HOW CANADA CAN PAY HER WAR BILL

THE United States has a population of a hundred millions to Canada's seven. Yet the United States has found it difficult to last enthusiasm up to the point where the public would subscribe $2,000,000,000 for the Liberty bonds to prosecute the war.

Canada's national obligations are today almost $2,000,000,000; and we are only half way through the war—and the easiest, most inexpensive half of the way at that. If the war goes on for another two years—which Gerard and Joffre and Balfour all plainly indicate there is every prospect of it doing—we may expect Canada's national obligations to total $4,000,000,000—or nearly $600 for every man, woman and child in the country. In the eyes of the courts as established by law suits for damages, I believe, the potential value of every child born in the world is between $1,000 and $1,500. That is, owing to the great war, every child born in Canada for the next generation will be worth the $1,000, less the $600 debt, with which the war has saddled Canada's future.

It may be said that if the war had not been fought, every child born in Canada would have been worth less than $1,000, for he might have grown up to pay tax levies to German conquerors. Don't forget that Canada was nearer armed invasion by German reservists resident in the United States than either the American or Canadian Government have ever permitted the general public to know.

A German Menace

That may be true. Everything points to the fact it is true. Germany had plans for the massed invasion of Canada. It is barely a year ago since German reservists on the borders of Canada were hurriedly and peremptorily ordered by Bernstorff to hide their arms; but the fact of the great war being a war to block Germany's world aggression, will not pay our war bills. We have to keep on whacking up to our last shoe peg till Germany is beaten.

Now in Europe, they can tax industry 80 per cent. of profits without breaking industry because all the industries there are very old. They have garnered away "the thrifty husbandry of many years" in reserves, in capital increased without the addition of cash, in expanded plants, in bonuses paid over and above dividends to the shareholders.

Young Industries and Taxes

In Canada that is not the case. Industry in Canada is still young. Very little of it dates beyond 1880; and in the '90's the assets of many corporations, both rail and factory, were best represented by minus. If you taxed many Canadian industries 80 per cent. of their profits, you would break them. They need their surplus profits to amortize indebtedness. Two great railroads will be examples of this for some time to come.

Then, how is Canada to pay her war bill?

She can't repudiate one of her debts without hurting her credit. She must keep her credit good in order to borrow and expand as she grows.

Because Uncle Sam has jojined in the fight for democracy, he will, undoubtedly, be a willing banker; but if the war goes on, it is going to take Uncle Sam all his time to raise money for direct loans to European countries and for his own war expenses. The Liberty Loan proves this.

How is Canada to keep up her war expenses?

When the war broke, I remember telling a Canadian financier that Canada would have to spend billions. He gave me one look of incredulous contempt. "That," he said, "is a physical impossibility."

Yet here we are almost up to the $2,000,000,000 mark, and never a prospect of quitting.

Paying the Future

Now, Canada can pay in several ways. She can keep on issuing bonds and subscriptions subject to renewal, which is letting posterity carry the burden; but unfortunately we, of this day, will have to keep on paying interest; and that system of paying indebtedness is a dead weight around a young country's neck. It is a dead weight that might hamper and handicap the future. For instance, if to pay interest we had to tax profits to excess, we would handicap every industry and business in the country. We would keep them from expanding as the nation expanded. We would keep outside capital from coming into industry. Who will loan money on industries that are taxed to death? We would keep the public from buying railroad shares. We would keep the railroads from paying good wages and giving good service.

Not by War Profits Tax

A young country cannot tax profits to excess and stay in business.

Canada may as well swallow that fact and not hurt herself experimenting.

But the beauty of a young country is—she has untapped reservoirs of wealth from which she can dip.

Canada will have to dip from these reservoirs, or go broke. In more dignified language, Canada will have to draw on her undeveloped resources, or suffer such a financial panic as pessimists have never had in their blackest nightmares.

Potential Natural Resources

To be specific—

Canada is the only country in the world—barring China and Russia—that has unlimited and unexploited coal areas.

Canada is the only country in the world that has unlimited and unexploited pulp wood areas.

Canada is the only country in the world—barring again China and Russia—that has unexploited gold bearing areas.

Barring only Russia, Canada is the only country in the world that still has boundless timber areas.

Barring no country on earth, Canada is the only country that has arable, rich and free land.

It is not my place to point out how these unexploited reservoirs of wealth can be used to pay the war bill. It doesn't matter to me whether the new fiscal policy entails socialism or any other "ism." The point is, we have to pay the bill, or go broke; and we have to enter on a contsructive policy of do, and case the old laissez faire, which, being interpreted, should be written lazy fellow of drift. In the past, fiscal policies have simply passed the burdens on to posterity, and called it statesmanship. That sort of statesmanship, financing will not stand the test of the present war.

A Policy of Action

What do I mean by do instead of drift?

Coal is a good example, or oil, which is bound to be the great motor power for ships and cars in future. South America is a land of 70,000,000 people. They have not a ton of coal in all their area, and as far as I know, they have little oil. While the climate is hot in three quarters of the continent and mild in the other quarter, coal is needed for power purposes—to drive street cars, run factories, etc. Has Canada ever sent a ton of coal from the Pacific Coast or the Atlantic to South America? Coal is selling in certain sections of South America today at $30 a ton.

Or, take pulpwood—whether you raise the revenue from it by an export duty or by the Government going into the business itself. There is today a famine in print paper. I know printing concerns in the United States now using from $1,800,000 to $2,500,000 of paper a year. There are countless such firms. Suppose Canada sold only $50,000,000 of pulpwood a year. It would take only 40 years to pay off her war bill.

Or, take timber. When the world begins to rebuild after the war, Canada could sell a billion dollars of timber a year and not feel the loss; but somebody would definitely have to attend to the job. It won't sell itself by wearing a frock coat and looking wise and drifting.

The Agricultural Outlook

Or, take the matter of wheat lands! In the United States we are lying to ourselves about the scarcity of wheat. We are telling ourselves we are short of wheat because we have been selling what we need to the Allies. That is so much hot air. The most we have sold in a year went out in 1916-17—over 300,000,000 bushels. The next most was some 200,000,000. Those amounts are nothing compared to the possible exports if all American wheat lands were in wheat— but they are not. Yearly from Minnesota, south, more and more wheat land has been turned to corn; and yearly, more and more farm people have deserted the land for the towns, the farm for the factory. The United States is no longer an agricultural country. It is a 30 to 70 country. Thirty million people live on the land and have to feed the 70,000,000 living in town and city; and when the population increases another 20,000,00, as it does every ten years, Uncle Sam will not be able to feed himself. Figure this for yourself—six bushels per head for food, 720,000,000 bushels and 100,000,000 for seed. Canada will have to raise Uncle Sam's bread as well as a good percentage of John Bull's. Now, it isn't my place to point out how such a future wheat crop may pay the war bill; but if Canada were planting 50,000,000 acres to wheat instead of 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 acres, one year's crop would pay half the war bill.

But the supremely easiest way to pay the war bill would be as England has paid her war bills since the days of the Armada—by sea commerce; and that I shall take up in detail in the next issue, with the vital, the very vital importance of Canada's new oil fields as a supply of motor fuel for the merchant vessels of the world.

CANADA'S COAL OUTPUT

Statistics Covering First Operation of Current Year

The Mine Branch of the Department of Mines, has received from the principal coal mine operators returns of their production during the first three months of 1917, on the basis of which the following estimates have been made of total production during this period. According to these estimates, the total production of coal during the first quarter of 1917 was 3,590,991 short tons, comprising 1 233,934 tons in January; 1,143,956 tons in February and 1,213,101 tons in March. Corresponding records for the year 1916 are not available for comparison.

The record would appear to show that the average rate of production in Nova Scotia and British Columbia was less than the average rate of production during 1916, but greater in the provinces of New Brunswick, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The exports of coal during the three months were 501,570 tons, as against exports of 737,744 tons during the corresponding period of 1916.

WINNIPEG LETTER

Our Winnipeg market continues to be quiet, but there is ready sale for all the wheat offered, and the receipts from the country are on a fair scale about 400 cars daily, compared with 500 to 700 cars daily a year ago when receipts were extra large for the time of year. Today's prices are 1 nor. 220c, 2 nor. 217c, 3 nor. 212c, No. 4 200c, No. 5 176c, No. 6 159c. Feed 119c. Futures closed July 218c, October 187c.

Oats—The oat market is very firm with eager demand. There has been active buying of cash oats, and for July delivery, for some weeks, evidently principally on government account, and these oats do not come back in the market, so that it acts tight. During the week, up to the last day of June, prices held very firm at a little above the close of a week ago, but today, the first business day in July in this market, it was seen that July oats in Chicago advanced 1c yesterday, and corn was up 2c to 3c, and our July oats opened almost 1c higher, and later when it was known that there were no deliveries made on the July contracts in this market, prices advanced to 2¼c over Saturday's close for July, and October and December oats followed with an advance of about 2c. There is no restriction on the trading in oats for future delivery as there is on wheat. Today's prices are 2 C.W. 73⅜c, 3 C.W. and extra 1 feed 72⅞c, 1 feed 71⅝c, 2 feed 69⅝c. Futures closed July 73⅜c, October 62c, December 59¾c.

Barley—Barley is in quiet demand at 1c under last week's prices. No. 3 125c, No. 4 120c, rejected and feed 110c. The July future closed 115c.

Flax—The flax market has been quiet with a downward tendency and prices have lost 13c to 16c on the week. The visible supply of flax is very small in Canada and America, and the great shortage in the last Argentine crop precludes the United States getting any supplies from that country until after another crop is grown. In the United Kingdom the linseed and linseed oil situation is that the supply does not meet the demand, as there, they have to look wholly to India for a supply of seed this year. The demand for cake and oil is also very strong and supplies small. Technically, therefore, the world's flax seed situation is very strong, and should the favorable development of the new crop in the United States and Canada be hindered by adverse weather flax prices will again go very high. Today's prices are 1 N.W. 263½c, 2 C.W. 259¾c, 3 C.W. and rejected 245c. July 263c, October 259½c.

OIL PROSPECTS SEEM EXCEEDINGLY BRIGHT

The annual meeting of the Alberta Petroleum Products Company Limited, held at the board room recently was full of promise. Not promise as some oil companies promise, but of real prospect. In his annual report, A. W. Dingman, the managing director called attention to the fact that a subsidiary company had been formed for the purpose of extracting gasoline from the gas produced by the wells of the company. This company is called the Calgary ePtrol Company, Limited, and is capitalized at $250,000. Part of the company is composed of oil men from Los Angeles, who are superintending the installation of the gas extraction plant. The first unit of this plant which will be erected at a minimum cost of $50,000, is expected to be ready by September 1.

Another firm is negotiating to take the residue of the gas after the gasoline has been extracted and are willing to pay a satisfactory price for it. Arrangements are also being made to start to clean out No. 1 well. The officers elected were: President, A. E. Cross; first, vice-president, Wm. Fearce; second vice-president, A. J. Sayre; managing director, A. W. Dingman; secretary-treasurer, E. R. Mosher; directors, A. E. Cross, Wm. Pearce, A. J. Sayre, E. Taylor, T. J. S. Skinner, P. T. Bone, A. W. Dingman.

Where To Look For Immigrants

J. S. Dennis, of C. P. R., Says Canada's Hope for New Population Lies in U. S. and N. W. Europe.

J. S. Dennis, assistant to the president of the Canadian Pacific, in a letter to the Toronto board of trade, says:

"If and when Canada begins to prosecute a vigorous campaign for the attraction of settlers, it is obvious that it can be carried on in the British Isles only incidentally. In the United States, in northwestern Europe and certain other European peoples, including Russia, is where it must be most vigorously pushed.

"In the United States alone there are a large number of young men brought up on farms who leave them every year and flock to the cities, because of the impossibility of securing land at a low price. Every effort must be made to intercept these men and, by placing inducements of Canada before them, to attract them to this country.

"The resumption of immigration is not a question that can be idly dismissed with a wave of the hand. Very big issues are involved, the outcome of which will probably have a permanent effect upon the Canadian nation. It is a common habit, for instance, to deplore the foreigner's "hyphen" and apparent lack of ability to assimilate our ideals of citizenship and freedom, whereas, on the contrary, the fault sometimes lies at home. The newcomer's impressions are generally gained from personal contact with natives; his memories and natural prejudices in favor of the country of his nativity never extinguish themselves rapidly and, under the difference and even derision which he encounters, may perhaps never extinguish themselves at all.

"A certain amount of responsibility inevitably devolves upon the native inhabitants of a country, individually and collectively, to make immigrant newcomers welcome, especially if immigration is what that country particularly desires. A realization of this, and its putting into practice, ends in making the immigrant pleased with his changed surroundings, while the lack of such welcoming spirit tends to keep him hyphenated."

U. S. OFFICIAL THINKS THE STATES AND CANADA CAN SUPPLY ALLIES

Washington, D. C.—The grain requirements of the allies and the European neutrals were put at 971 million bushels, a total much greater than the United States can supply, in a statement by Herbert C. Hoover today, listing the minimum needs of each nation for human consumption and for feed.

	Bread Grains. Bushels	Fodder Grains. Bushels
United Kingdom	225,000,000	170,000,000
France	175,000,000	70,000,000
Italy	90,000,000	60,000,000
Belgium and Portugal	50,000,000	None
European neutrals and ex-European neutrals	15,000,000	116,000,000
Totals	555,000,000	416,000,000

"It will, of course, be impossible," Mr. Hoover said, "for North America to furnish all this quantity, although the major load must fall on us. In any event it emphasizes the necessity for control of exports in order to control prices and to protect our supply, and the necessity for conservation and elimination of waste."

U. S. A. ADOPTS NEW METHOD OF SCORING

The American Kennel club's new scheme of rating, which goes into effect July 1, gives championship points according to the number of dogs entered in each breed, and not according to the total benched in a show, as is at the rule at present.

YOUNGEST CHAMPION IN GOLF HISTORY

Atlanta, Ga.—Robert Tyre Jones, Jr. is the name of the new southern golf champion and he is just 15 years old. "Little Bob," as he is affectionately called by all Atlantans, earned this title by the most consistent golf that a champion has ever played in a tournament. He earned it by outplaying one of the gamest golfers the south has ever seen, Louis Jacoby, of New Orleans, in the 36 holes final at Birmingham.

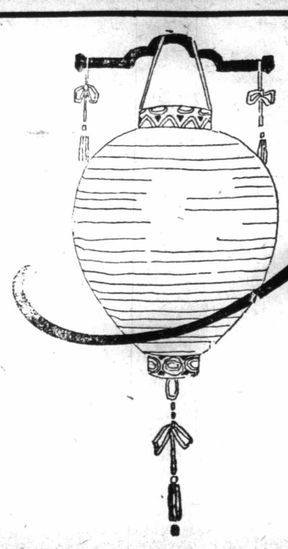
The fact that "Little Bob" was born on St. Patrick's day may have something to do with his success in golf, for it was on March 17, 1902, that he first saw the light of day in the old L. P. Grant home near Grant park, his parents residing with their friends, Mr. and Mrs. Bryan M. Grant, at that time. He is the youngest golf champion on record.



For the last several years the Joneses have resided at East Lake and a plausible explanation of Bob's great success as a golfer is due to what artists would call "atmosphere." He fairly breathed golf from the cradle.

"Little Bob" is one of those "born" golfers. He had the natural ability and under the careful training of Stewart Maiden, professional of the East Lake club, he broadened rapidly into one of the best golfers the south has ever seen. Bob gives Maiden credit for his golfing ability. The jolly Scotchman is also given credit for the wonderful game of Miss Alexa Stirling, the national woman's golf champion. Their accomplishments seem to merit the credit given.

It was at the age of nine years that "Little Bob" first began to really shoot "regular" golf, and Maiden, seeing the promise of the youngster, took him in hand and coached him carefully, firm in the belief that one day Bob would be a champion. Maiden's judgment has been proven.

STORIES OF EVENTS OF IMPORTANCE IN THE WORLD TODAY

THE work of the Red Cross, dividing roughly into two classes—first, peace activity in cases of pestilence, famine, fire and flood, and, second, in time of war, relief and care for the sick and wounded and relief to dependent families of soldiers—carries an appeal at this time to the American woman exercised perhaps by no other organized war effort, either governmental or private. To those who may have felt the pull of this appeal or who may be in contemplation of essaying the difficult role of the Red Cross nurse the question, "What does a woman need to know to be eligible as a Red Cross nurse?" must often have occurred.

A glance at some of the most important prerequisites to service as a Red Cross nurse will prove at once that more than 90 per cent. of those who aspire to go to the front as Red Cross nurses must be eliminated at the start through their lack of experience necessary to fit them for the work.

The Red Cross nurse must have been graduated from a nurses' school, giving at least two years' general hospital training in an institution caring for both sexes and maintaining a daly average of at least fifty patients.

Some of the Qualifications

She must be not only of voting age, but must have added four additional years of discretion and arrived at the mature age of 25, yet she must not have passed her fortieth birthday.

If her state law so requires she must have been registered as a nurse under the law.

If your potential nurse has satisfied all of the requirements already named she must be in addition a member of an organization affiliated with the American Nurses' Association and obtain the indorsement of its executive committee or two of its officers. She must have the indorsement of the superintendent of the nurses' school where her diploma was acquired, the further aproval of the local committee on Red Cross nursing service, and, finally, must pass the exacting physical examination required by the Red Cross before assignment to active duty.

A woman needs to know many things and have wide experience to be eligible as a Red Cross nurse. The work which must be done in the care of the wounded in hospitals not only demands skill and training in the technique of nursing but also a constitution acustomed to bear the strain of physical effort and a nervous system which will withstand shocks of whatever intensity. The stipulations made by the Red Cross, to be satisfied by its nursing candidates, can be said to be most appropriate to insure nursing material capable of proving equal to war time emergencies.

Nurses' Aids May Be Needed

A limited number of nurses' aids may be used at the front who lack the wide professional training required of the nurse. Though the greater volume of Red Cross work must be done at home the experience of deepest human interest will always be met in the paths trod by the Red Cross nurse in the actual care of the wounded soldier. The professional Red Cross nurse who is so fortunate as to reach the front will meet with experiences to which the supporting armies of women behind the lines are strangers.

The last request of the dying soldier is often intrusted for fulfilment to the Red Cross nurse and his last message to her hands for delivery. American Red Cross nurses have served in caring for wounded of all European armies since September, 1914, but with the sending of the Pershing expedition to the western battle front American boys will bleed, suffer and die and the American Red Cross nurse will share their sorrows.

Service as a Red Cross nurse, while founded upon the principle of ministering to others, is not without its own inherent hazards to those engaged, as witnessed by the recent Mongolia incident, in which the lives of two American hero nurses were sacrificed for the American cause. The function of the Red Cross nurse might be best expressed in the words of Ian Malcolm, the representative on the British commission recently in Washington of the British Red Cross, who defined it to be "to draw a great net of mercy through an ocean of unspeakable pain."

Incidents are legion which show the patriotism, heroism and bravery of American nurses in the Red Cross service, and these attributes have made the service what it is today.

It is stated that as soon as information reached Chicago of the loss of the two nurses on board the Mongolia and the serious injury of a third a number of nurses in that city promptly volunteered to fill the places of those who had made the "major sacrifice" in the service of their country.

Red Cross nurses in Serbia, in order that they might have better facilities in caring for the wounded, elected to go to shell fire of the enemy. These nurses remained in this dangerous position through the capture of Belgrade by the Austrians, followed by its recapture by the Serbians and later by a subsequent recapture by the Prussian and Austrian armies, all the time directly in the line of fire.

That it is impossible to anticipate and provide against danger is demonstrated from the fact that not a nurse among the number of more than 250 sent by the Red Cross to foreign battle fields since September, 1914, has lost her life, while it remained for two nurses, peacefully seated on the deck of a ship in midocean to meet with a fatal accident which occurred during practice firing.

Red Cross nurses have been assigned to duty in all European countries and not a single nurse died from accident since the opening of the European war. The experience of Miss Helen Scott of Illinois and Miss Rachel Torrance, of New York, is a drama of thrills. These two nurses were sent out on board the Red Cross ship in September, 1914, to Russia where they helped to organize a Red Cross hospital at Kieff. After about one year's service in this city, at the urgent request of the Queen of Bulgaria, they were transferred to her country to aid the Bulgarian government in establishing a nursing service for the Bulgarian army. In this work a nurses' school was established in Sofia, into which many native women at Constantinople were received for training. These two American nurses continued their work at Sofia until the hospital service there was taken over by the Germans. During this time they were always under the direct patronage of the Bulgarian queen. After the assumption of the work by the Germans, Miss Hay and Miss Torrance went to Philipponolis and took over the relief work in that part of the country at the request of the Bulgarian queen. The nurses were recalled to the United States immediately after the declaration, on April 6, of the existence of a state of war by the Congress of the United States and have already reported to Red Cross headquarters in Washington.

In war expert services must be conserved, and while it seems necessary to hold our enrolled Red Cross nurses for the technical hospital service, there is still ample opportunity for the service of the patriotic women throughout America. To meet the needs of the present situation every woman must be willing to perform the duty for which she is best qualified, believing that every service rendered to one's country is equally important.

Sub. Plan Working Well, Says U. S. Naval Expert

THERE has been a decrease in the weekly number of victims of the German submarine, but in the opinion of the writer it is due to the arming of merchantmen and the increased experience of their masters in steering zigzag courses in their attempts to escape this peril. The decrease in the number of vessels sunk is due to these causes rather than to the actual destruction of the submarines themselves.

The present German submarines are capable of keeping the sea for several weeks, and can be so quickly submerged upon the approach of a destroyer that it has become exceedingly difficult for chasers to catch them.

I believe that to depend upon inventions to destroy submarines is a delusion and a snare. They must be met by a systematic defence and hard fighting.

Remedy

Lay out a "lane" four miles wide and two hundred miles long, starting from the west coast of Ireland westward, the western extremity of the lane to be known as the "base."

Station picket boats every two miles on each side of the lane.

At the "base" there should be detailed a force of destroyers to convoy steamers through the lane, with picket boats so stationed as to cover every mile.

With these picket boats so stationed, and destroyers convoying steamers through the lane, it will be nigh impossible for submarines to break through this cordon of defence.

Operation

Picket boats should not be under three hundred tons, capable of keeping the sea in stormy weather. They should be armed with a three-inch gun forward and a rapid-fire gun aft; should have one mast for a crow's nest; should all be provided with good sea anchors for heavy weather.

A lane two hundred miles long will require two hundred picket boats, and they should be relieved every ten days, requiring a total force of four hundred.

In time it may be found that these boats can be stationed further apart than two miles. A speed of ten knots is sufficient for the pickets.

There are many steamers in the menhaden fishing business and offshore trawlers admirably adapted for this service.

The only ports for clearance to England should be Bristol and Liverpool. In order to avoid the dangers of the English Channel, no clearances should be permitted for London.

All steamers bound to English ports should be required to report at the "base" for convoying, its latitude and longitude being given confidentially to their masters before departure from the United States.

At the "base" should be an energetic officer, in charge of the convoying flotilla. His duty would be to regulate and keep in operation the system of convoying.

There are many other details for this system, but it would require too much space to enumerate them.

To the United States more than any other nation is the safety of the Atlantic passage necessary, and our navy must take upon itself the protection from the German submarines. It is absolutely necessary that the navy should at once rise to the responsibility resting upon it for it will surely and justly be held responsible for the safety of the Atlantic Ocean.

The above is the defensive system, but it does not contemplate any cessation of the relentless warfare which must be waged by all the allied forces against these scourges of the ocean.

ON TO PARIS??

"On to Paris," said the Germans in 1914. Here is the "On to Paris" of 1917. German prisoners taken in the recent advance in France. Inset: General R. E. Turner, commanding a division of heroic Canadians.

French Youth Is the Premier Fighter of Air

A YOUTH whose chief distress in life is that he can't grow a heavy moustache, holds the record of the war for the number of enemy airplanes destroyed in battle. He is Captain Guynemer, 22 years old, who at the beginning of the war quit college to join the air corps. He recently brought down his 43rd enemy plane, according to a cablegram in the Star a few days ago. He has been flying since December, 1915. An aviator's life at the front is supposed to be brief. Yet Guynemer has been reported wounded only once.

Forty-three destroyed airplanes is Guynemer's official record. How many planes he actually has put out of commission probably never will be known. A downed airplane only goes into the official records when observers are certain that a fallen machine has been made unfit for further service.

No other aviator on either side of the trenches has made anything near Guynemer's record. Lieut. Navarre, another French aviator whose achievements have been quoted widely, has only 19 credited to him. Navarre spends 10 hours a day in the air. And he was seriously wounded last year—so seriously that it is said he is not "just right" in his head any more.

German Record Fifteen

Immelmann, the greatest of the German fliers the war has produced, had only 15 on his list when he was killed in 1916.

Guynemer enlisted at once when the war began. He never had made a flight, but his heart was set on flying. The first time he was allowed to go up in a machine alone he put it through paces which astonished even veterans. For this he was reprimanded "for taking unheard of chances." But he was given his certificate.

When he arrived at the front in April, 1915, he was assigned to reconnaissance work. He didn't like it. He complained! said he had been sent there to fight German airmen. And in a few months officers made him a fighting man.

That was December 5, 1915. Before nightfall he had pursued and shot down a German machine. On the 8th, 11th and 14th he brought down one each day. Since then he has established the record of four in one day, and two in one minute. Guynemer has all the medals that are given for military deeds by France.

Like Immelmann and like Navarre, Guynemer flies alone. But his fighting methods are different. Immelmann hid in clouds at great heights, swooped down on an enemy plane and fired all his ammunition as he passed. He kept on going and did not return to give battle if he missed.

Navarre is like a hornet. He dashes nose on into an enemy plane, with machine gun spitting, and hits as a hornet stings until the enemy plane crumples up and falls. Guynemer goes into battle with more caution. He circles around and around the enemy plane, manoeuvering as prize fighters do, until he sees an opening. Then he strikes a vital spot, and it is over.

Fell 9,000 Feet

It was in October, 1916, that Guynemer had the spill which nearly proved fatal. He had just brought down three enemy machines and was up more than 9,000 feet when a shell burst full in one of the wings of this airplane. The whole left wing was completely cut to bits.

With the canvas torn into strips the machine crashed through space. Guynemer gave himself up as lost. His only prayer was that he might hit inside his own lines. Allied aviators have great fear of falling into the hands of the Germans.

"At 4,800 feet," he said, in relating the incident, "I determined to make a fight for it, all the same. The wind had brought me back into our own lines. I was almost happy. I was already thinking of my funeral, with sorrowing friends walking behind my body. However I felt that it was death, and the thought is not a very pleasant one.

"My fall continued. In spite of all my efforts I could not do what I wanted with my machine. I tried to turn it, first to the right and then to the left. I pushed and pulled, but all to no purpose. I could no nothing.

"Down I fell, faster and faster. I shut my eyes. I opened them again. I looked down. At something like 120 miles an hour I crashed into a pillar.

"There was a terrific crashing sound and a deep thud. I looked round and found that nothing was left of my machine. How is it I am still alive? I wonder myself.

"I think it was the straps which held me in my seat that saved my life. They had eaten right into my shoulders. For 24 hours I was absolutely stunned. It is an odd sensation——"

Guynemer shrugged his shoulders and passed his hand thoughtfully over the trace of a mustache on his upper lip. If he only could grow that man-sized mustache!

RAPID-FIRE GUN IN BOW OF SUB. CHASER

Since the declaration of war between United States and Germany many hundreds of submarine chasers have been patrolling the coast in and about the harbors. They are very speedy and the guns are manned by sharpshooters.

A TORPEDO THAT JUST MISSED ITS MARK

An instantaneous snap from the stern of a vessel at which a German steel shark, as the torpedoes are called, had been directed. This is one of the most unusual pictures ever made of this death dealing device that is being used by the Germans.

Training to Win

(By A. L. CRANFIELD)

"WE shall win the war all right—I know it, not because I've just returned from France, but because I've seen what you are doing at home."

The officer from the Somme was talking to the officer who had not yet been "out."

From a grassy platform high in the Chiltern Hills they surveyed a training area of many miles. A huge wooden city stretched east and west and north, the huts brown as the brown earth, half hiddden on the hill-side, and veiled by the clustering woods and spinneys in the valley.

The hills rolled back their echo to the rattle of four giant ranges—the musketry of whole battalions at "mad minute" and field firing.

A hundred acres of undulating parkland lay immediately below the Somme man and his companion. Here everything that the soldier has to do was being done to fit him for the front. The accumulated, perfected experience of two and a half years of unparalleled warfare was being condensed and applied. No helpful hint was too small to teach, no "latest note" too new to have ben brought home and adopted. Every specialist had his corner, and every portion of the ground had its busy squad of men—doing things, listening, and watching them being done by men who did not make mistakes.

"This is the most refreshing and inspiring sight a trench-weary Britisher could see," said the Somme man, with the contented smile of one who had not always had reason to be appreciative.

You might have started with company drill and finished by throwing live bombs. You might have practiced the standing-load position, and ended with a thrilling bayonet charge over the final assault course. And if you could read the Morse code—dots and dashes sparked out of cables, flicked in blue and white above the bushes, flashed from mirror to mirror of cunningly-aligned heliographs.

Yet there was nothing done at random. The skilled eye recognized in a moment the graduations, the scientific preparations of men who had the will and the power to win the war. The recruits had their squad drill because only thus do they obtain the precision of movement implicit obedience and cohesion, which make possible the subsequent relaxation into extended order. Near by, other platoons further advanced had learnt to extend, to advance by short rushes, to get up and get down, with the same vigor and nerve with which they had previously formed fours.

The physical training experts from Aldershot had things all their own way. Not only had they large classes of ruddy-cheeked, bare-headed, half-stripped Britains in every conceivable position of bodily alertness and supple movement, but they had organised an obstacle course to try every muscle in a man's body.

"Every man an athlete," was their motto; and sure enough, stodgily built men, who in civil life last summer felt faint over their gardening now leapt and scrambled and jumped like the red blood that bubbled so strongly in their veins. Up a fence like the side of a house, through wire, along a plank that ended in an 18-foot jump—these were the sort of things that everybody was surprised to find he could do, and only wished they were really German trenches and entanglements.

All this was splendid practice for the bayonet—fighter's masterpiece—the final assault course a few hundred yards away. You heard the cheering all the time. There, with full pack and fixed bayonet at the high port, and the air was hideous with their joyous whoops and exultant yells.

It was a formidable journey. Packs are heavy and rifles and bayonets no help at all when you are running hard with wire and high banks to clear, a stiff and jarring downward jump to take, swinging sacks to jab, and at last a deep trench into which to leap with savage lungs at prostrate sandbags.

Meanwhile, and in passing, one had glimpses of exhiliarating displays by sergeants highly placed at Hythe, whose strident admirably lucid detail stripped musketry of all its secrets for recruits, and nearly drowned the busy rattle of the miniature range close by. The added diversion of a company rehearsing "The attack" served but to redouble the vigor with which these instructors expounded care of arms and rapid loading, since every specialist worthy the name knows that his own particular job is winning the war.

But there was much more that this wonderful training ground held for the pleased eye of the watchful officer from France.

Platoons practiced bomb-throwing with better aim and sturdier effort that they had ever shied at cocoa-nuts, and every man of them could tell you all about the inside and outside of the latest grenade. And there was no escaping the intrusive activities of the many schools, all helping to give a thorough grounding in military knowledge and practice which is sending out material moulded into the most thoroughly-equipped reinforcements that the British army in the field could desire.

Alongside the range-taking and cookery schools were the headquarters of the signalling school. Telephone and lamp, flag, heliograph and shutter spoke from every vantage-point; wires were being laid and worked in the trenches which the pioneers were digging. No less vigorous than the signallers were the staff of the anti-gas school, through whose subterranean chamber platoons were being passed after hours of preliminary drill in gas helmets. Typical also of the wise co-operation of one school with another was the presence of signallers in the gas chamber operating their telephones oblivious to the deadly cloud which enveloped them. Accustomed to don their gas helmets upon a three-seconds alarm and signal thus for long periods, these were the kind of men who might be trusted to maintain communication—that factor vital to success in every emergency of attack or defence.

Here, then, in this pleasant park was unfolded a fair example of the strenuous home training of an infantry brigade—the sort of work that may be every day in scores of similar camps throughout the British Isles.

"No wonder," remarked the officer from the front, "that I say victory is ours. I have seen these men come out, and they make good at once every time. And with the Germans driven back and such drafts pouring into France——!

"Given the same standard of efficiency and organisation in munitions and civil effort, these men and the millions they reinforce will do the rest."

Thomas O'Hara was sitting at a luncheon-room counter with his friend Sandy McDougall. The latter kept turning around to see if his coat and hat were still hanging on the nail where he had hung them.

"You're a very suspicious mon," said the Irishman, "Who do ye think would be after walking in here and steal our coats?"

"I canna say," replied the Scot, "but I'll take gude care that no one gets mine, laddie. Yours went about ten minutes ago."

For all Pain

"The efficiency of any drug" says Dr. C. P. Robbins "is known to us by the results we obtain from its use. If we are able to control pain and disease by means of any preparation, we certainly are warranted in its use. One of the principal symptoms of all diseases is pain, and this is what the patient most often applies to us for, i.e., something to relieve his pain. If we can arrest this promptly the patient is most liable to trust in us for the other remedies which will effect a permanent cure. One remedy which I have used largely in my practice is anti-kamina tablets. Many and varied are their uses. I have put them to the test on many occasions, and have never been disappointed. I found them especially valuable for headaches of malarial origin, where quinine was being taken. They appear to prevent the bad after-effects of the quinine. Anti-kamina tablets are also excellent for the headaches from improper digestion; also for headaches of a neuralgic origin, and especially for women subject to pains at certain times. Two anti-kamina tablets give prompt relief, and in a short time the patient is able to go about as usual."

Synopsis of Canadian Northwest Land Regulations.

THE sole head of a family, or any male over 18 years old, who was at the commencement of the present war, and has since continued to be, a British subject or a subject of an allied or neutral country, may homestead a quarter-section of available Dominion Land in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta. Applicant must appear in person at Dominion Lands Agency or Sub-Agency for District. Entry by proxy may be made on certain conditions. Duties—Six months residence upon and cultivation of land in each three years.

In certain districts a homesteader may secure an adjoining quarter-section pre-emption. Price $3.00 per acre. Duties—Reside six months in each of three years after earning homestead patent and cultivate 50 acres extra. May obtain pre-emption patent as soon as homestead patent on certain conditions.

A settler after obtaining homestead patent, if he cannot secure a pre-emption, may take a purchased homestead in certain districts. Price $3.00 per acre. Must reside six months in each of three years, cultivate 50 acres and erect a house worth $300.00.

Holders of entries may count time employment as farm laborers in Canada during 1917, as residence duties under certain conditions.

When Dominion Lands are advertised or posted for entry, returned soldiers who have served overseas and have been honorably discharged, receive one day priority in applying for entry at local Agent's Office (but not Sub-Agency). Discharge papers must be presented to Agent.

W. W. CORY, Deputy Minister of the Interior.

MY CANADA

I LOVE my country. There is nothing that she can ask I will not do. I am ready to live or die for her. She is the realization of a dream and the fulfillment of an ideal—this Canada of ours. She is the embodiment of what a country should be—and right or wrong, it is my home, my country—the one I love.

COMMENT AND CRITICISM

BOY SCOUTS
DESERVE ENCOURAGEMENT

The Boy Scouts are proving their worth in the United States in a decidedly striking manner since the war was declared in that country. They have not only taken much of the auxiliary work off the shoulders of the home guards but their last aggressive campaign in interest of the Liberty loan when they raised directly over $25,000,000 without figuring on what they did indirectly proves beyond the question of a doubt their work to the country. The Boy Scouts is a great organization everywhere and they deserve the earnest support and co-operation of the citizen generally.

CALGARIANS PROVE THEIR PATRIOTISM

We did not collect one million dollars, nor one hundred thousand dollars for our Red Cross work on Dominion Day, but after three years of continual hammering after subscriptions from the citizens for Red Cross work we did collect over six thousand dollars in one day. And this in face of the fact that within ten days previous to this scampaign two very aggressive campaigns had been waged in the city for subscriptions, both of which had been generously supported by the citizens beyond the fondest hopes of the promoters. Are Calgarians patriotic? This should be conclusive evidence that we are.

ALBERTA TAKES MANY HONORS AT FAIR

Those skeptics who doubt the greatness of Alberta have but to review some of the happenings at the Calgary Industrial exhibition to be fully convinced as to this province's standing in agricultural and commercial activity. In the first place the winning of the first prize by the Curtice Cattle Co., with Alberta Bred stock from Frank Collicutt's prize $12,000 and Saskachewan's famous $17,000 bull, establishes a new mark in cattle breeding in this province. It makes Alberta the prize producer of North America, and sets back some of the famous producers of the States. Then to top this over the prizes won for our butter in the Dairy exhibits was another feather in our cap that will make us all swell with pride at the honor. These honors were only two of a score that could be mentioned, but they are sufficient to prove that Alberta is becoming famous for its pursuits the world over.

KNOCKERS AT THE CITY HALL

A few days ago a committee of the city hall officials had a meeting to lay plans for the publicity pertaining to the tax reports. His honor, the mayor, a true friend of the newspapers, was in favor of expending a majority of the amount in the local papers while the balance of the committee wanted to buy a "pig in a bag," and take space in the foreign papers. This is the usual attitude assumed by this bunch of time-killers at the hall. When election time comes around, or when they are looking for personal publicity of any kind they are submissive as a negro porter to a millionaire and they "Kai-Tai" to the newspapers like Pooh-Bah in Mikado. Just as soon as they get into office they forget the little favors they have exacted in the past, and they become as domineering as the Kaiser himself. They are as appreciative as a pig over a dish of ice cream. If you criticize them they assume a lordly attitude and remind you that they are only filling in the time at the hall as a favor; that if they were not doing this work (?) they might be running the Standard Oil Co. or managing some corporation like the C. P. R. This is the kind of a bug that gets into their bonnet as soon as they get into office. However, the present scarcity of men won't last forever and sooner or later these work-slackers may be seeking other means of support. Who knows?

CLEAN UP CENTER STREET BRIDGE

You city fathers—what about the Center street bridge? You property owners and molders of the city's destiny, are your going to sit down quietly and let this great feat of modern progress rot and decay or are you going to wake up from your inertia and finish the work that you have now left half done. Over fourteen thousand people live on the North hill. Most of these people are in business in the down town frequently during the week. Today most of them avoid this beautiful bridge like you would a skunk's carcass. Why? Because of the unpleasant inhabitants that are now located around the lower end of the bridge. This element should be removed immediately from this locality and segregated in some other sections. It is a pity and a shame to expend thousands upon thousands of dollars in building a monument of this character, and then leave the work half done. Besides the people of the north hill deserve more consideration than this. To expect the mothers and daughters to walk along this thoroughfare now is out of the question. You would not permit your mother or daughter to do so, and if you did you would be living in mortal terror all the time. Then why expect your neighbors and friends to do it? It is time that the city gave some attention to this momentous question. It is time that steps were aken to clean and beautify the approach to the bridge, and the first step in this direction is to find another section for these inhabitants of questionable repute and remove them from Center street entirely. Or better still remove them from the town altogther.

JAMES HOSSACK WOODS
Recently Appointed President Canadian Press Assoc.

The press men of Canada are to be heartily complimented on the astute discrimination which elected James Hossack Woods to their chair of honor for the coming year. If precedent is a practical guide, he will prove one of the most popular presidents ever appointed by that organization.

Never met him? Then life still holds for you one of its most enjoyable experiences. There can be only one "Bert" Woods, and him it is ever a pleasure and inspiration to know. With a heart as big and broad as the prairie country he has made his home, wherever "Bert" Woods gives the latch string a pull and opens the gate the atmosphere about him is surcharged with a smile. The man is yet undiscovered who has failed to greet him with the welcoming smile and hearty handshake. Meet Woods at your first opportunity. You'll find him as keen on good acquaintances as yourself, and your idea of simple sincerity will be pleasantly refreshed.

But Woods is not the sort of sunshine and smile, however, well meant, that masks an empty head and uninitiative will. By no means. Nature endowed him differently to that, and character approved the gift. Withal his friendliness of spirit and graciousness of manner "Bert" Woods possesses a plentiful mixture of uncommon ability and commercial acumen.

Woods was born in Quebec forty-nine years ago—just a year after confederation. His people had lived in Quebec for some generations previously. There are some who can discern the mark and characteristics of those stirring times traced in his personality.

Woods seemed naturally equipped for a life of effort in newspaper work. His education at McGill and Manitoba Universities rounded out his innate capabilities to effectual performance.

The newspaper business called him in 1893 as reporter on the Toronto Mail, prior to its amalgamation as the Mail and Empire. While here he reported several sessions in the Ontario press gallery, and also several in the gallery of the House of Commons.

In 1896 Woods went to Montreal as news editor of the Herald, but the following year returned to Toronto Mail as city editor, which position he held until 1902.

It was in this year that Mr. Woods became business manager of Toronto News, to remain until the time of its sale.

Quick to perceive the importance to advertising of capable advertising service, in 1904 Mr. Woods founded the J. H. Woods Advertising Agency, which later became Wods-Norris, Limited, when Mr. C. C. Norris became identified with it. Here was laid the groundwork upon which was built the present well-known agency of Norris-Patterson, Limited,

Ten years ago he severed his connection with that business to become the managing director and editor of Calgary Herald, which position he holds today together with that of vice-president of Edmonton Journal.

Oh! and was I forgetting that Woods is quite a hand at sports? For one thing he is a chronic golf enthusiast, and rather an accomplished one. They tell me not many of his club associates are over anxious to challenge his ability at the game on the links.

Besides being a popular club man, Woods is vice-president and executive head of the Calgary Hospitals Board, which controls and directs all the public hospitals of Calgary. For two years, until the beginning of the war, he was first vice-president of the Alberta branch of the Canadian Red Cross Society, and has been, since the out-break of the war, honorary secretary treasurer and executive officer of the Belgian Relief Society of Southern Alberta.

Now you know James Hossack Wods, simon-pure newspaper-advertising-man. At least, you will know him well enough that his name will stand out with particular clearness next time you see it.

As President of Canadian Press association, Inc., for the present year, his activities will be watched with keen interest by advertising men. His term of office will undoubtedly be characterized by material success and an even closer union of his fellow associates. Again let me say that the C. P. A. and its member are to be congratulated on having elected so able and amiable a man and business counsellor as James Hossack Woods for their 1917 chief.

EXHIBITION
A LITTLE REMISS

The only criticism we have to offer the exhibition management for the best show ever given in this country was the seeming lack of attention displayed toward our celebrated visitors. Lt.-Gov. Brett came to town to boost the exhibition. He was an invited guest of the exhibition. His presence added greatly to the exhibition. In his democratic way he came without ostentation or display and sat in the ordinary reserve seats of the grand stand. He was not even put in the front row. If it was not for that genially and active head of the R. N. W. M. Police, Major FitzHorrigan, in escorting him to the grand stand his presence might have gone unannounced. This was a grave mistake. He should have been properly exploited as befits his office as the chief executive of the king in this province. Besides he is a fine enough fellow to be accorded this honor on personal grounds. However, here is an idea for the exhibition management. Set aside a few seats in the front row of the Grand stand way down front. Make a box arrangement, and when you have celebrated visitors drape the box with bunting. It's a courtesy that they deserve and the crowds will appreciate the honor and do due deference to the visitors. What think you?

AN IDEA FOR THE CITY FATHERS

Speaking on the subject of publicity reminds us that Calgary has a half dozen of the greatest publicity men in the country. Nowhere in the whole of Canada can the equal of such men as E. L. Richardson, R. J. Lydiatt and R. J. C. Stead be found. They are forerunners of publicity men. Give them full sway and they will make a mountain out of a mole hill, or a metropolis of a cow-town. In this connection here's an idea for the city fathers. Appoint these men on an advisory committee with Chas. Hayden and J. B. Mallette to exploit Calgary. Pay them for their services and set aside a few thousand for them to expend as they deem best in exploiting Calgary. The Standard will wager that Calgary will be advertised as it never was advertised before. The country will ring with good words about the city and better still the outsider will be interested because he will have a clearer conception of what Calgary is. Possibly it may be the means of bringing a few settlers and business houses to the city. At least it is a movement in the right direction and can do much good. The idea lends itself to great future possibilities and is worthy of the attention of the city fathers.

LET'S GET BUSY AND GIVE MAYOR AUTO

While we are on the subject of the city hall reminds us that we think that a city of the size of Calgary could afford to supply our chief executive with an automobile. It is a sad reflection on the town to have visitors and noted men come to the city and not be properly entertained. His honor is very democratic and hospitable. He believes in showing the best points of the city to those who come here. How can he do so properly without the means? Calgary can not advertise itself to the visitors any better than a casual review of the business houses and homes. When these visitors now come to town his honor either has to borrow an auto or forego the pleasure of a visit around the city. It is a sad reflection on the city of Calgary that a town this size can not afford to furnish the means for the chief official to properly represent the office and the city. The Standard believes that it is high time that some of these "moss-backs" and "way-backs" at the hall should bury their antiquated and pessimistic views regarding the future of the city and open up the purse strings of the treasury and give our worthy chief executive an automobile and anything else he needs to properly represent this growing metropolis of the west. He deserves it, and the niggardly attitude of council in past days should now be eradicated and an open-handed policy adopted if we are to continue to progress, which we are bound to. Down with poverty-screamers and calamity hollerers, say we.

RED CROSS WORKERS SHOULD GET THE PROFIT

Through the press the attention of the people of this country have recently been called to a movement of widespread interest, and one that has done much good to the rural communities of the States. We speak of the Chautauqua movement. It is almost national in character, this Chautauqua idea, in the United States, and it only has good things said about it wherever it is held. Of late this movement has been started in Western Canada. The idea is being fostered by three representatives from the States who are practically the owners and proprietors of the scheme. They propose or promise to devote a certain percentage of the income to the Red Cross work. As the business men of the communities—of Calgary and other provincial towns—have been solicited and contributed on the representations that were made by the promoters—that a certain percentage of receipts would be given to this noble work of an enlightened nation then we believe that proper steps should be taken by the local as well as the provincial authorities to see that this is done. The Standard does not wish to hamper the men in their work, and they deserve all the encouragement we can give them and a fair amount of profit for their efforts, but we do believe that since promises were made by the promoters to contribute a part of the income to the Red Cross work it should be done. Possibly a personal call from those two intrepid workers—the president, Mrs. J. S. Dennis, and the secretary, Mrs. John Cairns, will have the desired effect in securing proper arrangements for the delivery of a part of the income.

Screen Triumph, "Giving Becky A Chance"

Charming Vivian Martin, the Morosco-Paramount star, who recently scored such a success in "The Spirit of Romance," and "The Girl at Home," will be seen at the Allen next Friday and Saturday in Edith Kennedy's adaptation of Lois Zellner's clever story, "Giving Becky a Chance."

Formerly a charming star of the speaking stage, Vivian Martin has added fresh leaves to her laurel wreath with every appearance on the screen. Possessed of unusual piquancy and charm, full of life and vitality, she is the photodrama's best exponent of vivacious American girlhood.

In "Giving Becky a Chance" Vivian Martin has an opportunity to run her entire scale of dramatic emotions from the lightest light comedy to heavy gripping tragedy.

That Miss Martin is an accomplished and graceful dancer, was unknown to her many friends until the production of this picture. The director had prepared to make these scenes mere incidents, but when Miss Martin astonished them all with her grace, he promptly made them an important feature.

The production was made in the usual Morosco-Paramount thoughtful and beautiful manner.

Big Varied Program At The Pantages Coming Week

Many bright features will be offered at the Pantages theater for the coming week commencing with the matinee next Monday afternoon. For headliner Edna Keeley and her company will offer a musical comedy entitled "The Other Fellow's Girl"; the large cast presenting this number is composed of clever artists and capable singers. During the action of the playlet many tuneful musical numbers will be given such as "Physical Culture Girls," "He's Built for Speed Not Comfort," "In an Auto Built for Two," "Good-by George," "Some Day," etc. Some very bright and original costumes will be exhibited by a chorus of beauties, while the special scenery will further enhance the beauty of the offering.

The Six Venetian Gypsies will present a singing and musical number descriptive of gypsy life in Venice; all the members of the troupe are Italians, highly talented in the art of music and singing. A complete set of scenery is carried showing a beautiful picture of a typical gypsy caravan encampment, with electrical effects that enhances the beauty of the scene most realistically.

Frank Morrell billed as "The California Boy," will amuse with his singing and comedy sayings. Morrell is known the country over for his witticisms and clever presentation of the negro character.

O'Connor and Dixon will present a comedy skit entitled "Hired and Fired," which bristles with bright comedy lines and fun-making situations.

Claire and Atwood will present a knockout novelty which is the cause of much laughter, entitled "Bump de Bumps."

The Universal Current Events and a comedy motion picture will conclude a most worthy program of vaudeville that is sure to please everyone, even the most exacting of amusement seeker.

"Poppy," a Selznick-Pictures photodrama version of the popular novel of the same name, with beautiful Norma Talmadge as the star, will be the attraction at the Allen theater Monday and Tuesday, two days only.

This is the second of Miss Talmade's productions since she abandoned the programs for the broader field of the open booking system, at the head of her own company. She never has had a vehicle in which there was more scope for her versatility than in "Poppy" and it promises to be the sensation of the career of this young favorite screen artist.

Though barely 20 years old, Miss Talmadge is noted for the great range of her characterizations. In "Poppy" she begins by enacting the role of a girl of 14, and by gradual progression finally reaches that of a cultured woman of 30. In a singer this would be a register of three octaves. This is something more than a mere display of cleverness; it gives the story a variety of incidents that makes it unique and fascinating.

The story is adapted from the play by Ben Toal and John P. Ritter, based upon the novel, "Poppy," by Cynthia Stockley. It is directed by Edward Jose, and in the supporting cast appear such favorites as Eugene O'Brien, Frederick Perry, Jack Meredith and Dorothy Rogers. Miss Talmadge has declared that "Poppy" is the best role she has had since she firlst appeared in pictures. This is high praise, in view of the fact that her previous Selznick pictures, "The Law of Compensation," are among the big successes of this year.

At the Allen, Monday and Tuesday

Sessue Hayakawa, the noted Japanese screen star, scored a tremendous success in his latest Jesse L. Laspy photodrama, "The Jaguar's Claws," now showing at the Allen for the last times today.

Mr. Hayakawa has been seen as a Japanese, a Chinese, Hawaiian, East Indian and American Indian, and now for the first time is to be seen as a Mexican—a cruel, merciless bandit who, with his band of followers, whom he rules by fear, terrorizes a certain portion of northern Mexico.

The major portion of the picture was filmed in the exact locality in which the scenes of the story are laid, the Lasky company having received permission from the Mexican commander who was at that time in charge, to spend several days in the interior, a hundred cowboys being brought to Mexico for the purpose of securing some of the thrilling battle scenes between the Mexicans and cowboys.

In the supporting cast are Tom Moore, Marjorie Daw, Tom Forman, Mabel Van Buren, Lucien Littlefield, and Horace B. Carpenter. The production was made for the Lasky company under the direction of Marshall Neilan.

A current edition War Graphic will also be shown with the exceptional fine attraction.

Parallel Histories of Some Famous Movie Stars

It is not generally known that D. W. Griffith's spectacle "Intolerance", which will appear at the Grand next Monday as a special attraction for fair week, was in course of construction in advance of the making of his other big spectacle, "The Birth of a Nation," and that the players in the former picture were transferred when their scenes were over to the latter screen. It is interesting to those familiar with both pictures to note the versatility of some of these Griffith stars who, with few exceptions, were entirely unknown on the screen until Mr. Griffith employed them.

The versatility of these Griffith actors and actresses is noted in the widely different characters they portrayed in these nearly concurrent productions. For instance in "The Birth of a Nation" Mae Marsh was a very young girl and in "Intolerance" she is a young woman who saves from a life of crime a youth, played by Robert Harron. In the first produced spectacle Mr. Harron portrayed the younger son of a southern family of affluence while in "Intolerance" he is the son of a mill-hand, and is swept into a city's undercurrent.

From playing a negro villain in "The Birth of a Nation," Walter Long now gives us a new type of "heavy," that of a musketeer of the slums, in "Intolerance." George Seigmann, who led the negro rebellion from his office as lieutenant-governor in "The Birth of a Nation," now leads the Persians against Babylon, his role in "Intolerance" being that of Cyrus the Great.

AT THE ALLEN NEXT FRIDAY AND SATURDAY

An exponent of motherhood's graces in "The Birth," Josephine Crowell now visualizes the cruel Catherine de Medici. Lillian Gish is the eternal mother rocking the cradle of humanity in "nItolerance." She was given this role before "The Birth" was begun, but in that spectacle Miss Gish was cast for the leading part.

Although his name was widely known for his work on the spoken stage, Spottiswood Aiken had not been heard of in the screen world when he was cast in "Intolerance." However, like the others, Mr. Aiken became famous as a screen actor in "The Birth" before his first picture was completed. He was the southern planter in "The Birth." Typifying the finely reared daughter of southern aristocracy, Miriam Cooper gave to her role in "The Birth of a Nation" the naturalness of bearing that her convent training has given to her. In "Intolerance" Miss Cooper goes to the other extreme portraying a woman of the underworld.

Margaret Illington, the famous dramatic star, who will be remembered for her successes on the speaking stage in "Within the Law" and "Kindling," will be the star in "The Inner Shrine" at the Allen Wednesday and Thursday next.

The announcement that Miss Illington had decided to appear in photodrama caused the greatest interest in motion picture circles since the announcement that Geraldine Farrar was to appear on the screen, as Miss Illington has always been considered one of America's most distinguished and popular actresses.

The story of "The Inner Shrine" is said to be exactly suited to Miss Illington's personality and gives her ample opportunity to display her wonderful versatility in running the gamut of emotions.

The story is from a popular novel which was later prepared for the stage by the noted dramatic author, Channing Pollock, and has to do with a wealthy young American girl who marries a titled but unscrupulous Frenchman.

The Lasky company has surrounded Miss Illington with a splendid cast including Hobart Bosworth, Elliott Dexter, Jack Holt and Earnest Joy.

Many of the scenes of "The Inner Shrine" are laid in France and the production abounds in beautiful settings. The production is being made for the Lasky-Paramount company under the direction of Frank Reicher.

Charley Chaplin May Get One Million a Year

Broadway theatrical and movie stars were startled when they heard that Charley Chaplin, the English comedian, had received an offer of a salary of $1,000,000 for his services for one year, beginning about September 1. According to the report that reached the Rialto, Chaplin, who is now at work at Los Angeles on the final part of his contract with the Mutual Film company, for which he is paid a salary of $670,000 a year, will average more than $20,000 a week in his new job, as he is to receive a bonus of $50,00 for signing the "million-dollar contract."

The report that Chaplin was to receive the largest salary ever paid to a performer in the history of the amusement world could not be confirmed through his brother and manager, S. Chaplin. Mrs. Chaplin, wife of the manager, who was at the Hotel Claridge, said her husband was away with a yachting party. Mrs. Chaplin said she had heard of negotiations for the services of her brother-in-law, but knew nothing of his signing a contract or what amount had been offered him.

S. L. Rothapfel, proprietor of the Rialto theater, said the offer of $1,000,000 a year had been made to Chaplin by the First National Exhibitors circuit, a new picture organization, of which Rothapfel is the president, but he had no contract to show that the deal had been completed. Mr. Rothapfel said he expected to make an announcement to that effect within a day or two, or as soon as cash advances had been made to bind the agreement.

It was said that 24 other moving picture men were interested with Rothapfel in the First National Exhibitors' circuit, each of whom was to have exclusive rights to the Chaplin productions in certain territories.

A week ago it was reported that the Mutual Film company had offered to raise Chaplin's salary to the million mark providing he would produce a series of 12 pictures during the year. This he considered too big a task. It is said that he will engage himself according to the Exhibitors' Circuit contract to produce a series of eight pictures.

Movies Act on All the Senses

An Italian scientist has gathered some interesting psychological data with reference to the "movies." He was led to conduct his investigations in this relation by a curious circumstance. In watching the projection of a series of pictures representing a religious ceremony in the east, he distinctly heard the sound of bells.

When the film had been wound off and the illusion was at an end, the psychologist observed that in the orchestra there were no instruments other than stringed ones. He reached the conclusion that he had been the victim of auto-suggestion.

Another time this gentleman was afforded still another instance of auto-suggestion, when there was being shown a reel depicting a farmyard with men unloading a hay cart. The scientist asserts that he smelt fresh hay, and his assistant, sitting by his side, claimed to have had the same sensation.

As they glanced about for an explanation they observed that a spectator nearby had scented himself with some strong perfume. This they had not before observed; and now that it greeted their senses, they both remarked that it bore no relation whatever to the scent of new mown hay. The inference was clearly that the perfumed man had indirectly produced the illusion in their minds by stimulating, so to speak, the imagination of their sense of smell.

From these and similar experiences the Italian psychologist concludes that the moving picture acts upon all the senses. By some mysterious association, it would seem, it can delude the "warders of the brain." While the eye seems to see things actually moving, the ear hears the noise made by them, the nostrils catch up their smell, the skin itself feels hot or cold. The sense of taste alone remains unaffected.

Pearl White, the Pathe star, no sooner gets through with one serial than another is thrust upon her. Her last, "Pearl of the Army," showed her as rescuing America from its secret foes. Now she is working in "The Fatal Ring," which has her undergoing many startling adventures and hairbreadth escapes. Astra is producing the serial for Pathe and the cast includes Warner Oland, the renowned "heavy" of "Patria," and Ruby Hoffman. Fred Jackson wrote the story.

Ruth Roland, star of Pathe's "The Neglected Wife," has definitely decided to put into practice the theories which she has formed during her work in the serial. Her part, be it noted, was that of "the other woman." When Miss Roland arrived in New York on the completion of the serial she is reported to have said that the reason for much marital unhappiness is the too great latitude allowed to the husband by the wife and a neglect on the part of many wives to take pains to retain the love they had once won. Now Miss Roland has gone and got married. The happy bridegroom is Lionel Kent, of Los Angeles, who made her acquaintance on the coast and who for some weeks has been conducting an ardent wooing campaign by mail and telegram. As Miss Roland is supposed to believe that a husband should confine himself to two cigars a day and that he should devote his days to business and his evenings to his home it will be interesting to see if her theories work out in practice.

To induce the purchase of Liberty Loan bonds among the employes of the Pathe Exchange, Inc., the great motion picture company, J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager, has offered to buy the bonds and permit the subscribing employes to pay for them at the rate of $1 per week for each $50 bond.

This offer has been telegraphed to each of the 30 branch offices in the United States as well as to all the studios and factories. It is believed there will be a large response.

Will M. Ritchey, who graduated into film writing from newspaper editorial work, recently joined the Astra forces, producers of many pictures for Pathe. He is one of the best known photoplaywrights in the business.

"Who Pays?" established him as a writer par excellence of sustained continuity. Next came "The Red Circle." Since then Ritchey has done "The Neglected Wife," now being released by Pathe. He has also turned out many feature photoplays.

THE REASON WHY

An English militant crusader strolled into a barn when a young man was milking a cow. With a snort she asked: "How is it that you are not at the front, young man?"

"Because ma'am," answered the milker, "there ain't no milk at that end."

Mr. and Mrs. M. Muscovitch and little son have returned today from the eastern states where they have been spending their holidays.

Mrs. Smith, from Brandon, who was formerly Miss Greta Moffitt, is expected home on a visit with her mother, Mrs. Alexander Moffitt, the first of the week.

The Misses Haverson, who have been visiting Mrs. George Wright for a fortnight, left on Saturday for Edmonton en route to their home in Brandon. During their stay in Calgary they were the recipient of many social affairs.

Dr. Norris of Seattle, returned to Calgary a few days ago en route to his ranch. Dr. Norris is so impressed with the future possibilities of Alberta that he has purchased 2,000 acres near Drumheller and will follow agricultural pursuits for the time being.

WEDDINGS

DE LURE—ROBINSON

The marriage took place of Miss Mary Robinson on July 3 to Mr. Charle H. De Lure, at the home of the bride, 730 Eighth avenue west, the Rev. C. R. Bland officiating. The rooms were prettily decorated with pink carnations and smilax. The bride was prettily attired in a hand embroidered white silk gown and carried a bouquet of bridal roses. She was unattended. After the dinner given for the immediate relatives the happy couple left on the midnight train for the eastern states.

BOOK REVIEWS

"THE NEW ERA IN CANADA"

J. M. Dent & Son, Publishers. $1.25 at All News Stands

A book which is now electrifying the Canadian people is called "The New Era in Canada," a volume of essays written by prominent Canadians dealing with questions of the day. It speaks of subjects of present day importance and will find a place in the hearts of readers of all classes. Bankers and financial men, politicians, mayors of cities, manufacturers, business men, etc., will read with great interest the essays written by men of renown. Conspicuous among the writers are Stephen Leacock, Sir Edmund Walker, G. Frank Beer, Sir Clifford Sifton, Peter McArthur, Dr. J. O. Miller, Sir John Willison, Professor Frank Adams, Archbishop McNeil, etc. No other book yet published will be of such vital interest to the Canadian people.

NO SWIMMING ALLOWED

Some one has been taking regular baths in the city reservoir, which supplies water to the city of Calgary, is the startling news which has reached our ears. However, this is emphatically denied by the caretaker, Andrew Haxton.

LIFE TRIUMPHANT

Love, laugh and work," sang Elbert Hubbard, and his song lives after him.

LOVE!

We must not only love individuals, but we must love in that larger sense that takes in the whole world.

It is sweet to have one particular being enshrined in the inner temple of one's heart and to know the joy of unselfish devotion to that loved one; but such love, rightly understood, melts the heart until it is inclusive rather than exclusive—until the humblest human being who comes within the radius of our influence is the recipient of some form of our favor, until the face of every flower and dumb animal looks good to us and we read Divine Love in everything.

LAUGH!

What is more inspiring than honest laughter! We should each day make merry with those about us, and learn to extract a laugh from the most commonplace incidents. We should not only begin each day with a laugh, but we should cultivate a sense of humor, for it is a saving grace. There is no situation so grave that a kindly laugh will not relieve the tension.

WORK!

No life is complete without a daily task, and fortunate are those who must toil for a living. It is the salvation of both body and soul. It must be purposeful, however; something that we love and that leads us upward and onward. It must be something with a vision that makes for growth.

No normal person is so accursed by Fate that he has not a work born with him.

One must find one's particular work and then apply himself patiently and persistently at it. Success will come to him who has the genius of work within him.

What is more satisfying than the sense of a well-earned victory!

LOVE, LAUGH AND WORK!

Life will be triumphant then.

Clothes That Science Has Decreed to Wear

To Avoid the Peril of Bad Health Attention Should Be Given to All Wearing Apparel.

We have a number of good excuses for wearing clother. They capture and retain the body heat; afford us a defence against the wind; they protect us from the tissue and energy-destroying rays of the sun; they preserve us from the bumps, scratches, cuts and bruises that embitter our fair young lives, and they keep at bay the hordes of bloodthirsty mosquitoes and other insects that might otherwise devour us.

They also absorb the perspiration and assist the skin in performing its natural function of getting rid of body debris and other impediments to our glad, free progress through life. And they keep out the rain and snow, prevent the tarnishing of our complexions and the rusting of our internal machinery.

They are also the most effective means of adornment ever invented, and have afforded mankind—and especially womankind—more opportunities for exhibiting artistic temperament and the variegated spectra of their aura than all other measures combined. A little shrimp who, without clothes, might closely resemble a forked radish on a stick, by the aid of habiliments, bodily garniture and ornamentation, may plump himself into the Solomon class without an effort.

The woman who was otherwise engaged when Pandora liberated pulchritude, by a judicious enswathment in recherche garments a la mode, easily puts the Queen of Sheba in the "also ran" class.

Also, as an A1, free-hand topic of conversation — inexhaustible and boundless as the farthest reaches of the empyrean blue—clothes can give the war babies and the high cost of living cards and spades, and beat them blindfolded.

But what most interests us here is what bad clothes do to good health, and why they do it.

Perhaps the most ridiculous and undertaker-encouraging fashion in clothes—since those old days when the Spartans wore the same weight toga in the winter that they did in the summer, and got very tough or died doing it—is the quite generally employed fashion of draping the female chest—a most admirable costume, if only it were restricted to summer wear.

I refer to the "low neck" in-and-outdoor uniform of women. Its captious critics called it "daring." But the most daring thing about it was wearing it while breasting the sleet, snow and boreal winds of a kindly but frosty winter, while protected by nothing thicker than a thin skin and an inadequately adjusted fur boa.

Naturally a certain amount of resistance to exposure was developed. But thousands of cases of bronchitis, pneumonia and catarrhal throat conditions were evolved, which the medical profession is not yet through patching up, and the seeds sown for none can say how many cases of tuberculosis, neuritis and general conditions which would logically follow the physical depression of exposure.

A judicious amount of exposure is helpful But nobody who has anything to do with fabricating fashions seems to understand that there is such a word as "judicious" in the dictionary.

The perfectly senseless wearing of sheer stockings in low-cut, thin-soled shoes for "dress purposes"—if not for all purposes—is another example of sacrificing sense to style. Even in the summer the occasional "east winds" of our coast towns and the damp, penetrating breezes of inland resorts and cities are best met with something more heat-conserving than bare feet. If reasons were as thick as blackberries, there is not in the whole apologetical gamut one that would convince the veriest simpleton that this practice has anything sensible, utilitarian or advantageous in it—except perhaps its sex appeal.

For the available energy in the body is limited to so much engine power, so much capacity for assimilating food and converting it into heat and force. Therefore any extraordinary demands made upon it inevitably reduce the total stock.

For example, if a certain amount of energy is required to digest a meal, the brain during this period is capable of only a proportion of its maximum power for work. By the same token, if the system must "scare up" a definite amount of heat and energy to maintain the body at a uniform temperature of 98 degrees, and there are extraordinary demands placed upon it—as, for instance, to keep a pair of bare feet and legs from chilling, while supplying heat and energy for the remainder of the body—the resistance of other organs is lessened. In the event of an exposure to noxious germs, with just a little extra fatigue, or a wetting, this results frequently in some one or more of the acute "exposure" infections.

So if there exists any quicker or surer way of "catching" anything catchable than to wear low shoes or thin-soled slippers and gauze stockings, even in cool summer evenings, no doctor has ever heard of it.

Clothing, even summer clothing, should be sufficiently heavy to insure the proper functioning of the skin and the conservation of body heat, and at the same time, even in winter, be as light as possible, consistent with adequate protection.

It should afford freedom of movement and should be so planned and built as to afford protection to all parts of the body—particularly the delicate throat and lungs and the extremities—which are our veritable Achilles tendons.

It should be sufficiently porous and loose to afford the air a chance to circulate and carry off the sensible and insensible perspiration.

But probably if we had enough sense to wear proper clothes, adequately adapted to promote the greatest comfort and efficiency under all climates and weathers, we wouldn't be wearing clothes; we would be wearing harps and wings.

A CHILD LED MANY

Nearly Fifty Men Were Converted by a Nine Year Old Girl Evangelist

Pittsburg.—Mary Agnes Vichestain, 9 years old, daughter of former Police Magistrate J. H. Vichestain, spoke the other night at the Union Rescue Mission. This youthful evangelist, by painting vividly the pitfalls that await the careless youth, caused nearly fifty men to drop on their knees and ask for forgiveness for their sins, beseeching Mary Agnes to pray for them.

The little girl's impassioned pleas were several times interrupted when she began to cry. With a final sob of "Oh, men, come here and let me pray for you and shake you by the hand. Come to me and proclaim your conversion and set an example to the rest. Please come and let me kneel and pray for you!" Mary sank to her knees and prayed aloud.

Men stumbled over one another to reach the little girl. With cries of "Save me! Oh, pray for me!" they rushed to her feet and proclaimed their desires for a better life in their own picturesque language.

One young man who had been seemingly unaffected suddenly rose to his feet and, running down the aisle, shouted: "Little girl, ask God to save my soul and if he will I'll enlist in the army tomorrow and fight for my country."

TIMELY HINTS FOR THE HOUSEKEEPER

When ironing—When ironing rub your iron to clean it on a piece of brown paper sprinkled with rough salt.

To Soften Water—If the water in which you wish to wash the flannels is hard use two teaspoonfuls of glycerine to a tub of water.

To Remove the Smell of Onions—If a pot you need has a smell of onions fill it with boiling water and drop in a red hot cinder.

To Clean Real Lace—If you want to clean real lace carefully place it between folds of tissue paper well sprinkled with calcined magnesia and put it between the leaves of a book under a weight for two or three days. Shake out the powder and the lace will be found quite clean.

To Polish Grained Wood—Soak a flannel in a little linseed oil and rub the wood well. Then polish with a dry, soft cloth.

When a Dark Suit Gets Shiny—If you have aserge suit that looks shiny you can often give it a fresh appearance by sponging it well with hot vinegar and press it in the usual way. No odor of vinegar will remain.

Here is an easy way to wash dishes. After the meal all dishes are stacked upon a large tray and carried to the kitchen table. On the legs of the table are steel guides, making it an easy matter to move. With the tray on it, the table is pulled close to the sink. As soon as the cooking utensils are emptied they are filled with water and put to soak.

If you happen to run out of silver polish and there is none at hand, try rubbing each article with a clean, soft cloth dipped in a little kerosene. Follow this with a good wash in warm suds, rinse in hot water and dry.

ITALIAN OMELET

Chop very fine one cpuful of cold cooked macaroni and add one onion grated, one green pepper minced very fine and cooked in two tablespoonfuls of shortening until tender, taking care not to brown. Now break three eggs in bowl and beat until light with a fork. Pour in a well heated pan containing two tablespoonfuls of shortening. Spread over the prepared macaroni and turn the molet, using either a spatula or cake turner. Fold and roll. Serve on hot platter and garnish with parsley.

THE NEW SILHOUETTE

To conform with the government recommendation that all dressees shall be made very simply, a well known designer says:

"I, personally, believe that the princess dresses with Eton coats will be the favorite models. The stout woman can wear a princess line to the best advantage, and the slim woman looks smart in Eton. With the skirts scant and a little longer, I think that a suggestion of fullness over the hips for the small figure will give style, and still not use much cloth. With the close fitted dress and coat, an individual touch can be given by a smart flare on the coat, which is finger tip length. Tailored lines without trimming would not only carry out the wish of the government, but would be a decidedly new style feature.

THE HEIGHT OF PRAISE

Here is the warmest and finest of praise,
Here are the words that will flatter a man,
Search where you will there is never a phrase
Fitted to please as this little one can;
Say that he's clever, he's foxy, he's "there,"
Say that he's witty or say that he's sly,
None of them please him as when you declare,
"He's a regular guy!"

Pleased you may be when they say you are square,
Happy is he who is hailed as a brick,
Say a man's handsome, or quite debonnair,
Ply him with praises and lay 'em on thick;
Say that he's honest and true as the day,
Never you'll find one, however you try,
Able to please or to cheer him as, "Say, "He's a regular guy!"

Poets of old may have sung in their time
Praises of those they opined were the class,
Rhapsodies sung in a rapture of rhyme,
Hailing a lad (though mere often a lass),
Strumming their zithers in efforts to please.
Many a paean of praise did they try,
Seldom their words were as happy as these:
"He's a regular guy!"

FARMING AND LIVESTOCK

THE SUCCESSFUL FARMER

NO man is going to do much good at farming or anything else unless he is interested in that line. The instances in which a neglected business continues successful are very rare indeed. In all lines of mercantile service both the buying and selling must be looked after sharply, and where things are sold on credit the collecting is a vital point which cannot be neglected if bankkruptcy is to be avoided. There is usually plenty to do in any successful enterprise. The person on whom the business depends for success must think about it and must feel a deep and abiding interest in it. If there ever were any self-acting opportunities which kept themselves going they have been pre-empted for many years and those who would succeed these days must make their own opportunities and must know how to keep them alive.

There is no line in which a deeper interest or greater care is necessary than in farming. There are many things to do in order to succeed on a farm, and most of them are tasks which must be performed at a certain time, and tasks that are apt to be interfered with by bad weather, rains, drouths, early or late frosts, unreliable markets, overwhelming competition, bad health, insects or other pests, inability to secure necessary capital or labor, or by other acts of God or the public enemy.

A successful farmer must be a man who thinks and acts; but that is not all. He must be a man who feels. He must be interested in the plant and animal life of the farm. Such interest may not be absolutely necessary in certain lines in the cities or towns, but it is a necessary stimulus in the life of the man whose business is in the country.

There are undoubtedly many who are lacking in the attachment for the things of farm life, and some of these may make it go for a season; in fact, thousands of them drag along and endure it, while getting a living out of it and possibly increasing their substance in exceptional instances. It may be said that many in other lines drag through life in the same way; but surely such a drag-through, such a continuous pull-on-behind, the world cannot set down as a success. It is the person who is interested in his employment who is successful in it. It holds his attention. It excites his curiosity. It keeps his mind alive. It affords him employment, not only because of the profit he hopes to make out of it, but because it is an important part of his life.

Of late better roads and the automobile, better schools, the newly instituted rural credit system and the ready co-operation of the national and state agricultural departments have all done their share toward making farm life more livable and more productive. It now remains for the nation at large—the man in the street, the men in the trades and the professions—to grant the farmer their unquestioned regard.

The farmer is one of the few genuine craftsmen left to the world. However much he may avail himself of mechanical aids, the bulk of his work is carried on by hand. Moreover he does not suffer the bane of modern trade specialization; he plows the ground, he plants the seed, he cultivates the soil, he harvests.

Thoroughness cannot be claimed as a modern Canadian trait. Its absence mars our manufacturing, scholarship, and organizations. It leaves our defensive forces in chaos and makes us a mockery to our foes. The future of Canada depends very much on the ability of the people to acquire some of the steady, patient thoroughness which characterizes the farmer—the thoroughness that soils the hands and gnarls the knuckles and has little regard for appearances so long as it can be depended on for untiring work when national security is threatened.

Once on a time the world and his wife thought that war was fought by soldiers alone—men in glistening armor, men in chain mail, a multitude of spearmen and knights in all the colorful panoply of battle.

Then arose the great hoax that, at will, bankers could start, sustain and stop a war. God favored the battalions with the heaviest money bags. Wall Street, Lombard Street and the Rue de la Vrilliere were held to be the real battlefields.

In the course of the present conflict we have experienced a third readjustment of values; we have discovered that war is sustained and seen through to victory by the men in the furrows. God fights on the side with the biggest crops. Battles are fought and won, ideals attained or lost in the quiet, rolling fields.

Heretofore the farmer represented to some extent, a lower order of being. He was held to be unpolished, unsophisticated, unlettered — and hence negligible. He was a butt for jokes; stubbornly the hayseed clung to his hair. Unevenly matched with capricious Nature, he took what he could wrench from her, and was humbly thankful.

Our vision! We have seen valleys of death where the rivers run crimson and men do noble and magnificent things; we have seen watery valleys down which mighty ships went to terrible destruction before the inexorable powers of the deep. But for grandeur, for strength, for nobility what can compare with valleys standing so thick with corn that they laugh and sing!

We cannot fully appreciate this grandeur of the field until we understand the man who makes it possible. And when we understand him, new light will be shed on the movement which leads men back to the soil and keeps them there.

One of the most serious problems we face is the tendency of the young people to become dissatisfied with life on the farm. They will follow any legitimate lure for a change in life and more money. One can scarcely blame them. In the past, farm life has not been made attractive, the farmer has not been given the position, respect and co-operation he deserved.

The Farmer Has Now Come Into His Own

The War Does Not Depend Entirely on the Soldier, Popular Impression to the Contrary—The Tiller and Breeder Do Their Part.

As the attrition of war wastes down the world, we have begun to see that in the farmer's hands rests the ultimate decision. And since we have come to consider his position seriously, we find that for generations he has been deciding many things besides the outcome of war. Back of political strife and the manoeuvering of diplomats, back of economic struggle and the complaints of a million workers has stood the farmer.

The great difference between the present and the past position of the farmer is that previously he did not know that the destiny of nations rested in his hands. Today he is fully aware of his potentialities. No longer can legislation neglect him, no longer can bankers hold him in fee. He is in a position to demand attention and respect. But he has his weakness: he is at present, the one great race of workers lacking in the ideals of solidarity. When the American farmers shall have banded together for their mutual profit and advantage—and signs in the west show that they are already doing so—the rest of the nation's workers will appreciate the true value of the man who tills the soil. The man at the forge, the man in the mines, the man at the loom—these have demanded and gained a hearing. Certainly the American farmer, who never strikes is as much entitled to regard as a Polish miner who has not even taken the trouble to be naturalized and is eternally demanding his "rights."

If the war will gain for the farmer a proper regard, then the whole farming situation here in the United States will take on a different aspect and present a different future.

Ideals may be born in the soul of man, but the attainment of them starts in the soil. Back to that soil must man go to find the ultimate, fundamental things of life. We thought we knew where these were to be found—yet how limited was

THE PRESENT CONFLICT WAS FORETOLD IN 1600

Although Written Almost 400 Years Ago Brother Johanne's Prophesies Certainly Have a Strong Bearing on the Present Times

In the workshop of the Parish Magazine, under date of August 2, 1914, attention is called to Brother Johanne's prophecies written about the year 1600. It will bear repeating, although the war has been going on for three years, in view of the fact that the developments up to date are in keeping with the forecasts.

It is a prophecy about Anti-Christ, and it identifies Anti-Christ with the Prussion emperor, while the Allies in opposition to him are called the defenders of the lamb. It should be added that the "Black Eagle" stands for Germany, the "White Eagle" for Russia, the "Cock" for France, the "Leopard" for Great Britain, and "The other eagle" for Austria. Here then are some of the prophesies:

The real Anti-Christ will be one of the monarchs of his time, a Lutheran Protestant. He will invoke God and give himself out as his messenger. This prince of lies will swear by the Bible. He will represent himself as the arm of the most high sent to chastise corrupt people. He will have only one arm, but his innumerable armies will resemble the infernal legions. For a long time he will act by craft and strategy. His spies shall overrun the earth. He will have learned men in his pay who will maintain and undertake to prove his celestial mission. Anti-Christ will be recognized by various tokens, especially he will massacre the priests, the women, the children, and aged. He will pass along, torch in hand, but invoking God.

Next as to the army of which each side is composed, not even all Christians and all Musselmen, but even other more distant armies will be involved from the four quarters of the globe. Anti-Christ will have a confederate who will also have an eagle on his arms. He will be a Christian.

Anti-Christ's army will surpass anything that can be imagined. There will be Christians among the cohorts and there will be Mohammedan and heathen soldiers among the defenders of the lamb. What Anti-Christ will accomplish is shown by the following:—

The Black Eagle (Germany) will hurl itself upon the cock (France), which will lose many feathers, but will strike herocially with its spurs. It would soon be exhausted but for the aid of the Leopard (Great Britain) and its claws. The Black Eagle, which will come from the land of Luther, will make an attack upon the cock from another side and will invade the land of the cock up to one half. On the other hand we learn that the wh'te eagle (Russia), which will come from the north, and fall upon the black and other eagle (Austria), and will completely invade the land of the Anti-Christ. The Black Eagle will find itself forced to let go the cock to fight the White Eagle, whereupon the Cock and the Leopard will have to pursue the Black Eagle into the land of the Anti-Christ to aid the White Eagle. The battles fought up to the invasion by the land of the Anti-Christ will be nothing compared to those which will take place in the Lutheran country. Men will be able to cross the rivers upon the bodies of the dead, which will in places change the stream, and to the carnage of the battlefields will be added the destruction of myriads who will die by hunger and pestilence.

According to Brother Johanne this is a religious war, and your attention is called to it for this reason. To fight and win against the Anti-Christ, Britain, France and Russia must become Christian in deed as well as fame. Of these Britain in the first did not take the war as seriously as she might have. Many of her people still neglect their God, and though He should use her in overthrowing the Anti-Christ that does not necessarily say that she will be retained in that victorious position.

Such is the prophecy of old Brother Johanne, written about the year 1600 A.D. Each day finds the prophecy becoming more and more true. It is true that the kaiser has invoked God and proclaimed himself as His messenger. He stated that before God his conscience was clear, and swore by the Bible. His innumerable armies do represent the infernal legions, seemingly countless. His spies more than overrun the earth from U. S. to Japan. How true is his prophecy of the massacre of monks, priests, women and children—Germany's march of death through Belgium. The monk predicts the overthrow of Prussian militarism, but before this is accomplished men, more men, and still more men must fill the gaps, and it is not until all give their hearty co-operation that the German fortress will crumble.

CONSCRIPTION WILL BE NECESSARY TO SAVE THE COUNTRY

Leading Military Authority Diagnose the Situation in Which He Shows that Allies Have So Far Failed to Accomplish All They Claim

If the opponents of conscription really understood the situation or the dire necessity for such a measure being adopted we doubt very much if there would be any material opposition to the bill.

According to the views of a military expert published in the Times shows that:

On land, the German army has yielded the aggressive superiority, the control. The British army has done its share and done it well—in fact, it may be called a marvel of efficiency and good work; but, they have been unable to accomplish what they set out to do, because the plucky French have failed. It is stalled, worn out, and almost at the end of its offensive resources. This was foreseen a year ago. The future depends upon the British holding on and making what progress they can, until the new American army come to their assistance in full force.

On the sea, however, the British navy has lost its old-time control. It is not pleasant to admit, but it is too true. A situation has developed which we have very much feared—a possibility we plainly indicated in these columns as long ago as October, 1914, when we were urging greater preparations in Canada. When our Canadian and British leaders spoke of a few months' war, we said, that, unless the British fleets were defeated in the meantime, the war would go on five or six years. This was no guess, it was estimated on actual information obtained from the best sources. Our Navy is not defeated, but it has been rendered useless by German mines and submarines. This menace is becoming increasingly successful. So far nothing has been devised to effectively counteract it. We were on the way to certain defeat when the United States came in. Arrangements made with them are a very great help, and we hope will eventually be effective in enabling us to again regain control of the seas. But we must not count upon them.

The one thing we must de is to hold on in France, to give time for the reorganization of our Navy. It must be made as efficient as our new army—in the hope that with more intelligent direction, and in co-operation, with the United States, we may devise effective naval tactics. At the outset the Navy was more efficient than the Army, but Churchill and Asquith, ignoring the advice of the experts, brought on disorganization, disaster and defeat, from which it has not yet recovered.

Russia is out, for the present, at least. France is done and the whole cause of Canada today is resting on the British Army. If we fail, we will, most assuredly, have a German army at Quebec and Halifax, and, if the British government does not handle our Asiatic relations more intelligently, we will have our present ally, Japan, attacking us at Vancouver. This is a menace that must not be lost sight of.

The Chautauqua Plan and How It Operates

A famous man once said that there was no being, however wise, who could not learn or be taught now. It was on these very grounds that the great chautauqua movement was founded. Chautauqua—what do you think when this name strikes your ears? It is a name very well known to our American cousins; it is a movement directly fostered and supported personally by more business and professional men than any one world movement, either educational, social, or political. In thirty years this movement has grown from one assembly to over 5,000 assemblies. It is a movement which brings the world's greatest scientists, authors, lecturers, statesmen musicians, and entertainers to the doors of more than 12,000,000 people, who otherwise are practically shut out from the outside world. More than 250,000 public spirited men and women in United States and Canada, willingly obligate themselves for the the financial responsibility necessary to bring chatauqua to their respective communities.

Even as yet you have not probably grasped the meaning of the chautauqua movement. Soon Calgary will be ringing with the name of it.

The great open air meetings will be held here in a month and it is expected that every man, woman and child in this community will flock to hear the distinguished performers. The chautauqua meetings, without exception, are always held under canvas, because chautauqua promotes healthy minds and healthy bodies and fresh air and plenty of it.

Committees of this movement have been formed in forty Canadian towns and cities this year, similar to the 300 in United States which are getting their talent from Canadians.

Chautauqua is not a circus, or a moving picture show, but it is simply a sort of twentieth century fair which features intellect, oratory, art, music and entertaining rather that prize cattle. Chautauqua is purely educational and has solved the problem of clean wholesome public entertainment. Without touch of creed or denomination the Chautauqua is consistently a true expression of practical Christianity. It is Catholic only in a sense that it embraces all creeds and faiths; Protestant only in that it protests against all evil. World democracy is one of the aims of this movement, the suppression of autocracy, and the mutual friendship of man for man.

With these facts at your finger tips is it to be wondered why more people annually attend Chautauqua than league baseball.

The following are promoting the movement with vigor in Calgary:—G. W. Kirby, Alex. Calhoun, Lawrence Lambert, H. R. Chauncey, J. H. Woods C. A. Hayden, Dr. A. M. Scott, J. S. Ryan, R. J. Lydiatt, Mrs. R. R. Jamieson, A. C. Wisehart, E. W. Kolb, J. A. Irvine, S. G. Freeze, P. J. Parker, Geo. W. Craig, E. L. Richardson, P. N. Brecken, Mrs. Georgiana Newhall, W. T. D. Lathwell, J. Austin Huntley, D. E. Black, R. H. Meritt, W. Lewing, J. H. Ford, E. Gardener, A. S. Nimmo, R. Dawson, P. Harcourt O'Reilly, Allen Cameron, Chas. A. Stewart, Frederick Graham, E. C. Paget, S. H Adams, Harold E. Clum, F. Horigan, G. A. Anderson, H. A. Gibson, Wm. Irvine, W. M. Davidson.

This local Chautauqua committee has pledged themselves, according to Mr. Erickson, the local Chautauqua manager, to see that tickets are sold, to the extent, that the funds collected shall be sufficient to defray half the expense of holding the meeting in Calgary.

All those who attended the lecture given by Miss Ada L. Ward will be delighted to hear that this noted English woman and her blackboard are among the Chautauqua performers; all those who are interested in astronomy must not refrain from hearing Doctor Carpenter; to those who love music the Hawaiian Quintet will indeed be a treat. Miss Olive McCormick, the famous prima donna, will charm all by her beautiful voice, and Ruthven MacDonald, the well known Canadian baritone, has a very extensive reeprtoire consisting of descriptive, humorous, operatic, scotch and Irish songs. S. Platt Jones is in the first ranks of the continents entertainers. He rivals Charlie Chaplin as a humorist and an impersonator. These are only a few of the many noted entertainers—there are also Marion Ballen Fisk, the Comus Players, Dr. Labades, Mr. Donald and Miss Hill, of Toronto; Lacklan McNeill, Miss Byron, and many others, including the Chautauqua orchestra under the supervision of the Russian director, M. Witespike,

When Chautauqua has left Calgary there will be no one who regretted seeing the twenty-two attractions. It is different every day, and the program for the morning, afternoon and evening are different in every detail.

Dr. George W. Truett: "I believe thoroughly in the proposed co-operative Chautauqua movement, both for its educational and inspirational features."

Elbert Hubbard said: "Had my foresight in 1880 been equal to my hindsight in 1909 I would have dedicated my life to the Chautauqua idea."

Thomas Edison graduated in the literary work of the Home Chautauqua and kept on reading until his diploma is well-nigh covered with seals.

William Howard Taft last year gave a large part of his vacation to the Chautauqua platform to his own personal delight and to the betterment of his audiences.

Theodore Roosevelt said: "The Chautauqua is the most American thing in America."

President Wilson, Vice-President Marshall, Champ Clark, Opie Read, Henry Van Dyke, Arthur D. Carpenter, "Billy" Sunday and many others who may be properly listed as "Great Americans" have graced the Chautauqua platform and given the movement their unqualified support.

Cheaper Feed For Poultrymen

On account of the scarcity and high price of feed the poultry industry of this country is threatened by the prospect of the wholesale slaughter of laying stock and a serious falling off in the number of pullets to be matured.

The necessity for retaining for milling every possible bushel of wheat suitable for that purpose need not be emphasized. To provide poultrymen with feed for rearing their young stock with unnecessarily lowering the supplies of milling wheat, the federal department of agriculture has requested millers throughout Canada to put on the market the cracked and shrunken wheat removed from grain before it is milled.

In addition to small and broken wheat these cleanings consist chiefly of the seeds of wild buckwheat, a near relative of the cultivated buckwheat. The poultry division of the Central Experimental farm has used wild buckwheat in feeding experiments and reports it to be a highly satisfactory poultry feed and has ordered two cars of buckwheat screenings for the Central and branch experimental farms from the Canadian government elevators at Fort William. Fowls used to good grain do not take to it at first but when they become accustomed to it they eat it readily and do well on it.

The mill cleanings from local flour mills also contain traces of many other weed seeds, including several kinds of mustards. These, however, would not as a rule amount to more than two or three per cent. of the cleanings in the case of the standard grades of western wheat. This material is specially recommended for backyard, suburban and professional poultrymen. On farms the cleanings from yards and poultry houses where it had been fed would have to be disposed of so as not to disseminate noxious weeds in grain fields.

Those interested in obtaining this class of feed should immediately arrange with local mills or feed dealers for a supply. The mills cannot be expected to keep this material for poultry unless it is demanded for that purpose and that rests with the poultrymen themselves.

CULL THE FLOCK
(Experimental Farms Note)

The urgent need of conservation demands that all poultry not paying its way in either eggs or growth be killed for eating.

The present high prices of feed also make the keeping of such classes of poultry decidedly unprofitable as well as unpatriotic. Therefore, for your own good and for the good of the country, kill them.

There are in every poultry yard birds that have outlived their usefulness and others that will never pay their way, these might profitably be finished and marketed, not necessarily all at once but as soon as practicable, taking into account the market, etc. In these classes might be mentioned, in the order in which they should be disposed of, the following:

1. Male birds—The breeding season being over, all males should be fleshed and killed. It will cost $3 or over to keep each male until next breeding season, therefore, get rid of them; it will also be better for the layers, the eggs and the growing chicks.

2. Turkeys and waterfowl—Toms and turkey hens, geese and ducks, not absolutely needed for next year's breeding should be disposed of.

3. Hens—All hens of the heavier classes that are two years old and over might better be marketed now. In even the light classes many of this age ought to go. Others that are laying but that are not worth keeping for another year should be kept until the egg yield does not pay for the feed. Better still, keep culling out those that show signs of early moulting as you go along.

The best of the one and two-year-olds of the lightest breeds might pay to keep all summer but only the year-olds should be kept over winter and even these will stand culling fairly closely.

4. Broilers—If broilers are early it pays best to sell the cockerels when two or three pounds in weight rather than to keep till heavier. This is especially so when the sexes cannot be separated and where the runs are small; the pullets will soon require all the room and green feed available.

Light breed cockerels should be sold early; it seldom pays to feed them to maturity.

5. Roasters—Don't leave the marketing of all roasters till late in the fall. Distribute this sale over as long a period as possible. Never market without finishing.

MR. GEORGE J. BURY, who succeeds Mr. D. McNicoll, is a Montrealer. He was born here in 1866, and was educated at the Montreal College. His whole career has been spent in the service of the C.P.R. He started work in 1883 as clerk in the Purchasing Department of the C.P.R. Since then he has made a steady progression upward. He became Secretary to the Vice-President, now Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, and President, Sir William Van Horne, successively, in 1887, and Acting Superintendent of the Sleeping Car Service in 1889. In 1904, Mr. Bury was appointed General Superintendent of the central division of the C.P.R. at Winnipeg, and continued in that office some time. Since then Mr. Bury has always been engaged in the western work of the Canadian Pacific, and when a few years ago the late Sir William Whyte retired from the western executive office, Mr. Bury was appointed to succeed him as Vice-President. Since that time Mr. Bury has been in charge of the western interests of the C.P.R. During much of his career, Mr. Bury has worked in close touch with Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, Sir William Van Horne, and Mr. David McNicoll, and is fully imbued with the progressive C.P.R. spirit. Mr. Bury takes up his duties at Montreal on January 1st.

MARKET AND FINANCE

Winnipeg, July 10, 1917.

Wheat—The wheat market situation has been rather mixed throughout the past week, for owing to the movement of new winter wheat, just beginning in a small way in Oklahoma and Texas, prices at winter wheat markets in the United States have declined, while at spring wheat markets they have advanced, owing to good general demand and moderate receipts. The decline in the winter wheat markets seems really to be caused by the prohibiting of trading in future deliveries on the grain exchanges and boards of trade. Because of this, country dealers and elevator companies cannot hedge the wheat they may purchase from the farmers. There is no broad purchasing power coming between the buyers who purchase direct from the farmers, and the millers and exporters, who stand practically next to the great consuming public. For want of this, the buyer who buys the farmers' wheat, must find some miller or exporter to whom he can sell it, or perhaps consign shipments to a commission merchant at some central market town or city, where he has to take the chance of getting it sold at a profit or the risp of having to sell it at a loss or else hold on to it at expense of storage, etc., until he can decide to sell. This will result in the prices offered and paid to the farmer being much lower than they would be if there was a good healthy futures market going, where the buyer at country points, whether an individual local dealer or a line elevator company, could at all times without any delay sell practically any quantity of wheat day by day and scarcey depress the market at all. In fact it would just be getting back to the way the business was handled 30 years ago, before we had any grain exchange or any rules or regulations as regards trading. The food administration in the United States, and the board of grain supervisors in Canada, are to have the control of the distribution and movement of the wheat crops in the two countries. The executive of the Canadian board are at present at Washington, conferring with the American administration, but so far nothing definite has been published as to what regulations they may make. The main objects are to have all surplus wheat go for the use of the allies, and control prices so that they will continue high enough to encourage the farmer to increase production, and at the same time set a limit of maximum price, in order that speculative buying may be held in check, and restrained from carrying prices to an excessive height. Until these administrators and commissioners adopt a definite policy with rules and regulations to govern the trade, all interested must await the result in patience. Yesterday, the United States government crop report for July was published. The favorable weather for the winter wheat crop in June, resulted in an estimated increase over the June report in probable yield of winter wheat of 29,000,000 bushels, bringing it up to 402,000,000 bushels. Spring wheat, however, owing principally to dry backward weather in part of North Dakota decreased 7,00,000 bushels from the June estimate, making it 276,000,000 bushels. Together, winter and spring wheat indication at July 1 is for a yield of 678,000,000 bushels against 640,000,000 bushels, the final estimate of yield last year, an increase over last year of 38,000,000 bushels. This, of course, may be further increased or decreased according to weather to be experienced during the remainder of the season. The estimated probable production of corn and oats in the United States by the July report is also large. The corn crop is given as 3,124,000,000 bushels against after harvest estimate last year of 2,583,000,000 bushels and oats estimated this year 1,453,000,000 bushels against actual production of 1,252,000,000 bushels last year. World's shipments from exporting to importing countries last week were liberal at 9,499,000 bushels against 11,012,000 bushels last year. The United States visible supply decreased 1,572,000 bushels against a decrease of 799,000 bushels last year, and the total is now 12,647,000 bushels against 41,829,000 bushels last year. The Canadian visible supply increased 332,586 bushels for the week against a decrease last year of 1,153,343 bushels and the total now is 14,791,738 bushels against 21,467,968 bushels last year.

Our Winnipeg market is not showing much activity but there is a ready demand for all the wheat that is coming forward, and the government buyers, regular shippers and exporters and millers all participate in the buying. The movement from the west is getting lighter, averaging about 400 cars of wheat daily, against about 650 cars daily last year at this date. The weather during the past week over our prairie provinces has been favorable for growth, good rain showers in many districts supplying needed moisture and seasonable temperature supplying needed heat. The appearances, nevertheless, are that we will have no bumper crops this year. All crops are several days late, and the cool dry weather in May and first half of June caused a stunted development in much of the wheat crop that cannot now be fully overcome, no matter how favorable future weather may be. Today's cash prices are: 1 northern, $2.30; 2 northern, $2.27; 3 northern, $2.24; No. 4, $2.12; No. 5, $1.89; No. 6, $1.70; feed, $1.28. Futures closed, July, $2.30; October, $1.97½.

Oats—A good demand for oats continues, all cash oats being taken for export. This has kept prices for cash oats firm, and the strong course of Chicago oats and corn has given extra strength to oats for future delivery. The trading in oats for future delivery is unrestricted, and several traders are working on the bull side in helping to advance prices. Our October oats a year ago today closed at 42c, today at 62⅝c. Today's cash prices are, 2 C.W. 74½c; 3 C.W. and extra 1 feed 73⅝c; 1 feed 72⅜c; 2 feed 70⅜c. Futures closed, July 74½c; October 62⅝c; December 59½.

Barley—The barley market is firmer than it was a week ago with prices 2c to 3c higher. No. 3, $1.28; No. 4, $1.23½; rejected and feed, $1.12. The July future closed $1.27.

Flax—During the week the flax market declined severely without any apparent reason. On the 6th inst. July flax dropped down to $2.43 from its close at $2.53 the day before. It recovered, however, and closed at $2.52½. Since then the feeling is decidedly stronger and moderate advance has been seen each day since the 6th, today's close being $2.63½. Two months ago today July flax closed at $3.28. Perhaps there never was any good reason for the price going as high as that, but the situation as regards the stocks of old flax at this date, and the demand for both linseed oil and oilcake warrant a much higher price than the figures flax has been hovering around this past week. Today's prices are, 1 N.W. $2.64¼; 2 C.W. $2.60½; 3 C.W. $2.45½. Futures closed, July $2.63½; October $2.63½; December $2.64.

Sheep—Receipts, 12,000; weak; wethers, $7.75 to $11.00; ewes, $7.00 to $9.25; lambs, $10.00 to $15.75.

MONTREAL PRICES

MONTREAL, July 11.—At the Canadian Pacific livestock market the offerings today amounted to 350 cattle, 300 sheep and lambs, 700 hogs, 700 calves. There was no further change in prices for cattle. Trade on the whole was slow with sales of odd lots of choice steers at $11.00 to $11.50; good at $10.50 to $10.75, and the lower grades from that down to $8.50, while butcher cows brought from $7.50 to $9.50, and bulls from $8.00 to $10.00 per 100 pounds.

There was a good demand for lambs, and sales of small lots were made at from $9.00 to $11.00 each. Sheep sold at $7.50 to $9.00 per 100 pounds. The trade in calves was active, all the offerings selling at $7.00 to $12.00 per 100 pounds. The market for hogs was weaker, and prices scored a decline of 25c per 100 pounds in sympathy with other Canadian markets. Demand from packers was fairly good, and sales of choice selected lots were made at $16.70 to $17.00 per 100 pounds weighed off cars.

CANADIANS IN FIGHT FOR FUN

Ottawa, Ont.—The Canadians at the front apparently are earning a peculiar reputation among the Germans, according to a dispatch received here from Canadian army headquarters in France.

"An officer, recently captured, who knows the Dominion and its people well," the message says, "said to a Canadian officer in whose charge he ultimately found himself: "We Germans fight as a duty and because we have to. You Canadians appear to be in the war for fun and souvenirs."

Probably no other genius ever stirred up as much trouble for mankind in general as the man who invented the lawn mower.

The following resolution was passed by the United Farmers of Alberta yesterday:

Resolved, that we, the board of directors of the United Farmers of Alberta, in executive meeting assembled, hereby affirm our belief in the principle of the selective conscription of men to carry on the war, and the conscription of wealth for the same purpose. We also pledge our support to the government in an effort to intelligently and prudently carry into effect the conscription of men for this purpose, but in connection with and at the same time as that effort is made we insist that the government put into effect a systematic, just and equitable scheme of conscription of the wealth of the whole country. It must be understood, however, that this scheme must embrace the conscription of income wealth of all the men and institutions of the Dominion. The rate at which these incomes are assessed must be increased as the incomes increase until a certain limitation is reached, after which the remainder of said income is to be conscripted.

We also insist that in case of lands that have been acquired and held out of productive use, such lands are to be subject to equitable taxation, and in cases where lands are not subject to assessment and collectable taxation, such lands are to be expropriated, with or without, at the discretion of the government, a reasonable remuneration to cover original cost of said lands, and the title thereto to revert to the crown and become part of the public domain.

Jonnie O'Leary Meets Defeat

Johnny O'Leary is no longer lightweight champion of Canada, for that title now belongs to Clonie Tait; an Alberta boy. In the middle of the tenth round O'Leary was knocked out and Tait was awarded the decision by Referee Maxwell of Nelson. Up to the last round Tait had shaded O'Leary a little but through the fight the former was in fresher condition than O'Leary. At the end of the ninth round Johnny was in a weakened condition and the constant jabs on the jaw and body punches proved too much for the champion in the tenth. The bout took place at Medicine Hat after the preliminaries.

Following is the story of the bout by rounds:

1. Sparring and slinching.
2. More sparring and clinching and hanging on each other; even round.
3. Tait merely boyed while O'Leary moved wildly; even round.
4. O'Leary delivered two body blows but Tait drove O'Leary across the ring. Tait's round by a shade.
5. Coming back quick after breaking, Tait showed up well; even round.
6. Tait drove O'Leary to the ropes, fighting very carefully. O'Leary showed that he was weakening but Tait missed his opportunity; Tait's round.
7. For most part locked in clinches, no hard hitting; even.
8. Joked each other for the most part, and Tait got several straight lefts to jaw with no weight. Tait's round.
9. Whirlwind fighting. Both hammered the other all over the ring. At the end O'Leary was much weakened.
10. Tait got O'Leary twice to the jaw and the latter countered weakly. Tait dropped his opponent who rose only to be smashed down by Tait again, who was awarded decision.

The preliminaries were fast while they lasted and pleased the crowd down to the ground. Major Fitz-Horrigan, Lieut.-Governor Brett, Provincial Treasurer Mitchell and several prominent citizens were present. The preliminary bouts were as follows:

K. O. Chaliff of Regina, knocked out Billy Burke of Winnipeg, in the 12th round.

On the eve of the contest the betting was 3 to 2 on O'Leary. On Monday Tait weighed 132¼ and O'Leary about 135 pounds.

Sept. 15—National vs. Shamrocks.
Sept. 22—Shamrocks vs. National.

OLYMPIC GAMES BELOW THE MARK

The great Olympic games which were held in Tokio this year were not up to the mark so far as records were concerned. The excuse for the poor showing of the Japanese was that the kind of food they ate was not conducive to stand the endurance tests, and the lack of proper coaching.

The Japanese team with experienced athletes from Wasede, Keio, and the Imperial universities, won the meet with 120 points. The Filipino athletes, mainly developed by the Y. M. C. A.'s, were second, and China, with its team composed of athletes from several governmental and mission schools, was third. The times usually were considerably slower than those in American meets, but the races were staged with faster records than in former years. Particularly good marks resulted in the pole vault, in which a Chinese boy cleared 11 feet 7 inches, and the 100 yard dash, where some of the performers who took part were credited with marks of :10.

PUT ALL SPORTS UNDER CONTROL

In the Scandinavian countries steady progress in the development of athletic standards is reported. A recent congress was formed at Stockholm to have control of all arrangements regarding sports among Norway, Denmark and Sweden.

$4,000,000 PAID FOR PLAYERS IN FIVE YEARS

Organized baseball spent nearly $4,000,000 in five years, from 1911 to 1916, in the draft and purchase alone of players, according to President August Herrmann, of the national commission.

HEAD OF GRAY DORT WILL TOUR THE WEST

Next month, R. Gray, president of the Gray Dort Motors Ltd., will take a western trip and a view of going over the western provinces to take note of the crop conditions. The Gray Dort car has met with much approval at the hands of the prairie people and Mr. Gray hopes he will be able to estimate what the proposed manufacturing increase should be for the coming season. J. P. Byers, secretary-treasurer of the company, will accompany the president on this trip.

Ban On Racing Till After War

The text of the order in council putting a stop to Canadian racing August 1, is published in Daily Racing Form. Strictly speaking, it only prohibits betting on racing after that date, but that is tantamount to a prohibition of the sport as well. Apparently there will be no more racing until peace arrives. That will come some time, but it may not be for several years. Possibly a smashing victory for the allies might result in a modification of present restrictions.

The order reads as follows:

"Whereas, it is deemed advisable in view of the conditions created by the present war and the desirability of encouraging in every way possible thrift and economy among the people of Canada and of taking steps to prevent as far as possible extravagant and unnecessary expenditures, that the exception in favor of horse racing in section 235 of the criminal code respecting betting, pool selling, and bookmaking should be rescinded during the continuance of the present war and immediately thereafter; and

"Whereas, it has been made to appear by very strong representations that this opinion is shared in by a great body of the population of Canada;

"Now, therefore, his excellency the governor-general, by and with the advice of the king's privy council for Canada and under and by virtue of the provisions of the war measures act, 1914, is pleased to make the following regulation and the same is hereby made and enacted accordingly:

"1. Subsection 2 of section 235 of the criminal code, chapted 146 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1906, and enacted by chapter 10 of the statutes of 1912, is amended by striking out all the words after the words "business of betting" in the eighth line thereof.

"2. This regulation shall come into force on the first day of August, 1917, and the amendment hereby made continue in force only during the present war in Europe and for six months after the conclusion of the said war.

UTAH HIGH JUMPER BESTS WORLD RECORD

Clinton Larsen, the Brigham Young university high jumper who gained national fame by clearing 6 feet 5⅝ inches in the recent Pennsylvania relay carnival, succeeded in making a world record jump a few days ago on the Provo (Utah) college grounds when he jumped 6 feet 7⅜ inches. The former record, by E Beeson, was 6 feet 7-16 inches. The record was made before a big crowd, but did not include Amateur Athletic union officials. Special care was taken in measuring the height and well known citizens of Provo witnessed the feat and are ready to certify to its correctness.

KAYO TAKES THE COUNT

Fred Fulton, the Minnesota heavyweight, knocked out Jack Moran, of St. Louis, in the third round of a bout scheduled for 12 rounds, at St. Louis on July 10.

AMATEUR GOLF RECORD BROKEN

Ned Sawyer of Bobolink club, Chicago, defeated Robert Markwell of Yale university, on July 11, at Chicago, winning on the 42nd hole after being five down on the 27th. Sawyer was western champion in 1906, and it took par golf to overtake his opponent. This was the world's record for an extra hole match.

Provincial Automobile Club Organization

A meeting of the committee was held in Calgary last week to arrange for a proposed convention.

The committee suggested that the organization be known as the "Alberta Automobile Association." That the symbol of the three "A's" be adopted, subject to the confirmation of the convention.

It was moved by Mr. George H. Webster, seconded by Mr. Roy Cowan, of Langdon, that the secretary of the Calgary Automobile club is requested to issue invitations to all known organized automobile clubs in Alberta, to send from one to three delegates, and that he also take steps to advertise in the public press in order to cover the entire province, inviting delegates from any city, town or village in the province, which has not yet an organized club, to send delegates to the convention, which is to be held at the Palliser hotel, Calgary, Alberta, on Friday, August 3, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The calling of this convention is the outcome of a widely expressed desire, from all parts of the province, that some form of organization of automobilists be formed, for the purpose of attaining the objects which have been gained by similar organizations throughout Canada and the United States, which have been highly successful and to the advantage of all automobile owners. These objects cannot be attained unless a live automobile club is formed in each locality, and is represented by a provincial wide organization, such as is suggested.

AQUAPLANING AT BRIGHTON BEACH

It is the desire of this committee that the officers and executive to be elected will be representative of the entire province, and that places of all future meetings and conventions, will be left absolutely to the decision of the convention, the idea being that an effective and representative provincial organization may be formed.

It was suggested by this committee that among the matters to be taken up at the convention, is, the election of officers, appointment of necessary committees, the question of assisting in the organization of local clubs at points where clubs do not now exist, and to discuss the all important question of good roads—this point involving the consideration of past and future legislation affecting roads, the proper expenditure of money now appropriated for this purpose, the arranging of good roads conventions, and any suggestion or action with this object in view, also any other questions which might be brought up by delegates and which are of general interest to automobile owners.

The automobile road between Banff and Calgary is now in first class condition, and the committee recommends that delegates, and all automobilists who drive their cars to this convention, take this opportunity of running up to Banff. The idea of calling this convention to meet in Calgary on a Friday is to give automobilists an opportunity of spending the week-end at our great national playground.

The officials of the park department, of the department of the interior, have set the first week in August as automobile week in Banff. Tents and other accommodations are being placed there for the use of visiting automobilists. A large attendance of autoists is expected, and the committee expresses a hope that car owners will show their appreciation by turning out in large numbers from all parts of this province.

On Saturday, the day following the convention in Calgary, a club run from Calgary to Banff is being arranged, returning on Sunday. Car owners from many points have already signified their intention of making this run.

Members of committee:
George Webster.
O. N. Gilbert.
Roy Cowan.
W. O. Helm.
A. S. Nimmo, chairman.

NEW BABY GRAND CHEVROLET IS OUT

The new Baby Grand, or model F. Chevrolet, has just made its appearance at the Pacific Coast Chevrolet factory. The first one of these cars turned out on the Pacific coast is being driven from San Francisco to St. Louis by R. C. Durrant, vice-president of the Chevrolet factory, as the official trail blazer of the San Francisco Ad club motor caravan en route to the national convention. Additional Baby Grands are being turned out daily to meet a demand created by the former larger four-cylinder model.

There are many improvements in the new car. The greatest change, according to President DeVaux, is to be found in the powerful valve-in-head motor. The stroke has been increased from four to five and a quarter inches, giving a piston displacement of 224 inches instead of 170. The car comes with 33x4 tires instead of 32x3½, as formerly.

The car now has semi-cantilever springs, which have replaced the three-quarter elliptic. The body has also been increased in size, giving more room.

NEW MAXWELL PLANT IN CANADA

In a very short time Maxwell cars will be a Canadian industry. An automobile factory, which will be completed at a cost of $500,000, is being erected at Windsor, Ontario, by the Maxwell Motor company. A large factor at present in the company's annual output, is the distribution of these cars in Canada. After a war there will be a great demand for automobiles in Canada and United States and this company has been forced to start a new plant to meet the production requirements.

Things An Autoist Should Know

Movable Headlights

Adjustable and reversible headlights are among the newest wrinkles of the moment. As supplied on Dodge Brothers cars, their light may be turned in any desired direction through the loosening of a lock nut. Throwing the rays straight back illuminates the rear wheel for any necessary repairs. If a tire is to be changed on a front wheel the polished front door is swung open and used as a reflector to throw the light where it is wanted.

Spare Wheels for Fords

Ford owners may now carry a spare wheel, with its attendant convenience in the matter of making quick tire changes. Removing a single nut removes the wheel with the incapacitated tire. The spare wheel, with a tire ready inflated, is slid into place, the nut tightened, and everything is shipshape. An extra wheel with four new hubs to replace the regular Ford hubs is offered for $30.

Time by Electricity

A self-winding dash clock, which is kept going by electric current from the storage battery or four dry cells, is to be had for $15. The clock is wound every minute by tension of the main spring created by electric current. The watch movement is seven jeweled, mounted on a hard rubber composition base that acts as both insulator and absorber for any vibration. Removing the bazel exposes the regulator and setting device, by which adjustments can be made, if desired. The clock is designed with the idea of avoiding danger of dirt or dust penetrating. The current consumption is said to be so slight that the clock will continue to run after the current has become too weak for starting or lighting. The clock, designed to be set flush in the instrument board, comes in either nickel or black, with black or silvered dial.

FORD HAS NOW REACHED TWO MILLION MARK

Last Thursday was a real red-letter day in the history of the Ford Motor company, as it recorded the production of the two-millionth Model T Ford motor. This is more amazing in the light of modern progression when improvements and refinements in everything mechanical is the order of the day. Here is a most simple power plant, so simple that it is probably perfect in its original scientific design, duplicated 2,000,000 times without as much as a hair's breadth of change. Can one think of a greater tribute to the worthfulness of the genius of Henry Ford? Two million of this one Model T Ford motor in practical operation along almost all lines of human activity and meeting all demands to the full extent of a world-wide, universal satisfaction. No wonder the demand for Ford cars keeps so continuously ahead of production.

More Engine Power

A device designed to increase the efficiency of motors attaches to the intake manifold after tapping it, and from it extends in a flexible tube to the radiator. The radiator is also tapped and a copper tube extends into the neck of the radiator so that it can conduct moist air through the instrument to the cylinders. The device keeps the mixture constantly damp. Water in the moist air is instantly decomposed into 88 per cent. oxygen and 12 per cent. hydrogen. The liberated oxygen combines with carbon in the cylinders forming carbon monoxide, and an explosion of gasoline vapor, carbon monoxide, and hydrogen results, blowing out the carbon. This induction of moist air also makes the mixture a better conductor for the spark than dry air. The price is $10.

Kerosene for Dust

When any part gets rusty, put kerosene on it, but wipe off the kerosene after it has stood a while. Kerosene is useful in removing rust, but it will also cause rust. After removing the kerosene, put oil on the parts or wipe them with an oily rag.

Strain Your Oil

It seldom occurs to the motorist that he ought to strain his lubricating oil, but this should be done, nevertheless. Most people rely on the strainer in the funnel and many give the matter no thought at all. The result is that foreign matter carried into the pump may clog it or cause it to fail, besides clogging the strainer in the pump.

Inspect Valves Monthly

Do not neglect to inspect your valve clearance at least once a month. If the valve lifters are out of adjustment power is being lost without its being noticed. Wait until the motor cools and adjust them to 1-64th of an inch. If they are too wide open they become noisy; if too far closed the motor loses compression. In either case there is a serious loss of power.

Watch Fan Blades

The blades of some fans have a bothersome habit of working loose, through defective riveting at the hubs, and for this reason a new fan should be rather carefully watched for a time. A loose blade can do a good deal of damage and when one blade goes the rest of the fan often is injured, if running at high speed, because of the lack of balance.

Look for Leaks

Do not neglect a slight leak in the gasoline line because it isn't leaking fast. The vapor, being colorless, accumulates without your seeing it, and a disastrous fire may result. If tightening the joints does not stop the leak, rub some soap in the threads.

FROM LAKE ATHABASCA TO GREAT SLAVE LAKE

By CHARLES CAMSELL

During the summer of 1914, an exploration was carried out in the hitherto unexplored region lying between Athabasca and Great Slave lake and east of Slave river. The expedition was undertaken with the object of obtaining as much information as possible on the geography, topography, geology, and natural history of a region that had previously been visited by only one man who had left any written record of his journey. That man was Samuel Hearne, an officer of the Hudson's Bay company, who crossed the region in company with a band of Chipewyan Indians in the winter of 1771-72 as he was returning to Fort Churchill from his voyage of exploration to the Coppermine river.

The exploration carried out by the writer consisted of a single canoe traverse across the region from south to north leaving Lake Athabasca at a point a few miles west of the mouth of Charlot river and entering Great Slave lake at the mouth of the Taltson river about 40 miles east of the mouth of Slave river. Parts of the route are travelled by the Indians that live and hunt in the region, but the whole route is apparently not known to any single individual, and there are certain parts of it that have never been travelled by any one of the present generation. As a result it was found impossible to get any native to accompany the expedition in the capacity of guide and the route was followed with the aid only of rough sketch drawn by an Indian, and in which there were many blanks.

Though a period of five and a half months elapsed from the time the party left Ottawa on May 5 until its return on October 18 only about two months of this time was actually employed in geographical and geological investigation of the field, the remainder of the time having been taken up in travel to the point of starting on Lake Athabasca, and from the point of completion of field work on Great Slave lake.

Our course to the point on the north shore of Lake Athabasca where exploration actually began followed the usual boat route from Athabasca, at the end of the railway line, down the Athabasca river to its mouth and thence northeast for about 100 miles on Lake Athabasca. The return journey from Resolution, on Great Slave lake, was made by way of Slave river to Lake Athabasca and thence by the Athabasca river to the point of starting at Athabasca.

The unexplored portion of northern Canada, exclusive of the islands of the Arctic, is embraced in a number of blocks of territory marked off from each other by the travelled routes of explorers. The largest of these blocks has an area of about 75,000 square miles in extent is about twenty-five. The aggregate area of all the unexplored blocks is over 350,000 square miles or about one-fourth of the total area of continental Canada.

One of the largest of these unexplored blocks is that across which our traverse was made. It covers an area of about 53,000 square miles and extends in a north and south direction from Athabasca lake to Great Slave lake and Hanbury river, and in an east and west direction from Slave river to the Thelon and Dubawnt rivers. It embraces the whole of the basin of the Taltson river and the headwaters of the Thelon river. It includes the extreme northwest corner of the province of Saskatchewan and the northeast corner of the province of Alberta, but the greater portion of it is in North West Territories, beyond latitude 60 degrees north.

From Edmonton, which is a convenient starting point for expeditions into that northern country, the region may be reached by either of two routes. One follows the course of the Athabasca river for 430 miles, to Lake Athabasca, and the other lies over the new Edmonton, Dunvegan, and British Columbia railway to Peace River Crossing and thence follows the Peace river to Athabasca lake.

The only means of entering this unexplored block of territory in the summer and of travelling through it, is by canoe, and there are several Indian canoe routes leading into it from points on Athabasca lake, Slave river, and Great Slave lake. Most of these routes lead to a point on the edge of the Baron lands near the headwaters of the Taltson river, which has been a rendezvous for many years for the Indians of Forth Smith, Fond du Lac, and Resolution, during the autumn hunting season.

The chief results of the expedition into the region north of Athabasca lake were the carrying of a survey across an unexplored block of territory 53,000 square miles in extent; the exploration of two streams previously unexplored, the Tazin and Taltson rivers, for a distance of about 290 miles; the exploration of a number of lakes, ranging from 15 to 30 miles in length, along the course of these rivers; and the location of a number of belts of the older, pre-Cambrian, stratified rocks, in which minerals of economic importance may occur.

The Taltson river drains practically the whole of the country between Athabasca and Great Slave lakes, east of Slave river to the 108th meridian. Its main tributary is the Tazin, which drains the region immediately north of Athabasca lake, while the Taltson river itself carries the water from the region between the east end of Great Slave lake and latitude 61 degrees, its headwaters interlocking with those of the Thelon river.

Neither the Tazin nor the Taltson can be considered navigable for large boats, except in short stretches, and steamers could only ascend the Taltson river from Great Slave lake for a distance of 23 miles, to the first falls. Falls and strong rapids occur at frequent intervals and in our descent of the two rivers it was necessary to make about forty portages, the longest one mile in length, and to run dozens of rapids.

The basin of the Taltson river lies entirely within the Laurentian Plateau region, and its physical features of land and water are characteristic of the great region that comprises the northeastern part of the continent of North America. It is a country, when viewed on a large scale, of moderate relief and rounded outline, but in detail it is rugged, broken and rocky. It abounds in lakes, and its streams flow in ill-defined and irregular valleys, rarely more than 100 feet deep.

The highest elevations in the region are on the immediate shores of Athabasca lake where the hills rise somewhat abruptly to a maximum height of about 700 feet above the lake or about 1,400 feet above the sea. From there, the surface slopes gradually and regularly, northwest, to Great Slave lake. In consequence of this general character of the region the height of land between Athabasca and Great Slave lakes lies about 3 miles north of Athabasca lake and the average slope of the upper level of the plateau from there to the mouth of Taltson river at Great Slave lake is about 5 feet to the mile and presents no decided break at any point.

The Taltson river flows northward to Great Slave lake following the slope of the land surface; but, like most rivers in the Laurentian Plateau region, it has no well defined valley nor has it an evenly graded profile. It is characterized rather by a succession of level stretches and short, sharp falls. Here and there, for considerable distances, its valley is well defined and regular: but more generally, it flows from one expansion to another through narrow, gorge-like openings at which there are as a rule direct falls or strong rapids. For the greater part of its course it flows through a rock country, on which there is little or no soil; consequently, there are few gravel beaches and the river itself is clear and carries no sediment. Within 30 miles of Great Slave lake, however, it enters an alluvial plain which has been built up in the past by Slave river and is a part of the ancient delta of that stream. Here, the river cuts a shallow valley in the old delta deposits, exposing sections of sands and silts.

The country abounds in lakes, all of them remarkable for the clearness of their water and the beauty of their surroundings. The largest of these are: Tazin lake, 29 miles long and 8 miles wide, Hill Island lake, about 24 miles long and 2 miles wide, Tsu lake 17 miles long, and Thekulthili lake, a lake which we did not thoroughly explore, but which is at least 25 miles long. They are all rock basins, with irregular shore-lines and few beaches.

Over the greater part of the region the bed-rock has no covering of soil nor loose material. Here and there sandplains or patches of boulder clay occur; and, towards the mouth of the river, the bed-rock is covered by sediments from Slave river. On account of the lack of soil there are no possibilities for agriculture even if the climate were more temperate. The forest trees are small and stunted and no commercial timber, other than pulpwood, occurs anywhere in the whole region. The principal trees are spruce, Banksian pine, poplar, larch, and tanarack.

GENERAL PERTAIN
The command of the entire armies of France, Britain and Belgium in France, have been placed under his control.

COMMANDER OF THE "BLUE DEVILS"
Lieut.-Col. Fabry, the noted commander of the Alpine Chasseurs, known as the Blue Devils, whose remarkable heroism and awful experiences are well known.

The lakes and streams abound in fish, including whitefish, pike, suckers, and lake trout. Game, however, is scarce except in the winter season when caribou come into the region in great numbers from the Barren lands. Besides these, there are a few moose and black bears. All the fur-bearing animals common to the Mackenzie river are found here.

The country is inhabited by Indians known as Caribou Eaters, a branch of the Chipewyan stock, who trade at Fort Smith. A few other Indians, also, from Chipewyan, Resolution, and Fond du Lac hunt over parts of it.

The commercial possibilities of the region are small and it is not likely to support any population except, possibly, such as might be engaged in mining pursuits. Agriculture is out of the question and unless economic minerals are found in it, it will always remain unsettled. So much of this block of territory remains to be explored that it is impossible to say, yet, what it may contain in the way of minerals. Quartz veins were noted in the Tazin rocks in several places, notably at Hill Island lake, a region which it might be worth while to prospect. These veins may possibly prove in places to be gold-bearing.

All the solid rocks of the region are of Pre-Cambrian age. The oldest rocks encountered are a series of schists, quartzites, conglomerate, narrow beds of limestone and argillite, and some volcanic rocks, all classed together under the name Tazin series. They occur in several isolated bands which trend northwest to north and are entirely surrounded by granite or gneiss. These bands are merely remnants of a once more widespread series of rocks which were reduced in area by the intrusion of the granites and by erosion. They are economically the most important rocks met with since they are cut by a number of quartz veins which may contain some of the precious metals. These bands of Tazin rocks are the areas to which prospectors should devote their attention in prospecting in the region.

The Tazin rocks are everywhere intruded by granites and gneisses of a great, composite batholith, which covers 86 per cent. of the country along the route of our traverse. Granites and gneisses of different ages are here grouped together, but some of the massive varieties are clearly younger than the gneissic. The trend of the gneiss is mainly north and south, conforming to the trend of the rocks in the Cordilleran region rather than of those in eastern Canada.

No information is available with regard to the climate of the region traversed except that obtained during the months of July and August from our own observations. During these two months the prevailing conditions were bright, warm days and cool nights. Storms of wind and rain were infrequent and the rainfall was so light as to interfere very little with the progress of the work.

The maximum temperature recorded at noon was 86 degrees F. on July 25. Frost was not noted until September.

The four factors which influence the climate conditions in this region are: (1) the warm winds from the west; (2) the presence of the two large bodies of water on either side, namely, Athabasca lake on the south and Great Slave lake on the north; (3) the cool winds coming over the Barren lands from Hudson bay on the east; and (4) the absence of soil or other loose material on the bed-rock over a great part of the region.

Ice remains in Athabasca lake until the middle of June and in Great Slave lake somewhat later, and no doubt has the effect of retarding the advance of the spring, particularly in the country bordering these lakes. The proximity of the Barren lands on the east and of Hudson bay has a similar effect, so that spring is much later in this region than in the same latitude farther west, towards the foot of the Rocky mountains. These two factors so counteract the effects of the warm winds from the Pacific as to produce, also, a somewhat lower average temperature throughout the year than that which prevails in the same latitude farther to the west.

Judging by information obtained from the natives, the precipitation of rain and snow is very much the same as it is at Chipewyan where the average rainfall for the year is about 15 inches and the snowfall 4 feet.

It appears that the winter temperatures are not too low to permit of people living in the region with some degree of comfort. The chief drawback to travel and residence in the region are the myriads of mosquitoes in the summer months. These pests are in such numbers in the months of June and July, and in the early part of August, that some protection from them is absolutely necessary when travelling either through the woods or on the lakes and streams.

The lakes and streams of the region abount in fish, but the variety is not great. Nearly all the larger lakes contain lake trout and whitefish. Pike, suckers, and loche are found nearly everywhere in the rivers. The inconnu and rayling are caught in the lower part of the Taltson river below the last falls, but do not ascend to the upper parts of the stream.

American Makes Plea For Horses

Former United States Ambassador to Germany has come out in a strong appeal being made for the horse by the Jackey club, the National Federation of Horse Shows, the Hackney association, and other kindred organizations throughout the country.

Mr. Gerard is familiar with the policy that has given continental Europe such splendid war horses. He is a son-in-law of the late Marcus Daly, who brought some of the best thoroughbred blood of Europe to this country. As a daring cross-country rider he learned much about horses, and his opinion is likely to be valued highly by American breeders.

"This war is calling for horses as well as for men of fighting spirit," said Mr. Gerard, "and while cavalry has played only a small part in hostilities to date it does not follow that they will not be needed later on. Germany and Austria are prepared for any emergency through the establishment many years ago of a system of studs for the production of army horses which is only rivaled by that of France. Only those who have visited continental Europe and have seen the system under operation can appreciate the care and experience bestowed upon the work. Racing and army horse breeding are so closely allied that the recent announcement of 108 days of sport in the German empire this year, while it caused comment here, only means that the enemy is keeping up the speed tests in order to find the most desirable material for the 24 great breeding studs that are scattered throughout the empire.

"The chief of these is located at Graditz in East Prussia, and was founded by Count Lehndorff, the famous Prussian master of horse. Only horses whose breeding in all parts trace in a direct line to the English Stud Book are kept at Graditz and none is considered worthy to be a member of that band which has not demonstrated his quality on the race course. Count Lehndorff gave 21,000 guineas for the Irish-bred Ard Patrick, a winner of the English Derby, and 14,000 guineas for his half-brother, Galtee More. This would indicate that money was not a consideration in the development of the plan, which was inaugurated in the late sixties and had assumed such proportions that in 1870 16,000 mares were bred in East Prussia alone. This number was increased in 1910 to 47,000, and the cost of the upkeep of the various establishments was given in the budget for that year at £388,552, or almost $2,000,000 of our money. The revenue from stud fees, which are purely nominal, sometimes as low as $3 at the country establishments, and from speculation on the race courses in the same year amounted to £216,221, leaving a deficit of £172,341 to be defrayed by the Prussian government.

"When the Russians invaded East Prussia during the early days of the war and carried off more than 10,000 of their prized brood mares there was greater regret than over any other incident connected with that campaign. Americans have never placed a proper value on the mares and I am glad to learn that their purchase for army use has been forbidden by our government. Every available matron of the proper type will be needed to rehabilitate our supply of war horses.

"It ought to be an obligation," said Mr. Gerard in conclusion, "for every farmer and horse breeder in the country to see that the crop of foals next season should be the largest in the history of the United States. If the rural communities have not the type of sire which is needed to secure the best results, an appeal should be made to the government. There is an abundance of good warm blood in the country, and it should be had for the asking for such a patriotic purpose."

ANCESTORS AND THE MULTIPLICATION TABLE

"A man tackled me for a job the other day. After enumerating his various accomplishments he wound up with a final claim that was intended to impress me with its importance and for all," writes "Sid" in the June American Magazine. "He said that he was a direct descendant of Bishop Ump-te-ump—the most learned man of his time in England. I asked what time that was, and he said that it was about 400 years ago. I told him that—allowing 25 years for each generation—he must be the sixteenth descendant. 'No, not the sixteenth,' he said, 'but the fifteenth.' 'All right,' I said, 'call it the fifteenth. Now let's take a sheet of paper and see what your credentials really are. Let's see—you had one father and one mother, two grandfathers and two grandmothers, four great-grandfathers and four great-grandmothers, eight great-regat-grgandfathers and eight great-great-grandmothers — and so on.'

"Carrying the multiplication back to the fifteenth preceding generation I showed that at the time the bishop lived, my friend, the applicant, had exactly 32,768 ancestors. In other words, the bishop was only one of the 32,768 human being who were his forbears at that time.

"'You have mentioned the bishop, but what about the other 32,767?' I asked. 'It seems to me that I ought to hear something about them if I am to judge you by the good blood which you say is in you. The bishop was all right. You are lucky to have as much of him in you as you have. But the bishop's stock has been considerably watered. I don't believe he would recognize you. What about the rest?'

"That is the trouble with this heredity game—if you carry it back very far. Old Mother Nature is a wonderful leveler. She won't let geniuses or boneheads breed in a straight line. To the weak she frequently gives a child of incredible talent—to keep the neighbors from getting abusive. To the brilliant and favorel of the earth she often presents a choice of ivory in the shape of a dull son. Apparently the idea is to carry the race forward together and not to play favorites.

"Another feature of the scheme is that it keeps us all interested. Surprises abound on all sides. There is no telling where the next giant is coming from."

FIGHTING THE FOOD SHORTAGE

New Industries From Vegetable Fats

C. P. R. Working Out A Solution

THE seriousness of the food situation throughout the world has been frequently emphasized by the press and no one disputes the fact that the world seems steadily marching toward a period of starvation. Efforts are being made in all civilized countries along different lines to avert such a dissster and to devise means of overcoming a situation created by the war.

There have been food crisis in nearly every great war, and these have frequently given rise to new processes of sufficient merit to be continued in peace times, as for example, the manufacture of sugar from sugar beets, and the substitution of vegetable for animal fats as in oleomargarine.

Oleomargarine has been under discussion in Canada for some time and needs no further comment, except perhaps to point out that under the present regulations prohibiting the manufacture of this material there are undoubtedly many in the Dominion who are not getting the fats requisite for the proper maintenance of the body, because they are unable to purchase this fat at the present price of butter. In many countries where oleomargarine has been used for years a larger and ever larger percentage of vegetable fat is being substituted for the animal fat, and the day seems not far distant when hydrogenated vegetable oils may entirely replace animal fats for certain food purposes.

Arthur D. Little, Limited, the organization of analytical chemists which on the instigation of Lord Shaughnessy has been making an exhaustive study of Canadian natural resources have been investigating the utilization of vegetable fat in materials which have proven satisfactory substitutes for cream for all purposes excepting butter making and where whipped cream is required. The material is especially adapted to the manufacture of ice cream and can be produced much cheaper than cow's cream, a quantity of which through the use of such a substitute may be made available for other food purposes.

Dry milk, while a very important article of commerce, is known chiefly to bakers, hotels and ice cream manufacturers. A good product is now being manufactured in Ontario, but recognizing the advisability of establishing drying plants in smaller units and of a size that could be supported by the local community, work is being carried on with this requirement in mind. The installation of such plants would make it possible for dairymen to find a constant market, although they might be located at a distance so great from large centres of population as to make it impossible to sell liquid milk. For example, in Alberta the dairy industry is growing and would undoubtedly develop to a wonderful extent if drying plants requiring small amounts of capital could be established.

The same is true of vegetables, and mixed farming would be encouraged in the west if the farmer had a home market for his produce. Milk is 85% water, and many vegetables run as high or even higher in their moisture content. They are perishable, require special handling, and a large portion of the crop is composed of sizes too small to market. There are objections to the drying processes now employed and it is important, to perfect a method of drying vegetables and yet leave them fresh. Such material when placed in warm water soon absorbs the moisture which has been removed, and the vegetables when cooked in the water in which they have been placed give the same results as do fresh vegetables. The drying process must leave the vegetable with its natural color and with all the flavor with which it comes from the garden. The dried product must not be cooked or discolored, and should provide the housewife with a cleaned, sorted, ready-prepared material, which will keep without refrigeration or special storage, and enable her to avoid all the losses which accompany the use of most fresh material.

The utilization of that portion of fruits which is considered below standard, and therefore unprofitable to ship, is another problem which is receiving the consideration of Arthur D. Little, Limited. For example, a considerable part of every apple crop falls into such classifications as windfalls, seconds and thirds, poorly formed or poorly colored fruit, and as this proportion of the crop increases the selling price of the standard apple also increases. Methods for preparing a high [illegible] are under consideration, as well as the [illegible] of various apple products to utilize the portion of the crop considered unsalable or inferior by fruit dealers.

The desirability of increasing the food content of farm produce is obvious. It may be pointed out that the starch content of potatoes grown in Germany is much higher than that of potatoes on this continent, twice as high in fact. The cultivation of certain hybrids producing larger and better varieties of berries, etc., should also be encouraged, and while this phase of the problem scarcely comes within the province of the chemist, it is under consideration as a part of the general study.

Eabouraging progress has been made in the various fields onlined above, and definite announcements are expected in the near future.

NOT CHARGING FOR INVENTIONS

Supt. McCauley has not charged the city a cent for the use of his inventions on the 40 one-man street cars now in operation. The list of his patents in connection with the car are impressive. It includes the imergency step, the ceiling, with its ventilating system, lighting and shading arrangements, the door controlling mechanism, the front door entrance and step, and the brake. When questioned on the subject Mr. McCauley said that if the city thought his inventions were worth something then the remuneration was entirely in its hands. Winnipeg is thinking seriously of adopting the device on cars of the outlying district and Edmonton has already adopted it.

STORIES OF EVENTS OF IMPORTANCE IN THE WORLD TODAY

U. S. Build Army Cities to Hold 600,000 in Ten Weeks

Homes For the Accommodation of the Great Overseas Army Will be Completed Before Sept. 1st—Each Encampment to Have 1,000 Homes

SIXTEEN great military cities, which when completed will house about 40,000 men each—and there are not more than 150 cities in the entire United States of greater population—are now in process of construction. These cities are the cantonments in which the first American selective draft army, of between 500,000 and 600,000 men, will receive their preliminary training in this country, prior to their transfer overseas to the allied battle fronts in France. The contractors to whom the contracts have been let for the building "overnight," so to speak, of these sixteen army cities, are already hard at work, and they have less than nine weeks ahead in which to finish their jobs.

That the War Department will succeed in making good and that each of these new cities will be ready on schedule time for the more than 30,000 draft men, who will be ordered to them for training, is the belief of every officer in the army. Army officers and regular army enlisted men, with several thousand civilian employees added, will bring the population of each cantonment to about 40,000 men, necessitating a building problem involving the construction of about 1,000 houses, all of them of considerable size, in the space of but a few weeks. The average ground area covered by each cantonment will be between 1,500 and 2,000 acres, and the maintenance of the sixteen cities is expected to entail an expenditure which in one year will probably total more than $120,000,000.

To feed the soldiers alone, who will be trained in these cantonments, will require in one year more than 2,000,000 bushels of wheat, more than 84,000,000 pounds of fresh beef, and 42,000,000 pounds of fresh pork. The milk needed will total in a year more than 10,500,000 gallons, and there will be needed probably 2,500,000 bushels of Irish potatoes, over 325,000 bushels of onions, and over 275,000,000 pounds of other vegetables, such as cabbage, spinach, turnips, &c. In addition to all this food for man are the oats, hay, and other feed which will be needed by the more than 100,000 horses and mules which will be employed at the cantonments.

The sixteen army cities will be located near Ayer, Mass.; Yaphank, L. I.; Wrighmtstown, N.J.; Annapolis Junction, Md.; Petersburg, Va.; Columbia, S. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Chillicothe, Ohio; Louisville, Ky.; Battle Creek, Mich.; Des Moines, Iowa; Fort Riley, Kan.; Fort Sam Houston, Texas; Rockford, Ill.; Little Rock, Ark., and American Lake, Wash.

What the emergency means which faced the War Department following the passage of the selective draft law and the announcement by President Wilson that he would call to the colors the first 500,000 men of constription age on Sept. 1 can be understood, as was pointed out by an officer of the Quartermaster Corps, by keeping in mind what happens in the ordinary run of affairs during the construction of the average living house. The architect takes his time over the plans, there is plenty of time to look about for a contractor, and much time is wasted waiting for materials.

"Compare," says a War Department memorandum, "this every day experience with the government's task of providing in about twelve weeks barracks for about 600,000 men, with water supplies, plumbing and heating equipments, hospitals, store houses, stables, and shops in locations where there was nothing at the time the site was selected but mealow and grove. What private citizen would expect to move into a house on Sept. 1 on which not a stroke of work had been done on June 1?"

Each cantonment will be a city of orderly and properly laid out streets and blocks, with complete sewerage and electric lighting systems, railroad yards, water lines and fire departments, garbage incinerators, and hundreds of other conveniences necessary in the life of any well-organized modern settlement.

In the construction of the Panama Canal the Government's expenditure amounted to about $40,000,000 a year, and for the cantonments probably as much will be expended in four months. Just about one month ago the officials on whose shoulders was placed the burden of making the cantonments ready on time, started to solve the problem. Involved in the task was first of all the selection of the sixteen sites, the scientific planning and laying out of the sixteen cities, the purchase and the assembling of the materials, the drawing up of the contracts and the signing up of the contractors. Also there was the mobilization of the thousands of carpenters, mechanics, and other laborers, skilled and unskilled, and hundreds of other matters, some big, others small, and all of which had to be settled in the shortest possible time.

To construct each cantonment were required about 4,000 carloads of materials. As soon as the site was determined upon a sanitary engineer, a city planner, and an army officer representing the War Department proceeded to the place selected and started the work going. They were followed by the contracting engineer, who holds a major's commission, and under whose supervision the city is now being built.

An idea of the size of this job may be gained from a glance at the material estimate for a typical cantonment. Lumber is the big item, some 26,000,000 feet or 1,325 carloads being the requirement. Roofing nails alone will fill one modern freight car. Crushed stone for the roads will make 812 carloads.

Here are some of the other items; 28,000 squares of roofing, 60 cars; 20 carloads nails and hardware; 20 carloads plumbing; 192 carloads of tanks, heaters, stoves, ranges, piping, electrical materials, refrigerators, and the like; railroad materials for five miles of track, divided into 30 carloads of ties and other timber, 20 carloads of spikes, rails, fish plates, &c., and 114 carloads of ballast; 10 carloads of electric light poles, wires, insulators, &c. Materials for 12,000 cubic yards of concrete will take 70 carloads of cement, 350 carloads of stone, and 175 carloads of sand.

The men of the cantonments will sleep in double-deck bunks. This means there will be 37,000 separate bunks, each with its mattresses, 125 cars will be required, and the bunks will take 62 more. Water and sewer lines will make 65 carloads each, and 150 carloads of hospital equipment will be necessary. Three carloads of screens are also included in the estimate, as are 20 carloads of construction tools.

Where water cannot be obtained from already utilized sources wells must be driven or reservoirs constructed. The problem of sewage disposal will be met by connecting cantonment sewage mains to already existing sewage systems where possible, or by building reduction stations where necessary.

Areas of the cantonments will vary with the topography, the minimum being from 1,500 to 2,000 acres. In addition to the city itself, parade grounds, manoeuvring spaces, and rifle ranges must be provided.

Each cantonment will contain close to 1,000 buildings, the typical company barracks being a two-storey structure, built of wooden frame, covered with watched boards. The roofs will be covered with prepared roofing. They will be well ventilated with flues, lighted by electricity, heated in the north by steam and in the south by stoves. Each will have a kitchen and mess hall.

Colonel I. W. Littell of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, is in charge of the work of building the cantonments.

There is probably no more interesting feature of the great cantonment problem than the subsistence of the soldiers. H. M. Cottrell, agriculturist of the Farm Development Bureau of Memphis, was asked by the Little Rock Board of Commerce to estimate the amount of food supplies which will be needed at one cantonment. Mr. Cottrell is one of the recognized agricultural experts of the south, and his conclusions are made with authority. Mr. Cottrell took as his unit, in compiling his figures, the army division of 28,500 officers and men.

"Army rations," says Mr. Cottrell, "vary somewhat with the opportunity to secure the diefrrent foods. In a permanent cantonment like that to be established at Little Rock (which is similar to all the others in the country) the allowance per man will approximate four and a half bushels of wheat and one and a half bushels of corn yer year. The daily rations per man will average one-half pound of beef, one-fourth pound of pork, one-fourth pound of mutton or goat meat, one-half pint of fresh milk if it can be obtained at a reasonable price, one and one-fourth ounces of butter, and two and one-fourth pounds of vegetables, including twelve ounces of Irish potatoes and one ounce of onions.

"One division of men will need at least 7,000 mules and horses. Each horse and mule will be allowed daily fourteen pounds of grain and ten pounds of hay. Three-fourths of the grain ration will be oats and one-fourth corn if the price and supply make this practicable."

To feed a division of American selective draft troops Mr. Cottrell estimates the following as the amount of food needed:

42,750 bushels of corn.
146,698 bushels of Irish potatoes.
20,320 bushels of onions.
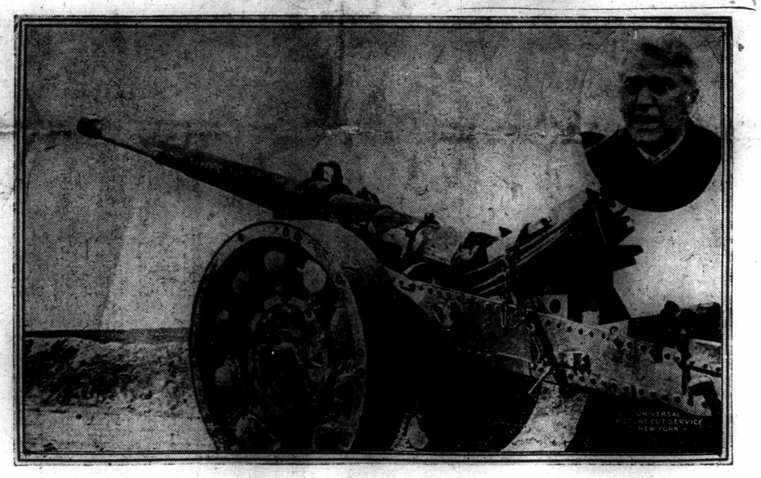
5,201,250 pounds of fresh beef.
2,600,625 pounds of pork.
2,600,625 pounds of mutton or goat
650,000 gallons of fresh milk.
822,250 pounds of butter.
57,800 dozens of eggs.
91,250 pounds of chicken.

For the animals required by one division there will be needed annually 838,400 bushels of oats, 159,690 bushels of corn, and 12,775 tons of hay.

"With average yields," Mr. Cottrell continues, "it will take the crop from 11,000 acres of wheat, 10,000 acres of corn, 37,000 acres of oats, 10,000 acres of hay, 2,000 acres of Irish potatoes, 140 acres of onions, and probably 1,000 acres of green truck, such as spinach, turnips, mustard, cabbage, and like crops. It will also require 10,000 fat cattle weighing over 1,000 pounds each, 17,000 fat hogs, and 50,000 fat young sheep and goats. It will take 8,000 cows to supply the butter and 1,700 cows to produce fresh milk; 7,000 hens will be needed to lay the eggs, 25,000 chickens to supply the meat needed for hospital extras.



"It will take from 1,000 to 1,500 men and as many mules to raise the field and garden crops consumed directly by the soldiers. It will take 630,000 bushels of grain to feed and fatten the cattle, hogs, and sheep, besides pasture and cottonseed meal. It will take 1,130,000 pounds of grain to feed the hens and raise and fatten the chickens. To raise the grain for the live stock and the poultry and to care for the animals and to market will require the labor of 1,200 to 1,500 men. It will take 15,000 tons of silage to fatten the cattle, sheep, and goats and 27,000 tons to feed the cows that furnish the milk and butter—a total of 42,000 tons."

As to what the production of these huge quantities of foods means to the farmers and live stock men of the country, particularly those who live in the vicinity of cantonments, Mr. Cottrell says:

"There must be immediate and thorough organization of planters, farmers, dairymen, truck gardeners, and poultry men, if home producers are to secure the benefits of the cantonment. It is the habit of producers of any farm producth to market all at the same time. The men and animals in the cantonment must be supplied every day in the year. Every week throughout the year more than 2,800 bushels of Irish potatoes, 600 bushels of onions, and 337,000 pounds of other green vegetables will be consumed.

"Every Monday there will be needed for the next seven days 100,000 pounds of fresh beef, 50,000 pounds of fresh pork, 50,000 pounds of mutton or goat meat, over 15,000 pounds of butter, nearly 1,200 dozen eggs, and about 1,800 pounds of dressed chicken. Every day there must be delivered 1,780 gallons of milk. Any week in which there is a failure to deliver the fodstuff, orders will have to be placed in distant States, and it will not take many failures to cause all local orders to be cancelled."

IN all the long list of Hun villainies none will stand out more prominently than the torpedoing of the Travose and the Alnwick Castle which occurred 350 miles from land. The suffering endured by the survivors was most intense.

One young man has died from exhaustion, both his feet having dropped off. Of the five in hospital still suffering grevious pain after nine weeks in bed, one from the Alnwick Castle, Mr. Vernon King, of Teddington, has had all his toes amputated one after another, and weeks of pain still lie before him before his feet can be healed. Another Mr. G. Biggleston, second engineer of the Thevose, whose narrative of the torpedoing is given below, has lost three toes by amputation from one foot, and part of one on the other foot. Mr. Biggleston is a native of Cornwall. Mr. Durand, the quartermaster of the Alnwick Castle has lost three toes; James Day, officers' steward, has lost two of three toes; and Roberage, baker's assistant, also of the Alnwick Castle, has lost three toes. He is a youth of 17 and a native of Richmond, Surrey; he is still suffering such great pain that it is pitiable to see him; the only sleep he gets is that produced by hypodermic injections. Barring complications, the lives of these men may now be looked upon as saved.

Diary of Pain

Monday, March 19.—We were steaming along in fine weather with a northerly swell in the Atlantic ocean when, about 11 a.m. there was a loud explosion on the port side. A torpedo had struck the Trevose between the bunkers and stokehold. The inrush of water was so great that it filled the engine-room and stokehold in a few minutes.

Two firemen were killed by the explosion and the subsequent inrush of water. The rest of the crew got into the starboard boats the port boat having been blown out of its davits by the explosion.

We rowed round the Trevose for some time, seeing that she did not sink, but the submarine came to the surface, so we cleared off. The Trevose kept afloat for more than an hour, when the Germans put bombs on board and sank her.

We were pulling in the boats until 4 p.m., when we sighted smoke in the distance. This ship turned out to be the Ailwick Castle; she speedily sighted us and, coming up quite close, took us on oard.b After having a good meal we turned in to get a good night's rest. All went well until 6 a.m. when bang! came a torpedo once more. All hands made a rush for the boats. There were two ladies—a French passenger, who had a baby with her, and the stewardess.

The boats were soon lowered and filled. There were four lifeboats and two small boats. We rowed away from the ship, which sank within 15 minutes. The submarine appeared on the scene to watch her sink, but did not interfere with any of the boats.

All the boats now made tracks in a northeasterly direction, but got got separated at night. In our boat, commanded by the chief officer of the Alnwick Castle, Mr. Blackman, were two ladies and the baby and 26 of the crew and passengers of the Alnwick Castle and 3 of the Trevese.

Tuesday, 20.—The sea was very rough, so we had to down sail and put out a sea anchor and some oil bags, to keep the boat's head to it.

Wednesday, 21.—The sea moderated a little, so we kept sailing on our course again. All the time the cold was intense, and, as many were clad in night clothes, the sueffring was great. (The narrator, whose modesty does not permit him to say so, left the ship in his pyjamas, but had slipped on a thick patrol jacket, which would have stod him in good stead; but, seeing a fireman who had only a thin vest on, he nobly took off his thick coat and gave t to the shivering stoker; and who shall say how much he suffered for this act of generosity, which probably saved the fireman's

DISABLED SOLDIERS AT WORK

Many remarkable devices have been created since the beginning of the war, to take the place of missing hands and legs of disabled soldiers. These contrivances are so skillfully made that they perform all the natural functions.

THE ADVENTUROUS CAREER OF CONSTANCE DUNLAP

"The Clairvoyants"

By ARTHUR B. REEVE

"DO you believe in dreams?" Constance Dunlap looked searchingly at her interrogator, as if her face or manner betrayed some new side of her character.

Mrs. deForest Caswell was an attractive woman verging on forty, a chance acquaintance at a shoppers' tea room downtown who had proved to be an uptown neighbor.

"I have had some rather strange experiences, Mildred," confessed Constance tentatively. "Why?"

"Because——" the other wom n hesitated, then added, "why should I not tell you? Last night, Constance, I had the strangest dream. It has left such an impression on me that I can't shake it off, although I have tried all day."

"Yes? Tell me about it."

Mildred Caswell paused a moment, then began slowly, as if not to omit anything from her story.

"I dreamed that Forest was dying. I could see him, could see the doctor and the nurse, everything. And yet somehow I could not get to him. I was afraid, with such an oppressive fear. I tried—oh, how I tried! I struggled, and how badly I felt!" and she shuddered at the very recollection.

"There seemed to be a wall," she resumed, "a narrow wall in the way and I couldn't get over it. As often as I tried, I fell. And then I seemed to be pursued by some kind of animal, half bull, half snake. I ran. It followed closely. I seemed to see a crowd of people and I felt that if I could get to that crowd, somehow I would be safe, perhaps might even get over the wall and—I woke up—almost screaming."

The woman's face was quite blanched.

"My dear," remonstrated Constance, "you must not take it so. Remember—it was only a dream."

"I know it was only a dream," she said, "but you don't know what is back of it."

Mildred Caswell had from time to time hinted to Constance of the growing incompatibility of her married life, but as Constance was getting used to confidences, she had kept silent, knowing that her friend would tell her in time.

"You must have guessed," faltered Mrs. Caswell, "that Forest and I are not—not on the best of terms, that we are getting further and further apart."

It rather startled Constance to hear frankly stated what she already had observed. She wondered how far the estrangement had gone. The fact was that she had rather liked deForest Caswell, although she had only met her friend's husband a few times. In fact, she was surprised that momentarily there flashed through her mind the query as to whether Mildred herself might be altogether blameless in the growing uncongeniality.

Mildred Caswell had drawn out of her chatelaine a bit of newspaper and handed it to Constance, not as if it was of any importance to herself, but as if it would explain better than she could tell what she meant.

Constance read:

"MME. CASSANDRA,

"THE VEILED PROPHETESS.

"Born with a double veil, educated in occult mysteries in Egypt and India. Without asking a question, tells your name and reads your secret troubles and the remedy. Reads your dreams. Great questions of life quickly solved. Failure turned to success, the separate brought together, advice on all affairs of life, love, marriage, divorce, business, speculation, and investments. Overcomes all evil influences. Ever ready to help and advise those with capital to find a safe and paying investment. No fee until it succeeds. Could anything be fairer?

"THE RETREAT,

"—— W. 47th Street."

"Won't you come with me to Madame Cassandra?" asked Mrs. Caswell, as Constance finished reading. "She always seems to do me so much good."

"Who is Madame Cassandra?" asked Constance, rereading the last part of the advertisement.

"I suppose you would call her a dream doctor," said Mildred.

It was a new idea to Constance, this of a dream doctor to settle the affairs of life. Only a moment she hesitated, then she answered simply, "Yes, I'll go."

"The Retreat" was just off Longacre square among quite a nest of fakers. A queue of automobiles before the place testified, however, to the prosperity of Madame Cassandra, as they entered the bronzed grilled plate glass door and turned on the first floor toward the home of the adept. Constance had an uncomfortable feeling as they entered of being watched behind the shades of the apartment. Still, they had no trouble in being admitted, and a soft-voiced colored attendant welcomed them.

The esoteric flat of Madame Cassandra was darkened except for the electric lights glowing in amber and rose-colored shades. There were several women there already. As they entered Constance had noticed a peculiar, dreamy odor. There did not seem to be any hurry, any such thing as time here, so skilfully was the place run. There was no noise; the feet sank in half-inch piles of rugs and easy-chairs and divans were scattered about.

Once a puff of light smoke appeared, and Constance awoke to the fact that some were smoking little delicately gold-banded cigarettes. Indeed it was all quite recherche.

Mrs. Caswell took one from a maid. So did Constance, but after a puff or two managed to put it out and later to secure another which she kept.

Madame Cassandra herself proved to be a tall, slender, pale woman with dark hair and magnetic eye. An eye that probably accounted more than anything else for her success. She was clad in a house gown of purplish silk which clung tightly to her, and at her throat a diamond pendant sparkling, as well as other brilliants on her long, slender fingers.

"So glad to see you, my dears," purred Madame, leading the way into an inner sanctum.

Mrs. Caswell had seated herself with the air of one who worshipped at the shrine, while Constance gazed about curiously.

"Madame," she began a little tremulously, "I have had another of those dreadful dreams."

"You poor dear soul," soothed Madame, stroking her hand. "Tell me of it—all."

Quickly Mrs. Caswell poured forth her story as she had already told it to Constance.

"My dear Mrs. Caswell," remarked the high priestess slowly, when the story was complete, "it is all very simple. His love is dead. That is what you fear and it is the truth. The wall is the wall that he has erected against you. Try to forget it—to forget him. You would be better off. There are other things in the world—"

"Ah, but I cannot live as I am used to without money," murmured Mrs. Caswell.

"I know," replied Madame. "It is that that keeps many a woman with a brute. When financial and economic independence come, then woman will be free and only then. Now, listen. Would you like to be free—financially? You remember that delightful Mr. Davies who has been here? Yes. Well, he is a regular client of mine, now. He is a broker and never embarks in any enterprise without first consulting me. Just the other day I read his fortune in United Traction. It has gone up five points already and will go fifteen more. Let me see—yes, I can do that. You too will be lucky in speculation."

Constance, with one ear open, had been busy looking about the room. In a bookcase she saw a number of books and paused to examine their titles. She was surprised to see among the old style dream books several works on modern psychology, particularly on the interpretation of dreams.

"Of course, Mrs. Caswell, I don't want to urge you," Madame was saying. "I have only pointed out a way in which you can be independent. And, you know, Mr. Davies is a perfect gentleman, so courteous and reliable. I know you will be successful if you take my advice and go to him."

Mildred said nothing for a few moments, but as she rose to go she remarked, "Thank you very much. I'll think about it. Anyhow, you've made me feel better."

"So kind of you to say it," murmured the adept. "I'm sorry you must go, but really I have other appointments. Please come again—with your friends. Good-bye."

"What do you think of her?" asked Mrs. Caswell on the street.

"Very clever," answered Constance dubiously.

Mrs. Caswell looked up quickly. "You don't like her?"

"To tell the truth," confessed Constance quietly. "I have had too much experience in Wall street myself to trust to a clairvoyant."

They had scarcely reached the corner before Constance again had that peculiar feeling which some psychologists have noted, of being stared at. She turned, but saw no one. Still the feeling persisted. She could stand it no longer.

"Don't think me crazy, Mildred," she said, "but I just have a desire to walk back a block."

Constance had turned suddenly. As she glanced keenly about she was aware of a familiar figfiure gazing into the window of an art store across the street. He had stopped so that although his back was turned he could, by a slight shift of his position, still see by means of a mirror in the window what was going on across the street behind him.

One look was enough. It was Drummond, the detective. What did it mean?

Neither woman said much as they rode uptown, and parted on the respective floors of their apartment house. Still Constance could not get out of her head the recollection of the dream doctor and of Drummond.

Restless, she determined that night to go down to the public library and see whether any of the books at the clairvoyant's were on the shelves. Fortunately she found some, found indeed that they were not all, as she had half suspected, the works of fakers but that quite a literature had been built up around the new psychology of dreams.

Deeply she delved into the fascinating subjects that had been opened by the studies of the famous Dr. Sigmund

"Get out!" he said, suppressing his voice with difficulty.

Freud, of Vienna, and as she read she found that she began to understand much about Mrs. Caswell—and, with a start, about her own self.

At first she revolted against the unpleasant feature of the new dream philosophy—the irresistible conclusion that all humanity, underneath the shell, is sensuous or sensual in nature, that practically all dreams portray some delight of the senses and that sexual dreams are a large proportion of all visions. But the more she thought of it, the more clearly was she able to analyze Mrs. Caswell's dream and to get back at the causes of it, in the estrangement from her husband and perhaps the brutality of his ignorance of woman. And then, too, there was Drummond. What was he doing in the case?

She did not see Mildred Caswell again until the following afternoon. But then she seemed unusually bright in contrast with the depression of the day before. Constance was not surprised. Her intuition told her that something had happened and she hardly needed to guess that Mrs. Caswell had followed the advice of the clairvoyant and had been to see the wonderful Mr. Davies, to whom the mysteries of the stock market were an open book.

"Have you had any other dreams?" asked Constance casually.

"Yes," replied Mildred, "but not like the one that depressed me. Last night I had a very pleasant dream. It seemed that I was breakfasting with Mr. Davies. I remember that there was a hot coal fire in the grate. Then suddenly a messenger came in with news that United Traction had advanced twenty points. Wasn't it strange?"

Constance said nothing. In fact it did not seem strange to her at all. The strange thing to her, now that she was a sort of amateur dream reader herself, was that Mrs. Caswell did not seem to see the real import of her own dream.

"You have seen Mr. Davies today?" Constance ventured.

Mrs. Caswell laughed. "I wasn't going to tell you. You seemed so set against speculating in Wall street. But since you ask me, I may as well admit it."

"When did you see him before?" went on Constance. "Did you have much invested with him already?"

Mrs. Caswell glanced up, startled. "My—you are positively uncanny, Constance. How did you know I had seen him before?"

"One seldom dreams," said Constance, "about anything unless it has been suggested by an event of the day before. You saw him today. That would not have inspired the dream of last night. Therefore I concluded that you must have seen him and invested before. Madame Cassandra's mention of him yesterday caused the dream of last night. The dream of last night probably influenced you to see him again today, and you invested in United Traction. That is the way dreams work. Probably more of conduct that we know is influenced by dream life. Now, if you should get fifteen or twenty points you would be in a fair way to join the ranks of those who believe that dreams do come true."

Mrs. Caswell looked at her almost alarmed, then attempted to turn it off with a laugh. "And perhaps breakfast with him?"

"When I do set up as interpreter of dreams," answered Constance simply, "I'll tell you more."

On one point she had made up her mind. That was to visit Mr. Davies herself the next day.

She found his office a typical bucket shop, even down to having a section partitioned off for women clients of the firm. She had not intended to risk anything and so was prepared when Mr. Davies himself approached her courteously. Instinctively Constance distrusted him. He was too cordial, too polite. She could feel the claws hidden in his velvety paw as it were. There was a debonnair assurance about him, the air of a man who thought he understood women, and indeed did understand a certain type. But to Constance, who was essentially a man's woman, Davies was only revolting.

She managed to talk without committing herself, and he in his complacency was glad to hope that he was making a new customer. She had to be careful not to betray any of the real and extensive knowledge about Wall street which she actually possessed. But the glib misrepresentations about United Traction quite amazed her.

When she rose to go, Davies accompanied her to the door, then out into the hall to the elevator. As he bent over to shake hands, she noted that he held her hand just a little longer than was necessary.

"He's a swindler of the first water," she concluded as she was whisked down in the elevator. "I'm sure Mildred is in badly with this crowd, one urging her on in her trouble, the other making it worse and fleecing her into the bargain."

At the entrance she paused, undecided which was the quickest route home. As by chance she turned just for a moment she thought she caught a fleeting glimpse of Drummond dodging behind a pillar. It was only for an instant but even that apparition was enough.

"I will get her out of this safely," resolved Constance. "I will keep one more fly from his web."

Constance felt as if even now, she must see Mildred and, although she knew nothing, at least put her on her guard. She did not have long to wait for her chance. It was late in the afternoon when her door buzzer sounded.

"Constance, I've been looking for you all day," sighed Mildred, dropping sobbing into a chair. "I am—distracted."

"Why, my dear, what's the matter?" asked Constance. "Let me make you a cup of coffee."

Over the steaming little cups Mildred grew more calm.

Forest has found out in some way that I am speculating in Wall street," she confided at length. "I suppose some of his friends—he has lots down there—told him."

Momentarily the picture of Drummond back of the post in Davies' building flashed over Constance.

"And he is awfully angry. Oh, I never knew him to be so angry—and sarcastic, too."

"Was it wholly over your money?" asked Constance. "Was there nothing else?"

Mrs. Caswell started. "You grow more weird, every day, Constance. Yes—there was something else."

"Mr. Davies?"

Mildred had risen. "Don't—don't—" she cried.

"Then you do really—care for him?" asked Constance mercilessly.

"No—no, a thousand times—no. How can I? I have put all such thoughts out of my mind—long ago." She paused, then went on more calmly, "Constance, believe me or not—I am just as good a woman today as I was the day I married Forest. No—I would not even let the thought enter my head—never!"

For perhaps an hour after her friend had gone, Constance sat thinking. What should she do? Something must be done and soon. As she thought, suddenly the truth flashed over her.

Caswell had employed Drummond to shadow his wife in the hope that he might unearth something that might lead to a divorce. Drummond, like so many divorce detectives, was not averse to guiding events, to put it mildly. He had ingratiated himself, perhaps, with the clairvoyant and Davies. Constance had often heard before of clairvoyants and brokers who worked in conjunction to fleece the credulous. Now another and more serious element than the loss of money was involved. Added to them was a divorce detective—and honor itself was at stake. She remembered the doped cigarettes. She had heard of them before at clairvoyants. She saw it all. Madame Cassandra playing on Mildred's wounded affections, the broker on both that and her desire to be independent, and Drummond pulling the wires that all might take advantage of her woman frailty.

That moment Constance determined on action.

First she telephoned to deForest Caswell at his office. It was an unconventional thing to do to ask him to call but she made some plausible pretext. She was surprised to find that he accepted it without hesitating. It set her thinking. Drummond must have told him something of her and he had thought this as good a time as any to face her. In that case Drummond would probably come, too. She was prepared.

She had intended to have one last talk with Mildred, but had no need to call her. Utterly wretched, the poor little woman came in again to see her as she had done scores of times before, to pour out her heart. Forest had not come home to dinner, had not even taken the trouble to telephone. Constance did not say that she herself was responsible.

"Do you really want to know the truth about your dreams?" asked Constance, after she had prevailed upon Mildred to eat a little.

"I do know," she returned.

"No, you don't," went on Constance, now determined to tell her the truth whether she liked it or not. "That clairvoyant and Mr. Davies are in league, playing you for a sucker, as they say."

Mrs. Caswell did not reply for a moment. Then she drew a long breath and shut her eyes. "Oh, you don't know how true what she says is to me. She——"

"Listen," interrupted Constance, "Mildred, I'm going to be frank, brutally frank. Madame Cassandra has read wour character, not the character as you think it is, but your unconscious, subconscious self. She knows that there is no better way to enter into the intimate life of a client, according to the new psychology, than by getting at and analyzing the dreams. And she knows that you can't go far in dream analysis without finding sex. It is one of the strongest natural impulses, yet subject to the strongest repression, and hence one of the weakest points of our culture.

"She is actually helping along your alienation for that broker. You yourself have given me the clue in your dreams. Only I am telling you the truth about them. She holds it back and tells you plausible falsehoods to help her own ends. She is trying to arouse in you those passions which you have suppressed, and she has not scrupled to use drugged cigarettes in order to do it. You remember the breakfast dream, when I said that much could be traced back to dreams? A thing happens. It causes a dream. That in turn sometimes causes action. No, don't interrupt. Let me finish first.

"Take that first dream," continued Constance, rapidly thrusting home her interpretation so that it would have its full effect. "You dreamed that your husband was dying and you were afraid. She said it meant love was dead. It did not. The fact is that neurotic fear in a woman has its origin in repressed, unsatisfied love, love which for one reason or another is turned away from its object and has not succeeded n being applied. Then his death. That simply means that you have a feeling that you might be happier if he were away and didn't devil you. It is a survival of childhood, when death is synonymous with absence. I know you don't believe it. But if you had studied the subject as I have in the last few days you'd understand. Madame Cassandra understands.

"And the wall. That was Wall street, probably, which does divide you two. You tried to get over it and you fell. That means your fear of actually falling, morally, of being a fallen woman."

Mildred was staring wildly. She might deny, but in her heart she must admit.

"The thing that pursued you, half bull, half snake, was Davies and his blandishments. I have seen him. I know what he is. The crowd in a dream always denotes a secret. He is pursuing you, as in the dream. But he hasn't caught you. He thinks there is in you the same wild demimondaine instinct that with many an ardent woman slumbers unknown in the back of her mind.

"Whatever you may say, you do think of him. When a woman dreams of breakfasting cozily with some one other than her husband it has an obvious meaning. As for the messenger and the message about the United Traction, there, too, was a plain wish, and, as you must see, wishes in one form or another, disguised or distorted, lie at the basis of dreams. Take the coal fire. That, too, is susceptible of interpretation. I think you must have heard the couplet:

"'No coal, no fire so hotly glows
As the secret love that no one knows.'"

Constance put her hand on her arm gently to restrain her, knowing that such indignation was the first sign that she had struck at the core of truth in her interpretation.

"My dear," she urged, "I'm only telling you the truth, for your own sake, and not to take advantage of you as Madame Cassandra is doing. Please—remember that the best evidence of your normal condition is just what I find that absence of love would be abnormal. My dear, you are what the psychologists call a consciously frigid, unconsciously passionate woman. Consciously you reject this Davies; unconsciously you accept him. And it is the more dangerous, although you do not know it, because some one else is watching. It was not one of his friends who told your husband——"

Mrs. Caswell had paled. "Is—is there a—detective?" she faltered.

Constance nodded.

Mildred had collapsed completely. She was sobbing in a chair, her head bowed in her hands, her little lace handkerchief soaked. "What shall I do? What shall I do?"

There was a sudden tap at the door.

It was DeForest Caswell.

For a moment Constance stood irresolute, wondering just how to meet him, then she said, "Good evening, Mr. Caswell. I hope you will pardon me for asking you to call on me but, as you know, I've come to know your wife—perhaps better than you do."

"Not better," he corrected, seeming to see that it was directness that she was aiming at. "It is bad enough to get mixed up badly in Wall street, but what would you yourself say—you are a business woman—what would you say about getting into the clutches of a—a dream doctor—and worse?"

He had put Constance on the defensive in a sentence.

"Don't you ever dream?" she asked quietly.

He looked at her a moment as if doubting even her mentality.

"Lord," he exclaimed in disgust, "you too, defend it?"

"But, don't you dream?" she persisted.

"Why, of course I dream," he answered somewhat petulantly. "What of it. I don't guide my actions by it."

"Do you ever dream of Mildred?" she asked.

"Sometimes," he admitted reluctantly.

"Ever of other—er—people?" she pursued.

"Yes," he replied, "sometimes of other people. But what has that to do with it? I cannot help my dreams. My conduct I can help and I do help."

Constance had not expected him to be frank to the extent of taking her into his confidence. Still, she felt that he had told her just enough. She discerned a vague sense of jealousy in his tone which told her more than words that whatever he might have said or done to Mildred he resented, unconsciously, the manner in which she had striven to gain sympathy outside.

"Fortunately he knows nothing of the new theories," she said to herself.

"Mrs. Dunlap," he resumed, "since you have been frank with me, I must be equally frank with you. I think you are far too sensible a woman not to understand in just what a peculiar position my wife has placed me."

He had taken out of his pocket a few sheets of closely typewritten tissue paper. He did not look at them. Evidently he knew the contents by heart. Constance did not need to be told that this was a sheaf of the daily reports of the agency for which Drummond worked.

He paused. She had been watching him searchingly. She was determined not to let him justify himself first.

"Mr. Caswell," she persisted in a low, earnest tone, "don't be so sure that there is nothing in this dream business. Before you read me those reports from Mr. Drummond, let me finish."

Forest Caswell almost dropped them in surprise.

"Dreams," she continued, seeing her advantage, "are wishes, either suppressed or expressed. Sometimes the dream is frank and shows an expressed wish. Other times it shows a suppressed wish or a wish which in its fulfilment in the dream is disguised or distorted.

"You are the cause of your wife's dreams. She feels in them anxiety. And, according to the modern psychologists who have studied dreams carefully and scientifically, fear and anxiety represent love repressed or suppressed."

She paused to emphasize the point, glad to note that he was following her.

"That clairvoyant," she went on, "has found out the truth. True, it may not have been the part of wisdom for Mildred to have gone to her in the first place. I pass over that. I do not know whether you or she was most to blame at the start. But that woman, in the guise of being her friend, has played on every string of your wife's lonely heart, which you have wrung until it vibrates.

"Then," she hastened on, "came your precious friend, Drummond. Drummond who has, no doubt, told you a pack of lies about me. You see that?"

She had flung down on the table a cigarette which she had managed to get at Madame Cassandra's.

"Smoke it."

He lighted it gingerly, took a puff or two, puckered his face, frowned, and rubbed the lighted end on the fireplace to extinguish it.

"What is it?" he asked, suspiciously.

"Hashish," she answered tersely. "Things were not going fast enough to suit either Madame Cassandra or Drummond. Madame Casandra helped along the dreams by a drug noted for its effect on the passions. More than that," added Constance, leaning over toward him and catching his eye, "Madame Cassandra was working in league with a broker, as so many of the fakers do. Drummond knew it, whether he told you the truth about it or not. That broker was a swindler named Davies."

She was watching the effect on him. She saw that he had been reserving this for a last shot at her, that he realized she had stolen his own ammunition and appropriated it to herself.

"They were only too glad when Drummond approached them. There you are, three against that poor little woman—no four, including yourself. Perhaps she was foolish. But it was not so much to her discredit as to those who cast her adrift when she had a natural right to protection. Here was a woman with passions which she herself did not understand, and a little money—alone. Her case appealed to me. I knew her dreams. I studied them."

Caswell was listening in amazement. "It is dangerous to be with a person who pays attention to such little things," he said.

Evidently Drummond himself must have been listening. The door buzzer sounded and he stepped in, perhaps to bolster up his client in case he should be weakening.

As he met Constance's eye he smiled superciliously and was about to speak. But she did not give him time even to say good evening.

"Ask him," she cried, her eyes flashing, for she realized that it had been part of the plan to confront her, perhaps worm out of her just enough to confirm Drummond's own story to Caswell, "ask him to tell the truth—if he is capable of it—not the truth that will make a good daily report of a hired shadow who colors his report the way he thinks his client desires it, but the real truth."

"Mr. Caswell," interrupted Drummond, "this woman——"

"Mr. Drummond," cried Constance, rising and shaking the burnt stub of the little gold-banded cigarette at him to impress it on his mind, "Mr. Drummond, I don't care whether I am—a she-devil"—she almost hissed the words at him—"but I have evidence enough to go before the district attorney of this city and the grand jury and get indictments for conspiracy against a certain clairvoyant and a bucket shop operator. To save themselves, they will probably tell all they know about a certain crook who has been using them."

Caswell looked at her, amazed at her denunciation of the detective. As for Drummond, he turned his back on her as if to ignore her utterly.

"Mr. Caswell" he said bitterly, "in those reports——"

"DeForest Caswell," insisted Constance, rising and facing him, "if you have in that heart of yours one shred of manhood it should move you. You—this man—the others—have placed in the path of a woman every provocation, every temptation for financial, physical, and moral ruin. She has consulted a clairvoyant—yes. She has speculated—yes. Yet she was proof against something greater than that. And I know—because I know her unconscious self which her dreams reveal, her inmost soul—I know her better than you do, better than she does herself. I know that even now she is as good and true and would be as loving as——"

Constance had paused and taken a step toward the drawing room. Before she knew it, the portieres flew apart and an eager little woman had rushed past her and flung her arms about the neck of the man.

Caswell's features were working as he gently disengaged her arms, still keeping one hand. Half shoving her aside, ignoring Constance, he had faced Drummond. For a moment the brazen detective flinched.

As he did so, DeForest Caswell crumpled up the mass of tissue paper reports and flung them into the fireplace.

"Get out!" he said, suppressing his voice with difficulty. "Send me—your bill. I'll pay it—but, mind, if it is one penny more than it should be, I'll—I'll fight if it takes me from the district attorney and the grand jury to the highest court of the staet. Now—go!"

Caswell turned slowly again toward his wife.

"I've been a brute," he said simply.

Something almost akin to jealousy rose in Constance's heart as she sow Mildred, safe at last.

Then Caswell turned slowly to her. "You," he said, stroking his wife's hand gently but looking at Constance, "you are a real clairvoyant."

PRUDENCE OF THE PARSONAGE

THE FAMOUS STORY OF A HAPPY FAMILY

By Ethel Hueston

COPYRIGHT 1915 BY THE BOBBS-MERRILL CO.

SYNOPSIS

Mr. Starr, minister, arrives in Mount Mark to take charge of the Methodist diocese, he is a widower with five children, all girls, namely, Prudence, the eldest, who mothers the rest of the family, who include, Fary, Connie and Carol and Lark, who are twins. The girls all go school and are particularly clever.

The twins, though very lovable and obedient children, are very mischievous, and often embarrass Prudence and Fairy.

Every one in the parish admires Prudence for her sweet and womanly disposition. Professor Rayburn, of the college, a suitor for her hand, but Prudence refuses him, considering her home and bringing up of the family, her particular duty.

Owing to Mount Mark being a small parish and the congregation rather sla about money matters, the parsonage family have quite a hard time to make ends meet. Fairy and Prudence make over old coat of their fathers for Connie, who always comes in for the left-overs, being the smallest, this being a particular disappointment, as she was promised a new coat. Connie calls on Mr. Harold, the president of the bank, and asks for loan of $5.00, explaining the situation him and promising to pay it back in two years, a nickle at a time. Mr. Harold tells her he is proud to have her trade. Connie surprises the family at dinner-time by producing the $5.00.

One night while Mr. Starr was away from home the twins hear a noise and awake the other girls. Through the braveness of Prudence the thief was caught. Prudence wins the $500.00 which had been offered as a reward for the catching of this noted burglar. Prudences decides to go for a bicycle ride and runs into a mule. She is hurt and is seen safely home by a stranger, Jerrold Harmer. He later calls and asks for Prudence's hand, to which Mr. Starr consents.

So the twins went back to the haymow. When it grew dark, they slipped into the kitchen, and huddled together on the woodbox beside the stove. And down to them presently came Fairy, smiling, her eyes tear-brightened.

"She is better!" crief Carol, springing to her feet.

"Yes," said Fairy, dropping on her knees and burying her face in Lark's lap, as she still sat on the woodbox. "She's better. She is better." Lark patted the heaving shoulders in a motherly way, and when Fairy lifted her face again it was all serene, though her lashes were wet.

"She is conscious," said Fairy, still on her knees, but with her head thrown back, and smiling. "She regained consciousness a little while ago. There is nothing really serious the matter. It was a hard knock, but it missed the temple. When she became conscious, she looked up at father and smiled. Father looked perfectly awful, twins, so pale, and his lips were trembling. And Prudence said, 'Now, father, on your word of honor, did you knock me down with that ball on purpose?' She spoke very low, and weak, but—just like Prudence! Father couldn't say a word, he just nodded, and gulped. She has a little fever, and the doctors say we may ned to work with her part of the night. Father said to ask if you would go to bed now, so you can get up early in the morning and help us. I am to stay with Prudence tonight, but you may have to take turns in the morning. And you'll have to get breakfast, too. So father thinks you would better go to bed. Will you do that, twinnies?"

"Will we!" And Carol added, "Will you kiss Prudence good night for us, and tell her we kept praying all the time? Prudence is such a great hand for praying, you know."

"We'll undress in the dark so as not to awake poor little Connie,' whispered Lark. "It's nice she can sleep like that, isn't it?"

And the twins went to bed, and fell asleep after a while, never doubting that Connie, in her corner of the room, was already safe and happy in the oblivion of slumber.

But poor Connie! She had not wakened when Fairy closed the dungeon door. It was long afterward when she sat up and began rubbing her eyes. She did not know where she was. Then she remembered! She wondered if Prudence— She scrambled to her feet, and trotted over to the dungeon door. It was locked, she could not turn the knob. At first, she thought of screaming and pounding on the door.

'But that will arouse Prudence, and frighten her, and maybe kill her," she thought wretchedly. "I'll just keep still until some one passes."

But no one passed for a long time, and Connie stretched her aching body and sobbed, worrying about Prudence, fearful on her own account. She had no idea of the time. She supposed it was still early. And the parsonage was deathly quiet. Maybe Prudence had died! Connie writhed in agony on the hard floor, and sobbed bitterly. Still she would not risk pounding on the dungeon door.

Up-stairs, in the front room, Prudence was at that time wrestling with fever. Higher and higher it rose, until the doctors looked very anxious. They held a brief consultation in the corner of the room. Then they beckoned to Mr. Starr.

"Has Prudence been worrying about something this winter?"

"Yes."

"Has she been grieving, and fretting for something?"

"Yes, she has."

"It is that young man, isn't it?" inquired the family doctor,—a Methodist "member."

"Yes."

"Can you bring him here?"

"Yes,—as soon as he can get here from Des Moines."

"You'd better do it. She has worn herself down nearly to the point of prostration. We think we can break this fever without serious consequences, but get the young man as soon as possible. She can not relax and rest, until she gets relief."

So he went down-stairs and over the telephone dictated a short message to Jerry. "Please come,—Prudence."

When he entered the front bedroom again, Prudence was muttering unintelligible words under her breath. He kneeled down beside the bed, and put his arms around her. She clung to him with sudden passion.

"Jerry! Jerry!" she cried. Her father caressed and petted her, but did not speak.

"Oh, I can't," she cried again. "I can't, Jerry, I can't!" Again her voice fell to low mumbling. "Yes, go. Go at once. I promised, you know.—They haven't any mother.—I promised. Jerry! Jerry!" Her voice rang out so wildly that Connie, down in the dungeon, heard her cries and sobbed anew, relieved that Prudence was living, frightened at the wildness of her voice. 'Oh, I do want you—more than anybody. Don't go!—Oh, yes, go at once. I promised.—Father needs me." And then a piercing shriek, "He is falling! Connie, drop that rope!" She struggled up in the bed, and gazed wildly about her,—then, panting, she fell back on the pillows.

But Mr. Starr smiled gently to himself. So that was the answer! Oh, foolish little Prudence! Oh, sweet-hearted little martyr girl!

Hours later the fever broke, and Prudence drifted into a deep sleep. Then the doctors went downstairs with Mr. Starr, talking in quiet ordinary tones.

"Oh, she is all right now, no danger at all. She'll do fine. Let her sleep. Send Fairy to bed, too. Keep Pru quiet for a few days,—that's all. She's all right."

They did not hear the timid knock at the dungeon door. But after they had gone out, Mr. Starr locked the door behind them, and started back through the hall to see if the kitchen dors were locked. He distinctly heard a soft tapping, and he smiled. "Mice!" he thought. Then he heard something else,—a faintly whispered "Father!"

With a sharp exclamation he unlocked and opened the dungeon door, and Connie fell into his arms, sobbing piteously. And he did the only wise thing to do under such circumstances. He sat down on the hall floor and cuddled the child against his breast. He talked to her soothingly until the sobs quieted, and her voice was under control.

"Now, tell father," he urged, 'how did you get in the dungeon? The twins——"

"Oh, no, father, of course not, the twins wouldn't do such a thing as that. I went into the dungeon to pray that Prudence would get well. And I prayed myself to sleep. When I woke up the door was locked."

'But you precious child," he whispered, "why didn't you call out, or pound on the door?"

"I was afraid it would excite Prue and make her worse," she answered simply. And her father's kiss was unwontedly tender as he carried hed upstairs to bed.

Prudence slept late the next morning, and when she opened her eyes her father was sitting beside her.

"All right this morning, father," she said, smiling. "Are the girls at school?"

"Oh, of course. Well, bring them up, I want to see them."

Just then the distant whistle of a locomotive sounded through the open window, but she did not notice her father's sudden start. She nodded up at him again, and repeated, "I want to see my girls."

Her father sent them up to her at once, and they stood at the foot of the bed with sory faces, and smiled at her.

"Say something," whispered Carol, kicking Lark suggestively on the foot. But Lark was dumb. It was Carol who broke the silence.

"Oh, Prudence, do you suppose the doctors will let me come in and watch them bandage your head? I want to begin practicing up, so as to be ready for the next war."

They then laughed, and the girls realized that Prudence was really alive and quite as always. They told her of Connie's sad experience, and Prudence comforted her sweetly.

"It just proves all over again," she declared, smiling, but with a sigh close following, "that you can't get along without me to look after you. Would I ever go to bed without making sure that Connie was safe and sound?"

Down-stairs, meanwhile, Mr. Starr was plotting with Fairy, a willing assistant.

"He'll surely be in on this train, and you must keep him down here until I get through with Prudence. I want to tell her a few things before she sees him. Bring him in quietly, and don't let him speak loudly. I do not want her to know he is on hand for a few minutes. Explain it to the girls, will you?"

After sending the younger girls down-stairs again, he closed the door of Prudence's room, and sat down beside her.

"Prudence, I can't tell you how bitterly disappointed I am in you."

"Father!"

"Yes, I thought you loved us,—the girls and me. It never occurred to me that you considered us a bunch of selfish, heartless, ungrateful animals!"

"Father!"

"Is that your idea of love? Is that ——"

"Oh, father!"

"It really did hurt me, Prudence. My dear little girl, how could you send Jerry away, breaking your heart and his, and ours, too,—just because you thought us such a selfish lot that we would begrudge you any happiness of your own? Don't you think our love for you is big enough to make us happy in seeing you happy? You used to say you would never marry. We did not expect you to marry, then. But we knew the time would come when marriage would seem beautiful and desirable to you. We were waiting for that time. We were hoping for it. We were happy when you loved Jerry, because we knew he was good and kind and loving, and that he could give you all the beautiful things of life—that I can never give my children. But you thought we were too selfish to let you go, and you sent him away."

"But father! Who would raise the girls? Who would keep the parsonage? Who would look after you?"

"Aunt Grace, to be sure. We talked it over two years ago, when her husband died. Before that, she was not free to come to us. But she said then that whenever we were ready for her she would come. We both felt that since you were getting along so magnificently with the girls, it was better that way for a while. But she said that when your flitting-time came, she would come to us gladly. We had it all arranged. You won't want to marry for a year or so, yet. You'll want to have some happy sweetheart days first. And you'll want to make a lot of those pretty, useless, nonsensical things other girls make when they marry. That's why I advised you to save your burglar money,—so you would have it for this. We'll have Aunt Grace come right away, so you can take a little freedom to be happy, and to make your plans. And you can initiate Aunt Grace into the mysteries of parsonage housekeeping."

A bright strange light had flashed over Prudence's face. But her eyes clouded a little as she asked, "Do you think they would rather have Aunt Grace than me?"

'Of course not. But what has that to do with it? We love you so dearly that we can only be happy when you are happy. We love you so dearly that we can be happy with you away from us,—just knowing that you are happy. But you—you thought our love was such a hideous, selfish, little make-believe that——"

"Oh, father, I didn't! You know I didn't!—But—maybe Jerry won't forgive me now?"

"Why didn't you talk it over with me, Prudence?"

"I knew you too well, father. I knew it would be useless. But—doesn't it seem wrong, father, that—a girl—that I—should love Jerry more than—you and the girls? That he should come first? Doesn't it seem—wicked?"

"No, Prudence, it is not wicked. After all, perhaps it is not a stronger and deeper love. You were willing to sacrifice him and yourself, for our sakes! But it is a different love. It is the love of woman for man,—that is very different from sister-love and father-love. And it is right. And it is beautiful."

"I am sure Jerry will forgive me. Maybe if you will send me a paper and pencil—I can write him a note now? There's no use waiting, is there? Fairy will bring it, I am sure."

But when a few minutes later, she heard a step in the hall outside, she laid her arm across her face. Somehow she felt that the wonderful joy and love shining in her eyes should be kept hidden until Jerry was there to see. She heard the door open, and close again.

"Put them on the table, Fairy dearest, and—leave me for a little while, will you? Thank you." And her face was still hidden.

Then the table by the bedside was swiftly drawn away, and Jerry kneeled beside her, and drew the arm from her face.

"Jerry!" she whispered, half unbelievingly. Then joyously, "Oh, Jerry!" She gazed anxiously into his face. "Have you been sick? How thin you are, and so pale! Jerry Harmer, you need me to take care of you. don't you?"

But Jerry did not speak. He looked earnestly and steadily into the joyful eyes for a moment, and then he pressed his face to hers.

IN THE REALMS OF WOMANKIND

Knitting's the Vogue

To those who ride in motor cars there is denied a sight, becoming more and more frequent as the days pass and the season when our sailor boys at sea will need warm mufflers during long bitter days. Factory girls, shop-girls, office women, clerks and stenographers are gradually making the hours of going to and from work profitable and knitting busily as they ride. Many girls have found to their astonishment that even strap hanging does not interfere with knitting, and having the hands busily engaged goes far toward preserving a balance at lurching corners.

Neat little bags of cretonne or burlap hold the work, and it is noticeable that as knitting becomes more and more prevalent hand work on blouses and millinery decreases. Gay embroidery on clothes still obtains to some extent, but it is obvious that women who are clever with their fingers are devoting themselves to more useful handwork than embroidery and crochet, and girls who have never held knitting needles are taking to knitting just as they do to anything else to which they put their minds.

THE TWENTY-EIGHTH OF JUNE

By JOHN GABRIEL

WHEN I went down to Merehurst a few years ago to do locum work for my old friend, John Mott, we had an hour or so in which to run over his list of patients. He never told me the hundredth part of what was interesting about Chaldrake—but there, of course he did not know the hundredth part himself.

"Ah, yes, Chaldrake!" he said, when he came to the name; "not much trouble for you there, Allaby. He wants bucking up more than anything—what a pity he never married. He is going on all right now, and there'll be no need for you to attend him at all unless he sends for you." And he went on to speak of periodic and recurring fits of depression, and I listened, interested in a merely professional matter that was not in the least out of the common. Afterwards—afterwards, the veil was drawn aside.

John Mott left Merehurst the next morning, and I had a month to spend in that exceedingly pleasant village on the fringe of Surrey and Sussex, while Mott attended a special course of lectures in Edinburgh. The prospect pleased me more than a little, for it was the middle of a particularly brilliant June, and already London had become a weariness and infliction to one who had been born and bred in just such another village as Merehurst. As for work, that promised to be just heavy enough to prevent downright slacking, and the first week passed almost before I realized that it had started. And then on the Tuesday of the second week, the 22nd of June it was, I had a message from the Grange, and an hour later I had seen James Chaldrake for the first time in my life.

Merehurst Grange was a house much older and more impressive than I had supposed. Without misuse of language it might have been styled a mansion, and set in that exquisite frame of the Surrey hills it would have been a delectable abode, but for the one thing. That one thing was the deplorable neglect and decay that one saw all around, from the wide, unkept garden to the cracking paint on the heavy, studded front door. And inside it was just the same, an untidy desolation everywhere. The place was more like a musty old ruin than an inhabited house of the twentieth century.

A decrepit old butler received me and conducted me through a hall hung with tapestries that, for all the lack of care, looked almost priceless. He opened a door on the left, and I heard him say:

"Dr. Allaby has arrived, sir."

I stepped into a book-lined room which was just suffocatingly hot, for a huge fire was blazing away in the square, old-fashioned grate, and the incongruity of it, on that flaming day of mid-June, was enhanced by the shafts of brilliant sunshine that streamed in through the window. And then from a chair, planted squarely in front of the fire, James Chaldrake rose to receive me, and I forgot all about the appalling temperature of the room in my interest in its occupant. A great, gaunt man was peering forward at me, and my first impression was one of surprise at his unusual stature. My second was that I was in the presence of a very sick man, indeed. Chaldrake's harsh-featured face was flushed and then of ivory pallor in turn, and I noted that, as he stood there, he was supporting himself by the chair from which he had just risen. His hair was quite white, I should have said, and yet in a queer, indefinable way, he did not look like a man who had passed from youth to age in the ordinary, normal way. And then I remembered—Mott had mentioned that Chaldrake was 48. I was finding my new patient decidedly interesting.

His first remark was disconcerting enough.

"I am not ill," he said, in a rough, grating voice. "I do not know why they sent for you; it was my sister. She is unnecessarily solicitous."

I made some commonplace reply and asked a few orthodox questions. After a little tactful cajolery he allowed me to test his pulse and heart, and both the one and the other told the story. Not ill? He was on the verge of collapse if ever a man was; he was acutely and critically ill.

He listened while I told him his medicine would be sent up within an hour, and then I made some remark about the overheated temperature of the room. He looked at me in the oddest way.

"June is my bad month," he said curtly—his first admission that he was ill at all.

"Why?" I asked, but he would not tell me why for quite a long time, and, indeed, showed as plainly as a man could that he wished me to leave him.

But at last he relented so far as to say, with a queer distrust in his manner:

"Did not Dr. Mott tell you? Years ago I had a great grief in June." He stopped, and fumbled with his bony hands at the lapels of his coat. And then he half rose in his chair, and cried out in a voice that I shall never forget: "Oh, it's hell itself on the 28th of June. I hear him crying to me always, but never, never like he cries to me on the 28th of June. Oh, my God, my God; his face in the water!" And there he was with his head buried in his hands, quivering and shaking from head to foot.

Not another word could I get from him, and the finish of it was that I left him, and in the hall told the butler that I wished to speak to Mr. Chaldrake's sister. She came to me, a sad-faced woman of middle age, who seemed in keeping with all else in that house of desolation. I gave her a few very definite instructions, and told her that her brother's state was gravely serious, and she listened primly, and said that everything should be done as I desired.

"And tell me," I said, "what is this grief your brother had years ago, the grief that always comes back to him in June?"

She looked up at me, and I am sure there was resentment and distrust in her eyes just then; she looked as though she thought I was trying to pry into matters which did not concern me.

"I will show you if you can wait a moment," she said quietly, and she slipped away like a little mouse, to return a minute later with an old and yellowed newspaper cutting, which she passed to me without a word. I glanced at the date; it was a page from the Times, and the date was June 30, 22 years ago. And the news upon the page concerned the going down in the Channel of the P. & O. liner Laventic, outward bound to the east—an event I dimly remembered.

"See," she said, and pointed to the list of drowned.

I looked and read:

"Hugh Chilton Chaldrake, younger son of John Chaldrake, of Merehurst Manor, Merehurst, Surrey."

"He was James' brother and mine," she said in that acid voice of hers. "James was always very fond of him."

I thought I began to understand then, and I remember that I had just then a quick impulse of pity for that gaunt-faced man I had just left. I repeated my instructions to Miss Chaldrake and came away. And that same night I wrote to Mott, and told him of James Chaldrake's condition, mentioning, too, that I was very interested in the man.

II.

Mott's letter from Edinburgh did nothing to lessen my interest in James Chaldrake; indeed, it stimulated that interest very considerably. He wrote as follows:

"I am sorry, but not in the least surprised that Chaldrake has had a relapse—I quite agree with you that his condition is serious. You seem to have been told a little about that unhappy house, but perhaps I can fill in the blanks. Chaldrake has never got over the loss of his younger brother, who went down in the Laventic on the 29th of June, a score of years ago. Hugh Chaldrake was going out to take up a post in Ceylon, I always understood. The story, as I have always heard it, is that the two brothers had had a quarrel, and had had not been on speaking terms during the year that preceded Hugh's death. The reason? Cherchez la femme, my dear Allaby. There was the inevitable woman, and the story goes that first one of the brothers and then the other was the favorite for her hand. But eventually she chose Hugh, and the elder brother was left inconsolable. The gossips had it that James would be sure to marry the lady after a decent interval had elapsed following his brother's death, but the gossips were quite wrong, and no such thing happened. Almost at once James Chaldrake began to live the life of a recluse, and the inference seems plain, that he never forgave himself for that angry quarrel with his brother, which had not been made up at the time of Hugh's death. We may take it, I think, that an unavailing remorse has spoiled James Chaldrake's life. As regards his condition"—and he passed on to professional matters.

During the next few days I paid regular visits to the Grange, and if Chaldrake was not conspicuously better, he was certainly not worse. And then came a visit which told me that all the drugs known to medical science would avail little enough to help James Chaldrake, and that it was his mind that was sick far more than his body. I had been shown into that same library in which I had first seen Chaldrake, and as the door closed behind me I heard him muttering and mumbling in his chair. I spoke, and he never heard me—I doubt if he would have heard anybody or anything just then. And then, just as I stepped forward, he rose unsteadily from his chair, and I never saw a look of such rapt eagerness upon a man's face as I saw upon his just then. He was listening—listening to a sound that only existed for himself. And—so I thought—he was looking at something, and here again, the thing at which he looked existed for none other than James Chaldrake. It was pitiful to see him—looking at nothing and listening to nothing. And then his lips parted and I just caught the almost whispered words:

"Look," he said, "there, there with the moonlight on his face!" He stopped and peered forward—at nothing. "Hark!" he whispered, "he is calling to me. 'Jim, Jim,' he is saying, 'save me, Jim!'" He seemed to tremble as he stood, and then there spread over his face a look of the most acute and dreadful fear. "He—has—gone," I heard him say, and it was as though every word was dragged from his ashen lips.

He stood for a moment, still trembling from head to foot, and then sank back in his chair.

When I spoke to him then and he answered me, he seemed to have no remembrance of that strange outburst of a few minutes before, for he did not refer to it in any way, beginning to speak with more interest than usual of his own illness. As a matter of fact this was the first occasion upon which he had really admitted that he was ill at all, and I listened with interest while he mumbled something about being glad if I would give him some strong medicine.

"Make it stronger, doctor, make it stronger," he said in a clearer voice. "Tide me over the 28th; aye, do that and I'll thank you."

"The 29th you mean," I said soothingly, wondering at his confusion of dates in a matter which was photographed upon his memory with such dreadful clearness.

He looked at me with that suggestion of vagueness and wondering that I had often noticed before, and I knew he was losing his grip upon himself once more. He sat there, huddled up in his chair, muttering incoherent snatches of words. And then, a full minute after I had corrected him about the date of his brother's death, he said again:

"Aye, tide me over the 28th, and I'll thank you, doctor."

So my correction had fallen upon deaf or unheeding ears.

I saw the sister again the day before I left, and I happened to mention this odd circummstance of her brother getting mixed in his dates when harping upon his brother's death.

"He keeps referring to the 28th as the day upon which your brother died," I said. "Of course he's wrong; the Laventic went down in the early evening of the 29th of June, did it not?"

"Yes," she said, "the Laventic went down on the 29th of June."

I made some casual remark about the oddity of her brother's mistake, and straightway forgot all about the matter.

It was that same evening I received a visit from the village parson, a fine old fellow who had had that little cure of souls for over 30 years. He looked in to smoke his pipe and chat of the great world that lay outside Merehurst, but after a time our talk came back to local affairs, and eventually centered upon James Chaldrake.

"A great tragedy that, Dr. Allaby, and I—I have never really understood it. A natural grief one can understand; that is a thing entirely admirable, of course. But this is a grief far removed from the normal; James Chaldrake's life, so it seems to me, has been one long penance, and I tell you again, I have never understood why. The inscrutable decrees of Providence ordained that his brother should be drowned at sea. It was natural that so grievous a loss should affect James, but not natural at all that it should affect him as it has done."

I made some remark about the quarrel between the brothers, and he gently shrugged.

"That is so; they quarrelled, but even so—no, Dr. Allaby, it is not natural. And the queer thing is this: They quarrelled about a girl, and I have always understood that those who knew the circumstances fully expected that James would marry her after a proper and decorous interval had elapsed following his brother's death. She had chosen Hugh, but I believe her feelings toward James had always been those of attachment and cordial liking. But he made no attempt to press his suit, and some years afterwards the girl married one of the Dorset Fanes. That, too, I never understood."

Nor did I. I only knew that for some reason beyond me, and apparently beyond those who knew James Chaldrake much better than I did, he had spoilt his life pining for that brother with whom he had quarrelled.

III.

The riddle was solved on the 28th of June, solved in circumstances every little detail of which I shall remember as long as I live. In the morning I paid my usual visit to the Grange, and found James Chaldrake in bed, where he had every reason for being, considering the state he was in. He was semi-delirious and very weak. And still his poor, fevered mind kept dwelling upon the one subject; still he had that queer obsession that he could see his brother in the water and could hear him crying for help. It was pitiful to hear him and to see the terrified intensity of his eyes as he had that vision of a night of long ago. Once he whispered:

"Oh, how could I, Hugh. Hugh, speak to me; I loved you always."

I left him after giving instructions that on no account must he be allowed to leave his bed. An hour later I sent over some sedative medicine.

That evening I had to go to one of Mott's patients at a village three miles away, and it was about half-past eight when I returned. I found waiting for me the old butler from the Grange, and as soon as I saw him I knew that he brought bad news. Almost before I had got in the hall he had come up to me and clutched my hand and his own hand was trembling.

"Oh, sir," he said, in a shaking voice, "come at once! The master has slipped away."

I stared my surprise, and there the old fellow was, almost dragging me to the door.

"Miss Chaldrake went to his room an hour ago, and he had gone. She told me to come for you, sir. Oh, be quick, be quick!"

I was quick, I think, for I was at the Grange 10 minutes later. And there in the hall I found Miss Chaldrake waiting for me. Her face was quite colorless, and the pallor was enhanced by the burning brightness of her eyes. I had a quick fancy that I should soon have two patients at the Grange on my hands.

"He has gone," she said in a strange, mechanical voice. And then she told me what I knew already, that she had gone to her brother's room and found that he had got up, dressed, and left the room and the house.

"And what have you done?" I said, now thoroughly alarmed.

"Berners got some men together before he came for you. They are looking for him, these men from the village."

Suddenly she covered her face with her hands, and it was just then that I heard a sharp rat-tat at the door, and saw that as they pulled the rope personally. The village constable was standing there, and he peered up at me with a latent excitement in his manner.

"Can you tell Berners to come, sir? We want some ropes—we've rigged up a drag, doctor." He lowered his voice when he said that, but not enough. For Miss Chaldrake was at our side, and I shall never forget that unhappy woman's face just then.

"The mere," she whispered, and then stood as though turned to stone. And then a little pitiful cry broke from her lips, and she turned and left us.

We went to the mere, the three of us, and I found other men waiting. It was a small pool of water on the estate, not a hundred yards from the house, willow-fringed and pleasant to look upon. But my heart was heavy as lead as I first set eyes upon it.

They began to do their grim work, and for a long time they worked with no result. And then I heard a shout, and say that as they pulled the rope it was taut and firm. I stood and watched them as they drew James Chaldrake to the mossy bank, and as his head and shoulders came into view I bit my lip. The pity and tragedy of it all had gripped me just then.

And then I heard another shout, a shout of unbelieving horror. I looked and saw that with James Chaldrake—underneath James Chaldrake, held in his arms—was something that once had been a man.

The chatter died away, and those silent village men drew slowly to the bank James Chaldrake and the burden that James Chaldrake held in his arms. And the next thing was that they had cleared a little space for me, and I was kneeling.

My work with James Chaldrake was soon finished. He was dead, and had been dead for a long time. It was my work with James Chaldrake's burden that chiefly mattered, for before I rose I had taken, unseen, a ring from what had once been the hand of a man.

An hour later I gave that ring to a woman, and I said this:

"No one will ever know. If you would rather not tell me anything I will go away."

She was silent for a moment, and then she told me all—told me with no tremor of her voice from first to last, and yet with something in it, and something in her face and eyes, that showed me how she had suffered.

"They loved each other, those two brothers of mine," she began. "And then they quarrelled. They quarrelled about a girl and I do not think she was worth it; no girl could have been worth such a price as that. She was going to marry Hugh after he had been a year in Ceylon. He was to sail on the 29th of June on the Laventic.

"The day before he came from London to say good-bye to me, James was away for the day—that is why Hugh came. He left me in the evening, and went past the mere on his way to the road. He stopped there for a time, and the reason was one of sentiment; it had been a trysting place for him and that girl who made two brothers hate each other. And while he was there James came upon him as he returned from his business."

She stopped and looked at me steadily.

"Hugh turned and saw him, and he gave a little cry. He slipped, and a moment later he was in the mere. It is deep and he could not swim."

She was silent again, and suddenly I felt most passionately sorry for her. And then I heard again that mechanical lifeless voice.

"The devil came to James just then, and the devil won. He, too, could not swim, but if the devil had not come to him he would have jumped into the water to try and save the brother he had once loved. But I told you—the devil won. James stood there on the bank. He stood there, seeing a picture he saw ever afterwards. That was his penance," she added quietly. "And it was part of his penance that he could never tear himself away from this spot, not even for my sake, and oh, how I begged him to come away. But he stayed—near Hugh.

"Listen! I knew all this three years later. James was ill—we thought he was dying—and he told me. Others never knew it, and you know why. Twenty-four hours afterwards the Laventic went down in mid-Channel, and my brother was supposed to be on board. He wasn't. He was lying in the mere, a hundred yards from this house."

She had finished, but after a time, in which I struggled vainly to find the right words, she asked me a question.

"Were they—were they together?" she whispered.

"Yes, they were together," I said. "James had his arm"—and I could not finish.

And at that, mercy was shown at last, and the woman came to silent weeping.

A rough intruder upon grief such as that, I stole away.

It isn't policy to promise men things; they like better to be uncertain of you.

Friday, 23.—Bitterly cold. The storekeeper, a fireman, and another boy died and were all buried at sea.

Saturday, 24.—The cattleman, who had become crazy jumped overboard for the fourth or fifth time. (Mr. King had pulled him in once.) The boat was turned round to search for him, but no trace could be found. As he was heavily clothed, he no doubt sank almost immediately.

On this day the fresh-water supply was finished, and the only water to be

During the eevning the chef died from exposure and was buried at sea. The storekeeper went crazy the same night.

Tuesday 22.—The cold continued inhad after this was the few drops to be caught from the sail when it rained.

Sunday, 25.—Two more men died and were buried at sea. The boat still kept heading for the land.

Monday, 26.—Everybody suffering intensely from thirst. There were plenty of biscuit on board, but no one dared to eat on account of the want of water. Heavy sea running. At 6 land was sighed. At 7 p.m. the sail was carried away and, as the sea was very rough, the boat was allowed to drift until morning.

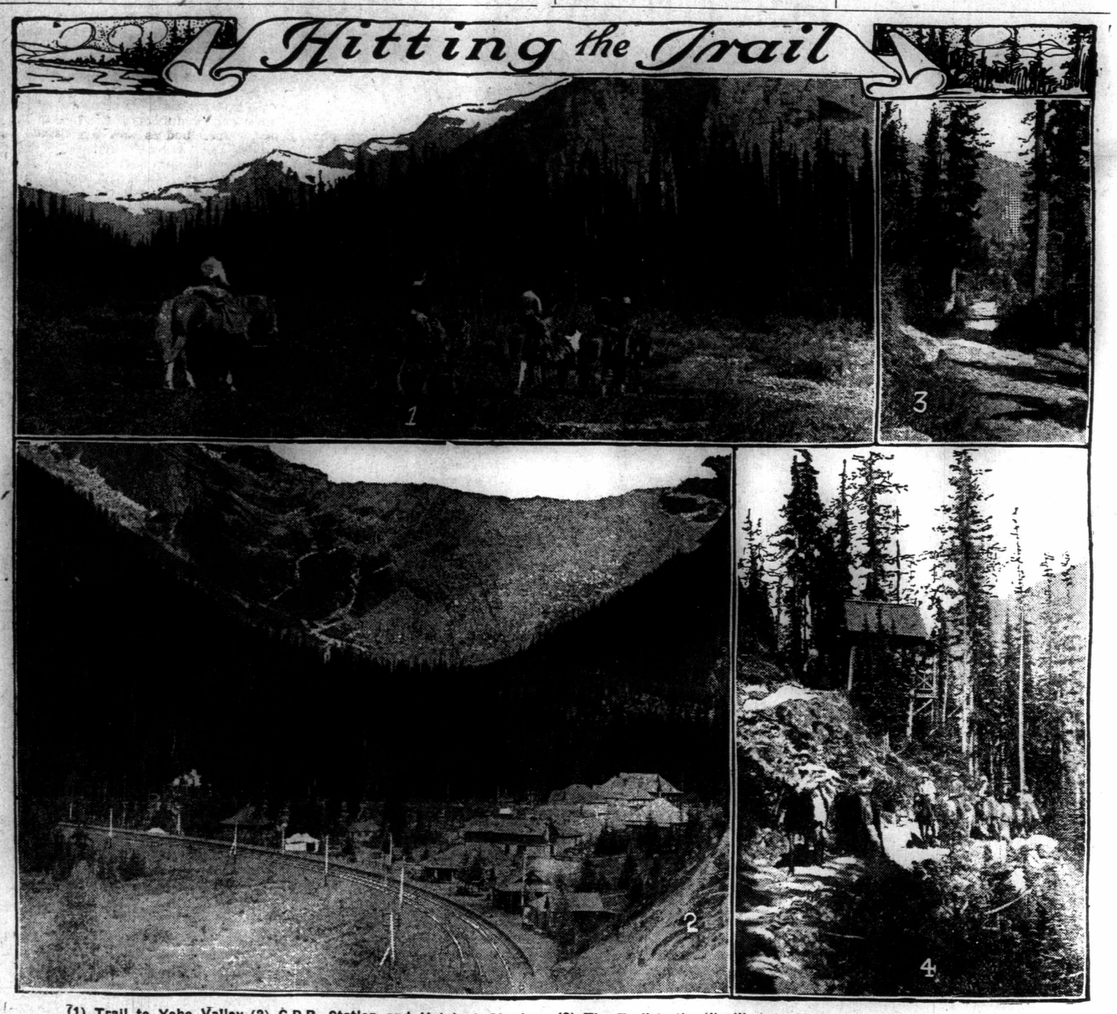
Tuesday, 27.—The linen-keeper died during the night, but, as land was in sight, he was not buried at sea. In the morning we pulled for the shore. Feet terribly swollen, later on turned black.

Suckling the Baby

These poor people arrived at Carino and were welcomed by the kind-hearted Spanish fisherfolk. The women and children shed tears of pity as the men lifted from the boat its half-dead occupants. At the sight of the poor little baby the pity of the good Spanish women became, if possible, intensified and Mr. Biggleston says that both they and the Spanish children stood around with the tears rolling down their cheeks. These good people, under the direction of their parish priest, carried the poor sufferers up to their houses, more dead than alive (a few more hours and all would have been dead), put them to bed, and gave them hot coffee.

The British Vice-Consul at Ferrol promptly did everything possible to alleviate suffering.

They remained in Carino nine days, when the terrible condition of the frost-bitten feet necessitated their removal to the hospital at Ferrol. There every care has been lavished upon them, but notwithstanding this, as already stated, five are still in bed with their feet in a terrible condition. One has died, having lost both feet, and the poor little baby, after surviving the ordeal of nine days at sea in an open boat, has died of meningitis. When the poor French lady had no longer any milk to give the little one, she put some condensed milk in her mouth and let the baby such it out in the manner that mother birds feed their young.



The poor linen-keeper, whose name was Watley, of Hammersmith, London, was buried in Carino, the Spanish verdict on the cause of his death being "eDath from Hunger, Thirst and Exposure."

Six boats in all set out from the Alnwick Castle. Two were picked up and their occupants landed at Cardiff; another was picked up and the occupants taken to New York (Captain Chave's boat). The fourth boat arrived at Carino, in Spain, but the other the other two, in one of which was the captain of the Trevose, have never been heard of.

JUST ANSWERED

A soldier in the English army wrote home: "They put me in barracks; they took away my clothes and put me in khaki; they took away my name and made me 'No. 575'; they took me to church, where I'd never been before, and they made me listen to a sermon for forty minutes. Then the parson said: 'No. 575. Art thou weary, art thou languid?' and I got seven days in the guardhouse because I answered that I certainly was."

Hitting the Trail

(1) Trail to Yoho Valley. (2) C.P.R. Station and Hotel at Glacier. (3) The Trail to the Illecillewaet Glacier. (4) A Mountain Trail.

CANADA is a land of trails.

Trails over mountains and hills, across prairies and through forests, by the banks of rivers beyond number and across country toward a distant sky line. Trails made by red men, by white men, and by nature.

But the mountain trails are the most alluring of them all, and hitting trails is the rarest of sport in Rockies or Selkirks, all the way from the Kananaskasis Pass on the east to the Yale gateway on the west.

The trail traveller feels the charm of the trail as soon as it is hit. It keeps you guessing where it is a hit-or-miss highway, where you require the keenness of an Indian to tell the way by the slighest of signs—a few twigs broken here, the mould of a horses' foot there, a blazed tree yonder, and then there will be a skip of a few yards that will throw you off the scent if you don't look out. Sometimes the trail is the way of a mountain stream, but just where you should emerge on the other side is a mystery unless you are in charge of guide or outfitter. A bog, too, will play tricks on you, for it carries few traces of other trailers.

Hundreds of miles of excellent trails have been made in the Canadian mountain ranges by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the National Parks department of the Canadian Government. Most of them are made for pony use, and mounted on one of these sure-footed little beasties of the west, you can be an explorer of the wilds and revel in the experience. Every mile of the devious way is a way of varying charm, every turn of the trail reveals new wonders.

Many trail trips are now made in loops. There is the one from Glacier station up the Cougar Valley to the caves and back by a loop route and over a pass that brings to view some of the sublimest scenery in the Selkirks. The literal ups and downs of this unique scenic route, as the railways would say, add to the interest, now in the bed of the valley, closed in by trees and huge plants like the Devil's Club, now climbing a thousand feet from which superb views are had of the kingly peaks like Sir Donald.

The trail traveller will find another region of infinite variety and attractiveness in the series of trails radiating from Field and leading up the Yoho Valley to the Yoho Glacier field at its upper end. One may go northward by the valley route, passing the Takkakaw, the Twin and the Laughing Falls, and return by the upper trail, bordering a charming lake or two, the nose of the Vice-President glacier, Summit Lake and then the steep down-hill bit to Emerald Lake and the tree-bordered avenue that will bring one back to Field. Shelter huts or tents make it possible to spend some days on this marvellous trail way, amid alpine region of surpassing beauty.

Lake Louise will also provide delectable trail paths, especially that leading to Paradise Valley and its circle of giant summits, and Sentinel Pass, leading to the valley of the Ten Peaks, while in the Rocky Mountain Park and Banff, the routes are multiplying year by year.

Yes, trail hitting is rare sport, I repeat, and no country in the world affords greater facilities for its enjoyment than our own Canadian mountain

What Our Bodies Are Worth

The courts are cold blooded, and do not place the value of a woman's shapely limbs, coquettish eyes, and symmetrical form at nearly so high a figure as would her sweetheart or her admirers or relatives. They do not consider any part of a woman's body so valuable as a similar part of a man's body. The value of her leg comes more nearly reaching the value of a man's leg than any other part, in the relative measure of values by the legal tribunals.

From a sentimental point of view this would seem unreasonable; but a thorough examination of every decision of the different Supreme Courts of the various States discloses the cold facts in the case. Out of twenty-two cases where the highest verdicts were sustained for personal injuries, where men and women were almost similarly injured, the twenty-two men received a total of $292,957 against the twenty-two women's total of $150,738,82 in damages. These figures are taken from the largest verdicts ever given, and the ratio in smaller verdicts for similar injuries shows a falling off in greater proportion.

The biggest verdict ever allowed a woman which was sustained by the Supreme Court was for $16,338.82. This sum was allowed a Mrs. Kenney against the South Shore Gas & Electric Company by the Court of Appeals of New York. She was frightfully and permanently disfigured by an explosion of gas.

But the Supreme Court of Rhode Island allowed a man by the name of Carr $22,895 for similar injuries against the American Locomotive company as damages resulting from a boiler explosion; and only lately a man frightfully inpured in a railroad accident near New York was awarded a frightfully injured in a railroad acciahasn't yet been passed upon by the higher court.

The next highest verdict ever sustained in favor of a woman for personal injuries was that of a Mrs. White, of Alabama, who at the age of sixty-four years and when in good health was made a hopeless cripple in a railroad accident. The railroad company had to pay her $16,000. But the Texas Supreme Court compelled a railroad company to pay $30,000 to a brakeman by the name of Gray who was no worse injured.

Even the spine of a man is valued by the courts at a higher rate than that of a woman. The Texas courts allowed a Mrs. Probandt $15,000 for the fracture of her spine; while the Supreme Court of Arkansas allowed Brown, a brakeman, $25,000 for such an injury. The jury gave Brown $50,000, but the court reduced it one-half.

Against the $12,750 allowed Miss Hoskovec of Nebraska, who was made a mental and physical wreck in a railroad accident, a man by the name of Yeargan in Texas was allowed $18,962.

A woman's leg comes more nearly being an equal in value to that of a man, according to the courts, than any other member of her body. A Miss Bugge, of Seattle, was allowed $14,500 for the loss of her leg, and $500 for the surgeon's bill; while a man by the name of Freeman in Texas was allowed $15,000 straight. Freeman was forty-seven, and Miss Bugge was thirty-one.

For a fracture and the shortening of a leg as a consequence, Miss Nedry, a woman teacher, was allowed $5,000 by the Arkansas courts; while a man by the name of Lannon in Illinois was allowed $15,000 for similar injuries.

For the fracture of a hip Miss Bouknight, a government clerk, was allowed $7,500 by the courts of Virginia, against $12,500 allowed an electrician by the name of Shaklee in Texas.

The eye of a man is worth $11,000; while that of a woman is worth only $7,500, according to the version of the courts of this country. The federal court allowed a Russian immigrant woman the smaller sum; while the Texas Supreme Court allowed a boiler maker's helper the larger sum for the loss of an eye.

It costs just five times as much to paralyze a man through negligence as it does to inflict the same injuries on a woman, according to Texas and Illinois courts. For a partial paralysis East St. Louis paid a Mrs. Cole $7,000; while the Kansas City Southern Railroad Company paid a switchman by the name of Gordon $35,000. The injuries are described as about the same in seriousness.

The hearing of a man is much more valuable in law than the hearing of a woman, according to Kentucky and Texas courts. The former allowed a Mrs. Ackerman $7,500 in aggravating circumstances; while the latter court allowed a locomotive engineer $15,000. The jury had allowed him $25,000; but the court cut off $10,000.

And a man's ribs are much more valuable than those of a woman, according to Texas and Arkansas courts. The five broken ribs of a Texas brakeman cost a railroad company $20,000; while the breaking of three ribs of a married woman cost a railroad in Arkansas only $1,000.

Even the ill shaped fingers of a man are more valuable in law than the pretty, shapely fingers of a woman. Barnes, of Texas, a laborer, was allowed $9,000 for the loss of three middle fingers; while Mrs. McNally, a machine operator in Kentucky, was allowed $6,500 for the loss of her thumb on the right hand, forefinger on her left hand, and injury to forefinger on the right.

And a man's nervous system is subject to a more damaging shock than that of a woman, according to the courts. A business man in Arkansas was allowed $16,000 for a blasting shock to his nervous system; while a Mrs. Swann, age thirty-seven, was allowed $8,000 by the Texas courts. This was cut down from a verdict of $13,000 allowed by the jury.

Other comparative allowances:

Fracture of leg.—Man, $10,000; woman, $3,500.

Injury to leg.—Man, $7,500; woman, $4,000.

Fracture to arm.—Man, $6,000; woman, $1,200.

Fracture to knee.—Man, $3,000; woman, $2,500.

Fracture of ankle.—Man, $10,000; woman, $7,500.

Injury to foot.—Man, $6,000; woman, $3,500.

Injury to shoulder.—Man, $2,600; woman, $1,550.

Fractured wrist.—Man, $3,000; woman, $2,500.

Injury to hand.—Man, $4,500; woman, $900.

Influenza or La Grippe

It is quite refreshing these days to read of a clearly defined treatment for Influenza or La Grippe. In an article in the "Lancet-Clinic," Dr. James Bell, of New York City, says he is convinced that too much medication is both unnecessary and injurious.

When called to a case of la grippe, the patient is usually seen when the fever is present, as the chill which occassionally ushers in the disease, has practically passed away. Dr. Bell then orders that the bowels be opened freely with salts, or citrate of magnesia. For the high fever, severe headach, pain and general soreness, one antikamnia tablet every three hours is quickly followed by complete relief. Ask for A-K Tablets. They are also unexcelled for headache, neuralgia and all pains.

SWISS IS MENACE TO ALLIES UNDER PRESENT REGIME

The renewed mobilization of the Swiss army is viewed as a menace to the Allies, in an article in the Washington Post purporting to come from Entente sources. This article states that the Germans for some time have been sending new and heavy artillery to the Swiss army, despite the urgent need of Germany's allies for big guns.

That the French appreciate the growing delicacy of the situation is indicated by the heavy withdrawal of funds from Switzerland, the Paris Rothchilds alone taking 80 million dollars out of Swiss banks. The Swiss are dependent upon Germany for fuel and food and the most of their guns are Krupp made. Switzerland also has invested in German war loans.

Both the president of Switzerland and the commander of the little republic's army are of German descent. Commander General Willie-Bismarck is a relative of the iron chancellor and his cousin, Count Bismarck, a German army officer, has been in Switzerland for some time.

With Swiss government voluntarily permitting the Germans to cross their border it means that it is giving this nation an undue advantage which no neutral nation would be guilty of.

Back in 1814 the Swiss permitted the Austrians under Prince Schwartzenburg to avail themselves of identically the same route to outflank the French in Alsace, and to repeat these tactics at this time means that Switzerland has ceased to be neutral and is a menace to the allies.

HOBBLE-DE-HOY

There were three jolly Welshmen,
As I have heard say,
And they went a-hunting
On Saint David's day.

All the day they hunted,
And nothing could they find
But a ship a-sailing,
A-sailing with the wind.

One said it was a ship,
The other he said "Nay,"
The third he said it was a house
With chimney blown away.

And all the night they hunted;
And nothing could they find
But the moon a-gliding,
A-gliding with the wind.

One said it was the moon,
The other he said "Nay;"
The third he said it was a cheese
With half o' it cut away.

Synopsis of Canadian Northwest Land Regulations.

THE sole head of a family, or any male over 18 years old, who was at the commencement of the present war, and has since continued to be, a British subject or a subject of an allied or neutral country, may homestead a quarter-section of available Dominion Land in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta. Applicant must appear in person at Dominion Lands Agency or Sub-Agency for District. Entry by proxy may be made on certain conditions. Duties—Six months residence upon and cultivation of land in each three years.

In certain districts a homesteader may secure an adjoining quarter-section pre-emption. Price $3.00 per acre. Duties—Reside six months in each of three years after earning homestead patent and cultivate 50 acres extra. May obtain pre-emption patent as soon as homestead patent on certain conditions.

A settler after obtaining homestead patents, if he cannot secure a pre-emption, may take a purchased homestead in certain districts. Price $3.00 per acre. Must reside six months in each of three years, cultivate 50 acres and erect a house worth $300.00.

Holders of entries may count time employment as farm laborers in Canada during 1917, as residence duties under certain conditions.

When Dominion Lands are advertised or posted for entry, returned soldiers who have served overseas and have been honorably discharged, receive one day priority in applying for entry at local Agent's Office (but not Sub-Agency). Discharge papers must be presented to Agent.

FAIRY TALES FOR THE LITTLE ONES

How the Fire Was Kindled

IT was drawing near the night. Another December day had been spent under the sullen gray sky. The frozen earth is hidden beneath the heavy blanket of snow. The Indians are returning home with their game. They hunt and fish for their food, and in the summer they raise corn, which they grind to coarse meal which is used in making their bread. Occasionally here or there a white man is seen, either hunting for food or chopping among the forest trees to get his fuel. There are scattered over these prairies log huts, lined with furs and have a bright fire in the rude, stone fireplace. A kindly woman sits knitting and her children play about her chair. At night the father comes and enjoys his meal, prepared by his good wife, and then when it is over the little family sits by the open fire and hear the adventures of the day told by the father.

In this certain home there are the father(mother, two large boys and three smaller children. The father and eldest boy had been hunting and trapping all the day and the remainder of the family had stayed at the little log house, situated in the prairies of Oklahoma. Their nearest neighbors (a family of Indians) live eight miles away and their white neighbors lived about eleven miles from them.

This home was comfortable. The frame was of logs and the inner walls were lined with furs. The windows were of heavy oiled paper. There in the center of one side of the room was a large fireplace of stone. In it a cheerful fire glowed brightly beneath large logs upheld by the andirons.

The father and son were coming home at evening with much game and the other son was coming with a large load of logs on a big sled. The mother had the supper prepared for them, for she knew that they would be cold and hungry. They brushed the snow from their heavy boots and coats before entering. Then they greeted their parents. Next they dined. The dishes were of wod and pewter, the table linen was of heavy, coarse spun flax and the chairs were very heavy and unpolished, as was the table at which they sat enjoying their hot meal.

After the meal they took their chairs and placed them by the fireplace. They seated themselves with ease. Then father and the two boys told of the different happenings of that day. They were glad indeed that they had sufficient fuel and fire with which to burn it, for the night was cold and growing colder. The wind whistled about the corners of the cabin. The distant whoops of the Indians were heard and they knew that they were rounding up their comrades, who by chance might have been overtaken on their expeditions by the swift wind and cutting sleet. If an answer was given them they would go in search of the ones who were missing.

The family had retired after heaping the fire with logs and chips. They slept soundly as anyone does on a cold winter's night. The wind howled unmercifully about the cabin, sweeping the snow into drifts about it. It whistled down the chimpney of the fireplace and fanned the fire, taking it, spark by spark, up into the chimney and turning them loose to dissolve in the cold air. Finally the last spark had gone up the chimney and nothing but the unburned logs were lying there, with no fire to burn them.

Now the sky had changed from a dark gray to a lighter shade of gray and the little settlements were awakening from their winter night's repose, kindling their fires for a new day.

The family was astir and were surprised and troubled about the disappearance of their bright fire, which only last night was as bright as a twinkling star. It certainly meant something when the fire went out in these days. It meant a long, weary tramp over the desolate prairie to the fire of some other family and there to beg a cinder, which contained that wonderful and precious substance—fire.

The largest boy mounted his horse and started to the Indian village, but he got about half of the way there when his horse much exhausted, could go no farther with him. He decided to walk. So leading his horse gently he proceeded with his journey when he himself became very fatigued and was taken from his feet by a strong gust of wind.

His people waited for him and wondered very much why he did not return. What was the matter? Was he lost? Had the frightful blizzard taken him under the snow blanket? This question was solved when the next brother found the frozen body of his brother under the snow and by him stood the faithful horse. He removed the snow from the body and wrapped it in a heavy coat. Was he breathing? Yes, very faintly, very faintly.

"Perhaps he may recover," said the brother. Then they went home and the mother was frightened to see slowly moving across the snow covered plain her two sons, one stiff with cruel cold; the other trying to keep back the terrible wind.

At last home was reached and there in the place was a bright fire. The poor brother who had been almost frozen was recovering, and found himself in a fur covered chair sitting in front of the fire with his family around him. All of them sat with anxious eyes and did sigh a very long sigh of relief when he opened his eyes.

The father had succeeded in making ing a fire from the sparks of two flint stones. All of this adventure would not have been told here had he found that he could have made the sparks from the little flint stones kindle the fire.

IF ALL WHO HATE WOULD LOVE US

If all who hate would love us,
And all our loves were true,
The stars that swing above us
Would brighten in the blue;
If cruel words were kisses,
And every scowl a smile,
A better world than this is
Would hardly be worth while;
If purses would not tighten
To meet a brother's need,
The load we bear would lighten

If those who whine would whistle,
And those who languish laugh,
The rose would rout the thistle,
The grain outrun the chaff.
If hearts were only jolly,
If grieving were forgot,
And tears of melancholy
Were things that now are not,
Then love would kneel to duty
And all the world would seem
A bridal bower of beauty
A dream within a dream.

If men would cease to worry,
And women cease to sigh,
And all be glad to bury Whatever has to die;
If neighbor spake to neighbor,
As love demands of all;
The rust would eat the saber,
The spear stay on the wall;
Then every day would glisten,
And every eye would shine,
And God would pause and listen,
And life would be divine.

BIRDS WEIGH THEMSELVES

(From the Little Paper, London)

An ingenious naturalist has been making the tomtits record their weight. In order to obtain the food which he places for them they have to alight upon what appears to be a twig, but is in reality the beam of a tiny scale. As they rest upon it, so they register their weight, which averages about one-third of an ounce per bird—48 tomtits to the pound!

THE ESCAPE OF THE PRINCESS

Once upon a time there lived a princess. One day while she was playing three old witches came and carried her away to their cave. They made her work hard for them. They told her if she would not want to see her father and mother again they would treat her very nice. But she wanted to see her parents again.

They became angry with her then, and put her in prison, when she was not working. One day one of the witches died, and the princess said:

"If you will let me out of prison I will make her come back to life."

For the princess was a fairy.

When she was out, and had given the witch life, they put her into prison again. One day the king and queen, parents of the princess, were riding through the wood where the witches lived, when they spied the witches' cave.

One of the witches was a fairy, and she killed the other two witches and went with the princess to their palace. There they lived happily ever after.

The Enchanted Horse

AS the Shah of Persia was keeping the Feast of the New Year in the city of Shiraz an Indian magician came to his court, leading a very ugly horse. It walked in a jerky way and looked more like wood than a living creature. The shah could hardly help laughing when he saw it.

"Laugh as you will, sire," said the magician, "I think you will be glad to pay a great price for my horse when you know what it can do. If your brave young son, Prince Frouz, will deign to mount it, and turn the peg in the siddle, he will be able to test its power."

"Well, let me see what it can do," said the prince.

He sprang upon the horse and, without waiting to learn how to manage it, turned the peg in the saddle. The strange animal at once rose with him into the air with the swiftness of an arrow, and carried him out of sight.

At first he was delighted at the speed with which he rushed through the air. He did not grow uneasy until he tried to turn the horse's head back to Shiraz, and found that it would not answer the rein.

"I suppose," he said, "I must twist the peg the other way."

He did so, and to his alarm, the horse leaped up higher into the sky, and began to travel as fast as lightning.

Prince Frouz did not lose his wits, and after examining the saddle he found another smaller peg. He gave this a wrench, and the horse then stopped, and carried him gently downwards, and he alighted, tired, weak and hungry, on the terraced roof of a strange, great palace.

It was now night, and everybody was in bed. Prince Frouz crept downstairs, and came into a splendid hall. There he saw a lovely young lady sleeping on a sofa, with ten women reposing around her. Going up to the sofa, he awoke the lady, and asked her pardon, and told her the story of his wonderful adventure.

"And now," he said, "may I ask, my sweet lady, who you are, and where I am?"

"You are in the palace of the Princess of Bengal," said the lady kindly, "and I am the princess."

She then called her women and bade them set out a repast for Prince Frouz, and conducted him to a royal bed chamber. The prince slept soundly, and rose up fresh and gay of heart, and the princess sent for him and begged him to tell her again the story of his wonderful adventure. They remained together all day long, and the result was that they fell deeply in love with one another.

At break of day next morning, before anyone else was awake, the princess climbed to the terraced roof of the palace and found the prince waiting for her, and they both mounted the enchanted horse and set out for Persia, where they intended to get married. The prince now knew how to manage the horse, and in a short time he arrived with the princess at a castle a little way from Shiraz.

Leaving his sweetheart there to array herself in her richest attire for the wedding, he went to his father, the shah, to tell him of her coming. Unhappily, he left the enchanted horse at the castle instead of taking it with him. While he was telling his father the story of his wonderful adventure, the Indian magician heard what he said, and ran to the castle and got the enchanted horse, and exclaimed to the princess:

"The shah wishes to see you at once, and Prince Frouz has asked me to fetch you. Mount with me on the horse, as we shall reach Shiraz in a moment."

The princess got up beside the magician, and he at once turned the horse's head away from Shiraz, and carried her off to Cashmere. They descended in a road near the chief town of that country, just as the sultan was riding by.

"Save me!" cried the princess. "Save me from this wicked man!"

The Sultan of Cashmere was amazed at her loveliness, and with one stroke of the sword he slew her enemy, and then he led her kindly into the stateliest room in his palace, and commanded a hundred slaves to wait upon her.

"I have escaped from one snare," she said to herself, "and fallen into another."

So she had. The sultan was wildly in love with her, and instead of taking her back to Prince Frouz, he arranged to marry her himself.

But the princess was as subtle as she was beautiful, and she frightened him away by pretending that she was mad. He sent his wisest doctors to cure her, and she rushed upon them, raging like a mad woman, and they, too, fled in terror.

One day a strange physician came to the sultan and promised to take the madness away from the princess.

"You see, sir," he said, "the lady has been bewitched by riding an enchanted horse. Let me place her again on the horse, and I will cure her."

The sultan was delighted, and the strange physician was taken to the princess. "Do you not know me, dearest?" he whispered.

It was Prince Frouz, who had been wandering in disguise all over the world in search of her.

He placed her upon the enchanted horse and sprang beside her, and in less than an hour he brought her to Shiraz. And they were married, with the consent of the shah, and to the joy of all the Persian people.

COMMENT AND CRITICISM

WHO WILL BE RESPONSIBLE?

Last Sunday a young lad was seen crawling to the top of one of the bridges spanning the Bow river. What a sad plight it would have been if accidentally he would have slipped off the top of that construction! Whose fault would it have been? Is there no man in the city who looks after such places and sees that no young boys are getting themselves into trouble and danger? It's a shame if there isn't.

ALL PRAISE FOR THE R. N. W. M. P.

Did you ever see a finer bunch of men than those red-coated policemen that paraded around the exhibition grounds last week and took all the honors of the occasion. It just naturally made the breast of the Calgarians swell with pride at the fine appearance of these rural saviours of law and justice. Go where you will—in the States, England, France or Russia and view the crack regiments of these countries, and you will not find a more striking or more handsome bunch of men than the regiment of the R. N. W. M. Police. They are not only physically Adonises, but they have the true up-to-date soldierly bearing and deportment of men of the twentieth century training. They are the finest speciments of Canadian manhood, and the people of Calgary are justified in the pride they have for the R. N. W. M. P. boys.

TO YOU, MR. ELIGIBLE

Don't wait to have the brand of a conscript on your brow: It will be just as disgraceful as being a convict behind the bars. You have scorned your duty while he would probably willingly change shoes with a man in a first line trench. Men are needed, and if you are a man you will quit your civilian clothes. Remember Belgium and Serbia, direct your thoughts towards Scarborough and Hartlepool, think of Nurse Cavell, Captain Fryatt, and the crucified Canadians, the U-boats who are now seeking to prevent the passengers of ships from reaching land, by cold-blooded murder. If you do not wilter in shame at the remembrance of these atrocities then you have no feeling. Do you think that when the boys come home they will overlook the fact that you have not helped to uphold Britain's honor. If so, get the fact out of your brain. If you escape severe censure you will be getting off handsomely. Fan the sparks of your manhood into a flame of patriotism, it is not too late yet to do your duty, but you must join NOW.

CALGARY NEEDS REAL PUBLICITY

Calgary today is greatly in need of publicity. A proper exploitation of the resources, industries and advantages of Calgary, circulated far and wide, will bring inestimable benefits to the city in years to come. But this publicity must be of the right kind. It must consist of advertising that appeals. The display advertising must be in the right mediums and the literature of the kind that will be read. Today the only thing of a publicity nature issued by the city is a miniature manual that would hardly do credit to a cow-town to say nothing of a progressive city of the twentieth century. What we need is a booklet that is brief, concise, and to the point. It must contain illustrations of the city—business enterprises, schools, colleges, library, parks, and homes. These illustrations should be works of art. The whole publication must teem with modernism in printing and illustrations. It must tell Calgary's story forcefully but briefly. It must be printed in a style that will strike the eye and hold the attention of the reader. Such literature is easily produced in Calgary and at a nominal sum. The returns on such an investment should justify immediate action by the city fathers.

SCARCITY OF LABOR A SERIOUS PROBLEM TODAY

Calgary is almost swamped with too much business. The scarcity of skilled labor of all kinds is proving a serious problem. Men today are in great demand for every line of business, and this was never so evident as in the printing industry. Newspaper publishers and printing establishments generally are feeling this scarcity of men to an alarming extent. Wages are going up and men are not to be had for love nor money. With the recruiting agents calling for more men, with the various lines of industry calling for help it is making men's services rise to an alarming extent. Already good laborers are receiving wages much above the scale and as this demand increases, the wages are bound to rise still further. The answer to this problem is hard to solve. A laborer is worthy of his hire and good men—men who are experts in their line, who render a full day's time with a maximum amount of labor are entitled to the results of their efforts, but the present sarcity of labor is putting a premium on men's work of the mediocre class and creating a principal that pretends to the bad when this labor scarcity is over. It means that when the war is over and help will be plentiful, the ordinary laborer's wages will materially decrease. This will mean greater trouble at home than the war has proven, for few men will take a set back of this character with good grace. They will take this matter as a personal affront and will blame the government. No matter which party is in power, the readjustment of the labor situation after the war is going to prove a most serious one.

Another Treat For Readers Of The Standard

READERS of The Standard, what did you think of "Prudence of the Parsonage?" Was it not the most interesting little story you have ever read? Did it not grip you and hold you with a band so strong that you were not content until you had read every line from beginning to end. Well, we have another treat for you. We are going to give you the sequel. This is a rare treat. None but the most prosperous of newspapers can afford to give its readers such high priced serial stories. We are not so prosperous but we are alive and ambitious. We believe that nothing is too good for The Standard readers and so we have made arrangements with the publishers and have bought serial rights to "Prudence Says So," the sequel to "Prudence of the Parsonage." The same delightful characters with some additions predominate in this latest publication, but we are not going to tell you much about the story. It would take all the zest out of it.

Beginning with this issue the great serial story by that greatest of Canadian backwoods' writers, James Oliver Curwood, called "Kazan", will have the first instalment published. A generous portion of this story will be published each week and there is little doubt that once you start to read this thrilling and absorbing story of the wolf-dog that you will watch each week for the next instalment.

"Kazan, the Wolf Dog of the Great Snows" is a tale of a battle for Master, for Mate and for Offspring; a battle for life and the needs of hunger with the wild and bitter elements of the Arctic night.

Be sure that you get The Standard hereafter as you will be mightily pleased with these big features as well as the other stories and features that abound throughout the issue. This is all for the small sum of five cents weekly or two dollars for the year. More than was ever given by any newspaper in Canada. Two great $1,000 serials as well as a host of other good things. READ AND INWARDLY DIGEST

Every advertiser should listen to the advice of Arthur Brisbane. Brisbane is probably the highest paid editor in the world. His editorials made the Hearst newspapers what they are today. Mr. Brisbane makes some caustic remarks that are well worth following by every advertiser who wants results from advertising. He says in part as follows:

"I recall when the United Cigar Stores were first started by Mr. Whelan. He told me he had been advertising, but without any results. I said to him:

"'You advertise as my cat walks into the room. If I don't see her by accident I don't know she's there.

"'You advertise as if you went to the cigar counter in a hotel and told the girl you were selling cigars and asked how much the hotel would charge you to whisper the fact. She told you a whisper would cost you $5 and then you asked her how much for a yell. When she told you $50, you handed over $5 and said you'd take one whisper.

"'You whispered, but nobody heard you, and you left the hotel imagining that you have saved $45, when you had really thrown away $5.'

"No matter what you say with the written or spoken word, you must say it as if it had never been said before. I'd be ashamed to write an advertisement that was not looked at by every reader the paper had. You must write an advertisement so that people will see, will read, will understand and will believe."

EMPIRE UNITY

The great resistance of the Belgian people in 1914, and the Teuton defeat at the battle of the Marne, surprised the Germans greatly, but the thing which has astounded the Huns most is the fact that the British empire has not been broken up. Germany expected that on the moment war was declared that the Boers would strive to obtain independence and that Ireland, Canada, Australia and New Zealand would break away from their allegiance to Britain; that the Hindus, after being treated in a dog like matter by those tyrannical Englishmen would also attempt to establish their ancient empire. How badly she was mistaken; little did she realize how well the pups loved the old bulldog. She had given them self government and British freedom and the British fleet defied any foreign foe to injure her charges; and what has been the result? By her generous treatment of a vanquished foe in 1900, Great Britain received the love and co-operation of the Boer. What the latter has done in this war is invaluable: through him German Southwest Africa, Togoland and Kamerun have been conquered, and any day he is expected to bring about the downfall of German East Africa.

What has the Australians done? Very few hours after the war began her crack navy made the subjugation of Germany's eastern colonies possible, and co-operated with the Japanese in the capture of Kiao-Chau. When can fade the glory of the Australian and New Zealand troops at the Dardanelles? And now what has Canada done? Who checked Germany's drive on Calais? Who was one of the stars in the Somme offensive? Who won Vimy Ridge?—Johnny Canuck. Recognized to be the finest fighting man on God's earth. If you don't believe this, examine the German graveyard in France and Flanders. India showed her loyalty by a gift of over half a million men who are now operating in Mesopotamia and France. She is doing splendid work in subduing the hated Turk, and the sultan's edict about "a holy war" is laughed at by the natives. Ireland seems to be the mischievous pup of the old bulldog. In spite of this fact, Irish glory in the war can never die; the sympathies of four-fifths of the Irish people are for democracy, empire unity and British freedom. Thus you see what parts are played in the war by the colonies. All are determined to put an end to autocracy, Prussian militarism and Hunnish despotism. All will remain by the mother country till the latter's aims are accomplished. Till the fair fields of northern France bloom again; till Belgium once more becomes a united country and safe from further invasion; till Roumania, Servia and Montenegro are once more restored to their rightful owners, and till Germany and her allies have paid in full for the ruin, horror and misery they have caused in the war, the British people will fight, fight, fight. Unity is strength and the unity of the British people is firmly cemented. The war has already accomplished this thing and by God's grace our great empire will keep together, with a union no power on earth can defeat?

ARISE YOU ENTHUSIASTS!

The returned soldiers who have been laying around idle not because of laziness, but because of injuries incurred at the front, would certainly appreciate an auto trip to some outing place. They have been good enough to spill some of their blood for us and now we should show some appreciation. If any of you citizens have cars give the returned soldiers a good time by taking them out for a trip. How about forming some sort of a league? Other cities and towns in the Dominion have done this little bit for our heroes, then why can't we? Just give this a little thought and see if you and some one else won't feel better.

MORE ABOUT THAT PUBLICITY COMMITTEE

Last week in this column we spoke of the needs of a publicity committee to properly exploit the city. If there ever was need of a committee there is for one to acquaint the people with the facts regarding the city. What does the average citizen know of Calgary? Nothing. He knows Calgary is here and progressing. Things look fine around home but the real facts pertaining to the growth and progress of the city is a blank. The notable places of historic association, the parks and pleasure places, the public buildings, all should be listed and illustrated in a booklet and circulated freely so that the citizens may be cognizant of what a really big city we have.

* * * *

HOW ABOUT THOSE IMPROVEMENTS?

You city fathers, when are you going to give more attention to the needs of the populace? When are you going to see to the people's comfort and pleasure? It's a small thing to see that St. George's Island and Bowness are favored with the few necessary adjuncts to make the places really popular. Just being habitable may be satisfying to you but is most discouraging to those who are looking for comfort with their pleasure. Run the street cars down [illegible] George's Island. Make that long promised lake for boating. Put up a comfort station. Likewise make the necessary improvements to Bowness that have been a long time promised but never seem to come. The alderman who takes the initiative in this is going to earn the plaudits of the entire population of Calgary, men, women and children alike.

TROUBLED WITH CALGARY COMPLAINT

Last week The Standard made mention of the Center street bridge and the problem that now confronted the people that lived on the North Hill and were compelled to use this bridge. Since this comment appeared The Standard is not aware of any blowing of trumpets or shouting of the populace at the city hall to remove the cause. Nor does it expect any particular notice to be taken of the matter by the city fathers unless the people of the North Hill get after them with clubs and belaying pins. Those city fathers who live in other parts of the city are not interested and those that do live in the district are feeling too much the effect of the heat to awake from their lethargy. Most of them will need a bomb to wake them up. Some day a scandal or a murder or a disappearance of some young child will arouse the people to the fact that they should have eradicated the evil at the beginning. Until this happens we can hardly expect the authorities to arouse themselves sufficiently to protect the people of the hill. And in this connection the householders of the North Hill are as much to blame as the city fathers. They should organize, appoint an aggressive committee and insist that proper steps be taken to move the present occupants from the lower end of Center street.

WORRYING IS A SERIOUS MENACE

The birds build nests for the protection of their young against the weather; the fox builds holes for security from their foes; the squirrels lay by stores of nuts for the coming winter, and dogs lay by bones against a day when there will be no bones. These are the manifestations of a protective instinct arising from an experience of many generations. So far as we know, however, no bird ever attempted to build more nests than his neighbor; no fox ever fretted because he had only one hole to hide in; no squirrel ever died of anxiety because of a failure to lay by for two winter's supply instead of one, neither has any dog gone into a state of decline because he failed to lay aside sufficient number of bones for his declining days. This protective instinct of the animals and birds is prevalent in the human family, but coupled with it is a great menace called worry. This bugabear has filled more graves than all the wars combined. It is a deeply bedded scurge that sinks into our souls, and if unchecked in its career it slowly but surely conquers its victim. Worry is the greatest menace of the human race. Not all worries are groundless nor can they be avoided, but most of the worries are preventable. If we meet our troubles day by day as they come without fretting over them we will be surprised how quickly they will vanish. The best antidote for worry is a change of environment, of mental occupation. A getting away from the scenes that provoke worry. Fresh air and exercise with a change of occupation will kill most any case of worry. So take the scientists advice and take a change when you find yourself worrying.

Mme. Petrova to Appear at The Allen Shortly

Mme. Petrova, the celebrated Russian actress, who will be seen at the Allen shortly in "The Undying Flame," is one of the most talented actresses on the screen and has an enviable international reputation on both screen and stage. The fact that she is appearing in pictures produced by the Jesse L. Lasky Company for Paramount, recalls the fact that it was Mr. Lasky who first introduced this great actress to America. A few years ago, while Mr. Lasky was making his customary trip to Europe in search of new talent for his "Folies Bergeres," he heard of a remarkable young girl at the Tivoli, in London, who had created a sensation by her singing. He attended the performance, was greatly impressed and proceeded to negotiate for a contract with her to make her American debut under his management. Mme. Petrova proved to be a phenomenal success in the "Folies" and later went into vaudeville, and also appeared in the serious dramas.

Novel Features At The Pantages Next Week

A big program composed of many novel features will be presented at the Pantages theater for the coming week, commencing with the matinee next Monday afternoon.

"Oh, Doctor!" is the title of a concoction of mirth and melody as presented by the eminent New York producer, George Choos, who has sent many musical numbers over the Pantages circuit, and whose name in connection with an attraction is a guarantee of something worth while. "Oh, Doctor!" is a riot of bright and tuneful numbers, pretty girls and a wealth of gorgeous costumes and scenery.

The eminent English actor, Owen McGiveney will, present one of the most artistic presentations ever given in a vaudeville theater, namely, his protean playlet of the classic climax of Dickens' story of "Oliver Twist." Mr. McGiveney, who is noted as one of the foremost Dickens authorities will offer a fifteen minute sketch that enacts the tragic climax of this story, playing each one of the half dozen different characters introduced, himself, with the aid of cleverly executed quick changes of make up. He appears in turn, as Bill Sikes, Fagin Monks, Artful Dodger, and Nancy. Special and elaborate scenery is carried with this number.

Johnny Small and the Small Sisters are an attractive and talented trio, offering one of the peatest and niftiest comedy singing, dancing and talking acts to be seen in present day vaudeville.

Bert Wheeler will present one continuous budget of surprises in his succession of comical transportation vehicles, which he handles in a most comical manner.

Al Wohlman will offer some songs that are not easily forgotten, and the Current Events will conclude a most promising program of Pantages vaudeville that is sure to please immensely.

George Beban Thursday only At The Allen

"A ROADSIDE IMPRESSARIO"

In his recent production of "The Marcellini Millions," Mr. Beban is seen as an Italian truck gardener, and in "A Roadside Impressario" as a roaming Italian with a trick bear performing for the benefit of the children in wayside towns, Mr. Beban doing himself the tricks the bear is supposed to do.

Now while trying to earn money enough as a dish-washer in a restaurant, to get bruno, the bear, out of jail, where he has been incarcerated for wrecking an apiary, he discovers a blackmailing plot against the local candidate for mayor, and also finds his daughter for whom he has been searching for sixteen years—all this is brought about in a most unusual and appealing manner.

Mr. Beban, in his story, does not attempt to preach any sermons, or point out any morals, but with the unerring finger of the artist he is, he puts in all his productions a wonderful human touch and feeling that so many other artists strive for in vain.

During the filming of "A Roadside Impressario" Mr. Beban and Bruno had a wonderful time together. The actor spent several weeks in training his companion, until the bear gives a wonderfully human performance, even if Bruno, in a careless moment, nearly removed the star's ear.

While taking the scenes at the Pallas studio, in which the bear upsets the beehives, Mr. Beban, Bruno and the bees had the entire plant to themselves. Cameras were carefully protected and the scenes were filmed quickly, but for several days thereafter, wandering and indignant bees were lying in wait for any of those who would venture near Mr. Beban's set.

The production was made for the Pallas Company under the direction of Donald Crisp.

Scene from the second act in the beautiful Joseph Urban production of the big New York Casino musical comedy success, "Flora Bella," coming to the Grand Theater, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, July 26, 27 and 28.

Douglas Fairbanks, the popular exponent of the smile, appears in his second production under the Artcraft banner, entitled "Wild and Woolly". The scenario, brimful of typical Fairbanks humor, by Anita Loos, authoress of many of his past successes, has been produced under the direction of John Emerson, and discloses Douglas in what is felt to be his greatest portrayal.

For this production the strenuous actor-producer has been practising stunts since last summer and even while appearing before the camera in other pictures his lariat way always nearby, so that he could try new tricks whenever he had a few minutes to spare. One evening a friend found him in his New York apartment attired in dress clothes preparatory to attending a social affair, lassoing the door-knob while waiting. Whenever he found an opportunity for out-door work the ambitious actor hired a pony to practice western tricks. As a result of all this training, for it was just that, the athletic screen favorite presents in "Wild and Woolly" a remarkable display of cowboy accomplishments depicted in his own inimitable style.

Starting in New York and ending in California, the picture discloses a variety of metropolitan and western scenes presenting the proper backgrounds to the story. As the youth of metropolitan birth who finally realizes his ambition to ride the plains of the West astride a bucking broncho, Douglas Fairbanks offers a wonderfully effective picturization in the role of Jeff Hillington. Jeff's visions of life in the West are based entirely upon the gaudy covers of ten-cent weeklies which he has been reading since early boyhood. He pictures the West today exactly as photographs show it to have been in the early eighties. Friends in Arizona plan to live up to his expectations and to their own surprise, things turn out more seriously than they anticipated. The story ends, after many amusing as well as thrilling situations, with Jeff as the man of the hour.

"I am really living this picture," he was heard to remark recently between scenes, "I'd rather play western pictures than eat, and when I return from the amusement world I hope to gather a gang of cow-boys around me and live on the great plains. That's the life. No cabarets, limousines or elevator apartments for me. The fact that Douglas meant what he said will be readily evidenced in this film, which indicate that "Wild and Woolly" out-Fairbanks anything this athletic screen star has ever displayed.

An able cast appears in support of the star, including Eileen Percy, Douglas Fairbanks' new dainty little leading lady, Walter Bytell, Joseph Singleton, Calvin Carter, Forest Seabury, J. W. Jones, Charles Steves, Sam de Grasse, Tom Tilson, and a host of real rip-roarin' cow-punchers.

Show starts 11.30 a.m., 1.30, 3.30, 5.30, 7.30, 9.30 p.m. Prices: Afternoons, children 5c, adults 15c. Evenings, children 10c, adults 25c, and reserved seat section 35c.

At the Allen, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday

"Wild and Woolly" is undoubtedly the masterpiece of the season.

Another outstanding feature with this attraction will be the musical program, arranged by H. G. Copley, director of the Allen Concert Orchestra, which will be heard at each performance.

Though the way a self-made man makes love may be absurd, the way he makes money isn't.

Fannie Ward to Display Latest Wedding Dress

The ever-popular star of the stage and screen, Fannie Ward, will be seen at the Allen next Friday and Saturday in the Lasky-Paramount production of "Her Better Self", especially prepared for the screen by Charles Maigne from George Middleton's popular story.

Fannie Ward has proved herself to be the most versatile of the screen's feminine artists, striking into the hearts of the public as she did by her wonderful performance in "The Cheat", where she has always remained. In her recent production, "The School for Husbands," she showed her wonderful cleverness as a comedienne, and still more recently she had an opportunity to run the full scale of her emotions in "Unconquered" in "Her Strange Wedding," Miss Ward is given a drama of unusual interest and appeal.

The story is that of a wealthy young society girl who is in love with a doctor, whose brother appears after having committed a theft in the East and steals from the doctor the affections of the girl. How they are married and the bridegroom is caught in another theft, is brought about in a startling manner, the brother attempting to murder the doctor, is himself stricken and the doctor and the girl are united. The suspense is maintained throughout and the production is one of unusual lavishness. Miss Ward is given another opportunity to display many of her wonderful gowns, among them being the latest mode in a wedding dress.

The incidents connected with the house party scenes leading up to the wedding were participated in by a number of well known society people spending the spring months in the West.

"Flora Bella" Coming to Grand Next Thursday

John Cort's beautiful urban production of "Flora Bella", the musical comedy triumph bearing this season's stamp of approval from the Casino Theatre, New York, will come to the Grand Theatre Thursday, July 26th, for a three days' engagement.

"Flora Bella" is one of those musical offerings that delight the ear with tuneful meloodies. The piece stands out from a dozen other musical comedies that come and go because it is satisfying from whatever angle you may choose to look at it. The play moves with a dash and go that holds right up to the final curtain. "Flora eBlla" tells a story of a young and neglected wife who makes her husband fall in love with her by returning to her former gay life and posing as her own twin sister. It is a part in which a Monna donna reveals, now as an artful coquette of the dance hall, now as the demure stay-at-home wife of the ennuied prince, and it is difficult to say in which capacity Miss Eleanor Henry is most charming. The book is by Felix Doermann, revised and adapted by Cosmo Hamilton and Dorothy Donnelly. The lyrics are by Percy Waxman, and the score by Charles Cuvillier and Milton Schwarzwald. There are twenty musical numbers, which include "Good-day, Good-night," "It Is Very Hard to Bring Up Father", "Cat and Mouse", "Young Men Take a Tip From Me," "Love is a Dance," "Flora Bella," "You're the Girl." "Give Me All of You," "Adam," and "Creep, Creep, the World's Asleep." Mr. Cort has selected an excellent cast quite in keeping with the "Cort Standard." The company seen here will be practically the original cast which includes Eleanor Henry, Lily Leonard, Guy J. Sampsell, Irving Brooks, Edwin O. Meyers, Josephine Kirkwood, Mortimer H. Weldon, Kate Stout, Adolph Link, Gilbert Clayton, the famous dancing team of Monjot and Gould, and the most fascinating chorus ever lured from "The Great White Way."

tI was a great surprise to the members of the company when they discovered that their favorite star, Vivian Martin, was a talented and graceful dancer. For some months she had wafted about the studio and occasionally indulged in a few dancing steps, but never did anyone suspect that she had the technique of the terpsichorean art at her fingers' tips, and when the scenes of the cabaret in which Miss Martin was to play the role of the naked dancer were to be filmed they all gathered around expecting to be highly amused. The look of amusement was changed to one of amazement when this versatile little actress stepped forth and went through the graceful gyrations that would be envied by a premiere danseuse.

How an innocent girlish "fib" brought about a number of serious complications, which, but for an unforeseen incident, might have resulted disastrously, is the theme of this clever story, and furnished abundant food for thought as well as an artistic and appealing photodrama.

A new War Topical closes the excellent program, and the Allen Concert Orchestra furnishes a delightful musical program.

WEDDINGS

McINTOSH—KERR

A quiet wedding took place Wednesday at the Pro-Cathedral, when Dean Paget united in marriage Miss Mildred Eloise, daughter of Mrs. J. H. Kerr, and Mr. George Logan McIntosh, formerly of Hamilton, Ontario. Only a few relaties and friends were present at the ceremony. The bride was given away by Mr. J. M. Baker and was attended by Dr. Rosamond Leacock, while Mr. Ault, of Vancouver, was groomsman. She was very smart in her traveling suit of shadow lawn jersey cloth, over which she wore a blouse of shell pink crepe de chine and a small white hat trimmed with pink and green, and the groom's gift, a pair of pearl earrings. Dr. Leacock wore a rainbow silk frock with hat to match, and carried a silver card case, also the groom's gift. Mrs. Kerr, the bride's mother, was wearing a very pretty gown of pearl grey crepe de chine and lace, and a hat of black. After the ceremony luncheon was served at the apartments of the bride's mother, and later Mr. and Mrs. McIntosh left for Montreal and New York, where they will spend their honeymoon, residing afterwards in Calgary.

BURNETT—CHRISTIE

The marriage took place Wednesday at the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Redeemer, of Miss Kathleen Christie, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. M. Christie, to Mr. Frank Burnett, of High River. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Dean Paget, and was witnessed by a number of relatives and friends of the young couple. Following the ceremony, supper was served at the Palliser, and Mr. and Mrs. Burnett left for the east on the 10 o'clock train.

EVENTS, PAST, PRESENT

The picnic held by the First Baptist church at Bowness on Wednesday afternoon, was a decided success, over 200 were present. The following were made happy by winning prizes: Doris Ethridge, Ivy Ethridge, Clarence Harkney, Ruth Redman, Grodolyn Rose, Charles Hopkins, Samuel Giffin, Phyllis Blandford, S. Giffin and John Gilmour, Hilton Sisters, a Soldier, Kenneth Pole, Ruth Redman, Hazel Van Buren, Miss Luck, H. Brown and Chester Waller, Hazel Van Buren.

The Hillhurst Presbyterian Sunday school also held their picnic at Bowness. A crowd of 200 turned out for this affair and a number of various games and races were enjoyed.

The Barbers' picnic was also held at Bowness, and the baseball match between the Journeymen and Master Barbers was won by the latter by the score of 19 to 7. The fat man's race was won by A. Gaulet, of the Palliser, and Mr. Muchy, of the Gem Barber shop came second.

War Brings Fleet of Mercy

Wounded Tommy Is Absorbed by Marvelous Hospital Organization

There is a great dock basin on the south coast that harbors a fleet of ships almost unknown before the war. They are white painted, and round their sides is a broad green stripe broken at intervals with the Red Cross of mercy. When war blazed out on the continent we had but few of these ships, and steps were taken to supply what would obviously become a great need. So this fleet of mercy was formed, and now it carries its sad freight over the seven seas away from the roar of the guns and the stutter of the mitrailleuse to the quiet of the long white hospital wards in England. They are part of a marvelous organization.

Private Atkins climbs from the firing step and hops over the parapet and under the wire in front. He hears a sound for all the world like an underground train coming through the tunnel before it reaches a station, and then there is a crash that defies description. Someone must have filled the tunnel up and the train has changed it. That is what Private Atkins thinks. In reality he has in a twinkling of an eye changed his state. He has become absorbed by the marvelous organization.

Presently he is gathered in and ticketed and taken to a place where they add cryptic initials to the red ticket tied to the second button of his tunic. It now reads, 'G. S. Head, S. thigh and l. arm." In the words of the surgeon, Atkins has been collecting things. From now on Atkins loses all power of volition. He is handled by many people like a very delicate and fragile piece of merchandise. He is loaded on to motor ambulances and taken off again, and put on to trains that hurry him to the sea as if he were perishable goods—which, after all, he is. Then he is carried on board a hospital ship, and for 12 hours at least he has compartive peace.

From France to England is a matter of about 12 hours at the most. To some it is 12 hours of hell, but others are able to appreciate their position better and many anxious eyes are strained to catch the cliffs of Dover on the rolling Sussex downs. When the ship reaches the quay there is an invasion of stretcher bearers, and in an hour every wounded man is off the ship. They are carried down the long canvas roofed gangways to the wharf and taken through a vast shed to a series of bays. These bays are built like a scene on a theater stage with no roof of their own and only three sides. There is even a fireplace to complete the stage effect. On the "prompt" side is a table piled with forms, and there a doctor sits all day filling in forms and recording all that has to be recorded when a man comes in wounded. The bays are each filled with one class, and in one there are a number of cases where the wound is in the head and a trephining operation has been carried out. In the next compartment are a number of Anzacs, in the next 30 or 40 "sitters." Sometimes at the end of the bays there are a number of men in gray uniforms, silent and dazed most of them, but receiving the same attention as the others. These are German prisoners who have been wounded and captured. They are sent to special hospitals, and for the most part are quiet and grateful for all that is done for them.

THE WINNING WAY

If you put a little lovin' into all the work you do,
And a little bit of sweetness, and a little bit of song,
Not a day will seem too long;
And your work will be attractive and the world will stop to look,
And the world will see a sweetness, like the tinklin' of a brook,
In the finished job; and then the world will turn to look at you.
With a world's appreciation of the thing you've found to do.
Just a little bit of lovin', and a little bit of song,
And some pride to sort of make it straight and true and clean and strong;
And the work that you're a-doin', pretty near before you know,
Will have set the world a-talkin', and the little winds that blow
Will bring echoes of it to you, and you'll see that you have done
More than you had dreamed or hoped for when the task was first begun;
And you'll find the bit of lovin' you have put into the same
Has come back to you in lovin', and come back to you in fame.
Them that strives for fame shall miss it; and that's what they ought to do;
But if you put some gladness, and if you put some of you
In the task that is before you, and you put a bit of pride.
Into it, and you go at it glad of heart and eager-eyed
You will find the world is turnin' pretty soon to look your way,
And you'll find that there's a sweetness in the tasks of every day;
And the world will see your work and pretty soon will speak your name;
And you'll find you have found lovin' and you'll find you have found fame.

WOMEN TO RUN WIRELESS

A number of women who have taken the wireless course have passed the government examinations with ratings of 100 per cent. and are eligible to take their places at the big switch boards. It is believed that the women will find considerable work to do.

THE ART OF DRESSING WELL

Rules and theories for good dressing are common; and as all women like to look well they proceed to study elaborate theories of color scheme and lines and to follow various systems guaranteed to make them look like a "dream" in a five ninety-eight suit.

The art of dressing well seems to be a talent with some women, just as singing or acting is with others. And some seem to have only the art of getting exactly the wrong thing whether it be a $50 Fifth avenue hat or a 50 cent blouse.

There are two little rules which, when understood and learned, ought to form a basis for any woman who wants to look attractive. The first is bring out your good points and the second is conceal your bad ones. In other words, the art of dressing depends upon your remembering that you are an individual and determining exactly what kind of an individual you are.

Cold-bloodedly considered, no woman with broad, short feet can improve their appearance by encasing them in a short vamp shoe that accents their already too wide and too short appearance. But that is exactly what the woman with the fat, pudgy little foot does. Watch her in the subway—there are dozens of her all unconsciously bringing out their very worst points.

If you happen to have a graceful, slender foot, it is distinctly worth your while to keep it well shod and accent your good points. If you have an awkward foot, make it as inconspicuous as possible.

So too for hats. A tiny little turban pulled down over small and expressionless eyes and topping a long ill-shaped nose only accents the lack of beauty of the features below it, while a large graceful hat may throw kindly shadows over a tired or hollow face.

Don't buy a hat because it is smart or the fancy of the moment or because some one you know looks well in that model. Try on hats with an honest eye to yourself as an individual.

Purchase the sort of headgear that will accent all that is best in your appearance whether it be charm of coloring or well cut features, and avoid as you would the smallpox any shape or line or trimming that caricatures your poorest features.

Lay stress on your good points, emphasize them, make the most of them. And in order to do that, you must of course find out what your good points are. A graceful arm is worth making something of, so is a pretty throat or slender height or petite daintiness. If you find something attractive bring it out. But if you find something awkward, twist the mode and the fashion to conceal it rather than contorting yourself into conformity with the fashion.

Suppose you have wide awkward hips. Will you be so foolish as to adopt the pannier skirt and give yourself the appearance of awkwardness the extra fullness is bound to produce? Or if you are 5 feet 10, will you wear your skirts so many inches above your boot tops that you will of necessity appear absurd—like a lamp post in a ruffle!

Not in appearing conspicuously different or over-emphasized lies the charm of dress. Not in following the mode so slavishly that you look like a replica of everybody else you meet, lies any of beauty; but in so adapting current fashions that they seem to belong to you rather than you to them.

A girl in a neatly tailtored suit, even if it be of the mode of year before last, is sure to look well if her hat is smart and becoming, her boots neat and well chosen and her gloves fresh and immaculate. If I had a limited amount of money to spend on clothes, I think I should be tempted to spend most of it in pleasant details.

It is always worth while to wear graceful collars that emphasize the pretty contour of a throat; or well cut skirts that suit the swing of a finely poised figure. In choosing the details that shall bring out your good points and in managing the larger matters that shall throw your awkwardness into the background you will find you have made a definite step toward looking attractive.

Girls in States Farming in Ernest

Were Laughed At, at First, Now Boys Come Around to Be Instructed.

Mount Kesko, N. Y.—A cornfield—a plow, overalls, common sense working shoes, a big straw hat—there you have it—a farmerette!

To all appearances she is a man. Her hair is tucked under the broad brim and held in place by a red, white and blue ribbon. In her sensible, washable blue overalls and blue shirt she looks like any farmers' nice little son who is doing his daily work in the cornfield. She can plow the ground, till the soil, and sow the seed. She knows a strawberry field from a blackberry patch; she can tell you how many potatoes to plant to any sized row, how long it takes tomatoes to grow, what fertilizers the earth needs, and what tools were made for.

All these things the farmerette is learning daily at the women's agricultural camp near here. If she is exceptionally ambitious she may spend the whole summer at the farm. She must stay at least two weeks. Most of these budding lady farmers, of whom there are already fifty, intend to spend the summer on the farm.

To Take Men's Places

The camp opened June 4. Based on democratic principles, it was to be a farm training school for young women who would thus become qualified to take the places on farms of men who had gone to war. So far the plan has exceeded the highest speculations. Fifty girls from Barnard, Vassar, Teachers' college, and graduates from the Manhattan trade school daily toil in the fields. Nor are they merely toying in light feminine fashion with their farm tools. In one day they had plowed and planted 22 rows of potatoes.

No one is more surprised at the success of the farmerettes than the farmers of this region. They laughed when they heard of the project. Today the natives are wide-eyed with astonishment.

Wanted 21 Hands

Several days ago there was genuine triumph at the camp. One of the neighboring farmers sent a call to the farm asking for 21 hands. Fifty girls begged to go. Dr. Ida M. Ogilvie, professor of geology at Columbia university and dean of the camp, said the hardest thing she had to do was to select those 21 girls from the 50 eager volunteers.

One would hardly suspect that the Manhattan trade school girls are graduate dressmakers or that the college girls are the proud possessors of one or more degrees. Sturdy and sunbuprned, they all look like country maids who have been used to cows and June bugs all their lives. The camp agriculturist explained that this was an acquired look, born of fresh air and substantial food.

Even if some things refuse to go your way there are other things.

Hot Weather Rules for Handling Horses

The Boston Work-Horse Relief Association is an organization that looks after the comfort and care of the work horse in that city. In a recent circular it gives timely hints as to the care of the horse in hot weather, which are of value to horse owners and drivers everywhere. They are as follows:

1. Load lightly, and drive slowly.
2. Stop in the shade—if possible.
3. Water your horse as often as possible. So long as a horse is working, water in small quantities will not hurt him. But let him drink only a few swallows if he is going to stand still. Do not fail to water him at night after he has eaten his hay.

When he comes in after work, sponge off the harness marks, and sweat, his eyes, his nose and mouth, and the dock. Wash his feet, but not his legs.

5: If the thermometer is 75 degrees or higher, wipe him all over with a damp sponge, using vinegar water if possible. Do not wash the horse at night.

6. Saturday night, give a bran mash, lukewarm; and add a tablespoonful of saltpetre.

7. Do not use a horse-hat, unless it is a canopy-top hat. The ordinary bell-shaped hat does more harm than good.

8. A sponge on top of the head, or even a cloth, is good if kept wet. If dry it is worse than nothing.

9. If the horse is overcome by heat, get him into the shade, remove harness and bridle, wash out his mouth, sponge him all over, shower his legs, and give him two ounces of aromatic spirits of ammonia, or two ounces of sweet spirits of nitre, in a pint of water; or give him a pint of coffee warm. Cool his head at once, using cold water, or, if necessary, chopped ice, wrapped in a cloth.

10. If the horse is off his feed, try him with two quarts of oats mixed with bran, and a little water; and add a little salt of sugar. Or give him oatmeal gruel or barley water to drink.

11. Watch your horse. If he stops sweating suddenly, or if he breathes short and quick, or if his ears droop, or if he stands with his legs braced sideways, he is in danger of a heat or sun stroke and needs attention at once.

12. If it is so hot that the horse sweats in the stable at night, tie him outside, with bedding under him. Unless he cools off during the night, he cannot well stand the next day's heat.

Ploughing Contest a Splendid Success

Over 300 Spectators Witness the Novel Spectacle

The second annual plowing match was held at the Osborne Brown farm, Wednesday, July 18. It was the most successful contest of the kind ever held in Alberta.

The competition was keen as there were twice as many contestants as last year; the attendance too, exceeded that of the first plowing match. Over 300 people came in automobiles, Fords, wagons, etc., to witness the interesting spectacle. The spectators came from the farms as well as the towns and city.

The Winners

Alexander Murray, who took first prize in the class for walking plows, made a good job of the three-quarters of an acre which he turned over. Alex Ingram was a good second, his finish being superior to Murray's. A piece of fine workmanship was exhibited by James Hodson, who walked away with third. Dick Bamford took fourth place, while Billy Miller made a clean walkaway with a fifth.

V. G. Miller, H. P. Rilp and J. J. Osborne (in the order named) won prizes in the sulky plow contest. The prize for the best turnout fell to Alex Ingram, who pulled the stunt with well matched black Clyde mares, who took honors at the Calgary exhibition two weeks ago.

Extensive Prize List

Class 1. Walking plows, ¾ acre, plowing to be four inches deep, time allowed, 4½ hours.

1, gold medal, presented by O. E. Brown and $15 by the Hudson's Bay company, won by Alex Murray. 2, silverware, presented by J. W. Durno, auctioneer, won by Alick Ingram. 3, two horse collars, presented by the Calgary Saddlery, won by Jas. Hodson. 4, cultivator, presented by the Massey-Harris company, won by Dick Bamford. 5, writing pad, presented by Rosewell & Carson, won by Billy Miller.

Class 2. Sulky plows, 1¼ acres, plowing to be four inches deep, time allowed 4½ hours.

1, cultivator, presented by O. E. Brown, won by U. G. Miller. 2, pair of bridles, presented by Riley & McCormick, won by H. J. Riep, of the Crown Feed company. 2, set of doubletrees, presented by Blake & Murray, won by J. J. Osborne.

Class 3. Walking plows, ½ acre, plowing to be four inches deep, time allowed four hours, open only to boys under 18 years:

1, gold watch, presented by the T. Eaton company, won by Allan Gibson. 2, bridle, presented by Great West Saddlery company, won by Bud Robbins.

Class 4. Best turnout:

1, cut glass bowl, presented by E. J. Dewey, president of the Calgary exhibition, won by Alick Ingram. 2, ton of coal, presented by York Shaw, won by T. Spenceley.

1, grind mill, presented by William Galloway & company, of Winnipeg, won by Tom Spenceley. 2, silk shirt, presented by George McLeod, clothier, Eighth avenue east, Calgary, won by Harry Bamford.

For other prizes ribbons were given and the directors of the Calgary exhibition add diplomas to the first prize in each class.

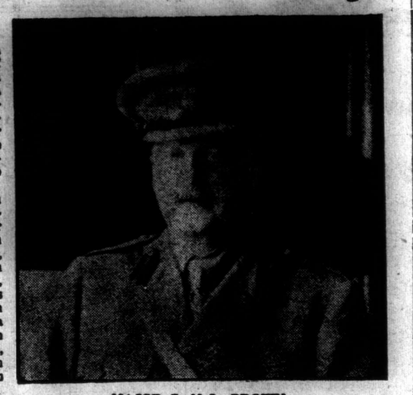
NEW OIL-BURNING ENGINE

Lord Shaughnessy Inspects Latest Construction From C.P.R. Shops

A NEW Decapod locomotive, just turned out by the Angus Shops for the Canadian Pacific Railway, has been inspected at Montreal by Lord Shaughnessy and a number of interested railway officials.

What strikes one most about this wonderful engine is the comfort and safety under which the engineer drives his train, and the ease with which so many tons of machinery can be operated from the luxurious shelter of a protected and cushioned cab. The locomotive engineer is not a machine but a human being, his cab is to some extent his home, and up-to-date railway managements are recognizing this by providing him with pleasant quarters. There is no doubt sound policy in this, for the less disturbed he is by weather, or other physical conditions, the more care he can devote to the locomotive and the train itself. Under the severe climatic conditions which sometimes prevail in the mountain divisions, this naturally conduces to safety, and so far as the locomotive engineer is concerned Safety First and Comfort First go hand in hand.

The interior of the cab, which is roomy and well ventilated, has spring cushioned seats which can be moved on a slide, while the sliding arm-rest on the window is also comfortably cushioned. A coat cupboard with swinging pegs takes care of the surplus clothing. The windows are double sashed with storm windows for winter and are constructed with small panes—a great advantage, as they are more easily and quickly replaced and occasion less discomfort if broken. A wind deflector enables the engineer to see the track without hurting his eyes, while a wind deflector on the roof of the cab stops the back draught and keeps the cab free from dust. The cab itself has double ventilators and is pleasantly warmed in winter through having the insulation on the boiler head made in panels which can be easily lifted out. The roof is painted a cool green, and cool green shades cover the lights, while the eyes are further protected by a deflector on the fire door which eliminates the glare. The water gauge is protected with a screen in case of the glass breaking, and, indeed, every possible device that human ingenuity has so far invented has been provided for the safety and comfort of "the man behind the gun."



A great improvement is the power reverse gear worked by air, as easy to work as the handle of a sewing machine, which eliminates the old heavy hand lever and reduces the physical strain upon the engineer.

So far as the exterior of the locomotive is concerned, this has been designed so that repairs can be made without the men having frequently to go inside or under the engine. One of the old worries of the engine crew is removed by a new type of air strainer, drawing cool air into the pump which requires little or no attention. A noticeable feature of the exterior is the Laird crosshead, an old type revived because it ensures such excellent lubrication and is easy to maintain. A safety strap is applied to the guide bar to prevent it from dropping. The guide is self-centering and maintains alignment better than the ordinary guide, while the leading driving wheel is flexible with one inch extra sideplay and is provided with wedge play to ensure proper guiding. The engine truck is provided with side resistance procured by a sliding inclined plane, and here again the safety of the engineer is considered in the safety clamp which prevents the tank from sliding forward on to the cab in case of collision.

Twenty-five such Decapods are under order for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and will be in service on the mountain division. Maximum power for minimum weight is the keynote of their construction. The locomotive itself weighs 125 tons, the tender 82.5 tons, loaded, while the tank capacity is 3,200 gallons of oil and 7,000 gallons of water.

Notwithstanding high prices of materials, the Canadian Pacific has continually added to its cars and engines, having built 1,500 cars last year and another 2,000 under construction at the present time.

MAJOR G. McL. BROWN.

MAJOR George McLaren Brown, Reserve of Officers, Canadian Militia, has been appointed Assistant Director (unpaid) at the War Office, with the rank of Lieut.-Colonel while so employed.

Major McLaren Brown is the European Manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and was born in Hamilton, Ont., in 1865, his father, Adam Brown, being a Scotsman from Dumfrieshire, and his mother an Englishwoman from Shrewsbury.

In 1887 he was appointed Agent for the Canadian Pacific Railway at Vancouver, promoted five years later to be Asst. General Passenger Agent, Western Division and subsequently became in turn Executive Agent, Superintendent of Hotels and Dining and Sleeping Car Dept. and General Passenger Agent, C. P. R. Atlantic Steamship Lines. In 1906 Major Brown was appointed General European Traffic Agent, and in 1910 General European Manager, with head offices at 62/5, Charing Cross, London, S.W.

In all these positions Major McLaren Brown has shown himself possessed of rare organizing and executive skill.

Hay crop about average, autumn cereals developing well, spring cereals, potatoes, roots and beans doing well. Orchard fruits, except cherries, abundant. Small fruits average, with strawberries excellent.

Don't Let Milk Spoil on the Farm Or in the Home

Keep Milk Continually Clean, Cold and Covered

This injunction applies equally to the producer, the wholesaler, the dealer, and the consumer.

Milk, to keep properly, should never get warmer than 50 per cehrdltrhmsh

Milk, to keep properly, should never get warmer than 50 degrees F. until it is consumed. The lower the temperature the better the milk will keep.

Bacteria—such as those which cause milk to sour—develop very slowly and cause little change in milk kept at such low temperatures.

A slight rise in temperature, even for a short time, permits these bacteria rapidly and bring about rapid deterioration of the milk, which may render it unfit for ordinary use.

Don't leave your milk bottles on a hot porch or doorstep. A short exposure in the sun or a warm place hastens the spoiling even of cold, bottled milk.

Have the milkman put your milk into the refrigerator. If this is impossible provide, in warm weather, a box with ice, or a bucket of water in a shady place, for the milk.

At any rate, have the bottles left in the coolest and shadiest place about your premises.

Don't leave milk in bottles or vessels in a warm room for a moment longer than is necessary.

Never pour milk, which has been exposed to the air, back into a bottle containing other milk. Keep such milk cold and covered in another clean utensil.

Keep Milk Clean

Milk(when warm, is an ideal cultural medium for bacteria. Keep milk clean. You can keep it clean only by keeping it covered so that the bacteria and molds from the air will not get into it.

Keep your milk bottles covered either with caps or by placing glasses over them. Keep them covered in the refrigerator and in the kitchen or dining room.

Never pour milk into an unsterile bowl or pitcher. Scald all vessels into which milk is poured for keeping or serving. Cool these utensils after scalding, before you put milk into them.

Before you open a bottle of milk, wash and wipe the outside of the cap with water and a clean cloth. The little depression at the top of the bottle collects dust or water, or milk, which may attract flies. Lift out the cap with a pointed instrument, so that the outside of the cap, which may be contaminated, will not be pushed down into the milk.

Clean and scald the refrigerator where milk is stored, regularly with hot sal-soda solution. See that the drip pipe is kept open and clean.

Even in the cleanest refrigerator, never keep milk in an open vessel. Milk absorbs odors easily.

Clean Empty Bottles

Finally, clean empty bottles. Rinse thoroughly with cold water every milk bottle, as soon as emptied, and then wash with hot water. This helps your milkman to give you clean milk.

Never take milk bottles into a sick room. If you have an infectious or contagious disease in your home, boil the milk bottles, and do not return them without the express sanction of your local health officer or attending physician.

Don't Throw Out Skim or Sour Milk

Clean skim milk is a valuable food, containing all the nourishing elements of whole milks except the fat or cream It is useful in cooking cereals, soups, sauces, cocoa, etc., and is a palatable, nourishing beverage.

Sour milk and butermilk can be used with soda in making hot breads, or sour milk can be easily turned into cottage cheese or clabber. Sour cdeam is a good shortening for cakes and cookies, and is useful for salad dressings and gravies for meat.

Field Crops of The Province Summarized

Ottawa.—A special press bulletin issued today by the census and statistics office gives the following report on the condition of field crops at the end of June, as summarized from telegrams from selected correspondents, including the superintendends of the Dominion experimental farms by arrangement with the department of agriculture. The reports for Saskatchewan and Alberta are furnished by the respective departments of agriculture for those provinces.

Saskatchewan.—The provincial department of agriculture reports that the crops are from seven to ten days later than last year. Some wheat is in shot blade. The straw will be short except on summerfallows where abundant rains and warm days have caused rapid growth. About half the summerfallowing is completed, and the acreage of new breaking and summerfallows shows slight increase over last year. The Dominion experimental stations report that at Rosthern rains all the month have worked favorably for all crops. Hay crops not fully recovered from drought in May, but grain and hoed crops are excellent. At the Scott station crops were injured by both frost and drought. The total rainfall for June was less than one inch Hay crops promise to be very light and grain crops short in straw. Many vegetable gardens proving failures. At Indian Head the weather during June was warm and showery. Grain crops have made good progress.

Alberta.—The provincial department of agriculture reports that the crop conditions during June were very encouraging. The first two weeks were cool and the late sown crops appeared very backward. During the last two weeks the weather has been ideal over the whole province. Growing showers visited a large percentage of crop area, and heavy rains with warmer weather where most needed. Slight frost and hail first part of month none since. The Dominion experimental farms report that at Lacombe the weather during June will average below normal temperature. Wheat 35, oats 24, barley 22 inches high. Hay prospects good. At Lethbridge the rainfall during June has been light, only about one-third of the average for the last 15 years. All but late sown grain is in excellent condition, but in imperative need of immediate moisture. The total area in crop is greater than last year, the largest increase being in flax.

British Columbia.—Agassiz: Most crops good, later than average, but earlier than last year. Invermere: Crops backward, but promise well. Root crops damaged by cutworms. Summerland: Apple crop, 20 per cent. higher than last year. Grain making good growth. Hay good. Sidney:

Crops Below the Normal According To Reports

It seems that the weatherman, in every way is against the farmer this year. "Rain wanted" is the cry in almost every locality in Alberta and Saskatchewan, to save the crops from ruin, as reported by the Farmers' Co-operative.

Hail storms swept over some parts of the country doing considerable damage here and there; yet the percentage of damage for the province is low. The straw seems to be very short especially where crops were sown late or sown on stubble and spring plowing.

In most places farmers have stopped breaking because of the dryness of the soil and in some instances summerfallowing has ceased on the same account.

Raymond and other southern districts have fair hay crops on irrigated land. Haying will be general in a couple of weeks, all over the province.

Excel—Light showers last week; also hail damaging about 5,000 acres from 15 to 100 per cent. Prospects are rather slim. Looks like a 10 or 12 bushel to acre crop.

Consort—Weather conditions fair. Some rain and hail last week.

Sedgewick—Rain and hail last Wednesday; damage from 10 to 90 per cent. Weather hot and dry.

Cadogan—Breaking has been discontinued on account of drought; crops in need of rain.

Aldersyde—Wheat, oats and barley heading out; straw seems very short; a few hail storms with about 10 per cent. damage. Rain needed badly.

Lomond—Heavy rain but week insured crop as far as moisture is concerned.

Edgerton—Crops heading out; straw short, weeds growing fast.

Armena—Crops will be headed out in two weeks.

Alderson—Seventy-five per cent. of crop dwindling away; rain needed.

Milk River—Moisture needed badly; plowing stopped.

Raymond—Crops are burning up; hay is fine on irrigated land.

Meeting Creek—Weather hot and dry; wheat heading out; straw short; oats in bad shape.

Forestburg—Weather is fine and crops doing well.

Rumsey—Wheat headed out; moisture needed badly.

Loyalist—Weather hot and dry; crops very poor.

Purple Springs—Slim chance for crops, too dry; 20 bushel yield is thought to be excellent.

Champion—Weather very fair; hail damage was very heavy; crops are well advanced.

Tractors at Work In England to Meet Crisis

Skilled Mechanics Are Kept in Readiness to Meet an Emergency—Working Day and Night to Ward Against the Food Problem.

Although somewhat slow, perhaps, in grasping the fact, England has, it seems, at last realized that every possible effort must be put forth to bring the maximum amount of land into cultivation this season and that the agricultural crops must be carefully husbanded.

The number of skilled plowmen taken from the land in conjunction with very unfavorable weather during the early spring months has combined to produce a very great reduction in the area of land ready for cropping at the present time, as compared with former years. This condition of affairs is now being rapidly overcome by the aid of motor tractors, which are at work night and day and in some cases for seven days in the week.

Work at Night

These iron horses are doing very satisfactory work. The war agricultural committees have at present 592 motor tractors at work, including forty-five caterpillar tractors lent by the Russian government. In addition to the above there are hundreds of privately owned tractors breaking up the land from the south of England to the north of Scotland. These tractors, in some districts, keep going for twenty-four hours of three 8-hours shifts. When night sets in a powerful headlight is lit in the form of an acetyline lamp, and with a similar light at each end of the furrow the work goes merrily on during the hours of darkness.

The tractors are of various horsepowers and weights, the lighter tractors being suited to stiff gradients, while on level ground the heavy and more powerful machines score, if the surface soil is dry. On the flat silt lands of Cambridgeshire, Lincoln and Norfolk, eight 10-ton tractors have been at work for a considerable time. The land in large areas of these districts is as level as a billiard table, absolutely free from big stones or any other obstruction.

The writer watched one of these powerful tractors at work on Holbeach marsh, drawing a double set of plows, each of which took four furrows, and turned over the land at the rate of two acres an hour, sixteen acres in a 10-hour day, including stops for meals. The work was well done and a good deep furrow of from eight to ten inches was taken out, while paraffin supplied the motive power.

The more common type of machine in use is considerably smaller and proportionately less powerful, usually drawing a 3-furrow plow. Breakdowns occasionally occur, but skilled mechanics are conveyed by motors, kept in readiness, to the scene of the breakdown and repairs are effected with the utmost possible dispatch, when the caterpillars crawl away again.

A One-Man Tractor

While these operations go ahead on large farms, the market gardeners and fruit growers are not behind. The son of a market gardener in the famous vale of Evesham (Worcestershire) in conjunction with a widely known engineering firm, brought out a small motor plow. This 9-horsepower motor plow takes two furrows at a time, and is so constructed that one man can guide it by means of two ordinary plow handles behind, or if the plow is working on a large field with no intricate turnings, the man is provided with a seat.

Among market gardeners and fruit growers this plow has become very popular; it only stands about three feet six inches high, and the mechanism has ben compressed into such small space that the plow will operate where a team of horses would be unmanageable. The plow will pass readily under the boughs of half standard and standard fruit trees and will plow, if desired, right up to the stem of the trees.

At the Highland Agricultural Society's show held two years ago, near the historic town of Stirling, trials of motor tractors and plows were conducted. The class of soil and gradients proved a very severe test and numbers of the tractors failed to finish and absolutely stuck. The Evesham gardener's plow, on the other hand, went bravely forward and never faltered. The demand for this motor plow during the last two years has been very much in excess of the output. In normal times this motor could be purchased for the price of two good farm horses.

An American tractor is also giving great satisfaction. Two sizes are in operation, one a 16-horsepower machine, the other a 24-horsepower.

In the great market gardening districts of Worcestershire, German prisoners are now working on the land and giving wonderful satisfaction to the growers, who only wish that their number could be increased.

IN THE SHEEP WORLD

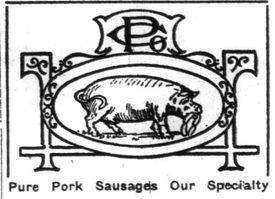
After the lambs are two weeks old, they begin to eat and should have a trough from which the old sheep are kept by a creep.

The grain for the lambs may consist of oats, corn or wheat. For very young lambs the grain may be cracked, but never finely ground.



If the ewes are in the sheds while suckling the lambs, it will pay to feed the ewes grain.

Ewes suckling lambs before grass, should have three or four pounds of roots in their rations.

Dock the lambs when they are a week or ten days old, cutting the tail about one inch from the body.

MARKET AND FINANCE

WINNIPEG LETTER

Our Winnipeg market keeps moderately active. There is a good demand for all the wheat offering, all grades finding a ready sale, the buyers being the government agents, regular exporters and millers. The movement from the west continues to decrease as compared with a year ago. Weather has been very warm over the prairie provinces, and many districts complain of rain being badly needed, less than average production is forecast. Prices of all grades of wheat are 10c higher on the week and feed wheat is 18c up, which suggests manipulation. Today's prices are: 1 northern, $2.40; 2 northern, $2.37; 3 northern, $2.34; No. 4, $2.22; No. 5, $1.99½; No. 6, $1.80; feed, $1.46. July closed $2.40, October $2.90.

Oats—The oat market has been firm and steady throughout the week, but in the last few days demand was lighter, and it seemed as if prices were hard to hold up. Fresh strength was put into the market today by the bullish crop report of the Free Press, which advanced the October future 1¼c and December 1⅜c, but cash prices were down ½c to ⅞c. Today's prices are: 2 C.W. 73⅞c, 3 C.W. and extra 1 feed 72⅝c, 2 feed 69⅜c. July 73⅞c, October 64⅞c, December 60⅝c.

Barley—The barley market is easier, with prices 2c to 4c down on the week. No. 3, $1.24; No. 4, $1.21; rejected and feed, $1.10. The July future closed $1.26½.

Flax—The flax market has had a big recovery in prices. It is not active, but seems strong, and stocks are unusually small. Prices have advanced 28½c to 29c on the week. 1 N.W. $2.93; 2 C.W. $2.89; 3 C.W. $2.74. July closed $2.92, October $2.86, December $2.84.

THOMPSON, SONS & CO.

FARMERS OF STATES OBJECT TO PRICES FIXED BY GOVERNMENT

St. Paul, July 19.—Farmers of the northwest are strongly opposed to senate leaders fixing a price of $1.75 for wheat, according to J. M. Anderson, president of the Equity Co-operative exchange.

"That price is not enough," Mr. Anderson said today, "farmers paid $3 a bushel for seed. Every other expense included in planting, caring for the crop, and harvesting it, has increased tremendously. At $1.75 a bushel there would be no profit.

TORONTO STOCKYARDS REPORT

Toronto, July 19.—Receipts at the Union stockyards today were 399 cattle, 59 calves, 935 hogs, 411 sheep and lambs.

Good active market and everything cleaned up at steady prices. There were several small lots of extra choice stable-fed cattle in and these sold strong from $11.85 to $12.50. There was a fair run of cattle and small stuff in for Thursday's market. The quality was mixed, but prices held good. Good butcher cows were slightly firmer. There was a fair demand for choice quality stockers and feeders.

Sheep and lambs steady; calves steady. Hogs steady at $15.75, fed and watered.

GRAIN MARKET

SUMMARY OF THE CROP AND MARKET SITUATION

Hot Weather in States Will Reduce Supply Materially

The bad weather in some of the states has affected the crop situation materially. Wheat closed firm at a net advance of 4c to 14c, corn finished unchanged to 1¼c higher, and oats gained ⅝c to 1⅝c. In provisions the outcome varied from unchanged to 17c decline.

It is said that the hot weather in North Dakota has reduced the supply and the prospects are that not over one-half of the normal crop will be produced this year.

Corn prices ran up to new high records both for immediate and future delivery. The September options reached to within 2¼c of the maximum limit allowed under the board of trade war emergency rules. Scantiness of arrivals and of rural offerings were the dominating factors.

Offers by neutral governments to resell corn at the seaboard made no impression here, but late in the session renewed peace talk caused a moderate reaction.

Liquidating sales by holders of lard weakened provisions. On the break, however, packers came to the support of the market.

INCREASE GOLD PRODUCTION IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Vancouver, July 19.—Gold bullion deposited at the Dominion assay office in Vancouver from January 1 until yesterday amounted to $1,669,149.37, as compared with $965,157.54 during the corresponding period last year, a remarkable increase of $703,991. This is only the early part of the gold producing period; in July in some districts they are only beginning the season and from now on will come the heaviest flow of gold. If the ratio of increased production is maintained, the end of the year will bring striking evidence that British Columbia and the Yukon have joined in the empire-wide effort to increase the production of gold so as to be able to assist individuals or nations who demand gold before extending credit.

HAIL INSURANCE BEING TAKEN IN LARGER QUANTITIES

Reports from the country state that the farmers are taking considerably more hail insurance this year than they did last. They are evidently profiting by their indiscretion of the past.

Hail insurance men take the view that there is scarcely a section of the province which is immune from losses from hail, as the experience of the past few years has shown. A number of districts have never yet been visited by hail, since these districts were settled, while other portions of the province have been visited almost every season in one or two instances the entire crop having been wiped out. A chart is kept of the districts visited by hail and each year adds new territory and the view is now general that there are few districts if any entirely immune.

The season is now here when heavy losses from hail may be expected. July and August are the two worst months for hail, and already some local storms have been reported from various parts of the province, with considerable loss in some instances.

STATE INSURANCE AGAINST DISABILITY.

(Montreal Chronicle, June 29, 1917).

In his presidential address to the Canadian Medical Association, Dr. A. G. Blackader, of McGill, paid considerable attention to the matter of compulsory invalidity insurance. Dr. Blackader advocated the adoption of a state scheme upon German and British lines, and asked that a committee of the association be appointed to consider the question and possibly draft a bill. In his advocacy of this measure, Dr. Blackader was undoubtedly actuated by the highest motives of humanitarism. But it is at least a matter for argument whether his remedy would not be worse than the disease which he proposes to cure.

It is scarcely generalizing too broadly to say that practically every scheme of state beneficance has, as a result, a certain loosening of the moral fibre in those benefited. That is perhaps inevitable in the present imperfectly-educated stage of democracy, but scarcely to be encouraged on that account. Under present conditions in Canada, all, except possibly a small minority, who have the will, have also the power to provide for a rainy day, for periods of sickness or misfortune. Numberless agencies are available, whereby that provision can be made. Moreover, practically everyday experience does not fill Canadians with enthusiasm for further extensions of the functions of Government. We are already over-governed—mostly by mediocrities. A false economy is, of course, easy enough. But it can scarcely be said that present circumstances are favorable for launching our great schemes involving either immediately or ultimately, large expenditures of public money. Further, if it is conceded that insurance is a proper function of the State, why should not the State extend its functions to every branch of activity—business or professional. Does Dr. Blackader look forward to a new world after the war, when we shall all be obediently doing what an all-embracing State tells us to do, and the medical profession will be merely a branch of the civil service?

BIG FARM LAND DEAL CLOSED NEAR TABER

Taber.—One of the biggest land deals which has taken place in the Taber district for some years has just been closed, whereby Albert Green has disposed of his farm and sheep ranch. The farm has been sold to Mr. Cooledge for $25,000, and Mr. Cooledge has since disposed of a half interest in it. Mr. Green's sheep ranch on Chin Coulee consists of several sections, and is an ideal sheep grazing area. It has been sold to Ed. Hagerman for $84,000. This, however, does not include the sheep. The ranch is well equipped with buildings, including one of the most modern houses in the south country.

There is a great deal of land changing hands in the Taber district. The Cameron ranch, which was put on the market last fall, is being bought up, partly by new settlers, and partly by people living in the Taber district. The outside edge of the ranch on the northwest has all been disposed of to a depth of four or five sections.

At the Highland Agricultural Society's show held two years ago, near the historic town of Stirling, trials of motor tractors and plows were conducted. The class of soil and gradients proved a very severe test and numbers of the tractors failed to finish and absolutely stuck. The Evesham gardener's plow, on the other hand, went bravely forward and never faltered. The demand for this motor plow during the last two years has been very much in excess of the output. In normal times this motor could be purchased for the price of two good farm horses.

An American tractor is also giving great satisfaction. Two sizes are in operation, one a 16-horsepower machine, the other a 24-horsepower.

In the great market gardening districts of Worcestershire, German prisoners are now working on the land and giving wonderful satisfaction to the growers, who only wish that their number could be increased.

IN THE SHEEP WORLD

After the lambs are two weeks old, they begin to eat and should have a trough from which the old sheep are kept by a creep.

The grain for the lambs may consist of oats, corn or wheat. For very young lambs the grain may be cracked, but never finely ground.

If the ewes are in the sheds while suckling the lambs, it will pay to feed the ewes grain.

Ewes suckling lambs before grass, should have three or four pounds of roots in their rations.

Dock the lambs when they are a week or ten days old, cutting the tail about one inch from the body.

THE OLDEST RANCHING CENTRE IN SOUTHERN ALBERTA

HIGH RIVER

There are hands rocking cradles,
In the nations at war,
Whose fingers are beckoning
Sweet peace from afar.
But the dove with the olive Keeps shunning "our earth,"
Till the turning of swords
Into plowshares "and mirth."

July 19-20, 1917 --- Special Fair Section --- July 19-20, 1917

High River is the progressive mixed farming center of Southern Alberta, and one of the oldest ranching centers in the province. Its record has been one of prosperity, and its citizens are energetic in the patriotic provision of those kernels of golden wheat, and those horses and cattle which are so necessary to the big victory which is coming to our fighting men on the soil of France.

Loans for Livestock

The Union Bank of Canada is prepared to make loans to good farmers on reasonable terms, to purchase cattle for feeding or breeding purposes. It is in the best interests of farmers to increase their herds.

The Growth and Prosperity of High River

(By Pte. Jas. Pettigrew)

In the year 1877, when Jasper Smith drove his bullock team on to the soil that is now the site of the prosperous town of High River, he little thought that in the year of grace 1917 there would be raised up on the green sward where his bullocks nibbled the prairie grass the spires and pinnacles of such a town as one sees today, just 35 miles from the city of Calgary. High River is a town of 1,200 population, and its many beautiful homes, which are situated on the sloping eminences which stretch out on all sides from the business section of the town, are a credit to those men and women who had the optimism to establish themselves in such a happy and healthy community, where the tillers of the soil are the true wealth-builders, and where the ambition of its men of wisdom has not led on to extravagant expansion which would be in advance of the needs of its citizens or those tillers of the soil surrounding it—for what is any town or city but a trading centre for those men whose firm hands grasp the plow handles, and whose eyes are trained to the making of a straight furrow. The cattle on a thousand hills are theirs, and the town that is their trading center would be exceeding their majestic rights to expand beyond the needs of those men who market the products of their labors in their trading center. And the town of High River is a trading center for those surrounding thousands of acres of waving wheat which each year passes through the elevators on to the steel highways of our Canadian Dominion, and for those thousands of browsing steers which mean so much to the many fighting men who today are standing on that grim battle-line which stretches out over the sand dunes of Central Europe. We are winning in the "big push" up against the tottering wall of military autocracy—not so much because of that bulldog tenacity which makes our men in the face of every horror attempt the taking of a mightier grip on the vitals of those military horror-makers—as because our tillers of the soil are every year taking a mightier grip on "Production."

Keep the Potatoes Green and Growing

(Experimental Farms Dept.)

Many are growing potatoes in Canada this year, for the first time and, as a result of the greatly increased number of growers the crop will probably be greatly increased. But to insure a good crop there must be an abundance of moisture in the soil and the tops must be protected from insects and disease.

Cultivation—The soil should be kept shade the ground. As most of the until the tops meet sufficiently to shade he ground. As most of the tubers develop in the three or four inches of soil nearest the surface, and as the tubers will not develop well in dry soil quite shallow cultivation is desirabe at this season of the year in soil which 's dry there may be good development of tops but there will be few tubers. The roots in such cases have gone down deep into the soil to obtain moisture but the tuber bearing stems, which are quite different from the root system, do not develop well. Where the soil is a loose, sandy loam, hilling is not necessary and may be injurious, as the soil dries out more than if left on the level. In heavy soils it is desirable to hill the potatoes as it will loosen the soil and the tubers will be shapelier than when the ground is left level. When there is sufficient rainfall and moisture in the soil hilling is likely to give best results in all kinds of soil as the soil will be looser and the tubers can push through it readily. As a great development of tubers takes place during the cooler and usually moister weather of the latter part of summer, it is very important to keep the plants growing well until then. In one experiment it was shown that during the month of September there was an increase of 119 bushels of potatoes per acre.

Protection of potato tops from insects—It is very important to prevent the tops of potatoes from being eaten by insects particularly by the Colorado potato beetle. The old "bugs" do not do much harm to the foliage, as a rule, and usually the plants are not sprayed to destroy these, although the fewer there are to lay eggs the less difficulty there will be in destroying the young ones. These begin to eat rapidly soon after hatching, and close watch should be kept so that the vines may be sprayed before much harm is done. Paris green kills more rapidly than arsenate of lead but does not adhere so well, and in rainy weather it is desirable to have something that will stay on the leaves so that they will be protected until it stops raining and thus prevent the tops being eaten. At the Central experimental farm a mixture of Paris green and arsenate of lead is used in the proportion of 8 ounces Paris green, 1½ pounds paste arsenate of lead (or 12 ounces dry arsenate of lead) to 40 gallons to water in order to get the advantage of both poisons. It may be that it is not convenient to get both poisons when either 12 ounces of Paris green or 3 pounds paste arsenate of lead (or 1½ pounds dry arsenate of lead) to 40 gallons water could be used, or in smaller quantities, say 1 ounce Paris green to 3 gallons or 3½ ounces paste arsenate of lead or half that quantity of dry to 3 gallons of water. An experiment conducted for six years at the Ontario Agricultural college, Guelph, showed that, on the average, where the tops were sprayed to kill "bugs," the yield was 186.9 bush is per acre, while when the tops were not sprayed and allowed to be eaten, the yield was only 98.2 bushels per acre. It is desirable not to stop with one spraying which usually does not kill all the bugs but to spray several times, if necessary, so that as little foliage as possible is eaten.

Protection of the potato plants from late blight and rot—In some years the crop of potatoes is much lessened by the late blight disease and when rot follows little of the crop may be left. It is, therefore, very desirable to prevent this disease from spreading. This is done by keeping the plants covered with Bordeaux mixture from about the first week of July, or before there is any sign of the disease, until September. Sometimes the first application of Bordeaux mixture is made before the potato beetles are all killed when the poison for them may be mixed with the Bordeaux. While the disease is not very bad every year it is well to be prepared. There was an average increase per year of 94 bushels of potatoes from spraying with Bordeaux mixture in three years.

The formula for Bordeaux mixture for potatoes is 6 pounds copper sulphate or bluestone, 4 pounds freshly slaked lime to 40 gallons of water. While the bluestone will dissolve more quickly in hot water, if it is not convenient to get this, it may be suspended over night in a cotton bag in a wooden or earthen vessel containing four or five or more gallons of water. The lime should be slaked in another vessel and before mixing with the copper sulphate solution should be strained through coarse sacking or a fine sieve. The copper sulphate solution is now put into a barrel, if it has not already been dissolved in one, and enough water added to half fill the barrel; the slaked lime should be diluted in another barrel with enough water to make half a barrel of the lime mixture. Now pour the diluted lime mixture into the diluted copper sulphate solution and stir thoroughly, when it is ready for use. The concentrated lime mixture should not be mixed with the concentrated copper sulphate solution, as, if this is done, an inferior mixture will result. If the barrels are kept covered so that there is no evaporation, stock solutions of the concentrated materials may be kept in separate barrels throughout the season. It is important to have the quantities of lime and copper sulphate as recommended, but, in order to be sure that enough lime has been used and there is no danger of burning the foliage, let a drop of ferrocyanide of potassium solution (which can be obtained from a druggist) fall into the mixture when ready. If the latter turns reddish-brown, add more lime mixture until no change of color takes place.

CANADIAN FARMERS RECEIVE MEDALS

Within the last few days a number of farmers in Western Canada have received medals and diplomas for their agricultural produce exhibited at San Francisco Fair in 1915. The exhibits were made under the auspices of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which itself had its own building and large display on the grounds, for which it was awarded a gold medal. The successful farmers and the medals awarded are as follows:

A. L. Fryberger, Gem, Alberta, gold medal for spelts.

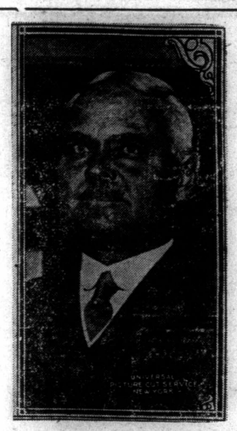
P. C. Hansen, Pincher Creek, Alberta, gold medal for wheat.

Arthur Perry, Cardston, Alberta, gold medals for wheat, oats and barley, and silver medal for grasses.

N. Taitinger, Claresholm, Alberta, gold medals for barley and wheat.

J. T. Worthington, Olds, Alberta, gold medal for wheat and silver medal for flax.

A. E. Barnes, Nemiskam, Alberta, silver medal for oats.



S. G. Hagen, Winterburn, Alberta, silver medal for oats.

T. Maynard, Deloraine, Manitoba, silver medal for wheat.

Jos. R. Peterson, Raymond, Alberta, silver medal for timothy.

Among the British Columbia exhibitors medals and diplomas were awarded to Stirling and Pitcairn of Kelowna, and Mrs. Jack McGregor, of Peachland.

Each of the exhibitors received diplomas with their medals. Although the distribution of medals, for unavoidable causes, is somewhat delayed, it comes at this time when the eyes of the world are turned upon the food producing countries as a vivid reminder of Western Canada's capabilities in that direction.

Good Roads and Their Cost

Much Needed Information Supplied by Ontario Report

To assist smaller municipalitines to avoid the expensive and annoying mistakes which have been made by many municipalities during the process of street improvement, the Ontario Department of Public Highways has prepared a special report.

The work is the result of information secured by a survey of 33 cities and towns in Ontario. In the introduction Mr. McLean, deputy minister of public highways, outlines the growth of city streets from the country corners to the modern urban thoroughfare. The expenditure involved by street improvement is discussed and the mistake of undertaking work of this nature, without consideration of a general plan, condemned. Lack of intelligent and experienced supervision also accounts for much of the expenditure of public funds for no adequate return.

The selection of the type of pavement best suited to local conditions is of great importance, the chief factors in which are: The size and wealth of the municipality, the amount and class of traffic, the class of street, whether business, residential, etc., and the materials available locally.

Another matter to receive consideration is the selection of materials, covering all classes of pavements from the gravel or broken stone surface to the most durable as well as the most expensive forms, such as creosoted wood block, brick and stone block. Streets of cities, towns and villages are classified, and the materials best suited to their construction are shown under the different headings.

The treatment of gravel and macadam roadways with oils and tars is described; the advantage of rounded corners at intersections in order that motor traffic may turn easily and safely is illustrated; the paving possible in avoiding land damages by the establishing of permanent grades and street levels in new subdivisions is shown; and the two important items of drainage and foundations are discussed.

The history of street improvement from the laying of the first roadway is given and the methods used in the construction of pavements, sidewalks, curbs, gutters, street railway track allowances and pedestrian crossings are described. Detailed costs of materials, labor, pavements, sidewalks, curbs and guters are furnished. Special features such as the construction of bridges, subways, driveways, etc., are fully described and the costs of these various works supplied where possible.

Tabulated data show the extent of paving in the municipalities, the cost of different classes of pavements prior to 1915, and the cost of the different sections of pavements laid in 1915, forming a valuable record of pavement costs prevalent throughout Ontario. In addition ot being a report, interesting and instructive, it will prove a valuable book of reference to those connected with street improvement. Copies may be obtained by applying to Mr. W. A. McLean, Department of Public Highways, Toronto.

The Feeding of Swine

By G. B. ROTHWELL, B.S.A.
Assistant Animal Husbandman

Anticipating the needs of the near future with regard to meat of all classes, it is apparent that the relation of supply and demand will be such as to make imperative, heavily increased production. That this increased supply should be of a rapidly available nature is peculiarly desirable under the conditions that apply to the nation at war. In this connection swine may be bred, fed and marketed with greater despatch and in greater numbers than any other farm animal now contributing to the great meat-markets. Heavy home consumption and tremendously increased export trade make a permanently profitable market certain, if the opportunity is realized and grasped.

To the farmer, who with profit to himself and country wishes to accelerate his endeavor in solving one of the nation's war-time problems, the following pages may prove of interest.

Feeding and Management

In the consideration of feeds for the production of cheap pork, choice is largely influenced by locality, season and local conditions. By these factors economy of purchase or prfoduction is governed, provided the food is palatable, easily digested and nutritious—essentials in any successful ration. The complete ration must, further, be properly balanced, compounded of a variety rather than once or two constituents, and above all things contain some succulent food, winter or summer. On the latter or natural class of food, largely depends the continued health of swine. It is essential in the feeding of breeding stock.

The Stock Boar

Summer Feeding—Supply a pasture of clover, alfalfa, or fine grass with water and shade. If no pasture is available, supply fresh green food liberally—clover, alfalfa grass, green peas and oats or weeds, as lamb's quarter, pig weed, dock, etc.

Winter Feeding—Alfalfa or clover hay fed dry, in racks. Roots, such as raw mangels or sugar beets, pulped; cooked potatoes and turnips, 5 to 10 pounds daily; or in the absence of roots, clover or alfalfa hay, cut fine and soaked or steeped.

Feeding the Year Round.—If skim-milk, butermilk or whey are available, supply at rate of 3 to 10 pounds daily as needed. The meal ration may be made up of ground oats, ground barley, bran and shorts in any combination of two or more, fed at the rate of 2 to 5 pounds per day, as needed. Use judgment in feeding the boar. If overfat, he will prove a poor or uncertain stock-getter, indifferent and sluggish at service. If he is too thin, he will transmit to his get, lack of vigor and vitality and poor condition generally.

Exercise — Importance cannot be overestimated. Supply a roomy shady pasture in summer, not a filthy, fly-infested pen or corner. In winter, arrange a paddock out-of-doors, close to the barnyard. If convenient give him the run of the yard for a few hours daily. As a shelter use, the year round, a cheap, portable, single-boarded cabin about 6 feet by 8 feet. Supply plenty of bedding. By feeding and caring for, as outlined, crippling and rheumatism, so common in boars, will be avoided.

The Brood Sow

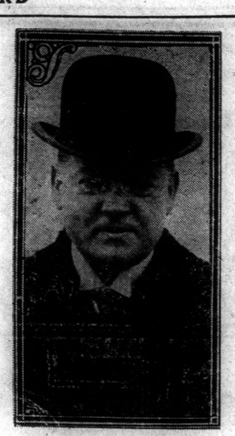
Summer—Pasture, same as advised for boars.

Winter—Roughage same as for boars. Meal mixture of bran two parts, shorts, one part, except when nearing farrowing-time, when the mixture should be of equal parts. If necessary ground barley or oats might replace either. Avoid corn in more than one-quarter the ration. For the breeding sow it is debilitating and over-fattening. Feed meal at the rate of 2 to 4 pounds as needed.

During Gestation—Flush, or bring the sow into good condition before breeding. Maintain this condition after breeding. Avoid over-fatness with the ensuing troubles—difficult farrowing, small, weak, or dead pigs. Too thin condition, particularly with a young sow, may permanently injure, in any case will likely mean small, thin pigs, a high percentage of runts, and small milk secretion. The in-pig sow must receive a cooling ration tending toward a laxative nature. The ration above advised qualifies in this regard. Remember, first and last, that constipation at this time makes very certain, serious trouble with the litter—small, unthrifty, poor-doing pigs, due to constipation in both themselves and their mother. Such litters dwindle rapidly with no perceptible cause.

Exercise—Equally as important as with the boar. With the exception of that period spent in the farrowing-pen, house the brood sow outdoors the year round in a portable cabin, 8 feet by 10 feet, and as described, placing four or five sows in each cabin. Choose a dry site. Make the sow work to obtain feed. This has an unfailing influence on the vigor, size and numbers of the soming litter, and lessens liability to rheumatism and crippling.

After Farrowing—Avoid exciting the sow during or after farrowing. Always be present at this time, but give only such attention as may be required; no more. The first feed should be a tepid slop of middlings. During the first ten days gradually increase ration to maximum. Particularly avoid overfeding, causing scours and thumps in little pigs. Feed the sow for milk production such rations as ground oats, middlings (equal parts), or ground oats, gran shorts (equal parts), both combinations with milk products. In summer allow green feed or pasture only after pigs are two weeks old. In winter, feed roots, clover hay, etc., to keep the bodily functions healthy and blood cool. Empty a pailful of earth and wood ashes in a corner of the pen. When weaning cut down meal supply and remove young pigs for longer periods each day until the sow is dry. If pigs are over-fat, lazy and sluggish at service. If he is too thin, he will transmit to his get, lack of vigor and vitality and poor condition generally.



Exercise — Importance cannot be overestimated. Supply a roomy shady pasture in summer, not a filthy, fly-infested pen or corner. In winter, arrange a paddock out-of-doors, close to the barnyard. If convenient give him the run of the yard for a few hours daily. As a shelter use, the year round, a cheap, portable, single-boarded cabin about 6 feet by 8 feet. Supply plenty of bedding. By feeding and caring for, as outlined, crippling and rheumatism, so common in boars, will be avoided.

ley, 3 parts; shorts, 3 parts; linseed oil meal, 1 part; with 5 pounds of skim-milk daily. Soak for twenty-four hours, and feed. If in pen, add to this some dry grain, oats or corn, scattered in litter. This is not necessary if pigs are on grass paddock. As pigs increase in age, gradually increase the grain to three pounds or more daily, as needed, increasing also the proportion of ground barley or oats in the mixture, until at six months of age the ration consists of ground corn or barley, 6 parts; shorts, 3 parts; linseed oil meal, 1 part. Shelter the pasture or paddock-fed pig either with a portable cabin or a light open-sided shed. Avoid, particularly, turning the weaned pig outdoors to a shadeless paddock. Sunburn, skin trouble, temporary and often permanent stunting, ensues. Have natural shade if possible and supply clean, fresh water.

Other Good Growing Rations

1. Ground barley, 4 parts; shorts, 4 parts; gluten feed, 2 parts; skim-milk, 3 pounds.

3. Ground wheat or shorts, 2 pars; barley, 2 parts; ground peas, 1 part; skim-milk, 3 pounds.

Numbers 1 and 2 would be applicable to Central and Maritime conditions, while No. 3 would be more adapted to Western needs.

Pastures

Compared to pen feeding, the pasture affords 5 to 25 per cent. hceaper gains. For growing breeding stock, pasture feeding provides for growth of bone and muscleand general vigorous health. For fattening and finishing pigs, firmer, better quality pork will result. With the latter class of stock, however, the range must, of necessity, be more limited. Alfalfa forms the best forms the best pasture, with clover or grass.

Green Feeds

For dry-lot or pen-feeding fresh-cut alfalfa or clover are best. Rape is largely employed but is much lower in value than the two first mentioned and must be used before it becomes coarse and fibrous.

Economical Production and Health

General Rules for Feeding—(1) Never feed more than the pigs will clean up. (2) Make all changes in rations slowly. (3) Realize that the breding pig is an out-of-doors animal. (4) Approximate outdoor conditions in the farrowing and feeding pen, i.e., supply fresh air, light, drainage, and above all avoid draughts and dampness. (5) Make exercise a prime factor with every class and age of breeding pig. (6) For economy and health see that green feed, pasture, roots, and well-ured roughage are part of the ration. (7) Remember that the pig is a poor patient and particularly difficult to treat. Strive to eliminate the cause of disease—prevent rather than cure it.

Minimizing Labor by the Use of the Self-Feeder

To obtain maximum results and at the same time reduce labor to the minimum is the constant aim of the manufacturer. It has been proven that the hog may feed himself practically throughout life, and give a profit at least equal to that of hand-feeding methods, labor considered. This point is worthy of every farmer's careful consideration when labor conditions in the next few years are anticipated. The self-feeder makes possible the feding of hogs, where labor for hand feeding is not to be had, or the doubling or trebling the extent of the operation as it might otherwise be carried out, and with less labor.

Requirements of a Good Self-feeder for Swine

Such a device to be successful must be cheap, strong, capacious, portable, easy to construct, weather-tight, easy of regulation for different textured meals, and most important of all, so arranged that the contents will feed into the troughs without any stoppage caused by the blocking of the meal in the hopper. Further, the troughs must be constructed to ensure the minimum amount of waste such as might be caused by the animals nosing the meal over the sides or soiling it by standing in the troughs.

Advantages of the Self-Feeder Over Hand-Feeding Methods

1. Saves over 50 per cent. of the labor. 2. Reduces waste of feed to the minimum. 3. Prevents digestive troubles due to overfeeding, the pigs having full access to the meal at all times and therefore eating in small quantities frequently, instead of suddenly overloading the stomach two or three times in the day. 4. Gives the small or timid pig as good an opportunity as the more aggressive individuals. 5. Will-produce gains equal to hand-feeding methods at equal or less cost.

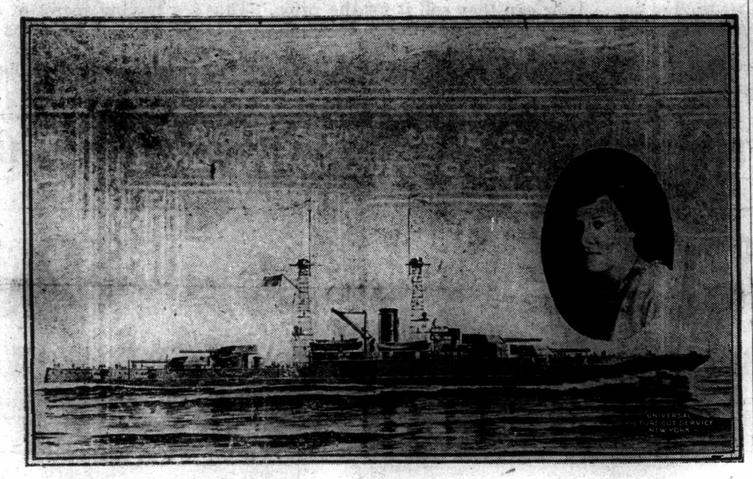
Correct Condition for Using the Self-Feeder

Place the feeder on a platform or floor that will remain clean during wet weather and prove accessible to the pigs at all times. Provide shade of some sort, either trees or a rough shed. While this system of feeding will prove relatively economical in dry lot feeding where green food, skim-milk or water are supplied daily, the maximum efficiency will be reached where the feeders are placed in a good clover or alfalfa pasture. In any case, dry lot or pasture, with or without milk products, fresh water should always be supplied, preferably running, or from some self-watering device, regularly and frequently filled.

Young pigs from ten weeks of age onward may be safely and economically fed by this method. Until this age is reached it is generally wise to feed by hand, although experiments have proved that even sucking pigs may be benefited by the feeder. Shoats of all ages, and in fact all classes of pigs to be finished quickly for market may be most profitably "self-fed." Young breeding stock, similarly, is benefited provided the ration is one of bone and muscle forming nature. In general, avoind self-feeding with aged sows, particularly as forrowing time approaches.

Meals and Mixtures Adapted to Use in the Self-Feeder

From a mechanical standpoint practically any mixture of whole or ground grains or other mill-feeds may be successfully fed. Corn, for example, is frequently fed along with clover or alfalfa pasture, for short finishing periods. For young pigs or shoats any of the following rations will be found suitable provided all hulls are fairly finely ground.



1. Shorts, fine ground oats, fine ground barley or corn, equal parts.

2. Shorts 4 parts, any of the above grains 4 parts, ground peas 2 parts.

3. Shorts or wheat 2 parts, barley 2 parts, peas 1 part.

With any of the above rations fed to young pigs skim-milk may be most profitably fed. Where such cannot be obtained the addition of tankage, meat or blood meal is recommended, say at the rate of one pound tankage to six pounds of any of the above mixtures. Where whole corn is used, one pound of tankage could be added to every eighth of corn.

Progress of High River

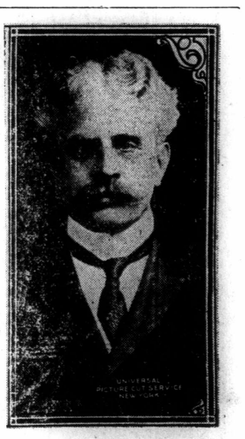
or the belt pushers on those machine guns, or those men who feed our howitzers—and eevn they are but those quiet Canadian lads who but yesterday were pitching sheaves with a hay fork—are a mighty factor in our great victory, "out yonder," but there are mighty factors around the town of High River in those men who are breaking new land on that "ocean of prairie" for the production of those things which netx year will grow on the soil of our Canada to feed our hosts of warriors on the soil of Europe—and possibly the peoples of a great free Europe—our High River farmers do not lose sight of the fact that the continent of Europe will be looking to "our Canada" for those things which they produce to fill the empty storehouses of the war-stricken area. And if we are building those thousands of ships to carry those products to Europe, our farmers will need to produce the cattle and grain for those ships to carry. The spout from which those grains of golden wheat flow into the ships' holds at the seaboard places is only the end-piece of our great wheat-producing machine where—away in our great central west prairie land—one can look on the miles of swishing wheattops, and the hum of the binder is ever in our ears.

High iRver's Part.

But we will need to get back to the consideration of the prominent part that is being played by the High River district in the destiny of our empire, and when we review the trade and financial conditions in the district, we find every cause for an optimistic outlook on the future years of prosperity which will come to High River.



When C. C. Short, at the age of 13, left the then end of steel at Swift Current and arrived at High iRver in 1883, he never anticipated the honor of being amongst those men who would see a prosperous town like High River spring up on the bare prairie, on which he first set foot in 83. Mrs. Short was the second white woman to have the courage to reside in central southern Alberta.

Has Done Great Work

High River has done splendid work, too, in the moneys raised for war purposes in the province, and Mrs. A. J. Arnold has an astounding array of figures to prove the loyalty of High River to the cause of our men in France, and Mr. Elliot, the secretary to the Patriotic fund is energetic in looking after the welfare of the dependents of those splendid men who have gone from High River to help in the victory fight.

550 Suits for Boys at Pricings Little Short of Wonderful

This Clothing Grouped on Main Floor Tables

When the buyer for the Boys' Store returned from the East a few days ago, he warned us that something would happen to startle the patrons of this store. To say that he has thoroughly established the threat, would be putting it mildly. Here we find 550 boys suits, all the way from the little wash suits for youngsters to the neat fitting pinch backs for upper school boys. It's clothing of the stamp that makes parents sit up and say:—How can they sell it for the price. That's a buying secret of ours, of course. We actually believe that Western Canada never before saw such values, and the stock is NEW, not PRE-WAR BOUGHT or samples, discards, seconds or maker's surplus. It's NEW, IT'S FRESH, IT'S ULTRA SMART, the kind of duds that the boy likes because he falls into them and they seem natural —not "stiff and starched."

FREE SOUVENIRS TO BOYS SATURDAY, 8.30 to 12 a.m.

STORIES OF EVENTS OF IMPORTANCE IN THE WORLD TODAY

Patriotism Stirs The Heart of The Self Exiled American

JAMES HAZEN HYDE, self-exiled American, who left the shores of this country in anger after the famous insurance scandals of 1905, has heard the call of his native country. The former Beau Brummel of New York society will help the French committee install accommodations in France for American troops. Like William Thaw, who as an aviator has done much to lessen the stigma of contempt which the American public has cast on the family name, Hyde may be able to purge his name of the ridicule which attaches to it.

In the early years of 1900 Hyde was pointed out as a horrible example of the "second generation of the rich." He is the man who introduced yellow gloves to America. At that time yellow gloves were associated with fops. He wore spats. Spats then were considered unforgivable. He bought his clothes in Paris, hobnobbed with foreigners snubbed his fellow countrymen whose investments enabled him to draw down a salary of $77 an hour, and generally made himself obnoxious to an American public always ready to speak its mind rudely.

Imitated French Dandies

Hyde inherited $51,000 of the $100,000 capital stock of the Equitable Life Assurance society from his father, along with the vice-presidency of eigners, snubbed his fellow countrying the world of finance he had been a college boy at Harvard. When he arrived at the college he was dubbed "Caleb" Hyde, because of his appearance. He resembled what is popularly known as a country "bumpkin."

But Hyde learned quickly. He cultivated a wavy pompadour and a pointed black beard. He learned French and studied French literaure, history and chateaux. He was a young exquisite when Harvard turned him loose on New York.

The senior Hyde had been a prodigious worker. He rose from clerk to founder and head of a great life insurance corporation. It was expected the junior Hyde would follow in his father's footsteps. He didn't.

Hyde became known as an accomplished linguist and a famous whip. He drove a four-in-hand with Alfred G. Vanderbilt from New York to Philadelphia and return in a day. He became president of the Alliance Francaise of New York and got a decoration of the Legion of Honor in recognition of his services in spreading French literature in America. He was at 23, vice-president of the Equitable and director in 46 great corporations. Yet all his time was devoted to society. He was more interested in the cut of his clothes than in the two thousand million dollars he controlled.

Newspapers gave prominent space to young Hyde and his doings for ten years. His stables, at that time the finest in America, were exploited, as were his beard and hair, maintained at an expense of $10 a day, and the violets which he grew to place over the left ears of his horses. He had a flagstaff placed in front of his New York residence. When he was at home a red flag with a white "H" flew at the top of the mast. When his carriage drew up to the door a carpet was rolled from the vestibule to the curb that he would not have to step on rough bricks. The cream of politeness when with what he considered his equals, Hyde never was known to say "good morning" to the elevator men in the Equitable building.

And all this time he was drawing $100,000 a year in salary from the insurance company. He spent his time in giving lavish dinners to actresses and royalty at his palatial country home at Bay Shore, Long Island. He was seen frequently with Mme. Rejane, the famous French actress, much to the distress of the mammas of New York society buds. Mme. Rejane was old enough to have been his mother. It cost him $30,000 to entertain Sarah Bernhardt. And in January, 1905, he gave a fancy dress ball at Sherry's, said to have cost $100,000. Then came the deluge.

The crowning feature of the fancy ball was a comedy in French performed by Mme. Rejane and a bit of spicy poetry accompanying it. The beautiful ballet from the Metropolitan Opera house danced. And newspapers recalled that at a previous little $20,000 dinner Mme. Rejane put on a dance all alone. It was on top of a table.

Protest from all parts of the country arose when an account of the ball was published. Agents of the insurance company said it was hurting their business. They joined forces and demanded that Hyde be put out of the company.

Hyde fought back. The president of the company and other officials disclosed that the expenses of all the costly entertainments Hyde had been giving werep aid for out of company funds. Hyde's Legion of Honor ribbon came to him after he had given $30,000 to the French ambassador. The company had paid that $30,000. It had paid for the fancy ball at Sherry's. Officials also said he had reaped rich profits from underwriting syndicates, which had operated unlawfully with funds of the Equitable society.

Ousted from Company

The dandy admitted it, and added that James W. Alexander, president, and directors of the company had been doing the same thing for 25 years. He sent his check to make restitution for the amounts he had made in that way and for what he had spent on social entertainments. As a result the entire insurance business of the country underwent a federal investigation and general restitution was made to the Equitable. Hyde, Alexander, and many other officers of the concern got out. Hyde sold his property in America and exiled himself to France.

Paris soon acclaimed him the Beau Brummel of the fashion center of the world. "Le Pompadour American" they called him. He affected red, mauve, gendarme blue and burnt orange socks with tie and boutonnieres to match. He became a patron of art, of literature and pretty actresses. He dwaddled his time away after his own heart. But he was never seen at American clubs in Paris at the Fourth of July, Washington's Birthday and Thanksgiving reunion banquets Americans in Paris attended annually. And once, in Versailles, an American on seeing Hyde's vivid yellow socks, exclaimed in astonishment, "Where did you get those socks!" Hyde knocked him down, and immediately all the French gentlemen adopted yellow socks.

Uneasy Are The Crowns that Rest On Royal Heads

THE great war has directed the attention of the world toward the government of the European nations and has developed the fact that little generally is known about the crowns of the reigning monarchs.

The crowns of today can trace their origin back to the garland or wreath of leaves used in Rome in recognition of some particular service or honor won.

The next evolution was the gold band placed on the brow of a general who conquered a city or a soldier who in battle by an act of bravery saved the life of a Roman citizen. The first soldier in a regiment to scale the walls of a besieged city always was crowned, and the "naval crown" was a reward for the one who won the battle on sea.

There is truth in the saying "uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

The troubles of Czar Nicholas have recently served to accentuate the untold misery under the covering of a bejeweled brow. No one can foretell how the war will further affect the crowns of the universe. It is certain, though, that the world in the future cannot move along as it has in the past.

Upon the ruins of some of the monarchies will arise a form of government having for its cornerstones "liberty, truth, justice and equality."

Kaiser's Crown Cost Millions

Some of the other crowns today are believed to be threatened and in a few years they are likely to adorn the show cases of our great museums, where other crowns are now lying.

Since France became a republic the crown has rested in the Louvre at Paris. The crown was first worn by Napoleon 1.

The kaiser's crown is known as the most expensive one in the world. The original crown of Germany is valued at 2½ million dollars and no one can wonder at this enormous valuation when it is known that it contains no less than 1,250 valuable diamonds. It takes first rank in beauty and splendor.

The imperial crown of Austria is also massive in appearance and is regarded by many of the best judges as being as beautiful as the German crown. It is crescent shaped and studded with immense diamonds and rubies, heightened by the mountings of fleur-de-lie. There is an opening in the middle of the crown and from this arises an arched fillet extending from back to front, set with costly pearls. It is surmounted by an orb on which is a cross of pearls.

The royal crown of Great Britain is wonderfully constructed and decorated with diamonds, pearls, sapphires and rubies. The arches are covered with these precious stones. The fluerde-lis on the crown are said to represent the claim of England's sovereignty over France. The center of the arches are surmounted by an orb and cross. The center of the crown is filled with royal purple. The crown of the queen consort, worn by Queen Alexandra at her coronation and also by the present queen, is of matchless beauty. The main jewel is the Kohinoor diamond in the center. The latter was presented to Queen Victoria in 1850 and has an interesting history. Its weight is 186 1-16 carats. The story runs that this famous gem was carried 5,000 years ago by the hero, Karna. During the fourteenth century it was taken to Delhi by Alaed-din and weighed then 793 carats. In 1673 the grand mogul sold it to Tavernier.

Finally it came into possession of the East India company and was presented to the English crown. Its weight had been greatly reduced, due to injury and recutting, in passing from hand to hand.

Russian Crown Into Discard

The recent revolution in Russia has brought a change in the government, which has affected the badge of sovereignty. From a monarchry Russia is now a republic, thus the czar and his crown have been separated. The imperial crown of Russia is decorated with priceless jewels. The main one of the entire collection rests on the summit of a band of gems that rises from the circlet and extends across the head from back to front. The side pieces of the cap are sections of a sphere and decorated with a number of gems.

The royal crown of Sweden and Norway was first used by Bernadotte, the distinguished French general, who afterward became King of Swe-

World War May Mean the Regeneration of the Arab

THE fall of Bagdad has brought the British people directly into touch with the Arab world—that world of noise, bustle, passion and rhetoric which has lain under the deadening influence of the various Turkish dynasties near upon a thousand years. At this moment the Arab race presents a sad spectacle, divided, scattered and tattered by war, revolution, conquest and deliberate misgovernment, yet one not devoid of promise. When the Arab has met civilization in the past the marriage of intellects has been fruitful. The nature of the issue is demonstrated by the ruins which scatter Syria, Mesopotamia and Irak.

The groves of columns at Tadmor, the vast temples of Baalbek, the palace of Al Hadhr, the hippodrome of Gerash, the theater of Amman, the basilicas of the Hauran and North Syria, the mosques and tombs of Damascus, the desert castles of Kerak, Salkhad and El Nejin are witnesses to results of the mating of the Arab mind with the successive cultures of Greece, Rome, Parthia, Persia, Byzantium and the Franks.

By the strange movements of the web of fate the British in Bagdad now come once more face to face with the Arab world for the first time since the last English, Irish and Scottish Crusaders left the Holy Land. For though Egypt is Arab in tongue, the western desert in name, it is not until you arrive at Bagdad that you reach that roaring, chinking, clattering, arguing, bellowing, demonstrative world of Rabelism jest, caustic satire, plaintive poetry, majestic verse, calculated rhetoric, comprehensive invective, subtle flattery, remorseless logic and strident, ear piercing din which stretches west, the Kurdish hills on the east, and the rugged fringes of the Taurus on the north, that space of earth which the old Arabian geographers named Irak, Jazirah, Shamiyeh, Suriya and Filistin.

From Prosperity to Desolation

Outwardly the Arabian world today is unprepossessing; squalor, poverty and noise are its outward habiliments. As one who has some faith in the future, I dread the reaction which may take place in English minds when the public realizes what a land of ruin and desolation the Turks have made of what was once the center of a prosperity which had endured for three thousand years.

The Arab is physically and intellectually as virile as he ever was, but superficially he is unrecognizable from his former self. In the early days of the Abbasid Caliphate, not only was the Arab world prosperous, but we have records of an elaboration of government and a complexity of administration which would astonish those who are only acquainted with the social and political conditions under which Arabs live today.

The Bagdad of Haroun-al-Rashid was not a disorderly agglomeration of tortuous streets, picturesque ruins, pointed arches, slender minarets, ragged awning and crumbling walls. It was built on a rigid system with broad avenues, named and ordered quarters, solid and businesslike government offices, square towers and massive walls. It was not inhabited by a squalid and ragged population, sunken in disease and poverty, but was an orderly capital with a perfect police system, regular cantonments of troops, colleges, observatories, exchanges, law courts, hospitals, poor houses, public baths, trade unions and guilds. There was society in Bagdad; wits and poets, philosophers and statesmen, lexicographers, learned doctors and metaphysicians met and conversed in schools and assemblies. Through the pages of the old chroniclers one gets small glimpses of that extraordinary and elaborate world which pivoted on Bagdad, for Bagdad was not an oasis in the wilderness; Damascus, Kirkisiya, Raggo, Mosul, Ras-ul-Ain, Erbil, and scores more great cities surrounded it. Now many of them are marked by mere undulations in the soil.

Such was the Arab world which pushed forth armies to farthest Turkestan, and had, before the building of Bagdad, stretched out its advance guards beyond the Pyrenees. And be it said, though the Arabs were conquerors, yet were they not destroyers. So long as the lordship of Islam was in Arab hands, intellect, architecture, and commerce flourished. Frequently oppressors, often tyrants, the provincial governors of the Arab Caliphs hardly ever left a province without adding to it some monument or institution.

Now Lives in Squalor

Whence comes, then, this desolation and wretchedness of today? In the days of Charlemagne Europe was emerging from the darkest chasm of history, and Bagdad was at its zenth; today the flourishing provinces of which Bagdad was the imperial capital are deserts, and of Bagdad itself there remains only a purlieu of 140,000 souls where 2 million once subsisted in affluence. Has the Arab degenerated? What explanation can account for the utter collapse of this people? Degenerate in the true sense the Arab certainly is not; you will find his memory as acute, his wit as nimble, his sense of humor as keen, his observation as direct, as in the days of Ibu Batuta, Abu Nowas, or Ed Tabari. Lithe and supple of good physique, his

THE STRAFER STRAFED

"Gott Strafe England" (God Punish England) reads the sign tacked to a tree just inside the lines of a series of trenches captured in the early offensive by the British army. Hundreds of similar signs were found nailed to fences, posts and trees, even to the fronts of houses, barns and other buildings.

War May Mean the Regeneration of the Arab

perfect features, glossy hair, small hands and feet show he is in body as true to type as his puns, oratory, wit and astuteness prove his mind to be unaltering; yet he who gave civilization and order to a third of Asia and the whole of North Africa now lives on a dunghill amidst flies and ruins. What is the answer to the enigma?

I think the answer is that the Arab intellect is one that only produces itself to the utmost by contact with other minds. For centuries the Arab of Aarabia, which is the Arab of isolation, has remained in the same position, neither advancing nor retiring, absolutely changeless. In the days of the Prophet the Arabs of Arabia were, as today, intensely aristocratic in sentiment as regards birth and breed, desultory but courageous warriors, brilliant poets, fine conversationalists and astute diplomatists. The Arabs that Arabia has put forth have been whatsoever the contacts they established with the outer world made them.

Fire of Contact Needed

When they met Rome they produced Palmyra, when they met Byzantium they produced the brilliant Sassanian culture they produced Bagdad, when they invaded Spain they produced Cordova and the Alhambra, but when they were in turn subjected to the Turks, not by conquest, but by the infiltration of Turkish dynasties and the Turcofication of the mercenary armies of the petty states, the Arabs were divorced from civilization and intellectual contact; they lost all the trappings of material civilization, keeping only their fiery hearts, their agile thoughts, their poetry, and their individuality.

Various Forms Of Headache

"It is necessary in order to treat headaches properly to understand the causes which produce the affection," says Dr. J. W. Ray, of Blockton, Ala. Continuing, he says, "Physicians cannot even begin the treatment of a disease without knowing what causes give rise to it, and we must remember that headache is to be treated according to the same rule. We must not only be particular to give a remedy intended to counteract the cause which produces the headache, but we must also give a remedy to relieve the pain until the cause of the trouble has been removed. To answer this purpose anti-kamnia tablets will be found a most convenient and satisfactory remedy. One tablet every one to three hours gives comfort and rest in the most severe cases of headache, neuralgia, and particularly the headaches of women.

"When we have a patient subject to regular attacks of sick headache and when he feels the least sign of an oncoming attack, he should take two A-K Tablets. Obtainable at druggists in any quantity desired."

The Turk has not been able to oppress an Arab and reduce him to slavery and sullen bondage as he could Armenians, Bulgarians and Greeks. The Arab remained the intellectual superior of his master; the Turks could fight and bully, divide and rule, the Turk could reduce all Arabistan to ruins, but he could not make the Arab admit Turkish superiority. But just as the Greek, Roman, Byzantine, Sassanian and Spanish contacts were fruitful, so the Turco-Arab contact has been sterile, fruitful only in ruins.

Uneasy Are the Crowns That Rest on Royal Heads

den on the death of Charles XIII in 1818. The crown is richly decorated with immense pearls. It is now held by Sweden.

Portugal has been a republic since October 5, 1910. The royal crown that was used by the former kings was identical with the crown of Spain. The crown was mortgaged at one time to the Rothschilds of London.

The crown of Spain has eight arches handsomely decorated with oval shaped pearls of matchless beauty. The crown, however, was not used at the coronation of King Alphonso XIII. It will be remembered that Alphonso's father died before the day of his birth, hence the stork was master of ceremonies at his coronation, for he came into the world a "king."

The crown of Italy has eight arches set with large and handsome pearls and is similar to the Spanish crown.

There is no hint of imperial sovereignty in the head dress of Uncle Sam. The president has no badges to symbolize his high office in America.

FINGERPRINT EVERYONE

New York Doctor Says This Method Would Eradicate Crime

A fingerprint record of every man, woman and child in the country on file at Washington, with a duplicate record in states or other local districts, is urged by Dr. John B. Huber, of New York, as a means of finding the large number of girls reported as "missing" and never found every year.

Here are some of the other ways in which a universal fingerprint record could be utilized, according to Dr. Huber:

It would protect the innocent as well as disclose the criminal.

Numberless unfortunates found mysteriously dead would be identified. Fifty thousand persons die and are buried without identification in the United States every year.

Aphasia (memory blindness) puzzles could be solved.

The crime of abandoning infants would be stamped out.

Beneficiaries of life insurance policies could not substitute a dead man's body for a live man.

Election frauds would be ended.

The number of persons who vanish yearly in New York alone is 3,500; says Dr. Huber. He continues:

"There would be practically no more lost identity in the metropolis or anywhere else in these United States if universal finger printing were adopted. Francis Galton computed that the chance of the finger prints of two individuals being identical are one in 64 billions—a chance so infinitesimal as to be negligible. These lines are more enduring than any other part of the body; they do not vary from youth to age; they persist even after death; injuries alone change them, but the scar of a cut that has been finger printed would be an additional identification.

"It was Galton, that amazing genius in scientific detail and in interpretation of data, who proposed and first reduced the fingerprint method to a system."

A man may forget home kindred, friends and almost everything else, but he never forgets the first time he went into a barber shop to get a shave.

Synopsis of Canadian Northwest Land Regulations.

THE sole head of a family, or any male over 18 years old, who was at the commencement of the present war, and has since continued to be, a British subject or a subject of an allied or neutral country, may homestead a quarter-section of available Dominion Land in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta. Applicant must appear in person at Dominion Lands Agency or Sub-Agency for District. Entry by proxy may be made on certain conditions. Duties—Six months residence upon and cultivation of land in each three years.

In certain districts a homesteader may secure an adjoining quarter-section pre-emption. Price $3.00 per acre. Duties —Reside six months in each of three years after earning homestead patent and cultivate 50 acres extra. May obtain pre-emption patent as soon as homestead patent on certain conditions.

A settler after obtaining homestead patent, if he cannot secure a pre-emption, may take a purchased homestead in certain districts. Price $3.00 per acre. Must reside six months in each of three years, cultivate 50 acres and erect a house worth $300.00.

Holders of entries may count time employment as farm laborers in Canada during 1917, as residence duties under certain conditions.

When Dominion Lands are advertised or posted for entry, returned soldiers who have served overseas and have been honorably discharged, receive one day priority in applying for entry at local Agent's Office (but not Sub-Agency). Discharge papers must be presented to Agent.

"KAZAN"

BY
JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD

CHAPTER I.
The Miracle

KAZAN lay mute and motionless, his gray nose between his forepaws, his eyes half closed. A rock could have appeared scarcely less lifeless than he; not a muscle twitched; not a hair moved; not an eyelid quivered. Yet every drop of the wild blood in his splendid body was racing in a ferment of excitement that Kazan had never before experienced; every nerve and fiber of his wonderful muscles was tense as steel wire. Quarter-strain wolf, three-quarters "husky," he had lived the four years of his life in the wilderness. He had felt the pangs of starvation. He knew what it meant to freeze. He had listened to the wailing winds of the long Arctic night over the torrent and the cataract, and had cowered under the mighty crash of the storm. His throat and sides were scarred by battle, and his eyes were red wih the blister of the snows. He was called Kazan, the Wild Dog, because he was a giant among his kind and as fearless, even, as the men who drove him through the perils of a frozen world.

He had never known fear—until now. He had never felt in him before the desire to run—not even on that terrible day in the forest when he had fought and killed the big gray lynx. He did not know what it was that frightened him, but he knew that he was in another world, and that many things in it startled and alarmed him. It was his first glimpse of civilization. He wished that his master would come back into the strange room where he had left him. It was a room filled with hideous things. There were great human faces on the wall, but they did not move or speak, but stared at him in a way he had never seen people look before. He remembered having looked on a master who lay very quiet and very cold in the snow, and he had sat back on his haunches and walled forth the death song; but these people on the walls looked alive, and yet seemed dead.

Suddenly Kazan lifted his ears a little. He heard steps, then low voices. One of them was his master's voice. But the other—it sent a little tremor through him! Once, so long ago that it must have been in his puppyhood days, he seemed to have had a dream of a laugh that was like the girl's laugh—a laugh that was all at once filled with a wonderful happiness, the thrill of a wonderful love, and a sweetness that made Kazan lift his head as they came in. He looked straight at them. his red eyes gleaming. At once he knew that she must be dear to his master, for his master's arm was about her. In the glow of the light he saw that her hair was very bright, and that there was the color of the crimson bakneesh vine in her face and the blue of the bakneesh flower in her shining eyes. Suddenly she saw him, and with a little cry darted toward him.

She was on her knees beside him, all fluffy and sweet and beautiful, her eyes shining wonderfully, her hands about to touch him. Should he cringe back? Should he snap? Was she one of the things on the wall, and his enemy? Should he leap at her white throat? He saw the man running forward, pale as death. Then her hand fell upon his head and the touch sent a thrill through him that quivered in every nerve of his body. With both hands she turned up his head. Her face was very close, and he heard her say, almost sobbingly:

"And you are Kazan—dear old Kazan, my hero dog—who brought him home to me when all the others had died! My Kazan—my hero!"

And then, miracle of miracles, her face was crushed down against him, and he felt her sweet warm touch.

In those moments Kazan did not move. He scarcely breathed. It seemed a long time before the girl lifted her face from him. And when she did, there were tears in her blue eyes, and the man was standing above them, his hands gripped tight, his jaws set.

"I never knew him to let any one touch him—with their naked hand," he said in a tense wondering voice. "Move back quietly, Isobel. Good heaven—look at that!"

Kazan whined softly, his bloodshot eyes on the girl's face. He wanted to feel her hand again; he wanted to touch her face. Would they beat him with a club, he wondered, if he dared! He meant no harm now. He would kill for her. He cringed toward her, inch by inch, his eyes never falering. He heard what the man said—"Good heaven! Look at that!"—and he shuddered. But no blow fell to drive him back. His cold muzzle touched her filmy dress, and she looked at him, wihout moving, her wet eyes blazing like stars.

"See!" she whispered. "See!"

Half an inch more—an inch, two inches, and he gave his big gray body a hunch toward her. Now his muzzle travelled slowly upward—over her foot, to her lap, and at last touched the warm little hand that lay there. His eyes were still on her face; he saw a queer throbbing in her bare white throat, and then a trembling of her lips as she looked up at the man with a wonderful look. He, too, knelt down beside them, and put his arm about the girl again, and patted the dog on his head. Kazan did not like the man's touch. He mistrusted it, as nature had taught him to mistrust the touch of all men's hands, but he permitted it because he saw that it in some way pleased the girl.

"Kazan, old boy, you wouldn't hurt her, would you?" said his master softly. "We both love her, don't we, boy? Can't help it, can we? And she's ours, Kazan, all ours! She belongs to you and to me, and we're going to take care of her all our lives, and if we ever have to we'll fight for her like hell—won't we? Eh, Kazan, old boy?"

For a long time after they left him where he was lying on the rug, Kazan's eyes did not leave the girl. He watched and listened—and all the time there grew more and more in him the craving to creep up to them and touch the girl's hand, or her dress, or her foot. After a time his master said something, and with a little laugh the girl jumped up and ran to a big, square, shining thing that stood crosswise in a corner, and which had a row of white teeth longer than his own body. He had wondered what those teeth were for. The girl's fingers touched them now, and all the whispering of winds that he had ever heard, all the music of the waterfalls and the rapids and the trilling of birds in spring-time, could not equal the sounds they made. It was his first music. For a moment it startled and frightened him, and then he felt the fright pass away and a strange tingling in his body. He wanted to sit back on his haunches and howl, as he had howled at the billion stars in the skies on cold winter nights. But something kept him from doing that. It was the girl. Slowly he began slinking toward her. He felt the eyes of the man upon him, and stopped. Then a little more—inches at a time, with his throat and jaw straight along the floor! He was half-way to her—half-way across the room—when the wonderful sounds grew very soft and very low.

"Go on!" he heard the man urge in a low quick voice. "Go on! Don't stop!"

The girl turned her head, saw Kazan cringing there on the floor, and continued to play. The man was still looking, but his eyes could not keep Kazan back now. He went nearer, still nearer, until at last his outreaching muzzle touched her dress where it lay piled on the floor. And then—he lay trembling, for she had begun to sing. He had heard a Cree woman crooning in front of her tepee; he had heard the wild chant of the caribou song—but he had never heard anything like this wonderful sweetness that fell from the lips of the girl. He forgot his master's presence now. Quietly, cringingly, so that she would not know, he lifted his head. He saw her looking at him; there was something in her wonderful eyes that gave him comfidence, and he laid his head in her lap. For the second time he felt the touch of a woman's hand, and he closed his eyes with a long sighing breath. The music stopped. There came a little fluttering sound above him, like a laugh and a sob in one. He heard his master cough.

"I've always loved the old rascal—but I never thought he'd do that," he said; and his voice sounded queer to Kazan.

CHAPTER II.
Into the North

Wonderful days followed for Kazan. He missed the forests and deep snows. He missed the daily strife of keeping his team-mates in trace, the yapping at his heels, the straight long pull over the open spaces and the barrens. He missed the "Koosh—koosh—Hooyah!" of the driver, the spiteful snap of his twenty-foot caribou-gut whip, and that yelping and straining behind him that told him he had his followers in line. But something had come to take the place of that which he missed. It was in the room, in the air all about him, even when the girl or his master was not near. Wherever she had been, he found the presence of that strange thing that took away his lonliness. It was the woman scent, and sometimes it made him whine softly when the girl herself was actually with him. He was not lonely, nights, when he should have been out howling at the stars. He was not lonely, because one night he prowled about until he found a certain door, and when the girl opened that door in the morning she found him curled up tight against it. She had reached down and hugged him, the thick smother of her long hair falling all over him in a delightful perfume; thereafter she placed a rug before the door for him to sleep on. All through the long nights he knew that she was just beyond the door, and he was content. Each day he thought less and less of the wild places, and more of her.

Then there came the beginning of the change. There was a strange hurry and excitement around him, and the girl paid less attention to him. He grew uneasy. He sniffed the change of air, and he began to study his master's face. Then there came the morning, very early, when the babiche collar and the iron chain were fastened to him again. Not until he had followed his master out through the door and into the street did he begin to understand. They were sending him away! He sat suddenly back on his haunches and refused to budge.

"Come, Kazan," coaxed the man. "Come on, boy."

He hung back and showed his white fangs. He expected the lash of a whip or the blow of a club, but neither came. His master laughed and took him back to the house. When they left it again, the girl was with them and walked with her hand touching his head. It was she who persuaded him to leap up through a big dark hole into the still darker interior of a car, and it was she who lured him to the darkest corner of all, where his master fastened his chain. Then they went out, laughing like two children. For hours after that, Kazan lay still and tense, listening to the queer rumble of wheels under him. Several times those wheels stopped, and he heard voices outside. At last he was sure that he heard a familiar voice, and he strained at his chain and whined. The closed door slid back. A man with a lantern climbed in, followed by his master. He paid no attention to them, but glared out through the opening into the gloom of night. He almost broke loose when he leaped down upon the white snow, but when he saw no one there, he stood rigid, sniffing the air. Over him were the stars he had howled at all his life, and about him were the forests, black and silent, shutting them in like a wall. Vainly he sought for that one scent that was missing, and Thorpe heard the low note of grief in his shaggy throat. He took the lantern and held it above his head, at the same time loosening his hold on the leash. At that signal there came a voice from out of the night. It came from behind them, and Kazan whirled so suddenly that the losely held chain slipped from the man's hand. He saw the glow of other lanterns. And then, once more, the voice—

"Kaa-aa-zan!"

He was off like a bolt. Thorpe laughed to himself as he followed.

"The old pirate!" he chuckled.

When he came to the lantern-lighted space back of the caboose, Thorpe found Kazan crouching down at a woman's feet. It was Thorpe's wife. She smiled triumphantly at him as he came up out of the gloom.

"You've won!" he laughed, not unhappily. "I'd have wagered my last dollar he wouldn't do that for any voice on earth. You've won! Kazan you brute, I've lost you!"

"He's yours, Issy," he added quickly, "but you must let me care for him until—we know. Give me the chain. I don't trust him even now. He's a wolf. I've seen him take an Indian's hand off at a single snap. I've seen him tear out another dog's jugular in one leap. He's an outlaw—a bad dog—in spite of the fact that he hung to me like a hero and brought me out alive. I can't trust him. Give me the chain—"

He did not finish. With the snarl of a wild beast Kazan had leaped to his feet. His lips drew up and bared his long fangs. His spine stiffened, and with a sudden cry of warning, Thorpe dropped a hand to the revolver at his belt.

Kazan paid no attention to him. Another form had approached out of the night, and stood now in the circle of illumination made by the lanterns. It was McCready, who was to accompany Thorpe and his young wife back to the Red River camp, where Thorpe was in charge of the building of the new Trans-continental. The man was straight, powerfully built and clean shaven. His jaw was so square that it was brutal, and there was a glow in his eyes that was almost like the passion in Kazan's as he looked at Isobel.

Her red and white stocking-cap had slipped free of her head and was hanging over her shoulder. The dull blaze of the lanterns shone in the warm glow of her hair. Her cheeks were flushed, and her eyes, suddenly turned to him, were as blue as the bluest bakneesh flower and glowed like diamonds. McCready shifted his gaze, and instantly her hand fell on Kazan's head. For the first time the dog did not seem to feel her touch. He still snarled at McCready, the rumbling menace in his throat growing deeper. Thorpes' wife tugged at the chain.

"Down, Kazan—down!" she commanded.

At the sound of her voice he relaxed.

"Down!" she repeated, and her free hand fell on his head again. He slunk to her feet. But his lips were still drawn back. Thorpe was watching him. He wondered at the deadly venom that shot from the wolfish eyes, and looked at McCready. The big guide had uncoiled his long dog-whip. A strange look had come into his face. He was staring hard at Kazan. Suddenly he leaned forward, with both hands on his knees, and for a tense moment or two he seemed to forget that Isobel Thorpe's wonderful blue eyes were looking at him.

"Hoo-kooh, Pedro—charge!"

That one word—charge—was taught only to the dogs in the service of the Northwest Mounted Police. Kazan did not move. McCready straightened, and quick as a shot sent the long lash of his whip curling out into the night with a crack like a pistol report.

"Charge, Pedro—charge!"

The rumble in Kazan's throat deepened to a snarling growl, but not a muscle of his body moved. McCready turned to Thorpe.

"I could have sworn that I knew that dog," he said. "If it's Pedro, he's bad!"

Thorpe was taking the chain. Only the girl saw the look that came for an instant into McCready's face. It made her shiver. A few minutes before, when the train had first stopped at Les Pas, she had offered her hand to this man and she had seen the same thing then. But even as she shuddered she recalled the many things her husband had told her of the forest people. She had grown to love them, to admire their big rough manhood and loyal hearts; before he had brought her among them; and suddenly she smiled at McCready, struggling to overcome that thrill of fear and dislike.

"He doesn't like you," she laughed at him softly. "Won't you make friends with him?"

She drew Kazan toward him, with Thorpe holding the end of the chain. McCready came to her side as she bent over the dog. His back was to Thorpe as he hunched down. Isobel's bowed head within a foot of his face. He could see the glow in her cheek and the pouting curve of her mouth as she quieted the low rumbling in Kazan's throat. Thorpe stood ready to pull back on the chain, but for a moment McCready was between him and his wife, and he could not see McCready's face. The man's eyes were not on Kazan. He was staring at the girl.

"You're brave," he said. "I don't dare do that. He would take off my hand!"

He took the lantern from Thorpe and led the way to a narrow snowpath branching off from the track. Hidden back in the thick spruce was the camp that Thorpe had left a fortnight before. There were two tents there now in place of the one that he and his guide had used. A big fire was burning in front of them. Close to the fire was a long sledge, and fastened to trees just within the outer circle of firelight Kazan saw the shadowy forms and gleaming eyes of his team-mates. He stood stiff and motionless while Thorpe fastened him to a sledge. Once more he was back in his forests—and in command. His mistress was laughing and clapping her hands delightedly in the excitement of the strange and wonderful life of which she had now become a part. Thorpe had thrown back the flap of their tent, and she was entering ahead of him. She did not look back. She spoke no word to him. He whined, and turned his red eyes on McCready.

In the tent Thorpe was saying:

"I'm sorry old Jackpine wouldn't go back with us, Issy. He drove me down, but for love or money I couldn't get him to return. He's a Mission Indian, and I'd give a month's salary to have you see him handle the dogs. I'm not sure about this man McCready. He's a queer chap, the Company's agent here tells me, and knows the woods like a book. But dogs don't like a stranger. Kazan isn't going to take to him worth a cent!"

Kazan heard the girl's voice, and stood rigid and motionless listening to it. He did not hear or see McCready when he came up stealthily behind him. The man's voice came as suddenly as a shot at his heels.

"Pedro!"

In an instant Kazan cringed as if touched by a lash.

"Got you that time—didn't I, you old devil!" whispered McCready, his face strangely pale in the firelight. "Changed your name, eh? But I got you—didn't I?"

CHAPTER III.
McCready Pays the Debt

For a long time after he had uttered those words McCready sat in silence beside the fire. Only for a moment or two at a time did his eyes leave Kazan. After a little, when he was sure that Thorpe and Isobel had retired for the night, he went into his own tent and returned with a flask of whisky. During the next half-hour he drank frequently. Then he went over and sat on the end of the sledge, just beyond the reach of Kazan's chain.

"Got you, didn't I?" he repeated, the effect of the liquor beginning to show in the glitter of his eyes. "Wonder who changed your name, Pedro. And how the devil did he come by you? Ho, ho, if you could only talk—"

In the passion of the moment he seized the whip and sprang upon Kazan.

They heard Thorpe's voice inside the tent. It was followed by a low girlish peal of laughter, and McCready jerked himself erect. His face blazed suddenly red, and he rose to his feet, dropping the flask in his coat pocket. Walking around the fire, he tiptoed cautiously to the shadow of a tree close to the tent and stood there for many minutes listening. His eyes burned with a fiery madness when he returned to the sledge and Kazan. It was midnight before he went into his own tent.

In the farmth of the fire, Kazan's eyes slowly closed. He slumbered uneasily, and his brain was filled with troubled pictures. At times he was fighting, and his jaws snapped. At others he was straining at the end of his chain, with McCready or his mistress just out of reach. He felt the gentle touch of the girl's hand again and heard the wonderful sweetness of her voice as she sang to him and his master, and his body thrembled and twitched with the thrills that had filled him that night. And then the picture changed. He was running at the head of a splendid team—six dogs of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police—and his master was calling him Pedro! The scene shifted. They were in camp. His master was young and smooth-faced and he helped from the sledge another man whose hands were fastened in front of him by curious black rings. Again it was later—and he was lying before a great fire. His master was sitting opposite him, with his back to the tent, and as he looked, there came out of the tent the man with the black rings—only now the rings were gone and his hands were free, and in one of them he carried a heavy club. He heard the terrible blow of the club as it fell on his master's head—and the sound of it aroused him from his restless sleep.

He sprang to his feet, his spine stiffening and a snarl in his throat. The fire had died down and the camp was in the darker gloom that precedes dawn. Through that gloom Kazan saw McCready. Again he was standing close to the tent of his mistress, and he knew now that this was the man who had worn the black iron rings, and that it was he who had beaten him with whip and club for many long days after he had killed his master. McCready heard the menace in his throat and came back quickly to the fire. He began to whistle and draw the half-burned logs together, and as the fire blazed up afresh he shouted to awaken Thorpe and Isobel. In a few minutes Thorpe appeared at the tent-flap and his wife followed him out. Her loose hair rippled in billows of gold about her shoulders and she sat down on the sledge, close to Kazan, and began brushing it. McCready came up behind her and fumbled among the packages on the sledge. As if by accident one of his hands buried itself for an instant in the rich tresses that flowed down her back. She did not at first feel the caressing touch of his fingers, and Thorpe's back was toward them.

Only Kazan saw the stealthy movement of the hand, the fondling clutch of the fingers in her hair, and the mad passion burning in the eyes of the man. Quicker than a lynx, the dog had leaped the length of his chain across the sledge. McCready sprang back just in time, and as Kazan reached the end of his chain he was jerked back so that his body struck sidewise against the girl. Thorpe had turned in time to see the end of the leap. He believed that Kazan had sprung at Isobel, and in his horror no word or cry escaped his lips as he dragged her from where she had half fallen over the sledge. He saw that she was not hurt, and he reached for his revolver. It was in his holster in the tent. At his feet was McCready's whip, and in the passion of the moment he seized it and sprang upon Kazan. The dog crouched in the snow. He made no move to escape or to attack. Only once in his life could he remember having received a beating like that which Thorpe inflicted upon him now. But not a whimper or a growl escaped him.

"Not another blow!" she cried, and something in her voice held him from striking. McCready did not hear what she said then, but a strange look came into Thorpe's eyes, and without a word he followed his wife into their tent.

"Kazan did not leap at me," she whispered, and she was trembling with a sudden excitement. Her face was deathly white. "That man was behind me," she went on, clutching her husband by the arm. "I felt him touch me—and then Kazan sprang. He wouldn't bite me. It's the man! There's something—wrong—"

"I hadn't thought before—but it's strange," he said. "Didn't McCready say something about knowing the dog? It's possible. Perhaps he's had Kazan before and abused him in a way that the dog has not forgotten. Tomorrow I'll find out. But until I know—will you promise to keep away from Kazan?"

Isobel gave the promise. When they came out from the ten Kazan lifted his great head. The stinging lash had closed one of his eyes and his mouth was dripping with blood. Isobel gave a low sob, but did not go near him. Half blinded, he knew that his mistress had stopped his punishment, and he whined softly, and wagged his thick tail in the snow.

Never had he felt so miserable as through the long hard hours of the day that followed, when he broke the trail for his team-mates into the North. One of his eyes was closed and filled with stinging fire, and his body was sore from the blows of the caribou lash. But it was not physical pain that gave the sullen droop to his head and robbed his body of that keen quick alertness of the lead-dog—the commander of his mates. It was his spirit. For the first time in his life, it was broken. McCready had beaten him—long ago; his master had beaten him; and during all this day their voices were fierce and vengeful in his ears. But it was his mistress who hurt him most. She held aloof from him, always beyond the reach of his leash; and when they stopped to rest, and again in camp, she looked at him with strange and wondering eyes, and did not speak. She, too, was ready to beat him. He believed that, and so slunk away from her and crouched on his belly in the snow. With him, a broken spirit meant a broken heart, and that night he lurked in one of the deepest shadows about the camp-fire and grieved alone. None knew that it was grief—unless it was the girl. She did not move toward him. She did not speak to him. But she watched him closely—and studied him hardest when he was looking at McCready.

Later, after Thorpe and his wife had gone into their tent, it began to snow, and the effect of the snow upon McCready puzzled Kazan. The man was restless, and he drank frequently from the flask that he had used the night before. In the firelight his fact grew redder and redder, and Kazan could see the strange gleam of his teeth as he gazed at the tent in which his mistress was sleeping. Again and again he went close to that tent, listened. Twice he heard movement. The last time, was the sound of Thorpe's deep breathing. McCready hurried back to the fire and turned his face straight up to the sky. The snow was falling so thickly that when he lowered his face he blinked and wiped his eyes. Then he went out into the gloom and bent low over the trail they had made a few hours before. It was almost obliterated by the falling snow. Another hour and there would be no trail—nothing the next day to tell whoever might pass that they had come this way. By morning it would cover everything, even the fire, if he allowed it to die down. McCready drank again, out in the darkness. Low words of an insane joy burst from his lips. His head was hot with a drunken fire. His heart beat madly, but scarcely more furiously than did Kazan's when the dog saw that McCready was returning with a club! The club he placed on end against a tree. Then he took a lantern from the sledge and lighted it. He approached Thorpe's tent-flap, the lantern in his hand.

"Ho, Thorpe—Thorpe!" he called.

There was no answer. He could hear Thorpe breathing. He drew the flap aside a little, and raised his voice.

"Thorpe!"

Still there was no movement inside, and he untied the flap strings and thrust in his lantern. The ligth flashed on Isabel's golden head, and Mcready stared at it, his eyes burning like red coals, until he saw that Thorpe was awakening. Quickly he dropped the flap and rustled it from the outside.

"Ho, Thorpe!—Thorpe!" he called again.

This time Thorpe replied.

"Hello, McCready—is that you?"

McCready drew the flap back a little, and spoke in a low voice.

"Yes. Can you come out a minute? Something's happening out in the woods. Don't wake up your wife!"

He drew back and waited. A minute later Thorpe came quietly out of the tent. McCready pointed into the thick spruce.

"I'll swear there's some one hosing around the camp," he said. "I'm certain that I saw a man out there a few minutes ago, when I went for a log. It's a good night for stealing dogs. Here—you take the lantern! If I wasn't clean fooled, we'll find a trail in the snow."

He gave Thorpe the lantern and picked up the heavy club. A growl rose in Kazan's throat, but he choked it back. He wanted to snarl forth his warning, to leap at the end of his leash, but he knew that if he did that, they would return and beat him. So he lay still, trembling and shivering, and whinning softly. He watched them until they disappeared—and then waited—listened. At last he heard the crunch of snow. He was not surprised to see McCready come back alone. He had expected him to return alone. For he knew what a club meant!

McCready's face was terrible now. It was like a beast's. He was hatless. Kazan slunk deeper in his shadow at the low horrible laugh that fell from his lips—for the man still held the club. In a moment he dropped that, and approached the tent. He drew back the flap and peered in. Thorpe's wife was sleeping, and as quietly as a cat he entered and hung the lantern on a nail in the tent-pole. His movement did not awaken her, and for a few moments he stood there, staring—staring.

Out side, crouching in the deep shadow, Kazan tried to fathom the meaning of these strange things that were happening. Why had his master and McCready gone out into the forest? Why had not his master returned? It was his master, and not McCready, who belonged in that tent. Then why was McCready there? He watched McCready as he entered, and suddenly the dog was on his feet, his back tense and bristling, his limbs rigid. He saw McCready's huge shadow on the canvas, and a moment later there came a strange piercing cry. In the wild terror of that cry he recognised her voice—and he leaped toward the tent. The leash stopped him, choking the snarl in his throat. He saw the shadows struggling now, and there came cry after cry. She was calling to his master, and with his master's name she was calling him!

"Kazan—Kazan—"

He leaped again, and was thrown upon his back. A second and a third time he sprang the length of the leash into the night, and the cord about his neck cut into his flesh like a knife. He stopped for an instant, gasping for breath. The shadows were still fighting. Now they were upright! Now they were crumpling down! With a fierce snarl he flung his whole weight once more at the end of the chain. There was a snap, as the thong about his neck gave way.

In half a dozen bounds Kazan made the tent and rushed under the flap. With a snarl he was at McCready's throat. The first snap of his powerful jaws was death, but he did not know that. He knew only that his mistress was there, and that he was fighting for her. There came one choking gasping cry that ended with a terrible sob; it was McCready. The man sank from his knees upon his back, and Kazan thrust his fangs deeper into his enemy's throat till he felt the warm blood.

The dog's mistress was calling to him now. She was pulling at his shaggy neck. But he would not loose his hold—not for a long time. When he did, his mistress looked down once upon the man and covered her face with her hands. Then she sank down upon the blankets. She was very still. Her face and hands were cold, and Kazan muzzled them tenderly. Her eyes were closed. He snuggled up close against her, with his ready jaws

The Cub second baseman, Larry Doyle, has come around in great shape and is playing like a whirlwind at the keystone sack for Fred Mitchell's charges. Larry could always whale the ball and is sustaining his reputation in fine style.

Good Pitchers Who Can Hit Are Very Scarce

Pitchers who can hit are as scarce as Liberty Bonds in Berlin. When a team has a flinger in the game who is reliable in making a base hit or even making a sacrifice fly, it has an extremely valuable performer.

Take two teams of about the same strength, with the rival pitchers of about equal ability. One of the pitchers, however, can hit while the other curver is a joke at the bat.

If the two teams are going at their normal gait, it is a safe wager that the aggregation with nine hitters in the line-up is going to win the game.

Alexander the Great, of the Phils; Babe Ruth, of the Red Sox; Walter Johnson, of Washington, and Ray Caldwell, of the Yankees, are not only mighty hurlers of the sphere, but they add much to their value because they can hit the ball hard.

It is always a hard day's work for a pitcher toiling in a game, when the opposing flinger is no rally gummer at bat. It means that he is no soft spot for him in the battle. He must go at high pressure all the time.

If the competing pitcher is one of those helpless individuals whose efforts in an offensive way are laughable, it makes it easier for the other slinger. If hard pressed, he can walk the catcher purposely and feel fairly certain that he can fan the pitcher, who is next at bat, or make him hit into a double play.

How many rallies have you seen spoiled by flingers who are as helpless as a canary bird in a gamecock fight when asked to bat?

Alexander the Great is good for twenty-five triumphs or more each season with the Phils. But if Alexander couldn't bat, his wins would not be quite so large as they are.

Next to Gabby Cravath, Alexander is probably the surest hitter on the Phil team in a pinch. No batsman wastes his hits less than Alexander. If you dissect his record you will find that his bat has a great deal to do with his own victories. Last season he won a number of 1-to-0 and 2-to-1 tilts, in which he batted home the winning run.

This season, he has been a menace to his opponents with the bat as well as with the arm. When Alexander the Great goes to the tee, Pat Moran always yells to his opponents:

"Well, we have nine hitters in there today!" This is a warning that has a psychological effect on the other pitcher, particularly when he is a cipher with the bat.

A team will welcome a good pitcher even if he cannot be expected to help in the attack, but when he can hit as well as pitch, then that club has a jewel indeed.

AUTOS FOR HOUSEWIFE PROVES ECONOMICAL

The automobile is taking the place of the old market basket. Housewives who have the use of autos can do their shopping whenever they wish, and in as short a time as they wish. It is easy to comprehend that such wives are saving time and at the same time have a chance to see all the grocery stores and markets which they could not do if they had to walk.

No use arguing, the automobile is proving the most efficient and economical means to help "keep down the cost of living."

ONE-ARMED ATHLETE

Windham, Maine.—Charles S. Foley, one-armed outfielder, has accepted 26 chances without an error and hit for .428 in seven games this season with the South Windham baseball team. Foley lost his right arm when run over by a trolley car ten years ago, but kept on playing ball. Foley has stolen 13 bases and made four sacrifice hits. He is also a basketball and football player. He has scored nine runs in seven games and on May 3 made four hits in five times up, scoring three runs.

CAMPING IN ROCKY MT. PARK

Mr. J. B. Harkin, commissioner of Dominion parks branch, Ottawa, advises that an area of ground has been set apart this summer near the junction of the Bow and Spray rivers at Banff, as a public camp site. The ground is subdivided into lots and anyone who wishes to camp will be able to secure a permit for the use of one of these lots at the rent of $1 per month per tent. An area for parking automobiles is set aside also in connection with this site.

One hour of the present is worth two in the future and a hundred in the past.

Calgary Horses Led At Brandon Fair

Guy. Boy,. Expay. and Peter R., All Local Steeds, Took First Three Places

Brandon, Man., July 18.—Splendid racing was provided Tuesday. The 2.12 pace was the feature event and was hotly contested. The Brandon horse, Dick Mayburn, proved to be in splendid condition, and won in three straight heats. The following is the summary:

2:20 Trot

Guy Boy, br.h., James Stewart, Calgary	1	1	1
Expay, b.h., Jack Stewart, Calgary	3	2	2

LICORICE BALL IS SAID TO BE ILLEGAL

Charges were preferred against Cy Falkenberg, alleged inventor of the emery ball, by Manager Lee Fohl, of the Cleveland Indians. The manager says this veteran has a "licorice ball" which is illegal. Cy, it is said, hurls a floater or sailor by moistening the ball with a bit of licorice, which dries into a smooth, shiny spot. Umpire Billy Evans has reported the charge to President Johnson and sent along a ball duly moistened.

THE BIG LEAGUER

Old Ty fades out, and Speaker's fame
Is drifting swiftly now;
E. Collins no more wears a frame
Of laurel on his brow;
The new stars now who rule the skit
And strike the winning blow,
Step out upon the field and hit
Three Hundred with the hoe.

The polished bat is out of date,
A remnant of the past;
The stars who slide across the plate
No longer lead the cast;
For now, along the rolling flat,
We hear the cheering grow
For stalwarts who step out to bat
Three Hundred with the hoe.

'Raus mit the cheering and acclaim
And let the old clods fly—
Come on and swing into the game
And build the Hoeing Eye!
For each one still may do his bit
Apart from Rooters' Row
If he is poised to swing and hit
Three Hundred with the hoe.

GIBSON IS WAITING

New York.—"Billy" Gibson, manager of Benny Leonard, received a wire from "Doc" Kone, a Chicago promoter, in which the latter offered $20,000 for Leonard to box Charlie White 20 rounds to a decision in the west, on Labor day afternoon. Gibson will not give an answer until Leonard's battle with Featherweight Champion Kilbane at Shibe park, Philadelphia, one week from Wednesday night.

ONE CAR FOR EVERY ELEVEN PERSONS IN IOWA

Washington, D.C.—Iowa led the United States in 1916 in the number of motor cars registered in proportion to population. She had one car for every 11 persons. California was a close second with 1 car to every 12 inhabitants. Nebraska and South Dakota had 1 for every 13. Arkansas could show but 1 for every 116. The average for the United States is 1 car for every 29 persons, according to figures presented by the Office of Public Roads, United States Department of Agriculture, in circular 73, "Automobile Registrations, Licenses and Revenue in the United States, 1916."

The New England States were more uniformly supplied with motor cars than any other section. They averaged 1 car to about every 27 persons. The prosperous corn belt states also showed a fairly uniform distribution of cars. The south, which does not possess as great mileage of improved public roads as other sections of the country, had relatively fewer cars in proportion to population.

TWO VALUABLE PRIZES GIVEN AWAY TO BEST PLAYERS

Bob Boyle, of the Grain Exchange Bowling alleys, has offered a beautiful trophy to the player in the S.P.A. making the greatest number of safe hits. The prize is a silver-mounted baseball bat and ball—a beautiful decoration for the player's den, worth about $40.

D. E. Black, has also offered a gold medal for the best all-round fielding and batting average in the league this season.

DOWN ON THE FARM

It is reported that a Lethbridge automobile dealer has ordered a million dollars' worth of cars for the southern Alberta farmers. Southern Alberta has had two immense crops and expects a record one again this year, with the result that farmers are investing in gee-gees.

Things An Autoist Should Know

Wartime Economy

Cars, nowadays, are made in such a way that they will run on a poor grade of gasoline, or even kerosene. If only the car owners had wit enough to experiment they would find that most cars would run on a mixture of half gasoline and half kerosene or all kerosene, but they are afraid. See what a saving it would be? Try a gallon. The important items of expense in connection with autos is fuel and tires. Tires are much higher now but by increased mileage that extra expense is overcome. The slightest thread cuts should be plugged up right away.

Cone Clutch Slippage

While Fuller's earth is the usual substance employed to stop cone clutch slippage, in the absence of it, talcum powder may prove beneficial. Often the slippage is due to poor pedal adjustment. The pedal if permitted to touch the floor boards might cause it. When the leather is dry and shiny application of neatsfoot oil is the most common remedy. There are two clutch bearings which should be well lubricated—the thrust bearing at the rear of the clutch shaft and the throw-out collar bearing.

Avoiding Alkali Dust

This western country is covered in places with alkali and when cars pass over such sections the dust rises and settles in the carburetor, giving rise to carburetor troubles. The small particles clog the carburetor and keep the engine from working as it should. A record-breaking car driver avoided all this trouble by causing the carburetor to draw all of its air from a point under the cowl where the air is free from alkali dust. To do this the hot air tube of the carburetor was removed and a longer one substituted. the latter being carried through the dash.

Preserving the Hood Finish

Many car owners get disappointed with their cars when, a short time after they get the car, the finish on the hood becomes dull, while the other sections retain the bright finish. It is hard to get the bright finish on the hood if it once becomes dull so the best thing to do is to keep it bright. Some owners find that by lining the hood with asbestos, keeps the engine heat from the hood, thus preserving the bright lustre. If the hood gets very warm keep water away from it for that is very detrimental.

How to Clean The Motor Car

Here are some good suggestions on keping the auto in good shape:

Good-looking automobiles are just as important to the appearance of a city as good-loking lawns, back yards and vacant lots.

While several columns of advice might be given to the driver-owner, the following "ten commandments" will cover the subject nicely and tell what atention should be given "the old bus":

First—See that the gasoline tank contains a sufficient quantity of gasoline; that there is plenty of oil in the crank case; that the radiator is filled with water, and that the tires are properly inflated.

Second—Lift hood and inspect fan belt, hose connections, ignition, wiring, coil and spark plugs. Fill the storage battery with distilled water to proper level in each cell, Oil the valve stems and push rods. Inspect oil pump and fittings for possible leaks.

Third—Screw down grease cups on front springs and front axle. See that the nuts on the spring bolts are tight. Keep the spring clip nuts tight. Fill steering gear housing with soft grease.

Fourth—Remove floor boards and oil gear shifting mechanism, clutch and brake mechanism. Inspect clutch leather and if dry, apply neatsfoot oil. Oil all clevis pins.

Fifth—Screw down grease cups on rear springs and see that spring bolt nuts are tight. Inspect transmission and differential housing for loose nuts or bolts. Examine the brakes and screw down grease cups over brake shafts on rear axle.

Sixth—Inspect body bolts and fender bolts. Fill all grease cups with good grade of medium-weight grease. Keep the wheel rims free from mud and sharp edges. Keep the body and fenders free from mud.

Seventh—Occasionally jack up car under frame, pry the spring leaves apart with a heavy screw driver and lubricate between leaves with graphite mixed with oil. Keep transmission case and differential housing two-thirds filled with good grade of medium-gravity grease.

Eighth—Occasionally drain oil from crank case and then flush out crank case by pouring through a pint or so of two or three tablespoons of kerosene in each cylinder to cut carbon, and let stand over night.

Ninth—Strain the gasoline, if possible, when filling tank. More care should be given to straining if the car is equipped with a vacuum feed system. Drain small amount of gasoline from storage tank in order to remove sediment. The strainer screen inside of top connection from vacuum tank should also be cleaned.

Tenth—Wash the car thoroughly. Makers of fine bodies recommend that cold water be used solely; but if soap is used, letit pure soap, free from alkali and other chemicals that are injurious to the finish. After every vestige of dirt has been removed, rub dry in long sweeping strokes; don't use a circular motion. Avoid the use of furniture or kindred polishes; a hard wax, something like that used on floors, is best for polishing purposes. This should be allowed to dry for about five minutes, and then rubbed well. Upholstery can be washed well with pure soap soda and then rinsed well with clean water.

If a foreign or unfamiliar noise develops, satisfy yourself as to what it is; neglecting this may result disastrously.

AUTO LICENSE REVENUE SPENT ON ROADS

Washington, D.C.—In 1916 there were 1,067,332 more motor cars registered in the United States than in 1915, an increase of 43 per cent. The gross total of registered cars, including commercial cars, was 3,512,996; the number of motorcycles registered was 250,820.

States collected in registration and license fees $25,865,369.75, of this $23,910,811 was applied directly to construction, improvement or maintenance of the public roads in forty-three states, according to figures compiled by the office of public roads.

Many a man would never be missed if his wife didn't throw things at him.

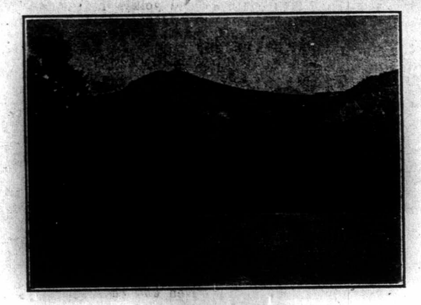
THE AUTO DRIVES DULL CARE AWAY

The auto fills a long-felt want,
For it enables us to jaunt
Far from the city streets,
And we can breathe the country air,
And hear the toil-worn farmer swear,
And watch him husking beets.

Before the auto made its bow,
We seldom looked upon a cow,
Or saw a setting hen;
And all we knew of babbling brooks,
And sylvan dells, we learned from books.

The country seemed so far away!
And when we'd toiled the long, sad day,
We could not journey there;
We stifled in our dismal rooms,
Amid the city's smell and fumes,
And longed for country air.

The auto's brought the country near;
And from our foreheads disappear
The furrows and the frown;
And we can take our wilting wives,
And put some sunshine in their lives,
By jogging out of town.



Oh, we can seek the rural vales,
And see the cattle wag their tails,
And hear the roosters crow;
And we can drink the country breeze,
And wind our car around the trees,
And chortle as we go.

The auto is a boon to men;
It's making old gents young again,
It keeps us all enthused;
It makes each day a holiday,
It drives the cares of life away—
When it is sanely used.

How to Beat the High Cost of Living

DON'T WASTE THEIR RICHES

Women Who Inherit Millions Show Ability as Managers

In the adage crop of the world there is a saying that it takes three generations to make a gentleman and the same number to dissipate a fortune. This old saying came into being before the time when American women began to take charge of inherited millions.

Instead of wasting money upon cocktails, highballs queens of the chorus and the gaming tables, the woman of millions, who has been called upon to make the best if widowhood, has added to the fruits of philanthropy and to the uplift of the human race.

A score of large fortunes have been left to women in the last decade. Not one of them has abused the trust, and there isn't a petticoated spendthrift among them.

They range from women of age and experience to women who are young and beautiful, and in every case the delegated fortune has gone its decent way, unsullied by crime, transgression against the social, moral or criminal laws, or family disgrace.

Rich Women Are Generous

Take the case of Mrs. E. H. Harriman, known as America's richest woman. She got her fortune in one of the shortest wills that ever went into court. It merely handed over to her the entire properties of the railroad building wizard of his time.

As a stewardess of her late husband's estate, she has thus far made the following bequests:

Bear Mountain Park, the 10,000-acre tract near West Point, valued at one million dollars, she gave to the state of New York.

She gave $200,000 to Trinity school for an athletic field.

She gave $60,000 to test a new serum to combat typhoid.

She is now planning a university memorial to her husband, to be called the Edward H. Harriman university.

Mrs. Russell Sage, the dean of American widows of multimillionaires, celebrated her 88th birthday last September at her home in Lawrence, L. I.

Through the death of her husband she came into 70 million dollars. During the lifetime of her husband it was said that he never contributed a cent to charity.

If this is true, then Mrs. Sage is making up for what he failed to do. Her largest benefaction was the gift of ten million dollars to the Sage foundation for Social Benefit.

Youngest Manager of Millions

Mrs. Tom Shevlin is the youngest multimillionairess. When Tom Shevlin, the greatest halfback ever produced at Yale, died, he left a fortune estimated at 65 million dollars.

Since the death of her husband Mrs. Shevlin has devoted herself entirely to the care of her two little children and the management of the vast estate.

She is interested in most of the charitable institutions in St. Paul and in a number of institutions in KKentucky, where, as Miss Elizabeth Sherley, she was considered one of the beauties of the Blue Grass state.

Others in the list include Mrs. Seth Low, Mrs. William Copley Thaw, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, Mrs. John D. Archbold and Mrs. J. Borden Harriman.

FOR THE CAKE-MAKER

Chocolate Cake

One cup of sugar, scant half-cup of butter beaten smooth, then add one egg and beat again, one cup of sour milk. Stir into the milk one teaspoon soda, add one and one-half cups of flour and three teaspoons of cocoa sifted in together. Last add the vanilla.

Spice Cake

Two cups of sugar, two cups of sour milk, one-half cup of molasses, one-half cup of lard, one cup of chopped raisins, five cups of flour, two and one-half teaspoons of soda, one teaspoon of all kinds of spice, a little salt.

Chocolate Cake

Take three tablespoons cocoa or chocolate, yolk of one egg; reserve the white for boiled frosting if liked; one-half cup milk. Put this on stove and let thicken; set in a dish of cold water to cool. This is the chocolate part.

White part: One cup sugar, piece of butter size of walnut worked into sugar with the hands, one-half cup milk, one and one-half cups flour, sifted twice. Add chocolate part to this, beat well; next add one teaspoon soda dissolved in a tablespoon warm water. Mix together well; bake in moderate oven. It is done when it will not cling to a straw.

Pork Cake

One cup sugar, one cup molasses, two eggs, one cup finely-chopped pork, one cup boiling water poured over it and let stand until the pork is soft; one teaspoon cinnamon, one teaspoon cloves, one teaspoon allspice, one cup currants, one cup raisins, one cup citron, one teaspoon saleratus, four cups flour. It makes three good-sized loaves and is an excellent fruit cake.

Sponge Cake

Four eggs; beat separately the whites and yolks; add to the whites one cup sugar; add to the yolks one teaspoon vinegar; put the yolks with the whites and one cup sifted flour. Bake 30 minutes.

Layer Cake

One cup sugar, piece of butter, two eggs, one-half cup milk, two teaspoons cream tartar, one and one-half cups flour, one teaspoon soda in hot water; flavor with lemon. A nice, inexpensive cake.

Lily Cake

One-third cup of butter, one cup of sugar, one-half cup of milk, one and three-quarters cups of flour, two and one-half teaspoons of baking powder, three whites of eggs, one-third teaspoon of lemon extract, two-thirds teaspoon of vanilla. Mix in order given and cook 40 minutes.

Economical Fruit Cake

One cup molasses, two tablespoons of lard or butter, one cup of hot water, one teaspoon soda and little salt, two cups flour, one-half cup raisins, one-half cup currants and spices if desired. Make one loaf.

Strawberry Salad

Have nice lettuce leaves from the center of a head (using outside leaves for Dutch salad); make a cup out of the lettuce leaves by crossing the stems; heap a few berries in the center. Sugar, and put a teaspoon of mayonnaise dressing on each portion.

Strawberry Cornstarch

4 cups milk.
1½ cups sugar.
½ cup cornstarch.
½ teaspoon salt.
1 teaspoon vanilla extract.
2 cups crushed strawberries.

Put three cups of the milk in top part of double boiler, and as soon as it comes to a boil add the cornstarch, which has been mixed with the fourth cup of milk; add slowly, stirring constantly, add the salt, vanilla, ½ cup sugar. Boil 15 minutes, stirring constantly; pour into a bowl or mold and set aside to cool. The individual cups are very nice, as the cornstarch sets and cools quickly. Serve with the crushed strawberries, that have been mixed with the other cup of sugar.

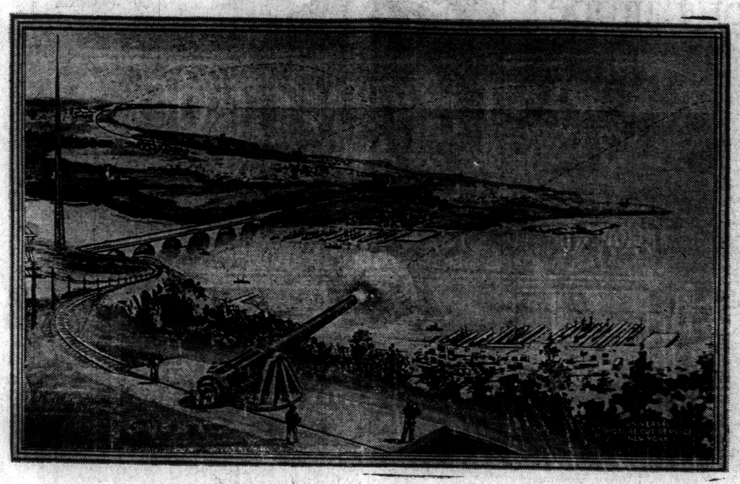
Beans a la Mexicana



For this Mexican dish, soak one cup cup of black Mexican beans all night; then boil with two tiny red peppers and two cloves of garlic until the beans are tender enough to mash. Drain, mash and add pepper, salt, butter and a little cream; serve the beans in the center of a dish surrounded by plain boiled rice. A smooth, rich tomato sauce may be served with them if desired.

Rice a la Conde

One-fourth pound Carolina rice, two ounces butter, three ounces sifted sugar, one pint milk, one tin apricots or peaches, one teaspoonful vanilla essence, cherries and angelica. Wash the rice thoroughly in cold water, put into a pan of cold water and bring to a boil, then pour away the water. Add the milk and stir until boiling, then cook slowly for three-quarters of an hour, stirring occasionally. Add the butter, sugar and vanilla, and turn into a bordered mould—one with a hole in the center—and set aside to cool. When cold turn out, fill the center with apricots or peaches and decorate with cherries and angelica. The peaches should be cut in half and the juice poured around.

THE TRAINING OF A GOOD HUSBAND

They had been married about three months and had been very cozy and happy in their boulevard apartment, when John began slipping back into his bachelor habit of taking supper, now and then, down town and coming home along about 10 or 11 o'clock with one plausible excuse and another framed up after the old client-from-out-of-town pattern.

But he would always faithfully phone the little woman about it. In fact, he would phone her twice, once about 5 o'clock to tell her that he couldn't possibly get home to supper that night and then again, along about 8 o'clock, to ask whether she was at all lonesome, or something to that effect. That last phone call began to worry her a little. Not that she was at all suspicious of John—she was a sensible, quiet little woman with trustful brown eyes—but she just got to wondering a little why he should think it necessary to phone her about nothing in particular that second time. Somewhere, some time, she had read that men did such things to make sure that their wives were really at home and not, by chance, on a little trip down town on their own account. She thought she detected a note of apprehension in John's voice, at times, that could not be entirely accounted for on the ground of solicitude. Once or twice she was really tempted to drop downtown after the 8 o'clock call some night and give John a pleasant surprise at the office. But she didn't. She just kept on thinking quietly about the matter, but said nothing.

At first it only happened one or two nights of the week. But John gradually "hunched" on the little woman, as his confidence grew, until he had business down town about every other night. Still she didn't complain. She wasn't the nagging kind. She just kept on thinking, but always she met him with a sweet, trusting smile, on his return home in the late hours, with the usual remark about how tired he must be. Then, after much patience and silent worry, she reached one of those eternal feminine determinations to put a stop to it, and she did it in her own eternal feminine way. And here's how:

She had made some acquaintances in the apartment building—some that her husband had never met. There was a young couple upstairs that she had chummed up a little with. They were in her apartment one night when the usual 8 o'clock call came in. She turned sweetly to the man and said:

"You answer it—just tell him that he got the wrong number—it's somebody that calls up here every night about this time."

The man did as he was bid and did it man fashion—"Get off the line; you're in the wrong pew."

In a few minutes hubby called again and this time the little woman answered the call.

"Why, no, dear, not a soul. I guess it's somebody got in on the line," she said. "Will you be home soon, dear?"

Every night that the couple upstairs happened to call, she let the man answer the 8 o'clock call. The third night that this happened hubby came home at 9 o'clock rather unexpectedly. The young couple upstairs had only stopped in a few minutes and had gone out to the picture show. He gave a quick glance around his apartments and then one at his wife, as she gave him the usual late honeymoon kiss, saying:

"Oh, I'm so glad you come, dear. I have been rather lonesome."

"There's some gink breaks in on our line every time I try to telephone you," said the husband. "It's got to be quite an annoyance."

"I'm sure I can't imagine who it could be," she said demurely. "There's no one on our line, is there?"

"No. But it looks kind of funny that it should happen so often and you'd think he owned the company, the way he talks."

His next night out, he didn't 'phone at all, but came home about 7.30 o'clock. He sat around in his smoking jacket until 8 o'clock and then proposed that they go downtown to the show.

He took supper at home for several evenings after that and one night the young couple upstairs came in. On being introduced and hearing the man's voice, a puzzled frown came over John's brow, but he said nothing. Only he gave his wife a suspicious look, which she met with a smile of infantile innocence.

And now they all play whist together almost every night and hubby's business down town has dwindled away to nothing.

EGGS ON THE MENU!

Boil enough water to cover an egg, adding to each half-pint one tablespoonful of vinegar (no salt). When the water boils dip the whole egg under it for two seconds only. Take it out at once, break the shell, and, holding the egg just above the surface of the water, break it open and allow the egg to slip into the water. This prevents the splashing which is the cause of the spreading out of the egg and the spoiling of the shape of it. The heating of the egg in water for two seconds renders the albumen near the shell liquid, and the whole egg drops out without any of it hanging to the shell.

FORGET IT

If you see a tall fellow ahead of the crowd,
A leader of men, marching fearless and proud,
And you know of a tale whose mere telling aloud
Would cause his proud head to in anguish be bowed,
It's a pretty good plan to forget it.

If you know of a skeleton hidden away
In a closet and guarded and kept from the day
In the dark; and whose showing, whose sudden display,
Would cause grief and sorrow and lifelong dismay,
It's a pretty good plan to forget it.

If you know of a thing that will darken the joy
Of a man or a woman, a girl or a boy,
That will wipe out a smile, or the least way annoy
A fellow or cause any gladness to cloy,
It's a pretty good plan to forget it.
—Judd Mortimer Lewis.

VIVE LA FRANCE

By Oliver Wendell Holmes.

The land of sunshine and of song!
Her name your hearts divine;
To her the banquet's vows belong
Whose breasts have poured its wine;
Our trusty friend, our true ally
Through varied change and chance;
So, fill your flashing goblets high,
I give you, VIVE LA FRANCE!

Above our hosts in triple-folds
The selfsame colors spread,
Where Valor's faithful arm upholds
The blue, the white, the red;
Alike each nation's glittering crest
Reflects the morning's glance,
Twin eagles, soaring east and west:
Once more, then, VIVE LA FRANCE!

Sister in trial! who shall count
Thy generous friendship's claim,
Whose blood ran mingling in the fount
That gave our land its name,
Till Yorktown saw in blended line
Our conquering arms advance,
And victory's double garlands twine
Our banners! VIVE LA FRANCE!

O land of heroes! in our need
One gift from heaven we crave
To stanch these wounds that vainly bleed—
The wise to lead the brave!
Call back one captain of thy past
From glory's marble trance,
Whose name shall be a bugle blast
To rouse us! VIVE LA FRANCE!

Belts Are Narrower Than Ever

Meanwhile, we are in favor of the belt. It must be loose, this belt. We know not, as it were, whence it comes nor where it is going this narrow girdle, but no frock is complete without it. A new frock of blue serge from Jenny has a straight chemise with a plaited skirt attached to the middle of the front of the frock by a single button—one of an upright row—and droops carelessly in the back. The belt of this is only a little less wide than the frock itself, to which it adds a smart little touch. Some of the newest belts are not tied in the fashion so popular for several seasons. Instead, the ends disappear under a convenient plait or fold.

Frocks which have come over from Paris since the openings are almost chemise like in form. Straight to the hips, they are girdled easily a few inches above the plaited skirt, which is attached to the straight top by means of a simple seam.

DO YOU KNOW—

That if you anoint the hot water bag frequently with glycerine it will be kept free of cracks?

That you can make a dustless duster by wringing out pieces of cheesecloth in hot water and saturating with crude oil.

That tea leaves moistened with vinegar will remove the discoloration in glass caused by flowers?

That a few thin slices of white soap added to the water before putting flowers in will keep them fresh twice as long?

That one tablespoon of ground pepper and two tablespoons of brown sugar mixed with enough cream to make a smooth paste will kill flies and won't hurt the cat?

That a magnet will attract a hook and eye which is liable to rust while it rejects the non-liable ones? So a magnet is a handy tool for the sewing basket.

The Whimsical Kingdom of Europe Where a King Pays for his Throne

PROBABLY you've never heard of Liechtenstein, the whimsical Lilliputian kingdom of the Alps which is hedged around by the battle lines in Europe. Queerest little nation of the world is Liechtenstein, a mere handful of earth in the Alps. And its king—just imagine it—instead of drawing a salary for his services, pays his subjects for the privilege of ruling them!

Theoretically Liechtenstein is at war with Prussia and has been ever since 1866. Actually, so far as is known, only one Liechtenstein is now under arms. He is the son of the present ruler, John II, and is fighting against the French and British. But more about Liechtenstein's first and last war—its expedition of 1866—later on.

Liechtenstein is a valley, nearly as smooth as the top of a billiard table, of sixty-eight square miles. It is wedged in between Switzerland and Austria, with the River Rhine skirting its western boundary, and is but a few miles from the German frontier. It is protected from its neighbors by the Alps, sheer walls of rocks rising from the valley as a base. Thousands of American tourists, traveling through the Swiss cantons, Grisons and St. Gall, have looked out of the car windows without suspecting that between these mountains and the Austrian Alps to the north lay one of the oldest kingdoms of Europe. Few foreigners have been in Liechtenstein. And the Liechtensteiners are glad to have it so.

Founded By Money Lender

The midget nation has played no part in the political world. For centuries it has minded its own business and kept its fingers from being burnt. Able to exist without help from the outside world, it has just about done so. Yet the story of its past goes back to the Twelfth century.

The founder of the house of Liechtenstein was a lively and enterprising Lombard. This adventurer arrived in what is now Germany in the Twelfth Century. He was there to make his fortune and began by marrying a thrifty little princess of the house of Schwaben. The young couple had not the slightest decimal of principality, but soon had a flock of children to educate and provide for.

The husband took what little money he could save and embarked on the career of an usurer whenever occasion presented itself. "Great oaks from little acorns grow," as the old third grade copybooks said. So in time the shrewd Lombard was lending to princes and kings, who usually were in want of money. The husband was glad to let the princes have money, provided they furnished proper security.

When settlement time came it often wasn't convenient for the princes to pay cash, and they often closed their debts by paying the Lombard with small strips of land, or by conferring titles on him, privileges, royal honors, and other similar trappings which go with royalty. When there was no land the Lombard wisely shrugged his shoulders, smiled and took the trappings.

And so for several generations the descendants of the original Lombard kept up the loan business he had established. They also invested the profits in real estate, and even today the ruler owns much land in Austria and Germany. The noblest German families did not frown on having sons-in-law from this family of money lenders. It often proved convenient. And so in time the Liechtensteiners, as the descendants of the original Lombard were called, found some of the bluest blood of Germany in their veins.

In 1614 an emperor ceded to them, in settlement of pecuniary claims, the principality of Troppau, in Schlesien. Another emperor canceled his debt by adding to it the principality of Jagendorff. Next the title of "Prince of the Holy Roman Empire" was conferred on the head of the family, who then purchased two districts adjoining those the emperors had given him and founded the Kingdom of Liechtenstein.

The Loyal Subjects "Kick"

Nothing more was heard of the kingdom until the Congress of Vienna met in the early part of the Nineteenth Century to readjust the face of Europe after Napoleon had made all existing maps out of date. The congress resolved to maintain Liechtenstein as a sovereign and independent state, with a vote in the German confederation. In return for these advantages Liechtenstein was to furnish ninety men and one drummer to the federal army each year. Keep your eye on the drummer. He and the other ninety come back into the scene later.

Now the Liechtensteiners are a peaceable people, and were even then. They numbered some five or six thousand at the time of the congress. And they were not then, nor ever have been, impressed with awe for autocrats. So the year after the congress met, the inhabitants addressed themselves to their sovereign, John I, and declared with rustic frankness that they had no objection to being ruled by him, since the congress had decided so, but that they found it entirely unnecessary to pay any salary to him or his civil list. Also they argued they were too few in number to contribute ninety men and a drummer to the federal army every year.

Prince John was immensely rich and had a rare sense of humor. He told his subjects that he could do without a salary, and that he would make an agreement with the Austrian government whereby the latter would undertake to furnish the ninety and one together with its own contingent to the army. The loyal subjects declared themselves pleased and all went well for some fifteen years.

In 1836 Prince Aloysius I ascended the throne. In the meanwhile the natives of Liechtenstein had thought if over and decided that a prince, even tives of Liechtenstein had thought, it penses on his country in the way of festivals, solemn audiences, illuminations and fireworks. Accordingly they sent a deputation to their new lord and master and made it obvious to him that he must indemnify the country for all expenses of such nature.

Aloysius I also had a sense of humor. He admitted the claims of his subjects concerning an annual indemnity, which he paid with exemplary regularity. He loaded the delegation with valuable gifts and sent them home rejoicing.

The Liechtensteiners now led an existence wholly ideal. Throughout his reign, Aloysius spent money freely, building roads and public buildings and schools. Then he died and his son, the present ruler, ascended to the throne in 1858.

This king, John II., spent much time in Vienna. The lights were brighter there than in Liechtenstein. He built a magnificent palace in Vienna and lived in luxurious style. He intrusted the government of his nation to a minister and carried on his end of it by correspondence. An his loyal subjects didn't like that.

One morning just as the prince was getting out of bed a dozen of the most distinguished subjects of Liechstenstein called on him. After the customary reverences and ceremonies, the deputation solemnly put a request to the prince which ran something like this:

"Your royal highness has a large fortune and spends it in a royal manner. Your worshipful subjects formerly benefited by your generosity. But if your serene highness continues to reside in Vienna it will inflict a serious loss on your subjects. In the future you should inhabit your own capital and spend your money there at least six months out of the year."

Sets Up a Parliament

John II evidently had gotten out of bed on the right side that morning. He told the deputation, which was standing with hats in hand, that he would arrange to spend half of his time in his own country and that, furthermore, he had contemplated granting his loyal subjects a constitution, since they took so much interest in its government. There would be a parliament, he said, with fifteen members whom he would pay out of his own pocket.

Again all went well until Austria and Prussia got into a war against each other over the Schleswig-Holstein duchies which they jointly had wrested from Denmark in 1864. Liechtenstein sided with Austria, declared war on Prussia and raised an army of eighty men and a trumpeter. The eighty men and the bugler marched off bravely for the front and arrived there about a week after the war was over. This was in 1866. Peace was made and Prussia annexed much territory. But in making settlement Bismarck overlooked Liechtenstein. No peace was made with it. Today elderly Liechtensteiners gleefully inform visitors that their country still is at war with Prussia.

Austria, evidently piqued by the outcome of the war, "picked on" Liechtenstein. It sent a bill to the kingdom for that ninety men and one drummer it had been furnishing to the federal army for the Liechstensteiners for so many years. King John thought his subjects ought to pay it, inasmuch as it concerned them mostly, and so checked the bill up to them.

But the Liechtensteiners obstinately refused to pay the bill. They hadn't paid out anything so far, and they didn't intend to begin it as such a late date. The prince threatened to abdicate and cede his dominions to Austria. The people protested. They didn't want to belong to Austria. They said they would rather belong to Switzerland. As a compromise the king settled the bill and his nation joined the Austrian Customs Union, which made it economically but not politically dependent on Austria. Yet, in fact, Liechtenstein is not economically dependent on anybody. It could exist without communication with the outside world. However, under its trade relations with Austria, it nets a trade balance of some $12,900 annually. Also all military service was abolished from thence on.

Today John II is still paying his subjects for the privilege of governing them. He is known as the hermit king. For nearly forty years he has been practically invisible to the world. His relatives and confidential advisers are all that see him. He entertains large parties of guests at his various castles in the shooting season, and in his palace at Vienna in the carnival season he gives luxurious banquets, but no one ever sees him. He is 77 years old.

Just why the aged monarch flits from castle to castle only under cover of darkness is a question. It has been said he is illm ost of the time. As it is, a governor represents him in Liechtenstein. The governor is a man selected from outside the country. The king sends his orders by long distance telephone and the governor in the capital city, Vaduz, represents the the prince before the Landtag.

A Landtag Meets Yearly

The Landtag is the legislative power of the country. It consists of fifteen members. Three appointed by the king and twelve elected for four years by a vote of Liechtenstein's ten thousand inhabitants. Every man more than 24 years old has the right to vote. The Landtag meets once a year in session and for several weeks discusses petty things. The prince pays the salary of the members. There also is an informal cabinet, consisting of the chancellor of the exchequer, chief justice, state engineer and director of forests. They have little to do, except draw their salaries.

There is no public debt and no mint. Austrian currency, weights and measures are used. Also the Austrian postal system is called on to carry a letter at rare intervals. Liechensteiners have little cause to write letters. It is one spot not reached by mail order catalogues.

It is a land of contentment and personal pride. The people live simply. They look up to the prince as the father of the people. And he, too, is proud of them, for he has caused his known. To be sure there is a penicoins and stamps used in the kingdom.

Few of the inhabitants are more than moderately well-to-do. There are few men servants or maids. And there are no poor. The ill and crippled are kindly cared for. Crime is almost unknown. To be sure there is a penitentiary. It has twenty cells, all empty. There are kindergartens and advanced schools. Even the peasant girls are taught French. Little Gothic churches stand throughout the country. The Liechtensteiners are a religious people. The roads are kept in practically perfect condition and little stone fountains supply every village with the cool water from inexhaustible mountain streams.

"Ah! It is a happy land!" an elderly resident exclaimed to an American who happened to visit the little country.

The people are cordial hearted, yet there is no hubleness or servitude in their make up. They love flowers and their cottage windows are filled with bright blooms. The climate is mild, with frequent and violent storms. The storms pass quickly, however, like April showers, and again the little valley seems smiling.

In the spring the green of heavy leaved vineyards furnishes a background to the pink and white orchards which stretch up to the box bordered gardens of the cottages. The houses are modern and in some cases heated by hot water. About their doors large red, and yellow, and white roses nod their heads in the cool mountain breeze. Every house has electric lights, and the streets of the capital, Vaduz, are lighted by electric bulbs. A single light for a house costs $1.25 a year. Liechtenstein has unlimited water power, and the good prince has helped his subjects develop it.

Vaduz has a population of about one thousand. Here are two large spinneries, and also a $100,000 church which the prince built. The town is at the foot of a great white cliff on which the prince's castle sits. In a room of the castle are eighty helmets of leather, brass embossed, seventy-eight muskets, the sword of a captain, a trumpeter's brass horn, eighty uniforms and the red and blue banner of Liechtenstein which the brave little army carried to the war that had ended before they got there. It is only evidence of Liechtenstein's past military glory, and like Eugene Feld's little toy soldier and dust covered dog, await the touch of fingers long gone.

The Men Wear Earrings

The women wear short, full skirted skirts and fringed silk aprons. The men are distinguished by their soft green jackets, and wear dangling gold earrings. They speak German, not the hard guttural German of Prussia, but with a soft accent which shows the influence of Italian.

Throughout the country are many shrines, little crosses and crumbling castles. One of these, besides the village of Balzers, has stood 1,000 years and never has been captured. The Swiss tried to take it in 1499 from its baron. Overlooking the Rhine, these ruins recall the day when robber barons extracted a tariff from every boat which passed in front of their domains.

Most of the inhabitants are farmers. They grow flax, maize, apples, pears, plums and vegetables. Liechtenstein practically exists on its own bread, cheese, milk, honey and wine. Cattle graze on its fertile meadows and the firs of the mountains furnish wood for heat.

REDUCE HIGH COST OF LIVING BY USING SOUP AS A FOOD

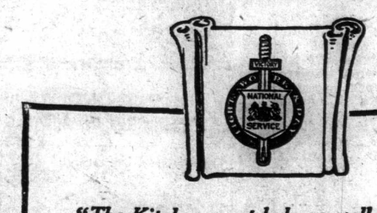
Every once in a while a row of figures is poked under our noses and some investigator of the poor announces that the average salary of men in low paid industries is $600 a year and even less. And yet on this sum they may raise a family of really healthy children. Those of us on another level gasp and are inclined frankly to doubt the learned gentleman's figures. "Why, how can they live —what do they have to eat? It's simply impossible to get a dinner for a little sum."

But even though our standards and theirs may differ, one of the chief factors in the low cost meal of humble people is soup; yes, soup. To us who think of soup as a dainty bouillon cupful to precede a six-course dinner, soup is just an appetizer. But in the category of foods of the humble class, soup takes the first place, and it is on soup that the Russian peasant subsists, that the German soldier fights, that the French family lives. Yes, soup is the world-wide international dish.

The modern housekeeper says that she has not the time—that gas stoves do not conduce soup making—that it is cheaper bought by the can. All of these answers beg the question. If we truly wish to cut down living costs, to feed the family, especially growing children, on the most amount at the least price, we would do well to cultivate the vanishing art of soup making. Soup does not take as much time to prepare as a cake or a fancy dessert; nothing is more ideal for soup cooking than the little simmerer on the gas stove, which will burn for an hour at a fraction of a cent. Or it would pay us to invest in a single hole fireless cooker for this purpose alone.

The cheaper cuts of meat, if there are any, give fullest nourishment in soup. Shank, brisket, plate, chuck, sticking piece and all, will yield their precious protein and extractives when cooked or simmered slowly. Then there are all the legumes, the beans, the peas, so often thought indigestible, which, made into a soup or puree, yield nutrition without indigestible hull. Besides, there is the great class of milk soups, the cream of this or that, carrot tomato, oyster plant, etc. The soup which most readily builds up the growing child is the cream soup, with its fat and protein and starch all there.

It is tritic to say that a soup stock pot is an economy, but evidently few city dwellers have one, judging from the way that the tail of the porterhouse steak and the bones from the mutton chop of rib roast are heaped into the garbage can. A perennial soup pot into which one can drop every shred of vegetable remnant every little bit of cold cereal left over—that makes for real economy.



Russian bosch—have you ever eaten it—beets and meatballs and all? Lentil soup with frantfurters—doesn't it make you hungry? Cream of corn soup with toasted croutons—doesn't it warm and comfort you? Puree of salmon—plain vegetable, nourishing barley or pea—what more royal dish than a generous plateful? Do not forget either the humble split pea made with the discarded ham shank, or the plebian black bean soup which will warm the cockles of your heart better than an eight course banquet. Save the Food and Serve the Empire!

The Average Canadian Family Wastes Enough to Feed a Soldier

"The Kitchen must help as well as the Workshop and the Trenches"
Lloyd George.

INTELLIGENT economy in the kitchen can do much to prevent the threatened world famine—can counteract the effect of high prices—and can replace growing debt with systematic saving.

Careful investigations show that before the war the average British family wasted 25% of their food—and we Canadians were even more extravagant.

This waste is not in a few big things, but in many little ones, each, we used to think, too small to bother about—such as careless peeling of vegetables and fruit—failure to make good use of dripping and "left-overs"—and such others as will occur to every thrifty housekeeper.

For the Empire's sake as well as your own, hunt up and cut out these leaks! You'll be helping to relieve the food shortage—saving your own money—and putting yourself in a position to buy Canadian War Savings Certificates and help win the war.

War Savings Certificates are issued in denominations of $25, $50 and $100, to be repaid in three years at full face value. They cost $21.50, $43 and $86 respectively, at all Money Order Post-Offices and Banks, thus yielding over 5% Interest. Should you need it, you can get your money back at any time. 19

Crop Reports Are Very Unfavorable and Only Rain Can Save Us

While the Reports From Some Points Are Encouraging Most of the Statements Indicate That Rain Is Absolutely Necessary

The report that rain fell in some parts of the province the latter part of this week is gratifying news as the crops were sadly in need of rain to save them from being burnt up.

The hot, dry weather with the temperature at 100 degrees, which has been the prevailing condition for several weeks, has worked havoc with the farming industry.

Unfavorable reports have been coming from various points in the province. Crop authorities all say that conditions are far from satisfactory. A visit to the principal points on the different railroads confirm the fears that crops may be much less than last year unless rain appeared at once. Whether the rain that came was general or of a sufficient quantity to save the crops is a matter of conjecture as the reports from the different localities have not come in as we go to press.

The conditions, summed up in brief, are as follows:

Spring was late, dry and cold, the seed bed, however, was in excellent condition when the seed was sown, that is it was excellent from the standpoint of moisture, but owing to shortage of labor this spring and last fall a very large percentage had to be seeded on stubble land without even discing in some cases. Then in some districts it was found expensive to secure good seed and a chance was taken on seed from wheat that had been somewhat severely rusted.

A Dark Side

These seeding conditions were followed by a very cold and dry June, which culminated in a severe general frost on June 21. Rain following the frost would largely have mitigated any trouble but there was no general rain for more than a week after this frost. Even now there has not been sufficient rain excepting in a few isolated and widely scattered districts. We are now past the middle of July. Weather is intensely hot and there has been very little rain. Straw is short and the heads that are coming promise to be very short also. Coarse grains are rather worse as to general conditions than wheat. This is the dark side of the picture and it is certainly dark enough. The reverse is that the crop has an exceptionally strong, vigorous root and with a general rain now followed by warm weather and light cool winds an immense amount of recovery would be possible.

Might Reach Average Yield

With favorable weather from now there is every reason to believe 75 per cent. of an average wheat crop may be realized. An average wheat crop would be 18 bushels on the entire acreage seeded which is over 12 million acres. Seventy-five per cent. would be roughly 170 million bushels. The situation as to farm help seems at least to be receiving attention from the Ottawa government and it is none too soon. There is not sufficient labor to reap even a short crop, though of course the smaller the crop the less the number required. There is sufficient binder twine available but price is high, 22 cents per pound as against 12¼ to 13 cents last year. There appears to be an abundant supply of farm machinery of all kinds but just at the nouent farmers are rather hanging back owing to uncertainty as to crop.

The Eastern Situation

The greater part of eastern Canada has been praying for dry weather, as the rains of the past 10 days have endangered thousands of acres of the finest clover, alfalfa and mixed hay, as well as the corn and bean crops. And generally, over the province of Ontario, fair weather has enabled the farmers to get much of their clover crops under cover. A week or more of such weather is yet needed to save the crop.

Now is the critical time as anything may happen yet. The growing grain crops are two weeks late and the late rains have induced a growth of straw which would not recover easily in case of beating storms. Hay promises to equal last year's crops in many sections. Spring wheat, oats, barley and mixed grains are looking fit for better than average yields. Fall wheat is beginning to ripen in the southern portions of Ontario and has developed better than many expected.

Our Crop Areas

A special bulletin from the census office gives the crop areas in Canada as somewhat higher than those of a month ago. The following table will show the acreages of 1917:

As compared with former years.

CUTTING THE COSTS OF CULTIVATION

Present prices of man and horse labor demand that more economical methods be tried out by market gardeners wherever possible. Reducing the cost of cultivation will help to solve the problem of labor, as well as to increase the net returns from the crop in question.

Several gardeners who have made a specialty of carrots the past few seasons are planning to continue producing the crop at a profit through the use of a four-row sugar-beet and bean cultivator. Rows are spaced 20 inches apart, a four-row marker being used so that cultivation may be handled more conveniently. Seeds are planted in hills rather than drills, four or five seeds every six inches, to facilitate the tedious task of weeding usually required.

These practices seem worthy of trial by more of the growers. Other crops can doubtless be handled in this way. Net returns from market garden crops vary inversely with the cost of production—that is, the lower the cost of production the higher the profits.

U. S. TRYING TO GET 10,000 BOYS ON FARMS

On returning from a tour of the cadet farms, which have been established through New York state since the beginning of war to supply boy labor to farmers, Arthur W. Wilson of the federal department of labor, declared that at least 10,000 more boys could be used at once to meet the labor shortage which now prevails in the agricultural districts of the state. Ever since the movement was begun the response to the call for boy labor has been very great, and, according to Mr. Wilson, more than 12,000 boys collected from the big cities, are devoting their energies to the raising and harvesting of crops.

"These boys are all making good," said Mr. Wilson. "The farmers are so pleased that they are constantly calling for more boys than the secretary of the farm cadet bureau of New York state can supply. As an illustration of the need of this class of labor, Cattaraugus county has twice as many boys on the farm as the initial census showed any demand for. The boys are earning from $1.50 to $2 a day without board, and many are getting $30 a month with board. Several thousand have gone on individual farms, but there are also over 40 squads of from 15 to 20 boys living together in camps under competent leaders."

PROMINENT BUSINESS MAN DIES

Mr. H. W. Hunt, the well known business man, recently in partnership under the name of Hardy & Hunt Piano company, died suddenly this week of paralysis.

Mr. Hunt leaves a widow and three daughters, Mrs. Freeland Robertson, of Vancouver, who arrived in the city Monday morning; Mrs. William Brantom, who has been living with her parents while her husband is in France; Miss Winnifred Hunt, at home, and Mr. Verne Hunt, 20 years of age, who has been associated with his father in the store for a few months. He also leaves a widowed mother, 82 years of age, Mrs. George Seely, who resides with her daughter.

NO PEACE WITH KAISER

Belfast.—Sir Edward Carson, minister in the British war cabinet, stated in an address here that Britain was ready to negotiate peace but only with the best of the Huns and would never agree to peace while Prussianism held sway above water.

MUST HAVE MEATLESS DAYS

Toronto.—Food Controller W. J. Hanna has issued a statement suggesting that all hotels and restaurants have meatless days on Tuesdays or Fridays. That at two of each of the meals daily there should be a substitute for white bread. Every citizen will be called upon to pledge themselves to this plan.

Crop Optimism Prevails Over Canada

Conditions Seem Good According to Writer in Financial Post.

Farmers from all parts have reported this week in words that leave no doubt as to the situation "I never knew better prospects for crops in my district," is the general remark. Corn, potatoes, all kinds of roots, beans and sugar beets are making great promise in eastern Canada. While the west has, as Hon. Valentine Winkler says, been saved in the right time by copious rains general over the whole prairie section. Hay crops, while light on the whole, will yield an average return. Winter apples in Ontario will be lighter than usual, with Nova Scotia a very fair crop and, British Columbia a good crop. Pears, cherries, berries and plums are going to be a full crop. Livestock prices have hardened during the week and farmers with high priced cattle on their pastures feel much easier. Horse purchases by the allied governments will bring over $30,000,000 to Canadian farms this year. The only cause for complaint is in the matter of cheese prices at Ontario points. The makers claim that they get only 20½ cents out of the 21¾c allowed by the British government because of the ruling requiring grading to be done in Montreal.

Some Crop Increases

The census and statistics office at Ottawa says that the acreage of oats is 11,781,900 acres as compared with 11,376,346 acres, the area sown, and 9,875,346 acres, the area harvested last year. Barley is sown to 1,954,100 acres, as against 1,827,780 acres, the area sown, and 1,681,180 acres, the area harvested in 1916. Rye has a sown area of 159,470 acres, as compared with 147,170 acres in 1916; peas 152,465 acres, compared with 159,680 acres; mixed grains 558,250 acres, as compared with 410,726 acres; hay and clover 7,661,800 acres, against 7,892,932 acres; and alfalfa 84,900 acrs, against 89,472 acres. The condition of these crops in per cent. of the standard rpresnting a full crop is for oats 85 per cent. compared with 90 per cent. last year and 93 per cent., the average at the end of May for seven years 1910-16; for barley 87 cent., as against 89 per cent. last and 92 per cent., the seven years' average; for rye 86 per cent. against 91 per cent. last year and 89 per cent., the average; for peas 88 per cent. compared with 90 per cent. last year and 91, the average; for mixed grains 89 per cent. both this year and last year and 92 per cent., the average; for hay and clover 80 per cent. compared with 98 per cent. and 92 per cent., the average.

In wheat the area sown this year is about 10 per cent. les than the area sown last year, but this is 4 per cent. greater than the area harvested last year. Quebec alone of all the provinces has increased por acreage of wheat this year, being 25,000 acres in excess of last year.

Alberta Looks Good

Hon. Mr. Sifton, premier of Alberta, reports a particularly promising crop in southern Alberta with an acreage equal to last year. The labor situation in Alberta is well in hand.

The appointment of a food controller is relieving the situation. Farmers are reposing with more confidence in justice being done. No break movements are so likely to adversely disturb prices for farm products below the level of profits.

Western Conditions

E. Cora Hind says: Western weather continues to be a source of anxiety. It has certainly not favored growing crops. There has been considerable rain fairly well distributed; this has been followed by days of cold high winds culminating on night of 20th in frosts at a number of points varying in intensity from one to six degrees. Alberta has enjoyed the greatest rainfall but has been no better off than her neighbors in matter of wind and cold. In some districts growth is reported as very slow and many areas of coarse grains have germinated unevenly owing to lack of moisture. These things are not pleasant but are no worse than prevailed in June, 1915, the year of the biggest crop the west has ever seen, so here's hoping.

Official of U. S. Approves of Name of "Sammy"

Paris.—Major-Gen. John J. Pershing, U. S. A., gave his formal approval to "Sammy" as the official nickname of the American soldiers in France.

In one of the first army orders the American commander-in-chief has issued on French soil he appeals to the chivalry of his troops, and urges them to treat the French people with the greatest courtesy and consideration.

"The laws and customs of France," he says, "must be faithfully observed." The order, which was issued today, reads:

"It should be a point of honor for each member of the American army to avoid doing the least damage to any property in France which would stain the good name of the United States.

"The maintenance of cordial relations between the United States and France requires perfect deportment on the part of the soldiers.

"The valiant deeds of the French army and the unusual sacrifice of the civil population command our profound respect."

General Pershing had some words of warm praise and appreciation today for the hearty reception accorded him and his force in France. He spoke particularly of the Fourth of July celebration.

Affected by Demonstration

"This celebration," he said, "testified to the deepest feeling. It was almost overwhelming to see how women and children clung to the arms of our soldiers during the march, treating them as though they were their own men.

"Everything is proceeding in the most satisfactory way."

Hundreds of souvenir cards and letters from young and old in all parts of France are daily pouring in on the American chief.

All the touching testimonials of the deep affection conceived by the people of this republic for the Americans.

BUCK TO GET HIS RELEASE

George E. Buck, of Black Diamond fame, who has been incarcerated for the past few months in jail for the alleged attempt of swindling in the Black Diamond oil scandal, will get his release on August 15, but must leave the country within ten days, otherwise he will be subject to arrest on other charges of a similar nature.

MANY NEW COMPANIES INCORPORATED LATELY

Alberta is having its share of new corporations as shown by recent reports from Edmonton. The latest official statement includes the following companies:

The Pike Grain company, capitalized at $30,000; the Security Cartage and Storage company, capitalized at $20,000; Hood and Irvine, capitalized at $60,000; the Alberta Wheat Lands, $25,000; Union Ranch and Land company, $20,000; and the Parisian Cleaners, capitalized at $10,000. These companies all have their head offices at Calgary.

FRED JOHNSTON STILL WINNING

Fred Johnston, the popular sportsman and owner of Dick Mayburn, is making a name for himself in the racing world of western Canada this year. He was not only very successful at the Calgary meet but is continuing his good luck at other points in the circuit. His latest achievement was at Regina where he was successful in repeating his winning stable.

WISHING CRONK "BON VOYAGE"

On August first Mr. J. B. Cronk will sever his connection with the management of the Allen theater to accept a more lucrative position as manager of a Toronto theater which the Allens have constructed in that city.

While many will rejoice at Mr. Cronk's good fortune his departure will be sincerely regretted by a host of friends and patrons of the house.

In Calgary Mr. Cronk's friends are legion. They are as numerous as bees in an orchard and as staunch as the rocks of Niagara. To them "Ben," as he is familiarly, and generally called, is the personification of everything that a friend and pal should be.

With his business associates Mr. Cronk occupies a high position. His straightforward but open-handed methods have won for him the high regard of the business world. On all sides business men, friends, and patrons of the house are loud in their praises of Mr. Cronk.

Shakespeare says, "A good name is better to be chosen than great riches," and truly it is exemplified in the present manager of the Allen because he has won the esteem and good will of the entire community and his name stands out as a monument of goodfellowship.

Alberta Summer School for Teachers Increases Greatly in Attendance

Many Teachers All Over Alberta Have Taken Advantage of the Opportunities Given by the Alberta Government

The summer school for teachers now in session in Edmonton is the fifth annual one held of this character. This session began on July 2 and will cease on August 4. In 1913 the attendance was 75, in 1914 it was 155, in 1915, 310, and in 1916, 320. This year over 475 teachers have enrolled to take one or more courses in agriculture and gardening, 300 in one or more of the courses in nature study and 137 in household science. Fifteen other subjects attracted an average of 80 teachers each.

Special grants are provided by the department of education for the encouragement of instruction in special subjects. To qualify for these grants the teacher must hold the special elementary certificate in the subject.

Only those teachers who hold at least a second class interim certificate, and upon whose work in the field the inspector has given a favorable report, will be admitted to the summer school courses. The transportation to and from the summer school is paid by the government and arrangements have been made with the university for board and room at reasonable rates. Ample provision will be made for recreation, especially in the form of tennis, baseball, football, basketball and bowls.

The department of education has provided a special course of five weeks at one of the provincial normal schools for certificated British teachers and teachers from the United States who hold certificates of sufficiently high grade to be acceptable to the department. This course was formerly given in January and February of each year, but, in order to make it possible for candidates to attend without breaking into their year's work in the schools, the department decided to change it to the summer course. The course is designed to prepare such teachers for service in the schools of the province.

The summer course staff is an extensive one, including upwards of 40 leading educationists in the various studies included in the curriculum.

To obtain a certificate in elementary science courses must be completed in agriculture including the study of plants, soils, farm animals and poultry, with the addition of teaching in the second summer; and in nature study, comprising lectures, laboratory work, field work and expressive work. Students are also required to complete satisfactorily a reading course during the period intervening between their first and their second summer's attendance.

For a certificate in elementary household arts, courses must be completed in sewing and designing, as well as in household science, dietetics and household management.

Certificates are also given for first aid and home nursing. A special course of instruction is given for high school teachers in science and agriculture, including studies of economic plants, farm animals, plot work, agricultural chemistry, soil physics, agricultural bacteriology, field crops, experimental plots, farm animals, and economic entomology; also methods in botany and zoology.

GET READY THE MACHINERY

Time May Be Saved at Harvest by Being Prepared

Time is money on the farm at harvest time. Now is the time to repair the mowers, binders and rakes which will very shortly be required for service. All machines should be inspected now and, if any parts are broken or missing, they should be obtained immediately. It is much better to secure what is needed now than to risk having to make a special trip to town during the busy season, thus causing a serious delay and, possibly, extending the harvesting of the hay or grain crop into wet weather. It is also an excellent plan to keep on hand a few extra pieces or parts which need frequent renewing, such as knife sections, canvas slats, reel slats and braces, rivets, etc. These are convenient to have and will often save time and annoyance.

Clean out the oil cups and oil all running parts of the machinery a few days before it is to be used. This will allow the oil to penetrate to the bearings, and permit the machine to quickly get into smooth running order.

The knives should all be sharpened andin readiness. These things should be particularly attended to this year. Help isscarce, production is needed, and if crops are to be saved with as little loss as possible good management must prevail. It is good business. Do it now.

LIBERAL CHIEFS ARRANGING FOR BIG CONFERENCE

Most of the big Liberal chiefs have been in Winnipeg the past week arranging for the big pow-wow that is to be held in Winnipeg for two days beginning August 7. Among the leaders present at this week's conference were Hon. A. L. Sifton, Hon. Chas. Mitchell Hon. W. M. Martin, Hon. George Bell, Sir Clifford Sifton and others.

BIG ENTENTE CONFERENCE

Paris.—A conference of the allied nations was held in Paris the past week to thresh out the Balkan situation. Members of the entente were present and many subjects were discussed of great interest to the allies. No formal announcement has been issued regarding the deliberations as action must be submitted to the various governments before official notice of the proceedings may be publicly announced.

NEW CALGARY JUSTICES

A. M. Delong and P. A. Carson, two well known barristers of the city, have been appointed justices of the peace. Mr. Delong is associated with R. T. Aitken.

NEW MILLION DOLLAR COMPANY

A $1,000,000 film company is in process of formation in Calgary to produce "The Barrier" in Canada. Other works of equal standard will be produced from time to time. The company is composed of D. G. Inverarity, H. B. Wright, B. Tipp, I. Weiner and others.

CANADIAN CAVALRY HONORED

Ottawa.—A report from overseas says that the Canadian cavalry brigade which has been at the front with the Imperials, has been recognized for their good work and have been rated first in efficiency.

PRESENT FUEL SITUATION.

Coal Should Be Secured Now to Last All Next Winter.

The following indicates that there will be a greater coal shortage next winter than last, and therefore we should arrange for our fuel supply accordingly:

1. Great Britain is short 15,000,000 tons of coal; France lacks even more; the coaling of Allied warships on the Atlantic coast, the naval, domestic and industrial requirements incident to the entrance of United States as a belligerent, all mean that the coal production must be increased.
2. United States officials anticipate that next fall there will be unprecedented demands on rolling stock as well as greater difficulty in handling the production.
3. The situation is that the United States companies have placed an embargo on coal going out of that country, and the United States desires to keep coal cars in that country for an emergency that may arise.
4. The present rather acute shortage of coal in many quarters will not be helped by war conditions in the United States.
5. Coal prices have generally increased, and, unless there is Government regulation, they will reach higher levels.
6. The U. S. Geological Survey, as well as other agencies having knowledge of the facts, is urging all consumers of coal, both large and small, to store their winter's fuel during the summer months.

In so far as central and western Canada is concerned, the situation is intensified by the fact that owing to the coal strike in the west some 200,000 tons has already been lost from production this year; also, owing to shortage of ships and the great demand for iron ore for the manufacture of munitions, much less coal than ordinarily was brought up the Great lakes last year, so that there are practically no supplies on hand.

From the above it is evident that, to be assured of our winter's supply of coal, and, at the same time, save inconvenience and perhaps higher prices, we should buy coal during the summer months wherever and whenever it is available.

The Dominion Government has appointed a Fuel Controller to take charge of the situation, and the coal dealer and householder can assist by filling their bins now with sufficient coal to last through the whole winter. By so doing they will help out conditions when the railway congestion occurs next fall.

COMMENTS AND CRITICISM

LIBERALS' FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE

A big Liberal conference is to be held in Winnipeg August 7th and 8th, to discuss the leading questions of the day and to unite as far as possible the western provinces so that concerted action may be taken on subjects of vital interest to the country and to the west particularly.

It is claimed by the leaders that the present national government through their present difficulty have attempted to disrupt the Liberal party and that drastic measures must be taken to counteract the impending trouble.

Whatever the reasons may be it is safe to predict a hot session for the Liberals. So many questions are necessary to be settled that two days hardly seem sufficient under the circumstances.

THE NATIONAL SERVICE CAMPAIGN

The National Service Board of which Hon. R. B. Bennett is director, is carrying on a publicity campaign to bring the people to a realization of the present situation and the need for a proper insight into conditions in Canada.

The principal part of their publicity work deals with display advertising in which they have devoted much space to the subject of the proper conserving of our assets whether they are in the form of waste at home or in business. Also they draw upon the reader's attention the necessity of helping the government through saving as well as the buying of war bonds, loans, etc.

The matter they have in display should be carefully read by the public. The advice they give should be pondered over seriously. The subjects discussed are of too vital interest to the future of Canada not to be given careful consideration.

JUST A LITTLE TALK ABOUT OURSELVES

"Nothing succeeds like success" is ably exemplified in the progress that the Calgary Western Standard is making. From every side we have most encouraging remarks for our recent work in embarking on a broader scale and publishing the weekly newspapers of the province. We have now a list of seven newspapers, all standard size, seven columns and eight pages, containing local news and feature pages of The Standard.

This list will be augmented by another half dozen until we have a round dozen, so that we may cover the entire Southern Alberta field. Later we may branch out into the British Columbia and Saskatchewan territory, but for the present we will be content with those that we have.

In connection with the publication of one of the papers we accomplished the impossible. We closed the contract, hired reporters and assistants, secured the advertising, printed and issued an eight page standard size newspaper in two days. We challenge a record that will beat this anywhere in the world. As far as we know it is unprecedented in the annals of newspaperdom. If it was not for the remarkable facilities of The Standard this feat would have been impossible. As it was, this herculean task was accomplished without interfering with the publication of three other weeklies which we were compelled to issue at the same time.

All this may be uninteresting matter to the average subscriber but still we believe that a majority of our readers will rejoice at our great progress and bear with us in our seeming egotism in relating these facts.

And now a word about our future. We believe that you are well pleased with The Standard. At least many of our readers show their appreciation by sending in renewals. One solicitor working the Saskatchewan district sent in 51 orders in two days. Another sent in 60 from High River. These are only two of many similar instances. They all go to show that The Standard is the people's paper—and that the people want it.

Just keep your watchful eye on The Standard for the next few months. Look at the numerous special features that we are going to give you. If you don't say that The Standard is the greatest investment for the money, and best illustrated weekly newspaper in Canada we will miss our guess.

LORD NORTHCLIFFE

Alfred Harmsworth, newspaper man and democrat, more generally known as Lord Northcliffe, the world's greatest publisher, with Tory leanings and Conservative policies, was selected by the British government to attend the special official mission to the United States.

While an offer of a place in the British cabinet which has been tendered several times, has had no attraction for him, the opportunity to serve the empire and the cause of the world's democracy through aiding to co-ordinate the war efforts of the two English-speaking peoples was one which appealed to him.

No man could have had better talents for the work than he—no other citizen of England understood the people of the States—their character, temperament, method of thought and process of reasoning than he. He understood them and they understood him, and for that reason the people of the States were able to get down to the bottom of the requirements and acceded to the requests of the Allies with all the vim and energy that they are noted for.

It was a clever piece of diplomacy—this selecting Lord Northcliffe and getting him to accept. Whomsoever suggested the idea is deserving of much praise and the thanks of the people generally.

GOETHALS RESIGNS—HURLEY APPOINTED

When the report was first announced that General Goethals had been asked to resign on account of the squabble with the president of the U. S. shipping board, it was received with much misgiving because he seemed the only available man the United States government had that could satisfactorily solve the present U-boat difficulty. The president of the United States has shown, however, that he is equal to the occasion and has allayed all fears by his prompt appointment of Edward N. Hurley, of Chicago.

Mr. Hurley is the one man that can fill General Goethals' position satisfactorily. Although but a short time in the government service he has demonstrated his entire capabilities to fill any position within the province of the government. Mr. Hurley has had a remarkable career. Only a few years ago he was filling a minor position in Chicago, where he rose from a clerkship to be head of one of the largest machinery houses of the country.

Since he became connected with the U. S. government, which is only a few years ago, he has successfully filled several positions of trust, including head of the federal trade commission. The fact that he has been selected to become head of the great shipping board which will have the expenditure of billions of money and the construction of thousands of ships of all kinds shows the confidence the president has in Mr. Hurley. This confidence will not be misplaced if all reports are true.

NATURE'S SEEMING INJUSTICE

Word comes from Black Diamond that the latest episode of Mr. J. B. Jenkins, otherwise known as the "millionaire kid," has resulted in a failure and that he is disposing of his recent acquisition of blooded stock and will retire from agricultural pursuits. Another fiasco added to a large list of ventures and another failure charged to a life that seems to be surrounded with a mixture of life's good fortune as well as failures.

In reviewing the career of Mr. J. B. Jenkins it is regrettable that nature should shower over the head of this young man all of her good fortune only to have it wasted and thrown away when so many useful ways might be found for disposing of the gifts and a life saved which is now wasted in useless and idle pursuits.

Perhaps the all mighty and all wise being who shapes the destiny of the world is teaching us a lesson which may be learned and profited by, through observing the career of this erratic young profligate, but a casual observation of his ways and means would naturally cause one to protest against the seeming injustice that nature has been guilty of in making flesh of one and fowl of another, particularly when such riches might be devoted to alleviating the suffering of the world instead of being thrown away on every whim of a "whip-o-will" who is as flighty as a March wind.

MEDICINE HAT DISGRACED

If the reports we learn about the conditions as they were in Medicine Hat during the recent Stampede are true we can thank our lucky stars that we have not had a similar celebration. According to the stories which the spectators tell, and we can hardly doubt the veracity of our informants, the conditions were worse than the early mining days when disorder ran amuck and crime was the order of the day. Thieves, gamblers and confidence men together with women of questionable character seem to have been a striking feature of the Stampede and combined with other so-called attractions to interest and inveigle the money from the pockets of the spectators. Gambling games of all kinds were said to have been run during the week and despite the law, liquor and intoxicating beverages were sold everywhere. The reports of the condition of some of the visitors on the trains that left after the Stampede were such that we tremble for the welfare of decent citizens that happen to be unfortunate enough to be occupants. And they now say that we should have a Stampede. Calgary, the cleanest city in all Canada, should be so disgraced. The Lord forbid that we should ever have this thrust upon us. It is bad enough to live next to a sister city whose name is so besmirched to say nothing of having a repetition of this disgrace at our own doors. Calgary has been able to eke out a living for its merchants and citizens without resorting to such questionable methods and we hardly think that the good citizens of the town will ever permit it to be so dishonored and disgraced.

For these Things for Which we are truly grateful Oh, Jehovah ---New Telephone Book.

RISING ABOVE DIFFICULTIES

A man never goes so low that he may not rise, and a man never rises so high that he may not fall. That is one of the great truths of life. The man at the bottom, even though he may have gone down through sin may rise. The man who has risen to a place of exaltation through his own merit may go down to the very depths through his own carelessness or some weakness that he permits to overpower him.

Therefore, it behooves the man at the bottom to make effort to rise, and it is enjoined on the man at the top to take care lest he fall. Men in prison have been known to find the light and having found it followed it to happiness and success when they left their places of confinement. Men high up in the world's estimation have fallen to the very depths, and then seemingly unable to recover from the shock have remained down.

Sometimes the boy of poor parentage or evil environment says to himself, if not to others: "O, well, what's use? No one would believe in me after they found out from whence I came!"

Every possible use in the world. First there is the human soul to be considered. It was sent here to work out a purpose. It has a right to its chance and should be encouraged in trying to find that chance. Every misspent life represents a human soul cheated of its opportunity. Every misspent life represents part of the Great Plan gone awry. It means that the earth has been deprived of something good and wholesome that it should have had. It means human ingenuity and energy gone to waste.

Every life profitably lived means a human soul working out its destiny and rising to greater possibilities. It means that something moer has been contributed to the good of the world. It means that the Great Plan is being worked out and that the world is profiting thereby.

Men should look at this aspect of life before they decide that their life is theirs to waste; that opportunity is theirs to brush aside. A man may have made a vital mistake, but as long as he keeps his mental faculties there is always opportunity for him to redeem himself, even though prison walls may hold him captive. Many a man who has gone down to the depths has pulled himself out and forever after contributed to the good of humanity.

No boy or girl, no man or woman has a right to believe for a moment that circumstances of birth or environment bars them from the good things of life. Position does not depend on birth or environment. It depends upon the determination to rise superior to any circumstances, to free one's self from whatever shackles hold him back. And with that sort of determination he will put whatever is disagreeable in his life so far behind him that it will be forgotten, or if remembered will never work to his detriment.

TOPICS OF THE DAY

NO LEGAL REQUIREMENT TO CHANGE YOUR NAME

Many wartime applications are being made to the courts to change the names of persons. Most of those people probably do not know that any man, woman, or child can legally change his or her name without going to any court or other tribunal to obtain permision to do so.

Within the last few days we read of one of our judges refusing a man permission to take the name of Russell, although it is a name in common use. This man can take that name just the same, although out of deference to the judge who refuced permission he ought not now do so.

In Smith vs. U. S. Casualty Co., 197 N. Y. 429, the highest court of this state, following the decisions in many other states, effectually settled that every person had the right, without let or hindrance, to change his name according to his desires. Judge Vann, who wrote the unanimous opinion of the court of appeals, said:

So a writer in the American and English Encyclopedia of Law says: "At common law a man may lawfully change his name, or by general usage or habit acquire another name than that originally borne by him, and this without the intervention of either the sovercign, the courts, or parliament; and the common law, unless changed by statute, of course obtains in the United States."

There may be a disadvantage in having one's name changed by a court order. Judge Vann thought, in view of the fact that the statute said that after a man's name had been changed by a court he should thereafter be known by "no other name," that a person who once had his name changed by a court order probably could never change it again without a court order. A man who changes his name without a court order can subsequently change it without the permission of anyone.

In the course of his opinion Judge Vann said:

A predecessor of Honore de Balzac was born a Guez, which means beggar, and grew to manhood under that surname. When he became conscious of of his powers as a writer he did not wish his works to be published under that humble name, so he selected the surname Balzac from an estate that he owned. * * *

Voltaire, Mollere, Dante, Petrarch, Richelieu, Loyola, Erasmus and Linnaeus were assumed names. Napoleon Bonaparte changed his name after his amazing victories had lured him toward a crown and he wanted a grander name to aid his daring aspirations. The Duke of Wellington was not by blood a Wellesley but a Colley, his grandfather, Richard Colley, having assumed the name of a relative named Wesley, which was afterward expanded to Wellesley.

Mr. Walsh, in his Handbook of Literary Curiosities, makes an interesting statement * * * * "Herbert Lythe becomes famous as Maurice Barrymore, Bridget O'Toole charms an audeince as Rosa d'Erina, John H. Broadribb becomes Henry Irving, Samuel L. Clemens and Charles R. Browne attract attention under the eccentric masks of Mark Twain and Artemus Ward. John Rowlands would never have become a great explorer unless he had first changed his name to Henry M. Stanley. James B. Matthews and James B. Taylor might have remained lost among the mass of magazine contributors but for their cunning in dropping James and standing forth as Brander Matthews and Bayard Taylor. Would Jacob W. Reid have succeeded as well as Whitelaw Reid? While some of these names were merely professional pseudonyms, others were adopted as the real name and in time became the only name of the person who assumed it. * * *

In Larke's "General Grant and His Campaigns" it is stated * * * that "General Grant's baptismal name was Hiram Ulysses and he bore that appellation until he was appointed a cadet at West Point. General Hamer, who nominated him for a cadetship, by some means got his name mixed up with that of his brother. He was, therefore, appointed as 'Ulysses Sidney Grant,' and that name once so recorded on the books of the military academy could not be changed. He was baptized into the military school as U. S. Grant and he has ever since been thus designated."

Another instance * * * is that of President Cleveland, who had the baptismal name of Stephen G. Cleveland. After he entered his teens he omitted the word 'Stephen' and assumed the name of Grover Cleveland, by which he was known throughout his distinguished career.

President Woodrow Wilson dropped his first name.

Notwithstanding that the change of name made by a person himself, if he becomes known and recognized by his new name, is just as strong and effective in law as if officially authorized by all the courts in the land, it is wise, although not necessary, to resort to the courts in these cases, because in that way evidence of the change is established in permanent form.

FRENCH CANADIAN VIEWPOINT

The following story is taken from the Brockville, Ont., Recorder and may assist the people of this country in gleaning some information why the people of Quebec take the stand they do:

Ottawa.—The debate on the question of compulsory service has brought to light the fact that our fellow citizens of French extraction feel that the English speaking people do not treat them as equals. This was strongly exemplified in the able speech of Hon. Jacques Bureau, ex-solicitor-general. Mr. Bureau is not only a very able man, but is very level-headed, with no prejudice in his make-up, and a man in whom all classes have the utmost confidence. The other day in the house, Colonel Best had made a wholly uncalled for attack on the French-Canadians and said things that no member of parliament should be allowed to say. Mr. Bureau not only replied to these attacks, but went over the history of Quebec and its relationship with the other provinces for years, recalling time after time and event after event that proved conclusively that a portion at least of the English-speaking people was bent on treating the French-Canadians as a subjugated race. He very rightly resented all these attacks and turned the tables by saying that the French were the senior Canadians and the rest were junior Canadians. In 1763, the senior Canadians took on a new allegiance, but at that time they were in the vast majority. They have ever been true to that allegiance. Three hundred years ago their sires had landed on the banks of the St. Lawrence and had started to hew out homes for themselves. They had left France to come to a new land where they could enjoy peace and bring up their families in their faith. The French-Canadian is devoted to three things from which he cannot be detached—his fireside, his faith and his language. Any attacks on these he resents with all his being. From this standpoint, Mr. Bureau, in a most eloquent manner, recounted the attacks made on the senior Canadians. They know no home but Canada, have no attachment to France, and ceased to be a military people on this continent centuries ago. They are not cowards, but they have been taught to be prepared to fight only for their homes; for the defence of their own land, which is Canada alone. They have not been imbued with the military spirit nor have they received military training as the other provinces, hence they should be treated in a different manner. Mr. Bureau showed how they had been approached on this question of recruiting in a manner altogether at variance with their traditions, and he believed the government was not anxious, and had not been, to secure recruits in Quebec. The Quebec people believe this, too, he said.

These viewpoints are recited because Mr. Bureau's speech revealed clearer than it has ever been before the feeling that the French-Canadian people believe that they are not being treated as equals, but that they, the first comers into this land, the men who subdued the forests and built homes for themselves, are being treated by the newcomers as if they were aliens. Men who had only been here some 20 or 25 years talked the most glibly and offensively about the French-Canadian, who is really the original British subject in Canada. Mr. Bureau said emphatically that if the government of Canada would take a half dozen of its leading men and have them go through Ontario, muzzling such ranters as the Toronto News, and silencing the fanatical talk, a sample of which has been given in the house of commons, unity would be restored and French Canada would show her appreciation by enlisting every man that was necessary without any compulsion service bill. Mr. Bureau's speech certainly had a telling effect on the house.

PEOPLE ARE PRETTY GOOD PEOPLE

People are pretty good people,
Taking them all in all;
You can find a good spot in the worst of the lot
(Often it's very small);
But most of 'em go on trying,
Doing the best they can.
I haven't a rap for that hard-working chap,
The average human man.

People are pretty good people,
Trying hard to be kind,
And the wrong they do—except a few—
Is just because they're blind,
Blind and bothered and busy,
Harried by toil and strife—
For work and fret is the game they get
All of the years of life.

They do good deeds in silence,
Hiding their love away,
And few are told of the hearts of gold
Throbbing in mortal clay,
The hearts that always answer,
Hearing the rightful call—
People are pretty good people,
Taking them all in all!

A BIBLE LESSON

What wanderer on corn husks fed?
Who raised good Dorcas from the dead?
Whose dancing won John Baptist's head?
Who coat of many colors wore?
What craftsmen made a great uproar?
Who was shipwrecked near Malta's shore?
What skilful goldsmith dwelt in Tyre?
Who set the wheat fields of foes afire?
What was the name of David's sire?
Who lover's hair wove in a loom?
Who Ninevah warned of her doom?
What man, while Paul preached, slept and fell?
What maid met Labon at the well?
Whose dreams did famine time foretell?

GOD; THE MIGHTY

(Thomas Hobbes)

For as much as God Almighty is incomprehensible, it followeth that we can have no conception or image of the Deity; and consequently all his attributes signify our inability and defect of power to conceive anything concerning His nature; and not any conception of the same, save only this: That there is a God, for the effects we acknowledge naturally do include a power of their producing before they were produced, and that power presupposeth something existent that hath such power, and the thing so existing with power to produce, if it were not eternal, must needs have been produced by something before that, till we come to the Eternal, that is to say, the first power of all powers and first cause of all causes, and this it is which all men conceive by the name of God, implying eternity, incomprehensibility and omnipotency.

WIT and HUMOR

MATURED THOUGHTS

Be loving and you will never want for love.

A man who speaks from experience tells us that the amount of money required by his wife depends on whether she uses diamond pins or rolling pins.

And "she" in turn retorts that only close quarters are to be found in her stingy husband's dollars

Before marriage a young man sometimes gives his sweetheart a lock of his hair; after marriage she sometimes helps herself.

Another "experienced" married man says that a wife should be like a roast lamb—tender and sweet, nicely done, but without sauce.

And that during courtship a woman may cling to a man's neck and after marriage walk on it.

The more you see of some people the less you are satisfied.

But fault may be found where it is not.

And there are still people in this busy, lend-a-hand war-time who devote precious hours to reading fiction.

FAMILIAR MISQUOTATIONS

Variety is the fice of life.

The husband who hesitates is bossed.

Nature made woman to temper man—and she keeps him in one.

And, like another Helen, find another boy.

The weakest go to the ball.

Art is long and mostly cheating.

Straw lids tell which way the wind blows.

Assume a virtue and get away with it.

I am monarch of all I survey—with my eyes shut.

Honesty is the best bluff.

It's a long lane that has no cafe.

EAVESDROPS

Isn't she horrid with all that rouge on her face?

I'll never give a quarter to see him again.

I hope all my boy friends have flat feet.

I'm always worried about someone else.

Ah! Take a long breath the Lord never made a finer day.

Look down into that valley—do you believe there is war?

You need not take me home.

I have an engagement that evening.

THE GOOD OLD DAYS

"Yes, sir," said the waiter, and a few minutes later returned with a glass of water.

"Waiter!" roared Colonel Tippler again, glaring at the glass, "I said I wanted a drink; I'm thirsty, not dirty."

NOTHING TO DO

A New Yorker has received from his younger brother, who is serving his country in the Officers Reserve corps at Madison barracks, the following succinct but highly descriptive letter:

"Dear Bill.—This is the life. Nothing to do between 10 o'clock at night and 5 o'clock the morning. Yours affectionately, John."

DESCRIBES IT, ALL RIGHT

"How's politics?" asked Mr. Wombat.

"Unsettled and variable," answered Mrs. Wombat, who had the paper. "Oh, pshaw! That's the weather report."

"Fills the bill, however," responded her husband.

THE MODERN WAY

The modern bathroom is like a laboratory, and the shining shelves of glass and nickel hold charming containers for all sorts of toilet waters, soaps and powders. Medicines are kept in neat cabinets as surgically clean as those in a hospital.

Three-Eye League is Forced to Drop Out

For the first time in many years the minor leagues are seriously threatened. Every year since the Federal league invasion there has been talk of disbanding minor leagues and many of the smaller aggregations have been wrecked on the rocks of poor attendance and financial deficits. But the situation has assumed graver proportions this year. It demands the earnest consideration of all interested in the minor league activities.

A real blow was handed the national minor league organization when the Three-Eye league disbanded a few days ago. This league, one of the oldest minors, has withstood every financial difficulty. Composed of wealthy, prosperous towns in Iowa and Illinois it has laughed while other weaker leagues were going under. Even when brought face to face with serious difficulties the Three-Eye has managed to find some way out. But this year it could not stand the pressure and went on the rocks.

It is not to be wondered that the Northern league failed to stick out the season when such a famous organization as the Three-Eye league could not continue play. Other noted leagues to go under recently are the Northwestern, North Carolina and the Virginia. Several other minors are on the verge of going to the wall.

There has even been talk this season of closing the parks in the superminors, the American association and the International league. It is, however, believed these, with the Coast organization, the Western and Southern leagues in class A and the Texas will be able to weather out the season. The Central league also seems to be in pretty fair shape and may finish its season.

The Western league has been forced to divide its season into two championship seasons to keep up interest. Patronage in the Western is said to be below normal.

Many of the minors could be put on their feet with a little help from the majors, but there is little chance of aid from that quarter.

CHICAGO IS RIDING AT THE VERY TOP

New York.—If the ability to make runs had anything to do with it the White Sox would be considerably in the rear of first place, instead of riding high on top. Tight pitching and tighter fielding have come to their rescue.

Six times since the season opened the White Sox have been forced to struggle through an afternoon without a run. Only one club—the Browns—in the American league has surpassed this figure. They are credited with seven shutouts. The Yankees and Athletes are tied with the White Sox. The Cleveland Indians lead in the matter of avoiding shutouts, having been led to the whitewash department only once.

In the National league the Phillies have thus far escaped the brush completely. There must be something in the Chicago air or in the way the Chicago fans cheer, for Eddie Collins and Joe Jackson, American league's famous sluggers, are far behind their wonted marks.

In the National league the favorites in the race—the Giants—have fallen victim to the no-run heavers just once. The Braves, Dodgers and Cubs have fallen thrice each. The Cardinals have had a horse-collar score on six separate occasions.

FRED JOHNSTON IN REGINA; SPOKEN OF HIGHLY BY PAPERS

Fred Johnston, of Calgary, one of the west's best known horsemen and a man who has done much to put the sport of kings on the high plane it occupies in western Canada, is in the city with his two horses, Dick Mayburn and Doctor McLaughlin. He purchased Dick at Brandon, but McLaughlin he has had for some time. Russ McGirr is Fred's pilot and he will drive this pair in the races this time. He will remain in the city a few days.

Mr. Johnston was president of the Sportsmen's Patriotic association of Calgary until last fall when he resigned owing to stress of business. This organization sent athletic equipment to soldiers in the trenches and under his efficient leadership it proved to be a great success.—Regina Leader.

O'LEARY, FORMER CHAMPION, VISITS REGINA FAIR

Johnny O'Leary, former lightweight champion of Canada, who lost his title to Clonie Tait at Medicine Hat, is visiting the Regina fair. He says he is through with the fight game and will buy a hotel and get into legitimate business.

AUTO EXHIBITION AT FAIR IMPORTANT FEATURE

Regina, Sask.—Already more entries than there is space available have been received by the exhibition management for the auto show which is being held in connection with the provincial summer fair and it is estimated that fully 50 cars will be on display in the winter fair building when the doors of the show are thrown open to the public.

The dealers, accompanied by Manager D. T. Elderkin, visited the grounds recently to decide on the arrangement of their exhibits and it was decided to engage a professional decorator to decorate the stands and the building and every effort will be put forth to make the show an attractive one in every way.

MONTREAL FRANCHISE IS TRANSFERRED TO NORFOLK

The president of the Montreal baseball team announced recently that the Montreal baseball franchise would be transferred within a few days to Norfolk, Va., owing to the small attendance at the Montreal games this season. Norfolk is anxious to have a team in the International league and have offered a fair price to have the Montreal team operate in that city.

FAST HORSES TO RUN ON THE CLEVELAND TRACK

The North Randall track will be a busy spot for a week starting Monday, July 16. Over 500 of the fastest and finest horses in the country were entered. The purses offered range from $1,500 to $3,000, depending on the kind of races. On one race alone over 25 entries were made.

AUTO EXCURSION TO BANFF

Calgary Auto club will hold a club run to Banff on August 3. The roads between Calgary and Banff will be gone over thoroughly to insure a successful run.

SWIMMING CONTEST IN BANFF A SUCCESS

Ted Watson captured the drag stone honors in the recent swimming contest at Banff. Fred Schultz and he took the first prize in the relay race.

THE MUCH TALKED OF DOBLE STEAM CAR

The yearly motor car sensation is the Doble setam car. If the claims made for it are substantiated, it will work a revolution in the motor car business.

It is claimed for the Doble car that it meets all the disadvantages of steam and gasoline cars heretofore produced. It burns kerosene without priming, and instead of a pilot flame, ignites with an electric spark. It condenses its exhauste steam so the car may be run more than 1,200 miles without refilling the water tank, or showing exhaust steam.

There are no gears or clutch. The two cylinder engine is geared to the rear axle. A speed of one mile an hour is possible and the assertion is that it can jump to sixty miles an hour in fifteen seconds, which would be a world's record and then some. The time required to start, when everything is cold, is announced as one minute.

A generator is geared to the rear axle, supplying lights, a storage battery and the motor blower, which forces the mixture of kerosene and air into the fire box. The steam plant occupies the place of the engine in a gasoline car, and is not dissimilar in outside appearance. The car starts with a button on the steering gear, and a range of power is obtained by moving the throttle, which corresponds to the gasoline feed on a motor car.

Things An Autoist Should Know

Avoid Motor Trouble by Oiling Car Properly

The care and attention which an automobile requires after it has been placed on the road are often not accorded to it by its owner or operator. Lack of knowledge, procrastinations, and even wilful inattention are often the causes of unsatisfactory service of a well built and mechanically correctly designed automobile. The manufacturer often places in the hands of the purchaser a highly developed and perfectly constructed car, only to have it operated by an owner (and sometimes a chauffeur) whose whole interest, knowledge and care are centered and absorbed by keeping the varnish bright, the metal parts polished and the upholstery clean.

The under-the-hood and more frequently the under-the-body parts of a car are subject to such glaring neglect that the manufacturer often feels that he is subject to a positive injustice when called upon to repair some part which has failed while plainly showing evidence of patent neglect.

As lubricators of motor cars, where we actually place the lubricant on the parts needing attention, it never has been our experience to have a car brought to us for service which had been perfectly lubricated. Some part had always been overlooked. We have always found a dry oil cup or an empty grease cup, not to mention such parts as are failing to receive their proper share of lubrication owing to clogged oil and grease holes or broken grease cups, etc.

Now, patently, it is unfair to ask the manufacturer to pay for the instruction of the owner, just as it is unfair to ask the owner to pay for the costly errors of the manufacturer.

The sales department is often to blame for promising more than the car can actually perform, and the fact that this is often unintentional does in no way lessen the evil. Salesmen are encouraged to see only the best side of their merchandise, so that they may present that side to the prospective customers, yet this attitude can easily produce the trend of mind which caused one Ford agent (not salesman, but agent) to most truthfully, although not as his customers understood it, assert that Ford cars contained all the grease and oil, except cylinder oil, that the car required until it wore out.

Lubrication is at best a highly technical matter and, although manufacturers do provide in most cases, ample means of lubrication and furnish charts and instructions, we venture to say that of the small percentage of owner-drivers who actually study these and understand them few are there who do not constantly postpone the actual labor of attending to the less accessible grease cups and oil cups on their cars.

To fully and completely lubricate the average car is the work of from seven to ten hours, yet we have never met a dealer who would admit that this was true of his particular make of car, and we have never talked to an owner who thought that it would taye more than an hour or two. If, therefore, an owner who has been told that "our car requires practically no attention; it is so simple," tips a floor man in a garage to grease his car in some spare half hour, it is scarcely surprising that the universals, brake mechanism, transmission and differential and dozens of minor moving parts get more of the promise than the lick in the "lick and a promise" that even the more obvious and easily accessible parts receive.

U. S. WILL BUILD A BIG MOTOR PLANT

Uncle Sam plans a plant of his own for the building of special bodies for army motor trucks and the repair of trucks sent in from the field. An appropriation of $100,000 has been asked of congress by the war department for the erection of new buildings to the present motor repair plant at Jeffersonville, Ind. Machinery will be installed for the building of complete trucks, if thus should be found necessary. There is ample government ground available for an even greater increase in the size of the plant than that now proposed.

FORD ADOPTS NEW LIGHTING SYSTEM

A simple, rugged controller has been devised for installation in Ford magneto lighting systems, with the idea of insuring full illumination at low speeds and no more current than the lamps can stand when the car is driven fast. The basic principle is a varying magneto field connected with the throttle and operated automatically as the throttle is moved. An auxiliary device is provided to eliminate self-induction at low speeds. The lamps are wired in parallel, making each a separate unit, so that if one goes out the others burn as before.

DON'T THROW AWAY PUNCTURED TIRES

"The practice of throwing away a tube which has been punctured or blown out is dead wrong," states the service manager of the Fisk Rubber company. "This old fashioned idea still prevails among some autoists, but it is only because they fail to understand the advancement which has been made in the science of repairing tubes.

"A good repair man of today can make good as new an injured tube. Improved repair equipment and greater skill on the part of the average repairman account for this improved grade of workmanship. Motorists will do well to send their tubes for repairs just as long as a reliable repairman will accept them."

Remember that chains are needed in summer as well as in winter. A heavy rain will soon make the streets and roads dangerous. Some people only carry one chain on the right rear wheel away from the curb. Two are better, both on the rear wheels, but it is best to use four and have one in reserve.

Earl von Osterheldt and Ralph A. Kauffman of Des Moines, Ia., have received a patent on an automatic automobile top so constructed that the pressure of a foot lever by the driver of a car will either raise or lower the top. Compressed air is the medium used to perform the work.

Many methods of silencing a noisy transmission are in vogue from the ground cork of the "gyp" who is trying to sell a broken winded old crock, to the new transmission that suggests itself to the car owner with a fat pocketbook. However, a little flaxseed meal placed in the transmission gear is a really effective and harmless silencer.

The status of the motor car in Japan today is about where it was in America in 1900, one of the trade papers reports. In a population of 60,000,000 there are only 1,341 automobiles, nearly three-fourths of which are registered in Tokio, the capital city and metropolis. There is one small but alert motor club, and Japan's one and only automobile magazine, Jidosha, expired two years ago after a heroic struggle to survive motoring apathy. And—this on good authority—there is but a solitary gasoline sales pump in the whole country.

GASOLINE WASTE

Although this is the age of self-starters, motorists are prone to let their engines run idle to an unnecessary degree. Some economists approximate that each of more than 2,000,000 cars in the United States wastes an average of a pint of gasoline a week in this way. Figured even at 20 cents a gallon, this gasoline waste would amount to more than $2,600,000 a year.

Ann Pennington in "The Little Boy Scout" at the Allen

Ann Pennington, the winsome little dancer of the "Follies" returns again to the screen in the Famous Players-Paramount production, "The Little Boy Scout" a charming photo-play furnishing the diminutive star with more than ordinary opportunity to display her special talents.

As a dancer Miss Pennington has won wide spread recognition for herself and her former productions on the screen more than proved her ability to act before the camera. In "Susie Snowflake" also a Famous Players-Paramount production, she was seen as the delightfully boyish daughter of an actress, driven by circumstance to live in a prim New England village. In "The Rainbow Princess," as a daring circus performer she won new laurels.

A distinct change from both of the roles was furnished for her in the part of Justina in "The Little Boy Scout" she appears as a rebellious nulece of old Miguel Alvarex, living with his family near the Rio Grande in Mexico. The old uncle is a miser and a tyrant and attempts to force her to marry his weakling son in order to bring her money into his own coffers.

Justina, however, has the American love of liberty inherited from her mother who was a New Englander, and on the very eve of her wedding, runs away on a donkey of the priest who had been summoned to marry her.

Her adventures from this point from a sequence of events both humorous and dramatic that hold the onlooker breathless. How she stumbles right onto the sentry of a United States army camp and how her donkey betrays her presence by a vigorous braying, how the soldiers help her make her way to her mother's sister in New England, and what happens when she gets there, is all told with all the charm and piquancy which only Ann Pennington could give it.

As a boy scout Miss Pennington completely subjugated the hearts of the dozen or so youngster members of that organization who were called in to "local color" and incidentally instruct the star in the gentle art of wig-wagging and other scout mysteries.

CHARMING YOUNG STAR OF POPULAR MUTUAL COMEDIES

Edith Thornton, Despite Her Youth, Is Finished Screen Actress.

Edith Thornton, star of Novelty comedies on the regular Mutual program.

"The Madcap Princess!" Such is the delightful name that has been given brown haired little Edith Thornton by her associates in "Novelty" comedies, the three clever burlesques produced especially for the Mutual program.

The name aptly fits her, for she fears nothing and is exceedingly whimsical. She is also beautiful, with long, black hair and lustrous eyes, so the combination "Madcap Princess" very pleasingly designates the little star.

Edith Thornton makes a great success in "Miss Trillie's Big Feet," "Rip Van Winkle Badly Ripped" and "The Corsican Brothers Up to Date."

"Two Little Imps" is the name of the picture shortly to be released by Fox, in which Jane and Katherine Lee play the leads.

Douglas Fairbanks had a birthday recently. He says smilingly everybody came across and a nice time was held by him.

Seventy-five thousand dollars was subscribed by the Lasky employes for Liberty bonds.

ROSCOE "FATTY" ARBUCKLE in "THE ROUGH HOUSE"
PARAMOUNT-ARBUCKLE COMEDY

Coming, August 6-7, to the Allen

Mme. Petrova will Be at Allen next Wed. and Thurs.

The first part of the story of "The Undying Flame" takes place in ancient Egypt and Mme. Petrova plays the beautiful daughter of a Pharoah. She is loved by a shepherd, but her father refuses to permit her to marry beneath her rank and sentences the humble shepherd to death. Before he is executed the latter breaks in two a double scarab, giving one portion to the princess and requesting that the other part be buried with him, according to the superstition that their souls will thus be reunited in a later incarnation.

The sequel of this romantic situation is found in modern Egypt where we see Mme. Petrova as Grace Leslie, daughter of an English army officer who has come with him to inspect the garrison at Soudan.

During their visit, a polo match takes place and in the course of the game Grace has occasion to hand the ball to young Capt. Paget, an officer who has already attracted her attention. As she does this she has the queer sensation of having performed the same action at some other time, and as a matter of fact, the action is nothing more or less than an exact duplicate of what had taken place between the shepherd and the princess in ancient Egypt.

Other incidents occur which give her the same uncanny feeling until the culmination is reached when an old gypsy fortune-teller gives her a half scarab, telling her that not until she shall have found the other half will her happiness become complete.

Being merely a very sensible, modern young lady, Grace is inclined to laugh at her own foolish thoughts of the subject until one day she sees Captain Paget, whom she knows to have been on duty, riding off towards the desert. Learning from her father that he is going to order a "surprise drill" to test the efficiency of the garrison, and realizing that if Paget were found missing it would mean court martial and disgrace for him, she starts out to find him.

Stealing out of the house, she at last comes upon the object of her search talking to one of the women of the garrison who had lured him to an appointment there. Misunderstanding, Grace goes back to her father while Paget, being unable to explain his absence, prepares to accept a dangerous post in a remote part of the desert which has been offered him.

As he is packing he comes upon a scarab which he has kept as a souvenir, and, wanting only to forget it all, tosses it out of the window where it falls at the feet of Grace Leslie who, having learned the truth about the interview she had witnessed, is coming to atone for her misjudgment.

Wonderingly they piece together the two halves which exactly fit and realize that the old superstition has at last brought them together for the fulfillment of their destiny of centuries ago.

Mme. Petrova has won a world-wide reputation for her versatility and for her powerful emotional acting — she has an unparalled opportunity for displaying her remarkable talents in this production.

One of the most delightful musical programs has been arranged for this spectacular attraction, which will be rendered by the Allen Paramount concert orchestra at each performance.

The management also wishes to announce that many novel musical surprises are in store for our patrons during the coming season, which will be announced later.

Jackie Saunders in 'The Checkmate' at Allen Mon.-Tues.

Jackie Saunders is probably the only motion picture star in this country whose main ambition is to own a big farm with plenty of cattle barns, windmills and all the rest.

In "The Checkmate" in which Miss Saunders is starred, this predilection of the clever young artiste is plainly exhibited, for the opening scene, with a cockfight in the barnyard and a hundred or two "lowing kine" in the near distance, backed up by barns, corn cribs and a tall windmill, is Jackie's own idea of the way a picture ought to open.

Frank Mayo, the dashing young chap who plays opposite Miss Saunders, had an extensive stage career in England, playing with the Lyceum company under Sir Henry Irving for several years. Daniel Gilfether, who made a world-wide reputation in support of Tomasso Salvini, plays "Father" Millie McConnell, who plays "Ma" was for several seasons with Mrs. Leslie Carter and Richard Mansfield.

Of course "The tomboy of the screen" is lured from her "lares and penates" by the wicked young man from Broadway and Forty-second street, who is at last reformed by the glamor of her goodness and converted into a hard working husband: but admirers of Miss Jackie know all the time that her heart is back on the farm where she can get into a calico gown and sunbonnet and be just "The Tomboy."

Charles Chaplin, it is said, responded to the selective draft call and is willingly waiting his turn to declare himself.

Robert Warwick Coming Soon in 'The Silent Master'

With Robert Warwick as the star, Selznick-Pictures as the standard of quality, E. Phillips Oppenheim as the author, Miss Olive Tell as the leading woman, and Leonce Perrer, the noted French producer as director, the showing of "The Silent Master" which will be shown at the Allen soon promises to be a cinematic event of more than ordinary interest.

Mr. Warwick's first Selznick-Picture, "The Argyle Case" was declared to be his greatest triumph, and in "The Silent Master" he believes he has advanced a step farther in the development of the photoplay art. To insure the highest degree of excellence in the Warwick productions, Harry Fapf has brought from France the famous Berret to take charge of all future creations of this corporation.

"The Silent Master" is taken from the Oppenheim novel. "The Court of St. Simon," which derives its name from a mysterious tribunal in which wrong doers, especially oppressors of the poor, are punished. The presiding genius of this court is a marquis, who calls himself Valentine Simon. To satisfy a whim, he introduces a young scapegrace, Eugene Arlen, to the people of the underworld whom he employs in his beneficent work. Arlen takes a morbit interest in the life, and embarks in it on his own account. Later Valentin meets Arlen's sister, without knowing her relationship to the youth, and marries her. When she learns that her husband contributed to her brother's downfall, she leaves him. The adventures and romance which bring the story to its satisfying conclusions are of an absorbing sort.

The production is spectacular throughout, including numerous magnificent interior scenes, realistic reproduction of Paris haunts and a panorama of the city as viewed by Montmartre at night.

Attractive Program Billed at Pantages for Coming Week

A great bill of vaudeville will be offered the patrons of the Pantages theatre for the coming week, a bill consisting of high class as well as delightfully entertaining attractions. The headliner will be "Little Miss Up-to-date," a speedy high powered girl revue featuring Faye O'Neil and Leon Leonard and a chorus of pretty misses, in dances, singing, nonsense and a wealth of beautiful costumes, the whole being further enhanced by some special scenery that is in keeping with the balance of the offering.

Another big feature of the new programme will be offered by Miss Octavia Handsworth, and her own company in "Salvation Sue," a comedy drama of the north by John B. Hymer. Miss Handsworth was formerly a motion picture star under the direction of Pathe and also Lubin; her work being appreciated by countless thousands.

The king of nonsense also known by the name of Harry Breen, will visit us again with a line of new material of the nuttiest of nonsense. Breen is in a class by himself and incidentally the originator of "nut" comedy.

Two crafty ignoramuses will also amuse with a nonsensical comedy skit, they are known as Swor and McCormack, and their skit is labelled "Miss-Fittable Insurance."

The Four Roses, four pretty girls, will present some beautiful whirlwind dancing in a most efficient manner.

The Universal Current Events and a comedy motion picture will complete a very interesting programme of vaudeville, and one that is sure to please immensely.

Vaudeville Gossip

There will be no successor to the late Sam Chip, of Chip and Marble. John W. Dunne, Mary Marble's manager-husband, has just announced that Miss Marble will star next year alone. John L. Golden, who wrote "The Clock Shop" for the famous team will find sufficient time to write another vehicle for her, with Frank Craven as a collaborator.

Gus Edwards, who sponsors "A Bandbox Revue," soon to be seen at the Orpheum, is emphatically renewing his vaudeville activities this year. He is now planning to produce another Gus Edwards' Revue which will be headed by Olga Cook, the blonde beauty who played the Orpheum circuit last season as a "single." Mr. Edwards promises it will contain the highest priced chorus in the world.

He intends also to produce "The Belle of Toytown," with a cast of twenty girls, headed by Louise Groody.

Rose Coghlan who celebrated her fiftieth year on the stage shortly before her daughter Rosalind Coghlan started her Orpheum tour in "Our Little Bride" and who was lately featured in "Our Betters," is likely to be seen again in vaudeville. She has a sketch called "The Deserter," said to be a timely comedy written by Willard Mack and Thomas F. Fallon.

Irene Bordoni, who was the late Melville Ellis' partner in Orpheum vaudeville, has begun an action for divorce from Edgar Beoman, the Belgian actor to whom she was married less than two years ago. She has also filed separate suit against an actress of the Opera Comique, Paris, charging alienation of the affections of her husband.

Chic Sale's twins, who were born last Christmas time, were christened last week Charles Bishop and Mary Claire Sale. Mrs. Sale is Marie Bishop, the violinist who appeared on the Orpheum bills with Mr. Sale.

Among the enthusiastic stage helpers of the Red Cross is Nan Halperin, who is never too busy to do her bit. Last week in Boston, she sang patriotic songs to a large audience on the Common and later went among the crowd and persuaded many women to lend their aid to the cause. Miss Halperin's tour of the Orpheum circuit begins on August 26.

Agnes Johnston, of Thanhouser, who seems to turn out charming stories for motion pictures with as little effort as we have in lighting a cigar, wrote "An Amateur Orphan," which has just been released by Pathe. Miss Johnston is under 20, which probably accounts for her knowledge of youth and the effervescent, whimsical humor which she so successfully puts into her scenarios. She was the author of "The Shine Girl," "Prudence the Pirate," and "Her New York," all of them successful. Gladys Leslie is the featured player of "An Amateur Orphan."

Mr. Esler officiated. Mr. and Mrs. Neve left on the afternoon train for Banff, and on their return will take up their residence on Fifth street west.

ADVICE TO THE BRIDE

1. Marry when the year is new,
   Always loving, kind and true.
2. When February birds do mate,
   You may wed, nor dread your fate.
3. If you wed when March winds blow
   Joy and sorrow both you'll know.
4. Marry in April when you can,
   Joy for maiden and for man.
5. Mary in the month of May,
   You will surely rue the day.
6. Marry when June roses blow,
   Over land and sea you'll go.
7. They who in July do wed,
   Must labor always for their bread.
8. Whoever wed in August be,
   Many a change are sure to see.
9. Marry in September's shine,
   Your living will be rich and fine.
10. If in October, you do marry,
    Love will come, but riches tarry.
11. If you wed in bleak November,
    Only joy will come, remember.
12. When December's snows fall fast,
    Marry, and true love will last.

ONLY A BABY SMALL

Only a baby small,
Dropt from the skies;
Only a laughing face,
Two sunny eyes;
Only two cherry lips,
One chubby nose;
Only two little hands,
Ten little toes.

Only a golden head,
Curly and soft;
Only a tongue that wags
Loudly and oft;

Only a little brain,
Empty of thought;
Only a little heart,
Troubled with naught.

Only a tender flower,
Sent us to rear;
Only a life to love
While we are here;
Only a baby small,
Never at rest;
Small, but how dear to us,
God knoweth best.

—Matthias Barr.

The Housewife's War Commandments

I. Thou shalt not throw away anything edible or allow it to spoil for lack of proper care.

II. Thou shalt practice thrift every day in the home.

III. Thou shalt keep all food covered, or at least screened from the flies, which carry deadly disease and filth.

IV. Thou shalt study economical menus and recipes as never before.

V. Honor the humble vegetables as never before. Can many vegetables, fruits and greens this year.

VI. Provide for thy family at least one can of fruit, one can of greens, one can of vegetables for every day in the year.

VII. Thou shalt cease from being finicky. Be willing to try new foods.

VIII. Thou shalt learn to appreciate rice—a valuable source of starch—when potatoes are high and scarce. Learn to use the valuable corn instead of the expensive wheat for breadstuffs.

IX. Thou shalt pay cash for everything that is purchased. Buy only what is needed; buy it only when needed; and shut off wastage in the home by decreasing the use of such things as sugar and butter, in "making things."

X. Thou shalt have at least one meatless day a week, if not more.

Join "The Speak Well Club" Today and Boost Everything and Every Body

Calgary is one of the best little towns on the face of the earth but it has one besetting sin—Its citizens are prone to knock. Everywhere you go, at the clubs, in the offices, at teas, at home, men and women alike seem to take a delight in whispered innuendoes about their neighbors and associates. It matters little whether the gossiper has been guilty of the same offence or would be if the opportunity and inclination presented itself. They are all prone to "pan" the other fellow, or speak in a disparaging manner of his or her actions, life or antecedents.

This fault is as prevalent as the winds of March. Unintentionally the habit has grown until no one is safe or immune from this terrible scourge.

The Standard believes that it is high time that this habit was curtailed and just to show that we have an abiding faith in Calgary and its citizens, and that we believe that the habit is one rather of thoughtlessness than with malice and forethought, The Standard is going to organize the "Speak Well" club, and it is going to see just how many people in this city really are honest at heart by asking for applications to the club.

There is only one condition: If you break the principal rule before you can again be reinstated you must do penance. In this case it means you must apologize to the party either by word or letter and promise never to do it again. Otherwise you will not be a member in good standing and you will be acting a lie if you wear the button and do this. It is all going to be left to your conscientiousness.

Remember, everyone can join, men and women, boys and girls.

"SPEAK WELL CLUB"

109 Sixth Avenue West, City

I herewith make application to become a member in good standing in the "Speak Well" Club. I agree to adhere to the principal rule of the order: "If I Can't Boost I Won't Knock."

It is understood that in making application to become a member no obligations of any kind are entailed excepting to conscientiously agree to observe the rules of the order and to endeavor to get as many members as possible.

TO SUCCEED, FOLLOW UP

How common it is in games of football, baseball and other sports that some quick thinking player dashes off a thrilling play only to fall back for the remainder of the game into obscurity and be forgotten—and for no other reason than that he failed to—follow up.

Periodic brilliancy is not success.

Follow up. When you think a worthy thought, follow it up. When you strike an effective blow for a right cause, follow it up. It's the man with the courage, first to start a thing, and then to follow it up that after awhile has an accumulation of points that stamp him great and masterful. Follow up or else you will fall back.

The great man is simply the small man become great. Every great man at some time or other is the unknown, obscure man. Make your life count by compelling every single effort to figure in the final summing up. For, after all, success itself is nothing more or less than work well performed and followed up day after day, year after year.

Persist, follow up, keep at it.

WHERE WASTE OCCURS

1. When anything edible is allowed to go to the garbage pail or allowed to spoil for lack of proper handling.
2. When we eat more than our bodies need for growth and repair and to supply the energy for our work.
3. When too much is served at a meal. Uneaten portions are left on the plate and later thrown into the garbage pail. Learn to know the needs of your family and serve to each no more than you think he will want.
4. When too much is prepared for a meal. Many housekeepers do not know how to use left-over foods to make appetizing dishes.
5. When burned or spoiled in cooking. Buy food wisely and prepare it carefully.
6. When handled carelessly. Buy clean food, keep it clean until used, and be neat in all details of cooking and serving. This lessens waste and is a valuable health measure as well.

Then follows this advice:

"Overeating tends to poor health, and fat instead of brawn, makes us sluglish and indolent instead of energetic and resourceful. Eat enough and no more. Eat for physical and mental efficiency."

A COMMENCEMENT ROMANCE

I saw her on Commencement Day,
All gowned in girlish white,
With roses on her maiden breast
And in her tresses bright.
I met her later at the ball,
And we together danced—
I hung upon her every look,
Her lightest word, entranced.

I took her in my motor car
Next morning for a spin,
And breathed to her my fond desire
Her hand and heart to win.
But when I clasped her fingers small,
She drew her hand away,
And coyly murmured, "I'm engaged
To old Professor Gray."

FARMING AND LIVESTOCK

Horse Breeders Association To Appeal to The Government

Officers and members of the Canadian Thoroughbred Horse Breeders' association are understood to be behind a plan involving a plea to the Dominion government for an extension until October 1 of the time set for the cessation of betting on Canadian race tracks. At Ottawa a deputation will wait within the course of a few days on Premier Borden and Hon. Mr. Doherty with a view to having the cabinet amend the order-in-council recently promulgated. The various jockey clubs are said to be neutral in the matter, though none in Ontario or Quebec would pass up the opportunity of being able to hold another meeting. It is the horsemen, however, who will be the chief sufferers and on this account representations for an extension will probably be made. When a deputation interviewed Premier Borden and his colleagues in June, they requested that they be allowed to race this summer, there being at that time talk of shutting down immediately on racing until after the war. They then suggested that October 1 be set as the date for closing down and did not press their claims when informed, on the other hand, that August 1 was the date named by the government in the order. Premier Borden and Hon. Mr. Doherty treated the horsemen courteously and assured them that they would always be willing to encourage the sport of kings.

A meeting of the Thoroughbred association took place at Windsor this week and at this gathering a resolution was passed, requesting Mr. C. Ross, honorary secretary of the Connaught Park Jockey club, to represent it in the proposed appeal to the government. Officers of the association pointed out that the suspension at this stage of racing in Canada would virtually ruin some or the members of the association, they having made their plan with the understanding that there would be two meetings at each track and that racing would continue, as in former years, until October 1 or thereabouts. The majority, in fact, will be forced to sell their stock and suffer, therein, heavy losses. They expressed the hope that the government would answer their plea with an extension of eight weeks, also adding the belief that the original intention of the government would not be affected. If necessary, the Horsemen's association offered to send representatives to Ottawa to reinforce the deputation. It is understood that the breeders will offer no objection to a suspension of racing for next season as they will have an opportunity meanwhile of making their preparations accordingly with the probability that more meetings will be offered on the American side.

Mr. Ross stated that the situation was still unsettled. He explained that the Connaugh Park committee, at a special meeting recently, had decided not to attempt to hold another meeting before August 1, though there was talk of one, but that they would, of course, avail themselves of the opportunity should the request of an extension of time be granted. Mr. Ross admitted that he had been requested to act in behalf of the Canadian Horse Breeders' association and said that steps had already been taken. The situation may be settled by the latter part of next week.

Some of the jockey clubs in Quebec and Ontario have already held two meetings. Grant Hugh Brown, for instance, juggled his dates in such a way that he sandwiched in an extra week at Devonshire Park, Windsor, while nearly all the "bull rings" at Montreal cut in with the usual two. The Canadian Racing association decided to abide by the government ruling and advised its clubs to shut down August 1. Nevertheless all the clubs would welcome the proposed extension, which would allow Connaught Park, Blue Bonnets, Dorval, Hamilton, Fort Erie, Windsor, Kenilworth and Woodbine to hold one more week's racing each. The Miller bill restricts jockey clubs to two meetings each and those which evaded the new law by advancing their dates, would of course have to remain closed.

Canada is the only country mixed up in the war which decided to ban racing and, while sportsmen absolutely refuse to concede any necessity of such action, the extension, even until October 1, would no doubt prove popular.

PLOWING CONTEST FROM THE OLD DAYS

An old time plowing match is to be held commencing 12 noon on Wednesday, July 18, at the farm of Mr. Osborne Brown, three miles south of the city limits, and the committee in charge extends a special invitation to residents of the city and district to be present on this occasion. This is the second annual plowing match held in the district. The Provincial Department of Agriculture is providing an expert judge, and the Hon. Duncan Marshall has accepted an invitation to be present. No admission charge will be made, and light refreshments may be obtained at a Red Cross booth to be conducted by the ladies of the district.

A meeting of the residents of the district was held on Saturday night at Mr. Osborne Brown's home, and the following committe was appointed to take charge of the event—Mr. Bamford, W. Warden, Sam Johnson, R. Bamford and Robert Spencely.

Those attending the match may go south on the Macleod trail to Turner station and then one mile West, or through Elbow Park, Elboya and past the Country club.

FARMERS ARE PROSPEROUS

Claresholm.—A sure indication of the prosperity of the country is shown in the fact that many of the farmers now have two automobiles, one for the farm and one for personal use.

The Summer Care of The Sheep

During the summer months, the flock is too often neglected after the shearing has been accomplished. As a rule, the sheep are allowed to run in some large field where water is available and they are left to themselves for the season.

Ordinarily, all the ewes with lambs may run in one lot after turning to pasture. Ewes not having produced lambs are usually disposed of during summer. Ewes, having lost their lambs, and which it is desired to retain for breeding again, may run with the nursing ewes, but if the size of the flock justifies two divisions, the dry ewes may run with the yearlings. The possibility of ewes breeding during summer renders it advisable to place the ram in a yard by himself. He will usually be contented in a separate pasture, but if not, one or two sheep with him will ensure quietude.

Water and Salt Important

It is advisable to have places in the pasture where salt is available at all times. If salt is only given occasionally, sheep are apt to eat too much at one time. Rock salt may be used, but should always be made to have a piece of rape ready for fall feeding.

Weaning may take place at from ten to sixteen weeks, according to the development of the lambs. These lambs should be put on good feed and allowed with the dams a shorter period each day, until they are finally kept away altogether. The ewes should have a drier pasture until the milk flow stops. It may be necessary tomilk a few of them out once or twice to prevent udder trouble.

If at all possible, never pasture the sheep at the extreme end of the farm, where the dogs may have full play without being seen. Two or three lambs killed means the profits of the year gone. Go through the sheep as often as possible, especially later in the summer, when the wool has grown and the sheep are in better flesh. It often happens that a sheep will get on its back in a hole and cannot get out, or it may become entangled in a root. There are many ways of losing sheep, especially in the ways mentioned, which a close oversight would prevent.

Leghorns Are The Best Egg Producers

Leghorns produce eggs cheaper than hens of the general purpose breeds—Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes, Rhode Island Reds and Orpingtons. This fact, which confirms the belief and experience of commercial poultry farmers, was one of the results obtained in a rther extensive feeding test recently reported by poultrymen of the United States department of agriculture. Because they lay as many or more eggs, eat only about 55 pounds of feed per head as compared with 70 to 85 pounds eaten by the general purpose breeds, and because their egg yield very materially exceeds that of general purpose breeds during their second and third laying years, Leghorns, the specialists say, undoubtedly are more profitable to keep for the production of eggs only.

In this test, the feed cost of a dozen eggs for one of the Leghorn pens was 7.34 cents in 1913 while the average cost of all the pens of the general purpose breeds was 10.6 cents. In 1914 the feed cost of a dozen eggs for the same pen of Leghorns was 8.7 cents as against an average cost of 15.1 cents for the second laying year of the general purpose hens. During their third laying year the cost of a dozen eggs was 8.8 cents compared to 18.6 cents for the general purpose fowls. The total value of eggs per hen over feed cost in the Leghorn pen for three years was $6.84 against $4.30 for the general purpose hens. The highest egg production obtained in any of the feeding experiments up to 1915 was by a pen of Leghorns which laid 157.6 eggs per hen, at a feed cost of 6.7 cents a dozen.

The Leghorns produce smaller eggs than the general purpose breeds. The average weight of the eggs of a pen of Leghorns during the first laying year was 1.42 pounds per dozen as against 1.53 to 1.58 pounds for the other pens. However, Leghorns laying eggs weighing 1.50 pounds per dozen or even more, the specialists say, have been selected and bred by many poultrymen. An examination in May, 1915, of 500 eggs from three Leghorn pens showed that 31 per cent. weighed more than two ounces apiece, or 1.50 pounds to the dozen.

The value per dozen of the eggs produced by the Leghorns was from 1 to 3 cents less each year than the eggs of general purpose hens. This difference is due to the fact that the general purpose breeds are better winter layers than the Leghorns, while the latter give a higher production in the spring and summer. Very few Leghorns become broody, which probably materially affects their egg yield as compared with the general purpose breeds. Better fertility in the eggs, especially with stock confined to the yards, is more often secured with Leghorns than with the general purpose or any of the heavier breeds.

Sheep Ranching in Alberta

The Sheep Industry is adding untold wealth to the resources of the province.

the ordinary coarse kind is generally preferred. Sulphur may be added to the coarse salt during summer months as ac onditioner.

While sheep possess the ability to do without water with less annoyance than other classes of stock, it certainly adds to their comfort and health to have access to pure fresh water at all times. Especially is this true during the hot, dry months of July and August.

Pasturing horses and sheep in the same field is not to be recommended, as some horses are possessed of a nasty disposition and will chase and annoy smaller animals with the certainty that some of them may be injured.

Tar for Gad Flies

During the hot, dry season when the flies torment the sheep a great deal, it is advisable to coat the nostrils of the sheep in some way with tar. This may be done by boring a hole or several holes in a log, place salt in the bottom, and smear the edge of the hole with tar. This is very effective and simple in operation. The gadfly, which is responsible for the trouble, deposits the larva or living worm in the nostrils of the sheep. In a short time the larva pass up the nostrils and flocks in the winter season. The larva, lodge in the nasal sinuses. During the winter it develops, and the irritation it causes produces a running at the nose which is common among so many when developed, is expelled by the sneezing of the sheep, especially when grain feed is given dry. This worm goes into the manure, where it changes to the chrysalis state, emerging in June or July as a mature fly.

Value of Shade

During the summer season, sheep should have some form of shade in their pasture. If they have access to a small grove, this is all that is needed, but where they cannot have this, a cheap shelter may be constructed of boards. During the hot season, it will be noticed that sheep feed chiefly in the morning and evening, while during the heat of the day they lie in the shelter and chew their cuds. Thus the value of shade is clearly demonstrated.

Change of Pasture

Instead of giving the flock the run of a large pasture, divide it in two, if possible, and graze alternately. This gives them fresh feed fairly well throughout the season. Provision should always be made to have a piece of rape ready for fall feeding.

Things To Know About Raising Sheep

At weaning time the ability of a ewe to produce a good lamb often is ruined because the necessary care is not taken to see that she is dried off properly. A little care at this time will be well repaid. Two or three days after the separation the ewes should be milked out. All of the milk need not be practically different in condition except that the calves fed whole milk averaged about four pounds less in weight. But considering that $19 worth of whole milk per calf had been saved in the six months' period, the use of flaxseed was considered the better practice.

After the lambs have been castrated and their tails cut, the flock should be turned into a dry pasture field where they can be watched during the day and any necessary attention given. There is seldom any danger after the first day, although it is advisable to watch the flock closely until the wounds are healed. Neither of the above operations should be performed in warm weather when the fly season is on, as maggots are almost certain to get into the wounds.

One of the most important points about shearing is to limit the sheep's ration a few hours before shearing, as the sheep will stand the handling much easier and with less danger of injury on a moderate empty stomach, than it will when heavily fed. Care should be taken to keep the sheep in as comfortable a position as possible while shearing. Do not keep it sitting on its hind quarters any longer than necessary. Let it stand until the head and neck are shorn, then set it up on its hind quarters, shear part of the shoulders and all the belly, then lay it down on its side, shearing one side to the center of the back. After this, roll it over and shear the other side. It is a good plan to have a knife handy to trim the feet of the sheep while it is lying down. This saves a second handling, but care must be taken not to allow toe clippings to get into the wool.

New Rate Adopted at Local Stockyards

For every animal brought to the said market or stockyards for storage, or sold or offered for sale, or bartered or exchanged, the following market or yardage fees:

For every horse, mare, gelding or mule	25 cents
For every head of horn or hornless cattle	25 cents
For every calf	10 cents
For every swine	6 cents
For every sheep	5 cents

The above charges include weighing and use of all facilities at the said market or stockyards.

Corrals

Animals in corrals, covered or open, left without feeding orders, 35 cents per head per day, including hay and water.

Feed Charges

Hay, timothy, per 100 lbs.	$ 1.50
Prairie hay, loose or baled, per 100 lbs.	1.00
Straw, per 100 lbs.	.75
Oats, per ton	55.00
Chop, per ton	60.00

These charges include the shaking out of hay and straw, and the placing of oats and chop in feed troughs.

No charges or fees, other than the charges approved herein, shall be levied or collected at the said market or stockyards.

PROVINCE OF ALBERTA Savings Certificates

The Deputy Provincial Treasurer, Edmonton reports that Provincial Savings Certificates are meeting with a splendid reception from the public. Under this plan one may deposit his savings and be sure of receiving a good interest rate with the solid security of the government behind it. There has been a steady flow of deposits into the Provincial Treasury, the amounts received from individual investors varying from $5.00 to sums representing a modest fortune. The average daily receipts continue to increase in amount as time goes on, evidencing the growing popularity of the idea. As the Savings Certificates Act was intended primarily for the benefit of residents of the province of Alberta, deposits from outside the province were hardly looked for, but considerable sums have been received from neighboring provinces. The advantage of obtaining 5 per cent. and of being able to withdraw the deposit on demand without any unnecessary formality naturally appeals to investors, especially when interest is allowed for the full time the money remains on deposit however short it may be. Another attractive feature is the option of having interest compounded half-yearly, or if preferred, of having it forwarded yearly or half-yearly.

WINNIPEG LETTER

Grain Trade Seems To Be at Sea

According to a Well Known Winnipeg Authority, the Food Administrators Are Needed to Solve Problem.

(By Thompson, Sons & Co.)

The grain trade is still very much at sea in regard to what the final outcome will be of the endeavors of the United States food administrators, and the Canadian board of grain supervisors, to promulgate rules and regulations for the carrying on of the grain trade in America and Canada for the duration of the war. In the United States congress the food administration bill is still being fought over, and the latest report of interest is that the senate has made a fixed price of $2 per bushel, basis 1 northern, at primary shipping points, this to be in force until July, 1919. The Winnipeg Grain Exchange received a telegram from the board of grain supervisors for Canada, intimating that they had decided that dating August 1, 1917, the maximum price of wheat, basis 1 northern, in store Fort William, shall not exceed $2.40 per bushel. This is for the balance of the 1916 crop, and it is the first price fixing action the board has taken. It holds until further notice and it will prevent the price of our old crop of 1 northern going any higher than that after August 1. It has frequently been the case, that the price of cash wheat between the middle of July, and the time new wheat would begin to move, has advanced very sharply owing to scarcity. Last year, after July 20, 1 northern advanced 44½c within a month. Evidently the board of supervisors considered it would be right to checkmate the tendency to advance, which had begun to manifest itself, by instituting the fixed maximum price of $2.40. In face of this order of the board, cash 1 northern sold on Saturday at $2.42 and $2.43 and yesterday at $2.41, but today the price is up to $2.45. We have no inkling yet what prices the board will set on the new crop, whether there will be a maximum and a minimum price, or simply a flat price. The board has just returned from Montreal and Toronto, where meetings were held with eastern millers and grain men, who gave information and expressed opinions as to how best they thought the grain trade should be handled at this time. If we are rightly informed the board goes back to Washington to further confer with the American administrators after their food bill is through congress, which may be in about another week or so. Shortly after that we expect the rules and regulations decided on for the coming year will be given out. In the American markets there have been good advances during the week on cash wheat and the July delivery and also in the September delivery. Reduction in visible and invisible supplies, with a disposition on the part of farmers in the winter wheat districts where the crop has been harvested, to hold back their wheat from market, and the complaints from North Dakota and Montana of small yields through drought, have combined to advance prices in the American markets. Minneapolis has advanced 26½c on July and 26c on September. Duluth is 25c up on September wheat and Chicago has made the big advance of 47c on their July wheat and 32c on their September wheat. Our Winnipeg market, owing to the close way in which it is restricted, has advanced during the week only 5c on July wheat, but 29½c on October. The movement of wheat in the United States is now on a very small scale, because, as we have mentioned above where the new wheat is ready the farmers are either stacking it, or if threshed storing it in their own granaries, and the old crop is entirely out of their hands. Visible supplies are very small, although they were slightly smaller in 1915, but in that year America and Canada were just beginning to put their hands on the immense yields of that year, very different from the present situation. Last week the United States visible supply decreased 363,000 bushels against a decrease of 1,046,000 bushels last year, and the total is now 9,621,000 bushels against 38,635,000 bushels a year ago. The Canadian visible decreased 1,126,981 bushels against a decrease last year of 301,434 bushels, and now stands at 13,686,232 bushels against 19,931,669 bushels last year. Last week the world's shipments from exporting to importing countries were 9,957,000 bushels in wheat and flour against 13,769,000 bushels a year ago.

Crop prospects in western European countries have improved considerably since about the middle of June, and the people of France, Spain, Italy and the United Kingdom are rejoicing in the welcome improvement. There are prospects this year of a very large increase in the production of potatoes over a year ago in the United Kingdom, America and Canada, and at the same time there is a general movement to economize in the use of food, and to eliminate waste, so that in time, even with the immense war consumption, production will again overtake requirements, and there will be a different story in regard to prices to what we see in these days.

Trade jogs along in our Winnipeg market under the handicap of restrictions, but there is a good demand for all the cash wheat offering. The movement from the country is falling off now, averaging about 200 cars of wheat daily, against about 500 cars daily a year ago. The past week has been one of extreme summer heat and very doleful reports have been coming in from nearly all parts of the three prairie provinces about the poor prospects. The temperature in the west day after day has ranged above 90 degrees, and at several points as high as 100 in the shade has been recorded, and the only rain reported during the week has been from local thunderstorms. The season over most parts of western Canada has been more or less unfavorable from the beginning, and much of the crop developed under unfavorable conditions, and could not recover the lost ground, unless it could be recreated. The consequence is, many fields are short in straw and head, and thin on the ground, and the prospect is a moderate or low average yield. After the intense heat of the past week or ten days, the weather seems to be changing to cooler, and should a cool and rainy spell set in as seems not unlikely, a great improvement in growth and production could take place. Today's prices are: 1 northern, $2.40; 2 northern, $2.37; 3 northern, $2.32; No. 4, $2.20; No. 5, $1.95; No. 6, $1.65; feed, $1.54. The October future closed at $2.29½.

Oats—There has been a very strong oat market during the week, but the main strength of the situation has been congestion in the July delivery, which has been taken advantage of by some speculative traders to force prices as high as they possibly could. Today with a sharp break in July oats in Chicago and signs of a favorable change in northwest weather, there is an easier feeling and a decline of 1½c to 1¾c in October and December oats, but the July future and cash oats are practically unchanged from yesterday. Generally there has been an advance of 5c to 6c on the week, but closing prices today show this advance only on July and cash with the October future 2¼c and the December future 1½c up on the week. Today's prices are: 2 C.W. 79¾c; 3 C.W. and extra 1 feed 78c; 1 feed 76c; 2 feed 74¾c. Futures closed: July 79¾c; October 67¼c; December 62⅛c.

Barley—Barley s firm again and advanced 1c to 3c on the week. No. 3 $1.27; No. 4 $1.22; rejected and feed $1.11. The July future closed $1.27½.

Flax—The flax market has been steady to firm with advances of 3c to 9c on the week, the feature of the week being the large advance in October and December compared with cash and July. 1 N.W. $2.97; 2 C.W. $2.92; 3 C.W. $2.78. July and October closed $2.95, December $2.90.

Alberta Company Buys Prize Cattle

Prices for prize cattle and livestock is rising so rapidly that it is hard to say what will be the limit. The latest purchase of the Glengarry Ranch Co., Claresholm, Alta., who paid $20,000 for Gay Lad 16, a Hereford bull, established a new mark in pricings.

This company has just made a purtotal cost of which was hrdluadhm chase of 14 Hereford animals, the total cost of which was $48,000. The shipment is expected from Harris, Missouri, this week, where the purchase was made at a sale held several weeks ago.

In these days when labor is high and also scarce on many farms, the hog may afford "a way out." Hogs utilize refuse and waste grains, damaged grains, and garbage; garnering grain behind cattle or shattered grain inharvest fields; and utilizing slaughter house by-products and dairy by-products. They are also largely self-feeders. The modern farm "cafeteria" gives a pig a chance to make a hog of himself more quickly than he can by the hand-fed route, and it has the added merit of being the cheapest way of producing pork. A sow when she is not developing a litter or nursing pigs, can in summer time be placed in a pasture and given very little grain. In winter, possibly the cheapest maintenance ration is a combination of grain and hay, such as corn, wheat, rye or barley, and alfalfa, clover, cowpeas or soy bean hay. The grain should be limited to one or two pounds per hundred pounds live weight per day. Sows should be given all the hay they will clean up. Sows which show exceptionally rundown condition from suckling their pigs should be separated from the herd and fed grain until they regain breeding condition. Where pastures are very luxuriant, it is possible to carry breeding sows on pasture alone, but the most palatable hay will not keep sows in good breeding condition if fed alone.

More pigs are ruined at weaning time than at any other stage of their existence. They should have access to corn and other grain when they are with their mother, so that they will know how to eat and will not miss the milk. Skim milk or buttermilk is desirable feed for pigs at weaning time. The milk should be fed in the same condition at all times—either sweet or sour—otherwise the digestive system will be impaired. Usually the pigs are large and thrifty enough to wean at the age of six to eight weeks. They should have access to green forage, such as alfalfa, rape, clover, or sorghum, at all times. The feeding trough should always be kept clean. Care should be taken that the pigs are not overfed. Overfeeding causes feverish conditions and will stunt the growth of the pigs.

CANADIAN LOAN

New York, July 26.—The banking syndicate floating the $100,000,000 two-year 5 per cent. Canadian notes will offer them at 98 and interest, to yield slightly less than 6.1 per cent., it was announced today.

Stoney Indians Discovered First Oil in Alberta

(By W. McD. Tait)

MANY stories of the discovery of oil in Alberta have been written, and as many people and districts claim the title "pioneer" in the industry that has brought the last prairie province of Canada so prominently into the limelight.

It is a fact well known to oil men that the South Kootenai Pass first attracted the attention of the seekers after crude petroleum. And that "Kootenai" Brown and "Bill" Aldridge were the men that first made known to the world that a seepage existed on Oil Creek in the mountain corner of Southern Alberta has never been disputed. But that Stoney Indians were the real discoverers is something most white men are not willing to admit. All doubt was, however, dispelled from the mind of the writer when, seated with Kootenai Brown in his cottage home on Waterton Lakes, he related "the beginnings of oil in Alberta".

"Some years ago", Kootenai said, "Dr. Dawson, Canada's greatest geologist, came to the Kootenai Pass vicinity and employed me to peregrinate him and his son around. He asked me then if I would know crude oil if I saw it, and I said 'I think I would'. Dr. Dawson then entered into a learned discussion of the formation of the rock in the pass and gave me his geological reasons for believing that oil should be found there."

Just here another story crept into the pioneer ranger's story of oil, but as it bears little relation to the discovery of the Stoneys, it need not be told. It had to do with Dr. Dawson, Kootenai Brown and a grizzly bear.

"But", continued Mr. Brown, "to make a long story short, it was in 1886, 28 years ago, while I was engaged with the Royal North West Mounted Police as guide and packer, that I fell in with some Stoney Indians who were hunting and fishing in the foothill country. I told them what I had learned from Dr. Dawson, but they said they never saw crude petroleum and would not know it if they did see it. To give them an idea what it looked like I mixed up molasses and coal oil from a lamp we were using, and told them if they ever saw anything that looked like, and felt like, and smelt like that to be sure and let me know. Shortly after that a Stoney came to me and reported that he had discovered a spring of crude oil. I was very busy at the time and could not go immediately to investigate but as soon as I could I went with the Indians and found the seepage on what came to be called Oil Creek, now Cameron Creek."

And this is where "Bill" Aldridge comes into the story. Neither Kootenai Brown nor he were the real discoverers, but Bill was the first to take an active interest in the seepage. He was working for Kootenai and wanted some grease to oil his wagon. Kootenai had been up to the seepage and brought home a bottle of the crude material. This he gave to Aldridge to put on his machinery.

But Kootenai is telling this story. "He asked me where I got the oil, and I told him. He went up immediately, soon after built cabins for his wife and family, and started to work. He found that by digging away the earth in certain places that considerable oil would ooze out of the saturated gravel beds; so he made a wooden pump with which he pumped gallon after gallon and carried it out in tin cans strapped on the back of an Indian pony and disposed of it to ranchers for lubricating purposes. He actually made his living for years by selling this oil at one dollar a gallon."

Mr. Brown tells that there are some 18 springs on Cameron Creek and all are producing the oily mixture today. Oil companies have gone in and the story of their success in locating wells has been written several times. That the Stoneys were the means of opening up a great oil district is without doubt. The shales in the district have been examined by R. A. Daly, formerly of the geological survey who describes them as belonging to the Benton formation which overlies the Dakota sandstone.

HE WAS ON THE JOB

The undertaker arose and said to the mourners assembled:

"If anyone present wishes to say a few words of tribute of the deceased, now is the time when the family will be glad to hear such."

A stillness prevailed, and after a few moments of silence it was broken by a young man, who arose and asked:

"Do I understand that no one wishes to make any remarks?"

"It would appear so," replied the undertaker.

"Then," asked the young man as a light came into his eye, "may I be permitted to make a few remarks about Southern California and its wonderful climate?"

Temperament is the perquisite of a four-figure income.

August Furniture Sale

Mail Orders Orders Filled Very Promptly

Careful Packing and Crating Excuted by Experts

All Deliveries in the Order Purchases Are Made

Beginning on Friday, August Third---8:30 a. m.

This event has been thoroughly advertised and from far and near we expect the utmost in appreciative response. With such a patronage as we anticipate the event itself will be short lived, necessarily. Many lines are decidedly short—some of them makers' samples. This means exclusive furniture, of course!

This Is a Bay Merchandise Event of Some Twenty Years Standing---An Annual Gathering of Home Equipment

This, kind friends, is an Annual Sale—a once-a-year outpouring of furniture principally, but added stimulus is obtained by grouping stocks from the Rug, Drapery, Hardware, China and Staple Linens and Cottons Sections. Altogether it presents, this year one of the biggest hearted bargain carnivals you ever participated in, we are sure. The Furniture buyer began his aggressive campaign on the factories some five months ago in preparation for this selling. Add to this the fact that previous sales in the daylight show rooms have been doubled nearly every month this Spring and Summer. This can mean but one thing—the presence on these floors of an immense amount of ODD PIECES of furniture. This combination will net Calgary a handsome profit. Awake on Friday, August Third, to greater money saving in Furniture and kindred commodities than you have known in over a year. All deliveries will necessarily be in order in which purchases are made. We anticipate the attendance of scores of out-of-town people. Please read Thursday evening's (Aug. 2) Herald and News Telegram as well as the Morning Albertan of August Third (Friday).

Out of Town Patrons

will find in this event opportunities for money saving rivalled only by sales of pre-war days. These are times when economy must be assumed wisely, a time when serious consideration of value should be uppermost. This August sale of better furniture and house furnishings should be attended upon the opening day for the very values it sets before you. Almost $50,000 worth of Seal of Quality pieces—good staple furniture that will hardly sell at such prices again. Depend upon that! Among the many remarkable offers is one concerning

Axminster Rugs

These are in two extra good room sizes—9 x 10 ft. 6 in. and 9 x 12 ft. These are genuine Axminsters but comprise a special purchase of odd lines at the mill by our buyer last spring. Possess mixed centers and cross-band borders. These rugs are at least worth $45.00 each. While they last..... $28.75

Also the 27 in. x 54 in. small rugs to match..... $2.85

Floor Six

To Local Customers

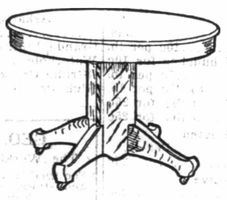
Those of you who do not know, will learn that August at this store, is the opportunity month of the year to buy furniture of the better sort at the most ridiculous of low prices. Most of this stock is marked at prices that must of necessity change upon any remaining assortments after this sale. Come here, if you please, and scrutinize critically the elements of furniture designing. Note every detail of finish. Come here with the expectation of finding immense variety—in each of these essentials you cannot possibly be disappointed. We promise you the best that your money can buy—ANYWHERE.

Baby Conveyances

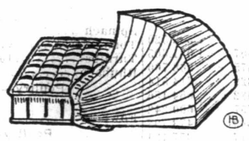
Here is a much better quality baby go-cart than usually sells for a third more, retail. Has the high sides and collapses in one motion. It is similar to illustration at the bottom of this page. Note the long graceful lines. 10-inch wheels and 1-2 in. rubber tires. Has an adjustable back and foot well. This is really the go-cart for YOUR kiddie. August Sale Price..... $12.90

8 Cars of New Furniture Now Lie on the Siding

Six of These Will be Unloaded



in sufficient time for the opening of the sale. The other two contain house furnishings and will also be relieved of their contents before opening day. In the furniture cars are chairs for living room, den and library. Dining room suites, kitchen pieces and tables almost without number. We cannot begin to tell you of the wealth of buying opportunities lying dormant in these cars now on the siding. Sufficient it is to say—Come, and you cannot expect too much!



Two Cars of Mixed Furnishings

Enamelware, silverware, bed linen and cottons, rugs, linoleum, carpet yardage, curtainings, draperies—made up and by the yard, table oilcloth, china, cut glass and kindred items. All will be displayed on Friday of next week. Among them you will find easily 200 of these specially priced spreads arrayed on a table for disposal the first day of this big August Sale. An extra heavy weave, fully hemmed ends. These are the medium size spread —generally used in the home. $1.65 ordinarily. Friday of the Sale, each $1.29

STORIES OF EVENTS OF IMPORTANCE IN THE WORLD TODAY

OUT OF SIBERIA

Catherine Breshkovskaya, who was banished to Siberia by the Russian government thirty years ago as a revolutionist.

NEW FRENCH PREMIER

Alexander Ribot, former finance minister in the retired Briand ministry.

From Farmer Boy in States to Chief of Staff in France

The right hand man of General Parshing, Lieut.-Col. Harbord, rose from the ranks. He has had a varied career from a farmer's boy in his infancy, to private in the army and later an officer in the U. S. army earned through his own efforts.

Col. Harbord is a unique character with a personality that appeals. When he was a young man at the Military Service Institute 20 years ago, he wrote a prize essay which ended as follows:

"Final responsibility for our infantry and other forces, their fitness for battle in organization and training, or their lack of it, rests on those charged with the affairs of the government. The problem should not be held in abeyance till the emergency arises. The strongest nation of giants suddenly aroused from slumber, unarmed and lethargic, could not withstand the smallest army of Davids."

James G. Harbord, then a second lieutenant in the Fifth Cavalry, is today Lieut.-Col. Harbord, chief of staff, the "right hand" of Major-Gen. John J. Pershing in France.

Harbord is not a West Pointer. He was born a poor boy in Illinois 51 years ago and enlisted in the army as a private in the Fourth Infantry on Jan. 10, 1891. As a boy he had gone with his parents to Kansas, and in due course of time was sent to the Kansas State Agricultural college to [illegible] the scientific points of farming. He was an apt student and was graduated with honors in 1886.

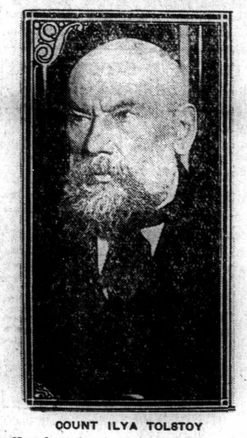
In the Kansas district in which [illegible] lived there was a vacancy at West Point in 1887. Harbord tried out to win it. One of the youngsters who beat him on the competitive examination was Claude B. Sweezey, now Lieut.-Col. Sweezey and Harbord's junior by 12 files. Sweezey went to West Point and Harbord went back to his farm. But Harbord had made up his mind to be a soldier and an officer, and so it was that in January, 1889, he appeared at a recruiting station. He announced at the time that he expected to win an officer's commission sooner or later.

The young soldier passed through every non-commissioned grade. Within three months he had won his corporal's stripe, in six months he was a sergeant, and the beginning of his second year's service as an enlisted man found him quartermaster sergeant of his regiment—in other words, the second ranking man of the non-commissioned staff. In July, 1891, he appeared before an army board to be examined for a commission and got it with flying colors. On August 2 President McKinley made him a second lieutenant of cavalry and assigned him to the famous Fifth.

When Sweezey, who had won the West Point appointment which Harbord had so desired, was graduated from the Military Academy in 1892 Harbord had been an officer nearly a year.

Harbord's first duties as an officer took him to Cuba, where during the reconstruction period he served under Major.-Gen. Leonard Wood, who was one of the first high-ranking officers to realize that in Harbord the army possessed a soldier of great possibilities. Later, in the Philippine Constabulary, under Brig.-Gen. Henry T. Allen and under Col. H. H. Bandholtz, now chief of staff of the National Guard division of New York, he made a record for efficiency. When he arrived in the Philippines he was a captain in the Eleventh Cavalry, and his transfer to the constabulary carried with it the temporary rank of colonel. As Colonel Harbodr he was assigned to organize the Moro units of the Philippine native forces, in the Island of Mindanao. General Wood was then, as he had been in Cuba, the executive head under whom he worked.

Harbord often tells a little story of how his actual rank in the army and his temporary rank in the constabulary resulted in an amusing mistake. It was the custom in those days to write in parentheses after the name of a constabulary officer the rank he held in the regular establishment. Harbord's title should have read "Colonel J. G. Harbord, Philippine Constabulary (Captain, U.S.A.)" Instead, a sleepy army clerk one day wrote it and had it printed as follows: "Captain James G. Harbord, U.S.A., (Colored Philippine Constabulary.)"



In 1905, after two years in Mindanao with the Moro contingents, Harbord was ordered to assume command of the constabulary in Central Luzon, succeeding Colonel Bandholtz, who had been promoted to chief of constabulary. It was not until June, 1914, that he was relieved from duty with the constabulary and ordered to return to the United States. The "Manchu" law was responsible for his failure to succeed Colonel Bandholtz in the command of the native organization. Under that law only field officers could succeed to the command, and Harbord was still only a captain.

Returning to this country, Harbord was stationed on the Pacific coast. Then he was ordered to the Mexican border to serve under his friend Pershing. In 1916 he was ordered to the War College division of the general staff. A few weeks ago came the order to proceed to France as chief of staff to General Pershing. The friendship between Pershing and Harbord began when the two officers were on duty in Mindanao; Harbord's selection as chief of staff in France was made at the personal solicitation of Pershing.

"You ask me," said an officer of regulars a few days ago, "to tell you what kind of an officer Harbord is. I can only answer that he is one of the ablest in the army, a man of splendid appearance, magnetic personality, and, to top it all, a brilliant writer, a fact which is indicated when one recalls that he is a gold medalist of the military service institution."

Taken in the light of present-day happenings, certain parts of Harbord's prize essay read like a prophecy. He said:

"It is as fallacious and dangerous to rely wholly upon courage, devotion and resources of the people, without practical preparation, as it is futile to depend upon isolated position or arbitration to forever protect us from war. * * *"

Russian Revolt Was Predicted Nine Years Ago By U.S. Writer

Nine years ago an American writer set out to write an imaginative novel depicting as realities all sorts of amazing things. He told of telephones with attachments allowing those speaking through them to see each other though separated by thousands of miles, projectiles for passenger service shot through the air at tremendous speed and landing travelers in Pekin a few hours after leaving New York, and other similar marvels infinitely surpassing anything at the service of the human race of the twentieth century.

As a fitting prelude to his imaginary era of super-wonders the author casually tossed off a few sentences about Russia. He wrote them back in 1908. When he put the words on paper he doubtless did not believe that there was anything remarkable about them; he saw them, probably, as a mere flight of fancy, fitting well into his fanciful story.

But today he must look upon these words with awe and ask himself whether he is endowed with the gift of prophecy. For here is what the American novelist—Harry E. Rice, of Xenia, Ohio—tossed off in his book, "Eve and the Evangelist," a full nine years ago while describing his imaginary world of the year 2108:

"Rule by royalty was at this time a thing of the past in all Europe. Russia was the first to declare for individual freedom, the declaration coming 12 years after the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese war. The aristocracy, which was synonymous with bureaucracy, had vainly tried by the old methods of iron rule to keep the people in subjection. Little by little the grand dukes and their army of sycophants were shorn of power.

"Final political emasculation came when Czar Nicholas made a third unsuccessful attempt to reassert his so-called "divine rights." Orders issued to the army and navy fell on deaf ears. The soldiery and sailors were honeycombed with sedition, fanned by great stacks of literature, circulated despite the activity of the grand dukes' agents, edicts issued from St. Petersburg, and loud claims made by blustering, bewhiskered martinets in the uniforms of generals.

"The crisis came on that memorable night in May, 1916—May 16, to be exact—when the grand dukes issued orders through the weak czar for the prohibition of the revolutionary meetings, called for that night in every city of note in the empire. Regiment

SMOKE TO FOIL "U" BOATS

One of the several methods used to curb the destruction of vessels by the "U" boats, now showing results in reported losses. The British destroyers convoying the merchant vessels send out dense clouds of black smoke

It is not all-sufficient that we cry
"God save the king!" and wave our flags on high.
Patriotism calls for sacrifice:
If we want victory we must pay the price.

The men and boys who at their country's call
Responded, counting not the cost at all,
The wives and mothers wishing them God-speed
With aching hearts, are patriots indeed.

And so are those, with neither youth nor health,
Who give so generously of their wealth;
And of their penury—the widow's mite
Is not too trivial in the Empire's sight.

"'Tis what a nation gives that makes it great."
Then let us all give as our hearts dictate.
We owe a duty to the boys out there.
They bear the brunt. Shall we not do our share?

POINTED PARAGRAPHS

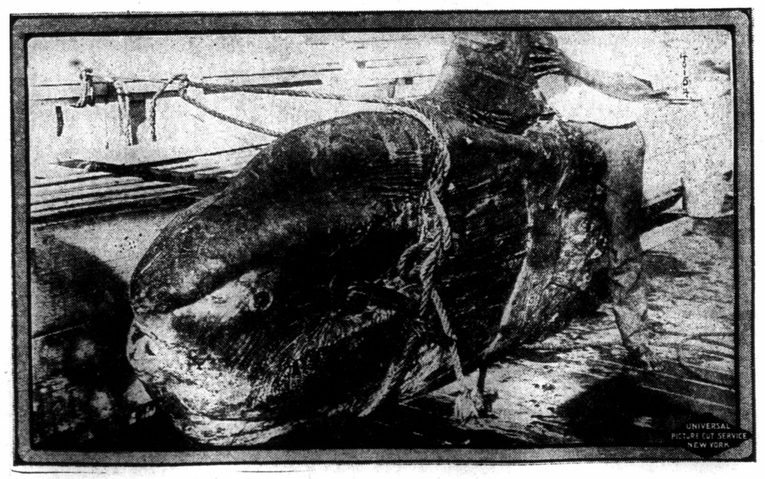
Kindness breaks no bones.

Reform is an airship that is always on the verge of starting.

In the average man's life the longest day is the one just before pay day.

Most of our mistakes would never be noticed if we did not call attention to them.

A woman of experience says it is easier to acquire husbands than it is to get rid of them.



Men who have seen better days as a rule looked at them too often through the bottoms of whiskey glasses.

NEVER BE SORRY

For doing your level best.
For your faith in humanity.
For being kind to the poor.
For hearing before judging.
For being candid and frank.
For thinking before speaking.
For discounting the tale-bearer.
For stopping your ears to gossip.
For asking pardon when in error.
For bridling a slanderous tongue.
For being generous with an enemy.

A Visit from Dickie

Story of the War

The captain sat in his office and wrote a letter.

It was a nice office, with piles of army books and piles of forms neatly arranged on the table covered with clean brown paper, and a fine array of pens and pencils, and the black and the red ink as carefully set out as a battalion on parade.

Outside the windows rattled the traffic of the base, but it disturbed the captain not at all, for ever since he had joined up a twelve month ago he had been employed in that pleasant office in that peaceful French town.

The captain was writing to a girl friend of his. "Of course, it is a great satisfaction to feel that one is out here doing one's bit——" he had written, when he heard a ribald laugh at his elbow. He turned quickly. There was old Dickie, whom he had not seen for 18 months, standing at his side, but such a disreputable looking object that for a moment he did not recognize him. He was unshaven and so besmeared with mud that little pellets were even clinging to the bristles of his chin. The skirts of his tunic were torn, there was a jagged gash in the knee of his breeches and his puttees, heavily caked with mud, were badly rent and all sagging. He looked so grotesquely inappropriate in that natty office that the captain could not forbear to cast a self-satisfied glance over his own immaculate uniform and glossy brown field boots.

Old Dickie was laughing with a glint of his white teeth. He put one muddy finger on the letter spread out on the table.

"You know, you're not doing your bit, old thing!" he said genially.

'What do you mean?" replied the captain.

"You're doing ga bit, but not your bit," was the answer.

"I don't know what you're talking about," said the captain, rather ruffled. "I've been out here for a year; I've only been home on leave three times; I work on an average ten hours a day, Sundays included; I——"

"How old are you?" said Dickie.

"Same age as yourself—26. But—"

"Fit?"

"You know I'm perfectly fit. As I was saying——"

"Ever done any drill?"

"No. You see the army was glad to avail itself of my business ability. The experience I gained at the bank has been simply invaluable. I always thought you were ill advised to go into the Blankshires. Fine regiment and very gallant of you, and all that, but your business talents were simply lost, old man, as a foot-slogging infantry subaltern. Now——"

"Then you don't know what it's like getting up on a cold winter's morning, shaving by candle light and drilling dull recruits in the icy wind? You don't know the discomfort of dirty billets, of long route marches, of endless hours of boredom on the rifle range? Yu don't know the impossibilities of living on an infantry subaltern's pay?"

"Well, I suppose I don't. But I don't mind telling you——"

"Ever been in the trenches?"

"No, but——"

"Then you don't know what it is to live like a beast in a hole in the ground? You never have experienced that utter weariness of body and mind that comes to a man at stand-to in the early hours of the morning? You have never been sickened by the foul odors that dawn brings out of the ground? You have never gone out into No Man's Land on patrol, with your heart in your boots, terrified not of death but of the unknown that peoples every shadow cast by the Verey lights? You have never taken a fatigue party out at night over roads swept by machine gun fire, across broken country under shrapnel? But, perhaps, you have been under fire?"

"Well, there was an air raid at the station here, but, as a matter of fact, I was on leave at the time——"

"And, of course, you've never been over the top, never felt your heart thrill to the roar of the intensive bombardment, and warm to the splendid bravery of the men you lead? You have never seen the blood and the mud and the horror of a show like the Somme, or got that lump in the throat when you looked on your men, what was left of them, worn out and dirty and muddy like me? You've been out of the way of death, so you could hardly be expected to know how glorious life is!"

The captain lifted his head and looked at his friend, and noticed how pale and tired he seemed.

"It strikes me you think I am a funk, Dickie," he said.

"Oh, no," answered the other, "only thoughtless and rather blind."

"But," the captain went on, ignoring the interruption, "I am at the orders of the army, and if they want me for the firing line they will send me—I am quite ready to go."

"Did you read the story of the death of Loftus Jones, V.C.?" asked the other. "He might have pleaded many things so as not to have to risk his life; he might have accepted the offer of the other destroyers to help him; wounded as he was, there was no possible obligation upon him to go to the bridge of the Shark and fight the last gun. But he didn't wait for orders; he decided for himself."

"Yes, but——"

"Are you indispensable in this job of yours?"

"I think my chief is pleased with me; I joined as a lieutenant and I got my third star three months ago. And I tell you again that if they want me for the firing line they will take me."

"I am told," his friend replied, "that you do your work extremely well; but you haven't answered my question. Are you indispensable? Do you honestly think that an older man, a disabled officer, could not take your place?"

"I tell you once more that if they believe that to be the case it is up to the authorities to replace me!"

"No, it isn't, old man," answered Dickie, "and I'll tell you why. No man wants his organization disturbed, and I am perfectly sure that your chief might be considerably annoyed to lose the services of such an able and hard working fellow as yourself. But this is a question, in the first instance, not between you and your chief, but between you and your conscience. Have you ever asked to be released?"

"I can't say I have!" he replied with bowed head.

"Then you know what to do. And remember my words—when you are up against it, it's not so hard to die!"

When the captain looked up the office was empty, and he found he had fallen asleep over his unfinished letter. And then he remembered that Dickie had been killed at Serre in July.

GEN. PETAIN TRIES HIS HAND AT WRITING GAME

Paris, France.—Gen. Petain, the French commander in chief, has written a series of articles entitled "Why We Are Fighting," the first of which will appear in the Army Bulletin.

The general tells in clear and simple terms the objects of the war and why a premature peace must not be concluded. He then goes on to show at some length why and how Germany brought on the war, tracing the events of the summer of 1914.

Gen. Petain's article is commended highly by the press. The Figaro says it is an answer made in accordance with the national spirit to the abominable propaganda which is carried on in many parts of the country, even in the trenches. It would be impossible, the newspaper says, to reach the mind and the heart of the soldier more effectively than Gen. Petain has done in his first article.

A young man and a young woman leaned on the front gate. They were lovers. It was moonlight. He was loath to leave, as the parting was the last. He was about to go away.

"I'll never forget you," he said, "and if death should claim me, my last thought would be of you."

"I'll be true to you," she sobbed. "I'll never love anybody else as long as I live."

They parted. Six years later he returned. His sweetheart of former years was married and had changed greatly.

"Let me see," she mused, "was it you or your brother who was my old sweetheart?"

"Neither," he replied. "Probably my father."

MUTUAL CONFESSIONS

An English poet told in New York why he had abandoned poetry for war work.

"Even I," he said, "can't make poetry pay nowadays. In fact, as far as poetry goes, I'm a good deal like the young Washington square chap who recently got married.

"When this chap took his bride home to his tny flat she burst into tears and cried:

"'Darling, I've a dreadful confession to make to you. I can't cook.'

"'That's all right,' he said. 'And I've a confession to make in my turn. I'm a poet, and you'll have nothing to cook.'"

Various Forms Of Headache

"It is necessary in order to treat headaches properly to understand the causes which produce the affection," says Dr. J. W. Ray, of Blockton, Ala. Continuing, he says, "Physicians cannot even begin the treatment of a disease without knowing what causes give rise to it, and we must remember that headache is to be treated according to the same rule. We must not only be particular to give a remedy intended to counteract the cause which produces the headache, but we must also give a remedy to relieve the pain until the cause of the trouble has been removed. To answer this purpose anti-kamnia tablets will be found a most convenient and satisfactory remedy. One tablet every one to three hours gives comfort and rest in the most severe cases of headache, neuralgia, and particularly the headaches of women.

"When we have a patient subject to regular attacks of sick headache and when he feels the least sign of an oncoming attack, he should take two A-K Tablets. Obtainable at druggists in any quantity desired."

BY
JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD

SYNOPSIS OF FORMER CHAPTERS

In which Kazan, the wolf dog, is introduced to the readers of this story. Thorpe and his wife are living at one of the far Canadian settlements and Thorpe has just returned with Kazan, that he has picked up on his travels.

Kazan had never known the touch of a hand until Thorpe's wife caressed him for bringing her husband safely home. The touch was so strange and soothing that Kazan immediately became her devoted slave.

Kazan became domesticated under the soothing influence of Thorpe's wife and all went well until one of the desperadoes of the wilds came to Thorpe's hut. Kazan evidently recognized the ruffian McCready and snarled at him. McCready likewise though he knew Kazan but under another name and he later tested him and found that he did.

During the evening McCready drinks heavily and a devil made plan is hatched in his mind. He wakes up Thorpe on a pretence that some one is about and they go out looking for the prowler. McCready gets Thorpe to hold the lantern and they disappear in the darkness. When McCready returns Thorpe is not with him. Kazan sees him come back and wonders at Thorpe's failure to return.

McCready then goes into the hut with a deep laid plan in his drunken head. Thorpe's wife screams on his appearance, calling for Kazan. Kazan is tied tight with an iron chain but on hearing his mistress scream he makes several attempts and finally breaks the chain, bounds into the hut and leaps upon the ruffian and buries his fangs into McCready's throat until he feels the warm blood oozing therefrom. Thorpe's wife tries to pull Kazan off and finally faints in the ordeal. Now go on with the story—turned toward the dead man. Why was she so still, he wondered?

A long time passed, and then she moved. Her eyes opened. Her hand touched him.

Then he heard a step outside.

It was his master, and with that old thrill of fear—fear of the club—he went swiftly to the door. Yes, there was his master in the firelight—and in his hand he held the club. He was coming slowly, almost falling at each step, and his face was red with blood. But he had the club! He would beat him again—beat him terribly for hurting McCready; so Kazan slipped quietly under the tent-flap and stole off into the shadows. From out the gloom of the thick spruce he looked back, and a low whine of love and grief rose and died softly in his throat. They would beat him always now—after that. Even she would beat him. They would hunt him down and beat him when they found him.

From out of the glow of the fire he turned his wolfish head to the depths of the forest. There were no clubs or stinging lashes out in that gloom. They would never find him there.

For another moment he wavered. And then, as silently as one of the wild creatures whose blood was partly his, he stole away into the blackness of the night.

CHAPTER IV.
Free From Bonds

There was a low moaning of the wind in the spruce-tops as Kazan slunk off into the blackness and mystery of the forest. For hours he lay near the camp, his red and blistered eyes gazing steadily at the tent wherein the terrible thing had happened a little while before.

He knew now what death was. He could tell it farther than man. He could smell it in the air. And he knew that there was death all about him, and that he was the cause of it. He lay on his belly in the deep snow and shivered, and the three-quarters of him that was dog whined in a grief-stricken way, while the quarter that was wolf still revealed itself menacingly in his fangs, and in the vengeful glare of his eyes.

Three times the man—his master—came out of the tent, and shouted loudly, "Kazan—Kazan—Kazan!"

Three times the woman came with him. In the firelight Kazan could see her shining hair streaming about her, as he had seen it in the tent, when he had leaped up and killed the other man. In her blue eyes there was the same wild terror, and her face was white as the snow. And the second and third time, she too called, "Kazan—Kazan—Kazan!" and all that part of him that was dog, and not wolf, trembled joyously at the sound of her voice, and he almost crept in to take his beating. But fear of the club was the greater, and he held back, hour after hour, until now it was silent again in the tent, and he could no longer see their shadows, and the fire was dying down.

Cautiously he crept out from the thick gloom, working his way on his belly toward the packed sledge, and what remained of the burned logs. Beyond that sledge, hidden in the darkness of the trees, was the body of the man he had killed, covered with a blanket. Thorpe, his master, had dragged it there.

He lay down, with his nose to the warm coals and his eyes leveled between his forepaws, straight at the closed tent-flap. He meant to keep awake, to watch, to be ready to slink of into the forest at the first movemen there. But a warmth was rising from out of the gray ash of the firebed, and his eyes closed. Twice—three times—he fought himself back into watchfulness; but the last time his eyes came only half open, and closed heavily again.

And now, in his sleep, he whined softly, and the splendid muscles of his legs and shoulders twitched, and sudden shuddering ripples ran along his tawny spine. Thorpe, who was in the tent, if he had seen him, would have known that he was dreaming. And Thorpe's wife, whose golden head lay close against his breast, and who shuddered and trembled now and then even as Kazan was doing, would have known what he was dreaming about.

In his sleep he was leaping again at the end of his chain. His jaws snapped like castanets of steel,—and the sound awakened him, and he sprang to his feet, his spine as stiff as a brush, and his snarling fangs bared like ivory knives. He had awakened just in time. There was movement in the tent. His master was awake, and if he did not escape—

He sped swiftly into the thick spruce, and paused, flat and hidden, with only his head showing from behind a tree. He knew that his master would not spare him. Three times Thorpe had beaten him for snapping at McCready. The last time he would have shot him if the girl had not saved him. And now he had torn McCready's throat. He had taken the life from him, and his master would not spare him. Even the woman could not save him.

Kazan was sorry that his master had returned, dazed and bleeding, after he had tort McCready's jugular. Then he would have had her always. She would have loved him. She did love him. And he would have followed her, and fought for her always, and died for her when the time came. But Thorpe had come in from the forest again, and Kazan had slunk away quickly—for Thorpe meant to him what all men meant to him now; the club, the whip and the strange things that spat fire and death. And now—

Thorpe had come out from the tent. It was approaching dawn, and in his hand he held a rifle. A moment later the girl came out, and her hand caught the man's arm. They looked toward the thing covered by the blanket. Then she spoke to Thorpe and he suddenly straightened and threw back his head.

"H-o-o-o-o — Kazan — Kazan — Kazan!" he called.

A shiver ran through Kazan. The man was trying to inveigle him back. He had in his hand the thing that killed.

"Kazan — Kazan — Ka-a-a-a-zan!" he shouted again.

Kazan sneaked cautiously back from the tree. He knew that distance meant nothing to the cold thing of death that Thorpe held in his hand. He turned his head once, and whined softly, and for an instant a great longing filled his reddened eyes as he saw the last of the girl.

He knew, now, that he was leaving her forever, and there was an ache in his heart that had never been there before, a pain that was not of the club or whip, of cold or hunger, but which was greater than them all, and which filled him with a desire to throw back his head and cry out his loneliness to the gray emptiness of the sky.

Back in the camp the girl's voice quivered.

"He is gone."

The man's srong voice choked a little.

"Yes, he is gone. He knew—and I didn't. I'd give—a year of my life—if I hadn't whipped him yesterday and last night. He won't come back."

Isobel Thorpe's hand tightened on his arm.

"He will!" she cried. "He won't leave me. He loved me, if he was savage and terrible. And he knows that I love him. He'll come back—"

"Listen!"

From deep in the forest there came a long wailing howl, filled with a plaintive sadness. It was Kazan's farewell to the woman.

After that cry Kazan sat for a long time on his haunches, snimng the new freedom of the air, and watching the deep black pits in the forest about him, as they faded away before dawn. Now and then, since the day the traders had first bought him and put him into sledge-traces away over on the Mackenzie, he had often thought of this freedom longingly, the wolf blood in him urging him to take it. But he had never quite dared. It thrilled him now. There were no clubs here, no whips, none of the man-beasts whom he had first learned to distrust, and then to hate. It was his misfortune—that quarter-strain of wolf; and the clubs, instead of subduing him, had added to the savagery that was born in him. Men had been his worst enemies. They had beaten him time and again until he was almost dead. They called him "bad," and stepped wide of him, and never missed the chance to snap a whip over his back. His body was covered with scars they had given him.

He had never felt kindness, or love, until the first night the woman had put her warm little hand on his head, and had snuggled her face close down to his, while Thorpe—her husband—had cried out in horror. He had almost buried his fangs in her white flesh, but in an instant her gentle touch, and her sweet voice, had sent through him that wonderful thrill that was his first knowledge of love. And now it was a man who was driving him from her, away from the hand that had never held a club or a whip, and he growled as he trotted deeper into the forest.

He came to the edge of a swamp as day broke. For a time he had been filled with a strange uneasiness, and light did not quite dispel it. At last he was free of men. He could detect nothing that reminded him of their hated presence in the air. But neither could he smell the presence of other dogs, of the sledge, the fire, of companionship and food, and so far back as he could remember they had always been a part of his life.

Here it was very quiet. The swamp lay in a hollow between two ridge-mountains, and the spruce and cedar grew low and thick—so thick that there was almost no snow under them, and day was like twilight. Two things he began to miss more than all others—food and company. Both the wolf and the dog that was in him demanded the first, and that part of him that was dog longed for the latter. To both desires the wolf blood that was strong in him rose responsively. It told him that somewhere in this silent world between the two ridges there was companionship, and that all he had to do to find it was to sit back on his haunches, and cry out his loneliness. More than once something trembled in his deep chest, rose in his throat, and ended there in a whine. It was the wolf howl, not yet quite born.

Food came more easily than voice. Toward midday he cornered a big white rabbit under a log, and killed it. The warm flesh and blood was better than frozen fish, or tallow and bran, and the feast he had gave him confidence. That afternoon he chased many rabbits, and killed two more. Until now, he had never known the delight of pursuing and killing at will, even though he did not eat all he killed.

But there was no fight in the rabbits. They died too easily. They were very sweet and tender to eat, when he was hungry, but the first thrill of killing them passed away after a time. He wanted something bigger. He no longer slunk along as if he were afraid, or as if he wanted to remain hidden. He held his head up. His back bristled. His tail swung free and bushy, like a wolf's. Every hair in his body quivered with the electric energy of life and action. He traveled north and west. It was the call of early days—the days away up on the Mackenzie. The Mackenzie was a thousand miles away.

He came upon many trails in the snow that day, and sniffed the scents left by the hoofs of moose and caribou, and the fur-padded feet of a lynx. He followed a fox, and the trail led him to a place shut in by tall spruce, where the snow was beaten down and reddened with blo d. There was an owl's head, feathers, wings and enough left to tell the story. He found the trails of many rabbits, and he knew that there were other hunters abroad besides himself.

Toward evening he came upon tracks in the snow that were very much like his own. They were quite fresh, and there was a warm scent about them that made him whine, and filled him again with that desire to fall back upon his haunches and send forth the wolf-cry. This desire grew stronger in him as the shadows of night deepened in the forest. He had traveled all day, but he was not tired. There was something about night, now that there were no men near, that exhilarated him strangely. The wolf blood in him ran swifter and swifter. Tonight it was clear. The sky was filled with stars. The moon rose. And at last he settled back in the snow and turned his head straight up to the spruce-tops, and the wolf came out of him in a long mournful cry which quivered through the still night for miles.

For a long time he sat and listened after that howl. He had found voice—a voice with a strange new note in it, and it gave him still greater confidence. He had expected an answer, but none came. He had traveled in the face of the wind, and as he howled, a bull moose crashed through the scrub timber ahead of him, his horns rattling against the trees like the tattoo of a clear birch club as he put distance between himself and that cry.

Twice Kazan howled before he went on, and he found joy in the practice of that new note. He came then to the foot of a rough ridge, and turned up out of the swamp to the top of it. The stars and the moon were nearer to him there, and on the other side of the ridge he looked down upon a great sweeping plain, with a frozen lake glistening in the moonlight, and a white river leading from it off into timber that was neither so thick nor so black as that in the swamp.

And then every muscle in his body grew tense, and his blood leaped. From far off in the plain there came a cry. It was his cry—the wolf-cry. His jaws snapped. His white fangs gleamed, and he growled deep in his throat. He wanted to reply, but some strange instinct urged him not to. That instinct of the wild was already becoming master of him. In the air, in the whispering of the spruce-tops, in the moon and the stars themselves, there breathed a spirit which told him that what he had heard was the wolf-cry, but that it was not the wolf call.

The other came an hour later, clear and distinct, that same wailing howl at the beginning—but ending in a staccato of quick sharp yelps that stirred his blood at once into a fiery excitement that it had never known before. The same instinct told him that this was the call—the hunt-cry. It urged him to come quickly. A few moments later it came again, and this time there was a reply from close down along the foot of the ridge, and another from so far away that Kazan could scarcely hear it. The hunt-pack was gathering for the night chase; but Kazan sat quiet and trembling.

He was not afraid, but he was not ready to go. The ridge seemed to split the world for him. Down there it was new, and strange, and without men. From the other side something seemed pulling him back, and suddenly he turned his head and gazed back through the moonlit space behind him, and whined. It was the dog-whine now. The woman was back there. He could hear her voice. He could feel the touch of her soft hand. He could see the laughter in her face and eyes, the laughter that had made him warm and happy. She was calling to him through the forests, and he was torn between desire to answer that call, and desire to go down into the plain. For he could also see many men waiting for him with clubs, and he could hear the cracking of whips, and feel the sting of their lashes.

For a long time he remained on the top of the ridge that divided his world. And then, at last, he turned and went down into the plain.

All that night he kept close to the hunt-pack, but never quite approached it. This was fortunate for him. He still bore the scent of traces, and of man. The pack would have torn him into pieces. The first instinct of the wild is that of self-preservation. It may have been this, a whisper back through the years of savage forbears, that made Kazan roll in the snow now and then where the feet of the pack had trod the thickest.

That night the pack killed a caribou on the edge of the lake, and feasted until nearly dawn. Kazan hung in the face of the wind. The smell of blood and of warm flesh tickled his nostrils, and his sharp ears could catch the cracking of bones. But the instinct was stronger than the temptation.

Not until broad day, when the pack had scattered far and wide over the plain, did he go boldly to the scene of the kill He found nothing but an area of blood-reddened snow, covered with bones, entrails and torn bits of tough hide. But it was enough, and he rolled in it, and buried his nose in what was left, and remained all that day close to it, saturating himself with the scent of it.

That night, when the moon and the stars came out again, he sat back with fear and hesitation no longer in him, and announced himself to his new comrades of the great plain.

The pack hunted again that night, or else it was a new pack that started miles to the south, and came up with a doe caribou to the big frozen lake. The night was almost as clear as day, and from the edge of the forest Kazan first saw the caribou run out on the lake a third of a mile away. The pack was about a dozen strong, and had already split into the fatal horseshoe formation, the two leaders running almost abreast of the kill, and slowly closing in.

With a sharp yelp Kazan darted outinto the moonlight. He was directly in the path of the fleeing doe, and bore down upon her with lightning speed. Two hundred yards away the doe saw him, and swerved to the right, and the leader on that side met her with open jaws. Kazan was in with the second leader, and leaped at the doe's soft throat. In a snarling mass the pack closed in from behind, and the doe went down, with Kazan half under her body, his fangs sunk deep in her jugular. She lay heavily on him, but he did not lose his hold. It was his first big kill. His blood ran like fire. He snarled between his clamped teeth.

Not until the last quiver had left the body over him did he pull himself out from under her chest and forelegs. He had killed a rabbit that day and was not hungry. So he sat back in the snow and waited, while the ravenous pack tore at the dead doe. After a little he came nearer, nosed in between two of them, and was nipped for his intrusion.

As Kazan drew back, still hesitating to mix with his wild brothers, a big gray form leaped out of the pack and drove straight for his throat. He had just time to throw his shoulder to the attack, and for a moment the two rolled over and over in the snow. They were up before the excitement of sudden battle had drawn the pack from the feast. Slowly they circled about each other, their white fangs bare, their yellowish backs bristling like brushes. The fatal ring of wolves drew about the fighters.

It was not new to Kazan. A dozen times he had sat in rings like this, waiting for the final moment. More than once he had fought for his life within the circle. It was the sledge-dog way of fighting. Unless man interrupted with a club or a whip it always ended in death. Only one fighter could come out alive. Sometimes both died. And there was no man here—only that fatal cordon of waiting white-fanged demons, ready to leap upon and tear to pieces the first of the fighters who was thrown upon his side or back. Kazan was a stranger, but he did not fear those that hemmed him in. The one great law of the pack would compel them to be fair.

He kept his eyes only on the big gray leader who had challenged him. Shoulder to shoulder they continued to circle. Where a few moments before there had been the snapping of jaws and the rending of flesh there was now silence. Soft-footed and soft-throated mongrel dogs from the south would have snarled and growled, but Kazan and the wolf were still, their ears laid forward instead of back, their tails free and bushy.

Suddenly the wolf struck in with the swiftness of lightning, and his jaws came together with the sharpness of steel striking steel. They missed by an inch. In that same instant Kazan darted in to the side, and like knives his teeth gashed the wolf's flank.

They circled again, their eyes growing redder, their lips drawn back until they seemed to have disappeared. And then Kazan leaped for that death-grip at the throat—and missed. It was only by an inch again, and the wolf came back, as he had done, and laid open Kazan's flank so that the blood ran down his leg and reddened the snow. The burn of that flank wound told Kazan that his enemy was old in the game of fighting. He crouched low, his head straight out, and his throat close to the snow. It was a trick Kazan had learned in puppyhood—to shield his throat, and wait.

Twice the wolf circled about him, and Kazan pivoted slowly, his eyes half closed. A second time the wolf leaped, and Kazan threw up his terrible jaws, sure of that fatal grip just in front of the forelegs. His teeth snapped on empty air. With the nimbleness of a cat the wolf had gone completely over his back.

The trick had failed, and with a rumble of the dog-snarl in his throat, Kazan reached the wolf in a single bound. They met breast to breast. Their fangs clashed and with the whole weight of his body, Kazan flung himself against the wolf's shoulders, cleared his jaws, and struck again for the throat hold. It was another miss—by a hair's breadth—and before he could recover, the wolf's teeth were buried in the back of his neck.

For the first time in his life Kazan felt the terror and the pain of the death-grip, and with a mighty effort he flung his head a litite forward and snappedblindly. His powerful jaws closed on the wolf's foreleg, close to the body. There was a cracking of bone and a crunching of flesh, and the circle of waiting wolves grew tense and alert. One or the other of the fighters was sure to go down before the holds were broken, and they but awaited that fatal fall as a signal to leap in to the death.

Only the thickness of hair and hide on the back of Kazan's neck, and the toughness of his muscles, saved him from that terrible fate of the vanquished. The wolf's teeth sank deep, but not deep enough to reach the vital spot, and suddenly Kazan put every ounce of strength in his limbs to the effort, and flung himself up bodily from under his antagonist. The grip on his neck relaxed, and with another rearing leap he tore himself free.

As swift as a whip-lash he whirled on the broken-legged leader of the pack and with the full rush and weight of his shoulders struck him fairly in the side. More deadly than the throat-grip had Kazan sometimes found the lunge when delivered at the right moment. It was deadly now. The big gray wolf lost his feet, rolled upon his back for an instant, and the pack rushed in, eager to rend the last of life from the leader whose power had ceased to exist.

From out of that gray, snarling, bloody-lipped mass, Kazan drew back, panting and bleeding. He was weak. There was a curious sickness in his head. He wanted to lie down in the snow. But the old and infallible instinct warned him not to betray that weakness. From out of the pack a slim, lithe, gray she-wolf came up to him, and lay down in the snow before him, and then rose swiftly and sniffed at his wounds.

She was young and strong and beautiful, but Kazan did not look at her. Where the fight had been he was looking, at what little remained of the old leader. The pack had returned to the feast. He heard again the cracking of bones and the rending of flesh, and something told him that hereafter all the wilderness would hear and recognize his voice, and that when he sat back on his haunches and called to the moon and the stars, those swift-footed hunters of the big plain would respond to it. He circled twice about the caribou and the pack, and then trotted off to the edge of the black spruce forest.

NEW HEAD GEAR SUGGESTIONS FOR THE BACK TO THE SOIL MOVEMENT

Don't Be a Woman Bore If You Want to Be Popular

If a woman wished to be popular and remain popular, with her friends and relations it is absolutely necessary that she should avoid earning the reputation of a bore. People not only detest, but also take care to avoid the woman whose conversation and manners irritate them in any way, and who has not the tact and common sense to perceive when her talk becomes wearisome and limit it accordingly.

The man who bores is a sore trial but the woman who possesses such a characteristic is a positive affliction. Doubtless there are a few readers who have not met such a woman. She will recite for hours at a stretch the troubles — real and imaginary— which she experiences with her husband, children and servants. She will expound upon her own ailments and bore you with a recital of pains and aches sufficient to fill a hospital ward.

She also usually complains of being a bundle of nerves and yet takes a keen delight in telling you the most sensational and harrowing news which she has read, until she makes your flesh creep. And if you plead an engagement in order to escape her, she not only offers, but actually insists in a manner not to be denied on accompanying you until she has exhausted her fountain of talk.

The grievances which such a woman has to tell you are inexhaustable. No one ever understands her for the simple reason that she can never understand herself. Every one abuses her. No matter how earnestly she may work for the good of others she is always sure that no one appreciates her efforts. The truth of the matter is that she really does nothing at all without largely advertising the fact, and no one can appreciate self-praise.

She talks of the failings of her husband, children and servants, totally ignoring her own faults, which however, are very apparent to her friends. She is not with you five minutes before she begins telling you of the hours which her husband spends at the club, neglecting her night after night. No wonder you remark inwardly the poor man tries to escape the affliction as much as possible if his wife bores him as much as she bores you.

Then there is the woman whose children treat her unfeelingly. She cannot mention them without enumerating all their petty faults and failings. Her children torture them. And her servants wear into shreds. In fact, to judge from her tales, they seem to have been specifically created by a special providence to worry her into an early grave.

But of all the women who bore their friends, perhaps, the most to be despised—for really she deserves nothing but contempt—is the woman who fancies that she is entitled to fill some mission in the world, and bemoans her fate because she married a poor or incapable man who cannot help her to realize her hopes and ambitions. Such a woman makes her own life miserable, as well as the lives of every one connected with her. What action can be more mean on the part of the woman than that of giving vent to thoughts which are a continual reproach to her husband, because she is not what she thinks she ought to be? Pride should keep a woman from talking in such a manner, even although she might have dissatisfied thoughts.

The woman who will avoid becoming a bore must remember that her personal affairs and petty domestic troubles are of no particular interest to any one except, perhaps, to spiteful neighbors to whom they form food for gossip. If you meet or visit a friend the natural question is: "How are you getting on?" Or something to that effect; but there is no necessity to enter into the most minute details of your troubles or to bemoan your faith which, after all, is but cowardly. Friends have quite enough trouble and worry with their own affairs without having to listen to a long recital of what does not concern them.

Every woman, of course, is not a good conversationalist, nor possesses a happy knack of being able to entertain friends with pleasing talk. In that case it is a good plan to talk as little as possible. A good listener is always appreciated, no matter where he or she may be.

There are only a few celebrities in life. One is Mother. You can always depend on her.

Make Mother a present and it pleases her most when it is something that will divide equally among the children.

It frequently happens that Mother has better health than father and the children because she doesn't have time for sickness or any other recreation.

When a child excels its father he is teased about it, but when it excels its Mother it pleases her almost to death.

Photographs of Mother never look like her for the reason that she seems to have been idle when they were taken.

When Mother prays it is for something she wants for her children, and when father prays it is for something he wants for himself.

What a Woman Should Know If She Wants to Be Wise

If a man promises to marry a woman and the woman promises to marry the man, a civil contract has been entered into, and, so long as they are both competent to contract and there has been no fraud, it doesn't make a particle of difference what their motive was—money, marbles, or jackstraws—a valid contract has been entered into, a contract which, if either party backs out, can be cashed in before a judge and jury. We talk of the "sacredness of marriage," of "marriage sanctified by love," but in the making of the marriage contract love is not an essential There need be no higher motive than that which enters into a horse deal. This is the cold, bleak policy of the law of the state of New York, established by a leading decision.

The man who said this was Martin W. Littleton, the lawyer whose client, 85-year-old John B. Manning, has just had a judgment rendered against him for a quarter of a million dollars (breaking all previous records) for his failure to marry Honora May O'Brien, 28 years old, poor, and confessedly "tired of the drudgery of life." Under cross-examination, Miss O'Brien frankly admitted that she did not love and never had loved the old man whose failure to marry her was the fruitful source of her complaint to judge and jury.

What constitutes legal evidence that a deliberate contract of marriage was entered into? The man who thinks that he must ask a woman, in so many plain words, to marry him, and that he is not enmeshed in an engagement until he has done so, is mistaken.

The law says no formal words are necessary; nor is it necessary to constitute a contract to marry; nor is it necessary there should be a special promise in direct terms; but such a promise may be inferred from or established by the circumstances, although not especially spoken. All that is necessary is that the parties shall understand that it was their intentions to marry.

NOME SETS FASHION IN REINDEER COATS

Far up north in the locality of Nome, Point Barrow and other Arctic points, Parisian and American fashion books are not to be found in abundance. Neither are they studied religiously by the men and women in order that they may have just the right curves, frills and cuts that predominate in the fashion centers of the world.

Nevertheless Nome and the other cities 'way up in the Northland have their styles. Right at this time there looms a possibility that they may advance to the fore with a fashion that is destined to spread to the states. Possibly it may reach Paris.

It is the reindeer coat and hood. Attractive of appearance, light of weight and carrying much warmth, the reindeer garb has leaped into popularity in the Far North since it won recognition at the Igloo fair held recently in Nome.

Wins Blue Ribbon

Mrs. Walter C. Shields, wife of the superintendent of the northwest division of the Alaska bureau of education, was the first to introduce the reindeer garment as a "dress-up" coat, according to advices received in Seattle recently by William T. Lopp, head of the department, with offices in the Smith building. Now the northern populace is all excited.

At the Igloo fair the coat won a blue ribbon. It received a perfect score for tanning, sewing and quality of skins.

Who were the judges? Well, none other than Mary Oquilluk of Igloo, Nora Nowadlook of Wales, and Mollie Dexter of Chinik. They are the Baksts of the north. They have handed down their decision and have admitted the reindeer coat and hood into the fashion centers. The garb is said to be much cheaper than any other fur coat to be made or purchased in the north.

Nome doesn't very often make a bid for recognition in the fashion circles, but it is asking for a little attention this time.

THE BRIDE'S TROUSSEAU

The ideal trousseau, according to Jane French in the Mather's Magazine, is one that permits the bride to be suitably gowned on every occasion. Following is the trousseau recommended to meet every need of the summer bride:

Wedding dress, veil and gloves.
Going-away suit, with three blouses.
Afternoon gown for luncheons and teas.
Evening gown for dinners and dances.
Two afternoon gowns for home.
Two morning gowns for home.
Sport suit.
Long coat.
Negligee and bath wrapper.
Lingerin, six of each kind; stockings, eight pairs; corsets, two pairs.
Petticoats, four.
Shoes and slippers, four pairs.
Hats, two.
Gloves and handkerchiefs.

As to house linen, the bride should be careful not to lay in too large a supply. Here is a list which will be found ample:

One dozen sheets. (Two pairs better than the rest.)
One dozen pillowcases.
One dozen best towels.
One dozen everyday towels.
Eight bath towels.
Two tablecloths.
One dozen best napkins.
One dozen small napkins.

BRING YOUR SHOES HERE for expert repairing. We do it by up-to-date machines such as are used in making new shoes. You'll be more than satisfied with the result. You'll be equally satisfied with our prices. And you'll also be pleased at the little time it takes to have the work done.

Country Orders Receive Prompt Attention

Russian Revolt Was Predicted 9 Years Ago by U.S. Writer

after regiment of soldiers, many from Cronstadt, was sent into the streets of St. Petersburg, with orders to prevent the meeting arranged for that city, no difference what the cost might be. The troops were ordered to charge the crowds and clear the thoroughfares. Not an order was obeyed. Even the long-relied upon Cossacks were seized with the spirit of mutiny. Company after company of soldiers joined the revolutionists.

"Fearing their lives were in danger, the few officers that remained loyal to Nicholas hurried back to the palace to find Nicholas, long weak-minded, a mumbling paretic."

An interesting point about the above prophecy is that the prophet really came closer to the actual events of the Russian revolt than would appear from his words. He states that the revolution came "twelve years after the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese war," but then goes on to say that the actual date was May 16, 1916. Now, the Russo-Japanese war ended in 1905, so that 12 years later would be 1917 instead of 1916.

The czar of Russia was actually deposed at midnight, March 15-16, 1917. Therefore, the Ohio prophet, writing nine years ago, came within two months of hitting the exact date. Surely a prophet who comes as near as that to an event which, when he wrote, seemed absolutely beyond the bounds of probability, is entitled to pat himself on the back and feel singled out from his fellow-men.

He did not confine his prophecies to Russia. Having settled the fate of czardom, he turned his attention to Germany, and made these remarkable prognostications:

"Germany was one of the last to fall in line, the conservatism of her worthy people being a bar to hasty, ill-advised orabortive action. Kaiser Wilhelm, being a ruler of keen perceptive faculties, gracefully abdicated. While inwardly raging, he appeared so indifferent that it was somewhat paradoxical that the people chose him for their first president. He ruled justly and wisely in this capacity, making a record somewhat akin to that left by President Roosevelt of the United States. Thus was the quesion of lese-majeste, together with others of equal importance, peremptorily settled.

Stories of the War

Tommy Being Instructed To Be a Fighting Demon

(By Gilbert Seldes)

LONDON.—The day after the battle of Arras began two soldiers were found dead in a German trench. The British soldier had killed his man by thrusting his bayonet through the throat. But as the German fell he jerked his own bayonet upward and his opponent fell dead upon him.

From such incidents as this lessons are learnt and the training brought up to date in the schools which the British army has established with every command. These schools are the center of military intelligence. Everything done in them is the result of nearly three years of the most costly experience. Undoubtedly the American army will profit by this experience, and this article is written not so much in praise of the wonderful system which the British army has evolved as to give Americans a clear idea of the sort of training their own soldiers are likely to get.

The physical and bayonet training school at Aldershot and the others modeled upon it are not for soldiers. Their purpose is to instruct officers and non-commissioned officers in physical drill and bayonet work sufficiently so that they may teach conscripts to the rank and file.

The hardest thing for an American to understand is the spirit in which the training is given. Between examinations of actual work I had a talk with one of the officers in charge of the school. Here are some of the things he said:

"I know this is a crude way of putting it, but the purpose of our instruction is to teach the men to kill the enemy. It sounds brutal, but this is a brutal business we're in, and we have found that if we don't carry our men to the extreme we never get them to the point where they will kill an enemy. I think I know what squeamish people feel about this, and I don't want to give offense or express a view that I am giving you what you asked for, but we think of our own experience, and every hour we spend really counts. We depend in this war exactly as we have always depended in it. We have to fight against the climate, against the nature of the ground, against the nature of the enemy, but we have to fight against the human nature that we have, and that is why we have realized that the only way to accustom Germany to a military career is to get a certain number of German soldiers out of commission.

Kill or Be Killed

"Every instructor who leaves this school has the lives of a whole unit in his hands. He has to save the lives of the men under him and the only way he can impress the bitter necessity of the case on his men is to use the simplest language. That is why we always talk about 'killing Germans.' Believe me that it does not make us any too happy. We aren't bloodthirsty, particularly. But we are out to win the war, and the bayonet—the white arm—is the soldier's last resort. It is kill or be killed."

I put this first because it explains the whole system on which the bayonet school works and because it is the object of bayonet work always before the men, the commanding officer had a series of pictures drawn. Each one shows the sack fading like a moving picture "fadeout" into a German soldier. The student who sees these pictures hardly has to be told what his duty is.

A Versatile Weapon

After the man has learned to handle the rifle with bayonet attached he goes into the field and the whole group is divided into squadrons of 12. Six men in each group teach the other six for a time, then they change about. The men learn to point at the vital spots, the throat, at the stomach for an advancing enemy, at the kidneys for a retreating enemy. They are shown how versatile an instrument the bayonet can be. It can be used at arm's length, or long point, and it can be used for the short jab when the German is closing in and Tommy has only about five inches to work in. The men are taught also how to reverse the bayonet, beat down the German bayonet with the butt and shoot forward with the point again.

Along the side of the main field there is a course like a cinder path ready for an obstacle race. The first obstacle is a row of suspended sacks with a long stick protruding from each one. The stick represents an enemy bayonet and the men have to charge, parry the stick, drive home and withdraw.

The two operations of parrying and thrusting (technically known as "potting") must be done in one motion. After the point, the withdrawal is most important. It must be swift, clean, and must be done without upsetting the balance of the bayonetter, so that he may be ready for another enemy.

Above it has been said that the bayonet is a trench, capable like the machine in France. After the obstacle guard of sacks has been "done in" the men charge into the trench. The sacks are moved from place to place at each trial, because no one knows precisely where the Boche may be when a raid comes off. When the first line trench is cleared the men go over the top again, meet a squad of Germans holding the next trench, take them, dash into the open space beyond and throw themselves on their faces, waiting for the word of command to begin firing.

When a soldier has learned how to put three inches of cold steel into a sack and to pull it out again, he has just begun to know the mysteries of the "white arm" and has not reaped any advantages from his training. The bayonet school would lose half its purpose if it did not teach a great deal more. It keeps men fit, in connection with the physical training department, and it teaches them how to think and act like lightning. It also teaches them to think in unison. Whenever a group is sent out for training the prime necessity of cooperation is made clear at the start. Ten men in a German trench are useless if they think in 10 separate ways. They must think and work together.

A Tap on the Bash

Later on in the course the students take each other on. Two men with sticks may take on one with the bayonet, or one stick will play against two bayonets. Or the instructor may form a circle round himself, with all the men facing away from him. Then he will tap a man on the back and, as the man turns, will face him with either end of the stick. Sometimes an expert will be able to tap two or three men at one time, and the men will have to think together, so that they each do their bit without falling over or tripping up the next man.

The students are taught to accustom their men to the fact that they will seldom meet a single German and be allowed "to call it a day." There is always another round the corner. It is never enough to plunge. The attacking bayonet must be thrown aside, the point made and withdrawn, and the proper attitude for the next one must be taken, all in a matter of seconds, not of minutes.

In the gymnasium itself the men are taught to guard while being attacked by a second enemy. A good look or a shove from the shoulder has saved many lives while the bayonet was occupied.

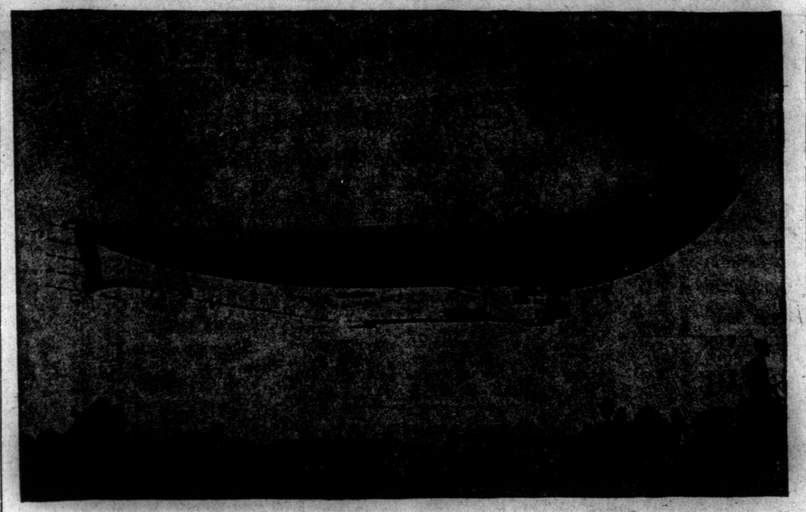
The final step in bayonet work is in the trenches. A section of the field has been dug up for trenches, with all the German tricks of the trade—false alleys, sharp and misleading corners, trenches which can be caught with enfilade fire, traverses around which a squad of Germans may be hiding, dugouts, and the rest. In these trenches are a number of Germans—sacks and sticks with dummy heads, placed in different positions for each attack. Sometimes the first line is stripped of men; at others most of the enemy are waiting to receive the first wave of the British infantry.

The attack starts after a bombardment, which is either left to the imagination or shown by smoke. The men come over in successive waves, leaping over their parapet, sneaking or rushing up to the German trench system.

The first wave leaps over the trench with a shout and attacks the Germans behind the parados. A moment after they have started the second wave is coming over, more cautiously. These men go down into the trenches by twos. The leader scouts for dugouts and slowly works up to the place where the trench divides. Where he is met by a trench shaped like the letter T, with an additional spur off to one side, he must make a quick decision. He cannot cross the open space without being sniped, and yet he knows there may be a German in the next bay of the trench. Or he may have to go down into a dugout and clear it.

They Jump Forward

In any case he must not work alone. The instructor, standing above the trenches, watches him not only for his work, but for his co-operation with the other men near him.



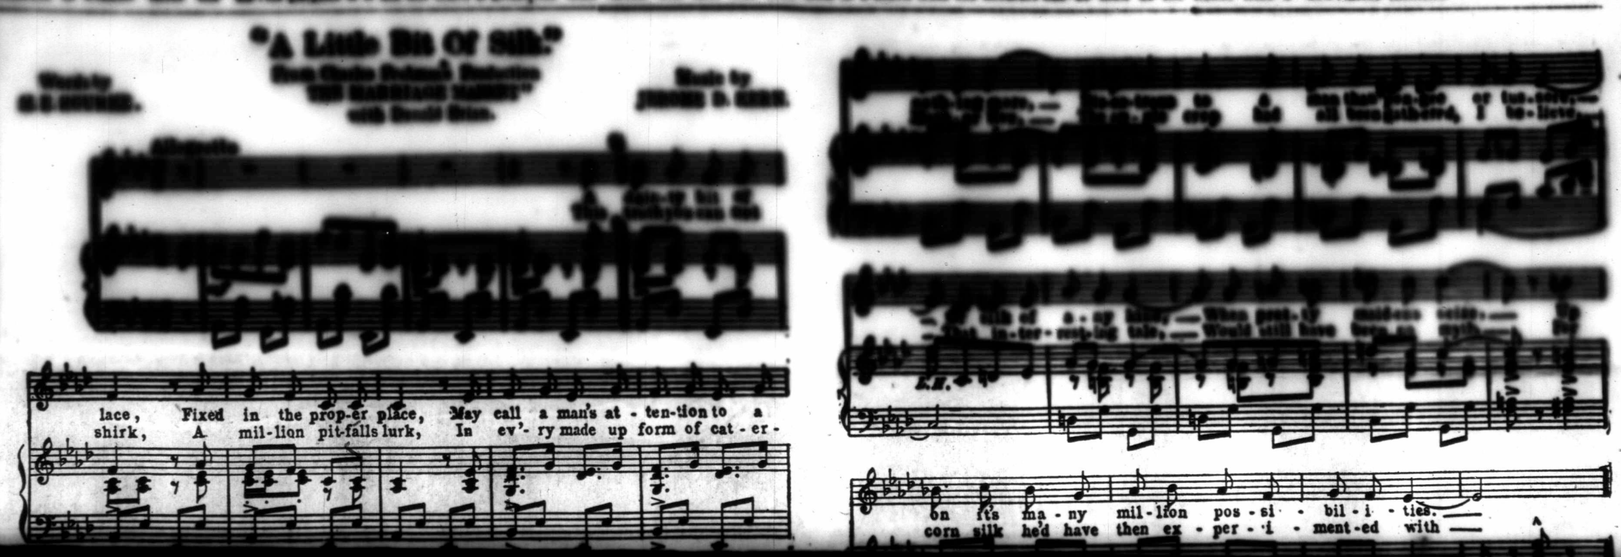
The men are watched for aggressiveness, for judgment, for quick intelligence, and they are eager to make a good showing. But the eye of the instructor does not worry them half so much as the bag of straw frightens them. They jump every time they see one. Fortunately, the training which has gone before makes them jump forward, with the bayonet fixed for attack.

The actual training in the trenches is the test of a man's ability to face the enemy in France. He comes up against every possible situation and as soon as the Boche tries a new dodge it is reported back and is incorporated in the work. Where the risk of injury is minimized the groups may divide themselves off into opposing parties and go into the trenches, but experience has shown that the safest and most productive way is to teach the man the actual thrust of the bayonet, even if the enemy be of straw.

Co-operating with the bayonet training is the course in "physical." The German training has been on the "strong man" system almost entirely. If a man can chin himself 20 times he gets a good mark. If he can lift a heavy load he is a good man. The British method, based on the Swedish drill of Ling, has nothing whatever to do with mere strength. It aims at fitness.

The purpose of "physical" is to make each man fit. This involves, apart from mere health, the harmonious development of the whole framework, the internal organs, the muscular system and most particularly the nerves and the brain. Every man must be alert. He must be able to understand orders clearly and to execute them quickly. He must understand the first principle of training, which is to do the proper thing in the proper way.

THE NEW ITALIAN DIRIGIBLE



Captain Murray Sueter, director of the Air Department of the British Navy, and Engineer-Lieutenant Aldwell have been attending on behalf of the British Admiralty a series of trial flights made near the new "Forlanini" airship. The vessel has a gas capacity of 400,000 cubic feet, and combines many of the advantages of the rigid and non-rigid types. The flights were of three hours' duration each, and they are stated to have been very successful. The envelope is of the fish shaped pattern. A strong steel girder runs its whole length and, with the cabins and engine room, which are grafted on to it, forms the keel of the vessel. The car, which is completely enclosed and has windows, is divided into fourteen compartments. Looked at from a distance, the cabins appear to be part of the gasbag.

MANUFACTURING ON LARGE SCALE IS ECONOMICAL

One large automobile company employs 17,000 men and turns out 1,000 cars a day. This would mean that one day's work of 17 men is all that is required to produce a complete car at a labor cost of say $85. Of course, such is not actually the case, but it illustrates the economy possible when manufacturing is carried out on a large scale with the latest facilities.

Tommy Being Instructed To Be a Fighting Demon

(By Gilbert Seldes)

LONDON.—The day after the battle of Arras began two soldiers were found dead in a German trench. The British soldier had killed his man by thrusting his bayonet through the throat. But as the German fell he jerked his own bayonet upward and his opponent fell dead upon him.

From such incidents as this lessons are learnt and the training brought up to date in the schools which the British army has established with every command. These schools are the center of military intelligence. Everything done in them is the result of nearly three years of the most costly experience. Undoubtedly the American army will profit by this experience, and this article is written not so much in praise of the wonderful system which the British army has evolved as to give Americans a clear idea of the sort of training their own soldiers are likely to get.

The physical and bayonet training school at Aldershot and the others modeled upon it are not for soldiers. Their purpose is to instruct officers and non-commissioned officers in physical drill and bayonet work sufficiently so that they may teach essentials to the rank and file.

The hardest thing for an American to understand is the spirit in which the training is given. Between exhibitions of actual work I had a talk with one of the officers in charge of the school. Here are some of the things he said:

"I know this is a crude way of putting it, but the purpose of our instruction is to teach the men to kill Germans. It sounds beastly, but this is a beastly business we're in, and we know that if we don't equip our men to kill Germans the Germans will jolly well kill us. I think I know what America is going to go through—and please understand that I don't want to give advice or anything of that sort. I am giving you what you asked for, the result of our own experience, and heaven knows we paid dearly enough for it. We started in this war exactly as you have started in it. We have nothing against the German people, any more than you have. We do not want to annihilate the German people. But we have realized that the only way to overthrow Germany as a military power is to put a certain number of German soldiers out of commission.

Kill or Be Killed

"Every instructor who leaves this school has the lives of a whole unit in his hands. He has to save the lives of the men under him and the only way he can impress the bitter necessity of the case on his men is to use the simplest language. That is why we always talk about 'killing Germans.' Believe me that it does not make us any too happy. We aren't bloodthirsty, particularly. But we are out to win the war, and the bayonet—the white arm—is the soldier's last resort. It is kill or be killed."

I put this first because it explains the whole system on which the bayonet school works and because it is a very hard thing to get used to. At the school you can see a dozen men charging with fixed bayonets against a row of sacks suspended from a crossbar. Their eyes are hot, their faces are flushed, and you can hear them yell as the bayonet strikes home and yell again as they dash into a trench where more sacks are lying about waiting to be stabbed.

Unless you know that the men have been taught to be afraid of every sack you cannot understand the reason for their breathless rage and for the triumphant grunt with which they greet a home strike. After the first few days the men realize that each sack is a German with a pistol or bayonet, waiting for them. And that delay means death.

Before the war bayonet training was something else. Two men, heavily padded and with masks, would take muskets with trick bayonets made to slip back into the musket as a stage dagger slides back into the handle when a touch is made.

The two men would hop about each other like fencers, and every touch counted so many points, until a victory was won. There was nothing bloodthirsty about that sort of exercise, but it was utterly useless for war.

The present period of instruction lasts more than two weeks, but the actual working days are never up to 14.

From the beginning the men are impressed with the reality of their work. The bag of straw was first used in England. In order to keep the object of bayonet work always before the men, the commanding officer had a series of pictures drawn. Each one shows the sack fading like a moving picture "fadeout" into a German soldier. The student who sees these pictures hardly has to be told what his duty is.

A Versatile Weapon

After the man has learned to handle the rifle with bayonet attached he goes into the field and the whole group is divided into squadrons of 12. Six men in each group teach the other six for a time, then they change about. The men learn to point at the vital spots, the throat, at the stomach for an advancing enemy, at the kidneys for a retreating enemy. They are shown how versatile an instrument the bayonet can be. It can be used at arm's length, or long point, and it can be used for the short jab when the German is closing in and Tommy has only about five inches to work in. The men are taught also how to reverse the bayonet, beat down the German bayonet with the butt and shoot forward with the point again.

Along the side of the main field there is a course like a cinder path ready for an obstacle race. The first obstacle is a row of suspended sacks with a long stick protruding from each one. The stick represents an enemy bayonet and the men have to charge, parry the stick, drive home and withdraw.

The two operations of parrying and thrusting (technically known as "pointing") must be done in one motion. After the point, the withdraw is most important. It must be swift, clean, and must be done without upsetting the balance of the bayoneter, so that he may be ready for another enemy.

About 50 feet beyond the suspended sacks is a trench, exactly like the trenches in France. After the advance guard of sacks has been "done in" the men charge into the trench. The sacks are moved from place to place at each trial, because no one knows precisely where the Boche may be when a raid comes off. When the first line trench is cleared the men go over the top again, meet a squad of Germans holding the next trench, take them, dash into the open space beyond and throw themselves on their faces, waiting for the word of command to begin firing.

When a soldier has learned how to put three inches of cold steel into a sack and to pull it out again, he has just begun to know the mysteries of the "white arm" and has not reaped any advantages from his training. The bayonet school would lose half its purpose if it did not teach a great deal more. It keeps men fit, in connection with the physical training department, and it teaches them how to think and act like lightning. It also teaches them to think in unison. Whenever a group is sent out for training the prime necessity of cooperation is made clear at the start. Ten men in a German trench are useless if they think in 10 separate ways. They must think and work together.

A Tap on the Back

Later on in the course the students take each other on. Two men with sticks may take on one with the bayonet, or one stick will play against two bayonets. Or the instructor may form a circle round himself, with all the men facing away from him. Then he will tap a man on the back and, as the man turns, will face him with either end of the stick. Sometimes an expert will be able to tap two or three men at one time, and the men will have to think together, so that they each do their bit without falling over or tripping up the next man.

The students are taught to accustom their men to the fact that they will seldom meet a single German and be allowed "o call it a day." There is always another round the corner. It is never enough to plunge. The attacking bayonet must be thrown aside, the point made and withdrawn, and the proper attitude for the next one must be taken, all in a matter of seconds, not of minutes.

In the gymnasium itself the men are taught to point while being attacked by a second enemy. A good kick or a shove from the shoulder has saved many lives while the bayonet was occupied.

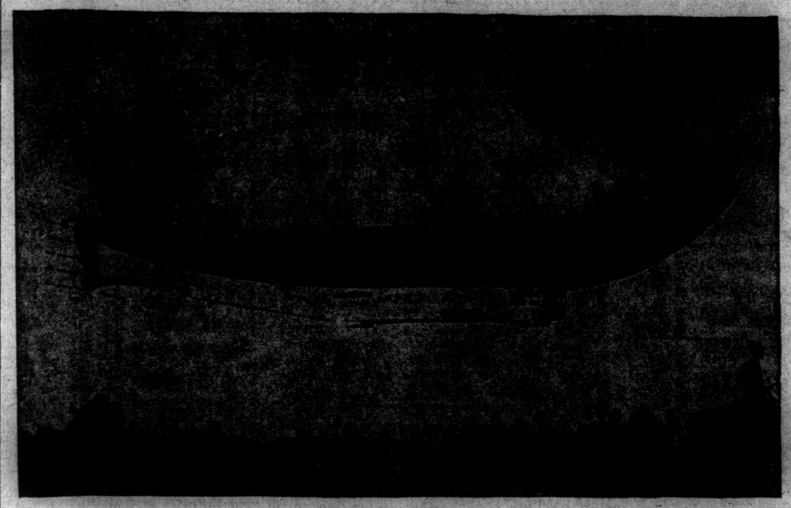
The final step in bayonet work is in the trenches. A section of the field has been dug up for trenches, with all the German tricks of the trade—false alleys, sharp and misleading corners, trenches which can be caught with enfilade fire, traverses around which a squad of Germans may be hiding, dugouts, and the rest. In these trenches are a number of Germans—sacks and sticks with dummy heads, placed in different positions for each attack. Sometimes the first line is stripped of men; at others most of the enemy are waiting to receive the first wave of the British infantry.

The attack starts after a bombardment, which is either left to the imagination or shown by smoke. The men come over in successive waves, leaping over their parapet, sneaking or rushing up to the German trench system.

The first wave leaps over the trench with a shout and attacks the Germans behind the parados. A moment after they have started the second wave is coming over, more cautiously. These men go down into the trenches by twos. The leader scouts for dugouts and slowly works up to the place where the trench divides. Where he is met by a trench shaped like the letter T, with an additional spur off to one side, he must make a quick decision. He cannot cross the open space without being sniped, and yet he knows there may be a German in the next bay of the trench. Or he may have to go down into a dugout and clear it.

They Jump Forward

In any case he must not work alone. The instructor, standing above the trenches, watches him not only for his work, but for his co-operation with the other men near him.



The men are watched for aggressiveness, for judgment, for quick intelligence, and they are eager to make a good showing. But the eye of the instructor does not worry them half so much as the bag of straw frightens them. They jump every time they see one. Fortunately, the training which has gone before makes them jump forward, with the bayonet fixed for attack.

The actual training in the trenches is the test of a man's ability to face the enemy in France. He comes up against every possible situation and as soon as the Boche tries a new dodge it is reported back and is incorporated in the work. Where the risk of injury is minimized the groups may divide themselves off into opposing parties and go into the trenches, but experience has shown that the safest and most productive way is to teach the man the actual thrust of the bayonet, even if the enemy be of straw.

Co-operating with the bayonet training is the course in "physical." The German training has been on the "strong man" system almost entirely. If a man can chin himself 20 times he gets a good mark. If he can lift a heavy load he is a good man. The British method, based on the Swedish drill of Ling, has nothing whatever to do with mere strength. It aims at fitness.

The purpose of "physical" is to make each man fit. This involves, apart from mere health, the harmonious development of the whole framework, the internal organs, the muscular system and most particularly the nerves and the brain. Every man must be alert. He must be able to understand orders clearly and to execute them quickly. He must understand the first principle of training, which is to do the proper thing in the proper way.

Over-talented.

AH, better far it is to be
Blest with one gift that shines
Than cursed with mediocrity
In half-a-dozen lines!

For instance: You could hardly name
A thing Jones couldn't do;
Of ways to reach success and fame
A score at least he knew.

But yet his talents, strange to say,
Were not of much avail
In helping him to make his way
Or fill his dinner pail.

While Smith, whose wit and skill are small,
His course triumphant goes;
On one thing only can he call,
But that one thing he knows.

And so Jones hustles hard and long
To make his two ends meet,
While Smith in power waxes strong
And lives on Easy Street.

Hence we contend: Far better be
Blest with one gift that shines
Than cursed with mediocrity
In half-a-dozen lines.

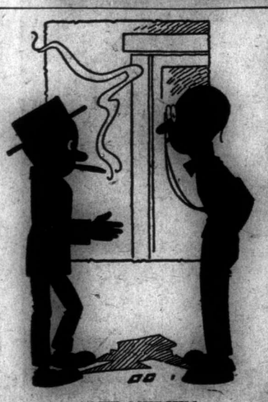
"Does your wife care anything about baseball?"

"She never did until one day she heard me say that they were going to play two games for one admission."



A Good Manager.

A DENVER newspaper woman whose income is never less than $2,000 a year, went into a department store to purchase a pair of stockings.

The silk-and-jewaled saleagirl contemptuously threw down the asked-for lisle threads, and then, in the condescending manner of some of her kind, opened a box of the three-dollar silk variety.

"These," she said loftily, "are quite nice for the price. I've worn them for several years and find them very satisfactory."

"Good gracious! What a manager you must be!" cried the customer admiringly. "If I could make my salary go as far proportionately as you do yours, I could have a yacht, a French car and a country estate!"

A SAFE MEDIUM.

Advertising Man—You say you prefer our paper above all others for your ad?

Advertiser—Yes, this time I'm advertising a roll of bills I found on the street and I don't want to risk having someone see the ad and claim the roll.

YAWNS OF THE MAN.

TRAVELERS' tales which often add charm to the conversation of an agreeable person frequently render a bore more tiresome than ever, a fact that was amusingly illustrated by an occurrence in a well-known clubhouse recently.

"There I stood, gentlemen," the long winded narrator was saying, after droning on for an hour with reference to his trip to Switzerland, "there I stood, with the abyss yawning in front of me."

"Pardon me," hastily interjected one of the unfortunate men who had been obliged to listen to the story, "but was that abyss yawning before you got there?"

An Unpleasant Landing.

"That's nothing. Hammocks often fall."

"Yes, but Helen's little brother Earlie had put three or four garden rakes under this one, with the teeth standing up."

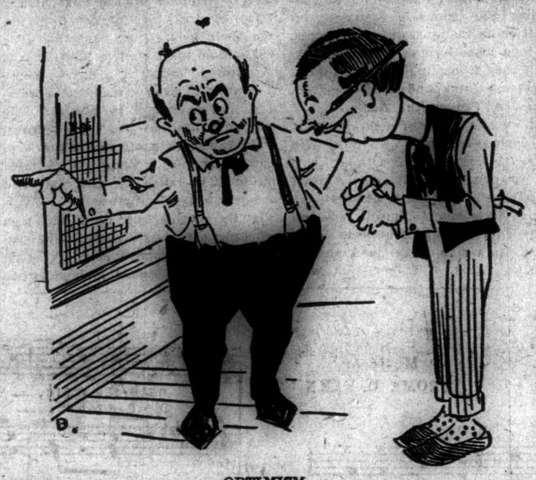
GREAT ATTRACTION.

Stranger—How in the world did you succeed in interesting so many of your boarders in that fishing pool when no one has caught a fish there in the last five years?

Hotelkeeper—Sh! I labeled an old jug "Rye, 1870," dropped it overboard and had the hired man fish it up. Ever since that I can't keep my guests away from that pool.

A Receipt for His Brain.

AN Ohio politician enjoys telling of a discussion he once overheard in a country grocery store.



In some way the argument, quite a heated one, degenerated into a dispute in which one side took the position that the others were crazy to entertain such political tenets as theirs.

At this point a solemn looking individual who up to this time had held his peace suddenly interjected:

"Gents, I want to say that I'm the only sane man here that has the papers to prove it!"

The crowd gazed upon him in astonishment.

"It is true, gents," continued the solemn looking individual as he drew forth a document from the recesses of his coat. "Here's my discharge from the state insane asylum!"

OPTIMISM.

The Result After Three Years' War

Britain Declared War Three Years Ago Saturday — Millions Have Been Killed and the Cost Has Been Enormous

To think back it seems inconceivable that the war, caused by a petty quarrel in the Balkans and the assassination of the Archduke of Austria and his consort, has been raging now for three long years—years of terrible hardships for event the people living most remote. Over five million soldiers and one million civilians lie buried on the plains of Europe and on the sands of the ocean bottom—costing humanity between seventy-five and a hundred billion dollars. Upwards of 40,000,000 men have gone forth to war and not a living man has been left unstirred by that dreadful, wasteful fire that has scourged the globe.

The widespread destruction is something amazing. Scores of great cities, hundreds of towns and thousands of villages lie in ruins, while millions of homes have been devastated. All new enterprises such as railroads, schools, colleges, churches, and myriads of other works of peace have been stopped and instead, the old used up very rapidly, for lack of men and lack of time to repair these cause great deterioration. Somewhere around 10,000,000 tons of ocean shipping lies at the bottom of the sea, the prey of submarines, mines and raider cruisers. Just imagine! How many years of toil will it take to replace all that has been destroyed?

Countries have learned to appreciate the value of human productivity, since so many human have died. They have found out that conserving human health and lives are very essential, especially in war time, and henceforth the world is to be bettered by the blessed yet bitter experience. Inventions have been very common, but the human value has been surprisingly small because most of the wonders invented were of such nature that they would destroy life. However this war has set the world a pace in two directions: the conquest of the air and the new marvels in the medical line gained by surgeons tending to the wounded.

The changes on the map we do not know, but we do know that human society has been greatly altered. Russia has changed from an absolute burdensome autocracy to the world's freest and most liberal democracy, with high ideals. Germany has a chancellor who has no "von" attached to his name, showing that though as yet the militarists rule, the once-slaves are worrying the authorities very much. People are beginning to realize that a strong people's government is very necessary—leaders lead the people to victory. The British government has taken over industrial plants to run on war work, while France, Italy and Germany have done the same—United States also. Women are recognised as important, as they render much service at home, producing and manufacturing, while the men fight, and thus they have gained equal suffrage with men. In most countries idleness in war time is a crime now, thus everyone has to do their bit.

Theoretical education has practically ceased in most warring countries, and in others the output of doctors, lawyers and other students are very few, however experience (education) has flourished; peasants who have toiled for years in one locality have had a chance to meet people in distant countries, meet different scenes and learn of different ways. How history repeats itself!

We thought that Kitchener's prediction of a three years' war was pessimistic, but now it seems different. The three years are up and the war still raging.

One Hundred Important Events of World's Greatest War

June 28, 1914—Archduke Ferdinand, heir presumptive to Austrian throne, and wife assassinated at Serajavo, Bosnia, by Slav student, Princip, giving the pretext for war.

July 23—Austria delivers famous ultimatur to Serbia, charging assassination plot was hatched on Serb soil.

July 28—Serbia having agreed to all Austrian demands save one, Austria declares war.

August 1—Germany declares war on Russia.

August 3—Germany declares war on France and invades Belgium.

August 4—Great Britain declares a state of war by act of Germany.

August 23—Japan at war with Germany.

August 27—Germans burn Louvain, Belgium.

War in Near East

August 29—Russians crushed in battle near Tannenburg, Prussia.

September 5-10—Germans turned back by French and British in the battle of the Marne.

September 12—Battle of the Aisne begins.

October 21-31—First battle of Ypres.

October 30—Russia declares war on Turkey.

November 1—Germans sink Admiral Cradock's British fleet off Chile.

November 10-12—Second battle at Ypres.

December 1—General De Wet captured, ending South African revolt.

December 5—Serbians defeat Austrians.

December 8—British sink German fleet off Falkland Islands.

April 22—Gas used first in war by Germans at Ypres.

April 25—Allies land at Dardanelles.

May 4—Lusitania sunk unwarned by U-boat; 1,000 die, of whom more than 100 are Americans.

May 22—Italy declares war on Austria.

June 2—Teutons retake Przemysl.

August 5—Germans capture Warsaw.

First Diver Pledge

September 1—Germany promises United States to sink no more liners without warning.

September 3—Czar succeeds Grand Duke Nicholas in command of Russian armies.

September 24-25—Allies in drive in France capture 25,000.

October 5—Allies land at Saloniki.

October 9—Germans occupy Belgrade.

October 10—Bulgaria attacks Serbia.

December 4—Ford peace party sails.

December 9—Germany announces Serbia entirely conquered.

December 13—Allies evacuate Gallipoli.

February 14, 1916—Russians capture Erzerum, Turkey.

February 23—Germans open Verdun offensive.

April 18—Russians take Trebizond, Turkey.

April 24—Irish revolt in Dublin.

April 28—British besieged in Kut-el-Amara, Mesopotamia, surrender.

May 30—Battle of Jutland; fourteen British and eighteen German warships sunk.

New Kingdom Rises

June 27—British and French in great drive in west.

July 9—Submarine merchantman Deutschland reaches Baltimore.

July 10—Russians take Stanislau, Galicia.

July 27—Russians retake Brody, Northern Galicia.

July 28—Capt. Charles Fryatt of a British merchant ship which had sunk a U-boat, executed by Germany.

August 9—Italians take Gorizia.

August 28—Rumania enters war on side of Entente, and invades Transylvania.

September 6—Germany begins great squeeze of Rumania.

November 10—First great air battle of world's history; 67 British, French and German airplanes brought down.

Crossed the Ocean In Skiff All Alone

Washington, D. C.—The American legation at The Hague has forwarded to the state department a letter making inquiries concerning the whereabouts of Miss M. Gardiner, daughter of Capt. J. H. Gardiner, who left Shelbourne, N. S., on June 19, 1893, in an effort to cross the Atlantic in a 15-foot sailboat of his own make.

Capt. Gardiner was last heard of about 800 miles east of New York, when Capt. Crowley, of the British steamship Verejane, picked him up and outfitted his boat with supplies.

Capt. Gardiner insisted on continuing his solitary journey across the ocean, although he said that he had had hard luck in the journey out of Shelbourne. He was bound for Falmouth. He said that he was trying that method of crossing the ocean in an effort "to make a name for himself."

What the U.S. Has Done To Win War

Ten millions of men registered under a comprehensive plan for an orderly procedure in raising the armed forces of the country, and all of them assigned to their relative places within that body;

A regular army trebled and a national guard more than doubled through voluntary enlistment, with a united force now of more than half a million men;

An aircraft program of great proportions in process of realization;

Substantial orders of weapons from small arms to heaviest artillery in process of rapid manufacture;

Great camps throughout the country beginning to turn out their thousands of intensively trained officers for the new troops and a second series of camps about to begin;

Huge cantonments being rushed to completion for the housing of a half million men called into action under the selective draft law and extensive canvas camps coming into being for the accommodation of the national guard;

Special camps to provide for thousands of men in the hospital companies and units;

Specialized forces, such as engineers, forestry men and aviators, being dispatched to the aid of our allies.

THE WELCOME RAIN

There was a heavy downpour of rain over the northern farming districts, saving many a farmer hundreds of acres of crop, and bringing smiles to the toiler's face. It is felt tha tthe rain has done a great deal of good, especially in the southern parts.

BRITAIN MAKES LARGE INCREASE IN AIR FLEETS

London.—The output of aircraft in Great Britain is considerably on the increase, according to Dr. Addison, minister of munitions.

"No fewer than 100 factories are engaged on some process or other connected with the construction and equipment of the flying machine," he said. "The output is increasing by leaps and bounds. If for the purpose of comparison you put the number of airplanes produced in May, 1916, at 100, then in May of this year the number rose to rather more than 300. Even this rate of increase is being accelerated. A growing number of workers are employed in the airplane factories, the increase in the last five months being 25 per cent. on the previous total."

Railroads Offering Special Low Rate

From this date until August 20th a special one cent rate is in effect on the western roads for all harvest hands who desire to come west.

According to an official at Edmonton proper arrangements have been made for bringing in a large number of laborers from the coast as well as from eastern points.

It had been stated that Saskatchewan alone would require 20,000 harvesters, but unless the crop turns out a good deal better than now seems likely that number is pretty certainly an exaggeration. Alberta will probably need from 7,000 to 8,000 and at present it looks as if the three provinces together will take in the vicinity of 30,000 in addition to the men already on the ground. It was believed by the delegates to the Winnipeg conference that the required number of harvesters could be secured without much difficulty, although the war conditions in the United States will most likely prevent as large an influx from that source as might otherwise have been the case.

Steps are now being taken by the Alberta authorities to open up labor bureaus at Calgary and Lethbridge. A bureau is already in operation in Edmonton, and men are being supplied with places every day. The special cent-a-mile rate went into effect August 1, and is expected to bring in a large number of men from the several sources now being canvassed, reports from the recruiting men recently sent out being to the effect that the prospects are reasonably good. The reduced railway rate applies to the Canadian Pacific, Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern roads, but not to the Edmonton & Dunvegan.

Millions Were Made By Food Speculators

The Government Expert Discovers That Food Merchants and Cold Storage Men Are Fleecing the People

Ottawa, Canada—The sensational report made by W. F. O'Connor, the cost of living commissioner, and which revealed the vast profits made by food speculators and cold storage men, has startled the country.

The most serious charge made in the report is that the company headed by Sir Joseph Flavelle, head of the imperial munitions board of Canada, made $5,000,000 in 1916 as the result of the spectacular jump in the price of bacon.

Another packing house and cold storage concern, Matthews-Blackwell, Ltd., which shared with Sir Joseph's company a monopoly of the bacon industry in Canada, according to Commissioner O'Connor, cleaned up $1,600,000 during the same period. These two companies sold 140,000,000 pounds of bacon out of the 151,000,000 pounds sold by the cold storage plants of Canada.

Profits Nearly Doubled

In 1916 the Flavelle company exported, principally for use of soldiers fighting in France, 95,000,000 pounds of bacon. This they sold at a margin of profit of 5.05 cents a pound, aggregating $4,898,000. The year previous the company exported 57,000,000 pounds at a margin of profit of 3.67 cents. In 1914 the company sold 14,990,000 pounds at a margin of profit of 3.06 cents.

"There is no evidence of correspondingly increased storage or other costs," observes Commissioner O'Connor, commenting on the jump in price for 1916 over the previous two years. Then he asks: "The margin of 3.67 cents was sufficiently satisfactory and profitable in 1915, so why not in 1916?"

Millions Made in Eggs

The Flavelle company made millions more on ham, eggs, cheese, etc., and one firm, the Burns company, made a profit of 16 cents on each dozen eggs it sold, and it sold 200,000 dozen.

The O'Connor report also declares that the excessive quantities of beef, ham, bacon, mutton, and lamb now held in cold storage are being held by speculators, and that the prices of these meats should drop forthwith. The accompanying figures, based on returns sent by two-thirds of the companies of Canada, show the amount of the chief food products held in cold storage on July 1 of this year and the same day last year:

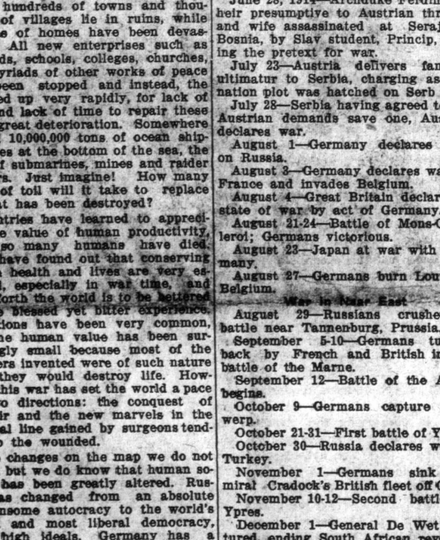
	July 1, '17	July 1, '16
Eggs, dozen	3,590,861	8,012,372
Butter, pounds..	4,306,685	4,052,354
Cheese, pounds..	4,674,233	5,810,654
Beef, pounds ...	6,615,415	4,479,106
Pork, pounds ...	27,622,902	19,311,831
Bacon, pounds ..	9,493,355	6,771,075
Ham, pounds ...	1,518,232	1,367,349
Mutton and lamb, pounds	566,832	186,536

Liberals To Convene at Winnipeg August 7th and 8th

The Liberal convention to be held at Winnipeg, August 7-8, will be of historic value, as this is the first opportunity for the west to express its views as a unit in federal matters. Events leading up to it are rapidly progressing.

As the present situation in Canada is a grave one—in fact the most serious since confederation, it is felt that every true Canadian citizen will deem it his duty to lend a willing hand. There are to be four delegates from each constituency, who will arrange a platform for the party. It is hoped that these men will do their duty by considering problems which are of real national value. The west is to be considered first; however that will not interfere with other matters.

Owing to the fact that so many of the representatives come from distant places the convention has decided to cut the cost of transportation by allowing every delegate or visitor to buy his ticket direct to Winnipeg (one-way) and obtain a standard convention certificate, which will be exchanged at Winnipeg by a free return ticket. Passengers who buy tickets from the conductor, should get off at the nearest divisional point and obtain a ticket for the remainder of the journey, with a certificate—the ticket issued by the conductor must be attached to the certificate.



The accommodation at the numerous hotels will be reserved for delegates and visitors. The Royal Alexandra hotel, where the convention is to be held, has 500 rooms; the Fort Garry hotel 300; and several others with 200 rooms.

The committee on arrangements have issued invitations for a reception to be tendered to Hon. H. C. Brewster, premier of British Columbia; Hon. A. L. Sifton, premier of Alberta; Hon. W. M. Martin, premier of Saskatchewan, and Hon. T. C. Norris, premier of Manitoba, and other distinguished guests. The function will be held at the Royal Alexandra hotel on Monday evening, August 6, from 8 to 11 o'clock, and will be informal; there will be music and addresses, which promises a very enjoyable evening.

WILL BE SHORTAGE OF HELP FOR HARVEST

There will be a shortage of help this fall from all reports of press and the government source of information. Farmers should get busy and hire their help at once and be sure that they will get their crop off and not wait for the same to get ripe before trying to locate that hired man. The provincial board of labor at Regina want 20,000 men, and its a lead-pipe cinch that few men are going to get by that hustling burg for the harvest fields in the west until they get their wants filled.

COMMENTS AND CRITICISM

PREMIUMS ARE FORTHCOMING

In reply to the request of our contemporary regarding the delivery of the casseroles, The Standard has been so swamped with circulation orders that we have been unable to fulfil the contracts as rapidly as the subscribers desired. Still, the premiums are forthcoming and we thank our contemporary for the opportunity to acquaint our advertisers with the fact that we had secured over 5,000 additional subscribers through this means. Can our contemporary show as good a record in twice the time?

THE ANNUAL CALL FOR HELP

The same old annual cry from the same old source—what are we going to do for harvest hands? Only this year the call seems just a little more strenuous and just a little more appealing. Perhaps the cry is not any more strenuous than former years but because of the shortage of labor of all kinds and the high cost of living this call sinks deeper into our consciousness.

Forty thousand hands are going to be needed in Western Canada and twenty thousand in Alberta to gather in the bountiful crops that nature has blessed the people of this country with. And if labor should fail us at this critical moment a profitable crop will be turned into an unfortunate loss and a smiling nation into a weeping one.

So much depends upon the success of this year's crop that superhuman efforts should be made by the government and provincial authorities to see that help is provided at all hazards.

THE FARMERS' DUTY

In this time of war there is a special duty laid upon every citizen. Some have to bear arms and risk their lives and safety on dangerous seas, and on the battle fronts in Europe. Others must care for those of them who are wounded and in performing that duty risk their lives almost equally with those who do the actual fighting. There are so many brave men performing such duties for their country that those of us who remain at home in safety and security must needs feel the obligation on us to do our part.

The farmers have an important duty, a vital national economic function imposed upon them. They must provide food for our armies, food for our families at home and food for our allies abroad. The great and vital importance of this service has been recognized and the farmers of the country are directed to be given and will receive especial considerations in the matter of exemption from military service.

The service that the farmers of the country are to perform is in the highest degree patriotic, but it is to be profitable, too. Never before has the farmer had such a market for his products or such tremendous purchasers as he has now in the governments of the United States, Canada and Allies.

The farmers are given an easy way to serve their country, show their patriotism, and greatly benefit themselves. Money is needed to feed, equip, arm, and clothe our soldiers at the front. And money is needed, too, to buy the products of the farms for our army and the armies and navies of our Allies. A great proportion of this money has been raised and is to be raised by the sale of loan bonds. The farmer in supporting the loan serves his country, his people, and himself, and he serves, too, the cause of liberty, the cause of humanity and civilization.

THE CO-OPERATIVE SPIRIT OF CALGARY

Calgary is waking up and the progressive spirits of the Calgary Ad club, the Rotary club, the Board of Trade and several other organizations are to be commended for the good work they have been doing within the past few months to instil new life into the city and its business interests.

The co-operative spirit that predominates now throughout the city is evident in every walk of business. Men of different kins and clans all meet upon an equal footing and the glad hand of goodfellowship is extended everywhere.

The old snobbishness of James for Jim is disappearing and William and Billy now meet on an equal footing and call each other b ytheir first names in affectionate good nature.

It is a good sign this friendly feeling. It is conducive to the welfare of the community and it means success and happiness for the people.

GOOD ROADS MEAN PROSPERITY

The aggressive campaign fathered by the Auto club for good roads is commendable and worthy of the support of every farmer, ruralite and city business man irrespective of what line of industry he follows. The benefits to be derived from good roads is a thousand fold. Farmers can market their crops more cheaply and at less expense of every kind. They will expend more money in the cities because it is easier to go and come. The city will profit from good roads in many ways. Business generally will be boosted by good roads.

If there is any question regarding the advantages of good roads a comparison of the cities of the east that have good roads and those that have ignored this necessary adjunct to prosperity will readily show the advantages of good roads. They will be convinced after viewing the telling results.

It is the duty of the provincial government to see that good roads are provided throughout the province and those that take the initiative are the ones that are going to be crowned with the people's thanks.

CONSCRIPTION BILL A WISE MEASURE

The conscription bill has passed the house and will shortly become law. Such is the report we get from Ottawa this week. Why this bill has been fought so strenuously it is hard to perceive the reasons why. That the act itself is a necessity everyone who is conversant with the situation will agree. And yet the labor unions and other interests have fought it "tooth and nail" when, if they gave the matter due thought, they would realize that should recruiting stop at this time and we fail to supply the allies with more help, that the Demigod Germany would stand a good chance of winning the fight.

Perhaps those that have been so bitterly opposed to the act have not given the matter much thought and have not been brought to a proper sense of appreciation of what failure at this time might mean to the country.

Perhaps if they would review the h'story of Belgium since the war and see what monstrous atrocities the kaiser has been guilty of when his will has been disputed they would come to a different line of thinking, and an appreciation of the necessities of conscription.

The act is a necessity and a wise one, and well we will come to realize it before this war is over.

WE NEED BUSINESS PROSPERITY

One of the soldier boys from the front writes us in reference to a comment we published some time ago in which we exulted over the fact that the Sarcee camp was again to be inhabited by the mighty throng in khaki. He took exception to the fact that we could have a thought of anything but the boys overseas. We quite agree with our friend that our first thought should be the welfare of those who are fighting our cause but how can those who are unable to fight show their goodfellowship better than by contributions of money, goods, etcetera. Nor can the business men of Calgary and Canada hope to make such contributions excepting through the profit they get from their business. How else could the war be waged or the soldiers be maintained and supplied with the necessities to say nothing of a few luxuries if the merchants and business men did not contribute their pro-rata either through taxation or contributions of various kinds. Our esteemed correspondent is narrow in his views. He does not realize that even those at home may be making many sacrifices equally as great, albeit, it has not the same dangerous aspects of a personal character that he has to undergo. Yes, we love the boys in khaki, and we shall be happy to give them full credit for their unselfish devotion, but we must not lose sight of the fact that we can best serve them at home by the continual boosting of our town and keeping in the march of prosperity.

KEEP WATCHFUL EYE ON THE "PEN"

"One story is good until another is told," is a pretty safe adage to go by. If the reports we hear of the conditions at the Provincial Penitentiary are true then some officials at the "Pen" need to have their authority curtailed by a vacant position. Assuming a domineering attitude in a place like a prison is a fault that the officials can easily fall into, in fact it takes a very wise and conscientious man to avoid falling into the habit. Everything tends to shape an official to this end and the fact that he has no authority above him excepting his own better self to warn him in case he does become domineering it takes a man with a strong inner self for good not to acquire the habit.

There is no doubt that the officials have many hard battles to fight and natures to overcome that have never been under restraint, but still having unlimited power is apt to develop a spirit in the guards that is not conducive to the welfare of the prisoners. A fair warden will know how to take care of such difficulties and anything but a fair and just warden should be dismissed peremptorily.

By all means the provincial government should investigate every rumor of unfairness accorded to the prisoners at the penitentiary as well as at Ponoka because in these two places the prisoners have no redress and domineering attitudes can rapidly grow under the circumstances.

THE brotherhood of mankind must no longer be a fair but empty phrase; it must be given a structure of force and reality. The nations must realize their common life and effect a workable partnership to secure that life against the aggression of autocratic and self-pleasing power.—President Wilson.

The Boys You Used To Know

By WILL CUNDILL

WHEN you're busy, busy, busy, with the big affairs of life,
And tired, tired, tired with the everlasting strife;
When in spite of every effort you cannot play the game,
And you feel there's something lacking, something that you cannot name,
And you don't know what on earth to do, and don't know where to go,
How'd you like to spend an hour with the boys you used to know?
How'd you like to close your office up and shut and lock the door,
And pack your grip and take a trip to your old home town once more,
And meet again your boyhood chums upon the old school-ground,
And in the spreading elm tree's shade just rest and lie around,
And call each other Jack and Jim, and Will and Fred and Joe,
And live the old days over with the boys you used to know,
And tell about the fun you had at the games you used to play,
And "Skin the Devil," "One Old Cat," town ball and pull away?
Perhaps your eyes would moisten as you called the old class roll
And found that in the passing years that Death had taken toll,
And in your hearts you'd wonder who'd be the next to go
In answer to his summons, of the boys you used to know.
And how'd you like to go again a pleasant hour to roam
Across the fields and down the creek to the bluff called "Hunter's Home,"
And see again the ledge of rock above the swimming hole,
Where you used to fish in springtime with a hazel brush for pole?
The old grist mill and dam are gone, but the waters overflow,
Like the constant love that binds you to the boys you used to know.
And how'd you like to climb again the bluffs which seemed so high,
When you were boys together in the happy days gone by,
And breathe again the air of spring, all laden with perfume
Of honeysuckle, curb and plum, and violets in bloom,
And gather around a fallen log and in a campfire glow
Eat a lunch of mother's cooking with the boys you used to know.
Those loyal chums of bygone days are scattered far and wide,
And all have ties that bind them to the place where they reside,
But no matter what their station, no matter where they roam,
At times they feel a longing for the town they still call home;
And in their hearts the pulling, as their busy ways they go,
Of the stronger ties that bind them to the boys they used to know.
The years are passing swiftly by, the time will not be long
When you can meet those boys you know when life was one sweet song;
So pack your grip and take a trip and spend a week or two
In the town that always will be home with the latchstring out for you,
And send a bunch of letters out and let each letter show
That you would like to meet again the boys you used to know.

TOPICS OF THE DAY

Alsace-Lorraine and The Politieal Situation of Today

The Socialists scheme to decide the future fate of Alsace-Lorraine by popular vote, to determine whether it shall, after the war, revert to France or to Germany, is impossible because of the wholesale deportations and exiles of the Alsatians, according to Daniel Blumenthal, former member of the Reichstag for Alsace, ex-Mayor of the Reichstag for Alsace, ex-Mayor of Colmar, Alsace, and well known in France as a journalist, publicist and lecturer. He is now in the United States, having come to tell of the effects of the war on his country.

"It would be impossible to determine by vote of the people whether Alsace and Lorraine should belong to France or to Germany," he said in the course of his visit to New York on the way to Washington. "So many persons found to be French in sympathy have been deported by Germany that we find Alsatian exiles in almost every civilized country. So many thousands more have been imprisoned or put to death that the inhabitants are in a constant state of terror, and a calm and dispassionate view of the situation by them would be impossible. Then, too, we must consider what is the desire of the many who have been forced to leave the country.

"Alsace and Lorraine are literally infested by German spies. This has been the situation since before the war began. These spies have caused the arrest of so many persons that thousands more are awaiting the expiration of the prison terms of their countrymen before they will in turn be sent to prison by order of the German authorities. In other words, the prisons are so over-crowded that there is a waiting list.

"It is notable that among these prisoners there are more women than were able to conscript the men and men. The German authorities account for this by the fact that they force them into the German army. Wholesale desertions are occurring, and whenever the Alsatians who have been drafted by the German commanders have an opportunity to do so, they desert and go over to the French.

"Some time ago, when the Alsatians were protesting against German rule, we were asked why we did not revolt and fight Germany for our freedom. We were unwilling to plunge the world into a war. We knew that such action by us would result in a world war, and we are not willing—and I do not believe the Alsatians would ever be ready—to take such action.

"Now that the world is at war, we are fighting with it for freedom. The fact that thousands of Alsatians have escaped from the German army to fight with France, even against their brothers and fathers, who now are forced by Germany to fight with the German troops, is good proof that we are doing our part in this fight, 'that the world shall be made safe for democracy.'"

Mr. Blumenthal said that more than 30,000 Alsatians have deserted from the German armies and have joined the French during the last year. "Thousands of others have been taken out of the German armies and sent to do farm and other labor in Germany, because of their attempts to desert," he said.

"The Germany of today is a different Germany from that we knew at the time of the signing of the treaty of Frankfurt. The military spirit of democracy as was represented in Germany that has been crushing us. The old spirit of democracy as was represented in Germany of the Frankfurt treaty is dead, and the men who were representative of that old order are dead, along with the things they stood for.

"Alsace and Lorraine after this war cannot be a part of Germany. Our relations with France have constantly grown closer for years, and Alsace and Lorraine must revert to France. It is the ultimate destiny of Alsace and Lorraine that they should be a part of France. A republic is as impossible in Alsace-Lorraine as would be peace and happiness under Germany."

German "kultur" has been responsible for untold misery throughout the length and breadth of the land, he said. Convents have been sacked and destroyed, education practically abandoned, and most of the schools closed. "Religious effort now is striving to re-establish old forms of worship," he added. "No real progress will be possible in any direction until peace comes and Alsace and Lorraine are French."

Some 8,000 charges are heaped up against Mr. Blumenthal for high treason by reason of his talks and the articles that he has written for Alsatian periodicals. He served in the French army near Rheims, and has devoted the last year to work for his countrymen and in propaganda for the freedom of Alsace and Lorraine from Prussian rule.

Lawyers and Doctors In The States are Doing Their Bit

The professional men, lawyers and doctors of the United States have developed a fine league of brotherhood to assist the boys who have enlisted in that country. They propose to preserve the business of those who are called to the front by giving the business their personal attention. The expression from the brotherhood of professional men speaking of the plan was as follows:

"We know what a sacrifice you are making. We know what it requires to build up a practice and how readily it goes to pieces when the man who built it up is absent for an extended period. We are going to try to hold your practice and to see that your family or other dependents get the benefit of it while you are away."

In past wars in which the United States has been involved the doctor, lawyer, or other professional man left his practice to the profit of those of his profession who remained at home. There were many cases of professional men aiding families of those who were at the front, but organized effort to maintain practices intact was not made until recently. The best minds in the legal and medical professions are at work to solve this new social problem. In the business world the heads of establishments have drawn further and further from what may be termed the customer, so that the one may never see the other; but this is not so in the professions. At the center is a personality, a certain kind of man, jovial or earnest, grave or gay, who appeals to a certain kind of clientele. How to organize a cohesive something that will take the place of an absent personality is an important phase of today's problem.

The difficulty of the problem is recognized by Henry W. Taft, chairman of the war committee of the bar of the city of New York.

"The work of our committee has several branches," said Mr. Taft, "and one of them will be concerned with conserving the practices of lawyers that they have no one to leave their business with; but a lawyer's business is such that we cannot yet say how we will proceed, for we are facing something that has never been attempted before, except in England, where it has been tried to some extent, and conditions there are quite different. As individual cases are considered we probably shall find ways of handling them. We now have 4,000 lawyers who have volunteered for this work. One of the questions they answered when tendering their services was, 'Are you willing to assist in conserving the practice of members of the bar engaged in war service?' The men are classified according to boroughs."

"What do you consider the chief difficulty in conserving the practice of a lawyer who is absent for an extended period?" Mr. Taft was asked.

"A fundamental difficulty in dealing with this branch of our work lies in confidential relations existing between lawyer and client, which in this country has usually prevented the lawyer from transferring to another his business and clientage. In England the situation in this respect, in both medical and legal professions, is somewhat different. Indeed, I believe in some cases a professional practice becomes the subject of more or less formal transfer from one man to another.

"Another branch of our work which we also regard as important is to give advice gratuitously to persons going to the front in relation to their affairs, in the making of wills, transferringof property, and so on. There is probably a great number of young men of moderate means who should make some such arrangements, but neglect to do so rather than incur the expense of employing a lawyer. We want to serve these, and are now organized to do so at 40 Wall street and 39 Pine street.

"A third branch of our work will be trying to aid the government by supplying lawyers in connection with hearings before exemption boards, and other such matters. This work has already excited the interest of federal and state officials, who promise to avail themselves of such services as our committee can offer.

"What we have supposed will need the continuous attention of our committee is the relief of those dependentsof lawyers going to the front. In England this has been developed enormously under the professional classes war relief council in the training and education of children, maintaining maternity homes and other activities for the purpose of relieving distress. Of course other ways for our committee to be useful may become apparent, and the response to our invitation for voluntary service has been so enthusiastic and widespread as to indicate that lawyers are only too willing to help. I think there are a great many lawyers who feel that their professional education and work have not equipped them to be of direct military service in time of war. This is particularly true of those who are not within the military age. The fact referred to intensifies the desire of such lawyers to be of use in the indirect ways in which our committee purposes to be helpful. It must not be forgotten that lawyers more than any other class have occasion to study the principles upon which free government is founded, and when they see the foundations of civil liberty attacked they are quick to perceive the disastrous results to humanity that may attend the success of such an attack. I want to add that the finance committee, for the purpose of raising funds for needy lawyers at the front, tain substantial sums."

There is a printer in Calgary so cheap that he won't walk in the sun for fear of an extra amount of evaporation of his system.

How do you suppose it would look in print if we should publish a list of the Calgary concerns who are ordering goods from the east when the same thing can be purchased here? Perhaps we may. It will make some firms squirm to see their names in the list, incidentally it will awaken the public to the fact that these firms do not believe in reciprocity.

Names Of British Sportsman Appear In Casualty List

London—Casualties among prominent British sportsmen are on a much lighter scale in the latest list issued. Lieut. J. W. Shaw, of the Royal Flying Corps, reported missing since a flight over the enemy lines on June 7, is the famous Marlow Rowing club oarsman. He rowed in the Marlow eight in the Thames Cup at Henley in 1913 and 1914, the crew winning during these two years, challenge cups for eights at the regattas at Walton (twice) Kingston, Reading (twice), Marlow (twice), Goring and Streatley. Lieut. Shaw also won several prizes in fours and was also well known as a sculler. Arthur Copus, reported missing is the prominent Middlesex and Hanwell soccer player. He gained many caps in the county games, having played against Norfolk, Surrey and Oxford.

Lieut. Cecil A. Stredwick, wounded by shrapnel in the right arm, earned a fine reputation as a golfer. He won the last medal played for at Epsom in 1914 and in the same year he and his fathed won the spring foursomes at the same club. Bill Ladbury, the well known flyweight boxer, has been killed in action. He met all the best lads at his weight and in 1913 defeated Sid Smith, who held the world's flyweight championship, in 11 rounds at the Ring, London. In January, 1914, he met Percy Jones at the National Sporting club for the Lonsdale belt, but was beaten on points. Since he joined the colors he defeated Harry Curley and Alf Mansfield last year.

The following well known sporting officers have received promotion for brilliant services on the battlefield: Lieut.-Col. A. Courage, the famous hunting man, point to point rider and polo player, master of Shorncliffe drag in 1898-9, won the Hussar's Subalterns cup in 1899 and a member of the winning teams which won the Indian Inter-Regimental 1902-3-4-5 and Aldershot cup in 1914. Major J. R. Badger, the well known polo player, who was on the winning team which won the Norwich County cup in 1913, Coronation cup and Inter-Regimental in 1914. Lieut.-Col. K. Whitton, the Scottish athletic champion, who won the hammer throwing and weight putting on several occasions between 188- and 1890. Captain H. B. Moore, the Uppingham and Oxford university rugby footballer and cricketer.

SCHEDULE CUT SHORT BY WESTERN ASSOCIATION

Tulsa, Okla.—J. P. Scott, owner of the Tulsa club, announced the other day that six of the eight directors of the Western Association have expressed a desire to curtail the present playing season. He stated that he had received word from J. C. Bell, president of the association, that five of the league members had favored the move and that he too believed it best. President Bell stated that the date for closing would be set as soon as they heard from the other two directors.

DOROTHY POND TO FIELD FOR INDIAN JUNIORS

Cleveland, O.—Dorothy Pond, 18 years old, has signed on as outfielder with the Indian Juniors, a boys' baseball club here. The Indian Juniors rank fourth in the race for the city's amateur baseball championship, and Dorothy, who catches like a basket and has a superb wing, is counted on to advance the standing of the team in the league. She is the first girl in this section of the country to play on a boys' baseball team.

Scotty Mitchell Does Some Fine Twirling

Hustlers Defeat the Cubs; Good Hitting Displayed on Both Sides

The game last Wednesday night was rather one-sided as the Cubs were minus some of their men; however, the score was fairly close—10 to 6, in favor of the Hustlers. Of the Cubs, Eva French, who is out of commission, and Frank Donnelly, who is on his holidays, were not able to bring up the standing of the team by their absence. Ab Donnelly, the general utility man, was the receiver—some catcher at that.

Scotty Mitchell threw a fine game for the winners, allowing six hits and striking out nine Cubs. Gill pitched fine till the fateful fifth arrived, when the opposition made five runs in succession, after two were out—this of course cinched the game.

The Hustlers scored two in the first, three in the second, and five in the fifth, while the Cubs scored one in the first, one in the fifth, two in the seventh and two in the eighth.

Quite a few hits were made and some real sliding pulled off. The spectators were amused to see Tigner pull off the Charlie Chaplin stunt in running from third to home—he fell all over the lot but scored at that.

LEONARD OFFERED $20,000 TO FIGHT WHITE TO A DECISION

Benny Leonard has been offered $20,000 to meet Charley White in a bout to a decision. The offer was made by Jack Curley. Dick Curley, who staged the recent fight between Leonard and Kilbane, is ready to make an offer for the bout. The field of battle is to be somewhere within two hours of New York.

BOXING MATCHES PLANNED FOR K. C. NEXT WINTER

Kansas City, Mo.—Kansas City will stage 15-round bouts next winter. That much became known this week when a widely known promoter, whose name cannot be used at this time, announced that he will organize a club, strictly a membership affair, to be run in conformity with the state law. The bouts probably will be held in Convention hall, where the Leonard-Ever Hammer bout was fought. Police stopped a bout here late last winter and at that time it was said the fight game was dead until it could be legalized by the legislature.

PRINCETON RUGBY STAR KILLED BY BAD FALL

Warden McLean, the Princeton football tackle, who starred on the all-eastern eleven, died in Chattanooga, Tenn., from injuries received when his horse bolted and threw him against a tree.

McLean was a second lieutenant in the officers' reserve training camp at Fort Oglethorpe, and a son of William McLean, publisher of the Philadelphia Bulletin and director of the Associated Press. He was one of the best tackles developed on the football gridiron in recent years. On a winning team he would have been hailed as one of the best of al' times.

FASHIONS IN MOTOR EQUIPMENT

Automobile trunks are to be had nowadays in an infinite variety of designs. A refinement that has just appeared is a complete wardrobe trunk, with drawers, shoe box, coat hangers, and the like, built to be carried upright on the front end of the running board. A steel holder locks the trunk to the car and an enameled duck cover protects it from dust. A turn of a handle removes the trunk, permitting it to be carried bodily to your hotel room.

The Chalmers Motor company is bringing out a complete new line of open and closed cars comprising a five passenger touring car, four passenger phaeton, roadster, and cabriolet on the 117 inch chassis and seven passenger sedan, limousine-landau, town car, and town car landau on the 122 inch chassis. The Chalmers company now secures the bodies in the rough and completes them in its own factory James Levy, the Chicago distributor, has received his first allotment of the new models.

Things An Autoist Should Know

Some Suggestions for Repair of Tires

When a tire receives an injury extending through all the plies of fabric, the repair must be made in the form of a section.

Two methods are commonly used, the outside and the inside, of which the outside is the more efficient. There are three points in a tire where strain and flexing action are most prominent, the center line of the tread surface and the edges of the tread above the beads. To obtain the necessary strength, plies or steps of fabric should not be ended at these points.

First buff the inside of the tire for a distance of five inches on each side of the break. Cut through the tread four inches beyond the injury on one side and skin it back to a point the same distance from the other side. Lay the tread back so that it will not interfere with the work. Remove the side wall on the injury side for the same distance.

Remove one chafing or bead strip below the injury, starting one-quarter inch inside the limits of the section. A second ply is then removed, starting three-quarters of an inch above the first ply on the reverse side and running one inch inside the first ply on both ends. Then bevel out the remaining plies around the injury, and thoroughly roughen all surfaces to be repaired. The job is now ready for cementing and building.

Air bags stretch in us; that is, they become longer and consequently smaller in diameter. To equalize this it is necessary to employ a pad; otherwise the strain on the bag is likely to crack it.

A satisfactory pad can be made from one ply of fabric, 20 inches long and four inches wide. On top of this should be laid two thicknesses of gum, one-sixteenth inch gauge. Soapstone the pad well and cure it for ten minutes in an old casing, using an air bag. A pad made in this way will last a long time.

Tread cut repairs are apt to loosen when the area to be repaired is not thoroughly roughened and the overflow of new stock is not removed. Take a piece of emery paper and sand off the repair until it is flush with the tread surface, with no loose edges remaining.

This Wrench Holds

Monkey wrenches that refuse to grip the nut as tightly as they should are among the familiar drawbacks to the joys of motoring. A Chicagoan has devised one in which the whole handle revolves to give the proper opening to the jaws. When you turn a nut you may grip it as tightly as you like by giving a little twist to the handle. Incidentally, double guides fastened to the top jaw of the wrench tend to keep it parallel with the lower jaw and increase the wrench's gripping power still further. The device costs $1.50.

TIRE SUGGESTIONS

With the best of the driving season just opening and considering that tire expense is usually the largest single upkeep item of a well cared for car, that tire prices are rising and that a tire shortage is predicted in some quarters, the following suggestions for the care of tires is made: Use a size of tire adequate to carry the load imposed. It does not pay to overload tires. Keep tires inflated up to the pressure recommended unless you are ready to sacrifice tire-life to riding comfort. Have cuts in treads repaired as soon as they occur and thus avoid sand-blisters and tread-separation. Avoid hitting abrupt jolts at high speeds and avoid sharp objects both on the road and in the garage. Don't drive over or against curbs. Keep the wheels out of hardened ruts and car tracks. Be sure that the rims are free from dents and bends and keep them well graphited. Take care that oil and grease are not allowed to remain on the tires. Don't use chains more than safety requires and be sure they are properly put on. Keep the front wheels in perfect parallelism and be sure that front and rear wheels track. Never drive on a flat tire, even for the shortest distance unless absolutely necessary. Avoid fast driving, unless you are ready to pay for the tire expense that inevitably goes with it. Drive slowly over car tracks, crushed stone and rock strewn roads. Repair punctures in casings as well as in tubes. Don't let a deflated tire stand with the load on it. Carry as few spare casings as prudence demands and keep them well covered and locked in place. Don't keep tires "in stock" unnecessarily, for they deteriorate with age. If any are thus kept don't remove the original wrappings. By all means, never apply the brakes suddenly except in the interest of safety. Always engage the clutch gradually. Take all curves at moderate speeds and never slue around corners. Be sure that no parts such as fenders and steering connectons can possibly strike the tires. Neglect and reckless driving are tire destroyers.

ITALIAN INVENTION PROMISES USEFULNESS

An Italian invention that contains much promise of usefulness, in connection with internal combustion motors provided with forced lubrication, is an arrangement that short circuits the ignition current when the lubrication fails. It is provided with a device for putting it out of action when it is desired to start the engine, when of course there is no oil pressure; and as soon as the oil pressure is raised to the normal point this starting device automatically becomes inoperative.

Things Worth Knowing About The Autos

Q. I have a 1916 (——) car and am not getting a good mileage, about 10, and when I stop a lot of gasoline comes out of the carburetor. I am contemplating getting a (——) carburetor and taking off the old (——). Do you think this would be a help?

A. I believe you will get a much better mileage with a different carburetor, but buy the new carburetor from the manufacturer thereof, or an authorized agent, so as to get one with the proper size, nozzles and openings, or you will do more harm than good. The gasoline which comes out of the carburetor is not because of a fault in it, but rather because of condensation in the manifold.

Q. I have a 1916 (——) car which has been very satisfactory, but of late I must shift a lot on hills. Also the car has no power when I first go out, and I have trouble getting up a slight hill near my house. Any information will oblige.

The reason you must shift so freely is that your valves probably need grinding. The trouble when you first go out is due to the engine being cold. Be sure that the shutter on the hot-air pipe is closed. You will have to put up with this, or start the engine shortly before starting on your trip.

Q. For the last two weeks there is a sort of hissing sound every time the wheels go around from the rear of my 1914 (——) car. It sounds as though I had a puncture, but the tires are not losing air. This annoys and worries me so that I do not get all the fun out of driving. I can't tell what it is, and thought that perhaps you could make a suggestion.

Counterbalance for Fords

The newest thing in Ford accessories is a device offered by an Iowa man, by the use of which, the maker claims, any Ford owner may have the advantages of the much discussed counterbalanced crankshaft. This consists of four castings, to be attached to the crankshaft in pairs. Each pair is bolted together with four bolts, and the counterbalancing weights are so disposed that they come opposite the crank throws, being as close to the latter as they can be placed and at the same time allow sufficient clearance for the connecting rods.

AUTO INDUSTRY IS VERY IMPORTANT

The U. S. congress, while attempting to incorporate in the war revenue bill a tax upon the gross sales of automobiles, brought before the public a real conception of the importance of the automobile industry.

"I doubt very much whether the men in the industry itself," says an automobile statistician, "have actually realized that every man out of every fifty in the United States depends upon automobile work for a livelihood. It is estimated that factories, accessory makers, dealers and garage owners employ over 800,000 people. At the lowest estimate, at least one or two other persons are dependent on him, making a total of over two millions or one-fiftieth of America's population.

"Some people have the idea that only the 'luxury chasers' or 'idle rich' have motor cars, but this idea is erroneous, for it noted, it will be seen that one of every thirty westerners owns a car.

"None of us realize the importance of the industry. On the basis of figures given above, every $1,000 worth of automobiles produced gives employment to one person in some way.

PAISLEY NET WITH SUMMER WEATHER

It sems that the gay Paisley effects have so endeared themselves to womankind that they could not be given up, even when warm weather made Paisley shawl fabrics look too solid and substantial to be pleasing to the fancy. The new Paisley designs are on net and the rich colors and Persian designs are very attractive against the filmy background.

Military Satire Will Be Bright Feature Next Week at Pantages

"Coming events cast their shadows before!" It can very well be applied to the new attractions that will be offered at the Pantages theater for the coming week, commencing with the matinee Monday afternoon. Very flattering praise has preceded the new program, same being a very good indication of the entertaining qualities of the new bill.

Miss America, a musical military satire, will be the headline attraction. It is a bright, snappy, musical comedy featuring Jean Walters and Macklin Megley and a chorus of beauties who are said to be very restful to the eye. Some bright musical numbers will be introduced; the costuming is above the average and is original, while the scenery further enhances a real amusing feature.

Frederick H. Spear and company will present a playlet entitled "Every Man's Sister," which is full of strong situations and clever acting.

Alexander Pantages presents the mirthful pantomimic instrumentalists, De Michelle brothers, who bill themselves as "The Comical Wops;" these two boys aside from being artists, are also comedians of the first water; their offering is sure to be a treat, both to lovers of good music and to those who delight in light entertainment.

The Girl from Starland is a scenic spectacular novelty which includes singing, dancing, and a clever novelty which is offered as a surprise.

Chester Gruber, who has a way all his own, will amuse with his line of comedy chatter.

The Universal Current Events and a comedy picture will conclude a very promising program of vaudeville.

NEW STAR DISCOVERED; FIRST IN FIVE YEARS

Cambridge, Mass.—The discovery of another star, said to be the only one found in five years, was announced to the Harvard college observatory today by Prof. W. S. Adams, of Mount Wilson observatory, California.

The star was estimated to be of the fourteenth magnitude. It was found in the outer portion of the spiral nebula of the star classed as Dreyer No. 6,946, 105 seconds south and 37 seconds west of the nucleus.

COMING—THREE DAYS COMMENCING AUGUST 13 AT THE ALLEN

"The Silent Master" a Mystery Play, at Allen Next Mon.-Tues.

"The Silent Master," a fascinating story of adventure and romance on two continents, ranging from the Paris underworld to fashionable society of New York will be one of the features Monday and Tuesday at the Allen.

This is the second of Robert Warwick's Selznick-Pictures, and in it this most popular of all moving picture leading men will be seen in a role even more novel than that in his recent success, "The Argyle Case." It is that of a man of wealth in Paris, who in league with the Apaches, holds a mysterious Court of St. Simon, in which wrongdoers who cannot be reached by the ordinary processes of law are punished.

The master of this court calls himself Valentin Simon. He initiates a neurotic youth into the mysteries of the underworld, and the young man takes a morbid interest in the criminal coterie which Simon uses for benevolent purposes. Thus Simon becomes an innocent cast of his ruin. Simon adopts his real name, Marquis de Combreuil, goes to America and there meets and falls in love with the young man's sister, ignorant at first of her relation to the youth. Simon marries the sister, and she discovers that he was the man who introduced her brother to the underworld. This causes an estrangement, and then follow a series of romantic adventures through which Simon rehabilitates himself in the eyes of his wife.

In this photodrama Mr. Warwick has the support of an unusually distinguished cast. Olive Tell, his leading woman, has appeared in many Broadway successes, and is regarded as one of the most beautiful women on the American stage. Anna Little is a favorite with picture fans, having come east after a long engagement with coast companies. Henri Velbel, a noted French character actor, makes his American film debut. Donald Galaher is a favorite American juvenile. The director is Leonce Perret, who was brought from France by Harry Rapf to take charge of the Warwick productions, and who had 308 successes to his credit before braving the submarines to come to America. "The Silent Master" is a screen adaptation by Mr. Perret of E. Phillips Oppenheim's "The Court of St. Simon."

Mae Murray in Humorous Story Next Wed. and Thurs. at Allen

Mae Murray, the talented young screen star who was last seen in the charming Lasky production, "The Primrose Ring," is appearing in her latest photoplay success "At First Sight," at the Allen next Wendesday and Thursday.

George Middleton is the author or co-author of many very well known productions such as "The House of a Thousand Candles" and others, and in "At First Sight" he has embodied all of the whimsical humor and light farce as well as the deeper elements usually found in his best productions.

According to arrangements with Mr. Lasky, this production was made in the Famous Players-Lasky eastern studios with Mr. Robert Leonard as director. Mr. Leonard has for some time devoted all his time to the productions of this star, and cameraman Charles Rosher, who has been working with Mr. Leonard in several of his more recent pictures is also doing photographic work in this production.

The story deals with the adventures of pretty Justine Gibbs, played by Miss Murray. Justine is a very attractive and highly American type of young woman who rebels against a prearranged marriage and follows the dictates of her heart. It is essentially a comedy, and the story is really based upon the efforts of the young writer so absorbed in his work that the heroine must take him by storm. A great deal of the charm of the story lies in the quaint and humorous scenes between the absent-minded young writer and the impetuous heroine.

The writer is at work upon a story which closely follows his own and Justine's adventures and it monopolizes his time and attention to such an extent that Justine sees the only way she can successfully win his heart or arouse his interest is by providing material that will satisfactorily finish the story which she proceeds to do in a wholly unexpected and original manner of her own.

Her breezy and charming courtship of the bashful young man is amusing in the extreme and her coy retreat after she has practically won the game adds the last bit of delightful piquancy to the picture, leaving the hero (but not the audience) with the firm impression that it was his own masterful ways and quick initiative which won him the bride of whom he is now so proud.

In addition to this excellent attraction Roscoe Fatty Arbuckle will also be seen in his third side-splitting mirth provoker that this famous comedian has ever appeared in.

From start to finish is just one round of gloom-dispelling situations that was ever taken together in a single production.

A big double program for a single price.

"Joan the Woman" Coming August 13

Of all the great motion pictures ever made none has had a finer purpose than "Joan the Woman," in which Geraldine Farrar, the famous opera star, appears at the Allen three days commencing August 13.

It is not merely awe-inspiring as a spectacle and thrilling in its heroic moments, but there is something bigger and more ennobling back of it than stagecraft.

It shows to what heights a woman can rise when it comes to a moment of sacrifice. No one can hold back the big lumps that come to the throat when they see this wonderful peasant girl of France with one of England's greatest invading knights at her feet in the humble supplication of genuine love, hold back her humane emotions because her country needs her. And in the continuance of this throbbing love story every soul must be stirred to see the girl, Joan, hard as adamant on the battlefield, twice save the life of her suitor only to find in the end that he is the one selected to trap her for the king of England. Historical and wonderful in pageantry it is, but the thing that will make it take rank with the greatest motion pictures of our time is the way Joan's great love story is woven through it all.

Cecil B. DeMill, the producer of the picture, has created an epoch in photo-dramatic history with this thrilling and artistic achievement.

Mexico, with all the background of cactus, ponchoed peons, sleepy peddlers and all its other quaint scenic accessories is the background for the first part of Ann Pennington's latest Famous Players-Paramount Picture, last times today at the Allen. Later the scenes shift to a prim New England town by way of contrast, but little Miss Pennington is equally attractive in either environment and has imparted to the picture a charm quite out of proportion to the length of the production so that as the last scenes flash across the screen one feels like seeing it all over, or better still, continuing the story. This is a picture of great current interest that you can't afford to miss.

ONE MORE QUESTION

Precocious Offspring: "Pa, may I ask just one more question?"

Patient Pater: "Yes, my son, just one more."

Precocious Offspring: "Well, then, pa, how is it that the night falls, but it's the day that breaks?"

House Peters to be At The Allen Soon

In a gripping, tense drama of brotherly love, House Peters, the splendid Pallas-Paramount star, will be seen at the Allen next Friday and Saturday in the production, "The Heir of the Ages," the unusual story by William Addison Lathrop.

House Peters has long been a great favorite of the photo-dramatic patrons—since his first appearance on the Paramount program in "The Girl of the Golden West." With years of training on the speaking stage in all parts of the world, a traveler and soldier of fortune himself, House Peters has brought to the screen the experience and study of an artist.

In "The Heir of the Ages" he is seen as a primitive man in the days of cave life and shows the human instincts of unselfishness and love. Later the situations which confronted him ages ago come again when he is superintendent of a mine in a small western town. He falls in love with an ignorant little mountain girl only to lose her to his worthless brother in the east, and then nearly loses his life in an effort to save theirs.

How he finally wins the object of his heart is brought about in a manner which must be seen to be enjoyed.

House Peters as the cave man, clad in the furs of the beasts he has killed with his club, was a surprise to his many friends around the studio who knew he was a well built man, but they did not expect to see the young Hercules who, with matted hair and bearing a club—with his brawny breast exposed to the breeze, stroll out of his dressing room on the day those scenes were filmed.

In the cast supporting House Peters are included Eugene Pallette, Nina Byron, Henry Barrows and Adele Farrington.

BOOK REVIEWS

Harold Ashton's admirers will be glad to hear that he has a new, lively book on the market called "The Tale of a Tank, and Other Yarns." This wonderful book depicts strange scenes and peoples with which we all like to get acquainted and aside from that it gives us a great deal of information about war—and also peace. The book is published by the Musson Book Co., Ltd., corner Wilton avenue and Victoria street, Toronto. Price $1.25.

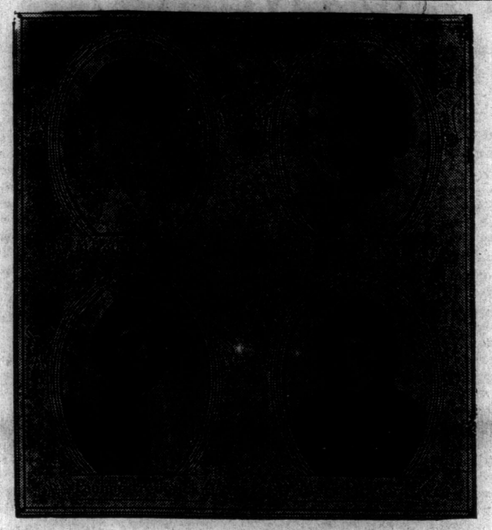
Calgary's high-brow and social smart set are saying farewell to the Hon. Major FitzHorrigan with tears in the eyes, they are regretting his departure even though it be for a much worthy cause. Major FitzHorrigan will be missed; his good morning, lovely day, made every one feel that the morning was good and the day would be lovely—he seemed to make you see the sun regardless of the cloud. It is a great gift, few of us have it, few of us reflect it. So we bade him God speed and a safe return, and among his new found friends he will find none who like him better than we do.

PARTNERSHIP IN MARRIAGE

It is hard for a woman to see the difference between the $2 a month which she spends for gloves and the cost of four 50-cent ties which her husband buys in the same length of time.

There are a lot of men who would storm over such an equal distribution of the family funds.

To keep up a regular system of deposits requires a great deal of self-denial on the part of each.



It cannot be done alone by either husband or wife.

It must be worked as a combination, otherwise one may save and the other may spend.

Early in married life there should be a mutual agreement, with complete understanding concerning matters of this sort, and each should live strictly up to that agreement.

Young men, when you think of marriage, be bright enough to select a girl who understands life and is capable of being a helpmate in the best sense of the word, and then don't do all the spending of the partnership funds because she is good-natured. Be friends and equals and let both of you save from the first.

WEDDINGS

SINCLAIR—EVANS

A very pretty wedding took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Evans, 921 Eighteenth avenue west, when their daughter, Mary Isabella, was united in marriage to Mr. Harold Robertson. The Rev. J. B. Westman performed the ceremony. The bridal couple left on the 5:30 train for Banff to spend their honeymoon.

BOWIE—BOUTILIER

The marriage of Miss Annie May Boutilier and Mr. William Bowie took place at Knox church yesterday afternoon, Rev. A. W. R. Whitman performing the ceremony. After spending their honeymoon at the coast, Mr. and Mrs. Bowie will take up their residence at Vulcan.

THE BAKERS' PICNIC

The bakers' picnic, which was held at Bowness park on Wednesday afternoon, was a grand success. About 600 were in attendance and a most enjoyable time was had by all. The chief features of the event were the baseball match, tug-of-war, and the football match, the opposing sides in each case being the salesmen and the master bakers. The salesmen defeated the masters at baseball by a score of 14 to 13. The same side won the tug-of-war while the football match was a draw.

FEMININE FADS AND FANCIES SUMMER MILLINERY

Hats of all kinds are fascinating this formal, they seem to have,—n....ids summer. Big and little, dressy and informal, they seem to have received especially delightful treatment, and the woman who cannot this season find a hat in which she looks well is surely the exception.

One of the most interesting groups in the general melange of delightful things is that of the fabric hats. Of course, we have always had them, these hats of linen, of satin, and of crepe, but never before have we had such a wealth of them and certainly never were they as charming. And then again, wash fabrics have never been so featured by the milliners as they are this season. In fact, it is almost safe to say that the hat designers are using wash fabrics that have not before been used for anything outside children's wear.

KNITTED FOUR-IN-HAND TIES

Some four or five years ago the knitted silk four-in-hand was popular. Today, in the window of the smartest stores, the gay little colors appear again, and they are very cheery. The patters is a wavy weave of silk mixture; white and green, purple and gold, blue and gold, green and blue, lilac and black, black and white, black and many other combinations of these colors. Always there are two tones.

COL. McLEOD CHAPTER PLAN WIN-THE-WAR CARNIVAL

Studebaker Touring Car and Many Other Fine Prizes to be Given Away in Contest

Again the Col. Macleod Chapter, with its never tiring efforts to please and entertain are making plans to give the Calgary people a pleasant surprise for three days, beginning September 20 to 22, inclusive. Regardless of the strenuous times these worthy daughters of the empire never lag in their ambition to keep before the pleasure seeking public a profitable way to enjoy themselves while at the same time presenting to the people the privilege of giving and benefitting a most essential and needy cause. The carnival will be held in the Pryce-Jones building, where the National Fete bazaar was held some months ago. The car to be given away is the big seven passenger, six cylinder Studebaker, costing $1,750, and will be won in a contest by the young lady selling the greatest number of tickets for the carnival. The young ladies have just four weeks to devote to the selling of the tickets, the date of entering the contest has not been announced as yet. Many other costly and lovely prizes will be contested for, and nothing is being left undone that would further the enjoyment and success of this promising and splendid entertainment.

ADDRESSING INVITATIONS

Things the Elite Should Know

Invitations written in the first person, if sent to married people, should be addressed to the wife; the same thing is true in regard to notes acknogledging wedding gifts, but in this case the husband's name is incorporated in the note.

It is correct to address all formal invitations to "Mr. and Mrs. John M. Lynch," even if only Mr. or Mrs. Smith is known to the sender. This includes business friends of the family. In both cases the inner envelopes (if there are any)) are addressed to "Mr. and Mrs. Smith," no street address being used.

It is not proper to address an invitation to "Mr. and Mrs. John Smith and family." A separate invitation should be sent to each of the other members of the family. Parents living with married sons or daughters should have separate invitations sent to them.

When sending formal invitations to sisters it is correct to write "The Misses Smith" on the envelope, but in the case of informal ones the note is addressed to the eldest and through her the younger ones are asked. Individual invitations should always be sent to bachelors.

It is a decided faux pas to address an envelope to or speak of Mrs. Doctor Brown, Mrs. Judge Smith, or Mrs. General Jones. These titles belong to the husbands only.

Mrs. Douglas McNeil is spending the summer at her cottage, Gull Lake.

MANHOOD

We cannot look, however, imperfectly, upon a great man without gaining something by him.

He is a living light-fountain, which it is good and pleasant to be near, the light which enlightens, which has enlightened the darkness of the world; and this, not as a kindled lamp only, but rather as a natural luminary, shining by the gift of heaven; a flowing light-fountain, as I say, of native original insight, of manhood and heroic nobleness—in whose radiance all souls feel that it is well with them.—Carlyle.

A FAMILY FAVORITE

GRANDMOTHER'S EGGLESS GINGERBREAD

1 cupful of granulated sugar
½ cupful of lard or drippings
1 cupful of cold thick molasses
1 cupful of ice cold water
1 teaspoonful each of ginger, cinnamon and nutmeg
½ teaspoonful each of allspice and cloves
1 teaspoonful of soda dissolved in one tablespoonful of hot water
1 cupful of raisins
1 cupful of currants, each dusted with flour
1 quart of flour, measured before sifting.

There are two secrets in folowing this recipe: First, after beating the sugar and shortening well together, do not stir the mixture until you have put in all the rest of the ingredients, till you come to the flour. Sift this in gradually, folding it through gently and slowly with a perforated cake spoon, until the flour is incorporated. Second, put it into a rather cool oven and bake slowly, allowing it to rise before beginning to brown.

If you will notice, this concoction takes no milk, butter or eggs, and yet is more delicious and satisfying to the man of the house than any other sort of cake you can offer him.

THE LANGUAGE OF RINGS

When the coquettish dames of Spain in times gone by, carried on their correspondence and love affairs by the aid of their fans, without speaking a single word, their French sisters used rings as signs and symbols of a similar character.

A pearl or garnet ring signified that its wearer was unhappy; a thin circlet of fine turquoise intimated the fair one's inability to return her lover's sentiments; while a plain gold ring in the shape of a knot expressed her willingness to share his fortunes.

A ring in the shape of a gold serpent, with a brilliant in its head, indicated the lady's doubts of her gallant's sincerity; while her faith and her wish to confide in him always were shown by a ring and tw clasped hands.

TO BE "IN LOVE"

Love as instituted by Divine providence is edifying in all its phases by its grace and charm; our very environment is beautiful by its influence.

Should jealousy which is generated from human weakness, temporarily mar the scene, love with its unconquerable power will govern our mind and hold us true to our trust.

To be "in love," then our happiness knows no bounds; mind and body secured by a bond that even death shall not sever.

Love in all its purity can pass through the fire of physical temptation, for when from the personality of our character there is reflected a lovable temperament, jealousy, in common with other blemishes in our nature, will sink into oblivion.

NOTHING CAN OVERTOP THE PLEASURE A PONY GIVES A CHILD

The Child and the Pony

It is difficult for one who has not used his powers of observation rather closely to comprehend the real pleasure a child derives from the companionship of a Shetland pony. Have you ever noticed a youngster and his pony more than casually? No? Well the next opportunity you have to do so, take advantage of it. You will be not only surprised, but the new view you will get of child life will be well worth the time you will spend.

One morning a few weeks ago a group of the guests of a hotel, noted as the place where a large number of persons prominent in the world of literature and art are annual visitors, had an opportunity to see how natural it is for a child to put everything else out of mind when a Shetland pony appeas on the scene.

A number of little boys and girls were playing on the lawn when a couple of small boys drove up to the entrance of the grounds with a tiny spotted pony. Boys immediately ceased whatever they were doing and with the little girls, who cast aside their dolls, made a rush for the two boys nd their pony.

The boys, who had come to deliver a package to the hotel were almost overwhelmed by the rush of children. Some of them petted the pony, but most of them were clamoring for a ride. The clamor became so great that some of the men who were watching the incident went to the assistance of the boys and their pony.

So many of the little ones, however, begged to be permitted to ride that one of the men suggested to the boys that they take the children for a short ride, charging them five cents for a trip to the end of the street—some 200 yards—and return. When the youngsters agreed to this proposition what a rush there was on the part of the children to parents and nurses for five cent pieces.

For two hours the willing little pony trudged back and forth from the hotel to the end of the street one of his little masters driving and each time two little passengers were carried. While the pony was thus engaged the children were having the best time imaginable, and when the boys decided to leave, having earned quite a sum of money, all the youngsters coaxed them to come back the next day.

Whether they did or not the writer is not able to say, but one thing is sure and that is that those who witnessed the occurrence that morning are firmly convinced that to the average boy or girl a pony is about the most desirable thing on earth

We often wonder how many children of parents in comfortable circumstances would be obliged to forego the pleasure of a pony's companionship if those p rents were fully aware of what it means for a boy or girl to have a pony, not only in the way of pleasure, but as a means of promoting their health and keeping them from doing other things which ore attended by objectionable features

The Breeding of Farm Mares

Subject of Special Interest to the Farmer and Rancher—Buying When the Market Is High and Selling When It Is Low is a Fallacy

(By William H. Willson)

During the past three years we have all had an opportunity of realizing how effectively drastic changes can be made in the commercial world, even to the extent of revolutionizing the trade and commerce of a nation.

Countries whose trade and commerce reached to the farthest ends of the world, at the stroke of a pen, it seemed, diverted their entire efforts to the prosecution of a war for which they were not in the slightest, prepared. Factories sprung up overnight, as it were and others were changed entirely over from their regular business into munition making; ships were moving troops and trains conveying them by the hundreds of thousands to the scenes of the conflict without any very great commotion. Five millions of Britain's workers are now engaged in some part of the work of the active army and the nation is organized so that everything is used, nothing wasted, and nothing wanting.

This shows what immense changes can be quickly made of things inanimate, but when we change to living things; when we speak of breeding a new type of horse we have something which is not subject to such changeableness but is a long, long work of careful watchfulness, of deep thoughtfulness and scientific application. The manufacturer can change his machine every day, every hour if necessary to satisfy the markets, but the breeder must look years ahead for the type that will satisfy.

Good horses will be in good demand at good prices. The wastage of material in this war is bound to have n effect upon the price of raw materials for manufacture especially with regard to those commodities not obtained from the farm or capable of as quick replacement. Tractors and motors are not capable of themselves to produce a fine crop of young tractors or young motors every spring and to be annually improved by intelligent breeding and handling as livestock will. There is no need to consistently urge the superiority of the horse over the tractor, it is so apparent. For every argument in favor of mechanical traction there are many in favor of the horse but the markets indicate, and every known condition indicates, that our power problem will be, not so much as which is best, but which is capable of supplying the demand. Every good engine will have its place and every good horse will have its place at the conclusion of hostilities. Today we can feel the great need of more human power, we need more men. When the war ceases northern France and Belgium have to be repaired and the world will have millions and millions less workers than when we went to war. It will not be a case of finding work for men but men for work, and so serious do I look for this situation to become that the greatest demand will be for the conservation of human labor which is only possible by the utilization of other forms of power.

The position would therefore seem to be, that the markets promise to absorb all forms of economical power at very good prices. The word economical is the effective. We must breed our mares so that we may obtain economical horses. Economical to you and to everyone who can use them. We must not use two horses where one powerful draft horse would do the work because it would not be economical. It would cause double work in the barn, two sets of harness instead of one and perhaps two men and two wagons and an endless chain of other additional unnecessary work. Big, powerful draft horses then are the economical horses. The markets today indicate this and the smaller they get from the typical heavy draft horse the less they like them or bid for them.

How big can we breed them? The biggest horse I know, not the fatt st, the biggest, with the frame to carry the muscle and the bone that means, with the muscle, the power, is a 2,400 pound Percheron stallion on Namaka farm. This horse is siring colts from medium mares that develop at five years into geldings of 1,800 pounds to the ton. This is the type that are eagerly sought after today.

Another important factor is the diversity of occupations for which the horses which you are breeding for, are suitable. I think I am safe in saying that the Percheon horse is used in more widely different senses than any other breed. Certainly if thisis an indicator, the Percheron has the widest patronage of all the heavy draft breeds.

As a farmer's horse it is claimed that he has no equal, and as a city teamer it is claimer that he is the most popular.

Undoubtedly the men who have had experience with this breed in the war seem to be particularly loud in their praises of it and I do not think that I ever saw any other horse of the heavy draft breeds but a Percheron in a circus ring or selected for special training by animal trainers.

Undoubtedly the largest patronage is the lot of the breed which has developed in it the largest number and most desirable qualifications. The best men in every line get the biggest patronage and so does the best horse.

What Does a Farmer Want in the Shape of a Good Horse?

The horse must be sound and economical and powerful, must be gentle, a good and easy feeder; he must advertise his owner as a good stockman, must be able to stand the torture of flies, heat, hurried meals and shortened rest and other strains of the harvest. Farmers use the Percheron right in the southern states of the union where it is hotter, the flies are worse and the work and hours pretty much as bad. In some states only Percheron horses and mules and niggers are used and the man stops before the horse. Let me ask this question: Did you ever see the big-headed, wasp-waisted, hungry-looking type in the blacks and the greys?

What Does the City Man Want?

A horse that can stand the noise, bustle and excitement of the city without getting excited. That can move a load at a good walk, not a slow drag. One that can stand a hasty, petulant driver and one that will attract attention and advertise a business. The teams of blacks and greys are foremost here.

What Do They Want in War?

This surely is the supreme test. It is the horse that is ready for every emergency, cool, courageous and bold, that will do as he is bid and not argue about it. It would seem since the Englishman is importing pure bred Percheron brood mares, and both officers and men vieing in their praise of the Percheron that his reputation has been upheld here. The Percheron history tells us that this was the business for which the Percheron was originally bred and for which the influence of the French government has always been exercised to keep the breed bred for.

What Do They Want for Training?

Intelligence, boldness, calmness, dependence, and every other desirable quality.

Whether it seems so or not at this present time, it is nevertheless a fact that the day is not far distant when conditions will force our farmers to be breeders and sellers, or buyers of the economical type of horse. The high price of other livestock today, especially here in the west is largely due to the influence of the farmers on the markets as buyers and not as they should be, as sellers. Much as we may desire it, we shall not always have a ready surplus of cash for investment and some of us may likely have to ask our bankers for a little help. What answer could many of us give if, when turning us down, he said: "No, I cannot take the chance because you are not breeding a type of horse that is increasing in value. Your horses are depreciating on every market." What sound argument can many of us put up to ourselves for our own satisfaction in support of the fact that many of us are actually breeding the type of horse that is not wanted and is fast following the light horse. I do not think you will long be able to convince your banker that he should loan you money to buy tractors or motors in place of horses. One winter out of doors will fix the machinery and no little machine crop for the farmer either in the spring. Look at the many desolated farms a few years ago and the wasted wealth in machinery lying around. Economical horses, that's good business.

Every indication that I can find at exhibitions, in government records and farm journals points to two important facts:

(a) That there is more intelligence being displayed by our farmer breeders in the breeding of their horses than ever before, and

(b) Percheron sires are being more extensively used than ever before and gaining ahead faster than any other breed of draft horses in Canada.

Do not you who read this be the laggard. Take those small mares of yours and use a good, big, sound Percheron sire. You will see a great improvement in weight and a tendency, very marked, to the Percheron type in the very first cross. You will get lots of pleasure and encouragement every time you improve the blood in your horses by deeper impressions of Percheron blood. No breed crosses better or more uniformly successful on the native stock as the Percheron. I have this borne out by dozens of men. Get the pleasure and the profit out of the business this way. It is the proven safe road. Do not bother your head about tractors and their competition with your work.

Professor Carlyle, one of the most able agriculturalists in America, said at a dinner to which I was present in Calgary: "We have been spending some time at our (Oklahoma) college and experimental farm (of which he is principal) in finding out if there was a tractor, a farm tractor down in our country, or down where we have to work the nigger and the mule so much, suitable for our purposes. We are trying to develop a farm tractor. We have had some 27 different makes under observation and under test in the last three years. We have fourdifferent kinds of the smaller tractor which our people seem to have demonstrated as the most useful and the most satisfactory in service on our farm at the present time. They may develop one after a while that will be satisfactory but they have not done that yet."

GONE BUT NOT FORGOTTEN

Availing herself of her social privileges the wife of a country squire asked questions which, coming from anybody else, would have been thought impertinent. "I presume you carry a memento of some kind in that locket you wear?" she said to a female parishioner. "Yes, ma'am," was the reply, "it is a lock of my husband's hair." "But your husband is still alive!" the lady exclaimed. "Yes, ma'am, but his hair is gone!"

A Poet From The Railway

Mr. C. J. Dennis and his home in the bush at Toolangi, Victoria, N.S.W.

THE dangers of the Mediterranean route between Australia and England have induced a large number of Australians to pass through Canada, who otherwise might never have known this country, and have brought Australia into closer sympathy with the Dominion than ever before. Canadians also have learned to appreciate the Anzacs, and the increasing trade between these two junior partners of the British Empire, as shown in the record traffic of the Canadian Australasian service, is one of the bright sides of this war. There are many points of common touch—both are vast countries anxious for greater population and both are on the whole still mainly agricultural. The comparative absence of cabled news from Australia in Canadian papers is, however, a handicap against the knowledge of each other's social problems and progress, and Australian authors are as little known in Canada as Canadian writers are in the Antipodes.

One poet of Australia is, however, making headway here and deserves to be even better known—so vivid a picture does he give of the Australian larrikin in the terse vernacular of Adelaide, "Doreen and the Sentimental Bloke," which in its own country has run into the hundred thousands and has been put into a pocket edition for the soldiers in the trenches, threatens to rival even Robert Service (who like himself owes much to Kipling) in the affections of the Canadian reader, and though "The Moods of Ginger Mick," which has made a tremendous hit in Australia, has not yet been published in this country, stray copies pass from hand to hand and are greatly treasured. Ginger Mick is a peddler of rabbits who volunteers for the front and dies like a hero at Gallipoli. Dennis' "Backblock Ballads," descriptive of the people of the Australian bush and the settled country districts, are classics.

Dennis wrote "Doreen" in the bush at Toolangi, Victoria, in a log cabin which he built himself after he had grown tired of being a Government official and a newspaper editor.

Just as the early days of construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway attracted men of all classes, some of which, such as Morley Roberts and Frederick Niven, have since made their mark in literature, so the building of the Australian railways provided a job at one time of his career for C. J. Dennis, who as a man handy with the axe and saw was able afterwards to draw pay as a carpenter. His father was a retired sea captain and a hotelkeeper with small appreciation of poetry. At one of the rockiest periods of his career the poet wired the publican "Send ten pounds, going Broken Hill," to which his father replied "Sending nothing, go to Hell." In spite of this lack of sympathy, Dennis became editor of the "Adelaide Critic," which he left to establish the "Gadfly," a saucy paper on the lines of New York "Life." This paper was once accused by a correspondent of sectarian bias. Dennis replied that the paper was controlled by an Anglican, a Roman Catholic, a Wesleyan Methodist and an Atheist, and gave it as his opinion that the Atheist was "the most religious man of the lot."

Ten Dry Commandments

(By Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture.)

1. Thou shalt have no other occupation than farming.
2. Thou shalt fallow thy land every third year, being careful to plow it both early and deeply.
3. Thou shalt cultivate thy fallow and not allow weeds or any other thing that is green to grow thereon, or winds to blow through it, for in such way the moisture which thy fallow should conserve will be wasted and thy days will be nothing but labor and sorrow.
4. Thou shalt not despise the harrow, but shalt use it even whilst thou plowest, and shalt place thy chief reliance upon it thereafter, whether in early spring, late spring, midsummer or autumn.
5. Thou shalt sow good seed early and down into the moisture, lest peradventure it cometh not up betimes. He who soweth his seed in dry soil casteth away many chances of reaping.
6. Thou shalt not overload thy dry land farm with seed, even as the merciful man doth not overload his ox or his ass. Thin seeding best withstandeth the ravages of drought and hot winds.
7. Thou shalt keep on thy dry farm such kinds and numbers of horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, and poultry as the water supply maketh possible, and thou canst grow pasture, fodder, roots and grain for. Thou shalt be protected against adversity, and thus shalt give thy children and children's children cause to call thee blessed, inasmuch as thou didst not too greatly dissipate in thy lifetime the fertility stored in thy soil through many thousands of years.
8. Thou shalt not live unto thyself alone, but shalt join the Grain Growers' association, the agricultural society in thy district or any like minded organization that is good. Through these thou shalt work unceasingly for the welfare of thy district and the upbuilding of Saskatchewan agriculture.
9. Thou shalt study thy dry land farm and its problems unceasingly, and ponder on ways and means whereby its fruitfulness may be increased, keeping always in memory the fact that not alone by speeches and resolutions, but also by intelligent and timely hard work shall production be increased and the economic salvation of the country be wrought.
10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's big farm. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's big four, nor his mortgage, nor his worry, nor his hurry, nor anything that is thy big neighbor's.

Remember these dry farming commandments to keep them wholly.

THINGS WORTH KNOWING IN RAISING CATTLE FOR DAIRYING

At birth a 50-pound calf should have about eight pounds of whole milk a day, while a 100-pound one should have about 12 pounds. For the first four days milk from the dam should be fed, then that from any of the other cows in the herd, preferably not from any that are nearly dry. Milk containing not more than four per cent. butter fat is considered best. At the beginning of the third week either skim or separated milk may be substituted for whole milk at the rate of one pound a day. The daily ration may be increased from two to four pounds, depending upon the vigor of the calf. When the calf does not drink eogerly what is oeffred, the quantity should be cut down. The ration at the end of the third week usually should be approximately one-half whole and one-half separated milk. During the fourth week the change should be continued until by the end of the week only separated milk is fed, unless the calf is very delicate. With especially vigorous calves the change to separmilk is fed, unless the calf is shrdlu ated milk can be made about a week earlier. The quantity fed can be increased gradually from 18 to 20 pounds a day.

While, because of its high price at the present time, it may not be wise to feed too liberally of grain to cows on pasture, it will surely pay to feed such amount to it, to the right kind of cows, to keep up their milk flow. If it does not then the cows had better be turned off to the butcher. The farmer who allows his cows, which came fresh during the late winter and spring months, to become reduced in their milk flow now or any time during the summer because of a lack of feed, due to blind dependence upon short pasturage, will surely be feeding his herd at a loss all next fall and winter. Usually for a period of three or four weeks, or possibly six weeks, in the early summer, when the pastures are flush and at their best, it does not pay to feed grain and other feeds to the milch cows, but it does pay to do some extra feeding in the stalls whenever, during the grazing season, the pastures are too short to give the cows their proper fill of grass. This will hold true with good cows, whether it be in June, July or August.

Let the flag fly in the front yard and make the dirt fly in the back yard.

FARM PREPAREDNESS

Cool heads and bright hoes will help.

Keep the plow out of the good pastures.

A rusty hoe is proof of lack of patriotism.

It is not enough to "call a spade a spade." Use it!

The farmer will do his duty. Don't disgust him with too "much dingdonging."

It is not enough to get the garden itch in the spring. You've got to keep scratching all summer.

Right now there is need of greens, grains, grit and gumption—and the greatest of these is gumption.

In time of war the private citizen who fails to do his duty is a slacker; the negligent and unfaithful public official, a traitor.

Material Reduction in Visible Wheat Supply

Over Two Million Bushels Short Last Week—Market Unsettled and Trading Small—U. S. Total Production Shows Increase.

(By Thompson, Sons & Co.)

Wheat—In the week ending today with its winding up of July contracts, it has been possible to recoynize a little more clearly, the strong situation that wheat and grain generally is in for the time being. Visible supplies of wheat are down to a narrow compass, and on the North American continent, where new winter wheat has been harvested, the farmers are in no hurry to bring it to market. There is still delay on the part of the legislators at Washington to come to an agreement over the American food bill, and this is causing every branch of the grain and flour trade to go slow, waiting for the announcement of the regulations which are to apply on the handling and selling of the new crops. The Canadian board of supervisors on their part while ready to promulgate regulations adequate for the Canadian trade are in courtesy bound to wa't until the United States controller has the authority of American legislation to enable him to take up his work, as weeks ago it was agreed that the two countries would co-operate in whatefer regulations may be considered expedient. In the meantime the grain trade cannot enter into any plans for future business, and are forced to give their attention to the small daily business which comes along in the regular routine. Our board of supervisors, however, do not have to wait the convenience of others to use their authority on matters arising solely in Canada, and on the 27th inst. they issued an order prohibiting the sale and shipment of any more Canadian wheat of the present crop to parties in the United States without having requested and received the consent of the board. Prices of cash 1 northern in Minneapolis and Duluth have in the last few days been up close to $3 per bushel, compared with $2.40 for Canadian 1 northern and other grades in proportion. $2.40 per bushel is the maximum price fixed by the Canadian board to be paid for our 1 northern going into domestic consumption or into the hands of the government buyers, but if 60c per bushel more could be got on the other side of the international boundary, it would be impossible to prevent the wheat going there except by definite prohibition. As showing the small primary movement from first hands in the United States at the present time, there have been received at the seven principal centers of winter wheat accumulation during the present month of July 5,804,000 bushels of wheat compared with 15,594,000 bushels received in July, 1916. Small stocks, small movement, even with the small demand, have resulted in advances in the American markets of 20c to 25c per bushel on the week for cash wheat, but our Canadian prices controlled as they are, are 1½c to 2c lower on the week. The prices for future deliveries, however, show in the American markets declines of from 2c to 8c per bushel and in our Winnipeg market a decline of 5¾c. The visible supply in the United States made a decrease last week of 2,731,000 bushels against an increase of 2,254,000 bushels for same week a year ago, and the total is now down to 6,890,000 bushels compared with 40,889,000 bushels a year ago. Our Canadian visible decreased last week 1,734,099 bushels against a decrease last year of 1,969,213 bushels, and the total is now 11,952,133 bushels against 17,961,213 bushels a year ago. The world's shipments of wheat and flour last week fell off considerably compared with several weeks back; in fact they have not been so small since the last week in March. The quantity last week was only 6,966,000 bushels against 10,130,000 bushels same week last year and compared with an average of about 10,500,000 bushels per week in the last 12 weeks. The weather in the United States winter wheat belt has been very favorable over the week for ripening and harvest work, and harvest is creeping northward at a good pace, so that spring wheat cutting is expected in South Dakota next week. In the southwest drought and heat has caused a small average yield of winter wheat, but further north and east it has been more favorable and the yield over all is exceeding earlier estimates, so that if the spring wheat in the northwest sates yields a fair average, the ottal wheat production in the United States is likely to slightly exceed the total production of last year, which was 640,000,000 bushels. In western Canada, especially in Saskatchewan and Alberta, also in eastern Montana and western North Dakota, there has been last week a period of abnormally intense heat from which all crops have suffered seriously, and low estimates of the yield are given out. At many points in the province of Saskatchewan the maximum temperatures were above 100 degrees on more than one day, and this extreme heat unaccompanied by any rain has been very severe especially on poor crops. Some districts received a little rain, and two days ago there was a favorable change in the weather, much lower temperatures and increase in rainfall, which will be of great benefit in freshening up all crops and causing the grain to fill out. The season has been two weeks or so late all over the western continent, had it not been so, all grain crops would have ripened up under the great heat, and harvest time would have been here. Some barley is ready for cutting, but we thing the wheat harvest will not start until about August 20.

There is a ready demand in our Winnipeg market for all wheat offering, but the movement from the west is now down to a daily average of around 170 cars of wheat, so that the quantity for trading in is getting small, and stocks in elevators west of Winnipeg and in farmers' hands are getting well cleaned out, making a very different situation compared with a year ago when the balance of the immense crop of 1915 was still coming along at the rate of over 500 cars per day. It is well known now that our western crop of this year is going to be one of moderate yield, owing to the drought of spring and early summer, and the extreme heat and small rainfall of July, and so far as can be judged at present, if our western wheat yields 200,000,000 bushels it will do well. Cooler weather with rains during August will help to swell the yield, but too much cool weather may bring us early frost, s othat for some weeks yet the final outcome will be indefinite. Today's cash prices are: 1 northern $2.38; 2 northern $2.35; 3 northern $2.30; No. 4 $2.18; No. 5 $1.93; No. 6 $1.66; feed $1.56. The October future closed at $2.24¼.

Oats—The oat market has been very firm and active, there being a good demand for cash oats of all grades, and a congested condition in the July future, which on a small scale acted something the same as the congestion in May wheat did in the month of May. The July oat trades cere finished up today, 320,000 bushels being delivered through the clearing house and the price closed at 80½c after running up to 83c. At close of the market today's cash prices are: 2 C.W. 79c; 3 C.W. and extra 1 feed 76c; 1 feed 73c. Futures, July 80½c; October 69½c; December 65½c.

Barley—The barley market is steady, slightly easier in price mith demand fair and supply small. Today's prices: No. 3 $1.25; No. 4 $1.20; rejected and feed $1.11. The July future closed $1.27.

Flax—It has been a strong week in the flax market with an advance in prices of around 33c per bushel, closing prices today being 5c to 6c under tod price reached. The cause of the advance has been very bad reports on the new crop in western Canada, Montana and North Dakota on account of th severe hot weather and drought together with a little congestion in closing up the July trades. Today's prices are: 1 N.W. $3.23; 2 C.W. $3.16½; 3 C.W. $3.06. Futures closed, July and October $3.25; December $3.18.

LAST YEAR THE BEST IN HISTORY OF LIFE INSURANCE

The United States spent more in life insurance in 1916 than in any previous year, according to figures gathered from the companies by the Insurance Press. In the United States $4,500,000,000 of new business was written, and in Canada $231,000,000. The companies paid out $785,500,000 in the United States, and the Dominion, of which $476,900,000 was death claims, and $281,600,000 was payments for premium savings and surrender values, and to annuitants and in foreign countries. Loans on policies increased but $1,851,000 in 1916, as against an increase of $34,000,000 in 1915 and $68,000,000 in 1914. Nearly $25,000,000,000 in life insurance contracts were in force in the United States on Jan. 1, 1917, and $1,400,000,000 in Canada, not counting the fraternal and accident risks.

It is estimoted that $3,000,000,000 of life insurance is carried by Americans who are subject to the draft. A life insurance statician is authority for the statement that eighty-seven per cent. of all estates left in the United States consist solely of life insurance.

So far, in 1917, the demand for life insurance has been, it is announced, beyond all precedent. There was an indicated increase of almost thirty-one per cent. in the first five months. If this keeps up the new business for the year will exceed $5,895,000,000.

Heavily Insured New Yorkers

Policies of a quarter of a million or more were paid by the companies on the lives of sixteen men who died in 1916. They were:

Thomas L. Shevlin, Minneapolis	$1,525,000
Lewis Parker, Grenville, S.C.	770,000
William A. Read, New York	617,000
W. Le R. Roach, Muscatine, Ia	497,000
Andrew J. Graham, Chicago	434,599
Durgin Horne, Pittsburgh	433,590
Max Kobre, N.Y.	376,000
Michael Holzman, Baltimore	291,369
C. T. Peck, Chicogo	285,000
Charles Stix, St. Louis	278,000
Harris Wolff, N.Y.	275,336
Geo. C. Boldt, N.Y.	275,000
G. F. Gund, Cleveland	274,090
P. C. McKinney, N.Y.	272,000
M. D. Thatcher Pueblo, Cal.	264,111
A. E. Pew, Bryn Mawr, Pa.	250,139

The insurance on the life of the late R. A. McCurdy of the Mutual Life, who died at his home at Morristown, N.J., was $246,310.

Some of the New Yorkers who died heavily insured were:

Richard Limburg	$235,034
W. W. Lawrence	220,000
Jos. Morningstar	194,697
Louis Auerbach	192,500
F. H. Eaton	177,300
William Lennox	175,000
John S. Riegel	172,000
Nathan Eiseman	155,000
Herman Reiners	128,227
H. Gitterman	125,000
Henry Glass	112,600
Edward Slayback	107,624
J. R. Olyphant	100,060
L. H. Fibel	100,000

In Canada the heaviest individual payments on death claims were R. M. Thompson, Winnipeg, $117,000; W. J. Garrigue, Montreal, $100,598; Robert Davies, Toronto, $100,000; B. B. Law, Larmouth, $91,500; E. L. Ferris, Edmonton, $75,000.

WEEK'S EARNINGS OF C. N. R.

Toronto, Aug. 2.—Gross earnings of the Canadian Northern railway for the week ending July 31, 1917, were $1,134,900; from July 1 to date, $3,844,900.

Corresponding period last year, $1,287,300 and $3,834,200, showing an increase of $72,400 and $10,700.

Meeting of Share Holders of Eldon Mining Co., Ltd.

A meeting of shareholders of the Eldon Mining Co., Ltd., was held at the head office of the company the past week, when the directors informed the shareholders that, owing to the fact of the general public not having responded readily to the offer of shares made last month, they required their financial assistance in prosecuting the work of the company.

After hearing an account of the work already accomplished in the development of the property and the plans for the future, as laid down by the directors, several shareholders expressed ther confidence in the property itself and in the able manner in which the company's affairs had been handled by the directors. Unanimous support was accorded by the shareholders for the continuation of the working and immediate and substantial financial assistance was immediately forthcoming in the shape of applications for further shares from nearly every shareholder present.

Although there were only some 30 shareholders present, the result of the meeting was very gratifying, as it showed the intention of the shareholders in general to stand behind the proposition and also demonstrated the fact that they fully realized that they owned a good property.

EMPLOYES CLAMOR FOR PAY

Montreal—A regular turmoil was in progress around the office of the National Jockey club, all the morning, with over a hundred employes of the Maisoneuve track and persons of every description clamoring for money. The horsemen claim that the track owners were withholding payment of purses and salaries amounting to $7,000, and they were threatening serious consequences to the track owners if their claims were not attended to.

Story of the War Pilot

(Written by an Airman)

Flying in war times is a grim business. There is precious little that is "breezy" about it, and to tell the truth, the war pilot is not a "breezy" fellow.

If you are interested in the type, study the faces of any pilots you see, here are the alertness and quickness natural to the man who takes up flying, and there is also a certain hardness. Small wonder if, after three hours or so over the lines, his jaw should feel like iron.

All the way, from the start tothe return, the pilot's condition is one of incessant movement. Both feet and one hand are engaged in flying. Quick, neat movements, continually correcting, even on a calm day. That is flying. Ears listening to the engine and for the "crack, crack, crack," of a Hun attacking.

Eyes moving continuously over the instruments relating to speed and height and engine revolutions, over the earth, the other machines of the "formation," and round and round, high and low, and especially backwards, first one side and then the other, lest a Hun be diving on the tail. And in the midst of it all, suddenly "Archie" (anti-aircraft) shells bursting around in groups of six. "Archie" is a greater strain on the nerves than fighting.

"It takes 15 seconds," says a pilot, "for the anti-aircraft gunner to get a sight on you. Consequently you have to dodge and to do something different every 15 seconds."

And there is plenty of fighting. too, for the British pilot always attacks, where the Hun, unless in greatly superior circumstances, almost always puts his nose down and runs for protection first.

A Wild Game

An aerial fight is a wild game. See a man dive 4,000 feet, on to his prey, perhaps at the rate of 180 miles an hour. Does he feel exhilarated? No, his heart is thumping too hard from the sudden change of atmosphere pressure. See the rapid manoeuvring, with on time to think, where one, pitted against three, is yet the victor. Then think of the flight home that follows, with control cables holding by their last strands and only half the engine's cylinders working. Such things are common . . . That is the time to get home, sure enough; but British pilots have turned and fought in such conditions, because their principle is attack.

Perhaps as the formation returns to its aerodrome there will be oneor two pilots who are off duty, watching the landings. The power to land a machine well under all conditions is the greatest test of the pilot, and consequently flying folk are never tired of watching landings.

"All back?" "No." "Who's missing?" "Ah, poor old ——." "Really-How?" "Shot down as soon as we got there." "Oh, dear; any chance for him?" "Don't think so; we saw his machine fold up." "Anyluck yourselves?" . . . . "Archies very bad this morning at ——." And so on a tale of loss and gain, which is yet steadily ensuring victory.

No "push" can be successful without aerial success, and no aerial success can be attained without the greater risks is likely to have the longer casualty list. That is the pilot's share in victory.

But after six months or so nerve begins togo. It is really a question of nervous fatigue brought on by overstrain. Probably no man living could fly four hours a day all the year round, even in peace times. But when the signs of that overstrain begin to show the pilot is sent home at once an lighter duty for a rest.

Is the war pilot afarid or not? Who knows? One pilot replied: "Yes, I'm frightened todeath all the time—but somehow not a bit afraid."

A Hun pilot gets the Iron Cross, first class, automatically, after less than 50 hours' flying in France! Perhaps thatis due to our principle of attack. It is not as easy for a British pilot to get even a military cross, much less a D. S. O. or a V.C., the standard is so much higher.—London Daily Mail.

THE MAIDEN'S PRAYER

I wish that I had been a boy;
I'd show the fellows, too;
How I could sacrifice my joy
And carry the red, white and blue;
I'd join the army or navy;
Or National Guard so grand;
Or I'd join the cavalry, maybe,
And fight for my native land!
I'd show the fellows how to walk
And act as brave and true;
I'd give them many a good, hard talk
About the red, white and blue!
And perhaps I'd be a captain—
But even a guard would do—
As long as they would let me stay
And fight for the red, white and blue!
But I'm only a girl and happy,
So true to my country, too—
I am working for the Red Cross
To help the red, white and blue!

The Work Being Done By 40,000 Young Men In the Different Camps Where They Are Getting Experi nce To Fit Them for Officers To Command the Army Of Conscripted Men.

IT will probably never be known whether or not the President and his cabinet thought that eventually we would be at war with Germany and some persons might be inclined to criticise the administration for not being in a better state of preparedness when the crisis came. But whatever may have been the inevitable trend of affairs it must be remembered that in order to preserve the sincerity of our desire to remain at peace, it was necessary for us to do nothing that would indicate an unfriendly attitude towards Germany or give that Government the least pretext for her hostile acts against our rights as a neutral nation. So when Congress finally declared a state of war we were not much further advanced towards doing our part than we were in August, 1914. It was a gigantic task to arm and equip a force of sufficient strength and efficiency to measure up to the greatness of our country, as we were deficient in officers as well as in men.

Profiting by the experience of England conscription was adopted as the quickest and fairest way to raise an army. Officers to command these men were necessary as the regular army had few available officers to spare. Steps were taken at once to establish training camps for the education and equipment of young men to become officers of the lower ranks for the new army.

Where Camps Are Located

Sixteen camps were set apart for this purpose, located at the following places: Plattsburg (N.Y.), Madison Barracks (Sacketts Harber, N.Y.), Fort Niagara (N.Y.), Fort Myer (Va.), Fort Oglethorp (Ga.), Fort McPherson (Ga.) Fort Benjamin Harrison (Ind.), Fort Sheridan (Ill.) Fort Logan H. Roots (Ark.), Fort Smelling (Minn.), Fort Riley (Kan.), Leon Springs (Texas), and the Presidio, at San Francisco. Lists were thrown open for applications and very soon the desired number of about 40,000 men obtained. Men between the ages of twenty-one and fifty were eligible, although only a few of the latter age made application, the great majority being between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five. They came from all the walks of life, college graduates, professional men and men of large business affairs predominating. Many gave up lucrative positions to accept the call, while others made great sacrifices. The training is practically the same at each camp.

Only men of good character were accepted as men with bad records were not wanted to officer the new army. One of the rules is that each man's application had to be signed by three well known and reputable citizens from his home town or city. The period of training covers three months during which time the student is expected to imbibe enough military knowledge to become at least a junior officer. The camps are a sort of hot house West Point, where the mind of the young man is helped by rigid training. At first people were skeptical about three months being long enough to train an officer, but those who saw the men from the camp at Fort Myer march down Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington during the Confederate reunion in that city, will attest to the military bearing and behavior of these young men who handled themselves like veteran West Pointers. The very flower of the officers of the regular army were sent to these camps as instructors and they found the average man an apt pupil. Of course, there are men whose temperament unfits them for duty as army officers and these were soon weeded out. Others who had dependents were sent home, and still others who were careless were dismissed.

Paid While Training

The men were paid $100 per month while training, but had to pay their subsistence and furnish their own uniform during the three months period. The clothing necessary is as follows:

1 hat (service)
1 Coat (service) olive drab.
2 Shirts, flannel, olive drab.
2 Breches (service) olive drab.
1 Pair of leggins, canvas.
1 Pair shoes, marching.

All the necessary arms and equipment and books used are furnished by the government. The first camp closes on August 11th and the second one begins August 27th, and lasts until November 26th.

The men are required to be in good physical condition and must pass a rigid physical examination before they are admitted to camp. A man whose body is wracked with disease is unfit for military service no matter how brilliant his mind may be, consequently the physical examination is the first ordeal the embryo officer must undergo.

At the majority of camps the men are housed in cantonments, the type of shacks now used for housing the soldiers in Europe. They are one story affairs resembling the country tomato canning factories, and are divided into rooms for two men. The beds are like those of a section in sleeping cars, one above the other, and the mattress rests upon wire, which is more or less springy. The men are required to keep their houses clean and to air their bedding at certain times. This makes the camps democratic, for the young millionaire, who has always had his valet at his call, must sweep up and make his bed just the same as his brother who is not well off in this world's goods. It must be said to the credit of the rich young men, that they have entered into this spirit of democracy with a hearty good will and are excellent "housekeepers," and all through the camps equality is the watchword and everybody is on the same footing. One day a man works as a private, the next day he may be a non-commissioned officer, and the next he may play the part of a lieutenant, only to go back as a private on the following day.

Camp Day

The camp day begins at 5.45 a.m. and lasts until 9.45 p.m., a ten-hour periods of actual work with short periods of rest. Five hours work is done in the morning, three in the afternoon and a two-hour study period at night. The only time a man really has to himself is Saturday afternoon and Sunday. Many of the men are so interested in their work that they spend Saturday afternoon in study catching up some little failure of the week. The morning is usually given over to drills, for every drill of the army must be learned perfectly before a man can be given a commission. These drills consist of manual of arms, musketry training, physical drill, semaphore and flag signalling, bayonet and sabre drill. These drills are supposed to be learned during the first month of training. The greater part of the afternoon is given over to lectures and study. Each man is provided with a folding chair, which he carries to a point selected by the lecturer. Then the men gather about in a semi-circle and listen to an officer discourse on the subject of the care of a regiment, in organization or equipment and other military subjects.

Lectures by British Officers

Frequently there is a lecture by a Canadian or English officer, who has seen service at the front. These talks are intensely interesting for they bring the war scenes out in a vivid manner. One of the recent lectures at camp was on the use of gas masks, the lecturer explaining how they were adjusted, giving a demonstration by the use of a mask, after which a number of the students tried it on. Lectures on the use of the bayonet are frequent, for that weapon now plays an important part in the European war.

During the early days of the conflict the firing was all done at long range and the Germans and their enemies rarely saw each other, but today there is much had to hand fighting and our men must be taught how to hold a bayonet to the best advantage. The German soldier is not quick to protect himself with a bayonet, being clumsy and unused to boxing, while the Englishman goes in for athletics and his boxing proclivities serve him well when it comes to hand to hand fighting. The English lecturer gives the points on these subjects.

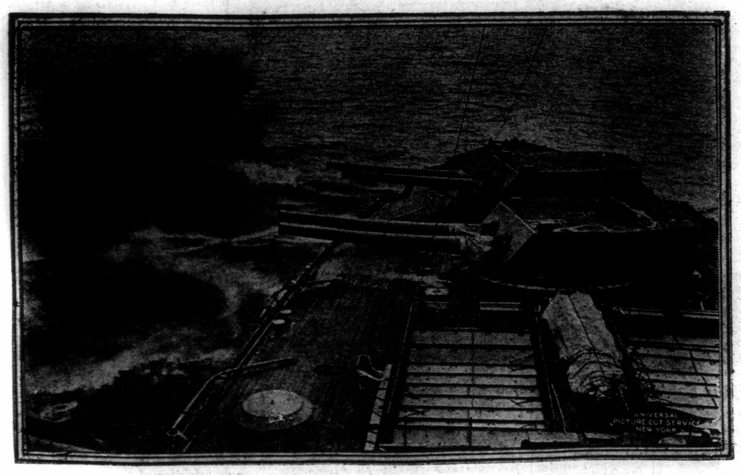
Cleaning trenches is also another subject which the men study, that is the cleaning of the German trenches of men, also how to withdraw a bayonet after kiling a man. Some of the lectures and training are kept a secret as those in charge do not think the general public should know some of the workings, but in the majority of cases one may ride or walk about the camps at will and at certain times the men may receive visits from their friends. During the lectures the men take notes and the day after the lecture they are quizzed on this and taeir lessons of the day before.

Barbed Wire and Trench Work

The second and third month of training is going throug trenches and barbed wire entanglements, as though one were in actual warfare. Trenches have been built, which are a counterpart of those used in Europe, and dugouts are constructed by the men. Barbed wire entanglements set up and lessons in how to break through them are a part of the work. Here the men are taught trench raids, night work to the accompaniment of star shells; how to use hand grenades and all the paraphernalia of modern warfare. The discipline of the camps is rigid and the training, while arduous, is not too much for the average healthy young man. He lives at these camps just as his subordinates will live in the training camps or behind the lines in France, and be gets a thorough grounding in the fundamental work of a soldier. Unlike the Canadians and English in the early days of the war, who were trained only along certain lines, and when the fighting drifted into other phases, they were helpless, our men are being trained in every possible feature of war.

Efficient Training

Thoroughness, efficiency and precision mark every part of the training. A careful watch is kept and the men are marked like the average school boy. The examinations are rigid.



The sanitary condition of the camps is excellent, and there has been little sickness. The morals too are above reproach. Two rules have been made bearing on these lines, which have worked well, one is that the men are required to wear their uniforms in public at all times and another which forbids any man in uniform from entering a drinking salon or a house of questionable character. A few of the men have broken these rules and were dismissed for the good of the service, but the percentage who break rules is so small that the morale of the camps has not been affected. On the whole the men are working hard to fit themselves to become leaders in this great crisis when real men are needed to win our fight for Humanity and Civilization.

IMMORTALITY

They are not dead, the soldier and the sailor,
Fallen for Freedom's sake;
They merely sleep with faces that are paler
Until they wake.
They will not weep, the mothers, in the years
The future will decree;
For they have died that the battles and the tears
Should cease to be.
They will not die, the victorious and the slain,
Sleeping in foreign soil.
They gave their lives, but to the world is the gain
Of their sad toil.
They are not dead, the soldier and the sailor,
Fallen for Freedom's sake;
They merely sleep with faces that are paler
Until they wake.

—Arthur G. Bourinot.

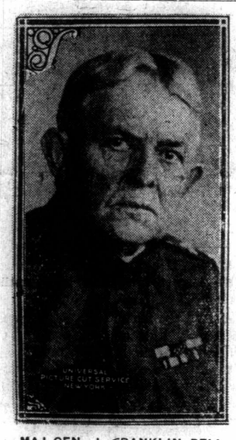
Tourists Are Welcome In Canada And They Will Be Treated Well

Popular Impressions to the Contrary Tourists and Pleasure-seekers Will Find No Toruble if They come.

Since the United States' entry into the war the impression has been gained in many parts of the country that Americans as tourists are no longer welcome in Canada. Being situated at a much used point of entry into the neighboring dominion, the Detroit Automobile club has been receiving inquiries on the subject, and by way of answering them Capt. W. S. Gilbreath, manager of the club, has gathered some first hand information from Canadian officials.

W. W. Scott, superintendent of immigration at Ottawa, Ont., writes:



"American tourists are welcome this year in Canada as in previous years. Bona fide tourists, being citizens of allied or neutral countries, may enter Canad without a passport and leave without a permit. They are assured courteous treatment at all times. Citizens or subjects of an enemy country may not enter Canada. Persons born in any enemy country, but naturalized in the United States or in some other allied or neutral country, should cary their naturalization papers. Persons of evident enemy origin, but who claim to have been born in the United States or in some allied or neutral country, should carry a birth certificate or some other evidence of their birthplace. Males of United States registration age (21 to 30 years inclusive) are not encouraged to enter Canada without some document showing that they are permitted to leave the United States.

T. C. Ray of Windsor, Ont., secretary of the border chamber of commerce, has furnished the following information regarding the entry of automobiles:

"Upon arrival of an automobile in Canada the owner must show a license card or permit issued by his home secretary of state. If he desires to remain in Canada twenty-four hours this card is taken up and held until his return. He must leave at the point he entered Canada.

"If he desires to remain in Canada longer than twenty-four hours there is issued to him a thirty day bond or permit, which must be canceled by a Canadian customs officer when the machine leaves Canada. He may leave from any port. If the tourist desires to remain longer than thirty days he must obtain what is known as a guarantee bond good for six months, issued at the port of entry. This also is canceled upon his leaving Canada. In addition the tourist must obtain an Ontario license.

"Should the tourist come from a state having a reciprocal agreement with Ontario, his license will be good for twenty-four hours, also for thirty days, but if he is to stay longer he must obtain an Ontariolicense. These states have a reciprocal agreement: Kentucky, New York, Maine, Vermont, Connecticut, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, New Jersey, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Missouri, Tennessee, and the District of Columbia."

Various Forms Of Headache

"It is necessary in order to treat headaches properly to understand the causes which produce the affection," says Dr. J. W. Ray, of Blockton, Ala. Continuing, he says, "Physicians cannot even begin the treatment of a disease without knowing what causes give rise to it, and we must remember that headache is to be treated according to the same rule. We must not only be particular to give a remedy intended to counteract the cause which produces the headache, but we must also give a remedy to relieve the pain until the cause of the trouble has been removed. To answer this purpose anti-kamnia tablets will be found a most convenient and satisfactory remedy. One tablet every one to three hours gives comfort and rest in the most severe cases of headache, neuralgia, and particularly the headaches of women.

"When we have a patient subject to regular attacks of sick headache and when he feels the least sign of an oncoming attack, he should take two A-K Tablets. Obtainable at druggists in any quantity desired."

"KAZAN"

BY
JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD

SYNOPSIS OF FORMER CHAPTERS.

In which Kazan, the wolf dog, is introduced to the readers of this story. Thorpe and his wife are living at one of the far Canadian settlements and Thorpe has just returned with Kazan, that he has picked up on his travels.

Kazan had never known the touch of a hand until Thorpe's wife caressed him for bringing her husband safely home. The touch was so strange and soothing that Kazan immediately became her devoted slave.

Said to relate Thorpe did not understand Kazan in too close proximity he became alarmed and grabbed a club and struck Kazan believing that Kazan intended to bite her.

Kazan became domesticated under the soothing influence of Thorpe's wife and all went well until one of the desperadoes of the wilds came to Thorpe's hut. Kazan evidently recognized the ruffian McCready and snarled at him. cCready likewise thought he knew Kazan but under another name, and he later tested him and found that he did.

During the evening McCready drinks heavily and a devil made plan is hatched in his mind. He wakes up Thorpe on a pretence that some one is about and they go out looking for the prowler. McCready gets Thorpe to hold the lantern and they disappear in the darkness. When McCready returns Thorpe is not with him. Kazan sees him come back and wonders at Thorpe's failure to return.

McCready then goes into the hut with a dep laid plan in his drunken head. Thorpe's wife screams on his appearance, caling for Kazan. Kazan is tied tight with an iron chain but on hearing his mistress scream he makes several attempts and finally breaks the chain, bounds into the hut and leaps upon the ruffian and buries his fangs into McCready's throat until he feels the warm blood ozzing therefrom. Thorpe's wife tries to pull Kazan off and finally faints in the ordeal. Now go on with the story.

Kazan looks up after attacking McCready and sees Thorpe approaching with a club in his hand. He remembers the last licking he had from Thorpe and so he flies in terror.

When Thorpe hears how Kazan has saved his wife he is almost overcome and they jointly go out to hunt for Kazan, but Kazan does not understand and the nearer that Thorpe approaches the faster does Kazan fly away.

In his flight he runs across the pack and the desire for companionship overcomes his training and he joins the band of wolfs.

The leader of the band disputes Kazan's admittance to the pack and a fight ensues in which Kazan is victorious, but wounded. A she-wolf attracted by his wonderful fighting ability comes to him and helps him to his feet. He recovers and goes off into the great forest.

Now go on with the story.

When he reached the shadows he looked back. Gray Wolf was following him. She was only a few yards behind. And now she came up to him, a little timidly, and she, too, looked back to the dark blotch of life out on the lake. And as she stood there close beside him, Kazan sniffed at something in the air that was not the scent of blood, nor the perfume of the balsam and spruce. It was a thing that seemed to come to him from the clear stars, the cloudless moon, the strange and beautiful quiet of the night itself. And its presence seemed to be a part of Gray Wolf.

He looked at her, and he found Gray Wolf's eyes alert and questioning. She was young—so young that she seemed scarcely to have passed out of puppyhood. Her body was strong and slim and beautifully shaped. In the moonlight the hair under her throat and along her back shone sleek and soft. She whined at the red staring light in Kazan's eyes, and it was not a puppy's whimper. Kazan moved toward her, and stood with his head over her back, facing the pack. He felt her trembling against his chest. He looked at the moon and the stars again, the mystery of Gray Wolf and of the night throbbing in his blood.

Not much of his life had been spent at the posts. Most of it had been on the trail—in the traces—and the spirit of the mating season had only stirred him from afar. But it was very near now. Gray Wolf lifted her head. Her soft muzzle touched the wound on his neck, and in the gentleness of that touch, in the low sound in her throat, Kazan felt and heard again that wonderful something that had come with the caress of the woman's hand and the sound of her voice.

He turned, whining, his back bristling, his head high and defiant of the wilderness which he faced. Gray Wolf trotted close at his side as they entered into the gloom of the forest.

CHAPTER V.

The Fight in the Snow

They found shelter that night under thick balsam, and when they lay down on the soft carpet of needles which the snow had not covered, Gray Wolf snuggled her warm body close to Kazan and licked his wounds. The day broke with a velvety fall of snow, so white and thick that they could not see a dozen leaps ahead of them in the open. It was quite warm, and so still that the whole world seemed filled with only the flutter and whisper of the snowflakes. Through this day Kazan and Gray Wolf traveled side by side. Time and again he turned his head back to the ridge over which he had come, and Gray Wolf could not understand the strange note that trembled in his throat.

In the afternoon they returned to what was left of the caribou doe on the lake. In the edge of the forest Gray Wolf hung back. She did not yet know the meaning of poison-baits, deadfalls and traps, but the instinct of numberless generations was in her veins, and it told her there was danger in visiting a second time a thing that had grown cold in death.

Kazan had seen masters work about carcases that the wolves had left. He had seen them conceal traps cleverly, and roll little capsules of strychnine in the fat of the entrails, and once he had put a foreleg in a trap, and had expereinced its sting and pain and deadly grip. But he did not have Gray Wolf's fear. He urged her to accompany him to the white hummocks on the ice, and at last she went with him and sank back restlessly on her haunches, while he dug out the bones and pieces of flesh that the snow had kept from freezing. But she would not eat, and at last Kazan went and sat on his haunches at her side, and with her looked at what he had dug out from under the snow. He sniffed the air. He could not smell langer, but Gray Wolf told him that it might be there.

She told him many other things in the days and nights that followed. The third night Kazan himself gathered the hunt-pack and led in the chase. Three times that month, before the moon left the skies, he led the chase, and each time there was a kill. But as the snows began to grow softer under his feet he found a greater and greater companionship in Gray Wolf, and they hunted alone, living on the big white rabbits. In all the world he had loved but two things, the girl with the shining hair and the hands that had caressed him—and Gray Wolf.

He did not leave the big plain, and often he took his mate to the top of the ridge, and he would try to tell her what he had left back there. With the dark nights the call of the woman became so strong upon him that he was filled with a longing to go back, and take Gray Wolf with him.

Something happened very soon after that. They were crossing the open plain one day when up on the face of the ridge Kazan saw something that made his heart stand still. A man, with a dog-sledge and team, was coming down into their world. The wind had not warned them, and suddenly Kazan saw something glisten in the man's hands. He knew what it was. It was the thing that spat fire and thunder, and killed.

He gave his warning to Gray Wolf, and they were off like the wind, side by side. And then came the sound—and Kazan's hatred of men burst forth in a snarl as he leaped. There was a queer humming over their heads. The sound from behind came again, and this time Gray Wolf gave a yelp of pain, and rolled over and over in the snow. She was on her feet again in an instant, and Kazan dropped behind her, and ran there until they reached the shelter of the timber. Gray Wolf lay down, and began licking the wound in her shoulder. Kazan faced the ridge. The man was taking up their trail. He stopped where Gray Wolf had fallen, and examined the snow. Then he came on.

Kazan urged Gray Wolf to her feet, and they made for the thick swamp close to the lake. All that day they kept in the face of the wind, and when Gray Wolf lay down Kazan stole back over their trail, watching and sniffing the air.

For days after that Gray Wolf ran lame, and when once they came upon the remains of an old camp, Kazan's teeth were bared in snarling hatred of the man-scent that had been left behind. Growing in him there was a desire for vengeance—vengeance for his own hurts, and for Gray Wolf's. He tried to nose out the man-trail under the cover of fresh snow, and Gray Wolf circled around him anxiously, and tried to lure him deeper into the forest. At last he followed her sullenly. There was a savage redness in his eyes.

Three days later the new moon came. And on the fifth night Kazan struck a trail. It was fresh—so fresh that he stopped as suddenly as though struck by a bullet when he ran upon it, and stood with every muscle in his body quivering, and his hair on end. It was a man-trail. There were the marks of the sledge, the dogs' feet, and the snow-shoe prints of his enemy.

Then he threw up his head to the stars, and from his throat there rolled out over the wide plains the hunt-cry—the wild and savage call for the pack. Never had he put the savagery in it that there was tonight. Again and again he sent forth that call, and then there came an answer and another and still another, until Gray Wolf herself sat back on her haunches and added her voice to Kazan's, and far out on the plain a white and haggard-faced man halted his exhausted dogs to listen, while a voice said faintly from the sledge:

"The wolves, father. Are they coming after us?"

The man was silent. He was not young. The moon shone in his long white beard, and added grotesquely to the height of his tall gaunt figure. A girl had raised her head from a bear-skin pillow on the sleigh. Her dark eyes were filled beautifully with the starlight. She was pale. Her hair fell in a thick shining braid over her shoulder, and she was hugging something tightly to her breast.

"They're on the trail of something—probably a deer," said the man, looking at the breech of his rifle. "Don't worry, Jo. We'll stop at the next bit of scrub and see if we can't find enough dry stuff for a fire.—Wee-ah-h-h-h, boys! Koosh—koosh—" and he snapped, his whip over the backs of his team.

From the bundle at the girl's breast there came a small wailing cry. And far back in the plain there answered it the scattered voice of the pack.

At last Kazan was on the trail of vengeance. He ran slowly at first, with Gray Wolf close beside him, pausing every three or four hundred yards to send forth the cry. A gray leaping form joined them from behind. Another followed. Two came in from the side, and Kazan's solitary howl gave place to the wild tongue of the pack. Numbers grew, and with increasing number the pace became swifter. Four—six—seven—ten—fourteen, by the time the more open and wind-swept part of the plain was reached.

It was a strong pack, filled with old and fearless hunters. Gray Wolf was the youngest, and she kept close to Kazan's shoulders. She could see nothing of his red-shot eyes and dripping jaws, and would not have understood if she had seen. But she could feel and she was thrilled by the spirit of that strange and mysterious savagery that had made Kazan forget all things but hurt and death.

The pack made no sound. There was only the panting of breath and the soft fall of many feet. They ran swiftly and close. And always Kazan was a leap ahead, with Gray Wolf nosing his shoulder.

Never had he wanted to kill as he felt the desire in him to kill now. For the first time he had no fear of man, no fear of the club, of the whip, or of the thing that blazed forth fire and death. He ran more swiftly, in order to overtake them and give them battle sooner. All of the pent-up madness of four years of slavery and abuse at the hands of men broke loose in thin red streams of fire in his veins, and when at last he saw a moving blotch far out on the plain ahead of him, the cry that came out of his throat was one that Gray Wolf did not understand.

Three hundred yards beyond that moving blotch was the thin line of timber, and Kazan and his followers bore down swiftly. Half-way to the timber they were almost upon it, and suddenly it stopped and became a black and motionless shadow on the snow. From out of it there leaped that lightning tongue of flame that Kazan had always dreaded, and he heard the hissing song of the death-bee over his head. He did not mind it now. He yelped sharply, and the wolves raced in until four of them were neck-and-neck with him.

A second flash—and the death-bee drove from breast to tail of a huge gray fighter close to Gray Wolf. A third—a fourth—a fifth spurt of that fire from the black shadow, and Kazan himself felt a sudden swift passing of a red-hot thing along his shoulder, where the man's last bullet shaved off the hair and stung his flesh.

Three of the pack had gone down under the fire of the rifle, and half of the others were swinging to the right and the left. But Kazan drove straight ahead. Faithfully Gray Wolf followed him.

The sledge-dogs had been freed from their traces, and before he could reach the man, whom he saw with his rifle held like a club in his hands, Kazan was met by the fighting mass of them. He fought like a fiend, and there was the strength and the fierceness of two mates in the mad gnashing of Gray Wolf's fangs. Two of the wolves rushed in, and Kazan heard the terrific, back-breaking thud of the rifle. To him it was the club. He wanted to reach it. He wanted to reach the man who held it, and he freed himself from the fighting mass of the dogs and sprang to the sledge. For the first time he saw that there was something human on the sledge, and in an instant he was upon it. He buried his jaws deep. They sank in something soft and hairy, and he opened them for another lunge. And then he heard the voice! It was her voice! Every muscle in his body stood still. He became suddenly like flesh turned to lifeless stone.

Her voice! The bear rug was thrown back and what had been hidden under it he saw clearly now in the light of the moon and the stars. In him instinct worked more swiftly than human brain could have given birth to reason. It was not she. But the voice was the same, and the white girlish face so close to his own blood-reddened eyes held in it that same mystery that he had learned to love. And he saw now that which she was clutching to her breast, and there came from it a strange thrilling cry—and he knew that here on the sledge he had found not enmity and death, but that from which he had been driven away in the other world beyond the ridge.

In a flash he turned. He snapped at Gray Wolf's flank, and she dropped away with a startled yelp. It had all happened in a moment, but the man was almost down. Kazan leaped under his clubbed rifle and drove into the face of what was left of the pack. His fangs cut like knives. If he had fought like a demon against the dogs, he fought like ten demons now, and the man—bleeding and ready to fall—staggered back to the sledge, marveling at what was happening. For in Gray Wolf there was now the instinct of matehood, and seeing Kazan tearing and fighting the pack she joined him in the struggle which she could not understand.

When it was over, Kazan and Gray Wolf were alone out on the plain. The pack had slunk away into the night, and the same moon and stars that had given to Kazan the first knowledge of his birthright told him now that no longer would those wild brothers of the plains respond to his call when he howled into the sky.

He was hurt. And Gray Wolf was hurt, but not so badly as Kazan. He was torn and bleeding. One of his legs was terribly bitten. After a time he saw a fire in the edge of the forest. The old call was strong upon him. He wanted to crawl in to it, and feel the girl's hand on his head, as he had felt that other hand in the world beyond the ridge. He would have gone—and would have urged Gray Wolf to go with him—but the man was there. He whined, and Gray Wolf thrust her warm muzzle against his neck. Something told them both that they were outcasts, that the plains, and the moon, and the stars were against them now, and they slunk into the shelter and the gloom of the forest.

Kazan could not go far. He could still smell the camp when he lay down. Gray Wolf snuggled close to him. Gently she soothed with her soft tongue Kazan's bleeding wounds. And Kazan, lifting his head, whined softly to the stars.

CHAPTER VI.

Joan

On the edge of the cedar and spruce forest old Pierre Radisson built the fire. He was bleeding from a dozen wounds, where the fangs of the wolves had reached to his flesh, and he felt in his breast that old and terrible pain, of which no one knew the meaning but himself. He dragged in log after log, piled them on the fire until the flames leaped up to the crisping needles of the limbs above, and heaped a supply close at hand for use later in the night.

From the sledge Joan watched him, still wild-eyed and fearful, still trembling. She was holding her baby close to her breast. Her long heavy hair smothered her shoulders and arms in a dark lustrous veil that glistened and rippled in the firelight when she moved. Her young face was scarcely a woman's tonight, though she was a mother. She looked like a child.

Old Pierre laughed as he threw down the last armful of fuel, and stood breathing hard.

"It was close, ma cheri," he panted through his white beard. "We were nearer to death out there on the plain than we will ever be again, I hope. But we are comfortable now, and warm. Eh? You are no longer afraid?"

He sat down beside his daughter, and gently pulled back the soft fur that enveloped the bundle she held in her arms. He could see one pink cheek of baby Joan. The eyes of Joan, the mother, were like stars.

"It was the baby who saved us," she whispered. "The dogs were being torn to pieces by the wolves, and I saw them leaping upon you, when one of them sprang to the sledge. At first I thought it was one of the dogs. But it was a wolf. He tore once at us, and the bearskin saved us. He was almost at my throat when baby cried, and then he stood there, his red eyes a foot from us, and I could have sworn again that he was a dog. In an instant he turned, and was fighting the wolves. I saw him leap upon one that was almost at your throat."

"He was a dog," said old Pierre, holding out his hands to the warmth. "They often wander away from the posts, and join the wolves. I have had dogs do that. Ma cheri, a dog is a dog all his life. Kicks, abuse, even the wolves can not change him—for long. He was one of the pack. He came with them—to kill. But when he found us—"

"He fought for us," breathed the girl. She gave him the bundle, and stood up, straight and tall and slim in the firelight. "He fought for us—and he was terribly hurt," she said. "I saw him drag himself away. Father, if he is out there—dying—"

Pierre Radisson stood up. He coughed in a shuddering way, trying to stifle the sound under his beard. The fleck of crimson that came to his lips with the cough Joan did not see. She had seen nothing of it during the six days they had been traveling up from the edge of civilization. Because of that cough, and the stain that came with it, Pierre had made more than ordinary haste.

"I have been thinking of that," he said. "He was badly hurt, and I do not think he went far. Here—take little Joan and sit close to the fire until I come back."

The moon and the stars were brilliant in the sky when he went out in the plain. A short distance from the edge of the timber-line he stood for a moment upon the spot where the wolves had overtaken them an hour before. Not one of his four dogs had lived. The snow was red with their blood, and their bodies lay stiff where they had fallen under the pack. Pierre shuddered as he looked at them. If the wolves had not turned their first mad attack upon the dogs what would have become of himself, Joan and the baby? He turned away, with another of those hollow coughs that brought the blood to his lips.

A few yards to one side he found in the snow the trail of the strange dog that had come with the wolves, and had turned against them in that moment when all seemed lost. It was not a clean running trail. It was more of a furrow in the snow, and Pierre Radisson followed it, expecting to find the dog dead at the end of it.

In the sheltered spot to which he had dragged himself in the edge of the forest Kazan lay for a long time after the fight, alert and watchful. He felt no very great pain. But he had lost the power to stand upon his legs. His flanks seemed paralyzed. Gray Wolf crouched close at his side, sniffing the air. They could smell the camp, and Kazan could detect the two things that were there—man and woman. He knew that the girl was there, where he could see the glow of the firelight through the spruce and the cedars. He wanted to go to her. He wanted to drag himself close in to the fire, and take Gray Wolf with him, and listen to her voice, and feel the touch of her hand. But the man was there, and to him man had always meant the club, the whip, pain, death.

Gray Wolf crouched close to his side, and whined softly as she urged Kazan to flee deeper with her into the forest. At last she understood that he could not move, and she ran nervously out into the plain, and back again, until her footprints were thick in the trail she made. The instincts of matehood were strong in her. It was she who first saw Pierre Radisson coming over their trail, and she ran swiftly back to Kazan and gave the warning.

Then Kazan caught the scent, and he saw the shadowy figure coming through the starlight. He tried to drag himself back, but he could move only by inches. The man came rapidly nearer. Kazan caught the glisten of the rifle in his hand. He heard his hollow cough, and the tread of his feet in the snow. Gray Wolf crouched shoulder to shoulder with him, trembling and showing her teeth. When Pierre had approached within 50 feet of them she slunk back into the deeper shadows of the spruce.

Kazan's fangs were bared menacingly when Pierre stopped and looked down at him. With an effort he dragged himself to his feet, but fell back into the snow again. The man leaned his rifle against a sapling and bent over him fearlessly. With a fierce growl Kazan snapped at his extended hands. To his surprise the man did not pick up a stick or a club. He held out his hand again—cautiously—and spoke in a voice new to Kazan. The dog snapped again, and growled.

The man persisted, talking to him all the time, and once his mittened hand touched Kazan's head, and escaped before the jaws could reach it. Again and again the man reached out his hand, and three times Kazan felt the touch of it, and there was neither threat nor hurt in it. At last Pierre turned away and went back over the trail.

When he was out of sight and hearing, Kazan whined, and the crest along his spine flattened. He looked wistfully toward the glow of the fire. The man had not hurt him, and the three-quarters of him that was dog wanted to follow.

Gray Wolf came back, and stood with stiffly planted forefeet at his side. She had never been this near to man before, except when the pack had overtaken the sledge out on the plain. She could not understand. Every instinct that was in her warned her that he was the most dangerous of all things, more to be feared than the strongest beasts, the storms, the floods, cold and starvation. And yet this man had not harmed her mate. She sniffed at Kazan's back and head, where the mittened hand had touched. Then she trotted back into the darkness again, for beyond the edge of the forest she once more saw moving life.

The man was returning, and with him was the girl. Her voice was soft and sweet, and there was about her the breath and sweetness of woman. The man stood prepared, but not threatening.

"Be careful, Joan," he warned.

She dropped on her knees in the snow, just out of reach.

"Come, boy—come!" she said gently. She held out her hand. Kazan's muscles twitched. He moved an inch—two inches toward her. There was the old light in her eyes and face now, the love and gentleness he had known once before, when another woman with shining hair and eyes had come into his life. "Come!" she whispered as she saw him move, and she bent a little, reached a little farther with her hand, and at last touched his head.

Pierre knelt beside her. He was proffering something, and Kazan smelt meat. But it was the girl's hand that made him tremble and shiver, and when she drew back, urging him to follow her, he dragged himself painfully a foot or two through the snow. Not until then did the girl see his mangled leg. In an instant she had forgotten all caution, and was down close at his side.

"He can't walk," she cried, a sudden tremble in her voice. "Look, mon pere! Here is a terrible cut. We must carry him."

American Women One Vast Unit, Knitting for the Red Cross—Mufflers Are Easiest to Do But Sweaters Are Most Interesting—What Sort of Wool and How To Set To Work.

MORE busy than flicker of butterfly wings, or the buzz of bumblebees, this summer, is the flash of knitting needles. Everywhere one set he flyin needles—at the theatre, on the railroad train, on excursion steamers, in restaurants, in the crowded subway cars, even on the sidewalks. Woman's knitting bag and woman are inseparable companions, for there must be no idle minutes f all the sweaters and mufflers, all the mittens and compress pads are to be finished in time. In time—that is, to reach the soldiers before cold weather; and for every soldier there is, these days, somewhere a woman knitting.

Most of the work is done under the auspices of the Red Cross, but one may obtain materials and directions for knitting anywhere. The work of kniting comfort garments for the sailors of the United States Navy has been officially placed in charge of the Comforts Committee of the Navy League by an order of Secretary of the Navy Daniels. If you want to knit for the Jackies, drop a line to the headquarters of the Comforts Committee of the Navy League, at Washington, and directions for doing this work will be sent you. Every shop seems to have a supply of the necessary wools and the right needles, with lists of directions about setting to work. Let not the tyro at knitting think, however, that she can turn in work of any old kind. Every article knitted must come up to the specifications of the Red Cross—and the standard of work is high in this organization. Dropped stitches will not be tolerated, or uneven widths resulting from that frequent fault of the beginner in knitting too many stitches. The beginner is very, very careful not to drop stitches, but where is the beginner who is not sorely puzzled to understand why more and more stitches keep growing on her needles as she goes along?

Easy to Learn to Knit But Practice Makes a Good Knitter

Anybody can learn to knit—even a child of five years old; but the ability to knit perfectly and at the same time rapidly comes only with practice and close attention. Some of the sweaters turned out in the past few years by enthusiastic women who "could hardly wait to get them finished" have been a disgrace to the gentle art of knitting. Dropped stitches, bulging or sagging lines and knot-tortured surfaces have betrayed the unskilled and too-hasty fingers that wielded the flying needles. No such work is tolerated in garments for the soldiers, and if woman is learning nothing else this summer she is learning to knit perfectly.

Best to Begin on Something Easy

Do not plunge into the knitting coterie with a sweater, set up on your needles by some kind friend, or by a demonstrator in the shop where you bought the wool. Learn to set up stitches yourself and set up and pull off after a few ribs have been finished, several times until you have mastered this first important step in the craft. There are women who have completed whole sweaters for themselves without ever having learned how to set up stitches on a needle; some kindly individual starting the work and attending to the setting up business where sleeves were added, pockets started, or other details attended to. The best thing to begin on is a washcloth or compress pad. Cotton is used, not wool, and after the stitches are set up in proper number one has only to knit straight ahead until a square is obtained. If a mistake is made little time will be lost pulling out the stitches and beginning over and one will not feel the same discouragement as in pulling to pieces a potential woolen garment. After you have acquired the knack of knitting evenly without dropped stitches or extra stitches unaccountably burdening the needle, begin on a wool muffler. For this you will need half a pound of knittnig yarn and fifty stitches must be set up—or 'cast on" if you prefer that term. Then knit until the muffler is fifty-eight inches long, no longer and no shorter; for remember it is the Red Cross you have to deal with, and every bit of work submitted must meet specifieations. It may not seem to you that half an inch on the length of ten-inch washcloth could make any possible difference to anybody; but if you were a Red Cross nurse, handling piles and piles of these knitted cloths, it would matter a good deal to you whether the yiles could be heaped evenly and accurately, and not with ragged edges where washcloths projected half an inch here and there.

Directions for War Knitters

Sometime ago this page gave a list of directions for the knitting of sweaters, mufflers and wristlets for the army and navy, but so many requests have come in from women anxious to set to work that it is deemed advisable to repeat the directions. The sleeveless jacket is a articularly useful article and may be worn over the shirt or used as a substitute for the shirt. It slips over the head ond fits smoothly over the body, clinging to the hips. The wristlets serve for gloves and wristbands and a space is provided for the thumbs to pass through. These easily knitted wristlets will be of inestimable comfort to sailors and to soldiers in the trenches when cold weather sets in.

The Sleeveless Jacket. — Three-fourths of a pound of gray knitting yarn. Cast on 80 stitches. Knit two and purl two for 4 inches. Knit plain until sweater measures 23 inches. Knit 28 stitches and bind off 25 stitches for neck. Knit 28 stitches. Knit seven ribs on each shoulder. Cast on 24 stitches. Knit plain for 19 inches. Purl two and knit two for 4 inches. Sew up sides, leaving 9 inches for armhole.

Wristlets.—One-fourth pound gray knitting yarn. Cast on 52 stitches. Knit two and purl two for 12 inches. Sew up, leaving a two-inch space for thumb, thre inches from top.

The Red Cross also asks for washcloths and knitted "wipes" or substitutes for gauze sponges.

Knitted Wipes.—Three-ply No. 8 cotton. No. 5 amber needles, or their equivalent. Cast on 35 stitches. Knit a stitch, put thread around needle, knit next stitch and repeat until you have on of the double rows and nine of he single large mesh rows, and finish off.

Washcloths.—Eight or 10 three-ply knitting cotton and No. 4 nedles. Cast on 61 stitches and knit until you have a square. Washcloth should measure ten inches square.

The Social Side of War Knitting

Besides its real purpose of providing comforts for the men who are going forth to fight, and the happiness it gives to hundreds of women who are gladly availing themselves of this opportunity to "do their bit" and offer real service, knitting has its social side too. Many are the afternoon porch parties given in honor of knitting this summer. Bridge tables are not brought out but needles fly wherever two or three are gathered together. At many of these afternoon gatherings on the porch or under the trees in the garden, some member of the party reads aloud—not a novel but something interesting, pertaining to the war. Better work is accomplished by the knitting contingent in this way, for though one may chatter blithely while doing ordinary knitting, purling requires absorbed attention and much concentration—and purling is an important feature in the knitting of war garments. You will note that the young woman who knits as she walks has passed the purling stage on her sweater and is doing straight knitting. Only an expert could walk and purl at the same time.

One has become so accustomed now to seeing flying knitting needles in the subway and other public conveyances that the sight no longer arouses special attention. With the knitting bag always conveniently at hand, it is easy to add a rib or two between ordering and lunching at a restaurant, or between the acts at a matinee. One enthusiastic maiden even carried her knitting to the movies, but so many droped stitches had to be picked up next day that she reluctantly abandoned the practice. And by the bye, be sure and learn how to recover dropped stitches by aid of a crochet hook. A dropped stitch picked up in time may save nine ribs of raveled out work! And learn, if you can, the rapid Dutch method of knitting. It is not as graceful as the old-fashioned Colonial way of throwing the wool over with a movement of the wrist, but it is much more speedy when once acquired. One must learn this method of knitting as a beginner, however, it is almost impossible to acquire the knack once the other method has become a habt. If your eyes are not strong, use white bone needles upon which the dark wool shows up better than on amber needles. And by all means learn to wind your ball of yarn from the inside out so that it is not forever roling about and moking people stoop to pick it up.

Beauties of the Canadian Rockies

GLACIER CLIMBING HAS A REAL FASCINATION

The Great Ice Rivers and Tall, Majestic Mountains of Western Canada Have an Overpowering Effect on all Spectators--How the Mountains Are Conquered by the Modern-Day Climbers.

THERE is a fascination about mountain climbing that danger whets rather than dispels and no task is too difficult for the mountaineer to undertake; to scale lofty, rugged, ice-clad cliffs is his greatest joy, and the treacherous glacier invites and encourages his spirit of adventure. While nature has given to the Rockies and the Sierras of the United States stupendous mountains, noble peaks and picturesque canyons surpassing in hugeness and height the elevation beyond the Canadian border, yet the Selkirks and Canadian Rockies are more abrupt and rugged, presenting vast areas of glaciers and affording to the lover of mountain climbing a better field for the display of his prowess and skill. These mountains are growing in popularity, and every year adds to the number who go there to conquer some lofty peak or to cross some mighty glacier. While there is plenty of excitement in both, glacier climbing gives even the veteran mountaineer a succession of thrills, for glaciers have their moods, and their ways are not easily understood. Snow craft is not learned in a day, and almost every season some climber loses his life through the treacherous snow which covers the crevasses of a glacier.

Formation of a Glacier

In plain terms, a glacier is a river of ice draining a rock basin above filled to overflowing with ice and snow and technically known as neve, but popularly called a snow field. In these high regions the heavy precipitation is always in the form of snow which keeps the great rock basins full to overflowing. The prodigious weight of the mass compacts the under snows into crystal ice. This overflow, pushed slowly down the mountain by the enormous pressure from above, constitutes the glacier. Its upper part is covered with snow, and its lower part where the warmer air melts the surface snow is exposed ice. This is the "ice fall," and in contrast to the snow covered part is called a "dry glacier." Heat and cold, contraction and expansion, and the unevenness of the bed over which it moves downward causes large cracks to occur across the ice river. They are of all sizes and are called crevasses. Sometimes they cross each other and the result is that when the pressure from above closes the cracks great ice pillars of fantastic shapes, called seracs, are formed.

The flow of a glacier is just like that of a river—the centre of the stream moves faster than the sides or bottom, while on a curve the outside edges flow more rapidly than the inside. Again at a narrow place, the flow is faster and the glacier is broken water of rapids. The piles of mud and rocks always found beside a glacier or at its tongue are known as moraines. The material of which they are formed has fallen from surrounding cliffs, and through the course of ages has been carried by the glacier and deposited in their places in somewhat the same manner as a rapid stream or river deposits driftwood along its shore, except that the flow of the glacier is very slow, being only a few feet a year, and the process of piling up has taken ages. If the rate of the flow of the glacier over its rocky bed caused by gravitation and pressure from above, is greater than the annual loss by melting during the summer the glacier is advancing, if less, it is retreating.

These great masses of ice stretch over vast areas, for instance, the Illecillewaet snow field is about ten square miles, while the Columbia snow field is roughly estimated to cover over two hundred square miles at an altitude of ten thousand feet. Any number of hanging glaciers are to be found in the Selkirk range, one of the few places in which they exist. Along the heads of the high valleys they are found lining the sides and are strikingly beautiful in the labyrinthine structure of their crevassed surfaces which from a distance resemble a creamy film of lace work enshrouding bare rock.

Canadian Alpine Club

Up to 1888 there were no climbers in Canada who climbed for pleasure. Of course, there was the engineer corps and the topographical survey of the Caadian Government, but this was work, not play. Today, however, mountain climbing in these splendid ranges has become a genuine sport and a part of the summer vacation of many Canadians. This was brought about through the organization of what is known as the Alpine Club of Canada. Each year the members go into camp and some new snow-capped giant is conquered. Only those who have climbed over glaciers to the summit of a perpetual snow-capped mountain are eligible. The club at present has a membership of about seven hundred, many of whom are women who are glacier climbing experts. While all glaciers are beautiful, the rugged formation of the Illecillewaet with its huge crevasses, its giant seracs and its moraine of boulders is perhaps the most picturesque. Unfortunately, it is rapidly receding and climbing on parts of it is a dangerous sport owing to the "rotten" ice. Its snow field, which must be crossed to reach Sir Donald, the prettiest peak of the range, spreads over many crevasses and it is unsafe to go over it unless accompanied by one of the Swiss guides.

Illecillewaet Ice Cave

The writer in climbing over the Illecillewaet glacier came across an ice cave with a waterfall in the rear. At this point the glacier was a delicate blue-green and transparent. The ice had formed itself into seats around the sides of the cave and one might sit in a cold chair and view the waterfall, a thin stream which dropped for fifteen or twenty feet. At another place there was a maze of crevasses sweeping outward from the centre. Many of them seemed bottomless, and the ice in their depths was a deep blue. Everywhere one heard the trickle of water, for streams were running beneath the glacier. In order to fully appreciate the magnificence of this big ice field it is necessary to study it under different aspects—in light, in shadow and with the sun sparkling on its many ice points, or when it is covered with fresh snow, or to follow its snow slopes to the sky line and then turn and gaze upon the dwarfed landscape below. From the crest of the snow field to the tongue of the glacier is a fall of about three thousand feet—a pretty stiff climb, but worth the exertion, for the seracs—great pinacles of ice, are alone worth the trip.

Asulkan Glacier

The Asulkan glacier is in the same vicinity, and is even more dangerous and difficult to climb. It presents several spectacular groups of seracs and a number of fine crevasses of great depth and lined with pendant icicles. They resemble cavernous jaws set with sharp, cruel teeth, yet when the sun plays on their walls of green and blue they seem like some fairy cave filled with gems. Patches of red snow, so common in the Arctic regions, are frequently seen on the Asulkan snow field—a vegetable formation resembling a seaweed. It grows on the surface of the snow making a crimson stain and is the lowest form of plant life.

Any number of smaller glaciers exist in the Selkirks but the two mentioned are the most beautiful, although the Geikie is regarded by many climbers as remarkable on account of its almost smooth surface. The Selkirks are separated from the Rockies by the low lying valley of the Columbia River, and are wholly different in structure and older geologically.

Mount Robson

The highest peak of the Canadian Rockies is Mt. Robson with an altitude of thirteen thousand, five hundred feet. This mountain has a glacier gateway worthy of the most energetic mountain climber. Last year several members of the Alpine Club of Canada reached its summit and had some thrilling experiences on the snow fields. Of course, these people climb by the aid of ropes, which is the only safe way to climb where snow and ice are encountered. The ice field presents the best seracs to be found on the glaciers of the Rockies. A number of snow cornices form every year and these are extremely dangerous to climbers. They are a sort of overhanging edge of snow at the crest of a peak or ridge caused by drifting; ice is formed by the snow thawing and freezing again. Should the climber step on one of these a bad fall is sure to follow.

Victoria Glacier

Mt. Victoria, near Lake Louise, is one of the favorite peaks of the Rockies. It is over eleven thousand feet in height and has a beautiful blue-white glacier on its slopes. This great ice field is said to be from two hundred to two hundred and fifty feet in thickness. In marm weather the thunder of avalanches is frequently heard at the Chalet, for great masses of this ice break off and come thundering down the mountain. As distances in the mountains are very deceptive, it is no uncommon thing for tourists to start to walk to the Victoria glacier under the impression that it is a mile or two away, when in reality the tongue of the glacier is about five miles from the hotel. During the summer visitors are cautioned not to approach the Victoria glacier owing to the avalanches which generally bring a shower of rocks as well as ice. The glacier alone is three miles in length and must be crossed in order to gain the summit. Even after the main ice field has been covered hanging glacier and cornices bar the way. From the top the view is magnificent for countless peaks, lakes and the beautiful Paradise Valley come into view. Lake Louise like a huge turquoise lies at the foot of the peak, with Lake Agnes and Mirror Lake stuck into the sides of a nearby peak. Wild flowers are all about nestling even at the edges of the glaciers, while far in the distance Bow Valley with the Bow River like a ribbon of silver winding its way through the valley can be seen. Altogether the view from Mt. Victoria is one of the grandest in North America.

Valley of the Ten Peaks

Up in the Valley of the Ten Peaks glaciers fairly run riot. The one known as the Wenkchemma is the largest and rests against several of the peaks. A large part of it is buried under moraine debris, which makes climbing over it both easier and safer. Streams from these glaciers trickle down the mountains and keep the flowers in the valley fresh with their spray.

The snow field of Mt. Resplendent is unusually smooth and causes the climber little bother, but the final stages of the climb are usually trying on account of avalanches. In Paradise Valley, Yoho Valley and Consolation Valley numbers of glaciers are to be found their sides beautiful by Alpine flowers and weird trees dwarfed by wind and storm. Scores of unnamed lakes dot these beautiful mountains of Western Canada, and many peaks are yet unnamed and unconquered.

Glacier climbing under the care of a competent guide is healthful and invigorating and brings the traveler into the heart of nature's beauties. Solid ice rivers covering many miles, countless snow fields, rushing torrents, beautiful waterfalls and acres of wild flowers form an ever ending delight to the lover of His handiwork—the Maker of the Everlasting Hills.

CROWN AND BRIDGE WORK

OUR GREAT SPECIALTY

ARE you contemplating Crown and Bridge Work? If so, do not make the mistake so many others have made, namely, having the work done by other than a specialist in this branch of dentistry. In order to be successful in Crown and Bridge Work, an intimate knowledge of this work, combined with mechanical skill and years of experience is required.

¶ The lack of these qualifications explains the failure to attain strength, durability, its natural appearance, and sanitation, all of which are so very important.

¶ By visiting our offices you will readily appreciate the fact that we are thoroughly equipped with the most modern appliances for the proper execution of this work, and a test of skill will convince you, as it has hundreds of others, who have been wearing our crowns and bridges for years with perfect satisfaction, that all the assertions we have made are entirely justifiable.

WRITE FOR OUR FREE BOOK

¶ If you cannot call conveniently for a few days, send a postcard, and a useful and interesting book, "The Care of The Teeth," will be sent by return mail. It tells you a great many things about your teeth, and shows how many thousands suffer from bad health through no other cause than defective teeth

THE LEGEND OF THE RED, THE WHITE AND THE BLACK MAN

Once upon a time as the Great Spirit sat in the doorway of his mighty wigwam in the Happy Hunting Grounds, and gazed upon the treasures of the world spread beneath him, he decided to make a man, a creature that would look somewhat like himself to rule this earth as the Great Spirit might direct. So the Great Spirit built a mighty oven and started a fire beneath it. Then, he took some clay from the shores of the silver lake near his wigwam and shaped the image of a man from it.

When the oven was warm the Great Spirit put the image in it to bake, but he was so anxious to see how it would turn out that he did not leave it in the oven long enough and when he took it out the man was only half-baked. This made the Great Spirit very angry and he called this man the White Man and flung him down into the land where the rising run and the cold north wind meet.

White Half Done, Black Overdone

Then the Great Spirit built another fire and shaped another man from the clay. This time the Great Spirit was overzealous and left the man in the oven too long, so that he got burnt. When the Great Spirit took the man out of the oven and saw how black and burnt he was, he was again very angry. He called this man the Black Man and threw him down into the southern part of the world where the sun's rays shone the warmest.

Once more the Great Spirit shaped the image of a man and built a new fire beneath his great oven. By this time, however, the Great Spirit had learned much by experience and he left this man in the oven just the right length of time so that he was neither half-baked nor overdone. When he took this man out of the oven he was just right and was a healthy red-brown color.

"Ah-ha," said the Great Spirit with satisfaction, "this is the best of all," and he called him the Red Man. To this man he gave the great western land where the sun makes its wigwam and the great mountains crowned with jewel lakes reach up to the Happy Hunting Grounds.

Work the Black Man's Salvation

Then the Great Spirit took a journey with the sun one day to visit the earth. He saw the White Man in the northeastern land and when the White Man saw the Great Spirit he cried:

"Lo! Great Spirit, I am but half-baked and not strong enough to earn my living." And the Great Spirit answered him, saying, "Take this and earn your living by it." And he gave the White Man a book.

Then to the southland in the heat of the day rode the Great Spirit with the sun and there he saw the Black Man stretched under a tree in the shady jungles.

"Lo! Great Spirit," cried the Black Man, when he saw him coming. "I was baked too much in the Great Oven, so that I am too lazy to earn my living." Then the Great Spirit gave a spade to the Black Man, and said:

"Take this spade and dig near the waters in your land, the southland, for there are many diamonds and other precious treasures hidden there by which you can earn your living."

And as the day wore on and the sun turned homeward to his wigwam for rest the Great Spirit rode with him to the land of the west, where the Red Man dwelt.

Spirit's Gift to the Red Man

"Ah, Great Spirit, said the Red Man when he saw him coming, "here I am, strong and well, in this beautiful land which you have given me, but I do not see how to earn my living."

"Take these," said the Great Spirit, as he handed the Red Man a bow and a quiver of arrows, "and with them earn your living. From the animals you shall have food and clothing; from the trees you shall have material to build your wigwams and canoes, and from the plants and herds you shall have medicine to keep you well."

And so there came to earth the White Man, with his learning of books and the preaching of the Great Spirit's own Book; the Black Man, who must ever dig for his living and uncover the treasures of the earth, and the Red Man, who is versed in all of nature's knowledge, and in time the Great Spirit has brought them all together to learn to help each other and enjoy the many fruits of the earth until he shall see fit to call them all back to his Great Wigwam on the shores of the silver lake in the Happy Hunting Grounds.

WHAT IS MAGNETISM?

A steel needle thrust through a cork and allowed to float in a basin of water will rotate until it lies in a line indicating north and south. This is because the earth itself is a huge magnet with a north and a south pole. If a sheet of paper is laid over a familiar toy horseshoe magnet and bits of iron sprinkled gently over it, the lines of force taken by the magnetism are revealed. It is the magnetic lines of force needle until it lies parallel along them.

The sunalso is a magnetic body. This is to be expected of a globe which is largely composed of iron and other magnetic metals. When the solar disk is obscured by the moon in times of total eclipse, a pearly rosy of steel blue mist is found to completely envelop the sun. It can only be seen at such times because it is too faint to be visible against the glaring sky of day. This corona, as it is called, is divided into myriads of streamers near the poles of the sun, and suggest strongly the appearance of the iron dust about the poles of a magnet.

The frequency of sunspots and the brilliancy of the aurora go hand in hand. A particularly violent sunspot is usually followed by a great display of the northern lights. The cause of the auror and all terrestrial magnetic storms lies in cyclones on the sun.

Sunspots are gigantic whirlpools of heated gases in the solar atmosphere, which, as they revolve, become strongly magnetic. Above them the lines of force about the sun bend sharply outward, sometimes so far that they reach the earth's orbit. Electrically charged particles of gasses, called ions, are constantly being driven outward along these spoke-like magnetic fields. When a stream of them touches the earth they are drawn in toward our magnetic poles and produce an X-ray effect in the upper air which we call the Aurora Borealis and Aurora Australis.

Spots on the sunand aurorae on earth run in cycles of eleven years. The last sunspot maxibum was in 1915 and the next one will be in 1926.

A MYSTERIOUS COMMUNICATION

"We arrived here safe, after a long and troublesome journey. The ordered goods have arrived in excellent condition. The messenger has brought us snow and hail in good order; the storm came one day later. I am sorry that the thunder burst up, and the lightning we had to patch up also. The ocean and rivers I wish you to send as early as possible; and do not forget to send us new clouds and a new sun. But the most important thing we want is a bay, as ours has been burned. Then we want a few yards of forest. Roll them all up and send immediately!" This letter was not written by a practical joker, but by the manager of a traveling theatrical company which had lost some of its scenery.

THE MAN WHO SAVED QUEEN VICTORIA'S LIFE

In the recent fighting near Ypres there was killed Lieut.-Colonel Gordon Wilson, who, as an Eton boy, was instrumental in saving the life of Queen Victoria in March, 1882. When Roderick Maclean, a young man, attempted to fire a pistol at the queen on the platform of Windsor station, Wilson struck up the assailant's arm, for which he was summoned to the castle and personally thanked by the queen. He afterwards served with distinction in the South African war, and was A.D.C. to Baden-Powell throughout the siege of Mafeking.

A POINT OF ORDER

Theodore Ropsevelt, in his autobiography, relates an incident that caused some amusement in the New York legislature before the assembly was properly organized or had adopted any rules, and each day the only business was for the clerk to call the roll. One day a member named Brogan suddenly rose, and the following dialogue ensued:

Brogan: "Misther Cler-rk!"

The Clerk: "The gentleman from New York."

Brogan: "I ask for the reading of the rules."

The Clerk: "There are no rules."

Brogan: "Thin I object to thim."

The Clerk: "There are no rules to object to."

Brogan, nonplussed, but immediately recovering himself: "Oh! Thin I move that they be amended until there ar-r-re!"

MY CANADA

I LOVE my country. There is nothing that she can ask I will not do. I am ready to live or die for her. She is the realization of a dream and the fulfillment of an ideal—this Canada of ours. She is the embodiment of what a country should be—and right or wrong, it is my home, my country—the one I love.

Progress Of the War During the Past Week

United States Using Every Means to Meet Conditions—Germans Meet at Essen and Declare for Peace.

The happenings in war circles this week have been very confusing. First of all we have the Liberal convention, which brings new difficulties by Laurier getting the position of "leader." Then Russia's change and offensive puts new hope into the hearts of the Allied soldiers. United States, too, is taking active part in the great European struggle. Difficulties in different countries tend to make the struggle appear hard. However, if it would be known how much trouble the Huns have, we would think ourselves very lucky.

Aug. 4—Section 32 of the American field service went to the front today.

United States seized 2,000,000 tons of shipping, comprising 100 vessels, for which builders will receive compensation.

Russia's national debt has increased to 50,000,000,000 roubles from 9,000,000,000 since the war has started.

On the Russian frontier the Huns have been victorious and the Russians were retreating. However, in places a few prisoners were captured from the offensive army.

The restoration of the Greek fleet began today. The light cruiser Helli being returned today.

Aug. 5—Canadians advanced on the western front towards Lens on a 1,00-yard front to a depth of 200 yards, successfully holding their positions.

The trans-Atlantic wireless service between United States, Canada and Great Britain was discontinued today.

A Holland-American line steamer struck a mine, but reached port in spite of its damaged condition.

Aug. 6.—Gen. Erdelli of the Russian army was assassinated.

Aug. 7.—Liberals in session; Canada is chief problem discussed.

Austria acts hostile towards the Germans—would like to break with Huns.

Premier Kerensky has his cabinet formed.

Aug. 8.—People of Germany demanding a government which represents the German people.

Russian troops resume offensive, capturing Austro-German towns.

Italian airmen cause destruction in Hungary.

Food bill passed the U. S. senate today.

Aug. 9.—Bread cards are to be used in Paris next October.

Important advances along the western front, near St. Julien, were made, but rain caused a stop.

Germans are aiming at Odessa now. Their wheat supply must be getting low.

Explosion near Cracow, Galicia, proved fatal to many men.

At Essen, Germany, many people gathered, declaring for peace.

Aug. 10.—Regulations were passed in Canada to the effect that only certain foods can be used.

Liberals choose Laurier and decide against conscription.

Russians completely check the Huns.

New Ship Canal to Bisect Scotland

Glasgow.—Plans for cutting a ship canal across Scotland, connecting the North sea and the Atlantic by a voyage of only 50 odd miles, are advocated owing to the war and the growing importance of the British naval base at Rosyth. Naval men expect that work on such a canal will be begun as soon as the war is over and that the work can be completed within three years.

To Relieve Channel

The value of a canal by which the largest warships could pass at will between the North sea and the Atlantic needs no demonstration. The commercial possibilities of such a canal are also large, for it would effect an astonishing reduction in distance between certain important ports as well as avoid the dangerous passage north of Scotland and the congested English channel route on the south.

The canal would reduce the distance from Glasgow to Leith by 485 miles, from Glasgow to London by 253 miles, and from Glasgow to Hamburg by 312 miles. The saving between Liverpool and Leith would be 400 miles, between Leith and Belfast 377 miles, between Liverpool and the Elbe 288 miles, and between Glasgow and Antwerp 290 miles.

Discuss Other Routes

Two rival routes for the canal are being discussed. One would follow an existing barge canal, involving the deepening of the upper Clyde, the crossing of a plateau with an indifferent water supply, and the construction of six locks on each side. Advocates of this route point to the advantages of the canal passing through Glasgow.

The alternative route would start from Alloa on the Forth and make directly for Loch Lomond across land which is never more than 50 feet above sea level. As the lake itself is 22 feet above the Atlantic, only one lock would be necessary at each end of the canal. There would, however, be a deep cutting of eight miles, nearly two miles of which would be comparable in magnitude to the Culebra cut on the Panma canal.

GOOD CITIZEN DEPARTS

George E. Aylesworth

War in the United States is drawing citizens from this side rapidly. People who have been called slackers here are responding readily to the call of their home country. George Aylesworth, who for the past four years had the honor of being one of the most popular theatrical managers in the province, left last week for Chicago, where he is to train for overseas service. Mr. Aylesworth was manager of the Princess theatre here, and his departure will cause grief at the theatre and also in the city. He was a leader in all the social and business developments of the city and country in general.

When he heard that the United States had declared upon an active participation in the Europeon war, he immediately sent to the state department for admission to the ranks. Response came to him telling him where he could report for duty.

Mr. Aylesworth has the distinction of being the first theatrical manager from Calgary to don the khaki. If his success in military circles will equal his success in theatrical circles, of which we have no doubt, he will be of great service to his country, as he has been in the past. Though we regret to see him go, our best wishes are with him for a successful career.

THE APACHE INDIAN UPRISING IN ARIZONA

Globe, Ariz.—A force of mounted rangers were today expected to reach the scene of the Apache Indian uprising in the Sierras Anchas mountains, 50 miles northeast of here, where nine white men, employes of the asbestos mines in that region, were reported early today to be surrounded in a dugout by a mob of more than 100 striking Indian and Mexican miners, while a forest fire set by the Indians was sweeping the mountains.

Other forces of cowboys and forest rangers are hurying to the imperilled white men's assistance.

Annual Meeting of The Canadian Seed Growers' Association

The annual meeting of the Canadian Seed Growers' association for the year 1916-17 was held in the Canadian building, Ottawa, on July 31 and Aug. 1. Dr. Jas. W. Robertson, president, occupied the chair, and there were present, among others, Dr. C. A. Zavitz, O.A.C., Guelph; G. H. Clark, seed commissioner; Geo. F. Chipman, Winnipeg; R. B. Whyte, Ottawa, and the secretary, L. H. Newman.

The reports submitted showed that never before in the history of the association has the value of systematic work in the improvement of seed been more apparent than during the past season. The number of applications from individual farmers who wish to carry on this work under expert direction is 285, this being much the largest number ever received during any one year. The total number of farmers now affiliated with the association is 1,504. Plans were discussed for advancing the work still further and of adapting it to meet after-war conditions. The problem of assisting in creating a source of supply of pure vital and productive seed in sufficient quantity to meet the needs of newcomers and others is an important one and therefore received special consideration at this conference. The matter of encouraging the production of registered seed potatoes on a substantial scale in certain districts in New Ontario for use in the older settled parts was discussed at considerable length. The association expects to cooperate with the provincial department in this work and looks forward to rather large developments. The officers elected for the ensuing year are as follows:

Dr. J. W. Robertson was re-elected president, as was also Mr. L. H. Newman as secretary-treasurer. The board of directors consisted of 18 members, of which two are from Alberta—H. A. Craig, deputy minister of agriculture, Edmonton, and E. A. Howes, University of Alberta, Edmonton.

EXPLOSION IS DESTRUCTIVE

An explosion and fire in a big chemical works in East Londan, August 9, wrecked the building and killed or injured scores of workers. Thirteen bodies of women so far have been rescued from the ruins. Many of the injured have been treated at the police stations and other convenient places. Bodies are still being searched for. Combustion is thought to be the cause as far as is known.

CALGARY MAN IS HONORED

CLIFFORD B. REILLY

Mr. Reilly was elected vice-chairman of the Winnipeg convention of the Liberal associations. It was an honor that all Calgary will be duly appreciative of. The fact that they selected a Calgary man for this important office portends well for our position in the political world.

C. S. NOBLE IS TO HAVE LARGE ACREAGE FOR NEXT YEAR

Mr. C. S. Noble is the wizard of record wheat producing in Alberta. Most of his land is situated around Nobleford.

Mr. Noble has approximately 7,000 acres of wheat in crop this year and is preparing for a larger acreage for the season of 1918.

In a way the record for wheat production between Mr. Noble and George Lane, of Calgary, has developed into something of a race, with each of the wheat kings doing his utmost to increase the bushels of wheat taken from the rich Alberta soil.

The record of the career of Mr. Noble since his coming to Alberta but a few years ago, is like the tale of fairy riches in a way, and his wealth has accumulated in the production of wheat and other grains only, and principally wheat.

Mr. Noble has built a thriving little town near his big farms, which has been named after him, "Noblelord," and at which there is already one of the most up-to-date small hotels in the rural sections of the province. There are several large elevators and many other improvements in the town already.

POLITICAL TROUBLES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

St. Johns, Nfld.—A political crisis has developed in the legislature through the upper house rejecting the bill for the taxation of business profits for war revenue.

It is said the government will prorogue the legislature and consider further action. This may take the form of an attempt to force the bill through a special session, or there may be an appeal through a general election.

Liberal Convention Is For a United Canada

Some Dissatisfaction Arises From Different Sources—Laurier Will Lead—Labor Party Will Take a Separate Stand.

The Liberal convention, held at Winnipeg the past week, has been the cause of much critical comment. Certain crafty politicians hand the idea that because Laurier is to lead the party, the Canadian people will follow the example of Russia. Why so? No reason whatever for any person to think that for we have a different form of government altogether—with an autocratic government we might follow Russia's example but not with our present form. While many resolutions of interest were passed, the only one that attracts attention is the one in connection with conscription, which is by far the most serious problem in Canada today. The stand taken in connection with this was "No Conscription" for Canada, and passed the convention unanimously except for a few of the delegates.

In Winnipeg the veterans feel very much hurt over the attitude of the convention, however, they will form a new party in the west, a party which will stand for conscription and national government. This new organization will hold a convention next Thursday.

The main accomplishment at the convention was the reuniting of the Liberal party with Laurier at its head. Though Laurier has in the past turned down conscription, he will have to change when election comes for he can't speak on a platform against compulsory service, when the majority of the west demand it. He will by all means show his worthiness as a statesman by utilising his every energy to unite the people of Canada in this great crisis, that the war may be won. Every Liberal will be only too glad to support him if he takes the right attitude, of which we have no doubt, for he, with years of experience, as head of the nation knows their necessities and demands.

Alex Ross, M.P.P. of Calgary, though he refrains from discussing the Liberal convention, does declare that the Liberals are far from being united, and he states that there is to be a third party at the coming election, which will be a straight labor party. According to him the stand taken will be, first, a party standing for coalition government and conscription, second, for Laurier, and third, for labor. Furthermore he said that he knew of no labor man who would care to participate in a coalition government, however its future policy will be decided upon at the labor congress to be held in Ottawa on September 11.

Now that Sir Wilfrid has a united party behind him, Sir Robert Borden has appealed to him, to help form a national government, giving more generous terms than before. However no conclusion has been reached. It is thought that Sir Robert pleaded with the opposition leader that a general election might be avoided.

As yet the outcome is very far away and things seem undecided, but even if Laurier is opposed to national government he will by all means have to support compulsory service.

Non-Partisan League Starting In Regina

Plans are being made to form and organize the Non-Partisan league in Saskatchewan, with a platform which will support conscription and national government.

Yesterday H. G. Smith, managing director of H. G. Smith company, wholesale grocers, of this city, started the ball rolling in an appeal to the independent citizens of Regina to sink party affiliations and to gather together to form an organization to elect a candidate who would support a national government. Since then the army and navy veterans, in session last night, passed a resolution regretting that conscription had not been endorsed by the Liberal convention and praising the stand taken by J. G. Turriff.

Veterans Disappointed

This morning Sergt. Renton, president of the Great War Veterans' association, expressed himself unmistakably. A Liberal for the last 10 years he was grievously disappointed with the action of the convention.

H. G. Smith was a member of the Wetmore royal commission which investigated some of the Bradshaw charges and is known as a prominent Liberal. He is one of the leading business men in Regina and a man of much force and energy.

SOCIALISTS FROM UNITED STATES ARE BARRED

Washington—Secretary Lansing announces that the policy of the U. S. government has undergone no change with respect to withholding passports to Socialists and others desirous of leaving this country to attend international meetings for a discussion of peace aims and terms. Under this policy no passports will be issued for Americans to participate in the International Socialist conference to be held at Stockholm, Sweden, on Sept. 9.

EFFECT OF HIGH EXPLOSIVES

Beginning last fall the British and French have employed explosives of terrific power; greatly exceeding the force of the German shells. Photo shows gun carriage blown up a tree.

So The People May Know

THE FARMER HAS A JUST COMPLAINT

The farmers of the country are beginning to awaken to the fact that the recent action of the government in establishing a price for wheat is pauperizing them to a certain extent and there is now a murmur arising, here and there, which is gaining in power every day, and which threatens to burst some day in an explosion the like of which has never been known in this or any other country.

Rumor upon rumor and complaint upon complaint comes from the fields as the full significance of the recent action slowly simmers through the brains of the ruralites. The discrimination this order has entailed against the farmer being able to take advantage of the present conditions and get a fair price for his products is causing the farmer to hurl epistles of anger and comment that is bound to result in a serious storm if some action is not taken to quell the difficulty.

Among the remarks made by the farmers is the fact that nine-tenths of the board that were appointed to pass this law were commission grain men, not farmers. That most of these men or the firms they represented have thousands upon thousands of bushels of wheat in storage today. When the proper time comes the farmers think the embargo will be lifted for a while with the result that wheat will soar to an unheard-of price and the commission men will receive fortunes upon fortunes while the poor deluded farmer will again be caught in the wedge between the jobber and the public and lose the rightful profit his efforts have entitled him to.

The farmer naturally feels that he is entitled to all the profit he can get because he has to pay the other fellows profit for everything he uses. No embargo has been placed on the price of farming machinery, automobiles, and a hundred and one necessities which the farmer has to buy whether he wants to or no. Worse still, these prices have all gone up from one to three hundred per cent.

Some assurance will have to be given to the farmer by the government to allay their suspicions and that, promptly, or the tide of discontent now arising means trouble more serious than the present war if the rumors are allowed to grow until they come to a head.

Suspicions and Deceptions Befogged Russians' Reason

So Declared Alexander F. Kerensky the Man of the Hour and War Dictator

I meant to write about the attitude of the imperial duma toward the social and economic questions of wartime—the questions that prove the irreconcilability of the basic social tendencies of the majority of the imperial duma with those of the majority of the bloc—about what must be done immediately for the solution of the gigantic economic crisis in order to prevent a complete economic breakdown. The "Provisions Problem," in relation to the bloc of the imperial duma, would be in many respects a very interesting topic to discuss. I meant to write on this, but * * * I read in the December issue of the Russkaya Mysl an article by Mr. Isgoyev, and I feel an urgent need to write something on demagogy.

Many colored facts of the present sufficiently reveal the spirit of the "new man" in those "mature politicians," or in the ordinary Russians, for whom the war became that "rejuvenating bath" which washed them clean of the sins of 1905 to such an extent that frequently, instead of becoming rejuvenated, they are simply naked people who have reverted to the psychology of the primitive man.

I had occasion to write that the great European war flung the political consciousness of the main part of our society "from Europe to Asia" and forced it to react against the attitude of the authorities toward the people, in a manner "a la Moscow" and "a la Tartar." Even the opinion which, according to the Moscow formula, the people were allowed to have was repounced. This retrogression in politics corresponded, as one might have expected, to a kind of general backsliding to the primitive in thinking and in world outlook.

A movement in the direction of political and social mythology began. Political "mythmaking" sprang up. The picture of the world became extremely simplified. The capacity for explaining and generalizing on events was lost. A leaning toward personification of events, toward fetichism, became noticeable. For example, the terrible phenomena of the world conflict, which came as the inevitable consequence of complex political and social causes, were regaded as a conspiracy of the "bad" against the "good"; or were ascribed to the machinations of "one man," who, if he is not Satan himself, is at least one of his "angels."

The severe trials and misfortunes that have fallen to the lot of our native land are considered the results of internal intrigues of the enemy; the defeats and failures that afflict the enemy are attributed to Supreme Justice, etc. It seems as if the human intellect, oppressed with the horror and the immensity of events, has lost the power to perform its function—to explain events—and explanations give way to fairy tales. * *

In his remarkable novel, "Mr. Britling Sees It Through," H. G. Wells profoundly reveals the painful evolution of consciousness that English society went through during the war. He tells how, after the initial perplexity and surprise, the "second stage" began. * * *

"It was marked by the first beginnings of a spy hunt, by the first denunciations of naturalized aliens, and by some anti-German rioting among the mixed alien population in the East End"; then "it became peevish and impatient, like some ill-trained man who is sick; it directed itself no longer against the enemy alone, but fitfully against imagined traitors and shirkers * * *"

So, for a long time, our military failures were sincerely attributed to "treason," to the crimes of individuals, and on this soil blossomed the "abominable calumny" of a whole nation. But, little by little, people began to reason, ceased to be satisfied with mythology, and, analyzing facts, they began to come to the conclusion—elementary and partial at first—that the cause of the failures lay in the shortage of ammunition and supplies. New blows, another effort of thought, and the causes of events open up deeper, and consciousness becomes clarified. And so, slowly, gropingly, there came at last the inevitable conclusion: the entire system is at fault. I purposely take this instance, momentous and clear to all, the instance of the evolution of the masses' conception of the causes of our failures—an evolution from primitive fetichism to the modern working hypothesis.

But we know very well that, besides the naive masses who sincerely saw the "Jew" where they later learned to discern the system, besides those few who did not lose their power of reasoning and fought the calumny from the very beginning—risking, in their turn, accusations about German money—there were also those others of whom Christ said: "Verily I say unto you, it were better for them to fasten a stone to their necks and cast themselves into the sea." There were persons who knew the whole truth of the matter, high priests who smiled to one another and turned the delusions of the common herd to their own interest. They fed the legend with new "facts," pretending to give them credence. They sailed with the tide, they played upon the instincts of the stupefied and exasperated masses—they were practicing demagogy.

Then came the high cost of living, that symptom of the developing process of disruption of the country's economic structure, and again the "pirate," the shopkeeper, the speculator were pushed to the front. A wave of pogroms swept the country before the mind of the average man learned to discern here, too, the system, not the person. The Liberals did not have the civic courage to oppose their authority, their convictions, and dignity, to the hateful demagogy. They could not do it, not alone because they were preserving the "bloc"—no, they could not do it, because some in their own ranks had the same psychology of fetichism, the same myth-making; they did not wish to lose their authority, to go against the tide; they were afraid to measure forces with the conscienceless demagogues.

How regrettable it is that the cultural temper of very many could not hold out against the ordeal by fire and sword and, after some resistance, were carried away by the elemental current of war psychology, terrible at times in its nudity and primitiveness. And how much courage one needed, how much political training and sense of responsibility, not to yield to weakness and adopt the policy of non-resistance to outbursts of "patriotic moods." It was still more difficult for some to withstand the desire to utilize the people's state of mind; oftentimes it is so easy to escape the consequences of one's own deeds by the timely offering of fitting scapegoats to the disaffected people angered by defeat, to set the perplexed soldier against the alien, the hungry against the first merchant, to find a "German" among old comrades.

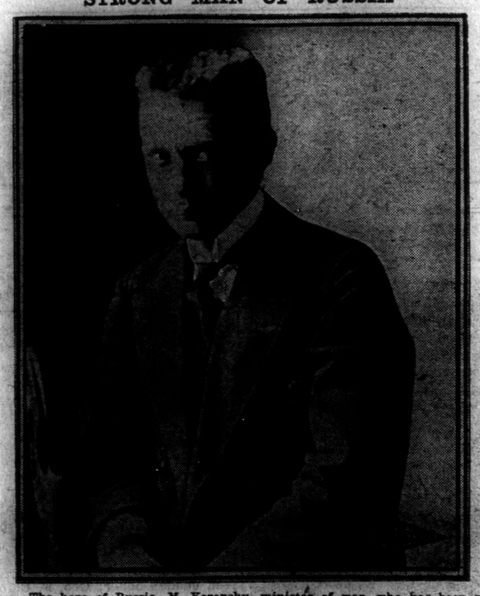
And this demagogic game of cat and mouse is spreading more and more; the political promoters begin to resort to this method in their utterances, feeding and supporting with their authority the most absurd tales. Nobody, it is true, was surprised when, in November, at the time of the acute conflict between the old regime and the country, Purishkevich (he shared with Markoe the leadership of the reactionary right) made a most demagogic speech in the imperial duma, full of hints at treason by anybody and everybody, which in reality was adroitly intended to divert the people's wrath into channels harmless to the powers that be. (This speech, by the way, was from beginning to end refuted, so far as the facts go, by the persons cast under suspicion.) Such utterances of the Right "promoters," who changed only the object of their attacks, not the method, are matters of course, but one is filled with surprice and resentment on behalf of Russian public opinion when such vile demagogy meets with sympathy and support from the leading Liberal circles.

One is still more perplexed when the utterances and writings of some of the most prominent Liberal leaders begin to carry the same flavor of demagogic opportunism, when they strive to substitute dark hints, calculated to excite the people, for documents and serious proof. Is this an unconscious result of the dark and grave experiences of war time, or the influence of the corrupting example, of the convenience of the demagogic method for taking advantage of the common people? Really, it is so simple! Just substitute "German" for "Jewish" brutality, declare all who think otherwise to be "Germanophiles," and, when possible, hint cautiously at treason—that is the rather simple recipe. The recipe is very old. The "Siglists" of the eighties were hounded in the same way; in 1905 Japanese money appeared, etc. But then the effort to explain the labor movement by means of Japanese money called forth general resentment, whereas now—well, times were revolutionary then, but now it is patriotism!

This passion for mythmaking in politics is constantly gaining ground. The old conceptions of the forbidden and the permitted in journalism disappear, and those whose duty it is to direct their powers of understanding toward aiding the people, so that the latter also may understand events and get at their real import, themselves become dominated by fear of the mob and introduce new temptations and chaos into public consciousness. That is why I stopped at Mr. Isgoyev's article. It is so typical, nowadays, in this time of beclouded minds and political fortune telling * * *

Well, God be with him—with this Mr. Isgoyev. He does not matter. But now, perhaps, my long preface about demagogy is clear. I think that if Russian society were not passing through this grave disease such "literature" would not appear in the columns of the Russkaya Mysl, admittedly a magazine with old social traditions. The sense of proportion became atrophied; the boundaries between the permitted and the forbidden were wiped out; all that was wanted was that the enemies within and without should "get it good and hard" from the Left and from the Right.

Is it not time, gentlemen, to stop and think over what is going on around us? Is it not time to give up this demagogical confusion thrice confounded? Is it not time to leave these provocations, treasons, dark forces, and so on—which are, after all, naive—and come back to a serious analysis and explanation of events? Really, the time has arrived to put an end to this psychosis and look about us more attentively! to understand, at last, the true cause of the phenomena which shake the foundations of the country with ever-increasing frequency! Is it really worthy of a nation's reason to strive stubbornly to reduce the world tragedy to a tragi-comical farce that is played somewhere in the reception rooms of stately mansions, in departmental secret offices, and in the backyards of Russian society? Do not all these "provocations" and "conspiracies" and "treasons," etc., remind you, after all, of the philosophy of the Moscow beggarwoman, who reduced all of politics, domestic and foreign, to "anti-christ" and England, plotting perpetually against Mother Russia? It is time to leave the stuffy atmosphere of grandmothers' tales and get out into the fresh air of human thought. Really, one feels hurt and ashamed at this lingering period of beclouded reason that has seized the greater part of thinking Russian society.



Alexander Feodorovich Kerensky, minister of war under the provisional government in Russia, is the one man upon whom hangs the fate of the new democracy. He is 36 years old, a lawyer, a student of economics and philosophy, an orator, and an executive possessed of a tremendous driving force of nervous energy and capacity for swift and shrewd judgment. He has that fine balance between radicalism and conservatism, that sincerity and honesty that make him the outstanding figure of the revolution and the hope of the soldier-deputies, the bourgeoise, and the financiers, who look to him for the establishment of a government in Russia which will be no more an aristocracy of soldiers, workmen, or bourgeoise than of aristocrats. He has an internal malady, said to be tuberculosis of the liver, and his general constitution is so weak that after working frantically for three weeks at a time in Petrograd he rushes to a sanitarium in Crimea for three or four days. These recent pictures of him show his right arm to be injured. No word has been received from Russia indicating how the injury was sustained. He is a man of middle height with closely cropped brown hair, flashing brown eyes, which have the strained, wary look of a man taught by bitter experience to analyze the motives of those he meets. His smile, broad, generous and engaging, entirely changes his features, which habitually maintain a meditative, severe, almost sullen look. As an indication of his personal force, he himself led the first attack in the new Russian offensive which killed the German hopes of a separate peace and which threaten Austro-German territory in Poland and Galicia. Before the attack he told the soldiers that if they did not go forward he himself would go alone against the Germans. The effect was a terrific charge which renewed enthusiasm for the war all along the whole line.

American Red Cross Mission To Russia

A DISTINGUISHED party of physicians, surgeons, bacteriologists, professors of food chemistry, sanitation experts and dentists, making up the first unit of the United States Red Cross mission to Russia, numbering twenty-nine in all, left Vancouver the other day on the "Empress of Asia," en route to the eastern front.

Lieut.-Col. Frank Billings, professor of medicine in the University of Chicago, is in charge of the party and is taking to Russia over $100,000 worth of medical supplies, surgical instruments, dressings, water sterilizers and other necessary articles, including vaccine for the prevention of typhoid, smallpox, cholera, diphtheria, bubonic plague, meningitis and other diseases. A heavy task lies before them in Russia, and they are going abundantly prepared to go immediately to work.

The mission is being sent out by the United States Government, and the United States Red Cross Society will see that they are kept fully supplied in order to meet all demands for alleviating the suffering among the Russian soldiers and people. The move has been gratefully welcomed by the present Russian Government as an expression of the friendship of the people of the United States for Russia.

During the past month the United States Red Cross has raised over $125,000, and, while the work has been already begun in France, Italy, Serbia and Belgium, the present is but the first of similar units to be sent to Russia. The present party will investigate and report on Russia's needs and upon this report the United States Red Cross headquarters will decide the equipment and numbers of subsequent units. Steps are now being taken to get together complete equipment, even to motor ambulances.

Col. Billings and the other members of the mission are a sturdy and affable lot of men and are fitted out in uniforms very similar to those worn by the British. The colonel is exceedingly proud of his organization and the promptitude with which it was effected.

"Every man who was approached to go on this mission, Winslow of Yale and Whipple of Harvard, and all the others, at once offered their services," said Col. Billings. "They dropped their work right there and got ready in four days, leaving their families behind them, to undertake this work, which is going to be of such tremendous importance to the Russian nation and to the military in particular.

"These men are leaders in their professions and are the heads of the largest universities in the United States, but they did not hesitate a moment when the call reached them."

Several of the party have already seen active service in the present war. Major M. Grow spent twenty months on the Russian Mazurian front, and he has received the Military Order of Saint George for services in the Russian campaign, as well as being honored in other ways. Major (Dr.) H. McCarthy has been in France making a survey of the prison camps in that country before the break between Germany and the United States; while Colonel Billings has been in Russia several times.

Some of the members of the party took occasion to obtain several motion pictures of various points of interest, and, as they have already a large supply of film, they will be able to produce before the Russian people graphic pictures of interesting events and things on this continent.

Mr. G. M. Bosworth, Vice-President of the C. P. R., has received a letter of appreciation for the very many courtesies the delegation received en route to the Pacific Coast. It was sent at the instigation of Lt.-Col. Billings. The names of the mission are as follows:

Lieut.-Col. Frank Billings (chairman), professor medicine in the University of Chicago; Lieut.-Col. W. B. Thompson, director of the Federal Reserve Bank, New York; Major B. Thacher, lawyer, New York; Capt. J. W. Andrews, auditor, St. Louis, Mo.; Major W. S. Thayer, professor clinical medicine, John Hopkins University, Baltimore; Major D. J. McCarthy, fellow of Phipps Institute, Philadelphia; Major H. C. Sherman, professor of food chemistry, Columbia University; Major H. H. Swift, of the Swift Company; Major G. C. Whipple, professor sanitary engineering, Harvard University; Major C. E. A. Winslow, professor bacteriology and hygiene, Yale Medical College; Major W. Post, assistant professor of medicine, Rush College, Chicago; Major Robins, Chicago; H. J. Horn, transportation expert, Brookline; Major S. Wightman, professor clinical medicine, New York Polyclinic Hospital; Capt. H. Brown, publicity; Capt. R. L. Barr, vice-president Chase Securities Company, New York; Capt. W. Cochran, Capt. A. Wardell, lawyer of New York; Capt. Grow, of the Medical Officers' Reserve Corps, Washington; Capt. Pirnie, civil engineer, New York; Lieut. C. Kelleher, attache; Lieut. H. B. Redfield, law secretary of Brooklyn, attache; Lieut. W. C. Nicholson, of the Swift Company, Chicago, and Lieuts. H. D. Hardy, H. M. Wyckoff and N. C. Travis.

How to Distinguish Ranks and Ratings In the U. S. Navy

Here is a description of the various devices and insignia by which the rank and rating and also the branches of the service may be distinguished for men in the navy. In the case of commissioned officers reference will always be to the collar, as that is the marking most likely to be noticed by the man in the street.

Admiral of the Navy—Four silver stars of five rays each, the two end stars surcharged upon gold foul anchors, the crowns of the anchors pointing toward each other and one ray of each star pointing upward.

Rear Admiral—Same as for admiral of the navy, omitting the anchor near the front edge of the collar but retaining its star, thus having four stars, the rearmost one surcharged on a gold anchor.

Vice Admiral—Same as for admiral, but only three stars and substituting a silver foul anchor without a star for the gold anchor surcharged with a star.

Commodore—Same as for read admiral, but with only one star.

Captain—A silver spread eagle and a silver foul anchor in the rear of the eagle.

Commander—A silver oak leaf and a silver foul anchor in the rear of the leaf.

Lieutenant Commander—A gold oak leaf and a silver foul anchor in the rear of the leaf.

Lieutenant—Two silver bars and a silver foul anchor in the rear of the bars, all bars at right angles to upper edge of collar.

Ensign—A silver foul anchor.

Chief Boatswain—Two foul anchors crossed, embroidered in silver, surcharged at point of crossing with a gold five-pointed star.

Chief Gunner—A flaming spherical shell embroidered in silver, flame horizontal and pointing to the rear, surcharged at the center of the shell with a gold five-pointed star.

Chief Machinist—A three-bladed propeller embroidered in silver, surcharged at the center with a gold five-pointed star.

Boatswain, gunner and machinist wear corresponding insignia, but the devices are embroidered in gold and the surcharged stars in silver.

Chief Carpenter and Carpenter—A carpenter's square, point down, embroidered in gold and silver, respectively.

Midshipmen—A gold anchor, shank vertical.

Medical Officers—A silver acorn leaf embroidered upon a gold spread oak leaf with the stem outward.

Pay Officers—A silver oak sprig of three leaves and three acorns inscribed in a rectangle.

Naval Constructors—A gold sprig of two live oak leaves and an acorn.

Civil Engineers—Two crossed silver sprigs, each of two live oak leaves and an acorn.

Medical Reserve Officers—A gold acorn leaf embroidered upon a silver spread oak leaf.

Torpedoman—A torpedo.

Musicians—A lyre.

Bugler—A bugler.

Shipwright—Two axes crossed.

Ship's Cooks and Bakers and Officers' Stewards and Cooks—A silver crescent on a dark background.

Hospital Apprentice—A Geneva cross of red cloth.

The rating badge consists of a spread eagle above a specialty mark and a class chevron. The chevrons shall be made of strips of cloth sewed flat, without padding.

Maple Creek Royally Entertained Irrigationists

President Appeals for Greater Production---Experts Talk On Agricultural Subjects ---Progress Made In Farming Industry.

(By R. J. C. STEAD)

Maple Creek, Sask., once famous as a ranching centre, and still retaining much of the atmosphere of the good old days before the barbed wire era, has just been entertaining the Western Canada Irrigation association at its eleventh annual convention. This, by the way, is the first time the convention has been held in Saskatchewan, and it was particularly appropriate that Maple Creek should have been selected as the point of meeting and that the Hon. W. R. Motherwell, minister of agriculture for the province of Saskatchewan, should have presided over the deliberations. Maple Creek is the centre of Saskatchewan's irrigation enterprises, which are on a much larger scale than most people, even residents of that province, appreciate. A large number of streams flow down from the Cypress hills, and back in the '90s the ranchers began diverting the water from these streams for hay and pasture purposes. It is recorded that the first ditches at Maple Creek were dug in 1896, although the first irrigation license was not issued until 1900. About the same time irrigation began to be employed at Bear Creek and Piapot Creek. From these beginnings an irrigation district with 190 schemes has been developed. The irrigation is employed mainly for pasture and for growing crops of hay and other fodder. Irrigation and dry farming are practiced side by side and the crop marketed at Maple Creek in 1916 has a valuation of $2,500,000.

PROF. W. H. FAIRFIELD

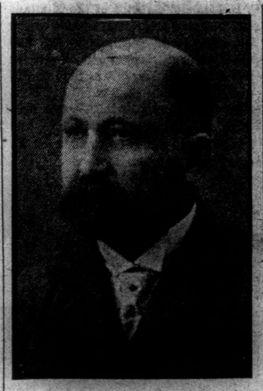
No Lack of Attractions.

Although Maple Creek cannot offer the mountain scenery and bathing facilities which are among the attractions of the British Columbia towns which have entertained the association in the past, there was no lack of hospitality and amusement for the visitors, whose time was fully occupied. The committee in charge decided that the town would do well to "bunch its hits" for the first week in August, and as the result a variety of entertainments was provided which perhaps would not have been duplicated at any other western centre. In addition to the Irrigation association the summer agricultural fair was held. There was a two days' stampede, in which many of the best riders of the west competed; a Chautauqua organization held its meetings in the big tent, and a baseball tournament was run off. The town was full to overflowing, but as the citizens had generously opened their houses and as the accommodation arrangements were in the hands of a competent billeting committee, no inconvenience was experienced on the score of accommodation.

President Appeals for Production.

Hon. W. R. Motherwell, minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan, and president of the association, although in ill health, attended and presided over the first two days of the convention. Although not an irrigator himself, Mr. Motherwell has had many years' experience as a dry farmer, and he remarked that he had discovered that the profession of the irrigator and dry farmer were the same, namely, providing moisture for the crops. Instead of being two distinct professions, they were but two branches of the same profession. Indeed, Mr. Motherwell expressed the opinion that the ideal farm was a farm partly irrigated and partly non-irrigated. On the irrigated section he would raise his pasture crops, hay, clover, alfalfa, root crops, small fruits, trees and gardens, and on the non-irrigated section with dry farming methods he would raise his grain crops. As it happens, this is actually the condition that is found throughout a large part of the irrigated areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta.



Mr. Motherwell impressed upon the convention the fact that there was no prospect of low prices for farm products for many years to come. The world's surplus supplies of food have been exhausted, and even when peace is arrived at it will require some years to restore them. He urged the farmers to take advantage of the early harvest this year to get an unusual amount of fall plowing done. The time had been when western Canadian farmers were urged to increase their efforts in order that the prosperity of the country might be maintained, but that was not the incentive. The need of greater agriculture production now strikes deeper than any question of personal profits. It is a matter of raising food for the allied nations to eat. It is a matter of saving the world from threatened starvation. The farmers of western Canada must take a great part in this work, and they must combine every method available, whether by irrigation or by dry farming, or by a combination of these methods, to produce every possible pound of food products for the coming season.

Foreshadows New Legislation

The matter of new legislation which would enable districts in Saskatchewan to undertake irrigation enterprises on the same basis as they are now able to do in Alberta came up for discussion, and Mr. Motherwell assured the convention that any need for new legislation would be sympathecically considered by the government, and new legislation would be introduced as soon as it was found necessary. It was indicated that the legislation to create irrigation districts would probably be along the same lines as the present legislation existing in Saskatchewan for drainage purposes, by which the community desiring drainage may organize itself for that purpose and incur liabilities chargeable to the lands affected. Irrigation enterprises will be carried out in the same manner.

Experts Discuss Agriculture.

The program included the names of the best known agricultural experts in the west, such as Prof. J. Bracken, of the field husbandry department, University of Saskatchewan; Don. H. Bark, chief of irrigation investigation division of the Canadian Pacific railway; Prof. W. H. Farfield, superintendent Dominion experimental station, Lethbridge; F. H. Aulg, deputy minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan; F. M. Logan, assistant dairy commissioner, Regina; James Johnson of Nelson, B.C.; Prof. L. S. Klinck, dean of the faculty of agriculture of the University of British Columbia; G. R. Marnoch, president of the Lethbridge board of trade; A. S. Dawson, chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific railway department of natural resources; Archibald Mitchell of the Mitchell Nursery company; A. A. Dowell, animal husbandry instructor of the University of Alberta; F. B. Linfield, director Montana agricultural experiment station at Bozeman, Mont., and others. The first three named—Messrs. Bracken, Bark and Fairfield—devoted themselves entirely to a discussion of alfalfa raising, Mr. Bracken dealing with alfalfa under dry land conditions, and Messrs. Bark and Fairfield discussing it under irrigation conditions. Alfalfa is essentially an irrigated crop, which is best illustrated by Prof. Fairfield's remark that the Lethbridge irrigation district is now the principal alfalfa centre of Canada, with about 15,000 acres devoted to this crop. It was grown originally for export, but has become the basis of an important live stock and dairy industry.

HON. W. R. MOTHERWELL

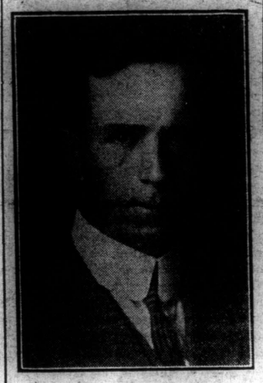
Fish an Irrigation Product.

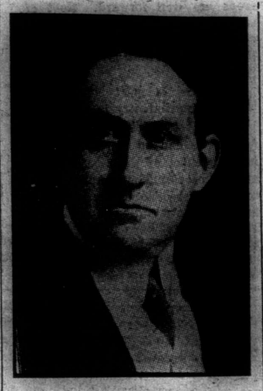
The feasibility of increasing the fish supply of the country by employing irrigation reservoirs for that purpose was discussed in a very interesting paper by Prof. E. E. Prince, Dominion fisheries commissioner, of Ottawa. Prof. Prince pointed out that the conditions existing in irrigation reservoirs, and even in irrigation canals, were particularly favorable to the production of great quantities of fish. He discussed the various kinds of fish most suitable for this purpose, and seemed to favor the yellow perch as the most desirable species. Arguments in favor of encouraging fish production throughout the irrigation districts are self evident. Not only would the fish become a valuable and inexpensive item of food on the farmer's table, but the sport incidental to the industry would add to the attractiveness of farm life. Prof. Prince assured the convention of the most sympathetic co-operation from the fisheries department along any lines found to be practicable.



Progress of Dairy Industry.

F. M. Logan, of the Saskatchewan dairy department, led an interesting discussion of co-operative creamery work in that province. The dairy industry is a particularly appropriate one for discussion at irrigation conventions, as irrigation and dairying are closely linked together. Contrary to the general opinion, the purpose of irrigation is not, mainly, to raise fruit and vegetables, but to raise fodder crops. Returns of the United States department of agriculture show that of the total irrigated area in the United States less than 5 per cent. is devoted to the production of fruit and less than 5 per cent. of the production of vegetables, including potatoes, but more than 50 per cent. is devoted to the production of fodder crops, among which alfalfa stands first with an acreage of more than 30 per cent. of the total irrigated crops in the United States. As alfalfa is a great milk producing crop, the relation of irrigation to the dairy industry is evident.

Mr. Logan outlinedthe development of dairying in Saskatchewan from the time when the product was insufficient for local demands and when it commanded no special recognition on foreign markets to the present day when butter from Saskatchewan brings a premium on eastern markets and is regarded at the coast quite as favorably as butter from New Zealand, which was formerly considered unequalled by any Canadian product. The work along this line is only in its infancy, and the prairie provinces, with their abundant cheap fodder their cool nights and freedom from disease, and the dairy work which is being carried on by the various governments are designed to fill a big place in the butter supply of the world.



Inter-Provincial Co-operation.

Why do not the people of the prairies buy more fruit from British Columbia, and why do not the people of British Columbia buy more products from the prairies? That is the question propounded by James Johnson of acting secretary of the Western Canada irrigation association.

ROBERT J. C. STEAD

Nelson, B.C., to which no satisfactory answer has yet been given. Mr. Johnson was well qualified to speak for the fruit growers of that province, having distinguished himself and British Columbia by capturing the gold medal at the San Francisco exposition of 1915 for the finest cherries exhibited there, and he has also had a lengthy experience not only in the production of fruit but in the preparation of its for the outside market. He expressed the opinion that there was a great need for more co-operation between the countries east and west of the Rocky mountains in the exchange of their products. He emphasized the fact that the war had shown the necessity of a nation being able to stand upon its own resources. By supplying our own requirements we are able to retain in the country money which would otherwise go into foreign markets. He made a special plea for consideration by the consumers and producers in western Canada of the needs of the neighboring provinces when entering the market for the purchase of supplies.

F. M. LOGAN
Assistant Dairy Commissioner of the province of Saskatchewan, who addressed the convention on co-operative creamery work in Saskatchewan.

Reservoirs in Cypress Hills.

One of the serious problems which confront the irrigators of the Cypress Hills district is found in the fact that although there is a heavy spring flow of water in the streams coming out of the hills, this flow has largely disappeared by the time it is required for irrigation purposes. The only means of meeting this situation is found in the creation of reservoirs which will hold the surplus water back until such time as it may be required. F. H. Peters, commissioner or irrigation of the department of the interior, delivered an interesting paper on this subject. His department has already made exhaustive surveys of the Cypress Hills watershed, and he was able to present to the convention estimates of the cost of reservoirs that would materially increase the supply of water available in the Cypress Hills district. It was not proposed that this work should be proceeded with immediately, as there was a general recognition on the part of the convention that many necessary developments must wait until after the war, but the surveys which have been made and the estimate which have been presented will doubtless constitute the basis of extensive irrigation enterprises within the next few years.

Linked closely with Mr. Peter's discussion of reservoirs was an address by E. H. Finlayson, district inspector of forest reservoirs, on the Cypress Hills Forest Reserve. The relationship of forests to water supply is

Alberta's Big Wool Clip For Year 1917

150,000 Pounds Wool Sold In Calgary On Wednesday---645,000 Pounds To Be Sold In Toronto.

Alberta is just beginning to realize that she can be a great sheep-raising country. There are no setbacks to this industry as can be proven by the success attained by those engaged in the business. The returns are very much greater this year than any other before. As the shearing has been completed (August 1), Jas. A. Hill, Dominion representative, can give almost correct figures as to the amount of wool clipped in southern Alberta. He states that approximately 1,100,000 pounds of wool was sheared in the southern part of the province, of which amount 645,000 pounds is to be shipped to the Toronto Dominion warehouse, to be sold under government supervision, on August 23. The westerners appreciate the action of the government in establishing a warehouse close to the big markets.

Raymond Knight, of Raymond, is the biggest single shipper, who sent to Toronto, as his amount is 110,000 pounds. R. C. Harvey, of Chin Coulee, was the second biggest shipper, his layout being 101,000 pounds.

There were 90,000 fleeces shorn from the wool-bearers and the average per fleece was slightly over seven pounds. This is about a pound heavier than last year's average, due to better feeding and a better season generally.

Sheep shearers were rather scarce this year, which aused some delay, however many shearers were brought from the states. The price paid was from 12 to 14 cents per head, a very excellent price when one takes into consideration the fact that experienced men can shear 150 sheep per day. Some made as high as $18 a day. Machines were used in some localities with some success. Though with this device some wool is lost the compensation from labor saved is sufficient to make up for the depreciation.

Many of the growers are selling co-operatively this year, although some did last. In the south selling this way has doubled. At Lacombe last year there were 30,000 pounds sold through the association and this year there were 40,000 pounds. At Edmonton 30,00 pounds was sold last year and 60,000 pounds this, while at Pincher Creek 25,000 pounds was sold last year and 55,00 pounds this year.

According to Mr. Hill's report 50,000 Alberta sheep are grazing in the B. C. forest reserve, doing excellently.

At Calgary, Wednesday, August 8, over 150,000 pounds of wool was sold. The average price was about 60 cents making a total of over $90,000 worth of wool for this district. The bids were not numerous but were high, as some of the best clip brought as high as 64 cents while the lowest grade brought 20 cents. In other parts of the province the bid had reached 59 cents so Calgary has something to boast about especially when it comes to counting out the money.

The annual sale, Wednesday, was consummated by the Alberta Sheep Breeders' association, Ernest Milne, Dominion government grader, graded 151,121 pounds, while 10,000 pounds was sold ungraded.

The lot sold in Calgary is divided into the following grades:

Medium combing 186 bags; three-eighths blood (fine medium), 125 bags; low quarter, 38 bags; fine and half-blood staple, 62 bags; fine and of Nelson, B.C., who made a special plea for greater inter-provincial trade.

JAS. JOHNSTONE,

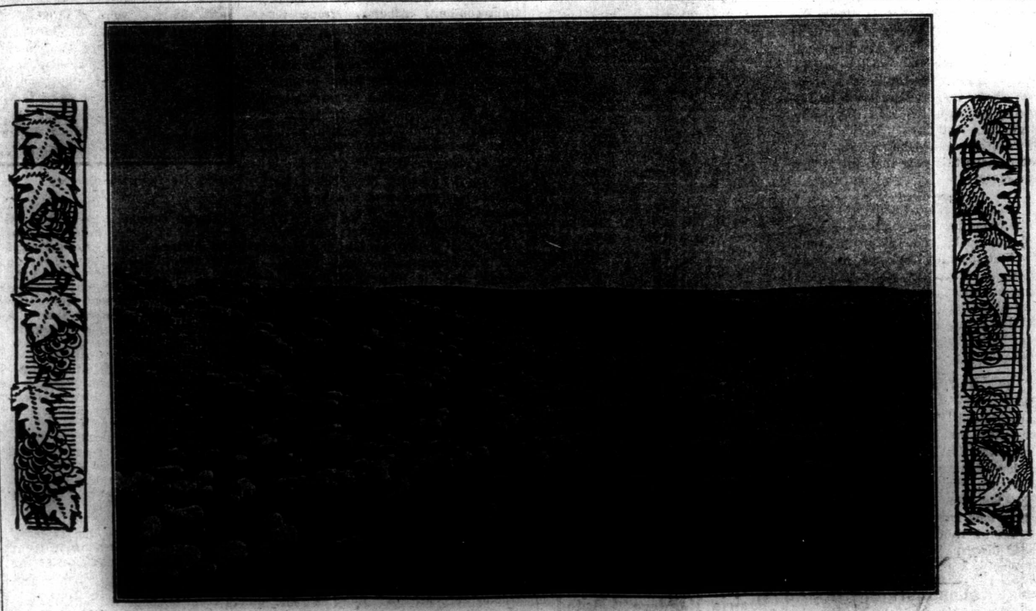
medium clothing, 80 bags; tags and rejects. The clip, as a whole, is estimated to shrink 53 per cent. The largest demand, at present, is for three-eighths blood staple wools, which are being absorbed into the army and navy contracts for Uncle Sam's troops.

This clip represents only a portion of the total clip of the province, there being abou 800,000 pounds in the Lethbridge district which is to be consigned to the government warehouse in Toronto and sold direct to manufacturers. The Edmonton sale disposed of another 60,000 pounds, the Vermilion sale of 37000 pounds, the Lacombe sale of 44,000 pounds, and the Pincher Creek sale of 62,000 pounds.



The Lacombe wool brought an average of 59½c per pound, the Pincher Creek wool an average of 57.83c and the Vermilion wool 37½c. The total of these figures is over and above those clips sold privately. The highest price yet paid in Alberta is 60c, though it is reported that one buyer gave 62c for a few pounds of very choice fine medium wool. P. V. Lewis, who is buying for J. Koshland & Co., of Boston, was the largest purchaser of wool in the west this year, having shipped close to a million and a half pounds out of Canada.

PEACE RIVER, A CENTER OF ATTRACTION

The crops in the Peace River country are looking fine. A bumper crop is expected, according to what Ralph Harris, writer and traveler of that country, says. The recent rains have straightened things up considerably even in that northern clime, which seems to be the center of attraction.

Sheridan Lawrence, who went there 30 years ago, has 300 acres of wonderful crop this year. He shipped 40,000 bushels of wheat to Winnipeg last year and got the nice sum of $1.85 per bushel. It is estimated that there is 150,000 acres of crops in fine conditon; at least 50 per cent. of the crop is safe from frost.

Settlers are just beginning to realize that the Peace River country is rich; at least the wealth lies on those fertile plains, ready to be gathered when the time arrives, or people arrive. Over 3,500 land seekers have entered that north country during the last season, of which number 75 per cent. have located permanently there. Farmers go in for mixed farming; one established creamery is working overtime to keep the supply going.

There are 75 organized school districts, two hospitals and numerous churches in that north country and excellent opportunities for more progress. Homesteads are yet available, but won't be after a short while, as the center of attraction will soon be crowded, at the present rate.

CROPS TO BE FAIR

The reports according to the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator company about crops are quite favorable, although the average yield will be less than last year, however, when we consider the average price of wheat for previous years, we find that this year's price will make up for the loss in yield. The average price of wheat for 1916 was 30c, for 1915, 27.77c and for 1914, 19c. This year's prices have been over $2, practically all year round.

Milk River—Very light showers last week; harvesting is general and threshing will start August 20. It is estimated that there will be a yield of from 10 to 15 bushels.

Camrose—Fine rain helps crops considerably.

Holden—Rains last week help the crops; grain filling better; average yield expected.

Burdett—Weather dry and cool; yield to be about 15 to 18 bushels. Cutting will be general in few days.

Lomond—No rain for three weeks; spring plowing and stubble crops look bad, but summerfallow is all right; yield may be 35 bushels.

Aldersyde—Showers last week and this; crops doing fine; yield will be a little worse than last year. Barley is being cut.

Fort Saskatchewan—Splendid rain, crops fine.

Wainwright—Rains this week, conditions favorable.

NO CROP FAILURE IN THE CALGARY DISTRICT

Standard Representative Makes Flying Trip Through the Outlying Districts and Finds Indications Good

Much has been written, and more said about the danger of a crop failure, or at least a serious shortage, throughout Alberta, owing to the dry season. Bpt on taking a motor trip through the country previous to the recent rain we were surprised at the good crops growing in most districts. Starting from Calgary and travelling north to Didsbury we passed through some fine mixed farming districts, and noted that the stock were in fine fettle. Haying is in full swing all through these parts, and the yield is good. In many places the farmers were busy baling the wild hay in the fields, and saving the labor of stacking. Some crops of oats were heading out, and although short in the straw gave promise of a heavy yield of grain, later fields were not yet heading, but gave promise of coming on all right. The fields of wheat, barley and rye were all good, the barley exceptionally so. We would not hesitate to estimate the average yield of all grains, for this stretch of the country, at eighteen bushels per acre, and having re-crossed the same country since the rains, we would add another five bushels per acre to our original estimate. The root crops were in an optimistic mood, and declared that they were satisfied, saying that wherever the fields were put in properly the crops were as good as average years.

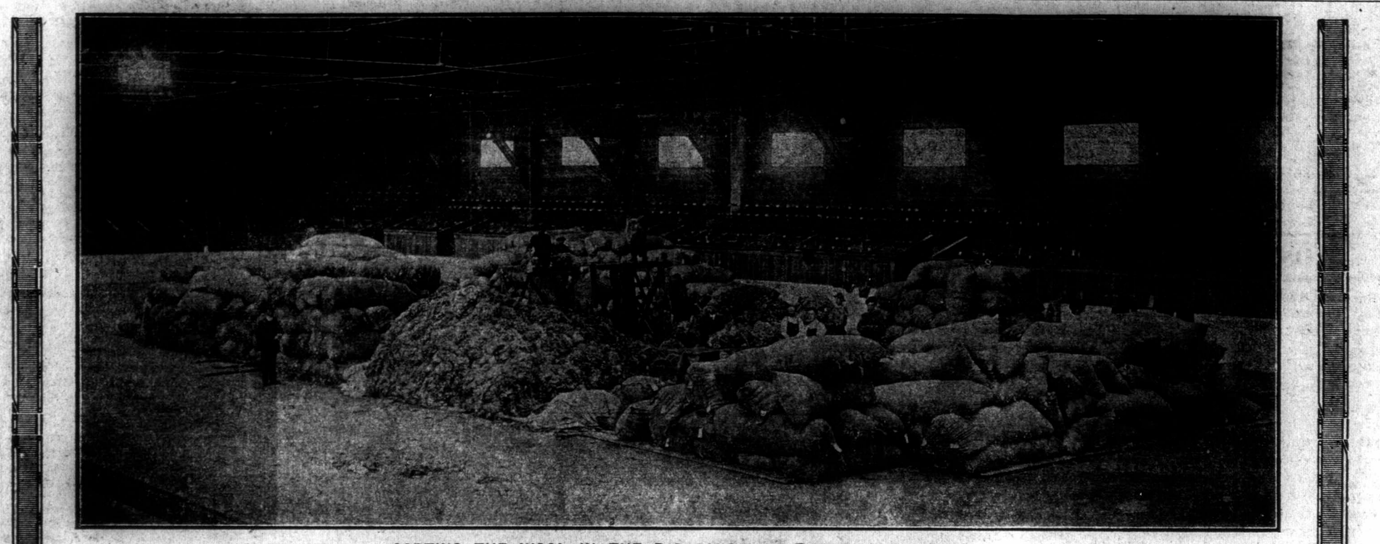
From Didsbury on to Edmonton, and for a good distance east of the C. & E. line, the country is in better shape than it is further south, owing to the earlier rains. In fact we never saw the country in better shape since we have been acquainted with it. Pasture is plentiful, the stock are in good condition, and we believe the yield of timothy hay will be as great or greater than ever before. From the C. & E. line west to the mountains the countrty has stood the dry spell better than further out on the prairie, though around Cochrane the crops were short, and further west in the grazing country, the rain was badly needed.

Taken all round the country is in better shape this year than in the dry year of 1914.

CLARESHOLM DISTRICT

The crops here have stood the long, dry, hot spell remarkably well, and now that the rain has come, are coming right away. In many instances farmers expect their wheat yield to quite equal last year's, and nowhere, with the exception of those who have been hailed, will there be anything approaching a failure.

HIGH RIVER DISTRICT



Despite the long dry spell, crops here are good. Those put in on summer fallow are bidding fair to equal, if not excel last year. And all fields that have been well put in are in good shape. In most places the straw is short, but the heads are good and farmers look forward to a heavy yield. The recent rain was just what was needed for the root crops, the potatoes and turnips are now filling out nicely.

OLDS DISTRICT

Crop conditions here are good. Most farmers anticipating heavier yields than last year. Barley cutting will soon begin, while wheat and oat crops are well forward. Root crops are better than usual, and there has never been more hay in the district than the crop that is being cut this year.

Stock are in good condition, and the dairying industry is flourishing.

Motoring from Battleford to Prince Albert, we had an opportunity of seeing the effect of the recent dry spell on the crops. The country has certainly suffered to a considerable extent, but the situation is not hopeless. The crops have been retarded, but not ruined. And there is still a prospect of a fifteen bushel average. Wherever the land was well worked and the seed got in early the grain has stood the test well, and will repay the trouble taken. The stock are in good condition, and there is no shortage of pasture.

SORTING THE WOOL IN THE BIG CALGARY INDUSTRIAL BUILDING
Many men were employed by the inspectors in the sorting and grading of the wool, the aggregate amount running over a million pounds.

Crop Acreage In Canada For 1917

The following table, compiled from a bulletin issued by the Census and Statistics Office last week, shows the acreage seeded to crops in Canada this year, as compared with the acreage harvested in 1916:

	1917 Acreage Seeded	1916 Acreage Harvested
Wheat	13,549,650	12,900,590
Oats	11,806,000	9,875,346
Barley	1,819,900	1,681,108
Rye	153,900	147,170
Peas	151,830	150,280
Mixed Grains	409,140	397,770
Buckwheat	336,400	341,500
Flax	695,750	605,700
Corn (Husking)	173,600	173,000
Beans	43,000	32,500
Turnips, etc.	152,100	156,200
Sugar Beets	14,000	15,000
Corn (Fodder)	310,465	297,100
Potatoes	502,400	448,800

In some cases the acreage seeded in 1916 was larger than in 1917, but it was not all harvested. In wheat, for example, the acreage seeded in 1916 was 14,897,090, as compared with 13,549,650 acres seeded in 1917, a decrease of 9 per cent., though acreage seeded this year is 5 per cent. greater than the acreage harvested in 1916. Every province shows an increase in area planted to potatoes. The acreage in potatoes in 1917 is larger than in any previous year, being 18,400 acres larger than in the previous record year of 1912.

Splendid reports come in from northwestern Manitoba in regard to the crops in the middle west. Along the main line of the C. P. R. a good yield is expected. Northwestern Manitoba will have bountiful yields.

MAPLE CREEK ROYALLY ENTERTAINS IRRIGATIONISTS

pretty generally understood. Mr. Finlayson brought it home with particular emphasis to the irrigators of the Maple Creek district. For their water supply they are absolutely dependent upon the forest areas in the Cypress Hills, and he appealed to them especially for co-operation in protecting these areas from destruction by fire, which is the greatest enemy not only to the forest reserve, but to the agricultural development of the country. With the various reserves destroyed, not only would the supply or irrigation water be reduced, but climatic conditions would be induced which would be a menace to the agricultural development of the provinces.

Address on Corn.

Prof. Klinck, of the University of British Columbia, delivered a very interesting address upon corn for fodder and ensilage. Prof. Klinck is a recognized authority on the special subject of corn, and while not committing himself particularly to the possibilities of corn production in southern Saskatchewan, he gave much valuable advice on corn selection and cultivation. G. R. Marnoch, president of the Lethbridge board of trade, contributed an interesting address on more and better water for the farmer. Mr. Marnoch was instrumental in having a convention called in June last for the consideration of this subject, and his address dealt largely with that convention and the means relating to this problem which it had brought to light. It has been found that irrigation is a very important factor in solving the problem of the farmers' water supply, not only through the obvious means of ditches and reservoirs, but also because it is now known that the flow of water in the wells in the irrigated districts has increased since irrigation was introduced.

International Irrigation Convention.

A. S. Dawson, chief engineer of the department of natural resources of the Canadian Pacific railway, outlined in a short address the main features of the International Irrigation Congress at El Paso, Texas, last year, which Mr. Dawson attended, in company with S. G. Porter, R. S. Stockton and Robert J. C. Stead, all delegates from southern Alberta. About 400 delegates attended the convention and the Canadian representatives were given places on the program. Canada's importance as an irrigation country was further recognized by re-electing Mr. J. C. Dennis, chief commissioner of colonization and development of the Canadian Pacific railway, to the position of vice-president of the association, and by electing the speaker (Mr. Dawson) a member of the board of control. Mr. Dawson also gave a brief description of the Elephant Butte dam, which was visited by the delegates, and which was built across the Rio Grande river in New Mexico to conserve the flood waters for irrigation purposes.

Archibald Mitchell, of the Mitchell Nursery company disclosed the opinion that considerable success could be obtained in raising fruit on the prairies, and in an interesting address on that subject he indicated the lines that had been most successful and the methods which are met with best results. He paid a rtibute to the work of D. W. Buchanan, of Winnipeg, in producing varieties of fruit suitable for growth on the prairies, as well as the work of Mr. Stephenson, of Nelson, Man., whom he described as the Apple King of the Prairies.

A. A. Dowell, animal husbandry instructor of Alberta, followed Mr. Mitchell with an address on sheep. The rapid increase in prices, both of wool and mutton, has turned the attention of western farmers to the possibilities of sheep raising. Mr. Dowell in his remarks outlined some of the difficulties which the intending sheep raiser must combat, and offered suggestions as to varieties to be selected and the general management of the flock.

One of the most eloquent addresses of the convention was delivered by Dr. F. B. Linfield, director of the Montana Agricultural Experiment station at Bozeman, Mont. Although Dr. Linfield's subject was sweet clover, he took a few minutes of his time to discuss the international situation. Himself a Canadian by birth, it was a matter of particular gratification to him to be able to come to Canada on an occasion of this kind when the two countries were standing side by side for the principal of democracy. Canadians might be disposed to feel that the United States had been over-tardy in shouldering its share of the struggle. In that they would not differ from a large number of people in the United States, who had been anxious that their country should take its place with the champions of liberty very much earlier in the war than it did. He believed Canadians would recognize, however, that the situation existing in the United States had to be treated with extreme patience in order that when the country did strike the full weight of its blow should not be mitigated by dissensions at home. It had required two years or more for the great masses of American people, who had paid no particular attention to European politics, to realize that this was a worthy struggle between great and irreconciliable principles, and not a war carried on between nations, all of whom were seeking personal advantage. This great truth, however, had gradually come home to the mind of the people of the United States. They are putting their hand to the task now with the same spirit of determination that has marked the Allies during the past three years of war. The United States is preparing to carry on a struggle for five years if necessary, and will do so with an efficiency that would have been impossible had it entered the arena earlier in the fight.

Speaking on the subject of sweet clover, Dr. Linfield laid stress upon the fact that it was a crop particularly suitable to the irrigation areas of western Canada, that it was a highly desirable forage crop, and that it restored to the soil the nitrogen necessary for the most successful grain production.

Premier Martin paid the convention the courtesy of making a special trip from Regina to say a few words of welcome to the delegates on the occasion of their first meeting in Saskatchewan. He, unfortunately, found it necessary to return east on the next train and was unable to follow personally the deliberations of the association. Hon. Mr. Motherwell occupied the chair Wednesday and Thursday, when he was called east, and the second vice-president, G. R. Marnoch, presided over the concluding session.

An invitation was received from the Nelson board of trade to make that city the next convention centre, and this invitation was supported by Mayor Annable, of Nelson, who was present for the purpose of pressing it upon the association. As is the practice of the association to meet year about on opposite sides of the Rockies, the invitation was accepted. The date of the 1918 convention will be fixed later by the executive committee.

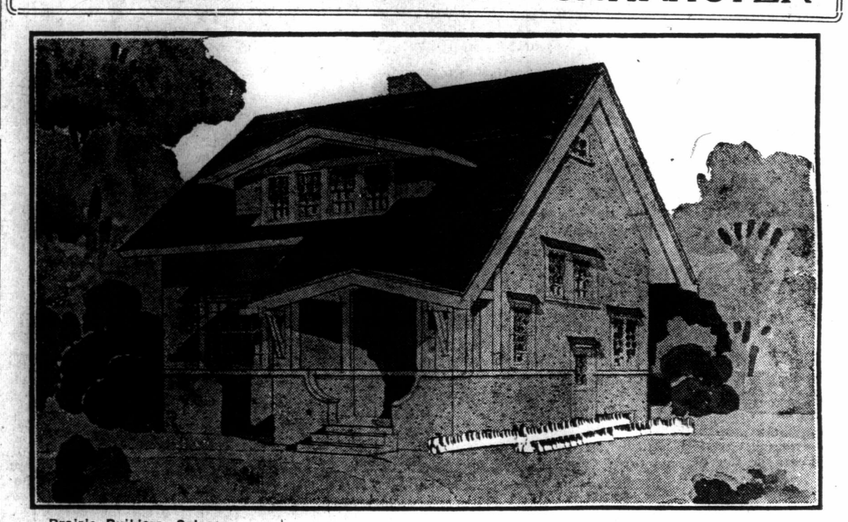
The election of officers resulted as follows:

Hon. president, the Hon. minister of the interior, Dr. Roche, Ottawa; first Hon. vice-president, the Hon. minister of agriculture, Duncan Marshall, Edmonton; second Hon. vice-president, the Hon. minister of agriculture, Mr. Motherwell, Regina; first vice-president, Hon. Hewitt Bostock, Ducks, B.C.; second vice-president, G. R. Marnoch, president of the board of trade, Lethbridge.

Executive committee: R. G. Williamson, Maple Creek, Sask.; Jas. L. Brown, Kamloops, B.C.; Jas. Johnstone, Nelson, B.C.; F. H. Peters, Calgary; A. S. Dawson, Calgary; W. E. Scott, Victoria, B.C.; F. H. Auld, Regina, Sask.; F. E. R. Wollaston, Vernon, B.C.

Robert J. C. Stead of Calgary was elected acting secretary.

Resolutions Adopted.

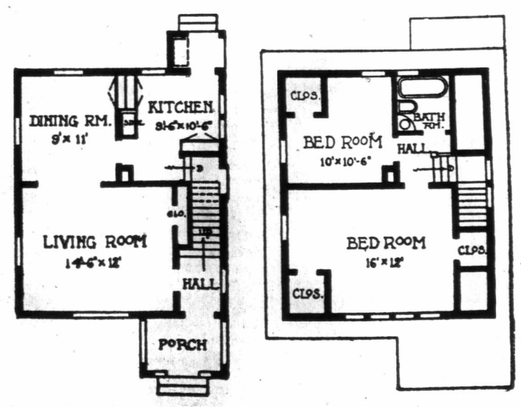


Resolutions adopted by convention at its concluding session included resolutions calling on the government of the empire to accept sole responsibility for settlement and future welfare of empires sailors and soldiers, and pledged the support of the association to that end. Another resolution requested the minister of the interior to investigate what steps are necessary and to inaugurate a definite policy towards reforestation of Cypress Hills forest reserve for the purpose of regulating stream flow in the territory affected.

The convention resolved to urge upon the Dominion government and the government of British Columbia the importance of making necessary appropriations and taking necessary steps to continue without interruption the gauging of streams of water supply. It also indorsed general principles of resolutions passed at recent better-water convention at Lethbridge.

A resolution directed attention of the public health departments of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan to supervision which will prevent pollution of waters in irrigation ditch.

Another resolution indorsed the principle of inter-provincial co-operation between western provinces in consumption of home products and pledges association toward encouragement of such co-operation.



CANADIAN HOMES OF CHARACTER

Prairie Builders, Calgary

HERE is a desirable little cement stucco cottage, size 20 ft. in width by 24 ft. in depth, that can be built complete, exclusive of heating and plumbing, for $1,500 to $1,900. It is frame construction, built in the usual method of good concrete foundation and basement full size. The main stairs carried up from the entrance at the right side with basement stairs and grade entrance underneath. The exterior is attractive in appearance, the outside studding being 14 ft. in height with gable roof and pitched shed over, a wide front dormer lighting the main bedroom in the second story, the roofs are shingled and stained and the exterior walls covered with cement stucco, all the outside trimmings painted white. The entrance porch is liberal in size, the main roof shedding down over the same with small gable over the porch.

The living room at the left of the hall is 14 ft. 6 in. wide and 12 ft. in depth with one wide window in front and good window at the side. At the right of living room in front of the stairs is a convenient coat closet. The dining room is connected with the living room by wide opening and has a china closet at one side and connects through the kitchen on the right hand side. The kitchen is provided with ample cupboards and small rear porch with space for refrigerator. There is one central chimney with large tile flue, providing for heater in the basement if desired. This main floor is finished in pine, stained mission brown and has a birch floor.

The second story has two good chambers, each provided with ample closets, and in the rear over the kitchen is the bathroom. This floor is finished in pine and painted white with birch floor. This cottage is well suited to a narrow city lot and will make a very desirable and economical home for a small family.

MARKET AND FINANCE

WINNIPEG LETTER

Wheat Markets Are Unsettled

(Thompson, Sons & Co.)

Winnipeg, August 7. 1917.

Wheat—The wheat markets have been unsettled during the past week, but the tendency of prices has been upwards. The uncertainty regarding the regulations to be made by the American and Canadian controllers, keeps the grain trade waiting, and prevents plans being made in view of the new grain season. On the other hand, old supplies are now getting into such small compass, that the amount of business that can be done is gradually decreasing. In the southwestern part of the United States winter wheat belt, where harvesting is nearly finished, and considerable threshing has b en done, the movement to market is slow, and on a small scale, as if the farmers are preferring to hold back their grain, in hope of higher prices. A year ago the situation in this respect was entirely different. The winter wheat crop was early and a good crop in yield and quality, besides which, there was still a large part of the liberal crop of 1915 still in farmers' hands, and many farmers wanted to get the balance of their old crop hauled out, before they threshed the new crop, so that marketing was on a large scale. As showing the difference in the movement, between this year and last, the receipts at 11 principal markets in the United States from the beginning of the new crop year—July 1 for winter wheat, and August 1 for spring wheat—to this date, have this year been 8,086,437 bushels, while in the same period last year the quantity was 24,970,144 bushels, more than three times as much as they have been this year. Last year also, the southern farmer had the inducement of a sharply advancing market to sell on, caused by the spreading of the serious rust damage in the spring wheat crops. The small receipts at the present time are also the cause of further decrease in the American and Canadian visible supplies. Last week the United States visible decreased 1,071,000, against an increase of 3,272,000 bushels a year ago, and the total quantity is now down to 5,819,000 bushels against 44,161,000 bushels last year. The record smallest U. S. visible we know of was 5,332,000 bushels on July 26, 1915. The Canadian visible decreased 1,540,731 bushels for the week, against an increase of 1,911,876 bushels last year, and the total is now 10,411,402 bushels against 19,873,732 bushels a year ago. Thus these visible supplies this year amount to only 25 per cent. of what they did a year ago. World's exports for the week were liberal, amounting to 10,661,000 bushels in wheat and flour, against 11,669,000 bushels a year ago. North America leads the exports with 7,704,000 bushels, half a million less than a year ago, but Australia comes well to the front with 1,868,000 bushels, over a million bushels more than a year ago. India and the Argentine are small shippers, less than a million bushels between them. Evidently Australia is being fairly well supplied with vessels now, and she has a big surplus of wheat from which they can draw their cargoes. Harvesting in the United States has reached the spring wheat country, and has even touched southern Manitoba. The first car of new spring wheat arrived in Minneapolis yesterday from northern Iowa, graded No. 1 northern, and was sold at $2.95 per bushel, and delivery of the first new Manitoba wheat is reported from Gretna, Man., today. Tomorrow the United States agricultural department will issue its August crop report. We expect it will show an increase in the estimated yield of winter wheat, because the weather for filling became gradually more favorable as the wheat drew nearer towards maturity, and it has kept so up to the present. Spring wheat on the contrary may show some reduction from last estimate, owing to the extreme heat and lack of rain in July; a total of around 660,000,000 bushels, as the estimated probable yield for winter and spring wheat may be expected. Crops in Europe have not improved recently according to the latest reports we have. In France the yield is disappointing owing to drought damage, and large imports will be needed. In Italy weather is unfavorable for harvesting and labor is scarce; stocks of grain are also light. In the United Kingdom weather is favorable but the wheat crop is under average, other crops, however, are doing well, especially potatoes.

In our Winnipeg market there continues to be an excellent demand for all grades of wheat, the fact is there is not enough coming from the country to supply the demand, and practically all stocks will be cleaned out before the new wheat is ready in any volume worth mentioning. The government agents, millers and shippers are all keen buyers. A little wheat has been cut, but even in early districts with light crops not much will be cut before next week, and will depend on the kind of weather we have. During the past week the weather has been much cooler compared with the extreme heat of the week before, and there have been rain showers in many parts. We consider such weather coming at the present time is favorable for the filling out of the yield, and should seasonable weather continue up to the harvest time, we may have a larger production of wheat than recent estimates have anticipated. There is, however, always the danger that rain in August may so cool the atmosphere that frost will come over night and damage late grain. Fort William and Port Arthur stocks are down to 5,580,058 bushels of wheat against 10,373,164 bushels a year ago, and stocks in elevators west of Winnipeg on August 1 were down to 3,585,000 bushels against 8,232,347 bushels a year ago. Today's prices are: 1 northern $2.40; 2 northern $2.38; 3 northern $2.33; No. 4 wheat $2.24; No. 5 $2.02; No. 6 $1.75; feed $1.66. The October future closed at $2.26.

Oats—The oats market is much easier and prices on cash oats are down 4c to 6c on the week, largely in sympathy with a sharp decline in the United States where the oat crop is very large, and beginning to come on the market. Our western Canadian crop is going to give a small yield in the aggregate, hundreds of thousands of acres being scarcely worth cutting owing to draught and heat damage. Today's prices are: 2 C.W. 73c; 3 C.W. and Ex. 1 feed 72c; 1 feed 68c; 2 feed 66c. Futures closed, October 68⅞c; December 64⅞c.

Barley—Barley is in less demand with higher grades 5c down on the week, and feed grades unchanged. No. 3 $1.20; No. 4 $1.15; rejected and feed $1.11. No trades in future deliveries.

Flax—The flax market has been very strong during the week owing to smallness of visible supplies, and bad reports on growing crops. Prices have advanced 12c to 14c on top of the already high prices. Today's prices are: 1 N.W.C. $3.35½; 2 C.W. $3.30½; 3 C.W. $3.19½. Futures closed, October $3.33½; November $3.33; December $3.30.

Market little stronger with considerable demand for A. P. Cons. due to very good reports from well. Mount Stephen has been unable to get their well in shape to make new hole as yet. Southern Alberta No. 2 making rapid progress and the well should be finished within next 30 days. Record still working but no new developments. We understand that delay in getting material will prevent installing casing head gas plant at Calgary Petroleum Products (Dingman) well, this month.

LIVESTOCK

AT WINNIPEG YARDS

Winnipeg, Aug. 9.—Livestock receipts at the Union stockyards today totalled 1,050 cattle and 1,322 hogs. The cattle market held at steady prices on butcher steers, cows and heifers; bulls and oxen also sold at steady prices. Stockers and feeders were slow and prices a shade easier in spots; veal calves were slow and sold at easier prices. Sheep and lambs brought fairly steady prices, but the market is slow for this class of stuff. It takes real good lambs to bring $12.50. Milch cows and springers' trade has slackened off a little, but prices are about the same.

Hogs dropped 25c to 35c per hundred. Market was weak at $16.25, with prospects of a lower market.

AT TORONTO YARDS

Toronto, Aug. 9.—Receipts at the Union stockyards today were 342 cattle, 51 calves, 1,106 hogs, 342 sheep and lambs.

Trade was slow. The market was 25c to 30c lower on good butchers', with other grades in proportion. There were no choice heavy steers for export on the market today. Everything offered was fairly well cleaned up at the lower prices. Butcher cows were steady at $7.00 to $8.50. Bulls easy at $6.50 to $9.00. Stockers were quiet with only the choicest grades wanted. There was no demand for light, common steers, and calves were easy. Lambs, 50c to 75c lower. Hogs steady at $17.00, fed.

CHICAGO LIVESTOCK

Chicago, Aug. 9.—Hogs—Receipts, 17,000; strong. Bulk, $15.80 to $16.75; light, $15.10 to $16.70; mixed, $15.85 to $16.75; heavy, $15.10 to $16.80, a new high price record; rough, $15.10 to $15.35; pigs, $11.25 to $14.00.

Cattle—Receipts, 3,000; native beef cattle, $7.90 to $14.35; steers, $7.00 to $12.25; stockers and feeders, $5.80 to $9.25; cows and heifers, $4.40 to $12.00; calves, $8.75 to $13.50.

Sheep—Receipts, 7,000; strong. Wethers, $7.50 to $10.80; ewes, $6.50 to $9.25; lambs, $9.25 to $14.85.

AT SOUTH ST. PAUL

South St. Paul, Aug. 9.—Hogs—Receipts, 1,850; steady, 10c higher. range, $15.00 to $16.20; bulk, $15.40 to $16.65.

Cattle—Receipts, 2,200; killers strong. Steers, $5.00 to $12.50; cows and heifers, $6.00 to $9.00; calves, 25c higher, $5.00 to $11.50; stockers and feeders, 25c to 50c higher, $5.00 to $8.50.

Sheep—Receipts, 310. Lambs, steady, 25c higher; sheep steady; lambs, $6.00 to $14.00; wethers, $7.00 to $9.50; ewes, $5.00 to $8.50.

CALGARY MARKET

HOGS REACH $16.50

Livestock prices were elevated to the highest levels ever known here Thursday, when hogs cleared at $16.50 per hundred. Five loads topped at this figure, and there was no trouble disposing of them.

In Winnipeg the high water mark was five cents above the local market. In Chicago the prices smashed records, going to $16.80. Reports from all markets are to the effect that the lowly porker is coming into his own.

Cattle were disposed of at $8.25 on Thursday, although the run was light. The general scarcity of hogs is sending the price skyward.

WHOLE LIST SLUMPS

Montreal, Aug. 8.—Influenced by the New York slump, the local stock market showed inactivity and narrowness. Several stocks showed fractional advances, however. These were Steel of Canada, Smelters, Shawinigan, Dominion Bridge, and Dominion Textile. Smelters was the most active, 375 shares selling with a net gain of ⅜. Steel of Canada was quiet and steady with a net gain of ½. Bridge gained a half point. Forgings was down 7¾ points in the only sale of the day. Civic Power lost ¼ point.

In the bond section, in which more interest was shown, the 1937 loan was unchanged at 95¼ at the close, while the 1931 loan lost ⅛ point. Canadian Rubber bonds sold at 94¼. Lyall sold at 88¾, and Quebec Rails at 62½.

Total business for the day: 1,706 shares, $24,40 bonds, 10 unlisted shares.

TRADE WAS NARROW

Toronto, Aug. 9.—An extremely limited trade was transacted on the local stock market today. Prices were lower, but the fractional declines were largely without significance. The 1931 loan was the most active bond, with broken lots selling at 95⅛ to 95½. Among the investment issues, Mackay common was ¾ weaker. Winnipeg Railway continued its downward trend, touching 38.

FINANCIAL

Big Increase In Bank Clearings

EXTRA DIVIDEND DECLARED

New York, Aug. 9.—The Union Pacific Railroad company today declared an extra dividend of 1 per cent. on the common stock, in addition to the regular quarterly dividend of 2 per cent. This is the same amount as was distributed three months ago.

FOOD SITUATION AFFECTS STOCKS

New York, Aug. 9.—Wall street took a calmer view today of the price control situation, but professionals pressed their advantage tentatively, though rallies of one to three points ruled at the close.

There were signs of substantial supportin war issues and steels during the occasional interval of unsettlement, but certain equipments and motors were again under a cloud. Depression in the latter group was emphasized by receivership proceedings against a concern making automobile parts.

Shipping and rails, especially the former, were conspicuous for their comparative strength at all times, and tobaccos continued their rise under the auspices of pools. Other strong and active specialties included Industrial Alcohol, United States Rubber, Sugars, and a few utilities.

The recovery, which became more general in the hour, resulted mainly from the customary covering movement, public interest manifesting no change from its long sustained apathy. Sales, 550,000 shares.

Foreign exchange retained its irregular characteristics, remittances to Paris hardening slightly, while lires suffered another decline. Rates on neutral countries were more variable, but Swiss and Dutch rates remained steady. The noteworthy feature of the Bank of England statement was the gain in gold of approximately $5,000,000.

An irregular tone prevailed in the narrow bond market. Liberty 3½'s were quoted at 99.49 to 99.60. Total sales, par value, $3,200,000.

United States coupons and registered 4's rose three points on call.

A recent dispatch from Holland states that at Liege, Belgium, the German authorities arrested, tried and put to death an entire family named Groneret, on the unproved charge of espionage. The parents were shot to death before the eyes of their two daughters. One of the girls was offered freedom if she was willing to reveal the accomplices of her father, which she refused to do, and was immediately shot; the other girl, 14 years old, was tortured, outraged and also shot.

NO ALUM

The discovery of the arrival of the potato bug is credited to Mr. D. McBride, inspector for the government of noxious weeds. The potato bug does not flourish in this part of the province as it does in the east and south and it cannot hibernate in Alberta. Paris green is used to eradicate the pest. The first potato bugs appeared in Manitoba some 30 years ago.

Former Czar a Prisoner But Is Thoroughly Enjoying Life

Paris.—The Journal prints the following graphic description of the czar's imprisonment from its Petrograd correspondent, Paul Eric:

"A prisoner? Yes, I suppose so. But I am hardly less free now than formerly, for have I not been a prisoner all my life?"

This is the only reflection Nicholas II. seems to have made upon his captivity within the precincts of Tzarskoe Selo castle.

He was talking to Count Benckendorff, former grand marshal of the Russian court who shares the former czar's captivity. The former ruler spoke very sadly, his eyes filled with tears at the recollection of his cloistered, guarded life, and to hide his emotion he hastily turned his head aside and lighted a cigarette.

Peering through the dron railings that surround the palace grounds people can from time to time get a glimpse of the former czar through the foliage. It was thus I saw him yesterday. He emerged from his suite of rooms to the palace steps where he joined Count Benckendorff.

Wears Uniform of Colonel

Nicholas was wearing the uniform of a colonel in the Fourth Tierailleurs regiment. He seemed to me to be in excellent health and in no wise cast down by his dethronement. His chat with the count was apparently on a pleasant subject for he never ceased to smile.

I saw the couple stroll slowly through the grounds. Their talk evidently was about horticulture for from time to time they halted before various flower beds, and the former czar pointed with his cane at certain blooms. No sooner had they begun their promenade than an officer and three soldiers with bayonets fixed appeared seemingly from nowhere and followed them at a short distance.

The walk did not last long, and before disappearing into his apartments Nicholas turned and gravely saluted the officer who had been dogging his footsteps.

150 Men Watch Family

Watch was kept upon the Romanoff family by 150 men distributed in the palace and gardens. They form a triple circular cordon around the palace. In the interior only three soldiers mount guard, but Colonel Cobilinsky, commandant of the palace, has the right at any hour of the day or night to enter the spacious room without the formality of announcing his visit in advance, while the officers on duty can at any time remind the captives of the regulations they have undertaken to respect. Their task, however, is rendered easy by the cold and dignified demeanor of the prisoners.

At meals Nicholas is always in a good humor, and never refers to his downfall. He eats simple fare without complaint.

Various Forms Of Headache

"It is necessary in order to treat headaches properly to understand the causes which produce the affection," says Dr. J. W. Ray, of Blockton, Ala. Continuing, he says, "Physicians cannot even begin the treatment of a disease without knowing what causes give rise to it, and we must remember that headache is to be treated according to the same rule. We must not only be particular to give a remedy intended to counteract the cause which produces the headache, but we must also give a remedy to relieve the pain until the cause of the trouble has been removed. To answer this purpose anti-kamnia tablets will be found a most convenient and satisfactory remedy. One tablet every one to three hours gives comfort and rest in the most severe cases of headache, neuralgia, and particularly the headaches of women.

"When we have a patient subject to regular attacks of sick headache and when he feels the least sign of an oncoming attack, he should take two A-K Tablets. Obtainable at druggists in any quantity desired."

Synopsis of Canadian Northwest Land Regulations.

THE sole head of a family, or any male over 18 years old, who was at the commencement of the present war, and has since continued to be, a British subject or a subject of an allied or neutral country, may homestead a quarter-section of available Dominion Land in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta. Applicant must appear in person at Dominion Lands Agency or Sub-Agency for District. Entry by proxy may be made on certain conditions. Duties—Six months residence upon and cultivation of land in each three years.

In certain districts a homesteader may secure an adjoining quarter-section pre-emption. Price $3.00 per acre. Duties—Reside six months in each of three years after earning homestead patent and cultivate 50 acres extra. May obtain pre-emption patent as soon as homestead patent on certain conditions.

A settler after obtaining homestead patent, if he cannot secure a pre-emption, may take a purchased homestead in certain districts. Price $3.00 per acre. Must reside six months in each of three years, cultivate 50 acres and erect a house worth $300.00.

Holders of entries may count time employment as farm laborers in Canada during 1917, as residence duties under certain conditions.

When Dominion Lands are advertised or posted for entry, returned soldiers who have served overseas and have been honorably discharged, receive one day priority in applying for entry at local Agent's Office (but not Sub-Agency). Discharge papers must be presented to Agent.

W. W. CORY, Deputy Minister of the Interior.

N.B.—Unauthorized publication of this advertisement will not be paid for.

Making Your Shoes Last You Longer

Shoes should be oiled or greased whenever the leather begins to get hard or dry. They should be brushed thoroughly and then all the dirt and mud that remains washed off with warm water, the excess water being taken off with a dry cloth. While the shoes are still wet and warm, apply the oil or grease with a swab of wool or flannel. It is best to have the oil or grease about as warm as the hand can bear, and it should be rubbed well into the leather, preferably with the palm. If necessary the oil can be applied to dry leather, but it penetrates better when the latter is wet. After treatment, the shoes should be left to dry in a place that is warm, not hot.

Castor oil is satisfactory for shoes that are to be polished; for plainer footgear neat's-foot, fish oil, or oleine may be substituted. If it is desired to make the shoes and boots more waterproof, beef tallow may be added to any of these substances at the rate of half a pound of tallow to a pint of oil. The edge of the sole and the welt should be greased thoroughly. Too much grease cannot be applied to these parts.

A simple methd of making the soles more durable, pliable, and water resistant is to swab them occasionally with linseed oil, setting them aside to dry overnight.

Many of the common shoe polishes are harmful to leather. All those which contain sulphuric, hydrochloric, or oxalic acids, turpentine, benzine, or other volatile solvents, have a tendency to harden the leather and make it more liable to crack.

It is poor economy, too, to wear a shoe with the heel badly worn on one side. This throws the shoe out of shape and may soon result in its ruin. It is also likely to cause temporary injury to the foot.

o

The Russian authorities have found it necessary to re-establish the death penalty as the only means of discipline. The situation has become so alarming in Russia that the government was faced with the alternative of sacrificing the army to a number of traitors or putting into force this only possible means of inspiring terror.

* * *

Mr. H. H. Wood, member of the grain board, who has just returned from the east, states that the maximum of $2.40 was to apply only to the old wheat still in Canada—the 1916 crop—and that it had no reference to the 1917 crop. A maximum of not much more than $1.75 is the price mentioned for the No. 1 northern, 1917.

Eddie Durnan, of Toronto, who is the champion sculler of America, will defend his title on Toronto bay on August 31, against John S. Hackett, of Beaudette, Minn.

LEONARD OFFERED $5,000 TO MEET EDDIE CAMPI

Leonard has been offered a guarantee of $5,000 to meet Eddie Campi in Seattle. Four rounds is the limit out on the coast, and Benny intends to see the big trees, the seals, the fruit, the flowers, not forgetting the fog and some of those record-breaking four-round purses.

BENNY LEONARD AGAIN STARTLES BOXING WORLD

Benny Leonard again came out champion, forcing Johnny Kilbane to quit in the third of a scheduled six-round bout at Philadelphia.

A Lucky Turndown

After the first round a man circled the ring and offered to bet $500 against $50 that Kilbane would not be knocked out. He sat down feeling very much abused when he failed to get his money down. Five minutes or so later he was hugging himself.

YOUNG GIRL IS CLEVER SWIMMER

Chicago.—The aoquatic performances of Miss Thelma Darby, a 14-year-old girl, of Indianapolis, were the most notable events on the program of championship swimming staged by the Central Athletic association recently at the South Shore Country club. She won the 50-yard dash for women in 33 seconds flat, scoring ahead of Miss Blanche Greenburg, of the Hyde Park High school, Chicago, and Miss Marion Kuttnauire, of the same school.

FOUR MEMBERS FROM THE GIANTS ARE DRAFTED

Secretary John B. Foster, of the New York Baseball club of the National league, stated last night that the numbers of four members of the Giants had been drawn in the draft. George Burns, the left fielder; Davis Robertson, the right fielder; Jeff Tesreau and Pol Perritt, two of the pitchers, are the ones whose numbers have appeared.

It is by no means certain, however, that these players will be called to the colors, as all are married and have dependents. In the event of their being chosen, the New York club will be greatly weakened and its pennant chances, which now look unusually bright, will be a matter of great doubt.

ANOTHER GREAT SPORTSMAN OFF TO FIGHT IN THE WAR

With the departure of Elmer Oliphant, who is to join Gen. Pershing's forces in France, West Point loses one of its greatest athletes. In the big "plebe" class, just taking up studies at the West Point institution, is W. T. Vandegraff, last season's captain of the University of Alabama football eleven, for several years All-Southern tackle, and said to be one of the best punters the south ever has developed. He is proficient both in punting and drop kicking. In 1915 he kicked four field goals in one contest.

GREAT BASEBALL TOURNAMENT TO LAST ONE WEEK

All is set for one big week of baseball in Calgary, with the naming of the date for the Calgary baseball tournament, open to all comers, with a cash prize list of $850.

Arrangements were completed last night when the executive of the Sportsmen's Patriotic association met, and decided to have the schedule start August 20 and last until August 25.

The first prize is $500, second $250, and third $100. Calgary will be represented by an all-star aggregation picked from the three league teams in the S. P. A. At present no manager has been named to head the locals, and this will probably be decided upon et a meeting of the managers of the teams soon.

The local team will probably be pickel on paper. That is, the men with the best all-around averages will be selected to play with a view of making a well-balanced team.

Invitations have been extended to Vulcan, Champion, Carmangay, Burdett, Stavely, Lomond, Travers, Taber, Gleichen and Medicine Hat to come hither and battle across the green sward for money and laurels.

The executive committee has closed the main arrangements, and has only to arrange the excursion rates with the railroads and dispose of enough tickets to make the affair sound financially.

H. A. MacDonald, chairman, expressed the view last night that the business end of the tourney will glide forward like a well-oiled steam roller, and a great week of sport will be held in the city.

The World Bows to the Strike Preventer

TENNIS PRINCIPLES

To explain to a boy the fundamental good way is to stand him in front of a wall, give him a tennis ball, and ask him to bat it up against the wall a few times with his naked hand.

Anyone who is tested thus will nearly always meet the ball fairly and fully as it is falling, so that it strikes on the palm of the hand, as one come forward at the ball with the palm almost as flat as the top of the table, but, of course, inclined a little towards the wall. Simple as this exercise seems, it is nevertheless of great importance, for it is the foundation stroke in tennis, so far as regards the ground game or balls that are played after hitting the ground.

Now suppose that the ball had landed. The rebound would come off a perfectly flat surface. If that surface were tilted up toward the wall, the ball would tend to bound back toward the wall, as I showed in connection with one's hand.

Now one's hand, open and in position to play the ball is, in effect, if cut off with about half the forearm, a racket. Why is it that so many beginners forget this and neglect to play the ball naturally with the racket, which is only an artificial production of the same shape which they always use naturally, to-wit, the hand and arm

THE BEST HANDICAP HORSE IN THE WORLD

This is Boots. A few days ago in New York City he won the title "the best handicap horse in the world today" by travelling a mile and a furlong in one minute and forty-nine and two-fifth seconds. This equals the world's record. In fact, it may be said very truthfully that it breaks the world's record, because when the great Borrow set that high water mark he carried only 117 pounds. Boots ran equally well the other day, carrying 127 pounds over the course in the Brookdale Handicap, at a speed of thirty-seven miles an hour. Boots is a big bay gelding and belongs to A. K. Macomber. He is the son of Hessian and Little Flower and before this latest achievement was best known as the winner of the Suburban Handicap. A handicap race is one in which a high-record horse is made to run further or carry more weight than his competitors, so as to even up conditions. Boots, handicapped by top weight, matched the world record set by Borrow, carrying ten pounds less. That's why Boots is best.

PUTTING A SALMON RIVER ON THE MAP

THE map referred to is a map of some importance, for salmon is the big game of the fisherman, and brings in search of it sportsmen from all over the world with big two-handed rods and large noisy reels and (what Canada much desires) a deep purse for camps, guides and outfit. Harry Allen, President of the New Brunswick Guides Association, has known the Cains River as one of the best trout streams in the Province of New Brunswick, and salmon were frequently caught twenty miles up from the junction with the better known Miramichi, but he believed that if the right kind of fishermen got there, they would find salmon all the length of at least eighty miles.

The investigation was made a short time ago by a party of sporting writers and editors from the United States. Maxmillian Foster, a salmon fisherman of twenty years standing, who knows New Brunswick and Newfoundland like a book, and writes for the "Saturday Evening Post"; Hughie Fullerton, of the Chicago "Examiner," Jack Lait, of the Chicago "Herald," Grantland Rice and W. O. M'Geehan, of the New York "Tribune," and L. O. Armstrong, of the Bureau of Commercial Economics, Washington, D.C., an old campaigner who has hunted and fished in the Canadian woods for over fifty years, and A. O. Seymour, General Tourist Agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, an ardent fisherman.

When they arrived at Fredericton, all the local fishermen were pessimistic. "If there are salmon in the Cains," they said, "you have come at the wrong time. They went out with the ice and are now at sea. Better go home and come back in a month." It was cold and raining, the worst kind of weather for flyfishing, but nothing daunted, they set out.

With eight fishermen, one movie picture operator from the Essanay Company of Chicago, and nine guides, the fleet started out near the head of the Cains River, fishing the pools as they went down. The first day they struck only trout, but from the second day onwards the movie man was busy. Twice he had to choose between two fishermen who had hooked their salmon at the same time. Maxmillian Foster had a basket of thirteen, ranging from seven to eighteen pounds. The largest measured forty-two-and-a-half-inches, which means that if it had been taken in the fall it would have weighed forty-two-and-a-half pounds. Every member of the party had what he came for, thanks to Silver Doctor and Parmachene Belle, the two flies that the Cains River salmon seem to like. In one pool seven beauties, weighing between them sixty-eight pounds, were taken out in two hours, and it was only dark and lack of time that closed the sport. Result, eight happy fishermen, one happy movie man, and one supremely proud Harry Allan, who saw that his claims were justified and that Cains River could take its place for salmon besides the hitherto more famous waters of the Miramichi and the Restigouche.

Big Auto Contest Attracts Attention

The ladies are all active about the Win-the-War carnival, each anxious to find out the conditions of the contest.

The following information will be of value for those who have a view of winning that Studebaker car:

Call at the Colonel Macleod chapter, I. O. D. E. rooms, 50-53 Herald building, at any hour between 9 and 6 on Wednesday, August 15 ((not the 8th, as has been erroneously reported), and make application for your tickets. The contest is open to any young woman in the city or district. You sell these tickets for $1 each. Each ticket admits two. The ticket entitles the holders to a full program of dancing, entertainment, etc., during any performance of the carnival.

The young lady who sells the greatest number of tickets between August 15 and September 22 will be awarded the Studebaker car, now on exhibit in a window of the Foundry Products company, old Pryce Jones building, corner Twelfth avenue and First street west. The car is completely equipped—a six-cylinder type, electrically lighted and started, a handsome maroon body, new individual driving seats, beautiful upholstery, seven-passenger accommodation, with two seats removable. This car sells f.o.b. Calgary, for $1,750.

Another Foot Supporter

A simple form of foot rest to be used with the accelerator is now to be had for 75 cents. It consists of two nickel plated members of drawn steel with a rod running through both pieces so that the top member rocks backward and forward with the motion of the foot. The whole thing is small and compact, providing a rest merely for the instep instead of the whole foot, but it is said to relieve the foot and leg of all strain and prevent any irregular application of power on rough roads. A spiral spring keeps the movable member in an upright position and there is a means of raising and lowering the device to suit any height of accelerator.

Things An Autoist Should Know

SUBSTITUTE FOR GASOLINE

A Detroit genius claims to have solved the "gasoline substitute" problem for automobiles, says the Electrical Experimenting Magazine. He utilizes a very simple electrical phenomenon, that of "electrolysis," or the decomposition of water by the passage of fan electric current through it. The hydrogen gas evolved is mixed with air and passed into the engine cylinders. The inventor states that it is more economical than gasoline because of the higher explosive value of the hydrogen—air mixture.

HOW TO WASH YOUR CAR

It is just as easy to wash a car properly as not. All the mud should be thoroughly softened by a gentle stream of clear, cold water, which also will wash away all the dust. Then all the grease and oil spots should be removed with a piece of waste saturated in gasoline. The car should afterward be rubbed gently with a clean sponge, using an abundance of clean cold water, until all mud is removed. The car should be rubbed dry with gentle strokes of chamois, wringing it out as the water is absorbed. The object is to remove the dust and mud and leave the surface dry and clean, with just as little scratching and rubbing as possible. Rubbing should be done in straight lines rather than in circles. To prevent water drying and spotting it is well to clean one panel at a time.

GASOLINE IN ENGLAND

In pursuance of the suggestion recently made in England, several of the leading British petroleum companies have ararnged to pool their distributing facilities throughout the country and the ships now employed in bringing oil from abroad. A committee known as the pool board, petroleum supplies, has been formed at the offices of the Ministry of Munitions, and consists of representatives of the Anglo-American Oil, Anglo-Mexican Petroleum, Browning Petroleum, Homelight Oil, Union Petroleum Products and H. P. Wheatley companies. All petroleum products except lubricating oils will be distributed by the pool board under special war brands. The object of the system is the release of men for the army and navy through avoiding duplication of an effort in handling, shipping, storing and distributing oil products.

IN AND NEAR HAWAII

In the Hawaiian territory there are 6,250 motor vehicles registered, according to latest reports. Of these, 2,465 are registered on the Island of Oahu, 599 on Mani, 686 on Kanai and 1,500 on Hawaii. Those numbers represent an investment of $6,250,000.

Figures furnished by the department of commerce indicate that the industry is growing very rapidly in Hawaii—the number of imported machines increasing constantly.

During the month of March, 1917, 212 automobiles were imported, valued at $204,400, against 177 machines during the same month the year previous, valued at $152,842.

Startling increase is shown between 1915 figures and 1917. In 1915 for nine month, 662 cars were imported, valued at $750,784, against the importation of 1,461 cars valued at $1,411,378 for nine months in 1917. This is an increase of 799 machines, an increase in valuation of $660,630.

THE EXPERTS SAY—

Any tire dealer will show you how to rol the air out of an inner tube and fold it properly, but if it is left in its folded condition too long it will crack. So opetn it occasionally and fold it another way. If this is not done, the tube will become almost useless.

When dry cells are used for starting purposes, extreme care should be used to keep them in a dry place. Even though the cells may be new, any dampness will cause them to short circuit, and when this takes place you have hard work starting your engine on the magneto.

A source of noise that is frequently overlooked is the case covering the timing gears. It should be kept filled with lubricant. If it becomes empty it acts as a sounding board and intensies the noisefi of the gears.

Cincinnati—George Whitted, Eddie Burns and Bobby Byrne, of the Phillies, were relieved of some of their cash by a band of sneak thieves who took $140 from the three players, who were sleeping at the Metropole hotel. Jewelry was passed up.

HUNS HAVE MANY FAST NEW AIRPLANES

These Airplanes Were Used to Bombard London from Great Height

London.—The German aeroplanes that are now being used for long distance bombardments are of a new and powerful type, described as follows by a writer in the Swiss paper, Gazette de Lausanne:

These are the flying machines that were put through numerous trials in January last at Doeberitz, when members of the reichstag were among the spectators.

These machines are driven by twin motors and propellers. They have a very high speed, and can moreover be made to mount with exceptional rapidity, thanks to a special device of the rudder. They conduct their bombardments at heights of 10,000 to 12,000 feet, and so are pretty well invulnerable to anti-aircraft guns.

Their speed is so great that 20 minutes after leaving Ostend they are over Margate and Ramsgate. Going and coming, the journey to London takes only an hour and a quarter. Not being meant for fighting these planes are accompanied by water planes for their defence.

Mrs. A. E. Shider, of Didsbury, is a visitor in the city for a few days.

Dethroned Kings on the Downward Slide

People Slowly Getting the Upper Hand---Some Kings Feel the Drop Very Much ---Event Is of Historic Importance.

HISTORY abounds in abdicated kings, and the present war has added to the list. Of the unfortunate rulers who have lost their thrones, a few have been allowed to pass their declining years peacefully in their own countries. Many have been imprisoned, and have become insane, many ex-rulers have been exiled, and some have sought refuge in England and America. Two even found safety under the humble name of Smith.

It is said that Nicholas II, until recently czar of all the Russias, has but 500,000 rubles left of a fortune estimated a year ago to be greater than the Rockefeller, Morgan or Krupp possessions. He furnishes an example of the vicissitudes of kings. Practically all of the mines of Siberia were the personal property of the czar. He owned in his own name 150,000,000 acres of land, upon which were mines, timber and farms. Besides, he drew an immense salary to maintain his palaces and defray the expenses of royal personages and dependents.

The other most recent abdicator, Constantine of Greece, did not have such vast estates, but he had enough for a life befitting his station, and he undoubtedly will have much less in future. As in the case of the czar, no announcement has been made about arrangements for the future allowances of the Greek king, who is now residing in Switzerland with his queen, a sister of the German kaiser.

Nicholas Petrovich, the old king of Montenegro, is another ruler who lately lost his crown, at least temporarily. He has leased a villa just outside of Paris, where he is living with his daughter, Princess Xenia. Because Nicholas was suspected of treachery to his allies, the Entente powers, he is guarded by the Paris police, although he enjoys comparative freedom. His cabinet minister who went with him when he left his country, when the army was starving and besieged by the forces of the central powers, has deserted him. But Nicholas is not alone, for he took with him his entire family, excepting Prince Mirko, who was left behind with the army, and has been mentioned as the Austro-Hungarian candidate for the throne of a united Serbo-Croatian state under Austro-German protection.

King Nicholas Petrovich is passionately fond of poker. When he is not reading the war news, according to reports from Paris, he gathers his old cronies about him for a game. He is the father of the Queen of Italy. Another of his daughters is Princess Francis Joseph of Battenberg, and still another is a Russian grand duchess.

Little has been heard recently of King Ferdinand of Rumania, who sacrificed his vast holdings in Austria by allying himself with the Entente powers. His brother, William, 15 months older, who was himself Crown Prince of Rumania until he resigned all his rights in 1886, has not only expelled Ferdinand from the family, but now has begun to call himself king. It is certain that Ferdinand's finances are in a very bad condition; and it is not likely that he will ever regain his lost property in Austria. The older brother, William, has two sons, both of whom are generals in the German army, and his daughter by his first marriage was wedded to Manuel II, then king of Portugal.

Peter, king of Serbia, had the distinction of being the second king to lose his crown because of the present war. His grief was probably greater than that of any other ruler who met with a similar misfortune; for Peter had spent a lifetime trying to gain the throne. His early crime—the murder of Prince Obrenovitch that he might take the throne—was never quite forgotten. Then, too, Peter was not accepted into the graces of the other European royalty on his accession to the throne in 1903, following the murder of King Alexander and Queen Draga—his last step to the crown.

The sad little old man once remarked in a fit of temper: "I must be very ill today; it does not even please me to be king." When they drove him from Serbia he went to Athens. He has now found an asylum on the Greek Isle of Euboea

Before the great war began there were abdications every little while. Some of the ex-rulers are living. There is, for instance, the Princess Kiakiliani, widow of King Kalakaua of the Sandwich Isles. Having ceased to be a queen, she spent her time traveling, and because she had a fortune, was able to keep in the limelight. She attracted notice in New York city some years ago when she tiped a waiter $500. Her home is in Paris.

An abdicant most unhappy was the insane King Otto of Bavaria, who was deposed for Ludwig III in 1913, after a reign of 27 years. Otto succeeded his brother, who drowned himself in Starnburg lake on June 13, 1886, and he was possessed with the same melancholy disposition. Throwing bric-a-brac and dishes became his hobby while he was a prisoner in the Palace Turstenried during the last few years of his life.

Another ex-ruler of unbalanced mind was a nervous little man behind the bars of a prison in Central Turkey—Abdul Hamid II, once sultan of Turkey, notorious for his frightful massacres in Armenia. He was deposed in 1909. He called himself the "most miserable of men," but the people have nicknamed him "Abdul the Damned."

Manuel II of Portugal is now merely Manuel Braganza. After his abdication he leased Sir Harry Maclean's villa, Abercorn, at Richmond, England. The villa originally cost £25,000, and the four acres on which it stands seem small for a man who once had a kingdom. Manuel has only a little money of his own, and the Portuguese government gives him a small annuity. For several years he has lived quietly. He delights in the flowers and trees of the fresh English landscape. It is rumored that he has learned a trade.

Napoleon III and his beautiful consort, the Empress Eugenie, also sought peace in England. After the refugee Napoleon died, broken-hearted, at Chiselhurst, the ex-empress and the prince imperial, Louis Napoleon, occupied Lord Harrington's castle, Egypt, on the Isle of Wight. Six years later, after the prince imperial fell in the Zulu war, the saddened woman took up her abode at Farnborough, England, and at intervals in Paris.

in the Aegean sea. At 72 he spends much of his time walking, perhaps trying to imagine that his valor early in the war, when he marched at the head of his picky army, makes up for his earlier acts.

The "King of Hedjaz," formerly Sherif of Mecca, is another recently deprived of office. But he seems to have come out on top, for the English, French and Italian governments recognized the government of Hedjaz, which he founded. In it are the holy cities of Medina and Mecca.

ITALIANS STARTING AN ATTACK

In the region of Jamiano, Italian infantry is shown starting an attack on the Austrians, after an intense artillery preparation.

Carries Knife In His Brain Twenty Years

DENVER, Colo.—Although he carried a "concealed weapon" for thirty years, Ernest Swensen was never arrested for violating the law. The weapon was a knife blade, an inch and a quarter long and embedded in his brain. An operation has removed it and he is recovering. Swensen is 50 years old. When he was 20 he was camping out with a friend and was attacked by tramps. A knife blade found its way into his skull and gradually worked into the brain.

Empress Eugenie was 92 years old last May. She has turned her Farnborough home into a hospital for British officers, and much of her time has been spent caring for the wounded from the battlefields of France. She foregoes some of her customary trips to France since the war. Usually she passes most of the winter at her villa at Cap Martin, on the Riviera. On her way she spends two weeks in Paris, where she gratifies her mania for revisiting old spots and old friends, and from the windows of the Hotel Continental she can look out on the Tuileries gardens where her child used to play.

It is generally known that Louis Philippe, king of the French, taught in a Swiss college during his exile when he was discovered to be among the plotters against the French republic in 1793. Three years later he was joined by his mother and brothers, who had been imprisoned in Paris since the Terror. They set sail together for the United States, and settled in Philadelphia in an old mansion. For two years they traveled in New England, the Great Lake region, and the Mississippi valley. The exiled king was then reconciled with Louis XVIII, and lived with his brothers at Twickenham, near London. He went to Sicily in 1807 and remained there until Napoleon's abdication. Then Louis XVIII made him colonel-general of the Hussars and restored his estates in Orleans. This made him enormously wealthy, and although his attitude toward the house of peers cost him two years of exile, he was made regent to Charles V, who was deposed. Louis Philippe then became king by "the grace of God and the will of the people." His alliance with the Spanish house caused his downfall, and he was forced to flee with his consort to Honfleur. They found refuge in a gardener's cotatge.

"Mr. and Mrs. Smith" were a bedraggled couple, without any property save the clothing they wore, when the English consul smuggled them into New Haven. Yet "Mr. and Mrs. Smith" were once King Louis Philippe and his queen. Victoria took pity on them and placed a castle at their disposal, and they settled at Claremont as Count and Countess of Neuilly.

"Prince Jaime," or "Don Jaime," his cronies of the cafes and tea rooms of Paris call a prim, bewhiskered little man who is a bookkeeper by profession, but is abiding his time until he shall become King of France by "the grace of God and the will of the people." He is James III of the Bourbon line, and is a third cousin of Alfonso of Spain. He might be on perfectly good terms with his reigning cousin were it not for the awkward circumstance that James thinks that he himself should be King of Spain. His grandfather sat on the Spanish throne until the opposing branch of the Bourbon family took title.

Unique among the abdicants of the seventeenth century was Queen Christina of Sweden, daughter of Gustavus Adolphus. The "Madcap Queen," as she became known, came to the throne in her eighteenth year. She showed remarkable ability, but was headstrong and incurred the opposition of her chancellor and ministers. When they urged a marriage with her cousin she refused and abdicated in his favor. She left Stockholm in masculine attire under the name of Count Dohna, and lived at the various European capitals until her fortune was exhausted. She tried to regain the throne several times. In 1869 Christina died—old, forlorn, and miserably poor—in Rome.

Charles I, emperor of Rome and king of Spain, passed his last years at his villa at Yste in Estremadura, after his abdication for Ferdinand. There he dictated his commentaries, cultivated flowers, and delighted in a large collection of birds. Ferdinand I, of Austria, who abdicated in favor of the late Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, his nephew, spent the remainder of his life in prison in Olmutz. Philip V, founder of the Bourbon dynasty, abdicated for his son, Louis XV, who died a few months later. Philip resumed the scepter and tried several times to abdicate, only to be prevented by his ambitious wife, who kept him in confinement until his death.

The King of Sweden, who spurned the Russian Grand Duchess Alexandra, granddaughter of Catherine II, was dethroned and transported to Germany with his entire family. Gustavus IV left Germany for St. Gall, Switzerland, where he died in loneliness and indigence. His body was brought to Sweden for interment in the royal burial place, Riddarholmskyrka.

Of all exiled monarchs, Napoleon the Great suffered the biterest exile—confinement and death on the rock of St. Helena.

Dictator Will Tackle the Job of His Life

Lord Rhondda, Britain's New Food Controller, is After Those Who Make Big Profits Out of People's Foodstuffs

Lord Rhonddo has tackled one of the biggest jobs in the world. He is the British food controller, recently succeeding Lord Devonport, whose health was reported to have given way under the tremendous strain. Lord Rhondda's nerves are good. If he succumbs to worry no other man ought to be appointed to carry on his work, for it well might be considered an impossible task. It is too early to say whether Lord Rhondda has succeeded or is likely to succeed, but his attitude toward the problem is a promising one. He says that those who are making undue profit out of the people's foodstuffs in time of war are blackmailers, and ought to be treated as such. This is a sound foundation for any food controller and the food controller who does not accept some such principle in the beginning is sure to be a disappointment. Moreover, it may be said that up to the present time Lord Rhondda has not failed in any undertaking. He has been conspicuously successful. He seems to have the winning habit.

The Man With the "Punch"

A writer in the Daily Mail says that Lord Rhondda is the man with a "punch," the Mail being justly proud of its acquaintance with American slang. When he was a student it is said that he was a noted boxer, and in the course of his long association with Welsh miners his powerful physique and readiness to take chances of violence served him well. "D. A.," as he is still called in Wales, for everyone there continues to think of him as David A. Thomas, is not a man to whom people who come into contact with him can remain indifferent or judicial minded.. In an open letter not long ago a Socialist leader said: "When we don't hate you we love you." He is a man of great strength of character and will power. He is a boss, a man who thinks quickly, and whose mind once made up is permanently made up. He might not be an easy colleague, but he would be a courageous leader. When the present cabinet was formed he was made president of the local government board, which seemed to the public rather an unimportant post for a man of his ability, but in that department in the few months he conducted it he got rid of more red tape than had been destroyed in years.

Great Coal Owner

Lord Rhondda, as most people are aware, is not "unconnected with coal." He is described as a sales agent. In reality he is a great mine owner. He was, in fact, the Cambrian combine, and in his efforts to become a millionaire, which were crowned with success some years ago, he had to fight the miners' union on many occasions. Not long ago miners' leaders were denouncing him for the profits he was making out of coal. A deputation waited upon him with some idea of dissuading him from this course. He smiled and answered: "Then why not invest the funds of the miners' union in mines? You know the industry and have full facilities for becoming mine owners." As a capitalist he was naturally hated by thousands of his constituents, but nevertheless they returned him year after year to the house of commons with unprecedented majorities. He was and is almost as popular in South Wales as Lloyd George is in North Wales.

A Lusitania Survivor

David A. Thomas, M.P., was on the Lusitania when she was torpedoed. He was returning from a mission he had undertaken for the British government in the United States. He had little expectation of being rescued, but when he was picked up he had already determined that the remainder of his life should be devoted to the service of his country, and a very short time afterward his duty again called on him to cross the ocean. He did not hesitate, and no doubt he would spend his time on the high seas if by doing so he could better conduct the food controllership. One reason for his long popularity in Wales is his hatred of cant. There is no hypocritical pretense of piety about him. When taking his millions out of the coal industry he did not do it to an accompaniment of upturned eyes and writhing hands. He was about as frank as the landlord who defended

COMMENTS AND CRITICISM

HOW ABOUT AUSTRALIA'S PLAN

Australia is realizing that returned soldiers deserve some sort of a living for their services for humanity. Many are half invalids, others fit only for sanitariums, while a few are able to do a considerable amount of work. Every one of these men can earn a living, if they have something to start on—money is the question. The reports circulated declare that Australia is inducing soldiers to go onto farms, by capital provided by the government. A very fair deal, indeed! Has Canada, with all its acres of land, offered anything to the soldiers? Has it offered any capital to start these farms? If it has not, it is high time that Canada would provide for her defenders. Even on the streets of Calgary hundreds of enthusiastic returned soldiers would gladly start farming if they had the capital.

LIBERAL OPPORTUNITY

What are the Liberals going to do? They are assembling from all over the Dominion and surely some agreement will be reached about the present war. Members from the different provinces who state that they are in favor of conscription—the only way in which Canada can lend enough support to the allies, and who state that in spite of that they have faith in the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, cannot mean what they say. If, during the coming election, the members want to stand for Right, Honor, Integrity, Liberty, etc., they cannot have faith in Sir Wilfrid's leadership, and must take the alternative.

Quebec, whom Sir Wilfrid represents, is not only opposed to conscription but also opposed to the war, and will, during election, raise quite a racket if the other members from the other provinces don't come down hot and heavy on their trails. It is up to the members who are now in session to rally forth and stand by a government which is out to help win the war.

There is a chance for Liberals to be of value to their country. Arise to the opportunity!

POULTRY FOR EVERYBODY

"Unlike most industries, poultry-keeping, if it is to take its rightful place among our Dominion industries, must depend mainly upon the well-directed efforts of the small producer rather than upon the large operations of the poultry farm." Thus speaks the director of the Dominion experimental farms in his introductory letter to a bulletin by the Dominion Poultry Husbandman, Mr. F. C. Elford on "Poultry-Keeping in Town and Country". Mr. Elford goes over every phase of his subject. With a large number of especially interesting and appropriate illustrations, after pointing out the advantages derived and offered by poultry-keeping, he describes the best method of housing and of feeding. He shows that poultry farming can be made profitable, pleasureable and health producing. With particular reference to the adaptability of women and girls, he mentions two or three classes of people who might well turn their attention to poultry-keeping as a side line. He gives hints and suggestions on the best breeds to have and how to select birds with good constitutions. Pigeons as well as all kinds of fowl demand attention. In short, the publication is a complete and valuable handbook on poultry raising and keeping. Everybody interested can get a copy free by addressing the Publications Branch, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.

LIEUTENANT EATON HONORED

In honor and memory of Lieut. J. N. Eaton, a tablet was unveiled Wednesday, August 8, at the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Redeemer by the Rt. Rev. the Lord Bishop of Calgary.

Lieut. Eaton lies in a grave "Somewhere in France," where many a western man, in the springtime of their lives, have fallen for the sake of liberty and justice. He, like many others, was the idol of his friends and compatriots and on this memorial occasion many feel indebted to the hero.

The tablet, which is simple and unobtrusive, and which has been placed on the western wall of the sacred edifice, reads: "To the glory of God and in memory of Lieut. John Norris Eaton, who was killed in action at Vimy Ridge, April 5, 1917. Fidelis and Finem. Erected by his friends and schoolfellows at the Bishop Pinkham college."

A HOMELESS PEOPLE

The attitude taken by the French-Canadians of Quebec is one in direct contrast to the ideas and sentiments of the Canadian people. It is also opposite to the views and ideas of the French people. This condition makes the French-Canadian a class without a country. Certainly they could not claim Canada as their home when their ideas are exactly in variance to the people of this cuntry. In France they would have no haven to turn to and in the United States even where all kinds and conditions of people congregate they would not be welcome. So they are practically a people without a country. How long they can defy the people of this country who are true believers in the principles of honesty and justice it is hard to say, but sooner or later there is going to be an upheaval in Quebec and when it comes a marked change will be found in the attitude of the French-Canadian of that community.

WAR COSTS

The cost of the war to Canada is stated by the finance minister to be $850,000 to $900,000 daily. As we have about 425,000 troops enlisted, this would figure out at about $2 a day for each man, taking the smaller estimate as correct. The addition of 100,000 men to our forces apparently will mean $200,000 daily added to our account, but this is not necessarily the case, as the permanent organization to handle the additional forces would be available, and the cost of transporting, caring for and allotting this new force would be less than if the new army were being sent into the field without the advantage of the system already in working order in Canada and Britain and France. Nevertheless the additional cost will be considerable, probably $150,000 a day, or over $50,000,000 annually. The new income tax is counted upon by the finance minister to bring in between 15 and 20 millions yearly, so that the increase in our overseas strength will mean a net cost to the nation of more than 30 millions.

WHAT CO-OPERATION MEANS

There are three words adorning the front cover of the Grain Growers' Guide—that excellent organ of the co-operative farmers of the three prairie provinces.

These words are "Organization, Education, Co-operation." They sum up the whole sequence and salvation of the farming industry.

Every city should adopt these words as their motto. Every farmer and rancher should have the words stamped indelibly upon his memory.

There can be no real sufficing co-operation until, through organization, the farmer can understand and deal with the problems—commercial or political—which face his class Through such organization he will receive and impart a liberal education. Without this education the whole structure falls down. By education we do not mean book learning, but just plain, business, horse-sense.

Think over these three words. Remember that we are at war; that those in power do not understand; that other classes are linked together to the detriment of the unorganized farmer.

Keep thinking of these three words. Then translate thinking into action. Get together; learn from one another; work together. It pays—and pays handsomely.

WHEN ADVERTISING IS AN EXPENSE

The merchant and business man who hesitates to advertise his goods on the theory that he doesn't have to would do well to investigate some of the stories of advertising which are continually being printed about New York and sister cities of the United States.

The cities of the United States and likewise the business firms of that country have had the most phenomenal growth in the history of the world, and why?—Because of the wonderful advertising that country has enjoyed.

From the first it has been exploited in the old countries by picture and story until every man, woman and child believed that gold dollars were growing on the trees and money laid in the streets ready merely to be picked up.

This may seem like a fairy story but it is nevertheless true as evidenced by the striking illustrations of foreigners who have come to that country with the avowed intention of picking it up.

Advertising has done this for the United States. It has made it the most talked-of country in the world. And local advertising has made many a millionaire in the cities of that country.

Even the big metropolitan newspapers realize the value of advertising and have taken and paid for many pages of advertising to local and foreign publications to explain the merits of their particular publication.

The Hudson's Bay Co. and the Eaton stores and the hundred and one other successful concerns are increasing their business purely and simply through the value of advertising and yet we hear on all sides the small merchant and business man say: "We cannot afford to advertise."

Advertising is not an expense unless you make it so. Indiscriminate advertising is an expense. It's a luxury that few business men can afford. Judicious advertising is a necessity. It is as necessary to the business man as his clerks, his show rooms or his goods.

When the small merchant realizes that he must keep his name before the public, day in and day out—saying something about his business and his goods—so that he who runs may read, then success in a business will crown his efforts.

If you want to make advertising an expense—advertise once in a while. It will be a dear lesson well taught. If you want to make a success of your business advertise today and tomorrow—and keep everlastingly at it.

TOPICS OF THE DAY

And A Little Child Shall Lead Them

During all the long bloody war in Europe there has not been a moment when either side could go out between the trenches and rescue the wounded. Such a thing as a few moment's armistice to bring in the wounded is unknown. Here's a story, however, of an armistice produced by a little child. It was told by a French soldier:

What a hellish noise! Above me shells are bursting and all around me is the rat-tat-tat of machine guns.

It is just before dawn, and the fog is so thick that one can scarcely see a yard ahead. All we know is that our troops during the night stormed and captured the village over yonder held by the Germans. I fall asleep.

Suddenly I am awakened by a peculiar, uncomfortable stillness—as is the case often where a sleeper is awakened either by a sudden noise or the cessation of noise. As I emerge from the dugout the lieutenant winks at me somewhat mischievously and points directly in front of him. Carefully I raise my head over the top of the trench to get a view of things.

The sun has risen and the fog has disappeared. In front of us is a meadow, and there, midway between our trenches and those of the enemy, is—God, it is impossible, it must be a delusion! but no—there in the middle of the field, crawling on hands and knees, is a little child, a baby.

It appears perfectly happy and contented and seems to be enjoying itself. Not a sound is to be heard, not a shot is fired. Every man has become dumb from amazement.

"A child has fallen from heaven!" cries a soldier near me.

Well, that is about the case, for where else could that child have come from?

Before my weary brain can summon up any convincing reasons how that child got out there—whether some poor mother lost it in the panic due to the battle of the night before—a French soldier jumps out of the trench and runs to where the child is crawling out.

Absolute stillness prevails in the trenches, and only to our right, from which this extraordinary sight is hidden by a clump of trees, is the sound of gunfire heard.

And this spot, which all through the night had been a veritable inferno of shot and shell, is now like some peaceful island or a cool, friendly oasis in a burning desert.

Over there in the enemy's trenches we can see the helmets of the Germans as they peer over the edges. No one is any longer thinking of the enemy or the war or the danger. All eyes are on the soldier and the child which he is approaching. And as he picks up that little frightened, helpless piece of? humanity and fondly takes it in his arms, a laugh, a low friendly laugh, passes along our entire column.

The laugh is infectious, and we can feel how it is going along the ran ksover yonder. And suddenly—what, are they going to shoot?—no, on the contrary, a great wave of applause with shouts of "Bravo!" from thousands of German throats breaks the stillness. Then, as the soldier jumps back into our trenches with the child safely in his arms, our ranks, too, burst into a triumphant shout which passes all along the line.

Even for some time after not a shot is fired. It is as if we felt ashamed of ourselves, and no one touched a gun while that child was in our midst.

When the firing did start again it was rather desultory and indifferent and there was nothing dangerous about it. The little child had worked a wonderful change in the hearts of both friend and foe that morning.

"DONE!"

An innkeeper was boasting to a group of his customers that no one had ever been able to get the better of him, when a stranger entered and, hearing the remark, said to a neighbor, "I'll bet you a sovereign I will do him." "You won't!" said the landlord. "I will!" said the man. "If you'll put a sovereign under that mug and place it on that table, I will take the money without touching the mug." "You won't trick me," said the landlord; "and, to let you see I am not afraid, I will put two—in fact, I will place three sovereigns under it. There you are," he added—"all is ready!" And he stood by with a smile on his face, while the others looked on, eager to see how the scene would end. Leaning under the table, the man extended his hand, and presently withdrew it with three sovereigns in his palm. He showed them all round, to the wonder of everybody. The landlord, getting rather warm in his excitement, caught up the mug, whereupon the stranger picked up the money from the table and walked out amid a shout of laughter!

Catholic Canon Law At Last Codified

Codification of the conon law of the Catholic church, began under the initiative of Pope Pius X in 1904, has been completed. In his allocution to the Sacred College at the consistory of last December, Pope Benedict characterized it as "a work so great and so opportune that through it our age must be celebrated by posterity"

In initiating the work Pius X reserved to himself the prefectship of the commission to which it was intrusted, the senior cardinal to be vice-prefect. The commission was composed of Cardinals Serafino, Vincenzo Vannutelli, Agliardi, Satolli, Rampolla, Gotti, Ferata, Cassetta, Mathieu, Gennari, Cavichioni, Merry del Val, Steinhuber, Vives and Cavagnis. Today, after 13 years, only three of the 15 men survive, namely, Vincenzo Vannutelli, Merry del Val and Cassetta.

Cardinal del Val invited all the bishops in the world to co-operate in the work. Besides, 17 consulters of the commissio n were appointed, but the number was soon increased considerably and 42 consulters attended the first meeting, which was presided over by Archbishop (now Cardinal Gasparri, secretary of the Sacred Congregation of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs.

The new code is comprised in five books, the first being in the nature of a special introduction and explanation of the work. The second book treats of clerics, religious and lay. The third, De Rebus, treats of the sacraments, sacred times and places, benefices, ecclesiastic.l goods, etc. The fourth book, Judiciis, deals with legal procedure in the ecclesiastical courts. The fifth book is entitled De Delictis of Poenis.

The code does not concern the rite and ceremonies of mass, administration of the sacraments or other sacred functions, and leaves untouched all laws and decrees contained in liturgical works approved by church authority. In the main the code is for the Latin church, though in many general matters its laws apply to the Oriental churches as well.

GRAINS OF WISDOM

Never be ashamed to do a kind action to anyone under any circumstances.

As the shadow of the sun is largest when his beams are lowest so we are always least when we make ourselves the greatest.

The richer a man makes his food, the porer he makes his appetite.

If you would be nothing, just wait to be something.

The memory of good actions is a starlight of the soul.

He that is good will become better, and he that is bad, worse; for virtue, vice and time never stop.

Let prayer be the key to morning and the bolt of the evening.

One of the most important rules of the science of manners is an almost absolute silence in regard to yourself.

FEAR

When any kind of fear so takes possession of a man as to destroy or palsy the antipodal quality of courage, then it is that it degenerates into cowardice.

Fear and courage are counterparts in the human character, each needing the other to balance and limit it.

The fear of fire, for example, is absolutely essential to preserve life; but let it be unaccompanied by courage and the pitiable coward crouches in terror while his wife and children perish in the flames.

A genius is a man who manages to live without working.

The Sunday Hour

ARE YOU A PATIENT?

Few among us there are who are not called upon to exercise patience, and few of us have learned to exercise such perfect mental control that we set a perfect example of patience to those around us. Some of us are too full of self-confidence. We depend too much upon our own individual ability to do that which is right. Trivial circumstances cause us to exclaim angrily, "Oh, I've no patience." Yes, but we ought to have patience. Impatience is a sin, and a great one. Many ill-natured acts, many sins, many positive crimes, are simply the result of giving way to impatience; in other words, giing way to vill-temper, for she who is impatient will of necessity be ill-tempered.

By the same rule she who has cultivated the beautiful gift of patience, has also found peace; for peace and patience go hand in hand. Patience, once firmly established, gives a halo of content, for the truly patient do not complain, whatever trials and disappointments await them, and trials and disappointments do await all of us, whatever our station or means.

There is no one individual in this wide world to whom perpetual peace is granted, or perpetual happiness without any troubles or crosses whatever. That is why we should pray for and cultivate the spirit of patience. That is why we should pray for and cultivate the spirit of patience, which enables us to yield to our burdens and trials and be drawn nearer that real peace of the heart which none can wrest from us.

Some of us have many pin-pricks that disturb the equanimity of the spirit and torture us to distraction, until we have learned that patience today, now always, is what we must practice until we have actually acquired the gift.

Great troubles have more power to subdue the spirit and to ring aoubt, if not actual patience, at least resignation, which is, in some instances, akin to patience, but the small vexations of life tempt us to a show of ill-temper and impatience all unawares.

Therefore, it is of these we should beware; for it is un-Christianlike and unlovely to speak harshly to anyone. Patience teaches us to be gentle and kindly at all times. It teaches us charity for the failings of others, and foes far towards making us exercise forbearance and justice towards the erring.

Patience is one of the most beautiful virtues we can possess, and therefore we should strive unceasingly to possess it.

A married man says there is evidently no end to a wife's mind, and he gets a piece of it every day.

Submarine Menace On the Increase

Huns Wreaking Vengeance—Claim They Are Building Subs Faster Than Destroyed.

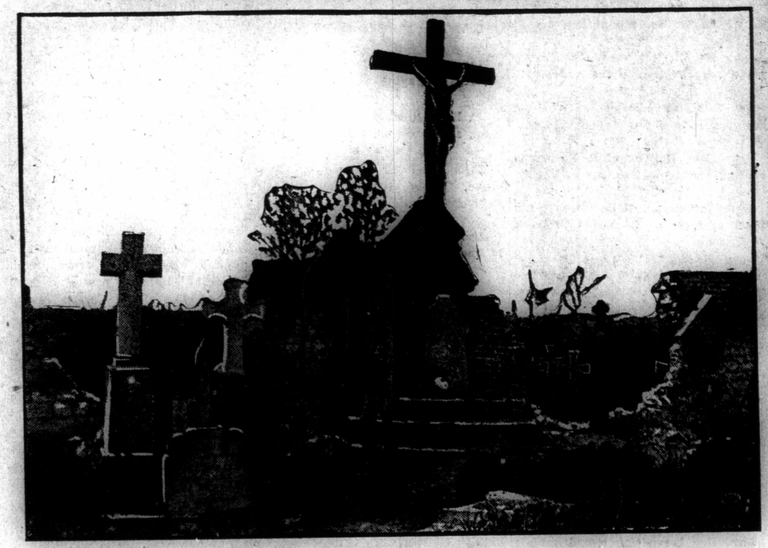
The nation does not yet fully realize the meaning of the destruction wrought of late by the German submarines. The grave consequences of the inability of the admiralty to find an effective remedy for submarine warfare are not yet generally understood.

To a partial degree the German calculations have been right. Today the submarines are a greater menace than the German armies in the field.

All through this war the nation has been told too little, from a mistaken fear of telling the enemy too much. I fully believe in the policy of almost complete silence about the losses inflicted on German submarines, but more might be disclosed with safety about the extent and character of the depletion of our merchant shipping. The Germans are well informed on this point, and we shall not be telling them anything they do not know.

Shortage of Shipping.

It must now be bluntly recognized that most of our present difficulties are due to the shortage of shipping, which has been mainly produced by the depredations of the submarines. Because we are short of ships we are rapidly growing short of everything, but of bread most of all. The stability of the cotton industry of Lancashire is now being threatened, partly from other causes, but chiefly owing to the fact that sufficient ships are not available to bring us raw cotton and to carry Lancashire manufactures to distant oversea markets. The pressure of the submarines slackened a little during May, but is increasing once more, and seems likely to go on increasing.



The Germans admit that our naval forces are destroying some of their submarines, but they claim to be building submarines far more rapidly than we destroy them. It is not at all iman outrageous overcharge on the ground that he needed the money. Now that he has got the money he is ready to spend it.

Lord Rhondda's Principles

Lord Rhondda told a correspondent who went to interview him that he was not in reality an energetic man. In fact, unless he was particularly interested in a thing he was indolent. This means that he must have the gift of becoming greatly interested in whatever problem he has in hand. Asked for a declaration of faith, he said: "I may tell you my religious principles in a nutshell, and I always act up to them. It is a good old world, and I shall be very sorry to go out of it because I do not know what it is going to be in the next. Anyway, I believe in getting as much pleasure and happiness as possible out of this world while you are in it, so long as you do not interfere with the pleasure and happiness of other people. And as a corollary to that I believe in giving as much pleasure as possible to other people, as long as it does not interfere too much with your own enjoyment."

A THOUGHT FOR EACH DAY

Monday

Don't worry over the past. Try to shape the future so that you won't want to worry over it.

Tuesday

How much nicer the world would be if we were only as ready to praise as we are to blame.

Wednesday

The only real harm that misfortune can do is when we allow it to make us bitter and discouraged.

Thursday

People can always be found who are willing to undertake big things; but it is the person who does the small things cheerfully and well that makes life smooth.

Friday

When you visit a friend, try to leave her feeling a little happier than she was before.

Saturday

Cheerfulness is not only a virtue—it is a duty.

Sunday

Sunday was not meant for regrets over the failure of the past week, but for resolutions for the coming one.

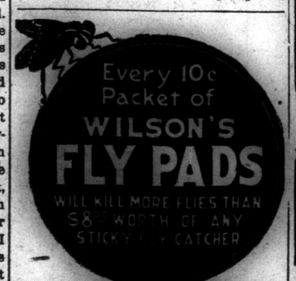
Tag Day Receipts Amount to $1,500

Tag day was quite a success when one takes into consideration some of the obstacles. A great many of the citizens are out and away on their holidays while most of the working men are out haying and preparing for harvesting. However, the taggers and conveners worked faithfully and are well satisfied.

The conveners were Mrs. Harold Riley, Miss Egbert, secretary; Mesdames Robie, Kerby, Geo. Lane, C. R. Edwards, Roberts, Jas. Ruttan, W. B. Nelson, E. F. Harrop, F. M. Black, A. MacWilliams, Broatch, J. Rex Brown, E. H. Riley, A. E. Hume, McElroy and Mrs. Fred Brown in charge of the refreshments. Through the kindness of the Central Methodist church giving the use of the rooms, gas and dishes, the expenses of the day were very small.

This is the first of a series of tag days which the Canadian War Contingent association is putting on to spread over several months.

The receipts for the day were $1,500.

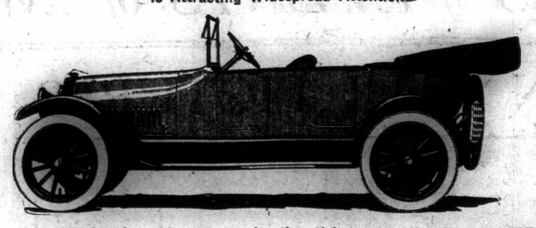


GERALDINE FARRAR IN "JOAN OF ARC" AT ALLEN NEXT MONDAY

Today—in the noise of the charge, the soldiers of France still are led by the spirti of Joan of Arc. Her shining face is seen before them pointing the way to victory across the gaping shell holes and through the driving hail of fire. The French and the English swear that they have seen her—their own incomparable Joan of Arc. And that Joan leads them always to victory!

To us in this country Joan is the greatest woman that ever lived. But to France she is the very life, the very spirit of the nation.

To understand the France of today you must know Joan of Arc and her glorious story—do not miss "Joan the Woman."



A gigantic spectacle in eight parts.

ON WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 15TH, TICKETS FOR CARNIVAL WILL BE DISTRIBUTED TO CONTESTANTS

The Free Auto Offer for Young Ladies Selling Greatest Number of Tickets Is Attracting Widespread Attention

On Wednesday of next week, the tickets for the WIN-THE-WAR CARNIVAL to be held in the Pryce Jones building, September 20th, 21st and 22nd, will be distributed to contestants from the rooms of the Colonel McLeod Chapter, No. 503 Herald building.

The plan, as almost everyone knows, is that the young lady selling the greatest number of tickets for the Carnival, between August 15th and the closing date of the entertainment (September 22nd), will be awarded the huge Studebaker car, now on exhibit in one of the windows of the Pryce Jones building.

Any young lady may compete—the contest is open to all. The tickets sell for $1.00 and each admits two persons to dancing and entertainment.

The net proceeds of the Carnival go toward patriotic work in which the Chapter has expended since the war began over $28,000.

Be sure and get your tickets early on Wednesday and start on your way toward winning the big car. The latter is equipped complete. Electrically lighted and started—enamelled in a deep maroon shade with bronze outlines. One man hood, Stewart speedometer, oil gauge, separate tire carrier, wood spoke wheels, full seven-passenger accommodation.

Women The Play Writers Of Today

Mere Man Has No Chance In New York—Feminine Scenario Writers Have It Their Own Way.

It is beginning to look to the playwrights as though it is necessary to be a perfect lady in order to get a play produced.

The Selwyns announce "Daybreak," by Jane Cowl, as their first offering of the season.

Rachel Crothers has had a play accepted by Cohan & Harris.

"The Land of the Free," in which Florence Nash made her stellar bow at Asbury Park last week, was written by Fannie Hurst and Harriet Ford.

Last season revealed Maude Fulton's talents as a playwright, and it looks as though Dorothy Donnelly has given up acting for good in order to devote all her time to making successes out of almost producible manuscripts.

As for the movies, no mere man can boast a record that beats the achievements of little Anita Loos who has written more than 300 scenarios and had them all filmed.

Then here is Jeanie Macpherson, who is said to be the world's best scenario doctor, and who has turned out scores of original plots for the camera.

Nor can we overlook Marion Davies, who with her photoplay story, "Runaway Romany," not only meets the Misses Loos and Macpherson on their home grounds, but goes them one better by playing the leading role in the picturization of her scenario. "Runaway Romany," so we understand, is now in its finishing stages, and the effulgent Marion will make her screen bow at a Broadway theater some time in September.

FIRST MEMBER TO RECEIVE VETERAN'S JEWEL

An interesting ceremony took place at the regular meeting of the Royal lodge No. 86, I. O. O. F., August 2, in the lodge temple, when one of the members, Bro. W. D. Spence, P. G., who is connected with the Alberta Financial Brokers of this city, was presented with a veteran's jewel by Bro. Henderson, P.G.M., of Alberta jurisdiction. Mr. Spence has been a member for over 25 years, having been transferred from the St. Mary's lodge No. 36, of St. Mary's Ontario. Bro. Spence was the first member of lodge No. 86 to receive this honor.

JACK PICKFORD AND LOUISE HUFF AT ALLEN SOON IN "WHAT MONEY CAN'T BUY"

In a gripping story dealing with the adventures of a vigorous American father and son in a European principality, Jack Pickford and Louise Huff, supported by Theodore Roberts, will be seen at the Allen soon in the Lasky production, "What Money Can't Buy," a photodramatic version by Beulah Marie Dix of George Broadhurst's famous drama.

Having scored such a profound success as co-stars in the Famous Players-Paramount production of "Great Expectations" and Lasky-Paramount production of "Freckles," Jack Pickford and Louise Huff have made themselves the most popular youngsters of the silent drama. In addition to their popularity as co-stars both have proven themselves artists of ability as stars in separate productions.

The story of "What Money Can't Buy" has to do with the adventures of Dick Hale; his father, a wealthy financier; Princess Irenia of Maritzia, and the unscrupulous financier, the King, in his power.

Dick Hale's father is trying to get a concession to build a railroad through the principality, which is opposed by Texler, the king's financier. How the adventurous young American and the young princess fall in love; how he is imprisoned in a lonely castle by his jealous rival; how the princess permits herself and her little brothers to be captured by the American; how affairs are finally straightened out by a brilliant ruse, will naturally have to be seen to be appreciated.

Wallace Reid, Co-starring with Kathlyn Williams in "Big Timber" At the Allen, Next Friday and Saturday

KATHLYN WILLIAMS AND WALLACE REID LAST OF NEXT WEEK

The fact that Kathlyn Williams, the noted Morosco star, and Wallace Reid, the popular young Lasky star, will be seen together at the Allen next Friday and Saturday in the Morosco-Paramount production, "Big Timber," a picturization by Gardner Hunting of Bertrand Sinclair's famous story, is bound to be of unusual importance.

Kathlyn Williams has for some time been one of the most popular actresses on the screen. In her recent productions, "Out of the Wreck," "The Cost of Hatred," with Theodore Roberts, and "The Highway of Hope" with House Peters, she has been placed among the most emotional artists of the country.

Wallace Reid, the vigorous and handsome Lasky star, is now the most popular among the younger actors in the photodrama and in each production adds many more admirers to his thousands.

"Big Timber" is a story of the California lumber camps and all of the scenes were taken high up in the Sierras, in the lumber camp district. How big trees are felled and cut and handled is graphically shown during the action of the story. One of the most unusual scenes is a log chute down the side of the mountain. The big logs are seen skidding down to plunge into the waters of the river, throwing a spray high in the air.

By dint of constant watchfulness, Director Taylor was able to film a natural forest fire raging in the big timber. So great was its headway that the forest rangers ordered the members of the company to aid them in fighting the flames.

The story has to do with the loveless marriage of Stella Benton, a young society girl, and Jack Fyfe, owner of the big timber.

"FORBIDDEN PATHS" AT THE ALLEN NEXT MONDAY AND TUESDAY

It is a well known fact that the Japanese consider it an honor to die for their country and the mikado and that kari-kari is common among unsuccessful generals and admirals in the service of Japan. Therefore "Forbidden Paths," a strongly vital story of a Japanese man and an American maid, is particularly fitting and in keeping with the true character of the Nipponese as the Japanese lover sacrifices his own life to bring happiness to that of the woman he loves.

Winsome Vivian Martin, the delightful screen star, who is sharing the leading honors with Sessue Hayakawa, the noted Japanese artist, was more than delighted at her experience in filming the production. It is the story of a love affair between a Japanese artist and a young American girl. Many of the scenes were taken in a great house leased especially for the purpose where was found a notable collection of rare Japanese prints, embroideries and vases. In several scenes Miss Martin appears in a lavishly embroidered Japanese kimono and at the end of the production its owner, a wealthy collector, presented it to her with his compliments. Altogether the little star says she has made up her mind that next best to America she loves Japan and its pretty, quaint customs.

Sessue Hayakawa having appeared as an East Indian prince in "Each to His Kind," a Hawaiian in "The Bottle Imp," and a Mexican bandit in "The Jaguar's Claw," returns to the role of a Japanese in "Forbidden Paths," his greatest offering to his host of admirers.

GERALDINE FARRAR AS JOAN OF ARC AT ALLEN, FOUR DAYS COMMENCING MONDAY NEXT

Based on the life of the immortal Joan of Arc, a motion picture production in eight parts, entitled "Joan the Woman," will be seen at the Allen four days, commencing Monday.

Although Miss Farrar a year ago acted in three short photoplays under Mr. DeMille's direction at the Lasky studies, "Joan the Woman" will mark her first appearance as the star in a cinema drama of length sufficient to comprise an entertainment unsurpassable.

There is a certain timeliness about the story of Joan of Arc, as it has been frequently from France that public interest in the Maid of Orleans never was so keen as at the present moment. Although the story of "Joan the Woman," written for the screen by Jeanie Macpherson, has been carefully guarded, it is said that Mr. DeMille and Miss Farrar have touched upon this feature of modernism in relating one of the most fascinating stories of mediaevalism.

All the scenes of the picture were made last summer in California, Miss Farrar having spent more than four months in the motion picture colony. As to the historical accuracy of costumes, armor, heraldry, buildings and the personnel, that portion of the production was in the hands of Wilfred Buckland, formerly of the artistic staff of David Belasco. Mr. Buckland and Mr. DeMille for two years have worked side by side in the Lasky studios, and the assembling of material for "Joan the Woman" consumed many months of that time.

"Joan of Arc" lived five hundred years ago, yet the problems she met and mastered, rising in the end to achievements to which no other woman, either before or after, attained, are the problems universal to women of all ages," said Miss Farrar. "It is not as if another Joan of Arc will rise from our midst in this generation to be commander-in-chief of a great nation's army, but in their small way thousands of women in all parts of the world are miniature Joans.

"Joan of Arc more than any woman who ever lived, stood for equality and for woman's place in the world, not only alongside of man, but as the leader of man. What community is there but has its woman leader, its feminine mind that is more far-seeing than the masculine, and more ideastic?

"First of all, Joan stood for principle. Inspired by the 'voices' who talked to her in her dreams, she was determined she had a mission in life to perform. Rebuffed, ridiculed, wounded by word and sword, she clung tenaciously to her purpose. That the world which circumscribes the life activities of the modern woman is more limited than Joan's world does not alter the opportunities of the modern woman to fight and win as she fought and won.

"What finer lesson could Joan of Arc have left behind her for the modern woman to ponder over? How often is heard the statement that tomorrow will be good enough? With Joan there was no tomorrow—everything was today.

A special augmented orchestra has been engaged for this gigantic attraction.

Never before has such a stupendous production played at these prices. Afternoons, children 5c, adults 15c. Evening, children 10c, adults 25c. Reserved seat section 35c.

VARIED PROGRAM OFFERED AT PANTAGES COMING WEEK

A varied program of variety will be offered at Pantages theater for the coming week, commencing with the matinee next Monday afternoon. The headline attraction will be the musical comedy tabloid entitled "Oh, You Devil," featuring Clay Crough, the original devil funmaker, assisted by a bevy of pretty girls in songs and dances. The act is in two scenes representing Hades and a cabaret, the company having fun in both places. Neil McKinley, who is the colonel of the tribe, will leave to the audience to find where he came from, for he does not remember that much himself, all he thinks about now is to make people laugh, and that keeps him so busy that he has time for nothing else.

Charles Mack and company will offer a bright comedy number entitled "A Friendly Call," which is replete with Celtic humor and some clever dancing.

Lane and Harper will present a neat offering of the mirth provoking kind entitled "The Man and the Manicure."

The Demitrescue-Dunham troupe of aerial artists will astound with their seemingly impossible tricks performed in mid air.

The Universal Current Events and a comedy motion picture will complete a very entertaining program of vaudeville which is sure to meet with the approval of every one seeking amusement during next week.

A convincing orator is one who has sense enough to shut up before his audience acquires that tired feling.

H. B. WRIGHT OF THE REGENT GETS INSIGHT INTO FILMING

Mr. H. B. Wright, manager of the Regent theater here, has just returned from a trip to the east. He declares he had the best time he ever had. He was in New York during the height of the war excitement. He saw the Canadian Highlanders there and was in the city on the day that the first drawing of the draft took place. He saw the way the jack tars did their recruiting, witnessed the taking of a huge moving picture production and spoke to the high and mighty men of the moving picture world, and also met some of the moving picture idols.

Mr. Wright was away for exactly one month, but he said he was mighty glad to get back to Calgary, away from temperatures that climb as high as 105 degrees.

Mr. Wright's trip was mainly on business. He went particularly to see the Goldwyn pictures before booking them, and says that he found them even better than anticipated. S. Goldfish, president of the Goldwyn corporation, took him to the studio at Fort Lee, built originally for the Universal pictures. Among others, he met Edgar Selwyn and Margaret Mayo there and also Jane Cowl.

When Mr. Wright and Mr. Goldfish arrived at the studio they were in the midst of one of the final scenes of "Pauline of the Circus." There was nothing to make one think that it was not a real circus with the huge tents, the elephants and other circus animals were borrowed from the Hippodrome and the actors were in their make-ups. Most of the scenes in this picture are night scenes and they are always taken after dark. Mr. Wright himself witnessed one of these scenes taken in the dead of the night, when the circus was brilliantly lit up.

"I saw the bill from Lucille for Jane Cowl, and the gowns used in the production were magnificent, valued at $6,000, I was told," said he. "The Goldwyn pictures are to be shown exclusively at the Regent, while the first four pictures are to be 'Polly of the Circus,' 'Baby Mine,' 'Fighting Odds,' and the 'Spreading Dawn.'"

In addition to the Goldwyn pictures Mr. Wright states that he has also booked a number of the biggest specials of the year, including "On Trial," "The Mask of Life," "The Barrier," "The Demaster." He also secured the Alberta franchise for the exclusive handling in Alberta of the 1918 million dollar Charlie Chaplin pictures.

While at Montreal, Mr. Wright stayed with L. E. Ouimet, general manager of the Pathe film exchange, and a pioneer of the moving picture world in Canada, having opened the first moving picture house in Montreal. From there he went to Toronto where he concluded his business with N. L. Nathanson, general manager of the Goldwyn pictures in Canada.

THINGS WORTH KNOWING.

Noah Webster started with 70,000 words. That was in 1828, when the first edition of his dictionary was published. In the next edition, that of 1864, the list had grown to 114,000. Noah had died in the meantime, but his heirs and assigns continued his work. In 1890 a total of 175,000 words were listed. Since then the number has more than doubled—it is now about 400,000.

Of course, nobody could be expected to learn all those words, nor is it necessary. Whenever, in your reading, you come across a word the meaning of which is not entirely clear to you, drop your book or newspaper, as the case may be, and consult the dictionary. Don't delay; if you do probably you will never look the word up. It is surprising how many words one may add to one's vocabulary by this simple method.

BY

JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD

SYNOPSIS OF FORMER CHAPTERS

In which Kazan, the wolf dog, is introduced to the readers of this story. Thorpe and his wife are living at one of the far Canadian settlements and Thorpe has just returned with Kazan, that he has picked up on his travels.

Kazan had never known the touch of a hand until Thorpe's wife caressed him for bringing her husband safely home. The touch was so strange and soothing that Kazan immediately became her devoted slave.

Sad to relate Thorpe did not understand Kazan in too close proximity he became alarmed and grabbed a club and struck Kazan believing that Kazan intended to bite her.

Kazan became domesticated under the soothing influence of Thorpe's wife and all went well until one of the desperadoes of the wilds came to Thorpe's hut. Kazan evidently recognized the ruffian McCready and snarled at him. cCready likewise thought he knew Kazan but under another name, and he later tested him and found that he did.

During the evening McCready drinks heavily and a devil made plan is hatched in his mind. He wakes up Thorpe on a pretence that some one is about and they go out looking for the prowler. McCready gets Thorpe to hold the lantern and they disappear in the darkness. When McCready returns Thorpe is not with him. Kazan sees him come back and wonders at Thorpe's failure to return.

McCready then goes into the hut with a dep laid plan in his drunken head. Thorpe's wife screams on his appearance, caling for Kazan. Kazan is tied tight with an iron chain but on hearing his mistress scream he makes several attempts and finally breaks the chain, bounds into the hut and leaps upon the ruffian and buries his fangs into McCready's throat until he feels the warm blood oozing therefrom. Thorpe's wife tries to pull Kazan off and finally faints in the ordeal. Now go on with the story.

Kazan looks up after attacking McCready and sees Thorpe approaching with a club in his hand. He remembers the last licking he had from Thorpe and so he flies in terror.

When Thorpe hears how Kazan has saved his wife he is almost overcome and they jointly go out to hunt for Kazan, but Kazan does not understand and the nearer that Thorpe approaches the faster does Kazan fly away.

In his flight he runs across the pack and the desire for companionship overcomes his training and he joins the band of wolfs.

The leader of the band disputes Kazan's admittance to the pack and a fight ensues in which Kazan is victorious, but wounded. A she-wolf attracted by his wonderful fighting ability comes to him and helps him to his feet. He recovers and goes off into the great forest, followed by the she-wolf. When he stops and the other draws up beside him he feels the same thrill that he experienced when the girl touched him.

For months they traveled together finding company in each other till one day they saw a man coming in a sled, with the result that Gray Wolf was wounded in the leg. For days they lived in the woods, when finally they went on, finding a trail—man-trail. Kazan with his call soon brought to his assistance a whole pack of wolves and they were off to vengeance.

They came upon the sleigh, fought the dogs and lost several of their number under the rifle fire. Kazan had nearly finished with dogs and man when he noticed the girl in the sleigh. Everything changed suddenly and Kazan and Gray Wolf supported the occupants of the sleigh. It was the girl that saved the day.

When Pierre Radisson, who was the owner of the sleigh, discussed the recent fight with his daughter, he concluded that Kazan had helped them. He also knew that the brave wolf was seriously wounded so he struck out on the trail and finally came upon the wounded Kazan. He wanted to touch the wounded dog but the snaps kept him away so he left, only to return with the girl. Joan moved closer and Kazan felt a new thrill. till finally he drew up beside her. When she saw the wounds on the dog's leg she asked Pierre to help her take Kazan to the camp.

Now go on with the story.

"I guessed that much," replied Radisson. "For that reason I brought the blanket. Mon Dieu, listen to that!"

From the darkness of the forest there came a low wailing cry.

Kazan lifted his head and a trembling whine answered in his throat. It was Gray Wolf calling to him.

It was a miracle that Pierre Radisson should put the blanket about Kazan, and carry him in to the camp, without scratch or bite. It was this miracle that he achieved, with Joan's arm resting on Kazan's shaggy neck as she held one end of the blanket. They laid him down close to the fire, and after a little it was the man again who brought warm water and washed away the blood from the torn leg, and then put something on it that was soft and warm and soothing, and finally bound a cloth about it.

All this was strange and new to Kazan. Pierre's hand, as well as the girl's, stroked his head. It was the man who brought him a gruel of meal and tallow, and urged him to eat, while Joan sat with her chin in her two hands, looking at the dog, and talking to him. After this, when he was quite comfortable, and no longer afraid, he heard a strange small cry from the furry bundle on the sledge that brought his head up with a jerk.

Joan saw the movement, and heard the low answering whimper in his throat. She turned quickly to the bundle, talking and cooing to it as she took it in her arms, and then she pulled back the bearskin so that Kazan could see. He had never seen a baby before, and Joan held it out before him, so that he could look straight at it and see what wonderful creature it was. Its little pink face stared steadily at Kazan. Its tiny fists reached out, and it made queer little sounds at him, and then suddenly it kicked and screamed with delight and laughed. At those sounds Kazan's whole body relaxed, and he dragged himself to the girl's feet.

"See, he likes the baby!" she cried. "Mon pere, we must give him a name. What shall it be?"

"Wait till morning for that," replied the father. "It is late, Joan. Go into the tent, and sleep. We have no dogs now, and will travel slowly. So we must start early."

With her hand on the tent-flap, Joan turned.

"He came with the wolves," she said. "Let us call him Wolf." With one arm she was holding the little Joan. The other she stretched out to Kazan. "Wolf! Wolf!" she called softly.

Kazan's eyes were on her. He knew that she was speaking to him, and he drew himself a foot toward her.

"He knows it already!" she cried. "Good night, mon pere."

For a long hime after she had gone into the tent, old Pierre Raddisson sat on the edge of the sledge, facing the fire, with Kazan at his feet. Suddenly the silence was broken again by Gray Wolf's lonely howl deep in the forest. Kazan lifted his head and whined.

"She's calling for you, boy," said Pierre understandingly.

He coughed, and clutched a hand to his breast, where the pain seemed rending him.

"Frost-bitten lung," he said, speaking straight at Kazan. "Got it early in the winter, up at Fond du Lac. Hope we'll get home—in time—with the kids."

In the loneliness and emptiness of the big northern wilderness one falls into the habit of talking to one's self. But Kazan's head was alert, and his eyes watchful, so Pierre spoke to him.

"We've got to get them home, and there's only you and me to do it," he said, twisting his beard. Suddenly he clenched his fists.

His hollow racking cough convulsed him again.

"Home!" he panted, clutching his chest. "It's eighty miles straight north—to the Churchill—and I pray to God we'll get there—with the kids—before my lungs give out."

He rose to his feet, and staggered a little as he walked. There was a collar about Kazan's neck, and he chained him to the sledge. After that he dragged three or four small logs upon the fire, and went quietly into the tent where Joan and the baby were already asleep. Several times that night Kazan heard the distant voice of Gray Wolf calling for him, but something told him that he must not answer it now. Toward dawn Gray Wolf came close in to the camp, and for the first time Kazan replied to her.

His howl awakened the man. He came out of the tent, peered for a few moments up at the sky, built up the fire, and began to prepare breakfast. He patted Kazan on the head, and gave him a chunk of meat. Joan came out a few moments later, leaving the baby asleep in the tent. She ran up and kissed Pierre, and then dropped down on her knees beside Kazan, and talked to him almost as he had heard her talk to the baby. When she jumped up to help her father, Kazan followed her, and when Joan saw him standing firmly upon his legs she gave a cry of pleasure.

It was a strange journey that began into the North that day. Pierre Radisson emptied the sledge of everything but the tent, blankets, food and the furry nest for baby Joan. Then he harnessed himself in the traces and dragged the sledge over the snow. He coughed incessantly.

"It's a cough I've had half the winter," lied Pierre, careful that Joan saw no sign of blood on his lips or beard. "I'll keep in the cabin for a week when we get home."

Even Kazan, with that strange beast knowledge which man, unable to explain calls instinct, knew that what he said was not the truth. Perhaps it was largely because he had heard other men cough like this, and that for generations his sledge-dog ancestors had heard men cough as Radisson coughed—and had learned what followed it.

More than once he had scented death in tepees and cabins, which he had not entered, and more than once he had sniffed at the mystery of death that was not quite present, but near—just as he had caught at a distance the subtle warning of storm and of fire. And that strange thing seemed to be very near to him now, as he followed at the end of his chain behind the sledge. It made him restless, and half a dozen times, when the sledge stopped, he sniffed at the bit of humanity buried in the bearskin. Each time that he did this Joan was quickly at his side, and twice she patted his scarred and grizzled head until every drop of blood in his body leaped riotously with a joy which his body did not reveal.

This day the chief thing that he came to understand was that the little creature on the sledge was very precious to the girl who stroked his head and talked to him, and that it was very helpless. He learned, too, that Joan was most delighted, and that her voice was softer and thrilled him more deeply, when he paid attention to that little, warm, living thing in the bearskin.

For a long time after they made camp Pierre Radisson sat beside the fire. To-night he did not smoke. He stared straight into the flames. When at last he rose to go into the tent with the girl and the baby, he bent over Kazan and examined his hurt.

"You've got to work in the traces tomorrow, boy," he said. "We must make the river by tomorrow night. If we don't—"

He did not finish. He was choking back one of thise tearing coughs when the tent-flap dropped behind him. Kazan lay stiff and alert, his eyes filled with a strange anxiety. He did not like to see Radisson enter the tent, for stronger than ever there hung that oppressive mystery in the air about him, and it seemed to be a part of Pierre.

Three times that night he heard faithful Grey Wolf calling for him deep in the forest, and each time he answered her. Toward dawn she came in close to camp. Once he caught the scent of her when she circled around in the wind, and he tugged and whined at the end of his chain, hoping that she would come in and lie down at his side. But no sooner had Raddisson moved in the tent than Gray Wolf was gone. The man's face was thinner, and his eyes were redder this morning. It was like a wheeze, as if something had given way inside, and before the girl came out he clutched his hands often at his throat. Joan's face whitened when she saw him. Anxiety gave way to fear in her eyes. Pierre Radisson laughed when she flung her arms about him, and coughed to prove that what he said was true.

"You see the cough is not so bad, my Joan," he said. "It is breaking up. You can not have forgotten, ma cheri? It always leaves one red-eyed and and weak."

It was a cold bleak dark day that followed, and through it Kazan and the man tugged at the fore of the sledge, with Joan following in the trail behind. Kazan's wound no longer hurt him. He pulled steadily with all his splendid strength, and the man never lashed him once, but patted him with his mittened hand on head and back. The day grew steadily darker and in the tops of the trees there was the low moaning of a storm.

Darkness and the coming of the storm did not drive Pierre Raddisson into camp. "We must reach the river," he said to himself over and over again. "We must reach the river—we must reach the river—" And he steadily urged Kazan on to greater effort, while his own strength at the end of the traces grew less.

It had begun to storm when Pierre stopped to build a fire at noon. The snow fell straight down in a white deluge so thick that it hid the tree trunks fifty yards away. Pierre laughed when Joan shivered and snuggled close up to him with the baby in her arms. He waited only an hour, and then fastened Kazan in the traces again, and buckled the straps once more about his own waist. In the silent gloom that was almost night Pierre carried his compass in his hand, and at last, late in the afternoon, they came to a break in the timber line, and ahead of them lay a plain, across which Radisson pointed an exultant hand.

"There's the river, Joan," he said, his voice faint and husky. "We can camp here now and wait for the storm to pass."

Under a thick clump of spruce he put up the tent, and then began gathering fire-wood. Joan helped him. As soon as they had boiled coffee and eaten a supper of meat and toasted biscuits, Joan went into the tent and dropped exhausted on her thick bed of balsam boughs, wrapping herself and the baby up close in the skins and blankets. Tonight she had no word for Kazan. And Pierre was glad that she was too tired to sit beside the fire and talk. And yet—zKazan's alert eyes saw Pierre start suddenly. He rose from his seat on the sledge and went to the tent. He drew back the flap and thrust in his head and shoulders.

"Asleep, Joan?" he asked.

"Almost, father. Won't you please come—soon?"

"After I smoke," he said. "Are you comfortable?"

"Yes. I'm so tired—and—sleepy—"

Pierre laughed softly. In the darkness he was gripping at his throat.

"We're almost home, Joan. That is our river out there—the Little Beaver. If I should run away and leave you tonight you could follow it right to our cabin. It's only forty miles. Do you hear?"

"Yes—I know—"

"Forty miles—straight down the river. You couldn't lose yourself, Joan. Only you'd have to be careful of air-holes in the ice."

"Won't you come to bed, father? You're tired—and almost sick."

"Yes—after I smoke," he repeated. "Joan, will you keep reminding me tomorrow of the air-holes? I might forget. You can always tell them, for the snow and the crust over them are whiter than that on the rest of the ice, and like a sponge. Will you remember—the air-holes—"

"Yes-s-s-s—"

Pierre dropped the tent-flap and returned to the fire. He staggered as he walked.

"Good night, boy," he said. "Guess I'd better go in with the kids. Two days more—forty miles—two days—"

Kazan watched him as he entered the tent. He laid his weight against the end of his chain until the collar shut off his wind. His legs and back twitched. In that tent where Radisson had gone were Joan and the baby. He knew that Pierre would not hurt them, but he knew also that with Pierre Radisson something terrible and impending was hovering very near to them. He wanted the man outside—by the fire—where he could lie still, and watch him.

In the tent there was silence. Nearer to him than before came Gray Wolf's cry. Each night she was calling earlier, and coming closer to the camp. He wanted her very near to him tonight, but he did not even whine in response. He dared not break that strange silence in the tent. He lay still for a long time, tired and lame from the day's journey, but sleepless. The fire burned lower; the wind in the tree-tops died away; and the thick gray clouds rolled like a massive curtain from under the skies. The stars began to glow white and metallic, and from far in the North there came faintly a crisping moaning sound, like steel sleigh-runners running over frosty snow—the mysterious monotone of the Northern Lights. After that it grew steadily and swiftly colder.

Tonight Gray Wolf did not compass herself by the direction of the wind. She followed like a sneaking shadow over the trail Pierre Radisson had made, and when Kazan heard her again, long after midnight, he lay with his head erect, and his body rigid, save for a curious twitching of his muscles. There was a new note in Gray Wolf's voice, a wailing not in which there was more than the mate-call. It was The Message. And at the sound of it Kazan rose from out of his silence and his fear, and with his head turned straight up to the sky he howled as the wild dogs of the North howl before the tepees of masters who are newly dead.

Pierre Radisson was dead.

CHAPTER VII.

Out of the Blizzard

It was dawn when the baby snuggled close to Joan's warm breast and awakened her with its cry of hunger. She opened her eyes, brushed back the thick hair from her face, and could see where the shadowy form of her father was lying at the other side of the tent. He was very quiet, and she was pleased that he was still sleeping. She knew that the day before he had been very near to exhaustion, and so for half an hour longer she lay uqiet, coing softly to the baby Joan. Then she arose cautiously, tucked the baby in the warm blankets and furs, put on her heavier garments, and went outside.

By this time it was broad day, and she breathed a sigh of relief when she saw that the storm had passed. It was bitterly cold. It seemed to her that she had never known it to be so cold in all her life. The fire was completely out. Kazan was huddled in a round ball, his nose tucked under his body. He raised his head, shivering, as Joan came out. With her heavy moccasined foot Joan scattered the ashes and charred sticks where the fire had been. There was not a spark left. In returning to the tent she stopped for a moment beside Kazan, and patted his shaggy head.

"Poor Wolf!" she said. "I wish I had given you one of the bearskins!"

She threw back the tent-flap and entered. For the first time she saw her father's face in the light—and outside, Kazan heard the terrible moaning cry that broke from her lips. No one could have looked at Pierre Radisson's face once—and not have understood.

After that one agonizing cry, Joan flung herself upon her father's breast, sobbing so softly that even Kazan's sharp ears heard no sound. She remained there in her grief until every vital of energy of womanhood and motherhood in her girlish body was roused to action by the wailing cry of baby Joan. Then she sprang to her feet and ron out through the tent opening. Kazan tugged at the end of his chain to meet her, but she saw nothing of him now. The terror of the wilderness is greater than that of death, and in an instant it had fallen upon Joan. It was not because of fear for herself. It was the baby. The wailing cries from the tent pierced her like knife-thrusts.

And then, all at once, there came to her what old Pierre had said the night before—his words about the river, the air-holes, the home forty miles away. "You couldn't lose yourself, Joan." He had guessed what might happen.

She bundled the baby deep in the furs and returned to the fire-bed. Her one thought now was that they must have fire. She made a little pile of birch-bark, covered it with half-burned bits of wood, and went into the tent for the matches. Pierre Radisson carried them in a waterproof box in a pocket of his bearskin coat. She sobbed as she kneeled beside again, and obtained the box. As the fire flared up she added other bits of wood, and then some of the larger pieces that Pierre had dragged into camp. The fire gave her courage. Forty miles—and the river led to their home! She must make that, with the baby and wolf. For the first time she turned to him, and spoke his name as she put her hand on his head. After that she gave him a chunk of meat which she thawed out over the fire, and melted the snow for tea. She was not hungry, but she recalled how her father had made her eat four or five times a day, so she forced herself to make a breakfast of a biscuit, a shred of meat and as much hot tea as she could drink.

The terrible hour she dreaded followed that. She wrapped blankets closely about her father's body, and tied them with babiche cord. After that she piled all the furs and blankets that remained on the sledge close to the fire, and snuggled baby Joan deep down in them. Pulling down the tent was a task. The ropes were stiff and frozen, and when she had finished, one of her hands was bleeding. She piled the tent on the sledge, and then, half covering her face, turned and looked back.

Pierre Radisson lay on his balsam bed, with nothing over him now but the gray sky and the spruce-tops. Kazan stood stiff-legged and sniffed the air. His spine bristled when Joan went back slowly and kneeled beside the blanket-wrapped object. When she returned to him her face was white and tense, and now there was a strange and terrible look in her eyes as she stared out across the barren. She put him in the traces, and fastened about her slender waist the strap that Pierre had used. Thus they struck out for the river, floundering knee-deep in the freshly fallen and drifted snow. Half-way Joan stumbled in a drift and fell, her loose hair flying in a shimmering veil over the snow. With a mighty lull Kazan was at her side, and his cold muzzle touched her face as she drew herself to her feet. For a moment Joan took his shaggy head between her two hands.

"Wolf!" she moaned. "Oh, Wolf!"

She went on, her breath coming pantingly now, even from her brief exertion. The snow was not so deep on the ice of the river. But a wind was rising. It came from the north and east, straight in her face, and Joan bowed her head as she pulled with Kazan. Half a mile down the river she stopped, and no longer could she repress the hopelessness that rose to her lips in a sobbing choking cry. Forty miles! She clutched her hands at her breast, and stood breathing like one who had been beaten, her back to the wind. The baby was quiet, Joan went back and peered down under the furs, and what she saw there spurred her on again almost firecely. Twice she stumbled to her knees in the drifts during the next quarter of a mile.

After that there was a stretch of wind-swept ice, and Kazan pulled the sledge alone. Joan walked at his side. There was a pain in her chest. A thousand needles seemed pricking her face, and suddenly she remembered the thermometer. She exposed it for a time on the top of the tent. When she loked at it a few minutes later it was thirty degrees below zero. Forty miles! And her father had told her that she could make it—and could not lose herself! But she did not know that even her father would have been afraid to face the north that day, with the temperature at thirty below, and a moaning wind bringing the warning of a blizzard.

The timber was far behind her now. Ahead there was nothing but the pitiless barren, and the timber beyond that was hidden by the gray gloom of the day. If there had been trees, Joan's heart would not have choked so with terror. But there was nothing—nothing but that gray ghostly gloom, with the rim of the sky touching the earth a mile away.

The snow grew heavy under her feet again. Always she was watching for those treacherous, frost-coated traps in the ice her father had spoken of. But she found now that all the ice and snow looked like to her, and that there was a growing pain back of her eyes. It was the intense cold.

The river widened into a small lake, and here the wind struck her in the face with such force that her weight was taken from the strap, and Kazan dragged the sledge alone. A few inches of snow impeded her as much as a foot rad done before. Little by little she dropped back. Kazan forged to her side, every ounce of his magnificent strenth in the traces. By the time they were on the river channel again, Joan was at the back of the sledge, following in the trail made by Kazan. She was powerless to help him. She felt more and more the leaden weight weight of her legs. There was but one hope—and that was the forest. If they did not reach it soon, within half an hour, she would be able to go no further. Over and over again she moaned a prayer for her baby as she struggled on. She fell in the snow-drifts. Kazan and the sledge became only a dark blotch to her. And then, all at once, she saw that they were leaving her. They were not more than twenty feet ahead of her—but the blotch seemed to be a vast distance away. Every bit of life and strength in her body was now bent upon reaching the sledge—and baby Joan.

It seemed an interminable time before she gained. With the sledge only six feet ahead of her she struggled for what seemed to her to be an hour before she could reach out and touch it. With a moan she flung herself forward, and fell upon it. She no longer heard the wailing of the storm. She no longer felt discomfort. With her face in the furs under which baby Joan was buried, there came to her with swiftness and joy a vision of warmth and home. And then the vision faded away, and was followed by deep night.

Kazan stopped in the trail. He came back then and sat down upon his haunches beside her, waiting for her to move and speak. But she was very still. He thrust his nose into her loose hair. A whine rose in his throat, and suddenly he raised his head and sniffed in the face of the wind. Something came to him with that wind. He muzzled Joan again, but she did not stir. Then he went forward, and stood in his traces, ready for the pull, and looked back at her. She did not move or speak, and Kazan's whine gave place to a sharp excited bark.

The strange thing in the wind came to him stronger for a moment. He began topull. The sledge-runners had frozen to the snow, and it took every ounce of his strength to free them. Twice during the next five minutes he stopped and sniffed the air. The third time that he halted, in a drift of snow, he returned to Joan's side again, and whined to awaken her. Then he tugged again at the end of his traces, and foot by foot he dragged the sledge through the drift. Beyond the drift there was a stretch of clear ice, and here Kazan rested. During a lull in the wind the scent came to him stronger than before.

At the end of the clear ice was a narrow break in the shore, where a creek ran into the main stream. If Joan had been conscious she would have urged him straight ahead. But Kazan turned into the break, and for ten minutes he struggled through the snow without a rest, whining more and more frequently, until at last the whine broke into a joyous bark. Ahead of him, close to the creek, was a small cabin. Smoke was rising out of the chimney. It was the scent of smoke that had come to him in the wind. A hard level slope reached to the cabin door, and with the last strength that was in him Kazan dragged his burden up that. Then he settled himself back beside Joan, lifted his shaggy head to the dark sky and howled.

A moment later the door opened. A man came out. Kazan's reddened, snow-shot eyes followed him watchfully as he ran to the sledge. He heard his startled exclamation as he bent over Joan. In another lull of the wind there came from out of the mass of furs on the sledge the wailing, half-smothered voice of baby Joan.

A deep sigh of relief heaved up from Kazan's chest. He was exhausted. His strength was gone. His feet were torn and bleeding. But the voice of baby Joan filled him with a strange happiness, and he lay down in his traces, while the man carried Joan and the baby into the life and warmth of the cabin.

A few minutes later the man reappeared. He was not old, like Pierre Radisson. He came close to Kazan, and loked down at him.

"My God," he said. "And you did that— alone!"

He bent down fearlessly, unfastened him from the traces, and led him toward the cabin door. Kazan hesitated but once—almost on the threshold. He turned his head, swift and alert. From out of the moaning and wailing of the storm it seemed to him that for a moment he had heard the voice of Gray Wolf.

Then the cabin door closed behind him.

Back in a shadowy corner of the cabin he lay, while the man prepared something over a hot stove for Joan. It was a long time before Joan rose from the cot on which the man had placed her. After that Kazan heard her sobbing; and then the man made her eat, and for a time they talked. Then the stranger hung up a big blanket in front of the bunk, and sat down close to the stove. Quietly Kazan slipped along the wall, and crept under the bunk. For a long time he could hear the sobbing breath of the girl. Then all was still.

The next morning he slipped out through the door when the man opened it, and sped swiftly into the forest. Half a mile away he found the trail of Gray Wolf, and called to her. From the frozen river came her reply, and he went to her.

Vainly Gray Wolf tried to lure him back into their old haunts—away from the cabin and the scent of man. Late that morning the man harnessed his dogs, and from the fringe of the forest Kazan saw him tuck Joan and the baby among the furs on the sledge, as old Pierre had done. All that day he folowed in the trail of the team, with Gray Wolf slinking behind him. They traveled until dark; and then, under the stars and the moon that had followed the storm, the man still urged on his team. It was deep in the night when they came to another cabin, and the man beat upon the door. A light, the opening of the door, the joyous welcome of the man's voice, Joan's sobbing cry—Kazan heard these from the shadows in which were hidden, and then slipped back to Gray Wolf.

A PAGE FOR THE BOYS AND GIRLS

ROBERTS DREAM

(By Dora Hardy Killam)

ROBERT threw himself down in the shade of the big chestnut tree and wiped his perspiring face with his handkerchief.

"It's awful hot," he said, "an' chasing squirrels makes a fellow tired. It's fun to see 'em run an' jump."

It was very quiet under the chestnut tree and up among the boughs a little vireo chanted, "You see, you hear, you understand," over and over again. Robert had just decided that he would go to the house and ask mamma for a cookie and get his bicycle, when a funny chattering voice said, "Oh, here's a fine fat little boy! Let's make him run."

"Won't that be fun?" cried another chattering voice.

"Let's throw chestnut burrs at him," chattered many voices.

Robert looked about him and to his surprise found he was surrounded by squirrels. But such squirrels! They were much bigger than he, and he saw that they had immense chestnut burrs in their paws. Before he could speak to them or even shout, they began to pelt him with the burrs. The burrs pricked his face, stung his hands, and clung to his legs.

"Run!" shouted the squirrels, "we want to see you run."

Faster and faster came the chestnut burrs and louder and louder grew the chattering, and Robert ran and ran but always in a circle.

"It's great sport to make fat little boys run," chattered the giant leader.

Somehow, Robert had lost his shoes and stockings and oh, how the burrs hurt his feet! He tried to call his mother but he could make no sound and he began to wonder if he could run another step when all the squirrels chattered "Jump!" For a second he hesitated, but he heard a mighty chattering of "Jump! Jump." and the terrible burrs pelted him.

Robert made a leap and felt himself falling and then he heard his mother say, "Here is Robert asleep with his feet all cramped under him and a green chestnut burr in his hand. It must have dropped and he closed his hand over it."

"No," said Robert, rubbing his eyes, "the squirrels threw them at me."

Mamma laughed and said that he had been dreaming. That night when mamma and papa went to kiss Robert good-night, Robert said, "I won't make the squirrels run and jump any more. I guess they don't like it."

possible that their claim is well founded. They have set us various problems in this war which we have either not solved at all or have only very partially solved. The submarine campaign is one of the problems which we have not solved at all.

In certain circles there seems to be a disposition to say rather helplessly that the submarine question is incapable of solution. I decline to admit this contention. There is some answer and some remedy for every new method of warfare. Human brains found out the way to attack under water, and human brains can assuredly find out the best means of counter-attack.

If the shipping losses continue at their present average weekly rate we shall not be long before we reach a position from which we may not be able to recover.

A BIT OF PHILOSOPHY FROM A POOR MAN'S WEALTH BY JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY

A poor man? Yes, I must confess—
No wealth of gold do I possess;
No pastures fine, with grazing kine,
Nor fields of waving grain are mine;
No foot of fat or fallow land
Where rightfully my feet may stand
The while I claim it as my own—
By deed and title, mine alone.

Ah, poor indeed! perhaps you say—
But spare me your compassion, pray!—
A poor man? Yes, I must confess—
No wealth of gold do I possess;
No pastures fine, with grazing kine,
Nor fields of waving grain are mine;
But ah, my friend! I've wealth, no end!
For millionaires might condescend
To bend the knee and envy me
This opulence of poverty.

French Armies Now Number 3,000,000

France Maintains at Maximum Her Strength, Her Means and Her Will as Announced by High Commissioner of French Republic.

American papers have been rather erroneous in giving out statistics regarding the French armies and general standing of France. They haven't given credit to France for the advancement which she has made since the beginning of the war. According to Andre Tardieu, high commissioner of the French republic, the strength of the nation now present in the zone of the armies above shows that the maximum figure has been reached during the war.

This figure, which amounts to a little less than 3,000,000 men, exceeds by over a million the number of men actually engaged in the war at the beginning. But there are even more when one takes into consideration the number in the interior and colonies. With sufficient resources from the metropolitan and colonial depots, she is able to keep at a standard her strength, by reason that under better command and instruction more men are trained and less killed in combat. The following figure will give one an idea of the remarkable economy applied since the war. Sir Cook, of Galveston to Progressive

FARMERS GETTING HIGHEST PRICES

The coming fall promises to give the farmer and rancher the highest prices for his products ever known in the history of Canada. The wheat and oil market is already at the top point with indications for further advance, now that the embargo on wheat has been lifted, while the livestock market prices are the highest that have ever been quoted in the history of the Calgary stockyards.

four kilometers while a French division holds an average front of five kilometers—one-sixth more.

The artillery equipment has been increasing gradually; since the beginning they had "75's" galore; the number constantly increased till now it is adequate for her needs. In August, 1914, France had 300 heavy artillery guns grouped in the different regiments, while in June, 1917, she had 6,000, most of which were modern. Summing things up she has one gun for eight meters in the sector of attack. The output in munitions was arranged in August, 1914, for 13,000 shots of "75's" a day. At present it is arranged for 250,00 shots of "75's" and 100,000 shots of heavy guns. These figures show that in spite of the fact that France has been fighting constantly, she has at the same time created new industries in order to maintain her means.

If you consider, on another side, the weight of the projectiles shot on the German trenches during one of the recent offensives you will find the following figures for the lineal meter:

	Kilograms
Field artillery	427
Trench artillery	283
Heavy artillery	706
High power artillery	125
Total	1,441

The monthly expenditure in ammunition for "75's" was:

	Francs
July, 1916	4,000,000
September, 1916	7,000,000
October, 1916	8,000,000

During the last offensive the expenditure was 12,000,000 shots of all calibers.

It ought be interesting to note that also the completely transformed and re-armed Belgian, Serbian and Greek armies and the gifts sent by the United States to the allies.

France has expended since the beginning of the war the following sums:

	Francs
1914	8,000,000,000
1915	12,000,000,000
1916	22,000,000,000
1917	10,000,000,000
Total	52,000,000,000

France received from foreign countries, from August 1, 1914, to January, 1917, 6,000,000,000 francs, and during that period she loaned to several allied governments 4,000,000,000 francs.

If France with only 38,000,000 people and a country invaded several times can give such astounding figures, it must be because of the strict discipline which she forced upon the necessary resources. This discipline is a proof of strength. However the ordeal has veen very severe, but the national energy has been stronger, and now she is prepared for the last blow, to do her part in company with

Crop Forcast Of U. S. Government

Yield According to Report Very Satisfactory—Enormous Corn Harvest.

The U. S. Agriculture Department, in reporting on the crops, forecasted a total wheat production this year of 653,000,000 bushels, compared with 687,000,000 the forecast a month ago, and 636,000,000, the average production from 1911 to 1915.

The condition of spring wheat on Aug. 1 was estimated at 88.7 per cent., compared with 92.6 a month previous, and 76.9 the 10-year average. The forecast for spring wheat production was 230,000,000 bushels, and winter wheat production 422,000,000 bushels.

The condition of corn on Aug. 1 was 79.3 per cent, compared with 79.9 July 1 and 79.4 per cent., the 10-year average, on Aug. 1.

Corn production was forecasted as 3,120,000,000 bushels, compared with 3,159,000,000 bushels, the July forecast, and 2,994,000,000 bushels the 1911-1915 average.

The condition of other leading crops and the estimated production follow:

Oats, 77.3 per cent., 1,540,000,000 bushels; barley, 77.2 per cent., 231,000,000 bushels; rye, 92 per cent., 37,000,000 bushels; buckwheat, 92.3 per cent., 13,000,000 bushels; white potatoes, 87.3 per cent., 400,000,000 bushels; sweet potatoes, 91.6 per cent., 64,000,000 bushels; flax, 84.6 per cent., 12,000,000 bushels; rice, 91 per cent., 24,000,000 bushels; hay, 81.4 per cent., 100,000,000 tons.

The total production of apples was estimated at 222,000,000 bushels, compared with 214,000,000, the 1911-1915 average.

The peach crop was forecasted as 42,700,000 bushels, compared with 49,000,000, the five-year average.

The acreage of the above crops, excluding apples and peaches, is 367,716,000, compared with 327,352,000 in 1916 and 326,660,000 in 1915.

Canada's Growth

In the first census year after confederation, 1871, Canada's total production of grain crops was only 71,000,000 bushels, with a valuation of about $50,000,000. In 1916, the total value of our agricultural products was $841,000,000, and that was a somewhat off year in production, though prices were high. At confederation, the cheese industry was just making a beginning, the first co-operative cheese factory having been established in 1864. Today, the annual output of cheese is 200,000,000 pounds, with a value of close to $40,000,000, based upon present prices. The value of Canada exports in 1868-70 was $13,000,000. In 1916-17, they are valued at $480,000,000. These figures tell a remarkable story of agricultural progress and development, which is coincident with the progress and development of Canada as a whole.

That the future of Canada is closely related to the future of agriculture can be easily demonstrated. Notwithstanding all the progress Canadian agriculture has made since confederation less than one-quarter of the land available for agriculture is occupied today, or about 110,000,000 acres. And only about 50,000,000 acres out of the 110,000,000 occupied area have been improved. There is estimated at the present time to be 100,000,000 acres available for immediate improvement. That is, if more of our people settled on the land, or if sufficient people could be brought in from other countries, 100,000,000 acres could be immediately brought under the plow and made available for agricultural production.

U. F. A. WILL SPEND MILLIONS

The amalgamation of the United Farm Growers, Ltd., which goes into effect on September 1, means the expenditure of over one million dollars for new elevators in Alberta. This does The Standard's appeal aside repeatedly last year for relief for the farmer bear fruit. Further expenditures are contemplated in the $10,000,000 bond issue to be made.

Must Reduce Pleasure Riding to Save Gasoline For Army

After careful investigation of the present gasoline situation W. Van H. Manning, director of the Bureau of Mines of the Department of the Interior, has issued the following statement:

One-half of the gasoline used in the United States (1,250,000,000 gallons) is used in pleasure riding.

It is estimated that the United States army will need 350,000,000 gallons for aeroplanes, trucks, automobile tractors, and other machines. There is no way of obtaining this in this country except by saving from the existing supply, and this economy may be effected by voluntary cutting down of pleasure riding (for instance, the man who takes his family out on

What Uncle Sam Is Doing to Win War

U. S. Postmasters Will Supply Soldiers With Reading Matter

Postmaster General Burleson, of the U. S. postoffice department, has just completed arrangements whereby he expects to supply the soldiers at the firing lines and in cantonment camps with plenty of current literature. His plan is a very wise one as it will be of no expense to anyone, just a matter of conserving what has heretofore been destroyed.

In all postoffices there accumulates all kinds of reading matter which is non-deliverable and non-returnable. These are monthly and weekly magazines and periodicals of high class character, and are only destroyed ordinarily but now, according to the postmaster general's scheme they can be put to good advantage by being sent to the soldiers behind the firing lines and to soldiers in training camps. It is not the intention of the authorities to send cheap, trashy stuff to the boys, but only the high class, which will have an educative value to those who read them, when not on duty. All the mail will be sent to an Assorting post, from where it will be forwarded to the firing lines.

All the postmasters have been notified and all are asked to do this patriotic work with good will. Publishers across the continent will be sent to centrally located offices where they will be distributed.

The article is an enlargement on a plan which the postmaster general has been carrying out already, i.e., by co-operating with publishers and persons, forming a scheme whereby people can send any magazine or periodical to the boys at the front for only 1 cent, without any name or address. The agreement made with the publishers was, asking them to print the following on the cover page of their publications:

"Notice to Readers—When you finish reading this magazine place a 1 cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employe, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers and sailors at the front.

General Progress Of The War Reviewed

Canadians Capture Hill 10—Russians Back With Full Force—China With the Allies—United States Actively Engaged in the War Now.

The war this week has been very favorable on the allied side, while Germany has had trouble in every direction. With the present outlook, it seems that the decisive blow is fast approoaching, and that once more peace and prosperity will reign, but we cannot revel too much in a good thing, for what today is victory, tomorrow may be defeat.

Russia—First of all, Russia seems to be one of the most important topics of the day. She has been down and out, ready to lay down her arms and appeal for mercy, when from somewhere in those Russian forests a voice urged them on to liberty. They, as a nation, rose once more, though with difficulty, and took the offensive, which they still maintain. Their progress this week has been slow but sure, and their lines as they gather in strength will eventually accomplish the desired end.

Canada—Each day brings honor for Canada, though her losses are many. Canadians have distinguished themselves ever since Canada's advent into war, and now with their success near Lens, puts on the finishing touch. They are fast capturing Germany's greatest stronghold, having taken Hill 70 this week. Wherever Canucks go they leave a trace—always of honor, not disgrace.

Though the weather was rather unfavorable they pushed ahead with every effort and added more to the allies' territory.

Anglo-French—The combined armies of the French and English have also done good work. A big push on a nine-mile front helps things out considerably in the Flanders district. During the week many miles of lines were pushed ahead nearer to that spot—"decisive line."

United States—This week was the first during which the U. S. soldiers have taken active part against Germany. They were actively engaged in several conflicts in which they have themselves with such bravery that they dare face their fellow Tedays.

U. S. is doing all in her power to help the allies in the way of foods, munitions and money, while she herself is trying to accumulate "the sinews of war." Food restrictions were passed during the past week.

Italy—Italy has been making slow headway in the mountains. She must remember, however, that they can't run really over dangerous mountains.

Germany—Germany has had trouble inside and on the border. Her own people are getting discontented, while she is being hard pressed on every side by the allied soldiers. Her submarines seem to be her only hope, but that is an idle hope, for Britain can never be starved out.

Other Countries—In other places the news is limited. However, we can say that China has leagued with the allies against Germany.

COMMISSIONERS AND J. P.'S RECENTLY APPOINTED

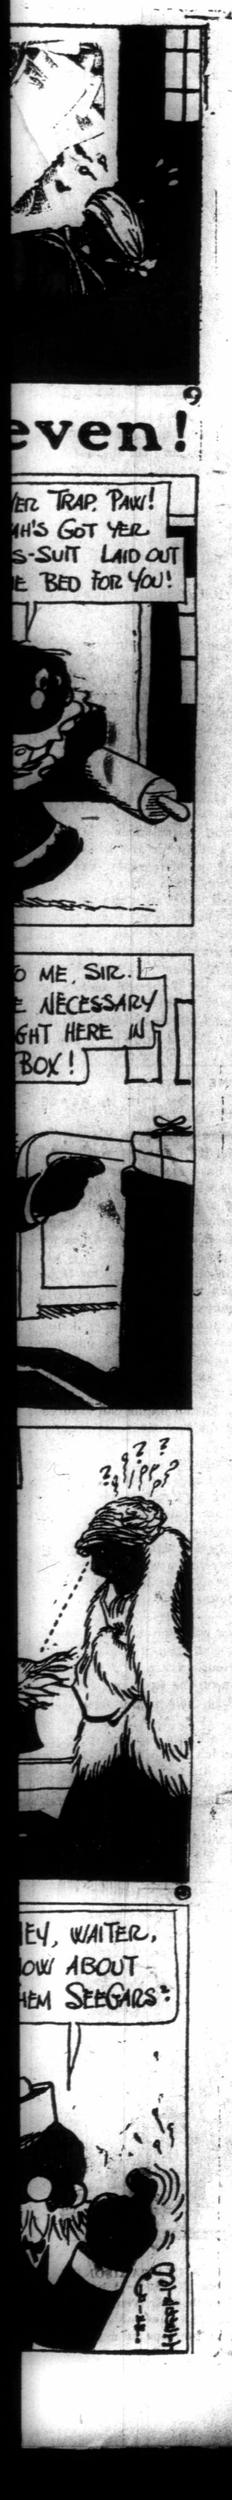
William J. H. Mustard, of Calgary, and Donald McKay Murray, of Okotoks, are among those appointed justices of the peace, while Geo. H. V. Burroughs, Joseph Grisdale and Geo. B. Coutts, all from Calgary, were appointed commissioners for taking affidavits.

ELECTION MAY ONLY COME IN DECEMBER

On account of much business going on in the house at present, election seems as though it may be put off. It is expected, however, that December will bring the critical contest.

ALBERTA RICHEST IN CANADA

Alberta's resources are developing so rapidly and the great wealth of the province piling up so fast it is safe to predict that this province will soon be one of the richest in the whole of Canada. Bank leavings show a high water mark and continue to exceed a year ago by a million dollars or more. The fact that it is not speculative argues well for the future progress of the country.



$50,000 GOES TO WOOL SHIPPERS THIS WEEK

The authorities in charge of the wool, which was sold here the other week, announce that the checks to the wool shippers will be mailed this week. The total of amount of these checks are $50,000.

MINING NEWS

The Silver Rising company report that they have just shipped another car of high-grade ore to the Trail Smelter. The car contains approximately 30 tons of ore, and it is said there is still ore above 60 per cent. silver. They will bring the company a net return of approximately $500. It is expected that they will shortly ship a further car containing copper ore worth about $50 per ton in the near future. These facts show that Alberta has definitely taken a stand on the map as a mineral-producing province.

First six months of 1915	2.39
Second six months of 1915	1.68
First six months of 1916	1.47
Second six months of 1916	1.28

In order to measure the offensive and defensive qualities of the troops, it is well to quote a few figures:

The western front has an extension of 739 kilometers. Twenty-seven kilometers are held by the Belgians; 138 kilometers are held by the English; 574 kilometers are held by the French, which shows that two-thirds of the hardest fighting place is held by the French. Moreover the German divisions on the west front, in June, 1917, was distributed as follows: 42 opposite to the English; 81 opposite to the French. A German division holds an overage front of four kilometers while a French division holds an average front of five kilometers—one-sixth more.

It might be interesting to note that she has completely re-equipped and re-armed Belgian, Serbian and Greek armies and has given not less than 800 heavy guns to the allies.

France has expended since the beginning of the war the following sums:

	Francs
1914	8,040,000,000
1915	22,800,000,000
1916	32,640,000,000

The condition of corn on Aug. 1 was 78.8 per cent. compared with 78.9 July 1 and 78.4 per cent., the 10-year average, on Aug. 1.

Corn production was forecasted as 3,191,000,000 bushels, compared with 3,124,000,000 bushels, the July forecast, and 2,754,000,000 bushels the 1911-1915 average.

The condition of other leading crops and the estimated production follow:

Cotton, 7.3 per cent., 11,900,000 bales; oats, 87.8 per cent., 1,456,000,000 bushels; barley, 77.9 per cent., 208,000,000 bushels; rye (per cent. not given), 56,000,000 bushels; buckwheat, 92.2 per cent, 19,900,000 bushels; white potatoes, 87.9 per cent., 467,000,000 bushels; sweet potatoes, 84.8 per cent., 86,400,000 bushels; flax, 60.6 per cent., 12,800,000 bushels; rice, 85 per cent., 34,600,000 bushels; hay, 84.6 per cent., 100,000,000 tons.

The total production of apples was estimated at 188,00,000 bushels, compared with 214,000,000, the 1911-1915 average.

The peach crop was forecasted as 42,700,000 bushels, compared with 49,000,000, the five-year average.

The acreage of the above crops, excluding apples and peaches, is 367,716,000, compared with 327,352,000 in 1916 and 326,660,000 in 1915.

Canada's Growth

In the first census year after confederation, 1871, Canada's total production of grain crops was only 71,000,000 bushels, with a valuation of about $50,000,000. In 1916, the total value of our agricultural products was $841,000,000, and that was a somewhat off year in production, though prices were high. At confederation, the cheese industry was just making a beginning, the first co-operative cheese factory having been established in 1864. Today, the annual output of cheese is 200,000,000 pounds, with a value of close to $40,000,000, based upon present prices. The value of Canada exports in 1868-70 was $13,000,000. In 1916-17, they are valued at $480,000,000. These figures tell a remarkable story of agricultural progress and development, which is coincident with the progress and development of Canada as a whole.

That the future of Canada is closely related to the future of agriculture can be easily demonstrated. Notwithstanding all the progress Canadian agriculture has made since confederation less than one-quarter of the land available for agriculture is occupied today, or about 110,000,000 acres. And only about 56,000,000 acres out of the 110,000,000 occupied area have been improved. There is estimated at the present time to be 100,000,000 acres available for immediate improvement. That is, if more of our people settled on the land, or if sufficient people could be brought in from other countries, 100,000,000 acres could be immediately brought under the plow and made available for agricultural production.

U. F. A. WILL SPEND MILLIONS

The amalgamation of the United Farm Growers, Ltd., which goes into effect on September 1, means the expenditure of over one million dollars for new elevators in Alberta. Thus does The Standard's appeal made repeatedly last year for relief for the farmer bear fruit. Further expenditures are contemplated in the $15,000,000 bond issue to be made.

Must Reduce Pleasure Riding to Save Gasoline For Army

After careful investigation of the present gasoline situation Mr. Van H. Manning, director of the Bureau of Mines of the Department of the Interior, has issued the following statement:

One-half of the gasoline used in the United States (1,250,000,000 gallons) is used in pleasure riding.

It is estimated that the United States army will need 350,000,000 gallons for aeroplanes, trucks, automobile tractors, and other machines. There is no way of obtaining this in this country except by saving from the existing supply, and this economy may be effected by voluntary cutting down of pleasure riding (for instance, the man who takes his family out on Sunday for a 50-mile ride can cut this in half).

It has been estimated that by economical use enough gasoline can be saved to supply not only the United States but also its allies for war purposes.

The following suggestions should be observed by automobile owners:

1. Do not allow your gasoline engine to run idle.

2. Use kerosene, not gasoline, for cleaning purposes in the garage.

3. See to it that the carburetor does not leak. Form the habit of shutting off the gasoline at the tank.

4. By judicious regulation of the mixture of gasoline and air in the motor both greater power and economy of fuel may be obtained.

Automobile owners need not lay up cars, but should use them either for trade or pleasure purposes thoughtfully and judiciously. If this advice is followed there will be no undue scarcity, for the United States possesses an abundant supply for ordinary purposes.

"THE BARRIER" AT THE REGENT

"The Barrier" is coming. To fittingly express all that this means—a photo-picture play founded on the celebrated novel of that name—its wonderful scenic effects, intertwined with love and pathos, with heartrending scenes and interesting passages, all make a story so absorbing, so filled with interest that it would take the vocabulary of a Shakespeare to fittingly express it. This wonderful picture is coming and all Western Canada has a treat in store for them. Watch for it.

What Uncle Sam Is Doing to Win War

U. S. Postmasters Will Supply Soldiers With Reading Matter

Postmaster General Burleson, of the U. S. postoffice department, has just completed arrangements whereby he expects to supply the soldiers at the firing lines and in cantonment camps with plenty of current literature. His plan is a very wise one as it will be of no expense to anyone, just a matter of conserving what has heretofore been destroyed.

In all postoffices there accumulates all kinds of reading matter which is non-deliverable and non-returnable. These are monthly and weekly magazines and periodicals of high class character, and are only destroyed ordinarily but now, according to the postmaster general's scheme they can be put to good advantage by being sent to the soldiers behind the firing lines and to soldiers in training camps. It is not the intention of the authorities to send cheap, trashy stuff to the boys, but only the high class, which will have an educative value to those who read them, when not on duty. All the mail will be sent to an American port, from where it will be forwarded to the firing lines.

All the postmasters have been notified and all are asked to do this patriotic work with good will. From smaller towns the literature will be sent to centrally located cities—often near cantonment camps and from there distributed.

This system is an enlargement on a plan which the postmaster general has been carrying out already, i.e., by co-operating with publishers and persons, forming a scheme whereby people can send any magazine or periodical to the boys at the front for only 1 cent, without any name or address. The agreement made with the publishers was, asking them to print the following on the cover page of their publications:

"Notice to Readers—When you finish reading this magazine place a 1 cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employe, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers and sailors at the front.

"No wrapping, no address."

Many of the publishers adopted this scheme, but still the suply was short, for it takes enormous numbers to supply millions of soldiers, so the postmaster general has devised the new scheme—a scheme which Canadian postal authorit'es should adopt also.

An up-to-date authhor is writing a war drama in which an investigation board will play the most important part.

General Progress Of The War Reviewed

Canadians Capture Hill 10—Russians Back With Full Force—China With the Allies—United States Actively Engaged in the War Now.

The war this week has been very favorable on the allied side, while Germany has had trouble in every direction. With the present outlook, it seems that the decisive blow is fast approoaching, and that once more peace and prosperity will reign, but we cannot revel too much in a good thing, for what today is victory, tomorrow may be defeat.

Russia—First of all, Russia seems to be one of the most important topics of the day. She has been down and out, ready to lay down her arms and appeal for mercy, when from somewhere in those Russian forests a voice urged them on to liberty. They, as a nation, rose once more, though with difficulty, and took the offensive, which they still maintain. Their progress this week has been slow but sure, and their lines as they gather in strength will eventually accomplish the desired end.

Canada—Each day brings honor for Canada, though her losses are many. Canadians have distinguished themselves ever since Canada's advent into war, and now with their success near Lens, puts on the finishing touch. They are fast capturing Germany's greatest stronghold, having taken Hill 70 this week. Wherever Canucks go they leave a trace—always of honor, not disgrace.

Though the weather was rather unfavorable they pushed ahead with every effort and added more to the allies' territory.

Anglo-French—The combined armies of the French and English have also done good work. A big push on a nine-mile front helps things out considerably in the Flanders district. During the week many miles of lines were pushed ahead nearer to that spot—"decisive blow."

United Staes—This week was the first during which the U. S. soldiers have taken active part against Germany. They were actively engaged in several conflicts in which they bore themselves with such bravery that they dare face their fellow Teddys.

U. S. is doing all in her power to help the allies in the way of foods, munitions and money, while she herself is trying to overcome "the submarine menace." Food restrictions were passed during the past week.

Italy—Italy has been making slow headway in the mountains. One must remember, however, that they can't run easily over dangerous mountains.

Germany—Germany has had trouble inside and on the border. Her own people are getting discontented, while she is being hard pressed on every side by the allied soldiers. Her submarines seem to be her only hope, but that is an idle hope, for Britain can never be starved out.

Other Countries—In other places the news is limited. However, we can say that China has leagued with the allies against Germany.

COMMISSIONERS AND J. P.'S RECENTLY APPOINTED

William J. H. Mustard, of Calgary, and Donald McKay Murray, of Okotoks, are among those appointed justices of the peace, while Geo. H. V. Burroughs, Joseph Grisdale and Geo. B. Coutts, all from Calgary, were appointed commissioners for taking affidavits.

ELECTION MAY ONLY COME IN DECEMBER

On account of much business going on in the house at present, election seems as though it may be put off. It is expected, however, that December will bring the critical contest.

ALBERTA RICHEST IN CANADA

Alberta's resources are developing so rapidly and the great wealth of the province piling up so fast it is safe to predict that this province will soon be one of the richest in the whole of Canada. Bank leavings show a high water mark and continue to exceed a year ago by a million dollars or more. The fact that it is not speculative argues well for the future progress of the country.

$90,000 GOES TO WOOL SHIPPERS THIS WEEK

The authorities in charge of the wool, which was sold here the other week, announce that the checks to the wool shippers will be mailed this week. The total of amount of these checks are $90,000.

MINING NEWS

The Eldon Mining company report that they have just shipped another car of high-grade zinc ore to the Trail Smelter. The car contains approximately 30 tons of ore, and it is estimated that it will run about 40 per cent. metallic zinc. This will bring the company a net return of approximately $900. It is expected that they will shortly ship a further car containing copper ore worth about $50 per ton in the near future. These facts show that Alberta has definitely taken a stand on the map as a mineral-producing province.

ONCE FRIENDS NOW FOES

No more bitter denouncements of the German Kaiser have been uttered than those spoken by Col. Roosevelt, who is ready and anxious to lead a force of Americans to fight the Kaiser's armies. This picture was taken in 1910, it shows the Kaiser and Col. Roosevelt reviewing a large body of German troops.

PEACHES

Selection—Select ripe, sound fruit and that which is tree-ripened in preference to any other kind of product.

Directions—Blanch the peaches in boiling water for about a minute, plunge them into cold water, and remove the skins. If this is properly done the skins will come off very easily when the peaches are uniformly ripe. When canning whole peaches, pack them immediately into the jars. When canning halved freestone peaches, split along the line of the pit mark and twist the peach gently to separate the pieces. With clingstone varieties a pitting scoop should be inserted close to the pit, thus cutting it free on the one side, then scooping the pit out from the other half. To avoid oxidation the fruit should be placed in cold, slightly salted water if it is not packed immediately.

After packing, hot syrup should be added until the jar is full. The density of this syrup should depend upon the purpose for which the peaches are being canned. Pie peaches are canned in water or in syrup made in the proportion of one cupful of sugar to four cupfuls of water. When the peaches are to be used as dessert, three cupfuls of sugar to four cupfuls of water make about the right proportion. As soon as the jars have been filled, rubbers and tops should be placed in position loosely and the peaches sterilized in a hot water canner for 16 minutes or in a water-seal canner for 12 minutes, 10 minutes in a steam-pressure outfit, or five in a pressure cooker.

Preserved peaches are made by placing halved or quartered fruit in a syrup made in the proportion of a pound of sugar to a quart of water, simmering for about eight minutes, then bringing to a boil and packing in the jars. Rubbers and tops should be placed in position and the jars sterilized for 10 minutes in the canning outfit.

When preparing pickled peaches, use a syrup made in the proportion of four quarts of vinegar to five pounds of sugar. Stick three or four cloves into each peach, add the peaches to the syrup, and simmer for about 40 minutes. Cinnamon may be added if this flavor is desired. Place the fruit in the jars, put rubbers and tops in position loosely, and sterilize in any type of canner for 10 minutes.

PLUMS

There are many varieties of plums, but for home use the same general method of canning may be followed with all of them. Because most canned plums are used for dessert, a fairly heavy syrup should be used. Pits are seldom removed, although this may easily be done if desired. They are generally canned with the skins, but these may also be removed, and with some of the larger, thick-skinned varieties this is advisable. Pricking the skins with a fork will prevent the skins from breaking during the canning operation. While the proportion of syrup will vary according to the variety of plum, three cupfuls of sugar to four cupfuls of water will make a syrup heavy enough for ordinary dessert use. If an extremely sour plum is being canned, four cupfuls of sugar to four cupfuls of water should be used.

Plums need not be blanched. They should be packed into the jars immediately after washing, hot syrup should be added, rubbers and tops placed in position loosely, and the jars should be sterilized for 16 minutes in a hot-water canner, 12 minutes in a water-seal canner, 10 minutes in a steam-pressure outfit, or five minutes in a pressure cooker.

Damson preserves are usually made of equal parts of plums and sugar, cooked until done, or placed in an earthenware crock, alternating layers of plums and sugar, and cooked in a moderately hot oven for about three hours. They are then packed in the jars, and rubbers and tops placed in position. If jars, rubbers and tops have been carefully sterilized, nothing further need be done; but if there is some doubt as to this, place the jars in a canning outfit and sterilize for 10 minutes.

When making plum jelly select fruit that is not thoroughly ripe. Remove the juice by cooking, add equal parts of sugar and boil until a temperature of 220 degrees has been reached. If no thermometer is available remove from the fire as soon as two drops form on the edge of a spoon held sidewise.

Plum butter may be made by adding a pound of sugar to each pound of plum pulp secured by cooking the fruit a few minutes and running it through a colander. The combined product should then be cooked until it is a thick paste, stirring constantly to prevent burning.

PRESERVE YOUR OWN FRUIT

DO-YOUR-BIT

Toward Conserving the Food Supply

Canning is the most important topic of the day. Even politicians discuss it. Women should not only discuss it but also practice it, as it is one of the most patriotic works ever thought of. It also reduces the high cost of living.

During these war times when the question of food is the most important topic of the day, woman should do her part in helping along these lines, by reducing the cost of living which can be done by canning fruit during season. It is not only a saving to her but also a saving to Canada and the allies inasmuch as canning food, is conserving food.

Why? Food which is not canned will spoil, while food which is preserved, keeps.

In order to see the difference between "Home-canned" goods and "tin-canned" goods, one must compare the two. First of all, when you buy preserved goods, you pay for the tin, the labor, the goods, and the profit, while if you are canning yourself you only pay for the material used, and a little of your spare time. Then, too, you know what you eat when you do your own canning.

To Milk Consumers

We wish to announce to our customers that in advancing the price of milk, we have not done so before conditions justified such procedure. From the information we have been able to secure, it appears that in most American and Canadian cities the price of milk is higher than in Calgary or Edmonton. In many instances it is from 20 to 40 per cent. higher.

If you are using two quarts of milk per day it increases your daily milk bill approximately two cents per day. If you use two pounds of meat per day, the difference in price, as compared with one year ago, is ten to twenty cents per day.

As shown by analysis, milk, in proportion to its food value, at present prices is fifty per cent. cheaper than meat, and one hundred per cent. cheaper than eggs or fish. You may economize by using more milk.

BE A BOOSTER

Do you know there's lots of people
Setting round in every town,
Growling like a broody chicken
Knockin' every good thing down?
Don't you be that kind of grouch,
Cause they ain't no use on earth,
You just be a booster rooster
Crow and boost for all you're worth.

If your town needs boostin', boost 'er,
Don't hold back and wait to see
If some other fellow's willin'—
Sail right in, this country's free.
No one's got a mortgage on it,
It's just yours as much as his;
If your town is shy on boosters,
You get in the boosting biz.

If things just don't seem to suit you,
And the world seems kinder wrong,
What's the matter with a boostin'
Just to help the thing along.
'Cause if things should stop agoin'
We'd be in a sorry plight,
You just keep that horn a-blowing—
Boost 'er up with all your might.

If you know some fellow's failin's
Just forget 'em 'cause you know
That the same chap's got some good points,
Them's the ones you want to show.
"Cast your loaves out on the waters,
They'll come back," a saying true,
Mebbe, too, they'll come back "buttered"
When some fellow boosts for you.

ADVERTISE IN THE STANDARD

MY LIFE.

(By Juliette Day.)

My first appearance was in Boston, where I was born one chilly, grey day in 1893—December 8, I believe. I did child parts for Winthrop Ames at the Castle Square theater there.

Mary Miles Minter began to act when she was two years younger than me, for I was seven when I first stepped out on the boards, while she was only five. After the Ames experience I supported Millie James in "The Little Princess;" then I went with the Ben Greet players.

There was a hiatus in my stage career. That was when I went abroad at the age of fourteen to study in Paris, and in the then safe-and-sane Berlin. When I came back to Broadway, I went into "The Bluebird," with Mr. Ames again, at the New Theater. Later I played "Modesty" in "Everywoman," and was selected for the leading role in "The Yellow Jacket."

At eighteen I was featured in "Marrying Money," produced by Henry Miller. At the close of this engagement I played "Snow White" at the Little Theatre, and then a leading role with Montgomery and Stone in "Chin-Chin."

"Twin Beds" found me in the leading part. This eminently successful comedy toured the continent for 36 weeks. Then came "Upstairs and Down," from which I was graduated into the movies.

I am about to make my screen debut with the American Film company, with whom I am contracted for a series of photoplays. My "bow" number, "Betty and the Buccaneers," has been completed, and I am at work upon my second, "The Rainbow Girl."

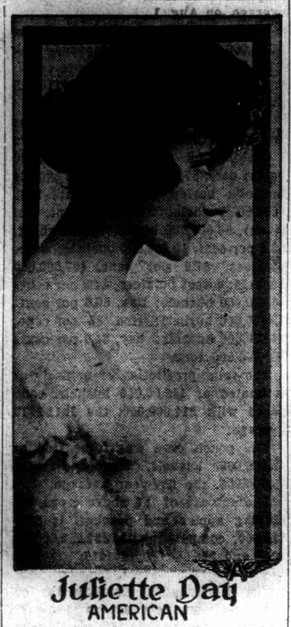
EVERY HOUSEHOLD SHOULD SAVE WHEAT WHEN POSSIBLE

Cornmeal for breakfast, the catchphrase of the Produce Exchange, has caused a sympathetic echo from individual families that know the right kind of cornbread. Southern cooks begin their recipes as did the famous Mrs. Glass and her hare: "First get your cornmeal." Once it was hard to get, but now southern cornmeal can be found in New York and other cities, not only in the smaller shops, but in the big central groceries. The New England woman is also particular about the material with which she makes her cornbread.

There are many things which can be made with cornmeal. A few of them are the various forms of cornbread and Johnny cake and the famous New England Indian pudding. Then there are Boston brown bread, which is part cornmeal, and "hasty pudding," which is also known as cornmeal mush, and which, when sliced cold and properly browned in salt pork or bacon fat, is a breakfast dish fit for kings. Hominy, known as a cereal hereabout, is served hot with butter in the south. Here is the way to make some of the better known meal compounds:

Rye Drop Cakes

Six heaping tablespoons rye meal, six heaping tablespoons Indian meal, three heaping tablespoons flour.



Add two heaping tablespoons of baking powder to the flour, a little salt, two tablespons of molasses, and mix with a scant pint of water.

The mixture should be a little stiff, to drop from the spoon with the aid of a knife into deep fat. This should not be too hot, as the meal takes little time to cook.

Among the old-time southern recipes given by Marion Harland, daughter of Marion Harland, in her book, "Like Mother Used to Make," are these:

Johnny Cake

Mix a teacupful of sweet milk with one of sour, or buttermilk; add a teaspoonful of baking soda dissolved in hot water, a teaspoonful of salt, and a tablespoonful of melted butter. Stir into this enough cornmeal to make a soft dough which can be handled. Roll it out in a sheet about half an inch thick, and lay it in a biscuit tin. Bake in a rather slow oven for forty minutes, brushing it over frequently with a bit of cloth dipped in melted butter. This should be done four or five times after the bread begins to brown. This was the old-time Johnny cake originally baked before an open fire on a board.

Juliette Day
AMERICAN

Virginia Corn Pone

Stir a teasponful of salt and a tablespoonful of melted lard in a quart of cornmeal and enough cold water to make a soft dough. Shape with the hands into oblong rolls like little loaves, and bake quickly in a well-greased pan. Serve hot break open, and eat with butter.

Batter Bread

Sift two cups of southern cornmeal—that in common use in the north will not do at all. Stir into it a good teaspoonful of salt, and work into it a tablespoonful of melted butter. Beat two eggs light, put with them a quart of milk, stir in the meal and bake in well greased pie tins. The bread is cut into triangles and split open and buttered and eaten very hot.

A New England recipt for oJhnny cake baked on the griddle is that of a once famous hotel man made for his own delectation. There are no actual measurements. The cornmeal was scalded with enough boiling water to reach every grain and make a thick dough. This was thinned with milk and then brought to a Johnny cake consistency with wheat flour. The stiff mixture was dropped from a spoon into a spider or fry pan, in which was plenty of sweet salt pork fat. The oval cakes, four or five to a pan, half an inch thick, were cooked slowly until there was a delicately thick crust on either side.

To cook hominy grits you soak the hominy over night, and put in a kettle or double boiler on the following morning, with the water in which it soaked. Boiled soft, it may be eaten as a cereal or with buter. To bake it, you take a pint of the boiled grits cold, then add two eggs well beaten, a small piece of butter and milk to make a moderately thin mass. Bake for thirty minutes.

DAIRYING AND POULTRY

A Billion Bushels Of Wheat For Next Year

United States Department of Agriculture and State Officials Set High Mark for Wheat Production—Winter Wheat Acreage to Be Increased This Fall by 18 Per Cent. Over Last Year—Rye Acreage Also to Be Expanded—Details of Acreage Proposed.

The production of over one billion bushels of wheat and over 83 million bushels of rye, through the planting of 47,337,000 acres to winter wheat and of 5,131,000 acres to rye this fall, is the immediate war agricultural program for the nation announced today by David F. Houston, secretary of agriculture. This record winter wheat acreage, an increase of 18 per cent. over last year, would yield 672,000,000 bushels if the average yield for the past 10 years is equalled, or under a repetition of the favorable conditions of 1914 would give 880,000,000 bushels. In either case with a spring wheat crop next year equal to that of 1915, the nation will have more than one billion bushels of wheat for domestic use and export.

This vastly increased production of wheat, needed in any case, will be absolutely essential to prevent a serious shortage of breadstuffs next summer should the growing corn, now behind the season, be much damaged by early frosts.

The program approved by the secretary of agriculture represents the best thought of the U. S. department of agriculture and of state agricultural officials and state councils of defence.

The study of this question has involved many factors and the specialists have been aware from the first that the demands for wheat may exceed the supply next year. Effort therefore has been made to recommend in each state about as large an acreage in wheat and rye as can be sown without upsetting proper farm practice which must be maintained in the interest of wheat and rye crops this and succeeding years, as well as in the interest of other necessary spring-planted crops which are not discussed in detail at this time as they are not food crops in which a marked shortage exists.

When estimating the states department took into consideration the fact that there is a general shortage of fertilizers, with the understanding that there will be plenty of seed and machinery for the production of the bumper wheat crop. And transportation facilities will be provided while the farmer will be given a fair deal by giving him a fair set price for his wheat.

The farmer will have to put forth an additional effort in order to meet this great demand, however the U. S. department of agriculture, the state colleges of agriculture and other state and local agencies will be at the disposal of the farmer. These will co-operate with the farmer and help in every possible way.

In each state the officials will get the acreages of the ground to be expected sown. Originally the department decided on 44,000,000 acres to be sown to wheat this fall but seeing that certain states could successfully carry on more production, the acreage was increased to 47,337,000.

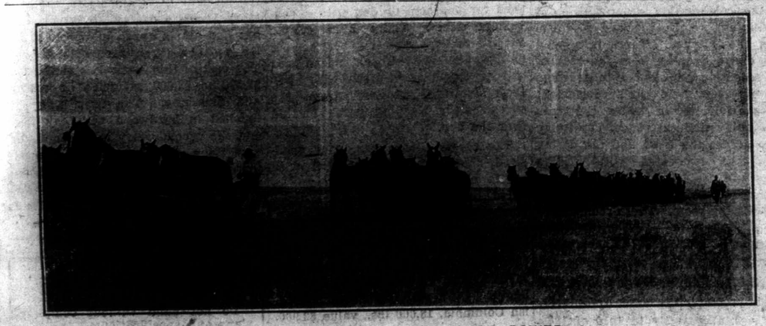
Following is a summary of the department's recommendations regarding winter wheat and rye:

Wheat

The planting of approximately 47,337,000 acres to winter wheat, on the basis of the average yield for the past 10 years indicates a total production of 672 million bushels, which exceeds all previous winter wheat crops harvested in the United States with the exception of the crops of 1914 and 1915 when the acreages harvested and yields per acre were both above normal. If the extremely favorable conditions under which the winter wheat crop of 1914 was grown are again experienced, the yield of winter wheat next year will be 880,000,000 bushels or by far the largest winter wheat crop ever produced and even larger than the total of both winter and spring wheat crops for all past years except two.

It is too early to determine the area to be sown to spring wheat but if acreages of previous years are taken practically 350 million bushels, under normal conditions, can be raised. Thus with no increase in spring wheat acreage and the 18 per cent. increase in fall wheat, the yield for 1918 would be one million bushels.

The increased acreage will affect only farms where farming is carried on, on a large scale, where there is plenty of machinery. It will also affect places where the oat and rye crops have been very heavy, where wheat will do well on stubble. In certain districts the increase could be made but it would possibly damage the crops for future years, so the department is very careful in making the increase.



Basis of Increase

Since the acreages sown last fall are fresh in the memory of the farmer, the sowings suggested for this year are compared with those of 1916. Kansas, Ohio, Oklahoma, Indiana, Illinois and Oregon, in which nearly one-half of the winter wheat was sown last fall, are asked to furnish considerably more than one-half of the increase planned for this fall. Their agricultural leaders think it possible and are taking the necessary steps to see that it is done. The southern states are asked for the largest percentage of increase since they have better facilities and better producing land. Most of the states for which only small percentage increases are suggested, recently increased largely their wheat acreages and are already growing about as much as is consistent with a well-balanced agriculture.

Rye to Be Increased Heavily

It is recommended that there be sown in the United States this fall 5,131,000 acres of rye which, on the basis of ten-year averages, will yield 83,635,000 bushels. This is an increase of 917,00 acres, or 22 per cent. over that sown last year, when the largest acreage in the history of the country was put in. It is an increase of 48 per cent. over the 1915 acreage and of 57 per cent. over the five-year (1912-1916) average sown acreage.

In any consideration of the expansion of the acreage of bread grains in certain parts of the country, it is necessary to consider wheat and rye together. This is because rye can be planted safely on many fields with less risk than wheat. Further, rye can be used as a substitute for wheat as a bread grain by those who are accustomed to it. Rye succeeds on poorer soils and with less fertilizer and in colder climates than wheat, and for these reasons should be planted in preference to wheat where it has been proved a safer crop. The farmer who, because of an attractive guaranteed price for wheat, may be tempted to plant wheat rather than rye in a locality where rye is the more certain crop takes a speculative risk of loss through winter killing and destructive wheat diseases which is unwarranted. While no guaranteed price for rye has been authorized by congress, there is every reason to expect that the price of rye for the next year will bear a satisfactory relation to that of wheat and, therefore, justify the planting of rye where the present experience with it indicates its superiority.

PLOWING WITH REAL HORSE POWER

Special Methods to Increase Yields of Wheat and Rye

Specialists of the department of agriculture and the state agricultural colleges hope that by better methods the average yield per acre will be at least maintained wherever there is a fertilizer shortage and will be increased in other sections. Much educational work will be done to make this desire an actuality, and in this campaign the most successful growers will have a prominent part. For instance, it is stated that on the land that could be sown to fall wheat this autumn, it is possible materially to increase the yield per acre by putting into practice some principles that are already well known to most farmers. These should appeal especially to those who cannot increase their usual acreages without doing injustice to other crops which should be grown.

These principles may be summed up as follows:

(1) Plow early. Give the plowed land two months to settle before sowing where possible.

(2) Compact the late-plowed land with roller and harrow.

(3) Don't plow after a cultivated crop. Prepare such land with disc and harrow.

(4) Make the seed bed a fit place for the seed.

(5) Sow with a drill, sound, plump, clean seed of adapted variety.

(6) Prevent losses from smut by treating infected seed with formaldehyde.

(7) Make the soil fertile with manure or fertilizers applied judiciously where needed.

(8) Reduce winter wheat killing by following the above suggestions.

HORTICULTURAL EXHIBITION

The Horticultural society are to hold their tenth annual exhibition next Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, at the Horse Show building. Already there are a good many entries, with excellent displays. This society is one of the most educative concerns in the city, as they show the people what can be done in the line of flowers and vegetables.

Among those displaying exhibits are the City Parks department, Floral departments, local florists, and a few outsiders. There are enough entries now to make this event a huge success, and many more are expected.

Demonstrations of Chinese vegetables will be given every afternoon and evening by Mrs. Deachman, and a musical program will be given every day, under the direction of Mrs. Annie Glen-Broder. Everyone should take in this affair, is it is educative and practical.

ALLIES NEED ALL AVAILABLE PRODUCE

Britain and her allies need 160,000,000 bushels of wheat more than there is available for export from the two countries to whom they look for supplies—Canada and the United States—according to a statement by Hon. W. J. Hanna, Canada's food controller, and this is calculated on the decreased scale of consumption already practiced in Great Britain. To make up this shortage, the people of Canada and the United States are organizing to substitute other foods and reduce consumption of flour foods by one-sixth. Household scientists say it can be done without loss of health or comfort.

HARVESTING WILL BE GENERAL NEXT WEEK.

The report from Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator Co., shows that crops will be fair. Some frost.

The crops are coming on fast now, and though we can't boast of a very heavy crop, we will have something near an average. The weather in general has been fair, as there has been some moisture in every part of the province, to help the crops on to maturity. Oats and barley are rather poor, but will make something. During the last few nights frost visited a few of the districts and shrivelled the grain a bit, doing but little damage.

The following is a report from several of the towns sent in by the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator company agents:

Burdett—Cutting is general; yield to be about 15 to 18 bushels. Oats poor. Frost last few days.

Lomond—Harvesting started; oats and flax fair. Had fine rains last week.

Wainwright—Cutting started; crops fair.

Warner—Harvesting general this and next week. Heavy rains last Friday. It is expected that new grain will be hauled to the elevators the first of next month.

Amisk—Wheat ready to cut on 20th. Weather favorable, oats and barley crop light.

Aldersyde—Weather fine. Sixty per cent of last year's yield.

Consort — Cutting this week; weather warm and dry; average yield about 15 bushels.

Blackfoot — Cutting this week.

WESTERN LIVESTOCK CONVENTION AT REGINA

At a meeting of the Western Canada Livestock union at Regina, held during the fair week, it was decided to hold this year's convention at Regina, on November 14 and 15. The last convention was held at Calgary and this time it is only fair to have it in Saskatchewan. Preliminary plans for speakers were made, according to E. L. Richardson, who was present at the meeting.

SAVE BY BEING INDUSTRIOUS AT TIMES

Surplus fruits, beans, tomatoes and other vegetables produced in the home gardens are allowed to spoil on the vines or rot on the ground. A morning's work would can and preserve such surplusage for use when fruits and vegetables are scarce and high in price. During war times every bit of food should be preserved and taken care of.

VICTORIA PARK TEEMING WITH ACTIVITY FOR FORTHCOMING SHOWS

The activities at Victoria Park, where the several shows and sales are held under the auspices of the Alberta Live Stock associations and the Calgary Exhibition Co., are increasing each year. While a number of events have already been held since the beginning of the year, below is a list of sales and shows to be held during the balance of the year.

August 21 to 24—Horticultural show in the Horse Show building. The entries for this show may be made with the secretary, Thos. Bellew, at the exhibition offices. This show is an annual treat for lovers of flowers and vegetables.

October 30-31—The second annual auction sale of dairy sale, sheep and swine will be held the last two days of October. The dairy cattle and swine will be sold the first day and the sheep the second day. It is expected that these sales will show a very large increase over the first annual sales held last year. The entries for these sales close on the last day of September.

December 11-14—The Alberta Winter Fair, including the Provincial Poultry show, the Fat Stock show, the annual auction sale of beef females, and the annual auction sale of horses, will make the second week of December a busy one in Calgary. Last year over $50,000 changed hands for pure bred live stock during the Winter Fair week, and this year it is expected that the sales will show a considerable increase.

The shows and sales held throughout the year at Calgary have proven a great benefit to the live stock interests of the province. Not only does the seller find a ready cash sale for his stock at these sales, but purchasing is made convenient for the buyer. He is able to inspect a large number of animals at one point and purchase by open bid at actual value as shown by the bids of other practical stockmen present. The shipping arrangements are also made convenient for the buyer, and the reduced transportation in force at these special sales gives him additional help.

Information regarding these shows and sales may be obtained from E. L. Richardson, secretary of the Alberta Live Stock Associations, Calgary.

In these war days, when the question of the Canadian grain supply is so much in the public mind, when the western crop has become a vital factor in the national life of Canada and a rigid supervision is being exercised by the Dominion government over the disposal of our wheat; it is perhaps important that the extent and location of the many granaries of the prairie provinces should be thoroughly known and appreciated by the general public as well as to those more directly interested.

A new edition of an official publication of the government, which will tend to effect this purpose has just been issued by the Natural Resources Intelligence branch of the department of interior, Ottawa. This consists of a map of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta showing the position of each city or town containing one or more grain elevators.

It is a most timely and useful publication and copies may be obtained gratis, on application to the superintendent, Natural Resources Intelligence branch, department of the interior, Ottawa.

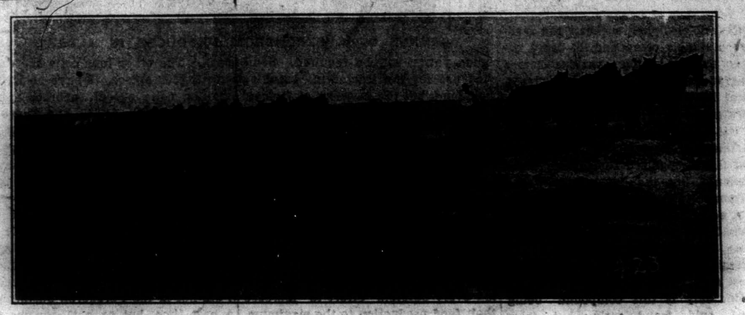
Harvesting Will Be General Next Week

Reports from Ottawa Show That Harvesting Will Be General Soon—Crops Are Below Normal in Some Places—Oats and Barley a Little Backward in Alberta—Drought in Saskatchewan—British Columbia Has Hay Crop All Stored—Livestock Good.

Ottawa, Aug. 17.—A special press bulletin issued today by the Census and Statistics office gives the following report on the condition of field crops throughout Canada, as compiled from telegrams dispatched at the end of July:

Atlantic provinces—In Prince Edward Island frequent beneficial rains have assured excellent cereal crops, insect damage reducing wheat below average. Hay an average crop. Potatoes promise full crop with 15 per cent. increased acreage. In Nova Scotia all crops made excellent growth. In New Brunswick weather was excellent for growth. Potatoes and roots are good, grain is a bad color.

Quebec—Rimouski: Rains frequent; all crops have splendid appearance, good hay crop. Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere (Kamouraska): Frequent showers favorable to all crops. Hay good. Grains poor, but better than expected in June. Potatoes promise average crop. Lennoxville (Sherbrooke): Hay crops late, about 40 per cent. being harvested. Yield above average. Heat of last few days very beneficial to corn, roots, etc. Aubrey (Chateauguay): Hay averages two tons per acre. All grains promise average crops; roots a failure. Potatoes doing well, also corn except on lowlands where drowned out. Cap Rouge: Hay crop very heavy, pastures fine. All grain suffering from excess of precipitation. Roots promise well, corn for silage poor, potatoes fair. Lac a la Tortue (Champlain): Wheat, oats and barley good; potatoes very good; corn better than in June; beans promise well; hay abundant; roots fair.



Ontario—Ottawa: Hay harvesting about two weeks late, crop average. Grain and roots promise well. Corn with favorable weather should be abundant crop. Potatoes promise to be above average. Pastures very good. Prescott (Grenville): Hay, full crop of good quality, three-quarters cut. Grain promises full head and filling well. Corn for husking doubtful, for fodder very promising; potatoes good. Peterborough: Fall wheat ripe, thin, but heads well filled. Barley above average, peas best for several years. Oats and mixed grains specially good; potatoes and roots looking fine; fodder corn large acreage and good appearance. Everything ten days late. Oshawa (Ontario): Hay about average, one-third well saved, third fairly well, rest poor. Barley, oats and spring wheat prospects above average; corn, mangolds, turnips doing well; potatoes big crop, if blight does not damage. Farm help very scarce. Conestogo (Waterloo): Hay crop harvested in good condition. Wheat nearly ready to cut, some rust prevalent. Spring crops look well, but need rain, so do roots and potatoes. Hyde Park (Middlesex): Wheat badly infested with ball smut and rust. Oats developing open smut, but loko well; peas, corn, barley, potatoes turnips excellent, though late; hay, half well saved.

Manitoba—Millwood: Cereals, injured by drought, about half crop; potatoes and roots late but good; hay and pastures half crop; summerfallows very fair; late crops suffering from great heat. Brandon: Drought continued during July. Wheat will not average more than 12 bushels. Oats and barley worse, hay a failure; cutting will begin about August 20.

Saskatchewan—Indian Head: July very dry with hot southwest winds; crops have suffered considerably throughout district. Early sown grain on fallow filling fairly well. Stubble and spring plowing will be very light. Crops are maturing rapidly. Cutting will commence from 10th to 15th and should be general by August 20. Saskatoon: Crops very short owing to continued drought. Best grain fields very weedy. Yields of hay much below normal. Many vegetable gardens almost total failure. Rosthern: No rain since July 12. Hay and corn poor, roots fair, grain good, but needs rain. Yield about 50 per cent., unless copious rains soon. Potatoes promise above average.

Alberta—The Alberta department of agriculture reports hot and dry weather generally throughout the province except in a few districts. Grain and roots have advanced well, but all need rain, particularly in southwest portions. Haying general. Barley turning in many districts. If rain comes soon a big crop can still be harvested. Lacombe: High temperature and dry weather last three weeks of July have hastened maturity and reduced prospective yield of all cereals; some districts not suffering from lack of rain, but all central Alberta would be benefiten by good rainfall. Hay harvest 60 per cent. completed. Early varieties of grain will be ripe next week.

British Columbia—Agassiz: July exceptionally dry and hot. No rain fell until the last five days. All hay stored in excellent shape. Grain crops maturing rapidly. Corn growing fast; roots and pastures need rain. Livestock in good condition. Summerland: Apple crop will not exceed that of 1916; it is very patchy. Well kept orchards have held out well during water shortage and heat. Early peaches are just ripe; apricots coming in. Both running small this year. Invermere: Crops under dry farming conditions a failure.

WORKERS OF THE SOIL ON THEIR WAY

HARVESTERS IN NEED THIS FALL

T. H. Molloy, secretary of the Saskatchewan provincial bureau of labor, estimates that 20,000 harvesters will be needed for Saskatchewan this season.

Let men who are rejected by the recruiting sergeants for the army be organized into military battalions to save the harvest, is a suggestion.

HORSE OWNERS WARNED

Carbon bisulphid, a cheap and readily obtainable compound, is being unduly exploited under various names and at exorbitant prices as a treatment for bots and worms in horses, according to information which recently has come to the United States Department of Agriculture. This chemical is a recognized remedy for these ailments, but the department warns farmers against paying $5 for a quantity, sold under a fanciful name, that probably could be bought at any drug store for 25 cents. In the warning promulgated the Agricultural Department says:

Not only is this compound being thus sold fraudulently, but false claims are made for it and directions for its use improperly prescribed. Carbon bisulphid is poisonous, and if used indiscriminately by inexperienced hands may do more harm than good, theu specialists say. The vapor of this substance is suffocating, and inflammable when mixed with air, and must be kept away from all fire. As the method of administering this compound is not altogether easy, it is suggested that the treatment should be given under the direction of a veterinarian.

The usual method of administering is to give about one fluid ounce divided into three doses and to supplement it with a purgative. For yearling colts half, the amount, in similar dosage, is sufficient. The carbon bisulphid is administered in sealed capsules soluble in the stomach. Gelatin capsules sealed with glue or other wise prepared by the druggist so there will be no leakage may be used. So-called four-dram capsules will actually hold about three drams of carbon bisulphid; two-dram capsules about one and one-half drams. An instrument known as a balling gun or balling iron will facilitate the administration of the capsules. Inhaling of carbonbisulphid fumes by a horse may have serious consequences, and it is accordingly important not to use leaky capsules or crush them during their administration. The day preceding the treatment the horse is fed lightly and all food is withheld in the evening. A purgative of aloes (one-half to one ounce) or a pint of raw linsed oil is given. On the day of the treatment thre drams of carbon bisulphid in a gelatin capsule or capsules are given to the horse, still fasting, at six o'clock in the morning, three drams at seven o'clock, and thre drams at eight o'clock—making in all nine drams of carbon bisulphid in either thre or six capsules, according to the size of the capsule used.

These doses are for a mature horse; a yearling colt may be given half the quantity.

When the remedy is used for the removal of "nose fly" bots, which occur commonly in certain Western States, it should be given during the fall of the year, as bots of this species leave the upper part of the intestinal tract after this time and establish themselves in the lower intestine, where they are but little affected by ordinary medicinal treatment.

CANADA AND U. S. MUST CONSUME LESS EATS

Canada and the United States must cut down their normal wheat consumption by 160,000,000 bushels to meet the needs of Great Britain and the allies. Hon. W. J. Hanna, Canadian food controller, estimates that to feed Great Britain, France and the other allies, and the men at the front, will require 1,105,000,000 bushels of wheat. This means at least 460,000,000 will have to be imported from Canada and the United States. There will be under normal consumption in these two countries only 300,000,000 bushels surplus for export, and so by special efforts of food conservation the people of United States and Canada will have to make up a shortage of 160,000,000 bushels.

HORSE BREEDING IN STATE OF MONTANA

(By Harry L. Smith, Gallatin Co.)

It is now nearly 50 years that I have lived in the Gallatin Valley. I have seen Montana reclaimed from its wild state, with many Indians and few whites, to one of civilization, with fine farms, progressive cities and enlightened people. When I came to this section of the west the nearest railroad was 500 miles away. I have seen the little cayuse mare supplanted by the heavy draft horse—mostly Percherons. Because I have seen this rapid change in the equine stock of the state, along with other improvements in livestock and crop production, I have great faith in the future of the horse business here.

We need more good draft horses, and our farmers are bound to have them. As better methods are put into practice, farms will be operated more intensively, which means more horse power will be required. Some find use for the tractor in breaking new land, but the majority of farmers in this state still prefer horses. Most of them use four, six, and eight horses on two and three bottom plows, depending upon the texture of the soil. I know many farmers who have discarded their tractors and gone back to horses. This is the case practically all over the west, and particularly through western Canada, where tractors have been used more extensively than here. The Canadians are exerting every possible effort to increase their food production to the maximum. They are using every horse 1,700 pounds or over, that they can get, and not mechanical power, except where sufficient horses are not available. If tractors would accomplish the end desired they would be used to work the soil.

I began breeding Percherons not quite ten years ago. I now have over 40 head. In fact, all the horses I own are Percherons. No other breed has so many friends here in the west. This is due to the fact that almost any kind of a native mare will produce a good chunk of a colt, if bred to a Percheron stallion. If she happens to be a good sized mare, she will produce a real drafter, with size, quality, action and hardiness. Grade Percheron colts, as well as pure breds, get their growth early, are easy keepers, clean legged and have good dispositions.

The question is occasionally raised as to the advisability of keeping pure bred mares in Montana and other western states. Some say such mares cost too much in the first place, and that the risk is too great to make the breeding of pure breds profitable. If pure bred mares are cared for as they should be, they will bring more clear money per dollar invested than any other class of live stock. Susan Reinette, an 8-year-old Percheron mare of my own breeding, produced a foal as a 3-year-old, and has had a colt every year since. All of her colts are living, and she is going to have another one this summer. I sold a two-year-old stallion out of her for $750 cash. The other four colts are easily worth $300 apiece. I have sold three stallion colts out of another mare, Venus, for $750, $1,000, and $1,400 respectively, making a total of $3,150, the result of her efforts in three years.

Some of us may be criticized for being horse cranks, but with the demand for heavy draft horses increasing every year, and the fact that we can sell every pure bred stallion colt we produce for $300 to $1,000, and more if extra good, there is mighty good excuse for being a draft horse breeder. I am not in the Percheron business as a past time, but as a money making proposition.

Elevator Capacity In Canada

The following figures give one an idea of the elevator capacity in Canada. However, these figures do not account for every elevator in the Dominion:

	Bus. (cap.)
Alberta	25,841,000
Saskatchewan	65,710,000
Manitoba	22,810,000
British Columbia	1,793,000
Ontario	65,465,000
Quebec	10,000,000
New Brunswick	1,800,000
Nova Scotia	500,000

A Report On Dairy Products

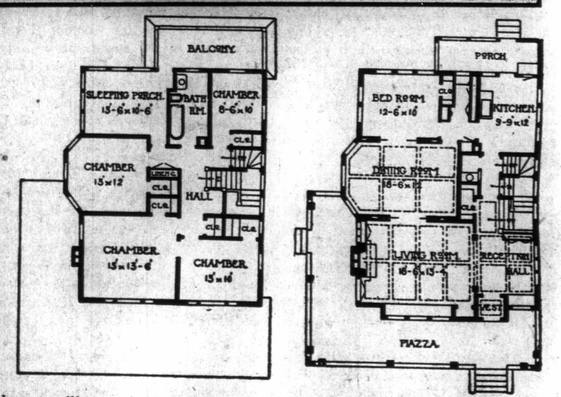
The Census and statistics office reports on the total production of butter and cheese in the creameries and cheese factories of Canada for the year 1916, as compared with 1915, the report being based upon returns collected from the dairying branches of the provincial departments of agriculture. The figures for 1915 represent approximate estimates, as the returns for that year are not quite complete. The total number of creameries and cheese factories operating in 1916 is reported as 3,446, including 993 creameries, 1,813 cheese factories, 624 combined factories (cheese and butter) and 16 condensed milk factories. The total number of patrons contributing to creameries and cheese factories during the year 1916 was 221,192, the deliveries of milk amounting to 2,600,542,987 pounds, and of cream to 157,620,636 pounds. The two chief dairying provinces of the Dominion are Ontario and Quebec. Both manufacture cheese and butter; in Ontario more cheese is made than butter; in Quebec more butter is made than cheese. In Ontario the total number of establishments operating in 1916 was 1,165, and the patrons numbered 87,325, whilst in Quebec the establishments numbered 1,984 and the patrons 79,145; so that the average number of patrons per establishment was 75 in Ontario and 40 in Quebec.

Production and Value of Creamery Butter.

The total production of creamery butter in Canada in 1916, is returned as 82,564,130 pounds, of the value of $26,966,357, as compared with 83,824,176 pounds, of the value of $24,368,636 in 1915. Comparing the relative production of the provinces, the production in 1916 is highest in Quebec with 34,323,275 pounds, of the value of $11,516,148, as compared with 24,680,109 pounds of the value of $8,031,998 in Ontario. These two provinces together produce about 70 per cent of the total creamery butter of Canada. Of the other provinces the production and value of creamery butter in 1916 were in relative order as follows: Alberta, 8,521,784 pounds, value $2,619,248; Manitoba, 6,574,510 pounds, value $2,038,109; Saskatchewan, 4,310,669 pounds, value $1,338,180; Nova Scotia, 1,586,679 pounds, value $505,000; British Columbia, 1,243,292, value $497,316; New Brunswick, 709,932 lbs., value $236,194; and Prince Edward Island, 613,880 pounds, value $184,164. The average price per lb. of creamery butter for all Canada works out to 33 cents in 1916, as compared with 30 cents in 1915. By provinces in 1916 the highest price was in British Columbia, 42 cents, and the lowest in Prince Edward Island, 30 cents. In the other provinces the price per lb. for 1916, was as follows: Nova Scotia, 32 cents; New Brunswick, 33 cents; Quebec, 34 cents; Ontario, 33 cents; the prairie provinces, 31 cents.

Production and Value of Factory Cheese.

The total production of factory cheese in 1916 was 192,968,597 lbs., of the value of $35,512,530, as compared with 183,878,898 lbs., of the value of $27,587,775 in 1915. By provinces the lead in production is taken by Ontario, with a total quantity in 1916 of 126,015,870 lbs., of the value of $23,212,935, Quebec being second with 61,906,750 lbs. of the value of $11,245,104. These two provinces together account for 98 per cent of the total production of factory cheese. The production and value of factory cheese in the other provinces in 1916 were as follows: Prince Edward Island, 2,121,736 lbs., value $409,495; New Brunswick, 1,185,664 lbs., value $210,692; Manitoba, 880,728 lbs., value $158,931; Alberta, 745,122 lbs., value $154,545; Nova Scotia, 94,727, value $16,959, and British Columbia, 18,000 lbs., value $3,960. The average price per lb. of factory cheese for all Canada works out to 21 cents in 1916, as compared with 17 cents in 1915. In 1916 the average price is highest in British Columbia, 25 cents. In Quebec and Ontario the average price is 18 cents, and in Alberta it is 21 cents.



CANADIAN HOMES OF CHARACTER

Prairie Builders, Calgary

THIS "substantial home" is frame construction throughout with shingled roof stained and the exterior covered with narrow siding and painted. There is nothing specially ornate or peculiar about the house; it is a good, plain, comfortable home with every convenience and thoroughly built in every respect. The size of the house is 30 feet in width by 40 feet in depth and is suitable to a south or east frontage. The plan shows a wide piazza across the front and on the left side back to dining room. It is a full two story house with low pitched hip roof and with wide projected bracketed cornice, the piazza roof being treated in the same manner as the main roof.

The vestibule entrance is at the right and opens into a reception hall with platform stairs at the rear built on the combination order with steps leading up to the second platform from the kitchen. There is a good coat closet opening from the rear of the reception hall and a toilet room opening from rear hall. Basement stairs extend down under the main stairs with grade entrance. The living room across the front and the dining room are connected with sliding doors and are both good-sized rooms with wide open fireplace in the end of the living room. These rooms have beam ceilings. At the rear of the dining room is an extra room to be used for bedroom or den with a convenient closet. There is an ample butler's pantry conecting between the dining room and kitchen in the rear and an ample rear porch with balcony overhead, reached from the second story sleeping porch located over the den.

The second floor has four good-sized chambers all provided with ample closets, a large bathroom located over the pantry and a linen closet opening from the front hall. Stairs are provided to the attic leading up over the main stairs, the attic story is not designed to be finished, but has ample space in which to finish two or three rooms if desired. The cost of this house is estimated at $7,000 to $8,000 exclusive of heating and plumbing. The first story is finished in hardwood with oak floor and the second story in white enamel with floor. There is a good concrete foundation under the house with full basement, laundry, drying room, fuel room and heating room, also toilet in the basement.

HORSE-SENSE.

Amongst all of our domestic animals, the horse is one of the most intelligent and sensible," writes M. H. Norton.

"Some people do not believe that animals possess reasoning powers. I do, and therefore I must believe that cows home frometaoin shrdlu m mm horse-sense in a horse is not wholly instinct, but partially, at least, the result of reason.

"When I was a boy I delighted to ride horseback and used to drive the cows home from pasture, mounted on the old family horse—there were no Texas steers in that outfit. One day I put on the saddle, and not being strong enough to properly tighten the cinch strap it became loosened, with the result that while cantering along the road the saddle sullenly swung directly beneath the horse, carrying me with it, with both feet tangled in the stirrups, directly against his hoofs. I made no outcry—was too scared—but that horse stopped instantly, looked around at me, and stood patiently until I had extricated myself from the perilous position in which I was placed. Had he moved one step my head would have been crushed. That was an exhibition of horse-sense prompted, I believe, by reason and not instinct, for instinct would have prompted him to run.

MARKET AND FINANCE

WINNIPEG LETTER

Wheat Markets Are Unsettled

(Thompson, Sons & Co.)

Markets have been somewhat unsettled throughout the week ending today, owing to the advance of the season, with fine crop weather general over all North America, and the progress of harvesting in the United states. In the United States markets there has been a sharp decline in cash wheat, and in the September delivery, which in the last two days has also had against it the influence of the passage by Congress of the new food bill, which was signed by President Wilson on the 10th inst. The United States Food Commissioner, Mr. H. C. Hoover, has not yet, so far as we know, issued decided orders regarding the buying and selling and transportation of grain; probably these will emerge in due time under the experience of developing a new system of trading in grain; there will be much to learn by those to whom the duty of food controlling will fall, and perhaps some things to unlearn on the part of those less experienced in such matters, but we feel sure the great majority of the people affected by the change in conditions will loyally fall in with the rules and regulations to be promulgated, even although full approval may not always be given to the voice of authority. Up to the present our Canadian board of grain supervisors have made no regulations about the handling of the new crop. The task is a difficult one, and besides they await making a co-operative arrangement with the United States authority. In the meantime, the impression is abroad that the United States Food Commissioner is more inclined to lean toward the interest of the consumer in the lessening of prices, than to support the interest of the producer in obtaining a price commensurate with the law of supply and demand. At the present time there is a fine instance in our Winnipeg market of how this works. A few weeks ago our Board of Supervisors issued an order that the maximum price of no. 1 northern for the balance of the old crop would be 240c. On that date, July 21st, prices were no. 1 northern 240c, 2 northern 237c, 3 northern 234c, no. 4 wheat 220c, no. 5 wheat 195c, no. 6 wheat 180c, and feed wheat 152c. Since that date no. 1 northern has, of course stood at 240c, but the prices of all other grades have advanced owing to scarcity of wheat, until within the last few days no 2 northern has sold at the same price as no. 1 northern, and no. 3 northern is only 2c under no. 1 and no. 2 northern. The prices of the lower grades have advanced as follows: No. 4, 11c,; No. 5, 18c; No. 6, 8c; and feed wheat, 20c. With no maximum on No. 1 northern it is quite probable it would have advanced to at least 250c, and perhaps much more, even with speculative trading prohibited. On the 8th inst. the United States government report for August was issued, and the indicated probable yield of the winter and spring wheat was put at 653,000,000 bus. Since the data from which the estimates are compiled was sent in by the crop reporters at country points, the weather has shown improvement, both north and south, and an estimate today would add a few millions of bushels to the above figures. Last week world's shipments were 8,317,000 bushels, against 10,561,000 bushels the previous week and 10,846,000 bushels last year. The United States visible supply decreased last week 601,000 bushels, against an increase last year of 4,599,000 bushels, and the total now stands at only 5,218,000 bushels against 48,760,000 bushels a year ago. The Canadian visible decreased 1,306,823 bushels, against an increase of 883,045 bushels last year, and the total is now 9,110,579, against 20,756,777 bushels. The great difference between the aggregate of this year's visible supplies in the United States and Canada shows how stocks have been cleaned down; the comparison is about 15,300,000 bushels this year against 71,600,000 bushels a year ago. Crop news are practically unchanged on the week. In the Argentine the acreage under wheat is increased and the crop has had a good start. In Australia with recent good rains the crop is progressing favorably. In Europe harvesting is being prosecuted under improved weather; and in the United States, winter wheat country preparations for seeding the new crop are in view.

In our Winnipeg market, conditions are much the same as they have been in the last few weeks. The demand for cash wheat keeps insistent, but is unfilled owing to the gradually decreasing quantity coming forward for sale. Prices for all grades except that for No. 1 northern have advanced 2c to 13c; the maximum price of No. 1 northern, having been fixed by the grain supervisors at 240c is unchanged. All branches of the trade are among the buyers, government agents, individual exporters and shippers, with millers and millers' agents are all alike keen buyers. Stocks of wheat at Fort William and Port Arthur are down to 3,698,000 bushels, and in store west of Winnipeg 3,354,000 bushels. The Dominion government, in face of strong opposition on the part of the grain trade generally, and the farmers' organizations, have ordered sample markets to be established at Winnipeg and Fort William on the 1st of September. Today's cash prices are: No. 1 northern 240c, No. 2 northern 240c, No. 3 northern 238c, No. 4, 231c; No. 5, 213c; No. 6, 188c; Feed, 172c. The October future closed 208 3-8c.

Oats—In the oats market there has been a general decline. The oats crop in the United States is very large and quality good in the middle states where harvesting is going on, and both cash oats and cash corn in the United States have declined heavily, and our prices have gone down in sympathy, the decline in cash oats on the week being 4c to 6c, and in the future deliveries 2c. The oats crop in Western Canada is one of the poorest ever raised, owing to unfavorable conditions at seeding and growing times. Today's cash prices are: No. 2 C. W., 67c; No. 3 C. W. and Ex. No. 1 feed, 60c; No. 1 feed, 54c; No. 2 feed, 54c. Futures closed: October, 66 3-8c; Nov., 62 1-2.

Barley—There has been a better demand for barley at an advance of from two to four cents; No. 3, 123c; No. 4, 119c, rejected and feed, 113c. The October future closed at 116c.

Flax—The flax market has been erratic and irregular, but closes the week at 2-3c to 3c down. No. 1 northwestern, 333c, No. 2 C. W., 327c; No. 3 C. W., 318c. Futures closed: October, 333c; November, 333c; December, 327c.

TWO GRAIN COMPANIES AMALGAMATE

Winnipeg.—At a meeting of the shareholders of the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Ltd., held in the industrial bureau Wednesday, the amalgamation of that company with the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator Co., Ltd., was completed. After September 1 the two companies will cease to exist in name and the United Grain Growers, Limited, will take their place.

The new board: T. A. Crerar, C. Rice-Jones, Calgary; John Kennery, R. McKenzie, F. J. Collyer, J. F. Reid, John Morrison, C. F. Brown, E. J. Fream, Calgary; J. J. McLellan, R. A. Parker and P. S. Austin, of Ranfurly, Alta.

The union gives farmers a company of their own with more than 32,000 shareholders and over $3,000,000 assets, upward of 300 country elevators besides those at Fort William and Port Arthur, with a capacity of over 3,000,000 bushels; implement and supply warehouses at Winnipeg, Regina and Calgary, and livestock commission departments in Calgary, Edmonton and Winnipeg.

The Winnipeg offices of the new company will occupy five floors in the new Bank of Hamilton building.

WINNIPEG LIVESTOCK

Winnipeg, Aug. 16.—Receipts of livestock at the Union stockyards today totaled 900 cattle and 500 hogs. Cattle trading was steady to strong, good butcher steers were in good demand at 25c to 40c stronger than Wednesday. Butcher cows and heifers sold about steady, while bulls and oxen brought a shade stronger price. Stockers and feeders also sold at unchanged prices. Veal calves slow, prices fully $1 per hundredweight easier than last week; sheep and lambs were slow, prices off 50c to $1.00. Milch cows and springers selling from $60 to $100 per head. Hogs went up 20c over Wednesday's market. Selects sold at $16.85; receipts were light.

CHICAGO LIVESTOCK

Chicago, Aug. 16.—Hogs—Receipts, 9,000, strong; top, $18.25, a new high price record. Bulk, $17.30 to $18.10; light, $16.60 to $18.25; mixed, $16.75 to $18.25; heavy, $16.60 to $18.25; rough, $16.60 to $16.80; pigs, $12.00 to $15.25.

Cattle—Receipts, 7,000, weak. Native beef cattle, $6.25 to $15.00; western steers, $7.00 to $12.50; stockers and feeders, $6.10 to $9.40; cows and heifers, $4.60 to $12.75; calves, $10.00 to $14.75.

Sheep—Receipts, 8,000; weak. Wethers, $7.80 to $11.30; ewes, $7.25 to $10.00; lambs, $10.50 to $16.75.

HOGS SELL AT $18.25

Toronto, Aug. 16.—Receipts at the Union stockyards today were 227 cattle, 54 calves, 641 hogs, 238 sheep and lambs.

The market for cattle was steady to firm at slightly better prices for all grades. Choice butcher steers, 10c to 15c higher. Good demand and everything cleared up with the assistance of one or two buyers for Boston, whose presence helped in the stiffening tone of the market.

Calves and lambs firm. Hogs again passed all records and today sold up to $18.25, fed and watered.

MONTREAL PRODUCE

Montreal, Aug. 16.—Cheese firm with a good demand. Eggs strong. Butter market is very firm, and the prospects are for higher prices tomorrow.

Cheese—Finest westerns, 21¾c; finest easterns, 21¾c.

Butter—Choicest creamery, 41c to 42½c; seconds, 40c to 40½c.

Eggs—Fresh, 52c to 53c; selected, 47c; No. 1 stock, 43c; No. 2 stock, 38c to 40c.

Pork—Heavy Canada short mess, barrels, 35 to 40 pieces, 51c to 52c; Canada short cut back, barrels, 45 to 55 pieces, 46c to 48c.

VALUES DEPRECIATE ON N. Y. MARKET

New York, Aug. 16.—For no apparent reason other than those involved in the new peace negotiations and the many domestic problems arising from the war, today's stock market developed heavy tendencies, depreciation of quoted values being aided by pressure from professional traders. Heaviness extended to fails, that division becoming unsettled on the weakness of New Haven, which fell over two points to the new low record of 32½, with a two-point decline in the convertible six per cent. notes. Other rails reacted sympathetically, New York Central falling 1½ at its extreme, and Delaware and Hudson 2%. Pacifics and coalers were disposed to improve, but fell away later on the general decline.

All the activity occurred during the backward movement of the first and last hours, dealings meanwhile dwindling steadily. Moderate buying of representative shares was observed at the lower levels, but otherwise the list lacked support.

Shipings and coppers were among the few exceptions, the former again leading as a group at slight gains, and metals holding for the most part on reports of an early settlement of labor difficulties. Sugars lost 2 to 3½ points in the final dealings on the suspension of trading in futures on the sugar exchange.

Equipments and war shares yielded easily, United States Steel making an extreme decline of 1⅜, Bethlehem Steel 3, and leathers, motors and a few unclassified stocks, 1 to 3, with fractional rallies at the heavy close. Total sales, 510,000 shares.

Bonds were mainly lower with lighter trading in the Liberty issue to 99.88 to 99.96. Total sales, par value, $3,100,000. Panama coupon 3's fell five points on call.

CANADIAN TRADE ON THE INCREASE

Ottawa, Aug. 16.Canada's trade, exclusive of exports and imports of coin and bullion, and of foreign merchandise shipped through Canada, increased, according to a statement by Hon. J. D. Reid, minister of customs, by almost $100,000,000 in July last as compared with July, 1916, and by nearly $290,000,000 in the four months ended July 31, in comparison with the like period last year.

The value of merchandise entered for consumption in July, 1917, was $90,181,595, and in July, 1916, was $63,622,687. Goods entered for consumption in the four months of the present fiscal year amounted to $382,100,850, as against $249,867,867 in the like period of 1916. Exports of domestic goods reached $177,366,149 in July last, and $507,854,674 in the four months' period. They were $104,964,270 in uJly, 1916, and $350,345,305 in the first four months of the last fiscal year.

Exports of foreign merchandise have shown a decided falling off. They were, in July, $2,850,371, and in the four months $11,604,620, while in the same period of 1916 they reached $56,637,340 and $122,627,072 respectively.

WHEAT CROPS WILL HAVE TO BE WATCHED FOR HESSIAN FLY

The Hessian fly, one of the most dangerous pests to the wheat crop, has been discovered. W. W. Thomson and James Harper, B.S.A., employed by the insurance companies, discovered the fly in the Edenwold district:

So far as the discoveries of Mr. Harper are concerned, he stated last evening, after showing samples of the damaged wheat that thousands of acres had been damaged, and that fully 50 per cent. of the fields visited would not yield anything. What damage has been done in the southwest district has not been estimated.

The condition of the grain when attacked by the Hessian fly cannot be mistaken for anything else. The eggs are laid in the straw just above the second node, much the same as the weevil, which has been discovered in the Cupar, Semans and Indian Head district, with this difference, that the weevil cuts the straw and the Hessian fly sucks the sap from the straw, making it brittle and then the straw breaks just as soon as the heat waves strike it. The grain, when the Hessian fly attacks the straw, according to Mr. Harper, will stand up well until near maturing time and then it is discovered not to have filled out, and there are nothing but hulls on the head. In the case of the weevil the straw is cut and the damage easily seen within a few hours after the weevil has committed its depredations.

In the case of the Hessian fly, Mr. Harper stated last evening that the only way in which an infested district could possibly get rid of the pest was to burn the straw.

cinch strap it became loosened, with the result that while cantering along the road the saddle sullenly swung directly beneath the horse, carrying me with it, with both feet tangled in the stirrups, directly against his hoofs. I made no outcry—was too scared—but that horse stopped instantly, looked around at me, and stood patiently until I had extricated myself from the perilous position in which I was placed. Had he moved one step my head would have been crushed. That was an exhibition of horse-sense prompted, I believe, by reason and not instinct, for instinct would have prompted him to run.

WINNIPEG LIVESTOCK

Winnipeg, Aug. 16.—Receipts of livestock at the Union stockyards today totaled 900 cattle and 500 hogs. Cattle trading was steady to strong, good butcher steers were in good demand at 25c to 40c stronger than Wednesday. Butcher cows and heifers sold about steady, while bulls and oxen brought a shade stronger price. Stockers and feeders also sold at unchanged prices. Veal calves slow, prices fully $1 per hundredweight easier than last week; sheep and lambs were slow, prices off 50c to $1.00. Milch cows and springers selling from $60 to $100 per head. Hogs went up 20c over Wednesday's market. Selects sold at $16.35; receipts were light.

CHICAGO LIVESTOCK

Chicago, Aug. 16.—Hogs—Receipts, 9,000, strong; top, $18.25, a new high price record. Bulk, $17.30 to $18.10; light, $16.60 to $18.25; mixed, $16.75 to $18.25; heavy, $16.60 to $18.25; rough, $16.60 to $16.80; pigs, $12.00 to $15.25.

Cattle—Receipts, 7,000, weak. Native beef cattle, $6.25 to $15.00; western steers, $7.00 to $12.50; stockers and feeders, $6.10 to $9.40; cows and heifers, $4.60 to $12.75; calves, $10.00 to $14.75.

Sheep—Receipts, 8,000; weak. Wethers, $7.80 to $11.30; ewes, $7.25 to $10.00; lambs, $10.50 to $16.75.

HOGS SELL AT $18.25

Toronto, Aug. 16.—Receipts at the Union stockyards today were 227 cattle, 54 calves, 841 hogs, 238 sheep and lambs.

The market for cattle was steady to firm at slightly better prices for all grades. Choice butcher steers, 10c to 15c higher. Good demand and everything cleared up with the assistance of one or two buyers for Boston, whose presence helped in the stiffening tone of the market.

Calves and lambs firm. Hogs again passed all records and today sold up to $18.25, fed and watered.

MONTREAL PRODUCE

Montreal, Aug. 16.—Cheese firm with a good demand. Eggs strong. Butter market is very firm, and the prospects are for higher prices tomorrow.

Cheese—Finest westerns, 21¾c; finest easterns, 21¾c.

Butter—Choicest creamery, 41c to 42½c; seconds, 40c to 40½c.

Pork—Heavy Canada short mess, barrels, 35 to 40 pieces, 51c to 52c; Canada short cut back, barrels, 45 to 55 pieces, 46c to 48c.

Stokes Stephens has sent part of their crew to Sweet Grass to prepare for drilling operations. Production continues steadily at Alberta Petroleum Consolidated and temporary arrangements have been completed to sell their oil at better than $3 per barrel at the well. Record has been making very good progress. Southern Alberta No. 2 is held up until 4½ inch casing can be installed. Market slow except for strong demand for Alberta Petroleum Cons and Southern Alberta.

CANADIAN TRADE

Ottawa, Aug. 16.—Canada's trade, exclusive of exports and imports of corn and bullion, and of foreign merchandise shipped through Canada, increased, according to a statement by Hon. J. D. Reid, minister of customs, by almost $100,000,000 in July last, as compared with July, 1916, and by nearly $296,000,000 in the four months ended July 31, in comparison with the like period last year.

TWO GRAIN COMPANIES AMALGAMATE

Winnipeg.—At a meeting of the shareholders of the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Ltd., held in the industrial bureau Wednesday, the amalgamation of that company with the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator Co., Ltd., was completed. After September 1 the two companies will cease to exist in name and the United Grain Growers, Limited, will take their place.

The new board: T. A. Crerar, C. Rice-Jones, Calgary; John Kennery, R. McKenzie, F. J. Collyer, J. F. Reid, John Morrison, C. F. Brown, E. J. Fream, Calgary; J. J. McLellan, R. A. Parker and P. S. Austin, of Ranfurly, Alta.

The union gives farmers a company of their own with more than 32,000 shareholders and over $3,000,000 assets, upward of 300 country elevators besides those at Fort William and Port Arthur, with a capacity of over 3,000,000 bushels; implement and supply warehouses at Winnipeg, Regina and Calgary, and livestock commission departments in Calgary, Edmonton and Winnipeg.

The Winnipeg offices of the new company will occupy five floors in the new Bank of Hamilton building.

EVERY DISABLED SOLDIER SHOULD KNOW

That there is no such word as "impossible" in his dictionary.

That his natural ambition to earn a good living can be fulfilled.

That he can either get rid of his disability or acquire a new ability to offset it.

That the whole object of doctors, nurses, and instructors, is to help him in doing that very thing.

That he must help them to help him.

That he will have the most careful and effectual treatment known to science.

That interesting and useful occupations form a most valuable part of the treatment in convalescent hospitals and Sanatoria.

That if he cannot carry out his first duty by rejoining his comrades at the front, and if there is no light duty for him with the Canadian forces overseas, he is taken home to Canada, as soon as his condition and the shipping facilities make this possible.

That his strength and earning capacity will be restored there to the highest degree possible, through the Military Hospitals commission.

That if he requires an artificial limb or kindred appliance it will be supplied free.

That every man disabled by service will receive a pension or gratuity in proportion to his disability.

That his pension cannot be reduced by him undertaking work or perfecting himself in some form of industry.

That his pay and allowance continue till he is cured or till his pension begins.

That an extra three months' pay and separation allowance when there are dependents receiving such allowance, will be paid to all men returned from overseas and honorably discharged after at least six months' service, with certain exceptions, such as members of the Permanent Force and Federal or Provincial Civil Service who can step right back into their old positions.

That if his disability prevents him from returning to his old work he will receive new training for a new occupation.

That full consideration is given to his own capacity and desires when a new occupation has to be chosen.

That his own will-power and determination will enable him to succeed, both in the training and in the occupation afterwards.

That his maintenance and that of his family will be paid for during the training he may receive after discharge, and for a month longer.

That neither his treatment nor his training will cost him a cent.

That his home province has a special commission to assist him in finding employment on discharge.

That hundreds of towns and villages have committees, associations, and clubs, to welcome him on arrival, and to help in securing a position for him.

That the Dominion and provincial governments, the municipal authorities, and all sorts of employers, give the returned soldier preference in filling vacant positions.

That the returned soldier wishing to take up land and farm it, will be helped to do so, under Federal and other settlement schemes.

That the military hospitals commission exists to carry out his restoration and training in Canada.

That the board of pension commissioners exists to distribute the pension provided by his country for him and his dependents.

That the military hospitals commission and the board of pension commissioners are in the position of trustees, appointed for his benefit, and representing the whole people of Canada.

That, therefore, he should write direct to the commission or the board if he needs advice or help.

Canadians are unanimously resolved that every returned soldier shall have a full opportunity to succeed. When that opportunity is put within his reach, his success will depend on his own good sense in seizing and using it.

This is intellectual stuff: The spread of intelligence embraces only what the appetite requires.

Various Forms Of Headache

"It is necessary in order to treat headaches properly to understand the causes which produce the affection," says Dr. J. W. Ray, of Blockton, Ala. Continuing, he says, "Physicians cannot even begin the treatment of a disease without knowing what causes give rise to it, and we must remember that headache is to be treated according to the same rule. We must not only be particular to give a remedy intended to counteract the cause which produces the headache, but we must also give a remedy to relieve the pain until the cause of the trouble has been removed. To answer this purpose anti-kamnia tablets will be found a most convenient and satisfactory remedy. One tablet every one to three hours gives comfort and rest in the most severe cases of headache, neuralgia, and particularly the headaches of women.

"When we have a patient subject to regular attacks of sick headache and when he feels the least sign of an oncoming attack, he should take two A-K Tablets. Obtainable at druggists in any quantity desired."

Synopsis of Canadian Northwest Land Regulations.

THE sole head of a family, or any male over 18 years old, who was at the commencement of the present war, and has since continued to be, a British subject or a subject of an allied or neutral country, may homestead a quarter-section of available Dominion Land in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta. Applicant must appear in person at Dominion Lands Agency or Sub-Agency for District. Entry by proxy may be made on certain conditions. Duties—Six months residence upon and cultivation of land in each three years.

In certain districts a homesteader may secure an adjoining quarter-section pre-emption. Price $3.00 per acre. Duties—Reside six months in each of three years after earning homestead patent and cultivate 50 acres extra. May obtain pre-emption patent as soon as homestead patent on certain conditions.

A settler after obtaining homestead patent, if he cannot secure a pre-emption, may take a purchased homestead in certain districts. Price $3.00 per acre. Must reside six months in each of three years, cultivate 50 acres and erect a house worth $300.00.

Holders of entries may count time employment as farm laborers in Canada during 1917, as residence duties under certain conditions.

When Dominion Lands are advertised or posted for entry, returned soldiers who have served overseas and have been honorably discharged, receive one day priority in applying for entry at local Agent's Office (but not Sub-Agency). Discharge papers must be presented to Agent.

W. W. CORY,
Deputy Minister of the Interior.

STORIES FROM THE SEAT OF WAR

"I don't say we tunnelers did it all at Messines, you understand—not a bit. But we did our bit," said one of the Anzacs, otherwise known at the front as "the Wombats." The nickname is from the burrowing habits of the Australian animal, the wombat.

Thanks largely to the arduous and risky labors of "the Wombats" for many months previously the main German position at Wytschaete was blow asunder the middle of June, but unluckily for Hammond he was not there to see the tremendous upheaval, having been invalided back to the commonwealth. Hammond stands 6 feet 4½ inches and is a native of Utah. He is an expert in railroad construction work.

Hammond and his fellow-soldiers were dispatched to the front in May, 1916. After two months of underground work his superiors found that he was so tall that he would be better be employed outside than inside the shafts being constructed, so he was put on a "dump job." That is to say, he was one of a detail of men whose duty it was to bring up supplies—mostly lumber and sandbags—to the tunnelers.

It was a star shell which at last brought about his undoing. In the pitch blackness which abruptly followed it he lost his bearings and rolled off a duck board and down a bank. He bruised one of his legs so madly that he was sent back to Sydney, but a few days ago he was discharged practically well. Speaking of the operations which rent Messines ridge, Hammond said:

"We were divided into three tunneling companies, and after being reinforced by a number of British troops were distributed along a distance of approximately twenty-five miles. At intervals we sank shafts and drove a series of tunnels in the direction of the German lines. Communication was established between the various shafts by means of crosscuts. As each tunnel was completed mines were laid in readiness to be exploded by electricity. The work was in progress for twelve months and many of the mines were laid six and seven months ago.

"A new explosive is being used. It is a British invention, but I do not know the constituent parts except, of course, that guncotton is used. It is far more powerful than gelingnite or nitro-glycerine and does untold damage.

"The Australians commenced tunneling under Hill 60 as far back as May of last year. At one place the Australians' work was carrier on on month after month without arousing the slightest suspicion among the Germans, and they continued to tunnel straight ahead. One shaft was 35 feet deep, and we succeeded in extending several tunnels 1,400 feet under the German lines. That work had been accomplished when I left the front last November and other preparations were in progress for the great offensive. We tunneled right under the German lines, under their supports, their dugouts, and their machine gun emplacements without our work being discovered."

SPORT BRIEFS

The commissioned members at Sarcee camp defeated the cavalry and infantry units in the cricket match. The score was 111 to 87.

Leon J. Cadore, a pitcher of the Brooklyn National League club, passed the physical examination before an exemption board here. Cadore waived exemption.

"Speed" Minor, by scoring 3 runs, stealing 3 bases and polling out four hits, brought him to the top of the league, whereby he captures Boyle's silver bat and ball.

Ty Cobb is still in the lead. Some batter! His hitting average is .385 for 105 games. He made 155 hits, including 30 doubles, 21 triples and 5 home runs. Fifteen more points and he hits .400.

The southern A. A. U. outdoor swimming championships will be held at Atlanta, Ga. Sanction has been granted to the Atlanta A. C. for five senior and three junior title events and they will be run off in a two-day meet on August 17 and 18.

Steamer Maxwell is trying to arrange with the Calgary baseball associations, to have them send a team to Winnipeg in September to compete for the inter-provincial championship. Maxwell is a veteran of the old Monarch baseball team in Winnipeg.

Hugo Bezdek's contract as manager of the Pittsburgh club contains a clause whereby he can coach the University of Oregon football team this fall if he desires. Bezdek is a former University of Chicago back field star and was best noted as a line plunger.

Detroit.—Eddie Plank, the veteran lefthander, has retired permanently from baseball, it became known today. Plank left the team last Saturday. Plank's last game was pitched in Washington a week ago Monday, when Walter Johnson defeated him 1 to 0 in 11 innings.

There will be no more S. P. A. league fixtures until Aug. 27, when the Cubs and Columbus club will hook up in a league fixture. The standing of the league after last night's game is as follows:

An allied carnival and military and athletic tournament will be held under the auspices of the Majestic Athletic association in the ballroom and roof garden of the Hotel Majestic in New York, Oct. 2, 3 and 4. England and Belgium will give exhibitions of military sports, tugs of war, fencing, and boxing on opening night; France, Italy, Serbia and Roumania will present their entertainment the second evening, and the French athletes will conclude the entertainment.

Le Fohl declares that if the White Sox win a pennant this year it will be through unfair tactics. He charge every White Sox pitcher with disfiguring balls. He has a collection of balls used by White Sox pitchers which, he says all have tell-tale black spots, where some substance has been used to shine them.

It isn't improbable that Fohl is right, for Dave Danfarth is credited with having discovered the "shine ball" while with Louisville and taking it with him to Chicago.

OMAR OF THE U. P. RETIRES AND CANFIELD TAKES HIS PLACE

Announcement comes of the departure of Mr. L. E. Omar, who has acted as the Alberta passenger and traveling agent of the Union Pacific in Calgary for the past year. Many Calgarians will regret to learn of his departure and particularly the traveling public as his pleasing personality and obliging demeanor has ingratiated him into the public's confidence to the extent that people who desired to travel, have been wont to wend their way to the Union Pacific office knowing that they would get a fair and impartial report regarding conditions, expense, etc.

Mr. Omar will be succeeded by Mr. L. J. Canfield who comes from Walla Walla, Wash., where he has been the traveling agent for the Union Pacific. Mr. Canfield will have to "go some" to equal Mr. Omar's record although we must confess he shows the earmarks of a close second. The Union Pacific office is at 809 Center street.

KEEN COMPETITION IN TENNIS GAMES

A most successful afternoon's play was held on Saturday when the men's handicap singles for the Crosby bowl, presented by Miss Craufurd, was started and almost reached the semi-final stage.

There were 18 entrants for the event but, unfortunately four competitors were unable to take part.

Some very close matches were contested and that between P. R. Bryenton and J. R. Henley was one of the features of the afternoon, both playing good tennis, the first set going to Bryenton 8-6 and Henley taking the last two sets, 6-4, 6-3.

Whittle vs. Hepburn was also a long and closely contested match, the former winning in two straight sets, 6-4, 11-9.

F. Parker won against J. G. Porter, 6-1, 6-3, and afterwards defeated F. V. Stuart on equal terms, 6-4, 6-2.

The finals will be played on Saturday, August 25. The following is the result of Saturday's matches:

J. R. Henley (owe 15) won from P. R. Bryenton (owe 15), 6-8, 6-4, 6-3.

R. Q. Henley (scratch) won from H. A. Allison (scratch) by default.

L. H. Fenerty (owe ½ 30) won from J. R. Henley (owe 15) 6-0, 6-2.

E. H. Horstman (owe ½ 15) won from H. S. Leask (owe ½ 15) by default.

H. K. Richardson (owe ½ 15) won from H. A. Matthews (scratch) by default.

DON'T

Don't cover your rear number with a spare tire. B a real sport.

Don't hog the midle of the road.

Don't run in front of a street car. There is more room behind it.

Don't gamble on what the other fellow is going to do, for he may be a gambler, too. If so and you take a chance, you'll both lose; but it's too bad about the cars.

Far more effective than Sticky Fly Catchers. Clean to handle. Sold by Druggists and Grocers everywhere.

GUN CLUB TO HOLD TOURNEY AUGUST 29

W. J. McLaren was winner of the "A" class spoon in the Calgary Gun club shoot yesterday, with a score of 24 birds. A large number of the gunners were present and plans were arranged for a big merchandise shoot August 29.

The event will be in the nature of a tourney, and prizes will be donated by friends of the club. Birds will sell at five cents each, and the proceeds will go to the Canadian Red Cross fund. The score yesterday follows:

R. G. Robinson	23	23	25
W. J. McLaren	24	17	21
O. Youell	22	24	22
Dr. Mertz	21	23	—
Joe Garden	21	21	23
R. R. Burden	19	21	22
E. G. Foley	16	17	—
George Muckle	23	21	—
R. C. Ross	23	21	—
F. Scott	16	—	—
R. S. Hill	15	—	—

DON'T BE AFRAID TO STAND UP TO THE PLATE

Now that the tournament is close at hand, the players need encouragement, so listen to this:

Fellows, do you want to lam it out for .300 or better in the big game? Take a few tips from an old timer, who has been all the way through, from the bushes to the large time, and you can break into the select circle.

There's not much difference between standing up to the plate in the battle of life, and facing the guy from the next town in a Saturday afternoon pastime on the sand lot. You'll find it works out just about the same.

First of all, stand up there! The old devil, who's serving them up to many of us in life's game, is going to cut loose with everything he carries, but don't let him get your goat. He'll probably lob over a slow one first, one of those easy teasers that looks like a pipe to get away with. That's when he tries to make you forget your religion and your soul. Watch for this change of pace. Don't break your back swinging like a gate for that slow pill. You're as good as fanned if he sneaks that one across.

It takes all the pep out of you.

Let it go by and hand him a hoot.

Then he may serve a fast one on the outside. You may think you can reach over and pickle this, but you'll find it's got a wide break to it. That's one of the devil's favorite offerings. It's the old booze he's trying to make you fall for, and you're a mark if you start after that one.

Batters in the Life's league have been trying for ages to make a hit off that old shoot, but the best of them have whiffed out, and none of them has ever connected squarely. Lay off that tempting booze ball, or the first thing you know your batting average will figure out with the same numerals as the size of your hat—Six and five-eighths. I know. I've taken a few swings myself, and I've seen the best of them slink back to the bench finally for a drink of water—all in and through. You can't beat it.

There's another one that the devil will try you out with. This shoots up as if it was going right across the rubber, but it breaks on the inside, close up to your letters, and the best you could ever get would be a foul strike off the handle of your bat. This twister is gambling—the old ponies, the pasteboard fifty-two, the bones, beating the stock market, the idea of getting something for nothing. There's nohing to that, fellows, believe the old timer. Don't go after that easy sugar. Hustle for what you get and it'll stick with you.

Let all these balls breeze by, and you've got the devil in a hole. Against his will, he'll have to serve one right down the groove, or else walk you, which he never does. That old fast, straight one is what he has to hurl now. He will rely on his smoke to make you miss it. This pill is old opportunity.

Oh, boy! Dig your spikes in, swing back your shoulders, bring the old ash around and bust that ball right on the beezer! There she goes! Wow! Up and up, far away. Over the fence—a homer! And a homer in the League of Life, in the Lord's league, is some happy smash. Try for it, old scout, and win in this coming tournament.

A WITTY PUBLICATION

The Canadian Oil issues a delightful little house organ called Canadian Oil News. It is replete with many witty sayings and information generally. Here's a little ditty some of us will appreciate:

King Solomon and King David
Led merry, merry lives,
With many, many lady friends
And many, many wives;
But when old age crept over them,
With many, many qualms,
King Solomon wrote the Proverbs
And King David wrote the Psalms.

Things An Autoist Should Know

THE FIRST AUTOMOBILE OVER 200 YEARS AGO

Merely a sketch of the history of the automobile is, in itself, significant hows and whys of the development of a self-propelled vehicle which has converted the formidable road engine of a hundred years ago into the graceful and easy-running automobile of today—a development that lays largely within the past 70 years.

Up to 1769 the horseless carriage existed only as an ideal. Of the many interesting conceptions which had been brought forward, none was of the slightest permanence. The proposition advanced by Sir Isaac Newton in 1680, is worthy of mention only for its quaintness. This unique contrivance was expected literally to kick itself ahead by reaction against atmospheric resistance to the jet of steam which it blew out rearward.

"The first steam vehicle which really ran was that of Nicholas Joseph Cugnot, 1769 and 1771," says a writer in the Scientific American. "Cugnot's second model is still to be seen in a Paris museum. He was followed during the decades from 1780 to 1840 by a vast number of more or less successful experimenters. Some of their machines ran and others did not; some were playthings and others commercial propositions; but none of them survived the tests of time and of the profit and loss account.

"It is to be emphasized that in this period little or no historical continuity is to be found. Each inventor worked out his own ideas, without any attempt to apply or improve upon those of his predecessors, so that in every respect it was a century of sporadic effort rather than of definite progress in any particular direction.

"Nevertheless, the results achieved admit of a certain classification. In the first place we can identify two permanently distinct principles employed in the source of power. Most inventors used a thermic generator, demanding that the vehicle carry a supply of fuel, by the combustion of which heat was produced, to be converted into energy. But there were always a few more daring ones who sought to employ a reservoir of stored-up energy in the form of compressed air, flexed springs, etc.; and these devices, of which the most notable was a compressed-air car that actually ran in Paris in 1853, have a lieal descendant in the present day electric.

"Then, too, in external appearance, we find the proposed conveyances falling into two well-defined groups. First in point of time comes the road engine or steam roller type. Second, we have the true horseless carriage, involving the addition of power plant and transmission to a vehicle which retains the characteristic appearance of the horse-drawn vehicle. The specimens and the quaint wagon steered by reins are to be classified here.

"At first development of power transportation followed two entirely distinct lines. On the one hand, we find the conception of the superior trackage to be secured by the laying of rails; and at a very early date these were extensively employed for horse and mule vehicles along busy routes, and for mine and factory trucks drawn by donkey engines and cable. On the other hand, as we have indicated, came the efforts to produce a suitable road engine or steam carriage for service on the common roads. It would seem from this distance that these conceptions should have been united at a very early date."

6,000,000 ACRES RELEASED FOR GRAIN TO FEED MEN

Every motor truck in use helps to conserve the grain supply for human beings, and some estimates as to what this saving is have been made by Harry W. Perry, of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce. "At the beginning of this year there were 300,000 trucks in use in the United States," said Mr. Perry last week. "Each commercial motor vehicle takes the place, on the average, of three horse-drawn vehicles and between four and five horses. Each horse displaced relieves between four and five acres of land from raising grain for horse feed, so each truck means the turning of 20 acres of land for other agricultural purposes than horse provender. Therefore the 300,000 trucks release approximately 6,000,000 acres from providing power for horse-drawn vehicles. Three acres are required for the support of a human being. Thus an army of 2,000,000 men can be fed from the land that would be required to feed horses to take the place of the 300,000 motor trucks.

"INSIDE STUFF" ON BEST SLANG

Phrenologists Given Credit for Neat Phrases

Philadelphia.—The American Society of Phrenologists at its recent meeting in Philadelphia prepared for baseball writers and fans a list of terms that may be used as synonymous for "hit on the head," thus conferring a great favor on those who are always looking for something new. Here they are:

Drubbed on the dome.
Bammed on the bean.
Tapped on the conk.
Bumped on the beezer.
Biffed on the coco.
Busted on the cranium.
Whiffed on the skull.
Cracked on the nut.
Nailed on the knob.
Slugged in the belfry.
Lammed on the peak.
Dinged on the brain box.

MOTOR NOTES

The importation of automobiles, traction engines and parts thereof, into the Federated Malay states has been prohibited, except under license. The prohibition on the importation of automobiles into the Straits Settlements and the duty of 10 per cent. on automobiles in the Federated Malay states were recently announced.

Officials of the Firestone Tire and Rubber company are jubilant over the concern's victory in the Perlman rim patent case, in which a patent infringement suit was lost by L. H. Perlman, head of the $8,000,000 Perlman corporation. It is said the withdrawal of the suit relieves makers and buyers of automobiles of a royalty tax amounting to between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000 a year.

SAFETY FIRST

There was a man who fancied,
That by driving good and fast,
He'd get his car across the track
Before the train came past;
He'd miss the engine by an inch,
And make the train crew sore;
There WAS a man who fancied this,
There isn't any more.

HUDSON'S BAY CO. IN LONDON

In London, at a meeting of the Hudson's Bay company, it was stated by Governor Kindersley that the land sales were rapidly growing, which shows that people are going back to the land. Their store sales were also at a high figure.

The directors resolved to institute a taxation reserve fund in view of the heavy liability of the company. A continued improvement was shown in sale shops; the policy of building large stores was fully justified. The company today generally stood in a thoroughly sound position.

ST. HILDA'S LADIES' COLLEGE

At a meeting of the board of governors of St. Hilda's Ladies' college, held on Tuesday last, the Bishop of Calgary presiding, it was decided that both the exterior and interior of the college building should be redecorated in accordance with a specification furnished by John Jones, decorator, thus rendering the premises thoroughly up-to-date. This work is to be taken in hand immediately, so that the building may be ready for occupation when the pupils reassemble on September 11.

Something About the FIJI ISLANDS

A Short Sketch of the Land and People of This Picturesque Island—Visit of a Battalion to Calgary Last Week En Route to the Front.

THE average person thinks only of cannibalism when the Fijis are mentioned, for this terrible mania so common years ago among the Fiji people has been exploited in history to such an extent that it has completely overshadowed any good qualities that the natives might possess. But the cannibal days of the Fijis are over, and today they are living the simple life of the average South Sea Islands—and under the British flag.

Early History

The Islands first came into history about the middle of the seventeenth century, when the celebrated Dutch navigator, Tasman, published the log of the adventures of his ship, "Heemshirk." Tasman merely sailed around the islands, and it was a century or more later before the white man set foot upon them. The famous Captain Cook, who lost his life in the Hawaiian Islands, also saw the land now known as the Fijis, and learned something of the native commerce between the islands. In 1796 Captain Wilson, sailing on the "Duff," narrowly escaped shipwreck on the Fiji reefs and brought back only slight information concerning them. In 1827 the French ship "Astrolabe" was sent to the South Seas on an exploring cruise and after 17 days among the natives some accurate information was obtained. The United States next took a hand in prying into their secrets, for in 1838 Commodore Wilkes was sent to chart the waters thereabouts. Three years before this, however, a few Wesleyan missionaries had arrived on the islands, and were trying to Christianize the savages. Cannibalism in its worst forms prevailed and many of these good people suffered martyrdom through the most fiendish devices which savagery could inflict, but others came to take their place and the white man finally began to gain ground.

How Great Britain Came Into Possession

The islands were ruled at that time by King Thakombau, who was a monster of cruelty, and one who lived entirely upon human flesh. In 1855, however, there came a check to his cruelty when the United States government became incensed over the brutal murder of a number of shipwrecked sailors and demanded a large compensation, which the king was unable to pay. In order to get rid of the debt he offered the islands to Great Britain, but the offer was refused as England did not think the islands worth the indemnity, and they went begging for more than 16 years longer. During the Civil war in the States, an Englishman discovered that cotton thrived there, and soon immigration started from Australia, but as there was still danger the project did not succeed. Then the chiefs of the island began to make war upon each other, and Thakombau found himself hard pressed by Maafe, a powerful chief of a neighboring island, and after two years of fighting the old chief found that it was a question of giving up to his rival or offering the islands to Great Britain once more. This time his offer was accepted and since 1874 it has been a crown colony. The old king was retired upon a good salary and forced to change his diet as the new governor made it plain that England would no longer tolerate cannibalism and it gradually died out. Later the old king became a Christian, in name at least, and died in 1883. Many of the old cannibal clubs and drums are preserved in the library at Suva, while others were sent to the British museum in London.

The British at once began to cultivate the land, which they found unusually fertile. They brought coolies from India to work on the plantations and gradually the native has been pushed back to make room for the energetic English settler, and so, like the Hawaiian, the Fijian is passing and his land is being peopled by the men of other lands.

Origin a Mystery

The origin of the Fijian race is shrouded in mystery, for they in common with the Polynesians have no literature, and even the legends handed down from father to son contain no hint of their origin. The Fijians themselves believe that they have always lived upon the islands and in the language of a converted native, "All are said to have been born of one pair of first parents. The Fijian was born first, but acted wickedly, and was black; he, therefore, received but little clothing. The Tongan (another race inhabiting the islands) was next born. He acted less wickedly, was whiter and had more clothes given him. White men came last. They acted well, were white and had plenty of clothes." From the natives' appearance it would seem that they are a link between the two distinct types of people—the eastern and the western Polynesians, and it would seem certain that the original stock of the Fiji people contained both African and Asiatic blood.

The natives are strong, well built people with a keenness of sight, a sensitiveness of touch and smell, and a power of hearing which is little short of marvelous. Their power of endurance is not great and while they could hardly be called lazy they are spasmodic workers and labor best when in a crowd of workmen. Then they try to excel each other. They are resourceful in many ways and will make rope for tying baggage from bamboo by cutting it with the sharp edge of a shell. They will make a rain-roof covering of banana leaves and twigs in a few minutes. They are proud of their birth and vain as to their personal appearance. They invariably carry a small mirror in their pockets and frequently stop to comb their hair and admire themselves before it. Those natives who have taken to European clothes are exceedingly fopish. They are polite to their superiors and not over-truthful in their statements.

They love feasting and the dance above all things, and on every occasion there is a feast. Few have learned to use the dishes of the civilized races, and today when one sits at a Fijian feast he will find food cokeod in crude earthen ware in an oven formed of hot stones. Mussel shells serve as soup spoons, fingers take the place of knives and forks, while the drink in served in cocoanut shells. Roast pig is the favorite meat although the large turtles so numerous about the islands are also frequently found on their menus. Yams, which grow in abundance, as well as bread fruit, are also favorite dishes. Their old drink is little used on account of its effect. It is known as "yaqona," and made from the root of a plant and has a peculiar narcotic effect. The root is pounded at present, although in the old days it was chewed and spat in a bowl. The English physicians put a stop to this filthy practice and it is now pounded in the bowl and mixed with water. The solid matter is extracted by a fibre brush and a muddy looking liquid remains. This is drunk from cocoanut shells and the shells are then spun back to the bowl to be refilled. Drank in moderation the beverage has no ill effects but when taken in large quantities it produces inflammation of the eyes, a numbness of the limbs and a scaliness of the skin. The British government forbids its use to any great extent.

Their dance is known as the "meke" and is danced to a song. At present it is a tame affair as war clubs are not used, and only a limited amount of the native drink may be obtained, so there is no "encouragement" by which the dancers can work themselves into a frenzy. Some of the movements are not unlike those of the Maori dancers. A native band furnishes the music by using strange tom-toms made of hollow bamboo.

House and Canoe Builder

As a house builder the Fijian has no equal in the Pacific. The structures are picturesque, strong and well built. The timbers are shaped with adzes and tied in place with cords of sinnet. Rushes and sugar cane leaves form the thatched roof and are fastened to the rafters with scraped reeds. Their canoe building, too, was remarkable but on account of the English motor boats, which have been brought to the islands it is becoming a lost art. In the interior of the islands some of these big canoes still ply up and down the rivers.

The language of the islands at present is English although in the interior the natives still use their native tongue—a Polynesian dialect with a limited vocabulary. The old religion of the Fijis was fetishistic and in some cases totemistic, a fact shown by the hideous idols or totems which were set up in the forests before the coming of the white man. Today the Christian religion holds at least a nominal sway over the islands. In the rural districts the old superstitions still exist and some of the old rites are practiced secretly, but the major portion of the people are civilized to such an extent that already a literature is springing up.

Geography and Climate

Two hundred and thirty islands go to make up the group known as the Fijis and they spread themselves over 120,000 square miles of sea which in some places between the islands runs in a dangerous current. Some of the smaller islands are comparatively recent as geologists measure time, which proves them to be of volcanic origin. The approach by steamer is both striking and beautiful for the mainlands are indented with numerous bays. Farther back, high, verdure-crowned mountains rise and between them are deep, shadowy valleys and mysterious looking trails beside the rivers which come down from the mountain like tiny threads of silver. In sailing around the islands one gets a great variety of scenery from lofty mountains to low wooded shores skirted by the velvety border of mangrove bushes.

Suva is the principal town and bears the stamp of Great Britain at every angle, but although this is a pleasant place to linger it is not Fiji, for the real Fiji is in the forest and up the wonderful rivers with their queer fish and strange birds.

The climate is, of course, tropical but comparatively cool considering its proximity to the Equator. Moun-

Prussia Has Grown Under Ruthless War

From Humble Beginnings In The Mark of Brandenburg to the Present Day She Has Had Amazing Growth.

Two well known authors have written interesting articles on Prussia showing the amazing growth of that country from her humble beginnings in the Mark of Brandenburg to the present day.

Three centuries ago Prussia held sway over a few patches of territory in northern Germany. Now she controls, either as actual Prussian territory, or by virtue of her tremendous military preponderance, all of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, Turkey and Luxemburg, practically all of Belgium and Serbia, more than half of Rumania, all of Russian Poland, and large portions of adjoining Russian territory, and considerable sections of northern France.

Frederick William, the "Great Elector," began the work of creating Greater Prussia. Under him (1640-88) Prussian overlordship was extended over parts of East Prussia, Pomerania, etc. Under him, and especially his successor, that gloomy Hohenzollern, Frederick William I., the Prussian army rose to a high degree of efficiency.

This made it possible for the next ruler of Prussia, now known to world-wide fame as Frederick the Great, to win a series of victories against a powerful coalition of European rivals, and annex to his dominions Silesia, taken from Austria, more of East Prussia, and other territory. Later Frederick participated, with Russia and Austria, in the first partition of Poland, and, to the Polish territory thus acquired by Prussia other parts of that hapless kingdom were added by Frederick's successor, Frederick William II. The greater Prussia resulted from these wars

The further expansion of Prussia followed the war against Denmark in 1864, and that against Austria in 1866. As a result of these, she acquired Schleswig-Holstein, Hanover, and Hesse, and wrested from Austria her position as the most influential member of the North German confederation. Thus closed the first chapter in the history of Prussian expansion under Bismarck.

Then came the Franco-German war of 1870-71. From this war the German empire sprang into being, under Prussian influence, and the French territory of Alsace-Lorraine was added to the German dominions under Prussian tutelage. By the formation of the German empire Bismarck brought under Prussian hegemony all the South German states, among which the most important is Bavaria.

Between 1870 and 1914 Prussian ambition reached out across the boundaries of the German empire and brought the neighboring empire of Austria-Hungary within its shadow to such an extent that, when the world war began, the Austro-Hungarian government was practically at the what proportions Prussian influence beck and call of Berlin, and shows to had grown on the eve of the fatal 1st of August, 1914.

What is the situation at the present moment? From a humble North German state, Prussia has developed into a powerful kingdom, with actual territory stretching far beyond her original frontiers, and a sphere of influence reaching from the North Sea to the Persian Gulf and constituting the mighty Prussianized chain of allied and conquered lands to which the name Mittel-Europa is nowadays constantly applied.

With only 40,000,000 inhabitants within her frontiers, Prussia now lords it over 136,000,000 inhabitants of other lands, including those in all the other portions of the German empire, Austrians, Hungarians, Bulgars, European and Asiatic Turks, Frenchmen, Belgians, Luxemburgers, Russians, Poles, Lithuanians, Ruthenians, Czechs, Jugo-Slavs, Rumanians, Italians, Armenians, Levantines, Ottoman Greeks and Arabs.

GERMANY'S FOOD SUPPLY IS GETTING VERY LOW

It is announced by people who came recently from Germany, that the food supply is getting very low. At least, some say that that country lacks 600,000 tons of wheat of the amount necessary to supply the people till the middle of August, when the crop is gathered. Officials of certain states in Germany have issued notices to the effect that there would be a great lack of wheat during June, July and part of August. Only the northern part can boast of a good crop, so on the whole there will be a great shortage.

It is thought by some that the food sent by America for the relief of the Belgians has been consumed in a German military hospital at Antwerp.

In Poland the people are starving for want of food.

Austria-Hungary is inclined to be hostile toward Germany, the tension growing more and more as the general difficulties arise in Germany.

COMMENTS AND CRITICISM

THE ALIEN VOTE AND INFLUENCE

The authorities should use all their influence to pass measures in parliament which will keep aliens from voting during the coming elections. The influence which the aliens cast, might go against the "Win-the-War" party and thus conscription would fall through. Though we have nothing against certain aliens, we must remember that we are fighting against their relatives and friends and though openly they do not care to oppose, deep down in their hearts a sound resounds, "My fatherland!" However, if certain of these men, who have lived here for years and have proven themselves worthy citizens, can honestly feel for the country of their adoption, they should be allowed to vote. There are many such as these, and they sometimes receive unjust criticism.

PROGRESS ON THE PORT ARTHUR ELEVATOR

Rapid progress is being made on the 2,500,000 bushel elevator which is being constructed by the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator company at Port Arthur. Every 24 hours the construction is made five feet higher and the huge tanks are gradually taking form. Since the commencement there has been trouble with labor employed, the shortage and inefficiency of labor delaying the progress very much. The moving forms for the storage annex are made up and set in place, while the necessary machinery is already delivered to the site. In fact, all the preliminaries have been completed, and by present indications the elevator will receive grain by October 1.

All assistance possible should be given by the government and the local authorities to this worthy undertaking. Furnishing sufficient labor to the builders means that the building will be ready at a time when the farmers will need assistance of this character. To delay the construction even a few weeks may mean a great loss to the farming interests and help to keep the high cost of living up.

NORMAL CONDITIONS

The wise man alone is satisfied with normal conditions.

The folish man as well as the bright man, the lazy man as well as the ambitious man, are only satisfied with something more or something less than the normal.

More happiness is packed into normal living, more contentment, more permanent results, more satisfaction when all is over.

To get more money than is required to satisfy normal desires, to make an inroad into exclusive social circles, to have high aspirations for book lore, even to become righteous overmuch are temptations common to the race.

In normal life one is not subject to the deprivations of poverty, is not denied something of the pleasure of taste, has a remnant of time for books and does not overlook human ties.

Wars of nations, wars of individuals, strifes of mind and body as well as the emulation and rivalries of peace feed the abnormal life.

The normal life is largely unaffected by abnormal environments and sidesteps many tantalizing situations.

Quiet days pass smoothly and quiet lives are twice blessed—a blessing to themselves and a blessing to others.

Any man or any woman can find a normal life by avoiding extremes, by eliminating desires, but cultivating simplicity, by courting the unseen and the unknown.

Business and morals are founded upon the normal life; so is the family; so is the church; so is the school; so is the farm; so is the mine, and so is that commerce which sweeps the world year in and year out.

Sometimes the average life is mistaken for the normal life. There is no such thing as the average life, it is the fiction of the statistician, but the normal life is real, is enduring, is final.

WORK OF THE R. N. W. M. P.

One hardly realizes the value of the Mounted Police, who patrol these western plains, restoring and keeping law and order. No one knows the hardships which they endure; no one gives them due credit. Last week a few of the Mounted Police officers returned from a very hard and trying trip from the extreme north, where they had been looking after the lawless. The trip was a 3,000 mile stretch from the frozen north to the more tropical city of Edmonton, where the two Eskimo captives are now on trial for the offences for which the police brought them down. The two Eskimos, who are charged with murdering two missionaries, have been evading the law till the Mounted Police courageously tramped to their dens and captured them. If we had no such organization as the R. N. W. M. P. who would execute the law in those northern countries? Who would keep order, in general, where only a few people live? Their existence is a blessing to the Canadian people, and they should not be sent overseas as their departure will make a gap which cannot be filled. Though they would make excellent soldiers their value right here is beyond comprehension.

BENEFITS FROM THE WAR

If one can forget the appalling loss that has attended the war and in a broad sense of reasoning reflect on the benefits that will accrue to humanity one cannot help from being struck with the multitude of benefits that the war will bring.

First and foremost the great loss that all the nations have suffered in human lives to say nothing of the other losses from a financial standpoint, will impose a hardship upon the nations for a century to come and make all future generations stop and reflect most seriously before engaging in a like encounter.

On the other hand the many benefits are hard to estimate. The greatest benefits will probably accrue to the world from a scientific standpoint. The inroads that the enemy have made in various lines on land and sea have spurred the allies to use their best talent to originate more modern methods to offset this tirade. The results have been noticeable both in air and sea.

The development of the submarines have far exceeded our wildest dreams. Today it is possible to go anywhere under the sea without hindrance from the ocean or the elements. Soon it will be possible to go without suffering any more inconveniences than is now attendant on the ocean lines which are dreams of pleasure and pastime.

The aeroplanes are now undergoing remarkable changes and development which promises to revolutionize transportation in this world. It practically means that land transportation either for man or beast for long distances will be a thing of the past.

The world has had the greatest benefit by learning that people can do on half the amount of food by economically manufacturing and cooking foods. Since the war extravagance has been forgotten and the world has gotten along with food, costing only half as much as before, or in other words, feeding twice as many people on same amount. The knowledge will be of great value to the public for years to come.

These things being taken into consideration it is a comforting thought that the war has done some good.

AMERICAN EFFICIENCY

German efficiency has been held up as a degree of excellence unattainable by a democracy. The accomplishments of the United States since April 5th last refute the truth of the claim. In the short space of time since that day the United States has accomplished the following:

Declared a state of war as existing between that country and Germany;

Seized 91 German ships and begun repair work on them;

Authorized unanimously a war fund of $7,000,000,000;

Appropriated $600,000,000 for merchant shipping and as much for air fleets;

Agreed to loan the Allies $3,000,000,000 and advanced them a large proportion of that sum;

Passed a selective draft law and in a single day registered nearly ten million men for military service;

Enlisted 600,000 volunteer soldiers in the regular army and in the National Guard of the States;

Sent a commission to Russia to aid democracy there and a body of railroad men to Russia and another to France to advise and assist in railroad transportation in those countries;

Begun the construction of 32 camps for our soldiers;

Sent to England a fleet of destroyers and to France a detachment of troops;

Authorized and now enforcing embargo whereby our enemies will receive no more food or material from us;

Passed a food conservation law;

Organized many voluntary commissions and boards who are aiding the government and the people in the speeding up of work, conservation of food, and other national movements;

Drafted by lot 687,000 men for military service;

While the government was accomplishing these things the American people have loaned the United States $2,000,000,000 and offered $1,000,000,000 more, over four million citizens subscribing to the loan.

In addition they have given over $100,000,000 to the American Red Cross and $3,000,000 to the Young Men's Christian Association.

All these things were accomplished while the soil was not invaded or even threatened with invasion and without any disturbance of business conditions. All was done with the calm determination and judgment of an earnest, patriotic people performing a service for civilization and mankind and maintaining the rights, the dignity, and the honor of the greatest democracy in the world.

The German leaders derided America's entry into the war as a bluff.

The German imperial government was nearly fifty years in perfecting its military efficiency. In less than four months the American republic has made such strides as to indicate that in less than two years' time the boasted superiority of German efficiency will have been discredited. There is such a thing as American efficiency, and time will prove that German efficiency can not withstand it, fighting as it is for liberty, justice, and humanity.

SO THE PEOPLE MAY KNOW

Alberta and Western Canada is today infested with a lot of crooks operating under the guise of subscription solicitors. They usually invade the country fairs where they reap a rich harvest from the farmers, ranchers and country people who come to town with "money to burn". These men if they wanted to be straight and do an honest business could make as much money as the average business man could wish.

As an illustration The Standard has a crew of four legitimate salesmen on the road who have made close to one thousand dollars within the past four weeks. This kind of commission would satisfy the average business man, we know. It should satisfy the cupidity of the average subscription solicitor if he was not a born crook. As a wag says, "Some are born crooks, some achieve crookedness and some have crookedness thrust upon them." Most of the western subscription solicitors are all three.

In many cases these solicitors secure a contract or subscription blank of the newspaper and then go to a country job printing office and have some blanks printed. After getting a paper from the newsstands they are in line to "trim" the public.

Prompt measures should be taken by the subscribers to notify the papers if they do not receive an acknowledgment promptly with regular copies of the paper. Likewise if any subscribers know of any subscription blanks being printed in his local town a notice should be sent to the newspaper at once.

No solicitors have authority to print subscription blanks of their own and any jobbing printer who accepts an order from a traveling solicitor to print any kind of printing for a legitimate newspaper in another town is lending his services to a crooked deal and should be prosecuted the same as the solicitors as they are a party to a fraud, in fact they are to blame because they make it possible for the crook to operate.

It is high time that the country police department took the matter in hand. They should use prompt methods in hunting down these flagrant cases of fraud and they should prosecute the printers as well as the solicitors.

The Standard will pay a reward of ten dollars for information regarding certain subscription blanks that were printed by some printer in British Columbia or Alberta with the Calgary Western Standard's name on it. If we can get the evidence we are going to make a case anyway.

In the meanwhile the public should beware of such men as style themselves—Chas. Berg, W. H. Cook, A. D. Kettles, McTaggart and W. H. Howard, two of whom parade under the title of veterans, not war veterans but veterans of crookedness. They are all men going down the wayward path and need a resting place in some domicile under police supervision.

TOPICS OF THE DAY

FIGHTING THE GERMANS

Sixteen nations are now at war with Prussia and her allies, Austria, Bulgaria and Turkey. Austria began the conflict by declaring war on Serbia on July 28, 1914. Prussia, which had instigated the war, formally declared hostilities on August 1. Turkey entered on November 3, 1914, and Bulgaria dallied with both sides until October 4, 1915, finally joining the Germanic combination. The allies entered the war in the following order, the table showing the name of the state, date of entry in the war and population, including colonial possessions:

1914
Serbia, July 28	4,547,000
Russia, August 1	175,137,000
France, August 3	87,429,000
Belgium, August 4	22,571,000
Great Britain, August 4	439,959,000
Montenegro, August 7	516,000
Japan, August 23	73,807,000
1915
Italy, May 23	37,398,000
San Marino, June 2	12,000
1916
Portugal, March 10	15,208,000
Roumania, August 27	7,508,000
1917
United States, April 6	113,168,000
Cuba, April 8	2,500,000
Panama, April 9	427,000
Greece, July 16	4,821,000
Siam, July 22	8,149,000
Total	993,157,000

The following countries, although they have not declared war, have broken off relations with Germany this year on the dates given, the table also showing their population:

China, March 18	320,650,000
Brazil, April 9	24,618,000
Bolivia, April 13	2,890,000

EAT LESS!

There is little doubt that most of us could be perfectly healthy and quite possibly better looking on less food than we habitually eat.

For instance, afternoon tea could quite well be cut down to a cup of tea, without sugar, alone, and where there is a substantial midday meal a heavy supper is never advisable.

So much depends on the kind of work that a person does, as it is a well known fact that manual workers require more food than brain toilers.

Children should be stinted as little as possible, while old people do not require as much as those in the prime of life.

"A little less of everything" should be our motto just now, and we may be assured that neither our health or looks will suffer in consequence.

THE LOVE OF CHANGE

The tendency of the times seems to be toward radical changes of all sorts.

The reason, perhaps, may be traced back to the fact that the people have witnessed such wonderful developments in the sciences during the last half century that they begin to suspect that there is nothing good in old things.

The methods of locomotion have brought distant parts near.

The sending messages by means of electricity have made the nations of the world neighbors.

The inventions in the way of machinery have revolutionized the manufacturing of all kinds of goods, so that one man today is able to produce more than could be produced by many men 50 years ago.

These changes and such as these have no doubt been the cause of making certain restless persons believe that all change must be useful.

And so we have a great number of reformers.

Among them are the reformers of the drama and other public entertainments. There are men who believe that the decorum of the old times is a sort of Puritanism; and they look for greater freedom. The result is that the stage has become questionable in its morality.

The same thing may be said about the light reading which has become popular in late years. Books and magazines are now published which would have horrified our ancestors.

The ministers preach strange doctrines. They seem anxious to create a sensation. Indeed, it would be no more than true to say that the works of Thomas Paine, if published today, would be looked upon as tame.

Many men are found in the state legislatures looking for a variety of changes. One of the most foolish of these mutationists is the fellow who wants to pass eugenic laws. His presence is but too frequent, and during recent years he has become a sort of nuisance.

Another advocate of change is the man who wishes to put sex hygiene into the schools. That simply means that he is anxious to debase the minds of young and innocent children.

He proclaims his nostrum in the name of science, and his grave deportment is likely to make victims of those who listen to him.

Not long ago the city of Chicago fell a victim to the seductions of this last sort of quackery.

A rule was passed by the board of education of that city requiring the teaching of sexology in the schools. It became so disgusting that the parents rose up in their might. Even the United States government refused to allow the school reports through the mails.

So the state board of education has just rescinded the former vote and abolished the nuisance.

This has proved such an evident return to decency that the people of Chicago breathe more freely.

It is too bad that the American people are so subject to the contagion of fads. A cool head is always a valuable asset to a community. It often proves a saving quantity, as is shown in Chicago.

It should not be forgotten that while all improvements are to be encouraged, there are always some things which are best left as they are.

GO STRAIGHT AND DO IT

If you have something hard to do.
Just go to work and do it.
If you conclude to put it off
You're pretty sure to rue it.
The task that's dreaded is the one
That needs your first attention.
And, doing it, you may escape
A lot of reprehension.

Pitch in and do the hard thing first,
Let easy one come after;
Make this your rule, and life will mean
A lot of joy and laughter.
But if you let the hard things go,
Your enemies will taunt you
With serious duties unperformed,
And all your life they'll haunt you.

DUTY

Duty of every kind has in it the elements of pleasure, and if we do not discover and appropriate them it is our own fault. Gingham, Fashion's Latest Favorite

Plain Material is Often Combined with Bright Plaid Gingham

Gingham is Best Made Up Very Simply An Ideal Model is This in Green and Rose Print Design

The Checked Gingham Sport Frock has Big Pockets and a Collar of White Pique

A Pink and Black Gingham is Combined here with White Organdy

The Sheer White Collar Adds Daintiness to this Bold Plaid Gingham

Fine Check Patterns Vie With Bold Plaid Effects—Wisest to Buy Best Quality for Sake of Soft Texture and Rich Colors—Organdy and Gingham a Modern Innovation.

Every woman is a little girl this summer, dressed in gingham—that immemorial tried and true play-frock material for small girlhood. And gingham play-frocks are the thing—or as they are called in modern parlance, sport frocks. Workaday gingham costumes there are, and chief of these are the queer over-alls, or "woman-alls" as they are dubbed; bifurcated affairs, comfortable enough to work in around house or garden, but scarcely to be considered beautiful, though young and pretty women do manage to look piquant in their baggy proportions.

Gingham dresses are everywhere; the few tentative models put out early in the season caught popular fancy immediately, and now every shop is showing gingham sport frocks by the score. Truly surprising it is, what the designers and manufacturers have done with gingham; some of these frocks are distinguished afairs and one may pay a substantial price for a costume that a year ago one would not have worn in the kitchen on the maid's day out.

Finger Qualities Best to Purchase.

The shops are flooded with cheap grades of gingham, and with costumes made of cheap grades of gingham, but in buying or wearing a fabric so lately of humble class—as far as grown-up costume is concerned—it is best to have a fine and beautiful quality or none at all. A first quality gingham will retain its perfect color through countless launderings and the pattern will be clear and beautiful until the last shred of fabric remains. Gingham of this grade costs as much as fine printed voile—even as much as silk used to cost in the good old days of several years agone. So it is to be expected that a smartly built frock of best Scotch gingham may not be bought for a penny. But such a frock will wea rand wear—no sun will be able to fade it out, and no laundering. And—as one far-sighted little woman puts it—"after it has been cut over for a little girl, what is left of it will do for the most enchanting rag rugs." And right here it is pertinent to suggest that the woman who studies economy and conservation in her household, will save all the family silk hose and alll the scraps of gingham that can be collected. Cut into strips and sewed together, the two will weave into really beautiful rugs, round or oblong, and of a type very fashionable now for summer bed rooms.

Simple Styles Best In Gingham.

Gingham in itself is so striking—especially when the pattern is in bright colors — that the prettiest frocks are those of quite simple type. The best trimmings are made with strips of the material used in bias effect and sometimes tiny corded pipings of plain color are set along the edges of these bias trimmings to throw them into higher relief. A little white in collar and cuffs is also effective, bringing out the color in the gingham frock, yet softly relieving it. One frock on today's page has no contrasting trimming at all, the only relief to the printed pattern—for this is a frock of colored print, not of actual gingham weave—being in a collar of very fine hand-embroidered lawn. The printed design of the material is in an allover effect of rose and green on a paler pink ground. The difference between such a print and gingham is, that the print has a right and wrong side while gingham, because the color is woven in, is alike on both sides. This is fortunate, since so many of the patterns are bold plaids that would waste a deal of material in the cutting-out, were it not possible to turn the fabric on either side.

Care In Cutting Out Essential.

Take the plaid gingham sport frock with a pleated skirt, for example. In such a frock great care must be exercised in cutting out the sections, or the result may be very bad, and hopelessly amateurish. The pattern in both sleeves must be accurately matched and pinned together before cutting, or the crosswise strips may be several inches higher on one arm than on the other. The same holds true of the fronts of the bodice and of the pockets, which are cut from bias strips of the material. Several breadths went into the making of the pleated skirt, and each breadth had to be cut so that its crosswise stripes tallied with the stripes in the next breadth. One need not be quite so accurate in cutting out a checked gingham, but for a plaid frock it is wisest to purchase two yards more than an ordinary frock of the style contemplated would require, to allow for the matching of the pattern. The pleated frock just mentioned has a green and tan plaid pattern; the belt is piped with plain green linen and buttons and belt buckle are of green composition. The collar and cuffs are of sheer white organdy, not hemmed, but finished daintily with a picot edge.

Blue and tan is the color scheme of the checked pattern in another gingham frock. This model is admirably simple. The gathered skirt, trimmed near the hem with a wide bias band, has large square pockets over the hips. The blouse opens in revers and the sleeves have turned back gingham cuffs. A collar of white pique lends a note of fresh daintiness to the morning costume, and a smart sport hat and white footwear make the little costume all that it should be.

Organdy and Gingham a Dainty Combination.

One of the clever things the designers have done, is the combination of gingham with organdy—an idea entirely new this season. Usually, rather dainty ginghams in pastel coloring are selected to mate with the organdy though there are some very smart frocks with red and white checked gingham used in this way. A model pictured shows white organdy in combination with plaid pink and white gingham, and a tiny line of black edging the pink plaid makes the frock extra smart. This note of black has been echoed in the footwear; the white slippers have black kid trimming and the flesh tinted silk stockings have black clocks. Note how simply, yet how gracefully this little frock is made. The organdy tunic, pleated at the shoulder line, is trimmed with a broad band of the gingham and small pearl buttons are sewed along the upper edge of this trimming band. A similar band finishes the loose organdy sleeve. A straight panel of gingham runs down the frock at the front and the skirt appears to be of gingham although in reality it is of white lawn at the sides, under the sheer tunic of organdy. This tunic is pleated and stitched from shoulder to belt in the bodice; below the belt the pleats are carried down by pressing, but are not stitched. A collar of organdy and lace finishes the frock and the flat gingham belt has a pearl buckle. The costume fastens at the left side, the tunic coming over the edge of the gingham panel, and the buckled belt holding the fastening firmly in place.

Though not as cool and dainty as the organdy and gingham combinations, the sport blends of gingham with galatea, khaki and chambray are considered very smart and modern. A sport tailleur pictured today shows a coat of orange wool jersey with skirt and trimmings of Scotch gingham in a bold plaid combining geranium red and orange. This warm and striking color scheme is subdued wisely, with a black straw sport hat and black footwear. There are combinations also of blue galatea with blue and white plaid gingham, and of green wool jersey with green plaid gingham, and nothing is smarter for the country club just now, than a costume of this sort.

At Ardsley the other day a tall young woman wore a really distinguished costume of gingham, a costume so simple in design that it stood out with definite distinction among a host of smart summer frocks. It was built of gingham in a checked pattern of blue and black on white, the prevailing tone being blue. The skirt was cut to give large, saddle-bag pockets over the hips, and the surplice bodice had ends that extended around to form a knotted sash at the back. Very tall, pointed cuffs, and a deep collar were of white pique. White slippers and stockings, a white hat with pleated blue ribbon and a white and blue parasol completed the charming toilette.

SIMPLY PREPARED FOOD THE MOST DIGESTABLE

Do not spoil the digestibility of food by elaborate preparation The more simple the preparation the more digestible the dish, the more appetizing and there is less effort in making and less waste of food material.

To cook materials with the idea of having something for a "made-over" is wasteful. Most materials are rendered indigestible and unattractive in appearance by being re-cooked. Especially is thus true of meat and eggs, which are almost wasted as far as nourishment is concerned when they are re-heated, beside being a severe tax on digestion. Use all left-overs and prepare them in the most digestible and attractive forms possible but do not aim to have left-overs.

To do without the most nourishing and wholesome foods or to limit a proper supply, especially to children and those who have not reached full growth is false economy. We can't afford to tamper with the physical development of the race and much of its lack in this respect has come from under-feeding. Plenty of pure milk, fresh eggs and buter and cream, lean meat (not too much) fruit and vegetables are necessary for this, and these kept as near the natural state as possible. Commercialized forms are not the same thing at all.

Use common sense and beware of some of the starvation menus that are published—menus that pretend to feed a family for a sum that cannot possibly provide proper nourishment as prices are at present. As a sample, one of them gives eight pounds of shoulder (with its generous accompaniment of bone and gristle) for a family of eight. It does duty for three meals, two of them supplied with made-over meat from the first meal. Anyone with experience knows how that would work out.

LINEN ALSO POPULAR

In fabric hats, linen plays quite a considerable part. It has been popular for several summers but this year it has managed to take on new airs and graces that lend it an air of novelty. A canary and white striped linen tradition Gablom-- gHfir.. meno ve departs from sailor and mushroom tradition and allows itself to be knocked into a tricorne affair trimmed in two perky little bows of the linen and admirably rakish of line. A linen hat that disdains such audacity and goes in for demurenes is of soft blue handkerchief linen with a wide drooping brim and a medium high crown is entirely covered with daisies made of the linen and flatly applied. The edges of the petals on these linen daisies are narrowly outlined with black and a very narrow black ribbon bow is posed on the left front. Simplicity itself but exclusively smart.

PROVEN RECIPES

Fritter Batter

One cup flour.
One-fourth teaspoon salt.
One-half cup milk.
One teaspoon sugar.
One-half tablespoon butter, melted.
Two eggs.

Mix salt and flour, add milk gradually and egg beaten thoroughly. For fruit fritters add the sugar. Bananas, apples and peaches lend themselves nicely to the making of fritters. Fritters can also be made of tomatoes, corn, squash, clams and oysters.

Cream of Barley Soup

Put two quarts of stock, made from bones (or if stock is not at hand use a pint each of milk and water), into a stewpan, stir into it two sliced onions, two sliced carrots, a bay leaf and parsley, and two ounces of barley meal. Simmer for three hours. Beat up the yolk of an egg, stir it into a cupful of hot milk, also add salt and pepper, and add to the soup. Press through a colander and reheat. Serve very hot.

REGENT OF THE "WIN-THE-WAR" CARNIVAL

who is one of the most energetic and popular leaders in society and who is noted for her patriotic services, speaks favorably of the "Win-the-War" carnival. She states:

"Judging from the number of entries for the competition arranged by the Colonel Macleod chapter, I.O.D.E., in connection with the "Win-the-War" carnival to be held in the Pryce Jones building, September 20, 21 and 22. The event promises to be one of the most interesting that has yet taken place in Calgary. Each contestant feels that not only is she helping in a good cause but that the chances of winning a handsome car are indeed excellent.

"The executive of the chapter, consisting of Mrs. P. J. Nolan, regent; Mrs. James, first vice-regent; Mrs. Melvin, second vice-regent; Mrs. A. H. McLaren, secretary; Mrs. Brokovski, treasurer; Mrs. Lamont, Echoes secretary; Mrs. Whittemore, standard bearer; Mrs. Macleod, Mrs. C. A. Stuart, Mrs. A. H. Clarke, Mrs. Postlewaite, Mrs. Turner Bone, Mrs. A. M. Grogan and Mrs. Findlay, councillors, are in charge of the competition, and these ladies will see that all arrangements are carried out fairly and squarely.

"The proceeds are for the chapter's patriotic and war work. Since war was declared the chapter has donated over $12,000 for such purposes. They have contributed to the British, Canadian and French Red Cross, Belgian Relief, Cliveden hospital (10 beds), Herald Tobacco fund, Field Comforts, Y. M. C. A. camp supplies, Convalescent Homes for Soldiers, Maple Leaf club, British and Foreign Sailors' society, and numerous other worthy objects of a patriotic nature, so that the public need have no fear that their money will not be well expended. The contestants and any others who may wish to enter may obtain their tickets at room 503 Herald building, any afternon from 2 to 6:30 p.m.

ANNUAL PICNIC OF THE RETAIL CLERKS A SPLENDID SUCCESS

One of the most successful picnics held this year was that on Wednesday, at Bowness park, given by the retail clerks. The favorable weather combined with the many attractions was thoroughly enjoyed by the large crowd who turned out on this occasion. Those woh won in the numerous athletic events were:

SESSUE HAYAKAWA AND VIVIAN MARTIN IN "FORBBIDDEN PATHS."

"Forbidden Paths" is a strongly vital story of a Japanese man who is in love with an American girl. His supreme self-sacrifice is one of the most noble and characteristically Japanese deeds ever screened and throws a new light on the character of the Nipponese.

Sessue Hayakawa is co-starred with winsome little Vivian Martin and supported by an exceptionally strong cast including Tom Forman, James Neill, Carmen Phillips, Paul Weigel, Ernest Joy and others.

The story opens in the interior of a wealthy Japanese importer's store in San Francisco, by the name of James Thornton. His daughter, Mildred, is in love with a young fellow, Harry Maxwell. Harry looked upon her as a child and retains his old attitude of affectionate indifference to her. Sato is employed by her father and later made a partner in the business. He is deeply in love with Mildred, but the fact of their difference of race restrains him from showing it.

Harry Maxwell is appointed to a position in the American Embassy in Mexico City. Mildred is heart-broken over his going. Later in Mexico City Harry meets a demimonde, Benita. She likes him from the first meeting and seeing that he does not suspect what she really is, hides the fact from him. She plays on his sympathies until, finally Harry marries her. The American Ambassador, learning of his intention, races to the church and arrives just after the marriage has been concluded. He denounces Benita and tells Harry the kind of woman he has made his wife. Harry is stunned. Benita cannot deny it, and Harry goes home. Meeting Mildred again, he now realizes what he has lost, and she, in her delight to see him, shows him plainly that she loves him. Sato has to stand aside and watch this love between them.

Harry, now falling in love with Mildred, wires the ambassador to do anything to get Benita to consent to a divorce. The ambassador goes to Benita, but succeeds only in arousing her suspicion that there is another woman, and she starts for America.

Benita arrives at Harry's home and sends his Jap servant to inform him that his wife has arrived. The servant meets Sato. Sato stops him and goes himself to see Benita. Sato is astounded at this news and, after a moment, a wild hope sweeps over him. Then his whole thought is of Mildred. He tells Benita to wait and he makes love to her, trying to get her to run away with him. She is too wise, but she likes Sato and is not suspicious of his intentions.

Harry determines to leave the country and comes to Mildred for a last good-bye. They separate, as they think forever.

From this point the story has many unusual twists and turns which must be seen to be fully appreciated. The story closes with a most startling climax, during which is found a most puzzling and mysterious note, reading "Sato Has Found a Way."

FIJI ISLANDERS PASS THROUGH CALGARY

tain hotels make life enjoyable even in the hot season. During the entire year the thermometer rarely sinks below 60 degrees or gets above 90 degrees. During nine months of the year little inconvenience is found by the heat as the trade winds from the southeast keep the atmosphere fresh. Sometimes there is a hurricane with a terrific rainfall. Indeed, Fiji holds the record in this line for on August 6, 1906, 30 inches of rain fell during one night.

Beautiful Scenery

The flora of the country is one great mass of richness, especially in palms and creeping plants, which fairly choke the pathway of the traveler. Some excellent wood is also found there. These forests are like some land of enchantment and the traveler who has time should get into one of the big canoes and let the natives carry him through this fairyland of natural beauty. The beds of many of these rivers are of coral and so clear is the water that fishes of all kinds may be seen cavorting about the water and scurrying away at the approach of the boat.

To those who love the sea rather than the inland rivers there is a never-ending joy in the Fijis, for there one may skirt the coral reefs in motor boats visiting numerous caves where the octopus can be seen waving angry arms among the gentle anemones the flower of the sea, and also gaze upon the huge, lazy starfish. In fact, everything that lives in the water can be seen among these reefs. Fights between a strong Fijian and an octopus are part of the tourists' amusement.

Fiji at present is getting on the commerce map in her production of cocoa, vanilla, sugar cane, bananas and coton. As yet her trade is mainly with Australia, but when the war is over the opening of the Panama canal is expected to aid materially in bringing the islands to the front both commercially and as a resort for tourists.

NORRINE COFFEY
The Mysterious "Maid o' the Movies," at Pantages Next Week

CRONK DEPARTS FROM CALGARY IN A FLOOD OF CHEERS AND TEARS.

The conductor yelled "all aboard," and the engineer blew his whistle and rang his bell, and the engine made one or two jerks and slowly pulled away. As the train began to make headway, there emited from the crowd of a hundred or more spectators, an awful howl, intermingled with screeches and tears, howls and laughter, and yells of good cheer that would have done credit to a regiment of young college students.

This joyful, tearful crowd had come down to witness the departure of their friend and companion, J. B. Cronk, who was on his way to pastures new. He stood on the platform waving a fond farewell. His handsome, smooth face was lit up with a smile, while from his eyes there seemed just the gathering in each corner.

The crowd watched the departure of the train until it had rounded the curve and was out of sight and then they turned and sauntered homeward all in loud praises of the man who had just left Calgary.

Many a man has been accorded demonstrations of affection by the adoring friends in Calgary, but few, not excepting royalty, have ever been favored with such an open demonstration of regard as were given to Mr. Cronk previous to his departure. From the time the announcement of his intention to leave Calgary until his departure, it was one galaxy of pleasuredom for him.

He was dined and feted, by friends and clubs galore; invitations pouring in upon him so rapidly that if he had not had a strong mind, as well as a level head, it would have been turned at this open demonstration of goodfellowship and affection.

But Ben is wise. He knows the public. He has catered so long to the public wishes—to their whims—to their likes and dislikes, that he can turn a cranky pessimist into a smiling optimist, into the flash of a second. He knew just how much of this demonstration he would withstand without overtaxing the thing, and so he left all Calgary without a thought in anyone head, but a lasting remembrance of what a good fellow he was.

Mr. Cronk has been manager of the Allan Theatre for about three years. He took the house when it was in rather a chaotic condition, left so through the unbusinesslike methods of his predecessors. He brought order out of discord. He established a reputation for catering to the best in everything, and he soon had the elite of the town weekly visitors to the house. He made no mistakes, as many a manager before him had done, when they had the trade, to cheapen the character of the shows to make a little more money. He never waived in his determination to give the people of Calgary the best in photo picture plays that were to be had in the country, and so continued to add to his popularity and built up a cleintele for the house that has made the Allen one of the big dividend payers of the country.

Previous to his managerial experience at the Allen, he had a varied career always identified, however, in the publicity line, from traveling sign writer to business man on his own resources.

Today he can number his friends in Calgary by the hundreds. A member of most of the leading clubs in the city including the Shriners, of which he was a leading light, he had a host of good fellows always ready at his beck and call to do homage to the presiding genius of the photo picture world of Calgary.

Among the demonstrations of good fellowship that were accorded Mr. Cronk, two may be specially mentioned. One given on Friday night at the King George, when over one hundred friends dined and feted him until the early hours of the morning. At this celebration a handsome gold watch was given to him as a lasting tribute of their friendship and goodwill.

Next evening the Shriners held an entertainment, when the organization met and gave him the official goodbye that is always accorded to departing members. Incidentally they presented him with a token of their regard, in the shape of a gold chain, as special memento of the occasion.

Mr. Cronk goes to the coast first on a pleasure trip, and will then wend his way eastward to Toronto, where he expects to take up his duties as manager of the new picture show house, which the Allens' are now building in that city, and which is reported to be the finest one of its kind in the country.

If Mr. Cronk's reputation in the past is any criterion to go by, we can expect even a greater success for him in Toronto than he has had in Calgary, albeit they are a friged lot in that town.

ORGAN RECITAL AT KNOX CHURCH BY LYNNWOOD FARNAM

W. Lynnwood Farnam, of Emmanuel church, Boston, who is visiting Calgary, is curtailing one day of his holidays to present an interesting program of organ music for the benefit of the Red Cross society in Calgary on Monday evening next. Mr. Farnam is a Canadian born musician, having at an early age distinguished himself by winning Lord Strathcona's scholarship at the Royal College of Music. A large crowd is expected to attend this interesting affair.

LOVE

The hearts of some women tremble like leaves at every breath of love which reaches them, and they are still again.

Others, like the ocean, are moved only by the breath of the storm, and not so easily lulled to rest.—Longfellow.

To whom it may concern: I took my wife to the Mayo Bros. hospital at Rochester, Minn. Her case was pronounced heart disease and hopelessly incurable. We came home. Soon after, she commenced taking spinal adjustments from T. E. Davis, D.C. Satisfactory results followed, with continued improvement.

"HER UNBORN CHILD" AT THE GRAND NEXT WEEK

Howard McKent Barnes, a dramatist who already has one success to his credit in "The End of a Perfect Day," is the author of a new drama of discussion, "Her Unborn Child," which will be the attraction at the Grand theater for one week comencing next Monday. The subject of the play is birth control, and while Mr. Barnes makes no attempt at sensationalism he does not handle the subject with kid gloves.

Because of the sacredness of motherhood and out of courtesy to the ladies, the daily matinee performance will be reserved exclusively for the ladies. Gentlemen will be admitted at all other performances. Because of the subject of "Her Unborn Child" no person under 18 years of age will be admitted during the engagement.

The central figures around whom this vital play is woven are a pair of youthful lovers who, blinded by the impetuosity of romance, love not wisely but too well. In her greatest need the bewildered girl seeks aid from the gentle old physician who brought her into the world

The confronting problem, "What is to be the fate of her unborn child?" is realy the problem of this wonderful human play. The author shows great modesty in the handling of this delicate theme yet at the same time portraying vividly and emphatically a play teeming with purpose and appeal.

ANOTHER GLITTERING BILL WILL BE AT THE "PAN."

Many pleasant surprises will be given patrons of the Pantages theater during the coming week, commencing with the matinee next Monday afternoon. The headline position will be given to "Follies de Vogue," a glittering revue featuring, as fun-makers, Anna Mae Bell, Hal van Rensselear, Gladys Lanphere and the famous Chicago Winter Garden girls. Some of the latest popular singing numbers will be given as well as dance specialties. The Winter Garden girls are known to be a treat to the eye, for they are the choice pickings of the theatrical world beauties. Some stunning costuming will be displayed by these peaches and the scenic investiture will further enhance the beauty of the offering.

The Sully family of five will offer their variety farce entitled "The Information Bureau," which is known as one of the standard offerings in vaudeville. Some very clever comedy as well as singing and dancing numbers will be introduced during the act, which is sure to make a great hit with theatergoers.

Willie Solar, the eccentric comedian, who is billed as four feet eleven of live wire, will be another strong feature of the new program; Solar comes direct from the Century theater, New York city, where he was featured in Ziegfeld's "Cocoanut Grove;" he also was a star at the London Hippodrome, London, Eng., where he made a big hit.

Norrine Coffey will offer a bright novelty entitled "Maid o' the Movies," which is something new and original on the vaudeville stage.

The three Mori brothers will offer a conglomeration of Japanese pastimes in a most delightful manner.

The Universal Current Events and a comedy picture will conclude one of the strongest vaudeville programs of the current season at the popular playhouse, during the coming week.

KATHLYN WILLIAMS AND WALLACE REID AT THE ALLEN TODAY

Kathlyn Williams and Wallace Reid have scored brilliant success in the new Morosco-Paramount production, "Big Timber," which is appearing at the Allen for the last times today.

Many difficulties were encountered during the filming of this unusual photodrama. After the right location was found in the heart of the Fort Bragg mountains, and in order to reach it they had to use practically every known form of locomotion. They left the hotel in automobiles, after that a brief ride in a stage, then a trip across the lake in a moor boat, a ride on a logging train, a half mile ride on horseback, and then a long walk up the mountains, but after their strenuous efforts the proper background was secured for the scenes required.

The new Christie comedy which is shown with this attraction, is something out of the ordinary, and rounds out an excellent bill.

TWO POPULAR THEATRICAL MANAGERS

ORAL D. CLOAKEY

J. B. CRONK

ORAL CLOAKEY IS NEW MANAGER AT ALLEN THEATRE.

Mr. Oral Douglas Cloakey, who was assistant manager at the Allen Theatre, has assumed the position of manager. This promising young citizen has behind him a very marked career, which will undoubtedly reflect on his present occupation a ray of hope which will bring enthusiasm to all who hear of his fortune, in aspiring to the position of manager at the Allen.

He is of American descendency, born in Cars City, Michigan, U.S.A., and educated at St. John's College, Winnipeg, Tuckwell's Proprietory College, Winnipeg, and O'Sullivan's College, Brandon, Man. His first business occupation was "drugs drummer" for the Standard Co., Winnipeg, an orchestra composed of a host of drums and a piano. However, his business career started with more of a foundation when, in 1910 he joined the Al. G. Barnes Wild Animal Circus. After finishing with the circus people, he toured the Eastern States and Ontario with Grinell's Concert Co., of Detroit, and Windsor, playing fairs, also a season of burlesque in Detroit, and with Finsell's Orchestra in Detroit. In 1913 he came west, to the Sherman Theatre, in Brandon. Now he is the popular manager of the Allen Theatre here, where he had been assistant manager and drummer for the last few years.

For the past seven years he has been a member of the A. F. of M. On February 8, 1917, he was married to Miss Mazie Hill, of the Juvenile Bostonian Opera Co. His first visit to Calgary was in 1905, in company with his father, and lived with his uncle, George H. Cloakey, of Olds, who is at present a resident of Calgary.

This is what Mr. Cloakey says about himself, the west and the theatre: "I am a booster for the west, in spite of the fact that I consider Detroit my home town—one of the finest cities in America. Still Calgary takes a lot of beating, and affords many opportunities for ambitious young men.

"It is our intention of featuring splendid orchestra and musical numbers. Surprises are in store for our patrons in the near future, with the line-up of big Paramount productions that are to be shown this coming season, which will be announced shortly, will no doubt increase popularity of this photo play theatre, more than ever. Prompt and courteous attention for the utmost comfort of our patrons will be strictly adhered to at all times."

Mr. Cloakey is very popular among the citizens of Calgary, and will gain for himself many more friends in the near future, with his pleasing personality.

WALLACE REID COMING TO THE ALLEN IN "THE SQUAW MAN'S SON"

Wallace Reid, supported by Anita King, will be seen at the Allen soon in the Lasky-Paramount production, "The Squaw Man's Son," the thrilling sequel by Edwin Milton Royle of his famous story, "The Squaw Man," which was the first photodrama ever made by the Lasky company. By a strange coincidence the production of the sequel was exactly three years after the beginning of the filming of the first story. In addition to Miss King, the cast includes Dorothy Davenport, Raymond Hatton, G. H Celdert, Ernest Joy, Lucien Littlefield, Donald Bowles, Mabel van Buren and others.

GEORGE BEBAN IN "THE COOK OF CANYON CAMP"

Famous for his excellent portrayals of Latin characters, George Beban, the splendid character actor, will be seen at the Allen next Friday and Saturday in the Morosco-Paramount production of Donald Crisp's story, "The Cook of Canyon Camp," which was prepared for the screen by Mr. Beban and Julia Crawford Ivers and produced by Morosco director, Donald Crisp. Mr. Beyan is famous for his delineation of Italian characters and in addition to his undying fame in "The Sign of the Rose" and "Pasquali," has more recently scored pronounced success in "Marcellini Millions" and "A Roadside Impressario." He is equally as versatile in interpreting French characteristics as was testified by his wonderful performance as the old French musician in "The Bond Between."

In "The Cook of Canyon Camp," Mr. Beban is seen as a French-Canadian cook in a lumber camp near Quebec. By his wonderful sympathy and cleverness he reunites a family and after so doing receives reward enough to marry the girl of his heart and have the dream of his life, the greatest "flapjack" palace in the world.

BY

JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD

SYNOPSIS OF FORMER CHAPTERS

In which Kazan, the wolf dog, is introduced to the readers of this story. Thorpe and his wife are living at one of the far Canadian settlements and Thorpe has just returned with Kazan, that he has picked up on his travels.

Kazan had never known the touch of a hand until Thorpe's wife caressed him for bringing her husband safely home. The touch was so strange and soothing that Kazan immediately became her devoted slave.

Sad to relate Thorpe did not understand Kazan in too close proximity he became alarmed and grabbed a club and struck Kazan beliving that Kazan intended to bite her.

Kazan became domesticated under the soothing influence of Thorpe's wife and all went well until one of the desperadoes of the wilds came to Thorpe's hut. Kazan evidently recognized the ruffian McCready and snarled at him. cCready likewise thought he knew Kazan but under another name, and he later tested him and found that he did.

During the evening McCready drinks heavily and a devil made plan is hatched in his mind. He wakes up Thorpe on a pretence that some one is about and they go out looking for the prowler. McCready gets Thorpe to hold the lantern and they disappear in the darkness. When McCready returns Thorpe is not with him. Kazan sees him come back and wonders at Thorpe's failure to return.

McCready then goes into the hut with a dep laid plan in his drunken head. Thorpe's wife screams on his appearance, caling for Kazan. Kazan is tied tight with an iron chain but on hearing his mistress scream he makes several attempts and finally breaks the chain, bounds into the hut and leaps upon the ruffian and buries his fangs into McCready's throat until he feels the warm blood ozzing therefrom. Thorpe's wife tries to pull Kazan off and finally faints in the ordeal. Now go on with the story.

Kazan looks up after attacking McCready and sees Thorpe approaching with a club in his hand. He remembers the last licking he had from Thorpe and so he flies in terror.

When Thorpe hears how Kazan has saved his wife he is almost overcome and they jointly go out to hunt for Kazan, but Kazan does not understand and the nearer that Thorpe approaches the faster does Kazan fly away.

In his flight he runs across the pack and the desire for companionship overcomes his training and he joins the band of wolfs.

The leader of the band disputes Kazan's admittance to the pack and a fight ensues in which Kazan is victorious, but wounded. A she-wolf attracted by his wonderful fighting ability comes to him and helps him to his feet. He recovers and goes off into the great forest, followed by the she-wolf. When he stops and the other draws up beside him he feels the same thrill that he experienced when the girl touched him.

For months they traveled together finding company in each other till one day they saw a man coming in a sled, with the result that Gray Wolf was wounded in the leg. For days they lived in the woods, when finally they went on, finding a trail—man-trail. Kazan with his call soon brought to his assistance a whole pack of wolves and they were off to vengeance.

They came upon the sleigh, fought the dogs and lost several of their number under the rifle fire. Kazan had nearly finished with dogs and man when he noticed the girl in the sleigh. Everything changed suddenly and Kazan and Gray Wolf supported the occupants of the sleigh. It was the girl that saved the day.

When Pierre Radisson, who was the owner of the sleigh, discussed the recent fight with his daughter, he concluded that Kazan had helped them. He also knew that the brave wolf was seriously wounded so he struck out on the trail and finally came upon the wounded Kazan. He wanted to touch the wounded dog but the snaps kept him away so he left, only to return with the girl. Joan moved closer and Kazan felt a new thrill, till finally he drew up beside her. When she saw the wounds on the dog's leg she asked Pierre to help her take Kazan to the camp.

After some time Kazan was taken to camp and laid beside the fire, where he was taken care of. All seemed strange yet familiar to him. A cry from the sled frightened Kazan and he answered with a low whimper, which Joan noticed. She uncovered the bundle and held it before the dog, that was interested. The dog dragged himself to the girl's feet.

Pierre and Joan name the dog "Wolf," and retired for the night. During the night Kazan heard Gray Wolf calling. Gray Wolf crept near to the camp and Kazan answered her. The next day they started north, the dog chained behind the sleigh and Pierre drawing the sleigh. He had a deadly cough, but he kept it to himself. At night they stopped for camp and Kazan heard Gray Wolf several times. The next day after a tiresome journey they reached the river in time to make camp before a storm. That night Pierre died and Kazan heard Gray Wolf's wailing cry.

In the morning Joan found her father dead, and though frightened she kindled a fire. Then she pulled down the tent, harnessed Kazan and started down the river. Exhausted she fell upon the sled and Kazan dragged the load himself till he came to a cabin. The inmates took Joan and her baby and Kazan and revived them. In the morning Kazan slipped out and met Gray Wolf who tried to keep him in the haunts, but he went back and followed Joan and the baby until they reached their own cabin. Then Kazan slipped back to Gray Wolf.

Now go on with the story.

In the days and weeks that followed Joan's home-coming the lure of the cabin and of the woman's hand held Kazan. As he had tolerated Pierre, so now he tolerated the younger man who lived with Joan and the baby. He knew that the man was very dear to Joan, and that the baby was very dear to him, as it was to the girl. It was not until the third day that Joan succeeded in coaxing him into the cabin—and that was the day on which the man returned with the dead and frozen body of Pierre. It was Joan's husband who first found the name on the collar he wore, and they began calling him Kazan.

Half a mile away, at the summit of a huge mass of rock which the Indians called the Sun Rock, he and Gray Wolf found a home; and from here they went down to their haunts on the plain, and often the girl's voice reached up to them, calling, "Kazan! Kazan! Kazan!"

Through all the long winter Kazan hovered thus between the lure of Joan and the cabin—and Gray Wolf.

Then came Spring—and the Great Change.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Great Change

The rocks, the ridges and the valleys were taking on a warmer glow. The poplar buds were ready to burst. The scent of balsam and of spruce grew heavier in the air each day, and all through the wilderness, in plain and forst, there was the rippling murmur of the spring floods finding their way to Hudson's Bay. In that great bay there was the rumble and crash of the ice fields thundering down in the early break-up through the Raes Welcome—the doorway to the Arctic, and for that reason there still came with the April wind an occasional sharp breath of winter.

Kazan had sheltered himself against that wind. Not a breath of air stirred in the sunny spot the wolf-dog had chosen for himself. He was more comfortable than he had been at any time during the six months of terrible winter—and as he slept he dreamed.

Gray Wolf, his wild mate, lay near him, flat on her belly, her forepaws reaching out, her eyes and nostrils as keen and alert as the smell of man could make them. For there was that smell of man, as well as of balsam and spruce, in the warm spring air. She gazed anxiously and sometimes steadily, at Kazan as he slept. Her own gray spine stiffened when she saw the tawny hair along Kazan's back bristle at some dream vision. She whined softly as his upper lip snarled back, ehowing his long white fangs. But for the most part Kazan lay quiet, save for the muscular twitchings of legs, shoulders and muzzle, which always tell when a dog is dreaming; and as he dreamed there came to the door of the cabin out on the plain a blue-eyed girl-woman, with a big brown braid over her shoulder, who called through the cup of her hands, "Kazan, Kazan, Kazan!"

The voice reached faintly to the top of the Sun Rock, and Gray Wolf flattened her ears. Kazan stirred, and in another instant he was awake and on his feet. He leaped to an out-cropping ledge, sniffing the air and looking far out over the plain that lay below them.

Over the plain the woman's voice came to them again, and Kazan ran to the edge of the rock and whined. Gray Wolf stepped softly to his side and laid her muzzle on his shoulder. She had grown to know what the voice meant. Day and night she feared it, more than she feared the scent or sound of man.

Since she had given up the pack and her old life for Kazan, the voice had become Gray Wolf's greatest enemy, and she hated it. It took Kazan from her. And wherever it went, Kazan followed.

Night after night it robbed her of her mate, and left her to wander alone under the stars and the moon, keeping faithfully to her loneliness, and never once responding with her own tongue to the hunt-calls of her wild brothers and sisters in the forests and out on the plains. Usually she would snarl at the voice, and sometimes nip Kazan lightly to show her displeasure. But today, as the voice came a third time, she slunk back into the darkness of a fissure between two rocks, and Kazan saw only the fiery glow of her eyes.

Kazan ran nervously to the trail their feet had worn up to the top of the Sun Rock, and stood undecided. All day, and yesterday, he had been uneasy and disturbed. Whatever it was that stirred him seemed to be in the air, for he could not see it or hear it or scent it. But he could feel it. He went to the fissure and sniffed at Gray Wolf. Usually she whined coaxingly. But her response today was to draw back her lips until he could see her white fangs.

A fourth time the voice came to them faintly, and she snapped fiercely at some unseen thing in the darkness between the two rocks. Kazan went again to the trail, still hesitating. Then he began to go down. It was a narrow winding trail, worn only by the pads and claws of animals, for the Sun Rock was a huge crag that rose almost sheer up for a hundred feet above the tops of the spruce and balsam, its bald crest catching the first gleams of the sun in the morning and the last glow of it in the evening. Gray Wolf had first led Kazan to the security of the retreat at the top of the rock.

When he reached the bottom he no longer hesitated, but darted swiftly in the direction of the cabin. Because of that instinct of the wild that was still in him, he always approached the cabin with caution. He never gave warning, and for a moment Joan was startled when she loked up from her baby and saw Kazan's shaggy head and shoulders in the open door. The baby struggled and kicked in her delight, and held out her two hands with cooing cries to Kazan. Joan, too, held out a hand.

"Kazan!" she cried softly. "Come in, Kazan!"

Slowly the wild red light in Kazan's eyes softened. He put a forefoot on the sill, and stood there, while the girl urged him again. Suddenly his legs seemed to sink a little under him, his tail drooped and he slunk in with that doggish air of having committed a crime. The creatures he loved were in the cabin, but the cabin itself he hated. He hated all cabins, for they all breathed of the club and the whip and bondage. Like all sledge-dogs he preferred the open snow for a bed, and the spruce-tops for shelter.

Joan dropped her hand to his head, and at its touch there thrilled through him that strange joy that was his reward for leaving Gray Wolf and the wild. Slowly he raised his head until his black muzzle rested on her lap, and he closed his eyes while that wonderful little creature that mystified him so—the baby—prodded him with her tiny feet, and pulled his tawn hair. He loved these baby-maulings even more than the touch of Joan's hand.

Motionless, sphinx-like, undemonstrative in every muscle of his body, Kazan stood, scarcely breathing. More than once this lack of demonstration had urged Joan's husband to warn her. But the wolf that was in Kazan, his wild aloofness, even his mating with Gray Wolf had made her love him more. She understood, and had faith in him.

In the last days of the last snow going home, Kazan. We're going away down where his people live—where they have churches, and cities, and music, and all the beautiful things in the world. And we're going to take you, Kazan!"

Kazan didn't understand. But he was happy at having the woman so near to him, and talking to him. At these times he forgot Gray Wolf. The dog that was in him surged over his quarter-strain of wildness, and the woman and the baby alone filled his world. But after Joan had gone to her bed, and all was quiet in the cabin, his old uneasiness returned. He rose to his feet and moved stealthily about the cabin, sniffing at the walls, the door and the things his mistress had done into packages. A low whine rose in his throat. Joan, half asleep heard it, and murmured:

"Be quiet, Kazan. Go to sleep—go to sleep—"

Long after that, Kazan stood rigid in the center of the room, listening, trembling. And faintly he heard, far away, the walling cry of Gray Wolf. But tonight it was not the cry of loneliness. It sent a thrill through him. He ran to the door, and whined, but Joan was deep in slumber and did not hear him. Once more he heard the cry, and only once. Then the night grew still. He crouched down and not to the cabin. The call that came tohim from over the plain was not so strong. At dusk Gray Wolf came out from her retreat, and slunk to his side, whimpering, and nipped gently at his shaggy neck. It was the old instinct of his fathers that made him respond by caressing Gray Wolf's face with his tongue. Then Gray Wolf's jaws opened, and she laughed in short panting breaths, as if she had been hard run. She was happy, and as they heard a little snuffling sound from between the rocks, Kazan wagged his tail, and Gray Wolf darted back to her young.

The babyish cry and its effect upon Gray Wolf taught Kazan his first lesson in fatherhood. Instinct again told him that Gray Wolf could not go down to the hunt with him now—that she must stay at the top of the Sun Rock. So when the moon rose he went down alone, and toward dawn returned with a big white rabbit between his jaws. It was the wild in him that made him do this, and Gray Wolf ate ravenously. Then he knew that each night hereafter he must hunt for Gray Wolf—and the little whimpering creatures hidden between the two rocks.

The next day, and still the next, he did not go to the cabin, though he heard the voices of both the man and the woman calling him. On the fifth he went down, and Joan and the baby were so glad that the woman hugged him, and the baby kicked and laughed and screamed at him, while the man stood by cautiously, watching their demonstrations with a gleam of disapprobation in his eyes.

"I'm afraid of him," he told Joan for the hundredth time. "That's the wolf-gleam in his eyes. He's of a treacherous breed. Sometimes I wish we'd never brought him home."

"If we hadn't—where would the baby—have gone?" Joan reminded him, a little catch in her voice.

"I had almost forgotten that," said her husband. "Kazan, you old devil, I guess I love you, too." He laid his hand caressingly on Kazan's head. "Wonder how he'll take to life down there?" he asked. "He has always been used to the forests. It'll seem mighty strange."

"And so—have I—always been used to the forests," whispered Joan. "I guess that's why I love Kazan—next to you and the baby. Kazan—dear old Kazan!"

This time Kazan felt and scented more of that mysterious change in the cabin. Joan and her husband talked incessantly of their plans when they were together; and when the man was away Joan talked to the baby, and to him. And each time that he came down to the cabin during the week that followed, he grew more and more restless, until at last the man noticed the change in him.

"I believe he knows," he said to Joan one evening. "I believe he knows we're preparing to leave." Then he added: "The river was rising again today. It will be another week before we can start, perhaps longer."

That same night the moon flooded the top of the Sun Rock with a golden light, and out into the glow of it came Gray Wolf, with her three little whelps toddling behind her. There was much about these soft little balls that tumbled about him and snuggled in his tawn coat that reminded Kazan of the baby. At times they made the same queer, soft little sounds, and they staggered about on their four little legs just as helplessly as baby Joan made her way about on two. He did not fondle them, as Gray Wolf did, but the touch of them, and their babyish whimperings, filled him with a kind of pleasure that he had never experienced before.

The moon was straight above them, and the night was almost as bright as day, when he went down again to hunt for Gray Wolf. At the foot of the rock a big white rabbit popped up ahead of him, and he gave chase. For half a mile he pursued, until the wolf instinct in him rose over the dog, and he gave up the futile race. A deer he might have overtaken, but small game the wolf must hunt as the fox hunts it, and he began to slip through the thickets slowly and as quietly as a shadow. He was a mile from the Sun Rock when two quick leaps put Gray Wolf's supper between his jaws. He trotted back slowly, dropping the big seven-pound snow-shoe hare now and then to rest.

When he came to the narrow trail that led to the top of the Sun Rock he stopped. In that trail was the warm scent of strange feet. The rabbit fell from his jaws. Every hair in his body was suddenly electrified into life. What he scented was not the sent of a rabbit, a marten or a porcupine. Fang and claw had climbed the path ahead of him. And then, coming faintly to him from the top of the rock, he heard sounds which sent him up with a terrible whining cry. When he reached the summit he saw in the white moonlight a scene that stopped him for a single moment. Close to the edge of the sheer fall to the rocks, fifty feet below, Gray Wolf was engaged in a death-struggle with a huge gray lynx. She was down—and under, and from her there came a sudden sharp terrible cry of pain.

Kazan flew across the rock. His at tack was the swift silent assault of the wolf, combined with the greater courage, the fury and the strategy of the husky. Another husky would have died in that first attack. But the lynx was not a dog or a wolf. It was "Mowlee, the swift," as the Sarcees had named it—the quicket creature in the wilderness. Kazan's inch-long fangs should have sunk deep in its jugular. But in a fractional part of a second the lynx had thrown itself back like a huge snow ball, and Kazan's teeth buried themselves in the flesh of its neck instead of the jugular. And Kazan was not now fighting the fangs of a wolf in the pack, or of another husky. He was fighting claws—claws that ripped like twenty razor-edged knives, and which even a jugular hold could not stop.

Once he had fought a lynx in a trap, and he had not forgotten the lesson the battle had taught him. He fought to pull the lynx down, instead of forcing it on its back, as he would have done with another dog or wolf. He knew that when on its back the fierce cat was most dangerous. One rip of its powerful hind-feet could disembowel him.

Behind him he heard Gray Wolf sobbing and crying, and he new that she was terribly hurt. He was filled with the rage and strength of two dogs, and his teeth met through the flesh and hide of the cat's throat. But the big lynx escaped death by half an inch. It would take a fresh grip to reach the jugular, and suddenly Kazan made the deadly lunge. There was an instant's freedom for the lynx, and in that moment it flung itself back, and Kazan gripped at its throat—on top.

The cat's claws ripped through his flesh, cutting open his side—a little too high to kill. Another stroke and they would have cut his vitals. But they had struggled close to the edge of the rock wall, and suddenly, without a snarl or a cry, they rolled over. It was fifty or sixty feet to the rocks of the ledge below, and even as they pitched over and over in the fall, Kazan's teeth sank deeper. They struck with terrific force, Kazan uppermost. The shock sent him half a dozen feet from his enemy. He was up like a flash, dizzy, snarling, on the defensive. The lynx lay limp and motionless where it had fallen. Kazan came nearer, still prepared, and sniffed cautiously. Something told him that the fight was over. He turned and dragged himself slowly along the ledge of the trail, and returned to Gray Wolf.

Gray Wolf was no longer in the monlight. Close to the two rocks lay the limp and lifeless little bodies of the three pups. The lynx had torn them to pieces. With a whine of grief Kazan aproached the two boulders and thrust his head between them. Gray Wolf was there, crying to herself in that terrible sobbing way. He went in, and began to lick her bleeding shoulders and head. All the rest of that night she whimpered with pain. With dawn she dragged herself out to the lifeless little bodies on the rock.

And then Kazan saw the terrible work of the lynx. For Gray Wolf was blind—not for a day or a night, but blind for all time. A gloom that no sun could break had become her shroud. And perhaps again it was that instinct of animal creation, which often is more wonderful than man's reason, that told Kazan what had happened. For he knew now that she was helpless—more helpless than the little creatures that had gamboled in the moonlight a few hours before. He remained close beside her all that day.

Vainly that day did Joan call for Kazan. Her voice rose to the Sun Rock, and Gray Wolf's head snuggled closer to Kazan, and Kazan's ears dropped back, and he licked her wounds. Late in the afternoon Kazan left Gray Wolf long enough to run to the bottom of the trail and bring up the snow-shoe rabbit. Gray Wolf muzzled the fur and flesh, but would not eat. Still a little later Kazan urged her to follow him to the trail. He no longer wanted to stay at the top of the Sun Rock, and he no longer wanted Gray Wolf to stay there. Step by step he drew her down the winding path away from her dead puppies. She would move only when he was very near her—so near that she could touch his scarred flank with her nose.

They came at last to the point in the trail where they had to leap down a distance of three or four feet from the edge of a rock, and here Kazan saw how utterly helpless Gray Wolf had become. She whined, and crouched twenty times before she dared make the spring, and then she jumped stiff-legged, and fell in a heap at Kazan's feet. After this Kazan did not have to urge her so hard, for the fall impinged on her the fact that she was safe only when her muzzle touched her mate's flank. She followed him obediently when they reached the plain, trotting with her foreshoulder to his hip.

Kazan was heading for a thicket in the creek bottom half a mile away, and a dozen times in that short distance Gray Wolf stumbled and fell. And each time that she fell Kazan learned a little more of the limitations of blindness. Once he sprang off in pursuit of a rabbit, but he had not taken twenty leaps when he stopped and looked back. Gray Wolf had not moved an inch. She stood motionless, sniffing the air—waiting for him! For a full minute Kazan stood, also waiting. Then he returned to her. Ever after this he returned to the point where he had left Gray Wolf, knowing that he would find her there.

All that day they remained in the thicket. In the afternoon he visited the cabin. Joan and her husband were there, and both saw at once Kazan's torn side and his lacerated head and shoulders.

"Pretty near a finish fight for him," said the man, after he had examined him. "It was either a lynx or a bear. Another wolf could not do that."

For half an hour Joan worked over him, talking to him all the time, and fondling him with her soft hands. She bathed his wounds in warm water, and then covered them with a healing salve, and Kazan was filled again with that old restful desire to remain with her always, and never to go back into the forests. For an hour she let him lie on the edge of her dress, with his nose touching her foot, while she worked on baby things. Then she rose to prepare supper, and Kazan got up—a little wearily—and went to the door. Gray Wolf and the gloom of the night were calling him, and he answered that call with a slouch of his shoulders and a drooping head. Its old thrill was gone. He watched his chance, and went out through the door. The moon had risen when he rejoined Gray Wolf. She greeted his return with a low whine of joy, and muzzled him with her blind face. In her helplessness she looked happier than Kazan in all his strength.

From now on, during the days that followed, it was a last great fight between blind and faithful Gray Wolf and the woman. If Joan had known of what lay in the thicket, if she could have seen the poor creature to whom Kazan was now all life—the sun, the stars, the moon, and food—she would have helped Gray Wolf. But as it was she tried to lure Kazan more and more to the cabin, and slowly she won.

At last the great day came, eight days after the fight on the Sun Rock. Kazan had taken Gray Wolf to a wooded point on the river two days before, and there he had left her the preceding night when he went to the cabin. This time a stout babiche thong was tied to the collar round his neck, and he was fastened to a staple in the log wall. Joan and her husband were up before it was light next day. The sun was just rising when they all went out, the man carrying the baby, and Joan leading him. Joan turned and locked the cabin door, and Kazan heard a sob in her throat as they followed the man down to the river. The big canoe was packed and waiting. Joan got in first, with the baby. Then, still holding the babiche thong, she drew Kazan up close to her, so that he lay with his weight against her.

The sunfell warmly on Kazan's back as they shoved off, and he closed his eyes, and rested his head on Joan's lap. Her hand fell softly on his shoulder. He heard again that sound which the man could not hear, the broken sob in her throat, as the canoe moved slowly down the woded point.

A PAGE FOR THE BOYS AND GIRLS

:: THE THREE CHUMS ::

A SMALL, ragged boy sat on a bench in one of the great London parks. His fingers closed tightly over a nut and a piece of orange-peel, and his face was stained with dirt and tears. With his eyes on the ground and great sobs shaking him from head to foot, he did not notice the sudden approach of a little solemn-eyed girl, ragged and forlorn-looking as himself.

She approached, gazed at him as mentally calculating whether he was worth striking up a conversation with, and finally deciding that, in spite of the ears, he was, suddenly said:

"Boy!"

With a flare of indignation which lifted up his tears, he lifted his head and saw her.

"Go yer speakin' ter?"

"Ter you. Why you cryin'?"

"Not cryin'!"

"Yare. But I wants ter speak ter you." The boy looked up and decided that she was all right. He grudgingly made room for her on the bench. They surveyed each other.

"What yer name?" asked the girl.

"Mindy. What's yours?"

"Bernard—Bernie, father calls me—but I tell yer why I—I was cryin', if yer like. See here—a big feller with a great fist grabbed my orange. I bit 'im hard, but 'e got ort. An' this"—he dismally designated the small piece of orange-peel—"is all I got left. An' besides, when father sees I bin cryin', 'e'll—will beat me no end."

The little girl nodded wisely.

"I knows," she said. "Mother beats me no end when I bin cryin'."

Bernie looked up aghast. "She beats yer? She oughtn't ter beat a girl."

"An' if yer father's big 'e oughtn't ter beat a little boy. Why does 'e beat yer?" asked Mindy.

"Cos 'e says 'e wants ter make me hard, so's I shan't never feel nothin'. Bernie,' 'e says, 'when yer go into the streets, the other little boys wants ter take all yer got, and ye're not ter let 'em. An' wh n yer get ter be a man 'twill all be the same; an' it ye'll find all that out for yerself make ye as 'ard as this'"—Bernie showed the little brown nut to Mindy—"'an' then ye'll be cock o' the walk an' yer own king.'"

"That's silly," she announced decisively. "Cos ye're still cryin' after all. My mother says the same thing. 'Little girls must be 'ard-earted as little boys,' she says, 'or it ain't right. Why should boys boss girls? Ay, Mindy, unless ye get 'ard like some, ye'll finfd all that out fer yerself when yet get older.' So she beats me no end, an' if I bin cryin', she says: 'Ere's a lump of soft soap fer yer.'" Mindy paused reminiscently. "Mothers is funny," she said at length.

THE KNOCKER.

"Tompkins has knocked about the world quite a bit, hasn't he?"

"Yes, and he's knocked about everything in it, too."

"Fathers is funnier," said Bernie. "But they both say little girls an' boys is funniest. 'Ave a nut, Mindy, an' let's forget 'em."

Suddenly Bernie remembered it was time to go home. He looked sadly at his new-found comrade.

"Say, Mindy," he cried, "I got ter go."

The little girl got up reluctantly.

"So've I. I'll cum along with yer, an' ye'll show me where yer live."

So saying, she thrust her little hand into Bernie's, and they marched off. Somehow, the dull old streets seemed brighter today. They were both proud possessors of a "chum."

"I lives 'ere," said Bernie at length, designating a poor-looking tenement. "Where's yours, Min? Is it far from mine?"

"Yes," said Mindy. "I got a long way to go. See yer ter-morrer, same place?"

"Yus," said Bernie gruffly, and went in.

* * *

When Bernie marched up to the bench in the park and caught sight of Mindy, this young lady was hopping from one place to another in mild excitement. But, seeing Bernie, she ran up.

"Oh, Bern," she said, "why wasn't yer 'ere before? There's a lady bin quarrelin' with a gentleman, but they've just gone."

"Hugh! Silly ter quarrel," said Bernie, who was not in the best of tempers, and had his arm in a sling. But Mindy in her excitement had not noticed that.

"He said to 'er: 'Can't I 'ave a little forgiv'nus, Alice?' An' she said to 'im: 'My name ain't Alice, sir—it's Miss Olson, if yer please.'"

"That's silly," said Bernie coldly.

At this some hidden willfulness in Mindy came out. She would not have this boy sneer at her story.

"Boy," she called out, "you just be quiet!" She only called him "boy" when she was angry with him. She was just about to say something even more cutting, when all at once she noticed his arm. "What's 'appened?" She pointed at it.

"Nothin'. Father 'urt me," he explained sullkily. She stared at him for a moment, and then all her great motherliness welled from her eyes in great tears.

"Bernie!" Then her black eyes blazed, and she clenched her little hands. "Oh, it's a shame, Bernie! Why d'yer stick it?"

"'Cos I got ter," said the boy moodily.

There was a long silence. Suddenly Mindy's face took on a ghastly look, and she almost fell on to the bench. Bernie's heart seemed to stop beating. "Min!" His voice trembled. "What's the matter with yer, Min?" he said, choking.

"Nothin'. I'm all right now. Mother didn't giv me no supper last night—to 'arden me," said Mindy, mechanically using the word she had so often heard. "An' I felt awful ill. But I'm all right. I'm goin' now."

"Goin?" Bernie looked at her piteously. "An' leave me? We got all the mornin' ter talk, an' I feel so mis'rable. Well, if ye're goin', I'll cum with yer."

"No, yer don't!" cried Mindy to his surprise.

"Yes, I does!"

Mindy drew herself up with dignity, and imitating the lady in the park, said:

"I will not 'low yer to escort me, and please remember that my name ain't Mindy, but Miss ———."

Bernie didn't catch the last word. Two dogs ran into him, snarling and yapping, and the boy looked down at them. When he looked up again Mindy had gone.

Bernie clenched his hands in despair. Mindy had gone, and Mindy was ill. If she fell down in the street, and a cab or a tram——. He ought to be with her. He must follow her.

Bernie set off at a furious pace, scrambling, eluding people, occasionally bumping against them. All at once a man knocked his injured arm a hard blow.

"That'll teach you not to run into people, you dirty little devil!" said the man. And poor Bernie, the Fates against him, stopped, dazed with the pain, to nurse his injured limb.

Mindy had a good start, but she had not yet been able to personally test Bernie's running capacity, so she glanced over her shoulder every now and then as she ran to make sure that he was following her. When she was assured that he was not, she smiled. Bernie was only a boy, and though Mindy knew that in most circles a boy was considered better than a girl, she had a shrewd and rooted belief in her own sex; and, indeed, no boy in London could match Mindy's quick wits.

She stopped at length before a dingy-looking door, without a doubt as to whether it was the right house or not, for she had purposely taken stock of it when Bernie had brought her to it. So with a firm little step she advanced and knocked twice.

Almost immediately a great gaunt man came to the door and stood looking down at Mindy.

"Don't want no little girls 'ere," he said sharply "so get out at once."

Mindy looked at him reflectively, as if sizing him up. Apparently she had decided that her policy was to be a firm one, for she said:

"Is this Bernie's father? Ef so, may I cum in, please?" Mindy, with her contempt for grown ups, always neglected their humanity, and spoke of them as if they were things.

"This" broke into an oath.

"I'm Bernie's father. Now get out!" he said.

"But I'd rather cum in. I want ter talk ter yer 'bout Bernie. 'E's my chum," she added, as if in explanation and for introduction.

"Ho, is 'e? Little girls an' big girls are all the same," said Bernie's father sourly. They're only 'chums' for what a man—a boy's got. What do you get out of Bernie? All 'is nuts and apples, I'll bet."

"No," said Mindy, indignantly. "I ain't got nothin' from 'im. Girls isn't like boys."

"They're a sight worse—an' crueller," said the man.

"Crueller?" Mindy's voice rose in shrill scorn.

"Not crueller'n you, 'cos you beat Bernie."

"I'll beat you," said the man, "if yer don't go."

"Beat me, then," said Mindy, though her heart quailed. "Mother does, every day."

Something in her worn little face and defiant attitude moved him, but when she announced calmly that her little body was beaten every day he was won over. Some sad thought of his lost youth might have helped, too.

"Come in," he said gruffly, signing for her to follow, "but mind I don't beat yer after all, if yer gives me any more of yer impudence."

"No, you won't," said Mindy, knowing she had won.

A fire was burning on the hearth when she went in, and the absence of any pictures on the wall or small knick-knacks about the room showed that no woman lived there.

"How dreadfully untidy," said Mindy candidly.

"Is it? But it's 'eaven. There ain't no petticoats," explained the man.

Mindy looked puzzled but decided that his remark was unworthy of laborer thought. Meanwhile the man opened a small cupboard and took out a great ripe apple. Then noticing Mindy's white cheeks, he poured out a cup of milk.

"Drink it."

Mindy obeyed and felt much better, and then she decided to ask the momentous question.

"Why do you beat Bernie? Bernie's my chum, an'—an' I won't have 'im beaten."

"It makes 'im 'ard," replied the man.

"It don't," scoffed Mindy. "'Cos 'e always cried—so do I. Yet see, if it was a little boy who 'it Bernie, 'e'd 'it back, an' not cry. 'E cries 'cos you 'it 'im, same's I cry 'cos mother 'its me. Don't yer understand?" She stamped her little foot. "Or can't yer?"

"Yer mother ought ter be ashamed," he began.

"Come an' see mether," went on Mindy. "Bernie an' me's friends, an' so you an' mother should be friends. Why, there's Bernie!"

Her chum came in hesitatingly. He feared a beating, though he had washed off the tear-marks at a street pump, and was forcing himself to whistle. His surprise at seeing Mindy sitting opposite his father and partaking of his hospitality was ludicrous.

"Min!" he gasped, open-mouthed, and ben cringed before his father.

"I ain't goin' ter touch yer, lad," said his father, more kindly than ever he had spoken before.

Bernie plucked up courage and asked Mindy how she was feeling.

"Better," she said. "Much better."

"What's up with 'er?" asked the man.

"'Er mother never gave 'er any supper last night. Sed it would make 'er ard."

A queer expression came over the man's face. He picked up a worn cap and coat.

"We're goin' ter take Mindy 'ome," he said. "Now then, you two young 'uns, run along firs, an' I'll come an' meet yer later."

* * *

"This is my friend, Bernie," said Mindy to her mother, with defiant pride.

Mrs. Reynolds, a tired-looking woman who was no ill-featured, turned round, broom in hand, to survey Master Bernard. Then she said:

"You ain't got no friend, Mindy. Bernie's father."

"Nor I you, Fred. I'm not sure as I wants ter, after spoilin' my lifef like you've done, with yer brute temper Little boys ain't never good friends to little girls. I know."

What more might have been said was cut short by the entrance of "Anna!" said the man hoarsely. "I never thought ter see yer again!" an' unfeelin' ways. God knows I worked 'ard fer yer an' gave in ter yer till I saw 'ow stupid yer was, an' till yer struck me 'cos the breakfast was late one day. You thought, 'cos I wants ter, after spoilin' my life like oughtn't ter 'ave any say different ter yours. Well, since you an' I parted company I changed me name to 'Mrs. Reynolds'—Reynolds bein' as yer know the name I 'ad afore I married yer." The woman didn't look at him as she spoke, but continued dusting laboriously where no dust was. "An'—an' Mindy was born six months after I left yer. But yer won't 'ave 'er—she's mine."

Mindy's father caught his breath in a sob.

"An' I," he said, "found myself without a woman, an' I didn't know 'ow to do fer myself. An' then I—I asked a woman to look after me—an' Bernie was born. Then she left me—sed she couldn't stand me nohow, and I didn't know why she couldn't then. But I do now, Anna, 'twas because I was always thinkin' of you. An' I was 'ard to Bernie, because I 'ad to be 'ard to someone. I see now as I made mistakes. When a feller's first married ' don't know nothin' worth knowin'—after, 'e learns. I've learnt, Anna, an' I missed yer terrible. Won't yer let's begin it all as if 'twas new, lass?"

Anna Reynolds looked at him at last.

"I fergive yer," she said. "As for Bernie, I've just took to 'im straight. I missed yer, too, Fred, though may-be not so much as yer missed me, for when a woman's 'as 'er child——, But somethin' was always missin', an' I was real lonesome. Yes, I be glad ter see 'e, Fred—yes, 'deed I be."

* * *

"Mindy," said Bernie with a lordly air, "you're 'arf a sister."

Mindy sniffed with doubt.

"I can't be 'arf a sister, silly."

"Then you're 'arf my sister," said Bernie, who had got it at last, he thought. "Doesn't matter what ye are. Min, though," he added with condescension, "as long as ye're my chum."

CONSIDERATE.

"Do you tell your husband domestic troubles when he comes home at night?"

"Never. I always phone him about them during the day."

Friendly Peggy's Compensation

Jas. D. Shearer in National Magazine

Peggy was only a little yellow dog. No one knew where Peggy was born, nor where she came from. She had no pedigree nor pride of family, neither was she handsome. But she had a well-formed head and was broad between the eyes which always looked frankly into your own, accompanied with a friendly wag of the little bushy tail. Then you knew she was saying, "I'm your friend." In fact she was everybody' friend and rejoiced in every nod or pleasant word. Peggy had not a trace of fear or suspicion in her nature. She gathered into her little heart all the good-will and kindness and playfulness which she found in her daily path, and it so broadened her sympathetic dog nature that she saw no evil, and had no enemies in all the world.

Soon after she first appeared in Kenwood she took up her home with Miss K——, a kind maiden lady of discretion with a place in her affections for just such a little street waif. But this made no change in the disposition of Peggy. Perhaps her coat was a little more glossy, her manner a little more effusive, but her affection for the schol-children she knew was as constant and strong as ever. But a dire calamity was impending!

One day a one-horse cart drove slowly down Penn avenue. In the wagon was a sort of coop, through the bars of which could be seen several unhappy looking dogs. Following the cart were several other dogs, for dogs are very sociable animals. As the cart moved slowly along, out ran Peggy to interview the dogs about the cart.

Suddenly the cart stopped and the driver, a scrawny, ill-favored fellow in a dirty green sweater ,and with a limp, suddenly fixed his eyes on Peggy and dismounted from the cart. What did he mean to do? A certain civilization decrees that all homeless dogs may be lassoed by a legalized freebeter, starved in a pound for three days and then drowned. Poor little waifs of the street, whose only crime is their affection for all men rather than for one man. This man in the green sweater held in his hand a long wire with a loop at one end, and he limped toward Peggy, who, all unconscious of danger, looked into his forbidding face and wagged her tail.

Just then a schoolboy passed by and scenting danger to his little friend called, "Come, Peggy! Come, Peggy!" Peggy imediately ran part way to him, then started back. Why should she not salute those stranger dogs first? Again came the call, "Come, Peggy! Come, Peggy!"

While she hesitated, the man with the wire advanced rapidly toward her and such a look of rage came over his face as he yelled, "You little rascal, you keep still or I'll have you arrested." But as he rushed toward the dog, the boy, disregarding the man, again called Peggy and ran up on the porch of her mistress' house, closely followed by the now thoroughly frightened Peggy.

On came the executioner, but before he reached the porch Peggy's mistress stod facing him with Peggy wrapped safely in her arms. As the green sweater limped back to his wagon muttering imprecations on the boy, Alan, from a safe distance, was heard to say, "I don't care if she didn't have a license. He don't get Peggy."

NO USE FOR ONE.

He saw her stepping from the car
And up to her he sped.
"May not I help you to alight?"
"I do not smoke," she said.

Be Cheerful

It is our daily duty to consider that in all circumstances of life, pleasureable, painful or otherwise, the conduct of every human being affects, more or less, the happiness of others, especially of those in the same house; and that, as life is made up, for the most part, not of great occasions but of small everyday moments, it is the giving to those moments their greatest amount of peace, pleasantness and security, that contributes most to the sum of human good.

Be peaceable.
Be cheerful.
Be true.—Leigh Hunt.

KAZAN

Abounds with interesting features

Read the succeeding chapters, you will be highly interested

She would move only when he was very near her—so near that she could touch his scarred flank with her nose.

They came at last to the point in the trail where they had to leap down a distance of three or four feet from the edge of a rock, and here Kazan saw how utterly helpless Gray Wolf had become. She whined, and crouched twenty times before she dared make the spring, and then she jumped stiff-legged, and fell in a heap at Kazan's feet. After this Kazan did not have to urge her so hard, for the fall impinged on her the fact that she was safe only when her muzzle touched her mate's flank. She followed him obediently when they reached the plain, trotting with her foreshoulder to his hip.

Kazan was heading for a thicket in the creek bottom half a mile away, and a dozen times in that short distance Gray Wolf stumbled and fell. And each time that she fell Kazan learned a little more of the limitations of blindness. Once he sprang off in pursuit of a rabbit, but he had not taken twenty leaps when he stopped and looked back. Gray Wolf had not moved an inch. She stood motionless, sniffing the air—waiting for him! For a full minute Kazan stood, also waiting. Then he returned to her. Ever after this he returned to the point where he had left Gray Wolf, knowing that he would find her there.

All that day they remained in the thicket. In the afternoon he visited the cabin. Joan and her husband were there, and both saw at once Kazan's torn side and his lacerated head and shoulders.

"Pretty near a finish fight for him," said the man, after he had examined him. "It was either a lynx or a bear. Another wolf could not do that."

For half an hour Joan worked over him, talking to him all the time, and fondling him with her soft hands. She bathed his wounds in warm water, and then covered them with a healing salve, and Kazan was filled again with that old restful desire to remain with her always, and never to go back into the forests. For an hour she let him lie on the edge of her dress, with his nose touching her foot, while she worked on baby things. Then she rose to prepare supper, and Kazan got up—a little wearily—and went to the door. Gray Wolf and the gloom of the night were calling him, and he answered that call with a slouch of his shoulders and a drooping head. Its old thrill was gone. He watched his chance, and went out through the door. The moon had risen when he rejoined Gray Wolf. She greeted his return with a low whine of joy, and muzzled him with her blind face. In her helplessness she looked happier than Kazan in all his strength.

From now on, during the days that followed, it was a last great fight between blind and faithful Gray Wolf and the woman. If Joan had known of what lay in the thicket, if she could have seen the poor creature to whom Kazan was now all life—the sun, the stars, the moon, and food—she would have helped Gray Wolf. But as it was she tried to lure Kazan more and more to the cabin, and slowly she won.

At last the great day came, eight days after the fight on the Sun Rock. Kazan had taken Gray Wolf to a wooded point on the river two days before, and there he had left her the preceding night when he went to the cabin. This time a stout babiche thong was tied to the collar round his neck, and he was fastened to a staple in the log wall. Joan and her husband were up before it was light next day. The sun was just rising when they all went out, the man carrying the baby, and Joan leading him. Joan turned and locked the cabin door, and Kazan heard a sob in her throat as they followed the man down to the river. The big canoe was packed and waiting. Joan got in first, with the baby. Then, still holding the babiche thong, she drew Kazan up close to her, so that he lay with his weight against her.

The sunfell warmly on Kazan's back as they shoved off, and he closed his eyes, and rested his head on Joan's lap. Her hand fell softly on his shoulder. He heard again that sound which the man could not hear, the broken sob in her throat, as the canoe moved slowly down the woded point.

A Summary Of The War For The Week

The Italians Have Been Making Headway ---50,000 Prisoners Captured During the Week---Canadians Move on to Lens.

Each day brings more excitement and thrills to the observer who sees the war in its true light. Instead of only a couple of countries fighting, there are now seventeen nations in league under the title of "Allies," namely, Great Britain, France, Russia, United States, Belgium, Italy, Japan, Rumania, Serbia, Montenegro, Greece, Cuba Portugal, San Marino, Siam, Liberia and China. Other countries are also on the verge of stepping into the war, as their inhabitants are very restless on account of the "German anti-allies' movement." The enemy, too, is composed of several nations, which brings over twenty nations into this great European, or better still, world-wide conflict. Millions of men lie buried on the battlefields and thousands rest upon the ocean sands, while many more march forth to France and other parts to join the warring bands, leaving home only those who are physically unfit, women and "slackers," to carry on the industries of the country.

On account of the great consumption of foods and other necessary war materials, and the lack of soil tillers and other industry men, nations have been compelled to devise new methods and ways to carry on the work; also to conserve energy and food. In England and Wales the increased acreage for wheat, barley, oats and potatoes this year is 347,000 acres—six per cent increase—while more than half a million small gardens have sprung into existence. United States, too, is increasing her acreage for cereals, and in the meantime is passing laws restricting certain kinds of foods, so that a greater amount can be given to the soldiers. Already in most countries, Canada included, meatless days have to be observed, while wheat flour must be mixed 50-50 with rye or other grains. However, though the Huns have sunk so many ships and destroyed much trade, England has no fear, for with American resources behind her, she will never starve.

The following is an account of each day's happenings:

Saturday—On the northern wing of the Ypres front, the French, after repulsing heavy counter-attacks, make further gains near the Steenbeke river. The allies capture 1,800 prisoners and 24 guns along the western front. Canadians hold the Prussian Guards back. Canadian political troubles are still unsettled, and election seems to draw nearer every day.

Monday—Germans try Hill 70 again, but fail, losing men and material. The Italians start a big drive. Things are quiet on the Russian front. Conscription bill ready for governor-general today.

Tuesday—Italians and French make headway, taking territory, booty and 12,000 prisoners. Winston Churchill reorganizing the British munitions department. Advance made on the western front by allies. Western Liberals conferring.

Wednesday—On the Isonzo front the Italians captured 13,000 Austro-Hungarian prisoners, while the French captured 6,000 on the Aisne front. Germans try to retake Hill 70. Germans raided the Yorkshire coast unsuccessfully.

Thursday—Furious fighting on Isonzo front, Italians capturing 16,000 prisoners. French make advances on the Verdun front; capture 7,639 prisoners. Canadians hold back the German attacks and move ahead towards Lens.

Friday—Hungary asks for peace. German casualty lists no longer permitted to leave Germany. Peru sends an ultimatum to Germany. Austrian counter-attacks fail. A German raider is sunk.

General News.

Australia has 150,000,000 bushels of wheat above home requirements awaiting shipment as soon as transportation difficulties have been overcome. Australia is short of steel and an effort is being made to manufacture plates, tin plate and galvanized iron.

The Italian merchant marine losses for the week ending Aug. 12, comprise six steamers and five sailing vessels, one of the latter being above one hundred tons. Five hundred vessels of all nationalities, of a tonnage of 339,245, entered port, and 509 of a tonnage of 414,775 left.

The enlistment in the U. S. has been very satisfactory. Last Aug. 14, the volunteers for the regular army reached a total of 190,347, bringing the roll to 7,000 in excess of the number asked. Since the total quota has been filled several days ago, the enlistment has continued at the rate of over 1,000 a day.

Washington, D.C.—Information concerning food costs in Germany received at the offices of the food administration show that many edibles, particularly those containing fats, are selling at almost prohibitive prices. Fat for frying is bringing more than $4 a pound. Goose fat is sold at $5.36 a pound.

Fowls generally are high. Fresh fowls bring $1.01 a pound, larded goose breast $2.08, salted goose legs 94c, young country laying hens $3.32 each, fed geese $11 to $19 each. The egg rations at Hamburg for one week was one egg for each person.

Horses are in great demand for food and horseflesh sells at from 53 to 86c a pound. Rabbits are sold at $2 each. Cheese is quoted at from 36 to 86c a pound.

Havre, France—Those who wish to hazard a guess upon the probable duration of the war will be able to derive some information from the French leases which the British and American governments are signing on the property which they are using in French ports. The old leases are running out and are being renewed for a period of three years. Of course, allowance has to be made for the work that will have to be done immediately following peace, but even so, this news is regarded here as confirming the belief that the war will continue well into next year.

Copenhagen.—Germany is believed to be making preparations for the establishment in Denmark and Sweden of a large number of branches of well-known German factories and industrial firms, says Svenska Dagbladet.

These plans if carried out would be detrimental to neutral trade, since the countries of the allies would be naturally suspicious of all neutral firms which might be serving German interests. The paper suggests a combination of industry and finance to offset this German influence.

In a statement to the organ of the workmen's and soldiers' deputies concerning the forthcoming Socialist convention at Stockholm, Premier Kerensky made himself understood that though the convention was not a government affair, the provisional government was lending its support to make the convention a success.

Among the 600 prisoners taken by the French in the hollow recesses of Dead Man's hill was a battalion commander with his staff, including Count Eugene Bernstorff, nephew of the former German ambassador at Washington.

OIL COMPANIES PAY BIG DIVIDENDS

When the extraction plant now in course of construction is completed, the Calgary Petroleum Products Co. will be able to produce over ten thousand gallons of gasoline daily. The fact that several companies are paying good dividends in the oil fields of Alberta shows the wonderful possibilities for future development.

TO REDUCE CONSUMPTION OF FOOD

Food Controller Hoover, of the United States, is endeavoring to give the people good advice in regard to food consumption so that the soldiers fighting and children starving may have plenty to eat. The following is a plan which he has outlined:

1. Eat one wheatless meal a day.
2. Eat beef, mutton or pork not more than once a day.
3. Economize in the use of butter.
4. Cut the daily allowance of sugar in beverages, etc.
5. Eat more vegetables, fruit and fish.
6. Urge in the home or the restaurant frequented the necessity of economy.

The Trouble Makers

I.W.W.'s Are Spreading over North America Very Rapidly—Vulcan District Infected.

That mysterious organization of restless, anarchial, unskilled laborers, known as the I.W.W.'s, are spreading rapidly over the whole of the North American continent, causing confusion among the peaceful farmers. Among other places the Vulcan district has been the centre of attack, where the trouble-makers are working hard to tie up harvesting operations.

Across the line, the I.W.W.'s have been very busy, tieing up grain operations and causing great damage in general. It is said that the organization is financed by moneyed German agencies.

In Canada, the Vulcan district in particular, the method employed is the same as that in the States. These men decline to work themselves and keep others from working. The farmers in the district are offering $4 per day for stookers and $4.50 for binders, but the I.W.W. men refused to accept even $9.

On Sunday last the I.W.W.'s held a meeting in the Vulcan park and decided on a plan of campaign. Their destructive work has been in preventing laborers from working. The I.W.W.'s threatened to burn down the printing plant of the editor who was fearless enough to criticize them.

The farmers held a meeting and F. Dunsmuir decided to come to Calgary to get 60 men. Some of the I.W.W.'s came up on the same train on Monday night and threatened to throw him off, if he didn't get off. He didn't get off, but came on to Calgary. He succeeded in getting a number of men from here.

Some of these men have been hanging about the office of W. Grant, provincial harvesting officer, and spreading their pernicious gospel among men seeking employment.

"We can make the farmers pay our price or make them leave their grain on the ground to rot," was one of the expressions overheard just outside of Mr. Grant's office door. Mr. Grant reports that 25 men arrived from Seattle Monday night and booked for the south country.

The General Political Situation In Canada

Hon. Robert Rogers Withdraws From The Borden Government---A. L. Sifton May Change The Situation.

With the disappearance of Hon. Robert Rogers from the Borden administration the way seems clear to the formation of a union between the present administration and some of the Liberals who do not wish to follow the lead of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The interchange of correspondence between Sir Robert Rogers and the premier shows a conflict of opinion that could only end with the retirement of the minister of public works. Since his entry into federal politics, Bob Rogers has been the storm centre, and from his statements it can be seen that he was no friend of any proposed union. His idea was to continue the Conservative party as it is now composed and to carry on the government as in the past. His ground for leaving the administration was that the premier was adopting dilatory tactics in relation to the enforcement of conscription. He will continue as a private member and promises his continued support to the party. It is the general opinion that the really strong man of the Borden government is now gone.

If Arthur L. Sifton enters the federal arena there will be a general shakeup in the provincial government. The general opinion is that either C. W. Cross, present attorney-general, or Charles Stewart, will become the premier. Both men have a following in the house, and the claims of both to the position will be urged. In any event, there is a strong possibility that Calgary will be represented in the new cabinet, and in the person of W. M. Davidson, editor of the Albertan and member for North Calgary. Should Mr. Davidson be given a portfolio, and the probabilities are that he will, he would assume the position of minister of education. During the past few years he has been a member of the public school board of the city of Calgary, and has given good service in that capacity. His acquisition would be an asset to the government.

An Ottawa dispatch appearing in some of the eastern papers states there is a possibility of a winter election. This would be to the advantage of the government in that it is expected Sir Wilfrid Laurier would not be able to stand a strenuous campaign in the winter weather. There is a possibility that the government may allow parliament to run its course, which would mean that there would be no appeal to the people until May next. This method was followed on a previous occasion—in 1896—but great favor. If the proposed union government is formed the chances are the elections will be called either in the late fall or in the winter and seats would be sought for the new members of the national government.

As the time goes on the prospects of the government for the formation of a union cabinet grows brighter. The representatives of the farmers, Messrs. Crerar and Wood, have decided not to enter into such a proposal, but the latest word from Ottawa is that Aruth L. Sifton, premier of Alberta, and J. A. Calder, of Saskatchewan, will be called in to represent the west.

With the union cabinet completed, the election will be a straight fight between the old line Liberals and the union forces of the Conservatives and Liberals who will follow the new members of the cabinet. In the Maritime provinces A. K. McLean of Halifax or Frank Carvell of Woodstock will probably be taken into the new government—either of whom would be a source of strength to the new party.

In the general talk about conscription a good deal of what is now going on in parliament is being lost sight of by the general public. At the present time there seems to be a desire to assist Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann through the purchase of the common stock of the Canadian Northern which those gentlemen have in their possession. The experts appointed by the government put a very slight value on this stock, but now that the road is being taken over by the government this stock seems to have acquired a new value. The matter is at the present time being fought through the committee of the house, and it is almost a surety that some substantial return will be given by the government for the stock held by these parties. If the government acquires the Canadian Northern—and there seems to be no doubt of that—the country will have taken a long step in the direction of public ownership. The

CANADA'S WEALTH STILL GROWING

Few people realize that Canada's mining industry is growing rapidly. The latest reports of the gold produced in 1916 was $20,250,000. India only produced $11,500,000 and Rhodesia $19,480,000. The oil industry for 1917 promises some amazing surprises when the year's results are known.

BRITISH IN CAPTURED TERRITORY

The ground recently won by the British army was so greatly shot up it was necessary to build a plank road to bring up troops and supplies.

Don't fail to order from the news agents or newsboys the next issue of the Standard, it will contain the greatest assortment of news features including a complete list of the great serials to be shown at all the different theatres and picture houses in Calgary.

LOOPED-THE-LOOP; NOW GOING "WEST"

Thomas Richler, an exhibition aviator, in trying to learn the loop-the-loop over Staten Island, lost control of his airplane and fell 2,000 feet to a ravine near the Richmond Country club. When persons arrived to extricate him from the wreckage he gave a short account of the accident. He was taken to the hospital and it was said that he probably would live only a few hours.

RUSSIAN ENVOYS TO UNITED STATES

SO THE PEOPLE MAY KNOW

CANADA IS FOR THE FAIR-MINDED NOT THE DOMAGOGUE

The Standard sympathizes with Lieut. Clifford Reilly as all fair-minded men of the city are bound to do irrespective of party affiliations.

While The Standard may not personally agree with Lieut. Reilly as to his views on certain public questions the fact that he has been a good citizen, a public servant and loyal subject of the Dominion, entitles him to better treatment than has been accorded by a lot of narrow-minded people who are showing more a spirit of demagogism than the open-handed spirit that should predominate in all true Canadians.

The lesson we are learning each day from the domineering disciple of Germany and how far this spirit will go when allowed to run untrammelled and unchecked is sufficient reason for us to ward against a repetition in this country.

A Domineering Demogogue has caused the greatest war in the history of the world and when the self-same spirit begins to show itself, even in a mild extent, in this country, it should be eradicated instantly.

Canada is a free country, where every man is expected to do his part and to voice his sentiment in all questions of the day if he desires, but it does not mean that the loudest talking ones shall have the right of overcoming the others whose spirit may be strong but whose voice may be weak.

The Demogogue spirit must be subdued here at all times. We must rule by right in fairness and justice—not by might, and the bellowing of lusty lungs.

Sons of Ex-Governors and a Governor at Training Camp

Sammy's Camp Life Is Depicted

Paul Scott Mowrer Describes Visit to United States Training Ground in France—Within Sound of the Roaring Big Guns.

With the French armies.—From the embattled region of the Californie plateau I went down yesterday for my visit to the American training camps. From the waste and ruins of three terrible years I went along villages thronged with bronzed young men in khaki—boys newly arrived from home, my own people from my own country. To see them here in this old foreign land on the edge of the all-consuming holocaust seemed wonderful and strange beyond expression. Their gestures, their commonest words became suddenly to me.

I saw them lounging in the village streets, shaving one another in open doorways, basking in the sun on old stone steps and marching along the roads or over the hills. And the scenes, vivified by their presence, engraved themselves on my heart of tenderness and pride.

Americans Can Hear Guns

These troops are not far from the front. Twice anti-aircraft batteries on the hills have had to drive off German airplanes, and when the wind is from the north it bears the sound of guns. The villages in this part of France are picturesque, with somewhat dilapidated aglomerations of barnyards and white stone cottages having red tiled roofs. Chickens pick continually in the twisted lanes, and the smell of cattle is everywhere. There is no large towns. It is a drowsy, hilly, agricultural country of golden wheat fields, fields of steel gray oats and fields of clover deep and green and sweet to breathe. Our boys from the middle west ought to feel somewhat at home, for it is one of the few regions in Europe where women wear sunbonnets.

Here, in a sort of valley, in every hamlet and villages along a stretch of poplar bordered road, the American trops are billeted. The general has his headquarters in a community somewhat larger than the others. From this point a second road diverges along which the veteran soldiers of the crack French division have taken up their quarters. For each battalion of Americans there is a battalion of French.

Dig Trenches Under Hot Sun

In an angle of the two roads is a hilly tract of perhaps thirty square miles of pine and beech and stony pasture where nobody lives and little will grow. This is the training ground. Every day from morning until night the Americans are sweating and toiling with their new French comrades in learning to dig trenches and use grenades and machine guns—in short, absorbing all the highly complicated details of this unprecedented warfare. It will take some time, for there is much to learn. Before they move again our boys will get to know again our boys will get to know this quiet country well.

Only a few miles from the billets is a small town with several stores. It is there I met the first American soldier I have ever seen since the landing. He was on a bicycle. When I called to him to inquire the way he came and leaned against my automobile while he talked to me in a soft southern accent, for he was a farmer boy from North Carolina. Like so many of our boys, he had lips as red and delicately molded as a girl's, but his eyes were deep set with a slight downward slant at the outer corners, which bodes ill for the foe when the fever of battle has risen.

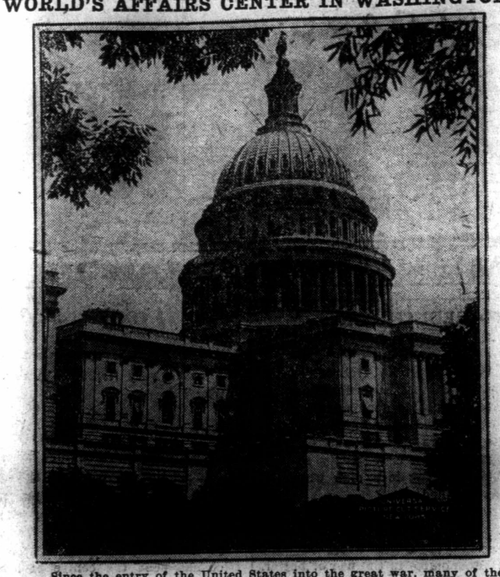
Boy From Dixie is Homesick

Some day this boy will fight with the fury his ancestors showed under Lee, but for the moment he was homesick and garrulous in a naive way that was both amusing and touching.

"Our camps are out yonder about eight miles," he said. "Some say it is six miles, but I think it is eight, because I walked it once. I can walk pretty good, but it took me two hours. How is everything going on up at the firing line? Pretty hot, eh? I know it is a kind of a delicate question, but I would like to know, because as soon as all this is over I want to get home. You see, the girls here are all right, but you can't talk to them, for you can't understand anything they say. Down at the town where he landed were about twenty girls who could talk just as good as me. They said they had learned English in London or Columbus or somewhere; I think it was Columbus. They were nice girls and I liked that town.

"But I want to go up to that firing line some time before I go back home. My company commander has promised to take me up some day. I am his orderly and I came in to buy $5 worth of cigarettes. They say they ain't got none, but have sent them all up to the firing line. At least the woman she made signs like tying up a package and shooting a gun. So I know she sent them up yonder. But it ain't no good making signs. If you could only talk to them it would be all right."

In One "American" Village



In the eight miles which my North Carolina friend said was the distance to the first billet, there were few signs of our men. I passed an American motorcycle whizzing along in a cloud of white dust. I overtook convoy wagons drawn by Missouri mules and met two officers riding along with handkerchiefs knotted around their necks as if they were only a step from the Texan border, but once I entered the first village and long after there was no lack of Americans. These tanned young fellows swarmed everywhere. I saw them leaning in all the dorways, sitting in groups or lying asleep in the sun by the roadside. They gathered around a pear-shaped drinking water bags, which the army has set up at regular intervals in the village lanes. They stood in line holding tin plates where camp stoves under a square of canvas were giving out an agreeable odor of wood smoke and grilled meat.

Here was one man sousing his head and naked shoulders from a tub of water. There sat another in the shade of an old well holding a board on his lap for a desk while he penciled a letter home. Some were trying with small success to communicate by gesture with old women knitting on the dorsteps. But on a quiet stretch of road I met a tall, handsome rascal who apparently had overcome the curse of Babel. He was strolling along with a pretty French girl on each amr. Others romped with the children. I saw one standing under a tre showing four astonished youngsters how to use a lariat he had made for them. And one, the most pathetic figure of all, sat alone on a plow by a barn staring into space with his elbows on his knees. He was dreaming, perhaps of the corn fields in far away Illinois.

Marines Lead the Way

I passed several hours with the marines. So far as I have observed these men have more esprit de corps than any other unit in our army. Their pretence at real contempt for the regular infantry is not only amusing but to a certain extent commendable, for it is just such friendly rivalry that spurs the men to their efforts. Their uniform is a kind of dark olive gray which they call foresty green. On being told lately that they would perhaps be put into khaki their disgust was beyond words. They have protested and I hope their resentment will be given attention.

WORLD'S AFFAIRS CENTER IN WASHINGTON

Since the entry of the United States into the great war, many of the leading affairs of the world are being discussed by foreign diplomats in Washington.

New Wheat Being Hauled to Elevators

The general crop conditions throughout the province is very favorable. Cutting is general in almost every locality, while in some places where the crops were well advanced, the grain is being threshed and hauled to the elevators. From Manyberries, Etzikom and Alderson the news comes through the agents of the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator Co. that new grain is being hauled to the elevators, while from Winnifred sample wheat arrived in the Calgary office which graded No. 1. The weather has been fine lately for harvesting.

The following is detailed report given out by a few of the elevator men:

Innisfail—Crops fairly good in this district.

Delbur—Weather very hot, grain ripening fast; heavy rain last Sunday; cutting will be general next week.

Rumsey—Cutting is in full swing; crops better than expected. Oats short but good all-round crop is expected as no frost has infested these fields.

Wainwright — Cutting is general, with fine weather conditions for a good harvest. Rain helped the late crops wonderfully.

Manyberries—Harvesting is in full swing. Weather very favorable.

Etzikom—New grain is being hauled to the elevators. Weather fine, yield normal.

Alderson—Weather hot and dry. Harvesting progressing well.

Winnifred—Weather hot and dry, but crops doing well. Harvesting is well under way.

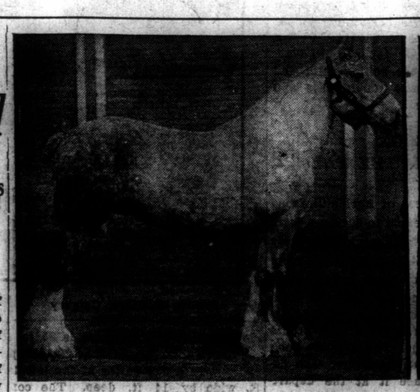
"United Grain Growers, Limited," Organized

Several Calgary Men are Chosen as Officers of The New Company---Mr. Rice Jones One of Foremost Men.

The final details and arrangements of the organization, The United Grain Growers, Ltd., which is the amalgamation of the Grain Growers' Grain company and the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator company, has been completed. The two companies, out of which the new one has been organized, were two of the largest concerns this side of Winnipeg.

The officers elected for the new company are: President, T. A. Crerar; first vice-president, C. Rice Jones; second vice-president, John Kennedy; secretary, E. J. Fream. Executive: Manitoba, T. A. Crerar and John Kennedy; Saskatchewan, J. Reid; Alberta, C. Rice Jones (Calgary) and R. A. Parker (Bow Island). C. Brown was appointed executive agent of the company. Mr. Fream, the secretary, will remain in Calgary.



As each company had different systems and rules in different things, the agreement between the two companies as a basis of amalgamation was that the system of representation and voting should conform to that in practice in the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator Co. Mr. Rice Jones, late of the Elevator company, but now first vice-president of the new company, stated that in order to conform the Grain Growers' Grain company to the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator company system it was necessary to have the Dominion government amend the charter. This amendment was made later than was expected, and under the amendments it was necessary for the old shareholders of the Grain Growers' Grain company to organize into locals similar to those of the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator company before a meeting of the shareholders of the new company could be held. "However," said Mr. Rice Jones, "on account of the shortage of labor this year we felt it would be useless to attempt to get representative meetings of the farmers. So we decided it would be best to put off the organization of the locals until the winter.

"Under the amendments passed by the government, the representatives of the shareholders of the united company must be delegates from locals. No proxies will be allowed, as has been the case with the Grain Growers' Grain company. Consequently we cannot have a meeting of the shareholders of the united company until the organization of these locals in Maintoba and Saskatchewan is completed next winter. In order to complete the organization and start this season as the United Grain Growers, Ltd., it was arranged for the shareholders of the Grain Growers' Grain company before making these changes, to increase the number of directors to twelve. Whereupon, three of the Grain Growers' directors resigned and the shareholders elected six of the Alberta Farmers' Co-operative Elevator company directors on their board. This new board of directors comprised six from Alberta, three from Manitoba and three from Saskatchewan.

"After completing the board, the shareholders of the Grain Growers' Grain company exercised the power given them by the government and changed the system of representation and voting, following which the board of directors held a meeting, changed the name of the company to the United Grain Growers, and elected officers. The result of the meeting was satisfactory to all concerned."

According to Mr. Rice Jones, the great bond issue had been authorized by the company at the Winnipeg meeting as constituting a $7,500,000 permit already granted by the Grain Growers' Grain company, and approximately an additional $2,500,000 issue, which will be used in expansion work, building elevators, warehouses, etc. The new company will make marked changes in the west, as both the old ones were reputed for good work in that line.

PUBLIC MARKET UNJUSTLY CRITICISED

The Standard feels that the Calgary Public Market is coming into a lot of unwarranted and unmerited criticism. The management of this market has been beset with many obstacles during their tenure of office and they are to be congratulated rather than censured for holding their own against the strong competition that the uptown markets have made on the Calgary Public Market.

In the past this market has been a public benefactor to a great extent—by being the first to furnish the public with produce of all kinds at reasonable prices—and the fact that competition has reduced the volume of business through no fault of the management is no reason for any unjust criticism that may now be indulged in by some who may profit by the closing of this necessary adjunct of the city.

The city officials and aldermen who have stood by the market in the past should have a vote of thanks for furnishing the poor workman and others with good goods at reasonable prices and it would be well if the city would look a little deeper and see the real reason for the unjust criticism.

Calgary needs a market of this kind for both the citizens and the farmer and whether the market is moved up town or remains in its present location it deserves all the support the city can give it.

AREA AND YIELD OF FALL WHEAT, HAY, CLOVER AND ALFALFA

The Government Issues Preliminary Estimate of Yield of Fall Wheat and Other Crops—Alberta Ranks Third for Fall Wheat.

The preliminary estimate of the average yield per acre of fall sown wheat for 1917 is 22 bushels as compared with 21½ bushels in 1916, 29.41 bushels in 1915 and 21.70 bushels, the average of the seven years 1910 to 1916. The total yield of fall wheat for 1917 is therefore now estimated at 17,816,000 bushels, from 809,250 harvested acres as compared with 20,060,000 bushels from 932,500 acres in 1916. In Ontario, the chief fall wheat province, the total yield is 14,515,000 bushels from 655,500 acres, as compared with 16,465,000 bushels from 774,800 acres in 1916, the average yields per acre being 22.11 bushels in 1917 and 21¼ bushels in 1916. Saskatchewan now ranks as the second fall wheat province with 2,220,000 bushels from 105,700 acres and Alberta is third with 836,000 bushels from 38,000 acres. The total yield of hay and clover is placed at 13,379,000 tons from 7,824,000 acres, as compared with 14,637,000 tons, the record crop from 7,892,900 acres in 1916. This year's total yield of hay and clover has only twice been exceeded, viz., last year and in 1911, when the yield was 13,989,000 tons. The average yield per acre this year is 1.70 ton as compared with 1.85 ton in 1916 and 1.62 ton in 1911. The yield from alfalfa is 152,200 tons from 86,500 acres as compared with 260,500 tons from 89,470 acres last year, the average yields per acre being 1.76 ton as compared with 2.91 tons.

Condition of Spring-Sown Grains

The condition of spring wheat for the whole of Canada has receded from 85 p.c. of the standard at the end of June to 77 at the end of July. Oats show 76 compared with 85, barley 78 against 86, rye 81 against 83, and peas 85 against 89. The condition of other crops on July 31 was as follows: beans 74, buckwheat 86, mixed grains 90, flax 88, corn for husking 76, potatoes 84, turnips 90 mangolds 86, hay and clover 88, alfalfa 86, corn for fodder 77, sugar beets 88 and pastures 83. Converted into a standard wherein 100 represents the average yield per acre of the nine years 1908 to 1916 the condition of the principal grain crops at July 31, 1917, was as follows: Fall wheat 94, spring wheat 92, all wheat 83, rye 96, barley 93, oats 88, potatoes 99 and flax 107. That is to say the yields per acre of these crops, according ot their appearance on July 31, are expected to below the average yields of the previous nine years by 6 per cent. for fall wheat, 8 per cent for spring wheat, 7 per cent. for all wheat, 4 per cent for rye, 7 per cent for barley, 12 per cent. for oats and 1 per cent. for potatoes. Throughout eastern Canada the condition of the crops generally on July 31 is reported as excellent. In Ontario spring wheat is marked as high as 91, and oats and barley are 93; but in the west excessive heat and drought during July brought the condition down by July 31 to figures below 70 p. c., of the standard, spring wheat being 68 in Manitoba, 63 in Saskatchewan and 64 in Alberta, whilst oats are 62 in Manitoba, 53 in Saskatchewan and 57 in Alberta. Reports received during the last fortnight are, however, of somewhat more reassuring character. The Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture telegraphed (August 8) as follows: "Cool weather of past week and local showers generally have done much good to improve crop conditions. Wheat is filling well and cutting will be general in about 10 days. Oats are very short in straw and from present indications will be very low in yield." The Alberta Department of Agriculture telegraphs (August 11): "Heavy rains and cooler weather prevailed throughout most of province during past week and greatly benefited late crops. Grain harvesting will be general in several districts next week. Light frost in few districts on August 8 did very little damage excepting to vegetables in one or two places."

A New Self-Loader For The Live Stock

A Nebraska farmer uses a home-made of a pair of old cult'vator wheels and pine lumber. When it is in place for loading against the back of the wagon it provides a fenced incline up which the animals can be driven into the wagon.

The use of this handy device is a labor and time saver as well as an efficient source of protection against injury. If you have ever seen farmers go to the trouble of taking one back wheel off the wagon to that by the aid of hurdles or gates they could drive the hogs or calves into the wagon you will readily appreciate the value of this self-loader, especially on farms that handle much stock. It can be hitched to the rear end of the wagon and hauled to any part of the farm.

Far more effective than Sticky Fly Catchers. Clean to handle. Sold by Druggists and Grocers everywhere.

COST OF FOOD DOUBLED IN THE LAST 17 YEARS

Statistics Compiled by the Department of Labor Show That Food Has More Than Doubled in the Last 17 Years in Canada.

It is hard to conceive of such a fact that food prices have more than doubled in Canada during the last 17 years. However, this is true and, what is more, other living expenses have also doubled. The department of labor in its bulletins show that in most cases of food, the prices have raised to three times the sum they werein 1900. All but one or two have more than doubled.

For years the department has maintained clerks to compile various statistics. The following table, which shows the average price per pound of various foods in Canada is obtained by striking a general average, the same qualities, as far as possible, being obtained for comparison each year:

	1900	1917
Beef, sirloin steak.....	13.6	31.6
Beef, shoulder roast....	9.8	21.8
Mutton, roast	11.8	28.5
Pork roast, fresh.....	12.2	30.1
Bacon, breakfast	15.4	39.
Lard, pure leaf	13.1	31.1
Butter, creamery	25.5	46.8
Cheese, old	16.1	34.
Bread, plain	3.7	7.4
Flour, family	2.6	7.3
Rice, medium	5.2	8.
Beans, hand picked ...	4.3	15.2
Apples, evaporated	9.8	15.4
Sugar, granulated	5.4	10.
Sugar, yellow	5.	9.5
Tea, black, medium	32.8	46.
Tea, green, medium	34.8	45.2
Coffee, medium	34.4	40.4
General average $5.48		$11.89

To show the proportionate increase in the cost of living in the various provinces, 20 staple articles are selected in each of the prices added. Thus 20 articles which cost $6.86 in Saskatchewan in 1900 and $7.88 in 1914 cannot be bought today for less than $11.32, according to report.

The only article listed which remains at practically the same figure is coal oil. In 1900 it cost 24 cents a gallon and today the average price for Canada is 25.4.

A general summary is given showing the cost of living, inclusive of light, heat, fuel, rent, food and similar necessities of life. The figures for 1900 are $9.38 against $18.67 at the present time, showing that the cost of living has doubled in Canada during 17 years.

Horses Will Never Be Replaced in the Army

A Military Authority Gives His Views On Horse Needs at The Request of The Percheron Society of America.

"There seems to be a rapidly increasing opinion," says Colonel Reilly, "that the day of the horse in war has passed. The nearly three years of warfare in Europe have shown this to be an entirely erroneous idea. On the Eastern or Russian-Rumanian front, where there are few good roads—in other words where the road conditions are somewhat similar to those which ordinarily obtain in the United States—the horse has not only held his own for the mounted services, such as the cavalry and artillery, but also for supply purposes. Again and again the armies operating on this front have found the arrival of supplies and ammunition dependent upon the use of horse transport.

"Even on the Western front, where the road system is probably the best to be found anywhere in the world, mechanical traction has not been able to displace the horse. In general, it might be said that the line between mechanical and horse traction on a battlefield is the extreme limit of the enemy's artillery fire when any heavy action is going on. The horse is used on the battlefield and the mechanical traction in the rear of it where roads can be kept in fairly good condition.

"Of course during calm periods mechanical traction is used along the rear part of the battlefield. There are various reasons for this division of the work of transporting guns and supplies. Probably the main one is that batteries frequently must be placed and supplied in positions some distance from a road. Often the country to be traversed is so rough that a tractor cannot get over it.

"If the army is operating on conquered ground this ground generally is so cut up with old trenches and shell holes that horse traction, and only horse traction, is practicable. Frequently the mud is so deep that mechanical traction is practically helpless. In many cases the situation is such that no wheeled carriages of any kind can move. In such cases pack animals, horse and mules, have to be used.

"So well are these conditions recognized that in spite of the tremendous weights of heavy-artillery material and the slowness and difficulty of moving it by horse traction, it is considered that only half the heavy batteries should have mechanical traction. The remainder are horsed, and thus the means is always available to move the batteries, no matter what the difficulties.

"Therefore, in general it may be said an army must still have animals for all its cavalry, the usefulness of which is far from disappearing; it must have horses for all its light field artillery, half its heavy field artillery, and all its regimental and divisional supply trains.

"Incidentally every regiment of infantry must have several hundred horses and mules. The more the question is examined, the more two facts stand out: That first is that certain very essential work in modern warfare can only be done by horses and mules. The second is that the number of these animals needed for armies which are counted by the millions must be counted by the hundred thousands."

THINGS WORTH KNOWING

No doubt a good many farm women have spent a lot of time putting grease on little chickens to keep them free of lice. A better method is to mix some dalmation powder and sulphur together and dust it on them with a powder gun at intervals of 4-5 days for the first two weeks. The gun only costs about ten cents. Lift the hen off the nest and dust her too with the powder, if this method is followed one will seldom loose a chicken.

A hen never tries to spread her wings over a rooster-sized son to protect him, but Mothers do it.

IS IT NOT CURIOUS?

A grade cow, eight years old, near Woodstock, Ont., that freshened last November, has given in eight months 13,092 pounds of milk, average test over 3.2, spot cash value $288.57; she is still giving 34 pounds of milk per day, and is due in November again. Such a cow is a source of perennial pride to her owner; he weighs the milk from each cow he has, because he finds it pays.

But is it not curious that many dairy men never bother to weigh, and so remain quite hazy as to each individuaes'l roprfamencpj.. K(q-o - Nfde vidual's performance? It is curious, too, when you come to think of it, that so many are content to bother with a herd not one of which has any remote chance whatever of giving in a year even one-half of what this fine cow gave in eight months.

The immense possibilities for an increased flow of milk from cows selected on tehir actual records, bred right, fed well and handled sensibly, seem, curiously enough, entirely undreamed of as yet by some dairy farmers in all provinces.

Milk record forms will be gladly supplied free of charge by the Dairy Division, Ottawa, to any one curious enough, and enterprising enough to find out what each cow does actually produce in return for all she eats. Make each cow pay.—C. F. W.

Live Stock Owners Being Defrauded

Livestock and poultry owners have been defrauded for years by manufacturers of condimental or tonic stock foods and regulators. This stuff is not worth feeding at any time, bnt now price it is especially desirable that any unnecessary expense be done away with.

Various mixtures have been tested by authorities who have every reason to be fair, but in practically every case these nostrums have been found to be without value for the purpose for which they are sold, or worth far less than the price charged.
