OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable L. René Beaudoin

Tuesday, January 10, 1956

THIRD SESSION—TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the twenty-eighth day of July, 1955, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the secretary to the Governor General, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is with pleasure that I greet you as you resume your parliamentary duties at the beginning of this new year.

Since you last met there have been significant international developments. Some of them have been welcome as releasing tensions in certain parts of the world while others unfortunately have had the contrary effect. My ministers remain convinced of the need to maintain the defences of the free nations as a deterrent to war. A strong North Atlantic Treaty Organization and adequate protection for this continent are in their view fundamental to the preservation of peace and the security of Canada.

Security, however, cannot rest on arms alone. The government, therefore, is continuing its constant efforts, through diplomacy and negotiation and through the United Nations and other international agencies, to bring about better understanding between nations.

A meeting of commonwealth prime ministers will be held in London in June to consider matters of mutual interest. My prime minister has accepted the invitation to attend.

Meanwhile my ministers are looking forward to the visit to Ottawa in February of the prime minister and the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom.

The annual meeting of the consultative committee of the Colombo plan agreed that this constructive work should be continued for a further period and you will be asked to authorize Canada's continued participation in the plan, as well as in the United Nations technical assistance program.

[Mr. Speaker.]

A royal commission has been appointed to consider and report upon the development and financing of television and sound broadcasting in Canada.

The royal commission to examine and report upon our economic prospects is proceeding with its inquiry.

The year just ended has been the most productive in our nation's history. More men and women have been employed than ever before. Our harvests have been abundant. Our trade has exceeded all earlier levels. A record number of houses has been built.

Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being. In particular, although sales of wheat in the past five years have been at record levels, an unprecedented series of bumper harvests has made necessary the storage of abnormal stocks of grain both in elevators and on farms. Lack of space in elevators has limited the ability of producers to deliver grain as early as usual in the marketing year. In order to provide an immediate source of funds where they may be needed, my ministers will ask you to authorize guarantees for bank loans to producers secured by their grain.

You will also be asked to authorize the treasury to bear the cost from August 1, 1955 of storage and interest charges on wheat held by the wheat board over and above its normal carryover levels. As a consequence of this arrangement, returns to producers will not be depressed by carrying costs on abnormal carryover.

A higher level of employment this winter than last seems to be assured and the improvements you made to the Unemployment Insurance Act last year will provide a better coverage for those who are temporarily without work, particularly in the winter season. Various departments and agencies of government have sought to arrange their construction programs to provide more employment during the winter season. It is gratifying to note that many other employers are endeavouring to follow the same policy.

In October my ministers held a conference in Ottawa with the premiers and other ministers of all the provinces to consider financial and other relations between the federal and provincial governments. Following this useful discussion and some further correspondence, my ministers have placed before all provincial governments a specific proposal for federal-provincial fiscal arrangements to commence next year.

The conference established a committee of ministers from all governments to consider health insurance programs and the work of this committee is now under way.

My ministers have also conferred with provincial ministers to consider and develop an arrangement for sharing the costs of assistance to unemployed persons not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, and in need. Detailed agreements have been submitted to the provinces. You will be asked to approve the legislation necessary to implement this program.

You will be asked to provide for the construction, jointly with the government of Ontario, of a gas pipe line across northern Ontario from the Manitoba boundary to Kapuskasing, to be leased to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, which is to build connecting lines in western and eastern Canada. My ministers consider this government participation is necessary to make this important national project possible at this time.

You will also have laid before you amendments to the Trans-Canada Highway Act to accelerate the completion of essential links in the trans-Canada highway and to continue, in co-operation with provincial governments, the work of constructing that highway up to the agreed standards.

Amendments to the National Housing Act will be laid before you. The rapid growth of our centres of population has been a spectacular feature of our national development since the last war, and in that growth wide use has been made of the National Housing Act by our citizens, particularly in suburban areas. One amendment now to be proposed is designed to increase assistance to encourage redevelopment of older sections of our cities to their best use.

Early last year the home improvement section of the act was proclaimed. It has contributed greatly toward the betterment of many existing houses. An amendment will be laid before you to increase the amounts of loans available for this purpose.

A joint committee of both houses will be proposed to review the progress and programs of the federal district commission in developing the national capital.

In the field of industrial development you will be asked to extend the scope of the Industrial Development Bank. You will also be asked to increase the size of loans which may be made by the Canadian farm loan board and to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

My ministers also plan to introduce a bill to provide that women receive equal pay with men for equal work in industries which are under federal jurisdiction.

You will be asked to revise the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and the Dominion Succession Duty Act. You will be requested to consider amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the Supreme Court Act, the Excise Act, the Canada Shipping Act, the Small Loans Act, the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Canadian Citizenship Act and the Indian Act.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make provision for all essential services.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May divine Providence bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE HON. ALCIDE COTE

(Translation):

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply moved at this time as I rise to pay tribute, at the very beginning of this session, to the memory of the late Alcide Cote, who died at his St. Jean home on August 7 last. Every hon. member must have been as shocked as I was on learning of the death of a colleague esteemed by all, at an age which still held the promise of many more years of fruitful labour in the public service. While we were not unaware of the seriousness of his illness, we had thought that his return to this house, on June 8 last, after a few months' rest, justified the assumption that before too long he would be able to resume all his duties. The spontaneous applause, from all parts of the house, which greeted his return here on that occasion, told more eloquently than I am able to say today of the affection and high esteem we all had for him.

The late Alcide Cote could proudly claim direct descent from one of the first Canadian settlers. After completing his studies at the College of St. Jean and the University of Montreal, he practised law in the city of St. Jean, of which he was mayor from 1945 to 1949. For several years he took an active part in the initiatives of the bar association of his province, of the union of municipalities, of the chamber of commerce and of numerous other associations.

Mr. Cote had first been elected to the House of Commons in 1945. His constituents had renewed his mandate in the general elections of 1949 and 1953. In 1952, he had been sworn as a member of the privy council and appointed postmaster general.

Mr. Cote's participation in public affairs, in the field of his profession and in municipal and federal politics is abundant evidence of the interest he had dedicated to the welfare of his fellow citizens. The passing of our colleague has caused deep regret among the members of this house as well as in all the other spheres in which he had carried out his beneficent activities. And it is, I believe, the spontaneousness and sincerity of such regrets which constitute the most touching tribute that could be paid to his memory.

(Text):

Since we last met, Mr. Speaker, death has removed from our midst an esteemed and helpful colleague, Hon. Alcide Cote, at a time in his life when it might have been expected that he could look forward to many more years of useful activity.

I am sure I speak for all members of the house in saying that Mr. Cote will be remembered in this assembly for his gentlemanly nature and his deep consideration for his fellow men, which made him one of the most popular members of the house. Those endearing qualities were combined with a deep sense of responsibility as a citizen. Throughout his career in the professional, municipal and federal fields, he worked hard and conscientiously for the welfare of the people who had put their trust in him, and gave of himself unstintingly in the service of the nation as a whole.

Another trait of his personality which I am sure all hon. members would have me recall was his great modesty and his deep humility. It was typical of his natural modesty that when a new postmaster general was to be appointed, in 1952, he was perhaps the most surprised of all members of the house that he should be called upon to fill that position.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that all members would wish to join with me in expressing at this time our sympathy to Mr. Cote's sisters and brothers and the other members of the family in their bereavement.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know that every hon. member of this house will join in the words of sympathy that have been expressed by the Prime Minister. We extend our sympathy to the members of the government with which Mr. Cote was associated and to all of his colleagues, because there had been that close association day by day which had brought him very much in contact with them.

I should like to emphasize, however, that Hon. Alcide Cote was a warm friend of every member of this house. I think it can be said without any question that there was not a single member of this house who had not responded to his genial and cordial approach to the problems that came up in discussion here. Naturally in a democratic chamber there was not always complete agreement about the manner in which things should be done, but it was always characteristic of him that the discussions which took place were carried on in the kindly and generous manner to which the Prime Minister has referred.

I perhaps have good reason to know something of what it means to be welcomed back by the members of this house, and I recall the time last year when we were all happy to welcome the Hon. Alcide Cote back into this house, thinking he was returning to his duties. It made it doubly tragic when we heard a short time afterward that he had suffered a heart attack and later was taken away very suddenly.

I simply wish to join fully, on behalf of myself and my associates, in the words of sympathy expressed by the Prime Minister and to extend to the members of his family the sincere sympathy that I know is felt by every hon. member of this house.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition are indeed shared by all members of this house. Mr. Cote was a very charming personality, a very good friend and one who should have been able to look forward to a long career in this parliament and country. As has already been said, it is tragic to know that he was cut off in the prime of life and has been lost to the country, the government, his party and the province where he lived.

My closest association with him was at the United Nations in the autumn of 1953, when in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs he acted as chairman of the delegation. I am quite sure that those of us who were associated with him throughout the number of weeks we were in New York will recollect the fine personality that chaired our meetings, the genial comrade who in the evenings, when the day was over, sat around and proved himself to be a very fine companion.

We all join in the sympathy that has already been expressed to the members of his family, to his brothers and sisters. I wish also to extend to the government and to the members of the Liberal party our sympathy in the loss of one of their devoted colleagues. I am sure all members of the house feel that we have lost from among us one whom we regarded as a fine personality and a good friend.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, we in this corner of the house wish to join those who have preceded me in expressing our respects to one of our departed members.

Every so often it becomes a rather trying duty for members of this house to rise and pay tribute to one of our colleagues who has departed this life. Our duties here and our lives and our associations in this house are, generally speaking, very pleasant. Sometimes our pleasant associations are marred by the departure through death of members whom we honour and respect as fellow workers for a better country and a greater nation. It is perhaps a double tragedy when we realize that one is taken from us at such an early age.

There is not much one can say apart from paying our respects and our tributes to a colleague well respected and well loved. Members of this group pay their respects to the memory of Mr. Cote and wish to extend their deepest sympathy to his near relatives and friends.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Hon. James J. McCann, Minister of National Revenue, the Hon. Stuart S. Garson, Minister of Justice, the Hon. Hugues Lapointe, Minister of Veterans Affairs, and the Hon. W. E. Harris, Minister of Finance, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the one hundred and forty-third chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, intituled: An act respecting the House of Commons.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house under standing order 65, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Harris, Lapointe, Tustin, Quelch and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That Edward T. Applewhaite, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Skeena, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

Motion agreed to.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENTS

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the Prime Minister moves the adjournment I wish to direct a question to him through you. In view of the inclusion in the speech from the throne of a reference to the trans-Canada pipe line, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could make arrangements for the tabling tomorrow of the draft agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario as well as the draft agreement between the proposed crown company and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will endeavour to ascertain if those documents can be tabled tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 4.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 11, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE—TABLING OF LETTERS AND DRAFT AGREEMENTS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table of the house copies of a letter in French and in English which I addressed to the premiers of all the provinces on January 6 last concerning fiscal arrangements.

At the same time I should like to table copies of a letter which I addressed to the premiers of the provinces on December 5 and 6 last, with copies of a draft federal-provincial agreement on unemployment assistance.

I also wish to table two copies in French and in English of the revised proceedings of the federal-provincial meetings of April 26 and October 3 last.

Perhaps hon. members would wish for the sake of convenience to have these letters printed as an appendix to today's Hansard, together, I suppose, with the enclosed draft of the federal-provincial agreement on unemployment assistance. If that should be the desire of the house, perhaps Your Honour might so instruct the officials.

Mr. Drew: I should think that would be very desirable.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this suggestion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of documents see appendix, pages 23 to 30.)

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at the last sitting of the house the Leader of the Opposition asked the Prime Minister to table certain documents referring to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I now table two copies of these documents.

GRAIN

WHEAT—AVAILABILITY OF FREIGHT CARS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What is being done by his department and the car controller in order to make freight cars available for the transportation of wheat to fill the unfilled storage space at the head of the lakes and also on the Pacific coast? Would the minister also say what are the possibilities of an early increase in the amount that may be delivered to country elevators by farmers?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the transport controller is of course an officer of the Department of Transport. However, the department and the wheat board have been exerting pressure on the railroads and on the transport controller to speed up the movement of wheat from the prairies. My hon. friend will realize that the weather on the prairies for the last three or four weeks has been extremely unfavourable for railroading. The weather is improving and I may say that car loadings are improving. We hope that the improvement will continue. As far as added quotas are concerned, these are being increased from day to day and week to week as the situation warrants. A new list is published each week showing additional quotas for various points on the prairies.

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT ON 1954 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the important announcement made yesterday that the government will pay the carrying charges on part of the wheat carryover, can the minister now say whether a payment on the 1954 wheat crop will be made at once to provide hard-pressed farmers with some cash immediately?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend will realize that the bill he has referred to has considerable bearing on the ability of the government to decide on the amount of an interim or final payment. As soon as parliament has disposed of that legislation, we will be able to give careful consideration to the subject matter of his question.

CEREAL GRAINS—AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the low price received for grains has consideration been given to putting all cereal grains under the Agricultural Prices Support Act?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I am afraid I will have to refer that question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I direct the question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I understand that the Agricultural Prices Support Act does not include wheat and coarse grains.

CRIMINAL LAW

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION RESPECTING CRIMINAL SEXUAL PSYCHOPATHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the recent tragic murder in London, Ontario, would the minister indicate to the house what progress the royal commission on the criminal law relating to criminal sexual psychopaths has made and when their report will be tabled?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend's question I may say that somewhat more than a month ago I discussed with Chief Justice McRuer the prospects of an early report and he told me that until a considerable mass of scientific data which they wish to assemble shall have been prepared they will not be able to make a report. I do not expect we will get one for some months yet.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

RESUMPTION OF WORK ON WINNIPEG POST OFFICE AND DEER LODGE HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. When will work be resumed on the post office in Winnipeg and the addition to the Deer Lodge veterans' hospital in St. James?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I suppose one could answer by saying it is a matter of degree. The work was never discontinued. There was some slow-down because of the extreme weather, material shortages and certain other factors, but the work is progressing in accordance with the government's policy of winter employment.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION FOR PERSONS DENIED BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Have arrangements been made for unemployed persons who have been denied benefits under the new act to be put on benefit if they could have qualified under the terms of the old Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The question asked by my hon. friend has been asked me privately by several other hon. members since yesterday, and I should like to make just a brief comment on it at the moment. The unemployment insurance commission found that the date upon which they could get their staffs at regional and local offices aware of the terms of the new act was approximately some time in October. Consequently the provisions under the new act came into effect on October 2. Since that time the commission has been following the course of its operations very carefully and I am glad to report to the house that, in the main, the great revisions of last year have gone into effect very well indeed. As a result of the 12 or 13 weeks' operations the commission found that there was need for some adjustments so that the actual application of the act could more closely conform with the intentions of parliament. It has been possible to achieve some of these by regulations made under the act. On others—and these include those referred to by my hon. friend about which he is concerned, as am I—the commission would like to have a little longer time to complete their preliminary survey and to assess the longer term effects of any further adjustments they might recommend to the government. They are also, of course, studying the legal implications involved. The commission feels that a useful part of their survey would be for them to get at first hand from hon. members an outline of any difficulties that are being experienced among their constituents. With this in view, I shall be happy to arrange for any hon. member, including my hon. friend who asked this question, to discuss this whole matter with the members of the commission and myself because it is not quite as simple as it appears to be on the surface.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? If the commission finds it impossible to deal with this matter by regulation and if the problem still continues, will the government introduce at this session any necessary amendments to the act?

Mr. Gregg: I should like to be satisfied—as I hope to be shortly—as to the answer to the first part of my hon. friend's question before I answer the second part.

TRADE

GATT CONFERENCE—INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he will acquaint the house with the instructions under which the Canadian delegation will be operating at the forthcoming conference with respect to the extension or modification of the general agreement on tariffs and trade?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The delegation will be instructed to represent Canada to the best of their ability. It is not expected that the area of the tariff negotiations will be particularly wide. The negotiators we send are experienced men and they will report, as they appear, any opportunities to improve the Canadian position.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister further whether there are any specific instructions as to seeking a widening or any particular form of modification of the existing agreement or is it merely a matter of a general extension?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No. This is a discussion of individual items. Whether we may widen the area of negotiation I cannot say. Frankly, we think that the results are not likely to be startling.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST FOR EQUALIZATION OF SASKATOON-SUTHERLAND AREA RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I should like to address to the Postmaster General a question of which I sent him notice. In view of the recent amalgamation of the town of Sutherland with the city of Saskatoon, has consideration been given to equating postal rates within the whole area so constituted? If so, what has been the result of such consideration?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): This matter is under active consideration at the present time. I would hope to be able to advise my hon. friend on the matter in the near future.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

D.E.W. LINE—AVAILABILITY OF CANADIAN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Has the attention of the Minister of National Defence been called to press reports that United States personnel will man the distant early warning line in the Canadian Arctic because of the lack of suitable Canadian personnel, and would he care to comment upon that press report?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I may say that the question of manning the D.E.W. line, which, of course, is not yet completed, is under consideration. As it is at present the subject of discussions I think it would be premature for me to comment. As soon as it is possible to make a statement with respect to the matter one will be made.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SHIPMENT OF AIRCRAFT TO EGYPT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Have any aircraft been shipped from Canada to Egypt recently or are there any orders on hand for the export of such aircraft?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In order to give a final answer to this question I would have to make inquiries of the Department of Trade and Commerce as well as my own department. However, I believe I can say at once that I know of no shipments of Canadian aircraft to Egypt or of any orders for such shipments.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUTTER

SALE TO EAST GERMANY—INQUIRY AS TO TERMS OF CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Would the Minister of Trade and Commerce give the house the terms of the contract for the sale of 7 million pounds of storage butter which is alleged to be destined to East Germany?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am sure my colleague the Minister of Agriculture will be glad to do that.

Mr. Dufresne: Then I ask the same question of the Minister of Agriculture.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I do not believe I can agree with the figures that were used with regard to the sale, Mr. Speaker, but with regard to any sales of butter that have been made recently, some of them to Czechoslovakia and others to Eastern Germany, those to Czechoslovakia were at 39 cents a pound and those to Eastern Germany at 37 cents a pound. The butter was sold, of course, for delivery through a certain agency.

Mr. Dufresne: May I ask a supplementary question? Are the freight and handling charges paid by the government or the purchaser?

Mr. Gardiner: The price is as of Montreal.

[Later:]

Mr. Dufresne: I wish to ask a question supplementary to the question I asked of the Minister of Agriculture a few minutes ago. I would like to know the terms of these sales. Were they cash sales? What were the terms really between Canada and the other party?

Mr. Gardiner: Cash against documents at Montreal on the price level that I stated.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CF-105—INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Can the Minister of Defence Production give the house any estimate as to the date when production of the CF-105 will commence at the A. V. Roe plant at Malton? Can he report on what progress has been made in that connection?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Steady progress is being made, Mr. Speaker, on the pre-production models of the CF-105. My hon. friend will understand that the production line does not start until several planes have been made, tested and adjusted, so when he speaks of the date of production it is difficult to set a date. The work is proceeding steadily with some success, I believe.

STORMS

MARITIME PROVINCES—DISLOCATION OF TRANSPORTATION—ARRANGEMENTS FOR TRANSPORTING MAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): May I direct a question to the Postmaster General, notice of which I have not sent him. In view of the dislocation of transportation in Nova Scotia, particularly, can the minister tell us what arrangements, if any, are being made by the Post Office Department for the transportation of mail throughout the province?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): We are endeavouring to remedy the situation as quickly as possible. Of course when the means of transportation are interrupted they are interrupted for the Postmaster General as for the rest of the people. We are trying to take all the emergency means available to meet the situation.

Mr. Nowlan: Are you using trucks now?

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

INQUIRY AS TO RESTORATION OF TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister any report to make on the progress made in re-establishing telegraphic communications in the maritime provinces after the damage caused by the recent weather conditions there?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must answer that I am unable to give any reply to my hon. friend this afternoon.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEEN ELIZABETH HOTEL—REQUEST THAT NAME BE CHANGED TO CHATEAU MAISONNEUVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister tell the house if his department is still considering the possibility of changing to "Chateau Maisonneuve" the name of the new Canadian National Railways hotel in Montreal?

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Duplessis does not want to.

Mr. Dufresne: Whenever he does want to, he will not seek permission from the hon. member for St. Mary.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must inform my hon. friend that this matter lies within the purview of the Canadian National Railways authorities and not of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Dufresne: Has the Minister of Transport already recommended to the board of transport commissioners that this change be made or does he intend to do so?

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MRS. ANN SHIPLEY AND SECONDED BY MR. OVIDE LAFLAMME

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mrs. Ann Shipley (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) asked me by telephone if I would move the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I of course immediately accepted the honour, but with some humility. However, I soon became proud indeed, because I realized that the honour was not for me primarily but for the people of my riding, Timiskaming, whom I have the honour to represent; and furthermore, I believe that the right hon. Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet were not unmindful of the fact that in their selection they would be honouring all the women of Canada, be they in public or in private life.

It is not very long ago that women did not have the vote, and not so long ago that they were not considered persons for the purpose of qualifying for most public offices.

Throughout my experience as a trustee of a public school board, as the head of a municipality, a member of council and as a member of this House of Commons, I have found no indication whatever that we are simply tolerated; on the contrary, I have been welcomed and immediately accepted as any other member.

I stand in this house today, Mr. Speaker, as the first woman in Canadian history to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am deeply conscious of the significance it holds for the women of Canada. On their behalf and on behalf of the people of Timiskaming, I thank the right hon. Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet.

I was pleased to note in the speech from the throne that a bill will be introduced to provide that women will receive pay equal to that paid to men for equal work in industries which are under federal jurisdiction. This was indicated by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) last session. This legislation will not affect women who are employed in industries which are not under federal jurisdiction. I mention this because there appears to be great misunderstanding on this point. All other women employees come under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

Speaking on this subject on previous occasions I pointed out how difficult it is to evaluate what is equal work, and I shall be most interested to examine the methods of administration which will be proposed in the forthcoming bill. What I would like to see is some method of giving women equal opportunities for advancement, but I know of no way of putting that into legislation in order to ensure the desired results. I notice that there is a vacancy on the civil service commission and I urge strongly that this vacancy be filled by the appointment of a woman. Not only do I feel that this is necessary; I urge that this should be done if we are to attain our objective of equal opportunities for all.

I congratulate and welcome the new members to this house. The seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), will be telling you something of the accomplishments of those who come from his province, the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Bellechasse was outstanding as a student and won many honours. After graduating as a lawyer he took a most active interest in the work of the junior chamber of commerce and the affairs of his community and country and consequently was elected to this house at a very early age. In fact, I believe he is just two months short of being the youngest member in the house.

I am going to be brief in what I say as I am sure you are all anxious to hear le nouveau député de Bellechasse who speaks the mother tongue of a large percentage of my electors. Unfortunately and obviously that is not one of mine. He takes his seat on the right side, le côté droit, le côté sans lequel le cœur ne pourrait fonctionner.

Mr. Speaker, I wish also to congratulate you, as chairman of the committee on rules and procedure, upon the improvement in our rules. When I first came to this house I could not understand why so much valuable time should be taken up by member after member speaking for the full 40 minutes, in effect saying what had been said by many other members who had spoken for the full 40 minutes and who had the same convictions. However, I soon learned that the privilege of speaking often and at length is valued most highly by some hon. members and that any effort to shorten debate would undoubtedly meet with strenuous opposition.

You, sir, have accomplished what appeared to be the impossible in a truly statesmanlike manner. I need not have been surprised at this because hon. members who have been in this house for a long time have told me of your tact, sense of fairness, and above all complete understanding and knowledge of the rules, which has made you one of the best Speakers, if not the very best Speaker, that this house has ever known.

I was pleased to note the remarks with respect to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the speech from the throne. Last summer I had the privilege of joining a group of senators and members of parliament who journeyed to Paris to meet similar groups from other NATO countries. Invitations had been issued to the speakers of the assemblies of all NATO countries, but there was some doubt as to whether they would all attend. However, on our arrival we found that there was a representative group from every country. The representatives of two countries, the United States and Great Britain, about which there had been some doubt in the beginning, were outstanding in their enthusiasm.

Hon. Wishart Robertson, who headed our group, was made temporary chairman until it was determined what form the new organization should take. Subsequently Canada was honoured by the appointment of Hon. Wishart Robertson as chairman of the continuing organization.

Prior to the Canadian delegation meeting, there was some criticism in the press; in fact, I think in one or two cases they went so far as to call us busybodies. I was not disturbed about being called a busybody as I joined the group two years previously because, although I appreciated the importance of NATO in keeping peace in the world, I felt that as a member of this parliament I should know a great deal more about it.

Our meetings were held in the Palais de Chaillot, which is the headquarters of NATO. Every convenience was placed at our disposal. At the first meeting, we were made welcome by Lord Ismay, the secretary general of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He, of course, stressed the importance of NATO and deplored the lack of knowledge on the part of the general public of the work being done by the NATO organization. Lord Ismay told of the various methods that had been adopted to bring knowledge and a greater understanding to the public, and went on to say that he was particularly pleased that we had come to NATO headquarters as he felt that perhaps we could do a better job of disseminating knowledge of NATO to the people of our countries than could be done by the other methods that had already been tried. I cannot, of course, speak for the others who attended, but I have spoken of little else since my return. I have made many speeches to both large and small audiences and over our local radio station. We have created a definite interest in the community, because I have many bookings to speak to other groups, as soon as I can find the time.

We in this house can imagine the frustrating delays that took place in the early months of NATO, particularly, when all decisions had to be unanimous. It would have been surprising indeed if there had not been delays and difficulties, for there was no precedent for such an organization in time of peace. Yet NATO has become the framework for the common defence of over 400 million people on both sides of the Atlantic. I for one agree with Lord Ismay that, if comparable arrangements had existed in 1914 or 1939, the history of the twentieth century might well have taken another course and the world been spared the carnage and waste of two world wars.

I could not in the time at my disposal today attempt to speak of all we learned at this conference. We were briefed by the top men of the various departments and divisions. We were taken to SHAPE and received by General Gruenther, the supreme commander, who spoke to us at some length and then introduced the heads of the various divisions of the armed forces. Here again the story was the same: the great work that was being done, the need of greater support, and again the lack of knowledge and understanding on the part of the very people who were being protected by our NATO forces.

We met every day and all day for the week we were in Paris and, before the conference adjourned, we formed a continuing organization. As the primary reason for our existence is to further the aims and objectives of the North Atlantic treaty, it was felt that, excepting for enough members to ensure continuity, the same members of parliament should not attend the meeting each year, so that greater numbers would be taking an active interest in this vital organization.

It is perhaps a little difficult for Canadians to realize that there is active opposition to NATO within NATO countries, especially abroad. True, the numbers involved are not very great, but it is a very vocal minority. In fact, Lord Ismay stated in his report that a survey shows that 80 per cent of the people in the United States, United Kingdom and France had no idea what the word "NATO" stood for.

In particular, the NATO countries abroad are being bombarded with destructive propaganda and, if they are told again and again that NATO is indeed an offensive organization of nations and we do very little to tell them that it is solely to prevent aggression, we have no one but ourselves to blame that these minorities exist.

The officials of France, from the President down, welcomed us with open arms. We could not begin to accept all the hospitality offered, in the time at our disposal.

As the Minister of National Defence felt that our knowledge of the functions of NATO would be incomplete unless we visited our forces in Europe, the Canadian delegation left France and flew to Germany and visited our army bases there as well as all the air bases in both France and Germany. Before this tour was finished, I was beginning to feel that it was an endurance test because of the number of places we visited and the thousands of people to whom we talked in so short a period of time.

At every base we were shown the living quarters, the recreational and educational facilities, the working facilities and how well the men had been trained. We were given an opportunity to talk, unaccompanied by brass of any kind, to the men and women of all ranks. The only complaint I heard on the whole tour was from several of our men and their wives that they were sorry they could not stay longer.

I was deeply interested in the new permanent married quarters. The highest ranking officers live in quarters identical with those of the newest recruits. They have the same furniture and the same furnishings. The area allotted to each of the men is determined solely by the number of children, and it seems to be working perfectly. Incidentally, whoever was responsible for the selection of the furnishings should be highly complimented. Furnishings, of necessity, must be functional and durable. Nevertheless, the simplicity of design and natural finishes have created homes of undoubted charm. In spite of the fact that the only differences in the apartments are in the colours of walls, rugs and curtains, each has its own individuality.

The schools we visited had just recently been completed and are as fine as or finer than any of our newest schools. However, there is one very important difference: the cost of construction is much less than for a similar building here, because of the difference in the whole economy.

Either we went to visit the municipal authorities in the adjoining towns or they were invited to meet us at the base; and no matter where we went we were met with glowing praise of Canada and Canadians. We had met the same thing in Paris, and previously I had met the same reactions when I visited the United Nations. But I think it is most significant that in Germany this feeling was the same. It must be remembered that our men and women went to Germany as members of the NATO forces and, perhaps partly for this reason, the German people accepted them and became extremely friendly with them, even before there was any question of Germany herself joining the alliance. I asked several burgomasters why they felt so friendly to Canadians. They said we had so much in Canada in the way of land and forests and we were capable of building the best fighting plane in use in Europe today; but, in spite of this, we are not boastful.

They spoke in glowing terms of the wives of the servicemen, and this pleased me very much. It appears that the wives who first went over to join their husbands had to live on the economy of the country because there were no permanent married quarters ready for them. As land is so valuable and scarce in both France and Germany, our bases were situated, in so far as was stategically practicable, in the poorest farming areas. As a consequence, in many cases, the built-up areas nearest to the bases were small villages where there was no modern housing available. They rented quarters in buildings that had no running water. The burgomasters told me they knew the type of streamlined kitchens and other amenities that these wives were used to in Canada, but they did not complain. On the contrary, they and their husbands worked together to make this temporary home as convenient as they could.

I spoke to some of the officers in the various stations about the unusual public relations that seemed to exist wherever we went. They told me that, of course, that was their objective but they were extremely proud of the help they had had from their men and very proud of the job done by the wives.

I spent an evening with one young wife from my own community, and she told me how much she and her husband had learned from this posting abroad with the air force.

She had known that our Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and others were highly regarded in the international field and that Canada was rapidly becoming one of the key nations, but what she did not know was that this warmth and trust were ready and waiting to be extended to Canadians as individuals.

She said she had come abroad proud to be a Canadian, but she is going to come back twice as proud and, in addition, with an understanding of other people in other countries that she never had before. She said she used to feel sorry for people who did not enjoy all the amenities of life as we know them in Canada; but now she knows that a streamlined kitchen is not everything; that the people with whom she came in contact over there, if given a choice between physical comforts and the financial wherewithal to maintain their beautiful parks, monuments and historic buildings, would not hesitate to choose the latter. She said something more that I think a great many older people, who should be wiser, have not yet learned, that in helping others we should help them to help themselves in their own way, because what we feel is an essential in our life might be the last thing they would want.

One frequently reads in our newspapers criticism of Canadians. They state that we are not proud enough, that we are inclined to be a little too critical of our own country, and so on. I wonder whether this is so. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this very national characteristic is perhaps one of our greatest assets. The Canadian abroad is not a pushing or demanding person, though I do not mean he can be pushed around. We are quiet but we are also firm. In fact I think I can sum it up best by saying that I am very proud that we act like ladies and gentlemen.

To get back to NATO, my opinion is perhaps not worth very much on such an important and complex question. Nevertheless I am the mother of children who would be in the thick of any war that might involve Canada. I am convinced that not only must we make every effort to keep NATO strong, but we must become more active in sponsoring an intimate friendship and understanding between NATO countries and their peoples. This must be done or in my opinion there is grave danger of those who would like to see us quarrelling with each other and mistrusting each other having some success. NATO is too vital to our well-being and to peace in this world to allow us to sit idly by and just hope for the best. We not only must do these things but if more financial support and more men and materials are deemed necessary we should not hesitate to provide them.

I was deeply impressed with one paragraph in the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) following the most recent NATO meeting, to the effect that the meeting emphasized that we cannot relax either in defence or in diplomacy in the face of new Soviet tactics. He said that this was agreed by all, and that if the Soviet union can be made to realize the determination of the fifteen NATO members to work closely together to resist aggression and infiltration, the world will be spared a lot of unnecessary trouble.

At the time of the Geneva conference I was very worried because so many people seemed to think that the peace proposals would immediately make these defence measures unnecessary. It is my firm conviction, Mr. Speaker, that so long as there is a single country of any size whose people are not free to come and go at will, to read what they wish, and across whose borders we may not go freely and unaccompanied, then we are not safe from aggression.

Being a definite supporter of the short and, if possible, pertinent speech, I do not intend to take advantage of the honour accorded me today and speak at great length. However, I must avail myself of tradition and say something about my constituency, Timiskaming, that part of the great province of Ontario that starts approximately 100 miles north of North Bay, runs to within 250 miles of James bay and east and west 100 miles. We have a population of over 50,000 people. Mining, lumbering and farming are our major fields of employment. Lumbering carries with it all the seasonal unemployment problems.

The lower belt of the riding spreading east and west from Cobalt is chiefly rock, more or less mineralized. The upper belt spreading from Kirkland Lake is the same. In the centre spreading from New Liskeard we have the small clay belt. This soil, although it is limited in area, produces fine crops, particularly root vegetables of outstanding flavour and excellence.

The mines have created untold wealth for the nation, employment for thousands, a ready market for the produce of the local farmer, and modern municipalities have also been created. With the present price of gold and the inevitable depletion of ore reserves, these municipalities are now facing serious problems. The development of the north country has all taken place in the short period of the past 50 years. In 1904 the first claims were staked at Larder Lake. The second staking was in 1906, and was part of the claims now known as Kerr-Addison Gold Mines Limited. About this time the railroad being built by the province of Ontario as a farming development railway reached Cobalt, where almost pure silver was blasted from the rock cuts for the rail line. This fabulous find attracted prospectors from all over the continent. From Cobalt the prospectors spread north. Travel was still very difficult, chiefly by canoe and portage, but by 1909 the Porcupine camp was discovered and the Kirkland Lake camp was discovered in 1911.

In Timiskaming it has been our misfortune that no great base metal mines have yet been brought into production. To the east, about 25 miles away in northern Quebec, there are the great copper mines of Noranda and others, and to the west there are the fabulous nickel mines at Sudbury. We do produce cobalt which was invaluable to the Canadian and United States governments during the war but for which we now have to find or develop a commercial market. We produce a little copper, silver and certain other metals that are by-products, but our chief production is gold.

To have a gold mine used to be the equivalent of sitting on top of the world, but today with controls and a set price it is not the unalloyed joy of old. Without the help given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act many of our gold mines would be forced to close, thereby creating mass unemployment. If such should happen, properties in most gold mining communities would be valueless. The millions invested in schools and public utilities would be worthless, as in most cases we have relatively no secondary industry. We have tried and are still trying to attract industry, but it is very difficult to persuade them to locate in other than the congestion of big centres. Regardless of the price of gold or the assistance given, mining is a depleting industry. Therefore it is inevitable that a day will arrive when there is no more ore. Now is the time when action should be taken.

Perhaps it will be necessary to offer special inducements to industry, such as special freight rates or reduced hydro rates or both. This is obviously beyond the capabilities of the municipalaties concerned, and in any event is a provincial or, if necessary, even a national matter. In the case of northern Ontario it should not be too difficult, as the province not only owns the hydro but the railroad as well.

We have modern towns with excellent schools, many churches, good roads, air and rail transportation and recreational facilities available to us that others spend hundreds of dollars to come and enjoy. The trans-Canada highway goes right through the centre of Timiskaming and thanks to this government, with some help from the province, so will the trans-Canada pipe line. We have some available housing and enjoy moderate rentals, but above all we have the finest, friendliest people in the world. In the north you are not judged on who your parents were, their success or the lack of it, or on where you came from or what language you happen to speak at the moment. You are judged simply on what you are. If you want to work and become a leading citizen you have exactly the same chance as the next fellow.

Much has been written of the great fortunes that have been made from gold mines but very little of the heartbreaks and losses. Of all the claims staked, but a very small fraction of 1 per cent ever become profitable undertakings. As the Kerr-Addison gold mine is in my riding and was one of the very first group of claims staked in northern Ontario, I am going to give a very brief outline of its history. In 1906, when the claims were first staked, we must bear in mind that there were no roads, no railway and no electricity; but by 1907 or 1908 a shaft had been sunk, a steam-operated mill built and some gold produced. I do not even know the names of those involved nor the name under which the mine operated at that time, but I do know that the gold produced was part of the gold used in minting the first gold coins in Canada.

The company failed to find enough gold to carry on, closed the mine and lost their entire investment. No one seems to know how many times the claims changed hands, how much money and time were spent in exploration or how many heartbreaks ensued. During the period of 1919 to 1922, another group gathered together enough money to sink a second shaft. They went down 300 feet and had to quit. Ironically the bottom of the shaft stopped immediately over one of the best ore bodies in operation today. Eventually a new company was formed, shafts were sunk, a modern mill was built and today Kerr-Addison Gold Mines Limited processes by far the greatest tonnage of ore and is the second largest producer of gold in the western hemisphere.

This sounds like a success story and indeed it is, if we forget all about those who fell by the wayside. Prior to the Kerr-Addison success, hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent on this prospect. Prospector after prospector, and others willing to risk their savings, put everything they had into trying to develop a profitable mine but all was lost.

Fortunately experiences such as this do not stop prospectors. They are a special breed of Canadian. I have often tried to describe them without success. Westerners are very proud of their forebears, the pioneers. We of the mining areas of Canada are no less proud of our pioneers, the prospectors.

What makes a prospector may be difficult to define, but what the prospectors have done for Canada is a much different matter. By their very doggedness, or maybe their dreams of finding the pot of gold, they have opened the door to two of Canada's greatest assets, namely our mines and our oil fields. In 1955 Canada's mineral production soared to the record-breaking figure of $1,700 million. This unprecedented expansion is a tremendous help in balancing our international trade and provides employment for thousands of persons, not only in the actual production of minerals but in the factories all over Canada that manufacture the necessary equipment and supplies.

Just a few years ago you would have been laughed at if you had predicted that Canada's production of metals would reach the figure of $1,700 million in one year, but today it is generally accepted that this is only the beginning of the development of our mineral resources. In proof of this contention I would point out that in 1955 the groundwork was laid to bring more and more mines into production.

As Canadians we are pleased and proud of this great development, but how many of us give a thought to how it came about? The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys provides an excellent service that is most helpful, but it still takes the old-fashioned slugging, prospecting and diamond drilling, to find the mines. Of all the completely new mines brought into profitable production during the past ten years, almost 50 per cent are attributed to ordinary prospecting. You can trace the development of most of the mines in Canada right back to the men and women of the Cobalt, the Porcupine and the Kirkland-Larder camps. You will find them in there, if you care to look, either as the prospectors, the management or those providing the initial risk capital. Sometimes they are all three.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that those of us who were left behind in these areas and are carrying on under somewhat difficult circumstances, may be forgiven for expecting co-operation in facing our problems and for being so proud of what our pioneers have done for Canada.

It is not only the mining output that has gone ahead by leaps and bounds during the last year. The economic review shows the gross national product to be up by 10 per cent, that our export trade has increased, and that our unemployment has receded. In almost every field there are improvements; better still, all indications in economic activity for 1956 point upward.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), I have the honour to move:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, C.H., Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada:

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

(Translation):

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I fully realize that, in inviting me to second the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) wished to show his consideration for the constituency I have the honour of representing in this house. On behalf of all my electors and in my own name, I thank him most sincerely.

It might have been better for me and for you if, before risking my first words, I had had the opportunity of familiarizing myself with the atmosphere of the house. However, I did not wish to miss the opportunity that had been offered me of publicly expressing my deep appreciation to my electors who thought that I could represent them worthily in the parliament of my country.

I recognize however, Mr. Speaker, that this confidence of my electors is an unequivocal tribute to the man who, for us and for the people throughout the country, is the undisputed leader of the Canadian nation, the right hon. the Prime Minister.

I do not want to delay any longer, Mr. Speaker, before offering you my humble tribute; I make myself the spokesman of all members of the house in congratulating you most sincerely on the admirable way in which you have unfailingly exercised your delicate duties. Even outside the house, I had already heard of your tact, fairness, firmness and wisdom.

May I heartily congratulate the new members who, like myself, sit in this house for the first time: the hon. members for Temiscouata (Mr. St. Laurent), Quebec South (Mr. Power) and St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Menard). I am convinced that the house will benefit by their presence here and that their electors will only have cause to be proud of having sent them here. On your behalf, I wish them all possible success in a new career that will undoubtedly be fruitful to their constituency and their country.

As for the other new members, I will leave to people who know them better than I do the care and particularly the pleasure of congratulating them. Words of congratulation will be better felt and expressed by those who share their opinions. However, I have no doubt that, like all of us, they are anxious to promote the greatness of our country and the welfare of all Canadians.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to extend to our new Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) our most sincere congratulations for that new obvious mark of confidence he has received. A tireless worker, a living example of dignity and of devotion to duty, the hon. member for Lotbiniere does great honour to his constituency and to his fellow citizens of his province and of his country.

My presence here reminds you of my predecessor who, since 1940, has represented my constituency, His Excellency the Canadian ambassador to Argentina, Mr. Philippe Picard. He has been serving his country for almost 30 years now and the new post to which he has been called testifies to his great qualifications, to his vast experience in international affairs and to his devotion to his fellow citizens.

I wish, in the name of all members, to pay homage to one who is no longer among us, one who was loved and respected by the house and by everyone, the late Hon. Alcide Cote. Well liked in his constituency, esteemed by all those who had the advantage of knowing him, he had risen very rapidly in public life. His memory will long live in our minds. To his relatives and to his numerous friends I extend our deepest sympathies.

Mr. Speaker, you will no doubt allow me to turn for a moment to my constituency and to satisfy to some extent my desire to say a few words about it.

Located on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, between Levis and Montmagny, and extending southward to the American frontier, my constituency of Bellechasse is one of the oldest counties in the province of Quebec. Settled mostly in the 18th century, Bellechasse has always remained essentially agricultural; it is made up today of 21 parishes with some a little more populated than others.

Parish life has always been most intense in these parts, a fact which undoubtedly speaks for the devotion my fellow citizens have for their origin, their language and their faith.

To increase its population and retain its many native sons, my constituency needs industry. But its geographic position and proximity to Quebec city make this difficult. Still, it is with pleasure that I note that some industries, thanks to the courage and tenacity of those who have set them up, have undergone remarkable expansion. May I mention among others the Industries Provinciales Limitée, of St. Damien, my native community, the A. Garant et Fils Limitée of St. François and the Filature Saint-Charles Limitée, of St. Charles. The development of these firms is a tribute to their directors and it is fitting that I should point this out.

Each year, however, many of Bellechasse's native sons have to look elsewhere for jobs. That is a problem which could be solved, at least in part, by the development of small scale industry. These young people leave our constituency for larger centres where, especially in winter, they merely swell the ranks of the unemployed. I feel that government assistance to small industries would go a long way towards solving the difficult problem of unemployment as well as the housing shortage.

It is with pleasure in this connection that I point out that the present government, through the industrial development bank, has already helped the expansion of small scale industries by making provision for loans.

According to the annual report for the 1955 fiscal year, the bank, between November 1, 1944 and September 30, 1955 had authorized 1,468 loans, amounting to $123,724,603.

I would nevertheless like to suggest that a lowering of the interest rate and an easing of the conditions of the loans would possibly promote greater progress in the small industries field.

I have noted with pleasure in the speech from the throne the fact that the government does wish to broaden the scope of the work of this important agency. To my mind, this will promote greater development in this field.

As regards unemployment, the present government has already adopted highly beneficial measures. I am happy to point out that the amendments made last year by this government to the Unemployment Insurance Act were intended to make it easier for more of the unemployed to receive higher benefits. It is gratifying to point out that the number of unemployed has decreased remarkably all across the country at this time as compared with the corresponding period of the years 1953 and 1954. According to the report issued by the dominion bureau of statistics up to December 20, 1955, the comparison between the weeks ending November 19 for both years 1954 and 1955 shows an increase of 143,000 workers in employment. In all sectors of employment, there has been a decrease of seasonal unemployment.

In my opinion, this thorny problem of unemployment in particular cannot be solved satisfactorily solely by means of legislation and the intervention of the state. Its solution requires the combined efforts of all levels of government, of all municipalities, social bodies and businessmen.

It is very gratifying to observe that all across the country many employers, cities, municipalities, labour unions and social groups such as chambers of commerce, as well as newspapers, are hard at work, and co-operate in efforts to keep employment at a reasonable level throughout winter. For its part, the government has set an example through its departments by keeping a backlog of important wintertime works that can be carried out during that period. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate all of these groups who are eager to co-operate in the solution of this serious problem and who realize that the government, by direct intervention in this field, could only bring about an incomplete and temporary solution which could possibly have disastrous consequences for the economic situation of the country.

At the last federal-provincial talks on ways and means to alleviate or remedy the unemployment situation, the federal government laid before the provinces a sharing plan to which three provinces have already given their agreement, namely Newfoundland, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island.

Under that scheme, when the number of unemployed in any given province, whether employable or not, exceeds .45 per cent of the population of the province concerned, the government is prepared to share the average cost of relief granted by that province to the unemployed.

The present government has contributed and is still contributing to relieve the unemployment situation through the housing act, which promotes the building of new homes in this country. In 1955, that act, which deals with these two great social problems, unemployment and housing, has made it possible to build in this country more than 125,000 new homes. It is unfortunate that the severity of our climate is slowing down this boom in construction.

Last year, the present government amended this act in order to guarantee loans with regard to accommodation already built. This year, we find in the speech from the throne that parliament will be called upon to vote new amendments enabling and facilitating the building of new low-priced homes while tending, more particularly, to eliminate slum areas and to raise the amounts loaned for the improvement of existing accommodation.

To my mind, the expansion of new home building cannot fail to increase again to a considerable degree this year, because the population as a whole is realizing more and more all the benefits the government is allowing them on this point and also because the growing number of new housing units sprouting up everywhere lessens their apprehensions with regard to the risk involved in a loan which may seem too high for the building of a home.

Aware of its responsibilities and acting with a wise and clear perception, this government thus enables Canadians at all economic levels to realize their dream of becoming home owners while supplying at the same time a great deal of employment.

Canada has just experienced the most prosperous year of its history. Immediately after the last war, some calamity howlers who were opposing the government deemed it their duty to propagate apprehension with regard to the future. This was ten years ago. Now, we have passed through this period of transition from war to peace, which is so difficult. After a whole decade, may we not say now that Canada's constant progress seems assured to the present and future generations.

The opposition has often criticized the means chosen by the government to warrant the advancement of this country. I am perfectly aware that, if an economic recession were to take place, the opposition would blame the government all the more, because they are able to recognize the economic progress of Canada.

The past ten years have shown that the government was efficient in its action. Events are proving it was right.

I regret to say that, during the last year, the farmer has reaped less benefit from this expansion than any other part of our economy. The problem of farm surpluses remains to be solved. Everybody realizes how manifold it is. The farming population of my county is thankful to the government, to which it has given its support since 1921—because they believe in liberalism—for maintaining the price of butter. The dairy industry is the basis of the rural economy in my district, and if the government were to abandon this support before the market for this product has become more stable, it would, I think, endanger the economy of all the farmers from my county and our province.

Still to be solved is also the question of other just as important products, to which I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). If a diversified agricultural production such as this were better organized it might help to remedy the situation. When agricultural production will enjoy a stable market at home it will mark the opening of an era of unprecedented progress.

After overcoming the numerous difficulties that followed the war, Canada is now on the road of progress and continues to co-operate closely in the solution of international problems. Within the framework of the Colombo plan, she has contributed, since 1950, to increase the living standards of the peoples of south and southeast Asia. Without peace in the world, to what avail would be all our projects? Since the last Geneva conference, it seems that the Russians have shifted the conflict. In my opinion, their diplomatic offensive in Asia can only encourage free nations to give greater help to the underfed populations of that continent, to the full measure of our resources.

I am glad to hear that parliament will be asked to increase its contribution to the Colombo plan in order to accelerate the execution of many big projects, such as the erection of a dam at Warsak in northwestern Pakistan to be used for irrigation as well as for the production of electrical power so necessary to industrialization, the construction of a research atomic reactor offered to India and the implementation of other projects of lesser magnitude but at the same time important for some countries that did not receive much help from us. The rise of nationalism in Asia means the awakening of the masses. Those nations will no doubt seek to improve their living conditions. They will always have sympathy for those who will be the first to help them.

In a spirit of solidarity and charity, Canada must show to those nations that she contributes to their economic emancipation in order to ensure the triumph and expansion of our civilization. It would seem that throughout the world the unity of the free countries and their joint efforts to ensure peace in the world through a show of force capable of discouraging any would-be aggressor have achieved the desired results. Canada, with the understanding and support of her people, has borne her share of responsibilities towards this defence community.

This unity of strength of the free peoples will no doubt bring about a change in the tactics of the communist countries. It appears evident even now that Russia is attempting, by a diplomatic offensive, to render this force inoperative. It therefore appears all important for the free world to spread knowledge of the advantages of our democratic institutions, chief among which, to my mind, is the freedom of our people to choose the form of government they desire.

Before I resume my seat, I do not wish to omit mentioning publicly the great success achieved by the Canadian delegation at the last meeting of the United Nations general assembly. The acceptance of sixteen new member nations, which was one of the main features of this meeting, has undoubtedly strenghtened the position of this world assembly, widening its influence in its purpose to maintain peace through better understanding between nations, and all this is the result of the work of our delegation.

May I, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. members of this house, offer my very warm congratulations to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) for the efficiency he has shown as head of our delegation.

In the eyes of the world, I would say that the result shows that our nation earnestly desires peace and understanding between all nations and has no selfish ambitions.

(Translation):

I should like in closing to express heartfelt congratulations to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) for the fine account she has given in moving the address to His Excellency the Governor General.

Her condensed outline of the economy and of the projects for the future of Canada is proof of her high qualifications, which are an honour to the constituency she represents with such dignity in the house, and indicative of her wide experience in public affairs.

Her speech is a brilliant testimony to the glory and talents of all Canadian womenfolk, which the government has always so fittingly recognized.

Mr. Speaker, I eagerly second the motion of the hon. member for Timiskaming.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue this debate tomorrow and Friday.

GRAIN

CASH ADVANCES ON FARM STORAGE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Before the house adjourns I would like to move a motion for the adjournment of the house to consider a matter of urgent public importance. I am one of those who—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member at this point, because he says he wishes to move the adjournment of the house for a certain purpose. A motion to adjourn the debate has already been passed. Is the hon. member going to indicate that his motion to adjourn the house for a definite purpose is in order at this stage?

Mr. Coldwell: I do, yes. May I read it? I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the need for immediate action to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain to alleviate the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers and the entire economy of the prairie provinces. I make this motion because I believe that this is the right time to move it.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be good enough to comment further on his contention that this is the right place to move this motion?

Mr. Coldwell: Under standing order 26 a member is entitled to move the adjournment of the debate for the consideration of an urgent matter of public importance. The time to move that is after starred questions on Wednesday. There were no starred questions on the order paper today, and there being no starred questions on the order paper they could not be called. Hence if they could not be called that should not preclude a member from rising in his place and making an appropriate motion at the appropriate time. I submit that the fact that there were no starred questions does not take away from an hon. member the right to move a motion such as I have already moved.

Mr. Speaker: The reason the words "after starred questions on Wednesday" were added to this standing order was that the house wanted to make sure that starred questions would be disposed of on that particular day. It should be understood that a motion of this kind, being one of urgency, must be made at the very first opportunity. This motion is such as to stop discussion on any other matter. Therefore I think it should have been moved after routine business had been concluded, even on a day like today when there are no starred questions.

It is quite evident why there are no starred questions today. Under another standing order 48 hours' notice must be given, and the house met only yesterday. We passed a motion yesterday afternoon to the effect that today we would take as the first order of business the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. We have now reached the stage where an ordinary adjournment motion could be made, a motion such as a motion to adjourn the house. Such a motion is non-debatable.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), thinking that standing order 26 was the one on which he could depend at this juncture, has moved this particular motion. If the hon. member and I do not agree on what I have said so far I think he will agree with me as to this further point. Whenever the speech from the throne is the first order of business no other motion to discuss a matter of urgent public importance should be entertained.

The urgency of debate is something that has to be considered. The acting leader of the house has indicated by his announcement of the order that tomorrow the matter referred to in this motion could be discussed. In my experience it has never happened in the house that while the speech from the throne was being currently debated a motion for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance under the new standing order 26 was agreed to.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would you permit a comment on this point? First of all, may I suggest that one should be aware of the fact that under standing order 38 the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, on any day when it takes place, is placed ahead of all other matters, including starred questions. Therefore I feel that if my leader had attempted earlier today to move the adjournment of the house he could have been told quite properly that he would have to wait until all starred questions—this being Wednesday—had been disposed of, and that he would not get a chance at starred questions until after the house had finished what debate it wished to have on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I can say that my leader certainly gave consideration to attempting to move this motion earlier, but he felt that he would be out of order and therefore he preferred to wait until the time provided for in the rules.

As to the point as to whether or not a motion of this kind should be allowed when the debate on the address or the budget is going on, I suggest that both of those debates are general debates. There are occasions when hon. members who have taken part in those debates are interested also in the urgency of matters such as this, and there really is no reason why the fact that these other debates are taking place should preclude their taking part in a discussion which they feel is on a matter of urgent public importance.

I can recall that frequently Your Honour and your predecessors have suggested when an attempt like this has been made that consideration had to be given to the urgency of the debate. In other words you had to consider whether the question was of sufficient urgency to set aside what had been planned already for the house at that particular time. At this particular time the plan seems to be for the house to adjourn and the members to go home. By presenting this motion we are not proposing the setting aside of any other important matter. We propose this instead of going home. I feel that on all counts, the way in which the rules are set up, on the score of importance and on the score that it does not interfere with the discussion of anything else, this motion should be allowed for discussion for such time as the house wishes to give to it between now and six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I must tell the hon. gentleman that when he says that in the past my predecessors, at least two of them, or I, decided that there was no urgency of debate on the basis that we should not put aside the matters which had been specified to be debated on a particular day, he has, I agree, a point. It was in that light that very often decisions were made, namely that the motion would not be allowed, and that the business which had been appointed for that day should not be put aside, it being more urgent to debate other matters than the one proposed in the motion to adjourn the house.

I am not going to try to split hairs. It has been indicated by the hon. member and his leader that they have specific reasons for bringing forward this motion at this moment. Were I to agree that the motion has been moved at the right moment, and that it cannot be refused on the ground that matters appointed for today are more urgent, and this obviously because the said matters have already been disposed of and we are now, as he says, preparing to go home; if I were to state it as my opinion that this was a matter of urgent public importance we would have the situation that between four and six o'clock we would be debating this matter, namely the need for immediate action to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain, to alleviate the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers and the entire economy of the prairie provinces.

For two hours we would be debating this specific subject which, in my view, as it has just been mentioned in the speech from the throne, will certainly be commented upon, discussed and debated at great length by many speakers during the debate on the speech from the throne. What will be my position when I try to administer other rules which tell me that there should not be any repetition of arguments, notwithstanding how much latitude is given in a debate like the speech from the throne debate?

I think the hon. member, for the sake of orderly discussion from now on, should not press the motion at this time, as I feel it is very important that we have an orderly and sufficiently wide discussion in the speech from the throne debate, and as I feel difficulty would be caused to other hon. members generally in discussing the speech from the throne without knowing exactly what to do about the specified matter being brought up today, one which cannot be debated to the satisfaction of all within the two hours that we have at our disposal.

Does the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) wish to add something?

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to what you said latterly. Far be it from me to put into your mind as Speaker of the house the possibility of preventing a wider discussion of this matter in the debate on the speech from the throne. I did not bring the matter forward with that in view. I brought it forward because I had promised my constituents who are wheat growers that I would raise it at the first opportunity, and this is the first opportunity I have had of raising it. But if the allowance of this debate today would preclude the possibility of discussion of this matter by many members of the house who will not be able to discuss it in the next two hours, I would be the last one in the world to endeavour to interfere or risk interfering with their right to discuss this very important matter. Without prejudice, therefore, I will take your advice.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore I will not receive the motion.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 4.05 p.m.

APPENDIX

LETTERS AND DRAFT AGREEMENTS RESPECTING FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

Similar letters sent to the premiers of all provinces. The letter to the premier of Quebec was in the French language.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER CANADA

OTTAWA, January 6, 1956.

My dear Premier:

At the opening session of our October conference, I put forward certain general ideas which the federal government believed would form a reasonable basis for a revised approach to the question of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. These ideas were further elaborated in our sessions in camera, with some statistical illustrations of how they might operate.

We discussed these suggestions at some length at the conference and the general consensus seemed to be that they were worth careful study. We did not expect, nor did we ask the provincial governments to commit themselves on these principles at the conference, but at the closing session, I invited them to send in further comments or observations after they had had time for further consideration.

Since the conference I have received formal communications from four provincial governments and there have been informal exchanges of views with other provinces, both between ministers and officials; all of these have been carefully considered.

The federal government is now prepared to make a definite proposal and to recommend to parliament that appropriate legislation be passed along the following lines:

1. The federal government would make unconditional tax equalization payments to the provinces. In brief, these annual equalization payments would bring the combined per capita yield of certain standard taxes applied to the personal income tax field, the corporate tax field and the succession duty field up to the level of the average per capita yield of these taxes in the two provinces which have the highest per capita combined yields in these three fields. These equalization payments would be paid during each fiscal year commencing April 1, 1957, and would be calculated on the basis of the tax and population figures for the preceding taxation year.

2. During the currency of these arrangements, the federal government would also pay to each provincial government each year any amount required to bring the total yield of these standard taxes, plus the equalization payment, up to the highest of:

(a) the tax rental paid or available to the provincial government in respect of the year ending March 31, 1957, increased by an amount proportionate to any increase in population of the province, from June 1, 1956 to June 1 of the taxation year in respect of which the equalization payment is made; or

(b) in the fiscal year 1958-59, 90 per cent of the standard tax yield plus equalization and stabilization payments, if any, in 1957-58, and in subsequent years, 90 per cent of the average standard tax yield plus equalization and stabilization payments, if any, in the two preceding years.

3. Where a provincial government undertakes not to impose or permit its municipalities to impose taxes in the personal income tax field, or the corporation tax field or the succession duty field, the federal government would pay to such provincial government each year an amount equal to the yield of the standard tax in that field in that province.

4. Where a provincial government prefers to impose and collect its own taxes in any of these three fields at whatever rates it chooses, the federal government would abate the rate of federal tax in that field in that province by the standard rate.

5. Where a provincial government chooses to impose and collect corporation taxes, other than a general tax on profits, the federal government in determining the taxable income of a corporation would not allow as an expense provincial corporation taxes on that corporation up to 9 per cent of its taxable income or up to the general rate of corporate income tax levied by the provincial government, whichever is the greater. Where the total provincial corporation taxes paid by a corporation exceed such level, such excess would be allowed as an expense to the corporation. The cost to the federal treasury of allowing such excess as a corporate expense would be deducted from any payments due to the provincial government arising out of these proposals.

6. The standard rates proposed are:

(a) On personal incomes, 10 per cent of the federal tax under the Income Tax Act (i.e. excluding the old age security tax);

(b) On corporations, 9 per cent of the taxable income deemed to be earned in the province;

(c) On successions, 50 per cent of the federal duty. (In calculating equalization payments, it is proposed to average the yield of succession duties over a period of three years.)

7. In calculating equalization payments, stabilization payments or rental payments under numbered paragraphs 1, 2 and 3, the standard rates of personal income tax and succession duty would be adjusted upward or downward each year, if necessary, in order to offset any future changes in either the rates of tax or personal exemptions resulting from future amendments to the Income Tax Act or the Succession Duty Act.

We propose that these arrangements be for a period of five years commencing April 1, 1957.

These proposals provide revenues to the provinces somewhat greater than those available under the present tax-rental system; they provide for revenues increasing with the growth and expansion of our country; and they guarantee a measure of stability in this sector of provincial revenues more effectively than do the present arrangements.

They also make it possible for any provincial government so desiring to secure these revenues in these tax fields without the necessity of imposing and collecting its own taxes.

It would, I think, be useful to have our committee of officials meet as early in February as possible to clarify the technical details of these proposals.

I would be glad to hear from you in due course.

Yours sincerely,

LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER

OTTAWA,
DECEMBER 5, 1955.

The Honourable Leslie M. Frost,
Premier of Ontario,
Toronto, Ontario.

My dear Premier:

My colleagues and I have been considering changes in the draft unemployment assistance agreement proposed by a number of provinces in earlier correspondence and in discussions held with federal officials during the week of October 3rd. We have now approved a revised draft agreement, two copies of which I am enclosing with this letter.

In revising the draft agreement, we have sought to meet all the points raised by provincial representatives in so far as they would help to assure to all provinces, with their wide variety of institutions and procedures for providing relief, an equal measure of federal participation.

In all cases where changes have been made it will be noted that the revised text offers somewhat more favourable terms to the provinces than was the case in the original draft of last August. No change is contemplated in the formula designed to meet the special situation in Nova Scotia as set forth in my letter to you of August 26th.

The attached agreement was drafted in such a manner that it may be given effect from July 1st, 1955, or whatever later date may be preferred by each provincial government. In the event your government decides to enter into an agreement on the basis of this revised draft, would you please arrange to have both the attached copies signed or initialled by your appropriate minister and returned to the Minister of National Health and Welfare for completion on behalf of the federal government and one of the copies will then be returned to you for your records. Before sending the signed or initialled copies to Mr. Martin, paragraph 17 should, of course, be completed to indicate whether you wish the agreement to come into force on July 1st, 1955, or at some later date, and also whether the agreement with your province is to run for a term certain of five years or some lesser period.

Following completion of the agreement, the appropriate officers of the federal government will work out with the officials of whatever department you may designate the detailed administrative procedures for the submission of monthly reimbursement claims, beginning with the month in which the agreement takes effect. Federal authority to make the actual reimbursement payments will, of course, have to await the passage of legislation at the next session of parliament beginning January 10th, 1956.

Yours sincerely,
LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT.

Draft agreement as submitted on December 5, 1955 to all provinces except Nova Scotia:

(b) the average monthly percentage determined for the twelve-month period ending the thirtieth day of June immediately preceding the month to which the reimbursement claim relates shall be subtracted from the highest percentage ascertained pursuant to sub-paragraph (a) of this paragraph in respect of any other twelve-month period;

(c) from the difference ascertained pursuant to sub-paragraph (b) of this paragraph there shall be subtracted ·10 per cent;

(d) the difference ascertained pursuant to sub-paragraph (c) of this paragraph shall be multiplied by the population; and

(e) in the event that the calculation in sub-paragraph (c) of this paragraph results in a negative quantity, sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph 11 shall have no application.

14. The reimbursement claim shall

(a) be submitted within six (6) months next following the last day of the month to which it relates, but no claim submitted by in respect of any month prior to the actual date on which this agreement is executed shall be disqualified solely on the ground that it was not submitted within the said six (6) months, and

(b) contain the following certificate signed by the provincial auditor:

"I hereby certify that this claim for reimbursement has been prepared in accordance with the terms and conditions set forth in an agreement respecting unemployment assistance dated the day of 195 , and made between the Government of Canada and the Government of the province of ".

15. Canada shall, on receipt of a reimbursement claim that has been prepared in accordance with this agreement, pay fifty (50) per cent of the total claim.

16. In the event of any controversy arising between Canada and in respect of this agreement, either party may submit such controversy to the Exchequer Court of Canada for determination.

17. This agreement shall be deemed to have come into force and shall bind the parties from the day of 195 , to the day of 19 , and thereafter until terminated by either party giving to the other party one year's notice in writing.

18. Any notice given pursuant to paragraph 17 may be communicated as follows:

(a) to Canada, by registered mail addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, at Ottawa; and

(d) the difference ascertained pursuant to sub-paragraph (c) of this paragraph shall be multiplied by the population; and

(e) in the event that the calculation in sub-paragraph (c) of this paragraph results in a negative quantity, sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph 11 shall have no application.

14. The reimbursement claim shall in respect of any month prior to the actual date on which this agreement is executed shall be disqualified solely on the ground that it was not submitted within the said six (6) months, and

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION RESPECTING ADVANCES ON FARM STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the continuing representations made by the western farm organizations, is the government giving reconsideration to the decision it previously made not to grant advances on farm-stored wheat?

[Mr. Harris.]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government's program for wheat is at present on the order paper. If any further measures are decided upon, they will also appear on the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So that means there are no advances.

BUTTER

SALES TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture? It is supplementary to the questions asked yesterday in respect of the sale of surplus butter. Would the minister care to lay on the table of the house the full text of the agreement or agreements in respect of the sale of that butter to those designated countries?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): There is no objection to that being done, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR SPEED-UP IN GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the serious and tragic loss of life in Canada this winter because of fires, mostly in substandard dwellings, will the minister discuss with his colleagues the possibility of a real speed-up in the government's housing program so these tragedies might not continue to occur?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we all, of course, have been sorrowfully impressed by the number of casualties that have occurred recently. I do not know whether or not they have occurred in substandard dwellings. I understand that official investigations are being conducted; also that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is implementing the provisions of that act just as expeditiously as possible. It is my understanding that 125,000 new dwelling units were completed last year and that the prospects for the coming year are for completion of an even larger number than that.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HOSPITAL INSURANCE COVERAGE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Has the Minister of Veterans Affairs received representations from the Canadian Legion concerning arrangements for the provision of hospital insurance coverage in British Columbia for returning defence personnel and their dependents now denied it? If so, is consideration being given by the minister to the representations of the British Columbia command of the Canadian Legion?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The answer to the first part of the question is no. As to the second part, of course if representations are received they will get the consideration and action they always do, as the record shows.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF WOMAN MEMBER TO THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the government's intention to appoint a woman to the civil service commission?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): This matter has been under consideration, Mr. Speaker, and a decision had been reached in that connection but the person we desired to appoint felt she was not desirous of accepting the appointment and the matter is still under consideration because we would like to have a competent woman acting on the civil service commission.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SHIPMENT OF AIRCRAFT TO EGYPT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs anything further to add to the answer he gave to my question yesterday concerning the shipment of Canadian aircraft to Egypt?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The matter is still under investigation but I should have thought my hon. friend would have been satisfied with the answer to his own question which he gave to the press after the sitting yesterday.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to address a question now to the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman inform me when the right hand of the government will know what the left hand is doing?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It is not within my knowledge that there is any right or left hand concerned in this matter at this time.

LIVESTOCK

MAINTENANCE OF FLOOR PRICE ON HOGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Can the Minister of Agriculture assure the house that the present floor price on hogs will be maintained in 1956?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The present floor price on hogs was set about two years ago, I think, Mr. Speaker, and when it is discontinued the government will announce the fact.

[Later:]

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct to the Minister of Agriculture a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort. Can the minister state the floor price paid for hogs on the Winnipeg market?

Mr. Gardiner: The floor price for grade A hogs on the Winnipeg market is $20.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a further supplementary question. I have here a receipt—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): —dated January 3, which indicates that a price of $18.85—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member be good enough to put his supplementary question?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Yes. I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware that a price of $18.85 is being paid for grade A hogs on the Winnipeg market?

Mr. Gardiner: I am quite satisfied no such price has been paid.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST THAT AIR-SEA RESCUE SERVICE BE AUGMENTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? In view of the recent losses at sea on the west coast, will the minister augment the existing air-sea rescue service by the provision of helicopters for that work?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I believe that question ought to be directed to my colleague the Minister of National Defence, under whose department search and rescue in British Columbia comes.

Mr. Pearkes: May I direct the question I asked the Minister of Transport to the Minister of National Defence?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have already noted the hon. member's question; but the provision of helicopters for any purpose is not as simple as a question and answer.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the fact that there is no reference in the speech from the throne to any proposed amendments to the Disabled Persons Act, would the minister care to indicate whether he is prepared to recommend amendments to that act during this session?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would be most ungrateful if I did not at once acknowledge the tribute which my hon. friend paid me a few moments ago. I can say to him that I generally think I am right, and I hope I am always honourable, but I am not entitled to the designation involving these two words.

The question that my hon. friend asks is one that will be studied very carefully by a group of administrators of disability allowances from both the federal and provincial governments.

BLIND PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF SUPPLEMENTARY ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? What consideration is the government giving to the request of the blind organizations in Canada for a supplementary allowance to blind persons to help them to meet those special expenses which arise because of their blindness?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the right hon. gentleman, I would like to say that the government of course is giving all representations of that character its most careful consideration.

STORMS

MARITIME PROVINCES—RESTORATION OF TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Queens asked as to progress being made in re-establishing telegraphic communications in the maritime provinces.

The management of the Canadian National Railways advise that extra men have been assigned to the area and that rehabilitation work is being carried on around the clock. By Friday of this week the Canadian National hope conditions will be close to normal.

So far as any government telegraph lines are concerned, the department has had no reports of any failures in service.

I might add that the department does not receive reports from private telegraph companies.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 11, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to extend my compliments to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the motion to adopt the speech from the throne. I do so with more than the customary formality because I have had earlier occasions to listen to the mover; and so far as the seconder is concerned, I very greatly welcome the opportunity to hear a young man in politics making a speech in this house for the first time.

I was particularly interested in the remarks made by the hon. member who moved the motion because at the time when in our earlier association she visited the parliament buildings in Toronto as the reeve of Teck township it seemed to me that we saw eye to eye on a great many things. I am a little inclined to think that today also we see eye to eye on a great many things, and probably on many subjects of importance, particularly in relation to the mining areas with which she has been associated and about which she has spoken so well, though we have a few differences of opinion. Whatever our thoughts may be in that respect, I welcome the occasion when for the first time a lady member of this house has moved the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I trust that in the years to come many opportunities will be presented to other ladies, and perhaps those now in this house, to move similar motions. Even with the assurance that hon. members opposite may have that this is a distant possibility, at any rate may I express the hope that in due course we shall see many more ladies taking their places in this house and contributing to the discussion of those special fields in which their knowledge is of such great value to all of us.

I hope also that the youth of the seconder of the motion (Mr. Laflamme) will offer encouragement to many young people to play their full part in our political affairs without waiting perhaps too long in the hope that with a greater maturity of years they may have more opportunities. As we look around this house we see many hon. members who have spent many years here. Apparently they have not suffered, but on the contrary they seem to have actually gained in health and friendship from their long association with other members in this chamber.

Today we are considering what is the government's statement of parliamentary business which was presented to us last Tuesday in the speech from the throne. My complimentary remarks end there. The speech from the throne, which is of course the speech of the government presented under our constitutional system by Her Majesty's representative, contains no single new statement which has not already been before the public except the announcement that it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation which will assure to those women employed in the government service equal pay for equal work.

Naturally we welcome this legislation and the government will be well aware why we do. We do this, not only because of the value of the legislation itself but because we have sought this legislation for several years. For three sessions the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) had similar bills on the order paper. Granted, they were presented by a member of the opposition—and I suppose for that reason they were tainted to some extent in the minds of the government. But there have been occasions when the government has accepted bills put forward by members of the opposition. I recall one measure of considerable importance put forward by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and later adopted by the government. I recall others which have been adopted. Therefore it is not sufficient simply to say that this was put forward by the opposition.

Three years ago when the bill came forward it did not reach a vote. On April 6, 1954, there was a division on the motion for second reading and we had a most gratifying example of independence, which I hope will be extended and enlarged, when twelve Liberal members supported the motion. All members of the government and the overwhelming majority of Liberal members voted against the motion. The same was true on February 15 last year. On the latter occasion eleven Liberal members voted with us on the bill, and every member of the government and all the other Liberal members against it. I mention this because it is naturally a matter of gratification to us that the government has adopted a measure which has been put forward and supported by the vigorous arguments of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) and other members; and I hope that in this case members on both sides will feel it is appropriate to congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West on the adoption of the measure which she has sought to have placed on the statutes.

In addition to that one positive statement —a very gratifying statement—and the repetition of information already made public, there is very little but easy reassurances and uninformative platitudes. Surely, on a careful examination, no hon. member has been able to find any earlier speech from the throne which contained less information than this does.

After a few brief references to legislation which will be introduced to implement earlier public statements, we are told at the close of the speech from the throne that we shall be asked to consider the revision of two acts and the amendment of ten others. Is that the legislative program for this session? Or perhaps I should ask: Is that as far as the government has yet gone in deciding the legislative program for this session? If it is, then once again we shall find that it is not the form of the rules that determines the expedition of the business in the house; it is the way in which the business of the government is presented to this house.

Either the government has more information or they have come unprepared; or, on the other hand, they have information and have denied to us information which properly should have been included in the speech from the throne. It is surely appropriate that, no matter how brief the speech from the throne may be, it is intended to state the general legislative program of the government. It seems to me that, if there is further information, then it carries one stage further the disregard for this house which we have had occasion to mention at different times.

What about the Canada Council, which has been mentioned before in the speech from the throne? We have heard a good deal about that. This government has emphasized its belief in the commission report which presented that recommendation. Has the Canada Council been lost along with the Canada Medal? Certainly there is nothing to tell us what is to be done about this council, which many members have hoped might be able to implement in some measure those broad recommendations of the Massey report, in regard to which I think there is common agreement in this house.

What about a revision of our labour legislation? It will be recalled that we have been asking over and over again that effective steps be taken to review our labour legislation. It will be recalled that at a time when this house was brought together to meet a situation, with which the government dealt in a manner of which we did not approve, we emphasized then the need for a review of our labour legislation. We pointed out then and we have pointed out continually since then that as this country rapidly expands and our industrial development creates increased numbers of workers in this country a basis of harmony and of understanding and of the recognition of the rights in clearly defined terms of those who work in our many activities in Canada is an essential part of that good understanding, of that good fellowship which is a priceless part of the development of this Canadian democracy of ours.

We have had general assurances that this subject was being considered, but now when concern may be felt by many about the situation that could arise it is not too much to ask the government to take steps to carry out the recommendation that was made at that time and call together representatives of labour, of management and of the government, so that the greatly cherished rights of organized labour, the relationship of management to labour and the relationship of the public represented by the government may be explored and interpreted in satisfactory and desirable legislative terms. There is no reference to this in the speech from the throne.

Then again, what about the interesting question of the use of television? It is true reference is made to a commission that has been appointed; but, Mr. Speaker, this country must be almost unique on either side of the iron curtain. We have had television broadcasting for several years in Canada and the Canadian people have yet to see the first political broadcast by any representative of any of the national parties. That same limitation has not been imposed upon provincial parties. In the provincial elections that have taken place the provincial parties have been given the right to use this medium of communication to convey their ideas in the ordinary use of free speech. We alone are denied that privilege. I do not know of any other country with television broadcasting today where political broadcasts are not available to representatives of the political parties.

The right to have those broadcasts has been requested. The right to have such broadcasts has been urged by the party I have the honour to lead and by the other parties on this side of the house. This is no longer something to be left in the hands of any government agency with the bland assurance that the government does not interfere with those agencies. If those agencies are not carrying out the processes of democracy, then it is the duty of the government with the support of parliament to take appropriate steps to assure that they will. The time is overdue for the same privileges that have been extended since the very first days of radio broadcasting to be carried into the field of television broadcasting. That is particularly true when we see that the C.B.C. television news finds so many occasions to report the activities of members of the government. I am not in any way challenging the wisdom of that, and I concede immediately that there are members of the opposition who have had similar opportunities. That, however, is not part of the process of the exchange of political ideas.

My understanding was that the very large sums of money that the parliament of Canada has been called upon to approve for the maintenance of these channels of communication had as their purpose, amongst other things, education. At a time when it is pointed out to us in the speech from the throne that there are other things than arms that count in preserving our democracy, I think we perhaps might suggest that one of the things that will help to preserve democracy is a knowledge of the political processes themselves. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to regard this as a subject of very real importance from the point of view of the continuance of our democratic processes and to take such appropriate steps with the concurrence of parliament as may be necessary to assure that broadcasts of this type will be available.

During the course of this debate, Mr. Speaker, there will be many vigorous criticisms of things that have been done. In recent years there has been a tendency for some sensitiveness to be displayed when criticism is directed to the government with regard to public affairs. In fact, it is carried so far that it is almost regarded as improper to direct vigorous and strong criticism of action which in the opinion of those expressing their opinions may call for the strongest terms of criticism. I am not suggesting for a moment that the members of the government or hon. members of this house are not quite prepared to take their part in the exchange of ideas, but nevertheless I do recall, as many others will, occasions on which some evidence of dissatisfaction was expressed when criticism was directed to the government.

For that reason it seemed to me that there was a very special significance in the words of Her Majesty the Queen when in her Christmas broadcast she spoke of the great traditions of our democracy. Less than three weeks ago, speaking to the whole world over the radio, Queen Elizabeth used these words:

> There are certain spiritual values which inspire all of us. We try to express them in our devotion to freedom, which means respect for the individual and equality before the law. Parliamentary government is also a part of this heritage. We believe in a conception of a government and opposition and the right to criticize and defend. All these things are part of the natural life of our free commonwealth.

When, Mr. Speaker, vigorous criticism may be directed against any action of this government let us remember that we have it on the highest authority that can express it that this in fact is the proper conception of our form of free government. As we direct vigorous criticism against the government—and we shall do so—we do so not merely for the sake of criticism itself but because we have already seen in this house the positive value of criticism. We have seen that criticism, maintained and carried forward with conviction and determination, produces results. May I say at the outset that it is not my intention today to move a detailed amendment. There are too many subjects to discuss for them to be included in one amendment. Moreover, His Honour the Speaker has indicated that if a specific subject is contained in an amendment which is voted down, we cannot later introduce that subject on a motion by way of amendment when we are going into supply nor may we bring it forward in any other manner. We regard the motions on going into supply as extremely important motions and we certainly do not intend to close the door to the introduction of positive motions which will call for an expression of opinion by the members of this house in regard to several of the extremely important issues that are now before us. We hope that hon. members opposite will welcome as much as will our own members the opportunity that will then be available to them to express the opinions that they have been expressing outside this house about some of these subjects.

I make that explanation now because we intend neither to make nor to be involved in detailed amendments which would foreclose the widest measure of debate at a later stage in this session when we are presented with the opportunity that is only then afforded to the opposition to frame its own motion, and to have a decision expressed by the house, in terms that we believe place the matter before the members in a manner clearly expressing the opinion of the members.

This speech from the throne comes before us at a time when we are in the midst of tremendously important events. Yet let us see what we are told about international affairs. This is what we are told in the speech from the throne:

> Since you last met there have been significant international developments. Some of them have been welcome as releasing tensions in certain parts of the world while others unfortunately have had the contrary effect.

There we have a clear, explicit and positive statement that will immediately commend itself to the opinion of hon. members. The speech from the throne continues:

> My ministers remain convinced of the need to maintain the defences of the free nations as a deterrent to war.

Yes; we have expressed that belief. The speech continues:

> A strong North Atlantic Treaty Organization and adequate protection for this continent are in their view fundamental to the preservation of peace and the security of Canada.

Then the speech from the throne or the government's statement, as we might properly call it, says that there are other things than arms that must be considered in maintaining security, and reference is made to the extension of friendship and the part we can play in the extension of that friendship with other nations.

Mr. Speaker, even the most commendable effort at condensation must surely have found difficulty in producing such a meaningless statement in these troubled days. We are living during a period when the history of all mankind is being shaped by events of such compelling importance that the decision of this government, its policies and the attitude we are asked to support must surely be amongst the first considerations to be placed before us. Foreign policy, under our historic tradition, undoubtedly calls for consultation and conditional decisions which must from time to time be made on the spot by the representatives, ministerial and diplomatic, of any government. But in the end the ultimate responsibility, under our system, is with parliament. In view of the fact that we are told so little in the speech from the throne, it would be difficult for us to know to what phase of foreign policy we should direct any remarks if we were to make those remarks in this debate. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister to permit a coherent and related debate on external affairs as a separate debate at an early date on an appropriate motion. If that course is followed, we then can hear from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) a comprehensive review which will bring to us information gathered in an extended and, I hope, fruitful trip. We can also have an opportunity, without separation of the discussion, of discussing some of those statements of policy which have been made not merely in political statements but in fact have appeared in certain magazines and other publications and which perhaps may raise some question in the minds of people in other countries as to whether these are things decided upon by parliament itself.

Now that parliament meets I would hope that we may have a chance of discussing those things here so that not only within our own country but also within the partner nations which are associated with us in that great organization we describe as NATO it may be known what is in fact the expression of the representatives of the people of Canada on some of these subjects. With the shorter period that this debate will take, under the new rules, I hope that facilities may be afforded for such a debate. It need not take long but I am sure it is one that would be welcomed by all hon. members. In such a case it would also make it possible for many of the hon. members of this house to express, in regard to subjects of importance, certain opinions which we would hope might be helpful to the government. No matter how closely related to the speech from the throne —if that is possible—a debate of this kind might be, nevertheless it does not seem to afford the same opportunity to bring into focus the thoughts of the members with regard to these extremely important subjects. I think it would be particularly desired that such a discussion should take place before the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the Secretary of State visit Ottawa in February. I need hardly say that every hon. member in this house welcomes the prospect of seeing Sir Anthony Eden here for the first time in his new capacity. I would hope that it might be helpful to the government at the time of those discussions to have had a review of foreign affairs in this house where new subjects, which have not as yet been brought forward, might perhaps be presented for consideration.

Then, I turn to the first subject that is dealt with by the speech from the throne after the reference to external affairs and the appointment of certain commissions. Anyone not living in Canada who read this speech from the throne at some distant point would be satisfied that today we are living under conditions so perfect that government intervention is hardly necessary in any case. Let us see what we are told.

> Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being. In particular, although sales of wheat in the past five years have been at record levels, an unprecedented series of bumper harvests has made necessary the storage of abnormal stocks of grain both in elevators and on farms. Lack of space in elevators has limited the ability of producers to deliver grain as early as usual in the marketing year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is what we are told about the sectors of the economy which have not fully participated in the general high level of prosperity to which reference is made. There is not a word about potatoes, not a word about apples, and not a word about many other farm products which are of immense concern to the farmers whose daily livelihood depends upon the marketing of those particular farm products. There is not a word, of course, about the problem of marketing butter. The right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) nods his head. There is no worry so far as he is concerned. One might almost think there was no butter.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are many people who seem to be concerned about these things. They have been making representations to the government. The government is well aware of these problems. It would have helped if we had known what the government proposed to do in regard to the representations that have been made and whether we are or are not going to have some legislation before us to deal with these subjects. Why, Mr. Speaker, even with one ear the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) must have heard some rumblings of discontent. No, Mr. Speaker, the government is not unaware of these representations. It would have been helpful if we had known. Of course, there is particular emphasis on that because the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) today made it clear that if we are looking for the government's policy the only place we can look is in the speech from the throne. When he was asked today about the wheat policy, his reply was that the government's policy on wheat is at present on the order paper. Therefore, you have the whole policy; this is the whole story.

This certainly brings us to a discussion of a question which is of concern not merely to the wheat growers of western Canada but to every Canadian. It is of great concern to everyone who realizes the plight of the prairie farmers at this time. This is not just a question of a particularly bountiful crop. We are told that is all that has happened; we have had a bountiful crop. If that were all that had happened, we would not need to be greatly worried. But the truth is that we have been affected by other problems as well. Surely, the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not question that there are other problems when he has found it necessary on a number of occasions to complain about what are described as the give-away policies of the United States government.

Mr. Gardiner: We both agree on all of it.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps the right hon. minister will define the part in regard to which there is some limitation in the difference of opinion between himself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Gardiner: We will do that in due course.

Mr. Drew: Wheat sales are mentioned, and therefore in discussing the speech from the throne it is essential that we consider this whole question of wheat markets. The United States is not diminishing but is intensifying its drive to get rid of its surplus. This was re-emphasized in the clearest and most explicit terms this week by the President of the United States in his statement to congress.

Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has indicated that the government's whole policy is to be found in this limited statement that we have before us. What are we to be asked to do to meet the really serious situation confronting most of the prairie farmers at this time? We are to be asked to authorize the treasury to bear the cost, from August 1, 1955, of storage and interest charges on wheat held by the wheat board, over and above its normal carryover level. Just what does that mean? It is a most ambiguous statement, and I hope it will be clarified at the earliest possible moment. If it means anything worth while to the farmers then it should mean that the abnormal carryover and storage should be paid for by the treasury, according to this paragraph—whether the wheat was delivered to the elevator before or after August 1, 1955. Otherwise, the effect of this will be very limited indeed.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The farmers know what it means; don't you worry about that.

Mr. Drew: No one, Mr. Speaker, will more readily give full credit to the common sense and intelligence of our farmers than I will. But if the farmers of this country are able to understand what this speech from the throne means, then they have a great deal more ability than most members of this house, and certainly than the members of the government who themselves do not understand what it means.

It should be pointed out that we are also being asked to authorize a guarantee in regard to certain farm loans. The guarantee has already been made. The proper course would have been to call this house together and not only to have placed the legislation before the house at that time, but to have offered an opportunity for hon. members to present their arguments to the government before they became committed to an unsatisfactory course, which has not met approval by the farmers. That would have been the wise, the satisfactory and the sensible parliamentary procedure. But no; this government simply regards parliament as a place to get the stamp put on afterwards. They said what they were going to do. They then promised the guarantees and counted on the fact that they would get appropriate support. Well, they will; but Mr. Speaker, I would hope that from within the ranks of the Liberal party would come some suggestion, privately if not publicly—if that is too much to hope for—that the government can go too far in taking for granted subsequent parliamentary support for decisions that should have been made by parliament. On this occasion, after extensive commitments have been made and presented to the public, they are brought to us for approval.

It is not a question whether we approve of this or whether we do not. There was a far better method. There were many things that should have been done.

An hon. Member: What are they?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, one of the hon. members opposite asks: What are they? Well, we at least have the admission of one hon. member that he does not know all the answers to this question.

The government has sought to create the impression that the plight of the prairie farmer is really not so very serious after all. Statistics have been employed which seek to give the impression—and probably it did give the impression in other parts of Canada—that the prairie farmer really is not having too difficult a time. The statistics do not support that statement. The real statistics show a very different situation.

In the past three years there has been a sharp decline in farm income in western Canada which, if it had been repeated in other parts of our economy, would have spelled disaster for the whole of this country. Let us see what the figures are. In 1951 the farm income in western Canada, that is in the prairie provinces, was $1,127 million; in 1952, it was $1,082 million; in 1953, it was $884 million; in 1954, it was $376 million.

It would appear, Mr. Speaker, from the figures now available, that the returns for the current year will be even less. Of course, it is true we do not need to be reminded that the year 1951 was the peak revenue year. It would not be any answer to any industrial worker, if he told you that he had seen a drop in his income to one-third of what it was in 1951, to tell him that that was not really serious because 1951 had been an all-time peak up to that time. The fact is that in this human sphere people do gear their lives to the level of income, with some adjustment to that situation if they are wise and cautious; but surely it is not to be expected that within that length of time revenue would drop as it has in this case.

These figures tell why there should be cash advances to the prairie farmers for field-stored grain, and without further delay. The government never really intended that this system of farm loans should have any broad application to the problem. I think that was made perfectly clear on November 28 by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in a speech he made in Calgary. These were his words:

> It is my hope and belief that comparatively limited use will be made of the lending facilities, that most farmers are either in a position to carry on without borrowing, or are in a position to finance in the ordinary way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that statement is not borne out by discussions with any representative groups of prairie farmers at this time. The system that has been adopted is open to many objections. These objections were pointed out right away. The banks are not in a position to carry out any system of cash payments. There was a perfectly simple method, and that was to make cash payments as advances on the quota book in the ordinary way in relation to a stated quota of the grain grown last year, and then to have the grain made deliverable upon demand as soon as space became available in the elevators. No real difficulty presents itself in connection with that. The elevators are strategically situated to absorb the grain; the elevators have the staff to do the job. The elevators could have handled it satisfactorily under a system that would have been simple and that would have involved no serious difficulties of any kind. But in this case the minister responsible for the marketing of the grain says he believes that most farmers are in a position to finance in the ordinary way. Well, that is one reason why it is so necessary to discuss this subject. Surely that statement is adding insult to injury.

When times were good the government, with smug self-satisfaction, announced the cheques it was going to pay out. It did it with a flourish. When it was going to be a really big one, it did it as close to an election as possible. It did it with the proud boast also that this was because of its almost divine omniscience. Now, when things are tough, it washes its hands of the problem and turns it over to the banks. In turning it over to the banks it does not show the same consideration that it proposes to show to those who are interested in certain other types of activity in this country.

Another provision that we are going to be called upon to make calls for interest, I believe, of 3½ per cent; but in this case the farmers must pay 5 per cent for the loans that are necessary and are guaranteed, remember, by this government. Surely, that is piling it on the farmer fairly hard. Even if there are any substantial advantages in these proposals that are made, it is just a case of giving with one hand and taking away with the other. The government cannot and must not evade its responsibilities in this situation. I hope that among hon. members of this house on both sides there will be freely expressed views which will indicate the belief that this is not merely of concern to the prairie farmer but is a matter which the members of this house, from coast to coast, recognize as a national problem.

Wheat marketing alone is not what is causing difficulty for the farmers. Deliveries of oats, barley and rye have been cut most severely by quotas, the reductions from last year's figures being 66 per cent of oats, 36 per cent of barley and 77 per cent of rye. Of our total deliverable grain about 15 per cent had been delivered by the end of November as compared with 32 per cent a year ago. Along with the figures I have given already this indicates something of the nature of the broad problem, the difficult and serious problem with which the prairie farmer is confronted at this time.

The problem is not only in regard to grain and wheat alone; nor is it only in regard to the failure of the government to market our products. One of the problems, a problem directly related to the subject under consideration, is the very large quantity of unused elevator space in western Canada at this time. The elevators are not full. That situation is related directly to any provision which is made and which assumes that they are. The figures are clear at this time that there is well over 100 million bushels of storage space empty in the elevators in western Canada, that more than 100 million bushels of elevator space could absorb very substantial quantities of the farm-stored grain, as good grain as we have grown in a great many years.

When there is storage space available for well over 100 million bushels, why is that space not being used? The government has the machinery. If that machinery is inadequate, let them present to this house whatever appropriate legislation is required and I feel sure that they will receive the support of hon. members of this house in regard to that situation.

I heard the question asked: what could be done? I have made certain proposals and I repeat them now. One: Provision should be made for immediate cash advances in the ordinary way on the quota book by the wheat board for farm-stored grain on a quota basis, making an initial payment thereon as if the wheat had been delivered to the elevator. The wheat would then be delivered on demand by the farmer as elevator space became available.

Two: Low-grade wheat now occupying elevator storage space while high-grade wheat cannot be stored should be sold for feed grain in Ontario, Quebec and abroad. This would provide elevator space for a good part of last year's high quality crop.

Three: The government should recruit top-flight salesmen from Canadian business concerns who would plan an aggressive selling policy for Canadian wheat and give advice as to long-term selling policies.

Four: The government should refer the whole problem of the handling and sale of Canadian wheat and its relationship to the Canadian economy as a whole to the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects and ask for an early interim report as well as a more complete report later on.

Five: The government should take immediate steps to assure the full use of all elevator space.

This is not by any manner of means the first time that we have made proposals that cash should be advanced for farm-stored grain. On December 17, 1952 I had the following to say on behalf of our party:

> In view of the fact that farm storage of grain is not normal in Canada under ordinary circumstances when line elevator storage is available, it does not appear desirable that legislation should be designed to encourage farm storage when satisfactory elevator storage is a practical possibility. On the other hand it now seems necessary, and urgently necessary, that something be done to make cash available to the farmers for farm-stored grain, if they are to meet their current debts and make the necessary arrangements for the next year's crop. That is the principle at issue.

That is what I had to say on the subject over three years ago. Then let me quote what is reported on page 27 of Hansard of November 24, 1952, where I had this to say:

> The whole system of handling and distribution has broken down. The government, no matter what its explanation may be, has failed to take effective steps to provide for the handling of grain, in spite of the knowledge many months ago, and the warnings many months ago, that this situation was going to arise. In western Canada today there are many farmers, with huge quantities of wheat and other grains worth considerable sums of money, who are unable to get money at this time to cover their harvesting and living expenses because of their inability to deliver that grain to market.
> This is a situation with which the government should deal immediately. It is urgent and calls for attention without delay.

The situation did ease off to some extent, but the basic factors were there more than three years ago when we urged immediate action to prepare to deal with this subject. But the government brushed those suggestions aside, as suggestions are being brushed aside now. I hope that hon. members on both sides of the house who come from western Canada and who are living in the middle of this situation will clearly interpret the situation to the house and to the members of the government who have not yet acted as though they recognized what the problem really was.

The situation today is urgent and it calls for attention without delay. The urgency is that much greater because of the failure of the government to act over the long period during which these requests for action have been made.

There is another aspect of the problem which should not be disregarded and I am making this statement now in the hope that we may achieve results. I am making the statement now in the hope that whether they do so publicly or privately—I would prefer publicly—hon. members opposite will indicate to the government how strongly they feel on this subject. Perhaps then we might find some bending on the part of the government. Perhaps even the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would bow to the indicated views of hon. members as he did on an earlier occasion.

There is no hint in the speech from the throne as to what is going to be done in the future. It is not the present, it is what is going to be done in the future. We have the words of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, "If you want to find out our wheat policy look at the speech from the throne."

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I did not say that.

Mr. Drew: The order paper.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Why not say "the order paper" and then we will be together?

Mr. Drew: I am assuming everyone is correctly interpreting what those words mean. The fact is that the only thing on the order paper that refers to this subject is the very speech to which reference has been made. Since we have that statement, this is the time not only to ask for action in regard to what has been grown but to point out the urgent need for a statement of policy by the government as to what is going to happen during the current year.

How can the farmers of western Canada plan for this year unless some statement is made? Not only is it necessary from the point of view of the future of the whole Canadian economy; it is vitally necessary for the farmers themselves so that they will not become further involved if nothing is going to be done. Anything less than a clear statement of policy covering the whole of the current year at this time is going to create frustration, confusion, hardship and even, conceivably, disaster.

The proposals now made by the government fall far short of meeting the situation. In fact, they suggest that the government intends to rely on the hope of a crop failure. What else is there, if this represents their whole policy? That is a grim prospect for our prairie farmers. The government seems to hope that a national emergency will be solved by a domestic disaster.

I am not suggesting that this is a simple problem. On the contrary, it has become an extremely difficult problem because of the failure of the government to adopt any positive and coherent policy. It has become more difficult still because of the fact that we live side by side with a great and friendly neighbour which finds it necessary in its own interests to follow a course that makes things still more difficult for us. But the facts are well known. What is needed is that the government grapple with these facts and come forward with some definite statement on what it intends to do.

Whether it agrees or does not agree with what the United States is doing, it knows what the United States is going to do. It would be desirable that we have a similarly clear statement. At least let us hope that the two ministers mainly concerned will reconcile their differences of opinion so that the government in this case may speak with one voice.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce may be the one who interprets the views of the government; the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) may be the one; but at least let us know which voice is the voice of the whole government in this case. Here is a glaring inconsistency in more than mere words. The Minister of Agriculture undoubtedly believes in something of this kind and he has acted on those beliefs. He has made arrangements for the sale of butter to communist governments at a loss of at least 25 cents a pound to the Canadian taxpayer. In doing that, he is doing the very thing the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been criticizing when it was done by the United States. As a result, the very friendly government of New Zealand has criticized this government for what it has done.

Mr. Gardiner: No one in this government has ever criticized the United States for selling butter.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Agriculture wants to slide on butter alone. We were talking about policies in regard to handling farm products, and there is no difference between the way he is handling the sale of butter and some of the arrangements the United States government is making, which have been the subject of criticism by this government. When it comes to the question of farm products, there is no essential difference in principle between any of these products.

As far as this is concerned, we have another difficulty confronting us. At the time when the Minister of Agriculture tells us that we have no real surplus as soon as we dispose of 10 or 12 million pounds, we are told by the National Dairy Council of Canada, an organization which should know something about the facts, that there is a very large surplus. These are their own words:

> With milk production running at an all-time high, it is estimated that the butter surplus exceeds domestic needs by some 65 million pounds.

Now, who is telling us the facts?

Mr. Gardiner: Who is the dairy council?

Mr. Drew: I hope the Minister of Agriculture will repeat that question to the national dairy council.

Mr. Gardiner: I have repeated it many times.

Mr. Drew: I hope he will, because one thing is certain, that in these conflicting statements somewhere or other a policy is emerging, whether it is there or here: "the truth if necessary, but not necessarily the truth." Which is the correct statement? Where are the facts? Surely inconsistencies can go too far. Surely there must be some limit. Of course, in the meantime the communist government of East Germany must remember words that were spoken long ago: "guns or butter". The East German government is in a better position; it has guns and butter. It gets the guns from Russia and the butter from us.

These are things in regard to which we should have clear and explicit statements and there should be a resolution of its own position by the government so that we may know what the facts are. One clear fact is that this government is drifting, is not dealing with problems, and is so self-satisfied under the impression that its large parliamentary majority, unrepresentative of the actual voting strength which supported it is a permanent thing on which it can count forever. It does not seem to be very much bothered with parliament or with the demands of those who are waiting upon it.

Granted that detailed policies may be difficult to state, surely we have a right to expect that, in regard to all these products, the policies will at least be understandable, whether it be with regard to wheat, coarse grains, butter, cheese, apples, potatoes or any other farm product, so that our farmers may not merely know what is going to happen in regard to what they have already produced but may know what plans they should make during this spring for the coming crop season.

There are, of course, difficulties in the way of meeting these demands, but before the end of the debate on the speech from the throne we might hope that the whole issue will be clarified.

The next subject of importance in the speech from the throne is the construction of the gas pipe line across northern Ontario. We are informed that legislation will be placed before us. Because of the time limit in the contract itself, it is to be hoped that that legislation will come before us very quickly after the termination of this debate. That will be the time when we shall know what the legislation is. That being so, I believe that the best time to debate this subject will be when we see the legislation and can relate our arguments to the legislative proposal which is actually before us. However, in the meantime I do wish to place before the Prime Minister a proposal which I hope he will approve and which I think would meet with the approval of members generally. It will be recalled that we made repeated and persistent efforts during the last session to find out what plans were under consideration. We found that impossible. Now we are told some details. We do not know yet what form the legislation will take, what features may be included in that legislation.

There is one very satisfactory way in which all hon. members could be adequately informed with regard to this vitally important subject. I ask the Prime Minister to appoint a select committee of the house representative of all parties which would begin immediately to inquire into the whole question. That committee should be given the power to call witnesses and to call for the production of documents. In that way the relevant evidence in regard to this vitally important subject could be made available in a very short time. We would then be in a position to deal with this tremendously important question with a knowledge that will not be in our possession if any other course is followed. I make this request in all earnestness hoping that the advisability of a committee of that kind under the circumstances will commend itself to the Prime Minister on this occasion.

I wish to deal now, Mr. Speaker, with a subject that is causing great concern throughout Canada and very naturally so because it relates to the whole question of the human structure of our country. There is no mention whatever in the speech from the throne of the extremely important subject of immigration. Certainly the figures of immigration in the last year were startling enough to call for some comment by the government and some indication of the course it proposes to follow. The figures of the last few years tell their story. The number of immigrants arriving annually was as follows:

1951	194,391

In contrast with that the total number arriving in the first nine months of 1955 was only 86,607. True, the government announced in the middle of December that there would be some assistance to immigrants under special conditions. Another announcement which we certainly welcome is the setting up of an appeal board which we hope will have some opportunity to deal with some of the unexplainable decisions of the officials of the department handling this very important question.

But the uncertainty of our immigration policy is part of the government uncertainty in a larger field. It relates to the whole question of development, of expected population, of the manner in which this country is going to grow. There are undoubtedly some people in Canada living in areas where growth is rapid who are unaware of the fact that there are many parts of Canada where growth has been stagnant for many years. A broad policy of development is something that we have urged in the house time and time again. We need co-operation in the development of our great power resources between the federal and provincial governments. Perhaps one hopeful thing about the announcement made in connection with the pipe line is that the federal government has now enunciated a policy which will surely prevent them at any future time from giving the answers they have to the government of New Brunswick in connection with the Beechwood power project, to the government of Saskatchewan in connection with the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project, or in connection with some of the other projects in respect of which the provinces have sought the co-operation of the federal government. If the government is ready to join in this particular case it is difficult to see how it can withhold similar co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments in other cases where development might seem wise and advisable.

We have been urging the adoption of a development program for many years. At the same time we have urged the development of power and irrigation resources. Today we stand on the threshold of opportunities not dreamed of in the past. With the scientific devices made available under pressure of war and in the years since the war we now have made available to us in this country by discoveries within the past few years mineral and other resources beyond the dream of avarice. Today we can say without any reservation that if we employ the resources that God has placed at our disposal to the best advantage of our own people there are no people in the whole world today, no people anywhere, with greater opportunities for the future than we have here in our own country.

Decisions, however, still must be made. Reference has been made to our rapidly increasing exports. Yes, but much of that is in the form of raw materials which could be processed here. I hope no one will suggest that I have said that all our raw materials should be processed here. Everything of that kind is subject to the reasonable application of common-sense rules and legitimate self-interest. I do believe it is in the legitimate self-interest of the people of Canada that we should process our own raw materials here in Canada for the employment of Canadians to the greatest degree that is practical and possible.

To do that we need power. Plan the power as we encourage the development. Do not suggest there are no ways in which that encouragement can be given. One of them has been stated on different occasions, namely, to encourage our own industries in this country by proper tax provisions. At the moment there are many industrial and other developments in Canada that are at a disadvantage in relation to companies from the United States who are coming in here and doing business in competition with them. Certainly the least our people can expect is that they shall at least be dealt with equally in relation to competitors from outside our own country.

There are other devices. The first thing is to declare a policy. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the policy that produced our tremendous development in the forest industry business in this country is a policy that can be applied to our raw materials generally, and that it is then the duty of the government to take appropriate steps consistent with our democratic beliefs and our belief in free enterprise to make that development the best that it can be for the future of Canada.

There is a direct relationship between plans of that kind and immigration. That brings me to another committee. Several years ago the government set up a committee on manpower. It has not been heard of for a long time. It was a good committee. I suggest that along with plans for development and immigration this committee should be revived and that it should examine the whole question of the need of manpower for different fields of development. It can be estimated with reasonable relationship knowing that power produces industrial development, industrial development produces work and in turn industrial work produces payrolls which provide markets for the farmers so that we increase our own domestic markets by that very process. It is all one integrated problem. Let us have a revival of that committee. Let us have real plans for immigration, real plans for development and an examination of what those plans will produce in the way of new population requirements.

Mr. Speaker, we have been told that security does not depend upon arms alone. Certainly we all agree with that statement. One of the things to which it applies, I think, is the efficiency of government. Over and over again we have urged that the government take the appropriate steps to examine our organization of government just as any big business would examine its own organization from time to time if it expected to remain solvent. The answer has been that this action would be an infringement upon the supremacy of parliament. That contention, of course, is disposed of completely by the way in which this government has been appointing commissions. It has appointed a commission to inquire into the economy of Canada. It is a very good commission and we shall look for fine things from it. But if that commission can be appointed, surely there can be no reason why a commission should not now be appointed to inquire into the organization of government.

There has not been a single report of any inquiry which has not shown some place where there could be an improvement. I therefore repeat my request to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—and it is a request that I have made on many other occasions—that, consistent with the statement in the speech from the throne that there are other things than arms that are involved in the preservation of our security, this basic step will be taken to strengthen the efficiency of government and that he will announce that we may have a royal commission to inquire into the business organization of government and to advise on how this whole system which handles our public affairs can best be administered.

There are many reasons why this matter assumes compelling importance. Let me take one example. It has hardly been realized how fast the government's purchases of goods and services have been increasing in the past few years. When that sort of thing happens the need for examination appears in any business operation. Since 1947 the government's expenditure on goods and services has more than doubled. This fact is an indication of why we need an examination of this kind. Then let us take a look at the total taxation of all governments in Canada. In 1954 it had increased in proportion much more than had the national income. With all the burdens and sacrifices of war, in the peak year of 1944 the amount of our national income taken by all governments was 29 per cent. In 1954 it was 30 per cent. Surely that is a warning. We have often been told in the past that once total taxation collected was over 25 per cent of the national income, we had a real danger mark. The figure of 30 per cent has already been reached. This is the time for governments to examine in every way they can the possibility of economies of one kind and another.

Mr. Speaker, in this house last year we had a debate which showed that discussion and exchange of ideas can produce definite results. I am not in any doubt that the satisfactory outcome of that debate represented the efforts not only of the members on this side of the house, of the press and of the people of Canada generally but of many Liberal members opposite who expressed their opinions privately to the government on that occasion. I would hope that on this occasion similar requests will be made. I repeat that I would hope they would be made publicly. But whether they are made publicly or privately, I hope they will be made. I am sure that there are many hon. members opposite who support some of the ideas which I have placed before them. Certainly I am convinced that the representatives of rural constituencies in western Canada are not fully satisfied with what the government is doing on this occasion.

Let us hope for another example of democracy in action. I do not for a moment suggest that I expect the Liberal members of this house to vote for the short amendment that I shall present. However, I hope that in the process of democracy they will just the same present their arguments to produce results that would give a great deal of satisfaction to many members of this house and to many people throughout the whole of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), that the following be added to the address:

> We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national problems and their disregard of the rights of parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), I too at the outset should like to extend my warm congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am sure that both hon. members were somewhat conscious of a special responsibility when they spoke yesterday. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) was making history in being the first woman in this house to move the address and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) was making his first speech in parliament. I am confident that all hon. members will agree that, notwithstanding those circumstances, both hon. members discharged their duty in a manner which gives assurance of further able and conscientious contributions to the conduct to the work of parliament.

Before her election to parliament in 1953 the hon. member for Timiskaming had acquired considerable experience in public life which began in 1939 on her election as a public school trustee. That success led, three years later, to a seat in the council of the township of Teck. During two years as a councillor the hon. member served the electorate so much to their satisfaction that they made her reeve and kept her in that office for nine years. It was not really surprising that her municipal services and her energetic work with the children's aid society, the hospital board, and many other organizations should have led the electors of Timiskaming in 1953 to consider that she would be a worthy representative of their interests in the House of Commons.

Since coming to Ottawa there has been no diminution in the public-spirited endeavours for which the hon. member had become so noted. She has worked diligently on behalf of her constituency, showing, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, a special interest in the gold mining community of northern Ontario, of which Timiskaming is such an important part. She has applied intelligently and diligently in the house and in the committees the experience she gained in the municipal and social welfare fields.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) has made an auspicious debut in this house. He has demonstrated the concern which a young lawyer, born into a family of farmers, feels for the welfare of his constituents most of whom belong to the agricultural class.

In spite of his youth, the new member, who has been practising his profession for a little over three years, has taken an interest in public matters for a great many years. The fact that he now sits among us means that the people of Bellechasse have judged that his talents and training were such as to ensure that he would make a fine member of parliament. I do feel confident that the electors of Bellechasse who had been enjoying the competence and devotion of his predecessor for the past 15 years, will know, from reading their new member's speech, that they have chosen a worthy member to look after their interests.

(Text):

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition told us that there was going to be vigorous criticism directed against the government during this session. I can assure him that we will be prepared to meet that criticism and that we will hope to continue to find it is intended to be constructive criticism and not merely made for the purpose suggested in one of the newspapers I read yesterday, that there should be a lot of iron in the debates of this house as well as searching and vigorous inquiry. We are prepared to have as vigorous and searching inquiry as possible directed against any of our activities, because we feel that the more these things are known and publicized the better they will redound to our own credit.

The Leader of the Opposition said that there was not very much new in the speech from the throne, that most of the matters that were dealt with there had become known earlier. I believe we have all been in Ottawa long enough to realize that anything that gets serious consideration anywhere does not remain new very long. The ladies and gentlemen who occupy the press gallery have ways known to them of obtaining information which they do not hesitate to communicate to the readers of their newspapers as soon as they can get the slightest inkling about what is apt to happen. I do not consider it a very serious reproach to have been unable to have in the speech from the throne any "scoops" that had not been already scooped up by these representatives of the fourth estate.

The hon. gentleman made one exception, and that was in respect of the announcement on behalf of the government of the introduction of a bill requiring that equal pay be accorded to women in all industries under federal control if the work were equal to that for which the men were receiving a given pay. He suggested that this had been a subject of discussion in the house for the last three years, and that is quite true. But these matters all progress, and I think that the recognition that is continuously being given to the place women now occupy in the professional, and even industrial life of our community, has been reasonably rapid and rather satisfactory. Now, this is a matter upon which opinions have gradually come to take a shape to which we were able to give expression in the speech from the throne. I would expect my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) would not have very much difficulty with the principle of his bill when it comes before the house for consideration.

The hon. gentleman has said that the speech is very uninformative about the legislation that is being planned by the government. I can assure the hon. gentleman we have included in that speech all the matters that have been decided upon for presentation to parliament at this time. Of course, we cannot give any assurance that there will not be developments in the course of the session that will require other legislation. I feel it is not realistic to say that we are merely proposing the revision of two acts and the amendment of ten other acts. There is a long list of important legislation described in the speech from the throne before one comes to those two paragraphs which group together the acts to be revised and the acts to be amended.

The hon. gentleman has specifically referred to some of them. One of the most important is, as is always the case in every session of parliament, the provision of the services required to carry on the business of the country and a careful examination of the manner in which the moneys that have been appropriated are disposed of in the fulfilment of the obligations that Canadians put on their elected representatives in this House of Commons.

The hon. gentleman does not find it very illuminating to say there have been some developments in the international field that lessened the tensions in some parts of the world, and that they were warmly welcomed, but that there have been others that have had a contrary effect and which still make it necessary for this nation to do its part with its associates in further extending and maintaining the strength of the free nations as a deterrent to war.

I am not going to dwell upon the almost unimaginable situation that war would now create with those tremendously destructive engines of war that we now know are available and capable of producing perhaps irreparable chaos if used in warfare on this terrestrial globe. I do not think they will be used. I have confidence in the future, and I do not believe that humanity could be so insensible as to resort to the use of those terrible engines of warfare. Nevertheless we have to continue to do our part to maintain that balance which creates a situation where no one could expect that by aggression he would initiate something that would not be as disastrous for himself as for those against whom it was directed.

This means that a very substantial portion of the appropriations made by parliament for the whole of the public services of the Canadian people still has to be devoted to the building up and maintenance of that armed strength. That does put limits upon the part of the income that can be taken by taxation from the Canadian people and that can be devoted to other much more agreeable objectives than to the maintenance of armaments.

The hon. gentleman has noted that there is no reference to the Canada Council in the speech from the throne. The matter was again given careful consideration when the speech from the throne was being prepared, and we came to the conclusion that this was not the opportune time to bring that legislation before parliament. Unless the situation changes somewhat materially between now and the end of the session I do not expect to bring that kind of measure before parliament at this session.

The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that there is not, in his view, wide enough use being made of television in this country to enlighten the Canadian public upon matters of public policy. Well, personally I am older than the Leader of the Opposition. I am probably more old-fashioned than is the Leader of the Opposition, but I must confess that I have never been too favourably impressed by some of the so-called political television broadcasts that have come from countries where it is used to a very considerable degree. I think it has a place, as have all of these modern inventions, in the dissemination of information; but one of the matters that has to be constantly considered is whether or not it is being used in a manner that is really conducive to a proper and dignified conduct of partisan propaganda.

I think the televising of the opening of parliament has been done without any impairment of the solemnity and dignity of the ceremony, and that it is something that is of interest, and should be of interest, to a very large number of Canadian people who would not have the opportunity of getting the same impression from newspaper reports as they can get from seeing it televised. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is not going to be any obstacle to the use of television for any legitimate purposes. There may be some question as to how much time provided at public expense should be made available to political parties for those purposes. That is something that will have to be balanced against what its real, educational and informative value can be to the Canadian public.

The matter with which the hon. gentleman dealt at considerable length was the wheat situation as it now exists in this country. The hon. gentleman knows it is part of a situation which is pretty widespread throughout the world. For the last several years there has been more wheat produced and available for export from the four large exporting countries than the importing countries will absorb, and there have been methods adopted in countries which are or were importing countries to foster and promote, at even greater cost, the production of wheat on their own lands. That is a situation that has to be faced as a fact.

The hon. gentleman has said that there is available space in the elevators for 100 million bushels. There is some space available in the elevators at the lakehead; there is some space available in the elevators on the Pacific coast, because there has been serious difficulty in getting box cars to move the grain from point to point. I asked my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) about the hon. gentleman's estimate of the available capacity. His opinion is that it is not half the figure mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition. But even if it is not, that is too much, and there has been pressure put upon the railways to make available all the facilities possible for moving grain into the elevators and moving it from the elevators to the shipping points, and there will continue to be those continuous efforts.

There are some people who believe, as does the hon. gentleman, that it would have been proper for the wheat board to make cash advances against grain on the farm. That proposal was considered and the conclusion we arrived at was that it would not be practicable to ask the wheat board, which had not been created for that purpose, to undertake that additional duty.

The hon. gentleman referred to the proposal for storage charges on the excess over the normal carryover. A resolution dealing with this matter has been placed on the order paper and the matter will be gone into quite fully when the bill is before the house. He has perhaps noticed that it is to be the carrying costs of the reserves owned by the Canadian wheat board in respect of board stocks of wheat in excess of 178 million bushels at the commencement of a crop year. That is the time when the calculation will be made as to the quantity to which the recommendation for payment out of treasury funds would apply.

The hon. gentleman spoke of the advisability of recruiting a staff of top-flight salesmen to promote the disposal of the Canadian crop. There are top-flight salesmen connected with the wheat board, and they have been visiting all the traditional wheat importing countries. It is well known that, with the exception of the United Kingdom, importations are not made by the trade but are made under and through government agencies. In all the countries where there was any possibility of finding markets for Canadian wheat there are trade commissioners who have been playing a very active role.

I am told that since the end of November the sales that have been made are greatly in excess of those made in the previous year. That does not apply to deliveries made within that period, because deliveries have been conditioned upon the transportation facilities, which have been used to the extent of their availability.

The hon. gentleman spoke about the development of power and the use of natural resources. Of course all power resources as well as raw materials that can be taken from soil which is still public property are the property of the provinces. The question as to whether or not there should be joint undertakings by the federal government and the provincial governments for the development of resources within the provinces is a matter which also is conditioned upon the availability of funds that can be devoted to such purposes.

The past year was an active one in the development of our relations with the provincial governments. We had several major conferences with the leaders of the provincial governments, and have made considerable progress in developing new patterns of co-operation. Hon. members will be familiar with the preliminary conference which we held in April last to consider the scope and the agenda for our main conference in October. At this preliminary conference the federal government placed before the provincial representatives certain suggestions for action in providing assistance to unemployed persons in need. It was agreed that we should have a special conference on that during the summer. Following detailed discussions between the officials on the facts and figures, we had that special conference on unemployment assistance in June, and I reported to the house immediately on the results of this meeting.

In October we had another full conference on the subjects decided upon at the April meeting. It consisted of an opening plenary session at which the head of each government made a prepared statement, followed by a series of committee meetings in camera at which detailed discussion took place upon the various subjects. A statement was then issued at the end of the meetings describing what had been done in committee.

The conference established a committee of ministers to consider in more detail the subject of health insurance, to which preliminary consideration had been given by the conference itself. This committee met during that week and determined the general nature of the approach it would make to the subject. It will be meeting again later this month under the chairmanship of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

The conference decided also to establish a continuing committee of federal and provincial officials which is to meet from time to time to exchange information and examine technical problems in the field of federal-provincial fiscal and economic relations. The deputy minister of finance was designated to represent the federal government on this committee, and the provincial premiers have all designated senior officials of their services to be their members. The committee will not take collective action, but each of its members will report to his own government on the subjects discussed.

It was agreed also at the conference that a meeting of the ministers concerned with highway matters would be held to consider the steps which should be taken to continue the work of the trans-Canada highway. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) convened this meeting in November, and the government will be introducing legislation to accelerate the completion of essential links in this highway and to continue general work on it elsewhere up to the agreed standards.

In addition to these conferences we have had several discussions between individual federal and provincial ministers from time to time, and between officials of our various governments. There has also been some correspondence on the matters which have been discussed at our meetings. These have all contributed to the working out of the matters that were of such concern to us all.

Before speaking of these individual matters I should like to indicate my colleagues' and my own appreciation for the friendly and co-operative spirit in which the provincial governments participated in all these discussions this year. Naturally there have been differences of opinion, and indeed differences of philosophy and approach to the various problems, but such differences are only to be expected. What is important is that there was evidently a genuine desire to make our complicated federal system of government work as effectively as possible and to respect the responsibilities of the other governments in our confederation for carrying on with their part of our various Canadian problems.

I think much was gained in understanding both between the federal and provincial governments and among the various provincial governments themselves, in addition to what we gained in the progress made on the substance of our discussions. My colleagues and I fully recognize the magnitude and the importance of the problems which the growth and development of this country have created for the provincial governments, and we bear this in mind in making our recommendations about our relations with those governments. On the other hand I believe that they now have a better appreciation of the magnitude of the social security obligations which the federal government has undertaken, as well as an appreciation of the continuing burdens of defence.

There were four main subjects of discussion with the provinces over this period. The question of fiscal relations is, of course, the key problem upon the solution of which depends the approaches that may be made to many of the others. There were also the problems of unemployment insurance, health insurance, public investment and natural resource development.

Speaking on behalf of the federal government I outlined a number of the programs it has followed in the field of public investment since the end of the war. They were tempered, of course, by the overriding needs of defence, by the need for restraint because of the dangers of inflation, and by our desire to postpone what could reasonably be postponed so that it would not compete with the high level of private investment.

I also outlined many of the programs we have undertaken, jointly or in co-operation with the provinces, in various fields, and I shall not endeavour to recapitulate them here, as they may be found in outline in the printed proceedings of the conferences held in October and in April last. However, I think I should report to parliament what I said about our approach to the problems.

I said we felt that parliament should not provide for sharing in the cost of provincial projects except in special circumstances and as a part of a policy which we could justify on national grounds. In general, we did not see any need to share in the normal costs of growth of provinces and municipalities. The financing of this growth presented problems, but they did not seem to us to require a federal solution.

In the vitally important field of fiscal arrangements, we have developed during the past year a new approach. We think this approach can become the basis of durable arrangements appropriate to a period of peacetime growth, as distinct from the war-time period and the immediate post-war period in which our present agreements were developed.

Our central fiscal problem in this period of great development arises fundamentally from the fact that the public now expects both levels of government to do things which require substantial expenditures. As I told the provincial representatives in October:

> The people expect and demand—and are willing in the last analysis to pay for—some basic minimum of public services in all parts of Canada. With this added to the cost of war, both levels of government have been forced into more and more intensive occupation of the various fields of taxation. We have both had to use the field of direct taxation, which the fathers of confederation thought would be so unpopular that we could both be trusted in it with little risk of friction. We have also occupied jointly what used to be considered parts of the field of indirect taxes, which the provinces have learned to cultivate with some legal and administrative ingenuity. We have not protested this, and indeed indicated in 1950 our willingness to concur in a constitutional amendment that would regularize—if it needs regularization—and facilitate provincial sales taxes that do not offend against the sensible purpose which the fathers of confederation had in mind.

I went on to say:

Our present problem is twofold; to achieve some method of sharing the revenue available from the direct tax field, and some reasonable degree of equity and stability in the revenue of the various provinces. The latter involves some recognition of the fiscal need of those provinces whose tax potential is less than others, some payment of subsidies in one form or another. There is nothing repugnant to the spirit or the letter of our constitution in this; the original British North America Act provided what were then substantial subsidies and recognized fiscal need. Throughout our history the forces of economics and geography have been tempered by some measure of national consciousness and solidarity. But this process requires judgment and discretion and due regard to the interest of the nation as a whole.

We discussed the tax rental agreements and, for our part, asserted that they had accomplished most of their objectives with a considerable measure of success. By means of them we have achieved a good deal of elimination of duplication of direct taxes and simplification of our tax laws. There is no doubt that the agreements have provided more stability to provincial budgets than they otherwise would have had. They have given an assurance of growth in revenues in proportion to populations and the gross national product. While the need to use these direct taxes as a means of stabilizing employment levels has been less than was thought might be the case, we have had to use them to temper inflation and to meet the urgent needs for funds required for the emergency of Korea and for the NATO defence programs.

I mention these things because they are a part of the legislative program that will have to be considered by this house, and because I tabled in the house yesterday the proposal that has been submitted to the provincial governments.

The payments under the tax rental agreements have included fairly large elements of subsidy to provinces whose tax capacity was not high, and these have enabled such provinces to establish and maintain standards of public services more nearly approaching those of the wealthier provinces than would otherwise have been possible.

Of course it is an understatement to say that the agreements have not found enthusiastic support everywhere, even among all those who signed them. One provincial government felt that they were inconsistent in principle with the spirit of our constitution, and was therefore unwilling to share in whatever benefits they might provide. The premier of another of the largest provinces, in signing the agreement, stated that it was at best a stopgap and should be replaced by a more satisfactory distribution of revenue sources. Others thought there should be a more explicit recognition of fiscal need.

As has been stated many times in this house, the government has never contended that these agreements were a final or perfect answer to the problems in our fiscal relationships. We have been prepared to see them modified, improved, or superseded by something better, if it could be found. We think we have found a means of modifying and supplementing the agreements in such a manner as to enable them to accomplish our essential objectives more effectively and avoid some of the dangers and difficulties that were inherent in the plan underlying the existing agreements, supplemented as they are by the abatements provided in our tax laws for taxes in provinces without agreements. It was the essential principles of this new plan which we discussed with the provinces last fall and which are embodied in the proposal made to them at the end of last week in letters, copies of which I tabled in the house yesterday.

We feel that the time has now come when the equalization aspect that was sought in our tax rental agreements can be secured separately and clearly. I am taking some little time to explain the probable effect of this new plan. It provides for an equalization of revenues derived from the three direct tax fields that were involved in the tax rental agreements.

The first fact we have to recognize is that the various provincial governments have at their disposal very different degrees and types of tax potentials. The second fact is that while the costs of providing required provincial services are not the same in every province, these costs do not vary as greatly as the tax potentials. The third fact is that the development of large-scale enterprises operating on a nation-wide basis has meant that the distribution of the higher income brackets and the larger volumes of corporate profits is not even as between provinces but shows a heavy concentration in those provinces containing our large metropolitan centres. This has meant that large amounts of income and profits which are in a sense partly earned in several provinces throughout the country can be effectively taxed only in one province.

Most federal countries are faced with this problem, and a number of systems have been devised to meet it. In examining the question of fiscal need it has seemed to us that a system applying a kind of provincial means test such as is used in some federal countries would not be acceptable or workable in a country with our history and traditions. We want something more objective than a provincial means test.

After examining many possible plans we came to the conclusion that the most generally acceptable means of bridging this gap in Canada between the costs of essential provincial services and the wide variations in the tax potentials available to the provincial governments would be to develop a pattern of tax equalization payments from the federal to the provincial governments.

What we have proposed is a series of unconditional annual payments to the provincial governments which would supplement the yield of certain standard rates of tax applied to the incomes, profits and inheritances or successions in a province so as to bring this yield up to the yield of such rates in the wealthier provinces.

This matter was discussed and illustrated at our October meeting. We received representations following that meeting and gave them very careful consideration, and we have recently forwarded to all the provincial premiers a definite proposal. We will expect to receive their views with respect to this proposal, and we expect that there will have to be legislation to provide for this plan being implemented.

There will also be legislation dealing with most of the matters referred to by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech. With respect to his suggestion as to the pipe line, for instance, the appropriate time to explain the government's policy in that regard and the reasons for that policy will be when the legislation is brought before the house. The same will be true with respect to the proposed legislation to deal with the wheat situation in the prairie provinces.

I may say that, as set forth in the communiqué that was issued after the October conference, we stated that we would give careful consideration to any special project for the development of resources that any provincial government might wish to have us consider. The hon. gentleman has suggested that some day there will have to be some general policy of co-operative development of natural resources between the federal and the provincial governments. That is probably inevitable, but there are provinces that are very jealous of their responsibility and right to control in their own way the development of their own resources. The federal government, deriving its funds from taxation of the whole population of the country, has to be careful that any recommendation it brings to parliament for the application of those funds raised from general taxation throughout the country is equitable to all the provinces.

There is one thing, I think, that has been developing as rapidly as has our industrial expansion. That is the spirit of national unity in this country. We are becoming a Canadian nation, and we have to be very cautious that we do not attempt to move too rapidly and that all the moves that are made are conducive to the growth and development of that national consciousness and that spirit of solidarity between our people from one ocean to the other. It is against that background that all our proposals that can have any bearing or effect upon the growth of that national consciousness are developed and implemented.

The hon. gentleman referred to other matters that he has suggested at previous times, and that will probably be debated again at other times. I know that for many years he has been suggesting that if Mr. Hoover would only come over here and preside over a commission to investigate the effectiveness of our forms of government administration it might be very helpful to the Canadian people.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I know the Prime Minister has made that remark lightly but I would not wish Hansard to carry the recorded statement that I had suggested that Mr. Hoover be brought here. I never have and I never would. I believe we are fully competent to deal with our own affairs.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I used that name, Mr. Speaker, because Mr. Hoover did preside over the kind of commission in the United States that has been suggested here. I did not use it to designate the former president of the United States as an individual but merely as an illustrious example of the kind of chairmanship the Leader of the Opposition had in mind for that kind of commission in our own country. But we now have a commission, which the hon. gentleman has qualified as a very good commission, investigating the economic prospects of the Canadian people. The chairman of that commission has in the past also given us valuable assistance in special examinations into the efficiency of certain branches of the Canadian administration. It may be that when this work he is now on is terminated he will be available for further service to the public. I know of few as public-spirited Canadians in our population willing to devote so much time to the service of their fellow citizens.

In spite of all the problems that face us at the present time I am confident that, as in the past, ways and means will be found to overcome them which will keep this country what many times in the past it has been described to be, and as I hope it will be described many times in the future, one of the bright spots in the world in which to work and to contribute to human progress.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address to His Excellency. I think it was peculiarly fitting that a lady should have been selected to move the address on this occasion, particularly as the one piece of new information in the speech from the throne was that as far as the federal authority was concerned, henceforth women who were doing the same work as men should receive the same remuneration.

I noted that the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister spoke of the efforts that have been made to secure that end in this house over the last three or four years. I think they overlooked this fact. I have been here for 20 years, and all of the ladies who have sat in this house over that period and long before I came—one, for example, was Agnes Macphail—urged on the government of Canada the adoption of this particular policy. On this occasion I do not think the work that was done by other ladies in former years should be overlooked by the house.

As one examines the many areas in which the speech from the throne has failed to deal effectively with issues confronting Canada, there is no conclusion to which one can come, in my opinion, other than that this government should be brought not only before the bar of this house but before the bar of public opinion as being not only bankrupt in ideas in many respects but bankrupt in policy. I cannot deal with all the matters with which I should like to deal, including, for example, a national health program. I shall therefore have to confine myself to just a few of the matters that I think concern the house and the country.

A moment ago I referred to the government as being bankrupt in policy. Nowhere is this bankruptcy more clearly indicated than by the manner in which the government has failed to bring down a policy which will meet the needs of the farmers, particularly the western farmers, in the desperate cash position in which they find themselves at the present time. In spite of the fact that an abundant crop had been harvested in western Canada—and incidentally it is a crop that is of very fine quality—the virtual breakdown in the distribution of that crop from the producer to the consumer means that the farmer is unable to deliver grain to meet even the most immediate living expenses and the cost of his farming operations to produce that crop. Indeed at January 4, four months after the harvest, fully three-quarters of the delivery areas were still on the initial unit quota or the one bushel per specified acre quota. But in the face of this situation the government disregarded the overwhelming majority of western farmers who favoured cash advances for farm-stored grain, as we in this movement have advocated consistently and as has been adopted as a policy by others in this house and in the country. All the government has done is bring down a policy of forcing farmers to try to obtain loans from the banks. In doing this the government is doing something that was found to be completely inadequate in 1951 and something which fails to meet the problem now when the situation is, if anything, worse than it was four years ago. Inadequate, cumbersome and bound with red tape from beginning to end, this policy has undoubtedly raised the farmers' resentment throughout the prairie provinces.

Announcements by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) as to what the program meant have been completely belied in many cases by the actual administration in the field. For instance, in the first few weeks of the program it has been found in many cases that in place of the maximum available loan of $1,500, even if sufficient grain were available to entitle the farmer to that loan, the amount that in practice the farmer could borrow would be less than $200—indeed, on a quarter-section farm it would be even less than that—after a meagre two-bushel delivery was completed.

All of this seems to justify the statement I heard made about the government's bank loan policy—and it was one of the farm leaders who made it—namely that it is the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on western farmers. The evidence is clear that if a farmer had obtained credit standing at a bank, he did not need this legislation; and furthermore, if he could not obtain a bank loan under ordinary circumstances, he was not likely to get one under the government plan. The farmer has been justifiably annoyed at the prospect of paying 5 per cent interest when, as the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, other organizations are getting funds at 3½ per cent. The farmer is paying 5 per cent interest on what amounts to his own money, and in effect is paying 5 per cent because of the government's failure to adopt policies that would move wheat into world markets in sufficient volume. I am speaking of a policy over a period of time.

On all these counts the strongest criticism is justified. Yet the government remains blind to the situation. Certainly the Prime Minister surprised and shocked many people last fall when, in response to the telegram from Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan calling for cash advances on farm-stored grain, he replied that there were only relatively small numbers of farmers who required assistance. It reminded me of the Prime Minister's response at the conclusion of the last session on July 27, 1955, when I asked whether the government was going to take any action to assist the farmers of eastern Canada who had suffered an anticipated loss of $200 million as a result of the severe drought. It is true that the loss fortunately was not that great. At that time the Prime Minister replied that he found it difficult to believe these reports from the looks of things. That was an attitude on the part of the government that I thought was curiously remote, cold and unsympathetic. The same attitude has been all too clearly revealed on the question of cash payments to western farmers.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say emphatically to this house that we in this party do not share that attitude, and that we cannot be silent while something is being done which is as wrong in principle and as inadequate in practice as is the government's policy on guaranteed bank loans to prairie farmers. Nothing less—and I want to make it clear we have been suggesting this for a long time—than a program of cash advances on farm-stored grain of up to 75 per cent of the initial price on the full anticipated quota will suffice to bring the western farmer out of the very real financial crisis in which he finds himself as a result of his inability to dispose of his grain. When I say "quota", I mean at least the amount of wheat he will be expected to deliver on a quota during this crop year.

This is not a plea, and I want to make this clear to those members who are not from western Canada but are from other parts of Canada, for a handout, nor is it a request for a subsidy but a request for an advance payment on grain which the government will market through the wheat board. A few moments ago the Prime Minister said the wheat board had not been established to make payments of this description to the farmer. Perhaps it might be argued also that the wheat board has not the necessary funds to undertake that job. But the government has the obligation, I believe, to amend the wheat board act so the wheat board may have that power, and to appropriate sums of money adequate to enable the wheat board to make these advances.

In the speech from the throne there is a paragraph which foreshadows an expenditure by this government, with the Ontario government, which may amount to $150 million and which in effect is an advance to a private corporation for the building of a pipe line. This is not a private Canadian corporation but a private corporation which is controlled by the Tennessee and Delhi oil companies of the United States. I say if that can be done for foreign speculators in gas in this country, it could certainly be done for the farmers of Canada.

Because of that feeling on our part, I am going to move an amendment to the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis), that the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the words "serious national problems", the following words:

—including their failure to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain, equal to not less than 75 per cent of the initial price, to alleviate the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers and the entire economy of the prairie provinces.

The amendment as amended would read thus:

We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national problems, including their failure to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain, equal to not less than 75 per cent of the initial price, to alleviate the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers and the entire economy of the prairie provinces, and their disregard of the rights of parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house.

There is another financial crisis, and a long continuing one, which confronts agriculture as a whole. During the past four or five years particularly, the farmer's costs of production have steadily risen while the prices he has received for his products have steadily dropped. For instance, in August, 1951, the index of farm prices stood at 294·3. By August of last year it had gone down to 225·9, a decrease of almost 25 per cent. At the same time the index of farm costs had risen from 237·7 in August, 1951 to 241·3 in August of 1955. Of course, those official figures are taken from the bulletins that are issued by the department presided over by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The price of agricultural products has declined, and according to the government's own departmental advisers this drop is expected to continue. For example, at the recent federal-provincial agricultural conference it was predicted that farm cash income in 1956 will be approximately the same as that estimated for 1955. It was pointed out that the prices for oats, barley and rye had fallen sharply in recent months. Departmental officials estimate the prices for cattle and calves will likely fall in 1956, as well as the price for hogs, which incidentally recently fell to the support price level. They expected no increase in the amount of grain farmers would deliver in 1956. That is hardly an optimistic picture, but is one that has had, and will continue to have if correct, a profound effect not only on the agricultural part of our economy but ultimately if allowed to persist on the whole economy of Canada.

This is something the government should bear in mind when deriving satisfaction from the increase in the gross national product over last year. We are told that estimates run from something like a 9 per cent increase over 1954 for a total of $26·16 billion to another figure that is sometimes given of $26·4 billion. But does this indicate the true picture? In my opinion it does not, for those figures should be looked at in real terms. Let us, in other words, squeeze the water out of those figures to see what they look like when we have eliminated the effect of inflation for which the government has been responsible over the years.

I notice the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) shakes his head. I am not forgetting that during the war years I heard people very closely identified with the public service of this country say that after the war was over, with the high expenditures and large public debts we had accumulated, a little inflation would be a good thing and would enable the government to collect more in taxes and pay off some of those accumulated debts. Expressed in terms of 1935-39 dollars the gross national product in 1955 ranges from approximately 12·8 billion of those dollars to 12·9 billion of those pre-war dollars, depending on which of the two estimates one uses. In other words, when expressed in pre-war dollars the gross national product is less than half the value when expressed in present-day inflated dollars.

This is not yet the final step in arriving at what is the true picture for the average Canadian citizen. In order to compare Canadian production over the years we must remember that Canada's population has been increasing and these figures should, therefore, be expressed on a per capita basis. Canada's population at June 1 of last year was estimated to be 15,601,000. Applying that figure we estimate the gross national product in real terms on a per capita basis for 1955 is likely to range from $818 to $826. Even the highest of those estimates is barely 1½ per cent higher on a per capita basis than the per capita share of the gross national product of 1944, and certainly explains why the average Canadian does not feel as prosperous as the government says he is. Indeed, it portrays an average annual increase in per capita gross national product of only one-tenth of one per cent over 1944. which in view of the increase in productivity year by year by an estimated 2·5 per cent is to say the least an astonishing reflection on federal government policies. Of course there was full employment in 1944 and this year, in spite of buoyant conditions in many industries and the enormous increase in the profits of many great corporations, there were still 230,000 unplaced applicants as at November 17, 1955, the latest estimate. It is true that is substantially lower than last year, but it is still much higher than human needs justify.

Now, year by year it is clear, some years more than others, that we bear the cost of this failure to plan consciously for full employment in the only way in which it can be done over the years, by the consistent application of a program of public investment and public planning, based upon the need for tremendous expenditures on highways, schools, hospitals and other forms of social investment.

This afternoon I paid particular attention to one of the closing paragraphs of the Prime Minister's address. He said the time might come when the federal government and the provinces co-operatively would have to play a bigger part in the development of our resources. I was glad to hear him say that because I believe the time has come when that should be undertaken; when through a public investment board, perhaps with a public investment authority, the savings of our people might be directed into desirable channels, that we might plan and use our resources in a planned way for the benefit of all our people, even if it requires, as I think it will, the extension of public ownership and socialization in this country.

I have referred to farm income and the unemployment situation. Basic to a high level in both these sectors is a solution of the fundamental problems of Canadian trade, which I shall refer to in a moment, and which I think the government has failed miserably to solve. For certainly the government has been content to adopt a wait and see policy, a policy that would have been disastrous in wartime and which I believe might be equally disastrous in peacetime.

With regard to wheat, it is clear that only a crop failure will enable the government to solve the problem if, of course, it maintains its present policies. The C.C.F. on its part, however, attacks that economic concept which regards abundance as a tragedy and which welcomes scarcity and does nothing to relieve it. Yes, nature was generous last year, and I say that instead of showing concern we should be rejoicing. It is my view and that of my colleagues that abundance should be met with a determination to use it to meet the needs of people wherever they live. Yet even in Canada we read of people starving in Toronto, or at near-starvation level. While wheat is piled high on the western plains and butter stocks are the largest in our history, there are large numbers of our people who are undernourished and underfed. When some scheme should be devised to enable those people to get the butter, we have to sell it at from 25 to 29 cents a pound below the domestic price to countries behind the iron curtain. We do that rather than dispose of it to our own needy citizens.

Also, out on the broad reaches of Asia, Africa and Central and South America, and even in Europe, there are people without enough to eat, while here surpluses pile up. We must remove that tragic contradiction from our national fabric and from the international scene. I say rather than leave these surpluses to pile up as a glut, it is far better for some of this food to be used as part of our defence program to feed the hungry peoples of the world and improve their standard of living as the only way in which the totalitarian doctrines of communism or fascism can be effectively countered or eliminated. Mr. Speaker, this is a federal responsibility, and this at least is a responsibility that cannot be sloughed off on the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario, the province of Saskatchewan or on any province of Canada. Trade and commerce are under the jurisdiction of this parliament of Canada.

I say the government has failed to recognize that failure to sell wheat and a number of other commodities in sufficient volume is not owing to the abundance with which nature provided us, nor the entry of the United States into our normal markets on a large scale, though undoubtedly that was a factor, but is related to the vast and, we are told, ever-widening gulf between the standards of living of the privileged and underprivileged sections of the globe and the chronic shortage of dollars with which to buy those commodities.

The long-term solution requires a vast program of development in the underdeveloped parts of the world, and we ourselves feel the effects of the lack of such a policy in our own trading relationships. I am happy to see that the government is going to increase the amount that is to be allocated to the Colombo plan. But after all, that amount is relatively very small indeed, and will not amount to more than the cost to be borne by our government to pay the storage on grain over and above the normal amount of storage that the elevators have to use in a normal year. If we take all the grain in storage in elevators and elsewhere, it is considerably less than that amount. At 10 cents a bushel it will cost the elevator companies and the wheat board together, as the grain marketing organizations, something like $50 million.

There are a number of suggestions in that regard that I intended to make but I must now turn to something else; therefore I am going to leave it at that point.

As far as our marketing is concerned, we find the dollar problem arises out of the imbalance as between the amounts the dollar area exports as compared with the amounts it imports. As a matter of fact, as far as Canada is concerned it has meant the loss of the British market for one after another of its products, like cheese and apples. The acceptance of sterling and other currencies in part payment of our exports, as we have suggested from time to time, would not by itself solve this problem, and we are not suggesting that we should take full payment in the soft currencies for our exports; but it would mark a necesary first step by acting as a spur to encourage them to buy from us and for Canada to use that newly acquired sterling or other currency to buy in the commonwealth or other areas and thus eliminate to some extent our extraordinarily heavy dependence on imports from the United States. Yet the government, instead of seeking on its part to correct this imbalance, has since 1947 clearly followed a decision to link the Canadian economy inextricably to that of the United States.

For instance, while before the war exports were divided more evenly between the United States and the United Kingdom, today we depend upon the United States for export markets almost four times as much as we do to the United Kingdom. As far as imports are concerned, a similar pattern reveals itself; for while in the 20 years before the war less than two-thirds of our imports were from the United States, today the proportion has risen to almost three-quarters. On the other hand, before the war imports from the United Kingdom were almost one-fifth of our total, and now they are only one-twentieth.

We in this country must also face up to the effect this policy will have not only on our trade but on the whole field of economic and political policy. The government should seriously consider the implications that the concentration of our trade in the United States may have on the very independence of this country. I suggest this not in any narrow spirit but out of the profound conviction that this Canadian experiment on the northern half of the North American continent has something to offer the world at large, something which would be lost if the Canadian voice became merely an echo, which it has been all too frequently, of the larger and louder voice of the United States.

The increasing United States dominance in Canadian industry is a matter of legitimate concern. I am sure this concern is shared by Canadians everywhere. However, I would say immediately that I have the most profound respect and the highest regard for citizens of the United States as citizens, but I do object to and I fear, and believe the vast majority of Canadians will agree with me, the vast power of huge United States corporations in the Canadian economy and hence some time or other perhaps in our political life.

I say this feeling is shared by many Canadians. I have here a report which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of an address given on December 14 last by Mr. James Stewart, president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. Mr. Stewart said:

> Canadians are increasingly expressing concern about foreign control over their country's industry.

He then went on to elaborate. More significant still, I have here a copy of the script used by the ambassador of Canada at Washington when speaking to the New England export club at Boston, Massachusetts, on October 17, 1955. Anyone who reads Mr. Heeney's forthright speech to that organization can see the same ideas which I am expressing at this moment. I presume that since Mr. Heeney spoke as our ambassador probably the script was vetted before he used it in Boston last October. For example, he points out that in 1952 about a quarter of Canadian manufacturing, mining, smelting, petroleum exploration and development industries, Canadian railways and other utilities, taken together, was owned in the United States. He said:

> I have no reason to believe that today's figures would show this situation to have shifted substantially to the Canadian side.

If I have the time I will produce some figures to show that there has been a vast increase since 1952 in this control, and will back up that statement with figures from the official records. I find the same thing in an editorial quoting extracts from an address by Mr. G. Edward Hall, president of the University of Western Ontario, speaking to the Boston conference of distributors. I should like to quote a good deal of this speech, but I shall quote only one paragraph, which is as follows:

> The term Canadian, associated with a company name, should be significant and meaningful. It should imply its stock is available to the Canadian public, that it is listed on Canadian stock exchanges, that its financial statements are made public and reflect only the Canadian operations, that the dividends are payable in Canadian funds, that, as one enlightened American company put it, "our company is not just an American company doing business in Canada, but rather is a company jointly owned by Canadians and Americans doing business in both countries."

Many of our so-called Canadian companies have become more and more not merely subsidiaries of United States companies and corporations; they have become parts of United States corporations and companies. To the extent that this has happened I think it has become a danger.

I said I would try to give a few figures to show what this actually means. United States direct investment in Canadian companies has more than doubled since 1945, climbing from $2·3 billion to $5·7 billion in 1954, while in addition portfolio investment, other than government and municipal bonds, has climbed to $1·8 billion in 1954.

As a proportion of industries and merchandising—manufacturing, mining, smelting, petroleum exploration and development, steam railways, other utilities and merchandising—United States-owned direct investment has climbed to 24 per cent in 1951 and to 25 per cent in 1952, the latest year for which official figures are available. That is an indication of what is happening. Then if we turn to the manufacturing industry we find that the proportion of United States direct investment has climbed sharply from 33 per cent in 1950 to 36 per cent in 1951 and 38 per cent in 1952. In mining, smelting, and petroleum exploration and development it has climbed from 39 per cent to 53 per cent in the same three-year period.

Even this is not the complete picture, for in addition we must add portfolio investments held by United States individuals and institutions. In 1952 they totalled $1·4 billion. Assuming the same type of distribution as in direct investment we find an additional 10 per cent of capitalization in manufacturing industries must be credited to United States sources, which brings the total up to almost 50 per cent. We might well ask how much larger this figure may grow before we shall have lost effective control of our own destiny. If we lose effective control of our economic destiny how long shall we hope to retain effective control of our political independence?

In the field of trade we find that many significant decisions concerning Canadian economic life are made outside of Canada, that many Canadian firms which are subsidiaries of United States companies buy in the United States from their parent companies or buy from firms with which their United States parent has also entered into contracts, thus placing obstacles in the way of the diversification of Canadian trade.

Should we then not insist that more of our own resources should be used in this country? Not long ago I read in the Montreal Gazette a statement made by John C. Doyle, president of Canadian Javelin, which referred to what he called the most valuable and largest iron ore deposit in the world in Labrador. He referred to talks which were going on between the company and United States steel and iron ore interests, and he seemed to suggest that it would be only a matter of time until the company was taken over lock, stock and barrel, as he put it, by United States concerns.

Of course we know what will happen. This iron ore will go down on the railways which are being built to the sea, it will be put into ships and go to the United States. Then it will come back to us in the form of expensive fabricated steel for use in Canada. Why should not we do what we have done in regard to gas and insist that at least a percentage of the iron ore in this country should be utilized by Canadian foundries giving employment to Canadian workmen? If necessary the government of Canada should undertake, as it did so successfully in connection with the artificial rubber plant, Polymer, the establishment of a steel industry under public ownership and public control. When we notice the extraordinary steps which the federal government, and it appears the Ontario government also, have been prepared to take to avoid having the trans-Canada natural gas pipe line come under public control and ownership from beginning to end, we fear that they will not undertake such a plan even if it were intelligent and feasible as it is.

We believe that great enterprises of this magnitude should have public control and public direction. However, I am not going to deal further with the question of the gas pipe line project because, as the Leader of the Opposition has said already, as well as the Prime Minister, legislation will be brought before the house. I do not know that the government need be precipitate about that, because when I look at the representations which are to be made before the federal power commission of the United States and read the accounts of what is likely to happen there I do not think there need be any hurry as far as this parliament is concerned, because we are not likely to see permission given by the federal power commission in the United States for the importation of gas into that country under this project in the next one, two or perhaps three years, if ever.

It is our profound conviction that the development of many great national projects should be participated in by all Canadians so that the wealth that is our heritage may be shared by the community as a whole. To do this the government must initiate a massive program of public development of the vast resources at Canada's disposal.

One other aspect of our national resources I should like to deal with briefly, because I have only a few minutes left to me now; that is, that we have failed to provide educational opportunities for our young people. The Ottawa Citizen of January 5 of this year had this to say:

> In the United States, alarm at Russian competition is an increasingly influential factor in the demand for greater aid to education. The most recent voice raised in warning is that of Dr. John R. Dunning, dean of engineering at Columbia, who declares that "no high school anywhere in our country has even one-half the Russian requirements in mathematics, science, physics or chemistry." Dr. Dunning asserts that the Russians are graduating more scientists and engineers than American universities are.

Just last month Lewis L. Strauss, chairman of the atomic energy commission, reported that colleges and universities are providing less than half the scientists and engineers the United States needs. I am told that the situation is no better in Canada and may even be worse, yet again here the government has failed to provide imaginative leadership.

Indeed, the failure again of the throne speech to make any mention of the Canada Council is, I think, sufficient proof of that statement. The refusal to launch a national program of scholarships as part of the Canada Council project means yet another tragic postponement of the development of Canada's human resources.

Even in the United Kingdom, where today no child of ability can be denied a high school and university education because of lack of funds, we learned from the interesting address to the Ottawa Canadian Club yesterday by Mr. Norman Smith—I regret that I was unable to listen to it owing to another engagement, but I read it in the Ottawa Journal last night—the following:

> Sir Winston Churchill, in his first major speech since the general election, said last month: "The behaviour of their leaders must not lead us to suppose that Russian power and capacity are not growing in many other directions. Technological education is an all-important subject in which Great Britain has allowed herself to fall behind. We are already surpassed by Russia on a scale which is most alarming."

If that is true of Great Britain it is even more true of our own country and, if we can believe the statements I quoted from the United States, true of our great ally in the democratic cause.

I began by saying that I believe that the throne speech indicates clearly that the government has shown itself to be not only bankrupt in ideas but bankrupt in policy. I have been able to deal only with the plight of our farmers, some effects of inflation and of our trade policies, as well as the growing threat to the Canadian economic—and perchance political—independence through the failure of the government to take effective steps to safeguard our own economy. Latterly I have pointed out the failure of the government to take effective steps in the provision of opportunity to young Canadians through educational facilities to equip themselves to meet the growing demands made upon our schools and universities by industry and by our economic and social development.

I have, I believe, shown that the statement I made when I began to speak can be fully substantiated by an examination of government policy or, shall I put it this way, by the failure of the government to formulate policies to meet the needs of the Canadian people in 1956.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I wish also to follow the traditional practice of congratulating the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I congratulate them on the honour which has been bestowed upon them in being selected by the government for this honoured duty. Naturally, of course, I cannot very well lean over backwards and congratulate them on the subject matter of their speeches because almost their entire subject matter consisted of laudatory remarks paying their respects to the government which they naturally believe is doing a tremendous job but which other members of the house, including most of us on this side, would say has not been so well done.

Might I say at the outset that we are all aware of the illness of the national leader of the Social Credit party. For this reason it is impossible for him to be here today. I believe this is the first opening of a session of parliament which he has missed in his rather long and somewhat distinguished career. It is the first time he will not have the privilege of taking part in the debate on the speech from the throne. He wishes me to express on his behalf his very sincere thanks to many of his colleagues in the house for the kind inquiries that so many have made both personally and by letter and other means of communication, and for the expression of their hopes that he will experience a complete recovery. I may say that he is doing remarkably well and that it is anticipated by his doctors that he will experience a complete recovery. It is expected that he will be back with us in the not too distant future.

The Social Credit party in Canada has always stood on what we believe to be good, sound, basic principles of life. Some of these principles we regard as very precious, very dear. We believe in the dignity of human personality. We believe that man is in fact the greatest of all God's creations. We believe that mankind was created free and should remain free, and that his freedom should be protected at all times. We believe too that the Creator who created us all has also provided for man's every welfare. We believe therefore that the administration of any nation should be done in such a way as to preserve the freedom of man and at the same time give him security to enjoy the good things of life without interfering with his God-given freedom.

We propose what we believe to be a scientifically sound economic policy which, if applied to the problem of distribution, will give to the people of this and other countries an abundant life while at the same time retaining for them their freedom to enjoy peace, prosperity and contentment. We have a phrase that we use quite often and which I am afraid others have to some extent copied from us, that that which is physically possible and desirable can and should be made financially possible.

In spite of the indications in the speech from the throne that Canada is enjoying a measure of prosperity, the fact remains that Canada, and western Canada in particular, is experiencing a situation which is almost comparable to that of the hungry thirties. There exists on the prairie provinces what might be stated to be starvation in the midst of plenty. This is something that no government should be very proud of. In fact when the over-all economic situation is reviewed and we find that such a vast industry as agriculture, not only as it exists in western Canada but as it exists from one coast to the other, has to go through a period of time which is almost a duplication of the hungry thirties, then we cannot say that the economy of Canada is healthy by any means.

What is the situation, particularly in western Canada? The leader of the opposition party mentioned something about that this afternoon. The leader of the C.C.F. expressed himself along the same line. We have a situation here where those who are responsible for the production of the foodstuffs of this country find themselves, while having a reasonable amount of assets, with no cash. When I say "no cash" I mean just exactly that. Some of them find difficulty in getting the very bare necessities of life.

It has been said over and over again in western Canada that the only reliable income is that received from family allowances, pension cheques and war veterans allowances, and it is said that this money is about the only money that is keeping things going in western Canada at all. Yet we have this situation of a depressed agriculture in the midst of plenty. While having assets and while being responsible for the production of these life-giving products of the country, our farmers have to suffer.

This problem is not only that of the grain that is grown in western Canada. The same problem of what is almost starvation in the midst of abundance exists in the east. There is still the problem of the distribution of the abundance of foodstuffs other than grain. We have surpluses of potatoes in New Brunswick and apples in Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. We have heavy stocks of butter throughout all of Canada and of cheese in Ontario and Quebec.

Farmers all over the Dominion of Canada are caught in a sort of cost-price squeeze. The prices of farm products are continuing to decline while the costs of the things which the farmers have to buy continue to go up. Farm cash income reached its peak in Canada in the year 1951, but it has been on the decline ever since that time. The aggregate cash income of all the farmers of Canada last year was $1,200 million less than it was in 1951. That is a serious situation, and one which has been allowed to develop in our country right under the eyes of what should be a responsible government.

In 1954 the farmers made up 20 per cent of Canada's total population, but they received less than 10 per cent of the national income. As I was discussing the matter with him a few hours ago, one of my colleagues stated that he had heard that the figure was about only 8 per cent of the national income. Considering the great service rendered to Canada and all its citizens by the farmers of this country, we maintain that this is shabby treatment indeed.

Let us remember that agriculture is the basic industry in Canada. Without agriculture people do not eat. Without agriculture people will have nothing to wear. Without a prosperous agriculture we cannot have a prosperous Canada. About 50 per cent of Canada's population lives in the towns and the rural areas. All these towns are contiguous to and are reliant upon agriculture for their very existence. It is in these small places that farmers get their groceries, repairs, clothing, household equipment, machinery, fuel, medical and dental services and such like. When a dollar is received by a farmer for some of his production it starts its way through a circuit which takes it through the service centres on down through the small businessmen in these small communities, right down to the great factories that make the things which the farmers want to buy. Consequently when a dollar starts on its way from the farmer it immediately creates a series of business transactions.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the leader of the Social Credit party in Canada, has calculated that the dollar turns over about seven times as it circulates on its way back to its point of origin. Mr. Speaker, just put this process in reverse, in other words just short-change the farmer, and you will have just seven times less business being done. If business declines seven times, no wonder we have surpluses; no wonder we have what might be tantamount to starvation in the midst of plenty.

This government, Mr. Speaker, has now been in power for over 20 years, and throughout those 20 years it has sounded praises of its own efficiency and of its policies. I have really never been able to determine what its policies are; they change so often according to the particular political complexion of the country. As I say, the government have been in power in this country for 20 years. They therefore must take the blame for any blunders of the past. Surely the experience of the hungry thirties should have been enough for the government to exercise sufficient foresight to prepare and to adopt such policies—shall I say such financial policies—as would distribute our vast peacetime abundances.

Mr. Speaker, the government has blundered. I am going to take you back a few years and indicate to you where they made perhaps one of the biggest blunders of this century. That was in the signing of the Bretton Woods agreement, which this group opposed from the very moment it was brought forward in this house. We were a small group. We attempted a sort of small-scale filibuster. I do not know how long that filibuster would have gone on had it not been for the fact that parliament was approaching the Christmas recess, when everything tended to close down parliamentary operations.

We opposed that agreement. We fought it tooth and nail. We were the only group in this house that opposed it. Both our Conservative friends and our C.C.F. friends voted for its adoption. I believe I am correct in saying that perhaps there was one gentleman in the Conservative party in this house who voted with us. I may have to stand corrected, but if my memory serves me rightly it was the venerable Mr. Tommy Church.

What effect has the Bretton Woods agreement had on the fiscal policies of nearly all governments, and what effect has it had on the trading nations of the world that signed that agreement? In this respect I think I should like to quote from a broadcast that was made by the hon. member for Peace River, the national leader of the Social Credit party. This broadcast was given over station CKYL, Peace River, on Tuesday, November 22. This is the part where Mr. Low refers to the Bretton Woods agreement:

> . . . our federal government fell for the Bretton Woods plan in 1945. The plan was drafted and proposed at the Bretton Woods conference in New Hampshire by Harry Dexter White, a communist who wormed his way into a high position in the treasury of the United States . . . It placed upon debtor nations the obligation of balancing their trade with the creditor nations by payments in the form of gold or United States dollars but it did not place upon the creditor nations any such obligation. Its net effect was to place all the nations who became parties to it under a world-wide gold standard. Bretton Woods came up for ratification by the Canadian parliament during my first session at Ottawa in 1945. After the most careful study of which I was capable I advised the federal government when I spoke on the floor of the house not to become a signer to the agreement, because I was quite sure I saw that it would cause widespread dislocation of trade that would hurt the debtor nations especially, nations like Great Britain. I saw also that the United States was bludgeoning Great Britain into signing the agreement by making that the price of a very large loan to Britain. I fought the proposal with all my might, but in spite of our opposition, the federal government ratified it and immediately came under its terms.
> From that day in the late fall of 1945, Canada sat back and demanded gold or United States dollars in payment for our exports. Britain and some other countries who had been our traditional markets for many years did not have gold nor United States dollars, hence they couldn't buy from us. Britain therefore turned to other countries to obtain her foods and some other necessities. They turned to Russia and China for grains and lumber and soya beans because those countries were ready to exchange those things for goods which Britain could supply them. Right from 1945 my colleagues and I in the House of Commons pleaded with the federal government to offer to supply Britain and other countries our surplus food products, our lumber and other things in return for what they could send us in goods; or if they could not yet manufacture or produce sufficient goods to pay us with, we should be prepared to accept the only other thing they had—their own currency. Our government was not prepared to do so. Consequently, Canada lost some of the best of the markets we had enjoyed for many years, markets we could very well have today. Our government was not prepared to use the escape clause in the Bretton Woods agreement, and as a result trade was dislocated exactly as we said it would be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, much has been said in the last few months about the fact that the United States of America has been following a sort of give-away program. The fact is that the United States of America accepted and took advantage of that escape clause, and were able to go out in the world and offer their surplus agricultural products to those who would take them. When he was speaking along these lines some few weeks ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce wept some crocodile tears when he said that the United States, with their vast surplus of agricultural products, had not stayed within the Bretton Woods agreement and because they had adopted a sort of give-away program they had upset all the normal channels of trade.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I find it very difficult to criticize the United States government for the way they have handled their surplus production. They set up the commodity credit corporation to take over all agricultural products which were in surplus. The farmer was paid for them and was reasonably satisfied. They piled up billions of dollars worth of surplus agricultural products. Then they looked around at the world and said, "Do you want these agricultural products?" Is there any harm, I ask, in a nation going out and asking if other nations want to be fed?" That is exactly what they did. The other nations said, "Yes, we will take these agricultural products," and the hungry peoples were fed. I find it very difficult to criticize a government that will take surplus agricultural products from the farmers, reasonably satisfy the farmers by paying for them, and then turn around and see that they are distributed to the peoples of the world who need them. I find it very difficult to criticize a government for that sort of action.

It is obvious that the present government of Canada looks upon the surplus foodstuffs in Canada as a sort of calamity. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you noticed carefully the reading of that paragraph in the speech from the throne that deals with this particular matter. It says this:

> Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being.

Now, notice that. This high level of prosperity, which the government calls "increased well-being", was not fully participated in by some sectors of the economy.

> In particular, although sales of wheat in the past five years have been at record levels—

They do not say what they have been for the last year or two.

> —an unprecedented series of bumper harvests has made necessary the storage of abnormal stocks of grain both in elevators and on farms.

Let us analyse that paragraph. Putting it another way, you might just as well say this. Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity but the farmers of this country who have produced the foodstuffs which make for the well-being of our people have not been able to enjoy the well-being that they have brought about. You might just as well put it in that fashion. The farmers cannot enjoy this well-being because they have produced so much. Now, how can too much be a tragedy? Surely that should not be a tragedy. The tragedy exists in policies that are being pursued by this government which make the distribution of this vast abundance of foodstuffs impossible; that is the tragedy and that is the calamity.

Surely the criterion of the well-being of a nation should be its ability to produce, and surely any policy pursued by the government—and since money is the medium of exchange it must be financial policy—should be applied to the distribution of these foodstuffs. I believe I heard the Minister of Finance, or it may have been his predecessor, state on one occasion, "We believe that which is physically possible can be made financially possible". Well, it was a nice slogan to accept from us, but evidently this government has not succeeded in working it out. We are able to produce the foodstuffs, but because of the financial policies being pursued we are not able to distribute them.

The Social Crediters of this country, this party to which I have the honour to belong for a good many years, are in the position of advocating financial proposals which would be geared to the solution of what some might term the problem of abundance. Social Credit has never regarded abundances as a calamity, because that is the great objective of industry. What is industry here for if it is not to produce goods? What is the farmer working his land for if it is not for the purpose of producing an abundance? Our philosophy is that an abundance of the good things of the earth makes people happy and contented, and the proper distribution of the abundances of this earth will do away with all the calamities of war upon war upon war. But until the financial policy is changed we will always meet the problem of distribution, and it will be regarded by governments that are on the wrong track financially as a calamity.

I have only a few minutes of my time left. What are we able to do in the physical world? In my imagination I see a conference room. We call in the scientists. We say to them, "We want you to sit around the table. We are going to lock the door on you and after you have had a conference on what you are able to do, just rap on the door and we shall open it and you can give us your verdict." Well, our scientists gather in there and on the basis of physical realities, on the basis of what they know can be done in this physical world, they rap on the door. We let them out and we say, "Gentlemen, what are you able to do for the advancement of civilization?"

Well, what are they able to do? They will tell you that they are able to travel to the moon. Do not think that is something that cannot be accomplished. Physicists are holding conferences almost every day, discussing and perfecting formulae that have already been worked out to travel to the moon. They tell us that they are able to pick up the sea, transport it over wide areas and cause the deserts of the earth to be flooded so that they blossom like the rose and bring forth millions more bushels of grain, if you please. Is that going to be a tragedy? They tell us they are able to transport the atmosphere of the tropics, take it to the north and south poles and make those areas tropical areas.

We are going to discuss pipe lines in a few days. As for power, they say, "Well, you can discuss pipe lines if you like, but just about the time you get them built we shall have atomic energy here, and gas and oil pipe lines could conceivably be obsolete." Then some of the more advanced scientists say, "Well, don't talk like that. The very moment you get atomic energy to run the factories and heat the homes we shall be able to harness the energy of the sun and by a series of—" oh, they use some technical language that I do not understand—"power stations around the globe, pick up the energy of the sun, absorb the heat and energy, radiate it out, and that will last forever and ever, just as long as the sun is in the sky." We say to the scientists, "Can you do all that?" And they say to us, "Brother, you imagine it and we shall do it." That is what our modern-day scientists say.

We go to the Minister of Finance and we say, "Mr. Minister, we want you to get your financial brains around this table. We have a simple problem for you to solve. In a nutshell the problem is this. Here are six loaves of bread and here are six hungry men with no money in their pockets. We want you to move these six loaves of bread to these six hungry men." Well, of course, our present problem is this. We have vast supplies of agricultural products. We have people who need them; we have nations who need them, but our farmers who raise the agricultural products, the foodstuffs, have no money in their pockets. "Now, then, you financial wizards of the country, when you are ready with a solution tap on the door, come out and we shall await the solution."

We wait and we wait. Eventually a little faint rap comes on the door. We open the door and they walk out. We look at them. Their hair is all dishevelled and they are bleary-eyed. They look as if they had been on a ten-day toot. We say to them, "Well, what is your verdict; what have the financial brains of this country come up with as a solution to this great problem?" They say, "Yes, we have a solution." We reply, "What is your solution? All Canada awaits it." What is it? They have decided to adopt the Woolworth plan; that is the five, ten and fifteen plan. They have decided to guarantee the banks against loss if they will only lend to the farmers a little bit of loose change at 5 per cent.

Can you beat that, Mr. Speaker? We are able to do everything under the sun in this physical world; nothing is impossible. But somehow or other the government have not adopted and cannot discover any financial policy that they can apply to the distribution of our abundances. And what makes it worse than ever is this. What do the banks do when they lend the money? Well, all they do by right and by power given to them by the laws of this country is simply write the figures in a book and expand the credit of the country. Nobody will deny that, Mr. Speaker. Why, the expansion of credit every time loans are made is money created out of nothing, by the stroke of a pen, and the farmer has to pay 5 per cent to the banks for writing figures in their books. They have to pay through the nose because of a tragedy for which they are not responsible, a tragedy which we must place at the door of the present government, because they refuse to face the reality of the problem of distribution in the midst of plenty.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and I have a good many things in my notes here. Opportunity will be given on the legislation that is to come down in future for us to discuss even the wheat situation and the problem of abundances; but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that there would not be any great problem in Canada if this government faced the realities which can be faced and only faced as they change their financial policies to apply to the distribution of the good things of the earth; for, in the final analysis, those are the things that give life and security, abundance and contentment, and bring peace and prosperity to the nation. If the government does not wish to pursue the right policies, then all I can say to this parliament and to the people of Canada is that they had better wake up and change the government or this country will go down into absolute economic chaos. This is the choice; it is one thing or the other, and the people of this country had better wake up to that one thing.

They are waking up to it here and there and all over. I know something of that because it is my business to learn it. There are two Social Credit governments in Canada. Just one more and you will not stop this party from sweeping this country from one coast of Canada to the other. Just one more provincial government is all that is needed. That is my belief, and it may not take very long to prove that by actual fact. One more government is all we need and we will sweep this country.

An hon. Member: Which government, provincial or federal?

Mr. Hansell: One more provincial government.

An hon. Member: Ontario?

An hon. Member: Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the attention of the gentlemen of my own group. See how the house is hushed when we tell them of our political progress.

An hon. Member: We are waiting for you to sprout wings.

Mr. Hansell: Everyone wants to know which province is going Social Credit next, but I am not going to tell them because I like to keep them on edge. That is part of our strategy.

I appreciate the time that has been given me. We will have more to say about this on another occasion. Those of my group who are to follow me in the days to come during this debate will perhaps amplify what I have said and also bring to your attention and to the attention of parliament some other salient factors which we believe should be brought to the attention of this country.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) upon her most excellent speech in moving the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) upon his most thoughtful remarks in seconding that motion. The constituencies of both these hon. members must be proud of them. In particular the women of Canada must be happy at their emancipation which was so ably demonstrated by the hon. member for Timiskaming. What has happened confirms the fact that there are now no doors closed to women in business or in the professional and political world. At last women's suffrage has reached fruition.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity early in this debate of bringing some matters to the attention of the house, but before dealing with them I should like to commend the decision which has been made to expedite our proceedings. The day to day business of government is work, and we should get on with it as quickly as possible.

The generally optimistic tone of the speech from the throne regarding our economic position is most encouraging. It is in line with official statements of cabinet ministers, heads of important private institutions, banks and business houses. However if you read the fine print in most of these statements you will find that it is recognized frankly that there are major problems to be dealt with. These are sometimes overlooked except by the people directly affected. As long as we are aware of this and take steps to meet them, this optimism is healthy.

It is proper that we Canadians should appreciate our own robust stature and good fortune, but there is some danger that a too-glowing picture may create false impressions abroad and obscure our pathway at home. An eminent Canadian, our ambassador to the United States, referred to this possibility in a recent speech to a United States audience when he said:

> We Canadians appreciate your good opinion. And we, of course, share American optimism and faith in Canada's future. Nevertheless, the very generosity of the praise sometimes makes me uneasy and I am not infrequently disturbed by the more extravagant reports that I encounter. And I often find myself wishing that some of those who express such high opinions of things Canadian were better informed about our people and our economy.

After mentioning some of the problems, he said further:

> I mention these points simply to indicate that we have in Canada no magic formula and that our streets are not quite paved with gold, or even uranium, as some of the stock promoters would have you beileve. Like other countries, we are not without difficult political, economic and social problems . . .

One of these problems is the dominion-provincial relationship about which we shall hear a great deal in parliament and elsewhere. These relations are never static and the need for flexibility in dealing with common problems was never more apparent.

At the confederation table when arrangements were worked out the vision of a great nation prevailed, but future events were but dimly foreseen. It is not surprising in view of the great developments that have taken place that some changes in our thinking are necessary. Rather it is a matter for wonder that the main principles have held good in spite of the stresses and strains and growing pains.

One very important event which took place in our early history was the purchase by the Dominion of Canada of lands held by the Hudson's Bay Company, now the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec. Like the Louisiana purchase by the United States from Napoleon this was a wise move in the building of a great nation, but in Canada the disposition of the lands in the course of time led to the building up of the two large central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. These provinces benefited directly from the addition of very extensive land areas to their territories. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the other two original partners at confederation, gained indirectly with the growth of the Canadian nation but lost ground in their relative position within confederation.

At the time these arrangements were accepted the lands were considered to be only wilderness. As the frontiers of knowledge and geography have been pushed back the wonderful storehouse of mineral treasures is now being appreciated and exploited. Here is just one example of how the benefits of nationhood have accrued disproportionately to certain provinces.

You may say that this is now history and that we maritimers may as well accept the facts of geography and history. The lands that were parcelled out as of little value have become a storehouse of wealth and the deal perhaps should be considered closed. The fact remains that the acquisition and the later development of these resources were based on the national credit, the national transportation system and in some cases the national market.

Are the benefits then to be limited to some provinces? Is it too late for Nova Scotia to benefit or to be considered entitled to land in the far northern reaches of this country which some day may produce great wealth or become strategically important? If any in this house think that is so, I would ask them to study the map of Canada hanging in the railway committee room. I am sure they would be convinced that Nova Scotia with so little has done a great deal, and as an original partner of confederation with New Brunswick, should receive the consideration due it.

In our present distribution of taxable wealth as related to the responsibility of the provinces lies a problem affecting our greatest resources, our young people. It is the question of educational opportunities. The financial resources of Nova Scotia, for example, are not such as to support a modern school system and the necessary variety and quality of higher educational facilities as well. This I believe to be true of some other provinces. With respect to Nova Scotia, we are very proud of the advances made in the last year in education, but our resources are not sufficient to make complete provision for higher education as well.

In Canada we do not have the great number of large corporations and wealthy foundations upon which to draw for financial support that they have in the United States. Even in that great country to the south the privately supported universities are having a very difficult time. Statistics published there show that university professors have suffered losses in real income during the past 15 years, a period when most other groups in society have enjoyed a substantial rise in living standards. Put dramatically in an advertisement drawing attention to this situation, it was said that as to higher education, "we have been living on borrowed time." If this is so in the United States colleges, to which we have been losing teachers for a long time, how much more so is it true of our Canadian universities?

Financial problems hang over our colleges at a time when university graduates are in demand everywhere as teachers, administrators, doctors, executives in business, engineers and scientists. Not long ago a particular aspect of this problem was forcefully emphasized by Dr. O. M. Solandt, the former head of the defence research board. He warned that the shortage of engineers and scientists was a real threat to our defence program. This is not simply a question of continuing material prosperity or higher standards of living; it becomes a question of survival. But along with the scientists, in fact more vital to our well-being as a nation, is the teaching of languages, law, music and the arts generally. These must be maintained and allowed to flourish if we are to have a society and culture worth preserving.

Our present arrangements for university financing are inadequate. The federal government is already giving substantial aid, but the problem has not been solved by any means. Either the provinces must receive enough money to meet this and other responsibilities under the dominion-provincial fiscal arrangements or more money must be obtained the hard way through direct means by the universities.

Under our constitution, education is a provincial responsibility. That division of power is appropriate today, as it seems to me our school system is best administered by provincial and local authorities. Nevertheless the federal government has for a long time shared the costs of vocational training without interference with the administration of the school system. In the same manner, a larger share of the cost of higher education, of professional training and of the liberal arts courses could be borne by the federal government without interfering with the operation of the private institutions.

Now I come to what hon. members might regard as a theme song, my criticism of the present method of distributing the Massey grants. As I have just stated, geography, not per capita equality, determined the allocation of the Hudson's Bay lands. Why has this population principle become so sacred now? If there were no other standard of measure, it might be acceptable, but on the contrary a perfectly fair and acceptable basis was devised for the post-war training of service personnel.

In the veterans' training program a uniform national rate per student was paid. This worked very well, gave the student freedom of choice as to the college he attended, and imposed no relative advantage on particular institutions. Compare the results of this per capita distribution to those of the Massey grants, and I shall cite only a few instances from the 1954-55 estimates. One province received $105.41 per student; another, $162.96; another, well over $400; while Nova Scotia received only $85.23, the lowest of all the provinces. We would urge that the Massey grants be distributed on the basis of a uniform national rate per student.

The dominion-provincial program providing allowances for disabled persons was a forward step in our social legislation. Yet seldom have we heard so much criticism of a well-intentioned measure. Last year, only a few months after the act came into force, I spoke in this house asking the government to look into some specific problems. These difficulties came to light very early and had been brought to my attention by interested people. I am sure other hon. members have had a great many complaints too.

Most of the difficulties arise out of the rather rigid regulations and their interpretation—perhaps more with the interpretation than the regulations. I shall refer to only some of them. For example, the disabled applicant who has been rejected should have the right of an appeal from the board's decision, a privilege enjoyed by those turned down for old age assistance and war veterans assistance. Arrested tuberculosis patients, paraplegics and similar cases should certainly have the same consideration.

The nature of the criticism suggests that an early review of the legislation and its application is desirable. It is good to know that a conference of federal and provincial welfare officials will be held in Ottawa soon to review the program. I trust, however, that their deliberations and the government's action will go beyond revisions aimed at improving only the present program of assistance to the totally disabled.

There is an old saying that half a loaf is better than none, but in this case it has not worked out. Speaking politically—which may possibly be poor politics—this has been a poor bet, partly because there are those who are cruel enough to exploit the misunderstanding and false hopes that were built up when the plan was first announced. However, the weakness of the program was foreseen by a group which is generally interested in seeing that the most effective measures to rehabilitate the disabled are incorporated in the act. In its brief on the subject of disability allowances, in May, 1954, the Canadian Welfare Council summed up the situation thus:

> While recognizing the need for disability allowances for totally and permanently disabled persons, we are strongly of the view that such allowances must be thought of in terms of their effect upon those who are not eligible as well as upon those who are eligible for benefit from them. When this is done the need for a broader program becomes at once clearly apparent . . .

In its outline of a comprehensive program the council recommended that maintenance for the disabled should be provided through, first, a disability allowance for the hard core of disabled persons who must be regarded as incapable of rehabilitation. This would include the totally disabled provided for in the 1954 act. Second, it recommended a rehabilitation allowance for those people for whom there is any hope of rehabilitation, regardless of how meagre that hope may be, to provide maintenance during the whole process of rehabilitation similar to that now offered during retraining under schedule R of the Canadian vocational training act. Third, it recommended maintenance for those partially disabled who are not eligible for either of the above programs through public assistance provided by the province or local authority.

The weakness in the present program arises, I suggest, from the gap, the absence of assistance for the people who are not totally and permanently disabled and for whom there is a chance of rehabilitation. I would urge the minister, who is always thoughtful and co-operative, to consider carefully the need for more flexibility in the regulations and the additional provision for maintenance during rehabilitation for those who may benefit from it.

May I add that some advocates of changes in welfare programs have suggested that when amendments are being made to one particular piece of welfare legislation an across the board survey should be made which would embrace war veterans allowances and assistance and legislation that has been enacted for the benefit of the blind, which in the latter case would cover the appeal now being made by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind whereby a specific allowance free from the means test would be granted to all blind adults to cover the costs of guiding and other essential expenses peculiar to blindness.

With regard to national health insurance, much progress has been made in building up facilities and in the training of personnel. As we have talked at length about this before, I now have only one thing to add. Let us get on with further preparations as quickly as possible, and let us relax our demands on the provinces, for some of them just have not the resources for such a huge undertaking.

Among the major pieces of legislation to come before us this session is the proposed revision of the Dominion Succession Duty Act. Without going into detail, which would be more appropriate when the act is under consideration, I should like to draw attention to certain general provisions which seem to me to be unfair. First, I should like to recommend that in the case of a widow up to $50,000 of her husband's estate be a true exemption and not just an exemption that excludes from taxation estates under $50,000. At present if an estate is $50,000 or under no tax is levied, but if it is even one dollar over that amount the tax is levied on the entire estate.

A second objection to the present law is that when a widow has a survivor's pension or a life interest in an estate full succession duties, assuming normal life span, must be paid within four years in equal instalments.

This may mean that the widow pays taxes on income she never receives if she dies before her allotted span of years. It amounts to double or triple taxation in any event, income tax on the original earnings, estate tax and then tax on the widow's income if she lives to receive the income.

A lot of these inequities would not be so severe if the wife were viewed as a married partner. It has been recommended that one-half of a husband's estate should pass on to his widow free of duties. This seems to me a fair proposition provided a reasonable limit be fixed. I realize that there are many who are not so well off financially that they need worry about estate duties. In some cases when a man dies in his active working years some assistance could be given on the basis of unclaimed benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I ask the minister if consideration could be given to paying the unemployment benefits, to which a worker would have been entitled had he lived, to the widow and children.

Another matter of a similar nature relates to the payment of war veterans allowance and assistance. Those veterans of the first war who for one reason or another, in many cases not of their own doing, served in England but not in France or another theatre of war should be eligible for benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act. These men and women, particularly of the early contingents, the first and second contingents, soldiered under great difficulties. They had to contend with mud, slush, cold, disease, veritably the conditions of the trenches. Anyone who was stationed in the early war years at Salisbury Plains, as the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) probably was, Westenhanger or Moore Plain, came home full of rheumatism, arthritis and allied diseases. They served under physical conditions as bad as if not worse than those which prevailed in England during the second world war and are, I suggest, entitled to the same consideration.

The constituency of Halifax which I have the honour to represent is of more than ordinary importance to the nation. The evidence of this is found in cold cash. Payments by the dominion government in lieu of taxation for 1955 were greatly increased and brought up more in line with the tax paid by the average citizen. Our high tax rate over the years can be attributed to the small share borne by the federal authorities, whose contributions were all out of proportion to the value received from the Halifax, Dartmouth and Halifax county taxpayers.

I am sure the increase in these payments pleased the citizens of Halifax and the municipalities very much. In addition, the national harbours board paid $75,000 in taxes to the city of Halifax. However, this payment is anything but in line with the tax they should pay in view of the fact that they control practically all the waterfront in Halifax. It was a great surprise to me that the payment was not at least double this amount, for it seems fantastic and all out of proportion for the national harbours board to be paying merely $75,000. In so doing they are adding to the burden of the individual taxpayer of Halifax, in particular the businessman who is already staggering under his tax load.

In spite of this shortchanging, the national harbours board is deserving of commendation for its endeavours in bringing the port of Halifax to a higher standard of efficiency each year. There is no doubt that this improvement has been a factor in the growth in the volume of business handled by the port. But more remains to be done, and I would urge that docking and handling facilities be maintained and extended to keep ahead of and create demand, as well as to meet any emergency such as war.

To give aid to the national harbours board and to assist in every way possible in promoting trade through our port, the city of Halifax has tried to do its part. About two years ago they organized the port of Halifax commission, the members all working without remuneration and doing a major job well in soliciting and directing traffic through our port and in advising the national harbours board management of the needs of a modern, efficient harbour.

In addition to our commission we also have a group of men, the finest in North America, whose aim is to assist the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) in his administration. I refer to the members of the Halifax longshoremen's association and other waterfront workers who efficiently load and unload ships in fair weather and foul, and give service far beyond the call of duty, thus expediting the business of the nation.

On several occasions in the past reference has been made to the volume of Canadian manufactured goods shipped through United States ports. One of the big-volume commodities using these channels is automobiles. As we all know the automobile industry is a highly protected one in Canada. Naturally we in Halifax would like to see this business come our way over Canadian railways.

We realize that there are many factors which determine the choice of a port of shipment and that the competition is very keen. Our facilities must be of a very high order and our reputation for service must be first rate if we are to compete with the big United States ports. Much depends upon our shipping companies and their employees, but they must have the very best port facilities with which to work. A port without adequate railway and air services is like the proverbial flower, "born to blush unseen".

Now that railway business has increased considerably, it is expected that the Canadian National Railways can afford express accommodation which is advanced beyond the village stage. The old wooden buildings constructed during the war of 1914-18, which serve as express sheds and offices, must be most inefficient for their operations. Certainly they give the appearance of makeshift arrangements, and I am sure they impose unnecessary burdens on the staff working there. They should be replaced by fireproof structures as early as possible. Condemned as a fire menace some years ago, their continued use must constitute a hazard to shippers, not to mention the effect on the morale of those employed.

This is an important year for Canada in the field of tariffs and trade. The GATT conference to take place shortly is of vital concern to those as dependent on exports as are we in Nova Scotia. It is to be hoped that the tariff gains of the last few years can be held and that our relative position can be improved.

Another conference to which we look with great interest is the British Caribbean conference to be held in London in the near future. Canada has a particular interest in the hoped-for federation of the British West Indies, for here is another embryo organization which is, in a sense, following in our footsteps in its growth toward a firmer political and economic foundation. We have an interest in this matter as it is the evolution within the commonwealth of another group of territories taking steps, by peaceful means, toward the control of their own affairs.

We have a very direct interest, too, in trade with this area. It is a natural market for some of our goods, and is of particular importance to the Atlantic provinces. Trade has been hampered not by lack of demand but by exchange difficulties in the whole sterling area. With federation, we can look for improvement in the economic position of the group of islands and for the growth of trade, a mutual advantage.

May I conclude by asking that a trade mission, whose specific aim would be to improve our trade in fish, be organized to go to the West Indies and to South America. I suggest that it might be organized along the lines of that successful mission headed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a year or so ago.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks may I be permitted, not only because it is the custom but because the parties concerned deserve it, to offer my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

As for the latter, his name will be added to the long list of able public representatives and he has truly shown that he is a very gifted speaker. I know that his future will be a brilliant one and I beg him to accept my best wishes for a most prosperous career.

As for the hon. member for Timiskaming, we had had the opportunity of hearing her previously in the house. We knew she had talent, but she has proven once again that her constituents have reason to be proud of electing her as their representative in this house. However, as has already been said, her part in this debate has been a happy event, because it is the first time that a woman has been called upon to move the address. I want to congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the members of his cabinet for their thoughtful move, thereby taking official note of the increasing participation of women in public affairs.

Before making certain requests of particular concern to the district I represent, I would like to draw attention to some of the main features of the speech from the throne which is now under consideration.

Last year a disaster had been forecast, just as it was tonight by the spokesman of the Social Credit party; I thought that Canada would again go through that period of great darkness that has left vivid memories in the minds of those who have gone through it or have heard about it. There are very few here tonight who have lived through that dark period.

According to the forecasts of the opposition, our economy was doomed, everything was going to ruin through the government's lack of foresight or because of the political party which, unfortunately for them, has now controlled the fortunes of this country for 20 years.

We had then heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) foretell, as he did today, these calamities; in spite of our present prosperity he tries again to dictate to us his policy.

We would ask the Leader of the Opposition a simple question. We would like to know what means are available to him to improve conditions further. We have put this same question every year since I have been a member of the house and yet I have never heard from the opposition a single suggestion likely to add, if this should prove possible, to the progress and prosperity achieved under the Liberal administrations which, one after the other for 20 years, have held power in this country.

For example, when it comes to helping the western farmers, as this government wants to, I ask the Leader of the Opposition to tell us by what other means we could help them. He says that there are many, but fails to mention any one in particular.

He also claims that our trade was not given the expansion which could reasonably have been expected and that we are not taking advantage of economic possibilities. I see him going, like former prime minister Mr. Bennett, with a load of t.n.t., to blast his way into commonwealth and other markets. We have already seen, on the other side of the house, some of those gallant champions of social and political economy but they have never pointed to any means likely to further improve present conditions.

Well, I remember that one day a member from the other side of the house told us: "We know of many ways of pulling the country out of its present depression, but we do not tell anybody, because we keep them for the hustings, for our political contests." Well, when people have good methods or know how we could further improve the situation, I think it is high treason against the nation if they do not make it their duty to show these methods to their colleagues in this house. However, we know only too well that the hon. members across the way have no suggestions to offer; they can only look enviously at the achievements of the party to which I have the honour and the advantage to belong and in which Canadians at large put their trust these last 20 years.

We will be asked to come to the assistance of the western farmers. Well, this shows once more that, in spite of what can be said in certain circles—certain circles which, by the way, are growing ever more restricted—of the people of Quebec and of those who represent them, our fellow citizens will have noticed once more that we are not confined in our thinking to our own immediate surroundings, that there is nothing jingoistic about us, but that we are part of the great Canadian people, and that, as citizens of Quebec, we realize that we must help every part of the country which depends upon us to emerge from a difficult situation. Still, it is the Liberal party which has national unity as its aim. It is to this party, which some people are attempting to condemn, that those farmers who keep complaining, in spite of the very generous treatment they have received, will possibly owe their escape from bankruptcy this year or in years to come.

Last year we also heard the opposition, in plaintive tones and shedding many a crocodile tear—tears to which the hon. representative of the Social Credit party referred to a moment ago—harp regretfully on the theme of unemployment. I represent an electoral riding with a population made up of workers in the proportion of about 85 per cent, and I too was sorry last year that so many people were jobless. I belong to a family of 14 children, and my father was a worker. I therefore have a fellow-feeling for the workingman and I too was saddened by the plight of some families in the city where I live. This year, things took a turn for the better, but the situation is not yet what it should be.

I hope that one day things will settle in such a way that we shall be able in all seasons to guarantee work to those who are able to supply it. However, there again the government, mindful of the welfare of the country and especially of the labouring class, took steps to convince some industries to carry out works in winter rather than in other seasons because it is then that the majority of labourers are out of work. This attempt on the part of the government has had the result of greatly reducing the number of unemployed this year. If we compare the situation as it is today with that of years past, even if there are still a great many jobless, we note that never have workers had so much work. The situation today, even if there are still too many unemployed, is different from what it was 25 years ago, when, in thousands of homes, not a single person had a job, when neither the father nor the older children who were able to work could find employment.

That was real unemployment, when the whole family was out of a job. Today, you may, no doubt, see the father or one of the children out of work but there is always someone to bring home his earnings. Never have there been so many people with jobs. Moreover, there is no more of that anxiety that was felt by the workers during those periods to which I have referred. No longer are they afraid of not having enough to eat. All this is due to the social measures brought about by the Liberal government.

Today, the unemployed man has sons and daughters in gainful occupation. When he himself is unable to work, he can benefit from unemployment insurance, family allowances, and when he reaches a certain age, the old age pension.

Those are social measures which have not always been welcomed by our opponents. As a matter of fact, they have opposed them at all times.

Today, when a member of a family is unable to work, he may draw certain benefits which he did not receive when our friends opposite were handling this nation's business.

I would like to express my heartfelt appreciation to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) for the special consideration he gave to the case submitted to him by the stevedores of Montreal and elsewhere who wanted to be treated like any other worker. They had been classified as seasonal workers; I note, however, that the government agreed to the humble request of the member for St. Mary. As a matter of fact, I conferred with the Minister of Labour and the administrators of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am not saying that I alone was responsible for this result; I am pointing out that I am proud to have taken part in this effort. I am happy to thank the Minister of Labour on behalf of those workers who were really counting on these benefits in order to live through a period when they have much difficulty in finding work. For that matter, it is quite legitimate since I do not believe the stevedore's job is more seasonal than that of the construction worker, for instance, who does not work for a greater number of days during a year than a longshoreman in the Montreal harbour or elsewhere.

In any event, the Minister of Labour met the request of that class of workers and I am quite happy to have been in a position to contribute myself to securing the support of the Minister to that point of view. It is a further step taken by the Liberal party for the workers.

Now I shall touch on the federal provincial relations in the realm of taxation.

We already took cognizance of the offers made by the federal government. The provinces concerned will be studying them. Is there one member in this house, no matter where he sits, who is not willing to pay tribute to our great statesman, the present Prime Minister, who presided with extraordinary diplomacy over the sittings when the thorny problem of the distribution of revenue among the provinces was debated. Let us congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister for the manner in which he conducted those talks. I also congratulate all the provincial premiers although I do not know them all—I know one of them—who maintained the atmosphere that should prevail in such circumstances. We can therefore hope that the problem will be settled to the satisfaction of all concerned.

Once again I wish to stress the generosity or the liberality—those terms are synonymous and they go well with the Liberal party—of the federal government's share in the construction of the trans-Canada highway, to which the federal government contributes 90 per cent. I need not analyse the intentions of the government of my province but, as a citizen of that province and as a member of this parliament, I have reason to wonder what prevents my own province—of course, I am not speaking for the government but in my own name—from benefiting from that 90 per cent of the cost of construction of that highway which, as we know, is already built in some Canadian provinces. I therefore express the hope, without trying to dictate a policy to anyone, that my province will accept this generous offer. Very many things have been said in that connection. We have heard about autonomy. Would the province of Ontario have sold its autonomy by accepting this 90 per cent on the construction of the trans-Canada highway? Neither the premier of that province nor any member of the party opposite has uttered the least protest on account of that 90 per cent. None of them has said that this would jeopardize the autonomy of the province. If the autonomy of my province were threatened, I would be the first to rise and state publicly that I disagree with any government who would attempt to interfere with its autonomy. There are perhaps reasons that we do not understand for which the province of Quebec refuses to accept that 90 per cent share of the cost of construction of the trans-Canada highway; I do not want to make any insinuation. If I had to repeat everything that I have heard in this connection, I suppose that some people would be unhappy about it;

I think that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) would not like it very much.

We must also emphasize particularly the amendments which can be made to the housing act with respect to unsanitary dwellings.

Once more, and it is my duty to say so, I must say how sorry I am that the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal have not used the means put at their disposal in order to bring about slum clearance. I hope that they will avail themselves of the opportunity to do so offered them at this time by the extension of the provisions of the act and the increase in the amount of the subsidy. I would like to be allowed to offer a few suggestions along this line.

In my constituency there may be found homes which are really a menace to the health, if not to the morals of those who live there, especially the children. To my mind the problem has not been attacked in the proper way. The point is not so much to clear slums but, first and foremost—I repeat this once more—to find a way to provide, at a reasonable rent, sufficiently large homes for large families.

There is a project under discussion in Montreal at the present time. I do not know if it has been approved definitely. It may have been. I refer to the project bearing the name of a commissioner of the city of Montreal. It is proposed to clear out, in this particular district, a number of slums. On that point there is agreement. However, no solution is brought to the problem of large families, to sanitary and moral conditions, by building seven-storey tenements in a sector as unsanitary as the block bounded by St. Denis, St. Lawrence, De Montigny and Ontario streets. If this is the way to solve the slum problem, then, I do not know anything about it. Apartments will no doubt be cleaner, but will sanitary conditions be improved by crowding adults and children in a rather restricted sector? Just imagine the chore of the mother of the family lodging on the sixth or seventh floor. Just imagine the promiscuousness of all these people in the same building.

To my mind, the solution of the problem of healthy housing lies in a way—and it is possible under the present legislation—which would allow us to put a tenant, if it has to be so, or a home owner in a house of his own where he could breathe fresh air in surroundings where children can grow up properly. The plan is not without merit of course, but I do not favour the carrying out of such a plan for the solution of the slum clearance problem.

I hope once again—and I wonder why more has not been done so far—that the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal will go ahead, will make great strides, and as quickly as possible, to take advantage of that legislation which can materially improve the living conditions which are the lot of some people.

Now we all have noted, more specifically the member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), the fact that the government had decided women will receive equal pay for equal work. For 25 years I have been in public life and I have been advocating such a step, and that is the reason why last year I did not hesitate to support by my words and by my vote as well the motion which was then before the house.

This is what I said last year:

> My opinion is that there should be no discrimination in the treatment meted out to women or men. Human rights have already been discussed in this house. This question will be referred to again, and, in my opinion, we should give the women of our country equal pay for equal work.

Well, this measure has been included in the policy of the government, which recognizes that it has to be extended to the fields under its jurisdiction. I have been sponsoring a motion of this kind for the past 25 years, and I do not hesitate to express to the government my most sincere appreciation for its gesture in this instance.

Now, before referring to two questions, of which one at least is of particular interest to me, may I be allowed to add my congratulations to those already conveyed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) for the leading part he has played recently in the United Nations Organization. It is fortunate that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who cannot be everywhere at once, is able to choose a substitute, and one who fulfils his task very well indeed, probably because both are in such excellent agreement. As a matter of fact the foreign press is forever praising them. While again congratulating the Minister of National Health and Welfare for his recent participation in the United Nations discussions and the success he reaped there, I also indirectly congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has been able to build up an enviable reputation in his own sphere at home as well as throughout the world.

I do not know whether the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) will scold me—I doubt he will, though—but once more I want to draw his attention to the question of bridges, and more particularly the Jacques Cartier bridge. I must in the first place congratulate him for widening the carriage roads, and I hope both the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec will make the necessary improvements to the approaches at both ends of the bridge.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Are you talking about the Three Rivers bridge?

Mr. Dupuis: At Three Rivers, the second bridge is being rebuilt.

The Minister of Transport told me recently in a private conversation that Montreal will have a new bridge. I congratulate him on that. Unmistakably, that is imperative. It will be a toll bridge like certain bridges which were built after the Jacques Cartier bridge.

I must also put several questions on the order paper. I will not labour the point, but some people hold the view that we cannot do away with the toll on that bridge. Maybe we shall discuss the issue later on, but I do not have the time tonight; however, let us take for granted the toll will be maintained. I wonder if it would not be advisable to have standard rates for the whole island of Montreal. I think it would be advisable also to consider having a toll only on cars and not on their passengers. The reason for that suggestion is quite simple when we realize that 38,000 people use the Jacques Cartier bridge to go to work in Montreal, while some 10 or 15 years ago there were perhaps only 8,000 who used it, and that these workers, who cannot make a living in the small communities where they live, come to Montreal, the metropolis, to work and have to pay every day, besides their street car tickets, a toll on the car in which they sometimes ride free, but not always. In addition all the American tourists and many other travellers have to pay the tolls. In my opinion that should be abolished in order to do away as much as possible with the bothersome task of collecting tickets. I believe that the suggestion of collecting only for the automobile deserves special attention from the Minister of Transport and from the government.

Now, needless to say, in my humble opinion there are many reasons why the tolls should be abolished altogether. But on the other hand I do not know whether the province of Quebec, which is a party to the contract, would agree to change the contract, because I have been told that all the replies which should have been received from the provincial authorities on this matter of tolls have not yet been received.

There is another matter which I would like to mention but I am somewhat reluctant to do so, Mr. Speaker, not so much on account of the principle involved but because it might be said in certain quarters that I intend, through the following remarks, to raise a racial matter. I wish to draw the attention of this house and of the government —it is my duty to do so—to the fact that, in the matter of bilingualism, although great improvements have been achieved under the Liberal party, there is still much to be done, more particularly in the matter of telephone exchanges.

I believe that the Bell Telephone Company should be able to provide operators who speak English and French equally well in order to avoid trouble to people who do not speak English and who, sometimes, are unable to reach those to whom they want to speak. For long distance calls, one is asked to wait for a French-speaking operator, which adds to the delay in putting the call through. Ottawa, which boasts of being an intelligent city, a practical, intellectual city, all of which is quite true—and it is quite true and I am not speaking of the quality of the administrators because I do not know them.

An hon. Member: Do you mean Charlotte?

Mr. Dupuis: I only know her by name. I have heard various things about her. In any event I have nothing to add. I might leave that to one of my colleagues with whom she has had some differences of opinion on certain occasions.

But Ottawa, which fancies itself to be an intelligent city and which, in fact, is a practical, intellectual and intelligent community, should understand that it is in its interest, in a field like that of telephone communications, to see that its operators should at least speak the two official languages of this country.

I would like to give you a few amusing details. I have personally tried to make myself understood in French by pronouncing the names of certain French members sitting in this house—if I were to name them, you could see how easy it is to pronounce these names—but I was unable to get in touch with the person I wished to call up precisely because it was a French name. That is regrettable. However, I do not blame only the government and we certainly have no lesson to take from the other side of the house as regards bilingualism in official positions. However, there is room for considerable improvement in this situation. Thus a person from the country, who is not without intelligence but who cannot speak English, can in no way be put in touch with someone when telephoning to Ottawa because that person speaks only French. It seems to me that there is a gap that should be filled, which would add to the beneficent measures of a government which has reached near-perfection as regards wise administration.

I hope that my remarks will be taken in good part and given effect to by the officers of the Bell Telephone Company, which will enable them to ensure an excellent bilingual service in Ottawa, contributing at the same time to making it a more efficient one.

Since Mr. Speaker is now in the chair, I conclude my remarks by extending to him my best wishes for the new year, as I have not yet had an opportunity of meeting him personally, due to the fact that other occupations are now taking all my time. Some of you know what I mean. At the same time, he will allow me to emphasize his fairmindedness and his vast knowledge, and the way he discharges his duties, which make him one of the greatest of the House of Commons Speakers Canada has ever known.

As to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—having no portfolio to ask for myself, although I would not refuse one—he will allow me to extend to him publicly the tribute of the workers' representative of a Montreal constituency. I want to tell him how everybody admires his way of handling public business. First of all, he is one of the greatest Canadians we have ever known and, though I run the risk of repeating myself, I think that the best way to describe him is to say that he certainly is the greatest champion of national unity we have ever known.

Mr. Speaker: Before moving the adjournment, and as we have read in the papers that the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis) is getting married this coming Saturday, may I extend to him our sincere congratulations and ask him to convey our respects to his future wife. Our best wishes to both of them.

On motion of Mr. Robinson (Bruce) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Harris the house adjourned at 9.56 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 13, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR ACCELERATED DEPRECIATION ON FARM GRANARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the grain congestion and the necessary construction of farm storage facilities, has the minister given consideration to granting farmers accelerated depreciation for income tax purposes on farm granaries?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the government has given very serious and careful consideration to all the problems which have arisen in the grain trade.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When will the results of this consideration become known?

Mr. McCann: The best answer I can make to that question is a repetition of the answer given yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He said that the government's legislation program with respect to grain is on the order paper. He also said that if there is any further program, it will appear on the order paper.

IMMIGRATION

PROPOSED SIMPLIFICATION OF FORMALITIES—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would the minister tell the house whether the proposed simplification of formalities in the case of British immigrants coming to Canada referred to by his deputy minister, Mr. Laval Fortier, at a press conference in Canada House as reported in the French newspaper Le Droit, is intended for British immigrants only or whether these simplifications will be extended to all immigrants coming to Canada regardless of their original nationality?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not the hon. gentleman's advantage of having read the particular item in question. I think perhaps it would be wise for me to read it before I attempt to explain it.

FIRES

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION AND PREVENTIVE MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is any agency of the minister's department or of any other government department taking any measures, in co-operation with provincial and municipal agencies, to discover the cause of so many fires in homes and apartments, and to prevent the appalling loss of life in such fires? If so, what measures are being taken?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The division of building research of the national research council has a fire research section, the object of which is to investigate all aspects of fires with special reference to loss of life and the improvement of buildings with respect to fire hazards. The head of the section receives all second degree fire calls in the city of Ottawa, and therefore the national research council through its fire research section has studied all serious fires in the capital city in close co-operation with the Ottawa fire department during the last three or four years.

As the question suggests, the responsibility for fire prevention is a provincial matter under the British North America Act. The officer directly responsible is the fire marshal in the various provinces. The division to which I have referred works closely with the fire marshal and reports to him the results of their studies. In general, the division is working to eliminate fire hazards from Canadian homes and Canadian buildings. The difficulty at the moment is that these fires occur in the older houses and about all that the building research department can do is to call attention to the hazards in the home, the necessity for cleanliness, the necessity for having wiring checked, particularly if the wiring is old, and to ask that all precautions be taken.

I believe that as a result of the study we are moving toward a better class of fire-resistant building in newer construction both of homes and of other types of buildings.

Mr. Noseworthy: May I ask two questions of the Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the large number of children who have recently lost their lives in burning homes and apartments, and in view of the fact that many mothers left alone with small children have no knowledge of what to do in case of fire, will the minister consider the advisability of including with the children's allowance cheques which go to the mothers of the country every month—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Noseworthy: —some suggestions prepared by experts to be followed in case of fire?

My second question is—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be good enough to allow the minister to reply to this already lengthy question before he puts his second question? May I tell him now that if the second one is of the same length and gives as much information as the first, perhaps he might now consider revising it.

Mr. Noseworthy: I shall wait for the minister's answer to the first one.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. gentleman gave me notice of his intention to ask this question yesterday and the matter that he asks about is going to receive our careful consideration. I may tell him that already our department of information has issued pamphlets in the thousands about fire prevention in co-operation with the Ontario fire marshal's office. I was in touch with the Ontario fire marshal yesterday, and I found that his office, under the direction of the attorney general of the province of Ontario, does distribute material somewhat along the lines suggested. However, the matter will receive careful attention.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO ALLOWANCES FOR VETERANS RESIDING OUTSIDE OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I have given his most capable parliamentary assistant verbal but unofficial notice of the question. In view of the minister's summer-long consideration of the question of amending the War Veterans Allowance Act to provide for an allowance to be paid to veterans who have to reside outside of Canada for health reasons, can he inform the house of the results of his summer's reflection and pondering on this question?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in view of the introductory remarks of the hon. member before he put his question, I am not sure that he should not have addressed it to my parliamentary assistant. However, I shall endeavour to answer him by saying that the question of paying war veterans allowance to a veteran residing outside of Canada has received, as he knows, consideration on numerous occasions. It was again given very careful study after the close of the last session. The decision has been reached that no amendment would be made at this time.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

QUEBEC POST OFFICE—ALLEGED DELAY IN COMMENCING CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister give the house the true reasons for the delay in commencing the construction of the new post office in the city of Quebec?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I am not aware of any unusual delays, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the hon. member would do well to have a personal chat with me and tell me what he has in mind.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I only want to know the reason for the delay in the commencement of the construction of the new post office in the city of Quebec.

Mr. Winters: There are no delays and no obstacles. We are progressing with the development of the plans and specifications.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has given favourable consideration to the suggestion that a select committee of the house be set up to inquire into Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, which was mentioned in the speech from the throne?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no decision reached to recommend to the house the establishment of a select committee to deal with that matter.

STORMS

INQUIRY AS TO REQUESTS FOR DISASTER RELIEF FOR MARITIME PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. I regret that I have not had the opportunity to give him notice, so perhaps he might take my question as notice. Has any request been received by the government from any of the maritime provincial governments for disaster relief to help alleviate hardship caused by the recent disastrous storms and floods in the maritime provinces?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, no request has been received from any of the maritime provinces, but I shall inquire whether any such request has been received by any of the departments.

TRADE

REVISION OF EMPIRE TRADE AGREEMENT AND GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Is the minister aware of a statement made by the Australian minister of trade and commerce recently, indicating some feeling that there has to be a revision of the empire trade agreement and also the general agreement on tariffs and trade? Has there been any official communication from the Australian government to the Canadian government in that regard? If so, is the matter likely to be the subject of further conferences or further communications?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I regret to say I have not seen the newspaper article in question.

Mr. Fleming: Two days ago.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Nor have I seen any official communication from the Australian government in that regard. If one has been received, no doubt the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will so advise. I have not seen it.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INTRODUCTION THIS SESSION OF LEGISLATION IMPLEMENTING ANY AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Will the government be prepared at this session to introduce legislation implementing any agreement reached between the federal government and the provinces respecting health insurance?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the federal and the provincial governments are to meet pursuant to a suggestion made by the Prime Minister of Canada at the conference which was held in this chamber on October 3. That conference set up a subcommittee consisting of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Finance and the provincial treasurers of the provinces. That committee is to meet on January 23 next. I would remind my hon. friend of the words of the premier of Ontario, that the only way to make progress in this matter is to recognize that co-operation between the provincial and the federal governments is essential. I would hope the hon. gentleman would agree with that view.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

CRASH AT MOOSE JAW IN 1954—STATEMENT AS TO SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members of the house will be interested to know that all the claims arising out of the death of passengers and crew of a T.C.A. North Star aircraft resulting from the collision between that aircraft and an R.C.A.F. Harvard aircraft near Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, on April 8, 1954, have now been settled.

I think hon. members will agree with me that it would not be desirable to make public the amounts paid to next of kin with respect to each of the 31 individual passengers and four members of the crew. I may say, however, that the total amount paid in settlement of these claims was slightly under one million dollars.

It has been impossible, in spite of the most careful and painstaking investigations by technical and legal experts of the Department of Transport, the Department of National Defence and Trans-Canada Air Lines, to ascertain responsibility for the accident.

As a result of the accident T.C.A. suffered a very heavy loss in the value of the plane. The government has therefore decided that it would be only fair and equitable for the crown to pay the third party claims. This the crown has done.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 12, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in commencing my remarks this morning may I join with those who have preceded me in offering a word of congratulation to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to His Excellency's speech. In so far as the hon. member for Timiskaming is concerned, may I say that I listened with interest to her references to her recent trip to Paris in connection with the NATO parliamentary association. I should like to say to you that the hon. member for Timiskaming, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) and Senator Fergusson, who were the lady members of the group that went from Canada, made a contribution to the deliberations of that conference which was referred to most favourably by all in attendance.

As to the seconder, may I say that the longer one is in the House of Commons the more one looks for that infusion of youth and ability which elections generally bring to the House of Commons. My mind goes back to 1945 when a group of brilliant young members, representative of all parties, entered this house. You, sir, were a member of that group. Two or three other members of that group have become members of the cabinet, while others have made important contributions. All this strengthens that concept of democracy without which the House of Commons cannot discharge its responsibilities.

I have read the speech from the throne and having read it I must say that one would almost think that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had placed in the hands of the Governor General a copy of the speeches delivered in 1929 and 1930. There was adulation for the prosperity which exists, along with a complete playing-down of the current agricultural situation in this country. Reading those speeches of 1929 and 1930 one realizes that the government of that day lived in the same dreamland which was apparent in the speech delivered the other day by His Excellency. He spoke of the expanding economy, but he played down the serious situation of agriculture in the country. At that time, however, the situation was different; generally speaking, agriculture was in a precarious position everywhere in the world. Today that is not a fact.

However, before I deal with the question of agriculture, which to one coming from a western constituency, or indeed from any constituency in Canada today, is a matter of paramount importance, there are one or two references I wish to make to matters which for some reason or other have not found their way into the speech from the throne.

One is in connection with the development of T.C.A. The Prime Minister yesterday afternoon mentioned that something must be brought about, or will be brought about in the future, whereby the federal and provincial authorities will join together in a national development policy. One of the first things that has to be considered in that connection is the transportation problem.

Some years ago—I think it was in 1953—the Canadian Pacific Air Lines asked for a permit from the transport board to operate a freight line throughout the northern section of Canada between Montreal, Winnipeg, Prince Albert, Edmonton and Vancouver. At that time the Prime Minister stated that the decision that was then made was not to be taken as the "perpetuation of monopoly conditions". We in the northern part of Saskatchewan—and the same applies generally in all the areas in the western provinces—are today denied air services because of the monopoly in effect that denies any competition to the T.C.A.

I should like to hear from the Prime Minister in that connection. What is going to be done? Is this era of monopoly centralization in the T.C.A. to continue? Has not the T.C.A. held for sufficiently long a position whereby it has been able to prevent competition? Is it not time that, in so far as freight deliveries are concerned in particular, competition should be permitted? As far as the passenger situation is concerned, competition could do no harm to the T.C.A.; it could only improve services.

The safety record of T.C.A.—and mention was made by the minister today of the tragic episode at Moose Jaw—has been good. But surely, when national development beyond anything ever before expected is immediately before us, the time has come for a reconsideration of the whole matter and for the Prime Minister to go even further than he went in 1953 when he said that the decision then made was not to be understood as a perpetuation of monopoly conditions.

What I have said in that connection represents my own views on this subject. I believe the problem of air transportation deserves serious consideration at this session of parliament. Certainly those of us who have had the privilege of travelling abroad and have seen something of the value of competition in other countries believe that the time has come for a reconsideration of this matter, so that such arrangements may be made as will permit competition with T.C.A. in this country.

Then there is another matter, which affects particularly those of us who live on interprovincial rivers. On a number of occasions, I have raised in this house the question of the seriousness of pollution and its effects on those who reside in urban centres on interprovincial rivers. The problem is with us again on the North Saskatchewan river, and I am asking the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to give consideration at this session of parliament to meeting it. This problem cannot be met by provincial co-operation, as we have found in the meetings that have taken place between the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It can only be met as it is met in the United States, by amendments of the criminal law to the end that wilful pollution shall indeed be an offence as against the state.

Those are the two problems I mentioned that particularly affect and are of interest not only to the constituency of Prince Albert but also to other areas in other parts of Canada; first the hampering and throttling effect of lack of competition to the T.C.A. and second to river pollution.

Coming to some of the matters that have already been dealt with, and I do not want to be repetitious, we on this side of the house are not given to panegyrics of our leader or paeans of praise which in some parts of this house apparently are a routine matter. As I listened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) yesterday reviewing the situation in this country, I could not but think how right he has been on many matters in the last several years. He has dealt with the wheat situation on several occasions. But to what effect? Well, we are met by those optimistic utterances to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has almost patent rights.

When we pictured the danger of accumulating surpluses, we were met by the argument, all is well. The farmers of this country were assured on more than one occasion by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there was nothing to fear. "Do not worry about these surpluses", he said in effect. "You will have none of them on your farms at the end of the present crop year". That is what he told the people of Canada, particularly those engaged in agriculture, last year. That is what he told the people of Canada in February, 1955, when this matter of piling up surpluses on the farms of the country was before the house. I think I ought to read what he said on that occasion. On the 18th of February, 1955, after dealing with the question of carryovers, he said this as found on page 1312 of Hansard:

> However, as I say our sales are very good. I can assure hon. members, I think with certainty—

There was authority; "with certainty", he said > —that before the crop year ends on July 31 any producer who has grain of any kind that he wishes to market will have had an opportunity of marketing it.

That was his statement in February, 1955. What has happened since to change that opinion? I will refer to the United States policy in a moment, but their policy as between February and July was such that it interfered but very little with wheat marketing anywhere in the world. Then the minister produced this, Mr. Speaker, which for optimism is indeed a howitzer. As found at page 1313 of Hansard he said:

> We will have a substantial carryover of wheat, but that wheat will all be in public storage.

"All!"

> Storage on the farm will no longer be a problem to western Canada.

That was in February of 1955. One hundred million answers to that false prophecy are to be found in the granaries of western Canada.

Then to return once more to the Leader of the Opposition, let me point out that he indicated over and over again from 1952 on that we were indeed losing our markets and in particular that we are losing the British market. On two or three occasions in this house motions were made to assure something in the nature of a commonwealth conference to provide for the building of a spirit of co-operation so that our markets within the commonwealth would not be lost. Again we were faced by the optimism and were told: Do not worry about it; we are in office; all is well with the world. That was the attitude.

Then came the serious situation in the prairie provinces. It could be seen coming all summer long. I refer to the inability of the farmer to market. We asked for cash advances. One of the first to ask for that assistance was the Leader of the Opposition, who so often is painted as being inimical to the west. Was he not right on the question of markets? No one can deny that he was. Was he not right when he demanded advances on farm-stored wheat? I should like to see any of the western members stand up and say that he was wrong. One of them made the statement that you cannot have advances because, if you do, you have the elevator men engaged in the money business. As a matter of fact, under the present system, today it is the elevator men who will have to collect for the banks or assure that the banks receive their payment.

The Prime Minister went west in September on the occasion of our jubilee celebration. When he returned to the east and he said he thought—and now I am generalizing as to his words, although I have the exact phraseology—that very few people in the west needed assistance, that all was well. I say this to the Prime Minister. Has the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) not told you about the meeting he attended in Marquette constituency? If you want an answer, ask him. Let him bring the message to Garcia. Has the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) not told you—I say this, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister—or let you in on the secret that the west is aroused and that almost unanimously the people are asking for cash advances? You say that the loan system will fill the bill and you are asking the farmer to pay 5 per cent on his earnings. You are asking the farmer to pay interest on his income. Is it any wonder that feeling is aroused in western Canada today? When action is asked for, energetic evasion of responsibility has become the first care of this government.

Must I prove to the government today what conditions are like? I am not going over the statistics that have already been placed before the house. We are in a serious position in the west and when we are in a serious position, it is only a matter of time until the effect will be felt everywhere in the dominion. Farm implement sales are down. Retail sales in Saskatchewan are lower than they have been for several years. The reason is simply this. While the farmers have done their job, they relied on the kind of humbug that is to be found in this speech of February 16 to which I have made reference. They relied on the humbug that markets would be found for their wheat, that they did not have to worry about farm storage, and they acted accordingly.

Here are some figures, Mr. Speaker, that indicate the net income of farmers in western Canada for the last three or four years, beginning in 1949. I could go back farther if anybody wanted me to do so.

Farm income on the Prairies

1949	810
1951	1,127
1952	1,082

In that period of time, as was mentioned yesterday by the leader of the C.C.F. party, the purchasing power of the dollar has gone down since the war by approximately 50 per cent. If you take that fact into consideration, you begin to realize something of the difficulties in which we find ourselves today in western Canada, in spite of the optimistic statements made by the various ministers of the crown.

I have a suggestion to make to the Prime Minister. If he wants to find out what the people of western Canada think of the cavalier treatment the west has received at the hands of this government in regard to cash advances, let him appoint one of those western members—and there are some ambitious ones—to the Senate and let us have a by-election. Then there will be an answer. If the Minister of Justice was not able to make the Prime Minister realize the situation the Minister of Mines and Technical surveys (Mr. Prudham) should; or if the Minister of Agriculture has not been able to convey it to the Prime Minister, the result of such a by-election would do so.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The result would not interest the Conservative party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact the government finds itself in the position that it cannot act. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce takes a stand, that stand binds the government. The only hope we have of the government's changing its attitude with regard to stored wheat is for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to go on another fishing trip. That is the one hope we have in western Canada today. The handling of this problem is a tragedy of errors; it is a chronic and tragic record of self-deception, optimism and arrogance. It is an attitude on the part of the government that constitutes a mockery of the public demand for action.

I want to say to the leader of the C.C.F. that the amendment moved yesterday is one that represents the attitude generally of the farmers in western Canada. I had hoped that it would not be tacked on to the amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne because that does not give my hon. friends from western Canada supporting the government a true opportunity of standing up and being counted. If that amendment had been made on going into supply, the people of western Canada, who ask for and demand cash advances, would have been able to find out, once and for all, where the Liberal members stand on this demand. Cash advances are asked for and demanded by them.

What is the over-all policy on agriculture? There was a conference of provincial ministers of agriculture last fall with the federal Minister of Agriculture. Was there an over-all future policy developed? I could not see it. Where is the unity in the government today? On the one hand you have the Minister of Trade and Commerce speaking in Calgary and making a statement in regard to competition by the United States of America. He said:

> We have told our United States friends quite frankly we regard some of their recent actions as detrimental not only to Canada's interests but to the interests of all countries including their own.

That is one minister. Then, we have the other minister, the Minister of Agriculture, commending Benson of the United States for his policy on the disposal of surplus agricultural products.

Mr. Gardiner: On everything but wheat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, another amended statement.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not an amended statement; that is the original statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government should have a department of ministerial muffs through which corrections in quotations and statements would be made. That is the first time there has been any circumlocution in regard to this question. The minister has never denied making the statement.

Mr. Gardiner: That is an absolutely false statement. I have set forth the correct statement at least once a week ever since.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now I understand why there have been so many messages to the press lately. This is one of the statements that the press has not been reporting then, although it has reported some of the other alterations, changes or alleged misquotations. It has not reported this one.

Mr. Gardiner: You apparently do not read your own local newspapers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That, of course, is no answer. I have here every correction, and it takes a big file to cover the Minister of Agriculture's corrections.

Then, again, the Minister of Agriculture has been speaking in favour of parity. He made a speech before the agricultural conference in Ottawa and he said this in regard to maintaining a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations:

> This, in our opinion, is more helpful than saying parity, which can mean many different things. You can call it parity or whatever you like.

Mr. Gardiner: That is correct.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then the Minister of Trade and Commerce, almost on the same day, speaking before the farmers' union of Alberta, said:

> We have seen the unpleasant results of parity pricing in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, all you have to do is pay your money and take your choice.

Mr. Gardiner: They are both the same if you read them. We are both opposed to the application of parity as in the United States.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There seems to be divided responsibility between the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Agriculture wants a certain kind of action and the Minister of Trade and Commerce strongly adheres, and continues to adhere, to his declarations of the past regardless of their application to the present.

The loan system that was evolved is a sham and a delusion. It is meaningless. Farmer after farmer comes to me and says, "I can borrow from the bank without that because I have the credit." Farmer after farmer is turned down by the banks in western Canada. Then, in addition to that, there is the other point that the farmers find themselves in a position of having to swallow the pill of paying interest on their earnings, paying interest on their year's work. Surely, Mr. Speaker, even at this late date the Prime Minister will give reconsideration to the declaration made yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce which can be interpreted as nothing else but placing a final stamp of disapproval on farm-stored grain.

What a mess! Granaries filled and farmers unable to sell. What an example of disorganization! The Leader of the Opposition said yesterday that there was 100 million bushels of available terminal space at the head of the lakes of the Pacific coast.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is not true, but you can repeat it again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have heard the minister say before that a statement was not true, only to have it proven true, as was the case with his statement on February 16 last.

Here are the figures. I simply take them from the grain statistics weekly issued by the dominion bureau of statistics, and they indicate that the amount of general storage in Canada today is approximately 600 million bushels, 598 million bushels.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is the nominal storage; you can discount that by 10 per cent.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister can make his speech later.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not like these phony statements being put on the record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no one in this house who has more often created a surplus of chaff than the minister. The dominion bureau of statistics grain statistics weekly, page 1, indicates that there is in storage in Canada 364 million bushels of wheat. Then there are other grains, oats, barley, rye, flax seed, etc., equal to 157,049,000 bushels. This makes a total of 521,809,000 bushels. Deducting the amount of available storage, that would leave over 100 million bushels still available and unused. How does this happen? It is because of another failure. They set up a transport controller who apparently does everything but control. The figures show that we are short of box cars.

I have available here the January 11 issue of a bureau of statistics bulletin which indicates that during the year 1955 the number of grain cars used decreased by some 31,000; grain products by some 4,900; coal went up; concentrates went up; gasoline and fuel oil; sand, gravel and crushed rock; iron ore some four times; lumber, timber and plywood; newsprint and various other commodities went up materially in their use of freight cars. Why cannot we in western Canada receive a fair and proper allotment? What is the reason? Is it because the hauling of wheat is not profitable? Is that the answer? Is it because some other commodities are more profitable? I pose these questions and I ask, is that not another example of the kind of thing that has caused the greatest emergency in western Canada's history. There is available space for storage which is unused because of the shortage of freight cars.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce himself, when he spoke in Edmonton to one of the organizations meeting there in the month of November, said we were 10,000 cars short in the western provinces. What is this but another example of what the Leader of the Opposition called yesterday the inertia of a government too long in power, disdainful of the wishes of the people and of the needs of the times?

I have only a few more minutes left, sir. I want to place before the government a number of suggestions that have come to me from farm representatives in western Canada. I do so with diffidence because of the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in July last when he said in effect that he did not listen to anything the opposition said. I am addressing these remarks to the Prime Minister. I ask him to realize that today the Canadian farmer on the whole is not sharing equitably or fairly in the national income with the other sections of the country. The prairie farmer is the worst off. Today his income has been cut down approximately 50 per cent from the high point of several years ago.

We are not asking for a handout. The western wheat farmer has not received handouts. We are asking for a measure of justice, not the dubious hopes that are to be found in a royal commission set up to determine Canada's economic position 25 years hence. What we want today is action. The fundamentally important thing is immediately to make available cash advances. Second, immediate action to make available the necessary box cars so that the farmers will be able to sell what they have to the extent of the available storage. Why can that not be granted?

These are two things for which we ask. They will not cost anybody anything, because if you get an advance on account of your wheat you cannot fool anybody. You cannot commit a fraud on anybody because you have no quota book, and there is no quota book for thieves.

The Leader of the Opposition yesterday mentioned the disposal of those portions of the surpluses of wheat that are a little better than feed. Is there not some way that that wheat can be removed from the main terminals? Can there not be co-operation brought about between the federal and the provincial authorities so that in the form of government guaranteed bank loans the eastern farmers would be encouraged to purchase their feed requirements in advance and thereby utilize storage space existing at the present time at the terminals and also on thousands of farms in western Canada? I can see nothing in the way of doing that. Today the farmers are throttled; they cannot sell anywhere except to the wheat board. Surely, the first thing is to do something to remove that surplus of unsaleable wheat; that is, unsaleable for human consumption.

I should now like to refer to the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), which were made when he was in Europe, to the effect that there was a possibility of trade in wheat with Russia. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) seemed to admit that something along that line was taking place, but he said he did not want to become involved in a discussion on wheat.

The NATO organization is being challenged today as never before. Is there any possibility of strengthening that organization in the interests of economic unity so that the various NATO countries will, in unity of purpose, set up something in the nature of a food bank, as advocated by the FAO, to the end that strategic quantities of durable farm products will be maintained in a central place? If that were done, the surpluses would be removed from the farms not by the destructive conditions of the 1930's but by the government and placed in a position where in the years ahead they might be utilized for the benefit of mankind.

What consideration has the government given to the United States plan to set up a soil bank program in that country? Today we have something similar under the P.F.R.A. under which submarginal lands are taken out of production. Is there not something inherently good in the United States plan which could be made available to Canada so that we could meet the problem with which we are faced today? We are going to have many surpluses in the future so long as technological skill and reasonable climatic conditions remain.

Is it not also time to give reconsideration to proceeding with the project which has received the continuing support of the Leader of the Opposition, namely, the Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project? The Secretary of State for External Affairs opened the new Canada dam in India, a dam that will irrigate 250,000 acres, with an ultimate objective of 600,000 acres. I believe in the Colombo plan and its extension; but surely, while we are engaged in such a plan in another country, we on the prairies in Canada and in the province of Saskatchewan have the right to ask whether the time has not come to give favourable consideration to the request of the western provinces to proceed with a similar project here. The Minister of Agriculture has often suggested, the building of this project so that when the days of famine come again in western Canada we shall be able, through its instrumentality, to diversify our agriculture and raise our economic level to that of some of the other provinces.

(Translation):

Mr. Gerard Legare (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, before I state my reasons for speaking today, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. We had already become familiar with the warm, convincing, voice of the hon. member for Timiskaming and we knew that she would open this debate with wise and judicious remarks. The new member for Bellechasse has revealed himself as a valuable asset for the right wing of the house and we are grateful to the electors of his constituency for sending to this parliament a young man full of talent, life and spirit.

Now that the house is called upon to study many measures of more or less immediate effects on the economic future of the country, I should like, at the beginning of this session, to emphasize the dangers which threaten us unless a better balance can be established between progress in industry and that of agriculture.

We have learned in the speech from the throne that parliament will be asked to enact legislation designed to help the farmers of western Canada. We easterners shall gladly do so, knowing that the effects of an economic upset in the prairie provinces would soon be felt out here.

However, if the west has its problems we also have our own, and even though they are not mentioned explicitly in the speech from the throne we expect that this parliament will continue its policy of agricultural price support. If we go back to 1944, the year when that legislation was enacted, we see that the avowed intention of the legislator was then to provide sufficient and steady revenues for the farmers during the period of transition from war to peace and—today this is the most important point—to seek to achieve a fair balance between the revenues of agriculture and those of other fields of endeavour.

This fair balance does not yet exist and all legislatures should try to achieve it. On the other hand, agriculture in Quebec and Ontario would have been depressed long ago if that legislation had not been passed 12 years ago.

A superficial examination of the problem might suggest that it is illogical to maintain price support in the case of butter for example when there seems to be overproduction. On going deeper into this problem, we find two things: if the support price goes down, production will immediately decrease so that it will no longer be sufficient for domestic consumption. We will then have to import butter. Then, too, the income of farmers will fall and they will quit the farm, which will lead the agricultural economy to bankruptcy.

And here I wish to congratulate the government on having found ways and means to dispose of the butter surpluses of the last two or three years without dislocating the market of allied countries. There has been criticism of our sales of butter to iron curtain countries at prices lower than those prevailing on our domestic market, but those who make this criticism seem to forget that the crux of the problem is to sell our butter without weakening our local marketing position and without affecting the support price.

The government can sell its surpluses to anybody, to Russia or communist China if need be, at any price it can obtain. That is a secondary matter. The point I wish to emphasize is this. The government should ensure the producer a return high enough to cover his costs of production. Our workers understand that the farmer needs money to buy the goods they themselves produce. They know also that, before the implementation of legislation regarding the support price of butter, they paid as much as 80 or 90 cents a pound for this product. I am therefore pleased to congratulate the government on its policy in this field and I urge it to give even closer consideration to the gap between the revenue of the farmer in Quebec and that of other classes of workers.

The dairy industry plays an important part in the economy of my constituency. Besides, the province of Quebec has the largest milk production of the whole country. This production has kept growing since 1950, from 4,830,000,000 to 5,575,000,000 pounds. A third of this production is sold as fluid milk and the rest is used in the manufacture of butter and cheese.

This single industry brings Quebec an annual return of some $170 million. Quebec is also the largest butter producer and last year manufactured close to 120 million pounds. In the production of cheese, it comes second, Ontario being first with 61,827,000 pounds in 1953 as compared with 13,600,000 pounds in Quebec.

[Mr. Legare.]

If the province of Quebec is the largest milk producer it is also the greatest consumer of this product. Daily consumption represents 1·06 pints per capita, whereas the average for the country is 0·86 pint. These few figures show the importance of that industry in the province of Quebec, and the necessity for the governments to give it their constant attention.

And as the overproduction of wheat in the western provinces will again be discussed at length during this session, I would also like to say, Mr. Speaker, that in part of my constituency, as well as in some of the neighbouring counties, last summer drought almost completely ruined the grain crops. This winter, a great many farmers who were able each year to sell a few hundred bushels of grain will have to buy $500, $1,000 or even $1,500 worth of grain. Such losses are beyond their means, and it is to be hoped that the Catholic farmers' union can get the provincial authorities to solve this problem if necessary with the help of federal authorities.

If the speech from the throne contained nothing of interest for the Leader of the Opposition, I was glad for my part to learn that the National Housing Act will be amended so as to provide for an increase of the amount and number of loans granted; that the bank for industrial development will be authorized to widen its field of action; that the Canadian farm loan board will be able to grant larger loans; and that a group of women workers will receive better pay.

On the other hand, we know that the government is trying to reduce winter unemployment, that it is planning to assist more unemployed and, finally, to improve all its services.

I want to seize this opportunity to congratulate the government for improving the air service to Quebec and in the eastern sector of my province. There has been increased activity at the airports of Mont Joli and Rimouski, in my riding, and this increased traffic should be maintained. Mont Joli has an airport of considerable importance which could be used more freely, and I would ask the Department of National Defence to consider the possibility of stationing a squadron there.

The people of Trois Pistoles were glad to hear that their town will get a public building and they hope to obtain the necessary votes this very session.

To conclude those few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the government, particularly the Department of Transport, to the need for a new icebreaker built to provide winter navigation between both shores of the St. Lawrence, east of Saguenay. No longer can water transportation of food and materials be suspended for three or four months each year. Industry is fast developing in this area of the province and the population there is likely to double within a few years.

Before long, mining operations and the development of new industrial communities, both on the north and on the south shores, will call for more powerful ferry boats designed to operate all the year round. But a fairly regular service can be maintained only if an icebreaker helps them from time to time. I know, for that matter, that recommendations to that effect will be made before the Gordon commission by some industries on the north shore.

In closing I congratulate the newly elected members in this house and I hope they will find in their new responsibilities the satisfaction arising from well-performed duty.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it would be easy for hon. members of the house to come to the conclusion that the present agricultural situation in this nation concerns only the farmers of the three prairie provinces, but I am afraid that that conclusion would not be correct. The agricultural crisis that exists in Canada today is one that faces agriculture from one end of the nation to the other. It is true that it may be more aggravated in the prairies, but nevertheless the crisis faces farmers in all provinces.

I hold in my hand the Economic Annalist, an official publication of the dominion bureau of statistics. The Economic Annalist takes the base period 1935-39 and indicates the prices of agricultural products as being equal to 100. Then for the same base period it indicates farmers' costs of production as also being 100. The latest index for prices of farm products is 225. Yet the index for farmers' costs of production has gone up since the late 1930's by an even greater amount. The cost of production index for agriculture today is 241. Thus according to the economists and statisticians of the federal government, as published in the Economic Annalist, this is a more adverse price-cost relationship than even in the late 1930's. In other words, prices for agricultural products across the country today in relation to the farmers' costs of production are even worse than they were in the late 1930's—worse today than when the Minister of Agriculture first took office in 1935.

The crisis in the prairies is not one that faces farmers only. As a matter of fact, it affects almost everyone in those three provinces. Certainly the businessmen who have advanced credit to the farmers have large amounts on their books and are as deeply concerned in solving this problem as are the farmers themselves. So the need to solve the agricultural crisis is important to the whole Canadian nation, to the people in all provinces, and to the businessmen and the farmers on the prairies in particular.

The crisis has not developed overnight. As a matter of fact, the trend has been apparent to a great many of us for a long time. We have seen sales of farm products going down. We have seen sales and exports of grain going down. We asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce time and time again, not only what the government was going to do to increase sales, but how he could explain the very serious deterioration in the sales of Canadian wheat. On 15th February, 1955, as shown on page 1157 of Hansard, he replied to a question of mine as follows:

> Mr. Argue: Am I to take it from the minister's statement that he is saying that export clearances of wheat during the present year will be greater than last year?
> Mr. Howe: Oh, yes, during the crop year, yes.

He stated that export clearances of Canadian wheat would be greater. As a matter of fact, they were down from a reduced figure of 255 million bushels the previous year to 251 million bushels last year. The export figure of 251 million bushels was down from an export figure of 385 million bushels two years before. Exports of coarse grains are also down. Two years ago Canada exported 119 million bushels of barley, and last year exports of barley were down to 77 million bushels. Two years ago we exported 65 million bushels of oats; last year exports of Canadian oats were down to just 22 million bushels. That is a very rapid falling off in Canadian sales of grain. Worse still, the trend is continuing.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that he has information that in recent weeks sales are up, but I have here the very latest export figures issued by the board of grain commissioners for the period 1st August, 1955 to 4th January, 1956. These show that the Canadian exports of wheat are down by a further substantial amount. They are down to only 76·2 million bushels in that period from 99·6 million bushels the previous year. In other words, while a year ago our exports of wheat were lower, and we were concerned about it, but in the crop year to date they are running 23½ per cent under last year. Unless there is an improvement in export sales for the balance of the crop year, at this rate we shall export in the present crop year less than 200 million bushels of Canadian wheat. With this huge surplus of wheat on hand even if we did not get a crop for the next three years, at this rate of selling Canadian wheat at the end of a three-year period we would still have a surplus on hand. That is the situation. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce able to comprehend it? Apparently not. As late as 28th March, 1955, he said:

> Our percentage of total sales has been reasonably good.

While the Minister of Trade and Commerce was away in April the Minister of Public Works was Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. I asked him what was happening to Canada's sales of wheat, and he had this to say, as shown on page 2940 of Hansard:

> The situation is that Canadian export sales in the present crop year have been substantially higher than during the last crop year.

He even went one step further. He said:

> Canada has been retaining her place in all her established markets and has indeed got an increased share in many of them.

That was what the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce said. On 13th May, 1955, the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson) asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question along the same lines, and the minister replied:

> There is no drop from last year in the sales of Canadian wheat.

How can we have confidence in the policy of the government? How can we have confidence in the statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? How can we have confidence in the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday that sales are improving, when every statement as to the sales made last year and since has been proven to be incorrect, since exports of Canadian wheat in the crop year just ended were even lower than the figure for the previous year, and exports in the current crop year are running 23½ per cent below last year as of 4th January, 1956?

That is not the only place where the forecasts were lamentably inaccurate. We were interested to know whether the policy the government was following with respect to the wheat board would be such as to get the grain off the farms. As late as 7th July, 1955, the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say as to the farmers' likely ability to deliver their grain before the end of the crop year. As shown on page 5803 of Hansard, he said:

> I am still confident that before the next crop starts to move we will have off the farms all the grain that producers now wish to deliver.

He was completely wrong. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, three weeks before the end of the crop year, with the experience he has in the grain business and with the officials he has in his department, surely must have had information that suggested that there would be a very large quantity of grain on the farms and it would be impossible for farmers at that late date to deliver all the grain they wished to sell before the new crop came on the market. As a matter of fact, at the end of the crop year there were approximately 100 million bushels of wheat alone in farmers' bins, and other grains totalled almost 100 million bushels. So the Minister of Trade and Commerce's forecast was rather inaccurate. He was upward of 200 million bushels out, three weeks before the statistics were compiled and produced. I ask him at that time, on the same day, whether the eight-bushel quota would be delivered. He said that there would be lots of box cars by that time, adding, "And then my hon. friend will have nothing to complain about."

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The eight bushel quota was delivered.

Mr. Nicholson: Not then.

Mr. Argue: Well, I asked if the eight bushel quota would be delivered before the end of the crop year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, it will not.

Mr. Argue: That is what I asked about and the minister said "Yes". I took it from the minister's answer that he was saying that the farmer would be able to market his eight bushel quota before the end of the crop year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They marketed it shortly after the end of the crop year.

Mr. Nicholson: Not before.

Mr. Argue: As recently as one month ago thousands of farmers in western Canada had yet to deliver their eight bushel quota.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I deny that. I will give you the figures.

Mr. Argue: The Star-Phœnix published a report in the first part of August to the effect that in northern Saskatchewan 60 per cent of the farmers had yet to deliver their eight bushel quota.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It was not true.

Mr. Argue: And I personally know farmers who a month ago had not yet delivered their eight bushel quota.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They had a permit to deliver it.

Mr. Argue: The minister says that they had a permit. Certainly they had a permit, but the elevators were full and the box cars were down in the United States or had disappeared some other place. There is a whole lot of difference between a permit to deliver and some place to put the grain when the farmer wishes to deliver it. I think the minister should take a lesson from what has happened in the last 12 months and not make statements that are inaccurate and will be proven inaccurate.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am particular from whom I take lessons.

Mr. Argue: Well, if the minister would take lessons from some members on this side of the house he would not be making the wrong statements he is making almost every time he refers to the grain situation.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I will make many more statements.

Mr. Argue: The minister has one answer to the problem. He has a resolution on the order paper whereby the national treasury will make certain payments for the carrying of stocks of grain in excess of 178 million bushels after the first of August of last year. I am glad that resolution is on the order paper. We will certainly support it but it will not meet the situation. As a matter of fact, by itself it will do very little to cope with the situation. I want to say to members of parliament outside the prairie provinces and to others who are already writing in some eastern papers: Do not think that the few millions of dollars that will be spent as a result of the passing of this legislation is something that is a handout to the prairie producers or in fact is something that will be of benefit to the prairie producers only.

The huge mountain of wheat, oats and barley in the prairie provinces that is undelivered, in the farmers' yards, stands as a threat to the agricultural industry from one end of this nation to the other unless something is done about it. The farmers of Ontario have a stake in what is done with the grain of western Canada. The resolution on the order paper now will never convince the prairie farmers that the government means to advance money on the grain and to buy the grain or that the farmers will be able to obtain an income from their year's work. However, it at least gives them some ray of encouragement that maybe after a long, long sleep the government is finally rousing and beginning to view dimly the magnitude of the problem.

If the farmers of western Canada should ever be convinced that they are not going to be able to sell their grain, and decide to feed it to livestock, livestock prices and prices for dairy products across the nation will collapse. They are falling now as a matter of fact because they are already below the selling floor that has been established under pork by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Suppose the prairie farmers should decide to do this. Suppose they should decide to take 10 per cent of the wheat surplus, maybe 100 million bushels of wheat being 10 per cent of the surplus last fall, 50 million bushels of oats, 10 per cent of that surplus, and 33 million bushels of barley, 10 per cent of that surplus, and feed this grain to livestock. If it were put into hogs there would be 1,800 million more pounds of pork produced in Canada this year than have ever been produced before. This is twice as much pork as the total quantity produced in Canada in 1954.

The Minister of Agriculture thinks he has a little trouble now with some surplus butter. He has also had a little surplus pork. But let the farmers on the prairie provinces decide that in order to get some money out of their grain they are going to have to feed it to hogs then the hog market will collapse. With the collapse of the market for pork, the market for beef will also collapse. If the prices of coarse grains collapse there will be an increase in the marketing of cream and butter and then the government's legislation may not be able to stand the strain of the increased quantities of dairy products that will be coming on the market.

Therefore I say that everyone in Canada should be supporting the very small step that is now being taken to deal with this problem. Once again I regret the policy is to pay something only to the elevator companies. Why does the government not start with the farmers? In this situation I believe the farmers are more important than the elevator companies and that if storage is to be paid to the elevator companies as will be the case, then storage should be paid on farm-stored grain. If you were to pay storage to the farmers, as could be done, on their surpluses of grain you should add a further clause to the resolution saying that you would pay storage on any surplus over 47 million bushels of wheat at August 1 which is the average carryover in the last 20-year period. Pay farm storage. It would give some encouragement to farmers to keep their grain on the farms in the expectation that they would be able to sell it instead of having them feed it to livestock with the most devastating results that are bound to follow.

What is the government doing? Net Canadian exports are now running less than 200 million bushels. The government is doing nothing for the farmers. I attended a great many farm meetings last fall, mass meetings called by farmers' union organizations and others.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I attended several meetings on the prairies myself.

Mr. Argue: I have yet to meet one farmer in western Canada, outside Liberal party politicians, who is in favour of the bank loan legislation. The farmers want advance payments. They want advance payments as of right. They want advance payments without interest. They think that after they have spent a year's effort on their farms and have produced a crop they should not have to pay interest on their cash asset.

The farmers of western Canada unanimously support cash advances on farm-stored grain, the very thing embodied in the amendment moved yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). We in the C.C.F. are not recent converts to the proposition that an advance of 75 per cent of the initial price should be paid on farm stored grain. On December 3, 1951, I moved exactly the same resolution in this house in precisely the same terms. If that resolution had been accepted by the government in 1951 and legislation placed on the statute books of the nation, we would not be facing the crisis in western Canada that we are facing at the present time.

What about these guaranteed bank loans? The farmer with thousands of bushels of wheat in his yard has to go cap in hand to the bank as a beggar and plead for a loan. He does not go there with any right to a loan. He does not go there with any right to a loan of even one dollar. What the banker will say to him that morning depends on how the banker feels. As related to me, the general practice the banks of western Canada are following is that first of all they ascertain whether or not the farmer has $3,000 worth of grain on his farm and then they say that half of the value of that grain is $1,500. They then find out if he has sold any grain, flax or anything else. Then they take from the $1,500 the value of the grain he has already sold since the first of August. Then they ask him if he owes any taxes and whether the municipality is collecting those taxes by way of seizure of proceeds at the elevators. They take the value of his unpaid taxes from the $1,500 and in other cases the bankers are saying to the farmers: "If you are in arrears to the bank already to the extent of $500, we will take that off too."

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They have no right to do that. They are not doing it.

Mr. Argue: The minister says they have no right to do that. I say to him that the banker has a right to say no to every farmer who walks into his office under this legislation, because the banker has all the rights and the farmer has none. Even the bankers do not like the legislation either. They think it is poor or loose banking practice for the minister to suggest what in their opinion may not be very good loans. The bankers are not happy about the situation. The elevator agents are not happy about it. The farmers wanted advances through the wheat board and the elevator system. They wanted to go to their elevator agent and to get an advance from the elevator agent and they wanted to get it without interest. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said: "Oh no, you cannot do it that way. After all, the elevator agents are not used to the banking business; they are not accustomed to making loans; they have not sufficient ability to make loans of this kind". But since the legislation was announced, a few weeks later, I noticed that apparently the elevator agents in western Canada in the meantime had acquired a great deal of ability because they are being held responsible for collecting the loans. From any experience that I have had, it is much easier to lend money than it is to collect it. While not having enough ability to make loans, the elevator agents in western Canada personally are being held responsible for sending the cash tickets to the bank whenever the farmer draws in a load of grain, if he has received one of these bank loans. The farmers in western Canada are unanimously opposed to this kind of legislation. It is wrong in principle. The farmer should not be obliged to pay interest on his own money. It is wrong that he should not be able to obtain some money as of right. Hence I again emphasize the necessity, even at this late date, of the government's bringing in legislation to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain.

The great job ahead is to move the grain finally. We cannot leave it on the farms indefinitely. We cannot leave it in our elevator systems indefinitely. After a number of years its value will deteriorate. No matter who is paying for it, the value of it will be eaten up in storage costs. In some of the annexes on the prairies—and I have seen many of them—there has been definite widespread spoilage. If we are going to maintain the value of our investment, we must move our grain. The private grain trade—the grain exchange—and all those opposed to the Canadian wheat board are saying to the western farmers: "Drop the price of wheat and it will move". I think that is a fallacy. I do not think that the dropping of the price of Canadian wheat by 25 cents a bushel or 50 cents a bushel would move any more of it. Perhaps it would not move even a bushel more. Why would it move any more wheat? Our wheat is already being offered at a low price. As a matter of fact, the wheat producers in Canada are now being paid the lowest price for wheat paid to producers anywhere in the world. The United States farmer gets $2.08 a bushel. The Argentine farmer gets $2.72 a bushel. The United Kingdom farmer gets $2.24 a bushel. The farmer in France gets $2.61 a bushel. The farmer in Switzerland gets over $4.00 a bushel, and up to $4.50 is paid to the farmer in Chile. Does anybody think that by dropping the price of Canadian wheat you are going to sell any more of it? If they think that, they are not acquainted with the facts.

What action does the government take? What does it do about the situation? It makes trips to Washington. That is about all it does. It goes down there and says to the United States government: "We do not like your policy; it is a give-away program and gifts are bad. Your program is doing us a great deal of harm". They complain. Yet the United States program is not just a give-away program. It has many other aspects. They accept local currency; they will make barter deals, long-term contracts and so forth. Giving away is only one small part of it. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce against giving wheat away, I wonder. I do not think so.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No; not to countries that need gifts of wheat.

Mr. Argue: He is not even against Canadian wheat being given away.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Trade and Commerce is so much in favour of Canadian wheat being given away that I am sure he was highly pleased in the four years between April, 1948 and March, 1952 when $490,700,000 worth of Canadian bread grains was given away. That was wonderful. Our wheat was being given away at the rate of $122½ million a year and the minister said, "It is wonderful. The Americans are paying for it". When our wheat was being given away under the Marshall plan in that four-year period, what did the government do? "Oh," they said, "we are selling Canadian wheat; you see we have a good Liberal government in Canada that has found markets for Canadian wheat and we are paying you in good hard Canadian dollars". It took all the credit for the United States give-away program which was giving Canadian wheat away and paying for it in United States dollars. Now the United States have decided that they are going to continue some gifts of wheat but when they give wheat away, they are going to give away some of their own wheat instead of going to another nation, buying wheat and giving it away. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other members of the government go down to Washington to talk to Mr. Benson and President Eisenhower, they shed gallons of crocodile tears about the United States give-away program, but they were perfectly happy to take credit for the United States give-away program from 1948 to 1952 when they were giving away Canadian wheat and paying for it in United States dollars.

In the present situation in the United States I think the United States policy is sensible. I think it is the only policy the United States government can follow at this time. Instead of going to Washington and saying to the Americans, "You are doing the wrong thing and you should stop it," I would suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he should say to them, "With regard to wheat you have a surplus problem and we have a surplus problem. We want to get together to adopt a common policy to solve our mutual problem and we are prepared to adopt even some of the measures that you have adopted since those measures are proving to be successful". These measures include accepting local currency and making barter deals.

The Canadian government has only one policy, namely cash on the line. Most nations in the world have not Canadian dollars; they have not our kind of money. Hence they are unable to buy the wheat we have to sell when we offer them wheat and accept only dollars in return. The other nations of the world are not doing that. The other nations of the world are willing to sell wheat on the various bases to which I have referred. The strange part of it is that these unorthodox methods are working for all the other exporting nations. For the crop year which just ended Canada was the only country of the four major exporting countries of the world that lost exports. Our exports dropped from 255 million bushels to 251 million bushels. United States exports went up from 211 million bushels to 276 million bushels. Argentine exports went up from 110 million bushels to 134 million bushels and Australian exports went up from 63 million bushels to 94 million bushels. That program of accepting local currency, of barter arrangements and gifts, is working for every other exporting country in the world and is helping them to increase their sales and pay their farmers good prices. Only the Canadian government is sitting back with a dog in the manger policy, unwilling to look at the situation with an open mind, unwilling to make any changes in policy, and rapidly losing Canada's position in the markets of the world. The fact that our sales have dropped and are dropping from 385 million bushels, export, in the year 1952-53, to a rate today running at less than 200 million bushels is appalling and a disgrace. I ask the government to undertake these further measures to see that Canadian sales and Canadian exports of wheat are improved before there is any further deterioration in the markets for Canadian wheat or any further deterioration in the position of agriculture in the west.

The government has a big budget. There is nearly $2 billion budget for defence. Let no one say there is no place to get the money to buy up the necessary surplus grain and send it to the nations of the world who need it. It is still true that two-thirds of the people of the world are undernourished. The food and agriculture organization reports make that statement. I feel we would be doing more to protect democracy, doing more to build good will if we were to concentrate on a program of economic assistance rather than concentrate almost wholly as we are now doing on the building of armaments. I should like to see a very large program of economic development and economic assistance. I should like to see the Canadian government establish a big fund to help develop the underdeveloped countries.

With our defence budget of $2 billion, with our gross national product running at over $26 billion, I am suggesting that an economic development fund of $1 billion would not be too high and would be a very small price to pay for the beneficial results that would flow in building good will for Canada, good will for democracy, good will for the west and in solving, as it would, the burdensome surplus of agricultural products. This situation is more serious on the prairies than it is in other parts of Canada. I ask the Prime Minister, I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I ask the other members of the cabinet to remember that the people in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are Canadians too and that they should be entitled to the same economic standard of living as that available to Canadians in other provinces.

I ask this government to come to the assistance now of its fellow Canadians in the three prairie provinces. If it does not do that, agriculture will deteriorate even further on the prairies and it will deteriorate further across Canada. It will be in danger of being crippled, perhaps permanently. I ask this government now, during this session, not to stand idly by any longer while the agricultural industry of this nation is being destroyed.

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): I should like first of all, Mr. Speaker, to offer my congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) has already made an excellent contribution to this house in so many respects, and we on this side of the house rejoice very much in having her as one of us. Her long experience in municipal and public affairs before she came to this house has made her a very valued member of parliament and one whose advice and assistance it is a privilege to share. She has an astute and an unusually clear and analytical mind. I am sure that she will make a very great contribution to public life.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) has already acquitted himself well in his maiden speech. He, too, has shown marked ability. I know he will be a worthy addition to this house and we are very happy to welcome him to this corner of the house.

Some weeks ago I was interviewed by officials of the Y.M. and Y.W.C.A. and the recreational association at Brantford respecting a study of the physical fitness of the young people of Canada. They drew to my attention certain newspaper articles, and articles in magazines, and told me what they knew from their own experience about the apparent rapid decline in physical fitness amongst our youth. I was very much interested, Mr. Speaker, in what these young men told me. I was sufficiently interested to read a little bit about this subject since I was approached and I decided I ought to bring the matter to the attention of the House of Commons at this time.

Last year a nation-wide survey was conducted by Sports College which is a non-profit organization devoted to educational services through research to provide information in the fields of sports, health and physical fitness. Sports College discovered that only one in six Canadians has even a minimum of physical fitness. The survey covered a sample group of some 51,000 Canadians from 14 to 50 years of age. It was found that only 13·2 per cent of Canadian males and only 27·2 per cent of females could pass simple tests in physical fitness. Ontario showed the lowest physical fitness standard of any province in Canada, where only 10·3 per cent passed the test. In British Columbia 34·8 per cent passed; 29·5 per cent in Manitoba and 14·8 per cent in Quebec. Sedentary workers had the lowest physical fitness rate of any vocational group and heavy physical workers the highest. Only 17·8 per cent of executives passed the tests and only 12 per cent of students.

It was found in the survey that the youth of Canada is decidedly unfit. Only 14 per cent passed the minimum tests. Rural people far outclassed city dwellers in fitness levels, and towns and villages were well ahead of the cities. But on the whole out of a total of 51,555 Canadians tested only 8,532 or 16·6 per cent passed the tests.

Now, I understand that by physical fitness is meant functional efficiency or ability adequate to handle daily work and recreational loads without undue fatigue and with sufficient reserve for physical emergencies and special stresses.

Being physically fit means being able to carry on comfortably the normal daily activities of life, with a reserve for any emergency that might arise and to be able to recuperate without undue effort.

For many reasons I feel that I am one of the last members in this house who should raise this matter, perhaps because of previous lack of knowledge of the subject on my part. Mr. Speaker, never having known what it was to be underweight at all, perhaps I should not embark on a subject of this kind. But just as a man who occasionally drinks too much might possibly be a good temperance lecturer, I decided to brave speaking on this particular subject.

The reason for our low standard of physical fitness is, of course, our high standard of living. The very same situation that exists in Canada today exists in the United States, and I imagine that their figures might be even a little worse than ours. They have alarmed the President of the United States, and before he was taken ill with this unfortunate heart attack he had called a meeting at Denver of recreational groups throughout the United States to advise him as to what to do to stem the tide of physical unfitness. However, my remarks today, Mr. Speaker, are nevertheless wholly confined to Canada.

The relatively poor showing made by Canadians at the British Empire games at Vancouver in the summer of 1954 served to focus attention on the state of physical fitness in Canada. I am told that many of our contestants at running, swimming and jumping were unable to finish the course and were among the first to give up. To contest successfully in these sports requires endurance and stamina to a marked degree, and endurance and stamina in persons are developed by physical fitness.

Physical fitness tests made in Europe show that European people are far ahead of Canadians. In tests made there only 8·7 per cent of European youngsters failed. In certain strength tests made in the United States 35·7 per cent of the children failed, but only 1·1 per cent of European youngsters failed in the same tests. In Austria and Switzerland, only ·5 per cent of the youngsters failed. I am satisfied that European nations have Canada badly beaten in the matter of physical fitness.

The local recreational leaders of Brantford emphasized to me that there was no over-all policy or leadership in the field of physical fitness. Individual athletic groups can work only among their own organizations, and I was told there was no over-all leadership and no over-all direction. In the past in Canada boys obtained sufficient exercise at home doing the chores, but in the mechanized age in which we live they do not get this type of exercise. The only exercise that they receive is exercise under supervision. As I see it, the problem is going to get worse instead of better in all age groups, particularly as the need for constructive use of leisure time becomes more and more important. The recreational directors federation of Ontario suggested a royal commission should investigate the state of physical fitness in Canada and the constructive use of leisure time. It was thought that a royal commission would take a broad view of the subject rather than look at the situation from the particular point of view of any sport. It might be well worth while for the government to consider such a matter.

I know that the government, and particularly the Department of National Health and Welfare, is not unaware of this situation regarding physical fitness. I have read the excellent speech of the parliamentary assistant to the minister which was made at the time of the British Empire games. In that speech he referred to many of the points which I have mentioned this morning.

Will you call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: If I appear to be reluctant to grant the hon. member's request it is because we all realize that in a debate where a time limit has been placed, we must save every minute.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Brown (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, before the one o'clock adjournment I was drawing the attention of hon. members to the state of physical fitness of the Canadian people, in particular the young people of Canada. I had given to the house some figures and statistics published in sports magazines and elsewhere which showed a surprising decline in the state of physical fitness among Canadians. These statistics show that we have a situation where one-sixth of the Canadian people only are what could be called physically fit.

I pointed out that fortunately one does not have to be an athlete to be physically fit but merely able to discharge the normal daily activities which are the lot of the average Canadian with a certain reserve for emergencies and special effort. It was found that Canadians sadly lagged behind the European nations in this regard, a situation which should not exist at all.

This is an Olympic year and I wonder how Canada will do at the Olympic games. I read the other day that Russia has four million men in training from which will be selected the teams to contest the Olympic games. Of course this is done to show the world what can be done by communism. Therefore physical fitness is an important matter, I believe a vitally important matter when one remembers the number of rejects for military service at the time of the last war on the ground of physical unfitness. I wonder what would be the number of rejects in a similar emergency today. Not only is this a matter of health, I believe it is also a matter of national defence and is truly a part of our fight for democracy.

That is why I believe that physical fitness is more than a provincial matter. Undoubtedly it is a provincial matter, but I believe it is also a national issue. No one regrets more than I that the National Physical Fitness Act was repealed last year in this house, apparently without protest. I take my full share of the blame for giving the impression abroad that we members of parliament were not interested. As a matter of fact I hope that some day we will have a new act because I believe this house is composed of members who are most interested. I believe that our Department of National Health and Welfare, headed by its outstanding minister, will take another look at the subject of physical fitness in Canada. If the figures which I have given today are correct, then I think we are faced with a rather disgraceful situation.

I do not think for one moment that the government will stand idly by; certainly the Department of National Health and Welfare will not stand idly by, nor will the members of this house stand idly by and allow the communist countries to train their youth in the way that they are or that they say they are, to be supermen, and then have us preside over what sports editors are calling a nation of jellyfish. I do not think that that situation will be permitted at all.

Before closing my remarks in English, and while on the subject of health in general, may I say also that many Liberal members of parliament are looking forward to federal participation in some sort of national health insurance scheme. Of course health insurance is also a provincial matter, but its standardization across the country needs the participation of the federal government and the federal parliament. We wish the dominion-provincial conference opening on January 23 every success. I am happy to note that the federal-provincial conference of October of last year set up a committee composed of ministers from all the governments in Canada to consider a health insurance program and that the work of the committee is well under way. Not only the people of Brantford but the people of Canada await the day when all Canadians will benefit from this long-anticipated social measure, to which I believe everyone will be willing to contribute.

Before resuming my seat I should like to say a few words in the beautiful language of my French-speaking colleagues with whom it is a great privilege to speak in this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, many of us who come from areas of Canada where English is the only language spoken look for a chance at least to try using the other official language of the country which is spoken by so many eminent members of this house. A vast majority of the population of Brantford speaks English, but I should not like to miss this opportunity of extending the regards of my constituents to their fellow citizens of the various parts of French-speaking Canada.

Some years ago, there were hardly any families in Brantford who knew French. At that time, my wife and I were meeting with a very small group of persons interested in learning that language. The group held no regular meetings but got together in the homes of the various members and spent charming and memorable evenings.

Today, the situation is entirely different. There are in Brantford quite a number of families that speak French and often we hear that language spoken on the street.

However, the greatest change occurred among the English-speaking people of Brantford. Over the last few years an impressive number of our people have shown a deep interest in the French language. My wife is a member of the university women's club. This club has a French conversation group which meets every Wednesday evening at the home of one of its many members. Meetings have even been held in my own home. At each of these meetings these ladies speak nothing but French. They read French books, carry on discussions in French and study the language with the competent assistance of a French teacher. All have become quite versed in French as they could well prove if they were allowed to speak in this house.

There are evening classes in French at the Collegiate Institute. These courses are naturally followed by adults. They are very successful and a large number of young and old people attend them.

What a change! I am told that what is happening in Brantford is happening throughout Ontario. That is a new and splendid development. It will contribute mightily to national unity. Still, as far as I have been able to see, the French and English-speaking people of this country have always been remarkably united. This new development, this new interest in the French language, will greatly assist us, I am sure, in understanding each other better than at any time throughout our long and happy history of common life in Canada.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, first may I congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Then may I turn my attention to what unquestionably is, in my opinion, one of the greatest problems confronting the Canadian nation at the present time, namely, the question of surplus wheat, which has already been dealt with most ably by several speakers who have preceded me.

In my opinion and, I believe, in the opinion of practically everyone in my constituency, the government's wheat policy is regrettably inadequate. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture ought to be downright ashamed of themselves for inflicting upon the splendid wheat growing communities of Canada treatment the like of which is not to be found in any other nation in the world today. Every other nation that even pretends to be enlightened indicates at least elementary knowledge of how to appreciate its wheat growers.

Take, for example, France. Last year France exported about 92 million bushels of wheat. On every bushel of it she paid about $1.30 a bushel as an export subsidy, which means that that wheat went on the world's markets at $1.30 a bushel cheaper than it would otherwise have gone on the markets. That is a most serious matter. That French wheat was soft wheat at that, while the Canadian wheat in the main is the finest wheat produced on the globe.

Take the United States. At about the end of November 1955 a farmer near Bismarck, North Dakota, raising 5,000 bushels of No. 1 northern wheat on 250 acres could obtain on every bushel of his entire crop, stored right on his farm, a government loan of $2.10 a bushel, receiving $10,500 for his 5,000 bushel crop. When that loan matures, he will be free to let the wheat go to the government as full repayment of the loan. Contrast that with the contemptible thing that was offered to the Canadian farmers—

Mr. Studer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes.

Mr. Studer: What commitments did that farmer at Bismarck have to make before he was eligible for the loan? He had to vote for and agree to a reduction in acreage. Is that what the hon. member recommends?

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member will let me finish my speech, he will not be getting up and making stupid remarks which he will probably have to retract later on. Don't let the hon. member run away with the idea that the hon. member for Lethbridge does not know wheat and the wheat situation just as well as he does.

Mr. Studer: Where do you sell your wheat?

Mr. Blackmore: As I was saying, that is the situation. It was no new thing in 1954. Every farmer in the United States then could put his grain into farm storage and receive $2.21 a bushel. At that time he did not have to make any commitments such as the hon. member for Swift Current infers. But the simple fact is that this was the situation which confronted the ordinary producer of wheat in the United States. Now, once the United States government takes that wheat into its possession, it may keep it or it may dispose of it through export subsidy, acceptance of foreign currencies, gifts or whatever other device may be found necessary to dispose of that wheat.

In Canada we have what amounts to a declaration from the Minister of Trade and Commerce that no such devices will be used to help dispose of Canadian wheat, even if the farmers in the three prairie provinces starve to death. That is not a very pleasant thing, but we have to face facts just as they are, take off the gloves and call aces aces and spades spades.

Mr. Studer: Then state the facts.

Mr. Blackmore: The system which the United States will use for disposing of its grain has been called by secretary of agriculture Benson "a friendly but vigorous and competitive basis" upon which to dispose of the wheat. We may not agree, but I do not know whether we, representing 16 million people, have any particular reason to disagree too strenuously with the opinions of a man who represents 165 million people and is quite as qualified a man to make pronouncements as is any man in Canada.

That was the situation in the United States in November, 1955. In Canada on the same date meanwhile, rear Regina, just across the border from Bismarck, North Dakota, a Canadian farmer, having raised on 250 acres of land 5,000 bushels of No. 3 wheat, which I am informed is comparable to United States No. 1 northern, would get, not $2.10 a bushel, but a miserable $1.22½ a bushel—if he could be allowed to market that wheat. Whereas his American cousin was sure he would be able to market his wheat, the Canadian had no idea when he would be able to market his wheat, but the Canadian farmer was allowed to market only 300 bushels, for which he would receive, after his year of work—as his wages for a job well done and thoroughly done, producing results of the best kind to be found in the world—not $10,500, but a contemptible $367.50. The Canadian has to hold 4,700 bushels of wheat on his farm stored unaided, entirely at his own expense and risk. To appreciate how serious that is, all a man needs to do is to be out on a farm, not living in engineering offices and all that kind of thing all his life. If storage opens up, the Canadian farmer may be able to sell up to eight bushels an acre or another 2,000 bushels for $2,230. That would bring his total sales for 1955 up to $2,597.50 while his United States neighbour has $10,500 with which to pay off his bills and prepare for another year of production.

Hardly anything more needs to be said, I believe, to impress upon our good friends in Ontario, Quebec and farther east and in British Columbia farther west how genuinely serious this thing is to the ordinary man trying to make a living and trying to make Canada grow through raising wheat. Into the bargain, the Canadian farmer has to provide storage for 2,700 bushels of unsold wheat on his farm, holding it for no one knows how long.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

It might be well to stop to comment for a minute or two on the importance of first-class storage. If storage is going to be suitable it must be constructed in such a way as to be able to turn aside all kinds of weather. It must be such that it can be aerated. It must be such that it will keep the birds and mice out, keep the cows out in case a mishap occurs, and the horses, the pigs and the chickens, which means that anyone who must put up temporary and inadequate shacks in which to store his grain is going to lose heavily. I am told that in the United States the storage is the very finest kind that can be provided.

I do not propose to go any further into the general aspects of the situation. I propose to canvass the prospects for the future of our Canadian farmers. Those prospects are far from rosy. We live in a world that is new and strange to us, a world that is full of change. If the whole nation works together, even then the risk and the danger will be sufficient. If one group of citizens has to work alone and absorb the impact of these changed conditions I think everyone must recognize the outrage that is being committed against those citizens who must so do.

We must note carefully and carefully appraise each of the many determining factors in the situation surrounding us. May I mention several of those and comment briefly on each one of them? There is in the world a vast amount of human need, as everyone in the house fully knows, wants of people who lack the money with which to buy. At least 1,400 million people go to bed hungry every night, all lacking money to buy. All of this need constitutes enormous potential markets. Everybody recognizes that those markets are available as soon as western statesmen get together and discover a suitable system of distribution.

The all-important thing is that we have not heard a word of western statesmen, if you can call them that, ever getting together and finding a suitable method of distribution. No matter what the FAO tells us is the condition, no matter how much pious longing is expressed, the simple fact is that when they come back here and report they report absolutely nothing concrete. We are still going on under the same system with which we tried to get along 50 years ago.

All round the earth the needs of humanity are increasing rapidly because, first, of the growth of population which is great and, second, the ever-expanding and rising standard of living made possible through scientific discovery. Not only should these 1,400 million people who go to bed hungry every night have their hunger appeased but they should have decent houses in which to live. They should be able to have refrigerators, deepfreezers, and up-to-date facilities for toilets and the like in the same way that we do. For certain it is being borne in on them that all men are brothers in this world, and if we do not behave as though we are brothers we are facing some real trouble before too long.

This state of affairs simply demands more and more production, not a limiting of production. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) referred to the reduction of acreage in the United States. I regret that, and I maintain that the United States in reducing their acreage instead of finding an adequate way in which to distribute their grain has committed an unethical act against the other nations of the world, and so shall we if we limit production. Of course we may be forced to do that because we just have not the plain common sense to do anything else, but we will not be discharging our responsibility if we do so.

There is an ever-increasing potential human demand, a demand in terms of need, for greater and greater production of all kinds of commodities by all peoples who have the resources with which to produce. There is implicit in what I have said a declaration of a responsibility resting upon us Canadians which we cannot escape and which we must discharge to our own children and grandchildren, a responsibility we simply must assume in the matter of producing all kinds of grain and especially wheat, food for the world.

The great Creator undoubtedly designed this vast land as a veritable ever normal granary for producing foods of all kinds. Imagine the inadequacy of a generation of Canadians who, because they have not sense enough to devise a way to distribute the goods, stop producing them and leave unused the great wheat-producing areas of our western plains and in other parts of the country for the production of almost every kind of human food. Food we must produce for the teeming millions unable to produce the grains they need.

We forget that we have here a vast area with very few people in it. Oh, we are aware of it in a general sort of way but right down inside ourselves we forget that because we possess this vast area with very few people, while there are areas where there are almost unbelievably many people crowded into a square mile, it becomes our duty to help produce food for those who are restricted in their resources.

The second general fact facing us is that many of our farmers—in fact all our farmers —will find their markets becoming less and less available largely because the nations that used to buy our wheat are finding their difficulties increasing which are making it—

Mr. MacDougall: I am sorry if I bothered the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. Blackmore: I hope the hon. member is finished with his conversation. No comment is necessary, I think. Many of the nations are finding the difficulties of international trade such that they do not dare risk trying to sell enough of the goods they can produce for enough foreign exchange to buy the wheat they need. These nations are feeling a more and more pressing urge to produce their own wheat. For example, in the period 1935-39 France imported an average of 2·5 million bushels annually. That was a chance for us to sell wheat. But last year she exported 92 million bushels, as I have indicated.

Why has France changed from an importer of wheat to an exporter of wheat? She has changed simply because she has discovered that no longer is there a certain market for most of the commodities which she has produced over the years. Consequently she has no assurance whatsoever that she is going to be able to buy on the world's markets the wheat she needs. Hence she subsidizes the production of wheat in her own country. As a result, in good years she gets a great surplus which she must dispose of, as occurred last year when she exported 92 million bushels at prices which we could not begin to compete with.

I have dealt with the factor which involves the truth that so many of the nations which used to import, because of their difficulties, have now begun to produce their own and consequently are exporting. I now come to the third factor that faces us. That factor is this. It seems improbable that in the foreseeable future France and other nations in similar circumstances will change the pattern of production upon which they are now engaged, especially in connection with wheat. Scientific developments and the trading practices of the United States and certain other nations will compel nations to endeavour to become, as far as possible, more and more self-sufficient, especially in respect of foodstuffs, for the sake of their own self-defence and security.

The United States herself has done and is doing that very thing. They will do this much as Canada has been doing in respect of rubber. Formerly, we produced no rubber in Canada. We bought our rubber from Malaya. We now in large measure produce our own rubber. Thus Malaya is deprived of the means of buying wheat from us and we are deprived of a market. Will anyone in this house, or would anyone in authority throughout this country, advocate that we discontinue the production of rubber in Canada and run the risk of being in a position such as that in which we found ourselves during the last war? Not a one.

So we are going to continue producing our own rubber. We are already producing much of our gas, oil and many other things that we need, and in due time we shall produce yet more and more of what we need so that we can be self-sufficient and shall not incur the danger of impossible adverse trade balances such as those we are now suffering from. This very tendency of various nations to produce within their own boundaries what they must have will prevent Canada herself from buying substantially more British goods and thus providing Britain with more Canadian dollars with which to purchase Canadian wheat.

I grow a little bit weary, Mr. Speaker, of listening to a good many of the members in the house railing at the government for inefficient methods of selling our wheat. I think many of those people who engage in that foolish talk would be well advised to give careful thought to what I have just been saying. It will not matter how much our government tries, or how many devices it uses to sell wheat in France; France for the present will not take our wheat any more. So it will be with a great many other nations that formerly were our markets for wheat.

The fourth factor of great importance is this. Wheat and grain production generally is likely to increase in areas having resources permitting grain production. Regardless of whether or not the United States limits acreage, whether we limit acreage or whether the world as a whole tries to limit acreage, we are going to have certain other considerations entering into the picture. For example, better varieties of grain are being discovered right along. Finer fertilizers are being perfected. Methods of insect control are being adopted as well as methods of weed control. Great improvements in machinery are taking place. Every one of those advances makes it possible, under ordinary conditions, to produce more grain on the same area of land. These factors are going to come into action still more in the future. We might as well face these facts rather than endeavour to live in a fool's paradise.

The fifth factor is this. Already embarrassing world supplies of wheat have been augmented by a 1955 world total production of 7,300 million bushels, compared with a 1945-49 average of 5,895 million bushels and a 1935-39 average of 6,085 million bushels. By reference to some of these figures of production we see that we have accumulated close to 1 billion bushels of surplus wheat in the world for 1955 alone. That does not indicate very much opportunity in the future for us to dispose of surpluses. Even if nations like France who formerly bought our wheat were to open their doors and again buy some of our wheat, we still should find nations like Australia, Argentina and others endeavouring to thrust their surpluses into the gap provided by France. This is another fact which we simply must recognize.

I come now to the sixth factor. The whole world at this moment waits under the shadow of unimaginable disaster through nuclear warfare. Everyone in the country realizes that fact. Would we not be wise to store up a quantity of the grain which we possess against a time when dangers which we have no way of avoiding might more or less wholly impair much of our land for production for two or three years? If such a disaster were to come upon our children, how improvident they must consider us to have been when they look back upon us and think of what we could have done for them, but did not do, just because we did not have the sense to do it.

Then there is the seventh factor. Up to this present moment the so-called free nations, whether through unpardonable ignorance, indifference, stupidity or mischievous influence, have stubbornly omitted to adopt any effective method of distribution either internally or internationally. I referred to that matter a moment ago. I thought the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) did very well last night in bringing to the attention of those who were in the house how utterly and contemptibly inadequate our financial thinking is when compared with our thinking in terms of producing and accomplishing all manner of things physically.

This matter just cannot be laughed off. We have grandchildren coming up and they will realize our utter inadequacy for the age in which we live. Why not do something about finding how to distribute? I am not insisting that we use the method I have in mind, the Social Credit system. Let anyone who thinks he can distribute by any other means bring his plan forward; let us have something done.

These seven factors all tend to show, as I see it, that the farmers have no justification for expecting any change in the near future. Meanwhile the grain of a great many of them is lying in elevators with mounting storage costs, which is another matter to which I believe far too little attention is given.

We come now to a possible solution of the difficulty. Once more I should like to commend those who have spoken before me. Everywhere in Canada most unfortunately, and in the west as well, there prevails a vigorous divergence of opinion as to what should be done about our wheat problem. Government spokesmen, and I suppose their paid agents on the C.B.C. radio stations, have been dinning into people's ears the fact that the United States made a terrible mistake by encouraging production, treating her farmers well and all that sort of thing. They have argued that she has run into surpluses, so let us not do that. But they never tell us what to do. Apparently what is in their minds is that the thing to do is to turn all our farmers out on the prairie and say, "Root, hog, or die."

May I now, in deference and humility, suggest what appears to me to be the only principles upon which a really satisfactory solution of the surplus wheat problem can be based. In offering these proposals may I state that I am speaking for myself and not necessarily for the Social Credit group in this house or the Social Credit movement throughout Canada. I do not dare say that I speak entirely for even my constituents, because I have not been able to consult any large percentage of them to make sure what they think. When I have talked with them I have found they seem to be utterly at sea. They know something ought to be done, but they expect somebody higher up to tell them what should be done.

Two Social Credit conventions in the Lethbridge riding in the fall of 1955 approved these proposals I am about to give. I think others would have done so had they had the opportunity. Here are the four proposals. The first is the provision of adequate facilities for storing wheat on each wheat growing farm. Without such provision it is rather unrealistic to talk about advances to farmers on farm-stored grain. Once we have adequate facilities that will turn the weather, turn the insects, turn the rodents, then we are able to proceed. That therefore is the first thing.

The second proposal is for immediate payment, not within the next five, six or seven months, on wheat stored on farms to cover full average costs of production plus a living allowance large enough to cover the average costs of carrying on. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that not less than 75 per cent of the price per bushel be paid. This was a good suggestion. My suggestion is probably just a little more flexible than that. I am not sure that 75 per cent of the price per bushel will cover the cost of production and give the producers sufficient to cover living costs. The hon. member's wording indicates that he feels as I do, about the matter.

My third proposal is provision for the payment of storage on farm-stored wheat, such payment to be made in kind. The object of this policy would be ultimately to return to the wheat grower possession of the wheat stored on his farm, strictly on condition that the wheat grower would keep such paid for and returned to the farmer grain off the market until market conditions became favourable.

That may sound strange, but what it actually means is this. If the government buys the wheat on a man's farm and pays him for it, then the government could either adopt the policy the United States apparently has been following of continuing to pay money for storage on that wheat or it could say to the farmer, "Now, every year we have our grain in your bin we will pay you part of the grain back so that in due time you will own the grain and you will own the storage in which the grain is cared for." I propose the latter alternative.

Quite obviously, just as soon as the farmer owns the grain and the storage facility in which the grain is stored, then it will become his responsibility and his pleasure to take care of the grain without having storage paid on it. It is my judgment that if the United States were to adopt that one principle they would remove from the shoulders of the government a burden which is crushing them financially and in other ways.

Now, the fourth proposal is that the financing of all phases of this farm storage plan should be done through the Bank of Canada. I am sure the government believes that the Bank of Canada is a very stable institution. It should be the institution through which Canada could make financially possible what is physically possible. I favour calling upon the Bank of Canada to do its job. If it cannot do its job, I want to know why it cannot. I believe it can if properly managed. Consequently, the money which would be advanced to the farmer to build this approved storage would come out of the Bank of Canada at an interest rate of not more than 1·5 per cent. The money to pay for the wheat would come out of the Bank of Canada.

In this case probably the government would have to borrow the money from the Bank of Canada and distribute it through the wheat board. There might be various technical means whereby the money could be issued to the farmers, but the original money would come out of the Bank of Canada and not from the Canadian taxpayers. This is the money which would go to pay for the wheat. To pay for the storage as I have already suggested the government would simply begin turning back to the farmer the wheat it had already bought from him, so that ultimately he would own the storage, he would own the wheat, he would have been paid for the stored wheat and would be in a position to carry on in the future. The only restriction he would be under would be that he could not sell that grain unless conditions warranted it. Probably he would be required to receive a permit from those who would be administering the whole wheat situation.

Of interest to those seeking a solution to the problem of the present glut of wheat in Canada will be a Canadian Press report of a statement on the subject issued by Premier Manning of Alberta. Let me read the report which appeared in the Lethbridge Herald of December 22, 1955. I am not sure I shall have time to read all of it. It is headed, "Two-Price System to Solve Glut—Manning's Plan", and is written by Phil Adler, Canadian Press staff writer:

Two methods of solving the problem of surplus grain on the prairies were suggested Wednesday by Premier E. C. Manning of Alberta.

He said in an interview that Canada should accept soft currency for wheat or negotiate new trade agreements by extending credit through the Bank of Canada.

The farm-born premier who grows grain and raises 110 head of cattle on his 300-acre farm near Edmonton also advocated establishment of a federal grain bank "to meet fluctuating conditions" and spoke in favour of a two-price system for wheat.

Mr. Manning, Social Credit premier of a province which produced 133,000,000 bushels of wheat this year, said the grain surplus was a long-range problem which cannot be solved by interim measures. But interim measures were necessary.

Soft currency should be accepted up to a "reasonable" amount, the amount depending on the economic status of the country concerned. He said convertibility of all the soft currency would not be necessary providing the agreement was made on "specific terms" which would give Canada "prior preferred rates" on the country's exports. Wider trade with other countries would result.

Write Off Advances

Dealing with extension of credit through the Bank of Canada, Mr. Manning said no one will suffer if credit advances were written off.

"The farmer will be paid in full for his grain," he said. "The Canadian economy will benefit from the farmer's spending."

The whole economy of the country was based on buoyant agriculture economy.

New trade agreements should vary from other contracts. Canada should take from the wheat-buying country any goods economically possible for the country to export, providing the goods would not disrupt Canadian trade.

Speaking of the intangible benefits of selling wheat to needy countries, Mr. Manning said "it will go a long way to break down conditions which cause communism."

He said costly war materials made from resources which cannot be replaced are written off whereas food comes from a source which continues to produce.

The premier said there was "strong justification" for a two-price system for wheat. The domestic price "should and can be controlled in fairness to economy" and the export price should be the best possible.

He also said the federal government "would be well advised" to establish a grain bank to meet fluctuating conditions caused by war, crop failure and the like.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

I do not pretend that Mr. Manning had in mind the proposals I have offered, but I think almost anyone will notice there is a sort of similarity between the two. In any event, Mr. Speaker, if we adopt a method of that sort we shall not be sitting by watching the farmers being driven off their land. That is exactly what is happening today. The government is supinely sitting here under the ivory towers while farmers with their grain in storage are having the price of that grain eaten up by storage rates until they have nothing left with which to discharge the responsibilities they have to enter into in respect of their farms, until the first thing we know one farmer moves out and another one moves in. In other words the farms are seized, not by the government but other people, some of those whom the government permits to do the job. Communism hardly does any worse than that.

Imagine the outrageous injustice. Men who have been on the land for 30, 40 or 50 years and have built up homes, find themselves driven from their homes not through any inefficiency on their part, or any imprudence whatsoever, but by a set of circumstances over which they could exercise no more control than they could over the sun; and all this is permitted by a government that pretends to be the friend of the farmers and pretends to be giving Canada good government.

While the suggestions I have outlined may not commend themselves to every hon. member, I think every hon. member will realize they have some chance of solving the problem which now confronts us.

Mr. A. M. Fraser (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to associate myself with all the previous speakers in extending very hearty congratulations to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) on the excellent quality of the speeches in which they moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I felt it was singularly appropriate that the hon. member for Timiskaming should move the address in reply to the speech from the throne in which the government indicated its intention to extend the principle of equal pay for equal work to women employed in all occupations under federal jurisdiction, a principle which she and the other women members of the house have consistently advocated.

I would like also to congratulate the Prime Minister and the cabinet on their positive and constructive approach to the problems which Canada is facing at home and abroad. This approach is fairly reflected in the policies outlined in the speech from the throne.

First, as regards external policy: Canada, I am sure we will all agree, has an enviable reputation in world affairs, thanks in large measure to the skill and devotion of our distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) whose constant efforts in the cause of peace have won for him the gratitude and admiration of the whole free world.

It is clear from the speech from the throne that the government is taking a realistic view of the dangers implicit in the international situation. As the speech states, the government remains "convinced of the need to maintain the defences of a free world as a deterrent to war."

In particular, I find myself in entire agreement with the government on the great importance which it attaches, and rightly, to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I have always regarded NATO as essential to the security of the Atlantic community. My conviction in that respect has been strengthened by the opportunity I had last year to see something of the work of NATO at first hand. Like the hon. member for Timiskaming, I was privileged to be one of the group of Canadian parliamentarians to attend the NATO parliamentary meetings in Paris last July. We had the great privilege of receiving briefings from Lord Ismay and other senior officials at Palais de Chaillot, and from General Gruenther, Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery and other high-ranking officers at SHAPE at Fontainebleau.

This authoritative exposition of the aims and methods of NATO convinced me that this great defensive organization has achieved a degree of military integration among free nations unprecedented in time of peace.

Our subsequent visit to the the Canadian army and air force bases in France and West Germany enabled us to see for ourselves the truly magnificent contribution which Canada is making to the NATO defence system. We all came away, I am sure, deeply impressed by the high morale of the Canadian forces and the excellence of their equipment. Not only were those service men and women helping to defend the frontiers of freedom in western Europe, but they were on the best of terms with the local people among whom they lived. They were Canadian ambassadors of good will, imparting a better understanding of the Canadian way of life and obtaining in return a fuller knowledge of Europe and its peoples, a knowledge and a sympathy which they will carry back with them to Canada. The long-run effects of this mutual understanding will be of incalculable value. Canada has every reason to be proud of her contribution to NATO.

The primary purpose of NATO is, of course, to deter aggression, but it is important that NATO be more than a military alliance. The NATO nations have developed a common defence policy, but if NATO is to continue strong, if it is to attain its full potentialities for good, this collective defence system must be buttressed by co-ordinated action to achieve economic expansion and greater social welfare.

This, I believe, is especially vital in the present phase of competitive coexistence when the struggle between the free world and the communist bloc is being waged more and more clearly in the economic field. Moreover, increased emphasis by the NATO countries on economic, social and cultural co-operation would go a long way to combat the pernicious propaganda of the communists that NATO is merely an aggressive alliance. I would therefore urge the government to continue and, indeed, intensify its efforts to persuade the other NATO governments to implement article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty.

As the speech from the throne so truly says, "security cannot rest on arms alone". The house, I am sure, will support the sincere and unremitting efforts which the government is making to improve international understanding, both by means of diplomatic negotiation and through the medium of the United Nations.

In particular we have all been thrilled by the initiative which Canada took at the recent session of the general assembly of the United Nations. And here, Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my warm admiration for the outstanding success achieved by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and the other members of the Canadian delegation. By their tireless efforts and patient negotiation 16 new member countries have been admitted to the United Nations. As a result that organization has become more truly representative of world opinion than ever before, a fact which cannot fail to increase its effectiveness, particularly in the economic and social fields. The admission of the new members was indeed a resounding victory for the cause of international co-operation.

The government has given further proof of its constructive approach to world problems by its decision to continue and to increase its contribution to the Colombo plan. This decision I am confident will have the wholehearted approval of this house. It is a decision inspired by a genuine desire to help the peoples of the economically undeveloped countries of Asia to help themselves to attain a higher standard of living. It is inspired also by enlightened self-interest, since experience has shown us that the more widespread prosperity is throughout the world the more prosperous we ourselves will be. It is inspired also by the belief that economic aid and technical assistance to the peoples of less developed countries will reduce the danger of war. The more healthy the economy of a country, the less likely it is to fall victim to external attack or internal subversion. Thus the Colombo plan and other similar projects diminish the area of potential conflict and thereby serve the cause of peace.

I turn now to some of the internal features of the speech from the throne. As it points out, the past year has on the whole been a prosperous one for Canada despite the serious marketing difficulties encountered by our great agricultural industry, particularly our wheat farmers. The year 1955 has been the most productive year in Canadian history. Our export trade has been greater than ever before. More Canadians have been gainfully employed than ever before. I am confident that the house and the country will derive great satisfaction from these striking proofs of the essential soundness and indeed the dynamic character of our economy.

I have very happy to be able to state that Newfoundland has shared in this prosperity. There were unfortunately some weak spots, particularly in certain sections of our fishing industry, but throughout Newfoundland as a whole the record economic level of 1954 was well maintained in 1955 and may even have been surpassed. Production in two of our basic industries, namely, forest products and mining, was at a record height. Construction operations continued at a highly satisfactory rate. The average level of personal income increased. The premier of Newfoundland, Hon. J. R. Smallwood, in his new year's message described the year just ended as the most prosperous in all our history.

In the riding of St. John's East, which I have the honour to represent in this house, economic conditions were very good indeed. At this point I would like to make a special reference to Bell island, the great iron mining centre which contributes so much to the economic stability of my riding. The year 1955 was a most important year in the history of the iron isle for it witnessed the completion of a new conveyor system and the erection of a new ore concentrator. These improvements represent the climax of the great mechanization program which the Dominion Wabana Ore company has been carrying out over the past several years. Since 1949 the company has spent a total of $19 million on the procurement and installation of the most modern equipment for the production, concentration and transportation of its product.

The company has firm contracts for the annual delivery of one million tons of iron ore to the United Kingdom and another one million tons to West Germany. Both contracts extend through 1961. Together with its deliveries to the Dosco steel plant at Sydney, Nova Scotia, these contracts provide Bell island with an assured annual market for three million tons of iron ore before concentration.

While I am on the subject of Bell island I should like to remind hon. members of the privations suffered by the 11,000 residents there in April of last year as a result of the prolonged ice blockade which cut them off from supplies from the mainland for a period of two weeks. That dangerous experience has demonstrated the urgent need for the construction of an airstrip on Bell island. I am happy to say that negotiations have been going on for some time among the federal government, the provincial government and Dominion Wabana Ore Limited for the construction of an airstrip. I trust that these negotiations will be pressed forward to a speedy and successful conclusion so that a recurrence of last year's isolation will be prevented.

I feel very strongly also that the time has now come for the erection of a federal public building at Bell island. Important federal functions are discharged there by three departments of our federal government, namely post office, customs and the Department of Transport. At present the officials of these departments have to do their work in the provincial public building in offices rented from the provincial government, offices which are quite inadequate to their needs. I would therefore urge most strongly that the government take immediate steps to remedy this situation by providing this great industrial community with a federal public buliding.

While I am on the subject of public buildings, I trust that the construction of the new customs building scheduled for St. John's will be proceeded with this year.

A few minutes ago I referred to the fact that 1955 was a good year for the people of Newfoundland. Nevertheless the average personal income of Newfoundlanders is still far below the Canadian national average. Indeed it amounts to only about half the national average, according to the submission of the government of the province to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. At page 122 the Newfoundland government stated that in St. John's proper there are 308 "condemnable" houses. It added, and I quote:

> These are shocking, run-down tenements in slum areas which should have been torn down long ago. There are another 350 to 400 houses which are only slightly better and which will be condemned when the "condemnable" houses are finally removed.

The submission points out that these figures are based on only a partial survey of the area within the city limits of St. John's. It estimates that in the whole of the St. John's area there are over 1,000 houses which should be condemned now. Hon. members will therefore readily understand why the people of St. John's will welcome the far-seeing amendments which the government is proposing to its great National Housing Act.

I wish also to congratulate the government on the arrangement it has proposed to the provincial governments for sharing the costs of assistance to those unemployed persons who are not eligible for unemployment insurance benefits and who are in need. Under this arrangement the federal government will assume half those costs after the number of unemployed reaches ·45 per cent of the population of a province. This is a constructive social measure and will be of great assistance to the provincial authorities in meeting the costs of unemployment relief. As the house knows, the provincial government of Newfoundland has already signed the draft agreement embodying this cost-sharing arrangement.

I welcome also the proposed amendments to the Trans-Canada Highway Act. The problem of communications has always been a very difficult one in Newfoundland because of the dispersal of its population. Good road communications are essential to the development of Newfoundland's natural resources and to the growth of its tourist industry. I am convinced that these proposed amendments will be of great value to Newfoundland, as they will be to the other provinces.

The full development of Newfoundland's natural resources requires social capital on a scale which the provincial government is unable to provide singlehanded. The provincial government has done very much and will continue to do its utmost to build up the public services which are a prerequisite to industrial development, but it needs the co-operation of the federal government. Moreover, the development of natural resources in Newfoundland, as in the other provinces, is unquestionably in the national interest of Canada as a whole.

It is my firm conviction, therefore, that the government of Canada should participate as fully as possible in public investment in Newfoundland, and thus contribute to her industrial development.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I naturally associate myself with those words which are always conventional and usually sincere, and in this case most sincere, in expressing congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is a difficult task for one to speak in this house on such an occasion. I know that the gracious lady who moved the address and the young man who seconded it both maintained the traditions that one expects of those performing that task, and this augurs well for their own future in parliament.

I am sure, too, that we all regret the fact that on this particular occasion the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the leader of the Social Credit party, is not in the house because of illness. I am sure we all hope that in the not too distant future he will be fully restored to health and back with us again.

The hon. member who has just preceded me has stated that the speech from the throne was a courageous approach to the problems confronting Canada. Overlooking any references to external affairs, with which one will not quarrel, if one can say that this speech is a courageous approach to internal problems then either we have no problems in Canada or the government does not have a solution to them, because there is very little in that speech having to do with our own domestic problems.

I was reminded of a statement I heard many years ago in a legislature a long way from here. A Liberal leader, who was criticizing vigorously a speech from the throne which had been brought down by a Conservative government, snorted and sniffed and finally said, "It was as dry as last year's birds' nests". I think that is as apt a description as one could find for this speech from the throne.

Last evening one of the hon. members from Halifax produced his own speech from the throne, in which he brought forward suggested solutions to many problems, none of which were mentioned in the speech from the throne. One appreciates that and welcomes it. The only thing that bothers one is the fact that members on that side occasionally have the courage to make these suggestions but, when the time comes to vote, they continue to vote for the government and vote against the very suggestions which they sometimes have advocated themselves. This does not add to one's hopes for the solution of some of those problems.

Last night the hon. member dealt with a problem to which he has referred on many occasions and to which I have also referred. I am going to mention it only briefly, but it is one that is becoming more important as the years go by. The question is the whole problem of university education in this country.

If time permitted—and if Mr. Speaker permitted, as I am sure he would not—I could put on record extensive quotations with respect to the problems confronting our universities today. I have one document here that contains statements by gentlemen who are not educationalists and not visionaries, but men such as Mr. Rhys Sale, the president of Ford of Canada, Mr. Douglas Ambridge, the president of Abitibi corporation, and Dr. Solandt, of the defence research board. All point out that we have not enough students attending university, and that of those who are attending, not enough are studying the sciences. In this country, we talk sometimes boastfully, or perhaps wishfully, of a population of 40 or 50 million which we shall attain in the not far distant future. Every one of these men says that if we are going to attain that increase or any part of that increase, we must develop, and emphasize the development of leadership to a far greater extent than we are doing today.

I do not wish to attach too much importance to the scientific field, because I think the humanities also have an important position and one which should be safeguarded. But I read last night a statement by the vice president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to the effect that in Russia two-thirds of the students in all the universities are studying applied science and engineering with direct reference to the nuclear world we are entering. Here in Canada less than 50 per cent are studying the sciences, including medicine.

Something must be done to assist the universities in carrying the load with which they are burdened. That problem applies particularly, as I have said before, to our own universities in the maritime provinces. There we have succeeded in maintaining a tradition and a culture—I think a significant one and one of which we are proud—which is virtually the only one of its type left in North America. It has been illustrated during the last few weeks by articles, which I hope hon. members have read, in Maclean's magazine, written by different Canadian authors, including Bruce Hutchison and Max Ferguson, dealing with our own particular culture. Perhaps the maritimes are the one place left in North America where we do not make a cult out of financial success itself, and we do not measure success by the size of a man's Cadillac car or by the number of garages a man has or whether he has two or three cars in his garage. The other night I read a magazine article by a leading educationalist in New Brunswick, who said that probably the maritimes were the only place left in North America where a clergyman receiving a salary of $3,000 a year and rendering real service to the community would probably get greater recognition than the president of a huge corporation drawing perhaps $500,000 a year.

If we have succeeded in maintaining that standard—and I believe it is worth while maintaining—our universities have contributed much towards it. Our universities indigenous to our own soil, though rather small, have performed a yeoman service.

They find the pressures today even greater than before.

Without going into the figures, which I have put on the record at other times, I simply want to say again, Mr. Speaker, that I am disappointed there is no reference or suggestion in the speech from the throne of an amendment to the act which would provide for larger grants to universities in general and our own universities in particular. It is absolutely wrong, sir, that a financial system should be worked out under which the universities which need the most receive the least, and that is the situation with respect to our universities in the maritime provinces. The government has not dealt with that problem up to the present, and that is only one of many problems in the field of education and the social services to which I think some attention should have been paid.

In that connection, too, I want to mention the system introduced last year of pensions for crippled persons, which has not worked out satisfactorily and has created tremendous disappointment. I do not suppose there is one member of the house who has not in his constituency a score of people who have been refused a pension when by any law based on practicality they should have received it. The minister said yesterday he was proposing to call a conference. That is always an easy way to deal with things and to postpone them. I realize that this is a matter of provincial-federal co-operation and that a conference is necessary, but I do know the minister has received many protests during the year and I would have thought there would have been time to call that conference before now. In any event, we hope and urge that some action be taken in that connection before the house rises.

One could go on with omissions, but I do not propose to do that at the moment. The house will be glad to know, as has appeared in the newspapers, that the complaint I have made from time to time about the long delay in connection with the inauguration of the service now given by the Bluenose has finally been overcome and that the ferry is belatedly but I believe efficiently operating today between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor. I do not believe it could have been anticipated that it would be put in operation this fall. After all the long delays one would have thought every preparation would have been made, but certainly the accommodation at Yarmouth is of the most temporary nature. I know it is causing concern to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) right now, and I am quite certain that it was only due to the pressure of public opinion in the last month or two that the Bluenose was put in operation this fall. Otherwise it would have been delayed until next spring.

There is one point in connection with this matter that I want to mention. I refer to the rates which are being charged for the transportation of vehicles on the ferry. Some of us remember when the former minister of transport, Hon. Mr. Chevrier, spoke in such glowing and enthusiastic terms about this matter many years ago. At that time he emphasized the important part the ferry would play in the development of the economy of the maritimes, particularly the economy of Nova Scotia, in that our trucks could carry fish and agricultural products with a relatively short haul into the markets of New England and central Canada. That has been expected. Most of us thought that really would be the greatest contribution the ferry would make other than its contribution to the tourist industry, which was an obvious one.

Now, however, we find that the rates which it is proposed to charge are so high that according to the truck men they are virtually prohibitive. Instead of enabling us to deliver more goods more cheaply and efficiently to the markets of Ontario, Quebec and New England, the rates are such that we cannot augment these deliveries and we are virtually bound by the scale of costs which is now in vogue. I realize it is the responsibility of the minister and the C.N.R. to make the ferry operate as efficiently as possible and also not to lose too much money in connection with its operation. But that, sir, is only one factor in the situation. The boat was not built to operate as a financial success. The boat was built—incidentally, the province of Nova Scotia contributed $1,500,000 toward its capital cost—to assist industry in the maritimes in general and in Nova Scotia in particular. It is not going to render that service if the present rates are maintained.

It is true there has been an intimation that the matter is under study and review. Naturally these rates are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians. They are not inscribed on stone and it should be possible, and I say it is necessary, to have them revised. Seasonal rates are not an unknown factor to the Department of Transport or in ratemaking generally in Canada. You have seasonal rates effective in so far as transportation on the great lakes is concerned. During the tourist season when the boat will be taxed to capacity one rate could be charged because at that particular season there would be very little movement of products, but in the middle of September when the tourist trade rapidly falls off I think an adjustment in rates would not only be in the interests of industry in Nova Scotia but also in the interests of the boat itself, because you could then build up traffic in trucks which would be carried and bring about increased revenue which otherwise would be lost.

I raise this matter now because I hope that by the time the minister's estimates come before the house some time this spring he will be in a position to tell us that the rates have been revised. If he does not, I give him fair warning that I intend to urge as strongly as possible that he take action on that score before his estimates go through.

Dealing with shipping for a moment longer, there is one other matter to which I want to refer. I have mentioned it before, and again there is no reference to anything such as this in the speech from the throne. I think it is important. I refer to the necessity of a better and more efficient steamship service out of maritime ports to the Caribbean and South America. We in the maritimes have one asset which is not duplicated anywhere in Canada except in British Columbia. That is our maritime position, our export position. Nova Scotia sticks out like a wharf into the North Atlantic and, as we know, the movement of freight by water is the most economical method.

I know we have a potential market for Nova Scotia, maritime and Canadian products generally in the markets of the Caribbean and South America, and this problem is not being met. Let me give one little graphic illustration as to just how we were confronted with the problem this year. I think the house knows—I am going to refer to it in a moment —that this fall we were confronted with a crisis with respect to apples, as were other fruit growing districts in Canada. It was possible to market only a proportion of the crop. Certain exporters were able to locate markets in the West Indies for a substantial quantity of apples at a price which was most attractive in view of the competitive rates generally prevailing.

These markets were developed. They were found or financed, but then what did the fruit exporters find? They found that the refrigerated space available from Canadian National Steamships, the only steamship company servicing that area from Halifax, was so small that they could only accommodate a fraction of the order on each ship. As a result less than 50 per cent of the apples for which a firm market had been negotiated in Trinidad left Halifax, and a really substantial loss was incurred by the fruit growers who had looked forward to a very profitable market in the West Indies.

I know there are problems. I know there are exchange problems. I have had some little difficulty in getting permits for the export of Nova Scotia products to the West Indies. In this case, however, the exchange problem was solved, dollars were available, but Canadian National Steamships just had to say, "We are sorry, we have not the refrigerated space and we cannot take your apples."

That, Mr. Speaker, is not good enough. The Annapolis valley is probably as large an egg-producing area today as any other part of Canada. It has developed tremendously during the last ten years. There is a market in Venezuela with no exchange problems. It is a dollar market. They have dollars to burn, based on oil. What do you have to do? You have to rail the eggs in carload lots from the Annapolis valley to New York, or you have to haul them by truck and then reload them on refrigerator ships in New York and take them down to Venezuela, where you have competition from the United States producers. I am told they make a profit. That is not good enough either.

I have a suggestion to make. I have raised this matter before and I am urging it again as one contribution toward the solution of our maritime problems, many of which we must solve ourselves and as to which we are not asking any assistance. But this is a national problem. Private industry cannot furnish these ships because the markets are not there. They will have to be developed slowly and gradually. I have found the department to be most co-operative, the minister to be most apologetic and the Canadian National Railways anxious to serve. But when you have small ships with little refrigerated space there is no hope of developing those markets. That is something which should be done soon.

Speaking of transportation, I would not want to worry the minister with further possible problems which may arise, but I suppose it would not be amiss to give a preview of one upon which I know the minister has already been approached. Undoubtedly we shall hear more about it in the relatively near future. In my own constituency we have a transportation problem across the Minas basin, where before the war there was a regular steamship service cutting off several hundred miles of roundabout drive. We had the distinction, and in this case perhaps the misfortune, of having the then minister of finance in the dominion government as the representative of our constituency. He felt, and properly so, that he had to set an example for economy so that all his colleagues would follow suit. As a result, that steamship which was giving us a daily service and was receiving a subsidy from the Dominion of Canada, found that the subsidy was cut off or disallowed. I am told, in fact I know this, that it was the only steamship subsidy which was cut off in the whole of Canada, but it was to be an example.

The subsidy was discontinued and the boat ceased operation. It has since been sold and of course cannot go back into that operation again. However, a group of men are organizing a company which will have a ship in that service independent of the tides, and one which can operate at any time, day or night. I presume an approach will be made to the Minister of Public Works for the construction or reconstruction of wharves. I know a subsidy will be asked for as well if that ship is to operate as it should. I hope and believe this request will receive the support of the government when it is brought actively or officially to their attention within the next few weeks or months.

Much has been said in this debate already about the problems of agriculture, and I do not intend to repeat what others have said. Coming from the east, I think this should be said. The wheat grower is not the only farmer in Canada who is encountering problems. Farmers generally are encountering serious problems, and I do not think proper attention is being paid by this government to the solution of those problems. I know their solution is not any easy matter.

I know there is no cut and dried solution that anyone can come up with.

We are living in a rapidly changing world in so far as agricultural production is concerned. I do not think that fact has been recognized by those who are responsible for our administration at the moment. We have the problem of bonuses, fire sales, subsidies in other countries, in Europe and in Great Britain. Owing to these governmental techniques the net result is that the farmers in those countries can grow perhaps inferior goods but sell them at higher prices than our farmers can get by selling our goods over there at the moment.

I think study must be given to this whole problem of what we are going to do about subsidized production of agriculture all over the world. Sometimes the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture come down fairly late and we do not have as much time to spend on them as we should like to have. But when his estimates are before the house this winter or this spring I hope he will be in a position to give us the thinking of his officials or the suggestions of his department as to how agriculture is going to fare in this —if I may use a cliché—new world. It is a new world and one with which we are going to be confronted for many years to come. Frankly, as I said before. I do not think any great approach has been made so far to the solution of this problem.

In that connection may I say that I think our whole agricultural price support legislation needs overhauling and review, and that a policy needs to be evolved in connection with it. Frankly, at the moment I do not think we have a policy. I think we have a hit-or-miss approach, one of "do something if you can for this place if there is enough pressure, and don't do it if there is not enough pressure". No farmer knows where he fits in or what is going to happen so far as price support is concerned. I noticed a statement in the press, and it is not from a jaundiced political Conservative viewpoint. I have in my hand a statement attributed to the minister of agriculture from my own province, Hon. Colin Chisholm. When speaking here the other day at the dominion-provincial agricultural conference he said this:

> I don't think we can continue any longer to deal with surpluses as isolated problems, or as problems which can be settled merely by granting price support here and there when extreme urgency calls for it.

I do not think we can do that either. I think something must be done to create price support legislation which will be consistent and rational, which can be understood and which can be brought into effect. I saw the system operating this fall in the valley. As is well known, the apple growers in the Annapolis valley approached the government and asked for financial assistance in September when they were confronted with the biggest crop they have ever had, I suppose, in their history. It was a beautiful crop, a tremendous one, and one which was absolutely beyond their capacity to market, as was true also of growers in other parts of Canada. It was not an isolated problem. It just happened this year that apples would grow on spruce trees, almost, anywhere in North America. In fact, trees that had not been sprayed or looked after for 15 years produced a very good quality crop.

The apple industry, through a delegation, approached the government and asked for financial assistance. That was early in September. The matter went on and on. First the Minister of Agriculture told the delegation from Nova Scotia that they should find out what was the attitude of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia with respect to this matter. I want to register my own objection, Mr. Speaker, to this particular approach.

Mr. Gardiner: If I may do so, I should like to make a correction.

Mr. Nowlan: Surely.

Mr. Gardiner: That representation was made by Nova Scotia, namely that they knew what the position of the other three provinces was, and we asked them to get it for us.

Mr. Nowlan: I accept the minister's statement entirely. What I am saying is this. Representing Nova Scotia, I want to register a protest against a philosophy or a policy which would require, as a prerequisite to the price support of some commodity in Nova Scotia, the reaction of the growers of the same product in Ontario, Saskatchewan, British Columbia or wherever it might be. I can understand that there might be circumstances and products where that procedure should be followed but it does not necessarily apply in every case. This is a huge country. Each part has its own problems and its own diversifications. What may be the situation prevailing in British Columbia this year has no application to Nova Scotia this year or vice versa, or to Ontario or Quebec.

That is one criticism I make of a hit-or-miss policy or lack of policy. When one is evolved, I say it must be evolved on such a basis that you do not have to say to somebody from one province, "Go and find out what they are thinking about it in another province". As the minister just said, he knew fully and his department knew fully what the other people were thinking about it anyway. It was well known that Ontario and Quebec, for their own reasons—and I am not criticizing them at all—did not favour price support for themselves. The minister knew that, but for weeks a stall was carried on.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not like to interrupt, but I should like to say we did not know. The Nova Scotia government came to us and represented that the three provinces had a certain point of view. We said all right, but to get that in writing from them. They were not able to get that in writing from them.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not going to enter into a discussion with the minister, Mr. Speaker. All I can say is this. I have kept out of this discussion up to now. I have said nothing about this at any time because I thought the thing was going to fail. I knew it would fail because, quite frankly, I was in Ottawa a week before the delegation came here and I saw the officials in the minister's department. They told me that the attitude of Ontario and Quebec was opposed to ours. It is a strange thing it took the minister five weeks to find out officially, and that he had to get the Nova Scotia officials to tell him what his own officials told me the week before. They wanted to obtain the attitude of Ontario and Quebec simply as a stall, hoping the apples would fall, the apples would rot or freeze or something would happen to them and the problem could be solved in that way.

In the end, following weeks and weeks of delay after the decision of Ontario and Quebec was known, during which time the growers did not know whether to borrow money in order to pick the apples, to borrow money to buy boxes or discontinue operations, a whisper would come down that there was a telegram from Mr. So and so who says that something is going to be done tomorrow. Then there would be another whisper from somebody who would be in communication with somebody who would be in communication with somebody who would be in communication with the Minister of Agriculture who apparently was not so optimistic. It depended on how good a Liberal you were or to whose telephone you had access whether you decided to pick apples or let them freeze on the trees.

Finally the minister announced that there would be no price support this year. I could debate that decision but I am not going to do so. It was a decision he had to make. I think from some points of view he could justify it, but I do not think it is justified from our own point of view. However, I am not debating that at the moment; I am simply dealing with the technique which was followed.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Gardiner: That is not exactly correct either. If we are going to have a record, we had better have it correct. I stated that we could not carry out the proposal which they had made.

Mr. Nowlan: There are official records of this, Mr. Speaker, but I have not those records in front of me. The end result was that there would be no price support for the valley this year. The minister went on to say that if they would reorganize, which might be an excellent suggestion, the marketing system and approach him next year, he would give the matter consideration. Of course this is a very broad promise. He said he would give consideration to anything they proposed. Whatever the exact words may have been, the end result was that we were told there was no price support for us this year.

As I have said, for the sake of this argument I am not quarrelling with that decision, although I may on another occasion. But that was not the end of it. Word kept coming that something was yet going to be done. This was the end of October or perhaps almost the first of November. I am speaking now from memory. This decision had been awaited from early September. Somebody says something else is going to happen, but this is not official. Then in November I read in the newspapers that officials from the department were down interviewing the minister of agriculture for Nova Scotia about this matter. Then we find officials of the price support board in the valley studying the case and getting the facts. The minister has a most competent inspection service which could have advised him, and undoubtedly did, every 24 hours as to the number of apples picked, the number in cold storage, the variety and where they were moving. All those things are matters of official record.

However, we had a delegation down to get the facts of the case. Then we had another delegation down to get the facts of the case. Even in December there were studies being made. Actually, Mr. Speaker, you know, in the old days of our great-grandfathers when we communicated back and forth, by smoke signals from hilltop to hilltop, information could have been carried back and forth to Ottawa from the Annapolis valley just as quickly as it was this season. Still these whispers, these thoughts, these hopes continued.

Then I read a most amazing statement attributed to the minister. I am paraphrasing it, and it was made in December when he met the potato growers from Prince Edward Island. He said, "Were I to give price support to potatoes in Prince Edward Island I would have to give price support to apples in the Annapolis valley". If you can tell me the connection between apples and potatoes, I should like to know it. It is true that the French word for potatoes is pomme de terre and for apples it is just pomme, so perhaps the minister was confused and was thinking in French at that time; I do not know. I cannot find any other connection. If that is the basis upon which we are going to get price support, "because if I give price support to the potato growers in Prince Edward Island I have to give it to the apple growers of the Annapolis valley," then it is high time there was a study of this price support system.

I might remind the minister that when I first came to this house he did not even give price support on that basis. At that time he gave price support to potatoes in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, but did not give it to Nova Scotia potatoes. The day I left there was an announcement that price support had come to the valley. I did not have time to read the report, and because of the dislocation of communications in the valley I have not been able to receive any report other than the one I got from a few growers when I left that it was not worth anything. They did not think it would be accepted. Evidently it takes from an early September morning until a cold January morning to find out whether or not you can get price support, and in the meantime the apples are all sold, picked or frozen. This is not a happy situation. I say the time has come when we should have a study of this situation before we can adequately cope with the problems confronting agriculture.

There is one other matter which affected my constituency and upon which I want to make perhaps a few critical references. The disaster that recently hit the maritimes is not the only one from which we have suffered. During the fall and early winter the steamship service connecting our province with New Brunswick was cut off because of a strike, which extended from September until just before Christmas. The western part of Nova Scotia was isolated. The Bluenose was not there and the Princess Helene was tied up. Industry suffered tremendously. Unemployment was rife, and as I say this strike lasted from September until a day or two before Christmas.

This year we celebrated the bicentennial of the expulsion of the Acadians. We all know the tragic story of their expulsion and of their return around through the isthmus of Chignecto. I may say that if they had come back this year they would have had to travel the same way, because there was no other way of getting into Nova Scotia. The workers did not want to stay on strike. Industry was dislocated. This matter was as important to western Nova Scotia as a rail strike would be to the national economy. For the last few weeks at any rate settlement was held up, and I say this not unkindly but I believe advisedly, by the stubbornness of one man, the president of the S.I.U., who was determined to hold the strike on as long as he could in order to exercise influence somewhere else. We paid the penalty.

In a situation such as that, and one which meant so much to us, I do not believe we got the co-operation and leadership from this government which we deserved and which would have been given had the circumstances been different and had the strike occurred elsewhere. One result of the strike was unwarranted attacks on labour which naturally result when people are angered by such things. It was unfortunate and unnecessary that it should have been allowed to continue as long as it did.

Now I close on a happier note. I noticed that the Minister of Agriculture had his deputy in Nova Scotia last week. He was there for various reasons, probably, but among other things he had a conference with the minister of agriculture and the premier of Nova Scotia on the construction of a dam across the Annapolis river which, if completed, will restore thousands of acres of marshland and will remove the necessity of maintaining scores of miles of running dikes.

I just happened to read that in the paper last night. I smiled because I remembered that when I first spoke in this house, from down in the far corner, sir, I spent some little time emphasizing that question and urging the minister to do something of that nature. I am glad to know that he has had his engineers down there. I understand that surveys have been made and soundings have been taken, and that economically and financially it will not be such a terribly expensive undertaking.

I do hope that the Minister of Agriculture will see his way clear to work with the province of Nova Scotia in this regard. According to the reports one reads, they are prepared to co-operate in such an undertaking. I do hope this is one of those joint undertakings which can be worked out to the satisfaction of both parties, and if so it will be for the good of Nova Scotia.

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, like those who have preceded me, I should like to add my congratulations to the mover, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme).

I feel that this debate gives the private member an opportunity to report to the House of Commons generally on the affairs of his own constituency and the affairs of the province or of the nation in general as they affect the people he represents. This year, as in other years, and as long as I am permitted to sit in the House of Commons, I intend to outline to the government the necessity for the construction of the Chignecto canal, but before doing so there are some other matters that I should like to bring to the attention of the government.

The Liberal government has been very good to the province of New Brunswick in the past 20 years. I am not going to enumerate all the good things. The things I pick out are those with which perhaps we were not entirely satisfied. In outlining them I do not mean to say that I do not approve the government's program. I am making only helpful suggestions.

I have informed the Department of Public Works of the necessity of dredging to assist the fishermen of my constituency, especially at Cape Bald, Robichaud, Offer, Dupuis Corner and Little Cape. With respect to the first three mentioned, I have asked for extension so the fishermen will be able to land their fish there shortly after they are caught, and there will be no congestion. If that were done they would have the facilities that should be afforded. At Lower Cape Bald the wharf is the same size as it was 30 years ago, and it is now becoming quite crowded.

There is one harbour in Westmorland county that is in need of special consideration, namely the harbour of Pointe du Chene. This harbour is used by fishermen and shippers alike, but the depth of water is not great enough for ocean-crossing vessels to complete loading their cargo. The channel should be deepened to at least 18 feet to allow fully loaded vessels to enter the harbour. I ask the government to investigate this matter carefully. I have been assured by many of the shippers in the area that if this were done they would use the harbour, and it would give a lift to the economy of that particular area.

I wish to thank the Department of Public Works for the new wharf that is under construction at Emily's Point-Shemogue. I would also like to mention the fact that the building of 110 houses by the department at Moncton is appreciated in terms of employment and lasting effects. During one of the debates last year the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) challenged me to say something about assistance to New Brunswick in the development of power. Last year I did that; I used the Colombo plan as an example, and I asked for some consideration for New Brunswick. This summer I read in the press that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had opened a project under the Colombo plan in the Far East. While I was very pleased to read that, I was sorry that instead of it being in the Far East it was not just down east in New Brunswick. Therefore I again suggest to the government that consideration be given to financial assistance by way of loan or by some other method for the development of power in the province of New Brunswick.

Since I spoke last on the Chignecto canal project, or since I first started speaking on it, most of the hon. members from New Brunswick have also mentioned it in their addresses and have been favourably disposed toward it. Perhaps the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, whose constituency would be vitally affected by it, will have something to say about the construction of the canal this year.

I should like to read to the house a short clipping from the Moncton Times, dated November 5, 1955. It reads as follows:

> "The Chignecto canal project is essentially sound," declared Hon. George Drew, head of the national Progressive Conservative party and Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, at a press conference in Moncton yesterday.
> Mr. Drew was spending a few hours in the city on his way to Nova Scotia in the course of a hurried tour of the maritimes.
> In saying he found the project "to be sound after intensive study," he added that "the courage and vision of people before us were responsible for the building of our rail lines." The same, he stated, holds true of canals.
> "Throughout history lines of transportation, whether rail or water, have led to progress and I am of the opinion the Chignecto canal is a sound proposition for the benefit of Canada as a whole, and particularly so here in the maritimes."

I know the Leader of the Opposition was sincere when he said that this would be of benefit to all of Canada. I rather expected him to say something about it in the House of Commons during this debate.

In connection with the Chignecto canal project, last fall there was a press release in the Moncton Transcript dated September 16. It was a Canadian Press dispatch from Halifax. According to this dispatch a spokesman for the Nova Scotia Light and Power Company made a statement concerning the development of light and power under the Chignecto-Minas project. The dispatch stated that the project would provide 60 times the electrical energy that could be used in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick combined. That amount of electrical energy could be provided by the Chignecto-Minas project.

The Chignecto canal, of which I am speaking, would pierce the isthmus of Chignecto. For those who are not familiar with the geography of the maritimes may I say that the isthmus of Chignecto is a narrow neck of land which joins New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The proposed Chignecto canal would provide a short route in sheltered waters for ships running from the St. Lawrence river to the eastern seaboard of the United States, and in some cases would mean a saving of almost 500 miles. Such a canal would increase steamship sailings between the Atlantic provinces and central Canada, and with the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway the route to the eastern seaboard of the United States, Mexico and South America would be shortened by at least 400 miles.

It may surprise many to know that in 1871, shortly after confederation, industrial wages in New Brunswick were the highest of any of the provinces, but by 1946 they ranked second lowest. In 1871 one out of every five industrial workers in Canada was employed in the maritimes, but by 1946 this had dropped to one out of seventeen. During the past few years there have been discoveries of ore bodies in northern New Brunswick and Gaspe which are of such importance that another look at the Chignecto canal project by the government of Canada is very much in line. I think that we are entitled to know for once and for all what is going to be done about this great project.

The extent to which the failure to build the Chignecto canal has arrested development in the maritimes is difficult to estimate. That failure, together with the depression of the 1870's, greatly retarded our progress. Young people of the maritimes when denied opportunities for advancement migrated to other parts of Canada and the New England states which benefited greatly by such migrations.

The volume of traffic passing through our Canadian canals far exceeds the expectations of those men who had the foresight and courage to embark upon a policy of canal construction. The Chignecto canal has been included in federal estimates in the past, but for some reason or other it has never been carried out. There have been ten surveys made of the Chignecto isthmus, and with the exception of minor technical differences all agree that the canal is feasible. The Chignecto canal is a national need and in fairness to the maritimes Canada should keep her promise and build it now.

There is another matter which I should like to discuss briefly; that is the Canadian National Railways, which has a close connection with my constituency. Offices and repair shops of the railway are located in Moncton, and the interests of the employees of the Canadian National Railways are of great concern to me. As a member of the railway committee, to which Mr. Donald Gordon, the president, reports annually, I have become somewhat familiar with the operations of the Canadian National Railways. Although in Ottawa and Montreal Mr. Gordon may be considered the most important man in the Canadian National Railways, to me, representing as I do 5,000 railway workers in Moncton, the railwayman in Moncton is most important.

Not only do these men work for the Canadian National Railways; they take an interest in railroading that money could not buy. Railroading has been their lifelong work; they have spent many years in helping to build up the Canadian National Railways and when a deficit occurs they, like the rest of us, must pay taxes to make it up. As the true representative of such a large number of railwaymen I must make my position clear with respect to legislation concerning the right to strike by Canadian National men. It is not my intention to support any anti-strike legislation dealing with the Canadian National, whether it be introduced from one side of the house or the other.

Before closing I have another request to make or recommendation to offer in connection wtih another corporation. While I approve of nationalization in the matter of the Canadian National Railways, I want to say something about another corporation, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As far as radio is concerned, the C.B.C. has not been brought to my notice by my constituents generally. They seem to be fairly well satisfied with C.B.C. radio, but I do want to say a word about C.B.C. television.

We have a local television station in Moncton which serves us well. Its local programs are good, but apparently productions of the C.B.C. are distributed to local stations to be shown to the viewers there. As more sets are bought in my constituency the more complaints I get about C.B.C. television productions. I have been told that they are terrible, that they smell. Although I am not a television fan I have viewed some of the C.B.C. productions and I must say that the complaints seem to be justified. Perhaps this work could be done better by private enterprise or perhaps not, but my opinion is that it could be better done.

It may be that this is a new type of Canadian culture as distinct from that of our neighbours to the south, but the fact is that it is not being well received by the public who are paying the bills and who should be entitled to view what they want to view.

An hon. Member: They are no worse than the United States programs.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): I have no complaint to make about the United States programs I have seen, as I have found them to be quite good. I am not a producer and I do not know how to remedy this, but I do know a finished product when I see one. There must be some way to remedy this and perhaps somebody else has a remedy. Probably issue will be taken with me on this matter, but I am simply indicating the representations which have been made to me by my constituents. They are the ones who have sent me here to make known the needs of the county of Westmorland.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity which this debate affords to bring to the attention of hon. members of the house so early in the session a matter which is of widespread interest and deep concern to many of the people who live in the coastal areas of British Columbia, and indeed I think it would be fair to say to the people who live in all the maritime parts of Canada. I am referring to the matter of coastal marine protection services.

In order to indicate something of the interest which this question has aroused in British Columbia I should like to give a few samples of newspaper headings which have appeared in recent months in that province. For example, in the Victoria Daily Colonist of September 17 appears the headline "Fishermen ask for naval vessels as alternative to coastguard help". In the newspaper The Fisherman of September 13 we find the headline "Union renews demand for proper coastguard". Then again in the Victoria Colonist we find on October 2 the headline "Six hundred west coast fishermen ask B.C. mariners' help". On October 17 in the Vancouver Daily Province I was interested to see the headline "Marler to inspect B.C. rescue system". On October 18 in the same newspaper, appears the headline "Marler set against B.C. coastguard. Plan 'not practical', states Minister of Transport on tour". Then in the Vancouver Sun of the following day, October 19, appeared the headline "Search called off for B.C. fisherman. Gillnetter wreckage found as chill waters claim third life."

All our ships are not lost, as indicated in the October 24 headline in the Vancouver Province, "Battered U.S. ship safe in Bull harbour after nearly foundering off B.C. coast". Then on October 31 in the Vancouver Sun appeared the headline, "Air-sea search finds fisher beached, safe".

In the Comox district Free Press of August 17, there was another headline of interest, which reads, "RCAF crashboat in night rescue. The crash boat of the Comox R.C.A.F. station was called out at midnight Tuesday and rescued a party from Mitlenatch island where they had been marooned by the stormy weather".

These are a few samples from the headlines which have been appearing in various newspapers published in British Columbia during recent months, indicating perhaps why the member for Comox-Alberni, among others, should be concerned with this matter and should be interested to take this opportunity early in the session, once again, of raising this question of marine coastal protection.

I should like to say at the outset that I am not too much concerned about that headline which states that the Minister of Transport is set against coastguards, because it has become obvious to me during the previous sessions I have attended that for some reason or other, whenever anyone mentions the term "coastguard" the government apparently goes into an immediate state of dither, buries its head in the sand and tries to forget all about the matter. That is perhaps why, as far as I am concerned, I am going to attempt to use the phrase "marine rescue service", because essentially that is what the people who are raising the question of a coastguard have in mind rather than a coastguard in the sense in which that term is used in the United States, where that service, of course, has other aspects to it.

An earlier headline I read indicated that fishermen on the coast are greatly interested in this matter and that interest has reached the extent that they have been supporting a petition which has been circulated on the coast during the past few months. I have been entrusted with the honour of presenting that petition to the Minister of Transport on behalf of those people. I should like to make it clear that this petition was not sponsored by any large organization putting on a high pressure campaign to obtain signatures for it. This petition was initiated and circulated by a widow with two small children, whose husband was lost with a fishing vessel off the west coast of Vancouver island not so long ago. Having had the opportunity and the pleasure of becoming acquainted with her,

I must say here publicly that I wish to commend her courage and initiative in doing something about the situation rather than simply sitting at home with her grief.

This petition represents the real feeling of hundreds of the people who go down to the sea in ships, that all is not well with the present situation. I am happy to say that I have indicated the contents of this petition to my colleagues, the other members of the C.C.F. group in this house, and that they are thoroughly in agreement with me in supporting it. I was also very happy to note, according to a report in the Victoria press, that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) and the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Fairey) have also indicated that they are prepared to lend their support to this petition. I am sure there are many other hon. members of this house who will be willing to do likewise, particularly those who come from the maritime areas of this country.

Now I should like to read to the house, so all the members may be fully aware of its contents, the statement which precedes the 1,860 names which are thereto attached. This is addressed to Hon. G. C. Marler, Minister of Transport:

> We the undersigned do hereby petition for the establishment of a Canadian coast service which will have at its disposal every modern technological advantage in the hands of trained personnel.
> We submit that the present air sea rescue service, admirable in theory, is, in practice, inadequate and inefficient and does not meet the very real and stringent requirements inherent in marine rescue work.
> We submit that the present life saving service is poorly equipped, understaffed by untrained personnel, and, with reference to geographic considerations, poorly located. It is well to note that if the present life saving stations at Tofino and Bamfield are justifiable, there are exposed areas of the British Columbia coast, with as much, or greater, marine activity, that have no comparable service.
> We submit that because of increasing coastal marine activity, including the development of a Canadian offshore fishing industry, it is imperative that a coast guard service be inaugurated to protect the lives and safeguard the property of those involved.
> We submit that the rescue services of Britain, the United States and other nations be taken under consideration and the best features of each, with due regard to the particular and peculiar needs of Canada, be incorporated into a Canadian coast guard.

As I have indicated, this petition has 1,860 names of west coast residents, fishermen and others, attached to it, and I feel honoured to have been entrusted with the task of delivering this to the Minister of Transport. I was very glad to see that the Minister of Transport paid a visit to the coast of British Columbia during the recess. I understand he had an opportunity of seeing firsthand something of that coast on a trip by air from Victoria, I believe it was, to Prince Rupert. I was quite interested to discover a Canadian Press report carried by the Vancouver newspapers containing certain remarks made by the minister as a result of his inspection. In the dispatch he is reported as saying that from what he has learned the present facilities appear to be very good, at least on paper.

I must say when I read these remarks of the minister I had the feeling he was taking some words out of my mouth from the speech which at that time I was mentally preparing for delivery here. The claim has been made more than once by spokesmen for the government that the air-sea rescue service as we know it today is the answer. The Minister of Transport is also quoted as saying that those who urge a coastguard service are apparently unaware of the existing air-sea rescue facilities. Therefore I feel it might be worth while to take a brief look at the air-sea rescue service as it is now constituted, how it is set up and organized, because I want to assure the Minister of Transport that a good many of the many people with whom I have discussed this matter during the recess have had some firsthand acquaintance with just how the service operates.

I myself am not a mariner and consequently have relied a good deal on discussions with people whom I know have had many years of firsthand experience of life on the British Columbia coast through travelling up and down it by ship. Coupled with that, I have tried to make my own observations and form my judgments therefrom. I want to make it clear that while I am in complete support of the submission of this petition, what I have to say about the air-sea rescue service and the suggestions I may make as to what should be done are the result of my own observations and my own judgment of the matter.

I have in my hand a little booklet entitled "Search and Rescue in B.C., 1955 edition". It is a very good little booklet which sets forth quite clearly just what the search and rescue service is and what it is prepared to do. It starts out with the rescue co-ordination centre at No. 12 air defence group, Vancouver, and indicates that there are certain primary and secondary facilities attached to and co-ordinated by that centre.

The primary facilities are the No. 12 communication and rescue unit of the R.C.A.F. stationed at Sea island. I should like to say that the impression I had on my first visit to these establishments was favourable. I felt they were being efficiently run and were doing, within the limits of what they were able to do, an effective job of organizing the work. Quite frankly, I was impressed with some of the equipment that the communication and rescue unit at Sea island has available for various forms of search and rescue work both on land and by sea. I think it is fair to say my own reaction is in line with the general reaction to the work of that particular rescue unit of the R.C.A.F. I have heard some very favourable comments made on the work they have done.

On the other hand, however, as I think is clear from the wording of the petition, the feeling is not so much one of dissatisfaction with what is there but with what is not there. That brings us to the consideration of this plan which, as the Minister of Transport has stated, looks good on paper. We find that attached to the co-ordination centre are quite a number of various units and organizations of one kind and another. I am going to mention the ones particularly concerned with rescue and search as far as the sea is concerned.

As secondary facilities there are, for example, the vessels of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, motor launches at various points along the coast. There are the vessels of the Department of Transport, the Department of Fisheries and the British Columbia forest service. That of course is not to mention the various communications services, including the marine radio stations of the Department of Transport. While there are some questions as to communications facilities, respecting the co-ordination of various air frequencies and so on, that have been raised with me, by and large the real criticism does not arise in the communications field.

In addition, of course, there are the vessels of the British Columbia towboat owners' association. In the areas where the vessels of the members of that association operate most frequently there is a feeling that they can do a useful job, but there is a recognition that these boats do not operate everywhere. The same thing applies with respect to the various government boats which are co-ordinated in this centre.

When you add all these various vessels together they appear to provide an impressive number, but apart from the two small lifeboats at Bamfield and Tofino stations none of these vessels is on duty, on call and available for marine rescue work, at any and all times or at any given or known location. That, Mr. Speaker, appears to me to be the weakness of the present set-up, plus the fact that none of the government vessels nor, as far as I know, none of the privately owned vessels that are tied in with this plan are equipped to carry on marine rescue work or carry crews who have been trained to perform marine rescue work.

I have felt more than once that in this respect the set-up is very similar to what would be the case in a city like Ottawa if our house were on fire and we had to rely on going down the street and being able to find a truck which happened to be equipped with a pump and a ladder. The chances of doing that would be rather remote. That, Mr. Speaker, is the feeling of the people of the coastal areas of British Columbia on this matter.

By way of illustration, while I was visiting one of the centres in my constituency this summer I had the opportunity to go aboard one of the larger vessels operated by the Department of Fisheries. There are, as you may know, three of these larger vessels, the Howay, the Laurier and the Kitimat. This was my first opportunity to see one of the larger type fisheries vessel. It was quite a substantial looking boat. One felt that it could go out into the open waters of the Pacific in rather stormy weather. It was well and, I would say, quite comfortably equipped to do the work of the Department of Fisheries. But when I raised the question as to what they had aboard that vessel to carry on any sort of marine rescue work, they had to admit that the boat had no such equipment. I greatly doubt whether, under the present set-up, the crew of that vessel has ever received any special training in the carrying out of marine rescue work.

As I stated earlier, the initiator of a petition which I have read was a Mrs. Ian C. MacLeod of Tofino. I have here her recounting in a straightforward factual manner of just what happened at the time her husband was lost. I feel that this perhaps reveals some of the weaknesses of the present set-up to which I have been referring. This is the story:

On July 30, 1955, a fishing boat Maidi H was reported missing with Ian Charles MacLeod of Tofino and a friend Kenneth Wilson from Vancouver.

The Tofino lifeboat and fishermen combed the shore waters and beaches from here—

That is Tofino.

—to Estevan point. Air and sea rescue was contacted. They sent one plane at 11.30 next morning (3 hours late due to fog here) which picked up local observers and searched for 4 hours.

The following day two planes were sent. These searched for 4 hours with no local observers aboard. Two days elapsed. Then pressure was brought to bear on the air and sea rescue and five planes were promised. These agreed to take up local observers. However, only two planes were sent and the other three were dispatched to search for a plane (carrying government officials) lost near Kitimat making a total of 15 planes searching in the Kitimat area.

This same day August 3rd, the fishery guardian Comox Post was requested by a local resident, and arrived from San Juan in the straits of Juan de Fuca late the following afternoon. The Comox Post tied up at the Tofino float for the night and started her search the following morning, Friday, August 5.

The forestry boat Yellow Cedar was tied to the Tofino float all during the search for the Maidi H. The skipper of the Yellow Cedar phoned to the forestry branch headquarters to ask permission to take part in the search and he was refused even though, theoretically, this vessel is incorporated into the air and sea rescue service.

This is her statement of conclusions derived from this experience:

1. We need three or four larger and faster and well-equipped boats to patrol off shore during the fishing season, spring to fall.
2. We need more lifeboats, at least two for the upper part of Vancouver island.
3. We need one or two planes based in a central west coast area, R.C.A.F. station, Long Beach. Vancouver is too far when weather conditions are sometimes entirely different between the two areas.
4. We need better co-ordination between the various organizations taking part in a search.
5. Search vessels and planes should be able to communicate on the same frequency band for better co-ordination and co-operation during a search.
6. We need better equipment on the smaller vessels.

I have here one other story which I am going to read, Mr. Speaker. This is the story of an experience of some of the Indian fishermen who live in my constituency, and is set out in this man's own words. This incident happened, I might say, in April, 1952:

We started out about 6.30 a.m. We had few provisions. We went 6 miles out from Rafael point and our engine stalled at 8 a.m. in southeasterly gale. We drifted to Estevan point ¼ mile off shore and the wind changed to a westerly. We drifted for 6 hours at night to Lennard island. The next day 18th we pumped the boat all day and in the evening the wind calmed. Early evening of the 18th we spotted a troller 3 miles abreast. They did not see us. We tried to attract attention with smoke and a mirror. Before dark we spotted a plane directly above us. We tried to attract attention with smoke and a mirror, but they did not see us. On the 19th before midday another plane was flying on the inside of us. We tried again to draw attention with no avail. No provisions and we boiled salt water for the remaining part of the day. On the 20th, no plane. On the 21st we started working on the engine and by 4.30 p.m. she was under way and we pulled in to Tofino about 10.45 p.m.

Each day Nelson Reitlah and Johnathan Thomas worked on the engine. As a result, from 4 days' exposure Nelson Reitlah developed T.B. of the lung and was released from hospital on July 14, 1955.

The next of kin of Nelson Reitlah and Johnathan Thomas and the residents of Ahousat raised sufficient money to bring planes up from air and sea rescue, Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that is probably not quite correctly stated. I believe it was a private plane which was chartered.

Chartered plane Ahousat people paid $140. Ahousat people also paid $125 to supply gas for boats to go out on rescue. No help from Indian department.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are but two of many stories which could be told of happenings on the sea along the coast of British Columbia. The conclusions I come to in my own mind are that while certainly the facilities which have come into existence should not be scrapped, nevertheless before we can consider ourselves to have anything like adequate marine coastal protection they must be supplemented by properly equipped facilities, with properly trained personnel who are going to be on the job and available for quick work in the event of disaster at sea. The booklet published by search and rescue, to which I have previously referred, I think does make quite clear that no provision has been made as yet for proper facilities of the kind to which I have been referring. On page 5 of this 1955 edition of "Search and Rescue" appears the statement:

Marine search and rescue in Canada is dependent mainly on co-operation between mariners themselves.

Later on that page it says:

Only when immediate danger or loss of life is involved, or when no commercial or private vessel is available or prepared to take on the job, will a tow be provided by one of the government operated services. Even when such a tow is provided, the master of the vessel so towed is liable to be charged for the service.

The following policy is in effect regarding surface craft in distress:

(a) Whenever surface craft request assistance which involves towing, the rescue co-ordination centre will pass the request to a commercial salvage company operating in the area.

(b) If no commercial company is able to go to the aid of the distressed vessel, then the rescue co-ordination centre will request the assistance of the Royal Canadian Navy, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or other government vessels.

(d) It must be understood that the search and rescue organization in Canada differs from that of the United States coastguard, in that free towing of vessels is not provided on request.

I cannot help but wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether or not the policy which is presently in effect, and which is the policy stated in this booklet, does not show more concern for the interests of the private towing and salvage companies than for the fishermen and others operating vessels along our coasts. The people who know we have government vessels operating on the coast find it difficult to understand why, particularly when they see that such vessels are attached to a service such as this, vessels which have been paid for by the people of Canada are not more freely available and more effectively available to the people of Canada who need them.

The fishermen of British Columbia are not suggesting necessarily that they expect a completely free towing service. But they know, as I know, that for many of the areas of British Columbia there simply are no commercial firms operating in a way to provide any effective service. They know, as I know, that there are times when, no matter how much they may desire to help themselves, they cannot do so with the type of vessels they have, and we have some very fine fishing vessels in British Columbia. It is under those circumstances they feel there should be properly equipped rescue vessels available.

I have had it reported to me that in some ways in this connection we have actually gone backward. For example, I have had it reported to me that all during the thirties for about four months every winter there was a naval tug stationed at Bamfield for the purpose of rescue work, supplementary to that provided by the small lifeboats. Let me make it clear that from my own observations of the work being done by the captain and crew of those life boats, they are doing the very best they can. Generally speaking, people of the area are high in their praise of the work they perform. But anyone who sees these lifeboats realizes they are certainly not what one would consider to be modern rescue vessels. They are limited by the very nature of their construction in the type of facilities it might be practical to instal in them, as for example radar.

It seems to me that a rescue vessel which is going to be asked to go out in weather into which no ordinary vessel would venture should have the very latest type of equipment. Certainly radar is one of the great weapons of mariners in combating such things as fog. Anyone who knows the west coast of British Columbia knows that fog does descend upon it on more than the odd occasion. Nevertheless in years gone by naval vessels were made available, and they are not now being made available. There is a story which is rather notorious on the west coast of a case away back in 1951, I believe it was, when the captain of a certain naval tug set forth to rescue a tuna fishing vessel. After having steamed out for a couple of hours off the coast, according to the story, he was ordered back because he had not had authorization from Ottawa.

All these things indicate some of the sources of dissatisfaction with the set-up and some of the reasons for the demand that has arisen that we now have a marine rescue service. The time has come to establish a proper, modern rescue service which would be available under these circumstances to the people in the coastal areas of British Columbia, and I suppose other parts of Canada. These services are necessary. It appears to me these services could be provided without incurring the enormous costs which apparently, as I said earlier, have caused the government to bury its head in the sand every time anybody mentions the coastguard. It is for that reason, as I said earlier, I have welcomed this opportunity of raising this matter almost at the outset of the current session.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): In taking part in this debate I should like, first of all, to convey my congratulations to both my colleagues, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), the mover and seconder of the address. The mover of the address is my neighbour, and as you are able to ascertain, a very good neighbour indeed. She did a wonderful job and her constituents have good reason to be proud of her, just as we have.

(Translation):

Our good friend the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) has proved to us that he can most creditably get by in this house. The electors of his riding were right in choosing him to represent them here in Ottawa, and we are all very proud to have him among us.

(Text):

I would not like to let this occasion go by, Mr. Speaker, without extending to you my sincere congratulations and good wishes. I also wish to take this opportunity to transmit to you and through you to all hon. members salutations and best regards from all the people of the constituency of Villeneuve. We are on the eve of a new session. We all came here in order to work in the best interests of our fellow Canadians, and I am hopeful that our deliberations will bear fruit and will be profitable to each and every one of our fellow citizens, from one end of the country to the other.

I intend to talk this afternoon about my constituency and the surrounding district, not because it is the usual practice in such a debate but because I feel that what is going on in northwestern Quebec is of great interest to the whole of the population of Canada. I would also like to acquaint the house with some of the projects we wish to undertake in order to accelerate the more rational development of our natural resources. And finally, during the course of my remarks, in the name of my constituents and for the welfare of our district I will be making a few suggestions to the government, who in the past have responded so well to most, if not all, of the requests of those whom I have the honour to represent in this house.

With regard to mining in northwestern Quebec, Mr. Speaker, we are taking no backward steps. On the contrary, we are continually going forward. We are producing more and more of the much needed base metals. Our gold mines are still employing more than 4,500 men in spite of the trying times they are going through. We now have a lithium producing mine, the first one in Canada, and it is operated by the Quebec Lithium Corporation. There is a new copper producer in the Chibougamau mining area, and by the looks of things there will be probably two or three more in the very same area within the next year or two. There is every reason to believe that in this country of ours during the next ten years we shall see an even greater expansion in our mining industry than we have enjoyed during the past decade, and we know it was the most active ten years we have ever had.

There are many reasons why we should be very much on the alert regarding the development of the mining industry of this country, and there are certain facts which should always be kept in mind. First, we are sitting on top of a tremendous storehouse containing an immense variety of minerals. This accumulation of riches has only been scratched, and today its extraction from the earth and its processing have created new jobs for a great number of Canadians. For every mine which finally does reach production there are at least 1,000 other properties which are being investigated, thus providing employment for many thousands of men engaged in prospecting, diamond drilling, surveying and all sorts of exploration work. And what is more important, for each man working in a producing mine there are four or five other men working in a related or supply industry.

Second, Mr. Speaker, mining is still the biggest influence in opening up the north country, and lately it has also been bringing booms in more settled areas such as Bathhurst and Little River in New Brunswick, Gaspe and Oka in Quebec, and Algoma, Blind River and Bancroft in Ontario. During recent years mining has been responsible for the building of more new railway lines than all other industries combined. It has tilted the scale in favour of the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. And finally, what is more important, it has attracted huge sums of foreign capital to this country, thus bringing about much more expansion than would otherwise have been possible. It has created new investment in mining projects to a total of about $1 billion.

Our strategic position adjoining the world's largest industrial nation, the abundance of our mineral resources, the many big projects which either are developed or will be developed shortly, the new Canadian settlements from coast to coast, cannot help but result in a period of growth in the years immediately ahead that will far surpass anything we have experienced up to the present time.

Our mining industry has grown and expanded, and so has the federal department of mines. Before 1949 this government service was only a branch of another ministry. In fact the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys was created on January 18, 1950, by an act of parliament which received royal assent on December 19, 1949. During the past 50 years the federal department of mines has done a great job for the country in the fields of geology, mineralogy, special research and other related experiments. The excellent mapping done by the department and the very careful work carried on in its laboratories have led to the discovery of bigger and more numerous ore deposits, and have also permitted a more economical processing of them.

Airborne magnetometer surveys were started in 1947 by the geological survey branch, and during the following four or five years this kind of work was carried on over many thousands of miles in various parts of Canada. The information derived from this kind of work has been valuable and most gratifying. Those surveys have been responsible for the finding of the iron ore deposits of Marmora, Ontario, the copper-zinc deposits of Bathurst and Little River in New Brunswick, and many other ore deposits in different parts of the country.

However, since 1952 it seems that the department has discontinued this kind of work, at least in most of the provinces. I would urge the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) to let the geological survey branch carry on with its airborne magnetometer surveys across the whole of Canada, especially in those provinces where there is no such work in progress. This has provided useful and valuable information in the southern part of the shield area. I am convinced that it would be of great help to those who are engaged in prospecting in other parts further north.

When I say that I have in mind more particularly that part of our district between Beattyville and Chibougamau, where the Canadian National is now building a railway line. During the next season this section will be a hive of activity as far as prospecting is concerned, and this activity will continue for many years to come. Mines will be developed in that area, and the more tools we put in the hands of the prospectors and the companies the quicker the job will be done.

It is quite easy to understand that this intensive mining activity in the areas of known economic importance and the spreading out of those activities into new areas has caused an extraordinary demand for more and more geodetic, topographic, hydrographic and geologic surveys. It is not surprising to learn that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has found it most difficult to keep up with the increased needs. However, it is gratifying to learn that by using modern tools and equipment, by developing new techniques and a more rapid system of surveying, the personnel of the department have been able to speed up their work and they are now pretty well meeting the increasing demand.

But there will be much more to be done. The demands for increased services by all branches of the department will be pressing. I urge the government to make more money available to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys so his department will be able to keep up with its work and be permitted to continue to operate with the high degree of efficiency which it has shown in the past.

Agriculture has gradually become a basic industry in northwestern Quebec, more particularly within the clay belt which is eminently suited to the production of fodder and consequently stock-farming, either for the production of meat or dairy products. Small-scale farming and gardening could be made profitable around the larger centres such as Rouyn-Noranda, Malartic, Val d'Or-Bourlamaque and Amos. In this respect I would hope that the division of horticulture at Kapuskasing would conduct experimental work in the growing and preparation for market of vegetables in those centres. There are a great number of small farms which are suitable for that kind of production, and their owners are in urgent need of guidance and encouragement. I will go as far as to say that an experimental station for that purpose would be a profitable investment.

At this point I want to take advantage of this opportunity to offer my sincere thanks to the officers and technicians of the Department of Agriculture for all they have done to help the farmers of our district. More particularly I wish to say that the farmers of northwestern Quebec are grateful to the director, the technicians and other employees of the federal experimental farm at Kapuskasing and of the experimental substation at Macamic in the constituency of my good friend the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Gourd), for the guidance, good advice and encouragement which has been supplied in the performance of their duties. We are in great need of this kind of service, and we hope it will be accelerated.

As it is, the development of agriculture in northwestern Quebec depends mostly upon the mining industry. This industry injects a pecuniary serum which enables a settler to live through the difficult years when he has to work on virgin soil which will bear fruit only after years of unceasing labour. The settler finds in the mining centres a ready market for his lumber and other farm products, and the mining industry provides work for him during the off season. So gradually the settlement lot becomes a productive farm and the settler a real farmer who is ready to take his rightful place in the community.

The majority of our farmers are at a stage where they need additional help, guidance and encouragement. They need help in connection with their livestock and the classification, storage and distribution of their product. Studies of these various problems are now being made by local organizations, but it is only with the help of duly qualified technicians, the guidance of good management, the encouragement of the business people of our district and financial aid from both the federal and provincial governments that a program of such breadth can be carried out.

There are over 65,000 people in the cities and towns of northwestern Quebec. Carloads of such commodities as meat, vegetables, dairy products and poultry come from outside the district to be distributed by the many merchants in the different localities. In such a situation it would be thought that local products would find an outlet. However, we are becoming aware of the fact that the grocer cannot buy products which are not classified. Moreover, if he is not assured of a steady flow of products from the local farmers he cannot buy from them.

Our farmers need a distribution centre in which they could find facilities such as a slaughterhouse, cold storage and good management for the distribution of their products. These facilities are presently lacking, therefore the flow of products is not steady. This is due partly to a lack of guidance in connection with distribution.

Further progress could be made by a livestock improvement program operated jointly with a program for the development of grasses. This would enable the farmers of the district to continue the production of livestock on a more sustained basis.

Finally, so that the farming industry of northwestern Quebec may fulfil its expectations, let us hope that a large-scale program of drainage will be undertaken with the co-operation of both federal and provincial governments throughout the whole of this part of the pre-Cambrian clay belt which is level with the farm lands. In addition to improving arable land it would help reforestation and the development of large marshland areas which are now absolutely useless. The farmers of northwestern Quebec keep toiling to clear and improve their farms. The heavy work which they took on at the beginning is now producing results.

However, if we want the progress of the farmers of our district to be on a par with that of other industries, we shall have to give them a hand; we shall have to help those who have worked so hard to clear the land and, finally, we shall have to try to make it easier for the farmers to distribute their products. We know how steadfast our farmers are, and if we help them ever so little we may be sure they will do their full share in the development and progress of northwestern Quebec.

Earlier in my remarks I said I would acquaint the house with some of the projects we of northwestern Quebec have in mind in order to accelerate the more rational development and exploitation of our natural resources. Before I do so I wish to quote, with your permission, from an article which appeared in one of our leading local newspapers, the Star, in the edition of January 6, 1956. The article is entitled "To get something done, or not", and it reads as follows:

> When you see a committee set up within, or auxiliary to, a larger body, it is safe to guess that one of two purposes has prompted its formation—(1) to get something done, and (2) not to get something done but to go through the motions of getting something done.
> Frankly, we have had to revise our opinion of the Abitibi East industrial commission which the federation of chambers of commerce sponsored in 1954. We were suspicious then that it was just another committee which would go through the motions.
> We are happy to say here and now that this opinion was wrong. It has been proved wrong.

It has been proved wrong because this industrial commission, of which we expect so much in northwestern Quebec, has been organized by and is actually under the direction of a group of people who firmly believe that if you want something done you should at least know what you want to have done and that, if you want to be helped, you should start by trying to help yourself.

The industrial commission was organized in 1954, as I have said, and it started its work with a three-point program. First, the commission promised its full co-operation and assistance to the farm organizations of the district in their efforts to construct a slaughterhouse and establish a distribution centre, both very essential, as I have said, to the future well-being of our farmers. Second, the commission undertook to sponsor the establishment of a paper mill in the very heart of the district, which for many years has seen its pulpwood being cut and shipped away to be transformed into finished paper in other parts of the province rather than on the spot. Third, the commission has undertaken to sponsor the construction of a zinc refinery. After only the very short period of two years we have good reason to believe that those three projects are well on their way to becoming realities.

The establishment of the paper mill, I am told, will be announced very shortly. The construction of that mill and the development of a water power site to operate that mill will mean an outlay of at least $50 million. This new industry in the district will create an important source of employment and, moreover, it will mean that one of the most important natural resources of the area will be processed right on the spot, thus giving more profit, as it should, to the people of the district. The establishment of this paper mill will necessitate the construction of a 50-mile railway spur beginning at a point on the new railway line presently being built from Beattyville to Chibougamau.

The promotion work on the proposed zinc refinery is well under way, and we are informed that the refinery itself might be in operation before the end of the year. As everyone knows, a large amount of zinc concentrates is produced every year in our district. Not only part of this production but the whole of it is being shipped to different points in the United States to be refined. Again in this case, if we can succeed in having those concentrates processed right where they are produced we shall have gone a step forward in the more rational exploitation of one of our natural resources.

As to the construction of a slaughterhouse and the establishment of a distribution centre, the project is well under way, and as soon as the financial details are arranged the construction will be started and accelerated as much as possible.

Those projects I have mentioned are not the only ones which are under study by the industrial commission. There are many others, indicative of the work which is now being done by this group of people who are so confident of the future of our country that they do not hesitate to give their time and knowledge for the welfare and the well-being of their fellow citizens.

If I mention the above projects, it is because I think the information might be of some interest to the house, in view of the fact that more and more we hear about the desirability of processing a larger amount of our own natural resources right here in Canada. If we are anxious to do so, and I am sure we all are, what I have just said shows one way to do it.

The provinces have the responsibility and the right to control and develop their own natural resources and, as was mentioned yesterday and so well explained by the Prime Minister, they are very jealous of those prerogatives. That is their privilege and their right. But if some local organization, within its own province, takes the initiative, there are good reasons to believe that the government of that province will pay more attention to these representations than to any others that may be made from here, no matter how constructive or how sincere they may be.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I should like first of all to take the opportunity of congratulating the mover and the seconder for the able manner in which they fulfilled those duties.

Before I make any comments on the speech itself, I should like also to take this opportunity of saying that I recently had the opportunity of attending the last session of the general assembly of the United Nations as a parliamentary observer, and I should like to express my personal thanks for the courtesy extended to me there by the head of the Canadian delegation, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I should like to say at the same time that all the members and staff of the Canadian delegation seemed to be very efficient and very well up on their duties in general.

My first observation on the speech from the throne itself is this. Like others who have already spoken and no doubt others who will be speaking in the future, I cannot help regret certain omissions from the speech itself. I regret particularly that there was no reference in the speech from the throne to the problem of veterans affairs. In this regard I regret particularly that no provision was made to set up a standing committee to deal with veterans' problems as they arise. For instance, last year some new veterans' legislation was passed, quite a bit of it as a matter of fact, but already certain weaknesses in this legislation have made themselves apparent. While no veterans' legislation has been proposed so far at least this session, if a standing committee were set up it would have the opportunity of discussing the weaknesses that have appeared in recent legislation.

I am also sorry to notice that there is no mention of any legislation respecting war veterans of world war I who served only in the United Kingdom. It had been hoped that possibly legislation would be proposed to include these few remaining persons under the War Veterans Allowance Act. However, this is apparently not being done. It seems rather a shame that these persons who served in the first world war should not be included, as they certainly travelled through an active field of warfare to get to England. I think the north Atlantic could most certainly be described as an active field of warfare from 1914 to 1918.

Again in this regard I am sorry to notice that no legislation is proposed to change the War Veterans Allowance Act to increase the ceilings on permissible income, as proposed in the Legion brief of November 10, 1955. The Legion is very thankful for the increases made in the War Veterans Allowance Act legislation last year, but feels that the amounts are not sufficient and that the ceilings on permissible income should have been raised to $1,200 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man. I also think it is a pity that other recommendations made in the Legion brief apparently were not given favourable consideration by the government.

The second matter I should like to mention at this time has reference to the Income Tax Act. I am certainly very sorry to observe that no legislation is proposed to amend the Income Tax Act. At the last session of this parliament the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) presented certain criticisms of the Income Tax Act, and I may say that the citizens of many parts of this country also have many criticisms to offer of that act. I should like to point out in this regard that my colleague, the hon. member for Middlesex East, has a resolution on the order paper and no doubt when it comes before the house these matters will be gone into in considerable detail.

However, there are some observations I should like to make at this time regarding the Income Tax Act and proposed amendments thereto. I think possibly the Department of National Revenue might very well be renamed the department of archaeology, not only because some members of that department seem to delight in delving into the past but because they seem to extend their digging and delving so far back into the past that they could properly be called archaeologists.

No longer speaking in a spirit of levity, I believe some time limit should be placed on the authority of the Department of National Revenue to make reassessments. Theoretically they can go back as far as 1917, and it seems to me that some time limit, say two or three years, should be sufficient unless, of course, the department can prove fraud. In that case I think the time limit should be extended farther back, but if so the onus should certainly be placed on the department to prove fraud and the onus should not be, as it is at the moment, on the person charged to prove that he is not guilty.

I should like to add one further qualification there. It is possible that from an administrative point of view this suggestion might not work out too well with large corporations, but it would certainly work out very well with farmers, small businessmen and individuals. It is a very difficult thing for a small businessman, a farmer or other individual to keep his records forever, and apparently you cannot get a clearance from the Department of National Revenue to allow you to destroy old records. As I have already mentioned, how far back is a person expected to keep his records? This situation places a person in a very difficult position when he is suddenly investigated by the Department of National Revenue and asked where he got the money to buy a radio five or six years previously. This particularly applies to farmers, and it makes everyone exceedingly apprehensive.

I see it is almost six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and at this time I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Nesbitt the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, according to the rules I find that a minister of the crown has to designate the days for this debate. If I were to state now that it was the intention of the government to use all the days next week for this debate I would hope that, while that would be taken as notice to that effect, if it became necessary or desirable to alter the procedure my present declaration would not preclude me from changing the order if I notified the house on the preceding evening.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, just by way of information, what change has the minister in mind that might occur?

Mr. Harris: None whatever, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 16, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL STATUS OF WOMEN

MEASURE TO REQUIRE EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to provide equal pay for equal work for women.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister inform the house what military equipment, if any, was shipped over the week end in the Star of Assuan, and the destination of that equipment?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I have no knowledge, Mr. Speaker, of any military equipment having been shipped over the week end. I understood from my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the matter was being looked into by his department, which I presume would deal with any export permit required. I have no knowledge of the matter.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Secretary of State for External Affairs inform the house of the position of trade negotiations with Russia which were said to have been initiated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he was in Russia not long ago?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, subsequent to the return of my colleague, a draft trade agreement was forwarded to the Russians. That is the last we have heard of the negotiations. Perhaps we should say that they are pending.

Mr. Fleming: How long ago was that? How long has the government been waiting for a reply?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): About a month.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE TO UNITED NATIONS SCIENTIFIC COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Has Canada appointed a representative to the United Nations scientific committee to study the effects of atomic radiation? If so, who is the representative?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have appointed a representative to that conference. He is Dr. Cipriani of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

GRAIN

WHEAT—PROVISION OF NECESSARY BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he tell the house what is being done to channel the necessary box cars for wheat transportation purposes in the prairie provinces, and what are the possibilities of increasing wheat quotas in the next week or ten days?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the movement of box cars in the west has improved very considerably in the last two weeks, largely as a result of improved weather conditions. I had a letter from the president of the Canadian National Railways this morning in response to continuing correspondence I have had with him. He tells me that he has ordered that 100 new box cars be diverted to western Canada every day in addition to those going out loaded. He also points out that deliveries of new box cars will commence immediately, and all new box cars are for immediate dispatch to western Canada.

I have not the same clear indication from the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I have a general indication given me by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway last Saturday to the effect that they are increasing their supply of box cars in the west, and I may say that unloads at both Vancouver and Fort William indicate that there is a very considerable improvement.

As far as increased quotas are concerned, they are being announced every day. The last report I saw indicated only about one-third of the points are still on initial quota. Other points have one, two or three bushel quotas, and the changes are being made as opportunity presents itself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a supplementary question? I thank the minister for the statement, because it will bring a degree of hope to the western farmers. Approximately what is the extent of the shortage of the necessary cars to transport wheat on the prairies at the present time?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I have not the figure here. When I spoke in Edmonton I said that there was a shortage of 10,000 box cars on the prairies below the customary number in action on that date. I know that there are more box cars today, but I cannot say how many more.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING

INQUIRY AS TO REPEAL OF ACT DURING PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, to satisfy the curiosity of some members on both sides of the house, I wish to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a question. Does the minister intend to introduce a bill to repeal the Yukon Quartz Mining Act this session?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, if and when a decision is reached it will of course appear on the order paper.

FISHERIES

JUAN DE FUCA STRAIT—INQUIRY AS TO CLOSURE OF SOCKEYE SALMON FISHING ON CANADIAN SIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries? Does the government propose to enforce closure on the sockeye salmon fishing on the Canadian side of the strait of Juan de Fuca this year? If so, what steps are being taken to ensure that Canadian fishermen are assured of their fair share of the catch?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, since I was delayed in getting back to Ottawa by the storms in my constituency, I have not had time yet to look into this question, but I assure the hon. member that I shall look into it and bring down the answer as soon as possible.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

ALLEGED CESSATION OF WORK ON WINNIPEG POST OFFICE AND DEER LODGE HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he received a copy of a resolution passed by the Winnipeg city council protesting the cessation of work on the Winnipeg post office, in addition to the Deer Lodge hospital?

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) prefers the term slow-down to the term cessation, but in any event can the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) give assurance as to when the cessation or slow-down may be terminated and full construction resumed?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have been informed there has been no cessation and that the work is proceeding just as expeditiously as possible.

IMMIGRATION

PROPOSED SIMPLIFICATION OF FORMALITIES—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) in a position this morning to answer my question regarding the statement made last week in London by his deputy minister, Mr. Laval Fortier?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have now had a chance to read the item in the newspaper to which the hon. gentleman referred on Friday last and also to read a somewhat expanded report in another newspaper. All it seems to amount to is that an effort is being made to cut down on the amount of paper work that prospective immigrants have to do. I think it is a most laudable objective for any government department anywhere. We are always trying to cut down paper work in my department.

I think perhaps I should say just one other word about the implication in the hon. gentleman's question to the effect that in some way this might be something applied to the United Kingdom only. There is no such intention. Of course it is known to all hon. members that we have one regime for immigrants from the United Kingdom, France and the United States, and another regime for other countries.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN AMOUNT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). As it is now seven years since any change was made in the amount of the old age pension, does the government intend at this session of parliament to increase the amount of the pension in accordance with the increase in our gross national product?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend did not give me notice of his intention to ask this question. I can say at once that the government is giving consideration to a number of matters in the health and welfare field, one of which, as he knows, will involve a discussion with the provinces on the 23rd of this month. We have to bear in mind the over-all situation when we arrive at decisions. But no one in this house should know better than does my hon. friend who made a recommendation that there should be a continuous relation between contributions made under a partially contributory system and benefits to be paid. That was likewise the recommendation of a committee of which my hon. friend was a member, and the government bears in mind recommendations made by parliamentary committees.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 13, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last when the debate was adjourned at six o'clock I had commenced to make certain remarks referring to the Department of National Revenue. At that time I expressed some regret that the speech from the throne made no reference to any intended changes in the Income Tax Act. At the same time I made a suggestion, which I hope the hon. minister might take into consideration. I suggested that a time limit be placed on the activities of the Department of National Revenue as to the time they may go back and make reassessments on private individuals. I believe I suggested a limit of approximately two or three years. As I pointed out at that time, it is very difficult for people to keep records indefinitely and it is particularly arduous on persons who are not familiar with accounting, such as farmers and small businessmen not to mention individuals.

In this regard we all know that there are certain cases of fraud and evasion with respect to the payment of income taxes, but nevertheless I think a great majority of the reassessments that are made concern perfectly innocent mistakes. The way things are at the present time, a person virtually must have a public accountant of some kind to keep his records. As a result most farmers and small businessmen have their income tax returns made up by persons who are not fully qualified. Very often this is done by the township clerk, a conveyancer, a real estate man or someone of that nature. As I say, these people are not always fully qualified and they make plenty of mistakes. In fact, I have heard that qualified people such as chartered accountants have made mistakes in drawing up income tax returns. If they do it I am quite sure that people less qualified are likely to do it as well.

As I pointed out, many reassessments are made on the basis of innocent mistakes. It is quite hard on a small farmer to find suddenly after a few years that he owes, on the return he made some time ago, not only a certain amount of back taxes which he did not pay but interest and sometimes a penalty. I suggest that, where there is no question of fraud or evasion, the matter of interest and penalties be dropped. Of course, this would not apply where it was a matter of fraud or evasion; but where the farmer has had his tax return made up by the township clerk it seems to me most unfair that he should be liable for considerable interest or even a penalty because of a mistake made by someone else.

There is another matter I should like to mention in connection with the Department of National Revenue, and that is the exceedingly arbitrary methods followed on occasion by the department. This seems to be increasingly so. We all realize that it would be quite impossible for the department to carry on its duties unless the onus of proof were placed on the person under suspicion to show that he was innocent. If things were otherwise it would be most difficult for the department to carry on, but I think at times the department goes a little too far and I should like to cite a case which I investigated recently.

About the middle of last July a young man about 20 years of age was sleeping the sleep of the just in the house of his parents who were away on holiday. At about eight o'clock in the morning he heard a knock at the door and when he answered it he found two members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as well as several officials of the Department of National Revenue. They had a search warrant and when they entered the house they kept the young man on one side of the room and questioned him repeatedly as to where the family kept their safe. He told them he did not know that they had a safe in the house, in fact he was quite certain they had not.

At the same time other officials of the department visited the place of business of these people and seized their books. So far everything was perfectly in order but the books of this particular business were quite extensive and when they were taken away the people in charge requested a receipt which was refused. About two months later a form of receipt came in but it was incorrect. In addition to all this, the people had to supply their own truck in order to have the books taken up to the London office of the income tax branch. It is like providing your own car for your own execution. In due course, the business required some of the correspondence taken by the department, for certain business purposes. When it asked to have this correspondence returned, it found that the department had lost it, and this caused considerable difficulty and a certain amount of expense. These books were taken last July and they have not been taken back yet. It is a great inconvenience to this business to have its books lost.

If the Department of National Revenue has to carry out investigations like this, there is no reason why it cannot photostat the records and send them back so that the business can carry on in a normal way. As I have pointed out, the Department of National Revenue has all the advantage on its side. The burden of proof is on the accused, so to speak, and not on the department. Unless some of the extreme measures such as this are checked, they are liable to continue. This is the thin edge of the wedge. If these arbitrary methods are allowed to continue unchecked, there is no telling where they might stop.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

I hope the minister will deny this and say it is not so, but it is my understanding that very often the department will get books from some professional man such as a doctor or dentist and keep them for some time, not for the purpose of checking on his records, but for drawing comparisons so that it can check on some other member of the same profession.

There is another matter about which there is considerable apprehension and suspicion in the minds of large segments of the public —and I hope again the minister will say this is not the case. Very often investigations of individuals are prompted by complaints that have been motivated by a purely personal dislike. I believe the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) last session referred to the income tax division's activities as the "income tax terror". In or about the year 1791, during the regime of the French revolution, known as the "red terror", people would inscribe the name of somebody they did not like on a slip of paper and put it into a box in the shape of a lion's mouth, and the people whose names were on those slips of paper were summarily arrested and guillotined the next day. I am not suggesting that the Minister of National Revenue would do anything like that, but I do say there is a general suspicion that many of these investigations are motivated by complaints arising purely out of jealousy or some personal dislike.

As I say, I hope this is not the case. In any event, many of these methods I have outlined which are employed by the Department of National Revenue—I could speak of them for a long time but I do not wish to take the time of the house in doing so—do not have any place in a democracy. I rather hope the minister will do something to check the zeal of some of the junior members of his department.

Having dealt with some of the omissions from the speech from the throne, I should like to deal for the next few moments with some matters which are in it. Having carefully examined the speech given by His Excellency, I am reminded of an old rhyme I have heard from my parents. This rhyme has to do with weddings of another day and goes something like this: "Something old, something new, something borrowed and something blue." If we were to paraphrase that rhyme, we might say that the speech had something old, nothing new, something borrowed and benefits few.

Apparently the government has borrowed a little from some of the suggestions of the other parties. The suggestion of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), which she has been putting forward for a number of years, has apparently been borrowed. It would also seem from the wording of the speech that the suggestion of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has made in other years regarding small loans is about to be incorporated in government policy.

However, I did not see anything in the speech from the throne making reference to any suggestions from the Social Credit party, which, of course, is rather a pity; but if you look a little more carefully you will see that during 1955 the government has been experimenting with at least one aspect of Social Credit policy. It has always been my understanding that one of the main aspects of Social Credit theory is the circulation of money and the creation of prosperity thereby. I do not think it can be said that the government was experimenting particularly with the circulation of money but I should like to suggest that possibly they have been experimenting with the circulation of at least one product, namely, cheese.

By this I mean that, so far as dollars are concerned, as fast as cheese was exported from the country it was brought back into the country in the form of imports. In this regard I should like to refer to an article in the Picton Gazette of Wednesday, January 11, 1956. The article appears on page 1 and reads as follows:

> Statistics presented to the 23rd annual meeting of the Ontario cheese producers' association in Toronto showed that 6,500,000 pounds of cheese, valued at $3,500,000, were imported during 1955. In the same period 10 million pounds of Canadian cheddar, worth just over $3 million, were exported. Included in the imports, were 5,500,000 pounds of New Zealand cheddar. In his annual report, association president W. O. Coon said a request would be made to the federal government—

And so on. Of course, to be fair, some of these cheese imports consisted of fancy cheeses like Dutch cheese, Danish blue and others. They are included, but as far as dollar value is concerned there was more dollars' worth of cheese imported than exported. The cheese situation has been the source of very considerable annoyance to dairy farmers everywhere, particularly in Ontario.

For a moment let us see what the situation is at the present time with regard to cheese. The latest available figures respecting cheddar cheese that I have been able to obtain are as follows: Stocks on hand on the first of January, 1955, were approximately 42,424,000 pounds. Production in Canada for 1955 amounted to 78,638,000 pounds. Production in 1955 was down a bit from 1954 when the amount was 84½ million pounds, but the fall in production was no doubt due to the very hot, dry summer in Ontario last year. Stocks on hand at January 1, 1955, plus cheese production for the year make a total of 121,062,000 pounds.

In order to see what stocks were on hand at January 1, 1956, the figure for 1955 consumption should be deducted and this amount, according to the latest figures I have been able to obtain, is estimated at 73 million pounds. There must also be deducted the 10 million pounds of cheddar cheese which were exported, leaving a net amount of 38,062,000 pounds. However, to this amount must be added the 5,500,000 pounds of imported New Zealand cheddar which would make the amount of the stocks on hand at January 1, 1956, approximately 43,562,000 pounds, a slightly higher amount than was on hand at the same time last year.

As hon. members will recall, it was just about this time last year that there was a lot of discussion in the house regarding imports of New Zealand cheese. At that time almost 2½ million pounds of New Zealand cheese were being imported. As I recall the situation, at that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) suggested that there would be no further imports of New Zealand cheese for six or nine months. He certainly hit the nail on the head because, as all hon. members know, about nine months later another 3 million pounds of New Zealand cheese were imported into Canada.

Now, as was mentioned at this time last year, this whole situation is ridiculous. It is like bringing coals to Newcastle and is a slap in the face to the dairy industry of Canada. This New Zealand cheese is saleable on the dock at Montreal at 26 cents a pound whereas the Canadian price is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 29 to 31 cents a pound. I say the situation is almost identical with that which existed at this time a year ago. At that time several hon. members in this house set out very completely and concisely some of the hardships that the importation of New Zealand cheese would bring for the cheese producers of Canada, and particularly the Ontario cheese producers who, as hon. members know, have an association of their own for the sale of cheese abroad.

I am not going to take up the time of the house to deal with all the arguments on this subject because they are set out in detail by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) in volume I of the 1955 session of the debates of the House of Commons, page 305. The arguments which the hon. member set out at that time certainly apply today. As has been pointed out, the cheese industry is only one aspect of the dairy industry, but what affects the cheese industry certainly affects other things such as butter. Apparently butter is having its own problems, but that is a matter which will be dealt with by other hon. members in the course of this debate.

On this whole question of dairy products, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the government is not giving the leadership it should. It is standing by with folded arms and allowing things to slip. Farm groups have become exceedingly aggravated over this cheese question. What can the government do? I submit that the government can do one of two things. They could either raise the tariff on cheese or adopt another procedure open to them with which I shall deal in just a moment.

Now, farm groups have become very upset over this situation, and the result is that I received a resolution from the Oxford county federation of agriculture which I should like to read. The resolution is as follows:

> Be it resolved that the Ontario and Canadian Federations of Agriculture make emphatic representation to the federal government asking the imposition of a tariff duty upon all imports of cheese, milk powder and other dairy products equivalent to the protection granted other industries and sufficient to allow producers of dairy products an equitable share of the national income.

I can see why the federation of agriculture would send in a resolution like that. The present one cent tariff on cheese accomplishes nothing. It certainly does not protect the dairy industry and it certainly does not provide much revenue, so I really cannot see what the purpose of the one cent duty on cheese is. I know quite well, at least we have always heard, that the present government is not interested in raising tariffs. In fact, we are told it is rather more interested in lowering them, so the government may not wish to raise the tariff on cheese. Whether or not they should may be another matter, but I do not think they will want to do it.

I would suggest there is another procedure open to the government to check further importation of New Zealand cheese into Canada. This procedure was very concisely set out last session by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. White) on page 334 of the debates of the House of Commons for the 1955 session, volume I. The procedure outlined by the hon. member on that occasion has to do with the use of the Export and Import Permits Act. On one or two occasions last year I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) intimated that this act had no application to cheese, but in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac I believe that possibly the minister might be mistaken. Perhaps the government has the necessary machinery set up to bring the importation of cheese under the Export and Import Permits Act. I feel that before this debate is finished some statement should be forthcoming either from the Minister of Trade and Commerce or from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

The dairy farmers of Ontario and the cheese producers association of Ontario have a right to know what, if anything, the government is going to do. It must be remembered that Ontario produces three-quarters of the cheddar cheese produced in Canada. If something is not done at once the farmers who produce cheese and other dairy products are going to suffer. As I said before, I hope that before this debate is completed we will have a statement of policy from either the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address. I was particularly impressed with both speeches; both were excellent. When the mover of the address turned her attention to northern Ontario, her burst of eloquence about that great territory thrilled me. I am sure all of the people of northern Ontario appreciated her remarks about her constituency.

This debate has taken an extraordinary turn, one which I find it hard to believe. The speech from the throne was brought down at a time when the Canadian economy is travelling in the highest possible gear. Everything and every resource is stretched to the limit. My department is concerned with finding enough steel to keep the economy rolling in the face of a world shortage of steel. The world is short of nickel, of copper, of aluminium, and a shortage is developing very rapidly in newsprint. In order to maintain progress and maintain employment, these problems require everyday attention.

Now, the debate has turned on surpluses, and what are those surpluses? They are wheat and butter, although cheese was mentioned today. I can relieve the minds of hon. members about cheese. I have been informed several times by my office that there is not sufficient matured cheese available for export to enable us to fill our quota in the British market, which is a valuable market for fully matured cheddar cheese, which product commands a substantial premium in that market. Therefore, let us not talk about a surplus of cheese. However, it is interesting to see that the hon. member who mentioned cheese is devising ways of accentuating a shortage. In other words, if we could have a greater shortage of cheese, everything would be wonderful.

This has been the attitude of the opposition to the supply problem. Shortages are wonderful, to be solved by simply denying their existence. We sat in this house all during last July when speaker after speaker would get up and say that there were no shortages. I would indicate that even then there were shortages of steel, of nickel, of aluminium and of other materials. But this was denied by the opposition. What was the purpose of keeping us here during the month of July? It was to prevent the government from getting authority on a reasonably long-term basis to deal with the materials in short supply and to allocate those materials to the best advantage of the Canadian economy.

Let us return to the surpluses we have. There could have been no debate, I am afraid, if the weather had taken a different turn. If we had had a very dry spring and a very dry early summer, instead of a very wet spring and a very wet early summer, we would have had no surplus of either wheat or butter. We would have been about on balance in wheat, and butter would have been in short supply. The Conservatives, the C.C.F. and the Social Crediters would have said this is wonderful; we have no surpluses, and without surpluses I do not know what the discussion on the speech from the throne could have been. However, we have a surplus of wheat, and already it has been attacked. We must do away with this surplus. The suggestion was made by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that we immediately adopt the soil bank plan of the United States government. I suppose he thought that that would be a new plan. We in Canada invented the soil bank plan back in 1941. At that time we had an accumulation of wheat which resulted from the dislocations of war, the sinking of ships in the Atlantic and our inability to supply wheat, even though countries overseas were very anxious to obtain it. At that time we instituted the soil bank plan. We paid our producers to take their acreage out of wheat and put it into coarse grains or summerfallow. As a result of that policy, we reduced acreage in wheat from 27¾ million acres in 1940 to 16 million acres in 1943, a reduction of 11¾ million acres. During the year 1955 only about 20 million acres are planted to wheat, which is a reduction of 7¾ million acres planted to wheat since 1940.

Well, we should plant at least 20 million acres of wheat. I believe that our economy requires production to that extent. I will admit at once that if we get five more wet years in succession, 20 million acres of wheat will produce an accumulating surplus in this country. But I think I have lived in the western country, and I think many other hon. members have lived in western Canada, long enough to know that never before in the history of western Canada have we had five very wet years in succession. Therefore, I reject the soil bank plan or any other plan destined eventually to place wheat in the deficit column. If we cannot keep wheat supplies in balance, let us have a surplus of wheat, but let us never adopt a policy that can produce less wheat than our markets will take.

It has been said that the reason for the surplus is that exports have not been up to standard; that the government has been lax in not exporting sufficient wheat to take care of the western situation. Let us examine the levels of exports. We will go back to the good years when everyone was quite happy about wheat, when the farmers were happy, and when we had a situation that seemed to call for no criticism. We will go back to 1947-48. In that year we exported 195 million bushels of wheat; in 1948-49 we exported 232 million bushels of wheat; in 1949-50 we exported 225 million bushels of wheat; in 1950-51 we exported 241 million bushels of wheat. In other words, the average export for those four very satisfactory years was 223 million bushels per year.

Now, let us look at the last four crop years. In 1951-52 we exported 355 million bushels; in 1952-53 we exported 385 million bushels; in 1953-54 we exported 255 million bushels; and in 1954-55 we exported 252 million bushels, an average of 312 million bushels of wheat exported from Canada per year. It is rather interesting that in not one of the good years were the exports as large as exports during the least satisfactory export year in the past four years. Last year we exported 252 million bushels of wheat. We have heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) talk that kind of nonsense about a drop in exports and suggest methods that we should adopt to correct the situation. He is quite willing to advise us on that point. But never in any of the years from 1947 to 1950 did we export as much as we exported last year.

I could go into the deliveries, which mean more to the farmers than exports. They are of more immediate importance to him. In the war years, when we had a sellers' market, when we could export anything we could produce, beginning with 1940 and going through 1944, the average deliveries by farmers to country elevators amounted to 326 million bushels a year. In the next years, 1945 through 1949, the five-year average was 286 million bushels marketed. In the last five years—1950 through 1954—a yearly average of 415 million bushels of wheat were marketed by farmers. Perhaps I should give the house the figures for all grains, including wheat, oats, barley and other grains. In the five-year period, 1940 through 1944, the total marketing of all grains averaged 492 million bushels. The five-year average from 1945 through 1949 was 456 million bushels. In the five years from 1950 through 1954, the average was 656 million bushels.

We have had a great deal of advice as to how this wheat should be sold. We are told how our methods are antiquated; that the world has been moving ahead of us and that we should adopt methods of other countries in disposing of our wheat. We have had a great number of references to bartering and to selling for local currencies. What is the purpose of bartering? Barter was used centuries ago before money was invented. But today the only purpose of barter is to give a customer through barter a deal which you would not give him for dollars. The same is true of local currency. The reference is not to local currencies that we could bring back to Canada. You sell for local currencies and you leave the local currencies in the purchasing country. That is the method that has been used where wheat is sold for local currency. In other words, a form of give-away, and the give-away usually represents up to 70 per cent or 80 per cent of the value of the wheat. These are also direct give-aways. Hon. gentlemen know we give away wheat when there is an urgent need for wheat. We have given wheat to several countries when, as a result of disaster, or crop failure, that sort of gift was a desirable procedure.

However, I wish I could persuade hon. gentlemen—it seems obvious to me—that we must treat all our customers alike. If we give wheat to one customer, barter wheat with another customer to his advantage, or accept local currencies from a third customer, then to expect to get cash from a fourth customer is of course absolutely untenable. I can give a very good illustration of that point. Two years ago the United States started their five-point plan for disposing of wheat. In that year about 41 per cent of their wheat exports went under programs involving give-away. Last year one of the official reports of the department of agriculture stated that 66 per cent of their wheat exports went out under the five-point program. I have seen predictions that this year practically 100 per cent of their wheat exports will go out under the five-point program. There is a law of economics that I am sure most of us remember. It is called Gresham's law. That law goes back even longer than I have lived, by about two centuries. Gresham's law is that a bad currency will drive out a good currency.

That is exactly what has happened to the United States in marketing wheat. The bad currencies are those deals which sell wheat at less than its value in good currency. The result is that our competitor can no longer sell wheat in exchange for good currency. Here we have a perfect example of the working out of Gresham's law, so far as the wheat marketing operation is concerned.

I could go on at further length and talk about sales for local currency or through barter deals. I think the idea of sales for local currency should be pretty well ended by a statement made in Winnipeg by a high officer of the British high commissioner's office when he stated that if we accepted pounds sterling for wheat we would not sell one more bushel of wheat to the United Kingdom. We shall therefore not pursue that matter further.

I now come to the point at issue. We have surpluses of wheat in Canada. The delivery position was particularly aggravated this year owing to the fact that our sales in the early part of the marketing year were much below those of a year ago. What was the reason for that situation? The reason was that there was no confidence abroad in the pricing of wheat in North America. Everyone expected that, since the United States was depending on their five-point program to export wheat, Canada would be forced to do something similar, or at the very least would be forced to cut prices drastically.

The situation was further aggravated by the bearish propaganda that went out from Canada itself. Every time I would read a speech by an opposition member using extreme language about our surplus wheat, I would say to myself, "I wonder what that speech is going to cost the producer of western Canada". Every time we would get resolutions from the boards of trade in the various wheat areas, we would say to ourselves: "That postpones buying some more". But the fact of the matter is that up to the first of November there was no forward buying of Canadian wheat. When a boat was under the grain elevator spout, the buyer would buy wheat to put in that particular boat, but our advance sales were woefully deficient up to that date.

Then apparently everyone began to believe that Canada was going to maintain a price, because orders started to come in. I have never before in my experience seen buying as active and as steady as it has been since November 1. True, our exports are behind exports of a similar date last year, and it will probably be about March before we can pass the record of exports of last year. The reason for that is that at this season we have to bring our grain out through the winter ports, a process which is much slower than when the St. Lawrence is open. However, we are selling wheat.

I told the farmers in western Canada, when I spoke to several gatherings there, that exports were down at that time but I predicted that exports would pick up later in the year. That is what is happening. I went to western Canada for one reason only, namely to see just what the situation was there and the extent to which it could be remedied. In Regina I spoke to the delegates of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. I said that I spoke. I might say those sessions last all day and everybody speaks. I was just one of many speakers. I attended the meeting of the Alberta wheat pool delegates, and I also attended the annual meeting of the farmers' union at Edmonton. Prior to that visit, and because of the lack of early marketing possibilities, I made up my mind that something should be done to assist the farmers—and particularly the small operators—to finance themselves until marketing could return to normal. I recommended to the government that the system of loans that was used in 1951 be made available again this year. Other plans were considered very carefully at that time. We considered as to whether loans could be made through country elevator agents. We found insurmountable obstacles. Loans made by chartered banks are protected by the Bank Act, which is a federal act. Loans made in any other way, except through the banks, would have little or no security. Grain on the farm comes under the heading of property and civil rights, which is a matter for the province. A government lien on grain on the farm would have to take second place to tax liens, and would be on a par with liens put on by implement dealers or suppliers of any other kind. That matter was explored thoroughly. The government decided the only practical way to handle the matter would be to arrange guaranteed loans from the chartered banks.

It has been said that the interest rate is too high at 5 per cent. I have been a borrower from banks all my life, and I have never yet succeeded in borrowing money from a bank at less than 5 per cent. I know of many periods in my life when, if the government had guaranteed my bank loan, it would have relieved me of a great deal of stress and strain. I therefore cannot be too greatly concerned about objections to guaranteed loans bearing an interest rate of 5 per cent.

Recently there has been a great drive for advances on farm-stored grain. The suggestion has been for three-quarters of the value of the grain to be advanced by the wheat board. Many hon. members may think that the inspiration for that suggestion came from the farms. I can assure you there has been nothing of the kind. It came from the cities. If I had time, I could quote chapter and verse to that effect. Who are its supporters? The supporters are the enemies of marketing through the wheat board.

Mr. Nicholson: You have all the time you want.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think I have only ten minutes more. Which are the two newspapers that are advocating the advances on wheat stored on the farm? One is the Winnipeg Free Press and the other is the Financial Post. The Winnipeg Free Press is a great newspaper, but its declared policy has been for many years to do away with marketing through the wheat board and to return to marketing through the grain exchange. As far as the Financial Post is concerned, it too has followed a consistent policy of attempting to end the marketing of western wheat through the wheat board.

Now, let us examine the position of the wheat board. In every market where Canadian grain is sold I think you will find people who will tell you that the ablest grain marketing organization in the world is the Canadian wheat board. The chairman of the board has been in the service of the government for 25 years, his duties associated solely with the marketing of western grain. Associated with him are three very able men who share in the work of the board. I can tell the house that, if the government instructed the wheat board to lend money on farm-stored grain and assume the responsibility for the lending of that money and its subsequent collection, the four members of the wheat board would be out of office within a matter of days.

Mr. Argue: You made them handle box cars against their wishes.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member made his speech; may I have the next turn. It must be remembered that the money administered by the wheat board is the farmers' money. It is not the board's money, it is not the government's money. True, we provide a bank guarantee to give the board borrowing powers, but the board administers the farmers' funds, and is responsible to the producers for those funds. I have had experience in handling other people's money and I know that if you are going to do that successfully you must be very careful about your commitments. I have been handling other people's money for 40 years, and I have reason to know whereof I speak.

You must be careful about lending on grain where only limited security can be had. The grain on the farm would be the only security the board would have. It may be said that the farmer would have to market the grain and bring it to the country elevator eventually, when the board would be able to recover its loan; but I suggest that the farmer does not necessarily have to bring it to the country elevator. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) threatened us with the situation where the farmer would refuse to do that and would feed the grain on his farm. It is perfectly legal for a farmer to sell grain to another farmer within the province. If any of these things happened the board would have no effective recourse. It is true the board would have a lien on the grain, but after the grain has been consumed it would be pretty difficult to execute the board's lien. It is not a lien that takes priority over anything, rather it is a lien that is secondary to other claims.

An effective means of taking security on farm stored grain would be just impossible to work out, and I think the people who started the propaganda knew that, and saw its possibilities as a means of destroying the wheat board. I am sure that that is the case. Why would the Financial Post advocate loans on farm-stored grain except as an effective means of destroying the wheat board?

Mr. Argue: What about the delegates?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is nonsense.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Let us look at the position of the delegates. A resolution was presented to the annual meeting of the united grain growers, one of the oldest co-operative societies in western Canada advocating that loans be made by the wheat board against farm-stored grain, and that resolution was defeated almost unanimously, and with very little discussion. Practically the same resolution was presented to the delegates meeting of the Alberta wheat pool, and it was defeated. The same resolution went before the delegates of the Manitoba wheat pool, was passed at one session, was reconsidered at the next session and modified to ask for loans on farm-stored grain only provided suitable arrangements could be made by the Canadian wheat board.

True, it was passed at the meeting of the delegates of the Saskatchewan pool. Unfortunately I have no way of knowing just what happened, but I was told it was passed by a small margin and after a heated discussion between those for the resolution and those opposed to it.

A favoring resolution was passed by the three farmers' unions, but I must say that at the meeting of the farmers' union which I attended a resolution was presented asking for a vote of confidence in the Canadian wheat board which was passed unanimously, except for one vote in opposition.

In other words, the attitude of the farmers' unions is something like the attitude of the C.C.F. party in this house: that party is in favour of the wheat board but, and the "but" is always there. I have never heard a clean-cut statement from the C.C.F. party that it is unreservedly in favour of the wheat board. I read a clipping of a speech by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in which it was reported that he said that when he came down here he would put a motion before the house that would make the Liberals stand up and be counted regarding their attitude toward loans on farm-stored grain. I am not worried about the attitude of my fellow Liberals, because I know that the Liberal party favours the present methods of marketing wheat and I am pretty sure that our members on the Liberal side will see through the propaganda drive which is behind the demand for advances on farm-stored grain.

I will be most interested to see how the opposition will respond to that demand that they stand up and be counted. I know how a few of them will, particularly the Conservatives. I think I have them pretty well sorted out as to who believes in wheat board marketing and who does not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the western farm conference in December attended by the ministers of agriculture of two of the western provinces?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Is the hon. member referring to the meeting he organized in Prince Albert or the meeting in Regina or Saskatoon?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am referring to the Saskatoon meeting.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The Saskatoon meeting and the Prince Albert meeting were attended by certain pool leaders, certain implement manufacturers and certain citizens of the towns attended. As far as the Saskatoon meeting is concerned, I did not see any advocacy there of payments on farm-stored grain, although my memory may have slipped. Certainly at the Prince Albert meeting we had a ringing declaration by the city boys who could hardly wait to get at that $500 million of prospective loans to farmers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like the minister to answer this question. Did the western farm conference in Saskatoon, which was attended by the minister of agriculture of the Liberal government of Manitoba and other representatives, not send a delegation to Ottawa, which included representatives of the Liberal party, to ask for farm-stored wheat advances, and did not Mr. McDonald, the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, say that your plans were as effective as a stirrup pump in a forest fire?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): This delegation came to Ottawa from the Saskatoon conference and my colleagues will confirm the impression that we got from that meeting at Ottawa that there were two or three delegates present who advocated payments on farm-stored grain, but there were certainly those who advocated just the opposite. I will get together all my records of the Saskatoon meeting because we will have further discussion of this subject. I will be able to answer the questions of my hon. friend during the debate which will take place on the legislation.

We are told that the prairies are in a desperate plight, that if something is not done immediately there is going to be a serious drop in buying power on the prairies which will be reflected in eastern Canada and thus we will soon have another depression. I was able to get from the bureau of statistics only the records of retail sales on the prairies for the first nine months in 1955 as compared with the first nine months in 1954. I find that in Manitoba retail sales were up 4·3 per cent.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In Alberta retail sales were up by 6·4 per cent.

An hon. Member: That cannot be.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In Saskatchewan retail sales were down by 1·7 per cent.

An hon. Member: We can understand that.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Incidentally, there is no change in the price level between those years. I have no desire to disparage the position of the producers. A certain number of producers have found themselves in difficulty this past season, and the purpose of the guaranteed loan was to relieve those smaller producers. I was told several times, mostly by city people, that it was ridiculous to offer $1,500 and that that was chicken feed. I am not interested in the man who thinks $1,500 is chicken feed. That particular loan was intended to relieve that situation. As far as the long term situation is concerned, it seemed to me it was a hardship on the western farmer that he should be required to pay the carrying charges at the level required when grain storage is filled for practically 12 months in the year. Apart from that, it did not seem to me that there was any particular burden on the farmer through this condition of plenty.

However, the carrying charges, which used to run at between eight and 10 cents a bushel, went up last year to 16 cents a bushel and could go as high as 20 cents a bushel. That is a burden on the farmer for doing something that is in his own interests and also in the interests of the country as a whole, for it is greatly in the interests of the Canadian economy as a whole that we should have orderly marketing of western wheat, and that the full value of that wheat should be recovered through our marketing methods. Therefore, on my return from the western trip, I recommended to the government that the farmer be relieved of a substantial part of the cost of storage involved by the carryover of wheat, that the government take that over and pay carrying charges on the abnormal portion of the carryover of wheat held in storage for government account. That, I think, is reasonable, in these circumstances, and we shall go into that proposal in more detail as we reach the bill presently on the order paper.

I see that my time is exhausted. I might sum up by putting the attitude of the opposition and the attitude of the Liberal party in a few short words. I think it can be fairly said that the attitude of the opposition is that they seek strength and progress through scarcity; as long as there is scarcity they are quite satisfied, and everything is fine. The attitude of the government is that it wants strength and progress through sufficiency. Even if planning for long-range sufficiency involves building up temporary surpluses, we shall take the onus for that program. We shall endeavour to see that hardship is not permitted to fall on the producer, but we are glad to have surpluses, particularly at a time when, in so many areas, we have acute shortages that hold within themselves the seeds of inflation.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I wish, like other members, to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I know that it is a great honour to be bestowed on a member, and I am sure the people who sent them here will appreciate the honour that has been bestowed on them.

I wish to raise the problem of the Disabled Persons Act as it is administered in Manitoba. Many disabled persons there are not receiving the benefits of that act. I took this matter up with the genial minister some time ago, and he said that 2,200 people had applied for it in Manitoba, but only 371 people had been granted the pension. Six hundred and seventy people had applied but had been refused, and another 1,000 or 1,500 people had applied but their applications had not been dealt with.

I could take you to the constituency of Selkirk and show you people who can hardly walk along the street. They are not able to earn their bread and butter, but still they have been turned down because they are able to walk. It is misleading to have a Disabled Persons Act when it does not help the people who are disabled and who should be looked after. I am going to appeal again to the government and to the minister that they speed up this matter and see that those who are entitled to this allowance receive it.

Now I wish to talk about conditions in the Selkirk constituency, the interlake country. I have listened to my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) telling us today about the great crops we have. In my constituency of Selkirk we have nothing. I told the Prime Minister last year that there would be people starving in Selkirk constituency, and he said that would not be the case. I can assure him it is the case today. People are leaving the interlake district because they cannot get enough to eat. They are crowding into the cities. If a community does not have a crop for one year, it is a catastrophe; but, when it does not have a crop for two years, it is a disaster. The dominion government should step in and do a little for these people.

I said that the people are leaving the interlake district. My good friend, the Minister of Justice(Mr. Garson) knows that what I am saying is true. He has been up there, and I wish he had told the government more about it. He saw the conditions in which these people were living. A survey was made last October at Teulon, about 40 miles from Winnipeg, and it was found that about 60 people were leaving every morning to go to Winnipeg to dig sewers or do other work so that they could get bread and butter for their tables. I do not know how far you are going to let this go before you do something for these people. These people are not wheat farmers, about whom you hear other members talking; they are just ordinary dirt farmers who keep a few cows and cultivate a quarter section of land. Many farmers who had cattle have had to sell them. This survey was taken in Teulon, but the other districts surrounding it, at about the same distance from Winnipeg, are in the same position. I could not give you accurate figures for them, but a survey should be taken. These people who had cattle have very few left now because when the disaster first struck they sold a few head in order to keep going, and since then they have been continually getting rid of more all the time. They are not going to have any cattle left, and it is their cattle on which they depend. They depend on their cattle for the production of cream which brings in enough cash to supply them with the necessities of life.

The provincial government has been concerned with the matter but the provincial officials always tell me that the dominion government is not doing anything and that when they do something the provincial government will step in and help too. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) spoke he referred to mass meetings. There have been many mass meetings in the interlake country, some of them having as many as 500 farmers in attendance. These meetings were not called by any political party. They were called by the rank and file farmers with the support of the municipalities in which they live. These farmers want to know what is going to happen so far as they are concerned.

What does the provincial government offer them? They say that they will try to provide work and wages. How are they going to do that? They say to these farmers, "Well, you can go to the bush." How can a man who has a few head of cattle and other stock go to the bush? The bachelors can go and those farmers who do not do anything but grow grain. The provincial government also said they would pay for the trucking of hay into the districts where it is needed. They said they would pay for the trucking of the hay. What I want to know is, who is going to pay for the hay? These people have no money to buy hay so very little trucking of hay is going on. Mr. Robertson, the minister of agriculture for Manitoba, said to these farmers: "You can go to your municipality and get relief at 6 per cent."

That is the position in which these farmers in Selkirk find themselves. I know what the federal government did. They sent a man to the district to survey the damage to the farms and as a result paid the farmers so much money for damage to their buildings. The farmers of the interlake country do not care what their farms look like. They want to be able to get back into production again. They want to be able to produce cattle because conditions there are really bad.

I want to say something about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as it affects these people.

I have a resolution here that I am going to read. The interlake farmers come under the P.F.A.A. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows how much money has been paid there. He has paid out more money there than he ever did before but it has only been a drop in the bucket. Then there is the case of the man who bought crown land. If he bought crown land after the 31st of December, 1940, the law says he cannot participate in P.F.A.A. benefits. But here is the hard thing. He has to pay into the fund. Last year the minister said in the house that these men have paid about $300,000 into the fund. I do not know what would happen if any private company or individual took money from people for such a purpose and then refused them the benefits of it. That is what is happening. These farmers have paid $300,000 into the fund but they have never got anything back and the law says they cannot get anything back. I bet that if anybody else did that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) would have the person on the carpet right away. I know he would not let me, any co-operative society or anybody else do it. Money is being taken from these people for benefits that they can never be paid.

I have a resolution here from the Manitoba farmers' union, Fisher Branch, one of the districts that has been pretty badly hit. It contains an appeal on behalf of these people who bought crown lands. When these men came back from the war we were delighted to have them take up farming, but now they have had two or three bad years and the first thing we know they will leave their farms and go back where they came from. The resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas the farmers who bought land from the government after 1940 are not able to participate in the P.F.A.A. assistance and as these farmers contribute into this fund when they deliver grain to any elevator and as these farmers are in a desperate need of assistance in this area;
> Be it resolved that we urge the government to consider these needy fellows and bring them into the P.F.A.A. program so they may participate in the assistance along with the other farmers.

I appeal to the minister to give this matter further consideration when he brings the act before the house for revision. If he even granted assistance for this year until times get a little better it would be of tremendous benefit to these people.

In my opinion many eastern members and others who do not know the situation think that when a person receives P.F.A.A. assistance he is getting a lot of money. Some of the cheques that have been arriving in the Eriksdale district have been for $5, $7, $20 and so on. The same is true of the Arborg district. How it is computed that a man should only receive $5 or $7 as a payment for his year's operations I do not know. I think there should be a survey of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The whole operation of the legislation should be investigated. During the recess I spent half my time answering letters and dealing with Mr. Bird, the director at Regina, with respect to P.F.A.A. applications. The districts hardest hit are Fisher Branch, Eriksdale, Arborg, Riverton and even some of the sections farther south such as Teulon, Woodlands and Petersfield. They have all been badly hit.

There is no use of my going over the whole matter again, but I want to make a suggestion before I sit down. Our troubles in the west seem to arise from the fact that we have too much grain. Then send some of it to Selkirk. We need feed, we need seed, and there seems to be an abundance. I have not seen it myself but I have seen photographs in the newspapers of wheat standing out in the field. The people of the interlake country have had no crop for two years. They need seed and they need feed so that they will not have to sell more cattle. I do not know how much plainer I can make the situation. It is a desperate one, and I hope that the Manitoba member of the cabinet will help me to impress upon the other members of the cabinet how serious the situation is. The interlake country has met with a disaster such as it never had before. There have been two years during which there has been no crop. I want the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to give consideration to extending the P.F.A.A. benefits to those who have paid into it. If a man is not to receive the benefits, then do not take his money. I hope the cabinet will send somebody out there, and they will see that I am telling the truth in this house. They will see how serious the situation is. Then, we could ship in feed and seed to these people who so badly need it.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): May I be privileged, Mr. Speaker, with other members in this house who have preceded me, to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address. I do so with the knowledge that to speak in this house, particularly at the opening of the session, is an ordeal through which many people have gone and one which they have carried out with a great deal of distinction to themselves and to this house.

Before beginning my main theme today I wish to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), for whose opinions I have always had a great deal of respect. He referred to the large iron ore deposits which we have in Newfoundland and Labrador. In the course of his remarks he said this at pages 56 and 57 of Hansard for January 12, 1956:

> In the field of trade we find that many significant decisions concerning Canadian economic life are made outside of Canada, that many Canadian firms which are subsidiaries of United States companies buy in the United States from their parent companies or buy from firms with which their United States parent has also entered into contracts, thus placing obstacles in the way of the diversification of Canadian trade.
> Should we then not insist that more of our own resources should be used in this country? Not long ago I read in the Montreal Gazette a statement made by John C. Doyle, president of Canadian Javelin, which referred to what he called the most valuable and largest iron ore deposit in the world in Labrador. He referred to talks which were going on between the company and United States steel and iron ore interests, and he seemed to suggest that it would be only a matter of time until the company was taken over lock, stock and barrel, as he put it, by United States concerns.
> Of course we know what will happen. This iron ore will go down on the railways which are being built to the sea, it will be put into ships and go to the United States.

We have had these iron ore deposits in Labrador for countless ages. We know that Canada is not in a position to digest these large deposits of iron ore, and the question arises, what are we going to do with them? Well, we cannot eat them. It has been suggested also in this house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and I have commended him for it, that we give away the great surplus of wheat that we have to the hungry people. As a practising Christian, I cannot take exception to that proposition. Well, we have friends and we have allies who need our raw materials. If we cannot digest our raw materials at the present time I think we have a duty also to our allies to see that they get the raw materials for which their economy is so badly in need.

I am not so concerned about foreign capital coming into Canada to help us with the development of our natural resources. One need only picture the oil situation in Alberta and Saskatchewan. It needed not only United States capital but United States know-how to develop it. If we took a selfish attitude regarding our natural resources, what would have happened to the oil in those provinces? May I say also that of this iron ore which we have there and which we want to put to use, according to the latest information I have, two or three million tons will be going to our allies in Europe to help their economies.

I am not concerned so much about what capital comes in to develop our natural resources, as I am with the fact that we should develop them. When the time comes that Canada needs these natural resources this government, or whatever government is in power, will see that Canada gets her share first. I think that policy has been enunciated in this house for three or four years. I am not concerned so much, therefore, with whether United States capital or any other capital comes into this country as I am with the development of the natural resources we have and putting them to the best use to which they can be put.

We have heard a great deal about wheat in this country. We shall hear more about the wheat situation and the plight of the farmers in the west with whom we all sympathize. I believe a way will be found to help the farmers and relieve them of some of the burdens they are carrying. I am sure that those of us who do not belong to the west will sympathetically receive any reasonable proposition which comes before this house to alleviate any distress in the western provinces. We are not one-section Canadians in this house, we are Canadians. What affects one part of this country affects the other part.

In connection with these very large iron deposits which we have in Labrador, may I say also that we have the largest hydroelectric potential of any part of the world. I refer to the Hamilton river-Grand Falls hydroelectric potential. It may be news to members in this house that a very large British concern, allied with other British concerns, has spent several million dollars in investigating this hydroelectric potential. We have these huge iron ore deposits, and we have other mineral deposits. Right alongside of them we have this wonderful hydroelectric potential which we want to put to use. If we develop our iron ore deposits, we will develop the hydroelectric energy sufficient to run those mines.

We are concerned in Newfoundland to see that this development takes place, and that it goes forward as speedily as possible. It may be news also to some members who have advocated our natural resources in Canada that for the last 50 years we have been exporting iron ore from Bell island to European countries of some 2·5 million tons and a half million to Dominion Steel in Nova Scotia and the balance goes overseas. I have mentioned this in order to bring to the attention of the house that we have a large potential in natural resources which we want to develop and which we wish to develop in the best interests of Canada and the people of our province. In this way we hope to achieve a diversification of our economy and allow our people to get the work they so badly need.

I turn now from quoting the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to a few remarks made by the hon. member for

Macleod (Mr. Hansell) which are found on page 62 of Hansard for January 12, 1956. The hon. member made his usual witty and entertaining speech, and referred to the situation out west. He used these words:

> In a nutshell the problem is this. Here are six loaves of bread and here are six hungry men with no money in their pockets.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) is a brother divine. I was rather disappointed —when he mentioned the six loaves of bread —that he did not say anything about the little fishes. I am sure he knows the scriptures, and the lesson which we have read so many times, namely, the miracle of the loaves and the fishes. He will remember that that lesson refers to bread and fish; it was not bread alone. In that lesson our Lord demonstrated that what the people needed was a balanced diet. That brings me to my theme, the purpose for which I am speaking here today, namely, the fisheries of Canada.

Mr. Winters: Very good.

Mr. Stick: There are two main primary producers in this country, the farmers and the fishermen. We have heard a lot about the problems of our friends on the farm, but we do not hear overmuch about the problems of the fishermen. Newfoundland was discovered some 450 odd years ago, and it was discovered because of the great wealth which was found in the sea around our coast. We may say that today the fisheries are our national economic problem. It is our national industry; it has always been so and it is still so today. Anybody who knows anything about the sea knows that the fisherman's life is not a rosy one. It is a life of hazard and a gamble, when he has to go out day by day and night by night seeking a living on the face of the water.

Many years ago a bank manager was transferred from the west to St. John's, Newfoundland, and he made a remark something like this. He found it far more difficult to make advances to fish merchants than to farmers when he was in western Canada because when he made his advance on the prospective wheat crop and other grains he could see those grains growing, but when he made advances to a fish merchant he could not see the fish in the sea. According to his story, he was taking greater risks making advances to fish merchants than when he was lending money to farmers. That is true. Our men take chances. Our men go out in their big boats, and a great majority of them in small boats. They go out day by day, and they do not know whether they are going to get a catch of fish or not; but they go. They take the chance; they take all the risks involved in storms and stress of weather which can destroy their fishing gear overnight. They may have very little to show for their day's toil. This has been going on for many centuries in Newfoundland. Therefore, it may be said that our people live by faith, faith in divine Providence to give them the blessings of the harvest of the sea.

Newfoundland has been described as a land of hope and tragedy. I think there is a lot of truth in that also. We have had many tragedies in Newfoundland, but we have always had hope.

As I have said, this has been going on for hundreds of years. Our fishermen now find themselves in the position where it is very difficult for them to replace their equipment owing to the high cost of replacement. It is true that a few years ago we had a depression in our fishing industry. At the present time things are looking a lot better. The high cost of replacement is something about which our fishermen have to worry, and rightly so. As I said, they go out and they produce. They are one of the primary producers of this country. They accept all the hazards of their calling. They look around and they see the products which they have brought in being processed in the processing plants which we have around our coast and which we hope to expand, and they see the workers in those plants qualifying for unemployment insurance. They who have produced the wherewithal to give work to these people are denied this privilege. I go around my riding year after year and I speak to hundreds of our men and our women, too. They say to me: "Mr. Stick, why can we not get the benefits of unemployment insurance?" I say to them: "It is not an easy thing to bring about; there are great difficulties in the way." I hope that in time, after a proper study is made, our fishermen may have the benefit of the system of unemployment insurance, for which they are willing to pay, so that they may feel they are not discriminated against.

Last year we had a report on this problem from an interdepartmental committee. The most charitable thing I can say about that report is that it is the most negative report that I ever read in my life. That committee went out of its way to find every excuse it could so that our fishermen would not have benefit from unemployment insurance. I spoke on it last year and I make an appeal now. Our fishermen in Newfoundland feel—and I expect this feeling persists in other provinces as well—they have a right to participate in unemployment insurance. Furthermore, they are prepared to pay their proportion the same as other workers. My appeal today is this. Their cause is just; they are worthy of it. I hope the interdepartmental committee will carry on its work until it does find a way to include the fishermen in the national scheme of unemployment insurance which we have in Canada. I do not care what department it comes under. I do not care whether it comes under the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Fisheries. I believe it can be done. This problem can be solved. If there is a will there is a way. It is high time this problem was solved, and something should be done at this session or at the next session.

This is my idea as to how it should be done. I do not want boards of civil servants going around checking on the fishermen to see whether they are fishing today, tomorrow or the next day. In the main, our fishermen are honest people. I put forth this idea for what it is worth. In Newfoundland we know that if a man catches a certain quantity of fish he is a full-time fisherman, and that he must fish the whole season to catch that quantity of fish, whether it is codfish, lobsters or other kinds of fish. Let us get a yardstick so that if the fisherman catches a thousand pounds or two thousand pounds, let us say, of codfish, he would be entitled to full benefit of unemployment insurance, and he would pay for them. If we work out the yardstick on that basis, then he would get his receipts from the merchant to whom he sells his fish, and on those receipts the government, with their agents going around and with their fish inspectors, would know very well that he had caught this quantity of fish and therefore he is a full-time fisherman; he has fished the whole 190 days and is entitled to unemployment insurance because he has paid his assessment the same as the other ordinary worker. Surely, some yardstick can be worked out. There are enough brains in the civil service of Canada to work out a yardstick so that our fishermen by fishing the full time would reap the benefit of unemployment insurance.

The argument used against my suggestion is that it would be subsidizing the fishermen. Well, a rose by any other name smells just as sweet. I have heard the word "subsidization" used as an excuse before. If we adopt such a scheme, then it will encourage our fishermen not only in the fall of the year when they get discouraged and seek some other kind of work, but it will encourage them to keep on fishing right up until the weather prohibits them from fishing. It will also encourage our people in the winter months of January, February, March and part of April when they have nothing to do, when they find that they cannot get employment elsewhere and when they work preparing their boats and building their boats. It will give encouragement to these people by assuring them that in those four months they will be looked after. They are paying for it. It will encourage them to carry on in this industry which is one of the oldest in the world. By carrying on, they will be contributing their share to the economic life of this country.

The fishing industry today is worth about $200 million to Canada. It is capable of great expansion. It cannot be expanded if you have a disgruntled fishing class. If we encourage our fishermen, by showing them they have the sympathy of our people, they will be prepared fully to accept the risks under which they have carried on for many years and they will be adding to the industry and the wealth of this country in no uncertain terms.

May I say a final word. At the main entrance to the House of Commons are these words carved in stone:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

The words "and north" also should be included.

Everything that comes from the sea is wholesome. Doctors will send you on a sea voyage and to the seacoast as an antidote for frayed and distorted nerves. What applies in the medical profession with regard to health measures, applies to the food which comes from the sea. It is nutritious. Only lately we have been finding that out. What the people of Canada need to eat is a balanced diet. By eating more fish our people's health will be that much more improved. On looking around at the people in this part of Canada, I see a lot of anaemic children, with no colour in their cheeks; but when I go back home and see our own children with the healthy look on their faces, I can only come to one conclusion, namely that it is the fish diet that gives them the bloom in their cheeks. Canada needs a balanced diet and more fish is what we must have to build up the fishing industry. For the sake of Canada and for the health of our people, here and now I advocate that we encourage our fishermen by giving them unemployment insurance whereby they may carry on under the hazards under which they have been carrying on for centuries. If they do not get this encouragement they will feel disappointment.

Mr. Speaker, I have just about finished. In making this plea, I do so in the best interests of all of Canada and not in the interest of one section only. I do so because if we look after our fishermen and encourage them as we do our farmers and everyone else, I believe we will have a Canada fit to live in; a Canada to which other people are looking and to whose shores they will want to come; a Canada which we all desire; a happy Canada, a prosperous Canada and a good Canada in which to live. We have the land, the forests, the mines and the sea. Surely, with that combination we can work out a scheme of economics whereby all the people of Canada will enjoy that prosperity which we all wish them to have, full health, full stomachs and faith in the future of our country which I believe is brighter than that of any other country.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, may I associate myself with the previous speakers in this debate in complimenting the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

First I should like to deal with a matter which primarily concerns my own riding: that is, the Polymer Corporation, a crown company, of which we in Sarnia are very proud—and I think this is the general opinion of people all across this country. I make this statement because of an article which appeared in a weekly publication published in Fort Erie some months ago. This dealt with the Polymer Corporation but unfortunately did not speak the true facts.

I make this statement also because while the Gordon economic royal commission was sitting in Toronto an hon. member of this house who formerly belonged to the socialist party took it upon himself to state in his presentation to the commission that the government should dispose of all crown companies, including the Polymer Corporation. It so happens that I represent the riding in which Polymer is located and I am going to accept the responsibility of speaking as the member for that riding on behalf of the employees of this successful crown corporation. What I have to say will be confined to the Polymer Corporation and will not refer to any other crown corporation, especially the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Like most hon. members of this house, I assume on both sides, I believe in free enterprise. That may be a misnomer as things are today in Canada, but for what it is worth I believe in free enterprise. I believe also that private enterprise or free enterprise and public ownership can contribute jointly to our economic development. We have considerable evidence of that in our province of Ontario and I think some other provinces have shared a similar experience. It is possible that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) in suggesting that the government dispose of this particular crown corporation had in mind the success or failure of crown corporations when they attempted to do business in Saskatchewan with such disastrous results.

The Polymer Corporation produces synthetic rubber. I want it understood distinctly that it is not in competition with any other industry in the Dominion of Canada. I have followed this corporation from its beginning. I recall quite well making several statements in this house concerning the responsibility of Polymer to the municipality in the way of paying taxes or making payments in lieu of taxes. I recall the arguments I made year after year but I regret to say that I did not receive any support from any quarter in this house.

The fact is that I met with a great deal of opposition from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who contended right along that this and other crown corporations should not have to pay taxes or make payments in lieu of taxes because of the great contributions they made to the municipalities in which they were situated. Any industry makes a contribution to the municipality in which it is located, but it also imposes upon the municipality the necessity of providing services. I argued year after year that Polymer should make its contribution.

When the city of Sarnia enlarged its boundaries in 1950 and took in the Polymer Corporation in that year this crown company paid the city $45,000 in lieu of taxes. I was disappointed in the smallness of the amount and said so on more than one occasion. I expressed the hope that the government or the Polymer officials would reopen the matter and renegotiate with the city for a larger sum. Apparently the city made no effort to obtain a larger sum.

I am happy to be able to say today that in 1955 Polymer paid to the city of Sarnia in taxes a total of $282,739. The amount paid in the year previous was slightly smaller, and in the year previous to that it was slightly smaller again. I expect and I hope other hon. members will share my optimism that in the next ten years this crown corporation will in all probability pay to the city of Sarnia well over $3 million. That is not peanuts for any municipality. I am very happy, and I have said so on more than one occasion, that a formula was announced by the former minister of finance, the Hon. Mr. Abbott, in November 1949 which obligated crown companies in this country to assume municipal responsibilities.

Polymer is a very successful corporation which is operated pretty much the same as any private corporation in this country. It has exclusive agencies in 23 countries. There was a period in the history of this crown company when it was touch and go. It was organized and brought into being during the war to play its part in the war effort in providing rubber for vehicles used in fighting that war. We were not able to get natural rubber and this corporation was organized to produce synthetic rubber. It was faced since with the wide fluctuations which occurred in the price of natural rubber, the price going up as high as 46 cents a pound and dropping to less than half that amount. All during that period it was necessary for this company not only to supply the local markets but to increase its production in order to supply the export market at the lowest possible price. As I said a moment ago, they have exclusive agencies in 23 countries selling rubber to most of the free world.

I should like to place a few more statistics on the record because I feel sure hon. members will be interested in the operations of this crown company. Last year it paid $3 million in dividends to the federal treasury and made provision for depreciation in the amount of $5,350,000. Its net income was $4,924,000 out of a gross income of just about $54 million. I am happy to say that it is the largest employer of labour in Sarnia. Only a few weeks ago there were 2,453 people in the employ of the corporation and the payroll for 1954 amounted to $9,790,669.

It will be noticed from these figures that the employees of Polymer are not being paid starvation wages. They are highly skilled technicians. Sarnia is the centre of a large chemical industry in which hundreds and hundreds of engineers are employed. The chemical industry demands that type of employee.

The plant and equipment cost some $72 million. The working capital at the year end was a little over $15 million. The corporation retired $4 million of 4 per cent serial debentures during 1954. The greater part of the capital expenditure during the year went towards increasing productive capacity. Looking at the statements in the past three or four years, I have marvelled that more money was not spent for capital improvement or capital replacement, because this particular company is producing practically twice as much as it was set up to do when it was originally constructed.

I am also happy to see that, since the beginning of the construction of the Polymer Corporation, well over $200 million has been spent for industrial expansion in the city of Sarnia and the area immediately surrounding it. That does not include the immense amounts that are going to be spent by the Ethyl Corporation, the Imperial Oil, Dow Chemical and other companies this year, which will probably run into another $50 million to $75 million. In addition to that, Polymer had an export figure of $37 million in 1954. As I have said in previous years, this particular company has given leadership to private industry in its program of research and development.

There is every evidence from the figures I have quoted that this is a sound industrial enterprise, and I see no reason why Canadian industry should provide a luscious melon to satisfy the hungry taste buds of foreign investment seekers. We have heard about foreign investments, even this morning and on previous occasions in this house during this particular session. We had an eminent resident of Ontario speaking in Boston some months ago and saying that a little over 30 per cent of the investment in Canadian industry was United States money. I understand that this was somewhat qualified a few weeks ago by a United States economist in New York, who produced figures of a breakdown showing that United States investment in Canadian industry was about 44 per cent. That was startling to me, and I am sure it will be to the house.

I am going to say that today's welfare and the future security of Polymer employees should not be determined by any politician, regardless of what party he happens to belong to, and especially one who has only so recently associated himself with the principles of socialism. The employees of Polymer do not have an inferiority complex as to their capabilities of competing in the competitive world trade in synthetic rubber. I say here emphatically that Polymer must continue to have the right to live as a prosperous Canadian industry owned and controlled by Canadians.

Over the years there have been some attempted disagreements by one of the senior ministers of the crown with statements I have made in this house concerning Polymer. Some of these have been made, of course, in the heat of an election campaign and have less weight, but at all times I have been interested in the welfare of the Polymer employees and the success of that particular corporation. I say that now because I think it is only fair to the taxpayers of Canada and to the members of this house that crown corporations officials should appear before the proper House of Commons committee and give an accounting of their stewardship.

In view of the suggestions that have been made by responsible speakers and by this weekly magazine, and because, too, as I said a moment ago, crown companies should give an accounting to the members who represent certain areas in the Dominion of Canada, I am going to ask that the government permit officials of Polymer to be called before a proper parliamentary committee. I am sure they will report on the remarkable achievements of this industry, which contributed so much to our war effort and which in peacetime has continued to expand at no expense to the Canadian taxpayer. I feel that the officials of Polymer would be glad to come before the committee and proclaim to the members of that committee, to this house and to the people of Canada how successfully they have managed to operate this particular crown company.

The next subject with which I wish to deal probably concerns not many municipalities in Canada, but last year—either during discussion of the estimates or during revision of the bill—it was made known that municipalities having within their boundaries Indian reservations would be entitled to be compensated for services they had rendered to those particular reservations. I immediately contacted the city of Sarnia and learned to my dismay that they had not made any claim since the enlargement of their boundaries, when the Sarnia reservation came within the city limits. As I understand it, it is the law of our country that where a municipality gives services to an Indian reservation it can be compensated by the government for those services—through the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, I suppose, since it is under that particular minister's department. As I have said, this probably does not apply to many municipalities, but in our particular instance this Indian reservation of some 3,900 acres which is still left in the city is very valuable property. A few years ago they sold 100 acres—one of the largest sales—to the Dow Chemical Company for $2,000 per acre. I think that since then they have been asking considerably more. True, other crown-owned property in the city, right on the St. Lawrence seaway, has been sold for some $350 an acre, but that, of course, was sold to a defeated Liberal candidate, and I hope the time has passed when that sort of thing is done. It is not ethical, to begin with, and it is to be hoped it will not happen again. Not every industry can pay $2,000 or $3,000 per acre for industrial property, but it is unfortunate that we have let the time slide by when property could have been purchased by the government and resold to the city for industrial purposes at a price much less than today's asking price.

I have asked the clerk of the city of Sarnia to prepare a table which might be used as a guide to other members who have Indian reservations within their particular ridings. It shows how they make up the amounts they have spent and the figures of the amounts for which they should be reimbursed. I have figures here for the last five years indicating what the reimbursement would have been since the Indian reservation came within the city limits. The table is broken down into the following headings: General government, fire, police, street lighting, public works, sanitation, health, welfare, education, recreation and community services, debt, land purchase and miscellaneous. These figures might be valuable to other members whose communities are in the same predicament as Sarnia, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the table be incorporated in Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The table is as follows:

TOTAL APPLICATION	$154,117.18

The figures are based on assessment and appear to be very reasonable because one can readily see that 3,700 or 3,800 acres at $2,000 an acre amounts to $6 million or $7 million while the assessment is about $1¾ million. For the year 1951 the city claimed $34,118.96 on the basis of a rate of 19·12 mills. For 1952 the city claimed $38,197.47, for 1953 $28,868.47, for 1954 $27,064.72 and for 1955 $27,867.56, making a total of $154,117.18. The mayor of Sarnia was mayor before annexation of this land by the city but just because he and the other elected officials did not know that the city was entitled to this consideration from the federal government is no reason why the city should not be given it. I ask the government to make the payment retroactive to the particular time when the city enlarged its boundaries and took in the Indian reservation.

I do not hesitate to say that this amount is not peanuts and I would also say that the elected officials, especially the one holding the highest office, have been grossly negligent in not inquiring into what they were entitled to receive from the senior government. One cannot pick up a newspaper without seeing that some municipality is squawking about the small amount of its income in proportion to the total tax dollar. True, the federal government is taking about 78 cents out of every tax dollar and the municipalities are hard pressed. While the senior officials of this or any other municipality may be grossly negligent, and I say they are, that is no reason why the federal government should be so niggardly in its attitude and refuse over the years to inform these municipalities of the fact that the federal government has an obligation to them. In view of the large amount that the federal government takes out of the tax dollar and the conditions in which the municipalities find themselves today, I say it is a shameful thing that this or any other government should not let the municipalities know about considerations such as this that entitle them to receive money from the senior government or any other government.

There may be other municipalities in this country that have a great deal more coming to them than in this case and over a greater period of years. I cannot condemn too strongly the action of any government in neglecting its obligations to a municipality, especially in these days when municipalities find themselves so hard pressed to meet their own requirements.

Last session, Mr. Speaker, a committee was set up to study fishing conditions on the great lakes. It was one of the most instructive committees on which I have ever had the pleasure of being a member. From the expert evidence given at the meetings of the committee we learned to our dismay that the lamprey menace on the great lakes was costing some $5 million a year. I think that the members of the committee were greatly impressed by the testimony and I am sure that the minister, who I regret is not here, took a most realistic view in an effort to solve the problem facing the fishermen on the great lakes today. I know that in the debate on the bill in the house after it was considered by the committee one could gather from the minister's remarks that he was very anxious that the situation be corrected and without delay.

Since that time an international joint committee has been set up on which there are three Canadian members. In fact, they are three Ontario members because only one province in Canada is on the great lakes. There are also three representatives from the United States representing the eight states bordering on the great lakes. I believe the personnel of that committee was announced early in December, and I was rather amazed to find there the name of one particular man. I was dumbfounded to think that the minister could have chosen him because we had been in contact with this particular individual, Mr. Harkness of Toronto, a civil service employee of the Ontario government, during a meeting of the fishermen of the Sarnia district and through certain newspaper articles.

I recall quite well having urged a sort of double flank movement to eradicate the lamprey menace and suggested that not only should we meet the attack in lake Superior but also in lake Huron because otherwise we would suffer a $5 million loss annually until the menace was eradicated. We urged that the hatchery at Point Edward be kept open and we found that this particular member of the committee, who had not been appointed at that time, declared to the press in a newspaper article that restocking the lakes was like spitting in the ocean. He should be an authority on spitting in the ocean because that is all he has been doing for the last ten or twelve years to preserve the fishing industry in the great lakes. In the meantime the trout fishing industry is being eliminated and the fishermen are going broke. In my end of lake Huron some of the fishermen are not even going to set out their nets in the spring.

I do not intend to enlarge upon the qualifications of the other members of the committee because I am not competent to do so, but I do think it is quite important that when anybody who is a member of such an important committee takes such a negative attitude that attitude should be revealed to the members of the house. I would say he is not fit to be a member of the committee. You never solve any problem by a negative approach, and if any member of this international joint committee is going to take a negative approach to the solution of the problem of a loss of $5 million annually to this industry he had better be replaced by somebody else.

In the course of the debate last year on this subject there was no dissension of opinion except that I believe the view was expressed that the campaign should be confined to lake Superior. It was said that the lamprey should be eradicated there before they got the toehold that they have in lake Huron and lake Michigan. I disagree with that on principle because, as many members may recall, the life span of the lamprey is about six years and after it spawns it dies.

Figures were tabled at that particular time showing the loss to the trout fishing industry. I contended then that when the lamprey eels were through eating the trout they were going to attack the whitefish and the pickerel. That is what they are doing. I am going to ask the indulgence of the house again to have a table put on Hansard showing the catch in lake Huron off the shores of the county of Lambton and the county of Huron. The table was prepared by the Ontario government. There are alarming figures here with respect to the catch of whitefish in that part of lake Huron. In 1949 the catch amounted to 118,894 pounds and in 1954 the amount was 29,887 pounds, just about a quarter. That is a very alarming situation.

I am going to emphasize again, as forcibly as I can, the necessity of this government seeing that the joint committee take double barrelled action. If they are going to reestablish the fishing industry on the great lakes, they cannot wait another seven or eight years, which is the time it may take to destroy the lamprey in lake Superior. In the meantime, the fishing industry in lake Huron will be destroyed. By that time, there will not be any whitefish left and the lamprey will be after the pickerel. The $5 million a year that this industry has contributed to the joint economy of the two countries is no small amount of money.

The amount appropriated last year for this work was $350,000, including research. I do not believe that is sufficient to do even the necessary work in lake Superior. According to the evidence given before the committee, there are some 40 to 50 streams emptying into lake Huron around Manitoulin in which these electrical weirs could be installed at a cost of from $5,000 to $10,000 a season, including operations. These weirs have proven successful in killing the lamprey as they come up to spawn. I maintain that the members of this house, through this government, must make provision for this joint commission to have more money, enough money so they can make a joint attack in lake Huron. I go along with the idea of exterminating them in lake Superior, but we should not wait until they are exterminated in lake Superior before making an attack in lake Huron. In the meantime, the fishermen will go broke, and we will have completely lost an important industry. I believe it is only sound common sense and good judgment on the part of business or government, when an industry can be rehabilitated which is worth so much to our economy, to act without delay.

I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that before the estimates are put in final form, some provision should be made to cover this matter. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is quite aware of the menace because he has never lived too far away from the great lakes region. We also know that these streams in which the lamprey spawn are in the riding of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I do not believe he has anything to do with the lamprey, but I do hope he does something towards the extermination of this pest. I feel sure he would lend an attentive ear because, after all is said and done, many of the people in his riding are fishermen. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) speak this morning on behalf of all fishermen, and not only those in his own riding.

I should like, if I may, Mr. Speaker, to have permission to place on Hansard a table compiled by the Ontario government showing the catch of lake trout, pickerel and whitefish in lake Huron in the counties of Lambton and Huron.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to place his table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

I shall close in just a moment or two, but I want to mention a letter I received this morning from Port Huron. This city is right across from Sarnia on the United States side. The fishermen there are also concerned about what is taking place and what is not taking place. No doubt some hon. members in this house will be surprised that these people in the United States do not operate hatcheries as we do in Ontario. We have always maintained that hatcheries were necessary to restock the lakes. Perhaps these people took it for granted that our stocking of the lakes would be sufficient for their welfare.

We have met with these people and the members of the legislature of Michigan. This morning I received information that they are introducing a bill, that is the state of Michigan, which will involve a cost to the taxpayers of some $500,000, that is $100,000 a year for a five-year program of research and restocking. I am happy to see that they realize their position. They are opening hatcheries, and I think that is something we must do. I feel that when the government and their advisers look at the information available on the lessening of the various catches, they too will find it necessary to take additional measures. I believe that these 50 streams I mentioned a minute ago are the places, and probably the only places, where these lamprey spawn, so we are justified in asking the government to provide sufficient money to put in these weirs. If it happens to be a hundred, we should still make the expenditure because we will not re-establish the industry until the lamprey is exterminated.

I do hope that some of the members of the committee will be allowed to see how this program is progressing. I hope the committee will be set up as early as possible in this particular session. I am going to make one suggestion in closing. I hope the federal government can make representations to the one department of the Ontario government which issues permits for these sand suckers to take out sand and gravel as they do where lake Huron joins the river St. Clair. Hundreds of thousands of tons are taken to Toronto, Hamilton or Cleveland. I would think that Hamilton and Toronto could find sand and gravel elsewhere. In any event the old fishermen tell me that the removal of that sand in such large quantities destroys the spawning beds of the fish within 20 to 25 miles of the spot where the sand is taken out.

We have protested this action in the past, and I am glad to say that I do not believe any licences were granted this year. But as part and parcel of the program to re-establish the fishing industry on the great lakes, representations ought to be made to definitely ensure no more sand or gravel is taken out of that particular area. I am quite prepared to take the word of the old fishermen, who have had 30 years' experience, that the removal of the sand destroys these spawning beds. I am hoping that this session this government will find sufficient money to eradicate the lamprey menace within three or four years and thereby re-establish the fishing industry on the great lakes, an industry which has made a great contribution to the economy of this country.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): I have been afforded a great opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to speak in this debate. I am not going to do as other members have done and thank the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address. I never have done so because I believe that when the leaders of the opposition parties have done that on behalf of their parties, that is sufficient. Certainly, I feel it is true to say that many of these expressions of thanks, particularly those coming from opposition groups, are not entirely truthful. The upshot of the whole thing is that it could well be eliminated once the members who lead the various groups in the house thank the mover and seconder of the address.

I am sorry the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is not in his seat because I should like to draw attention to some remarks he made on November 1 while speaking in the town of Terrace in my province. He made an accusation against the federal government, and if he had only broadened his target to include everyone in the House of Commons I would support his contention 100 per cent. But he narrowed it down to a condemnation of the government when he said that they lacked vision. I think that every member of every party in every corner in this house, to a greater or lesser degree, lacked the vision to realize what a great country we have from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Therefore, if he would only say that his own party as well as the Liberal party lacked vision I would be inclined to go along with him; but since he has narrowed his target to represent only the Liberal administration, unfortunately I will have to disagree with him.

I could buy about nine-tenths of what was said in the speech from the throne. I was rather amazed at my good friend, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), the other day. When he was about to move his want of confidence motion he said there was nothing new in the speech from the throne. Well, I am quite sure that the Leader of the Opposition from his childhood to the present time has consistently read his Bible. I do not think that every time he reads it he expects to find something new in it. Possibly he will get a greater understanding of what is in the Bible, but not necessarily anything new, because the same words are in it now that were there at the time of King James.

I think that by and large, of the speeches of members of the opposition, the leader of the official opposition was not as dynamic as he generally has been on past occasions. I think the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) excelled himself as far as leaders of the opposition parties are concerned. I cannot forget my good friend, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), who really put on a good show the other night, but in the final analysis I do not think he said very much.

Mr. Lennard: What about your own leader?

Mr. MacDougall: The hon. member would not expect me to comment on that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are more than discreet not to.

Mr. MacDougall: The whole question comes down to the matter of what is generally agreed across the length and breadth of the country to be good economics in government administration.

I must confess that this morning I was very much impressed with my good friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). You know, I hate to disagree with the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has been a good friend of mine for many years; but I sometimes wonder whether there is a little difference between an honest to goodness real dirt sod buster and a city slicker. I remember that on April 22 last my good friend the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang)—and he is really an honest-to-goodness sod buster; he is not one of those city slickers who go out to the manor every week end; he is there all of the time—said that he wished the people in this house realized that the western farmer was not bankrupt.

I think back to the days when I was a sod buster—and that is quite a while ago. In those days I busted sod with a team of oxen. I think I have intimated in this house before that in the old days we used to have itinerant preachers in Saskatchewan. One of them became a driver of oxen and worked for a neighbour of ours. He gave up preaching. My father asked him why he gave it up and he said: "No man can continue to be a Christian if he drives oxen." I had that experience, and I know there is a lot in it. Before the outbreak of the first world war I was very much inclined that way. Since I was the youngest of a family of ten, none of whom had taken the cloth, I was very much tempted to go in for the ministry, but in the meantime I had driven a team of four oxen and there it ended.

I should like to speak for a few minutes on the trans-Canada highway. I commend the minister—

Mr. Knowles: Is that where you are going to drive your oxen?

Mr. MacDougall: —for the interest he has taken in the trans-Canada highway. The policy that was announced by the federal government when the trans-Canada highway was first conceived was a fair policy at that time. In the time that has elapsed we have seen the program of trans-Canada construction falling far, far below expectations. It seems to me the government will be well advised to reconsider a revision of the program which the minister has now decided on. Before I continue with this subject, may I assert that regardless of what I may say I am still a 100 per cent Liberal, and do not let anyone think that I have any idea of joining any other party.

In British Columbia we have a terrifically high cost of road construction. It runs to something approximating $169,000 a mile in the mountainous area as compared with $60,000 odd in the prairie provinces. Therefore, there is a great difference between the amount that one province has to spend in comparison with another in order to fulfil the terms of the agreement originally made with the federal government in connection with the trans-Canada highway. As far as I am concerned there is no argument in connection with this statement. I do not think that any of us who are sincere in our belief will disagree that, so far as provincial administrations are concerned, roads through mining areas, or lateral roads within the confines of the individual provinces, are of prime importance. That is their chief concern. I don't know that I blame them for it. Now, with that great difference of cost in the construction of the province of Saskatchewan—I say that pretty well because of the prairie provinces as well and the province of British Columbia—that policy of a 50-50 deal is scarcely good enough. First of all we have in the trans-Canada highway one of the real Canadian projects, when it is completed. It is 100 per cent Canadian, because it will link the furthermost eastern portion of our realm to the furthermost western portion and consequently it is a 100 per cent Canadian undertaking. I sincerely suggest to the government and particularly to my good friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), that they revise the situation with respect to the construction of the trans-Canada highway, and that, from this date hereon, the federal government will bear 100 per cent of the cost of the completion of the trans-Canada highway.

Now I hold in my hands, Mr. Speaker, Votes and Proceedings of January 12, and on page 18 is one resolution that I am afraid I cannot go along with:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure for the payment of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves owned by the Canadian wheat board in respect of board stocks of wheat in excess of one hundred and seventy-eight million bushels at the commencement of a crop year, such payment to be made to the board by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Now maybe you will say that I am old-fashioned. I probably am; but, you know, being old-fashioned has its virtues just the same as being modernistic has certain virtues. I can well remember my father, when he was a much younger man than I am today, telling me, not on one but on several occasions: My boy, I want to tell you this fact of life; that you will never cure the economic ills of any country by charity.

I think that axiom is just as true today as it was when he uttered those words. Now as I have already stated, I used to be a western farmer. Western farmers, in their thinking, do not change very much from one generation to another, and I am taking the word of a practical western farmer when I quoted earlier what the hon. member from Qu'Appelle said. Now in connection with this I congratulate the government on being sincere in their endeavour to help the economy of everyone in the Dominion of Canada. From that I do not think there is any argument, but in this instance I believe that it is not going to be even remedial. There is no need to tell you that in this broad domain of ours we have the Atlantic on the east and the Pacific on the west. We have another ocean to the north and we have on some portion of the southern part of our realm the great lakes. We are, therefore, by and large a marine country. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if this item goes through—now I cannot give you the exact figure, but I understand that it is to be in the neighbourhood of something like $30 million—that that is not going to satisfy the western farmer. I have a vivid recollection of what happened in the last parliament, when unfortunately, with my vote, I aided and abetted the giving of $65 million to the western farmers as the unexpired portion of moneys that could have been spent by the United Kingdom for the purchase of grain under the wheat agreements at that time. That $65 million did not cure anything. When we had voted that $65 million, I doubt very much if the ink was dry on the paper before my good friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was hollering for $365 million. Now you cannot very well appease that type of thinking. As I have said, we are, whether we recognize it or not, a marine country; and if we pass this resolution, certainly it is in condemnation of the government if they do not, because they have acted most magnanimously with all these things. You are going to find in the prairie provinces that you are going to have a new prairie song, particularly in Saskatchewan, applicable also in Manitoba and Alberta, and the song is going to be: Strike up the band, here come the sailors with cash in their hands just off the whaler, stand in a row, do not let them go, for Jack Canuck is a cinch and every inch a sailor. That is what those boys are going to think of the federal government with $30 million minimum handout in connection with the storage of grain. I was amazed when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said that the storage charges were going to be as high as 15 and 16 cents a bushel or even go a little higher. That is quite a bit of folding money, no doubt about it; but do not forget, Mr. Speaker, despite storage charges, they have something to store. As the minister pointed out, those surpluses are not the great curse that some of our friends would like us to believe.

Now there is another surplus that I want to mention and that is the question of butter. You know there has been a lot said about wheat and a lot said about butter, if you believe everything that my good friends from the opposition benches say about the government's policy in connection with wheat and butter. It is an amazing thing to me when in 1953 the government went to the country without promising a solitary single thing excepting good government. They promised nothing but a continuance of good government. My good friends in the official opposition were going to reduce expenditures by $500 million a year, year after year. Well you know, the people of Canada may be a bit naïve on occasions but they are not crazy enough to swallow that line of malarkey. Promises are just promises regardless of who happens to make them, whether he sits on your extreme left with the socialist party or is part of the official opposition or of the government. I believe the people of Canada have come to the point where they believe that the future performance of the government can be judged by its past performance. The administration was returned in 1953 without having made one single, solitary promise to the electorate of Canada other than the continuance of good government.

Now a word about butter. I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will agree when I say that presumably we have a small, not a great surplus of butter. I think that if we were able to sell three to four million pounds of butter over the sales for the present year we would wind up at the end of the calendar year with no surplus at all. But supposing we do have a surplus, then I would offer two suggestions to the administration.

Some years ago when Holland started the manufacture of margarine they found that they had quite a surplus of butter. In order to correct this situation they amended their margarine legislation to provide that in the future all margarine should contain a certain percentage of butter. As a result of that the butter surplus was eliminated. This would be all to the good as I have never been convinced even by the advertising that is put out that margarine is as good a food product as butter. If this surplus continues, why should we not do as Holland has done and insist that each pound of margarine contain a certain percentage of butter?

If we do not want to do that, and if we are still faced with a surplus of butter, then my second suggestion would be that that butter be sold to the taxpayers who have bought it at the same price as margarine is being sold. I will buy that one any day in the week. It seems to me that that is one of two logical ways to dispose of this surplus which a great many people, particularly opposition people, seem to regard as criminal. We should give thanks to the Almighty for having surpluses of this, that and the other thing rather than scarcities.

There are many other things I could deal with before the expiration of my time, but I am going to mention only one. I think hon. members by and large, regardless of their politics, had the hope when the civilian disability pension legislation was passed that it would be broad enough to cover a wife who was disabled, a husband who was disabled, or a son or daughter who was disabled. I know of one tragic case in Vancouver where the husband cannot get a disability pension for his wife who is suffering from multiple sclerosis and who must be waited on and nursed practically around the clock because he is earning a certain amount of money, not too much but enough to just put him over the borderline. As a result the wife cannot obtain a civilian disability pension.

I know as far as I am concerned, and I think this would apply to many hon. members whether they sit in the opposition or on the government side, that that was not the spirit in which I considered the civilian disability pension legislation. I should like very much to have the government take cognizance of this right now, not next year or the year after, and make the necessary rectification of the legislation.

The speech from the throne does not indicate this as being one of the pieces of legislation to be amended at this session, but I think this is something that would appeal to the heart and mind of every full-blooded Canadian from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It has happened quite often that after new legislation has been passed and in force for some time we fail to iron out the bugs that develop. You know perfectly well that when a new type of airplane is constructed quite often bugs may develop. The Comet II was an outstanding example. However, in that case the bugs were eliminated and today the Comet III is one of the world's greatest airplanes. The Comet II was grounded because of bugs in the construction.

I am sure I speak for all in the house when I say that none of us wants to see the civilian disability pension legislation grounded because of bugs. Let us start immediately to eliminate the bugs and thus fulfil the spirit rather than the letter of the act.

In conclusion I just want to say that despite all the haranguing about the situation in Canada being pretty bad, about the poor farmer being in such a terrible condition, about the fisherman being faced with such awful conditions, I think it can be said that while things are not as good as they ought to be, by and large the economy of this country —I do not think I am exaggerating—is buoyant and the future is bright.

I must congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) on the bold endeavour he made in his first budget. If he will stop talking to that Tory who is sitting with him he will hear what I am saying, but I am not going to repeat it. I congratulate him because I think he has done a very fine job. Further, I think it is fair to say that the time has come for us to do what is right and not what is expedient, that the time is ripe for us to act with courage and not temerity in all things respecting the government and welfare of this beloved nation of ours.

Mr. J. A. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the other members of this house in congratulating both the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am particularly happy to do so on this occasion, as I have gathered that during the course of the present session we shall be asked to agree to a bill granting women of the federal civil service equal status with men. This, in my opinion, is most certainly a move in the right direction.

In making my maiden speech in the Canadian House of Commons I feel very humble indeed. I am well aware of the honour which was given to me by the people of my riding. I am equally aware of the responsibilities that I must now assume as a member of this house. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that in you and your office are centred many of the fine and valuable traditions that have been handed down to us through the centuries, and that from your dais stems the guidance which makes our democratic process function.

I shall readily admit that in the field of parliamentary procedure I am one of the infants of this house. However, I shall at all times attempt to give your high office the respect and attention to which it is entitled, and I wish to assure you that I shall more than gladly welcome any guidance and assistance you may see fit to give me personally from time to time. At this time I should like to thank you personally, and through you the members of your staff, for the many courtesies which were extended to me during my short stay here last July. I would also like to include in this respect the courteous consideration I received from the members of all parties, the members of the civil service and others. I was the only new member at that time, and I feel that everyone went out of their way to, shall I say, acclimatize me during my stay here.

The riding which I represent, Battle River-Camrose, came into being following the 1952 redistribution. My predecessor, Robert Fair, was the first member of this new riding. This territory has a population of approximately 58,000 people. The vast percentage of these people are either actively engaged in agriculture or are dependent upon agriculture for their livelihood. It is an area of many small communities, each of which is justly proud of itself.

The only city in my riding is the jubilee city of Camrose. Camrose is the youngest city in Canada, and as such celebrated its first birthday last September. It was my privilege to attend its first birthday dinner, and I was very pleased to notice that at this gathering the vast majority of the guests were men and women in civic positions in the city, the administrative staff of the city offices, the teachers, members of the department of public works and others. To me this was a fine gesture on the part of the mayor and members of his council, for far too often those people charged with the responsibility of carrying out established policies are overlooked in civic functions of this type.

Other large centres found in my riding are Lloydminster, a meridian town as it straddles the Alberta-Saskatchewan border; Vermilion, where one may find one of the large generating plants operated by Canadian Utilities; Viking, just north of which is the large natural gas field which for years was the major source of fuel for the city of Edmonton; Wainwright, which until recent years was noted for its large buffalo park, the area now being a part of the Wainwright military camp; Bashaw; Hardisty; Holden; Daysland; Killam; and others.

Most of the towns and villages within my riding have taken advantage of the Alberta government's self-liquidating revolving fund and secured money at a very low rate of interest to instal water, sewage and other community projects. By making this money thus available the Alberta government has given the people of the smaller communities of the province the same modern conveniences enjoyed by city dwellers. It was with a great deal of pleasure that I officially opened the waterworks project in the village of Kitscoty, where my family and myself had resided for many years.

The ethnic origin of the people of Battle River-Camrose is, to my mind, a true example of how peoples of many nationalities can become one under a democratic system such as ours. It is not hard to find people whose ancestors came to Canada from the British Isles, from the United States, from the Scandinavian peninsula, France, Germany, the Ukraine, Poland, Russia, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Belgium, Holland and other European countries, all living together within this riding; and they are not only proud that they are now Canadian but they are consistently and conscientiously working together to make this a happier and more prosperous nation. We are all Canadians; and, while many of us still cherish and like to practise some of the customs of our ancestors, we are prepared to admit that we have gained and are still gaining much from the cultures of other ethnic groups. The United States often maintains that it is the melting pot of national groups. I would not want it to think that it is the only nation entitled to claim this singular distinction.

During the latter part of 1955 we in Alberta celebrated the golden jubilee year of our province. On this eventful occasion we were very happy to have with us for a short time the Prime Minister of Canada. It was a thrilling sight to see him being driven up to our legislative buildings, accompanied by our Lieutenant Governor Bowlen, in the same landau which had been used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier 50 years previously. This was a sight that stirred the emotions of most of us. It reminded us that we Albertans are a part of a large and growing nation.

This was a gala event. However, to my mind the events which really struck at the heart of Alberta were the ones which were held in the smaller communities throughout the province where the local people, young and old, gathered together to do honour to their senior citizens. It was at gatherings such as these that we of the younger generation were given the opportunity of expressing our appreciation to the men and women who had come to our province over 50 years ago, stayed there and played their respective parts in the moulding of our communities and the province as a whole. I can well recall watching one little old lady going forward to accept a scroll which was given to her at that time, a scroll which she so richly deserved. These events definitely laid down a challenge to the younger people of these communities, a challenge to continue the growth of Alberta and make it a still better part of our great country.

I would not want any member of the house to feel that all is well in my riding, because that most certainly is not the case. We have many problems which are bothering us. As I have already stated, agriculture is our basic industry just as it is still the basic industry of the whole of Canada. We in Battle River-Camrose have thousands upon thousands of bushels of wheat which cannot be marketed. I most certainly subscribe, Mr. Speaker, to the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and other hon. members on this side of the house. They have already mentioned the need for immediate action to provide cash advances to the farmers of the west to alleviate the crisis now confronting them. I am certain that all members from the west are acutely aware of this crisis, and that each and every one of them will be striving to persuade the government that something effective must be done immediately to, first, relieve the situation as it now exists and, second, establish machinery which will not permit such a disaster to happen again.

Many meetings of the farmers in my riding have been held to discuss this serious problem, serious because it affects the whole economy of western Canada right now and will within the very near future have an adverse effect upon the economy of the whole of Canada. At the annual convention of the farmers' union of Alberta one could sense the uneasiness that existed in the minds of the delegates, and we must remember that the delegates were only reflecting the over-all thoughts of the farmers and townspeople of their own areas. There is very little use trying to encourage our young people to remain upon the farms of the west as long as the present uncertainty in the industry remains. Our farmers are forced to face too many crises, too many risks of nature from the time they sow their grain until they have it harvested, to have to face the risk of not being able to market their products at the end of the season. I would again like to point out, just as it has been pointed out time and time again in this house, that the farmers of Canada fall far short of receiving their rightful share of the national income.

You may well ask what are the Social Credit proposals for remedying this serious situation. I wish now to quote from a statement released to the press by the Social Credit caucus in Alberta in early December. They had this to say:

> The present federal policy with respect to loans on farm-stored grain is entirely inadequate and the proposal to put the farmers further into debt at 5 per cent interest is unfair and unjust when all the circumstances are taken into consideration. Not many farmers will be able to qualify for the full amount of the loan. Even if more of them did, the amount would not be sufficient in many cases to take care of the debts incurred in putting in and taking off the crop.
> We believe the federal government should make it possible for the Canadian wheat board to make cash advances to farmers against grain stored on the farm. The Canadian government should make an immediate start on provision of approved storage on the farms. One way of doing this would be to pay the farmer storage rates on the same basis as paid to elevators, if they build approved facilities.
> It is obvious that the federal government does not have the answer to surplus production. We do not look upon surpluses as a calamity. It is only when we bungle the handling of them that they become such. If we provide proper storage, widely dispersed on the farms, and are prepared to use the national credit to finance the cash advances against the surpluses so stored, these surpluses can become a blessing to our country and the world in the years ahead.
> As a long-range program towards a permanent solution to the problem of surplus grain production the Canadian government should undertake a vigorous sales campaign to sell our surplus agricultural products to other nations requiring additional food supplies. To this end we should be prepared to enter into barter deals, credit deals and to accept at least some currencies of the importing countries in exchange for our surplus grain.

Nor would I wish hon. members to feel that the marketing of grain is the only problem of concern among the farmers of the west. The hog raisers in my area are going out of business as rapidly as possible because the returns from this branch of agriculture are not sufficient to justify the cost of feed and the work which must go into raising a litter of pigs for market. The cattlemen are viewing with alarm the steady decline in prices being paid for their stock on the Winnipeg and other markets of the west. This winter has all the appearance of being similar to the winter of 1919. Cattlemen were forced to start feeding their cattle early in November, and many of them are seriously concerned whether or not they have sufficient feed on hand to carry them through.

I do know that the price demanded for baled hay has risen by leaps and bounds during the last few weeks. What will likely happen if the winter continues to be severe is that many of the smaller ranchers will be forced to place their cattle upon the markets of the west. As it takes years to build up a foundation herd, I feel that this would be very serious to many of the smaller ranchers in my area. We can also appreciate the depressing effect that the dumping of a large number of cattle will have upon the open market.

Some question with respect to whether the so-called floor price on hogs is being maintained was raised in the house the other day. It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that not only should the floor price on hogs be strictly adhered to, but that there should also be established a floor on all agricultural products, including cattle and cereal grains.

It has already been pointed out that the crisis in western agriculture has been growing in the last few years. This unhappy situation has affected practically everyone living in my riding. When a farmer's income is cut off it affects the merchant, the machinery agent, the professional people; in fact, nearly every phase of our life is affected. It is my intention to deal at greater length with this problem at another time. We still have problems centring around the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Income Tax Act as it affects farmers, old age pensions, veterans allowances, the Meridian bridge just north of Lloydminster, and public buildings. Just in that connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the government, and more particularly the Minister of Public Works, upon the fine federal building which is now being constructed in the city of Camrose. I trust that similar structures will soon be undertaken in other parts of my riding.

It is no secret throughout the dominion that oil has meant much to Alberta. In this connection I should like to point out that while Battle River-Camrose cannot claim the same distinction as such places as the Pembina field, Redwater, Leduc, Golden Spike and so forth, yet we have experienced a lot of activity along these lines. There is hardly a small community in my riding which has not seen a drilling crew come into it seeking oil. Oil has been discovered from south of Camrose eastward toward the Lloydminster area.

We realize that nature has been good to us in this regard. The town of Lloydminster with the Husky and Excelsior refineries, the Sydney Roofing and other plants associated with the oil industry, are good examples of what oil has meant to our economy. I will listen with great interest, Mr. Speaker, to the debate on the proposed gas pipe line through northern Ontario. I only hope that the people of Canada will soon be able to enjoy the advantages of this type of fuel. The story about Alberta coal is not one of which anyone can be proud, however.

My predecessor, Robert Fair, was known throughout western Canada as one of the champions of western agriculture or perhaps I should say Canadian agriculture, because to him agriculture was a Canada-wide project. He was also known as a strong advocate for a fair deal to all veterans. He was a friend of the old age pensioner. In fact, in my mind Robert Fair left an enviable record behind him. He was a very close and dear friend of my wife and myself. I knew of his ambitions and his accomplishments. I am aware of the respect in which he was held, not only throughout his own constituency but amongst the members of all parties here and throughout Canada generally. I am fully conscious of the fact that I am following in the steps of a truly great statesman, and it is my intention to attempt at all times to maintain the standards set by Robert Fair. With God's help I shall attempt to do this.

Mr. Donald D. Carrick (Trinity): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) upon the excellence of her speech in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. We knew that she would acquit herself well, and of course she has done that. We know that the choice of the hon. member is a tribute to her personally, and an indication of the high esteem in which she is held by this government.

I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) upon the excellence of his address. It augurs well for his future as a parliamentarian.

I am going to speak on that portion of the throne speech which deals with the subject of natural gas in Canada and the trans-Canada pipe line. The government proposes to recommend to parliament the creation of a crown corporation to construct the northern Ontario section of an all-Canadian pipe line, and to approve an agreement relating thereto made between the government and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. The federal government deserves the commendation of the people of Canada for the part it has taken in the development of natural gas and in the plan to bring Alberta gas to the people of eastern Canada.

It may be helpful to an understanding of the problems if I were to outline the situation at the present time. In Alberta, there are large reserves of gas available for export eastward. According to a recent estimate the reserves amount to 16 trillion cubic feet, and development is currently proving up over one trillion cubic feet of new gas each year. Everyone in Alberta is anxious to see the gas put to use. The owners want to get the revenue from the sale of gas and avoid the wastage involved in burning at the well heads. The establishment of a gathering system in Alberta will require capital expenditures which will stimulate industrial activity in Alberta. The Alberta government is anxious to see the gas put to use because the royalties will produce millions of dollars in income for its treasury, and the disposal of the gas will be a stimulus to continued exploration and development of further gas and oil deposits. For these and many other reasons, everyone in Alberta is anxious that Alberta gas be sold.

It is equally desirable that natural gas be made available to the people of Ontario and Quebec. The premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, has stated that he is interested in having western gas made available to consumers in Quebec. The premier of Ontario, Mr. Frost, had a study of the whole situation made for his benefit, and he is anxious to have Alberta gas made available to the consumers of Ontario at the earliest possible date. Ontario is engaged in exploiting to the full its resources for the production of electricity and it is forecast that without the aid of natural gas there will be an acute shortage of fuel in Ontario by 1970. Of the approximate 1,250,000 people who have come to Canada since 1945, about 500,000 have settled in Ontario, and it is considered that if the enormous rate of expansion is to continue it is necessary to have natural gas as a supplementary fuel. In short, the people of Ontario and eastern Canada want to be able to buy Alberta natural gas.

Hon. members will recall that for a time there was a discussion whether it would be desirable to ship Alberta gas into the United States in the west and import Texas gas into Ontario and Quebec in the east, and not build an all-Canadian pipe line. That question has been settled, and all parties in this house are agreed that the construction of an all-Canadian pipe line is desirable to transport Alberta gas to eastern Canada.

The question has arisen whether the pipe line should be constructed under public or private ownership. This government decided that it would be preferable, if possible, to have the pipe line constructed by private enterprise.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, a company incorporated by special act of this parliament, is grappling with the problem of construction of the pipe line from Princess, Alberta, to Montreal, Quebec. The present plan is to have the line run from Princess, Alberta, through Saskatchewan via Regina; through Manitoba via Winnipeg; through Ontario via Port Arthur and Fort William, Kapuskasing, North Bay to Toronto and from there to Montreal via Morrisburg. A lateral will be run from Winnipeg through Emerson to the Minneapolis market. Already there is an existing lateral from Toronto to Niagara Falls available to feed the market in the northwestern part of New York State. Branch lines will also be run from North Bay to Sudbury and from Morrisburg to Ottawa. The pipe line will be 34 inches in diameter from Princess to Winnipeg, 30 inches in diameter from Winnipeg to Toronto and 20 inches in diameter from Toronto to Montreal.

It is estimated that the cost of constructing the pipe line from Alberta to Quebec will be about $375,000,000. Of this amount about $118,000,000 will be involved in construction of the pipe line from the western boundary of Ontario to Kapuskasing. In endeavouring to arrange its financing the company found that it could not at this time, by its own efforts alone, finance the construction of the whole project.

The possibility of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited doing its own financing was investigated for the Ontario government by Mr. J. G. Glassco of Clarkson, Gordon and Company in Toronto. In a report dated November 18, 1955, he says the figures show that without government assistance in any form the project would suffer losses for two or three years and would earn only small profits for several years thereafter. Apart from unsatisfactory initial earning power, the uncertainties of market development in areas new to natural gas and the possibility of heavy construction and operating costs in the rugged terrain of northern Ontario constitute additional difficulties in financing the project by conventional methods. He concluded that the company would not likely be able to attract enough support from private capital to finance the whole pipe line.

The governments of Canada and Ontario, which are both interested in seeing the pipe line completed at the very earliest possible date, have agreed, subject to approval of the appropriate legislative bodies, to construct the pipe line from the western border of Ontario to Kapuskasing at an estimated cost of $118,000,000. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited will construct the rest of the pipe line, that is from Princess, Alberta to the western border of Ontario and from Kapuskasing to Montreal at an estimated cost of $257,000,000.

It was recognized that even with temporary government assistance it was not possible, on the basis of the present markets in eastern Canada, to construct and operate the pipe line on an economic basis. Arrangements were therefore made by Trans-Canada to sell to Tennessee Gas Transmission Company at Emerson, Manitoba for the Minneapolis and mid-west market 200 million cubic feet of gas daily for a period of 25 years. Arrangements were also made to sell the same company 100 million cubic feet of gas daily for a period of 25 years for export via Niagara Falls into northwestern New York state only if gas surplus to Canadian needs is available. It is expected that the revenues derived from these two sales with an expanding market in eastern Canada will enable the project to be operated on an economic basis.

The import now taking place of Texas natural gas by Consumers Gas Company from Buffalo in New York state to Toronto for consumption in the market in the Toronto area is an integral part of the plan of building up markets in Ontario. The gas is being brought into Toronto under an arrangement by which it can be discontinued when Alberta gas is available to satisfy the requirements of the Toronto market. The pipe line can at that time be used with a reverse flow to carry Alberta gas to northern New York state.

It is also an integral part of the plan of building up the markets in Ontario for Tennessee Gas Transmission Company to export from the United States into Ontario 90 million cubic feet daily of Texas gas until Alberta gas is available to replace it. This Texas gas will service the communities east of Toronto along the north shore of the St. Lawrence as far as Montreal.

It will be realized that the export of gas to the Minneapolis market and to northwestern New York state and the export of gas from the United States into Ontario by Tennessee Gas Transmission Company are an integral part of the financing of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. This export of gas cannot take place without the prior sanction of the federal power commission in the United States. Applications are now pending before the commission for such approval. Tennessee Gas Transmission Company is endeavouring to obtain it before April 30, 1956, the date on which Trans-Canada expects to be able to demonstrate to the government of Canada that its financing has been arranged.

This government proposes to carry out the construction of the pipe line from the western border of Ontario to Kapuskasing through the medium of a crown corporation which is to be created. The government has entered into an agreement with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to construct the pipe line and lease it to that company for a period of 25 years. The government of Ontario has agreed to pay up to one-third, but not to exceed $35,000,000, of the estimated $118,000,000 cost. That is a very brief factual statement of the situation existing at the present time.

Some criticism has been directed at the federal government for entering into this agreement with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. It might be profitable for us to look at this criticism for a moment in the light of the circumstances which existed when the agreement was made on November 21, 1955. It was in May, 1954, that Trans-Canada obtained permission from the Alberta petroleum and gas conservation board to export gas eastward. Since that time it has been engaged in arranging for the purchase of gas for a period of 25 years from its owners in Alberta. It has also been engaged in arranging for the sales I have already mentioned in the United States, and in procuring markets in Ontario and Quebec. The arrangements for purchases and sales had to be completed before the company could arrange to raise money to finance the construction of the pipe line to eastern Canada. The company finally came to the point where it was clear that it was not able, without some temporary assistance from the federal government, to finance the construction of the pipe line to eastern Canada.

The choice facing the federal government was a difficult one. Its paramount interest was to see the pipe line constructed so that Alberta gas could be brought to eastern Canada at the very earliest possible date. I have already outlined why it was in the interests of both Alberta and eastern Canada for this to take place. Trans-Canada had been interested in the project since 1949 and had spent in excess of $13,000,000 working on the project and exploring the possibility of constructing and financing the all-Canadian pipe line. The company had already contracted to purchase at an estimated cost of $30,000,000 the pipe necessary to lay the line from Princess, Alberta to Winnipeg, Manitoba. It was a reasonable expectation that if the federal government gave some temporary assistance to the company, the pipe line could be completed and Alberta gas would be flowing into eastern Canada by 1958. If the federal government refused to give the company any temporary assistance, the possibility of Trans-Canada financing the pipe line was at an end.

What was the alternative to rendering temporary assistance to the company? Since Alberta needed to sell its gas and eastern Canada needed the gas for its fuel requirements, it was clear that the pipe line had to be built. If it could not be built by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited it would have to be built under public ownership. Assuming an arrangement could be made among the federal government and the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, it was a reasonable expectation that it would take considerable time to complete the negotiations for such an agreement and that the line would not be completed until at least 1960.

The federal government was faced with the fundamental question whether this is the kind of economic activity in which it and the provincial governments should participate. In view of what has happened in the recent federal-provincial conferences, it could be under no illusions about the difficulty of reaching an agreement with the provinces. There was the very distinct possibility that no agreement could ever be reached by the five provinces concerned and the federal government on the construction of the pipe line. Taking all these factors into consideration, it was a reasonable conclusion for the federal government to reach that the better alternative was to render temporary assistance to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to enable it to construct the pipe line.

Criticism has been expressed in some quarters to the federal government rendering any assistance at all to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. It is argued that if the pipe line is to be constructed by private enterprise, then private enterprise should be prepared to do it without any assistance from the government. I see no justification for this argument. There might be some justification for it if Trans-Canada were at liberty to construct the pipe line upon any route it desired. It could lay its pipe line along an economic route which would pay its own way, and no help would be required from the government.

This is not the situation. It is the federal government, supported by all parties in this house, that is requiring Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to lay its pipe to eastern Canada over a stretch of territory in Ontario which is devoid of substantial customers. Since the federal government is requiring this action in the national interest, should it not assist in offsetting any economic disadvantage to the project required by the national interest?

There is nothing unique or unusual in the federal government assisting private enterprise in a project that is in the national interest. Federal government assistance to private enterprise in constructing a railroad to unite Canada was a cornerstone in the policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. It may well be that the construction of a trans-Canada pipe line in our day will rank in importance with the construction of a railroad in the generation of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Some criticism has been directed at the federal government on the ground that it assumes all the risk of the construction of the uneconomic part of the project and gets none of the profits. This is not an accurate statement of the agreement or summary of the situation. The agreement provides that the federal government through the crown corporation will construct the portion of the pipe line between the Manitoba-Ontario boundary and Kapuskasing, a distance of 675 miles, as an integrated part of the all-Canadian line. Upon completion of construction the crown corporation will lease this northern Ontario section to the pipe-line company for a maximum period of 25 years.

Trans-Canada undertakes to purchase the section as soon as the finances can be arranged. It is given an option to purchase for the 25-year period of the lease, and the terms of the purchase provide a strong incentive to exercise the option at an early date.

The provisions dealing with what the federal government is to receive are somewhat complicated. Rental payments are to be made monthly and annually. If the option to purchase is not exercised, the federal government will receive by way of rental payments a profit over and above expenses, interest costs and amortization in the event that gas demand increases as expected.

If the option to purchase is exercised the least the federal government will receive will be its full investment plus interest thereon at 3½ per cent per annum. Depending on the time the option is exercised the purchase price may be higher.

In view of the fact that Trans-Canada must show the federal government that the project has been financed before the federal government spends one cent on the construction of the northern Ontario section, the risk to the government is minimal. The federal government will get its money out of the project with interest, and it is doubtful if this is the kind of undertaking in which the government should make any further profit.

There has been some criticism in the newspapers of the project on the ground that Trans-Canada in its contract with Tennessee Gas Transmission Company has sacrificed Canadian consumers to the interest of the Tennessee company.

The charge is that Trans-Canada had a contract with Northern Natural Gas Company to sell that company gas for distribution in the Minneapolis and midwest market, and that Trans-Canada cancelled that contract and made a less favourable one with the Tennessee company. It is charged that as a result of the Tennessee company paying a lower price for gas than the Northern Natural Gas Company had agreed to pay, the Canadian consumers will have to make up the difference and pay a higher price for gas. All of this came about, it is charged, because the Tennessee company had a financial interest in Trans-Canada which it improperly used to procure a contract favourable to itself at the expense of the Canadian consumers. It is also alleged that the Tennessee company used its influence to obtain a contract for the purchase of gas from Trans-Canada for sale through Niagara Falls, Ontario, to the markets of New York state at a price which is too low, with the result that the price to Canadian consumers will be too high.

These charges puzzled me, because the directors of Trans-Canada did not seem to me to be the type of men who would sacrifice the interests of the Canadian consumers. Of the 15 directors of Trans-Canada 11 are Canadians, so that Canadians control the board. Hon. members will recognize the names of many of the Canadian directors as men who are highly esteemed in the Canadian business community. They are the president, Mr. N. E. Tanner, a former minister of mines and minerals in the Alberta government; H. R. Milner of Edmonton; A. Deane Nesbitt of Montreal; J. K. McCausland of Toronto; Jules R. Timmins of Montreal; Hon. Edouard Asselin of Montreal; J. R. Tolmie of Ottawa; E. W. Bickle of Toronto; Hon. G. Peter Campbell of Toronto; G. P. Osler of Winnipeg and M. A. MacPherson of Regina.

I made inquiries about the facts from persons associated with the project and am advised that these charges are based upon a complete misunderstanding of the facts and are not true.

I have mentioned the charge that the Tennessee company improperly used its financial interest in Trans-Canada to procure contracts detrimental to the interests of Canadian consumers. I am told that at the time Trans-Canada made the contract with the Tennessee company, the Tennessee company had no financial interest whatsoever in Trans-Canada nor at that time had there been any discussion of the Tennessee company acquiring any interest. The contract with the Tennessee company was made on the 11th day of August, 1955. The Tennessee company did not begin negotiations to acquire any financial interest in Trans-Canada until the latter part of October, 1955, and the contract defining its interest was dated 1st November, 1955. Moreover, there was no relation between the contract of the 11th August, 1955 and the interest of the Tennessee company in Trans-Canada. The desire of the Tennessee company to acquire a financial interest in Trans-Canada arose in connection with a liability it assumed of $30,000,000 to enable Trans-Canada to obtain pipe for use in construction in 1956. Obviously since the Tennessee company had no financial interest in Trans-Canada at the time the contract was made, the charge that it used its interest improperly is without any foundation.

I am also told that everything considered, the contract with the Tennessee company is more favourable to Trans-Canada than the contract with Northern Natural Gas Company. Northern Natural Gas had agreed to purchase 100 million cubic feet daily of natural gas for sale in the Minneapolis market the first year, building up to 200 million cubic feet daily the third year with an option on an additional 100 million cubic feet daily beginning the fourth year. The Tennessee company agreed to purchase double that amount, namely 200 million cubic feet in the first year, with an option on an additional 200 million cubic feet. A prominent market consultant retained by Trans-Canada advised in effect that considering the volume and load factor the price to be received by Trans-Canada from the Tennessee company compared favourably with the price Trans-Canada was to receive from Northern Natural Gas Company.

There is another consideration that is important. The only gas Northern Natural Gas Company could purchase was for use in the Minneapolis market. But the Tennessee company contracted to purchase, if Alberta gas were available surplus to Canadian needs, 100 million cubic feet daily for sale in the markets of northwestern New York state. This additional volume of sales has an important bearing on the volume of gas to be shipped to eastern Canada, and consequently will ultimately have a beneficial effect on the eastern Canadian consumer in the rate he will pay for gas.

Point of Order

Mr. Knowles: Might I rise on a point of order? I wonder if Your Honour will consider a comment on the application, now that we have new rules in the house, of citation 293(o) of Beauchesne's second edition; also citation 314. Citation 293(o) prohibits a member from reading from a previously prepared speech. This rule has been sanctioned by usage both in England and Canada. Citation 314 reads:

> It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech, for the reason that "if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by other people, and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention."

I hope the hon. member for Trinity will not take it personally that I raise this point of order in the midst of his speech. I think this is the first instance of the reading of a speech this session. Perhaps we might have a ruling.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, if I may comment on this, I came in the house about 15 minutes before this hon. member started and another hon. member was reading his speech at that time, and I suggest that if the hon. member has been in the house as long as I have he has seen other speeches read. It is quite obvious that my hon. friend is not reading his speech; he is consulting his notes from time to time.

Mr. Knowles: I am quite prepared that the point I raised should be raised against me or any member of this group if any of us were to read his speech. But I think it is pretty obvious what the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick) is doing right now, and I ask for a ruling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I am glad the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested when he first rose that I should comment rather than give a ruling. We have commented from this chair a great many times on the question of reading speeches, and what I am going to say now will be by way of comment and not, unless I have to, by way of a ruling.

I think officially or unofficially it has always been the habit in this house to allow far more latitude in the debate on the address than in debates on specific bills, items in the estimates and so on which are before the house or the committee. I remember being placed in the embarrassing position last session of being requested to make a ruling upon this subject, and I stated then what I am going to state now.

There is perhaps no better known or more often quoted rule of this house than the rule against the reading of speeches; neither is there any rule that I know of that is broken more consistently or that is more difficult for the Speaker of the moment to enforce. Perhaps it is not letting any cat out of the bag when I say that I understand that serious consideration is being given at the present time in certain quarters to the possibility of more strictly enforcing the rule against the reading of speeches. If that enforcement comes, I think it will come first in connection with specific matters and not in connection with debates of this kind.

May I say of the hon. member who has the floor that I do not know whether he was reading his speech. I think it is obvious to everyone that a speech as full of figures as the one the hon. member has been delivering would compel the speaker who is delivering it to keep his eyes closely fixed on the paper before him. Unless actually challenged on this point I must assume that the hon. member is giving the house the benefit of his own views. I do not think it is being seriously suggested that he is giving to the house views which someone else has handed him in order that he might publicize them here.

So if we comment on the point which was quite properly raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and which I am sure will be raised again, I can only say—this is a confession of weakness from the Chair at the moment—that I know of no way in which I can tell an hon. member he is reading his speech if he tells the house that he is following his notes fairly closely. May I say entirely by way of obiter dictum that sometimes I almost wish we had the right to say to a member, "In my opinion you are reading your speech." At the moment I understand that the usage of the house is to accept what is being said as the member's views.

I think perhaps the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has now been made sufficiently to permit the hon. member for Trinity to carry on the rest of his discourse without reading word for word things which perhaps he may have committed in paragraph form to paper. I am certainly not going to stop the hon. member delivering a speech of that nature if he happens to be following facts and figures quite closely. The time taken during this discourse will not be deducted from the time allowed to the hon. member for Trinity, because I have taken up most of it myself.

Mr. Carrick: Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure hon. members of this house that if I have trespassed technically against a rule I have not trespassed against the spirit of that rule. The speech which I have presented to the house was prepared only by myself and no one else. It is my own ideas that have gone into it. I worked on the subject a great deal, and probably I gave the hon. member who objected the impression that I was reading it. I was following my notes quite carefully. I knew the subject so well that it may have been that I gave that impression.

The Trans-Canada project has been criticized in the press on the ground that it is an American-sponsored project and the Canadian public will not be given the opportunity to obtain control of it. Figures have been bandied about to show that it is impossible for the Canadian public to acquire control on the basis of the issued common stock. I am told that these figures are no indication of the ultimate distribution of the common stock to be issued and of the ultimate control of the company.

The sponsors of the project have assured the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that the Canadian public will be given the opportunity of buying a controlling interest in the project, and the minister has on a number of occasions communicated that assurance to the public.

I am also advised that in the contract between Trans-Canada and the Tennessee company there is a provision requiring a majority of the common stock of Trans-Canada to be offered to the Canadian public. The same arrangement had been made with Canadian Delhi Petroleum Limited, which is controlled in the United States.

It should perhaps be mentioned that there is no assurance the Canadian public will seize the opportunity to obtain control of Trans-Canada. If it does not desire to put its money into this project it is not the responsibility of the federal government. As long as the Canadian public is given the opportunity to acquire control, that is all that can be asked of the federal government and of the promoters of the project.

Mr. Speaker, it must be apparent that the federal government has been grappling with a difficult problem. Its aim is to have the Trans-Canada pipe line constructed and in operation at the earliest possible date. It has done everything it can to achieve this objective, and it deserves the commendation of the Canadian people.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, before concluding my remarks, I would like to say a few words in French in order to show my affection and respect for my French-Canadian colleagues in this house as well as to pay tribute to the French-Canadian people as a whole.

I wish to thank all my French-Canadian friends for the encouragement which they extend to us English-speaking members in our efforts to learn French. I have always admired their great ability in speaking both French and English. Over the past few years I have had the privilege to make the acquaintance of a large number of French-Canadians who have made me understand the generosity and kindly friendliness which characterize the French-Canadian people. There are no difficulties between the various races in Canada which cannot be solved by working together, by mutual understanding and good will. By working together we shall make of our beloved Canada a country which offers the world a fine example of brotherhood and co-operation between all Canadians.

(Text):

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was pleased to note that at this time a lady was given the honour of moving the address. I am not going to make any apology for taking up the time of the house today, because as you know I am generally a man of few words and I try to get those words over.

First of all I should like to suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that he consider, and consider carefully and most sympathetically, the request of the Canadian Council of the Blind and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind for an improvement in the legislation concerning our blind folk. This is something I believe is certainly needed.

These two organizations that are sponsoring this improved legislation are both working for one end, and that is to help the blind people of Canada. The Canadian Council of the Blind is an organization composed entirely of blind people. The Canadian National Institute for the Blind is a different organization, and is the one that publishes the braille books and talking books, and organizes many other aids for the blind, including the school at Brantford.

Now I am going to read from a little pamphlet, just to give you the meat of what these people want. I believe that every member of parliament, including the Prime Minister and every member of the cabinet, has received one of these pamphlets. This is a one-point program; they are not asking for a number of things as they have in the past, but just one specific thing that they feel is definitely needed for the blind people. This is what they are asking for:

> A specific allowance free from the means test by the government of Canada for all blind adults, to cover the costs of guiding and other essential expenses peculiar to blindness.

Because the handicap of blindness by its very nature imposes additional expenses, such as guidance and other essentials, the Canadian Council of the Blind and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind believe that the government of Canada should provide an allowance. It will defray at least a part of these expenses and encourage sightless citizens to lead an active normal life socially, recreationally, and, wherever possible, vocationally.

The legislative improvements may be made effective through amendments to the Blind Persons Act of Canada—1951.

I feel that I am closer to the blind person and the needs of the blind than perhaps any other member in the house, owing to the fact that I have in my own home a person who is blind as the result of an accident some 12 or more years ago, a person who is not receiving the blind allowance and has never asked for it. I know almost everything that blind persons can do, how many things they cannot do, what they can do for themselves and cannot do for themselves, and the many cases in which they need a sighted person to help them. I know the great need for companions who can help these people in everyday life.

These blind people, when they first become blind, think the world has caved in on them and that there is absolutely no hope. But after a few years they become normal citizens if given half a chance. Through the Canadian National Institute for the Blind these chances have been given to them in the form of education and help at home through their home teachers, and at the blind school in Brantford. Every one of these blind people—and we have a great number of them in Canada—is dependent, as I have said, on a sighted person. They have to have somebody who will read to them, somebody who will take them to the dentist, to the doctor, to public meetings and so on, because they want to know as well as you or I what is going on.

I have found that if these people are given guidance they are able to do as well as, if not in many cases better than, a sighted person. I know one person who can answer the telephone, take 15 or even 20 telephone numbers, and five or six hours later repeat those numbers with comments on them to the person for whom they are intended. They can type, knit, make leather work, work in factories and do machine work. But these people, in order to have a better outlook on life, need someone to guide them to different places, to ride with them when they travel in a car, bus or train, tell them what is going on outside and explain to them what might be of scenic interest, the roads, trees or mountains they are passing and so on; and these people will remember.

[Mr. Fraser (Peterborough).]

A few short weeks ago I had the pleasure of sitting next to Mrs. Sadie Bending, president of the Canadian Council of the Blind, when she made a speech which I would say would be hard to beat. All she had were braille notes, which she followed with her left hand, and she talked as fast as I am talking now, or even faster. She was so interesting that the people who heard her—many sighted people as well as blind—have asked that she come back to speak again. She is a very clever woman and has travelled all over Canada, the United States and Europe, and can describe the countries through which she has travelled as well as you or I who have our eyes. This is because her husband was with her and acted as her companion. As they went along the highways and byways he explained and described everything. Being blind and having nothing else to interfere with her thoughts, she remembered everything and was able to repeat the descriptions to the people at that meeting.

As I have said before, I hope consideration will be given to this request from the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and the Canadian Council of the Blind. It will cost a few dollars, not very much. I feel that if even one department of the government would cut out some of its waste and extravagance—every department has some, as the ministers well know—what would be saved in that one department alone would be more than sufficient to cover the expense of this improved legislation for which the blind are asking at the present time.

I see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is in the house. He knows that we give millions and millions of dollars to foreign countries to help them to improve the health of their people and for other purposes. I think it is requesting very little to ask that the government use a few dollars to try to improve the health of our blind people here at home, because I feel quite sure that if the legislation they request were put into effect it would give them a better outlook on life and by so doing would certainly help improve their health and assist them in many other ways. At the present time the only way they can see is through their fingers, by reading braille, through the use of talking books or through the eyes of a person who is fortunate enough to have sight.

I do not think I would be a very good member, Mr. Speaker, if I did not stand on my feet at this time and protest against something that is proposed for the post office in Peterborough. From what we have read and have been told it is proposed by the Post Office Department to put television cameras in the Peterborough post office in order to spy on the postal employees. There are many reasons why I and, I feel, every Canadian citizen, should protest against the use of this kind of device. These cameras or viewers or whatever you want to call them are nothing but another step by the government to try to take away the rights of Canadian workers. It is an attempt to take away their privacy.

The men in the postal department will have no privacy at all. They will not even be able to blow their noses without someone watching them. I would judge that a dictatorship country might use this kind of device. In fact it might be used in Russia, and I suppose if a man over there were caught doing something he was not supposed to do he would be shot at sunrise. Thank the Lord that does not happen here. Surely in Canada, which is supposed to be a free country, this kind of method is not needed to keep our citizens honest. I believe I am right in saying that instead of making the postal employees more honest it may very well have the opposite effect. I know if I were working in a post office and knew that one of these cameras was watching me I would resent it every minute of the day, and I do not think I would be able to do the work as well as I could if the machine were not there.

I know personally most of the postal employees in Peterborough. They are an honest, hard working group of men and have done an excellent job. At Christmastime the men in the Peterborough post office, with the space they have available, were able to handle millions and millions of pieces of mail. I do not think they would have been able to do so if they had had these machines spying on them at that time. I wonder why they were picked to be spied on. I suppose after the cameras are installed in that post office they will be installed in the post offices in Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton and other places throughout the country.

I wonder why the Post Office Department was picked and not the customs department or the taxation department. Why not include members of parliament? Why not put a camera on us all the time?

Mr. Pearson: We have no money.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I think we would be the first to object.

Mr. Campney: We have no money.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): No money?

Mr. Campney: Members of parliament have no money.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Most members of parliament are like goldfish in a goldfish bowl. They never have any privacy, but it would be just that much worse with television cameras on them all the time. I wonder how the Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) would feel if he had a television camera on him at his desk in his office, at his desk here in the House of Commons, when he is combing his curly locks or when he goes to wash. I do not think he would like it.

This peekaboo idea of the Post Office Department is not needed in Canada and, as I said before, only a dictatorship government would think of such a thing. I ask the Postmaster General if he would like to have a camera focused on him all the time. How would he like to have a camera on him when he went to the washroom, especially if it was a washroom like they have in the post office in Peterborough where there are no doors at all? One will not be able to go to the washroom to clean up without a television camera on him. The next thing they do will be to add a loudspeaker to these television cameras so that they can say, "Peekaboo, I spy you." Yes, one will not even be able to go to the toilet without having a television camera spying on him. To put such machines into a building where our workers are supposed to have rights is something that only a country like Russia would think of.

I understand that some 16 of these television cameras are to be installed in the Peterborough post office. Some of them will be dummies. In the past the men have never objected very much to the use of peepholes in post offices through which inspectors can watch and check on a man whom they suspect of not being honest, but they certainly do object to television cameras.

Personally I think it is a waste of the taxpayers' money. It is going to cost over $50,000 to instal them, and will cause a great deal of hard feeling. The sooner the idea is thrown out by the Post Office Department the better for this country. This is certainly the last straw. I hope all the postal unions across the country will object and send their protests not only to the Postmaster General but to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself. I hope the citizens of Canada generally will do likewise. I have had hundreds of letters and telephone calls about this matter. I have not been able to walk more than a block in the city of Peterborough without two or three people stopping me and talking to me about it.

I mentioned a few minutes ago that if the waste and extravagance of even one department of the government were done away with there would be enough money saved to provide the new legislation that the blind are requesting. Let me give a couple of examples of extravagance. An article appeared in the press a couple of weeks ago headed, "Queer Work for Queen's Printer", which reads in part as follows:

> . . . the Queen's Printer at Ottawa has issued a special illustrated folder with order blank, covering a selected list of 26 publications. Prices range from 15 cents for a simple pamphlet to $8 for a much more elaborate work.
> Doubtless some of this material properly comes from government printing presses but much of it, one would imagine, could well be left to private publishing which costs the taxpayer nothing.
> Why, for example, should it be necessary for the Queen's Printer to put out expensive books dealing with "Radio Fundamentals" or the "Climate of Montreal" or "Logging in Canada"? Even more inexplicable is the publication of three handbooks on how to play and coach hockey.

I know that most of the members are interested in sports, but why should the government go in for handbooks of this kind? Why not allow the printing houses throughout Canada to do that work? These printing houses are paying back to this government 50 per cent or more of their income in taxes. They are helping to pay the cost of government and everything we have here. Now their business is being stifled by these books the government is getting out, because it is work that is being taken from these publishing houses.

One asks, where is this government going to stop? Surely there is a limit to this extravagant spending. I just wonder how long the taxpayers will stand it.

I have another example of waste. When I returned to Ottawa for the opening of parliament I discovered, as most of the members did, that our offices had been equipped with new fluorescent lighting. I walked into my office and turned the switch. Then I thought one of these post office T.V. cameras, along with kleig lights, had been turned on. I was almost blinded by the light. I looked at the ceiling and saw that the old light which had been in my office had been removed. It was in very good condition last year. The fluorescent lighting installed consisted of eight 40-watt fluorescent tubes. I believe that if any electrical engineer had been installing these lights he would have said that four tubes would have been plenty, perhaps even two. I feel sure that many thousands of dollars could have been saved on this lighting installation, and that the money saved would have helped to pay for this proposed new blind legislation.

On more than one occasion I have said that this government is a wait and see government. They never seem to make a move unless it is right before an election or unless they think it is about time they moved into the particular field concerned to get a vote. I was not very much surprised, therefore, to learn through the speech from the throne that the government intended to bring forward legislation to provide equal pay for women in those industries under the jurisdiction of the federal government. This matter has been brought up before. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) has introduced similar legislation, only on a broader basis, for over three years. Of course it generally takes this government about three years to wake up. I believe they are now waking up to the fact that if they do not act soon they are going to lose a lot of the ladies' votes in this country. It seems that all this government thinks of is where they can get another vote.

There is a strong feeling in this country, and I have found it not only in my own city but in many other places I have visited, that the Criminal Code is not strict enough in regard to the purchase and use of firearms. It has been brought to my attention that during the past year there have been a number of cases before the courts in which people only in this country a few months or a year at the most have used firearms for criminal purposes. I feel, and I know many others feel, that more teeth should be put in our Criminal Code to cover the sale and use of these firearms.

I have in my hand here, Mr. Speaker, a family allowance cheque in the amount of $33. It is dated October, 1953. The cheque was cashed in a grocery store in Peterborough on that date. As hon. members know, hundreds of these family allowance cheques are cashed every month in stores across Canada. On November 11, 1955, when this grocer went to the bank to pick up his cancelled cheques, he found a slip debiting his account with the $33 for the cheque and the word "forgery" opposite it.

My purpose in bringing this matter forward is to protest against the government taking so long to draw the forgery to the attention of the storekeeper. Evidently the forgery was in regard to the endorsation on the back of the cheque. The finance department has taken over two years to bring it to the attention of the storekeeper. In industry a cheque such as that would have been found within a couple of months at the most. This is a case where a government cheque bounced, but like this Liberal government it was rather slow in bouncing. It is said that the mills of the gods grind slowly, but surely the finance department ought to grind a little faster than that. These cheques are made out on a machine, and certainly when they were run through the trouble could have been found. Surely the person who did not get the cheque must have notified the welfare department long before the two years were up.

I do not believe it is fair in such a case to make the storekeeper the goat. The storekeepers across this country are acting as bankers to the government when they cash these cheques. Many of these women cannot get around to the banks because their husbands are working and the banks are closed on Saturday.

If events such as these were reported within two months the storekeepers and the other fellows would have a chance to check and perhaps get the persons who cashed the cheques. When it takes two years he has absolutely no chance. I do hope that the government will reimburse this particular storekeeper and other storekeepers who, after two years, have been notified that a forged cheque has been cashed by them.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the ten days that are allotted to the throne speech debate are ten of the most valuable days to our country. During that period of time the members of parliament who are assembled here review the past, and as a result of their deliberations they anticipate the future. Therefore that period of time is of inestimable value to the people of Canada, because without them how can our country contribute to the stability, to the strength and prosperity and security of its people? If we do not know the conditions throughout the more than 5,000 miles that stretch from Newfoundland to Victoria, how can we formulate solutions that will be in the interests of this country of ours?

I think members of parliament are accepting their duty when they participate in this throne speech debate. Everyone throughout the Dominion of Canada appreciates their efforts. We have the greatest country in the world. There is no question of that whatsoever. However, we and the government are certainly not satisfied with the best. Nothing short of perfection plus will prevent us from using the utmost effort within our party to strengthen our country and provide policies that will be in the interests of all of our people.

We are not a mediocre people in Canada. We do not tolerate mediocre governments in Canada. During the last 20 years we have had a government, as everyone will agree, that has built this country up to be the best country in the whole world. If anyone doubts that let him name some other country in which he would rather live. If this is the best country in the world, how did it get that way? It got that way through the efforts of this government and through the efforts of the people who assisted the government and through the efforts of all the members of parliament, even the opposition. In spite of themselves they make a contribution to the welfare of Canada.

As I say, we have the interests of all the people at heart, regardless of how they are represented, whether they are represented by members of the government or by members of the opposition. We are extraordinary people in Canada, and we are going to be extraordinary-plus people. We are a young and virile country with the same type of government, young and virile; therefore we cannot help but be greater and still greater in the future.

Some mention was made of congratulations to the mover and the seconder, and suggestions were made that perhaps we could dispense with them. We cannot dispense with them on such an historic occasion as this when, for the first time in the history of Canada, we had a woman move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is an historic occasion. It is just indicative of what is going to transpire in this Elizabethan age. Throughout all the eras, every country that has had the privilege of having a queen has prospered and gone forward, but not at the expense of some other country, and in its forward movement has taken along with it other countries that were willing to take the same step of having progressive queens. Therefore we are proud of our lady member. We think it is a prelude to some greater honours for her in the future. I am sure those occasions will arise.

We also have the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), who represents one of the great races of Canada. Many of them live in my constituency at Lafleche, Gravelbourg, Meyronne, Ponteix, Val Marie; Dollard, Lac Pelletier, and at numerous other places in western Canada. The ancestors of many of them came from Bellechasse, Dorchester, Beauce, and other French counties in Quebec. They are proud of the hon. member for Bellechasse, because he has a great future before him.

We are meeting here today in a body to discuss the future of Canada. I am pleased to present the situation in my own constituency, if it can be presented within the period of time allotted to me, which we all know is impossible. If I could describe what is in evidence in that constituency in a few short words, I would tell you that we have had our usual, normal crop. We have had our usual exhibitors. Again a lady from my constituency—in fact, almost a neighbour because anyone living within 30 miles of you out west is your neighbour—won the national honey championship, and I have some of her honey with me. If you are nice to me I will let you taste some of Mrs. J. W. Kent's honey. Again at the Chicago international hay and grain show in Chicago my constituents won honours in grain, and at the national show in Toronto Mr. Robins of Shaunavon won prizes this year as he has other years.

We have all the other good things. I told the house last year about many of our products. Unfortunately not enough people are taking advantage of the good things to eat that this country produces. If more of them did so perhaps some of our surpluses would, if not disappear, at least diminish. I am going to try to encourage you today to consume some of the abundance that this country produces.

We are not living in an age of scarcity; we are living in an age of Liberal abundance, and it should be available to all of the people of the world. It is our ambition to make that abundance available to all the people so there will be no underfed or undernourished people anywhere in the world. Certainly we also have difficulties. If there is one hope that any hon. member might have it would be that he could say in this House of Commons, "All is well in my constituency; all is well in Canada; all is well in all the world."

I think that is the ambition of every member of parliament, but we have not attained that yet. Why? Canada is more dependent upon conditions of world trade than any other nation. Four out of every five bushels of grain that are produced in Canada have to be exported; whereas the United States consumes four out of every five bushels that it produces.

We have our difficulties. We have control over our own economy, but we cannot control the economies of other countries of the world. Some of our socialist opposition friends think we can, but they have never been able to do it. No matter how good things are in this country, the Liberal government always makes them better. No matter how bad things are, the opposition can always make them worse. We in Canada are determined to make them better. We have no control over floods and hurricanes and surpluses, but at least the surpluses are gifts. Therefore we should avail ourselves of the good things that we have.

In spite of anything that has been said in this House of Commons regarding surpluses, I do not know of anything that is nicer to come home to in southwestern Saskatchewan than a nice wife and nice granary full of wheat and a stable full of cattle and all the things that can be produced on the farm. There is nothing nicer to come home to, and there is nothing sadder to come home to than an empty house, empty barns and empty granaries, and we have had many of them in southwestern Saskatchewan.

We have wheat problems, certainly; we have an abundance of them. One of them is the problem of the surplus that has been mentioned. If we are to have a problem I want a problem of abundance, because we had the problem of scarcity for many years during the 1930's in too many areas. What position are we in today that so many complain about? We are in the position of having one crop ahead. Who can complain about that?

I have been farming since 1916, working on a farm in southwestern Saskatchewan for 40 years. During the years of crop failure in southwestern Saskatchewan, when we used the P.F.A.A., my ambition was to get in the position where I would have one year's crop ahead. That was my ambition. Now we have one year's crop ahead, but unfortunately we have not one year's financing ahead. That is the problem we are going to try to solve, to provide one year's financing ahead. If any socialist is making any comment I do not think he should make it, because if we had a socialist system he would have no problem at all; he would not be here. We would have problems with reference to scarcities because the socialist system is a system of scarcity, a system of control throughout the world, a system of rationing throughout the world. There is no socialist who will deny it, so let us take the situation as we have it and provide surpluses and not scarcities. We do not want scarcity and hunger in the midst of plenty, nor poverty in the midst of scarcity.

What is the difference? In other words, we can supply a solution if we have abundance but the solution to scarcity has never been found. That has been the problem in every socialist country in the world. We are taking measures to alleviate the situation on the farms. Farmers are provided with bank loans, not available to all the farmers but available to many of them.

This is not, however, only a national problem; it is partly a provincial problem. There is no government I know of that is more subject to it or more vitally interested in it than the government of Saskatchewan. Now we have banks which have charters from the federal government. Almost every town has a credit union, and they receive their charters from the provincial governments. If the socialist provincial government does not like this situation in regard to banks, why do they not get off their seats? They are the best sitters in the world. The only exercise they take is mental exercise in jumping to conclusions. If they got off their seats and did something about such situations, they would see what they could do to provide guarantees to the credit unions. Let the Saskatchewan government do something about it themselves in that province and provide the guarantee to the credit unions, interest free.

That is what they advocate; and why should it not be interest free, interest on our own money? We do not have to go to the Bank of Canada. My credit is not as good as a socialist's credit. I have not been able to get a loan from the credit unions at less than 6 per cent. If there is any money that is interest free, it should come from them. There is hope for the people of Saskatchewan. I understand the socialists are going to pool all their wealth, including the socialist members of this House of Commons, and form a socialist co-operative and lend money to the farmers of Saskatchewan, interest free. Good luck to them.

What has caused the present situation? We have had five crops in three years, and normally we have three crops in five years. We have had the competition of other countries, including the United States. We were not aware of this fact until some five socialists went to Washington, I believe some time last February. When the United States government saw the gullibility of the socialist members who went to Washington on their own they said, "This is it, boys; we will get rid of our wheat; no one will say a word." That is when the competition became heavy.

If the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is wondering how much was lost to the farmers of Canada in the last three years by the speeches of the socialists in this country, I would estimate the amount at $1 million a speech; not that they are that valuable. Take the farm income for the year 1953 and figure it out in proportion to the number of speeches. It is as simple as two and two are four. The socialists in Saskatchewan say to send socialists to Ottawa. Between 1949 and 1953 we had the best conditions in Canada we have ever had. The socialists went out in the 1953 election campaign and said "Send the socialists to Ottawa; send fighters to Ottawa who will fight for you".

Well, the socialists had better start fighting. You do not fight with words only; you fight with facts. It seems there are too many people in this House of Commons among the socialists who have no alternative to offer except words. We have the same situation out in Saskatchewan. We have a tax and talk party and a talk and tax government. They are the pseudo-socialists living on the capitalists. They are wine, dine and dance socialists, and their slogan is to eat, drink, and be merry for tomorrow the capitalist will die.

What are we trying to do in Canada? What are the farmers asking for? They are asking that we hold the price line. That is the first demand of the farmer in western Canada. That is what the wheat board is there for. You could get rid of the wheat at 80 cents a bushel, but I would rather get rid of one bushel at $1.40 and have one left in my granary. The farmer says to hold the price line. That is what the government are trying to do. They are providing some assistance—it would be hopeless to ask the provincial government to do that—so the wheat board will not become involved. They are trying to provide some assistance that will operate apart from the wheat board so that if something should happen like what happened in 1929 with the pools, the wheat board will not be lost.

There are not enough votes in western Canada to hold the wheat board if the rest of the people of Canada decide that we should have it no longer. So we have provided the means through the banks, which is insufficient; I know it does not cover everyone. The provincial governments can come to the rescue. If they do not wish to do that, they can step right out and buy 50 million bushels from the wheat board tomorrow. If the wheat board act does not provide for this we will pass the necessary legislation. It is like the government of British Columbia making a barter deal with the British government. Three years ago they made a deal with Britain for their salmon. If one provincial government can do it, another provincial government can do it, because they buy over $50 million worth of power corporation equipment, much of it from Britain. They buy their electrical equipment and Britain has it, and they buy many other things. What is to stop them from doing it in other provinces of western Canada. Get busy socialists; wake up; smarten up. Why sit idly by and talk and hope thereby you will be able to win yourselves another election? I do not know how long it is going to last, but the socialists had only one solution left that they thought would stand up and hold water, and that was to barter.

You cannot accept sterling for your wheat. Mr. Gordon Bowen, British trade commissioner, came out and told the farmers this fall that acceptance of sterling would not sell an additional bushel of wheat, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce told you this morning. That is something the Liberals have been saying for a long time. It is wise to accept advice from the Liberals.

We had another meeting out in western Canada, as Charles Woodsworth has reported in the Western Producer of December 8, 1955. He told them exactly what the Liberals have been telling them for the last few years, that the wheat problem is a combination of economics and he did not believe price cutting was the answer. We do not believe it either. He did not believe in a policy or deals involving the acceptance of soft currencies between countries, as was pointed out this morning. He also pointed out that barter deals were just as dangerous. He said that Japan would take more Canadian wheat if she could send us textiles, and that would hurt the textile industry here.

We have a whole economy to take care of, not an individual one, so we are endeavouring to help the farmer to the extent the government can within its capacity, so the socialists have no argument whatever left. They have not a leg to stand on; but as I understand it that does not bother the socialists very much, as long as they have a seat to sit on.

However, they do have one argument left, and that is to feed all the hungry people of the world. That is what we all want to do, feed the hungry people of the world. They tell us to give it to India, give it to China, give it to Africa, give it to anyone who will take it.

I am ready to feed everybody, as there is nothing that hurts me more than to know that some people are hungry. But do you know that there are over 50 million monkeys in India, and that each one of them eats as much in a day as does a human being. In many cases they are considered to be sacred. I certainly have no intention of feeding the monkeys of India. All the monkeys are not in India; there are some monkeys in Saskatchewan. If there are no monkeys there, certainly there is some monkey business going on. If there is no monkey business out there certainly there is Tommy-foolery, and at last tommyrot is now setting in there. They will have to make more exertions out there if they are going to keep themselves in power.

We are making a big mistake here in Canada in not providing better storage facilities for our wheat. We should be making preparation in the good years for the bad years when we may have a shortage of wheat. We should provide permanent storage space as Joseph did in biblical days, when he prepared for the seven lean years during the seven fat years. The hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) said something about the Bible, the good book, this morning, and everything in it is just as true today as it was in those days. We should be providing permanent storage facilities for 5 million bushels for the lean years, and they could be provided right there at Swift Current or Maple Creek. That would be the safest insurance in which the government could invest.

We should provide every facility that would better the welfare of the farmers. We should do everything we can to guarantee the future of our farmers. We should have permanent policies, not something that is here today but will pass out of the picture tomorrow, as is advocated by many members of the opposition. The Liberals are famous for their policies. When they establish a policy it is permanent for the interest and welfare of the farmers of the country.

Who has a better right to these things? One thing I do not like is to hear people here in parliament or elsewhere say that the farmers are receiving too much consideration, that if you give them more they will be off to California. There is not one-half of one-half of one-half of one-half of 1 per cent of the farmers who go to California. I have been living in southwestern Saskatchewan for 40 years, and the only connection I have had with California is to eat a little lettuce or celery or drink some orange juice that may have been imported from there. If there are any people who should go to California, who have a greater right than the farmers who spend most of their lives producing food in the interests of the people, so they may have cheap food?

Who is it works so hard and who claims no benefits over and above what he should have for his own interest? Fourteen hours a day means nothing to a farmer, 100 hours a week means nothing to a farmer because he is willing to contribute that in the interests of the nation. He is producing in the national interest, for the benefit of all people, and what he produces is for the benefit of other industries. Those who work in other vocations can go to California, but the minute the farmer does he is blamed for doing it. I for one am sick and tired of hearing about that.

Another thing I want to mention is this. When the farmers receive $20 or $30 million in payments from the wheat board, which is their own organization, we see headlines in all the papers. Why should those headlines appear when it is the farmers' own money? On that same day over $40 million will be paid out to labour in this country—I wish it were $80 million—but we see no headlines in the paper when $40 million has been paid to labour that day. But when—perhaps once or twice a year the farmers' own organization does make payments of $20 million or $30 million we see headlines all across the country. That leaves the impression that Canada is contributing that money.

Whatever may be contributed to the farmers in the future will come back to you tenfold with the blessings of the farmers of western Canada. They do not keep anything; they spend it all, and it comes back to you to keep the wheels going around in the industry of Canada. Do not begrudge any assistance that is given, because we will not call for assistance unless there is a deficiency in farm income and the figures show it. Have you ever seen a westerner stand up in this House of Commons and not vote to assist you even if it is a subsidy to the gold mines?

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Timiskaming refer to gold, because they use the gold subsidy for political purposes out in wester Canada. Our socialist friends keep telling the people that the federal government is paying to have the gold taken out of one spot to be buried in another down at Fort Knox, Kentucky, instead of the facts relating to gold subsidies. Don't think for one moment that that does not hurt us in western Canada.

Farming should be brought up to equality with other industries. We should not want it otherwise. Perhaps the same could be said for our fishermen. We are all one great co-operative organization here in Canada, and we should be ready to help carry one another's burdens. All we wish to know is what the burden is and to what extent help is required. All governments should be co-operating one with the other in an effort to bring the people of Canada to the highest levels that any people could visualize. Everyone should be contributing to the welfare of Canada, because you cannot have one part of the economic body sick and hope to have a well body.

There is another thing I should like to mention at this time. People should be encouraged to eat our food. If there is one thing which I think is detrimental to Canada it is these food faddists, these people who go around telling us that we should not eat butter, we should not eat meat, we should not eat wheat or we will get too fat. They tell us if we do these things we will have a bulging waistline when we get to be 50 years of age. They tell us not to eat these things that have been acceptable since the beginning of time and have helped to build all nations. They tell us not to eat bread and meat and butter and all the other things we produce, to eat some synthetic food instead.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. (Brown) referred to the deterioration in the health of our youth, and I contend that you cannot raise a generation by having them get up in the morning and eat a piece of lettuce and then tear off to school. We should not be eating all these things we import from other countries when we have the food right here in Canada. Many people get up and take a sip of orange juice in the morning, a leaf of lettuce at lunch and some celery at dinner time. As I say, you cannot raise a generation of people on that sort of food.

My grandparents on both sides all lived to be over 90 years of age, and they did not live on rabbit food. They ate pork, potatoes, beef and pancakes all at the same meal, even for breakfast. They were not afraid that they were going to get fat because they had a good meal; they were not afraid they were going to die tomorrow. There are more thin people dying in Canada these days than fat people, if I read the statistics right. I like fat people, as they are the happiest. If a fat person laughs he does not laugh just in one place; he laughs all over. You never hear of divorces in fat families; they are too busy providing the things to eat to think of divorce. A man comes home and meets his fat—I should not say that—his pleasingly plump wife, and he has no time for a divorce. He puts his arms around her, or tries to, and everything is fine.

But what happens to these emaciated families when the husband comes home from work? He wants to know what is cooking for supper. She says, "You are getting too fat. I have a little lettuce here for supper". When that happens, that is the beginning of divorce.

I suggest that we put out of business all those factories producing synthetic foods, and that we stop buying in Canada imported products that are described as containing vitamins A, B, C and all the way to Z. If they have to have vitamins added to make them consumable, there must be something wrong with the initial products. We should eat the things we grow here in Canada. If that does not take up the surplus, it will at least take up part of it, and it will ensure that we have a nation of healthy and strong people to which all other nations of the world will look with admiration and envy. We want you to eat bread, beef, butter, potatoes and fish—especially fish, because we need brain food, as an hon. member intimated this morning. We can use much of that brain food in Canada.

What are the remedies? Sell the wheat. Hold the price line and sell the wheat. We have the best men in Canada selling that wheat; or, if we have not, we had better get them. We have men in Canada who have been selling wheat for 35 years. We took them over from the wheat pools, people with experience dedicating their lives to the selling of wheat. But that is not good enough for the socialist government of Saskatchewan. They say, "Eliminate those experienced men who are no good; let us sell the wheat on theory." If the leader of the socialists or the premier of Saskatchewan or the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) or anybody else thinks he can sell wheat, let us get rid of the wheat board and put them in. If we did that, we would find that tomorrow every farm in western Canada would be for sale. We shall have to develop new policies for wheat, but what the farmer wants is to sell the wheat. He wants the money from the sale of the wheat.

Some socialist members say they have been demanding advances on wheat sales since 1942. Would any farmer be one cent better off if they had been doing that since 1942? No. Let us look at it as it really is. You cannot spend the money twice. I do not want a lien on the future purchases of the farmers of Canada. I want the provincial and federal governments to provide assistance to the western farmer, so that he is not only one crop ahead but one year's financing ahead. That is what the governments as a whole should do, particularly the socialist government of Saskatchewan.

When a socialist provincial government is incapable of acting itself, the only thing left for it to do is to appeal to the federal government. When a school board becomes incompetent, it is replaced by an administrator. In Saskatchewan when a municipal council is considered incompetent and the government has to supply the revenue, it provides an administrator. Nobody in Canada likes administrators, but if there were a socialist government in the Dominion of Canada and a province like Saskatchewan was concentrating all its efforts on making appeals to the federal government for its financing, I can tell you that the socialist administration would place an administrator in the province of Saskatchewan instead of a government.

So I would advise the government out there to get busy and substantiate itself in the eyes of the people. There is only a certain period of time in which you can make your living by talking; there comes a time when you must act. So we should provide suitable new policies, develop new uses for wheat and pay for its storage. All this would be in the interests of the whole economy in Canada.

Some farmers are asking for retroactive storage payments, and I think they are right in doing so. To indicate to you what a farmer receives for No. 4 wheat, I receive $1.07½ in my elevator. We farmers have been in a price squeeze. In Saskatchewan, over and above that, we have the tax squeeze. That is the position in which we find ourselves.

The following is a report on the farmer's share of money paid by consumers for food:

Out of every dollar spent for bread, the wheat producer gets 15 cents.

Out of every dollar spent for beef, the producer gets 62·8 cents.

Out of every dollar spent for eggs, the producer gets 76·8 cents.

Out of every dollar spent for fluid milk, the producer gets 51·7 cents.

Out of every dollar spent for creamery butter, the producer gets 72·3 cents.

Out of every dollar spent for cheese, the producer gets 34·5 cents.

Out of every dollar spent for canned tomatoes, the producer gets 16·9 cents.

Out of every dollar spent for potatoes, the producer gets 51·7 cents.

This leaves us in the position that out of every dollar spent for bread, the producer gets less than half of the amount received by the next closest producer. That is one of the reasons for the situation in Saskatchewan. Another is that the percentage of farm cash income from all livestock and poultry products in 1954 in Saskatchewan was 26·1 per cent. All the other provinces were higher: 67·7, 70·8, 58·8, 77·1, 73·3, 48·1, 53·0, 66·1. This shows that our economy is based on wheat. If we adopt something else we are in competition with the rest of the farmers of Canada.

As I have only nine minutes left I shall try to draw to a close. Here we have a situation in which all the governments should try to co-operate with one another in endeavouring to alleviate the situation in Saskatchewan and throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. If there are more capable men in Canada, certainly we want them. The government is looking for them and hoping they will offer themselves, even at a personal sacrifice, in the interests of the people of Canada, so that we may all prosper together and so there will not be the feeling in any one section of Canada that one particular industry is profiting at the expense of another.

We have had the greatest government for formulating unity that Canada has ever had, but we still have a great advancement to make. We have to overcome the untruths that are told to the people in western Canada in order to gain political advantage, untruths that are told in the interests of some individual who hopes he might possibly be elected on what he tells the people. What we need is some honesty in politics and men who have the interests of the Canadian people at heart, so we can progress as a country should progress. There should be such a thing as honour, even in politics.

Sometimes we find that is not the case. If any member of the opposition, including the socialists, or Karl Marx junior—the hon. member for Assiniboia—has any solution other than what we have heard so far, we shall be glad to hear it. They would be making a contribution to the welfare of Canada, and we should be glad to listen to them. I think at the bottom of their hearts even the socialists know that they would have to adopt an entirely different attitude from the one they have adopted in order to make this Canada prosperous and the great country it is destined to be.

There is only one danger facing this country. It is not that it has had a Liberal government for the past 20 years, because it has proven that it can take the people of Canada to the greatest heights of any country in the world. The only danger is that the people of Canada may listen to what the opposition say. I am sure that, as time progresses, even we Liberals who may be outnumbered at the moment in Saskatchewan will bring the truth to all the people of that province.

We have a great country, the greatest in the world, a country that one might say has set the pace for other countries. All is not lost in Canada. As long as we have stability in the government and a government that has the interests of the people at heart, we shall have a great future before us. There is no room in this country for socialist agnostics, or agnostics of any kind, but there is room for men who have faith—faith in the people and faith in a government that can carry the people to new heights. No prediction of the socialists has ever come true, much to their dismay and discomfiture. It has been in the interests of all the people of Canada that none of their predictions have ever come true.

All the people of the world, including Canadians, are proud of Canada. I am proud to be a Canadian and, although I do not like to take words from any other source, I have here a little United States schoolgirl's description of her country which I have applied to Canada. What this little schoolgirl wrote about her country appeared in an editorial in "Model Publications" of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, and I have transposed and rearranged it to meet Canadian conditions. This is what she said, paraphrased:

I am a Canadian. Listen to my words, socialist, fascist, communist. Listen well, for my country is a strong country and my message is a strong message. I am a Canadian and I speak for democracy. My ancestors and relatives have left their blood on the cliffs at Louisbourg and the plains of Abraham. On the highway between Chambly and Longueuil and in the valley of the Richelieu, on the waters of the river Marne and in the shadows of the Argonne forest, on the beachheads of Dunkirk, Dieppe, Salerno and Normandy.

A hundred thousand and more of my countrymen have died for freedom. My country is their eternal monument. They live on in the laughter of a small boy as he watches a circus clown's antics. They live on in the sweet, delicious coldness of the first bite of peppermint ice cream on the first of July. They live on in the tenseness of a baseball crowd as the umpire calls "batter up", and in the referee's signal on the football field and hockey arena. They live on in the high school band's rendition of O Canada on Remembrance day and in the inspiring music from the peace tower.

They live on in the clear, sharp ring of a school bell on a fall morning. They live on in the triumph of a six year old as he reads aloud for the first time. They live on in the eyes of an Ontario farmer surveying his acres of corn and potatoes and pasture. They live on in the brilliant gold of hundreds of acres of wheat stretching across the plains of Saskatchewan. They live on in the milling cattle in the stockyards of St. Boniface and Toronto.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will not have enough time to conclude his quotation. This is a debate on which a time limit has been placed. The hon. member for Kindersley.

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of any amendment introduced on the floor of the house that has had more unanimous support from the farmers of western Canada than the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F. party. I am particularly pleased to take part in the debate at this time after hearing the official government pronouncement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the pronouncements we have just been subjected to from that quarter of the house which I am convinced is quite accurately known as the rump.

I am pleased to take part in the debate because I represent a constituency which is perhaps the most seriously affected by the congestion in wheat. It is seriously affected because we had a good crop in 1952, a good crop in 1953, and in many parts of the constituency an average crop in 1954, followed by a good crop this year of good quality grain. This means, therefore, that many farmers in the constituency of Kindersley still have wheat stored on their farms grown in the 1952 crop year. This emphasizes the problem and is some indication of the amount of grain in store upon some Saskatchewan farms.

I think what I must do in outlining an argument on the subject of wheat, and marshalling support for the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, is first to explain to members from other parts of Canada the problems confronting us in western Canada and, second, to explain to members of the government the problems confronting us. I think the problem can be summed up by saying that the farmers are caught in a price cost squeeze. If we were to analyse the cost of production and the returns over the past few years I think it would indicate that this more than anything else is the problem that we are desirous of solving at the moment.

Operating costs are very high and, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), the cost of production index for farmers stands at 241 on the basis of the period from 1935 to 1939 being 100. This gives us an indication that it is costing us over two and one-third times as much now as it did in the base period of 1935 to 1939, taking that period as 100. We find that since the war there have been increases in the prices of everything the farmer has to buy. We have been subjected to increases in the prices of farm machinery, fertilizer, gas, oil and grease, repairs, labour. Indeed, I cannot think of one item used on a farm which has decreased in cost since the war.

Tied in with that is the technological advance which has overtaken agriculture and which of necessity has increased the farmer's cost of production, because included in the technological advance is the use of such things as chemical sprays, chemical wire worm control, chemical insecticides which will increase productivity but also increase cost. It is a most inefficient farmer who will hesitate to use these things to obtain the maximum amount of production.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): At the supper recess, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out how the technological advances in agriculture had caused farm costs to be higher than they were in previous years. I was pointing out how the use of 2-4-D for weed control and Mergamma-C for wire worm control and the judicious use of fertilizers have also increased production. I do not think we can for one moment assume that the average production of wheat is as we term it today. We like to think in my area that the average yield for wheat is 16 bushels to the acre. I am quite convinced that with these technological advances the average yield in my area in a dry year would be closer to 18 or perhaps 20 bushels to the acre.

I believe it is necessary for the government to consider this increase in average yields rather than take the point of view the Minister of Trade and Commerce evidently takes when he makes the statement that if we had had a dry year we would have no surplus. I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce missed the point entirely. In those areas that have no crop the farmers are extremely hard up. I am thinking of areas such as the interlake region of Manitoba, represented by my colleague the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce). They have no grain, and they are extremely hard up. Therefore I do not think we can continue to hope for a dry year as the means of solving this governmental dilemma. The costs of producing a large crop are of necessity higher than the costs of producing a smaller crop because of the increased threshing expense.

Then after we have gone through the procedure of harvesting a crop we are faced with perhaps the biggest expense of all, the cost of building storage on our farms. These costs range from 15 to 20 cents a bushel. In the light of these figures one can make some appraisal of the very high costs indeed that are facing western farmers. They are of necessity building granaries; and if these dry years for which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is hoping do come, the farmers may never need those granaries again. The construction of these buildings is part of the cost of operation, yet the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) denies the farmers the privilege granted to those making money out of handling of wheat, accelerated depreciation for this storage.

Perhaps one of the most revealing figures related to farm costs came to light in a survey of 77 farms conducted in the Kindersley area in connection with the Kindersley vocational farmers' association. The figures dealt with the costs of farming, and the conclusion reached is that the cost of production of a bushel of wheat, allowing no wage to the operator, is on an average for all the farms $1.16 a bushel. If you were to allow the operator a yearly wage of $3,000, which is not exorbitant in these days, the cost is $1.60 a bushel. With these figures in the background pointing up the very high costs of production for the western farmer, we must look to every aspect of the problem to see in what way he can hope to recover some of his capital costs and have a little bit left over in order to carry on in the future.

We find that in the past crop year many farmers were unable to deliver the eight-bushel quota which was promised to them by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on February 18 of last year and again as late as July 7 of that same year. At that time he indicated that all of the grain would be off the farms by the start of the new crop year. I have had it indicated to me that these remarks created the feeling that farmers had an assurance from the responsible minister that they would be able to market all these thousands of bushels of grain they had in storage on the farm, so they need not worry if they had to replace their tractor, their combine or make some other capital expenditure.

When this promise failed to materialize the farmers found themselves very hard pressed. When it failed to materialize to the extent that they could not even deliver the eight-bushel quota last year, let alone this last crop year, they found themselves in very straitened circumstances indeed. We find today there are some points in Saskatchewan that are on a quota of 3 bushels per specified acre. Yet in other areas not too distant we find they are still on the unit quota which allows a delivery of 300 bushels per farmer, and these people have not had access to storage space in the elevator to deliver that.

I believe the government should give very serious consideration to making an investigation into the functions and duties of the transport controller who is responsible for allocating box cars to various marketing points along the railway line, and for assuring that they are fairly apportioned. Last fall, for example, I found that farmers in the Alsask area who had produced some flax were forced, as a result of the shortage of box cars, to haul that flax 160 miles to Saskatoon in order to deliver it. We found farmers from Sceptre on the Canadian Pacific line hauling their flax down to Medicine Hat at a cost of 25 cents a bushel.

If you can think of anything more ridiculous than hauling your own grain along the main railway line by truck to points which have space available, you have to use some imagination. We found farmers hauling their Durum from one rail line to another, from Merid to Compeer, a distance of 40 miles, in order to deliver some grain and recover some money. As recently as December they were hauling Durum wheat across the South Saskatchewan river from Lancer up to points on the Canadian National line where there was space available. In the process of doing that, one farmer's truck fell through the ice and he lost his load but was able to recover the truck.

These facts give some indication of the desperate circumstances in which farmers in western Canada are. They do not like hauling flax or Durum 160 miles to market. They do so because of dire necessity. This dire necessity is perhaps caused by the fact that in the early fall the priority given the use of box cars indicated to me that the government had written off western agriculture. The first priority was given to hauling lumber. About 100 of these big 40's per day were shipped out of the Saskatoon division for the express purpose of shipping lumber. These are the same cars that today are down in the United States, the same cars that are not available to transport grain to fill the terminal storage space. The next priority was coal. About 100 cars a day were allocated to that. Then, after that, they might give some consideration to hauling grain for the farmers.

Last fall one of the big mills in Humberstone could have used 30 cars a day to haul wheat from the prairies, but the cars were just not available through the inefficiency of the transport controller or through the misdirection of the government, I am not sure which.

We see then, Mr. Speaker, that on the one hand we have these very high operating costs, and on the other hand we have had no opportunity to deliver a quantity of the grain that a bountiful nature has given us, to offset these exorbitant production costs.

We must think in terms of the returns for a year's labour. The Minister of Trade and Commerce likes to refer to the past, so I think I should be allowed to do so as well. It will be found that in the period from August, 1945, to July 31, 1953, the average producer return from a bushel of wheat varied between $1.81⅞ and $1.85½. But the 1953 crop indicates an entirely different story again, because on the wheat the farmers were able to deliver they recovered $1.564 a bushel, or 27 cents below the 1945 to 1953 average. I expect that the price the farmer will receive for his crop this year will be even lower.

We know that tied in with this decline in price is the fact that deliveries from the farm up to December 28, 1955, are down nearly 70 million bushels from last year, and that was bad enough. They are down 173 million bushels from the ten-year average. This gives us an indication of the shortage of purchasing power so that farmers cannot compensate for the increased cost of production. Tied in with that is the fact, as was pointed out by previous speakers in this debate, that the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat is less than 50 per cent of what it was in 1945. We are now coming to the crux of the situation, and I should like members in every corner of the house to give this very serious consideration. The purchasing power of a bushel of wheat has declined to less than half what it was in 1945.

While I am on this point I should like to indicate to members from other parts of Canada, who are not familiar with wheat growing, that the producer does not receive $1.40 a bushel. I have heard that statement used many times by people who do not know that the farmer pays the freight to ship his grain to the lakehead or to the coast terminals. In the case of a 19-cent freight rate, it would mean that the farmer would recover $1.21 a bushel for No. 1 northern. On the other hand, if he happened to have an inferior quality of grain which graded down to No. 1 feed, he would receive 79 cents a bushel. You can imagine the financial plight of a farmer who can only deliver 8 bushels per specified acre and receive 79 cents a bushel. The results of this are manifest in other aspects of the economy. It is not just a local problem; it is not just a situation out in Saskatchewan that we can blindly overlook.

Last year one of our major sources of unemployment was the farm implement industry. We find that in Canada in 1953 the wholesale sales of farm implements were $238 million. They were down 4·9 per cent from 1952. In 1954 the wholesale sales of farm machinery were $146·7 million, or a reduction of 38·4 per cent from 1953. In the three prairie provinces, where this situation is even more critical, it will be noted that in 1953 the sales amounted to $159,667,000 but in 1954 they dropped to $80,928,000, which is a decline of almost 50 per cent. Therefore it is only a matter of time until the dilemma and the quandary facing the western farmer are reflected in the other portions of our economy.

We have to make a thorough assessment of the problem. That assessment cannot be based on the terms used by the Prime Minister, because in a telegram to Premier T. C. Douglas of Saskatchewan on October 24, 1955, he had this to say:

> On studying this problem carefully and having in mind our experience with the 1951 crop, it was apparent to us that only a relatively small number of farmers would in fact require assistance.

The statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce today certainly did not give any illumination to the situation, when he indicated that there was a slight shortage of cash.

In order to accurately assess conditions in the Kindersely constituency, which is representative of Saskatchewan, I invited the opinions of rural municipal councils throughout that area. I invited them to express their opinions to me, through resolutions, on the financial position of the farmer, on the suitability of bank loans as a temporary solution, and any other solutions which they would have to offer. The replies were most illuminating. They did not coincide in any way, shape or form with the statement of the Prime Minister or with the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

In the replies I received the statements of the financial position ranged from "fair for the moment" to "will change very soon." As an indication of that fact I received such expressions as "dire shortage of cash", "critical", "weak", and "acute". These are replies that I received from members of rural municipal councils of the Kindersley constituency, men who have the greatest knowledge of the situation at the present time.

I asked for their expressions of opinion on the suitability of bank loans. The replies I received, with the exception of one that it might help as a temporary solution, were such as of "inadequate", "worse than useless", "highly resented", and "very unsatisfactory".

Other suggestions I received from the councils ranged from requests for cash advances on farm-stored grain to lowering of tariffs, acceptance of sterling, foreign currencies, and a reclassification of low grade wheat. What they had in mind there was a reclassification of grades 5 and 6, which are glutting the terminals, to a feed status wheat which could be sent to areas such as that of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), to assist those farmers who have no feed and no wheat.

There are two resolutions which are of particular interest, and perhaps they sum up the situation as expressed by the resolutions from other municipal councils and will give the house an opportunity of gleaning the feeling of the farmers in that area. I am going to read those two resolutions. The first is from the rural municipality of Deer Forks, No. 232, and reads as follows:

> Whereas, the farmers of this municipality are in a very difficult financial situation due to the following factors;
> 1. Several successive years of good crops grown, a lot of which are backlogged on the farms and cannot be sold because of the present marketing conditions;
> 2. Practically all of the available reserves of cash have been exhausted to carry on the farming operations and to provide the necessary storage facilities on the farms for this surplus grain;
> 3. The continuous rise in the cost of farm machinery, equipment, repairs, fuel and other commodities which the farmers must purchase to carry on their farming operations and the steady decline in the prices of the products which they produce to sell;
>
> And whereas the recent guaranteed bank loans on future marketings of grain have failed to remedy this situation;
> Be it therefore resolved that the council of the rural municipality of Deer Forks No. 232, in the province of Saskatchewan, strongly urge the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the member of parliament of our federal constituency of Kindersley to adopt the following recommendations with as little delay as possible:

1. Provide cash advances up to 75 per cent of the value of all stored grain on the farms through the facilities of the Canadian wheat board;

2. Enact the necessary legislation to provide for parity prices between the commodities which the farmers must purchase and the products which they produce to sell.

Certified a true copy of a resolution passed by the unanimous consent of the council of the rural municipality of Deer Forks No. 232, at their regular meeting held on the 5th day of December, A.D. 1955

W. P. Rolick,
Secretary-Treasurer,
Rural Municipality of Deer Forks No. 232.

This is an indication of what the farmers in Saskatchewan are thinking as reflected by those who are closest to the problem, the municipal councils.

I have one more that I should like to put on the record because it expresses the attitude of farmers throughout the west. This is addressed to me:

Dear Sir:

At the last meeting of council there was quite a discussion on the wheat and farm situation, and as a result of the talk on the matter the following resolution was passed.

"Resolved that we send a resolution to our member to Ottawa advising that in the present wheat situation we are in favour of the following policies for the immediate and long term future.

1. That under present wheat board arrangements interest free advances should be available up to 75 per cent of the expected sales quota on wheat

2. That when land is seeded to grass in the future so as to reduce acreage in wheat that the sales quota be not reduced so that encouragement to reduction in acreage in wheat be given.

3. That we are in favour of a wheat acreage reduction program providing arrangements are made to purchase all production from the reduced acreage.

4. That we are in favour of accelerated depreciation on farm storage being allowed by the Department of National Revenue.

5. That we are in favour of all grades of wheat from No. 5 down being classified as feeds and subsidized for sale to local and foreign markets until this type of grain surplus is used up.

6. That we do not feel that our type of local agriculture can continue to carry on with the marketing situation of the last few months."

Carried

The council feel that this matter of an agricultural sales policy and all its ramifications and effects is not a political matter as it is one that will affect the whole economy and should be considered as a business matter without any reference to party east or west, as loss of markets will affect all.

Yours sincerely,
W. H. Howes,
Secretary.

There are two of the letters, Mr. Speaker, as I indicate, which outline the thinking of farmers in that area in respect to the cash situation of farmers and the attitude they have toward a solution. We must then turn to the solution of this problem.

I think we are fairly safe in assuming that a problem does exist. The first problem is that of finding an immediate solution, a means of putting cash into the hands of farmers now, not six months from now. It is in this regard that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar moved the amendment to the amendment requesting cash advances of 75 per cent of the value on the anticipated delivery quota. It is a policy that has been advocated since 1942 as a necessary part of the wheat board legislation and as a permanent aspect of that policy. It is simply an extension of the principle of orderly marketing.

This morning the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that every time the C.C.F. mention the wheat board, we say we are in favour of it—but. I submit that not only are we in favour of the wheat board but we are a champion of the principle of orderly marketing. For example, you tell only your best friend that he has halitosis, and the same thing relates to the Canadian wheat board. We are so determined to maintain it that we draw these points to their attention so they can be corrected, so this principle of orderly marketing can be continued. We do not take the attitude, "Do not say anything against the Canadian wheat board because the government might throw it out".

The Canadian wheat board is simply an agency of the government. If we do not like the policies the government is foisting upon the Canadian wheat board, policies which might in a few short years undermine the wheat board, we do not hesitate to draw them to the attention of our best friend, in the hope that they may be corrected. The Canadian wheat board has adopted the principle of buying more wheat from the farmers than they can sell in one year. Why not enlarge this principle to the extent that they can make cash advances on farm-stored grain? That would be buying a little more wheat from the farmers than they might sell but you would continue to enlarge the principle of orderly marketing.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce in his outline this morning stated that he went west to see the situation and the extent of the remedy necessary, but before he went west he realized that he had better do something to salve some of the wounds, so he had already decided something should be done and he dragged out this old chestnut of bank loans, a piece of 1951 legislation in the hope that his reception out west would be a little better. It did not help, Mr. Speaker, because I am afraid if I were even to think of some of the expressions that I have heard used to describe the policies of the Minister of Trade and Commerce you would immediately call me to order.

I am afraid once the farmers of western Canada hear the recent statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to why he could not recommend cash advances on farm-stored grain their reception of him would be worse. The only criticism the Minister of Trade and Commerce had against cash advances on farm-stored grain was that you could not trust the farmers. He is afraid they would go out some dark night after they had received the cash advance, and feed the grain to the pigs, or perhaps sell it to a neighbour. That is the objection the Minister of Trade and Commerce has. He says it is all right to do it through the banks, where we can get our ounce of flesh, but if we do it through orderly marketing we just could not implement this type of policy as far as Saskatchewan farmers are concerned because they could not be trusted.

He was quite pleased with the rate of 5 per cent, stating he had borrowed money at higher rates of interest than this from time to time; but I don't think he would borrow his own earnings at 5 per cent, which is precisely what the farmers of Saskatchewan and western Canada are asked to do. Bank loans are inadequate, so inadequate that one of the major banks in Kindersley has had inquiries about it but it has not made one loan. The bank at Abbey, which serves eleven hundred people, has only loaned $15,000. It is not that they do not need it; it is that they highly resent paying interest on their own money and burdening themselves with future debt. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) decided to diversify agriculture and offer free banana seeds to all the farmers of Canada I do not think they would take that offer either; and there is not too much difference.

We find that the farm organizations of western Canada are unanimously in favour of cash advances on farm-stored grain. Municipal councils, the farmers' union and the Saskatchewan wheat pool are in favour of the proposal. In fact I have not met a farmer or a businessman who is opposed to the principle of orderly marketing through cash advances on farm-stored grain. I imagine the members from Saskatchewan, no matter where they sit, would be obligated to vote in accordance with the wishes of the farmers of Saskatchewan and support the proposal for cash advances on farm-stored grain. I think it will be most interesting to see for whom they vote when the time comes.

The second immediate solution that has been offered has to do with a two-price system under which the farmer would be paid a price on the maximum under the international wheat agreement or, as the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool has termed it, a price of $2.30 a bushel. An increase of 20 cents a bushel would only mean an increase of one-third of a cent on a loaf of bread. We have already admitted the desirability of this two-price system, because the farmers who grow Durum and sell it on the domestic market receive $2.04 a bushel, but when it is sold in the export market the price is $2.74 a bushel.

We must turn then to a long-term proposal as a final and definite solution of this problem. Other solutions have been advocated by my colleagues from time to time and will be advocated in the future. We must turn to the long-term solution. The first point I have outlined is the necessity for stimulating trade. The Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated that our actual exports were only declining gradually. He pointed out that the 1954-55 sales were 251·8 million bushels, and he was applauded by all government members of the house. But what the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not tell the house was that in an expanding world market, Canada's share was declining. He did not tell the house that the sales by Argentina in the same year were up 24 million bushels; that the sales by Australia were up 31 million bushels; that United States sales were up 65 million bushels, while Canada's sales, one of the major wheat exporters under the international wheat agreement, suffered a decline of 3 million bushels.

The minister stated that he was in favour of give-aways, when replying to the hon. member for Assiniboia; yet he said this morning that you cannot have barters and you cannot deal with certain types of currency because those would be give-aways. What I say is that if that will help us move some of our wheat, the mechanical arrangements can be worked out to the mutual benefit of all countries.

The final point which I should like to deal with in connection with the long-term program is the necessity for Canada to give some leadership in international affairs. Too often we have paid lip service to the two-thirds of the people of the world who are starving, and I think it is necessary that Canada show some initiative and follow the recommendations made by Dr. L. E. Kirk, retired chief of the plant production branch, food and agriculture organization, who in setting out several programs stated:

> These would include: a persistent effort to reduce tariffs in order to facilitate world trade; encouraging the production of alternative crops in order to reduce those products in surplus supply; lowering costs of production by greater efficiency as a means of lowering prices; making grants in aid of surplus products to needy countries either as outright gifts, or preferably, conditional on the importing country matching such grants with counterpart funds for use in their own economic development.

I think we have passed the stage in civilization when we can allow thousands, yes millions, of bushels of wheat to lie in the fields of western Canada to be blown asunder by storms as happened last December. Farmers lost as much as 1,500 bushels, which were just blown away. This should not be allowed to happen when people in other areas of the world are starving.

If we are to be realistic in considering the whole matter of defence, the matter of winning friends in the world, I think we should be able to squeeze enough water out of the $2,000 million of defence expenditures to provide $500 million a year for this international organization in order that it may buy up surplus food from the surplus-producing areas and distribute it through the proper means to those areas which need it, those areas where men are starving. In the near future we will be needing the men in these areas as our brothers and friends.

This is a policy which we should launch ourselves so we will be ready for what may come in the future. I have pointed out the necessity for correcting the cruel price-cost squeeze which is facing western farmers. I have pointed out the inadequacy of some of the legislation which has been proposed, and I have referred to the legislation which western farmers and businessmen desire in order to remedy this situation. In conclusion I have pointed out what long-term solutions are necessary to solve this problem of grave national concern.

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I too want to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. While this may be somewhat repetitious, my congratulations are sincere. I have always considered the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) a most capable speechmaker, and I am sure we are all proud to have this lady Liberal member on our side of the house.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) showed a wide interest in Canadian affairs generally. I envy him his fluency and ease of expression, which most of the French-speaking members in the house seem to attain.

Some hon. members have complained of errors of omission in the speech from the throne. It has been said that it omits to mention a number of the problems which are besetting Canada that should have been mentioned. I think an error of omission was committed in that it did not say enough about the good things that have occurred in our country during the last year. It does contain a few cryptic comments about the country's prosperity and the growth we achieved in 1955, and I think we can look back on that year as one of continuous expansion and terrific growth. During the past year Canadians spent more money, earned more money, produced more goods, bought more goods, sold more goods, exported more and imported more than ever before in the history of the country. We have a larger labour force working today than at any time in the country's history.

It is significant that as we meet this year our problems are concerned mainly with the growth in the economy and the inflationary aspects of what is occurring, rather than with unemployment and the deflationary trend about which we were worried when we met in January of 1955. My own particular constituency has been no stranger to this almost frantic growth which has occurred in Canada during the past year.

Reliable sources of information to which I have had access, namely the chairman of the metropolitan commission in Toronto—we call him the super mayor, Fred Gardiner—tells me that metropolitan Toronto is the third fastest-growing community on the North American continent, being surpassed only by Los Angeles, California and Houston, Texas. Upon examining the construction figures under the National Housing Act I find that more starts and finishes occurred in the metropolitan area than anywhere in Canada during 1955. I am pleased also to note that of the building activity under the National Housing Act in metropolitan Toronto, 43 per cent occurred right in the riding of York-Scarborough. So according to my calculations that would make York-Scarborough the fastest growing centre in Canada.

I think I am safe in saying that my problems are concerned chiefly with this growth, and I suppose hon. members will say that I am lucky to have problems of this nature rather than problems of other types. However, there is one situation I want to mention. It is a local matter, but as I go on I think it will be seen that this encompasses considerations which are of national concern.

As hon. members know, the planning for transportation facilities constitutes a terrific headache in our rapidly expanding centres of population in Canada. Railroads such as the Canadian National Railways are called upon to provide increases in their plant and equipment, in their trackage, in their assembly and marshalling yards, in their repair and storage buildings as well as in their rolling stock and other equipment. It is not always easy to locate these railroad developments in areas where surrounding property values will not be affected adversely.

It was with some dismay that about 10,000 of my constituents and myself were faced with the decision of Canadian National Railways to establish a huge assembly and marshalling yard smack in the centre of a fine residential area in south Scarborough.

We commenced to make representations opposing this development in the fall of 1952, previous to the last general election, and the battle has gone on until just recently. During that time, delegations of citizens attended here in Ottawa before both the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and Hon. Lionel Chevrier, the previous minister of transport. Representations were made to Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways, in Montreal; briefs were presented to the railway officials in Toronto, and our case was laid before the board of transport commissioners in a hearing they held on the subject.

All during this period the railways were adamant in their stand in so far as the development was concerned. They needed the space. Their argument was that having purchased this land for this purpose in 1926, they felt they were on very strong ground in their desire to go ahead with the particular type of development, that is a marshalling yard, they had in mind.

To make a long story short, finally in December of this year I introduced another delegation of citizens, with the reeve of the muncipality, Mr. A. Harris, to the Minister of Transport in Ottawa. After our presentation the minister made arrangements to attend at Toronto and inspect the site personally. In the middle of December we were glad to show him the actual site of the problem. After viewing the area he mentioned that he would ask Mr. Donald Gordon and his advisers to take one more look at the situation and give it further consideration.

Accordingly, late in the same month of December we were called in by the Canadian National Railways officials in Toronto and, to our delight, we were presented by the railways with a new concept in planning for a metropolitan Toronto. Instead of a huge assemby yard, they had pared down their plans to a small storage yard and were able to release 100 acres of fine industrial land that could be sold for private purposes. This was the balance of their holding in that particular area. In addition, they are installing a service road along the boundary of this industrial land and a green belt some 200 feet in width which will protect the residential housing in the immediate vicinity.

[Mr. Enfield.]

The municipal officers of the township of Scarborough were, of course, very much elated over the prospect of this new inflow of industry and a consequently increased municipal assessment. We were all very happy that the residents were to be protected in so far as their property values were concerned.

Here was a situation where, to all intents and purposes, the die had been cast. A large corporation had made up its mind to carry out a development that dated back to 1926. Yet even at this stage the Minister of Transport saw fit to ask them to reconsider, which they did, and the matter has been solved to the lasting benefit of the people. I think it was a question of weighing what was most in the national interest; whether this development should continue as planned or whether the interest of the people in the area, who stood to lose some millions of dollars in property values through this development, was paramount. I am happy to say that in this case the people's side of the argument won out.

To my mind this is the finest example of democracy in action, and I must express my heartfelt thanks to the minister for his assistance and to the railway management for keeping an open mind even at this very late stage in the development. Most of all, I take off my hat to the civil action committee of the citizens. They did a tremendous amount of work in maintaining the enthusiasm of the people and in the presentation of their arguments; and, of course, the victory is theirs.

There is one thing that bothers me about the whole problem. The railway purchased a site some 29 or 30 years ago for a certain purpose. They stated the purpose at the time of the purchase, and they felt that this gave them an inalienable right to hold that land as long as they wished and develop it for that purpose at any time. Compare this with a private individual who buys a piece of land in a booming, growing metropolitan area. He holds it for many years and then, at some future time, he applies to the municipality for permits to construct the particular type of development he had in mind in the beginning. He is faced with zoning bylaws and regulations which say that the area has changed and that there is no particular reason why his plans should not change with it. This is called planning; and, of course, it is the only intelligent way to carry on development in growing metropolitan areas.

To avoid a repetition of this very large problem—and I must stress the fact that this was an acute problem for the some 10,000 people concerned in Scarborough—I would suggest to the C.N.R. that when they purchase land for large developments of this nature they plan their activity in concert with the municipality concerned. If this were done, a plan of subdivision could be registered against the title of that land. A permanent record would be made of the intentions of the railway, the surrounding land could be zoned at the same time for industrial purposes, and the whole problem would disappear.

The C.N.R., as it is presently constituted, has the power to develop whatever property it owns in the way it wishes without reference to municipal or provincial planning bodies or councils. No doubt in the past the C.N.R. has had to have this power, but in the future, as our metropolitan areas grow and our centres of urban population grow, our railways will have to be more conscious of the planning of such areas so that problems such as the one I have just seen solved may be obviated.

It is with great respect that I make this suggestion. Having solved my particular problem and having learned something, I must take this opportunity to try to pass on what I have learned to those who are responsible for the administration of the railway.

There is another matter in which the people of my constituency and, I think, many people in Canada are most interested. This is the question of a national health insurance scheme. I should like to say a few words in that regard. It is my considered personal opinion that a majority of the people in metropolitan Toronto, at any rate, are sold on health insurance. The only question that remains is whether a health insurance scheme taken out of private hands and placed on a governmental basis can provide cheaper, more adequate and wider coverage than the presently constituted private schemes such as the Blue Cross and P.S.I., which are now in operation. I feel personally that that will be the case. I feel that on a universal basis, cheaper, better and wider coverage can be offered to the public, and I think Canadians are ready and eager to accept such a plan, provided they will still have a free choice of doctor or hospital.

However, a perusal of the recent proceedings of the federal-provincial conference leaves it far from clear, to say the least, what we may expect in this connection. The government, through the Prime Minister, indicated its willingness to proceed with a plan of national health insurance if participation by a substantial majority of the provinces representing a substantial majority of the people were assured.

Reading these proceedings it is rather difficult to determine from the comment or lack of comment by the provincial spokesmen whether such participation will be forthcoming. The provinces naturally are concerned with the fiscal problem, the question of whether under a hard-pressed financial structure they are going to be able to afford to participate in a national health insurance scheme. I was encouraged, therefore, when I learned of the recent proposal of the Prime Minister regarding fiscal arrangements with the provinces. I calculate that under that proposal there will be, in total, additional payments of some $67½ million to the various provinces over and above the present tax rental schemes.

The proposed new dominion-provincial fiscal arrangements may strengthen the provinces' financial position to the point where they may strengthen their resolve with regard to health insurance. I think what the provinces need is to have some concrete plan placed before them in the way of a national health insurance scheme with definite ideas as to its cost and, of course, indications of how the money is going to be raised to pay for the scheme. From our point of view, as the Prime Minister pointed out in the conference, the prerequisite to the institution of such a scheme is that it be proven or indicated that the scheme will be in the national interest and will affect the majority of the people of Canada. Only on such a basis will we have the constitutional power to go ahead.

In the meantime the federal government is continuing to consider the matter, in that a committee has been set up composed of representatives of the federal government and of the provinces who I understand are to hold their first meeting to discuss the matter on January 23 next. I would suggest to our federal representatives that they adopt an aggressive, positive and optimistic approach to the question of national health insurance, because I think the provinces will need that approach if they are to be encouraged to enter the scheme.

Even if such a scheme were limited to hospital insurance alone it would be a great boon to the Canadian people. Hospital costs are the biggest single item when it comes to sickness. You can put off your own family doctor for a few months so far as his bill is concerned, but I understand you cannot even vacate your room in a hospital unless you have first made arrangements to pay your bill.

In the meantime we are of course continuing our activity under our national health plan. The philosophy underlying the national health plan of course is that you cannot have national health insurance until you have the necessary hospital space and other medical facilities to look after the people when the plan is operating. We are fortunate in Scarborough in having a newly constructed Scarborough hospital which is on the brink of its grand opening. We received a grant of $197,500 under the national health plan system of grants to assist in its construction, and a further $40,000 was received by the hospital from the Atkinson foundation in Ontario. The Atkinson foundation is an organization established by the late Joseph E. Atkinson to carry out charitable activities in the province of Ontario. In the field of health alone this foundation has paid out since its inception in 1942 nearly $2 million in health grants, and has authorized the future payment of nearly $1 million more.

There is no overestimating the importance of such charitable organizations, and with the terrifically increased demand for medical and hospital facilities that would accompany the institution of a national health insurance project the work of foundations of this kind will become increasingly more important and necessary in the field of health grants.

Our social welfare measures of course have to be paid for, and Canada's ability to pay depends on our resource development. Over the past few years our tax policies and political stability have encouraged the heavy inflow of large blocks of foreign risk capital, vestment in our resource industries. I was surprised to note the grave concern of the particularly United States capital, for investment in our resource industries. I was surprised to note the grave concern of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in his speech on January 12 last about the extent of United States capital investment in this country. I say, thank heaven for it. Without large and substantial amounts of risk capital we would not be enjoying the high level of business activity, the sharp and steady rise in our standard of living and the attainment of the style of living to which we would all like to become accustomed.

Natural resources are no good to anyone if they are left in the ground. If they are left there long enough they are no longer natural resources. The other night the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) gave us a very interesting and graphic picture of what technological advance and change can do. He pointed out that we may soon be able to fly to the moon, using the new sources of energy that we are producing. I suspect that when he spoke of the third province that was to fall to the Social Credit party he might have been thinking about the moon. I think it is important to recognize that substitution through technological advance may outmode products, materials and sources of energy so that they are no longer resources, and we must make hay while the sun shines.

The resources we have to develop can only be developed with foreign capital in the present stage of the growth of this country unless, of course—and I doubt that this would occur—a socialist government were able to take every aspect of the whole economy and organize it completely.

Mr. Nicholson: A Liberal government did it during the war.

Mr. Enfield: A very interesting point has been raised, and no doubt the hon. member who interjected it will have ample opportunity to follow it up on future occasions. In any event, as far as I can see the problem of heavy United States investment is confined generally to the field of labour-management relations, not fully but chiefly. A large United States corporation, for example, may look upon the Canadian branch of its operations as expendable in the face of very heavy trade union pressure. The least they might do is to use the Canadian situation as a ground for experiment. Perhaps it was this to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was referring.

In this connection I am most happy to see in a recent speech by Mr. Walter Gordon, chairman of the royal commission studying Canada's future economic prospects, that the problem of heavy foreign capital investment in Canada is one of the most important matters that the commission will be studying. I look forward to the results of that study. I think they will be very illuminating. I might take this opportunity to commend Mr. Walter Gordon and his commission on the aggressive, vigorous, and energetic attack they are making on the matters arising from their undertaking.

Well, a booming economy always seems to leave a certain amount of labour unrest, a certain amount of conflict between labour and management, in its wake. Unfortunately my riding has been no stranger to this during the last year. The Canada Wire and Cable Company has been shut down for some time by a strike. This plant is located in the section of my constituency known as Leaside. We have two very large Frigidaire plants, both of which are idle at the present time as a result of the strike in the General Motors organization. One cannot help but feel very grave concern over the privation and suffering that the families of the workers at these factories must be undergoing because of the long period of idleness. I can only express my hope that the parties concerned, in the unions and in management, will be able to meet in the immediate future and find a common ground on which their differences can be settled.

In conclusion may I say that while 1955 has been a big year for Canada, I expect an even bigger year in 1956. We have our difficulties in certain well-defined areas of our economy. I think it would be too bad, however, if we allowed our good judgment to be blurred by such difficulties in our approach to the over-all picture. Domestically we are very strong indeed. In the international sphere Canada has never enjoyed greater stature, resulting from the unflagging efforts of our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We hope we will hear much from him later on his extensive coverage of world affairs and his extensive travelling since the last session. Our prestige has never been higher at the United Nations. This results from the work of our delegation headed by our very capable Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I for one, therefore, Mr. Speaker, look to the future with very great optimism indeed.

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): It is an honour for me, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the motion moving the acceptance of the speech from the throne. It is also an honour to be here and to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the house of my willingness and desire to co-operate with them in every way possible. I am indeed pleased to see again the four or five ministers and the numerous members of the opposition across the floor who campaigned so vigorously against me during the last election in Restigouche-Madawaska. It was indeed unfortunate that the election took place right between our famous salmon fishing season and our hunting season, because these hon. gentlemen could have avoided wasting their time.

It is a pleasure for me to congratulate the new members. I regret that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. St. Laurent), who represents the riding located next to mine, does not intend to speak. I thought possibly he could help me convince his father that the government should do something for the maritime provinces. We do have power, and we could sell him the power he needs to build the industries he promised in Temiscouata riding. May I say this. I very much appreciate the co-operation and assistance I received from thousands of former supporters of the Liberal party who voted Conservative, many for the first time.

An hon. Member: And probably for the last.

Mr. Van Horne: I invite hon. members across the floor to follow their example. I also express my thanks to the numerous supporters of the Social Credit and C.C.F. party who actively supported the official opposition, thereby informing the government in no uncertain way that we are dissatisfied and discouraged with the indifference and lethargy with which this country has so long been governed. The speech from the throne confirms this fact, and makes it abundantly clear that the government is indeed indifferent to the needs of the Canadian people.

My riding of Restigouche-Madawaska stretches some 210 miles right around the top of the province of New Brunswick. Our breathtaking rivers, the Restigouche, Upsalquitch and Matapedia, have played host to the world's famous anglers, and our guides on those rivers are recognized to be the greatest guides in the world. The people are hard-working and for the most part are engaged in lumbering, farming, fishing and pulpmill operations. All of us have endured our full share of indifference on the part of the federal government. We are, Mr. Speaker, fed up with the Liberal government.

The riding of Restigouche-Madawaska is a vital part of the long forgotten and neglected maritime provinces. Alas, our economic history since confederation has not been a happy one. From the bleak stretches along the shores of New Brunswick over to the closed mines at Inverness and to the far reaches of Madawaska county, deserted farms, deserted homes, deserted mining villages, closed factories and shops, mark the long procession of our young people who have to leave the maritimes, forced to go elsewhere to make a living. They were driven from our land by the same economic conditions which yesteryear drove our forefathers from the shores of Europe. Why must we become emigrants again from the maritime provinces, driven like nomads on the desert, from place to place, to find work and a chance to make a living? The burden of education becomes greater and heavier as we raise our sons and daughters in the certainty soon they will be forced to leave our beautiful part of the country to go elsewhere to find jobs. How can traditions be established and maintained in our families if they are going to be continuously uprooted?

We in the maritimes are going to have our place in the economic sun of Canada. Such men as Premier Smallwood are going so far as to say publicly that unless the federal government wakes up to our needs Newfoundland will leave confederation. This young generation is on the march, regardless of party politics. Mr. Smallwood is supposed to be a good Liberal. We are going to get a new deal for the maritime provinces. If this government does not want to give us justice and our economic rights, we are determined to replace it with a government that will. We say this, give us a new deal or quit.

As Hon. Hugh John Flemming, premier of New Brunswick, whose courage and devotion to the cause of the maritimes have earned him the reputation of being an outstanding champion of maritime rights, said recently before the Gordon commission:

> Though it is my firm conviction that the great economic experiment undertaken by confederation to make trade flow artificially east and west instead of naturally north and south was like trying to make water run uphill—it has turned out to be like our own famous magnetic hill in New Brunswick—a definite illusion.
> At the time of confederation, the voice of the maritimes was heard and heeded throughout Canada. It will be heard again.

New Brunswick is no longer content to remain one of the weakest links in the Canadian confederation. Last Friday I tendered a resolution calling for a new deal in the maritime provinces. It has since been amended to conform to the rules of the house. What we need in the maritimes is an entirely new deal. We feel that the government should put into force immediately an over-all new deal plan to ensure that economic development in the maritime provinces will cease to remain stagnant and will keep pace with the modest economic progress of central Canada.

We ask you for federal financial assistance to help develop our natural resources. We ask you for drastic reductions in transportation rates to the full extent needed to permit competition by maritime producers and manufacturers in confederation-made markets. We ask for regulations promoting and enforcing the development, the manufacture, the processing and the use of the idle and wasting natural resources of the maritimes, such as timber limits now owned and controlled by a few and immobilized by them and going to waste. We ask for regulations controlling the exportation of raw products, such as pulpwood in an unprocessed and unmanufactured state. We ask for remedial measures to offset the ill effects on our economy in the maritimes of the St. Lawrence seaway project. We ask for loans for capital development. We ask for the immediate implementation of a public works program to build the Chignecto canal, and to provide better and more adequate shipping and terminal facilities at our ports, such as Saint John, Dalhousie and Campbellton. We ask the government to build year-around ports, such as at Jacquet River, to handle the ore coming from the new mining area near Bathurst. We ask you to build the long talked of Campbellton-Cross Point bridge. We ask you to erect new post offices. We ask you, the government of this country, to have the Canadian National Railways build new stations where needed, such as at Edmundston. We ask you to complete and to entirely pay for the trans-Canada highway in the maritimes.

There are those sitting across the floor of the house who may say, "Would you have us do more for the maritimes than we would do for central Canada?" I answer by saying, "Would you have this country continue indefinitely with one part prosperous and the maritimes in a continuous depression?" That is what is happening today.

The whole economic theory behind confederation was that we in the maritime provinces could profitably trade artificially east and west rather than trade naturally with our pre-confederation markets to the south. And when I see an appropriation like the $26 million voted to the Colombo plan to develop hydroelectric power in Pakistan, while on the same occasion the government refused even to endorse our loan and sign our note so we could borrow money cheaply to build the Beechwood project, I say it is time to have another look at a government that would do such things. I certainly invite my friends across the way who are members of the Liberal government to force the heads of their party to act, to move and do something while there is still time.

In speaking of the modest prosperity in central Canada, my attention was forcibly drawn the other day to the implication which resulted from the facts set out in the admirable speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that Canada is not really making progress.

I should like to commence my observation by addressing a few remarks to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to tell him how the people of my riding resent his inactivity and indifference in the manner in which he has been lately conducting the affairs of his department. I shall speak on the question of health in French, and I shall return to English afterwards.

(Translation):

I now turn to family allowances. I will concede that, when they were initiated—

Mr. Habel: Your leader opposed them.

Mr. Van Horne: That is not true. The basis used in setting the amounts of family allowances was the cost of living in 1944 or 1945. Inasmuch as the cost of living in the meantime has almost doubled, will anyone suggest that, if this government were honest towards the Canadian nation, it would not consider it to be its duty to raise or even double family allowances.

I keep getting hundreds of letters urging me to express to the government the dissatisfaction of the Canadian people for this lack of honesty which prevents the government from recognizing its duty towards the mothers and children of this country by refusing to increase family allowances.

The same is true of disability pensions. As you know, one must be totally and permanently disabled to be entitled to such a pension. In other words, you have to be unconscious to get it, unconscious to keep it, and unless you walk about toting a coffin under your arm, you cannot draw that pension.

If that pension plan is supposed to help the disabled, should not the government recognize that the pension should be paid to anyone unable through illness to earn a living at his ordinary trade or occupation? You may say that, to a certain extent, it comes under provincial jurisdiction but every government and every Canadian knows that the Liberal government has everything to say when it comes to administration and regulations regarding disability pensions.

I would also like to mention our older men and women, who are forced to retire at 65.

Nothing stifles initiative and the joy of living so much as the realization that once you reach age 65 your services will no longer be in demand. We should protect our citizens who, after a long life of hard work, are anxious to work in order to retain their health and happiness. We must afford them the opportunity of taking up another occupation, if their health is adequate, and if they are anxious to continue to work. I am not claiming that they should continue in the same line of work as the one in which they were engaged throughout their life. Laws, however, should be passed to help them, since it is a great pity to see how the health of these men and women is affected immediately upon their retirement. Where would the Liberal party be today had the prime minister been forced to retire at 65, along with the other members of his cabinet? There would no longer be any party.

The general tendency within our industries is to enforce compulsory retirement at age 65. This affects not only the health of those who have to retire, but also the entire economy of the country.

I also wish to deal with the matter of old age pensions. I cannot understand the thinking of the Liberal party leaders as regards the means test. Under our laws, one has to be poor to be entitled to the pension, one must be very careful to stay poor to keep it, up to the age of 70. Not only must one be poor to obtain the pension, one must also stay poor to keep it. So, a man who worked hard all his life and managed to put something aside, either in the form of real estate or in cash, is penalized by the government for having had the foresight of saving his money, whereas the spendthrift is assured of the old age pension. I am convinced that my electors want the old age pension to be granted to anyone, without the means test, at the age of 65 and the amount raised to $60 a month. If the government had been loyal to the Canadian people, it would have raised the amount of this pension in accordance with the rise in the cost of living.

When, if ever, will the government wake up and give us a national health insurance plan? Is not the government ready to admit that, if Canada does not have today a health insurance plan, it is due precisely to its cowardice and complacency towards the Canadian people?

Is not the government ready to admit that, before handing out huge sums of money to foreign countries, allowing them to enjoy free medical care, it would be its duty to see to it that we, the people of Canada, have as much as the government is ready to give to the citizens of these foreign countries? Alas, for the past five years the Conservative opposition has been beseeching you to put in force immediately a national health insurance plan for our sick people.

Take the poor man with a family who has to live by the sweat of his brow—

An hon. Member: That hurts!

Mr. Van Horne: His chief worry is the thought that he would not have enough money to pay the hospital and doctor's bill if his children fall sick. When will the government recognize that, before giving over a billion dollars to Britain, it should give some to our Canadian citizens? Is the Canadian government not ready to give as much to Canadian citizens as to foreigners from Europe—

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: Get a translation of this.

Mr. Trainor: It must be good.

Mr. Lesage: Say it in English.

Mr. Robichaud: Say it in English.

Mr. Lesage: Say it in English. Is this your party's policy?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

(Translation):

Mr. Van Horne: On behalf of all my fellow citizens, I urge the government to concern itself more actively also with the urgent question of mental health. Even our opponents from the other side of the house should concern themselves a little more with the achievement of things like that instead of coming to the house to make us waste our time.

The same thing applies to mental disease, as it does too to old age pensions or pensions to veterans. You are not doing your duty to the Canadian people, and you know it.

Of course, the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare certainly is interested in the health of the people of this country, but I am unable to understand how it is that he is unable to convince the government that it should give the citizens of this country as much protection and assistance in the field of health as it does, for instance, to foreign countries.

Consequently, and to sum up my remarks, I request the immediate introduction by the government of legislation with a view to establishing a national health insurance plan, and also with a view to amending existing legislation so as to extend the old age pension to every person aged 65 without a means test.

Moreover I ask that this government help our hospitals that are now unable to collect more than 40 per cent of their bills because their patients cannot pay. I therefore believe that if the federal government does not want to help hospitals and does not want to do its duty by setting up a national health insurance plan, it should at least help hospitals that are unable to collect outstanding accounts.

(Text):

I would like also, Mr. Speaker, to speak about an organization which is working an injustice on the people of Canada; that is Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

An hon. Member: Your party voted for it.

Mr. Fleming: Be quiet; grow up.

Mr. Van Horne: In the United States they have an act called the national housing act. In Canada we have an act corresponding to it called the Central Mortgage and Housing Act. And it was none other than your own Mr. Bates who, in the May issue of Canadian Business, said that in the United States there is a lower down payment under their housing act than under ours and also there is a lower interest rate, namely 4½ per cent instead of 5 per cent. There is a longer amortization period, namely 30 years instead of 25. The United States give veterans a preference. They have no down payment to pay on a house. Furthermore the down payment is very much lower than the down payment required in Canada.

The biggest and the most unjust thing about this Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation legislation is that it refuses to recognize a mortgage loan on a house which is already built; that is, an older house or a house not built to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation standards. What does that do? It prevents a fellow with an older house from selling it and getting fair value because he cannot get a mortgage loan that equals the mortgage loan that Central Mortgage gives on a newer house built to their standards. In other words, it is the same thing as if the government came along and put their hand in the pocket of a home owner and said, "We are going to take away this value from you, because we refuse to recognize the mortgage loan value of your house".

If the national housing act in the United States is able to recognize almost the same loan value on a house which is already built as on a new house, then why cannot the Canadian government do the same? The failure of the Central Mortgage and Housing Act to recognize a loan value and lend money on a house which is not built under the Central Mortgage and Housing rules is killing the value of the older houses, of houses not built to Central Mortgage and Housing standards. This stupid restriction is taking away value, like a man who puts his hand in your pocket and removes all the money. It takes away the equity which people have invested in homes that are not built under the Central Mortgage and Housing specifications.

In other words, some people in this country cannot build or buy a home of their own. Those people are denied the right to obtain a mortgage loan on their property under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation

Act. In the United States a family may purchase a home through this national housing act and maintain a mortgage on it which goes up to 90 per cent of the value of the house whether new or old. In Canada it must be a new house built under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, and the down payment required is far more than the average citizen can afford to pay.

If these required amendments to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act to bring the act up to par with the national housing act in the United States and provide the same benefits were to mean the expenditures of large sums of money on the part of the Canadian government, I would say that possibly we should study the matter further. The government is denying countless thousands of Canadian citizens the chance to acquire a home.

I would also like to say a word, Mr. Speaker, in regard to agriculture. On November 8 I sent a telegram to the Minister of Agriculture saying:

Hon. James W. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ontario.

After careful study of urgent and deplorable problem of the potato farmers in the maritime provinces I urgently suggest and strongly recommend the immediate adoption of reciprocal tariff measures between the United States and Canada for importation of potatoes into Canada and the immediate adoption of a diversion program based on same lines and same prices as now in operation in the United States. The government is sitting down on the job in regard to the solution of the potato problem. The farmers need and require immediate action if disaster is to be averted.

I have not received any answer to that telegram, but as a result of the tremendous pressure which was put on the Minister of Agriculture finally at the eleventh hour he consented to give a little assistance, but it was too little and too late; it was not enough, and it did not solve anything. It did not get the potato farmer out of the plight in which he had found himself for three long, hard years. These farmers have seen their farms mortgaged to the hilt. They have had their backs against the wall, unable to carry on.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture why his government insists on selling butter to the communists at 37 cents a pound when the poor people of this country must pay 70 cents a pound for it. I ask him if that is right when there is so much utter poverty in Canada. The government seems to be worried about surpluses and where to store those surpluses, and this at a time when there is utter starvation in this country. Any hon. member can prove that to the government.

It was a pleasure during my campaign to know that the Minister of Transport was in my riding campaigning actively against me. His presence in my riding served a most useful purpose, for it drew attention to the fact that the Canadian government had for years without number neglected the transportation facilities of the maritime provinces and of my own riding in particular. I ask the Minister of Transport why he has not seen fit to provide year-round docking facilities at Jacquet River, New Brunswick, which would be a natural outlet for the production of the mines near Bathurst. This locality furnishes one of the best opportunities on the eastern seaboard for a year-round port. I understand that the minister did take time to investigate the pitiful condition into which the port of Dalhousie has been permitted to deteriorate.

The federal government is always so anxious to know how the St. Lawrence seaway will affect the United States, but it never concerns itself one bit with how it will affect the maritime provinces. The history of the past 20 years in the maritime provinces is one of complete disregard by the federal government of our economic problems. It is true that for many of those years we have had in the maritime provinces complacent, dormant and weak provincial Liberal governments. I remember well the Liberal convention of 1948 when Hon. John McNair requested the federal Liberal government of that time to do something for the maritimes. But that was all that was ever done by the Liberal governments in the maritimes in the way of acquainting the federal government with the problems that existed down there.

I should like to say a word about the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Donald Gordon has indicated in effect that he is out to wreck the unions of the C.N.R., and he is doing just exactly that. The Liberal government is standing idly by and permitting him to do it. It is also permitting Donald Gordon to make the C.N.R. unsafe. I recently investigated one case where an engineer and fireman were killed in an accident and I can assure you that the whole tragic accident was wrapped up in negligence and skulduggery and covering up on the part of the C.N.R.

Donald Gordon is wrecking the unions of the C.N.R. in another way. Maintenance and repair work in the shops is being given out to contractors, which means that employees who for long years have fought through their unions for whatever rights they now possess automatically lose all those rights the minute they are laid off and are rehired by the contractors to do maintenance work on the tracks or repair work in the shops.

According to information we have received from the union, as of May 1 next year all repair work in the shops will be done by contract. That cuts out the unions entirely, and it does not give the men a chance. After having worked so hard to acquire these rights the employees of the C.N.R. should not have them taken away overnight. It is true that many of them will be hired by the contractors but it will be done without any question of the union, their rates of pay may even be reduced, there will be no overtime, and they will not have the benefits which they have obtained through years of negotiation with the C.N.R.

Recent events have served to prove how farseeing was the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) when years ago he foretold and stated publicly what the government should do for the employees of the C.N.R. in order that their rights might be recognized and their unions safeguarded. There is no question about it that today the C.N.R. is in the position where its employees are forced to take drastic action precisely because the federal government did not wish to recognize their rights. I see that my time is about up.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Van Horne: I certainly feel that these remarks will not be brushed aside. I feel that I should make my debut by at least stating that I believe that after making this speech and after saying what we need in our part of the country, you will at least take the time to go down and see for yourselves that what I have said is true. If you do that and if you do something about these problems you will have the public support required.

I should like the Minister of Transport to come down to my riding once more because he was prejudiced when he was there the last time. Here is what happened. Every election time they get plans ready for a new station at Edmundston, but as soon as the election is over the plans go into the basket and then at the next election they start all over again. This has been going on now for 20 years, and frankly we do not like it.

In closing I want to say that I come up here to try to do a job. What we are after are results. You fellows can have all the credit as long as you give us results. Just come across with something for us. Build the Cross Point bridge, build the station at Edmundston; do these things, and we will tell you that you are a good group of fellows.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, like those who have preceded me in this debate I too at the outset should like to extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I want also to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his cabinet upon their wise decision in selecting the experienced and most able member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The choice was most appropriate as the speech advocated the introduction of a bill to provide that women shall receive pay equal to that paid to men for equal work in industries which are under federal jurisdiction. It was most logical that the hon. member, representing as she does the electors of a great constituency, speaking as one entitled to speak in the name of all the women of Canada, should be the first one to congratulate the government for another move in the right direction and for the adoption of a policy which will protect and widen the freedom of thought, speech and action for which all citizens of our great country are so grateful.

(Translation):

The seconder of the address (Mr. Laflamme) has clearly shown that the electors of the beautiful agricultural constituency of Bellechasse were well advised in sending him here as their worthy representative in the government of the country. The electors of that constituency may without fear increase the confidence they have placed in him at the by-election of last fall; his electors, the majority of whom practise the noble profession of farming, may rest assured that their interests are in good hands.

(Text):

It seems rather difficult to explain why the leader of the official opposition should classify the speech from the throne as uninformative and containing less information than any previous speeches from the throne. Anyone who reads the speech carefully—and this should include the hon. member who has just preceded me—will surely find more than the revision of two acts and the amendment of ten others.

Was the hon. member who has just spoken forecasting the policy now being formulated at his party's convention, which is being held at the present time in Ottawa? May I repeat in English in a very few words what he has said in French, for the immediate benefit of the few members of his party now sitting in this house? He asked the government of the country to double family allowances and to increase the old age pension to $60 per month without any means test. Is this a forecast of what is to be decided by the convention being held at the Chateau Laurier? I am sure the position of his party was quite different when the law was passed a few years ago introducing the family allowance in this country.

Anyone who reads the speech from the throne carefully will surely find much more than has been presented to us for our consideration by the short amendment of the Leader of the Opposition. This government, which we on this side of the house are prepared and proud to support, has been a government which deals in action, a government ready to meet criticism and accept suggestions, a government whose past history will show that vigorous and searching inquiry has infallibly proven its trustworthy integrity and zealous devotion to the welfare, prosperity and freedom of a great nation.

How can a well-thinking representative of the Canadian people justify an accusation of indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national problems, against the present government of this country? Was it not a Liberal administration under the great leadership of Wiliam Lyon Mackenzie King that so wisely and so successfully administered the affairs of this country during the second world war? And today is not our country under the able leadership of our present Prime Minister, of whom all Canadians are so proud and from whom the free nations of the world are so earnestly seeking co-operation and advice?

Is Canada today not taking a leading role in the international field? Were we not ably and successfully represented when we had our Prime Minister touring the world on a mission of peace and good will? Are we indifferent when we have men like our present minister of external affairs, our ministers of national health and welfare, of trade and commerce and of labour, or others, leading our Canadian delegations at Geneva and at NATO meetings, or in our determination to ensure a lasting peace for the free nations of the world? Are we so indifferent and can we be rightfully accused of inertia when our country's economy, under the present administration, is constantly increasing and, within an over-all climate of political and economic freedom, reaching records never dreamed of by our present generation? Are we inactive, and is our Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act inefficient, when our construction of new homes reaches the fabulous figure of 130,000 units in a single year and when our construction program exceeds $5 billion in the same year?

The Leader of the Opposition was right for once when he said:

> I do not for a moment suggest that I expect the Liberal members of this house to vote for the short amendment that I shall present.

It is true to say that we have to face serious national problems, but I want to express my complete disagreement with the mover of the amendment when he says that the advisers of Her Majesty lack leadership in facing such problems.

A growing and progressive country like Canada is bound to be faced from time to time with problems of a serious and national nature. In fact some of these problems are mentioned in the speech from the throne and these, I might add, are not included in the revision of the two acts and the amendments to ten others which have caught the attention of the opposition. Canada is today playing a prominent role and contributing a substantial portion of its resources to the maintenance of armaments and the assurance of peace in the world.

In facing our national problems, it has been the aim of our government to maintain a Canadian unity; unity among our population from coast to coast, as well as unity in our economy. We from the maritime provinces, who for so long have been referred to as originating from what have been called "have-not" provinces, have always consented to any major policy which could contribute to the benefit and welfare of our great nation. We realize that to achieve and to maintain this economic unity and stability, the farmer in the prairie provinces as well as the labourer in Ontario and Quebec must be provided with earning facilities which are inherent in a healthy and sound national economy.

We realize that we have to face with broadminded views the problems confronting the wheat farmers in the west and the difficulties arising from the diversified industries of the central provinces. We disregard any parochial or sectional attitude which could paralyse or even delay the march of progress and development of this great nation, a democratic country where peace and freedom may reign forever. We support assistance to the wheat farmer, the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway, and the participation of our government in the financing of the trans-Canada pipe line. We accept, although with some reluctance at times, the centralization of those numerous industries necessary to maintain our vast production program for defence purposes.

However, allow me to say that we from the maritimes—and this would apply more so to us from New Brunswick, and particularly to my constituency of Gloucester—have about reached what we could call a saturation point. The days have gone by when we wish to be called beggars or "have-not" provinces. We have at our front door the vast resources and the richness of the Atlantic ocean. We have in New Brunswick over 15 million acres of productive forests, further implemented by soil and climatic conditions excellent for natural reproduction. This can be a most valuable asset to a large percentage of our population provided, however, that our lumbermen are assured a fair deal and that lumber dealers are prepared to pay a reasonable and profitable price to those participating in this industry.

The recent discoveries of lead, zinc, copper and silver ore, chiefly in the northern and northeastern parts of the province, are most important to our economic future. In my own constituency of Gloucester, the town of Bathurst, the centre of this great development, whose population has increased by 48 per cent in the last 15 years, could easily be called upon to double its present population within the next three to five years. In fact it is in most urgent need of a public building to house the personnel of various government departments, and its citizens have warmly welcomed the recent announcement of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) respecting the construction of a new structure at the earliest possible date. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Public Works will include in this year's estimates a sufficient appropriation to proceed without delay with the construction of this most urgently needed public building. At a later opportunity this session I intend to stress the urgency of proper improvements to shipping facilities for the port of Bathurst.

I have just said that we have in the maritime provinces vast natural resources of the sea and the soil which could assure our population their rightful participation in the general economy of the country. This participation in the welfare of the entire nation has been assured us by confederation. Unfortunately our geographical position, our limited population and our competitive transportation problems have had the ill effect of weakening the links of this union of provinces created by the Canadian confederation.

I do not want at this particular time to elaborate on the need of future developments in our fishing industry. I expect also to have the opportunity to discuss this vital question at a future date during this session. However, I must say that we are amazed to learn from reports originating from scientists of the fisheries research board that we have in our gulf of St. Lawrence waters one of the largest potential herring fisheries in the world, and to see that our Atlantic coast fishermen are still using the outmoded and obsolete methods of their forefathers to catch this particular type of fish. If we are to reap the harvest of the sea and maintain a flourishing industry, the federal Department of Fisheries must activate its research program without delay and at the same time make it more practical and accessible to the average fisherman.

We all realize that all power resources as well as raw materials that can be taken from the soil are the property of the provinces. Our Prime Minister said, when addressing the federal-provincial conference last fall, and repeated in the house as found at page 49 of Hansard of January 12:

> . . . we felt that parliament should not provide for sharing in the cost of provincial projects except in special circumstances and as part of a policy which we could justify on national grounds.

The discovery of large deposits of lead, zinc, copper and silver in the Bathurst-Newcastle area of New Brunswick, which has occurred in the last few years, can be considered as one of the most important events in the economic life of our province since confederation. Preliminary surveys have indicated that mining costs will be relatively low, and the deposits being within easy reach of water, shipping facilities are well situated from the standpoint of world markets. We know, however, and I must repeat, that the key to the future development of these mines is the provision of large supplies of relatively cheap electric power. When such an opportunity is offered to a section of the country which has been seriously and adversely affected by faith in the union of confederation, we of the maritime provinces must insist on the restoration of these differentials which could rectify the ill effects of the union.

The capital investment required to provide our potential industries with relatively cheap power is tremendous and, furthermore, we are deprived by nature of the numerous flows of water from the far north which are generating power so abundantly for industries of the central provinces. A project known as Beechwood is now under way on the Saint John river which will provide—I would have liked the hon. member who has just spoken to hear this—barely enough power to supply the normal requirements of an increasing growth in the demand for domestic consumption and small industries. The undertaking of an over-all program which would include the entire Saint John river system would involve the province of Quebec and the state of Maine.

The development of the hydroelectric power potential of an international river valley system, like the Saint John river in New Brunswick, presents problems of great complexity and beyond the financial capacity of a small province like New Brunswick. It is our belief that the development of such projects should be undertaken under the joint auspices of the provincial governments concerned and the federal government. Otherwise a province may have to alienate a portion of its resources to the United States in order to obtain the necessary funds for hydroelectric power development. In such a case I cannot help but remind the house that there exists a policy of the federal government which affects in many ways, both directly and indirectly, the conservation and utilization of Canada's natural resources.

If we are to participate in the strengthening of the Canadian economy as a whole, if we are to benefit from this economic growth and are not to be regarded as a burden or a weak link in the Canadian confederation, we must insist that the federal government establish a policy to assist our province or other provinces in essential natural resource development. Is New Brunswick to become an exporter of its newly found raw materials for the benefit of other countries, or are we in a position to assure the citizens of Canada that the possible new industries to be derived from these discoveries are not to settle beyond the borders of the province or the dominion?

Yes, if we want this assurance it is the duty of our governments to provide these mining companies with relatively cheap power, thus giving for the future that balanced economy so earnestly desired by our entire population.

On motion of Mr. Robichaud the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 17, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHINA—RECOGNITION OF PEKING AS DE FACTO GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Can the minister say whether or not the government has given further consideration to recognizing the Peking government as the de facto government of China?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government is giving, and will continue to give, careful consideration to this important question, as it does to all important diplomatic developments.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED SHIPMENT OF AIRCRAFT TO EGYPT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Recently there have been two questions asked by hon. members opposite which dealt with the export of military equipment from Canada. The questions concerned at least three departments of the Canadian government, but possibly I may try to answer them now.

Last Wednesday the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) asked the following question:

> Have any aircraft been shipped from Canada to Egypt recently, or are there any orders on hand for the export of such aircraft?

If by "recently" the hon. member meant, as I assume he meant, during the last few months when there have been disturbing developments in the Middle East, there have been no such orders received for the export of aircraft to Egypt. However, early last summer it was agreed after consideration to issue a permit, in consequence of an order received, for the export from Canada to Egypt of 15 reconditioned Harvard training aircraft of world war II vintage. These are, of course, not combat aircraft. My information is that up to the present only a small part of this order—three aircraft, I believe—has been shipped.

I might add a word on the general policy regarding the export of arms from this country. Such export is controlled under the Export and Import Permits Act, 1954. Applications for permission to export military equipment are considered by the departments of external affairs, trade and commerce and national defence in consultation, before permission is granted or refused.

In considering such applications we recognize, as does the United Nations charter, that all countries have the right of legitimate self-defence. To exercise this right means in practice, of course, that they are entitled to maintain military establishments for that purpose and to make or buy weapons to equip them. While our sales of military equipment are necessarily on a very modest scale, we are prepared, as are other countries, to export weapons, but only subject to certain considerations which I might outline briefly.

As a general rule the government's policy re export of military equipment varies with the circumstances and with the destination of the shipments. Thus, arms are exported fairly freely to NATO and to commonwealth countries. None may be sold to countries of the Soviet bloc. Shipments to areas of unrest or possible local conflict are either refused or limited and, in the latter case, allowed only after the closest scrutiny to ensure that such sales do not exceed the legitimate defensive needs of such countries or constitute themselves a threat to neighbouring countries.

By and large, the government follows in this matter policies similar to those of the United Kingdom and the United States in respect of most areas and in all appropriate cases we consult with those governments in respect of requests received for military equipment.

REPORTED EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question addressed yesterday by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) to my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) concerning the ship Star of Assuan, I am informed that the Star of Assuan, which sailed from Halifax during the week end, carried the following mutual aid material and equipment for Turkey, Greece and Portugal:

36 world war II artillery tractors and spares for Turkey. These tractors are four-wheel drive trucks and do not carry guns.

32 4·7 naval guns with spares and ancillaries for Turkey.

Spares for electronic equipment and for aircraft for Turkey, Greece and Portugal.

These mutual aid items, which were made available by the Canadian government, were allocated by the standing group of NATO and were shipped on a bill of lading arranged in the usual way by the Canadian maritime commission on the Star of Assuan.

The whole matter constituted an entirely normal NATO arrangement for the provision by Canada of mutual aid to our allies Greece, Turkey and Portugal.

The ship also carried the three Harvard aircraft for Egypt to which I referred earlier.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I wonder if the minister could find out and tell us for our information if these non-combat planes were fitted with gun mountings and in any event how far have they been stripped down.

Mr. Pearson: I shall try to secure that information but I do not know how you could put a gun mounting on a Harvard training aircraft.

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE VISIT OF MINISTER TO ISRAEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the seriousness of the situation in the Middle East, can the minister give a statement to the house and the country on this situation, and would he also indicate his attitude to a request which has become somewhat general that in view of his visit last fall to Egypt and in order to equalize Canada's position in the Middle East he give consideration also to visiting Israel?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall be glad to deal with both these matters when an opportunity arises for a debate on external affairs.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

USE OF HELICOPTERS IN AIR-SEA RESCUE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) inquired with respect to the provision of helicopter service for search and rescue work on the west coast.

[Mr. Pearson.]

In reply, I may say I find that for some time past one helicopter has normally been attached to the Royal Canadian Air Force search and rescue unit at Sea island near Vancouver. It is there now and is expected to remain there continuously to carry out search and rescue duties as and when required.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): May I ask a supplementary question? How many helicopters has the Royal Canadian Navy at the present time?

Mr. Campney: I cannot answer offhand how many helicopters the Royal Canadian Navy has at the moment; I will find out for my hon. friend.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the minister's statement yesterday that the government pays some attention to reports of parliamentary committees, will he recommend the appointment of a special committee to consider recommending an increase in the amount of the old age pension in accordance with the increase in the gross national product since 1949 when the present figure of $40 a month was set?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend, who is a very good parliamentarian, knows as well as I do that before a minister can indicate to the house his intentions they must be communicated first of all to his colleagues in the government. I would be expected, of course, to observe that practice.

But seriously I may tell my hon. friend that I believe that at the beginning of the session I should say to him in a friendly way, in view of his interest in these questions, that he ought to appreciate the position that the administration finds itself in in these matters. Yesterday I indicated that we are having a conference with the provinces on January 23 to discuss the question of health insurance, a question of great interest to this country and one involving the expenditure of considerable sums of money.

I believe my hon. friend ought to place himself in the position in which the government, in these matters, seeks to place itself. I should like, finally, to say that I regard the old age security program—while the $40 may not be as much as all of us would like to see—on balance, as representing the most generous old age security system of any country in the world. A further consideration is that it is the only old age security system in the world that at the age of 70 provides a non-means-test arrangement. When my hon. friend seeks to prod me, and I do not mind it because I know he does it in a kindly way, I think in fairness he ought to temper his attitude and be a little more responsible in the interrogations he puts day after day.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Is he aware of the fact that since the present figure of $40 was set the gross national product has gone up by over 60 per cent?

Mr. Martin: Yes, I am aware of the fact. I am aware as well that under this system more than 700,000 Canadians are receiving old age security benefits, and the fact that the cost of living goes up and goes down does not alter the fact that—

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): When did it go down last?

Mr. Martin: It went down last year, for my hon. friend's information. I should like again to impress upon my hon. friend that we have an old age security system of which we need not be ashamed.

Mr. Knowles: That is not the view of those who are trying to live on it.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION OF NEW TAX PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he say whether another federal-provincial conference will be held to discuss the latest tax proposals, in the hope that a satisfactory arrangement can be arrived at?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There has been no decision made in that regard, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION ON MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have not given the minister notice of this question but I hope he will take this as such notice.

In view of the minister's failure yesterday to deal with the two-price system of wheat marketing, as requested by the pools and farm union organizations, can we assume that the government plans on introducing such legislation at this session of parliament?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government has considered various proposals put forward by organizations in the prairies, among them the two-price system. We decided on other plans that achieved the same purpose. We considered the two-price system, but we decided instead to give help on storage of grain owned by the wheat board. It is not the intention to proceed further with the two-price system.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED ROBBERY AT OSHAWA OFFICE OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct this question to the Minister of Labour, but in his absence the Minister of Finance might possibly answer the question. Are there any further developments regarding the robbery yesterday at Oshawa involving unemployment funds?

The second question is this. Is it the standard practice to pay unemployment insurance funds in cash?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that I am not familiar with what occurred in Oshawa yesterday and I shall have to get an answer. Perhaps the Minister of Labour could make it on his return.

FISHERIES

JUAN DE FUCA STRAIT—STATEMENT AS TO CLOSURE OF SOCKEYE SALMON FISHING ON CANADIAN SIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) yesterday directed to me the following question:

> Does the government propose to enforce closure on the sockeye salmon fishing on the Canadian side of the strait of Juan de Fuca this year? If so, what steps are being taken to ensure that Canadian fishermen are assured of their fair share of the catch?

To the first part of the question the answer is that sockeye salmon fishing in the strait of Juan de Fuca is regulated by the international sockeye salmon commission. The government is only called upon to enforce the regulations adopted in accordance with the authority invested in the commission under the sockeye salmon convention between Canada and the United States.

The commission is composed of three representatives from each country, and no regulation can be adopted unless it is voted affirmatively by at least two commissioners from each country.

No regulation of a nature referred to by the hon. member has been adopted by the commission.

To the second part of the question the answer is that the same convention provides for an equal division in so far as possible of the catch between the fishermen of Canada and the United States. In the past this provision of the convention has been given due effect by the commission in adopting any regulations, and there is no reason to think that the commission would propose to adopt any regulation in the future which would have a different effect.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, might I ask a supplementary question? Could the parliamentary assistant inform me as to the date of the next sitting of the commission?

Mr. MacNaught: Saturday of this week.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, before the house adjourned last evening, I advocated that it was the duty of the government to provide our mining companies with relatively cheap power, which is the key to a balanced economy for the future, so earnestly desired by our entire Canadian population. Should it be found that a full-scale development of the Saint John river is not the logical answer to our power problem in New Brunswick, we have other alternatives to offer. Hydroelectric alone may not be sufficient to supply New Brunswick's industries with their power requirements. Construction of high pressure steam electric plants using large turbine generators will have to compensate for our limited sources of water supply available for generating power. We have in New Brunswick, and more so in Nova Scotia, huge coal deposits which could be used advantageously for generating power provided its production cost could be reduced and assurance of low cost money could be provided during the initial stage of development.

I do not advocate a give-away policy by any government whether federal or provincial, but this may be a case where the federal government would be well advised to subsidize as a maritime project the water transportation of coal from the Cape Breton coal mines to a large generating plant located somewhere along the northeastern shore of New Brunswick. After all, is not the federal government actually subsidizing the transportation of coal to a maximum of $2.50 per ton for straight all-rail movement to points in central Canada, and this for the benefit of local industries there? I feel quite confident that if the government were prepared to subsidize the transportation of coal to a large generating plant located in the mining area of northern New Brunswick to an amount equal to $2.50 per ton the cost of generating power could be reduced to a level acceptable to our mining industries.

Canadian National Railways now have under construction a new line which will cost over $35 million to serve the mining district of Chibougamau. Would it not be logical to ask the federal government to do as much to assure the development of New Brunswick mining resources by helping to finance power generating plants? I must also not disregard the major role which will be played by atomic energy in the future of our economic growth and expansion. We should have soon, even now, the assurance from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that the first practical atomic reactor to be used to produce electric energy for commercial purposes in Canada will be built in New Brunswick. This assurance would be a stimulant to our mining companies which are now investing millions of dollars and would give hope of retaining in New Brunswick the milling, refining and complete utilization of sulphur and other associated chemical industries which would necessarily follow.

The sharing or participation of the federal government in the cost of financing an adequate source of power for New Brunswick's mining industries should be regarded as a special circumstance and as part of a policy which can be justified on national grounds. Such a decision will strengthen our entire economy and provide the balanced rate of economic growth within Canada which is essential to assure unity in our population and unity in our economy.

I realize that the hon. member who preceded me last night is far from being satisfied with the policy adopted by the present government in order to help the New Brunswick potato farmers—

Mr. Van Horne: That is right.

Mr. Robichaud: —in disposing of their crop.

Mr. Van Horne: That is very true, sir.

Mr. Robichaud: It may be true that the price offered is lower by far than the $5 per barrel promised to the farmers of his constituency by the hon. member during his election campaign last fall.

Mr. Van Horne: That is wrong, sir. You are a liar.* That is not correct.

Mr. Robichaud: It is correct. Every farm had a poster out in front of it with the candidate's name on it and promising $5 per barrel for potatoes. The hon. member is asking the federal government to build the Cross Point-Campbellton bridge. The hon. member should be made aware that last March the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) made an announcement in the house to the effect that the federal government would pay its share of the construction of this interprovincial bridge.

The hon. member should address his request to the government of the province of Quebec and to the premier of New Brunswick and ask them if they are prepared to come across with their share of the project as they promised so often before the federal Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) made the announcement that the federal government was prepared to pay its share.

Mr. Ferguson: It does not hurt to lose his seat. Of all the cry-babies I have ever heard, the hon. member is the worst.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: The hon. member will have his opportunity to make his speech.

Mr. Ferguson: I have it now.

Mr. Robichaud: When the hon. member accused our able Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) of inactivity and indifference in the manner in which he lately has been conducting the affairs of his department, was he really sincere and was he aware of the fact that under his leadership and guidance his department is spending over one billion dollars a year of the Canadian taxpayers' money for the welfare of the Canadian people? Is he aware of the fact that in order to double family allowances, the Canadian taxpayers would have to pay an extra $380 million a year and that in order to increase the old age pension by $20 a month another $180 million would have to be appropriated? He should tell us if his leader and the other members of his party are prepared to advocate this additional expenditure of $560 million to be added to the burden of the already heavily taxed Canadian taxpayer.

The hon. member mentioned additional help for mental hospitals. Is he aware of the fact that the federal government has contributed over $1 million to build a new mental hospital in his own town of Campbellton? I would say that our present Minister of National Health and Welfare is well aware of the needs of the citizens of Canada. A matter of great importance, as the minister just stated a few moments ago, namely the establishment of a health insurance policy, is now under serious study. I am confident that the Canadian public would prefer to see the implementation of this welfare legislation rather than the doubling of family allowances.

Mr. Brooks: Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare write your speech?

Mr. Robichaud: Was the hon. member expressing the policy of his party when he said in French last night—and he was careful to say it in French so that even the members of his own party could not follow him too closely—as follows, as reported at page 176 of Hansard:

(Translation):

When will the government recognize that, before giving over a billion dollars to England, it should give something to Canadian citizens?

(Text):

Such nonsensical, exaggerated and wild statements may pass unnoticed in an election campaign but not before this House of Commons.

Mr. Van Horne: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Robichaud: You had your chance last night.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member who has the floor please address himself to the chair? At this juncture I understand that the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne) is rising on a question of privelege. Will he be kind enough to state his question of privelege?

Mr. Van Horne: Is this the hon. member who is known in New Brunswick as the fellow who is always asleep in the house?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Robichaud: Last night the hon. member asked for regulations promoting and enforcing the development, the manufacture, the processing and the use of the idle and wasting natural resources of the maritimes such as timber limits now owned and controlled by a few, immobilized by them and going to waste. He asked for regulations controlling the exportation of raw products such as pulpwood in an unprocessed and unmanufactured state.

See also* pages 225-26.

I would remind the hon. member that crown lands are strictly under provincial jurisdiction, and that he should direct his request again to the government of New Brunswick, with whom he is so closely related.

(Translation):

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the house an unfortunate situation which affects a large number of electors in my constituency and more particularly the 6,000 residents of Shippigan and Miscou islands. As I stated before the house last year, those residents are served by a ferry during the shipping season but, in the wintertime, their only means of communication is an ice bridge.

I understand that the construction of a bridge between Shippigan island and the mainland is primarily a provincial responsibility. The provincial authorities might have already undertaken the erection of that bridge had not the cost of the work been greatly increased due to the fact that a navigation channel must be left free to enable the fishing boats of the district to go to their fishing grounds. However since the maintenance of navigable waters comes under federal jurisdiction, I think that the Department of Transport or the Department of Public Works would be justified in sharing in the construction of that bridge.

Those of us who live in the district are aware of the difficulties and hardships of those islanders, especially during the period preceding the formation of the ice bridge between the island and the mainland. On December 9 last, the ferry boat was seriously damaged and it was only a month later that service could be half restored.

I must say that hundreds of residents of Shippigan island volunteered their services and worked long hours without pay to cut the ice and open a channel that would enable the ferry to resume operations. All this time, the islanders were without coal or fuel oil and, in many cases, lacked essential supplies. There was, too, the sad spectacle of sick people being transported in men-drawn sleds across treacherous ice for emergency hospital treatment on the mainland.

During the holiday season, there was a delay of five or six days before mail could be delivered to the various post offices on those two islands. Their residents rely essentially, for their livelihood, on the fishing industry and on field moss. Huge quantities of fish and moss ready for shipment could not be shipped owing to the lack of transportation; the economy of that area was therefore seriously affected.

I am not in a position to confirm whether the New Brunswick provincial authorities called on the federal government to invite them to share in the construction of a bridge between Shippigan island and the mainland. Under normal conditions, this construction would be essentially a provincial matter but, as I mentioned earlier, since the cost of that construction is substantially increased on account of navigation, I believe that the federal government should take part in that project.

May I express here my appreciation to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) for the co-operation given us by his department for the improvement of facilities in the fishing centres of Gloucester county. However, I regret that, so far, we have been unable to get a favourable decision for some improvements to the docks of Maisonnette and for the construction of a wharf at Petite-Rivière-de-l'Île. I realize that these two fishing centres have difficulties which are embarrassing enough and hard to solve for the departmental engineers but I still think that the Department of Public Works should be in a position to meet these problems and to give its early approval to these two projects. The residents of those two centres are fishermen first and foremost and have no other means of providing a living for their families. It is not reasonable to expect them to continue operating in such conditions? Those good fishermen deserve more favourable consideration on the part of the federal authorities.

I would not like to resume my seat without asking the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) to give favourable consideration to a revision of the new Unemployment Insurance Act with a view to extending its benefits to this large number of seasonal workers at present excluded from its provisions. I also support the request made by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) and express the wish that these fishermen may be allowed to come in under this legislation as soon as possible.

(Text):

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I cannot hope to emulate the enthusiasm of both hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick.

One thing I did notice—and I would congratulate them upon it—is that they are so perfectly bilingual it must be convenient at times to call each other names in either language.

As most hon. members know, I come from a city constituency. The members of my group who have spoken up to the moment have come from rural constituencies, and they are concerned with the question of wheat and its marketing. Since I come from a city which is in the centre of the wheat country, a city whose reason for existence is service to the farmers who live in that wheat country, and whose livelihood depends on the prosperity of the farmers in that country, I shall make no apology for trying to reflect some of the opinions that are being expressed in and around my city. Even our industries are geared to farming, because there we have great storage elevators. The dominion government has a storage elevator there. We have flour mills, packing plants, a vegetable oil extracting factory, and so on. Therefore, we are dependent upon agriculture, which is all around us. This is acknowledged, of course, by other people, even by labour, who have passed resolutions in regard to the question of farm advances upon stored grain. They, if their resolutions are any indication, are almost as anxious about the question as the farmers themselves.

I hold in my hand a copy of a report which says that Mr. F. W. McClelland, president of the Saskatoon and district labour council, issued a statement deploring the tie-up of grain. He said that it was giving his organization serious worry. This, he says, is a very serious situation, as lack of money in the farmers' pockets means not only hardship for the farmers, but also reduces business for businessmen and industry, and results at times in labour lay-offs. This is the meat of the resolution that was passed. It asks that the government guarantee cash advances to farmers on grain stored upon the farms; so much for the opinion of labour.

One might have thought that perhaps the pronouncements of the government and the pronouncement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and the fact that certain legislation was on the order paper by way of the speech from the throne, might have stilled, as it were, the controversy that is taking place. But I hold in my hand the issue of the Star-Phoenix of January 11, which was printed after the contents of the speech from the throne were known. It contains a picture of an assembly of people and says that more than 500 persons crowded into convocation hall of the university Tuesday afternoon to hear a panel discuss Canada's grain marketing difficulties. This grain marketing problem, of course, is a long-term one.

Apart from the need of getting money immediately into the hands of farmers, the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday morning dealt with some of the western demands—I think I should say the C.C.F. demands also because what we have advocated has been much in line with what the farmers themselves are advocating in the west. To remind you of them, sir, I wish to read a few of them. Immediate advance payments are recommended; use of barter trade where that is practical, and would not interfere with labour in this country. The acceptance of sterling and other soft currency programs for assistance to underprivileged nations should be stepped up and increased, and we should have a more efficient staff of salesmen for Canadian wheat throughout the world.

The minister dealt with some or perhaps all of those points yesterday. I was going to comment that he had not mentioned, for I had noticed it too, the matter of a proposed differential between the domestic and the export price. But my hon. friend the member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson) raised the point this morning, and the minister has made his comments on that, so I will not need to deal with it.

While I am not a technical expert, we are fortunate in this group in having one or two young men who are themselves graduates in agriculture who are themselves farmers, and who are particularly interested in the question now before the house and the country, men who have made a close study of figures and statistics. That is not in my line, so I shall refrain from trying to do it.

I would like to comment on the general attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). He said that he was at a meeting or two in the west and I think he mentioned Edmonton, perhaps, in particular. He did mention the meeting of wheat pool delegates in convention at the city of Regina. He spoke there on one day and he said he had heard the delegates there did favour the resolution on advance payments. I think he played this down, a resolution which favoured advances on farm-stored grain; a resolution which, may I say, is endorsed practically unanimously in the west. I am talking now about farmers irrespective of their political opinions on other matters.

As to this playing down, and as to the assertion by the minister that there is a lack of unanimity and that sort of thing, what are the facts? Well, as for the playing down of the wheat pool resolution, one cannot do that very well. It has been attempted before. Now I am not mentioning this politically at all but it did happen. It was Mr. McDonald, who leads the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, who asserted that the result of the wheat pool convention was that the delegates were quite in agreement with what the government was doing. The wheat pool hastened, through some of its officers, I know not who, to deny that particular assertion, and so it was obvious that Mr. McDonald had been either misinformed or misquoted. The statement put out by the wheat pool says:

> Over the years, the policy of the wheat pool organization is laid down by the delegates in annual meeting. When the pool delegates convened for the 31st annual meeting on November 1, the regular order of business was suspended—

They must have thought it pretty important.

> —in order to undertake a special discussion on the emergency situation in farm finance.

Then there followed a complete discussion of the whole situation and the delegates passed a resolution as follows:

> That we urge the government of Canada to make immediate provision for advances to farmers on farm-stored grain.

They did pass other resolutions. I do not think I need to give them to the house. I have no intention of cutting that one out from the other resolutions, and if anyone wishes I shall be pleased to read them. I skip a bit and go on:

> The policy of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, as approved by its delegates in annual meeting, is clear-cut.

Then, I have underlined this.

> It does not favour the government's proposal for bank loans.

Well, so far as playing down the decision of the wheat pool delegates is concerned, I think I have given the answer. As well as those meetings attended by the minister and by other members, I am sure by Liberal members of this house, there were other meetings. As a matter of fact there were hundreds of meetings. I can mention the meeting at Regina where my genial friend the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang) was debating with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), and may I say that my sympathy in that case was with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, irrespective of what the subject was.

However, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce wants any information as to the real feeling at that particular meeting, he can certainly get it in detail from the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who, I am sure, would admit the almost unanimous support for cash advances there. Then there was the farm conference at Saskatoon, and I have the minutes of the meeting before me, but I will not weary you with them. I see across from me the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). You may be sure if the Minister of Trade and Commerce wants a correct analysis of the opinion of that meeting, he could get it from the hon. member for Rosthern. The meeting at Saskatoon, was billed as a farm conference but it was not exactly that, because it was made up of representatives for various organizations, representatives of the grain trade for example. Some of the ministers of agriculture, I think from Manitoba and Saskatchewan, were there. I do not think the minister of agriculture for Alberta was there. The co-operatives were represented, school trustees and labour and so on. Numerous resolutions were passed.

Let me read you one that stands out. I am quoting, Mr. Speaker, from the Co-operative Consumer of October 7. This resolution was, I think, the main resolution at the conference:

> . . . the conference urged the federal government to make immediate provision for advances to farmers on grain they had in store up to the value of one-half the normal delivery expected.

Then it makes some provisions as to how these advances should be paid and so forth. Skipping a little bit, further down it says:

> It was also stressed that this was an advance and not a loan.

Well, that was the farm conference at Saskatoon. I do not think there is any doubt about what those people thought about what the government should do. I did not intend to mention what follows but I happened to see it, in the same paper. I might say the co-operatives in our province are playing a more and more potent and meaningful role in public life. I have here a copy of a night letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) from George Urwin, president of the Federated Co-operatives Limited, in which he says:

> Respectfully suggest prompt action on request from conference of representatives from all sections of our economy concluded in Saskatoon yesterday. Lack of purchasing power through inability to market grain causing severe hardship which can only be remedied by immediate action by your government in respect to the requests of the conference.

There is not much hesitancy or doubt there about what those people at Saskatoon asked for and really wanted despite the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce plays down those requests, and says they were not unanimous. He says there was a difference of opinion among those farmers as to what they actually wanted. Now an immediate result of that conference at Saskatoon was that a delegation from that conference was sent here to Ottawa. There, I think, was one place where the minister got his idea there was a lack of unanimity. I have already explained that conference consisted not of farmers alone but a wide representation of other interests in addition.

Now in a case like that the only kind of resolution you can get passed is a resolution which will compel unanimity. When this delegation came to Ottawa and presented its resolutions, there was a storm of anger among the farmers in the west. Some of them said the delegation had scuttled the Saskatchewan conference and it was a milk and water affair that was presented to the government. As far as the farmers of that conference were concerned, they were very irascible indeed about the alleged neglect of that particular delegation to press home the point which the farmers wanted to make. I think that explains to some extent why that delegation was not as forceful as it might have been.

Yesterday the minister linked up the C.C.F. with these particular resolutions, but I may say that it is not particularly a C.C.F. business. Liberal farmers are just as concerned as other people. It is interesting to note that the Liberal association of Saskatoon made quite a point of the interest being too high. One gentleman attending that meeting was quite indignant and said that the 5½ per cent rate was exorbitant when the Canadian wheat board could borrow money at 3½ per cent. At that time they did not know whether the rate would be 5 or 5½ per cent. Those are not my words, they are the words of a member of the local Liberal association. Another speaker was very critical of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) for not, and so on and so forth.

I do not know whether there was any significance in this, but that particular meeting of the association was called to appoint officers for the coming year and the president and secretary of the association both gave notice that they would not be available.

Mr. McDonald, the leader of the Liberal party in the province, had something to say about the interest rate, and I think he made the most amazing contribution of all in regard to that matter. I have here a report which appeared in a November issue of the Star-Phoenix referring to a statement made by Mr. McDonald. If Mr. McDonald ever becomes premier of the province I hope he does not take on the treasury portfolio. The report stated that Mr. McDonald had indicated that a majority of the loans would be repaid in six months and the interest rate thus would amount to only 2½ per cent rather than 5 per cent. Mr. McDonald would be most valuable to the small loan companies in this country in connection with their rather non-understandable interest rates.

I must find fault with the insinuation—the press took even more than that out of it—by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who must have been angry, as I do not think he really meant it, that somehow the C.C.F. by what it was advocating was opposing the wheat board system of marketing. The minister knows better than that. Everyone in the country who is interested knows better than that. That type of marketing is a fundamental part of our philosophy and there is no question about that.

I was at a number of meetings and they certainly endorsed the wheat board system of marketing. I never in all my life heard anyone take such a drilling as did Mr. Stanley Jones, president of the Winnipeg grain exchange, in the town of Swan River in northern Manitoba. I was there and I heard 300 angry and very earnest farmers, all of whom were in favour of advance payments on grain, do everything to that man except lay hands on him. He escaped, but that is about all. I would point out that a great number, a proportion at least of those farmers at that particular meeting, were C.C.F. people and they certainly were in support of the wheat board method of marketing. As I say, I never knew a man to get such a going-over.

I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) over there and perhaps I should modify my previous statement by mentioning that at the meeting at Minnedosa I understand he was drilled until the small hours of the morning by another group of farmers who apparently had about the same opinion as most of the farmers in western Canada.

Mr. Garson: I know my hon. friend is most anxious to be fair and I believe he will accept a correction in his remarks. A large number of good citizens of that district came out and asked questions, which it was perfectly proper for them to do. They argued things out with their member until the small hours of the morning. In this I think they showed an appreciation of the proper usages of democracy.

Mr. Knight: I am quite prepared to accept the minister's statement. Perhaps he did not feel things quite as badly as they were represented in the press. But I would point out that the farmers argued with the minister until that time. Would the minister not say that they were opposed to the actions of the government in this particular regard. I think the minister was quite fair in saying that this discussion was a perfectly proper one.

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend's question, I would say that he is quite right. If people were opposed to the government policy I think the proper thing for them to do was to come to a public meeting and make their views known. The proper thing for their member to do was to go there and explain the position of the government; and then come back and explain to his colleagues the position his constituents had taken. That is the way democracy works.

Mr. Knight: The minister and I are perfectly in agreement, but the point I am making is that the farmers who were at that meeting were opposed to present government policy in connection with this grain business. They were in favour of cash advances.

Mr. Garson: No, Mr. Speaker—my friend—

Mr. Knight: Unless you are taking time off, Mr. Speaker, I must object.

Mr. Speaker: I am not taking time off, but having asked a question the hon. member, I think, should definitely clear up this matter.

Mr. Garson: I am really rising on a question of privilege because my friend has imputed to me and to those who took part in that meeting a statement which is not completely correct. My hon. friend stated that those present at that meeting were opposed to the present policy which we have now been discussing in this chamber. As a matter of fact one of the important requests made at that meeting is being implemented by the present government policy now under discussion.

Mr. Knight: We are not discussing that at the moment. The opinion which the farmers had at that time was different from their opinion now after having seen the legislation on the order paper. I do not think the minister has any point at all. With reference to this insinuation that somehow or other the C.C.F. was advocating the scuttling of the wheat board, it is most interesting to note that this insinuation was made by such an important man as the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Therefore I think it should be denied and denied here and now. I do not think anyone will suggest that Mr. Douglas of the province of Saskatchewan does not represent the C.C.F. There are plenty of others, but he certainly does represent them. I should like to direct the attention of the house to a broadcast on provincial affairs which he made on September 28, 1955. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will take note of this statement made by Mr. Douglas:

> We in the west must continue to support the two basic principles for which the farmers have fought throughout the years. The first of these is the Canadian wheat board and an orderly system of marketing, and the second is the international wheat agreement designed to establish an equitable price for wheat as between exporting and importing countries. Any changes in policy which would undermine these two basic principles would set western agriculture back a quarter of a century and must be resisted.

Let the Minister of Trade and Commerce put that in his pipe and smoke it. As far as I am concerned I do not think I need emphasize this because the minister as much as anybody else in this house knows that there was misrepresentation in the statement made. One must not get angry about these things.

Speaking of anger, let me assure the minister that the anger of the farmers in the prairie provinces is genuine. As far as the loan proposal is concerned, it has been treated everywhere as a joke. My Liberal friends will bear me out on that if they are completely honest. The minister will remember similar legislation in 1951, a time when some of the farmers were unfortunate enough to have their grain under the snow. I have forgotten the name of the bill but, at any rate, there was $20 million available for loans, and the farmers of western Canada used between $600,000 and $650,000 only. Does that show that they appreciated the gesture of the government?

Who are these farmers? I have met many of them. I saw 400 or 500 farmers in connection with this particular matter about which I am speaking. For all the Minister of Trade and Commerce's attendance at meetings, I doubt that he gets into the farm kitchen and hears the farm wife discuss these matters. Perhaps he is too big a man to attend these meetings, but somebody should tell him what the people are saying. They are saying, "Why is the price of wheat cheaper to the Canadian producer than it is to any other producers in the world? If the United States is giving away wheat and ruining our market, at least it is wheat for which the United States farmer has already been paid through subsidization." Or he will ask, "What is wrong with subsidization anyway? Is not the gold mining industry subsidized? Are not the railways subsidized?" What is not subsidized nowadays? Is not industrial production subsidized, as my hon. friend from Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) will agree, by tariffs we have imposed against imported goods?

There is some support from a rather unexpected quarter. I have a dispatch here from Neepawa, Manitoba, which says:

> The chief commissioner of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada Thursday laid part of the blame for the present wheat surplus problem at the feet of the protected industry of the east . . .

D. G. McKenzie defended the western farmer who, he said, is being accused of asking the rest of the country to subsidize his products.

When one looks back over the last 80 years, Mr. McKenzie said, it is obvious that the manufacturers started government subsidies.

Many farmers say, "Why should I pay 5 per cent interest on my summer's wages that I have not yet received, for which I have worked all summer or maybe for two summers? I owe money to the man who supplies my gasoline, to the grocery store and other local people. These people are not charging me interest at the moment. They have my sympathy, but why should I go to the bank and increase my indebtedness by 5 per cent in respect to the amounts of funds the bank would advance to me?" It is a reasonable argument. It is so reasonable that they are not going to the banks to borrow much money, as my banker friends tell me.

That is most of the material I wish to bring forward with regard to the question of wheat. I may come back to it later.

There is another small but important matter with which I should like to deal, and that is the need for a change in the regulations regarding unemployment insurance. The amendment, of course, is not working out. The effect of it is that it is even more difficult for persons seasonally employed to draw the benefits than was the case before the amendment was passed.

This country suffers from the vagaries of climate. This year winter in Saskatoon came upon us in October. Some people could not qualify for the 30 weeks because they were laid off in the middle of October, and they could not get the supplementary benefit for their unemployment until 1st of January of 1956. I understand that, once having received it, they can then draw it for some months. These people had to face the Christmas holidays and the cold weather and the need to purchase fuel, without a job and without money. That matter has been taken up with the Minister of Labour. I wired to him myself and have had some response from him. He assured me that these regulations will be reviewed. Our climate is cold and uncertain. The people concerned are mostly civic workers, men in the employ of the city who have been working in the parks and in various outdoor jobs. Their plight is shared also by several types of construction labour.

There is another matter which is perhaps unimportant to the house but is a rather strange situation. A person mailing a letter in a certain section of our city for another section of our city has to pay five cents postage instead of four cents. That is due to the fact that the railway town of Sutherland, not far distant from Saskatoon, has been amalgamated, municipally speaking, with the city, but the postal arrangements were slow in being finalized. That is why that strange situation arose. I would say more about it, and would certainly make demands on the government in regard to it, but I am pleased to be able to inform the house and the people in my own constituency that that is no longer necessary. I understand instructions have gone out that the postal rates between the various parts of our city will now be equated as soon as the arrangements can be made.

In the time left at my disposal, there are one or two matters in general in regard to which I should like to express some disappointment with this government. I think I shall be excused for doing that. My hon. friend suggests that the time is rather limited to deal with the faults of this government. One would need a rather longer period than we are allowed. The government is losing face in this country. Even the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), whom we used to look upon as a sort of benevolent despot—did I say "despot"? I did not intend to.

An hon. Member: Right the first time.

Mr. Knight: —as a benevolent gentleman, is losing some of the appeal he had. Somebody told me the title he would give a book if he were writing the life story of the present Prime Minister. I see my friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) looking at me. May I say I think it is too bad that a tremendously picturesque character and a man of undoubted ability such as our Minister of Agriculture should have had written about him a biography that does not at all do justice in its writing to the subject with whom it is concerned.

Mr. Gardiner: You write one.

An hon. Member: Maybe he would do a better job.

Mr. Knight: May I say to the minister's suggestion that I should do a much better job if I had the time. With regard to the Prime Minister, this friend of mine suggested that, if he were writing a book about the present Prime Minister, the title should be, "The Man Who Always Says No". It was a westerner who suggested that title. To the suggestion for cash advances, the answer was no. To the suggestion for the Saskatchewan dam, the answer was no. To our repeated demands for national health insurance, the answer is a sort of quavering no, but still a no up to the present time. My own plea for federal aid to education? No. The demand for an arts council? No.

Mr. Garson: An increase in taxation? No.

Mr. Knight: Plans for increased economic aid to underprivileged countries?

Mr. McIvor: Yes.

Mr. Knight: No. Sometimes I do not blame the Prime Minister as much as I blame some of the people behind him, and if I have time I should like to tell you a story in that regard. I cannot review the world situation in this speech, but I was thinking that our diplomatic efforts have not been too successful. I was thinking that if virtue were measured in terms of miles travelled then the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) would be a great man. But it is not, and I am led to the conclusion that in certain directions—I am not quite sure that it is not in every direction—we are losing this thing that we call the cold war. I am not too sure about it.

Mr. Studer: Or anything else.

Mr. Knight: I think we have missed our trump card, economic aid.

Mr. Ferguson: I think you are using the discards.

Mr. Studer: You are playing with the discards.

Mr. Knight: The total amount of economic aid that this nation has given has been niggardly. It is not only that we do not support and aid this sort of thing but we have actually opposed it. Back in 1954 we refused to join a scheme for economic development under the auspices of the United Nations. We did not support that plea for economic assistance. We have noted the desire for a lessening of defence expenditures. I hope this will be feasible but in my opinion as we decrease our defence expenditures we should proportionately increase our economic assistance. I am thinking chiefly of the Asiatic peoples. I think that anyone who has read the press of late cannot but come to the same conclusion as I have.

An hon. Member: I hope not.

Mr. Knight: We are losing the cold war in the matter of technological and other types of education. In my last speech on federal aid I referred to the terrific strides that the Soviet union has been making compared to our efforts.

Mr. Ferguson: Give your friends a pat on the back.

Mr. Knight: Only 10 per cent of the young people of this country between the ages of 18 and 24 avail themselves of higher education. The corresponding figure for the United States is 30 per cent and the proportionate figures in other countries, with whose political philosophy we do not agree, are pretty terrific.

Mr. Studer: Do not be too sure.

Mr. Knight: The peculiar part of it is that in the matter of education we have no plans. In another year twice as many people in this age group will be knocking at the doors of our educational institutions as are doing so today, and we have no imaginative program to take care of them. Why do we persist in this country with what amounts to starvation of education? A larger share at least of the production of our expanding economy should be used for education instead of being put back into capital investment.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knight: I am sorry, time will not allow me to permit a question at the moment.

Mr. Garson: May I ask that before you take your seat—

Mr. Knight: No. Not only do we not encourage educational advance but we seem able only to think of economic and material improvement.

Mr. Ferguson: Why do you not read the Soviet bulletin that they issue every week?

Mr. Knight: What about the needs of the mind? When I came to the House of Commons eleven years ago, to mention education in the federal parliament was like using a naughty word, almost as the word "peace" has come to be regarded in certain quarters of this country. What are these forces that are holding back the Prime Minister?

Mr. Ferguson: The C.C.F.

Mr. Studer: The socialists.

Mr. Knight: I do not completely blame the Prime Minister and I should like to tell a story to indicate why I do not blame him as much as certain forces that must be working upon him somewhere. I attended a meeting of the council on the humanities at the Chateau Laurier a little over a year ago. Educators from across the country were present together with the occasional member of parliament. We were all interested in the creation of an arts council. At the end of the discussion the Prime Minister made an excellent, delightful and interesting speech. When we came away from the meeting one of the delegates put his hand on my shoulder and said, "Well, boy, apparently that is in the bag." I said it would look like it. I said

I had never heard something expressed which was as close to a commitment and yet was not a commitment.

That was the general feeling of the meeting and it was the greatest surprise to me and the others who attended the conference to find that in the next speech from the throne there was no mention at all of that particular subject. I ask why?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Knight: I am in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and those of the house. I was interrupted and I think I can finish in two minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is, in effect, asking me to inquire of the house whether they wish to give unanimous consent. I would point out that under ordinary circumstances I would be glad to do so, but in a debate with a fixed termination I think the hon. member should consider carefully before he asks me to make such a request. The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to extend the usual congratulations, in fact, even more so in this case, to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and also to express appreciation to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for having our colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley), move the address. It is particularly pleasing when she did such a splendid job.

I do not intend to follow altogether the speech just made by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) but at the outset, in case I do not get around to it, I think I should deal with what has been said about the marketing conference that was held in Saskatoon last fall because it has been referred to by previous speakers including the hon. member for Saskatoon. I attended the conference and I do not think the record should be left in the indefinite state with respect to it that is now the case because there has been a suggestion that the government has flouted the wishes of the farmers as expressed at the conference in the policy that the government has adopted. As I do not think that is the right inference I believe the record should be put straight.

As already stated, I attended the conference and I also have a copy of the resolutions passed at the conference. It was called by the interprovincial farm union council and was attended by representatives of the various provincial governments, the pools, and even of labour organizations. One of the reasons for calling the conference was to advise the government as to what western Canada, particularly the farmers of western Canada, wanted done respecting the problem which then faced them due to a shortage of cash having arisen through the farmers not being able to market their grain because of the congestion of the elevator facilities. The first resolution passed by the conference was moved by Mr. McIntosh, who is a member of the provincial government of Saskatchewan, I believe, and seconded by Mr. Hansen, who is the head of the farmers' union of Saskatchewan. It reads as follows:

> That this conference express its confidence in the Canadian wheat board as a sound method of marketing Canadian grain.

As I recall, that resolution was passed unanimously. That was the thesis upon which this whole conference proceeded.

As one might expect, the next matter that came up for discussion was advances to farmers. I should like to read to the house the resolution passed by this conference on this matter. There was a great deal of discussion on the motion introduced; it was amended, and finally a motion was drawn up which it was thought would pass through that conference. Here is the motion as amended and passed:

> Be it resolved that the organizations participating in this conference urge the government of Canada to make immediate provision for advances to farmers on grain in store on the farm, and further that these advances should be up to one-half the value of the normal delivery expected and should be repayable on the basis of one-half of the value of each delivery made by the farmer.

I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to two or three significant words in this resolution which was not drawn haphazardly but was drawn in order to meet the wishes of the people attending that conference. It was drawn after a great deal of discussion and after various motions had been made and withdrawn because it was clear that they would not be supported by the conference. I would ask you to bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, the fact that at this time a great number of requests were being made that advances should be made through the wheat board to the farmers. That suggestion was naturally brought before this conference. It was one of the things definitely advocated by some attending. I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that that suggestion was not endorsed. You can see that there is nothing in any way said otherwise than that advances should be provided for. If this conference had intended to endorse the idea of advances against farm-stored grain being made by the wheat board, it would have said so because it was invited to say so. It was quite clear, however, that that resolution would not pass that conference. The reason why it would not pass the conference, Mr. Speaker, was that the basic idea of the people represented there was that nothing should be done to interfere with the present and future success of the wheat board as our marketing agency. Many people at the conference pointed out that if the wheat board was invited to enter this field its position might be in danger; and it was accepted as fundamental that nothing should be done to endanger the position of the wheat board as our marketing agency.

Mr. Ellis: You will never sell that idea out west.

Mr. Tucker: I may not be able to sell it out west but I am telling about what happened at that conference. It is not my purpose to try to sell anything. It is my purpose to tell the truth, Mr. Speaker.

Something has been said to the effect that it was quite clear that this money was not supposed to be a loan but that it was supposed to be an advance. May I ask why it would have been said that this money should be repayable on the basis of one half the value of each delivery made by the farmer? If this money was not a loan, why should it have been resolved that it should be repayable in a certain way?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tucker: My C.C.F. friends may groan all they want to, but there is only one meaning to that resolution, namely that it was to be an advance and was to be repayable. That was the resolution passed by this conference. As one who was there, it is my duty to put the facts before this house. If the able men who attended this conference had intended to pass a resolution asking the government to make through the wheat board advances that should not be repayable, does anybody think that they would not have drafted a resolution that would have said so in so many words? Of course, Mr. Speaker, they were trying to give advice on the basis of what, first of all, would preserve the wheat board as a marketing agency and, subject to that consideration, would meet the immediate needs of the farmer for cash. There was a difference of opinion as to how it should be done. Some advocated that it should be done through the wheat board's advancing money through the elevator agents. Others at that conference pointed out that this procedure would get the wheat board involved and might do a tremendous amount of harm to the wheat board. The final decision was to draft the resolution in this form and to leave the matter to the government to decide, after hearing representations from the various farm organizations and others there represented as to what was the best way to do this. But again I say everything was based on the idea that nothing should be done to interfere with the wheat board.

If what was made plain to this house yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had been made plain to that conference, and it was suggested from time to time that the wheat board's position would perhaps be endangered if they were asked to do this, I have no doubt what that conference would have done. If it had been made plain to this conference that the wheat board was absolutely positive that they should not be asked to do it and would not undertake to do it, I have no doubt what that conference would have decided, because it was and is the belief in western Canada that the present wheat board has been doing a good job, that it has done a good job and that nothing must be done to endanger its continued existence.

Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us this, and I am reading from page 127 of Hansard:

> I can tell the house that, if the government instructed the wheat board to lend money on farm-stored grain and assume the responsibility for the lending of that money and its subsequent collection, the four members of the wheat board would be out of office within a matter of days.

I put this to every member of this house: If that proposition had been put to that conference—and bearing in mind they would not endorse it when it was merely the thought of some that the wheat board should not be asked to handle this matter—if they had definitely known that that was the opinion of the wheat board, I put it to the members that that conference would have made even plainer their decision that they did not want to ask for something to be done that was against the considered advice of the wheat board and something which, in their opinion, they could not effectively administer.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): You cannot intimidate the farmers with that sort of proposition.

Mr. Tucker: My hon. friend is trying to twist my words. I am not trying to intimidate anybody. I am putting before the house exactly what happened before this conference and what I think would have been their attitude in an even more pronounced way if they had known for sure the advice that the wheat board was giving. I want to tell my friends of the C.C.F. this. I am sure that their actions must be interpreted by the rest of Canada in a way that they do not like. They keep professing to be favourable to the wheat board but they continue to find fault with what is being done in respect of the wheat board's work. They continue to ask for things that the wheat board consider they cannot do and still retain the confidence of the farmers of western Canada. Then when my hon. friends are asking for these things, demanding them and stirring up demands for them they say, "We still are the best friends of the wheat board".

Mr. Argue: Who forced the wheat board to distribute box cars?

Mr. Tucker: As to that matter, may I say that the wheat board already have power to do that.

Mr. Argue: The minister forced them to use it.

Mr. Tucker: My hon. friend made his speech and I did not interrupt him. I know that it must be unpalatable to him for me to have these actual facts put before this house. My hon. friends may suggest all they want to that this thing cannot be sold to the farmers and that sort of thing. I have taken the attitude that I will try to tell the truth here and will rely on the sense of justice of the people of Saskatchewan to support me in doing so. I am putting before this house what was passed by that conference and what happened at that conference.

The government knew that the conference had refused to endorse the wheat board's being asked to handle this question—had definitely refused to do so. That is something that cannot be denied. Further, they knew the attitude of the wheat board in reference to this matter. They also know the attitude of western Canada which was that the wheat board should not be endangered, as it would have been according to the wheat board's own opinion which they undoubtedly thought should be taken in that regard. Is the government then to be blamed for acting upon the advice of a conference called for that purpose and for doing the thing in a way that appeared to be the only way in which it could be done to provide these advances, namely through the banking system—a procedure which was not refused or turned down by this conference. It was the only way in which it could have been done if it was not to be done through the wheat board, and if the wheat board said: "We cannot do it and we will not do it, and we will not try to do it, and if you destroy us, why that is your responsibility." Then, of course, it seems to me the government did the only thing it could.

I have no fear, Mr. Speaker, with regard to what the people of western Canada will say if it comes to an actual showdown and they know the facts and that the opposition parties are insisting on demanding that the government load a burden on the wheat board that might break its effectiveness as a marketing agency for western Canada, and that they are insisting on this even at the risk of endangering the wheat board. I am satisfied that the people of western Canada will say that the Liberal government and those who support it did right in doing nothing to endanger the existence of the wheat board. I say that to the C.C.F., and they can make the most of it.

I ask them this question. If the wheat board is of the opinion that farm financing cannot be done properly by the board and still preserve their effectiveness as a marketing agency—and apparently that is their opinion; there is no reason to doubt it—is it the C.C.F. attitude that this should be done regardless? On this question of getting help to the farmers in this time of emergency, do they say that we should risk doing away with the long-term plan of keeping the wheat board? I just wonder whether my hon. friends really take that attitude? That is what I wish to say about that meeting at Saskatoon. In my opinion the government did the only thing it could do, consistent with the advice brought from that conference. Anybody who reads the resolutions passed by that conference, or who attended the conference, knows that what I am saying is true.

I intend to come back to this question of grain marketing, but there are one or two things I wish to say before I do that. We are being invited to vote lack of confidence in this government.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tucker: And the C.C.F. endorse that. If that motion of lack of confidence carried it would mean a new election. Does anybody in the C.C.F. really pretend that if an election were held there is any other alternative to the present government than a Progressive Conservative government? Surely, they will not pretend that they would have any chance of forming a government. Are my C.C.F. friends anxious to replace the present government with a Progressive Conservative government? They do not answer. I know they would not dare to say that, because Saskatchewan would repudiate them if they did so. When they ask us to vote against the government they are asking us to take the chance that we might have a Progressive Conservative government instead of a Liberal government. Since I know western Canada does not want that, why should I vote lack of confidence in the present government? I ask them, why should they do it?

Where would our provincial government be without the money it gets under the dominion-provincial agreements?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Tucker: The C.C.F. may say "oh". They know themselves that we could not carry out our educational program; we could not carry on our hospitalization program without the money we get under the dominion-provincial agreements. Have they any guarantee that if this government were defeated and succeeded by another government, we would have dominion-provincial agreements under which we would get the money which we get today, to the same extent and under the same circumstances? They could not guarantee it; and yet they are ready to take that chance. I myself know the attitude of some of the members of the government of Saskatchewan. They would hate to take the chance of having this government defeated when they are faced with that kind of possibility. They know that is true.

Let me in this connection deal with the attacks that are being made on the wheat board today. The government is being attacked because of its wheat board policy. The central point of that policy is the wheat board and the maintenance of the wheat board. If the government were defeated, as the C.C.F. want, could my C.C.F. friends tell their friends in Saskatchewan that they would guarantee the wheat board would be maintained as the exclusive marketing agency of wheat, oats and barley, as it is today They cannot do it. They could not guarantee it. They are ready to take a chance on this very thing that is so important. They are doing it for what purpose? They are doing it for political advantage, Mr. Speaker, that is all.

They say they want to see the Liberals stand up and be counted. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am ready to stand up and be counted in support of a government that maintains the wheat board as the marketing agency for our grain. Certainly, I am ready to stand up and be counted and support the government that is bringing in improved dominion-provincial agreements under which our province can give a standard of education and of health that it could not give without them.

I was elected to this house in 1935. At that time one of the problems in Saskatchewan was that we had no access to the large incomes of the corporations and of individuals in the central provinces, and that we could not, without impossible taxation, give the children in Saskatchewan the same educational advantages that were enjoyed by the children of Ontario. We said that some system should be evolved so that there would not be any first and second-class citizens in Canada. We said that there should be a definite minimum of government services throughout Canada. Our party has worked on this problem of trying to equalize the yield from income, corporate and succession duty taxes, up to the time that the last suggestion was made by our present Prime Minister.

At that time one of the arguments that we used was this. We are probably facing another war when the boys of Saskatchewan will be expected to fight and perhaps die for Canada. Is it fair that Canada shall say to them: "If you live in Saskatchewan you cannot have the same educational and the same health advantages that you would have if you lived in some other province"? We said something should be done about it. This was opposed by many people. They said it was not fair to put heavier taxes on Ontario to help out Saskatchewan and other provinces. Some people not very far from me took that attitude, but the Liberal party worked on this program, and now we have the present proposals in regard to dominion-provincial relations based definitely upon the idea of fiscal need. This the C.C.F. profess to support. Are they sure it would be carried out by the other party? No. But yet they ask me to throw out a government that recognizes the principle of fiscal need, and replace it with a party that at times has not supported that point of view. I am wondering who is playing politics on this important matter?

I commend the Prime Minister of this country most heartily and sincerely on the leadership that he has given in trying to work out a system of dominion-provincial grants which recognizes the principle of fiscal need, and which recognizes the desire of the provinces not to appear to surrender their economy, by being able to draw the money under this arrangement without signing any agreement.

I want to commend the Prime Minister on his earnest endeavours to get a system that is satisfactory to all the provinces of this country. I do deplore most sincerely the suggestion that when he is trying to get a system worked out that is acceptable to all parts of this country he is supposed to be catering to one part rather than another.

Saskatchewan depends upon these dominion-provincial agreements more than any other province in Canada. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is trying to come to some agreement which will be and give fair recognition to the claims of Quebec to the position to which she feels entitled in confederation, then we in Saskatchewan should be the first to support that. We should want Quebec to be satisfied with this because it is an important part of Canada. Unless the agreements are accepted by the whole country as a fair basis upon which the government should act, then they are not solidly established as we should want them to be.

This is a very difficult problem under any federal system. It is a problem of seeing to it that all provinces have a fair chance of carrying out their constitutional obligations particularly in regard to education and health to an equal degree. I hope it will not be too long before, under the leadership of our present Prime Minister, the present proposals are put into effect providing a new and more solid foundation for the unity of our country than has before been possible. This has been such a vexing and divisive influence upon our country. How can you have real unity if one part of the country feels that another part is getting a much better deal out of confederation? When agreement is finally brought about I believe it will re-establish Canada as a more united country. I want to commend the Prime Minister for the work he has done and the leadership he has given in that respect. The government he leads certainly should have the support of all the members from Saskatchewan because I think these tax agreements are more important to us than to any other part of this dominion.

I should like to say a word about external affairs.

An hon. Member: What about wheat?

Mr. Tucker: I am not afraid to deal with wheat. The people who should be afraid to deal with wheat are those who profess to be in favour of the wheat board and yet are always advocating policies which will destroy it.

I wish to say a word in regard to external affairs. I commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) for the attitude he has taken at NATO to the effect that the attention of the western world should be directed to building up economic strength and economic co-operation. We cannot hope to build up solid military strength unless we have economic strength.

Surely, we do not want to repeat the mistake we made in the thirties when each country tried to solve its unemployment problem, its problem of low farm prices by taking individual action. In this way each nation hurt the other nation. The result was the terrible experiences we had in the thirties. At that time, we resolved that never again would we be a party to doing that sort of thing. I want to commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs for pointing out, particularly to our good neighbour the United States, that article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty is an integral and important part of that agreement; that therefore, they should take no steps that are unfair to the other members of that organization hoping as they do to live up to the terms of that agreement. I believe that, in emphasizing that, our minister was doing a good thing, not only for Canada but for the whole of the western world. Why then suggest that we embark on a different scheme on a national basis and follow the past United States system of subsidy and giveaway, regardless of the extent to which it may destroy the economic foundation of neighbouring countries? When it is suggested to us we do the same, is it not being suggested, Mr. Speaker, that we repeat the mistakes of the thirties?

I want to commend the government for taking the lead at GATT and saying that we should adopt trade policies leading to a greater measure of trade. I want to commend the government also for taking the lead at the NATO conference in saying that, if we are going to solve these problems which are besetting agriculture in all countries of the western world, we must work together in harmony. Things should not be done because one nation is strong and thereby able to take a position that may almost ruin a neighbouring nation. Surely our Secretary of State for External Affairs deserves the united support of every member of this house in that connection. Yet my friends of the opposition say I should vote against the government. I am not afraid to vote in favour of not repeating the mistakes of the thirties, and I do not think my hon. friends opposite should ask me to do otherwise.

I should say a word of commendation about the good work done by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) at the United Nations. One of the things that hampered the work of the United Nations was its lack of universality. Our representatives there succeeded in getting 16 of the nations of the world admitted to membership, thereby strengthening the organization and making a contribution to peace. By giving that leadership our representative added lustre to the name of Canada in the councils of the world.

Now, I would like to say a word about farm prices. I have looked over the index figures, but I have not time to give them now. I would point out that if you allow for a hoped for further payment on wheat, the index of farm prices is back around 228·8 based on 1935-39. His costs stand at 228·9. In other words the prices received by the farmer and the cost of doing business are both more than twice as much as in 1935-39. This figure of 228·9 is the index of farm prices. It allows for 20 cents more per bushel on wheat which brings the index of farm prices to 228·8, which is one-tenth of 1 per cent away from the index of farm costs. In other words, if you calculate that we will get another 20 cents on wheat the farmer is now back—

Mr. Nicholson: Where do you get that figure?

Mr. Tucker: I am hoping for it.

Mr. Nicholson: Where do you get it?

Mr. Tucker: I am hoping for it. If we do not get it, the situation will not be so good. I am hoping we will get a further payment on oats and a further payment on barley but I have not taken this into my calculations. In any event, we have got back to the position where what the farmer now gets from what he sells, relatively to what it costs, is relatively the same as in the period 1935-39.

In the interval, his position has been much better. His position has been getting worse during the last four or five years. His costs have been going up and the prices at which he sells his goods have been going down. This situation has been reflected in the trend of the population and it is something to which I am sure the government is giving attention. The figures I got were from the Canada Year Book and they seem to me significant figures—figures to which every member should give some attention. I have only the figures for 1941 and 1951. In 1941 the number of people engaged in agriculture totalled 1,083,816. By 1951 the number had decreased to 826,759, that is a decrease of roughly 257,000 or 23·7 per cent. The number has decreased by almost one-quarter. I think that trend has gone on since 1951.

On the other hand, in the case of those engaged in all forms of gainful occupation, including agriculture, the number in Canada in 1941 was 4,195,000 in round numbers, whereas in 1951, and this does not include Newfoundland, the number had increased to 5,179,000, or an increase of 24·4 per cent. Therefore, while the number of people engaged in gainful occupations went up by 24·4 per cent in the decade from 1941 to 1951, the number of people engaged in agriculture went down by 23·7 per cent.

It is quite obvious that it has been felt by the people of Canada that it is much better to be engaged in some occupation other than farming. So far as I understand their attitude, the royal commission on agriculture in Saskatchewan, noting that the number of people in Saskatchewan in agriculture had gone down, that the number of farms had decreased, that farms have increased in size, believed that no fault should be found with that because the only way in which a farmer now can make a living is by doing business on a bigger scale. Therefore you have to have larger farms for the farmer to have an adequate income, and as I take it they do not find fault with that trend.

But the government must bear in mind that sociological changes like that bear down very heavily on the sections of the community affected and the government must always keep in mind that these changes should not be permitted to happen faster than considerations of humanity warrant, or faster than would be in the best interests of the basic economy of the country. This is something to which careful attention must be given and it is one of the reasons why I feel that the rest of Canada should have no hesitation in supporting any modest measure of temporary assistance to the farming industry that may be necessary to temper this situation until we can find out exactly what the long-term position should be.

Mr. Nicholson: Why modest?

Mr. Tucker: I think I should now say a few further words in regard to the wheat situation. I think at the outset that I should say that I commend the stand taken on this matter by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) down through the last four or five difficult years. The attitude has been taken over and over again by opposition groups that we were losing our markets, that we were faced with a pile-up of grain, that we needed to get rid of our grain, that we had to do something about it, that this grain surplus was striking at the very foundation of our economy in western Canada.

I may be wrong, but in my opinion if there had been any indication on the part of the minister responsible for our program, if there had been any weakening in support of the wheat board, if there had been any indication that this vast quantity of grain would suddenly be thrown on the markets of the world: if there had been any thought that that was likely to happen, it would have broken the world price of wheat. What that would have cost the farmers of this country is incalculable.

Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce is attacked for his firm stand on this question, for his being behind the wheat board, for his saying that there will be no fire sale of wheat—that the situation is not as bad as it has been painted by the opposition. I think on reflection we must all admit that he has done a good service to the farmers of this country and for that reason he deserves support when the time comes to vote.

One thing that was significant to me in the speech yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was that up until, I believe he said early in November, there had been no great demand for our wheat and then suddenly it came on faster than he had ever experienced before. At a time when there is an open market, speeches such as those that have been made would not have much effect because people dealing in wheat would know the exact supply situation. They would not go according to speeches.

But when there is a tremendous amount of wheat in the hands of a government and that government is being attacked by the opposition because there is a great deal—too much—wheat on hand; when it is being contended that a new policy should be followed, that a more aggressive sales policy should be adopted, that something should be done to get rid of it, those people who are thinking of buying wheat may be inclined to believe that the government may finally give in, and should that occur the price of wheat might drop substantially and therefore they hold back to see what effect the opposition attack may have.

I think it is fair to say that this continual outcry on the part of the opposition that there should be some change in the marketing of wheat, that the wheat board is not getting rid of the wheat fast enough, that the government should be thrown out because it is not doing a good selling job—when these things occur other people may think that the opposition may be able to bring down the government and they may decide to hold back to see what happens. How much damage has been done by these cries which have been heard in the past, that the government should get rid of our wheat, nobody can tell, but I do point out that to me it seems to be a case of playing politics at the expense of the farmers of our country.

The minister has pointed out that he feels from his long experience that we are going to get through this situation without changing our policy, without creating panic and without throwing our wheat on the world market and breaking the price. Because he takes that optimistic position he is attacked. He takes the attitude that it is a good thing that we have a surplus because we may have a crop failure when we would need that surplus to meet the demands of our customers. This is in the best tradition of former great leaders in western Canada.

Western Canada likes the straightforward attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce because he talks to them in a blunt, straightforward way. Yet we continue to have this outcry that there should be a change in his attitude. As an example, last night I read where a Conservative member of the provincial legislative of Manitoba had said that a new wheat policy was needed. He said that the problem of farm security could be met by paying on farm-stored grain. His solution for the disposal of our surplus was practically a forced sale, make prices and conditions suitable to the consumers in the importing countries.

Would it not be a sad thing if when, through the goodness of Providence, we had a good crop, as a result of weakness on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in doing the things suggested by this Progressive Conservative member of the legislature of Manitoba our wheat was pressed on the markets of the world so as to break prices. The result would be that our farmers would lose—and the country would lose—through that goodness of Providence rather than being benefited. Surely we should be glad that we have a minister who says that we are going to take advantage of the goodness of Providence by seeing to it that the farmer benefits. That is the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I intend to support it—to stand up without hesitation and be counted, believing I am thereby supporting the best interests of the farmers of our country.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin in the usual way by extending my congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I should like to follow that with a note of personal congratulations and best wishes to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on reaching his seventieth birthday. I might say that he followed up this milestone in his life by making a most spirited address to this house yesterday. Although there may be some differences of opinion as to the accuracy of some of the comments he made at that time, he certainly showed a great deal of spirit for a man who has, throughout his career, done a great deal for our country.

I should like now to extend congratulations to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who spoke just prior to myself. He should be congratulated because, during the course of his address, he gave the province of Saskatchewan an export of a new kind. The export which he introduced to this house was red herrings, the same brand of red herrings that was introduced into the house yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as a new export from Port Arthur.

The principal red herring injected into these debates was the red herring that those who are critical of the government's handling of the present agricultural emergency are people who are attempting to throw out the Canadian wheat board. I do not think that any member of this house, or perhaps even newspapers or others that have been mentioned by these two gentlemen, are seeking deliberately to destroy a means of orderly marketing. However, in supporting generally the principle of the Canadian wheat board, I do not think anyone in his right mind, farmer or otherwise, could fairly assume that the support of a principle of orderly marketing necessarily means support of all the actions of those who may be carrying out that policy of orderly marketing.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his statement, went to great lengths to establish that, in his view, production of surpluses of agricultural products was in the long run a good thing for our economy. He tried to imply that others who may not think as he does want to see shortages rather than surpluses. That is most unfair and most untrue. When we take the minister's reasoning that it is in the national interest to continue producing surpluses of all kinds of products, particularly of wheat, despite any temporary state surpluses, then it must necessarily follow that, if maximum production is in the national interest, then it is also in the national interest that the burden imposed by this method of production should be carried on a national basis in the national interest and should not be a burden imposed upon the producers of agricultural products alone.

If it be true that it is in the national interest to maintain a high level of production regardless of the state of our overseas markets for these products, then it must follow, and even the most ardent supporters of this government's policy must agree, that the present very limited emergency steps contemplated in the speech from the throne are steps which still impose on the prairie farmer the great burden in the national interest of carrying something which is a responsibility of the nation as a whole.

The minister made some reference to retail sales in the prairie provinces for the first nine months of 1955. He compared them with the first nine months of 1954 and from that comparison came to the conclusion that the western farmer has no need of cash. He stated in his comparison that retail sales were up, I believe, some four per cent in Manitoba, that retail sales were down only one per cent in Saskatchewan and were up some six per cent in Alberta. But let me point out that this particular gauge is a most unreliable one and presents a very false picture of the actual state of affairs. A far more reliable gauge of the actual cash position of the agricultural producer in the west would be one based upon how much farmer debt has increased during this period of 1955, when retail sales were maintained. How much more do the western farmers now owe their local merchants? How much do they owe their suppliers of all forms of products? How much, in turn, has the debt of those merchants and suppliers increased as compared with those in the east and other parts of Canada from whom they buy their products for resale to the western farmers? It is only fair and honest to say that the farm debt position has very greatly worsened during 1955. Such is the need for cash that a great many western merchants in smaller towns and cities alike have had to go on a straight cash basis with the farmer. The farmer's credit is no longer good, simply because the merchant himself finds he cannot maintain his own credit position and continue getting goods if he has nothing to show for the sale of his products except a debt owing by a farmer without cash.

I know we have in southern Alberta a very sad situation which accentuates the belief that there is a crying need for more cash for the farmer. That is the fact that many farmers are disposing of No. 1 and No. 2 wheat for feed. Good grade wheat is being taken by merchants of all kinds in exchange for petroleum products, household appliances, motor cars, foodstuffs and so on. It is being taken in for as low as 50 cents a bushel for No. 1 wheat. That wheat, in turn, is being sold at merchant's cost, or even less, for feed. This is at a time when our elevators are loaded with huge quantities of low grade wheat which at this stage should properly be used to supply the feed needs of the west as well as the east.

I am not going to offer any specific solution for the farm problems of the west. The leader of my party has outlined what I believe is a good emergency program at this time—cash advances to farmers—and a good suggestion for a long-term solution, that is, to toss this problem to the Gordon commission for a full study of all the aspects of future policy on wheat marketing in order that we may evolve a plan that will ensure not only maximum production of agricultural products but a fairly steady flow of cash for those products, in order that those who produce them may continue to live on a standard comparable to the rest of Canada.

I should like to devote the rest of my time today to a discussion of another phase of the western Canadian economy, one which, at least in one regard, has shown a great deal more progress than has our basic industry, agriculture. I refer of course to petroleum and natural gas. During 1955 the petroleum and gas industry poured into western Canada as direct investment more than half a billion dollars, to be exact some $503 million in new capital investment in oil and gas exploration and development, land acquisition, pipe lines, refineries and everything else that goes to make up that particular industry. This investment of more than half a billion dollars in one year is by far the largest rate of investment in Canada's history in any single natural resource. It of course reflects the steady growth that has taken place since 1947 when the Leduc discovery started off the oil boom.

This year western Canada, the four western provinces and the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, are now assured of a still greater investment. There will be poured into the west this year by the oil and gas industry a minimum of $680 million, a rate, I might say, which dwarfs by many times the investment rate of the industry of only $12 million a year nine years ago. But if the critical problem of the oil and gas industry, that is, the solution of the gas export question, is settled, new investment in the four western provinces in 1956 will not be $680 million but will climb to a minimum of 813 millions of new dollars.

The effect of that kind of capital investment upon a part of Canada whose basic industry has suffered and suffered severely is an effect which is incalculable, I might say, and this is a good measure of the importance of these resources to western Canada as well as to all of Canada, that nine years ago this industry supported directly and indirectly some 25,000 men, women and children in western Canada. Today the number of western Canadians supported directly or indirectly by the oil and gas industry is not 25,000 but exceeds 300,000 people.

There is every reason to believe that over the next few years, provided the industry can continue to grow through freedom to market its products, provided we can develop along with oil and gas production ancillary and associated industries, petrochemical, steel and so forth, to supply oil needs, we will in a relatively few years have at least one million western Canadians supported by these twin resources.

I am going to toss a very few more figures on oil at you, Mr. Speaker, and then get down to the question of our problem with respect to gas. In 1955 this industry, which is pouring so much in capital investment into western Canada, took out far less, but it still took out some $301 million worth of crude oil which it marketed, of course, in Canada and the United States. This year we have a substantial market growth ahead of us for oil. This year we will be marketing 156 million barrels of oil with a worth at well-head of something over $376 million, making oil, of course, by a substantial measure the No. 1 mineral producing industry in terms of cash produced in all of Canada.

In 1955 this western industry managed to produce some 353,000 barrels of oil daily, an amount which represented 57½ per cent of the petroleum needs of the Dominion of Canada. That record was set only eight years after the discovery of Leduc at a time when our oil hunger in Canada was less than half what it is today and when we were only able to produce less than 10 per cent of our needs. This year we will produce in western Canada some 429,000 barrels of oil per day equal to 65 per cent of this year's demand for the whole of Canada.

I might say, however, that these figures, while large, must be stacked up alongside one factor, and that is that our ability to produce oil in western Canada is growing even faster than our ability to market it. Right now in the four western provinces we can produce no less than 700,000 barrels of oil per day compared with 20,000 barrels a day nine years ago, if we have the markets to absorb it. The figure of 700,000 barrels daily is made up of the maximum efficient rates of production of all the thousands of oil wells in the west as determined by competent engineers employed by governments and oil companies.

We are, therefore, not producing to our full ability. We are producing some 55 or 60 per cent of the amount of oil we could produce if we had markets. But a breakdown of where we are selling oil and how those markets for oil have grown sets a pattern we might well bear in mind when we consider oil's twin product, gas. In 1954 we first broke into the United States oil market and in that year we managed to dispose of 7,900 barrels of oil per day, all of that going into the area along the western end of lake Superior on the United States side. In 1955 these exports of our oil to the United States increased severalfold. They increased to 50,800 barrels daily, and in this year we will be able to market in the United States at least 112,000 barrels of oil daily, an amount which represents 26 per cent of the expected oil production of western Canada. In other words, the United States market has become a very vital factor in our market planning.

The sale of oil to the United States in this year alone will bring to Canada a minimum of $113 million in United States currency which will continue to improve greatly our trade position with our neighbouring nation to the south. Without this United States market for oil and the lift that access to that market provides to support capital spending in the development of new resources in western Canada I believe quite firmly western Canada would lose capital investment of at least a quarter of a billion dollars per year.

I use these figures because they do indicate the importance to the development of these resources of the west of access to markets outside of Canada. It will perhaps interest hon. members to know, and this rather disturbs me at times when I think about it, that even a year ago we faced certain problems in Ottawa, and they were not confined to the government side of the house alone. The problem that faced us was that there were members of the house who were still attempting to place restrictions upon the route of oil pipe lines plus restrictions upon the marketing of our oil that would have, if approved, ruled out the market growth we have been able to enjoy across the border.

You may recall the stand taken some years ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when he ruled that the first oil pipe line should go partly over United States territory to Sarnia, Ontario. I was not in politics at that time but I strongly supported his position because that was the most economic means of bringing the oil east. What has been the effect of that decision? It can be summed up this way, that because that oil line reached Ontario by traversing in part United States territory we were placed in contact by means of the pipe line with a United States market which in 1956 is going to take from western Canada approximately 54,000 barrels a day of western Canadian oil.

You may recall a year or so ago the protests lodged on the other side of the house against expansion southward from Vancouver of the Trans Mountain oil pipe line. Those objections, I am happy to say, were overruled. But had they gone through, and had we been unable to move oil by pipe line south from Vancouver into the northwest United States, this is what would have been the effect this year. Western Canada would have lost a market which this year will amount to 58,500 barrels of oil per day. Those two markets in the United States which are available to us only because of the relative freedom given to the oil industry to plan its transport systems on the most economic basis without too much regard for the location of the 49th parallel today, mean that western Canada, in terms of production, is producing an extra $300,000 worth of oil per day and that the Canadian economy is being strengthened by that amount. As I indicated to you earlier, even access to that United States market does not take care of our oil surplus problem. We are still capable of producing almost twice as much oil as we are able to market in Canada and in the United States, but the oil industry are not calling for subsidies of any kind to help them out. They are simply leaving their wells cut back to the amount of oil they can produce efficiently and can market in the areas to be served.

That brings us to the question of gas. Our oil planning has been based upon a fairly wide recognition of the fact that a pipe line is merely a means of transport between an oil field or a gas field and a market. Unless that pipe line can move that product to a market at a price which the customer is willing to pay and at which the producer is willing to sell, the pipe line cannot be a success financially and cannot do the job for which it was intended in moving the products from the field to the market. With regard to gas, unfortunately, our thinking in this country on both sides of the house to a large degree has been based upon the acceptance of a purely emotional appeal without one whit of regard for the cold economic facts of mounting surpluses of gas in western Canada and the cold economics involved in the setting up of a transport system or the economics of producing gas, transporting it and getting it to a market at a price which the customer is willing to pay. As a result of this emotionalism with regard to gas, we have now had in Canada seven long years of growing surpluses of gas in the west and continued indecision in the east. During those seven years we have seen oil pipe lines and the oil industry expand tremendously but in Canada gas has remained the one single resource of our country which has been so badly mishandled by politics that that resource still remains shut in. It is a resource whose present worth, having regard to proved reserves today, is something over $2 billion at the well-head and is a resource which could become the basis for a great industrial future for all provinces of western Canada and a great stimulus to industrial development in eastern Canada as well. That resource is still shut in.

We have had some changes in thinking. At long last we now have approval, after about seven years, of the first gas line from western Canada across the Rocky mountains to the Pacific coast. The plan that has finally been evolved is a compromise one and it is not the most economic plan by any means. However, it is one which will at least this year finally get gas rolling. That compromise plan involves a high degree of co-operation between this country and our neighbour to the south. That co-operation is essential because Canada's west coast cannot possibly provide a market big enough to support any kind of pipe line from anywhere unless the biggest part of the pipe line through-put goes into United States markets. That is enough to be said for the system in the west. At last we shall get a pipe line built there now. I might say that had the government two or three years ago recognized the problems that are in the way, and had they recognized the solid basis for the fears entertained across the border that because of Canada's exportation act and the restrictions in that act there could be no trust on the part of United States consumers as to security of either flow or price of gas from Canada, the situation would be different. Had the government recognized those facts two or three years ago and had they brought down in 1953 or 1954 the amendments to the export act which were finally brought down in the spring of 1955, the pipe line to the west coast would today be in operation on a sounder and more economic basis, in terms of values of gas, for the governments of British Columbia and Alberta, and the producers of gas in the northern parts of those two provinces and on better terms for the consumers in British Columbia.

We now come to the pressing problem of what to do about a gas pipe line eastward. As this house knows, Mr. Speaker, several years ago—in 1952, as a matter of fact—I urged this house to accept an international arrangement which would involve United States gas flowing into eastern Canada and western Canadian gas moving across the prairies and southward into the midwestern states. That plan has now been accepted in part under the new compromise arrangement between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and Tennessee Gas Transmission Company. Part of this plan will involve a decision in this house in the next few weeks. In 1952 also—and many times since then—I tried to establish the fact that the all-Canadian pipe line, which all of us would like to see if it were feasible, was in fact a policy that could not be carried out without subsidies; that it could not stand on its own economic feet; that it was not financially feasible because banks, insurance companies and investors are not stupid enough to put their money into a proposition when they know they are going to lose. In any case, we finally reached the stage in January of last year when the all-Canadian pipe line concept fell flat on its face after it applied to the Canadian government for a guarantee of its bonds in order to allow a private company to carry out not what the pipe line company wanted to do but what the government said it had to do, namely to build an all-Canadian line before it could sell any gas in the United States market which was needed to help support the line. You know what happened to the bond guarantee. It was turned down. Incidentally, I was most happy to see it turned down. But that occurrence opened up a new problem. What could be an alternative? One would be to defer the all-Canadian line—in other words a line through a thousand miles of northern Ontario —until such time as eastern Canada's markets had been built up sufficiently to support such a project and in the meantime to allow western Canada gas to move into nearby United States markets and build up eastern Canadian markets with gas through existing pipe lines reaching from the southern United States. As I mentioned earlier, that plan has been accepted but the government, supported by the Ontario government, has ruled that, along with those two features of export to the United States from western Canada and import to eastern Canada from the United States, must come at the same time—before it is economically feasible or privately financially feasible—the northern Ontario line. That brings us up against the cold fact that there is a price tag on nationalism.

If we want this northern Ontario gas line now instead of when the north or eastern Canada can support it, then somebody must pay for it, and that is the proposition which the government of Ontario and the government of Canada have now brought forward. They plan to build this northern Ontario line as a joint government enterprise and to lease it to a private company, namely, Trans-Canada, who would carry out the more economic phase of the over-all plan.

There are some here and elsewhere who would like still to maintain their previous position of an all-Canadian project and get themselves off the hook by making this whole pipe line project from Alberta to Quebec a socialized project. I will comment a little further on that in a moment. But the present proposal of Tennessee Transmission and the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, coupled with the government part of the northern Ontario line, is one that can go ahead this spring only if the federal power commission of the United States will approve the import of Canadian gas into the midwest and the export of United States gas to Ontario and Quebec. Of course, most hon. members know that hearings before the federal power commission at Washington are due to start later this month. Quite frankly, the odds are against the early approval of that proposition by the federal power commission. The chances of approval were a great deal better a year ago; they were far better two or three years ago than they are now.

One of the prices that we have to pay for our indecision and our dilly-dallying around with this problem for several years in the building up of a set of circumstances, resentments and other things in the United States, which are prejudicing our chances now of quickly cracking the ice to get the markets which were ours for the asking not too long ago.

The great opposition to the importation of gas to the midwest stems from a group of United States pipe line companies who are already marketing United States gas in the area into which Tennessee Transmission would contemplate exporting Canadian gas. That opposition is led by Northern Natural Gas Company which supplies Minneapolis and other parts of the midwest. Northern, as many hon. members know, is a company which for a number of years has been a prime supporter of importing gas from Canada, and until the collapse of Trans-Canada's original project a year ago, Northern were intending to be the distributor, through their existing system, of Canadian gas in the United States midwest. They have now been frozen out. They are the company which had hopes of getting Canadian gas. They made a great deal of effort to get Canadian gas. They now dislike seeing somebody else bring the same product in to compete in their markets.

Some other utility companies farther south than Minneapolis take the attitude that at this stage they do not want to see a fresh competitor supplying the same product into areas in which they are now bringing United States gas, and in which they have a very heavy financial investment. I would suggest that that poses another problem. At least, it brings up another possible solution to the fix in which we are now.

May I summarize? We have ahead of us in this parliament some important crises that will have to be solved if we are to resolve this very serious gas problem in the future. We can accept the present compromise plan which this government has worked out in co-operation with the Ontario government, Trans-Canada and Tennessee Transmission; but the odds are against approval of that over-all plan in its present form by the United States federal power commission in time to start any construction in 1956.

In lieu of the present plan, we can urge on the government that the present plan be modified in the United States section by bringing in as participants with Tennessee Transmission in the line of connection at Emerson, Manitoba, where the Canadian gas would move south to the United States, the existing gas utility companies of the United States midwest. If we did that, we would perhaps eliminate their objections before the federal power commission. In other words, their position might then be not one of opposing a new competitor but rather of supporting a new supplementary supplier of gas from Canada, in which they themselves had a financial stake. It is a suggestion that carries a lot of merit. It is the only hope I see of getting any pipe line east from Manitoba started in 1956.

Then, we come to a third general proposition, and that would be to defer construction of the northern Ontario section of the line, that is, the government section, and redesign the United States territory links of this east-west pipe-line system. In other words, build a line from Alberta to Ontario, following roughly along the line of the route of the existing oil pipe line between Alberta and Ontario, which incidentally, is the lowest economic route and would not cross the areas in the United States now being served by existing United States pipe lines. It would reach into a part of the United States which does not now have natural gas, but is anxious to have it, and could absorb many times the amount of gas that could be marketed at this time in northern Ontario.

If that were done, then the northern Ontario line would be built a few years hence, at the time of the looping stage of the pipe line system. As hon. members know, the capacity of a line is limited by the size of the original pipe line. A 30-inch diameter pipe is now planned for northern Ontario. In a few years that line would have to be paralleled by another large-diameter pipe line to meet the growing market needs. But that parallel line or loop would not necessarily have to be laid along the same section of territory. It could go north of lake Superior, and at that time step into the eastern Canadian market built up in advance for it, and could be supported without government help, as is the case with the present uneconomic pipe line in northern Ontario.

I might say that if we redesigned the United States section of the line there would still be no hope of getting any line built in 1956.

The fourth proposal which is made by some people is that we socialize this whole project, socialize Trans-Canada and build this whole system as a government operation from Alberta to Quebec. There are some who think that is an easy way out, and there are others who believe as a matter of faith that government ownership of projects such as these are in the best interests of the country. I want to say only one thing, namely, that an over-all government-owned pipe line would impose upon Canada a whole new set of problems. Gas is simply one of several fuels. To socialize the pipe line would bring Canada face to face with the problem of how to satisfy the coal miner, how to satisfy the coal operator, how to satisfy the railway worker who is transporting coal or fuel oil, how to satisfy the fuel oil dealer in Canada and those who are distributing or are in any way concerned with the production, transportation or marketing of these competing fuels.

If we socialize one fuel, we may be forced through necessity to socialize them all. In lieu of socializing the others we may be forced by necessity into setting up a new system to subsidize the low, free enterprise fuels to compete with the socialized ones. That is one of the problems we shall be faced with in Canada if we socialize the gas line.

The other problem is a very real one. If we socialized the gas line in Canada we would find ourselves face to face with a very strong new opponent to the import of Canadian gas into the United States. This new opponent would be the United States coal industry who, as a matter of course, opposes all gas and oil pipe lines in the United States, whether they are entirely domestic or international. If we gave the United States coal industry new arguments, if we gave the free enterprise United States coal industry, the free enterprise United States railway system, the free enterprise United States oil industry who are now being asked to compete in their home market with socialized fuel from another country, new arguments, I am very much afraid it would take years to break through the barrier of that United States border in order to get outlets we desperately need for surplus western Canadian fuel.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. A. R. Lusby (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks it is, of course, too late to be original in this, but I should like to add my very sincere congratulations to those which have already been tendered in the course of this debate, to the mover and seconder in respect to the resolution on the reply to the speech from the throne, on the very excellent manner in which they discharged their duties. I particularly wish to congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) upon the fact that of all of her sex she has been the first to have the honour of moving such a resolution in this chamber. I know that her enthusiasm for her task must have been greatly heightened by the fact that this year the speech from the throne indicated the imminent passage of legislation to provide that women shall receive equal pay with men for equal work in matters coming within the federal jurisdiction. Such legislation constitutes, I think, a very significant advance in the long march towards complete recognition of women's rights. I think also the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is to be congratulated, not only on the fact that this legislation is to be passed, but also upon the fact that it has first been given searching and careful scrutiny. It is true the principle involved seems to be simple and straightforward but I can readily see there may be many difficulties in the interpretation and application of the act when it is passed. After all, there are women concerned in this matter.

The speech from the throne confirms our knowledge that this year has been a prosperous one for Canada, and that those prophecies of depression and ruin which only a year ago echoed so freely and loudly from the opposition benches in this chamber have proved groundless. That is not to say that one can overlook the serious difficulties confronting the farming industry. It has always been my belief that prosperity in that industry is a necessary component of any stable and enduring national prosperity in this country. Therefore it is imperative that a solution be found for the difficulties which are now facing the farming population. However, this government during its tenure of office has acquired the habit of dealing effectively with all national problems which arise, and I am confident that it will take every feasible and desirable step within its power to deal successfully with this problem also, and not only the vexing problem of agricultural surpluses, but also the allied one of undue disparity between agricultural prices and cost of production.

Apropos of the western wheat problem, I might say, Mr. Speaker, this matter is being dealt with very ably by speakers from the government benches, and I do not feel called upon to speak about it myself. However, in passing, I noticed the other day that when the Leader of the Opposition was speaking in this debate he suggested that certain low grade western wheat should be sold as feed grain in Ontario, Quebec and abroad. Those are his words as I got them from Hansard.

I should like to point out to the Leader of the Opposition that there are many farmers in the maritimes who are also substantial users of feed grains, and who have benefited greatly by the policy adopted by this government of granting freight assistance for the movement of western feed grains to eastern Canada, which includes the maritimes. Surely, Mr. Speaker, in any scheme to dispose of this low grade western wheat, the maritimes should be considered. I do not think any movement of that wheat eastward should stop in Ontario or Quebec.

In the field of external affairs the need, stressed in the speech from the throne, to maintain a strong North Atlantic Treaty Organization as part of an effective defence system cannot be too strongly urged, and it is my hope that while the military aspects of NATO are developed its economic aspects and implications will not be neglected. Among the organization's aims is the co-operative fostering and strengthening of the economic life of its member states, and today, with the effective waging of war so largely based upon industrial strength, a strong economy is as essential to any nation for defence as a large army or modern air force. Effective defence is closely geared to the economic strength of a nation. Moreover, an impoverished economy in any nation is a direct invitation to communism.

I should also like to commend the government upon its decision to give continued support to the United Nations. And in this connection I wish particularly to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) upon the important role he played in obtaining the recent admission of additional nations to UN membership. To my mind, one of the marked weaknesses of the United Nations has lain in the fact that, with so many qualified states denied admission, it was not truly a representative world organization. The recent increase in its membership has done much to alleviate this situation, and should add greatly to the stature of the organization as a working instrument for the preservation of world peace. The minister can take justifiable pride in the fact that the Canadian delegation, under his guidance, led the way in bringing about this favourable result.

In this debate, Mr. Speaker, the contributions of most members are in part at least a sort of "state of the constituency" message, and I naturally wish to observe the custom by placing before this house some of the needs and aspirations of my own constituency.

In my constituency of Cumberland, Mr. Speaker, the year has been generally a good one, although our farmers have been confronted by difficulties, as have farmers elsewhere. Lumbering and industrial activity has continued at satisfactory levels. The coal mining industry, which, of all our industries, is to me the cause of most concern, has held its own, with the prospect that it can continue to do so, although the seasonal lack of orders during the warm weather months remains a problem for the smaller, independent mine operators.

Here let me say, Mr. Speaker, that while the long-range prospects for our Nova Scotia coal industry encourage no undue optimism, the fact that there has been some improvement during the year indicates the importance to the industry of a high level of industrial activity in Canada generally. Given that, our coal industry may face the future with greater confidence. For example, in my own town of Amherst, which is an industrial town, the high level of industrial activity which I may say has been aided substantially by orders and contracts from this government, has been of very material benefit to the Cumberland coal mining industry.

In this connection also, I should like to suggest to this government that the development of our Canadian steel industry, that great user of coal, particularly in eastern Canada, would be of incalculable benefit to our coal industry and I believe could prove its ultimate salvation. It would certainly remove to a large extent the cloud of uncertainty which still hangs over the future of the industry. Of course, the freight subventions paid by this government, including those of the past year, which were successfully designed to aid Nova Scotia coal in finding a sales outlet in Great Britain and continental Europe, have remained a chief prop of the industry.

I should like to suggest that this government co-operate in every possible way with the provincial governments concerned in an effort to implement the recommendations contained in the Christie report, which envisages the widespread production and distribution of electrical power throughout the maritimes produced by a system of coal-burning steam plants. In my opinion, in the production of electrical power by the use of coal-fired steam plants lies the true future of maritime electrical development, far more than in any hydro development that could be contemplated.

I have said that in my constituency this year has generally been a good one, but in Nova Scotia and in fact throughout the maritimes we need something more than an assurance of a good year. I think more than any other part of Canada we need the assurance of a good future, a stable and prosperous future. Today it borders on the trite to say that, economically and otherwise, Canada has a brilliant and prosperous future. For the country as a whole and for the more fortunate provinces that is entirely true, but if that future is to be brilliant and propitious in every respect, then we must be able to apply that saying with equal aptness to every province of this dominion.

While I do not suggest at the present time that we in the maritimes are facing the future with any pessimism, because we certainly are not, yet we are well aware that, regrettably, and so far inescapably, we are more vulnerable to any adverse economic winds that may begin to blow than any other part of Canada.

It has been said by the Prime Minister that there is a growing spirit of Canadian unity. Again, that is perfectly true, but if that spirit is to reach full fruition efforts must be put forth to ensure that every province of this federated country shall share in an equitable degree in the prosperity and development of the country as a whole. There is nothing more conducive to a spirit of disunity, or at least a spirit of apartness, than the existence of a pronounced gap between the prosperity and economic level of certain provinces and the prosperity and economic level of other provinces. While substantial gains have been made in the less favoured provinces in raising their economic levels, the gap does remain substantial. I think that every effort should be made to see that every province shall enjoy fully an adequate economic level as compared with any other province.

What should be the role of the federal government in this regard? In spite of the somewhat chilling influence of the British North America Act, the concept of the federal government as a significant factor in the economic life of this country has broadened vastly since the days of confederation. Always, of course, the federal government has been accustomed to act within its own jurisdictional fields, as defined by that act, not only to protect the interests of Canada as a whole, but to undertake, wherever real need may exist, such useful projects as fall within those fields, even though primarily calculated to create benefits of merely provincial or at most regional scope. I refer to such things as harbour improvements in Halifax or the building of a canal in Ontario. Nor has this restriction of the benefits in such cases to provincial or regional scope been in itself deemed a valid objection to federal action within federal fields of jurisdiction.

In more recent times, however, we have seen a far-reaching extension of federal activity, sometimes with provincial participation, sometimes without, sometimes with the sanction of a constitutional amendment, sometimes without, into fields where the venerable fathers of confederation, even if they could have envisaged the subjects at all, would never have expected the federal government to poke its nose. There are many instances of this, such as unemployment insurance and assistance, old age assistance, blind and disability pensions, indeed the whole realm of social security. In addition there are such things as the trans-Canada highway, disaster relief and public health. In my opinion these are all prime examples of that slow extension of federal activity into broader and broader fields of national life. In each case, of course, federal participation has been explained by the fact that it is deemed to be a matter of national interest or concern and that to deal with the subject adequately is beyond the available provincial resources.

In my opinion, the over-all effect of these extensions of federal activity and the resulting greater impingement of that activity upon the economy of the country has been to lessen the gap which exists between the economic levels of the less fortunate provinces and those of the more fortunate and therefore to foster in no small degree that spirit of national unity which, as the Prime Minister has said, is indeed growing and steadily knitting this country into a true national entity, however diverse its components.

But the gap, the disparity between the economic levels of the two classes of province, still remains substantial, far too much so. I submit that the federal government should undertake, not tentatively, not sporadically, but as a matter of settled and continuing national policy, the narrowing of that gap, the lessening of that disparity, by every feasible means at its command. Thereby can be achieved a signal contribution to the cause of Canadian unity and true future greatness.

Let me suggest one way in which this government may within its own established constitutional sphere advance such a policy. I think it is generally agreed that the vast concentration of industry in certain restricted areas of the country is to be deprecated. I do not think that anyone would wish to have all industry concentrated in two or three or four small areas of a country. Of course, no one will question the right of the industrialist to locate his plant wherever he considers it most advantageous to do so, but it seems to me that a proper system of allocation of government contracts and orders could be used so that those regions which are most in need of industrial building up would be encouraged. If that were done, not only would those regions, —and of course the maritimes are one of them, —which require greater industrial activity be encouraged to build up their industrial economies; it would also to some degree tend to halt or at least slow down the existing concentration of industry in areas already overdeveloped.

When I say that the government should adopt as a national policy the task of lessening the economic gap between different provinces, it seems to me that this may, and probably would, involve further advances by the federal government into spheres of activity that hitherto have perhaps been considered purely provincial preserves: a greater degree of federal participation and assistance in projects which, in the past at least, would have been considered of only provincial concern. Undoubtedly here constitutional problems cannot be ignored, and, of course, there are many provincial rights and privileges which must be jealously guarded. I am certainly not one to advocate the destruction of any essential provincial rights. Nonetheless, I do submit that the British North America Act, which is the foundation stone of our constitution, never was intended to be in the nature of a straitjacket against legitimate Canadian development, certainly not a rack upon which the economy of any one province should be warped.

The Prime Minister has very properly said that this government must be most careful in expending in any one province moneys raised from the Canadian taxpayers as a body. Certainly such caution is required; nor do I advocate any wholesale federal participation in purely provincial projects. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) this morning propounded a list of questions to which he said the Prime Minister had answered no. There is one question to which the Prime Minister and this government have always said no, and that is to the question, "Will you countenance any wasteful or inexpedient expenditure of public moneys?" I hope they will continue at all times to say no to that question. Nonetheless, if in any of the less favoured provinces there is some useful project which would have the effect of substantially promoting the economic life of that province, and if the financial resources of that province are not adequate to carry the load, I submit that then federal participation in such a project should be deemed legitimate and proper and that, above all, the question of such participation should be faced boldly and not with any undue constitutional qualms. As for the Canadian taxpayers, a wise and sound application of such a policy would in the end prove for them the old story of bread upon the waters.

Turning again to my own province and constituency, I note that there is no mention in the speech from the throne of any specific federal or joint federal-provincial undertaking in Nova Scotia. That is hardly surprising in view of the fact that a number of such projects have only recently been completed, ranging from the Canso causeway to the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry service. Yet I hope that in the not far distant future some speech from the throne will foreshadow the appointment of a royal commission to inquire with the utmost detail into the feasibility, the cost and the economic benefits to be legitimately expected from the construction of a canal across the isthmus of Chignecto.

This matter has been broached in the past and was broached earlier in this debate by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy). I myself have spoken about it on numerous occasions and, like him, I shall continue to do so. I have never been one of those who take the view that we should build the canal first and then discuss the probable economic benefits afterwards. In common with most of those who have given some attention and study to the project, I am reasonably confident that a thorough investigation into the matter by a royal commission would give a favourable answer to the question whether the economic benefits to be derived by the Atlantic provinces, and indeed by Canada as a whole, would justify the expenditures which would be entailed. If that question were once favourably answered, I am confident that the construction of the Chignecto canal would not be long delayed. Certainly the people of the maritimes are entitled to have that question considered and to have it answered definitively once and for all. I therefore urge again the appointment of a royal commission to investigate the matter in its every aspect and to answer that question. I hope and believe the answer will be a favourable one.

The Chignecto canal, when constructed, will lie upon or close to the northern border of my constituency, which, as many know, is connected with the neighbouring New Brunswick constituency of Westmorland by the isthmus of Chignecto, which is of great importance in that it links the mainland of North America to Nova Scotia. If we cross my constituency to the southern side—that is, the Minas basin shore—we find there at the present time a pressing need for another transportation link: the re-establishment of a ferry service from the Cumberland county shore across Minas basin to the Kings county shore. Here a short water trip of approximately seven miles would obviate for commercial and other road traffic a trip around the head of that body of water of some 20 times the distance. Consequently, as a stimulus to commercial road traffic between the Annapolis valley and Cumberland county, eastern and northern New Brunswick, and even so far afield as Quebec and Montreal, that ferry link would be of inestimable benefit. To the tourist trade it would be a natural complement to the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry service which has been recently established. Yet, after many years of operation, that ferry service was discontinued during the last war, and it has not been resumed, in spite of the vastly greater need for it today than ever existed before.

A strong and vigorous association, the Minas basin ferry association, has now been formed to press for assistance in re-establishing this service. The cost of deep water terminals which would enable the ferry, unlike its predecessors, to operate at all stages of the tide, will undoubtedly be substantial. Although I have no doubt that the provincial government would strongly favour this project, yet it may well be that it will fail for lack of financial means unless a measure of federal aid is forthcoming. It is my earnest hope that any representations of the Minas basin ferry association to Ottawa in this connection—and I hope they will be fortified, as I expect they will be, by all available facts and figures to prove the extent of the advantages to the economy of Nova Scotia and the maritimes—will meet with a favourable reception here.

I am aware that, unlike the Chignecto canal, which is a matter entirely within the jurisdictional responsibility of the federal government, the Minas basin ferry service, since it is projected to operate only between two points in the one province, is in a somewhat different category.

Our old friend the British North America Act expressly places ferries operating between two provinces or between Canada and another country within the federal orbit of jurisdiction, but I believe that its silence with regard to ferries operating only between points in one province has been interpreted by our courts as meaning that the latter type of ferry falls within the provincial sphere.

Yet is it not somewhat illogical, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that if the Minas basin ferry happened to operate across the headwaters of the bay of Fundy, let us say, to some point in New Brunswick, it would be a legitimate object of federal bounty, while if it operated only between two points in Nova Scotia it would not be? After all, one of the primary objects of the ferry service would be to promote trade between the Annapolis valley and points in New Brunswick, definitely interprovincial trade. As I said, it would shorten the trucking route very substantially.

Here, I think, is a striking opportunity to apply the principle I was advocating a few moments ago, that if a project will have the effect of materially strengthening the economy of one of the less favoured provinces, yet the project will fail without federal assistance because of lack of provincial financial resources, that project should be a legitimate object of federal participation. There are precedents for subsidies to ferries operating only between provincial points, and in fact prior to its discontinuance during the war this particular ferry enjoyed a modest federal subsidy, though possibly the constitutional question was skirted to some extent there by the fact it was then operated by the Dominion Atlantic Railway, which is a subsidiary of the C.P.R.

In any event, jurisdictional question or not, the matter of federal aid in the re-establishment of this ferry service is certainly one deserving of the most careful and sympathetic consideration, and I earnestly ask that it be given such consideration whenever it is brought to the attention of the government.

There were one or two other matters I wished to mention in connection with my constituency, but I think I will simply refer to one more, the matter of the program of building armouries. This of course concerns the Department of National Defence. I understand there is a need for new armouries at many points in the maritime provinces, and I am particularly concerned about the town of Springhill, which had a very fine record during the last war, and indeed during both wars. Its sons joined the colours freely, fought bravely, and the muster roll of the dead and wounded is very great for a town of that size. The people there support militia training very strongly, yet there is only an old wooden building which serves as an armoury and is most inadequate for the purpose. True, it was fixed up. It was condemned a year or so ago and some money was spent in repairing it. I suppose the militia can carry on with it, but certainly it is not the type of accommodation they should have.

I understand there are many other places where there are perhaps no armouries at all, and that the allotment of funds under the armoury building program is such that it will be years before the program is completed. I think we are all agreed that the problem of national defence is going to continue for years to come as one of the foremost problems of the government. We know that the Geneva spirit evaporated. Personally I never had any expectation that it would do otherwise. For the foreseeable future Canada is going to have to maintain immense armaments and be ready for any eventuality. Surely if that is the case and men are to be trained against the prospect of war they are entitled to every facility to enable them to become efficient soldiers.

Therefore I urge the Department of National Defence to enlarge and hasten the program of building armouries, for after all an armoury is a very important part of the training of the militia. I urge that the program be speeded up, and I sincerely hope that in the very near future the town of Springhill will be provided with a fully adequate armoury.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to add my words of congratulation to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Their speeches were well delivered and well prepared.

It is an unusual fact, sir, that exactly a year ago today at about this time in the afternoon I had the pleasure of following the hon. member who has just completed his speech. There have been many subjects under consideration in this debate and many problems have been presented to the house. The problem I wish to present to hon. members today is the problem of the agriculturists, not only in my own constituency of Lanark but in the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

Yesterday the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) placed before the house the condition of the cheese producers in his own riding and in the province of Ontario generally. I find myself in complete agreement, because in the speech I made a year ago to which I have referred I dealt with this very same matter. I reached the same conclusions; therefore I congratulate him on the speech he has presented to the house dealing with that question.

I am also well aware that there is a problem in the Canadian west in connection with the disposal of wheat, a problem that is apparently causing hardship to the farmers. I am aware that the marketing of wheat is important to the whole economy of Canada. In dealing with the question of dairy products today may I say that I have not changed my position with regard to the importation of New Zealand cheese. I find there is a desire even in my own riding that some form of protection should be afforded the dairy farmers, and they have even asked for protection on cheese at the rate of so much per pound.

But I wish today to take up the question of butter and the surpluses existing in Canada at the present time. This is another problem of the dairy industry that we had last year. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has consistently pointed out that there is no surplus of butter, and I might say he couples with that the statement that if we sell ten or twelve million pounds there will be no surplus of butter in Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: No troublesome surplus.

Mr. Blair: Oh, "troublesome" has entered into the picture. That is a little different.

Mr. Gardiner: It has always been in there.

Mr. Blair: I note that on December 23 in a letter to the Winnipeg Tribune the Minister of Agriculture sought to clarify his viewpoint, and he stated at that time:

> I said in every statement I have made that after we have sold ten to twelve million pounds of butter there will be no real surplus in Canada. We require what is left to have a sufficient supply of butter at all points across the country.

It does seem odd to me that we will have no surplus if we get rid of ten or twelve million pounds. Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in a very optimistic speech to the house—and I have no doubt he has grounds for his optimism—pointed out the heavy demand for such commodities as iron, copper and nickel. This will have little bearing on the financial condition of the farmers in my riding, where one of the chief occupations is dairy farming.

I find the position of the Minister of Agriculture difficult to understand in view of his persistent statement that there is no surplus, when reputable statistics reveal a surplus varying anywhere from 50 to 60 million pounds. It is a peculiar fact that speeches made either by himself or by others interested seem to take a certain line. We even find such statements made by officials of his own department. This line seems to take the following viewpoint: "The production and the consumption of butter are gradually getting closer together."

We hear that on all sides. It may be that in the long run they are getting closer together. We may be approaching the place where the production of butter may be equal to the domestic consumption, but we are a long way from that position. This result could only be achieved by an increase in the population of this country of possibly several million people. At the rate people are coming into this country—at rates accomplished by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, judged by last year's figures—that period is many years away.

The Minister of Agriculture has attempted to place himself in a position—at least it seems that way to me—wherein any attempt to criticize this surplus might be regarded as unpatriotic. First he points out that a certain amount is required for pipe-line needs. I think we would all agree in this house that we have had enough controversial debates about pipe lines without bringing in the butter situation. But at all events he points out the need for a supply of butter to the consumers. Then he points out that a large amount of butter is required for stabilization. That large amount of butter is somewhat indefinite. He points out that any amount is not surplus. His position is simply this. There is no surplus after we get rid of the surplus. You remember the old saw; if we had some bacon and if we had some eggs, we could have eggs and bacon.

Let us consider the position in Canada at the present time. The Canadian government floor price on butter is 58 cents per pound. The sale made to Czechoslovakia was at 37 cents a pound. But at the time that sale was made—the house was sitting last June and July—vigorous protests were made about the sale at that price to the communists. In the meantime New Zealand has protested to Canada against sales of this type. Since last fall the Canadian government has protested to the United States with regard to the United States policy of wheat marketing. New Zealand has now accused Canada of being guilty of the same sort of thing with butter as the United States is doing with wheat. The Canadian government has given assurance to New Zealand that our sales of butter on the world market would not be injurious to New Zealand trade. It is therefore apparent that in the government's policy there is some conflict between the marketing of butter and the marketing of wheat.

As I said, the first sale of butter to Czechoslovakia was in July of 1955. One must note that it was sold for export at a lower price than the market value here. It therefore did not interfere with the world price, which at that time was about 41 cents a pound. The cost of shipment in this case will be 3 cents a pound, and another 3 cents could be allowed if it were necessary for making it salt-free.

Another opportunity arose in November to sell eight million pounds to East Germany. In this case the price was 37 cents, which could be considered the London price less the cost of shipping. This month there is a further sale of one million pounds to Czechoslovakia at 39 cents a pound, but a new factor has entered into the business and that is probably the cause of the protest which New Zealand has made. I refer to the fact that there has been a rise in the world price of butter of about 9 cents a pound in the last few weeks. The price in London is now approximately 48 or 49 cents for Australian butter, slightly higher for New Zealand butter, and again a slightly higher rate for Danish butter. These are the sales which the government has made in an attempt to get rid of its so-called surplus. In view of all the statements that have been made the question arises, what is the amount of surplus butter on hand?

The province of Manitoba has entered into the dispute. Their department of agriculture has made a statement to the effect that the real surplus of butter amounts to about 50 million pounds. The national dairy council of Canada gives a much higher figure. Based on dominion bureau of statistics data I was able to work out the following statistics, and I should like to present them to the house. This is a table of dairy production and consumption trends. First we consider the livestock population of this country as of June 1, the number of milk cows on the farm. I go back for several years in arriving at these conclusions:

DAIRY PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION TRENDS

LIVESTOCK POPULATION (June 1st)—	1951	1952	1953	1954	1955

* In recent weeks product being sold under brand name coloured spreads with heavy promotion in province of Quebec with nearly one-third of total population.

As the table suggests, in recent weeks a product has been sold in the province of Quebec under the name of coloured spreads, and the province of Quebec has a very large population. No doubt the sales of that spread will go up and will help to maintain a higher average of edible oil consumption in the Dominion of Canada. I have another interesting table here on creamery butter production and stocks estimates. It is as follows:

Creamery Butter Production and Stocks Estimates	lbs.	lbs.
December 1, 1955—Stock ..	114,073,000
Estimated production Dec.-Apr. (+ 10 per cent over last year)	76,431,000

		(alternative)
Estimated domestic disappearance Dec.-Apr. (same as last year)	114,225,000	117,423,000 (+ 2·8% pop.)
Estimated exports	3,000,000	3,000,000
Total disappearance	117,225,000	120,423,000

In regard to production, it has been said that last year was a bad year for production in the province of Ontario. There is no doubt that parts of this province had one of the most severe droughts that we have had for years. It was one of the driest years on record, and one would have thought that would have had considerable effect on the output of dairy products. Yet throughout the whole period of the summer production remained steady, or there was a slight increase. Therefore this fact will not bear out the argument that a large supply on hand is required in case of an emergency. I believe that figures are sometimes tiresome and difficult to listen to, but on the other hand facts must be brought out.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member realizes that he left out dairy butter.

Mr. Blair: I will speak on the dairymen later. I know the minister says that. He has already given warning that we must not talk about stocks of butter and we must not talk about butter in storage.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not saying that at all. I am simply saying that you cannot operate in this country without a storage of butter in the summer to carry the consumers through the winter.

Mr. Blair: I know we cannot. Therefore in general, sir, these figures would show an estimated stock of over 60 million pounds of butter on hand. Included in the set of figures I have given is the consumption of oleomargarine.

In considering this whole matter I gave warning to the Department of Agriculture, and to the whole dairy industry, that for some unexplained reason the fact is not yet realized that edible oil products are making dangerous inroads into the dairy industry; that at the present time at least one-third of the dairy industry market is gone, and that the milk producers are being lulled to sleep by statements that these products are not presenting the danger that was at first considered.

When the daily newspapers across Canada, about September 1, told the story of the sale of butter to East Germany, there was included as part of the story the following:

> Government statistics show total butter consumption as continuing to go up although per capita consumption has remained about the same. In any event, margarine has not made the inroads on sales that it was feared it would.

There might be a grain of truth in the statement that would make it palatable to some, but there are other facts which have not been taken into consideration. In fact I consider that some facts are not known and they should be known. Some of these things have been distorted. No account has been taken of the growth in our population, and the fact remains that the consumption of butter has been standing still in recent years, despite the fact that our population has increased by more than two million people.

If we consider it on a per capita basis, there is no doubt that in view of our population growth it is clearly proven that the dairy farmers have lost one-third of their market owing to the inroads of edible oils. Figures have been juggled, and the dairy farmer is presented with a figure that is calculated to lull him to sleep under false security. If we consider the statement that there has been no loss, we find that the revised figure for the 1948 total butter consumption, before margarine, was 342 million pounds. In 1954 it was 312 million pounds, which would show a loss of 30 million pounds.

In the first year after substitutes were allowed the per capita consumption dropped to 22·11 pounds, and in 1954 there was a further drop to 20·69 pounds. In the year 1954, the year of substitutes, the consumption of those substitutes showed an increase of 10·9 pounds. This occurred in eight of the provinces where it was legal. This clearly shows the loss to the Canadian dairyman of a third of his market. This is a problem which the Canadian government should fully realize, and it should appreciate that it has grave responsibility in this respect. If action is not taken in this matter the Canadian dairy industry, as a great industry of the Dominion of Canada, will become a thing of the past.

It has become a fact, Mr. Speaker, that we have arrived at the unusual position where agriculture has become depressed, while there may be and is a boom in other sections of our economy.

In this same debate a year ago I pointed out the importance to our whole economy of the buying power of 450,000 dairy farmers in the Dominion of Canada, who together with their families and all the people who are connected with the dairy trade consume large quantities of manufactured goods. In fact the average farmer buys in the proportion of four to one as much in goods of every description as does the average urban consumer. Not only does he buy the necessities for his household, but he buys the products of industry in the nature of farm implements and machinery which he uses in his work on the farm. However, one thing is becoming increasingly apparent; that is, that the value of farm production is dropping; yet the farmer is still faced with high costs of the goods he buys while farm prices have not been increased. While this may make for cheaper food products, yet it is a condition of unbalanced economy which cannot be favourable to a great industry.

Then, sir, I would like to point out to you that at a meeting in London, Ontario, last week the Ontario chamber of commerce seemed to be very much aware of this situation. They agree that farm people are aware of the seriousness of the cost-price squeeze which has drastically cut farm income, and they are ready to discuss this matter.

The Minister of Agriculture in his speeches has taken pains to point out the fact that a large quantity of butter is considered necessary beyond immediate needs, to stabilize the price of butter, and he has pointed out that shortage of butter in one year brought extremely high prices to domestic consumers. Surpluses of some farm products and the recent developments in international trade have placed many Ontario farmers in a hopeless competitive position. The winter of 1951 was the year butter approached a price of 85 cents. It was known to the Department of Agriculture, months before, that a serious shortage of butter was in sight.

Mr. Gardiner: The year you started your statistics, too.

Mr. Blair: Yes. In fact it should have been known to the Department of Agriculture six months before this price was reached because in October, 1950, the board of directors of the national dairy council brought this matter to the attention of the government at a meeting with the chairman of the agricultural prices support board. They discussed this matter of the high prices that butter would reach unless steps were taken to increase the supply of butter through importations, with a view to protecting the people and preventing such a condition occurring.

The only way in which a rise could be prevented was by having on hand a sufficient supply of butter to prevent such a shortage and a consequent rise in price. Four months later the same organization, the national dairy council, again inquired if there was enough butter on hand to meet the needs of the consumers, and asked if any action had been contemplated by the agricultural prices support board to make sure that such a stock was on hand to relieve the situation.

This would seem to clarify the situation when the minister, in his speeches, points out that he is holding a large stock of butter on hand in order to stop speculation and to stabilize the market. However, during January and February of the year 1951 the trade was responsible for the importation of about 5 million pounds of butter to meet the shortage. When the agreement for the importation of 5 million pounds had been completed, order in council No. 372 was passed dated January 24, 1951, at the instigation of the Minister of Agriculture, prohibiting any further imports.

It is a rather amazing fact that three days later the order in council was rescinded. This fact would seem to refute any arguments of the Minister of Agriculture that he has been responsible for the protection of the consumers, and his arguments of this date concerning the stabilizing of the price of butter. At the present time no doubt he uses this argument about stabilizing the price when he has an enormous quantity on hand.

The floor price of 58 cents per pound is absolutely necessary, because without a floor price of this amount there would be utter chaos in the whole dairy industry. However, in consideration of present conditions there are certain facts which we must recognize.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend is through with the other matter of importation, will he permit a question?

Mr. Blair: Yes, but I am going to finish this speech and then the minister can finish his speech later.

There is a trend toward increasing production, and even some increase in consumption. The argument that consumption and production will balance within the next year cannot be proven, nor will this occur for many years to come, assuming that these rates continue, until Canada obtains a larger domestic market. As I stated before, a larger domestic market will only occur in the event of greater immigration to this country and an increase in its population. The development of our natural resources and increased manufacturing in Canada will necessitate a larger population and hence the increased market. A population increase of ten million people or more would take care of all our agricultural products, and possibly we would have none for export except wheat.

There is one bright spot in this picture and it concerns my own profession, because doctors are continually warning us to be discreet in our diet. There has been an attempt by those who market food to advise us to eat more butter, meat, apples, cheese and a hundred other prepared products. It is quite obvious that we might destroy our health by stuffing ourselves in an attempt to stabilize conditions, and thereby might suffer from indigestion. In this regard I might point out that under present conditions the government in its attempt to deal with surplus products is suffering a great deal from political indigestion.

It is not sufficient to obliterate the facts in this serious matter of agricultural commodities with a maze of figures. The facts must be faced, and no attempt made to create an optical illusion by figures will satisfy the Canadian farmer who finds himself in serious difficulty.

The dairy industry is vital to the economy of large segments of Canada. The government must come to grips with this problem; otherwise we are going to see the deterioration of an industry highly important to the economy of Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: Is it not correct that in 1951 17 million pounds of butter were brought in, during the period spoken of?

Mr. Blair: That is quite possibly so.

Mr. Gardiner: You gave earlier the figure of 5 million pounds.

Mr. Blair: At the same time there was an order in council, that lasted three days, against any further importation.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, but the butter was brought in.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all join with those who have preceded me in this debate in congratulating the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The way in which these two hon. members acquitted themselves has brought honour not only to themselves but to the constituencies which they represent.

I am sure I am expressing the sentiments of all of us in this house when I say that we are happy to see the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) again in good health and now able to continue with his duties.

I wish to inform this house with considerable regret that last Thursday in my constituency one of the old pioneers by the name of Wasyl Eleniak passed away. At the time of his death he had passed his 96th birthday. I mention his name because he was the first settler of Ukrainian origin who came to Canada. He and another man by the name of Pylypiwsky arrived in Canada in 1891, just 65 years ago. Mr. Eleniak was a fine example of a good Canadian, one who had vision and faith. After his arrival he witnessed the coming to Canada of thousands and thousands of his fellow countrymen who made their homes here. He also witnessed the contribution which those people made to Canada, both culturally and economically. Those people came from a land where they knew nothing but tyranny and oppression, and he witnessed the enthusiasm, the zeal and the love with which those people embraced their newly adopted land.

During the course of this debate considerable reference has been made to the wheat situation which exists in this country. As one representing a rural constituency engaged primarily in agriculture I should like to deal with the problem we are faced with in the marketing of our grain. I do this because I think there has been a lot of misrepresentation. There has been a barrage of criticism; and many uninformed solutions, such as barter trades, the acceptance of soft currencies, the acceptance of other fancy deals, have been suggested which if carried out would almost certainly have the tendency to destroy the wheat board system of marketing our grain.

We are all aware that there is a problem today which faces the western producer. The wheat board faces greater difficulty in the marketing of grain than at any time since the last war. The government is aware of this situation and has indicated this in the speech from the throne in the following words:

> Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being. In particular, although sales of wheat in the past five years have been at record levels, an unprecedented series of bumper harvests has made necessary the storage of abnormal stocks of grains both in elevators and on farms.

I think that is a clear, concise and frank statement which recognizes the problem.

Everyone knows that the marketing of wheat is not merely a Canadian problem, it is international in scope. I should like to refer to a statement made in the house by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who has been a very strong critic of this government. I want to quote his figures as they appear on page 94 of Hansard of January 13. The hon. member said:

> Already embarrassing world supplies of wheat have been augmented by a 1955 world total production of 7,300 million bushels, compared with a 1945-49 average of 5,895 million bushels and a 1935-39 average of 6,085 million bushels. By reference to some of these figures of production we see that we have accumulated close to 1 billion bushels of surplus wheat in the world for 1955 alone.

Let us consider the situation in France. We find that in 1935-39 France imported annually 2·5 million bushels of wheat, but in 1955 France exported 92 million bushels of wheat. We find the same situation existing in other countries. This is due to the fact that there has been a heavy subsidization of wheat production in many countries of the world. This has been one important factor in the creation of this problem, and one over which the Canadian government had no direct control. All Canada can do, and I believe this is what we are trying to do, is to convince the importing countries that when the exporting countries are able to meet their needs it is not economically sound to encourage production by means of high internal prices.

Another factor which has contributed to the wheat problem and over which Canada has no control is the method followed by the United States in the disposal of their surplus grain. When we compare Canada with the United States we find that the population of the United States is over ten times that of Canada. We find that of every five bushels of wheat which they produce they are able to consume four bushels right at home. They can almost afford to give away the other bushel, or if they preferred they could even dump it in the ocean. Out of every five bushels of wheat produced in Canada we can hardly consume one bushel. We must find an export market for the other four bushels.

Since the United States has had thrust upon her a position of leadership in the western world she has felt compelled to give aid to many of these countries, and as one method of getting rid of her wheat she is disposing of it in the form of foreign aid. This country cannot afford the luxury of competing with the United States in the methods they use to dispose of their wheat.

A third and I think the most important reason for this problem, and one over which this government could hardly have any direct control, is the superabundant crops we have had in Canada during the last five years. Reference to the Canadian wheat board report as revised—these figures have been quoted already—will show that for the years 1941-50 the average wheat crop was 362 million bushels, whereas during the last five years the average crop according to my computation was 506 million bushels. The world is simply not in position or is not able to absorb this five year record crop production in Canada, and the result has been that some has had to be carried over on the farms and in elevators.

As I say, the government of Canada has had no direct control over these three important factors which have caused the present world wheat problem.

In spite of these difficulties, what has the government succeeded in doing? I might say that in spite of strong protests from many quarters of Canada, the federal government has respected and upheld the wishes of the western producer by maintaining the wheat board system of grain marketing. This is a very important matter for the farmer of western Canada, who has been fighting for this for so many years. The farmer remembers the hungry thirties, a similar period of unsold surpluses, when in Alberta wheat sold for as low as 18 cents a bushel and at the same time no significant reduction was made in the surpluses.

The wheat board has adopted a policy whereby it has refused to handle surpluses by selling at greatly reduced prices. The wheat board levels things off. It does not throw our wheat on the world market. That does not mean to say it has to sit back and wait. It must be realistic, but it does not have to have a fire sale of the wheat.

Let us look at the record. If we refer to the wheat board report we may see what the farmer has been able to sell during these record crop years as compared with other years. If we take the ten-year period we find in the wheat board report the following round figures, obtained from the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada, of producers' marketings of western Canadian grains: 1941-42, 227 million bushels; 1942-43, 267 million bushels; 1943-44, 329 million bushels; 1944-45, 351 million bushels; 1945-46, 237 million bushels; 1946-47, 335 million bushels; 1947-48, 247 million bushels; 1948-49, 294 million bushels; 1949-50, 320 million bushels; 1950-51, 368 million bushels. The average, according to my computation, is 295½ million bushels annually. Compare that with the crop years 1951-52 and following. The figures, again, are as follows: 1951-52, 455 million bushels; 1952-53, 535 million bushels; 1953-54, 397 million bushels; 1954-55, 319 million bushels. Again according to my computation, this comes to 427 million bushels annually. At the same time we find that, having sold better than average crops each and every year, prices have been maintained at a fairly high level.

When it comes to the question of coarse grains, the wheat board has encountered no serious difficulties during this bumper crop period and, according to reports, none are expected to be encountered for this crop year. I might also state that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has visited the province of Alberta and has made the statement —as I believe he has made the statement in this house—that it is anticipated that even this year's crop, a better than average crop, will be sold. Therefore if during the superabundant crop years we can sell a better than average crop at fairly good price levels without resorting to fire sales, without getting panicky and without getting into some of these fancy deals such as barter trades and soft currency deals, that is what the western farmer expects the board to do and continue to do.

We have heard a good deal said, especially in western Canada, about barter trade. I should like to say a word or two in connection with this matter. Our Canadian economy is as free as any economy in the world. Anything can be imported into Canada from anywhere, subject to our customs duties. Barter is a two-way trade. It ties one down and relates a certain product to another product.

Let us take an example. Let us assume that Canada has made a deal with West Germany whereby for a certain number of bushels of wheat we would get from West Germany 10,000 thrashing combines. That would imply that once we got these combines in this country the government would have to tell the farmer he would have to buy one of them. The government would be responsible for seeing that these combines were sold to the farmers. I wonder whether that is what the farmers or Canadians in general would want. It would mean that we would be imposing on the Canadian people federal controls which the Canadian people are not prepared to accept. It seems to me that barter is a most restrictive type of trade.

One hears of another solution, not only in the province of Alberta but also in the province of Saskatchewan and to some extent in Manitoba. There are those who tell you the convenient political myth that Canada should accept soft currencies for wheat. They create the impression that they have an easy answer to our wheat problem, whereas in fact they have no answer at all. When you say "accept soft currency", you mean "accept inconvertible currency". Of course there is no problem if it is convertible, for then you talk in terms of dollars. For example, Britain has convertible sterling and it also has blocked currency which is inconvertible. The wheat sold to Britain by many countries is sold for convertible sterling. The British tell their importers that they may buy wheat in any country of the world. It is significant to note that, as has already been mentioned in this house, the British trade commissioner recently said that Britain would not buy wheat from Canada for blocked sterling. Yet the United Kingdom in the past year bought more wheat from Canada than from all the other countries of the world combined.

It is true that the United States in some cases sells for non-convertible currency and uses that currency for expenses in foreign countries, including the building of airfields and in different forms of foreign aid. In connection with the subject of inconvertible currency or soft currency, I should like to read an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on December 15, 1955, under the heading "The Sterling Myth". The reason I read the editorial is that I think it gives a very good answer to those people who are peddling this solution to the producers of western Canada. The editorial reads:

> The people who say that Canada could and should "sell" wheat for sterling fall into two classes. Some do not know what they are talking about, and some do; the latter, that is, know they are talking nonsense. But it is convenient nonsense, and particularly convenient for some Saskatchewan socialists; it gives an impression that they have a simple, government-dealing, non-capitalist answer to our wheat troubles, when in fact they have no answer at all.
> For this reason, the myth that "sales" for sterling are possible and desirable no doubt will persist, in face of the most direct and simple evidence to the contrary. There are none so blind as those that do not want to see. But one is entitled to hope that the Saskatchewan mythmongers will in time gain fewer dupes; that their allies of the other class—the ill-informed—will shrink.
> Two weeks ago, on November 30, Mr. Gordon Bowen spoke to the convention of the Saskatchewan farmers' union. He said that Britain would not buy a bushel more wheat if Canada accepted payment in sterling. Mr. Bowen is the United Kingdom's senior trade commissioner in Canada; if anyone ought to know the official British policy in this matter, it is he. And his pronouncement surely is concrete enough, and sufficiently simple, to penetrate any head. Even those who profess not to be able to understand the most definite and simple statements of the case, made many times by Mr. Howe and other Canadians, may pay some attention to the official word of Britain as the buying country.

The editorial goes on:

> There is one direct untruth that may, however, have to be disposed of first. It is sometimes said, by advocates of Canadian "sales" for sterling, that the United States now makes such sales. It does not.

The United States takes inconvertible foreign currencies from all kinds of countries whose currencies play no great part in international trade; whose governments therefore do not mind having such claims on them blocked in the hands of other governments; and which have no objection to living on charity.

The United Kingdom, for all its economic weakness, is not that sort of country, and sterling is not an unimportant currency. Sterling that is not blocked—sterling that can be used at all—is the same thing as dollars, to Britain and to everyone else. To take payment in such sterling would be no different at all from what we do now. Blocked sterling, on the other hand, is useless to Canada—it means simply giving wheat away—and to the United Kingdom the exchange of blocked sterling for wheat would represent a further weakening in the status of sterling as an international currency. The Canadian advocates of sterling sales are apt to pose as friends of Britain, even though it be at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer. In fact, they are not anything of the kind. They are doing nothing at all but peddle a convenient political myth.

I think that is a very good answer to those who do in fact peddle this convenient political myth. We have also heard criticism in the house by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to the effect that we should have a more aggressive sales policy with respect to the sale of wheat. I do not think selling wheat to other countries is the same thing as selling Fuller brushes or vacuum cleaners, but the fact is that in the last few months members of the wheat board and officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce have visited the major wheat importing countries. These countries include Japan, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, Sweden, Finland, Germany, Belgium, Holland, Spain, Portugal, Italy and Austria. In addition to these visits we have the efforts made by the Canadian trade commissioners in these countries.

At the same time the Canadian wheat board has invited representatives from wheat importing countries to visit Canada. We have had visitors from Japan, the United Kingdom, Brazil, Colombia, Peru, Switzerland, Ireland, Ecuador, Venezuela and Germany, so they could see for themselves how our grain is produced, how it is being stored, how it is being inspected and how it is being handled, because we believe we have the best system in the world and we want the world to know.

The government has made other efforts. As a result of direct action on the part of the government we find that there has been an increase in storage facilities through additions to the Halifax terminal elevators and the elevators at Churchill, and through a system of accelerated depreciation to elevator companies either at country points or terminals. In the last two and a half years there has been a total increase in storage accommodation of nearly 40 million bushels.

The only point I should like to suggest to the government, especially the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is that whereas the privilege of accelerated depreciation is accorded to elevator companies under which they may write off for income tax purposes over a period of three years any building they erect for storage, the same consideration should be given to farmers who store their grain on their own farms. Instead of being able to write off depreciation for income tax purposes over a period of 20 years they should be able to do so in the same period of three years as in the case of the elevator companies.

Finally I should like to say that the western farmer expects, the western farmer insists, that the policy of the government be, first of all, to maintain the wheat board system of marketing. The farmers have fought for the wheat board for many years and they do not want to lose it. Second, the wheat board together with the Department of Trade and Commerce should continue to follow aggressive sales methods by selling as they have been selling, especially during the years of better than average crops. Third, the wheat board together with the Department of Trade and Commerce should endeavour to maintain a fairly high price level by refusing to get panicky, by refusing to resort to fire sale prices, by refusing to indulge in the suggested barter trading or the acceptance of soft currencies or other fancy deals which would have the tendency that the farmer would get less for his wheat or the taxpayers would be burdened with more taxes. I also express the hope, and of course this is beyond the control of the government, that for the crop year 1956 we will have another bumper crop in the west.

Mr. Charles Yuill (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to add my congratulations to those already expressed to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. During this debate the discussion has centred largely around agriculture, and I think rightly so because agriculture is our basic industry. It is actually the keystone of our whole economy.

We find, however, that, in spite of the apparent over-all buoyancy of our economy last year, we have many problems pertaining to our basic industry. We find that agriculture is perhaps in as precarious a position as it has ever found itself in for a number of years. We find that farm income has shrunk by better than a billion dollars in the last four years; to be exact, by $1,200 million.

By the same token, we find that agriculture embraces some 20 per cent of our population. Reducing the matter a little further, we find that they have received, in their own right, much less than 10 per cent of the national income, or in other words less than 50 cents on the dollar as compared to their fair share of the national wealth.

When you honestly appraise the whole situation I think you will find that something must be wrong somewhere down the line. I think it is the responsibility of parliament to sit down and soberly and intelligently appraise the whole situation. Instead of getting out and beating political drums I think it is our responsibility as human beings, charged with a grave responsibility, to deal honestly and sincerely with our problems rather than to reduce the matter to a political drum-beating level.

I believe one of the things that perhaps has influenced the depressed standards prevailing throughout agriculture is the fact that agriculture is always in a price-cost squeeze. The farmer is always obliged to buy on a controlled market. By the same token, he is always compelled to sell his commodities on an uncontrolled market.

Another thing that I think has contributed quite considerably to the plight of our economy today dates back to about 1944 or 1945 when, through the medium of the Bretton Woods agreement, the trader nations were obligated to go to the moneychangers and change their pounds sterling or their other currency into terms of Canadian or United States dollars. I think that was when many of our former substantial customers were forced, as a matter of self-preservation, to try to become self-sufficient with regard to the growing of wheat.

True enough, in many cases it was apparently necessary to subsidize the wheat-growing industry in those countries in order to encourage their farmers to take over and try to produce in terms of self-sufficiency. As was mentioned just a few moments ago, I believe France was a striking example. We used to sell France a considerable amount of wheat, but now, for that very reason, she has become a surplus producer of wheat. According to figures submitted just a few moments ago they marketed some 92 million bushels of wheat on their own.

I am certainly not one of those who feel unhappy about having a surplus. I do not think there is anything wrong about it. I think it is something to be happy about. But I believe our basic problem is one of distribution. I think we have fairly well mastered the art of producing, but I do not think we have done a good job in the technique of distribution. In spite of the fact that we have a billion or more bushels of surplus wheat in Canada today, on the world market I do not think it amounts to a surplus at all. When you realize that three out of every five people in the world will go to bed hungry tonight, it does not seem to me that the problem is altogether one of lack of production. We have the production here but we have not the medium through which it can be distributed to the needy people of the world.

We hear a great deal about ways and means. Some people are critical of the suggestions we have offered on more than one occasion. With regard to international trade, we should consider a mutual agreement policy whereby we will trade, on equivalent values, one commodity for another. We find that this procedure has worked previously. We find that it is being used today.

I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not take kindly to barter, but yesterday I was agreeably surprised to hear that there is at least one member of the Liberal party who believes in barter trade. I enjoyed very much the speech of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer). He was loud in his praises of a barter deal that was consummated by the province of British Columbia. He seemed to be quite happy with it. I think it was a good stroke of business. The only thing with which I could disagree is the fact that he took credit for the Liberal government of British Columbia. I wonder if he has forgotten that British Columbia has had a Social Credit government for almost four years and that they were the ones who carried to such a successful conclusion that little barter deal.

Mr. Philpott: No; it was the federal Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) who carried it to a conclusion.

Mr. Quelch: Get the Minister of Trade and Commerce to page the Minister of Fisheries. Then you might learn something about barter deals.

Mr. Martin: Oh, let us hold our tempers here.

Mr. Yuill: So long as parliament sits here I suppose there will always be differences of opinion as to the proper techniques to use. I was going to say I think this is a problem that has reached the proportions of a crisis. It is not a crisis, particularly, but it is a situation that calls for the best thinking from every group in this house. I think it is quite possible to find some acceptable medium through which we can deal with our trader nations without getting too hot and bothered about soft currencies, barter or anything else. I believe it is essential that we do so. But when we get to the point of setting up barriers that will not permit us to deal on those reasonable and natural levels, I think it is time we had a look at the situation and tried to do something about changing it.

So far as our production today is concerned, looking at it from a world point of view I do not think we have any surpluses at all. With the growing population in the world today, before many years I think we may have the problem of producing enough to feed those people, if we can do it. We are doing a good job of it now.

Then I believe we should give a little bit more thought to the main problem, at least as I see it. I refer to the problem of distribution. We have heard a lot about butter and butter surpluses, and the medium through which our butter is being sold. I am one of those people who believe that there is such a thing as charity. Charity should begin at home. If we are going to give anything away we should start first of all by giving to our own Canadian citizens who are in the low income brackets. We should give to the war veterans, the senior citizens, the mothers on mothers' allowances, blind pensioners, physically handicapped pensioners and others receiving social benefits today.

If the government took a little more realistic view of the matter and enclosed in the envelopes of the recipients of those pensions five butter coupons every month, they could take them to me or to some other merchant and get five pounds of butter for 37 cents a pound. The merchant in turn could cash them in and replace the five pounds of butter. If we did that we would be doing something that would be not only beneficial to the internal economy but we would be practising Christian and moral ethics that would be worth while as well.

If the time ever comes when we have to give something away, we should start at home. I know there are arguments that it would disrupt the butter trade in Canada. I just wonder whether it would. Many people in those income brackets who would receive butter are not able to buy butter today. They either have to go without it or resort to buying margarine as a substitute. I was at a convention in Alberta not long ago, and the delegates were hot and bothered about whether or not margarine should be coloured. If butter were made available to underprivileged people at fire sale prices, instead of shipping it behind the iron curtain, we would be doing something of which we could be proud.

[Mr. Yuill.]

As far as agriculture is concerned, I believe the government has given serious thought to the best ways and means of helping. Personally I feel that the two-price system would help solve the problem confronting agriculture in this country. Through that medium we would at least have some semblance of parity and some evidence of a reasonable equation between the cost of production and the amount received from the sale of the product. However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to feel that this would not be a wise move.

I am not questioning the point particularly. From what I can get from the speech from the throne I feel that the sum total of the assistance to agriculture is geared to the $1,500 limit loan at 5 per cent. I come from a community that is basically agricultural. I am just wondering how many farmers will be able to avail themselves of it, desirable as it may be. Very few in my part of the country will be able to qualify. If some of my constituents already have a commitment at the bank I wonder what the reaction of the banker will be? Will the farmer be required to apply the loan to his former commitment? If so, then he will be deprived of any assistance under this new arrangement. I wonder whether there will be any stipulation that this must be a loan independent of any other commitment that an individual may have with the bank.

That is something of great importance to all concerned. We should be willing to sit down and try to come up with the best answers. It would be a wise man who could give a complete answer to this question. Until we are prepared to sit down like human beings and deal with these things we shall never accomplish too much. In our group we have always been champions of agriculture. Many of my colleagues have already expressed the views of this group pertaining to our attitude toward farm-stored grain; therefore I shall not deal with it. I should like to predict that as far as the $1,500 loan is concerned it is going to be a great disappointment to many people who are so urgently in need of special consideration. I am not going to deal any further with agricultural difficulties.

I offer my congratulations to the Minister of Public Works for finally completing the government building in the town of Edson in my constituency. It was a long and perilous detour, but at last we are getting the building in the town that we have needed for many years. On behalf of my people, I express thanks to the Minister of Public Works for getting on with the erection of that much-needed building.

We have another little problem in that part of the country. It relates to what some day is going to be the best part of the trans-Canada highway in the Dominion of Canada, namely Jasper. We have a road that goes through from Jasper to the British Columbia boundary. It will be known some day as the west gate of Jasper national park. There is a road which is passable in fair weather. It is a road that ultimately will be the route of the new trans-Canada highway. What the people in that part of the country would like to see is some favourable consideration by the minister concerned to building that road up to a standard that would be compatible with transportation that would no doubt enhance the tourist aspects of Jasper national park. Last year, according to provincial statistics we had an increase of something over 11 per cent in the number visiting Jasper national park. Since that is one of the show places of the dominion I think anything the department could do to establish a through route from Jasper to the west gate would be not only appreciated but would enhance the tourist trade, particularly, would greatly enhance the public service, and would be welcomed by those who are desirous of coming through from British Columbia into Alberta.

We have in Alberta, up to the east gate, one of the finest highways in Canada. As a matter of fact it is definitely up to trans-Canada standards. It is not completed but it should be, weather permitting, this year. If it is not finished this year, at the latest it will be finished next year.

In British Columbia they have a commitment by the provincial government that they will build a standard highway to the west gate of Jasper national park. If that is done, then I would urge the minister to give consideration to that much-needed connecting link that today is only navigable under very hazardous conditions; to go out there and begin the plan in the not too distant future, and see to it that sufficient money is voted for the completion of that program.

There is one other little suggestion I would like to make, and I do this in all kindliness. In the town of Jasper I think the people have contributed quite considerably to the tourist set-up from many different angles. They perhaps do not contribute as much in dollars and cents as people living in cities out of the park, but they do contribute in their own way quite a considerable amount of money. They do possess a considerable amount of good will, and without the people of Jasper I am sure that park would be anything but the wonderful summer resort it is today for tourists.

I would suggest to the minister that he give consideration to setting up some kind of council comparable to that proposed to be set up in the Northwest Territories. These fine people could sit down and by popular choice delegate to two or three or four or any reasonable number the responsibility of co-operating with the local government administration. I think the people would be quite qualified to offer kindly suggestions and by their mutual good will and co-operation enhance the over-all public relations within the town of Jasper.

With all due respect to those who are charged with the responsibility of looking after the park affairs there, I do feel that it would lighten their job. It would pay off in many ways, financially as well as in terms of good will. I would ask the minister if he will think that over, and I hope that in the not too distant future we may have a little more harmony and that over-all good will that I feel is so essential to the happiness of the people who are obliged to live within the confines of the national park.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am very happy to be here listening to the speeches from both sides of the house. I think you will agree that the speeches delivered up to the present time have had more pep in them than at any time in the last 20 years.

I want to welcome the new members to the house. There are a great number, and if I would be allowed to give advice to the new members I would say, always be sure of what you are going to say and be sure that it is right. I would like to welcome the page boys. All but two are new this year. Perhaps we forget the boys who are, in a sense, a very essential part of the efficient carrying on of the business of this house. We bid them welcome.

I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on his initiative in doing new things. Of course I support him in his congratulations to the mover and seconder of the motion in reply to the speech from the throne. I just want to second what he has said. Also we do like to think that our Prime Minister is capable of doing new things. It was a new thing to request a lady member of the house to be the first speaker. That is in keeping with our gracious Queen of England, who heads the social life of the British commonwealth of nations.

Another new thing he did was in his appointments to the Senate. One of the first jokes I heard when I came down here was told by the late hon. member for Cartier, Sam Jacobs, who had given outstanding service to this house, who was noted for his polish as a critic and as a speaker, and noted for his humour. When he was asked if he would consider going to the Senate his reply was, "I have got Jew consideration." Now the Prime Minister has appointed a Jew to the Senate for the first time. Not only that, but the first time in my experience he has appointed a Conservative to the Senate, and three independents; and we congratulate him.

I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I would rather the former hon. member for Spadina was sitting in his seat here in the house and giving his outstanding service than any other place.

During the recess my better half and I thought we would take a trip west and see what was happening way out there. I remember that when I came to this country in '94 the slogan was "Go west, young man", and I think anybody who goes west will always get an earful. I travelled through Jasper, up into Yukon and back to Vancouver and I found that there were many people throughout all that country who were prophesying great things for Canada.

First there was the Social Credit prophet who said that Social Credit would sweep the country. That was quite a statement, and perhaps he was right. Then the C.C.F. prophet said that the C.C.F. would at least be the official opposition in the next house. Then I noticed that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) made the prediction that the Conservatives would be the leaders of the house. I would agree with all three prophecies if there were no Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada.

I enjoyed reading the speech from the throne, because it contained so many things that I thought were fine. The farmers are to be considered and it is a well-known fact that if you have prosperous farmers you will have a prosperous country. The unemployed are to be considered, and there is to be equal pay to women for equal work, something for which we have been hungry for years.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) was the first to bring in a private bill in this connection. I remember asking a former minister of labour, the late Hon. Norman Rogers, why it was that girls who taught in schools did not get the same pay as men, and why girls serving behind counters selling goods did not get the same pay as men. He just smiled and said, "We have not much to do with that."

I know from private conversations with the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) that this matter has been receiving considerable thought during past years. I know that in the Fort William district there are ladies who receive the same pay as men for doing the same work. We have two or more postmistresses who receive the same pay for doing the same work, and that is only right. One thing that concerns me in connection with employment of the fair sex is that they must retire at 60 years of age instead of 65. If they are to receive the same pay as men let them be retired at 65 the same as the men.

One or two things have happened in Fort William which I think the government and the country should know about. Fort William had 629 days without a fatal accident, which I think is a record of which any city or any member of parliament can be proud. I am certainly thankful for it. It shows that the chief of police, the mayor and city council and the local paper, the Times-Journal, have been on the job advertising and advising. It also shows that the people of Fort William believe in the provincial slogan, "If you drink, don't drive; if you drive, don't drink." That record was broken just a little while back, but we hope to have another record later on.

Fort William is trying to co-operate with the Minister of Labour in providing winter work. During the past year when dredging operations were being carried on, one of two main pipes going under one of our rivers was broken, but it was decided to repair this during the winter by putting a channel under the river. It is hoped that the government will pay at least 20 per cent of the cost. The city is also putting in trunk sewers as winter work. The government should assist in this, and if they do not I am going to tickle somebody under the ear. I think the government is sensible in supporting winter work as it will provide employment for many people.

Before I came down here a committee of citizens called upon me and asked me to do certain things. First, they asked me to tell the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) that they supported him absolutely in his new plans for the completion of the trans-Canada highway. I think the minister has shown initiative, that he understands the needs of Canada and has sympathy with the unemployed. The governments of the provinces are asked to pay only a certain percentage, but they must administer it. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) said they should pay 100 per cent and he wanted even more than that if he could get it in connection with roads in British Columbia. I do not agree with him, because he would not give the farmers anything by way of help when he is asking us to subsidize the building of roads.

Then I was told to support the gas pipe line. Two experts, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick) and the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle), have provided the house with considerable information. Hon. members would do well to read their speeches in Hansard as each hon. gentleman did a very good job from his own point of view.

I do not expect that the gas pipe line will bring the millennium to the head of the lakes. I know I will not change from electricity to gas or from oil to gas, because we do not like too much gas around our house. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and his associates have been considering this pipe line. We sat in the committee, one of the best committees of the house, and the company was given permission to build an all-Canada pipe line. I remember when a delegation from the lakehead came down here to make sure that the gas pipe line would go through the lakehead, and the minister got the two companies together to get them to co-operate. I asked him if that was the last hurdle in the development of the gas pipe line and he just shook his head. He knew better than I that more money was needed.

This committee told me to support the government in helping the farmers sell their grain or keep it in storage. The members of the committee believed, just as I believe, that the farmers work longer hours and get less pay than anybody else.

There is one thing we want the government to do, and in this connection I refer to what was said by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). It will be noted that I am quoting a Conservative member, but there are some Conservatives who talk sensibly. The lampreys in lake Superior should be wiped out, and money should be spent in an effort to save our lake trout, the finest table fish in existence.

There are three things that I am going to support later on and to which I want the government to give wholehearted consideration. The first is pensions for veterans who served in action in world war I or world war II. I brought this up three years ago and have been bringing it up since. A man who has served in a war should receive some consideration. One friend of mine had four Christmas dinners in the trenches. One man was asked to go out into the trenches where there was water, and he did not have dry feet for two days. He spent 31 days in a trench. You cannot tell me that would not take away years from his existence. Veterans who have risked their lives and cut down their length of life should have pensions at the age of 60 without a means test. We shall go into this matter again.

Another thing we recommend is that civil servants who retired when their salaries were small should have their cases examined. One case brought to my notice was that of a man who served for 37 years as a postman. He carried the mail until his feet gave out, and then he had to retire. I believe he was earning $1,600 a year at the time, and he was paid a pension accordingly. He is still receiving that pension. He should have his pension increased in proportion to the increases in salaries since that time.

A third matter we suggest is that the blind should receive pensions without a means test. We shall also deal with this matter again.

I should also like to say that I am perhaps more convinced than ever that the government should go ahead with the provinces in establishing a national health insurance plan. For two years I sat on committees of this house studying this subject. We brought in a bill which I thought was very good, whereby a contributory pension would be paid to patients and they would be allowed to choose their own doctors.

This year in Fort William we had a case of a man and a boy who had to pay $30 a day for nursing only, with hospital and doctor's expenses added. One lad 15 years of age had to lie on his face for three months. His back, arms and legs were burnt, and he lost his two hands. A boy like that, from a home of honest workers, should have consideration. As you would expect, the city of Fort William would not ignore such a case. The West Fort Kiwanis club there organized a local benefit society. We raised at least $8,000 and are still raising more, because we want to give that boy a chance to occupy a position in life. I am not asking any member of the house for anything but, of course, the door is open.

I should like to say a word about external affairs. It has been brought to my attention many times that we should have a department of peace. We have departments of national defence, national revenue, agriculture, trade and commerce and many other departments, but we have no department of peace. I do not think that is right. I read his speeches, and I know the minister of external affairs believes in the Prince of Peace, and his department is really a department of peace. Judging from his speeches, the name of that department might very well be changed from the Department of External Affairs to the department of peace.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and the house for listening to me once again, and I am happy to note that nobody is sleeping.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a point of privilege. This morning I apparently used an unparliamentary term to designate the inaccuracies, wrong information and misstatements in the speech of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). I am most anxious to withdraw any unparliamentary term I may have used in describing the hon. member for Gloucester. My strong convictions and devotion to the cause of the maritimes' rights incite me with fury whenever I see some hon. member from the maritimes being so lukewarm toward our tragic problems in the maritime provinces and their valiant people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Van Horne: It was this state of mind which prompted me when I called the hon. member for Gloucester a name not permitted in the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I had occasion to read the words to which the hon. member has referred in the blues of Hansard, and I think it warrants going a little further than the hon. member has gone. I think the words should be withdrawn without any qualification.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to do so.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to refer first to one matter mentioned in the speech from the throne, which stated that at this session the Dominion Succession Duty Act will be amended. I had hoped since the close of the war that the dominion government would give up the taxes it collects under this act, as in my opinion all such revenue belongs purely to the provinces.

I was interested to read in the press only this morning a comment that the dominion government, especially the Department of National Revenue, was anxious to retain a succession duty because the returns that had to be filed on any estate gave the government valuable information in dealing with the collection of income tax. That may or may not be true, but I would say to the minister that in the opinion of many people, especially in the provinces where they still maintain the right to levy and collect succession duty, this tax does bear most heavily on many people.

The minister knows that the exemption, which is now $50,000, was placed at that figure when our dollar was worth a great deal more than the dollar is worth today. That exemption is allowed in every estate irrespective of the relationship of the person to whom the money may pass. There is a further injustice, at least in my opinion. Once that estate exceeds $50,000 the whole amount of the estate becomes taxable. I for one would be most anxious at some time to hear some explanation by the minister as to how he can justly and fairly say that an estate of $49,990 should be exempted from all succession duty but an estate of $50,100 should be subject to duty on the full amount. I should like also to mention to the minister that the present exemptions under the dominion act of $20,000 to the widow and $5,000 to children under a certain age, are too small and should be increased. I only mention this to the minister, because I realize that at a later date there will be ample opportunity for discussion when the bill is brought before the house.

I was disappointed that the speech from the throne did not contain some reference to legislation pertaining to veterans. I had hoped that the government would have realized the error it made in the amendments it brought down last year to the War Veterans Allowance Act, in that it did not accede to the requests made by the Canadian Legion that the ceiling be placed at $1,200 for single men and $2,000 for married veterans. This matter has been before the house on many occasions, and members from all parties have made most earnest pleas to the minister on behalf of those veterans who are entitled to receive war veterans allowances.

In particular it seems to me that at this very late date the veterans of the first world war, who must be getting close to the age of 60 and whose numbers are decreasing every year, should be given some special additional consideration. Only today I believe I heard a member again asking the government to make the war veterans allowance payable to the veterans of world war I who served only in England, which under the act is not classed as a theatre of war. While no mention is made in the speech from the throne of any legislation for veterans, I for one sincerely hope that the minister will introduce legislation to deal particularly with the raising of income ceilings for war veterans allowance recipients and making the amount payable to veterans who only served in England.

I see that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs is here, and I am sure his attention has been drawn to the December issue of The Legionary in which there is an article entitled, "A National Cenotaph." I am sure there are many members of the house who have seen and been impressed by the memorials and cenotaphs erected in various other capitals of the world. It seems to me that in this Canada of ours surely now, ten years after the end of the war, we should have a national cenotaph in memory of those who served not only in world war I but in world war II and other wars. I hope the minister will have something to say during the session on the question of a national cenotaph.

In the January issue of the same magazine there is an article by Adam W. Williams entitled, "The Disability Table", to which I am sure the attention of the parliamentary assistant has been drawn. I was most interested to read the table found here, which it is stated was published in 1918. No doubt there have been a great many changes in the disability table since 1918 both by way of increases in the percentage rates and additions to the table. It is interesting to note in the article that the Legion requested the pension commission to publish the current table, and the reply of the commission is quoted as follows:

> It is not considered that this document (the table of disabilities), which has been prepared for inter-commission use, would serve any useful purpose to the Legion whose officers, at their dominion headquarters, have ready access to the chairman and chief medical adviser.

The article goes on to point out that the Legion officers in Ottawa do have access to the table, but says that the Legion believes the table should be made available to their service bureau officers. I would suggest that it should be made public so the local physician who treats a veteran may have the benefit of it. The article further points out that the act states:

> The estimate of the extent of a disability shall be based on the instructions and a table of disabilities to be made by the commission for the guidance of physicians and surgeons making medical examinations for pension purposes.

There is nothing there to indicate that the table is a secret document. If there is any special reason why the table should be kept secret I am sure the many members of the house who are veterans would be glad to know what it is.

On other occasions I have mentioned in the house the failure to observe Armistice day as a national holiday. Last year I quoted a resolution passed by the county council of my country which reads as follows:

> That since, by the statutes of Canada, November 11th is designated as a public holiday, our government be urged to enact legislation that November 11th not only be declared a national holiday, but that it also be observed as such.

Of course there are some people who say that we have far too many holidays. The day before Armistice day or on Armistice day you will notice that in the big city newspapers the full-page advertisements of certain stores will indicate that two minutes of silence will be observed, or that the store will not open until two minutes after eleven o'clock. This day means a great deal to the veterans of Canada, and I think I am safe in saying that all the Legion branches resent the fact that Armistice day is not generally observed as a holiday throughout the Dominion of Canada. If the parliament of the Dominion of Canada is in session at that time parliament does not observe Armistice day as a holiday.

I should like to concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) with respect to the time limit in making assessments of income tax returns. He referred to the long delay and the fact that the income tax department can go back and reassess farmers, small businessmen and other taxpayers of that kind. I have here a resolution passed by the county council of the county of Hastings which was sent to them by the county council of the county of Middlesex. The resolution reads as follows:

> Be it resolved that any farmer, individual or business with a net annual income of $10,000 or less, who files an income tax return and no action is taken on it within six months, that this return become final and complete.

There is another matter I should like to draw to the attention of the government. It is one that has been commented upon many times before, especially last session when the Municipal Grants Act was amended. I refer to the fact that in the smaller towns and villages the government pays no compensation in lieu of taxes. There are hundreds of villages and towns across the country with one, two or three federal buildings, and they are not able to qualify for compensation under the act as it stands at the present time. Yet these small municipalities, which are so hard pressed for money today, have to supply many essential services to government buildings for which they receive no payment. There are such things as snow removal, streets, sidewalks, lighting, garbage collection, fire and police protection and many other services of that nature. It is rather difficult for the average real estate owner in a small village to understand why his taxes should have to go to supply these services to government buildings.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) that a most welcome announcement in his budget would be that in future all federal property will be assessed in the usual way and taxes will be paid thereon. At the same time another most welcome announcement by the Minister of Finance would be that as far as municipalities and school boards are concerned, the sales tax will not be applied to any purchases made by them.

In the Globe and Mail of today there is the announcement of the establishment of the new townsite near the village of Bancroft, which is the centre of several new uranium mines now coming into production. To date two of these mines have made contracts whereby $65 million worth of uranium concentrates will be purchased by the federal government. The village of Bancroft is the closest village to these various mines. At the present time the small inadequate post office in that village is unable to supply the necessary services required by the large influx of new people in this district. I have had the matter up with the Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe). His officials have made certain inspections, and I believe they have made certain recommendations, but to date nothing has been done.

I pointed out to the Postmaster General some time ago that eventually he will have to erect a new building there. At the present time there are several highly desirable sites available. If he delays, those sites will not be available at a later date. The post office at the present time is not suited for a village a third the size of Bancroft. There is insufficient space not only for the public but for the staff. All mail coming into and going out of the office has to be carried from the street, around the building and into the post office. There is no such thing as driving in at the side or around the building. The post office is located on a highway on a sloping hill, without any facilities for public parking. There is no accommodation for the various mail contractors who operate rural routes from this post office. There are two wickets, which are entirely insufficient. At the present time the post office at Bancroft has requests for over 300 boxes which cannot be installed for the simple reason that in the post office there is no room to instal them. I find that in the next riding, which is represented by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), there are three new post offices located at Killaloe Station, Barrys Bay and Eganville respectively; yet the revenue from the Bancroft post office is from three to four times as much as that from any one of those post offices.

It may be just a coincidence that those three offices just over the line were erected in the minister's riding. At the same time, I feel that the Postmaster General should give immediate attention to the situation that exists in Bancroft. Any improvements they are attempting to make in the present building can only be described as of a temporary and makeshift nature. The developments that are going on now and that will continue in that district indicate that the only answer is a new federal building with proper accommodation.

I would therefore say in a most kindly way to the minister and to his parliamentary assistant who, I will say, has been most helpful to me in the matter, that they ought to see that something is done at once to begin the erection of a new building in that district.

As to the matter of cheese, I wish to concur in the remarks made yesterday in this house by the hon. member for Oxford and the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) when he referred to the plight of the dairy farmer in Ontario. In the debate last year I urged the Minister of Trade and Commerce to pass an order in council whereby cheese would be placed under the export-import act. Previously in the house the minister had made certain answers which indicated that it could not be done. But I have noticed that neither the Minister of Agriculture nor the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that the method I suggested in my speech was not feasible, was not correct or could not be carried out.

When the minister spoke yesterday he was apparently pleased with the surplus that we have. At the same time he is adding to that surplus by allowing the importation of millions of pounds of cheddar cheese from New Zealand. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce is under any delusion as to how the cheese people of eastern Canada feel about the importation of cheese from New Zealand, I would simply say this to him. Let him attend any meeting of cheese producers in eastern Ontario, and let him attempt to explain to them why it is necessary to import millions of pounds of cheddar cheese into Ontario.

The various county councils in eastern Ontario have all been passing resolutions urging the government to impose proper tariff protection. I will read one resolution that I believe was sent to the Minister of Agriculture. It is as follows:

> That Hastings county council express approval of the recommendation of the Ontario federation of agriculture, that the dairy industry of Canada be given adequate tariff protection; and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Hon. Jas. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture and to Mr. F. S. Follwell, M.P., and Geo. S. White, M.P.

No doubt the Minister of Agriculture has received many of these resolutions. What he does with them I do not know. But when these people pass these resolutions I should like to point out to the minister that they want something done about them. Their livelihood depends on it. Not long ago I read in the papers a statement by an official of one of the agricultural associations who described the importation of cheddar cheese as the worst slap in the face the Ontario farmer has ever received.

Even at this late date I am going to ask the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce if they will not see that the necessary order in council is passed whereby the importation of cheddar cheese will be placed under the export-import act. Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce was asked for some assurance that no more cheddar cheese would be imported from New Zealand. At that time he said he did not expect—I will be through in a minute, Mr. Speaker—any further importations for another three or nine months. Sure enough, in exactly nine months along come three to five million pounds more cheese.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate, it is a real pleasure for me to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I say it is a real pleasure because they are both friends of mine. I am sorry to see that the hon. member for Timiskaming is not in her seat. But I say to her through you, Mr. Speaker, that the speech she made was not only an honour to herself but also to the fine constituency she represents so well in this house.

(Translation):

I also wish to congratulate the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme). He has shown that he has the makings of a good member of parliament and he will undoubtedly prove to be a worthy successor to our former colleague, Mr. Philippe Picard, now Canadian ambassador to Argentina.

(Text):

Last summer I was privileged to be a member of the Canadian delegation to the NATO parliamentary association meeting that took place in Paris. The initiative for this meeting was taken by our Canadian NATO parliamentary association, and it was a great success. Nearly 200 parliamentarians representing the 15 countries that belong to NATO were at this meeting, and the Canadian representatives had an opportunity to meet a great many of the other delegates.

This meeting was devoted primarily to contacts and to general discussion. However, an important resolution was passed inviting the Speakers of the parliaments concerned to send delegates to yearly meetings, expressing the wish that the governments of NATO countries facilitate such meetings and providing for the organization of a continuing committee with secretarial assistance.

The main subject discussed at the Paris meeting was the development of economic and cultural co-operation among NATO nations as contemplated in article 2 of the North Atlantic treaty. It was suggested that future meetings of NATO parliamentarians should devise ways and means of implementing article 2 by facilitating trade and cultural exchanges between NATO countries.

At the briefing we received from General Gruenther of supreme headquarters allied powers, Europe, known as SHAPE, it was suggested that these meetings of NATO parliamentarians are an excellent thing because as all NATO countries are democratic countries, their governments are dependent on public opinion for whatever they do, and it is very important that the parliamentarians of NATO countries be familiar with NATO so they can explain it to their constituents and enlist their support for NATO, without which, as I said, Mr. Speaker, the governments of these NATO countries would be incapable of giving NATO the support it so richly deserves.

It was also mentioned at that meeting that the alliance of countries around the north Atlantic should develop among the NATO countries the same cultural and economic ties and co-operation that existed among the nations that surrounded the Mediterranean at the time of the Roman empire; with the difference, Mr. Speaker, that the nations that developed those cultural and economic ties around the Mediterranean were held together by the force of the Roman empire, while on the contrary the nations of the North Atlantic treaty are united by the free will of their democratic governments elected by the free vote of their people.

I noted with satisfaction, Mr. Speaker, that the final communiqué of the meeting of the North Atlantic council held last month in Paris contained the following paragraph:

> The council recognized that recent developments in the international situation made it more necessary than ever to have closer co-operation between the members of the alliance as envisaged in Article II of the treaty. They decided to instruct the permanent council to examine and implement all measures conducive to this end.

I am sure that those who attended the meeting of NATO parliamentarians in Paris would like to feel that our deliberations had some small part in influencing the council to include in its communiqué a reference to the cultural and economic aspects of the North Atlantic treaty.

The receptions given us by the French republic were very fine indeed, in the unique setting in which they were held, and that great country once more lived up to its reputation for gracious hospitality. I wish to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to express publicly the great appreciation of all the Canadian delegates for all the courtesies extended to us during our stay in Paris. I wish to underline the fact that the Speaker of the Senate, Hon. Wishart Robertson, took the initiative for these NATO parliamentary meetings, and that his contribution to them was recognized by the fact that he was elected chairman of the meeting in Paris, and also was elected president of the continuing committee to continue the work we started in Paris last summer.

From Paris we flew to Germany and visited the Canadian troop installations around Soest in Westphalia. There I had the opportunity to meet the Royal 22nd regiment from Quebec city, where I live, and I had the occasion to renew old acquaintances with several of the officers and men, including the men in the Royal 22nd from the Magdalen islands. It was indeed a pleasure to see them and to say hello to them so far away from home. After that we visited the R.C.A.F. bases at Grostenquin and Marville in France and at Zweibrucken and Baden-Soellingen in Germany.

We all came back with a feeling of pride in the excellent work our soldiers and airmen are doing in participating in the NATO defence of Europe.

The so-called spirit of Geneva, which existed in Europe when we visited last summer, has disappeared rapidly, and it is important that all NATO countries be very careful not to allow themselves to be misled by any seeming softening of the Russian attitude into relaxing our vigilance or diminishing the strength of our NATO defensive organization.

To turn from foreign affairs to the domestic situation, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it was with great satisfaction and pride that the members of the house read in the weekly bulletins of the dominion bureau of statistics that all the main indications of the economic condition of our country have shown marked improvement over the same time last year. I refer in particular, Mr. Speaker, to the gross national product, to industrial employment, to manufacturing production, new orders in factories, housing construction, retail trade, total wages paid to labour forces, bank loans and car loadings. Every figure supplied shows an improvement over last year and there is no doubt that this country, under the wise and firm guiding hand of this government, has reached a degree of prosperity never reached before.

It is a satisfaction also, Mr. Speaker, to note that this well-being and this increase in the national wealth has been accomplished without inflation. The cost of living is about the same as it was at this time a year ago. I have here, Mr. Speaker, some figures that should be of interest to the house that were given to me by the Department of Labour this afternoon, and they are the latest figures. They give an indication of the prosperity now existing in this country. The total labour force at this time in 1956 is 5,588,000. Last year at the same time it was 5,435,000, showing an increase in the labour force of 153,000. People with jobs—and there is a distinction there, because there are people who have jobs but do not work all the time—total 5,388,000 in 1956 against 5,187,000 in 1955, an increase of 201,000. People employed in 1956 total 5,237,000 against 5,082,000 in 1955, an increase of 155,000.

It would be amusing, Mr. Speaker, if I had the time to examine in detail the dire predictions of ruin and catastrophe made by the members of the opposition last year at just about this time. Unfortunately we have not the time to examine all of them but I cannot resist the temptation to take a look at a few. At page 23 of Hansard for last year the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe)—and I am sorry he is not here at the moment—attacked the government for having said in the speech from the throne that the unemployment existing at that time, a year ago, was regional and seasonal. At page 26 he accused the government of complacency and talked about the unemployed worrying and looking to the future with fear and uncertainty.

It has been proved, Mr. Speaker, that the government was right in saying that the unemployment which existed then was seasonal and regional. Seasonal unemployment in a country like ours is inevitable because of the climate; but it is a satisfaction to note, as I said a few minutes ago, that the total labour force employed has increased by 155,000, and that the unemployed are at a much lower figure than they were last year at this time. The fiery hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who I am sorry to say is not here tonight, went off the deep end at page 150 of Hansard when referring to the statement in the speech from the throne that unemployment was of a regional and seasonal nature, when he said:

> What a monstrous understatement, Mr. Speaker. It is no wonder that what the speech from the throne proposes in the way of legislative and other remedies is very fragmentary and of the nature that it is, based upon an approach so hopelessly lacking in realism to a national problem.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the statement in the speech from the throne last year, that unemployment was regional and seasonal, was not an understatement. It was a statement of fact and was a realistic approach to the situation which existed at that time. Experience has shown that the hon. member for Eglinton was just as wrong as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, and the government was right in its appreciation of the situation at that time.

The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Holowach) also went out on a limb last year at just about this time. He said at page 2320 of Hansard:

I do not intend to re-examine the validity of all the figures which have been given by the able speakers who have taken part in this debate, but I do believe those figures indicate without doubt that unemployment in Canada is neither regional nor seasonal, as has been constantly stated by government spokesmen.

These hon. members, Mr. Speaker, if they reread this year the speeches they made last year at about the same time, must see that they made a big mistake and must feel rather silly in the light of what has actually happened since then. I wish I had the time to go on, Mr. Speaker, to give you other pearls from the speeches of the opposition members last year. Unfortunately time is lacking, but I think the quotations I have given to the house will show, and I repeat it, how wrong the opposition members were and how right the government was in appreciating the unemployment situation at this time last year.

I have received many complaints, Mr. Speaker, from my constituency concerning the effect and operation of one of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act adopted by this house at the last session of parliament. The speech from the throne last year said:

The government proposes to introduce legislation immediately for the amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide for an increase in the duration and scale of supplementary winter benefits. It is also proposing to introduce, during the session, broader amendments designed to make unemployment insurance a more effective instrument in providing financial support to unemployed workers.

In the speech from the throne this year, Mr. Speaker, we find another reference made to the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act:

The improvements you made to the Unemployment Insurance Act last year will provide a better coverage for those who are temporarily without work, particularly in the winter season.

I note particularly, Mr. Speaker, the words "designed to make unemployment insurance a more effective instrument in providing financial support to unemployed workers". Unfortunately subsection 2 of section 45 of the new Unemployment Insurance Act has exactly the contrary effect. It decreases the efficiency of unemployment insurance in providing financial support to unemployed workers and provides less coverage for those who are out of work.

This is a section which says that when an insured person who has already drawn unemployment insurance benefits during an established benefit period makes a new application for unemployment insurance, he has to show that he has made contributions during 30 weeks within the last 52 weeks before his claim, that is to say during the preceding year.

Under the old act, people who did not work regularly could qualify for unemployment insurance by making 180 daily contributions during the two years immediately preceding the day their benefit period commenced, providing they had made contributions for at least 60 days during the last year before their claim, or for at least 45 days during the last 26 weeks before their claim. Under the new act, as above mentioned, an unemployed person must have worked and made contributions during 30 weeks out of the preceding 52.

I submit that this is too drastic a change, and as a result only one in ten of the workers of the Magdalen islands who applied last fall for unemployment insurance, and who usually got it, was able to obtain benefits this year. The reason is that the industries in the islands which are connected with the packing, freezing, smoking and salting of fish do not operate 30 weeks in one year. This was the cause of great hardship, and certainly does not help in providing financial support to unemployed workers as was forecast in the speech from the throne last year, nor in giving them better coverage, as is mentioned in this year's speech.

I suggest that the act be amended to lengthen the period in which the 30 weeks of contributions are to be made. This should be lengthened from one year to 18 months. Then if a worker applied for unemployment insurance on November 1, when most of the local plants are closed, he would have not only the immediately preceding summer season but also the summer season before that in which to find his 30 weeks of contributions.

Some of the people in the Magdalen islands who did not qualify for unemployment insurance last fall were able to qualify for seasonal benefits under section 49 and following of the act. However, these seasonal benefits only begin on January 1 and end on April 15. It has been a great hardship for many unemployed workers to be deprived of these seasonal benefits during the Christmas season, and I suggest that the act should be amended further so that the seasonal benefits would begin on December 15 and end on April 1, instead of beginning on January 1 and ending on April 15. In that way the wives and little children of those people who are unemployed through no fault of their own would be given the opportunity of enjoying the Christmas season like the wives and children of others in the country.

I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the house to the recommendation made by the committee on industrial relations in its fourth report dated June 8, 1955. It recommended that the government study the advisability of extending unemployment insurance to fishermen who earn salaries and who work in other sections of the industry that could be put under the act.

I have mentioned this subject a great many times in this house, and I am coming back to it again. I underline the fact that it is most difficult for a member of parliament to explain to constituents who are fishermen why they cannot get unemployment insurance, when the people who pack and process their fish, who work in the plants on land, are able to get unemployment insurance. This anomaly should be corrected, and I hope we can count on the government correcting it as soon as it is humanly possible.

Before going on to another subject I should like to point out that these amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act should be made at this session of parliament. If they are not made now but are postponed until the next session, which will probably begin only in January, 1957, next winter the unemployed workers and fishermen will find themselves in exactly the same position they are in this winter, and will have to suffer the same hardships.

Family allowances are one of the greatest measures of social security in our country. They have been ridiculed, even called baby bonuses at times. Nevertheless at this time all parties in this house, even the one headed by the Leader of the Opposition, who so firmly opposed them at first, now recognize, in their public speeches at least, that they are an excellent thing, not only from the social point of view but from the economic point of view, because they put more money in circulation and add to the purchasing power of the people.

I know that some of our opponents are quite touchy at being reminded that at one time they were opposed to family allowances. I hope you will bear with me if I am unable to forgo the temptation of mentioning it again. They rightly deserve it because of the attitude they took in the beginning. Our great leader, the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, was responsible for them and history will record that his decision to create family allowances was that of a great statesman.

But over ten years have gone by and family allowances have not been increased. As everyone knows, the cost of living has increased enormously during that time while the needs of children have not decreased. The means of meeting the needs of the children should be increased to keep pace with the cost of supplying them. On February 23, 1955, as reported at page 1436 of Hansard, I said:

> This is what I said on January 19 last: "I say to the people of my county that when the time comes to increase family allowances the Liberal party will increase them. The Liberal party was the party that introduced family allowances in the first place, and it can be counted upon to increase them when the revenues and wealth of the country permit us to do so."
> In case there should be any doubt on the subject, I categorically state that I am in favour of increasing family allowances as soon as practicable.

An hon. Member: When is that?

Mr. Cannon: That is what you are going to find out. I am still of that opinion. I have received representations, both verbally and in writing, from my constituents to the effect that they think it is time family allowances were increased. These people point to the increase in the cost of living since 1945 and the fact that government income available for purposes other than war purposes has greatly increased since that time. I agree with them, and I make an appeal to the government to increase family allowances. If they cannot double them, as requested in some quarters, they should at least increase them 25 per cent or 50 per cent. If it is impossible for the government to increase family allowances all along the line they should—and this is the minimum they should do—at least increase the monthly allowances of $5, $6 or $7 for the younger children to the $8 given to the older children, so the same scale would apply to all. This modification would not only benefit the children but would greatly simplify the administration of the act.

Before leaving this subject I again urge the government most earnestly to enact legislation at this session of parliament to improve, as above outlined, these two great social security measures, unemployment insurance and family allowances.

Before I conclude I think it is only fitting that I should make reference to a visit by His Excellency the Governor General of Canada to the Magdalen islands last fall. He came during September on the frigate Buckingham, and he visited the islands from one end to the other. I wish to express publicly in this house the great appreciation of the people of the Magdalen islands for the honour that was done to them by the visit of His Excellency to the islands, and especially in the way in which he visited them so completely, going to see all the people.

As we all know, His Excellency has many qualities, but there is one that I did not suspect before his visit to the islands. He is something of a poet, and before terminating my remarks I should like to put on Hansard the "Ode to the Saucy Sally" which was written by His Excellency. The Entry island referred to therein is the Entry island of the Magdalen islands. The ode is as follows:

On board the frigate Buckingham there hung a little craft
As nimble as a kayak, as buoyant as a raft;
The passengers admired her; travelled in her at each stop
And called her Saucy Sally with the fringe on top.
For she carried very proudly a magnificent decor—
A fringe she had amidships, and also aft and fore.
The passengers adored it—what the actors call a "prop"—
And they loved the Saucy Sally with the fringe on top.
When we called at Entry island the wind grew even stronger,
And our journey to the jetty seemed long and getting longer.
We whispered soft as seas grew high and spirits took a drop—
What about it, Saucy Sally with the fringe on top?
But she did her duty nobly and never let us down,
Returned us to the Buckingham and how she went to town!
The waves she scorned superbly, with a jump and skip and hop—
So thank you, Saucy Sally with the fringe on top.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, had I been permitted to take part in this debate yesterday you probably would have found it necessary to call me to order because of the strong language I would have used, as I have rarely been more annoyed with a statement from someone representing the government than I was as I listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I feel that two members of this cabinet, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is responsible for the marketing of wheat and has charge of the bureau of statistics, and the Minister of Agriculture, who is the only farmer in the cabinet, are performing a great disservice to Canada by failing to convey to their colleagues, to parliament and to the country the real problems confronting the farmers in all parts of Canada.

How different was the speech yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce from the speech that President Eisenhower presented to the congress in Washington a week ago today. President Eisenhower did not say, "No country is as prosperous as the United States." He did not say, "Our farmers have more money in the bank, more wheat in the granary, more food in conservation, than any other country in the world." This is what President Eisenhower said:

> In this session no problem before the congress demands more urgent attention than the paradox facing our farm families. Although agriculture is our basic industry, they find their prices and incomes depressed amid the nation's greatest prosperity. For five years their economy has declined. Unless corrected, these economic reversals are a direct threat to the well-being of all our people.
> But more than prices and incomes are involved. In America agriculture is more than an industry; it is a way of life. Throughout our history the family farm has given strength and vitality to our entire social order. We must keep it healthy and vigorous.

Yet the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have created the impression in this house and abroad that the Canadian farmers are sitting pretty. The Minister of Trade and Commerce raised that old bogey, the abolition of the wheat board. No member of any party in this parliament has suggested that the wheat board should be abolished. Certainly members of my party have been keen supporters of the wheat board when the Liberals were dragging their feet, but to suggest that well-known newspapers such as the Winnipeg Free Press or the Financial Post are campaigning to dispose of the wheat board is nonsense. I am not going to take time to defend the Winnipeg Free Press; its editorial writers will be able to do that. But I should like to draw the minister's attention to the weekly letters of the Searle Grain Company Limited. This company, which one would normally expect to be sniping at the wheat board and anxious to get back to the open market, is very careful in its weekly comments regarding the situation. The leading article in the letter of 11th January states:

> The proposed move is of interest because it reflects a partial recognition of the increasingly difficult position in which the farmers of western Canada have found themselves as a result of the marketing problems that have arisen. Because of the sacrifices which farmers have made in the past we have consistently maintained in these columns that sooner or later an appraisal would have to be made of the farmer's position in relation to the whole national economy and that, if it appeared justified, extreme measures of one sort or another might eventually have to be taken to ensure him of a more secure place in the scheme of things.

The same letter refers to another serious problem which we must not ignore, that at the Toronto royal winter fair, Koga II wheat, a new variety developed in Germany, placed 18th in competition with many Canadian hard red spring wheats. It was also pointed out that two other English varieties entered in this class placed 21st and 25th respectively.

The fact that the Searle Grain Company is recognizing these important international developments and is not saying a word about the problem that confronts Canadian farmers resulting from the fact that we have a wheat board, shows how ridiculous are the suggestions made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and other Liberal members from the west who have not enough courage to stand up in parliament and perform their duty to their constituents by pointing out that the people who sent them here are not getting their fair share of the national income.

I turn now to what the minister tells us about net income for the years 1951 to 1954. He tells us in one of his publications that the accrued net income of farm operators from farm production has declined from $2,750 million in 1951 to $1,851 million in 1952, $1,653 million in 1953 and $1,054 million in 1954. How could the minister stand up here yesterday and fail to recognize this situation? If it were not for the fact that all the other sectors of the Canadian economy are experiencing an all-time boom, our Canadian farmers might accept the fact that we in Canada were destined to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. But the dominion bureau of statistics weekly bulletins, also published by the Minister of Trade and Commerce's department, turn up week after week with annoying information. Here is October 14:

> Corporation Profits: Second quarter profits before income taxes of corporations in Canada were an estimated 22·6 per cent larger this year than in 1954.

The department store sales were at an all-time high. Chain store sales, manufacturing and all the other sectors of the Canadian economy were at an all-time high.

Naturally I am chiefly concerned about what is happening in the wheat-producing parts of Canada. While farm income in all parts of Canada has been declining, the reduction in farm income in the prairie regions has been staggering. Again taking figures from the minister's own department, we find that in the province of Saskatchewan net farm income dropped from $565 million in 1952 to $126 million in 1954.

It is not easy to know exactly what percentage of the Canadian people are classified as farmers. In provinces like Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes, where some people spend part of their time farming and part of their time fishing or working in industry, one cannot determine exactly, but we accept the fact that roughly 20 per cent of the Canadian people derive their livelihood from farming. As long as I can remember, everyone in public life who has sought support has emphasized the fact that the farmers are the salt of the earth, but when it comes to giving them their share of the national income that is a different matter.

I am indebted to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) for the information he gives us regarding the distribution of the national income to groups on the basis of profession. These figures do not give a complete and accurate picture, but they do tell us what sort of incomes the people who pay income tax have. Since over 80 per cent of the farmers of Canada have never had enough money to pay any income tax, naturally the Minister of National Revenue has no information regarding how little these unfortunate Canadians are getting. However, the figures I have indicate that medical doctors top the list with an average of $11,258 each, according to the information they furnish the income tax authorities. Consulting engineers and architects are next. I understand the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be in this category if he were working for a living. The figure for them is $10,289. Lawyers slipped a little bit. If they had been able to work another half hour in the year they would have brought their incomes up to the $10,000 mark, but as it was they were about $50 short of reaching that figure.

But farmers are away down the list. Those farmers who were fortunate enough to be able to pay income tax earned an average of $3,869. With respect to the division of the national income among the different classes of people in the country, it is not realized by the farmers nor the people generally that in 1954 our farmers were getting a smaller percentage of the national income than they were immediately before world war II began. If one takes the whole period from 1930 to 1939 the farmers' share of the national income was 6·1 per cent. We have a great deal of sympathy for the people who lived through the hungry thirties. We knew something about the 3 cents a dozen for eggs, 10 cents a pound for butter and a nickel a pound for beef and pork. While these prices prevailed the farmers received 6·1 per cent of the national income.

If you go back to 1931 you find that the farmers' share was down to 2·9 per cent. It picked up the next year to 4·1 per cent, but then dropped back to 3 per cent. Twenty per cent of the people received 3 per cent of the national income in that year. In 1954 farmers in all parts of Canada got 5·6 per cent of the national income. No minister of trade and commerce, Mr. Speaker, who is responsible for the statistical information compiled by a government, is doing his duty when he speaks on a controversial question such as the minister discussed yesterday and completely ignores the fact that in all of Canada in the last year for which statistics are available, 20 per cent of the people only received 5·6 per cent of the national income.

Although most of my remarks are going to be devoted to wheat, I am sure that hon. members who represent farmers in all parts of Canada would not dare to take the Minister of Trade and Commerce back to their constituents and permit him to make a political speech in their support suggesting, as he did yesterday, that the only thing wrong with the farmers of Canada is that there are certain C.C.F. people who are agitating and talking about facts that are unreal. Certainly the people in Ontario and Quebec are not going to blame the C.C.F. for the disastrously low prices they are receiving for what they sell and the very high prices they pay for the things they buy.

A few days before I came here I saw one of the farmers in my constituency. He is a man who has acted on the advice of the Minister of Agriculture. He has put some of his grain on the market by feeding it to cattle. He has one of the best herds of cattle to be found anywhere in the country. On December 27 last, between Christmas and New Year's day, he received for choice steers, young cattle not yet two years old, 14 cents, 13½ cents, 13¾ cents, 13¾ cents, with a top price of 14¼ cents a pound. These cattle were all bought by Canada Packers or Burns. The farmer registered his protest with one of the buyers, and the buyer said, "You are mighty lucky you are selling these cattle at these prices. If you had held off until spring and fed them you might be lucky if you got 10 cents."

This was probably just a comment made by the buyer, who has no more information than anyone else about the matter, but he did convince the farmer that possibly there might be a worse price. But the farmers know that while they are caught in this price squeeze, with their prices going down and their costs going up, others in Canada, as I have indicated, are having a very good time.

I mentioned the fact that corporation profits are going up. The Financial Post survey of industrials and mines gives us some information regarding how some of Canada's big corporations have been faring during the period between 1946 and 1954. I will not mention all of them. One of them, the British American Oil Company, trusts me with a credit card. I usually buy "co-op" gas when I am in my own home town, but in travelling around I buy British American gas where "co-op" gas is not available. Therefore I am interested in the profits they are making. Between 1946 and 1954 their net profits after taxes jumped from $3·3 million to $18·1 million, which would appear to be an increase of 410 per cent.

The Steel Company of Canada, which depends to a very large extent on farm machinery for part of its sales, had an increase in net profits after taxes of 440 per cent. Then I come to the Industrial Acceptance Corporation, and it would appear that credit buying in Canada is really paying off for this type of company. Their net profits increased by 2,602 per cent. Loblaw Groceterias apparently found that it is much more profitable to sell vegetables than to grow them. Their profits increased by 306 per cent. Traders Finance net profits increased by 801 per cent, and the profits of the Hudson's Bay Company, which has been doing a land office business in the northern part of my constituency for about 300 years, increased by 478 per cent.

Dominion Stores are advertising today that side bacon can be bought in Ottawa at 27 cents a pound. I do not know how the farmers of Canada can be expected to produce pork when the finished product, side bacon, is sold at 27 cents a pound. This company's profits increased from 1946 to 1954 by 733 per cent.

If it were not for the fact that every conceivable type of corporation in Canada has had a most prosperous period during and since the war, probably our farm population would not be so greatly dissatisfied. But I am sure that in every province in the country the fact that this diminishing share of the national income is going to the farmer is the fact that is driving so many people off the farms and to the cities.

In the small community in which I live we have a composite school that this year has 360 students registered. The principal tells me that he does not know of any of the girls who are looking forward to marrying farmers and living on farms, and that he knows of only three boys who are counting on returning to the farm eventually. I am sure no one can suggest that this school was not established there in the hope that many of these young people would not have to go to the cities to take their high school work, but by being able to stay home at night or by going home for the week end they would keep up their interest in the local farms. But they realize that their parents and their grandparents who have lived on the farm have lived in all periods in a situation where they did not get a fair share of the national income for what they produced.

Another serious defect in the minister's statement of yesterday is this. He failed to recognize the fact that price is such an important factor in the present situation. While in my opinion Canada is the best country in the world that I know of, and while our farmers are the best people in the country as far as I can see, I cannot understand why any cabinet minister should boast of the fact that in no country in the world do the producers have to sell their wheat for as low a price as do those in Canada.

I have a criticism to make of both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Agriculture has a vote for "Agriculture Abroad" which he gets through parliament every year. In this issue there is a discussion on agricultural developments in Australia, France, Hungary, Ireland, Sweden and the United Kingdom. But in the discussion of agricultural policies in each of those countries the minister's officials carefully refrain from pointing out the wide difference in the prices paid to the farmers in those countries compared with the prices paid to the farmers in Canada.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce also publishes a bulletin entitled "The Wheat Review" which regularly contains information with regard to agricultural conditions in other countries. This one has a discussion of agriculture in Uruguay, Argentina, Australia and France. It so happens that I also get from Washington regular bulletins entitled "Foreign Agricultural Circular", and I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce that they could perform a real service by scrapping "The Wheat Review" and "Agriculture Abroad" and merely asking Washington to supply them with information as to what is done.

I will not have time to deal with what the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to say about Uruguay, but I think the Canadian people should have the information in this bulletin that Washington puts out with regard to wheat farming in Uruguay. First of all it points out that before the war Uruguay exported a small quantity of wheat but that as a result of their policies, Uruguay's exports are now 23 million bushels. It is true that is not as large an amount as we are exporting; but the fact that in 10 years' time one country increased its exports ten times suggests that we should pay a little bit of attention to it.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

In Uruguay the farmers start out with a price of $2.51 a bushel. Those who are unable to deliver their grain at the beginning of the season have the price go up month by month until at the end of the crop year the price is $2.72 a bushel. In other words the farmer who holds his grain on the farm for a year has an extra 21 cents a bushel for storing his grain. In addition to that, the farmer in Uruguay has been paid 18 pesos per hectare for every hectare he puts into wheat, and this is very conveniently translated into dollars and acres. The Uruguay farmer is paid $4.80 per acre.

What a contrast there is between this amount and the pittance the Minister of Agriculture, under the P.F.A.A. legislation, did not give many farmers who did not get a crop last year. In Uruguay $4.80 an acre is paid for the first 494 acres. As to the big farmer, the farmer who has over 500 hectares or 1,236 acres, he does not get anything. The smaller farmer, however, gets $4.80 per acre for the first 494 acres. For the difference between 494 and 1,236 acres he does not get anything.

I ask this question of the Minister of Agriculture, who is kind enough to be following me carefully. How can the farmers in the Melville area, with present prices, hope to compete in the world market with wheat that is produced on land that carries with it a subsidy of $4.80 an acre, and when the government of Uruguay is bridging the difference between what the farmer is paid and what is received in the foreign market?

The Minister of Agriculture devotes a section to France, but I suggest that he compare what his officials say about wheat in France with what Washington says about wheat in France. Washington points out that the support level for 1955-56 is about the same as it was a year ago. It is $2.64 a bushel for some of the softer varieties and $3.04 per bushel for the Durum or hard wheat. Here is some information that the minister's department carefully avoided putting in the publication. France has been subsidizing her exports. In 1955 France will probably come close to replacing Australia as one of the principal exporters.

For the 1954 crop, marketed in 1954-55, the total export subsidy payments are estimated at 41·8 billion francs ($119,543,000). The quantity of wheat and flour exported under subsidy that year is estimated at 2,015,000 metric tons (74,028,000 bushels) grain equivalent. Hence, the average subsidy cost for the crop was 2,076 francs per quintal ($1.61 per bushel).

This is not all taken out of the treasury, I should explain. This report from Washington explains that the farmers themselves contribute 54 cents a bushel, while the French government contributes $1.07, making a total of $1.61 a bushel. That partly explains why it is that France, once a country that imported a good deal of wheat and where for quite some time imports and exports balanced, is pushing Australia for fifth place. The exports of France increased from 40·2 million bushels in 1953-54 to 87·9 million in 1954-55, almost double.

Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce very carefully refrained from pointing out that last year the United States replaced Canada as the principal exporter. Perhaps hon. members would be interested in this little table showing the exports from the United States, Canada, Argentina, Australia and France last year and the year before. The United States increased from 211·4 million to 276·5 million. Canada dropped from 255·1 million to 251·8 million. Argentina increased from 110·3 million to 134·5 million. Australia increased from 63·4 million to 94·2 million and, as I said, France increased from 40·2 million to 87·9 million. The estimates this year are that France will increase her exports to 91·9 million.

I realize the problem that is posed when countries which support one section of their economy are prepared to subsidize to the extent that France has done. My time is running out, and I shall not be able to refer to what they are doing in the United States, but it has been mentioned in the house so often that hon. members in all sections will realize that the United States has been following a very generous policy in dealing with their own farmers.

In spite of efforts in that direction, President Eisenhower brought a message to congress asking support for a soil bank and for disposal of surplus corn, cotton, rice, when this very important sector of the people of the United States is unable to get its fair share of the national income, and that in turn is having a disastrous effect on their whole economy.

Before I conclude I wish to suggest that the proposal made by my leader is very reasonable. The amendment before the house, together with our subamendment, now reads:

> We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national problems, including their failure to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain, equal to not less than 75 per cent of the initial price, to alleviate the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers and the entire economy of the prairie provinces, and their disregard for the rights of parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house.

My leader and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) have made reference to accepting soft currencies and sterling and barter. I should like to refer very briefly to the Polish deal. Apart from the blast from the Leader of the Opposition last year when this deal was announced, I have not heard any criticism in parliament or out of parliament regarding this deal. I understand that Poland is going to be in the market for from 50 to 60 million bushels of wheat each year for the next ten years. I understand that Poland has found Canadian wheat to be excellent. It blends very well with their wheat, and I understand that Poland is anxious to do business with Canada. But this business can only be done if we will accept from Poland some of the goods they make and want to sell.

If Poland had access to a lot of gold they probably would supply gold. Canada is prepared to spend $16 million to get a lot of gold from a hole in the ground up in the north and have it put in a hole in the ground down in the hills of Kentucky. But so far we are unwilling to risk more than 4 cents a bushel on last year's wheat crop, with nothing for the oats, barley, rye and other commodities. It is time the Canadian government agreed to set up an import board that would work in co-operation with the wheat board.

The wheat board is charged with the business of selling, but we have no organization in Canada that is facing the situation resulting from the Polish deal, for instance, with a view to getting goods from Poland into Canada without disrupting our Canadian economy. This job can be done. It is a real reflection on our society when we permit 20 per cent of the Canadian people to be placed in the position that their share of the national income is diminishing year by year and we are not making a real effort to increase our production and see that it gets abroad.

Members of this group have frequently referred to the fact that two-thirds of the world's people never get enough to eat. From Rome each month I get the FAO news letters which deal with some of the problems that are being faced by our international organizations on which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been working so hard. May I say we are very pleased that the minister made such a valuable contribution to the deliberations of the last general assembly of the United Nations; but I cannot understand why he sat there and saw the budget for FAO slashed as it has been.

The director general offered his resignation because the budget was being reduced from $7 million to $6·4 million for an international organization that is charged with the job of organizing the world's production and distribution of food. They have had their budget cut by $600,000, and during the closing days of our last session the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his other capacity as Minister of Defence Production told us that when the air force asked for a new type of plane, although it cost $122 million, there was no problem about finding sufficient Canadian funds to embark on that new type of plane.

I submit that with so many hungry people in the world the government of Canada should be giving real leadership in seeing that maximum production is maintained in Canada, that our own people here have all the foodstuffs they can eat and that our surplus is sold, bartered or given away to relieve hunger in areas where people have never had sufficient to eat.

(Translation):

Mr. Georges Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on going through the newly revised edition of our Standing Orders for 1955, I have once again been able to realize how uncommonly much we owe to your ability and devotion to duty. During the two years you have held office you have managed to popularize these standing orders which had been all but incomprehensible to mere laymen. You will permit me to say that, along with some of your predecessors, you will go down in the parliamentary history of this country. Your tact and fairness, together with your perfect knowledge of the two official languages of this country, justify this unanimous tribute from the members of the house, whatever their political persuasion.

The present session began auspiciously with the speech of the mover of the address in reply, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley), the first woman on whom such an honour has been bestowed since confederation, and also with the remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) whom I could well call the representative of youth. To both of them I offer my most sincere congratulations and I hope that in the future they will continue to make worthy contributions to the debates of the house.

I hope that the six newly elected members who have taken their seat among us for the first time will prove an asset to the house and to their respective constituencies. Since I have had the honour of taking part in the electoral campaign of my hon. friend the new member for Temiscouata (Mr. St. Laurent), I would like to congratulate him for the honest and sincere manner in which he obtained his mandate; I had reason to repeat to his electors the following saying: "Blood will tell".

I would also like to draw attention to the special contribution, during the recess, of three members of the cabinet in making Canada better known abroad, namely the hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) during his trip to Russia, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) during his trip to Russia and in the East and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) who, as leader of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations, achieved an almost impossible feat when he succeeded in obtaining the "package deal" admission of 16 nations to that organization. Canada, which does not rank among the major nations of the world, must act as a peacemaker in the world if we want our nation to become worthy, in the international field, of the message given to the shepherds of Bethlehem: "Peace on earth to men of good will".

I appreciated the appointment of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) as a successor to the late postmaster general, the Hon. Alcide Côté. The latter had greatly helped me in the task which had been entrusted to me by my electors, who were requesting improved postal service. I have no doubt that the new minister will be just as sympathetic. I dare hope that the appointment of the new minister will coincide with a greater generosity on the part of his department, especially for the rural mail carriers and postmasters.

The constituency of Roberval which I represent in this house has received some outstanding visitors in the year 1955, that is the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage), the parliamentary assistant (Mr. Kirk) to the Postmaster General, the parliamentary assistant (Mr. Bourget) to the Minister of Public Works on the occasion of the official opening of the federal public building in Roberval, in March, as well as the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) at the official opening of the Roberval airport in November. To these hon. colleagues, I express my appreciation and that of my electors for their kindness in honouring us with their presence in our district which, I believe, is most attractive and hospitable. I do hope they will come back and that the pleasant memory they have of their sojourn among us will entice other members of parliament, parliamentary assistants and ministers to visit the riding of Roberval and its friendly people.

The unprecedented economic expansion of 1955 in Canada could not but have its effects on the constituency of Roberval.

I am therefore glad to see that in 1955 the federal government has really contributed to the progress of my constituency. I will restrict myself to the following works made possible by generous grants from the Department of Agriculture: the agriculture building in Roberval, the central cheese and butter factory of La Doré, the central cheese and butter factory of St. Méthode, the Bhérer cheese and butter factory of St. Félicien; and, thanks to the Department of Public Works: the completion of the federal public building in Roberval, further work on the breakwater at Roberval, the completion of a dock at St. Prime and the awarding of a construction contract for the federal public building in Dolbeau. But the most important contribution to our local economy is definitely the beginning of the construction work of a 139-mile railroad connecting Chibougamau and St. Félicien, at an estimated cost of $17 million. In addition to bringing employment to our workers and putting an unprecedented amount of money in circulation, this work will endow my constituency not only with a long railroad in a northerly direction but, what is more important, with a brilliant future. When the hon. Minister of Transport came to Roberval, he certainly did not miss the opportunity to point out that my electors were very appreciative of the government's wise decision to connect Abitibi and Lake St. John, through Chibougamau, the great economic attraction at this time, in our province. I trust their testimony, together with that of their representative, will constitute the best expression of their gratitude to those who took this progressive decision. That is why my electors, more than ever, are glad to have put their confidence in this government. If my representations in the future are given as much sympathetic consideration as in the past, this confidence will inevitably become unshakable.

A young and lively constituency like the one I represent in this house can hardly leave any respite to its representative and, therefore, this representative still has many requests to submit to the government. As a good parish priest of my district said: "One must thank and one must ask relentlessly; it is the best way to have one's prayers answered."

On December 10 last, the people of Roberval constituency learned the sad news of the death of its representative in the Quebec legislative assembly, Mr. Antoine Marcotte. To his widow, to the members of his family and to all his friends I extend my sympathy in my capacity as member of the same riding in the House of Commons of Canada.

So young a district cannot but naturally look forward to adolescence. It is thus that in 1954 we celebrated our first centenary, that of Roberval. Hardly two years have passed and, in this summer of 1956, we shall celebrate another centenary, that of the establishment of the Montagnais Indian reserve of Pointe Bleue. As its name indicates, this reserve is located on a wide point of land heading towards lake St. John between St. Prime and Roberval. A law enacted under the union and assented to on August 30, 1851, Statutes 14-15 Victoria, chapter 106, authorized the government to survey the lands which were to be allocated to Indians. Thus in 1853 the government granted the Montagnais of my district a reserve of 16,000 acres on the shores of the Peribonka river, and another one of 4,000 acres on the shores of the Metabetchouan river, where a fur trading post and a mission had been established more than two centuries before. During the summer of 1856, the Montagnais Indian tribe of the Saguenay made a petition to the executive council of Upper and Lower Canada, submitted by Mr. David E. Price, M.P., requesting an exchange of the lands granted on the Peribonka and Metabetchouan rivers for another piece covering an area of six square miles on the shores of lake St. John at the place now known as Pointe Bleue. The exchange, approved by the crown lands department on July 25, 1856, was agreed upon by an order in council dated September 4 of the same year and ratified by the governor general on September 6, 1856. On that historical date, the present Pointe Bleue reserve was born. I must give credit to the historian of our district, Canon Victor Tremblay, for these brief notes on the history of Pointe Bleue.

Therefore, that reserve was formed at a time when colonization began in the lake St. John district. The Montagnais Indians and the French people of that district had been friends for a long time, since on May 27, 1603, the chief of the tribe, Anadabijou, had signed with Samuel de Champlain at Pointe-aux-Alouettes, opposite Tadoussac, the first official act granting to European people the right to settle on the lands of this country. In that treaty, the first occupants of the soil invited the newcomers to "settle the land and fight their enemies." In the years that followed the French remained friendly with the Montagnais tribe and saved them from extermination when they were attacked by Iroquois hordes which were driven away with the help of a French contingent rushed by Governor Denonville, towards the end of the seventeenth century. The battle is said to have been waged on the shores of a river still called today "Rivière-aux-Iroquois" which crosses the municipality of St. Prime where, I am happy to say, I was born.

The population of the Montagnais Indian reservation at Pointe Bleue is now some 1,125 people, representing 200 families of which 110 are sedentary and 90 are nomadic. The hunting grounds are getting poorer each year and the slump in furs has made it necessary for most of these Indians to try and make a living at manual labour as craftsmen, labourers and even farmers, which is for them a sort of unnatural adaptation and adjustment, but in which they excel.

The Pointe Bleue Indians value the land which makes up their reservation and which was parceled out in the past but which I undertake to safeguard for them as long as I shall be their member, even though at the present time they do not have the right to vote, a right they do not seem anxious to get.

Since becoming member for Roberval, I have been requesting certain improvements for the Pointe Bleue reservation, particularly the construction of a residential or boarding school for the children of nomadic Indians. During the school year 1954-55, of the school age children at Pointe Bleue 74 out of 272 received no schooling whatever because of the fact that as their parents were roaming the woods these children could attend no classes, there being no boarding school on the spot. In order to adapt themselves to their new living conditions and to carry out their struggle for existence with adequate hopes of success, these young Indians need education. I would even say that it is a vital necessity as far as they are concerned if they are to play their proper part and develop as they should, and not be forever in a position of inferiority.

While I am on that subject I would call the attention of the officials of the Department of Indian Affairs to the sad state of disrepair of the road through this reservation, both in the direction of Roberval and in that of St. Prime. This road is little better than a path. It must quite closely approximate its appearance of fifty years ago with its right angled curves, its level crossings, its near proverbial narrowness and clouds of dust. Not only do I find the state of this road intolerable with regard to modern needs, but I also take it to be a disgrace as far as the federal government is concerned. In the whole of my county and even throughout the four counties of the district concerned, its only jurisdiction in the matter of roads is in relation to this road through the reservation. An ever-increasing number of these Indians have taken up haulage by truck. One of them even runs a bus service between Pointe Bleue and Roberval. A large number of tourists like to come to this reservation in the search for novel attractions. Besides, normal traffic on the road is sufficiently heavy for the department concerned to realize the urgent necessity of proceeding without delay to the rebuilding of this road which is a disgrace to the federal government.

The Indians of Pointe Bleue request a good asphalt road to connect their reservation with local highway 55 leading to St. Prime and Roberval. I find this request reasonable and I bring it to the attention of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) whose progressive mind is well known to me. I am sure he will give this request his sympathetic attention.

As a centenary should be marked by public festivities and celebrations, a committee was created a few months ago in order to celebrate in a particularly original way the centenary of the Montagnais Indian reservation of Pointe Bleue. For this occasion, the Montagnais Indians have in store for us a special program of unprecedented originality which will be a tourist attraction in the area. As a token of consideration for these first inhabitants of the country, I renew the invitation which I was requested to make to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who presides over Indian affairs, and to his deputy minister, (Mr. Laval Fortier), in order that their presence may enhance the grandiose celebrations of the centenary of the Indian reservation of Pointe Bleue. The first reply made by the minister did honour me and I trust that he will take advantage of his stay in Pointe Bleue to lay the cornerstone of the future boarding school, the construction of which I have so much at heart. I can assure the minister of a more than friendly reception in Pointe Bleue as well as in the other localities of the beautiful Roberval constituency.

I should now like to broach a rather delicate matter and that is the question of the name of the future hotel which the Canadian National Railways are now building in Montreal, close to the Central station. A large number of my electors have requested that I express my opinion on this matter and I believe I can do so without hurting anyone's feelings.

I know that the permission of Her Majesty was originally obtained to name that hotel the Queen Elizabeth hotel. Later on a petition signed by 200,000 people, some of them very prominent people, was tabled in this house by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets). These petitioners asked that the hotel be called the "Chateau Maisonneuve", in memory of the founder of Montreal. In time the question was taken up by the newspapers and everybody could realize, even in the English language papers of Montreal and Toronto, that the petition was logical because it was based on historical facts. Everybody knows the loyalty of the French Canadians to Her Majesty and her predecessors, and it would be unfair to say that this is a move against the British crown, which is also the Canadian crown under our common allegiance. Besides there is in Montreal the "Windsor" hotel, another one which is called "Queens" and a theatre which is named "Her Majesty's", and I do not know of any boycotting of these establishments on account of their names. The problem is not there to be sure; it comes from the fact that the origin of Montreal is French; that the metropolis is the second-largest French-speaking city in the world after Paris, on the strength of its population; that, being the metropolis of Canada, Montreal is part of the French province of Quebec; that Paul Chomedy de Maisonneuve founded this city heroically in 1642, stating to the French governor of Quebec at the time: "Even if all the trees on Montreal island were to change into Iroquois, I would not give up my plans"; that it is fitting to maintain the French character of Montreal and that this future hotel, which because of its size will be able to accommodate visitors from all over the world, would, to my mind, serve this legitimate end if it bore the name of Maisonneuve, a truly historic name, which indeed deserves to adorn a public building of this kind.

I know that it is up to the directors of the national railways to settle this matter, and I trust that, if they put their minds to it, they will find the right way to bring even Her Majesty to decide in favour of the petition tabled in the house. I had the privilege to highly appreciate the spirit of understanding of the present chairman of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Donald Gordon, last summer when I appealed to him on behalf of the people of La Doré, who wanted to have the station site moved nearer to the village—at a distance of 1¼ miles—whereas the proposed site was 3¼ miles away from it. I again want to express my appreciation to Mr. Gordon, and I trust that he will show the same spirit of co-operation, in order to satisfy the people of the province of Quebec in particular, a considerable proportion of whom have expressed their views upon the subject in the above-mentioned petition. I also venture to say that being aware of the loyalty of her French-speaking subjects, Her Majesty will accept the name suggested in this petition.

(Text):

In conclusion I want to congratulate the increasing number of hon. members of this house who try to speak my mother tongue, one of the two official languages of this country. I see in that fact a growing trend toward the national unity preached by Sir Wilfrid Laurier fifty years ago.

I am told that the University of British Columbia has recently opened a school of French language for its students. I was delighted to hear my friend the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) speak in this house recently in French about national unity through a better knowledge of the two official languages of our country. I know many other members in every political group who are beginning to speak French well. I think we all can testify that the future of Canada will be a good one because Canadians in every province are thinking of themselves primarily as Canadians with loyalty to Canada as a whole.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I think I arise tonight with as much trepidation as I did on the occasion of my first speech in this house. I am not sure whether the whip of my party moved me to my present position as a trial by fire as in ancient days, or whether because of my efforts with regard to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act I have been appointed parliamentary assistant to my good friend the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Simmons). In any case, though I was never in any doubt before, I am sure I can count on the support of those great free thinkers, those exponents of political fair play, the Liberals to your left, Mr. Speaker.

If there is a precedent in this debate for speaking at great length about the wonderful characteristics of the constituencies from which we come, then tonight I want to break precedent. My constituents know that I feel I represent the finest people and the finest district in this great dominion; and, if they did not, I assume I would not be here. No; I think my constituents will be quite satisfied if I speak about their problems only as problems which affect all of this great country.

Everywhere we turn today we hear people discussing in one form or another the role of government in our democratic system. This is not merely a topic for college professors, students of history or businessmen. It is even discussed by union leaders and union members as well. Each group has its own ideas, but there seems to be no hard and fast definition of the government's function.

To me, here in Canada we seem to have lost sight of the fact that government and business may be separated and still have the government fulfil its role of ensuring the continued general welfare of its people. As businessmen we demand the right to conduct our own affairs without restriction but, at the least sign that we may get hurt, we demand that the government move in and enact some new type of guarantee or impose some new restrictive control. As labour leaders we demand that we have no restriction on our right to bargain or our right to strike but, when things do not go right, we ask the government to move in and tell the boss what he should do.

Let us be quite frank. If these courses were pursued to their ultimate conclusion, then the government would end up by running everything, business and labour alike, because there never has been a treasury bench so prepared to move into new fields of power under the protective umbrella of unprecedented prosperity. The freedom of the individual is disappearing at an accelerating rate. Some day we shall awake to find that not creeping socialism but galloping socialism has brought us a nationalist socialist state. Let us not look for excuses. We can see the evidence everywhere. This government is not going to be satisfied until it finds itself in every phase of business. For them it is a natural evolution conceived during a period of national emergency and now carried forward quietly while our people do not know what is happening.

[Mr. Hamilton (York West).]

Someone may say this sounds very much like the echo of last year's defence production debate. Perhaps it does, but I do not think I need to apologize for that, because only the other day I listened to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) complain because he had not been given the powers he wanted to have last year. The salient feature is that the government, by moving into business, can attain the same type of control of business as it can by restrictive legislation.

Let us get the government out of business. Let us see it perform its true role of attending to the general welfare of the people. Business—and when I say "business" I mean every part of it, management and labour—cannot expect fair play if its competitor is also its regulator.

We have plenty of examples. Last year, in speaking on the estimates of the Department of Transport, as shown on page 6497 of Hansard, I used these words:

> In its creation the air transport board gave every indication of being a desirable means of or agency for controlling the growth of the industry throughout the whole country. But in recent years it would appear that it no longer can be considered an impartial agency in connection with these decisions. I think most of our trouble has resulted from a hidebound adherence to a policy of monopoly at the top.
> This tendency, of course, was exemplified most clearly in the decision approximately two and a half years ago in the Canadian Pacific Air Lines-Trans-Canada Air Lines air freight case which was heard by the air transport board. This decision appears to have closed the door to any hope of competition on the national level. Its reverberations have been felt right down through the industry to the lowliest class 4 group "C" charter air operator.

Later on I said:

> What has been the result? This country has waited two years to obtain a transcontinental air freight system. There is ample proof of that fact. It was two and a half years ago that the application of Canadian Pacific Air Lines was heard. But in the Montreal Gazette of April 25, 1955, there is this announcement in large type: "T.C.A. to start cargo service to west coast." I would ask hon. members, is that the way business expands in this country? Under our system of commercial enterprise should we not expect that business will go out and create a situation where it can make money under the competitive circumstances which exist in all other phases of our national life? No; we waited for the same service we might have had two years ago.

As found on the same page I said:

> The second result of this decision has been the placing of a lid on the air transport business from one end of the country to the other, from the highest level to the lowest, because it is obvious that unless there is room for expansion at the top there can be no hope for smaller operators to expand in their field as well.
> Third, and I think I should be able to say this, it seems that it has even placed the employees of the national air line in a position where they feel that their job security depends upon the continuance of a monopolistic situation, whereas truthfully I am quite sure they would all be better off and would have a better opportunity for advancement if true competitive conditions existed.

But as I pointed out at that time, Mr. Speaker, it did have one beneficial result. The same application for a competitive licence reduced air freight rates in Canada, and that fact cannot be contradicted. Here is the first example of the government acting with its left hand as competitor and with its right hand as regulator.

Since I spoke in the house last year on this subject I have listened to many people speak both inside the house and outside, but there appears to be no general change in the situation. Pacific Western Airlines applied for an air bus licence to carry passenger traffic on a transcontinental basis, but that application has recently been denied. It seems to me that simply to allow competition will not solve the whole problem. I think it is necessary that competition should be allowed in the first instance, but at the same time I believe that the government should get out of the air transport business and get out of it before it is too late.

I do not suggest that the government get out of it before a competitive licence is granted, because if that should be done then I am sure any purchaser might expect a continuation of monopoly conditions. The first step is competition, and the second is for the government to get out of the business.

At the present time a commission is investigating the serious problem of raising revenue for our national broadcasting system, and I am sure the Minister of National Revenue has plenty of worries in that respect. Here too is a situation where the government acts on the one hand as competitor and on the other hand as regulator. It appears to me that the same solution might be advocated in this case as well. It would seem that there is no reason why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should not dispose of its physical properties in radio and television stations to private enterprise. Its production facilities, its job of regulation, could still be carried on. I have great admiration for some of the production facilities. There is no reason why they should go out of that phase of the business. They could ensure that the necessary number of hours are devoted on all stations to the type of programs which such an agency as a Canada Council might suggest as being proper and fit for Canadians. But it does not need to own the physical properties which it possesses. I suggest that many of the government's financial worries in connection with its operation would be removed if such a program were initiated.

I have read about a third example just recently. The Minister of Defence Production has told of plans for the expansion of the Polymer Corporation. Here is an institution, also conceived in a time of national emergency, for which we now have great plans of expansion. I see no reason why Canadian business enterprise could not carry on such a business. I say to the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy), whose chief concern in connection with that corporation I believe is the worry that foreign capital may be brought into Canada to take it over, that I am quite sure that within the confines of this country there is the business initiative and capital to ensure that, run by private enterprise, it is also owned here as well.

The other day I read of another example of the government in business. In the Globe and Mail of September 19 there was an article about the great plans of the Bank of Canada for the construction of a new office building in the city of Toronto eight storeys high, to be built of granite and limestone. In reading the article I found that the basement, the sub-basement and the first and second floors will be occupied by the bank's Toronto agency, its securities department, foreign exchange department and the industrial development bank. The other six floors will be rented as office space. Is this government going into the real estate business as well? I am quite sure that private business in metropolitan Toronto can provide all the necessary office space for business in that city. Here is further evidence of creeping or galloping socialism.

You know, Mr. Speaker, when I hear about the plans for national health insurance—and we certainly need it—I never hear any reference to the tremendous strides that have been made by our insurance companies to cover every possible person who can be covered under an actuarially sound scheme. In addition I have yet to hear of any reference to types of plans other than those of the insurance companies which in my province of Ontario are taking care of innumerable people. When we talk about national health insurance, let us see if we cannot provide a plan based on the practices of the companies now in the field. All they require is an undertaking by the government to ensure that those people who are unable to obtain insurance under the present group plans will be underwritten by the government. In all other respects I am quite sure they are prepared to carry out such a plan more efficiently than it would be done by some autocratic institution in Ottawa.

We have further evidence of the inroads of the government into business. You know, in my business in dealing with air transport matters I am accustomed to receive references from the companies branch here saying that they think a certain application is satisfactory, but they must refer it for approval to the Department of Transport or the air transport board. I have received plenty of those letters, but recently I have been seeing more of them. The other day I received one in connection with a company's operation in the radio and television field. I now find as well that we cannot get into that business in Canada unless we refer it to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Department of Transport. This is effective control of business today by this government without any type of restrictive legislation.

This is the way the letters read:

> However, I wish to mention that this case has been submitted to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to the Department of Transport.

The other day I received a further example. The Minister of National Health and Welfare would be interested in this matter, because a group of people wanted to get together to make some surveys on the question of whether there was adequate hospital coverage in any particular area. What they had in mind were surveys of that kind. We therefore made an application to the companies branch to see whether we could incorporate that type of company. Oh, yes; I think we can incorporate it all right. But this is the type of letter we get back in this case:

> . . . I wish to confirm that the object clauses of the petition for incorporation . . . have been submitted to the Department of National Health and Welfare. Upon receipt of their advice I shall communicate with you.

Apparently the minister is going to reserve for himself all the survey rights in this type of thing. This procedure is just as effective as if we had passed an act which said, "You will go into this business only if we give you permission to do so." There is plenty of evidence of that.

What I say is this. Let us get out of business. Let us leave it to the people who have been trained for a lifetime to run businesses. As to those institutions that apparently we cannot give back to business, let us, as sane and reasonable men, leave them alone. Let us not continue to snipe at them day after day in this house; I am sure that is a terrific blow to the morale of the people who spend their days working for them.

Let us devote the energies of this house to providing for the welfare of the people of this country. Let us see if we cannot increase the efficiency of our own departments so that some of the funds required for all those who wish increased old age pensions—and there are plenty of people in this country who need them—can be provided without taxing the people more and more.

Let us not think that we are too efficient in connection with the operation of our business; I refer to the government's business. I read an editorial in the "Office and Equipment News" of December. This editorial indicates that we do not want to listen to anybody who has any idea of improving the efficiency of our work. There is no place for them. We do not want anybody from outside to tell us whether there is available new equipment which will cut down the ever-increasing numbers whom the Minister of Finance must find the wherewithal to pay. No; we are satisfied to go on being empire builders. If you can add a few more to the payroll, your own job goes up in value.

I therefore direct your attention tonight, Mr. Speaker, to the great necessity of leaving to the people who know how to do it one phase of what has become an extremely important part of our daily routine here; and let us, on our side, turn our attention to efficiency in our own government departments.

Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock and move the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Leduc (Verdun) the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTION

(Answer deposited with the Clerk of the house.)

LOAN TO CHINA

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Has the government of Canada been reimbursed for the sum of $60,000,000 loaned to China in 1946?
2. If so, on what date?
3. If not, when will payment be made and what is the amount of interest to date?

Mr. Harris:

1. The credit to China authorized under the Export Credits Insurance Act was $60,000,000. Advances made under the credit amounted to $51,037,091.15. These advances, together with accrued interest, were consolidated in 1947 and 1948. The total debt thus consolidated amounted to $52,215,997.48. Bonds bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum and maturing serially on December 31 of each of the years 1948 to 1977, were issued against the consolidated debt by the government of China. Only part of the loan has been reimbursed.

Question

2. Payments by the government of China have been made as follows:

Date of payment	Principal	Interest
July 9/48		$ 502,851.13
Jan. 11/49	$1,755,997.48	502,851.13
Aug. 18/49	277,325.16	1,071.31
Nov. 14/49		756,900.00
May 3/50		193,367.37
June 29/50	756,557.34	569,508.55
Feb. 7/51		1,132,200.38
	$2,789,879.98	$3,658,749.87

3. (a) The time at which the government of China will resume payments on the loan is uncertain.

(b) The interest due but not paid on December 31, 1955 was $7,764,500.77. This amount does not include capitalized interest.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 18, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOREIGN POLICY—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY MR. DULLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the ways in which Canada can become involved in the results of foreign affairs decisions made at Washington, has the minister made any effort to ascertain whether Mr. Dulles' "brink of war" statement in Life magazine of January 16 represents United States foreign policy? Has the minister any comment to make on Mr. Dulles' statement?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question just before coming into the house. As to the first part, I would merely point out that Mr. Dulles takes no responsibility for the article in question except those parts in which he is directly quoted. In so far as the particular paragraph is concerned to which I believe my hon. friend makes reference, Mr. Dulles, at his press conference yesterday in Washington, clarified and amplified the meaning of that paragraph and I think no further inquiry on our part, in respect to that particular paragraph, is required.

So far as the second part of the question is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have no comment to make on the statement. Some of the matters dealt with in the article might be touched on by me in the review of foreign affairs, which I hope to be able to make at an early date.

REQUEST FOR CANCELLATION OF PERMITS TO EXPORT PLANES TO EGYPT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)? In view of the inflamed situation existing in the Middle East, will the Prime Minister cancel the export permits to send additional planes to Egypt?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no consideration has been given to the question of cancelling the export permit for these training planes and I know of no reason for reconsidering the matter and coming to the conclusion that the export permit should be cancelled.

CHINA—RECOGNITION OF PEKING AS DE FACTO GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), arising out of an answer he gave yesterday respecting the recognition of the people's communist government in China. Is the minister prepared to give an assurance that the government does not at the moment contemplate early recognition being given to that government? Secondly, has he been in touch with the United States government recently, suggesting that something be done towards the recognition of that government by the United States government?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is, of course, a very important question of government policy and, if there is anything I can appropriately say in regard to it, it will be during the statement on external affairs which I hope to be able to make shortly.

FISHERIES

REPORTED TRANSFER OF BIOLOGICAL STATION IN MARITIME PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) or his parliamentary assistant, which is based upon a report that it is proposed to move the biological station from St. Andrews, New Brunswick, to Halifax, Nova Scotia. Is it the intention of the Department of Fisheries to move the biological station at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, to Halifax, Nova Scotia? If so, would the minister give his reason for such a move being made?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question only as I came into the chamber a moment or two ago. May I say to my hon. friend that I think there has been a recommendation made that certain phases of the work done at St. Andrews be moved to Halifax. I shall be glad however to look into the matter and give an answer later, particularly to the second part of the hon. member's question.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—REPORTED ENTRY ON WESTBANK RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Did the provincial government of British Columbia approach the Department of Citizenship and Immigration for permission to enter on Indian land for the construction of a bridge approach through the Westbank Indian reserve? If so, was such permission granted?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the provincial government has made a cash offer to the Indians for certain land for the purpose of building this bridge but I do not believe any permission has been asked to build the bridge. Permission was asked and granted to a provincial surveyor to make a survey.

Mr. Jones: Is the minister aware that Indians armed with shotguns are keeping government employees from the property?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I was not aware of that. In fact I would have been very alarmed if I had been.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NATIONAL DEFENCE—AUTOMATIC RETIREMENT OF CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES AT 65

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if the Department of National Defence is continuing the policy of automatically laying off civilian employees when they reach the age of 65 years and, if so, how does that fit in with the program of the Department of Labour for the continued employment of senior citizens.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of his question. In answer to the first part may I say that the Department of National Defence does not automatically lay off people at 65 years, but we do regard 65 years as the normal age for retirement. However, when an employee reaches the age of 65 years and indicates that he wishes to continue working, each particular case is considered on its merits, the man's usefulness, his ability to discharge his duties and whether a favourable decision would be helpful to him. I may say in this connection that a fairly high proportion of civilian employees who wish to continue working after 65 years of age are in fact retained by the department.

In reply to the second part of the question, I would say that I think the policy of the Department of National Defence in this regard is in accord with the program of the Department of Labour and with the practice in other government departments.

ATOMIC ENERGY

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD POSSIBLE POSTPONEMENT OF FURTHER NUCLEAR TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can inform us whether the question of postponing further thermonuclear tests until the report of the United Nations committee on the genetic effects of fall-out is received was discussed at the recent meeting of the United Nations assembly. If so, what was the attitude of the government of Canada to such a proposal?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The question of the postponing of thermonuclear tests was discussed at the recent meeting of the assembly of the United Nations and the committee referred to by my hon. friend was set up. However, I am afraid it will take the committee some time to present its report.

The position taken by the Canadian delegation, headed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), was that we would agree to any postponement or cessation of tests of this kind, but only as part of a satisfactory disarmament scheme which would include adequate provisions for inspection and control. As the house knows, the Canadian delegation to the United Nations has been doing its best to bring about such a satisfactory scheme, especially through its membership on the subcommittee of the disarmament commission, the meetings of which will be resumed shortly.

BUTTER

PURCHASE AT REDUCED PRICE BY WELFARE INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the Minister of Agriculture inform the house as to whether or not the privilege of purchasing butter at 21 cents a pound below the support price has been extended to all welfare institutions operated by provincial governments across Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question, and in reply to state that the answer would be yes if it were not for one phrase used. The phrase used is "has been extended". I am not certain that they have all made application but, if the word "available" were substituted for "extended", butter at 21 cents less has been made available for any institution, whether government or otherwise.

At the same time I should like to say that the fact that it is 21 cents a pound cheaper has made very little, if any, difference to the consumption of butter at those institutions.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO CS-2F AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I thought for a moment I was sitting on springs. I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). Could the minister inform the house how far the CS-2F production program at the de Havilland plant in Toronto is behind schedule?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has spoken of the CS-2F. I shall have to consult counsel to find out what program that is.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for York West wishes to clarify his question.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Perhaps I might identify the plane in question as the plane required by the Royal Canadian Navy.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I shall make inquiries. The only delay would be due to the de Havilland strike. I understand the components manufactured in outside shops have not been delayed and I am under the impression that the completion date of the program has not been set back.

METHOD OF PLACING CONTRACTS BY DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. I have not given him notice but he will know the answer. It is prompted by an article in the Globe and Mail headed, "Weapons of Influence; Drew Says Contracts Used to Keep Liberals in Power."

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIvor: My question is: Was the placing of contracts by the dominion government carried out so honestly and was it of such service to the country as to have the profound influence it did in the last election?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I may say there are no political implications whatever in the placing of contracts by the Department of Defence Production.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RESERVE ARMY—REPORTED REDUCTION IN TRAINING DAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has there been a change in the policy of the department, involving a reduction in the number of days for which reserve army personnel can be paid for training? I ask this question because I understand an order has been issued in western command reducing the number of training days for reserve army personnel to 30.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that. I shall look into the matter and advise the hon. member.

HOUSING

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT SUPPLY PORTION OF HOUSING ACT FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of yesterday's announcement by the banks indicating a decline in money being available for housing, would the government consider again supplying a portion of N.H.A. funds as it did before the first session of this parliament?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's question as notice. I will be glad to bring it to the attention of the minister, who will be back tomorrow.

Inquiries of the Ministry

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN STATUS OF KINGSTON DISTRICT OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs relative to the Department of Veterans Affairs office in Kingston, Ontario. Is it the intention of the Department of Veterans Affairs to reduce the district office of the department at Kingston, Ontario, to a sub-district office, and have the documents of the district office at Kingston been parcelled up and transferred to Toronto and Ottawa? If so, what is the reason for this change?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is the intention of the department to reduce the Kingston office to the status of a sub-office, and I believe this decision is being implemented at the present time. The decision was reached following a survey of the work load in that particular district and because of the decrease of the work in that office it was decided that it would be both more efficient and more economical to reduce the office to the status of a sub-office. The personnel will be decreased by about 25, I believe. Part of the work will be done in the Ottawa district office and part of the work involving the county of Northumberland will be done in the Toronto office.

Mr. Brooks: Has the minister received any protests from any veterans organizations in Kingston opposing this move?

Mr. Lapointe: No, sir.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MANNER OF ASKING QUESTIONS ON ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order. It concerns the manner in which questions on the orders of the day are being asked. I understand that in asking questions on the orders of the day the intent of a question must not be the imparting of information but simply the asking of a question.

What I have in mind is a question asked by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Jones) this afternoon. As a supplementary question he asked whether the minister was aware that Indians on a certain reserve have taken up shotguns, apparently against the provincial officials.

I do not object to the question but the purport of the question is that a statement has been made which may result in a wrong interpretation. We do not know whether or not the statement is true, and it could be interpreted that a sort of civil war has commenced between Indians and provincial government officials.

Mr. Ferguson: Get it in the movies. Call in Hollywood.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know what all the gabble is about.

Mr. Ferguson: The kids will love it.

Mr. Hansell: That information is given. I think we have a right to know the source of that information. Otherwise it may cause some considerable reflection upon individuals and, in this case, perhaps upon the British Columbia provincial government.

Mr. Jones: In answer to that statement may I say that the information was given on the C.B.C. news this morning.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): If I may speak to the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this. Earlier the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) asked a question in which he said that the banks had made a certain pronouncement with respect to lending on mortgages. While I do not profess to be fully informed about what the banks do, I am reasonably certain that I would have been informed of this development. However, it is my impression that only one bank stated that its portfolio was now full of mortgages and that it was unlikely to have additional money for mortgage lending.

This question was put in the form of the banks' announcement and I am sure—at least I speak subject to correction—that the bankers' association did not say there would be no more bank lending on mortgages. I say that only to emphasize the point of order, namely that some questions are placed in the form of a statement of fact and that they are never caught up with if they are in that form and happen to be wrong.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might take this opportunity to inform the house how fully I appreciate the basic difficulty whenever question time comes along. As hon. members know, the same rules apply to questions asked orally and to written questions placed on the order paper after notice. There is a long list of limitations as to the type of questions which may be asked before the orders of the day are called. They are to be found at page 119 of Beauchesne's third edition. Although they are not obliged to do so, hon. members sometimes, through courtesy, give notice to the minister who is to reply to the question. Sometimes I myself receive a copy of the notice, for which I am grateful.

Most of the time, however, I do not get a copy of it. I do not complain about this matter because hon. members are not obliged to give me notice. But I cannot judge a question until I have listened to it. Once I have listened to it, if I see that the minister is ready to reply, I feel that it is his wish and that of the house generally to have the question dealt with.

There is no doubt in my mind that some questions contain a great number of unverified facts and should be prohibited before the orders of the day are called. If I were to interpret the rules in the way in which they should be interpreted and if I followed the previous rulings given over the years by my predecessors and reported at page 119 of Beauchesne's third edition, I think I could cut off about 95 per cent of the questions that are asked. Such action would be interpreted as extremely drastic action on my part. I myself do not see how we can properly give justice to hon. members who from time to time complain about the manner in which these questions are being asked.

I would ask the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) to realize that I agree with him but I would ask him to put himself in my position and to realize how difficult it is for me to enforce, in the way in which they should be enforced, the rules of the house with respect to these questions.

Perhaps I might venture a comment which some hon. members may feel to be uncalled for. I will risk making it, depending upon the indulgence of hon. members. We often hear some hon. members say that the British system with regard to question time is better than ours. May I say that in the British house no question may be asked without previous notice. I myself would much prefer that system.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, I would not want it to be thought that I was criticizing your decisions or your work as Speaker of the house, because I certainly would not do that. All I am suggesting is that when questions are prefaced with statements, we at least have the right to know the source from which the statement comes.

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING OF DATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as house leader? Can he say when arrangements will be made for the debate on external affairs to which his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, made reference yesterday and again today?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I hope this debate will be ended earlier than the last possible date, namely a week from today. Should it not be ended until that time, then we can arrange a suitable time shortly after that, not next week but perhaps in the following week.

BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR TIME ON STATION CBUT, VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, of which I have given him notice. Did any member of the government of British Columbia request time on station CBUT in Vancouver for political purposes in the Vancouver Centre by-election? If so, did the regional director in British Columbia refuse that request?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I wish to thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his question. I am informed by the C.B.C. that the government of British Columbia did not request time, paid or otherwise, on station CBUT for political purposes in the Vancouver Centre by-election.

POWER

BEECHWOOD PROJECT, NEW BRUNSWICK—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Would the Minister of Finance advise if the government has changed its mind with regard to its refusal to help finance the Beechwood hydroelectric project in New Brunswick?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of those questions that might very properly be put on the order paper or be the subject of debate. It seems to assert a policy about which, to my knowledge, I have not said anything in the house. I shall have to examine the question to see what answer is required.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 17, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, in a page where friendly writer Legouvé extols the merits of women, I came across a remark which has remained engraved in my memory: "Our glory is the outcome of a smile". When I heard the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) move the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I understood that beyond her smile which promised intellectual brilliance she had put in her speech a large part of her heart. Had it not been for the warmth of the speech of the seconder of the motion, I believe that she would have shattered the secular belief in man's intellectual superiority. Rather than dispute an opinion proudly held by so many human beings, may I be allowed to offer my warmest congratulations to my hon. colleagues of Timiskaming and of Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) for a performance that was brilliant from the oratorical, intellectual and political points of view. The honour and glory which they reaped on that occasion will unquestionably earn them the abiding confidence of their electors.

(Text):

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the mover (Mrs. Shipley), in her own language, upon the excellence of her speech in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is a tribute to her, not only on account of her personality and the fact that she is the only lady sitting on this side of the house, but it is also a tribute to every woman in Canada.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall continue my remarks in my mother tongue with the reservation that I shall conclude my speech in English, in order to show my affection and respect for my English-speaking colleagues in this house.

(Translation):

Last year I had the honour of moving the address. In my remarks pertaining to the electoral constituency I represent, I stated that there was only one important federal public service missing at Verdun, namely a post office that would adequately meet the essential needs of our greatly increased population. Without any delay, and perhaps to give the lie once more and in a tangible way to the unjustified and vague critics of some members of the opposition, our government, with its customary wisdom, understood the urgency and seriousness of the situation. Preliminary plans were prepared; the final plans were completed and the contract was granted to the lowest tenderer, without any political interference or influence, which greatly honours the honesty and conscience of the present administration. Preliminary work has just started and we hope that, before the end of 1956, the new Verdun post office will stand in all its glory for the benefit and advantage of my fellow citizens. I wish once more to express my most sincere gratitude to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and to his faithful and devoted parliamentary assistant (Mr. Bourget). The late lamented Hon. Alcide Cote contributed in no small measure to the realization of a project close to my heart. In my unworthy prayers, I reserve for him a heartfelt and grateful remembrance.

It is therefore with real pleasure that I wish to associate myself with the words of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada who, in the speech from the throne, stated with good cause that:

> Various departments and agencies of government have sought to arrange their construction programs to provide more employment during the winter season.

Further on, this speech reveals an aspect of the social policy of this government and demonstrates its great readiness to relieve human suffering through changes in the National Housing Act and increased aid toward slum clearance and rehabilitation of the blighted areas of our cities. That is, Mr. Speaker, one of the best means of fighting juvenile delinquency; I am sure that the Canadian nation will join in the praise and congratulations which I am glad to extend to the administrators of this country. The working and underprivileged classes of society will also benefit from the paternal support of a state which unstintingly seeks the common good. Since we have touched upon the question of charity, would it be too much to wish that, as far as practicable, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) will, at this very session, lighten the burden of the taxpayer stricken by illness either personally or through his loved ones, by amending the Income Tax Act in order to allow the deduction, from the income of individuals, of all medical expenses.

At the opening of last session, I felt it my duty to appeal to the noble feelings of the members of the opposition and to invite them not to scream out loud without reason, not to exaggerate the seriousness of our national or international problems, not to try deliberately to provoke unrest and confusion in the minds of the population, to avoid preaching defeatism and not to ignore the explanations, the advice and the generous efforts of our government.

Every one in this house remembers however that most members of the opposition, particularly those of the official opposition, displayed their well-known pessimism by maintaining that there is widespread and acute unemployment in this country, and that Canada is heading towards bankruptcy. Together with many members from this side of the house, I protested vigorously against a stand or an attitude so prejudicial to the welfare and to the reputation of the Canadian nation. No, Mr. Speaker, it was not logical to talk about acute unemployment and distress in the country when there was only underemployment of a regional and seasonal nature, when our economy remained buoyant, when salaries and the standard of living were high.

I was glad last week to hear from the very representative of the Queen of Canada that the year just ended has been the most productive in our nation's history, that more men and women have been employed than ever before, that our harvests have been abundant, and that our trade has exceeded all earlier levels.

Unlike that of its opponents, the policy of the government is to work in a quiet and efficient way, and to spread, as usual, a rightful optimism. Against defeatism, it casts its energy, its power, its courage, its work and its victory; to mere talk, it opposes action and tangible achievements; in the face of depressing criticism, it shows its record of achievements and good deeds, the fruit of its labours, its competence, its will to fulfil the social mission that was bestowed upon it by Providence for the welfare, peace and happiness, not only of the Canadian nation, but of the whole of humanity.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the session that has just begun, humbly to express some suggestions and wishes of a purely practical nature.

Competent engineers are working at the present time, following suggestions made by interested localities, on the plans of a bridge which is to be built in Verdun, as I hope, or in the immediate vicinity, to connect both banks of our national river, in conjunction with the gigantic undertaking of the St. Lawrence seaway. Would it be premature at this time to wish that this piece of architecture be called "Louis St. Laurent bridge" as a tribute to the dynamic personality and the prestige of the present head of the Canadian nation, or just to commemorate the beneficial repercussions of his journey around the world during which he was rightly acclaimed and was able to note the marked progress towards his objectives, which is the recognition, by the other nations of the world, of our distinctive national identity, of the broadmindedness of Canadians and of their desire to fraternize with their fellow men. This, Mr. Speaker, is merely a personal suggestion which I wanted to put forward in my anxiety to avoid the trouble recently experienced with regard to the construction in Montreal of an up-to-date building, though devoid of the characteristics of a castle. With respect to this, I still trust that the management of the Canadian National Railways, who are solely responsible in this matter, will reconsider, if not for historical and patriotic reasons, at least in order to avoid certain inconveniences with regard to the transportation of tourists which may result from the existence of another hotel bearing a similar name.

Along the same lines, Mr. Speaker, and without wishing in the least to kindle racial prejudices of any kind, may I make so bold as to request the government, within the framework of its responsibilities, to see to it that those responsible for the filling of federal positions in Montreal and in other centres of this country, apportion these appointments with a view to providing adequate representation for all parts of the population, with regard to racial origin, while having due regard also for the ability, availability and effectiveness of candidates as well as for the rules and regulations in force at this time.

Public opinion and religious authorities have been quite concerned, for some time, and more precisely for a few months past, over the banefulness of certain immoral publications circulating throughout this country at the present time. True the federal government has done its part in the enacting of section 150 of the Criminal Code which concerns the entry into this country of obscene published material and its production, printing, distribution, circulation or possession. However, I thought it my duty, as a Christian and head of a family, to make this appeal in the house to the interested parties, in particular to the printers, distributors and dealers of these venomous publications, asking them to have the courage of their convictions and to work for the safeguard of the moral health of our people, especially of this the most tender section of our population, our children, this human capital that it is our duty to mould, guide, encourage and feed, not with poison, but with the best cultural vitamins that we must administer to them intelligently. Quite often, in the course of electoral campaigns, speakers hold up cavalierly and on the least provocation the flag of autonomy and respect for the constitution. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the name of this autonomy, is this not for me an excellent opportunity to urge provincial censorships, where they exist, to use the necessary means at their disposal with a view to effective and constant respect for the law, if the ones responsible for its application are moved by a sincere desire to make use of this autonomy for positive, definite and moralizing results.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to resume my seat without saying that right-thinking people in our country are convinced that our government, in administering the affairs of the country, shows the will to develop "our conquering energy" in the establishment of a true Canadian spirit, invigorated by the culture of our two great races and being, through its very existence, a source of peace, happiness, prosperity and fulfilment for our nation and for the community of free nations. The present government knows that its essential mission is to establish and maintain peace, the basis of all public happiness, through justice and the defence of the freedoms and the rights of everyone. It knows also that its supplementary mission is to replace private enterprise when it is found wanting or when its means are insufficient. Through legislation that has stood the test of life and of experience, our government ensures the progress and development of the nation and the stability of internal peace.

Following the first world war, an eminent French scholar, moved by all his country's misfortune, said:

To survive, France must grow.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the same applies to Canada for we have all the necessary elements of greatness. We have a vast territory; our population is constantly increasing, our inland navigation is growing and will further develop as a result of the deepening of the St. Lawrence river; we have a long seashore where we can build harbours that could serve powerful fleets to facilitate and provide uninterrupted commercial exchanges. But such industrial and commercial development is not sufficient. To be worthy of itself, to promote peace and harmony among its members by means of a truly Canadian mentality, the Canadian nation must, through moderation, tolerance, work and know-how, make that mentality acceptable to all groups and all nationalities. To achieve that noble goal, men on the political and intellectual battlefields must give leadership and keep that goal constantly before the eyes, the intelligence and the will of the people so that freeing itself from the grips of prejudice and fanaticism, and understanding the perils of the future, the whole nation may marshal all its forces, energies and determination and bring together, so as to give life to the great ideal of Canadian greatness, all those who, under confederation, wish to go on living and ensure the greatness of our country, Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, as I promised, I should like to repeat in English the conclusion of my remarks in French. Following the first great war it was said by a highly cultured Frenchman that if France wanted to continue to live she must become greater. The same can be said of Canada, for we possess all the necessary assets to ensure our greatness. We have an immense territory, an ever-increasing population, inland waterways which will assume much greater importance with the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, an immense coast line along which can be built harbours capable of accommodating powerful fleets which will facilitate trade.

However, industrial and commercial development will not suffice. In order to retain its self-respect, to promote peace and harmony between its members through the development of a true Canadianism, the Canadian nation must by its moderation, tolerance, hard work and skill bring all groups and all nationalities to the acceptance of such Canadianism.

To achieve this noble ambition the soldiers on the intellectual and political battlefields must give leadership, must always direct their eyes, their intellects and their wills toward the objective to be reached in order that, freeing themselves from prejudice and fanaticism and realizing the dangers with which the future is fraught, our people will consolidate their forces, their energies and wills and rally under the standard of Canadian might all those who under the aegis of confederation wish to continue to live and to ensure the greatness of our country.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to say a few words on what I believe to be one of the most important speeches made in this parliament during the session, the speech from the throne. The people of this country wait most intently for the delivery of the speech from the throne, in other words, for words from the government as to what people in all walks of life may expect in the way of management of the country's affairs.

It is or should be a guiding speech so that great industries may know whether to expand or curtail their production, so that the farmers of this country can make up their minds as to what crops they should specialize in. Our distributors of commodities from coast to coast await very intently the delivery of the speech from the throne. The people are entitled to know what the government intends to do on their behalf, at least from year to year. The government has available in the dominion bureau of statistics greater sources of information on world conditions, world production and, more particularly, Canadian production than any other group of people in this country. If people do not furnish to the dominion bureau of statistics information that is as nearly accurate as possible, they can be fined or imprisoned for not furnishing such information. It is compulsory. The gathering of this information is for the specific purpose of keeping the government posted.

After all, who is the government? The government is the Canadian people. So the bureau of statistics is gathering this information for the Canadian people. From the speech from the throne I cannot see, for the life of me, any semblance of information for the people of Canada that has necessitated to any degree the bureau of statistics.

One item was the trans-Canada highway. That was old 20 years ago. That was initiated to give the unemployed young men 10 cents an hour, or $5 a month. It is something we should hide and forget about; it is a disgrace. We have men sitting in parliament today who worked on that project and received that kind of money, for wheeling muck from one mound to another and back again. That project should have been completed 15 years ago in a country like Canada. It would have been completed 20 years ago if we had had either a Liberal or a Conservative government in power with enough gumption and initiative to do the proper and decent thing. Everyone knew 20 or 30 years ago that the trans-Canada highway was a necessity. Look how they have handled it. Now they bring it out in the year 1956 as something great for the future. It is something of the past that we are going to do in the near future, everybody hopes.

The next item is the trans-Canada pipe line. It has been pulled apart, rebuilt, discarded, started east, north, south and in all directions, and finally we find it now in the 1956 budget. What kind of guidance is that from the bureau of statistics, who are the servants of the government of Canada? Is it a guide as to what course the government should follow this year?

A most important item, immigration, has been forgotten. That is something that never gets old. Selective immigration will always be a "must" for the Dominion of Canada, certainly for the next 75 to 100 years. Only in today's newspaper we see that there exist in this country shortages of materials and labour. We have had no guidance in the immigration department of this government since the war. When one man admits failure, they give him another cabinet job. The greater the failure is, the more promotion he gets in his next job.

For a long time we were told there were not sufficient ships to bring to this country artisans who could do a job. Shortly after the war many desirable immigrants from many desirable countries in the world wanted to come to Canada, but there were not enough ships to bring them—people from England, Ireland, Scotland, Germany, Switzerland, Holland and Italy. We screened them to see if they were farmers, barbers, butchers, bricklayers or other types of workers that this country could absorb. Now we find ourselves faced with a tremendous surge forward in the growth of Canada, short of people to operate the country. If that is foresight, I do not want that kind of foresight.

There is an item that should have been foremost: coping with the prosperity of this country. It is very funny to listen to some of our Liberal members speak on the budget. They point their finger to the opposition and say, "In one breath the opposition say there is great prosperity in the country, and in the next breath they say it is going to the dogs". As this is not the case, I will say now that there is the greatest prosperity in Canada today that this country has ever enjoyed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ferguson: You are applauding a little too soon, gentlemen. That is your trouble. You are willing to applaud and pat yourselves on the back when the country is enjoying only half the prosperity it should be. That is the Liberal gauge for prosperity for the people: "Half of what you should have is sufficient for you." Half of the prosperity to which this country is entitled, according to the Liberal government, is sufficient for the people of Canada. That is not my opinion about the prosperity of this country. The prosperity of Canada today should be twice or three times as great as it is. There is virtually no limit to what this country's prosperity should be in the year 1956.

I noted when my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. McIvor) spoke yesterday he suggested there should be a new post in the cabinet, the minister of peace, and that the minister of external affairs would be the very man to suit that position. May I suggest another post for the Liberal cabinet: the post of Moses. He would give this country the guidance and prosperity it needs. The Liberals are very prone to forget that the cabinet of the government of Canada has assumed the position of the great Creator. They smile and stick out their chests as if they had put the oil in the ground in Alberta. They are taking the credit for the iron ore being put in the ground in Quebec and Labrador.

An hon. Member: No, Mr. Manning put the oil in the ground in Alberta.

Mr. Ferguson: They forget about God and say it is the cabinet of this government that has the credit for having done all this. If they reflect quietly about this, the people of Canada will realize that the great credit for the prosperity of Canada has been brought about by individual corporations and men with vision and confidence in the country and in the development of its natural resources. That is what has brought prosperity to Canada from one end of the country to the other. But the Liberal government, which is responsible for immigration and for keeping in pace with the national prosperity resulting from the resources of this country, has fallen down badly on its job. No matter how obvious the needs of this country, this government has done nothing to create any spark of prosperity. What has the government done that they should claim any credit? You hear them talk about the schools they are building. One C.C.F. member from Saskatchewan who spoke yesterday said, "If it was not for the federal government what would Saskatchewan do without schools?" Let me say this to him. The government is only giving back to the people of Saskatchewan money that they were forced to entrust to them. He spoke as if the federal government was making a gift to the great province of Saskatchewan. He did not even intimate, he asserted, that if the Conservative party were in power the province of Saskatchewan might lose their sources of money for education and that their educational standards would probably drop. How absolutely ridiculous and unfounded such a statement is!

Can anybody in the world conceive of any ten men in the House of Commons, irrespective of politics, cutting down or curtailing the educational system anywhere in Canada? A man who makes such a statement does so deliberately to mislead the public or for want of something to say, and I think the latter was probably the case yesterday.

There is a perplexing problem mentioned in the speech from the throne, the problem of wheat. Here is where the Moses of the cabinet comes into the picture. The Moses of the cabinet stepped forth and said: "Moses is going to lead you into the land of promise; it is a godsend we have got all the wheat we have and no place to put it." Oh, what a Moses! Everything is going to be all right. Let me remind the Moses of the cabinet and the government that after the war European countries wanted all the wheat and other food commodities they could get but they did not have the necessary Canadian dollars to buy these commodities. Therefore they did everything in their power to plant wheat from which to make flour and thus replace to a degree the finest wheat in the world produced in this country simply because they could not buy our wheat. Through dire necessity, not having the money to buy our wheat, not having the Canadian or United States dollars, they began raising their own wheat.

In France 70 million bushels have been produced this year and in other parts of Europe 100 million bushels. The British Isles are almost producing enough wheat to fill their requirements. We sat back in 1953 with a crop of inferior wheat. We piled it into our granaries. We used all available storage space for that wheat when we should have sold it at a reasonable price for cattle feed. We should have got rid of it. We should have released the space knowing the positive fact that that wheat was not suitable wheat for flour. We should have taken 70 cents a bushel if necessary and made space available for the wheat crop of last year.

An hon. Member: Tell the farmers that.

Mr. Ferguson: I am sure that the members of the government, with their tongues in their cheeks, are hoping that the Good Book will come true and that there will be seven years of plenty and seven lean years.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): And grasshoppers.

Mr. Ferguson: If that occurs, and the old Bible is never wrong as far as I am concerned, then the government will get off the hook. They will be saved but they will be saved through Providence and not because of their vision or their proper management of the country's affairs. As sure as you are a foot high, if that prediction is one year out all the assets we believe we have in the form of wheat, for which the farmers are not being paid, will not be worth very much. I say that if the farming community of the Dominion of Canada is not prosperous the factories will not continue very long to produce the commodities that our farmers normally purchase. Men will be laid off in our machine shops. The motor car industry will not be talking about a tough time due to a strike. It will be talking about a tough time due to lack of sales. We in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario will feel the results. We felt them in the thirties.

It is all right to talk about the terrible thirties and say they will never recur. Nobody wants them to recur and we can avoid the conditions of the thirties to some extent if we give the people of Canada some guidance as to what they should be able to do for the next 365 days. They are intelligent, industrious people. The government can and should give the Canadian people the proper guidance. They should give the Canadian people their head, give them the resources God gave them, and we will not need any nonsensical talk 30 years hence about the trans-Canada highway or the pipe line.

What a speech from the throne we listened to this year! What an incentive for the people of Canada! I have listened to quite a few speeches from the throne and in my opinion the present one is the poorest, the most sparse and bare speech that has even been delivered. In a year of prosperity there is no guidance for the future except from the Moses of the cabinet who says that our wheat is a great asset. It is like some people who had a few million dollars in the thirties. They had a great asset, but the great majority of the people were suffering from want, and that is what is happening today.

It is all right to tell the farmers of the country it is a great asset but we should be selling feed grain to eastern farmers in Quebec and Ontario at a reasonable cost and clearing our granaries for first-class flour grain which we can hold in readiness for the lean years that are bound to come. Do not continue to fool the people of Canada because the greatest sufferers, the people who will feel the sharpness of defeat, are the men who sit on the Liberal benches, particularly the members of the cabinet. They have missed an opportunity, a great chance, to do something as businessmen instead of spending their time changing one cabinet minister from one post to another.

During the last election campaign they paraded a galaxy of pictures and said, "Look at all the wonderful men we have to fill the cabinet posts." Take a look at the posts today. They are almost all changed. With the exception of two, none of them occupies the same post, and one of them has been in every position in the cabinet in an effort to bolster up the brilliance that was depicted to us by the Liberal government during the last election. Some brilliance! Some cabinet!

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, today I should like to make a few remarks concerning the guaranteed annual wage. Possibly it might be more pertinent to discuss wheat or the pipe line at this time but full-scale debates will be coming up in these fields soon which will afford me the opportunity to participate and make my contribution at that time, and also this debate is of course a general one.

Before I bite into the core of my remarks, however, I should like to make a few comments about matters of interest to my constituents and also to touch very briefly upon the international scene. First, may I congratulate most warmly and sincerely the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon their excellent contributions. May I also congratulate the new Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe), whose department is so important to my constituents. Finally, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues for their effective governing of the country in both external and internal affairs since the house prorogued last July.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the Post Office Department, which has been criticized in the past, should be voted a hearty "well done" for the excellent job carried out this past Christmas. In my part of the country great credit should go to the postmaster of Toronto, Mr. Harry Lawrence, the various local postmasters, the inside staffs and, last but not least, to those tireless, good-natured and indispensable men, the letter carriers. They deserve the best but often I think they are the unsung heroes of the communications world. We in York Centre are grateful that approximately 40,000 more people now receive letter carrier service than received this service in 1953. There are still pockets which are not being served and there are also some brand-new subdivisions, but I feel sure that the Post Office Department will assist us in this regard and will render to us the effective and efficient service given us in the past.

I said that I would allude briefly to foreign affairs. I discern that the government is playing a more positive role in world affairs at the present time and this course I vigorously applaud. One might mention the trip of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to the Soviet union and Asia and also one might mention the brilliant work of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in steering through legislation in enlarging the membership of the United Nations. One important role I suggest we can play—and one which I urged in this debate in 1953—is to be a bridge between the United States and the commonwealth countries of Asia. I will go further. I say we should be a leader in promoting economic assistance and in rendering moral and political support to the peoples of Asia and Africa. It is interesting to note that the only important western statesman to visit India since last July is our Secretary of State for External Affairs, to counteract the influence of the Russian threering circus featuring those two performing bears. Mr. Speaker, it has often been said—and I believe rightly—that one of the best ways to combat communism is by social reform. It therefore follows that the way in which to combat communism in Asia and Africa is by helping the Asians and the Africans to raise their living standards by helping them to help themselves, not by turning the other cheek to colonialism or by allowing them to drift and slide or slip into the Stygian depths of Soviet totalitarianism.

I come now to the guaranteed annual wage or supplementary unemployment benefits or compensation as the plan is sometimes called. It is a social and economic phenomenon indigenous to North America. The idea is that industry provides basic financial security to the union member to the same extent as government does in several European countries. It will be the purpose of this brief discussion to weigh the various influences of this plan in an effort to determine the possible effects on our economic and social system.

At the outset I may point out that it would not appear to be as radically new a departure as it is reputed to be. The collective agreements provide only for supplementary unemployment payments to be added to existing unemployment insurance benefits. The principle is then to supplement present unemployment insurance legislation. Second, the idea is not brand new either. Various companies in the United States have had such plans of one kind or another in effect for some time.

The great United States jurist, Mr. Justice Brandeis, put it this way several decades ago:

> The right to regularity in employment is co-equal with the right to regularity in payment of rent . . . is as imperative as the reserve for depreciation; and it is equally a part of the fixed charges to make the actual contribution to that reserve. No business is socially solvent which cannot do so.

Again the sovereign state of Wisconsin in 1932 set up a state scheme of employer-financed unemployment compensation.

In brief, how does this plan work? Usually the company involved puts up 5 cents per hour for each hour worked by each employee in a special trust fund. When the fund exceeds a certain size in relation to the number of employees, the contribution of the employer ceases. The employee is entitled to draw on this fund during a lay-off for a one-year period, provided he has two or three years' continuous service with the company. Such payments, when added to unemployment insurance, comprise anywhere from 55 per cent to 75 per cent of ordinary take-home pay. In some cases the effect of the supplementary payments is nearly to double the unemployment insurance payments, particularly in the United States. In this country, in considering for example such union agreements as are in existence with Continental Can and American Can, the effect is to increase the unemployment insurance payments by approximately 50 per cent. In other words, if the unemployment insurance payment provides $30, the employee receives an additional $14 from the fund, making a total of $44.

Let us now detail some of the arguments raised against the guaranteed annual wage and endeavour to determine their merit. The first argument is that such a plan is possible only if a market can be guaranteed. If management cannot be guaranteed a salary, how can labour be guaranteed a wage? That is the way the argument runs. Guaranteed annual wage plans have been in effect for some time in such United States companies as Procter and Gamble, the Hormel Meat Packing Company and the Nunn Busch Shoe Company, to cite but three examples. At Procter and Gamble a full year's work is guaranteed but the company reserves the right to cut work and does not specify the wage rates. At Nunn Busch the year's work is similarly guaranteed but the volume of sales determines the amount of the cheques. Hon. members will note that these are consumers' goods industries with a relatively stable and constant market compared with durable goods industries. I would think, however, that the same argument would be applicable to the automobile industry. Certainly, as has been the experience since the war, in the foreseeable future demand will be constant over the long run owing to the increasingly voracious appetite of the public for new cars and owing to the increasing demand resulting from the growing Canadian population. Perhaps the solution generally would be to tie in the plan with sales. Certainly it has worked in this way in the examples I have cited above.

The second argument against the plan is that such a plan will ruin the spirit of adventure which is said to be a characteristic of the Canadian businessman. It is argued that employers will restrict production and employment to a minimum and that the resultant curtailment of industrial expansion in this country would bring on an economic recession. I respectfully submit that this argument has no merit whatsoever. Employers who have orders or expect to receive orders are going to fill them by hiring more employees, if necessary. If customers do not get service they will go elsewhere. It would take a high rate of supplementary payments to make employers lose customers rather than pay temporary employees.

Then again there are two other reasons why the plan, if applied generally, would encourage expansion rather than curtail production. Expansion means that the rate of lay-offs will be kept down and contributions to the fund will be accordingly less. Second, to the extent that payments under the plan mitigate the severity of depressions, the less risky is it to expand in the economy. There is thus more security for the industrialist as well as the employee within this framework, and hence the Canadian businessman can expand with considerably less risk and fear.

Another contention is that the accentuation on security will render the Canadian worker indifferent and rob him of initiative and ambition. But would anyone seriously believe that the Canadian working man would be satisfied to receive 65 per cent to 75 per cent of his regular pay when he can earn 100 per cent by working? A person believing this is, I say respectfully, unaware of the fierce desire among Canadians today to enjoy the amenities of life and is also unaware of the Canadian workingman's competitive fervour to live as well as his neighbours, to say nothing of his wife's desire to get him out of the kitchen and out of the house when jobs are available.

The great merit, Mr. Speaker, of the guaranteed annual wage is, of course, that it gives the unionized workingman security in a complex society where otherwise he would be at the mercy of economic conditions of supply and demand over which he would have little or no control. It is contended by union spokesmen that management now has an economic and social responsibility to provide steady, fulltime work for their employees. To avoid lay-offs, apart altogether from market factors, it is incumbent on management to plan and organize more effectively. Of course, once a fund is built up and is not depleted by lay-offs, management contributions will cease. It follows, therefore, that the efficient management will reap the benefits under the scheme. This will be applicable to both large and small companies, as size would seem to be irrelevant.

To sum up the other advantages I have alluded to previously I would say that the guaranteed annual wage plan would add modestly to the resistance against recession; would stimulate to some extent and would certainly not deter the expansion of industry. Then too, in itself, it would not be an inflationary influence except in so much as any force limiting recession is inflationary. Finally, as I have just said, production and employment would tend to be concentrated a little more in the more efficient industries, both large and small.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me both ironical and unfortunate that the plan, even in concept, is bitterly assailed by important sections of business. This is understandable, of course, if one has the nineteenth century laissez-faire economic outlook. But anyone who thinks those days are still with us is whistling in the graveyard. The mid-twentieth century concept of society is, as I see it, a concept within the framework of which everyone has a right to a job, the right to work, and the right to provide his family with a basic minimum of the necessities and amenities of life.

I said it is ironical that industry is in some quarters hostile, because if industry will not provide that basis of security to its employees, then the state will. Let us make no mistake about that! In this country we have a mixture of private and public enterprise, with the emphasis on the former. We have generous smatterings of the welfare state, and we will and must have a comprehensive national health plan as soon as arrangements can be worked out with the provinces. Our system has worked well, and I am sure that the business community will continue to measure up to its public responsibility now as in the past.

As for labour, it has always played a solid constructive role in the development of this country. Organized labour is one of the great progressive forces in our community; always at the forefront against discrimination in any of its vicious forms; always forward looking in its vigorous espousal of the causes of economic and social reform. As one of the cornerstones of our democratic state, organized labour is truly a bulwark against reaction and fascism or any other form of totalitarianism.

It is my opinion that the guaranteed annual wage opens up new vistas, new challenges to industry, which I feel certain will prove beneficial to labour, to management and to the Canadian people and will render even greater the speedy development of this great Canada of ours.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): The leader of the house told us today, Mr. Speaker, that within the next two or three weeks there would be an opportunity to have a debate on external affairs. That being so, I want to speak today about the situation in the Middle East. I do so for this reason. I want to advance certain propositions and to ask certain questions of the minister which he will have time to consider and which perhaps he will be able to answer.

The situation in that part of the world has become increasingly tense in the last few months, although judging from the Prime Minister's answer to my question today the right hon. gentleman did not seem to be too much aware of it. His Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is, as is illustrated by the fact he said there have been disturbing developments in the middle east in recent months. But the government as a whole apparently does not accept that fact. Potentially, the situation in the middle east is much more dangerous than that which existed in Korea or Indo China. The western world finds itself in trouble, and in no small measure through the shortsightedness of its own policies the western world has brought that trouble on itself.

What I do not like to see, and what I am not prepared to support, is any action by this country or this government which is going to add fuel to the flames which already exist. Canada is sending aircraft to Egypt. The minister told us that these permits were issued in the early summer. There is a vast difference between the situation which prevailed in the early summer of last year and the situation as it prevails today. There would have been much less danger in the situation had the aircraft been shipped when the permits were issued. Then only a few people realized that perhaps Russia was going to enter the Middle East in the way in which she did. But the unhappy fact is this. Although this government has expressed a desire to keep some sort of balance in the Middle East, yet it knows as well as I do that within recent months Egypt has entered into negotiations with countries behind the iron curtain whereby Egypt is buying at least $100 million worth of arms, and not at current market values. They are being bought at fire sale values, in some cases at a discount of as much as 90 per cent.

The result of that is going to be a decided imbalance of arms in the Middle East, with the Arab nations, comprising some 40 million inhabitants, replete with arms supplied by the Soviet union, ready to wage war on the small democracy of one and three-quarter million people which we helped to create. It is utter folly for Canada to send arms to a country which at this moment is already being armed by the Soviet union. Yet, according to what the Prime Minister said today, the government intends to proceed with this policy which I maintain is disastrous. I repeat, there is a vast difference in the situation as it exists today, and the situation as it existed when these permits were granted.

Yet there is a layer of whitewash being administered by departments of government and on the radio. Last night I heard Mr. Blair Fraser discuss this matter on the C.B.C. I imagine he is a self-appointed Liberal apologist. I listened to him at first with some amazement, and then with great hilarity.

An hon. Member: He is a Tory.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I cannot find the difference between a Tory and a Liberal sometimes. I am not suggesting he is a professional apologist. He is, however, a most highly enthusiastic amateur.

I want to remind the house of what has happened in the last week. I asked the minister a question last Wednesday. I suppose many members of this house had known that planes were being shipped to Egypt. It was no secret. The news appeared in the December issue of Canadian Aviation, a journal published in Toronto. I asked the minister whether these planes had been shipped and his answer was that, to the best of his knowledge, such was not the case. He said explicitly:

> In order to give a final answer to this question I would have to make inquiries of the Department of Trade and Commerce as well as my own department. However, I believe I can say at once that I know of no shipments of Canadian aircraft to Egypt or of any orders for such shipments.

The members of the opposition sometimes find themselves in an unhappy position when a minister makes a denial. Of course the denial achieves publicity in the press, and I am not complaining about it. But, as I say, it does put those who know something of what is going on in an extremely invidious position.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, that on more than one occasion you have asked the members of the opposition to accept the word of a minister, and I think you were absolutely right. But I insist there must be a quid pro quo. If we are to accept the word of a minister, then the minister has to tell us the facts.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, maybe I should intervene and say the answer I gave at that time was strictly accurate. No planes had been shipped to Egypt at that time and no orders had been received recently in the terms of the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Speaker: May I interject here. The theory of the hon. gentleman as to the acceptance of a statement by any member of this house, that is from one by another, is not quite accurate. I think he might well compare notes with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I shall discuss the matter later with my colleague. I am now dealing with the minister and he is indulging in semantic quibbles.

Then the next day, knowing this was a matter of urgent public importance, I asked the minister again if the statement was right. The minister did not know then what the situation was. There has been nothing but confusion in this government. There is no liaison between ministers. They do not consult with each other. Each minister goes his own set way, and this minister was left in utter and complete ignorance of what was going on. The minister's answer to me, as reported at page 33 of Hansard, was:

I should have thought my hon. friend would have been satisfied with the answer to his own question which he gave to the press after the sitting yesterday.

The Canadian Press came to see me. I said I believed 25 planes were being shipped by Canadian Car and Foundry. This was published in the newspapers. Apparently the members of the opposition know much more of what is going on in the government than do members of the government. And I am satisfied that makes in no way whatsoever for good government.

Then the Egyptian ambassador appeared on the scene and stigmatized the whole affair as being a deliberate falsehood. Well, I had some sympathy for the gentleman. I remember the definition of Sir Henry Wotton that an ambassador is an honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country. His Excellency has all the attributes of an admirable ambassador and he should certainly go far in his chosen profession.

Then we have the case of the Star of Assuan. This is an Egyptian vessel which was taking a cargo to the Middle East. The captain of the vessel who might have access, one would think, to the ship's manifest said, "All we have are apples and things." These things included guns and trucks and three of these aircraft which the government apparently did not know about before nine o'clock yesterday morning. Then all the newspapers the next day tried to get at the truth of it. I have here the Globe and Mail of yesterday morning. There is a dispatch under the by-line of Dave McIntosh who had this to say on two separate occasions:

Canadian arms are being shipped to Turkey but none to Egypt, responsible officials indicated today.

The responsible officials obviously knew nothing of what was going on. Further on we find this:

But one senior authority, through whose department all foreign orders for military supplies normally go, said that after an exhaustive check he could find nothing to indicate that arms were being exported to Egypt.

No one knew anything about it. The Liberal curtain of silence was being brought down on everything, and the only character absent from the scene was Ananias. His soul must have rested in peace, for his blood brothers were evident in the whole picture. Twelve planes are still going to this area where conflagration is imminent, and the Prime Minister said he had no reason to cancel the export permit.

Well, perhaps the Prime Minister does not know what is going on, but I am certain the Secretary of State for External Affairs does. I am certain the Secretary of State for External Affairs knows that today Egypt is arming the enemies of one of our closest allies, namely France. Is there any guarantee that Canadian planes are not going to be given away by Egypt to shoot down French soldiers? I cannot see the French government, itself, being very happy about it.

Then yesterday I asked the minister if he could tell us whether or not gun mountings are on the planes and he answered, again not too accurately:

I shall try to secure that information, but I do not know how you could put a gun mounting on a Harvard training aircraft.

Well, Mr. Speaker, he was sitting next to his colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney), and the Minister of National Defence has issued certain pictures; one showing a Harvard releasing a stream of rockets, one showing a Harvard carrying bombs and one showing a Harvard with machine guns mounted on its wings. Yet we are told these are just training planes, non-combat planes, civilian planes. There is no guarantee whatsoever from Egypt that these planes will be used in any way other than that for which Egypt wants to use them, which may be the attempted destruction of Israel.

I asked the Prime Minister last week, for his own sake as much as for any other reason, if he would try to let the right hand of the government know what the left hand of the government is doing. Apparently the right hon. gentleman was not interested. There has been nothing but fumbling and confusion in this whole sorry mess. The government comes out of it with very little credit—in view of the Prime Minister's answer to me today, with much discredit. The policy which has been pursued at its best is dangerous and at its worst can be disastrous.

But what of the Middle East? The most obvious fact is that Russia is there and right in the middle of it. I am amazed at those who express amazement. We should have known that Russia was going to go in there. We should have known that Russia was prepared to probe every weak spot in the western armour. Russia has gone there because, as I said in the debate in 1948, one cannot appreciate Soviet ambitions unless one has a knowledge of czarist aspirations. There is no difference today between the foreign policy of the Soviet union and the foreign policy of czarist Russia in so far as expansion is concerned.

Last year I heard a well known United States diplomat say that conducting the game of diplomacy with the Russians was like playing a game of chess. I am not going to give that diplomat's name but he reminds me of a quotation from Disraeli:

> To call him notorious might be offensive; to call him distinguished would be to prostitute an epithet and whom I shall therefore sum up as being rather well known.

Had this well known United States diplomat known something about the game of chess then he should have foreseen what was going to happen; that the Russian knight would jump over the pawns of the northern tier and threaten us with mate in the Middle East.

Russia has not gone through the back door; she has gone through the front door. The situation is dangerous for all of us. Russia has shown that she will not be stopped by pacts, such as the Baghdad alliance, another example of the state department "pactomania", an alliance ostensibly against communism. We have been told in this house that these alliances against communism were open to all countries which do not like the communist way of life. The Baghdad treaty, of course, is not open; it is a closed shop. It is not open because Iraq insists that it be closed to one nation, the only democracy in the Middle East, namely the democracy of Israel. Now what has Iraq done? As soon as Britain assumed her as a partner in the cold war against communism, Iraq warned the big three that she would use the arms she received under the Baghdad treaty as she saw fit.

A military spokesman said, only a month or two ago, "Iraq's best brigade is ready to march against Israel, supplied by western arms". And only recently Iraq has insisted that unless she gets the most modern western arms she is going to turn to the Soviet union. Again we are being played off; again we are falling for the same old game. The Arab nations are obviously arming to the teeth, yet the British foreign office tells Israel it must not start an arms race.

There is a group in the British foreign office who seem to be passionate admirers of the Arabs. They are most self-righteous; they are clothed with impeccable correctitude; they give one the impression that they were sired by Jehovah out of the goddess of wisdom, but their policy has been little short of disastrous. The effect of playing up to Iraq in this way has been to antagonize Egypt, a country which legitimately has assumed leadership in the Middle East. Egypt has been by-passed and Iraq has been pandered to with all the consequences that will come from such action. We profess surprise that Egypt enters into a pact with the iron curtain nations to get arms, but there is no reason whatsoever for our surprise. Egypt told us some months ago, just last June, what she was going to do.

We have the cold war transferred to the Middle East, and I believe that Russia's intentions are absolutely clear. In 1947-48 the Soviet union supported Israel for one reason only, to get the United Kingdom out of Palestine. That having been achieved, the next step in Russian foreign policy is to get the west out of the Middle East as rapidly as possible, and so now it supports the Arabs. Russia does not want to get involved in a war in the Middle East, but Russia will not be too unhappy if as a result of her machinations and our stupidity Israel and the Arab states become involved in a war, because the west would be involved also and the only possible victor would be the Soviet union. If I am right in that diagnosis, and I believe I am, then the obvious way to block the Soviet union is to see that peace is maintained in the Middle East, and it is to that end that our diplomacy should be directed. We know what the Russians want; we know what they will do.

What about the western powers? What about the United States? I wish I knew what was United States policy in the Middle East. I wish the Americans knew what was their policy in the Middle East. We had a statement by Mr. Dulles last August which presented the skeleton of an agenda around which the nations could negotiate. Israel accepted that proposal as the basis for negotiation, but the Arabs as usual spurned it.

The real problem is what are British intentions in the Middle East. I have never been an admirer of the Middle East division of the British foreign office, as I think the minister well knows. It has a record of which it has no reason to be proud. I remember commenting on that situation in 1948, especially on British relations vis-à-vis the Arabs, and what I said then is true today. I should like to quote from page 3550 of Hansard of May 3, 1948 what I said when we were dealing with the partitioning of Palestine:

> I say the British will find that the cost of Arab friendship has been expensive, for all their other attachments have been sacrificed. French interests and Jewish hopes have been laid on the altar of Arab intransigence, and the gift has been spurned. I do not profess to understand this pandering to feudal monarchs and the most reactionary and, indeed, treacherous interests in the Middle East.

I was discussing at that time the conduct of Egypt and Iraq during the war and I maintain that there has been no significant change in British policy. A particular section of the foreign office is still infatuated with the Arabs. It is afflicted with too many aspiring Lawrences. What is the record of Israel in this matter of negotiations with the Arabs? I am going to quote the London Times, which is not a friend of that country but which had this to say in an editorial:

> She has grasped every chance and created more to negotiate with Arabs apart from their governments. She has tried to lead Arab governments into negotiation at all levels.

I wish the Arabs had been as willing to negotiate. This same paper, the London Times, which not too infrequently mirrors changes in or actualities of British foreign policy, made its position abundantly clear. I think this may be the position of the foreign office, when the Times, commenting on Israel's desire for a treaty, said in its editorial of August 29:

> As things stand, such an alliance is impossible and such pressure futile . . . Alliance implies a high identity of interest and Britain's interest in the Middle East can be advanced now by alliance with the Arab states. They alone, however incompetent, unstable or unreliable, have the oil, occupy the territory and provide airfields in sufficient dispersion for the function they fulfil.

Perhaps that was a case of coming events casting their shadows before them, but I should like to ask the editor of that paper: Should our security be based on alliances which a few pieces of gold will upset? Has there been a record other than that in the history of the Middle East, with the exception of that one democratic country of which I speak? The Arabs have the oil. Russia probably needs that oil if she has war in mind. The United Kingdom needs that oil today because she gets from it dollars and the currencies of other countries by selling it on the markets of the world.

The story of oil is a dirty and filthy story, a story of crookedness, corruption, and rottenness. It is not much different today from what it was in the past. We should realize that as a result of oil those two allies, the United Kingdom and the United States, have almost been at war with each other in the Middle East. In fact their pawns have been shooting at each other. I refer to the incident that occurred in the fall of last year when the troops of the sultan of Muscat supported by Trucial Oman levies with British officers clashed with Saudi Arabian military units. Saudi Arabia is backed by the Arab-American oil company, the sultan by the British foreign office, and both of them were fighting for oil in the Middle East.

There is nothing that could be more fatal than such results of avowed policies. I have talked about these oil companies before in this house and pointed out in 1948 how Aramco had made profits of $170 million on a capitalization of $1 million within a few years. Last year it paid King Saud more than $250 million in royalties, but not one cent of that money was used to improve the conditions of the people in that area. Instead Saud finds himself still helplessly poor, since he has to bribe and pay his way out of so much trouble and extravagance. Where does the money come from? A most revealing document entitled "The Price of Oil in Western Europe" was published by the United Nations. It shows where the money comes from. I quote:

> Total payments in respect of taxes and royalties by Aramco to the government of Saudi Arabia amounted in 1952 to $212 million. Since, under the existing agreement, such payments represent 50 per cent of the net profits realized on crude oil production, net profits must have been in the neighbourhood of $425 million, on a total production in that year of 300 million barrels. In other words, with crude oil selling at $1.75 per barrel, a net profit in the neighbourhood of $1.40 per barrel was being earned.

Who is being held up in this process? We have an international cartel which decides what the price of oil shall be. They are the ones who are making the money; they are the ones who have a great interest in that area; they are the ones who will sacrifice honour and everything else as long as their profit situation is kept sacred. I am not saying that the oil industry is a monopoly, but I think it fulfils Stuart Chase's definition of an oligopoly.

What about the speech which Sir Anthony Eden made on November 10 last in the Guildhall. He said:

> It is not right that United Nations resolutions should be ignored.

I welcomed that statement, and I am sure it will be welcomed by every hon. member of this house. United Nations resolutions should not be ignored. But this was a change in United Kingdom policy. They ignored these resolutions dealing with Palestine when it suited their particular purpose. The Arab nations not only ignored them but they destroyed them, as they would have destroyed

Israel had they been able to get away with it. I remind the house again that on the morning of May 15, 1948, the day the state of Israel was created, Arab legions were invading that area. War was declared by the Arab nations. They have not given any sign since that there is anything less than a state of war prevailing in that area.

One of the things which I think is implicit in Sir Anthony's speech is that Britain would be willing to act as a mediator if both sides would agree to come to terms and give up certain territory. This matter of giving up territory is of great importance. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made a speech in 1948. It is out of date, and I do not say that he holds the same views today, but I am quoting it because I want to know what he thinks now about this matter. Speaking in the United Nations assembly in November, 1948, he said in part:

> On the other hand . . . the Jewish community should realize that it cannot have it both ways—it cannot have all the territory that was given it by the November 29 resolution, together with all the additional territory which it has been able to take by force of arms.

One of the questions I want to ask the minister is this: Is that still his position and the position of the government, or have intervening incidents compelled a change of mind? I hope they have. Let us consider this matter of Israel having to give up territory to appease the Arabs. What territory did Lebanon lose in the war of liberation? Her borders are practically the same. What territory did Syria lose in the war of liberation? Her territories are practically the same. Did Jordan lose any territory? No; on the contrary, in 1950 Jordan assumed responsibility for a large portion of what had been Palestinian territory. I have never heard any suggestion from the British foreign office or other countries that Jordan give up any territory.

What about Egypt? Egypt lost no territory; she gained some. She gained an area she would perhaps like today to get rid of; she gained the Gaza strip. Has it ever been submitted that Egypt should give up territory? But Israel has to accede to truncation in the sacred name of getting together and perhaps achieving peace.

Furthermore, there was never any United Nations resolution to the effect that the Arab states should profit out of their defiance of the United Nations. But those who advocate today that Israel, for the sake of peace, should give up territory which is vital to her, are advocating a reward for aggression; they are advocating a requital for Arab intransigence. I do not blame the government of Israel for not seeing eye to eye with the western powers in this matter.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

In any event, let us assume that territory was given up. Is there any guarantee the Arabs would be satisfied with a truncated Israel? Everything they have said points to their insistence that Israel must be destroyed. Are we to gain anything whatever by appeasing the Arabs? Perhaps there may be two different points of views, but my point of view is that we have nothing whatsoever to gain.

It has been suggested that perhaps Israel might give up part of the southern Negev. That was a British expression of opinion. Why? Because Egypt wants to inherit more desert, or because the United Kingdom wants to have some means of communication between Aqaba, which is at the head of the Red sea, and her stations near the Suez? I should like to know what is behind many of these demands that Israel give up territory that was taken from nobody, which really was the territory of a state that had died stillborn, the Arab part of what was to be Palestine. Had that land belonged to other countries there might be some justification. It has not; therefore I cannot see why Israel ought to give it up.

Before I leave this matter, let me say that I believe there have to be rectifications of frontiers; villages have to be joined together and lines have to be straightened out. But there would be no sense in our insisting that Israel give up territory which, as I have said, is completely necessary for her future and her welfare.

The other vexing question is, of course, that of refugees. There are approximately 900,000 refugees in Arab countries around Israel, living in desperate poverty and misery. I myself cannot claim to have seen these camps, but I know others who have. I would feel happier were I convinced that the Arab nations were doing something to help these unfortunate refugees. There is a refugee camp in Jordan which one must pass when travelling from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. That camp is there for a deliberate purpose, so that every pilgrim to that area shall see the suffering of these Arab refugees, the idea being to instigate more dislike for the state of Israel which it adjoins. The refugees are being used by the Arab nations today as pawns in the game of power politics.

Lists of refugees have been padded. The United Nations pays out some $2.50 a month per capita to feed these unfortunate people, but the lists are padded. I am told it was reported last year that out of 900,000 refugees, only 400 died. The comparable death rate in this country, which is infinitely better off than the refugee camps, would be 8,000.

I should like to know where that money is really going. For eight years these refugees have been indoctrinated with hatred for the state of Israel. Now it is suggested that Israel should take them back. Obviously that is absurd. A few years ago Israel offered to take back 100,000. The offer again was spurned. However, in the interim many have been going back; probably some 60,000 or 70,000 families have been reunited, parents reunited with their children and husbands with wives. They have been coming back and living on exactly the same basis as any other citizens of Israel. But to expect Israel to take back a massive number of Arab refugees, who have been taught to hate Israel and to try to destroy it, is asking more than any modern state would be prepared to accede to.

Canada has a part to play here. We have, as a servant of the United Nations in the Middle East, General Burns, a man whose judgments are not always liked but a man who has the respect of the people there because they know he is a man of integrity. Because they respect him, they respect Canada. Canada is a nation without any imperialistic ambitions. Why, then, cannot Canada play a more significant part than it has in the past?

We speak a good deal about assuming the obligations which are ours under the United Nations charter. One of our obligations is to do everything in our power to see that war does not break out. Therefore I believe that Canada can do much more than it has done. Mr. Hammarskjold is now in the Middle East trying to bring Israelis and Arabs together. He may fail. If he fails, then another attempt must be made. Egypt is the linchpin of the whole business and it is Egypt which must be persuaded.

If we are to establish peace in that region, however, there will have to be a massive scheme of social rehabilitation. Such a scheme will be fantastically expensive; but if peace is the result I say it is worth it. Where are we going to obtain the money? We already know something of the profits of the oil companies in that area. We already know these oil companies are prepared to sacrifice national interests as long as their own interests are maintained.

I suggest it is worth considering that the United States, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and France nationalize or socialize—call it what you like—these oil companies. Let them reimburse their nationals with securities of the state. Let them approach the Arab states and say, "We are prepared to give you a half interest in these oil companies and, further, we are prepared to give the profits which accrue from the development of oil in this area to a fund under the United Nations which will be used exclusively to rehabilitate the Middle East."

I can hear people say, "It is absurd, it is fantastic, we cannot do it." I say it has to be done or we will lose everything. How long is Saudi Arabia going to be prepared to sit back and get 50 per cent of the pie when she can get 100 per cent whenever she wants to? How long are these oil companies going to be safe from Arab determination to get more than they are already getting? The Arabs will take over these companies when they wish to do so.

I have been told the Arabs would face the great difficulty of having no technicians. Let us not be naïve. They can get all the technicians they want today from Moscow, and with them, these oil fields will be run. Do not let these oil corporations have any illusions as to what their future is in that area. They are in danger. They are in jeopardy. That is why, of course, they buy off the powers that be with such huge sums of money as we know are given to the king of Saudi Arabia.

But suppose after every step has been taken which could lead to peace the Arabs are still intransigent. What happens then? Here is a problem which has to be faced. There is only one thing the west can do. Along with the offer of rehabilitation, peace must be imposed in the Middle East by the United Nations, and peace on the basis of the existing armistice lines with certain emendations. I see no other solution, because if war breaks out there then we will lose everything. Israel is prepared to negotiate. The Arabs are not. Somehow they have to be brought together. That is the responsibility of diplomacy and the minister has to play a part in that.

It is not a task we can afford to shirk. It is a task that we have to try to accomplish. I am convinced that the great powers of this world will sacrifice Israel if they believe that country jeopardizes their own national interests. It is no cliché to say that Israel is a bastion of democracy. It is true. I have seen it at work. It is democracy, and to sacrifice that nation now leaves me at a loss for words to describe such a policy. We in Canada have played an honourable part in the creation of Israel. We can still play an honourable part, but in doing so we have to assume greater responsibilities than those we have had in the past.

Mr. Charles Henry (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to say a few words in this debate on the reply to the speech from the throne. The speech has set out adequately the state of Canada as we see it today, and I have no difficulty at all in agreeing with the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the motion for concurrence. I find that there is confidence in the government, and I say this because in a few words I find that the speech satisfies me that the twentieth century still belongs to Canada.

I think there is historic significance in that we have had the motion which we are considering moved by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley). She is one of the distinguished women and mothers of Canada, and it is historic to think that in the year when parliament will adopt a measure providing for equal pay for women, one of the distinguished women and mothers of Canada has entered this debate in this way. In addition, however, I wish to point out that the mover of the motion is a voice from the frontiers of northern Canada, this land of frontiers, a very significant thing at this time in our history.

As for the seconder of the motion, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), it is a tribute to the Canadianism of our French speaking compatriots that he should take part in this debate, remembering that it was Laurier who proclaimed that the twentieth century would belong to Canada. It gives us a renewal of this spirit of the frontier in this debate to think that the hon. member for Bellechasse has seconded the motion.

We must not forget that under Laurier our frontiers were extended westward, and that under the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King the gains which we made were consolidated, he being the father of our social security system. We remember, therefore, that we are born to the spirit of the frontier, which gives rise to private initiative, private property and a feeling of political as well as economic democracy amongst us.

Under the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this spirit of adventure still persists. This spirit of adventure has carried us into the United Nations, NATO, and into the parliamentary councils of the world. This Canadian spirit of the frontier has been projected abroad. But we must remember also that within the lifetime of this parliament the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage), a follower of Jacques Cartier, extended the boundaries of Canada to the north and now Canada has sovereignty extending to the Queen Elizabeth islands. As I see it, he did this not only for the queen of Canada and all Canadians, but for Her Majesty as queen of the commonwealth. He did it also on behalf of our NATO partners, because this extension of our frontiers to the north is indeed a very important shield for NATO and for all the free world.

In considering the extension of Canada's political sovereignty we must also compare the extension of Canada's economic sovereignty. Indeed, these should be kept abreast and equal. Balance is an important thing for the development of our nation. Therefore the first problem of an economic nature which I should like to discuss is the question of foreign investment in Canada. There have been estimates made on the other side of the house ranging between 30 and 40 per cent in this field. However, I would point out that there is no great measure of agreement amongst economists on this point, and that it is a matter which should engage our consideration. One eminent Dutch economist in writing about the economic future of Canada has pointed out that post-war investment within Canada from outside Canada may be limited to the figure of 15 per cent. It will be important for the Gordon commission to consider this matter and to give a studied report on the subject.

On the question of foreign investment I think it is important to remember, however, that in the early days of the development of the United States there was heavy reliance on foreign investment, and a great piece of work was done there with the use of foreign capital for its development. We must remember also that there are projects of development under way in Canada today which are of such size that the question of foreign investment becomes almost a must.

There is the development of Labrador iron. It is beyond my comprehension how we could have developed that great project if there had not been reliance on foreign investment. In addition, it must also be remembered that when other countries bring their capital here for investment it is a tribute to Canada. Not only that, but when we use these foreign funds it frees much needed risk and equity capital within Canada for other domestic advances in our economy.

The next problem about which I wish to speak is that of providing a balanced share of the national income for those on fixed incomes. In this group, as we know, are included those who procure their income from investments and the group of senior citizens and others who are on pensions. I say the Gordon commission can do much for us if it will compare our standard of living with that of the United States, and our system of taxation as well as of social security, with those of our neighbour to the south.

Our standard of living is second to that of the United States, probably less by 20 or 25 per cent in the level of development. However, I trust that the Gordon commission can give us light on the subject. There is also for consideration the question of tax relief for those on investment income and, in addition, progressive increases in social security payments under our system for those receiving them.

The greatest social security measure yet unimplemented by this government and the provinces, of course, is health insurance. I think it is a tribute to the Prime Minister and the government, that we see an atmosphere prevailing as between the government and the provinces which, to say the least, is one of co-operation in the field of dominion-provincial relations. Let us hope that the committee at present studying health insurance will bring forward a solution for this problem, and that before long we may see, as between the provinces and the dominion legislation which may lead the way to this great social measure.

I wish to consider next the future intervention of government in the economy and in business. In my view the policy of the government is sound in that public ownership is relied upon as the exception rather than the rule. The government has shown a clear indication of relying upon direction of the economy on its part, and leaving control for the most part to private enterprise. Using an analogy to the weather, I believe it is the function of government to provide a good climate but not to control the raindrops.

Under this thinking, private enterprise should be given the first chance to develop our assets in every case. But private enterprise may fail. There are certain cases where it will not and cannot carry on a development, and in those circumstances public intervention on the part of the government is warranted and indeed desirable. The common good must prevail, and where things are needed it is insufficient reason to say that private enterprise cannot provide them.

There is the problem, however, of balance in the economy generally. I speak of balance as between the primary, secondary and tertiary industries of our country. The balance to date, in the development of our country in the post-war period, has been very good. We have come through a hot war and a cold war, and now we are in a period of what some call the cold peace. The record for 1955 is encouraging. The books have been closed in effect and we have a record of prosperity that is very good.

However, we have some agricultural surpluses which are a matter of concern to all of us in this chamber and to Canadians generally. It has been encouraging to note the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in which he said that last year grain was marketed in the west which was the equivalent of an average crop, and that he thought the surpluses were temporary. In so far as city dwellers are concerned, there has been a substantial net gain in wages for labour estimated to be 7 per cent. This is an encouraging thing for Canadians at this time as we enter upon the year 1956.

In particular, the Gordon commission will take into consideration an assessment of the future, as well as plans for expansion in relation to our resource industries. I trust that we shall obtain guidance from the application of that famous United States commission which prepared the Paley report. As we know, this was a commission set up by the President of the United States to advise upon resource materials. Decision must be made as to the precise extent of its application to Canada and in particular as to the timing of the terms of the report to Canada.

In this particular period I think we have something to learn as to how much of our resource development has been due to Korean rearming, stockpiling for NATO and such things as political instability abroad. There are certain findings of the Paley report which should be studied carefully, too.

The report says in effect that domestic takings on the part of the United States in the past several years have now reached proportions which are greater than the known reserves in the fields of copper, lead, zinc and oil. In addition to this fact, the Paley report points out in another section that as of 1950 the United States was forced to import 10 per cent of its petroleum, one-third of its copper and zinc, and one-half of its lead. All those items were formerly exported by the United States. Finally the report projects this thought. In 1975 all materials on the part of the United States will be 50 per cent to 60 per cent higher in demand than as of 1950. All minerals except gold will be 90 per cent higher in demand than in 1950. Finally, as to certain mineral commodities, the demand will be even greater than the percentages and figures I have mentioned.

Obviously the Gordon commission will turn its eyes upon central Canada, that is Ontario and Quebec. An economist writing today about Canada tells us that it is the industrial heartland of North America and is destined to become the industrial heartland of the free world. I am referring now to that part of Canada which fronts on the United States and runs along the St. Lawrence river and the southern great lakes. Here you have an area which competent economists estimate as giving production which is greater than that of the whole of Europe minus Russia. This indeed is a tremendous record, but in this thermonuclear age I would think we in Canada should start to think about the implications involved in terms of the centralization of industry in this area.

I think it is a matter of urgent necessity at this time for the government, on the advice of the Gordon commission, to give thought to the expansion of primary and secondary industry elsewhere throughout Canada, bearing in mind this tremendous concentration in central Canada. Indeed, I think consideration should be given to decentralization of government records and certain functions which are centralized in this area. It is a matter of concern for provincial governments and the federal government as to planning and development of the decentralization in relation to government records and government functions. In this field I think there is a role for bar associations, business associations, trade associations and learned societies, and I think that they should be the right arm of government in planning this decentralization which I believe is needed in the circumstances. It is to be noted that in the United Kingdom these professional and business organizations play a role in this respect. All this is said, of course, because within our time in the immediate decade ahead this particular area will be the "workshop" and the "arsenal of democracy".

As to the resource industries in the other parts of Canada, let me remind hon. members about the lead and zinc which have been found recently in the Yukon and in New Brunswick and the nickel and copper found also in the Yukon, but again in Manitoba; and finally of the iron deposits not only in Labrador but in Newfoundland and in a place near here, namely Renfrew county. In the light of the Paley report I think these great resources are a challenge to the imagination of all Canadians for the development of industry throughout the whole nation.

I wish to pay a tribute in this house to Canada's newest and most unique province, namely Newfoundland. Here is one which has set a record as to the true frontier spirit for all Canadians to see. We have heard of Brinco, a crown corporation under the direction of the provincial government in that great province. Brinco has done much to bring outside capital to Newfoundland. Indeed, primary and secondary industries are being developed at a surprisingly successful pace in that province at the very moment. Premier Smallwood has proved himself to be quite a private enterpriser not only within Newfoundland but also in the capitals of the world. He has investigated his great supply of primary resources and has done great things. We heard him speak at the dominion-provincial conference. Indeed, it will not be his fault if Newfoundland does not develop. Of one thing we are certain. He was correct when he said he had no intention of remaining idle and leaving his province to be a game preserve or a tourist attraction.

We think the great resources of that province will not be long in making themselves felt in markets at home and abroad. Of course he has an able assistant here in the person of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), who makes an able advocate at the "nerve centre", Ottawa. Their combined efforts should indeed see to the welfare of that province.

As to the agricultural problem on the prairies and the surpluses, I do think it is important that in June next there will be a census of the people of Canada. This will give to the government and the Gordon commission up to date figures indicating how many Canadians are on the farms and in the cities. At present we have the 1950 figures, and at that time 13 per cent of the working force would appear to have been on the farms of Canada. Economists estimate that we can employ as many as 20 per cent on the farms, but there is a difference of opinion amongst economists on this matter. I feel that in the light of the census figures which we will obtain in June, a very important study will be forthcoming from the Gordon commission on this subject. I, for one, will look forward to reading it.

In conclusion, I wish to say that the speech from the throne has shown that this government is alert to the financial advances which are important for Canada if it is to have a balanced capital expansion. I have read the speech with care, and I see that for short-term credit there is to be a revision of the Small Loans Act. I presume this will make small loan credit more readily obtainable by consumers throughout the country, which is a good thing. I note that in the long-term credit field there is to be an extension of the National Housing Act provisions concerning the redevelopment of the blighted areas in the cities. This has always been an important matter for me, because I represent the riding of Toronto-Rosedale.

I think that if the government sees fit to diversify the nature of the amendment to the extent that commercial properties may be included in the financial arrangements under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, it will be a good thing. We would have the commercial development of properties which are blighted and in need of redevelopment in such areas. I know that it would be most welcome in Toronto because the daily press, particularly the Telegram, has been very active in advocating just such a redevelopment. In fact I believe this newspaper has had much to do with the sharpening of public opinion on the subject at this time. I visualize that there will come to a metropolis like Toronto great advances in commercial assessment and increased tax income as a result. I understand the mayor and board of control are looking for new income, and this should please them very much.

In addition to this, I wish to commend the Minister of Finance for the consideration he has given the taxation of crown-owned property in Toronto. I would remind him that in Great Britain all crown properties in cities comparable to Toronto are taxable by the municipal authorities notwithstanding that they are crown-owned. This should be a firm precedent. I hope the time is not long until we shall see taxes paid on those properties in order to enable our large municipalities to better discharge their financial obligations.

I welcome also the farm improvement legislation and the home improvement legislation. These are matters which will help Canada to expand. I do not think there is any industry which can better help to solve unemployment than the construction industry. This industry is active now throughout the whole year and is the answer to a very large extent to the regional and seasonal aspect of unemployment in Canada.

Finally I wish to speak about the industrial development bank and the legislation proposed by the government in this regard. There always has been in Canada, as indeed there has been in the United States, a shortage of equity capital to advance industrial expansion. Our banks have been limited in this respect by their charters. There has been a shortage of loan companies, a shortage of investment trusts, and indeed a shortage of building societies as we know them in the United Kingdom. This has meant that we have had trouble with our housing, both private and public.

One result of this was government intervention in requesting our chartered banks to take upon themselves the duty of mortgage financing. However this, tied in with the public housing provisions of the National Housing Act, has worked well and has produced municipal and public housing corporations. Good results have been achieved to date, but we hope that with the amendments now proposed there will be an expansion not only in the field of private ownership but in the public housing field.

I feel that this industrial development bank legislation could be used to good effect in the commercial field, perhaps combined with the National Housing Act amendments. I hope to see an upsurge of the frontier spirit, an upsurge of private initiative in Canada, in this commercial redevelopment of our smaller cities outside the metropolitan areas, and indeed in our towns. I hope to see municipal industrial commissions established, which would be building societies. They would go forward with the matter of establishing factories for our workers in the primary and secondary fields. Equity funds could be provided, and mortgage funds could be provided also. They would build factories and long-term leases could be provided to attract industries to the smaller centres of Canada. This would give us a decentralized expansion of primary and secondary industry, which could be of great advantage to Canada in the future.

My final words are these, Mr. Speaker. Canada is the golden hinge between the United Kingdom and the United States, a dominant world trading power and a political figure in the world of nations. Let us have a balanced economy between farm and city, between our primary and our other industries. Let us watch to see that in expanding production we have markets to sell the products being produced. Above all, in watching the balance of the economy let us watch inflation. I do not fear inflation, because I believe this government has experimented sufficiently and satisfied itself as to the best monetary and fiscal ways of avoiding inflation.

I say it is no magic new law of control of our affairs that I am advocating. I am advocating vigilance at home and abroad; in NATO and the United Nations. I am advocating brotherhood, an old fashioned doctrine. Then I am advocating prudence in monetary, fiscal and commercial matters. I say there is a framework of combined private and public enterprise in Canada which has proven successful since confederation, and within this framework if everybody cares enough, if everybody shares enough, then everybody has enough.

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): In rising to take part in this debate for a few minutes I would say that I have found it rather difficult to become greatly interested in the speech from the throne. In this I believe I am not much different from the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address. However, those two speakers were very enthusiastic about the ridings from which they come. I do like to see a member who is proud of his riding, and those two speakers certainly have shown pride in the parts of Canada which they so ably represent in this house.

During the last few months of 1955 I believe the people of Canada followed with interest the work of the Canadian delegation at the United Nations. I should like to commend our entire delegation under the able leadership of the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the prestige which they brought to this country during the deliberations which took place there.

Since coming to this house, Mr. Speaker, I have had a perennial problem, but during the past year the Minister of Public Works has relieved me of this. I am thinking of the new federal building at Vernon. This has now reached the stage where test holes have been sunk to test the foundation on which the building will be built, and we now assume that work will be started at an early date, so I am writing this off as one of my problems.

During the recess the Minister of Agriculture paid a visit to my riding. I sincerely regret that previous commitments had made it impossible for me to be present at the convention of the British Columbia confederation of agriculture the day he was there. However, the minister did perform various ceremonies and received delegations that I had arranged for, and he handled these with his usual good grace. I should like him to know that we appreciated his visit and would ask him for a repeat performance when I could possibly be a better host.

Naturally, since Vernon is the centre of the second largest and the best butter producing area in British Columbia, the minister became involved in the butter situation that we have heard so much about recently. I must say he slid out of this situation with better grace than might have been expected under such slippery conditions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take the time of the house in talking about wheat and butter, but I am going to say this. We can talk about our farm surpluses and criticize the wheat board, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Agriculture from now till doomsday and get nowhere. The challenge that faces us today is to work out monetary techniques by which those who need our products—and the need exists for all that we can produce—will be financially able to purchase the goods which we produce in such abundance. To this end we should and must devote our best energies.

In the debate the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has stated the financial policy of this group, and he has indicated the means for providing the purchasing power necessary to move all these so-called surpluses into the hands of the consumers. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has expressed our policy for placing purchasing power in the hands of our wheat growers in respect of grain they cannot sell and must keep on their farms. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) will deal in his usual clear and constructive manner with the two-price system, which will allow us to dispose of our surpluses in the trade channels of the world without severe hardship on our products. All I need say is that I endorse these sound policies.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate our C.C.F. friends for becoming so enthusiastic about the two-price system that has been advocated by Social Crediters for years. I must also congratulate them for finally acknowledging the necessity of accepting the pound sterling and other foreign currencies in settlement of our sales in foreign markets. When we recall that these same members voted against our amendment calling for this action last year, it is certainly quite a change of heart.

There is just one more thing about surpluses. I would like to notify the Minister of Trade and Commerce that when he was speaking in this debate on January 16, he made a remark to which I took exception. On page 125 of Hansard he was telling about what would happen had we had a dry year in 1955 instead of a wet, successful crop year. He said, and these are his words:

> If we had had a very dry spring and a very dry early summer, instead of a very wet spring and a very wet early summer, we would have had no surplus of either wheat or butter. We would have been about on balance in wheat, and butter would have been in short supply. The Conservatives, the C.C.F.'s and the Social Crediters would have said this is wonderful—

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that Social Crediters have ever felt that an abundance of produce is a calamity, and I do not like to be grouped with those who figure that this surplus which we have at the present time is a problem and a calamity. In fact I will go so far as to say that at the present time we do not have any true surpluses, that you cannot have surpluses so long as there is need in the world for goods which we have in such abundance. I maintain that the problem is not a problem of surpluses but a problem of distributing goods to those who are so sorely in need; and I am sure that if the policies that have been advocated were adopted by this government, then our surpluses would soon disappear. No; we do not fear abundance, for we have the answer in policies which are geared to solve the problem that we know exists today. The problem is distribution, and not a problem of overproduction.

Now let us talk about Okanagan-Revelstoke, the finest part of the finest province of Canada. Here, Mr. Speaker, I have a report that has been compiled by the economics division of the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa, dealing with soil and agricultural conditions in the north Okanagan. It is a very able report and contains a lot of useful information. It was compiled by three very smart young fellows whom I had the pleasure to meet previously when they were working in that part of our province. In this report the conclusion is that we have in that area a tract of land that is perfectly well suited to the dairy industry, and it is recommended that this is the type of agriculture that should be carried on in the area.

In the Okanagan-Revelstoke area, Mr. Speaker, we have a very diversified production. The southern part is mainly a fruit growing district. Cherries and soft fruits are produced in abundance. Vernon has the largest McIntosh apple orchards in the British empire. Scattered throughout the whole riding are stock ranches that have captured prizes all the way from the Canadian national exhibition in Toronto to the Pacific coast.

However, our main agricultural industry is dairying. We have the second largest milk handling company in the province and the only two cheese factories west of the Rocky mountains. In the past few years these two companies have increased their production from nil until last year it was about 800,000 pounds. What cream is left from the surplus of fluid milk after supplying the Okanagan, Revelstoke and Kamloops areas is turned into butter, yet one of our creameries imports 300,000 pounds of butter from Alberta each year to satisfy the demand.

We have no butter surplus. Our problem is to build up our dairy production to meet our own needs. The demand has increased in one year by 22 per cent, but our milk production has increased only 8 per cent. Our problem is one of scarcity, not surplus.

The federal Department of Agriculture is doing a lot of good work for our dairymen, but we need technical and experimental services in order that our farmers may produce more feed on their small farms to support a larger number of dairy cattle. I am glad to say that the Minister of Agriculture and his officials are sympathetic to the need which they know exists, and I look forward to the not too far distant day when we shall have a demonstration farm in that area under federal supervision to help our farmers better help themselves.

I could not rest unless I said something about power. We have one of the finest power sites that could be developed in British Columbia at Mica creek in the Columbia river basin. Last year we heard a lot about this, possibly too much, but today we hear nothing. A year ago we had reason to believe that the dam at Mica creek would be at least in the planning stage this year.

We want power in the interior of British Columbia, for we know that industry follows power. We want to share in the wonderful industrial development that is taking place in our province. In order to do this we must have action by this government toward the settlement of the whole problem of the Columbia river development. I would urge speed in gathering United States, British Columbia and federal authorities around the conference table so we can get on with the job of development which will mean so much to the economy of the interior of British Columbia.

I was particularly interested in the words of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in the speech he made following that of the Prime Minister in this debate. The hon. member was referring to the development of our natural resources, and in referring to the Prime Minister he said, as reported on page 54 of Hansard of January 12:

> I was glad to hear him say that because I believe the time has come when that should be undertaken; when through a public investment board, perhaps with a public investment authority, the savings of our people might be directed into desirable channels, that we might plan and use our resources in a planned way for the benefit of all our people, even if it requires—

I should like you to pay attention to this.

> —as I think it will, the extension of public ownership and socialization in this country.

I was rather surprised to hear those words from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, because I had always thought that the matter of public ownership was first in his mind, but he is now asking that our resources be developed even if it requires national ownership. Our greatest resource in British Columbia is power. Being a good Social Crediter I can well endorse those words, because we believe that where private enterprise fails to provide the necessary facilities demanded by our citizens it then becomes the duty of the government to do so. In accepting the words of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I do not want hon. members to jump to the conclusion that I have become a socialist.

In closing there is one little problem I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Public Works, as I believe it comes under his department. The great Columbia river, which is a wonderful source of power, is also a great source of trouble. This river flows through the heart of my riding from Revelstoke into the Arrow lakes. In that small mileage there is considerable erosion; in fact, at the little town of Arrowhead which is located at the mouth of the river the rate of erosion is so high that it will be a matter of a few years only before the entire townsite has disappeared.

This is certainly something that is worthy of attention, because in that part of the country sites for the mills and industries which we hope to see there when Mica creek is developed are at a premium, and it is necessary that all local sites should be preserved. This is something which I will be taking up with the minister, and I am sure we will get satisfaction.

In closing I can only reiterate that we are not greatly concerned about these surpluses, as we know we have policies which will provide a cure. We urge this government to give serious consideration to them, and we urge the opposition to just forget about this criticism and harping at officials who they believe are not doing a good job, and get down to the actual problem of finding a solution.

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. At this time I wish to avail myself of the opportunity of speaking about a matter which affects the whole population of Canada, and which will have an increasing influence upon their lives and our standard of living. The increase or decrease in our standard of living is influenced directly by the subject matter I intend to deal with today, and I refer to education and the relationship thereto of the federal government.

No one needs to be told that when the educational systems were first established in this country they were created at a time when the population was sparse and the day to day requirements small. There was an extremely keen local interest in all such matters. Nor do hon. members need to be told that the standards of education and living were met if the student was instructed in reading, writing and spelling, with a little arithmetic thrown in for good measure.

Since those systems were instituted there has been some considerable change. First of all there has been a change in the schoolhouse. Many a tale is told of the old log schoolhouse, built by the labour contributed by the individuals of the community and from material supplied by those same individuals. This schoolhouse has now evolved to a brick and mortar building. Society does not now contribute through individuals putting up so much material and offering so much labour; rather it contributes in the way of money for the construction of classrooms, which now cost between $15,000 and $25,000 each.

Originally students were trained for life in the community itself; today that type of education is not sufficient. You have to train your children so they may go anywhere in this great country of ours and fit in and be part not only of the community, but of the whole country. To that end the three R's were found to be lacking. Our educationists added first of all geography, history and physiology and, more recently, industrial arts, home economics, art, music, shopwork and vocational training.

When the little log schoolhouse was operating there was not much equipment in it, and not much maintenance was required. In many parts of the country the student who used to go down to fire the stove early in the morning is now a thing of the past, and a full scale janitor staff is employed. Now we find that the necessary equipment and the maintenance of that equipment are increasing the actual costs of producing the end result.

Then we find that everything else in the educational system seems to have changed and improved, taking advantage of new methods; but the means of financing these changes has stayed in the old rut. Rather than increasing means of financing, there have been decreasing means. At one time means were available to most municipalities—and some municipalities did in fact use them—of levying on personal and corporate incomes to assist them. However, through various agreements, the beneficiary of which was the federal government, this right was lost to the municipalities. So while the educational system has expanded, the tax base for paying for it has contracted.

In the early days farming and lumbering were the basic industries, and it was rather easy to determine the wealth of the person by the extent of his real estate holdings. Today such is not the case. There is much wealth hidden in personal property as well as real property. No one would suggest that the people who own the nice new homes that are being built in the country fall into the class of wealthy people. So there is no way of saying that the man who has real estate is the wealthy man to be assessed the extra costs of the educational system. These new homes do not produce income; they are merely means of shelter for a man, his wife and his family.

In other matters this was recognized when the first income tax act was passed many years ago. It was felt then that the basis of taxation should be broadened and a system of taxation introduced that would be more productive and fairer. But not so in educational matters, the taxation was left to the community level. The tax load was left on the individual home owner's shoulders. At one time the responsibility for education was the community's. Today society generally has that responsibility. I would suggest that this government must recognize that and take such steps as may be necessary to correct the situation.

As I have said previously, there is much self-satisfaction on the part of the members who sit on the government benches and boast of a balanced budget. It is very easy to balance a budget for one set of books and at the same time allow a very large deficit on another set. In the provinces across the country, according to the Canada Year Book for 1954, which is issued by the dominion bureau of statistics, the debt of municipal and school corporations, by province, is indicated as follows:

Newfoundland	4,001,573
Prince Edward Island	3,460,954
Nova Scotia	47,193,229
New Brunswick	47,195,303
Quebec	556,574,459
Ontario	550,036,933
Manitoba	78,455,750
Saskatchewan	47,081,265

These figures are given for the year ended 1951. In the Canada Year Book for 1955, printed under the same authority, we find that these figures have increased. The figures as given there are:

Province	Amount
Newfoundland	$ 4,507,659
Prince Edward Island	3,971,538
Nova Scotia	53,158,467
New Brunswick	54,149,465
Quebec	628,506,882
Ontario	627,230,109
Manitoba	78,298,733
Saskatchewan	50,328,148
Alberta	145,068,719
British Columbia	186,679,221

In the same volume we find figures showing the total of municipal debts. In 1950 the amount was $1,323,383,268. In 1951 there was an increase of just under $300 million, bringing the figure up to $1,606,609,259. Then we come to 1952, when there was another increase of $225 million, bringing the amount to $1,831,898,941. In the same volume we find that the amounts collected by the municipalities in each of these years also increased.

What trick is there in balancing a budget at the federal level when the obligations of the Canadian people at another level are permitted to increase, according to the last statistics available, at the rate of $225 million a year plus the carrying charges? The tax load you are asking the home owner to pay is being consistently increased. People are encouraged to buy homes so they will have a permanent stake in Canada. Yet in many instances you seek to drive them out of their homes by failing to provide the tax remedy that is required.

The figures will show that the great bulk of the increase in the municipal debt of the country is on account of education. It is said that education is a provincial matter, and I agree. You may say, "Why do the provinces not increase their grants?" I suggest that the history of taxation in the last few years has been such that the provinces have been deprived of their proportionate share of the tax dollar.

So far as the municipalities are concerned, their share of the tax dollar has been practically eliminated. The federal government now stands in the position of hogging the largest share of the tax dollar, which is a complete reversal of the position in 1939. The government creates the impression of being a hog at the feeding trough of taxes levied on the Canadian people. Beware that you do not suffer the fate of all hogs when fattened.

The problem of education and providing proper facilities for the children of our country is not going to diminish in the future. I have here figures prepared by Dr. M. E. LaZerte at the instance of the Canadian school trustees' association. Incidentally, these figures are also taken from a publication of the dominion bureau of statistics entitled, "Probable Increase in Secondary School Enrolment in Canada, 1952 to 1964". The figures show an enrolment in 1952 of 305,200 secondary school students in grades 9 to 13. It is estimated that by 1964 the figure will increase to 611,475. That is a doubling of the population in the secondary schools. This is only an estimate, but it highlights the problem of providing (a) accommodation for these children and (b) the teachers to instruct them.

Many individual school sections in the country have recognized the basic necessity of trying to equalize the tax load. In the past few years there have been instances where separate school sections, some with large industrial and commercial assessments from which they were benefiting, realized that the fair thing to do was to join with other school sections which had a highly residential assessment, to try to level off the load.

It was recognized that it was to the benefit of all to equalize the load carried by the home owner. But of course the benefit such action can bring is limited to the effect that can be achieved by a school tax on real property.

The concern, however, is much broader in scope than merely that of a school section or school board. We have to educate our children as Canadians. As a society we have a duty to educate them as Canadians. Does anyone in this house contend that because a child comes from rich Toronto he is entitled to a better education than a child who comes from some outlying part of the country? If you say he is, then leave the legislation as it stands. If you say he is not, then steps must be taken by this government to ensure in some way that the educational opportunities across the country will be equal for all, no matter from whence they come. Do not make the dollar bill the necessary requirement to enter school and attain the standard of education being required in this country today.

I fully appreciate and recognize this fact. The actual curriculum and the actual teaching in the schools must now and, as far as I can see, for all time in the future remain under provincial direction. We have in this country, to add to our strength, many cultures. These differences must be respected and the various methods of teaching in the various parts of this country must be respected. But there must be made available the opportunity for every child who is a Canadian—whether he be natural-born or imported—to attend school and be educated, if he wishes to avail himself of the opportunity, in order to help us all maintain and raise the standards in this country.

In the fast-growing areas there is another problem, and it is one that is going to be enlarged rather than diminished. I refer to the serious potential teacher shortage. If a man wishes to take the formal training for commerce, he spends 16 years taking it. The same thing applies for agriculture. For law the training period is 17 years. For medicine it is 18 years. So far we have been fortunate in that, by and large, our educators have been perhaps a little bit dedicated. Nevertheless they have given to us a fair standard in our schools. But they are and will be faced with the prospect of asking people to spend the same length of time in qualifying themselves to accept less than other people receive, or they are going to be faced with the sorry measure of trying to short-cut the courses for teachers. Anyone here who has or is likely to have children in school can readily see the effects of that situation.

We cannot expect others in other businesses or professions not to keep in step with the expanding economy, and that involves more money. Whether by design or accident, by the failure of this government to make available to the provinces money for distribution down to the municipalities, you have stretched to the limit the resources of the municipalities of this country. You yourselves are going to feel the effect of this when you find teachers leaving the profession for lack of increase in salary. Why should they stay in it? Would anyone here do so? You must make the funds available so that the most highly trained people in this country will come into the teaching profession, and teach our children so they may build this country of ours. The hog that has moved into the taxation trough and that is taking the big bite had better slim down and make some of it available to other levels of government in this country.

I have one other matter to which I should like to refer, Mr. Speaker. It has a rather direct bearing on my constituency. I know of one person who does not agree with me. However, there is in the area a transportation problem that is being partially met by large expenditures of money by the government of the province of Ontario on highways and bridges. They are doing everything within their field to improve the lot of the people riding into and out of the city of Toronto.

In my riding the Canadian people have quite a large investment in the way of railway tracks. No extra capital outlay is required for the creation of a roadbed. It is there. All that is required is for the Canadian National Railways, in this particular instance, to realize that in many instances their counterparts in the United States are successfully operating commuter trains through built-up areas, and are providing a service that has long been demanded by the people of the area from which I come. I suggest that a privately-owned company in the United States would not dare fail to put on adequate commuter trains.

I do not mean to merely put them on and say, "Now, look; the people do not ride on them." You have to put on proper cars; you have to build a service so people know they can count on it. The road traffic is becoming heavier, and I suggest from the floor of this house, Mr. Speaker, that if the Canadian National Railways would establish a modern, efficient, clean, adequate commuter service on their line running west from Toronto to Hamilton, (a) they would be providing a service which a publicly-owned company should provide; and (b) they would be pleasantly surprised at the revenue that service would earn.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): I should like to join with the many others, Mr. Speaker, who have thanked the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address. I particularly enjoyed the opening of the debate because the hon. member for Timiskaming is a women for whom I have the greatest admiration. I feel that the historic occasion of having a woman move the adoption of the address is a tribute not only to the women of Canada but very definitely to the hon. member for Timiskaming.

The seconder of the address, the hon. member for Bellechasse, is a young man who shows great promise. I have no doubt he will make great contributions in the future to this house, to his riding and to the country.

There is something which I have not heard mentioned up to the moment, and that is a word of thanks to our Speaker. I am going to do that. Our Speaker made a speech before the Empire Club in Toronto which was one of the most brilliant and best presented speeches on British parliamentary institutions to which it has ever been my pleasure to listen. Personally I believe he did a great service to this parliament and to his own racial origin when he made that speech. It was one of the best received speeches that has ever been made in Toronto.

I should like to pay my respects also to the Prime Minister for calling this conference between the federal and provincial governments on the question of health insurance. This is the last great field of social security to be entered into, and I think he deserves nothing but commendation and admiration for calling this conference.

I want to pay tribute to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who I thought made one of the best speeches in this house the other day on the question of the wheat surplus that I have ever heard in my life. I should like to pay tribute to the Minister of National Health and Welfare who has been doing excellent work at the United Nations, following up the groundwork laid by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Last summer I was one of a group who were privileged to go to the meeting of the United Nations interparliamentary association, and later to see the armed forces in France and Germany. Naturally it was a unique experience, one which I hope every member of this house will enjoy in the future. However, the thing about which I wish to speak particularly in so far as that trip was concerned is the armed forces. I can assure you that the money which has been spent on these armed forces has been well spent. The Canadian brigade up in Westphalia is one of the most efficient brigades I have seen anywhere. The men are well housed, well fed and well looked after. They are most efficient in their operations. It is a very well trained brigade, and I daresay there is no better brigade anywhere in any of the armed forces of the NATO nations.

I was particularly struck with our Canadian air division. The Canadian air division is something we hear about, but we do not seem to really appreciate the magnitude of it. It is one of the really big things in Europe. It is not just a small contribution by Canada, it is a very large contribution and is the finest of its kind in Europe. I might say it was rather interesting to find that our planes are the best day fighters in Europe. This was rather a shock to some of our allies, but it was very gratifying to a Canadian to find that this country is capable of building planes of that nature, having a Canadian engine which is more powerful than anything produced by our allies.

Originally I thought I would speak on external affairs, arising out of my interest in seeing these NATO forces. When I mentioned this to one of my friends he said, "Well, ignorance has never been a deterrent". Nevertheless, I thought possibly I would still try to give some views on external affairs, in view of the fact that I was so interested in seeing what was happening over there. However, I see it is now six o'clock, so I have pleasure in moving the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Hunter the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 19, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

REQUEST FOR EARLY DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared to deal with the proposal I made a week ago that there be a debate on external affairs which would give us an opportunity for a coherent discussion of that subject following a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). It seems to me that events which have occurred since that time emphasize the desirability of a debate shortly after the termination of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I quite agree with the Leader of the Opposition, and I hope that arrangements can be made for such a debate shortly after the conclusion of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORTED SHIPMENT OF AIRCRAFT TO EGYPT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the photograph handed to the press by the public relations officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force, showing a Harvard trainer carrying military weapons, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs amend the answer he gave to the effect that he did not believe that Harvard trainers could carry weapons, and amplify the remarks he made on the earlier occasion?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am quite ready to amend and amplify the answer which I gave on this point, and which was preceded by the cautionary observation that I was not a military expert. I said I did not believe this could be done. Apparently it can be done.

Mr. Drew: Might I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence? If that is so, have any steps been taken to ensure that military weapons are not provided for the Harvard trainers being shipped to Egypt?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to get the information the Leader of the Opposition has asked for. I should like to say, in explanation of the statement on which he based his question, that I am informed that the pictures of the Harvard which were displayed in various newspapers were taken many years ago and they are in the offices of newspapers everywhere. The Harvard has for many years been regarded entirely as a trainer. It was never in fact in action, but was an armed trainer in use for some time years ago.

With regard to the question the Leader of the Opposition has asked, I shall obtain the answer for him.

TAXATION

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE ON PAYMENT OF TAXES ON GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Finance is back in Canada and the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is proceeding, would the Prime Minister reconsider his answer to the mayor and city council of Toronto who requested a conference on the matter of taxation on federal property in Toronto?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I would point out to the hon. member for St. Paul's that I saw the mayor and board of control of the city of Toronto last week and discussed this subject.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION FOR PERSONS DENIED BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour if his department has obtained a ruling from the Department of Justice as to whether it will be possible by regulation to pay unemployment insurance benefits to persons denied those benefits under the new act provided they could have qualified under the old act?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The answer is that a ruling has not been received as yet. While I am on my feet, I can report at first hand to my hon. friend that in his own city of Winnipeg there are not a very large number so affected. I was glad to find in my week end visit there that under our new legislation some 25 per cent more were qualifying for seasonal benefits this winter, and I am quite sure it includes practically all those he has in mind.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUMBER OF HELICOPTERS IN POSSESSION OF NAVY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I should like to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Fraser) on Tuesday last as to how many helicopters the Royal Canadian Navy possesses. The number is 22.

POTATOES

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH STARCH PRODUCERS IN NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government reached any agreement with the starch producers in New Brunswick as to the proportion of the $1 per barrel of potatoes the government will pay? If so, what is the amount?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have made a proposal to the potato producers in New Brunswick to the effect that we would pay a certain amount on the potatoes that are utilized for starch provided they are potatoes that are in the commercial grades. I do not think that is the exact term to use in connection with it. I think it would be better if I were to give the hon. member a copy of the proposal itself, which will give him full information with regard to the matter. I am not certain that an agreement has yet been signed.

Mr. Montgomery: May I ask a supplementary question? The minister mentions commercial grades. I presume he is referring to Canada No. 1?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that is correct.

[Mr. Knowles.]

WAR ASSETS

DISPOSAL OF DISMANTLED FIELD ARTILLERY WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister inform the house whether any field artillery weapons are being dismantled or have been dismantled and the parts sold separately by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation under circumstances which would make it possible for those parts to be sold outside Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I shall get more complete information. There is a full report being prepared of all orders that have been acquiesced in for anything that might be classified as a military weapon.

Mr. Drew: Since the Prime Minister has indicated that an inquiry will be made, may I point out that my question was whether field artillery weapons had been dismantled and the parts sold separately. I would imagine they would then not have been sold as weapons, and I would hope that the Prime Minister, at the same time the inquiry is being made, will also make inquiries with respect to whether such parts, if they were sold, would require the ordinary permit that is required in the case of weapons being sold.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REPORTED RECRUITING OF IMMIGRANTS THROUGH PROMISE OF HEALTH INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Was the statement made on the C.B.C. last night at ten o'clock that the deputy minister of immigration is trying to get recruits overseas by saying that in the very near future Canada will have health insurance a correct statement? If so, did the minister give the deputy minister authority to say that, and can the minister also tell us when we are going to have health insurance?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I was more profitably occupied at ten o'clock last evening than the hon. member. Therefore I did not have the advantage of hearing the broadcast. I do not know what may have been said on the news broadcast; but I have sufficient confidence in the good sense, discretion and propriety of my deputy minister to feel quite assured that he did not make any pronouncements about policy in any field that was not his own.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—REPORTED ENTRY ON WESTBANK RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct the answer I gave off the cuff yesterday to the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

Mr. Fleming: This seems to be the day for corrections.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said I understood that the provincial government of British Columbia had, as I believed, made a cash offer to the Indians of a particular reserve for certain land for the purpose of building the bridge to which the hon. member had reference. I am informed that the offer was not for land for the purpose of building the bridge but was for land for the highway leading up to the bridge, and that so far as the land for the bridge itself is concerned an application is under discussion at the present moment between officials of the public works department, I believe they call it, of British Columbia and the officials of my department looking to an application to the council of the band for this other land.

With respect to the shotguns, I am informed that certain employees of a contractor went on the reserve to look for a gravel pit without permission, that this was resented by the Indians and that they apparently did happen to have some shotguns, but I am told that no shots were fired.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, in view of the corrective statements made this morning by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, may I ask if any other members of the government choose to follow their example and avail themselves of this opportunity to correct misleading statements they have made?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman correct your statement that he is now the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, may I give you my earnest assurance that I did not hear you say that.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR REPEAT PERFORMANCE OF "C.B.C. STAGE" PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask the question put by the hon. member for Peterborough, but since that question has been asked may I direct one to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the number of requests which have been reaching me, will he ask the C.B.C. to consider a repeat performance of the very excellent program that was given on "C.B.C. Stage" on the night of January 1?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will convey the request to the officials of the C.B.C.

GRAIN

VANCOUVER—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF IDLE GRAIN SHIPS IN HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying at least to find that hon. members opposite can find some humour in the absurd position in which they are placed by contradictory statements that have been made. However, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has he either seen or had his attention drawn to a report in the Vancouver Province of January 14 that grain ships are lying idle in Vancouver harbour because they cannot get the grain that has been ordered to fill them?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the editorial, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Drew: It is not an editorial. It is a news report.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have not seen the news report. I am aware of the fact that certain ships are delayed, waiting for proper grades. The attention of the railways has been called to the situation, and more cars are constantly being diverted to that movement. The situation largely results from the fact that for some days the tracks in the west were closed through storms in Alberta and through washouts on the lines. The situation is being corrected as rapidly as possible, and by another week I think traffic will be moving normally out of that port.

[Later:]

REPORTED CONFERENCE RESPECTING ALLEGED SHORTAGE OF FREIGHT CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it a fact that a conference is going on at the present time with the chairman of the wheat board in connection with the shortage of freight cars. Is it a fact that in part the reason for the accumulation of vacant shipping space in Vancouver and elsewhere is the large number of Canadian freight cars in the United States? What is being done to move those cars back into Canada for use in the transportation of available wheat?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is true that we have a great many box cars in the United States. Whether or not the number is as normal I do not know. It is also true that the United States has a great number of flat cars in Canada. Whether or not that situation is as normal I do not know. However, the arrangements governing the return of cars on both sides is a matter of agreement between the railroads. In wartime, when a transport controller was appointed by the government in Washington, there was something the government could do about the matter. We have explored the situation and there seems to be nothing the government can do to assist the railroads in carrying out their arrangements. It is purely a matter for the railroads.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the authority of the transport controller? Where does he operate from, and what authority has he to assure that these cars are available, at least in fair proportion, to the operations of the grain trade?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend helped to pass the act governing the duties of the transport controller. If he will look at that act he will have more accurate knowledge of the duties and authority of the controller than I could give him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I understand he has been on vacation.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Some people do take vacations; unfortunately, I am not one of that happy number. I think my hon. friend takes his share, from what I have been able to learn. The controller has been doing a very good job, and he has a very able staff that is carrying on in his absence. The office of transport controller is not a one-man show.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

BUTTER

SALES TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, about a week ago I asked the Minister of Agriculture if he would lay on the table of the house copies of the agreements for the export of surplus butter to certain countries. At that time he said that he would do so. When may we expect that tabling to be done?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have not read too carefully the new regulations with regard to laying returns on the table as the result of what has been arranged recently, but I will see that those agreements, if any, are tabled. I was not aware that I was obliged to bring them here and put them on the table, but I will see that whatever is available is put on the table.

FLOODS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ASSISTANCE RESPECTING LOSSES SUFFERED BY INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether any appeals for assistance have been made on behalf of the Indians who suffered severe losses in the November and December floods in British Columbia. If so, has he any statement to make as to what action we may expect?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Nothing of that sort has come to my personal attention, Mr. Speaker, although it is conceivable that something might have been dealt with in the ordinary way by the department.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO REDEVELOPMENT IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Richardson (St. Lawrence-St. George): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the increased emphasis which the government is placing on housing redevelopment, can the minister tell the house what progress is being made in respect of housing redevelopment in the city of Montreal?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question. After the city of Montreal approached the federal government, with the consent of the provincial government as required by the legislation, a joint committee consisting of representatives of the city of Montreal and of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was established in the latter part of September of last year. This committee has been actively studying the many problems involved in a large redevelopment undertaking of this nature.

I am informed that the committee is now prepared to recommend on many of the details, including the boundaries of the area to be redeveloped. The official report of the joint committee is expected early in February. This report will be submitted in the form of a recommendation for the consideration of the city of Montreal and the federal government. So far as the federal government is concerned, I can assure the hon. member that the report will receive prompt attention.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT SUPPLY PORTION OF HOUSING ACT FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I understand that yesterday in my absence the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked the following question:

In view of yesterday's announcement by the banks indicating a decline in money being available for housing, would the government consider again supplying a portion of N.H.A. funds as it did before the first session of this parliament?

In reply, I should point out that I do not know of any general announcement by the banks regarding a decline in money available for housing. There has been no indication by prospective borrowers that there is a general shortage of mortgage money under the National Housing Act. As the hon. member knows, the act contains authority by which Central Mortgage may make loans directly to borrowers if loans are not being made available by approved lenders. If a shortage of mortgage money did occur it would be a matter of government policy, in light of the circumstances at that time, to determine to what extent the corporation's power to make direct loans should be used. At the present time this authority is being used in the smaller communities. It is the government's intention to ensure that a high level of house building continues.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 18, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): When the debate adjourned last night, Mr. Speaker, I had indicated that I intended to make some remarks on external affairs. However, before I go on with them I would call the attention of the house to the fact that another one of those very sad cases occurred last night in Toronto. A young girl of 13 was attacked and killed. I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) together with the attorneys general of the provinces can work out some form of procedure to help control this type of thing.

In so far as my remarks on external affairs are concerned, I enter upon those with some timidity in view of the fact that there are experts on this subject in the house who know so much more about it than I do. However, I do want to make some remarks along this line. I suppose even a cat can look at a king.

While there are many troubled spots throughout the world, some of which could boil over at any time into either a local conflict or a major conflict, yet I think it must be conceded that the long-term and enduring problem is that of Russian communism. Many of these hot spots throughout the world are caused by communist propaganda and communist infiltration. Therefore the main problem, the long-term and enduring problem, boils down to the question of Russia and her purposes.

The extent of her conquests have been rather drastic since the war. As we all know, she has the Baltic states, with the exception of Finland. She has taken over Poland; she has retained the Ukraine; she has Eastern Germany, Rumania, Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia. China and northern French Indo-China have followed her policy.

In addition, from a political point of view her adherents have made considerable political gains in many countries. We just have to face the fact that any portion of the world where there is social, economic or political injustice, is a likely spot for communist infiltration. The communists have no scruples; they can promise anything, whereas when we try to help we have to fulfil our promises. Therefore ours are restrained, carefully thought out, and inclined to be rather smaller than the communist promises. Accordingly it is a more difficult problem for us; the same as it is more difficult for a government in power than for an opposition, who can make extravagant promises.

The armed forces of the Russians are there not entirely for protection. Of course they state they are there for protection, but they are there for other purposes. They are there also for intimidation, and if a suitable occasion arose I suggest they would be there for aggression. At the moment we hope they are there mainly for intimidation. But the trouble with that type of thing is that their armed forces bear no relationship to their economy, because their economy is in the complete control of the government, which, of course, is a totalitarian government. By taking complete control of the government and of the economy, and certainly brooking no opposition of any kind, they are in the position where they can gear their economy to an armed forces economy and a heavy industry economy; whereas in a democracy we have to keep things on a sounder basis and aim at genuine prosperity rather than an enforced economy.

I suppose that the thermonuclear weapons which are now possessed by the Russians may have an effect which is quite different from what people expect. Many people are frightened that there will be a world catastrophe, which could easily happen, but it might possibly have the other effect. If enough people realize the extreme danger, it may well be that instead of a thermonuclear war we will have peace, or in the alternative we might have more or less a stalemate in nuclear weapons and have the traditional type of war break out in which thermonuclear weapons would not be used. That is a strong possibility. If Russia attacked, obviously thermonuclear weapons would be used; but if a war started in a small way and slowly kindled into a major conflict we could easily have a war using traditional weapons only and not thermonuclear weapons.

Since Russia is a totalitarian state, they need not consult the wishes of their people, and do not. I do not think we quite appreciate how strong that makes them, in the sense that they can gear their whole economy to whatever particular phase of activity they wish to engage in at that time. Also, the people have no say in what the government does. If they venture a contrary opinion they are sent to labour camps. They are subject to excessive propaganda, really, of an active and inactive kind. Since they are subject to excessive propaganda from birth they are not in a position to even think clearly or from a detached or impartial point of view. They have no knowledge except what is imparted to them through government propaganda.

In addition there is a great inactive type of propaganda to which they are subject. They do not allow the people to move. They are not permitted to leave the country; they are not permitted to get education by travel, and accordingly they are not in a position to judge the propaganda that is incessantly poured out to them in Russia, or at least partially counter it by seeing what is actually happening abroad.

As long as the Russians keep their people within the confines of their iron curtain it is quite obvious that they will not be in a position to gather any real knowledge of what happens outside. We may laugh at their propaganda and say it is incredible, but if you have heard nothing else, if it is continuous and persistent it is easy to understand that people may become adjusted to it and have complete faith in it. I am quite confident that the people of the satellite countries may not believe that propaganda because they have known better, but when two generations of Russian people have been brought up under that system it is easy to understand that they would believe in it and be willing to fight for it.

I believe it would be ridiculous to think that at any time we could have a revolution in Russia, barring the development of internal changes over a period of time. The present system is bound to last for a considerable length of time, subject to the outbreak of war which might destroy it. It must be remembered that this is not a moral government, it is an unmoral government. They are guided by what they wish to achieve, not by any moral principles. As long as they work on that basis no government should be naïve enough to believe in their word or to believe in any signed agreement entered into by them, because they will keep it only as long as it suits their purpose.

It would be most unwise to expect a revolution in Russia and the establishment of a democratic government. That might happen under certain circumstances in the satellite countries, but certainly not in Russia proper at the present time. The people there have never known democracy. Russia is the largest police state in the world. The days when the peasants might gather up their scythes and go out and murder the aristocrats are over. Today a revolution requires scientific and modern weapons and well-trained men to handle them, and nothing in Russia would ever be permitted to reach that stage.

I think it is quite clear that there has been no change in the purpose of the Russians. Last year many people had hopes that after the death of Stalin the government there might become somewhat softer in its outlook, might be inclined to be more friendly toward the democratic nations, might be more inclined to indicate that they thought they could live side by side. I do not think the original purpose of the Russians has ever been lost. At the present time the Russians have no intention of giving up their eventual plans for world conquest and the establishment of world communism.

In view of that fact it is quite obvious that this will be a long drawn out proposition. Our first duty and obligation is to maintain our allegiance to the United Nations and to NATO, of which our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might be considered the father. While they are both equally important, I think it is most vital that we continue our adherence to NATO which is actually giving us the physical strength to resist if something does happen. Of course this involves the continuation of large armed forces, and I think for many years we must look forward to spending a large proportion of the money collected from the public on our armed forces. However, I think that will prove to be a cheap form of insurance in the long run.

Another thing we are going to have to do is guard our economy. I think it is most vital in any democratic country which desires to maintain itself against communism that the economy be watched most closely. We must remain prosperous; we must retain high employment, because everyone knows that part of the communist propaganda is directed at unemployment, bread lines and things of that kind. The hope of communist countries is that the democracies will have a breakdown in their economies. Accordingly that is something that will have to be watched very carefully. Fortunately it has been watched very carefully, and the present government will continue to watch it and prevent anything like the depression which was predicted last year by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew).

I think one thing we will have to recognize eventually is the importance of education, which is under the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces. We will have to realize the importance of giving what assistance we can. What form this assistance may take is something I will gladly leave to the judgment of our Prime Minister, but what I am getting at is this. Any country which hopes to compete with communism and keep up its scientific reputation and its rate of scientific advancement must have able instructors in its universities. It is only by having able instructors in our universities that we will be able to turn out trained scientists who will keep us abreast or ahead of the scientific competition which has been entered into between Russian communism and the democracies. Something must be done in this connection, particularly in keeping up the scientific progress of our country.

Of course we have done great things along these lines with our atomic energy plant at Chalk River and our other research work, and I think the federal government has gone far beyond what many governments have done. We will certainly have to keep our eyes on this in order that we may not only keep abreast of scientific development but ahead of it if possible.

We must continue what we have been doing in helping less fortunate nations under the Colombo plan. We have made considerable contributions under this plan, and this year we are increasing them. It may be that eventually we will have to increase them again. If we are going to avoid trouble spots in the world we should try to help less fortunate countries. After all, we are not the biggest country in the world, but we should try to help cure the economic, social and political ills of these trouble spots. We will have to spend money to do it, and it will take a great deal of patience and a great deal of tact.

I suppose one of the reasons the democracies are so powerful is the fact that they are governments of the people, but I think it is also quite clear that democracy in competition with communism, with the totalitarian government, has certain apparent weaknesses. In the long run I do not think they are weaknesses, I think they are evidence of strength; but we must face the fact that the communists have complete control over their people and can compel them to do anything whether they like it or not.

We do not believe in that sort of thing; we believe that the people must be convinced as to what we are doing. That is the strength of a democracy. But in the case of short-term urgency it could be a weakness, because a democracy cannot act as rapidly as a totalitarian state. What it boils down to is that as a long-term proposition we will have to continue to keep eternal vigilance and never relax.

I was astonished to hear the Leader of the Opposition say that the speech from the throne contained little but easy assurances and uninformative platitudes. I do not know exactly what the Leader of the Opposition was looking for, but if he was looking for a side show or something fascinating, then he came to the wrong place. The speech from the throne is an indication of government policy. It has to do with the serious business of governing the country, and for somebody to look for excitement or something of that kind in the speech from the throne is absolutely absurd. As I say, it is serious business.

The government was not in a position to say anything in the speech from the throne regarding the important matter of health insurance but there may be something later on because, as you all know, the Prime Minister has called a conference with the provinces to consider that particular phase of social security. To say that either we are doing nothing, or that there is a failure to disclose these things, is to my mind a most unfair statement; but I suppose it was not unexpected.

I shall close simply by saying that I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs will forgive my temerity in entering into a discussion of external affairs, and I trust that what I have said has not been so bad that I shall be disowned immediately.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join in the congratulations offered by other hon. members to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

My initial address in this house, of considerable length, described my own riding and mentioned the necessity of some way of decentralizing industry. Many reasons for such decentralization can be seen by those who live in smaller communities. The fact that many people are crowding into large urban municipalities makes them very vulnerable to complete annihilation in this day and age of atomic warfare.

Decentralization would help many phases of our economy. For instance, if our population were more diversified and spread out, the carrying of freight throughout the country would bring additional revenue to our railroads. So I could go on. There are many reasons for this. However, as others have mentioned and I myself have mentioned, industry is moving out into the smaller communities to a considerable extent. Several industries have settled in my riding during the past few years.

In this connection I should like to congratulate all our local municipal councils and associated boards, such as the school boards and hospital boards, on the wonderful job they are doing to keep those communities attractive for industries that may be looking for good industrial sites. In the last year it has been interesting to note the increase in hospital facilities that has taken place in that particular part of the country from which I come. In one centre, that of Fergus, a new hospital was built with 56 beds at a cost of $541,000. The general hospital at Palmerston had an addition and was remodelled at a cost of $138,000. The Wingham hospital had an addition estimated to cost $610,000. The Louise Marshall hospital at Mount Forest had an addition at a cost of $112,064. As I have said, all this is an indication that those communities are doing their best to look after the services and facilities so necessary in our smaller communities.

All this work, as all hon. members know, is done with the co-operation of provincial and federal governments, but I maintain that the initiative and the main part of the cost is borne by those municipalities themselves and neighbouring municipalities interested in those particular centres. In that connection, in my own riding alone well over a million dollars has been spent on hospital facilities in the last year. In the past few years well over a million dollars has also been spent on public and high school facilities.

I hope other hon. members in this house will join me in urging the Minister of Finance once again to give consideration to the necessity for dropping the sales tax on purchases by municipal councils and associated boards. The land and property taxes, are increasing and are a very heavy burden on the property and land owners in the small communities as well as in the large communities, but they are necessitated by the provision of modern and adequate facilities for these people.

Now I should like to turn to another phase of the economy. We are all interested in our own ridings, but this is one of the fundamental problems of agriculture throughout the country. The counties of Wellington and Huron do their share in providing agricultural products for this country's economy; in particular they are among the leaders in the production of oats, mixed grains, flax, butter, cattle, beef and many other associated products.

I was rather interested in a statement made by Dr. E. G. Pleva, professor of economic geography at the University of Western Ontario. This statement will bring to the attention of this house the importance of agriculture in that part of the dominion called the lowlands of the St. Lawrence. That district, which comprises 1 per cent of the land area of Canada, contains about two-thirds of the population and three-quarters of the industrial development, and receives—this fact was very interesting to me—one-half of the agricultural crop dollars. One can see why we who represent ridings in that district want to add our voices to the voices of those who are bringing to the attention of this house the condition of agriculture throughout our dominion.

Since coming to this house it has been rather interesting to see how much is said for the western farmer. Certainly he is an important and integral part of the economy of this great dominion and is having his problems. We have surpluses. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in a speech the other day, seemed to welcome these surpluses. The Minister of Agriculture, using a Biblical term which he has quoted many times in this house, about the seven good years and seven bad years, indicated they were a good thing. However, I feel that with the recent trend of improved methods in all phases of agriculture, increased production is going to continue; it is not going to be the exception. Unless we have some major national setback, which does not happen very often, conditions of increased crop production are going to continue.

In that connection I should like to mention the recent speech by the hon. member for Parkdale, in which he mentioned the necessity for increased research. I would say that every medium possible should be used in order that research in agriculture may be continued and fostered, and so that costs of production may be reduced, the quality of products improved and our agricultural products made able to compete in the markets of the world as regards price and quality.

As I have said, the western farmer has been spoken of a good deal in this house since I have been here, and no doubt a good many times before that. But what was predicted a few years ago by many farming organizations in this country has happened. The effective surplus in the west has had a bad effect on agriculture throughout the whole economy. Farming prices have fallen to such an extent that the farmer is having a very difficult problem.

In connection with the farmers of southern Ontario, a report of the Searle Grain Company of Wednesday, January 11, gives a very definite reason for our problems down here. Under the heading, "The Underlying Reason for Concern" the report has this to say:

> Without entering into the debatable question whether the western farmers should or should not be encouraged to raise more livestock at this time we do feel that the suggestion is of great interest, not only because it reflects the concern felt by eastern producers about the trend in this particular branch of the agricultural industry, but also because it brings out clearly the chain of reaction and the difficulties that can follow when the natural order of events and the natural flow of marketing is disturbed. The actual background which provoked this suggestion from Ontario stems largely from the distress selling of quantities of grain in parts of western Canada, and particularly in Alberta, at prices far below the regular Canadian wheat board prices. These sales, conducted along legal lines, entirely outside board operations, were from farm to farm as well as to feeders of poultry and other livestock and they are indicative of the desire of the farmers concerned to find an outlet for their grain to provide ready cash at a time when restrictive quotas are in effect. It is the competition of the feeders who enjoy cheap feed resulting from this distress selling of grain that is most feared by the eastern livestock group.

To bear that out, I have a recent hog producers' survey conducted by my own Wellington county federation of agriculture, which would indicate that 27·6 per cent more hogs were raised in western Canada in 1955 than in 1954. In eastern Canada the figure is down by 11·6 per cent, which is an indication that what was predicted would happen has taken place. The Minister of Agriculture suggested to the western farmers that they diversify their production, and that their only solution was to raise more livestock.

Throughout the world today we are coming closer together from an economic point of view, so what happens in one part of the world affects every other part. The same is true of our dominion. The fact that the western farmer has of necessity had to become a general farmer has affected the farmers of southern Ontario. What has happened? In a recent address Professor MacDougall, professor of economic agriculture at the Ontario Agricultural College, advised that some of the younger men who are farming should leave the farms, that they would be happier in the cities. Many of these young farmers are boys who went overseas and fought for us in the last war. When they came home they used their war benefits and gratuities to do what they had fought for and felt they had the right to do. They used them to become farmers, to carry on the occupation they had chosen in this supposedly free world, to live in the way they wanted to live. Now they are faced with the inability of the government to sell the products of the farmers on the markets of the world.

I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) said about the operations of the income tax department as they affect farmers. It has been brought to my attention that income tax collectors go about the country and drop in quietly and unobtrusively on farmers who have been paying their income tax to the best of their ability. They sit down with them and ask them about their living costs. They ask them how much they have spent on meat, vegetables, clothing and so on, and the prices are all taken at the retail level.

The farmer unknowingly goes along with the income tax official, and when the official is all through he asks the farmer to sign a paper. Then the income tax inspector goes away and shortly afterwards an amount is added to the income the farmer has already declared. He receives a new assessment which is away out of line from the point of view of what he should pay by way of income tax.

Instances have also been brought to my attention respecting applications by farmers to the farm loan board. Regardless of whether the farmer has assets to cover the loan he requires, if he owes money to the bank or to an implement agency or somebody else in his district he is refused a loan. He is told that if he will pay off the bank and pay off the amount he owes the implement agency he will then be given a loan. How is he going to do that? He has to sell his stock in trade, his cattle and hogs, and practically go out of business. The farm loan board is no use to him. They do not help him to put his eggs all in one basket, consolidate his loans and give him a longer time to pay, thus permitting him to stay in business by maintaining his agricultural establishment. Then the farmer could carry on, but in so many cases he has been refused a loan. I notice that legislation is to be introduced respecting the Canadian farm loan board and I hope some consideration will be given to extending a little leniency to so many of these people that need help so badly.

There is only one other thing I should like to mention. It has to do with the statement of Professor MacDougall to which I referred before. He apparently believes that our small farms will disappear and that we will become a country of great farms. I say the same thing is happening in the case of the small retail merchant. Today with the increased number of great shopping centres and the spreading out of big retail buying organizations, the small retail merchant is being caught in the squeeze. The day when he lived in his own small community and catered to the needs and necessities of the people there is disappearing. With improved means of transportation he is caught in the squeeze. He not only has to compete with merchants in his own town but has to compete with big buying organizations who get special discounts.

I speak for the small automobile retailer as well as the ordinary retailer in our different communities. How is the small car dealer going to compete with the great sales agencies in the cities who get special discounts because of the number of cars they sell? I believe it is not a good indication for our economy to be heading in this direction. I believe that the small property owner, the farmer and the retailer, who have been the backbone of the country, who have been ready to take their places on municipal councils and various municipal boards; these people who have been big taxpayers in our small communities, who have provided the streets, hospitals, schools and all the other facilities that are so necessary, still have a definite place in our economy and should be protected.

There is just one other thing I want to say. The fact has been mentioned in the house before that our farmers could and would produce more on the farms if the bugbear of surpluses was removed. They feel now that if they increase their production their products will come on the market at a time when prices are depressed. In connection with the butter surplus, which was mentioned the other day, I sometimes feel that we might deal with it in the same way we dealt with the pork surplus a few years ago. The butter has been bought and paid for by the people of Canada. The farmers do not like the opposition of margarine. If this No. 1 storage butter were thrown on the market at prices comparable with those at which it is being sold to communist countries, I feel that such action would be a good advertising medium for the butter producers of this country, that it would get butter into homes that have not used it for years, and that the people of Canada would benefit thereby.

Mr. W. A. Pommer (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate may I briefly add my congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the exceedingly able manner in which they discharged their duties. The hon. member for Timiskaming set a precedent by becoming the first woman in our history to move the traditional address in reply to the speech from the throne with which His Excellency the Governor General opens our sessions of parliament.

The hon. member was pleased to say that in selecting her the Prime Minister had in mind the honouring of all the women of Canada in public and in private life. I have no doubt that was one of the things the Prime Minister had in mind. But after listening to the competent and informed speech which she made, and witnessing the manner in which she discussed some of the problems confronting the people of her constituency, our country as a whole and the great alliance of free nations with which we are associated, I am convinced that the Prime Minister had more in mind. I am sure he felt as I do, that it was not only an honour due to the hon. member as a representative of the women of Canada, but was in recognition of her own abilities, her own performance in this house and in the administration of the municipal affairs of the township of Teck of which she was reeve for so many years.

The seconder of the motion, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), has been recently elected to the house and was making his first speech. We are sure that the people of Bellechasse have an able representative in this house, and I congratulate him on his excellent speech. I am sure it augurs well for his future parliamentary career in the House of Commons.

I should just like to say a few words about the constituency I represent. The constituency of Lisgar is one of the historical political subdivisions in Canada. It was first known as Selkirk. The boundaries have been somewhat changed over the years, but it has been electing members to this house since the time of the entry of Manitoba into confederation. The first member was one of the great builders of Canada, namely Mr. Donald Smith, later known as Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal. The constituency covers an area of about five thousand square miles and has a population of about 49,000 people. I am proud to say that in enterprise, culture, respect for the laws of God and of the nation, and friendliness and kindliness, the people of Lisgar take second place to no other people in Canada or indeed in the world. I speak from 35 years of experience when I say that. I have seen them face bad times with fortitude and good times with humility and moderation.

Unlike many other constituencies in Canada, especially in the west, the whole area of Lisgar is fertile and populated. It is primarily a farming area. Serving the people and providing centres for social and business activity are some 60 towns and villages. Mixed farming is general throughout the area, but we produce plenty of good wheat and many other things as well. Some of the best purebred livestock will be found on the farms in Lisgar.

In the southern and eastern parts of the constituency row crops such as sugar beets, corn, peas, beans and tomatoes are successfully grown. Sunflowers do well and have been a good source of income for many farmers in recent years. Last year, for the first time in Manitoba, locally-grown tomatoes were canned. They were grown in the Morden, Winkler and Plum Coulee areas and were processed by the Aylmer plant at Morden.

I mention the range and variety of our farm output by way of notice to the Minister of Agriculture that our people are interested in the whole range of policies followed by his department. The minister, however, knows western Canada better than do most other men, and probably needs no notice. Perhaps I should direct these remarks to the Leader of the Opposition and to the other party leaders who aspire to office. Their agricultural policies must be sound, practical and well balanced if they are to appeal to the people of my constituency.

Along with the hon. member who moved the address in reply I was privileged to attend the first interparliamentary conference of the NATO countries at Paris last July. I agree with everything she said about the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and its importance to the preservation of freedom in the world. It is tragic that, so soon after a terrible war, nations should be obliged to band together in order to prevent another conflict by means of a show of force. Yet it would be more than tragic, it would be stupid if we were to ignore the facts and leave the way open to an aggressor to subdue us one by one.

I was impressed by what I saw and heard at NATO headquarters in Paris and on our visits to the Canadian forces serving in Europe. I was particularly impressed with the achievements of NATO and with Canada's role in those achievements. We can be proud of that role; but I wish more Canadians knew more about the challenge which the communist dictatorship presents to us and about the necessity of maintaining, enlarging and improving our common defence effort so long as that challenge exists.

It has been said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and by others as well, that ignorance is one of the great obstacles in the way of enduring peace. We know that the ignorance of the free world which exists in the minds of the Russian people is deliberately fostered by the communist government. We also know that some of the ignorance which exists in our own country and in other free countries about the Russian people, their conditions of life, their achievements and their opinions is due to the iron curtain which the communists have placed in the way of the exchange of information between the citizens of Russia on the one hand and those of the free countries on the other.

Between the countries of NATO, however, there are no artificial barriers to the exchange of information. We members of parliament who were privileged to take part in that assembly owe it to our country, and to the common cause of freedom, to tell the story of NATO. None of us could tell it better than did the hon. member for Timiskaming.

I was intrigued by a few of the things the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said last week. He seemed to belittle the references to the general prosperity of our country which are contained in the speech from the throne. He said they reminded him of what was being said in 1929 on the eve of the great depression. I have heard this line of talk from opposition speakers before, from the socialists as well as the Conservatives. Never since our government came into power in Canada, according to them, have we ceased to be on the eve of a depression. No matter how prosperous in fact we have continued to be, their endlessly repeated refrain has been that this is not true prosperity; it is merely a Liberal prosperity. We seem to be prosperous, but it cannot last. Things are bound to get worse. We are surprised they are not worse already. The government is not doing the right thing and this false prosperity is a deceptive accident.

Then when things slow down just a little they scream that the depression has arrived, and call upon us to take desperate remedies which they have thought up to meet the depression for which they have been hoping. Ever since the last traces of the great depression were wiped out in the second world war and a wave of expansion followed it, the socialists and Conservatives have been predicting blue ruin. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is one of the chief architects of the economic policies which have brought a long succession of prosperous years. He has been ridiculed as an optimist, but his optimistic predictions have been more than justified by subsequent events.

Just a year ago we had more unemployment in this country than most of us like to see. Week after week we listened to the opposition labouring, almost gloating, over that fact. The Minister of Trade and Commerce told us the situation would soon improve. The government took certain measures to see that it did improve. We were told the measures were inadequate, that various emergency steps should be taken. Within a few months the situation did improve. We have heard little about unemployment in the debate so far this session.

What do we hear about? We hear about the wheat crisis. We hear that it is going to be a lot worse. We are told drastic steps must be taken. I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet. I do not know long prosperity is going to continue. I will not be surprised if we have a few ups and downs. Right now I should like to see our farmers selling more wheat and getting more cash for it, but I do not believe western Canada is going to the dogs as fast as the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. would have us believe. Western Canada was built on faith and optimism. It was not built by men who always expected the worst. If everybody believed all the stories we hear from the opposition about calamities, both present and to come, no one would put another dollar into this country. Yet we find that capital investment last year was higher than ever before.

Not long ago Douglas Gibson of the Bank of Nova Scotia, one of our recognized authorities on economics, was quoted in the Financial Post as saying that the underlying trend in Canada is decidedly upward. I agree with him. I do not think any of the prophets of gloom have much in the way of a real basis for their predictions. The other day the C.C.F. leader said this government was bankrupt of ideas. I say that any party which pins its hope of beating this government on prophesying a depression is rather bankrupt in political ideas.

A year ago these gentlemen were talking about unemployment. There was unemployment. They said the government was to blame and that the government could stop unemployment if it would only do the things they wanted done, such as putting a lot of people to work building things to be paid for by the taxpayers. Had all the things they suggested been done there would not have been enough people to produce the goods which went to swell our gross national product in 1955 to a record figure in excess of $26 billion. Now they have changed their tune. They do not talk about unemployment; they talk about the wheat surplus. There is a big wheat surplus. I do not say it will disappear as quickly as last year's unemployment problem, but we may be surprised.

What has happened in the past year to make the blue ruin boys talk about wheat this session? It has been nothing but a good crop, 494 million bushels and most of it of high grade. This makes five bumper crops in the last six years. Is that bad? I do not think it is as bad as our critics make out. Things could have been a lot worse if we had not had the wheat board system of marketing, which guarantees a fair price and enables every farmer to move a proportion of his crop when elevator storage is limited.

During those six years the farmers have marketed more wheat than in any other period in their history. They have received cash for it. They still have a lot left on their farms, but I can remember times when they were a lot worse off. I can remember when they did not have good crops, when many had no crops at all, and when those who had crops received very little cash for what they sold. We had a Conservative government in those days, and I daresay they did the best they could but I do not recall any miracles.

This government perfected the wheat board system of marketing. It has taken the lead in getting co-operation among the leading wheat exporting and importing nations in stabilizing wheat prices. The speech from the throne tells us about two other things that are to be done, one temporary and one permanent, to improve our wheat marketing system. There are to be guaranteed bank loans for the farmer with wheat on his farm who is short of cash. Our friends say that idea is no good. They say there should be unlimited advances from the wheat board through the elevator agents against wheat stored on the farms.

I wish it could be done that way, but the wheat board takes the position that it was not set up, nor is it organized, to do that kind of business. It is quite clear the wheat board is right. It certainly was not organized to lend money. It was organized to sell wheat, and has its hands full at the present time selling wheat. The board has no staff experienced in money lending, and would have to cast around for persons whom it could employ who are experienced and at the moment unemployed. It is rather strange that those who profess to be such supporters of the wheat board should, at a critical period in its existence, wish upon it overnight a new and invidious responsibility. I know that if the wheat board did undertake that job and made a few mistakes, we would soon hear about it from those whose chief aim in life is to discredit and destroy the wheat board.

No member from the western plains need offer any apology for discussing wheat on the floor of this house. Right now we are confronted with problems of storage and the financing of storage. They are important, but they should not be confused with the troubles we have had in the past, problems of short crops and hence lack of cash income, or problems of price. We have had good crops; we have had a steady flow of wheat to the markets, and we have had a reasonably stable price structure.

For the good crops we can thank divine Providence. For the stable price structure we can thank the marketing system which this government has developed with the support of our farm organizations, and which the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture have stoutly defended. They have defended it against the attacks of the advocates of an open market, whose system would have meant disastrously low prices at this time. They have defended against the advocates of socialism, whose system would have put the western farmer in bondage to the state.

For many years our farmers hoped for a system of orderly marketing. Now they have it. What has it meant? Well, let me give you a few figures. For the ten-year period from 1940 to 1950 the average annual wheat crop in all Canada was 391 million bushels. The average annual exports were 275 million bushels. There was no surplus. In the last six years, with five bumper crops and only one poor crop, the average annual production was 522 million bushels. The average annual export was 286 million bushels.

To those who say there is something wrong with our foreign markets, the answer is in the fact that exports in recent years have been above the ten-year average. We have had above normal crops. In that situation, I submit that orderly marketing does not mean selling all that is produced right away. The selling of it all could mean disastrously low prices for the farmer, which is what happened in similar circumstances in the old days of the open market. It could mean subsidized export or dumping, which would cost the taxpayers of all Canada millions of dollars. I submit that it makes sense to follow the policy of orderly marketing which has meant much to the western farmer, and that it makes sense to ask the taxpayer to pay part of the cost of storage. I submit that subsidized dumping on a grand scale at the expense of the taxpayer could only bring demands that the western farmer curtail his production, to his long-term disadvantage.

I welcome the proposed measure to provide for payment of carrying charges on abnormal wheat carryovers. It will put more cash in the hands of the wheat grower this year when he needs it badly. It is one more step in reducing the risks attendant on wheat growing to something like the risks that pertain to other businesses in this country. It is not a special benefit to the wheat grower at the expense of the whole country. It will prove a long-range stabilizing influence on our whole economy. Every sector of the economy benefits when the western farmer sells his wheat at a fair price.

The western farmer has been blessed with a succession of bumper crops. He has been selling enough on export markets and otherwise to dispose of normal crops. It is clearly in the national interest that the excess be stored against the time when demand may increase or we may have a short crop. The cost of that storage should not all fall on the farmer. So, Mr. Speaker, I welcome the loan plan as a sincere attempt to make money available to the small wheat farmer during this time of slow marketing. I hail the plan for payment of storage as an important constructive move which belies any suggestion that this government is bankrupt of ideas. I deplore blue ruin talk which pictures a good crop as a disaster.

There are other announcements in the speech from the throne of special interest to my constituency. The Industrial Development Bank Act is to be amended. I hope the amendments will permit the bank to advance capital for the establishment of seed cleaning plants. The inability of the bank to assist an industry of this kind came to my attention in connection with a proposed plant at Pilot Mound. I wrote to the Minister of Finance, and received his assurance the matter would be taken up.

The proposed amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act will make those important measures of greater use to the farmers. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been a benefit to many farmers in the west in cases of crop failure. I am glad to note that amendments are proposed, but will wait for the introduction of legislation to present certain views in detail. Briefly, I believe the act should make it somewhat easier for Manitoba farmers to qualify for assistance than it has been up to now. Since the establishment of the scheme, Manitoba farmers have paid in $4,500,000 more than they have drawn out in crop failure benefits. This is in comparison with Saskatchewan and Alberta, who have taken out $90 million more than was paid in by the producers.

Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the future with confidence. Never has the outlook for Canada been brighter. We have problems in Canada, but they are small compared with those of other countries. They are problems associated with growth and expansion. They pale into insignificance in comparison with the larger problems of the world, the problem of avoiding war, the problem of bringing a better standard of living to the overcrowded and economically undeveloped areas. As a Canadian I am proud of the part our country is playing in building the defences of the free world through NATO. I am proud of our contributions to what I regard as the equally important and more enduring additions to the structure of peace through the United Nations, the Colombo plan and other agencies of economic co-operation.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just preceded me is something like the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who tries to tell this house that the opposition considers a big wheat crop is a calamity. Such a statement is very far from the truth. We consider abundant crops to be of great benefit to the people of this country and they should be of great benefit to the world. But when we see a recession in the areas where the people produce those crops; when we see the rest of Canada enjoying great prosperity while the people engaged in agriculture on the prairies are suffering recession caused by increasing costs and inability to deliver their grain or sell it because of the maladministration of this government, we say the calamity is the government.

I might say that the hon. member who preceded me does not read nearly as well as the minister does in presenting his case. The hon. member also referred to the fact that Canada is enjoying unprecedented investment in industry. We are enjoying an unprecedented peacetime boom because of terrific government expenditures in defence and defence contracts, and also tremendous investments coming from the great giant that lives to the south of us on this continent, the United States.

On other occasions I have referred to the danger facing Canada because we are living on the same continent with this very wealthy nation of 160 million people. I have referred to the danger that faces this small country because that great country to the south, with all its wealth, can move in here and buy into and absorb Canadian industry through their subsidiary companies in this country and gradually obtain control, economically, of our natural wealth and the industrial life of our nation.

Mr. Trainor: Where would you get it elsewhere?

Mr. Castleden: Why should Canada not be doing this? Why should not Canada be developing her own natural resources? Why should United States firms be doing that? Why does not this government have a fiscal policy which will provide money for investment in these developments, and thus keep these things for Canada?

During his speech the other night the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar put some excellent figures on the record to indicate the way United States industry was infiltrating into Canada to such a degree as to give concern to many Canadians. I have here another example which may be of interest to the people of Canada. I should like to quote from an article by the financial editor which appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 6:

> In Canada three names dominate the soap industry—Lever Brothers, Colgate-Palmolive and Procter and Gamble. From these three giant firms come the three most widely known and used soaps—Lux, Palmolive and Ivory, and there are few readers whose homes will not contain at least some of the products of these companies.
> Yet not one of these companies is Canadian, none of them sell shares in the Canadian end of their operations, and not one of them even lists the parent company stock on Canadian exchanges.

They have certainly made the Canadian people soap conscious.

Procter and Gamble, whose headquarters are in Cincinnati, Ohio, has been operating a branch plant in Canada since 1913—43 years. Since the beginning of this operation, the firm that makes soap that is 99 44/100 pure has kept its subsidiary 100 per cent pure, as far as outside ownership is concerned.

And since this is the case surely the time has come for these huge soap firms to share the made in Canada profits with Canada's soap-conscious citizens.

Another article on January 3 referred to a possible change in the control of Algoma Steel following the death of Sir James Dunn. It was indicated that there was a possibility that Bethlehem, the great steel combine in the United States, was interested in purchasing a controlling interest in Algoma, but this will be known only after the will has been disposed of. Take our iron ore deposits, our power, our pulp—

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Castleden: I am sorry, I have not the time. I think every Canadian should be made aware of the rapid increase in United States control of Canadian industry. The ultimate result of this will be political control, and the citizens of Canada should be kept constantly aware of that development. Many people are viewing it with deep concern, and Canadians should know about it.

In connection with the plight of the agricultural producer on the western prairies and this trend which is taking place in industry in Canada, this government deserves censure by the opposition. It is the duty of the opposition to censure the government, and I think that censure is to be found in the amendment now before the house which reads:

We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national problems, including their failure to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain, equal to not less than 75 per cent of the initial price, to alleviate the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers and the entire economy of the prairie provinces, and their disregard of the rights of parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house.

The part of the amendment referring to the failure to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain of not less than 75 per cent of the initial payment is a real fact. I am pleased to support that amendment as representing the opinion of people whom I represent in this house. For three years now the situation has been getting steadily worse, and we in the opposition have pointed out that a continuation of present policies, with the costs of operating a farm constantly increasing, as well as the costs of operating all other businesses in Canada in the face of less returns is something that is causing great concern to those people who operate these businesses. Surely it is elementary that unless those who are operating businesses and farms receive an increased return as a result of their operations they must face bankruptcy.

All kinds of reasons are being presented for the increasing costs of operation of these enterprises. When this government took off price controls in 1947 and 1948 we saw the beginning of a spiral. We in this party stressed the danger of the policy the government was adopting at that time, but we were told that while there might be a slight rise in the cost of living, it would only be for a year or two and then the law of supply and demand would operate and things would level off. But the fact is that since that time the cost of manufacturing and the cost of living everywhere in Canada has increased.

An hon. Member: Not every year.

Mr. Castleden: In what year did they go down? Just take a look at the record. Consider the figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics, which show that the things the farmer purchases now stand at 241 as compared with 100 in the base period 1935-39. The return to the farmer should also be up by that same amount if he is to escape bankruptcy.

The blame for the increasing costs of operation lies with the federal government. It has been said that it is up to the provincial governments and the rural municipalities, but when the farmer cannot balance his budget then these other organizations cannot balance theirs. The cost of operating a rural municipality is up. It costs two or three times as much to purchase machinery as it did in those early days; labour costs, the cost of materials of all kinds and of everything along the line are up.

The small western merchant is in the same position. The Canadian economy must be constantly expanding if it is to keep up to the increasing cost of operating. The Minister of Trade and Commerce told us the other day that we have nearly as much in the way of grain deliveries as we had in another five-year period, but the minister did not take into account the cost of operation. The farmer must have more for what he produces; he must receive more for his toil. Instead of his returns increasing, they have been steadily declining.

This decline is not just in connection with grain. The minister carefully avoided talking about the decrease in the return the farmer gets for other products. If your cost of operating goes up and your return steadily declines, you reach the point where your return is less than your cost of operation; and if anybody in this house can tell me that you can continue along that road and not go into bankruptcy I should like to have him stand up and show how it can be done. That is exactly the position in which the farmer is today.

When the farmer is ever faced with some of those other risks which confront him from time to time, such as frost, rust or flood conditions, things are calamitous for him. For 1956 at least, his costs will be even greater. I suggest that in considering this problem we should look to the government as being responsible for these increasing costs. If they place the farmer in the position where he is not getting a sufficient return for his production, then they must accept the blame. Cattle prices are down; some are 60 per cent of what they were in 1951. Hog prices are down 40 per cent, a declining return in the face of increasing costs.

The government know what should be done. Are they going to accept that circumstance, as they should? They have accepted it with regard to butter and have put in floor prices on butter. The dairy farmers are getting some relief, but the dairy farmers are chiefly in the eastern parts of Canada and in British Columbia. The farmers in the prairies produce good butter—good in quality and in quantity—but the economy is not geared to that. The economy in the prairies is geared chiefly to the production of grain. If the farmers of western Canada are going to be forced into the production of butter and the fattening and finishing of stock, then they will have to do that; but I can assure you that will have its repercussions on production in the other parts of Canada. Sales of wheat and the farmers' returns must increase if the farmers are going to continue in operation. It is fear of the future, with the increase in costs and the declining returns, that is causing the uneasiness in the west.

In 1955 we had one of the most abundant crops of high-grade wheat the west has ever produced, but the deliveries were lower than they ever have been for years. The bins are bulging, with millions of bushels of wheat out in the open fields in the western parts of the province of Saskatchewan and in Alberta. There are piles of wheat, but no elevator space for it. When there is space, no cars are available; the cars are somewhere in the United States. Today we are told that there are freight boats waiting on the Pacific coast for wheat cargoes, and the wheat cannot be shipped out. The farmer on the prairies is in desperate circumstances because he cannot deliver his grain. Shipping orders come to the farmer at a local point to deliver grain, but he cannot get box cars.

A very acute situation faces the farmer there. When he goes to town the oil man asks him to pay his bills, and the storekeeper who has carried him through the summer asks him what is going to be done about his bill. He receives notice that his municipal taxes are in arrears, and he sees his land listed in the tax arrears list to be placed in the local elevator. He has 4,000 or 5,000 bushels of good wheat in the granary. If he has no money, it is not his fault. He has worked and produced for a year, and now he cannot get any return for it. What is he to do?

An hon. Member: See the wheat board.

Mr. Castleden: Ask this government what it intends to do about it. To get over the situation he takes some cattle, decreases his herd abnormally and tries to sell. He takes them to the local stockyards and finds about three firms bidding against him, and has to sell his stock at their prices. He raises a few hogs. He is told to raise hogs by the Minister of Agriculture, to turn his grain into cash. What do we find? Instead of the price he used to get a few years ago, with which he might be able to pay his operating costs, he finds the price of hogs is declining until this year it has reached the floor of 19 cents, which is supposed—

Mr. Studer: Two years ago, when the farmer was getting more, you were making the same speech.

Mr. Castleden: I was not here in 1951, when prices were highest. This is exactly the situation in which the farmer finds himself now. You do not like it, but you know it is a fact. You try to blame the C.C.F. for this. I shall deal with the wheat board shortly. The farmer says to the government, "We cannot deliver our grain. You have no box cars. Your transport controller has sent them into the United States, and they are not available. Our costs are going up. We cannot make our deliveries." The Canadian government has sold less wheat. Other three major exporting countries have increased sales. Australia and Argentina increased their export sales of wheat, and the United States gave it away, which is not difficult.

If more wheat is being used in the world, Canada should be receiving a greater share of the market than it is at the present time. It is not the fault of the wheat board; it is the policies of this government which prevent the sale of that grain. The western farmer knows that. We have the best wheat in the world, and he knows that too. Why should it not be sold? Since there is a market, why are we not getting it? The Minister of Trade and Commerce is supposed to be one of those men who get things done. I suggest he has a job here he has not done, and the farmers resent the situation.

The farmer in this position says to the government, "I am in a jam. I am loaded down with a burden of debt. It is hard to operate. I have the wheat. The value is here. You keep telling me you are going to sell it. Last July you said you would clear out all the old crop before the new crop arrived, but that has not been done. We have the grain. You say that it will be sold in a little while. How about letting us have a little cash in advance so we can operate? The elevator agents could inspect the bins for efficient storage and seal the bins. Properly stored grain is an asset. We shall let you place the advance on record in our permit book so you will be safely covered."

The farmers held protest meetings and agreed to send a delegation to ask the government if it could help them over the crisis. The answer of the government is a gem. It said, "You poor fellows, we shall take care of you. Just run down to the bank and get some more money at 5 per cent. We shall guarantee that not one banker will lose a nickel on it." Who is asking that the bankers be guaranteed? We are not asking for relief for bankers; we are asking for relief for the harassed man who has done his job and is entitled to his wages for a job well done. He is refused those wages because of the policies of this government. That is where the calamity lies; it does not lie in the production. It is a very serious situation, and the farmer resents it deeply.

I will say that the statement in the speech from the throne in which the government, after the house opened in January, finally admitted that it was going to do something about helping the farmer in regard to the carryovers, was welcome. I believe that will have the support of the people, but it does not help the farmer out of his immediate financial position. It does not put any cash in his pocket. Perhaps when this wheat lying in stock for two or three years is finally sold, that assistance from the government will be a saving to the farmer because it will not cost him so much to carry his grain, and he appreciates it.

But surely it was a small, mild and deserving request that the farmer made, that he be given an advance on the good solid collateral he had of the money he needs at the present time to help him over a financial stringency, out of which he cannot get without assistance. He has been placed in this position by this government and is helpless in the situation in which he finds himself. He says, "If you are ensuring that the rest of Canada is prosperous; if you are willing to spend a billion dollars in war contracts in the industrial areas, we too are producing something that could be used for defence purposes and for winning the world to democracy. How about helping us over this situation so we can carry on and continue to produce?" It is the least the government can do for the hard pressed victims of their own wheat policy, but what the government offers them is merely another load upon their backs, another 5 per cent interest. I can tell you that the farmers are deeply resentful at being put in this position.

We had quite an exhibition in the house the other day when the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that because we are advocating advances on farm stored grain we are against the wheat board. What an utterly ridiculous statement for any person to make. To me it is most irresponsible. He knows perfectly well that the C.C.F. party and the farmers of the west stand behind the policy of the wheat board with everything they have. They only got the wheat board after struggling and fighting 40 years for it. The farmers established their wheat pool organizations. They went after the Winnipeg grain exchange and succeeded in closing it.

The line elevators used to buy farmers' grain outright in the fall at depressed prices, at a time when the farmers needed money. They stored the grain, held it at fixed prices in the world market as best they could, boosted the price where they could, and pocketed the difference. When the minister tries to charge us with being against the wheat board I would reply to him that I think the wheat board has suffered more under his policies as Minister of Trade and Commerce than at any other time. The wheat board is a government agency established to handle the farmers' grain and protect them against exploitation by the Winnipeg grain exchange. Of course the setting up of the board has been hard on some of the line elevator companies. Some of them were affected seriously in the years following the commencement of the board's operations.

But who does the minister appoint as transport controller in charge of box cars; the ex-president of the Winnipeg grain exchange. Since he has held that office the allocation of box cars throughout the west has been such as to militate against the wheat pools. Most farmers in Saskatchewan used to deliver their grain to the wheat pool, but not any more; they could not get box cars.

We tried to find out why box cars were not being allocated to the pools and why they were being sent to the line elevator companies. The farmers had to drive for miles and miles to deliver their grain at all. Space was available in the line elevators because the box cars went to the line elevator companies. For the past four or five years the line elevator companies have been becoming stronger and more powerful. The Saskatchewan wheat pool has been going down so far as the percentage of grain it handles is concerned.

If there is any criticism against the wheat board it is as a result of the policies of the transport controller, one of the members of the board of grain commissioners, whose whole life has been spent in the line elevator company field. He is a man who I believe would like to see the Winnipeg grain exchange re-established. Before that ever happens the farmers of the west will be far more vocal than they are at the present time. They will not be sending only half a dozen representatives to Ottawa. They will fight to maintain the wheat board with every ounce of energy they have. They have not forgotten the way they and their fathers were exploited by the grain exchange for years before the establishment of the wheat board.

Mr. Trainor: They are perfectly satisfied now?

Mr. Castleden: They are satisfied with the operation of the wheat board. It is the operation of the policies of the government that is bothering them. The wheat board could do its job and sell the grain if the policies of the government allowed it to do so. The government should give the board the extra assistance necessary to send people throughout the world to sell the best product we have.

We are in competition with the United States treasury. The western farmer knows that across the line the government guarantees the farmer $2 a bushel on the farm. He sees that there are support prices for agricultural products which at least keep their agricultural areas out of the recession in which we find ourselves in western Canada. The western farmer sees that the United States government are sufficiently interested in their farmers to see that the family farm is maintained in that country as part of the American way of life.

With the continuation of the policies of the government in power today the small farmer is being squeezed out completely, and bankruptcy faces him. If the government do not take some action in the immediate future to relieve the situation they are going to have a revolt on their hands of a kind they have never had before. The farmers of the west are resentful.

I do not know what language the government requires to tell it that the people of the prairies are not satisfied, but I would suggest to the people of the west that the one thing the government does understand is the ballot. Unfortunately the government are sitting here with a vast majority. They do not need to care very much about the pleas of the farmers of the west who rightfully resent the discrimination and callous disregard for their condition.

They look to the government for long-term policies which will alleviate not only the immediate situation but make it possible for them to face the future with some assurance that they will be able to win in the end. They are militant when they see their farm organizations and their wheat board threatened, and they will make their voices heard in no uncertain terms when the opportunity presents itself.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Castleden: Yes.

Mr. Richardson: How many people do you have in your constituency at the moment who are actually bankrupt?

Mr. Castleden: My constituency is in the park area where there are smaller farms. It is not part of the larger area where they have larger straight grain farms. However, I would say that about 80 per cent of the farmers of my constituency are in debt.

Mr. Studer: Bankrupt?

Mr. Castleden: What do you mean by "bankrupt"?

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Castleden: I might also say that in the Yorkton area there are about 2,000 people listed at the unemployment insurance office looking unsuccessfully for work. I presume these people are facing bankruptcy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Do I understand the hon. member for Yorkton has completed his address or does he wish to call it one o'clock?

Mr. Castleden: May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Castleden: Before the luncheon recess, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the serious economic plight of the grain producer in the western prairies. I pointed out how he had been caught between rapidly rising costs of production and operation and rapidly diminishing returns during the last number of years. That is a situation that can lead only to bankruptcy. You do not long continue in business when the returns from your operations are less than the costs of operating. I pointed out that the western producer of grain and other products has a feeling of deep resentment toward the Ottawa government, not only for its failure to allow him some advances on the grain he has produced and for which he can obtain nothing with which to pay his expenses, but also for the fact that it is offering to place upon his back a further burden of 5 per cent in the way of interest on loans.

The action of the transport controller, in his failure to provide box cars to allow the shipment of grain, adds further to his resentment. Then the distribution of those box cars in a discriminatory way, thus preventing the farmer from delivering grain to the elevator to which he wishes to deliver it, further adds to his feelings of disgust. He looks over the record, and he watches the method of appointment of members of the board of grain commissioners. In this house we were given the word of the minister that he had received no recommendation from the Saskatchewan wheat pool with regard to certain men, but correspondence subsequently tabled in the house showed that the Saskatchewan wheat pool had recommended these very people for appointment to that job. This fact only adds to the grain producers' mistrust of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the administration as a whole.

The charges that have been made to the effect that we were opposed to the idea of the wheat board are completely unfounded. We have always supported it without any equivocation. To the farmer the maintenance of the wheat board is vital. The expansion of the wheat pools is vital to the producers as a protection against exploitation by the Winnipeg grain exchange. With their very last efforts they will fight to maintain the wheat board and see that it is run properly.

The farm organizations have been extremely bitter in their condemnation of the government responsible for present conditions, both as to the cost of production and markets. They condemn the policies of the government during whose regime they have seen an expanding and constantly increasing cost of living through the years and as a result of which they now find themselves caught in a position where they are not able in any way to obtain cash for the products they have to sell.

I emphasize the fact that the problem is not just the immediate one of a few dollars cash. There remains the basic problem with regard to costs of production and diminishing returns. This problem will have to be faced if agriculture is to be saved. We are looking to this government to do something about the matter, but so far we have looked in vain.

I am proud to support the amendment as a condemnation of this government on its failure to take effective action in the face of a real and serious problem.

(Translation):

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, may I associate myself with the previous speakers in this debate in complimenting the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both did well by themselves and by their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, the 1956 session starts auspiciously. Because of the high level of prosperity prevailing in the country, and a higher level of employment than at this time last year, economic conditions are generally satisfactory. True, one sector of the economy, agriculture, is going through a rather difficult period. It is a pressing problem which the government will have to face during this session. A situation such as this, however, adds nothing new to the ordinary duties of any government. Managing the affairs of a country is essentially a complicated job. I would imagine that there never was a government without any problem to solve. This government has shown in the past that it is experienced and efficient enough to solve a difficult proposition, and we can trust that it will find the proper solution to our present agricultural problem.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house to point out to hon. members and to the government all the difficulties that beset our farmers. It has already been done, and I am sure others will like to enlarge upon those difficulties, in their own way. May I be allowed, however, to emphasize at this time, a particular phase of this situation, which has resulted from the changes that have happened was equally beneficial to the consumer. Since thinking of the rural exodus to industrial centres and of the importance of checking this tendency.

We have to realize that nowadays there is a strong flow of population into the cities. Because of higher wages, of shorter working hours than on the farm, and of other facilities normally found in towns and cities, our country people feel more and more attracted to the industrial sectors of our country. We are being told repeatedly that farming no longer pays. Because working the land seems too difficult, it is given up. Everywhere, along our country roads, we see abandoned farms. These young men who leave the country to swell the number of city workers are leaving behind properties that used to be prosperous farm units. They leave without a qualm and without even finding a purchaser. Farms of up to 100 acres of tillable land, with good buildings, are put up for sale for as little as $500, yet they remain unoccupied and unproductive. And this goes on despite the fact that the young people in our rural areas do not know where to settle. In the face of such a situation, what are we to expect for the future of our farm people, whose merits and greatness were so often exalted? Are the noble accounts praising the advantages of country life nothing but fancy or fiction? No. Man's first necessity is to feed himself and his family; and the soil is and remains his sole provider. The land is also a guarantee of moral security. We can at this point repeat those words of writer Henri Pourrat:

> Land, there is man's element; and the tilling of it is man's foremost task. When mortals have attained power, they can think of less simple endeavours, such as manufacturing automatic pencils, writing crime fiction, making streamlined automobiles. That is more wondrous still, with this undefinable touch of insignificance which clings to all human values. Tilling the land remains a greater endeavour.
> Man will forever have to deal with winter and summer, rain and sunshine, soil and water, grass, trees, wheat, and the vine. Those are the tangible things. They are simple and lasting things. In the worst calamities, these will always provide a fresh start. After crises, wars, revolutions, after the resounding crash of crumbling civilizations, there will always remain the great silence of nature: the earth that turns soundlessly, clover, rye, oaks living their humble lives, timed on the regularity of seasons.

Can we forget that Canadian history truly began when valiant men cut down trees to clear through the forests a path wide enough to make room for houses? Is it superfluous to state that in rural parishes we find everything that ensures durability and stability? Today, as in times gone by, life on the farm provides a favourable atmosphere where the noblest virtues and the soundest traditions will bloom. Rural life guarantees a strong, well-balanced race, sound in body and mind.

Farmers are cool-headed and thoughtful. They are less easily taken in by rash innovations and dangerous waves of opinion. They saved us many times from moral surrenders which threatened our integrity. True farmers can raise their soul to summits where the real meaning of life is better understood.

Mr. Speaker, those traditions, this deeply religious rural population must be preserved in all its integrity. To that end, the agricultural family must be guaranteed its rightful place. It embodies, on the Canadian scene, factors of strength, of balance and of dignity which heighten and enrich our whole national heritage.

(Text):

I wish at this time, Mr. Speaker, to commend the government upon its butter price support policy. Since the introduction of this policy seven years ago it has proven beneficial both to the producer and the consumer. It had the net result of eliminating speculation from the butter market. We often hear it said in certain quarters that this subsidy resulted in creating large and costly surpluses. This, however, is not a true picture of the situation. At no time since the introduction of this measure in Canada have the annual butter stocks exceeded the maximum consumption by more than 5 per cent. This is a small surplus indeed, considering the stabilizing influence of this policy in the marketing of this food commodity. Undoubtedly this support program has permitted the dairy farmer of this country to stay in business. It had its effects, not only on the price of butter but also on other dairy commodities such as fluid milk and cheese, the returns from which are closely dependent on the price of butter itself.

It must be pointed out also that this policy was equally beneficial to the consumer. Since its inception the consumer has been permitted to buy butter at a stable price within the scope of the value of this commodity and the ability of the consumer to pay. The situation is far better than it was before this control measure, when the producer never knew what his returns would be and the consumer did not know what price he would be called upon to pay for a pound of butter.

It is true that this has resulted, during the past few years, in certain butter surpluses which must be disposed of on world markets at a loss to the national treasury and to the Canadian ratepayer, but it is not long ago that the reverse situation existed. There was a butter shortage in Canada, and in order to protect the consumer against paying exorbitant prices for this commodity butter was imported into Canada. It is only just, therefore, that the dairy farmer also should receive protection when surpluses arise on the domestic market. This can only be done through the measures adopted by the government of exporting these surpluses at current world market price levels. In this respect let me quote from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen, dated November 28, 1955, with which I agree:

> Last summer when some government-held butter was sold to Czechoslovakia at 21 cents a pound below the support price in Canada, there was much talk of the communists being given a "bargain". The same talk is being revived now in connection with the considerably larger sale (through a Dutch importer) to East Germany.
> These are no bargains at all. The European countries in question, or any others, could easily buy butter elsewhere at the same figure (37 cents) that is quoted by the Canadian government agency. For the world price happens to be substantially below present levels on this continent.
> It is sometimes suggested that if the government occasionally has more butter on its hands than it knows what to do with, the surplus should be disposed of to Canadians instead of abroad. This policy has been followed to a very limited extent in the supplying of butter at cut rates to public institutions; some 4,000,000 pounds have been used up in this manner. But to offer the government surplus to the public as a whole would simply break the butter market, for who would pay the present market price if he thought he could get butter for perhaps 20 cents less?

It is estimated that since its introduction the price support on butter has cost the ratepayers of this country less than one-fifth of a cent per pound. As stated in the above editorial, is this too stiff a price to pay for keeping butter values at a fairly stable level for the benefit of both producers and consumers? Is it too much to pay for helping an important national industry adjust itself to the formidable competition offered by margarine? The farm people of the country are contributing their share in maintaining the degree of protected economy as it prevails in Canada. Most of the commodities they buy from our manufacturers enjoy protection in some form or another. Is it too much to ask that, in turn, the commodities the farmers produce also get a certain degree of protection?

A few days before I left home for Ottawa I had the opportunity of discussing this whole problem with a friend. At the outset of our conversation he thought it was an abnormal situation that he had to pay 65 cents a pound for butter, while our surpluses were being sold to other countries at 37 cents per pound. In the course of the conversation I brought to his attention the same argument I have just brought to the attention of this house. In the end he admitted that the course followed by the government was fair and wise. He felt this was a matter that should be explained to every Canadian butter consumer. My friend admitted he had been led to view the situation unfavourably by certain recent press reports and radio broadcasts. In the light of our discussion he became satisfied that the government's action with regard to butter was fair both to the consumer and the producer.

We on this side of the house, Mr. Speaker, are dedicated to the task of bringing before Canadian citizens the legislative measures of a good, sound government.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Before directing my remarks to the subjects I intend to take up, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity of extending congratulations to the members of this house who have been elected for the first time. I hope they will enjoy their labours in parliament and their associations with the rest of us, and will receive the recognition they deserve from this government as the elected representatives of their constituents, regardless of the party to which they belong.

I would not miss this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of extending congratulations to the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley). She deserves those congratulations and the honour which was given to her. As the speech from the throne indicates, there will be legislation this session to give women equal pay with men in industries under federal jurisdiction. I think it was only right that she should receive the honour to speak first on that issue on behalf of the women of this country.

In justice, I feel I must also mention one of the outstanding Conservative lady members of this house, who deserves congratulations for having pressed this matter so vigorously in the last few years that she has convinced the government that the time has come to introduce this legislation. She will get due credit for it. Last, but by no means least, I should like to congratulate the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), who spoke easily and well. I am sure he will prove to be a good representative of his constituents.

There are several matters, Mr. Speaker, with which I could deal. Like most hon. members I am chiefly interested in matters which affect my constituents. I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Michaud), who just took his seat, particularly his remarks with regard to butter. I also read with interest the speech the other day of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy). I congratulate him on his remarks and also the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). If this government does not wake up and take a warning from these hon. members who are supporters of the government, it will be in trouble.

If the members of the government read the speeches of the hon. members from New Brunswick they will know that everything is not well in that province. These hon. members would not be rising in their places and criticizing the government and trying to point out that improvements could be made if they were not giving the views of their constituents. It is pretty nearly time, Mr. Speaker, that somebody supported the opposition in this house, who for the last few years have been pointing out that the problems of agriculture and of various other industries have not received the attention they should have received in the interests of the agricultural people of the country.

My chief concern is agriculture, and I am going to direct my remarks chiefly to that industry. It makes no difference whether the agriculturist is in the west, whether he is a wheat grower, a dairy farmer in the central part of Canada or in some other part of the country, a small farmer, a vegetable grower, or whether he is a potato grower in my constituency, in Prince Edward Island or in British Columbia; the financial position of the farmer today is serious, and it is serious all over the country. It is time this government paid a little attention to what hon. members are saying, both their supporters and members of the opposition. They have been given fair warning.

The production of food is a very important industry. When the farmers are prosperous the whole economy of the country is stimulated. When the farmers cannot sell their products, and in addition cannot get anything for their labour because markets are limited and prices are low, then there is something wrong, particularly when there is a market in this country for the produce grown by the farmers.

The past two years have been abundant years. Crops have been good; yields have been larger than usual. This has been the situation of the industry in my section of the country, in Prince Edward Island, in other parts of Canada and in the United States. We had a larger crop of potatoes last year than usual, but we are hearing so much about surpluses in this country that we are kind of getting tired of it. With the exception of wheat, Mr. Speaker, I do not think any surpluses are grown.

According to the facts presented before the tariff board in this city last July, more potatoes are consumed every year in Canada than are grown; therefore we have no surplus of potatoes in this country so long as our own people can consume them. But what do we find? Owing to the policy pursued by this government—and we cannot convince the Minister of Agriculture that it should be changed—we find that we have no access to our own markets. We have no access to our own markets chiefly because those markets are supplied by foreign products, which are allowed to come in here in competition with our own farmers' produce.

We are not growing more potatoes than are necessary in Canada. Our own people want those potatoes. They need them and they can consume them. The only reason they are not getting them is that the consumer buys where he can buy cheapest, and we are in competition with a foreign country. The producers of potatoes in a foreign country are permitted to dump their products in here. In many instances they have a shorter haulage distance. According to statements made to the tariff board, they are more efficient growers. The efficiency of the United States potato grower results from the policy followed by this government. That is the answer.

When you protect an industry that industry can grow bigger, and the bigger the industry grows the more efficient it becomes. In my constituency we have just as efficient potato growers as are found in the United States, when conditions are similar. The efficiency of the United States potato growers has resulted from their protected market and their quota system. If we were given a fair chance in our own Canadian markets our potato growers could grow potatoes just as efficiently, and they are doing it in some places.

Potatoes are vital to our economy. It is only right that I should place the feeling of the people of my constituency before this House of Commons, because they do not believe they received a fair deal in the last season. In the first place, no farmer in this country of plenty should be asked to work, to labour and to gamble on his crop, and then take a chance on what he may get out of it, when everybody else around him is protected. Industry of all kinds in this country is protected. The gold mining industry is protected and subsidized to the tune of many millions of dollars. But what happens to the potato growers in the eastern part of the country? The rest of the country needs those potatoes, and that has been the hue and cry ever since the days before confederation. The inducements held out to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and the rest of us in the maritime provinces to come into confederation were that trade would be encouraged east and west instead of north and south. We were promised that if we would come into confederation we would be given the opportunity to take our products into the markets of central Canada in competition with goods produced and grown there.

It all comes down to one thing, and that is that the transportation problem between the maritime provinces and central Canada is something that should be looked after by the federal government. It should not be left to the railroads to fix their rates at the point where they pay. It was never anticipated that we would have to pay heavy freight rates on long hauls in order to place our goods in the west and encourage east and west trade, or that we would be in competition with a foreign country which is dumping its goods in this country at prices less than the cost of production. For a time this year they were able to ship in potatoes as Canada No. 1 grade when they were smaller than the potatoes we were allowed to ship as Canada No. 1.

In making the final arrangements, because of the policy which has been forced upon our farmers the producers of potatoes must carry back home culls to a greater extent than they should be asked to do. The only market for culls is the starch factory, or to be used as feed.

I notice the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat, but I should like to ask his parliamentary assistant or anyone else on the government side why it is that you can go into a government hotel like the Chateau down here and get table potatoes which are smaller than Canada No. 1. Those potatoes are not 2½ inches in diameter; I do not think they would average more than 2 inches. Why are they being purchased as Canada No. 1? Why is the restaurant upstairs using potatoes that would not measure up to the size of Canada No. 1. Where are those potatoes coming from? It looks to me as though the United States can ship in any size they want while we have no protection whatsoever.

I am glad the Minister of Agriculture has come into the chamber, because I have a few words to say to him and I hope he will harken to them. They are not critical words, but when they are interpreted I think he will realize what the people down there are thinking. This potato situation was known in September, but because of the policy this government was following, because of the increased yield in the United States as well as in Canada, because United States potatoes were coming in here during the early part of the season as Canada No. 1 when they were smaller than what we could put on the market as Canada No. 1, our producers and potato dealers tried immediately to get in touch with the Department of Agriculture in order to have a conference so that something might be done to relieve the situation which the farmers were facing. They could get nowhere.

Mr. Gardiner: We had two conferences with them.

Mr. Montgomery: I do not know whether it is the minister's fault and that is why I am speaking to the minister directly. There was no conference arranged. Wire after wire was sent to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) who represents New Brunswick, and we presume word was sent from him to the department, but still no conference was forthcoming. There was no conference until around December 18. If I am wrong I should like to be corrected, but that is the information I have. Following that conference there was a further conference.

Mr. Gardiner: My friend says he wants to be corrected and he is putting this on Hansard. At the moment I am not sure of the other exact dates, but there certainly was a conference during the first week of December. There was a discussion earlier than that, but during the federal-provincial conference, which was held in the first week in December, there were a number of discussions on the question.

Mr. Montgomery: As I understand it, during the first week of December the ministers of agriculture of the different provinces met in Ottawa with officials of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Gardiner: Members from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island governments had separate discussions with the Department of Agriculture officials, at which I was present.

Mr. Montgomery: That was not granted at the request of the potato men. As I understand it, that was the first time the matter was brought to a point where all the parties could discuss it. The first meeting after that at which the potato growers and potato dealers could give their story and review their case was very close to December 18, if it was not on that date. Following that there were further discussions, and then the program of diversion was pronounced some time around January 4 or 5.

Going on from there I should like to know why the program has not gone into effect even yet.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member will have to go down to New Brunswick to find out.

Mr. Montgomery: I have just been down to New Brunswick and the government, as I understand, has yet to tell the people and the potato growers what they are prepared to do. There is just one thing they said they would do; that is, to guarantee $1 a barrel, but they did that after the market price of potatoes was $1.25.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend apparently does not understand it. I have the order in council in front of me which was passed a considerable time ago. It is not $1 a barrel of 165 pounds of graded potatoes, it is $1 a barrel for potatoes of garden run taken to the plant. The $1 per barrel is paid on that basis, which is an even higher price than my hon. friend has indicated.

Mr. Montgomery: I suggest that the minister inform his officials in New Brunswick, because that is not what they are telling the potato producers in New Brunswick.

Mr. Gardiner: It is they who told me.

Mr. Montgomery: I hope the minister can furnish me with a copy of that order in council, because that certainly is not the information being circulated. It is $1 per barrel of 165 pounds of Canada No. 1.

Mr. Gardiner: No, it is not.

Mr. Montgomery: That is what I would like to have information on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member must realize that he is taking part in a debate, and that this is not a time for questions and answers.

Mr. Gardiner: I will send this over, and my hon. friend will note that it is $1 per barrel of 165 pounds for potatoes spot graded. That means it is $1 per barrel for the potatoes as they are taken in to be graded afterward.

Mr. Montgomery: I am afraid the minister would not agree with some of his potato inspectors. We will leave that, and time will tell whether the minister or the inspectors are right. I hope the minister is right, because that would be an improvement over the information that is being passed around.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the recommendation to council and it cannot be anything else but right.

Mr. Montgomery: That was my interpretation, and I appreciate the information the minister has given. I do want to say a word about the program. This government should have a policy governing potatoes. New Brunswick grows approximately 20 per cent of the potatoes grown in Canada, and Prince Edward Island is also a large producer. My constituency and the fringes of my constituency grow from 75 to 80 per cent of the potatoes grown in New Brunswick. This industry is vital to us, and we submit that there should be a potato policy, just as there is a wheat policy or any other kind of policy. That potato policy should be such that it would automatically come into effect when the price is so low as it was this year.

No two farmers may agree exactly on the cost of production. Some will tell you it is $1.75 a barrel, some will tell you it is more, some less. But I think it is fair to state that our largest and most efficient growers claim—and this corresponds with the growers in the state of Maine, who are large growers—that one cent a pound is a very fair average. That means $1.65 a barrel. When the government has guaranteed a price of $1 they are guaranteeing only 36 cents a bushel, which is just slightly over half the cost.

Mr. Gardiner: On what we are talking about, it is 42 cents a bushel.

Mr. Montgomery: I shall concede that if the minister's interpretation is the correct one it will come to about 42 cents a bushel. But here is the worst part of the program, and this is where our people feel hurt. It is too late coming into effect. I do not know whether the minister or members of this house realize it, but potatoes are a product that cannot be handled like grain or some other products. They must be put into storage before frost comes. If there is no storage they must be sold. The minute they are frozen they are a loss.

Second, these farmers have to gamble when they put in their crop. Many of them have to borrow for their fertilizer. They have to work all summer. They have to buy their sprays and a good deal of costly machinery, which involves large capital investment. When harvest time comes they must try to sell enough potatoes to pay part of their bills, because they have to live. They have to pay their grocery bills, clothing bills and so on. They need money; some need it worse than others.

In a fall like the last one, many farmers have to sell their potatoes at 65, 70 or 75 cents a barrel. A barrel is 165 pounds. When the farmer was selling potatoes at 65 and 70 cents a barrel he was losing about 90 cents a barrel on the cost of production. Had this program come into effect when it should have, on October 1, it would have saved a great many men heavy losses.

That is what our potato producers have been trying to impress on our government for a number of years. From hearing some of the other members speak it would seem that they have heard some of the potato growers and dealers in New Brunswick talking. Some of those people were very strong friends of this government a very short time ago, but I do not think they have the same feeling now that this government is doing all it can for the people in the potato business. The people who really needed that help were the people who had to sell between October 1 and November 5, the latter being about the latest date in any year that one can take a chance on keeping potatoes, even on ground floors. Those who need money have to sell the potatoes right out of the fields. How can the economy of any constituency or any part of the country be kept up when the producer, who has worked all summer, has to sell his product for 90 cents less than it cost him to produce it?

There is another matter to which I would like to refer. Unless I am wrong this program terminates on April 30. It has not yet gone into force. Up to the night before last no potatoes had gone into starch under this diversion program, and I doubt that any will be going in under this program for another week or so. That leaves the months of February, March and April as the only three possible months in which this program will have any effect. I should like to tell the Minister of Agriculture and the members of this government that a program that stops at the end of April is not going to have the beneficial effect it should have.

These people down east do not feel they are coming here and asking for a handout. As has been mentioned before, because of pre-federation agreements these people are asking for an adjustment for unfair treatment. There are many ways in which such an adjustment can be made. There are no complaints through the country when the government subsidizes the freight charges on coal, when it subsidizes or helps to pay the freight on grain from the west to the east. If the federal government were to live up to the pre-federation agreements it would help to pay the freight on potatoes from the maritime provinces to central Canada. That would be only living up to the trade your forefathers made, when we were supposed to be able to place our products in central Canada in competition with the markets here.

We are not getting that privilege. We have a right to ask the federal government for it, and the federal government has a right to take out of the treasury the money to pay the difference in freight rates if we cannot place our products on the market at competitive prices, so the farmers can recoup the cost of production. That should be a policy that would work both ways. We do not come here asking this government for any other assistance.

To summarize what I have said, this government has procrastinated. It had plenty of warning. I know myself that wires were sent to the department in Ottawa, to the Minister of Labour, and that representations were made by the secretary of the horticultural council of Canada. Everybody was working to try to arrange a conference.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend has referred to this and he has also referred to the fact that I am sitting listening to him. I want to tell him that there were conferences. I do not remember the exact dates, but conferences were held with those people. What they were interested in at that time was not selling potatoes for starch. Proposals were sent to them, but they did not accept them.

Mr. Montgomery: I would be glad to listen to the minister make a speech later and explain all this, because he has a good deal of explaining to do.

Mr. Gardiner: I shall not waste my time now answering and explaining it to you. I shall take it up with the right people.

Mr. Drew: Little Caesar.

Mr. Gardiner: I have already explained it fully to those people, and they do understand me.

An hon. Member: He has plenty to explain.

Mr. Montgomery: I do not think the minister himself really understands the situation we are in there. Otherwise I do not think he would be so hard-hearted that he would not do something for these people.

Mr. Gardiner: I met them three or four times. I do not know how many more times I should have met them.

Mr. Montgomery: We farmers have lost a good deal of money as the result of a program which now appears to be very late in coming. It seems to me this government should have decided how much it was going to contribute to that program, and let the farmers or the starch producers know at once.

As I have said, in summing up, what I should like to impress upon the minister is that this is not going to be the last season.

It has not been the first. Two years ago a marketing board was found to be not satisfactory by any means.

Nobody blames the government for not wanting to go into that sort of deal again with the same type of people handling it. Nobody wants that. But you will find that most of our farmers want a square deal. They want a program that will be operated openly, aboveboard and honestly so that a few cannot take advantage of many others. That is all I wish to say about potatoes, but I thought I should concentrate more on that subject because we are being hurt most in that field.

We want the government to continue its support of the dairy industry. We are not satisfied with any explanation offered yet regarding the disposal of surplus butter. We also believe there would be no surplus butter in Canada if our own people had the opportunity of consuming it. I am not so fortunate as the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Michaud). If he can explain to his constituents that the present policy is a proper one I commend him. He is a smart boy. It cannot be explained that easily in some other parts of New Brunswick, and I doubt if it can be explained that easily in some other parts of Canada.

If there is any charity involved I think charity should begin at home, and a lot of other people think so too. We are forcing a great many people to eat margarine, which may or may not be as good as butter; but why should we protect one product and not allow our people the opportunity to have the other product?

I am not going to take the time to tell the government how the surplus butter can be dealt with. There are difficulties in the way, but I know there are people in the Department of Agriculture who are smart enough to handle the situation so that the poor people of the country may have the opportunity of eating our butter instead of margarine, and be able to buy it at the same price. It would not affect the marketing of good butter at all.

I should also like to deal shortly with the C.B.C. I do not intend to say much because the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) did so the other day so much better than I could. If the government feel that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is doing the best job that can be done so far as television programs are concerned, then all I have to say is it would be a good thing if the C.B.C. would get out of the field and hand it over to somebody else. Even a bunch of amateurs could put on better programs than we are getting in New Brunswick. They are a disgrace, and should not be shown on television screens. If anything will lead to more delinquency it is some of the programs that are being shown, and I commend the hon. member for Westmorland for what he said the other day regarding this matter.

The only other point I wish to mention has to do with income tax. I think there should be changes in the act so our farmers will be shown a little more consideration for the efforts they have made in trying to keep books. I am not an auditor, and I do not wish to criticize the income tax officials too severely. I have found them most co-operative. They will almost bend over backward in an effort to live within the law and the regulations, but the law should be changed. I pass on this suggestion to the government for consideration, because I am not the only one who has encountered this situation. There should be a change so that honest farmers who are trying to keep books will not be told by the field man when he comes around that their books are no good and cannot be accepted.

Most of these farmers are not too familiar with keeping books. They know pretty well what they are doing, and most of them are honest; nevertheless the field man will say he is not satisfied and he will ask a lot of questions and get the farmer mixed up. The farmer may then get mad and refuse to answer any more questions. Thereupon the field man goes back to his office and issues an arbitrary assessment. It may not be too much in some cases, but in other cases the amount is large. Regardless of the amount the farmer says, "Well, what can I do about it? You cannot fight the government." The farmer pays it if he can. I do not think that the government intended that the act should be administered in that way. I believe the matter is worth looking into, and adjustments of some sort by way of amendments to the act should be introduced so that any reasonable set of books will be accepted as sufficient.

Then the officials will not make a farmer feel that he is guilty from the moment they walk in the door, and that the only way he can get out of the situation is to prove himself innocent. That is the impression that is given, and it is wrong. I know that many departmental officials do not want that to be the case, but that is the impression that is getting abroad. I am satisfied I am not the only member who has met with that situation.

Mr. Gardiner: On a question of privilege, just before I came in I believe the hon. member referred to the fact that neither I nor my parliamentary assistant were in the house. I am sure the hon. member would not want the impression to go abroad that my parliamentary assistant is not usually in the house.

He is in the hospital at present and is not able to be here. I do not think there is any member who attends more regularly than he does, and I should like to make that explanation.

Mr. Montgomery: I hope my remarks did not sound the way the minister has taken them. I just mentioned the fact that neither one was here. I am very sorry that the parliamentary assistant is in the hospital. I addressed my remarks to any other members of the government who were present in order that they might convey any information they thought was worth while.

Mr. Speaker: Earlier in his speech today the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton asked why the parliamentary restaurant was not buying No. 1 Canadian potatoes. Matters coming under the jurisdiction of the Speaker are not usually dealt with in the house except during the consideration of the estimates. Citation No. 302 of Beauchesne, third edition, is the authority on that point. However, I want to put the hon. member's mind at rest by informing him and the house that the parliamentary restaurant always buys No. 1 Canadian potatoes. Up to last Monday we had purchased New Brunswick potatoes in 25-bag lots at a price of $1.45 a bag. The market this week is $1.85 for No. 1 Canadian potatoes from New Brunswick and $2.40 for No. 1 Canadian potatoes from Prince Edward Island. Therefore we bought No. 1 potatoes from New Brunswick in 25-bag lots. We shall continue to buy No. 1 Canadian potatoes at the best market price.

(Translation):

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, may I first be allowed to congratulate the mover of the address in reply, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley), as well as the seconder, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme). Both made remarkable speeches and brought upon themselves the attention not only of their respective constituents, whom they represent brilliantly here, but also of the people of their province and of the country at large. I most wholeheartedly endorse the congratulations they have received from their colleagues, in every part of this house, since the beginning of this debate.

The women of Canada could not be better represented in this house than by the hon. member for Timiskaming. On the other hand there are very few of the younger members of this house to whom a more auspicious political career could be predicted than to the hon. member for Bellechasse.

I also wish to congratulate the new members who, a few days ago, took their seats for the first time in this house. I extend particular greetings to four new colleagues from the province of Quebec, namely: the hon. members for Temiscouata (Mr. St. Laurent), for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Menard). Their presence here is a new and eloquent expression of confidence in the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his government on the part of the people of Quebec.

Our four new colleagues from Quebec have no doubt undisputable merits of their own, but there is one among them on whom I wish to call particular attention, Mr. Speaker, in view of the personal victory he won in his constituency over the combined forces of his adversaries in extremely difficult circumstances and after one of the bitterest campaigns I have been given to witness personally. During that by-election, which won him the right to represent one of the greatest counties in the province, the hon. member for Temiscouata has indeed shown uncommon leadership and thus proved himself worthy of the man whose name he so proudly bears. His victory is due above all to his courage, his purposefulness, his self-control, the confidence with which he inspired the electors in his county, and the dignity he showed while facing fierce and often unscrupulous opponents. The imposing majority given the hon. member for Temiscouata by his constituents in such circumstances should be a lesson to his opponents in the future.

Mr. Speaker, since the start of this debate we have heard a lot about the western farmer.

Though we are well aware of the plight of our western farmers, we must not forget that there are farmers elsewhere in this country, whose problems are quite as worthy of the government's and the people's attention.

This is why I intend to speak to you today, as I have done many times in the past, about our eastern farmers and their problems and, more particularly, of one of their problems, which undoubtedly deserves urgent attention.

If the western farmer grows wheat, Mr. Speaker, the eastern farmer produces butter, apples, potatoes, among other commodities and, more especially pulpwood.

The question of the price and sale of butter has been at least temporarily settled by the setting of a floor price, under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and by selling part of our surpluses at the world price on various export markets. These two government measures, which have been well received by the main agricultural organizations in this country, more particularly by the Catholic farmers' union, in the province of Quebec, have helped in no small way to maintain the standard of living of the Canadian milk and butter producers.

As far as apples and potatoes are concerned, about which we have just been told by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery), we know that large crops have been raised by eastern farmers. In some districts a great many potato producers will have a hard time getting an adequate return on the sale of this commodity, so as to cover their production costs.

That is a problem to which the Liberal government has attended successfully in the past and to which, at this time, it is giving close attention.

There remains the marketing of pulpwood. The farmers and settlers of eastern Canada are large producers of this commodity, cutting almost a million cords a year, providing in this way a necessary if not indispensable complement to the rural economy of Quebec and the maritimes.

True, there is a market for the farmers' and settler's pulpwood, but this market, not always being subject to the law of supply and demand is often given over to the rule that might makes right, or to speculation.

The eastern farmer could partake in larger measure of the prosperity of this country if he were in a position to receive at all times a fair price for his products, more particularly for the pulpwood which he offers for sale every year.

When, because of overproduction, he has trouble getting a fair price for his butter, his apples, his potatoes or his other farm products, he understands the reason for this condition. It is a matter of supply and demand.

What he cannot always understand is that pulpwood, the only one of his products for which there exists a practically unlimited demand, does not bring him a greater return, in proportion, than his farm products for which there is no or hardly any market in periods of overproduction.

In one case, because of overproduction of farm products and the law of supply and demand, the eastern farmer must at times be content with a meagre return for his long days of work. In the other case, that of pulpwood, for which there exists a practically unlimited market, the law of supply and demand seldom comes into play and, in order to provide the necessities of life for his family, the farmer or the settler producing pulpwood, is too often forced to submit to an arbitrary system, in which he still comes out the loser when he is not the victim of obvious exploitation.

It is the province of Quebec which controls the Canadian newsprint industry, with more than half the production for Canada as a whole and, sad to say, it is in the province of Quebec that the bushworker is the worst paid for his labour, and that the farmer and the settler get the lowest price for the pulpwood they market.

The Canadian pulp and newsprint industry reached new records in 1955. Lumber, pulp and newsprint all reached new unparalleled levels.

For the ten months ending November 1, 1955, sales of all forest products to all countries reached the incredible total of $1,265 million, an increase of $145 million over the corresponding period of last year.

During the same period, sales of all Canadian products reached $3,578,200,000, an increase of $393,700,000.

Newsprint production for the whole of 1955 has been estimated at 6,180,000 tons, a gain of $2,588,000 tons since 1945. However great, that increase does not meet a growing demand, particularly in the United States which take up 80 per cent of Canadian production.

The expansion which is planned and some new undertakings will bring the estimated production of our paper industry to 6,200,000 tons in 1956, 6,575,000 tons in 1957 and 6,900,000 tons in 1958.

We have what would be a very good market for all the wood which the eastern Canada farmer and settler could place at the disposal of the pulp and paper companies, were it not for the fact that, in that field, the law of supply and demand is tampered with, directly or indirectly.

In this way, the eastern farmers and settlers would be assured of a fair and well-deserved compensation for the poor returns from their farms, the products of which are often difficult to market in times of overproduction, as a result of the hard and fast economic laws of supply and demand.

In other words, the prices paid for pulpwood, and more particularly to the farmers and settlers in the province of Quebec, should not be left to the discretion of powerful, though perhaps well-meaning, trusts, nor to the whims of speculators.

The prices of pulpwood bought from the farmers and settlers should, at least in the province of Quebec, be established on a fair basis which any pulpwood producer could understand.

In order to provide that basis, it would be necessary to set as follows the items which enter into the calculation of the price paid to producers of pulpwood.

1. The value of standing timber.

2. The cutting rate, including piling and opening of roads for haulage.

3. The cost of haulage to the points where trucks can pick up and carry pulpwood in normal conditions.

4. Improvement works, upkeep, fees for right of way and damages.

5. The protection, marking out and upkeep of boundaries, fences and forestry works.

6. Unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation board, and fire insurance on timber cut in danger periods.

7. A reasonable profit.

In most areas of the province of Quebec the value placed on each of those items is as follows:

1. It is generally recognized that the value of standing timber is of at least $5 a cord.

2. The cutting rate for farmers' and settlers' timber should always be equal to the minimum set yearly through collective bargaining, for the same work, on the companies' timber limits. For the year 1954-55 that item would have been $5.50 a cord.

3. The haulage rate for settlers' and farmers' pulpwood, at delivery points, should be equal to the average rate for the same operation on the companies' timber limits, which varies with the cost of manual and horse labour. With a cost of $9.50 a day for manual labour and $3 a day for horse labour at the present time, this item would come to $2.50 a cord.

4. Improvement works, the maintenance of tracks, the building of roads, fees for right of way come to 50 cents a cord.

5. Fire protection and prevention; fences, and forestry works implying rational and selective cutting might total $1 a cord.

6. The various expenditures with regard to unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation board, and fire insurance for lumbering operations in danger periods would probably be covered by an amount of 75 cents a cord.

7. A reasonable profit might be estimated at 20 per cent of the total of the first six items, that is $3.05 a cord under present conditions.

When adding the various items of this basic operation, which I believe to be fair and adequate: value of uncut timber, $5; lumbering, $5.50; haulage, $2.50; improvements, 50 cents; protection, fences and forestry work, $1; unemployment insurance workmen's compensation and fire insurance, 75 cents; profits of 20 per cent of foregoing, $3.05, which we believe to be fair; we get for wood marketed by the farmers and settlers a total operational cost of $18.30 a cord at shipping point, that is at the highway or railway station, whereas in various sectors of the province, the same wood, at the same shipping points but cut by pulp and paper companies on crown property would cost them from $19 to $25 a cord and often more.

This obviously does not include the cost of transportation of the wood from the shipping point to the factory, this price varying with the distance.

With somewhat more than a cord of pulpwood it is possible to manufacture a ton of newsprint. The cost of producing a ton of newsprint in a modern mill is approximately as follows:

Wood: mechanical wood pulp, 86 per cent, at $32 per cord ..	$ 27.52
chemical wood pulp, 14 per cent with 50 per cent yield	8.96
Water: 0·12 per 1,000 gallons	2.40
Steam	1.45
Power	5.40
Labour	7.50
Maintenance	2.80
Administration	2.25
	$ 58.28

To which should be added indirect costs such as:

Overhead	$ 8.90
Debt retirement	3.60
Insurance	0.40
Interest on capital	0.30
Selling agency	2.00	15.20
		$ 73.48

As far as the selling price of a ton of newsprint is concerned, the mills receive $117 a ton in Quebec and $111.60 in New York after subtracting transportation costs which bring this price to $126. This leaves the paper mills a margin of net profit of between $35 and $40 per ton of newsprint.

During the winter of 1954-55 pulpwood was bought from the farmers and settlers of Quebec at $10 or $11 on the average per cord of 128 cubic feet at the shipping point, that is $7 or $8 less than the production costs as appearing in the items I have just brought to your attention. In some localities, settlers received as little as $7.50 a cord for their wood.

Thanks to the representations made by the Liberal members in this house during the previous session on behalf of the pulpwood producers of the province, and to the educational campaign conducted during the summer and the fall of last year by the forestry section of the Catholic farmers union, under the leadership of Mr. Samuel Audette, forestry manager of the UCC federation, the prices of pulpwood were increased on the main by $2 to $3 a cord in the province of Quebec to reach an average price of $12 or $13 a cord and sometimes more.

However, as can be seen from the breakdown I just gave, these prices are still far from sufficient to cover the cost of operation and insure a small margin of profit to the producers of pulpwood.

Several pulp and paper companies have, however, given evidence of their will to cooperate, and have shown themselves anxious to contribute to the solution of this important problem of the rural economy of our province.

Negotiations are at present being carried out on this matter between officers of the Catholic farmers union and representatives of the pulp and paper industry. Moreover, on January 17 the executive of the Catholic farmers union submitted a brief to the Hon. J. S. Bourque, minister of lands and forests of the province of Quebec, on this important matter.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

The Catholic farmers union requested the establishment of a minimum average price of $20 for an apparent 8 foot by 4 foot by 4 foot cord of good commercial grade resinous wood and of varieties at present accepted for the manufacture of pulp and brought to a carriage road.

Moreover, the Catholic farmers union has asked that the felling rate on crown lands be such as to permit the buying of wood from the woodlots of the farmers. In other words, the C.F.U. wants a legislation identical with that existing elsewhere, for instance in Ontario since 1937, authorizing the province not only to set the minimum price to be paid the farmer or the settler for his pulpwood, but also to fix the quantities of wood which the pulp and paper companies would have to buy from the farmers and the settlers, having regard to their other sources of supply.

The Hon. Mr. Bourque answered that the request of the C.F.U. would receive consideration, but he suggested two ways of improving, according to him, the situation of the farmers and the settlers who sell pulpwood to the companies.

Farmers, he said, should not cut an inch of wood before they have a sale contract, and they should also get together to fix the price and stick to the price they fix.

Anyone who knows anything about the vast problem of marketing pulpwood by the farmers and settlers, will admit that, on the face of it, both solutions suggested by the minister are unrealistic, impractical and unacceptable, if not ridiculous.

It is indeed very much to be regretted that the hon. minister of lands and forests of the province of Quebec does not seem to realize that, without some action by the provincial government, or the goodwill of the companies, thousands of small pulpwood producers will continue to be unfairly treated because most of the pulp and paper companies dispose of endless woodland resources in the province, and are using or abusing this privilege, by maintaining the low prices that prevailed for the past few years for pulpwood marketed by the farmers and settlers.

As the province of Quebec has sole jurisdiction with regard to the crown lands, it is up to the provincial government of Quebec to put some order in those conditions.

(Text):

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, since wheat marketing is one of the main subjects of discussion in western Canada at the present time, and since I represent a constituency that is predominantly agricultural, and one that contains some of the very best wheat land to be found in western Canada, I intend to confine my remarks mainly to the subject of wheat marketing.

We in this group intend to support the C.C.F. subamendment which criticizes the government for their failure to make advances against grain stored on the farm. That does not mean that we agree 100 per cent with the details of the subamendment, but on the other hand it does mean that we are 100 per cent behind the general principle contained therein, namely, that advances should be made against grain stored on the farms. Some hon. members may recall that two years ago we had a resolution on the order paper to that effect. I am not worried in any way by the suggestion made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that support for that subamendment will be regarded as opposition to the wheat board, since a suggestion of that kind is too nonsensical to need any reference to it. I merely point out that as conditions change, so is it necessary to amend legislation to take care of those changing conditions.

As a result of the congestion of wheat, we feel that advances against grain are essential. The minister claims that support for that can be reckoned as a criticism of the wheat board. Well, if that argument holds water, then the government's action in making a proposal to make loans to the farmers against their grain on the farm would also have to be considered as a criticism of the wheat board, and the government's suggestion to pay storage charges would also have to be considered as a criticism of the wheat board. As I say, the whole charge is ridiculous. As conditions change, so will legislation have to be passed to take care of those changing conditions.

Before dealing specifically with wheat, I wish to make a few comments on general agricultural policy. In the past, our three main points in that regard have been that there is a need for adequate support prices. First of all, the government should maintain adequate support prices on all farm products. Second, there is need for an expansion of markets, both in the domestic field and in the export field. Third, there is need for an all-risk crop insurance program.

The justification for the first of those points has been emphasized time and again in this house by members of this group and members of other opposition parties. From time to time we have emphasized the fact that in the post-war years, as a result of government policies, farmers were compelled to accept for their farm products prices that were less than world market prices. In consequence of that, the prime minister of the day, Mr. Mackenzie King, stated that since farmers were being compelled to accept less than world market prices to maintain the price ceiling, the government would maintain a floor under agricultural prices after the war as part of a general stabilization program. Therefore, when the farmers ask for support prices today they are not asking for a handout in any shape or form; they are merely asking that the government live up to their promises and because the farmers have already paid for these support prices by accepting considerably less than world market prices during the war and in the post-war years. Those policies cost the farmers of Canada many hundreds of millions of dollars. So far, all that has been spent on support prices is a sum in the neighbourhood of $20 million. It is true that another $60 million odd was paid in regard to foot-and-mouth disease, but that has nothing to do with support prices. It was paid to deal with an emergency of the day. Therefore, we feel that the farmers are fully justified in asking for adequate support prices today. Well the government did keep faith to a certain extent by passing the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

I have always supported the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I think it is a good act. My only criticism would be that the government does not make as good use of that act as it should. Secondly, some of those support prices are not as high as they should be under the government's own formula. Under the government's formula they use 1943-44-45 as the base year. According to the agricultural prices support board, some of the support prices today are not as high as they should be on the basis of that formula. I quoted figures in the house last year to prove that point, and I do not wish to take the time to deal with them now.

The method of applying support prices may vary, of course. We in this group have suggested from time to time that they should be applied through a two-price system. A two-price system can be fully justified and it cannot be regarded as a hardship upon any class of society. It is just as well to recogniz the fact, that the secondary industries have been using the two-price system for years. When a secondary industry sets prices, it sets a price in the domestic market at a level that will return it a fair profit. So far as exports are concerned, it sells at the best price it can receive, and on many occasions the price the secondary industry receives for its exports will actually be less than the price at which it sells at home. That is especially true of farm machinery.

The two-price system simply means this. Farm products consumed in Canada would be paid for at parity prices as defined in the Agricultural Prices Support Act. To the extent that they are surplus, those surpluses would be exported abroad and sold at the best price that could be obtained, preferably by an international agreement, but supported by a reasonable floor to protect the farmer against a complete collapse of the market and guarantee him at least the cost of production.

At this time I am very glad to congratulate the C.C.F. on changing their policy in regard to this question. It will be remembered that last year they criticized me quite severely for advocating a two-price system. They said that they would not support it because they would not take anything less than 100 per cent parity. But already in this debate a couple of their members have supported it. I for one will not criticize them; in fact I should like to congratulate them upon their change of policy. I suggest that as long as they keep their policy parallel to ours they will not be liable to make a mistake.

I know there are some who say—I think the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) took this stand last year—that it would not be fair to the Canadian consumer to charge him more than was being charged to people in other countries. In the first place, if the farmers were asking a support price which would give them an exorbitant return I would agree with the hon. member 100 per cent. What is the farmer asking for? He is asking for a parity price based upon the Agricultural Prices Support Act. What does that act guarantee? That act guarantees to the farmer a price that will bear a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities and to wages. Is anyone in this house going to argue that the farmers of Canada are not entitled to a price that bears a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities or to wages paid in other industries? Surely no one would suggest that the farmer should have to accept less than that, especially when he has paid already for that protection by subsidizing the Canadian consumer in the post-war years, and our allies as well. Our farmers have paid for that protection and they are fully entitled to receive it.

In so far as the export price is concerned, by all means let the farmer receive parity if that is possible; but we in Canada have no control over the price that may be obtained for goods we ship to other countries. We can only try to get the best price we can. But on the other hand we can control the prices of commodities sold in this country.

We have had this very peculiar situation in the past. Approximately 94 per cent of farm products, apart from wheat, are consumed in Canada with 6 per cent being exported abroad. In the past we have allowed that 6 per cent that is exported abroad to dominate the price for the 94 per cent consumed in Canada. Is there any sense or reason behind a policy of that kind? The secondary industries do not stand for such a policy and it is high time that we recognized the farmer's right to a parity price for the percentage of his production which is consumed in this country.

There is nothing in the two-price system that would prevent the government from distributing surpluses to needy people in this country, to underprivileged people. Yesterday the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Yuill) suggested that it might be possible to give some of our surplus butter to old age pensioners, disabled people, blind persons or those receiving some form of social welfare payment. We have advocated that in the past, and have also referred to what was done in the United States during the pre-war days with their stamp plan. Under that plan people receiving social welfare payments received different coloured stamps for different farm products which were surplus. Those stamps entitled them to extra quantities of those commodities with every purchase they made. A similar plan could be used in this country for disposing of butter to old age pensioners, disabled persons or any group of people in the lower income brackets. As I say, the adoption of the two-price system would not interfere in any way with such a program.

We in this group have consistently supported the wheat board as the 100 per cent marketing agency for wheat. In my opinion the wheat board have done a magnificent job in the face of most difficult circumstances. On the other hand, the wheat board are often blamed for government policy for which they are not responsible in any way, shape or form. For instance, they were blamed on many occasions for selling our wheat at less than the world market price under the British wheat agreement. They were blamed for subsidizing the Canadian consumer by selling wheat at less than the price of class 2 wheat. That was not a policy of the wheat board, it was a government policy which the wheat board had to carry out.

The price received last year for wheat of $1.56 per bushel was altogether too low. It is interesting to note that a parity price on wheat last year, using the base period of the agricultural prices support board, that is 1943-44-45, according to the bureau of statistics would have been $2.27 per bushel. The farmer actually received $1.56. I think the actual price was around $1.70, but the rest of it went into storage charges.

Of course, the farmer did not get the $1.56 because out of that transportation charges had to be paid. Then again, that was for No. 1 wheat, whereas a large percentage of the wheat was 3, 4, 5 and 6. I would say that the average price received by the farmer would be nearer $1 than $1.56. I know of many farmers who are selling their low grade wheat today for around 75 cents per bushel.

Perhaps I should not publicize that fact, but it is something that is generally known. They owe the machine companies as well as other business concerns. A businessman may make a deal between a farmer and a feeder up in Edmonton or Calgary to sell his wheat. The businessman gets his debt paid, the feeder gets the wheat, and the farmer sells it for around 75 cents a bushel. The balance goes to pay the trucking charges from the farm to the feeder. Provided the deal is made directly between the farmer and the feeder I do not think there is any breach of the wheat board act, but if the businessman actually entered into a contract there would be a breach. As long as he merely acts as a go-between I imagine there is no violation.

If we had a two-price system in operation, what would be the effect upon the price of wheat? I am not sure of the exact figures, but we will say that approximately 20 per cent of our wheat is consumed in Canada with 80 per cent being exported abroad. According to the bureau of statistics the parity price for No. 1 on the 1943-45 base would be $2.27 per bushel. Twenty per cent at $2.27 and 80 per cent we will say at the average of the high and low under the international wheat agreement, which would be $1.70 per bushel, would give an over-all support price of $1.81 per bushel.

I mentioned that figure when I spoke in the house last spring and I was interested to note that about three months later when the United States announced their new support price it was set at $1.81 per bushel. I am not suggesting that there is any connection between those two prices; it was purely accidental, but it was interesting to note that when we were working on the support price we arrived at exactly the same figure at which the United States arrived later on.

A price of $1.81 per bushel is still well below a parity price of $2.27, but I think generally speaking the farmers would be quite satisfied to receive a support price of $1.81 per bushel. There is no support price under wheat today. Some people get confused on this subject and say that there is a support price of $1.40 per bushel. There is no support price of $1.40 per bushel. There is all the difference in the world between an initial payment of $1.40 and a support price.

A support price is for the purpose of preventing the price falling below a certain figure. What is an initial payment? The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) explained to this house what an initial payment was. He said that it could not be set early in the year because they had to be sure that the price of wheat would not fall below a certain figure before the initial payment could be set because the taxpayers of this country should not be called upon to subsidize the Canadian farmer. So they set the initial payment at a figure sufficiently low to make sure that there will be no loss. How can you possibly call that a support price?

I should like to turn from that to the question of surpluses. It is interesting to note that Mr. Hambridge, who is the F.A.O. representative for North America, when he spoke before the Senate last year, referred to the fact that at the present time over half the people of the world are hungry. No doubt many members have read the speech he made before the Senate. He painted a black picture. In view of that picture, we in this group do not agree that the solution to the problem of surpluses is a reduction in production. Surely the solution must be to find new ways of getting surplus goods to the people in need. I am not suggesting for one minute that it is any easy problem to solve. But that is the problem that has to be solved. Reducing production in the face of want is not the solution.

It is also interesting to note that under the international policies of the Bretton Woods agreement and the Geneva trade agreements we have not been able to solve that problem on an international level. As a matter of fact, world markets would have collapsed long before this if it had not been for the intervention of the United States, if it had not been for the fact that the United States brought down lend-lease during the war, under which it abolished the dollar sign entirely and made goods available to other nations in return for payment in kind. In other words, it was a form of deferred barter. Then the United States made large loans to foreign nations. Canada also made loans. Then the United States introduced Marshall aid. Members of the government have time and again praised the United States for the program of Marshall aid, under which the United States made dollars available to foreign nations to buy its surplus goods. Hundreds of millions of dollars made available under the Marshall plan were also used to buy Canadian surplus goods. We praised the United States for that policy because it was helping to solve our problem. In 1950 a committee of experts was set up by the director general of the F.A.O. to make recommendations upon ways and means of getting rid of the surplus commodities to the nations that needed them. The six experts appointed to that committee made a recommendation for an international commodity clearing house. Unfortunately that plan was rejected by the members of F.A.O. at a conference held in Rome. It became evident that from then on, as before, each individual nation would have to be responsible for the disposal of its own surpluses.

If I remember rightly, the Minister of Agriculture at that time stated that Canada would look after its own surplus. What the minister should have said was that the farmers would look after their own surplus. It is the farmers, not the government, who have had to look after the surplus, except in the case of butter. The wheat farmers have had to stand the full cost of carrying the surpluses. When the proposal for an international commodity clearing house was rejected, the United States government got busy finding ways and means of disposing of its surpluses. The interesting point to note is that the United States then adopted a policy very similar in part to the proposals contained under the international commodity clearing house proposal. The United States proposed to make its surpluses available for foreign inconvertible currencies. The United States proposed to make its surpluses available under barter. The United States proposed to make its surpluses available as gifts.

I recall that at the time that was first mentioned in the house the Minister of Trade and Commerce pooh-poohed the idea. He said he knew of no nation that would be willing to buy Canadian surpluses in return for their currency. Now the minister is complaining because the United States is selling so many of its surplus commodities on that basis and he is afraid they will be disposing of more and more commodities by that means. Yet two years ago the minister tried to laugh off the suggestion as being very inconsequential.

Now in the United States the government supports the price of wheat at a very substantial level. It advances the price of wheat to the farmer while the wheat is still on the farm and pays all carrying charges on that wheat. Compare that with the policy in Canada. In Canada we place the full burden on the farmer. There is no support price. As I have already pointed out, the interim payment is not a support price. There is no advance on grain on the farm. But the farmer has to carry the whole burden himself. The farmer has to pay all the carrying charges on the wheat. There is quite a difference between our policy and that of the U.S.A.

But that is not all. Not only does the government refuse to accept its responsibilities in dealing with the surplus of wheat, but it then criticizes other nations that are helping their farmers. Canada is in the position of being the only nation in the world that is not helping the farmers by supporting the price of wheat. The government criticizes the other nations for subsidizing their wheat producers and suggests that all other nations should quit doing that and follow the same policy as Canada. Let me quote what was said by our delegate at the international wheat conference, as reported in the Calgary Herald of October 27, 1955:

> Canada today warned the international wheat conference here that there will be market disturbances as long as heavy domestic subsidies are paid.
> W. C. McNamara, acting leader of the Canadian delegation, said frankly that "too many" countries represented at the conference follow domestic wheat policies which add to the difficulties of exporting countries.

Further on he said:

> "In particular", he said, "there will continue to be market disturbances, more or less serious, so long as wheat production continues to be subsidized as heavily as it is in many countries of the world today, both importing and exporting."
>
> He then turned to the position of Canada's own wheat producers.

Mark this. He is giving this wide publicity:

> "I would remind the delegates that in Canada world wheat prices are domestic prices. The Canadian producer of wheat has not been, and is not being, subsidized."

He told all the other nations of the world that Canada is doing nothing for its wheat farmers in so far as prices are concerned. He criticized them for protecting the wheat growers and suggested that they should stop doing so and get into line with Canada.

This reminds me of the rookie private who says that everybody is out of step but him and wants everybody else to get in step with him. Instead of Canada expecting all other nations of the world to cut off their support of agriculture and do the same as it is doing, I suggest it is time Canada got into line with other nations and supported its farmers as they are entitled to be supported. As an example of what other nations are doing, I might quote the figures given by the Wheat Pool Budget last year:

> The government of the United States guarantees farmers $2.24 a bushel for what wheat they market, in Argentina the figure is $2.72 a bushel, in Australia $1.55, in Great Britain $2.22, in West Germany $2.72, in Japan $2.53, in Greece $2.45, in France $2.95, in Sweden $2.28, in Belgium $2.49, in Turkey $2.28, and in Spain $2.72.

In Canada there is nothing, except an interim payment of $1.40 a bushel. What is Canada doing? Instead of realizing it is time it got into line with other nations, it asks other nations to stop helping their farmers and do the same as it does, which is absolutely nothing.

The minister has referred once more to sterling. I do not wish to take very much time in dealing with the question of sterling, but I was amused when he tried to bring in Gresham's law. He tried to apply Gresham's law to the acceptance of foreign currency. What is he really doing when he does that? The minister has the gall to say that all currencies except Canadian currency are bad. That is what he is saying when he applies Gresham's law to the acceptance of foreign currency. I would point out that the currencies of many nations today have a higher purchasing power in their respective countries than Canadian dollars have in Canada.

Then we had a very interesting statement by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore). He quoted an editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press to try to prove that acceptance of sterling would not be of any help. I suggest to the hon. member for Vegreville that he read the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the day before. What did the Minister of Trade and Commerce say? He warned members against taking any notice of any statement contained in the Winnipeg Free Press because he said the Winnipeg Free Press is against the wheat board and any statement they make is designed to undermine the wheat board.

I can quite believe that the Winnipeg Free Press would be very much opposed to Canada accepting sterling if they thought it was going to help sales by the Canadian wheat board. Naturally they would oppose the acceptance of sterling. The Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned the fact that Mr. Gordon Bowen of the United Kingdom high commissioner's office had stated that if Canada accepted sterling it would not increase sales of wheat to Great Britain. It might not, but it might increase the sales of other farm commodities. Maybe they are buying all the wheat they can buy. It certainly might help to increase sales of wheat to other nations in the sterling area. But there again we have that very broad statement of the minister. He said "sterling". What kind of sterling? Blocked sterling? Inconvertible sterling?

I can quite agree that Britain would not be interested in Canada accepting blocked sterling if it were blocked so that it could not be spent in Britain, could not be converted and had to be held until such time as convertibility of currency becomes an accomplished fact. Naturally Britain would be opposed to that because it would be just postponing the evil day when that blocked currency would become a demand upon United States dollars. But on the other hand if the proposal is to accept inconvertible currency which will not be converted into dollars but which will be used to buy British goods then I am satisfied that Britain would be quite prepared to support a policy of that kind.

I say that for this reason. Time and again in this country the United Kingdom high commissioner has stated that if Canada will buy more goods from the United Kingdom the United Kingdom will buy more goods from Canada. He has pointed out that Canada has had a large favourable balance of trade with the United Kingdom for a number of years and that as long as that situation continues the United Kingdom will not be in a position to expand its purchases in Canada.

That being the case, all Canada would have to do would be to accept inconvertible currency, use that currency to buy British goods and bring about a greater balance of trade between the two nations. The Minister of Trade and Commerce among others has said that if we are going to accept sterling and then spend it in Britain that is no different from accepting dollars. Let me point out that there is all the difference in the world. If you accept sterling and spend it in Britain you are providing a market for British goods. If you accept dollars and then use those dollars to buy goods in the United States then you are not providing a market for British goods. You are creating difficulties in international payments for the United Kingdom. That, of course, would be a different situation entirely.

My time is running on but I should like to make brief reference to a number of resolutions that were passed in my constituency. In October I received a long distance call telling me there was to be a conference of representatives of farmers, businessmen, farm organizations and all other interested parties in the western part of the constituency to discuss the wheat situation and I was invited to go to the meeting at which resolutions were to be drawn up to be presented to a mass meeting the following day. I went to the conference and there was quite a large attendance.

A number of resolutions were drafted and the following day a mass meeting was called at which the resolutions were presented. Let me point out that it was not a political meeting in any shape or form. I was not on the platform. There were representatives there from all political parties and it was a very large meeting. I only got into the discussion when people in the crowd asked me to deal with some of the points in the resolutions that were presented to the conference. The first resolution presented reads as follows:

Be it resolved that we ask the federal government to provide for advances to farmers against grain stored on the farms up to half the value of at least 8 bushels per cultivated acreage; and also provide that these advances be recovered by a deduction of approximately 50 per cent of the proceeds of each load delivered.

There was a very prolonged discussion of that resolution and I thought the discussion was most reasonable. First of all, strong opposition was expressed to any form of a loan. They did not want any interest charge made at all. It was pointed out that most of the farmers are already quite heavily in debt with respect to the wheat on their farms and that it would not help them to add another debt to what they already owe. They wanted advances which would help them to pay off some of the debts they have already incurred.

Second, they realized it would not be advisable for the advances to be too large because if the advance was on too big a percentage basis it would require fairly detailed inspection to make sure the farmers had enough wheat to cover the advances. Therefore they put the advance at a very moderate level. First of all they said the advance should be up to 50 per cent of the probable delivery for that year. Then some farmer said, "Well, we have no guarantee there will be any delivery. There might only be a delivery of 2 bushels to the acre, so that is no good." Then they based it upon what the delivery was last year, 8 bushels per cultivated acre, and suggested that the advance should be up to 50 per cent of a minimum of 8 bushels per cultivated acre. I think all members will agree that is quite a reasonable demand. That resolution was passed and forwarded to the federal government.

[Mr. Quelch.]

The second resolution reads as follows:

Whereas at the time the member nations of the FAO rejected the recommendations for the establishment of an international commodity clearing house it was agreed that each nation should be responsible for carrying its own surplus; and

Whereas it is in the national interest that a substantial reserve of wheat be maintained at all times;

Therefore be it resolved that we urge the Canadian government to assume the responsibility for carrying charges on all grain in storage at the end of each crop year.

I am very glad to see that the federal government is bringing down legislation this session which goes quite far in the direction advocated by this resolution. That being the case, I will not take time to argue the justification for the resolution being passed. The third resolution reads as follows:

Be it resolved that Canada continue to work towards the establishment of some form of an international commodity clearing house for the disposal of surplus food to needy nations;

Be it further resolved that until that goal is reached we urge the federal government to take the necessary action to move surplus food to nations unable to obtain all they require through the normal channels of trade, by such means as acceptance of foreign currencies and barter agreements and in the cases of extreme distress by gifts.

In that regard it was felt that we might very well follow the lead of the United States. They were doing that and the meeting felt that Canada might very well follow suit. They figured that the fact the United States was steadily expanding their disposal of surplus commodities through a program of that kind would suggest that Canada could do likewise, but they emphasized the fact that the whole endeavour of the government should be toward the establishment of some form of international commodity clearing house so that this question could be dealt with on an international basis rather than a purely national one. This resolution carried unanimously.

The fourth resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the Agricultural Prices Support Act was passed in an endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns of agriculture and those from other producers; and

Whereas grains were excluded from the products covered by the act;

Therefore be it resolved that we ask the federal government to amend the act so as to cover cereal grain.

As I have already pointed out, they have always strongly supported the Agricultural Prices Support Act, but the act has never included grains. Yet at the end of the war when the price of grains was controlled the prime minister at that time promised that after the war support prices would be placed under farm products to make up for the losses suffered as a result of the farmers being compelled to sell for less than world market prices. The government maintained good faith with the farmers in so far as all farm products are concerned except grains, but grain was not brought in under the Agricultural Prices Support Act and there is no support under grains today. This resolution therefore merely asks that grains should be brought in under the operation of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, it also carried unanimously.

In closing I should just like to point out that Canada is today lagging far behind what a number of other nations are doing in order to safeguard the efficient operation of their grain growers. Whilst farmers with strong reserves may be able to carry on without too much difficulty, the majority are under a severe strain and in many cases are being obliged to give up their farming operations. I believe that the resolutions and policies to which I have referred would help to put the grain growers on a sound basis. In the meantime we intend to support the subamendment put forward by the C.C.F.

(Translation):

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, 5,000 divorces are granted in Canada every year, that is one divorce for 25 marriages. In the two provinces which refuse divorce, Newfoundland and Quebec, parliament—according to figures which have been provided to me by the divorce committee—has, between 1950 and 1954, granted 1,512 divorces and refused only 14. 1,487 of these divorces were granted to Quebec residents.

For some time now a powerful campaign has been carried out in this country with a view to obtaining the enlarging of legal grounds for divorce.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I feel it necessary to return to this matter and to sound the alarm in relation to a situation which is assuming the proportions of a national scandal. I wish to underline a few facts, to reaffirm a few moral and legal principles and to seek out the one acceptable constitutional issue to this predicament.

Divorce is an infringement upon natural law, it sacrifices the child who is the main object of marriage, it disrupts the family, which is the very basis of society and withers society itself by sacrificing the commonweal to personal interests. Moreover, all Catholics and several Protestant denominations are opposed to divorce, which makes it contrary to the religious principles of the vast majority of Canadian citizens.

Considered inadequately by the courts and by parliament, it furthermore puts members in an ambiguous position and confronts them with a delicate constitutional problem.

From the point of view of nature, marriage is an institution the primary purpose of which is to insure the propagation of the human race. It is a contract which cannot be of temporary duration because it is bound by a permanent tie which is the child. So, divorce denies this primary purpose of marriage because it sacrifices the child in splitting the family, the foundation of our society.

People are rightly concerned about communism because it attacks the rights of man but, on the other hand, they allow the multiplication of divorce which destroys man at his very source. We know once more how man can be utterly illogical when we find that those countries which worry the most about a falling birth rate are also the ones to encourage divorce the most. In Canada we clamour for immigration to increase our population, and we empty our cradles through divorce.

Not only does divorce make for selfishness on the part of the parents to the prejudice of the children, but it prevents children from being born. Yes, because it is made easy since it is legal, divorce prompts parents to limit the obstacle children would be to their eventual separation. The possiblity of divorce tempts our young people to consider matrimony as a temporary adventure.

Unless he wants to reduce the human race to a level lower than that of the beasts, no right-thinking man will deny that the first end of marriage is the child and that this same child is the certain victim of divorce.

This would amount to admitting that, owing to its nature, divorce destroys our human society and favours the personal interest of husbands and wives to the prejudice of the common weal. To claim that divorce is useful to society is to recognize the priority of the individual welfare of a few people over the general welfare of society, or the priority of selfishness and sexuality over the renewal of the human race. In those divorce cases that are brought before parliament the main victims of this social plague, that is the children, have never been able to claim their rights. The generally admitted motive for divorce being adultery, parliament does not consider their case. Children have been called as witnesses for or against their parents, without any consideration being given to their own case while the sexual experiences of their parents were related before the committee.

Speaking of divorce as a social evil, Mr. Theodore Roosevelt wrote in an article entitled "The Scourge of Divorce in the United States":

A scourge for any country, easy divorce is a curse to society, a menace to the family, an invitation to marital unhappiness and a practice fatal to men and particularly to women.

It was not a Catholic who spoke that way, but the leader of a nation that deemed it advisable to facilitate divorce for all sorts of pretexts, a nation that is unsuccessfully fighting a cancerous growth, the progress of which it cannot stop. They granted divorce in the name of freedom, but they have always reaped licentiousness.

The very existence of divorce seems to establish a new principle, namely that by contracting marriage human beings become angels on earth, infallible beings, because means have been devised enabling them to free themselves from their oath at the slightest disagreement.

Not only is divorce a national scandal giving a respectable status to short-lived love affairs but it deals a serious blow to the religious principles of all Roman Catholics and of numerous Protestant denominations in this country.

To those who believe that constant assaults will shake our will to resist I repeat that true Roman Catholics will never compromise on divorce.

By her unshakable determination to fight divorce the Catholic church is not led by stubbornness or harshness; she merely respects the will of Him who built our human society; she is protecting the creative work of God and the natural right of people. Let me add, Mr. Speaker, that the fact that our parliament is dealing with divorce, even as an exception through private bills, puts the Catholic members in an unbearable and unjust situation. I know that these divorce cases are a source of annoyance for all members. I know also that some throw the whole responsibility for this situation on Roman Catholics since these bills come to parliament because divorce is not recognized in our province. I point out to them, Mr. Speaker, that we are not responsible for these divorce cases; we reject them and will never accept a situation resulting from the very fact that some men want to divide what God has united.

Moreover, any citizen imbued with moral responsibility and real concern for the common weal cannot, whatever his religious beliefs may be, find any social advantage in divorce. One has but to open one's eyes and to look at what history teaches us. In the United States, where easy divorce has laid a great nation open to ridicule, civil and religious authorities are seriously concerned with the consequences of this national scandal which undermines the strength of the nation. Thousands upon thousands of testimonies have pointed to the evil consequences of this scourge.

I will restrict myself to only one of these testimonies, one which summarizes the whole situation in a few words. I will quote a statement from Mr. John Fitzgerald, dean of the faculty of law at Loyola University, as reported in a release from the information service of the Canadian Catholic conference, bulletin number 45, February 1955 issue.

Mr. Fitzgerald said that, since 1867 (statistics in that field date back to that year), the population of the United States has increased in a proportion of 1 to 4 whereas divorces have increased in a proportion of 1 to 60. From 1930 to 1948, one divorce has been granted for every five marriages in the United States.

The dean of the law school lays some blame on lawyers and judges, but mainly on the judicial setting in which divorce cases are heard.

He claims that there is a tragic difference between the divorce legislation and the procedure followed in fact. Actually, divorce cases go uncontested and are settled amicably between the parties in a proportion of 80 to 90%. He adds that, according to estimates from the lawyers, there is perjury in 75% of the cases. Often, hearings take only a quarter of an hour or less and the facts at issue are not examined at all.

And what happens in Canada? In an article entitled "Court of Broken Dreams", at page 34 of the March 1955 issue of Liberty, the author, one of the magazine's reporters, writes:

(Text):

I sat in on a courtroom recently in an attempt to understand why 5,000 Canadian couples annually crack up their marriages in a divorce process of mud-slinging, name-calling and money-wrangling.

I wanted to find out why our divorce rate has risen to a point where one out of every 25 Canadian marriages winds up a divorce washout.

(Translation):

Would you like to know how divorces are granted in Canada? Let me turn, not to the testimony of a Roman Catholic preacher, but to the Divorce Reform Association of Toronto, which published a manifesto urging that the legal causes of divorce be extended. Here is the first paragraph:

(Text):

Did you know that there is divorce by consent in Canada? One judge has said that nine out of ten cases before him are collusive, that is, the parties have perjured themselves in order to get a divorce.

(Translation):

Would it be that justice itself recognizes that out of the 5,000 divorces granted each year, there are 4,500 common law cohabitations, legalized through perjury?

Quebec and Newfoundland are the only provinces that do not recognize divorce. In Quebec, the civil code, which derives its official status from the Confederation Act itself, recognizes in section 185 that marriage cannot be dissolved. Therefore, the federal government cannot and will never be able to establish a divorce court for petitions emanating from Quebec, because it would be contrary to the terms of the confederation act and against the statutes of our Quebec civil code. It is for that reason that, in order to obtain divorce from parliament, citizens of Quebec and Newfoundland must resort, to a private bill, a special law, and exclusive privilege. It must be admitted that the distinction is not illusory, since that procedure respects our civil code, safeguards the principle of the indissolubility of marriage, and prevents the setting up of divorce courts for the people of Quebec. However, one must not stop there, because although up to now the principle of the indissolubility of marriage has been safeguarded, have marriages themselves been saved? Has the rate of divorce been decreased to the extent expected, as a result of this necessity of resorting to private bills to obtain a degree?

As I stated at the beginning of my remarks, between 1950 and 1954 alone, Canadian parliament has recommended the granting of 1,512 divorces and rejected 14 petitions. And out of that number, 1,487 exceptional privileges were granted to citizens of the province of Quebec whose civil code recognizes the indissolubility of marriage.

Is that not a fantastic average? Should we not fear that the repetition of such exceptions will threaten the general rule, especially when it is known that, for our Anglo-Saxon fellow-citizens, the accumulation of precedents frequently acquires the strength of law?

Everyone admits that parliament has neither the competence nor the means to pass proper judgment on the cases submitted. For that matter, the courts hardly seem to do better, as is apparent from the opinion quoted above on the percentage of perjuries.

There have been instances of divorces being granted by parliament in 12 minutes! After being studied by the Senate, with its inadequate facilities, and adopted by the parliamentary committee following a mere reading of the case, they are usually passed by the house wholesale. To grant a divorce parliament is generally content with proof of adultery. This proof is based on the rather dubious testimony of the private detectives who have prepared the case. Those detectives, whose testimony disrupts marriages, are often young men with no legal responsibilities, who earn a small salary to carry out their foul business. All members of the committee genuinely feel that in most cases there is collusion. But how can it be proved?

Last year, in this house, I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) whether in the last ten years his department had prosecuted any of the parties in divorce cases for collusion. The minister replied that there was no record of any prosecution of this kind in the files of his department. Were the children wronged by disrupted marriages never taken into account? Divorces have been granted to persons in the absence of their marriage partner. Everyone knows that in Montreal, as in all large cities, there are detective agencies which, for a price, can build up evidence of adultery. From the figures I have given, it is easy to see that divorces are almost always a foregone conclusion in Ottawa.

Of course, parliament could be more severe in its examination of the cases but, on the other hand, I am not ready to blame it entirely for this, because the only means at its disposal for getting truth is the oath. When magistrates of the courts themselves recognize that there is perjury in the majority of cases brought before them, how can members of parliament or senators be expected to do better when there is collusion to commit perjury between witnesses? The error was first made when parliament entered the field of divorce, a field in which it will always be the loser in its struggle against passions. In short, even through the allegedly more difficult method of the private bill, hundreds of divorces are granted each year to the citizens of two provinces where divorce is banned.

The only conclusion possible is that this situation must be remedied because parliament is unfit and inefficient when it comes to hearing divorce cases, even though it is constitutionally authorized to deal with them.

The C.C.F. party, through many of its members, has for many years expressed alarm at parliament's readiness to grant divorces. But the solution it proposes is, in short, that divorce cases be sent to the Exchequer Court. This solution reminds me of the flood victim who would drain his cellar into that of his neighbour.

We will never agree to the principle that those cases be referred to a court of justice for that would be in actual fact a denial of the indissolubility of marriage, which is protected by section 185 of the Quebec civil code. So there is only one alternative, Mr. Speaker. It was set forth in this house 25 years ago, in 1930, by a great French-Canadian statesman, Mr. Henri Bourassa.

He suggested that the constitution be amended and that the question of divorce be referred to each of the provinces who would dispose of it at their discretion. Bourassa claimed that the matter should be referred to the provinces because the federal government was not able to exert the authority constitutionally attributed to it in this respect.

I can very well imagine the main objection to this solution which, for some people, would mean refusing the privilege of divorce to the non-Catholic population of Quebec.

As long as it has not been proved that divorce is a beneficial institution promoting common welfare, nobody will have the right to ask for the abolition of section 185 of our civil code. Anyhow, it is not a question of choosing the laws of one's country or province. I would be first to ask for the abolition of taxes if I were entitled to reject a law that is not favouring my personal interest.

At the federal-provincial conference of 1950, Mr. Bourassa's suggestion was brought up again by the premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, in a brief submitted to the attorneys general of Canada, and seconded by the representatives of three other provinces, those of New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan, which would bring up to five the number of provinces who would adopt this solution. When that proposal was submitted in 1930 by Mr. Bourassa, it was approved by the Divorce Reform League of British Columbia and by the Marriage and Divorce Reform Association of Toronto.

There would be no change in the position of the provinces that accept divorce, but this solution would have the advantage of putting an end to a situation which Quebec and Newfoundland cannot tolerate and it would also free parliament from a situation which is equally unbearable.

Since this entails an amendment to the constitution, which cannot be done without the consent of the provinces, I urge the government to call a federal-provincial conference without delay, and seek means of bringing about that amendment to our constitution.

The reasons put forth by Mr. Bourassa 25 years ago to obtain that amendment to the constitution, at a time when less than 100 divorces were granted each year, have become even more pressing if we consider that parliament now receives nearly 500 applications for divorce each year.

Unless the government hastily adopts the only acceptable solution, it will soon be overwhelmed by the rising flood of easy divorces.

[Mr. Girard.]

Soon, divorces will be granted for incompatibility, the most futile and the most fallacious of pretexts.

This serious problem must be solved before it is too late, for divorce, which some would like to make still easier, is becoming a legalized form of free love and is gradually undermining the vital strength of the nation.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address my remarks to the subamendment which is now before us, and to indicate the attitude that I believe will be expressed by the members of the party to which I belong.

The subamendment that is before us asks that the following words be added to the amendment which we have already introduced:

> . . . including their failure to provide cash advances on farm-stored grain, equal to not less than 75 per cent of the initial price, to alleviate the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers and the entire economy of the prairie provinces . . .

As has already been indicated by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), we would have moved this as part of our amendment had we not wished to leave the way clear to put an amendment of this kind before hon. members on the motion to go into supply. I explained at the time that I was speaking in the debate earlier that we were moving a broad amendment without going into detail so that we would not subsequently limit the opportunity to present an amendment upon which all hon. members would be called to express their opinion. I regret very much that by the introduction of this subamendment it is likely that we shall be unable to introduce an amendment on going into supply which would call for a direct vote on that one question by all hon. members without anyone being given an opportunity to say that he had voted against it for some other reason than that contained in the words themselves.

I should like very much to have had the opportunity to present an amendment calling for cash advances so that every hon. member on the other side as well as on this side would have been called upon to vote on that question and that question alone.

As I indicated earlier in my remarks in this debate, we refrained from introducing detailed amendments of that kind because of our desire that we should not preclude the possibility of offering an opportunity at a later time during this session for a clear and unequivocal vote on this and other subjects which will arise. However, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has chosen to introduce this subamendment. That is his right. The subamendment is before us. I wish to indicate the course that we propose to follow. I do not think the subamendment is drawn as well as it could have been. Nevertheless, the course is clear. The intention of this subamendment is to call for an expression of opinion in regard to the desirability of cash advances to meet the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers and the entire economy of the prairie provinces.

In moving this subamendment, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar placed no new issue before the house. We made it abundantly clear, without any reservation, that we favoured the principle of cash advances on farm-stored grain; nor did we simply state that at the beginning of this debate. In December of 1952 I asked in this house that legislation be introduced without delay to make it possible to provide for cash advances on farm-stored grain. Since then, we have continued to urge that legislation of this kind be made available. Therefore, the purpose of this subamendment is one which we have placed before the house, and one which we have stated publicly elsewhere on frequent occasions. The only question which arises is one of actual wording, and we are not going to haggle over words when the principle is clear.

It would have been much better if, after the words "not less than 75 per cent of the initial price", these words had been added, "on a reasonable quota basis." I prefer to believe, however, that the subamendment intends that.

The payment on a quota basis has become an accepted practice. In fact, it has become such an accepted practice that the book on which the payments are made is commonly described as a quota book. Therefore, I think it is reasonable for us to assume that in the drafting of this subamendment the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had in mind the requests which have been made by representative farm organizations, and in fact the proposal that we have made over and over again, long before this came out in the house this session, that there be a cash advancement on a reasonable quota, having regard to the general quota arrangements which have been made for the past several years. Since that is the situation and since that is what I consider to be a reasonable interpretation of these words, we intend to support this subamendment because it does express the request that consideration be given to the demand for the very thing we have been asking for, for several years.

I repeat—and I must repeat—I regret very much that by following this course hon. members to our left have perhaps denied the opportunity to have a clear vote on this one question by a substantive amendment when we go into supply at some later time.

I do not intend to make any extended remarks on this subject today, but I do intend to refer to one statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) during his remarks on January 16. He told this house in effect that if the plan of cash advances on farm stored grain went into effect the four members of the wheat board would be out of office within a matter of days.

Surely this is a new procedure. I should think it is an abnormal exaggeration, even for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and it would have to go very far to qualify for that description, but let us see just what this means. It has been a long established practice, going back for centuries, for ministers of the crown to announce in certain cases that Her Majesty's representative has approved of the subject matter about to be discussed. Obviously we are now to have a new practice. Apparently, in matters of this kind, instead of the approval of His Excellency as the representative of Her Majesty, in future we will be told that officials have approved of the measure we are called upon to discuss.

That is bureaucracy carried to a degree which we have not yet contemplated. That is bureaucracy carried to the point of being an affront to every member of parliament. We are told without apology that officials would resign if members of this parliament decided that a certain type of amendment should be made to legislation for which they are responsible. I hesitate to believe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has any support for such a statement. I prefer to believe that it is an abnormal exaggeration even for him.

Perhaps this is another case of the right hand not knowing what the left hand is doing. I would be inclined to think that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was perhaps very surprised when he heard that we were now being told when we could or could not do things in this house according to the pleasure of officials in various government agencies set up by the authority of this parliament.

We have complained before about bureaucracy. Unless that statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was utter humbug there is an apology due to the members of this house for an implied threat that certain public officials would not continue to do their job if we did ours.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a free country; they can resign if they wish.

Mr. Drew: I hear the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration say that this is a free country. I hope it will continue to be a free country and I hope this will continue to be a free parliament. I hope that we shall no longer have any suggestions of this kind. We have had enough arrogance from ministers without having arrogance from public servants. This is a subject which calls for further explanation and there is still time in this debate for an explanation to be given as to the authority upon which that statement was made.

In so far as the amendment and the subamendment are concerned, it is my understanding that a vote is to be taken today in accordance with the new rules. I would hope that on that vote there might be some hon. members who would recognize that the first vote, which will be on the subamendment, will be on the primary question of whether there is approval of the principle of making cash advances on farm-stored grain. I would hope that that would be the accepted position. I would hope that very much. I should like some hon. members opposite to express their opinions by way of vote and to indicate their support of a principle which I know many of them have been supporting outside of this house.

In so far as the general subject matter of this debate is concerned, the debate will continue and presumably there will be another subamendment when I can make any further remarks that I deem to be appropriate. For the reasons I have given, it is our purpose to support this subamendment.

(Translation):

Mr. David Gourd (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker may I be allowed to congratulate you on the flawless way in which you have been carrying out your exalted functions over the past three years. I would also like to recognize the high reputation which you enjoy through your deep knowledge of parliamentary law and your remarkable impartiality.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) for her brilliant handling of the delicate task of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Northern Ontario and the adjacent area in northwestern Quebec are rightly proud of the member for Timiskaming.

I am also happy to congratulate the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) who so ably seconded the motion. This young man certainly has a promising parliamentary future and we must congratulate the people of Bellechasse for sending to parliament a newcomer of such merit.

I heard it mentioned in the speech from the throne that, as a whole, Canada is enjoying at this time a remarkable period of prosperity. In fact, one only has to leave our beautiful country and visit other countries to see how privileged we are to be living in Canada and to enjoy so much comfort and freedom. May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to point out to our friends in the opposition that we are indebted to the wise administration of this government for this situation.

How privileged we are to have as special representatives to the great powers such extraordinary men as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), who visited Soviet Russia and other countries, men like the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) who has had such great influence on the decisions of the United Nations, and like our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who made a triumphant tour of the world.

Because of their competence and their skill, these statesmen have given our country an outstanding reputation and unequalled prestige abroad.

I would also like to mention the important contribution to the prosperity of Canada of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), and of the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). By their efforts they have maintained the prices of our products at a very satisfactory level.

I cannot understand why the members of the opposition are so upset by the abundance of our wheat crop and of our butter production. I take the liberty of advising them not to worry too much, because the situation is much better than they would have us believe. With such an excellent administration as that of our government and with the skill of men like the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and of Defence Production and of the right hon. Minister of Agriculture, we have no cause for worry and, in my opinion, we are far better off with large crops than with short ones.

I would not want to forget to thank our Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) as well as his predecessor who authorized the construction of the railroad from Barraute to Chibougamau, a distance of over 200 miles, entirely within the constituency of Chapleau, which I have the honour to represent. That railroad has already promoted considerable economic activity in that large area. Moreover, its extension into the lake St. John district will help commercial relations between the two important districts of lake St. John and Abitibi, to the mutual great advantage of both areas.

Construction of that railroad will unquestionably permit the establishment of many parishes, and promote the development of several new mines. Already, there are over 400 families and business establishments of all kinds in Chibougamau proper. In addition, the Opemiska Mining Company has just set up a new municipality, Chapais, where no less than 125 families have settled.

Being now acquainted with these facts, and knowing that our district has a population of about 200,000, mostly farmers, you will agree, I think, that we are justified in expecting the establishment of a regional slaughter-house and cold-storage plant which would permit our settlers and our farmers to raise cattle on a larger scale and to increase their agricultural production, since their products could be marketed in an orderly way during the year, which means that our producers would enjoy a security essential to the conduct of their business.

On the industrial level, as was so well outlined by my colleague, the member for Villeneuve constituency (Mr. Dumas), which is adjacent to the county of Chapleau, it is quite possible that a zinc smelter will be built before long in our district. I may add that I learned recently that Noranda Mines company might build a copper smelter. Moreover, in view of the boundless forests that are found in the northern part of my county, it is highly probable that a paper mill will also be built near Mattagami lake.

The construction of a new section of the railway, about 50 miles in length, from the vicinity of Beattyville up to Mattagami lake, would be warranted by this building of a paper mill.

Once these large scale projects are carried out, we will owe them to the work and unrelenting efforts of our public bodies, our industrial board, the professional organizations of our farmers and agronomists, our municipalities and our county council. I wish to congratulate them publicly, to thank them for their co-operation and to urge them to continue their work of promoting the development of this corner of northwestern Quebec so that it may become one of the most important districts and thus greatly contribute to the economic welfare of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I make it a point to congratulate our able Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) for his good administration. But I have a suggestion to make in connection with national security. I have already pointed out in this house the many reasons of national interest which would justify the federal government in approaching the government of the province of Ontario to ensure completion of the road connecting Norembega in the province of Ontario and the town of La Reine, in the province of Quebec, a distance of 47 miles. I do not intend to repeat the arguments. I believe however that the dangers which threaten our country and the development of modern weapons which have justified the establishment of a network of radar stations—two of them located in my constituency—require the direct assistance of the Department of National Defence for the completion of that road and the establishment of a communication system between the two provinces.

There is another stretch of road whose construction by the Department of National Defence would undoubtedly be most necessary and urgent. This stretch would connect Casey—where the department has built a very important airport—to the radar station at Parent. It is a distance of about 25 miles where construction would be very easy; it would certainly not cost more than $15,000 per mile and would provide an outlet for the population of Parent and the surrounding area.

I wish also to take advantage of this opportunity to ask our devoted Minister of National Health and Welfare to see to it that the rate of family allowances and of the disability pension be increased.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to end my remarks without mentioning once again, as I have done in my previous speeches, the necessity of appointing a representative to the Vatican. As almost every other country in the world is represented there, and as everybody admits without religious or national prejudice that the Holy See is an element of unity and peace between nations, I am convinced that, for Canada, the appointment of such a representative would be a help and a contribution to the cause of universal peace.

I also submit that the government would respond to the wishes of the great majority of the Canadian people and would follow its regular Canadian policy by giving this country a national flag. Canada is a sovereign member of the commonwealth of British nations, under certain amendments to the British North America Act. Our supreme court is now the final judicial authority and the queen's representative in our country, the governor general, is of Canadian origin. It seems to me that the adoption of a national flag would be an addition to the development of this our great country, Canada.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the throne there is one sentence in particular to which I wish to draw the attention of this house and upon which I shall base the major part of what I have to say this evening. The sentence to which I refer reads as follows:

> Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being.

The last part of that sentence, that not all parts of the economy have participated, will go down in history as the greatest understatement of all time. Even if we were only to make a summary of what we have heard in the present debate, and I am not referring entirely to speeches by members of the opposition parties, it certainly would appear that there is a large sector of our economy that has not participated in the so-called prosperity referred to in the speech from the throne. However, apparently there are some parts of the economy that have done better than previously. I have in my hand a Canadian Press clipping in which it is pointed out that corporate profits from January to September, 1955 rose to $2,236 million compared with $1,829 million a year ago. Apparently our huge corporations have been increasing their profits, but if that is the only basis on which the government can claim that we have prosperity then I must say they are giving their attention to a very small sector of the Canadian economy.

On the other hand, almost every member who has spoken about agriculture in this debate has drawn attention to the decline in income. Instead of burdening the house with any more statistics, I should like to point out briefly what is being said in my province of Manitoba by two of the farm organizations there, who between them represent pretty well all the farmers in that province, and, in addition, by the provincial government. In its submission to the commission investigating our economic prospects the Manitoba federation of agriculture stated in the very first paragraph of their brief:

> A continuation for even a year or two of recent trends in increasing costs and declining farm prices would spell disaster for agriculture in this province . . .

Then I also have a report of what was stated to the commission by the Manitoba farmers' union as found in the Manitoba Co-operator of November 17 last:

> In a ten page brief accompanied by the appendices showing the continuous increase in farmers' production costs and the continuing decline in the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat, the Manitoba farmers' union suggested to the Gordon commission that perhaps the greatest single factor in influencing present trends in agriculture "is, and has been, the policy or lack of policy on the part of governments."

In a report of the submission of the province of Manitoba, also found in the Co-operator of the same date, there is the following:

> Manitoba farmers "are facing an economic squeeze that bodes ill for them in the next few years unless some drastic measures are taken to remedy it," premier D. L. Campbell told the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. He explained, "Quite frankly, I don't know what the solution is."

That is, of course, a typical Liberal analysis. That is the situation facing agriculture and that is one reason why a great part of this debate has centred upon the amendment to the amendment moved by my leader on which I understand a decision is to be taken today. I want to deal with it for a few minutes, not so much on the basis of what has already been said on this side of the house, because certainly the case for the subamendment has already been very well stated, but on the basis of what has been said in defence of the position of the government. We have had some most extraordinary speeches, and apparently the Winnipeg Free Press seems to think so too. In a leading editorial in their issue of the 17th of this month under the title, "C. D., How Could You?", they state as follows:

> Mr. Howe, defending the government against attacks on its wheat policy, made an extraordinary speech in the House of Commons Monday. No doubt it had some subtle point. But such subtlety will leave plain folk in western Canada more puzzled and more dissatisfied than ever.

I am afraid it will be cold comfort to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to know that, at least in the opinion of the Winnipeg Free Press, his effort of last Monday is going to leave the farmers of the prairie provinces more dissatisfied than ever. That, Mr. Speaker, will be rather considerable because dissatisfaction and discontent with the actions of the government in the last three or four months have reached a pitch in western Canada that I have not witnessed before in my lifetime.

There have been mass meetings and meetings of organizations. Resolutions have been passed. In fact, we are informed in the same editorial to which I have referred that even from the constituency of Rosthern two telegrams were sent, as the result of a Liberal association meeting, asking for cash advances on grain. As a matter of fact, it is one of the top issues from the lakehead to the foothills. May I say more as a warning than anything else that if the Liberal members who represent prairie constituencies do not change their attitude they may find very slim pickings from the lakehead to the foothills at the next election.

It is not only a matter of cash advances. That is only one of the issues. It happens to be the top issue today and the straw that broke the camel's back. It is the culmination of years of broken promises, years of disregard for agriculture and, perhaps even worse, disregard for the views of the farmers as expressed through their organizations.

In his address the other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce took a rather astounding position when he as much as said that even though the prairie wheat pools had passed resolutions asking for cash advances, even though the Manitoba farmers' union and the farmers' unions in the other two provinces had passed resolutions asking for cash advances and even though various chambers of commerce, labour organizations and so on had done so, it did not matter. It was his opinion that they should pay no attention to all these organized bodies and should slough off the whole thing simply by saying that if the government took the advice of these organizations difficulty would arise with the officials of the wheat board. I am sure he cannot get away with that and I am sure he does not expect to.

On top of that, in one of his arguments against cash advances on farm stored grain he strongly implied that one reason it could not be done was that there was no assurance that the grain on which the advances would be made would in fact be there so that it could be delivered to repay the advances. That is an implication which I am sure will be resented by every grain grower of the western prairies. I have been in close contact with the farmers of western Canada over a period of 20 years, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been in contact with them for much longer than that, and I am sure he would not want to imply that the farmers cannot be trusted to the extent of at least 75 per cent on the grain they have. Surely the minister would not imply that the farmers would take advantage of such legislation to try to pull off some dishonest deal. There are plenty of ways to keep track of these advances. There are the grain permit books. There is the grain elevator system. There is the wheat board. The machinery is there. The question is whether or not the government are going to take the advice of the farm organizations of western Canada or whether they are going to take their own way regardless of what the people of western Canada think. As to the speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce last Monday, in some ways I should be pleased if enough copies of it were made so that one could be nailed on the door of every grain elevator on the prairies. It would make good reading for farmers who could come to the elevators and find there is no space for their grain.

Some of the other members on the government side of the house made their speeches in defence of government policy. I should like to refer to one made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) in which he took considerable time trying to interpret what went on at the Saskatoon grain conference. It so happens that I was also present at that conference. I am afraid that the hon. member's line, in which he tried to make it appear as though what is contained in this amendment is a threat to the Canadian wheat board, is nothing more than a most ungainly attempt to hide behind the skirts of the Canadian wheat board. Certainly anyone who attended the Saskatoon grain conference did not come away with any such idea as that.

At the conference were representatives from all the main farm organizations of the three prairie provinces, two of the governments of the prairie provinces, labour organizations, chambers of commerce, and retail merchants. It was a cross-section of the opinion of the prairie west. In all of the discussions that took place there was no suggestion whatever that there was any conflict between the proposition of cash advances on farm-stored grain and the principle of the Canadian wheat board or that there was anything incompatible. Certainly the hon. member for Rosthern cannot come to this house and try to interpret the desire of that conference as being one for bank loans at 5 per cent; because if there is any one thing on which they were fairly clear, it was that they were not in favour of bank loans at an interest rate of 5 per cent and that they were in favour of cash advances.

In dealing with the question of the Canadian wheat board I was rather amazed to find that any member of the Liberal party would get to his feet in this house and try to leave the impression that it was the members of this group or the members of the opposition generally who were any threat to the Canadian wheat board. When we look back over the record we find that exactly the opposite happens to be the case. For example, when the original wheat board bill was introduced in this house in 1935, if one looks back over the debates of that day he will find that it was the members of the Liberal party—who were then in opposition—who expressed some grave doubts as to whether or not they should support such a measure. As a matter of fact, in almost every case where they spoke, they expressed the hope that it would be a temporary measure, one just for the duration of the emergency at the time, and that it would not be a permanent measure on the statute books of this country. For example, the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir)—who is one of the few members on the opposite side of the house who were present in 1935 in this house—spoke on that question on June 13, 1935. In announcing his intention to vote for the second reading of the bill he qualified it with this paragraph as reported at page 3633 of Hansard of that date:

> At the same time I would hesitate very much to endorse a proposition whereby, at this stage of the game, a permanent compulsory pool organization or board should be established and set in motion to conduct the wheat marketing affairs of the country for years to come. I dislike to see the government go into the grain marketing business.

That was the position of the Liberal party at that time. If it has changed, it has been a recent conversion. The then minister of justice, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, in his speech on the same date, qualified his support for that principle in these words. After having given four qualifications, his fifth one was as follows as reported at page 3606 of Hansard of June 13, 1935:

> And, fifth, I vote for this as a temporary emergency measure and not as a permanent scheme of socialistic government operations in connection with the production and distribution of wheat, especially since it is introduced in the dying days of a moribund government.

The last few words, of course, are as applicable today as they were at that time. There you have the situation where the members of the Liberal party, sitting in opposition at that time, expressed themselves firmly as not being in favour of the principle of the wheat board handling the marketing of grain as a permanent policy in this country. They would only agree to it as an emergency measure to be taken off the statute books as quickly as possible. As a matter of fact, a year later they came to power and made an attempt at least to so weaken the wheat board as to make it partially inoperative. The time in 1938 when the initial price was cut down to 60 cents a bushel is another example of what the Liberal party felt as to the importance of the Canadian wheat board.

I think that is ample proof to show that far from any one of this group—who through policy and principle have always been in favour of orderly marketing and of the Canadian wheat board—being any danger to the future of the wheat board, it is the members who find themselves in the position of opposing our amendment who form the greatest danger.

As this issue developed across the west last fall, it was interesting to see what kind of lead was given to the farmers on this question by the various cabinet ministers concerned with this matter. For example, we have the Minister of Justice who is our cabinet representative from Manitoba; we have the Minister of Agriculture from Saskatchewan; and then, of course, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in whose department is the authority for the wheat board. The way in which this whole matter was handled created a great deal of resentment and discontent not only because of the refusal of the government to act but because of the number of contradictory statements that came out, one after the other. First one minister would put out one statement. Then another would come along and say something different.

The situation reached the point where it seemed to have the effect of the hit parade in which certain popular tunes of the day come to the top. At about the height of the excitement I noticed that there was one tune which rather adequately described the leadership of these three ministers. It was a tune under the title of something like "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered". I think that title just about describes what we were getting from our cabinet ministers. First the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) came along and tried to bewitch the farmers into believing that this surplus grain in their granaries was a very good thing. Then the meeting at Minnedosa in the constituency of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) certainly bothered many people and it must have bothered him considerably considering the fact that the questions lasted for about 3½ hours, although he dodged them very skilfully. Certainly that title well described the situation when it came to the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce because while the cash advance proposition was turned down and bank loans were offered at 5 per cent, the people of western Canada were well aware of the fact that something far different was being done in another direction. Practically at the very same time when we were told that there was nothing wrong in guaranteeing the banks for loans at 5 per cent, that the principle was right—the other day the minister referred to the fact that any time he had to borrow money he had to pay an interest rate of at least that amount—the government announced that they were prepared to advance a large sum of money to a private corporation, namely Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, at a rate of 3½ per cent. The minister shakes his head. If he thinks that is not correct, I should like to hear his correction.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Since the hon. member has asked for the correction, the government is advancing no money whatever to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Mr. Zaplitny: I rather expected the minister would say something like that because the agreement which was drawn up involves the federal government, the government of Ontario and the pipeline company. It amounts to the same thing as the government advancing approximately $85 million to a private company at an interest rate of 3·5 per cent. It is even worse than that, because in that same agreement there is a provision whereby the pipeline company can depreciate the pipeline at a rate of 3·5 per cent. In effect, what the pipeline company is going to have when it buys back that portion of the pipeline being built by the two governments under the agreement is an interest free loan of approximately $85 million.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I trust my hon. friend never gets in a position to handle government money because that type of financing would certainly wreck the country.

Mr. Zaplitny: If the minister believes that kind of financing is not right, then he will have to revise the agreement because that is what the agreement provides.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is not what the agreement provides. My hon. friend does not understand it, but I do not mind his explaining it in his own simple way.

Mr. Zaplitny: I will come to that question again. I want to continue. I merely use that as a comparison—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Better drop it.

Mr. Zaplitny: —to illustrate the different way in which the grain farmers were treated from the way in which a private company was treated at the same time.

Mr. Studer: Wrong again.

Mr. Zaplitny: I would not advise the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) to put in his oar at this time because the kind of defence he made of the government's position in his speech the other day should convince him that in this case silence would be indicated. The only thing he had to advocate for getting rid of our food surpluses was to eat more. He thought if everybody had all the food he could eat and put on lots of flesh our surpluses would disappear. What he seemed to forget is that there are two kinds of people in Canada. There are those who eat too much and those who eat too little. In many cases those who eat too little are not able to buy the food because of the government's stingy policy on social services.

Mr. Studer: Haven't you got a province out there that saves all the money?

Mr. Zaplitny: As I said earlier, this question of cash advances, in itself, is not the whole reason for the dissatisfaction amongst western farmers. It is a queston of whether the whole of agriculture in Canada, the east as well as the west, is getting a fair share of the national income. When we look at the statistics and find that 20 per cent of the population of Canada which operates agriculture is receiving less and less each year, when we would expect them to receive 20 per cent of the national income and find that they have slipped from about 8·5 per cent down to about 7 per cent of the national income, there is the basic reason for farmers complaining about the treatment they receive from this government.

I think before this session is over this parliament will have to give serious consideration to at least three phases of our economy. Basically, if we are going to have prosperity in this country that we can talk about and not just the prosperity of a few big corporations who increased their profits, there are three things which I believe we must do. First, we must agree as a parliament on the principle of parity prices. Parity for agriculture is not only a matter of giving justice to agriculture but it is part and parcel of the future prosperity of Canada. If we so arrange our affairs, and if we have legislation which results in giving agriculture its fair share of the national income, we will find we will have accomplished perhaps the greatest single step in keeping the whole economy of the country in a buoyant state. If we allow the share of agriculture to continually decline while the costs of production remain the same or go higher, then of course we will place agriculture in this country in a position in which the farmers will not be able to buy their share of the good things produced in this country.

As a result of that we will help to create an economic crisis in other parts of the country. It has happened before, and it would happen again very quickly. We hear arguments pro and con on the question of parity prices for agriculture. Sometimes we are told that if we attempted to establish a parity price system for agricultural products it might entail subsidies. There are those who are prepared to argue that would not be a good thing because we would have to use public money to place floors under farm products. On the other hand, when we look around our economy and stop to think of the kinds of subsidies that are being paid and have been paid over many years, I cannot see how anyone can argue that a few hundred million dollars in subsidies for agricultural products would be a wrong thing.

If we stop to think of one item alone, our tariff structure, what a terrific subsidy that is to the manufacturing concerns in this country! In the period of time during which tariffs have been operating they have been effective in draining from the pockets of the people of western Canada particularly hundreds of millions of dollars. There are other subsidies that are paid. The farmers of Canada have always been very fair, particularly the grain producers, and willing to play their part. When I hear members like the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) refer to the proposal to pay a certain part of the grain storage charges as a handout, it makes me wonder whether such a member has really studied the situation.

What is the picture? In 1946, when the war was over, the government decided to place a ceiling, not a floor, Mr. Speaker, on the price of wheat. They entered into an agreement under which there was to be a ceiling price of $1.55 a bushel. This was done at a time when we were lifting the ceilings on almost all other commodities in Canada. We were decontrolling steel, farm implements and taking the controls off farm fuels and the other things which enter into the cost of production. The government gave the farmers a proposition. They said that in order to enter into a four year agreement we must be assured a supply of wheat; we must assure Great Britain, our biggest customer, of a supply of grain at a price. The only way we can do that is by placing a floor and a ceiling on grain. At a time when we could have sold wheat at approximately $2 a bushel the farmers were asked to take $1.55 in the interests of stabilization, as it was called.

The farmers responded. They said: All right, in the interests of the over-all good of the Canadian economy, in the interests of the over-all good of the allied countries as well as Canada, we are prepared to go along and take less for our product than we could get on the ordinary market. Then, what happened?

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

As I have already mentioned, the government then proceeded to lift the controls on all the other commodities and left the farmer in the position of receiving a ceiling price for his product for a period of four years while all other prices were decontrolled and costs were allowed to go sky high. They gave them stabilization, all right. In fact, they gave not only one level of stabilization but two. It appears to have reached the state where they have stabilized farm income at a low level and farm costs at a high level. That is the kind of stabilization system that is placing the squeeze on the producers today. That is something to consider when we are talking about parity prices.

The other thing which we need to do if we are going to help maintain prosperity in Canada is to establish the widest and most generous system of social security in this country. How many times have we been told in this debate by hon. members on both sides of the house that it is a good thing, a fine thing, that we have surpluses, that we have more grain, more wheat, more butter, more cheese and all the other good things of life than Canadians can consume at the present time? Perhaps it is. Certainly, it is a better thing to have an abundance than a scarcity. No one will argue about that. But it is only a good thing to the extent that the people of Canada can make the best possible use of all these products, and that goes for manufactured articles as well.

The only reason for production is consumption. So long as the people of Canada can consume the goods that we produce, and have enough of the good things that we produce, we will have prosperity; but in order to obtain those goods they must have purchasing power. They can get that purchasing power either through the products they sell, the wages they earn or through social security measures. In so far as there are people in this country who live on such small incomes, or through misfortune, through lack of health, through an accident or through some other means, are not capable of earning a wage high enough to provide them with the purchasing power they require, it is up to this parliament to see to it, through social security measures, that money goes out in the form of pensions and so forth to provide that purchasing power.

We talk about a surplus of butter in this country, a surplus of cheese and of other things. We all know that while we are talking about them there are thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of people on old age pensions, people who are disabled, people who through illness or accident have had their earning power cut down and are not buying that very good food because they simply cannot afford it, since their $40 a month, or whatever they are getting, will not stretch far enough to pay the rent, the fuel and the light bill, and then buy enough groceries and clothes to keep them going until the next month. And yet we have been told by minister after minister in this debate that this is supposed to be one of the wealthiest countries in the world. Is it not a shame that we cannot make decent provision for the citizens of this country out of the great abundance that they talk about? Therefore, we need the widest possible measure of social security, not only to cut down and alleviate the suffering of the many unfortunate people in this country, but also to have a medium through which to distribute the purchasing power to buy up the good things we have produced.

We need to do a third thing. The government must be on the lookout at all times, and so must this parliament, to take action at any time that monopolies threaten the economy of this country. We quite often hear people talking about public enterprise. They sometimes talk as if the socialists were a threat to what they call free enterprise or private enterprise in our country. Let me say that there are many people who are engaged in monopoly enterprise who are a threat to the future of this country, a threat to the private enterpriser, the free enterpriser, who is an independent owner of his business. The threat to his future is not from the government; it is from the huge monopolies that are moving in and squeezing out hundreds and hundreds of their small competitors every day. It is a rat race. The corporation, with its huge, unlimited capital, is in a position to take advantage of every small business, and they take advantage whenever they can. Therefore, we must be always on the lookout to take action effectively against the formation of monopolies. It is in this connection that I want to refer to the government's action with respect to the trans-Canada gas pipe line. We had this question discussed back and forth in previous sessions, and recently an announcement was made that the federal government and the government of Ontario had agreed with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to build a section of the gas pipe line through northern Ontario, the part which is referred to as an uneconomic section, under an agreement whereby this company can buy back that part of the pipe line at a future time on certain terms.

I am not opposed to the government of Canada or the government of Ontario being involved in the construction of a gas pipe line. As a matter of fact, I think that is what should have been done for the whole gas pipe line. From the beginning, it should have been a publicly-owned utility which would be there to serve the needs of all of the people of Canada who could make use of it, and not only for that, but also to provide assurance to the provincial governments through whose provinces this pipe line shall go, and to the municipalities, that when and if they decide upon a public system of distribution of gas within their jurisdictions they will be dealing with the government under a policy of giving everyone an equal opportunity rather than with a private company which might use its power and position to dictate terms to the municipalities and even to the provincial governments.

On the other hand, the government decided to proceed with and to build this part of the pipe line as part of the over-all pipe line from Alberta to the east. The terms I have already stated. I still maintain they are correct. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) may deny it; on some future appropriate occasion he will give us his version of it. But generally speaking, the federal government is going to invest about $85 million of the taxpayers' money and the province of Ontario approximately $35 million of public money in a pipe line which eventually, under the agreement, is to belong to a private corporation at an interest rate of approximately 3½ per cent, with the provision that the private company may deduct a depreciation of 3½ per cent during the time they are paying back this advance, and taking over the pipe line. In other words, they are being offered $120 million interest-free loan on a pipe line deal which will be practically a monopoly, and which will be in a position to dominate the distribution of gas and to dictate to municipalities and to provincial governments on what terms they are going to be able to obtain natural gas.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Carrick: Will the hon. member permit me to put a question? Before we concluded at six o'clock I understood the hon. member to say that if Trans-Canada Pipe Lines purchased the northern Ontario sector they would pay no interest. I should like to ask the hon. member whether he agrees with the interpretation of the agreement contained in the release put out by the Department of Trade and Commerce on November 21, 1955 in which it was stated that if the northern Ontario section were purchased the government would receive 3½ per cent on its capital investment.

Mr. Zaplitny: I regret that my time is so short, but may I say that I am aware of what the hon. member has referred to. It is also a fact that in the interim the pipe line company is permitted to depreciate its capital at the rate of approximately 3½ per cent, so the result will be the same as an interest-free loan.

Mr. Carrick: That is not an accurate statement.

Mr. Zaplitny: I wish merely to say in reference to this whole pipe line deal that in my opinion it is an improvident deal. It is an alienation of the natural resources of this country, and the activities of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in the formation of the company with which this agreement was entered into runs very close to a violation of the Combines Investigation Act. As a matter of fact I am not too sure that there was not in fact a violation. Perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) would do his colleague a favour by looking at section 32 and also at the interpretation to make sure that the activities have not involved this government in the formation of a monopoly which is not in the interests of the public, which in fact is detrimental to public interest and therefore a violation of the act.

Mr. A. B. Weselak (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I join with other hon. members of the house in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) had the signal honour of being the first woman since confederation to move the address in reply and I am sure that the women of Canada were proud of the manner in which she acquitted herself. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) also did as well and could be considered representative of the youth of our country and his splendid speech reflected the increasing activities of the younger people of Canada in the affairs of this country which affect their present and future welfare.

This debate has progressed into its fifth day and it is almost impossible to enter the debate at this time without being repetitious. However, considering the speeches by opposition members I think one would have to go a long way to compete with them in that respect. A great deal of criticism has been levelled at the speech from the throne as containing little for the people of Canada. It is true that the speech from the throne is comparatively short, but on the other hand, as the member for Springfield, I find a great deal in it which will affect the people of my riding and be of benefit to them.

The speech opens with a reference to our international problems. It reasserts our support of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, of the United Nations Organization, of the Colombo plan and of the United Nations technical assistance program. With the recent change in attitude of the leaders of the communist bloc, which I do not think came as a surprise to anyone, these programs and organizations are of vital importance to us to assure our security and to provide a deterrent to aggression and communist expansion. Had we accepted the smiling diplomacy of the Russians and disposed of NATO as suggested by them, I am afraid that the consequences would be with us now and we would be reaping the harvest of our folly.

The hon. ministers of external affairs, of fisheries and of health and welfare are to be congratulated on their efforts—which in the case of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) has resulted in serious and painful injury—to find some ground by which peace could be assured in this troubled world. The efforts of the Canadian delegation at the United Nations have brought honour to Canada and are a credit to her statesmanship.

The speech also indicates that the government has been at grips with the western wheat problem, and in the proposed legislation for which it seeks the approval of parliament measures will be brought forward which will alleviate and assist the wheat growers of the west in their present difficulty.

Reference has been made in this debate to the proposal by the government to pay the carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves owned by the Canadian wheat board in respect of board stocks of wheat in excess of 178 million bushels as a form of charity.

In the course of this debate statistics have been placed on the record which do indicate that the prairie farm economy in contrast with many other sectors of the country has steadily declined. The farmers of western Canada have in the past pretty well carried their own load in spite of protective devices such as tariffs and patents which have contributed so much to the development of industry and the betterment and security of labour. The advantages obtained by tariffs and patents for the other sectors of the economy have to be paid for, and are paid for by the consumers of the country. Farmers are notably large consumers of industrial products per capita, and on a per capita basis pay a substantial portion of this cost. The farmer must buy in a market geared to our high economic level, yet must sell in competition in markets where the economic level is much lower than that of Canada. Protection by way of tariffs and patents, though they produce revenue are nothing other than a subsidy paid for by the consumers of Canada.

It might be of interest to note some of the other subsidies paid in this country. My findings show that since 1944 $2 million was paid to the maritime potato growers; $7 million to the apple growers east and west; $6 million to butter producers in Ontario and Quebec; approximately $6 million to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia potato growers under the prices support act.

Freight rate assistance from the prairies on feed grain for the benefit of producers and feeders from 1941 to 1954 resulted in assistance to feeders: In British Columbia to the extent of $22,462,939.52; in Ontario, $72,191,724.89; in Quebec, $87,510,698.70; in the maritimes, $38,347,090.19; making a total of $220,512,453.30. To which should be added approximately another $14 million for 1955 making a further total of over $234 million. These are some of the subsidies paid to various sectors of the agricultural economy in an effort to raise them in some measure to our general economic level.

In addition to these agricultural subsidies, in the year 1954 alone a total of $51 million was paid in other federal subsidies. The breakdown given in a statement of national accounts of income and expenditure prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics shows that in the year 1954 $15 million was paid in gold subsidies, $11 million was paid under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, $12 million was paid on coal subventions and $13 million in miscellaneous subsidies.

I have no quarrel with the payment of the subsidies I have referred to. It is far better to temporarily assist those sectors of our economy which are temporarily depressed in this manner than it is to legislate in such a manner as to reduce the economic level of the country as a whole. In this respect our prairie farm economy has temporarily become one of the soft spots and deserves the attention and assistance which is being proposed by the government.

The principle of mutual assistance by Canadians in Canada is further exemplified by the constant efforts of our Prime Minister to finalize and complete the renewal of dominion-provincial agreements which have done so much to equitably distribute the wealth of the nation. The Winnipeg Free Press in its editorial of January 13 made no mistake when it stated:

> The federal government's new tax offer to the provinces is excellent. When the history of our times comes to be written this can be expected to rank as one of the acts of true statesmanship to the credit of Canadian Liberalism under Mr. St. Laurent's leadership. It is a major contribution to the economic and political progress of our federal system.

The revised proposals, according to the editorial, will within the general scale of federal-provincial tax dealings give Manitoba a just deal in relation to other provinces, and under the new proposals we unquestionably do get this, along with all the advantages of the existing tax rental agreements.

The construction of the trans-Canada pipe line will be welcomed by the people of Manitoba. Manitoba has been very fortunate that within the boundaries of the constituency of Springfield, which I have the honour to represent, there has been developed on the Winnipeg river 788,000 horsepower of cheap hydroelectric power. We find now we must go farther afield for power, and its production and transmission is going to be far more costly than that produced in the past. The supply of natural gas to Manitoba will provide additional source of energy which will certainly contribute to the expansion of our provincial economy.

Further amendments to the National Housing Act to make it more effective are always welcome, since any incentive to improve housing conditions in Canada will result in a healthier and happier nation. The only suggestion I have at the moment for the government, is that some study be given to reducing the income requirement for country towns, where living costs are comparatively lower. In many deserving cases, this could be lowered, instead of being set at an arbitrary figure. In these towns the local bank managers are making the advances. They are familiar with local conditions and know the circumstances of the individuals involved.

The speech from the throne indicates that parliament will be asked to increase the size of the loans to be made by the Canadian farm loan board and to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

With the increase in the size of a farm now required to establish an economic farm unit, and in the amount of capital required to reasonably equip such a farm, the increased amount available certainly will be a welcomed amendment to the act. The increase in the amount of loan available will not, however, solve the problem if the loan to value ratio is by conservative appraisals brought down to a comparatively low level. In addressing the house on February 1st last year, I pointed out that there was a need for a scheme of long-term credit for the rehabilitation of young farmers and at that time made reference to the success of the work that had been done by the administrators of the Veterans Land Act in settling veterans on farms following the last war. I believe the Canadian farm loan board could administer a program similar to that instituted for the veterans, under which supervised long-term credit loans could be made to young deserving farmers to establish them on farms, particularly in cases where ordinary commercial credit is not available, which is the case in many of the farming districts of Canada.

The Farm Improvement Loans Act has been good legislation and has done a great deal to provide farmers with low-cost credit to enable them to equip their farms with modern labour-saving equipment, which is so necessary to them to reduce their cost of production. In our area, as in others, considerable advantage has been taken of this available credit; and it has been of great assistance, particularly to those whose farming operations are in the development or expansion stage. It is therefore quite obvious that any amendment designed to improve the operation of the act cannot help but be of further benefit to those concerned.

Amendments are also proposed to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. In our area, 1954 was the first year in which the act became generally applicable. My experience during the summer months while at home, in this respect, certainly gave me an appreciation of the difficulties encountered in the administration of this legislation. In 1954 the Manitoba government, aware of the dissatisfaction in Manitoba with regard to the operation of the act in many areas, authorized the appointment of a commission to make a study of the act itself and of alternative crop insurance schemes which might possibly be used as an alternative to the present legislation. The report was submitted to the government of Manitoba on September 9, 1955, and I would recommend it to all western members for thorough study, since it contains a wealth of information not only in regard to prairie farm assistance but also in regard to the experiences of the United States federal crop insurance corporation. The report also contains the commission's views regarding the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in Manitoba and suggested amendments to the act, which no doubt have received the consideration of the government and its officials.

In the constituency of Springfield we have the Berens River, Bloodvein, Brokenhead, Fort Alexander, Hollow Water, Little Black River, Little Grand Rapids and Poplar River Indian reserves, which comprise a substantial portion of the Indian population of Manitoba. The Fort Alexander and Brokenhead reserves are located at the south end of lake Winnipeg, while the others range to the north on the east side of the lake a distance of 160 miles. The two reserves at the south are located on reasonably arable land, and I believe a great deal can be done, provided financing and guidance are made available, toward agricultural development of these reserves. I understand that preliminary surveys to this end have been made and I am sure that the interest shown in our Indian population by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) will result in the closest co-operation between him and our newly appointed regional supervisor of Indian agencies to the advantage of the Indians of Manitoba. I am sure the proposed amendments to the Indian Act will be designed to facilitate the department's work in this connection and will be looked forward to with considerable interest.

Since my entry into this house, I have never made reference to the part the constituency of Springfield has played in the history of western Canada, nor of its importance to the economic welfare of Manitoba. Springfield borders on the province of Ontario north and south for a distance of 222 miles. On the west it is bounded north of the town of Selkirk by the east shore of lake Winnipeg, and south of the town of Selkirk it extends across the Red river to Stony Mountain and then skirts the city of Winnipeg and the town of Transcona. The constituency is representative of almost all occupational, ethnic and religious groups, who live and work amicably together for their common good.

On both sides of the Red river, extending from the city of Winnipeg to the town of Selkirk, are located mixed farms and large market gardens as well as other people located on small holdings and employed in the city nearby. This area is steeped in history, for here is located Lower Fort Garry, built 124 years ago, wholly intact and in an excellent state of preservation. It was in this area along the Red river that the early history of western Canada was enacted and where the story of Louis Riel began.

The central portion of the constituency is located in the Red river, Brokenhead and Whitemouth river valleys, and is one of the finest farming areas in western Canada. I say this despite the fact that in the past two years, owing to excessive moisture, we have had comparatively poor crops and the farmers in this area are at present hard pressed to meet their obligations and carry on their farming operations. This may seem an odd statement, but in 1954—and results will show that 1955 was not much better—the average wheat yield in the municipalities of Brokenhead was 9·5 bushels as against a long-term average of 19·7; of Lac du Bonnet 5 bushels as against a long-term average of 21·8; of Whitemouth, 5 bushels as against a long-term average of 16·8. One can readily see that they have been affected not only by price squeezes but also by drastic losses in production.

The eastern area of the constituency bordering the Ontario boundary and extending north between lake Winnipeg and Ontario is in the Precambrian shield. Through this area from the lake of the Woods to Fort Alexander on lake Winnipeg flows the mighty Winnipeg river, which has contributed so much to the economic development of Manitoba. It was along this river that the first discoverers of the west travelled to reach lake Winnipeg and then to travel south to where the city of Winnipeg is now located. On this river are located hydro plants generating 788,000 horsepower daily which supply the present needs of the province of Manitoba. On the river also is located the huge pulp and paper mill which provides employment for the communities of Pine Falls, Powerview and St. George and which also supplies winter employment to farmers in the area. This area also provides the finest fishing, hunting, swimming and boating within the areas of the two provincial reserves, namely, the Whiteshell and the Agazis.

Along the shore of the lake there is a great deal of fishing activity and fur farming. The mineral potential of this area has only been scratched. Gold has been mined for some time at Bissett. This area is rich in nickel, lithium, chromite, gold, copper, beryl and molybdenum. The Lithium Corporation of Canada, Falconbridge and Violamac are in the area doing development work and it will only be a matter of time until this area becomes a very important factor in our mineral production.

The problem of surplus wheat stocks has received in this debate a considerable amount of attention, and the opposition have made every attempt to lay the blame for this situation at the feet of the government. The minister and other speakers on the government side of the house have placed on the record facts and figures which show that in spite of ever-increasing difficulties Canada has retained and maintained the bulk of her markets. These speakers have shown that the situation is not an isolated Canadian problem but is a world problem which has developed as a result of several factors over which the government has no control. The first of these is within the country itself. It is the fact that Providence has been good to us and has given us bountiful crops which have resulted in greater quantities being made available for export consistently over a period of years. The second is the fact that crops throughout the world also have been good and that production as a result of subsidization by governments has had the effect of increasing production in traditionally importing countries, thus reducing their requirements and also making more wheat available for export in this country.

In an address to the Manitoba pool elevators at Winnipeg on October 28, Mr. Graham Spry, agent-general for Saskatchewan in the United Kingdom and Europe, a recognized authority on the problem, stated that the prairie wheat problem was not created in the west but is part of the world wheat situation. He went on to explain that it was not Canadian policy which had created this situation. Canadian farm policy, he explained, was stability at a price level which covered the cost of production and met fair and sensible competition. Fair and sensible competition, he said, does not exist and our Canadian wheat is being marketed in a world of production incentives and trade restrictions which have disturbed our normal markets.

In addition, the change in status of the United States from a marginal small exporter to the status of the largest wheat exporter of the world has further disrupted our trade in traditional markets. He described the Canadian wheat policy as the least artificial, the most sane in any country. These remarks were made with the thought that only a meeting of minds at the international level and a return to sane, sound and economic wheat policies throughout the world would solve this vexing problem which is facing the world today.

Previous speakers on this side of the house have placed on the record figures covering production, marketing and export which show that had we had normal production years there would have been no surplus. The solutions suggested by the opposition have been acceptance of sterling and soft currency, barter, giveaways and credit sales, and finally a more aggressive sales policy.

On the question of accepting sterling and soft currency I would refer the house first to an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press headed, "Duping the Farmer", which reads in part as follows:

> The most important of these is the one that Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan fastened on once again in a speech on Wednesday night. It is that Canada should take "payment" for wheat in foreign currencies—particularly in sterling—where sales cannot otherwise be made. This idea makes a certain superficial appeal. That is why it has been around for a long time. But in the form in which it is usually put forward it is simply a deception a smart-aleck idea from people who ought to know better and care more about the farmer. There is of course no difficulty whatever about taking in return for wheat or anything else, sterling or any other currency. The question is what we can do with the sterling when we have it. The Canadian farmer does not want pound notes. He wants dollars or goods.

The proponents of "sterling sales" talk as if we could get goods in exchange. That is untrue—not by wish of ours, but by obvious wish of the British or anyone else, in their own interests. If, having taken sterling, we are then allowed to spend the sterling on buying goods for Canada, or on making foreign investments that appeal to Canadians, then from the point of view of the United Kingdom they might just as well have paid us in dollars in the first place.

I would refer also to a statement made in Winnipeg before the farmers' union convention by Mr. W. G. Coventry, United Kingdom trade commissioner. In the issue of the Winnipeg Free Press of December 6, 1955, there is the following report with respect to what he had to say:

In an address to the Manitoba farmers' union fifth annual convention in Winnipeg and in a later questioning period, W. G. Coventry, United Kingdom trade commissioner, explained why these much advocated policies were not economically reasonable. But the speaker did suggest two practices which he said would stimulate movement of Canadian commodities into foreign markets.

The article goes on to say:

Canada could not sell more wheat to Britain, or to other countries, by accepting sterling, Mr. Coventry said, because it was only "payment deferred". The account would have to be settled with the Bank of Canada later. "You will never get the Bank of England to allow purchase in Canada for sterling", he added. The eventual need to settle with the Bank of Canada would be "a threat hanging over its head". By the same token, no other country would pay for Canadian goods with their own currency.

Giveaway programs were all right at times, Mr. Coventry said. They were better than "destroying the produce". But the British had "a dogged pride" and would not accept a bushel of free Canadian wheat. Mr. Coventry said he did not feel barter agreements were profitable because they called for specific orders to manufacturers to produce goods, specially designed for the other country in the agreement.

With regard to credit sales, sales on credit have been made to Poland, Brazil and Yugoslavia through the medium of the export credit corporation for substantial quantities of grain, and I am sure that should credit be required by any country it will be similarly made available.

With respect to giveaways, I might say that perhaps the United States can afford this luxury but I do not believe we can. In 18 months their giveaway program has cost the United States $1,692 million. To bring this giveaway program into its proper perspective, I think we must recognize that we in Canada export approximately 75 per cent of our wheat production and consume at home approximately 25 per cent. The United States, on the other hand, consumes within their own country approximately 80 per cent of the wheat production and exports a small surplus of 20 per cent. The United States is in much the same position as we are with our butter.

We must also recognize that in Canada any giveaway program of the scale entered into by the United States would have to be paid for by a mere 16 million people compared with the population in the United States of over 160 million. The funds available to the United States government for this purpose can be indicated by the fact that this year's budget in the United States will be in excess of $66 billion while ours is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $4 billion.

I think these comparisons should be kept in mind when we suggest that our wheat surpluses be disposed of completely by giveaway programs. I have no objection to the giving away of wheat to countries which require it and are in need, but I do not think we should disrupt world markets by entering into a war with the United States in this respect. An example of the type of deal entered into by the United States under this program is illustrated by the fact that an agreement was entered into by the United States last October with Japan to provide Japan with $170 million worth of farm products over and above her usual imports. In the deal made with Japan the United States is to accept local currency. Thirty per cent of this local currency is to be held in Japan and used by the United States for offshore installations, military housing, exchange students and to develop United States markets in Japan. The remaining 70 per cent would be used by Japan for the erection of hydro stations, the development of agriculture and the promotion of a Japanese productivity centre. Not a cent of this money will return to the United States. It is nothing but a dead giveaway program. Similar deals have been made by the United States with Brazil, Ecuador, Colombia, Egypt, Israel and Yugoslavia. The result of the United States program has been that while her average exports before the war were roughly 56 million bushels, she now exports in excess of 300 million bushels. These deals are bound to affect and to be reflected in our Canadian exports.

What are some of the things that our government has done to meet this situation? During this parliament the Canadian government entered into an agreement with Japan. It is a reciprocal trade agreement which gave Japan certain concessions and under which Japan also undertook to purchase certain commodities in this country. For a year or two, as the result of that agreement, we had a splendid market with Japan. We had a very good market and our exports to Japan rose to high levels. But since the United States have entered into their disposal program—and you can hardly blame Japan for this when you consider the deals I have just related—our exports with Japan have decreased. In the long run I believe Japan will be a valuable market of ours but our exports to Japan have been reduced. The Canadian wheat board has been pressing sales by inviting trade delegations from various countries with whom we deal in order to acquaint them with our method of handling growing and shipping our Canadian grain which is the best grain in the world and which has created standards which are acceptable the world over. The wheat board has also worked in our interests by appearances before official bodies in the United States to protect the interests of the Canadian grain producer. Finally, the wheat board has taken a realistic approach in the matter of grain pricing. Where necessary and where it has been advantageous they have reduced the price of grain and have refused to be panicked into a price war. I think the statement of the minister to the effect that orders are coming in at a rate exceeding that of last year certainly justifies this stand on the part of our Canadian wheat board.

The Canadian government itself has twice recently sent delegations to the United States to discuss this problem and to try to arrive at an amicable solution. I understand that a further conference is arranged for the latter part of January to discuss the problem once more. Finally, our adherence to and support of the principle of the Geneva agreement on tariffs and trade is one of the things which is doing a great deal to preserve our markets throughout the world. I feel satisfied that the wheat board and the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) have left no stone unturned to promote sales. As I said before, his statement to the effect that orders are coming in at a fairly good rate certainly seems to justify our confidence in our Canadian marketing policy.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express to the right hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the appreciation of westerners for the investment announced last June to be made in western Canada in the amount of $650,000 for the erection of a rust research and science building on the campus of the University of Manitoba. If conditions are favourable to rust, losses on the prairies can exceed $1 billion in an individual crop year. The rust research laboratory in Manitoba over the years has kept pace with the appearance of new races of this scavenger. Anything that can be done to facilitate this work is a sound investment. I am sure our eminent scientists in Manitoba will welcome the building which will no doubt improve their working conditions and increase their efficiency.

Mr. James A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset to add my congratulations to those that have already been extended to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I perhaps feel a little bit more justified than would many other members in this house in extending those congratulations to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) as it was in the riding that I have the honour to represent that the hon. member first saw the light of day and gained her early education. I would assume that her desire to serve in the municipal field was gained from the fact that her father for many years served as councillor and reeve of the township in which I happen to reside. As to the youthful member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme), I was pleased to see him taking an active part in the deliberations of this house.

I wish to turn my thoughts to a few of the problems that face the people engaged in making their living in agriculture. These problems are extremely difficult ones and they face many people in the country. The problems I wish to discuss are possibly more directly the problems of Ontario farmers, although indirectly they concern all the farmers of Canada.

The yearly net income of Ontario farmers has dropped more than $1,000 per farm since 1951. Much of this drop has been the result of the cost-price squeeze in agricultural production. To recover lost income as well as to improve long-term earnings is the prime concern of most farm operators. The question is h-o-w. I may come to the other one later. By how much and how fast can the goal of improved earnings be attained? There are many standards for measuring the success of farm operations. Some may consider a farmer to be a success if he has a beautiful homestead, has well-bred livestock or if his family have a standard of living comparable to that of other dwellers; if they have inside plumbing and a good motor car; and he need not be criticized if it happens to be a Buick or something better. But how is he going to maintain the standard of living he deserves with the agricultural outlook of 1956 staring him in the face?

Other hon. members have spoken on the butter and the cheese situation and on the situation with regard to wheat and other cereal grains. If we are going to sell our surplus butter behind the iron curtain for 20 cents a pound or more below the floor price and not give the consumers of Canada an opportunity to purchase this storage butter at the same price as that at which it is now being sold to these communistic countries, it would appear to me that something is seriously wrong in the administration of this government and in the handling of our surplus butter.

Let us look at the pork situation. The forecast as predicted by the marketing service of the Canadian Department of Agriculture has this to say:

> For the first quarter of 1956, the increase is forecast to be 5 per cent over the first quarter of 1955 and for the second and third quarters of 1956, a decrease of 3 per cent is looked for, based on surveys of breedings and farrowings. The increase forecast for the next six to nine months would scarcely supply the natural increase in population if the rate of pork consumption on the domestic market remains about the same as during 1955, and exports continue as in the past year.

It is to be hoped that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) maintains the present floor price on hogs because this forecast of marketings shows that farmers do not see hogs as a profitable business and present breedings are light. It is estimated that around 40 per cent of the population of Canada depends directly or indirectly on agriculture. Therefore, if agriculture continues in a depressed condition it can readily be seen how rapidly this would reflect on the other 60 per cent of the population.

How are the farmers overcoming this high cost of production? I think the farmers as a whole are appreciative of the assistance they have received from the agricultural colleges, the agricultural experimental farms, plant breeders and all of those connected with the science of agriculture. In Ontario I wish to give credit to the Ontario soil and crop improvement association for the outstanding work they have done in the last 15 years in assisting farmers to produce higher yields on the same acreages. Agriculturally speaking, the year 1955 will not be a particularly pleasant one to remember. Farmers can look forward to the year 1956 with less farm workers, higher priced land and less money with which to buy costly equipment. There is a challenge requiring all our mental, manual, scientific and financial resources.

Modern farm practices have resulted in higher yields per acre for the last 10 years. Those yields have been the highest in any 10-year period in the history of Canada. The biggest increases have occurred since 1950. Present day know-how can still increase the production per acre provided the farmer has a market for the products he produces. How far and how fast yield increases can be continued will depend on the returns farmers might reasonably expect for the hours of labour it takes to produce the product. I sincerely suggest, Mr. Speaker, to this government that they give more serious consideration to the difficulties of the agricultural producers than they have in previous years.

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, at the outset, to extend my sincere congratulations to my hon. colleagues for Timiskaming and Bellechasse (Mrs. Shipley and Mr. Laflamme) for their excellent speeches on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The reason I rise tonight is to refer to the federal-provincial conference on health insurance projects which is to be held January 23.

The numerous representations made to us by the public, the personal commentaries of doctors and medical bodies, the large amount of data compiled by the Department of National Health and Welfare, the legislation passed by the present government at the time of the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King to prepare a health program in 1948 and the additional credits voted since then are excellent groundwork to the study of a national health insurance plan. As far back as 1935, the Bennett government had created a survey commission to investigate the problem of health insurance in Canada. It may be recalled that the scheme submitted at that time had been declared ultra vires.

In 1937 the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission included suggestions with regard to health and health insurance in Canada.

In February, 1942, the Mackenzie King government instituted an advisory committee on health insurance and, in March, 1943, that body submitted a draft bill to the social security committee of the house. In 1943, the parliamentary committee on social security approved the general principles of the bill, but proposed some amendments which went through in 1944. In 1945, the Hon. Brooke Claxton suggested to the federal-provincial conference held at that time a national health insurance scheme whereby the federal government would pay 60 per cent of the cost, and the provinces 40 per cent.

On May 14, 1948, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King announced a national health scheme entailing an annual expenditure of approximately $35 million up to a total of $167 million.

In 1953, an additional amount was provided until 1958, bringing the grand total to $386 million, to be expended over a period of ten years, from 1948 to 1958.

As a result of that preliminary plan, about 46,000 beds have been added in hospitals for the care of adults, together with several thousand beds for children, not to mention the many spheres in which the government provided subsidies for sanatoriums, for tuberculosis control and so forth, all necessary elements in the implementation of a national health program.

At the federal-provincial conference of last October, and following the preliminary talks of April 1955, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made a proposal involving support of a national health insurance plan provided it did not require constitutional amendments, and provided that the majority of the provinces and of the people were in favour of the scheme.

The necessity to provide for a health insurance plan is a result of two very important factors. First there is the obligation to maintain the standard of health in Canada. But in view of the vastness of our country, and of the special characteristics of its various areas, the government must step in at all levels to ensure medical care to the whole population. The second factor comes from the tremendous rise in the cost of medical care and hospitalization, which again requires government assistance if we don't want more and more of our people to be deprived of adequate medical care. Thus, a medical board connected with army recruiting and entrusted with preserving and organizing medical care for the whole of Canada, made some remarks concerning the extent of our territory and the difficulty of providing medical care for everybody.

At a forum organized by this committee throughout Canada, a citizen of Bury, I think, in the province of Quebec, said: "We have here with us two undertakers and no doctors, so we can die when we please." Over the radio, another one from Lennoxville stated: "All of us dread doctors and hospitals, knowing that many of us have spent a lifetime paying for the costs of a couple of operations or of protracted illness." These two statements summed up the comments which had been made throughout the country.

It is for these reasons that the government must help. Already, in some parts of Canada, several provincial governments have adopted legislation to help the public through compulsory health insurance.

British Columbia, for instance, has a compulsory health and hospital insurance plan. Alberta and Saskatchewan likewise have plans whereby the public is obliged to contribute to the costs of health insurance.

British Columbia has a general hospitalization service covering all hospital costs, excluding medical costs. A 5 per cent sales tax serves to pay the cost of the program.

Alberta has a municipal hospitalization plan and a provincial plan for maternity, cancer and polio cases. Municipal plans are financed by means of a local land tax and provincial subsidies. The provincial plan is financed through the general revenue of the province. One hundred and seventy-three municipalities of Alberta, involving 93 per cent of the population, contribute to a compulsory insurance plan.

Saskatchewan has set up a compulsory hospitalization insurance plan for the entire province. This plan covers hospital costs, drugs, laboratory costs and operating-room costs. This insurance is financed by means of an annual tax of $10 per capita to a maximum of $30 per family. In addition, Saskatchewan is trying out a regional compulsory medical and hospital insurance plan in Swift Current. In 1953, 20,400 families were covered by this complete medical, dental and hospital protection plan. In 1954, the annual tax amounted to $18 for a single person and could reach a maximum of $44 for a family of four or more. This is a personal as well as land tax. It will be recalled that a referendum was held in Swift Current a few months ago in which a farm population in general voted against the establishment of a system of compulsory insurance, which, of course, forced the local government to revamp its policy in the matter of health insurance.

The province of Newfoundland has what is called a voluntary hospitalization insurance plan, known as the Cottage hospital plan. Hospitals are made up of 18 cottages comprising 503 beds for adults and 113 beds for children. The cost of this compulsory insurance varies from $7.50 to $18 for single persons, according to localities and from $15 to $36 per family, also according to localities served.

In the rest of Canada there is no compulsory insurance for the time being, although the province of Ontario has just stated that it was necessary to organize an insurance system, apparently compulsory, which would require the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments. This means that our people are more than ever ready to try out the plans being carried out in certain provinces and in other countries. Thanks to the experience gained in the world, particularly in England, Sweden and France, people are getting more and more convinced that, for the protection of the public and the attainment of a higher standard of health in this country, a national system of compulsory insurance must be adopted.

As early as 1942-43, an inquiry committee set up by the federal government showed that 32 countries had a compulsory health insurance system. On the other hand, nine countries had a voluntary insurance plan, among them Sweden, which, in my opinion, is one of the most advanced countries from the point of view of social legislation. Around 1942 the president of the Canadian Medical Association, Dr. McPhedran, who was also a member of the medical investigating committee, stated that the tendency of medical science was to specialization, because general practitioners are unable to earn an adequate income without resorting to surgery, and that any system of medical organization should, first and foremost, be based on preventive medicine. What Dr. McPhedran said in 1943 is even truer in 1956.

It is quite interesting to note the present tendency of medicine in this country. For instance, in 1954, 73·7 per cent of Canadian doctors practised in communities of 10,000 people or more. In the province of Quebec, more particularly, this proportion was 77·6 per cent, and a little above that, which means that only 22 per cent of physicians practise in cities of less than 10,000 population.

Furthermore, the tendency to specialization that began several years ago is gaining momentum. Indeed, in 1954, only 43·2 per cent of doctors in Canada were general practitioners, although the proportion did not exceed 38·7 per cent in the province of Quebec, whereas in 1948 the percentage of general practitioners in our province was 47·9. The reason for this, according to a doctor friend of mine, is that preventive medicine is altogether unprofitable for the physician. The necessity of earning a living is driving doctors to hospital service where they command substantial fees. The ordinary physician does not dare send his patients to a hospital for a medical examination that might well cost them $200 and even $300, and would not be covered by some insurance scheme. On the other hand, whereas a hospital examination today is costly, a consultation by the family doctor only brings him $2 or $3. Therefore, Dr. McPhedran was perfectly right in stating that health insurance should first of all be based on preventive medicine.

In 1956 as in 1943, doctors naturally tend to establish themselves where they can more readily specialize either in surgery or some other branch. Doctors fear that health insurance will ultimately protect only hospitals and specialists and afford no protection to the public at large or to the family doctor. We must therefore organize health insurance plans that would enable them to make reasonable profits through the practice of their profession without having to take up surgery or some other specialty.

Many people come in to see us—I am sure that all hon. members have received the visit of some of their constituents who showed them fantastic bills for hospital and medical care. Only a few days ago a postmaster who earns but $150 a month was telling me that he had paid out $7,000 for hospital treatment, operations, fees and medical care for his son. It is not surprising that these people should come to us to request assistance from the government. They say outright that they cannot bear this expense.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is it normal that, in a country like ours with well organized medical services—there is one doctor for 983 people, that is 16,000 in all in Canada—half the population should be unable or unwilling to go to hospital.

We have, particularly in the province of Quebec, a system of public assistance which, to my mind, is altogether inadequate and is a real disgrace, especially to the patient who has to beg for charity when he is under public care.

In 1952 the public hospitals of the province of Quebec took in 52,326 charity cases.

The provincial and municipal governments paid about $7.00 a day for these patients, while in 1954 hospital expenses in Quebec rose to $10.26 per capita, which means that our hospitals had to carry a daily deficit of $3.26 for each public patient. This kind of patient remained an average of 19 days in hospital, while private patients, who were obliged to pay their own way, only stayed about 10 days. Therefore, public patients now get 19 days paid, and those of average means must carry the burden of the deficit. These are the people who, when they call on us, show us hospital bills that might be called utterly fantastic.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is time for a concentrated action by the governments in the field of health insurance. People criticize the English scheme, which in 1953 cost 486 million pounds sterling for 48 million people; yet this insurance, which covers dental expenses, medical expenses at home, drugs, hearing aids, all hospitalization costs, diagnosis and doctors' fees and even capital investment for the building of hospitals and their maintenance, cost only $28 per head, whereas our own medical costs are much higher and cover only a small part of our medical needs. If a critical comparison is made between the English and the Canadian systems, the conclusion is not in favour of our system.

France, which attaches great importance to public health, has a system of preventive medicine. Every French citizen has a health booklet and has to undergo at least four complete medical examinations during his lifetime. These examinations include laboratory tests and X-ray inspections which are free, in that they are paid for by the insurance plan.

There are now in Canada 17 non-profit health insurance companies, such as the Blue Cross, which offer group insurance.

In addition, some 60 private companies specialize in health insurance. Unfortunately, in the province of Quebec, no insurance company offers to individuals the advantages of group plans as in Ontario. In Ontario, the Blue Cross is the only company offering to pay the full cost of hospitalization; there is only one limitation to that insurance, that is 120 days in hospital.

There are at present in Canada 4,300,000 people who have insurance policies in various companies or non-profit organizations.

Needless to say that the figure is impressive at first glance, but one must also consider that those insurance plans are divided into two categories.

There is the extensive plan which is called in English the "Comprehensive Plan" and there is the limited plan. The comprehensive plan includes medical and hospital care and covers a fairly large field; the limited plan offers some kinds of hospital or medical care as provided in the policy.

There is an untold number of insurance policies which are absolutely illusory and which are sold by companies not much concerned with the interest of the patient. Here is an example of an insurance costing $40 for a family of three people. A child of a subscriber was involved in an automobile accident. The cost of treatment of a fractured leg was $500. The insurance company paid $60 to cover all expenses. When I think of the millions of insurance policies which are drawn up this way, I can say that this protection is fictitious. I could mention an impressive number of such cases.

In the province of Quebec only 35,000 people are protected by comprehensive plans such as that offered by the Blue Cross. I am aware that some workers are covered by excellent group insurance plans but these, unfortunately, only protect a part of the population. That is why I have nothing against group insurance plans which are of great service to a large number of Canadians.

Personally I am opposed to a compulsory insurance plan for Quebec since I am still a believer in the virtues of private enterprise, as long as in the field of health insurance, it is assisted and controlled by the governments.

If we consider Canada's infantile mortality rate, we cannot say that we are living in the best country in the world. Canada ranks thirteenth among the countries of the world in the matter of infantile mortality. The rate of Canada's infantile mortality is 38 per 1,000, but in Quebec it is 50 per 1,000. This province's mortality rate among pregnant women is higher than elsewhere. Its mortality rate from tuberculosis is too high. We have much to do if we want to improve public health. If we want our people to benefit from medicine, we have to put medicine within their reach. I do not think that doctors are opposed to a plan of health insurance; quite the contrary is true. But doctors in general believe that preventive medicine would bring them absolutely no revenue, if they are not effectively protected by insurance plans.

In all insurance companies, there is nothing at present which permits protection against disease or maintaining a person in good health.

Someone had this witty remark one day about medicine in the Orient: it seems, he said, that over there the doctor is paid to keep his client in good health and that he has to attend him for nothing when he is sick. That may seem paradoxical, but what could be more logical after all?

If we examine the health problem in Canada, due to the immense size of our country, we must conclude that governments have to act. I know that the federal government has been working for a number of years on the preparation of a program which will permit every citizen of this country to participate in an insurance program that can protect them.

I repeat that in the province of Quebec I do not believe that a compulsory contributory insurance system would be practical. There is a big difference between compulsory insurance and a program of protection for the public. That is why I would like our province to co-operate with the federal government, which is ready to pay the larger part of the costs, 60 per cent, with the provinces paying 40 per cent. I believe that in order to ensure medical care, the better part of the public is willing to insure through insurance companies, without any necessity for coercion. We must allow people to buy protection from insurance companies as individuals at reasonable rates without having to belong to a group. These insurance companies should be allowed to band together and to carry the main load themselves, especially as regards hospital and medical costs. The federal government should ensure that policies be uniform. As you know, at this time a great many insurance policies are sold by agents on commission. In certain cases these policies are sold to people in good health but are cancelled by the companies as soon as the insured party falls sick. If insurance companies agreed to be integrated in a global plan, I believe that the provinces, with the help of the federal government, could pay the costs of preventive medicine, of diagnosis, laboratories and analyses and also assume, as suggested by Premier Frost at the last conference, the costs of hospitalization after a period of 50 days.

[Mr. Breton.]

The protracted illness is what many people are afraid of. A good number of people can afford the cost of 15, 20, 30 and even 40 days of hospitalization. But when it comes to chronic disease, they are absolutely helpless and these people are definitely ruined and in final analysis, become dependent on the government. That is summed up in the following statement made by the Lennoxville farmer on the occasion of the forum I spoke of a while ago. "We are all afraid of hospitals and doctors because we know that one or two operations or even a protracted illness will put us in debt for years to come".

I wish to draw a few conclusions before closing these few remarks in French. We could talk at great length on health insurance as there is so much literature on this matter. Once you delve into this problem, you can find literally tons of documents in the Department of National Health and Welfare, which proves that the government has had the matter under active consideration for years. If the problem has not yet been solved, it is because it is very complicated.

There is certainly much to do to set up a health program in Canada. Whether such a program be compulsory or not, it still remains that the provinces should organize a system that could be integrated into a national health insurance scheme. I am confident that the present government will co-operate in that direction as the Prime Minister has given to understand.

To conclude, I would like to summarize the four main points of my remarks—I made them as they came to my mind, and there may have been some overlapping of the ideas I put forth.

1. Health insurance must encourage and organize preventive medicine which so far has not been the case; this is, moreover, in accordance with the recommendation of medical associations;

2. The ordinary physician must be reasonably compensated for his services and especially for preventive medicine care which he is called upon to practise more and more if he wants to conform with the spirit of medicine;

3. National health insurance is not necessarily compulsory insurance. Voluntary plans integrated into provincial legislation may be very useful;

4. The formula of public assistance, such as is now implemented, is unfair to needy people as well as to the middle class which, under the present system, must pay prohibitive hospital costs.

In closing, may I say that a complete national plan of health insurance would require the payment of unemployment benefits to unemployed people when they are sick. I know that this might require a constitutional amendment, a problem which would be solved at the next federal provincial conference which will open this coming January 23. It would be good to broach this problem. If we really want to deal with the problem of health and health insurance, we must also guarantee unemployment benefits to the head of a family when he is sick. True it is that he gets benefits at present but only if he is sick while unemployed. All that would be required would be to state that illness is a cause of involuntary unemployment.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to repeat in English what I have already said in French on the problem of health insurance in Canada. However, I should like to sum up this subject by saying that, according to the declaration of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) at the federal-provincial conference of October 1955, the federal government is in favour of helping the provinces in promoting a national health insurance plan.

Personally, I am not favourable to a compulsory health insurance plan in the province of Quebec. It is my opinion that each province should organize at its own choice either a compulsory or an optional insurance plan, provided it can be integrated in a national plan.

We already have 17 non-profit insurance schemes in Canada and about 60 private corporations offering insurance plans throughout the country. It seems to me that these private corporations could institute a plan which could be integrated in a provincial scheme by co-ordinating their plans with those of the provinces.

There is no doubt that the average person cannot pay $40 to $50, which amounts approximately to $200 a year for a family of four people, to be protected against the risk of sickness. I believe, however, it would be possible to have a comprehensive insurance plan by which the private societies could bear the bulk of expenses, the provinces providing part of these expenses by paying the cost of diagnosis and laboratory examinations along with the hospitalization cost for sickness over 50 days, as was proposed by the Hon. Mr. Frost.

I may add, because I forgot to point this out when I spoke in French, that the costs connected with the treatment of sickness are rising very rapidly in our country and are reaching the point where they exceed the capacity of the patient to pay them. In 1945 these costs were ascertained to be about $21 a year per head. At the conference of last October they were estimated to be about $38 per head, and Mr. Frost estimated these costs to be $44 a year per head. The cost of caring for the insane amounts to an additional $8 or $10 per head. Therefore we are obliged to consider that for full protection of people against sickness it would cost about $50 per head a year. That means about $200 for a family of four persons. There is no doubt that the ordinary people of Canada are unable to carry these costs of sickness. That is why I am in favour of a national health insurance plan.

It is impossible for me in these few words to cover all the arguments in favour of a national health insurance plan but I should not like to resume my seat without congratulating the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) on the considerable amount of preliminary work he has accomplished to date in the field of health insurance in order to round out the different social security programs which are so vital to the welfare of the people of Canada.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the only true way I can express my feelings in entering this debate is to say that they are feelings of anger and deep concern over the attitude of the government with respect to the issue before parliament. The C.C.F. have moved a vote of non-confidence in the government on the basis of the treatment being meted out to our western farmers and the fact that the government have done nothing about the urgent and serious problems facing not only western Canada but, indeed, the whole agricultural economy of this country.

The C.C.F. are asking that there shall be paid to the farmers cash advances on farm stored grain of not less than 75 per cent of the initial price in order to alleviate the serious financial crisis now confronting western farmers. First of all, may I say I am quite disappointed that western members of parliament of the Liberal party have, in my opinion, failed to put before the house the true aspects of the situation prevailing in that part of the country. I am truly disappointed that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang), the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison), yes, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) have not seen fit to get up in the house during this debate and place before hon. members the true situation respecting the plight of western farmers.

I say it is not sufficient for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) or the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who is in his seat at the present time, to try to intimidate any western member, the farmers or the farm organizations so far as their support of the wheat board is concerned. I challenge the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is in his seat, to bring before the house an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act to bring rye and flax under the control of the Canadian wheat board. I guarantee him that every last member of this party will support it.

I say too, to the hon. member for Rosthern that he cannot intimidate the farmers of western Canada. The hon. member has a right to his own opinions but I feel that for many years he has been doing the same thing he did in 1945 when there was a discussion before the house with respect to the taxation of co-operatives. I recall well, as will all hon. members who were in the house at that time, that in his formidable and emphatic way he asked himself the question how he should vote. The hon. member for Rosthern had his hand raised in an emphatic gesture. He said, "I ask myself the question", and an hon. member sitting in front of me replied and said, "You will get a foolish answer." I think the hon. member for Rosthern has been getting foolish answers down through the years.

I say to him that I do not think he will find one farm organization in western Canada which does not support the Canadian wheat board. I say too that he will not find a western farm organization which does not support cash advances, interest free, to western farmers. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) spoke in this debate but from what I heard him say it would seem the only solution he has to offer to solve the glut of wheat we have in the country is that people should eat more. I suggest that is comparable to the reply of Marie Antoinette of France when the authorities said to her that the populace did not have bread and she answered, "Let them eat cake".

The western farmer today is in the worst cash position he has ever been in. Speaking from personal experience, because I have farmed for some 20 years, I have never seen the western farmer in as difficult a cash position as he is at the present time. I have been lucky in my farming down through the years, and through good luck, good health and a host of friends I have achieved a reasonable amount of success. However, I say to the government that they have betrayed many young men who came back from the forces in 1945 and took up farming. They have betrayed them because they took off price controls in 1946 and 1947, and since that time the price of agricultural implements has risen by leaps and bounds.

What is the government doing today to keep faith with these thousands of boys who came back and went on farms? I can take any hon. member and show him within two hours driving distance of my farm dozens of young farmers who came back, went into farming and today are loaded with debt because their gratuities were not sufficient to enable them to carry on and maintain a decent standard of living. I say to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, who has not seen fit to rise in this debate and tell the house what the conditions of the farmers are in his constituency, that I recall during a debate on agriculture and the wheat situation last year he rose in his seat and said to the house that when coming here he had flown over Port Arthur and he knew that all was well because from the aeroplane he had seen the boats going out of the port. That is not a true picture of the situation. The true picture comes to us through various sources, but sometimes the sources do not assist in presenting a true picture.

I want to refer to some of the newspapers of this country that have tried to put before the people of Canada the true position with respect to the farm situation. I have here a clipping from the Globe and Mail of December 1, 1955. In dealing with the plight of western farmers the editorial points out that the farmer's income has been cut by two-thirds in four years. The editorial goes on to say:

> The question does not concern the western farmer alone. It concerns all three prairie provinces, and all the people living in them, who are as dependent upon the farmer as he is dependent upon wheat.

It goes on to say that these farmers have a right to prosper. This afternoon an hon. member from the Liberal benches who sits over in the far corner asked the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) how many farmers were bankrupt in his constituency. Is that the attitude, is that the philosophy of the Liberal party, that we are going to meet this situation by finding out how many bankrupt farmers there are? If it is, I am going to say that not only will the situation in respect of agriculture be a deplorable one and one which will get worse and worse but it will also take the Canadian economy down with it. I can truly say that we have a situation which is perhaps comparable with that of the 1920's.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I have not sufficient time. I have less than 15 minutes. If it were an intelligent question or a more intelligent one than that which was asked this afternoon, I should be quite happy to answer it.

Mr. Speaker, the Globe and Mail in an editorial of August 3, 1955, has this to say. It states that in the United States during the 1920's the agricultural situation was comparable to the situation we have in Canada today. It first took place in one sector of the economy and gradually grew until we had the calamity in the late twenties. That could very well happen again. I am not predicting it. I do not want it to happen. But if more attention is not paid to that sort of thing, it might well happen again in Canada.

In addition, I want to refer to the falling sales of farm machinery. This article is taken from the Ottawa Journal of August 15, 1955. It illustrates the fact that the farmer has been forced into mechanization in order to increase his efficiency. All during that time he has had to buy on a highly inflated market, paying those prices which we have had gradually increasing since 1945 when this government threw price controls out the window, allowed prices to go up and allowed these machine companies to gouge the farmers for all the traffic would bear, or indeed for all their pockets would bear. This article points out that in 1954 sales of all farm implements in Canada dropped 38 per cent or more than $92 million, and that even the sale of parts went down 14 per cent.

This situation can mean only one thing, Mr. Speaker. It means that if the situation continues we are going to have less efficient operation. It is going to mean that the farmer will not be able to continue to operate with the efficiency that he has shown in the past. The article continues, showing that it is going to mean fewer jobs in other parts of Canada. For instance, it says that the sales in Saskatchewan have dropped by more than one-half. It also shows that the people working in plants manufacturing agricultural equipment in eastern Canada have fewer jobs than they had in the better years prior to 1952.

Then again we have the Montreal Gazette coming to our rescue in a way by trying to point out to this government the situation in respect of farm income. I refer to the Gazette for October 20, 1955. It shows that the income is now down to the 1947 level. Surely all hon. members can understand the plight of the farmer when this sort of thing prevails. It indicates that the farmer is receiving less and less income while many of the segments of our economy are enjoying greater prosperity. It is not fair or just when we have—as we have in Canada today—about 20 per cent of our people working on farms, engaged in agriculture, and receiving somewhat less than 8 per cent of the national income.

Again we have the price squeeze spoken of in many editorials in papers across this country. The Winnipeg Free Press points out that this government has not seen fit in any way to effect some assistance to the farmer. In an article of September 17, 1955, it indicates that even with the tariffs and customs on certain farm implements, the farmer is paying one-third more than he would otherwise have to pay. We in Canada are living in an economy which is in some measure protected. By that I mean that industry is protected. However, the farmer is obliged in many cases to pay for his farm machinery and parts one-third more than he would otherwise be obliged to pay. This article goes on to say that the sales of parts in Manitoba in 1954 dropped by 12 per cent from the 1953 figures and that parts sales in Saskatchewan dropped by 30 per cent.

This situation affects our whole western economy. It affects our merchants and of course it affects our municipalities as well as our everyday living. It is a matter about which we are tremendously concerned. The truth is that we have a depressed farm income.

The Windsor Star comes to the rescue of the farmer and tries to point out to the people what is happening. Surely this government reads these things and should know them. It indicates that Professor K. A. H. Buckley of the economics department of the University of Saskatchewan says that Canada is suffering an economic problem with regard to agriculture. It goes on to say this:

> That being the case, the Canadian government is riding along with the wheat problem, hoping something will turn up.

These are facts, Mr. Speaker. They are not something concocted by any C.C.F. group in this country. I think this government should measure up to its responsibility at this time. In the Ottawa Citizen of December 22, 1955, it is said that farm income has dropped 23 per cent in the last four years. Mr. H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, states this and he has this observation to make:

"How would anyone else like to take a 25 per cent salary cut?" he asked. "We are not hollering blue ruin or depression, but now is the time when the downward trend must be checked."

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we of this party hope that this government will take some of these statements seriously and that they will do something in respect of the farm problem.

It is true that Saskatchewan is the hardest hit of all the prairie provinces. I have here an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of September 17, 1955, and which indicates that in the first half of 1955 farm income was cut by $30 million. You can see what that means to our Saskatchewan economy. We are not asking for something unreasonable, Mr. Speaker. But when the Canadian economy is rather buoyant and when we have corporation profits as they are today as indicated in the Financial Post, we think we should have the type of policy which will fit the situation and result in building this nation from coast to coast, giving equity and justice to all our people.

I have here a clipping from the Toronto Star of October 7, 1955, indicating that the profits of corporations were 27 per cent higher for the second quarter of that year and that they rose 22·6 per cent over the $664 million for the corresponding period the previous year, according to the bureau of statistics. I am happy to know that industry is doing well but I think we can have policies of justice. I think we can have policies which will give fairness and equity to all our people. This year the farm people have worked and provided foodstuffs—as they have done in the last five years—not only for this country but for a hungry world. We find them today with their bins full of wheat. In the last two months, because of the fact that they have not been able to provide proper storage facilities, thousands and thousands of bushels of wheat have been ruined by the high winds. The wheat has been blown for miles where it will never be able to be used. We have other grain stored where it is deteriorating month by month. Yet this government, with a gross national product of $26 billion, sits idly by and never lifts a hand to help our farmers build proper storage for their grain. All we are asking is that we have a second look at this problem.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

I do not believe western members who represent agricultural constituencies here are doing justice to themselves or to the people they represent. They should be coming down here and telling the true story.

I want to say a word to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang). I have farmed on my farm for over 20 years, yet it is difficult to provide proper storage because the income has never been sufficient to do it. When you have young veterans returning to these farms, who have been farming during these difficult years of rising costs, trying to store their grain and then losing their income year after year—no wonder we are mad. I made an assertion to myself that if I ever had the opportunity to come to this house I would speak for my people.

Over the years I had some military training. I took training at the royal school of artillery and enlisted for active service in the last war. I was denied the opportunity to fight for my country, but I am prepared to come down here and fight for the boys who fought over there so they will have justice. When this government sees fit to allow this kind of situation to prevail and to allow these cartels and monopolies to take out of the people the kind of profits and the kind of prices they are doing today, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that they have betrayed those boys who went to fight for the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have just been informed by the Clerk that it is now 9.45 and pursuant to the provisions of standing order No. 38, paragraph 3, it is my duty to interrupt proceedings and forthwith put the question on the amendment to the amendment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXPLANATION RELATING TO SOME PROVISIONS OF STANDING ORDER 38

Mr. Speaker: With the indulgence of the house I should like to very briefly explain two points in relation to standing order 38, paragraph 3, because several questions have been put to me. The speech of the hon. member who was in possession of the floor at 9.45 must be considered as concluded, even if he had not then spoken for forty minutes. He has, however, full right to speak on any subsequent amendment or subamendment. This is my first point.

The second point relates to time. The monitoring of the time limit imposed by standing order 31 has been controlled by the Clerks at the table. Their timekeeping is always most accurate. Therefore I relied, as hon. members may have noticed, for the exact time at which I had to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question on the subamendment this evening, not on the clocks surrounding this house, which although very well supervised may go out of order, but on the announcement by the Clerk that it was 9.45. If it meets with the approval of the house I shall be guided likewise in the future for all similar interruptions contemplated by our standing orders.

It being ten minutes after ten o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

Question No. 5—Mr. Balcom:

What were the total expenditures for the years 1954 and 1955 for national defence, including (a) service pay; (b) civilian pay; (c) supplies, including provisions; (d) other expenditures?

Answer by: Mr. Campney:

	1954 $	1955 $
(a) Service Pay and Allowances	337,922,673	365,533,282
(b) Civilian Pay	128,976,658	139,293,398
(c) Supplies, including Provisions	831,401,678	749,003,209
(d) Other Expenditures	437,420,936	508,610,618
Total Expenditures	1,735,721,945	1,762,440,507

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—TELEVISION SETS

Question No. 7—Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. Did the national film board purchase any television sets for the use of film board members or other film board employees, to be used in their own homes?
2. If so, how many?
3. What kind of sets were bought?
4. From what firm or firms were they purchased?
5. What are the names of the manufacturers of these sets?
6. What was the total cost of such sets?

Answer by: Mr. Pickersgill:

1. The national film board purchased T.V. sets for use in the homes of some of its permanent staff engaged in the production and distribution of film for television.

2. Ten.

3. Standard table models.

4. Three sets from General Electric (the manufacturer); four sets from Ahearn and Soper; one set from Service Supplies Limited; one set from R.C.A. Victor (the manufacturer); one set from Thorgood Radio Limited, London, England.

5. General Electric—3 sets; Hallicrafter—1 set; Westinghouse—3 sets; R.C.A. Victor—1 set; Pye—2 sets.

6. $2,439.71.

Note: These sets were bought by the national film board, and placed on temporary loan in the homes of certain employees engaged in the production and distribution of films for television.

The treasury board came to the conclusion that television sets should not be provided in this manner to employees by the film board, and the board therefore recovered the sets for the purpose of turning them over to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 20, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under standing order 26 to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the need for a definite government policy regarding the shipments from Canada to foreign countries of arms, military equipment and ammunition and the effective supervision thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Drew asks for leave under standing order 26 to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of public importance. He has indicated that the matter in question is the need for a definite government policy regarding the shipments from Canada to foreign countries of arms, military equipment and ammunition and the effective supervision thereof.

As the house knows, according to standing order 26, it rests with the Speaker to decide, not only whether the motion for leave is in order, but also whether in his opinion, that is, in the Speaker's opinion, he thinks that it is of urgent public importance. Under our practice, a matter of urgent public importance is understood to be one with regard to which there is urgency of debate.

I do not know to what extent I should preserve the line of reasoning that I and many of my predecessors have followed, namely, that whenever there is a debate like the one currently going on, which gives the opportunity to hon. members to discuss a wide range of subjects, motions such as this one have not been allowed. I am inclined today to follow the precedents that have been established. Today is the seventh appointed day of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. There are still three more days.

We all know that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn), who adjourned the debate last night, will shortly obtain the floor and, on the basis of our memory of what has happened in previous sessions, is likely to move another subamendment which will give hon. members the right to speak for 40 minutes each. Therefore they can debate at great length the matter proposed for this day in the motion now before me. In view of that I would submit that all those who wish to put forward points with regard to this matter can take advantage of the debate which is going to follow shortly on the amendment to the amendment about to be moved by the hon. member for New Westminster. In these circumstances I do not think I would be justified in accepting the motion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I with deference place a consideration before you. While I recognize that such a dispatch need not necessarily be taken as evidence that the facts are so, the Canadian Press carries a dispatch this morning that there has been a permit issued for the shipment of 25-pounder shells out of Canada to an area where there is disturbance at the present time and that the permit order is dated since the disturbance actually began. Having regard to that and having regard to the fact that there is an incompleted order for aircraft of value for military training purposes, if nothing else, I submit it would be advisable that there should be an opportunity to deal with so important a subject as this without further delay. That was the reason for putting forward this proposal.

Mr. Speaker: We must be realistic about this matter. The hon. member cannot do anything else but debate the matter named in his motion. As soon as questions on the orders of the day are disposed of the hon. member for New Westminster will be able to speak for 40 minutes. Then the Leader of the Opposition may speak immediately following him and may deal with the subject named in his motion. That is why when we are considering urgency of debate we must bear in mind the fact that whenever a debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne or a debate on a motion to go into supply is under way the range of subjects that can be covered is very wide and great latitude is offered. Therefore it has been the consistent policy of Speakers as far as I can remember not to accept these motions in the circumstances in which we find ourselves today. Would the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway like to help me in this instance?

Mr. MacInnis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but I am afraid I shall not be able to help you. I rather think that the Leader of the Opposition is in a strong position in raising this question this morning. You have stated that the Leader of the Opposition can present his views after the hon. member for New Westminster has finished. That is true enough, but what is more important than a statement in this regard by the Leader of the Opposition is that we should have a statement from the government. In a debate such as that on the speech from the throne there is no compulsion on the Secretary of State for External Affairs or any other member of the government to make any reply after the Leader of the Opposition has made his speech. In my opinion that is the point of this whole matter. I should like to see you allow this motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harris: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I have never heard it suggested in this house—although I have not been here so very long—that a motion of this kind would be entertained by Your Honour when a general debate of this nature was going on. Indeed, I have heard it said many times that it would not be entertained for the obvious reason that these general debates give the opportunity for discussion of any subject that anyone wants to raise.

On the point made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) may I point out that if it is open to an hon. member, in the course of this debate, to speak on any subject on which he may choose to speak, surely it is equally open to the government to declare its position if it so chooses. Under these circumstances I can see no point in not supposing that this whole matter could be disposed of by discussion during the course of this debate. Whether or not the hon. member who has moved the adjournment of the debate should raise this matter by way of a subamendment is a matter of opinion for him to decide. As I said before, it has never been in the contemplation of any of the parties, so far as I know, that on this occasion a motion of this kind could be entertained.

Mr. Drew: Since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has mentioned this matter, I should like to point out that the key words in the statement were that the government may reply if it chooses to do so. Our point is that it does not choose to give us the information that we should have and that a debate of this kind would call upon the government to give a statement of policy with regard to something that is of great concern as it is related to the whole question of our relationship with other nations at an extremely important time in the world's history.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, earlier in this session the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) asked for a specific debate on external affairs. In his absence the other day and in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I said that we would have that debate within two, three or four days after the conclusion of this debate. It was my understanding that on that occasion these matters could be aired. There is no question of the government's not choosing to declare their position. We certainly will do so. We are quite proud of our record and we are prepared to defend it at any time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, since the minister has referred to his statement, I would point out that prior to his making this statement the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had assured me personally of a debate on external affairs.

An hon. Member: What more do you want?

Mr. Drew: I would ask the Prime Minister if, in the meantime, he will assure us that there will be no further shipment of arms or equipment from Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I think it is quite proper for me, Mr. Speaker, to give the assurance that we consider very carefully at all times any request for anything that can be of war service or armament service and that at the present time we are as much concerned about the situation in the Middle East as is any hon. member of the house; and that there will be no shipments for that area pending the debate on the matter in the House of Commons.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I say that not only would there have been an opportunity in the debate on external affairs to discuss this matter that my hon. friend has suggested, but it was also my intention, after discussing the matter with my colleagues, to anticipate this debate and make a statement to the house on this particular subject on Monday or Tuesday next.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure we all appreciate what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has said. It is a little bit better than the offer made by the Minister of Finance in that we shall get a statement next week rather than the week after next. However, it seems to me that in this matter there is immediacy—a real urgency—that calls for discussion today.

I should like to submit for Your Honour's consideration a new procedural point which I think has arisen because of one of the changes we have made in the rules. Your Honour suggests that so long as debate on the address is going on and provided that new amendments or subamendments are made, any hon. member may enter the debate and speak on any question such as this. Your Honour is referring to various precedents of that nature, but those precedents relate to a period when there was unlimited time for the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. There is now a ten-day limit. It may be technically correct to say that any member could rise on the supposed subamendment by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) and speak on this question. The fact of the matter is that there are only so many days left and many members who have already spoken who might wish to speak on this question would feel that they would not be fair to other members of the house if they were to speak a second time before all members have had a chance to speak once. I suggest therefore to Your Honour that in considering this situation, before you rely too completely on the precedents of the past, with some of which I do not agree anyway, you consider the new situation created by the time limit now fixed for the debate on the address.

Mr. Speaker: Well, no matter what time limit has been placed on the debate on the address in reply there is no change as to what kind of vehicle the debate on the address in reply is. It is one which consists of giving hon. members an opportunity to discuss anything coming within the administration of this parliament. If while this debate is going on by virtue of a particular announcement made a few days ago by the acting leader of the house if hon. members wish to put the debate on the address aside from time to time and use standing order No. 26 as a vehicle to discuss questions of actuality because they do not wish that day to be counted within the ten-day period for the debate on the address, I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the matter will have to be very seriously considered. I am not prepared today to give way and put aside all the decisions that have been rendered by my predecessors and myself, but I will consider it.

It does pose a problem, I realize that. It seems that before I do put aside all the precedents to which I have referred, I should like to give it some more thought. It does pose a problem. It seems to me that if the members of a party do consider that a particular matter needs to be debated on a particular day, then those who are interested in making, let us say, constituency speeches, could give way to those who want to take part in the debate on the matter named in the motion. There are other opportunities during the session, such as supply motions and the budget debate, for discussion of a wide range of subjects.

Now, are we going to allow the motion under standing order No. 26 to be a vehicle for questions of actuality and to displace a debate so wide as the one in which we are currently engaged at the moment? The same situation will obtain with regard to supply motions and the budget debate. Therefore, I think the hon. member will agree with me that before I change the practice I will have to give the matter very careful consideration.

Mr. Drew: Since Your Honour has indicated you propose to give this very careful consideration, may I point out that there is a very marked distinction between a motion of this kind and a motion in regard to a subject of general concern. When Your Honour suggests that the matter could be dealt with on a motion to go into supply, I would point out that the house has been informed by the government that three aircraft are actually now on the way—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: —to the Middle East; that 12 of the 15 aircraft ordered remain to be shipped; that certain shells are still to be shipped, and the purpose was to deal with this before that took place. The situation would in no way be met by waiting for a purely academic debate on the motion to go into supply.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have an opportunity during the day. The argument that has been made by both himself and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) is that if this motion were allowed today it would compel a member of the government to give the government's views on the subject matter. Surely, they will both agree that ministers are not precluded from doing exactly the same thing today during the debate on the address.

PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN ISSUING PERMITS FOR EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, reverting to the earlier discussion between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister, would the Prime Minister tell the house whether the issue of export permits covering aircraft, explosives or other war material is decided at the cabinet level or on the basis of certain principles and, if so, what are those principles and when were they first communicated to the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Matters concerning the acceptance or otherwise of orders for any of that type of material are discussed at cabinet level, but to my knowledge no orders are accepted before information has been communicated to those with whom it is sought to place the orders and the circumstances under which the permit could be given. The question of whether or not a permit could be granted is considered in the light of the situation and the repercussions it might have upon the situation with respect to peace in the world. In the discussions great consideration is given to the information we have from our allies in respect of similar matters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was the decision made regarding the export permit for aircraft for Egypt? At approximately what date did the cabinet determine that question?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It was some time in June of last year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How is it that when the question was asked at the beginning of the session none of the ministers seemed to know anything about it? How is it they knew nothing about it?

Mr. Fleming: I guess they were not at the cabinet meeting.

[Later:]

Mr. Drew: In view of the answer just given by the Prime Minister with regard to decisions on these matters all being made by the government, can the Prime Minister tell the house if a decision has been reached by the government with regard to the dismantling of field artillery and the sale of parts thereof as scrap to any agencies either inside or outside Canada?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I hope that we will have a full statement on Monday, but I can give the hon. member the assurance that no scrap is sold to any but Canadian consumers and that no permits are given for the exportation by them of any parts of military equipment.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION IN ECONOMIC FEASIBILITY SURVEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson)—

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Brooks: Who has the floor?

Mr. Speaker: This is a very difficult position for me to find myself in. Since both hon. members are from New Brunswick I would imagine they might have the same question.

Mr. Brooks: I was up first.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should ask the question.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, I should like—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harris: May I point out to Your Honour that when the Leader of the Opposition presented his motion the hon. member was on his feet, and it was not until recently that the hon. member for Royal rose to his feet.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, I might say that I was also on my feet at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not always the case, but usually when we call the orders of the day it has been the practice to give a member of the opposition the floor first to ask his question. The Leader of the Opposition did not ask a question. He made a motion under standing order 26, which is a different proposition. It is up to hon. members to move that Mr. So and so be now heard, by virtue of standing order 29. But in order to clear the matter and make an issue of it at this time, if necessary, I will give the floor to the hon. member for Royal.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, when the orders of the day were called I rose to my feet to ask a question. I was on my feet before the Leader of the Opposition took the floor. I feel I have every right to expect the privilege of being permitted to ask a question. Since a member of the opposition has already had the floor, I feel a government member should be given the privilege of asking the question I have in mind.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question is based on a Canadian Press dispatch from Washington to the effect that the House of Representatives today approved a $3 million survey to determine the cost and economic feasibility of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Brooks: My question is: Is it the intention of the federal government to join the United States in the cost of the proposed survey into the economic feasibility of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of my hon. friend, I should first say that last evening the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) approached me with a press dispatch which had just come off the ticker on this subject and asked me if I would reply to a question by him this morning. Perhaps I can now reply to both questions.

Mr. Drew: Now that you have given him a credit mark.

Mr. Pearson: The question, Mr. Speaker, concerns a decision taken yesterday by the House of Representatives in the United States of America to go ahead with an economic survey of the Passamaquoddy project, a decision which had previously been taken by the Senate in Washington. In reply to the specific question as to whether or not we are participating in this matter I can only say what I said to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) who brought this question up in July of the last session.

Mr. Brooks: As I also did.

Mr. Pearson: As my hon. friend has done too. I said to the house at that time that if as a result of the passage of this resolution—at that time the resolution had passed the Senate but not the House of Representatives—the United States government wishes to request the international joint commission to undertake a survey, the Canadian government would be prepared to give sympathetic consideration to a proposal for a joint reference to the commission by both governments. A joint reference would have the effect of indicating that Canada is interested and cooperative and not merely giving reluctant consent.

Mr. Brooks: Would you answer a supplementary question? Is the Canadian government paying part of the cost of this survey?

Mr. Pearson: Not at the present time. That matter would only arise if a reference were made to the international joint commission.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

METHOD OF PAYMENT OF CHRISTMAS OVERTIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is the Post Office Department giving consideration to the request of postal workers in various cities across Canada that the overtime they worked during the Christmas rush period be paid for in wages rather than by being granted time off in the month of January?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the method of compensation for overtime performed by postal employees during the Christmas rush is the same as that which would apply to the employees of any department. It is a matter of government policy which is determined by order in council.

That order covers employees in all departments.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO SPACE AVAILABLE IN ELEVATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister present the latest figures concerning the amount of empty space now available in terminal elevators?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I was able to obtain those figures from Winnipeg since I had notice of my hon. friend's question. I might say that the rated capacity, in other words the licensed capacity, is hardly a practical figure. If an elevator were filled to its rated capacity it would be unable to salvage any out of condition grain. There must be some limit. We regard the effective capacity as being approximately 10 per cent less than the rated capacity. Using the effective capacity as the figure we have the following:

Interior terminals	700,000	bushels
Pacific coast terminals
Vancouver-New Westminster	8,200,000	"
Victoria	400,000	"
Prince Rupert	700,000	"
Churchill	600,000	"
Fort William-Port Arthur	34,800,000	"
Eastern terminals
Bay and upper lake	6,100,000	"
Lower lake and upper St. Lawrence	1,200,000	"
Lower St. Lawrence	4,000,000	"
Maritimes	1,500,000	"
	58,200,000	"

As far as the eastern terminals other than in the maritimes are concerned there is no possibility of filling them after the close of navigation. They are filled from the lakes and shipments are constantly being made to the eastern Atlantic seaports for export. The unused capacity in the eastern terminals will grow steadily until at the opening of navigation these elevators should be empty.

REPORTED LOSS OF SALES BECAUSE OF SHIPPING POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Have any sales of wheat or other grains been lost because of unavailability of grain in shipping position or have any complaints been received from Canadian customers that grain of the kind and variety they wished to buy was not available in shipping position?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would need to make a very careful study of that matter. Many sales of grain are made every day. To say categorically that no sale has been lost because grain was not in shipping position is something I cannot do. I dare say sales have been lost. I do not know of any Canadian customer who has not been able to buy grain whenever he wished to place the order. We have always had sufficient stocks to supply Canadian customers.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF FAUTEUX COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister tell us when he expects to have the report of the Fauteux commission on correctional services which last July he hoped might be made in October, and will he lay on the table the documents containing the terms of reference of that commission?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question. So far as the presentation of the report is concerned, I was talking to Mr. Justice Fauteux recently, and I think that the best I can say, conservatively, at the present time—

Mr. Fleming: That is the way to talk.

Mr. Garson: —is that it will be made during the present session of parliament. With regard to the instructions, perhaps the quickest way to deal with that question is to read into the record my letter to Mr. Justice Fauteux, the chairman of the committee. This letter is dated at Ottawa, December 11, 1953. It reads as follows:

> This will confirm the arrangement under which you have been good enough to undertake to act as a member of an informal committee established to investigate and report upon the principles and procedures followed in the remission service of the Department of Justice in connection with the exercise of clemency and to recommend what changes, if any, should be made in those principles and procedures.
> As I think you know, I do not propose to place restrictions of any kind upon your field of inquiry. Rather, it is my hope that members of the committee would find it possible to examine the entire field of remission and parole and, after a full inquiry, report to me their findings and recommendations.
>
> I may say that the officials and facilities of the Department of Justice will be available for the assistance of members of the committee in connection with the inquiry. Arrangements will, of course, be made for the payment of your transportation and living expenses while you are engaged in this work away from your ordinary place of residence.
> In conclusion I wish to thank you again for undertaking to perform this public service.

Identical letters were sent to the other three members of the committee, Mr. J. A. Edmison, assistant to the principal of Queen's University of Kingston, Mr. W. B. Common, Q.C., the director of public prosecutions for the province of Ontario and Mr. Joseph McCulley, the warden of Hart House, University of Toronto.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask a supplementary question? Does the government consider that the words in that letter, which I believe are "remission" and "parole", cover the question that was under discussion last July, namely probation?

Mr. Garson: I think, Mr. Speaker, that the words "parole" and "remission" should be considered in connection with the second paragraph of the letter, which perhaps I had better repeat:

> I do not propose to place restrictions of any kind upon your field of inquiry. Rather, it is my hope that members of the committee would find it possible to examine the entire field of remission and parole and, after a full inquiry, report to me their findings and recommendations.

That would certainly include all those branches of probation which are tied in very closely with the question of remission and parole.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? In view of the fact that doubt appears to exist on this point, would he be prepared now to clarify the terms of reference to the committee and assure the committee that the question of probation is now to be included within the scope of its inquiry?

Mr. Garson: I think my hon. friend, like myself, is a lawyer and I am sure he would know the principles of constitutional law well enough to recognize the difficulty we would have in the federal field in setting up a commission of inquiry to investigate that which comes under the provincial field of jurisdiction. I think he would agree with me that we could not go any further with propriety than we have gone in the letter I have just read, and that really this committee can examine where the matters of remission and parole touch upon probation, but we can hardly authorize a federal committee of inquiry to investigate into another provincial field of jurisdiction.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I point out that the Archambault report, in my recollection—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member now is beginning to debate the answer. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member will come back later. There are other members who have been standing two or three times in order to ask a question.

[Later:]

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice? Will the minister, if he thinks there is any constitutional difficulty in dealing with the question of probation by the present committee, communicate with the provinces and get their concurrence, which I am sure would be forthcoming?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, during the whole course of this inquiry, I have had no reason to suppose that there was any difficulty whatsoever in this regard. Under the terms of reference, which were deliberately made quite unrestricted, I think the committee is quite able to examine into the whole field of federal jurisdiction over remission and parole and also into those fields of provincial jurisdiction over probation which are related to these federal fields I have named.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION —APPRAISAL RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works? Is the recent change in the appraisal value in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation houses resulting in a reduction in the amount of the down payment on these houses, and if so by how much?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the change in the basic appraisal rates is in accordance with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation practice of periodically adjusting these rates to changes in construction costs. The revision to which the hon. member now refers came into effect on December 15 last and has application to loans approved since that date. The full effect of the change on selling price cannot be seen at this early date.

The revision upward of the basic rates will result in an increase in loan, and if builders continue to sell at the same price as they have been, the down payment will be reduced by the amount by which the loan is increased.

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN COST OF EXTENSION TO PEACE RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, in view of the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday that ships are awaiting rail shipments of wheat, owing to the shortage of box cars. Will the government reconsider the offer of assistance in the building of the Pacific Great Eastern railway, in view of the fact that this railway will shorten the haul from the Peace river area to tidewater by half the distance, in other words, that one box car on the short haul will do the work of two?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I announced in this house on June 3 last that the federal government was prepared to pay a subsidy of $25,000 per mile for not more than 50 miles of a northward extension of the Pacific Great Eastern from Prince George. I stated that the government did not believe a through line to the Peace river valley was economically justified at that time. I pointed out, in support of that contention, that the Peace river area already has rail access through the Northern Alberta railways and that, although this railway taps the greater part of the area, it does not obtain a sufficient volume of traffic to result in profitable operations.

Great developments are taking place in our northern area, but I do not think that even the renowned productivity of the Peace river area has increased in less than one year to a degree where reconsideration of the offer made last June would be necessary.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED CUT-BACK IN ORDERS AT CANADA CAR—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has there been any cut-back in orders for box cars placed with Canada Car at Fort William and a consequent lay-off of a large number of employees at that plant? In view of our need of both box cars and employment, would the minister look into the matter?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can tell my hon. friend that there has not been an order for box cars placed with Canada Car at Fort William since 1912.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister look into the reasons for the lay-off of employees at that plant? If there has been a lay-off, why not put them to work producing box cars?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The plant was originally built to build box cars, but as I say, since 1912 it has not built a box car. Today it is not in a position to build box cars. I may say that since that particular plant is adjacent to my riding I am keeping a very careful watch on the employment situation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXCESS SUPPLY OF 25-POUNDER SHELLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house what supplies of 25-pounder shells in excess of Canadian requirements are now in Canada?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Not offhand, Mr. Speaker.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 19, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset compliment you on the capable way in which you conduct the office of Speaker of the house. I should also like to compliment the members of the cabinet who show such dexterity and capability in side-stepping the issues at hand. If I may say so, I am almost inclined to say that they show as much dexterity and skill as did the New Westminster soccer club in winning the dominion championship last year. I should like at this time to ease the mind of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) by announcing that it is my intention to submit an amendment which will give him the opportunity to discuss the question he wanted to discuss, and after the present debate is finished possibly he could continue its discussion by means of such a motion as he has in mind.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley), in the course of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne, said in effect that she could not understand why so much valuable time should be taken up by member after member repeating what had been said in other words by many other members. I hope she will forgive me therefore if I add my congratulations to the others with which she has been showered because through her I wish to congratulate the women of Canada and the constituents whom she has the honour to represent. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) on the capable way in which he conducted himself, and also the newly elected members of the house who I am sure will represent their constituencies ably and well.

During the course of the past two years when I have been in the house it has been my privilege to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) the need for a secondary airport to supplement the Vancouver international airport. It was with great pleasure therefore that I read the press release on January 12 that he had seen fit to accept the advice of some of his colleagues and possibly accept the thought I had in mind, that the White Rock airport would be a good secondary airport. The choice is well taken because the White Rock airport will lend itself to expansion. It is off the main air routes and is fog free. It is away from any military air base so that there probably will not be any danger of a tragedy similar to the one that occurred at Moose Jaw last year. It is also a short distance from Vancouver.

I wish to express gratitude to the minister and to anyone else who may have had anything whatsoever to do with the final decision that White Rock should be the secondary airport. I was pleased to see that the minister indicated in his news release that there was need for examination into the possibility of finding another site suitable for small craft. I trust such a site will be found before all the possible sites are used for other purposes.

During the past few days the discussion in this debate has been concerned principally with the question of grain surpluses. Other surpluses were also mentioned. The question of cheese was raised by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) referred to the question of dairy products.

The hon. member for Wellington-Huron (Mr. Howe) mentioned butter. Yesterday the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) dealt with potatoes. One might ask what brings about this cry. The real reason behind it, Mr. Speaker, is that the farmers have a right to expect a fair share of the national income. As pertinent to that matter, I have here a compilation of some figures respecting percentages of total national income received by farmers by years. It is not my intention to read all these figures but I should like you to note that during the years 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919, when the farmers represented about 30 per cent of the population of Canada, their share of the national income was 30 per cent. From 1926 to 1928 the number of farmers was less than that—it would be from 25 per cent to 30 per cent—and their share of the income dropped to the point where it was from 17 per cent to 14·6 per cent. During the depression years from 1929 to 1939 the share of the national income that the farmers received was reduced tremendously, to an all time low of a 4·1 per cent in 1933 while the farm population represented a little better than 20 per cent of Canada's over-all population. During this past year the share of the national income received by the farmers was 6·7 per cent. Yet they represent 20 per cent of Canada's population today. In effect that situation would indicate that the share of the national income received by the farmers compares approximately with what they received in 1934, which was a grave depression year.

During the war years, because of price stabilization and price control as set down by the government, the share of the national income received by the farmers rose to approximately 11 per cent. As was explained yesterday by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), the reason for that situation was that the farmer was promised a better deal after the war in order to compensate for the low price he was accepting for his commodities. Since the war, of course, we have had a continual decline in farm income with the result that I mentioned earlier, namely that today the farmers are in effect receiving about the same percentage of the national income as they were receiving during the depression year of 1934.

As far as my riding is concerned the problem is this. While there happens to be a grain terminal in my riding, it is not my desire to talk about grain at this time although I must say I could do so. The problem in my particular riding in this instance is that of the potato grower. He is not getting his fair share of the national income. One might say: Is this a national problem? It is definitely a national problem because, on reading the report made by a committee set up to study the question of potatoes last year, I discover that the potato industry is of major importance in every province in Canada except the province of Newfoundland. Therefore these people whose livelihood is so greatly affected should be given the consideration to which they are entitled. This particular committee, which was set up last year at the behest of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), was to hear representations but was not to make recommendations. The hearings were set for June of last year in the city of Ottawa and representations were made by the various potato growing groups across the nation. I would draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, pages 60 and 61 of their report. Eleven conclusions are arrived at. All of them are reasonable and sound. However, I would say that two of the conclusions definitely carry with them an inference or a recommendation which possibly affected the government's decision not to take any action on the tariff question last year. I would draw to your attention particularly conclusion No. 8 on page 61, which is as follows:

> Geared by force of geography to reliance upon export markets—whether elsewhere in Canada or abroad—the industry in Prince Edward Island is very greatly dependent for its continuance upon the demand at home and abroad for its certified seed potatoes.

That statement is perfectly correct but we have here an inference in the conclusion:

> Loss of its seed-potato quota in the United States would be but short of disastrous for the island and only somewhat less so for New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker, the inference is that by the setting up of a tariff the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island would lose their seed potato market. In reply to that contention I would say that the potato growers of New Brunswick and of Prince Edward Island have a high quality seed as well as a disease-free seed. That is the actual reason for the American people buying seed potatoes from them. They buy them because they need them, not because they particularly want to buy seed potatoes from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

The other inference is included in conclusion No. 10 of the report which is as follows:

> While no rigid generalization can be made, because of occasional and quite abnormal variations from the rule, such imports of table potatoes from the United States as do occur, appear to be attracted to this market by higher domestic prices which in turn frequently reflect a short crop in Canada.

That part of the statement is true. However, here is the inference:

> So called "new potatoes"—imported into this country during the spring and early summer months—command a premium because they are new; and probably would enter whether or not they faced a customs duty at the border.

The suggestion then is that there would be no value in putting a tariff duty in effect because these new potatoes would come in no matter what the price might be, and that there would be no stopping them. Those inferences should not be included in the report and the government should not have taken them into consideration. However, they apparently must have done so, the facts being what they are in the potato industry today. There is need for some action by the government in respect of protecting the potato grower.

The developments since the hearings were held in Ottawa in June—and there were several—are as follows. The first was definite action taken by United States authorities in respect of the size of potatoes that would be allowed to come into their country and which affected our market. I wish to thank the government for taking action on this particular question and bringing our regulations in line with those of the United States.

There is, however, another question which is more important and which affects the industry more greatly. I refer to the announcement made by secretary of agriculture Benson of the United States. On August 26 he announced that the United States department of agriculture extends financial assistance to those United States producer states which sign an agreement to show an approved plan which will eliminate, by various means, 20 per cent or more of marketable grade 2 or better potatoes. This program was to begin on September 26, 1955.

If the hon. gentlemen opposite who are from British Columbia wish to take part in this discussion, they may do so later.

An hon. Member: We never said a word.

Mr. Byrne: I was not paying attention. I do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Hahn: Diversion of grade 2 or better to starch, feed or flour was called for by the regulation.

[Mr. Hahn.]

Now, the fact of the matter in this instance is that the United States authorities were going to pay $10 a ton for the period from September 26 to December 31 last year; $8 until March 31 and $6 until June 30, 1956. In effect, this would act as a subsidy to those U.S. growers who were getting less than the normal price for their potatoes. Now, the conclusion that I must draw from this is that the assistance that was being given to the United States potato grower on potatoes diverted to these other industries was nothing more or less than a subsidy. In the retail trade this procedure is covered by the phrase, what I lose on the coffee I make up on the beans. So far as the United States grower was concerned, what he was losing on his table potato crop he was going to gain on the crop that was being diverted.

The Department of National Revenue says that this is not dumping. In reply to this particular question there is a letter dated September 20 from Mr. D. Sim, deputy minister of national revenue, at Ottawa, in which he says:

> Section 6 (A), as recently enacted by parliament, empowers the governor in council to impose an additional duty equal to the amount of subsidy on the goods, but provides that where the imported goods are also subject to special or dumping duty under section 6 (say by reason of an export subsidy)—

That is the important phrase.

> —the amount of the additional duty under section 6 (A) shall be reduced by the amount of the special or dumping duty under section 6.

The argument is that the potatoes that are being sent into Canada, while they are being exported, are not subject to this assistance because they do not come under the diversion plan. Technically, that is quite correct, but if you give a farmer $10 in another way as a bonus or anything else, that is going to make it possible for him to eventually give his potatoes away. It should be called dumping for the same reason.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in my own riding of New Westminster and the lower Fraser valley this has had a marked effect upon the potato growing industry. Last year, according to figures I have here, between June 1 and June 15, a time at which United States potatoes were being imported, the British Columbia potato growers association could only sell 197 tons of their own potatoes while United States imports amounted to 3,382 tons. From June 18 to July 2, a period when the duty was being imposed, the United States exported 1,244 tons which made a grand total of 4,626 tons of potatoes that were imported from the United States. During that time the B.C. grower could only sell 197 tons. In July the B.C. grower sold 3,482 tons and at the same time the United States exported to us some 1,327 tons. I might say that by this time the United States grower had skimmed the cream off the crop, as any person from British Columbia will recognize when they sold us 4,626 tons to July, for that is when the new potatoes come on the market and the United States growers were able to get high prices for them.

Then later, in August, the British Columbia grower was only able to sell 3,027 tons while the United States growers sold 2,805 tons. This made a total for the three months period for the B.C. grower of 6,787 tons, while the United States grower sold 8,788 tons in the same period. There is only six weeks' protection period for the potato grower in Canada. The figures were not available for the rest of the year, but the British Columbia coast marketing vegetable board had this to say in a release in October. They put out a regular bulletin, I should say, Mr. Speaker, from which this extract is taken in October, 1955:

> Imports of potatoes from the United States into the Vancouver market for the four-week period September 5 through 30th amounted to 1,455 tons. White varieties have moved fairly well up to the present date. However, it was found necessary by your board to drop the price on netted Gem potatoes by $6 per ton to be competitive with shipments being received from across the border. The Yakima market declined from $43 per ton on September 16 to $32 per ton on October 1.

Now, looking at the figure very quickly, one would say the United States market declined by $11 per ton, but the United States grower was getting a $10 subsidy for every ton of potatoes he was diverting at that time into another field. His market, therefore, declined by only $1 per ton, but the B.C. grower at that time had his market drop by $6 per ton in order to be competitive. The additional loss suffered by the United States grower would be made up by diverting 20 per cent of his other potatoes into the United States feed and flour business. This is one of my reasons for saying that this diversion scheme the United States has invoked at this time is, in effect, a subsidy. It is one of the arguments into which I would ask the minister to look very closely.

The December bulletin issued by this same organization, the British Columbia coast vegetable marketing board, had this to say:

> Closer to the border, the growers directly across the line have this past week approached the trade in Vancouver . . . offering to sell their No. 1 Gem potatoes at $2 below the prevailing Vancouver board price. Your board had declined to reduce the price of No. 1 Gems as it felt that these shippers would only again cut below us.

You can only go so far in reducing the price of your potatoes or any other commodity. You can hope that something will happen that will protect your market, and possibly you will be free to sell at a later time. Fortunately, that did happen for the B.C. potato grower in November. Heavy frosts in the Pacific northwest, which unfortunately wiped out almost every nurseryman and every small fruit grower, had a good effect so far as the B.C. potato grower was concerned. As a result of the frost it was not possible for the United States potatoes to come into the B.C. market, and the B.C. grower was able to sell his own potatoes in the lower mainland area of British Columbia.

Imports into Canada for the first seven months of 1955, as compared with 1954, are as follows. In 1954 imports amounted to 1,057,947 cwt., and in 1955 they amounted to 1,987,089 cwt.

Mr. Campbell: What about export?

Mr. Hahn: I have not the figure for export, I am sorry. However, our exports are quite negligible because they consist of seed potatoes which would go to the United States in any event because they are short of quality seed. The authority for that statement will be found in this tariff board hearing. The fact is that in 1954 we imported only about one million cwt. of potatoes, and in 1955 we imported very nearly two million cwt. In other words, last year the American potato grower was able to sell twice as many potatoes in our country as he had done theretofore. Naturally, that has its effect on the Canadian potato market. Not only is the subsidy having an effect on the price and the sales we make, but this matter of importing potatoes in such heavy quantities is bound to affect the potato grower in Canada.

There was an editorial in the British Columbian of January 17, 1956—I may say that the British Columbian is a daily newspaper within the area I represent—which had this to say:

> The British Columbia coast vegetable marketing board and growers in British Columbia have attempted to bring the intolerable situation to the attention of the federal authorities for several years.

This is the matter of tariffs on potatoes. The article goes on to say:

> Coast producers do not think the starch subsidy is the answer,—

That is the starch subsidy that the Minister of Agriculture pointed out yesterday we were putting into effect. I continue:

> —and remark that the hope such a subsidy "will help maintain prices across Canada is merely wishful thinking on the part of the federal department of agriculture inasmuch as Canadian prices are governed by the heavy imports from the United States whose product often enters Canada at below actual cost of production of either United States or Canadian growers."

The grower in the United States has a tremendous market for his goods, and the small amount that he sends to Canada does not affect his market at all; it does not affect his wealth. He is just getting rid of a small surplus. On the other hand, the Canadian producer finds that the potatoes that come in from the United States affect his price and his market a great deal.

The speeches that were made in the past few days with respect to surpluses were actually unwarranted, although I will say they were necessary. I say they were unwarranted for the reason that if the government were to examine into the possibility of the two-price system that was proposed by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), I am satisfied that most of the economic ills in the agricultural and primary producing fields would be adequately looked after.

As I indicated earlier, it is my intention to move an amendment to the amendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Yuill):

That the amendment be amended by inserting after the words "by reason of", the following:

1. Their failure to adopt and implement agricultural and marketing policies designed effectively to keep farm cash income in Canada at a just and economic level.

2. Their utter neglect of any responsibility with regard to assisting the provinces to maintain a satisfactorily broad tax base through adequate development of their resources, and—

The amendment as amended would then read thus:

We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of

1. Their failure to adopt and implement agricultural and marketing policies designed effectively to keep farm cash income in Canada at a just and economic level.

2. Their utter neglect of any responsibility with regard to assisting the provinces to maintain a satisfactorily broad tax base through adequate development of their resources, and their indifference, inertia, and lack of leadership in the face of serious national problems and their disregard of the rights of parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house.

Mr. MacDougall: That is a good one. The hon. member has everything in it but baling wire.

Mr. Hahn: Give me time, and I will have it in there, too. There are ranchers in the country who could tell you something about the price of baling wire, and perhaps it should be included.

I would agree with the hon. member for Jasper-Edson who the day before yesterday raised the question of the sale of butter. His proposal and his method of disposing of it through those who are in need of social security, such as the aged, the blind, the disabled, the war veterans, and others, are worthy of consideration. I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that if we are to give something to the people behind the iron curtain we should not give away our butter. Let us give away margarine and let us keep the butter for the people in Canada. Let us sell the butter to the people of Canada at the price at which we sell margarine. I am satisfied that the people of Canada would enjoy butter, and some of them would get in the position where they would begin to use it again.

I have included in my amendment to the amendment a matter having to do with the taxation field. The letter that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) tabled the other day contained new proposals having to do with taxation under which the provinces were to get 10 per cent of the income tax, 9 per cent of an unstated corporation tax, and 50 cents out of every dollar of succession duty. The objective is certainly a good one, namely, to bring the tax income of the poorer provinces up to that of the richer provinces. However, I would have the house recognize that the richer provinces are relinquishing the three major fields of taxation on a rental basis. If those provinces are to continue to produce and develop their resources and to be in a position to keep pouring dollars into the coffers of the federal government, then it will be necessary for them to receive more income to keep the rest of Canada happy.

In my province we would have no objection to assisting those other provinces, if we felt for a moment that the federal authorities were not, through their bungling and interfering methods, ruining the chances of some of those other provinces of advancing. Let me take our own case. In British Columbia last year we had an instance of the federal authorities interfering with our river development, as proposed by the government of British Columbia. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair), as well as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage), thought that we should divert water from the Columbia river into the Fraser. Because the Columbia river would come under the authority of the federal government, it left only one river over which the provincial government would have authority, namely, the Fraser river.

The moment that they started talking about putting a dam on the Fraser there was an objection from the Minister of Fisheries to the effect that that should not be done. I would agree with the Minister of Fisheries, because the salmon industry is vital to our country and must be protected. However, I would disagree with him, as I did earlier, with regard to diverting the excess water of the Columbia into the Fraser river. I say, let us go ahead and develop the Columbia river, as proposed by the provincial government a year ago. If we do that, then we shall have more tax dollars to pour into this government to help assist some of the other provinces.

This was not the only instance of interference in our province or in any other province. Not so many years ago, when the Alberta government enunciated a gas export policy, it was interfered with by the federal authorities. They would not agree with the export of gas so that the province of Alberta in turn could use the dollars they would get from the United States purchasers of that gas to develop industries within the province.

If we are to build up this nation, then we must have more dollars. We cannot for one moment hope that the people of Canada will have sufficient dollars to build up industries and keep them operating without being permitted to export their surplus production. The socialistic attitude, expressed earlier by the leader of the C.C.F. party, of denouncing the United States dollars that are being poured into this country, is entirely false and wrong.

I believe it is absolutely impractical and impossible to think that we in Canada could build 125,000 homes in a year and carry on all the other development that is required. Where would we get the millions of dollars for the St. Lawrence seaway project, the millions required for building our dams, bridges and other projects in British Columbia? Within the confines of all provinces this government has demonstrated time and time again its inability to bring about a satisfactory solution to the development of our coal and gas industries and our problems of primary industry. It has failed to put them on a good and sound financial basis. This has been the cause of much of the difficulty in which we find ourselves today. It has ceased development in many instances.

To add to the difficulty we find the change in this particular regulation respecting assistance to the various provinces is advanced for political purposes. The government has seen fit to present this proposal which would cut by $45,000 the allowance which British Columbia under ordinary circumstances is to receive, despite the fact that our province gained in population by almost 300,000 people. This just does not make sense. It does not add up.

I am aware that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has indicated that the government will rectify the situation by ensuring that no province will receive less than it did before, but why should our agreement today call for $45,000 less than what British Columbia heretofore received under the old agreement. I contend that if by proper direction this government were to encourage the development of provinces that have not they would be in the position of having.

We find, for instance, that in 1951 the Department of Defence Production issued contracts to the total amount of $5 million. I do not have the covering release with me but hon. members from British Columbia might well take note of this. An amount exceeding $5 million in government contracts was issued in 1951 in one group of which British Columbia's share was the small sum of $78,000.

Mr. Goode: Would my hon. friend permit a question? How does he prove his statement concerning the sum of $78,000? May I say that the Liberal members have been most concerned with the amount of business going to British Columbia.

Mr. Hahn: I will allow you to make your speech later. The proof of the statement is in fact that it was a release by the government of defence production contracts across Canada, which totalled $5 million, of which British Columbia's share was $78,000.

Mr. Goode: Surely the hon. member realizes that he is talking nonsense.

Mr. Hahn: The hon. member is not talking nonsense. I would be only too pleased to show you the directive.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Why do you not do something to help British Columbia? Do not interrupt so much.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hahn: I would conclude my remarks by drawing again to the attention of the government that the particular tax agreement which is being proposed at this time is one which ostensibly is advanced for political purposes to garner votes in certain parts of Canada. In effect this says to our premier, as it does to the premier of Alberta: "If you do not like it, put on your own tax agreement scheme".

That is very fine, but there is a calculated risk there and the Prime Minister knows this as well as do the premiers of Alberta and British Columbia. They are fully aware of what that calculated risk would involve. The fact is that nobody wants double taxation because it costs so much more for the individual. Businessmen realize it. Everyone recognizes the efficiency and the business acumen demonstrated by the premier of British Columbia during the past three years. He himself recognizes what this might cost.

I would ask members opposite to examine this matter closely before they find themselves facing the accusation across the dominion that they have been deliberately going out of their way to support a tax scheme which has the one object in mind of prolonging the existence of a Liberal government in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Hahn moves, seconded by Mr. Yuill, that the amendment be amended by inserting after the words "by reason of," the following:

1. Their failure to adopt and implement agricultural and marketing policies designed effectively to keep farm cash income in Canada at a just and economic level.
2. Their utter neglect of any responsibility with regard to assisting the provinces to maintain a satisfactorily broad tax base through adequate development of their resources, and—

May I say that it seems to me that the amendment to the amendment is placed at such an early point in the amendment that it gives the appearance of displacing the amendment rather than amending it.

It could probably be amended as to form in order to make it fit into the wording at a later stage of the amendment, but as it stands it would read:

We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of—

The amendment which presumably is amending the amendment then comes in. It seems to relegate the amendment to the bottom, and displaces it completely. However, I will accept it. Perhaps later we can get together and place it elsewhere. I do not wish to appear to be too meticulous about this matter but it does occur to me that it has this effect.

Mr. Hahn: Then the amendment now is as follows:

That the amendment be amended by inserting after the words "serious national problems" the following words:
"in particular, their failure to adopt and implement agricultural and marketing policies designed effectively to keep farm cash income in Canada at a just and economic level and their utter neglect of any responsibility with regard to assisting the provinces to maintain a satisfactorily broad tax base through adequate development of their resources,".

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Gingues (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, at the start of this important session, while we are on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, will you kindly allow me to join the other members of the house in offering my best wishes to you and in pointing out how able and dignified has been your chairmanship of the proceedings of this Canadian parliament. You bring to the discharge of these difficult duties remarkable tact and fairness. Your knowledge of parliamentary law and of the rules of the house, and more particularly the way in which you apply them in practice, place you in the first rank of the eminent Canadians who have preceded you in the Speaker's chair.

My most sincere good wishes also go to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) whose magnificent good health and fruitful labour are such as to forecast more happy and prosperous days for the whole Canadian people.

May I also heartily congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address (Mrs. Shipley and Mr. Laflamme). Their constituents may rightly be satisfied with them and must be proud, after seeing them at work, of having asked them to represent their constituencies in the parliament of the nation.

I rise today, Mr. Speaker, because I feel it is my duty to submit to the house and to the members of government a few practical suggestions, a few constructive ideas which, to my mind, are likely to help my electors and those of all constituencies of the country.

I must first express regret at the absence in the speech from the throne of any indication of the government's intention to propose, at this session, health insurance legislation, a measure which would add to the impressive body of social security legislation put forward by representatives of the Liberal party in recent years and later adopted by parliament. I know the feelings of the right hon. Prime Minister on the matter. I know that the members of his cabinet understand the urgency and necessity of this essential measure, that already they have long debated its advantages and foreseen the difficulty of putting it into force.

The question of a health insurance plan has been discussed in Canada for a long time.

I believe that the time has come to put the project into effect so that our people may without further delay benefit from this salutary legislation. We have now come to the point where something must be done to protect the large number of our fellow citizens who are suddenly taken sick.

When a child or a mother is sick, the cost of medical and hospital care may be heavy, but when sickness suddenly strikes the father, the head of the family, the cost of the necessary care becomes almost prohibitive. There is no use in trying to hide the truth, Mr. Speaker; at present, in a country that enjoys

Canada's prosperity, only two classes of people are in a position to get the necessary care, the needy and the rich. People who come under the public assistance act, or those who are personally well off can afford the luxury of going to the hospital. There is no alternative. As for the average Canadian, the middle class man, the one we usually call the white-collar worker, the man who has a small income, who is on a fixed salary—and that group includes the great majority of our workers and farmers—is no longer able to pay alone the cost of medical, surgical and hospital care. This fact cannot be challenged. The farsighted head of a family who has painstakingly managed to put a few dollars away for a rainy day is ruthlessly ruined when illness strikes him or anyone in his family. A few weeks in hospital and his property is mortgaged, his savings gone and he must then ask for credit and borrow money often at prohibitive rates.

Every day some good people come to my office to ask for assistance, because they cannot afford to pay their hospital bills, or those of the doctor, the surgeon or even the druggist. Hundreds of others, as I have just said, fall prey to lending institutions and have to pay interest up to 24 per cent to fill the gap left by a recent illness.

Some time ago, a respectable man whom I know very well and with whom I have been associated, a man of temperate habits, in other words a man like the hundreds of thousands of others in this country, came to me to tell of his sad experience. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to repeat this story to my colleagues as it shows the necessity of a protecting health insurance legislation, of an immediate, well drafted and truly generous act, one which, if I may say so incidentally, will allow the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) to convince his colleague, the member for Three Rivers in the Quebec legislative assembly, to co-operate for once for the general welfare of the population. He must know or rather we know that, by itself, the federal government can do nothing in that field; it has to rely on the full co-operation of all the provincial governments without exception. After this little digression I now turn to my story.

Last fall, an honest man whom I have known since childhood, a man of 60 who has worked all his life and has managed to save some $8,000—you will admit that $8,000 is not very much but it is a rather considerable amount for a man who earns a modest salary and has to save this money bit by bit—came to my office. Two years ago, his wife was taken ill. She was taken to the hospital where she underwent an operation. She was in and out of the hospital for a period of two years. He came to my office, crying like a child, to tell me that in the short period of two years all the money he had saved in order to have some security in his old age was gone, and that he was now sick himself and could no longer do his usual work. Well, Mr. Speaker, this would mean that, at 60, this man who is still young, will be unable to obtain the old age pension and will be forced, owing to sickness, to depend on public relief.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a special case, but I could mention many others which strangely resemble this one.

That is why I say, at the beginning of this 1956 session, that the time has come to enact legislation in that field.

I know that certain doctors, certain specialists—not all, fortunately—fear the inroads of health insurance legislation. Still, to my mind, the common good must prevail over particular interests. I am speaking here today in this house, on behalf of the community as a whole. When anything has become a national scourge the duty of the lawmakers is to take whatever means are necessary to set matters right.

The one and only means, in this case, is federal legislation supported by similar provincial legislation.

This measure has become necessary, I repeat, not because our hospitals abuse their privileges and overcharge their patients. That is not the case. In hospitals, as everywhere else, everything is more expensive and like all well organized corporations they have to balance their budget. However, when this law is assented to, the very great majority of Canadians who, I repeat, earn enough to live from day to day but hardly enough to make any savings, even when they are in perfect health, will feel they are protected and will enjoy thereby a greater feeling of security. If anything should happen to them, their morale will remain good and their chances of getting well again will be better. Under the present system there are large numbers of poor people who have to shorten their period of convalescence so as to reduce costs and who undergo serious relapses a short time later.

I know that thousands of sick people go back to work too soon because that is their only means of earning a livelihood for their family. Hence the great number of premature deaths in these families, because the last link in the chain of social security legislation given the country by the Liberal party has not yet been welded.

Since my election to this house in 1940, I have had the pleasure to vote for great social enactments of this government. First, it was the marvellous Family Allowances Act, then the Unemployment Insurance Act, the amendments to the Old Age Security Act, to the Blind Persons Act and to the Disabled Persons Act. I was happy then to advocate and support these basically Liberal measures. I shall be happier still, Mr. Speaker, to vote for a health insurance act for, if there is in life a time when we need help and the solace of human fraternity, it is when illness strikes us and when misfortune knocks at our door. I shall not insist any more, because I know all my colleagues share this feeling.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, last week, when I was listening to my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Brown), my speech was all prepared in French. When I heard him address himself to the house in my maternal tongue, and this for quite a few minutes, I decided to do likewise, and that is why I shall continue a part of my remarks in English. I hope that effort of my hon. friend and mine at this moment will contribute to good understanding amongst us members.

There is another suggestion which I would like to submit to the government, and particularly to the Minister of Finance. I should rather say two suggestions, because the matter with which I wish to deal concerns both the budget and the income tax.

In income tax return forms there is an item dealing with charitable donations made by every individual, by every taxpayer during the year. It is stated therein that a maximum of 10 per cent of the net income may be deducted for that purpose. In order to benefit from these exemptions, one must attach to the income tax reports receipts signed by charitable organizations, members of the clergy or other authorized persons. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this entails additional inconveniences for the taxpayer. He is not only compelled to figure out his income to the last cent, but he must endeavour to obtain a receipt which will justify, so to speak, a great number of small or negligible donations, the amount of which is rather difficult to remember. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that all this paper work be done away with and that these proceedings be simplified by putting everyone on the same footing, that is, by simply allowing everyone a 10 per cent deduction of net income for charitable donations.

This is the practice in other countries. Why should we not do the same in Canada? This would simplify matters and would be fairer to the taxpayer and easier for the income tax department. I therefore request the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) to include this amendment or improvement in his next budget. I believe everyone will benefit therefrom.

And since I am talking about the budget, I should like to put before the Minister of Finance another request, and a very important one, the immediate granting of which could bring about happy results. By this, Mr. Speaker, I mean that the national budget should be presented sooner. I believe that the budget should be presented to the house in January every year, and I shall tell you why. Most merchants, industrialists and businessmen take inventory after the festive season, that is, at the beginning of January. After that they must wait weeks and even months before finding out whether changes will be made in the Customs Act, Excise Tax Act, the sales tax or otherwise.

Owing to this state of uncertainty most merchants wait before making purchases, and I believe that this situation is greatly responsible for the increase in seasonal unemployment which occurs mostly during the months of January, February, March and April. The unemployment insurance commission, together with municipalities, chambers of commerce and other public bodies, and also individuals, are doing constructive work in order to alleviate this idle period which we call seasonal unemployment. If the budget were presented in January I believe this situation would not be as bad.

I am asking the Minister of Finance to study this matter carefully. We would indeed be entirely justified to act accordingly if thousands of workers could be retained in their jobs who otherwise must rely for their livelihood on their unemployment insurance benefits. I would be curious to find out the opinion of merchants and manufacturers about this scheme.

After submitting these suggestions, which I believe are in the general interest of all Canadians, may I, Mr. Speaker, put forward a request which concerns especially my district, the eastern townships. I am asking this now of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), whose sympathetic disposition we all know. In Quebec, as you know, the eastern townships are a small province within a province, and Sherbrooke, which I am privileged to represent in the house, is its capital. Writers and poets compare Sherbrooke to a queen and certain neighbouring towns to pearls and other jewels. They are right because Providence has showered its favours upon this privileged district which is represented by a dozen members in this house. We have rich mines, a great variety of industries; our population is progressive and alert, we have wonderful agricultural domains, an attractive countryside, magnificent mountains, large lakes teeming with fish, excellent hunting grounds, a prosperous tourist industry; in other words, prospects for a most brilliant future.

We also have numerous land transport facilities. The eastern townships are served by the large railways, the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian National and the Quebec Central which runs from Sherbrooke to Quebec City, via the rich mining district of Thetford Mines and Black Lake. We have numerous highways which, of course, could be improved but nevertheless help in expanding trade and industry. However, something is lacking. The eastern townships need air services which would speed up transportation between Sherbrooke, Quebec city and Montreal, and consequently with the rest of the world.

The minister knows that strong representations were made to his department for the building of an airport near Sherbrooke. Trans-Canada Air Lines were approached and, if I am not mistaken, they are making a survey at the present time of the passenger potentialities which the eastern townships would offer. I do not want to prophesy, but I can assert that air lines which would call at Sherbrooke would find it to their financial advantage.

As I have already said, the population of the eastern townships is progressive and full of initiative. They do not like to be behind the times. But in the field of air communications we are lagging behind other districts in our province and in the rest of the country. Therefore I request the Minister of Transport to provide in his 1956 budget sufficient estimates for the construction of at least two runways at the St. François airport, a few miles from Sherbrooke. In asking him to act as soon as possible, I am talking not only on behalf of the citizens of Sherbrooke but also on behalf of the population of the whole district.

I am convinced that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who is one of the most illustrious sons of the eastern townships, will support my request with his colleague and that when I go back to Sherbrooke I will be able to assure my constituents that the airport for which we have been waiting for such a long time will be built this year.

(Translation):

I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, with a word of gratitude to the Lord, for He has been kind to Canada. Under the aegis of those in authority, under the leadership of the real patriots who are guiding our party, Canada is gaining in importance every year. Its vast economic wealth is envied by the rest of the world. In the international field, the wisdom of our statesmen is recognized by all, and people from all parts of the world now come to consult with the heads of the Canadian government with regard to the complex problems upsetting other nations.

Canada has become a great nation, a country where we know the joy of living, where our children will be able to grow up and prosper in peace, we hope, saying, as we do now, that they are proud to be Canadians.

(Text):

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to congratulate most sincerely the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It seems to me we agreed last year that in the interests of saving time these little formalities were not going to be observed any more, and therefore I think the number of members who have commented on the excellence of their remarks is a tribute to them. I also think many of us are happy to see the very belated recognition of the importance of women in this house which was accorded by the selection of a woman to move the address in reply.

To the seconder, the hon. member for Bellechasse, I would sound one word of caution. Do not look forward to anything on the basis of your experience to date. As long as you remain on the government side of the house do not look forward to having great opportunities to indulge your oratorical prowess. There is the greatest bunch of tongue-tied orators over there I have ever seen or heard of in any legislature. To prove my point may I present a little statistical support of what I have said for the benefit of the hon. member for Bellechasse. I investigated to see what had happened to the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc) who moved the address last year. He managed to get into the fray actually more than is usual, but still only twice during the remainder of the session with comparatively short speeches. As a matter of fact, if it were not for those of us on this side of the house who have the responsibility of putting forward the views of the people of Canada, we could go home—I worked the matter out on a statistical basis—at the end of approximately 30 days. I certainly think that the people of Canada expect more attention to be paid to their business and more effort to be put into the debates than has been evidenced over the past years in the contributions of government members. I just mention that matter because I would not want the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme) to be disappointed when the gag goes on during his subsequent stay in this house.

I, of course, occupy a new location in the house this session. I am not quite sure whether it is the C.C.F. party to my left—that is what they are in some parts of Canada—or whether it is the social democratic party to my left—that is what they are in Quebec. I want to say that it is nice to be a member of a party that has the same name, principles and the same ideals no matter what part of Canada you come from.

An hon. Member: What about the Liberals?

Mr. Knowles: What about yourself? Are you a Progressive Conservative or a Conservative?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to turn now for a few minutes to the Post Office Department which is a subject of considerable interest to most people in Canada. Do I hear from the other side of the house an interruption "Not again"? That is so typical of the attitude on that side. I think it came from the treasury benches. Perhaps the hon. member might identify himself rather than throwing in interjections without identifying himself. Apparently he does not want to be identified.

Mr. Robichaud: Are you giving orders?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The difficulty of the government—and it is one among many others—is that they do not like to have in this house discussion of subjects of importance to the Canadian people about which the Canadian people are disturbed and annoyed. I think there is no better indication that the post office is one of those subjects than the fact that someone from the government benches says "Not again". He would prefer that the important subject of the post office be swept under the rug with all the other embarrassing little matters which they have been trying to hide underneath it. As a matter of fact, that is another reason why they should give more prominence to women in this government because, goodness knows, if ever there was any party that needed a housecleaning or any government that needed a housecleaning, it is the one now in office in Canada. I think the women are the people to do it for them. Goodness knows, the men have not done it up to date.

Toward the end of the last session we had in this house considerable discussion with regard to thefts from the post office. Substantial evidence was introduced showing the serious condition in this respect. Almost as if to prove the point,—that is the way it appears to me personally—during the recess of the house an attractive new post office in my riding was robbed not once but twice within three weeks. Here in my hand I have a press clipping which gives some details. The first time the safecrackers took $18,000 in cash and stamps. Then they came back three weeks later and escaped with about $10,000 in cash and stamps. The last paragraph of this clipping from the Montreal Star is interesting because it shows that even when they have the experience of something being wrong, the post office does nothing to correct it. The last paragraph of this news item reads as follows:

> Lt. Det. Richard Jones, of the Montreal police western division, said the burglars gained entry through a rear window. It was substantially the same method used in the previous burglary.

I think that is a sample of what is happening continually across Canada, namely the post office refusing to take advantage of the unfortunate experiences they have had to date.

I have another fascinating example, Mr. Speaker, of what happened to a post office and a bank in the same building on the same night, when an attempt was made to rob both; but I think perhaps we shall leave the Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) hanging on the wire—certainly he is not hanging around in the house at the moment—until after lunch. If I may do so, I should like to call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): When we rose for lunch, Mr. Speaker, I was just about to make a comparison between the care of money and other valuables as taken by the post office and by the banks, in an attempt to show that many of the thefts from the post office are the direct result of inefficiency and lack of attention on the part of the senior administrators of the department. I think an example is best drawn from a situation which arose last December in Chateauguay. I hold in my hand a newspaper clipping with photographs from the Gazette of Thursday, December 22. I am reading the caption of that picture which summarizes the situation fairly well:

When Miss Marie Soyer, daughter of Chateauguay Mayor George Soyer and post office clerk for the town, entered her office yesterday morning she saw a scene of wreckage and looting. The post office was robbed of $500 in stamps and $49 in cash when thieves smashed the lock on a box. But when the burglars attempted to loot the Banque Canadienne Nationale bank safe in the building they faced a different proposition. After drilling through the left side of the vault for at least six inches, they were forced to call a halt when they hit a solid sheet of cold steel.

Here, we have a situation in which a post office and the branch of a bank in the same building are entered on the same day. The post office is looted but the bank property remains safe. Someone listening to these words, and thinking in terms of the great banks of our larger cities, might think that the bank had an almost impenetrable vault. The interesting thing is that this clipping contains a photograph of this particular vault. We find it is an ordinary office safe, about four feet high, such as one will find in office after office across this country and costing a comparatively few dollars in relation to the valuables which it contains. It is the sort of thing one would expect a post office, when they have $500 or $1,000—in some cases $20,000—worth of valuables to have.

What do we find in this instance, and doubtless in instance after instance across the country? If the valuables are put away at all they are put away in a box, something that thieves could break open and remove the contents with a minimum of difficulty. If these thefts were only isolated around the country, perhaps we would have no major cause for worry. But the pattern as was shown last year, and the pattern that has continued to evolve month after month as is evidenced by newspaper story after newspaper story, is that the post office is considered, shall we say, a good business proposition for thieves. For some reason, almost certainly the lack of protection the post office is giving to the valuables it has, these thieves are breaking into post office after post office.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, very strongly that more adequate measures are going to have to be taken in this connection. With that in mind, I shall make one very definite recommendation at this point for the benefit of the minister. I suggest he transfer to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the complete and final responsibility for protective processes in his department. There is a great deal of uncertainty in this thing as to who is responsible for what. I think that is best illustrated by an amusing interchange which occurred in the house last year. On page 6778 of Hansard for July 26, 1955, in answer to a question by the leader of this party, we have the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) saying:

I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that the security measures taken by the post office are under constant review. Every time a theft occurs the circumstances of the case are considered and serious consideration is given by the R.C.M.P. to the security measures in existence—

Then there is more along the same line. Later on, we find the Prime Minister saying:

Special inquiry is going on all the time and I do not know of any better method of making inquiry and considering the system in force than the very close co-operation that exists between the post office authorities and the R.C.M.P.

Now, on the basis of the statement so far by the leader of the government one would imagine that there was close co-operation. However, on page 6779, the following page, in that same series of questions we find the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) asking the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) whether the R.C.M.P. was asked to assist in investigating recent post office losses in the province of Quebec. The answer is:

Mr. Speaker, I do not maintain that detailed supervision over the R.C.M.P. which would permit me to answer a question of that sort without notice. I should think, however, that they would not assist in such an investigation. The detection of crime in a province is under the jurisdiction of the provincial police and it would be only in the event of their calling in the mounted police or the post office calling in the mounted police that the mounted police would act.

In the last few days we have seen a most considerable mess in the government benches, with the ministers not knowing what they were answering and with contradictions between one another, so this should come as no surprise. Let me emphasize that here again, on the same day within a few minutes of one another, you have the Prime Minister of this country saying there is very close co-operation between the R.C.M.P. and the post office, and the R.C.M.P. are working on these matters. Then we have the Minister of Justice under whom the R.C.M.P. comes, stating he does not think they would be called in on a particular case. It is for that reason I suggest that the present investigatory staff of the post office, which, according to the estimates of last year, numbers five people, might very well be transferred to the jurisdiction of the R.C.M.P. Certainly the R.C.M.P. should be given final and absolute responsibility, in so far as federal jurisdiction is concerned, for the protection of Her Majesty's mails. I feel that if that were done this fine national police force we have would make considerable progress in a field which has so far given us nothing but a cause for worry.

Turning to another aspect of the post office service I should like to ask again, as I did last year, that the post office consider the re-establishment of the two-a-day mail delivery rather than the present one-a-day system which extends into such a large part of Canada. We should have a two-a-day mail delivery on a five-day week basis.

The immediate objection raised by the post office to the return to the two-a-day mail delivery is the increase in the cost. As one who has discussed this thing, not only with some of the biased people in Ottawa, but with people on the lower levels right across the country, I would point out that the return to the two-a-day, five days a week delivery would not cause a major cost increase in the operation of the post office.

Some people may ask, why can we not have mail delivered twice a day on a six-day basis? I would point out to them that the great majority of the industrial concerns of this country even our banks and other businesses, are now on a five-day week basis, and that from a realistic point of view it would be better to have ten deliveries a week than the existing one delivery a day for six days.

My second point is that such a system would eliminate a great deal of the difficulties now arising in mail delivery across the country. Under the present system, in order to arrange for delivery six days a week, the post office must employ a man for one of those six days who is unfamiliar with the route, and who rotates from route to route, spending only one day a week on each route. That enables them to have a five-day week for their employees. However, mail service is a very personal thing. All the myriad little changes which occur on a route are not known to those rotating mail carriers, or supervisory letter carriers, as the technical term is. The result is, there are continual complaints, continual difficulties and continual embarrassments for the post office.

Under a five-day-a-week system, the same man would service his route continuously, and the service to the people of that route would be improved as the number of complaints would be reduced. Another great advantage of this, Mr. Speaker, would be that the system would eliminate the miserable unfairness which the post office has instituted for most of its letter carriers on the island of Montreal. Unlike the rest of Canada where seniority is given primary consideration in establishing summer vacations for letter carriers, another factor has entered into the picture in Montreal, and that has moved supervisory letter carriers of comparatively few years' experience ahead of men with many years of experience on the vacation lists. If this were being done across Canada on an equal basis the post office might perhaps claim that there was some reason for it and that it was necessary, but it has been instituted in only a very few centres in Canada. In Toronto they have a totally different system of establishing the vacation period. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this inequity should be remedied. We tried to get that done last year and we were unsuccessful. The reason given was that it was brought up just as the vacation schedules were being established. Well, this year, slow moving as the department is, and slow moving as the minister may be, we at least have sufficient time for him to make up his mind and do something about this particular situation.

Let me turn now to a few things of local interest in Montreal. I should like to join my voice to that of the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau), when he gets around to it, in suggesting that there be an underpass constructed, and that very shortly, on Decarie boulevard, north of the Cote de Liesse traffic circle. That is a major traffic artery in the city. It presents a considerable danger, with trains periodically travelling across it. It is the wish of the people of that area that something be done about it and before too long.

I could not help but be amused by the typical example of this government's operation which I saw not too long ago in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway. I am delighted to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) in the house at this time. The seaway, of course, is well under way. We have already poured out millions upon millions of dollars into the construction, and now we are going to make models of it. I have no doubt that the models may serve a purpose. It is not the models that I object to so much, Mr. Speaker, as the basis on which we are going to house them. In the Globe and Mail of Toronto of December 6 we find this:

> The seaway authority also announced that a $500,000 contract has been awarded for the construction of two models of the seaway sections in the Montreal area.

Further on we find this:

> The contract calls for the construction of a $300,000 building to house the models. The models will cost an estimated $120,000.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, they are going to have a building to house a model which is two and one-half times the value of the model, a model of something which is already well on its way to completion. There is very grave doubt in my mind of the necessity for such a building, particularly even if we admit the need for the model.

The other day I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on the question of wheat and agriculture. I must say that after having travelled across this great country of ours not more than a couple of months ago from Winnipeg through to Vancouver and back, and after having listened to many people in that area, I came to the conclusion that the government has a certain policy on wheat and on agriculture. I have come to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that it is a two-part policy. It is compounded in equal parts of faith in the Liberal party and hope for a crop failure. As far as I have been able to see, that is about the only helpful advice or counsel that the government has so far been able to put forward in connection with the wheat surplus.

I do hope that when the estimates come down later this year we shall be able to get an explanation of some of the items in the public accounts book which reached us recently. The attention of hon. members should be drawn particularly to this book because there is so much of interest in it. I looked at a little item in the book only this morning and I discovered that one gentleman had drawn something over $11,000 in travelling expenses in the year ended March 31, 1955, and another gentleman had drawn something over $7,800 in travelling expenses. Both of these gentlemen are in the Department of Transport. I am reasonably sure that in the one case there is an explanation, but it is interesting to note that that explanation was brought forth by questioning by myself in the house last year. I believe the department has changed its policy in this regard.

This gentleman drew $11,000 in travelling expenses but what actually happened in that particular case is that he had a number of people working for him and he put in for their travelling expenses as well as for his own and apparently disbursed the money back to them. That policy I am informed has now been changed as a result of the representations made last year.

Let me point out that it was not until this matter was brought up in the house and the government criticized on that particular point that anything was done about an employee of the government disbursing funds to other employees. Eleven thousand dollars is a sizeable amount of money to give to any one individual to use to pay the travelling expenses of other people.

I am not at all sure that the same explanation applies to the other case which will be found on Z-84 of the public accounts. In that case the man received $7,865 in travelling expenses last year. I look forward with considerable interest to an explanation of that case.

When selecting people for government service there seems to be a practice on the part of the government to insist on abnormally high qualifications for particular jobs. Let me say at once that properly trained, properly educated, properly prepared people are necessary for many of the posts in our government, but at the same time let me say that there are many jobs which do not require a university degree as a qualification. Individual cases should be examined on their merits. Let me show what the government is doing in certain cases.

I have here an advertisement for fire protection officers, whose duties will be, under the supervision of the dominion fire commissioner, to inspect, test and report upon the condition of fire protection facilities including chemical extinguishers, stand pipes and hose systems, automatic sprinkler systems and the like. We have all seen this type of man who occupies a most important position going up and down the corridors of important buildings checking the fire extinguishers to see that they are in operating shape.

The desirable qualifications given for this position include graduation from a university of recognized standing in science, majoring in mathematics, physics and chemistry with preference being given to applicants with at least one year of experience in fire prevention or related work with boards of insurance underwriters, and so on.

One hardly needs a man with a university degree to go around checking fire extinguishers, stand pipes and automatic sprinkler systems. I make that statement with the proviso always that we must have people who have adequate training, adequate education and so on to fit them for the particular job they are going to do.

Mr. Reinke: Would the hon. member outline the duties as listed?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I shall be delighted to read them again. I do not know where the hon. gentleman was when I read the duties.

Mr. Reinke: Verbatim.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I shall be delighted to read them again. Apparently it takes twice as long to get something through the heads of some people in this house as it does to get it through the heads of most people.

Mr. Reinke: It all depends on where it comes from.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Considerably more than the hon. gentleman who has just asked the question. The duties are:

Under supervision of the dominion fire commissioner, to inspect, test and report upon the condition of fire protection facilities including chemical extinguishers, stand pipes and hose systems, automatic sprinkler systems, fire alarm and watchman systems, hydrants and fire pumps; to inspect and report upon fire exits and fire spread and exit protection in government owned or leased properties in the Ottawa area; to recommend necessary corrections in fire prevention equipment and practices in a variety of types of buildings involving common and special fire hazards; to assist senior fire protection engineers in professional inspections, tests etc.; and to perform other related duties as required.

I hope that the hon. member got that the second time around. Another case concerns a particular officer that I must admit the government is badly in need of, that is a pest control specialist to use on their own ranks. This man will be required to develop a continuous program for more efficient and economical control of insects and rodents at all army installations; to review, study and evaluate methods and techniques and recommend adoption of most efficient and economical means of control in individual projects. The advertisement then goes on in similar vein. Here is a man who is to be a rat catcher on a large scale. Essentially the job is that of pest control. It is a most practical job, but he must have graduated from a university of recognized standing with specialization in biology.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): And be a Liberal.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As someone says, "And be a Liberal." More and more one wonders whether these specifications are drawn up with someone specially in mind. I do not know that and I do not suggest that. This is not a matter of sour grapes as I am a university graduate. I feel most keenly that university training is required in many positions, but I am open-minded enough about it to realize that there are many positions to fill in this country where that sort of experience and education is not required. The quickest way to make a person unhappy is to take a man of superior education and perhaps intellectual attainments and put him at checking fire extinguishers in a government building and setting rat traps. It seems to me essentially that is what the government is trying to do in these two cases and I bring them forward for your consideration.

A matter which is causing considerable concern in Montreal has to do with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Our hope is that he will consider amending the Criminal Code to cover the operation of private card houses. As I understand it, at the present time the Criminal Code legalizes the operation of a room or club where for the payment of 10 cents an hour or 50 cents a day people may play cards or gamble legally. It seems to me that this should be corrected. When that section was included in the Criminal Code 50 cents a day or 10 cents an hour were realistic amounts, but the cost of everything has gone up and this section should be corrected on that ground alone quite apart from the inconvenience and trouble it is causing the Montreal police department at the present time in proving cases against people.

I want to express the hope that this year those members of the government who occupy the treasury benches will keep their noses to the grindstone and stay with us in this house. Some of them are quite good about it but others are a little bit delinquent. I am not only thinking of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) who went off salmon fishing last year when his bill was up in the house.

I do want to express my regret at one particular instance. In the heat of last summer, when we here were doing our very best, I read in the newspaper that a certain cabinet minister had arrived in London for a two-week vacation. It so happened that during the course of that vacation his estimates were considered in the house and were quite ably handled by another minister. I am not going to name the particular minister, as I think it would be a little unfair to him, but this illustrates an approach to this house and to the nation's business that, in my opinion, is very strongly to be condemned. That is only one illustration of their disregard for their responsibilities and disregard for the work of this house, and it could be multiplied many times.

I should like to mention just one final point, since I see I have a moment for it. Earlier in this speech, I gave an illustration of the confusion existing between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice regarding what the R.C.M.P. and the Post Office Department were doing. I wish the departments would get themselves at least halfway sorted out. I have here an advertisement by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration for an architect with several years' varied experience to help with all types of buildings for Indian agencies and reserves across Canada. We all know that the primary responsibility of the Department of Public Works is in that field, but now we find that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has to have its own officer.

Then we find that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is looking for an engineer to be responsible for certain installations in the Jasper national park. On the other hand, the Department of Public Works is looking for two engineers to take care of highways in the national parks. In other words, these departments, in the confusion which is so rampant in the government, are running one over the other willynilly. Without any consideration for the taxpayers, without any consideration for expenditures, without any consideration for anything except building their own private empires, these ministers, one after the other, are advertising for people, and in many cases they do not even know what to do with them.

I am quite sure that, when the estimates come up for consideration this year, we shall be able to look at some of these situations, and we shall certainly give the government every possible help we can in straightening out the stupid mess it is getting itself into today.

Mr. R. E. Reinke (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to offer my congratulations, as previous speakers have done, to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) on the very fine way in which she moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Timiskaming is one of the outstanding women of today. She was outstanding in her own riding before she came to this house and she has certainly been an asset to all of us here and a credit to the women of Canada. I am quite sure that her appeal to the Prime Minister to appoint a woman to sit on the civil service commission will not fall upon deaf ears.

I should like also to congratulate the seconder of the motion, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme). His fine oratory and his knowledge of parliamentary business were very apparent, and we certainly welcome him to this corner of the house.

The matter about which I intend to speak today is, to my mind, of very urgent public importance. I had intended to discuss it when the estimates relating to the Department of Justice were before the house but events over the past four weeks have been of such a serious and critical nature that I must bring it to the attention of the Minister of Justice and the hon. members of this house at this time.

The city of Hamilton, in which I have the honour to represent the riding of Hamilton South, is, I believe, an average Canadian city. One of my hon. friends says it is a little better than average, and I agree with him. In the space of a few more years it will no doubt reach a population of a quarter of a million people, since we are now fast approaching that population. The people of Hamilton, as I have said, are average people; they are hard-working, industrious, peace-loving citizens fulfilling their duties to their families and to their communities.

I point out this fact because what I am about to say affects the citizens of every town and city across this great dominion of ours. Whilst I am going to refer to my own particular riding, it is only because I am more cognizant of conditions there than I am of any other communities across Canada.

The people of our municipality are incensed, the citizens are riled, they are desperate and they are afraid. The men are afraid for the safety of their wives, and parents for their daughters. Why are they afraid? Because we have never in the history of our city experienced a more serious and despicable wave of heinous sex crimes than at the present time. Since December 5, eight cases of sexual assault have been reported to the police. Of these assaults reported, five have been brutal cases of rape.

Last Friday night a small young mother of a young child was hauled into a car as she walked along the street in the west central part of the city. She was taken to the outskirts of the city, was attacked by two men who were in the car, and was turned loose to wander about in a dazed condition until she finally reached a telephone. Since that time, an 18-year-old girl was abducted by two men, badly beaten, taken to a motel on the outskirts of town and there assaulted by one of the men.

Last Monday night, a 52-year-old woman complained to the city police that she had been raped by two men on a lonely township road just outside the city limits.

The week end before Christmas, a young couple walking home from a dance were assaulted by two men. The husband was knocked to the ground partially unconscious. His terrified wife was pulled into a car, assaulted and left near a small town on the outskirts of Hamilton.

Just two weeks ago, a 15-year-old girl on her way home from a skating rink in the east end of the city suffered a similar fate. On Sunday morning, a daring daylight attempt was made by two men on a 25-year-old girl. Here it is reported in the Hamilton Spectator of Tuesday, 17th January:

> The attacks have resulted in strict security regulations being put into effect at the student nurses' residence at St. Joseph's hospital. Girls are not being allowed out alone at night and all late passes have been cancelled for the time, it was learned today.

Many parents are taking the precaution of driving their daughters to and from places at night until the case is cleared up.

Then we have another account on the following evening, Wednesday, 18th January. The Spectator for that date contains the following report:

One of those "barbaric rapists" who have been terrorizing young women in the Hamilton district recently could be that young man who lives next door! If you're hunting for the $3,000 reward money offered for their arrest don't assume that the wanted pair are thuggish "bums" from the underworld. You have the word of their latest victim, the attractive young woman who was attacked in broad daylight at Aberdeen and James streets Tuesday, that they are not.

"That's the surprising part of it," she told the Spectator this morning. "The man who grabbed me seemed like a quite ordinary young man."

"You mean he looked quite respectable?"

"Yes, he did. He was neat and clean. There was nothing untidy or dirty about him."

I have no doubt whatsoever, Mr. Speaker, that the police of Hamilton will apprehend these thugs. Four of these attacks have taken the same pattern and are attributed to the same men. But what will we do with these callous, hardened beasts, once they are apprehended? What will happen to the degenerate who murdered 5-year-old Susan Cadieux of London, who after this despicable crime left her to die of exposure? What will happen to the sadistic rapist who spirited away 13-year-old Linda Lampkin of Toronto Wednesday night, strangled her with her own scarf and, according to newspaper reports, threw her battered body from a moving vehicle on Commissioner street in Toronto?

Most people are not aware, however, that the biggest percentage of these degenerates are sane. To back up that statement I should like to read the opinion of the superintendent of a mental hospital as reported in the Hamilton Spectator of Tuesday, January 17, which is as follows:

Dr. J. N. Senn, superintendent of the Ontario hospital here, said today the majority of suspected sex offenders committed by magistrates for observation are returned to the courts as sane persons.

I am not in a position to criticize the punishments or penalties handed out by our courts, but I will say that either our Criminal Code should be made more stringent or it is not being enforced severely enough, and I am inclined to lean towards the latter view. Section 136 of the Criminal Code reads:

Every one who commits rape is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life and to be whipped.

I think this section is perfectly clear. I believe every man who commits this offence should receive the maximum penalty. He should be put out of society for all time and be given lashes. Section 137 reads as follows:

Every one who attempts to commit rape is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years and to be whipped.

Here again I suggest that every offender should receive the maximum penalty. These people deserve no sympathy. I am speaking now of course of the sane person who wilfully and methodically sets out to carry out this act. As I have pointed out from good authority, I believe most of them come under this category no matter how they may try to hide behind the curtain of insanity. The penalty is there and must be meted out severely to act as a deterrent to others.

But more dangerous perhaps than the type of criminals I have just mentioned, who have been molesting women and children in Hamilton, is the type of sex deviate involved in the last two instances I referred to, the Cadieux case in London and the Lampkin case in Toronto. This is the type of criminal who, after committing this foul deed, kills his victim for the purpose, I suppose, of hiding his identity. The Hon. Kelso Roberts, attorney general of Ontario, expressed his views in the Toronto Star of January 12, 1956, as follows:

We are concerned about these cases and we are studying the problem but we have got to move slowly. I sympathize with the people who are angry over these recent assaults on children. But we cannot just go around locking up each and every sex deviate. We are not behind the iron curtain. We have got to try and understand each individual problem.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I most vehemently oppose this opinion. I should like to know why in heaven's name we cannot lock up each and every sex deviate. To my mind any man who is guilty of molesting small girls or full grown ones, for that matter, is a sex deviate. Under section 661 of the Criminal Code these men can be taken out of society for an indeterminate period and for life if necessary. I suggest that if the act of molesting, which in effect is an indecent assault, takes place more than once, society should be rid of that person at least until this complex problem is solved and while it is being solved.

To me it would seem reasonable to assume that the sex deviate probably begins his life of crime in the same way as a bandit or an alcoholic. It is very unlikely that a thief would attempt to rob the main branch of the Royal Bank of Canada in Ottawa in his first attempt at crime. I cannot conceive of a person becoming an alcoholic after one drink. It is a state that is brought into being progressively as the person becomes bolder and bolder and more irresponsible, gradually acquiring a thirst that cannot be quenched. The same is true of the sex deviate. His first offence may be to watch little children playing in the grounds of a school and attempt to entice them away. Becoming bolder and bolder and taking fewer precautions, he is finally successful in luring them to their downfall and leaving them maimed for life or ravaged and killed.

If life imprisonment and the lash are not enough of a deterrent, then these crimes must be prevented before they happen by taking these molesters out of circulation. I maintain that these men, who are urged by some mental deviation to molest children, even though it may be in a minor way at first, should be held in custody, and if they have not been guilty of indecent assault under section 141, which deals with that crime, we should add another section to this part of the code to deal with those who begin with a minor sex offence. One thing I am certain of is that we must be strict in dealing with these men.

I am pleased that at last we have section 162 dealing with peeping Toms. You have no doubt read of sex crimes committed by criminals who started by peeping in a window of an apartment or a home. The first thing you know some urge impels them to gain entry and then there is an assault and possibly a murder.

Some five years ago I had a personal experience in this connection. We were preparing for bed one evening and our dog kicked up quite a racket. I threw on my dressing gown quickly and went out to investigate. I arrived in time to see someone jumping over the side fence and then run around the side of the house next door and out to the street. A few hundred feet up the street a car was parked. Of course I was not attired to take chase but I got the colour and make of the car and so on and telephoned the police.

While I was waiting for the police to come I jumped in my own car to see if I could spot the car in the district. I noticed the car as a matter of fact cruising the district about two blocks away but unfortunately I was travelling the wrong way when I spotted it and by the time I had turned around he had disappeared. I returned to my home and waited for the arrival of the police. I was standing on the front verandah still attired in my dressing gown and, lo and behold, I looked over on the next street and saw what appeared to be someone looking in a window. I thought: How could this be so soon after this has happened to me?

I went into the house, secured a flashlight and turned it on this house which faced the same way mine did but was on the next block. There framed against a back window was this fellow looking in a bedroom. Of course he immediately noticed the light on him and took off with me after him. Here I was still only in my dressing gown. He ran down the block a hundred yards or so and I think I was gaining on him a little. I was younger in those days and in better shape. He jumped in his car and fled.

But this time I was fortunate enough to secure the licence number, so I turned it over to the police and he was apprehended. My wife and I picked him out of a line-up the next day, and sure enough it was he. He came from a good, respectable family in Hamilton, and was married and had two or three children. As a matter of fact, I felt sorry for him. He having pleaded guilty to this offence, the judge said, "I am powerless to convict him", and he was let off on suspended sentence. Of course at that time the code contained no provision for this type of crime. He was let off, put on a $100 bond and I think for a period of two years he was to stay out of that district. That was all the satisfaction that I had after this man came to my own window and within half an hour was looking into the window of someone across the street.

Let me read to you, Mr. Speaker, the definition of a criminal sexual psychopath as defined in our Criminal Code under section 659:

> . . . (b) "criminal sexual psychopath" means a person who, by a course of misconduct in sexual matters, has shown a lack of power to control his sexual impulses and who as a result is likely to attack—

I would ask you to note those words "likely to attack".

> —or otherwise inflict injury, pain or other evil on any person, . . .

Then it goes on and points out that preventive detention under the act means detention in a penitentiary for an indeterminate period. Are these men not criminal sexual psychopaths? Either they go back into society completely cured or they should stay in prison or in a mental institution. Whether they can be cured without surgery is not for me to say, since I am not a psychiatrist nor a doctor. In a great many cases I am of the opinion that surgery may be the answer. Those who are opposed to this solution might do well to remember the words of our Lord when He delivered His sermon on the mount as is written in the gospel according to St. Matthew, dealing with adultery:

> 29. And if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell.
> 30. And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: . . .

And so on. A royal commission, headed by Chief Justice McRuer, is studying the problem to see whether the section of the Criminal Code dealing with sex offences should be changed. That commission is holding meetings and has been sitting for two years in all parts of Canada. I would certainly hope that the commission will report to parliament at this session so that we shall have an opportunity to see whether this part of the Criminal Code needs some revising. Our children must come first. We are not going to keep them locked up or under surveillance while this sort of deviate runs at large.

Since 1947 when section 661 of the code was passed by parliament—that is the section to which I just referred—only 20 men in all of Canada have been given indeterminate sentences under this section dealing with sexual psychopaths. Possibly this is because sex offences are seldom repeated after the criminal has paid his penalty. Of 5,821 cases studied in New York city, 39 per cent had previous police records but for other offences. Only 9 per cent had been involved in previous sex offences. If our percentages in this country are comparable, surely 9 per cent of the sex deviates would amount to more than 20 over the past eight years. I can therefore only conclude that although under our Criminal Code we have provided a law under which to commit these men, our courts have been too lenient. This 9 per cent must be securely placed in detention forever or until there is no chance of recurrence, so that mothers and their daughters can once more move about without any fear whether it be daylight or dark.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to join those members who have preceded me in offering my congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The mover of the address, namely the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley), can, with considerable justification, feel proud of the fact that she is the first woman in Canada to have had that honour. What I think may be of equal importance to her as a Liberal as well as a woman is the fact that at long last the Liberal party have succeeded in electing a woman upon whom they can bestow that high honour.

Those of us who have been here for some years, Mr. Speaker, do not expect to find much by way of progressive legislation or of new legislation proposed in the speech from the throne in the third session of a parliament with an election more than a year away. The best we can hope for is a vague foreshadowing of better things to come when election year comes around, possibly next session. It is therefore gratifying to find in the speech from the throne a promise of legislation to provide, as between men and women, equal pay for equal work in the federal section of our economy. This is a matter for which another lady member of the house, namely the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), will be justified in taking some credit.

It would really be interesting if we were to make a study of just how much of the Liberal legislation introduced over the past years has originated on this side of the house. I think a close study would reveal the fact that most if not all of the best legislation that has been introduced by this government in the past 20 years or so was first brought to the attention of the house and the country by one or other of the opposition groups. As a matter of fact, it looks very much as though the government no longer takes the initiative or leadership in the field of progressive legislation but rather has become the agent of the opposition to implement legislation proposed by opposition groups.

Now that we have voted on the question of wheat surpluses it may be well to look at some of the other major issues that confront us today. First and foremost among those, in my opinion, is the international relationship between east and west, that which we speak of as the tension between east and west which exists at the present time. I refer to the struggle for supremacy between the communists and the capitalist countries of the world. It is the struggle for supremacy between Russia and her allies on the one side and the United States and her allies on the other. It is an issue, Mr. Speaker, the outcome of which is a matter of life and death for a whole generation of people in every country in the world today.

We can talk all we like about peaceful coexistence or competitive coexistence, but I think the cold stark fact is that as long as we have communism and capitalism dividing the world with two ideologies that struggle for supremacy will continue. The most we can probably hope for in the years to come is that the contest can be carried on without recourse to war. In view of the situation, it seems to me we should direct our thoughts along two main lines. We should first of all seek to use all the prestige and influence that Canada can command amongst the nations of the world to avoid what Mr. Eden has chosen to call a universal explosion. Secondly, we should seek to find ways and means of demonstrating to our own people, and to the people of other nations, nations that are now teetering in their support between the east and the west, that the democratic way of life can provide more tangible benefits than can the communist way of life. As I see it, that is the twofold challenge which confronts both the governments and the citizens of the countries of the free world today.

Mr. Eden was reported in the press yesterday as having pledged the British people to keep working for some way in which the communist nations and the free world can live together without quarrelling over the domination of the world. Canada has good reason to be proud of the prominent part which our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and our Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) have played in this field. I think Canadians everywhere recognize and congratulate those ministers on the good job they did for Canada and the world during recent months. Even though there are new clouds on the horizon, even though there may be new problems arising every day, we must, to use the words of our own Secretary of State for External Affairs—> —stand firm against tactics of divide, weaken and destroy, but equally do nothing by provocative word or policy to increase Russia's fear of the west as a threat to peace.

While we welcome those words from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, we wonder how the policy of the government which has recently come to light regarding the shipment of arms to Egypt can be made to fit in with the secretary's words. It would seem that there really does exist a right and a left in government circles, and that the government's right hand does not really know what the left hand is doing nor the left what the right is doing. We have heard a great deal of criticism regarding Russia's or the communist countries' shipments of arms to Egypt in recent months. One wonders just why we can blame one country for shipping these arms while we are engaged in the same practice.

So, Mr. Speaker, defence and negotiation must continue hand in hand. While we give our support to measures of protection against communism, we must continue our efforts to secure a genuine disarmament agreement. I want to add my voice to others in urging the government, and particularly the two ministers already referred to, to continue persevering to secure such an agreement. Here, I want to call attention to the recommendations made to the government by the Canadian Congress of Labour in this matter a few weeks ago. On page 1 of their memorandum to the government the congress says:

> The congress urges the government to press for a firm international agreement on the abolition of all stocks of atomic and hydrogen weapons and the prohibition of the manufacture and use of such weapons, under effective international control. As a first step towards these ends the government should take the initiative to obtain an agreement to stop nuclear weapon tests.

Just what is to be gained, Mr. Speaker, by continuing to build still more powerful nuclear weapons? Apparently, both east and west now have a sufficient number of these weapons to destroy each other in a matter of hours, if not in a matter of minutes. What is to be gained by building still more? Surely, since no one nation can keep such tests a secret from other nations and since science cannot yet tell us just what the disastrous effects of these tests may be upon unborn generations, as human beings, whether Russian, American, British or Canadian, we are intelligent enough to reach some agreement to stop further tests as a first step in an agreement for effective international supervision of a disarmament program.

Lord Beaverbrook's powerful newspaper, the Daily Express, in its New Year's message to the British people on January 2, asked these questions:

> What should be foremost in the minds of the people as the New Year opens? What should be their guiding light in the months that lie ahead?

The Daily Express gives these three answers:

> (1) War should be repudiated. It should be utterly dismissed from the thoughts of the public.
> (2) Armaments should be reduced to the utmost extent.
> (3) Above all, espouse the cause of world-wide control of atomic weapons. Press for it.
> Urge it upon the leaders of the nations.
> Atomic weapons have a particular horror for humanity. They hold a unique menace.
> Nothing would contribute so much to easing the tensions that exist today as the knowledge that these terrible instruments of destruction had been immobilised.
> Nothing could do more to relieve the world of its load of poison.

As the Canadian Congress of Labour points out, defence against communism is "not simply a matter of guns and planes and bombs, of armies and navies and air forces"; it is also a matter, to use the words of the congress, "of rooting out poverty and exploitation" wherever they exist. Only when we can prove to the world that as a nation we are employing our national wealth and our national resources to root out poverty and exploitation at home, and particularly in those underdeveloped countries of the world, shall we be able to demonstrate to these people that democracy can give them more tangible benefits than can communism.

We welcome the government's proposal to increase its contribution under the Colombo plan. In the opinion of many of us that contribution is still too small. There are, moreover, a number of sectors of our domestic economy where poverty and exploitation still exist. The old age pensioner, for instance, who has to live on his $40 each month, judged by present-day living standards, is not very far removed from poverty. The employable unemployed who has exhausted his unemployment insurance and is forced to fall back upon municipal relief is oftentimes on the very edge of poverty. It is no credit to democracy, no credit to our federal government or to our provincial governments that we have another winter upon us and still no satisfactory agreement has been reached regarding the responsibility for those who are unfortunate enough to be unemployed employables.

Mr. Philpott: Ontario would not take it.

Mr. Noseworthy: I have brought both provincial and federal governments into the picture.

Mr. Philpott: The other provinces did.

Mr. Noseworthy: There are many municipalities in Canada, Mr. Speaker, which are today without financial resources to meet their responsibility for social services and education; yet while we pride ourselves on our democratic freedoms and the strength of our free institutions, we permit petty jealousies as between governments at different levels to undermine the strength of those institutions, to undermine democracy itself at a time when democracy, as we know it, is engaged in a life and death struggle for existence against communism.

Here is another example, Mr. Speaker. Our sightless citizens whom we still subject to a means test, and to whom our government refuses to grant a small special allowance to cover the cost of guiding and other essential expenses, are oftentimes brought very close to poverty. Can Canada, with its vast national product, not spare just a few dollars for those sightless persons in the name and in the interests of democracy?

We were told in yesterday's press that in the last ten weeks 180 Canadian lives had been lost through fires. Tests show that in the great majority of cases inferior building material and substandard houses have been the causes of those fires, and the cause of this appalling loss of life. Notwithstanding the improvements we have made in the National Housing Act, notwithstanding the increase in building that has come about, we have not yet seriously tackled the problem of providing houses in Canada for those who need them most. The majority of the houses built under the National Housing Act are sold to those who are in the $5,000 income bracket or higher. There are still no houses being built or made available that can be sold or rented at prices that tens of thousands of Canadians in the lower income brackets, Canadian couples wtih young families to support, can afford. Our major problem in housing is still with us. It is that of providing houses for those people.

While I am on this subject, I wonder whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare will take an opportunity soon to tell us whether or not his department considers taking some action in this field. In my opinion his department is in a better position than any other organization in this country to carry on a national, all-out educational campaign to show our people both how to prevent those fires and what to do when they occur. A very prominent specialist, a man who is employed by the insurance companies as a specialist in this field, Mr. Douglas Abbey—I think he is the standards engineer of the fire protection division of the underwriters laboratories of Canada—tells us that:

> —an informed public would go a long way toward lowering the annual toll of lives lost in house fires.

What an opportunity there is for the Department of National Health and Welfare, which every month is in correspondence with the mothers of the children of our nation, to provide the homes with some form of guidance and instruction in this field. Of course the minister will run foul of provincial regulations and responsibilities. He may even find that his terms of reference and his budget will not permit him to take action along this line. If I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare, he is a man of vision, a humanitarian, and I am sure he is man enough to rise above those petty difficulties and do something for the children to whom his department is sending family allowance cheques every month.

The leader of the official opposition has already in this debate called attention to the need for the revision of some of our labour legislation. The grievances of a large group of railway employees still remain unsolved, and no edict of the Prime Minister that these men should not go on strike is a solution of that problem. Railways are essential in this country, and if because of competition they must be operated at a loss, then the employees of the railways should not be called upon to bear the brunt of those losses. Some means must be found other than the undemocratic method of depriving these men of a right that has been long established as a part of our collective bargaining system.

Much has been said already about unemployment insurance. I realize that the Department of Labour is watching this act very closely, and that the legislation requires continual revision to meet the needs of the day. There is one phase of this act to which I should like to direct the attention of the house.

I am given to understand that an employee who has suffered an industrial accident for which he is paid workmen's compensation suffers some loss in his unemployment insurance. While he is receiving compensation no payments are made on his behalf into the unemployment insurance fund. If after returning to work he finds himself unemployed, the number of days to which he would normally be entitled are reduced by reason of the fact that he has been drawing workmen's compensation.

It does not seem fair to me that a workman who has suffered an industrial accident, probably through no fault of his own, and who is placed on workmen's compensation of say 75 per cent of his wages for a period of time, should be penalized further by having his entitlement to unemployment insurance reduced by reason of that fact. I would suggest to the minister that some study be given to this problem and means found whereby workers who are injured and in receipt of workmen's compensation shall not have to suffer later on because of that fact.

I understand that hon. members generally are attempting to co-operate in keeping their speeches down to 25 or 30 minutes, and as a matter of fact I have been warned by our whip that if I exceed the 30-minute limit I am not likely to get on again in a hurry. So I had better watch my time.

There is just one further matter I should like to mention. I was disappointed personally, and I am sure many others are also disappointed, that no mention was made in the speech from the throne of the setting up of a Canada council to support the arts in Canada. It is now about five years since the famous Massey commission recommended the setting up of such a council, but when we heard the statement the other day by the Prime Minister that the government does not contemplate setting up such a council this year we were further disappointed.

It is difficult to understand why a prime minister who sets such a high value on culture as does our Prime Minister should take an attitude like this on this matter. The Prime Minister is a man of culture, he appreciates culture and he comes from a province where recently a Gallup poll showed there were more people supporting the idea of government subsidies for the arts than in any other province of Canada. He comes from a province where artistic culture is probably better established than anywhere else in Canada.

We wonder just what it is the Prime Minister and his cabinet are afraid of, for they must be afraid of something when five years are allowed to go by since that famous report was made. I merely want to say in closing that I trust the Prime Minister and those in his cabinet who are interested in Canadian culture will review the situation, and that before this session ends we shall have a recommendation for the setting up of this long-promised council.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks this session must be directed to the Minister of Finance. In his budget speech last year the minister stated that in 1955 Canada would probably have a gross national product of $25·25 billion. On the basis of that gross national product he intimated that the federal government would probably have a deficit of $160 million. Fortunately for the people of Canada, the minister was apparently somewhat conservative, because instead of a gross national product of $25·25 billion for last year the figure was $26·4 billion, or $1·2 billion more than expected. I would remind the house at this time of what the minister said in his budget speech last year, at page 2733 of Hansard:

> I propose, therefore, to recommend a tax structure which, as closely as I can estimate, would produce a balanced budget if we had a gross national product of about $26 billion.

In view of the fact that the gross national product was $26·4 billion I think it is reasonable to expect that the government will come reasonably close to balancing its budget.

I was interested to note that in a year-end statement, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made the prophecy that in the coming year our gross national product was going to reach $28 billion. If that should happen it is quite likely that in the coming year the government will have a fairly substantial surplus.

I should like to express the hope at this time that the government will use that surplus to give our people a substantial tax cut.

I think tax cuts are needed for very obvious reasons. In the first place, they are needed to bring relief to those in the lower income groups. In the second place they are needed to spur investment in Canadian mines, industry and business.

If the minister should find it possible to bring about tax reduction within the confines of a balanced budget, I would hope that the reduction will be in the field of personal income tax. I would hope it may be possible to increase the income tax exemption for married people from $2,000 to $3,000 and for single people from $1,000 to $1,800. I believe such action would be most beneficial. I sincerely hope that the government will not wait for an election year before they grant such tax reduction.

A good deal has been said already in this debate about the wheat crisis in western Canada, and I should like to refer to it briefly. It has been pointed out many times that the wheat surplus in the west recently reached an historic peak of almost one billion bushels. Out west we have grain in our barns, in our stables, in our granaries, in our elevators. Indeed, many farmers have grain out in their fields which they have not been able to get in.

As a result the great majority of farmers have been unable to deliver enough wheat to pay their ordinary living expenses. During the past four years farm income on the prairies has dropped by almost two-thirds. I do not think it is necessary for me to belabour the point to this house that the western farmer is in real difficulty. The important question we must face this session is, what can be done about it? Is there any practical solution? Dozens of proposals have already been made in this debate. Dozens of other proposals have been made outside the house, throughout the west. Some of those proposals are reasonable; some of them contain food for thought but many of them, in my opinion, have been little more than economic nonsense.

As I see it, this issue is not a political one. It is far too important. I think all political parties should get together to see if they cannot find a practical solution to this problem. In the west, in the past few months, I have asked dozens of farmers this question: If you were the Prime Minister of Canada, what would you do to solve the wheat crisis? Most of them would look at me for a moment, smile a little, and then quite frankly admit that they did not know precisely what an over-all solution would be.

The fact is that, as I see it, there is no easy answer. There is no pat solution. There is no magic formula. If there had been, I am quite sure the government would have been intelligent enough to find it many months ago. What are some of the solutions that have been seriously suggested in this house and elsewhere? I should like to comment on five or six of them.

Some people say that we should give away our wheat to the countries of Asia, or possibly of Europe, as a solution. Speaking for the C.C.F. group the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), as shown on page 88 of Hansard, took such an attitude. Personally I feel that Canada should not hesitate to make modest gifts to needy countries for humanitarian reasons if there is a famine or something of that nature. But to propose that a billion dollars should be set aside for such a purpose is, in my opinion, neither responsible nor practical.

Mr. Nicholson: Give them a stone when they ask for bread.

Mr. Thatcher: As federal representatives we should be just as responsible with the taxpayers' money as we are with our own. I do not think members who make suggestions of this kind would dream of spending their own money in such a reckless fashion. I say again that they should be infinitely more careful in proposing to give away money that belongs to someone else, in this case to the Canadian taxpayer.

Our farmers in the west, I believe, realize that it is not practical to give away all our wheat in order to solve this problem. They know that if we started giving away wheat the government would be called on to give away our butter surplus. If we gave away our wheat surplus, maritimers would expect us to give away our apple surplus. Ontario farmers would reasonably ask the government to give away our cheese surplus. Our textile industry is in difficulty; it could press for action to give away our textiles, and so on. Giving away our wheat, in my opinion—and perhaps I am biased—is not a feasible solution, at this time at least.

Mr. Studer: Give away the socialists.

Mr. Pearson: They have no surplus.

Mr. Thatcher: It has been suggested that we should take sterling from the United Kingdom in payment for wheat. That suggestion has been mooted a great deal in western Canada. I do not believe that is much more practical at this time than the first suggestion. As has been mentioned in this house already, Mr. Gordon Bowen, the United Kingdom senior trade commissioner, came out to Saskatoon a short time before Christmas to address a farm union meeting and was asked this question from the floor by a farmer: "How much more wheat would Canada sell to Britain if we were prepared to take sterling in payment?" Mr. Bowen made the flat and categorical answer: "You would not sell one solitary extra bushel more." So that disposes of this solution.

A third suggestion which is frequently made is that we should cut the price of wheat to encourage consumption. I certainly believe that the Canadian wheat board at all times must meet price competition, because if it does not it is going to lose its traditional markets. But my understanding is that it is already doing this. Today prices paid to United States, United Kingdom, German, Belgian and Argentine producers, and to producers in other countries, are considerably higher than the Canadian export price.

From past experience it seems very doubtful that a cut in price would sell more Canadian wheat. In the depression years the price went as low as 30 cents a bushel, and we did not sell very much more. In fact in some cases we actually sold less, because some of the countries put up the tariff to protect their own home producers against cheap Canadian wheat. It seems to me that if Canada cut her wheat prices today, probably Australia, Argentina and the United States would soon follow suit. None of us would sell any more wheat. Canada probably would not regain a larger proportion of the market, and in the long run the western farmers would be in a worse predicament than when we started. So I reject this third suggestion as not being feasible.

A fourth solution which has sometimes been suggested is that we should reduce the amount of acreage sown to wheat. If, to the extent that wheat acreage is taken out of production, rye, oats, barley, corn or hay is planted in its place, I am all for it. But I think it is contrary to economic sense and to humanitarian principles to encourage a farmer to take his land out of production altogether, when there are so many hungry people in the world.

A fifth suggestion, of which we have heard a good deal in this house, is that we should accept barter in return for our wheat. Personally I have nothing against barter. As a matter of fact, if a nation could be found which had something that Canada could use, to barter for wheat, I would be in favour of it. However, I have not been able to learn of any such country. I would very respectfully point out that those who suggest barter as a method of getting rid of wheat should be more specific. They should talk less in generalities and tell us precisely what country wants to barter with Canada for wheat. Then, if it is practical, let us go ahead with it. Personally I am rather of the opinion that barter would have as much effect on our wheat surplus as a pail of water taken from the Ottawa river would have in lowering its level.

A sixth proposal sometimes put forward is that we should scrap the Canadian wheat board and get back to the Winnipeg grain exchange. This school of thought proposes that we should let the law of supply and demand set the price of wheat. Personally I would hope that this course is not followed, because if the law of supply and demand were setting the price of wheat today, with our huge supplies on hand, the price would soon drop very sharply and drastically.

I could go on about some of the other proposals which have been made in this house to get rid of our wheat surplus. As I see it, none of them would do very much more than nibble at the crux of the problem. In my opinion it is a mistake for any citizen to feel that the government, by waving a magic wand of some kind, can get rid of this wheat. Unfortunately our grain economy is not under the control of the government; it is under the control of an uncontrollable world market.

I have always felt, and I feel more strongly than ever today, that the most practical way for the prairie farmers to get rid of large quantities of this grain is to feed it to livestock and poultry. I believe that such a program should channel some of our borderline grades of feed wheat into livestock consumption rather than into human consumption. I certainly do not suggest that this is the over-all answer. It is not, but it would put a good deal of cash into the hands of the farmer.

Some people will immediately say this is no solution because as soon as you feed grain to livestock and hogs you will have a glut of those particular farm products. I admit there is that danger, but apparently we are not very close to it at the moment. Today we are consuming practically all the beef and hogs we produce in this country. As a matter of fact, lately we have been even consuming a little of the United States production, because since November 12 last, carload after carload of steers has been coming into the Toronto market. Since that date approximately 5,400 United States cattle have been imported for slaughter by Canadian packing houses.

I say that through immigration, through natural increase, our population is growing by 400,000 per year. That is a pretty healthy increase but I do not think it is enough. If the government really wants to do something about the wheat crisis it should increase immigration. It should bring in not 125,000 people a year but 250,000, so that our home markets will be enlarged by people who will eat meat and dairy products. That will be a secure market. That would be the place for our farmers to start to get rid of some of their grain. Our farmers could then safely diversify. They could feed a lot of this wheat to cattle. If the glut is to be ended the government must build up our home market.

I would also remind the house that there is yet another market for Canadian meat products. Today, for reasons of price, Canada is not taking advantage of the provisions of the Geneva trade agreement which permit us to ship large quantities of meat to the United States. For example, as far as cattle are concerned there is a tariff today of 1½ cents per pound on the first 200,000 calves shipped to the United States, and a similar tariff on the first 400,000 cattle over 700 pounds shipped to that country. In the first 11 months of 1955 we only shipped 4,600 calves and 55,000 cattle south of the border. This means in effect that we only took advantage of 1·6 per cent of our minimum market for calves in the United States and 14 per cent of our minimum market for cattle.

What about hogs? Under the Geneva trade agreement we are permitted to send unlimited quantities of hogs to the United States by paying a tariff of 1 cent per pound. Yet last year, again for reasons of price, we only shipped 8,212 hogs. As far as sheep are concerned, we can sell unlimited quantities by paying a tariff of $3 a head, but in the 11-month period we only exported 8,382 sheep. Much the same situation exists in connection with poultry.

I say we are missing the boat. I admit that the United States already has large surpluses of certain meat products. Nevertheless they signed a trade agreement with us which permits Canadian livestock to enter their market when the price is sufficiently attractive. If they live up to the agreement I see no reason why Canadian farmers cannot compete over the ensuing years with a reasonable degree of success.

I repeat that, as I see it, the most practical way for parliament to fight the grain crisis is to encourage our prairie farmers to diversify their economy. If diversification is to be successful our home market must be built up, and the United States market must be cultivated. Personally I think the legislation announced by the government in the speech from the throne, which has as its purpose the paying of abnormal storage charges on wheat, will be welcomed in western Canada by pretty nearly everyone. At the same time I think the government erred in making loans available through the banks instead of making advances on farm-stored grain. However, I am going to comment on that legislation at the appropriate time.

I said a moment ago that in my opinion it is not reasonable to expect the government to solve the wheat crisis by waving a magic wand. However, there is one place where I think the government can be severely criticized. As has already been pointed out by various speakers, there are large quantities of elevator space available in western Canada. Some people suggest that there is space for 100 million bushels. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said this morning that it was only about 58 million. Whether the figure is 100 million or 58 million, that space should be filled. I think the situation which permits such empty elevator space to exist is inexcusable. The minister or the responsible authorities should tell the railroads that they are expected to give top priority to box cars for moving grain. If such action were taken I think it would do more than any other single thing to alleviate immediately the cash picture in the west.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in the more leisurely days of the past it has been customary for all hon. members taking part in the throne speech debate to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As far as I can determine it has been customary to carry out this bit of good manners even on occasions when the recipients were not particularly deserving because their efforts were only fair. However, those leisurely days are gone forever, and we now find ourselves operating on a schedule. We are faced with the problem of conducting ourselves suitably in this new age of efficiency and expedition.

We find ourselves in circumstances where debates, arguments and controversies must be carried on under a pre-set schedule. It is not surprising, therefore, that many hon. members rising to take part in this debate this year find themselves torn between two desires. On the one hand, they wish to comply with the spirit of the new rules and get down to the business at hand as quickly as possible. On the other hand, they do not wish to break away from the traditions of gallantry and good manners evidenced by complimenting the mover and seconder. Our desires in that respect are even less compatible this year because not only gallantry but chivalry are involved on this occasion, since for the first time in the history of this parliament the mover of the address has been a lady.

So here we are impaled on the horns of a dilemma. Shall we proceed to the business before us immediately we rise to speak and run the risk of appearing rude, or shall we carry on the traditional courtesies to which we have become so accustomed and run the danger of infringing on the time of some other hon. member who may have something really worth while to contribute to the debate? By way of compromise I should like on this occasion, not only on behalf of myself but, if they will permit me, on behalf of all hon. members planning to take part in the debate, to congratulate most heartily the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I turn now to the speech from the throne itself, and I wish to quote one short excerpt. It reads:

> Canada has enjoyed, on the whole, a high level of prosperity. Some sectors of the economy have not fully participated in this increased well-being.

Then it goes on to make reference to wheat. I presume, therefore, that one of the sectors which is not participating fully is the industry of agriculture. If the statement refers to agriculture, it is an understatement almost without parallel. I say that for the reason that agriculture is a keystone of our whole economy. I think it is fair to say that about 50 per cent of the people in Canada either directly or indirectly depend upon agriculture for their livelihood. Agriculture is therefore a vital part of our economy. Merely to say in passing that it is a sector which is not sharing fully in the general high prosperity is somewhat similar to a medical doctor's saying, when reporting on the health of a patient, that the patient looked fit all over with one minor exception, namely that his throat was slit from ear to ear.

We should remember that every depression in Canada since confederation began in the first instance because the farmers in this country did not have the purchasing power with which they could go to town and buy a lantern, a set of harness, a tractor or a light plant, as the case may be.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken exception to the fact that some hon. members have seen fit to criticize the fact that our agricultural surpluses are accumulating, especially in wheat. He took the attitude that surpluses are an unmixed blessing, and that we do not ever want to be in the position of old Mother Hubbard. That is perfectly true. But we should remember that almost anything, if carried to excess, can cease to be an advantage. If out of her abundance nature showers us with material blessings in the way of food, raw materials for clothing and so on, and if this country of ours becomes, literally and figuratively, a land overflowing with milk and honey, it is a good thing provided that special difficulties are not created. In most cases special difficulties of economics arise under those circumstances. It should be remembered that the promised land which overflowed with milk and honey is now a desert. Anything can become excessive. It is always possible to reach the point where virtues become vices and where assets become liabilities. When the minister put his defence of surpluses on those grounds I could not help being reminded of a young lady in my province who went to a psychiatrist complaining bitterly that her husband claimed that she was crazy simply because she liked pancakes. The psychiatrist said, "Your husband must be a most unreasonable man, because I myself like pancakes". She said, "Is that really so? You must come over to my house some time and look at mine. I have a whole trunkful".

Surpluses in themselves are not something of which we should be afraid. But if agricultural surpluses mean that we are going to have a depression in agriculture, with the attendant dislocation of our whole economy, we must be concerned with excess surpluses. If this government are developing a guilt complex over the present state of affairs as did Macbeth after he committed his well-known crime, I suppose they will have misgivings about their course of action. As you will remember, Mr. Speaker, under those circumstances Macbeth was visited by several characters from the hereafter. I do not think it has been definitely established whether or not that sort of thing ever occurs with the cabinet but if it does it might be appropriate that one of the visitors the cabinet might have from the hereafter would be one of the same visitors that Macbeth had on that memorable night. Among the ghosts who visited him was a farmer who had hanged himself on thinking of the prospects of a bounteous harvest. That is about the position in which the farmers of Canada find themselves at the present time.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the situation in agriculture—at least in my part of the country; I do not pretend to be able to speak for the west—is extremely serious. Agriculture cannot continue to exist in the economic atmosphere in which it now finds itself. It is true that the result will not be felt for some time. It is true that the farmers are still carrying on trying to make ends meet while their machinery is wearing out, their soil is being mined and they are drawing on their capital in every way. It is also true, especially in my province, that farms are still being operated by elderly people who cannot, at their stage in life, change to some other more profitable occupation. Hence they decide to mine their soil, let their plant run down and eke out a living in that fashion until they are old enough to qualify for admittance to an old people's home. The tragedy of it is that among the rising generation there is almost no one to whom agriculture appeals sufficiently, on economic grounds, to entice him to the land to carry on where his father left off.

Defenders of the present agricultural situation may take refuge in statistics to prove that farmers are not as badly off as we farmers think we are. I should like to point out that statistics are a good thing if properly interpreted and if used for the purpose for which they were intended, but one should not forget that there are a great many things that statistics do not tell. When statistics say that the net farm income of the Canadian farmer has dropped by a certain percentage, it means more than just a few cold figures. It means that with every percentage drop in the net income there are hundreds if not thousands of farms in Canada that have been operating for a century which must go out of business. These farms rapidly reach the point where they have little or no market value as agricultural land, quickly reach the point of no return, and are thus permanently lost to the Canadian people as a potential source of food and clothing.

It may be true that a few favoured farmers are still doing reasonably well. There may be farmers who find themselves with a large plant, a local market, good land and other special circumstances which put them in a favoured position. But all the farmers in Canada are not large producers. I do not have the figures for Canada, but it is a fact that in the United States 50 per cent of the agricultural production is produced by 10 per cent of the farmers. The other 90 per cent are important people, too. If they are eliminated from our economy, dire results will ensue. So I hope no one will try to dismiss the very difficult situation in which thousands of Canadian farmers find themselves by saying that farm net income has only dropped by a certain percentage in the last year.

As I said before, statistics can be deceiving. It is said that at one time there was a lumber camp in New Brunswick in which there were 100 men and two female cooks employed. Some statistician reporting on the state of the camp, and noting that one of the men had married one of the cooks, reported that 1 per cent of the men had married 50 per cent of the women.

There are three possible explanations of the government's apparent lack of concern about present conditions. One possible explanation is that the government do not realize the seriousness of the situation. It may be, too, that they know what is happening but think it is a good thing and are willing to let it happen. They may argue that our economy is out of balance, that we produce too much food, that there are too many farmers and some of them must be eliminated by the cold laws of economics. It may be that they realize the situation but find themselves powerless to do anything effective about it.

But agriculture is of tremendous importance to the Canadian people. It is, I believe, of vital importance not only for economic reasons but for other reasons as well. Some of the most obvious economic reasons, of course, are that we in Canada are one of the best fed nations in the world. This results from the efficiency of Canadian agriculture. If Canadian agriculture is permanently damaged, that will not continue to be the case. We depend on agriculture for many other raw materials besides food. We depend on agriculture for much of our clothing, and in a broader sense we depend on the soil for the raw materials of the pulp and paper industry and many other things. About 50 per cent of the Canadian people are dependent, directly or indirectly, on the products of the soil for their livelihood.

In this connection I should like to quote briefly from a small pamphlet entitled, "At the first table". It is written by Mr. Stewart Page, the agricultural representative for North Simcoe. He says:

> More and more we are learning to look at the land as the major source of real wealth, and to farming as a high art. We are learning that while soil fertility is highly perishable, it is also a renewable resource, and herein lies the art of good farming—How to extract a living from the soil in such a manner as to be able to pass on the farm to the next generation in a more fertile condition than we found it?
>
> What we need most for Canada, and for Simcoe county, is a readjustment of basic values so that the dollar will once more be the servant of man, not its master. Half of the world is hungry and needs our surplus food but we have priced ourselves out of the world market. Over half of our soils are hungry but we have put such a high value on the services of labour, industry and commerce that there is seldom enough left over to feed the soil.
> The crux of the whole problem today is that our greatest natural resource, the soil, must subsist as best it can on the scraps left over from the banquets of our highly artificial way of life. This was the way of all vanished civilizations of the past and we are travelling along the same road but at the speed of jet propulsion.

There is a very good sociological reason, too, why the economy of our rural areas and small towns must be preserved. After all, it still is a fact that the rural areas and the small towns are the wellsprings from which our civilization draws its leaders for the most part. In that connection I should like to quote very briefly from the footnote in a book recently written by Louis Bromfield entitled "From my Experience". This footnote appears on page 53:

> It is not perhaps without significance that the vast majority of the names listed in Who's Who are those of men who came from farms or from small communities in agricultural territory. Even with the immense development of industry and cities, the leadership of the country in all fields seems still to come very largely from rural areas where a sense of responsibility and maturity grows from work and contacts with the soil and with livestock, and where, more often than not, a boy or a girl learns to work and to think for what he gets in this life.

From the point of view of public health it is important, too. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) pointed out very forcibly the other day figures which are shocking so far as the physical condition of the average Canadian youth is concerned. I believe I am right in saying that this condition is worse in the large metropolitan areas. As the agricultural industry is starved, more and more people are forced to move into metropolitan areas and more and more people find themselves growing up in the larger cities where life itself is perverted. The justification for the existence of many of these cities no longer exists in this day of rapid transportation, instantaneous communication and the atom bomb.

The hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Reinke) pointed out recently one of the symptoms of the unnatural life lived by thousands of people in large cities. He pointed out that conditions were such that children on many streets in some of our cities are no safer than they would be in the jungles of Africa.

The obvious question to ask is, what is the answer? One of the most thorny problems facing all Canadians at the present time, of course, is the question of our wheat surplus, but I do not intend to take up the time of the house on that matter. However, in some other agricultural fields we do not have a surplus, yet the situation is little better.

I come from an area where the chief cash crop is potatoes. At the present time the farmers are asked to operate and to continue to produce one of the most basic foods of our country at a continual loss, and this at a time when Canada has not a net surplus of potatoes. Those producers of potatoes are asked to sell their product on an unprotected market, subject to being flooded with surplus potatoes from the United States with no duty chargeable on them. Those same farmers are asked to buy much of their equipment on the protected markets of the industrial areas of central Canada. We in the maritimes feel that this is not a reasonable or a fair state of affairs, and we hope that action will be taken to rectify it.

Some people will say that it is easy to talk, but what are we to do? If we go to the United States and point out these inequalities in our tariffs as between the two countries, they will say they must not be offended because they will retaliate with some other tariff. I feel very strongly that the United States people are reasonable, and if the situation were fairly explained, not so much to the experts but to the legislators of the United States who are required to make a decision, a reasonable decision could be arrived at.

A few weeks ago another member of this house and I had the privilege, along with a number of members of parliament from various European countries, of being guests of the United States government for some time in that country. While in Washington I found myself seated at dinner next to a very well-known United States representative. He asked me about the state of the economy in the maritime provinces. Among other things I mentioned this matter of the depressed state of the potato industry, which concerns us in many areas there. In passing I mentioned the tariff situation with which we are expected to cope. I said that our growers were not very happy about having to sell their product in the United States over a tariff of 35½ cents a hundredweight while United States potatoes come into their market duty free.

His reaction was, "I could not agree with them more. I think it is an unreasonable state of affairs." If he were a typical United States citizen described by the defenders of the present situation, I would have expected him to say, "It serves them right, because if we do anything for the potato grower, we shall have to do something for the apple grower, too."

We in the maritimes have the growing feeling that the horizons of almost all federal governments are limited to a varying extent. We have the feeling that the horizons of most federal governments are bound on the east by the St. Lawrence valley and on the west by the great lakes. We feel strongly that it is not only the members of the governments themselves who err in this direction, but the whole of parliament. None of us is as well acquainted with our country as we should be. As a suggestion toward correcting this situation, I would like to see members of parliament given the right to travel free at least twice a year on the air lines of our country so that members whose homes are in the extremities could have the opportunity to visit their constituencies, and those from central Canada could avail themselves of the opportunity to become personally acquainted with the problems that exist in other parts of Canada.

In the maritimes we have the feeling that if a problem of national importance arises, either in our part of the country or in the west, it is just simply beyond the ken of the government. We are not pleased with the lethargy of this government with regard to the problems facing the agricultural industry of this country and the west and the maritimes in general. Apologists for the government will say, "After all, you cannot expect a cure overnight. This is a democracy, and a democracy is like a good wife, very attractive but not fast." That is their excuse for not doing anything about it. I would point out that this is not a legitimate excuse for not doing anything. Action must be taken immediately to correct the situation if irreparable damage is not to be caused.

In the maritimes we have the feeling that the lethargy of the government is proportional, perhaps, to the square, or even the cube, of the distance of the problem away from Ottawa, and we are getting absolutely fed up with this state of affairs. Therefore we have two major problems facing the Canadian people at the present time. On the one hand, generally speaking, we have the depressed state of the agricultural industry, and on the other hand the fact that the maritime provinces, and to a lesser extent the west, continues in a state of chronic depression.

When my ancestors, and the ancestors of all the people of the maritimes, were pushed, either by religious persecution or by economic pressures, from the countries of Europe, they came to what are now the maritime provinces because they looked like a land of promise, and they were a land of promise. They progressed and prospered wondrously well for many years, as a matter of fact, until confederation. For more than 80 years confederation has hung like a killing blight over the economy of the maritimes. That is a tragic thing to have to say; nevertheless it is so. We in the maritimes whose ancestors came to a land of plenty find ourselves forced to migrate again because of economic conditions. Our patience is running out.

[Mr MacLean.]

The patience of the agricultural people of Canada is running out. After all, this government is now starting on its twenty-first year in office, and the problems of the maritimes and of agriculture remain unsolved. The farmers of Canada and the people of the maritimes are dissatisfied with this situation, because they remember that even Rip Van Winkle woke up after 20 years.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted at the outset of my remarks to pay my respects to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the motion now before the house. I think this is probably one of the finer practices which have grown up over the years concerning this debate. The mover and seconder are placed at a disadvantage in that they are the first to speak in the debate. They are notified in advance, and this year they certainly appear to have done considerable work, from the efforts they have made.

I am not so well acquainted with the seconder of the address, as he has just come to the house; but judging from the way he conducted himself I would say that it augurs well for the people of Canada when we have men of such ability standing for public office. It augurs well for the people of his own constituency and province.

I should like to say something about the mover of the address. She has handled herself with obvious distinction and ability while in this chamber, and I would say has been far above the average in her attendance and conduct of affairs. In particular I should like to refer to her work as a committee member, for it is in committee that the ability of a member is made known. I noted in the committees in which I have been associated with the hon. member that she has been most faithful in attendance and has shown a distinct ability in the conduct of the affairs of the committee. If necessary she can be very forceful.

If I were in authority I would recommend to the Prime Minister that when he is looking for a way in which to express the wishes of the government by giving advancement to hon. members, he would be well advised to look with favour upon the mover of this address, not because she is a woman but because of the ability which she undoubtedly has and which she has manifested in this chamber.

I should like to refer now to a matter which has to do with money. Loans of up to $500 are controlled by the Small Loans Act of 1939. I have no complaint whatsoever with regard to the majority of moneylenders who operate under this act. I am fully aware of the great need for such a service, because obviously the banking system under which we operate has not met the needs and wishes of a certain cross section of our population. I am aware also of the great good which moneylenders have accomplished, especially during and following world war II when many of our people had need of immediate cash for emergency purposes and to consolidate obligations incurred while in the armed forces or during the course of the war. This money was not available from any other source.

There has sprung up in the business sections of most of our communities numerous loan companies and moneylenders which are doing a most aggressive business in lending money, not solely to meet the necessities of persons but to satisfy the desires and whims of the Canadian people. Our newspapers contain large advertisements urging people to borrow money and using such slogans as "I like to lend money" or "We have the money you need in the amount you want" or "Phone for your loan in one trip". Many other catch phrases are used.

The slogans I have given were taken from the daily newspapers, but our motor buses and street cars blare forth the need to hurry to such and such a loan company to borrow up to $2,400 without any guarantee being required. Billboards impress upon the passing motorist how simple it is to get money without any security. The radio and television impress the listener and viewer with the simplicity of getting money for a trip to Florida or the purchase of a new television set. Many of the companies operating in Canada do so with United States capital, and naturally the profits of their operations go to United States investors.

We seem to have forgotten the fatherly and wise financial advice given by our bankers. It may be that our bankers have expressed too much concern, or shown too much restraint in the manner in which they make advances. We forget also that we have the privilege of banding together in credit unions which are growing in numbers so rapidly throughout this country. Money can be borrowed from a credit union at a rate usually not exceeding 1 per cent, after investigation by the other members of the credit union.

Under the provisions of the Small Loans Act a moneylender may charge 2 per cent per month for a period of 15 months and 1 per cent per month thereafter on loans of not more than $500. On this basis, in the year 1940—that is 15 years ago—the Canadian people borrowed approximately $20 million from loan companies and moneylenders. As I say, these were in amounts not exceeding $500. By January 1, 1954, the amount borrowed by the Canadian people during the preceding year had grown to $175 million. Owing to the power of publicity and advertising, it is estimated that in the calendar year 1955 the Canadian people borrowed approximately $200 million in amounts under $500.

Even with this class of loan, if it were divided among all the Canadian population of 16 million it would mean that each man, woman and child in Canada had borrowed approximately $14. However, this is not exactly the true picture, since it covers only loans up to an amount of $500. I have been told by the manager of a reputable loan company that the average loan today is for an amount far in excess of $500.

I hold in my hand a report from a commercial agency in my constituency showing the chattel mortgages that were filed in the county clerk's office in one week; this happens to be the week of November 30, 1955. This indicates that altogether there were 115 loans of which registration was made, and of those 115 loans there were only 18 under $500. Those over $2,000 numbered 5. As 5 and 18 make 23, you will readily see that 92 of these loans were for amounts between $500 and $2,000, in other words, approximately 90 per cent of the loans made.

I hold in my hand also a further report, for the week of December 14, 1955, which shows a similar situation. In that week there were 141 loans, of which 16 were under $500. Five were over $2,000, leaving 120 between $500 and $2,000. This leaves about the same percentage referred to above. This indicates to me that between the amounts of $500 and $2,000 there is a vast field of borrowing, a great deal of which is without proper departmental control or supervision.

We may reasonably ask why we should concern ourselves with any supervision in this field. After all, this is a free country, and business should not be interfered with by a paternal government. My answer to this would be that, if two and two are four, it is reasonable to assume that 200 and 200 would then be 400. If $500 in 1939 was of value—and it was—to the extent of $500 at that time, all will agree that today it is the equivalent of about $1,000 to $1,500 or in that neighbourhood. Therefore if it was necessary and beneficial to the Canadian people in 1939, it is equally of benefit to us in 1956 to have an increased amount of control over the loans made under this act, especially since the economy has been expanding so rapidly.

From the investigations I have made I find that in connection with loans up to $500 there are very few infractions of the act or of ethics in the operation of the act, but it is between the sums of $500 and $2,000 that there is no control, and I regret to say that in many respects the ethical standards of the moneylenders in many cases leave something to be desired. Let me repeat that I have no quarrel with borrowing for needs such as medical and hospitalization necessities or any other necessities for the home or the family, but I do not believe that we should instil in our people the belief that money can be gained easier by the toss of the pen than by the tug of the plow.

Most of this borrowing is secured by an assignment of wages given by the borrower and directed to the employer, or by obtaining security on the individual's household furniture, motor car or other chattel he might happen to have. When default is made, the more reliable companies interview the borrower to see wherein the difficulty lies, to find out why he has made default and try to help him to correct the practice into which he has fallen. They will try to work out a solution that will be of benefit both to the borrower and to the moneylender. But the more unscrupulous moneylender will seize or threaten to seize the goods and chattels pledged, and some may take garnishee proceedings on the wages, or threaten or cajole the borrower into refinancing the loan, for which an extra charge is made by the moneylender, and often a bonus is extracted.

It is in this particular case where, I believe, the greatest evil results; in the refinancing of these loans when the borrower falls into default. Legal expenses are added, though I have not been able to find out whether they are incurred. Insurance in large amounts is added. I have one example here in which insurance of $177 has been added on a loan of $950.

Over the years the government has done much to lessen the fears which beset our people. Family allowances have reduced the fear of youth; old age security has reduced the fear of old age; blind allowances have reduced the fear of blindness; unemployment insurance has reduced the fear of unemployment. Now I urge that controls be extended to reduce the fear of the loan shark.

Persons borrowing money are living in a state of acute fear, to such an extent that they will not give information with respect to their borrowings for fear of reprisals by the moneylenders.

However, I have in my hand evidence that excessive amounts are being charged on loans in excess of $500. I hold here a copy of an affidavit filed in the supreme court of Ontario in an action instituted by a moneylender. It is his own affidavit and in it he claims 33 per cent interest on the balance of principal which, in the schedule to the affidavit, appears to be $1,270. At the rate of 33 per cent he is claiming some $590 per annum as interest. I will be pleased to turn this information over to the persons in authority when the time arrives.

I have also interviewed a borrower who obtained a loan of $800 and had to repay therefor the sum of $1,200 within a period of two years. This loan has been completely paid off. I have interviewed another borrower who obtained a loan of over $3,600 for which slightly over $4,400 had to be repaid. This loan was also repaid in full within the period of a year, but the rate of interest works out to about 30 per cent per annum.

All these claims for interest may be perfectly legal, but in my opinion they are highly excessive and should be controlled. I am therefore recommending that the provisions of the Small Loans Act be extended to control loans up to $2,000. Loans over $500, as I have pointed out, are where the great evil enters the picture. Up to $500 everything seems to be in order because such loans are quite closely controlled by the department of insurance.

Borrowers of amounts over $500 are often faced with the necessity of paying a bonus to obtain a loan. The borrower is in such a financial position that he wants to raise a sum of money; and for various reasons, usually because of his credit standing, the moneylender will require that he either pay a cash bonus, or he will give him a loan of a stated amount taking therefor a mortgage for a larger amount. Of course, in the first place a person of this type would probably be better off if he was not given a loan, because on the basis of his past record in handling money he is not in a position to handle it in such a way as to come out of the deal profitably.

If the terms of repayment are too onerous and the borrower makes default for one month the unscrupulous moneylender will, after the exercise of pressure, enter into a refinancing arrangement under which the first loan and bonus are absorbed in an arrangement whereby a second bonus is taken, until eventually the property of the borrower is so encumbered that any equity in the chattel or real estate disappears, and then possession is taken over by the moneylender.

This actually came to my attention recently in a case in my own constituency which is also on record in the supreme court of Ontario wherein, from correspondence with the moneylender's solicitor, I find that the borrower approached the finance company for a loan of $2,000, which he obtained. The security given was a mortgage for $2,500 with interest being charged at 2 per cent per month on the $2,000. In other words the actual money advanced had interest added at 2 per cent per month. The mortgage was to run for a period of six months, when the whole amount was to become due and payable.

At the expiration of the six-month period the borrower was not in a position to pay the balance of the $2,500. So he approached the moneylender and an arrangement was entered into whereby a further bonus of $500 was added to the $2,500 and a rate of interest of 2 per cent per month on the whole $3,000 was inserted in the contract. Therefore the borrower wound up by getting $2,000 cash and giving security for $3,000, with interest at 2 per cent per month on the $3,000.

Eventually default was made on the mortgage and it was foreclosed. The property was lost and, incidentally, the borrower's family were separated, the wife going to one part of the country to find a job and the husband to another part of the country to find employment.

A further unsatisfactory practice which I believe is not prohibited by the act is where a loan is made for a stated amount and an amount equivalent to the first monthly payment is deducted immediately and interest charged on the whole loan. A case has come to my attention recently where the first monthly payment was deducted by the moneylender immediately the loan was given. The loan has not been repaid yet, and it will be interesting to find what adjustment is made by the moneylender when the loan is repaid in full.

All such practices, which I am sure can be repeated and magnified many times by many members of the house, tend to stain the reputation of the legitimate and reputable loan companies and moneylenders who are trying to do a good job by maintaining high ethical standards and by retaining a reputation for fair dealing in the performance of a worthwhile service. I therefore suggest to the government that an examination be made into the whole practice of personal loans up to $5,000 to see what can be done to protect the citizens of our country, and to remove some of the unsatisfactory practices which now appear to be in vogue.

Here again I realize the difficulty in getting evidence of such malpractice because of the fear of people in coming forward to give evidence. First of all, they do not want other people to know about their financial dealings, their banking practices and their personal affairs. Second, they are afraid that if they do come forward to give evidence the loans which they at that time have will be jeopardized and they will suffer considerable loss.

I have received a number of anonymous letters telling of sordid cases, some in Montreal, others in Hull, Toronto and elsewhere, none of which letters can be used because they are anonymous. But I am sure these matters are within the knowledge of the industry itself, and I am glad to see that the Canadian consumer loan association is most anxious that any unsavoury practice be stamped out. As a matter of fact I have a letter from the president of the association, which states in part:

> The Canadian consumer loan association wholeheartedly supports your view that legislation should be drawn so as to protect the welfare of these borrowers. We congratulate you on your industry and enterprise on speaking out on behalf of the people in the Windsor area.

As to the amount of interest being charged —and this matter is the subject of legislation which is now before this house—a study should be made to see what is an equitable rate. Having in mind the fact that few loans today are for $500 or less, and having in mind the large amount of work that is involved in the processing of a small loan, it may be that 2 per cent per month, which is the present rate, is not excessive. I am sure that the loan companies would have no objection to a considerably lower rate of interest on amounts in excess of $500. As a matter of fact I have discussed this matter with the head of a loan company. I have his letter which indicates that they would be quite pleased to have a lower rate of interest on amounts in excess of $500 up to, say, $1,500 or $2,000.

However, the people at large are not without fault. From a study of the report of the superintendent of insurance we find that those who apply for those loans are usually repeaters. They are persons who are continually in the hands of some loan company. They do not seem to be able to keep ahead with respect to their own financial dealings. They seem to need some paternal care. I think that is a further reason why we should see that the provisions of this act are extended. It seems to me that the average individual who takes out a loan from a moneylender is interested not so much in the amount of interest he is being charged or the other charges that are being added to his loan but rather is interested in how much a month he will be obliged to pay. The matter that interests him is, how much do I have to pay to get this loan? If he figures that he can pay that amount of money each month, he is quite satisfied.

If we are going to protect the general body of the public in Canada from the financial slavery of which we hear, I strongly recommend to the government that first of all the provisions of the Small Loans Act be extended to $2,000, so that in that act coverage will be given to an amount of $2,000; and further that there be an investigation—either departmental, by royal commission or otherwise, as the government may see fit—into the operation of all these personal loans up to an amount of $5,000.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, in congratulating the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and in welcoming the new members to this house, I should like to mention particularly the new hon. member from New Brunswick who is with us. To put the matter statistically, as the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) would, we have increased the Conservative representation from New Brunswick by one-third. If in the future we are able to get one-third as much for New Brunswick as we have been able to get in the past two years, we shall really be able to take our place in the economic sun.

During the by-election campaign it was my pleasure to spend a brief time in the constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska. While I should not like to hold myself out as an authority on all matters in that constituency, I think there is a lesson to be learned by those senators, cabinet members and M.P.'s who came in from outside our province to take part in that campaign. I derived a great deal of personal satisfaction out of the result because I knew that the people up in the northern part of our province, by voting in the present hon. member, had completely rejected the election ideas those outsiders had when they came into New Brunswick. It certainly gave me a great deal of satisfaction to know that our French-speaking citizens and other people in New Brunswick were willing to make their own decision. As hospitable as we may be at other times, at election times we insist that certain conduct foreign to us be left at home.

Long before this session began, Mr. Speaker, it was obvious that economic conditions were looming large as points of discussion. It is in Canada the day of new heights of resource and capital investment. It is the day of prosperous economic conditions. It is in Canada the day of shattering gross national products. It is also the day of great national projects. I should like particular notice to be taken of that last reference, because it is my main theme in these few remarks.

Having said that we are in a period of great economic development in Canada, the question that immediately comes to mind is this. How are we in New Brunswick sharing in that development? I cannot do better than to quote from a review that was made by two professors at the University of New Brunswick. I refer to professors Smith and Whalen, both personal friends of mine. They are brilliant young men who undoubtedly could have proceeded west or elsewhere and done exceptionally well, as have a great many other maritimers. However, they have chosen to stay with us and help us during these crucial times. May I quote the first part of a review they did recently with respect to our economic development:

> New Brunswick entered confederation in 1867 with a highly mature and prosperous economic system. The provincial economy was then based almost entirely on forest and sea, and these basic occupations sustained small agricultural, manufacturing, handicraft, and service industries. The techniques of wood, wind and water (that is, lumbering, shipbuilding and the carrying trade) were favourably developed during the first half of the nineteenth century in a province girt by the sea with a climate highly conducive to the growing of trees.
> After 1880, however, the rate of economic growth in New Brunswick began to lag far behind that of the Canadian economy as a whole. This was due to a number of factors, including the development of the steamship, the construction of a national transcontinental rail system, the growth of protectionism, certain technological changes especially in manufacturing, and the opening of the Panama canal.

To put the matter in my own words, as applied to present-day circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I would say this. Personal income is perhaps the best indicator of our situation. To express it as a percentage of the Canadian personal per capita income, we know that our figure declined from 72·4 per cent in 1946 to 61·8 per cent in 1953. That is an alarming situation. In 1954, the latest year for which figures are available, we only reached the per capita personal income that the rest of Canada had attained in 1946.

It was natural, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that when the speech from the throne unfolded we should look for some definite word about a particular economic development that might help us in New Brunswick. We heard about pipe lines; we heard about wheat, but I am afraid there was no direct reference to anything that would materially assist us in this economic picture today. On January 12, at page 49 of Hansard the Prime Minister gave us some sort of an explanation for this omission from the speech from the throne. I quote his words:

> I said we felt that parliament should not provide for sharing in the cost of provincial projects except in special circumstances and as a part of a policy which we could justify on national grounds.

Please notice those words, "national grounds", again, Mr. Speaker, because they continue my theme. The situation in New Brunswick today is good so far as future possibilities are concerned. We have been fortunate in discovering new minerals in that province, and with the development of those we hope that the future will be much brighter. However, a snag has cropped up in our plans. We find that in order to locate smelters to refine the minerals in that province we must provide cheap electric power. We have potential power there, as everyone is aware, but we are not able to finance it properly. We do not have such resources in the provincial treasury, and it has been necessary to make appeals to the federal government for some sort of interest free or low interest loan. So far the federal government has not seen fit to assist us in this way. They have said it is a provincial matter and that they cannot possibly help us because it is not a national project. Please notice that reference again, Mr. Speaker; they said it was not a national project.

I ask very seriously here today, what is the difference between a pipe line out west which cannot possibly benefit us in the maritimes in any way, and one of our own local development projects such as the Beechwood project I have mentioned? On September 13, 1955, it was announced that a joint agreement between the federal government and the government of Ontario had been reached with respect to a plan of financing to assist the new Alberta pipe line. The principle is there, Mr. Speaker. There is direct assistance given by the federal and provincial governments. As I have said, we cannot see what difference there is between our own project and a project such as a pipe line.

Second, I would mention the seaway. We were very wary of the seaway. We were annoyed at the lack of consideration that was given to the future of maritime ports when the seaway was being talked about originally. We are growing more suspicious every day. During the past summer there were one or two items that came to light that bear out the fact our fears were not completely groundless. On November 10, 1955, Mr. Chevrier, in an address in Boston said this about the seaway:

> A great increase in the flow of traffic between the St. Lawrence seaway area and the New England states was forecast here last night by Lionel Chevrier, president of the Canadian seaway authority.
> He told members of the New England railroad club that this would result from expansion of industry and population in the seaway area which "would be of advantage to both areas and the transportation lines that connect them."
>
> "Rapid economic growth in both the United States and Canada is diminishing potential dislocating effects on existing transportation," Mr. Chevrier declared. "Industrial areas exchange traffic readily with other industrial areas and where the distances are not great the volume may become very large."
> It was for this reason—with industrial expansion due to the seaway in mind—that he predicted a significant increase in what is now a relatively light flow of traffic between New England and central Canada.

Where do the maritimes fit into that prediction by Mr. Chevrier? Then we had a further cause for alarm with respect to the seaway when a strike occurred in Saint John. One of our large employers of labour, the sugar refinery was in a state of expansion, and as the result of a disagreement with the union it was found necessary to cease work. Negotiations were halted by both parties. Finally the matter was settled on December 8, and a significant statement was made by the management. It is worth noting that the management control of this organization is in central Canada. This is what they said:

> Referring to union demands for a shorter work week, the statement said that throughout negotiations the company conceded that a 48-hour work week had become outmoded. It had "frankly and clearly put its cards on the negotiating table with respect to major location disadvantages which have been highlighted in an economic survey just completed, the major impact of which will be felt with the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway."

This is the great national project that is going to help all of Canada. No, Mr. Speaker, we find it very difficult to see why it is that wheat can become a great national project; the South Saskatchewan dam can become a national project, yet one of our projects such as Beechwood, the development of a merchant navy or maritime coal, cannot be. The latter would seem to result in benefits to us all.

I suggest we have serious problems to overcome in the maritimes in our efforts to sell these ideas of ours. First we must sell the Canadian people the fact that we have a small diversified economy because of our location, our geography and the fact that we have no one particularly large industry. We will, therefore, always be in this category. We have no large rivers; we have nothing that fits into the Canadian economy which could possibly give us an opportunity of saying that it would benefit all the provinces. It must be appreciated from the beginning that we are small, and consideration must be given.

I feel that perhaps the more difficult problem that has to be overcome is what has been described as the Ottawa mentality. I refer to the politicians in Ottawa who refuse to look any farther than the Rideau canal.

They refuse to look down to the sea and realize that we do have an important part to play in the development of Canada. It has been said that we are a nation of landlubbers. That is true, Mr. Speaker. Instead of being a great maritime nation, we are controlled from central Canada. It really amuses me to hear people in this part of the country talk about these great national projects, and in the same breath refer to Sir John A. Macdonald's great national policies. He would have shuddered to think of some of the narrow-minded projects that seem to be considered national policies today.

We must revise our thinking with respect to these words that are bandied about so much today, namely "national projects". With respect to these enterprises, everybody in Canada must take a look at them and think once again about what we mean when we say "national projects". The government is entirely to blame for hiding behind these words in the way they have been doing of late. Perhaps we are all to blame for not thinking correctly about them but I think we could go further and say that the government is taking unfair advantage of the use of those words.

A dominion-provincial conference was held last year. We arrived here with what we thought was a new approach to the matter. We had our own formula and proposals to make. In fact, I believe it was recognized on the floor of the conference that our proposals were most ingenious. We had a formula worked out which suggested that our per capita income should reach 85 per cent of the average per capita income of the dominion. We were not asking for 100 per cent, only 85 per cent. That meant that we were asking that the people in our part of the country should have a standard of living 85 per cent as good as the Canadian average. What happened? After some encouragement we now have some indication of what is to be given to the provinces?

In this connection I can only quote an editorial that appeared in the Globe and Mail of January 13 with respect to announcements that were made regarding the new tax agreement. I should also like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Globe and Mail deserves a great deal of credit for the enlightened approach it is taking to the ills of the maritime provinces. It is very gratifying to all of us to see the tremendous interest the Globe and Mail is taking in the situation down there. All summer long there were very good articles on our conditions, and they are well aware of our problems.

[Mr. Bell.]

In the final paragraph of the editorial the Globe and Mail sums up our arguments in much better language than I could use today. I quote:

> Where fiscal need is fully apparent, as in the maritimes, the new formula is as inadequate as the old. If Ontario's contributions to British Columbia, Alberta and Quebec were lumped together and distributed to the maritime provinces, the national interest would be better served. And Ontario would be glad to make that contribution to the advancement of confederation's objectives.

Perhaps this is a new approach to this whole problem of ours. I have tried to point out the fears that are gripping our thinking with the ill-advised and ill-timed use of these words "national projects". I can only say in closing that it was a professor from the maritimes who is now out west, Professor Norman MacKenzie, who said that the provinces' economic welfare depends on Canada's prosperity. I ask, Mr. Speaker, how can Canada be prosperous when we have such a festering sore down east?

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to join with the hon. members who have spoken in this debate in congratulating the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I would also like at the beginning to bring greetings from my home city of Edmonton, still the fastest growing city in Canada, we believe, and now popularly known as the home of the Grey cup.

On behalf of the people of Edmonton-Strathcona I would like to say how happy we were to have seen so many federal cabinet ministers out west during the past year. It is hoped that the members of the cabinet who did not get out west in 1955 will somehow or other find it possible to visit Alberta during the present year. Indeed, I hope that all eastern members of parliament, especially those who have not yet seen the west, will find some opportunity this year to pay us a visit. It seems likely that we may have another Grey cup match out west this year; and if we do, the city of Edmonton is looking forward to another very happy occasion at that time, and we think it would be appropriate for as many members of parliament from the east as possible to visit us on that occasion.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that all Alberta rejoiced when the Prime Minister found it possible to come out to Alberta early in September to participate in the celebration of our golden jubilee. His visit on that occasion was reminiscent of the visit of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the time of the inauguration of the province of Alberta 50 years ago. On behalf of the people whom I have the honour to represent I should like again to express my thanks to the Prime Minister for taking time off to visit us on that occasion, in spite of the very arduous responsibilities which he carries at all times here in Ottawa.

I should also like to compliment the government on the fact that the speech from the throne gives every indication that our country will continue to enjoy prosperity during the next 12 months. While there may be some soft spots in our economy, such as the wheat surplus that we have heard so much about in the last week, I am confident that the government will do whatever needs to be done to bring those soft spots into line with the general high level of our national prosperity. I should like to commend the government on the steps it has already proposed. They will be a big help to our farmers out west, who are hard pressed for ready cash. However, further steps may be necessary, and if they are I am sure our government will not be found lacking.

I have already placed a resolution on the order paper concerning the wheat surplus, and I shall refrain from making any further reference to it at the present time. However, there are some matters that I should like to draw to the attention of the government.

In recent months we have had considerable publicity in northern Alberta on the subject of our northern Alberta Indians. This publicity has quite rightly caused a good deal of concern amongst those who feel very keenly for this particular ethnic group who make up part of our population. Personally I am convinced that there is a good deal of hardship, if not actual distress, amongst our northern Alberta Indians. This opinion is based upon reports I have received from what I consider to be very reliable sources.

I would like to state here and now that I very definitely do not consider myself to be an authority on Indian affairs. I doubt, in fact, that we have very many authorities on Indian affairs in this parliament at the present time. However, the Indians are our problem, and we must do our best to deal with it as adequately as we can. I believe it is one of the most difficult problems we face in Canada today.

I am sure there is not one of us who would not like to see our Indian population taking their full and rightful place in our national, social and economic life, with full citizenship status. I believe that is the goal we have for our Indian population, or at least I hope it is.

But we must be realistic. I think we must face the fact that many Indians are not yet ready, and probably will not be ready for some time, to become fully integrated with the rest of our population. I think it can be said that our Indians are free to move about in our society if they so desire, but unfortunately most of them have chosen a sort of self-imposed isolation. The reason for this unfortunate situation appears to be a combination of lack of education, lack of trade skills, language and other cultural barriers.

I believe another motive behind this self-imposed isolation is their natural desire for self-preservation, the idea that if they forsake their reserves they are in danger of losing everything. I believe that somehow or other we have to persuade them that they should find a better way of life, and we should try to have them leave the reservations and find employment in the general population.

There are those who go so far as to say that some Indians are gradually losing ground as the other elements of our Canadian civilization advances steadily. I do not consider myself a judge of this situation, but if there is any truth in it, it is certainly deplorable. But of one thing we are certain, and that is that there need not be any real distress amongst our Indian population. If there is such distress, and it has been reported among northern Alberta Indians, then immediate and effective relief is most essential. Better rations and better clothing for those in need must certainly come before such long-term remedies as better education. But mere relief is not the answer to the problem, and relief must not be made more attractive than work.

Some Indian bands in Alberta and probably in other parts of Canada are well-off financially through oil leases and the like. However, it appears they are still not getting very much nearer to the goal of full and complete citizenship. Therein lies the core of the problem. I am afraid I must admit that I am an environmentalist in this respect. If we do not do something really effective to change the Indians' environment we will continue to have Canadian Indians rather than just plain Canadians.

We should, I believe, give more encouragement than we do to those who are ready to leave the reservations and make their livelihood amongst the general population. We must take measures to combat this self-imposed segregation which perpetuates the problem.

It may very well be asked, "What do you propose to do about it?" Briefly I propose that our short-range and long-term programs should be more effective, and they must be speeded up. Our progress in bringing up the Indian has been so slow that I am convinced we have not sufficient supervisors and other workers in the field.

I would like at this time to pay unstinting tribute to those Indian agents, teachers, doctors, nurses and missionaries who have worked so hard, and are working so hard, at this most difficult problem. But I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the job is virtually overwhelming those workers who are in the field. I am convinced that our present rate of progress is so slow that in northern Alberta, at least, we are not getting anywhere.

I believe we must be prepared to vote more money to help solve our Indian problem. This is needed to place more workers in the field, and to speed up our education program. The immediate cause of hardship amongst the northern Indians appears to be the depletion of game, due to the advance of white settlement. This has deprived the Indians of their traditional livelihood and reduced them to a marginal existence dependent on relief.

I see it is approaching six o'clock, but perhaps I may be permitted to complete this subject.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Hanna: We must as quickly as possible convince them that they ought to find alternative ways of making a living. Surely it is possible to demonstrate to them that they would enjoy a much better life in work other than hunting, fishing, and trapping. At the moment they appear not to have the necessary skills. We must therefore adopt the quickest way possible to train them in agriculture, lumbering, mining and construction work. There is no question about the need for farm labour and workers in the lumbering industry, but we have not so far persuaded very many Indians that these occupations would offer them a better way of life.

Nearly 150 years ago Thomas Jefferson said of the Indian problem:

> Encourage them to abandon hunting, to apply themselves to the raising of stock, to agriculture, and to domestic manufacture, and thereby prove to themselves that less land and labour will maintain them; and bring within their reach more and more of the things which would help them make the transition.

In that connection I should like to make two comments. First, I agree with it; second, in a century and a half nobody seems to have done very much about it. Much has been said in the chamber in praise of the Colombo plan, and quite rightly so, but what we need is a little Colombo plan for our Indian population. If it works in southeast Asia it should work at home. We have to speed up the program of helping them to help themselves, rather than merely giving them relief. Direct relief, surely, where it is needed; but it ought not to be needed in times like these.

Having said all this, I should like to compliment the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) upon the measures he has taken already to solve the Indian problem. There is no doubt that much good work is being done by many devoted workers. Under the present and former ministers the work of Indian education is being speeded up and many new schools have been opened. The other day I was reading in the Edmonton Journal about an excellent experiment which is being conducted in the town of Jasper Place on the outskirts of Edmonton. Here 60 Indian children are being brought in daily by school bus to attend the town schools with other Canadian children. Everyone connected with this plan deserves the highest praise, for I am sure this sort of thing will pay dividends. All these young Canadians will surely benefit by growing up together.

I should like also to compliment the minister upon the measures he has taken to have Indian children attend technical schools in Alberta. He has also made arrangements to co-operate with the Alberta department of agriculture so that agricultural short courses will be given on Alberta reservations. I hope that measures such as this will be rapidly expanded to embrace as many as possible of our Indian population.

The minister has indicated that he intends to go out west at the first opportunity and study the problems of our northern Indians at first hand. I hope he will find it possible to do this, as I would like him to see for himself what needs to be done.

On motion of Mr. Hanna the debate was adjourned.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ST. LAURENT—CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT ON REPORTED EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like as a matter of privilege to explain at once to the house that, in reviewing the Hansard report of the answer I gave on Friday to a question by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) with regard to the shipments of arms or equipment from Canada, I found my words were not as precise as they should have been.

I said that "at the present time we are as much concerned about the situation in the Middle East as is any hon. member of the house, and that there will be no shipments pending the debate on the matter in the House of Commons." The whole discussion had arisen, in fact, out of the concern about the situation in the Middle East, and I intended my words about shipments to refer to that area which I had just mentioned, and I believe everyone understood that they did refer to that area.

However, when I saw the transcript, it seemed to me the words about shipments might be misunderstood and perhaps taken to mean there would be no shipments to any country, including our North Atlantic allies, and I therefore inserted after the word "shipments" the words "for that area", and I wanted to take this first opportunity to explain to the house that I had done so to remove any possibility of misinterpretation of the statement elsewhere or even here in parliament.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should think all hon. members of the house would welcome the insertion of those words, because I do not think there was any thought in anyone's mind that the shipment of arms as part of our general NATO arrangements should in any way be interfered with. The concern that had been expressed related to shipment to an area where there has been a great deal of disturbance. May I say also that the concern has related particularly to the uncertainty of the ministers as to what the facts are.

Mr. Speaker: Just for the sake of orderly procedure, may I be permitted to point out that a question of privilege is not debatable.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

TABLING OF REPORT FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1955

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to lay on the table two copies of the report of proceedings under the Trans-Canada Highway Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1955.

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Public Works that, according to our new procedure, all he has to do with respect to these documents is to send them to the Clerk at the table.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

AMENDMENTS TO ENLARGE CLASSES OF LOANS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act to enlarge the classes of loans that may be made under the act; to raise the limit on the aggregate amount of loans exceeding two hundred thousand dollars from fifty million dollars to seventy-five million dollars; and to make certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION, MAKE CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act to extend the application of the act, and to provide further for certain changes in consequence thereof and also in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO REVIEW PROGRESS OF FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

On the order:

Government notices of motions—the Prime Minister: The following proposed motion:

That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to review and report upon the progress and programs of the federal district commission in developing and implementing the plan for the national capital;

That the members to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of the said committee be designated at a later date;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records; to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time;

That the said committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and that Standing Order 66 be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that under the new rules this motion must be made a government order.

Mr. Speaker: Government order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINNIPEG—REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT BRISTOL AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Is the minister aware of the fact that a number of employees of Bristol aircraft at Winnipeg have been given notice of termination of employment, and that the notice indicates that there will be further lay-offs owing to a cut-back in government orders? Is there not something the government can do to alleviate this situation?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, Bristol Aircraft Company of Canada is a private corporation. It does work for the government, for T.C.A. and for a number of private contractors. Employment there is a matter for the management. There has been no cut-back in government orders. Work that would ordinarily go to Bristol Aircraft goes to Bristol Aircraft. It would be much more to the point to talk about employment as the result of complaints about Harvard aircraft. But I know of no unemployment resulting directly from any government action at Winnipeg.

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROCEDURE FOLLOWED IN ISSUING PERMITS FOR EXPORT OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): On Friday last, as reported at page 346 of Hansard, the Prime Minister stated that he hoped on Monday to be able to give a full statement with regard to the question of whether any permits had been issued in connection with the export of gun parts or any other military equipment.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Over the week end that matter has been carefully gone into. The reports we have had are being closely checked in the Department of Defence Production, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of National Defence, and the Department of External Affairs. My understanding is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has most of the information required, and that it is being gone over again so that it may be absolutely correct. I understand that he expects to be able to give a statement tomorrow.

STATEMENT ON ARMAMENT OF HARVARD AIRCRAFT DELIVERED TO EGYPT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): On Thursday last, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked me a supplementary question following a question which he had asked of my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs with respect to the ability of the Harvard trainer to carry weapons. His supplementary question to me was:

—have any steps been taken to ensure that military weapons are not provided for the Harvard trainers being shipped to Egypt?

May I say at the outset that the Harvards in question were never the property of nor were they at any time ever used by the Royal Canadian Air Force. They were, I am informed, assembled and built from spare parts by the Canadian Car and Foundry Company Limited for Egypt as training aircraft and are similar to the Harvards now being used by our own air force for the first stage of pilot training. The Harvards built for Egypt are not, I am further informed, equipped with any armament whatever nor was structural provision made in their construction to enable them to be so equipped. To give them any armament capability would require extensive factory rework which would take at least two months.

No items of aircraft armament have been made available by the Royal Canadian Air Force for use in the Harvards built for Egypt, nor has any request for the same been received by the Royal Canadian Air Force. Any such request, if received, would be subject to close scrutiny by government agencies concerned, following the procedure laid down and which I understand will be dealt with in detail by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the statement which he will make tomorrow.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Does the minister suggest that the fact that the Harvard trainers were not the property of the R.C.A.F. means there was any change in the construction of those Harvard aircraft so they would be any different from those ordinarily used by the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Campney: I do not understand the purport of the hon. member's question. The ordinary purpose of the Harvard trainer is for primary training and not for combat. I understand that those built for Egypt were constructed in the same way and to the same specifications as our primary trainer.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps the minister would inform us as to what the significance of the statement was that these were not the property of the R.C.A.F., because there must have been some purpose in making it.

Mr. Campney: The purpose was that the hon. member addressed a question to me as Minister of National Defence and asked me whether we had provided weapons for the Harvard trainer.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker. I wish to make the record quite clear. The question was directed because of a photograph of Harvard trainers that had been supplied by the R.C.A.F., and I asked the question whether there was any difference between the Harvard trainers supplied to the R.C.A.F. and the Harvard trainers supplied to Egypt in those circumstances. I think the question has some importance and can be answered by the minister if he will listen with both ears.

FISHERIES

REPORTED TRANSFER OF BIOLOGICAL STATION IN MARITIME PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Last week, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Royal asked if it is the intention of the government to move the fisheries research station from St. Andrews, N.B., to Halifax, N.S.

The answer is no. Since 1944 this station has grown from a staff of 10 full-time and 7 seasonal employees to 96 full-time and 29 seasonal employees. St. Andrews is the ideal location for the biological station serving the maritime provinces, since it is situated in the heart of most of the fisheries.

One or two maritime fisheries however are not centred around St. Andrews and so for some years we have stationed employees at Ellerslie, P.E.I., and Shippigan, N.B., for oyster studies, and at Chatham, N.B., for smelt studies.

The fisheries research board has now recommended establishing two other small detachments at Halifax to be closer to their work.

The international commission for the northwest Atlantic fisheries has established its headquarters at Dalhousie University, Halifax. Halifax is also the centre of our deep-sea trawler fleet and so it is felt that the section studying groundfish should be stationed there to carry out our share of research work for the commission.

The Royal Canadian Navy and the Department of Fisheries have a joint program of oceanographic studies. Since the navy provides personnel and vessels from their Halifax base, the work will be better carried out if the fisheries scientists are stationed at Halifax.

The total personnel affected is about 20. The move will be carried out gradually over the next two years to avoid inconvenience to the employees affected. The move will also relieve the present overcrowding at St. Andrews station.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

THEFT AT VERDUN—INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT STOLEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Could the Postmaster General inform the house as to how much was stolen last Thursday night from the temporary postal station in Verdun?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): I do not have the exact figure here, but I would be very glad to get it for the hon. member.

ARTHRITIS

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF DUTY AND SALES TAX ON META CORTIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). In his absence, perhaps the question can be answered by the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware of the new, so-called miracle drug meta cortin, which is reported to be effective in the treatment of arthritis? Does he know that the price of this drug in Winnipeg is $40 per 100 tablets, while the corresponding price in Minneapolis is $25 per 100 tablets? I am informed that this drug carries a customs duty of 20 per cent, plus 10 per cent sales tax. Will the minister consider making representations to his colleagues to have the customs duty and sales tax removed so this drug may become available to sufferers from arthritis?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I may say that I am acquainted with the drug. Whether it is a miracle drug or not I do not know and I do not think anybody else knows. I do not know what the price of it is because I neither use it nor prescribe it. However, I shall bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the matter of the duty and the sales tax on it will be given consideration, if it is up to the standard that my hon. friend claims for it.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR CLOSING OUT OF 1954-55 POOL ACCOUNT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister consider closing out the 1954-55 wheat pool account so that prairie producers may receive a larger payment at an early date rather than a smaller interim payment?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I stated on a previous occasion in reply to a question by the same hon. member that no consideration could be given to the subject until Bill No. 2 on the order paper is approved by parliament or otherwise. That is still the situation. It will be the situation and I hope the question will not be asked again until that bill is disposed of.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister not aware of the fact that Bill No. 2 is a bill standing in my name, and the bill he refers to is actually a resolution?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Quite right.

[Mr. Trainor.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MINTO ARMOURIES—INQUIRY AS TO CAUSE OF FIRE AND EXTENT OF DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house concerning the fire at Minto armouries in Winnipeg and the extent of the damage?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question, I cannot inform the house with respect to the cause of the fire, and I can give only an approximate figure as to the estimated damage. I might say it is estimated that the loss will probably reach half a million dollars. In order to determine the cause, a board of officers under Colonel Houghton, commandant of Camp Shilo, is being convened today to conduct an inquiry. The service fire marshal is also leaving Ottawa today to assist in finding out the cause of this unfortunate fire which, I am sorry to say, took the life of one civilian fireman and raged throughout all of yesterday at Minto armouries.

RESERVE ARMY—REPORTED REDUCTION IN TRAINING DAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he is now in a position to answer the question which I asked him on Wednesday last concerning the number of days which reserve army personnel can be paid for training?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. It has been found necessary to contact the various commands and check with them. I do not have the full return as yet.

INQUIRY AS TO EXCESS SUPPLY OF 25-POUNDER SHELLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is the Minister of National Defence able to give me an answer to the question I asked on Friday regarding the number of 25-pounder shells surplus to requirements in Canada?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I am informed that it has never been the practice to give the number of rounds of ammunition of any type or the number of pieces of battle equipment. I think that has been traditionally true for many years and I believe my hon. friend will appreciate the reasons.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on January 13 I directed a question to the Prime Minister as to whether a decision has yet been reached to my suggestion that a select committee of the house be set up to inquire into Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, which had been mentioned in the speech from the throne. At that time the Prime Minister replied:

> No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no decision reached to recommend to the house the establishment of a select committee to deal with that matter.

May I ask, Mr. Speaker, if a decision has yet been made? I would hope that the answer would be in the affirmative.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker; no decision has been made to recommend the establishment of such a select committee.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Shipley for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Hahn.

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, one of the most welcome proposals in the speech from the throne is the plan to speed up the completion of the trans-Canada highway. The Canadian public has become very impatient in the last few years with the seemingly endless delays in getting our first trans-Canada highway completed from coast to coast. It has been said very often that we seem to have lost the art of spanning our continent in spite of our tremendous advances in recent years in technological knowledge. About half a century ago, with far less population and with far less material resources than we have today, we had built two or three transcontinental railways. However, under this new proposal it is hoped that the trans-Canada highway can be completed finally on the new schedule.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that some people have been dragging their feet on this trans-Canada highway scheme. Otherwise it would have been completed long ago. What we need, I believe, is a national highway program similar to the program which exists in the United States. I think we should already be planning for trans-Canada highway No. 2 and hon. members will not be surprised, I am sure, if I suggest it should go through the centre of the prairie provinces by way of Edmonton and the Yellowhead pass and on to the Pacific coast.

I also think we need more highways into northern Canada to speed up development there. Already a start has been made by building the Mackenzie highway through northern Alberta into the Northwest Territories, but I believe additional roads are needed in the Northwest Territories to speed up and encourage development in that part of the country. I am also convinced, Mr. Speaker, that we badly need a new railway line to tap the great resources of the Northwest Territories. It seems to me that such a railway should be made a continuation of the railway lines that exist already in northern Alberta for those railways extend further north than do any other railways in that part of the country at the present time.

More specifically, I believe that Canadian National Railways should extend its line northward from Waterways, Alberta, to Pine Point on Great Slave lake. I hope that the government will consider some form of financial assistance to encourage such extension being made, similar to the financial assistance granted to the Pacific Great Eastern Railway in British Columbia.

I have suggested the extension of both highways and railways into the north. These facilities would not necessarily be in competition one with the other. I believe that both are needed and that the one would complement the other.

I am sure that all hon. members of this house were gratified to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) say a few days ago that the representations of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and the Canadian Council of the Blind were receiving his careful consideration. These representations ask for a basic allowance for all blind persons without any means test. I am reliably informed that Australia and Denmark, and possibly other countries, already have such a provision in their social welfare legislation and I believe that Canada should be kept in the forefront with our excellent Liberal social security program.

There is meeting today in Ottawa a dominion-provincial conference to study proposals for a national health insurance program. We all hope that that conference will be a success and that out of it will come definite proposals for a national health insurance plan.

We have all noted with a great deal of satisfaction that our gross national product is running considerably higher than was forecast in the budget speech last year of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and because of this many Canadians are hoping that the Minister of Finance will sharpen his pencil this year and give us some tax reductions, particularly reductions in the personal income tax.

However, I would be the last to suggest tax reductions at this time if they are made at the expense of our social security program. We cannot have it both ways. I believe that the majority of Canadians want a national health insurance scheme, but if we get it we must remember that it has to be paid for. However, if we as Canadians collectively can produce more per man hour through a well-managed and well-balanced economy, then we will be able to enjoy greater benefits, in the form of either tax reductions or increased social security benefits, or possibly both.

Before I close I should like to comment upon the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) on behalf of the Social Credit group. I have studied the amendment to the amendment most carefully to see how it applies Social Credit theories to the solution of our national problems and I am sorry to say that I can find no trace whatever of Social Credit theories in this amendment to the amendment. There is no mention whatever in there of financial reform, such as those we are always hearing about, and—

An hon. Member: We are not on that side of the house yet.

Mr. Hanna: —there is no suggestion of a basic dividend such as was demanded by the Social Credit convention meeting in Calgary last fall. I am wondering why these and other omissions have been made. I am wondering why our friends across the way have not seen fit to put forward some of their Social Credit proposals in this amendment to the amendment. Can it be that Social Crediters have decided finally that their theories do not actually in fact offer any solution to the problems that face Canada today? I myself strongly suspect that is the real situation.

I believe that the government has done a pretty good job in dealing with the very matters referred to in this proposed amendment to the amendment. If Canada is to continue to enjoy a high level of national prosperity and if the provinces are to continue to get the best possible deal in the matter of dominion-provincial arrangements, then I believe we had better keep a Liberal government in power.

[Mr. Hanna.]

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, like most of the other members who have spoken in this debate, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) on the speech she made in opening it. With the hon. members for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), Halton (Miss Bennett) and York-Humber (Miss Aitken), she sets a very high standard of representation, and her colleagues on the government side have good reason to be proud of her. We of the Conservative party are also very proud of our three women members and particularly proud that we have three times as many of them as the government. Considering that we have only 53 members altogether and the government has almost three times as many, I think we are doing just about nine times as well as the government, in the way of having representation by the women of Canada.

I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laflamme). He did a difficult task and did it very well, and I wish him a useful career in public life. I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister that it is rather unfair to call on a brand new member to make a speech of that kind. I realize that is a custom in the house, but it must be rather cruel for the member who has to deliver the speech.

I should like to warn the hon. member for Bellechasse and the other new Liberal members against following the advice given to them last week by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) at the Liberal party dinner held to honour him and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Press dispatches reported that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say:

> In the "easy" sessions, a Liberal could skip a vote, ducking out of the house; might even, with impunity,— > —openly criticize the government and party policy. But not in the "tough" sessions. Then there could only be undeviating loyalty.

I stress those words.

>
> If Liberals "both in the house and Senate"—

There is a little aside for the benefit of the new senators.

> —toed the party line, Mr. Howe forecast continued power through "another 50 years".

God help Canada if that were to happen. I point out to these new Liberal members what happened last year when this same minister laid down the party line, when he said he had to have his full wartime powers under the Defence Production Act on a permanent basis. I point out to them what happened to the handful of Liberal members who were rash enough to support him on the floor of the house. The only one who derived any benefit from it was the former member for Spadina, who, of course, found a haven in the Senate.

The Prime Minister also followed this party line laid down by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He followed it, for example, for weeks after the debate in the house began, telling us the minister simply had to have these powers or the government of Canada could not go on. Then, once he had the minister away on a fishing trip in New Brunswick, the Prime Minister ran up the white flag and made the most abject surrender to the official opposition that has been made since confederation. Of course, that only happened because he as Prime Minister had failed miserably to give leadership on this question. He knew from the start that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and of Defence Production was wrong and knew that action should have been taken to stop that minister earlier, but did nothing until weeks of debate had gone on.

If the advice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to be taken and the Liberal party members in this house are to toe the party line—and how they can do it more than they have been in the past I find it hard to imagine—the result will be that private members on the government side of the house will be gagged. That position has been the weakest feature of this parliament since it was elected two years ago.

Today I intend to deal with four subjects which did not find a place in the speech from the throne. That means, I suggest, that the government places very little importance on these particular subjects.

First of all, the speech forecast no legislation whatever for the veterans of Canada. Evidently the government has no intention of amending the existing veterans legislation, of introducing any additional measures to help the veterans of this country, or of setting up a committee on veterans affairs—either a standing committee, as so many of us have requested for years, or a special sessional committee.

In fact, the government's attitude is even more reprehensible in that the department now has only a half-time minister. That shows again the failure of the Prime Minister of this country to give leadership. He has allowed this session to commence without the veterans of Canada having a full-time minister to look after the problems which are of concern to them. It shows also the Prime Minister's low estimate of the ability of his parliamentary assistants. He has a great number of them ready, anxious and willing to become ministers, and yet apparently not one of them is suitable to be made the minister of veterans affairs or the postmaster general. It shows also his low estimate of the private members on the government side of the house. There are 170 Liberal members, but apparently among all the private members there is not one fit to take over one of these portfolios. But far more serious than that is this fact, that the failure to have a full-time minister of veterans affairs is unfair to the veterans of Canada. It is an insult to those veterans.

There are certain necessary changes that should be made in veterans legislation. I have not the time today to list them in detail, but I shall point out three or four. For example, there is a deadline in the Pension Act after which a veteran who marries cannot receive any payment for his wife, and if he dies his widow cannot receive a pension. That deadline is set at May 1, 1954. It should be advanced or removed altogether. I cannot see any reason why there should be such a deadline. It was written into the legislation in the first place to protect the veteran from deathbed marriages. In the United States there had been cases of young women marrying extremely old veterans simply to get a pension. In Canada previous governments have felt that such a thing should be prevented and hence the deadline. But there is no deadline for veterans of the second world war and there is no deadline under the War Veterans Allowance Act; also there is a wide discretion in the pension commission to deal with each application. I think the time has come to remove this deadline entirely.

Then the ceiling for the war veterans allowance should be raised. That question was debated at some length during the last session. I believe the time has now come when the permissive income should be increased to $1,200 for the single veteran and $2,000 for the married veteran as requested by the Canadian Legion. If that were done, recipients of war veterans allowance would be able to draw the full amount of old age security when they reach 70 years of age. That is something they are not able to do today.

Another improvement which should be made at this session is that provision should be made for the payment of war veterans allowance to veterans who are compelled to live beyond the borders of Canada for reasons of health. The other day I had an example of a veteran who was obliged to go to Mexico in order to stay alive. At the present time he can stay there only three months without losing his war veterans allowance. The result is that he must come back to Canada to die. I think that is an unfair situation. The same thing applies, of course, with regard to old age security. It should not be beyond the ability of this parliament to frame some provision that will enable people to go outside of Canada, if they must do so in order to stay alive. Some provision should be made to enable them to do so and still draw these allowances.

Also provision should be made for the widow of an Imperial veteran where that veteran came to Canada before the year 1935; at the present time, unless her husband was in Canada for 20 years, she cannot qualify. That means that if he died after he had been here for 19½ years, his widow has no eligibility. In addition, the Canadian Legion made various recommendations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and other members of the cabinet last fall for amendments to the pension act and also for further amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. These matters should be considered by this house during the present session.

I urge the Prime Minister to appoint a separate Minister of Veterans Affairs without further delay, also that he arrange for the consideration of these points that I have enumerated, and for the appointment of a committee on veterans affairs, preferably a standing committee.

The second subject which is not mentioned in the speech from the throne is the International River Improvements Act which was passed by this house last year and which was designed to meet a situation that had arisen on the Columbia river system in British Columbia. Hon. members will recall that there were several lengthy debates on this question. The bill was considered by the standing committee on external affairs. There was a great deal of publicity about the matter for many months and there was almost a civil war between the federal government and the government of British Columbia. In the final analysis, this particular bill was passed. Yet today, in 1956, it seems to have been forgotten. Apparently it has been put on the shelf by the government along with many other policies such as, should I say, that on health insurance.

I should like to outline the reasons for this legislation and the result. For 10 years, ever since 1945, joint investigations had been carried on in the Columbia river basin by dominion and provincial engineers. Then late in 1954 the British Columbia government proposed to make a deal with a United States company known as the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation under which a dam would be constructed at the foot of the Arrow lakes. The federal government took a dim view of that proposal on the ground that such a dam would prevent the full utilization of the Columbia river system in Canada. I think the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) will agree that that was the basis for the dispute between the two governments. Eventually this International River Improvements Act was passed. It established a licensing control by the dominion over the improvements on all international rivers, having in mind primarily the Columbia river.

I have here a report, tabled by the minister a few days ago, showing operations under this act up to the end of December, 1955. The report sums up the purpose of the act very well in these words:

> This act provides for the licensing of international river improvements to ensure that the water resources of Canada are developed and utilized in the national interest.

I think that is a good description of the purpose of the act. The report goes on to show that no applications whatever for licences were received during the year.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would allow me to do so, I should like to say this. The regulations were approved only in the very last days of December or the first days of January. That is the reason why there could not be any applications until the end of 1955.

Mr. Green: Applications could have been made even though they could not have been dealt with. In any event, the minister's own report shows that no applications were made up to the end of last year.

Mr. Lesage: That is right.

Mr. Green: I think the minister should give this house a report outlining the present position with regard to plans for the Columbia river system in Canada. The development of that system must be commenced right away. Last year it was agreed by both the federal government and the provincial government that the Mica creek project could be undertaken. However, there are two major preliminaries. One is that a treaty must be negotiated with the United States concerning payment for downstream benefits. The second is that there must be a plan for financing the construction of the projects such as, for example, that at Mica creek.

First of all, to deal with the question of a treaty, I ask the minister this question. What steps, if any, has the federal government taken to negotiate a treaty with the United States? Last year, during the discussion of his estimates, I questioned him along this line. I refer back to page 4777 of Hansard of last year:

> Mr. Green: General McNaughton has recommended that there be a treaty on downstream benefits. If hon. members remember, I point out today the great urgency in negotiating a treaty of that kind. I should like to ask the minister whether this government has yet taken any steps which would lead to the negotiation of a treaty concerning downstream benefits.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I have suggested the matter to the members of the international joint commission, and I understand that General McNaughton will insist at a coming meeting of the commission for a study of the matter.

There were further questions and answers and I said:

Have no steps been taken to deal with the United States government itself, as distinct from having the international joint commission consider this question?

Mr. Lesage: As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I believe we need the opinion of the members of the international joint commission on the matter. These gentlemen of the international joint commission have been dealing with this question for years now, and certainly they are best prepared to deal with a matter of this kind. Before governments can discuss the matter, certainly as far as we are concerned we want it to be discussed by the persons whom we consider to be the experts in the matter on both sides of the border.

There were further questions and answers to the same effect. I notice that in the regulations which have come out there is a provision that an applicant for a licence must give details of any agreement if it is intended to sell outside of Canada any part of the Canadian share of downstream power resulting from the proposed international river improvement. Although that has been put into the regulations, apparently nothing has been done towards negotiating any treaty with the United States concerning these downstream benefits. One of the federal government's main complaints against the British Columbia government last year was that it had attempted to make a deal which covered in part downstream benefits before a treaty had been negotiated, and yet we find this provision written into the regulations under the act.

In October I had the good fortune to meet Senator Richard L. Neuberger of Oregon when he was in Nelson while on a tour of the Kootenay district as a representative of the committee on interior and insular affairs of the United States Senate. He had been sent out by the chairman of that committee to inquire, on behalf of the committee, into the problem concerning the future development of the Columbia river in Canada. Our own minister has been kind enough to give me a copy of the senator's report, and I received one as well from the senator himself. It is very helpful in showing just what the position is concerning downstream benefits.

The senator, by the way, took a very fair attitude on this whole question. He was going around inviting representations from people in the district and listening to their views. I thought he had a very statesmanlike approach to the whole question and his report is an excellent one. He makes several recommendations to his Senate committee, and I propose to quote two of the recommendations. The introduction to his recommendations is as follows:

As a result of my own study trip on behalf of the committee, I recommend that the Senate committee on interior and insular affairs schedule public hearings at the earliest possible time to inquire into the status of plans and negotiations for the development of the upper Columbia river to the mutual benefit of the United States and Canada.

On the basis of the report which follows, I also make these substantive recommendations for consideration by the committee at such hearings:

1. That responsibility within the United States government for these important negotiations be raised from the level of a purely advisory committee like the United States section of the international joint commission and be explicitly assumed by the policymaking executive departments themselves.

I believe that recommendation should be put into effect in Canada. It is obvious that the chairman of the United States section of the commission is against downstream benefits, and I feel it is a waste of time to have the commission study this matter. It must be settled between the two governments.

The senator adds this further recommendation:

6. That this committee express its firm intent that, in our negotiations with Canada, no effort be spared to arrive at the best possible program for the development of the upper Columbia river—beginning now with the construction of the Libby and Mica projects—so as to maximize the mutual benefits to both countries which share this unique resource. Such a determined and constructive effort must give frank and open-minded consideration to the fair allocation of upstream costs and downstream benefits attributable to upstream storage—including possible sharing of benefits in generated electric power.

Now, as I understand it, that is what the Canadian government says. The senator also has this paragraph which I think is of great importance:

Failure to reach agreement on a mutually beneficial program for developing the Columbia river would threaten the gravest crisis in modern U.S.-Canadian relations, as well as incalculable economic loss to both countries. Agreement and execution of such a program, on the other hand, can assure economic progress for a generation to come for the Pacific northwest in both countries, and can make a material contribution to the industrial and defensive strength of the North American continent and the western alliance.

I do suggest to our own minister that the Canadian government take steps at once to initiate negotiations for a treaty with the United States covering downstream benefits.

The second problem concerns plans for financing construction. I ask the minister, has the federal government any such plans? Has it made any offer to British Columbia? The Mica creek project could be commenced right away, and United States interests are anxious to do this job. They have already suggested that if Canada is not going to build that project they will. I think any such step would be a tragedy for this country. Surely, we can build our own projects.

Senator Neuberger explains the United States offer in his report. He had already dealt with the first proposal, the Kaiser proposal, and then we find this:

> A second specific proposal is the offer of the Puget Sound Utilities Council to finance the construction of Mica dam, also in return for a share of the downstream power benefits realized by Bonneville power administration as a result of the storage provided by the huge Mica reservoir. This proposal was explained to me in Seattle by Dr. Paul J. Raver, former Bonneville power administrator who now heads Seattle city light and is chairman of the Puget Sound utilities council, and Mr. Jack D. Stevens, consulting engineer for the council.
>
> The Puget Sound utilities council is composed of the Seattle and Tacoma city light systems, public utility districts of Snohomish and Chelan counties, Washington, and the Puget Sound power and light company. Together, these five utilities propose to finance construction of the Mica project at an estimated cost of $250,000.

He goes on:

> This plan has been proposed to officials of the Canadian government—

The minister denied at the last session that the plan had been proposed to the dominion government.

> —of the government of British Columbia, and of Bonneville power administration. Like the Kaiser proposal, it depends on agreement with all three of these governmental authorities.

That money in effect would be advanced by the United States federal government. They would place their credit behind the Puget Sound utilities council. I oppose any such plan. I believe that developments of this kind in Canada should be undertaken by Canadians. We have a precedent in the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act which was passed in 1953. Under that act the dominion can enter into an agreement with any province to give assistance in the construction of dams and other works for the conservation and control of water resources in a particular province if they are of a major character.

We have another example in the pipeline plan. The government is now proposing to enter into a joint investment program, not only with the province of Ontario but in effect also with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I believe that only in this way will the Columbia river system be developed to the extent to which it should be developed.

[Mr. Green.]

There is also the Saint John river development. There again the dominion and the province must co-operate. The same is true of the Saskatchewan river dam, if the government ever gets around to approving the construction of that project.

Either the federal government must pay for a portion of the cost of these projects, or it must back the credit of the provinces which actually do the work. That is the course followed in the United States and I believe the time has now come for the Canadian government to adopt a similar policy. Certainly, I hope that with regard to the Columbia river system the federal government is not playing the part of a dog in the manger by passing a bill last year that took very drastic licensing control over the river system and yet sitting back and doing nothing about developing it. If that is to be the policy of this government, then I give warning that the people of British Columbia will be very resentful, and rightly so.

My next subject has to do with the atomic energy field. There have been great changes in that field in recent months. Rapid progress has been made in finding ways of using atomic energy for the production of electric power, not only in Canada but also in many other countries in the world. I find that emphasized in the last report of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. At page 6 I find the following:

> In view of the rapidly accelerating rate of development in the power reactor field—

Canada has set up at Des Joachims a demonstration power reactor, which I believe is being built in co-operation with the Canadian General Electric Company Limited, and will be operated by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, it is hoped, in the year 1958. In addition, there is a research and development program along these same lines, which is described on page 8 of the report of the crown company as follows:

> To sum up, the principal objective of your company's two-fold program is to develop an economic atomic power station for those areas of Canada which have exhausted their hydro resources and where the cost of conventional thermal fuels is excessive. Too much stress cannot be placed on the need for an abundant and cheap supply of electric energy, if Canada's economy is to continue to expand. It is already evident that there are areas of our country which will find it necessary to turn to atomic power, if the growing demand for power is to be satisfied.

In addition, the N.R.U. reactor is to be completed in 1956 at a greatly increased cost, by the way. The original estimate of the cost was $30 million; it is now $50 million. Then, there have been new refining facilities at Port Hope for Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, and there has been a great increase in the production of uranium, and in fact there is need now for markets for uranium outside of Canada.

Where does parliament fit into this picture? Atomic Energy Control Board was set up in 1946 to supervise all the atomic energy program. Parliament votes all the money. We have to pay all the bills. I have always believed that in Canada there should be a standing committee on atomic energy, a watch dog committee protecting the rights of parliament. They have such a committee in the United States. There they have a congressional committee. It was refused in Canada, and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has very carefully kept all of this field in his own hands. Twice there was a special committee in this house, in 1949 and 1953, but we have had a committee only twice in a period of ten years. The result is that parliament has had little opportunity to know anything about the progress being made or to give any direction.

I urge upon the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that there be an atomic energy committee this year to examine into this whole field, not only into the work of the Atomic Energy Control Board but also of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, Northern Transportation Company Limited and into the uranium policy of the government. That committee should have power to send for witnesses. The two previous committees were not given that power. There should now be a committee with the power to send for witnesses, and I hope that by virtue of the work of the committee some measure of control in this field will be brought back to parliament.

My final subject is the deep-sea fleet. Press dispatches of November of last year indicated that the government had decided to let the Canadian deep-sea fleet disintegrate, had refused to adopt any policy to save it. I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) for a statement in this debate concerning the policy of the government on this question, the reasons for the stand taken in November, and also for an explanation as to what has happened to the statement of policy made by Hon. Mr. Chevrier on November 12, 1953. I need only point out to the house that today our deep-sea cargo fleet is practically non-existent. There are 90 odd ships under United Kingdom registry, manned by British sailors under control of the British government. The only interest Canada has is that Canadian companies own those ships and draw any profits that are made. They are all old ships built during the war. Canadian policy does not make it possible for the owners to build modern vessels, and if Canada took them back she would not have men to man them, in view of the failure of government policy during those years.

We need our own shipping. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was out on the prairies a few weeks ago complaining about lack of shipping. He has no Canadian ships to control, no Canadian ships to direct so that they could help with the carriage of our wheat and other products. In a few years from now the St. Lawrence seaway will be completed and I predict that there will not be one Canadian deep-sea dry cargo vessel using that seaway because there will not be any such vessels left under the Canadian flag. It is a ridiculous situation. Here again there has been a complete failure of leadership by the government. We believe that steps should be taken during this session to foster the development and encourage the maintenance of at least a nucleus of modern deep-sea cargo vessels owned and manned by Canadians and operated under the Canadian flag.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I warn the government that for it time is running out. The government is being watched today by the public far more closely than ever before. I need only quote to the Prime Minister an article in the Vancouver Sun of September 19 last. The Vancouver Sun has always been a supporter of this government until last year. It is the largest newspaper west of Toronto. This is the heading of the article:

> Liberals arrogant after twenty-year rule.
> Time to give Canada's government back to people.
> This is first of a series of searching articles on Canada's Liberal government.

There were several of them.

> Canada's Liberal government is getting too fat for its britches.
>
> With an arrogance spawned by 20 consecutive years of power, the administration is slipping into the ways of dictatorial bureaucracy.
>
> A change in Ottawa is overdue. It could come through a revamping of the Liberal hierarchy to bring management of the nation's affairs closer to the people and parliament. Or it could come through a change of government.
>
> Either way, a change from "cabinet rule" appears necessary, if Canadians continue their traditional taste for responsive, broadly-based government . . .
> These are conclusions, the Vancouver Sun, like many people, has come to after a close review of the government's actions in, during and since the last session of parliament.

There is the situation in 1956. I hope the cabinet will get a broader vision than the need for toeing the party line. There is not much inspiration or leadership for the Canadian people in that new policy laid down last week, that the solution is to toe the party line. I hope that the cabinet will try rather to solve some of the serious problems facing the Canadian people. That is their responsibility today.

Mr. Goode: I wonder whether the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will permit a question. He has been very fair in most of what I have heard but in this case he has mentioned certain statements in the Vancouver Sun. I hope he will take the opportunity some time of reading my reply to those statements.

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member should read his own reply. It would be much more effective if he read it than if I did. I am afraid it will not help anyone very much except perhaps himself.

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, along with many previous speakers I wish to pay tribute to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the motion to adopt the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The hon. lady from Timiskaming, with her usual direct and charming manner, brought distinction to her sex, her constituency and herself by the able manner in which she proposed the motion we are now debating. She spoke with clarity and authority of the affairs of her constituency. Therefore, we who are associated with her as representatives of similar constituencies in northern Ontario are proud to take our stand with her as supporters of this government. My congratulations are also extended to the hon. member for Bellechasse on his contribution.

I have the honour to represent the constituency of Sudbury. When the new constituency of Nickel Belt was created in the redistribution of 1953 by absorbing the suburban portion of the old constituency of Sudbury, the urban portion which I represent remained under the name Sudbury. Owing to the vast increase in population we now have two ridings instead of one, Nickel Belt being so ably represented by my genial colleague on the government side of the house.

We have a very cosmopolitan population comprising dozens of nationalities, which makes it a melting pot in the true sense of the word. As an example, in the last year only, at three sittings in the judge's chambers over 600 individuals have received their Canadian naturalization papers. This is indeed a fine record, and these new citizens are taking their place with us to plan and form a strong community and a prosperous Canada.

Most of the rapid expansion and development in our area is due to the gigantic industrial influence exerted by the International Nickel Company which operates six mines and two smelters in the immediate district. The discovery of nickel occurred in 1885 when the railway was being constructed through our district. During rock cut blasting the metals of copper and nickel were uncovered and over the years this metal discovery has grown in leaps and bounds to the immense position in the industrial field it now enjoys. Ninety per cent of the world's supply of nickel is produced in the Sudbury area, with copper second in importance. Other metals in impressive amounts recovered in the smelting process are platinum, palladium, rhodium, ruthenium, gold, silver, cobalt, selenium, tellurium and sulphur and, of course, sulphuric acid. Now iron ore is soon to be added to this group of metals. The company has just completed the construction of an iron smelter at a cost of $19 million, and when all three units are in production will have an annual output of one million tons.

The International Nickel Company has an underground production of 44,000 tons per mine operating day and last year mined 14,468,000 tons. The proven ore reserves stand at 261 million tons, which would indicate continued prosperity for this region for many years. The figures, et cetera, to which I have referred, apply as well to the Falconbridge Nickel Mines, also in our area, but to a much smaller degree. As an example, the International Nickel Company employs 16,000 in our area and Falconbridge approximately 3,000.

I have described the great development and continued growth in industrial might of the Sudbury district to emphasize the contribution my district makes to our peacetime economy and to our security in time of war. This is indeed a billion dollar industry. Because a large proportion of the products are exported, chiefly to the United States, the stabilizing effect on our currency and the maintenance of the balance of trade between our two countries can be readily realized.

I should like for a few minutes to comment on some of the results of good legislation by this government, which has been of great benefit to my riding and which has added to our prosperity and economic structure. We have the fortunate distinction of being at the northern junction of two trans-Canada highways. The present one from Ottawa runs west to join the one running through the central part of the province, turning north at Parry Sound and meeting the present highway at Sudbury. It then continues west as one to terminate eventually at the Pacific coast. This, in itself, certainly puts Sudbury on the main line for motor transportation adding to the main line of the C.P.R. which has served us for so many years.

"Now we are working on the pipe line", as it has been so ably put. Because northern Ontario has been mentioned so often in the construction of the trans-Canada pipe line, it would be of value to estimate what an advantage it would be to us in Sudbury and in the north generally. The mechanics of this service were very thoroughly explained a few days ago by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Carrick), so no further enlightenment seems to be necessary. Suffice it to say that we will welcome this service and use it to the best of our ability both in domestic and industrial consumption. I have been led to believe, though not by any authority, that should the International Nickel Company be convinced that this type of fuel would be more economical than that in use at present they would convert their furnaces to its use. If such a conversion should be made and the company use gas instead of coal or electricity for their blast furnaces, it is estimated that Inco would use more gas as fuel than would be consumed by any of the large cities of Canada for their many needs.

The hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) visited our city last summer and officially opened our airport. This has been a real contribution by the T.C.A. to link us more quickly with the rest of the world, and I am glad to report it has enjoyed satisfactory traffic on this feeder line. As everyone is becoming more air conscious every day, we are indeed proud to have been included in this expansion program. The airstrip is of standard length so I hope soon we will be serviced with the larger aircraft and find ourselves on the main east-west flight across Canada.

We are well serviced with television. The Sudbury privately-owned television station was the first in Canada to be granted a licence and is quite capably performing its public relations and supplying good informative and entertaining programs. We are authoritatively advised that we will be served this fall by the microwave hook-up which will be a welcome addition and carry live programs to us. All this will add to the pleasure of our leisure time and be of value to the cultural life of the community.

I would like to bring to the attention of hon. members that the only bottleneck in the rapid growth and development of our district is the service of our railways. Of course we are fully aware that the C.P.R. was located in Sudbury before this city was more than a village, but at the present time their station and yards have become wholly outdated and there seems to be no evidence of any attempt to cope with the problems consequent upon the advance of the city. As it stands now, the city is cut in half with the main line and switching tracks and the centre of the city tied up in vacant and undeveloped land which could be quickly absorbed for industrial or residential sites.

The yards are so inadequate that trains have to be held out on the main line and prevented from entering the yards by the severe congestion confronting them. Passengers entraining during the rush hours must cross through trains to board others. This is most unsatisfactory. At least two main crossings are almost continuously blocked by trains switching for nearly 24 hours a day, and vehicular traffic is tied up as a result.

It is quite evident the C.P.R. enjoys the major amount of traffic and resulting revenue in our city and is also aware of the difficulty they will have in attempting to expand their service owing to being hemmed in by the city being built all around them.

Under these conditions it is unbelievable that the C.N.R. has made no effort to assist in meeting the traffic demand and consider making Sudbury a competitive point by increasing their service. Surely for the assistance of the Sudbury area the C.N.R. can make an immediate investigation and take action to help remedy this chaotic and decadent condition. The citizens of Sudbury are demanding a solution for this problem and it is for this reason I am making this appeal to the hon. minister who, I hope, will bring this state of affairs in Sudbury to the attention of the president of the C.N.R.

In conclusion I want to congratulate the government on many acts that have helped our area. A few may be mentioned: the Lorne street subway which received considerable federal aid; the new federal building about to be constructed to house all federal departments; the R.C.A.F. radar station which is not too far from our city; and the air services, referred to earlier, made possible by the construction of a new airport.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is being held in Ottawa today one of the most important conferences that has been held for a long time. I refer to the conference being attended by the Minister of National Defence and Welfare (Mr. Martin) along with his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), and their opposite numbers representing the ten provincial governments. As all hon. members are aware, the purpose of this conference is to study the question of health insurance. I shall not take any time to dwell upon the many years that it has taken to reach the point where it begins to look as though something may be done, but I want to say that I chose deliberately to speak today in order that I might draw to the attention of the federal government the fact that of the groups represented at this conference its part is the most important of all.

We all recognize the importance of federal-provincial co-operation in the field of health insurance; we all recognize the important part that must be played by the provinces and by authorities even more local than the provinces; we all recognize the importance of the part played by the medical profession; but the key to any successful health insurance program lies in the method by which such a program is to be financed.

When it comes to the successful financing of a program of the proportions of a national health insurance scheme no local, voluntary or provincial authority has the financial capacity to deal with it satisfactorily. The only body in this country that has the financial capacity to deal with this problem is the federal government.

There are those who still contend that it would be best to leave as much of this as possible to voluntary agencies such as the Blue Cross, Blue Shield and similar organizations, and there are also those who still want to leave the major responsibility for health insurance to the provinces. When one deals with this matter he is not dealing in the realm of theory. The fact is that the experiences of some of the provinces and of voluntary organizations have made it clear that they cannot put health insurance on a financial basis that will be satisfactory, and by satisfactory I mean one that will get health services to the Canadian people according to their need for such services rather than according to their individual financial capacity.

Only within the last little while changes have been made in the rates both of the Blue Cross and the Blue Shield in my province of Manitoba which stress the point that I am making. In the case of the Blue Cross, which we know as the Manitoba hospital services association, whilst there has been no change in the basic rates for some considerable time, a constant change is going on in that groups of people insured under that plan are one by one being put into a category that requires payment of a certain percentage of one's hospital bill. The basis upon which certain groups are being put into that category is that in the view of the Manitoba Blue Cross they are poor insurance risks.

Similarly, the Manitoba medical service, just a short while ago, announced—not publicly, but by informing those affected—that groups of its subscribers who from experience have been found to be poor risks, in the sense that they need more medical care than others, are being put on a higher rate than those who experience has shown do not require quite so much medical attention. In other words, these voluntary organizations, which in filling the gap left by the federal government have done a good job, nevertheless admit that the only way they can carry on is by imposing the cost of hospitalization and of medical services, so far as possible, on the people who actually get that hospitalization or those medical services. This is not insurance at all; insurance calls for spreading the cost over a larger group than those actually hospitalized or given treatment.

There was a day when it was regarded as radical to advocate that everyone should receive education, that education should not be limited to those who could afford to pay for it. There are still some who think that that principle is radical when applied to hospital and medical services. But the fact is that our society has moved on a great deal, and most people who do any thinking at all about this matter today realize that medical matters are of social concern and that our people should get the hospitalization and medical services they require, because they need them and not because of the length of their purses.

I submit that, because the voluntary agencies are finding that they have no alternative but to charge on a flat rate or premium basis, or to charge on a basis where the cost gets back to the people who actually get those services, you are not by that means implementing the principle that health care should be made available to those who need it and that we should all pay for it according to our ability to pay. The only way in which that principle can be put into effect in this country is by the federal government providing the financial basis, and by making available out of general revenue the major portion of the cost of health services.

Therefore, important as is the place assumed at this conference today by the various provincial governments, I submit that the most important part will be that played by the federal government. I call upon the federal government not merely to look for the least common denominator, to sit back and hope that some arbitrary formula will not be met so that the blame for inaction can be put on the provinces, but rather I call upon the federal government to give leadership with respect to this most important issue and to make a financial proposition to the provinces on the basis of the federal government's capacity for raising money according to the ability of the Canadian people to pay, so that we shall get a health insurance plan for Canadians that will really be a step forward.

It has been a pleasure during the course of this debate to hear many more hon. members speaking about health insurance than has been the case in former years. Of course, once it is mentioned in the speech from the throne—that happened many years ago when I first came here—that there is to be a conference of the various governments dealing with the matter, it becomes the thing to do. However, it is not good enough just to have a conference in session, just to have the notion that something will be done. The important thing is that health insurance get started in the right way. Thus a related reason for my urging the federal government to realize its importance at this conference, a related reason for my urging the federal government to give real leadership, is that I do not want to see health insurance programs in this country get off to a wrong start. I do not want them to get to a situation where we have to try to unscramble the omelet. Let us not run the risk of a hodge-podge that would not do the job. There is danger of that at the present time unless the federal government is willing to establish the basic principles of health insurance and lay them down in enabling legislation that will provide for proper health insurance right across this country.

We have at the present time hospital schemes in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and to some extent in Newfoundland. We have voluntary hospital schemes in most of the other provinces. We have the premier of Ontario indicating that, whether or not something is done at the federal level, there will be action in this field in the province of Ontario. No two of any of these schemes thus far are identical. My suspicion is that, if Ontario goes it alone apart from the federal government, its scheme will likewise be different from those in effect in the other provinces where a start has been made. Ontario with its greater wealth could do better perhaps than some of the other provinces, but even Ontario will face the same limitations. Because it does not have the same tax base that the federal government has, it will not be able to go all the way in implementing the principle that we should pay for health services according to our ability to pay and receive those services according to our need for them. That means financing those services mainly out of general revenues. I am satisfied that, if there is not a national plan, if there is not a basic federal enabling act so that we get off to a good start, the day will come when we shall have to unscramble the omelet, when we shall have to undo the hodge-podge of the different kinds of schemes we have in the different provinces. Would it not be the part of wisdom and the part of statesmanship by this present government to avoid a hodge-podge, to avoid an unsatisfactory situation, by offering now to the provinces, this very day, the kind of legislation that will finance a health insurance scheme on a proper basis letting each province come in as it wishes, as was done with old age pensions and give us a chance to go forward step by step into a full-grown program rather than a hodge-podge that would have to be unscrambled?

I want to urge that there be no stumbling-blocks put in the way of a national health insurance program. We have had many of them across the years. Everyone knows that the latest formula is to the effect that the federal government will be prepared to assist in the financing of a health insurance plan in the provinces that wish it if a substantial majority of the provinces, representing a substantial majority of the people of Canada, indicate that they want it. I hope that formula will be met. I hope there will be six provinces—and surely that is a substantial majority of the provinces—indicating that they want health insurance. If Ontario is one of them, along with British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland, and possibly one more, surely that adds up to a substantial majority of the population of this country. But even if the formula is not met in its exact detail, I suggest that the people of Canada will feel that once again they have been let down if for that reason no action is taken.

Across the years we have had the related question as to how an amendment could be made to the British North America Act. This discussion has been sidetracked into the question of how many provinces would have to agree before there could be an amendment of the British North America Act; and we have had discussions as to whether or not this was necessary, depending on whether the money collected for this purpose was collected by way of general taxation or by way of earmarked taxation. We have had the excuse that there were not enough hospital beds. We have been told to wait until the national health grants program resulted in more hospital beds and more facilities. Then, just when we thought we were making headway and just when we thought there was going to be a special committee of both houses of parliament to deal with this matter, in the same way that a special committee dealt with old age security, the international situation took a turn which enabled the government to say that defence commitments stood in the way of spending additional money on health services.

The Canadian people are conscious of this long list of excuses with which we have been confronted since 1919. They want action now. The eyes of Canada are on this conference that is taking place in Ottawa at the present time. Once again I urge the federal government to realize that its job is not just to sit there and find the least common denominator but that its job is to give leadership and to accept the fact that only the federal government can provide the financial base that will make it possible to provide health services to our people according to their need for these services, and let them be paid for by our people not according to the service individuals get but according to their ability to pay.

I wish also, Mr. Speaker, to urge that any health insurance plan worked out at the present time, in which the government must take the leading part, should include not just a minimum of services with the idea that they can be added to 10 years or 20 years from now but rather should include just as many services as possible. I am free to admit that maybe you cannot go the whole way at one fell swoop. The tragedy is that this program was not started a long time ago, at least as long ago as in the early 1940's, the first time it was mentioned in the speech from the throne. If we had only done that, by now we could be moving on to the addition of other services. But at least, Mr. Speaker, the initial stages should include diagnostic services, laboratory services and hospitalization. I am disturbed by the comments from federal government sources which suggest that hospitalization is not very high on the list. It should be right up there in the first stage. From there on the program should be capable of being developed until it includes medical and dental services and even until it includes sickness benefits for the breadwinner when he is out of work, either in the health insurance program or in the unemployment insurance program.

This is an extremely important field of social security, Mr. Speaker. Its potentialities are immense for improving the health of our people, the morale of our people and their productivity, if you will.

I insist that the opportunity must not be muffed by politics being played at the conference today, by governments looking to next elections or what-have-you, but rather all those at the conference should take advantage of the tremendous amount of research and study that has been done in this field and should come up with a program that will really mean something for the Canadian people.

I know there are those who will raise the old question of cost. I also know that the cost of an adequate national health program is today immensely more than it would have been in 1945 at the time of the green book proposals. However, it is still true that any national health insurance program that provides health services to all our people is not going to involve the expenditure of a great deal of new money. For the most part it is a case of rechannelling moneys that are now being spent by various levels of government, by private and voluntary organizations, by philanthropic bodies and by individuals. It is difficult to ascertain just what proportion of the medical costs of Canada are being paid by these various levels. Research done on the matter in the United States and such figures as I have been able to dig up for Canada, suggest to me that something of the order of 40 per cent of our medical bills are already paid by various levels of government which include the three levels, namely federal, provincial and municipal. That figure includes what is being paid for the health care of Indians and Eskimos. It includes medical services for the armed forces and such medical services as are provided for veterans. It includes the health grants and includes the various services provided by the provinces and the municipalities. Hence we are on the way. Social medicine is not something new. Its first stages are here. The Canadian people accept the fact that the cost of medicine is a social responsibility. All we are asking is that we visualize the immense possibilities for the health of our people, both curative and preventive, in going ahead with this program on a vast scale.

Someone might ask why I make a speech like this at this time. Why not let the government hang back? Why not let the government fail? Why not let the government muff this matter? It just so happens, Mr. Speaker, that it does not matter to me who brings in a national health scheme. It does not matter to me who gets the credit for it. My concern is that something be done. For that reason I deliberately chose to make this speech today, so that I might do my best to prod the federal government representatives at that conference to take the kind of action that will see the early establishment in Canada of an over-all health insurance scheme which, right at the start, will provide diagnostic, laboratory and X-ray services as well as hospitalization and which, just as soon as possible, will provide medical and dental services and out-of-work benefits to those who are unemployed because of illness.

A great many people will be involved in working out this scheme, including all the various levels of government and the medical profession. Once again I make my appeal to our friends the doctors in this country who have rendered tremendous service to the people of Canada over the years. One also recognizes the transition that they have had to go through as society's attitude toward these things has changed. I think most of us feel that it is unfortunate that doctors, who have such great capacity for doing a real job and adding to the health of our people, should be obliged to be concerned about economic matters and should have to put the question of making a living even alongside the question of the good they can do for Canadian human beings. I feel that any health insurance plan owes a great deal to the doctors and owes it to them to consider their position, but I also think that the doctors owe a great deal to the Canadian people and that it is their job to find ways of co-operating in a plan that will give the best possible services to all our people in this extremely important field.

There are two or three other subjects, Mr. Speaker, about which I should like to say a few words. First of all, I must say that I listened with interest to what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said on January 16, as reported first at page 124 of Hansard, at the beginning of his speech, and then at page 129 of Hansard, at the end of his speech. He said this:

> The speech from the throne was brought down at a time when the Canadian economy is travelling in the highest possible gear.

That is the theme song of the Canadian government: things are rolling at top speed. Then at the end of his speech he said:

> The attitude of the government is that it wants strength and progress through sufficiency.

I am prepared to accept that statement as a motto or as a goal. But in all seriousness I raise the question as to how those words, "strength and progress through sufficiency", fall on the ears of Canada's old age pensioners. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) may get to his feet as often as he wants to and decry the questions I ask about this matter. He may talk about the committee recommendation that was made in 1950. The fact of the matter is that, since the present figure of $40 a month was set, our gross national product has gone up by over 60 per cent. The gross national product in 1949, when the figure of $40 was set, was $16·4 billion. Estimates for 1955 put it at $26·3 billion; that is an increase of 60·3 per cent. If the gross national product this year reaches $27 billion, as some economists are forecasting, that will represent an increase of 65 per cent over the gross national product of 1949.

I feel it is little enough to ask for, Mr. Speaker, that our old age pensioners should get a corresponding increase in the pension that is paid to them. A 65 per cent increase in the pension which is now $40 a month would bring it to $66 a month. In other words, those labour organizations that are asking for a pension of $65 a month, in my view, are right on the beam. I decry the attitude of the government that these questions should not be asked. I decry the attitude of the government that this matter was settled because there was a committee that made a report in 1950. I decry the attitude of the government that the job is all sewn up because the means test was eliminated. The fact of the matter is that time moves on. No piece of social legislation is perfect for all time. No piece of social legislation ends the story or ends the fight for social justice and a fair deal for the citizens of this land. I insist that the time has come at this session for action on the question of old age pensions. In my view the amount should be increased at least to that figure of $65 or $66 a month for those on old age security, for those on old age assistance and for those on blind persons allowances as well. If we accept that figure for these groups, I suggest the same figure should apply in the case of those on disability allowances. I want also to support the remarks made a few months ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that something further should be done with regard to the War Veterans Allowance Act, particularly with respect to the question of the ceiling on permissible income.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has told us we are travelling in high gear; our economy is rolling full speed ahead. Economists tell us our gross national product is going to be larger than ever. To what avail, Mr. Speaker, this high gear, this tremendous gross national product, unless it gets through to our ordinary Canadian people in health and welfare and a decent standard of living, as well as those things that will make them feel that life is worth living in a country that has attained such progress as the government tells us we have accomplished.

I turn also for a moment to say a word on the question of housing. The government likes to boast of the number of new starts each year. I submit in all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, that the number of people who are losing their lives by fire in houses in this country should challenge this government to a tremendous speedup in its housing program. It is not enough just to be building new houses at high prices for people who can afford those high prices. A country whose economy is travelling in high gear, a country that feels it has great wealth, should be rebuilding from a quarter to half of the houses in this country or all those that are substandard and that continue to contain conditions that could result in further fires and a further loss of life. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, to what avail this high gear, this tremendous wealth, if thousands of our citizens must live in the kind of houses where life may be lost because of the danger of fire?

May I say a word now with respect to education. Here, too, I raise the same question. If we are travelling in high gear is it not a tragedy that in the field of education we seem to be slipping? I know the argument about education being a matter of provincial responsibility under the British North America Act. We in this group support that position taken in the British North America Act without question. The same situation holds in the United States, where education is a state responsibilty; yet President Eisenhower only recently recognized in a public statement that there comes a time when a matter such as education is of such importance to the nation as a whole that the nation as a whole has to consider the financial base upon which education is supported. I plead very strongly, Mr. Speaker, with this government to reconsider its position in this field, and to recognize the need for federal aid to education so that we can go ahead and not slip behind certain other areas of the world which are taking the lead over North America.

It has been suggested to me that there s one field where just a few million dollars —and that is easy for this government to find—could reverse the trend and that is in the matter of scientific training. We are not getting enough recruits in that field in order to keep pace with developments in the scientific world. We are losing many people to the country to the south of us. It has been suggested to me by experts in this field that just a few million dollars spent in scholarships could reverse the trend and keep Canada in the forefront in scientific training. The whole question of education is so important, so basic to our nation today and to our future, and of such nation-wide concern that I cannot but deplore the continued refusal of the government to concern itself with the financing of education. Once again I join my colleagues in this group and other members in other parties in the house; I join those groups of teachers, school trustees and municipal bodies who call upon this government for federal aid to education, without further delay.

I shall be through in a minute, Mr. Speaker, I accept the word of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that this nation's economy is in high gear, that this nation's economy is rolling ahead at full speed. I accept his assertion that strength and progress through sufficiency is a desirable goal. I call upon the government to put that assertion into practice. To what avail this high gear, if it is just statistics and figures and huge profits for large corporations? Let us get the benefit of this high gear, this fast rolling economy, this great sufficiency, through to our Canadian people. There are many ways in which it can be done. I have suggested some of them. I urge immediate action in the field of education, with respect to our veterans, in the field of housing, and in the matter of social security where the old age and blind pensions and pensions for disabled persons should be increased. Finally, I urge immediate action on the question I dealt with in the opening part of my remarks, a satisfactory national health plan. I urge that health insurance be brought in, and that it be based financially in such a way that it will get to our Canadian people, regardless of their individual financial capacity, the health services they need and which medical science is able to provide.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. L. E. Roberge (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, may I join with previous speakers in offering my heartiest congratulations to the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and the seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. With her customary grace, the hon. member for Timiskaming did splendidly in her description of the needs and geographical position of her constituency. She told us, too, of its natural resources and we are grateful to her for giving us this information.

As for the seconder of the motion, though he is one of the younger members of this He explained the needs of his constituency and described, in a very clear fashion, what his constituency is like. Like the mover of the address, the hon. member for Bellechasse is certainly a valuable newcomer to this side of the house.

The people of those two constituencies are certainly proud of their members and, in any event, just by looking at the latter's smiling countenances, it could be assumed that their electors have decided to renew their mandate.

Mr. Speaker, I would very much like to say a few words of the fine constituency which I have the honour to represent, the constituency of Stanstead. As is well known, it is situated in the eastern townships, along the American border, from the state of Vermont to the city of Sherbrooke, which is aptly called the Queen of the eastern townships.

The population of Stanstead is mixed. It is mostly made up of French Canadians, with their love of hard work, joviality, and friendliness. But we have too some English-speaking Canadians, courteous and well versed in business matters, who are a great source of pride to us in that part of the country. To complete this picture of good understanding, we should also speak of those who live on the American border. A large number of those people who live across from us, on the far side of the border, share in our activities. This American element adds to this spirit of good neighbourliness of which we are so proud.

We should not overlook the part played by the Rotary Club and the chamber of commerce in the establishment of this policy of bonne entente in our area, a policy whereby we fraternize daily with our neighbours.

In fact, to illustrate what I say, I might point out that, on the occasion of the American Legion convention in Newport last year, an event to which all governors of New England states were invited, I had the great honour of being one of the guests, which afforded me the opportunity of meeting the governor of the state of New Hampshire, Mr. Dwinell, and the governor of the state of Vermont, Mr. Johnson, and to appreciate even more their spirit of bonne entente. Hence, I am convinced that they will continue to co-operate as in the past. I take advantage of this opportunity to extend to them my best wishes for the new year.

Coming back to the American Legion convention, I must say that I was very proud to see the R.C.M.P. band supply the music on this occasion. On this, may I be permitted to thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who kindly helped us to obtain permission to use this band, as well as the R. C. M. P. commissioner who granted our request. The presence of this band in Newport, besides being great publicity, brought great credit to Canada. Newspapers of the surrounding area, as well as those of the New England states, and all my fellow citizens talked about it for a long time. I also congratulate the members of this band for their dignified behaviour and for providing entertainment which was appreciated by all.

Mr. Speaker, I want to talk now about some geographical situations and, above all, of the industries of this constituency, large or small, in all their forms.

The Beebe district has a granite industry operating on a fairly large scale. As a matter of fact, the Sun Life building in Montreal is a monument to the credit of that little village. Thanks to the co-operation of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) and of my colleague the hon. member for Sherbrooke, the granite you will see in the public building of Sherbrooke was from Stanstead county; it goes without saying that I am proud of that fact because it is going to be a great help to our region as far as employment for our people and publicity for our products are concerned.

In my home town of Rock Island, we have a steel plant which makes precision tools for industry, heavy as well as light. They are tools used in the aircraft, automotive and mining industries, etc. That plant is quite busy. It employs some 600 people, and I am told it is constantly expanding. I heard recently that it had taken on a number of new workers, which is good news indeed for the future of our region.

In the western part of my county and looking towards Coaticook there is a very prosperous little town which makes such products as fire hose, wooden furniture, textile, nylon and rayon. I was told some time ago that these industries are comparatively stable, although I imagine that, like anywhere else, there is always room for improvement. At the present time people seem to be well satisfied.

If we turn northwards we come to Lennoxville, which was formerly part of Sherbrooke county but which has been added to Stanstead county.

At the time of the redistribution, and lately during my first election campaign, I had my leg pulled about this beautiful town of Lennoxville; but I must assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am very proud to have the town of Lennoxville among those of my county, for its people are generally of a practical mind and they made a jolly good town for themselves. There is an asbestos roofing industry, and a few lesser ones. Lennoxville also has a university, of which we are proud, Bishop's College, the graduates of which are a credit to this institution all over the country and in all the spheres of society. Our experimental farm, under the able management of Dr. Mercier, is doing a wonderful job for our locality and our farmers from the eastern townships also benefit from its activity. And I hope things will go on as before.

To go back to the west, we come to the town of Magog, largest in the county. Magog is connected with the larger centres by the Canadian Pacific Railway and, moreover, is crossed in east-westerly direction by a national highway. The town has a population of 11,000. It is, I think, very satisfied with present conditions, though a year or more ago, things did not look very bright, for the town to some extent is dependent upon the textile industry; the Dominion Textile Company indeed has one of its main factories in Magog.

About a month ago, the company's manager assured me that the situation was now rather satisfactory. I was happy to hear this, because last fall, the outlook was rather grim, and heavy clouds seemed to gather on the horizon. There were rumours of unemployment during the winter, and also of an impending strike.

Fortunately, just before the Christmas season, an agreement was reached and the strike was avoided. Winter, therefore, began under good auspices, and I take this opportunity to congratulate the members of the Catholic union for their foresight. As I was saying a while ago, friendly understanding prevails in our district. All concerned were called upon to show their good will, which went a long way towards avoiding the strike. I, therefore, congratulate their president, Mr. Victor Lamontagne, as well as the manager of Dominion Textile, Mr. Jeff Moynan, for their particular co-operation with regard to the settlement of the matter. The latter showed a great understanding of both the company's interests and the workers' needs.

Now, the middle part of the constituency of Stanstead on the whole is rural. The future of agriculture having been discussed on many previous occasions, although I do not want to come back to the matter I feel I should point out that our farmers, as I stated before, live almost in a small paradise on earth. This earthly paradise, however, could still be improved. Some of our farmers are rather well organized as far as co-operatives and marketing are concerned.

In fact, towns close to the county provide them with a market for many of their products. In addition, they have access to a most favourable American market where they can sell their hay and cattle, although it is less interesting at the present time, for beef and other livestock sell at lower prices in the United States than on our own market, so that the prospects at the local level are good.

I believe, however, our farmers visualize the situation from a good angle. With their realistic approach, they anticipate better sales. For in our district the farmer must have a good business training to market his products. He must have also some know-how in mechanics, because in my county mechanization is gaining ground rapidly.

With his tractor and all the rest of his farm machinery the farmer must be enough of a mechanic to keep them operating. We can, in fact, see this every day; he is a good mechanic. Moreover the farmer must be content with a reasonable profit. True, he does receive more for his produce now than was formerly the case but this increase is not commensurate with the increased cost of the equipment he must buy to maintain his farm, etc. Still, he is not unreasonable and faces this situation with stoicism.

I should like to say to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that the farmers of our area are grateful to the present government which, through him, gives a great deal of assistance to agriculture through the maintenance of support prices on dairy products as well as of premiums on hogs, and also through subsidies on transportation of lime.

And, on this matter of transportation of lime, farmers in the eastern townships, who are close to lime quarries, do not, in my opinion, fully appreciate this situation. They do not seem to be interested in taking advantage of this product, of which there is such a need in my area.

I believe that I have given a fairly exact description of the situation in my constituency, as I have availed myself of the latitude given us in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne to elaborate on several topics.

I should like, in passing, to express full support of my colleague from Sherbrooke (Mr. Gingues) as regards health insurance. I do not wish to elaborate on what he said. With his talent and foresight, he gave to the house a fine outline of health insurance and I do want to repeat that I support him unreservedly.

There is a further point I should like to deal with for the welfare of my district. It has to do with the construction of an airport and once more I join my colleague in supporting that idea. Last year steps were taken to that effect and the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) undertook to consider the project. I hope the study has advanced to a point where before long we may expect an announcement on the construction of an airport, in the vicinity of Sherbrooke.

Now, Mr. Speaker, our junior boards of trade in Coaticook and Magog have initiated a campaign this winter against the sale of obscene literature. I want to congratulate them on their move. They start their inquiry by looking over the books to be found on the stands and which, even though they are not too bad, are nothing but cowboy stories, murder stories and the like, and, as such, are not suitable reading for our young people. To my mind, it is important to consider that problem and to act before it is too late. But what is still more serious is the clandestine sale of certain books provided by special agents, books which lead to corruption, books that are obscene. As a matter of fact, I rather believe that the sex crime wave of which we have heard so much lately is connected with these disgusting and revolting books. An inquiry might show us that these criminals spent their idle hours wallowing in the reading of this obscene literature until, unable to control themselves, they attacked the first passer-by, the unhappy victim of these unbalanced people being quite often some poor little child.

I would compare these people to the hyena which roams about the desert at night looking for putrefying corpses, because they like to wallow in filth, in all that is dirty. That is where they find their pleasure.

I know that that field is under municipal and provincial authorities. However, I would ask the Minister of Justice to take whatever steps he can so that the law will be complied with in so far as the sale of pornographic literature is concerned.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow the example of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) and other hon. members who have spoken in both languages during this debate, and make a few observations in English. I think this would indicate our full belief in the bonne entente which our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) wants to bring into being. I think the use of both languages is completely in line with the procedure followed in this house.

I should like to deal with a matter which is a rather complex and touchy one. A few years ago I would not have dared to mention this, but conditions have changed and things are looking brighter all over the world. I refer to Japanese immigration. Everyone realizes that to deal with this problem a few years ago would have been out of the question, but the peace treaty has been signed and the Japanese have adopted our democratic way of life and perhaps it is our duty to try to keep them in that way of life.

Japan is not a member of the United Nations but recently she has shown a spirit of real co-operation. I do not want to put this in the way of a formal request but perhaps I could suggest to the minister of immigration that a change be made in our immigration laws. Under the present law Japanese immigrants are not permitted to enter this country; our doors are closed to them. I think under present conditions our minister of immigration might be permitted to remove this stigma from the Japanese people and open our doors a little.

As I have stated to the former minister of immigration, I do not believe in open-door immigration, but I like to see immigration treated realistically. People who are permitted to enter this country should be those who can comply with our immigration laws. We do not want all aristocrats and blue-blooded people, but those who come here must have good health, good character and have a good background. They must have everything that will help to make them good citizens.

Although the Japanese people are used to a different climate and have a different religion and way of life, I think they can become good citizens of Canada.

In the constituency of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Deslieres) there are some Japanese who were displaced persons during the war. They have assimilated themselves into the population of that district and have become good citizens. I have talked over this problem with some responsible people, one being a former member of parliament who has been to Japan a couple of times and has studied the problem over there. He tells me that when he goes there to do business he finds the Japanese willing to enter into negotiations for the exportation of goods or perhaps the purchase of some of our products, but during the course of conversations with them they always ask, "What have you Canadians against the Japanese that you will not permit immigration into your country?"

Our representatives over there are rather on the spot because they cannot reply to a question like that. All they can do is to reply the best they can. As I say, I have discussed this matter with Mr. Hallé, a former member of parliament, and we may hear more about it later. He has told me that a change in our policy in this regard would help our export trade in the way of cattle and raw materials with some manufactured goods. He says that there is a good market in Japan for farm machinery. It would also help our commerce with Japan in other ways.

I know it will be said that if we open our doors we will have too many Japanese coming into the country, but that is something for the powers that be to decide. We are looking for markets all over the world and I think this would offer a chance to improve our situation in that direction. Our missionaries over there would be benefited in carrying our social welfare education. There is always this feeling in the minds of the Japanese and they treat our missionaries in an inferior way. They do not have the freedom that they would have otherwise. I hope the minister will give a little consideration to this problem.

As I said before, I am not in favour of open-door immigration, but it could be done on a strict quota basis. We should treat the Japanese the same as we do the people of other countries in that part of the world. This concludes what I have to say on the Japanese situation although I could extend my remarks and speak a little longer.

Another problem I should like to mention is one that has been mentioned before in this house, though I do not think it has ever been very much discussed. Although I do not wish to labour the matter, I just want to say a few words on what is called the world calendar.

In our days, speed prevails in our way of living, and everything is streamlined in industry, in accounting, in manufacturing processes and in everything connected with industry and trade. This world calendar would meet present conditions better than the Gregorian calendar we are now using. I have nothing against the present calendar, but as we have improved many things in our way of living, this is just one suggestion that I place before the house.

Most of the industrial people and religious people with whom I have talked over this matter have no great objection to it. However, it has to be adopted on the higher level, and I would leave the problem to the Canadian standards association or to the cabinet to be presented. I believe the only way it could be adopted would be by the United Nations.

The purpose of this world calendar would be to improve, regularize and stabilize our time system. I believe it would more adequately meet our modern conditions and would respond more to the present needs of industry, government, agriculture, religion, science and education—every field, one might say.

I shall not describe this calendar at length, as many of you have probably read about it. It has only a few alterations as compared with the present calendar. The quarters would begin on the 1st of January, 1st of April, 1st of July and 1st of October. In those months there would be 31 days, and all the other months would have 30 days, but at the end of the year a day would be added which would be a world holiday. The advantage of this calendar is that it would be permanent. We would not have to get one every year. It would be the same year after year. If you were planning future engagements of any kind, you would know, for instance, that if the 5th of May this year falls on Sunday, the 5th of May would fall on Sunday every year thereafter.

Mr. Speaker, in order that members may have a better idea of this calendar, would I be permitted to place it on record on Hansard as an appendix?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member consent to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roberge: The table is as follows:

(*World Holiday)

I do not wish to labour this matter, but I believe this calendar would be an improvement on the present one. It will have to be adopted all over the world at once, and it is up to the cabinet to present it to the United Nations, as I have said.

In closing, I may say that the speech from the throne had a good deal on the table for us, even if the opposition, as always, claimed that there is nothing worthwhile in it. However, I noticed that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) spent one and a half hours talking about it, saying that there was nothing in the speech from the throne and so on. We have had statements from banks and commercial interests that 1955 was an outstanding year, one of the best years we ever had, and they are looking forward to 1956 being another good year. With all these accomplishments the government certainly deserves great credit; but every Canadian throughout the country has also contributed to this state of affairs, otherwise it would not be so. If every Canadian farmer stays at his plough, every machinist in the shops stays at his machine and every banker stays at his desk throughout the whole economy of the country, then 1956 will be even better than 1955. The same applies to 1957, and I think that in 1957 we shall see another glorious year for the Liberal party.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the pleasant task of congratulating the mover (Mrs. Shipley) and seconder (Mr. Laflamme) of the speech from the throne is this year even pleasanter. For the first time we have had the resolution moved by a member of the stronger sex. As has already been pointed out, she comes to us here with that most invaluable experience, which one of our own women members has, namely, municipal experience.

In regard to the seconder, I at any rate am one of those who can regard him with envy when thinking of the long number of years that he may have ahead of him if he is fortunate enough, of course, to escape defeat at the hands of our party.

Now I should like to say a word or two about parliament as such before I come to what may be regarded as partisan matters, though I really feel that nothing I say this afternoon will be partisan. I just want to say a word or two in general terms.

When I had the good fortune to come to this house some ten years ago, I felt it was an honour as well as a responsibility. Although life in the opposition has its frustrations, for we do not always defeat the government, nevertheless I have felt that life here was very much worth while. I have felt that parliament, as it is the guardian of our free way of life, is really the guardian of all kinds of freedoms: that is to say, religious freedom, freedom of the press, freedom of competition, freedom of labour associations and freedom of business associations. I imagine we can all agree on that.

The only reason I mention this rather obvious matter at all is that it seems to me that the events we are now facing place on us a new and heavier responsibility and, along with it, a new and heavier task than we have ever had before. We have this new competition, this cold war, which in some ways is so alarming to us. However, it offers a strong challenge in putting it up to us that this free way of life, of which we talk so much and in which we believe so much, offers new responsibilities that we must recognize and that we must face.

One needs only to refer to the events of the moment: the recent visit of the Russians to southeast Asia and their attempts to help other countries, to put themselves forward as the real helpers in economic affairs and in military affairs, and in every way to seek to have the rest of the world look to them.

One particular aspect I should like to stress as being of special interest to many in this house is the tremendous impact that has already been made in the sphere of education. In a moment I am going to read an item from the daily press. Those in this house—and there are a good many of them—who are closely associated with the educational process, will realize how strong the impact of Russia is, particularly in respect of technical services. Some of us have hoped that education need not be much devoted to technical services as it had to be during the war. But we have responsible newspapers viewing with alarm—to use that phrase—what is going on now in Russia in the way of technological training. I am referring now to an article from the Ottawa Journal which says this:

> London dispatches tell of alarm voiced by Britain's leading newspapers over Russia's strides in technological training—

Then there is a quotation from the London Times.

> The London Times says that the plan, with its emphasis on technical training, is "a sobering reminder of the steady industrial progress which continues as the background to soviet foreign policy".
>
> The London News Chronicle says that the soviet threat is "obvious and enormous", that the West is "lagging hopelessly behind in technical education", and adds: "The western powers can no longer postpone bold, wholesale and imaginative revision of their educational systems".
> The Manchester Guardian has equally sobering comment.

So I say that, like all responsible people, we in this house particularly, must have regard to these things and to their implications. We believe that by the very terribleness of the new weapons we may escape them. But there is no immunity to this other kind of competition except through renewed efforts and renewed intelligence on our own part.
