, an officer of militia, had brought forward a series of charges, to the effect that Mrs. Mary Ann Clarke, a once favoured courtesan of the duke, had carried on a traffic in military commissions, with his knowledge and concurrence. During the progress of this investigation the house was in general fully attended, many of its members appearing highly edified by the equivocal replies and sprightly sallies of the fair frail one. But the duke, though culpable of great indiscretion, was acquitted of personal corruption by a vote of the house. He, however, thought proper to resign his employment. Various circumstances which afterwards transpired tended to throw considerable suspicion on the motives and characters of the parties who instituted the inquiry.

A.D. 1810.—The parliamentary session commenced with an inquiry into the late calamitous expedition to Walcheren; and after a long debate in the house of commons, the conduct of ministers, instead of being censured as was expected, was declared to be worthy of commendation. In the course of the discussion, Mr. Yorke, member for Cambridge, daily enforced the standing order of the house for the exclusion of strangers—a measure which, though sanctioned by a parliamentary regulation, was very unpopular, and became the subject of very severe animadversions in the London debating societies. John Gale Jones, the director of one of these societies called the "British Forum," having issued a placard, notifying that the following question had been discussed there:—"Which was a greater outrage on the public feeling, Mr. Yorke's enforcement of the standing order to exclude strangers from the house of commons, or Mr. Windham's attack on the press?" and that it had been unanimously carried against the former.—Mr. Yorke complained of it as a breach of privilege, and Jones was committed to Newgate. On the 12th of March, sir Francis Burdett, who had been absent when Mr. Jones was committed, brought forward a motion for his liberation, on the ground that his imprisonment by the house of commons was an infringement of the law of the land, and a subversion of the principles of the constitution. This motion being negatived, sir Francis published a letter to his constituents, the electors of Westminster, in which he stated his reasons for objecting to the imprisonment of Mr. Jones, and adverted to the very pointed terms to the illegality of the measure. This letter was brought forward in the house by Mr. Lethbridge, who moved that it was a scandalous publication, and that sir Francis Burdett, having acknowledged himself the author of it, was guilty of a flagrant breach of privilege. After an adjournment of a week, these resolutions were carried; and a motion that sir Francis Burdett should be committed to the Tower, was likewise carried by a majority of thirty-seven members. A warrant was accordingly signed by the speaker of the house of commons, for the apprehension and commitment of the right honourable baronet, and was delivered to the serjeant-at-arms, to be carried into effect. Sir Francis urged the illegality of the speaker's warrant, and resisted the execution of it till the 9th of April, when the serjeant-at-arms, accompanied by messengers, police officers, and detachments of the military, forced open the baronet's house, arrested him, and conveyed him, by a circuitous route, to the Tower. The greatest indignation prevailed among the populace when they heard of the apprehension of their favourite; and, having assembled on Tower hill, they attacked the military with stones and other missiles. For a considerable time the soldiers patiently submitted to the insults of the multitude; but finding that their audacity increased, they fired, and three of the rioters were killed. At the prorogation of parliament, on the 21st of June, sir Francis was liberated from the Tower, and great preparations were made by his partisans for conducting him home, but he prudently declined the honour, and returned to his house by water, to avoid the risk of popular tumult. As for Mr. Gale Jones, who claimed a right to a trial, he refused to leave Newgate, and was at last got out by stratagem, loudly complaining of the double grievance of being illegally imprisoned and as illegally discharged.

On the 31st of May an extraordinary attempt at assassination was made on the duke of Cumberland. At about half-past two o'clock in the morning his royal highness was roused from his sleep by several blows about the head, which were proved to have been given with a sabre; and, jumping up to give an alarm, he was followed by the assassin, who cut him across the thigh. He then called his valet-in-waiting, who hastened to his master's assistance, and alarmed the house. Having closely inspected the room, to see if any one were concealed therein, they went to the porter's room to awaken Sellis, a Piedmontese valet; when, on forcing open the door, they found him stretched on the bed, with his throat cut. Subsequent circumstances made it evident, that this wretch, after having failed in his attempt to assassinate the duke, had retired on the first alarm, and put an end to his existence. Next day a coroner's inquest was held on the body of Sellis, and after bestowing a patient attention to the evidence, the jury returned a verdict of felo-de-as. The assassin was believed to have been actuated by private resentment for some supposed injury, but nothing definite was elicited either at that time or subsequently.

On the retreat of lord Wellington at Talavera, the French armies advanced with astonishing rapidity; and having defeated and dispersed a Spanish army of 50,000 men, at the battle of Ocaña, Nov. 19, they carried their victorious arms into almost every province of Spain. They were, however, much annoyed, and sometimes repulsed by the patriots, who, wandering from place to place, seized every opportunity of revenging themselves on their rapacious invaders. The French army in Portugal was greatly superior in numbers to the English, and was commanded by marshal Massena, prince of Eeling, who employed every artifice to induce lord Wellington to quit the strong position which he held on the mountains. With this view he undertook, successively, the sieges of Ciudad Rodrigo and Almeida, both of which places, after a most spirited resistance, were compelled to surrender. All these stratagems of Massena could not induce the British general to hazard a battle under disadvantageous circumstances; and the cautious conduct of his lordship on this occasion, was as laudable as his courage and resolution had formerly been. Massena at length began to suspect that his opponent was actuated by fear; and therefore determined to attack him in his entrenchments, on the summit of the mountain of Buçaco. An engagement accordingly took place on the 27th of September, when the combined armies of England and Portugal completely defeated the French, who lost on the occasion upwards of 2000 men. A few days after this engagement, the British general, by an unexpected movement, retired towards Lisbon, and occupied an impregnable position on Torres Vedras; whither he was followed by marshal Massena, who encamped directly in his front.

While these events were taking place in Spain and Portugal, the successful termination of some distant naval expeditions served to confirm the gallantry of that branch of the service. The Dutch settlement of Amboyna, with its dependent islands, surrendered to a British force Feb. 17. On the 8th of August, a party of 180 British seamen, under the command of captain Cole, attacked Banda, the principal of the Dutch spice islands, and obliged the garrison, consisting of 1000 men, to surrender. The important islands of Bourbon and the Mauritijs were likewise reduced, at the close of the year, by a British armament, under the command of admiral Bertie and major-general Abercrombie.

Several events took place at this time on the continent of Europe, not less remarkable for their novelty than for their importance. Buonaparte, having divorced the empress Josephine, espoused on the 11th of March the archduchess Maria Louisa, daughter of the emperor of Austria. On the 1st of July, Louis Buonaparte, king of Holland, after having made a fruitless attempt to improve the condition of his unfortunate subjects, abdicated the throne in favour of his eldest son. That exhausted country was immediately seized by Napoleon, and annexed to the French empire. Charles XIII. of Sweden, being advanced in age and having no children, chose for his successor Charles Augustus, prince of Angutinberg; but as this prince died suddenly, it became necessary to nominate his successor. The candidates for this high office were the prince of Holstein, the king of Denmark, and the French marshal Bernadotte, prince of Ponte Corvo. The latter being favoured by Napoleon and by the king of Sweden, he was unanimously chosen crown prince, and his installation took place on the 1st of November, in the presence of the assembled diet. A few days afterwards war was declared against Great Britain; all intercourse was prohibited, and the importation of colonial produce interdited.

CHAPTER LXIII.

The Reign of GEORGE III. [the REGENCY].

A.D. 1811.—One of the first legislative acts of this year was the appointment of the prince of Wales, under certain restrictions, as regent, in consequence of a return of that mental malady with which the king had formerly been temporarily afflicted. The restrictions were to continue till after February 1, 1812. It was expected that a change of ministers would immediately take place, but the prince declined making any change in the administration, or to accept any grant for an establishment in virtue of his new functions.

The progress of events in the peninsula again claims our attention. Massena, who at the close of the preceding year, had posted himself at Santarem, met with such difficulties in procuring the necessary supply of provisions, that he was induced to abandon his position on the 5th of March, leaving behind him a considerable quantity of heavy artillery and ammunition. He continued his retreat through Portugal, closely pursued by lord Wellington and general Beresford. Numerous skirmishes took place between the outposts of the hostile armies; but on the 16th of May a more important action ensued at the river Albuera, between marshal Soult and general Beresford. The contest continued with great impetuosity for several hours, till at length victory declared in favour of the Anglo-Portuguese troops, and the enemy was compelled to retreat. The loss of the French was estimated at 9,000, among whom were five generals; the loss of the allies amounted to about half that number. After this victory general Beresford invested the important city of Badajoz, but was obliged to raise the siege, in consequence of the junction of the French armies under Soult and Marmont.

The war was at the same time conducted with great spirit in different parts of Spain. In Catalonia the operations of the enemy were crowned with success; but in Andalusia the French were compelled to retire before the determined bravery of the allied forces. This army had landed at Algeiras, under general Graham, with the intention of attacking the French troops engaged in the siege of Cadix. On the 5th of March they took a strong position on the heights of Barrosa, where they were attacked on the 25th by a superior force of the enemy. After a remarkably severe engagement, the French retired in disorder, with the loss of 3,000 men; but the numerical inferiority of the allies precluded the hope of pursuing them with success. The subsequent events of the war in the peninsula, during this year, were neither numerous nor important. The French army, who had threatened to "plant their eagles on the walls of Lisbon, and to drive the English into the sea," were not only unable to carry their threat into execution, but were frequently defeated by troops which they were taught to despise.

While the military prowess of England was thus nobly displayed in combating the oppressors of mankind, the superiority of her navy was sufficiently manifested by the success which attended all its operations. A combined French and Italian squadron, consisting of five frigates and six smaller armed vessels, was encountered off the island of Lissa, in the gulf of Venice, by an English squadron composed of four frigates only; the contest was fierce and for a time doubtful, but at length British valour prevailed, and three of the enemy's frigates were taken. On the 21st of July, a French flotilla, consisting of twenty-six vessels, was attacked off the coast of Calabria, by an English frigate and a sloop, and the whole of them were captured without the loss of a man. These and other gallant encounters, though on a small scale, redounded much to our naval credit.

From the year 1807, when the celebrated "orders in council" were issued, a secret discontent, indicative of hostilities, had evinced itself in the United States of America. This misunderstanding was greatly increased in the present year, by an unfortunate encounter between the American frigate President, commanded by commodore Rodgers, and the British sloop of war Little Belt, captain Bingham. The particulars of this occurrence were explicitly and interestingly related by the captain of the Little Belt, who attributes the blame entirely to the American. At any rate, whether the encounter was through a mistake, or designed for the purpose of incensing the English government, the result was, that the American States prepared for war, and notwithstanding remonstrances and concessions were made by the British ministry, war was soon afterwards declared.

During the months of November and December the internal tranquillity of the country was disturbed by frequent riots in the manufacturing districts of Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, and Leicestershire. The principal cause of discontent was the introduction of a new description of frame for stocking-weaving. The rioters assumed the name of Luddites, and they became so dangerous, that the legislature deemed it necessary to use severe measures for their suppression.

A. D. 1812.—The restrictions which had been imposed upon the prince of Wales by the regency bill, were now withdrawn, it being the unanimous opinion of the medical authorities that there was not the slightest prospect of his majesty's return to a state of perfect sanity. The prince therefore assumed the full powers belonging to the sovereignty of Britain; and, contrary to general expectation, very little change was made in the cabinet. On the 13th of February, the regent, in a letter to the duke of York, declared that he "had no predilections to indulge, nor resentments to gratify;" intimating, however, a desire that his government might be strengthened by the co-operating of those with whom his early habits had been formed, and authorising the duke to communicate his sentiments to lords Grey and Grenville. To this overture these noblemen replied, by unreservedly expressing the impossibility of their uniting with the present government, owing to their differences of opinion being too many and too important to admit of such union. The measures proposed for repealing the penal laws against the papists were agitated in both houses of parliament this session, but were negatived by a great majority.

The disturbances among the manufacturing classes, which began last year in Nottinghamshire, had extended into Lancashire, Cheshire, and the west riding of Yorkshire. The property of individuals as well as the machinery was destroyed by nightly marauders; a system of military training was adopted, and secret oaths administered; in short, the number and daring spirit of the rioters, and the steadiness with which their plans were conducted, rendered them so formidable as to require the express interposition of the legislature. A large military force was accordingly stationed in the disturbed counties, and were, on several occasions, found necessary for the maintenance of public peace. By a rigid enforcement of the law, and by the adoption of remedial measures for the distresses of the labouring poor, tranquillity was at length restored.

While the public mind was agitated by these occurrences, an event occurred which was at once truly lamentable and important. On the 11th of May, as Mr. Perceval, chancellor of the exchequer, was entering the lobby of the house of commons, about five o'clock, a person named Bellingham presented a pistol to his breast, and shot him through the heart. The act was so sudden and astounding, that (in the words of a gentleman, well known in the literary world, who happened to be close to Mr. Perceval at the time) "no one of the many individuals present precisely knew what had really happened; and it was the fall of the martyr of assassination only, that developed the nature of the atrocious deed. On receiving the wound, the unfortunate gentleman fell almost back towards his left, against the angle formed by the door and the wall, exclaiming very faintly, 'O God! the last words he ever uttered; for immediately, as if moved by an innate impulse to seek for safety in the house, he made an effort to rush forward, but merely staggered a few paces, and dropped down on the spot.' Bellingham was taken without resistance, a few minutes afterwards. It appeared that he was a Liverpool ship-broker, who having sustained some commercial losses in Russia, for which he thought the government was bound to procure redress, and his memorials on the subject being disregarded, he had worked up his gloomy mind to the monstrous conviction that he was justified in taking away the life of the prime minister. The gentleman whose words we have before quoted, thus graphically describes the appearance of the assassin: "Bellingham, with his breast exposed, and now extremely perturbed, was in a state of great excitation when general Gascoyne appeared, and recognised him as a man whom he knew, from having seen him at Liverpool. No words, indeed, can picture his frightful agitation: large drops of agonising sweat ran down his pallid face; and from the bottom of his chest to his gorge, rose and fell a spasmodic action, as if a body as large as the hand were choking him with every breath. Never on earth, I believe, was seen a more terrible example of over-wrought suffering; yet, in language he was perfectly cool and collected." On his trial at the Old Bailey sessions, the plea of insanity was suggested by his counsel, but overruled. In his defence he expatiated on the ill-treatment he had experienced, and attempted to justify his conduct. At his execution, his demeanour was remarkably firm and composed, and he persisted in refusing to express any contrition for his crime. The untimely death of Mr. Perceval drew forth a strong expression of sympathy; and his widow and family were liberally provided for by parliament. In the change of administration which took place in consequence of this melancholy circumstance, lord Sidmouth was appointed secretary of state; the earl of Harrowby, lord president of the council; and Mr. Vansittart, chancellor of the exchequer.

At the commencement of the campaign in the Spanish peninsula, fortune seemed at first to favour the enemy, who, on the 9th of January, made themselves masters of the city of Valencia, which general Blake, after a feeble resistance, surrendered, with 16,000 men. The strong town of Peniscola, which, on account of its commanding situation, was of great importance to its possessors, was soon after surrendered to the French by the treachery of the governor. Serious as these misfortunes were to the allies, they were in a short time counterbalanced by the success which attended the exertions of the British commander. After a fortnight's siege, lord Wellington carried Ciudad Rodrigo by assault, on the 19th of January; and on the 16th of April the strong city of Badajoz surrendered to him, after a long and most obstinate resistance. After the capture of this city the allied armies proceeded, without opposition, to Salamanca, where they were received by the inhabitants with benedictions and acclamations. As the hostile armies were now so situated as to render a battle almost inevitable, lord Wellington made his necessary dispositions; and as a favourable opportunity occurred on the 22d of July for attacking the enemy, he immediately took advantage of it. An action accordingly ensued, in which the French, after a determined and obstinate resistance, were obliged to give way to the superior bravery of the assailants, and to retreat in the utmost confusion. The darkness of the night was very favourable to the fugitives, yet upwards of 7,000 prisoners were taken, with eagles, colours, cannon, and ammunition.

After taking possession of the Spanish capital, lord Wellington advanced to Burgos; but being detained a long time in besieging it, the enemy had an opportunity of concentrating their force, and of re-occupying Madrid. This was one of the last military transactions which took place on the peninsula during the year. For his eminent services, which though generally appreciated were not over-rated, the Cortes bestowed on the British commander the title of duke of Ciudad Rodrigo, and constituted him generalissimo of the Spanish armies. The prince regent of Great Britain, &c., who had previously conferred on him the title of earl, now raised him to the dignity of a marquis of the United Kingdom.

The foregoing outline of the military transactions in Spain will put the reader in possession of the principal features of the war in that quarter. We must now direct his attention to the events which were transacting in the north of Europe. The fondly-cherished scheme of Buonaparte for ruining the finances of Great Britain, by cutting off her commercial intercourse with the countries of Europe, was, through intrigue or intimidation, adopted by all the neutral powers. The consequent stagnation of trade on the continent, though it was submitted to by their respective sovereigns, was very distressing to their subjects, especially the Russians, who had been accustomed to consider England as their natural ally. At length, the emperor of Russia resolved to submit no longer to the arbitrary restrictions which the will of Napoleon had dictated to him; and a war between those great powers was the immediate and inevitable result. In this contest the most considerable states in Europe were involved. The allies of France were the German states, Italy, Prussia, Austria, and Poland; to whom were opposed the combined powers of Great Britain, Russia, Sweden, and Spain.

Napoleon placed himself at the head of an immense army, and now commenced the ever-memorable struggle. After passing through Dresden, and visiting in rapid succession Dantzic and Königsberg, he reached the Niemen, the frontier river of Russia, on the 23d of June. On the line of march were half a million of soldiers, in the highest state of equipment and discipline; to whom he issued a proclamation in his usual confident and laconic style: "Russians," said he, "is driven onwards by fatality; let her destinies be fulfilled, and an end put to the fatal influence which for the last fifty years she has had on the affairs of Europe. Let us cross the Niemen, and carry the war into her territories." On the other side vast preparations had also been made; and the army, consisting of about 300,000 men, was under the immediate direction of the emperor Alexander, and his sagacious minister, Barclay de Tolly. The plan of the Russians was to draw the invaders from their resources; to make a stand only in favourable situations; and to weary the enemy by endless marches over the dreary plains, till the inclemency of a Russian winter should lend it aid to stop their ambitious career. Various partial engagements took place as the French advanced, the circumstances of which were so differently related in the bulletins of the opposite parties, that nothing is certain but the general result. Considering the immense masses of men that were in motion, the French proceeded with great rapidity, notwithstanding the checks they occasionally experienced, till the 7th of September, when the Russians determined to make a vigorous effort against their farther advance. The two armies met between the villages of Moskwa and Borodino, when a most sanguinary battle took place. On this occasion each of the hostile armies numbered 125,000 men; and when "night's sable curtain" closed the horrid scene, the bodies of 40,000, either dead or mortally wounded, were streched on the field of battle! Both parties claimed the victory, though the advantage was evidently on the side of the French, as they proceeded without farther opposition to Moskwa, where they expected to rest from their toils in peace and good winter quarters. About mid-day on the 14th the turrets of Moscow, glittering in the sun, were desecrated. The troops entered; but the city was deserted, and all was still. The capital of ancient Russia was not destined to be the abiding-place of its present occupants. A dense smoke began to issue from numerous buildings at the same instant. By order of the governor, count Rostopchin, bands of incendiaries had been employed to do the work of destruction. Public edifices and private houses suddenly burst into flames; and every moment explosions of gunpowder mingled with the sound of the crackling timbers; while frantic men and women were seen running to and fro, with flambeaux in their hands, spreading the work of destruction.

Paralysed, as it were, by the awful scene, and by the extreme danger which he could no longer fail to apprehend, Napoleon lingered five weeks among the reeking ruins of Moscow. Around him the Russians were daily increasing in strength, especially in cavalry; and it was not till Murat had been defeated, and the first snow had fallen, that he determined on his retreat. At length, after making several ineffectual attempts at negotiation, he quitted the city of the czars on the 19th of October, taking with him all the plunder that could be saved from the fire; having at the time 100,000 effective men, 50,000 horses, 550 field-pieces, and 2,000 artillery waggons, exclusive of a motley host of followers, amounting to 40,000. He had no choice left. To subdue the whole Russian army, and by that means to secure to himself an honourable peace, appeared to be beyond the verge of possibility; to return with all possible expedition was therefore the only course he could pursue; and he accordingly directed the march of his army towards Smolensk, where he arrived with his imperial guard on the 9th of November. Alternate frost, sleet, and snow made the weather insupportable. Overcome by cold, hunger, and fatigue, the soldiers and their horses perished by thousands; while he, whose mad ambition had led them to their pitiable fate, was travelling in his carriage, and wrapped up in furs. At length, after taking leave of his marshals at Smorgony, Dec. 5, Napoleon privately withdrew from the army, and reached Paris on the 19th. The Russians never relaxed in the pursuit till they reached the Vistula, and not a day passed in which some of the fugitives did not fall into their hands. By Christmas-day they estimated their captures at 41 generals,

During the absence of Buonaparte in this disastrous expedition, an attempt was made to subvert his power at home, which, had it not been speedily suppressed, would probably have occasioned another revolution. The conductors of the conspiracy were the ex-generals Mallet, Lahorie, and Guidal, who having framed a fictitious senatus consultum, went to the barrack of the first division of the national guards, and read a proclamation, stating that the emperor had been killed, and commanding the troops to follow them. The soldiers, little suspecting any forgery, obeyed, and suffered themselves to be led to different posts, where they relieved the guards. The conspirators then arrested the ministers of police, and having assassinated general Hallin, who had marched into the city with some troops, they attempted to seize the chief of the etat-major of Paris; but being arrested, they were committed to prison, and tried before a military commission; when the three generals and eleven others received sentence of death; which being put into execution, tranquillity was restored to Paris.

A.D. 1813.—The attempts which had been made by ministers to arrange the differences between Great Britain and the United States were unsuccessful, the influence of Mr. Madison, the president, being exerted in the rejection of all pacificatory proposals. The conquest of Canada was resolved on, and troops were dispatched into that country; but the vigilance of the British commanders baffled all their schemes, and obliged them to desist from the enterprise. The Americans, however, were successful at sea, and captured several British frigates and other vessels.

After the retreat of Buonaparte from Russia, the emperor Alexander pursued the remaining French forces as far as Posen, a city in Poland. He was here joined by the king of Prussia, who, considering the present an advantageous opportunity for restoring the equilibrium of Europe, renounced his alliance with France, and concluded a treaty with Great Britain and her allies. In the mean time Buonaparte was using all his efforts to revive the spirit, and call forth the resources of his empire; and having appointed the empress regent during his absence, he joined his army, now consisting of 350,000 new troops. On the 7th of May the hostile armies engaged at Lutten, in Upper Saxony, where the French were commanded by Buonaparte, and the allies by general Winisgerode. The conflict was long and bloody, and both parties claimed the victory. On the 19th, 20th, 21st, and 22nd of the same month, severe actions took place, and not less than 40,000 were killed or wounded. On the 1st of June, at the suggestion of the emperor of Austria, Napoleon made proposals to the emperor Alexander for a suspension of hostilities; in consequence of which an armistice was concluded, which was to terminate on the 20th of July.

It now became necessary for Buonaparte to withdraw about 20,000 of his best troops from Spain, to reinforce this grand army in the north of Europe. This diminution of the enemy's force in the peninsula could not fail to gratify the Anglo-Spanish army; yet a concurrence of unavoidable circumstances prevented the marquis of Wellington from opening the campaign till about the middle of May. Having obliged the enemy to evacuate Salamanca, he pursued them with as much haste as possible, and having passed the Ebro, he came up with them at Vittoria, a town in the province of Biscay, where, on the 21st of June, a battle was fought between the allied troops under lord Wellington, and the French, commanded by Joseph Buonaparte and marshal Jourdan. Admirable bravery and perseverance were displayed by the allies, who completely vanquished the enemy, and took 150 cannon and 415 waggons of ammunition. On the side of the allies there were 700 killed and 4000 wounded; and it was well known that the loss of the French was much greater. Being hotly pursued, the enemy retreated across the Bidassoa into France. The baton of marshal Jourdan being taken, was sent to the prince regent, who, in return, created the marquis of Wellington field-marshal of the allied armies of Great Britain, Spain, and Portugal. The Spanish government acknowledged their obligations to the British hero, by conferring on him the dignity of prince of Vittoria.

While the cause of rational freedom was so nobly sustained by lord Wellington in this part of Spain, sir John Murray had landed his troops at Tarragona, in order to invest that place. After he had made himself master of fort St. Philippe, on being informed of the approach of marshal Suchet, he, without waiting for information of the enemy's strength, disembarked his troops, leaving behind him his artillery. For this precipitancy sir John was severely censured by some political writers; and being tried at Winchester, in February, 1815, he was found guilty of "having unnecessarily abandoned a quantity of artillery and stores, which he might have embarked in safety; and was adjudged to be admonished in such a manner as his royal highness the commander in chief may think proper." His royal highness approved and confirmed the sentence of the court, but as the conduct of sir John Murray was attributed merely to an error of judgment, the case did not appear to him to call for any further observation.

After the battle of Vittoria the French army retreated with great precipitation into France, pursued by the light troops of the allies, and the marquis of Wellington caused the forts of Pampeluna and St. Sebastian to be immediately invested. When Buonaparte received intelligence of these successes of the British army, he dispatched marshal Soult with some forces to check their progress. On the 13th of July the French marshal joined the army, and on the 24th he made a vigorous attack on the right wing of the allies, at Roncesvalles, commanded by general Byng. From that day till the 2nd of August the hostile armies were continually engaged; the passes of the mountains were bravely disputed by the enemy, but the British were irresistible, and the French again retreated beyond the Pyrenees. The fortresses of St. Sebastian and Pampeluna surrendered to the British arms afterwards; and on the 7th of October lord Wellington entered the French territory at the head of his army.

While in the south of Europe these transactions were taking place, a great crisis was at hand in the north. During the armistice, which had extended to the 11th of August, several attempts were made by the allies to obtain such a peace as would effect and confirm the safety and tranquillity of the continental states. These endeavours were, however, rendered abortive by the insolent pretensions of the French ruler, which induced the emperor of Austria to relinquish his cause, and to join in the alliance against him. Hostilities were resumed on the 17th of August, when Buonaparte immediately prepared to attack the city of Prague; but being informed that his Silesian army was exposed to imminent danger from the threatening posture of the allies, he was obliged to change his plan of operations. He accordingly quitted Bohemia, and made an attack on the allied army under the Prussian general Blucher, who was compelled to make a retrograde movement. The further progress of the French in this quarter was arrested by the advance of the grand army of the allies towards Dresden, which made the immediate return of Napoleon necessary. He accordingly advanced by forced marches to the protection of that city; and having thrown into it an army of 130,000 men, he awaited the attack of his enemies. The grand assault was made on the 26th of August, but as there was no prospect of taking Dresden by escalade, the allies abandoned the attempt, and took a very extended position on the heights surrounding the city, where they were attacked by the French on the following day, and obliged to retire with considerable loss. It was in this engagement that general Moreau, who had left his retreat in America to assist in restoring liberty to Europe, was mortally wounded, while conversing with the emperor Alexander. A cannon-ball, which passed through his horse, carried off one of his legs and shattered the other. He had both legs amputated, but survived his disaster only a few days, dying from exhaustion.

In the following month several well-contested battles took place, in which victory was uniformly in favour of those who contended against tyranny and usurpation. But as Leipzig was the point to which the efforts of the confederates were principally

At this period an important accession was made to the allied cause, by a treaty with Bavaria, who agreed to furnish an army of 55,000 men. The hostile armies were now both in the vicinity of Leipzig: the French estimated at about 200,000 men; the allies at 250,000. On the night of the 15th rockets were seen ascending, announcing the approach of Blücher and the crown prince of Sweden. At day-break, on the 16th, the French were assailed along their southern front with the greatest fury, but failing to make an impression, Napoleon assumed the offensive. Throughout the day, by turns each party had the advantage; but at night-fall the French found it necessary to contract their position, by drawing nearer the walls of Leipzig. The following day was principally spent in making preparations for a renewal of the contest; and on the 18th another general engagement took place. The loss of the victors, during a battle which raged from dawn of day till night, was severe; but that of the vanquished was infinitely more so. Above 40,000 of the enemy were either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners; seventeen battalions of Saxons, with their artillery, joined the ranks of the allies, who took also sixty-five pieces of cannon. The immediate fruits of this splendid victory were, the capture of Leipzig and of the Saxon king, of 30,000 prisoners, and of all the baggage and ammunition of the flying foe.

The allies did not fail to follow up the advantages which had been gained; and their close pursuit of the French army, rendered its retreat to the Rhine in some respects as calamitous as their recent flight from Russia. The troops under Blücher and Schwartzburg, who had greatly distinguished themselves during the late encounters, entered the French territories on New-year's day, 1814. All the minor states of Germany now joined the grand alliance; the confederation of the Rhine was dissolved; and the continental system established by Buonaparte was broken up.

The spirit which had attended the march of the allied armies, communicated itself to the United Provinces, and occasioned a complete revolution in that part of Europe. The arbitrary annexation of that country was very detrimental to their commercial interests; and, at length, on the approach of the allies to the Dutch frontier, the people of Amsterdam rose in a body, and with the rallying cry of "Orange Boven," universally displayed the orange colours, and proclaimed the sovereignty of that illustrious house. The example of Amsterdam was followed by the other towns; the bonds of French tyranny were immediately broken, the independence of Holland was asserted, and a deputation was sent to London, to announce the revolution, and to invite the prince of Orange to place himself at the head of his countrymen. The Dutch patriots were assisted with all the succours that England could conveniently furnish; and the prince of Orange went and assumed the reins of government, not under the ancient title of stadtholder, but as king of the Netherlands. Denmark, the only remaining ally of Buonaparte, was compelled, by the crown prince of Sweden, to accept such terms as the allied sovereigns pleased to prescribe.

On the 1st of December the allied sovereigns issued from Frankfurt a declaration explanatory of their views. "Victory," they said, "had conducted them to the banks of the Rhine, and the first use which they made of it was to offer peace. They desired that France might be great and powerful; because, in a state of greatness and strength, she constituted one of the foundations of the social edifice of Europe. They offered to confirm to the French empire an extent of territory which France, under her kings, never knew. Desiring peace themselves, they wished such an equilibrium of power to be established, that Europe might be preserved from the calamities which for the last twenty years had overwhelmed her." This declaration was based on moderation and justice; and in their conduct to France, the allies acted up to their professions.

A. D. 1814.—After his hasty retreat to Paris, the fugitive emperor assembled the senate, and neglected no means that were likely to rouse the spirit of the French to resist their invaders. Very little effect was, however, produced by his appeals to the people, and he was under the necessity of appointing twenty-five commissioners, each invested with absolute power, to accelerate the cry of new forces. Having confided the regency to the empress, he left Paris on the 25th of January, and placed himself at the head of such troops as he could muster. His dominions were at this time threatened on one side by the British troops, under lord Wellington, and on the other by the allied forces commanded by their respective sovereigns and generals.

The army under the marquis of Wellington attacked Soult's on the 27th of February, and, after an obstinate battle, drove the enemy from a strong position near Orthes; and on the 12th of March, a division under marshal Bernadotte advanced to the important city of Bourdeaux, and entered it amid the acclamations of the inhabitants.

After the entry of the northern allies into France, several sanguinary contests took place; when Buonaparte finding that it was impracticable to prevail by force, attempted to relieve his affairs by negotiations. Plenipotentiaries appointed by the belligerent powers accordingly assembled at Chatillon; and the allies, whose moderation had on every occasion been particularly conspicuous, offered to sign preliminaries of peace, which would have secured to Buonaparte very important advantages. But these offers were rejected by Napoleon, who required that his family should be placed on foreign thrones, and insisted on terms totally incompatible with the liberties of Europe. The conferences were consequently discontinued; and the allied sovereigns, indignant at the conduct of one who displayed such an unquenchable aversion to a just and equal peace, resolved on vigorously prosecuting the war. In all the engagements which ensued, the superiority of the allies was sufficiently manifested. Napoleon now adopted the singular resolution of getting to the rear of his enemies, and by this ill-judged movement left open the road to Paris.

been soon as the Prussian and Austrian commanders could form a junction, they advanced, at the head of 200,000 combatants, towards the capital of France; and having gained a complete victory over the army commanded by Marmont and Mortier, under Joseph Buonaparte, they entered the city by capitulation on the 31st of March. The enthusiasm and exultation exhibited on this occasion, surpassed the most sanguine expectations of the conquerors. The whole city seemed to rise on masses, and to hail the allies as the liberators of Europe and the avengers of liberty. The white cockade was generally worn, the Louis XIV. was generally worn, and the king himself, with shouts of Vive le Roi, Louis XVIII! Virent les Bourbons! and the conquerors were welcomed with the acclamations of Vive l'empereur Alexandre! Vire le roi de Prusse! Virent nos libérateurs!

The French senate now assembled and appointed a provisional government, at the head of which was the celebrated Talleyrand, prince of Benevento. At a subsequent meeting they declared that Napoleon Buonaparte and his family had forfeited all claim to the throne, and that the army and nation were consequently absolved from the oaths of allegiance to him. The senate then directed their attention to the choice of a sovereign; and after a long consultation, in which there was considerable difference of opinion, they determined to recall the Bourbons. Marshal Marmont, after obtaining a promise that the life of the emperor should be spared, and that his troops might pass into Normandy, joined the allies at the head of 12,000 men.

Buonaparte, who had retired to Fontainebleau, finding that he had been deposed by the senate, and that the allies were fully determined not to treat with him as the ruler of France, now offered to abdicate in favour of his infant son; but this was peremptorily rejected, and he solemnly abdicated his usurped crown on the 6th of April; on which day a new constitution was given to France, and Louis XVIII. was recalled to the throne of his ancestors. As soon as the emperor Alexander was informed of this event, he proposed, in the name of the allied sovereigns, that Napoleon Buonaparte should choose a place of retreat for himself and family. By a mistaken sense of generosity, the small island of Elba, situated in the Mediterranean, between Corsica and the Tuscan coast, was given to him, in full sovereignty.

with an annual revenue of two millions of francs, to be paid by the French government; and what was a still more extravagant stretch of misplaced liberality, a further allowance of two millions five hundred thousand francs was to be allowed to the different branches of his family; who, as well as Napoleon were to be suffered to retain their usurped titles! The principality of Parma was also settled on Maria Louisa, his wife, in which she was to be succeeded by her son.

Louis, who had for several years resided at Hartwell in Buckinghamshire, having accepted the basis of the constitution, made a public entry into London, and was accompanied to Dover by the prince regent, from whence his majesty embarked for Calais, being conveyed to that port by the duke of Clarence. He entered Paris on the 3rd of May, where he was favourably received by the inhabitants, but the soldiery were far from appearing satisfied with the change which had been so suddenly wrought. On the same day, Buonaparte, after a variety of adventures, in which he had several narrow escapes from the violence of an infuriated populace, arrived at his abode in Elba.

Owing to some unaccountable delay in the transmission of the treaty concluded at Paris, or (as was thought at the time) to the envious malignity of marshal Soult, who hoped to defeat his opponent and retrieve his lost honour, a sanguinary battle was fought near Toulouse, on the 10th of April, between his army and that of the marquis of Wellington. But this useless and deplorable effusion of blood only added fresh trophies to those already gained by the British commander. The last action of the peninsular war was fought at Bayonne, in which general sir John Hope was wounded and taken prisoner, and general Andrew Hay was killed.

Among the minor transactions of this period, we must not omit, that at the close of the preceding year Hanover was recovered by the crown prince of Sweden; who also reduced Holstein and Westphalia.—The king of Denmark joined the grand alliance; and Dantzic surrendered after a long siege. The British, however, were repulsed, with considerable loss, in the attempt to take the strong fortress of Bergen-op-Zoom.

A treaty of peace and amity was, on the 30th of May, concluded at Paris, between his Britannic majesty and his most Christian majesty, by which it was stipulated that the kingdom of France should retain its limits entire, as it existed previously to the revolution; that Malta should be ceded to Great Britain; and that, with the exception of Tobago, St. Lucie, and the Manritius, all other possessions held by the French in January, 1793, should be restored. These and a few minor conditions being arranged at the time, it was agreed that all other subjects should be settled at a congress, to be held at Vienna by the high contracting parties, at some future period. The return of peace was celebrated by illuminations, feasting, and every joyful demonstration that so happy an event could inspire.

The first act of the heroic and fortunate victors, now that the treaty had been ratified by the respective governments, was to pay a congratulatory visit to the prince regent of England. Accordingly, the emperor of Russia, accompanied by his sister the duchess of Oldenburg; the king of Prussia, with his two sons; together with princes Metternich, generals Blücher, Barclay de Tolly, Bulow, hetman of the Cossacks, &c., landed at Dover on the 6th of June, and arrived in London the next day. The metropolis was illuminated, and became a general scene of gaiety during the three weeks' stay of the royal visitors. The illustrious strangers lost no opportunity of seeing whatever was most worthy of their notice; and they were not merely entertained by royal banqueting, but received the attention due to their rank and valuable services in the general cause of Europe, by splendid and costly entertainments from the corporation and public companies of London. The bank, the dock-yards, the arsenal at Woolwich, Greenwich and Chelsea-hospitals, the mint, St. Paul's on the day of the charity-children's anniversary, and Westminster-abbey, were by turns visited, and throngs of well-dressed people every where accompanied them; while the frank and urbane conduct of the noble guests—the emperor Alexander and the gallant old Blücher more especially were the admiration of the multitude. Nor were their visits confined to the places above mentioned. They witnessed Ascot-heath races; were present at a grand review in Hyde-park; and took a journey to Oxford, where they were splendidly entertained by the masters and students of the university, and received certain honorary distinctions. After having inspected nearly all the public offices of the metropolis, their majesties and suites made preparations for their return to the continent. They left London on the 22nd of June, arrived at Portsmouth in the evening, and the next day were entertained with the novel and truly grand spectacle of a naval review. The fleet formed a line of seven or eight miles in extent, and received the royal visitors with a royal salute, after which they slipped their cables, and were immediately under sail with a brisk gale. The Royal Sovereign yacht, on board of which were the illustrious visitors, led the van, and was followed by the barges of the admiralty and private vessels of all descriptions, to the number of two hundred. The effect was beautiful. The royal party quitted the men of war at about seven o'clock, and landed amidst a discharge of all the artillery round the works of Portsmouth and Fortsea. On the arrival of the prince regent at the government-house, he was met by the marquis of Wellington, who had been waiting his approach. As soon as the populace were informed of the arrival of the British hero, the air echoed with their shouts, and having taken the horses from his carriage, they drew him in triumph to the prince's abode.

The regent and his august visitors left Portsmouth on the 25th of June; and after reviewing about 7000 troops on Portsea-hill, they proceeded to the seat of the duke of Richmond, at Goodwood, to breakfast, arrived at Dover on the following day; and on the 27th the emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia, with their respective suites, took a farewell of the prince regent, and embarked for the continent. It is difficult to describe the eager curiosity and the unbounded demonstrations of joy with which they were received wherever they appeared; nor is it less so to do justice to that affability and condescension with which they uniformly endeavoured to gratify all who approached them. The homage of affectionate respect which the emperor Alexander, in particular, received in England, was not the flattery of sycophants; it was a testimony of the attachment of a free people, who honoured him as a man rather than as a monarch; and his discerning mind doubtless felt the tribute as one of the most grateful rewards to which his eminent services entitled him.

It is necessary that we now revert to the war that was still being carried on, though with no great vigour on either side, between Great Britain and the United States of America. Many indecisive conflicts took place between the rival flotillas on the lakes; and as the Americans had frequently succeeded in capturing such British vessels as were inferior to those with which they had come in contact, the honour of the British flag seemed for awhile to droop; but it rose again triumphant under captain Broke, of the Shannon, who in the short space of fifteen minutes captured the Chesapeake, off the port of Boston, and in sight of the people who lined its shores to witness the action. During the months of June, July, and August, the squadron under rear-admiral Cockburn, was constantly engaged in harassing the enemy in every available position, till the arrival of sir Alexander Cochrane, the commander-in-chief of the British troops in that quarter. Being joined by rear-admiral Malcolm, with some reinforcements from Bermuda, an attack upon the American flotilla in the Patuxent was formed, and the fleet sailed up the river. The American vessels being destroyed before the fleet arrived, the British commanders resolved to make an attempt on Washington, the seat of the American government. In pursuance of this design, they advanced to the village of Bladensburg, about five miles from the capital, and having defeated a superior American force, they proceeded, without further opposition, to Washington. On the approach of the British armament the enemy set fire to the navy-yard and arsenals, which, with the stores and a fort, were totally consumed. The senate-house, the house of representation, the treasury, the war office, the president's palace, and all the public buildings, were burned the same sight; 204 pieces of cannon and a large quantity of ammunition in the city and arsenal destroyed. The object of this expedition being thus fully accomplished, the British troops re-embarked. After this event the hostile operations in America were neither important nor interesting; the vigorous measures lately pursued by the British legislature convinced the president, Mr. Madison, that his country could derive no advantage from prolonging the contest, and induced him to accelerate the conclusion of peace. The treaty was consequently signed at Ghent, Dec. 24.

A.D. 1815.—We now resume our brief narrative of the events which were occurring on the other side of the English channel. Louis XVIII. devoted his attention to the re-establishment of order in the government, and endeavoured by every kind and conciliatory act, to soothe the animosities that still ranked in the bosoms of the royalists, republicans, and Buonapartists. The new constitution, which was modelled upon that of England, was readily accepted by the senate and legislative body. The conscription was abolished; the unsold property of the emigrants was restored to them; the shops, which, during the republic and the reign of Buonaparte, had always remained open on Sundays, were now ordered to be closed; and the liberty of the press was restricted within proper limits.

A congress of the allied powers was now held at Vienna, for the purpose of making such political and territorial regulations, as should effectually restore the equilibrium of power, and afford a more certain prospect of permanent tranquillity. But a state of tranquillity was not so near as their sanguine wishes contemplated. An event happened ere their deliberations were brought to a conclusion, which made it necessary for them to lay by their pen, and once more take up the sword. The restless and intriguing spirit of Napoleon was not to be confined to the isle of Elba; and the allied armies were no sooner withdrawn from France, than he meditated a descent on its coast. He accordingly took advantage of the first opportunity that offered of quitting the island, attended by the officers and troops who had followed him thither, with many Corsicans and Elbese, and landed at Cannes, in Provence, on the 1st of March.

The news of his landing was instantly conveyed to Paris, and large bodies of troops were sent to arrest his progress, and make him prisoner. But Louis was surrounded by traitors; the army regretted the loss of their chief who had so often led them to victory; they forgot his base desertion of their comrades in the moment of peril; and doubted not that his return would efface their late disgrace, and restore them to that proud pre-eminence from which they had fallen. At his approach, the armies that had been sent to oppose him openly declared in his favour; and he pursued his journey to Paris, augmenting his numbers at every step, till all resistance on the part of the king was deemed useless. On reaching the capital, he was received by the inconstant multitude with acclamations as loud as those which so recently had greeted the arrival of Louis. Such is the instability of what is termed popular favour! The unfortunate king retired first to Lisle, and then to Ghent.

When the allied sovereigns were informed that Napoleon had broken his engagements, and saw that his bad faith was fully equal to his ambition, they published a declaration, to the effect that Buonaparte having violated the convention, he had forfeited every claim to public favour, and would henceforth be considered only as an outlaw. In answer to this, he published a counter declaration, asserting that he was recalled to the throne by the unanimous voice of the nation, and that he was resolved to devote the remainder of his life in cultivating the arts of peace.

In the mean time, preparations for war were made by all the allied powers. The English, whose army, under the command of the duke of Wellington, was at this time in the Netherlands, resolved not to leave the man they had once conquered, in quiet possession of the throne of France, and every cogine was put in motion to re-assemble the troops. Buonaparte, likewise, actively prepared for the contest that was to decide his fate. He collected together all the disposable forces of France, and led them towards the Netherlands, hoping to arrive before fresh troops could come to the aid of the English and Prussians, and thus defeat them and get possession of Brussels.

The army under the immediate direction of the French emperor, including the corps of Gouchy, amounted to upwards of 150,000 men, with 250 pieces of cannon. In an order of the day, issued the 14th of June, he said, "the moment has arrived for every Frenchman who has a heart, to conquer or perish." The allied troops in Flanders were yet quiet in their cantonments. The Prusso-Saxon army formed the left, the Anglo-Belgian army the right. The former was 115,000 strong, commanded by the veteran Blücher; the latter about 80,000, commanded by the duke of Wellington, whose head-quarters were at Brussels; those of Blücher were at Namur, about sixteen leagues distant.

On the 15th of June the memorable campaign of 1815 was begun, by Napoleon driving in the advanced posts of the Prussians on the river Sambre; whilst marshal Ney crossed the river at Marchiennes, repulsed the Prussians, and drove back Belgian brigade to Quatre Bras. In the evening, at eleven o'clock, the duke of Wellington, (who, together with the duke of Brunswick, and the principal officers then in Brussels, were participating in the festivities of a ball, given by the duchess of Richmond,) received a despatch from marshal Blücher, informing him that Buonaparte was on his march to Brussels, at the head of 150,000 men. The dance was suspended, and orders issued for assembling the troops. On the 15th was fought the battle of Ligny, in which Blücher was defeated, and forced to retreat to Wavre, having narrowly escaped being taken prisoner. On the same day the duke of Wellington had directed his whole army to advance on Quatre-Bras, with the intention of succouring Blücher, but was himself attacked by a large body of cavalry and infantry, before his own cavalry had joined. In the mean time the English, under sir Thomas Picton, with the Belgians, under the duke of Brunswick, had to sustain the impetuous attacks of the French, commanded by marshal Ney, who was eventually repulsed, though with considerable loss. In this action fell the gallant duke of Brunswick, who was universally and deservedly lamented.—The whole of the 17th was employed in preparations for the eventful battle that ensued.

The retreat of Blücher's army to Wavre rendered it necessary for Wellington to make a corresponding retrograde movement, in order to keep up a communication with the Prussians, and to occupy a position in front of the village of Waterloo. Confronting the position of the allies was a chain of heights, separated by a ravine, half a mile in breadth. Here Napoleon arrayed his forces; and having rode through the lines and given his last orders, he placed himself on the heights of Rossomme, whence he had a complete view of the two armies.

About a quarter before eleven o'clock the battle began by a fierce attack on the British division posted at Hougomont; it was taken and retaken several times, the English guards bravely defending and eventually remaining in possession of it. At the same time the French kept an incessant cannonade against the whole line, and made repeated charges with heavy masses of cuirassiers, supported by close columns of infantry; which, except in one instance, when the farm of La Haye Sainte was forced, were uniformly repulsed. Charges and countercharges of cavalry and infantry followed with astonishing pertinacity. The brave sir Thomas Picton was shot, at the head of his division: a grand charge of British cavalry then ensued, which for a moment swept every thing before it; but, assailed in its turn by masses of cuirassiers and Polish lancers, it was forced back, and in the desperate encounter sir William Ponsonby and other gallant officers were slain. Soon after this, it is said, the duke felt himself so hard pressed, that he was heard to say, "Would to God night or Blücher would come." As the shades of evening approached, it appeared almost doubtful whether the troops could much longer sustain the unequal conflict; but at this critical moment the Prussian cannon was heard on the left. Buonaparte immediately dispatched a force to hold them in check; while he brought forward the imperial guards, sustained by the best regiments of horse and foot, amid shouts of Vive l'Empereur, and flourishes of martial music. At this moment the duke of Wellington brought forward his whole line of infantry supported by the cavalry and artillery, and promptly ordered his men to "charge!" This was so unexpected by the enemy, and so admirably performed by the British troops, that the French fled as though the whole army were panic-stricken. Napoleon, perceiving the recoil of his columns on all sides, exclaimed, "It is all over," and retreated with all possible speed. The French left the field in the utmost confusion and dismay, abandoning above one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon. They were pursued by the victors till long after dark, when the British, exhausted by fatigue, halted; the Prussians therefore continued the pursuit, and nothing could be more complete than the discomfiture of the routed army; not more than 40,000 men, partly without arms, and carrying with them only twenty-seven pieces out of their numerous artillery, made their retreat through Charleroi. The loss of the allies was great; that of the British and Hanoverians alone amounted to 13,000. Two generals and four colonels were among the killed; nine generals and five colonels were wounded; among them was lord Uxbridge, who had fought gallantly, and was wounded by almost the last shot that was fired by the enemy. Such is the general, though necessarily meagre, outline of the ever-memorable battle of Waterloo: evincing one of the noblest proofs upon record of British valour, and of the talents of a great national commander.

Buonaparte returned to Paris, in the gloominess of despair, and admitted that his army was no more. The partisans of Louis looked forward to the restoration of the Bourbons; another party desired a republic; while the Buonapartists showed their anxiety to receive Napoleon's abdication, and to make Maria Louisa empress-regent during her son's minority. Meanwhile the representatives of the nation declared their sittings permanent; and some of the members having boldly asserted, that the unconditional abdication of Buonaparte could alone serve the state, the declaration was received with applause, and the fallen emperor was persuaded once more to descend from his usurped throne.

A commission was appointed to repair to the allied armies with proposals of peace, but the victors had formed a resolution not to treat but under the walls of Paris. The duke of Wellington then addressed a proclamation to the French people, stating that he had entered the country not as an enemy, except to the usurper, with whom there could be neither peace nor truce; but to enable them to throw off the yoke by which they were oppressed. Wellington and Blücher continued their march to Paris with little opposition, and on the 30th it was invested. The heights about the city were strongly fortified, and it was defended by 50,000 troops of the line, besides national guards and volunteers. On the 3rd of July, marshal Davoust, the French commander, concluded a convention with the general-in-chief of the allied armies, who stipulated that Paris should be evacuated in three days by the French troops; all the fortified posts and barriers given up; and no individual prosecuted for his political opinion or conduct. The provisional government now retired; and on the 6th Louis made his public entry into Paris, where he was hailed by his sickle subjects with cries of Vive le roi! The military, however, though beaten into submission, were still stubborn; and it required some time and address to make them acknowledge the sovereignty of the Bourbons.

Buonaparte in the meantime had reached the port of Rochefort in safety, from whence he anxiously hoped to escape to America; but finding it impossible to elude the British cruisers, he went on board the Bellerophon, one of the vessels blockading the coast, and surrendered himself to captain Maitland. Prior to this, he had sought to stipulate for a free passage, or to surrender on condition of being allowed to reside in England, in honourable exile; but neither proposal could be listened to: the allied powers, aware of his restless and intriguing disposition, had determined upon the island of St. Helena as his future residence, and that there he should be kept under the strictest guard. The Bellerophon proceeded to Torbay; Napoleon was transferred to the Northumberland, commanded by admiral sir G. Cockburn, and attended by some of his most attached friends and domestics, he in due course reached his ultimate destination; but not without violently protesting against the injustice of his banishment, after having thrown himself upon the hospitality of the British nation.

Murat, the brother-in-law of Napoleon, having joined the allies when he found the career of his friend and patron growing to a close, rejoined him again on his return from Elba; but having been driven from the throne of Naples, he joined a band of desperadoes, and landed in Calabria; where, being speedily overcome and taken, he was instantly shot. Marshal Ney (who had promised Louis to bring Napoleon, "like a wild beast in a cage, to Paris") and colonel Labedoyere, suffered for their treachery; but Lavalette, who was sentenced to the same fate, escaped from prison, disguised in his wife's clothes; and by the assistance of sir Robert Wilson, Mr. Hutchinson, and Mr. Bruce, got out of the country undiscovered.

A congress was held at Vienna, and several treaties between the allied powers and France were finally adjusted, (Nov. 20). The additions made to the French territory by the treaty of 1814 were now rescinded; seventeen of the frontier fortified towns and cities of France were to be garrisoned by the allies for five years; 150,000 troops, as an army of occupation, under the duke of Wellington, were to be maintained for the same space of time; and a sum of 900,000,000 francs was to be paid as an indemnity to the allies. It was further agreed, that all the works of art which had been plundered by the French from other countries, should be restored. Thus the master-pieces of art deposited in the gallery of the Louvre, (the Venus de Medici, the Apollo Belvidere, &c. &c.) were reclaimed by their respective owners—an act of stern justice, but one which excited the utmost indignation among the Parisians.

In order to secure the peace of Germany, an act of confederation was concluded between its respective rulers; every member of which was free to form what alliances he pleased, provided they were such as could not prove injurious to the general safety; and in case of one prince being attacked, all the rest were bound to arm in his defence. Thus ended this long and sanguinary warfare; the events of which were so rapid and appalling, and their consequences so mighty and unlooked for, that future ages will be tempted to doubt the evidence of facts, and to believe that the history of the nineteenth century is interwoven with and embellished by the splendour of fiction.

A. D. 1816.—It has been justly observed, that "it was only after the storm had subsided that England became sensible of the wounds received in her late tremendous struggle. While hostilities lasted, she felt neither weakness nor disorder. Though a principal in the war, she had been exempt from its worst calamities. Battles were fought, countries were overrun and desolated, but her own border remained unassailable. Like a spectator viewing securely the tempest at a distance, she was only sensible of its fury by the wreck of neighbouring nations, wafted at intervals to her shores. The cessation of hostilities, in 1815, was like the cessation of motion in a gigantic machine, which has been urged to its maximum velocity. One of the first results of peace was an enormous diminution in the war expenditure of the government. During the last five years of the war, the public expenditure averaged 108,720,000*l*. During the first five years of peace it averaged 64,660,000*l*. Peace thus caused an immediate reduction of nearly fifty millions in the amount of money expended by government in the support of domestic industry. Transitions, whether from peace to war or war to peace, invariably produce derangements, if not aggregate loss, in the economical relations of the community. In the first, there is the abandonment of various projects of improvement, as roads, canals, bridges, and buildings; and of undertakings in commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, that depend on a low rate of interest, and moderate price of labour: in the last, are the derangements just alluded to, of soldiers and seamen discharged, foreign colonies relinquished, manufactures, suited to a state of war, suspended, workmen and capital put out of employment, and the public loaded with enormous debts, and the maintenance of reduced placemen, and naval and military supernumeraries. In times of industrial prosperity the masses take little interest in public affairs; their differences are with their employers. Encouraged by the demand for labour, they seek by combination to extort higher wages. The struggle continues till high prices and overstocked markets produce a mercantile revulsion; then workmen are discharged, wages lowered, and masters recover their ascendancy. It is in this state of depression that workmen begin to listen to representations of public grievances. Republican writings increase in circulation; abstract theories of government are propounded; and the equal right of all to share in political franchises is boldly asserted and readily believed. While the popular excitement lasts the property-classes keep aloof, having no wish to countenance opinions incompatible with their present immunities; and the aristocratic politicians of all parties either combine against the common enemy, or suspend the agitation of their mutual differences. This was the state of the country in 1816: in the metropolis and in the northern counties there were vast assemblages of people in the open air, but they were unattended by the rich and influential. Working men called the meetings, drew up resolutions, and made speeches, setting forth the evils of non-representation, of libertine wars, of the pressure of taxes levied on the industrious, to be squandered in extravagant salaries, sinecures, and unmerited pensions—for all which the remedy prescribed was a RADICAL REFORM of the house of commons, on the basis of universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and vote by ballot.

Though we can ill afford room for more than a brief recital of actual occurrences, it seemed absolutely necessary at this period of our history to take some notice of the position which, after a warfare of such long continuance and of so expensive a character, Great Britain assumed, in her domestic, as well as in her foreign relations. The preceding observations, therefore, which we have taken the liberty to extract from Mr. Wade's Chronological History, will furnish the reader with a synoptical review of this period, in language at once clear and condensed, and will tend to elucidate much that may afterwards be summarily mentioned or incidentally alluded to.

At the commencement of the session ministers were defeated in attempting to continue the property tax for one year longer; and, chagrined at this result, they abandoned the war duty on malt, thereby relinquishing a tax that would have produced 2,000,000*l.* The Bank restriction bill was extended for two years longer; and another ineffectual attempt was made in favour of the Roman catholic claims.

The house was now informed, by a message from the prince regent, that a matrimonial alliance was about to take place between his daughter and prince Leopold of Saxe Cobourg; upon which parliament voted an annual provision of 50,000*l.* for supporting a suitable establishment; and in the event of the decease of the princess, 50,000*l.* per annum was secured to his royal highness for life. The nuptials were solemnized with becoming splendour, on the 2nd of May, at Carlton house. In the July following the princess Mary gave her hand to her cousin the duke of Gloucester.

The event that next demands notice was one which placed the glory of the British arms, and the humanity of the British nation, in a conspicuous light. The Algerines and their neighbours, the Tunisians, had long been in the habit of committing the vilest atrocities on the subjects of every Christian power that happened to fall into their hands. Repeated remonstrances had been made, without procuring any redress, and it was now determined on, that this horde of pirates should either accede to certain proposals, or suffer for so long and so barbarously defying the laws of civilized nations. Accordingly, in the spring, lord Exmouth was sent with a fleet to the states of Barbary, to conclude a treaty of peace between them and the kings of Naples and Sardinia; to abolish Christian slavery; and to obtain from them a promise to respect the flag of the Ionian islands, which had lately become an independent country. The beys of Tunis and Tripoli acceded to all these demands; but the bey of Algiers demurred, as far as regarded the abolition of slavery. Shortly after, notwithstanding this treaty, a considerable number of unarmed Christians, who had landed at Bona, having been massacred by the Mahometans, lord Exmouth returned, and commenced a furious bombardment of the city of Algiers, which lasted six hours; the contest was severe; eight hundred of the assailants fell in the action, and the British ships suffered considerably; but the gallant admiral had the satisfaction of demolishing the Algerine batteries, and destroying their shipping, arsenal, and magazine; while the dey was forced to agree to the abolition of Christian slavery, and to the release of all Christian slaves within his dominions.

The distresses of both the laboring and manufacturing classes, from the causes before advocated, and the high price of provisions, at length produced serious disturbances in various parts of England. The malcontents in the eastern counties broke out into open violence, and were not suppressed without the assistance of the military. In London similar attempts were made. Mr. Hunt, a popular demagogue, had on the 15th of November convened a public meeting in Spa-fields, to draw up a petition to the regent. On the 2nd of December another meeting was called to receive the answer to their petition. While this meeting was awaiting the arrival of Mr. Hunt, a band of desperadoes appeared on the ground with a tri-coloured flag and other banners, headed by a young man named Watson, who, after using violent

A melancholy event now occurred which diffused a gloom over the whole nation. The princess Charlotte, daughter of the regent and consort of prince Leopold, expired on the 5th of November, after having

The British army returned from France, which they had lately occupied, according to the stipulations of the treaty at the restoration of Louis XVIII. Towards the close of the year, the expedition which had been sent out to explore the arctic regions, also returned to England, but without accomplishing their object; the progress of the vessels having been so impeded by the ice.

A. D. 1819.—THE CUSTODY OF THE KING'S PERSON VESTED IN THE DUKE OF YORK, WITH AN ALLOWANCE OF 10,000L. PER ANNUM.

A. D. 1819.—The country was still pregnant with disaffection; and the doctrine of annual parliaments and universal suffrage was advocated by the demagogues of the day, as the only remedy for all the evils arising from what they termed the venality of government, and a corrupt state of the representation. At length, the numerous meetings of the populace, in the open air, assumed a very serious aspect; one of which, from its being attended with fatal consequences, and having given rise to much subsequent discussion, it is necessary to describe. This was the "Manchester reform meeting." It was originally convened for the choice of a parliamentary representative, and had been fixed to take place on the 9th of August; but, in consequence of a spirited notice put forth by the magistrates, declaring that the intended meeting was illegal, it was postponed, and hopes were entertained that it would ultimately have been abandoned. However, new placards were issued for the 16th, and "parliamentary reform" was substituted for the original object. A piece of ground called St. Peter's field was the spot chosen for this memorable exhibition; and hither large bodies of men, arrayed in regular order, continued to march during the whole of the morning, the neighbouring towns and villages pouring out their multitudes for the purpose of centering in this focus of radical discontent. Each party had its banner, with some motto thereon inscribed, characteristic of the grand object they had in view, mottoes which have since become familiar even to ears polite—such as "No Corn Laws," "Annual Parliaments," "Vote by Ballot," "Liberty or Death," &c. Nay, such was the enthusiasm of the hour, that among them were seen two clubs of "female reformers," their white flags floating in the breeze. At the time Mr. Hunt took the chair, not less than 50,000 persons—men, women, and children—had assembled; and while he was addressing the crowd, a body of the Manchester yeomanry-cavalry came in sight, and directly galloped up to the hustings, seizing the orator, together with his companions and their banners. A dreadful scene of terror and confusion ensued, numbers being trampled under the horses' feet, or cut down. Six persons were killed, and about a hundred were said to be wounded; but the accounts which were published of this unfortunate transaction differed so materially, that we are unable to state the exact number with any degree of certainty. Coroners' inquests were held on the dead bodies; but the verdicts of the juries led to no judicial proceeding: true bills, however, were found against Hunt, Moorhouse, Johnson, and seven others, for a conspiracy to overturn the government, but at the same time they were admitted to bail.

Public meetings were now held in all the principal towns in the kingdom, and addresses were presented to the regent and the parliament, condemnatory of the civil and military authorities at Manchester; which were met by counter-addresses, calling for the repression of sedition, &c. At the opening of parliament, in November, the subject underwent a thorough discussion; and amendments to the address were moved in both houses, characterising the Manchester proceedings as illegal and unconstitutional: they were, however, negatived by overwhelming majorities. At the same time strong measures were resorted to for preventing the occurrence of similar disorders, by passing certain preventive and prohibitory acts of parliament, afterwards familiarly known as the "six acts." These, though decidedly coercive, seemed called for by the state of the country, and received the ready sanction of the legislature.

On the 23rd of January, 1820, died at Sidmouth, in his 53rd year, prince Edward, duke of Kent; leaving a widow, and one child, the princess Victoria, then only eight months old. The duke had never mixed much in the turmoil of politics, his life having been chiefly spent in the army, where he obtained a high character for bravery, but was regarded as a too strict disciplinarian.

Scarcely had the news of the duke's decease reached the more distant parts of Great Britain, before the death-knell of his venerable father, George III. was heard. The bodily health of his majesty had of late been fast declining, and on the 29th of January he expired. Some lucid intervals, though they were few and evanescent, had occasionally been noticed during the time he laboured under his distressing malady; but he had long been totally blind, and latterly deafness was added to his other afflictions. The king was in the 82nd year of his age, and the 60th of his reign; leaving six sons and four daughters living at the same time of his decease. His remains were interred in the royal vault at Windsor; but he had long been, as it were, dead to the world. It was a truly affecting sight to witness the "august old man," as he strolled through his suite of rooms at the castle, deprived of sight, and wearing a long patriarchal beard; yet frequently stopping at some of the pianos which were there purposely placed, and playing a few notes from his favourite Handel. He generally wore a blue robe-de-chambre, fastened with a belt, in the morning; and a silk plaid dress in the afternoon. He seemed cheerful, and would sometimes talk aloud, as if addressing an old friend, or some member of his family; but his discourse bore reference only to past events; for he had no knowledge of recent circumstances, either foreign or domestic. In speaking of the character of George the Third, no one will deny that he appeared invariably to act up to the dictates of his conscience; as a monarch, he studied the welfare of his subjects; as a father, he neglected not the honour and happiness of his children. He left a name unsullied by any particular vice; and his memory will be honoured by posterity for the goodness of his heart, for his piety, clemency, and fortitude.

CHAPTER LXIV.

The Reign of GEORGE IV.

A.D. 1820.—GEORGE THE FOURTH, eldest son of the late venerable monarch, who had exercised sovereign power as regent during his royal father's mental incapacity, was immediately proclaimed king; and the new reign commenced without any expectation of official changes. At the very moment of his accession, and for some time before, a most atrocious conspiracy existed, having for its object the assassination of the whole of his majesty's ministers. The sanguinary intentions of the conspirators, though their plans were crude and their means despicable, render a detail of their plans necessary.

Several wretched individuals, headed by Arthur Thistlewood—a man who had formerly been a lieutenant in the army, but who had subsequently suffered fine and imprisonment for challenging lord Sidmouth to fight a duel, and was now reduced to indigence—hired a stable in Cato-street, Edgeware-road, for the express purpose of assembling there and consulting on the best plan of putting the design into execution. The time chosen for the commission of the bloody deed was on the occasion of a cabinet dinner at lord Harrowby's, in Grosvenor-square; when they intended to proceed, in a body to his lordship's house armed, and, having gained admission by stratagem, to murder all the company present. Acting on previous information from one of the conspirators, who had associated with them for the purpose of their betrayal, Mr. Birnie, a Bow-street magistrate, with twelve of the patrol, went to Cato-street, and there, in a hay-loft, they found the conspirators assembled. The entrance was by a ladder, which some of the police officers ascended, and on the door being opened, twenty-five or thirty men appeared armed. A desperate struggle ensued in the dark, the lights having been extinguished, and Smithers, one of the police, was run through the body by Thistlewood; meantime, a company of the foot-guards, commanded by captain Fitzclarence, arrived at the place of rendezvous, which they surrounded, and succeeded in capturing nine of the desperadoes. Thistlewood and the rest escaped; but he was afterwards taken in an obscure lodging at Finsbury, while in bed. They were all found guilty; and five of them, namely, Thistlewood, Ings, Brunt, Tidd, and Davidson, were hanged and then decapitated at the Old Bailey; the other five had their sentences commuted for transportation. —About the same time the trial of Henry Hunt and others took place at York, for their conduct at Manchester on the 16th of August; when Hunt was sentenced to be imprisoned in Ilchester gaol for two years and six months, and Healy, Johnson, and Bamford to one year's imprisonment in Lincoln gaol.

The country had been in a very unsettled state in consequence of the foregoing proceedings; but they were either lost sight of, or treated as matters of little importance, when compared with the extraordinary scene that speedily followed: we mean the trial of queen Caroline. Her majesty had been six years absent from England, and for the last twenty-three years she had been separated from her husband. She had been charged with connubial infidelity, and a rigid investigation into her conduct had taken place; but though an undignified levity had been proved against her, the charge of criminality was not established; yet was she visited with a kind of vindictive persecution that rendered her life a burden. The prince had declared he would not meet her in public or in private; and among the magnates of rank and fashion his anathema operated with talismanic power; she was consequently put out of the pale of society, of which she had been described to be "the grace, life, and ornament." Thus neglected and insulted, she sought for recreation and repose in foreign travel; and during her absence rumour was busy at home in attributing to her illicit amours of the most degrading kind. It was, indeed, currently reported that the princess of Wales was living in adultery with an Italian named Bergami, whom, from the menial station of a courier, she had created her chamberlain, and familiarly admitted to her table. To elicit evidence and investigate the truth of these reports, a commission had been appointed, under the direction of sir John Leach, who proceeded for that purpose to the continent; and the result of his inquiries was, that the English ministers abroad were not to give the princess, in their official character, any public recognition, or pay her the respect due to her exalted station.

On the death of George III. the first step taken to degrade her was the omission of her name in the liturgy; but she was now queen of England; and notwithstanding an annuity of 50,000*l.* per annum was offered on condition of her permanently residing abroad, and not assuming, in the event of the demise of the crown, the title of queen, she indignantly rejected the proposal, challenged the fullest inquiry into her conduct, and returned to England on the 6th of June, with a full determination to face her enemies. She was accompanied by alderman Wood and lady Hamilton, and her entry into London was greeted with the joyful acclamations of assembled multitudes.

The charges against the queen being resolutely persisted in by her accusers, and her guilt as pertinaciously denied by her defenders, all attempts at reconciliation failed; and a secret committee of the house of Lords proceeded to examine the inculpatory documents contained in the "green bag." On the 5th of July lord Liverpool presented a bill of pains and penalties against the queen, on the ground of her adulterous intercourse with Bergami, and providing that her majesty be degraded from her rank and title, and her marriage with the king dissolved. The queen protested against these proceedings at every step, and was occasionally present during the examination of witnesses. Meanwhile the excitement throughout the country was of the most intense description. Guilty or not guilty, the public sympathized with her as a woman who had been subject to a systematic persecution for a quarter of a century, carried on by a man who was as relentless as he was licentious; and that however great her delinquencies might prove to be, her persecutor was the last man in his dominions who could justify himself in pursuing the object of his hate with cruel vindictiveness. During all this time, addresses and processions in honour of the queen kept the metropolis in such a ferment, that its mechanics and artisans appeared as if engaged in a national saturnalia. Sir Robert Gifford, the attorney-general, assisted by the solicitor-general, conducted the prosecution; Mr. Brougham, Mr. Denman, and Dr. Lushington, the defence. The judicial part of the proceedings having at length been brought to a close, the lords met on the 2nd of November, to discuss the second reading of the bill of degradation. Some declared their conviction of the queen's guilt; others as confidently asserted her innocence; while several denied both the justice and expediency of the bill, and would not consent to brand with everlasting infamy a member of the house of Brunswick. Upon a division for a second reading there was a majority of 28. Some were in favour of degradation, but not divorce. Upon the third reading of the bill, on the 10th, the ministerial majority was reduced to 9; when Lord Liverpool immediately announced the intention of government to abandon the further prosecution of this extraordinary proceeding. The filthy and disgusting details, as they fell from the lips of well-paid Italians, couriers, valets, and chambermaids, while under examination, were given, often indeed with purulent comments, in the newspapers; and thus a mass of impurity was circulated throughout the country, more contaminating, because more minutely discussed and dwelt upon, than any thing that was ever publicly recorded in the chronicles of royal shamelessness. On the 23rd the parliament was suddenly prorogued; and on the 29th the queen, attended by a cavalcade of gentlemen on horseback, went in state to St. Paul's to return thanks for her happy deliverance.

A.D. 1821.—On opening the parliamentary session, his majesty mentioned the queen by name, and recommended to the house of commons a provision for her maintenance. At first she declined to accept any pecuniary allowance until the name was inserted in the liturgy; but she subsequently altered her determination, and an annuity of 50,000*l.* was settled upon her.

During this session the subject of parliamentary reform excited much interest; the borough of Grampound was disfranchised for its corruption; and the necessity of economy and retrenchment in all the departments of government was repeatedly brought forward and urged by Mr. Hume, whose persevering exposition of the large sums that were uselessly swallowed up in salaries and sinecures, made a great impression on the public; and though none of his motions were carried, the attention of ministers was thereby directed to the gradual diminution of the enormous expence incurred in the different public offices, wherever it could be done without detriment to the public service.

The anticipated coronation was now the all-absorbing topic. The queen having, by memorial to the king, claimed a right to be crowned, her counsel were heard in support of her claim, and the attorney and solicitor-general against it. The lords of the council, having given the subject a long deliberation, decided that queens consort were not entitled to the honour—a decision which the king was pleased to approve. The 19th of July was the day appointed for the august ceremony, preparations for which had long been making; and nothing more magnificent can be imagined than the appearance of Westminster-abbey and Westminster-hall. The covered platform, over which the procession moved from the hall to the abbey was 1500 feet in length; and on each side of the platform an amphitheatre of seats was erected, to accommodate 100,000 spectators. Every spot in the vicinity from which a view of the gorgeous pageant could be obtained was covered with seats and galleries, for which the most extravagant prices were readily given. As early as two o'clock in the morning the streets were filled with the carriages of persons going to witness the ceremony; and before five a considerable number of the company had arrived and taken their places in the hall. It had been currently reported that the queen would be present as a spectator of the scene; and so it proved; for about five o'clock her majesty arrived in her state-carriage; but no preparation had been made for her reception, and, not having an admission-ticket, she had to bear the humiliating indignity of a stern refusal, and was obliged to retire! The king arrived at ten, and the procession immediately moved from the hall towards the abbey, his majesty walking under a canopy of cloth of gold, supported by the barons of the cinque-porta, among whom was Mr. Brougham, the queen's legal adviser and leading counsel! The ancient solemnity of the coronation in Westminster-abbey occupied about five hours; and when the king re-entered the hall, with the crown on his head, he was received with enthusiastic cheers. Soon after five o'clock the royal banquet was served; and the king, having dined with and drank the health of "his peers and his good people," quitted the festive scene. The populace were afterwards gratified with a balloon ascent, boat races on the Serpentine, a grand display of fire-works in Hyde-park, and free admission to the various theatres. The expences of the coronation amounted to 238,000*l.*

A. D. 1821.—SIR J. WILSON CASHIERS FOR THE PART HE TOOK IN FAVOUR OF THE QUEEN: 10,000*l.* SUBSCRIBED FOR HER BY THE PUBLIC.

It has been seen that the queen made an ineffectual attempt to witness the coronation of her royal husband. The proud spirit of the heir of Brunswick, which had borne up against a load of regal oppression and the consumely of sycophantic courtiers, was now doomed to yield before a slight bodily attack. Eleven days after her majesty had been repulsed from the door of Westminster-hall, she visited Drury-Lane theatre, from which place she retired early on account of sudden indisposition; and in one week more this heroic female was a corpse. As long as she was an object of persuasion, she was the idol of popular applause; those even who did not account her blameless, felt for her as the victim of a cruel and heartless system of oppression. But the excitement in her favour soon began to subside; and it was believed that the comparatively little interest which the public seemed to take in her favour on the day of the coronation, sunk deep into her heart. She died August the 7th, aged 52; leaving the world, as she herself declared, without regret. Her body lay in state at Brandenburg-house, her villa near Hammeramuth; and on the 19th, it was conveyed through London on its way to Harwich, the port of embarkation for its final resting place at Brunswick. But, as though indignities and tumults were to follow her to the grave, a fracas took place between the populace and the military who formed the escort. Countless multitudes had assembled to join in the procession; and when it was discovered that a circuitous route had been prescribed for the funeral train, in order to avoid passing through the streets of the metropolis, the indignation of the people knew no bounds, and in an affray with the guards two lives were lost. By obstructing and barricading the streets, however, the people at length succeeded in forcing the procession through the city, and the royal corpse was hurried with incense to the place of embarkation. On the 24th of August the remains of the queen reached Brunswick, and were deposited in the family vault of her ancestors.

At the time of the queen's death, his majesty was making a visit to Ireland, whither he had gone with the laudable but fallacious hope that his presence would allay the factious spirit of his Irish subjects. On returning from Ireland, his majesty expressed his intention of visiting Hanover. Having appointed lords-justices to administer the government during his absence, he embarked at Ramegate and landed at Calais, September the 24th; entered his German dominions October the 5th; and on the 11th made his public entrance into the capital, drawn by eight milk-white horses. Public rejoicings and festivals attended his sojourn; and, having laid aside the title of elector for that of king, he gratified his loyal subjects with the sight of another coronation, though on a less superb scale. On the 8th of the following month his majesty was again domiciled in Carlton palace.

We shall now turn for a moment to notice some elements of importance, though not connected with the domestic history of Great Britain. The first is the death of Napoleon Buonaparte, who died of cancer in the stomach, aged 51. The disease was constitutional, but it had probably been accelerated by mental agitation and the unhealthy climate of St. Helena. Those who wish to know the character of this extraordinary man must read it in his actions, under the various and varying aspects of his fortune. His aim was to astonish and aggrandise: to uphold or trample upon right and justice, as best suited the object he had in view. Before his love of universal domination, every other passion and principle was made to give way: religion, honour, truth, all were sacrificed to his ambition. This will best be expressed in a wish that "his beauteous corpse" be deposited on the banks of the Seine, in the midst of the French people, whom he loved so well." That wish has since been gratified by a Bourbon!

In Spain, Portugal, and Naples, a sort of revolutionary crisis had commenced. Encouraged by the discontents of the middle ranks, the troops, under the influence of Riego and other gallant officers, succeeded in making Ferdinand swear fidelity to the constitution of 1812. Similar conduct was pursued by the people of Portugal, whose declared objects were the establishment of a constitutional monarchy. And in Naples the popular mind took the same direction, and effected the same object.

A.D. 1832.—The year 1832, though not marked by any great event, foreign or domestic, was one of much interest as regards the number of important questions discussed in parliament. Among the leading subjects of debate were agricultural distress in England, arising from a superabundant supply and consequent low prices, and the scarcity and distress in Ireland, which, from the prevalence of agrarian outrage and other causes, amounted to positive famine. Some changes during January took place in the cabinet; ministers having strengthened themselves by an union with the Grenville party; and lord Sidmouth retired from his office of home secretary, to make room for Mr. Peel.

On the 5th of February the king opened parliament, and took the occasion to express his regret that his visit to Ireland had failed to produce tranquillity. He also admitted that agriculture had to contend with unexpected difficulties, but congratulated the house on the prosperity which attended the manufactures and commerce of the country.

The state of Ireland did indeed demand the most serious attention of the legislature. On one hand, coercive measures were necessary to repress the wild disorder that reigned throughout the island; for owing to the daring nocturnal bands of Whiteboys, &c., neither life nor property was safe. On the other hand, so universal was the failure of the potato crop, that the price was quadrupled, and the peasantry of the south were in a state of actual starvation. To meet the former evil, it was found necessary to suspend the habeas corpus act, and to renew the insurrection act. To alleviate the latter, a committee was formed in London, and corresponding committees in different parts of the country; British sympathy was no sooner appealed to than it was answered with zealous alacrity; and such was the benevolence of individuals, that large funds were speedily at their disposal; so that before the close of the year the subscriptions raised in Great Britain for the relief of the distressed Irish amounted to 350,000*l.*; parliament made a grant of 300,000*l.* more; and in Ireland the local subscriptions amounted to 150,000*l.*; making altogether a grand total of 800,000*l.*

From the beginning of the year to the end of the session in August, the houses of parliament were almost incessantly occupied on questions of the highest importance: agricultural distress, for which various remedial measures were proposed; lord John Russell's plan for a parliamentary reform; Mr. Vansittart's scheme for relieving the immediate pressure of what was called the "dead weight;" the currency question, which referred to the increased value of money caused by Mr. Peel's act of 1819, for the resumption of cash-payments; the improvement of the navigation laws, &c.

Parliament was prorogued on the 6th of August; and on the 10th the king embarked at Greenwich for Scotland. On the 15th he landed at Leith, and on the 19th held a levee in the ancient palace of Holyrood, where he appeared in the Highland costume. Having enjoyed the festivities which his loyal subjects of Edinburgh provided for the occasion, he re-embarked on the 27th, and in three days was again with his lieges in London.

During his majesty's absence the unwelcome intelligence was brought to him of the death of the marquis of Londonderry, secretary of state for the foreign department. This nobleman, who for some years had been the leading member of government, was in his 54th year; and in a temporary fit of insanity committed suicide, by cutting the carotid artery. In consequence of his Tory principles and the share he took in effecting the union with Ireland, he was the most unpopular member of the administration; but he was highly respected in private life, and enjoyed the personal esteem of his sovereign.

Little else of domestic interest occurred this year; but a few words relative to foreign affairs are perhaps requisite. The congress at Verona terminated in December: the allied sovereigns were disposed to re-establish the despotism of Ferdinand in Spain, in opposition to the cortes; but to this policy England objected, denying the right of foreign powers to interfere in the affairs of the Peninsula. The "sanitary cordon," established on the frontiers of France for the avowed purpose of preventing the fever which raged at Barcelona from spreading to that country, changed its name to an "army of observation," while the design of the French government to check the progress of revolutionary principles in Spain were developed, and, indeed, soon afterwards openly expressed.

A.D. 1823.—On the death of lord Londonderry, Mr. Canning, who was about to set out to India as governor-general, relinquished that employment, and accepted the vacant secretaryship, as one more congenial to his taste, and for the duties of which he was supposed to be perfectly efficient.

The new year presented more cheering prospects than any which had for a long time preceded it; the foreign demand for goods of English manufacture kept the cotton, silk, and woollen factories at work, and greatly benefited others, particularly the hard-ware and cutlery businesses. Those engaged in the shipping interest, also, participated in the general improvement. But it was not so with regard to the agriculturists; and during the month of January no less than sixteen county meetings were called to take into consideration the causes of their distresses. The usual topics—parliamentary reform, remission of taxes, a commutation of tithe, a depreciation of the currency, &c.—were generally suggested; and in some instances, where Mr. Cobbett and his supporters had sufficient influence, resolutions of a more ultra-radical kind were carried. These were pretty much of the same staple commodity as are still hawked about on similar occasions; namely, an appropriation of part of the church property; the extinction of tithes; the sale of the crown lands; the abolition of sinecures and pensions; a reduction of the standing army; the repeal of a variety of taxes; and an equitable adjustment of contracts.

Some popular changes now took place in the ministry. Mr. Vansittart, chancellor of the exchequer, resigned in favour of Mr. Robinson, and accepted the chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster, with a seat in the upper house and the title of lord Bexley; and Mr. Huskisson was made president of the board of trade, in the room of Mr. Arbutnot. Parliament was prorogued by commission on the 19th of July; a great mass of business having occupied the attention of the members; and much alteration having taken place between Mr. Canning and his political opponents, who plainly convinced him that he was not "reposing on a bed of roses." But he had the satisfaction at the close of the session, of dwelling on the flourishing condition of all branches of commerce and manufactures, and a considerable abatement of the difficulties felt by the agriculturists at its commencement.

In April, the French army of observation crossed the Pyrenees; and the duke of Angoulême, its commander, published an address to the Spaniards, declaratory of the objects of this interposition in their affairs; defining it to be, the suppression of the revolutionary faction which held the king captive, that excited troubles in France, and produced an insurrection in Naples and Piedmont. They then marched onward, and, without meeting any resistance of consequence, occupied the principal towns and fortresses. In October the city of Cadiz surrendered; and French interference terminated with the liberation of Ferdinand from the cortes, who in all their movements had carried the unwilling king with them. The French then retraced their steps, leaving, however, 40,000 in possession of the fortresses, to maintain the authority of the Spanish king in case of a reaction.

A. D. 1824.—Favourable as the political aspect of Great Britain appeared at the commencement of 1823, there was now an evident improvement in almost every branch of commercial industry; while the cultivators of the soil found their condition materially assisted by natural causes, without the aid of legislative interference. It was therefore a pleasing task for Mr. Robinson, when he brought forward his budget, to describe in glowing terms the general prosperity of the country, and declare his intention of effecting an annual saving of 375,000*l*. by reducing the interest of the four per cent. stock to three and a half. In short, it was evident that there were too many symptoms of a return to a healthful state, for the most sceptical cavillers to contradict. But course of prosperity in England, like true love's course, "never did run smooth" for any length of time. There was now an abundance of capital, and money was accordingly to be had at low rates of interest. Safe investments were difficult to be found at home; hence foreign loans were encouraged, till there was scarcely a state in the Old or New World which had not the benefit of English capital. It was a rare era too for the gambling speculations of a host of needy adventurers; and under pretext of having discovered advantageous modes of employing money, the most absurd schemes were daily set afloat to entrap the avaricious and unwary. Many of these devices, however, were so obviously diabolical, that the legislature at length interfered to guard the public against a species of robbery in which the dupes were almost as much to blame as their plunderers. A resolution passed the house of lords declaring that no bill for the purpose of incorporating any joint-stock company would be read a second time till two-thirds of the proposed capital of the company had been subscribed. This bill certainly checked the operations we have alluded to; but the evil had been allowed to proceed too far, as further experience proved.

A convention between Great Britain and Austria was laid on the table of the house of commons, by which the former agreed to accept 2,500,000*l*. as a final compensation for claims on the latter power, amounting to 30,000,000*l*.—a composition of one shilling and eight-pence in the pound!

Among matters of domestic interest, although not of a nature, perhaps, to demand notice in a condensed national history, we may mention two occurrences which applied the public with fertile topics of discourse. We allude to the trial of John Thurtell, who was executed for the murder of William Weare, as they were proceeding in a gig towards the cottage of their mutual friend Probert, near Elstree, where they had been invited to take the diversion of shooting; and also to the execution of Mr. Fauntleroy, the banker, who was tried and found guilty of forging a power of attorney for the transfer of stock. The first mentioned offender against the laws of God and man was the son of a respectable alderman at Norwich; but by associating with gamblers, and indulging in brutal sports, he had contracted habits of ruffianism to which such a course of life almost invariably leads. The latter violator of a sacred trust had committed forgeries to the enormous extent, as was asserted at the time, of about a quarter of a million.

A. D. 1825.—One of the first steps in legislation this year was an act to suppress the catholic association of Ireland. Daniel O'Connell assumed to be the representative and protector of the catholic population in that country, and continued to levy large sums from the people, under the absurd and hypocritical pretence of obtaining "justice for Ireland." Subsequently a committee of the lords sat to inquire into the general state of that country; and in the evidence that came before them, it clearly appeared that the wretched state of existence to which the peasantry were reduced by landlords and sub-letters, was greatly aggravated by their abject bondage to their own priests, and by the vicious mode in which tithes were collected; but that while the arch agitator and his satellites were allowed to inflame the passions of the people, and delude them into a belief that they were oppressed by their connexion with Great Britain, no remedy within the power of the legislature presented itself. We may here observe, by the way, that in the petitions which were presented to parliament last year, the catholics no longer placed emancipation in the front of their grievances, but demanded a reform in the temporalities of the protestant church, a better regulation of juries, and the disfranchisement of municipal corporations.

The catholic relief bill passed in the house of commons, but was rejected in the lords by a majority of 178 against 130. The debate was carried on with great animation; and, in the course of it, the duke of York strenuously declared against further concession to the catholics. "Twenty-eight years," he said, "have elapsed since the subject was first agitated; its agitation was the source of the illness which clouded the last ten years of my father's life; and, to the last moment of my existence, I will adhere to my protestant principles—so help me God!"

had been given to speculations of all kinds last year by the abundance of unemployed capital and the reduction of interest in funded property. The mania for joint-stock companies was now become almost universal. During the space of little more than a twelvemonth, 376 companies had been projected, of which the pretended capital was 174,114,050*l*. Though many of these were of an absurd character, and nearly all held out prospects that no sane man could expect to see realized, yet the shares of several rose to enormous premiums, especially the mining adventures in South America. But a fearful re-action was at hand.

Several country banks stopped payment in December, and among them the great Yorkshire bank of Westworth and company. A panic in the money market followed; and in a few days several London bankers were unable to meet the calls upon them. On the 12th of December the banking-house of sir Peter Pole and Co. stopped payment. This caused great dismay in the city, it being understood that forty-seven country banks were connected with it. During the three following days five other London banking firms were compelled to close; and in a very short space of time, in addition to the London houses, sixty-seven country banks failed or suspended their payments. The abstraction of capital in mining and other speculations, was now felt more severely than had been expected, even by those who had endeavoured to oppose their progress. It was impossible to calculate when or where the evil would stop; but that thousands of families must in the end be ruined was inevitable. The principal merchants of the city of London, at the head of whom was Mr. Baring, feeling that something was necessary to be done to support credit and restore confidence, assembled at the mansion-house, and published a resolution to the effect that "the unprecedented embarrassments were to be mainly attributed to an unfounded panic; that they had the fullest reliance on the banking establishments of the capital and country, and therefore determined to support them, and public credit, to the utmost of their power."

In two days after this declaration, the Bank of England began to re-issue one and two pound notes for the convenience of the country circulation. For one week, 150,000 sovereigns per day were coined at the Mint; and post-chaises were hourly dispatched into the country to support the credit, and prevent the failure, of the provincial firms which still maintained their ground.

A.D. 1826.—The effects of the panic were long and most severely felt; but it must be admitted that the Bank of England made strenuous efforts to mitigate pecuniary distress, and the course pursued by government was steady and judicious. The main ingredient in producing the mischief had been the great facility of creating fictitious money; the ministers, therefore, prohibited the circulation of one pound notes; while incorporated companies were allowed to carry on the business of banking. Beyond this they could scarcely go; it was next to impossible that they could afford an effective guarantee against future panics, over-trading, or the insolvency of bankers.

On the 2nd of February parliament was opened by commission. The royal speech adverted to the existing pecuniary distress, and showed that it was totally unconnected with political causes. It also alluded to measures in contemplation for the improvement of Ireland. After sitting till the end of May, the parliament was dissolved, and active preparations were made for a general election.

Certain leading questions, which had been frequently discussed in parliament of late years, had now got such possession of the public mind, that, at most of the elections, tests were offered and pledges required from the several candidates. The most important of these were catholic emancipation, the corn laws, and the slave trade; and out of the members returned for England and Wales, 133 had never before sat in parliament. It was observed that now, for the first time, the catholic priests of Ireland openly began not only to take an active part in elections, but to inculcate the doctrine, that opposition to an anti-catholic candidate was a christian duty. The English radicals were also extremely noisy and active in their endeavours to return Cobbett, Hunt, and others of that clique; but for the present they were unsuccessful.

The new parliament met on the 14th of November, and the session was opened by the king in person. No business of any great importance was brought before the house; but an exposé of the numerous joint-stock companies that had been established was made by alderman Waitman. He observed that 600 had been formed, most of them for dishonest purposes; the directors forcing up or depressing the market as they pleased, and pocketing the difference between the selling and buying prices. As certain members of the house, whom he named, were known to be directors of some of these bubble companies, he moved for a committee of inquiry with reference to the part taken by members of parliament in the joint-stock mania of 1824-5-6. The inquiry, on the suggestion of Mr. Caning, was restricted to the Arigna mining company, of which Mr. Brogden had been a director.

A few foreign occurrences claim our notice. The death of Alexander, emperor of Russia, a powerful ally of England, and a noble and benevolent prince, who sincerely desired the good of his people. It was his wish that his brother Nicholas should succeed him; and, in compliance with that wish, the grand duke Constantine, who was next heir to the throne, publicly renounced his right to the succession in favour of his younger brother.—Also, the death of John VI., king of Portugal and titular emperor of Brazil; whither he had retired, with his court, on the invasion of Portugal by Buona-

On the death of Mr. Canning there were but few changes in the ministry. Lord Goderich became the new premier, as first lord of the treasury, Mr. Huskisson succeeded to the office of colonial secretary.

and Mr. Herries was made chancellor of the exchequer. A few other changes took place; and the duke of Wellington resumed the command of the army, but without a seat in the cabinet.

The treaty mentioned as having been signed on the 6th of July for attempting the pacification of Greece, not being palatable to the sultan, he declined the mediation of the allied powers, and recommenced the war furiously against the Greeks. To put a stop to this course of desolation, the combined fleets of England, France, and Russia, proceeded to the bay of Navarino, with a determination to capture or destroy the Turkish fleet which lay there, if Ibrahim Pacha refused to listen to pacific overtures. No satisfaction being obtained, admiral Codrington, followed by the French ships, under De Rigny, and the Russian squadron, entered the bay; and after four hours from the commencement of the conflict, which had been carried on with great fury, the enemy's fleet was wholly destroyed, and the bay strewn with the fragments of his ships.

A.D. 1823.—It was seen from the first formation of the Goderich ministry that it did not possess the necessary ingredients for a lasting union. Differences between some of the leading members of the cabinet rendered his lordship's position untenable, and he resigned his seals of office. Upon this the king sent for the duke of Wellington, and commissioned him to form a new cabinet, with himself at the head: the result was, that his grace immediately entered into communication with Mr. Peel, and other members of lord Liverpool's ministry, who had seceded on the elevation of Mr. Canning; and, with very few exceptions, the same parties once more came into power. The duke, on becoming the first lord of the treasury, resigned the office of commander-in-chief.

The royal speech, delivered at the opening of parliament, chiefly referred to the late "untoward event" at Navarino, but defended it on the ground that the rights of neutral nations were violated by the revolting excesses of the Greeks and Turks.

Mr. Brougham having made one of the most elaborate expositions of the abuses and imperfections of the law ever delivered in the house of commons, two commissions were appointed, one to inquire into the state of the common law, the other into the laws of real property.

On the 8th of May the catholic claims were again brought forward, when sir Francis Burdett moved for a committee of the whole house on this subject, with a view to a conciliatory adjustment. After a three nights' debate, this was carried by a majority of six. A conference with the lords was then requested, and held; after which there was a two nights' debate in the lords, when the duke of Wellington opposed the resolution, chiefly on the ground that the church government of Ireland was unconnected with the civil government of the empire.

But it was remarked, that although the resolution was lost by a majority of fifty-four, the moderate tone of his grace augured favourably for it on a further trial.

In Ireland during the Canning and Goderich ministries all was comparatively still; but this year the excitement of the people, led on by the popular demagogues, was greatly increased by the formation of a Wellington and Peel administration. The Catholic Association was again in full activity; Mr. O'Connell was returned for Clare, in defiance of almost all the landed gentry of the county; the priests seconded the efforts of the itinerant politicians; and, in the inflated rhetoric of Mr. Shiel, "every altar became a tribune at which the wrongs of Ireland were proclaimed." Meanwhile, ministers looked supinely on, till the smouldering embers burst into a flame, which nothing within their power could extinguish. How could it, indeed, be otherwise, when the marquis of Anglesea, the king's representative, wrote a letter to Dr. Curtis, the titular catholic primate of Ireland, to the effect that the settlement of the catholic question was unavoidable, and recommending the catholics to "agitate," but refrain from violence, and trust to the legislature. What more could the great agitator himself require than such an ally! It is true that the marquis was forthwith recalled from the government of Ireland for writing the said letter—but he was not impeached.

The repairs and improvements of Windsor castle, which had been for a long time in hand, under the direction of Mr. Jeffrey Wyatville, (subsequently knighted) were this year completed; and the king took possession of his apartments, Dec. 9. A parliamentary grant of 450,000*l.* had been devoted to this truly national edifice, and great ability was shewn in retaining the principal features of the original building, while studying the conveniences of modern civilization.

At the latter end of the year, owing to the discovery of a systematic plan of murder having been pursued by some wretches at Edinburgh, an indescribable feeling of horror and disgust pervaded the whole country. The most fearful tales were circulated as to the extensiveness of the crime, which, it was added, certain members of the medical profession connived at, rather than lack subjects for the dissecting room. It appeared on the trial of William Burke and Helen McDougal, who lodged in a house kept by a man named Hare, that Burke and Hare had been in the habit of deceiving persons into the house, where they first made them intoxicated, and then suffocated them. The bodies were then sold to Dr. Knox for anatomical purposes, and, no marks of violence appearing upon the bodies, no questions were asked nor suspicion created respecting the horrid mode in which they had been procured. The number of their victims it was difficult to ascertain, though Burke confessed to upwards of a dozen.

This wretch, who was an Irish catholic, was executed, amidst the exultations and execrations of an immense concourse of spectators; and the system of strangulation which he had practised was afterwards known by the expressive term of burking.

The foreign events of this year, though important in themselves, bear too little on English history to render necessary more than a bare mention of them.—In April Russia declared war against Turkey. The destruction of the Turkish fleet at Navarino left the former power masters of the Black-sea; and on land 115,000 Russians were assembled to open the campaign on the Danube. Several great battles were fought, the Turks offering a much more effectual resistance to their invaders than was anticipated; at length the Russians retired from the contest, but did not return to St. Petersburg till October.—The affairs of Greece had gone on more favourably, in consequence of the war between Turkey and Russia; and, assisted by France and England, that country which had so long groaned under the oppressor's yoke, was emancipated from foreign control, and restored to the rank of an independent nation.

A.D. 1822.—Soon after the opening of parliament, ministers declared their intention to bring forward and support the long-agitated question of catholic emancipation, in order to put an end for ever, if possible, to a grievance which, among the Irish in particular, had "grown with their growth, and strengthened with their strength." In Ireland the catholic population was at that time estimated at five millions and a half, whereas not more than one million and three quarters were protestants; but in England, Scotland, and Wales, the number of catholics fell short of a million. It was well known that the duke of Wellington's repugnance to the measure had been gradually abating; that he thought the security of the empire depended on its being carried; and that he had laboured hard to overcome the king's scruples. These being at length removed, Mr. Peel, in a long, cautious, and elaborate speech, introduced the "catholic relief bill" into the house of commons on the 5th of March. Its general objects were to render catholics eligible to seats in both houses of parliament, to vote at the election of members, and generally to enjoy all civil franchises and offices, upon their taking an oath not to use their privileges to "weaken or disturb the protestant establishment." As it was a course of policy which the whigs advocated, it had their support; the chief opposition coming from that section of the tory party who felt it to be a measure replete with danger to the protestant institutions of the country. The majority in favour of the bill, however, at the third reading, was 320 to 142. In the upper house a more resolute stand was made against it; the lords Eldon, Winchelsea, Tenterden, and others, backed by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the bishops of London, Durham, and Salisbury, in the most solemn manner denouncing it as a measure pregnant with the most imminent peril to church and state as by law established; and powerfully appealing to their fellow peers to uphold the protestant faith at all hazards, and not sacrifice their principles at the shrine of expediency. It was, however, carried on the 10th of April, and received the royal assent on the 13th.

A few official changes followed. Sir Charles Wetherell, attorney-general, was dismissed for his anti-catholic opposition to the ministers, and sir James Scarlett appointed. Chief-justice Best was elevated to the peerage by the title of lord Wyndford; and was succeeded in the common-pleas by sir Nicholas Tindal, the solicitor-general; whose office was given to Mr. Sugden.

If we except the "metropolis police bill," which owes its origin to Mr. Peel, and from which such great advantages have arisen, there was nothing of moment submitted to the legislature after the passing of the catholic relief bill. The creation of this new police force was one of the wisest measures that had ever been resorted to for the protection of property and the peace of the metropolis districts; the old parochial watch, as corrupt as they were feeble, had become an absolute street nuisance; and, so far from being "a terror to evil doers," their well-known inefficiency enabled the midnight burglar and the daring footpad to pursue their criminal vocations with impunity.

During the summer months an unusual depression in every branch of trade was felt, and the wages of the artisan had greatly fallen. This gave rise to combinations and the destruction of property, particularly among the silk-weavers of Spitalfields. It was also the case in the manufacturing districts of the northern and inland counties; where, owing to the introduction of power-looms, the workmen were almost destitute of employment, and their families in a state of abject penury.

The year 1830 commenced without any circumstance occurring in or out of parliament worth relating. The position of ministers was a difficult one, but it was what they had a right to expect. By conceding catholic emancipation they had lost the support of their most influential old friends, and they were now compelled to accept as auxiliaries those hybrid whigs, whose co-operation, to be permanent, must be rewarded by a share in the government. But the stern unbending character of "the duke" would not allow him to share even the glory of a conquest with mercenaries whom he could not depend on; and therefore, as the tories were divided, it was clear that their rule was fast drawing to a close.

An event, by no means unexpected, now took place. For a considerable time past the king had been indisposed, and he was rarely seen beyond the limits of his royal domain at Windsor; where, when he was well enough to take exercise, he would enjoy a forest-drive in his pony-phæton, or amuse himself by fishing and sailing on his favourite Virginia-water. But gout and dropsy had made sad havoc on the royal invalid; and in April bulletins of his health began to be published. His illness gradually increased from that time to the 26th of June, the day on which he died. After a severe paroxysm his majesty appeared to be fainting, and having ejaculated "This is death," in a few minutes he ceased to breathe.

The character of this monarch is not to be summed up in a brief sentence or two; to form a just opinion of it, his conduct under many varying aspects must be impartially considered. This we endeavoured to do in our biographical memoir of George IV., and to that we beg to refer.

CHAPTER LXV.

The Reign of WILLIAM IV.

A. D. 1830, June 26.—WILLIAM HENRY, duke of Clarence, third son of George III., succeeded to the throne as William IV., being at the time of his accession in the 65th year of his age. This monarch was brought up to the navy, having entered the service as a midshipman in 1779, on board the Royal George, a 98-gun ship, commanded by captain Digby; and, by regular gradations, he became rear-admiral of the blue in 1790. From that time he saw no more active service afloat, although he wished to share in his country's naval glories; and nothing was heard of him in his professional capacity, till Mr. Canning, in 1827, revived the office of lord-high-admiral, which for more than a century had been in commission. He, however, resigned it in the following year, the duke of Wellington, as prime minister, disapproving of the expense to which the lord-high-admiral put the nation, by an over-sealous professional liberality.

On the 23rd of July parliament was prorogued by the king in person, the royal speech being congratulatory as to the general tranquillity of Europe, the repeal of taxes, and certain reforms introduced into the judicial establishment of the country.

It was, notwithstanding, a period pregnant with events of surpassing interest, but as they chiefly belong to the history of France, the bare mention of them is all that is here necessary. An expedition, on a large scale was fitted out by the French, with the ostensible view of chastising the Algerines for their piratical insults; but it ended in their capturing the city, and in taking measures to secure Algeria as a French colony. Then came the revolutionary struggle on the appointment of the Polignac ministry, which ended in the expulsion of Charles X. from the throne of France, and the elevation of Louis Philippe, duke of Orleans, as "king of the French," who swore fidelity to the constitutional charter.

This great change in the French monarchy was effected with less bloodshed, and in far less time, than could have been anticipated by its most sanguine promoters; for from the date of the despotical ordinances issued by the ministers of Charles X. to the moment that the duke of Orleans accepted the office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, preparatory to his being elected king, only four days elapsed, during two of which there were some sharply contested battles between the citizens and the royal troops under Marmont. Of the citizens 390 were killed on the spot; and of 2,500 wounded, 306 died. Of the royal guard, 375 were killed and wounded; and of gendarmes 202.

A similar revolution in Belgium followed. When that country was joined to Holland in 1815, to form the kingdom of the Netherlands, and thereby raise a powerful bulwark on the frontier of France, it was avowedly a mere union of political convenience, in which neither the national character, the institutions, nor the religion of the inhabitants was consulted. No sooner did the outbreak in Paris become known, than Brussels, Liege, Namur, Ghent, Antwerp, and other cities, showed an inveterate spirit of hostility to their Dutch rulers; and insurrections, which soon amounted to a state of civil war, were general throughout Belgium. The kingdom of the Netherlands having been created by Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, Russia, and France, these powers assumed a right of mediation between the belligerents; and on the 4th of November a protocol was signed at London, declaring that hostilities should cease, and that the troops of the contending parties should retire within the limits which formerly separated Belgium from Holland.

The effect of these successful popular commotions abroad was not lost upon the people of England; and "parliamentary reform" became the watch-word of all who wished to harass the tory ministry. The duke of Wellington was charged, though most unjustly, of having given his support, or at least been privy to the arbitrary measures of the Polignac ministry; and a clamour was raised against him and his colleagues which was beyond their power to control.

So strong and general, indeed, was the feeling against ministers, that the elections throughout the country had gone decidedly against them. At length, on the 2nd of November the house met, and his majesty's speech referred, among other topics, to the before-mentioned events, concluding with expressions of reliance on the wisdom and firmness of his parliament. Earl Grey took occasion to urge the necessity of an immediate reform of the representative system, which elicited from the duke of Wellington a declaration of his determination to oppose any measure which might be brought forward for that purpose, he being convinced that the legislature could not be improved. This useless avowal of his opposition to all reform excited a strong feeling against the duke, which was greatly augmented by the ingenious commentaries and violent denunciations of the whig press. Another less honourable mode had also been resorted to for the purpose of inflaming the public mind—the posting of placards in the streets of London, severely commenting on the royal speech, the anti-reform declaration of the duke, and the new metropolitan police.

The great civic festival of lord-mayor's day was nigh, at which the king and his ministers intended to be present; but owing to several letters having been received by the duke of Wellington, stating that a riot was to be apprehended if he made his appearance in the city,—one of which was from Mr. John Key, the lord-mayor elect, suggesting that he should come "strongly and sufficiently guarded"—his grace advised that the king's visit should be postponed. Considerable discussion took place in both houses on the abandonment of his majesty's visit to the civic banquet; earl Grey and other peers arguing that it had excited needless alarm, and produced an extraordinary depression of the funds. But the duke had been forewarned that a riot, and perhaps bloodshed would have ensued; and no better argument is needed to show the soundness of his policy than his own words, as they are recorded in the memoirs of the late sir W. Knighton. "If firing had begun," said the duke to sir William, "who could tell where it would end? I know what street-firing is; one guilty person would fall, and ten innocent be destroyed. Would this have been wise or humane, for a little bravado, or that the country might not have been alarmed for a day or two?"

But, admitting the correctness and humane motives of the duke's conduct in this instance, the popular feeling was hourly increasing against his administration. The inequalities and abuses which had crept into the representative system were too palpable to escape public animadversion; the dissipating effects of time and neglect were apparent in many departments of the state; and there was no reasonable ground for refusing to examine into, and, where necessary, to apply correctives to those parts of the body politic which required regeneration.

By degrees the small ministerial majority dwindled away, and in less than a fortnight from the assembling of parliament the Tories found themselves in a minority of 29, on a motion for the settlement of the civil list. This was a signal for the Wellington ministry to resign, and their seals of office were respectfully tendered to the king on the following day, Nov. 18.

The celebrated "reform ministry" immediately succeeded; at the head of which was lord Grey, as first lord of the treasury. The other members of the cabinet were the marquis of Lansdowne, lord president; lord Brougham, lord chancellor; viscount Althorp, chancellor of the exchequer; viscount Melbourne, home secretary; viscount Palmerston, foreign secretary; viscount Goderich, colonial secretary; lord Durham, lord privy seal; lord Auckland, president of the board of trade; sir James Graham, first lord of the admiralty; lord Holland, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; hon. Charles Grant, president of the India board; and the earl of Carlisle, without any official appointment. Among the ministers who had no seats in the cabinet, were lord John Russell, paymaster-general; the duke of Richmond, postmaster-general; the duke of Devonshire, lord chamberlain; marquis Wellesley, lord steward; sir T. Denman, attorney-general; and sir W. Horne, solicitor-general. The marquis of Anglesea was invested with the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, and lord Plunkett was its lord-chancellor.

During the autumn of this year a novel and most destructive species of outrage prevailed in the agricultural districts of the south of England, arising from the distressed condition of the labouring population. Night after night incendiary fires kept the country in a constant state of alarm, and farming-stock of every description was consumed. There was no open rioting, no mobs; nor did it appear that it was connected with any political object. In the counties of Kent, Hants, Wilts, Bucks, and Sussex, these disorders arose to a fearful height; threatening letters often preceding the conflagrations, which soon after night-fall would simultaneously burst out, and spread over the country havoc and dismay. Large rewards were offered for the discovery of the offenders, the military force was increased, and special commissions were appointed to try the incendiaries. Altogether upwards of 800 offenders were tried, the greater part of whom were acquitted; and among those convicted, four were executed, and the remainder sentenced to different terms of transportation and imprisonment.

In referring to foreign affairs, we have to notice,—1. The trial of the French ministers Polignac, Peyronnet, Chantelauze, and Ranville, on a charge of high treason for the part they took in enforcing the "ordinances" of Charles X. which led to the memorable revolution of July.—2. The Polish insurrection. This arose from the grand duke Constantine of Russia having severely punished some of the young military students at Warsaw for toasting the memory of Kosciuszko. The inhabitants, assisted by the Polish regiments, after a sanguinary contest in the streets, compelled the Russians to retire to the other side of the Vistula. However, dreading the resentment of their tyrannical masters, they afterwards endeavoured to effect an amicable settlement; but the emperor Nicholas refused to listen to their representations, and threatened them with condign punishment. Meanwhile, the Poles prepared to meet the approaching conflict, and general Joseph Cloupiński was invested with the office of "dictator."—3. A.D. 1830.—DIED, LADY AUGUSTA DE ANELAND (LADY A. MURRAY) A DAUGHTER OF THE EARL OF DUNMORE, MARRIED TO THE DUKE OF SUSSEX IN 1792.

Columbia, who expired, a voluntary exile, at San Pedro, Dec. 17, in the 48th year of his age.

A.D. 1831.—On the 3rd of February parliament re-assembled, and it was announced that a plan of reform would speedily be introduced by lord John Russell. In the mean time lord Althorp brought forward the budget; by which it appeared that the taxes on tobacco, newspapers, and advertisements were to be reduced; and those on coals, candles, printed cottons, and some other articles, abolished.

The subject of parliamentary reform continued to absorb all other political considerations, and was looked forward to with intense interest. In announcing his scheme, lord John Russell proposed the total disfranchisement of 60 boroughs, in which the population did not amount to 2000; and the partial disfranchisement of 47, where the population was only 4000. By this means the number of members would be reduced 168; but which would be supplied by increasing the number of county members, and by giving representatives to certain large towns heretofore unrepresented. He then went into a variety of other details, not necessary to be here enumerated; when the bill, after a spirited discussion of seven days, was read a first time. The second reading was carried on the 22nd of March, by a majority of one; the numbers being 302 to 301. And on general Gascoyne's motion for the commitment of the bill, there was a majority against ministers of 8. Three days afterwards, on a question of adjournment, by which the voting of supplies was postponed, this majority had increased to 22; whereupon the ministers tendered their resignations to the king. These he declined to accept, but adopted the advice of earl Grey, who recommended a dissolution of parliament, which took place on the 22d of April.

And now arose the cry of "the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill." Out of the 82 county members for England, nearly all were pledged to the bill; as were all the four members for the city of London. On the 14th of June the new parliament met, and was opened by the king in person. On the 24th lord John Russell made his second attempt. The debate lasted three nights, and on a division there was a majority of 136 in favour of the bill. It then underwent a long, patient, and severe scrutiny in committee; every clause was carefully discussed as it arose; many of its crudities were corrected, and many imperfections remedied. These occupied the house almost uninterruptedly till the 19th of September, when, after another eloquent debate of three nights, the bill, as amended, was carried by a majority of 109 in the commons, and taken up to the lords by upwards of 100 members.

Early in October, earl Grey, in an elaborate speech, again brought before the consideration of the lords the important measure of parliamentary reform, to bring about which, he said, had been the great subject of his political life; but if it could be proved to have the revolutionary tendency some imputed to it, he would be the last man to defend it; and he concluded by declaring that by this measure ministers were prepared to stand or fall. Lord Wharncliffe moved as an amendment, "that it be read this day six months;" which having been seconded and put from the woolsack, one of the most memorable discussions in parliamentary history followed. For one entire week the debate was continued; during which time all that historical, constitutional, and scholastic illustration could furnish; all that skill, force, and variety of argument could supply; all that conscious rectitude of intention, pure patriotism, and noble independences were capable of commanding, were brought to bear upon this great question; and when the house divided, a majority of 41 appeared against the bill.

On the 20th of October parliament was prorogued, and was not again called together till the 6th of December. The year, however, did not close till the great measure was again before the legislature. On the 12th the third reform bill was introduced into the commons by lord John Russell, who pointed out various alterations that had been made in it; the effect of which was to lessen the number of the boroughs to be disfranchised, and to maintain the full complement of 668 members. These concessions were regarded as improvements by the opposition, and on the second reading the majority in its favour was two to one; the numbers being 324 for, and 162 against it. The house then adjourned till after Christmas.

That we may not interrupt the thread of our narrative by taking the other events of the year in their chronological order, we pass on to April 14, 1832; when, after a four nights' debate in the house of lords, this popular bill was carried by a majority of nine. After this, parliament adjourned to May 7, for the Easter holidays. On that day lord Lyndhurst moved that the disfranchising clause should be postponed, and the enfranchising clause first considered; which was carried against ministers, by a majority of 161 to 116. As this was considered the first of a series of obstructions, dexterously contrived to delay and mutilate the reform bill, the ministers announced their intention to resign, unless his majesty would consent to a new creation of peers. To that expedient the king declined to resort, and the ministers sent in their resignations accordingly. A week of terrific agitation followed; all the hate and rancour of party feeling were centred in one object; and while men of moderate views and principles trembled for the safety of the monarchy, crafty and designing demagogues stirred up the passions of the people in the hope of profiting by a popular convulsion. His majesty was desirous of having ministers who would carry an "extensive measure of reform;" and on sending for lord Lyndhurst, whom he desired to communicate with the duke of Wellington and sir Robert Peel, he expressed himself distinctly to that effect. The duke, in loyal obedience to the commands of his sovereign, was disposed to lend himself to the royal emergency, notwithstanding his former anti-reform declaration. Not so, however, sir Robert; he saw no hope of modifying the reform bill to his satisfaction; and he declined, though tempted with the premiership, to co-operate in the design. The idea of a new administration was therefore abandoned; and the duke of Wellington recommended the king to recall his former servants. This was done; and as it was evident that the wishes of the king were more in accordance with the determination of the people as a body, than with the aristocracy, the peers, in obedience to the royal wish, absented themselves from the house, and the reform bill was silently carried through its remaining stages; the majority on its third reading being 105 to 22.

We shall now briefly refer to a few occurrences, foreign and domestic, which we have hitherto necessarily omitted.—The Russians sustained a severe defeat at Wawa, after a battle of two days, their loss being 14,000 men; their opponents, the Poles, suffered comparatively little. But on the 30th, a Polish corps, under Dwornicki, being hard pressed by the Russians, retreated into Austrian Galicia, and, surrendering to the Austrian authorities, were treated as prisoners and sent into Hungary. In short, after bravely encountering their foes, and struggling against superior numbers, Warsaw capitulated, and the idea of Polish independence was farther removed than ever.—In June, prince Leopold was elected king of Belgium by the congress at Brussels; his territory to consist of the kingdom of the Netherlands, as settled in 1815.

On the 7th of September the coronation of their majesties took place; but, as compared with the gorgeous display and expensive banqueting when George IV. was crowned, it must be considered a frugal and unostentatious ceremony. There was, however, a royal procession from St. James's palace to Westminster abbey; and in the evening splendid illuminations, free admissions to the theatres, and a variety of other entertainments gratified the sight-seeing populace.

On the 21st of October, the London Gazette contained precautions to be adopted by his majesty's subjects against the spread of the Asiatic cholera, that dreadful pestilence having lately extended from Moscow to Hamburg. It was ordered that a board of health should be established in every town, to correspond with the board in London, and to consist of magistrates, clergy, and members of the medical profession; while the most effectual modes of insuring cleanliness, free ventilation, &c. were pointed out. These precautionary measures were doubtless of great use, and worthy of the paternal attention of a humane government; but owing, as was supposed, to the quarantine laws having been evaded by some persons who came over from Hamburg and landed at Sunderland, the much-dreaded infection visited many parts of Great Britain, and in the following year produced indescribable alarm among all ranks of people.

One other event, but of so disgraceful a character that we would fain omit it altogether, remains to be mentioned among the domestic occurrences of the year.

On the 29th of October the city of Bristol became the scene of dreadful riots, which were continued during the two following days, and were not overcome till that large commercial town appeared to be on the verge of total destruction. Sir Charles Wetherell, a strenuous and uncompromising opponent of the reform bill, was recorder of Bristol; and maledictions on his head were freely uttered by the base and vulgar, (not of that city only, but of the metropolis and elsewhere) for the vigorous stand he made against the bill during its progress through the house of commons. On the recorder's making his public entrance the brutal storm commenced, and did not cease till the third day; by which time, besides immense destruction to private property, the mansion-house, custom-house, excise-office, and bishop's palace were plundered and set on fire; the prisons were burst open, and their inmates set at liberty; and during one entire day (Sunday) the mob were the unrelenting masters of the city. On Monday morning, when the fury of the rioters had partly spent itself in beastly orgies, and many had become the victims of excessive drinking in the rifled cellars and warehouses, the civil magistrates appeared to awake from their stupor; and, with the assistance of the military, this "ebullition of popular feeling," as it was delicately termed by some who had unconsciously fanned the flame, was arrested. The loss of property was estimated at half a million. The number of rioters killed, wounded, or injured, was about 110; but, of these, far more suffered from the vile excess of intemperance, and from being unable to escape from the flames which they had themselves kindled, than from the sabres of the soldiery or the truncheons of constabulary protectors. One hundred and eighty were taken into custody, and tried by a special commission; when four were executed and twenty-two transported. Their trials took place on the 2nd of January, 1832. Not many days afterwards, lieutenant-colonel Brereton, who had the command of the troops, committed suicide pending an inquiry into his conduct by a court-martial. He was charged with not having displayed the firmness and decision necessary for quelling a tumult of such magnitude. That more energy and decision ought to have been shown at the commencement by the civil power is evident; how far the colonel was in error is very questionable. The whole transaction abundantly proves to what excesses the unbridled fury of the populace will lead, when their passions have been inflamed, during a period of fierce political excitement; and ought to serve as a perpetual warning to all those unquiet spirits who love to "ride on the whirlwind," but know not how to "direct the storm."

A. D. 1832.—Having in our previous notice stated the result of the long-continued contest respecting parliamentary reform, we have now only to describe the changes effected in the representative system when the bills came into operation. As soon as the royal assent was given to the English reform bill (June the 7th), congratulatory addresses and other peaceful demonstrations of public joy were very generally indulged in; but if we may judge by the triumphant chuckle of the victors and the lofty scorn of the vanquished, the angry invectives of the late political disputants were neither forgotten nor forgiven. Yet though the war of words had not wholly passed away, it was now as a mere feather in the balance—the reform bill had become the law of the land. The decayed boroughs were disfranchised, and in their stead the right of parliamentary representation was given to large and populous towns; while an entire new constituency of ten pound householders was created in cities and boroughs. The county constituency was also greatly extended. Heretofore it had been restricted to forty-shilling freeholders; now copyholders of 10*l.* per annum; leaseholders of 10*l.* if for not less than sixty years, or of 50*l.* if for not less than twenty years; and tenants-at-will, if occupying at a yearly rent of not less than 50*l.* The county representation was likewise modelled anew: To Yorkshire six members were given, two for each riding. Devon, Kent, Lancashire, and twenty-three other large counties were divided, and two knights given to each division; seven English counties were to return three instead of two members each; and three Welsh counties, two instead of one. The reform bill for Scotland received the royal assent July 17th; that of Ireland, August 7th. Eighteen members had been deducted from the entire representation of England, but an addition of eight to Scotland, five to Ireland, and five to Wales, made the total for Great Britain and Ireland 658, as before. The Scotch and Irish reform bills possessed the grand features of the English bill, by extending the franchise; but some peculiarities adapted to the state of property, &c. in both countries, were necessary to be observed.

During the months of February, March, and April, the cholera became very prevalent, not only in the country towns and villages of the North of England, where it first appeared, but also in the metropolis; and all the horrors of the great plague of London, depicted with such fearful power by Defoe, were present to the imagination. Every possible attention was paid to the subject by government: parochial and district boards were forthwith organized; temporary hospitals got ready for the reception of the sick; and every measure that humanity and prudence could suggest was resorted to, to check the progress of the malady where it appeared, and to prevent contagion where it had not. The virulence of the disease abated during the three succeeding months, but at the end of the summer it appeared again as malignant as ever. In the whole year, the deaths from cholera, within the limits of the bills of mortality, amounted to 3,200; and the total number of deaths, as reported by the central board, exclusive of London, was 24,180; the amount of cases being 68,855. In Paris, 1000 deaths occurred during the first week of its appearance there; nay, so fatal was it, that out of 45,675 deaths which took place in the French capital in 1832, the enormous number of 19,000 was occasioned by cholera. This frightful epidemic next appeared in the Canadas and United States. It thus made the tour of the globe; beginning, as it was supposed, in Hindustan; then devastating Moscow and the northern parts of Europe; visiting Great Britain and France; and lastly, crossing the Atlantic.

In this year's obituary are the names of several men of eminence. From among them we select—sir James Mackintosh, an eloquent writer and statesman.—Jeremy Bentham, celebrated as a jurist and law reformer; a man who had his own specifics for every disease of the body politic, but who never had the happiness to see one of them effect a cure.—Sir Walter Scott, the "wizard of the north," as some of his eulogists have called him; an excellent romance writer, and a poet of acknowledged merit, who for a long period enjoyed a popularity unknown to any of his contemporaries. He possessed an extraordinary union of genius and industry; and had he been satisfied with his literary gains, instead of striving to amass wealth by joining in the speculations of his printers and publishers, his latter days would, in all probability, have been spent, as they ought, in the enjoyment of ease and affluence.

A. D. 1833.—On the 29th of January the first reform parliament was opened by commission, and on the 5th of February the king delivered his speech in person. Among other topics of interest, he emphatically dwelt upon the increasing spirit of insubordination and violence in Ireland, and of the necessity which existed for entrusting the crown with additional powers for punishing the disturbers of the public peace, and for strengthening the legislative union of the two kingdoms. This led to the passing of the insurrection acts in the following month; empowering the lord-lieutenant to prohibit public meetings of a dangerous tendency; suspending the writ of habeas corpus; authorising domiciliary visits by magistrates, &c.

During this session of parliament, which was unusually protracted and laborious, many other subjects of great national importance were legislated upon; foremost among which were the abolition of colonial slavery, and the renewal of the charters of the Bank of England and East India Company.

Great Britain had in 1807 abolished the "slave-trade," but slavery itself was now to become extinct in the West Indies. By the act for the "abolition of colonial slavery," all children under six years of age, or born after Aug. 1, 1834, were declared free; all registered slaves above six years became, from the same date, apprenticed labourers, with weekly pay, either in money or by board and lodging; possessing, at the same time, all the rights and immunities of freemen. In effecting so great a change, it was necessary that the owners of slaves should receive some adequate compensation. To meet this object, ministers at first proposed advancing a loan of fifteen millions to the West India proprietors; but the idea of a loan was soon converted into a gift, and of a still higher amount; the sum of 20,000,000*l.* being finally voted to the slave-owners as a liberal compensation for the losses they might sustain by this humane measure. An end was thus put to a question which had agitated the religious portion of the community from the day that Mr. Wilberforce first stood forward as the champion of African emancipation.

Many questions of magnitude present themselves in legislating for our extensive empire in the East, where the interests of a population of 100 millions are to be consulted; yet, vitally important as the subject is to the commercial prosperity and political influence of Great Britain, it never seems to have met with the consideration to which it is manifestly entitled, either in the British senate, or among the British community. It now, however, engaged the attention of parliament somewhat more than on former occasions. Three new statutes were passed: the first applied to the renewal of the charter of the East India Company, and the future government of India; the second regulated the trade to China and India; and the third referred to the collection and management of the duties on tea. The charter of the company was renewed for the term of twenty years, from April 30, 1834, under certain restrictions. And several subordinate provisions were made, of a judicial, municipal, commercial, and ecclesiastical character; one being for the mitigation and gradual abolition of slavery in the East.

With regard to renewing the charter of the Bank of England, there were three questions on which the legislature were divided upon some material points; the majority, however, insisting on the expediency of continuing the exclusive privileges of the Bank, so that it should remain the principal and governing monetary association of the empire. One important concession obtained from the Bank was a reduction, to the amount of 120,000*l.*, in a charge of about 280,000*l.* which the directors annually made for the management of the public debt, &c. It also obtained one important privilege: the paper of the Bank of England being made a legal tender for all sums above 5*l.*, except by the Bank itself or its branches. There was another enactment of general interest, but of very questionable policy, namely, that by which bills of exchange drawn at a certain limited date were exempt from the usury laws; an enactment the ruinous and demoralizing effects of which, in times of commercial distress, are incalculable. The charter, though renewed till August, 1855, had this reservation — it might be put an end to, should parliament choose, in 1845, by a year's previous notice being given.

Besides the settlement of the foregoing great legislative measures, various taxes were repealed or reduced; many official situations were abolished or reformed; several judicial processes amended; and a great variety of private bills passed.

A. D. 1834. — The desire to move onward in legislating for and removing every thing that seemed to obstruct the progress of "liberal" principles, was the natural consequence of the reform bill; and at the very commencement of the year the "pressure from without" was felt by ministers to be a most inconvenient appendage to their popularity. They had effected one mighty object; and to enter upon more, much caution and patient deliberation were requisite. They knew that popular clamour had been kept up long enough, and they accordingly endeavoured to separate themselves from the noisy and irregular auxiliaries who had joined their ranks in the hour of need, but who were now become troublesome hangers-on. This state of things could not long remain; and on Mr. Ward bringing forward a motion in the house of commons for appropriating the surplus revenues of the Irish church to the purposes of government, it appeared that there existed a difference of opinion in the cabinet as to the mode in which the motion should be met. The majority was in its favour; but the appropriation of church property to other than ecclesiastical uses was incompatible with the notions of Mr. Stanley, sir James Graham, the earl of Ripon, and the duke of Richmond; and they accordingly resigned their places in the ministry. This happened on the 27th of May. The 28th being the anniversary of the king's birth-day, the Irish prelates presented an address to his majesty, in which they strongly deprecated ecclesiastical innovations. The king promptly replied, and, in an unstudied speech of considerable length, warmly expressed his attachment to the church. He said that he had always been friendly to toleration in its utmost latitude, but opposed to licentiousness, and that he was fully sensible how much both the protestant church and his own family were indebted to the revolution of 1688; emphatically and somewhat naively adding, "The words which you hear from me are spoken from my mouth, but they proceed from my heart."

The rupture with the ministers above-named was speedily followed by another, and which ended in the resignation of earl Grey, the premier. In the communications which had from time to time been made by ministers to Mr. O'Connell on Irish affairs, it had been confidentially stated to him that when the Irish coercion bill was renewed, the clauses prohibitory of meetings would not be pressed; nevertheless, the obnoxious clauses appeared in the bill; and Mr. O'Connell declared that he considered it dissolved the obligation of secrecy, under which the communication had been made. Lord Althorp finding himself unable to carry the coercion bill through the commons, with the clauses against public meetings, sent in his resignation; and as earl Grey considered himself unable, without the assistance of lord Althorp as ministerial leader in the house of commons, to carry on the government, he also resigned. Parliamentary reform, the great object of his public exertions, had been accomplished; and as he was now upwards of seventy, and in an infirm state of health, he seemed glad to seize the first opportunity of closing his official labours.

An arrangement was, however, soon effected to form another reform ministry, lord Althorp consenting to resume the chancellorship of the exchequer, under the premiership of viscount Melbourne. The new cabinet then stood thus:—viscount Melbourne, first lord of the treasury; lord Brougham, lord chancellor; viscount Althorp, chancellor of the exchequer; marquis of Lansdowne, president of the council; earl of Mulgrave, privy seal; viscount Duncannon, home secretary; viscount Palmerston, foreign secretary; Spring Rice, colonial secretary; lord Auckland, first lord of the admiralty; Charles Grant, president of the India board; marquis of Conyngham, postmaster-general; lord Holland, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; lord John Russell, paymaster of the forces; and E. J. Littleton, secretary for Ireland.

The king in person prorogued parliament on the 15th of August. Notwithstanding the time lost in ministerial disagreements and changes, a great mass of business had been dispatched. The two principal measures were the "central criminal court act," and the "poor law amendment act." The former extends the jurisdiction of the Old Bailey court over a population of about 1,700,000; not only in Middlesex, but in parts of Surrey, Kent, and Essex; leaving to the Middlesex sessions, at Clerkenwell, the trial of offences punishable with not more than seven years' transportation. The Old Bailey sessions to be held at least twelve times a year.

But by far the most important of these measures was the poor-law amendment act; a measure, we regret to add, which appears to have brought with it much more misery than it has relieved. In saying this, we by no means would infer that a continuance of the former poor-law system, with its incompetent officers, private jobbing, expensive litigation, and all the numerous errors and inconsistencies that had been engrafted on the original act of Elizabeth, would have been desirable: far from it. But the present "amended" system, which was chiefly intended to reduce the burdensome amount of the poor-rates, might have been easily carried out without those obnoxious clauses which enforce the separation of married men from their wives, and mothers from their pauper children; withholding out-door relief, &c. Moreover, however desirable the centralization of poor-law power may be, and however able the commissioners who form the board at Somerset-house, local interests must often be left to local management; or a mode of generalizing will become so habitual to those who superintend the administration of the poor-laws, as to frustrate all endeavours to obtain individual justice.

Several popular measures were carried during the session; namely, the repeal of the house-tax; the abolition of the duty on almanacs; the abolition of sinecure offices in the house of commons; facilities at the post-office for the transmission of foreign newspapers; grants for building schools in England and Scotland, &c.

This year was remarkable for the systematic organization of "trades' unions" in London and other large towns of England, and for repeated "strikes" among tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, bricklayers, weavers, spinners, and other "operatives." But the different crafts all returned to their employments, without any very serious injury to trade or to themselves. At Paris, Lyons, and Brussels similar combinations of workmen took place, and were attended with serious consequences, particularly at Lyons, where no less than 5,000 persons (of whom 1,700 were troops) were killed before the insurrection, which had been caused by the trades' unionists interference with the trials of some of their members, was quelled.

An event now took place which caused much temporary consternation, and was regarded as a great national calamity, not merely on account of the loss sustained, but also from the historical and personal associations connected with it. On the evening of the 16th of October a fire broke out in one of the offices at the lower end of the house of lords, which continued to rage throughout the night, and was not completely extinguished for several days. Great anxiety was felt for the safety of that ancient edifice, Westminster-hall; and even the venerable and magnificent Gothic pile opposite, Westminster-abbey, was at one period thought to be in great danger; but nothing that skill or intrepidity could achieve was neglected in arresting the progress of the flames; and though the two houses of parliament were destroyed, neither the hall nor the abbey sustained material damage; and the libraries and state papers in the lords and commons were preserved. The fire, as it appeared on strict inquiry, was caused by negligence, in burning the exchequer-tallies in a building adjoining the house of lords. Temporary chambers for the accommodation of the legislature were afterwards erected on the site of the old buildings.

Just one month after the destruction of the houses of parliament the Melbourne ministry was summarily and unexpectedly dismissed. On the 14th of November lord Melbourne waited on his majesty at Brighton to take his commands on the appointment of a chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of lord Althorp, removed, by the death of his father, earl Spencer, to the house of peers. The king, it is said, objected to the proposed re-construction of the cabinet, and made his lordship the bearer of a letter to the duke of Wellington, who waited upon his majesty on the 18th, and advised him to place sir Robert Peel at the head of the government. Sir Robert was at the time in Italy, whither a courier was dispatched, and the baronet arrived in London Dec. 9, saw the king, and accepted the situation of premier; the duke of Wellington having in the interim provisionally filled the chief offices of the government. Thus again, though for a brief space, the tory party, or conservatives, as they were now called, were in the ascendant.

A.D. 1835.—The Melbourne cabinet had been for some time looked upon as the mere dregs of the Grey ministry; and the losses it had sustained by the withdrawal of the earl of Durham, the Stanley section, and the noble premier himself, had not been supplied by men of suitable talents. The public therefore had no great reason for regret, how very much they may have been surprised, when the king so suddenly dispensed with their services. Yet when the same men were entrusted with the reins of government who had been the strenuous opposers of reform, an instantaneous outcry burst forth, and the advent of toryism was regarded by the populace with feelings of distrust and dread. Sir Robert Peel, however, explicitly declared, that he considered the reform bill as a final and irrevocable settlement; and he appealed to several important measures that had formerly emanated from himself, as proofs that he was not opposed to the redress of real grievances, and the removal of all recognised abuses. Upon these grounds sir Robert solicited the confidence of the country; and he brought forward his leading measures with great dispatch and ability. The ministerial plans for affording relief to dissenters relative to the marriage ceremony, and also the settlement of tithes, met with general favour and concurrence. But when, on the 30th of March, lord John Russell brought forward his resolution—"that the house should resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to consider of the temporalities of the church of Ireland," the motion was met by sir E. Knatchbull with a direct negative, and after a long and stormy debate, ministers found themselves in a minority of 33. The Irish church bill was then discussed in committee; and after three nights' debate on the question of appropriating the surplus funds of the church to the "general education of all classes of Christians," which was opposed by the ministers and their friends, there was still a majority against them of 27. Finding that neither concessions nor professions of liberality were of any avail, the duke of Wellington in the upper house, and sir Robert Peel in the lower, announced their resignations; the latter at the same time declaring, that though thwarted by the commons, he parted with them on friendly terms.

These frequent changes in the ministry sadly impeded us in the progress of this succinct history; but in like manner as they engrossed universal attention at the time and were considered all-important, so must they now be related, as affording the readiest clue to the principal transactions which took place in the arena of politics.

Once more, then, we see lord Melbourne as the premier; with lord John Russell, home secretary; lord Palmerston, foreign secretary; right hon. Spring Rice, chancellor of the exchequer; the marquis of Lansdowne, president of the council; and the other official appointments filled nearly as they were when the "liberals" were lately in power, except that the great seal was for the present put in commission.

The first great question that engaged the attention of the commons, and one which had been looked forward to by the community with much impatience, was that of "municipal reform." For more than two centuries the abuses existing in corporate bodies, particularly the misapplication of municipal funds, had been a matter of constant complaint. It was naturally expected that a reform in the representative system in boroughs having been effected, a reform in the election of their own local authorities would follow. A commission to inquire into the state of municipal corporations, their modes of administering justice, their revenues and funds, and the privileges of freemen, &c., had already been instituted, and the result of the inquiry induced the commissioners to report to his majesty, that "the perversion of municipal institutions to political ends has occasioned the sacrifice of local interest to party purposes, which have been frequently pursued through the corruption and demoralization of electoral bodies." Then, after pointing out the various inefficient and corrupt modes in which municipal interests were attended to, and the great and general dissatisfaction which prevailed on the subject, the commissioners declared it to be their duty "to represent to his majesty that the existing municipal corporations of England and Wales neither possess nor deserve the confidence or respect of his majesty's subjects, and that a thorough reform must be effected before they can become useful and efficient instruments of local government." Upon this report, which was supported by a voluminous mass of details, lord John Russell brought in his bill, which, having been severely scrutinized in the lords, passed into a law. The grand feature of this bill is, that it vests the local government of a town in the rated and permanently resident inhabitants. In the council is vested the entire deliberative functions of the corporation. They appoint the town-clerk and treasurer, and from them the mayor and aldermen are chosen. They have the control of the police, watching, and lighting. If there be a surplus in the burgesse fund, they may apply it to local improvements or any object beneficial to the inhabitants; or if insufficient, they may order a rate to be levied. All the existing rights of freedom, or citizenship, or burgesse-ship, in the old corporations, are preserved to the present possessors; but all exclusive privileges of trading, or of exercising any calling or handicraft, in corporate towns, are abolished.

Many other measures of practical utility were discussed and passed this session. Among them were several acts framed by sir James Graham for improving the naval code and thereby increasing the naval power of Great Britain; first, by an act for amending and consolidating the laws relative to merchant-seamen; and secondly by an act, the object of which is to encourage the voluntary enlistment of seamen into the royal navy, by limiting the period of service to five years. Lord Brougham also brought forward a very useful bill for removing some of the more obvious and glaring defects in the old patent law; not the least of which was that the patent often expired just about the time the difficulties attending its first introduction had been surmounted, and, consequently, before the patentee had benefited by his invention. By the new law a power is vested in the crown of extending, on the recommendation of the privy council, the term of a patent from fourteen to twenty-one years.

Let us for a moment pause in our domestic narrative, to mention a diabolical contrivance in France, which might have involved Europe in another scene of blood and tumult but for its providential failure. On the 28th of July, during the festivities of the annual commemoration of the revolution of 1830, as Louis Philippe, attended by his sons and a splendid suite, was riding along the line of the national guard, on the boulevard of the Temple, an explosion like a discharge of musquetry took place from the window of an adjoining house, which killed marshal Mortier and another general officer, besides killing or wounding nearly forty other persons. But the king, who was the object of this indiscriminate slaughter, with his three sons, escaped unhurt. The assassin, who was a Corsican named Fieschi, was seized by the police, in the act of descending from the window by a rope, and wounded by the bursting of some of the barrels of his "infernal machine." The deadly instrument consisted of a frame upon which were arranged 25 barrels, each loaded with bullets, &c., and the touch-holes communicating by means of a train of gunpowder. On his trial he made no attempt to deny his guilt, but nothing could be elicited to prove that any formidable conspiracy existed, or that he was influenced by any political party to undertake the horrid act. The atrocious attempt, however, served for a convenient pretext to introduce a series of severe laws for the prevention and punishment of state crimes and revolutionary attempts.

We shall close one sketch of this year's occurrences by briefly noticing the deaths of two persons, who, in their career for popular applause, attained a more than ordinary share of notoriety. The one was Henry Hunt, late M.P. for Preston, who had long figured as a leader among the radicals, and whose zeal for "the people" at the too memorable meeting at Manchester had been rewarded by a long imprisonment in Ilchester gaol. He was originally a respectable and wealthy Wiltshire farmer; but having renounced the charms of country life for the euphonious greetings of "unwashed artisans," he for many years continued to hold undivided empire over their affections. In personal appearance Mr. Hunt was a fine specimen of the English yeoman; he was naturally shrewd, uniting caution with boldness, but, above all, greedy of political popularity. During the latter part of his life his name, which used to grace the walls in juxtaposition with "universal suffrage," was allied with "matchless blacking;" and it was while he was on a journey of business through the south-western counties that he met with his death, owing to a violent fit of paralysis with which he was seized as he was alighting from his phaeton at Alresford, Hants.—His more distinguished contemporaries and coadjutors, though sometimes powerful rivals, was William Cobbett, M.P. for Oldham; a man remarkable for persevering industry, and of unquestionable talents, who, from following his father's plough, and afterwards serving with credit as a British soldier in America, passed the greater part of his life in the unceasing strife of politics, and was able, by the force of his extraordinary and versatile powers as a writer, to keep a strong hold on public opinion for nearly half a century. He died in June, not three months after his quondam friend, Mr. Henry Hunt. [A memoir of Mr. Cobbett is given, at considerable length, in the "Biographical Treasury," affording a rare example of the effects of application.]

A.D. 1836.—The year opened auspiciously, both with regard to its commercial prospects and its political aspect. The whole manufacturing districts were in a state of activity; money was abundant wherever tolerable security was offered; and though an immense absorption of capital was taking place in extensive public undertakings, such as railways, some of which were already highly successful, there was very little of that wild spirit of adventure which ten years before had nearly brought the country to the brink of ruin. Mercantile confidence rested upon a better basis than it had done for a long time past; the ports bore ample evidence of the prosperity of British commerce; and though there were still just complaints of agricultural distress, they were partial rather than general.

When the king opened parliament in February these facts furnished congratulatory topics for the royal speech, and suggestions were also thrown out relative to certain improvements, contemplated by the legislature, and in the administration of justice, especially in the court of chancery; an equitable settlement of tithes in Ireland; municipal reform in that country, &c.

The first question of importance that occupied the attention of the house was brought forward by the chancellor of the exchequer, who announced the intention of government to reduce most materially the stamp duty on newspapers. It was proposed, he said, to reduce it from its present amount of 4d. with the discount, to 1d. without discount, which would be a reduction of nearly 2½d. On all newspapers sold for 7d. or less. To this remission parliament assented, by which the circulation of unstamped newspapers—an illicit trade that had long been followed by certain London newsvendors—was abandoned as profitable.

Notwithstanding several useful measures of legislation had been carried during the session, considerable disappointment was felt at its close in consequence of the loss or abandonment of certain bills which had been brought forward by ministers with some parade and apparent confidence of success; as, for example, the Irish tithe and municipal bills; the bill for governing charitable trusts in England by popular election; bills for amending the English municipal act, for improving the court of chancery, for removing the civil disabilities of the Jews, &c. But if the value depended on the amount of legislation, there was no cause of complaint; the number of general acts passed in 1836 being 17; and of railway bills alone, 33. By the act for the "commutation of tithes in England and Wales," provision was made for the final extinction within two years of the vexatious right of exacting tithes in kind, and for commutting them into a corn rent charge, payable in money. By the "established church act" for effecting a new distribution of episcopal dioceses and income, the income of the archbishop of Canterbury was to be reduced to 15,000*l.*, the archbishop of York to 10,000*l.*, the bishop of London to 10,000*l.*, the bishop of Durham, 8,000*l.*; Winchester, 9,000*l.*; Ely, 5,500*l.*; St. Asaph and Bangor, 5,200*l.*; Worcester, 5,000*l.*; and the other bishops to have incomes varying from 4,000*l.* to 5,000*l.* The bishoprics of Bristol and Gloucester to be united; also St. Asaph with Bangor, and Sodor and Man with that of Chester; and two new bishoprics to be erected, one at Manchester, the other at Ripon. Several other economical regulations in the church were at the same time effected by this bill. Two acts were also passed which were in some degree connected with church reform, namely, the "marriage act," and the act for "registering births, deaths, and marriages." Formerly, in order to be legally married, it was necessary to comply with the ritual of the established church; but by the new act a marriage may be simply a civil contract or a religious ceremony, according to the wish of the parties; it will be equally legal whether contracted in any registered place of religious worship, or in the office of the registrar. The new mode of registering births, deaths, and marriages, is valuable also as a statistical document and an authentic record of facts.

In the obituary for this year are several distinguished names: Lord Stowell, aged 90, an eminent civilian; many years judge of the high court of admiralty, and brother of lord chancellor Eldon.—Nathan Meyer Rothschild, the greatest millionaire of the age; a man who in conjunction with other members of his family on the continent may be said to have governed the European money market.—James Wood, the rich, eccentric, and penurious banker of Gloucester.—James Mill, the historian of British India.—Charles X. ex-king of France, who died an exile in Illyria, in the 80th year of his age.—And the abbé Sieyès, who under all the phases of the French revolution maintained an elevated station, and on the fall of the republic became a count and peer of the empire.

A. D. 1837.—It was remarked at the commencement of the previous year that symptoms of prosperity appeared in all the leading branches of commercial industry, and that no lack of capital was known for any undertakings, however vast, provided they held out a prospect for safe investments. But over-trading, led on and encouraged by over-banking, produced evils, which if not equal, were very similar in their effects, to those disasters which overwhelmed the country during the memorable commercial panic of 1825. During the year 1836 no less than forty-five joint-stock banks had been established. It was therefore natural that one of the subjects recommended to the attention of parliament in the opening speech, should be "a renewal of the inquiry into the operation of joint-stock banks." But the more important measures which had formed the leading subjects of debate, and which were regarded by ministers as necessary to the stability of their tenure in office, underwent certain alterations, and were again brought forward for discussion. Little progress, however, was made, when an event occurred which for a time absorbed all matters of minor interest.

The public had been apprised by the publication of bulletins, that his majesty was seriously ill, and on the 20th of June his death was announced as having taken place early that morning. He was perfectly conscious of his approaching fate, and had expressed a wish to survive the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo on the 18th. The good old king was so far

But if the value depended on the amount of legislation, there was no cause of complaint; the number of general acts passed in 1836 being 17; and of railway bills alone, 33. By the act for the "commutation of tithes in England and Wales," provision was made for the final extinction within two years of the vexatious right of exacting tithes in kind, and for commutting them into a corn rent charge, payable in money. By the "established church act" for effecting a new distribution of episcopal dioceses and income, the income of the archbishop of Canterbury was to be reduced to 15,000*l.*, the archbishop of York to 10,000*l.*, the bishop of London to 10,000*l.*, the bishop of Durham, 8,000*l.*; Winchester, 9,000*l.*; Ely, 5,500*l.*; St. Asaph and Bangor, 5,200*l.*; Worcester, 5,000*l.*; and the other bishops to have incomes varying from 4,000*l.* to 5,000*l.* The bishoprics of Bristol and Gloucester to be united; also St. Asaph with Bangor, and Sodor and Man with that of Chester; and two new bishoprics to be erected, one at Manchester, the other at Ripon. Several other economical regulations in the church were at the same time effected by this bill. Two acts were also passed which were in some degree connected with church reform, namely, the "marriage act," and the act for "registering births, deaths, and marriages." Formerly, in order to be legally married, it was necessary to comply with the ritual of the established church; but by the new act a marriage may be simply a civil contract or a religious ceremony, according to the wish of the parties; it will be equally legal whether contracted in any registered place of religious worship, or in the office of the registrar. The new mode of registering births, deaths, and marriages, is valuable also as a statistical document and an authentic record of facts.

In the obituary for this year are several distinguished names: Lord Stowell, aged 90, an eminent civilian; many years judge of the high court of admiralty, and brother of lord chancellor Eldon.—Nathan Meyer Rothschild, the greatest millionaire of the age; a man who in conjunction with other members of his family on the continent may be said to have governed the European money market.—James Wood, the rich, eccentric, and penurious banker of Gloucester.—James Mill, the historian of British India.—Charles X. ex-king of France, who died an exile in Illyria, in the 80th year of his age.—And the abbé Sieyès, who under all the phases of the French revolution maintained an elevated station, and on the fall of the republic became a count and peer of the empire.

A. D. 1837.—It was remarked at the commencement of the previous year that symptoms of prosperity appeared in all the leading branches of commercial industry, and that no lack of capital was known for any undertakings, however vast, provided they held out a prospect for safe investments. But over-trading, led on and encouraged by over-banking, produced evils, which if not equal, were very similar in their effects, to those disasters which overwhelmed the country during the memorable commercial panic of 1825. During the year 1836 no less than forty-five joint-stock banks had been established. It was therefore natural that one of the subjects recommended to the attention of parliament in the opening speech, should be "a renewal of the inquiry into the operation of joint-stock banks." But the more important measures which had formed the leading subjects of debate, and which were regarded by ministers as necessary to the stability of their tenure in office, underwent certain alterations, and were again brought forward for discussion. Little progress, however, was made, when an event occurred which for a time absorbed all matters of minor interest.

The public had been apprised by the publication of bulletins, that his majesty was seriously ill, and on the 20th of June his death was announced as having taken place early that morning. He was perfectly conscious of his approaching fate, and had expressed a wish to survive the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo on the 18th. The good old king was so far he made no attempt to do anything could any formidable attempt be made to undertake any successful attempt, without the aid of the laws for the state crimes

gratified; but the symptoms of internal decay rapidly increased, and he breathed his last (as his head rested on queen Adelaide's shoulder) in the presence of the archbishop of Canterbury, the dean of Hereford, &c., faintly articulating, "Thy will be done." The queen's attentions to her afflicted consort had been unremitting; for twelve days she did not take off her clothes, but was constantly in the sick chamber, engaged in kind offices and administering consolation. His majesty was in the 72nd year of his age, and had nearly completed the seventh year of his reign. The royal corpse lay in state till the 8th of July, when it was deposited in St. George's chapel, Windsor. The duke of Sussex attended as chief mourner; and the queen dowager was present in the royal closet during the funeral service.

Many were the eulogiums pronounced upon the deceased monarch; but no testimony was more just, or more characteristic of his real qualities, than the following tribute by sir Robert Peel. He said, "it was the universal feeling of the country, that the reins of government were never committed to the hands of one who bore himself as a sovereign with more affability, and yet with more true dignity—to one who was more compassionate for the sufferings of others—or to one whose nature was more utterly free from all selfishness. He did not believe that, in the most exalted or in the most humble station, there could be found a man who felt more pleasure in witnessing and promoting the welfare of others."

CHAPTER LXVI.

The Reign of Victoria.

A. D. 1837.—INTELLIGENCE of his majesty's death having been officially communicated to the princess Victoria and the duchess of Kent, at Kensington palace, preparations were immediately made for holding a privy council there at eleven o'clock. A temporary throne was erected for the occasion; and, on the queen being seated, the lord-chancellor administered to her majesty the usual oath, that she would govern the kingdom according to its laws and customs, &c. The cabinet ministers and other privy councillors then present took the oath of allegiance and supremacy; and the ministers having first resigned their seals of office, her majesty was graciously pleased to return them, and they severally kissed hands on their re-appointment.

By the death of William IV. the crowns of the united kingdom and of Hanover were dissevered through the operation of the salic law excluding females from the Hanoverian kingdom, which consequently descended to the next heir, the duke of Cumberland; and Adelaide, as queen-dowager, was entitled to 100,000*l.* per annum, settled upon her for life in 1831, with Marlborough-house and Bushy-house for residences.

On the 20th of October the new parliament assembled, when her majesty opened in person the business of the session. In her progress to and from the house, the queen was received by the populace with the strongest demonstrations of enthusiasm and loyalty. The speech, which her majesty delivered in a clear and audible voice, referred to the great advantages of peace, and the amicable relations subsisting between Great Britain and foreign courts; her anxious wish to improve the condition of the poor; and her desire that no unnecessary expenditure should take place in any department of the government; concluding with the following sentence:—"The early age at which I am called to the sovereignty of this kingdom, renders it a more imperative duty that, under Divine Providence, I should place my reliance upon your cordial co-operation, and upon the love and affection of all my people." In the house of lords, the address in answer to her majesty's gracious speech was moved by her uncle the duke of Sussex, who "trusted he might be allowed to express his conviction that when the chronicles at a future period should have to record the annals of her reign, which had so auspiciously commenced, and which, with the blessing of God, he trusted would be continued for many years, they would not be written in letters of blood, but would commemorate a glorious period of prosperity, the triumphs of peace, the spreading of general knowledge, the advancement of the arts and manufactures, the diffusion of commerce, the content of all classes of society, and the general welfare of the country."

On the ensuing lord mayor's day, Nov. 9, the queen, according to established custom, which has been usually followed by the sovereigns of England on their accession, paid a visit to the citizens of London, and dined with the corporation at Guildhall, which was fitted up in the most splendid manner for her reception. Her majesty was preceded by the royal dukes and duchesses, with their attendants and body guards; then followed the principal officers of her majesty's household in six carriages; next came the queen herself in her state carriage, with the duchess of Sutherland and the earl of Alhmarle; then the foreign ambassadors, cabinet ministers, and the chief of the nobility; the whole procession, which comprised nearly two hundred carriages, extending from St. James's palace to Temple-bar. When the royal cortège reached St. Paul's, the senior scholar of the blue-coat school, standing on a platform erected for the occasion, delivered a complimentary address, which the queen graciously acknowledged, and which was followed by the national anthem, sung by 600 of the blue-coat boys, whose juvenile voices were swelled into one loud and joyful chorus by the assembled multitude. Nothing occurred to interrupt the festive loyalty of the scene; patriotic toasts, congratulatory speeches, and courtly compliments, passed for their full value, and gave additional zest to the "mantling bowl;" his lordship was honoured with a baronetcy, the two sheriffs were knighted; and the youthful queen drank to the lord mayor, and prosperity to the city of London with such condescending affability, that her faithful subjects gave utterance to their delighted feelings in paeans of joyful acclamations.

No great progress was made during the first session of Victoria's parliament in settling the various important subjects under discussion. At its close, however, the civil list bill was passed; it provided a total sum of 385,000*l*, which was thus classed:—1. privy purse, 60,000*l*; 2. salaries of household and retired allowances, 131,260*l*; 3. expenses of household, 172,600*l*; 4. royal bounty, &c., 13,200*l*; 5. pensions, 1,200*l*; unappropriated monies, 8,040*l*.—On the 23rd her majesty went in person to give her royal assent; and then adjourned the parliament to the 16th of January.

A. D. 1838.—For some time past there had been symptoms of discontent in Lower Canada, fomented by the old French party, which at length broke out into the appearance of a civil war. To check an evil so pregnant with mischief, it was deemed advisable that no ordinary person should be sent out to that important colony. Accordingly, it was notified in the London Gazette, Jan. 16, that the earl of Durham, G.C.B. was appointed governor-general of "all her majesty's provinces within and adjacent to the continent of North America, and her majesty's high commissioner for the adjustment of certain important affairs affecting the provinces of Lower and Upper Canada." His lordship did not arrive in Canada till nearly the end of May. Actual contests had taken place between considerable parties of the insurgents and the troops under lieutenant-col. Wetherall, who had succeeded in driving them from all the villages on the line of the river Richelieu. At length, on the 13th of December, sir John Colborne himself marched from Montreal to attack the chief post of the rebels at the Grand Brûlé. On the following day an engagement took place in the church yard of St. Eustache, when the loyalist army proved once more victorious, 80 of the enemy having been killed, and 120 taken prisoners. Dr. J. O. Chenier, their leader, was slain; and the town was more than half burnt down. On the 15th, on sir J. Colborne's approach to the town of St. Benoit, a great portion of the inhabitants came out bearing a white flag and begging for mercy; but in consequence of the great disloyalty of the place, and the fact of the principal leaders having been permitted to escape, some of their houses were fired as an example. Dr. Wolfred Nelson, one of the rebel leaders, having been nine days concealed in the woods, was brought in prisoner to Montreal. In the Upper Province, a body of rebels, which occupied a position about three miles from Toronto, threatening that city, were successfully attacked and dispersed on the 7th of December by sir Francis Bond Head, at the head of the armed citizens, with such reinforcements as had spontaneously joined them from the country. The rebels had, however, established a camp on Navy island, on the Niagara river; and many citizens of the United States were implicated in the insurrectionary movements there and elsewhere on the frontier.

On the 3rd of March a sharp engagement took place between her majesty's troops and the insurgents, in which the latter were totally defeated at Point Pele island, near the western boundary of the British possessions. This island had been occupied by about 600 men, well armed and equipped; when col. Maitland, in order to dispossess them, marched from Amherstburgh with a few companies of the 32nd and 83rd regiments, two six-pounders, and some volunteer cavalry. The action that followed assumed the character of bush-fighting—the island, which is about seven miles long, being covered with thickets, and the pirates outnumbering the troops in the proportion of nearly two to one. Ultimately, however, they were driven to flight; leaving among the dead, colonel Bradley, the commander-in-chief; major Howdley; and captain Van Rensselaer and M'Keon; besides a great many wounded and other prisoners. In this instance nearly all the killed and wounded were citizens of the United States; and the arms that were found were all new, and marked as the property of the United States. The insurgents being thus foiled in their daring attempts, it is not necessary, for the present, for us to allude further to Canadian affairs, than to observe that some of the most active ringleaders were executed, and others transported to the island of Bermuda.

In narrating the national domestic occurrences of this year, we have to commence with one which, like the late conflagration of the houses of parliament, filled the inhabitants of the metropolis with great and well-founded alarm. Soon after ten o'clock on the evening of the 10th of January a fire broke out in the Royal Exchange. The firemen with the engines were promptly on the spot, but owing to an intense frost, great delay was occasioned before their services became effective. Every effort was made to arrest the progress of the flames that practised skill and intrepidity could suggest; but the work of destruction went rapidly on, from room to room and from one story to another, till, with the exception of the outer walls, that fine building, with its various offices and its royal statues, was utterly demolished. It was remarked by those present, that at twelve o'clock, when the flames had just reached the north-west angle of the building, the chimneys struck up, as usual, the old tune "There's nae luck about the house," and continued for about five minutes. The effect was extraordinary; for although the fire was violently raging, and discordant sounds arose in every quarter, the tune was distinctly heard.

For months nothing was talked of but the approaching coronation of Queen Victoria. It was expected to be a splendid spectacle, and so indeed it proved; but the walking procession of all the estates of the realm, and the banquet in Westminster-hall, with all the feudal services attendant thereon, (which distinguished the gorgeous ceremony of George IV. from that of William), were to be wholly dispensed with; it having been discovered that "the cost spoiled the relish;" but in order to make it more stately than the last, the exterior cavalcade was to be increased in splendour and numbers. The 28th of June was the day appointed for the celebration of this august ceremony, and as the procession was to pass through the principal streets, there was scarcely a house or a vacant spot along the whole line from Hyde Park corner, through Piccadilly, St. James's-street, Pall Mall, Cockspur-street, Charing-cross, Whitehall, and Parliament-street, to the Abbey, that was unoccupied with galleries or scaffolding.

At sunrise a royal salute from twelve pieces of artillery stationed in St. James's park announced the auspicious day; after which the 20th regiment of foot and the 5th dragoons took up their station in front of the palace; detachments of the blues and the life-guards, with their respective bands, came at nine; and their appearance was quickly followed by that of twelve of her majesty's carriages, together with the state coach. Then came the carriages of the royal dukes and duchesses; while the various foreign ambassadors formed into line in the Birdcage-walk. At ten o'clock the procession moved in the following order:—The trumpeters and a squadron of the household brigade. The foreign resident ministers and foreign ambassadors, in 32 carriages, many of them most superbly decorated. A detachment of the household brigade, preceded by a mounted band; followed by seven carriages, containing the royal dukes and duchesses, with their attendants. Another mounted band, followed by the queen's forty-eight watermen. Her majesty's twelve state carriages came next; in which were the maids of honour, the lords and grooms in waiting, and other officers of the royal household: closed by a squadron of the horse-guards and a mounted band. The military staff and aides-de-camp, together with a cavalcade of general officers, on horseback,—followed by the royal huntsmen, foresters, grooms with led horses richly caparisoned, the knight marshal and his men, and a hundred yeomen of the guard,—heralded the state coach, drawn by eight cream-coloured horses, and conveying H^{ER} MAJESTY, attended by the mistress of the robes, the duchess of Sutherland, and the master of the horse, the earl of Albemarle; the whole of this magnificent procession being closed by a squadron of the household brigade.

On arriving at the west entrance of the abbey, her majesty was received by the great officers of state, the noblemen bearing the regalia, and the bishops carrying the patina, the chalice and the bible; when her majesty repaired to her robing chamber; and the ladies and officers of the royal household, and others, to whom duties were not assigned in the solemnity, immediately passed to the places prepared for them respectively within the choir. Nothing can be imagined more imposing than the grand religious ceremonies which followed; but we feel that we have already trespassed so far beyond our limits in describing, even thus briefly, the leading features of the procession, that we must leave it to the reader's own imagination to conceive and properly appreciate the superb and solemn spectacle within the sacred pile, where—in the presence of her subjects most dignified in station and venerable in character, and surrounded by all that could be desired of chivalry or adorned by beauty—the young and patriotic maiden queen knelt, and, resting her hand on the Holy Gospels, took the coronation oath; or when the archbishop placed the crown upon her majesty's head, and the people, with loud and repeated shouts, cried "God save the Queen!"

There were 245 peers present, who after severally doing homage, kissed her majesty's hand. When the duke of Wellington performed his homage he was very generally cheered, as was also earl Grey. When the aged lord Rolle came in his turn, an incident occurred that called forth loud plaudits, as evincing a most kind and amiable condescension on the part of the queen. His lordship, from his feeble and infirm state, fell in ascending the steps; whereupon her majesty rose from her seat, extended her hand to him to kiss, and expressed a hope that his lordship was not hurt. This act of royal and gracious kindness was instantly felt and appreciated by all the spectators, who loudly and zealously applauded it. When the peers had done their homage, the members of the house of commons, determined not to be outdone in the manifestation of loyalty, immediately gave voice loud and hearty cheers, accompanied with reiterated cries of "God save queen Victoria!" The assembled multitudes in the galleries, &c. joined in the simultaneous burst of loyalty, till the vaulted roof and arches of the sacred edifice rang with one universal acclamation. During the performance of the homage the choir sung an anthem composed for the occasion, and the treasurer of her majesty's household threw about the coronation medals.

After the whole of the ceremonies had been performed, and the officers had arranged the procession for the return, her majesty, wearing the crown, and bearing the royal sceptre and the orb, accompanied by the princes and princesses of the blood-royal, returned to the royal palace with the same state, and by the same route, as in proceeding to the abbey.

Her majesty entertained a party of one hundred to dinner; the duke of Wellington gave a grand ball, to which 2000 persons were invited; the several ministers gave official state dinners; and that the populace of London and its vicinity might participate in the general rejoicings, a fair was permitted to be holden in Hyde-park for four days; where an area comprising about one-third of the park, well arranged, was occupied by theatres, taverns, exhibitions of all kinds, and stalls for the sale of fancy articles, toys, and sweetmeats. The theatres were also thrown open for gratuitous admission, a balloon ascent took place, fireworks were discharged, and the illuminations were of the most magnificent description.

The coronation festivities gave a great impetus to trade in the metropolis; there being, in addition to the numerous visitors from all parts of the united kingdom, a very considerable number of distinguished foreigners, independent of the gentlemen attached to the different embassies. No one, however, attracted so much notice or received such marked attention as marshal Soult, ambassador extraordinary from the French court; cheers as hearty as those which greeted "the conquering duke" being invariably given wherever he appeared. While on this subject we will not omit to mention a singular incident which soon afterwards occurred. On the 9th of July, a grand review took place in Hyde-park, in presence of her majesty, at which it was thought there were not less than 150,000 persons present. Just as marshal Soult arrived on the ground his stirrup broke; and on his attendant being dispatched to the saddlers to the ordinance, Messrs. Laurie and Co. of Oxford-street, they sent the veteran general the identical stirrups used by Napoleon Buonaparte! Whether the compliment received a suitable acknowledgment from the French marshal, or whether the reflections it suggested were of an agreeable kind, we have no means of ascertaining; but it certainly was one of those circumstances which may be truly called "remarkable." On the 13th the corporation of London gave a grand dinner in Guildhall to all the ambassadors extraordinary and other illustrious foreign visitors: on which occasion, the duke of Wellington and marshal Soult were toasted together, and they both acknowledged the compliment with the greatest cordiality.

A new coinage in gold, silver, and copper, was now issued. The gold consisted of five-pound pieces, double sovereigns, sovereigns, and half-sovereigns; the silver and copper comprised all the usual current coin of those metals; but in none of them was there either the originality or taste displayed that was expected.

A. A. 1839.—Canada again demands our notice. Lord Durham had been sent out with extraordinary powers to meet the exigency of affairs in that colony. It was now admitted that he had exceeded the scope of those powers, by deciding on the guilt of accused men, without trial, and by banishing and imprisoning them; but the ministers thought it their duty to acquiesce in passing a bill, which, while it recited the illegality of the ordinance issued by his lordship, should indemnify those who had advised or acted under it, on the score of their presumed good intentions. The ordinance set forth that "Woolfred Nelson, R. S. M. Bouchette, and others, now in Montreal goal, having acknowledged their treasons and submitted themselves to the will and pleasure of her majesty, shall be transported to the island of Bermuda, not to return on pain of death; and the same penalty is to be incurred by Papineau, and others who have absconded, if found at large in the province. Government had intended merely to substitute a temporary legislative power during the suspension of, and in substitution for, the ordinary legislature; and as the ordinary legislature would not have had power to pass such an ordinance, it was argued that neither could this power belong to the substituted authority.

The passing of the indemnity act made a great sensation as soon as it was known in Canada; and lord Durham, acutely feeling that his implied condemnation was contained in it, declared his intention to resign and return immediately to England; inasmuch as he was now deprived of the ability to do the good which he had hoped to accomplish.

Meanwhile, the Canadas again became the scene of rebellious war and piratical invasion. The rebels occupied Beauharnois and Acadie, near the confluence of the Richelieu and the St. Lawrence, establishing their head-quarters at Napierville; and their forces mustered, at one time, to the number of 8,000 men, generally well armed. Several actions took place; and sir John Colborne, who had proclaimed martial law, concentrated his troops at Napierville and Chateaugay, and executed a severe vengeance upon the rebels whom he found there, burning the houses of the disaffected through the whole district of Acadie. But it was a part of the plan of the traitors and their republican confederates to distract the attention of the British commander and to divide the military force, by invading Upper Canada; and at the moment sir John Colborne was putting the last hand to the suppression of the rebellion in Beauharnois and Acadie, 800 republican pirates embarked in two schooners at Ogdensburg, fully armed, and provided with six or eight pieces of artillery, to attack the town of Prescott, on the opposite side of the river. By the aid of two United States steamers, they effected a landing a mile or two below the town, where they established themselves in a windmill and some stone buildings, and repelled the first attempt made to dislodge them, killing and wounding forty-five of their assailants, among whom were five officers; but on colonel Dundas arriving with a reinforcement of regular troops, with three pieces of artillery, they surrendered at discretion. Some other skirmishes subsequently took place, chiefly between American desperadoes who invaded the British territory and the queen's troops; but the former were severely punished for their temerity. The conduct of sir John Colborne elicited the praise of all parties at home; and he was appointed governor-general of Canada, with all the powers which had been vested in the earl of Durham.

The adjustment of a boundary line, between Maine and New Brunswick, had been a subject of dispute from the time the independence of the States was acknowledged in 1783. Though the tract in dispute was of no value to either claimant generally as likely to become profitable under cultivation, yet some part of it was found necessary to Great Britain as a means of communication between New Brunswick and the Canadas, and thus through all the British colonies. Great Britain had, moreover, since 1783, remained in de facto possession of the desert, as far as a desert can be said to be occupied. At length, however, the state of Maine invaded this debatable land, and several conflicts took place; which for a time seemed likely to involve Great Britain and America in a general war. The colonists showed great alacrity and determination in defending their right to the disputed territory; and it was eventually agreed that both parties were to continue in possession of the parts occupied by them respectively at the commencement of the dispute, until the federal government and Great Britain should come to a definitive arrangement.

The proceedings of parliament had lately been watched with more than ordinary interest, the state of parties being too nicely balanced to insure ministerial majorities on questions affecting certain commercial interests. On the 9th of April leave was given to bring in a bill, on the motion of Mr. Labouchere, to suspend the executive constitution and to make provisions for the temporary government of Jamaica. It appeared that, in consequence of a dispute between the governor of that island and the house of assembly, no public business could be proceeded with; and it was proposed by this bill to vest the government in the governor and a council only—to be continued for five years. When, in the following month, the order of the day for going into committee on the Jamaica bill, was moved, it was opposed by sir R. Peel, in a long and elaborate speech; in which he exposed the arbitrary provisions of the bill, the enormous power it would confer on the governor and commissioners, and the impossibility of imposing an effectual check on the abuse of power exercised at a distance of three thousand miles. In support of the view he had taken, sir Robert alluded to the mode of treating refractory colonies, formerly suggested by Mr. Canning; who had declared that "nothing short of absolute and demonstrable necessity should induce him to moot the awful question of the transcendental power of parliament over every dependency of the British crown; for that transcendental power was an arcanum of empire which ought to be kept back within the generalia of the constitution." After an adjourned debate, May the 6th, the house divided, when there appeared for going into committee 294, against it 289, the majority for ministers being only five. The next day lord John Russell and lord Melbourne stated, that in consequence of this vote, the ministry had come to the resolution to resign, it being evident that with such a want of confidence on the part of so large a proportion of members in the house of commons, and the well-known opposition in the house of lords, it would be impossible for them to administer the affairs of her majesty's government in a manner which could be useful and beneficial to the country.

For one entire week political quidnuncs were kept in a state of feverish excitement or breathless suspense. Tales of arrogance and outraged royalty, dashed with an occasional allusion to whig trickery, travelled with railroad speed along the various channels of public information; but nothing officially transpired till the 13th, when sir R. Peel made a statement of the negotiations relative to the formation of a ministry to which, he said, he had recently been a party. Her majesty first applied to the duke of Wellington, and in consequence of what had then occurred, sir Robert had an interview, and, by desire, employed himself in making a general arrangement for suitably filling the various ministerial appointments. He then stated that a difficulty or misconception arose, which led to his relinquishing his attempt to form an administration. Sir Robert mentioned to the queen his wish to be enabled, with her majesty's sanction, so to constitute her household, that her ministers might have the advantage of a public demonstration of her full support and confidence; and that at the same time, as far as possible, consistently with that demonstration, each individual appointment in the household should be entirely acceptable to her majesty's personal feelings. Sir Robert was anxious to apply a similar principle to the chief appointments which were filled by the ladies of her majesty's household; upon which her majesty was pleased to remark, that she must reserve the whole of those appointments, and that it was her pleasure that the whole should continue as they then were, without any change. The duke of Wellington, in the interview to which the queen subsequently admitted him, understood also that this was her determination. But her majesty's old advisers, lords Melbourne and Russell, construed the matter differently; and laid the onus upon the right honourable baronet, who, according to their version, wanted nothing less than to have a controlling power over the whole establishment. However that might have been, her majesty, it appeared, immediately sent for lord Melbourne, and observing to him that she could not comply with such a stipulation, dispatched the following note to the Tory leader:—

"Buckingham-palace, May 10, 1839.—The queen having considered the proposal made to her yesterday by sir Robert Peel to remove the ladies of her bedchamber, cannot consent to adopt a course which she conceives to be contrary to usage, and which is repugnant to her feelings."

Upon the receipt of this note, sir Robert Peel immediately wrote to the queen, stating his impression with respect to the circumstances which had led to the termination of his attempt to form an administration. "My resignation," said the honourable baronet, as he detailed the circumstances in parliament, "was solely because I understood that her majesty had resolved to retain the whole of the household, as far as the ladies were concerned, and because I felt it impossible for me to conduct the government without the fullest and most unequivocal proof of the royal confidence." The duke of Wellington, in his place in the house of lords, said, he quite agreed with his friend, sir R. Peel, that a minister of the crown was entitled to a control over all the appointments of a queen's household, and that that control became doubly necessary where the offices in every department of the household had been long in the hands of an opposite party. For himself, he would rather suffer any inconvenience than interfere with the comforts of the sovereign; but the step recommended was absolutely demanded by the exigency of the occasion.

Many opinions on this impenetrable mistake were formed and expressed beyond the precincts of parliament which it would be neither wise nor decorous to state; and there were not a few who, when they saw the Melbourne ministry once more safely ennoiced, fancied that the whole transaction might be looked upon as an excellent specimen of whig diplomacy. In the short interval that had elapsed, a great clamour had been raised, and much virtuous indignation displayed, by those who thought themselves exclusively entitled to the appellation of "the queen's friends." Indeed, to a simple observer, it appeared as though a young and innocent queen, who had so lately been the object of a nation's homage, had suddenly fallen from her high estate, and become the object of its pity. However, be that as it might, lord Melbourne and his old coadjutors were once more seated at the helm of state.

One of the first acts of the reinstated ministry was to form a legislative union of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and to continue for two years the powers vested in the governor and special council of Lower Canada by the act previously passed to that effect. Another measure was also carried, after much opposition, namely, to grant the sum of 30,000*l.* for the purposes of public education. And a third, still more interesting to the great body of the public, was an immense reduction in the charge for postage, by the substitution of one uniform rate by weight, instead of increased charges according to the number of pieces of paper contained under one cover. Thus, whatever be the distance, the postage charge for a letter weighing only half an ounce is one penny; 3*d.* if an ounce; 4*d.* if two ounces, and so on.

The fierce and cruel contest that had raged for the last three years in the Spanish peninsula, between the Carlists and Christians, was now virtually terminated by the active and soldier-like conduct of Espartero, the queen's general and chief. The British legion had some time since withdrawn, the queen's party daily gained ground, and Don Carlos had found it necessary to seek refuge in France.

In narrating the affairs of Britain, it will be observed that we are necessarily led, from time to time, to advert to the events which take place in British colonies and possessions, wherever situate and however distant. For a considerable time past the government of India had been adopting very active measures, in consequence of the shah of Persia, who was raised to the throne mainly by British assistance, being supposed to be acting under Russian influence, to the prejudice of this country. Stimulated by Russia, as it appeared, the Persian undertook an expedition to Herat; an important place, to which a small principality is attached, in the territory of Afghanistan. Lord Auckland, the governor-general of India, thereupon determined to send an army of 30,000 men towards Candahar, Caboul, and Herat; and this force was to be joined by about 45,000 men, furnished by Runjeet Singh, the sovereign of the Punjab. In the mean time it appeared that the Persians had suffered great loss at Herat. It was soon afterwards rumoured that the chiefs of Afghanistan were prepared to meet a much stronger force than the Anglo-Indian government, though reinforced by Runjeet Singh, could bring into the field, and that they would listen to no terms of accommodation. The next accounts, however, informed us that the British had entered Candahar, that the difficulties experienced with respect to provisions had vanished, and that the troops were received with open arms. Shah Sojah was crowned with acclamation; and the army proceeded forthwith to Caboul.

On the 21st of September the fort of Joudpore, in Rajpootana, surrendered to the British; and that of Kurnul, in the Deccan, on the 6th of October. The camp of the rajah was attacked by general Willsie, which ended in the total rout of the enemy. A very great quantity of military stores were found in Kurnul, and treasure amounting to nearly 1,000,000*l.* sterling. In the camp an immense quantity of jewels was captured, besides 150,000*l.* in specie. The shah of Persia consented to acknowledge Shah Sojah as king of Afghanistan; but Dost Mahomed, the deposed prince, was still at large, and no doubt existed that a widely ramified conspiracy existed among the native chiefs to rise against the British on the first favourable opportunity.

The country had been much disturbed during the year by large and tumultuous assemblages of the people, of a revolutionary character, under the name of chartists; and many excesses were committed by them in the large manufacturing towns of Manchester, Bolton, Birmingham, Stockport, &c. that required the strong arm of the law to curb. This was alluded to in her majesty's speech, at the close of the session of parliament, as the first attempts at insubordination, which happily had been checked by the fearless administration of the law.

But present appearances were not to be trusted. The insurrectionary movements and outrages in the manufacturing districts of the north had for a time, it is true, been quelled; and ministers boasted that chartism had received its death-blow, or was now but an idle word. But though the flames of sedition were not seen to blaze as before, the embers were still burning, and a mass of inflammable materials was spread abroad, ready to become ignited in a moment. That the friends of order might be lulled into security, there had been none of those public meetings lately, nor any thing to lead the superficial observer to believe but that with the breaking up of the "convention," the charter cause was dead. Secret organization was, however, all the time going on, and a general rising was in contemplation. It was arranged that their active operations should commence in the remote and unguarded districts of South Wales, where the emissaries of "the charter" had obtained considerable influence; and while the country was in a state of alarm and confusion at what was going on in that quarter, other branches of the wide-spread conspiracy were to assemble and make a display of physical force sufficient to overawe the local authorities and astound the government. Thus prepared, on the 2nd of November the men began their march from the "hills" in the neighbourhood of Merthyr, &c., armed with muskets, pikes, swords, crowbars, pickaxes, and whatever other implements they could muster, and proceeded in the direction of Newport in Monmouthshire, marching through the villages and compelling many to join them, till the whole number amounted to nearly 20,000 men. It was their intention to enter Newport in the dead of night, and thus obtain possession of it unresisted; but the rain had continued to descend in torrents, which greatly impeded their progress, and thus happily that part of the design was frustrated. At about four o'clock in the morning of the 4th, the main body of this lawless mob halted at Tredegar park, the seat of sir Charles Morgan. The magistrates of Newport having received private information of the intentions of the rioters, were at this time assembled at the Westgate Arms, where a small party of the 45th foot was stationed; one company of that regiment being all the military force at that time in the town.

The several gatherings of the rioters were under the guidance of certain leaders, the general-in-chief of whom was John Frost, a man respectably situated in life as a tradesman, and who for his zealous advocacy of the "liberal" measures of the day (for he was a noted patriot of the new school) had found favour in the eyes of lord John Russell, who flattered and rewarded him with a magisterial appointment. His son, a mere boy of sixteen, was also the leader of a party. One Jones, a watchmaker at Pontypool, was another of the redoubtable chartist generals, and Zephaniah Williams was a fourth. Such was the state of terrorism inspired by the chartist bands, that many of the peaceable inhabitants of Tredegar, Blackwood, &c., fled from their homes on Sunday, and passed the night in the woods, lest the chartists should kill them. At length they reached Newport, and proceeded at once to the rendezvous of the magistrates at the Westgate Arms, which they assailed and endeavoured to take possession of; but by the excellent arrangement of Mr. T. Phillips, the mayor, and the steady resolution of the soldiers, who were planted in an upper room of the inn, from which they could take good aim, the rioters were successfully resisted, several were killed or wounded, others were made prisoners, and the multitude, with their cowardly instigators, fled from the scene of danger with all imaginable speed.

The conduct of the mayor and his brother magistrates on this trying occasion was above all praise; and it was a source of general regret throughout the country that, in the performance of his perilous duty, the worthy mayor was severely wounded by two musket balls. Fortunately, neither wound proved dangerous, and he subsequently received the honour of knighthood for his seal, skill, and bravery. The whole of the military stationed at the Westgate Arms amounted to only one officer (lieutenant Gray), two non-commissioned officers, and twenty-eight privates!

At a public meeting of the inhabitants of Newport, convened for the purpose of conveying the thanks of the inhabitants to captain Stack's company of the 45th regiment of foot, for "their gallant and steady conduct in resisting and routing on the morning of the 4th of November a large insurrectionary host of armed men, who entered the town with the evident intention of sacking and destroying it, murdering many of its inhabitants, and commencing a revolution in the government of the country," many excellent observations fell from the lips of the speakers; among whom was Mr. Frotheroe, who, commenting on the late outrage, referred to the conduct of the seditious leaders previous to Wat Tyler's rebellion, and quoted from Hume the following apposite passage: "They affected low popularity, went about the country and inculcated on their audiences the principles of the first origin of mankind from one common stock, their equal rights to all the goods of nature, the tyranny of artificial distinctions, and the abuses which had arisen from the degradation of the more considerable part of the species, and the aggrandisement of a few insolent rulers." This, said he, was the language used by the insurgents in Richard the Second's reign, and how similar is it to that held out by the seditious demagogues of the present day!

On the 10th of December a special commission was held at Monmouth for the trial of the chartist rebels at Newport, before Lord-chief-justice Tindal, and the Judges Park and Williams; the chief justice opening the proceedings with a luminous and eloquent charge to the grand jury. Accordingly, on the 12th, true bills were returned against John Frost, Charles Waters, James Aust, William Jones, John Lovell, Zephaniah Williams, Jenkin Morgan, Solomon Britton, Edmond Edmonds, Richard Benfield, John Rees, David Jones, and George Turner (otherwise Coles) for high treason. In order to comply with the forms customary in trials for high treason, the court was then adjourned to Dec. 31, when John Frost was put to the bar. The first day was occupied in challenging the jury; the next day the attorney-general addressed the court and jury on the part of the crown, and the prisoner's counsel objected to the calling of the witnesses, in consequence of the list of them not having been given to the prisoner, Frost, agreeably to the terms of the statute: on the third day the evidence was entered into; and on the eighth day, after the most patient attention of the court and jury, a verdict of guilty was recorded against Frost, with a strong recommendation to mercy. The trials of Zephaniah Williams, and William Jones, each occupied four days, with a like verdict and recommendation. Walters, Morgan, Rees, Benfield, and Lovell pleaded guilty, and received sentence of death, the court intimating that they would be transported for life. Four were discharged; two forfeited their bail; and nine, having pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy and riot, were sentenced to terms of imprisonment not exceeding one year. Frost and the other ringleaders on whom sentence of death had been passed, were finally transported for life.

The spirit of chartism, however, though repressed, was not wholly subdued. Sunday, the 12th of January, had been fixed on for further outbreaks in various parts of the country; but by the precautionary measures of the government and the police, their concerted designs were frustrated. Information was afterwards received that the chartists intended to fire and pillage the town of Sheffield on Sunday morning at two o'clock. They began to assemble, but the troops and constables being on the alert, they succeeded in taking seven or eight of the ringleaders, but not before several persons were severely wounded, three of whom were policemen. An immense quantity of fire-arms of all descriptions, ball-cartridges, iron-bullets, hand-grenades, fire-balls, daggers, pikes, and swords were found, together with a great quantity of crowfoot for disabling horses. The ringleaders were committed to York castle, and at the ensuing spring assizes, were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment of one, two, and three years. At the same time four of the Bradford chartists were sentenced to three years' imprisonment, and three from Barnsley to the term of two years. At the same assizes, Feargus O'Connor was convicted of having published, in the Northern Star newspaper, of which he was the editor and proprietor, certain seditious libels; and the noted demagogue orators, Vincent and Edwards, who were at the time undergoing a former sentence in prison, were convicted at Monmouth of a conspiracy to effect great changes in the government by illegal means, &c., and were severally sentenced to a further imprisonment of 12 and 14 months. In various other places, also—London among the rest—chartist conspirators were tried and punished for their misdeeds.

A. D. 1840.—For the space of two years and a half the British sceptre had been swayed by a "virgin queen." It was therefore by no means surprising that her majesty should at length consider that the cares of regal state might be rendered more supportable if shared by a consort. That such indeed, had been the subject of her royal musings was soon made evident; for, on the 16th of January she met her parliament, and commenced her most gracious speech with the following plain and unaffected sentence:—"My lords, and gentlemen.—Since you were last assembled I have declared my intention of allying myself in marriage with the Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg and Gotha. I humbly implore that the divine blessing may prosper this union, and render it conducive to the interests of my people, as well as to my own domestic happiness."

There could be no reasonable ground for cavilling at her majesty's choice. The rank, age, character, and connexions of the prince, were all in his favour; and the necessary arrangements were made without loss of time. A naturalisation bill for his royal highness was immediately passed; and Lord John Russell moved a resolution authorizing her majesty to grant 50,000*l.* a-year to the prince for his life. This was generally thought to be more than sufficient; and Mr. Hume moved as an amendment, that the grant be 21,000*l.*; however, on a division there was a majority of 267 against the amendment. Upon this, Colonel Sibthorp moved a second amendment, substituting 30,000*l.*, which was supported by Mr. Goulburn, Sir J. Graham, and Sir R. Peel, who considered 30,000*l.* a just and liberal allowance for the joint lives of the queen and the prince, and for the prince's possible survivorship, should there be no issue; if an heir should be born, then the 30,000*l.* might properly be advanced to 50,000*l.*; and, should there be a numerous issue, it would be reasonable to make a still further increase, such as would best the father of a large family of royal children. Those events would justify the augmentations, by giving a guarantee for the prince's permanent residence in, and attachment to, this country. He showed the inapplicability of the precedents in the cases of queens-consort, and unadverted upon the instance of prince Leopold's 50,000*l.*; as the whole country had cried out that that allowance was excessive; and on the house again dividing, the numbers were, for the amendment 262, for the motion 183; majority against ministers 104.

On the 6th of the ensuing month (February), the bridegroom elect, conducted by viscount Torrington, and accompanied by the duke his father, and his elder brother, arrived at Dover; and on the 10th, "the marriage of the queen's most excellent majesty with field-marshal his royal highness Francis Albert Augustus Charles Emanuel, duke of Saxe, prince of Saxe-Cobourg and Gotha, K.G. was solemnized at the chapel royal, St. James's." The processions of the royal bride and bridegroom were conducted on a style of splendour suitable to the occasion. The duke of Sussex gave away his royal niece; and at that part of the service where the archbishop of Canterbury read the words, "I pronounce that they be man and wife together," the park and Tower guns fired. In the afternoon her majesty and the prince proceeded to Windsor Castle, a banquet was given at St. James's palace to the members of the household, which was honoured by the presence of the duchess of Kent, and the reigning duke and hereditary prince of Saxe-Coburg; and the day was universally kept as a holiday throughout the country; grand dinners were given by the cabinet ministers; and in the evening the splendid illuminations of the metropolis gave additional eclat to the hymeneal rejoicings.

For many months past there had been an interruption to those relations of amity and commerce which for a long period had been maintained between this country and China. It originated in the determination on the part of the Chinese government to put an end to the importation of opium into the "celestial empire," and to the opposition made to that decree by the British merchants engaged in that traffic. Early in the preceding year a large quantity of opium, belonging to British merchants, was given up, on the requisition of Mr. Elliott, the queen's representative at Canton, to be destroyed by the Chinese authorities. The quantity seized was upwards of twenty thousand chests, which was supposed to be worth two millions; and Mr. Elliott pledged the faith of the government he represented that the merchants should receive compensation.

The English government was naturally desirous to keep on good terms with a country from which so many commercial advantages had been derived; but the Chinese authorities daily grew more arrogant and unreasonable, and several outrages against the English were committed. At length, in an affray between some seamen of the Volage and the Chinese, one of the latter was killed; and on captain Elliot having refused to deliver up the homicide to commissioner Lin, the most severe and arbitrary measures were immediately taken to expel all the British inhabitants from Macao. This hostile conduct was quickly followed by an outrage of a still more serious character. The Black Joke, having on board one passenger, a Mr. Moss, and six Lascars, was obliged to anchor in the Lantaod passage, to wait for the tide. Here she was surrounded by three mandarin boats, by whose crews she was boarded; five of the Lascars butchered,—and Mr. Moss shockingly mutilated. These proceedings gave rise to further measures of hostility. On the 4th Sept. captain Elliot came from Hong Kong to Macao in his cutter, in company with the schooner Pearl, to obtain provisions for the fleet. The mandarins, however, on board the war-junks opposed their embarkation, when captain Elliot intimated that if in half an hour the provisions were not allowed to pass, he would open a fire upon them. The half hour passed, and the gun was fired. Three war junks then endeavoured to put to sea, but were compelled by a well-directed fire of the cutter and the Pearl to seek shelter under the walls of Coloon fort. About six o'clock the Volage frigate hove in sight, and the boat of captain Douglas, with twenty-four British seamen, attempted to board the junk, but without success. The boat's crew then opened a fire of musketry, by which a mandarin and four Chinese soldiers were killed, and seven wounded. The result, however, was, that the provisions were not obtained, and that the Chinese junks escaped; while, instead of any approach to a better understanding between the two countries, it was regarded rather as the commencement of a war; which, indeed, the next news from China confirmed.

On the appearance of another British ship, the Thomas Coutts, at Whampoa, commissioner Lin renewed his demand for the surrender of the murderer of the Chinese, and issued an edict commanding all the British ships to enter the port of Canton and sign the opium bond, or to depart from the coast immediately. In case of non-compliance with either of these conditions, within three days, the commissioner declared he would destroy the entire British fleet. On the publication of this edict captain Elliot demanded an explanation from the Chinese admiral Kawn, who at first pretended to enter into a negotiation, but immediately afterwards ordered out twenty-nine war junks, evidently intending to surround the British ships. The attempt, however, ended in five of the junks being sunk, and another blown up, each with from 150 to 200 men on board; and on the rest making off, captain Elliot ordered the firing to cease.

A decree was now issued by the emperor prohibiting the importation of all British goods, and the trade with China was consequently at an end; but the American ships arrived and departed as usual. In the meantime preparations on a large scale were making in India to collect and send off a large force to China, so as to bring this most important quarrel to an issue. Several men of war and corvettes, from England and various foreign stations, were also got ready, and the command given to admiral Elliot, to give the expedition all the assistance and co-operation possible. The object of these preparations, as was stated by lord John Russell in the house of commons, was, in the first place, to obtain reparation for the insults and injuries offered to her majesty's subjects by the Chinese government; in the second place, to obtain for the merchants trading with China an indemnification for the loss of their property incurred by threats of violence offered by persons under the direction of the Chinese government; and, in the last place, to obtain a certain security that persons and property, in future trading with China, shall be protected from insult or injury, and that their trade and commerce be maintained on a proper footing. We shall hereafter have occasion to show the progress of the armament destined for China, and its results. The account we have here given was deemed necessary in order to show the origin of the dispute. Return we now to matters of domestic interest.

On the 1st of June his royal highness prince Albert presided at the first anniversary meeting of the "society for the extinction of the slave trade," held at Exeter-hall. The prince, in his opening address, "deeply regretted that the benevolent and persevering exertions of England to abolish that atrocious traffic in human beings, at once the desolation of Africa and the blackest stain upon civilized Europe, had not hitherto led to any satisfactory conclusion; but he trusted that this great country would not relax in its efforts until it had finally and for ever put an end to a state of things so repugnant to the spirit of Christianity, and to the best feelings of our nature." Many excellent speeches followed, and a liberal subscription was entered into.

A great sensation was caused in the public mind by an attempt to assassinate the queen. On the 10th of June, as her majesty was starting for an evening drive, up Constitution-hill, in a low open carriage, accompanied by prince Albert, a young man deliberately fired two pistols at her, but happily without effect. His name proved to be Edward Oxford, the son of a widow who formerly kept a coffee-shop in Southwark. He was about eighteen years of age, and had been lately employed as a pot-boy in Oxford street, but was out of place. He was instantly seized, and sent to Newgate on a charge of high treason; but it appearing on his trial (which lasted two days) that there were grounds for attributing the act to insanity, and as there was no positive proof that the pistols were loaded, the jury returned a verdict of "guilty, but that at the time he committed the act he was insane." The consequence was, that he became an inmate of Bethlem for life, as was the case with Hatfield, who forty years before fired off a pistol at George III. in Drury-lane theatre.

The murder of lord William Russell by Courvoisier, his Swiss valet, had just before excited considerable interest. The crime was committed at his lordship's residence in Norfolk-street, Park-lane, early in the night, and the murderer had employed the remainder of the night in carefully destroying all marks which could cast suspicion upon himself, and in throwing the house into a state of confusion, in order that it might bear the appearance of having been broken into by burglars. Nor would it have been an easy matter to have convicted him on circumstantial evidence, had not a missing parcel of plate been discovered on the very day the trial commenced, which it appeared he had left some days before the murder with Madame Ploane, the keeper of an hotel in Leicester-square.

It is some time since we have had occasion to notice any thing relative to French affairs; but an event transpired in August which we cannot well omit. On the 6th of that month Louis Napoleon, (son of the late king of Holland, and heir male of the Buonaparte family,) made an absurd attempt to effect a hostile descent upon the coast of France. He embarked from London in the Edinburgh Castle steamer, which he had hired from the Commercial Steam Navigation Company, as for a voyage of pleasure, accompanied by about fifty men, including general Montholon, colonels Voisin, Laborde, Montauban, and Farquin, and several other officers of inferior rank. They landed at a small port about two leagues from Boulogne, to which town they immediately marched, and arrived at the barracks about five o'clock, just as the soldiers of the 42nd regiment of the line were rising from their beds. At the first moment the soldiers were a little staggered, as they understood a revolution had taken place in Paris, and they were summoned to join the imperial eagle. One of their officers, however, having hurried to the barracks, soon relieved the men from their perplexity, and they acknowledged his authority. Louis Napoleon drew a pistol, and attempted to shoot the inopportune intruder; but the shot took effect upon a soldier, who died the same day. Finding themselves thus foiled, the Buonapartists took the Calais road to the colonne de Napoleon, upon the top of which they placed their flag. The town authorities and national guard then went in pursuit of the prince, who, being intercepted on the side of the column, made for the beach, with the view to embark and regain the packet in which he had arrived. He took possession of the life-boat; but scarcely had his followers got into it when the national guard also arrived on the beach and discharged a volley on the boat, which immediately upset, and the whole company were seen struggling in the sea. In the meantime the steam packet was already taken possession of by the lieutenant of the port. The prince was then made prisoner, and about three hours after his attempt on Boulogne, he and his followers were safely lodged in the castle. From Boulogne he was removed to the castle of Ham, and placed in the rooms once occupied by prince Polignac. On being tried and found guilty, Louis Napoleon was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in a fortress; count Montholon, twenty years' detention; Parquin and Lombard, the same period; others were sentenced to shorter periods; Aldenize was transported for life; and some were acquitted.

The insane attempt to excite a revolutionary movement in France, above described, probably owed its origin to the very "liberal" permission granted by Louis Philippe, and the no less liberal acquiescence of the English ministers, to allow the ashes of the emperor Napoleon to be removed from St. Helena, in order that they might find their last resting-place in France. This had undoubtedly raised the hopes of many a zealous Buonapartist, who thought that the fervour of the populace was likely to display itself in a violent émeute, which the troops would be more ready to favour than to quell. A grant of a million of francs had been made to defray the expenses of the expedition to St. Helena, (which was to be under the command of prince de Joinville), the funeral ceremony, and the erection of a tomb in the church of the Invalides; so that, in the language of the French minister of the interior, "his tomb, like his glory, should belong to his country!" The prince arrived at Cherbourg, with his "precious charge," on the 30th of November; and on the 15th of December Napoleon's remains were honoured by a splendid funeral procession, the king and royal family being present at the ceremony, with 60,000 national guards in attendance, and an assemblage of 500,000 persons. It was observed at the time of Buonaparte's exhumation, that his features were so little changed that his face was recognised by those who had known him when alive; and the uniform, the orders, and the hat which had been buried with him, were very little changed. It was little contemplated when the body was deposited in "Napoleon's Valley," at St. Helena, that it would ever be removed; nay, it seems that especial care was taken to prevent such an occurrence; for we read, that after having taken away the iron railing which surrounded the tomb, "they then removed three ranges of masonry, and came to a vault eleven feet deep, nearly filled with clay; a bed of Roman cement then presented itself, and underneath was another bed, ten feet deep, bound together with bands of iron. A covering of masonry was then discovered five feet deep, forming the covering of the sarcophagus."

We conclude this year's occurrences with the accomplishment of her majesty queen Victoria, who on the 21st of November gave birth at Buckingham palace to a princess, her first-born child; and on the 10th of February the infant princess royal was christened Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa.

A. D. 1841.—During the past year the attention of the great European powers had been drawn to the condition of Syria and Turkey; and an alliance was entered into between England, Russia, Austria, and Prussia to put an end to the dispute which existed between the sultan and Mehemet Ali, the warlike pacha of Egypt. For this purpose it was deemed expedient to dispatch a fleet to the Mediterranean; and on the 14th of August commodore Napier summoned the Egyptian authorities to evacuate Syria. In reply to this summons Mehemet Ali declared that on the first appearance of hostility in the powers of Europe, the pacha Ibrahim would be commanded to march on Constantinople. Soon afterwards hostilities commenced, and the town of Beyrout was bombarded on the 11th of September, and completely destroyed by the allies in two hours. The war in Syria was now carried on with great activity. The troops of Ibrahim sustained a signal defeat early in October, with the loss of seven thousand in killed, wounded, and prisoners; in addition to which, commodore Napier, with a comparatively trifling number of marines and Turkish troops, succeeded in expelling the Egyptians from nearly the whole of Lebanon, captured about 5,000 prisoners, with artillery and stores, and effected the disorganization of an army of 20,000 men. In short, more brilliant results with such limited means have rarely, if ever, been known, particularly when it is considered under what novel circumstances they were accomplished. But the great exploit remains to be related.

St. Jean d'Acre was taken by the allies on the 3rd of November. Colonel Smith, who commanded the forces in Syria, directed Omar Bey, with 2,000 Turks, to advance on Tyre, and occupy the passes to the northward of Acre; in the mean time admiral Stopford sailed from Beyrout roads, having on board 3,000 Turks, and detachments of English artillery and sappers. The forces and fleet arrived off Acre at the same hour. At two o'clock p. m. a tremendous cannonade took place, which was maintained without intermission for some hours; the steamers lying outside throwing, with astonishing rapidity, their shells over the ships into the fortification. During the bombardment the arsenal and magazine blew up, annihilating upwards of 1,200 of the enemy, forming two entire regiments, who were drawn up on the ramparts. A sensation was felt on board the ships similar to that of an earthquake. Every living creature within the area of 60,000 square yards ceased to exist. the garrison were leaving the place; and as soon as the sun rose, the British, Austrian, and Turkish flags were seen waving on the citadel. The town was found to be one mass of ruins,—the batteries and houses riddled all over—the killed and wounded lying about in all directions. The slain were estimated at 2,500 men, and the prisoners amounted to upwards of 3,000. The Turkish troops were landed to garrison Acre, where a vast quantity of military stores were found; besides an excellent park of artillery of 200 guns, and a large sum in specie.

As the foregoing successes led to the termination of the war in Syria, and its evacuation by Ibrahim Pacha, it is unnecessary to enter into operations of a minor character. Mehmet Ali eventually submitted to all the conditions offered by the sultan, and which were sanctioned by the representatives of Austria, France, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia:—1. The hereditary possession of Egypt is confirmed to Mehmet Ali, and his descendants in a direct line.—2. Mehmet Ali will be allowed to nominate his own officers up to the rank of a colonel. The viceroy can only confer the title of pacha with the consent of the sultan.—3. The annual contribution is fixed at 80,000 purses, or 40,000,000 of piastres, or 400,000—4. The viceroy will not be allowed to build a ship of war without the permission of the sultan.—5. The laws and regulations of the empire are to be observed in Egypt, with such changes as the peculiarity of the Egyptian people may render necessary, but which changes must receive the sanction of the Porte.

At the commencement of the year news was brought from China that the differences which had existed were in a fair train of settlement, and that the war might be considered as at an end. Hostilities had, however, recommenced, in consequence of Keshen, the imperial commissioner, having delayed to bring to a conclusion the negotiations entered into with captain Elliot. Preparations were accordingly made for attacking the outposts of the Bogue forts, on the Bocca Tigris. Having obtained possession, the steamers were sent to destroy the war junks in Anson's bay; but the shallowness of the water admitted only of the approach of the Nemesis, towing ten or twelve boats. The junks endeavoured to escape, but a rocket blew up a powder magazine of one of them, and eighteen more which were set on fire by the English boats' crews also successively blew up. At length a flag of truce was dispatched by the Chinese commander, and hostilities ceased. On the 20th of January captain Elliot announced to her majesty's subjects in China that the following arrangements had been made:—1. The cession of the island and harbour of Hong Kong to the British crown. 2. An indemnity to the British government of 6,000,000 dollars, 1,000,000 dollars payable at once, and the remainder in equal annual instalments, ending in 1846. 3. Direct official intercourse between the two countries upon an equal footing. 4. The trade of the port of Canton to be opened within ten days after the Chinese new year.

Thus far all appeared as it should be; but great doubts of the sincerity of Keshen, the Chinese commissioner, were felt both here and at Canton. Accordingly the Nemesis steamer was sent up the river to reconnoitre, and on nearing the Bogue forts (30 in number) it was discovered that preparations for defence had been made; batteries and field-works had been thrown up along the shore, and upon the islands in the middle of the river; a barrier was in course of being constructed across the channel, and there were large bodies of troops assembled from the interior. Keshen finding his duplicity discovered, communicated that further negotiations would be declined. The emperor, it appeared, had issued edicts repudiating the treaty, and denouncing the English barbarians, "who were like dogs and sheep in their dispositions." That in sleeping or eating he found no quiet, and he therefore ordered 8000 of his best troops to defend Canton, and to recover the places on the coast; for it was absolutely necessary (said the emperor) "that the rebellious foreigners must give up their heads, which, with the prisoners, were to be sent to Peking in cages, to undergo the last penalty of the law." He also offered 50,000 dollars for the apprehension of Elliot, Morrison, or Lamartine, or 30,000 dollars for either of their heads. In addition, 5,000 dollars for an officer's head, 500 for an Englishman alive, 500 for a head, and 100 for a Sepoy alive. The emperor also delivered Keshen in irons over to the board of punishment at Peking, and divested the admiral Kwan Teenpei of his button. Before the hostile edicts had appeared, captain Elliot, confiding in the good faith of Keshen, had sent orders to general Burrell to restore the island of Chusan (which we had taken many months before) to the Chinese, and to return with the Bengal volunteers to Calcutta. This order had been promptly obeyed; Chusan having been evacuated Feb. 29.

Capt. Elliot set sail on Feb. 20, up the Canton river. On the 24th he destroyed a masked field-work, disabling eighty cannon there mounted. On the 25th and 26th he took three adjoining Bogue forts, without losing a man, killing about 250 Chinese, and taking 1,300 prisoners. The subsequent operations of the squadron presented one unbroken succession of brilliant achievements; until, on the 28th of March, Canton, the second city in the Chinese empire, containing a million of souls, was placed at the mercy of the British troops. Every possible means of defence had been used by the Chinese commanders; but nothing could withstand the intrepidity of the British. In consequence of the Chinese firing on a flag of truce, the forts and defences of Canton were speedily taken, the flotilla burnt or sunk, and the union jack hoisted on the walls of the British factory. But Capt. Elliot seemed doomed to be made the sport of Chinese duplicity. He no sooner issued a circular to the English and foreign merchants,—announcing that a suspension of hostilities had been agreed on between the Chinese commissioner Yang and himself, and that the trade was open at Canton, and would be duly respected,—than the emperor issued another proclamation, ordering all communication with “the detestable brood of English” to be cut off. Several other imperial proclamations in a more furious style followed; the last of which thus concludes:—“If the whole number of them (the English) be not effectually destroyed, how shall I, the emperor, be able to answer to the gods of the heaven and the earth, and cherish the hopes of our people.” Capt. Elliot, however, whose great object hitherto appears to have been to secure the annual export of tea, had succeeded in having 11,000,000 lbs. shipped before the fulminating edicts of the emperor took effect.

In October, dispatches of great importance were received from general Sir Hugh Gough, commanding the land forces, and captain sir H. F. Senhouse, the senior naval officer of the fleet, detailing a series of brilliant operations against Canton, whither they had proceeded by the direction of Capt. Elliot. On the 20th of May the contest began by the Chinese firing on the British ships and letting loose some fire-ships among them, which, however, did no damage. Next morning the fort of Sham-ling was silenced, and a fleet of about forty junks burnt. On the 24th, a favourable landing-place having been discovered, the right column of the 26th regiment, under major Pratt, was conveyed by the Atalanta to act on the south of the city; while the Neimesis towed the left column up to Tsing-hae. After some sharp fighting, the Canton governor yielded, and the troops and ships were withdrawn, on condition of the three commissioners and all the troops under them leaving Canton and its vicinity, and 6,000,000 of dollars to be paid within a week, the first million before evening that day; if the whole was not paid before the end of the week, the ransom was to be raised to 7,000,000; if not before the end of fourteen days, to 8,000,000; and if not before twenty days, to 9,000,000 dollars. After three days, the conditions having been fulfilled, the troops left for Hong Kong, having had 13 men killed and 97 wounded. Sir H. F. Senhouse died on board the Blenheim from a fever brought on by excessive fatigue. Notwithstanding this defeat, the Chinese were still determined to resist, and Yeh Shan had reported to the emperor, his uncle, that when he had induced the barbarians to withdraw, he would repair all the forts again. The emperor, on his part, declared that, as a last resort, he would put himself at the head of his army, and march to India and England, and tear up the English root and branch!

Sir Henry Pottinger, the new plenipotentiary, and rear-admiral Parker, the new naval commander-in-chief, arrived at Macao on the 9th of August. A notification of sir Henry's presence and powers was sent to Canton immediately on his arrival, accompanied by a letter forwarded to the emperor at Peking, the answer to which was required to be sent to a northern station. The fleet, consisting of nine ships of war, four armed steamers, and twenty-two transports, sailed for the island and fortified city of Amoy on the 21st of August.

This island is situated in a fine gulf in the province of Fokien, the great tea district of China, opposite the island of Formosa, and about 350 miles north-east of the gulf of Canton, 500 miles south of Chusan, and 1,300 miles from Peking. It was fortified by very strong defences, of granite rocks faced with mud, and mounted with no less than 500 pieces of cannon. On the 26th, after a brief parley with a mandarin, the city was bombarded for two hours. Sir Hugh Gough, with the 18th regiment then landed, and seized one end of the long battery; whilst the 26th regiment, with the sailors and marines, carried the strong batteries on the island of Koolangsee, just in front of Amoy. The Chinese made an animated defence for four hours, and then fled from all their fortifications, and also from the city, carrying with them their treasures. The Chinese junks and war-boats were all captured; and the cannon, with immense munitions of war, of course fell into the hands of the English. Not a single man of the British was killed, and only nine were wounded. The next day sir Hugh Gough entered the city at the head of his troops without opposition.

The next dispatches from China stated that Chusan had been recaptured on the 1st of October. A more resolute stand than usual was made by the Chinese; but the troops, supported by the fire of the ships, ascended a hill, and escaladed Ting-hae, the capital city, from whence the British colours were soon seen flying in every direction. On the 7th the troops attacked the city of Cinhae, on the mainland opposite Chusan, which is inclosed by a wall thirty-seven feet thick, and twenty-two feet high, with an embasured parapet of four feet high. The ships shelled the citadel and enfiladed the batteries; the seamen and marines then landed, and admiral sir W. Parker, with the true spirit of a British sailor, was among the first to scale the walls. Here was found a great arsenal, a cannon foundry and gun-carriage manufactory, and a great variety of warlike stores.

Several other engagements took place, in all of which the British continued to have a most decided advantage, although it was admitted that the Chinese and Tartar soldiers shewed more resolution and a better acquaintance with the art of war than on former occasions. However, as a large reinforcement of troops, with a battering train which had been sent from Calcutta, was shortly expected, sir Henry Pottinger put off the execution of some intended operations on a more extended scale until their arrival.

Home affairs again require our attention. The finances of the country had latterly assumed a most discouraging aspect; and on the chancellor of the exchequer bringing forward his annual budget, he proposed to make up the deficiency of the present year, which he stated to be 3,421,000*l.*, besides the aggregate deficiency of 5,000,000*l.*, mainly by a modification of the duties on sugar and timber, and an alteration of the duties on corn. The opposition, generally, censured the proceedings of ministers; and sir Robert Peel commented severely on the enormous deficiency of 7,500,000*l.* incurred during the past five years, with a revenue too which had been throughout improving. It appeared that the Melbourne administration was on the wane; and its permanency was put to the test when lord John Russell, in moving that the house should go into a committee of ways and means in order to consider the sugar duties, entered into a defence of the present policy of government. Lord Sandon then moved the amendment of which he had given notice, "that considering the efforts and sacrifices which parliament and the country have made for the abolition of the slave trade and slavery, with the earnest hope that their exertions and example might lead to the mitigation and final extinction of those evils in other countries, this house is not prepared (especially with the present prospects of the supply of sugar from British possessions) to adopt the measure proposed by her majesty's government for the reduction of the duties on foreign sugars." The debate which hereupon ensued was adjourned from day to day, and lasted for the unprecedented extent of eight nights. When the house divided, on the 18th of May, there appeared for lord Sandon's amendment, 317; against it, 281; majority against ministers, 36.

On the 27th of May sir R. Peel took an opportunity of minutely reviewing the various measures that had been submitted to parliament by ministers, and afterwards abandoned, and the prejudicial effects on the finances of the country which had accrued from the passing of others. Sir Robert added, that in every former case where the house had indicated that its confidence was withdrawn from the ministry, the ministers had retired. The whole of their conduct betrayed weakness and a servile truckling for popular favour; and the prerogatives of the crown were not safe in their hands. He then moved the following resolution "That her majesty's ministers do not sufficiently possess the confidence of the house of commons to enable them to carry through the house measures which they deem of essential importance to the public welfare, and that their continuance in office, under such circumstances, is at variance with the spirit of the constitution." This motion was carried in a full house, (the number of members present being 623,) by a majority of one. On the 22nd of June her majesty prorogued parliament, "with a view to its immediate dissolution," and it was accordingly dissolved by proclamation on the following day.

On the meeting of the new parliament (August the 24th) the strength of the conservative party was striking. The ministers had no measures to propose beyond those on which they had before sustained a defeat; and when an amendment to the address was put to the vote, declaratory of a want of confidence in her majesty's present advisers, it elicited a spirited debate of four nights' continuance, terminating in a majority of 91 against ministers. This result produced, as a matter of course, an immediate change in the ministry. The new cabinet was thus constituted:—Sir R. Peel, first lord of the treasury; duke of Wellington, (without office); lord Lyndhurst, lord chancellor; lord Warrack, president of the council; duke of Buckingham, privy seal; right hon. H. Goulburn, chancellor of the exchequer; sir James Graham, home secretary; earl of Aberdeen, foreign secretary; lord Stanley, colonial secretary; earl of Haddington, first lord of the admiralty; lord Ellenborough, president of the board of control; earl of Ripon, president of the board of trade; sir Henry Hardinge, secretary at war; sir Edward Knatchbull, treasurer of the navy and paymaster of the forces. Earl de Grey was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and sir Edward Sugden, Irish lord chancellor.

Some ordinary business being disposed of, sir R. Peel proposed to defer till after Christmas the measures he thought necessary to equalize the expenditure and the revenue, and the plans of ministers for meeting the commercial difficulties of the country; and the first session closed on the 7th of October.

On the 30th of October the inhabitants of London were alarmed by a destructive fire in the Tower, which broke out about half-past ten o'clock at night, and continued to rage with the utmost fury for several hours. It was first discovered in the round or bowyer tower, and quickly spread to the grand armoury, where the flames gained a fearful ascendancy, and presented an appearance at once grand and awful. Notwithstanding the exertions of the firemen and the military, the conflagration continued to spread, and apprehensions were entertained that the jewel tower, with its crowns, sceptres, and other emblems of royalty deposited there, would fall a prey to the devouring element. Happily, by prompt exertion, they were all taken to the governor's residence; and the gunpowder and other warlike stores in the ordnance office, from which the greatest danger was to be apprehended, were also removed. In addition to the armoury and bowyer tower, three other large buildings were entirely consumed. The grand armoury was 345 feet long, and 60 feet broad. In the tower floor were kept about forty-three pieces of cannon, made by foundries of different periods, besides various other interesting objects, and a large number of chests containing arms in readiness for use. A grand staircase led to the upper floor, which was all one room, and called the small armoury, in which were above 150,000 stands of small arms, new flinted, and ready for immediate service. As that part of the building where the fire originated was heated by flues from stoves, it was the general opinion that the accident was thereby occasioned. The loss sustained, including the expense of rebuilding, was estimated at about 250,000*l*.

The closing paragraph in the occurrence of last year recorded the birth of the princess royal. We have now to state, that on the 9th of November the queen gave birth to a prince at Buckingham-palace; nearly a twelvemonth having elapsed since her majesty's former accouchement! The happy event having taken place on lord mayor's day, it was most loyally celebrated by the citizens so opportunely assembled. On the 25th of the following January the infant prince of Wales received the name of Albert Edward, the king of Prussia being one of the sponsors.

A. D. 1842.—The year commenced with most disastrous intelligence from India. In consequence of reductions having been made in the tribute paid to the eastern Ghizie tribes, for keeping open the passes between Caboul and Jellalabad, in Afghanistan, the people rose and took possession of those passes. Gen. sir R. Sale's brigade was therefore directed to re-open the communication. The brigade fought its way to Gundamuck, greatly harassed by the enemy from the high ground, and, after eighteen days' incessant fighting, reached that place, much exhausted; they then moved upon Jellalabad. Meantime an insurrection broke out at Caboul. Sir A. Burnes, his brother lieut. C. Burnes, lieut. Broadfoot, and lieut. Sturt were massacred. The whole city then rose in arms, and universal plunder ensued—whilst another large party attacked the British cantonments, about two miles from the town. These outrages, unfortunately, were but the prelude to others far more frightful. Akhbur Khan, the son of Dost Mahomed, on pretence of making arrangements with sir W. McNaughten, the British envoy at the court of Shah Soojah, invited him to a conference; he went, accompanied by four officers and a small escort; when the treacherous Afghan, after abusing the British ambassador, drew a pistol and shot him dead on the spot. Capt. Trevor, of the 3rd Bengal cavalry, on rushing to his assistance, was cut down, three other officers were made prisoners, and the mutilated body of the ambassador was then barbarously paraded through the town. It was also stated that some severe fighting had taken place, but under the greatest disadvantage to the British and native troops, and that the army in Caboul had been almost literally annihilated. A capitulation was then entered into, by which the remainder of the Anglo-Indian army retired from the town, leaving all the sick, wounded, and sixteen ladies, wives of officers, behind. They had not, however, proceeded far before they were assailed from the mountains by an immense force, when the native troops, having fought three days, and wading through deep snow, gave way, and nearly the whole were massacred.

So terrible a disaster had never visited the British arms since India first acknowledged the supremacy of England. A fatal mistake had been committed by the former government, and it was feared that all the energy of the new ministry would be insufficient to maintain that degree of influence over the vast and thickly peopled provinces of India, which was necessary to ensure the safety of our possessions. The governor-general, lord Auckland, was recalled; and his place supplied by lord Ellenborough, whose reputation for a correct knowledge of Indian affairs was undisputed. His lordship arrived at Calcutta on Feb. 28; at which time sir Robert Sale was safe at Jellalabad; but he was most critically situated. The garrison, however, maintained their post with great gallantry, and were able to defy the utmost efforts of the Affghans, having in one instance repelled forth and attacked their camp, of 6,000 men, and gained a signal victory. At length general Pollock effected a junction with the troops of sir R. Sale, and released them from a siege of 154 days' duration; having previously forced, with very little loss, the dreaded pass of the Khyber, twenty-eight miles in length. Gen. Nott also, who advanced from Candahar to meet general England, who had sustained considerable loss at the pass of Kojack, encountered a large force of Affghans, and completely defeated them. But, on the other hand, colonel Palmer surrendered the celebrated fortress of Ghuznee, on condition that the garrison should be safely conducted to Caboul.

The day of retribution was now at hand. General Nott, at the head of 7,000 men, having left Candahar on the 10th of August, proceeded towards Ghuznee and Caboul; while general England, with the remainder of the troops lately stationed at Candahar, marched back in safety to Quetta. On the 30th of August Shah Shodeen, the governor of Ghuznee, with nearly the whole of his army, amounting to not less than 12,000 men, arrived in the neighbourhood of the British camp; and general Nott prepared to meet him with one half of his force. The enemy came boldly forward, each division cheering as they came into position, and occupying their ground in excellent style; but after a short and spirited contest, they were completely defeated, and dispersed in every direction; their guns, tents, ammunition, &c. falling into the hands of the English. On the 31st of September general Nott invested the city of Ghuznee, which was strongly garrisoned, while the hills to the north-eastward swarmed with soldiery; but they soon abandoned the place, and the British flags were hoisted in triumph on the Bala Hisar. The citadel of Ghuznee, and other formidable works and defences were razed to the ground.

Early in September general Pollock marched from Gundannuck on his way to Caboul. On reaching the hills which command the road through the pass of Jugdalluck, the enemy was found strongly posted and in considerable numbers. In this action most of the influential Afghan chiefs were engaged, and their troops manfully maintained their position; but at length the heights were stormed, and, after much arduous exertion, they were dislodged and dispersed. General Pollock proceeded onwards, and does not appear to have encountered any further opposition until his arrival, Sept. 13, in the Teshzar valley, where an army of 16,000 men, commanded by Akbar Khan in person, was assembled to meet him. A desperate fight ensued; the enemy was completely defeated and driven from the field. On the day following this engagement the general advanced to Boodkhaik and on the 16th he made his triumphal entry into the citadel, and planted the British colours on its walls. "Thus," said lord Ellenborough, in his general orders, "have all past disasters been retrieved and avenged on every scene on which they were sustained, and repeated victories in the field, and the capture of the cities and citadels of Ghuznee and Caboul have advanced the glory and established the accustomed superiority of the British arms."

At length the long and anxiously desired liberation of the whole of the British prisoners in the hands of the Afghans was effected. Their number was 31 officers, 9 ladies, and 12 children, with 51 European soldiers, 2 clerks, and 4 women, making in all 109 persons, who had suffered captivity from Jan. 10 to Sept. 27. It appeared that, by direction of Akbar Khan, the prisoners had been taken to Bamceen, 90 miles to the westward, and that they were destined to be distributed amongst the Toorkistan chiefs. General Pollock and some other officers proposed to the Afghan chief, that if he would send them back to Caboul, they would give him 2,000*l.* at once, and 1,200*l.* a year for life. The chief complied, and on the second day they were met by sir Richmond Shakespear, with 610 Kuzzilbaahes, and shortly afterwards by general Sale, with 2,000 cavalry and infantry, when they returned to Caboul. Besides the Europeans, there were 327 sepoy found at Ghuznee, and 1,200 sick and wounded who were begging about Caboul. On the arrival of general Nott's division, the resolution adopted by the British government to destroy all the Afghan strongholds was carried into execution; though not without resistance, particularly at the town and fort of Istaliff, where a strong body of Afghans, led on by Amer Gola, and sixteen of their most determined chiefs, had posted themselves. This town consisted of masses of houses built on the slope of a mountain, in the rear of which were lofty eminences, shutting in a dale to Toorkistan. The number of its inhabitants exceeded 15,000, who, from their defences and difficulties of approach, considered their possession unassailable. The greater part of the plunder seized last January from the British was placed there; the chiefs kept their wives and families in it; and many of those who had escaped from Caboul had sought refuge there. Its capture, however, was a work of no great difficulty; the British troops driving the enemy before them with considerable slaughter. The Anglo-Indian troops soon afterwards commenced their homeward march in three divisions; the first under general Pollock, the second under general McSkall, and the third under general Nott. The first division effected their march through the passes without loss; but the second was less successful, the mountaineers attacking it about Ali-Musjid, and plundering it of part of the baggage. General Nott, with his division, arrived in safety; hearing with them the celebrated gates of Sonnuath, which, it is said, a Mahometan conqueror had taken away from an Indian temple, and which, during nearly eight centuries, formed the chief ornament of its tomb at Ghuznee.

The Niger expedition, as it was termed, which was undertaken last year by benevolent individuals, supported by a government grant of 60,000*l.*, was totally defeated by the pestilential effects of the climate. The intention was, to plant in the centre of Africa an English colony, in the hope, by the proofs afforded of the advantages of agriculture and trade, to reclaim the natives from the custom of selling their captives into slavery.

Among the various domestic incidents which diversify a nation's annals, none excite such lively interest or give birth to such a spontaneous burst of loyal feeling, as outrages directed against the life or welfare of a beloved sovereign. On the 30th of May, as her majesty, accompanied by prince Albert, was returning down Constitution-hill to Buckingham-palace, from her afternoon's ride, a young man, named John Francis, fired a pistol at the carriage, but without effecting any injury. He was immediately taken into custody, when it appeared that he was by trade a carpenter, but being out of employ, had attempted to establish a snuff-shop, in which he was unsuccessful. It was supposed that he was incited to this criminal act partly by desperation, and partly by the éclat and permanent provision (though in an apartment at Bedlam) awarded to Edward Oxford, who, it will be remembered, performed a similar exploit at nearly the same spot in June, 1840. The news reached the house of commons while the debate on the third reading of the property tax was in progress; which was suddenly stopped, and the house broke up. The next day, however, the bill was again proposed, and carried by a majority of 106.

jeaty on her happy escape, was presented from both houses of parliament on the 1st of June, and a form of thanksgiving was sanctioned by the privy council. It appeared that some danger had been apprehended in consequence of the same person having been observed in the park with a pistol on the preceding day; and lord Portman stated in the house of lords that her majesty in consequence would not permit, on the 30th of May, the attendance of those ladies whose duty it is to wait upon her on such occasions. Francis was examined before the privy council, and then committed to Newgate; he was tried, found guilty of high treason, and sentenced to be hung, beheaded, and quartered; but it was deemed proper to remit the extreme penalties of treason, and commute his sentence to transportation for life.

Scarcely more than a month had elapsed, when a third attempt, or pretended attempt, on the life of the queen was made in St. James's park, her majesty being at the time on her way from Buckingham palace to the chapel royal, accompanied by prince Albert and the king of the Belgians. A lad, about eighteen years of age, named John William Bean, was observed to present a pistol at her majesty's carriage, by a youth named Dasset, who seized him, and related the circumstance to two policemen. They treated it as a joke, and Bean was allowed to depart; but he was subsequently apprehended at his father's house, and committed to prison. On his examination he persisted in asserting that there was nothing but powder and paper in the pistol, and that he did not intend to hurt the queen; in fact, he appeared to be one of those weak and thoughtless beings, who, regardless of the consequences, seem always actuated by a morbid desire of notoriety.

It was evident that the false and reprehensible sympathy shewn to Oxford had encouraged others in their base attempts; and sir Robert Peel, acting on that conviction, introduced a bill into parliament for the better security of her majesty's person: his object being to consign the offenders to that contempt and to that sort of punishment which befitted their disgraceful practices. The bill was so framed as to indict for the offences of presenting fire-arms at her majesty, or striking or attempting to strike her person with missiles, and for various other acts of violence intended to alarm her majesty, or disturb the public peace, the penalty of seven years' transportation, with previous imprisonment and a good flogging, or other bodily chastisement.

Her majesty having signified her intention of visiting Scotland this summer, she and prince Albert embarked at Woolwich Aug. 29, in the Royal George yacht, commanded by lord Adolphus Fitzclarence. During their progress every tower and beacon along the coast vied in demonstrations of loyalty. Her majesty arrived Sept. 1; and on landing, proceeded direct to Dal-keith palace, the authorities of Edinburgh not being prepared for her reception at so early an hour as nine in the morning. On the 3rd her majesty made her public entry into Edinburgh, and was received at Holyrood palace by the royal body-guard of archers, commanded by the earl of Dalhousie. On the 5th the queen held a levee in Dalkeith palace, which was attended by an extraordinary concourse of the nobility of Scotland. On the 6th the royal party proceeded by sea towards the north; and dined and slept at Seone palace, the seat of the earl of Mansfield. On the 7th the queen departed from Seone for Taymouth castle, the seat of the marquis of Breadalbane. At Dunkeld she was received by a gallant array of lord Glenlyon's clansmen, 1,000 in number; and on her majesty's approach to Taymouth castle, a striking display was made of "bonnie laddies" in their national costume. A splendid discharge of fire-works greeted her arrival; and the evening was passed in the exhibition of Highland dancing on a platform formed under the windows of the castle. The next day a deer-stalking, in which 150 men were employed, was undertaken for the entertainment of prince Albert, who, doubtless, felt himself more agreeably employed in killing a score of roe deer, than he would have been if engaged in feats of arms with hardy Scotchmen. The royal visitors having honoured several other noblemen with their presence, and partaken of the amusements peculiar to the country, departed highly gratified; and re-embarking on the 15th, in two days reached Windsor castle.

We must once more recur to the warlike operations in China. After the arrival of reinforcements, the British expedition on the 13th of June entered the large river called Yang-tze-Kiang, on the banks of which were immense fortifications. The fleet at daylight having taken their stations, the batteries opened a fire, which lasted two hours. The seamen and marines then landed, and drove the enemy out of the batteries before the troops could be disembarked. 253 guns were here taken, of heavy calibre, and 11 feet long. On the 19th two other batteries were taken, in which were 48 guns. The troops then took possession of the city of Shanghai, destroyed the public buildings, and distributed the treasures among the people. Two other field-works were also taken, and the total of the guns captured amounted to the astonishing number of 364. The squadron set sail from Woosung on the 6th of July; on the 20th the vessels anchored abreast of the city of Ching-Keang-foo, which commands the entrance of the grand canal, and the next morning the troops were disembarked, and marched to the attack of the Chinese forces. One brigade was directed to move against the enemy's camp, situated about three miles distant; another was ordered to co-operate with this division in cutting off the expected retreat of the Chinese from the camp; while the third received instructions to scale the northern wall of the town.

The Chinese, after firing a few distant volleys, fled from the camp with precipitation, and dispersed over the country. The city itself, however, was manfully defended by the Tartar soldiers, who prolonged the contest for several hours, resisting with desperate valour the combined efforts of the three brigades, aided by a reinforcement of marines and seamen. At length opposition ceased, and ere nightfall the British were complete masters of the place. Ching-Keang-foo, like Amoy, was most strongly fortified, and the works in excellent repair.
It is supposed that the garrison consisted of not less than 3,000 men, and of these about 1,000 and 40 mandarins were killed and wounded. The Tartar general retired to his house when he saw that all was lost, made his servants set it on fire, and sat in his chair till he was burned to death. On the side of the British, 15 officers and 154 men, of both services, were killed and wounded.

A strong garrison being left behind for the retention of Ching-keang-foo, the fleet proceeded towards Nankin, about 40 miles distant, and arrived on the 6th of August, when preparations were immediately made for an attack on the city. A strong force, under the command of major-general Lord Saltoun, was landed, and took up their position to the west of the town; and operations were about to be commenced, when a letter was sent off to the plenipotentiary, requesting a truce, as certain high commissioners, specially delegated by the emperor, and possessed of full powers to negotiate, were on their way to treat with the English. After several visits and long discussions between the contracting powers, the treaty was publicly signed on board the Cornwallis, by sir H. Pottinger and the three commissioners. Of this convention the following are the most important articles:—1. Lasting peace and friendship between the two empires. 2. China to pay 21 millions of dollars in the course of that and three succeeding years. 3. The ports of Canton, Amoy, Foo-choo-foo, Ningpo, and Shanghai, to be thrown open to British merchants, consular officers to be appointed to reside at them, and regular and just tariffs of import and export (as well as inland transit) duties to be established and published. 4. The island of Hong-Kong to be ceded in perpetuity to her Britannic majesty, her heirs, and successors. 5. All subjects of her Britannic majesty (whether natives of Europe or India,) who may be confined in any part of the Chinese empire, to be unconditionally released. 6. An act of full and entire amnesty to be published by the emperor under his imperial sign manual and seal to all Chinese subjects, on account of their having held service or intercourse with, or resided under, the British government or its officers. 7. Correspondence to be conducted on terms of perfect equality amongst the officers of both governments. 8. On the emperor's assent being received to this treaty, and the payment of the first instalment, 6,000,000 dollars, her Britannic majesty's forces to retire from Nankin and the grand canal, and the military posts at Chinghai to be also withdrawn; but the islands of Chusan and Kolangsoo are to be held until the money payments and the arrangements for opening the ports be completed.

A. D. 1843. — On the 2nd of February the parliamentary session commenced; the royal speech, which was read by the lord chancellor, referring in terms of just congratulation to—1. The successful termination of hostilities with China, and the prospect it afforded of assisting the commercial enterprise of her people. 2. The complete success of the recent military operations in Afghanistan, where the superiority of her majesty's arms had been established by decisive victories on the scenes of former disasters; and the complete liberation of her majesty's subjects, for whom she felt the deepest interest, had been effected. 3.
The adjustment of those differences with the United States of America, which from their long continuance had endangered the preservation of peace. 4. The obtaining, in concert with her allies, for the Christian population of Syria an establishment of a system of administration which they were entitled to expect from the engagements of the Sultan, and from the good faith of this country. And, 5. A treaty of commerce and navigation with Russia, which her majesty regarded as the foundation for increased intercourse between her subjects and those of the emperor.

At the beginning of the year the perpe-tration of a crime, which was in some measure regarded as of a political character, excited the indignant feelings of the public. As Edward Drummond, esq., private secretary to sir Robert Peel, was walking from Downing-street towards Charingcross, he was shot through the back by a man, who was seized by a policeman just as he was about to discharge a second pistol. It was at first hoped that the wound was not mortal, but after lingering five days Mr. Drummond expired. The assassin was Daniel M'Naughten, aged 28, late a wood-turner at Glasgow; and it appeared that, although he had never received the slightest provocation, either real or imaginary, he had long harboured the design of taking the life of the premier, for whom he had mistaken Mr. Drummond. On his trial before lord chief justice Tindal, the absence of all motive for committing the detestable act being admitted, it was attempted to be shewn that he was of unsound mind; and the idea of his being a monomaniac being supported by the opinions of Dr. Munro and other medical men, the judge stopped the trial, and the jury consequently returned a verdict of "Not guilty, on the ground of insanity." A theory more dangerous than that of attributing the commission of heinous crimes to monomania can scarcely be conceived; and the sensation of alarm produced by this culprit's acquittal was both just and natural.
To return, however, to Indian affairs.

When the expedition to Afghanistan was first undertaken, it was intended to open the Indus for the transit of British merchandise, and render it one of the great highways to Asia. The object was not lost sight of, though Afghanistan had been abandoned; and endeavours were made to obtain from the Ameers of Scinde such a treaty as would secure the safe navigation of that river. In December, major Outram was dispatched to Hyderabad to conclude the best terms in his power with the native chiefs. Not being in a condition immediately to refuse to give up for the use of the navigation certain strips of land lying along the river, they temporised until at length their troops were collected, when on the 14th of February they sent word to major Outram to retire from their city. The major, not supposing they would proceed to extremities, delayed. The next day the residence of the British political agent was attacked; it was gallantly defended by 100 men for several hours; but at length their ammunition having been expended, the British soldiers retired with a small loss to the steamers, and proceeded to join sir C. J. Napier, then at the head of about 2,700 men, at a distance of about 20 miles from the capital of the Ameers. The latter hastened at the head of 22,000 men to attack the British force. On the 17th a battle took place, in which, after a severe struggle of three hours, the Ameers were totally routed, although they outnumbered the British force by seven to one. The Ameers on the following day surrendered themselves prisoners of war, and Hyderabad was occupied by the conquerors. Treasure and jewels were found to an amount considerably exceeding one million sterling. In consequence of this success, the territories of Scinde, with the exception of that portion belonging to Meer Ali, the morad of Khyrpore, have been declared by the governor-general to be a British province, and sir Charles J. Napier was appointed governor.

The new governor, however, was not to remain in undisturbed possession for any length of time. An army of Beloochees, twenty thousand strong, under the command of Meer Shere Mahomed, had taken up a strong position on the river Fullahie, near the spot where the Ameers of Scinde were so signally defeated, and sir C. J. Napier, on ascertaining the fact, resolved to attack them forthwith. On the 24th of March he moved from Hyderabad at the head of 5,000 men. The battle lasted for three hours, when victory declared for the British; eleven guns and nineteen standards were taken; about 1,000 of the enemy were killed, and 4,000 wounded; the loss of the British amounting to only 30 killed and 231 wounded. By this victory the fate of Scinde and Beloochistan was sealed, and the whole territory finally annexed to the Anglo-Indian empire.

In an age of experimental science like the present, where the wonders of nature seem scarcely to rival those of art, it appears almost invidious in a work of this kind to allude to any. In truth, our limits have compelled us to omit the mention of many works of national importance, of which the country has reason to be proud; and we trust to be excused for such omissions, while we insert the following. In order to save the vast amount of manual labour necessary to form a sea wall on the course of the south-eastern railway, near Dover, the great experiment of exploding 18,500 lbs. or 8½ tons of gunpowder, under Round-down cliff, was on the 26th of January attempted by the engineers, with perfect success. On the signal being given, the miners communicated, by connecting wires, the electric spark to the gunpowder deposited in chambers formed in the cliff; the earth trembled for half a mile each way; a stifled report, not loud, but deep, was heard, and the cliff, extending on either hand to upwards of 500 feet, gradually subsided seaward; in a few seconds, not less than 1,000,000 tons of chalk were dislodged by the shock, settling into the sea below, frothing and boiling as it displaced the liquid element, till it occupied the expanse of many acres, and extended outward on its ocean bed to a distance of two or three thousand feet. This operation was managed with such admirable skill and precision, that it would appear just so much of the cliff was removed as was necessary to make way for the sea-wall, while an immense saving in time and labour was also effected.

Now that we have trespassed on the province of art and alluded to its wonders, we cannot forbear to notice that wonderful and gigantic undertaking, the Thames Tunnel. For twenty years that stupendous labour had been going on, when on the 25th of May it was opened for foot passengers, at one penny each. At a recent meeting of the proprietors, a vote of thanks was offered to the engineer in the following terms:—"That the cordial thanks and congratulation of the assembly are hereby tendered to sir Isambert Brunel, F. R. S., for the distinguished talent, energy, and perseverance evinced by him in the design, construction, and completion of the Thames Tunnel, a work unprecedented in the annals of science and ingenuity, and exhibiting a triumph of genius over physical difficulties, declared by some of the most enlightened men of the age to be insurmountable." This great work was commenced in 1825, but stopped in 1828 by an irruption of the Thames, and no further progress was made until 1835. Loans were then granted by government, and the works were uninterruptedly continued, the total expense being 446,000*l.*

On the 21st of April, his royal highness the duke of Sussex died. On the 25th the queen was safely delivered of a princess, who was christened Alice Maud Mary. And on the same afternoon that the queen gave birth to a princess, the king of Hanover arrived in London, in a steamer from Calais, it being his majesty's first visit to England since his accession.

A GENERAL "STRIKE" OF THE WELSH MINERS ADDED TO THE DISTURBANCES.

England.—House of Brunswick.—Victoria.

On the 28th of June the princess Augusta, eldest daughter of the duke of Cambridge, was married to his royal highness Frederick William, hereditary grand duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz. A grant of 3,000*l.* per annum was settled on her by the government, and in a few days after the marriage they embarked for the continent.

In Carmarthenshire and some of the neighbouring Welsh counties, a novel species of insurrection had for a long time past kept that part of the country in a state of alarm, and rendered military assistance necessary. Certain small farmers, and the agricultural population generally, united (under the slogaric appellation of "Rebecca and her daughters") for the avowed object of resisting the payment of turnpike tolls, which are notoriously exorbitant there, and for the abatement of certain other grievances—the present administration of the poor laws being among the number—of which they loudly, and with no little show of justice, complained. Scarcely a night was suffered to pass without the removal of a gate or the demolition of a toll-house; and it usually happened that as soon as the work of destruction was completed, Rebecca's band quietly and stealthily dispersed to their respective homes. It will be sufficient to give merely one instance of these riots; but we should remark that the account of the riot we here enjoin was on a much larger scale, and attended with more serious results than any that occurred either before or since.—They were expected to attack the town of Carmarthen on Sunday the 18th of June, but did not come. On the following morning, however, at 12 o'clock, several thousand of the rioters were seen approaching, about 900 being on horseback, with one in front disguised with a woman's curls, to represent Rebecca, and from 7,000 to 8,000 on foot, walking about fourteen or fifteen abreast. Every man was armed with a bludgeon, and some of them had pistols. At their head were carried two banners, bearing inscriptions in Welsh, of "Freedom, Liberty, and Better Feed;" and "Free Toll and Liberty." On reaching the work-house, they broke open the gates of the court in front, and having gained an entrance into the house, they immediately demolished the furniture, and threw the beds and bedding out of the windows. While they were thus pursuing the work of destruction, a troop of the 4th light dragoons arrived from Neath, and having entered the court, succeeded in taking all those within prisoners, about 250 in number, during which time they were pelted with stones and other missiles. The riot act being read, and a cry being raised that the soldiers were going to charge, the mob fled in every direction, leaving more than sixty horses, besides the above prisoners, in the hands of the captors.

With respect to the proceedings in parliament, it may be stated, that a great portion of the session was occupied in discussing the merits, or rather in opposing the re-enactment of the "Irish arms bill." On the second reading, May the 20th, the attorney-general for Ireland declared that the objects of the present repeal agitators were, first, the total abolition of the tithes commutation rent-charge; next, the extension of the parliamentary suffrage to all sane male adults not convicted of a crime; next, fixity of tenure—a phrase meaning the transfer of the whole landed property of Ireland from the landlord to the tenant; and some other extreme propositions of the same class. The measures provided by this bill had been in existence with little intermission for almost a century, and the extreme avidity shewn by the Irish peasantry for the possession of arms proved its necessity to be most cogent. For about a month, almost every alternate evening was occupied with discussions in committee on the said bill. Afterwards a motion was brought forward by Mr. O'Brien for "the redress of grievances in Ireland," the debate on which was again and again adjourned, till at length the motion was negatived. On that occasion, sir R. Peel discussed the alleged grievances seriatim; and in reply to an observation of lord Howick's, he said that the Roman catholics now enjoyed equal civil rights as the other subjects of the crown, and that the oaths were so altered that the offensive portions relating to transubstantiation were abolished. "I am asked," said the right honourable baronet, "what course I intend to pursue? 'Declare your course,' is the demand. I am prepared to pursue that course which I consider I have pursued, namely, to administer the government of Ireland upon the principles of justice and impartiality. I am prepared to recognise the principle established by law, that there shall be equality of civil privileges. I am prepared in respect of the franchise to give a substantial and not a fictitious right of suffrage. In respect to the social condition of Ireland we are prepared also—but that is a matter for legislation, and we all feel that no partial legislation will be proper or effective—we are prepared to consider the relations of landlord and tenant deliberately and all the important questions involved therein. With respect to the established church, we are not prepared to make one alteration in the law by which that church and its revenues shall be impaired. He was not ashamed to act with care and moderation; and if the necessity should arise, he knew that past forbearance was the strongest claim to being entrusted with fuller powers when they thought proper to ask for them." On the 9th of August, the third reading of the Irish arms bill was carried by a majority of 66.

During the remainder of the session many other acts were passed, among them the following:—The church of Scotland benefices' bill. The poor relief bill for Ireland. The Irish municipal corporations' bill. The Chelsea pensioners' bill, empowering government to call out and arm the out-pensioners of Chelsea hospital if thought necessary. The episcopal functions bill. The defamation and libel bill.

Parliament was prorogued on the 24th of August by the queen in person; on which occasion her majesty expressed herself highly gratified with the advantageous position in which the country was placed by the successful termination of the war in China and India, and with the assurances of perfect amity which she continued to receive from foreign powers. At the same time she viewed with the deepest concern the persevering efforts that were made to stir up discontent and disaffection in Ireland, and to excite her Irish subjects to demand a repeal of the union. The laws were administered with strict justice and impartiality, and it was the duty of all her subjects to discountenance the present system of pernicious agitation. It was her majesty's sincere conviction that the legislative union was not less essential to the comfort and prosperity of the people, than it was to the strength and stability of the empire; and it was her firm determination to maintain inviolate that great bond of connexion between the two countries.

When her majesty and prince Albert returned from their visit to Scotland last year, it was generally understood that their next marine excursion would be to Ireland; and it is believed that the royal intention was abandoned with considerable regret, owing to the rise and rapid progress of the repeal agitation, so insidiously instilled into the minds and hearts of the Irish by the wily demagogue and his jesuitical satellites. There was, however, no reason that the queen of England and her illustrious consort should, on that account, be debarred from enjoying the healthful recreation of a short summer voyage—now so commonly indulged in by thousands of her subjects; and the necessary preparations had accordingly been made for an excursion round the western coast. At that precise moment the prince de Joinville and the duke d'Anmale, sons of Louis Philippe, arrived in England, and with all speed posted off to Windsor; but as they returned to France with even more haste than they came, conjecture was busy in attempting to discover the cause; and, as a matter of course, it was attributed to something politically wrong in their estimation at the English court. Now it happened that Espartero, the ex-regent of Spain, had just reached this country, and had been introduced to and graciously received by her majesty; and as it was believed that France had been secretly engaged in promoting the disensions in Spain which led to Espartero's downfall, no other hypothesis was sought for. But just as this solution of the enigma became current, it was ascertained that the French princes had merely crossed the channel as the bearers of a pressing invitation from their royal father, that the queen of England and her illustrious consort would embrace the opportunity which so seasonably offered of spending a few days, en famille, at his favourite chateau or palace of Eu, on the coast of Normandy.

No interview between the reigning sovereigns of England and France had taken place since the days of old, when our "bluff Harry" and his gallant knights met Francis and his chivalry on "the field of the cloth of gold." That was a gorgeous display of costly grandeur, in which two gay and youthful monarchs strove to excel each other. The present meeting was unattended with pomp or ceremony—a mere interchange of friendly civilities, dictated by pure good feeling on the part of Louis Philippe, and responded to by her majesty with reciprocal frankness and cordiality.

Soon after her Majesty's return from France, she made a trip to Belgium, accompanied by her royal consort. Nothing was neglected that could show honour and respect to the royal visitors, and they appeared to appreciate and fully enjoy the various entertainments prepared for them.

"The progress of the Queen through Belgium," said a contemporary writer, "is an event totally unexampled in history, when considered with the friendly nature of her visit, and the manner of her reception every where and by all classes of the population. It has exceeded as far as cordiality, good feeling, the honours prepared spontaneously by the people of the great cities and villages through which she has passed, any thing that the records of former days detail. Not Queen Elizabeth, in her progress through England, was received in so welcome, so noble, and so national a manner as Queen Victoria has been, in a land to which till now she was a stranger."

Scotland presented this year the melancholy spectacle of a disruption in her national church. Since the reign of Queen Anne, the right of presentation to parishes had lain with the heritors or landed proprietors, or other so-called patrons; but in 1834 the General Assembly had passed an act, giving a veto on the appointment to the majority of heads of families in the parishes. This act, however, having been pronounced to be illegal by the courts of law, the leaders of the dominant party in the Assembly determined to secede from the church. Accordingly on the first day of the meeting of the General Assembly in May, the ministry and elders, members of that body, opposed to the right of patronage and in favour of the veto, having given in a protest, retired to a separate place of meeting, and constituted themselves, and such as might afterwards adhere to them, into a body to be denominated the Free Church of Scotland. Within a few weeks, 470 clergymen seceded from the establishment and joined the Free Church, together with nearly a third of the whole Scottish population. Whatever may be thought of its wisdom, this proceeding evinced but too well the sincerity and zeal which animated the seceders. The voluntary abandonment by so many individuals of their homes and incomes, rather than hold them by compromising what they believed to be a fundamental principle, reflects the highest credit on the Scottish church and character.

England. — House of Brunswick. — Victoria. 513

Towards the close of this year, the affairs of Ireland assumed a serious aspect. Mr. O'Connell, who had long not only vauntingly prophesied the repeal of the union, but boasted that Ireland would see her own independent parliament legislating in Dublin by the approaching Christmas, now determined on active measures for the accomplishment of his designs. For a long time previous, his delusive promises had been echoed throughout the land; and the exultation of his supporters and followers — priestly as well as secular — at the prospect of so soon obtaining "Ireland for the Irish," was as extravagant, as his harangues and proclamations were artful, insulting, and fulsome.

It was too apparent, at the same time, to escape observation, that while he boasted of preserving the peace, and charged the government with attempting to overawe the people by the presence of the military, the mighty "gatherings" of repealers were conducted to the ground, in companies and detachments, with all the precision and regularity of disciplined bodies. At Tara, Mullaghmet, and many other places, these monster meetings had thus displayed their "moral" strength. At length, great preparations having been made for holding a repeal meeting at Clontarf, near Dublin, on Sunday the 13th of October, 1843, which was expected to be one of immense magnitude, the lord-lieutenant, with the lord-chancellor, and other members of the Irish government, suddenly held a council at the castle on Saturday, and published a proclamation, denouncing repeal agitation, and confining all persons from attending the Clontarf meeting, on pain of being proceeded against according to law. Meaning fresh troops, in considerable numbers, arrived from England; and at Mr. O'Connell's bidding the meeting was abandoned!

But, notwithstanding this, government issued a warrant for the arrest of nine of the leading agitators: viz. Daniel O'Connell, John O'Connell, Thomas M. Ray, Thomas Steele, Dr. Gray, Richard Burnett, Charles G. Duffy, Rev. Mr. Tyrrell, P. P., and Rev. James Tierney, P. P., all of whom had taken a conspicuous part in recent repeal meetings. The offence with which all these persons were charged was a conspiracy to excite disaffection and contempt among Her Majesty's subjects, and amongst others, those serving in the army and navy; to excite unlawful opposition to the government by the demonstration of physical force; and to bring into contempt the legal tribunals of the country by usurping the queen's prerogative in the establishment of courts for the administration of the law. They were also charged with endeavouring to forward those objects by seditious speeches and libels, and with soliciting and obtaining from different parts of the United Kingdom, as well as from foreign countries, diverse large sums of money. The whole of the parties were then held to bail, to take their trials in the Queen's Bench, Dublin.

We have no space to enter into a detail of the judicial proceedings which followed; but we must say that so numerous were the objections, and so technical the arguments, which were brought forward by the professional phantoms employed to defend the "travellers," that it seemed for a long time doubtful whether the trial would ever be brought to a close. The arguments were, however, combated seriatim by the counsel for the crown, the objections overruled by the judges, and a verdict of Guilty was at length recorded against all of them, except the Rev. Mr. Tierney, who had been previously discharged. Daniel O'Connell was sentenced to one year's imprisonment, to pay a fine of 2000*l.*, and to find bondsmen for his good behaviour for five years from the expiration of the term of his imprisonment; the rest to nine months each and a fine of 50*l.*, and all to find sureties for keeping the peace after their terms of duration had expired. Against this judgment an appeal was made to the House of Lords on a "writ of error." Regarding the question as one of law rather than fact, the Peers, instead of themselves adjudicating, referred the subject in the first instance to the English judges, who severally delivered their opinions on the different counts of the indictments, &c., the decision of the majority being in affirmation of the proceedings of the Irish Court. It then (on the 3rd of September, 1844) came before the Peers, when the "law lords," consented to leave the decision of this most important national question to the "law lords," of whom there were only five. Of these, two voted against, and three in favour of the prisoners; thus abrogating all that had been done in vindication of the offended laws, and leaving the question of "repeal" open for future strife and contentious disputation!

A. D. 1844. — At the commencement of this year, the affairs of the kingdom generally wore an improving aspect; trade and manufactures were reviving; internal tranquillity had in a great measure been restored; and the revenue was in a comparatively flourishing state; in short, no cloud appeared to darken the political horizon, save that portentous one which still enshrouded Ireland.

On the 1st February Her Majesty opened the parliament in person. The royal speech referred with pride to our late successes in India; to the establishment of commercial relations with China; and to the good understanding which subsisted between the government and all foreign powers; while the commercial and manufacturing prosperity of the country formed a subject for equal congratulation. It also earnestly recommended the adoption of such measures as might tend to improve the social condition of Ireland, and develop its natural resources; but at the same time emphatically declared Her Majesty's firm determination to maintain inviolate the legislative union between that country and Great Britain. The address was carried by a very large majority; and Sir Robert Peel (who in his speech advocated corn-law protection, and dwelt on the advantages of his "sliding-scale" over Lord John Russell's proposition for a "fixed duty") concluded by maintaining that his past measures had fulfilled the expectations he had held out, and that he now met Parliament under greatly improved circumstances both at home and abroad.

Indian affairs shortly afterwards formed the subject of parliamentary discussion; and the thanks of both Houses were voted to Sir Charles Napier and the army employed in Scinde, for their unbounded zeal and gallantry—the Duke of Wellington taking the opportunity of complimenting Sir Charles in the strongest terms, and declaring that he never knew an instance in which a general officer showed in a higher degree all the qualifications which were necessary for the conduct of great operations. This just tribute to the merits of an old and distinguished military officer was quickly followed by an event inseparably connected with the reputation and stability of our Indian empire. From some cause, never thoroughly made public, the East India directors thought proper to recall Lord Ellenborough, the governor-general. This nobleman had only been appointed to that important post about two years: his acts had met with the decided approbation of government, and it was generally supposed that his policy had given satisfaction to the court of directors. But it appeared that the contrary was the fact; and as various enactments had secured to them the undoubted right to recall the governor-general whenever they might think fit, they exercised that right on the present occasion, not only without the consent of Her Majesty's ministers, but in opposition to their well-known sentiments. This conduct gave rise to various conjectures, and became the subject of considerable animadversion; and the Duke of Wellington, as one of the chief members of the government, did not hesitate to characterise it as the most indiscreet exercise of power he had ever known. It was necessary, however, that a new governor-general should be sent out without delay: the office was accordingly tendered to Sir Henry Hardinge; and the directors, anxious to conciliate the ministry, readily acquiesced in his appointment.

And now the subject of Irish affairs for a time continued to engross the attention of parliament, to the exclusion of almost all other business. On a motion brought forward by Lord John Russell for a committee of the whole House on the state of Ireland, the debate was continued, by adjournment, for nine nights, and ultimately rejected by a majority of 99. In the course of this protracted discussion frequent reference was made to the recent trial and conviction of Daniel O'Connell and his coadjutors (but which we need not farther allude to here, the subject having been noticed in the concluding paragraph of the history of the preceding year). About the same time, another measure of relief to the Roman Catholic body was obtained by a bill for the abolition of a number of penal acts—many of which were obsolete, although they were still retained on the statute-book. Several long debates also took place on motions for the limitation of the hours of labour in factories; that question exciting much controversy, but leading to no satisfactory result.

The discussions on the subjects of free trade and the corn-laws, which had occu-pled so large a share of the attention of both Houses in former sessions, did not this year engage so much of the time of Parliament. Mr. Cobden, however, brought it before the House, by moving for a committee to inquire into the effects of protective duties on agricultural tenants and labourers. He argued that the gainers by the present law were not the farmers, but the speculators; and he denied that corn could be grown abroad, or conveyed from foreign countries hither, at rates ruinous to the English agriculturist. Mr. Villiers, and other members favourable to free-trade principles, strongly dwelt upon the effect of the repeal of the corn laws in giving additional employment in manufacturing districts: but the motion was lost by a majority against it of 91.

When the chancellor of the exchequer exhibited his financial statement, it was seen that the revenue very considerably exceeded the expenditure; and a fact so gratifying was hailed with joy, and looked upon as a happy presage of still increasing prosperity by the public in general; while it enabled him not only to propose the reduction of those stocks which bore the highest rate of interest, but also the remission of certain taxes. Long and anxious discussions on the Sugar Duties bill next engaged the attention of Parliament, and the ministers sustained a defeat by a majority of 20; but, on the 17th of June, Sir Robert Peel called on the House to reconsider their late decision; when they recovered from their "false position," by obtaining a rather larger majority than the one by which they had been outvoted.

It will be seen, from what has already been mentioned that the legislature had been far from idle during this session; but no measure that had yet been brought forward equalled in magnitude, as regards the great interests it involved, or which was calculated to produce such effects upon the commercial and monetary transactions of the kingdom, as the bill, introduced by Sir R. Peel, for the regulation of the Bank of England, and for the administration of banking concerns in general. By an act of Parliament passed in 1833, it was provided, that the charter for securing certain privileges to the Bank of England should expire in 1835, but reserving to the legislature the power of giving six months' notice, to revise the charter 10 years earlier; and this the prime minister signified his intention of now doing. On a subject so extensive, and embracing such abundant details, we cannot pretend to give more than a faint outline; but it is incumbent on us to state, that the ability with which he introduced the subject, and the lucid arguments by which he supported it, not only riveted the attention and admiration of the House, but tended to confirm an opinion which at that time very generally prevailed, that Sir Robert Peel was, of all public men, the one most capable of directing the financial operations of a great commercial country. He proposed that there should be an actual separation of the two departments of issue and banking, in the Bank of England; and that there should be different officers to each, and a different system of account: that the banking business of the Bank should be governed

Notwithstanding the warmest professions of sincerity between the governments of France and Great Britain had been reciprocated for the last three years, it was plainly to be seen that among a large portion of the French people there existed a latent jealousy against "perfidious Albion," as the democratic press chose to term our sea-girt home. That M. Guizot and his compatriots had no share in encouraging this odious feeling, our government was well aware of; but the policy of Philippe was nevertheless, in the hands of the political demagogues, a fruitful source of political friction. The friendship of the two nations was shown by all his words and actions. But still there was a formidable war party in France—a restless, discontented class, whose pugnacious valour seemed to be unappeasable by any thing short of an appeal to arms. At one time, indeed, a pretext for coming to an open rupture appeared on the eve of presenting itself. Queen Poinaré, the sovereign of Tahiti, had, by a treaty in 1842, placed her dominions under the protection of France, and in 1845 she had accepted of the cession of French territory, an act which appeared to have been disastrous to the natives; and the French experienced considerable difficulty, which they attributed to the intrigues of English missionaries resident in the island. Admiral Dupetit Thouars insisted that the Queen should hoist the French flag, in token of the French sovereignty; and on her refusal to comply, troops and seamen were landed to take possession in the name of the King of the French, and M. d'Abnigny was appointed governor. On the 10th of May, 1846, the French frigate, Uranie, having been sent to reach Europe, the act was at once disavowed by the French government. A Mr. Pritchard, who had gone out originally to this distant island in the Pacific as a missionary, had been acting as British consul there; and though he had notified to the English government his wish to resign the office, intelligence of the acceptance of this resignation had not reached Talbot, and he was still exercising the functions of consul. A French sentinel having been attacked and disarmed by the natives, Mr. Pritchard was held responsible for their acts, and he was seized and hurried off to prison by order of the French government. When the news of this outrage reached England, a very general feeling of indignation was expressed; and Sir Robert Peel, in his place in the House of Commons, declared, that a gross outrage, accompanied with gross indignity, had been committed upon Mr. Pritchard, though, as it was well known, the French government were not privy to it. He, however, represented the affair in its proper colours to them; and on the last day of the session of the British Parliament he was enabled to state that the Tahitian business had been brought to an amicable and satisfactory termination—the conditions being, that Mr. Pritchard would receive a sum of money from the French government as an indemnity or compensation for the outrage.

On the 6th of August Queen Victoria was happily delivered of a prince. It is worthy of note, moreover, as affording a striking instance of Her Majesty's ready attention to public affairs; for it was observed that only three hours previous to her accouchement, she was engaged in signing the necessary documents for giving the royal assent to various bills.

It had been for some time rumoured that Scotland would be honoured with a royal visit during the summer. Accordingly, on the 9th of September Her Majesty, accompanied by Prince Albert, the Princess Royal, and suite, proceeded thither; and on her arrival at Dundee was received with every demonstration of loyalty and high gratification. She accepted the hospitalities of Lord Glenlyon, and during her sojourn at Blair Atholl, his lordship's seat, her time was almost wholly passed in the quiet enjoyment of its romantic scenery, in taking healthful exercise in the open air, and in living as much as possible free from the trammels of court etiquette. On the 1st of October, the royal visitors took their departure, and arrived at Woolwich the next day.

The Queen's return from Scotland was followed by the speedy arrival of Louis Philippe, King of the French, on a visit to Her Majesty, at Windsor Castle. His Majesty left his château at Eu, in Normandy, Oct. 5., accompanied by his son, the Duke de Montpensier; they embarked at Treport in Le Gomer, steam-ship, and on the following morning he was viewing the gaily decorated "wooden walls of Old England," and acknowledging the salutations which greeted him on every side, as he approached our great naval haven of Portsmouth. His cordial manner of receiving the municipal authorities of that town, and his answer to their address, evinced an earnest desire to be regarded in the most friendly light by his English neighbours; he expressed his high gratification at being honoured with the presence of Queen Victoria last year, and said it was a source of pleasure to him to accept the kind invitation then made to him, to visit those shores where he had formerly been so generously treated. Prince Albert and the Duke of Wellington were on the spot to conduct the royal strangers to Windsor; and in a few hours the monarchs of England and France were exchanging mutual congratulations. It was observed that the Queen showed in common anxiety as she waited in the grand vestibule to welcome the King of the French; and when the carriages drove up, she advanced to the threshold, and in the most cordial manner extended her arms, whilst Louis Philippe and the prince alighted. Their Majesties embraced most affectionately at the moment of meeting; and the royal party, followed by the ministers and suites of both the monarchs, proceeded at once to the grand apartments.

The gorgeous ceremony of installing Louis Philippe a knight of the order of the Garter was performed on the 9th, with unusual magnificence. The King of the French, dressed in a uniform of dark blue and gold, was introduced by Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge; the Queen and knights all standing. The sovereign, in French, announced the election. The declaration having been pronounced by the chancellor of the order, the new knight was invested by the Queen and Prince Albert with the garter and the George, and received the accolade. Taking the King's arm, Her Majesty conducted him, in state, to his own apartment. At night there was a most splendid banquet in St. George's hall, to commemorate the installation.

On the 10th, the Duke de Montpensier visited Woolwich arsenal; and the royal party honoured Eton college with their presence. As the royal visit to Windsor Castle was limited to a few days, and was understood to be of a personal and private nature, neither civic banquetting nor public manifestations of joy were to be expected; but the lord mayor and corporation of London waited on the King, to present him with a congratulatory address on his arrival in this country; to which His Majesty returned a suitable answer.

Oct. 12th. The day fixed for the King's departure had now arrived. At 12 o'clock, Queen Victoria, leaning on the arm of the King, conducted his Majesty down the grand staircase; Prince Albert, the Duke de Montpensier, and the several suites bringing up the rear. The party entered seven carriages, and proceeded under escort to the Farnborough station of the south-western railway, from whence they travelled to the Gosport station by special train. Great preparations had been made for the embarkation; the principal naval and military authorities, with large bodies of troops, were in attendance; and, although the rain fell in torrents, thousands of spectators had assembled to witness the scene. The Queen and Prince Albert were to have accompanied the King on board the Gomer, and then to have crossed over to the Isle of Wight in the Albert and Victoria yacht. The reports from the seaward, however, were most unfavourable; a violent gale was blowing, the water off Spithead was a diet of surf, and a heavy sea was rolling in. The coast of Treport was known to be un-inconvenient one for landing under such circumstances, and danger was to be apprehended. It was, therefore, proposed that Louis Philippe should go back to London, and proceed to France by way of Dover and Calais, or Boulogne. Arrangements to that effect were immediately made, and in the evening the royal strangers took leave of the Queen and Prince Albert, and set out by their suite having been sent on board the steamers of the squadron. The train reached Nine Elms station at half-past ten, where a royal carriage was in readiness to convey the king and his son to the New Cross station of the South-eastern railway. Here a new disaster appeared likely to interrupt the royal progress. A fire had broken out in a large building at the station, and been raging for nearly two hours; firemen and officers of the Company were running in every direction, and shouts of welcome to the king mingled with cries of warning and the noise of fire-engines. Amidst all this turmoil of royalty was marked by the most assiduous and respectful attention of the directors; and his departure by a special train was promptly effected. By half-past two o'clock the king arrived at Dover; at daybreak a royal salute from the batteries announced to the inhabitants some unexpected event; and the news of Louis Philippe's arrival soon flew from mouth to mouth. The corporation hastily prepared and presented an address; and the king replied to it in the following terms: "Mr. Mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the ancient town of Dover, I leave this country with a heart deeply impressed by the general greeting which I have received from, and the feelings which have been evinced towards me by all classes of Her Majesty's subjects; above all, by the many tokens of friendship and affection which I have received from Her Majesty. They give me a favourable opportunity of manifesting towards your country those sentiments of amity, so essential to the maintenance of peace, and of those good understandings between the two countries which have ever been the aim and object of my policy. I am most happy to find these sentiments congenial to the wishes of the British nation; and I have no doubt but that they will be appreciated in my country. Two such nations, mutually calculated to be of so much advantage to each other, will, I trust, equally estimate what I have so deeply at heart, and what I have ever so deeply felt." After conversing for a short time with the deputation, the king retired to take a hasty breakfast, and then, with his suite, crossed the channel in the French post-office steamer Nord, as had been previously arranged. The weather was still boisterous and squally; but he landed safely at Calais, and proceeded that evening to the chateau of Eu.

On the 28th of October, a most interesting ceremony took place in London, and one that will be long memorable in the city annals — the opening of the New Royal Exchange by Queen Victoria. Those persons who have witnessed great public processions in the metropolis, will be at no loss to conceive how grand the array, or how multitudinous the assemblage of eager gazers, on this occasion; but those who have not, will hardly, we fear, be able to form a proper idea of it from so meagre a description of it as our limits compel us to give. Every care was taken to impart order and system to the proceedings. Although from the gates of Buckingham Palace to Cornhill, a dense living throng had been congregating from an early hour, — throughout the whole line all was quiet and orderly; the preservation of order being intrusted to the metropolitan and city police, with life-guards, blues, and lanciers, at intervals of a few yards each. The windows, balconies, and parapets of almost every house were filled with spectators, — among whom, particularly in the city, were to be seen numerous ladies splendidly attired; in many places seats were erected out of doors, covered more or less substantially, and decorated with flags, &c. About 11 o'clock, the royal procession left the palace, Her Majesty and Prince Albert (attended by the Duchess of Buccleugh and the Earl of Jersey) occupying the principal carriage of state. The royal procession was met at Temple Bar by the city dignitaries, on horseback, the lord mayor habited in a robe of crimson velvet, and a Spanish hat and feather, the aldermen in scarlet robes, and the deputies and common council dressed in mazarine cloaks and cocked hats. When the ceremony of presenting to Her Majesty the city sword of state had been performed by the lord mayor, the civic body joined the royal cortege, and proceeded amid the vociferous cheers of the spectators, and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, to the destined spot. On Her Majesty's arrival, the bells of the campanile tower, now heard for the first time, chimed "God save the Queen." The reading-room was fitted up as a throne-room; the walls were hung with crimson velvet, and the floor covered with crimson cloth; at the eastern end, on a dais, was a throne of crimson velvet, backed by a curtain of the same, bordered with gold lace. The Queen having taken her seat, and all the public functionaries being properly arranged, the recorder read a loyal and congratulatory address from the lord mayor and corporation to Her Majesty, hailing in suitable terms the presence of Her Majesty in the heart of her metropolis, and recalling the occasion of her great predecessor Queen Elizabeth's visit for a like purpose, and requesting Her Majesty's favourable regard and sanction to the work which her loyal citizens of London had now completed. Having returned a gracious reply, she gave the lord mayor (Magnay) her hand to kiss, and announced her intention to create him a baronet, in commemoration of the day. Her Majesty then, with numerous distinguished guests, partook of a sumptuous déjeuner, and at its conclusion she ordered the lord mayor to give as a toast, "Prosperity to the city of London," which she drank in a manner that evidenced the interest she felt in it. The Queen then retired to her private apartment. On her re-appearance, she and the prince proceeded to the quadrangle, in the centre of which Her Majesty stopped. The members of the corporation and the ministers formed a circle round the Queen; and the heralds having made proclamation, and silence having been commanded, she said, in an audible voice, "It is my royal will and pleasure that this building be hereafter called the Royal Exchange." This concluded the ceremonies of the day. The royal cortège returned to the palace; and the most exuberant festivity and hospitality that night prevailed throughout the city.

A. D. 1845. — We have seen that Great Britain began the year 1844 with favourable omens, and continued to advance in industrial and commercial prosperity to its close; and it was generally admitted that to Sir Robert Peel's financial measures and fiscal regulations much of that prosperity was to be attributed: accordingly at the commencement of 1845, his position and that of his colleagues appeared to possess increased stability. But doubtless there were potent drawbacks to it. The successful exertions of the anti-corn law league still occasioned great disquietude to the agriculturists; and a feeling of great uncertainty, as to the ultimate fate of the much-analysed protective laws, was generally entertained by those of the landed classes who kept a watchful eye on the course of passing events.

When the Queen met her parliament on the first day of the session (Feb. 4, 1845), she was enabled to state that trade and commerce had been extended at home and abroad; — that she continued to receive from all foreign powers and states assurances of their friendly disposition (alluding more particularly to the visits of the emperor of Russia and the king of the French); — and that the political agitation and excitement which she had heretofore had occasion to lament existed in Ireland appeared to have gradually abated. But whether this apparent state of repose and security had been effected by the prosecution of O'Connell and his fellow-repealers, or by the reversal of their sentences, the royal speech did not hazard even the most guarded hint.

Ten days after the opening of the session the premier submitted his financial scheme to the House, and clearly showed that he had to deal with a prosperous revenue. He stated, that on the 5th of January, 1845, he had a surplus amount over the expenditure of 3,357,000*l.*, and that by making the account up to the approaching 5th of April he might fairly estimate the actual surplus revenue at 5,000,000*l.*; a sum, he said, which would be either sufficient for the repeal of the income tax, or enable him to make large remissions in general taxation. He decided on the latter course; and proposed that the income tax should be continued for three years longer. The details of his financial propositions (all of which, after considerable discussion, were ultimately carried), may be thus summed up: — The duties on British plantation sugar he proposed should be reduced from 2*s.* 3*d.* per cwt. to 1*s.* per cwt., and the foreign free-grown sugar from 3*s.* 9*d.* to 2*s.* 4*d.* He proposed also the total repeal of the duty on cotton-wool, amounting to five sixteenths of a penny per lb., and yielding a revenue of 680,000*l.*; the repeal of the auction duty, 250,000*l.*; of the duties on glass, 640,000*l.*; of the export duty on coal, 183,000*l.*; and of reductions on duty on the numerous minor articles in the tariff to the extent of 320,000*l.*; which, together with an estimated loss on the sugar duties of 1,300,000*l.*, would amount to 3,388,000*l.*

Among the most important and obstinately contested questions brought before the consideration of parliament were the proposal to augment the grant for supporting the Catholic College of Maynooth, and the establishment of three Irish colleges for secular education. With regard to Maynooth, Sir R. Peel declared that the government were prepared, "in a liberal sense and confiding spirit," to improve that institution, and to elevate the tone of education there: for which purpose he proposed that a vote for the sum of 30,000*l.* should be taken for the proper accommodation of the president and professors, and for the maintenance and education of 500 free students. This announcement excited much surprise, and, from many of the members, strong animadversions, based on religious grounds; but the minister, speaking for himself and colleagues, said, "We do not think there is any violation of conscientious scruples involved in our proposition. We believe that it is perfectly compatible to hold steadfast the profession of our faith without wavering, and at the same time to improve the education and to elevate the character of those who — do what you will — pass this measure or refuse it — must be the spiritual guides and religious instructors of millions of your fellow-countrymen."

When the minister's plan became known, a determined opposition to it arose in the country, and numerous were the petitions that were presented against it. In London great meetings were held in Exeter Hall and Covent-garden theatre, and the measure was condemned in the strongest terms, as an endowment by the state of the Popish religion. The opposition to it, however, was counteracted by the great majority of votes it obtained in both Houses, and it at length passed into a law. The Irish colleges bill was introduced by Sir J. Graham on the 9th of May. Its object was to establish three colleges for secular education in Ireland, to be wholly independent of all religious instruction, though it should give every facility to the voluntary endowment of theological professorships. Sir R. H. Inglis declared it to be "a gigantic scheme of godless education;" but the epithet, though strong and characteristic, and one that was well calculated to dwell on the ear, failed to make an impression sufficiently powerful to defeat the measure; and it passed, carried by a great majority.

The labours of a long and anxious session of parliament were now brought to a close. The Queen appeared in person; and the speaker, in addressing Her Majesty on the various and important business which had occupied the attention of the legislature, alluded to the rapid development of private enterprise, in extending the railway communications of the kingdom — the care with which they had consulted the interests, and Still up to the 12th of December no Sikh aggression had been committed, and no artillery had moved down the river; but on the following day certain information was received that the Sikh army had crossed the Sutlej, and was concentrating in great force on its left bank.

Having crossed the Sutlej, the Sikhs invested Ferozepore on one side, and took up an entrenched position at the village of Ferozeshah, about ten miles in advance of Ferozepore, and nearly the same distance from the village of Moodkee. The headquarters of Sir Hugh Gough, commander-in-chief, were at Umballah, which is distant 150 miles from Moodkee; and Ferozepore was garrisoned by a body of rather more than 3000 troops, under the command of major-general Sir John Littler. In order, therefore, to effect a junction between the separated portions of the Anglo-Indian army, before an attack could be made upon them by the Sikhs, the governor-general issued orders to Sir Hugh Gough to hasten with his force towards Ferozepore. After suffering severely for want of water, as well as fatigue, they arrived in a state of great exhaustion, and took up their encamping ground in front of Moodkee; the troops having scarcely time to get under arms and move to their positions, when they heard that the Sikh army was rapidly advancing. The enemy's forces were said to consist of from 15,000 to 20,000 infantry, about the same number of cavalry, and forty guns. "To resist their attack, and to cover the formation of the infantry," says the despatch of Sir Hugh Gough, "I advanced the cavalry, under Brigadiers White, Gough, and Macleir, rapidly to the front, in columns of squadrons, and occupied the plain. They were speedily followed by five troops of horse artillery, under Brigadier Brooke, who took up a forward position, having the cavalry then on his flanks." The battle-field was a thick jungle, dotted with sandy hillocks, which partly screened the infantry and guns of the enemy; but the rapid and well-directed fire of the British artillery, and the brilliant charges of the cavalry, appeared soon to paralyse their opponents. The infantry, under Major-generals Sir Harry Smith, Gilbert, and Sir John MacCall, attacked in echelon of lines the enemy's infantry, almost invisible amongst wood, and the approaching darkness of night. In the words of the despatch, "the opposition of the enemy was such as might have been expected from troops who had every thing at stake, and who had long boasted of being irresistible. Their ample and extended line, from their great superiority of numbers, far outflanked ours; but this was counteracted by the flank movements of our cavalry. The attack of the infantry now commenced, and the roll of fire from this powerful arm soon convinced the Sikh army that they had met with a foe they little expected; and their whole force was driven from position after position with great slaughter, and the loss of seventeen pieces of artillery, some of them of heavy calibre; our infantry using that never-failing weapon, the bayonet, wherever the enemy stood. Night only saved them from a worse disaster, for this stout conflict was maintained during an hour and a half of dim starlight, amidst a cloud of dust from the sandy plain, which, yet more obscured every object." This victory, though glorious, was dearly purchased. Major-general Sir Robert Sale, the hero of Jellalabad, was amongst those who fell; as was also Major-general Sir John MacCall; the total of killed and wounded was 872.

On the 21st, Sir Hugh Gough advanced with his whole force towards Ferozeshah, where the Sikh army was posted in a strongly entrenched camp, defended by a most formidable park of artillery. A junction with Sir John Littler's division was effected, and Sir Henry Hardinge offered his services to the commander-in-chief as second in command. The camp of the enemy was in the form of a parallelogram, of about a mile in length, and half a mile in breadth, including within its area the strong village of Ferozeshah; the shorter sides looking towards the Sutlej and Moodkee, and the longer towards Ferozepore and the open country. The British troops moved against the last-named face, the ground in front of which was, like the Sikh position in Moodkee, covered with low jungle.

The command of the right wing of the British army was taken by Sir Hugh Gough; the left was under the charge and direction of Sir Henry Hardinge. The veteran commander thus describes the fight:—"A very heavy cannonade was opened by the enemy, who had dispersed over their position upwards of one hundred guns, more than forty of which were of battering calibre; these kept up a heavy and well-directed fire, which the practice of our far less numerous artillery, of much lighter metal, checked in some degree, but could not silence; finally, in the face of a storm of shot and shell, our infantry advanced and carried these formidable entrenchments; they threw themselves upon their guns, and with matchless gallantry wrested them from the enemy; but when the batteries were partially within our grasp, our soldiery had to face such a fire of musketry from the Sikh infantry, arrayed behind their guns, that in spite of the most heroic efforts, a portion only of the entrenchment could be carried. Night fell while the conflict was every where raging. Although I now brought up major-general Sir Harry Smith's division, and he captured and long retained another point of the position, and her majesty's 3rd light dragoons charged and took some of the most formidable batteries, yet the enemy remained in possession of a considerable portion of the great quadrangle, whilst our troops, intermingled with theirs, kept possession of the remainder, and finally bivouacked upon it, exhausted by their gallant efforts, greatly reduced in numbers, and suffering extremely from thirst, yet animated by an indomitable spirit. In this state of things the long night wore away."

"Near the middle of it, one of their heavy guns was advanced, and played with deadly effect upon our troops. Lieutenant General Sir Henry Hardinge immediately formed her majesty's 80th and the 1st European light infantry. They were led to the attack by their commanding officers, and animated in their exertions by Lieut. Col. Wood, who was wounded in the outset. The 80th captured the gun, and the enemy, dismayed by this counter-check, did not venture to press on further. During the whole night, however, they continued to harass our troops by fire of artillery, wherever moonlight discovered our position.

But with daylight of the 22nd came retribution. Our infantry formed line, supported on both flanks by horse artillery, whilst a fire was opened from our centre by such of our heavy guns as remained effective, aided by a light of rockets. A masked battery played with great effect upon this point, dismounting our pieces, and blowing up our tumbrils. At this moment Lieut. Gen. Sir Henry Hardinge placed himself at the head of the left, whilst I rode at the head of the right wing. Our line advanced, and, uncheked by the enemy's fire, drove them rapidly out of the village of Ferozepore, and their encampment; then, changing front to its left, on its centre, our force continued to sweep the camp, bearing down all opposition, and dislodged the enemy from their position. The line then halted, as if on a day of manoeuvre, receiving its two leaders, as they rode along its front, with a gratifying cheer, and displaying the captured standards of the Khalsa army. We had taken upwards of seventy-three pieces of cannon, and were masters of the whole field.

"The force assumed a position on the ground which it had won; but even here its labours were not to cease. In the course of two hours, Sirdar Tej Singh, who had commanded in the last great battle, brought up from the vicinity of Ferozepore fresh battalions and a large field of artillery, supported by 30,000 Ghorepurras, hitherto encamped near the river. He drove in our cavalry parties, and made strenuous efforts to regain the position at Ferozepore: this attempt was defeated; but its failure had scarcely become manifest, when the Sirdar renewed the contest with more troops and a large artillery. He commenced by a combination against our left flank, and when this was frustrated, made such a demonstration against the captured village as compelled us to change our whole front to the right. His guns during this manoeuvre maintained an incessant fire, whilst our artillery ammunition being completely expended in these protracted combats, we were unable to answer him with a single shot. I now directed our almost exhausted cavalry to threaten both flanks at once, preparing the infantry to advance in support, which apparently caused him suddenly to cease his fire, and to abandon the field."

Such a victory, fought under such disadvantages, could not be achieved without heavy loss. In the two actions of the 21st and 22nd of December, the British had 694 killed, and 1721 wounded. The Anglo-Indian force consisted of 16,700 men and 69 guns, chiefly horse artillery. The Sikh forces varied from 48,000 to 60,000 men, with 108 pieces of cannon of heavy calibre, and fixed batteries.

The late victories had prepared the public for expecting to hear that the discomfited Sikhs had re-crossed the Sutlej; when news arrived of another victory, obtained by the troops under the command of Major-general Sir Harry Smith, on the 28th of January, at Aliwal, over the Sikh forces commanded by the Sirdar Runjoor Singh Majethea. In this decisive and glorious action, the enemy's infantry were dislodged from every position and village they attempted to hold, by rapid charges at the point of the bayonet. Their horsemen were driven from every part of the field by repeated charges, in which the superior valour of the European and Native cavalry, as well as the precision of the artillery, were most conspicuous. These noble efforts, combined with the skill of the commander, ended in the signal defeat of the enemy; who was driven across the river with great loss, his camp being captured, and 52 pieces of artillery remaining in the hands of the victors. Sir Harry Smith's account of the battle was both spirited and luminous, but our limits forbid us from quoting more than the concluding paragraph. "The determined bravery of all was as conspicuous as noble. I am unwonted to praise when praise is not merited, and here I most avowedly express my firm opinion and conviction that no troops in any battle on record ever behaved more nobly. British and Native (no distinction) cavalry all yoking with her Majesty's 16th lancers, and striving to head in the repeated charges. Our guns and gunners, officers and men, may be equalled but cannot be excelled, by any artillery in the world. Throughout the day, no hesitation, a bold and intrepid advance. And thus it is that our loss is comparatively small, though I deeply regret to say, severe. The enemy fought with much resolution; they maintained frequent rencontres with our cavalry hand to hand. In one charge of infantry upon the 16th lancers, they threw away their muskets, and came on with their swords and targets against the lance." In killed, wounded, and missing, the British loss amounted to 585. The quantity of ammunition captured with the artillery, and found in the camp of the enemy, was beyond accurate calculation; consisting of shot, shell, grape, and small arm ammunition of every description and for every calibre.

In about a fortnight after this, another desperate contest took place, when the Sikhs were swept from their last and strongest hold on the British side of the Sutlej. The strongly fortified camp at Sobraon, constructed by them to protect the bridge at Hurrakee, and so keep up communication with their own territories, was the scene of this ever memorable battle. Sir Hugh Gough, commander-in-chief of the army, was the leader on this occasion, and the army under his direction consisted in the main of the officers and men who had fought the battles of Moodkee, Ferozepore, and Aliwal. Sir Henry Hardinge was present, aiding by his advice, and inspiring the soldiers by his example. He described the victory in his despatch as one of the most daring exploits ever achieved, by which, in open day, a triple line of breastworks, flanked by formidable redoubts, brit-

ling with artillery, manned by 32 regular regiments of Infantry, was assaulted and carried; and he stated that 220 guns had been taken in the campaign. The loss of the enemy was immense; not less, according to all accounts, than 10,000 men killed and wounded in action, and drowned in the passage of the river.

"Their awful slaughter, confusion, and dismay," as was said by the British commander, "were such as would have excited compassion in the hearts of their generous conquerors, if the Khalsa troops had not, in the early part of the action, sullied their gallantry by slaughtering and barbarously mangleing every wounded soldier whom, in the vicinities of attack, the fortune of war left at their mercy."

The Anglo-Indian army had 320 men killed, and 2083 wounded. Among the former was Major-general Sir Robert Dick, a gallant veteran of the Peninsular and Waterloo campaigns.

The British army now advanced upon Lahore; the unconditional submission of its government was tendered and accepted; and, on the 22nd of February, 1846, the citadel of Lahore was taken possession of by the commander-in-chief; the young prince, under British protection, was conducted to his palace; and arrangements were made for the occupation of the conquered territories. The Khalsa troops, after their late defeat, retired towards Unnaital; Teh Singh, their commander, attempted to rally them no more; and the remnant of his army surrendered their cannon, and dispersed.

Treaties were afterwards concluded with the Maharajah Duleep Singh, as the sovereign of Lahore, and Gholab Singh; the latter having been raised by the British to the rank of a protected prince, and a valuable territory assigned to him. In short, the moderation of the victor was conspicuous throughout the whole of the arrangements; territorial aggrandizement was not for a moment entertained; and the arrangements were all of a pacificatory character, combining liberality with caution, and calculated, it was hoped, to produce a powerful impression on the native population of India.

The vast importance of this decisive campaign, which had at once punished a daring and treacherous invader, and given such ample evidence of the skill and bravery of the Anglo-Indian army, was duly felt in this country, and by all classes gratefully acknowledged. Thanksgivings were offered up in our churches for the late splendid victories; the dignity of viscount was conferred by Her Majesty on Sir Henry Hardinge, and that of baron on Sir Hugh Gough (both of whom were rewarded with liberal pensions); and Sir Harry Smith was created a baronet. The corporation of London also voted that their thanks and the freedom of the city should be presented to each of them in boxes of gold of the value of 100 guineas each.

A. D. 1846.—On the 22nd of January, 1846, Her Majesty congratulated her re-assembled parliament on the prosperous state of the revenue, and the general improvement which had taken place in the internal condition of the country; and hoped that a further reduction of the protective duties would be found to ensure the continuance of her people's prosperity. The royal speech was gratefully acknowledged; and the addresses in both Houses were carried without a division.

Sir Robert Peel then gave a full explanation of the late ministerial crisis, and also of his own views and measures. The immediate cause, he said, which led to the dissolution of the late government, was that great and mysterious calamity, the failure of the potato crop: it appeared to him to preclude further delay, and to require immediate decision, as to the course to be taken with regard to the corn-laws; but, while he stated the failure of the potato crop to be the immediate cause, he would not withhold the homage which was due to the progress of reason and to truth, by denying that his opinions on the subject of protection had undergone a change. His experience during the last three years had confirmed him in his new opinions; and he felt no hesitation in declaring it, however much he might, by so doing, incur the imputation of inconsistency. He showed that while he was reviled for apathy and neglect, he and his colleagues were actually engaged in the most extensive and arduous inquiries into the true state of the Irish scarcity; and in the course of those inquiries he had come to the conclusion that the protective policy was unsound, and therefore untenable.

In a luminous and most comprehensive speech which he afterwards made when the House was in committee on the corn duties, he admitted that on the part of agriculturists, there was a natural dread of competition from foreign corn-growers; but, he argued, the dreaded competition would be met by the application of skill, capital, and industry; and he proposed that the state should assist agricultural industry by various local aids, and the remission of certain local burdens.

At length, after much discussion in both Houses, the corn-law bill was passed, and grain was admitted into our ports under the new rates of duty. But a Bill which had been framed for the suppression of outrage in Ireland had just been rejected in the House of Commons, by a majority of 73 over ministers. Thus defeated, they determined upon resigning their offices, and, in speeches remarkable for their explicitness and candour, the duke of Wellington in the House of Lords, and Sir R. Peel in the House of Commons, on the 29th of June, announced their resignation. Once more, lord John Russell had the task of forming a Whig ministry, and the following list was speedily completed:—Lord Chancellor, Lord Colclahan; President of the Council, Margits of Lansdowne; Lord Privy Seal, Earl Minto; Home Secretary, Sir George Grey; Colonial Secretary, Earl Grey; Foreign Secretary, Viscount Palmerston; First Lord of the Treasury, Lord John Russell; Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Charles Wood; Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Lord Campbell; Paymaster-General, Mr. Macaulay; Woods and Forests, Lord Morpeth; Postmaster-General, Mar-

The passing of the corn-bill and the new tariff excited much rejoicing in the manufacturing districts; bells were rung; flags and banners bearing appropriate inscriptions were displayed from factories, or carried in procession about the streets; cannons were fired, and all the usual modes of giving vent to popular feeling resorted to.

The first measure of any importance brought forward by the new administration, was Lord John Russell's scheme for a reduction of the sugar duties. He proposed that slave-grown sugar and foreign free-grown sugar be admitted at a duty of 2s. till July, 1847; from that date a descending scale until 1851, when they are to be admitted at a fixed duty of 14s., the present duty on British colonial sugar.
Another question which occupied the attention of parliament this session was the necessity which was said to exist for having a uniform gauge on all railways. Great and incontrovertible reasons were certainly given for it, and the bulk of the evidence tended to show that the narrow gauge was best for the public.

The almost universal failure of the potato crop, as we have before observed, was the immediate cause that led to the abrogation of the corn laws, although Sir R. Peel had at the same time declared that his late experience had induced him to become a convert to free trade principles. The most disastrous accounts from all parts of Ireland soon showed that the minister's apprehensions on that score were too well founded; and that unless prompt assistance were afforded, the great mass of the poorer population must die of starvation. Such evidence, indeed, was given of their destitute condition, that, forgetting everything but their necessities, the people of England, in every town and village in the kingdom, and of every class, contributed to their relief by raising bountiful subscriptions, and thus for a time partially arrested the impending awful visitation. Great, however, as was the assistance thus derived from individual charity, it was found absolutely necessary for the government to aid the suffering Irish by means more permanent and effectual, which, however, will best be noticed in the proceedings of the next session of Parliament.

During this year our relations with the United States more than once assumed a serious aspect. Mr. Polk, a conspicuous member of the democratic party, had succeeded Mr. Tyler as president; and there appeared to be a determination on his part not to yield an iota of their claims on the Oregon territory to Great Britain. What was called "the clear and unquestionable right" of the States to the territory in dispute, was arrogantly insisted on; and it was not until a firm and unequivocal declaration had been made by Sir R. Peel, in the House of Commons, that England was determined to maintain her territorial rights, that the threats of taking forcible possession gave way to the more wise and equitable mode of settling the question by arbitration; and it was eventually agreed upon, "that from that point in the 49th parallel of north latitude, in which the boundary laid down by existing treaties between Great Britain and the United States terminates, the line of boundary between the territories of the two countries should be continued westward along the 49th parallel to the middle of the said channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence, southerly, through the middle of the said channel and the Fuca Straits to the Pacific Ocean."

A. D. 1847. — The commencement of this year found the domestic affairs of the British Empire in a position calculated to call forth all the firmness of those intrusted with the government. The calamity that had befallen unhappy Ireland in the previous year, still continued to harass her. The extent of her distress, and the remedial measures of the government, may be gathered from the following brief extracts from Her Majesty's speech on opening parliament (Jan. 19, 1847), and the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on bringing forward his budget:—"My lords and gentlemen, It is with the deepest concern that upon your again assembling, I have to call your attention to the dearth of provisions which prevails in Ireland, and in parts of Scotland. In Ireland, especially, the loss of the usual food of the people has been the cause of severe sufferings, of disease, and of increased mortality among the poorer classes; outrages have become more frequent, chiefly directed against property, &c. . . . Various measures will be laid before you, which, if adopted by parliament, may tend to raise the great mass of the people in comfort, to promote agriculture, and to lessen the pressure of that competition for the occupation of land which has been the fruitful source of crime and misery."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer having congratulated the House that the finances of the country were never better able to bear the demand that would be made upon them, said, "Ireland required an extraordinary provision. Up to the present time
(Feb. 22.) there had been 2,000,000*l.* advanced towards its relief, and he much feared the expenditure under this head could not be estimated at less than one million per month, until the next harvest shall have been collected. This would be about 5,000,000*l.*, which, with the two already advanced, would be 10,000,000*l.*"

Besides many measures of immediate and temporary application, others of a permanent character were introduced to secure the well-being of Ireland; and among these was an efficient poor law for compelling the land to provide for the relief of its own pauperism. The discussion of this bill in its progress through parliament, occupied a great portion of the ses-

slon; but time was found for lengthened discussions upon the navigation laws, which had so long been identified with the established policy of the country; and various measures were introduced in connection with its finance, commerce, and trade, of which the most important was the bill for limiting by law the labour of young persons in factories, which had of late years excited much interest and discussion both in and out of parliament.

These, and other measures having been passed, parliament was prorogued by the Queen in person on July 23rd, with a view to an immediate dissolution; and the new parliament was convened in November, to adopt measures applicable to the commercial distress which weighed so heavily upon all persons engaged in trade at this period. The railway mania of the preceding year, and the failure of the potato crop, had brought upon a commercial crisis, during which a great many commercial houses were swept away; and the alarm thereby occasioned gave rise to a panic, during which the government consented to a temporary suspension of the bank act of 1844. But whether the violence of the crisis had already abated, or the mere announcement of the determination of the government had a beneficial effect on the public mind, there was no need for putting it in force, and on the meeting of parliament, the Chancellor of the Exchequer informed the House that there was every reason to believe that the crisis was over, and that the anticipated distress of the winter would be averted. The rest of the session was chiefly occupied with the discussion of measures for the repression of crime in Ireland; and the special business for which parliament had been called together having been now concluded, the two Houses adjourned to the 3rd Feb. 1848.

This year witnessed the decease of two men who, in their respective careers, had exercised greater influence upon their countrymen, than most of their contemporaries, — Daniel O'Connell and Dr. Chalmers. But for a sketch of these remarkable individuals, we must refer the reader to the "Biographical Treasury."

A. D. 1848. — There are few more eventful years in the history of the world than 1848. The combustible materials that had long been smouldering throughout Europe, then burst into a flame, which threatened for a time not merely to overthrow the thrones and dynasties of nations, but to sweep away the very bases on which modern society has been established. The expulsion of Louis Philippe's family from the throne and soil of France on Feb. 24, gave the signal for these general outbreaks. But whilst almost every throne on the continent was shaken by revolution, the English monarchy, strong in the attachment of the people, not only stood firm in the tempest, but appeared even to derive increased stability from the events that elsewhere convulsed the world. By the far-sighted agency of Sir Robert Peel the great question of free trade in corn, which might have become a prolific source of agitation, had been happily set at rest; hence when a knot of malcontents attempted to forward their political designs by a demonstration of physical force, the great mass of the British population at once rose up in defence of the laws and institutions of the country, and gained a moral victory over their opponents, the effects of which promise to be as lasting as they were beneficial. The 10th of April had been fixed by the Chartists for an immense meeting to take place on Kennington Common, whence they were to proceed to parliament in military array, to present a petition signed, as was asserted, by nearly 6,000,000 of men, and thus to overawe the government into a concession of their demands. Meanwhile the government took all necessary precautions to preserve the peace of the metropolis. Large bodies of troops were stationed unseen in different public buildings; and 150,000 citizens of London voluntarily enrolled themselves as special constables for the maintenance of order. When the appointed day arrived, the courage of the Chartists fell. Their leader, Feargus O'Connor, at the instigation of the police, induced the meeting quietly to disperse, and the "Monster Petition," as it was called, was conveyed to the House of Commons in a hackney vehicle. When analysed, it was found to contain not so many as 3,000,000 instead of 6,000,000 of signatures, and these of the most heterogeneous and absurd kind; hence it was deservedly treated with disdain, and the great Chartist demonstration, which was to have changed the institutions of the country, became a byword of contempt. But although all alarm was at an end, meetings continued to be held in the metropolis for the promotion of what was called the "People's Charter," at which much seditious language was held. The contagion spread to some of the large manufacturing towns both in England and Scotland, and in some parts of the country the Chartist demonstrations created so great an apprehension, that the government judged it expedient to arrest and bring to trial a few of the most violent leaders, who, on being found guilty, were transported or imprisoned for different periods. These transactions out of doors became the subject of frequent discussion in parliament, and led to the introduction of some new legal securities for strengthening the hands of government, and enabling them to deal more effectually with plotters against the public peace.

Scarcely had the alarm consequent on the proceedings of the Chartists subsided in England, when the country was again thrown into agitation by the events which took place in Ireland. The "Great Agitation" being now removed from the stage, his place was soon filled by some young men, of great spirit and sincerity, who thought that their demands for the "Repeal of the Union" might be prosecuted with success amid the turmoil of the period both at home and abroad. Among these were Messrs. Smith O'Brien, John Mitchell, and Thomas Meagher. Mitchell had established a newspaper, called the "United Irishman," in which rebellion was proclaimed without disguise. Each number contained what was called "Our War Article," in which the people were taught how to arm themselves, how to destroy troops in the streets of towns by pouring oil over them, how to form barricades and all the other apparatus of a civic insurrection. At length, when to all appearance every preparation was made for civil war, the Irish Government began to act.

O'Brien, with his two accomplices, Meagher and Mitchell, were arrested and held to bail; the two former for their harangues, the latter for a series of libels in his newspaper, and among others, for a letter addressed to the viceroy, as Her Majesty's Executioner General of Ireland.

State prosecutions, indeed, are always delicate affairs, and there were peculiarities in the law in Ireland at that time which made these prosecutions particularly hazardous. In fact, it was already obvious that the law was too weak to grapple with the turbulence which existed. Far from being intimidated by the impending trials, the incendiaries were no sooner admitted to bail, than they renewed their criminal proceedings with redoubled violence. In fact, the existing law was rather an attraction to the seditions, than a discouragement. The crime was vague, the punishment slight, the chances of escape considerable; and between arrest and trial, the public was at the mercy of the agitator, who might possibly reckon upon an intermediate accomplishment of his revolutionary objects. To apply the law of treason, would have been neither easy nor desirable; speeches and articles alone would not come within its definition; and even if that difficulty could have been got over, another would have immediately occurred, arising from the magnitude of the penalties in case of severe to extreme punishments. In short, the law of sedition was below the mark, and the law of treason above it. It was, therefore, expedient to meet the circumstances of the period, and the peculiarities of the crime, by a new enactment. These perilous forms of sedition were accordingly made felonies: the precision of the new law materially reduced the chances of eluding it; the consequences of conviction had much more of the pains than the charms of martyrdom: arrest was followed by committal and present incapacity for further mischief; while a punishment, at once infamous and merciful, satisfied both the claims of justice and the clemency of the public feeling. The bill met with some opposition in the House of Commons on purely constitutional grounds; but the chief resistance to it was offered by Mr. John O'Connell on the part of the old agitation, Mr. O'Connor on the part of the chartists, and Mr. O'Brien himself on the part of the rebellious clubs. The figure the latter gentleman made in rising to oppose a bill for securing the Crown and Government against the machinations of himself and his accomplices, was rendered doubly disgraceful by the fact that he had just returned from his treasonable mission to France. The would-be Cataline was received in scornful silence by an assembly of loyal gentlemen, and Sir George Grey, amidst the loudest acclamations, gave vent to the suppressed feeling of the House of Commons. The new statute came no sooner into force, than Mr. Mitchell was seized under its provisions, brought to trial without delay, convicted, sentenced, and, with imposing promptitude, transported to Bermuda. This was the second blow; first it stunned, then it maddened, the incendiaries, who agitated more furiously than ever, extended their insurrectionary organization with increased industry and vigour. A newspaper called the "Felon," started up in the place of the "United Irishman." Thirty-two new clubs were formed in Dublin in the course of the month of June and the beginning of July. In the provinces, also, the organization was spreading widely. The papers of the confederation, seized by the police, proved the existence of sixty-four clubs scattered through nineteen counties, but the number was probably much greater.

In the city of Cork alone there were seven clubs, of which four mustered 900 members. The law and the government were now openly defied. All descriptions of treasonable preparations were carried on with redoubled vigilance. Rebellion was no longer vaguely intimated of, but formally declared; nothing was left unsettled save the convenient and proper moment for revolt. The leaders dispersed themselves through the provinces, hectoring and blustering wherever they went, founding new clubs, talking the most rampant treason in every town and village, speaking and acting as if they had already trampled the law and the government under their feet. But the government, which had hitherto been watching them with a hundred eyes, was now prepared to smite them with a hundred hands. Power of proclaiming and disarming districts was already at the Lord-lieutenant's command; and on the 18th of July, to the great dismay of the clubs, this power was exerted, and Dublin, Cork, Kilkenny, Waterford, Drogheda, and Galway, along with some half dozen counties, were subjected to the wholesome rigours of the Act. This bold resolution took the enemy by surprise; for as the law had been made especially for the counties, to suppress predial outrage, the anarchists had never dreamed of its application to cities and towns. With the same vigour the government now silenced the abominable journals which had replaced the "United Irishman," demolished their presses, confiscated their types, seized their editors, and cast out their devils. The faction was thus fairly driven into the field, about which they had been blustering for so many months. The leaders, in different parts of the country, and in different strains of bombast, invited the populace to instant insurrection.

Meanwhile application had been made to parliament for those high powers which the constitution reserves for extreme cases of public disorders. On the 22nd of July a bill to suspend the habeas corpus was introduced in the Commons by Lord John Russell. On the 25th the bill received the royal assent, and on the 27th the Lord-lieutenant issued proclamations offering rewards for the capture of Mr. O'Brien and three other persons charged with overt acts of treason. The rest was rebellion burlesqued; the lowest description of treason which ever provoked the penalties of that high crime. On the 29th of July, at the head of a large body of the Tipperary peasantry, Mr. Smith O'Brien attacked a small force of policemen, took a constable prisoner, made booty of a horse, stormed a cabin, and was totally overthrown in half an hour. After lying perdu for a few days, he surrendered to the government, and was soon afterwards arraigned for high treason. Thus ended what, as soon as it was over, was called the farce of the Irish rebellion.

The trials for high treason may be briefly disposed of here, though they were not so disposed of by the courts of law. At a special commission held in the month of October in Clonmel, Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Meagher, and two others were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to the extreme penalties of law. That those antiquated and barbarous penalties would not be enforced was, of course, notorious to all the world; but the convicts themselves assumed the airs, and claimed the honours, of martyrdom. There were points of law reserved, however, for the superior courts in Dublin; and when, after long delays, these points were decided in favour of the crown, there still lay an appeal to the House of Lords, which further postponed the fate of the prisoners, whatever that fate was ultimately to be. In the month of June, however, the Lords confirmed the decisions of the tribunal in Ireland, and now all difficulties seemed removed, whether in the path of justice or of mercy, when a new and totally unforeseen difficulty arose. The convicts objected to any mitigation of penalties, and insisted upon their right to be executed pursuant to their sentence. It was formally contended that the Crown had no right to be merciful to Irishmen convicted of treason, and that to transport them, instead of hanging them, would be a monstrous stretch of arbitrary power. No serious doubt was entertained in the present case as to the right of the Queen to commute these sentences into transportation; but, nevertheless, it was thought expedient to pass a declaratory act to prevent future cavilling on the point. This step having been taken, nothing remained but to inflict the minor penalty, which was carried out as much to the satisfaction of the public, as either the extreme penalty of the law, which nobody thought of, or complete impunity, which a few giddy people recommended, would have been displeasing to it.

The New World, and we may add the old also, was this year thrown into a whirl of excitement by the abundant discovery of surface gold on the plains of Upper California. In the spring of the year some settlers were excavating a mill-race in the neighbourhood of the Sacramento, a river about thirty miles to the north of San Francisco, having its rise in the Californian mountains, and falling into the sea in the Bay of San Pablo. In the course of their work, they met with several pieces of heavy yellow-coloured metal, which being of a sufficiently peculiar nature to excite curiosity, were speedily discovered to be gold of great purity. For some time they preserved the secret, and are supposed to have gathered a very considerable quantity before it transpired. At length an Indian surprised them while occupied in searching, and although they endeavoured to divert his attention, and detained him for some time, he acquainted his tribe, by whose means it soon became known in the country. Such an unheard-of circumstance caused great surprise and some curiosity, but a few having tried for themselves, and having become most satisfactorily convinced of its truth, all other pursuits were abandoned, and all hands hastened to the "diggings," whilst wages, and all the necessities of life and labour, have risen to the most exorbitant prices. In the course of three months, 4000 people collected, digging and scraping early and late. The gold is found in three forms: granulated, of the size of medium gunpowder, and mixed with iron; in small scales or laminae, of from one eighth to one twelfth of an inch in diameter; and in solid lumps of from half an ounce to four pounds in weight.

In the East, the arms of Great Britain were not allowed to remain inactive, being once more challenged to a contest by a foe who, it was thought, had been effectually subdued. The immediate cause of the rupture was as follows:—Soon after the evacuation of the Panjab by the British troops in 1846, Moolraj, the dewan or governor of Mooltan, had become embroiled with the court of Lahore respecting the non-payment of his stipulated tribute to the treasury. By the mediation of the British authorities in India, these differences were at first temporarily adjusted; and at length, under their guarantee, the dewan was induced to trust himself in the city of Lahore for the purpose of personally arranging a final and amicable compromise. After this he returned to his province; but some time subsequently it was agreed, or alleged to be so, that he should retire from his office; and in pursuance of this understanding, the British officers, Mr. Vane Agnew and Lieut. Anderson, departed in the spring of 1848 from Lahore to Mooltan, to receive his surrender, and install his successor. While in discharge of this duty, they were treacherously and foully murdered. Moolraj then shut himself up in his fort, strengthened his defences, collected adherents from all parts of the country, and prepared to defy the British power. Immediately on intelligence of the murder reaching Lahore, a body of 3000 Sikhs, horse and foot, was ordered to march to Mooltan, under the command of Rajah Sher Singh. It happened that at this juncture Lieutenant Edwards was engaged upon the Indus with a small force, collecting the land-tax due to Moolraj. As soon as he heard of the assassination at Mooltan, he immediately took measures to effect a junction with the forces of Colonel Cortlandt, who had been commanding in a contiguous district; and this being accomplished, on the 20th May an engagement took place, in which the enemy were defeated with great slaughter, and the loss of two guns and five swivel pieces. The British troops then occupied the forts of the Dera and the line of the Indus. But they did not remain inactive. On the 16th of June, Lieut. Edwardes, having, with great skill and energy, formed a junction with the forces of the Rajah of Bhawalpoor, once more engaged the army of Moolraj, which, after a sanguinary conflict of nine hours' duration, was completely defeated with the loss of all its artillery. Moolraj now fell back upon Mooltan, in which he was immediately followed by the British and their allies. General Whish soon after arriving from Lahore with a large reinforcement, with a view to besiege the city, the whole British force assembled round the walls of Mooltan amounted to 28,000 men. The 12th of September was fixed for making a general attack upon the town. A party of the enemy having strongly entrenched themselves in a garden and village near the walls, 3500 of the British troops, under the command of Brigadier Harvey, marched at day-break against this post, and carried it after a severe struggle and much loss on both sides. Next day the Mooltanese troops made a desperate attack on Lieut. Edwardes' camp, but were repelled, and the British troops carried another important outwork. But at this critical juncture, Shere Singh went over to the enemy with the whole of his troops, consisting of 5000 men; and in consequence of this defection General Whish deemed it expedient to raise the siege, and fall back upon a position a few miles from the town. As it had now become apparent that a fierce struggle with the whole of the fierce soldiery of the Sikhs was at hand, a large force was ordered to assemble at Ferozepoor, under the orders of Lord Gough, and preparations on a large scale were made to crush this formidable rebellion.

On Oct. 9. Shere Singh separated himself from Moolraj, and by skillful manoeuvres led the whole of his force across the Ravee, and through the whole extent of Doab-Rechna, to the country north-west of Lahore, and south-east of Vysceerabad, where Chuttur Singh shortly after took up his position. On Nov. 21. It was found that Shere Singh was entrenched on the right bank of the Chenab, behind Ramnuggur, with nearly 40,000 men and 28 guns well placed. A picket of two regiments was posted advantageously on the left bank. Lord Gough despatched Major-General Thackwell with thirteen infantry regiments, besides artillery and cavalry, to cross the river some miles up the stream, and operate on the enemy's flank. Lord Gough personally led the attack on the advanced position. A surprise was attempted, but unsuccessfully. Some of the British troops fell into ambush, suffered great slaughter, and lost a gun. Among the losses sustained by the British in this engagement, were Col. Havelock, Gen. Careton, and Capt. Highbury, who fell in a gallant but unsuccessful charge against the enemy. After a variety of manoeuvres, in which Shere Singh displayed great ability as a tactician, the whole Sikh army abandoned their position at Ramnuggur, and marched upon the Jhelum.

Meanwhile, General Whish, having been joined by the Bombay troops, renewed the siege of Mooltan. The besieging army now amounted to 15,000 British troops; that of the allies to about 17,000; or 32,000 in all, besides 150 pieces of artillery. On Dec. 27. the troops advanced in four columns to the attack; and clearing the suburbs, and driving in the enemy on all sides, established themselves within 500 yards of the walls. A terrific cannonade and bombardment commenced next day. On Dec. 29. the besiegers had arrived so close to the walls, that their heavy guns were breaching them at a distance of no more than eighty yards. Tremendous damage was caused to the town; and in the fort a granary was set on fire, and several small magazines exploded. On the morning of the 30th, the principal magazine of the fort, in which nearly 800,000 pounds of powder were reported to have been stored, blew up with a terrific explosion. The dewan's mother, and several of his relatives, with many of the soldiers, and a great number of troops and people, were blown into the air; while mosques and houses, and huge masses of masonry, came tumbling down in destructive confusion. But with this grave event, our narrative must here close for the present.

In this memorable year's obituary are the names of two distinguished statesmen, Viscount Melbourne and Lord George Bentinck. The former for some time had retired from the active scene of politics, and was carried to the grave full of years and honours. But the latter was struck down in the vigour of manhood, and, it may be said, at the very commencement of a career which the great and various resources he had recently displayed, his boundless energy and uncompromising firmness, had made full of promise.

A. D. 1849. — Public affairs at the commencement of the parliamentary session presented no extraordinary feature. In England, the landed interest showed itself uneasy and dissatisfied with the great commercial changes that had recently taken place; and in Ireland, a lawless spirit still prevailed to some extent among the population. But commerce was reviving from the shocks which it had felt for the last two or three years; and the internal tranquillity of the kingdom was undisturbed. Great part of the session was devoted to the affairs of Ireland. A select committee having been appointed upon the Irish Poor Law, a committee of the whole house was agreed to, after a long discussion, to consider the government proposition of a "rate in aid;" and the debates that then ensued were chiefly remarkable for the speech of Sir Robert Peel, who at great length developed his own views respecting the state of Ireland, and suggested a plan for the redemption of landed property in that country. "If," said the right hon. gentleman, "technicalities and legal difficulties stood in their way, they should cut the Gordian knot and release the land." "Sooner than let the present state of things continue, he would altogether omit the Court of Chancery of its jurisdiction over the subject." These memorable words were soon followed by the introduction of a bill for facilitating the sale and transfer of encumbered estates. By means of it, a simple, short, inexpensive mode of selling and transferring land is substituted for the tardy and ruinous course of procedure which previously prevailed; and whether we regard the magnitude and stubbornness of the abuse it grappled with, the vigour and originality of the machinery it employed, or the vast and almost incalculable importance of the social change which its operation promises to accomplish in Ireland, it may justly challenge comparison with the greatest achievements of modern legislation.

Another most important measure of the session of 1849, was the bill introduced by the Government for the repeal of the Navigation Laws. After lengthened discussions in both houses, this crowning measure of the free-trade policy received the final sanction of parliament, and shortly afterwards obtained the royal assent; its operation being fixed to commence on Jan. 1. 1850.

We must now revert to the affairs of India. Our narrative closed last year with an account of the tremendous explosion of a large powder magazine in Mooltan, on the 30th of December, 1848, in the midst of the assault made by the British troops. But this produced hardly a pause in the conflict. After an incessant roar of cannon and musketry for about eight and forty hours, her Majesty's 32nd and 49th, and 72nd native infantry, pushed forward to a breach near the Delhi gate, but it proved impracticable. The troops then moved round to the opposite side of the town, where the entrance of the Bombay column had already been effected. The Fusiliers entered first, and placed the standard on the city walls. The Bengal column followed, and the city, which was taken about 3 p. m., was before sunset filled with British troops. The citadel, however, in which Moolraj had shut himself up, still continued to hold out; but practicable breaches having been effected, the British troops were about to storm the citadel, when Moolraj surrendered himself unconditionally, with his whole garrison. Mooltan having thus fallen, the troops engaged in the attack immediately commenced their march northwards, to join the grand army under Lord Gough, opposed to the two rebel chieftains, Shere Singh and Chuttur Singh.

On the 10th of January, Lord Gough received an official communication, that the fortress of Attock, which had so long been defended by Major Herbert, had fallen, and that Chuttur Singh was advancing to join his forces to those under his son Shere Singh, which then amounted to nearly 40,000 men with 62 guns. He, therefore, determined to lose no time in attempting the complete overthrow of the Sikh army in his front; and at daylight on the morning of the twelfth marched from Loah Zibbah to Dingee. The succeeding movements may be narrated in the words of his own despatch: "Having learned from my aples, and from other sources of information, that Shere Singh still held with his right the villages of Lukhneewalia and Futteh-Shah-keh-Chuck, having the great body of his force at the village of Lollia-walia, with his left at Russool on the Jelum, strongly occupying the southern extremity of a low range of different hills intersected by ravines which extend nearly to that village, I made my arrangements accordingly this evening, and communicated them to the commanders of the several divisions; but to insure correct information as to the nature of the country, which I believed to be excessively difficult and ill-adapted to the advance of a regular army, I determined upon moving on this village with a view to reconnoitre.

"On the morning of the 13th the force advanced: I made a considerable detour to my right, partly in order to distract the enemy's attention, but principally to get as clear as I could of the jungle, on which it would appear that the enemy mainly relied.

"We approached this village about 12 o'clock, and I found on a mound close to it a strong picket of the enemy's cavalry and infantry, which we at once dispersed, obtaining from the mound a very extended view of the country before us, and the enemy drawn out in battle array, he having either during the night or that morning moved out of his several positions and occupied the ground in our front, which, though not so dense, was still a difficult jungle, his right in advance of Futteh-Shah-keh-Chuck, and his left on the furrowed hills before described.

"The day being so far advanced, I decided upon taking up a position in rear of the village, in order to reconnoitre my front; finding that I could not turn the enemy's flanks, which rested upon a dense jungle, extending nearly to Hailai, which I had previously occupied for some time; and the neighbourhood, of which I knew, and upon the ravine hills, near Russool, without detaching a force to a distance; this I considered both inexpedient and dangerous.

"The engineer department had been ordered to examine the country before us, and the quartermaster-general was in the act of taking up ground for the encampment, when the enemy advanced some horse artillery, and opened a fire on the skirmishers in front of the village. I immediately ordered them to be silenced by a few rounds from our heavy guns, which advanced to an open square in front of the village. The fire was instantly returned by that of nearly the whole of the enemy's field artillery, thus exposing the position of his guns, which the jungle had hitherto concealed.

"It was now evident that the enemy intended to fight, and would probably advance his guns so as to reach the encampment during the night.

"I, therefore, drew up in order of battle, Sir Walter Gilbert's division on the right, flanked by Brigadier Pope's brigade of cavalry, which I strengthened by the 11th light dragoons, well aware that the enemy was strong in cavalry upon his left. To this were attached three troops of horse artillery under Lieutenant-Colonel Grant. The heavy guns were in the centre.

"Brigadier-General Campbell's division formed the left, flanked by Brigadier White's brigade of cavalry, and three troops of horse artillery under Lieutenant-Colonel Brind. The field batteries were with the infantry divisions."

"Such was the order of attack; but the question now arises, was it prudent under the circumstances to make the attack at all? The troops were wearied with their march, the day was almost spent, and there was no time to make proper preparations so as to avoid unnecessary loss of life. The truth seems to be, that Lord Gough was irritated by the fire from the horse artillery of the Sikhs, and suddenly changing his plan of waiting until the next day before he attacked them, he resolved to chastise their presumption upon the spot. If such be the fact, the commander-in-chief was certainly, in this instance, more brave than discreet, and his indiscretion cost us dear. No sufficient reconnaissance was made of the ground that lay between our troops and the enemy, and it was not known in what part of his line his chief strength lay.

"After a cannonade which lasted between one and two hours, the left division were directed to make a flank movement, and in obeying the order, exposed their own flank to a dreadful cross fire from Sikh batteries on their left which had not been observed, and on the third and fourth brigades ultimately reaching the guns, they were met by such a tremendous fire, that they were obliged to retire with severe loss. As soon as it was known that these two brigades were engaged, the fifth was sent against the centre of what was supposed to be the enemy's line, and advanced under Brigadier Mountain through the jungle in the face of a storm, first of round shot, then grape, and lastly musketry, which moved down the officers and men by dozens. Still they advanced, and on reaching the guns spiked every one in front and two others on the left, which had subsequently opened a flank fire on them; but the Sikhs no sooner saw they were deprived of the use of their guns, than they renewed such a fire with musketry not only on the flank, but in the rear of the brigade, that it was compelled to retreat—a movement which was effected in good order, and with determined bravery.

"In the meantime," we quote from a contemporary account, "Brigadier Godby, with Major General Sir W. Gilbert as a leader, who was on the extreme right of the infantry line, moved forward, and after marching through dense jungle for some minutes, came upon the enemy's infantry; the brigade opened their fire, but the enemy were in such numbers, that they easily outflanked them. Two companies of the second European regiment were wheeled up, showed front, and the whole charged, but had not gone far when they found they were surrounded. They immediately faced right about, kept up some fire-drilling and charged rear-rank in front. At this juncture Dawe's battery came to the rescue, and having beaten off the enemy, their guns were taken. While the infantry were thus highly distinguishing themselves, and earning imperishable laurels, the cavalry on the extreme left under Brigadier White had made a dashing charge and contributed much to the defeat of the enemy, while the cavalry on the extreme right, consisting of Brigadier Pope's force with the fourteenth light dragoons temporarily attached, having been taken in advance of their horse artillery, Lane's, Christie's, and Hulse's troops were directed to charge a body of the enemy's cavalry, variously estimated at from 1000 to 5000. Instead of obeying the orders given them they faced about, and in spite of the energetic endeavours of their own and other officers, left the field, (with the exception of a body of the ninth lancers who were rallied) and made direct for the artillery, on coming up to which, instead of pulling up, they dashed through Hulse's and Christie's troops, upsetting a waggon and some horses, and directing their course to the field hospital. The enemy, seeing the advantage they had thus unaccountably ensured, followed our cavalry, got amongst the horse artillery, cut down no less than 73 gunners, who had, by the flight of the cavalry through their ranks, been deprived of the means of defending themselves, and carried off 6 of the guns, two of which were subsequently recovered. A fire of grape was however poured in upon the advancing Sikhs, and they turned and fled.

"The British troops remained masters of the field, but their loss was very heavy: 26 European officers and 731 men killed, 66 officers and 1446 men wounded, making a total of 2269. Moreover 4 of our guns fell into the hands of the enemy, and five stand of colours, and the Sikhs, aided by the darkness of the night, were able to remove the greater part of the guns which had been taken by us during the struggle. Upon the whole, although the victory was complete, the policy and conduct of the action which had just been fought were most severely criticised. It was known by the name of the battle of Chillianwallah, from a village in the immediate vicinity of which the British army was encamped, and the news was received in England with a burst of sorrow, and we must add indignation. Want of due caution on the part of the general was patent on the face of the accounts of the engagement, and it was felt that it ought not to have been hazarded, nor so great a waste of life wantonly incurred. There was no need to test the courage of the soldiers who had been engaged in this campaign against the Sikhs, and the duty of the commander-in-chief was to effect the overthrow of the enemy by superior strategic skill, rather than by dashing exploits of personal valour, and hand to hand conflicts with the sabre and the bayonet. The consequence was an almost unanimous demand for the recall of Lord Gough, and the appointment of a general who would carry on the war in a more scientific and less desperate fashion. To this emergency all eyes were turned to Sir Charles Napier, the hero of Mervine and conqueror of Scinde, whose name was dreaded by the restless tribes of the Indus more than that of any other living man, and both the Government and the East India Company acknowledged the correctness of the public choice. Sir Charles Napier was without delay appointed commander-in-chief of the forces, and member extraordinary of the council of India, and he sailed from England at the latter end of March, to assume his duties in the East.

But in the mean time Providence had blessed our arms with a decisive and final victory, and the glory of Goojerat effaced all vindictive memory of the carnage of Chillianwallah." (Annual Register for 1849.)

On the 12th of February, the Sikhs drew up their cavalry in masses outside their camp at Chillianwallah, and under that cover the tents were struck, and the troops retreated in the direction of Goojerat. Lord Gough, with 25,000 men and 100 guns, then resolved to attack the enemy, numbering 60,000 men with 59 guns. The Sikh chief was strongly posted between two river courses, which protected his flanks, and yet allowed him good manœuvring space to retire either on the east or west side of the town of Goojerat, which afforded shelter and protection to his rear. The fight began at seven in the morning, and lasted throughout the day. The British army displayed the greatest gallantry; and the result was that, by four o'clock the enemy had been driven from every post, and was in general retreat, which the field artillery and cavalry converted into a total rout and flight. They were pursued with great slaughter for about 15 miles, and next morning an adequate force took up the direct pursuit, and detachments were sent to the points where retreat could most effectually be cut off. The result was, that 3 of the enemy's guns, and the whole of their ammunition and camp equipage, fell into the hands of the British.

This decisive engagement was followed by the most important results. Shere Singh and various other chiefs surrendered unconditionally. The flight of Dost Mohammed into Afghanistan, by dissolving the Sikh and Afghan confederacy, gave the finishing blow to the existence of the Sikhs; and the Punjab was forthwith declared to be a portion of the British empire in India. At a public durbar held on the 29th of March, it was agreed, that Dupleep Singh should resign the sovereignty, that all the property of the state should be confiscated to the East India Company, and that the famous diamond, called the Koh-i-noor, or Mountain of Light, should be surrendered to the Queen of England.

The year 1849 will long be memorable for the reappearance of cholera in appalling strength. On that occasion, this frightful disease did not, as in 1832, arise in one unhealthy spot, and thence radiate to congenial localities in other parts of the kingdom, but it reappeared in all its terrors simultaneously, and in all parts of the country, sparing neither the rich in their mansions nor the poor in their hovels, though its chief ravages were committed wherever neglect, vice, or poverty pressed upon the population. As soon as its presence was distinctly ascertained, every attention was paid to the subject by Government; parochial and district boards were forthwith organised; and every measure that humanity and prudence could suggest was resorted to check the progress of the disease. Nor were its ravages confined to England. As in 1832, it made the tour of the globe; the main points in which it differed from the former visitation being the longer continuance of the disease in the places visited, the greater tendency to subside and reappear, and the higher mortality it occasioned. In the metropolis it raged with terrific violence during the third quarter of the year, till it reached its climax in the week ending Sept. 8., during which period the deaths amounted to the enormous number of 12,847.

Among the numerous fair fruits of restored tranquillity in Ireland, was the inducement it offered to the Queen to visit a part of her empire hitherto known to her only by name. That gracious visit was a well-timed proof of the royal confidence in the unshaken allegiance of the great bulk of the Irish people; and it was likewise a compliment to the energy, prudence, skill, humanity, and moderation by which the unfortunate tumults of the preceding year had been so happily composed. The appearance, indeed, of the Queen among her Irish subjects was all that was wanting to complete the ascendancy of loyalty over treason, and of order over tumult. Nearly thirty years had elapsed since a British sovereign had appeared in Ireland; but there was little in common between the visit of George IV. and that of Queen Victoria, save the ordinary and formal incidents of a royal progress. The crown of England (deriving its lustre from the laws and liberties, the rights, franchises, and institutions, which contribute to the peace and welfare of the realm), possessed for the Ireland of 1821 little of the glory that now belongs to it. Those popular principles and sympathies, which are its brightest jewels, and which are now firmly set in it for ever, were wanting. It was not at that time, what it is at present, on the brows of Queen Victoria, — the diadem of a monarch dear to and identified with all her subjects. In that character, at once august and affectionate, she made her summer voyage to Ireland. Her visit was to the nation; and the nation which welcomed her was not only loyal but free. Her progress, comprehending the capital and principal cities, afforded the people of all orders and classes opportunities of testifying their joy and presenting her with their homage.

In the chronicles of royal progresses, there are few descriptions of a scene more splendid, more imposing, more joyous, or more memorable, than the entry of the Queen, accompanied by her Royal Consort, the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal, into the Irish capital. Never did a city pour out her inhabitants in vaster masses, or enjoy a more triumphant holiday. The houses were roofed and walled with spectators, throng above throng, until they clustered like bees around the vanes and chimney-tops. The noble streets of Dublin seemed to have been removed, and built anew of her Majesty's delighted subjects. The squares and large spaces resembled the interiors of crowded amphitheatres. The façades of the public buildings were formed for the day of radiant human faces. Invention had exhausted itself in diversifying the language of greeting and the symbols of welcome. The chariot of the gratified sovereign passed for miles among gay streamers, waving banners, festal garlands, and under gigantic arches, which seemed constructed of solid flowers, as if the hand of Summer herself had raised them. Joyous music at every point sent forth appropriate strains of gratulation; but neither flowers, nor arches, nor music, could have expressed the feelings of the myriads who rejoiced upon that secular occasion; the jubilant shouts alone which tore the concave, and were audible, loud and clear, not only above drum and trumpet, but above the saluting thunders of the fleet, adequately conveyed to the Queen's mind the gladness which her presence inspired.

The close of this year witnessed the death of the Queen Dowager, Adelaide. Her Majesty's health had long been feeble; but in the autumn of 1849 her debility assumed an alarming form, and after lingering a few weeks she died December 2nd, sincerely regretted by all classes of the community.

A.D. 1850. — This year opened with more cheering prospects than might have been expected. The bill for the repeal of the Navigation Laws, which had been passed the preceding year, far from putting an end to the public agitation for Protection, seemed only to have doubled its intensity. At the close of 1849, meetings sprang up on all sides, in which the Protectionists and Free Traders fought all their battles over again. The latter had all the ardour which is inspired by the desire of defending a recent conquest against adversaries who are at work to destroy it: the former had all the vehemence produced by a lost position and deeply affected interests. In the midst of these hostile dispositions, Parliament was opened by commission on the 1st of Feb. The prevalence of distress among the agriculturists formed a topic for regret in the speech from the throne; but as a set-off, great stress was laid on the increase of our foreign trade, and the cheapness of the comforts of life to the working classes. In opposition to the usual address, an amendment was ineffectually moved in both Houses of Parliament, embodying the complaints of the owners and occupiers of land, and seeking for relief. But these apparent triumphs of the Cabinet were soon seriously endangered by the division on the motion of Mr. Disraeli, for a Committee on the "Barbours on Land;" and especially to consider the necessity for an immediate revision of those poor law charges which rest wholly on such property. The Cabinet's admission in the royal speech, of the distress of the agriculturists, naturally formed a good point of attack for the mover of the Committee, and seriously embarrassed the Ministry in opposing his motion. The adhesion of Mr. Gladstone and other members of the Peel party to the motion, rendered the division very close, and gave the Ministry a majority of no more than 21, in a House of more than 620 members. Colonial affairs, and in an especial manner the West India question, also threatened the existence of the Ministry. The appointment of the Ceylon Committee, to inquire into Lord Torrington's conduct during the Ceylon riots, that had taken place in 1848, proved how little confidence was placed in the Colonial Office, whilst the resolution of Sir Fowell Buxton, affirming the injustice of exposing free-grown sugar to competition with slave-grown sugar, was rejected by the narrow majority of 275 to 234.

But by far the most important debate of this session arose out of the affairs of Greece. At the commencement of this year, intelligence had reached England that, in consequence of the refusal of the government of Greece to accede to demands which the British Government had made on account of certain British subjects, Admiral Sir W. Parker had been directed to proceed to Athens, and not obtaining satisfaction, had blockaded the Piræus, and had had recourse to other stringent measures. On the receipt of this intelligence, many persons otherwise friendly to the Government, manifested considerable dissatisfaction, considering such peremptory proceedings towards a feeble state like Greece unworthy of the dignity and reputation of the British nation. Soon after the meeting of Parliament, questions were addressed to the Government on the subject, and lengthened discussions took place, the object of which was to show that the nation did not sympathise with the Government in the course which it had thought fit to adopt. Lord Palmerston having, however, accepted of the good offices of the French Government, hostilities had ceased, and every thing promised a peaceful termination to this untoward affair, when it became known that the French ambassador, Baron Gros, who had been deputed to confer with Mr. Wyse, the British minister at Athens, had failed in his mission. Meanwhile, a convention was agreed to in London between Lord Palmerston and M. Drouyn de Lhuys, by which the whole matter was to be arranged. Before this convention was actually signed, the French Government despatched a steam frigate to the Piræus, to announce the basis of the proposed agreement to Baron Gros; but from some inexplicable cause, Lord Palmerston sent no instructions to Mr. Wyse on the subject; and the latter, in complete ignorance of the measures agreed to in London, gave notice to the Greek Government that he would immediately recommence coercive measures unless the demands of the British Government were unconditionally complied with. These demands were acceded to; but the French Government, to mark its sense of what it believed to be a want of good faith on the part of Lord Palmerston, recalled its ambassador from London, and only agreed to his return when the British Government consented to be bound by the stipulations of the convention in which he had borne a part. But the matter did not rest here. In the House of Lords the blockade of Greece was discussed at great length, and Lord Stanley brought forward a motion of censure against the Government, whom he reproached with having violated the principles of the law of nations, and having compromised the good understanding of England with the continental powers. After an animated discussion, Lord Stanley's motion was carried against the Government in a full house by a majority of thirty-seven. It was at first supposed that in consequence of this defeat the ministry would resign; but Lord John Russell showed by precedents that an adverse vote in the House of Lords does not necessitate the resignation of a government, nor a change in its policy. It was, however, deemed expedient that something should be done to counterbalance the moral effect of the vote in the House of Lords; and Mr. Roebuck gave notice of a comprehensive resolution, approving of the whole foreign policy of the Government. The debate on this motion lasted four days; all the most distinguished members of the House took part in it. A powerful defence of his policy was made by Lord Palmerston, who travelled over the whole ground of attack, and with varied and well put arguments maintained that he had not failed in his duty in the proud position of the minister who wielded the power of England, and fearlessly challenged the verdict of the House upon the principles of his policy. In a House, consisting of 574 members, the division gave a majority of 46 in favour of the Government. The victory thus gained would have created immense sensation, but for the melancholy event by which it was immediately followed. Sir Robert Peel had taken a prominent part in the debate just closed. His speech was distinguished by a manly generosity of tone, well suited to the lofty, though unofficial position, which he had occupied for four years; and though compelled to dissociate himself from the foreign policy of the Government, few will forget the sensation produced by his generous language in reference to Lord Palmerston,—"We are all proud of him!" The day after this memorable debate, while riding up Constitution Hill, his horse started and threw him. He was conveyed home, and medical attendance was instantly with him; but the internal injuries he had sustained proved too much for his susceptible frame, and after intense suffering of three days' duration, he expired on July 2nd. The intelligence of this sad event was heard with dismay. The House of Commons immediately adjourned out of respect to the memory of the great statesman; and next day in both Houses, members of all political parties gave utterance to their feelings of regret for his loss. Lord John Russell on the part of the Government, promised that the deceased should be honoured by a public funeral,—the highest tribute of respect to an individual which the House of Commons could pay—but Mr. Goulburn, on the part of Sir Robert Peel's family, declined this offer, in consequence of the often expressed and written desire of the illustrious dead, to be "interred without ostentation or parade of any kind." A national monument, however, was decreed to his memory in Westminster Abbey; and her Majesty would have conferred on his family the honours of the peerage if they had not been respectfully declined.

The last important business with which the House was occupied previous to its rising, was the attempt of Baron Rothschild to sit without taking the usual oath. Wearing apparently of waiting for the promised Government measure, on the 26th of July the baron presented himself at the table of the House, and demanded to be sworn on the Old Testament. After a discussion this was conceded, but when the oaths were tendered, on coming to the words on the faith of a true Christian, the baron said, "I pass them as not binding on my conscience," and concluded with the remaining words of adjuration. But this evasion of the law was not supported even by his ministerial friends, and the result was, that these words were affirmed to be an essential part of the oath, and the baron was declared to be not entitled to his seat in the House.

Among the most important acts bearing on the well-being of the community passed this session, may be mentioned the 'Act to make better Provision for the betterment of the Dead in and near the Metropolis,' the Factories Amendment Act, a bill for the better Government of the Australian Colonies, a bill for the Alteration of the Stamp Duties, and a bill for Altering the Qualification of Parliamentary Votes in Ireland. The 8th day of July witnessed the death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who had endeared himself to all classes of the community by his affability and bonhomie.

In the autumn of this year Great Britain was thrown into a state of political and religious excitement, almost unprecedented in its history. It was occasioned by the attempt of the Pope to re-establish the Roman Catholic hierarchy, which had been extinct since the Reformation. Without permission of the Crown, or any negotiation with the Government whatever, Pope Pius IX. divided the whole of England into twelve sees, and assigned these to as many Roman Catholic bishops, with territorial jurisdiction. The chief of them was Dr. Wiseman, who was created Cardinal and elevated to the rank of Archbishop of Westminster. Dr. Wiseman issued a pastoral letter, which was read on the 27th day of October, 1850, in all the churches and chapels of the Romanists, congratulating catholic England on the re-establishment of the Roman hierarchy. In it he used the startling expression, "Our beloved country has been restored to its orbit in the ecclesiastical firmament, from which its light had long vanished."

The nation was the more surprised at this, inasmuch as the position of Pío Nono was not such as to warrant any expectation of a step so audacious. Little more than a year had elapsed since his own subjects in Rome itself had rebelled against him, murdered his prime minister, and compelled him in the disguise of a mendicant to fly from Rome, nor was he restored except by the arms of the French, who besieged and took Rome in 1849. That the Pope, while holding his own little dominions on so precarious a tenure, should venture to assume such an exercise of supremacy over the most powerful nation in the world—a nation so jealous of its independence, which had so long been, and which still was, most averse to his claims,—seemed almost incredible to the people of England, and they were proportionably indignant.

The excitement produced by this intelligence throughout England was prodigious; and the flame was fanned by the publication of a letter which Lord John Russell had addressed to the Bishop of Durham, in condemnation of the Pope's proceedings. Every county, city, and almost every town, held meetings in the utmost alarm and indignation, and resolved on petitioning the Queen and Parliament to do something or other to prevent the Pope's measures from taking effect; and especially to annul all claims to local and territorial jurisdiction in this country. When the excitement was at its height, Cardinal Wiseman published a subtle defence of himself and the popish measure, which he addressed to the people of England, and whether consistently or inconsistently, pleaded in the most strenuous manner for the inviolable observance of the principles of "religious liberty." But the great body of the people turned a deaf ear to this appeal; and many, even of the Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen, viewed the papal rescript with no favourable eye, considering, as it did, their aspirations of ultramontane tendencies, which but a short time previously had been exhibited in Ireland. For the aggression of the Roman Catholic Church had not begun here. A synod of Irish Catholic archbishops, bishops, and inferior clergy, had been recently held in Dublin, under the direction of Archbishop Cullen, the Pope's legate; and great indignation was manifested by the Protestant population throughout the country, when it became known that the Queen's Colleges, which had been established in 1845, to enable the youth of Ireland to obtain secular instruction, had been solemnly condemned by the synod, and that its acts had been forwarded to Rome to be submitted to the approval of the Pope. But flagrant as was this invasion of the civil rights of the community, it did not appear desirable that it should be checked by legislative interference; and we must reserve for next year's narrative an account of the measures that were adopted to meet the new act of aggression.

But before entering on the second half of the nineteenth century, we cannot refrain from pausing for an instant to look at a few great landmarks of progress, which the lapse of half a century has raised around us. To begin with the most palpable. In 1800, a party travelling from Edinburgh to London would leave the former city on Monday forenoon, and reach the metropolis on Thursday evening, occupying nearly four days and three nights on the journey. Fifty years afterwards the same journey could be accomplished in twelve hours; and intelligence, which of course occupied the same time between the two capitals, can now be transmitted "swift as meditation." The tidings from India which, at the least, were four months on the way, can now be speeded to Bombay in a month, and to Calcutta in six weeks. There is no doubt that steam and its wonderful application to the use of man, has been the main agent in the progress of the half century now past. But many other discoveries have signalled the half century. In manufactures they are infinite, at once simplifying and improving the process—increased capacity of production with corresponding diminution of cost. In looking back to the half century just closed, let us also not forget that while the transmission of intelligence is wonderfully expedited throughout the empire, as contrasted with 1800, all classes of the community enjoy the advantage of sending a letter from Falmouth to the Shetland Isles, or from any part of the British Isles to another, for the trifling cost of one penny. This we contend has been a boon more extensive in its use, and beneficent in its effects, than almost any social amelioration that has been devised.

If we turn to the political history of the last fifty years, we find the commencement of the century ushered in by wars which, even at that early period of the contest, had added largely to the national burdens. We had vainly lavished our treasures and sacrificed our armies in attempting to check the first but terrible sallies of the French Republican arms, and although those reverses by land were in some degree compensated by those brilliant naval victories achieved towards the end of the eighteenth century by Lord St. Vincent, Lord Duncan, and Lord Nelson, in which the fleets of Spain, Holland, and France were successively humbled; yet the 19th century began amidst gloom, peril, and uncertainty. While warriors gathered laurels, many nations were plunged into wretchedness. And could any one have foretold that fifteen years would elapse and Europe, from the south of Spain to Moscow, would experience the actual devastation of war ere peace should be restored, we dare say that nations would have almost sunk under the prospect. The half century, however, closed after Europe had enjoyed thirty-five years of almost uninterrupted tranquillity, the great powers having been at peace with each other, and the warlike episodes that have occurred having been confined to contests within nations themselves when they could not agree as to the sovereignty; as, for example, Spain or Portugal, or revolts by the subject from the dominant power, such as Poland from Russia, Hungary from Austria, and Schleswig-Holstein from Denmark. But the general peace of Europe has been preserved, even while the revolutionary tornado of 1848 swept over the chief kingdoms, and the battle raged in the capitals. Whatever hostility dwelt within individual nations, and sought vent in civil contention, we have happily seen no desire to kindle a general war. Hence the latter half of the 19th century may be said to emerge with every prospect of the continuance of peace — a hope that we might say is strengthened by the ordeal through which Europe has passed since February, 1848. If we look to the other side of the Atlantic we see the United States prosperous as ever; but it is not the lot of any nation to be free from care and trials, and if the United States are exempt from many ills familiar to us, yet we find them threatened with a fierce contention which may one day shake the Union; — the institution of slavery, which they inherited from us. It may therefore be a legitimate source of congratulation to Great Britain, in reviewing the political progress of the last half century, that the slave trade was abolished throughout the British dominions, and twenty-seven years later slavery itself was swept away.

The latter part of the half century has also to record many eventful political changes, in addition to the extinction of slavery, but all smothered, like it, the growth of more enlightened and liberal ideas. The consolidation now rests on a broader basis than the Reform act of 1832. The miniature constitutions of the cities and burghs of the three divisions of the Empire, have been silently enlarged. The trade with India has been thrown open — the duties on exports entirely removed, and the import duties repealed or modified as to corn, sugar, and the staple necessaries of life. As a sort of sequel to this policy, and to convince foreign nations of the high and generous motives which now actuate this country in its commercial policy, the year 1851 was to be signalised by the industry of all Nations, congregated in one huge fabric in the metropolis — a spectacle which ought surely to beget good-will among nations, and be an earnest of a happy progress to the last half of the 19th century.

A. D. 1851. — At the commencement of this year, two subjects, though diametrically opposite, engrossed the minds of the community: the Papal aggression, with the incasures likely to be adopted to counteract it, and the Great Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations. It was generally expected that, with the exception of some measures calculated to abate the pretensions of the Papal See, the session of Parliament would be barren of legislative results, and that the fervour of politics would give way to the amenities which the great commercial jubilee would naturally inspire. How far this expectation was realised will be seen in the sequel. The Parliament was opened by the Queen in person, on Feb. 4. Her Majesty in the royal speech dwelt with satisfaction on the continuance of peace and amity with foreign nations: on the termination of hostilities between Denmark and Schleswig-Holstein, through the exertions of the German confederation in carrying out the stipulations of the treaty of Berlin: on the conclusion of an additional treaty with the King of Sardinia: and on the new measures taken by the Government of Brazil for the suppression of the slave trade. Her Majesty having alluded to the estimates of the year, which "were framed with a due regard to economy and to the necessities of the public service," proceeded to remark on the satisfactory state of the revenue, notwithstanding the large reduction of taxation in late years, and upon the flourishing state of the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom. The difficulties still felt by the owners and occupiers of land her Majesty lamented, but hoped that the prosperity of other classes of her subjects would have a beneficial effect in diminishing those difficulties, and in promoting the interests of agriculture. Her Majesty then foreshadowed the principal Government measures of the coming session; a bill to prevent the assumption of certain ecclesiastical titles conferred by the Pope; bills for improving the administration of justice in the several departments of law and equity; and a bill for a registration of deeds and instruments relating to the transfer of property.

Following the order of the measures here adverted to, Lord John Russell, on the 7th of Feb., in a most able and interesting speech, moved for leave to bring in a bill to counteract the aggressive policy of the Church of Rome. The debate was protracted during four nights by successive adjournments; and at length the motion was carried on a division by 395 against 63. The extent of this majority sufficiently demonstrated the feeling which pervaded the country in regard to the Papal aggression; but a sudden stop was put to the further progress of the measure through Parliament by events to which we must now more particularly advert. Before the session had lasted a month, a ministerial crisis had arisen, and the seals of office had been resigned, only to be taken back again after an interval of a few days. The weakness of the ministerial party had long been admitted, whilst the strength of the conservative opposition had been increased by the accession of several votes from the Peel section, after the death of their great chief. Taking advantage of the fresh admission of agricultural distress contained in the royal speech, on the 11th Feb., Mr. Disraeli renewed his motion on the burdens on land and the inequality of taxation, in the form of a resolution of the House affirming the duty of the Government to provide some immediate relief for that distress it publicly admitted, and pretended to denounce. To this proposition, the Cabinet replied by again denying the existence of the distress, or ridiculing the proposed measures for its relief. On a division, their majority could muster only 241 members, whilst the minority had risen to 267 votes. But close upon this victory, followed their defeat in a small House by their own friends; on the question of extending the county franchise to ten pound householders. Convinced of their own decline, but, as was surmised, hoping, by an immediate resignation, to anticipate the tactics of the Conservatives, and perhaps prevent their future accession to office, the Cabinet resigned, and Lord Stanley was sent for by the Queen. After a day's consultation with his friends,

Lord Stanley declined to take office until every other means had failed to constitute a government among the leaders of the majority. Lord Aberdeen, and Sir James Graham, were severally sent for by her Majesty, and entrusted with the formation of a new ministry; but all the negotiations for this purpose proved abortive, the two latter statesmen announcing their repugnance to take office while the bill to counteract the Papal aggression was unsettled. The Queen, therefore, on the advice of the Duke of Wellington, once more recalled the Whigs to office; but from that period, to the close of the session, the Cabinet existed on the sufferance of its opponents. Finance was the weakest point in the ministerial programme. In the middle of February, the first budget of the year was proposed, but found little approval or support. Another three years' lease of the income tax was demanded, and a partial remission of the window duties, and some removal of a few thousand pounds each, of agricultural burdens, were promised, but the ministerial crisis of March destroyed this budget. On the 5th of April the second budget appeared. By this the window tax was wholly repealed, a house tax imposed, and the bonus to the agriculturists withdrawn; but still the income tax was redeemed for three years. This budget found more favour than its predecessor, and its main details were carried. The House, however, marked its objection to the income tax, by limiting it to a single year, as well as nominating a select committee to inquire into its operation. Two other temporary defeats, on financial matters, were suffered by the Government—that on home-made spirits in bond, and that on the attorneys' certificate duties—and though these defeats were afterwards retrieved, the weakness of the Government was made fully evident. The ecclesiastical titles bill, introduced by the Cabinet, was regarded with little favour by any party. The more zealous Protestants viewed it as practically ineffective. The Romanists looked on it as an insult, and all the more insulting from its inefficiency; whilst the Peelites denounced it as inconsistent with the principles which the Whigs had professed for so many years on the subject of religion. Chiefly by the votes of the Conservative majority, several important amendments were carried against the Government, who, however, consented to adopt them, and thus made the bill more palatable to the country. The close of the parliamentary session was marked by an attempt of Alderman Salomons, who had a short time previously been elected member for Greenwich, to take his seat without the usual oath. This incident gave rise to lengthened discussions, during which, Alderman Salomons both sat and voted; but the House, on the motion of Lord John Russell, at length passed a resolution, denying the right of the honourable member to sit or vote, until he had taken the oath in the form appointed by law.

But while fierce discussions were raging in Parliament, the public attention was fully engrossed by another subject, to which we shall briefly advert. "The Great Exhibition of the Works of Industry of all Nations" in 1851, will be recorded in the annals of future ages as the first event of the kind which has occurred in the history of mankind. It is true that many expositions of industrial productions had been previously held from time to time in various other countries; but they were always restricted to the works of the particular nations or localities, to the exclusion of the rest of the world, and were thus in reality little else than large fairs, where the extension of private commercial dealings was the chief object in view. France especially had set the example of similar expositions in former years, carrying out the principle of encouraging and rewarding improvements in arts and manufactures, by the display of specimens of national industry, in a building set apart for the purpose. But the aerial fabric termed the Crystal Palace, designed by Mr. Joseph Paxton, in Hyde Park, London, for the English celebration of the Exhibition of Industry of all Nations, surpassed in extent and magnificence, and wondrous adaptation of means to ends, all former displays of our continental neighbours, and all that the most sanguine and enterprising of its projectors could have conceived. The Exhibition was opened with imposing solemnity by Her Majesty Queen Victoria, May 1st, in the presence of 25,000 persons. Never was a more imposing spectacle. East, West, North, and South had poured forth their treasures, the produce of the earth, the mine, machinery, and art. It is impossible, within our limits, to enter into any details respecting this gigantic undertaking; but as this great emulative gathering of nations formed a new and remarkable incident in the history of England, some of the most important facts relating to it may be suitably condensed for the purposes of reference. The site of the Crystal Palace was on the vacant space on the S. side of Hyde Park, between the Kensington Road and the Serpentine, 33m. 8, by W. of General Post Office. Its figure was a cross, being oblong, with a central transept rising 108 feet. Extreme length of building 1,851 feet, corresponding to the year of erection; extreme breadth 456 feet; area nearly 19 acres, or seven times the area of St. Paul's Cathedral. It was traversed from W. to E. by a central avenue 72 feet wide, on each side of which N. and S. ran aisles, and above them 4 galleries, extending the entire length of the structure and its width, the avenue excepted. In these spaces the articles exhibited were classified and displayed; the more conspicuous objects occupying the main avenue and transept, with choice sculpture, fountains, and parterres of flowers and rare plants interspersed. The ground floor and galleries contained 4,000,000 square feet of flooring, and afforded frontage 10 m. in extent for the exposition of goods. The roof was a furrowed one, with an awning of unbleached calico, and consisted, as well as the sides to within a few feet of the ground, of glass frames 49 inches by 10. About 4,000 tons of iron were used, and 600,000 cubic feet of wood. The contract price of erection was 150,000*l.* If the materials were retained, or 70,000*l.* If returned, it was begun and completed, except as to details, in seven months. It was open to the public 144 days, and the daily average admission was 42,536 persons. The number admitted in the last week was double the average of any preceding week, and the greatest number admitted in one day (Oct. 7.) was 109,915. The total number of exhibitors was 15,000. Foreign exhibitors occupied two-fifths of the space of the palace, and carried off three-fifths of the honours. There were 166 "council medals," which were the highest distinction; of these 79 were awarded to British, and 87 to foreign exhibitors; the "prize medals," 1,244 British, and 1,632 foreign; the "honourable mentions," 716 British, and 1,326 foreign. About one-third of the exhibitors were deemed worthy of some kind of recognition. The Exhibition was closed to the public on Oct. 11.; and shortly afterwards her Majesty conferred the honour of knighthood and other distinctions on those gentlemen, to whose zeal, ability, and active co-operation with Prince Albert, much of the success of the novel scheme must be attributed. It would far exceed our limits to enter upon any of the great questions, moral, social, and industrial, which are naturally suggested by so gigantic an undertaking, thus successfully concluded. But whatever else the results of this Exhibition may prove, it will have served a large and national purpose in enlightening the world on the real condition and character of the inhabitants of this country. It will have proved on the widest scale, and in the least controvertible form, that all sections of the people combine the most indomitable energy with an intense love of order and regard for their own institutions. Few designs ever awakened more alarm at its outset, or ever inspired greater apprehensions for its success during its progress; but in the same proportion few realisations were more complete, and no consummation more likely to be pregnant with lasting good. We have only to add that the general opinion was strongly in favour of the preservation of the Exhibition building, but this being adverse to the terms on which its site in Hyde Park had been temporarily conceded, a new Crystal Palace was commenced erecting at Sydenham, Aug. 5, 1852, more expressly and artistically appropriate to popular recreation and instruction.

The close of this year witnessed the death of the last and eldest surviving son of George III., Ernest, King of Hanover, better known in this country as the Duke of Cumberland. Unlike most of his royal brothers, his Majesty never courted, and certainly never enjoyed, much popularity in England; and the despotic measures which were adopted immediately after his accession to the throne of Hanover, were not calculated to inspire his subjects, either with confidence in the present or hope in the future. But such was the consistency of his conduct, and his uniform good faith, that public feeling had of late years undergone a great change in his favour, and at the time of his death, he was beyond all question the most popular of the German sovereigns.

A. D. 1852. — The opening of the parliamentary session of this year was looked forward to with considerable curiosity; for an important change in the Cabinet — the dismissal of Lord Palmerston from the office of Foreign Secretary, which to many seemed unaccountable — had taken place during the recess; and nothing but ministerial explanations, it appeared, could throw light upon the subject. On the 3rd of Feb. the session was opened by her Majesty in person; and soon after the royal speech was delivered, Lord John Russell availed himself of an opportunity presented to him by one of his supporters, to enter into the eagerly desired explanations. From these it appeared, that Lord Palmerston had on various occasions acted independently of his colleagues; and as more especially in opposition to a resolution passed in the Cabinet, "to abstain from the expression of opinion in approval or disapproval of the recent coup d'état in France," his Lordship had, both in public despatches and private conversation, spoken favourably of the policy adopted by the French President, the Premier resolved to call upon him to resign the seals of office. This took place on the 24th Dec. 1851; and Earl Granville was appointed Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his room. These explanations over, the attention of Parliament was speedily occupied with two questions of great importance: the Defence of the Country, and the new Reform Bill. Of the latter we need only say, that it was received with few manifestations of approval even by the friends of reform: while the ministerial scheme for organising the militia, gave Lord Palmerston an opportunity of ousting the minister by whom he had been dismissed. On the 20th of Feb. the Militia Bill came on for discussion, when Lord Palmerston moved to omit those words from the preamble which would convert the projected force into a general instead of local militia. This motion was carried by 136 to 125, and on that hint the premier, who, it was said, was in dread of a motion closely impeding on the policy of Lord Grey towards the colonies, resigned office, and Lord Stanley, who had since the ministerial crisis of last year succeeded his father as Earl of Derby, was once more entrusted with the task of forming an administration. During a short parliamentary adjournment which took place, the following list was completed: — Lord Chancellor, Sir Edward Sugden, created Baron St. Leonards; President of the Council, Earl of Lansdale; Lord Privy Seal, Marquis of Salisbury; Home Secretary, Right Hon. Spencer Walpole; Colonial Secretary, Sir John Pakington; Foreign Secretary, Earl of Malmesbury; First Lord of the Treasury, Earl of Derby; Chancellor of Exchequer, Right Hon. B. the Cabinet, the following were not:—Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl of Eglington; Commander-in-Chief, Duke of Wellington; Master-General of the Ordnance, Viscount Hardinge. On the re-assembling of Parliament on the 15th of March, the Earl of Derby made a long and eloquent speech in the House of Peers, in which he declined to pledge himself to a particular course in regard to any measures, though he did not desire to go back to the law of 1846 with respect to corn. While he frankly owned that, in his opinion, the imposition of a moderate duty, producing a large revenue, and enabling other kinds of taxation to be taken off, with hardly an appreciable effect on the food of the people, would be just, economical, and advantageous to the country; he thought that no minister ought to bring forward such a proposition, unless he was sure, not only of a bare majority, but of a very general concurrence of opinion throughout the country. The enunciation of these views was favourably received, both in and out of Parliament; and the ministry having declared that, as a speedy dissolution of Parliament was contemplated, none but the most pressing measures should be brought forward, all factious opposition was abandoned. The measures that were subsequently introduced are so fresh in the recollection of the reader, that we need only glance at the leading points. The Mutiny Bill, after lengthened discussion, was carried by a large majority; New Zealand received a constitution; various social and sanitary improvements were effected; and, above all, extensive changes, amounting in many respects to a thorough reform, were made in the proceedings of the superior courts of law and equity. These and other measures having been passed, Parliament was prorogued by the Queen in person on the 1st July; and on the same day dissolved by royal proclamation.

We must now advert briefly to the state of our colonial dependencies. Since the annexation of the Punjab to the British territories in 1849, no ground for uneasiness has arisen in that quarter. The present Governor-General of India, the Marquis of Dalhousie, has consolidated the victories of the British arms, by adopting a policy of conciliation; and there can be little doubt that the conquered people have already learned to prefer the legal government of Great Britain to the turbulent sway of their former chiefs. It is to be feared, however, that a second Burmese war has commenced. Some insults having been offered to the British flag by the Viceroy of Rangoon, the Governor-General of India at once took measures to avenge them. At the time we write (Sept. 21.), the British troops have already captured five principal cities, Martaban, Bassein, Rangoon, Pegu, and Promie, reconnoitred the banks of the Irrawaddy, and remained four months in the enemy's country, without loss, save from the climate, of more than 100 men. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the king of Ava will see the necessity of giving ample satisfaction for the conduct of his viceroy; and thus putting an end to a war which, whatever may be its consequences to us, must inevitably bring ruin upon himself.

But if we have cause for satisfaction in looking at our dependencies in the East, it is with very different feelings that we turn to our colonies at the Cape, where a fierce war has been carried on for eighteen months with the Caffres at a vast, and it is to be feared, useless expenditure of blood and treasure. To make the narrative clear to the reader, a few geographical details of the colony may not be out of place. Three large rivers, running in nearly parallel directions from north-west to south-east, and discharging themselves into the sea, supply as many available lines for the eastern or Caffrarian frontier of our Cape colony. The first of these is the Great Fish River; the second, the Keiskamma; and the third the Kei. Between the first and the second lies the recently annexed province of Victoria; between the second and third the extensive district, called British Caffraria; and, beyond the third, the territories proper of the independent Caffres, among whom the most powerful chief is Kreli. Thus by the last settlement, the Kei was intended to be the Caffre frontier, and the Keiskamma that of the colony; British Caffraria, as its designation imports, being a compound or neutralised country between the two borders, intended to serve as a barrier province. It was strengthened by a chain of military outposts, and being occupied by Caffres, though garrisoned by the British, it was hoped that future wars could be either prevented altogether, or confined to this particular field. To the north of British Caffraria runs a range of considerable highlands, called the Amatola Mountains, constituting a wild and almost impenetrable district, and the whole country along the Keiskamma is covered with dense thickets, or broken into rugged ravines.

Soon after Sir Harry Smith was appointed governor of the Cape, he summoned a meeting of the Caffre chiefs. A great many assembled; but Sandilli, who was the most formidable, and regarded as a sort of king among them, having refused to appear, he was formally deposed by the Governor from his authority; and the Caffre chiefs, at a second meeting, elected Smith, or the "Great Widow" as she was called, to rule over them in his stead. All attempts of the Governor, however, to induce the chiefs to effect the capture of Sandilli, were in vain. Sir Harry Smith, having meanwhile received information that the Caffre chief was lurking in the neighbourhood, thought he might be able, by a sudden sortie, to make him prisoner; or, at all events, force him to abandon that part of the country. He therefore ordered Col. Mackinnon, at the head of 600 men, to make the attempt. In pursuance of this object, Col. Mackinnon took his way up the valley of the Keiskamma river. On reaching a narrow gorge, where his men could only proceed in single file, a deadly fire was opened upon his column by the Caffres; and it was only after the serious loss of three officers, and sixteen men killed and wounded, that he succeeded in extricating his troops from the defile, and in dislodging the Caffres. This attack in the Keiskamma defile was the signal for a general rising amongst the Caffres, but it would be of little interest to enter into details of the events in this miserable war, which was carried on by skirmishes and random conflicts with bodies of Caffres, and in which the peculiar nature of the country rendered the savage fully a match for the disciplined soldier. It will be sufficient to give a general outline of the system of military operations adopted by Sir Harry Smith in this inglorious campaign.

When Sir Harry Smith was first surprised by the intelligence that Sandili was in insurrection, he repaired immediately in person to British Caffraria, took post at King William's Town, the chief station, and opening his communications with the other forts to the right and left, endeavoured to detain the insurgent Caffres round these posts, and thus keep them out of the colony until he was sufficiently reinforced to act on the offensive. His design was, as soon as he could gather strength, to concert a general movement from the British forts upon the Amatolas, the chief stronghold of the enemy, and to finish the war by routing him in his last retreat. The first part of the scheme was successful; that is to say, the Caffres exhausted their violence in vain efforts to force the British positions, and for some weeks it was considered that the device of thus making a neutral battleground had answered its purpose. At length, however, (though not till after material delay), Sir Harry effected his advance upon the Amatolas, and, as far as the immediate operation was concerned, with good result, for the mountains were penetrated in all directions, and the savages expelled. But, unluckily, when the British Commander abandoned the fighting ground of the forts, the Caffres did the same, and pushed on adroitly to Sir Harry's rear, and threw themselves upon the farms of the colony while he was marching on the Amatolas. The consequence was, that the war, instead of being finished, was transferred from British Caffraria to our own provinces; the savages ensconced themselves in strong positions, such as the "Waterkloof," in the very centre of Albany, and, after repelling all attacks, remain there still. Sir Harry could do no better than attempt to dislodge them by storm, but though the positions were more than once lost, they were habitually re-occupied, and very little progress was made. Finally the British Commander determined to advance to the Kei, and invade the Caffres in the remotest of their abodes. It was argued that on former occasions this movement had been productive of the happiest results; that the country was favourable to the operations of regular warfare, and that the Caffres, when their own properties were thus menaced, would sue for peace. Accordingly, the expedition was carried out, and with apparent success — the Amatolas being also again secured so completely, that, according to the official despatches, only three Caffres could be discovered by the most powerful telescope. A few weeks, however, brought several more specimens into view, and Sir Harry resigned the command into the hands of General Cathcart, just as it was ascertained that the Caffre bands within the colonial border were as numerous, as bold, and as well provisioned as ever. Thus all the operations of the British, though directly successful, were wholly ineffective in putting down the enemy or bringing the war to a close.

We have only space to advert here to the discovery of an extensive gold region in our Australian colonies. The effects of the discovery on the value of gold remain to be seen; but in the meanwhile it has given an impulse to emigration, which promises to be as lasting as it is beneficial. It was not until September, 1851, that the first intelligence of the new El Dorado was received in England, and some little time elapsed before the news became sufficiently assured to tell upon the public mind. Its effects, however, are now showing themselves. The emigrants to Australia, in the first four months of this year, were more than twice as many as in the corresponding period of either of the two preceding years. Since April, too, the excitement has been rapidly extending, nor is there any reason to conclude that it has yet reached its height.

In the course of the summer, considerable alarm prevailed as to a possible rupture between England and the United States, in consequence of the steps recently taken by the Ministry, at the instances of our North American colonists, to protect the fisheries on their coasts. In disregard of the treaty of 1812, which excluded the Americans from fishing in the bays of the British coasts, the New Englanders, it appears, have never ceased to fish on the coasts of Newfoundland, justifying their presumed breach of the treaty on the ground that if a bay or inlet were so spacious as to admit of a vessel entering without coming within a league from either shore, such bay should be considered as open sea. At Boston, a memorial was addressed to President Fillmore, representing that 2,000 vessels, and 30,000 seamen, are engaged in the fisheries, representing property valued at 12,000,000 dollars; and a very decided demonstration was made in all quarters that the advantages gradually assumed would not be yielded without a struggle. It is stated, however, though not officially, that a good understanding has been restored by the British government conceding in perpetuity that access of the American fishermen which had hitherto been permitted on sufferance; and thus all danger of a rupture is fortunately averted.

THE HISTORY OF IRELAND.

CHAPTER I.

There is no other country in the world the history of which has been written and commented upon in so unwise and unjust, not to say unchristian, a temper and tone, as that of Ireland. And, strange to say, the persons who have been the most frequently and the most violently wrong in their statements of the evils of Ireland, and on their proposals for remedying them, have been precisely those persons who have made the loudest professions of desire to serve her. It is not worth while to say how much of this mis-statement has arisen from their want of correct information, and how much from a deliberately bad spirit; certain it is, however, that Ireland has few worse enemies than those who in ignorance or in evil-temper attribute motives and feelings to England and English statesmen of which they are quite innocent, and who assign for Irish poverty and Irish suffering causes which have really had no part in producing them, and thus assist in maintaining a most fatal ignorance of the real causes not only in the minds of the sufferers themselves, but even in those of too many public writers and legislators upon whom so much of the nation's weal or woe depends.

Unwise laws and harsh rule of centuries long passed are quite coolly cited as proof of a partial tyranny of Ireland by England; yet a single glance at our statutes, a single reflection upon the punishments which to a very recent date were still allowed to disgust the wise, thrill the merciful, and brutalize the bad, would show that Ireland was not a jot less mercifully governed than Kent or Yorkshire, and that the cruelties of English law, whether administered in London or in Dublin, at Bristol or Cape Clear, were no proofs of English dislike of Ireland; but the inevitable result of the ignorance of which the laws of every nation have required long centuries of the patient toil of the good and the wise to rid them.

The folly which flatters nations with fables of antique splendour and consequence which are sternly contradicted by every page of their authentic history is, if ludicrous, at the least harmless; but they who aid a vast body of people to close their eyes upon the real causes of the worst evils to which a people can be subjected, incur a most fearful responsibility; for surely he who aids in perpetuating the causes of famine, discomfort, anti-social feeling, vice, and crime, is to be looked upon in no other light than as the instigator and creator of those evils; and however painful the duty may be, it is one from which we must not shrink, to express briefly, but emphatically, our firm opinion, that the deadliest enemies of Ireland have been and are precisely those persons who arrogate to themselves all patriotic and all just feeling, and whose anti-English railings, however much they may fail to irritate the common-sense of England, have not failed and cannot fail to act most injuriously upon the worst ignorance and fiercest prejudices of Ireland. The delusions of self-flattery may be pardoned and dismissed with a pitying smile; but a sterner sentence must wait the misrepresentation which walks hand in hand with malignity, and which abuses and libels one gallant and high-hearted race, only to the effect of keeping another no less gallant and high-hearted, though far less reasonable race, in a moral and physical degradation which is terrible even to witness.

Thus much we have deemed it necessary to say in reprobation of the shameful and absurdly unreasonable abuse that is heaped by Irish orators and writers upon the English government as to its treatment of Ireland. Were that abuse less injurious to the millions of Ireland it would be unworthy of notice; but it unfortunately happens that in attributing Irish distress to English oppression, Irish mismanagement is sanctioned and Irish suffering perpetuated; and it thus becomes a duty as imperative as it is painful to destroy the illusion, as far as we may be able, that has been so artfully and unfairly thrown around the subject.

The early history of most countries is so uncertain, that but little more credit is due to it than to any other romance; and when we read of the splendours of a country which during the whole period of its authentic history has been poor; of the power of a country which during all the period of its authentic history has been divided, turbulent, and weak; and of the learning and civilization of a country which even now has less of diffused learning and civilization than any other country in Europe, it is quite consistent with the severest logic and with the utmost charity to look upon the relations of the historian as being founded rather upon fancy than upon fact.

The best authorities agree in stating Ireland to have been peopled from the Spanish colonies of the partly trading and partly piratical Phœnicians; and this statement, credible from the unanimity of authorities otherwise conflicting, is still further strengthened by the facts of the Phœnicians having been well known to have traded largely with the British isles, and of the frequent finding, even at the present

STONE QUARRIES ABOUND IN ALMOST EVERY PART OF THE ISLAND.

IRELAND IS VERY FERTILE IN CORN, VEGETABLES, AND GRASS, ESPECIALLY THE LATTER, WHICH FEEDS MILLIONS OF HEADS OF CATTLE.

THE CLIMATE OF IRELAND IS MORE VARIABLE, AND BOTH HEAT AND COLD MORE MODERATE, THAN IN ENGLAND.

FROM THE INSULAR POSITION OF IRELAND AND THE PREVALENCE OF WEST WINDS, THE ISLAND IS PROPERLY FOR ITS HUMIDITY.

day, of ornaments and utensils which are indubitably of Phœnician manufacture. That gold and silver mines existed in Wicklow and some other parts of Ireland is asserted very positively, but we think with far more positiveness than proof of their productiveness; certain it is, that a recent attempt to find gold in a district in which it was once said to abound, proved to be a complete and lamentable failure. If, as seems to be certain, Ireland was once colonized by individuals of a people so wealthy as the Phœnicians, that fact would at once account for the valuable articles so frequently recovered from the soil. But it by no means goes to prove that Ireland in the early ages could boast of either learning or civilization of the high order claimed for it. It is not the most refined or most learned class that will venture into far and foreign lands to war with the wild animals, to reclaim the morasses, and to level the primeval forest. The hardest, the rudest, the least civilized; those who have the most to hope for and the least to lose or to fear are the men who usually go forth to colonize strange lands; and the Phœnicians who seized upon Ireland as their abiding place, were in all human probability the hardy and resolute rovers of the sea for many a long and strife-ful year before they became dwellers upon and cultivators of the land. That they came from Phœnicia, from a civilized, ingenious, and wealthy land, proves literally nothing as to their own civilization or their own wealth, as any one may perceive who will take the trouble to observe the majority of the colonists who leave the civilized and luxurious nations of our own day, to build cities in the desert, and to place palaces and thronged markets stored with costly wares where, even within the memory of man, the dense forest sheltered only the wild animal or the scarcely less savage man.

The Phœnician colonists of Spain were at once eager speculators and bold seamen; visiting the British coast as traders, especially in order to procure tin, they could scarcely fail to admire the soil and climate of Ireland, and could have but little difficulty in subduing or destroying the mere handful of poor and all but actually savage aborigines; who must have been a mere handful, destitute as they were of commerce or manufactures, and warring, as we know that they did at a much later date, with the wolf and the hill fox who disputed the swamp and the forest with them.

When historians tell us that splendidly manufactured and extremely costly articles are frequently excavated from the Irish soil, we do not dispute the accuracy of the statement; but we deny its cogency as proving that the early colonists of Ireland were learned, or civilized, or even wealthy. A magnificent ornament or a costly and ingenious machine taken from France or England to the arid desert of Africa or the swampy flat of the Swan River would prove that the country had been visited by people from a wealthy and civilized land, but certainly not that the individuals were themselves either the one or the other; in short, as a general rule, the very fact of emigration would be decisive on the opposite state of the case.

That the Phœnicians were the dominant people in Ireland—anciently called Ierne, or Erin, which signifies the western land,—and that the Magi, or priests of the worshippers of Persia, were the actual governing authorities, both lay and religious, as the Druids were in Britain, there is abundant proof. From the far East, indeed, Europe seems to have been supplied with its early superstitions, as well as with the fierce swarms of nomade and desperate barbarians, who, entering Europe on the north, at length found even the vast steppes and forests of Scandinavia too narrow for them, and whose furious assaults levelled cities and terminated the stern rule of ages, only in the end, to found nations at once mightier in conquest, wiser in law-giving, and possessing, as it should seem, as great a superiority in permanency, as in extent, of empire. As the aborigines, if such existed when the Phœnicians colonized Ireland, had made way for a more civilized, wealthy, and luxurious people, so these in their turns were soon obliged to make way for or submit to a fiercer and more hardy people. The Scotti, one of those Scandinavian hordes which under the various names of Northmen, Sea-kings, Danes, and Saxons, defied un navigated seas and natural barriers to prevent them from over-running the fairest and richest portions of Europe, (a. c. 200) sent forth from the north of Spain, where they had been colonized, a powerful and fierce horde led by Milesius: Hence these Scotti are more commonly called Milesians; the term Scotti being generally confined to another swarm of the same fierce race, which at a later date endeavoured to settle, also, in Ireland; but, unable to effect their purpose, departed northward, and founded the powerful Scots, who, now at war with the Picts and now in alliance with them against the comparatively civilized Britons, were so long famous for strength, courage, and perseverance, before they were famous for aught else; and who taught even the Roman legions to respect them as foes, ages before they had any of those arts of peace which the Roman eagles had heralded into many other lands.

That the vast immigrations which have changed the face of all Europe originated in the east of the world, and that the north of Europe, by whatever tribes nominally peopled, was, in fact, but the resting place and nursery of such immigrants, very many circumstances go to prove; but perhaps none more strongly than the general resemblance in both the political and the religious rule of tribes nominally and directly coming from distant parts and settling in distant parts. Thus we find that the Phœnicians direct from the east of the Mediterranean strikingly resembled, in many points, both civil and religious, the Scotti or Milesians of the Spanish coast who cretainly had settled there from the north of Europe, where, it is nearly as certain, they had originally halted on their march from the eastern quarter of the world; and these, again, in like manner resembled the Britons. Between the Magi of the Phœnician Irish, (those priests of the false faith of Zoroaster who were perfectly undisturbed in their rites, or rather usages were continued in their power as priests, sages, seers, and statesmen by the fierce Milesians,) and the Druids of Britain, there were so many and such striking resemblances, that the Milesians called their priests Magi and Druids indiscriminately. The dark grove and the unsparring sacrificial knife of the stern and unquestioned priest marked both offshoots or corruptions of the fire-worshippers; and the mysteries, cruelties and sacrifices, from the first fruits of the earth to the first born child of the idolator's family, of the Druids were, with but such difference as long journeys and distant residence will easily and fully account for, the mysteries, the cruelties, and the sacrifices of the Magi, too.

The dreadful and fierce sacrifices of the Druids were put an end to in Britain by the Romans; but, strange to say, that mighty and enterprising people seem never to have visited Ireland, where the Magi exercised their terrible rite quite undisturbed during all the long lustres of the Roman sway in Britain. Yet, geographically speaking, Ireland was well known to the ancients. The Greeks called it Ierne, the Romans Hibernia; and it was also called the Holy or Sacred Isle, not, as has been with much defiance of chronology and common-sense affirmed, on account of its owing its Christianity to one of the immediate disciples of the great founder of our faith, but to the precisely opposite reason that it was notorious as the residence of the Magi, and as the scene of their terrible rites long after those rites had disappeared elsewhere before the all-conquering and all-reforming Roman.

The Scotti, or Milesians, whether intermarrying with the Phœnician first colonists, or annihilating them, are the real ancestors of the Irish people; and yet we are asked to believe in an almost unbounded wealth, learning, and civilization, among this horde of semi-savages; these contemporaries and co-equals of the other Scandinavian and Scythian hordes who, probably during ages, had been wandering by slow degrees and in savage guise from the steppes of Tartary to the forests of Germany, and from the bleak north, with its ice-chained rivers and piercing blasts, to the luxurious coasts of Spain and Portugal, and the voluptuous plains and rivers of Italy! The glories and the magnificence, the learning, piety, and national fame of such people may be subjects equally convenient and unexceptionably for the romancer and the poet; but for the historian and the orator, the statesman who makes, or the student who suggests laws, to ask our belief in such manifest absurdity, and to ground upon such absurdities fierce declamations against a generous, great, and wealthy people, as having ruined these antique splendours by their injustice, and as having planted semi-barbarism where there was refinement, is not only too ridiculous for belief, but too much even for patient endurance.

That some wealthy Phœnicians settled and traded on the coastward counties of Ireland, as they did on the coasts of every country from the extreme west of the Mediterranean to their own antique Canaan in the extreme east of that sea, is quite true; just as it is that a Heracell, devoted to science, has ere now set up his observatory within sight of kraals of those Caffres who are but a step above the very brutes which they hunt down for food; and just as it has been true in all ages of the world, that millionaires in their fierce and unslaked thirst after more gold, have gone forth to dare the desert and the storm, the savage beast and the scarcely less savage man. But these Phœnicians gave place to or were amalgamated with a fierce, brave, rapacious and miserably poor horde, whose long residence at first in the bleak north of Europe and subsequently in the north of Spain, without arts and but too often without sufficient subsistence for their swarming population, had left them no trace of their common eastern origin with the Phœnicians, save general resemblances between the religious rites of the one and the religious traditions of the other. These were the real ancestors of the Irish people; these were the "ancient Milesians" and "Irish of the old time" in whose gold and gems, in whose piety, learning, and delicate breeding we are called upon to believe.

Had Ireland been so civilised and learned at this early day, we should surely not be even now ignorant whether the round towers were Phœnician temples or beacons for the Scotti, the Danes, and the other hostile settlers or piratical visitors of Ireland; and had Ireland been so rich at that day, the Romans would never have left her in contempt and in unvisited security, while ruling and reforming Britain for nearly four centuries.

We conclude this chapter, then, with stating and with begging particular attention to the statement,—that the early history of Ireland is as fabulous in all that relates to glory, learning, wealth, and heroes, as any other early history whatever; that, in the case of Ireland this fabulous turn of early writers has been made the foundation of great injustice committed by later writers, and by orators and statesmen, too, as to England; that though, no doubt, English kings and their advisers in past days may have unwisely decreed or unjustly acted in Ireland, as in any other country, yet Ireland never began to be civilized, populous, learned, wealthy, or important, until connected with England; that English connection has done much, and is still doing much, to make Ireland both prosperous and happy, and would do far more but for the fierce party spirit of some, and the equally fierce but still more disgraceful personal selfishness and ambition of others, which are constantly and throughout that torn land at work to perpetuate the grossest prejudices and the basest feelings. This, indeed, will incidentally become so evident in the course of the history of Ireland, that we only make this emphatic general statement, because we deem it an act of real and important justice to both England and Ireland, and, substantially, even a more important justice to the poor of the latter country than to the wealthy and powerful of the former, thus to draw the special attention of all readers of history, and especially of all young readers, to the utter incorrectness of the ill-natured declamations which charge England with an injustice never committed, by way of supporting the character of Ireland for an ancient prosperity which she never possessed.

CHAPTER II.

THE very early power, wealth, and learning of Ireland seem to be negative in a variety of ways; the nature of the government of the country would alone, we think, have been quite sufficient, in addition to the worst species of heathenism, to render its achievement of prosperity at home or influence abroad a thing quite impossible. A plurality of kings in different districts of a very limited territory, and those districts for the most part destitute of natural partitions, must necessarily make a people barbarous or keep them so; and what could be expected when five kings—each having a host of turbulent, ambitious, and to a very great extent independent chieftains and their clans, or septa to keep in order—divided the sway of the comparatively small portion that was falsely inhabited of so small an island as Ireland. In England, in Scotland, in India, in America, in France, every where, in all climates, and under whatever civil or religious rule, numerous sovereign powers without natural partitions have produced hostilities and jealousies, which have made each rival power in its turn the easy prey of an invader, or of some one of the rival powers themselves that chance, skill, superior virtue, or surpassing wickedness, inspires and enables to overwhelm the others. Had the Indian tribes of North America been united under one head, whether that head had been a monarch, or the chief village of the most powerful of the whole federated tribes, the pilgrim fathers and the first bold pioneers who looked from the rock of Plymouth, with eager eye and covetous heart towards the mighty forests and rich prairies of the far west, would have left their landing place on that rock, only to return to it appalled and in despair of finding even in the new world a refuge from the evils which had driven them forth in disgust, weariness, and natural love of life from the old world; or they would have fallen beneath the tomahawk and the scalping-knife, and their bones would have whitened in the wintry air, after furnishing many a feast to the panther and the bald eagle.

The enmity of tribe to tribe, it chiefly was, that kept the red man inferior in every way to his white foe, and enabled the latter to destroy whole tribes in succession, with less actual loss to himself than it would cost him to put down an ordinary town riot in the streets he had reared where the forest lately waved,

"And wild in woods the noble savage ran."

The same thing is remarkably observable even in India. Wealth, learning which is antique if limited, a subordination of ranks, and a simplicity of living utterly undreamed of in Europe; all these have not sufficed to prevent a vast portion of Indian wealth, Indian territory, and Indian rule, from being grasped by a mere handful of European merchants. Had the Indian princes been united, we should now have a mere factory, as at China; but the eternal rule prevailed here as elsewhere; each rival prince hated his fellow's power and valued his own, and no one of them was powerful enough to compel union even where union alone could save. In South America the Spaniards owed their success to the same cause; and if ever the fast increasing states of North America, spreading as they do over so many degrees of latitude that some have the productions of a high northern climate and others the productions of the tropics, shall allow commercial jealousies to prevail over political feeling, it is by no means improbable that two monarchies may arise on the ruins of the one existing federation of republics.

When the ancient kings of Ireland and the ancient glories of Ireland are spoken of, inexperienced readers of history are very apt to picture one king of Ireland swaying the whole Irish territory from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear, and from Galway-bay to the Hill of Howth. This, however, was so far from being the case, that within that island there were five separate kingdoms, always jealous of each other, and frequently at open war, either against each other or against one or more of the turbulent chieftains, whose power, recklessness, and utter detestation of peace and quietness, subdivided each of these five kingdoms into several more, with rulers who were more likely to quarrel frequently, and to sanguinary result, than the kings themselves, from the very proximity and comparative pettiness of each chieftain's possession, and the increased bitterness and personal sense of injury which entered into every dispute whether personal or territorial.

The five provinces or kingdoms of Ireland were Meath, Leinster, Munster, Connaught, and Ulster. The first named was considered the chief sovereignty; at the hill of Tara, famed alike in true history and bard's romance, which was situated in that kingdom, was the great assemblage of princes and chiefs; and the other four kings were nominally tributary to the king of Meath, just as the tanists, or chiefs of septs, in their respective kingdoms were to them. But in all these cases alike the subjection of the inferiors was merely nominal, and was thrown off or acknowledged just as the caprice, convenience, or interests of the inferior dictated. With a very small island thus divided among very many fierce, proud, jealous, and scarcely half-civilized rulers, it would be strange indeed if the history of Ireland, while such a state of things existed, could afford matter of sufficient interest to occupy the reader's attention. In truth, a ruder state of society short of that extreme barbarism in which, literally, every man's hand is against his fellow man, could not exist than that of Ireland under her early Milesian kings. The tribute paid by the sept to the tanist, by the tanist to his immediate king, and by the kings and chief tanists to the king of Meath, was, when paid at all, paid in the solid shape in which all other claims were paid, even to the fee of priest or harper, viz. in cattle. That a country which is said at that very time to have exported gold and silver in exchange for foreign luxuries should not have hit upon coined gold and silver, or even upon ingots, however rude, of those metals, for a home currency, to avoid the great inconvenience and loss attendant upon a system of barter, in many cases demanding the purchaser or debtor to drive his live legal currency from one end of the island to the other, seems to say as plainly as any fact can testify for another, that the gold and silver mines of that day in Ireland were not more productive than they have been more recently; and that the ornaments which have at times been found, whatever they may say for Phœnician taste, or wealth, or skill, bear strong testimony against both the Milesian people and their kings and princes having been perfectly destitute of all three.

Kingdom against kingdom, sept against sept, neighbour against neighbour, and often brother against brother and son against father; such was the state of society which, however lamentable, was quite inevitable and natural under such a system. To refuse to pay a tribute was to declare war against a superior; to insist upon the payment of a tribute was, generally speaking, to call the inferior to arms, aided by all the power, or, as they called it, all the "back," they could command.

Sometimes, indeed, a superior who could not procure payment of so many head of sheep or horned cattle, alive and in good order, would invite himself and his "back" or "following" to board and lodging with the defaulter for a period proportioned to the tribute, rent, or other debt in default; and when the self-invited guest chanced to be a great tanist or other personage with a numerous following, the unwilling tenant, as in the case of many recorded "royal progresses" in England, felt the effects of entertaining his superior for many a long year afterwards in baron and byre, in field and house. So ruinous, indeed, were these self-invitations, these coskerings, in which we may easily believe that a powerful creditor would sometimes eat more beef and mutton than could ever have been covered by the skins of as many oxen and sheep as were due to him, that it was no uncommon thing for the visited debtor, in sheer desperation, to call together his "back," and very fairly refuse to allow a morsel of his food or a drop of his drink to pass the lips of his creditor. In this case a sanguinary fight, leading probably to a dozen or more in explanation or support, in reprobation or in vindication of the conduct of one or other of the parties, was usually the result. How could a people thus situated, a people, too, high of heart and hot of head, and ready of hand, beyond almost any other people on the face of the earth, be otherwise than a turbulent, a divided, an always noninfluential and a frequently diseased and starving people? Barter and tribute in kind among people who carry arms and are prone to bloodshed, is only another name for perpetual war, arising out of the desire of the weak to cheat and of the strong to extort.

The wealth and power of a prince or other great man in a country situated, as to barter and tribute, as Ireland was, necessarily depended upon the extent and fertility of his land; and as though there were not in the ordinary course of things only too much temptation to bloodshed, the law for the division of landed property on the death of the owner was admirably adapted to awaken avarice into scheming, and hate and jealousy into sanguinary violence.

In a land in which bloodshed and disturbance were not the occasional and rare exception, but the frequent, almost the constant rule, cousins and more remote relations, nay even brothers themselves, were but too apt to live upon terms which were little likely to make them desirous to benefit each other; but the law said that a man dying possessed of landed property should not bestow it solely upon his children—to whom he would naturally be more attached than to any one else, but that all male relations even to the most distant, and without the slightest reference to friendliness or feud however deadly or long standing, should equally share with the eldest or best beloved child. It thus often chanced that the eldest son, or only son, of a deceased tanist or chieftain called his friends and sept around him, and pursued his cousins or male relatives to the actual death, as the only means of keeping his position in society by keeping his property intact and unbroken. Nor did even the chieftainship itself of necessity descend to the eldest, or any, son of a deceased tanist; he whom the family and the sept of the deceased chief elected as worthy was to succeed; and it is unnecessary to say that rivalry and partisanship not unfrequently proceeded to the full length of bloodshed and even of murder.

The residence of the chief was usually a long low wooden hut, situated on a hill top, surrounded by a lawn or yard, and defended by a rampart of mud; and caves, natural or excavated, were the residence of the meaner persons of the sept, whose attire was chiefly composed of undressed sheepskins. Cloaks and other garments of woollen cloth, of scarlet or some other gay colour, were not uncommon among the higher people; though it is not improbable that even much later than the period at which romance and factious feeling have joined to paint this people as being learned, luxurious, and wealthy, even this coarse and almost primitive manufacture only reached them through the medium of foreign traders and native pirates, who had great skill in the management of the coracles or currachs which they, like the Britons, constructed of wicker frames covered with skins of beasts.

The bards, an idle, imaginative, and not remarkably moral set of men, were not merely the attendants upon and diverters of the chieftain's hours of recreation and wassail; the chieftain's bard was also his recorder, and we may cease to wonder at the exaggerations that have come traditionally down to us when we consider that, besides gaining at every generation, these marvels were originally said, sung, and written—if written at all—by men whose comfort depended upon the complacent feelings of him whose deeds and possessions they sang, and who, therefore, were certainly under no very great temptation to observe a too rigid adherence to squalid or paltry realities. Every chieftain had his bard, and the chronicles thus composed of the affairs of all the chief families in the kingdom are said to have been committed to the care of keepers in the royal castle of Tara, but to have been burned about the middle of the fifth century after Christ, in common with all the magian or druidical writings, by order of St. Patrick; by no means the least service that that excellent first bishop of Armagh—so excellent a bishop that even the stupid exaggerations attached to him as a saint cannot diminish him in the eyes of those who admire usefulness and piety—rendered to the benighted land in which he and his handful of coadjutors from Rome, were the first to preach the gospel.

CHAPTER III.

We have spoken of St. Patrick as of a benefactor to Ireland; even the falsehoods of sedentary monks and of wandering and immoral bards and story-tellers cannot throw an air of ridicule over his truly Christian and venerable character; and higher praise, seeing their power of making truth doubtful and grave things ludicrous, it would not be easy to bestow.

The horrible superstitions which the Milesian priests propagated and supported by stern and unsparring cruelty remained in full force for above four centuries and a quarter after the light of the gospel had shed its rays of divine and glorious brightness upon nearly all the rest of Europe. Elsewhere the gospel no sooner was preached than it had its converts, convinced beyond the power of human sophistry, and faithful even unto martyrdom; but Ireland remained the prey of the bigot heathen, the abode of the heathen who was deluded, or the heathen who was coerced.

In one of the frequent piratical excursions that were made by the Irish, Mac Niel, a petty king, landed on the coast of Brittany, slew, burned, and spoiled; and brought spoil living as well as dead, human as well as brute. Among the captives was a youth of some fifteen or sixteen years of age, who, on arriving in Ireland, was sold as a slave and employed in herding sheep. This youth was the afterwards so celebrated St. Patrick. Naturally of a thoughtful turn, the mountain track and the forest glade in which his vocation caused him to spend much of his time, deepened all his meditative habits, and gave zeal and fervour to his native religious impressions. "He looked upon the land and saw that it was very good;" but he saw that it was peopled by idolaters and polluted by idolatrous cruelties. Even amid the bitterness of the reflections caused by his own situation, a slave and a captive in a foreign land, he felt that it would be a great and a truly Christian deed to open the eyes of the blinded heathen among whom his lot was so unhappily cast, and save their minds from the bondage of a false faith, and the lives of their firstborn from being sacrificed in torture at the flaming altars of senseless and graven idols. Fortunately, Patrick had scarcely attained the age of manhood ere he escaped from his slavery and got safely back to France, and for upwards of twenty years applied himself with constancy and diligence to learning, such as was then attainable. But neither the long lapse of years nor the pride of cultivated and matured intellect, could banish from his mind the recollection of the unhappy state of the Irish, or his early determination to make the attempt, at least, to enlighten their minds, and to raise their social condition.

A. D. 432.—Accordingly in the year 432, and when he was himself about forty-five years of age, he applied to the pope for permission to preach the gospel in Ireland. Such a permission was willingly granted by the pope, and Patrick, accompanied by a few French monks whom he had interested by his descriptions of the character and condition of the Irish, landed in Ulster, after an absence of nearly or quite a quarter of a century.

The foreign garb and striking appearance of Patrick and his companions filled the peasantry whom they first encountered with the notion that they were pirates, and preparations were made for driving them back to their vessels. But their quiet demeanour, the benevolence of their countenances, and the earnest and simple assurances given by Patrick, in the language of the peasants, that he and his companions had arrived on an errand of peace and good-will to all men, speedily converted fear and hostility into admiration and confidence. The hospitality of the principal people was cheerfully and heartily bestowed upon the disinterested strangers who had traversed land and sea in the hope of benefiting their rude but cordial entertainers; and Patrick and his companions presented themselves at Tara attended by a numerous and enthusiastic cortège. The mild and venerable aspect of the preachers gave full weight to the sublime and benevolent doctrines which they propounded. King and people listened at first with interest, and then with full and deeply interested credence; and in an incredibly short time after their first landing, idols and idol-worship became hateful to the people, the Christian doctrines were everywhere received, and churches and monasteries arose where the flames had but recently licked up the blood of the shrieking and expiring human victims of ferocious error or more hateful fraud.

The success with which Christianity was preached from the very first was such, that even the warmest and most interested advocates of the idolatrous worship seem to have made by no means such strenuous or fierce efforts in opposition to the new faith, as the general bigotry and sanguinary ruthlessness of their own precepts and practice would have taught one to anticipate. Occasional violence, indeed, was displayed by both the magi, or druids, and isolated groups of the more fanatical of their deluded followers; and upon more than one occasion St. Patrick was himself in considerable danger of being butchered. But there was none of that general and rapturous enthusiasm of opposition which could seriously or for any long time impede the progress of doctrines, which attracted by their novelty, and fixed and interested by their benevolence no less than by their authority.

On the other hand, the mission of St. Patrick, although it destroyed paganism in Ireland, not only produced none of that individual suffering which but too generally accompanies extensive changes, however good and desirable in themselves, but it immediately and to a vast extent improved the political and social state of the converted people. There was no massacre, no sweeping and sanguinary persecution of the priests or people of the old faith; but both seem quietly and imperceptibly to have adhered to Christianity. The temporal distress to which the magi or druids might otherwise have been subjected, as a consequence of the change of faith of those who had previously supplied their revenue was, doubtless, to a very great extent, prevented or shortened by the early and rapid founding of an immense number of churches and monasteries, to the service of which the converted magi were not merely eligible, but, in fact, indispensable. Episcopal sees were established throughout the country, and Armagh was made the metropolitan see, of which the Irish apostle was himself the first prelate. Learned, active, and pious, St. Patrick's conduct so well warranted and seconded his precepts, that the preachers of the Irish churches and the monks of Ireland's numerous monasteries soon became famous throughout Europe for such branches of learning as were then attainable; Irish monks traversed foreign countries as secular and religious teachers, and the music of the Irish churches was performed in a style of such unusual excellence, that in the reign of Pepin teachers were sent for to Ireland at an expense of great magnitude, considering the general poverty of the time, to instruct the nuns of Nivelles, in France, in psalmody.

The reforms effected by St. Patrick were doubtless of a most extensive and valuable kind; and, as has already been pointed out, the early establishment of numerous monasteries must have had a very potent effect, both in aiding the peaceful propagation of Christianity, and in averting the temporal evils which so extensive and sudden a change might otherwise have produced. But the monasteries, which at first were so valuable, soon became both mischievous and onerous; to found them came to be considered a set-off against the most enormous crimes and the most unchristian life; and to inhabit them was too often considered preferable to the exercise of the Christian usefulness which benefits society, and the Christian virtue, in the true and original sense of that word, which endures the evils of life instead of flying them, and lives to resist and overcome the temptations of the world instead of vegetating in ignorance of them. For the most part, indeed, the religious recluses of both sexes were subjected to very strict rule. Their diet was scanty and simple, their fasts frequent and severe, and their pilgrimages long and painful. But the seclusion of such a multitude of persons from the ordinary avocations of society, and the employment of vast sums in founding and endowing their abiding places, could not but be a great evil in a country which was still poor in spite of its natural fertility, and still very imperfectly civilized, in spite of the fame which a portion of its population acquired for solitary piety and unproductive learning.

But though, whether politically, morally, or religiously, the undue number of religious establishments and their inmates was an evil which could not but become more and more enormous with every succeeding generation. Though the Christianity of both the doctrine and practice of Ireland at this portion of her history was far beneath the genuine practical and apostolic Christianity, it is impossible not to perceive that St. Patrick,—pious, benevolent, and, considering the age in which he lived, learned,—laid a broad and a solid foundation for the improvement that island has made since its connection with England.

From the information which we derive from St. Patrick himself, we gather some curious particulars of the condition of the Irish people during his time. Thus we find that the numbers of colours to be used in dress were particularized for each rank; and we may from the relative number of these, allotted to the three principal ranks, form a shrewd judgment of the degree to which the magi, from whose ranks the bards, lawyers, and historians, as well as priests, were always taken, had usurped and used authority. To kings and queens seven colours were allowed, to tanists or nobles only five; but to bards six colours were allowed. Both policy and the etiquette which so largely influenced even the rudest courts compelled the magi to allow an outward social superiority to their kings and queens, through whom they, in fact, governed; but however warlike or wealthy the noble, he was reminded even by his very dress that he was held inferior to the magi.

CHAPTER IV.

It was not to Ireland alone that St. Patrick did the inestimable service of substituting the mild truths of Christianity for the furious errors of paganism; indirectly, indeed, but substantially, he was the Christian apostle also of Scotland, into which country Christianity was introduced in the sixth century by St. Columba, an Irish monk of great zeal and learning, who founded the long famous monastery in the island of Iona.

For three centuries after the arrival of St. Patrick the influence of Christianity in humanizing the people and elevating their condition was weakened, greatly weakened, at once by the plurality of kings and by the enormous number of the monastic establishments; and during those three centuries the wars of petty princes and of five kings retarded civilization and produced a sickening and pitiable amount of human misery. The fiercer and prouder spirits among the chief families scourged the country as warriors; the quieter spirits scourged it scarcely less by their learned and pious seclusion; and while even England was sending her best sons to the monks of Ireland, that they might enjoy the very best attainable education, those monks studied and prayed and taught foreign youth in cloistered ease, and in cold and selfish indifference to the world's sufferings and the world's crimes, without seeking to make their learning available to lessening the one, or their rank and influence useful in restraining the other. Though England at this time was divided into seven kingdoms, and though each of these, like each of the five Irish kingdoms, was again divided into petty but independent lordships; though, in fact, England fully shared with Ireland the evils of divided sovereignties where no natural division of territory exists, the Saxon population of England enjoyed a plentifulness of the most nourishing food, and a comfort both of habitation and apparel far superior to those of the Irish, with all the superiority allowed to the clerical and monastic population of Ireland as to learning. A clearer proof needs not be adduced of the mischief, serious, widely-spreading, and of the utmost practical importance, that was done by the preposterous extent to which monasteries were founded by mistaken piety and inhabited by indolent idleness. Corn and cattle of every description were abundantly produced; yet the great mass of the people were poorly fed, wretchedly lodged, and coarsely clad; for the simple reason that they were injured individually by their fierce petty princes when at war, and neglected by their priests and scholars at all times.

The confusion and petty warfare inevitable upon a plurality of sovereigns and petty princes, we have already alluded to as an obvious cause of a low social condition. A no less inevitable evil attendant upon that plurality is, that it bars the bosom of the people who are unfortunate enough to be subjected to it, to the attacks of foreign foes. The imminent danger of the whole country from some vast invading force may for a time cause all the petty princes and their turbulent and almost independent inferior chieftains to unite; for a time each may learn to forget his envy, his hatred, the insult that has stung, or the injury that has robbed him, and in the mere instinct of self-preservation each may do good service towards the preservation of all. This, we say, may happen in the case of the whole of such a country being threatened by a terrible and numerous invader; but so it may happen, too, that hatred of the native and neighbouring enemy may not merely overpower that sentiment towards the foreign foe, but may even convert it into a feeling of sympathy and a desire for his alliance or protection. But even where domestic differences do not, in the case of a great invasion, produce treason in some cases and ruin in the rest; the mere weakness which internal warfare ever produces must render the temporarily united foes comparatively inefficient just at the moment when they more than ever need strength, and more than ever desire to use that strength to good and wise purposes. If in actual warfare of king against king, chiefs against the king, or the still more common case, of chief against chief, each of the five kingdoms of Ireland lost from the year 700 to the year 717 one hundred men per annum, here would be a vast army—for that time and country—of 8,500 men. We have reckoned the loss of the five Irish kingdoms in the seventeen years specified at a very low probable average; and we have only reckoned with reference to those actually slain in battle, or in the occasional sanguinary skirmishes; of those who subsequently perished by the famine caused by war, or of the pestilential diseases invariably attendant upon famine, we take no account. No period could be better suited for the fair illustration of the evil to which we have adverted than seventeen years; for while that period would make the mere infant capable of bearing arms—particularly among a hardy, warlike, and half barbarous people—it would still leave in soldierly vigour and activity the man of twenty-five, or even of thirty years of age, who escaped unwounded from battle on the very day of that infant's birth. Here, then, in seventeen years of miserable squabbling we have an army of 8,500 men utterly destroyed; and at the end of that time we find that Ireland was insulted, invaded, and plundered for the first time by any considerable piratical force of Northmen, or Danes, as the piratical northmen and sea-kings were generally called. Here, then, we have evidence as irrefragable as evidence can be, that to the plurality of sovereignty in Ireland, and to the at once petty and ferocious internal warfare to which that plurality gave rise, Ireland, when the force northmen called up her rivers burned and sacked her monasteries, slew the monk in his cell, the peasant in the field, the penitent at the altar, and the nursing child at his mother's breast, owed the loss of an army thrice as numerous as would have sufficed to crush, ere he could have well landed, the slaying and spoiling for who wrought so much havoc and so much woe.

The History of Ireland.

THE KING WAS APPLIED TO BY SEVERAL PRINCES WHO WERE ABLE TO TAKE INTO THE FIELD A NEW RALLYING POINT.

The evil effect of divided and petty authority requires, surely, no farther proof; and how extensively that divided and petty authority obtained in Ireland may be pretty accurately judged from the single fact, that in one battle against the invading northmen, two hundred nominal kings or chiefs of Irish septs fell upon the field.

The kingdom of Meath, being nearly in the central part of Ireland, was, though originally the smallest of the five chief kingdoms, the titular chief; and the successful attempts of the kings of Meath to wrest territory from the other kings, and of those latter, individually to obtain the coveted titular royalty in chief, were a fruitful source, both of general national disturbance, and of partial and at the same time implacable feuds among the septs siding with the various kings.

For nearly forty years the northmen continued their attacks upon Ireland to mere predatory descents, in which they were usually, from the disunion we have described, successful in carrying off considerable spoil and numerous captives. But the very success of these descents, and the experience the marauders acquired alike of the fertility of the soil and of the disunion of the inhabitants, invited larger expeditions and more extended views of conquest. About the close of the eighth century they began to send as many as a hundred vessels laden with fierce warriors into the Boyne and Liffey. The monasteries, both as being the wealthiest places in the island, and as being the abode of the teachers of the faith of that hated Charlemagne, whose prowess and whose sternness had made his faith odious to the northern marauders, were the especial objects of their cupidity and vengeance. Built chiefly of wood, the monasteries when plundered were frequently committed to the flames; and crowds of terrified monks and nuns escaped from the swords of the enemy, only to perish of hunger, or the inclemency of the weather, amid the woods and morasses.

From conducting larger and larger expeditions from the banks of the chief rivers, farther and farther into the bosom of the island, the northmen at length proceeded to attempt a permanent settlement. And here again the divisions among the Irish favoured the designs of their enemies; for it was no uncommon thing for the weaker or more bitter of two rival septs to join their force to that of the invaders, losing sight of their general interest, as Irishmen, to their particular desire for safety or revenge, as members of this or that sept or kingdom. When the beacon fire sent forth its lurid light from the summit of some coastward mountain, to announce the northmen's approach, it but too often happened that it was to many a signal to aid and not to repel them; and to positive treachery of this kind the northmen chiefly owed it, that early in the ninth century (A. D. 815), they succeeded in planting a strong colony in the fertile district of Armagh. Between this colony and the neighbouring Irish there were frequent and desperate struggles; but about thirty years after it was planted, Turgesius, a Norwegian of great fame and power among the northern pirates, brought a powerful fleet to its aid, carried death and dismay into all the accessible parts of the country, and assumed the title of king of Ireland (A. D. 845). Having erected strong forts on well chosen parts of the coast, he wielded his usurped authority most sternly. The native born kings were made to consider themselves as his mere tributary tenants; and upon each he levied a tribute, in the nature of a poll-tax upon their respective subjects, which tax, either from its very nature or from the punishment, as some writers think, of its non-payment being the amputation of the offender's nose, was called nose money.

Turbulent even towards their own native titular chief kings of Meath, it might have been expected that the singularly haughty and fiery kings of Ireland would be stung to desperation by the sweeping and contemptuous as well as cruel tyranny of a foreign pirate chief. Many attempts at throwing off his oppressive and insulting yoke were unsuccessful; but at length the art and intrepidity of O'Malachlin, an Irish king, put an end to both the reign and the life of the usurper. As though the whole power and skill of the northmen had been supposed to centre in this one man, his death was the signal of a general rising of the Irish. The lukewarm grew zealous and the timid grew brave; every where the Irish heart beat and the Irish sword gleamed for Ireland alone; and the massacre of the northmen was so extensive, that the country might once more be said to be almost free from all enemies save the turbulent and the divided of her own sons.

But this freedom from the insulting yoke of the foreigner was soon interrupted. In larger numbers than ever, and with vengeance now animating them as well as cupidity, the pirate hordes of the north again poured in under three famous sea-kings, Sitric, Olaf, and Ivar. Waterford, Limerick, and Dublin were seized upon, as being convenient equally as strongholds from which to rule and oppress the native, and as commercial cities. And, as is generally observable, the avarice of unprincipled conquerors gave a commercial and trading consequence to those cities such as they had never before possessed, and most likely would never have derived from their original possessors. Merchants from various foreign countries repaired thither, with articles of both use and mere luxury; and an observable impulse was given to the civilization and refinement of the country, through the medium of the very invaders to whom thousands of the inhabitants owed misery and death. In truth, the situation of the native Irish during this occupation by the Danes may, without exaggeration, be compared to that of the unhappy Britons, whose miseries under the early rule of the Saxons are so graphically and so thrillingly depicted by Bede.

But a warfare which kept alive the native and the invader in constant peril, could not fall to abate in violence as years passed over. Intermarriage, and gradual communion for the purposes of trade, caused something like an armed incorporation of the two people. The natives were still governed respectively by their own kings; and the Danes, under their kings, in their fertile agricultural possessions and prosperous commercial towns, looked complacently down upon the frequent disputes and sanguinary engagements between the native provinces, precisely as Europeans looked forth from their factories upon those jealousies and combats of the Indian princes, which have given so much territory, wealth, and influence to a race who first went among them with the timidity of strangers and the cupidity of mere traders.

As we have already said, we believe that the accounts that have been given of the plentifulness of native Irish gold and silver have been most ridiculously exaggerated. It was to the commerce carried on and encouraged by Ireland's invaders, that wealth, whether of the precious metals or of foreign conveniences and luxury, was chiefly, if not entirely, owing. The Italian goldsmiths, so famous for the richness and cunning of their workmanship, undoubtedly supplied those ornaments and services of gold and silver plate which, towards the middle of the tenth century, abounded in the Irish monasteries and churches. We say that this is indubitable, because we have clear evidence of it in the will of Cormac, bishop of Cashel and king of Munster. In that will he bequeathed to various churches and monasteries not merely rich articles of gold and silver, but also rich garments of silk, which not even the wildest dreamers about the early native wealth and magnificence of Ireland will pretend to attribute to any other source than that commercial intercourse with foreigners which Ireland owed to her conquerors.

But neither the influence of the commercial spirit nor the foreign luxury introduced by the Danes, had the effect of subduing the Irish turbulence or weakening the Irish courage. Even when, laying aside for a brief time their petty quarrels for local supremacy, they turned their arms against the northmen, their endeavours were far more creditable than successful. But a king of Munster at length arose, to show the northmen that the power of an invader is precarious, and may be shaken long after the most timid of his followers have ceased to fear, and all save the very best and bravest among the oppressed have ceased to hope.

A. D. 900.—Brian Borohme, (or, as it is sometimes written, Brian Boru), whose talents and courage even the romances founded upon his actual deeds can scarcely rate too highly, was king of Munster, contemporary with Malachi, king of Meath. The latter, though in title the chief kingdom, was at this time scarcely the superior of Munster, the kings of which occasionally asserted their equality by a flat refusal to pay the tribute. Though rivals, Malachi and Brian Borohme had one common feeling of hatred to the foreign rule of Ireland; and the former, a brave and able general, was in a mere military point of view more completely the liberator of their common country than the latter. Disputes having arisen between the king of Meath and the Danes, who had now rendered Dublin very populous and wealthy, a battle took place between them in the vicinity of the hill of Tara, in which the Danes were so completely routed, and with so much loss, that they were glad to accept Malachi's terms for peace. The Danes had so often been victors in former and less ably conducted attempts to restrain their power, that among their slaves—by whom that warlike and trading people had all domestic duties performed, deeming them degrading to warriors and merchants—were upwards of two thousand native Irish. These Malachi compelled the Danes to liberate, and he had the satisfaction to believe that this battle had struck a terror into his foes which would not merely restrain them from any future excursions beyond their own bounds with warlike or predatory objects, but even cause them in the course of time to abandon the country altogether. Brian Borohme, as king of Munster, had obtained scarcely less decisive triumphs over the Danes, from whom he had, in the case of those who dwelt in Dublin, exacted an annual tribute of an ounce of gold per house.

Danes would have ended with the day of their defeat before Tara, but that his own subsequent defeat by Brian Borohme threw power into the hands of a man as wise in council as he was brave in the field. After what has been said of the general propensity of all the Irish princes, from the highest of the five kings to the very pettiest tanist who could boast his territory of a few acres, and his sept of a few scores of half-starved peasants, it will be a matter of so marvel that two powerful and warlike princes, so nearly matched in point of power and ambition as Malachi and Brian Borohme, should find subject matter for war against each other. Brian Borohme, conscious not only of warlike ability but also of capacity for civil rule, and perhaps honourably anxious to make the latter talent serviceable to the whole of vexed and suffering Ireland, flushed with his triumph over the Danes and over many of the smaller native kings and chiefs, from whose territories he had added very largely to his kingdom of Munster, aimed at the sole sovereignty of Ireland. Malachi, equally as an independent prince and as titular chief king, resisted his ambitious and certainly unfounded pretensions. A severe and passionate contest ensued, in which Malachi was subdued, and compelled in that hall of Tara which for centuries had witnessed the supremacy of his ancestors, to do homage to the rival whom he had so bravely though lucklessly resisted. Several of the minor kings and chiefs proposed to Malachi to renew the struggle, and offered to support him alike with arms and influence. But true to his compact, and, perhaps, with the characteristic nobleness of true bravery, conscious that Brian Borohme was the better capacitated to serve their common country by quelling her domestic as well as foreign foes, Malachi loyally and generously refused to do so. He went still farther; to his example of submission to the superior genius of Borohme he added the strongest entreaty to his friends to support and obey, instead of opposing, a man so well calculated to preserve the peace their bleeding country so much required. Retaining his kingdom of Meath, he paid tribute to Borohme and faithfully seconded his measures.

Brian Borohme's first acts showed that, however blameable the course by which he had obtained the chief regal place, his genius was admirably adapted to it. Without losing time in idle show and ceremonious enjoyment of his good fortune, he at once set out on a military tour of pacification, receiving the formal submission of the chiefs, and demanding good securities and hostages for the loyalty of those who had given any cause for suspicion, or whose position was such as to make their future revolt practicable on slight temptation. Nor did he confine his cares to protecting himself against the provinces; he also made strict laws for preventing the people from being scourged by the unjust coshering and other oppressions of their rulers. His well known talents, and the sternness with which he even imprisoned those chiefs who ventured to infringe his laws, had a most salutary effect; and in his reign Ireland was a better ordered and more happy and peaceful country than it had ever before been. The strongholds and religious houses, which had suffered so much at first by the violence of the northmen, and then by their neglect, were repaired, and many new ones founded. The Danes themselves, probably finding the advantage of peace to their commercial affairs, as well as dreading to provoke him as king of Ireland who had so signally chastised them when he was only king of Munster, busied themselves solely with trade, and did not for many years attempt to commit any violence.

Men who have long suffered under a great and grievous evil are ever apt to exaggerate the opposite good. It is possible that, even in the comparative tranquillity to which the iron rule and really benevolent justice of Brian Borohme reduced Ireland, the native of a country blessed with the excellent regulations of modern Russia, France, or England, would have found it but an unpleasant residence, and considered it but an unsafe one. But, not content with giving Borohme the really high praise of having reduced the extreme anarchy and the utmost licence, to comparative peace and propriety, the chroniclers, as usual, must describe wonders that he did under the similitude of wonders that no earthly power could do. In order to let us know that he very much prevented armed hands from traversing the highways in open warfare, and petty tyrants from plundering their unhappy peasants without restriction and murdering each other without question, they gravely assure us that a young lady traversed the rude roads of a country still the least orderly in Europe, her beauty heightened by gems rich and rare, and a ring of price suspended by her white wand; and that none were tempted by her beauty to rudeness, or by the rich booty she bore with her to robbery. Such idle tales are not merely beneath the dignity of history; they are offensive to the character at once of those who write and of those who believe them. Moreover, in the present case, the tale, idle as it is, has not even the solitary merit of originality; the same story, with the most trifling variations, is told of several other countries, England under a Saxon monarch among them.

Time, the great sower of painful memories, is also a great disturber of the good conduct which has its root in selfish policy and selfish fear, rather than in a genuine appreciation of goodness for its own sake. And thus it proved in the case of the Danes. The prowess of Brian Borohme and Malachi had awed them, and the singular fitness and energy displayed by the former as a civil ruler, had given them practical proof and participation of the benefits of peace in the land. For nearly a quarter of a century these feelings kept them perfectly in order; but as a new generation sprang into active life, and long habit had made strict rule much less imposing, they again began to show symptoms of a desire to return to their old course of varying the life of the trader with that of the armed and insolent robber. Perhaps, too, they were encouraged by supposing that the long lapse of years had deprived the once terrible Brian Borohme of his courage and conduct, as it was well known that it had of his physical strength and activity. The king of Dublin suddenly and without provocation led his northernmen into the kingdom of Meath, plundering without limit, and, wherever resisted, murdering without mercy.

As if to show that Irishmen were never to see the misfortunes of their country without doing their own shameful part towards inflicting them, the king of Leinster joined his forces to those of the northernmen, and partook to the fullest in their outrageous violence. At the same moment—most probably by long preconcerted arrangement—a new horde of northernmen, each man followed by women and children, entered Munster evidently with the intention not merely to plunder the country, but also to effect a permanent settlement. Malachi and Brian Borohme put themselves at the head of the other kings and leaders, to oppose the hosts of foreign and domestic foes that had thus suddenly sprung up amidst the profoundest peace and the most promising prospects of equal prosperity. Rightly believing that the native foes were at once more guilty than the foreign ones, Borohme dispatched a large part of his force under his son Donough, to overrun the kingdom of Leinster, and drive off or destroy all the cattle on which the enemy would greatly depend for provisions. This service the old warrior judged that his young and active son could effect in three days, to which period he limited his absence. Under all ordinary circumstances this course would have been both politic and safe; for the position of the northernmen was such, that it was to the last degree unlikely that any general engagement would ensue until after the return of Donough from an expedition the success of which would be of such material future value to the Irish. But once again a son of Ireland—probably from some dastardly fear or revenge, or from petty personal hope—was Ireland's enemy; treason was in the camp of the brave and good Borohme, whose gallant son was no sooner beyond recall, than some deserter from the camp made the northernmen aware how much the Irish were weakened by this detachment of so large a number of their best troops, and they at once forced on a general engagement.

Slight, even, had it been in his power, Borohme would not have for a moment thought of; he formed his troops in battle array, and though more than four score years had blanched his hair and abated his natural strength, he rode along the ranks and shouted his exhortations in the genuine and passionate eloquence of which in former times, he had so often witnessed the thrilling and inspiring effect upon the troops who had followed him to victory. Pointing to the northernmen, whose tumultuous ranks were swelled by Norsewagians, Danes, and Britons from the Orkneys, the Hebrides, and the mountains of Wales, he called upon Irishmen to strike no blow but in remembrance of priests and nuns murdered, churches burned, and the sacred things polluted or plundered; age cast forth to perish in the forest, and the young child smitten dead with the mother whose milk still hung upon its lip; "bearing a crucifix in his left hand as he brandished his familiar sword in his right, he called upon them to follow where he should lead, and to strike for the religion of the saints with the firm hearts and vigorous arms of men who knew how to die as Christians, but never to submit to heathens in heart, name, or alliance."

A. D. 1014.—It was shortly after day-break on the 23rd of April in the year 1014, that the venerable king and veteran warrior thus addressed his army, who, greatly as they knew their numerical force to be weakened by the detachment of the troops under Donough on the Leinster expedition, responded to the address by commencing the fight with cries of rapturous excitement, which proved that their king and general had only done them justice in saying that they knew how to die for their cause. The battle lasted—success now inclining to the Irish, and now to the northernmen—during the whole of the day; and wherever the onward charge of the Irish was the fiercest and farthest upon the foe, and wherever the foe in his turn repulsed them the most murderously and effectively, there gleamed the sword and pealed the still sonorous tones of Brian Borohme. Though age had dimmed the old man's eyes and abated his natural strength, he continued thus actively performing the duty of both skilful chieftain and stout soldier, quite literally,

"From morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve."

But as the shadows of the mountains fell denser and deeper, he became too weak to remain longer in the field, and was obliged to seek rest in his tent, though even here his mental vigour mocked his physical debility, and he continued to direct the fight by brief and judicious messages to the chiefs. At length the glad shouts of the Irish proclaimed that the foe was broken beyond hope; the king fell upon his knees in the thrilling gladness of the patriot king and the loyal soldier, and his tent, in the general joy, was left unguarded save by a single strapping page. The traitor who had warned the Danes of the detachment being sent under Donough into Leinster, could scarcely have wished a heavier calamity to Ireland than that which was caused by the eager rush of the king's personal guard to join in the slaughter and pursuit of their enemies, who were now to be seen flying in every direction, whether that rush was made merely in obedience to their own desire or in compliance with the king's command. He was recognized by a flying party of the enemy only a few minutes after he was thus left exposed, and neither his thin white hairs, his venerable aspect, nor his plump posture, could save him. In an instant his enemies were upon him; the loud shriek and feeble though zealous blow of the young page delayed the sacrifice not a moment; Brian Borohme, the terrible in battle, the wise in council, and the inflexibly just in rule, was slain, with many and ghastly wounds, even as he knelt in thanksgiving for the victory he had done so much towards obtaining for his country.

CHAPTER V.

The defeat of the northmen was complete at Clontarf; and though the death of Brian Borohme was felt by his troops as a very serious drawback upon their victory, such instant and excellent measures were taken for following it up, that the fierce sea kings did not feel inclined to risk such another. The armed invaders fled to their ships and sought safety in flight; and the northmen who were naturalized in Ireland, despairing of any farther aid from beyond sea, had no recourse but to live in peace with their neighbours, with whom the intermarriages of a few generations so incorporated them, that all distinction, save in a few male names of families, was lost between the two people lately so hostile.

Malachi, who had ably and bravely distinguished himself on this occasion at the very first outbreak of the northmen and their treacherous allies of Leinster, and who in many a former perilous time had amply earned the fame which won him the praise of the bards of his own time, and has nearly a thousand years later obtained from the greatest bard of his country the praise of having won

"—his collar of gold

"That he won from the fierce invader,"

Was now by common consent and acclamation called again to the chief sovereignty, which he enjoyed in all peace and honour until his death.

A.D. 1022.—Full of years and infirmities, but no less full of honours, Malachi expired peacefully in the year 1022; and the death of that venerable monarch was the signal for a renewal of those shameful civil wars, and their consequent miseries and degradations from which the strong hand and vigorous mind of Brian Borohme had so long kept the country free. The high renown of Malachi had caused all the kings and chiefs to hail him as the most worthy successor of Brian Borohme, but the relatives of those two truly great princes and warriors could not so easily agree as to the rightful successor of the former. If the principles of equity and plain reasoning had been appealed to, the claims of Malachi's heir would unquestionably have at once been admitted; and that upon two broad and intelligible grounds. In the first place, glorious and useful as the reign of Brian Borohme had been, he had obtained the throne by violence; and it is more than possible that even his valour and conduct would have failed to secure him upon it, had not the patriotic Malachi waived his own personal interests in favour of those of his country. In the next place, the unanimous consent of the kings and chiefs to Malachi's succeeding Brian very clearly pointed out the latter as the merely personal possessor of the throne, who had obtained it wrongfully, who, probably, at least, was allowed to retain it only on considerations of expediency, and whose heirs, consequently, even had he died after Malachi, could not, upon any sane view of the hereditary principle, for an instant be put into competition with those of Malachi. But equity and reason were allowed no voice in the matter. Many competitors appeared, loud disputes and sanguinary struggles ensued, and at length the field was cleared of all aspirants but two. These were Donough, king of Munster, heir of Brian Borohme, and Turlough, great nephew of the latter and nephew of the former; both, it will be perceived, claiming in hereditary succession to him who had been to all intents, an usurping king, however good and able one. The struggle between these two princes was long and sanguinary; but Donough, though already in possession of the kingdom of Munster, was vanquished. Baffled in his high ambition, and detesting the scene in which his rival had exhibited so marked a superiority in both talent and popularity, Donough almost immediately resigned his proper kingdom of Munster, and set out on a pilgrimage to Rome. Arrived at "the eternal city," he entered into a monastery, and there obscurely finished his life.

Turlough on mounting the throne speedily proved that he inherited with it much of the ability and warlike courage of his great uncle, together with a double portion of his despotic and resolved self-will. Much as he owed to the inferior kings and chiefs, he imposed upon them unusually heavy tributes; a tyranny the full weight of which was chiefly felt by the unfortunate kerne, or peasantry, from whom, in addition to all their heavy local burthens, it was of course wrung by their tyrants.

From the Irish natives, Turlough turned his strong hand upon the northern settlers and traders. Even under the firm and steady rule of Brian Borohme, these people, though strictly prevented from indulging their seemingly inherent and insatiable love of violence and plunder, were allowed to follow their peaceable pursuits, and the customs of their own countries; and their towns had invariably been governed by their own peculiar laws, administered by princes or governors of their own race. One of these, Godfred, king or governor of Dublin, was banished almost

TURLOUGH WAS A TYRANNICAL AND POWERFUL PRINCE: HE KEPT HIS COURT AT THE PALACE OF KEN MORA, IN CLARE.

AT THIS TIME THERE WAS A CONSIDERABLE TRADE CARRIED ON WITH ENGLAND, WHICH FURNISHED IRELAND WITH ITS CLOTH, &c.

Immediately after the accession of Turlough, who filled the vacancy with Murkertach, his own son. A similar course was subsequently followed as to all the Danish towns; and when we consider how little formidable the northmen had for some time shown themselves, and how very much they had even lost of their distinct nationality by frequent intermarriages with the Irish, it is difficult to resist the belief that this weeping change originated far less in necessity or patriotism than in self-will and a desire to aggrandize the royal family or its favourites.

At this period Ireland seems to have obtained a very considerable improvement as to wealth, if not as to refinement. We find mention more frequently made of gold in payment of tribute where formerly it was paid in cattle or other kind; and to its former exports of wheat, wool, hides, and cattle, we now find timber added. Indeed, so fine was the Irish timber at that period, and Irish bog oak especially, that William Rufus, whose reign in England was contemporary with that of Turlough in Ireland, actually imported Irish oak for the splendid roof of Westminster-hall.

A. D. 1086.—After an active and generally prosperous and valuable reign, Turlough died in 1086. His kingdom was partitioned among his three sons; the hereditary principle being thus again set aside, but on this occasion with at least the colour of justice, inasmuch as the principle of equal division—though including the most distant male relatives—was that of the Brehon laws in the palmy days of the Magi. One of the sons dying, a contest arose between the two survivors, Murkertach—already mentioned as succeeding Godfred the northman in the government of Dublin—and Dermot. The latter was defeated and driven into exile, and Murkertach now claimed and was about to assume the whole kingdom. But a rival was set up against him in the person of a chieftain of the old blood-royal, named Donalc MacLoughlin, who was extremely popular among the princes both on account of his personal qualities and his descent; and again the unhappy country was visited with a civil war upon a question the justice of which was so obvious, that any twelve honest men, however unlettered and unskilled in chicane, might have set it at rest in an hour. For eight years the old scenes of rapine, bloodshed, and misery bade fair to undo all that invaders—far less cruel and mischievous than the turbulent and justice-despising sons of the soil—had done towards improving and enriching it; and after all this strife and misery the rivals at length agreed to divide the regal spoil between them. The southern moiety of the kingdom was given to Murkertach, and bore the title of Leathmogh, or Mogh's share; and the northern moiety to MacLoughlin, and bore the title of Leath Cannin, or Conn's share.

Even this seemingly equitable arrangement did not restore a solid and lasting peace. We call the arrangement seemingly equitable, because it seems to have met the full consent of both competitors and their respective friends, and so far we are obliged to call it so; though, ad initio, one or the other party must have been entitled to all, if either was entitled to any. Clearly, however, this ground of debate was fully abandoned by the deliberate agreement we have referred to. But with the characteristic pugnacity of the time and country, the two kings, though they possessed, by treaty, and each within his own limits, the most kingly independence, a peaceful enjoyment of limited and defined authority, however, seems to have been by no means to the taste of either king. Perpetual encroachments were made by one or the other, and a long series of sanguinary and very mischievous battles terminated in the utter defeat of Murkertach, who, beaten at all points and utterly despairing of any better success, retired from the contest in 1109, and sought refuge in a monastery, where he terminated his days.

During the long and obstinate struggle between the native Irish kings, the coastward parts of the country were repeatedly annoyed by the northmen, especially by the Norwegian Magnus. His prowess and audacity had possessed him of the Hebrides and the Isle of Man, and under the title of the Lord of the Isles he struck terror and dismay far and near. Emboldened by the unnatural and senseless discussions of the Irish, he sailed up the Liffey, ravaging and destroying, and at length possessed himself of Dublin, where, having fallen into an ambush, he lost his life.

From all that has been said it will, we trust, be very evident, that the famous accounts given of the very early wealth, grandeur, and learning of Ireland, are sheer exaggerations for the most part, and unfounded assumptions for the rest. The earliest inhabitants of it, of whom any thing is certainly known, were divided into numerous septs, individually too rude, and as a whole too much divided among themselves, to have been either prosperous or influential. The towns upon the coast were either founded or raised into importance by subsequent invaders of a more advanced knowledge and refinement; and at the period to which we have brought down this history, the condition of Ireland had nothing desirable which was not owing to those invaders, and was, even then, such as to make it morally certain, that the improvement of the country, or even its escape from retrograding into its original misery and barbarism, could only result from such an event as that to which we now pass, namely, the appearance of England on the Irish stage; from which period the history of Ireland begins to possess that clearness of which all its earlier portion is so strikingly deficient.

CHAPTER VI.

THE various wars and arrangements in Ireland did not prevent the whole island from being still divided into the five chief kingdoms of which mention has already been made. The titular chief royalty, as well as the real chief power and influence which to the time of Malachi had appertained as by prescription to Meath, subsequently passed now to one and now to another kingdom. Munster, under Brian Borohme, had both the chief title and the chief sway, which afterwards appertained to Connaught.

Roderic O'Connor, king of Connaught and titular king of Ireland, however, had but little of the power which Brian Borohme had so sternly and steadily wielded. All his energies were required to enable him to govern Connaught, and he was incapable of either composing the differences of the other kings, or of uniting them all under his own authority in the common defence of their common interests. In a word, Ireland was in the twelfth century as divided as ever it had been; and only so far improved in wealth as to tempt aggression by exciting cupidity.

That Ireland had so long remained free from the aggressions of other than mere ravaging northmen would be wonderful, indeed, but for the poverty which we have shown to have caused that forbearance or contempt. Heathen Rome and Christian Rome alike had, for long ages, allowed the semi-barbarous people of the "sacred island" to fight and destroy at their own good pleasure. But the time at length came when Christian Rome, already enthroned as the mistress of empires and arbitress of the temporal and spiritual princes of the earth, looked with a longing eye upon the fertile island on which prosperity, thanks to her invaders, had begun to dawn.

The attention of Rome would probably have been drawn to Ireland as early as it was, under any circumstances; but Ireland's near and ambitious neighbour, Henry II. of England, it was who immediately drew the attention of the pontiff to her value and capabilities; overlooking, as it would seem, the extreme probability that the papal power would some day prove as formidable in enmity as it could possibly be useful in friendship. Attracted by the fertility of Ireland and its contiguity to his own kingdom, and being well informed of the internal dissensions of the kings and chieftains, which bade so fair to render the island an easy prey, he applied to the papal court for its sanction to his subduing Ireland.

A.D. 1115.—Pope Adrian III., who then filled the papal chair, was doubly glad to receive this request. An Englishman by birth, he was naturally anxious for the aggrandisement of his native country; and, as pope, he could not but be rejoiced at having from the king of England this emphatic acknowledgment of the temporal as well as spiritual supremacy of Rome.

Neither of these motives was allowed to appear; Adrian professed to be actuated in according his permission to Henry by the anxious care shown by that prince to enlarge the Christian church. The pretext was sounding and specious; but we can scarcely allow much weight to it when we remember that Ireland had for five centuries been acquainted with Christianity. But, then, it had owned no submission to Rome—and to Rome it had produced no revenue!

Had Henry invaded Ireland simply as being an island extremely convenient to him, it would savour rather of cant than of sincere and wholesome feeling to lament or even to blame his course; for it was as necessary that Ireland should be conquered in order to its being rescued from its barbarism and perpetual strife, as it was, in an earlier day, that the Roman and the Saxon should prepare the way for that English nation which owes nine-tenths of its marvellous greatness to that other fortunate injustice, the Norman conquest. But the pretences upon which, as set forth in the papal bull, he proceeded to his task of pleasure are grossly hypocritical. The bull in question, says Hume, "after premising that this prince had ever shown an anxious care to enlarge the church of God on earth, and to increase the number of his saints and elect in heaven, represents his design of subduing Ireland as being derived from the same pious motive; considers his care of previously applying for the apostolic sanction as a sure earnest of success and victory; and, having established it as a point incontestable, that all Christian kingdoms belong to the patrimony of St. Peter, acknowledges it to be the pope's own duty to sow among them the seeds of the gospel which might in the last day fructify to their eternal salvation." The pope having thus shown that Ireland ought to be conquered, and that Henry is its appointed conqueror, "exhorts him to invade Ireland, in order to extirpate the vice and wickedness of the natives, and oblige them to pay yearly, from every house, a penny to the see of Rome; gives him entire right and authority over the island, commands all the inhabitants to obey him as their sovereign, and invests with full power all such godly instruments as he should think proper to employ, in an enterprise thus calculated for the glory of God and the salvation of the souls of men."

This bull, encouraging as it was, did not alone occur to inflame the ambition of Henry. The state of Ireland soon after this bull was issued was precisely such as its foreign foe might have desired it to be; one of the intestine brawls which formed so large a portion of Irish existence breaking out just then with even more than the usual virulence and fury. Dermot Macmorrough, the then king of Leinster, who was remarkable even among his licentious countrymen for his gross immorality, had greatly provoked the chief men of his kingdom by his tyrannical conduct. Unaware or contemptuous of the general feeling that existed against him, he wantonly added to it by abducting the wife of Orlor, prince of Breffney, during her husband's absence. Prince Orlor, on his return to the bog island in which he had, as he imagined, secured the safety of his wife, was roused to the utmost rage by the information that Macmorrough had made a descent upon it and forcibly carried away the princess. Irish morality at that time was at so low an ebb, that nearly any man but the king of Leinster might have abducted his neighbour's wife, without running serious risk of incurring any enmity or censure beyond that of the injured husband and his immediate friends and followers. But Macmorrough's character was so generally detested, that the prince of Breffney met with warm and unusual sympathy. Among those who hastened to assist him was Roderic, king of Connaught; and so powerful a force was speedily led to the punishment of the ravisher, that he was fairly driven from the territory he had so scandalously misgoverned.

Chastised but impotent, disgraced and burning for revenge, the exile went to France, where Henry II. of England then was, and solicited his aid. Delighted at having an additional excuse for his meditated invasion thus opportunely afforded him, Henry affected to give faith and full credence to the version of the story which it suited Macmorrough's purpose to tell him; especially as he offered, if restored to his kingdom, to hold it as vassal of the English crown. Just at that moment, however, Henry was too busily engaged in Guienne in quelling the rebellious spirit of his French subjects, to be able to go personally to the aid of his Irish supplicant. Nevertheless he cordially promised him puissant support, and furnished him with letters patent by which all subjects of the king of England were empowered and encouraged to aid the exiled king of Leinster in his attempts to recover his dominion.

With this important document Dermot Macmorrough hastened to Bristol to raise a force upon its authority. For a considerable time, however, he found even the king's letters patent insufficient to induce men to volunteer for Ireland, where, according to the general notion of the country, hard blows were likely to constitute the principal booty. It is very likely that Macmorrough would have been still longer without reaping any substantial benefit from the possession of the king's letters patent, had he not fortunately met with a ruined noble of the illustrious house of Clare, who, by a furious course of pleasure and extravagance, had so reduced himself, that he would gladly have shared in even a less promising adventure.

Richard, surnamed Strongbow, earl of Strigul, was easily induced to enter into the cause of the king of Leinster, on being promised his daughter Eva as a wife, with a present portion and the reversion of her father's dominion. Having secured this potent ally—for Strongbow was a good and approved soldier,—Macmorrough left his new ally to raise and arrange forces, and proceeded to Wales, where by large and liberal promises he produced two other allies, Maurice Fitzgerald, and Robert Fitzstephen, constable of Abertivi. Having thus secured abundant aid, he made arrangements for future proceedings with the three leaders, and then clandestinely re-entered his kingdom of Leinster and secreted himself in the monastery of Fernes, of which—so little had the founding of monasteries, at that time so common in Ireland, to do with religious life or religious feeling—this tyrant and ravisher was the founder.

It is probable that Dermot Macmorrough had only his own revenge and his own interest in view when he sought the protection and aid of the English king. Yet when he thus proposed to introduce foreign troops into Ireland, and, like count Julian of Spain who introduced the fierce Arabs into his country, called the foreigner to look at once upon the loveliness, the fertility, and the fecundity of the land, it seems scarcely possible that he could have been wholly without a presentiment of the natural result. Some writers even go so far as to say, that his assisting Henry of England to overrun the rest of Ireland was actually one of the conditions upon which he obtained his countenance. In this there is more of bold conjecture than of legitimate reasoning; but if Macmorrough had no fears that the foreign soldiery might allow their plans to go a trifle farther than the mere recovery of his dominion, he only furnishes another proof that revenge, like drunkenness, blinds the keenest eye and bewilders the shrewdest intellect.

Robert Fitzstephen, with thirty knights, sixty esquires, and three hundred archers, was the first of the friends of Dermot to make his appearance in Ireland. The archers, besides being well and completely armed, were for the most part men who had seen considerable service, and their compact and orderly march struck terror wherever they appeared. Ten knights, thirty esquires, and sixty archers having, under the leadership of Maurice de Prendergast, joined this force, an attack was made upon the town of Wexford, which had been greatly improved and was chiefly inhabited by a party of Danes. The town was carried, and here the adventurers awaited the arrival of Maurice Fitzgerald. He joined them soon after with ten knights, thirty esquires, and a hundred archers; and the whole force of the adventurers was now fully equal to the task of defeating any force that Ireland could draw to one point. Roderic, king of Connaught, who had taken so signal a part in expelling the guilty and detested Macmorrough, made a gallant resistance to the foreigners and their ally of Leinster; but he was beaten at all points, and Macmorrough now, looking beyond the mere restoration of the authority from which he had so deservedly been driven, began to project the destruc-

THE IRISH THOUGHT THAT THIS NORMAN INVASION WAS A SCOURGE SENT BY GOD TO PURISH THEM FOR THEIR SIN.

Having first dispatched, under Raymond his confidant and lieutenant, ten knights and seventy archers, who made good their landing in spite of the resistance of a body of three thousand Irish by whom they were furiously attacked near Waterford, Strong-

Just at this juncture the brave Fitzstephen, who had been closely hemmed in at a fort at Carrick, sent to entreat aid of Strongbow. The latter, who previously to his successful rally, which beside dispersing a vast and enraged enemy, supplied him with a year's food, of which he was desperately in want, hastened at once to the aid of his friend; but before he could arrive Fitzstephen had allowed himself to be tricked out of his liberty. A messenger, sent by the people of Waterford, to whom he was especially obnoxious, informed him that Roderick—whom he knew to have marched against Dublin—had taken that

The army completely overcame the men who had done their utmost to terror wherewithal, thirty having, under Prendergast, was made upon which had been very inhabited town was carried. He awaited the knights, thirty men; and the men was now defeating any to one point. But, who had expelling the rough, made a foreigners and he was beaten. place; that Strongbow, Fitzgerald, and many other knights of name had perished, and that Roderick was now marching towards him with the avowed determination to spare neither sex nor age of the English. Now Fitzstephen, confident that a barbarous country like Ireland would be easily subdued, had brought over his wife and children with him, that he might settle his lands as soon as he should have conquered them. He was, therefore, on their account, struck so with terror, that he readily gave credence to the intelligence; the truth of which, indeed, the general character of Irish warfare rendered but too probable in every particular, except the conquest of Strongbow and his English host by their ill-armed and worse disciplined opponents. The messenger perceiving the impression his false tidings made upon Fitzstephen, now persuaded him to allow him to guide him to a shelter, together with his family and his immediate followers. In an evil hour his anxiety for the safety of his wife and children caused him to abandon the strong fort in which he could, at the very worst, have held out for some time, and place himself and his family in the hands of his bitterest enemies. He discovered his error almost as soon as he had committed it. Many of his most valued followers were put to death on the instant, while he and the rest were committed to prison and closely guarded. But how greatly was his chagrin increased when he heard of the splendid success of Strongbow at Dublin; and that he was hastening to Carrick for the express purpose of affording that aid which Fitzstephen's own precipitancy had now rendered useless. The people of Waterford, well knowing what fate they might expect should they fall into the hands of the terrible Strongbow, gathered up every portable part of their property, set fire to the town in several places, and then, carrying their prisoners with them, took shelter in a little island near Waterford harbour. Thither Strongbow pursued them with threats of taking the most signal and terrible vengeance; but just as he was about to attack the island, he was induced to depart by the most solemn assurances which the enemy caused to be given to him, that the landing of his first man should be the signal for striking off the head of every English prisoner.

While speaking of the siege of Dublin by the Irish, or, more correctly, of their rout before that place, we mentioned that Strongbow and his followers had been much straitened for provisions. What Strongbow had from the very first foreseen, had by this time taken place; Henry II. had become jealous of his barons. Doubtful how far feelings of allegiance would weigh with such turbulent and self-willed men against the promptings of young ambition, kindled and increased by splendid victories, he saw in each new enterprise a new instance of contempt of his authority, and in each new success a new temptation to actual independence of his crown. Hoping, probably, that want of munitions and provisions would cause them to suffer such reverse as would make them glad to sue to their liege sovereign for sanction and aid, in an enterprise which they had carried on with as much apparent independence as though no sovereign existed to claim the fealty or resent their disrespect, he had, for some time, forbidden all aid to be sent to them from England. As soon as the state of affairs in Ireland would admit of his doing so, and urged, in addition to other considerations, by certain intelligence he had received, that the king was on his way to Ireland at the head of a numerous force, Strongbow hastened to England and met the king in Gloucester, where he had assembled a very powerful force. Henry at first refused to admit Strongbow to his presence; but on the earl urging that he could clearly show that, in all that he had done, he had acted solely for the king's service, and that he would not even stir a step in the Irish expedition until he had received both a general and particular permission from the king, he was admitted. It must be very clear to all who have read thus far, that Strongbow, from the first, had determined to make his military and matrimonial connection with Dermot Macmorrough the stepping-stone to the sole and complete sovereignty of Ireland. But when his wary measures had proved the justice of his suspicions of the king's true feelings upon that subject, he shrewdly determined that to hold much under the king was far better than to have his conquests wrested from him by a powerful monarch; and he boldly affirmed, on being admitted to the royal presence, that he aimed at Irish conquest only for the king's service, and that for himself, he should be content with whatever reward his royal master might deign to bestow upon him. Pacified by a submission so complete, and seemingly so disinterested, the king accepted the surrender of Dublin and all other ports and fortresses conquered or to be conquered in Ireland; and granted to the earl and his heirs for ever, all his other Irish acquisitions to be held as fiefs of the English crown.

A. D. 1171.—The conciliatory policy of the shrewd earl having thus averted the storm of royal wrath in which he and his fortunes would otherwise have probably suffered shipwreck, Henry hastened his preparations, and, accompanied by Strongbow, landed at Waterford about the middle of October, 1171. The large force by which the king was accompanied, and the gallant appearance of his knights, armed cap à pie, procured him a degree of respect from the natives which they probably would have withheld from the name of king, which was too common among them to have much of that prestige which attached to it elsewhere. Not the slightest opposition was made to his landing, and as he progressed through the country, kings and chiefs flocked to him to tender their homage. To each who thus came in to surrender his possessions and authority, Henry instantly restored both on the easy condition of homage being done and vassalage confessed. Even Roderick O'Connor, the original opponent of Dermot, peaceably submitted, and without a single battle Henry II. of England became also king of Ireland. Having held a council at Cashel, in which special provisions were made for the support and protection of the clergy, upon whose exertions the king well knew that the peaceable maintenance of his authority would depend, and in which a variety of other laws for the regulation of marriage, wills, and succession of property were propounded, the king proceeded to celebrate the feast of Christmas at Dublin. The city possessed no apartment large enough to serve for the royal banqueting room on this occasion, but a temporary pavilion was erected, in which Henry feasted O'Connor and the other principal Irish princes in a style of profuse and costly hospitality such as they had never before witnessed.

The king appointed a lord high constable, an earl marshal, and a high steward; and distributed vast tracts of Irish territory among English nobles, but on the strictest feudal principle. Thus, for instance, by way of preventing the great possessions and equally great talents of Strongbow from being so predominant in Ireland as to tempt him to endeavour to throw off the royal authority, the king gave the whole of Meath, so long the seat of the chief Irish royalty, to Hugh de Lacy and his heirs for ever, on the tenure of fifty knights' service. Nay, so particular was the king that the feudal tenure and forms should in no wise be neglected, that though Strongbow had acquired his Leinster possessions by marriage and not by the sword, Henry, before he left Ireland, compelled him to resign them in form, and then conferred them upon him on the usual military tenure.

Having thus far provided for the future government and security of Ireland as an integral part of his dominion, and made such minor arrangements as chanced to occur to his mind or to the minds of his advisers, Henry departed from the scene of his easy conquest—if conquest indeed that could be called in which he never had occasion to strike a blow,—in April, 1172, having been in Ireland barely six months; and on landing in Wales, proceeded immediately to St. David's church to return thanks for a success of which he seems to have felt all the importance.

CHAPTER VII.

A.D. 1172.—THE reputation of Ireland for rudeness and poverty was such, that, with the exception of a few of the leaders, the first English invaders and settlers were chiefly men of desperate fortunes and of a character rather fitting them to battle with the natives than to civilise them. Even had they, however, been well fitted for that task, and ever so zealous in its performance, the very relations of conqueror and conquered, possessor and disposed, would probably have made their exertions of but little avail, at least in the earlier years of their residence.

The profuseness with which Henry had parcelled out Irish lands among English soldiers, and the stern and jealous rigour with which each English pale or settlement repressed the slightest Irish disturbance in its neighbourhood, soon caused the deepest and fiercest hatred. While the king and his formidable army remained, the Irish affected the most cordial and peaceful feelings; nay, perhaps, while the king's presence acted as a strong check upon the haughty and insolent tyranny of the conquerors, the conquered actually did entertain the hope of being allowed to live in peace and good fellowship. But the king had no sooner departed than the fiercest animosities began to display themselves. The natives, especially those who were in the immediate neighbourhood of the palatinates, and who, therefore, were especially subjected to the insolence and oppression of the English, looked with detestation upon these possessors of countless acres which they had forcibly wrested from the rightful possessors. From murmurs they proceeded to actions; rebellions on the one hand and unsparring severity on the other ensued; and again this luckless land seemed doomed to long centuries of petty but ruinous wars.

Strongbow was the principal man among the new comers, and was known to be the very soul of their councils, so against him the animosity of the natives was especially directed. To render his situation still more perilous, his own followers, who, justly or not, had acquired so much through his daring and skill, began to show strong symptoms of insubordination. His appearance was hailed with less cordiality; his orders obeyed with less promptitude. A chief cause of this want of cordiality among the English soldiers was the strictness of Fitzmaurice, who had the immediate command. He was a good soldier and a rigid disciplinarian, and being, as it would appear, sincerely desirous that the natives and the English should, for the sake of both parties, live in peace and in the mutual performances of good offices, he strictly forbade all plundering and brawling, to which the English showed themselves only too prone. This strictness, which the licentious soldiery considered all the more unreasonable, inasmuch as they were most irregularly paid, at length led to an openly expressed determination of the soldiers to abandon Ireland altogether, unless the command were taken from Fitzmaurice, and given to Raymond Le Gros, an officer who was altogether as popular among them. Raymond Le Gros, perceiving how important his support was to Strongbow, ventured to ask the hand of that nobleman's sister Basilia, a very beautiful woman, of whom Raymond had long been enamoured, but whom his comparatively humble fortune would probably never have allowed him to seek in marriage, but for the adventurous importance into which he was lifted by the mulous spirit of the soldiery. Strongbow was far too acute not to be well aware of the delicacy and even peril of his situation, but he was as proud as he was brave, and without hesitation refused Raymond both the hand of the lady and constableness of Leinster, which he also demanded. Raymond immediately embarked, taking a considerable portion of the army with him. Their departure was the signal for an immediate outbreak of the natives; while the English were so much weakened by the sudden loss of so large a body, that Strongbow found it necessary to dispatch a messenger to Le Gros, who had landed in Wales, promising that his double demand should be immediately complied with if he would return with the soldiers. He did so at a most critical moment; arriving just in time to save the garrison of Waterford, of whom the Irish had vowed not to spare a man. Le Gros received both his bride and his appointment, and then hurried to meet a vast force of Irish whom O'Connor was leading against Dublin. As usual, the superior arms and discipline of the English overcame the tumultuous though brave multitudes of the Irish. Roderick sought safety in flight, and Raymond Le Gros indulged his victorious followers to the utmost extent of their wishes in all the disorders of semi-barbarous warfare. Though defeated on this particular occasion, O'Connor was not subdued. Often routed, he as often gathered his wild followers to a head again, and his persevering and desultory attacks defied even the skill of the brilliant Le Gros. At length O'Connor entered into a new treaty, by which he engaged to hold his rightful dominions as the liege vassal of the king of England; and in consideration of his having the chief sovereignty of Ireland, exclusive of the English pale,—he undertook to secure the peaceable conduct of the other native princes, to whom Henry assured the possession and peaceful enjoyment of their respective territories on condition of their regular payment of tribute, consisting of a hide for every ten head of cattle slaughtered. Roderick O'Connor, therefore, was king, in vassalage to England, of all Ireland except the English pale, which included Dublin, Waterford, Leinster, Meath, and the whole extent of country from Dungarvon to Waterford.

A. D. 1175.—Strongbow died in 1175, leaving his daughter Isabel de Clare heiress to his immense wealth, with the exception of certain lands with which he endowed the priory which, in compliance with the quasi devout spirit of the age, he had founded at Kilmahnam.

At the death of Strongbow a new governor, Fitz-Adelm, went to Ireland. In his train was a knight, of no great previous notoriety, named De Courcy, who, in pursuance of a singular fancy, lighted up the flames of war in a part of the country which amid all the recent bloodshed had remained at peace. Lying towards Scotland, and being inhabited chiefly by Scotsmen and shepherds, the province of Ulster might have long remained undisturbed, but that a headstrong English knight conceived the humane and worshipful plan of fulfilling an Irish prophecy, at no matter what expense of blood, Scotch, English, or Irish. The prophecy ran that Ulster should be conquered by a knight from over sea, riding on a white horse and bearing birds upon his shield. De Courcy had come from over sea, he speedily provided himself with a white horse, and though his shield bore not birds but bees, yet as the latter as well as the former have wings, he was decidedly of opinion that he was twat a fait the very knight alluded to in the prophecy! And to this mere whim of a foreigner, who in more sober times would have been laughed at as a coxcomb, or shut up as a dangerous lunatic, the unhappy people of Ulster were to see homes and lives sacrificed!

In despite of the express prohibition of the governor, Fitz-Adelm, De Courcy mustered a numerous band of followers, and with pennant flying and trumpets sounding, galloped at day-break into the streets of Downpatrick, the capital of Ulster. The pope's legate, cardinal Viviani, who was in that province, endeavoured to dissuade De Courcy from violence; but the cardinal's eloquence was powerless against the prophecy. The cardinal, then, becoming indignant at the senseless and unpunished conduct of De Courcy, advised the king of Ulster, O'Neil, to oppose him in arms. In the first engagement O'Neil was defeated, but subsequently De Courcy, though generally successful in pitched battles, was frequently reduced to great straits; and on one occasion he only escaped capture—which in his case would have been inevitable death—by flying before his enemies for two days and nights, without other sustenance than water and wild berries.

The petty and mischievous warfare which De Courcy had commenced in Ulster naturally led to similar disturbances in other parts. Fitz-Adelm, the governor, was defeated; and Henry imagining that a more popular governor would perhaps succeed in restoring and preserving the peace of the country—a peace which was indispensable towards making the possession of the country a source of revenue to England—removed Fitz-Adelm, and gave his post to Hugh de Lacy, the lord of Meath, whom he instructed to take all possible means to conciliate the natives, but at the same time to exert himself in the erection of castles sufficiently strong and advantageously situated for the defence of the English pale. Nor did the king's anxious efforts to secure the peace of Ireland stop even here. He applied to Rome for permission to crown his son prince John as king of Ireland, though of course in vassalage to England. The court of Rome, which, even only with reference to the Peter-pence, and still more with reference to future contingencies, had a deep stake in the tranquillity and prosperity of Ireland, readily gave the permis-tion required. But, whether from already perceiving something of John's real nature, or from some other unexplained feeling, the king did not avail himself of it, but merely sent him over as lord of Ireland, where the prince arrived in the year 1186.

CHAPTER VIII.

A. D. 1185.—PRINCE John was at this period about nineteen years of age. Arrogant, heartless, and destitute even of the prudence which would have taught him to imitate the affability and kindness of manner by which his father, during the whole of his stay in Ireland, had contrived to conciliate and even attach the tetchy but warm-hearted chieftains, John by his very first act disgusted those who approached him for the purpose of renewing their oath of allegiance to the English crown. The flowing yellow garments and the preposterously long hair and beads of the Irish, presented a very odd appearance, no doubt; though, as the Irish were a singularly well and powerfully made race, one would imagine that their peculiarities of costume tended to make their appearance imposing rather than ludicrous. But when they were introduced to prince John, who seems to have been surrounded chiefly by persons as young and as ignorant as himself, they were received with peals of insulting laughter, and some of the boy-courtiers are said to have even gone so far as to pull the beards of these fiery and veteran warriors with every manifestation of contempt. The Irish nature was precisely such as it would be far safer to injure than to insult. Burning with rage, the chieftains departed from the prince's presence with the deepest determination to leave no effort untried towards shaking off the English yoke. They who had been the most cordially and sincerely desirous to show themselves faithful to the absent king of England, now unhesitatingly joined those of their fellow-countrymen who were already in arms against him, and an insurrection of the most extensive and terrific description forthwith broke out. The English army, bent on at various points, was in a great measure destroyed, and the Irish even made themselves a passage into the English pale, plundering and then burning many of the houses and butchering many of the inhabitants. So extensive was this revolt, and so deadly the animosity that was felt towards prince John, that it is most likely Ireland would have been wholly lost to England, for a time at least, had he longer continued in that island. Fortunately, however, genuine information, not always procurable by even the most powerful kings, reached the ears of Henry; and he instantly recalled his petulant and incapable son, and gave the government to De Courcy, earl of Ulster. He, probably, combining as he did both civil and military talents, and possessing enormous property and proportionate influence in Ulster, was the fittest man then in Ireland to overcome the formidable difficulties and danger consequent upon prince John's absurd and most unjustifiable conduct. Hugh de Lacy, who had formerly replaced Fitz-Adelm, would, indeed, have been a still more efficient governor than De Courcy, but he had recently been murdered in cold blood, by an Irish labourer, while superintending the building of a castle in his lordship of Meath.

De Courcy, well knowing the propensity of the Irish princes to make war upon each other, upon even the slightest provocation, so skilfully exerted himself to foment quarrels among them, that he easily broke up their league; and, once separated from their common object, they weakened each other so far that he had but little difficulty in quelling their desultory and individual attacks upon the English.

A. D. 1189.—Henry the Second, after a reign of thirty-five years, the latter portion of which had been tormented by the unnatural misconduct of his sons, died on the 6th of July, 1189, and was succeeded by the renowned king Richard the First. Attached, even to the verge of actual insanity, to warfare, Richard was more anxious to humble France or to lead an army against the far distant hosts of Heathenese, than to improve a conquest that was already made in his own immediate neighbourhood. He left Ireland wholly unnoticed; yet it was in his reign that the final annexation of Ireland to the English crown may in some sort be said to have taken place: as in the year 1189 Roderick O'Connor, the last native king of Ireland, expired in the monastery in which for thirteen years he had lived in peace while so much of strife and misery pervaded his country. But in his retirement he was far more useful to his country than its kings usually were. As he was the last Irish king, so was he the first of them who had the sagacity to perceive that the great source of Irish weakness and Irish misery was ignorance. Though monasteries and their inhabitants existed in very evil abundance, the great mass of the people were in the most deplorable state of ignorance. Roderick O'Connor exerted himself to establish schools, especially in Armagh; and by that wise act deserved an admiration which, unfortunately, the world is far more willing to bestow upon the brilliant but destructive career of the king who leads in war, than upon that of him who points the road to civilization and consequent happiness.

De Courcy, by nature bold, restless, and ambitious, availed himself of the neglect shown to Ireland by Richard, and made war and took spoil at his own pleasure; and when, in 1199, John succeeded to Richard, De Courcy had the boldness to refuse to acknowledge him as his sovereign. As the matter really stood between John and his nephew, Arthur of Brittany, his claim certainly was open to reasonable question. But powerful as De Courcy was in Ireland and against Irish chieftains, he soon discovered that he had overshot his mark in venturing to beard the king of England, even in the person of so every way contemptible a man as John was. De Courcy, in the life time of Richard had given great offence to prince John by the utter contempt with which he had treated all the prince's orders having relation to Ireland; and John, now that he had come to the throne, resolved to curb the proud vassal. De Courcy was accordingly arrested and sent to England. How or when he died is not accurately known, but it is certain that he was never allowed to return to his Irish possessions; and even his lordship of Ulster was taken from him and bestowed upon Hugh, the son of Hugh de Lacy, the murdered governor.

Though anything but warlike in disposition, John made an expedition to Ireland; less, it would seem, for the sake of putting an end to the disorders which existed there, than as an excuse for leaving England while the minds of his subjects were alarmed and irritated by the tremendous effects of the papal interdict. Attended by a powerful army, he was speedily waited upon at Dublin by twenty of the most powerful chieftains, who did homage and took an oath of allegiance. Anxious now to conciliate, as formerly he had been hasty to offend, he made many presents among them; and we may take it as a sure proof that these brave chieftains were even yet not far removed from barbarism, when we learn that of all the presents he made them, they were by far the most delighted with a quantity of scarlet cloth.

The reader of English history is aware of the important law regulations which were made in England during the reign of John; all these regulations were equally extended to Ireland, as were the provisions of that great political blessing—magna charta. But, unfortunately, these benefits, though they were actually conferred upon all, were enjoyed only by the English, in Ireland; the turbulence, the ignorance, and the indomitable prejudices of the dwellers beyond the English pale, making them look with mingled detestation and contempt upon all liberty and enjoyment procured otherwise than by force of arms. Where the barons from England subdued tracts of country and subjected the inhabitants to the feudal law, those inhabitants undoubtedly enjoyed the same imperfect and restricted liberty as Englishmen of the same rank; and nothing can be more grossly unjust and untrue than to represent as a consequence of English partiality, that difference between the people which really arose from the wild and ignorant, though not altogether ungenerous, fierceness and turbulence of the Irish themselves.

A. D. 1216.—John, whose attention to Ireland was but temporary, was now succeeded by Henry III. The long reign of this prince extended to fifty-six years; and the weakness of his character, especially, unfitting him to contend with the bold, able, and restless barons of his time, made the struggles of England more than enough to employ him; and Ireland was consequently left to be scourged by the constant wars between the Irish people and their English rulers, the latter of whom still farther increased the confusion of that unhappy country by fierce and frequent contests among themselves. How desperate the condition of the country had at length become, may be inferred from a petition of the Irish people to Edward I., in which they implored him to compel the barons to administer the laws equally whether to English or Irish vassals of his majesty, and to compel the extension of all English laws and customs to the whole Irish people. Utterly heedless, it would seem, of the fact that, as far as decrees could avail, all this had been done in the reign of John, and that it was the Irish people themselves who had prevented practice from being assimilated to theory; yet at the same time painfully sensible of the existing evils, though blind to their real causes, they offered to pay the sum of eight thousand marks to the king as the price of his rendering them this great and necessary service. He made an order accordingly; but the order of the great Edward was as ineffectual as that of the mean John, when opposed to the habits and prejudices of a people at once brave, restless, and ignorant, living in a state of society so provocative of injustice and tyranny as that of the feudal system.

The long war in which Edward I. was engaged with Scotland compelled him to summon his barons from Ireland, and during their absence the natives made frequent and very destructive attacks upon the English pale. The death of Edward enabled the celebrated Robert Bruce to seat himself firmly upon the throne of Scotland. Knowing how ardently the Irish desired to throw off the English yoke, and judging how importantly useful he could make them in diverting the attacks of the English from Scotland, king Robert Bruce in the year after his accession to the Scottish throne, (1315) sent his brother Edward Bruce into Ireland with a well equipped army of 6000 men. He was received with open arms as deliverer, and took upon himself the title of king. His brother soon afterwards landed in Ireland with a still more powerful army. But just at this time there was an absolute famine in both England and Ireland; and the latter country, suffering under the effects of long civil war as well as of the bad season, was still more terribly destitute than the former. The most splendid successes of war could avail nothing against famine. Reduced to feed upon the horses as they died of actual hunger, the soldiers of Bruce perished in awful numbers, and he at length returned to Scotland, leaving his brother to contest his usurped crown with the English or abandon it, as he might see fit. Edward Bruce, who was to the full as cruel as he was brave, bore up with a most constant spirit against all difficulties. But though he had much success in the field, and made terrible examples of the vanquished, he found it utterly impossible to drive the English from their strong holds. The Irish were, indeed, for the most part very favourable to him; but if they hated the English much, they hated each other still more, and, as usual, their mutual strife rendered it impossible that they could constantly and cordially co-operate even for a purpose and a cause which they all had strongly at heart.

A. D. 1212.—Under such circumstances, it is most likely that Edward Bruce would at length have seen that the conquest of Ireland from such a people as the English was a project too vast for Scotland, even with the mighty Robert Bruce for her king. But ere he had yet made up his mind to abandon his usurped royalty and return to Scotland, he was encountered at Dundalk by the English army, under the lord Bermingham. Edward Bruce on this important day performed the part of a good general and a stout soldier; but all his efforts were in vain, and he fell upon the field of battle while making efforts to rally a portion of his routed and dispirited force. Conspicuous by his arms and ornaments, he was marked out by an English knight, sir John Maupas. Holding Edward Bruce in especial detestation, and firmly believing his death to be in every way deserved and desirable, he vowed himself, after the custom of the age, to destroying him. Accordingly, though Edward was zealously defended by his friends and attendants, sir John succeeded in reaching him; and after the battle their dead bodies were found still grasping each other in the death gripe. Rarely, if ever, in modern warfare will an instance be found, where personal feelings are so linked with patriotic zeal.

Knowing what we do of the turbulence of the barons wherever the feudal law prevailed, how difficult the firmest and ablest kings found it to subvert them, and how much they encroached upon the kingly authority even in the king's immediate vicinage, we have no room to doubt that the English barons in Ireland made their vassals, whether Irish or English by birth, feel the full weight of their feudal chains. Removed as they were from the check of the king's personal presence, and living in a country in which civil strife was not the mere exception but the general, almost the universal rule, it would have been strange indeed if those barons had been less tyrannous than the men of their order who lived under circumstances less provocative of the evil impulses of our nature. But though the historian would sadly mistake his vocation who should represent the conduct of the English nobles in Ireland as being free from all spot and exception; though the very nature of the feudal tenure was provocative of wrong doing; yet, it behoves us, on the other hand, not to attribute to one cause, however open to censure in its own nature, evils which did not spring from it. And it is abundantly evident, that after making the fullest allowance for the evils which Ireland, in common with other countries, must of necessity have owed to the abuses of the feudal system, the chief and the abiding cause of Irish misery was the inherent disorderliness of the Irish character. The clergy, for instance, both English and Irish, maintained their place and privileges against even the boldest and most unprincipled of the nobles; but did the clergy of Ireland act as a united body? So far from doing so, the Irish clergy and the clergy of the English pale were at deadly feud. No English monk was allowed to enter an Irish monastery; and the monasteries of the English pale were hopelessly inaccessible to the native Irish monk. When we see that even the common bond of spiritual and temporal interest could not induce the clergy to lay aside their animosities, we need not marvel that the best attempts at causing a general union of the people failed, and that perpetual revolts, sometimes justified by tyrannous practices, and sometimes the mere rush and outbreak of fiery and turbulent spirits, at length tired the conquerors of their vain attempts to live in peace and unity with the conquered.

Edward III., who did so much towards improving the laws and raising the trade of England, was equally desirous to render the same service to Ireland. Clearly perceiving that it was next to impossible to obtain the exact obedience of the barons whose lands lay in Ireland; and, at the same time, very desirous to prevent the Irish people from being oppressed; he threw, as far as possible, the government of Ireland into the hands of nobles whose property lay in England, and for whose obedience and good conduct they consequently had some security. But this really excellent stroke of policy and humanity was made too late to have the effect it would have had at an earlier date.

A. D. 1361.—Lionel, duke of Clarence, was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland in the year 1361; and he evidently went there with the most sincere desire to give effect to his royal father's benevolent wishes for the people's welfare. But the animosities which had been so many years increasing were now beyond the possibility of a speedy remedy. Such was the hostility between the two races, that under the governorship of Lionel, it was found absolutely requisite to pass the stringent regulations known to lawyers as the statute of Kilkenny. Hitherto, even under the arbitrary John, attempts had been made to govern Ireland rather by affection than by severity, and the law left it quite open to the two races to become, in the course of time, amalgamated by marriage and friendship. But by this statute, which seems really to have been called for by the danger of the English, and by the exceeding rancour of the Irish, the latter were at length treated formally, and by the express sanction of the law, as a conquered, inferior, and dangerous people. Marriage with the Irish was forbidden under the heaviest penalties; the nursing of English infants by Irish women was discountenanced, and severe punishments were allotted to the offences, on the part of men of English descent, of speaking the Irish language, using the Irish customs, or wearing the Irish dress. These and some other enactments were doubtless very severe; but it must be remembered that enactments in an opposite spirit had, for two hundred years, been tried in vain; and that between this stern severity and the actual abandonment of the island—the possession of which by France would have been so prejudicial, perhaps so fatal to the English throne—the condition and temper of the Irish people left room for no middle course. However reasonable the demands of the English government, they never failed to provoke an armed resistance; the country was continually in a state of revolt; famine was frequent and suffering constant; and however much the historian, living in a free and happier age, may feel inclined to dislike severity, he must wholly part with candour, or defy common-sense, ere he deny that in the case of Ireland the duty of severity was, under all the circumstances, by this time quite inseparable from the task of saving the English from the fury of the Irish, and the Irish from the folly, the violence, and the licentiousness of their own chief men, clerical as well as lay.

Soon after the accession of Richard II. to the throne of England, that prince went to Ireland with a considerable force, the character of the country for turbulence very naturally leading him to expect that he should find the chiefs disinclined to yield him peaceable homage. Whether, however, from some vague predilection in his favour, or from the very fact of his being accompanied by a large and well-appointed force, he was even joyfully received. No fewer than seventy-four of the most powerful men hastened to make a formal surrender of their possessions, and to agree to receive them in grant from him on condition of maintaining his royal authority in Ireland against all who should gainsay or resist it. Delighted with a loyalty so exuberant where he had anticipated reluctant homage, if not actual resistance, Richard proposed to honour with knighthood the four principal chiefs, or petty kings as they still affected to be styled. But the Irish were not learned in the high lore of chivalry, and an honour which would have been eagerly coveted by the high-born and wealthy elsewhere, and which was often gladly earned by long and perilous services in the field, was actually declined by these rude and untutored men, who gravely assured him that it was the custom of the Irish kings to confer knighthood on their sons even as early as the age of seven years. And it was not until much pains had been taken to explain to them the theory and ordinances of genuine knighthood, that they could be induced to pass the preparatory vigil and receive the honour with its strict and solemn formalities. Richard on this occasion made a considerable stay in Ireland, and he and his Irish subjects parted in apparently cordial good feeling.

But as soon as the king was absent the Irish chiefs became as turbulent as ever. The English pale was perpetually attacked, and so much territory recovered from it by the Irish, that it became reduced within dangerously narrow limits; and at length Roger, earl of March, cousin and heir presumptive of the king, was barbarously murdered. Richard was, at this time, greatly harassed and endangered by the enmity of Henry Bolingbroke, the exiled duke of Lancaster. But though he well knew that that noble meditated the invasion of England, Richard unhesitatingly led an army to Ireland to avenge the death of his cousin (A.D. 1399). As was usual with them, the Irish chieftains endeavoured to avoid being brought to a general action, and retired to the least accessible spots among the bogs and mountains. But Richard was too intent upon avenging the murder of his cousin to listen to those who represented the difficulty of following the rebels into their retreats. Burning the towns and villages as he marched along, and disregarding the sufferings and complaints of his soldiers, who often floundered in the treacherous soil of the bogs, furnishing easy and helpless marks for the unerring weapons of their enemies, he followed the latter up so closely, that the greater part of them gladly submitted on condition of being received into the king's peace with full indemnity for the past. But Macmorrough, a lineal descendant of that chief whose misconduct had first called the English into Ireland, held out and loudly protested that neither fear nor love should ever induce him to submit. The chivalry of England was not, however, to be long resisted by a chieftain so comparatively powerless, and Macmorrough at length agreed to treat with the earl of Gloucester. But when the meeting took place, the fiery chieftain was so enraged at what he thought the insulting terms proposed to him, that he angrily broke up the conference and betook himself to his savage haunts, less inclined than ever to submission, though less than ever in a condition to carry on any permanent or effective war.

Richard offered a very large reward for the person of Macmorrough, living or dead; but events had, by this time, taken place in England, which compelled him to forego his desire to punish the haughty and half-barbarous enemy; for the earl of Lancaster, who subsequently dethroned Richard, and succeeded him under the title of Henry IV., had landed in England, and been joined by some of the most powerful of the nobility, and an army of nearly sixty thousand men. Richard was consequently obliged to abandon whatever projects he had formed for Ireland.

Henry IV. could find no leisure to attend to the affairs of Ireland, though many and pressing petitions were sent to him; and during the whole of his reign the turbulence of the Irish chieftains, and the cupidity and despotism of the English authorities, made that country a scene of wild disorder and wretchedness; in which condition it remained from the close of the fourteenth century to the accession of Henry VII. of England. During this long period of four-score years, the whole history of Ireland may be written in two words, strife and misery; and to enter into any detail would be merely to weary the reader with a monotonous recital of all the wrong that disgraces abused might, and all the misery that degrades while it tortures trampled weakness.

CHAPTER IX.

A. D. 1485.—As though Ireland had not already suffered sufficiently from wars, revolts, and their inevitable results, the accession to the throne of England of one of its most solidly wise and peace loving kings, Henry VII., was the signal for more Irish disturbance. Hitherto the unhappy people had at least fought about their own affairs; but now they were involved in the cause of a low-born boy, a silly impostor, and the mere tool of a more knavish one. The history of the equally impudent and unsuccessful attempt of the priest Simon to palm a mean youth, named Lambert Simnel, upon the people as the earl of Warwick, the nephew of Edward IV., and heir to the throne of England, we gave in detail under the history of that country. But it is necessary that we speak of it here, inasmuch as that gross imposture became a cause of very considerable suffering to the Irish.

Richard Simon, a priest living in Oxford, was undoubtedly the chief and direct instructor of the young impostor, Lambert Simnel; but considering the mode in which the king had arrived at his royal dignity, and considering the number, rank and temper of his enemies, and especially considering the character of the dowager queen, there is but little reason to doubt that Simon was himself a mere tool in the hands of persons far higher in rank. Though, by whatever means procured, young Simnel was well furnished with information of the circumstances connected with the royal family; and though, consequently, it might fairly be expected that all examination of his own story by those who also had means of knowing those circumstances, would but tend to strengthen his cause, his tutor judged it best to let him make his first essay at imposture at a distance from the court. Both for the sake of its ignorance and its propensity to fighting for any or for no cause, Ireland was judged to be the fittest scene for the first attempt; especially as many of the Irish were fondly attached to the cause of the house of York, of which it was pretended that the young impostor was a scion, and were still more especially attached to his alleged parent, the duke of Clarence, who, as lord-lieutenant of Ireland, had been a very general favourite. All these circumstances induced the friends and advisers of Simnel to take him to Ireland, and his reception there fully answered their most sanguine expectations. The lord-deputy of Ireland, Thomas Fitzgerald, earl of Kildare, received the impostor's story without suspicion or hesitation, the people followed the example of the court, and the impudent son of a poor baker was actually crowned,—the crown being taken for that purpose from an image of the virgin—lodged in Dublin castle with all regal honours, and received throughout Ireland, under the title of king Edward VI. without a word said, or a blow stricken in defence of king Henry VII.

Much as we know of the ignorance that pervaded the great mass of the people previous to the general diffusion of information by means of the press, the success, however temporary, of this most impudent impostor, is marvellous even as regards the common people; and as regards the higher order of his adherents, it requires no small exertion of charitable judgment to acquit them of having feigned credulity, in order to play off a low-born impostor against their king, in hatred of that king's talents, firmness, economy, and love of peace. For, in the first place, had the person to whose tale such extraordinary credence was yielded been the actual earl of Warwick, he would, even settling all the claims of Henry, the de facto king, aside, have had no title until after the daughters of Edward IV. And, in the next place, Henry VII., with the prudence which characterised his whole life, no sooner heard of the pretensions of Simnel, than he put all doubt out of the question, and rendered all dispute upon the subject utterly ridiculous, by causing the real earl of Warwick to be taken from his confinement in the Tower of London, and exhibited to the populace in the most public manner at Paul's cross. Margaret of Burgundy, however, affecting to believe the absurd tale, got together two thousand German troops, under the command of an able and enterprising officer named Swartz, and sent them to Ireland. The arrival of such a force, sent, too, by a person of such influence as the duchess dowager of Burgundy, raised the Irish enthusiasm to the highest pitch. Too poor to be able much longer to support the pretender and his numerous followers, the Irish now became eager to be led to the support of his claims in England, where, moreover, it may fairly be presumed that they hoped to profit largely in the way of plunder, even should they not succeed in dethroning Henry. That shrewd and sensible monarch had, however, wisely contented himself with convincing his English subjects of Simnel's imposture, and thus preparing them to give him a cold or hostile reception should he attempt to leave Ireland for England.

It is singular to reflect what might have been the consequence to both Simnel and Ireland had the impostor thoroughly understood the views of the wary Henry, and availed himself of them. Henry, content with exposing the imposture in England, would scarcely, so cautious was he and so little was Ireland directly profitable to the English crown, have taken the trouble or run the risk of going thither, in which case Simnel might have usurped Ireland, and in the distracted state of England at the death of Edward VI. the credulous English might have taken the son or grandson of the Irish usurper for the true heir to the English throne, in preference alike to the lady Jane Grey and the lady Mary—especially as the legitimacy of the latter could be so plausibly called in question. But in political adventure as in landscapes, "tis distance lends enchantment to the view," and Simnel, intonated with the honours which art in some credulity in others caused him to receive in Ireland, was easily induced to believe that his cause and name were equally popular in England; and, in the full persuasion that he had only to show himself in order to secure English support to his cause, he actually disembarked his Germans and a host of the wildest of the hordes, as the native Irish warriors of that day were called, at Poudrey, in Lancashire. This was precisely what the king desired. He had completely destroyed the pretender's character in England by the simple but irrefragable evidence of the real and living earl of Warwick, and having thus rendered it next to impossible for the pretender to excite English sympathy, he marched against him. The hostile forces met in Nottinghamshire, and near Stoke in that county a most sanguinary action was fought. The impostor was completely defeated, and both he and his inter were taken prisoners. The Irish, who fought with even more than their accustomed bravery, suffered dreadfully in this engagement. Ill provided with offensive weapons, they were altogether destitute of defensive armour; and consequently received the most ghastly and fatal wounds. Rushing, half naked, upon the cool and well-protected soldiery of England, they saw their ranks awfully thinned at every charge, and when the battle was over but comparatively few of them remained alive. With the capture of Simnel the king's anger ended. He immediately dispatched sir Richard Edgecombe with a full and free pardon to all in Ireland who had abetted or aided the impostor, and with authority and commandment to take their renewed oaths of allegiance. To Thomas, earl of Kildare, he sent, with the letter containing his pardon, a splendid gold chain; and shortly afterwards the principal lords of Ireland were summoned to wait upon the king at his palace at Greenwich, ostensibly for the purpose of doing homage and taking oaths of allegiance to him in person, as they already had done to his confidential representative. But the ever-politic king had a deeper design; that of making the Irish lords so ashamed of the impostor to whose designs they had so foolishly lent themselves, that they should be for ever after little disposed to countenance similar adventurers. And, accordingly, at a grand banquet to which they were invited, they had the surprise and mortification to find among the liveried menials who waited upon them, that identical Simnel whom a short time previous they had crowned as their king—and crowned, too, with a diadem sacrilegiously taken from the head of an image of the Virgin!

While a portion of the Irish were as foolishly as hardly throwing away their lives in England in support of Simnel, the Irish at home were fighting furiously among themselves. Bad as the situation of Ireland generally was, it was just now even worse than usual. The continual wars which were carried on by the Irish chieftains against each other and against the lords of the English pale, had thrown all the country beyond the then very narrow limits of that pale completely back into its primeval barbarism. Their huts, where they had them, were dreadfully mean, aquilid, and unwholesome; thousands of them had no shelter but the woods and the mountain caves, and for the most part they lived like the nomade tribes of the east, shifting from place to place with their flocks and herds for the sake of pasturage, and neither practising nor profiting by the cultivation of their singularly fertile country.

Partly, perhaps, because he deemed that the mere existence of such a state of things proved the negligence or the incompetency of the earl of Kildare, and partly from information that another conspiracy was on foot, and that the earl was concerned in it, the king dismissed that nobleman from his office of lord-deputy of Ireland. Incensed at this disgrace and deprivation, Kildare leagued with O'Donnell, O'Neill, and other Irish chieftains, and all the horrors of war were again inflicted with increased severity. The English pale was invaded and ravaged; and the sufferers, in revenge, made incursions upon the neighbouring country; each party vied with the other in ferocity and injustice; and, such was the strange and fearful lot of Ireland, the prudent and just precaution of the most peace-loving of English kings caused all the worst horrors of civil war to rage with tenfold violence throughout Ireland.

It seems to be a law as invariable as any physical law of nature, that evil deed shall be an evil seed; in other words, that in addition to the present evil which results from crime or folly, some future crime or folly shall result immediately from the one and mediately from the other. Ireland, poor, half barbarous, and distant, would have been but little likely to have been dragged into the seditions of the enemies of Henry VII. if that same country had not also been desperate and turbulent. But its known propensity to turbulence and bloodshed, the ready credulity with which it had listened to Simnel, and the at once ignorant and faithful ferocity with which its thousands had perilled life and limb in that impostor's cause, could not fail to point it out to any new adventurer of the same stamp, as a sure refuge and nursery of his embryo conspiracy. Accordingly, that Per-his Warbeck, of whom we have had occasion to speak at length under the head of England, chose Ireland as the abiding-place of his designs upon the English crown. He landed at Cork, and was received there with a warmth and credulity even superior to those which had been bestowed upon Simnel. Pretending to be Richard Plantagenet, one of those young princes who were murdered by Richard III. in the Tower of London, he had no sooner landed in Ireland than he sent out his false messives in every direction; especially directing his attention to Desmond and Kildare, as knowing them to be beforehand inclined to treasonable practices against their sovereign. Fortunately for the usually unfortunate Irish people, the infatuation in favour of this pretender reached France, and was still stronger there than in Ireland, and Warbeck accepted an invitation to the former country.

But Henry VII., who, though he loved peace and preferred the amassing of money to the showy but empty glories of the mere conqueror, was, nevertheless, very capable of exerting real vigour upon real and solid occasion, now came to the conclusion that the existing state of things in Ireland was far too favourable to the enemies of his throne; and he at once determined to make such alterations as would prevent that island from being so convenient a refuge and recruiting place for pretenders and their traitorous friends. It is a singular fact that Ireland, overrun and terribly injured by her own native factions, was at this time an avowed and permitted sanctuary to evil doers. He who had committed in England an offence by which he had forfeited his life or liberty, had only to escape from England into Ireland, and no man could touch him. This right of sanctuary was first formally recognised by Richard, duke of York—father of Edward IV.—during his governorship of Ireland, but for its actual origin we must look to the numerous monastic houses there. Henry VII. perceiving the immense and pernicious advantages which the worst enemies of England derived from this Irish right of sanctuary, very wisely determined to abolish it; and he entrusted this and some other important reforms to a man of considerable talent and still more energy, sir Edward Poyning, whose able and firm conduct caused his name to be given to the important regulations known to lawyers under the name of "Poyning's law," which struck at the very root of Irish sedition and turbulence, by taking away from the lords, parliament, and all other authorities in Ireland, the power of giving force and validity to any law until it should have been considered and sanctioned by the king of England. Sir Edward Poyning at the same time revived, as far as practicable, the celebrated statute of Kilkenny, and did much towards rendering the lords of the English pale less powerful, both as to wantonly oppressing the Irish, and as to carrying on with impunity their rebellious and traitorous practices against the king of England. Perhaps the most important act performed by sir Edward Poyning towards discountenancing the disorderly conduct of the lords of the pale, was his arresting and sending prisoner to England the celebrated earl of Kildare. The earl, however, was in no real danger. In this, as in not a few other cases, Henry VII. carried his usually praiseworthy temporising and peaceable policy too far, and allowed an exceedingly dull joke of the earl's to serve as an excuse not merely for pardoning him, but even for re-appointing him to the dangerously powerful office for which he had shown himself so singularly unfit.

A.D. 1497.—Warned by his narrow escape, the earl of Kildare seems henceforward to have conducted himself with considerable discretion. Perkin Warbeck, aided by his French friends, having made an attempt upon England, was signally disappointed by the loyal men of Kent. They invited him to land, intending to seize him, but the pretender was too experienced a cheat to fall into the snare, and the result fully justified his caution. Those of his adherents who had landed were either slain or made prisoners; and Warbeck, unaware or neglectful of the alteration in the temper and opportunities of Ireland that had been wrought by Poyning's law, proceeded thither. But though on landing at Cork he was well received by the mayor of that place, and also by the factious earl of Desmond, he speedily found it necessary to depart for Scotland, where he had a most credulous and fast friend in James IV., who protected and honoured him to the utmost, and even went so far as to give him the hand of his own relative the lovely Catherine Gordon, daughter of the earl of Huntly, who, to the honour of Henry VII. be it said, was most kindly and hospitably treated after the fall and execution of her husband. This short stay of Warbeck in Ireland was, thanks to the good order established by Poyning, productive of no general injury; the mayor of Cork, who was subsequently executed for his treasonable concert with the pretender, being the chief sufferer.

A.D. 1535.—The earl of Kildare had now for some time been in a sort of honourable imprisonment in England; cardinal Wolsey, the able minister of Henry VIII., having decidedly, and very wisely, objected to allowing that nobleman's use or abuse of his immense power in Ireland to depend upon his more or less lively recollection of the narrow escape his father had formerly had; and the cardinal had an additional reason to doubt the loyalty and faith of the young earl, from the fact of his being very closely allied with the notoriously seditious and powerful chieftains of the septa O'Carroll and O'Connor.

During Kildare's enforced absence he left all his interests and influence in the hands of his son, lord Thomas Fitzgerald, who was then barely twenty-one years of age. The usual feuds were rife in Ireland, and the usual suffering and desperation existed; and the immense estates of Kildare would, consequently, have tasked the whole of even his great and practised talents for their defence against open enmity, or the still more dangerous arts of pretended friendship. It is not surprising that, under such circumstances, so very young a man as the lord Thomas Fitzgerald should fall into the snare that was laid for him by his father's enemies. They, in order to involve him with the English government, caused it to be reported to him, that his father had been put to death in England, and that orders had been actually issued for his own arrest and that of other members of his family. Hot-headed, and, to say the truth, partly justified by the probabilities of the case, the young man assembled his armed followers and galloped off to Dublin, where he scornfully threw down his father's state sword, and made a solemn renunciation, in both his own and his father's name, of all allegiance and respect to the English crown. It was to no purpose that the chancellor, one of the few real friends in Ireland of the Fitzgerald family, implored the enthusiastic and deceived young man not to commit himself too hastily and too far. The mere rhymed follies of an Irish bard were, with this hot-headed and most ill-advised young nobleman, sufficient to counterbalance all the wisdom of a grave and really honest counsellor. He collected all the friends and stores he could command; and though the plague was then raging in Dublin, he proceeded to invest that city. Knowing that he had many friends, he sent propositions to the principal citizens, assuring the safety of the city itself, provided that they would aid him in laying siege to the castle. Alarmed for their own property and safety, the citizens consented to these terms; and the lord Thomas accordingly attacked the castle. The archbishop, who also had friends proof to the ordinary temptations which make men traitors,—contrived to get on board ship, and would most probably have escaped, but for the circumstance of the vessel in which he had embarked going ashore in a gale of wind at Clontarf. The unfortunate prelate got safely to land, but was seized by the adherents of Fitzgerald; and to the eternal disgrace of that personage, who actually witnessed the execution of his own most unjust as well as impolitic command, was immediately put to death. After this disgraceful murder, lord Thomas left a part of his army in blockade of the castle, and led the remainder into Kilkenny to invade the property of the earl of Ossory, to whom he had previously sent an offer of alliance. The earl, far more honest than was the wont of the Irish nobles of that time, sternly refused the offer that was thus craftily made to him in the double character of threat and promise. His loyal conduct was most providentially rewarded by a sudden change of determination on the part of the citizens of Dublin, who refused to allow the siege of the castle to be carried on any further. They employed scouts to spread a report that troops had arrived from England; and so implicitly did the people believe it, that they boldly threw open the castle gates, and sallied out with so much fury upon the domestic enemy, that they completely put them to the rout. Lord Thomas, who on learning the change that had taken place in the determination of the people of Dublin, had hastened back, was wholly unable to restrain the panic among his men, and was himself fain to take refuge in a monastery for the night. On the following day, being secure in his camp, he proposed terms; but as he refused to give up the children of several leading citizens of Dublin unless he were first assured of the king's pardon—an assurance which the citizens of course were unable to give him—the treaty came to nothing, and a terrible civil war ensued, the horrors of which were aggravated by a pestilence which, originating in Dublin, spread itself thence through the whole country.

A. D. 1535.—Lord Leonard Grey, newly appointed to the government of Ireland, displayed considerable talent in the course of this terrible strife; and after upwards of six months of hard fighting he obliged lord Thomas to surrender. He and five of his uncles, who had been as deeply concerned as himself, were sent to London as prisoners and there executed.

Henry VIII. was the more enraged by the extent and continuance of this rebellion, because it put a stop to the efforts he was just then making to carry into the religion of Ireland the same reformation he had brought about in England. As soon as the rebellion was suppressed, Henry renewed his endeavours to that end; and so evident an evil was the multitude of monastic houses in Ireland, that the archbishop of Dublin was the very first person to fall in with the king's design. By that prelate's advice the Irish parliament was called together, and an act was forthwith passed for transferring to the crown the first fruits and other spiritual dues which hitherto had been paid to the pope. This politic step was soon after followed up by the issuing of a commission, similar to that which had existed in England, for suppressing the monasteries. Unquestionably good and necessary as this measure was in itself, it was carried into effect without a sufficient regard to considerations of political economy, or even of ordinary humanity. The very enormity of the evil required that the remedy should be applied with all the greater prudence. Almost destitute as Ireland was at this time of manufactures and commerce, the suddenly turning upon the world of an immense number of men and women, who for years had been accustomed to the care of providing for their worldly wants, could not fail to make a very terrible addition to the frightful distress that already existed. to starving thousands, and the courtiers and speculators to whom the king disposed of the possessions of the suppressed communities, with a most unreflecting profusion, were little inclined to show the same indulgence to the tenants that had made the church every where proverbial as the easiest and most liberal of landlords. It is obvious that a very slight amount of judgment and care might have spared very much of the misery that was thus caused; and it is lamentable to reflect that the want of that care and judgment made evil mingle so largely and so long in what would otherwise have been a measure of unmixed goodness and wisdom.

The suppression of the monasteries, and the formal declaration of Henry VIII. as king of Ireland, completely independent of the pope—instead of lord of Ireland holding under the pope, which was the light in which the Irish had hitherto looked upon the king of England—were followed up by some politic endeavours on the part of Henry, by personal attentions and the distribution of titles, to conciliate the loyalty and regard of the Irish chieftains. O'Donnel, for instance, was created earl of Tyrconnel; O'Neil, earl of Tyrone; and his son, lord Duncannon; though the latter, formidable as he could make himself in wild Irish warfare, was so poor, that in order to be able to go to London to receive his new honour from the hands of the king, was actually obliged to borrow a hundred pounds of St. Leger, the English governor, and had so little prospect of returning even that petty sum in hard cash, that he stipulated to be allowed to repay it in cattle.

The most politic and just use that Henry made of any of the lands of the suppressed monastic houses in Ireland, was that of giving estates to many of the nobles upon whom he conferred titles; a step by which he at once reconciled them to the suppression and the separation from Rome, and gave them a stronger interest in resisting any attempts that might be made to disturb the country or to throw off his authority. And though neither that nor any other measure, unaccompanied by a more extensive civilization of the people, and increase of trade and commerce than were immediately practicable, could have wholly restored peace to a people who had been so long accustomed to live in the midst of the disturbances and miseries of civil war, it is clear that Henry's politic attention and liberality to the Irish had considerable effect; for the suppression of the monasteries and all the consequent sufferings of the people caused scarcely any increase of the usual turbulence of that most turbulent country. The comparatively short reign of Mary in England, however, served to show that the facility with which the Irish had acquiesced in Henry's sweeping reform of religion was chiefly owing to self-interest and to the skill of the king in accommodating his favour to the temper and desires of the person to be conciliated. For a very general inclination was shown in Ireland during the reign of Mary, to return to the papal faith, and one of the earliest difficulties experienced by Elizabeth was that of re-establishing protestantism among her Irish subjects.

The Desmonds and the O'Neills were especially troublesome in their resistance to England. The earl of Desmond broke out into an open war with the earl of Ormond, who, besides being a very powerful and able nobleman, was a cousin of the queen. Desmond professing to be confident that he could show that he was in the right, and was the injured party in the dispute between him and Ormond, which originated in a question of boundary of their adjoining possessions, petitioned to be allowed to represent the matter to the queen in person. He arrived in London under the impression that he was to have the required interview, but instead of being so favoured, he was, harshly enough, thrown in the Tower, where he was kept a close prisoner for some years. When he at length got his liberty he naturally enough considered himself a deeply injured man, and extended his enmity from the earl of Ormond to the English power altogether.

A. D. 1579.—Philip of Spain, hating Elizabeth, both as the protestant ruler of that kingdom which he would fain have subjected to the gloomy and desolating despotism of the inquisition, and because she had, most prudently, refused the offer he made of his hand almost ere her sister and his wife was laid in her tomb, gladly encouraged Desmond in his desire to work evil to the English power, and actually sent the rebel earl a very considerable force of Spaniards and Italians. But the wild Irish warfare, with its accompanying famine and other sufferings, was too much for the endurance of these troops, who had been accustomed to make war with considerably less bloodshed and more personal indulgence. Defeated wherever they appeared, and at length abandoned in despair by Desmond himself, they laid down their arms, and sir Walter Raleigh and other English officers decided that they could not be looked upon so much in the light of prisoners of war, as in that of felonious abettors of a foul domestic rebellion; and, as a consequence of this decision, they were summarily executed.

Desmond himself being found in a wretched hut, was put to death by some soldiers for the sake of the reward they anticipated receiving for his head from his enemy the earl of Ormond. The large territories of Desmond, and the vast possessions of the numerous wealthy men who had abetted his rebellion were confiscated, either on the death of the owners in battle, or by their departure on the failure of the rebellion to the Low Countries, where service was offered to them by Philip.

If the miseries of civil war fell exclusively upon those who excite it, the evil would be great and sad enough to cause our sorrow; but, unhappily, the worst share of wretchedness usually falls upon people who neither take part in the crime, nor have any power to prevent its commission. In the present case, the horrors of famine and disease raged to such an extent as almost to depopulate Munster. Raleigh and other Englishmen got grants of the land that was thus left untenanted; upwards of forty new lordships being distributed, at almost nominal rents, upon the condition of settling English families. This, however, could only be partially done, for we have not a greater horror of the most savage deserts of Africa at the present day than the generality of Englishmen then had of that poor and turbulent Ireland, of whose misery and barbarous cruelty they heard so much. Irish tenants, therefore, were, in many cases, accepted by the new owners of the soil. We have mentioned among these new owners the celebrated sir Walter Raleigh; and to the accident of his obtaining a grant Ireland owes the introduction of her staple food, potatoes, which he first brought into that country from Spanish America. He also introduced the cultivation of tobacco, but the climate of Ireland—more moist even than England—prevented the quality from being good, or the crop from being even moderately safe, and, excepting as a matter of curiosity, it is now but little grown there. But, by introducing the potato, Raleigh conferred a real and permanent benefit upon that country.

Hugh O'Neill, who had received much kindness from queen Elizabeth, by whom he had been created earl of Tyrone, and to whom he was indebted for the restoration of a very considerable part of the earldom, which had been forfeited to the crown by the treason of his uncle Shane O'Neill, was for some time one of the most loyal of the queen's nobles in Ireland. It chanced, however, that when the great and providential temper dispersed that armada which Philip of Spain and the pope had presumptuously named the "invincible," some of the vessels composing it were wrecked upon the coast of Ireland. Tyrone, whose earl had not so completely concealed his real feelings as to cause his loyalty to be wholly unsuspected, behaved with so much cordiality to the shipwrecked Spaniards, as to give an opportunity to his cousin, a son of Shane O'Neill, to accuse him of treasonable correspondence with Spain. All the long suppressed violence of the earl's nature now burst fiercely forth, and with a violence which gave ample occasion to believe that the real sting of the charge lay in its truth. Having, for many years, been favoured and distinguished by the queen, in whose service he had in his youth borne arms against the earl of Desmond, had he really been innocent, and indignant at the impeachment of his loyalty, it is quite obvious that he could have had no difficulty in obtaining an opportunity to clear himself in the eyes of her majesty. But instead of taking this safe and straight forward course, he caused his cousin to be seized and put to death; and having thus, by an inhuman and gratuitous crime put himself out of the queen's peace, he impudently set himself up as the patriotic enemy of that queen, to whose favour he owed all that he possessed. Levying war under the pretence of patriotism; but, in reality, to save himself from the deserved penalty of murder, he also excited the M'Guireas, M'Mahons, and other septa to join in his rebellion; and while the English government and its authorised officers and agents were endeavouring to civilise and enrich the country, these patriots were doing their utmost to throw it deeper and deeper into barbarism and poverty, for the mere sake of serving their own most disgracefully selfish purposes.

A. D. 1594.—The experience of ages had not as yet taught the Irish that peace is the true nursing mother of prosperity and happiness. Tyrone and his rebellious associates, with abundant support, had committed proportionate crime, and inflicted proportionate misery. And yet, when in 1594, sir William Russell went to Ireland as lord deputy, Tyrone had the consummate assurance to go to Dublin to take the oath of allegiance and give assurances of his desire to support her majesty's government. Sir Henry Bagnal, a shrewd man and stern soldier, who then filled the office of marshal of the army in Ireland, was for putting it out of the practised traitor's power to commit further crime by at once sending him over to England. But sir William Russell, desirous above all things of carrying conciliation to its utmost prudent length, determined to trust the earl's promise of faith and loyalty; and the earl showed his sense of this too trusting and chivalrous conduct, by immediately going to his own territory and opening a correspondence with her majesty's bitterest enemy, the Spaniard, from whom he obtained a large supply of arms and ammunition, and then openly placed himself at the head of a confederacy of Irish chiefs, the avowed object being the ruin of the English power in Ireland. The very poverty of the Irish, added to the nature of their country, abounding in wood, bog, and mountain, rendered the putting down of an armed rebellion in that country a matter of extreme difficulty under any circumstances; and this difficulty was increased by queen Elizabeth's well known parsimony, which, in this case, was as censurable as it usually was praiseworthy. Ill provided with means of paying any thing like a considerable force, her commanders in Ireland had their best laid plans defeated; and the rebels retiring for a time to their wild fastnesses, made their appearance in as full force as ever the instant that the English troops were disbanded or reduced. It was chiefly, beyond all doubt, to this circumstance, that the treacherous Tyrone owed his long impunity. Knowing the difficulty of finally and efficiently crushing such an enemy, without a far larger sum than the queen was ever likely to devote to that purpose, the queen's officers were na-naturally better inclined than they otherwise would have been, to listen to Tyrone's specious proposals for accommodation; which proposals he regularly made, and as regularly broke, according as the fortune of war made the one course necessary or the other seductive.

Shrewd and well advised as Elizabeth was beyond almost all English sovereigns, it was, probably, only her ruling passion that would thus have been allowed to injure her interest, without check from her own strong sense, or censure from her ministers' faithful zeal. But magnam rectigal parimoniam was the ruling maxim of her life; to parsimony she owed not a little of that respect which the profusion of her successor caused to be withheld from him; to parsimony she owed not a little of her impunity in despotism ten times sterner and a thousand times more gratuitous and wilful than the most despotic act that ever was charged against her successor's martyred son; and there was too much of the fierce spirit of the fiercest of the Tudors in the nature of Elizabeth of England to render it possible for any minister, however able, successfully to combat, even in a particular case, a maxim to which the whole experience of her life taught her that she owed so much. And, accordingly, to the six thousand pounds which was the ordinary revenue of Ireland, the queen added only twenty thousand, when emergency required the doubling or trebling of the ordinary English force of a thousand men; and it is easy to perceive that however fortunate on particular occasions her most skillful commanders might be, they were far too poorly supplied to allow of their following up the enemy with the requisite vigour and pertinacity.

While sir John Norris was in command of the English force in Ireland, Tyrone, who was extremely artful, availed himself of his knowledge of the limited extent to which the queen supplied her officers, to play upon that commander's feelings, to make and break treaties to such an extent, that the unfortunate gentleman actually died of a complaint which the doctors attributed solely to his mental sufferings. He was succeeded by sir Henry Bagnal, of whom mention has already been made as an able and shrewd officer. Being well aware of the real disposition and intentions of Tyrone, this gallant officer resolved to press him to the utmost; but an unfortunate circumstance caused the first of his operations to terminate in his death. The rebels at that time were besieging the fort of Blackwater, the garrison of which they had already reduced to great distress. Sir Henry led his troops to the relief of the fort, and was suddenly attacked on very disadvantageous ground; and one of the ammunition waggons accidentally blowing up, so increased the panic into which the men had been thrown by the suddenness of the attack, that a complete rout took place. The loss on the English side was fully fifteen hundred, and unhappily included the gallant sir Henry; and but for the able and daring conduct of Montacute, the commander of the cavalry, who fortunately held the enemy in check, the loss would have been much greater. The rebels were naturally very much elated by this victory, which was more decisive than they were accustomed to achieve; and it also put them in possession of a very considerable supply of arms and ammunition, of both of which they stood in great need. As for Tyrone, he was so elated, that he assumed to himself the title of deliverer of the Irish people and patron of Irish liberty.

This event caused no little anxiety at the English court; and Elizabeth and her councillors at length came to the determination to give no future room to the rebels to avail themselves of truces and treaties. The queen, in truth, deemed it high time, as it assuredly was, to put her Irish affairs in the hands of some commander possessing such rank as well as ability as would impose upon the Irish. Her own opinion inclined towards Charles Blount, the young and high-spirited Lord Mountjoy. But Essex, who was now high in his sovereign's favour, was himself ambitious of acquiring fame and influence by pacifying Ireland, and he urged that Mountjoy was not possessed either of the requisite standing or the requisite talent; plainly giving the queen to understand that he was himself by far the fittest person she could send. Those courtiers who were his sincere friends—and few men ever had friends more sincere in that order of society—endeavoured to persuade him that no office, however high, was worth his acceptance, if it would require his permanent absence from the court.

Deaf to the wise counsel of his friends, Essex so perseveringly pushed his suit, that Elizabeth at length consented to entrust him with the much coveted office; and in the patent by which she constituted him her lord lieutenant of Ireland, she gave him powers which had never before been entrusted to that officer; the power, namely, of peace and war, of pardoning rebels, and of appointing all the principal officers in his lieutenancy. As in power and distinction, so in military force he was favoured beyond any of his predecessors; having an army provided for him of twenty thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry.

Averse as Elizabeth was well known to be to all expensive armaments, the more reflecting among the friends of Essex trembled for him, and the more reflecting among his enemies rejoiced in anticipation of the utter ruin in which failure would involve him, should he be otherwise than splendidly successful when so abundantly provided with the means of achieving success. And, in order to render ill success the more ruinous to him, should it occur, Lord Cobham, Raleigh, Cecil, and the earl of Nottingham took every opportunity to impress upon the queen the impossibility of her favourite being otherwise than successful, after she had so largely and liberally provided for all his need.

LAWYERS HAD BEEN FREQUENTLY MADE TO PROHIBIT THE INHABITANTS OF THE ENGLISH PALE FROM RETAINING FAIR-DEALERS OR IRISH MERCHANTS.

OWING TO THE UNCERTAIN TENURE OF ALL LANDED PROPERTY, THE LAND WAS OCCUPIED ONLY BY TENANT TENANTS, AND BADLY CULTIVATED.

THE CLERGY AT THIS TIME WERE SO IMPROVED, THAT EVEN THOSE WHO HAD THE WILL, HAD NOT THE POWER, TO RELIEVE THE POOR.

Essex, wholly losing sight of prudence in the exultation of present honour and in the enthusiastic but empty acclamations of the populace, went to Ireland in the highest possible spirits; little dreaming how many courtiers rejoiced in his success only because they saw in it the sure precursor of his fall, and utterly unsuspecting that he was carrying even in his personal train not a few whose sole purpose in accompanying was to spy his actions and report his words.

The situation in which Essex was placed by the eagerness and pertinacity with which he had sought his mission, by the immense importance and the inevitable publicity of every false step he could take, and by the singular liberality with which the queen had supplied him with every thing that could aid him in being successful, seems so obvious and simple, that it is difficult to understand how a man of unquestionable genius could possibly fail to see the peculiar necessity in which he was placed, firstly, to abide with the most inflexible strictness to all positive and particular commands that he had received from the queen, how trifling soever they might be, and secondly, to allow no consideration to tempt him out of the course of action he had pledged himself to as being the best calculated to ensure success. And yet, in these two capital particulars, Essex was false to his own safety and the interest of his royal mistress from the very outset! So much can youth, vanity, and too much prosperity intoxicate even those minds to which nature has been the most liberal.

The earl of Southampton had incurred the anger of Elizabeth by marrying without her permission,—an offence which never failed very deeply to incense her against those of her courtiers who committed it; and ere Essex left England the queen gave him express and positive orders not to give any command to Southampton. But Essex was his personal and particular friend; moreover the queen had just delighted to honour Essex far above all her other courtiers; and he, generously desirous to serve his friend, could not see that even the most trivial disobedience would tell with fearful consequence against himself, should any ill success in his important mission make the queen's future anger proportionate to her present favour, her future disappointment proportionate to her present trust and confidence.

One of the very first acts of Essex on his arrival in Ireland was to give his friend Southampton the command of the horse. This error, gross enough singly, was still farther aggravated. The queen no sooner heard of this signal disobedience than she sent her special command to Essex to revoke Southampton's commission, and Essex, instead of obeying this command, contented himself with remonstrating upon its impolicy; nor did he obey it until a new and more positive order convinced him that his own command would be taken from him if he longer hesitated to obey.

Considering the impetuous and self-willed character of the sovereign whom he served, Essex placed himself in sufficient peril and disadvantage by this one error; but as if he were utterly infatuated and determined upon ruin, he immediately afterwards committed an error still more grave, because striking still more directly and fatally against the success of the enterprise that had been entrusted to him. At the English council board he had constantly, and in no measured terms, censured the folly of wasting time, strength, and opportunity in petty operations of detail against the Irish rebels; and he had positively pledged himself to proceed at once against the main body under Tyrone himself. The queen and her able advisers having perfectly agreed with him upon this point, his instructions were drawn up in exact conformity with the opinions he had so often and so strongly expressed. He was now, therefore, doubly pledged; at once by his own judgment and by his duty. Yet he had scarcely landed in Dublin when he allowed himself to be persuaded that the season was too early for passing the bogs which sheltered Tyrone, and that his better plan would be to devote some time to an expedition into Munster, where parties of the rebels were doing much mischief and exercising much tyranny. Now, making every allowance for the climate of Ireland, it is difficult to understand how it could be too early for soldiers, men whose duty and boast it is to overcome difficulties, to make their way through the bogs, when we remember that Essex did not leave London until the month of March. A man of prudence would have enquired how far such a strange excuse originated in the selfish interest rather than in the sincere conviction of the advisers. But gallant as Essex had proved himself, and especially at Cadix, he had none of that deep reflection and eagle-eyed glance at details which are so necessary to a commander-in-chief; and instead of discovering, as with more solidity and less brilliancy, he must have discovered, that the person who thus advised him had possessions in Munster, about which they were far more anxious than about the national honour, he at once fell into the snare, and employed himself in the very task of mere detail which he had so emphatically censured in other commanders. He was very successful in Munster—while he remained there; but when in July the English troops, thinned and sickly, returned to Dublin, the dispersed rebels returned to Munster as strong as ever, and far more confident; for they now perceived that Essex was by no means the consummate commander he had been called. The course he had so unwisely pursued had yet farther ill consequence. For the sake of what must of necessity have been merely temporary success in Munster, he had not only thinned and weakened his men, but, in mere partial actions, had given them the opportunity to form a very respectful opinion of the Irish prowess. sion his men behaved so timidly, that he cashiered the officers of the detachment, and actually decimated the common men. Nothing worse than this could have occurred in a decisive affair with Tyrone himself; nothing of the sort was likely to have happened while the English troops were fresh, strong, and full of contempt for the kerns of Ireland; but after being so disheartened in detail, how could men be expected to show any great zeal for more decisive and extensive operations? Moreover, so much time had been wasted, that, as formerly, it was said to be too early for passing the morasses, so now it was said to be too late. Essex now wrote home for reinforcements, and the queen, seemingly resolute to leave him no reasonable excuse for ultimate and signal failure, at once reinforced him. But real and counterfeited sickness, and very numerous desertions, rendered it impossible for him, out of the imposing force which he had frittered away in idle detail skirmishing, to lead more than four thousand men against the main enemy. With this force he found it impossible to bring Tyrone to action; for that wily chieftain was far more desirous of wearing out his enemy, than of giving him an opportunity of profiting by superior discipline and equipment. And with his usual and often successful impudence, he demanded a personal conference with the English commander. Here again Essex displayed great unfitness for his command. He was fully authorised, it is true, to parade rebels, but he betrayed at once his own dignity, and that of his royal mistress, in consenting to give the rebel chief an interview without first insisting upon his submission. Tyrone, who was as deeply politic as Essex was open and thoughtless, seems to have understood at a glance the character of the man with whom he had to deal. While making stipulations which, as coming from a rebel, could be looked upon only as insult to the queen, he behaved to the queen's lieutenant with the most profound personal respect; persuaded him into a truce until the following May, and even, it would seem, caused him to listen, at least, to insinuations which it was treason even to hear without resentment.

This "most lame and important conclusion" could not fail to be deeply annoying to Elizabeth, after she had departed so far from her usual economical policy in order to ensure a complete conquest of the Irish rebels. And Essex was so far from even seeing his error, and taking the only mode by which Elizabeth could have been soothed, that he excited her temper still farther by peevish and petulant letters in which he sought to throw the blame rather upon an alleged want of means and opportunity, than upon his own want of firmness and sagacity. Though the queen's answers plainly showed that she really was deeply offended, she was even yet disinclined to wound his proud spirit by so public a disgrace as immediate recall would by both his friends and his foes have been considered; and she expressly ordered him to remain in Ireland. Judicious action, or even judicious refraining from such action as could probably add to the queen's anger, might even now have enabled him to recover his ground in Ireland; but instead of availing himself of the opening the queen afforded him by refraining from recalling him, the spoiled favourite, happening while in his worst humors with the English court and with himself, to hear that the queen had promoted his rival, sir Robert Cecil, to an office which he had long coveted for himself, took no farther notice of the queen's express command, but hastened over to England. His reception there belongs to the history of England; we must here confine ourselves to Ireland, and its affairs, as he, on this petulant departure, left them.

Lord Mountjoy, whom Elizabeth, as we have said, originally intended for the Irish expedition, was now sent over, in the hope that he would repair the evils caused by the flighty and inconsiderate conduct of his accomplished, but, in this case at least, incapable rival. The Irish rebels speedily discovered that they now had to deal with a lord lieutenant very different in character from the vain and facile Essex. Brave and accomplished as a soldier, Mountjoy was also somewhat inclined to sternness and severity in his individual character.

A. D. 1602.—On taking the command in Ireland, Mountjoy determined neither to employ all his force upon one point, nor to make a war of detail in such a wise as could be advantageous to the rebels. Dividing his force into detachments, he gave the commands to men of known ability and courage, with orders to act with the utmost vigour while opposed, and to give no quarter even when opposition had ceased. The rebels being thus attacked in all quarters at once, and finding that their new opponent was impracticable in negotiation as he was irresistible in war, threw down their arms. Many of them sought safety by retiring into the most inaccessible morasses and mountain caves, and remaining hidden there, and half starved, while their friends exerted themselves to obtain their peace on such terms as Mountjoy chose to dictate. Tyrone was no exception to this general rule. At first, indeed, he tried to obtain terms, but his days of successful deception was now at length abandoned. Mountjoy inflexibly refused to admit him to mercy on any other condition than that of the most absolute and literal surrender of both his life and fortunes to the queen's pleasure.

A. D. 1603.—Finding that any attempt to pliant Mountjoy would probably put him in some danger of being altogether excluded from the queen's mercy, he appeared before the lord lieutenant and made the required submission. But he was even now too late. Elizabeth had expired while he still hesitated; and as the character of her successor rendered it very unlikely that he would show mercy to rebels so crafty and faithless as Tyrone, both he and O'Donnel made their escape to Italy; where Tyrone lived some years, supported only by a pension allowed to him by the pope. He was blind for many years before his death; and the poverty and obscurity into which his misconduct plunged him, compared with the rank, wealth, influence, and respect which he forfeited, ought to warn such men—if indeed men of ambition and ill regulated energies can be warned by anything of the danger as well as impropriety of inciting the ignorant and the violent to that worst of crimes, rebellion; a crime which is fatal to the criminals, and, unfortunately, still more fatal to those who neither share the crime nor possess the power to prevent its commission.

CHAPTER X.

A. D. 1612.—THE most efficient of the English commanders in curbing the restless spirit of Ireland was undoubtedly the lord Mountjoy; and perhaps, but for his stern chastisement of armed rebellion, Ireland would not have been in a state to profit by the wise and humane desire of Elizabeth's successor, James I., to civilize the people by raising them socially as well as intellectually, by giving them an interest in the preservation of peace by putting them in possession of the manifold luxuries and comforts which are only obtainable by the practice of the arts of peace. It is impossible to rate too highly the good effect of the wise policy of James towards Ireland; and when he boasts of that policy, we must read his self-laudation altogether without that pitying smile which we bestow upon his pedantries, and upon the absurdities which even his native sagacity did not prevent him from partaking with the majority of his subjects.

He clearly perceived what, next to the putting down of actual rebellion, was the most pressing and the most vital want of Ireland; manufactures, trade, and the opportunity, means, and, above all, the examples of using them.

The immense tracts of land which civil war and rebellion had depopulated in Ireland, and especially in Ulster, furnished the sagacious James with the first great element, room for civilized colonists whose example of industry and prosperity could not fail to have the effect of raising all the rest of the country in the social scale. On all former occasions the scheme of colonizing Ireland had a radically bad principle which constantly caused it to fail. The English pale was held by swordsmen, not by manufacturers, or even to any considerable extent by traders. Bold soldiers, but for the most part as uncultivated as the very natives whom they had dispossessed, these men either were constantly engaged in petty warfare with the "mere Irish," as the men beyond the English pale were called, or if they fell into peaceable intimacy with them, were far more apt to fall with them into barbarism, than to raise them into civilization and a propension towards the arts of peace. And that, as must be abundantly evident to the attentive reader, was actually the process which took place, not merely with the general mass here, but also with men of some mark and note.

Aware that a large sum of English money was absolutely necessary for the carrying out of his admirable plan of Irish reformation, and aware too that practical mercantile men were the best possible persons to look after the details upon which so much would necessarily depend, James incorporated the Royal Irish Society. The members were to be annually elected from among the aldermen and common council of London; and to the committee, thus formed, were all matters to be entrusted connected with the management of the Irish fisheries, and the waste tracts of land which were to be disposed of. These lands were to be let to three distinct classes of undertakers; so called because they undertook to fulfil certain conditions. Those who received two thousand acres were to build a castle, with a proportionate bawn or yard, surrounded by a substantial wall; those who received fifteen hundred acres were to build a substantial stone house, also surrounded by a bawn, unless in situations where a bridge would be still more desirable; and those who received a thousand acres were to build a good and substantial dwelling to their own taste. In some cases Irish chieftains were allowed to undertake upon these terms, and to have Irish tenants, on condition that these latter should abandon their wandering and predatory habits, and dwell together in steady, peaceful, and industrious pursuits; but, for the most part, preference was given to English undertakers, who were to have English or Lowland Scotch tenants. Nor did this excellent scheme comprehend merely the open and wholly depopulated country; Coleraine, Londonderry, and some smaller towns had considerable sums spent upon them in repairing and rebuilding; and hundreds of English and Scotch mechanics, with their families and all necessary appliances for their several trades, were sent thither. At the same time, churches were endowed and schools established; and those who so loudly charge it upon England as an injustice that the protestant church is supported in Ireland, would do well to look back, and to look attentively, upon this passage in Irish history. They who do so will not fail to perceive that the same power and the same period that laid a comparatively small charge upon the wealth of Ireland, gave Ireland all its wealth, in esse et in posse. How much of railing, violence, and misery would be subtracted from the great sum of the world's endurance, if men would thus look at both sides of a question! And how especially would that be the case with respect to Ireland!

Imperfection is inseparable from even the best human schemes. It is quite certain that the ends of civilisation would have been both more rapidly and more completely accomplished had only English, and of the most steady character, been accepted either as undertakers or inferior tenants; but how, consistently with humanity, could those Irish have been excluded who possessed a willingness and desire to remain upon their native soil, and conform to the English rules, habits, and pursuits? It is certain, too, that so magnificent a political scheme would have been more completely free from risk of injury or failure, could it have been carried out entirely under government control, and without the intervention of individuals embarking in it merely for the sake of individual speculation and gain. But the sum of money required was vast, the modern English system of finance was utterly unknown and unimagined, and, consequently, the king had no other alternative but to allow his noble plan to fall to the ground altogether, or to carry it into effect with the two disadvantages to which we have alluded. Disadvantages they undoubtedly were. The inveterate habits of the first generation of Irish undertakers and their settlers greatly deteriorated the character and habits of their English and Scotch neighbours; and knowing how powerfully men of all times, and of all nations, are unavoidably influenced by pecuniary considerations, we can scarcely be surprised, however much we may regret, that undertakers, both English and Irish, were sometimes more intent upon their individual bargains, than upon the successful working out of a great political problem; less particular about the moral fitness of tenants, than about their pecuniary solidity. But whatever unavoidable defects may be alleged against the actual working out of the plan, the plan itself was a mighty, a comprehensive, and an admirable one; and we think that few will be disposed to differ from sir John Davies, who says, as quoted by Hume, that "James in nine years made greater advances towards the civilization of Ireland, than had been made in the four hundred and forty years which had elapsed since the conquest was first attempted."

Having done so much towards introducing the industry and profit in the train of which civilization, comfort, and an attachment to peace, are so sure to follow, James declared all the people of Ireland to be equally his subjects, abolished the whole of the Brehon laws, and stationed a small army in Ireland, which was regularly paid from England, and thus spared all temptation to excite disturbances in the country by levying contributions upon its inhabitants. The good effect of this was strikingly shown in the case of an outbreak excited and headed by a turbulent chief named O'Dogherty. This chieftain, among many, was very much enraged at seeing the comfort and prosperity in which strangers dwelt in his native country; and he was especially opposed to the abolition of the Brehon laws, which gave occasion to per-odical warfare by a most absurd division of property, and made murder and other crimes as purchasable as any manufactured luxury, by affixing a price to each crime; as the Normans and Saxons, and most other partially barbarous people, had done at an earlier day. Taking counsel with other chieftains as prejudiced and turbulent as himself, O'Dogherty endeavoured to plunge the country into a civil war once more. But his first outbreak was steadily met by the resident English troops; reinforcements were speedily sent; and he who but a few years before might have sacked towns, and then have sold his good behaviour for a peerage, was easily and speedily put down. Regular circuits for the administration of justice were formed; charters of incorporation were bestowed upon the larger and more prosperous towns; and James had the truly enviable pleasure of seeing prosperity and growing civilization accomplished by his peaceful and equitable rule, for a country which his predecessors had for nearly four hundred and fifty years failed even to begin to rule with either certainty or advantage.

Hume, to whom we are indebted for the principal facts of this portion of our history more especially, gives a curious anecdote illustrative of the effect which the affixing prices to crimes had, in diminishing not merely the legal fear of committing them, but also the moral sense of their enormity. When sir William Fitzwilliams was lord-deputy, he told the powerful and unruly M'Guire that he, the deputy, was about to send a sheriff into Fermanagh. "Your sheriff shall be welcome," said M'Guire, "but let me know beforehand what a sheriff's head is rated at, that I may be prepared to levy the amount upon the county if my people chance to cut his head off."

CHAPTER XI.

A. D. 1641.—FROM the year 1603 Ireland had been constantly progressing, sometimes slowly, sometimes more rapidly, but always progressing, more or less, towards the comparative perfection of England; and if in the year 1641, Brian Borohme, or Malachi of the golden collar, those sincere and—the age in which they lived being considered—sensible friends of their native country, could have seen the splendid alterations that had been wrought in its favour, they would have denounced to the death the traitor, who, for the sake of his own base interests, or his own ignorant fancies, should have proposed to light up the torch of war, and undo, in a few weeks of violence, what had been accomplished by the wisdom, patience, and unbounded liberality of so many years. But unhappily the times were favourable to the worst designs of the worst description of mock patriots. The unfortunate Charles I. was now upon the English throne, and deeply involved in the fatal disputes with the parliament, which ended so lamentably for both king and people. To all discerning seemed certain, should succeed in wholly subverting their high-church sovereign in England, would they have any toleration to spare for his catholic subjects in Ireland? If any Irishman had a doubt upon that point, he had to look at the persecution already endured by his fellow religionists in England. As catholics, it was their bounden duty to prevent themselves from falling victims to the fierce and persecuting zeal of the puritans; as Irishmen, they would at all times, and under any circumstances, have been warranted in throwing off the foreign yoke which conquest had fixed upon them; and they were now especially called upon to do so, both by the favourable opportunity afforded to them by the fierce dispositions of their enemies, and by the high probability that those very enemies would rid themselves of the legal, established, and mild authority of their king, to make their little fingers heavier upon Ireland than ever his kings had been.

Moore's arduous eloquence was the more effective, because one or other of his arguments found an echo in the secret and long nurtured thoughts of each of the chieftains to whom he in the first instance addressed himself.

The utmost evil of man could have devised nothing better calculated to assist the designs of Moore and his fellow malcontents, than the virulent and daily increasing enmity to catholics which was manifested by the English parliament, and, indeed, by the people in general. O'Neill engaged to head an insurrection in the province, the signal for which was to be given simultaneously, to the very hour, with an attack upon the castle of Dublin, which was to be headed by Roger Moore and the lord M'Guire. Cardinal Richelieu, indirectly at least, promised arms and other aid; numerous Irish officers who were serving in the Spanish army promised to join them; and with the unconscious aid which the English puritans were giving them by their savage and coarse invectives and menaces, there could be no doubt that when the first signal of revolt was given, the whole catholic population of Ireland, even including the catholics of the English pale, would join in a revolt originating in zeal for the catholic religion.

Every arrangement having been made to ensure the active simultaneous outbreak of leading parties in every quarter of Ireland, it now only remained to fix the exact day which was to prove fatal to every protestant in the island; all minor arrangements, and the rousing of the mass of the people into action, being, by Moore's shrewd advice, deferred to the very hour of action itself, that the plot, being only then entrusted to the knowledge only of the comparatively few leading men, might thus run the less risk of being revealed, whether by actual treachery or by want of prudence. The day fixed upon was the 23rd of October, 1641; that late period of the year being named by Moore on account of the darkness of the nights, which would favour the dark deeds that were in contemplation, and on account of the difficulty that stormy season of the year would throw in the way of transporting men and arms from England, when news of the outbreak should reach that country.

Great and prudent precaution as Moore and his fellow-conspirators had taken to limit their numbers, and thus diminish the chances of treachery or imprudence, their terrible design would in all human probability have been frustrated, but for the unhappy difference between the king and his people. For whatever caution might be used in holding foreign correspondence, it was scarcely possible that so vast and terrible a conspiracy could be known at foreign courts without some "inkling of the matter" getting to the ears of some one of the numerous intelligent spies, who, for gain or other motives, busy themselves in tattling to the attachés of the embassies. And though no definite and tangible news of the matter in agitation reached the king from his ambassadors, yet he was warned by them that there assuredly was some deep and dangerous thing being planned in Ireland. Had the king been in concord with his people at home, and had the Irish authorities been, as they in that case had been, men zealous in his service and indebted only to his favour for their preferment, even these slight hints would doubtless have been so used as to have led to the discovery of the whole plot, and the prevention of one of the most extensive and terrible massacres that has ever occurred. But the lord lieutenant, the earl of Leicester, was detained in London, and sir John Borlase and sir William Parsons, who discharged his duties by commission, owed their promotion to the king's domestic enemies, the puritans, and therefore paid little attention to his warnings and made no use of them. So contemptuous were they, indeed, of their royal master's advice, or so thoroughly besotted by their ignorant and conceited notions of English superiority, that even within four-and-twenty hours of the time appointed for the wholesale slaughter of the protestants of Ireland, these thoroughly reckless or thoroughly incapable men had not so much as doubled the guards at Dublin castle, though its routine guard was at that time but fifty men, while it held out to rebels the tempting booty of thirty-five pieces of artillery, and arms for ten thousand men, with ammunition in proportion.

Yes; such was the fatal blindness or presumption of these men! The 23rd day of October, as we have mentioned, was the day appointed for the outbreak: the 22nd had already arrived; Moore and M'Guire were in Dublin, their very signal carefully watched and zealously obeyed by a whole host of their disguised followers, and a still larger following was hourly expected; yet not a doubt or a fear disturbed the serenity of the castle, until now when the eleventh hour was past and the twelfth had well nigh struck, sir William Parsons was roused from his complacent indolence by the appearance before him of one O'Conolly, who, though an Irishman and a conspirator, was also a protestant, and shuddered at the very hour approached which was to doom every man, woman, and child of his own faith throughout Ireland to inevitable death. The repentance and confession of O'Conolly were in time, though barely in time, to save Dublin castle from capture, and the protestants of Dublin from death; but, alas! it was now beyond all human power to prevent revolt and massacre from stalking, unsparring and ghastly, throughout the rest of the land. Sir William Parsons and his colleague, though the news fell upon them like a thunderbolt, acted with great promptitude and energy the moment that the positive assurances of instant danger, that were given to them by a repentant conspirator, convinced them how much they had erred in neglecting to found inquiries upon the hints they had received from their royal master himself. The guards were increased at the castle, and the gates shut; officers were dispatched to apprehend Moore and M'Guire, and to warn the protestants, from street to street, and even from house to house, to arm and prepare themselves for a death-struggle. Moore, shrewd, suspicious, and active, perceived that something had alarmed the castle, and he took his departure from the city before the officers could find him; M'Guire and Mahony were less fortunate; they were seized and examined by the lords-justices, and Mahony's confession conveyed to them the astounding and awful intelligence that the fate from which the protestants of Dublin had so narrowly escaped, was but too certainly in store for their unhappy co-religionists throughout all the rest of the unfortunate island.

O'Neill and other leaders, not dreaming of any check to their design taking place in Dublin, where the authorities had seemed so blind, deaf, and presumptuous past all human saving, were true to their time and to their ruthless purposes. The signal was given, and the signal was obeyed, not merely by those who had been initiated in the horrid design, but by the whole catholic population; for, alas! they who called upon that fervid and unreflecting people, called upon them to revenge the real or fancied wrongs over which each bosom had brooded in long, silent, but not the less stern yearning, for the vengeance that now was at hand; and they called upon that people, at once devout, ignorant, bigoted, and fierce, to do the deeds of demons, in that name whose very sound breathes peace and good-will to men.

No matter what the tie which bound the catholic and the protestant together, the Irish and the English, no sooner was the dread signal given than those ties were laughed to scorn in most cases, broken and forgotten in all. To the astounded English the very first burst of the fury of those among whom they had so long lived in all peace and good fellowship, and in the most implicit trust, it must have seemed as though they were labouring under some distempered dream, dreadful even as a dream, and far, far too grotesquely terrible to be any thing but one. Without the slightest previous diminution of the cordiality of apparent friendship, the Irish seized at first upon the property and houses of the astounded English of their various neighbourhoods. Even then the English suspected nothing of a universal conspiracy; but each family, village, or town thus injured, strove to defend its own property; rapidly then disappeared for cruelty the most unsparring. Men, women, and children were indiscriminately put to death, with circumstances, in many cases, of too revolting a cruelty to be detailed. No former kindness, no present connection, even, was suffered to save the unhappy creatures who were known to be guilty of the inextinguishable crimes of being English and of being protestants; and so extreme and insane was the bigoted rage of the thoroughly aroused demon of national and religious animosity, that in many cases the plunderers and murderers maimed, or wantonly and uselessly put to death, cattle of which they had become possessed by plundering the English, as though the very brute creation had acquired some ineradicable bad quality from merely having belonged to people of the detested nation. And it was by no means the least horrible feature of this truly horrible scene, that even the little children of the Irish, imitating the frantic ferocity of their parents, were to be seen bestowing their impotent blows and childish imprecations on the bosoms of poor innocents of their own age.

In but comparatively few cases had the English time or opportunity to make any attempt at defence; and even in those cases fire usually drew them forth from their barricaded houses, or both houses and owners perished in the same flames. But where from their numbers and desperation, or from the strength of the position they had taken up, the English protracted their defence and showed a dangerous front to their foes, perfidy was called in to the aid of the latter, who tempted their victims to surrender on the most solemn oaths of sparing them; but the moment of their surrender was also the moment of their destruction. Nay, in some cases even this shameful perjury was refined upon by the demoniac villainy of the rebels. They swore to spare some, only, of the victims, on condition that the spared should put the remainder to death. And when the insanity of terror had induced friends to slay friends, or relatives to slay relatives,—and, such is the weakness of human nature when called upon to confront the mortal agony, there were, unfortunately, many such cases—the credulous criminals, they who had slaughtered that themselves might be spared, were themselves put to death with every circumstance of the most diabolically ingenious cruelty.

Never in the world's history was massacre more unrelentingly carried on. Always prone to violence, and accustomed to see or hear of bloodshed as the ordinary consequence from trifling political or pecuniary disputes, the Irish were especially fit instruments of the fierce bigotry which assured them that in torturing and slaying the English heretics, they were doing a service very acceptable to God, as well as necessary for their country. Though in every province of Ireland, and every town, except Dublin, these unutterable barbarities were perpetrated; yet as in Ulster the rebellion first broke out, so it was in Ulster that its cruelties were most hideous and most conspicuous. Roger More, who, though he was enthusiastic in his hatred of the English, was by no means a cruel man, endeavoured to prevail upon O'Neill to put a stop to the heedless cruelties and slaughter. But the latter was brutal as he was fearless, and while one English man, woman, or child remained alive in the north of Ireland, over the whole of which he now had the most unbounded authority, he seemed to think the work but imperfectly done. Grieved to the heart at the wide-spreading horrors of which his own exertions had been the first cause, Moore retired to Flanders.

It is remarkable that while the English of Ulster, who chiefly were engaged in agriculture, were wholly destroyed, the Scotch manufacturers of Belfast, Coleraine, and the other towns scarcely suffered at all. The Irish affected, and perhaps felt, a connection between themselves and men of a common, though very remotely common, ancestry; and thus the more timid had opportunity for flight, and the bolder for strengthening their defences and thus enabling themselves to preserve by force, if necessary, that safety which, it is likely, had been accorded to them either in caprice, or treachery. This latter is, indeed, the more probable, because had the Scotch been less selfishly intent upon their own sole safety, had they invited and mustered in their towns the persecuted and astounded English, the rebels would have found the latter far less easy victims. O'Neill, who added talent to brutality, most probably foresaw this difficulty; and overcame it by his skillful appeal to that most deeply rooted of all human imperfections, selfishness.

To the confession of O'Connell, tardy as it was, it alone was owing that the English in Ireland were not utterly destroyed. Dublin, saved by that man's confession, and the promptitude of sir William Parsons, became the refuge of the maimed and destitute fugitives from the provinces. To these unhappy people the citizens of Dublin showed, as troop after troop of them arrived, each one more forlorn and exhausted and suffering than the last, the most unbounded and tender hospitality. Many were saved by the kindness and skill that were lavished upon their wounded and exhausted frames; but a vast number perished of diseases caused by their sufferings long after they were safe in Dublin.

It must not be supposed that the lords justices were idle while these horrors were being perpetrated all over the island; though they seem chiefly to have consulted the safety of the capital. They immediately summoned to Dublin all detachments of the army. Many of those detachments had been either hemmed in beyond the power of escape, or cut to pieces at the breaking out of the rebellion. But upwards of fifteen hundred arrived at Dublin, and to this considerable body upwards of four thousand were added by enlistment, and armed from the ample stores in the castle. A detachment of six hundred was sent to the relief of Feredah, which was invested by the rebels; but on being attacked, this detachment was completely panic-stricken, and routed, almost without firing a shot. By far the greater number of them were slain; and in addition to this large loss of men, the English had to regret that so many stand of arms had fallen into the hands of the rebels.

Considerable blame has been attached to the lords justices for the exclusive attention they bestowed upon the safety of Dublin; but though they undoubtedly do seem to have been quite sufficiently careful upon that point, it must not be forgotten that the greater part of the force at their command was untried and undisciplined; that the whole island abounded with armed rebels; that in the case of Feredah their endeavour to extend their rule had been signally unfortunate; and that the most experienced military men of the present day would find it difficult, in such a state of the whole country, to suggest a better plan for the employment of a small and but partially disciplined force, than that of keeping open a shelter and a rallying place for the fugitives from other parts of the country, and one, too, which ensured communication with England. It would seem, however, that some opportunities of enterprize against the rebels were really and glaringly neglected, since the brave earl of Ormond complained that the lords justices bestowed far too exclusive a care upon themselves and the capital. The catholic English of the pale at the outset of the barbarous massacre expressed their strongest indignation against the rebels, and applied to government for arms, that they might defend themselves and aid in preserving Ireland to the English crown. If the rebellion had broken out upon merely political grounds, it is most likely, as they had so deep a stake in the country, that they would have kept this promise. But the political rancour of the rebels, as we have already shown, was joined and almost merged in their religious bigotry; and this their common feeling soon caused the catholics of the pale not merely to lay aside, if they had ever entertained it, the intention of defending the government, but even to range themselves, with lord Gormanston for their general, on the rebels' side, and in their violence and cruelty to the unfortunate protestants they actually outdid the old Irish.

THE CATHOLIC RELIGION WAS TO BE ESTABLISHED, THEIR PRELATES TO SIT IN PARLIAMENT, AND THE LORDS-JUSTICES TO BE OF THAT PARTY.

THE ENGLISH PARLIAMENT AFFECTED GREAT ZEAL AGAINST THE IRISH REBELS, AND VOTED LARGER BOUNTIES FOR THEIR CAPTURE.

As the puritan violence of conduct and threat had furnished the rebels with a strong argument when rebellion was first proposed by Roger Moore, so it afterwards was made the subject of a gross fraud by Sir Phelim O'Neill. That cruel and crafty man having, on one of his murdering and marauding expeditions, found in the house of one of his victims a royal patent, removed the royal seal and affixed it to a forged commission, by which it appeared that he and other rebel leaders were exhortated and authorised by both the king and queen to take up arms to defend them and the royal prerogative against the violence and insolence of the puritans. This impudent forgery could scarcely fail to have great influence upon the ignorant multitude, who, though they could not read the instrument, would see the most authentic and indisputable evidence in the great seal; and it is probable that thousands who were active in rebellious ruffianism conscientiously believed that they were doing good service to the king.

The tremendous "troubles" by which all England was now agitated prevented the king from sending the requisite supplies to Ireland; the consequence was, that the unfortunate peasantry were plundered not only by the Irish rebels, but also by the English soldiers whenever these latter sallied forth from Dublin.

A short truce at length took place. The very rebels themselves were wearied with the long continuance of strife and bloodshed; and the marquis of Ormond being desirous of personally fighting for the king against the rebellious puritans in England, and wishing, also, to procure all the co-operation that was practicable from Ireland, entered into a correspondence with Sir Phelim O'Neill, between whom and the rebel parliament at Kilkenny and the royal authorities at Dublin a peace was agreed upon.

How long so bloodthirsty and turbulent a person as O'Neill would, under the most favourable circumstances have remained peaceable, it is difficult to guess; most probably, no longer than until the country had sufficiently recovered to offer new booty to himself and his fellow bandits. But he was not allowed to exhibit himself as a faithful keeper of his solemn agreement even so long. The pope looked longingly upon the pater-pence and the absolute authority of the green isle; and the instant he heard that O'Neill had agreed to give the torn land and the suffering people rest, he sent a confidential priest named Rinuccini as his nuncio.

Rinuccini took over a few men, a large supply of arms and ammunition, and a very considerable sum of gold. As he was, according to his instructions, even profuse in his distribution of the money among the influential leaders, he found no difficulty in procuring the answer that he required to the cry of "war to the heretical war, war!" which formed the burden of all his discourses. While he was exerting himself to procure a renewal of war, in which he succeeded to his utmost wish, he exerted himself also in preparing Ireland to become not only catholic but also monastic as ever. Whatever else the court of Rome understood, it was profoundly ignorant of political economy. For while that grasping and insolent power was ready to brave all divine laws and outrage all human feelings in its ardour for conquering countries, it was to the full as anxious to impoverish as to conquer them; and while desirous of tribute, was ever bent upon multiplying those non-producing communities, which could neither pay tribute themselves nor exist but by largely diminishing that which but for them might have been wrung from the laity. It was in accordance with this equally invariable and ignorant policy of Rome that Rinuccini now did all that exhortation, threat, intreaty, and gold could accomplish, to rebuild, beautify, and repeople the religious houses that had been demolished by Henry VIII.; and, still farther, the monks, whether jesuits or franciscans, carmelites or dominicans, who were placed in the principal abbeys and monasteries that were restored under his own directions, had it in charge from the zealous jesuit, that they should be instant in season and out of season in exhorting the laity to aid in restoring and beautifying all the monasteries throughout the island, of which it is quite clear that Rome felt confident of obtaining the complete dominion.

The assistance which the rebels received from Rome enabled them to recommence and continue the civil war with great advantage over the royal force, for the king was now in the power of the puritans; and much as those bigots hated the papists of Ireland, they loved their own aggrandizement still more; and while they obtained large sums from the gullied people of England, under the pretence of putting down the Irish rebels, they coolly applied those sums to the support of their own treasonable schemes, and left the luckless authorities at Dublin wholly unaided.

Rinuccini, though his ostensible mission was only of a spiritual character, no doubt had more ample secret powers and instructions. At all events, he by no means confined himself to matters spiritual, but interfered, and with so much insolence, in civil affairs, and showed so evident an intent to usurp all authority, that even the most bigoted among the Irish rebels became disgusted, and he was at length fairly driven out of the country.

After the murder of Charles I. that event added to the previously existing topics of strife in Ireland. The "king's party" included not a few of those who had rebelled against the authority of Charles I., and was, from a variety of causes, so strong, that the marquis of Ormond, then at Paris with the queen and Charles II., complied with the invitation that was sent to him to go over and take the chief command, in the hope that both his experience, his courage, ability, and his popularity, as being himself an Irishman, would make him so efficient a rallying point for the royalists, that Ireland might enable the young king at some future day to reconquer England.

For a time, in truth, it seemed as if this really would be the case. Notwithstanding the numerous causes of hate and strife which not merely divided the Irish people into royalists and parliamentarians, but also divided each of those two leading parties into many smaller factions that were either openly or secretly at the bitterest enmity, all differences among the royalists seemed to cease. Ormond was most cordially received among them, and speedily found himself at the head of an army of nearly twenty thousand men. Colonel Jones, who was a mere creature of the parliament, and to whom Ormond had delivered the chief command in Ireland when he himself hastened to aid the unfortunate Charles I. in England, was compelled to bestow all his care upon Dublin, where the parliament left him unaided. Ormond, therefore, found but little difficulty in the earlier part of his attempt to reduce Ireland to subjection to Charles II. At Dundalk, Ormond had no sooner summoned the place, than the garrison mutinied against their governor, Monk, and compelled him to surrender without firing a shot. Tredah and several other places were taken with comparatively small trouble and loss; and Ormond now proposed, after giving his troops necessary repose, to advance to the siege of Dublin. Could he have succeeded in that important point, it is very possible that Ireland would have wholly been lost to the parliament; for, considering the enthusiastic nature of the Irish people, it is highly probable the appearance of the young king in Dublin, whither he would have proceeded immediately on the success of Ormond, would have united the whole Irish people in defence of their king against the puritans, and their country against usurpers.

But a change had come over the spirit of things. Cromwell was now more potent in England than the parliament whose tool he had seemed to be; and though England presented abundant labour and no little danger, general Cromwell grudged Waller and Lambert the glory, which both aspired to, of conquering Ireland, in the character of its lord-lieutenant. With his usual art, he procured his own nomination; and, with his usual promptitude and energy, he no sooner received his appointment than he prepared to fulfil his task. He immediately sent over a strong reinforcement of both horse and foot to colonel Jones, in Dublin. Never was reinforcement sent at a more critically welcome moment. Ormond, and Inchiquin, who had joined him, had actually proceeded to repair a fort close to Dublin, and had carried forward their work very considerably toward completion. Colonel Jones, who, though he was originally educated not for the army but for the law, was a gallant and energetic officer, had no sooner received this reinforcement, than he sallied out suddenly upon the royalists, and put them completely to the rout. One thousand of them were killed; and twice that number, with all the ammunition and munitions of the royal army, graced the triumphant return of the colonel to Dublin. In the midst of the joy and exultation of the garrison and people of Dublin at this success, Cromwell himself, accompanied by Ireton, arrived upon the scene. Tredah, or Drogheda, a strong and well fortified town near Dublin, was garrisoned for the king by three thousand men, principally English, under the command of sir Arthur Aston, an able and experienced officer. Thither Cromwell hastened, battered a breach in the wall, and led the way in person to an assault. Though the parliamentary soldiery of England, with Cromwell and scarcely less terrible Ireton at their head, sword in hand, were not the men to be easily repelled, the garrison of Tredah showed that they were "English, too!" for the assailants were twice beaten back with great carnage. A third assault was more successful, and partly in implacable rage at having been even temporarily held in check, and partly as the surest way to deter other places from venturing to resist his formidable power, Cromwell, to his eternal disgrace, gave the fatal word "No quarter!" and so determined was he in this barbarous resolution, that even a wretched handful of men who were spared by the carnage, were, on the fact becoming known to Cromwell, immediately put to the sword. The excuse that Cromwell made for this barbarity, so thoroughly disgraceful to the soldierly character, was his desire to avenge the shocking cruelties of the massacre. Professing so much religious feeling, even that motive would scarcely have palliated his cruelty; but the excuse was as ill-founded as the measure was ruinous, for the garrison were not Irishmen stained with the horrible guilt of the ever execrable massacre, but, as Cromwell well knew, Englishmen, true alike to their monarch, their faith, and their country.

Having thus barbarously destroyed the entire garrison of Tredah, with the exception of one solitary soldier, whose life was merely spared that he might carry through the country the tale of the prowess and remorselessness of the English general, Cromwell advanced upon Wexford. Here he had the same success, and showed the same murderous severity as at Tredah; and in less than a year from his landing in Ireland he was in possession of all its chief towns and fortresses, and had driven both English royalists and Irish rebels to such straits, that no fewer than forty thousand withdrew from the island altogether.

But Scotland now attracted the ambition of Cromwell; and having looked well to the garrisoning of the principal towns, and sent a vast number of the inhabitants, and especially young people, of both sexes, to the West India as slaves, he left the government of Ireland to Ireton, upon whom also devolved the task of finishing the subjection of the country. Ireton, who was both a stout soldier and an accomplished officer, followed the parting advice and instructions of Cromwell to the very letter. With a well disciplined and well supplied army of thirty thousand men, he ruled the country with an iron and unflinching hand. Wherever the rebels appeared in force, there he was sure to meet them; and wherever he met, there he also defeated them. This war was almost literally without an exception against the native Irish, for the English royalists had departed before Cromwell committed the lord-lieutenancy to Ireton. This latter, therefore, was probably quite sincere, however otherwise blameworthy, when he alleged, as the cause of his inflexible severity to the prisoners he took in his various battles and skirmishes, his determination to take full vengeance for the massacre of the protestants. And however much we may pity the fate of those prisoners, many of whom, in all human probability, had no kind of concern in the massacre, it is impossible not to see in the cruelty of Ireton a fearful consequence of the original crime of the Irish themselves.

There was one prisoner, however, for whose death, or even for the ignominious manner of it, the most sincere and earnest hater of severity could scarcely find a tear. The faithless, selfish, and black-hearted Phelim O'Neill, the real author of the worst atrocities of the rebellion, was at length taken prisoner; and if ever the gibbet was rightfully employed in taking away human life, it was most certainly so on this occasion. As far as his means had permitted him, this man, who was in every sense of the word a mere bandit, caring little for creed and less for country, and intent solely upon his own aggrandisement, had rivalled Nero and all the worst tyrants and miscreants of antiquity. That he at one time contemplated the possibility of making himself king of Ireland, his whole conduct during the stay of the nuncio Rinuccini goes strongly to show; and however great the horrors inflicted upon Ireland by Cromwell, whose name to this day is the bye-word of terror throughout the island, that unhappy country was at least fortunate in being reconquered by even a Cromwell, instead of falling under the awful dictatorship of an O'Neill.

The only town of any great strength or importance that had now not yielded to the English was Limerick. Against this town Ireton led his men with his usual success. A fierce resistance was made to him, and when he at length took it by assault, he took a no less fierce revenge. But here it was ordained that both his success and his cruelty should terminate. The crowded state of the place and the scarcity of provisions had generated one of those fevers so common in Ireland, which are as infectious as the plague of the East, and nearly as fatal. Ireton had scarcely stilled the tumult and excitement inseparable from the taking of a besieged town, when he was attacked by this fever; and as he was already very much weakened by fatigues and exposure, it very speedily proved fatal. After what we have said of his inflexible severity to his Irish prisoners, it may seem paradoxical to affirm that his death was a new calamity to Ireland. And yet as such we really view it. We firmly believe that he was solely led to that cruel inflexibility by a sincere horror of the cruelty of the rebels, and by an equally sincere belief that it was his duty to both God and man to avenge it. But in his civil administration he was a just and calm governor; and as the country became orderly and obedient, so would he, we feel sure, have relaxed from his sternness and become the best resident ruler that Ireland ever possessed.

Ireton was succeeded in the lieutenancy by Ludlow. He drove the native Irish, almost without exception, into Connaught; and so completely was the Irish cause a lost one, that Clanricarde, who had succeeded O'Neill as its chief hope and champion, lost all heart and confidence, made his peace with parliament, and was allowed to find a shelter in England, where he resided in peace until his death. Under Ludlow and Henry Cromwell, Ireland, although in an awful state, as the consequence of so many years' continuance of all the ravages and neglect attendant on civil war, gradually improved. On the restoration of Charles II., the duke of Ormond, who was condemned to death at the same time as O'Neill, but spared and allowed to retire to France, returned to Ireland as lord lieutenant. Though brave and accomplished as a military man, Ormond, unlike soldiers in general, set a due value upon the more peaceable arts, and he wisely considered that the best way to ensure the peace and the obedience of a people, is to encourage commerce and manufactures among them. And, accordingly, he exerted himself to promote the immigration of English and foreign artisans, and established linen and woollen factories in Clonmel, Carrick and other towns. In the first named of these he established, also, a manufactory of that most beautiful of all the materials of ladies' dress which is known by the name of poplin, an article of commerce from which Ireland, for many years after she had forgotten the very name of the benefactor to whom she owed its possession, derived an immense annual income.

The duke of Ormond continued to be lord lieutenant of Ireland during the whole of the reign of Charles II.; and the improvement of the country was proportionate to his great and well-directed efforts to that end. On the accession of James II., that monarch, who was extremely anxious to fill all the offices of that country with zealous catholics, as though he foresaw that it would one day be the last spot of his dominions upon which he could, with even a chance of success, attempt to defend his crown, removed the duke; but Ireland still continued steadily to improve in wealth, morals, and comfort, until the abdication of James once more involved that ill-fated country in warfare. Aided by Louis XIV., James led a strong force to Ireland, where he landed, at Kinsale, on the 17th of March, 1689. The earl of Tyrconnel, whom he had himself made lord lieutenant, escorted him to Dublin, where he was received with every demonstration of loyalty and respect by the catholic clergy and people, the former meeting him at some distance from the city in their full clerical attire. But his whole conduct while in the country was arbitrary and mischievous in the extreme. As if the country had not already suffered long and severely enough from religious differences, he called them into fierce and active life again, by arbitrarily dismissing from the parliament the whole of the protestant members. Having thus done what was most calculated to embitter men's minds, and make any disputes that might occur between men of the opposite faiths desperate and fatal, he next proceeded to make it quite certain that of such disputes there should be no scarcity. Whatever might be the original sins of the act of settlement, by which all the real property tenures of the island were fixed, men's minds were now accustomed to consider that settlement as final and indefensible. Lands and tenements had changed owners again and again since the passing of that act. To take the land from persons who had paid for it, merely because the original holders held under that act, was not merely arbitrary, but dishonest; and in the spirit which dictated such a course, we see a spirit not less detestable than that of any of the agrarian theorists, who have from time to time varied the vagaries of mad or dishonest political speculators, by gravely proposing, that lands, which during many centuries have been in a state of improvement, should be taken from those whose toil, expense, and skill—or those of their ancestors—have made them worth something, and given them to those who have done nothing towards their improvement; for no better reason than that of allowing them, in due course of neglect, to relapse into their original condition of swamp and heath, with their inevitable concomitants, fever and famine. Even here James did not halt in his ingenious efforts for deteriorating the condition of the country to which he had appealed for shelter and aid.

Having unsettled men's minds by a pointed and insulting exclusion of men of protestant faith and profession from parliament, and having literally robbed others of their property; having done all this, James now proceeded to debase the coin; a measure destructive of trade and confidence, of private enterprise and of public credit, wherever it is ventured upon. To tamper with the coin of a country, to however trifling an extent, is to do that country an injury which must be great, but of which no human sagacity and skill can enable any one to say what will be the whole extent.

But James did not merely tamper with the coin of Ireland; he debased it in a manner so wholesale and so shameless, that one might almost suppose that he foresaw that he would ultimately be driven from Ireland by the son-in-law who had already driven him from England. Harsh as this census may sound, it will not seem too harsh to our readers, when they are told that James caused several pieces of brass artillery to be melted down and coined. The utmost value of each of these coins was sixpence, but the current value given to them by the preposterously dishonest order of James was five pounds! Not contented with subsisting his army, his suite, and his friends, upon this shameful difference between the nominal and the intrinsic value of his currency, he went still farther, and did what we think would justify even sterner censure than we have pronounced upon him; for with this same base money, so base as to have scarcely any intrinsic value at all, he purchased vast quantities of every description of goods and shipped them off to France.

Nothing could have been more impolitic than this varied and persevering injustice to his Irish subjects; by it James not only sharpened the zeal against him of the protestants, and made them more than ever willing to die, to the very last man, rather than live under his rule; but it also alienated many of the catholics, and considerably abated the confidence and zeal of still more. That he would ever, under any circumstances, have succeeded in recovering England by means of Ireland, or even in holding the latter as an independent kingdom, no one who appreciates the superiority of William III. can for a moment suppose. But it is by no means so certain that James would not, by wiser, more lenient, and more just conduct, have held out much longer, and have finally retired from Ireland under better circumstances, and on terms far more advantageous to himself.

In the province of Ulster, where nearly the whole population were traders and protestants, and where very much of the real property tenure was affected by the act of settlement, the tyranny of James aroused a spirit of the most determined resistance. The king, obstinate in his determinations and implacable in his resentments, looked upon the natural dislike of his subjects to a wholesale destruction of both their political liberty and their private property, as nothing less than treason against his authority; and made war upon them as fiercely as though they had had no more right or title to their land than the meanest of the fierce mercenaries by whom he was accompanied. Derry, commanded by the famous protestant clergymen, George Walker, closed her gates against him; and to the steady bravery with which, under circumstances of superhuman constancy, that city was held out against him, as more particularly described in the history of England, it was mainly owing to that he was so early driven from the island.

Inniskillen resisted him with success;

KING WILLIAM DIED IN 1701. HE FORWARDED TRUE ORATORS OF MIND, DEERED POLITICAL LIBERTY, AND WAS A PATRON OF TOLERATION.

Derry, with her clerical general and her army of 'prentice boys, nobly made good her war cry of "no surrender;" and at length on the 30th of June, 1690, after a little more than fifteen months of tyranny, so senseless that one might almost suppose him to have laboured during the whole of that time under a judicial blindness, the famous battle of the Boyne drove him for ever into that obscurity for which, as concerned the happiness of mankind, he was, in spite of many really good qualities of both head and heart, alone fitted.

Even the departure of James did not restore peace to this truly unfortunate country; for though catholics as well as protestants had deeply suffered under his arbitrary rule, the former preferred any other fate to that of having for their monarch so distinguished a champion of protestantism as the victorious William. Limerick, especially, made a stout and able resistance. William in person laid siege to that city, and was effectually repulsed, and compelled to retreat; and his retreat was made the more melancholy and difficult by his rear being encumbered with the protestant population of that part of the country, who, despoiled of their property, and fearing to trust to the mercy of their catholic brethren even for their lives, followed the army with piteous cries for that relief which it was utterly impossible to afford them.

The affairs of England now requiring William's presence, he gave up the command of the army to Ginckle, an able general. He defeated the Irish and French at Aughrim, and on the defeated troops taking refuge in Limerick, he at once laid siege to it. But the cause of the fugitive James was now at so low an ebb, that even the most enthusiastic of the catholics had given up all anticipation of benefit from farther resistance; and as from the stern character of Ginckle, it was not likely that he would keep any measure in his wrath, if compelled to take the place by assault, it was determined to treat for peace while it was still likely that he would listen to any reasonable terms. A negotiation was at once commenced, and after some alterations of detail in the terms proposed had been dictated by Ginckle and acceded to by the distressed garrison, peace was concluded, and the gates of Limerick thrown open on the 3rd of October, 1691.

In the treaty of Limerick there was much granted to the Irish people in general, and to the catholics in particular, which would assuredly have been denied in the one case to the whole population, and in the other to the protestants.

By this treaty, which under all the circumstances does great honour to general Ginckle, all forts and garrisons were to be given up by the catholics, who were to have restored to them in full the religious liberties enjoyed by them under Charles II.; all who had borne arms in the cause of James II. were to have full pardon; the garrison of Limerick was allowed to march out with all the honours of war, and those soldiers who preferred foreign service to remaining in Ireland were to be conveyed abroad at the expense of the government; and all the nobility and gentry, without any political or religious distinction, were secured in the right of keeping and carrying arms for sport or defence of their lives and property. If peace were always made on such reasonable and honourable terms, war would surely be shorn of half its horrors, and more than half its animosity.

When William III. was fairly settled upon his throne, Ireland as well as England began to exhibit manifest improvement in trade and commerce. Ignorant or interested politicians, indeed, still found topics for inflammatory speeches and writings, in the necessary or politic restrictions which the English government placed upon the export of Irish wool; and in the continuance of Poyning's law, which prevented the Irish parliament from passing any bill which had not first received the approbation of the parliament of England. But the whole history of Ireland tends to show her utter unfitness for an immediate self control.

Divided as that country was into religious parties, Poyning's law was the greatest mercy that could have been bestowed upon it. The English parliament could decide upon principles without reference to parties; but laws enacted by an uncontrolled Irish parliament would have been nothing more than the mere renunciation of the bigotries and the hatreds of this or that party that chanced to have the temporary parliamentary ascendancy. But the event renders all reasoning upon the subject quite supererogatory. The country, under those regulations which faction men at that time so loudly complained of, recovered with an almost miraculous rapidity from the effects of long years of strife and wanton destruction. Every description of labour became more and more in request; every branch of trade became more and more brisk. The agriculturists of the south, in addition to their export trade, had a vast, a sure, and a profitable market among the manufactures of Ulster. That some distress should exist was inevitable; but no one who is not wholly governed by prejudice, can deny that Ireland improved wonderfully and rapidly, upon the whole, during the time that elapsed between the treaty of Limerick and the accession to the English throne of George III., that is to say, from the year 1691 to the year 1760.

George III., in the very first year of his reign, showed his sincere anxiety to promote the prosperity and comfort of his Irish subjects. Public works of great extent and importance gave employment to those labourers who, in the inevitable fluctuations of trade and speculation, were in want of it; new roads were made, piers built at some of the sea-ports, a splendid quay was built at Limerick, and that magnificent canal was planned which connects Dublin with the Shannon, carrying business, employment, and prosperity throughout its course. A single glance at the extent and number of the public works thus commenced, and a single hour of reflection upon their inevitable effect in giving an impulse equally to the enterprize of the capitalist and the industry of the poor man, whose only capital is his labour, will prove equally the wisdom and the good feeling of the king and his advisers; and, if it were necessary, we should be able to prove beyond all dispute, and without any difficulty, that so far as this wisdom and good feeling failed to preserve Ireland from a recurrence of violence, outrage, deep wrong to many, and still deeper suffering to more, Ireland in this case, as in almost all previous cases, was afflicted and arrested in her course of prosperity, not by the cruelty or the neglect, the oppression or the ignorance of England, but simply by the intense and untamed propensity of Ireland's own sons to make their own wretchedness, in despite of all that could be planned for their benefit by wisdom, and accomplished by wealth and liberality.

In 1786, that perpetual source of ill blood, the tithe system, met with a determined resistance from a large party in the south of Ireland, who styled themselves Right-boys. They administered oaths, binding the people not to pay more tithe per acre than a certain sum they fixed—to permit no proctors—and not to allow the clergyman to take his tithes in kind. They also proceeded to fix the rents of land—to raise the wages of labour—and to oppose the collection of the tax called hearth-money. It was impossible that the legislature could allow this violation of the law to pass unnoticed, and in the following year an act was passed, to prevent tumultuous assemblies and illegal combinations.

A very few years passed from this time before the French revolution broke out; when all who were dissatisfied with the government, and hoped to profit by the convulsion into which the country was likely to be thrown, as well as those who sighed for catholic emancipation, or clamoured for the redress of grievances, hailed the success of revolutionary principles in that country, as the day-spring of liberty in their own; but while they professed to forward a "brotherhood of affection, a communion of rights, and a union of power among Irishmen of every religious persuasion," the leaders of this "association" contemplated nothing short of the subversion of the monarchy in Ireland, and a perfect fraternization with the republicans of France, whom they invited to come to their assistance. That such was their intention, was afterwards fully proved on the trials of Napper Tandy and others; and it was also evident from the formation in Dublin of national guards, distinguished by a green uniform, and by buttons with a harp under a cap of liberty instead of a crown. The 9th of December, 1792, was appointed for the general muster of these guards; but government interfered with their proceedings, and the muster never took place.

But although the progress of insurrection was stayed for a time, the spirit of disaffection only lay dormant till a more favourable opportunity should offer for displaying its activity. At length, however, an arrangement was made between the ringleaders and the French government, that an armament should be sent in the winter of 1796-7, with whom the Irish insurgents would be ready to co-operate. Accordingly, the invading fleet anchored in Bantry Bay, on the 24th of December, 1796; but as the general and a great part of the troops were on board ships that had not arrived, the admiral, after waiting for him a few days, returned to Brest; having previously ascertained, however, that the country was in a better state of defence, and that the population was less disaffected to the English government, than the French directory had reason to suppose.

In May, 1797, a proclamation was issued, declaring the civil power inadequate to quell the insurrection, and ordering the military to act upon the responsibility of their own officers. Many severities were consequently practised; and the United Irishmen, perceiving that their only chance of success was by assuming the appearance of being reduced to obedience, they conducted their operations in a more secret manner, discontinuing their meetings, and putting on the semblance of loyalty with such consummate art, that the government being deceived by these appearances, the administration of justice was again, in about three months from the date of the proclamation, committed to the civil power. The organization of the United Irishmen, however, had been going on all the time in a manner the most secret and effectual. Secretaries, delegates, committees, and even an executive directory were respectively engaged in furnishing supplies and arranging the materials necessary for carrying out their plans; and in the spring of 1797, the Irish union was extending far and wide throughout the island. Not being able to propagate their instructions by means of the public press, hand-bills were privately printed and circulated by their agents. In these, abstinence from spirituous liquors was strongly recommended—for the two-fold reason of impairing the revenue, and of guarding against intoxication, lest the secrets of the society should be incautiously divulged to the agents of government. Those who thought they knew the character of the lower Irish would not have believed that any motive would induce them to follow this advice; but it was so generally and faithfully obeyed, that drunkenness among United Irishmen became a comparatively rare occurrence. The members were cautioned against purchasing the quit-rents of the crown, as the bargains would not be valid in case of a change in the government; and the taking of bank notes was also to be especially avoided. These things indicated an approaching revolution, and to effect it they looked with intense anxiety to France for military aid. This was readily promised them; and preparations for the invasion of Ireland were made at Brest and in the Texel; but Lord Duncan's victory off Camperdown rendered the latter abortive, while that at Brest met with unexpected delays.

By this time the number of men sworn into the conspiracy amounted nearly to half a million, and plans were formed for the simultaneous rising of this body; their plans were, however, defeated by the vigilance of the ministry, and some of their most influential leaders arrested. In March, 1798, government issued a proclamation for the immediate suppression of the disaffection and disorders in Ireland; while general Abercrombie, at the head of the forces, marched into the most disturbed districts; not, however, till the insurrection had risen to a most alarming height. Vigorous measures were now taken; and general Lake, who succeeded Abercrombie in the command of the army, proclaimed martial law, and eventually crushed the rebellion in the memorable conflict at Vinegar-hill.

But it is needless to proceed: for the scenes which followed, and the affairs of Ireland generally, are so bound up with those of England from this period, that the reader will find the material points already succinctly given. And, in sooth, where there is nothing pleasant to recite, it is an irksome task to prolong a narration that may be speedily concluded. We shall therefore here introduce a few remarks relative to the inevitable tendency of the repeal agitation, which at present bids fair to dismember the British empire; unless, indeed, the machinations of the arch-traitor and his abettors speedily receive their merited reward—"a consummation devoutly to be wished" by all who would preserve Ireland from the horrors of civil war; for a war of surpassing horrors it assuredly will be, if once began, now that the poison of sedition has been so thoroughly insinuated into the minds and hearts of the people, in every part of the island. Insulting epithets, sarcastic gibes, the basest falsehoods that malice could suggest or impudence give utterance to, have been used by O'Connell again and again, to bring the government and people of England into contempt; the most furious denunciations against the "Saxon," he has coupled with the meanest sycophancy to an ignorant rabble; he has boasted of his power to wage successful war against the British army, while in the same breath he has affected to recommend peace, or insinuated that the soldiers were friendly to the cause of repeal. "If," said he, at a recent "monster" meeting, "it should be necessary for me to call this vast assemblage to arms—to bid you march to the battle-field, there is not one of you that would refuse the summons; ay, and your enemies know it as well as I do. Yes, I have set them at defiance, and I defy them again. I despise their threats of coercion."—Again, "I am no vain prophet. I am no deluding juggler! God has given you the highest moral—he will, therefore, give you the highest temporal—blessings. I am leading you into no crime. You may exhibit your strength thus in peaceful majesty; and if the time should come for using it, there is one here will tell you how to use it. Woe to them who attack you! Let the villains attack us if they dare! No master of thirty legions ever had more power than I have enjoyed within the last six months. I HAVE COWED ENGLAND. I HAVE COWED THE ENGLISH MINISTERS. IRELAND SHALL AND MUST BE FREE."

To write at all on Ireland, and not to allude to the threatened crisis which is thus so ostentatiously announ ed, would seem to be a positive dereliction of one's duty. To hear that the people are called together for an illegal object, in multitudes so immense that they are only to be estimated by "hundreds of thousands," assembled at one time and place—with some fifty thousand, more or less, perhaps, than attended the bidding of the "liberator," at a previous "monster" meeting;—to see that the same thread-bare fustian is forever made to supply the place of truth and fair argument; and that, with the most specious lip-loyalty to the queen, her authority is openly derided, and her government treated with ineffable contempt;—to know all this, and to suppose that the excited passions of "millions" are to be allayed with as much ease as they have been lashed into fury; or to believe that the good of Ireland and its inhabitants has ever been the real object of this monster-making, money-raising system of rebellion,—would be, according to our honest conviction, to exhibit a criminal apathy in the hour of danger, arising from a blind and fatal credulity. Shakspeare says,—

That we may not, however, be subject to the charge of taking a one-sided view of Irish grievances, we shall make a few extracts from the observations of an able popular writer, who in discussing political questions is never justly charged with any lack of liberal sentiments.

"In truth, however, this independence was apparent only. The wretched state of the elective franchise in Ireland was totally inconsistent with any thing like real independence; and so venal was the Irish parliament, that any minister, how unpopular soever, had no difficulty in securing a majority in that assembly. Hence the anticipations in which the more sanguine Irish patriots had indulged were destined soon to experience a most mortifying disappointment; and this, and the hopes inspired by the French revolution, terminated in the rebellion of 1798, which was not suppressed without a repetition of the former scenes of devastation and bloodshed.

"The British government at length wisely determined to effect a legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland, and to suppress the separate legislature of the latter. This measure, notwithstanding a strenuous opposition, was happily carried, and took effect from the 1st of January, 1801. And, unless it were resolved or wished to put an end to all political connection between the two countries, nothing could be more inexpedient and absurd than the existence of a separate independent legislature for Ireland. Perpetual jealousies could not have failed to arise between it and the legislature of Great Britain, which must necessarily in the end have led to estrangement, and probably separation. A legislative union was the only means of obviating these and other sources of mischief; its repeal would make Ireland a theatre for all sorts of projects and intrigues, and it would be sure to be followed, at no distant period, by the dismem-berment of the empire."—M'Culloch's Diet.

THE HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

CHAPTER I.

"HISTORY," says Dr. Robertson, "which ought to record truth and to teach wisdom, often sets out with retailing fictions and absurdities." Never was a sentence more literally true, nor is there a truism more necessary to be borne in mind by all who prefer the sober paths of history to the tortuous labyrinths of romance. Relying upon uncertain legends, and the traditions of their bards, still more uncertain, the Scots reckon up a series of kings several ages before the birth of Christ; but the earliest accounts we can depend upon we obtain from Roman historians; and even these are very meagre.

The Scots appear to have been descended from the Britons of the south, or from the Caledonians, both of Celtic origin, who being pressed forward by new colonies from Gaul, till they came to the western shores of Britain, there took shipping and passed over to Ireland, about a century before the Christian era. In their new abode, it is said, they obtained the name of Scyths, or Wanderers; from which the modern term Scots is supposed to be derived. About A. D. 320, they returned to Britain, or at least a large colony of them, under the conduct of Fergus, and settled on the western coasts of Caledonia, whence they had formerly emigrated, and in a few years after we find them associated with the Picts in their expeditions against the Roman province of South Britain. The modern inhabitants of Scotland are divided into Highlanders and Lowlanders; but the general name of both is Scots; and if the etymology of that name be correct, we may say, without sarcasm or reproach, that they still merit it as much as their ancestors; for there is scarcely a place in the world where they are not to be found.

There has been much dispute among antiquaries whether, in the first place, the Picts and Caledonians were the same race; and whether, secondly, they were of Gothic origin; but, according to the best authorities, both these points have been very satisfactorily demonstrated. Tacitus describes the Caledonians as being of tall stature, light hair, and blue eyes, and he deduces their Gothic origin from their appearance; the Celts being, on the other hand, a small and dark people, with black eyes and hair.

In the year 81, the Romans, under Agricola, carried their arms into the northern parts of Britain, which they found possessed by the Caledonians, a fierce and warlike people; and having repulsed, rather than conquered them, they erected a strong wall, or line of forts, between the friths of Forth and Clyde, which served as the northern boundary of their empire. In 121, Adrian, on account of the difficulty of defending such a distant frontier, built a second wall much more southward, which extended from Newcastle to Carlisle. However, the country between the two walls was alternately under the dominion of the Romans and the Caledonians.

In the reign of Antoninus Pius, the prætor Lollius Urbicus drove the Scots far to the northward, and repaired the chain of forts built by Agricola, which lay between the Carron on the frith of Forth and Dunglass on the Clyde. However, after the death of Antoninus, Commodus having recalled Calpurnius Agricola, an able commander, who kept the Scots in awe, a more dangerous war broke out than had ever been experienced by the Romans in that quarter. The Scots having passed the wall, put all the Romans they could meet with to the sword; but they were soon repulsed by Ulpian Marcellus, a general of consummate abilities, whom Commodus sent into the island. In a short time the tyrant also recalled this able commander. After his departure the Roman discipline suffered a total relaxation; the soldiery grew mutinous, and great disorder ensued: but these were all happily removed by the arrival of Clodius Albinus, who possessed great skill and experience in military affairs. His presence for some time restrained the Scots, but a civil war breaking out between him and Severus, Albinus crossed over to the continent with the greatest part of the Roman forces in Britain; and meeting his antagonist at Lyons a dreadful battle ensued, in which Albinus was utterly defeated.

The withdrawal of the Roman troops gave encouragement to the Scots to renew their insurrection, which they did with such success, that the emperor became apprehensive of losing the whole island, on which he determined to take the field against them in person. The army he collected on this occasion was far more numerous than any the Romans had ever sent into Britain; and it is asserted that in re-conquering Scotland he lost no less than 50,000 men. On his return from the northern extremity of the island he built much stronger fortifications to secure the frontiers than had ever been done before, and which in some places coincided with Adrian's wall, but extended farther at each end. But, in the meantime, the Scots, provoked by the brutality of the emperor's son Caracalla, whom he had left regent in his absence, again took arms; on which Severus put himself at the head of his legions, with a determination, as he said, of extirpating the whole nation. But his death, which happened soon after, put a stop to the execution of a threat so dreadful; and we find that his son Caracalla ratified the peace with the Scots. At this period Scotland was governed by Donald I., who is said to have been its first Christian king. He died A. D. 216. From the reign of Donald I. to that of Eugene I. in 357, during which time eleven kings filled the throne, no important event occurs for which we have authentic history; though we are told that for the great aid afforded by one of the Scottish kings, named Fin-cormachus, to the Britons, in their contest with the Romans, Westmoreland and Cumberland were ceded to Scotland. In the reign of Eugene I. we read that the Roman and Pictish forces were united against the Scots. The Picts were commanded by their king, named Hargust; and the Romans by Maximus, who murdered Valentinian III., and afterwards assumed the imperial purple. The allies defeated Eugene in the county of Galloway; but Maximus being obliged to return southward on account of an insurrection, the Picts were in their turn defeated by the Scots. In the following year, however, Maximus again marched against the Scots, and not only gained a complete victory over them, but the king, with the greater part of his nobles, were among the slain. So well, indeed, did the conquerors improve their victory, that their antagonists were at last totally driven out of the country. Some of them took refuge in the Ebrudæ islands, and some in Scandinavia, but most of them fled to Ireland, whence they made frequent descents upon Scotland.

The Picts were at first greatly pleased with the victory they had gained over their warlike antagonists; but being commanded to adopt the laws of the Romans, and to choose no king who was not sent from Rome, they began to repent of their having contributed to the expulsion of the Scots; and in the year 421, when Autulphus, king of the Goths, sent over a body of exiled Scots to Britain, under Fergus, a descendant of the kings of Scotland, the Picts immediately joined them against the common enemy.

It was at this period that the Romans were obliged, by the inundation of northern barbarians who poured in upon them, to recall their legions and abandon their conquests in Britain. The native Britons, therefore, so long accustomed to the dominion of these mighty conquerors, and now so incorporated with them, severely felt the perils of their situation when left to defend themselves; hence originated that supplicating letter to Rome, entitled "the groans of the Britons." This, however, not being attended with success, the Britons called in the Saxons to their aid. By these new allies the Scots were defeated in a great battle, and their king, Dongard, successor to Eugene, drowned in the Humber, A. D. 457, which put a stop for some time to these excursions. Hitherto we have seen the Scots very formidable enemies of the southern Britons; but when the Saxons usurped the kingdom, and subjected those whom they came to aid, the Scots joined in a strict alliance with the latter; nor does it appear that the league thus formed was afterwards broken.

Three centuries now pass without any thing occurring calculated to interest the reader, or to throw light on the Scottish history, beyond what has been related in the history of England during the Heptarchy. In 787 we find that Achaisus, king of the Scots, after quelling some insurrections, entered into a treaty of perpetual amity with Charles the Great, king of France and emperor of Germany, which treaty continued to be observed inviolably between the two nations, till the accession of James VI. to the throne of England.

The next remarkable event in the history of Scotland is the war with the Picts. Dongal, king of the Scots, claimed a right to the Pictish throne, which being rejected by the latter, they had recourse to arms. At this time the dominions of the Scots comprehended the western islands, together with the counties of Argyll, Knapdale, Kyle, Kintyre, Lochaber, and a part of Breadalban; while the Picts possessed the rest of Scotland, and a considerable part of Northumberland. The Scots, however, appear to have been superior in military skill; for Alpin, the successor of Dongal, having engaged the Pictish army near Forfar, defeated them, and killed their king, though not without suffering great loss himself. The Picts then chose Brudus, the son of their former king, to succeed him, but soon after deposed and put him to death. His brother Kenneth shared the same fate. Brudus, who next ascended the throne, was a brave and spirited prince; he first offered terms of peace to the Scots; which, however, Alpin rejected, and insisted on a total surrender of his crown. After vainly endeavouring to obtain the assistance of Edwin, king of Northumberland, Brudus marched resolutely against his enemies; and the two armies came to an engagement near Dundee. The superior skill of the Scots in military affairs was about to have decided the victory in their favour, when Brudus is said to have had recourse to the following stratagem to preserve his army from destruction. He caused all the attendants, female as well as male, to assemble and show themselves at a distance, as a powerful reinforcement coming to the Picts. This caused such a panic in the Scottish ranks, that all the efforts of their leader could not recover them; and they were accordingly defeated with great slaughter. Alpin himself was taken prisoner, and soon after beheaded.

Kenneth II., the son of Alpin, succeeded his father, and proved himself a brave and enterprising prince. Resolved to take a severe revenge for his father's death, he made the most vigorous preparations for war; and so well did he succeed, that, after many desperate conflicts, he became master of all Scotland; so that he is justly considered the true founder of the Scottish monarchy. He is also said to have been very successful against the Saxons, but of his exploits with those hardy and skilful warriors we have no accounts that can be depended on. Having reigned sixteen years in peace after his subjugation of the Picts, and composed a code of laws for the better regulation of his people, he died at Fort Taviot in Perthshire. Before his time the seat of the Scots government had been in Argyllshire; but he removed it to Scone, by transferring thither the celebrated black stone supposed to be the palladium of Scotland, and which was afterwards removed by Edward I. to Westminster abbey.

In the reign of Donald, who succeeded his brother Kenneth, the Picts who had fled out of Scotland applied to the Saxons for assistance, promising to make Scotland tributary to the Saxon power after it should be conquered. This ended in a great victory on the part of the confederates, who became masters of all the country south of the Forth and Clyde: it being agreed that the Forth should from that time forward be called the "Scots Sea;" and it was made a capital offence for any Scotsman to set his foot on English ground. They were to erect no forts near the English boundaries, to pay an annual tribute of a thousand pounds, and to give up sixty of the sons of their chief nobility as hostages. After the conclusion of this treaty, so humiliating to the Scots, the Picts, finding that their interest had been entirely neglected, fled to Norway, while those who remained in England met with a brutal death from their late allies. Donald, having been dethroned and imprisoned, put an end to his own life; he was succeeded by his nephew Constantine, the son of Kenneth M'Alpin, in whose reign Scotland was first invaded by the Danes, who proved such formidable enemies to the English. This invasion is said to have been occasioned by a body of exiled Picts who fled to Denmark, where they prevailed upon the king of that country to send his two brothers to recover the Pictish dominions from Constantine. These princes landed on the coast of Fife; and though one of the armies was defeated by Constantine near the water of Levan, the king was himself defeated by the other, taken prisoner, and beheaded at a place called the Devil's Cave, A. D. 874. This unfortunate action cost the Scots 10,000 men; but the Danes purchased their victory dearly, as they were obliged immediately afterwards to abandon their conquests and retire to their own country.

Constantine was succeeded by his brother Eth, surnamed the Swiftfooted, from his agility. He was succeeded by Gregory, the son of Dougal, contemporary with Alfred of England, and both princes deservedly acquired the name of Great. The Danes at their departure had left the Picts in possession of Fife. Against them Gregory immediately marched, and quickly drove them into the north of England, where their confederates were already masters of Northumberland and York. In their way thither they threw a garrison into the town of Berwick; but this was presently reduced by Gregory, who put all the Danes to death, but spared the lives of the Picts. He afterwards marched against the Cumbrians, whom he easily overcame, and obliged to yield up all the lands they had formerly possessed belonging to the Scots, at the same time that he agreed to protect them against the power of the Danes. In a short time, however, Constantine, the king of the Cumbrians, violated the convention he had made, and invaded Annandale; but was defeated and killed by Gregory near Lochmaben. After this he entirely reduced the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, which, it is said, were ceded to him by Alfred the Great, whose affairs were at that period any thing but prosperous.

Gregory next engaged in a war with the Irish, to support Donach, an Irish prince, against two rebellious noblemen. The first engagement after his landing in Ireland proved fatal to Brian, one of these chieftains; and he then reduced Dundalk and Drogheda. On his way to Dublin he was opposed by a chieftain named Corneil, who shared the fate of his friend Brian. Gregory then assumed the guardianship of the young prince he came to assist, appointed a regency, and obliged them to swear that they would never admit into the country either a Dane or an Englishman without his consent. Having placed garrisons in the strongest fortresses, he returned to Scotland where he died in the year 892.

Donald III the son of Constantine, succeeded Gregory; but his reign was short; for having marched against a body of marauders who had invaded and ravaged the counties of Murray and Ross, and subdued them, he soon after died, A. D. 903. He was succeeded by Constantine III, the son of Eth; the most remarkable event in whose reign was, that he entered into alliance with the Danes against the English. This, however, lasted but two years. As soon as Constantine had concluded the treaty with the Danes, he appointed the presumptive heir to the Scottish crown, Malcolm, prince of the southern counties, on condition of his defending them against the attacks of the English. He had soon an opportunity of displaying his valour; but, neglecting the necessary caution, his army was signally defeated, and he himself severely wounded. In consequence of this disaster, Constantine was obliged to do homage to the English monarch, Edward the Elder, for the possessions he had to the southward of the Scottish boundary.

Early in the reign of Athelstan, the son of Edward, the northern Danes were encouraged by some conspiracies formed against that monarch, to throw off the yoke; and their success was such, that Athelstan thought proper to enter into a treaty with Blithno, the Danish chief, and to give him his daughter in marriage. Blithno, however, did not long survive the nuptials; and his son Guthred, endeavouring to throw off the English yoke, was defeated and obliged to fly into Scotland. This event caused a series of hostilities between the Scots and English, which in the year 938 ended in a general engagement. At this time the Scots, Irish, Cumbrians, and Danes were leagued against the English. The Scots were commanded by their king Constantine; the Irish by Anlaf, the brother of Guthred, the Danish prince; the Cumbrians by their own sovereign; and the Danes by Froda. The generals of Athelstan were Edmund his brother, and Turketil his favourite. After an obstinate engagement, the confederates were defeated with great slaughter; the consequence of which was, that the Scots were deprived of all their possessions to the southward of the Forth; and Constantine, quite dispirited with his misfortune, resigned the crown to Malcolm, and retired to the monastery of the Culdees at St. Andrew's, where he died in 943.

The reigns of Malcolm, Indulfus, Duffus, and Cullen, present nothing worthy of comment; but a remarkable revolution took place in the reign of Kenneth III., who succeeded Cullen, A. D. 970. This prince commenced his reign by relieving the lower classes from the exactions and oppressions of the nobility, which had become intolerable. Without stating his reasons, he ordered the barons to appear before him at Lanark, where he had provided an armed host to take such of them into custody as he knew to be notorious offenders, and on the charges being substantiated, they were compelled to make restitution, or were punished in proportion to the magnitude of their offences. In this reign the Danes, who had previously been making attempts to invade England, landed at Montrose, and laid waste the country around. Kenneth finding that they were making rapid progress to his kingdom, and were then besieging Perth, resolved to give them battle. He is said to have offered ten pounds in silver, or the value of it in land, for the head of every Dane which should be brought to him; and an immunity from all taxes to the soldiers who served in his army, provided they should be victorious; but, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Scots, their enemies fought so desperately, that Kenneth's army must have been totally defeated, had not the fugitives been stopped by a yeoman of the name of Hay, and his retainers, who were only armed with rustic weapons. The fight was now renewed with such violence on the part of the Scots, that the Danes were utterly defeated; and after the battle the king rewarded Hay with the barony of Errol, in the earse of Gowrie, ennobled his family, and gave them an armorial bearing alluding to the rustic weapons with which they had achieved this illustrious exploit. Kenneth, at length, in 994, met his death by murder, at the instigation of a lady named Fenella, whose son he had caused to be put to death. The throne was then seized by an usurper, named Constantine; who, being killed in battle after a reign of a year and a half, was succeeded by Grime, the grandson of king Duffus; and he again was defeated and killed by Malcolm, the son of Kenneth, the lawful heir of the Scottish throne.

Malcolm formed a strict alliance with the king of England; and proved so successful against the Danes in that country, that Sweyn, their king, resolved to direct his whole force against him by an invasion of Scotland. In conjunction with Duncan, prince of Cumberland, who on this occasion entered into an alliance with Sweyn, Malcolm sustained a terrible defeat, and was himself desperately wounded. So elated were the Danes by this victory, that they sent for their wives and children, intending to make Scotland their future home. Towns and fortresses fell into their hands, and the Scots were everywhere treated as a conquered people; but they afterwards met with a severe check; which they endeavoured to remedy by sending for reinforcements both from England and Norway. Their fleets soon appeared off the coast, and they effected a landing at Redhead, in the county of Angus. The castle of Brechin was first besieged; but meeting with a stout resistance there, they laid the town and church in ashes. Malcolm, in the mean time, was at hand with his army, and encamped at a place called Barr, in the neighbourhood of which both parties prepared to decide the fate of Scotland.

The action was fierce and bloody, but was eventually crowned with complete success to the Scots. Sweyn was not, however, so discouraged but that he sent his son Canute, afterwards king of England, and one of the greatest warriors of that age, into Scotland, with an army more powerful than any that had yet appeared; and though the Danes were, upon the whole, successful in the great battle which followed, they were so much reduced that they willingly concluded a peace on the following terms; viz. that the Danes should immediately leave Scotland; that as long as Malcolm and Sweyn lived, neither of them should wage war with the other, or help each other's enemies; and that the field in which the battle was fought should be set apart and consecrated for the burial of the dead. But glorious as the warlike exploits of Malcolm had been, he is said to have stained the latter part of his reign with avarice and oppression; and at the age of eighty, after having reigned thirty years, he fell by the hand of an assassin. Duncan I., a grandson of Malcolm, succeeded him in 1034; he had also another grandson, the celebrated Macbeth, who in the early part of Duncan's reign signalized himself in quelling a formidable insurrection, but who subsequently, after having done much in expelling the Danish ma-raunders, murdered the king, and usurped his throne, to the exclusion of Malcolm, the rightful son and heir of Duncan.

For some time Macbeth governed with moderation, but his tyrannical nature was afterwards shown in almost every act. He caused Banquo, the most powerful thane in Scotland, to be treacherously murdered, and intended that his son Fleance should share the same fate, had he not made his escape to Wales. Next to Banquo the most powerful of his subjects was Macduff, the thane of Fife; for which reason Macbeth plotted his destruction; but on Macduff seeking refuge in England, the tyrant cruelly put to death his wife and infant children, and sequestered his estate. The injured Macduff vowed revenge, and encouraged Malcolm to attempt to dethrone the traitorous usurper. With their united forces they gave Macbeth battle; and, being defeated, he retreated to the most inaccessible places in the Highlands, where for two years he continued to defend himself against all who dared to oppose him. In the mean time, however, Malcolm was acknowledged king of Scotland, and Macbeth perished in a conflict with Macduff.

A. D. 1067.—Malcolm III. being now established on the throne, commenced his reign by rewarding Macduff for his great services, and conferred upon his family some distinguished honours. The conquest of England by William of Normandy involved Malcolm, who espoused the cause of the Saxons, in many fierce wars. Edgar Atheling, the heir of the Saxon line, and many of the Saxon nobles, found an asylum in Scotland. Malcolm married Margaret, the sister of the fugitive prince, who is said to have introduced a degree of refinement into her court remarkable for that time, and to have contributed to soften the rude manners of the people. Malcolm twice invaded England with success; but William, having collected a great army, in his turn invaded Scotland, and compelled Malcolm to do homage for the lands which he held within what was accounted the English territory. This was, as the reader has been elsewhere informed, an ancient feudal practice, common at the period; though in later times it has been asserted that the Scottish monarchs held their whole kingdom on this tenure.

On the death of William the Conqueror, Malcolm again espoused the cause of Edgar Atheling, who had been induced to seek his assistance a second time, when William II., surnamed Rufus, ascended the English throne. After several negotiations between Malcolm, Rufus, and Edgar, it was agreed that the king of England should restore to Malcolm all his southern possessions, for which he should pay the same homage he had been accustomed to do to the Conqueror; that he should restore to Malcolm twelve disputed manors, and give him likewise thirteen marks of gold yearly, besides restoring Edgar to all his English estates. William, however, afterwards refused to fulfil his engagements, and applied himself to the fortification of his northern boundaries, especially Carlisle, which had been destroyed by the Danes 200 years before. This place lying within the feudal dominions of Malcolm, he complained of William's proceedings, as a breach of the late treaty. Another war was the natural consequence; and the Scottish king, with his eldest son, were killed in attempting to take the castle of Alnwick, A. D. 1093.

Though Malcolm left male heirs, yet his throne was usurped, first by his brother Donald Bane, and afterwards by Duncan, his natural son. By the interposition of the king of England, however, Edgar, lawful son of Malcolm, was placed upon the Scottish throne. After a reign distinguished by no remarkable event, Edgar died in 1107; and was succeeded by his brother Alexander, surnamed the Fierce, from the impetuosity of his temper. But though impetuous, he was severely just, and rendered himself chiefly remarkable by the attention he paid to the administration of justice and the redress of wrong. A conspiracy formed against the life of this good king was dissipated by the vigour of his measures; and after assisting Henry I. of England in a war with the Welsh, he died in 1124. Having left no issue, Alexander was succeeded by David, his younger brother, commonly called St. David, on account of his great piety and excessive liberality to the church and clergy. David interested himself in the affairs of England, espousing the cause of Maud against Stephen. In several engagements he was successful, but was in others defeated, and found himself unable effectually to support the cause he had undertaken. He died in 1153, and was succeeded by Malcolm IV., a prince of a weak body, and no less feeble mind, who, dying in 1165, left his crown to his brother William.

In the beginning of his reign, William recovered from Henry of England the earldom of Northumberland, which had been relinquished by Malcolm; but afterwards leading an army into England, and conducting himself with too little caution, he was made prisoner by surprise, and detained in captivity, till, in order to regain his liberty, he consented to declare himself a vassal of England, and to do homage for his whole kingdom. Richard Cœur de Lion, however, who succeeded Henry, renitted the oppressive terms, and declared Scotland to be an independent kingdom; a measure to which he was induced, partly by the injustice of the claim itself, and partly by his wish of rendering the Scots his friends, during an expedition which he was about to undertake into Palestine. William showed his gratitude for the restoration of his independence, by continuing a faithful ally of the English till his death, in 1214.

William was succeeded by his son Alexander II., a youth of sixteen. He took the side of the English barons in their contentions with John, their feeble and imprudent monarch. He was a wise and good prince, and maintained with steadiness and spirit the independency of his crown abroad, and the authority of his government at home. At his death, in 1249, he was succeeded by his son Alexander, a child of eight years of age, who was immediately crowned at Scone as Alexander III. Having been betrothed, when an infant, to the princess Margaret of England, their nuptials were celebrated at York in 1251, and he did homage to Henry for his English possessions. The latter monarch demanded homage for the kingdom of Scotland, but the young prince replied with spirit, that he came to York to marry the princess of England, not to treat of state affairs, and that he would not take so important a step without the concurrence of the national council. One of the principal events of Alexander's reign was the battle of Largs. Haco, king of Norway having collected a fleet of one hundred and sixty ships, sailed towards Scotland with a numerous army, A.D. 1263, with a view to recover such of the western isles as had formerly belonged to his crown, but which had been wrested from it by the Scots. He made himself master of Arran and Bute, and afterwards landed on the coast of Ayrshire. Alexander attacked him at Largs; where, after a fierce contest, victory at last declared for the Scots, and the greater part of the invading army fell either in the action or the pursuit. Haco reached the Orkneys, but soon afterwards died, as is said, of a broken heart; and was succeeded by Magnus, who, discouraged by the disaster which had befallen his father, yielded all his rights to the Western Islands and the Isle of Man to the crown of Scotland, for the sum of 4000 marks, to be paid in four years, and a quit rent of one hundred marks yearly; A.D. 1266. The Norwegians still retained the Orkney and Shetland islands. From this period, Alexander was employed for several years in maintaining the independence of the Scottish church against the pretensions of the pope, and in restraining the encroachments of the clergy. His reign was a long and prosperous one; and his death was, in its consequences, a serious calamity to Scotland. While riding in the dusk of the evening along the sea-coast of Fife, his horse started, and he was thrown over the rock and killed on the spot.

A.D. 1286.—Alexander's children had all died before him. His daughter Margaret had married Eric, king of Norway, and died, leaving issue one daughter, Margaret, usually called the Maiden of Norway, the now undoubted heiress of the crown of Scotland, and recognized as such by the states of the kingdom about three weeks after Alexander's death. The same convention appointed a regency of six noblemen during the absence of the young queen. These regents for some time acted with wisdom and unanimity; but two of them dying, dissensions arose among the remaining four; and Eric, king of Norway, apprehensive for the interests of his daughter, applied to Edward, king of England, for his assistance and protection. Edward had already formed a scheme for uniting the two kingdoms by the marriage of his eldest son, Edward, with the queen of Scots. A treaty was entered into for this purpose; but the Maiden of Norway unfortunately died at Orkney, on her passage to Scotland; and the nation was struck with grief and consternation in beholding the extinction of a race of sovereigns who had distinguished themselves for their bravery and wisdom, and in anticipating the miseries of a contested succession.

The line of Alexander's descendants being thus extinguished, the right of succession devolved on the descendants of David, earl of Huntingdon, third son of David I. Among these, Robert Bruce and John Balliol appeared as competitors for the crown. Bruce was the son of Isabel, earl David's second daughter; Balliol, the grandson of Margaret, the eldest daughter. Although the right was incontestable in Balliol, the prejudices of the people favoured Bruce; each was supported by a powerful faction; and arms alone, it was feared, must decide the dispute. In order to avoid the threatened miseries of civil war, Edward I. king of England, was chosen umpire, and both parties agreed to acquiesce in his decree. This measure had nearly proved fatal to the independence of Scotland. Edward was artful, brave, and enterprising. The anarchy which prevailed in Scotland invited him first to seize, and then to subject the kingdom. Under the authority of an umpire, he summoned all the Scottish barons to Norham; and having gained some, and intimidated others, he prevailed on all who were present, not excepting Bruce and Balliol, the competitors, to acknowledge Scotland to be a fief of the crown of England, and to swear fealty to him as their sovereign lord. Edward now demanded possession of the kingdom, that he might be able to deliver it to him whose right should be found preferable; and such was the pusillanimity of the nobles, and the impatience of the competitors, that both assented to his demand; and Gilbert d'Umpfreville, earl of Angus, was the only man who refused to surrender the castles in his custody to the enemy of his country. Edward, finding Balliol had the best right, and was the least formidable of the two competitors, gave judgment in his favour; and Balliol once more confessed himself the vassal of England.

Edward now concluded that his dominion was fully established in Scotland, and began to assume the master; his new vassals, however, bore the yoke with impatience. Provoked by his haughtiness, the humble spirit of Balliol began to mutiny. But Edward, who had no further use for such a pageant king, forced him to resign the crown; and attempted to seize it, as having fallen to himself by the rebellion of his vassals.

Sir William Wallace, a hero and patriot, now first made his appearance, and almost singly ventured to take arms in defence of the kingdom; but his courage, although for a time it revived the spirit of his countrymen, could not save them from the power of the English king. He had lived a free man, and a free man he resolved to die; but the season of resistance was passed. He at length fell into Edward's hands, was arraigned at Westminster as a traitor, and an ignominious death was the reward of his unexampled bravery. Robert Bruce, the grandson of the competitor of Balliol, then came forward, to assert his own rights, and to vindicate the honour of his country. The nobles crowded to his standard, and many battles were fought with the English. The Scots, though often vanquished, were not subdued: the prudent conduct of Bruce, aided by the national enthusiasm, baffled the repeated efforts of Edward; and, although the war continued, with little intermission, upwards of twenty years, Bruce and his posterity kept possession of Scotland.

But while the sword, the ultimate judge of all disputes between contending nations, was employed to terminate this controversy, neither Edward nor the Scots seemed to distrust the justice of their cause; and both appealed to history and records, and from these produced, in their own favour, such evidence as they pretended to be unanswerable. The letters and memorials addressed by each party to the pope, who was then revered as the common father, and often appealed to as the common judge of all Christian princes, are still extant. The fabulous tales of the early British history; the partial testimony of ignorant chroniclers; suppositions, treaties, and charters; are the proofs on which Edward founded his title to the sovereignty of Scotland; and the homage done by the Scottish monarchs for their lands in England is preposterously supposed to imply the subjection of the whole kingdom. Ill founded, however, as their right was, the English did not fail to revive it, in all the subsequent quarrels between the two kingdoms; while the Scots disclaimed it with the utmost indignation. To this we must impute the fierce and implacable hatred to each other, which long inflamed both. Their national antipathies were excited, not only by the usual circumstances of frequent hostilities, and reciprocal injuries, but the English considered the Scots as vassals who had presumed to rebel, and the Scots, in their turn, regarded the English as usurpers who aimed at enslaving their country.

Speaking of the state of Scotland during the feudal period, Dr. Robertson observes, that the Scottish nobles enjoyed, in common with those of other nations, all the means for extending their authority which arises from the aristocratical genius of the feudal government. The nature of the country was one cause. Mountains, and fens, and rivers, set bounds to despotic power, and amidst these is the natural seat of independence. In such places did the Scottish nobles usually fix their residence. By retiring to his own castle, a mutinous baron could defy the power of his sovereign, it being almost impracticable to lead an army through a barren country, to places difficult of access to a single man. The same causes which checked the progress of the Roman arms, and rendered all the efforts of Charles I. abortive, often protected the Scottish nobles from the vengeance of their prince; and they owed their personal independence to those very mountains and marshes which saved their country from being conquered.

The division of the country into clans had no small effect in rendering the nobles considerable. The nations which overrun Europe were originally divided into many small tribes; and when they came to parcel out the lands they had conquered, it was natural for every chieftain to bestow a portion, in the first place, upon those of his own tribe or family. These all held their lands of him, and as the safety of each individual depended on the general union, these small societies clung together, and were distinguished by some common appellation, either patronymical, or local, long before the introduction of surnames, or ensigns armorial. But when these became common, the descendants and relations of every chieftain assumed the same name and arms with him; other vassals were proud to imitate the example, and by degrees they were communicated to all those who held of the same superior. Thus clanships were formed; and, in a generation or two, that consanguinity, which was at first in a great measure imaginary, was believed to be real. An artificial union was converted into a natural one; men willingly followed a leader, whom they regarded both as the superior of their lands and the chief of their blood, and served him not only with the fidelity of vassals, but with the affection of friends. Such a confederacy might be overcome, it could not be broken; and no change of manners, or of government, has been able, in some parts of the kingdom, to dissolve associations which are founded upon prejudices so natural to the human mind."

A. D. 1336.—Robert Bruce began to reign in 1306, and no prince was ever more indebted to his nobles. Their valour conquered the kingdom, and placed him on the throne; and he bestowed upon them, in return, the lands of the vanquished. Robert died in 1329, and was succeeded by his son David. He had been an exile in France, and afterwards a prisoner in England; and being involved in continental war with Edward III. of England, had not time to attend to the internal police of the kingdom. He died without children in 1371, and was succeeded by Robert Stuart.

king's promises, who had now attained to the years of manhood, and having obtained a safe conduct under the great seal, he ventured to meet him in Stirling castle. James urged him to dissolve that dangerous confederacy into which he had entered; the earl obstinately refused. "If you will not," said the enraged monarch, drawing his dagger, "this shall," and stabbed him to the heart. This filled the nation with astonishment. The earl's vassals ran to arms, marched to Stirling, burnt the town, and threatened to besiege the castle. An accommodation, however, ensued; on what terms is not known; but the king's jealousy, and the new earl's power and resentment, prevented it from being of long continuance. Both took the field at the head of their armies, and met near Abercorn. That of the earl, composed chiefly of borderers, was far superior to the king's both in number and in valour; and a single battle must, in all probability, have decided whether the house of Stuart or of Douglas was henceforth to possess the throne of Scotland. But as his troops were impatiently expecting the signal to engage, the earl ordered them to retire to their camp. His principal officers, now convinced of his want of genius and courage, deserted him; and he was soon after driven out of the kingdom, and obliged to depend for his subsistence on the friendship of the king of England.

The ruin of this great family, which had so long rivalled and overawed the crown, secured the king for some time from opposition, and the royal authority remained uncontrolled, and almost absolute. James did not suffer this favourable interval to pass unimproved: he procured the consent of parliament to laws more advantageous to the prerogative, and more subversive of the privileges of the aristocracy, than were ever obtained by any former or subsequent monarch of Scotland.

During the remainder of his reign, this prince pursued the plan which he had begun with the utmost vigour; and had not a sudden death, occasioned by the splinter of a cannon, which burst near him at the siege of Roxburgh, prevented his progress, he wanted neither genius nor courage to perfect it; and Scotland might, in all probability, have been the first kingdom in Europe which would have seen the subversion of the feudal system.

A. D. 1460.—James III. succeeded his father in 1460, and discovered no less eagerness than his father, or grandfather, to humble the nobility; but, far inferior to either of them in abilities and address, he adopted a plan extremely impolitic; and his reign was disastrous, as well as his end tragical. James feared and hated his nobles; he kept them at an unusual distance; and bestowed every mark of confidence and affection upon a few mean persons. Shut up with these in his castle of Stirling, he seldom appeared in public, and amused himself in architecture, music, and other arts, which were then little esteemed. The nobles resented this conduct in the king; and combinations, secret intrigues with England, and all the usual preparations for civil war, were the effects of their resentment. Alexander, duke of Albany, and John, earl of Mar, the king's brothers—two young men of turbulent and ambitious spirits, and incensed against James, who treated them with great coldness—entered deeply into all their cabals. The king detected their designs before they were ripe for execution; and seizing his two brothers, committed the duke of Albany to Edinburgh castle. The earl of Mar, having remonstrated with too much boldness, it is said, was murdered by the king's command. Albany, apprehensive of the same fate, made his escape out of the castle, and reached France.

James's attachment to favourites rendering him every day more odious to his nobles, soon inspired Albany with more ambitious and criminal thoughts. He concluded a treaty with Edward IV. of England, in which he assumed the name of Alexander, king of Scots; and, in return for the assistance which was promised him towards dethroning his brother, he bound himself, as soon as he was put in possession of the kingdom, to swear fealty and do homage to the English monarch, to renounce the ancient alliance with France, to contract a new one with England, and to surrender some of the strongest castles and most valuable counties in Scotland. The aid which the duke so basely purchased, at the price of his own honour and the independence of his country, was punctually granted him; and Richard, duke of Gloucester, with a powerful army, conducted him towards Scotland. The danger of a foreign invasion soon induced James to ask the assistance of those nobles whom he had so long treated with contempt. They expressed their readiness to stand forward in defence of their king and country against all invaders, and took the field at the head of a large army of their followers; but it was evident at the same time that they were animated by a stronger desire to redress their own grievances, than to annoy the enemy; and with a fixed determination of punishing those favourites whose insolence had become intolerable. This resolution they executed in the camp near Lauder. Having previously concerted their plan, the earls of Angus, Huntley, and Lauder, followed by almost all the barons of note in the army, forcibly entered the apartments of the king, seized every one therein, except Ramsay, who had taken shelter in his arms, and hanged them immediately over a bridge. Among the most remarkable of those who had engrossed the king's favour, were Cochran, a mason; Hommil, a tailor; Leonard, a smith; Rogers, a musician; and Torlissan, a fencing-master.

Having no reason to confide in an army so little under his command, James dismissed it, and shut himself up in the castle of Edinburgh. At length Albany made his peace with the king, but it was not of long duration; for James abandoned himself once more to his favourites; and Albany, again disgusted, retired to his castle at Dunbar, and renewed his former confederacy with Edward. The death of Edward, soon after, blasted his hopes of reigning in Scotland. He fled first to England, and then to France; and from that time he took no part in the affairs of his native country.

Grown fonder of retirement than ever, and sunk into indolence or superstition, James suffered his whole authority to devolve upon his favourites. The nobles flew to arms, and obliged or persuaded the duke of Rothsay, the king's eldest son, a youth of fifteen, to set himself at their head; and they then openly declared their intention of depriving James of the crown. Roused by this danger, the king quitted his retirement, took the field, and encountered them at Bannockburn; but his army was soon routed, and he was slain in the pursuit. Suspicion, indolence, immoderate attachment to favourites, and all the vices of a feeble mind, are visible in his whole conduct.

Many of those who acted against James, being fearful of the terrors of excommunication for having imbrued their hands in the blood of their king, endeavoured to atone for the treatment of the father by their loyalty and duty towards the son. They placed him instantly on the throne; and the whole kingdom soon united in acknowledging his authority.

A. D. 1483.—James IV. ascended the Scottish throne in the year 1483. He was naturally generous and brave; loved magnificence, and delighted in arms. Indeed, so well suited was he for those over whom he ruled, that during his reign the ancient enmity between the king and the nobles seemed almost to have entirely ceased. He envied not their splendour, because it contributed to the ornament of his court; and their power he considered as the security of his kingdom, not as an object of terror to himself. This confidence on his part met with duty and affection on theirs; and in his war with England he experienced how much a king beloved by his nobles is able to perform. Through the ardour of his courage, rather than from any prospect of national advantage, he declared war against England, and was followed by as gallant an army as ever any of his ancestors had led into England. The battle of Flodden Field, [see "ENGLAND," p. 297] gained by the earl of Surrey over James, and in which he lost his life, served to humble the aristocracy of Scotland more than all the premeditated attacks of the preceding kings. Twelve earls, thirteen lords, five eldest sons of noblemen, and a great number of barons, fell with the king.

A. D. 1517.—James V. succeeded his father when only one year old. The office of regent was conferred upon his cousin, the duke of Albany, a man of genius and enterprise, a native of France. A stranger to the manners, the laws, and the language of the people over whom he was called to rule, he acted rather as a viceroy of the French king, than the governor of Scotland. When James had attained his thirteenth year, Albany retired to France; and the nobles agreed that the king should assume the government, with the assistance of eight counsellors, among whom was the earl of Angus, who soon got the whole authority into his own hands. James was continually surrounded by the earl's spies and confidants, who closely watched his motions; he, however, eluded all their vigilance, and escaping from Falkland, fled to the castle of Stirling, the residence of the queen, his mother, and the only place of strength in the kingdom which was not in the hands of the Douglasses. The nobles soon appeared at Stirling; and the court of James was presently filled by persons of the first distinction. In a parliament held soon after, Angus and his adherents were attainted, and he was at length obliged to fly to England for refuge.

James had now not only the name, but the authority of a king. His understanding was good, and his person graceful; but his education had been neglected. He, however, formed a plan for humbling the power of the nobles, more profound and more systematic than any of his predecessors. The Scottish monarchs had the sole right of nomination to vacant bishoprics and abbey; and James naturally concluded, that men who expected preferment from his favour, would be willing to merit it by promoting his designs. Happily for him, the nobles had not yet recovered the blow which fell on their order at Flodden, and James treated them with coldness and reserve. Those offices which, from long possession, they considered as appropriated to their order, were bestowed on ecclesiastics, who alone possessed his confidence, together with a few gentlemen of inferior rank. These ministers were chosen with judgment; and cardinal Beaton was a man of superior genius. However, a false step which they took, presented to the nobles an advantage which they did not fail to improve.

Henry VIII. of England, uncle to James, proposed a personal interview with him at York, with a view to induce him to throw off his allegiance to the pope; and James accepted the invitation. By the persuasion of his ministers, however, James broke his agreement with Henry, who, in expectation of meeting him, had already come to York; and that haughty monarch resented the affront, by declaring war against Scotland. James was now obliged to have recourse to his nobles for the defence of his dominions. At his command they assembled their followers, it is true; but with the same dispositions which had animated their ancestors in the reign of James III. The king, perceiving their designs, disbanded the army, and returned into the heart of the kingdom. Impatience, indignation, and resentment against the nobles, filled his bosom by turns. He became pensive, sullen, and retired. In order to revive his spirits, an inroad on the western border was concerted by his ministers, who prevailed upon the barons in the neighbouring provinces, to raise as many troops as were thought necessary, and to enter England. But nothing could remove the king's aversion to his nobility, or diminish his jealousy of their power. He would not even trust them with the command of the forces which they had assembled, but appointed Oliver Sinclair, his favourite, to that post. As might have been foreseen, Sinclair no sooner appeared to take upon him the dignity conferred, than an universal mutiny took place in the army. Five hundred English, who happened to be drawn up in sight, taking advantage of this disorder, attacked the Scots; when hatred to the king, and contempt for his general, produced an effort to which there is no parallel in history. Ten thousand men fled before an army so vastly inferior, without striking a blow. About thirty were killed; above a thousand were taken prisoners, and among them one hundred and sixty persons of condition. The small number of the English prevented their taking more prisoners.

As soon as this affair reached the king, all the violent passions which are the enemies of life preyed on his mind; the deepest melancholy and despair succeeded to the furious transports of his rage. Death relieved him from his anxiety; but whether from the diseases of his mind, or by poison, is not sufficiently ascertained. It took place in December, 1542.

CHAPTER III.

The Reign of MARY.—House of Stuart.

A.D. 1542.—MARY, only child of James V. and Mary of Guise, who was born only a few days before the death of her father, succeeded to the crown. The situation in which he left the kingdom, and the perils to be apprehended from a lengthened regency, alarmed all ranks of men with the prospect of a turbulent and disastrous reign.

Cardinal Beaton, who for many years had been considered as prime minister, was the first that claimed the high dignity of regent; in support of his pretensions, he produced a will, which he himself had forged in the name of the late king, and, without any other right, instantly assumed the title of regent. He hoped, by the assistance of the clergy, the countenance of France, the connivance of the queen dowager, and the support of the whole popish faction, to hold by force what he had seized on by fraud. But Beaton had enjoyed power too long to be a favourite of the nation. James Hamilton, earl of Arran, the next heir to the queen, was called forth, by the general voice of the nation, to take upon himself the high office; and the nobles, who were assembled for that purpose, unanimously proclaimed him regent.

The earl of Arran had scarcely taken possession of his new dignity, when a negotiation was opened with England, which gave rise to events of the most fatal consequence to himself, and to the kingdom. This negotiation embraced a proposal from Henry, of the marriage of Edward, his only son, with the young queen of Scots. All those who feared the cardinal, or who desired a change in religion, were pleased with the idea of an alliance that would afford protection to the doctrine which they had embraced, as well as to their own persons, against the rage of that powerful and haughty prelate.

The designs which Henry had formed upon Scotland, were obvious from the marriage which he had proposed, and he had not dexterity enough to disguise them. He demanded that the young queen should be put under his care, and the government of the kingdom placed in his hands during her minority.

The Scots parliament consented to a treaty of marriage and of union, but upon terms somewhat more equal. The Scots agreed to send their sovereign into England as soon as she had attained the age of ten years; and to deliver six persons of the first rank, to be kept as hostages by Henry till the queen's arrival at his court. On the side of Henry, it was agreed that the queen should continue to reside in Scotland, and himself remain excluded from any share in the government of the kingdom.

The cardinal complained loudly that the regent had betrayed the kingdom to its most inveterate enemies, and sacrificed its honour to his own ambition; he lamented to see an ancient kingdom consenting to its own servitude, and descending into the ignominious station of a province; and in one hour, the weakness or treachery of one man, surrendering every thing for which the Scottish nation had struggled and fought during so many ages. These remonstrances of the cardinal were not without effect, and the whole nation declared against the alliance which had been concluded.

Argyll, Huntley, Bothwell, and other powerful barons, declared openly against the alliance with England. By their assistance the cardinal seized on the persons of the young queen and her mother.

On the 25th of August, 1543, the regent ratified the treaty with Henry, and proclaimed the cardinal, who still continued to oppose it, an enemy to his country. On the 3rd of September, he secretly withdrew from Edinburgh, and had an interview with the cardinal at Callander, where he not only renounced the friendship of England, and declared for the interests of France, but also changed his sentiments concerning religion, and publicly renounced the doctrine of the reformers in the Franciscan church at Stirling.

The cardinal was now in possession of every thing his ambition could desire, and exercised all the authority of a regent, without the envy and opprobrium attached to the name. Henry VIII. was not of a temper to bear tamely the indignity with which he had been treated both by the regent and the parliament of Scotland, and determined on invading that country. The earl of Hertford had the command of the army destined for the enterprise, and landed it, without opposition, a few miles above Leith. He marched directly for Edinburgh, which city he entered May 8th, 1544. After plundering the adjacent country, he set fire to both the towns; then putting his booty on board the fleet, reached the English borders in safety. Peace followed soon after; but cardinal Beaton had previously been murdered by the means of Norman Leslie, eldest son of the earl of Rothes, whom the cardinal had treated not only with injustice, but contempt.

The prelate resided at that time in the castle of St. Andrew's, which he had fortified at a great expense, and, in the opinion of the age, had rendered it impregnable. His retinue was numerous, the town at his devotion, and the neighbouring country full of his dependents. In this situation Leslie, with fifteen others, undertook to surprise his castle, and assassinate him; and their success was equal to the boldness of the attempt. May 20th, 1546, early in the morning, they seized on the gate of the castle, which was open to the accommodation of the workmen who were employed in finishing the fortifications; and having placed sentries round the cardinal's apartment, they awakened his domestics one by one, and turning them out of the castle, they murdered him without offering violence to any other person; thereby delivering their country from a man whose pride was insupportable, and whose cruelty and cunning were great checks to the reformation. The death of Beaton was fatal to the catholic religion, and to the French interest in Scotland. The regent threatened vengeance, but the threat was as impotent as it was unwise.

The death of Henry VIII., which happened January 28th, 1547, blasted the hopes of the conspirators, by whom they were supported both with money and provisions. Henry II. of France, sent powerful succours to the regent, under the command of Leon Strozzi; and the conspirators, after a short resistance, surrendered, with the assurance of their lives, and were sent prisoners to France. The castle, the monument of Beaton's power and vanity, was demolished in obedience to the canon law, which denounces its anathemas even against the house in which the sacred blood of a cardinal happens to be shed, and ordains it to be laid in ashes.

Edward VI. was now king of England; and the earl of Hertford, now duke of Somerset, and protector of the kingdom, entered Scotland at the head of eighteen thousand men: at the same time a fleet of sixty ships appeared on the coast, to second his land forces. The Scots had for some time seen this storm gathering, and were prepared for it. Their army was almost double that of the enemy, and posted to the greatest advantage on a rising ground above Musselburg, not far from the banks of the Esk. Confident of success, they attacked the English, under the duke of Somerset, near Pinkie, September 10th, 1547, who, taking advantage of their impetuous haste, routed them with considerable loss. The encounter in the field was not long, but the pursuit was continued for some time, and to a great distance: the three roads by which the Scots fled, were strewn with spears, swords, and targets, and covered with the bodies of the slain. More than ten thousand men fell on this day, one of the most fatal Scotland had ever seen. A few were taken prisoners, and among them some persons of distinction.

A. D. 1548.—The Scottish nobles falling in with the prejudices of the queen dowager in favour of France, in the violence of their resentment against England, voluntarily proposed to Henry II. of France, a marriage of their young queen, only six years old, with the dauphin, eldest son of Henry II., and to send her to his court for education. Henry without hesitation accepted these offers, and prepared for a vigorous defence of his new acquisition. On the 15th of June, 1548, the treaty was concluded by the parliament assembled in the camp before Haddington; and Mary was immediately sent to France, at that time notoriously the most corrupt court in Europe. Here she acquired every accomplishment that could add to her charms as a woman, and contracted many of those prejudices which occasioned her misfortunes as a queen.

Peace was soon afterwards made with England; and both the British and Scottish nations lost power by this unhappy quarrel, while France obtained a decided advantage. The reformation, however, gained ground. At this time appeared the famous John Knox, a man whose natural intrepidity of mind placed him above fear. He began his public ministry at St. Andrew's, in 1547, with that success which always accompanies a bold and popular eloquence. He was patronised by the conspirators while they kept possession of the castle, which he made the place of his abode.

At this time the queen dowager, Mary of Guise, aspired at the office of regent. She had already nearly engrossed the administration of affairs into her hands. Her designs were concealed with the utmost care, and advanced by address and refinement; her brothers entered warmly into the scheme, and supported it with all their credit at the court of France. The queen dowager visited France in 1550: from thence overtures were made to the regent to resign his situation in her favour, which the king of France enforced, by an artful admixture of threats and promises; so that he was induced to relinquish his power, which he formally laid down in 1554; and the parliament raised Mary of Guise to that dignity. Thus was a woman, and a stranger, advanced to the supreme authority in Scotland!

A.D. 1558.—On the 14th of April, the marriage of the young queen took place with the dauphin Francis; and the parliament of Scotland sent eight of its members to represent their whole body at the nuptials. In the treaty of marriage, the dauphin was allowed to assume the title of king of Scotland as an honorary title. The French king, however, soon after insisted that the dauphin's title should be publicly recognised, and all the right appertaining to the husband of a queen should be vested in his person; upon which the Scots' parliament, (Nov. 29), passed an act conferring the crown matrimonial on the dauphin. The earl of Argyll, and James Stuart, prior of St. Andrew's, were appointed to carry the crown and other ensigns of royalty to the dauphin. But from this they were diverted by the part they were called upon to act in a more interesting scene, which now began to open.

The bigoted queen Mary, of England, whose religious persecutions had earned for her a still more offensive name, died on the 17th of November, 1558; and Elizabeth, her sister, took possession of the English throne. In order to gratify the arbitrary caprice of Henry, Elizabeth, as well as her predecessor, Mary, had been declared illegitimate by the parliament; but in his last will he declared them the successors on the throne to their brother Edward; at the same time passing by the posterity of his sister Margaret, queen of Scotland, and continuing the line of succession to his sister, the duchess of Suffolk. Rome trembled for the catholic faith under a queen of such abilities as Elizabeth was known to possess. Spain and France were equally alarmed. Instigated by the impetuous ambition of the Guises, who governed the court of France, Henry, soon after the death of Mary, persuaded his daughter-in-law, and his son, her husband, to assume the title of king and queen of England, and used that style and appellation in public papers. The arms of England was engraved on their coin, and on their plate, and borne by them on all occasions; but no preparations were made to support this impolitic and premature claim. Elizabeth was already seated on her throne: she possessed all the intrepidity of spirit, and all the arts of policy, which were necessary for maintaining that station; and England was growing into reputation for naval power, while that of France had been utterly neglected.

It was absurd to expect that the Scottish protestants would assist to dethrone a queen whom all Europe began to consider as the most powerful guardian and defender of the reformed faith. Yet, absurd as it was, in 1559, the queen-regent issued a proclamation, enjoining all persons to observe the approaching festival of Easter according to the Romish ritual. The protestants, who saw danger approaching, in order to avert it, engaged the earl of Glencairn, and sir Hugh Campbell, of London, to expostulate with her. Without disguise or apology, she avowed to them her resolution of extirpating the reformed religion out of the kingdom; and soon after summoned all the protestant preachers in the kingdom to a court of justice, to be held at Stirling on the 10th day of May. The reformed convened in great numbers to attend their pastors to Stirling. The regent being alarmed at their being so numerous, although unarmed, promised to put a stop to the intended trial, and they dispersed towards their own habitations.

The regent had little regard to her promise. The 10th of May arrived. The names of those were called who had been summoned; and, upon their non-appearance, they were pronounced outlaws. This conduct occasioned an insurrection in Perth; the churches were defaced, the altars overturned, the images broken in pieces, the pictures torn, and the monasteries almost levelled with the ground. A truce was soon after concluded between the regent and the protestants, which was presently broken by the former; and the protestants again took to arms, not only with a view of redressing their religious, but their civil grievances; and the protestant army, wherever it came, spread the ardour of reformation. The gates of every town were thrown open to receive them; and, without striking a blow, they took possession of Edinburgh, June 29, 1559.

On the 8th of July, Henry II. of France died; and Francis, the husband of Mary, queen of Scots, succeeded to the throne. The queen-regent was soon after deprived of her power by the protestants; but the French garrison in Leith refused to surrender that place, nor were the Scots in a condition to oblige them.

In this situation of affairs, application was made to Elizabeth for assistance. She sent to them a supply of four thousand crowns, which was intercepted by Bothwell, and carried off. A second application was made, imploring her assistance. Elizabeth had observed the prevalence of French councils, and had already come to a resolution with regard to the part she would act, if their power should grow more formidable.

In January, 1560, an English fleet arrived in the frith of Forth, and cast anchor in the road of Leith. The English army, consisting of 6,000 foot and 2,000 horse, under the command of the lord Grey of Wilton, and attended by a prodigious number of protestants, entered Scotland early in the spring, and advanced towards Leith, which they invested.

Nothing could now save the French troops shut up in Leith, but the immediate conclusion of a peace, or the arrival of a powerful army from the continent. They chose the former; and Elizabeth not only obtained honourable conditions for her allies, but for herself; particularly an acknowledgment of her right to the crown of England from Francis and Mary, who in the treaty solemnly engaged neither to assume the title, nor to bear the arms of king and queen of England, in any time to come; this peace was signed July 6, 1560. While this peace was negotiating, the queen-regent died; and on the 4th of December Francis II. paid the debt of nature. He was a prince of a weak constitution, and still weaker intellect. The ancient confederacy of the two kingdoms had already been broken; and by the death of Francis the chief bond of union which remained was dissolved.

In 1561, the convention invited the queen to return to Scotland, her native country, and to assume the reins of government. She sailed from Calais in a galley, and on the 19th of August landed safely at Leith, where she was received by her subjects with acclamations of joy.

With a view to gain Elizabeth's favour, and conformable to the plan which had been concerted in France, Mary committed the administration of affairs entirely to protestants. Elizabeth commanded Randolph to congratulate her on her safe return; and Mary sent Maitland to the English court with ceremonious expressions of regard for the queen.

Mary had now been several years a widow, and numerous applications from different courts were made for her hand without effect. The queen of England recommended Robert Dudley, afterwards earl of Leicester, to her choice. The high spirit of Mary could not well bear the first overture of a match with an English subject. She dissembled, however, with the English resident, and married her cousin, lord Darnley, eldest son of the earl of Lenox. The ceremony was performed in the queen's chapel, according to the rites of the Romish church, on the 25th of July, 1565.

Darnley's external accomplishments had excited that sudden and violent passion which raised him to the throne. But his understanding was weak, and he was inexperienced and conceited. A few months after marriage their domestic quarrels began to be observed.

Rizzio, an Italian musician, whom Darnley had at first taken into great confidence, had now incurred his displeasure; and he imputed the change in the queen's conduct towards him, to his insinuations; and Mary's behaviour was undoubtedly such as to confirm and strengthen these suspicions. She treated this Italian with a familiarity, and admitted him to a share in her confidence, to which neither his first condition, nor the office of French secretary to the queen, which she had lately bestowed on him, gave him any title. He was perpetually in her company; and, together with a few favourites, was the companion of all her private amusements. The haughty spirit of Darnley could not bear the intrusion of such an upstart; and, impatient of any delay, he resolved to get rid of him by violence.

Nothing now remained but to concert

the plan of operation, and choose the actors. The place appointed for Rizzio's murder was the queen's bed-chamber. Darnley himself selected it, in order that he might have the satisfaction of reproaching him with his crimes before the queen's face. On the 9th of March, 1566, Morton entered the court of the palace with one hundred and sixty men, and seized all the gates without resistance. While the queen was at supper with the countess of Argyll and Rizzio, the king suddenly entered the apartment. Close behind him was Ruthven, clad in complete armour; and three or four others followed him. Rizzio, conscious of his baseness, supposing himself their victim, took shelter behind the queen, taking hold of her, hoping that she might prove some protection to him. Numbers of armed men rushed into the chamber. Ruthven drew his dagger, and furiously commanded Rizzio to leave a place of which he was unworthy, and which he had occupied too long. Mary employed tears, entreaties, and threatenings, to save her favourite; but notwithstanding all these, he was torn from her by violence; and before he could be dragged through the next apartment, his body was pierced with fifty-six wounds.

Mary was but a very short time without a favourite. James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, a man of base character, gained an ascendancy over her heart; and the king was treated with indifference and neglect. On the 19th of June, 1566, she was delivered of a son. This event did not in the least alter her opinion in favour of her husband; her aversion to him was excessive. Bothwell was the object of her admiration. Henry had for some time resided at Glasgow, where he had suffered severely from illness. Thither Mary went, and prevailed upon him to come to Edinburgh, to which place he was carried in a litter.

The house prepared for his reception belonged to the provost of a collegiate church, called Kirk of Field, and had all the advantages of healthful air to recommend it; and its solitude rendered it a proper place for the commission of that crime, with a view to which it seems manifestly to have been chosen.

Mary attended the king with assiduous care; she even slept two nights in the chamber under his apartment. On Sunday, the 9th of February, 1567, about eleven at night, she left him, in order to be present at a masque in the palace. At two o'clock the next morning the house was blown up with gunpowder. The dead body of the king, with that of a servant who slept in the same room, were found lying in an adjacent garden, without the city wall, untouched by fire, and with no bruise or mark of violence. [For a more detailed account of this dark transaction, the reader is referred to "EWLAND," pp. 332-5.]

The queen and Bothwell were generally suspected of the murder, not only by her own subjects, but by all Europe, over which it spread rapidly, and excited universal horror; but what contributed most to convince the world of her guilt, was her marriage, on the 16th day of May following, with Bothwell. This indecent act excited particular indignation and abhorrence in the Scots; and in one month Bothwell was obliged to make a hasty flight to Norway, where he died in a miserable state; while Mary surrendered herself to the nobles, who conducted her to Edinburgh, amidst the execrations of the soldiers and the multitude. The following evening she was conveyed, under a strong guard, to Lochleven castle, and put under the care of William Douglas, the owner of it, to keep her as a prisoner. In this place she resigned the crown to her son, and appointed the earl of Murray regent.

A. D. 1567.—James VI., at the time an infant, was crowned at Stirling on the 29th day of July, 1567; and the earl of Murray assumed the regency, the good effects of which were quickly felt. He called a parliament, that confirmed the proceedings of the confederates. Here the letters which Mary had written to Bothwell were produced, which proved her to be accessory to the murder of the king.

George Douglas, a youth of eighteen, and brother to William Douglas, who had charge of Mary, was induced, by her affable and insinuating manner, to let her escape. On Sunday, the 2d of May, while his brother was at supper, he procured the keys which unlocked her apartment; and the queen and one of her maids were suffered to escape to a boat on the lake ready to receive her. She travelled all night, attended by Douglas, Seton, and sir James Hamilton, and in two days reached Hamilton, where she raised a large army.

The regent was at Glasgow, holding a court of justice, when he heard of Mary's flight; and her army, already strong, was only eight miles distant. In this dangerous exigency the superiority of Murray's genius appeared, and he was soon in a condition to take the field. Between the two armies, and on the road towards Dumbar-ton, lay Langaide-hill. This the regent had the precaution to seize, and here he waited the approach of the enemy. The encounter was fierce and desperate; at length the queen's army were obliged to give ground, and the rout immediately became universal. Mary witnessed the battle from a hill; and when she saw the army, her last hope, thrown into irretrievable confusion, she began her flight, and never slept till she reached the abbey of Dundrenan, in Galloway, full sixty Scots miles from the field of battle. From thence she escaped in a fisherman's boat to Carlisle, with about twenty attendants. This event took place on the 16th of May, 1568.

Elizabeth no sooner heard that Mary had arrived in England, than she resolved to detain her. With this view she instantly dispatched lord Scrope and sir Francis Knollys, with letters full of kindness and condescence; but at the same time gave orders to prevent her escape. Mary was soon after conducted to Bolton, a seat of lord

Scrope's, on the borders of Yorkshire. She was some time after, on account of a rebellion in her favour, removed to Coventry, a place of strength, which could not be taken without a regular siege.

Wearied of keeping such a prisoner as the Scots queen, Elizabeth resolved to deliver her to the regent on certain conditions. But while this affair was in negotiation, the regent was murdered by Hamilton, of Bothwellhaugh, a person who owed his life to the regent's clemency. Thus ended that celebrated man, James Stuart, natural son of James the Fifth, by lady Erskine, and natural brother to Mary, queen of Scots. He possessed personal intrepidity, military skill, and sagacity. He was a friend to learning, zealous for the reformed religion, and liberal to all whom he esteemed worthy of his confidence and friendship. He was long and affectionately remembered among the people by the name of the "good regent."

A. D. 1570.—The earl of Lenox, father of the unfortunate Darnley, the murdered husband of Mary, was elected regent on the 12th of July, 1570; and in 1571 Dumbar-ton castle was attacked and taken by captain Crawford; a service of great importance to the regent, being the only fortified place in the kingdom that held out for the queen. He was, however, surprised and murdered at Stirling, on the 3d of September, 1571.

The earl of Mar was chosen regent by a majority of voices, on the 6th of September, 1571; but he retained the situation no longer than the 29th of October, 1572, when the earl of Morton was elected; the fourth who had held that dangerous office in the space of five years. James was now in the twelfth year of his age. Alexander Erskine had the chief direction of his education; and under him the celebrated Buchanan acted as preceptor, assisted by three others of the first ability. The nation groaned under the oppressions of Morton; and those about the king infused into him suspicions of his power and designs. The earls of Athol and Argyll were animated against him with implacable resentment: they beseeched the king to call a council of the nobles. James consented, and letters were issued for that purpose. This council met March 24, 1573, and advised the king to deprive Morton of the regency, and take the reins of government into his own hands. Morton immediately acquiesced; and a council of twelve peers were appointed to assist the king in the administration of affairs. Morton, however, gained the ascendancy within a month, and resumed his former authority.

James early discovered that excessive attachment to favourites which accompanied him through life. Eame Stuart, second brother of the earl of Lenox, by birth a Frenchman, and captain James Stuart, second son of lord Ochiltree, were most in his confidence. Both these favourites laboured to undermine the authority of Morton; they accused him of the murder of the late king, and offered to verify this charge by legal evidence. Morton was confined first to his own house, and afterwards in the castle of Edinburgh; and he was soon after tried, condemned, and executed. What he confessed with regard to the crime for which he suffered is remarkable; it amounted to this, that Bothwell and Huntley were the perpetrators, and that the queen was the author of it. Morton was executed in 1581.

The enterprise called the "raid of Ruthven" happened in the following year, when the king was seized in Ruthven castle, by Gowrie, Boyd, Glamis, and Oliphant. This conspiracy, it is said, was countenanced by Elizabeth. James, however, in June, 1583, escaped out of the hands of the conspirators, after upwards of ten months' confinement.

In 1584, the partisans of Mary were hurried in a conspiracy against Elizabeth. This plot was called the Great Plot, or Designment, which she no sooner discovered, than she resolved to take Mary out of the hands of the earl of Shrewsbury, who had had the care of her fifteen years, and appointed sir Amias Paulet and sir Drue Drury to be her keepers. Soon after this an act was passed, which rendered Mary accountable not only for her own actions, but for those of others; in consequence of which she might forfeit her right of succession, and even her life itself. From this period Mary was treated with increased rigour; almost all her servants were dismissed, and she was removed to Tetbury.

Not long after, the inconsiderate affection of the English catholics towards Mary, and their implacable resentment against Elizabeth, gave rise to a conspiracy, which proved fatal to the former. Having, however, taken up this subject at considerable length in Elizabeth's reign, (v. "ENGLAND," p. 342-5), and given all the necessary particulars of Mary's trial and execution, we shall here omit the description of those degrading, yet truly affecting scenes, thereby avoiding needless repetition; and pass on to the next event of importance connected with the court of Scotland; viz. the marriage of James to the princess Ann of Denmark, which took place Nov. 24, 1589.

As the prospect of succeeding to the crown of England drew near, James thought it prudent to endeavour to gain a party in that country. Edward Bruce, his ambassador at the court of Elizabeth, solicited her in the most earnest manner to recognize his title by some public deed; but a general and evasive answer was all that James could obtain. As no impression could be made on the queen, the ambassador was then ordered to sound the disposition of her subjects. In this he succeeded; and many of the highest rank gave him repeated assurances of their resolution to assert his master's right against every pretender.

During the summer of 1600, Scotland enjoyed an unusual tranquillity; when, in the midst of this security, the king's life was exposed to the utmost danger, by a conspi-racý altogether unexpected, and almost inexplicable. The authors of it were John Ruthven, earl of Gowrie, and his brother Alexander, the sons of that earl who was beheaded in the year 1584.

On the 5th of August, as the king, who during the hunting season resided at Falkland, was going out to his sport early in the morning, he was accosted by Mr. Alexander Ruthven, who, with an air of importance, told him, that the evening before he had met an unknown man, of a suspicious appearance, walking alone in a by-path, near his brother's house at Perth; and on searching him, had found under his cloak, a pot filled with a great quantity of foreign gold; that he had immediately seized both him and his treasure; and, without communicating the matter to any person, had kept him confined and bound in a solitary house; and that he thought it his duty to impart such a singular event first of all to his majesty. James immediately suspected this unknown person to be a seminary priest supplied with foreign gold, in order to excite new commotions in the kingdom, and resolved to empower the magistrates of Perth to call the person before them, and enquire into all the circumstances of the story. Ruthven violently opposed this resolution, and, with many arguments, induced the king to ride directly to Perth, and to examine the matter in person. When within a mile of the town, Ruthven rode forward to inform his brother of the king's arrival, with about twenty attendants. No preparations were made for his entertainment; although the earl appeared pensive and embarrassed, he took great pains to atone, by his courtesy, for the common fare with which he treated his guest. As soon as the king's repast was over, his attendants were conducted to dinner in another room. Ruthven told him, now was the time to go to the chamber where the unknown person was kept; and, conducting the king up a staircase, and then through several apartments, the doors of which he locked behind him, led him at last into a small study, in which stood a man clad in armour, with a sword and a dagger by his side. The king, who expected to have found one disarmed and bound, started at the sight. Ruthven, snatching the dagger from the girdle of the man in armour, and holding it to the king's breast, "Remember," said he, "how unjustly my father suffered by your command. You are now my prisoner; submit to my disposal without resistance or outcry, or this dagger shall instantly revenge his blood." James expostulated with Ruthven, intreated, and flattered him. Words had no effect. Ruthven told him he must die, and attempted to bind his hands. James, unarmed as he was, scorned to submit to that indignity; and, closing with the assassin, a fierce struggle ensued; the man in armour standing motionless all the while, and the king dragging Ruthven towards a window which was open. The king then, with a voice of terror, loudly exclaimed, "Treason!

treason! help! I am murdered!" His attendants heard and knew his voice, and saw at the window a hand which grasped the king's neck with violence. They flew to his assistance; and sir John Ramsay first entering the apartment, rushed upon Ruthven, who was still struggling with his royal master, struck him twice with his dagger, and thrust him towards the stairs, where sir Thomas Erskine and sir Hugh Herries met and killed him. Gowrie now rushed into the room, with a sword in each hand, followed by seven of his attendants well armed, and, with a loud voice, threatened them all with instant death. Notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, they encountered the earl, and sir John Ramsay pierced Gowrie to the heart, who fell without uttering a word. His followers having received several wounds, immediately fled.

The parliament lost no time in proceeding against the conspirators. The dead bodies of the two brothers were produced there according to law: an indictment for high treason was preferred against them; witnesses were examined; and, by an unanimous sentence, the punishment due to traitors was inflicted on their dead bodies. The parliament also enacted, that the surname of Ruthven should be abolished.

Queen Elizabeth died on the 24th of March, 1604, in the seventieth year of her age, and the forty-fifth of her reign. A short time previous to her death, she declared to Cecil and the lord admiral, "that her cousin, the king of Scots, should be her successor." This she confirmed on her death bed. As soon as she had breathed her last, the lords of the council proclaimed James king of England. All the intrigues carried on by foreigners in favour of the infants, all the cabals formed within the kingdom to support the title of lady Arabella Stuart and the earl of Hertford disappeared in a moment. Sir Charles Percy, brother to the earl of Northumberland, and Thomas Somerset, son of the earl of Worcester, were dispatched to Scotland with a letter to James, signed by all the peers and privy counsellors then in London; informing him of Elizabeth's decease, and of his accession to the throne. He prepared to set out for London, and appointed the queen to follow him within a few weeks.

CHAPTER IV.

The Accession of JAMES the SIXTH of SCOTLAND, and the FIRST of ENGLAND.

On the 5th of April James began his journey with a splendid train, and entering London on the 7th of May, took peaceable possession of the throne of England.

From this period to the legislative union of the kingdoms, Scotland declined not only in importance but in wealth. Instead of enjoying any advantages by the alliance, it was considered rather as an appendage of England, than as an important part of Great Britain, and it was consequently neglected. Hence, it became a scene of civil strife and national disturbances, rather than a land united in the strong ties of mutual interests and reciprocal attachments. Not that this state of things commenced immediately after the accession of James to the crown of England, or even during his life; but that, perhaps, must be attributed more to the personal attention of the sovereign, than to the transfer of the sovereignty.

We shall in this place introduce the reflections of that able historian, Dr. Robertson, on the alteration produced in the political and social state of Scotland by this event. "The Scots," he says, "had so long considered their monarchs as next heirs to the English throne, that they had full leisure to reflect on all the consequences of their being advanced to that dignity. But dazzled with the glory of giving a sovereign to their powerful enemy, relying on the partiality of their native prince, and in full expectation of sharing liberally in the wealth and honours which he now would be able to bestow, they attended little to the most obvious consequences of that great event, and rejoiced at his accession to the throne of England, as if it had been no less beneficial to the kingdom than honourable to the king. They had soon reason, however, to adopt very different sentiments, and from that period we may date a total alteration in the political constitution of Scotland.

"The feudal aristocracy, which had been subverted in most nations of Europe by the policy of their princes, or had been undermined by the progress of commerce, still subsisted with full force in Scotland. Many causes had contributed gradually to augment the power of the Scottish nobles; and even the Reformation, which, in every other country where it prevailed, added to the authority of the monarch, had increased their wealth and influence. A king possessed of a small revenue, with a prerogative extremely limited, and unsupported by a standing army, could not exercise much authority over such potent subjects. He was obliged to govern by expedients; and the laws derived their force not from his power to execute them, but from the voluntary submission of the nobles. But though this produced a species of government extremely feeble and irregular; though Scotland, under the name, and with all the outward ensigns of a monarchy, was really subject to an aristocracy, the people were not altogether unhappy; and, even in this wild form of constitution, there were principles which tended to their security and advantage. The king, checked and overawed by the nobles, durst venture upon no act of arbitrary power. The nobles, jealous of the king, whose claims and pretensions were many, though his power was small, were afraid of irritating their dependants by unreasonable exactions, and tempered the rigour of aristocratical tyranny, with a mildness and equality to which it is naturally a stranger. As long as the military genius of the feudal government remained in vigour, the vassals both of the crown and of the barons were generally not only free from oppression, but were courted by their superiors, whose power and importance were founded on their attachment and love.

"But, by his accession to the throne of England, James acquired such an immense accession of wealth, of power, and of splendour, that the nobles, astonished and intimidated, thought it vain to struggle for privileges which they were now unable to defend. Nor was it from fear alone that they submitted to the yoke; James, partial to his countrymen, and willing that they should partake in his good fortune, loaded them with riches and honours; and the hope of his favour concurred with the dread of his power, in taming their fierce and independent spirits. The will of the prince became the supreme law in Scotland; and the nobles strove, with emulation, who should most implicitly obey commands which they had formerly been accustomed to contemn. Satisfied with having subjected the nobles to the crown, the king left them in full possession of their ancient jurisdiction over their own vassals. The extensive rights, vested in a feudal chief, became in their hands dreadful instruments of oppression, and the military ideas on which these rights were founded, being gradually lost or disregarded, nothing remained to correct or to mitigate the rigour with which they were exercised. The nobles exhausting their fortunes by the expense of frequent attendance upon the English court, and by attempts to imitate the manners and luxury of their more wealthy neighbours, multiplied exactions upon the people, who durst hardly utter complaints which they knew would never reach the ear of their sovereign, nor move him to grant them any redress. From the union of the crowns to the revolution in 1688, Scotland was placed in a political situation, of all others the most singular and the most unhappy; subjected at once to the absolute will of a monarch, and to the oppressive jurisdiction of an aristocracy, it suffered all the miseries peculiar to both these forms of government. Its kings were despotic; its nobles were slaves and tyrants; and the people groaned under the rigorous domination of both.

"During this period, the nobles, it is true, made one effort to shake off the yoke, and to regain their ancient independency. After the death of James, the Scottish nation was no longer viewed by our monarchs with any partial affection. Charles I., educated among the English, discovered no peculiar attachment to the kingdom of which he was a native. The nobles, perceiving the sceptre to be now in hands less friendly, and awayed by a prince with whom they had little connection, and over whose councils they had little influence, no longer submitted with the same implicit obedience. Provoked by some encroachments of the king on their order, and apprehensive of others, the remains of their ancient spirit began to appear. They complained and remonstrated. The people being, at the same time, violently disgusted at the innovations in religion, the nobles secretly heightened this disgust; and their artifices, together with the ill-conduct of the court, raised such a spirit, that the whole nation took arms against their sovereign, with an union and animosity of which there had formerly been no example. Charles brought against them the forces of England, and, notwithstanding their own union and the zeal of the people, the nobles just have sunk in the struggle. But the disaffection which was growing among his English subjects prevented the king from acting with vigour. A civil war broke out in both kingdoms; and after many battles and revolutions, which are well known, the Scottish nobles, who first began the war, were involved in the same ruin with the throne. At the restoration, Charles II. regained full possession of the royal prerogative in Scotland; and the nobles, whose estates were wasted, or their spirit broken, by the calamities to which they had been exposed, were less able and less willing than ever to resist the power of the crown. During his reign, and that of James VII. the dictates of the monarch were received in Scotland with most abject submission. The poverty to which many of the nobles were reduced, rendered them meaner slaves and more intolerable tyrants than ever. The people, always neglected, were now odious, and loaded with every injury, on account of their attachment to religious and political principles, extremely repugnant to those adopted by their princes.

"The revolution introduced other maxims into the government of Scotland. To increase the authority of the prince, or to secure the privileges of the nobles, had hitherto been almost the sole object of our laws. The rights of the people were hardly ever mentioned, were disregarded, or unknown. Attention began, henceforward to be paid to the welfare of the people. By the claim of right, their liberties were secured; and the number of their representatives being increased, they gradually acquired new weight and consideration in parliament. As they came to enjoy more security and greater power, their minds began to open, and to form more extensive plans of commerce, of industry, and of police. But the aristocratical spirit, which still predominated, together with many other accidents, retarded the improvement and happiness of the nation.

"Another great event completed what the revolution had begun. The political power of the nobles, already broken by the union of the two crowns, was almost annihilated by the union of the two kingdoms. Instead of making a part, as formerly, of the supreme assembly of the nation, instead of bearing the most considerable sway there, the peers of Scotland are admitted into the British parliament by their representatives only, and form but an inconsiderable part of one of those bodies in which the legislative authority is vested. They themselves are excluded absolutely from the house of commons, and even their eldest sons are not permitted to represent their countrymen in that august assembly. Nor have their feudal privileges remained, to compensate for this extinction of their political authority. As commerce advanced in its progress, and government attained nearer to perfection, these were insensibly circumscribed, and at last, by laws no less salutary to the public than fatal to the nobles, they have been almost totally abolished. As the nobles were deprived of power, the people acquired liberty. Exempted from burdens, to which they were formerly subject, screened from oppression, to which they had long been exposed, and adopted into a constitution, whose genius and laws were more liberal than their own, they have extended their commerce, refined their manners, made improvements in the elegancies of life, and cultivated the arts and sciences.

"This survey of the political state of Scotland, in which events and their causes have been mentioned rather than developed, enables us to point out three eras, from each of which we may date some great alteration in one or other of the three different members of which the supreme legislative assembly in our constitution is composed. At their secession to the throne of England, the kings of Scotland, once the most limited, became, in an instant, the most absolute princes in Europe, and exercised a despotic authority, which their parliaments were unable to controul, or their nobles to resist. At the union of the two kingdoms the feudal aristocracy, which had subsisted so many ages, and with power so exorbitant, was overturned, and the Scottish nobles having surrendered rights and pre-eminences peculiar to their order, reduced themselves to a condition which is no longer the terror and envy of other subjects. Since the union, the commons, anciently neglected by their kings, and seldom courted by the nobles, have emerged into dignity; and, being admitted to a participation of all the privileges which the English had purchased at the expense of so much blood, must now be deemed a body not less considerable in the one kingdom, than they have long been in the other.

"The church felt the effects of the absolute power which the king acquired by his accession; and its revolutions, too, are worthy of notice. James, during the latter years of his administration in Scotland, had revived the name and office of bishops. But they possessed no ecclesiastical jurisdiction or pre-eminence; their revenues were inconsiderable, and they were scarcely distinguished by anything but by their seat in parliament, and by being the object of the clergy's jealousy, and the people's hatred. The king, delighted with the splendour and authority which the English bishops enjoyed, and eager to effect an union in the ecclesiastical policy, which he had, in vain, attempted in the civil government of the two kingdoms, resolved to bring both churches to an exact conformity with each other. Three Scotsmen were consecrated bishops at London. From them, their brethren were commanded to receive orders. Ceremonies unknown in Scotland were imposed; and though the clergy, less obsequious than the nobles, boldly opposed these innovations, James, long practised and well skilled in the arts of managing them, obtained at length their compliance. But Charles I., a superstitious prince, unacquainted with the genius of the Scots, imprudent and precipitant in all the measures he pursued in that kingdom, pressing too eagerly the reception of the English liturgy, and indiscreetly attempting a resumption of church lands, kindled the flames of civil war; and the people being left at liberty to indulge their own wishes, the episcopal church was overturned, and the presbyterian government and discipline were re-established with new vigour. Together with monarchy, episcopacy was restored in Scotland. A form of government, so odious to the people, required force to uphold it; and though not only the whole rigour of authority, but all the barbarity of persecution, were employed in its support, the aversion of the nation was insurmountable, and it subsisted with difficulty. At the revolution, the inclinations of the people were thought worthy the attention of the legislature, the presbyterian government was again established, and, being ratified by the union, is still maintained in the kingdom.

"Nor did the influence of the accession extend to the civil and ecclesiastical constitutions alone; the genius of the nation, its taste and spirit, things of a nature still more delicate, were sensibly affected by that event. When learning revived in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, all the modern languages were in a state extremely barbarous, devoid of elegance, of vigour, and even of perspicuity. No author thought of writing in language so ill adapted to express and embellish his sentiments, or of erecting a work for immortality with such rude and perishable materials. As the spirit, which prevailed at that time, did not owe its rise to any original effort of the human mind, but was excited chiefly by admiration of the ancients, which began then to be studied with attention in every part of Europe, their compositions were deemed not only the standards of taste and of sentiment, but of style; and even the languages in which they wrote were thought to be peculiar, and almost consecrated to learning and the muses. Not only the manner of the ancients was imitated, but their language was adopted; and, extravagant as the attempt may appear to write in a dead tongue, in which men were not accustomed to think, and which they could not speak, or even pronounce, the success of it was astonishing. As they formed their style upon the purest models; as they were uninfected with those barbarisms, which the inaccuracy of familiar conversation, the affection of courts, intercourse with strangers, and a thousand other causes, introduced into living languages; many moderns have attained to a degree of eloquence in their Latin compositions, which the Romans themselves scarce possessed beyond the limits of the Augustan age. While this was almost the only species of composition, and all authors, by using one common language, could be brought to a nearer comparison, the Scottish writers were not inferior to those of any other nation. The happy genius of Buchanan, equally formed to excel in prose and in verse, more various, more original, and more elegant, than that of almost any other modern who writes in Latin, reflects, with regard to this particular, the greatest lustre on his country.

But the labour attending the study of a dead tongue was irksome; the unequal return for their industry which authors met with, who could be read and admired only within the narrow circle of the learned, was mortifying; and men, instead of wasting half their lives in learning the language of the Romans, began to refine and to polish their own. The modern tongues were found to be susceptible of beauties and graces, which, if not equal to those of the ancient ones, were at least more attainable. The Italians having first set the example, Latin was no longer used in works of taste; it was confined to books of science; and the politer nations have banished it even from these. The Scots, we may presume, would have had no cause to regret this change in the public taste, and would still have been able to maintain some equality with other nations, in their pursuit of literary honour. The English and Scottish languages, derived from the same sources, were, at the end of the sixteenth century, in a state nearly similar, differing from one another somewhat in orthography, though not only the words, but the idioms, were much the same. The letters of several Scottish statesmen of that age are not inferior in elegance, or in purity, to those of the English ministers with whom they corresponded. James himself was master of a style far from contemptible; and by his example and encouragement, the Scottish language might have kept pace with the English in refinement. Scotland might have had a series of authors in its own, as well as in the Latin language to boast of; and the improvements in taste, in the arts, and in the sciences, which spread over the other polished nations of Europe, would not have been unknown there.

But, at the very time when other nations were beginning to drop the use of Latin in works of taste, and to make trial of the strength and compass of their own languages, Scotland ceased to be a kingdom. The transports of joy, which the accession at first occasioned, were soon over; and the Scots, being at once deprived of all the objects that refine or animate a people; of the presence of their prince, of the concourse of nobles, of the splendour and elegance of a court, an universal dejection of spirit seems to have seized the nation. The court being withdrawn, no domestic standard of propriety and correctness of speech remained; the few compositions that Scotland produced were tried by the English standard, and every word or phrase that varied in the least from that, was condemned as barbarous; whereas, if the two nations had continued distinct, each might have retained idioms and forms of speech peculiar to itself; and these, rendered fashionable by the example of a court, and supported by the authority of writers of reputation, might have been viewed in the same light with the varieties occasioned by the different dialects in the Greek tongue; they even might have been considered as beauties; and in many cases, might have been used promiscuously by the authors of both nations. But, by the accession, the English became the sole judges and lawgivers in language, and rejected, as solecisms, every form of speech to which their ear was not accustomed. Nor did the Scots, while the intercourse between the two nations was inconsiderable, and ancient prejudices were still so violent as to prevent imitation, possess the means of refining their own tongue according to the purity of the English standard. On the contrary, new corruptions flowed into it from every different source. The clergy of Scotland, in that age, were more eminent for piety than for learning; and though there did not arise many authors among them, yet being in possession of the privilege of discoursing publicly to the people, and their sermons being too long, and perhaps too frequent, such hasty productions could not be elegant, and many slovenly and incorrect modes of expression may be traced back to that original. The pleadings of lawyers were equally loose and inaccurate, and that profession having furnished more authors, and the matters of which they treat mingling daily in common discourse and business, many of those vicious forms of speech, which are denominated Scotticisms, have been introduced by them into the language. Nor did either the language or public taste receive any improvement in parliament, where a more liberal and more correct eloquence might have been expected. All business was transacted there by the lords of articles, and they were so servilely devoted to the court, that few debates arose, and, prior to the revolution, none were conducted with the spirit and vigour natural to a popular assembly.

Thus, during the whole seventeenth century, the English were gradually refining their language and their taste; in Scotland the former was much debased, and the latter almost entirely lost. In the beginning of that period, both nations were emerging out of barbarity; but the distance between them, which was then inconsiderable, became, before the end of it, immense. Even after science had once dawned upon them, the Scots seemed to sink back into ignorance and obscurity; and active and intelligent as they naturally are, they continued, while other nations were eager in the pursuit of fame and knowledge, in a state of languor. This, however, must be imputed to the unhappiness of their political situation, not to any defect of genius; for no sooner was the one removed in any degree, than the other began to display itself. The act abolishing the power of the lords of the articles, and other salutary laws passed at the revolution, having introduced freedom of debate into the Scottish parliament, eloquence, with all the arts that accompany or perfect it, became immediate objects of attention; and the example of Fletcher of Salton alone is sufficient to shew that the Scots were still capable of generous sentiments, and, notwithstanding some peculiar idioms, were able to express themselves with energy and with elegance.

"At length the union having incorporated the two nations, and rendered them one people, the distinctions which had subsisted for many ages gradually wear away; peculiarities disappear; the same manners prevail in both parts of the island; the same authors are read and admired; the same entertainments are frequented by the elegant and polite; and the same standard of taste and of purity in language, is established. The Scots, after being placed, during a whole century, in a situation no less fatal to the liberty than to the taste and genius of the nation, were at once put in possession of privileges more valuable than those which their ancestors had formerly enjoyed; and every obstruction that had retarded their pursuit, or prevented their acquisition of literary fame, was totally removed."

There were seven Scottish parliaments called after the accession of James, wherein he presided by a commissioner.

An act was passed in 1606 for the restoration of the estate of bishops; which was followed by a great variety of laws for giving proper effect to the general principle; and there were also many laws enacted for promoting domestic economy. After governing Scotland with considerable success during his occupation of the throne of England, he died on the 27th of March, 1625, and was succeeded by his son Charles I., then in the twenty-fifth year of his age.

CHAPTER V.

From the Accession of CHARLES I. to the Death of WILLIAM III.

DURING the first ten years of Charles's reign nothing occurred in Scotland calculated to disturb the serenity of his rule; but this calm was succeeded by frequent broils and contentions, arising from many causes, but chiefly originating in ecclesiastical matters. Among many laws of a salutary tendency, they passed an act, reserving to the crown those lands which the baronage had wrested from the church; the clergy were thus benefited, the people were relieved, but the barons were offended. Charles, who was attached to episcopacy from sincere religious convictions, as well as from views of political expediency, formed the scheme of assimilating in all respects the churches in England and Scotland. With this view he determined to introduce a liturgy, which in Scotland had never been regularly used; and he insisted upon the reception of a set of canons abolishing the control over ecclesiastical measures which the inferior church judicatories had been permitted to exercise. The violence with which all this was resisted was carried to the most extravagant pitch; the clergy were insulted, and episcopacy was again contemplated as the engine of popery and despotism. The dissensions which soon arose in England cherished this state of mind; the discontented in Scotland made common cause with the disaffected in the southern part of the island; they bound themselves by the extraordinary deed which they entitled "the solemn league and covenant," to exterminate prelacy as a corruption of the gospel; and they took an active part in those violent scenes which ended in the death of Charles and the erection of the commonwealth.

To describe the battles which took place between royalists and roundheads, or to make comments on the hypocrisy and falshood of the times, would be to repeat that which has already found a place in this volume, and which must ever remain the foulest blot in the annals of England. We shall therefore merely observe, that after the execution of Charles I., in 1649, the Scots proclaimed his son king, under the title of Charles II.; and that some months after his defeat at Worcester, Scotland was incorporated into one commonwealth with England.

On the restoration of Charles II., the Scottish parliament assembled, under the earl of Middleton, the king's commissioner, on the 1st of January, 1661. He declared the king's resolution to maintain the true reformed protestant religion, as it had been established during the reigns of his father and grandfather; intimating, however, that he would restore the episcopal government, though he allowed, meanwhile, the administration of sessions, presbyteries, and synods. This endeavour to establish episcopacy was violently opposed, and led to the most cruel persecution of the presbyterians, which lasted, with more or less severity, during the whole of his reign. Numbers were executed; others were fined, imprisoned, and tortured; and whole tracts of the country were placed under a military despotism of the worst description. Driven to desperation, the presbyterian party had several times recourse to arms, and, although in some cases successful, they were finally defeated and scattered at Bothwell-bridge.

A. D. 1685.—On ascending the throne, James II. professed his intention to support the government, in church and state, as by law established; yet his predilection for the catholic religion was evident in his very first acts. Compliant as the Scottish parliament was in what related to their civil liberties, they were resolved to adhere to their religious principles. On this point, indeed, the people of Scotland were unanimous, and they heard of the landing of the prince of Orange, and read his declaration in favour of liberty and in support of law, they hailed his advent with joy. The nobles began to intrigue; the populace, in their zeal, broke out into insurrection against the catholics at Edinburgh; and all classes looked up to the prince of Orange as the deliverer of the two nations from popish dominion. William consulted several of the Scottish nobles, clergy, and gentry, regarding the state of their country, and issued circular letters, summoning a convention at Edinburgh, on the 22nd of March, 1689. When they met, they decided that king James, by his abuse of power, had forfeited the rights to the crown; and immediately declared the prince and princess of Orange to be king and queen of Scotland. This act, which involved such mighty consequences, was attended by a declaration of their wrongs and rights. Former insurrections, though accompanied by many mischiefs, passed away without any advantage to the nation. Though the revolution of 1689 brought with it a civil war, it was the means of strengthening the constitution, of preserving public liberty, and securing private rights. The presbyterian church was now erected on the ruins of episcopacy; the prerogative was restrained to its proper functions; and many salutary laws for promoting domestic economy were enacted.

Although the great bulk of the people was in favour of the revolution, it must not be forgotten that there was a very considerable party that remained attached to the exiled family of the Stuarts; and it was found to be no easy matter to reconcile the Highlanders to the expulsion of their ancient race of monarchs. Many of them were in an open state of rebellion. However, in August, 1692, a proclamation of indemnity had been passed to such insurgents as would take the oath of allegiance to the new government on or before the last day of December. The last man to submit was Macdonald of Glencoe, and he, owing to the snows and other interruptions which he met with on the road, did not reach Inverary, the county town, in time, and the benefit of the indemnity was therefore strictly forfeited. William was informed, and fully believed that Macdonald of Glencoe was the chief obstacle to the pacification of the Highlands, and a warrant of military execution was procured from him against the unfortunate chief and his whole tribe. A detachment of soldiers, one hundred and twenty in number, commanded by captain Campbell, was ordered on the 1st of February, to repair to Glencoe, where they were quartered for a fortnight among the inhabitants of that sequestered vale. On the evening of the 13th, orders arrived to attack the Macedonians while asleep at midnight, and not to suffer a man to escape their swords; an order which the soldiers obeyed with ruthless barbarity. Thirty-eight persons, among whom were Otenece and his wife, thus merclessly perished; the rest, alarmed by the report of musketry, escaped to the hills, and were only preserved from destruction by a tempest that added to the horrors of the night. The carnage was succeeded by rapine and desolation; the houses were burned to the ground, and women and children, stripped naked, were left to die of cold and hunger. This horrible massacre excited universal execration; and, naturally enough, rendered the government of William odious to the Highlanders.

CHAPTER VI.

The Union of the two Kingdoms.

WILLIAM III. died in 1702; by which the crown of the two nations devolved on Anne, who assured the parliament that she would support the government as then established. But they refused to tolerate episcopacy, and they desired to concur in adopting the protestant succession for the crown; nay, they issued a declaration which intimated that purpose, in case of the demise of the crown, to appoint a different sovereign from whomsoever might be the English king. The English statesmen, foreseeing what this was likely to produce, recommended the appointment of commissioners to treat of a union between the two kingdoms. Instead of regarding it as an identification of the interest of both kingdoms, the people generally considered it as a total surrender of their independence into the hands of a powerful rival. Addresses against it were presented from all quarters, and in several places the populace rose in arms, and formed themselves into regiments of horse and foot in order to oppose the union. Nor were the commercial part of the community, who were supposed to benefit largely by it, satisfied with its terms. Notwithstanding every opposition, however, the treaty of union was ratified by both parliaments, and on the 1st of May, 1707, the legislative union of England and Scotland was ratified.

For several years the union was unproductive of those advantages which were at first expected: no new manufactures were attracted to Scotland, and commerce grew more languid than before. But by a considerable assimilation of the laws to those of England, the courts of justice were better regulated, and legal redress more easily obtained; while the barbarous practice of subjecting prisoners to the torture was abolished. It was stipulated by the treaty that no alterations should be made in the church of Scotland; that the commercial laws and customs should be the same in all parts of the united kingdom; that the Scotch royal burghs should retain all their ancient privileges; and that no persons should be deprived of those hereditary rights and offices which they had enjoyed by the laws of Scotland. Looking at these and other conditions of the union, it is certain that if the Scotch would abandon prejudices that ought to be obsolete, and resolve to profit by the connexion, they would soon have ample opportunity of so doing; while, on the part of England, it was evident that the zealous co-operation of her northern neighbour in times of war must tend to the security of the whole island, and in peace contribute to its commercial importance. Queen Anne died on the 1st of August, 1714; and, under the act of settlement, the united crown was transferred to George I.

We conceive it to be unnecessary to carry the general narrative beyond this period; the affairs of Scotland being henceforth detailed, in common with those of England, in the history of that country. But, in concluding this sketch, it appears requisite to give a brief account of the peculiarities which attach to matters ecclesiastical.—In 1560, the Roman catholic religion was abolished, and the reformation was sanctioned by act of parliament; the distinguishing tenets of the Scotch church having been first embodied in the formulary of faith attributed to John Knox, who had adopted the doctrines of Calvin, established at Geneva. General assemblies at that time began, and continued to meet twice every year, for the space of twenty years; after which they were annual. From 1572 to 1592, a sort of episcopacy obtained in the church, while the ecclesiastical form of government was presbyterian. Meantime, the dignitaries of the church and the nobility monopolized the revenues of the church, and left the reformed clergy in a state of indigence. After much deliberation, the protestant leaders resolved to provide a state-maintenance for their teachers, and the following plan was adopted. Two-thirds of all ecclesiastical benefices were reserved to the present possessor, and to the crown the remainder was annexed, out of which a competent subsistence was to be assigned to the protestant clergy. But the revenue thus appropriated, instead of being duly applied, was diverted into other channels. In 1587, all the unalienated church lands were annexed to the crown; and the tithes alone were reserved for the support of the clergy. Bishops continued till 1592, when presbyterian government was established by an act of parliament, and a division was made of the church into synods and presbyteries. But the king, desirous of having the power of the bishops restored as a balance to the nobles in parliament, prevailed on a majority of the clergy, in 1597 and 1598, to agree that some ministers should represent the church in parliament, and that there should be constant moderators in presbyteries. By an act of parliament in 1606, the temporalities of bishops were restored, and they were allowed a seat in parliament; and thus the presbyterian government was overturned. But episcopacy at length grew so obnoxious to the people, that, in 1689, prelacy was declared, by a convention of estates, to be a national grievance, which ought to be abolished; and in the following year the presbyterian government was restored and established by parliament; and the general assembly met, after it had been discontinued from the year 1652. Hitherto the provision for the maintenance of the clergy was inadequate, but their stipends were now raised and regulated by the price of grain.

The presbyterian church government afterwards secured in the treaty of union, is founded on a parity of ecclesiastical authority among all its presbyters or pastors, and modelled after the Calvinistic plan, which Knox recommended to his countrymen. This form of government excludes all pre-eminence of order, all ministers being held equal in rank and power. In matters relating to discipline a pastor is assisted by elders, who ought to be selected from among the most intelligent and consistent of the parishioners, but have no right to teach, nor to dispense the sacraments. Their proper office is to watch over the morals of the people, and to catechise and visit the sick. They likewise discharge the office of deacons by managing the funds for the maintenance of the poor within their districts. The elders and ministers compose what is called a kirk or church-session, the lowest ecclesiastical judicature in Scotland. When a parishioner is convicted of immoral conduct, the church-session inflicts some ecclesiastical censure. If a person considers himself aggrieved, he may appeal to the presbytery, which is the next superior court. The ministers of an indefinite number of contiguous parishes, with one ruling elder chosen half-yearly, out of every church-session, constitute what is called a presbytery, which has cognizance of all ecclesiastical matters within its bounds. Synods are composed of several presbyteries, and of a ruling elder from every church-session within their bounds. They review the proceedings of presbyteries, and judge in references, complaints, and appeals from the inferior court. But their decisions and acts are reversible by the general assembly, which is the highest ecclesiastical court, and from which there is no appeal.

FRANCE AT THE PRESENT TIME CONTAINS 34 MILLIONS OF INHABITANTS.

THE HISTORY OF FRANCE.

FRANCE, which in the times of the Romans was called Gaul, or Gallia, extended from the Pyrenees to the Rhine, and on the side of Italy, beyond the Alps to the Adriatic; that which was situated on the Italian side of the Alps being named Cis-alpine Gaul, and that beyond the Alps, Transalpine Gaul. The part of Transalpine Gaul nearest Upper Italy, and stretching along the Mediterranean towards the Pyrenees, was conquered by Fabius. As this was the first part that was converted into a Roman province, it was called, by way of eminence, the Provincia (afterwards changed into Provence). It was bounded by the Alps, the Cevennes, and the Rhone.
Cæsar, who conquered Transalpine Gaul at a later period, found it divided into three parts: 1. Aquitania, extending from the Pyrenees to the Garonne, chiefly occupied by Iberian tribes; 2. Gallia Celtica, from the Garonne to the Seine and Marne; 3.
Gallia Belgica, in the north, extending to the Rhine. But subsequently, by the command of Augustus, a very different and much more minute division of the country took place, which, however, it is not here necessary to describe.

The Gauls were the chief branch of the great original stock of Celts: and as they called themselves Gæli, the name Gaul probably thus took its rise. A great resemblance appears to have existed among all the Celts; and although they were divided into numerous tribes, there were but few branches that were perceptibly different from each other. The period of their earliest migrations is, however, too remote for history, and, moreover, inapplicable to our present object.

Cæsar represents all the Gallic tribes as warlike, going always armed, and ready on all occasions to decide their differences by the sword; as a people of great levity, and little inclined to idleness; but hospitable, generous, confiding, and sincere. The Druids, their priests, who were the sole de-positaries of learning amongst them, were admitted to the credulity of the people for the deference they paid to them. These priests ruled the people by the terror of their anathemas; they were exempt from all tribute to the state, and abounded in riches. They had also bards or poets, who composed war songs to animate the combatants, and to perpetuate the memory of their heroes. The elders, or senators of their towns, together with the military and their chiefs, formed what we call the nobility; these, in conjunction with the priests, possessed the riches and the power; vassalage and misery were the portion of the commonalty.

The discipline of the Romans, and the genius and good fortune of Cæsar, triumphed in ten years over the valor of the Gauls.—Colonies had commenced the work of their subjugation, and conquest completed it; Gaul became a Roman province.
The municipal regulations, and the agriculture of the Romans, soon rendered the country flourishing; and despotism afterwards despoiled it. This state of things continued for four centuries, when the people were reduced to the lowest depths of misery, impoverished by the proconsuls, the prey of factions, and alternately passing from insurrection to slavery, under tyrants, who were perpetually changing. But the “incursions of the barbarians” on the Roman territory, had by this time greatly lumbled the former mistress of the world.
The civilization, arts, and literature of the Romans were on the decline; the empire, divided and weakened, was falling into ruin, discipline was relaxed; the glory of the Roman name faded before the barbaric hosts that issued from the north, and over-ran the five provinces which had flourished under the administration of a Trajan and an Antonine.

Upwards of four hundred years after the Roman conquests, and under the reign of the weak Honorius, a people known by the name of Franks, from Franconia in Germany, abandoned their morasses and their woods, in search of a better country.
Under the direction of their king Pharamond, they passed the Rhine, and entered Gaul, but carried their arms no further than Belgic Gaul, that part of modern France till lately called the Netherlands.
Pharamond died soon after he had effected the settlement.

The long lists of kings which followed
Pharamond, are divided into three races.
The first is called the Merovingian, from Merovius, the third king of the Franks; it produced twenty-one kings to France, from the year 448 to the year 751, and ended with Childeric III. surnamed the Foolish. The second race began with Pepin, mayor of the palace, who did not take upon himself the title of king; nor did his son, the celebrated Charles Martel. Pepin the Short, his son, deprived Childeric III. of his crown.
This race, called the Carolingian, gave thirteen kings to France. It acquired much glory under Charlemagne, but became very weak under his successors, and terminated with Louis V. called the Slug-gard, after having possessed the throne 235 years, from 753 to 987. The third race, called the Capetian, commenced with Hugh Capet, and gave to France thirty-three kings, who reigned 806 years, and finished

Clovis owed his conversion to Christianity from his marriage with a Christian princess of Spain, and his example was followed by most of the Franks, who until that time had been pagans. He was baptized with great splendour in the cathedral at Rheims; on which occasion the king

He also divided the provinces among his principal nobility, allowing them to exercise sovereign authority in their respective governments; till at length, assuming a kind of independency, they only acknowledged the king as their head; and this gave rise to the numerous principalities, and their several parliaments, every province retaining the same form of government that had been exercised in the whole; and no laws were made, or taxes raised, without the concurrence of the clergy.

A. D. 768.—Charles, his son, called Charlemagne, was valiant, wise, and victorious. He conquered Italy, Germany, and part of Spain, and was crowned emperor of the Romans (the western empire), by pope Leo III. He established a regular and popular government, compiled a code of laws, favoured the arts and sciences; and died with the glory of being beloved by his subjects, and feared by his enemies.

Louis I. le Debonnaire, the only surviving son of Charlemagne, began his reign with the most cruel executions. His children revolted against him; he was compelled to do public penance, and declared to have forfeited the imperial dignity.

The Normans renewed their incursions, and their ravages, under Charles the Bald; besieged Paris in the reign of Charles the Gross; and at length obtained a fixed establishment under Charles the Simple. The royal authority became weakened, while the power of the lords considerably augmented; the imperial dignity was already lost to the house of Charlemagne; and it was soon followed by the loss of the crown of France.

FIRST BRANCH.—The Capetian Dynasty, or Third Race.

A. D. 987.—AFTER the death of Louis V. the last of the Carolingian race, Hugh Capet usurped the throne. This Hugh was the grandson of Robert, whom the French had elected king in the room of Charles the Simple. His father had rendered himself much respected by the nation, in defending Paris against the attacks of the barbarians. Hugh Capet, inheriting the valour of his ancestors, saved France under Lothaire. This family possessed the duchies of Paris and of Orleans; and these two cities, by their situation on the Loire and the Seine, were the strongest bulwarks of the monarchy against the Normans.

Hugh associated his son Robert in the kingdom. Robert, as pusillanimous as his father was courageous, reunited the duchy of Burgundy to the crown; but his weakness tarnished his virtue.

A. D. 1031.—Henry I., who had the misfortune to see his own mother armed against him, to deprive him of his crown and give it to his brother, with the assistance of the duke of Normandy, forced his brother to content himself with Burgundy, which this branch of the royal family possessed 300 years.

At this period the tyranny of feudalism was at its height. Overwhelmed with services, tolls, and subsidies of all sorts, imposed by the military or the ecclesiastics, the people fought only to rivet their chains more firmly. Those who lived in the country were called vassals; those of the cities and towns, bourgeois. Neither of them could labour but for the advantage of their lords who often quartered their military vassals upon them. Among themselves the lords were equally ferocious; their declarations of war extended to relations and allies, and the quarrel of a single family was sufficient to involve a whole community in the fiercest war for years together. Thus France became one vast field of blood, and perpetual carnage at length wearied even ferocity itself.

A. D. 1066.—The long reign of Philip I., son of Henry I., is an epoch of remarkable events. William, duke of Normandy, crossed the channel, and effected the conquest of England in 1066, where he established his own rigorous modification of the feudal regime; and he had the firmness to refuse homage to the pope. A jest of the king of France on the obesity of William kindled a war, from which may be dated a long continued enmity between France and England.

A. D. 1108.—Philip was succeeded by his son, Louis the Gross. The first years of his reign were disturbed by insurrections of his lords in different parts of the kingdom; and these insurrections were the more troublesome, as they were secretly fomented by the English king, that by weakening the power of France his duchy of Normandy might be the more secure. These wars between the two countries were often interrupted by treaties, but as often re-lighted by national ambition and antipathy.

Louis the Young, unfortunate in the crusades, at his return repudiated his wife, in whose right he inherited Guienne and Poitou. He died in 1180, and was succeeded by his son, Philip II. surnamed the August.

Philip II. defeated John, king of England, and wrested from him Normandy, Maine, and Anjou. He then went on the crusade with Richard Cœur-de-Lion, to rescue Jerusalem from the Saracens. The two kings succeeded only in taking Acre; and Philip, on his return, treacherously invaded Normandy during Richard's absence.

A. D. 1233.—Philip Augustus was succeeded by his son Louis, VIII. surnamed the Lion. His short reign was not marked by any great events; but he distinguished it by enfranchising a great number of serfs or vassals. He signalled his courage against the English; and died, of a contagious distemper, at the age of thirty-nine years.

A. D. 1226.—Louis IX. surnamed for his piety, Saint Louis, having defeated the king of England, and many of the grand vassals of France, at Taillebourg, conducted an army to Palestine, took Damietta in Egypt, and distinguished himself at Massous, where he was taken prisoner. He was a friend to the indigent, and a zealous advocate for the Christian religion. He died before Tunis, where he had gone upon a second crusade, against the infidels. Philip III. surnamed the Bold, his son, was proclaimed king by the army; he was liberal, benevolent, and just, but displayed no striking abilities. He was succeeded by his son, Philip the Fair.

A. D. 1285.—Philip IV. surnamed le Bel, or the Fair, celebrated for his disputes with Edward the First of England, and pope Boniface the Eighth, abolished the order of the Templars, reduced the Flemings, and made the seat of the parliament permanent in Paris. He was of a lively disposition, but cruel and unfeeling; and employed ministers who possessed all his defects, without his good qualities. In his reign, the states-general, or representatives of the three estates of the kingdom the nobility, clergy and commonalty, were first assembled. Philip IV. was succeeded by his son, Louis X., during whose reign, which was short, the people were burdened with impost.

The two brothers of Louis, Philip the Long, and Charles IV. succeeded successively. Philip signalized himself by a number of wise regulations in the courts of justice. Charles followed his brother's steps in this particular: but the state was loaded with debts and badly governed.

SECOND BRANCH.—House of Valois.

A. D. 1325.—Queen Jane, wife of Charles IV. being delivered of a posthumous daughter, the House of Valois mounted the throne; the states of France having decreed females to be incapable of inheriting the crown of France. This is called the Salic law, from its having been the practice of a tribe of Franks, called Salians, to exclude females from all inheritance to landed property. Philip IV. soon after his succession, defeated the Flemings; but was defeated by the English in a sea-fight near Sluys; also at Cressy and Calais. In this reign Dauphiny was annexed to the crown of France.

A. D. 1350.—John, a brave prince, but without genius or political discernment, succeeded Philip. He continued to war against England, but was defeated, and taken prisoner at the battle of Poitiers. The kingdom became the theatre of factions and carnage, and was drained of its valuables to ransom the king. He had stipulated for the cession of one-third of the kingdom, and 3,000,000 of gold crowns. Not being able to raise this enormous sum, John voluntarily returned to London, where he died in the Savoy, A. D. 1364. His son, Charles, surnamed the Wise, succeeded him.

Charles V., seconded by De Guesclin, constable of France, avenged the honour of the nation, and re-established order in the state. Every thing wore a new face under this king, who was wise, laborious, and economical; a friend to the arts, to letters, and to virtue.

A. D. 1380.—Charles VI. succeeded to the crown; and France, under his government, fell into great disorder. This prince having lost his reason, and recovering it at intervals, nothing decisive could be effected. The English king Henry V. entered France, and gained the battle of Agincourt. Henry, by treaty, became heir to the crown; but died a few days before Charles VI. Henry VI. of England was crowned king of France at a very early age. His uncle John, duke of Bedford, acted as regent, and during his life the power of the English increased in France. About this time Joan of Arc, an enthusiast in the cause of her country, re-animated the valour and patriotism of the French nation. She fought several battles with success; but was at length taken at Compiègne, and burnt as a witch, by order of the English. [See "ENGLAND," Henry VI.]

During this time, Charles VII. reigned only over a part of France. But the duke of Bedford was no sooner dead, than the duke of Burgundy became reconciled with Charles. Normandy, Guienne, and the other provinces which had been held by the power of the duke of Bedford, acknowledged Charles; and the English were compelled to evacuate France.

Charles VII. was succeeded by Louis XI. his rebellious son. He established the posts. He was a bad son, and as bad a father; a severe prince, but a deep politician. Some important changes in the political condition and the manners of the nation were produced in this reign. The royal power was extended and consolidated; the knights and nobles assisting in this, because it gave scope for their exploits. The gendarmerie, or body of permanent cavalry, was formed, and a corps of foot archers.

Charles VIII. who succeeded him, married Anne of Brittany; thereby putting an end to the last of the great feudal feuds of France. He restored to Ferdinand V. Cardagne and Roussillon. He was an amiable prince, and his death was considered as a public loss.

The House of Valois-Orleans.

A. D. 1495.—Charles VIII. dying without children, Louis, duke of Orleans, descended from Charles V., obtained the crown, of which he appeared worthy by his good qualities and his virtues. He commenced his reign by forgiving his enemies, and befriending his people. He conquered the Milanese, which he afterwards lost. He made himself master of the kingdom of Naples, conjointly with the king of Arragon. He made war also against pope Julius II. Gaston, duke of Nemours, and the chevalier Bayard, greatly distinguished themselves; but the French were obliged to quit Italy. Louis XII. acquired glory more durable, by gaining the love of his people, and by his extraordinary affability, than by his wars.

House of Valois-Angoulême.

A. D. 1515.—A prince of the house of Valois-Angoulême ascended the throne after the death of Louis XII., who left an only daughter, married to Francis, count of Angoulême, heir to the crown. Francis defeated the Swiss at Marignan; re-united Brittany to the crown; and conquered Luxembourg. He was the protector and promoter of the fine arts, and a great encourager of the learned. He died with the reputation of being the most polite prince in Europe.

(2 DEFES.)—Gap.

The face of affairs changed at the commencement of the reign of this prince. He joined the league of the protestant princes against the emperor, and made himself master of Metz, Toul, and Verdun. The emperor, Charles V., besieged Metz: the duke of Guise obliged him to raise the siege, and defeated him at Renti. Henry afterwards entered into a league against the house of Austria in Spain: and Philip II. avenged the honour of the Spaniards at St. Quintin. The duke of Guise took Calais from the English; and the peace of Cateau Cambresis terminated the war. Francis II., his son, succeeded to the throne: a prince without any remarkable virtues. He was married to Mary, queen of Scots; and died at the age of seventeen.

and died. Francis II. was succeeded by Charles IX. The religious wars, the seeds of which had been previously sown, broke out with fury in this reign. The massacre of Vassy was the signal, and France presented nothing but one continued scene of sanguinary factions for years. The massacre of St. Bartholomew's day covered the land with the bleeding bodies of the protestants. On the eve of St. Bartholomew, orders had been sent to the governors of provinces to fall upon the protestants in every department throughout France; and though an edict was published before the end of the week, assuring them of the king's protection, and that he by no means designed to exterminate them because of their religion, yet private orders were sent of a nature directly contrary; in consequence of which the massacre at Paris was repeated in many of the principal towns, so that in the space of two months 50,000 protestants were cruelly butchered. From the time of this most atrocious order, given by Charles himself, he was taken ill, and languished with bodily pains, until relieved by death. A. D. 1572.

Charles, dying without issue, was succeeded by his brother, Henry III., who, in 1576, concluded the celebrated "edict of pacification" with the protestants; the substance of which was, that liberty of conscience, and the public exercise of religion, were granted to the reformed, without any other restriction than that they should not preach within two leagues of Paris, or any other place where the court was. This edict caused the Guises to form an association called the "catholic league." This struck at the very root of the king's authority; for, as the protestants had already their chiefs, so the catholics were for the future to depend entirely upon the chief of the league, and execute whatever he commanded. Hence arose another persecution of the protestants, and another reconciliation. In the end, however, the king perished by assassination at the hands of a monk, in the year 1588. Before the king's death he nominated Henry of Bourbon, king of Navarre, as his successor on the throne of France.

THIRD BRANCH.—House of Bombon.

A. D. 1539.—Henry IV. took the title

king of France and Navarre; and his first care was to put an end to the religious disputes which had so long distracted the kingdom. For this purpose he subsequently promulgated the celebrated edict of Nantes, which re-established all the favours that had ever been granted to the reformed by other princes. He was acknowledged by the lords of the court, but opposed by the catholic league, which set up the old cardinal of Bourbon as king, under the title of Charles X. Henry IV., with a small army and little money, was obliged to conquer his kingdom. He raised the siege of Paris, and defeated the duke of Mayenne at Arques and at Ivry. After this success, he presented himself before Paris, and before Rouen, which places he besieged in form; but was compelled to abandon them by the duke of Parma. The duke of Mayenne assembled the states-general for the election of a king of France; but the victory gained by Henry at Dreux, and his abjuration of the protestant religion, overthrew all their projects; and Paris, and the greater part of the cities in the kingdom, submitted to his government. The duke of Mayenne retired into Burgundy; but the league, supported by Spain, were still in opposition in Brittany. Henry declared war against Spain, and defeated the Spanish army at Fontenay-Francoise.

With the assistance of his sagacious friend and minister, Sully, he established order in the finances, and in every department of the state; and whilst intent on reducing the dangerous power of the house of Austria, and rendering still greater service to the people, he was stabbed by a fanatical priest named Ravillac. Thus fell the greatest prince ever known in France; the best and bravest of its kings.

A. D. 1610.—Louis XIII., surmised the
 Just, succeeded Henry IV. Being a minor, Mary de Medicis was declared regent of the kingdom, and dispensed with profusion the riches which Henry had amassed to render France powerful. The queen's favourite, a Florentine, named Concini, governed the state. The lords, dissatisfied with the pride and despotism of this stranger, took to arms; and the death of the favourite calmed the intestine division. But no sooner was Concini in his grave, than another favourite, De Luyne, appeared, possessing more power, if possible, than the former. Louis banished his mother to Blois. The celebrated Richelieu, then bishop of Lucon, effected a reconciliation between them, and received, as a reward, a cardinal's hat. The protestants, much aggrieved by the catholics, took to arms. The king marched against them, and was victorious in every quarter, except at Montauban, from whence he was obliged to retire with great loss. The credit and ambition of Richelieu increased daily, until he was declared minister of the state.
 The war was renewed with the protestants; and Rochelle, the bulwark of the Calvinists, was, after a severe conflict, recaptured by the king. The queen-mother, and Gaston d'Orleans, became jealous of the authority of Richelieu, and, disgusted with his pride, left the kingdom; and the duke de Montmorenci was beheaded at Toulouse. Richelieu died in the fifty-eighth year of his age; and his death was soon followed by that of the king, who was succeeded by his son.

A. D. 1643. — Louis XIV. being only six years old when his father died, the queen, Anne of Austria, was declared regent of the kingdom, and appointed cardinal Mazarine as minister. Condé defeated the emperor at Rocroy, at Fribourg, at Nordlingen, and at Lens; and these successes, seconded by those of Turenne's, determined the emperor to conclude peace. The Spaniards still continued the war. The young king took the field in person at the head of his armies, and Steuay and Montmedy were the fruits of his first effort for military fame. Peace was soon after concluded between Don Louis de Haro, on the part of the Spaniards, and cardinal Mazarine, on that of the French. The cardinal died soon after, leaving the finances in the most degraded state, and the navy nearly ruined. Louis XIV. now took the reins of government into his own hands. He thirsted for glory, and had the discernment to choose great men as his ministers. Colbert and Louvois filled the first offices of the state. The finances, the commerce, the marine, the civil and military government, the sciences, and the arts, experienced a happy change.

The death of Philip IV. of Spain occasioned the renewal of war. Louis headed his troops, shewing a great example of activity and courage; and his conquests were the means of re-establishing peace. The success of his arms alarmed the neighbouring powers, who entered into a defensive league against France. Louis again took the field, and conquered the greater part of Holland, which he was obliged to evacuate through the firmness and intrepidity of the stadtholder, afterwards William III. king of Great Britain. The theatre of the war was soon after changed, and Franche Comté was reconquered.

In the zenith of his conquests, Louis dictated the conditions of the peace of Nimègue; but this peace was soon after infracted. The Spaniards lost Luxembourg; Algiers, Tripoli, and Geneva were bombarded, and obtained peace by making reparation in proportion to the offences they had given.

The princes of Europe formed the league of Augsburg against Louis, of which William, prince of Orange, was the soul. Louis impolitically revoked the edict of Nantes, thereby depriving himself of the services of many thousands of his best and most useful subjects, the protestants, whom he threw into the arms of his enemies. Having so done, he marched against the allied powers. He took, in person, Mons and Namur; and under Luxembourg, Catinaut, and Vendôme, the French signalised themselves at Fleurus, at Steinkirk, at Neuvinde, at Barcelona, and elsewhere.

James II. of England, having abdicated his throne, he flew to France as an asylum; and Louis endeavoured, but in vain, to re-establish him. Peace was made at Ryswick, and Europe once more enjoyed repose.

Peace was of short duration: the death of Charles II. of Spain rekindled the flames of war. Philip, duke of Berri, by the will of the late king, was named heir to the Spanish throne, which he ascended by the name of Philip V. The emperor claimed the crown of Spain for his son. War was declared; and the fortune of arms appeared to have abandoned Louis, who, as well as Philip, sued for peace: but the terms offered by the allies were so hard, as to excite the indignation of the Bourbons. The war was continued; and at length terminated in favour of France, who saw Philip in peaceable possession of the crown of Spain, secured by the peace of Utrecht in 1713. Two years after, Louis died, having reigned seventy-two years.

The reign of Louis XIV. has been celebrated as the era which produced every thing great and noble in France. He has been held up to the world as the munificent patron of the arts, and a prince whose conceptions and plans were always grand and dignified. The true character of kings can only be justly determined by posterity, and the reputation of this celebrated monarch has not been strengthened by time. After every proper tribute of applause is rendered him, it may be ascertained, that, in general, he rather displayed a preposterous vanity than the greatness of character, which has been productive of such baneful effects, that the decline of the French monarchy may be said to have mainly originated from his conduct. It must be admitted that in the earlier years of his reign, Louis was a liberal patron of letters, and many of the most celebrated writers flourished; as Corneille and Racine, the two greatest tragic poets of France, and Molière, the first comic writer; Boileau, the satirist; Fontaine, Fenelon, Massillon, and others. The close of the long career of Louis, once styled by the French "the great," was disgraced by a gloomy and bigoted intolerance.

A. D. 1715. — Louis XV. succeeded his grandfather at the age of five years and a half. The regency was conferred on his uncle, the duke of Orleans, under whose auspices the unfortunate Mississippi scheme, planned by Law, a Scotchman, took place. The king took the government upon himself at the age of fifteen, and appointed cardinal Fleury, his preceptor, prime minister. The emperor disturbing the peace of Europe, Spain and Sardinia united with France, and declared war. The taking of Philipsburg, the victories of Parma and Placentia, and the conquests of Don Carlos, put an end to this short war, which gave Lorraine to France.

favoured the pretensions of the elector of Bavaria. The combined armies of France and Bavaria subdued Upper Austria, and possessed themselves of Prague, where the elector was crowned king of Bohemia. But a sad reverse was soon after experienced. Austria and Bohemia were torn from Charles VII., who had been elected emperor by the assistance of France; and peace was demanded of the Hungarian queen, but refused.

Louis XV. who, after the death of cardinal Fleury, governed for some time in his own person, set four armies on foot, and marched into Flanders. He took Menin, Ypres, and Furnes; whilst the prince of Conti signalled himself in Italy. In the meantime Alsace was attacked; Louis flew to its assistance, and fell sick at Metz. As soon as his health was re-established, he besieged Freiburg, which surrendered. Several campaigns followed with various success, until peace was made at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748.

War recommenced in 1755, between the English and French. In Germany it was carried on with advantage to the latter. Hanover was taken, and the duke of Cumberland made the capitulation of Closterseven, disgraceful to the English. The king of Prussia defeated the French and Austrians at Koblentz, which instantly changed the face of affairs. Hanover was retaken, and the French beaten at Crevelt, by the prince of Brunswick. They were defeated at Warburg, and at Minden, by the English, who proved successful both by sea and land. Spain, alarmed at the many conquests of their arms, joined a confederacy of the princes of the house of Bourbon, known by the name of the "family compact," and the flame of war raged in both hemispheres, to the glory of the English nation, and the loss of the Bourbons. The peace of 1763 put an end to this war.

During the interval of peace, Louis conquered Corsica, after a desperate struggle on the part of that brave people for their independence, under Pascale Paoli. He died in 1774. He was a prince of very moderate parts, and was governed in a great measure by his mistresses and his favourites, who also governed France.

A. D. 1774.—Louis XVI., grandson of the last king, succeeded to the throne, he having, in 1770, married Marie Antoinette, princess of Austria. He regenerated the machine, much weakened by the success of the English in the late war; and the navy of France, in a few years after his accession, could boast of one hundred sail of the line. He assisted the Anglo-Americans to throw off the yoke of the mother country, which they effected; but it was in this war that the seeds were sown of that revolution which proved his ruin.

The war of American independence had, in truth, taught the people of every country to know their power; and in France, the influence of the nobility and the crown had been annihilated, by their contemptible prodigality in the preceding reign. A set of powerful but intolerant writers had also arisen, at the head of whom were Voltaire and Rousseau, who attacked all existing institutions with a wit and eloquence that made them universally popular. The taxes were most unjustly distributed; the clergy and nobility being exempt from taxation, and the middling classes and the poor being obliged to defray the whole.

Towards the close of the year 1788, when famine stared the miserable peasants in the face, the greatest difficulty was found to supply the enormous expenses which were every day increasing. The king was obliged to call a meeting of the states-general; a measure seldom resorted to, but in cases of the greatest necessity. The states-general, consisting of the nobles, clergy, and others, assembled, and commenced their sittings in the king's royal palace at Versailles, May 5th, 1789. They soon discovered the situation of the country; and they also felt their power and their consequence, from the eyes of all France being directed to their proceedings. They bound themselves, by an oath, never to separate until the constitution of the kingdom, and the regeneration of public order, were established and fixed on a solid basis. They declared themselves inviolable, by a majority of 493 against 34; and seemed passionately in love with freedom and their country. The celebrated Necker was dismissed the ministry, and retired from France.

A state of universal agitation was now on the eve of commencing; an awful scene approached—a scene from which we date the period of the French revolution. The citizens of Paris, who had assembled on Sunday evening, the 12th of July, 1789, in the public walks of the Palais Royal, proceeded from thence to the house of an artist on the Boulevard; and having procured a bust of M. Necker, and also of the duke of Orleans, they adorned them with garlands, and carried them through the streets in triumph. When they came to the Square or Place Vendôme, they were stopped by the German regiment of horse, who dispersed the people, and broke the bust of Necker. Some few were wounded; but they soon rallied in increased numbers. The army, which had been stationed round Paris, now came forward in full force with a body of cavalry; and the prince de Lambesque, of the house of Lorraine, at their head. He had received orders from marshal Broglie, to take post near the gardens of the Tuilleries, and maintain himself in that position, without doing any mischief to the people; but they were now assembled in such numbers, and were so tumultuous, that the prince, finding himself hemmed in, and fearful of being cut off, entered the gardens of the Tuilleries at the head of his German regiment, and, with his drawn sword, wounded a peaceable citizen who was walking there. The disorder from that time became universal; the soldiers fired on the people; and what with the shrieks of the women, the groans of the wounded, and the arbitrary behavi-

The general cry was, "To arms!" Muskets, and other weapons of defence, were soon in every hand. The French guards not only refused to fire on their countrymen, but united in their cause. They marched to the Place of Louis XV. to meet the German regiment. They soon came up with them, as well as with some hussars of the Hungarian light-horse, who had joined the Germans. A smart action took place, and the Germans were driven back in great disorder, leaving eleven of their comrades killed or wounded behind them.

On the 14th of July, in the morning, almost every person in Paris was armed; the soldiers mingled with the populace, and all at once a numerous body exclaimed, "Let us storm the Bastille." That instant they proceeded towards it, and presented themselves before the tremendous fortress, by the great street of St. Anthony. M. De Lannay, the governor, caused a flag of truce to be hung out; upon which a detachment of the patriotic guards, with five or six hundred citizens, introduced themselves into the first court. The governor having advanced to the drawbridge, required of the people what they wanted. They answered, "ammunition and arms." He promised to furnish them; instead of which, he caused the drawbridge to be raised, and a discharge of artillery on all those men who were in the first court, whereby many were killed and wounded. The governor now turned the cannon on the city. The populace, burning with revenge, sent for the cannon from the Invalids; upon which five pieces were soon brought them, and delivered to experienced gunners. Three pieces of artillery, under the direction of M. Huln, were also brought into the court of the Saltpetriere, contiguous to the Bastille, and immediately pointed against that fortress, on which they fired with great vivacity. The governor perceiving he could not hold out against such a phalanx as opposed him, threw out a white flag. The besiegers, however, would look at nothing that might lessen their resentment, or excite pity in favour of the besieged. The governor made a second attempt to pacify them, but in vain. He acquainted them, by a paper introduced through a crevice of the drawbridge, that he had 20,000lb. weight of gunpowder; and would blow up the garrison, and all its environs, if a capitulation was not accepted. The besiegers despised this menace, and continued their firing with additional vigour.

Three cannon were brought forward to beat down the drawbridge. The governor then demolished the little bridge of passage on the left-hand, at the entrance of the fortress. Hely, Huln, and Maillard, leaped on the bridge, and demanded that the innermost gate should be instantly opened. The besieged obeyed; and the besiegers pushed forward to make good their entrance, massacring all who came in their way; and soon after the standard of the victors was seen hoisted on the highest tower. In the meantime the principal drawbridge was let down; the populace rushed in, every one eager to discover the governor, and to plunge his sword into his treacherous bosom. One Arné, a grenadier, singled him out, seized, and disarmed him, and delivered him up to Huln and Hely.

The deputy governor, the major, and the captain of the gunners, were also seized. The victors proceeded with their prisoners to the Hotel de Ville; but they were scarcely arrived, when the mob tore them from the hands of those who held them in security, and trampled them under-foot; and De Launay, and the major, pierced with countless wounds, expired.

Thus fell the Bastille, after a siege of three hours only: a fortress that the most experienced generals of the age of Louis XIV. had deemed impregnable. It was begun by Charles V. in 1366, and finished in 1383.

The court, utterly astounded at these proceedings, now ordered the dismissal of the troops, and the recall of Necker. Bailly, who presided at the tennis court, was nominated mayor of Paris, and Lafayette became commander of the national guards. A crowd of the lowest rabble, accompanied by some of the national guards, proceeded to Versailles, and entered the palace amidst threats and execrations the most indecent and revolting. The king was compelled to accompany them to Paris, and to receive from the hands of Bailly the tri-coloured cockade, as a mark of his union with the people.

At this period the famous Jacobin club was formed; an illegal and violent power, which raised itself at the side of the national representation in order soon after to crush it. At first it consisted of a few well-disposed deputies and patriots; but it soon changed its character, and became the focus of insurrection and treasonable excitement.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.—The Limited Monarchy.

A. D. 1789.—We now come to the month of August, an ever memorable era in the history of France. The new constitution was finally ushered into the national assembly on the 1st day of the month. The articles being all discussed, the king accepted it with seeming sincerity, returning the assembly thanks for the title they had bestowed on him; that of "restorer of the liberties of France."

It was not long after this, however, that Louis, probably from finding his power circumscribed, attempted to leave France, with the queen and family, and had actually proceeded near the frontiers, when he was recognized by Drouet, son of the postmaster at Varennes, who contrived to impede his journey by overturning a cart in the way. In the meantime he conveyed the intelligence to the guard. The king was now fully identified. It denied having any in tention of leaving France. He was, how ever, conveyed back to Paris, where he had been but a very short time missed. His brothers escaped by taking different routes.

This attempt of Louis to leave the king dom, irritated the Parisians almost to frenzy, and he was soon after conveyed to the Temple as a prisoner, together with his queen, his children, and his sister, Madame Elisabeth. Here he suffered a rigorous confinement, until he was brought to trial before the national convention; for by that appellation the national assembly was then known. Being convicted of what they termed treason against that constitution which he had sworn to defend, he was con demned to die by the guillotine; which death he suffered on the 21st of January, 1793, with great fortitude, and was buried privately, in a churchyard of Paris; his grave being filled with lime, in order to prevent his partisans from removing his body. Thus died Louis XVI., who if not the greatest of the French monarchs, was certainly one of the most unoffending; but he was irresolute, brought up in the habits of indolence, and of a court famous for its breach of faith. He was, in fact, in every respect, unsuitable to the government of the French nation, whether as a despotism, or a free government; the latter he him self certainly was the means of introduc ing, by the part he took in the contest between Great Britain and her American colonies.

3. The Republican Government.

A. D. 1792.—During the confinement of Louis, the constitution was modelled anew.
The limited monarchy gave way to the re publican government, which took place the 30th of September, 1792. The death of the queen soon followed: the absurd and infa mous charges brought against her aston ished all Europe. But no power could save the once beautiful Marie Antoinette; her doom had doubtless long been decreed;
and she suffered by the axe of the guillo tine, on the 16th of October, 1793, after having been treated with every possible in dignity. A grave filled with quick lime, like that of her husband. This highly accom plished woman, who is described as a model of grace and beauty, was in her 38th year, and sister of Leopold II., late emperor of Germany.

La Vendee rose, and the continent as well as England armed in hostility to the convention, whom nothing seemed to in timidate. Fourteen armies, without ex perience, and merely with the aid of paper money, were set in motion. Custine took Mentz; Montesquieu invaded Saroy; Lille repulsed the Austrians, who bombarded the city; and Dumouriez, making a descent upon Belgium, carried the redoubts of Je neuve at the point of the bayonet. The generals had only to sound the Marseillais ymn, and the citizen soldiery saw in the republic a futurity of peace and prosperity, although the roots of what was called the tree of liberty was saturated with blood.

Lyon, after a two months' siege, nar randed to the republicans, and there are few examples, even amid the horrid scenes of barbarous warfare, of more vindictive cruelty than took place there. The guillo tine being deemed too slow an engine of destruction, crowds were driven into the Rhone, or butchered in the squares by discharges of grape-shot. Barrere sent a flaming account to the convention, which decreed that the walls and public buildings of the city should be rased, and Lyons henceforth called La Ville Affranchie.

The excesses and enormities of this period of French history are almost, in deed, too incredible for the sober pen of history to record. A new calendar was formed; and in order to obliterate the re membrance of the Christian sabbath, each month was subdivided into three decades, the first days of which were festivals or days of rest. A few days after, the munici pal authorities of Paris appeared in the convention, attended by the bishop and clergy decorated with caps of liberty, who publicly renounced their offices of Christian pastors. The bishop of Moulins threw down his mitre, and preached the doctrine that "death is an eternal sleep." Various allegorical creations, such as Liberty and Equality, were deified, and a young woman of abandoned character was enshrined as the Goddess of Reason on the altar of Notre Dame, to receive the adoration of the multitude.

The reign of Robespierre was now in its plenitude: a tyrant more savage and bloody cannot be found since the days of Nero and Caligula. The guillotine was in con stant action, and thousands were immo lated to his sanguinary vengeance. Royal ists and republicans indiscriminately felt the axe; and amongst his victims were Madame Elisabeth, sister to the king; and the duke of Orleans, the king's cousin, who had, in the national convention, voted for the death of Louis. The latter not only died unpitied, but execrated by both par ties, for the infamous part he had acted towards his near relation. This "bold bad man," who had renounced his title, and adopted the name of Philip Egalité, was in his 46th year, and met death with apparent indifference. Under the mask of patriotism he aspired to the throne, but met his just reward (though not for his regicidal and unnatural crime) from the guillotine. Who at that time could have imagined that young Egalité, his son, who had fought under the banners of the republic, would one day be sainted as Louis Philippe, king of the French!

This era was appropriately termed "the reign of terror." But the power of Robe spierre was not to endure for ever. Tal ler had the virtue and courage to de nounce him, in the convention, for his num berless barbarities. The members well knew they held their heads by the slight tenor of his will only; they were herefore gratified by the opportunity which now offered itself for his destruction; they supported the denunciation against him; and but a few hours elapsed between his accusation and his death, on that scaffold where he had so recently sent his victims by dozens. This event, which gave general satisfaction, took place the 28th of July, 1794.

The constitution of the third year, was, soon after the death of Robespierre, in some degree, put into force. A directory, consisting of five, forming the executive power, was appointed; it consisted of Reubel, Barras, La Revellière Lepaux, Merlin, and Treillard; and two councils; the first, of the "elders;" and the latter of "five hundred," formed the legislative part. One third of each chamber was to be renewed annually; and one of the "directors" was to go out yearly, and be replaced by the election of another.

The armies of France had been contending, from the year 1792, with those of almost every power in Europe. Prussia was, indeed, early drawn off from the contest; though it had penetrated the French territory. The republican arms were in general successful by land; and, in the beginning of 1795, they were in possession of all the Austrian Netherlands, Holland, and Germany, to the banks of the Rhine; they were also masters of Savoy on the side of Italy.

Early in 1796, Buonaparte, a young man, till then unknown in the world of politics, was appointed, through the powerful interference of the director Barras, to the command of the army of Italy. No sooner had he taken the field, than victory appeared to have adopted him as her favourite son. His prodigious successes astonished the world. He defeated the Austrians and Piedmontese in the battles of Montenotte and of Millesimo, in April, 1796; compelled the king of Sardinia to conclude a treaty of peace, in which Savoy and Nice were given up to France; on the 8th of May he crossed the Po; on the succeeding day he forced Parma to consent to an armistice; defeated general Wurmsers on the 3rd of August at Lonato, and on the 5th at Castiglione; advanced against the Tyrol; defeated Alvinzi at Arcole on the 15th of November; and at Rivoli on the 14th of January, 1797; concluded the peace of Tolentino, in which the pope yielded Avignon to France; and Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna to the Cisalpine republic, on the 19th of February; defeated the archduke Charles at Leoben; and signed preliminaries of peace with Austria at Leoben on the 16th of April, 1797, which formed the peace of Campo Formio, by which alone the Austrian capital was saved from destruction.

This treaty led to a congress to be held for the adjustment of claims, and to bring about that desirable blessing, peace. Radstadt was the place appointed for the meeting of the ministers of the different powers who were to assist. Fifteen months elapsed in negotiation, which terminated in delusion; and the French plenipotentiaries, Bonnier and Roberjot, were assassinated by some German soldiers on their return to France. Both parties having in the interim recruited their strength, renewed the war.

During the above mentioned negotiation, a plan was laid in France for the conquest of Egypt. They accordingly fitted out a formidable fleet at Toulon, on board of which were embarked 42,000 troops, the flower of Buonaparte's victorious Italian army. All Europe was interested in the destination of so formidable an armament, but more particularly England. Buonaparte, it was generally understood, was to have the command; but the great secrecy with which every thing relating thereto was conducted, baffled all the efforts at the discovery of his real designs. It left Toulon in May, 1798, under the command of Brieux as admiral, and Buonaparte as commander-in-chief of the troops, and steered to the eastward. In June, Malta submitted; and on the 2nd of July, it reached Alexandria, in Egypt; having had the good fortune to escape the vigilance of admiral Nelson, who had been dispatched in search of it as soon as it was known for a certainty that it had gone to the eastward. Alexandria was taken on the 3rd; and the boys and Mamluks were defeated in several actions. Egypt, including its capital, Grand Cairo, was in the possession of the French in twenty one days from their landing.

Buonaparte had landed his forces but a short time before the English fleet appeared on the coast of Egypt. The French fleet lay in the bay of Aboukir, moored in the greatest security; the intrepid Nelson attacked it on the 1st of August, and gained a victory as complete as any in the naval annals of our country.

Buonaparte having brought Egypt under his power, his next object was Syria, for the invasion of which he was in readiness early in February, 1799. He marched from Grand Cairo across the Desert. He took El Arish, Joppa, and Jerusalem, and penetrated the country as far as Acre, which place he besieged. Here he met with an unexpected foe, in the captains and crews of a small English fleet, commanded by sir Sidney Smith, which had come to the assistance of the pacha; and after many most daring attempts to take that city, during forty days and upwards, he retired with considerable loss.

It was during the siege of Acre that Buonaparte first heard of the reverses of the French, and the loss of the greater part of his conquests in Italy. He soon afterwards defeated the army of the pacha of Natolia at Aboukir, and his departure from Egypt followed immediately on that event. He left the government of his new conquest under general Kleber; and, embarking on board a small vessel, with a few of his principal officers, had the good fortune to escape the numerous English cruisers, and arrived at Frejus on the 13th of October. He was received in Paris on the 16th amidst the acclamations of the people; and was soon made acquainted with the external and internal situation of France. He de- plored the loss of those conquests which had acquired to him immortal fame; but he further deplored the state of the coun- try, torn into a variety of factions. An army, unclothed, unfed, and unpaid; a part of the interior of the republic in rebellion; a host of foes from without pressing it on all sides; the finances in the utmost pos- sible state of derangement; and the resources drained almost to the last livre. The quick discernment of Buonaparte told him that nothing short of a grand effort could save France from ruin. He soon made up his mind to the action, and, assisted by a few friends, his generals, and his army, actually assumed the government on the 9th of No- vember; abolishing, at the same time, the constitution of the third year. He was soon after elected first consul, with extraordi- nary powers.

The scene that took place on this me- morable occasion is well worth transcrib- ing:—The legislature met at St. Cloud; the council of elders in the great gallery; and that of five hundred, of whom Lucien Buonaparte was president, in the orangery. Buonaparte entered the council of elders, and, in an animated address, described the dangers that menaced the republic, and conjured them to associate their wisdom with the force which surrounded him. A member using the word "constitution," Buonaparte exclaimed, "The constitution! It has been trodden under foot, and used as a cloak for all manner of tyranny. Meanwhile a violent debate was going on in the orangery, several members insisting upon knowing why the place of sitting had been changed. The president endeavoured to allay this storm; but the removal had created great heat, and the cry was, "Down with the dictator! No dictator!" At that moment Buonaparte himself entered, bare- headed, followed by four grenadiers; on which several members exclaimed, "Who is that? No sabres here! No armed men!" While others descending into the hall, col- lared him, calling him "Outlaw," and pushed him towards the door. One member aimed a blow at him with a dagger, which was parried by a grenadier. Dis- concerted at this rough treatment, general Lefebvre came to his aid; and Buonaparte retiring, mounted his horse, and addressed the troops outside. His brother Lucien also made a forcible appeal to the military, and the result was, that a picket of grena- diers entered the hall, and, the drums beating the pas de charge, cleared it at the point of the bayonet. This truly Crom- wellian argument decided the affair, and in the evening it was declared that the dic- tatorship had ceased to exist; that a pro- visional consular commission should be ap- pointed, composed of citizens Sieyes, Ducos, and Buonaparte; and that the two councils should name committees, of 35 members each, to prepare a new constitution. In the interval between the abolition of one constitution and the creation of another, the consuls were invested with a dictator- ship. Lucien Buonaparte was made minis- ter of the interior; Talleyrand, of foreign af- fairs; Carnot, of war; and Fouché, of police.

The Consular Government.

A.D. 1800.—The new constitution con- sisted of an executive composed of three consuls, one bearing the title of chief, and in fact possessing all the authority of a conservative senate, composed of 80 mem- bers, appointed for life; the first 60 to be nominated by the consuls, and the number to be completed by adding two, annually, for ten years; and a legislative body of 300 members; and a tribunate of 100. Bu- onaparte was nominated the first consul, for ten years; Cambacères and Lebrun, second and third consuls, for five years. Sieyes, who had taken an active part in bringing about the revolution, and in framing the new constitution, was reward- ed by the grant of an estate, worth 16,000 francs per annum.

One of the first acts of the consulate was a direct overture from Buonaparte to the king of England for peace; which was replied to by the English minister, who adverted to the origin of the war, and in- timated that "the restoration of the ancient line of princes, under whom France had enjoyed so many centuries of prosperity," would afford the best guarantee for the maintenance of peace between the two countries. This was of course construed, as it was meant, a rejection of the offer.

The strength and energy of the new go- vernment made itself visible in the imme- diate union of the best leaders of all par- ties; in the return of many thousand emi- grants in the humbler ranks of life; and in the activity which was displayed by all who held office under the consular govern- ment. Buonaparte soon put himself at the head of the army of Italy, and by the ra- pidity of his operations out-generated his opponents. Having made himself acquaint- ed with the position of the Austrian army, encamped in a valley at the foot of Mount St. Bernard, he formed the bold design of surprising them by crossing that part of the Alps, which was before considered in- accessible to a regularly equipped army. It was, in truth, a most difficult and daring exploit, exceeding any thing that had oc- curred since the days of Hannibal; but in proportion to the peril of the undertaking, was the glory that awaited it. The battle of Marengo, which was fought on the 14th of June, 1800, decided the fate of Italy. Moreau, who was at this time command- ing the army of the Rhine, gained the battle of Hohenlieden, December 3rd, and threatened Vienna. These great victories were followed by the conclusion of a treaty with Austria, in its own name, and that of the German empire, but without the con- currence of England, on the 9th of February, 1801.

In this peace, the course of the Rhine was fixed as the limit between France and Germany. Those German princes who lost their territories beyond the Rhine by this new arrangement, were to be indemnified by additional possessions on the right bank of that river. In Italy the course of the Adige was fixed as the boundary between Austria and the Cisalpine republic, and the former power gave the Brisegian and Orsinau to the duke of Modena. The territories of the grand duke of Tuscany were erected into the kingdom of Etruria, which was given to the hereditary prince of Parma, according to a treaty between France and Spain; the grand duke being to be indemnified in Germany for the loss of his territories. This peace was the prelude to others. On the 29th of September, 1801, Portugal concluded a treaty with France; and Russia and Turkey on the 8th and 9th of October.

A. D. 1802.—England was also now disposed to enter into negotiations for peace; and the terms of the treaty of Amiens were soon arranged. France retained her acquisitions in Germany and the Netherlands, and her supremacy in Holland, Switzerland, and Italy. England consented to resign Malta to the knights of St. John, to make the Ionian islands an independent republic, and to restore all the colonies she had taken from France, except Ceylon and Trinidad. France, on the other hand, guaranteed the existence of the kingdoms of Naples and Portugal. The treaty was signed on the 27th of March, 1802; and for a short time the inhabitants of Europe were flattered with the prospect of continued tranquillity.

In May, Buonaparte founded the legion of honour; and soon after, he was chosen first consul for life. He had just before concluded with the new-elected pope a concordat for the Gallican church, the articles of which were—the establishment of the free exercise of the catholic religion; a new division of the French dioceses; the bishops to be nominated by the first consul, and to take an oath of fidelity to the republic. He also put an end to the proscription of the emigrants, and numbers returned to end their days in the land of their birth.

But his extraordinary successes, the adulation of the army, and his elevation, intoxicated the chief consul, so much so indeed, that it was not long before he took an opportunity of openly insulting the English ambassador. A renewal of hostilities was the natural result; and to such an extent did Buonaparte carry his animosity towards England, that on the ground that two French ships had been captured prior to the formal declaration of war, he issued a decree for the detention of all the English in France; and under this infringement of international law, the number of British subjects detained in France amounted to 11,000, and in Holland to 1,300.

A. D. 1804.—In February a plot was discovered in Paris for the assassination of Buonaparte and the overthrow of the consular government. The principals in this conspiracy were general Pichegru; Georges, an enthusiastic loyalist; and Lajolais, a friend of general Moreau, who also was charged with disaffection to the consular government. Pending the trials Pichegru was found strangled in prison; Georges and some of his accomplices were publicly executed; and Moreau was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, which was commuted to banishment to America.

One of the foulest atrocities of modern times was next perpetrated by the order of Buonaparte. The duke d'Enghien, eldest son of the duke of Bourbon, was seized in the neutral territory of Baden, and taken first to Strasburg, thence to Paris, and afterwards to the castle of Vincennes, where a military commission met on the night of his arrival, to try him, on the charges of having served in the emigrant armies against France, and of being privy to the conspiracy of Georges. It, however, signified little what the charges were; he was predestined for immediate execution; and, in defiance of every barrier of international law, justice, and humanity, he was taken out and shot in the castle ditch, almost immediately after his midnight trial was concluded. The prince had the reputation of being a brave soldier and a virtuous man; hence he was the more obnoxious.

The ambition of Buonaparte to obtain the imperial dignity, and his denunciations against England, seemed to occupy all his thoughts; and, truly, these were objects of no little magnitude. At length, on the 1st of May, a motion was made in the tribunate for conferring on Napoleon Buonaparte the rank of emperor, with hereditary succession in his family. The decree of the tribunate was adopted by the senate; and power given to Buonaparte, if he had no male issue, to adopt an heir from the children of his brothers. The title of prince, princess, and imperial highness, were conferred on all members of the Buonaparte family. Thus ended the French republic, under all its phases. It had lasted eleven years and four months—almost the exact duration of the English Commonwealth from the death of Charles I.

Pope Pius VII. now proceeded to Paris, and on the 2nd of December solemnly anointed the new emperor, who himself placed the imperial crown upon his own head. The Italian republic followed the example of France; and on the 15th of March, 1805, having named their president king of Italy, Napoleon, on the 26th of May, with his own hands also placed the new crown of the Lombardian kings upon his own head, and was anointed by the archbishop of Milan.

During his presence in Italy, the senate of the Ligurian republic demanded and obtained the incorporation of the Genoese state with the French empire, on the 4th of June; and the small republic of Lucca was transformed in the same year into an hereditary principality for Buonaparte's sister, the princess Elisa. He was already, also, preparing thrones to establish his brothers.

The History of France.

The threatened invasion of Britain had long been the theme of every tongue, and the people of France had been diverted from all other thoughts during the momentous changes which, with a magician's wand, had taken place in that system of government for the attainment of which the blood of Frenchmen had flowed with such reckless prodigality. A third coalition against France was concluded at Petersburg, between England and Russia, April 11: Austria joined the confederacy in August; and Sweden likewise was made a party to it, and received a subsidy. But the emperor Napoleon felt assured, that while he could detach Prussia from the alliance, which he did by promising Hanover to the king, he had no great reason to apprehend any serious injury from the other powers.

In Italy the archduke Charles was opposed to marshal Massena; at the same time 25,000 French marched under St. Cyr from Naples into Upper Italy, after a treaty of neutrality had been concluded between France and Naples. The Austrian army in Germany was commanded by the archduke Ferdinand and general Mack. This army penetrated into Bavaria in September, 1805, and demanded that the elector should either unite his forces with the Austrians or disband them: upon which the elector joined Napoleon; and a similar course was adopted by the dukes of Wirtemberg and Baden.

Foraking the camp of Boulogne, where he had been preparing the "army of England" for the projected invasion, Napoleon hastened towards Wirtemberg, and issued a declaration of war. The corps of Bernadotte and the Bavarians having marched towards the Danube, through the neutral province of Anspach, belonging to Prussia, the latter power, which had assembled its armies in the neighbourhood of the Russian frontier, renounced its obligations to France; and by the treaty of Potsdam, concluded on the 3rd of November, during the stay of the emperor Alexander at Berlin, promised to join the enemies of Napoleon. The Prussian armies, in conjunction with the Saxons and Hessians, took up a hostile position extending between the frontiers of Silesia and the Danube. But the Austrian armies in Suabia had been rapidly turned and defeated by the French, in a series of operations extending from the 6th to the 13th of October; upon which Mack, in the infamous capitulation of Ulm, surrendered with 80,000 men, but the archduke Ferdinand by constant fighting reached Bohemia. The French now penetrated through Bavaria and Austria into Moravia, and after having obtained possession in November of the defiles of the Tyrol, and driven back several Russian corps in a series of skirmishes, they occupied Vienna on the 13th of November, and afterwards took possession of Presburg. The next great battle, fought at Austerlitz on the 2nd of December, decided the war although it had only lasted two months; and the archduke

Charles, having received information of the event in Suabia, retired through the German provinces, after having fought a dreadful battle upon the Aude, which lasted three days. The battle of Austerlitz, in which Napoleon so signally defeated the allies, was well contested by the troops on both sides. The Austro-Russian armies amounted to 80,000 men, commanded by general Kutusoff and prince Lichtenstein; but 100 pieces of cannon, and 30,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners on the side of the allies, was an irrefragable proof of the desperate nature of the conflict, as well as of the good fortune of Napoleon. An immense number perished in a lake by the ice giving way. Davoust, Soult, Lannes, Bertiier, and Murat most distinguished themselves among the French marshals.

An interview between Napoleon and Francis II. immediately followed, and an armistice was concluded on the 6th. By the treaty of peace of Presburg, Austria yielded its Venetian possessions to the kingdom of Italy; the Tyrol and several German countries to Bavaria; Briegau to Baden, and other Suabian possessions to Wirtemberg. She also recognised the electors of Bavaria and Wirtemberg as kings, and the elector of Baden as sovereign elector. These and other concessions Austria was compelled to make. But during the victorious course of the armies of France by land, she suffered deeply from the naval power of England; the united fleets of France and Spain, under Villeneuve and Gravina, being nearly annihilated by Nelson in the battle of Trafalgar. This took place on the 21st of October.

On the 15th of December the emperor concluded a treaty with Prussia at Vienna, in which the alliance between both these powers was renewed, and a reciprocal guarantee of the ancient and newly-acquired states exchanged. France pretended to give Hanover to Prussia; and, on the other hand, Prussia yielded to France, Anspach, Cleve, and Neuchâtel. Prussia was now obliged to act offensively against England, as well by taking possession of Hanover as by excluding English vessels from the ports under her control. Joseph, the elder brother of Napoleon, was by an imperial decree named king of Naples and Sicily, which had been conquered by marshal Massena, who marched with an army from Upper Italy into Naples, on account of a pretended breach of neutrality occasioned by the landing of the English and Russians. But Ferdinand IV. took refuge in Sicily with his family; and that island being protected by the English fleet, formed merely a nominal appendage to the crown of Joseph Buonaparte. Prince Eugene Beauharnois, son of the empress Josephine by her first husband, was named viceroy of Italy; Talleyrand received the nominal title of prince of Benevento; Bernadotte was proclaimed prince of Ponte Corvo; and Louis, the second brother of the emperor, was proclaimed hereditary and constitutional king of Holland. With the same disregard of political justice, the constitution of the German empire, which had lasted for above a thousand years, was overthrown on the 12th of July, 1806, to make way for the Rhenish confederation, of which the emperor Napoleon was named protector.

Prussia, at this period, still trembling for her own safety, was once more excited by England and Russia to resistance; upon which Napoleon transported his immense army across the continent, and in less than one month he arrived at Berlin, having gained the ever-memorable battle of Jena, in which 250,000 men were engaged in the work of mutual destruction. More than 20,000 Prussians were killed and wounded, and 40,000 taken prisoners, with 300 pieces of cannon. Prince Ferdinand died of his wounds. A panic seized the garrisons, and all the principal towns of Prussia, west of the Oder, surrendered to the French soon after the battle; and on the 25th of October Napoleon entered the capital.

Bonaparte next promulgated the celebrated Berlin decree, or "continental system," by which the British islands were declared in a state of blockade; all articles of British manufacture were interdicted; and all vessels touching at England, or any English colony, excluded from every harbour under the control of France.

Beyond the Vistula, the war between France and Russia was opened on the 24th of December, 1806, by the fight of Czarnewo, in which the French carried the Russian redoubts upon the left bank of the Ukra. On the succeeding morning Davoust drove field-marshal Kamenakii out of his position; and on the day following the marshal renounced the command-in-chief, in which he was succeeded by Bennigsen. This general suddenly transported the theatre of war into Eastern Prussia, where the Russians, on the 23d of January, 1807, attacked the advanced posts of the prince of Ponte Corvo, who engaged them on the 28th at Mohrungen, and by his manœuvres covered the flank of the French army until a junction was formed. After continual fighting from the 1st to the 7th of February, the battle of Eylau took place. The slaughter was dreadful; both parties claimed the victory, and both were glad to pause while they recruited their respective armies.

The next operation of consequence, was the siege and bombardment of Dantzic, by Lefebvre; and general Kalkreuth was compelled to capitulate on the 24th of May, after Marshal Lannes had defeated a body of Russians who had landed at Weichselmünde with the view of raising the siege. At last, after a series of skirmishes between the different divisions of the hostile armies, the decisive victory of the French over the Russians at Friedland, on the 14th of June, 1807, led to the peace of Tilsit; which was concluded on the 9th of July, between France and Prussia, by Talleyrand and count Kalkreuth, after an interview between the three monarchs upon the Niemen, and subsequently at Tilsit. In this peace Prussia was shorn of territories containing upwards of one half of the former population of that kingdom; and from the various districts which fell into the conqueror's hands were formed two new states; the kingdom of Westphalia, and the dukedom of Warsaw. The former was given to Jerome Buonaparte, and the king of Saxony was flattered with the title of duke of Warsaw. Upon the intercession of Russia, the dukes of Mecklenburgh-Schwerin, Oldenburgh, and Coburg, were reinstated; and France and Russia exchanged reciprocal guarantees of their possessions, and of those of the other powers included in this peace.

Never had the fortune of man been more brilliant; the whole world was struck with astonishment at victories so rapid, and seemed to bow itself before so colossal a power. But his ambition was boundless; and under the guise of giving freedom to the world, he became its greatest tyrant. No sovereign could be more absolute; he regarded other men as insignificant ciphers destined to increase the amount of that unity which centered in himself. He talked of the glory of France; but thought only of his own exaltation, and was gratified with the increase of servile adulation. He re-established the impost, the abuses, and prodigalities of the ancient monarchy. The aids and monopolies re-appeared under the name of united duties. The press was kept under by a merciless censorship; juries were perverted; prefects and other petty despots assumed the place of free administrations of justice; the emperor nominated all the public functionaries, and all were inviolable; the council of state, a dependent and removable body, was the sole arbiter of their responsibility. The election of the deputies was ridiculous in this pretended representative government, the laws of which were the dicta of the emperor, under the name of decrees or senatorial edicts. Individual liberty no longer existed; a police, that was a true political inquisition, suspected even silence itself; accused even the thoughts of men, and extended over Europe a net of iron. All this time, too, the conscription, a dreadful tax upon human life, was levied with unsparring activity; and the French youth were surrendered to his will by the senate as a sort of annual contribution.

The affairs of Spain now began to occupy the attention of Napoleon: one of his first objects, however, was to destroy the English influence in Portugal. A French army, in concert with a Spanish one, marched against that kingdom, the partition of which had been concerted between France and Spain, on the 27th of October, 1807; the northern part being given to the house of Parma; the southern part to Godoy, prince of peace; and the middle, on the conclusion of peace, to the house of Braganza. Tuscany was to be given to France, and the king of Spain to be declared protector of the three states, erected out of Portugal; the Spanish monarch was also to assume, after the maritime peace should be concluded, the title of emperor of both Americas. In conformity with this treaty, Tuscany was given up to Napoleon in 1807, and afterwards incorporated with France; and marshal Junot, duke of Braganza, entered Lisbon on the 30th of November, after the royal family had embarked with their treasures, and a few of the principal nobility, in a British fleet, for the Brazils. But, in 1808, the Spanish nobility, tired of the government of the prince of peace, formed a plot to raise Ferdinand VII. to the throne, and free their country from foreign influence. It required no great effort to induce Charles to resign in favour of his son; but this was an arrangement to which Napoleon would not consent; and both father and son now became pensioners of the French conqueror, who invested his brother Joseph, at that time king of Naples, with the sovereignty of Spain and India. The people now rose en masse to vindicate their rights, and that struggle commenced in which the patriotic Spaniards were so warmly and successfully supported by the British under Wellington, during the long and arduous military operations which in England are known as the "Peninsular war."

The war in Spain appeared to give Austria a new and favourable opportunity for attempting the re-establishment of her former influence in Germany. The emperor Francis accordingly declared war against France, and his armies advanced into Bavaria, Italy, and the dukedom of Warsaw. But the rapid measures of Napoleon baffled the Austrian calculations; and, collecting a large army, he defeated the archduke Louis so severely at Eckmühl and at Ratisbon, on the 22nd and 23rd of April, that he was compelled to cross the Danube. Vienna was thus opened to the conquerors, and Napoleon took possession of that capital. The archduke Charles was, however, undismayed; he attacked the French in their position at Aspern, on the 21st of May, and the battle continuing through the next day, Napoleon was compelled to retreat into the island of Lobau, where his army was placed in a situation of great jeopardy, the flood having carried away the bridge that connected the island in the middle of the river with the right bank of the Danube; and two months elapsed before he was able to repair the disasters of the battle, and again transport his army across the river. Then followed the great battle of Wagram, which was fought on the 6th and 6th of July; and in this desperate conflict the loss of the Austrians was so great, that they immediately sought an armistice of the French emperor, which led to the peace of Vienna, signed on the 14th of October, 1809.

By this peace Austria was obliged to resign territories containing three millions of subjects. Salzburg, Berchtesgaden, &c. were given to Bavaria; the whole of Western Galicia, and a part of Eastern Galicia, with the town of Cracow, were united to the dukedom of Warsaw; and other provinces, with part of the kingdom of Italy, were destined to form the new state of the Illyrian provinces; while Austria was absolutely cut off from all communication with the sea, by the loss of her ports on the Adriatic.

The Tyrolese, who had been transferred to the king of Bavaria by the treaty of Presburg, finding that their ancient immunities and privileges had been violated, and that they were crushed by severe taxation, seized the opportunity of the Austrian war to raise the standard of revolt; and in their early operations they expelled the Bavarians from the principal towns. A French army entered the country and laid it waste with fire and sword; and the Tyrolese, animated by an heroic peasant named Hoffer, expelled the invaders once more, and secured a brief interval of tranquillity. The results of the battle of Wagram, however, gave the French and Bavarian forces an opportunity of overwhelming them; they penetrated their mountain fastnesses, desolated the land, executed the leading patriots as rebels, and the land was again subjected to the tyranny of Maximilian Joseph, the puppet of Napoleon. Several efforts were simultaneously made in Germany to shake off the French yoke; but after the overthrow of the Austrians there were no longer any hopes for them, and the emperor of the French exercised an almost unlimited power over the northern part of continental Europe.

In this concise history we are obliged to pass over those transactions which we have recorded elsewhere, and shall therefore not enter further than is absolutely necessary upon the particulars of the peninsular contest, the chief events of which are given under "England" and "Spain." This, in fact, should be borne in mind, generally, while turning over the subsequent pages; for, during the long war in which England and France were the principal belligerents, such were the alliances on both sides, that the leading events properly belonging to other countries, were too involved in the affairs of England to be there omitted; and where space can so ill be spared, though the reader may sometimes find a "thrice told tale," we wish to take credit for the avoidance, as far as is possible, of tautology.

During Napoleon's residence at Vienna, he abolished the temporal power of the pope, and united the remaining territories of the states of the church with France, to which he had previously united Piedmont, Liguria, Tuscany, and Parma, besides Savoy and Nice. A pension was assigned to his holiness, and the city of Rome declared an imperial and free city. The pope was conducted to Fontainebleau, where Napoleon concluded a second concordat with him, in which, though the pope did not resume his temporal jurisdiction, he obtained the right to keep ambassadors at foreign courts, to receive bishops, and to appoint to certain bishoprics.

One of the consequences of the peace of Vienna was the dissolution of the marriage between Napoleon and Josephine, which took place in December, 1809; and his second marriage; with the archduchess Maria Louisa, daughter of the emperor of Austria, in April, 1810. And when Napoleon declared the papal territory a province of France, and Rome a city of the empire, he determined that the heir apparent of France should bear the title of king of Rome, and that the emperor of France should be crowned in Rome within the first ten years of his government. The firmness with which he was opposed in Spain; the perseverance of Great Britain in maintaining the orders in council, to counteract the decrees of Berlin and Milan; and the daily increasing prospect of an approaching war in the North, where longer submission to the arbitrary mandates of Napoleon was refused, did not augur favourably for the future stability of his vast power. The British also carried on an important commerce with Russia, through Gottenburg and the ports of the Baltic, of which complaints was made to the courts of Stockholm and Petersburg. The commercial policy of Russia in 1810 and 1811, and its disapprobation of the treatment of the duke of Oldenburg, (a near relation of the emperor Alexander), had excited the distrust of Napoleon; and he spoke the language of offended confidence in remonstrating with "his brother the emperor."

At length Russia and Sweden made common cause with Great Britain in opposing Napoleon's darling "continental system;" while the latter arrayed under his banners the military strength of western and southern Europe, and, trusting to the vast number of his victorious legions, he crossed the Niemen, and directed his march to the capital of Lithuania. As the French advanced, the Russians retired, wasting the country in their retreat. Napoleon then with his main body marched upon Moscow, while a large division of his forces menaced the road to St. Petersburg. But the main force of the invaders advanced to Smolensko, which was justly regarded as the bulwark of Moscow. This strongly fortified position was taken by storm on the 17th of August, after a brief but bloody struggle; the Russian general, Barclay de Tolly, firing the town on his retreat.

But Moscow was not to be abandoned without another effort. Kutusoff, who now assumed the command of the Russians, fixed upon a position near the village of Borodino; and there firmly awaited the invading host. Nearly seventy thousand men fell in this furious and sanguinary conflict; and as the French were joined by new reinforcements after the battle, Napoleon entered Moscow, and took up his residence in the Kremlin, the ancient palace of the czars. The citizens, however, under the direction, or with the sanction, of the governor Rostopchin, not only determined to abandon their beloved metropolis, but to consign it to the flames; and scarcely had the French troops congratulated themselves on having secured winter quarters in that cold and inhospitable region, ere the conflagrations burst forth in every direction; and notwithstanding every device was tried to subdue the flames, they ceased not until more than three-fourths of the city were a mass of smoking embers.

In this unexpected and embarrassing position, Napoleon gave orders for a retreat. All the horrors that the imagination can conceive were now felt by the hapless fugitives, who so lately were the boasted conquerors of southern Europe. The winter had set in unusually early, and brave as the French soldiers were, the climate of Russia was an enemy too powerful for them to contend with. Thousands upon thousands perished with cold and hunger; thousands upon thousands fell beneath the swords of their relentless pursuers, who, maddened by the recollection that their hearths and homes had been polluted by these invaders, and that their ancient city lay smouldering in the dust, heeded not their cries for mercy. But why should we repeat the tale of horrors? Suffice it to say, that the wreck of this mighty army retreated through Prussia and Poland, into Saxony; while Napoleon, bent on providing for his own personal safety, and anxious to devise some new plan by which the progress of the enraged enemy might be impeded, hastened to Paris with all the speed that post horses could effect, and with all the comfort that a close carriage and fur garments could bestow.

Napoleon appealed to the senate for men, money, and the other munitions of war, and his appeal was promptly responded to. Notwithstanding his recent reverses, he felt that he still possessed the confidence of the French nation; and a large conscription was ordered to supply the losses of the late campaign: as soon, therefore, as the new levies were organized, he hastened to the north; and, to the astonishment of all Europe, the army under his command was numerically superior to those of his adversaries. The public voice in Prussia loudly demanded war with France, and the Prussian monarch took courage to assert his independence and enter into alliance with Alexander. The armies of these newly-united powers sustained a considerable loss at Lutten on the 2nd of May, and at Bautzen on the 21st and 22nd, in engagements with the French, but neither battle was decisive; and Napoleon, alarmed by the magnitude of his losses, and the obstinacy of his enemies, consented to an armistice. During the truce the British government encouraged the allies by large subsidies; but what was of most consequence, the emperor of Austria, who had never cordially assented to an alliance with his son-in-law, now abandoned his cause, and took an active part in the confederation against him.

Napoleon established his head-quarters at Dresden, and commenced a series of operations against his several foes, which at first were successful; but the tide of fortune turned; different divisions of his army were successively defeated; and he collected his scattered forces for one tremendous effort, which was to decide the fate of Europe. Retiring to Leipzig, he there made a stand, and under the walls of that ancient city he sustained a terrible defeat, Oct. 18, the Saxon troops in his service having deserted in a body to the allies during the engagement. Compelled to evacuate Leipzig, he retreated upon the Rhine, followed by the allied troops; and after a severe struggle at Hanau, Oct. 30, in which the Bavarians, under the command of general Frey, took a decisive part against the French, they were defeated, and multitudes were made prisoners. Bernadotte undertook the task of expelling the French from Saxony. The sovereign governments in the kingdom of Westphalia, the grand dukedom of Frankfurt and Berg, and the countries of the princes of Isenburg and Vonder Leyen, were now overturned; the elector of Hesse-Cassel, the duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbittel, and the duke of Oldenburg, returned to their own country; the Hanoverians again acknowledged their old paternal government; and the Russian administration was re-introduced into the provinces between the Rhine and the Elbe. Considerable masses of troops, partly volunteers, and partly drafted from the Prussian militia, enthusiastically followed the Austrians, Russians, and Prussians, across the Rhine. The flame of independence spread to Holland, the yoke of France was spurned, and the hereditary claims of the house of Orange were rapturously acknowledged.

A. D. 1814.—While the allies were thus effecting the humiliation of Napoleon by following up their successes to the very gates of Paris, Wellington's army advanced slowly but steadily towards Bayonne. As he advanced, the old partisans of the Bourbons began to revive, the exiled family was proclaimed, and the white flag floated on the walls of Bordeaux. Napoleon had the advantage over Blucher at Brienne on the 29th of January, but was forced to retreat at La Rochière, where the allies had concentrated their forces. He now retired between the Loire and the Marne, with the view of covering Paris; and it was not without difficulty that Blucher succeeded in penetrating the French line. But the order of march was still "forward! forward!"

On the 31st of March, 1814, the allied troops entered Paris, and Alexander declared, in the name of the allied sovereigns, that they would not negotiate with Napoleon Buonaparte, nor with any of his family; that they acknowledged the right of France only to the territory embraced within its ancient limits under its kings; and, finally, that they would acknowledge and guarantee the government which the French nation should adopt. They therefore invited the senate to establish a provisory government for the administration of the country and the preparation of a constitution. Accordingly, the senate assembled April 1, under the able presidency of Talleyrand, (a man ever skilful in taking advantage of circumstances), whom, with four other members, they charged with the provisory government. On the next day, it declared that Napoleon and his family had forfeited the throne of France. The legislative body ratified this decree; and the recall of Louis XVIII. to the throne of France was soon after made known. Meanwhile, April 11, Napoleon had resigned the crown conditionally in favour of his son, at Fontainebleau; and a treaty was concluded the same day, ceding to him the island of Elba.

Wearied with the imperial yoke, and with continual war, France hailed the return of peace with acclamations of joy and hope. The senators, in conjunction with some others, formed a chamber of peers. At the same time was convened the legislative body of the empire, which formed the chamber of deputies; and Louis, who had declared his determination to adopt a liberal constitution, granted the charter, which, notwithstanding some omissions and imperfections, contained sufficient guarantees for liberty. The new constitutional charter was presented to the nation by the king on the 4th of June. It contained the principles of a limited monarchy; as, the equality of all Frenchmen in the eye of the law; the equal obligation of all to contribute to the expenses of the state; the equal right of all Frenchmen to all offices; personal liberty; the free exercise of religion, and the liberty of the press; the security of property; oblivion of the past; and the suppression of the conscription. The person of the king (in whom was vested the executive power, the command of the forces of the kingdom, the right of declaring war and making peace, of appointing officers, and proposing and publishing the laws) was declared to be inviolable; the legislative power was vested in him in conjunction with the two chambers; laws relating to imposts and taxes were required to be presented first to the chamber of deputies; and the legislature was required to grant the civil list of the king for the period of his reign. The king convoked the chambers, named the peers, hereditary or personal, prorogued the chambers, and dissolved the chamber of deputies, but was required to summon a new one within three months. The chamber of deputies was to be composed of deputies chosen by the electoral colleges, one fifth part to be renewed yearly; to be eligible as a deputy, it was necessary to be forty years old, and pay 1000 francs of direct taxes. On the 14th of May Louis created the new ministry, and on the 3rd of August a new council of state. The royal orders of the Holy Ghost, of military merit, the order of St. Louis, and that of St. Michael, were revived; the legion of honour received a new decoration (the portrait of Henry IV.) and a new organization, and the order of the silver lily was founded.

There were still, however, many pre-ju-deeds in favour of the abdicated emperor to overcome, and many restless spirits to soothe. It was soon perceived that a great difference of opinion prevailed among the members of the royal family and among the ministers. The honours conferred on the old nobility and the emigrants who had returned with the court, excited great discontent; and the national pride was offended by the public declaration of the king, that he owed his crown to the prince regent of Great Britain. The army, so long used to war and the rewards which awaited a successful career, was in a state of the highest irritation; the remembrance of him by whom they had so often been led to victory was yet fresh, when they saw their corps dissolved, their dotations, their pay, and their pensions diminished, their importance and their influence destroyed, and they themselves compelled to change their favourite badges for others, on which they had formerly trampled. The holders of the national domains feared to lose them. The people were discontented with the burden of the taxes, the alleviation of which had been promised to them. In this state of public feeling nothing could be more fatal for the royal government than the sudden re-appearance of Napoleon on the coast of France, the 1st of March, 1815. These circumstances explain why, without the existence of an actual conspiracy in favour of Napoleon, the measures taken to oppose his progress were unsuccessful; why the army and a great part of the nation declared for him; and why, after a march of eighteen days, which resembled a triumph, he was able to enter Paris without shedding a drop of blood.

The king and his adherents left the country. Napoleon immediately annulled most of the royal ordinances, dissolved the two chambers, and named a new ministry. He declared that he should content himself with the limits of France, as settled by the peace of Paris, and that he would establish his government on liberal principles. But he could not satisfy the expectations of the different parties; much less could he avert the danger of a new war with Europe.

As soon as the news of Napoleon's landing in France was known at Vienna, the ministers of all the allied powers, who were assembled in congress there, denounced him as the enemy and disturber of the repose of the world; and declared that the powers were firmly resolved to employ all means, and unite all their efforts, to maintain the treaty of Paris. For this purpose, Austria, Russia, Britain, and Prussia concluded a new treaty, on the basis of that of March 1st, 1814, whereby each power agreed to bring 150,000 men into the field against Napoleon; who, on his part, was indefatigable in making preparations for war. At the same time, April 22, he published the additional act to the constitutions of the empire, and summoned the meeting of the Champ de Mai, which accepted that act, June 1.

As we gave in the "History of England"

a succinct account of the operations of the French and allied armies, which ended in the battle of Waterloo; as also the deportation of Napoleon to St. Helena, and the events which immediately followed the second restoration of Louis XVIII., we shall not repeat them in this place; but carry on our narrative to the period when the two chambers passed the law of amnesty proposed by the king, by which all those who had voted for the death of Louis XVI., or had accepted offices from Napoleon, during the "hundred days," were for ever banished from the kingdom.

With the evacuation of the French territory by the foreign troops, which was determined on by the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, the 9th of October, 1818, and accomplished in the course of the same year, was connected the payment of the expenses of the war, and of the individual claims of the subjects of foreign powers on the French government and nation. Here French diplomacy was successful; and ultimately a very small proportion of the real claims was accepted as a liquidation of the whole. France was now admitted into the alliance of the great European powers; and the old royalist spirit continued to revive. While strict monarchical principles were gradually gaining strength and influence in all departments of the domestic administration, the French cabinet entered more and more deeply into the continental system of the great European powers. But the return of France to royalty, and in a great measure the ancien regime, was far from satisfactory to the bulk of the people; and the government was kept in a continual state of oscillation,—now a set of ultra-royalists, and now the liberal party, directing the national councils.

While strict monarchical principles were gradually gaining strength and influence in all departments of the domestic administration, the French cabinet entered more deeply into the continental system of the great European powers. The election laws were found too favourable to the liberal party, and the ministry therefore proposed a new election law, for the purpose of giving the richest land-holders the preponderance in the elections of the deputies, and, at the same time, some laws of exception, relative to personal liberty and the liberty of the press, for the purpose of checking public opinion. Under these circumstances much acrimonious discussion took place in the French chambers; and the sessions of 1819 and 1820 were agitated by the most violent conflicts. The two parties attacked each other with reciprocal accusations, and Decazes, the president of the ministry, had already proposed several bills, calculated to gain over the moderate of both sides to the ministry, when, in February, 1820, the assassination of the duke of Berri by Louvel (who to the last moment of his life expressed his fierce hatred of the whole Bourbon race, and his detestation of royalty) drew forth the most virulent accusations from the extreme right. cases resigned, and the duke of Richelieu succeeded him. A new law of election was carried, amid the most violent opposition on the part of the doctrinaires (members who defended a consistent maintenance of the principles of the charte) and the liberals. Many officers of government, by their writings, and in their places as deputies, opposed the new system; so that with every new ministry there were numerous dismissions, and many names were even erased from the army-rolls for political opinions. It was evident, indeed, that many conspirators were secretly employed in attempts to excite the troops to a revolt, and some were tried, found guilty, and suffered the penalty due to treason.

The king opened the session of 1823 with a speech announcing the march of 100,000 French troops to Spain. He was alarmed for the safety of France by the revolutionary movements of his neighbours; and this army, which was commanded by the duke of Angoulême, was sent expressly to restore the royal authority. The invaders encountered no effective opposition; the cortes fled before them to Cadiz; and when king Ferdinand approached that city, they permitted him to resume his despotic sway.

During the last few years of the reign of Louis XVIII. he was much enfeebled by disease, and, consequently, unable to act with the energy necessary for establishing a firm and at the same time a conciliatory government. He died in September, 1814, nine years subsequent to his restoration.

On the accession of Charles X., brother of the deceased king, he declared his intention of confirming the charter, appointed the dauphin (duke of Angoulême) as member of the ministerial council, and suppressed the censorship of the public journals. Villèle was his prime minister. In May, 1826, the splendid coronation of Charles took place at Rheims, according to ancient custom, with the addition, however, of the oath of the king, to govern according to the charter.

On Lafayette's return from America in 1825, the citizens of Havre having received him with some demonstrations of joy, the government manifested their resentment by ordering out the gendarmes, who charged the multitude with drawn sabres. The influence of the jesuits was seen in the prosecution of the Constitutionnel and Courrier Français, two of the best liberal journals. Villèle, who had discernment enough to see to what this fanaticism would lead, and who was, at the same time, obnoxious to the liberals, on account of his anti-constitutional principles, and his operations in the funds, became less secure. The parties assumed a more hostile attitude towards each other. The royalists and the supporters of the jesuits became more open in the expression of their real sentiments; the liberals became stronger and bolder; and the government assumed a tone ill calculated to conciliate its avowed opponents.

On the opening of the session, Dec. 12, 1826, Damas, minister of foreign affairs, informed the chamber that all the continental powers had endeavoured to prevent the interference of Spain in the affairs of Portugal; that France had co-operated with them; had withdrawn her ambassador from Madrid, and had entered into arrangements with England to leave Portugal and Spain to settle their affairs in their own way. Several unpopular measures brought forward by the ministers, were after violent discussions rejected; among which was a proposed law concerning the liberty of the press. The withdrawal of this by an ordinance was regarded as a popular triumph. This event was followed by the disbanding of the national guards of Paris, a body of 45,000 men, who, at a review in the Champ de Mars, had joined the cries of hatred against the ministry. This was a highly unpopular measure; and Lafitte, Benjamin Constant, and some other members talked of impeaching the ministers; but Villèle took credit to himself for having ventured on a step which he knew to be unpopular, but considered necessary. Every proceeding, however, served to shew that the ministerial party was gradually losing ground, and that no trifling concessions to their opponents would avail.

While Charles was much more resolutely opposed to the prevalence of democratic principles than his brother, and yielded to the counsels of priests who were intent on the restoration of the church to the power, it possessed some centuries before, the people were taught to believe, and actually dreaded, that a plot was forming to deprive them of the constitutional privileges which they had gained after so long a struggle. Thus the nation became gradually alienated from the court, and the court from the nation; while every opportunity was seized by the turbulent spirits of the time to widen the breach, and, if possible, to overturn the monarchy. A new ministry was forced upon the king by the popular party; they professed moderate principles, it is true; but they had neither the abilities nor the influence necessary for steering a safe course between the extremes of royal prerogative on one side, and popular encroachment on the other; the consequence of which was, that while the ultra-royalists were deeply offended by their liberal measures, the revolutionary party treated them as drivellers and incapables. In this state of opposite feeling, Charles suddenly dismissed them, and entrusted the formation of a new cabinet to prince Polignac.

On Aug. 9, 1839, the following appointments were announced: prince Polignac, minister of foreign affairs; M. Courvoisier, keeper of the seals and minister of justice; count Bourmont, minister of war, count de Bourdonnay, minister of the interior; baron de Montbel, minister of ecclesiastical affairs and public instruction; and count C'abrol de Crousol, minister of finance. To these was afterwards added M. d'Haussey, minister of marine and the colonies, in lieu of admiral count Rigny, who declined the offered portfolio. The mini-
